Hamdan's lawyers complained about the colloquy in a recent legal filing, and the origin of Graham's and Kyl's comments has drawn recent attention on legal Web sites and on Slate.com. The subject did not come up during yesterday's Supreme Court argument, which focused on broader issues.

The briefs filed in support of the government do not make clear that the Graham-Kyl debate was manufactured. In their friend-of-the-court brief, filed in February, Graham and Kyl note that the "Congressional Record is presumed to reflect live debate except when the statements therein are followed by a bullet . . . or are underlined."

The Graham-Kyl exchange is not marked in either way, although a C-SPAN recording and other records make clear that the discussion never happened.

Members of the House and Senate routinely insert lengthy statements into the Congressional Record without uttering them on the floor or anywhere else. But Senate historian Richard Baker said that colloquies -- contrived debates between two or more lawmakers -- are relatively rare. Baker said he could not recall another example that included feigned banter of the type found in the Graham and Kyl debate.

David H. Remes, a Washington lawyer who has helped Hamdan's defense team, called the colloquy "outrageous."

"This colloquy is critical to the government's legislative history argument, and it's entirely manufactured and misrepresented to the court as having occurred live on the Senate floor before a crucial vote," Remes said.

Representatives from Kyl's and Graham's offices did not respond to telephone messages yesterday. A spokesman for Levin and a spokesman for the Justice Department declined to comment.

Padilla Judge Restricts Classified Info (AP)

By Curt Anderson

AP, March 29, 2006

MIAMI -- The federal judge overseeing the terrorism case against Jose Padilla imposed tight restrictions Tuesday on the handling of classified material to prevent disclosure of national security secrets when classified evidence is turned over to the defense.

DOJ_NMG_0023142

U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke agreed to a prosecution motion on the information, expected to include secret FBI investigations, material provided to the United States by foreign governments and Padilla's own words from interrogations during his 3 1/2 years in military custody as an "enemy combatant."

The former Chicago gang member was once accused of plotting as an al-Qaida operative to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" inside the U.S., but those allegations weren't mentioned in the indictment.

Padilla and four others are charged with being part of a North American terror support cell that provided recruits, money and supplies to Islamic extremists worldwide. All have pleaded not guilty.

Cooke said the order would allow defense lawyers to begin examining secret evidence under special conditions so they can prepare for a trial scheduled for September.

"We've got to go forward," Cooke said at a hearing.

Padilla, a former Florida resident, was added to the Miami terror case late last year amid a legal struggle over President Bush's authority to hold him indefinitely as an "enemy combatant" without criminal charge.

In court documents, prosecutors outlined some of the classified material expected to come up in the trial:

_Results of surveillance conducted by the FBI in a separate investigation authorized by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, which oversees eavesdropping and other monitoring of suspected foreign agents in the United States.

_A request to limit defense questioning of a witness about the chain of custody of a specific piece of evidence. No details were given, but the defense has raised questions about a "mujahideen data form" Padilla allegedly filled out to attend an al-Qaida training camp in Afghanistan.

_Information provided to the U.S. by an unspecified foreign government. The material may eventually be declassified, prosecutors said.

_Written and recorded statements Padilla made while in military custody. Some information about Padilla's interrogations has already been made public and the Justice Department is seeking declassification of most of the remaining evidence.

Defense attorneys objected that Cooke's order was premature and overly broad. They were particularly incensed by a related government proposal that they sign a document verifying that they understand the laws regarding classified material and the potential penalties for violations.

"It chills us in our ability to prepare a defense. It's just overbearing," said Kenneth Swartz, who represents defendant Adham Amin Hassoun.

The judge agreed with defense lawyers on that point and asked prosecutors to come up with a less burdensome agreement for defense attorneys to sign.

Prosecutors Rest Case In Terrorism Trial (LAT)

By Rone Tempest

The Los Angeles Times, March 29, 2006

SACRAMENTO — Federal prosecutors rested their terrorism case Tuesday against a Lodi father and son by showing satellite images of a compound in remote, northeast Pakistan that closely resembled a training camp described by the son in an FBI interrogation.

Based on the satellite photographs and the videotaped questioning, Department of Defense image analyst Eric Benn concluded that the site was a "probable militant training camp." Earlier in the trial, a former Pakistani police chief testified that a militant writer — whose books were found in a search of the Lodi man's home — runs a training camp in that area.

It was the strongest evidence produced by government lawyers who have had problems with the credibility of their undercover FBI informant and the legitimacy of a purported confession obtained after hours of interrogation.

But the case against Lodi ice cream truck driver Umer Hayat, 48, and his junior high school dropout son Hamid Hayat, 23, has so far not lived up to its advance billing as a breakthrough in the war on terror.

When the Hayats were arrested last June, federal investigators claimed they had shattered a trained Al Qaeda sleeper cell in California's agricultural heartland. And, in her opening remarks, Assistant U.S. Atty. Laura Ferris said Hamid Hayat was "awaiting orders" to commit a terrorist attack in the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0023143

But no evidence has been presented that he or his father had any direct links to Al Qaeda or had specific plans to launch a terrorist attack.

During his interrogation by the FBI, Hamid Hayat, who speaks halting English, vaguely described a camp that he attended, though he never clearly indicated that he participated in any training.

Former Los Angeles federal prosecutor Jan Handzlik, now a private attorney, said the difference between the government's sensational claims and the relatively mundane drama unfolding on the 13th floor of the Sacramento federal courthouse stems from the "amorphous" charges against the two men. The younger Hayat is charged with attending a training camp in 2003; both men are charged with lying to the FBI.

"While the government asserts a vast conspiracy to harm U.S. interests," Handzlik said, "the charges against the Hayats are in fact very narrow. At issue is the truth or falsity of specific, limited statements made during lengthy FBI interrogations. Jurors sometimes sense this gap between perception and reality, and wonder why the government's proof has failed to live up to its advance billing."

The links to Al Qaeda are tenuous at best, traced by prosecutors through an array of fundamentalist Pakistan political parties that also are involved in the Pakistan-India conflict over Kashmir. A juror who heard all of the evidence before she was excused from the case last week said she was unconvinced by the videotaped confession, saying the younger Hayat appeared to have been "badgered" into saying what he thought agents wanted to hear.

Pedro Tenoch Aguilar, who had been an FBI agent less than a year when he was asked to lead the Lodi terrorism investigation, testified that the government had gathered no on-the-ground evidence from Pakistan that Hayat attended the camp, though undercover informant Naseem Khan told investigators that Hayat intended to go.

"The government," said retired FBI agent James J. Wedick Jr., who serves as chief investigator for the defense, "has failed to develop any evidence suggesting Hamid Hayat attended a terrorist training camp, despite the fact the FBI has an office in Islamabad, Pakistan, and had access to the resources of the CIA and the super-secret National Security Agency. And, they knew his name, address and phone number in Pakistan where he went to help his mother and get married."

The prosecution is fighting a defense motion to have Wedick, a decorated, 35-year FBI veteran, testify as an expert witness on proper techniques of effective investigation. Today, the trial switches to the defense side; the trial is expected to last at least two more weeks.

Even the alleged confessions of the father and son, obtained in separate interrogations, conflict on important facts. The younger Hayat told interrogators he attended a camp near Balakot, described in Tuesday's satellite testimony. His father claims the camp his son attended was only a few miles from a family home in Rawalpindi.

No evidence was produced about what training Hamid Hayat received. He said he spent his time in the kitchen, peeling vegetables.

The government also faces a serious credibility problem with Khan, the paid informant who shocked the courtroom when he testified that he saw Al Qaeda's No. 2 leader, Ayman Zawahiri, casually attending the Lodi mosque in 1999.

That surprising claim by the 32-year-old former Bend, Ore., convenience store clerk has been universally discounted by terrorism experts and government officials who say it is very unlikely that Zawahiri traveled in this country after 1995, and probably not after 1993.

The FBI provided Khan with a car and paid him nearly $230,000 in salary and expenses to infiltrate the Lodi Muslim community.

Some legal experts say the Lodi case fits a national pattern in which federal officials, eager to show progress in the Bush administration's "war on terror," exaggerate their anti-terror accomplishments only to get bogged down when it comes to proving them in court.

"The Hayat case is like a number of other cases in which the government has somewhat overstated the case going in but, when put to the proof, it has not always been so compelling," said Carl Tobias, a University of Richmond law professor who tracks terrorism prosecutions.

Last week, excused juror Andrea Clabaugh, a Sacramento engineering firm account executive, told reporters that, in her opinion, the government had failed so far to prove its charges against Hamid Hayat.

DOJ_NMG_0023144

"It felt to me like he was being badgered and it felt to me, in some respects, he was giving the information because they refused to believe that he didn't know anything. He had to say something."

Even with difficulties facing the government, the two juries in the Hayat case — one for each defendant — may ultimately convict.

The jury pool for the Eastern District of California, where the trial is taking place, draws from some of the state's most conservative areas, including the northern Sacramento River valley and Sierra foothills, which are overwhelmingly supportive of the Bush administration and its policies.

But as Clabaugh's reactions suggest, that is far from certain.

Terror Camp Allegedly Attended By Hamid Hayat Likely Exists, Analyst Says (LODINS)

By Layla Bohm, News-Sentinel Staff Writer

Lodi News-Sentinel, March 29, 2006

Defense attorney says uncertainty leaves reasonable doubt

SACRAMENTO — There is a 60 to 70 percent chance that Hamid Hayat attended a "militant training camp" in Pakistan and that the camp actually exists, a Department of Defense analyst told a federal jury today.

Eric Benn, who has viewed tens of thousands of surveillance images in his years with the department, spent hours going over satellite images of a mountainous region in northern Pakistan. It was there that 23-year-old Hayat allegedly spent several months in a training camp in 2003 before returning to the United States last summer.

The defense maintains that Hayat made up the account only after hours of repeated questioning of the FBI. And, defense attorney Wazhma Mojaddidi pointed out, jurors must have proof beyond a reasonable doubt. While Benn said the possibilities of the camp existing were high, Mojaddidi took a different angle.

"So that leaves the probability of 30 to 40 percent that it may not actually be a militant training camp, is that correct?" she asked Benn.

"That is correct," he replied.

Benn was the government's last witness, and prosecutors rested their case at 2:06 p.m. after nearly five weeks of trial. The defense portion of the case against Lodi residents Umer and Hamid Hayat is set to begin Wednesday.

Hamid Hayat is charged with lying to the FBI and providing material support to terrorists by attending a camp.

His father, Umer Hayat, 48, is charged with lying to the FBI. He was not in court most of today, as two juries are hearing the trial and only Hamid Hayat's jury was allowed to hear evidence of the alleged camp. The elder Hayat did appear in court later, when attorneys argued legal motions after jurors left for the day.

Showing the jury four poster-sized arial photos of a region near Balakot, Pakistan, Assistant U.S. Attorney David Deitch asked Benn to point out various landmarks. One was a paved, two-lane road that wound through tree-covered mountains. Another road, unpaved and more rugged, branched off the paved road, starting where several vehicles and a bus were parked.

"A bus has no business going up this road," Benn testified in response to a question by Deitch.

During FBI interviews last June, Hamid Hayat at one point said he traveled by bus to a camp, then had to walk several miles at night with a flashlight. Benn reviewed those interviews, and jurors saw short excerpts today.

The distance Hamid Hayat said he traveled was "consistent" with the arial photos, as was a vague description of a clearing with buildings in it, Benn testified.

Based on the photos and Hamid Hayat's interviews, "it's much more likely than not" that the site is a training camp, Benn said.

The area can be found on Google Earth, a mapping program that features satellite images of the world. Much of Pakistan is in low-resolution and details cannot be seen, but the area immediately surrounding the alleged training camp reveals more details, including blue rooftops on buildings near a clearing.

Benn also pointed to two distant buildings he believed could be guard shacks to limit access to the alleged camp. Satellite photos taken in October 2001 — also shown to jurors — showed that most of the buildings had not been constructed then, and Benn pointed to groups of tents.

The senior analyst began working with images and intelligence shortly after entering the U.S. Army in late 1976. He was soon conducting surveillance along the Germany-Czechoslovakia border at the height of the Cold War, then got a master's degree in geography when his stint in the Army ended. He went to work for the Defense Department in 1983.

Benn continued his surveillance work by watching North Korea and later the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan. He was ultimately promoted more than once and now holds the civilian rank equivalent to a two-star general.

His work consists of analyzing photos taken by camera and satellite, looking at them from various angles and enhancements, and also using other intelligence to interpret them.

"At the most pedestrian level it can be count the number of tanks in a garrison," he said, or it can extend to "look at a potentially adversary nation that may be developing nuclear weapons."

Whether the camp exists, and whether Hamid Hayat attended it, will ultimately be up to the jury to decide. Benn said today that he had never visited the camp, and that he knew of no government employee who had seen it.

Contact reporter Layla Bohm at layla@lodinews.com.

SACRAMENTO Hazy Case Against Lodi Man Prosecution Rests -- Evidence Murkier Than First Described (SFC)

By Demian Bulwa, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, March 29, 2006

Sacramento -- Returning to Lodi last summer after a two-year trip to Pakistan, Hamid Hayat was grilled by FBI agents who suspected he might be a terrorist. But the young man didn't seem to understand he was in trouble.

He was questioned three times in the course of a week. When agents told him he had failed a lie-detector test, he confessed to attending a terrorist training camp in Pakistan.

But as Hayat sat in a lobby in the bureau's Sacramento office, eating pizza and waiting to confess further, he invited the lead agent on his case to a party -- a reception to be held when his Pakistani bride arrived. He also complimented the agent on his shoes.

Such unusual details have infused the trials of Hayat and his father, which reached a critical point Tuesday when prosecutors wrapped up their six-week case before a pair of juries in U.S. District Court. The younger Hayat, 23, is charged with supporting terror by attending a paramilitary camp in late 2003 and with initially lying about it; Umer Hayat, 48, is charged with lying about his son's training.

Prosecutors rested after revealing a far murkier case than the government had laid out in documents supporting the charges.

The government showed that Hamid Hayat held some radical and anti-American views. Their last witness was a Defense Department analyst who said Tuesday that Hayat's description of the camp during his disputed confession -- he said it was in a mountaintop clearing outside the Pakistani city of Balakot -- was consistent with satellite images, which showed a "possible" camp in the area.

One of the prosecution's main witnesses, however, was an aggressive informant who raised eyebrows when he reported having seen Osama bin Laden's chief deputy at a Lodi mosque as late as 1999 -- a sighting that national security experts doubt was genuine.

Prosecutors also were forced to rely on the defendants' videotaped confessions, which they called "the meat of the case" but which featured conflicting and sometimes bizarre details.

Umer Hayat, for example, told FBI agents that he had visited his son's camp out of curiosity in late 2004. While the son spoke of training with as few as 35 men in a field, the father described an underground room in a different province of Pakistan where 1,000 masked men, including Americans, fired machine guns, swung curved swords and learned to pole vault across bodies of water.

"You didn't take that as a literal description of what was happening, did you?" the elder Hayat's attorney, Johnny Griffin, asked FBI agent Timothy Harrison.

"I believe at times that Umer Hayat was a poor judge of the distances involved in jumping with a pole," Harrison responded.

Defense attorneys, who expect their case to take about two weeks, say the Hayats never went to a training camp but lied when pressured in a misguided attempt to be helpful. As for Pentagon analyst Eric Benn's testimony Tuesday, Hamid Hayat's attorney, Wazhma Mojaddidi, pointed out that her client had also placed the camp in Kashmir and Afghanistan.

At the center of the prosecution's case is Pakistani American informant Naseem Khan, who was working at a fast-food outlet and convenience store in Bend, Ore., when the FBI came to him weeks after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

The agents asked whether he was involved in money laundering for a charity called the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development, which authorities suspected of funneling money to the Palestinian group Hamas, according to trial testimony.

Khan, 32, denied having anything to do with the charity, but volunteered to agents that while living in Lodi in 1999, he had seen al Qaeda's second-in-command, Ayman al-Zawahiri, at the Lodi mosque. Khan later told agents he had seen two other men on the FBI's list of most wanted terrorists in and around Lodi, an assertion that several terrorism experts regarded as unlikely.

By December 2001, Khan testified, he was working for the FBI in Lodi in a terrorism investigation that would eventually earn him more than $225,000 in salary and expenses. His code name: "Wildcat."

Though Khan did not disclose his targets, defense attorneys and Lodi residents said Khan got close to Muhammad Adil Khan and Shabbir Ahmed, Muslim clerics from Pakistan who were in Lodi on religious worker visas. The men were detained last summer, along with the Hayats, on immigration violations, and later agreed to be deported.

Khan said that in the summer of 2002 he stumbled upon Hamid Hayat, a man with a sixth-grade education who was born in the United States but had spent half his life in Pakistan. Khan soon received permission to begin recording their conversations.

The men chatted about cricket, quitting smoking and Hayat's "jinxed" love life. When Khan posed as a would-be holy warrior, Hayat took the bait, expressing support for the Taliban and radical Sunni sectarian groups in Pakistan and showing off what prosecutors described as a "jihadi scrapbook" full of articles about militants.

Hayat told Khan that he planned to attend a training camp, but never indicated that he had actually gone.

"I have one objective now," Hayat told Khan on April 1, 2003, just before leaving Lodi. "If I went to Pakistan now, see, straight away, I'll stay at home for one or two weeks, then I'm going for training, friend."

In phone calls over the next couple of months, however, Khan scolded Hayat for "sitting idle" and "wasting time," and at one point told him to "be a man."

Khan testified the insults were a way "to make him talk."

The FBI was sufficiently interested in Hayat to divert his flight home last May to Japan, where the bureau's legal attache in Tokyo, Lawrence Futa, interviewed him. Futa recalled in testimony that Hayat was thin and "didn't appear to be someone who had gone through rigorous training recently."

A week later, however, Hayat confessed that he had attended an al Qaeda-run training camp and had returned to the United States "to carry out his jihadi mission," according to an affidavit signed by FBI agent Pedro Aguilar.

Umer Hayat, the agent wrote, admitted that his son had gone to a camp operated by Maulana Fazlur Rehman, the opposition leader in the Pakistani parliament -- a claim the defense calls outlandish. Initial news accounts of the arrests last year mistakenly assumed the reference was to Maulana Fazlur Rehman Khalil, the head of an outlawed militant group.

The information from father and son about who ran the camp was one of many conflicts in their statements to the FBI.

Hamid Hayat said he had been "fooled" into attending his camp, which he thought was a religious school, and escaped -- only to later become part of a budding terror cell in Lodi.

The young man gave five different answers when asked who ran the camp. He mentioned "big people ... taller than me, (more) educated than me"; a Pakistani group named Harakat-ul-Ansar that was first brought up by an FBI agent; al Qaeda; "maybe my uncle"; and "maybe my grandfather."

Both father and son seemed to have some trouble with English; they primarily speak Pashto in daily life. The agents did most of the talking during the interviews, and at times the Hayats seemed to parrot them.

For instance, when agent Harrison asked Hamid Hayat how he would get attack orders, Hayat responded, "Maybe, uh, send a letter or anything like that," according to a transcript prepared by Aguilar.

"No, I don't think they're gonna send a letter," Harrison said. "I think you're gonna have to talk to somebody here in Lodi."

"Yeah, maybe," Hayat said.

DOJ_NMG_0023147

Because of rules regarding hearsay, Hamid Hayat's jury will not hear his father's confession, and vice versa. After closing arguments, the juries will render separate verdicts. Hamid Hayat faces up to 39 years in prison if convicted; his father faces up to 16 years.

Page B - 1

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Brain Drain Hits Homeland Security (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Homeland Security Department is losing top managers and rank-and-file employees in a brain drain that could affect morale and the nation's safety, according to members of Congress and labor experts.

Homeland Security is "hemorrhaging on the front lines and higher up," says New York University professor Paul Light, an expert on the federal workforce. The turnover comes amid renewed threats of terrorism and as the department readies itself for another hurricane season.

Key vacancies include top leaders in the department's cybersecurity, technology and disaster response divisions.

The latest high-level departure came last week, when management chief Janet Hale announced she was leaving. She joined an exodus of top officials who have quit recently, many in the aftermath of Homeland Security's failures surrounding Hurricane Katrina last fall.

This month, operations chief Matthew Broderick resigned. Last month, Science and Technology Undersecretary Charles McQueary resigned. And in January, Chief Financial Officer Andy Maner quit.

Meanwhile, the job of cybersecurity chief has been vacant since last summer. David Paulison has been the acting chief of the Federal Emergency Management Agency since Michael Brown resigned the $148,000 post in September; no permanent replacement has been found. FEMA is part of Homeland Security.

Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke acknowledged that the stress of top-level government security jobs can be grueling and "wear" on employees, who are expected to make "countless personal sacrifices." Nonetheless, he said he expects a number of the top jobs to be filled soon.

The impact is difficult to gauge. But a House investigation of Hurricane Katrina response recently cited personnel shortages at FEMA as a key part of the agency's failings during the disaster.

"It can't help morale for the rank-and-file employees when you have so much turnover," says Rep. Bennie Thompson, D-Miss., the top Democrat on the House Homeland Security Committee. "There just appears to be a continuous brain drain out of the agency."

FEMA typically has 2,500 full-time employees. When Katrina hit, it was down 500. Some of those positions have been filled, but the agency is still struggling to get back to full strength.

To prepare for the next hurricane season, officials in February announced a plan to ensure 95% of FEMA's jobs are filled by June 1.

Randall Larsen of the Institute for Homeland Security questions how the department will attract good people. Though many top-level jobs pay more than $100,000, "Who's going to give up a good job in the private sector to go into an organization that is criticized by the press and Congress and the American people?" he said.

GAO: Customs Failed 'Dirty Bomb' Test (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu And William Branigin

Washington Post, March 29, 2006

Congressional investigators testing U.S. port security smuggled enough radioactive material into the United States last year to make two radiological "dirty" bombs, officials told a Senate panel yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0023148

In December, undercover teams from the Government Accountability Office, Congress's audit arm, carried small amounts of cesium-137 -- a radioactive material used for cancer therapy, industrial gauges and well logging -- in the trunks of rental cars through border checkpoints in Texas and Washington state. The material triggered radiation alarms, but the smugglers used false documents to persuade U.S. Customs and Border Protection inspectors to let them through with it.

"These are documents my 20-year-old son could easily develop with a simple Internet search," said Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.), who chaired the hearing into covert nuclear threats before a Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs subcommittee yesterday. "It is a problem when it is tougher to buy cold medicine than it is to acquire enough material to construct a dirty bomb."

Jayson P. Ahern, an assistant commissioner for field operations for Customs and Border Protection, said U.S. customs officers were unable to confirm the validity of counterfeit Nuclear Regulatory Commission licenses presented by testers, but a system will be in place within 30 days to do so.

"All our systems worked, and officers appeared to follow our protocols," Ahern said. "But the bottom line is the material was allowed in with questionable documents."

The GAO report is the latest to find weaknesses in implementing detection systems for air travel and biological, chemical and radiological threats. Another GAO report yesterday found that foreign corruption, technical limitations, poor maintenance and lack of infrastructure compromise detection systems placed overseas by the United States. But Ahern said U.S. customs officers have scanned more than 80 million containers with radiation portal monitors since 2000, resolved 318,000 alarms and turned up no illegal material.

Homeland Security and Nuclear Regulatory Commission officials, while not discounting the economic and psychological effects of a conventional explosive laced with radioactive materials or "dirty bomb," said the amounts smuggled were minimal.

Michael Levi, a fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations, said the 150 microcuries of cesium-137 smuggled by each team would barely cause more than one death from cancer per million people exposed for 30 years.

The GAO also reported it is "unlikely" the Department of Homeland Security can install 3,034 new-generation radiation detectors by September 2009 as planned at border crossings, ports and mail facilities, and that the $1.2 billion program may incur a $342 million overrun.

In a separate report released yesterday, the Council on Foreign Relations reported that the government has not made prevention of nuclear terrorism its highest priority. Council fellow Charles D. Ferguson said more action is needed to address proliferation threats posed by highly enriched uranium and weapons in Pakistan, Russia and more than 100 civilian facilities.

"Securing and eliminating vulnerable nuclear materials and weapons offer points of greatest leverage in preventing nuclear terrorism," Ferguson wrote. "The biggest impediment to reducing the threat of nuclear terrorism involving Pakistan is President [Pervez] Musharraf's expressed belief that terrorists cannot make nuclear weapons."

According to the International Atomic Energy Agency, there were more than 400 confirmed cases of illicit trafficking in materials that could be used to produce a dirty bomb between 1993 and 2004, and 21 that involved material that could be used to produce a nuclear bomb.

"The simple fact is that if a nuclear device is already in the U.S., it's too late," Sen. Daniel K. Akaka (D-Hawaii) said.

Fake ID's At The Border Crossings (NYT)

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

While federal officials have been scrambling to install enough radiation detectors to screen all cargo for dangerous nuclear materials, they have apparently left a glaring hole in this thin and spotty line of defense. Even when detectors signal the presence of a radioactive substance, border guards may be fooled into waving a shipment through based on fraudulent paperwork and glib talk by the drivers.

That disturbing lesson comes from a report issued this week by the Government Accountability Office, an investigative arm of Congress. Undercover testers put small amounts of cesium-137, a highly radioactive material, in the trunks of two vehicles and drove across the borders from Mexico and Canada at sites that had big stationary detectors.

DOJ_NMG_0023149

The good news is that the detectors signaled the presence of radioactivity and that inspectors then questioned the undercover testers and subjected their vehicles to further inspection with hand-held devices. The bad news is that they allowed the shipments through anyway, apparently on the basis of counterfeit Nuclear Regulatory Commission documents, copied from the Internet, and fake shipping documents from a fictitious company.

The G.A.O. says the smuggled cesium was enough to make two "dirty bombs," which could contaminate an area and render it unusable for a long period. The N.R.C., on the other hand, says the amounts were far too small to worry about. Either way, it is disturbing that the guards let the shipments through. It is not clear whether the guards have gotten complacent in the wake of repeated false alarms triggered by natural radiation from bananas, ceramic tiles, fertilizer and other products, or were simply tricked by the phony documents. Red-faced officials insist that they will give border agents new tools to verify such documents shortly. The N.R.C. clearly needs to tighten its rules governing the purchase and security of small quantities of radioactive materials.

A dirty bomb uses ordinary explosives to disperse radioactive materials and contaminate the environment. An even greater, if less likely, threat would be posed by a real nuclear weapon or the fissile material to make one. Unfortunately, bomb-grade uranium is much harder to detect than cesium, and radioactive materials shielded by lead are much harder to detect than containers of cesium in cardboard boxes in vehicle trunks. The nation is far short of its goal to have radiation detectors at every portal. If border guards miss shipments of bombs or fissile material, the result could be catastrophic.

Senators Urge Swifter Action To Strengthen Port Security (AP)

By Liz Sidoti

The AP, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON --Senators said Tuesday the United States must act more quickly to strengthen security at U.S. entry points following the disclosure that undercover investigators breached security by slipping nuclear material into the United States.

"There are several gaps in our defense," Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., said, opening a Senate Homeland Security subcommittee hearing on the matter. "These issues must be addressed with a sense of urgency."

Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the panel's top Democrat, called the outcome of the Government Accountability Office's investigation "an alarming wake-up call."

"If terrorists were to obtain nuclear or radiological material and smuggle it into this country, the consequences could be catastrophic: a tremendous loss of life and a crippling blow to our economy," said Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, the chairwoman of the full Homeland Security Committee.

In a test last year, the small amounts of cesium-137, which is used in industrial gauges, triggered radiation alarms in Texas and Washington state. The material was enough to make two small "dirty bombs," officials said, yet U.S. customs agents permitted the investigators to enter the United States after being tricked with counterfeit documents.

The Bush administration said Tuesday that within 30 days it will give U.S. Customs and Border Protection agents the tools they need to verify such documents in the future.

In a series of reports, the GAO, which is the investigative arm of Congress, found that the Homeland Security Department's goal of installing 3,034 radiation detectors by September 2009 across the United States -- at border crossings, seaports, airports and mail facilities -- was "unlikely."

Investigators also said the government probably will spend $342 million more than it expects to complete the job, given its current costs and pace. Between October 2000 and October 2005, they said, the government spent about $286 million installing radiation monitors inside the United States.

The commission, in charge of overseeing nuclear reactor and nuclear substance safety, defended its record.

"Security has been of prime importance for us on the materials front and the power plant front since 9/11," commission spokesman David McIntyre said.

Vayl Oxford, who heads the Homeland Security Department's Domestic Nuclear Detection Office, said Monday that the substance could have been used in a radiological weapon with limited effects. On Tuesday, he told lawmakers that his comment was not meant to discount the psychological and economic impact a dirty bomb could have.

DOJ_NMG_0023150

Jayson Ahern, the assistant customs commissioner for field operations, said a system for U.S. customs agents to confirm the authenticity of government licenses will be in place within 30 days.

To test security at U.S. borders with Mexico and Canada, GAO investigators last year represented themselves as employees of a fake company and obtained cesium-137.

They attempted to cross into the United States with the substance -- enough to possibly create two crude radiological bombs that could spread radiation if spread by the blast of a conventional explosive.

When stopped, the investigators presented counterfeit shipping papers and NRC documents that allegedly permitted them to receive, acquire, possess and transfer radioactive substances.

Investigators found that customs agents weren't able to check whether a person caught with radioactive materials was permitted to possess the materials under a government-issued license.

"Unless nuclear smugglers in possession of faked license documents raised suspicions in some other way, CBP officers could follow agency guidelines yet unwittingly allow them to enter the country with their illegal nuclear cargo," a report said. It described this problem as "a significant gap" in the nation's safety procedures.

False radiation alarms are common -- sometimes occurring more than 100 times a day -- although the GAO said inspectors generally do a good job distinguishing nuisance alarms from actual ones. False alarms can be caused by ceramics, fertilizers, bananas and even patients who have recently undergone some types of medical procedures.

Senators Urge Tighter Border Security After Test Finds Flaw (USAT)

USA Today, March 29, 2006

The United States must act even more quickly to strengthen security at U.S. border entrances following the disclosure that undercover investigators were able to slip nuclear material into the country, senators said at a hearing Tuesday.

“There are several gaps in our defense,” said Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn. “These issues must be addressed with a sense of urgency.”

Michigan Sen. Carl Levin, the top Democrat on the Homeland Security subcommittee, called the investigation by the Government Accountability Office “an alarming wake-up call.”

In a test last year, small amounts of cesium-137, which is used in industrial gauges, triggered radiation alarms at border crossings in Texas and Washington state. The material was enough to make two small “dirty bombs,” a GAO report said, yet U.S. Customs agents permitted the investigators to enter the United States after being tricked with counterfeit documents.

A dirty bomb would use a conventional explosion to spread radioactive material. It would make an area unusable and cause economic havoc.

Thomas Kean, an ex-governor who chaired the 9/11 Commission, told senators “the size of the problem still totally dwarfs the policy response.”

The Bush administration said that within 45 days it will give U.S. Customs and Border Protection agents the tools they need to verify such documents in the future.

Republican Sen. John Ensign of Nevada said he is dropping his opposition to the promotion of Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen, who headed Hurricane Katrina recovery efforts. Ensign said that after discussing Katrina problems with Allen, he would no longer oppose him as commandant of the Coast Guard. Under Senate rules, any senator can block a vote on a confirmation. President Bush nominated Allen in January. The nomination now goes to the full Senate for a vote.

'Dirty Bombs' Called Threat To Shipping (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, March 29, 2006

The marine shipping industry will be devastated if foreign countries do not increase cargo screenings to protect against a "dirty bomb" terrorist attack, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff is telling Asian officials this week.

During a trip to Japan on Monday and China yesterday, Mr. Chertoff urged cooperation to strengthen the shipping industry and to protect the United States against a nuclear attack.

DOJ_NMG_0023151

"I think we all know that if a container were used to bring a dirty bomb or something similar into the United States, in addition to the obviously catastrophic consequences in America, it would be absolutely devastating to marine shipping," Mr. Chertoff said during a press conference yesterday.

"We can only really build our own security if we build it in partnership with other countries," Mr. Chertoff said.

The International Atomic Energy Agency has reported 662 known attempts to smuggle nuclear or radiological material across borders around the world.

Mr. Chertoff said it would be a "mortal blow" if Asian ports failed to use nuclear radiation detection equipment on ships bound for the United States. Hong Kong ports are experimenting with technology for such a program.

On his first trip to Asia, the homeland security chief is examining cutting-edge technology used to secure foreign ports, including a visit to one of the largest ports of the world, Singapore.

"We're looking to build a stronger partnership overseas, particularly in port and container security," said Homeland Security spokesman Brian Doyle. "It will make us and them more secure."

On Capitol Hill, lawmakers criticized the department for failing to block nuclear-weapon smuggling in a sting set up by the Government Accountability Office.

Witnesses told the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs permanent subcommittee on investigations yesterday that enough nuclear material entered the country as part of the investigation to make two dirty bombs.

"The radiation detectors correctly alarmed," said Sen. Norm Coleman, Minnesota Republican and panel chairman. "This is the good news."

"The bad news, however, is that officers were fooled by fraudulent documents and didn't have the mechanisms to verify the documents. These are documents my 20-year-old son could easily develop with a simple Internet search. We cannot allow this potentially deadly material to transmit our borders with ease," Mr. Coleman said.

The forged documents showed the nuclear shipment was approved by federal officials.

Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the panel's ranking Democrat, said Homeland Security officials have made significant improvements to detect such materials at land- and seaports, but said the GAO report shows "much more can and should be done."

Takeover Makeover (WSJ)

By Richard C. Shelby

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Over the last three years, direct foreign investment in the U.S. has exceeded $530 billion. The benefits are substantial: In 2002 alone, foreign affiliates paid $17.8 billion in taxes, representing 12% of U.S. corporate tax revenue. The investment is a key engine of our continued economic growth and also helps sustain global partnerships with countries throughout the world. The leading foreign investor is our staunchest ally, the U.K. Other key foreign investors are Japan, the Netherlands and Germany. U.S. companies also have a substantial stake abroad, with $252 billion invested overseas in 2004. A policy of open foreign investment here is thus essential if we are to expect similar treatment from other nations.

Nevertheless, anyone within proximity of a television, newspaper or radio over the course of the last month is aware of the firestorm that erupted over the Dubai Ports acquisition. Aside from the heightened political rhetoric and the considerable misinformation surrounding this specific deal, the controversy focused the spotlight squarely on what has previously been an obscure process by which the U.S. approves foreign acquisitions: the Committee on Foreign Investment in the U.S., or CFIUS. More to the point, the Dubai controversy provided a revealing glimpse of inherent flaws in the CFIUS process. Along with the recent uproar over the attempted acquisition of a U.S. oil company by a state-owned Chinese firm, it should provide enough momentum for strong reform of CFIUS, without which there will be even more investment related altercations.

The Dubai deal highlighted a key CFIUS deficiency by demonstrating that many top officials were not aware of CFIUS's approval of the transaction. As chairman of the Senate Banking Committee, which has jurisdiction over the Defense Production Act and CFIUS, I learned of the approval as other lawmakers did -- through the media. In fact, the secretaries of Treasury, Defense and Homeland Security have all publicly stated that they were unaware of the approval until it made the evening headlines. It is precisely because of the inherently secretive nature of CFIUS that our highest officials were caught off guard, and it directly corresponds to the current lack of credibility in the process.

The Senate Banking Committee has had long-standing concerns with the inadequacies of CFIUS. In early 2004, members of the committee requested that the GAO perform a study on the process and include recommendations for reform. We held two hearings on the substance of this report last year, in addition to a hearing held earlier this month devoted exclusively to the Dubai Ports issue. Drawing from the GAO analysis and the record established by these hearings, I intend to move legislation through the Banking Committee this week that should give Congress and the American people greater faith in the CFIUS process.

A strong reform will introduce transparency, accountability and oversight to ensure public confidence that the deals approved by CFIUS do not pose a threat to national security. Striking the appropriate balance between our open investment policy and legitimate concerns over national security is not an easy task. The U.S. can never subjugate our national security to economic interests. But just as important as ensuring that national security is properly weighed, the signals that we send to the rest of the world about our investment policies must also be given thoughtful consideration.

This can be accomplished by strengthening the process by which we consider these transactions in specific areas. Among the key elements of reform will be closing the "Byrd Amendment loophole" to require full investigations of foreign state-owned companies which seek to acquire a U.S. company. Contrary to congressional intent, the Treasury used a loose interpretation of the Byrd Amendment to avoid a full 45-day investigation in the Dubai Ports case. This loophole will be closed to remove any ambiguity.

The Banking Committee bill will formally establish CFIUS in statute, giving it increased visibility and accountability. In a significant structural change, the secretary of defense will be added as a vice chairman and the director of national intelligence will be added as a regular participant. To increase transparency, the legislation will enhance congressional oversight, requiring notice to the relevant congressional committees on proposed transactions, with a report due to the committees of jurisdiction upon the disposition of those cases. To ensure accountability from the administration and to avoid the lack of culpability expressed by public officials in the Dubai case, the law will require certification of these reports by the CFIUS chair, vice chair and lead agency responsible for the review. The legislation will also require a comprehensive annual report to the Senate Banking and House Financial Services Committees on all CFIUS transactions.

Given the massive importance of the issues at stake in this debate -- national security and economic stability and growth -- it is incumbent upon the Congress to act thoughtfully and deliberatively. This can be achieved through targeted and specific legislation that will give us the credible process the American people deserve without causing irreparable damage to our economy and global relationships.

Sen. Shelby of Alabama is chairman of the Senate Banking Committee.

Xenophobia's Threat To Prosperity (WP)

By Charles Prince

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

Citigroup employs 300,000 people in 100 countries. We are a guest in every one of those countries. We've bought companies in many of them and, with a few notable exceptions during periods of war and revolution, we've been welcomed with great hospitality everywhere for over a century -- just as the United States has welcomed many companies based in other countries. I sincerely hope things stay that way.

But that could prove a challenge in the current political environment. There are now upward of 30 proposals in Congress to make changes in the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States (CFIUS), a little-known body that has the authority to suspend or prohibit any acquisition, merger or takeover of a U.S. corporation that is deemed to threaten national security. The committee, made up of representatives from a dozen federal agencies, has recently come under intense scrutiny, even though it has not allowed a single breach of national security since it was established in 1988.

Some of the proposals would place new and potentially damaging restrictions on foreign investment in the United States. Legitimate national security concerns are one thing, but introducing overt political considerations into decisions regarding the allocation of capital has the potential to undermine investor confidence -- both domestic and foreign -- in U.S. markets and to jeopardize the continued vibrancy, depth and liquidity of those markets.

DOJ_NMG_0023153

Like the investments made overseas by Citigroup, IBM, General Electric and countless other U.S.-based global firms, investment in the United States by companies based outside this country is essential for job creation and innovation. The same is true of individual and institutional investors in the United States and in other countries. U.S. assets owned by individuals or companies outside the United States total about $11.5 trillion. These investors have helped to finance the housing boom in the United States and have contributed significantly to the rise in home values and ownership. They bought nearly $227 billion of U.S. agency debt in 2005, and they currently hold more than $900 billion of such debt.

Non-U.S. companies established in the United States support nearly 5.3 million jobs in this country, spread throughout all 50 states. Put another way, 4.7 percent of Americans holding private-sector jobs are employed by companies based outside the United States. These employees receive compensation totaling $318 billion annually, and their numbers are growing rapidly. Indeed, the very presence of these companies in the United States creates a multiplier effect throughout local and national economies -- including tax revenue -- that benefits all Americans.

In an increasingly global economy, labels such as "foreign" and "domestic" have become less relevant. Many non-U.S. multinational firms have moved their U.S. personnel into senior global positions. For instance, many chief executives of U.S. subsidiaries, most of whom are American citizens, have gone on to become CEOs of the global company, including Don Shepard of Aegon, Don Robert of Experian, Marjorie Scardino of Pearson and Klaus Kleinfeld of Siemens.

At the same time, many companies based outside the United States have moved senior managers with global responsibility for an entire business unit or function to the United States. The leadership role played by the employees of these companies, and their operations, benefit the U.S. economy and must be taken into account when balancing the value conferred by non-U.S. companies against notions of national interest.

I respectfully urge Congress to take only those actions that will enhance the security review process for foreign investment in the United States, and to avoid endorsing proposals that could undermine America's support for access to capital markets and the free movement of capital. We must avoid measures taken in the name of national security that are isolationist and xenophobic, and could have the effect of choking off vital investments in America. Such a path could threaten job creation in the United States, impede American economic growth and jeopardize U.S. efforts to open foreign markets for American companies, consumers and investors. Any changes to the CFIUS process should result from an informed, sober and fact-based assessment of all of our interests.

Genuine threats to U.S. national security must be met with resolve and purpose -- no deal can be worth the safety of our citizens. But at the same time, challenges to U.S. economic success must be met with the same commitment to international leadership and engagement that has for decades contributed to increasing prosperity in this country and throughout the world. This is not a choice between protecting vital national interests and building a more prosperous future. These two goals are vitally important, but they are also compatible, and Americans will hold their leaders accountable for working to achieve both of them.

The writer is CEO of Citigroup Inc.

"Spy Files" Include Antiwar Surveillance (DENP)

By Felisa Cardona, Denver Post Staff Writer

Denver Post, March 29, 2006

The ACLU has obtained more documents that show that the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force was watching antiwar groups in Denver as part of a domestic terrorism investigation.

The files were released to the ACLU's Colorado chapter under a Freedom of Information Act request filed in December 2004.

The records show FBI agents spent hours monitoring activist organizations such as Food Not Bombs, and the now-closed bookstore, Breakdown Books in Capitol Hill, among other groups.

DOJ_NMG_0023154

FBI agents spent two hours outside the bookstore counting about 40 people who gathered there to carpool to an antiwar demonstration in Colorado Springs on Feb. 15, 2003. The report says agents noted the license plate numbers of a dozen nearby vehicles.

"This report raises more questions about the degree to which the FBI is unjustifiably regarding demonstrations and public dissent as potential terrorism," said Mark Silverstein, legal director of the ACLU's Colorado chapter.

Some of those groups, such as Making A Difference/Coloradans Opposed to War (MADCOW), have already disbanded since they were surveilled, Silverstein said.

In 2004, Denver activist Sarah Bardwell was questioned by agents regarding her association with Food Not Bombs, a group that the FBI characterized as having ties to the Anarchist Black Cross, a group that the FBI notes in the files as having a history of violence.

A flier for the Anarchist Black Cross was found on the Auraria campus in Denver and agents investigated a meeting that the group had on Lipan Street in 2004, the files show.

Silverstein said only a couple of people showed up for the meeting and ended up eating cookies.

The FBI contends that they do not watch groups or individuals unless agents receive intelligence that violent or disruptive activities are being planned.

Staff writer Felisa Cardona can be reached at 303-820-1219 or at fcardona@denverpost.com.

ACLU Says FBI Watched War Protesters In A 2003 Domestic Terrorism Probe (AP)

AP, March 29, 2006

DENVER - FBI files on domestic terrorism show the agency monitored a meeting of anti-war activists in Denver in 2003, suggesting the government may treat dissent as "potential terrorism," the American Civil Liberties Union said Tuesday.

A document obtained by the ACLU this week under the Freedom of Information Act says the FBI also recorded the license numbers of vehicles "in the vicinity" of a now-closed bookstore where the activists met before carpooling to a demonstration in Colorado Springs.

More than 30 people were arrested at two anti-war demonstrations in Colorado Springs later that day, but it wasn't clear whether any of them had been at the Denver gathering.

The new document was the latest twist in a campaign by the ACLU to investigate surveillance by local and federal authorities of activists in Colorado, including peaceful groups, dating to the 1950s.

"We just have questions about why the FBI is surreptitiously staking out a bookstore in Denver and writing down the license numbers of people who are stopping there for the purpose of carpooling to an anti-war demonstration," said Mark Silverstein, legal director of the ACLU in Colorado.

FBI spokesman Bill Carter in Washington said he was not familiar with the bookstore surveillance, but he said the agency would not monitor a group simply because it is protesting.

"Our interest is not in the First Amendment activities the group is involved in," he said. The FBI would monitor a group only if participants might be planning or engaging in "violent criminal activity," he said.

The latest document obtained by the ACLU says a two-hour surveillance of Breakdown Books in February 2003 showed that at least 40 people "appeared to be involved" in the Revolutionary Anti-War Response demonstration planned later that day in Colorado Springs.

The one-page document does not mention any potential for criminal violence. The only blocked-out portions appear to be the names of four agents who conducted the surveillance and the license plates of 12 vehicles.

Later that day, police in Colorado Springs fired tear gas and at least one rubber bullet after an anti-war rally spilled out of a park and blocked a major street. At least two people were treated for minor injuries and 13 people were arrested. A second demonstration ended with 21 arrests but no tear gas.

The document does not mention a domestic terrorism investigation, but Silverstein said the file number corresponds to another FBI document the ACLU obtained in December that includes the designation "AOT," which he said stands for "acts of terrorism."

Silverstein said the FBI released the documents in response to an ACLU request for information about the agency's Joint Terrorism Task Force. The FBI has formed 66 such task forces with local law enforcement agencies across the nation, including Denver police.

FBI documents obtained earlier by the ACLU showed the agency had opened domestic terrorism investigations of peaceful demonstrators after reading websites announcing protests.

Among the groups the FBI investigated were the Colorado American Indian Movement and the Rocky Mountain Peace and Justice Center, the documents showed.

- The Associated Press

In 2003, the ACLU settled a lawsuit against the city of Denver for keeping so-called "spy files" on peaceful groups since at least the 1950s. The city agreed to collect information only if it can show a clear connection to criminal activity.

Silverstein said ACLU chapters nationwide are now requesting documents about FBI surveillance of peaceful protesters as the national organization tries to measure how extensive the monitoring has been.

He said he did not know where the effort might lead.

"Certainly I wouldn't rule out asking for legislation or doing more public education or litigation, if it's possible to do that," he said.

FOR THE RECORD (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, March 29, 2006

Monitoring of activists: In some copies of Monday's Section A, a front-page headline said, "Activists on Anti-Terror Watch List." The list referred to in the article was not a formal terrorist watch list, the FBI said, but was included in a Department of Justice presentation to a law class that listed groups terrorists might associate with. Two left-wing groups were included.

After Hard Lessons, A New Game Plan For Hurricane Seasons (NYT)

By Jeremy Alford

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

BATON ROUGE, La., March 28 — Federal and state emergency officials promised a different approach on Tuesday to the coming hurricane season, saying they would no longer use "last resort" shelters like the Superdome to house displaced residents.

Instead, they said, they will put into effect a better system of communication and evacuation to get residents away from the path of a storm.

"Our goal is to create an environment for all of the individuals to leave in the face of a storm rather than stay," said Terry Ebbert, the homeland security adviser for Orleans Parish, speaking at a news conference with federal officials regarding preparations for the 2006 season, which begins June 1.

To relocate a large number of people efficiently, Mr. Ebbert said, officials are planning an improved public education campaign, and are exploring new ways to use buses, trains, airlines and other evacuation routes. Those plans, however, are still in the conceptual stages and will probably not be ready until closer to the hurricane season, he said.

R. David Paulison, acting director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, said the new plans were a direct result of lessons learned from last year's disastrous Gulf Coast hurricanes. By retooling the agency and bringing in emergency resources before they are needed — supplies are being stockpiled at various locations off the Gulf of Mexico — the federal government will not repeat its mistakes, he vowed.

"We have a different situation now," Mr. Paulison said.

While the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration will not issue its official forecast for the new season until May, William Gray, a hurricane expert with Colorado State University, is predicting a tumultuous six months, although the season is not likely to rival last year's devastation. In his December outlook report, Mr. Gray predicted there would be 17 named storms, 9 hurricanes and 5 major events with winds exceeding 111 miles per hour.

Aside from these threatening conditions, moving people out of hurricane-prone areas will be more challenging than ever, Mr. Paulison said, because there are now more than 94,000 trailers housing evacuees in the Gulf Coast region alone that are largely unable to stand up to severe winds. People living in trailers will face a mandatory evacuation even for something as small as a tropical storm, he said.

Henry Rodriguez, president of St. Bernard Parish, a swampy area just east of New Orleans that was virtually destroyed by Hurricane Katrina, said he would wait to see the actual response before he started cheering the federal government, but expressed confidence that preparations would be improved over all.

He added that he hoped that preparedness for this year would not overshadow relief from the hurricanes that had already left their mark on the Gulf Coast.

"I hope that they have learned their lesson by now," Mr. Rodriguez said. "I hope they know that everyone is depending on them. They needed better planning, and it sounds like we're getting that. I just hope their response is better than their efforts at recovery, though. There has been no progress there — only progressively worse."

La. Candidates Must Track Down Voters (USAT)

By Anne Rochell Konigsmark

USA Today, March 29, 2006

ATLANTA — Seven candidates for mayor came here to debate tough issues, but they aren't hoping to lead this city. They want to be mayor of New Orleans.

"We miss you, and we want you back," candidate Mitch Landrieu, who is also Louisiana's lieutenant governor, said recently to New Orleanians who have been living in Atlanta since Hurricane Katrina hit Aug. 29, flooding three-fourths of the city and emptying it of most residents.

In what could be a first in American politics, the New Orleans mayor's race may have more voters outside the city than inside. Candidates in the election April 22 are on a nationwide cat-and-mouse search for voters, who live in all 50 states.

"I just know of no precedent for it," says Hastings Wyman, editor of the Southern Political Report.

The mayoral hopefuls are catching trains, chartering planes and taking daylong car trips to reach voters in cities with large numbers of evacuees, such as Houston, Atlanta, Dallas and Memphis.

"This is murder," said candidate Johnny Adriani, who attended last weekend's Atlanta forum, which was hosted by evacuees. He said it took all day by train to reach Atlanta. "It was far too expensive to fly," he said.

Adriani, who lives in Baton Rouge since his home in the Lakeview neighborhood flooded, attended another forum last weekend in Houston.

More than 250,000 of the 460,000 people who lived in New Orleans before the hurricane have not come home.

On Monday, a federal court refused a request from civil rights groups to delay the election, already postponed from February to April. The groups argue it is unfair to the thousands of displaced black residents.

Jesse Jackson will lead a protest here Saturday.

Absentee-balloting rules have been relaxed somewhat for those living out of state; for those in Louisiana, there will be polling places statewide; more than 700,000 information packets have been sent to evacuees; and the state is running full-page ads in city newspapers around the Southeast. The Louisiana secretary of State's office commissioned a study that concluded about 80% of registered voters are living in or very near New Orleans.

The U.S. Justice Department, which oversees elections in Louisiana and other Southern states to prevent discrimination, has signed off on the election.

Candidates who are well-known and have money to travel have an advantage with displaced voters, says Ed Renwick, a political science professor at Loyola University in New Orleans. However, even a wealthy candidate "can't run television ad campaigns in all those cities," Renwick says.

"It's tricky," says Ashley Casey, who works for Audubon Nature Institute Director Ron Forman, one of the candidates. "You can't just walk down the street in another city and say, 'Hey! Voters!' "

This election is not easy for voters, either. Ferdinand Hines, who has been living in Atlanta since Katrina ruined his home in New Orleans East, was one of fewer than 100 attendees at the Atlanta forum.

DOJ_NMG_0023157

Hines plans to vote but is worried about the absentee-balloting process, which requires voters to get a signed affidavit proving they are displaced. "It looked like if they could come up with an online system, that would be more efficient," he said.

Some evacuees plan to charter buses to return to Louisiana to vote, says Carla Allen, co-founder of the Coastal Gumbo Coalition, a grass-roots group for evacuees that hosted the Atlanta forum.

"We are telling people to go home to vote," she says. She hopes someone will donate buses to evacuees.

"If we don't vote, we don't have a voice," she says. "And the next four years are going to be a turning point for New Orleans."

Indeed, Katrina changed what probably would have been a sleepy re-election race — with incumbent Ray Nagin winning easily — into nationally intriguing political theater. Twenty-two candidates have jumped in to challenge Nagin. "One of the reasons I'm running is to be a part of history," the Rev. Tom Watson says.

Among the challengers:

•Kimberly Williamson-Butler, the New Orleans criminal court clerk who announced her candidacy on her way to jail. She was held for three days this month for refusing a court order regarding cleanup of a flooded evidence room.

•Forman, who runs the city's zoo and aquarium. His wife, Sally, was one of Nagin's top advisers until her husband decided to run against her boss.

Who's she supporting now? "My husband," she says.

•Marie Galatas, who says God told her to run and who claims to be able to see into the future.

•Landrieu, whose sister is U.S. Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., and whose father, "Moon," was the city's last white mayor when he left office 30 years ago.

•Roderick Dean, an election oddity: This Louisville resident is the only candidate in the race who doesn't live in Louisiana.

Many challengers are political newcomers. They're gambling that Nagin's popularity has waned, particularly among white voters who gave him broad support in his first election. Nagin apologized after his Martin Luther King Jr. Day speech in which he predicted that New Orleans would again be a "chocolate city" — predominantly black — because "that's how God wants it to be."

Loyola's Renwick predicts turnout will be low in other cities but very high among New Orleanians who have returned.

"People here are going to vote like crazy," he says. "Interest in this race is extremely high. We might wind up having a normal turnout overall."

In 2002, 45% of the 300,000 registered voters turned out to vote for mayor.

Candidates at the Atlanta forum appealed to voters' love of New Orleans.

"You are New Orleanians, and you don't belong here," Adriani said.

Candidate Shedrick White recited a poem he had written about New Orleans, which evoked city treasures such as brass bands and red beans and rice. The moderator, the Rev. Glenn Allen, was moved to tears.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Opposes Iraq's Premier, Shiites Report (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, March 28 — The American ambassador has told Shiite officials that President Bush does not want the Iraqi prime minister to remain the country's leader in the next government, senior Shiite politicians said Tuesday.

It is the first time the Americans have directly expressed a preference in the furious debate over the country's top job, the politicians said, and it is inflaming tensions between the Americans and some Shiite leaders.

The ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad, told the head of the main Shiite political bloc at a meeting on Saturday to pass on a "personal message from President Bush" to the interim prime minister, Ibrahim al-Jaafari, said Redha Jowad Taki, a Shiite member of Parliament who was at the meeting.

Mr. Khalilzad said Mr. Bush "doesn't want, doesn't support, doesn't accept" Mr. Jaafari as the next prime minister, according to Mr. Taki, a senior aide to Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, the head of the Shiite bloc. It was the first "clear and direct message" from the Americans on a specific candidate for prime minister, Mr. Taki said.

DOJ_NMG_0023158

The Shiite bloc, which won a plurality in the parliamentary election in December, nominated Mr. Jaafari last month to retain his post for four more years.

American officials in Baghdad did not dispute the Shiite politicians' account of the conversation, though they would not discuss the details of the meeting. A spokeswoman for the American Embassy confirmed that Mr. Khalilzad met with Mr. Hakim on Saturday. But she declined to comment on what was said.

"The decisions about the choice of the prime minister are entirely up to the Iraqis," said the spokeswoman, Elizabeth Colton. "This will be an Iraqi decision."

In Washington, the State Department said it would not comment on diplomatic conversations, but Adam Ereli, the deputy spokesman, reiterated American support for "a government of national unity with strong leadership that can unify all Iraqis."

The Americans have harshly criticized the Jaafari government in recent months for supporting Shiite militias that have been fomenting sectarian violence and pushing Iraq closer to full-scale civil war.

Mr. Khalilzad has sharpened his criticism in the last week, saying the militias are now killing more people than the Sunni Arab-led insurgency. American officials have expressed growing concern that Mr. Jaafari is incapable of reining in the private armies, especially since Moktada al-Sadr, the anti-American cleric who leads the most volatile militia, is Mr. Jaafari's most powerful backer.

Haider al-Ubady, a spokesman for Mr. Jaafari, said the prime minister had received the ambassador's message and accused the Americans of trying to subvert Iraqi sovereignty.

Tensions between Shiite leaders and the American government, which had been rising for months, boiled over after an assault on Sunday night by American and Iraqi forces on a Shiite mosque compound in northern Baghdad.

Shiite leaders say at least 17 civilians were killed in the battle, most of them members of a Shiite political party. American commanders say the soldiers fought insurgents.

The reported American pressure over Mr. Jaafari's nomination is another sign of White House impatience over the deadlocked talks to form a new government. American officials say the impasse has created a power vacuum that has encouraged lawlessness and civil conflict.

The nomination has become one of the most contentious issues in those talks, with the main Kurdish, Sunni Arab and secular blocs calling for the Shiites to replace Mr. Jaafari. On Monday, Shiite leaders suspended their participation in the negotiations, saying they were enraged by the assault on the mosque complex.

In Baghdad on Tuesday, at least 21 people were abducted in four separate incidents in the biggest wave of kidnappings in a month, an Interior Ministry official said. In one incident, 15 men in Iraqi Army uniforms dragged at least six people from a money exchange shop and stole nearly $60,000. In two other cases, people wearing Interior Ministry commando uniforms snatched victims from two electronics shops.

The police in western Baghdad discovered 14 bodies on Tuesday, all killed execution-style with gunshots to the head, apparently the latest victims of sectarian bloodletting. On Monday, Iraqi forces found 18 bodies near Baquba with similar wounds. Earlier reports of 30 beheaded bodies found in that area were wrong, the Interior Ministry official said.

An American soldier was killed Tuesday by small-arms fire in Baghdad, and another was killed and three were wounded by a roadside bomb outside Habbaniya, the American military said.

The Iraqi security minister, Abdul Karim al-Enizi, said on the state-run Iraqiya network on Tuesday night that the Iraqi forces who had raided the mosque compound in Baghdad were not part of the Interior or Defense Ministry. A survivor said the soldiers did not speak Arabic well, implying they may have been Kurdish militiamen working with Americans, Mr. Enizi said.

At the Pentagon, senior officials defended the raid, releasing photographs they said proved that weapons and bomb-making materials had been seized inside the compound, which they described as a school complex that had been turned into a base for a "hostage ring."

When the soldiers entered the compound, "they found that there was a building there that had a small minaret and a prayer room inside it," said Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. "Some people are calling that a mosque."

The surge in violence has shaken confidence in Mr. Jaafari, who has been widely criticized by Iraqis for failing to smash the Sunni-led insurgency, letting Shiite death squads run rampant and doing little on reconstruction.

DOJ_NMG_0023159

Mr. Jaafari won the Shiite bloc's nomination for prime minister by one vote in a secret ballot of its members of Parliament, beating out the deputy of Mr. Hakim, the bloc's leader. As the largest bloc, with 130 of the 275 seats, the Shiites have the right to nominate the prime minister.

But a two-thirds vote of Parliament is required for approval of the new government. As long as the other major blocs oppose Mr. Jaafari, the process is at a standstill.

U.S. Appeals To Iraq's Top Cleric To Help End Political Impasse (KRT)

By Nancy A. Youssef And Warren P. Strobel

Knight Ridder, March 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - U.S. officials sent a message this week to Iraq's senior religious cleric asking that he help end the impasse over forming a new Iraqi government and strongly implying that the prime minister, Ibrahim al-Jafaari, should withdraw his candidacy for re-election, according to American officials.

The unusual decision by the White House to reach out to Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani suggested how eager the Bush administration is to jump-start negotiations that have failed to produce Iraq's first permanent postwar government more than three months after national elections.

But by contacting the revered Shiite Muslim leader, the administration risks further angering Iraqi leaders, who already complain that the United States is interfering too much with the process.

During a news conference Tuesday, Salim al-Maliki, the minister of transportation and a member of the dominant United Iraqi Alliance, said al-Jaafari was still the slate's candidate.

"We do not accept interference by the United States or any other foreign body because it is an internal decision of United Iraqi Alliance," al-Maliki said.

In Washington, two officials confirmed that the United States had passed a message through a third party to the reclusive al-Sistani, Iraq's top cleric and, in some ways, its ultimate political arbiter.

It wasn't known whether al-Jafaari was mentioned by name. But the clear message was that the prime minister's bid to keep his job was creating an impasse and the way to end it was for him to withdraw, one official said.

The gist of the message was "we need to find a way to address this process," an administration official in Washington said. "We need to find a way out of the impasse."

He spoke on condition of anonymity because the White House and State Department weren't publicly acknowledging the move.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan denied reports in Baghdad that President Bush had sent a letter to leading Shiite politician Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, a statement that, while true, was incomplete.

"What we are doing is encouraging the Iraqi leaders to move forward on a government of national unity, based on strong leadership. It is up to the Iraqi people to decide who the prime minister is," McClellan said. "I know of no letter."

It was unclear precisely how the message meant for al-Sistani was sent, but Haithem al-Husseini, a spokesman for al-Hakim, confirmed that the leader of the Shiite alliance bloc had received a message from the Bush administration. He wouldn't say whether al-Hakim or al-Sistani was the intended recipient.

Al-Sistani consistently has refused to meet with U.S. envoys.

Al-Hakim visited al-Sistani at his home in Najaf on Tuesday. Before a throng of supporters, al-Hakim promised that the Iraqi leadership would move quickly to form a government. When he mentioned a raid by U.S. and Iraqi forces that some charge occurred in a mosque, the crowds chanted: "No, no America."

The administration's outreach to al-Sistani underscored how much Bush has at stake in ending Iraq's political stalemate, which has gone on for months as violence continues.

"What it reflects - we are, we're deeper into this process," the administration official said.

Judith Yaphe, a Persian Gulf expert at the National Defense University in Washington, called the reported attempts to pressure al-Jafaari to resign "heavy-handed."

DOJ_NMG_0023160

"They have to know that Sistani does not want to be seen as interfering in the political process," she said. "You're guaranteed to get the result that you don't want."

Elizabeth Colton, a U.S. Embassy spokeswoman, declined to comment about the message. American officials have said the Iraqis are leading the formation of the government and that the United States is supporting them.

"This is an issue that Iraqis must determine, just like in other democratic systems," Colton said.

Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch, a multinational forces spokesman, said last week that the absence of a government was contributing to the surge of religious and ethnic violence.

On Tuesday, 24 people were kidnapped and more than 30 bodies were discovered throughout Baghdad, many of which had been tortured in apparent sectarian violence.

This week, there's been a growing chorus of complaints from Shiite politicians that the Bush administration doesn't want al-Jaafari as the next prime minister. They have charged that American officials are trying to usurp their election results, despite promising to bring democracy to Iraq.

Earlier this year, the United Iraqi Alliance, the largest Shiite slate, chose al-Jaafari to be its nominee for the top post in the permanent government. That virtually assured that he'd win, since the slate won nearly a majority of seats in the new parliament.

But widespread objections to al-Jaafari surfaced immediately from some, who charge that the Iranian-backed leader has been ineffective and divisive during the interim period. Opponents argued that the country's first democratically elected government since the fall of Saddam Hussein should have a more representative leader, particularly as religious and ethnic tensions worsen.

Adnan Ali, a top al-Jaafari adviser, said, "We have not received anything official objecting to Jaafari," adding that al-Jaafari has no intention of stepping aside.

Although a religious figure, al-Sistani has rescued the political process in the past, when he pushed for elections and the writing of the constitution, for example. But his aides have said he doesn't want to be seen as a politician. It's unclear how he'll respond to this outreach by U.S. officials.

Negotiations Resume In Capital (WT)

By Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, March 29, 2006

Negotiations for a new Iraqi government were back on track in Baghdad yesterday, despite continuing Shi'ite fury over an Iraqi-U.S. weekend raid on a complex used by loyalists of radical Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Pentagon officials showed reporters photographs from the operation that left at least 16 Iraqis dead, saying the evidence showed there were armed militiamen in the buildings, not unarmed men at prayer as Shi'ite clerics have insisted.

"This complex is an old school complex, I believe to hold, among other things, the hostage ring, people who grab people off the street for money," said Marine Gen. Peter Pace, pointing to a blown-up photograph of a group of buildings.

"This operation clearly was designed to go after a believed location of a kidnapping ring," said Gen. Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Iraqis contacted by telephone in Baghdad said Shi'ites were furious over the operation in Sadr City -- a poor, predominantly Shi'ite area that is home to the Mahdi Army, a militia loyal to Sheik al-Sadr, and the powerful Badr Brigades, the armed wing of the political party of the Supreme Council of Islamic Resistance in Iraq.

"The Iraqi people are angry about this Shi'ite mosque, they are angry at the American forces [and] accuse the Americans of killing Shi'ite people," said one young businessman who would give his name only as Ahmed.

Conflicting accounts of Sunday night's gunfight continued, with U.S. and Iraqi officials unable to agree even whether the scene of the conflict was a mosque.

Gen. Pace said Iraqi special forces, backed by U.S. special forces, found bomb parts, rocket-propelled grenades and a hostage when they entered the complex, which included a building that held a small minaret and prayer room. He told reporters he did not know whether people were killed in the prayer room.

DOJ_NMG_0023161

Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld, referring to a photograph of the weapons, said, "Those are not religious instruments." He added that the Iraqi forces found two men with traces of explosives on their fingers.

Residents of Sadr City claimed that the Iraqi army special operations unit that conducted the raid was an all-Kurdish unit drawn from the fierce Kurdish Peshmerga militia.

Usually very outspoken, Sheik al-Sadr has not made any public statements on the raid.

One Sunni leader close to the talks on the formation of a new government said that Iraqi Shi'ite leaders, who suspended their participation in the negotiations on Monday, had returned to the table.

"Today they were sent back and there was a good four-hour negotiation, so it seems they are going ahead with the political process," said Ala'a Makky of the Iraqi Islamic Party. He said the special forces raid might have been designed to send a message to Shi'ite leaders that militia killings had to stop.

"Let me tell you that one of the main issues of the coming government is to abolish the militias and dissolve all the militias so the government can work nationally without any sectarian divisions," Mr. Makky said.

True Or Not, Report Of 'Massacre' Angers Iraqis (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, March 29, 2006

BAGHDAD - The public perceptions swirling around a "massacre" - as some Iraqi officials have charged - are the latest incident to stall the creation of Iraq's new government.

Did US forces attack a mosque in a Shiite district of Baghdad Sunday night, killing 17 unarmed worshippers, an act that Iraq's Shiite interior minister called a "horrible violation" that has dominated Iraqi TV and sparked a political outcry?

Or, did Iraqi special forces, backed up by US advisers, take on a "terrorist cell" at an office complex, kill 16 "insurgents," and free an Iraqi hostage - only to have Iraqi provocateurs, as top US commanders allege, "set the scene up" to look like an atrocity?

The truth may be the latest war casualty as perceptions shape Iraq's political reality, and the prevailing view of a bloody US raid is undermining US-backed efforts to form a coalition government, while boosting the influence of anti-US cleric Moqtada al-Sadr.

"How could [Americans] come out of this mess?" asks Ghassan Atiyyah, head of the Iraq Foundation for Development and Democracy, who was reached in London. "Sadr is becoming a strong force in Iraqi politics. When he was weak, they could not deal with him, and now he is strong."

"I very much appreciate what [US Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad] is doing" to form a unity government, says Mr. Atiyyah. "It should have been done two and a half years ago, to balance these things."

Mr. Sadr conducted two popular revolts against US forces in 2004, and has become kingmaker by supporting Iraq's embattled Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari, against efforts by Kurdish, Sunni Arab, and secular parties - as well as, reportedly, the US - to see him go.

Sadr's Mahdi Army militia - which controls the Mustafa Husseiniya raided by US and Iraqi forces Sunday, and is accused of sectarian killings in Baghdad that mostly target Sunni Arabs - can deploy immediately in their thousands, and are often allowed to work unchecked by Iraq's Shiite-dominated security forces.

Underscoring the significance of the raid, President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, vowed to oversee an investigation. A Husseiniyeh is a Shiite place for prayer and other religious purposes. In Iraq it is considered virtually the same as a mosque.

"It is very important to clarify - an investigation could help defuse tension," says Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish MP who noted that Shiites did not turn up for talks Monday to form the government.

"Always people like Moqtada and extremists will benefit from this in the street, they will get sympathy from ordinary people," says Mr. Othman. "The last three years many things like this have happened: [Americans] hit a wedding ceremony, or hit the wrong house, or get wrong information - some anti-American people want them to make mistakes, to build on that."

The deputy US commander in Iraq, Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, early Tuesday dismissed reports that a mosque had been hit, or that the 50 Iraqi Special Operations forces, backed up by 25 US advisers, had chosen the wrong target. Besides capturing some weaponry, they released an Iraqi dental technician who had been kidnapped 12 hours earlier.

DOJ_NMG_0023162

Inside the religious complex, with its minaret, are series of rooms for teaching the Koran, a large prayer room, and Imam's quarters, as well as offices of Mr. Jafaari's Dawa Party, which were also raided. Even two days later, an Iraqi employee of the Monitor could see four places where the pockmarks of bullet holes coincided with bloodstains, and other evidence of killings at the place.

Iraqi units "told us point blank that this was not a mosque," said Lt. Gen. Chiarelli, noting that, on US military maps, the Mustafa Mosque was in fact six blocks north of their target. He said that Iraqi forces "did the fighting," and there was "gunfire from every room."

"After the fact someone went in and made the scene look different than it was. There's been huge misinformation," Chiarelli said. "I think the [anti-US] backlash has been caused by the folks who set the scene up."

That explanation did not wash Tuesday in the angry Ur neighborhood of northeast Baghdad, near the poor Shiite enclave of Sadr City, where witnesses and residents said the bloodshed has boosted their support of Sadr and his Mahdi Army.

"I need the government that I voted for to protect us, but they failed," says Souad Mohammad, the deputy director of a school, whose second-floor apartment, across the street from the mosque, is riven with holes from small-caliber US armor-piercing rounds.

"They came and killed the young people, and we want the Imam Mahdi Army to protect us, because they are from us, they are Iraqi people," says Mrs. Mohammad. "When the Mahdi Army is here, it's very quiet, no one is assassinated in this area, there are no car bombs, and at night there are checkpoints to protect us."

The popular view of US wrongdoing has been fed by the images on Al-Furat television - the station run by one of the most powerful Shiite parties in Iraq - of bags of explosives with wires poking out, that they allege US forces left behind.

The result has been a firestorm among the majority Shiite, which have borne the brunt of Sunni Arab-led insurgent attacks aimed at sparking a full-scale civil war, and who grate at US insistence on giving the minority Sunni Arabs a real political role.

Haidar al-Abbadi, an adviser to Jafaari, warned of "death squads working alongside US troops that execute people without any reason while they are praying," he told Al-Arabiya television.

True or not, that view is widely held. The US-Iraqi raid "means they are targeting Shiites, to stop the political process," says Jassim Mohamad Ali, whose face was scratched by jumping over a fence in the Mustafa compound, to hide from the raiders. "The only thing I witness from the Mahdi Army, they have honor and are loyal to this country, and they try to keep the Iraqi street clean," he says.

"People always say: The Americans never do these things, but when I saw them with helicopters and their Humvees and Bradleys, I am very sure now they are terrorists," says Mr. Ali, giving a stark opinion increasingly expressed on Iraqi airwaves following the raid. "We will fight terrorism, whether it is [extreme Sunni] Wahhabi or American."

U.S. Displays Photos Of Weapons Seized In Baghdad Raid (KRT)

By Drew Brown

Knight Ridder, March 28, 2006

WASHINGTON - Defense officials displayed photographs Tuesday of rocket-propelled grenade launchers and bomb-making materials that they said were captured during a bloody raid Sunday that's become a bitter point of contention between the United States and leading Iraqi officials.

The briefing by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, was intended to counter angry Shiite claims that U.S.-backed Iraqi commandos massacred at least 16 innocent worshippers at a Baghdad mosque.

"Those are not religious instruments," Rumsfeld said as the images were shown on a video screen.

U.S. officials say the raid was a successful operation by Iraqi special forces that eliminated a terrorist cell that engineered kidnappings and assassinations out of a former school complex in northeastern Baghdad.

But Iraqi Shiite leaders denounced the raid as an attempt by U.S. forces to distance themselves from Iraq's majority Muslim sect and to bolster minority Sunni Arabs in the stalled process to hammer out a new government.

DOJ_NMG_0023163

Shiites make up 60 percent of Iraq's population, and the loss of their support would likely doom any U.S. hopes of working out a political compromise. Hostility between Shiites and the United States would place U.S. forces in Iraq in a difficult, if not untenable, position.

Rumsfeld and Pace said that the troops opened fire only after they were fired upon by fighters from Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's Mahdi Army militia.

With overhead satellite imagery posted on a video screen, Pace pointed out several buildings where he said the Iraqi security forces came under fire as they approached the compound.

Pace said one building had a "small minaret and a prayer room" inside of which were found several rocket-propelled grenade launchers and bomb-making materials. Iraqi forces also freed a hostage who said he'd been kidnapped, Pace said.

"When the hostage was released, he pointed to two of the individuals who the Iraqi security forces had detained as being his kidnappers," Pace said.

U.S. military officials in Baghdad said Monday that the Iraqi forces had killed 16 hostile fighters and detained 18 people.

At least two of those people had traces of explosives residue on their fingers, Rumsfeld said.

In Monday's statement, U.S. officials said the Iraqi forces found 32 AK-47 rifles, five grenades, four rocket-propelled grenades, two grenade launchers and two heavy machine guns, plus various items commonly used to make improvised bombs.

The raid threatened to further stall negotiations over the formation of a new Iraqi government, but Rumsfeld said that top U.S. officials in Baghdad had informed him Tuesday that those discussions were going forward.

Rumsfeld, who recently has focused many of his public comments on how the U.S. government was failing in the information war against terrorists, said that the incident had been distorted in the press.

"The people we're up against are vicious, and they lie," he said. "Obviously, they have media committees, they plan what they're going to do, they plan how they're going to manipulate the press, and they get out there fast and do it. And there's no penalty for that. Indeed, there's only rewards, because the information is around the world, while, as they say, truth is still putting its boots on."

Codel Frustration On Iraq (HILL)

By Albert Eisele

The Hill, March 29, 2006

The chairman of the House Select Intelligence Committee returned from his seventh visit to Iraq last week "extremely frustrated" by the failure of Iraqi leaders to form a new unity government, which he called "the key to the future of Iraq."

Rep. Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.) also expressed disappointment at the poor performance of Iraqi security forces and the failure of private contractors to make more progress in rebuilding Iraq's war-damaged infrastructure.

"The thing I sense right now is a lack of urgency of the Iraqi leadership to form a government, and that's leading to a vacuum of influence at the top of the Iraqi government," he said.

Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner (R-Va.) and Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) echoed Hoekstra's concerns after they, Hoekstra and other lawmakers who visited Iraq and Afghanistan last week met with President Bush at the White House yesterday.

Hoekstra made the comments in a telephone interview from his district Monday before returning to Washington to meet with Bush. Three other House members who accompanied Hoekstra to the Persian Gulf region — John Shadegg (R-Ariz.), Mark Souder (R-Ind.) and Dutch Ruppersberger (D-Md.) — also took part in the White House meeting.

Shadegg praised Bush for "listening and reaching out to members of both parties who've been to Iraq and Afghanistan." He noted that two Democrats who oppose the war, Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) and Rep. Tom Udall (D-N.M.), had different suggestions, but Shadegg said, "The one consistent theme was the need for Iraq to complete the formation of a government of national unity."

Both Warner and McCain voiced similar concerns to Bush about the lack of progress in forming a new government.

DOJ_NMG_0023164

Warner met separately afterward with the president, Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Peter Pace and urged Bush to rally his Cabinet behind the war in Iraq and Afghanistan.

"We need a total team effort to bring about continual gradual success in Iraq and Afghanistan," Warner said, adding that he made his appeal at the urging of U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Gen. John Abizaid, commander of U.S. forces in the region.

McCain told reporters that Bush "appreciates the urgency of forming a unity government" but warned that the process is "still very slow and very long and very tough."

Hoekstra said he was disappointed to hear Iraqi leaders say it could be six or more weeks before they have a working government. "I think one of the most important things that needs to be done is for the Iraqis to form a new coalition government. That is the key to the future of Iraq," he said.

Hoekstra said Iraqi leaders are unhurried about bridging their religious and ethnic differences to form a workable government. "They've got to send a signal to the Iraqi people and the world that they recognize the future of their country lies in their hands," he declared.

Nevertheless, Hoekstra said he saw signs of progress on a number of fronts, including the performance of the Iraqi army and coalition forces, the quality of U.S. military and diplomatic leaders and the cooperation of other Arab countries in fighting terrorism.

"I was in Libya in January, and they were talking about their contributions in fighting the war on terror, and on this trip, people were verifying their claims," he said.

But he was sharply critical of the Iraqi police and security forces and of the slow pace of private contractors in carrying out billions of dollars worth of reconstruction projects.

"I'm disappointed in the police," he said. "We have the ability at any given time to project our power everywhere in the country. We can go in and help them, but the local law-enforcement people are not able to fill that vacuum."

While some private contractors have done their jobs, most haven't, he said. He blamed that on a combination of "security problems and poor management" and said he will press Congress to investigate.

"We took names, and we will follow up on it," he said.

Ruppersberger, who has been to Iraq three times, said that the effort to train Iraqi forces "has come a long way" but said the reconstruction program has been "mismanaged from the beginning."

U.S. troops should no longer conduct patrols in Baghdad and other major urban areas but should operate from the perimeter, he said, adding "We can still be there to assist the Iraqis, but they have to realize they can't be dependent on us. By moving out of the urban areas, the Iraqi people will no longer think we are occupying the country."

Shadegg said he "got to talk with more Iraqi civilians" than he had in two previous trips "and they made it clear most Iraqis don't want us to leave too soon, before they're in a position to defend themselves."

Bush Says Iraqis Resuming Government Talks (AP-Y2)

AP2, March 28, 2006

President Bush on Tuesday directed his entire Cabinet, from the housing chief to the treasury secretary, to assist their Iraqi counterparts once a permanent government is formed.

"By making a broad commitment from the federal government, we'll help the Iraqis establish a democracy, we'll help them build the institutions necessary for a stable society, and we'll help defeat the terrorists," the president said.

The president was surrounded on the Rose Garden steps by more than a dozen department secretaries and Cabinet-rank officials from his administration.

While Bush spoke at the White House about a future government, talks in Iraq to make it a reality remained fragile.

After a one-day boycott, Shiite leaders returned to the negotiations on how to replace the current caretaker government with a broad-based national one representing all of Iraq's factions.

DOJ_NMG_0023165

Bush said he was pleased the talks resumed. But Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish representatives are struggling over issues such as how to apportion the most powerful posts.

U.S. officials are eager for quick resolution on a unity government in hope it would quell the daily violence in Iraq and set the stage for the start of a drawdown of U.S. troops.

Bush's remarks followed a more than hourlong Cabinet meeting on Iraq and the fight against terrorism. Participants received a briefing from Gen. John Abizaid, the top U.S. commander in the Middle East; Gen. George Casey, the top commander in Iraq; and U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad.

White House press secretary Scott McClellan said Khalilzad told the president that the Iraqi negotiators "have made a lot of tough choices and ... reached a lot of compromises."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice brought up the need for each Cabinet member to build relationships with his eventual Iraqi counterpart, and Bush said he told them, "I expect them to follow through on that."

Bush also met Tuesday with three delegations of lawmakers from both parties who have recently visited Iraq. The president planned to speak about Iraq on Wednesday.

Thousands Of Iraqis Flee To Avoid Spread Of Violence (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

BAGHDAD, March 28 -- Sectarian violence has displaced more than 25,000 Iraqis since the Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite Muslim shrine, a U.N.-affiliated agency said Tuesday, and shelters and tent cities are springing up across central and southern Iraq to house homeless Sunni and Shiite families.

The flight is continuing, according to the International Organization for Migration, which works closely with the United Nations and other groups. The result has been a population exchange as Sunni and Shiite families flee mixed communities for the safety of areas where their own sects predominate.

"I definitely wouldn't say the displacement has peaked," said Dana Graber, an official of the migration agency in Amman, Jordan. "It's continuous."

The agency's figures were compiled from information provided by partner organizations working with displaced Iraqis. The government Ministry of Displacement and Migration puts the count higher, at more than 32,000.

"I was shocked to be threatened by people from the same place I had lived in for so many years," said Hussein Alwan, 53, a cafe owner, who said he was driven out of Latifiyah, a mixed Shiite-Sunni city in the area south of Baghdad known as the Triangle of Death.

Alwan, a Shiite, traveled with his wife, four daughters and three sons this month to the almost entirely Shiite city of Najaf, where local authorities have converted a vacant hotel into a shelter for the newcomers and say they are gathering tents for an outlying camp. Iraqi newspapers on Tuesday reported tents pitched in a field outside another southern city, Nasiriyah, for Shiite families arriving there in flight from sectarian violence.

Alwan told a story that already has grown familiar since the near-destruction of the Golden Mosque in Samarra, 65 miles north of Baghdad, touched off five weeks of Shiite-Sunni bloodletting. "They told me that I should leave within 24 hours or we will all get killed," Alwan said in an interview in Najaf. "So we left everything there and took only the bare things we need to live."

The mosque bombing greatly escalated steadily climbing sectarian and ethnic tensions in Iraq, where the Shiite majority and Sunni Arab and ethnic Kurdish minorities have been competing for a share of power and turf since the overthrow of President Saddam Hussein three years ago.

During Hussein's rule, forced transfers of ethnic group members left close to 1 million Iraqis internally displaced, and the country has experienced large flows of displaced people since the U.S.-led invasion, said Graber, the agency official. The November 2004 U.S. offensive in Fallujah, for example, sent more than 40,000 residents fleeing the city, she said.

Since the Samarra bombing, threats or killings have spurred many families to flee their homes with nothing, not even their ration cards, Graber said. "And there's no certainty as to when it will be safe again to return, when they can return without their sons getting killed," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0023166

Both Shiite and Sunni families make up the displaced, the immigration agency's figures show.

Many Sunni families are leaving Shiite or mixed communities to take refuge in heavily Sunni western Iraq, and many Shiite families are heading south to the country's Shiite heartland. In some places, the last remaining minorities have left otherwise homogenous places.

Within Baghdad, many families are moving between Sunni, Shiite and mixed neighborhoods.

Baghdad has taken in at least 220 Shiite families from Anbar province, a Sunni stronghold west of the capital, according to reports gathered by the agency. These families "represent a fairly high percentage of the total Shia community in Anbar," the agency noted.

In Fallujah, an overwhelmingly Sunni Arab city 35 miles west of Baghdad, only 37 Shiite families remain, persuaded by pleas from their Sunni neighbors to stay despite threats from foreign fighters, the agency said.

Another 15 or so miles to the west, in Habbaniyah, dozens of Sunni families have gathered to seek shelter.

Dhafir Sadoun, a 41-year-old shop owner who uprooted his household in Baghdad's Sadr City neighborhood and came to Habbaniyah, said he had felt no threat from the militias of Iraq's governing Shiite religious parties. But after months of kidnappings and killings of Sunni men blamed on the Shiite-dominated government security forces, it had become impossible to remain, he said.

"We did not fear the Mahdi Army," Sadoun said, referring to the militia loyal to Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, "because we've lived in Sadr City for 20 years, and everyone knows us and knows how we love the Shiites. But the Interior Ministry commandos arrest any Sunni. They don't just arrest them; they kill them."

Police in Baghdad discovered 17 corpses Tuesday, all men who were handcuffed and shot in the head, the Associated Press reported. Most had been dumped under a bridge.

Deaths reported publicly by police have represented a fraction of the total number of victims of execution-style, sectarian killings brought daily to Baghdad's morgue. Iraqi and international officials reported more than 1,000 people killed in central Iraq alone in the first week after the mosque bombing, and hundreds have died since.

Shiite-Sunni violence has intensified as Iraq drifts under the leadership of a caretaker government more than three months after national elections. In Baghdad, Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish political leaders resumed negotiations on forming a new government Tuesday, a day after the talks were interrupted by Shiites' outcry over a U.S.-Iraqi raid Sunday on what the U.S. military said was an armed faction and what the Shiites said were Shiite men at prayer in a mosque.

In Washington, top Pentagon officials said Tuesday that Sunday's raid did not mark the start of a broader crackdown on Shiite militias and said U.S. troops were unaware until after breaching the compound that it contained a place of worship.

At a Pentagon briefing, Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said the raid targeted a kidnapping ring. He said an Iraqi counterterrorism unit and its U.S. Special Forces advisers discovered an Iraqi hostage and numerous weapons inside the compound, as well as a small minaret and prayer room. U.S. forces "did not know that that minaret was there on the way in," Pace said.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld described the raid as a distinct, Iraqi-led operation. The Iraqi leaders engaged in negotiations over forming a new government, he said, were unlikely now to make any "big announcements on changes in policy" toward militias.

For Abu Ghraib, A Limited Prosecution (CSM)

By Mark Sappenfield

The Christian Science Monitor, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON - In May 2004, just weeks after the images of abuse at Abu Ghraib had become public, the commanding officer of American forces in the Middle East sat before Congress and shared what he considered to be a bedrock tenet of military leadership.

"Officers of the United States military are responsible," said Gen. John Abizaid. "Every officer is responsible for what his or her unit does or fails to do."

DOJ_NMG_0023167

Yet two years later, as the military nears the end of its efforts to prosecute those who staged the Abu Ghraib photographs, the responsibility for those crimes has fallen almost entirely on the lower ranks - at least publicly. The question of why has in many respects far overshadowed the rest of the legal process.

The reasons are many and begin with the obvious: Those who commit the crimes - on film, no less - are the easiest to snare. Yet many experts add that the lesson of the courts-martial of Abu Ghraib is: Once war's chaos descends, it becomes ever more difficult to trace the line of accountability upward through the ranks.

In this case, the confusion was not caused by bullets or bombs, but by the administration's decision to adopt new and undefined rules for detainee treatment before the war. With the new rules, the worst of war crept into the cellblock, and the chain of command all but evaporated.

"The fog of war does exist, and that's why you have to be so clear and drill, drill, drill," says Walter Huffman, who served as judge advocate general of the Army from 1997 to 2001. "When you inject uncertainty into a situation that was already filled with uncertainty, my experience is that this is exactly what happens."

Even in the best situations, establishing responsibility along the chain of command is among the thorniest of tasks for the military, whether the incident involves a ship run aground or a bungled battle plan. With Abu Ghraib, those bearing the public blame - and the jail time - have been enlisted men and women.

Last week, the 10th court-martial connected to Abu Ghraib concluded. As in every other case, the defendant was convicted and was not higher than the rank of staff sergeant. One final court-martial remains in May, also for a sergeant.

In some respects, that is typical, not least because soldiers on the ground are more likely than officers behind the lines to commit obvious war crimes. Yet experts note that officers are not exempt from discipline: It just comes in a different form.

Abu Ghraib has followed that pattern. The two highest-ranking officers known to be punished in connection with the scandal - Brig. Gen. Janis Karpinski and Col. Thomas Pappas - were given nonjudicial punishments that seriously blighted their careers. As a rule, though, nonjudicial punishments are not a matter of public record and therefore bring less attention than courts-martial.

To some, it is similar to what might happen to a police chief if he doesn't watch over his officers on the beat. "We do not yet hold people criminally responsible based on position alone," says William Eckhardt, who was the chief prosecutor in the My Lai cases, where two US soldiers were tried for leading a massacre of Vietnamese villagers in 1968. "It seems like things are working the way they should be," he adds.

Others, however, look at the Abu Ghraib proceedings and wonder what happened to the real-life "A Few Good Men" moment - when a plucky defense lawyer connected the dots between the crimes of enlisted men and the commands of a senior officer.

"Defense counsels are pretty good at defending their clients," says Mr. Huffman. "I was anticipating more higher-ranking officers called as witnesses of the defense."

It points to the limitations of the court-martial, which can essentially only hold senior officers to account if they gave an express order to abuse detainees. But that, in itself, is significant: It suggests to Huffman that high-level orders for abuse could not have been pervasive, or else defense lawyers would have found out about it.

In fact, the only general officer called during one of the courts-martial was Maj. Gen. Geoffrey Miller, who first oversaw Guantánamo before taking control of US detention facilities in Iraq in 2003. General Miller took the uncommon step of invoking his right against self-incrimination to avoid testifying.

"That was awfully unusually for a general officer," says Huffman. "That in itself sends an unfortunate signal."

As a result, what has emerged from the Abu Ghraib proceedings is a portrait of a problem more systemic than individual, a Hydra in reverse - a monster not with many heads, but none.

Like the 10 courts-martial, for instance, 12 Pentagon investigations of detainee treatment convened since Abu Ghraib speak in expansive terms about the dereliction of senior leadership but offer almost no specifics. Yet there is widespread agreement among experts that those convicted of crimes at Abu Ghraib were not simply "a few bad apples," as the administration suggested.

DOJ_NMG_0023168

Instead, they were the product of a culture of uncertainty and neglect that blurred the lines of accountability. Critics go further. One of the Pentagon investigations, by Vice Adm. Albert Church, "says misconduct was pervasive, therefore there can be no singular cause," says John Hutson, a former judge advocate general of the Navy. "I would say it does prove a singular cause - an arguably criminal lack of leadership."

It is a broad swipe at Pentagon leaders and the administration, but it also gets at the frustrations of some Americans. Mr. Hutson's concerns are about the detainee doctrine laid out at the highest levels of government, and he acknowledges that in such instances, holding senior leaders responsible isn't necessarily a legal exercise.

After the Navy went through the Tailhook sexual-harassment scandal, the Navy's senior leadership simply resigned.

Adds Eugene Fidell of the National Institute for Military Justice: "Some of the accountability is accountability that can only be achieved politically."

Rice Asks Russians To Probe Spying Reports (AP-Y2)

By Anne Gearan

AP2, March 29, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Tuesday she had asked her Russian counterpart for an investigation into a report that Russian intelligence fed U.S. battle plans to Saddam Hussein before the 2003 invasion of Iraq.

"I have talked with the Russian foreign minister and asked them to look into this and to take it very seriously," Rice said.

At the same time, Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, raised the possibility that the allegation of Russian collusion might be "disinformation," which in military parlance could mean that American commanders had sought to spread false information about battle strategy in order to deceive Saddam about actual troop movements.

The allegation first became public last Friday with the release of a 210-page Pentagon report on how Saddam's government viewed the U.S. invasion.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who said he was briefed extensively on the report months ago, said Tuesday he was not aware of the allegation against the Russians until last Friday.

"It merits looking into," he said.

Rumsfeld declined to say whether he thought there should be a U.S. investigation into whether someone inside the U.S. military gave classified information to the Russians, as is suggested in the report.

"I'd have to go back and read it carefully and see what credence one ought to give to it, and see what we may have discovered through other channels, and then make a decision," Rumsfeld said.

Rice, testifying at a Senate hearing, said, "We take very seriously any implication that someone might have been passing information that endangered the operation at the outset of the war, and we will look for an answer back from the Russian government."

Rice and other U.S. officials made no direct accusations against Russia, whose government has an increasingly prickly and complicated relationship with the United States.

"We've wanted not to conclude before we've had the discussion, but it's obviously a very serious matter and we're taking it up with the Russians," Rice said.

She placed a telephone call Tuesday to Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov to ask for an investigation, said State Department spokesman Adam Ereli.

Russian officials have said the allegation is false, and Lavrov has called it politically motivated. The Russian government strongly opposed the U.S. invasion.

Pace, in his first public comments on the idea of Russian help to Saddam, expressed a degree of doubt about the veracity of the information as presented in a Joint Forces Command report. The report cited two Iraqi documents captured during the early days of the invasion — one of which said the Russian ambassador in Baghdad had passed sensitive information about U.S. battle plans to Saddam.

The other document said Russian intelligence had obtained information from "sources" inside U.S. Central Command's war-fighting headquarters hear Doha, Qatar, and passed it to Iraqi officials.

DOJ_NMG_0023169

"We still don't know whether or not the translation itself is 100 percent accurate," Pace said. "We don't know if this is real information or disinformation. There's all kinds of pieces of this that need to be looked into."

The authors of the report, who briefed reporters on its details last Friday, said they saw no reason to doubt the authenticity of the information relating to alleged Russian collusion.

In at least one case, the report suggests that the information provided by the Russians did more harm than good for Saddam. In fact it may have reinforced in Saddam's mind a mistaken impression about the timing of the U.S. ground assault into Baghdad — an impression that permitted U.S. forces to preserve an element of surprise.

Referring to a Russian letter to Saddam that claimed the Russians had "sources" inside the U.S. Central Command, the Pentagon report said, "Such external sources of information were only one of the fog-generators obscuring the minds of Iraq's senior leadership."

That letter was dated March 24, five days into the war.

On the other hand, the Russians also reportedly told Saddam that the main focus of U.S. ground forces moving toward Baghdad from the southwest was the area around the city of Karbala. This was true. After crossing a bridge over the Euphrates River outside of Karbala, the 3rd Infantry Division had a clear path to the Iraqi capital.

Russia's Newfound Clout Pushes US To Rethink Ties (AFP)

AFP, March 29, 2006

Russia's newfound diplomatic clout on the international scene and its slide away from democracy have forced the United States to rethink its relations with Moscow, analysts say.

They say if President George W. Bush were to peer into the soul of his Russian counterpart Vladimir Putin today -- as he famously claimed to have done during their first meeting in 2000 -- he was sure to find a much less kindred and trustworthy spirit.

"Russia arguably is the most important country in the world to go from semi-democratic to undemocratic during the Bush administration," Michael McFaul, a senior fellow at the Hoover Institution in Washington and a political science professor at Stanford University, told AFP.

"I'm sure Bush regrets saying what he did about Putin (in 2000)," McFaul added. "He had judged this guy one way and he was wrong about it.

"Now Bush is much more suspicious and he's disappointed."

The latest signs of trouble between the two countries emerged last week with a US Defense Department report suggesting that Moscow provided intelligence to Saddam Hussein at the start of the 2003 US-led invasion of Iraq.

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was expected to raise the issue when she meets later this week in Berlin with her Russian counterpart Sergei Lavrov, who has denied the accusations, saying they were politically motivated.

The Pentagon report came amid brewing tensions between the United States and Russia on a number of issues, notably Putin's recent invitation to the Palestinian militant group Hamas to come to Moscow, his refusal to back US-led moves for UN sanctions on Iran over its nuclear program, and his support of the authoritarian regime in Belarus.

Washington has also expressed concern about Moscow using its new status as an energy giant to intimidate its neighbors, and has criticized Russia's decision to sell uranium to India.

Andrew Kuchins, a senior associate in the Russia and Eurasia Program at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, said it was clear that Moscow's behaviour was aimed at asserting itself as an independent major power not subservient to the United States.

"The Russians don't want to be talked down to by the US," Kuchins told AFP. "They see themselves as an independent player and they certainly want to be viewed as a significant player in the Middle East -- from Iran, to Iraq to the Mideast peace process."

McFaul said Putin's invitation to Hamas reflected the Russian leader's bid to undercut the United States on the world stage.

"Putin looks at any actions that weaken the US as good for Russia and vice versa," he said.

The fact that Russia is preparing to host the Group of Eight summit in Saint Petersburg has also emboldened Putin, analysts say.

DOJ_NMG_0023170

"Right now the Bush administration just wants to get through the G8 summit ... trying to make that as least negative an event as possible," McFaul said. "After that it's kind of over in terms of policy until new election in both countries (in 2008)."

Andrei Piontkovsky, a Russian political scientist who is a visiting fellow at the Hudson Institute in Washington, said the Putin administration's foreign policy decisions of recent months reflected its hostility to the United States and the West in general.

"I think the US needs to face reality and stop pretending that Putin is an ally," Piontkovsky told AFP. "Maybe several years ago Bush looked into (Putin's) soul and saw something there.

"But what really concerns me today is this very evident flight of Russian foreign policy from the West into the camp of anyone who is confronting the West."

Influence In Iraq Emerges As Key Issue As Arab Conference Opens (NYT)

By Abeer Allam

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

KHARTOUM, Sudan, March 28 — Concerns over growing Iranian influence in Iraq, and the lack of Arab involvement there, dominated the opening of the annual Arab League summit here on Tuesday.

"Any solution for the Iraqi problem cannot be reached without Arabs and Arab participation," Amr Moussa, secretary general of the Arab League, said in his opening speech. "Any consultations conducted without Arab participation will be considered unsatisfactory and will yield no solutions."

Arab countries have been fuming over an Iranian-American agreement this month to hold direct talks about sectarian violence in Iraq.

"They fear Iraq is drifting from the Arabs, being divorced from the Arab world, and the increased influence of another neighboring country," said Hoshyar Zebari, the Iraqi foreign minister. "This time, we are seeing some positive moves by the Arab League toward more realization of the situation on Iraq."

In a draft resolution likely to be approved tomorrow, the group's 22 Arab nations have pledged to reopen diplomatic missions in Iraq. In November, the Arab League also started an effort to reconcile differences among Iraq's religious sects in hopes of ending the sectarian fighting there, as well as increasing the Arab presence. Still, many Arab governments said they felt powerless in the face of Iran's growing influence.

"Arabs have no cards to play with, while Iran has many," said Abdel Wahab Badrakhan, editor of Al Hayat, a newspaper based in London. "Iran can influence the situation in Iraq, Lebanon, world oil prices, and now can play the nuclear card."

Analysts in the region feel that Iran is being rewarded for adopting a confrontational approach. Even though Iran has supported terrorist groups and defied the West's admonition to abandon its nuclear program, Arab countries fear that the United States may cut a deal with Iran that further weakens Arab influence in Iraq.

On the other hand, said Mohammed el-Sayed Said, deputy director of the Ahram Center for Political and Strategic Studies, the Arab countries have complied with international obligations and received nothing from the American government in return.

A declaration expected to be approved by the Arab League on Wednesday pointedly called for "respecting the Iraqi sovereignty, territorial integrity, freedom and independence and noninterference in domestic affairs."

Report Adds To Criticism Of Halliburton's Iraq Role (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

Even as a Halliburton subsidiary was absorbing harsh criticism of its costs on a 2003 no-bid contract for work in Iraq, the government officials overseeing a second contract wrote that the company was running up exorbitant new expenses on similar work, according to a report issued yesterday by the staff for the Democrats on the House Government Reform Committee.

The report, prepared for a frequent critic of Halliburton, Representative Henry A. Waxman of California, is based on previously undisclosed correspondence and performance evaluations from 2004 and 2005.

The documents show that the government's contracting officers became increasingly frustrated as they tried to penetrate what they considered to be inaccurate or misleading progress reports and expense vouchers filed by the subsidiary, Kellogg Brown & Root.

DOJ_NMG_0023171

In August 2004, one of the officers wrote to the company that "you have universally failed to provide adequate cost information as required."

A few months later, after the company was served with a "cure notice," in which the government threatened to terminate the contract if performance was not improved, or "cured," another officer said he was writing "in sheer frustration with the consistent lack of accurate data."

Kellogg Brown & Root's second contract, awarded in January 2004 for rebuilding oil infrastructure in southern Iraq, has a maximum value of $1.2 billion. A company spokeswoman, Melissa Norcross, said that the report was "as devoid of context as it is new information" and that many of the issues raised by the contracting officers had been resolved.

The company, Ms. Norcross said, was forced to work with an ever-shifting cast of oversight organizations and at least 15 government contracting officials. "With each change, the company adjusted to meet the needs of its customer," she said, "all while operating in an extremely hostile war zone."

But Mr. Waxman, the ranking Democrat on the committee, said the report showed that the company had "actually done a worse job under its second Iraq oil contract than it did under the original no-bid contract."

William L. Nash, a retired Army general who is a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations and an expert on post-conflict zones, said the unusually revealing documents laid bare "a microcosm of all the ills" of the Iraq rebuilding effort. "This a continuing example of the mismanagement of the Iraq reconstruction from the highest levels down to the contractors on the ground," he said.

The second contract was not terminated after the cure notice, and contracting officers later noted improvements in some areas. But the company received what appears to be a rebuke when it was given nothing out of a possible $7.9 million in socalled award fees for its first year of work on the contract. The award fees are incentives given by the government to reward good performance.

An award fee given for a later period, roughly the first half of 2005, was about 20 percent of the maximum, which Mr. Nash, who has been involved in determining such fees, described as extraordinarily low.

Both Kellogg Brown & Root contracts called for things like repairing oil wells and pipelines, installing power generators at oil facilities and importing fuel to Iraq. The first contract, worth $2.4 billion, generated enormous controversy after Pentagon auditors questioned more than $200 million in fuel delivery costs.

Critics like Mr. Waxman called the challenged costs overcharges, a description rejected by the company, which claimed a measure of vindication last month when the Army overruled the auditors and reimbursed nearly all of the delivery charges.

The new report, which says that Pentagon auditors have questioned $45 million of the $365 million in costs they reviewed, may revive the battle. A spokesman for the Defense Contract Audit Agency confirmed those figures.

Responding to the numbers, an official with Kellogg Brown & Root said, "Audits are part of the normal contracting process, and it is important to note that the auditors' role in the process is advisory only."

But what are likely to be seen as the most striking portions of the report are those that cite the variously stern, heated and even anguished language of contracting officers trying to bring the company to heel.

"As I have said in numerous meetings, KBR's lack of cost containment and funds management is the single biggest detriment to this program," one officer, Maj. Michael V. Waggle, wrote in the cure notice. He noted that the company had listed an impossibly high cost overrun of $436,019,574 on one job, charges of $114,308 for an oil spill cleanup that failed to remove any oil and another set of tasks in which the overruns were 36.9 percent of all costs.

The slides used in presentations during the deliberations of the board that determined the first award fee are almost equally eye-catching. On one slide, covering the company's success at meeting its planned schedules, a section labeled "Strengths" bears only the notation "N/A," presumably meaning no answer or not applicable. The "Weaknesses" section contains four detailed items.

Documents Trace KBR Billing Problems (WP)

By Griff Witte

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0023172

Halliburton Co. repeatedly overcharged the government and exhibited "profound systemic problems" under a $1.2 billion contract to restore oil services in Iraq, according to internal government documents released yesterday by one of the company's fiercest critics.

The documents, cited in a report by the staff of Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), depict government officials' increasing irritation with Halliburton subsidiary Kellogg Brown and Root Inc. as schedules slid, costs multiplied and the company balked at meeting demands for accurate cost estimates. Ultimately, contract overseers threatened to terminate the company's contract if it did not improve.

Pentagon auditors have challenged $45 million worth of company costs, out of $365 million in charges that were reviewed. Under the terms of its deal with the government, KBR earns its profit as a percentage of its costs.

In one case, the government's contracting officials reported that KBR attempted to inflate its cost estimates by paying a supplier more than it was due. In another, KBR cut its cost estimates in half after it was pressed on its true expenses. In a third, KBR billed for work performed by the Iraqi oil ministry.

"The government has made numerous attempts to work with KBR to bring their cost reporting procedures into minimal acceptable standards," a contracting officer wrote to the company in January 2005. He said that the company's "failure to deliver a useable, accurate cost report" was "endangering performance of the contract."

As the company's costs escalated and work fell behind schedule, federal officials in Iraq reported KBR was being "obstructive" toward officials trying to investigate what had gone wrong.

Melissa Norcross, a Halliburton spokeswoman, defended the company's performance under the oil contract, saying Waxman's report dredged up old issues that have already been resolved. Norcross pointed to a July report by the State Department that said Halliburton had been "satisfactorily addressing most of the issues" raised in previous evaluations.

She labeled the Waxman report "partisan" and said it does not take into account the numerous changes the government requested once work was already underway.

"After two years and from thousands of miles away, it is easy to criticize decisions and actions that were based on urgent mission requirements and severe time constraints," Norcross said in a statement.

KBR, the Pentagon's largest contractor in Iraq, has often been criticized for its work, including one deal for supporting U.S. troops with food, laundry and mail services. Yesterday's report was the first to look at the competitively awarded contract from 2004 under which KBR worked to restore oil services in the southern part of Iraq.

That contract was a follow-up to a no-bid 2003 deal that gave KBR that responsibility nationwide. The Pentagon's internal audit division -- the Defense Contract Audit Agency -- had warned the Army Corps of Engineers to contact auditors before negotiating with the company on the new contract because of "significant deficiencies" in KBR's ability to estimate its costs. The DCAA later said the Corps never did so.

"Halliburton has pulled off the impossible: it has actually done a worse job under its second Iraq oil contract than it did under the original no-bid contract," Waxman said in a statement. "This new round of overcharges and dismal performance would have been avoided if the Bush Administration had listened to its own auditors."

Halliburton has said in the past it believes criticism of its performance in Iraq is politically motivated, in large part because Dick Cheney was the firm's chief executive before he became vice president.

A Defense Department spokesman had no immediate comment on the Waxman report.

Halliburton's Iraq Work Criticized (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

The U.S. government was so uneasy about Halliburton Corp.'s performance on a major Iraq reconstruction contract that it threatened to end the award unless the company's conduct improved, internal government documents show.

The findings prepared for Rep. Henry Waxman (D., Calif.) are the first to examine the company's contract to restore Iraq's southern oil fields.

DOJ_NMG_0023173

Drawing on reams of government reports and correspondence, they show that U.S. contracting officials regularly expressed concerns about the quality, integrity and cost of Halliburton's work.

Pentagon auditors questioned $45 million of the $365 million Halliburton received for the work.

"Among the serious and persistent problems identified in the documents are repeated examples of apparently intentional overcharging, exorbitant costs, poor cost reporting, slipping schedules, and a refusal to cooperate with the government," the report noted.

Halliburton officials questioned the report's conclusions, noting that the State Department sent a report to Congress the following month crediting Halliburton with "satisfactorily addressing most of the issues" raised about its work.

"This partisan 'report' is as devoid of context as it is new information," the company said in a written statement stressing the dangers of working in wartime Iraq.

The report comes at a moment of transition for the U.S. effort to rebuild Iraq. The Bush administration recently chose not to seek additional money for reconstructing Iraq, even though the $20 billion spent to date has failed to restore the country's infrastructure to prewar levels. Law-enforcement officials are intensifying their probes into fraud and corruption that is believed to have occurred.

The report focuses on the "Restore Iraqi Oil 2" contract awarded in January 2004 to Halliburton's Kellogg, Brown & Root subsidiary. Halliburton said most issues have since been resolved.

In an Aug. 28, 2004, "letter of concern," officials in the Pentagon's Project and Contracting Office in Iraq accused Halliburton of "accruing exorbitant indirect costs at a rapid pace" and failing to properly track its expenses. In October of that year, contracting officials met with Halliburton personnel to complain that the company maintained too many support employees in Houston and Kuwait, according to a summary of the meeting included in the report. Near the end of 2004, a contractor charged with evaluating Halliburton's work concluded that the firm's progress reports about an oil-field project were "misleading" and "distorted," according to another document in the report.

The mounting concerns led contracting officials to take the rare step of sending Halliburton in January 2005 a so-called cure notice complaining that the company's "lack of cost containment and funds management is the single biggest detriment to this program" and threatening to terminate the contract if matters didn't improve.

The U.S. lifted the threat in June 2005, but sharply limited the bonuses Halliburton received for its work. For the first year of the contract, U.S. officials withheld all of the $7.9 million Halliburton was eligible for, accusing the company of misdeeds such as seeking reimbursement for construction work actually carried out by the Iraqi Oil Ministry, according to the report. The U.S. paid Halliburton just 20% of the award fees it was eligible for in the second phase of the contract, chiding the firm for slow progress in the field and overly expensive support personnel in Kuwait.

Mr. Waxman said the report showed the administration failed to properly oversee the rebuilding of Iraq.

"There were concerns raised about giving Halliburton more work, but the administration gave the company a blank check that essentially rewarded it for poor performance," he said.

Documents Describe U.S. Auditors' Battles With Halliburton (LAT)

By Walter F. Roche Jr.

The Los Angeles Times, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — Frustrated government auditors pleaded, cajoled and finally threatened Halliburton Co. executives who repeatedly failed to comply with government reporting requirements under a key Iraq contract with a $1.2-billion potential price tag, newly released documents show.

The documents, along with a report, were issued Tuesday by the Democratic staff of the House Committee on Government Reform. Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles) had requested the report on the contract, considered crucial to the restoration of oil production capacity in southern Iraq.

The 15-page report cites findings by auditors that Halliburton overcharged — "apparently intentionally" — on the contract by using hidden calculations, and attempted in one instance to bill the government for $26 million in costs it did not incur. Auditors also challenged $45 million in other costs, labeling them as "unreasonable or unsupported," the report said.

The report blamed the Department of Defense for awarding the contract despite warnings from auditors that Halliburton's cost estimating system had "significant deficiencies." Although federal officials have criticized the company and threatened to cancel its contracts, Halliburton remains the largest private contractor in Iraq.

The contract, awarded in January 2004, was one of three Iraq pacts for the company once headed by Vice President Dick Cheney.

Although the other two agreements — one for supplies for U.S. troops and the other for fuel and oil industry repairs — have faced heavy criticism as no-bid contracts, Waxman and his staff said Tuesday's report was the first to focus on the third Halliburton contract, for the repair of oil fields in southern Iraq, which was awarded after a competitive bidding process.

"Halliburton has pulled off the impossible," Waxman, a staunch critic of the firm, said in releasing the report. "It has actually done a worse job under its second Iraq oil contract than it did under the original no-bid contract."

Melissa Norcross, a spokeswoman for Halliburton and a subsidiary, KBR, dismissed the report as partisan, and said it focused on issues that had been resolved. She said Waxman failed to include a State Department report to Congress that commended the company "for numerous improvements" to its cost reporting system.

In the days after the U.S. invasion in March 2003, Bush administration officials said the revitalization of Iraq oil fields would finance the country's reconstruction. Since then, though, oil output has failed to exceed prewar levels.

The documents released Tuesday review objective examinations of Halliburton's performance and compliance, including by the Pentagon's Defense Contract Audit Agency. The records provide details of the repeated efforts of government auditors to get Halliburton to comply with record-keeping and reporting requirements.

"You are hereby notified that the government considers that you have universally failed to provide adequate cost information as required under the subject contract," a U.S. contracting officer wrote in an Aug. 28, 2004, letter to an executive of KBR, the Halliburton unit formerly known as Kellogg Brown & Root. "Furthermore, this contract is accruing exorbitant indirect costs at a rapid rate."

Another memo stated: "KBR has done the minimum and has not shown initiative in providing the information required, despite repeated requests."

Other audit documents cite Halliburton's "lack of cost controls." In November 2004, citing the continued lack of required data from Halliburton, government auditors warned that noncompliance would result in "adverse contractual action" and the issuance of a so-called cure notice.

In late 2004, alarmed U.S. officials discovered that Halliburton, in a routine monthly report, had projected an estimated $436-million cost overrun on the project. "This," the government delinquency report states, "is unacceptable."

In late January 2005, the Pentagon's Project and Contracting Office formally issued the threatened cure notice, and warned Halliburton that unless the deficiencies were corrected, the contract could be canceled.

"To date, KBR has yet to produce a cost report that would meet minimal acceptable standards," the Jan. 29, 2005, notice states, adding that the company "is in violation of its basic contractual requirements."

KBR responded with a corrective action plan on Feb. 20, 2005, and promised "to take the necessary measures to correct deficiencies," adding that measures had been taken to identify "systemic deficiencies." KBR blamed delays on government requests for voluminous information.

In a March 7, 2005, response, an official of the Joint Contracting Command cited the "repeated failed attempts by the government to get factual data from the cost report. In sheer frustration with the consistent lack of data, the government has been pushed into the position of asking for everything possible in an attempt to be able to track the KBR costs."

Christian Convert Goes Into Hiding; Italy Asylum Eyed (WT/AP)

By Amir Shah, Associated Press

The Washington Times, March 29, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan -- An Afghan man who had faced the death penalty for abandoning Islam for Christianity went into hiding yesterday in Kabul after he was freed from prison. Italy said it may grant him asylum.

DOJ_NMG_0023175

Abdul Rahman, 41, was released from the high-security Policharki prison on the outskirts of the capital late Monday after a court dropped charges of apostasy against him for lack of evidence and suspected mental illness. President Hamid Karzai had been under heavy international pressure to drop the case.

Muslim clerics condemned Mr. Rahman's release, saying it was a "betrayal of Islam." They threatened to incite violent protests.

Afghan Deputy Attorney General Mohammad Ishaq Aliko said Mr. Rahman was being held "at a special place and that is only for his own security," Agence France-Presse reported.

"The United Nations and the Afghanistan human rights commission are both aware and involved," Mr. Aliko said. Western diplomatic sources said it was thought the Christian convert was being held at a U.N. compound in Kabul.

U.S. officials have said they would help find Mr. Rahman a country that would provide him a "safe haven," but would not comment on whether U.S. forces were helping protect Mr. Rahman in Afghanistan.

"We are working with the appropriate authorities to ensure his well-being," a State Department spokeswoman said yesterday.

The Italian government said Foreign Minister Gianfranco Fini will use a Cabinet meeting today to press for Mr. Rahman to be granted asylum there.

Italy has close ties with Afghanistan, whose former king, Muhammad Zahir Shah, was allowed to live with his family in exile in Rome for 30 years. The former royals returned to Kabul after the fall of the Taliban regime in 2001.

An Italian diplomat in Kabul said no one from the Italian mission had been in contact with Mr. Rahman, but they had been assured his health was all right.

Mr. Rahman was put on trial last week for converting 16 years ago while he was a medical aid worker for an international Christian group helping Afghan refugees in Pakistan. He faced the death penalty under Afghanistan's Islamic laws.

The case caused an outcry in the United States and other nations that helped oust the hard-line Taliban regime in late 2001 and provide aid and military support for Mr. Karzai.

The outrage put Mr. Karzai in a difficult position because he also risked offending religious sensibilities in Afghanistan, where senior Muslim clerics have been united in calling for Mr. Rahman to be executed.

"This is a betrayal of Islam and the entire Afghan nation by our government," said Hamiddullah, a senior cleric in Kabul. "This will have very dangerous consequences for the government. Muslim leaders will react very strongly."

However, a preacher in northwestern Badghis province said the country's religious leaders should not incite violence. "Clerics shouldn't be calling for people to riot and damage our country," Mohammed Usman said.

DOJ:

U.S. Attorney General To Visit Yakamas (YAKHR)

By PHIL FEROLITO, YAKIMA HERALD-REPUBLIC

Yakima (WA) Herald Republic, March 28, 2006

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales will visit the Lower Yakima Valley on Wednesday to talk about drug and gang prevention with students and officials with the Yakama Nation.

An hour-long assembly with about 550 middle and high school students is planned for 10 a.m. at White Swan High School, Jonathan Black, a public affairs assistant for the attorney general's office, said in a phone interview Monday from Washington, D.C.

The event is open only to White Swan middle and high school students and school staff.

Later, Gonzales will meet tribal leaders in a closed gathering at the Yakama Nation Cultural Heritage Center in Toppenish. Tribal leaders have not said if other issues beyond drugs and gangs will be raised during their meeting with Gonzales.

As attorney general, Gonzales heads the federal Department of Justice, which is at the epicenter of issues such as immigration and the rights of detainees in the nation's war on terror.

DOJ_NMG_0023176

When Gonzales was sworn in on Feb. 3, 2005, he became the nation's first Hispanic attorney general and the 80th person to hold that office.

Born in San Antonio, he was one of eight children of parents who were the children of Mexican immigrants. After obtaining his law degree from Harvard University, he went on to serve as Texas secretary of state under then-Gov. George W. Bush. He is 50 years old.

His visit to the Lower Valley is his first stop in a swing through several Western states this week, including visits to Las Vegas, Los Angeles and San Jose, Calif.

U.S. Attorney General Appoints Local Prosecutor As Chair Of Justice Department Advisory Panel (SABJ)

San Antonio Business Journal, March 29, 2006

U.S. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales on Tuesday named Johnny Sutton to chair a key advisory committee that helps craft policy within the Justice Department.

Sutton is the U.S. Attorney for the Western District of Texas in San Antonio -- a position he has held since December 2001. In that role, he serves as the chief prosecutor for the federal government in San Antonio and West Texas.

Gonzales also appointed Susan Brooks, U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of Indiana, to serve as vice chair of the Advisory Committee of U.S. Attorneys.

"Johnny Sutton and Susan Brooks are experienced prosecutors who have served with distinction as United States Attorneys," Gonzales said in a statement.

"Together, we will work to combat terrorism, reduce violent crime and drug trafficking, prevent cybercrime and child exploitation, prosecute government and corporate corruption, and protect the civil rights of all Americans," the attorney general added.

Sutton has been a member of the Advisory Committee since 2002. He previously served as vice chairman of the panel and serves on the Border and Immigration Law Enforcement Subcommittee.

Sutton will be heading to Washington, D.C. every six to eight weeks for two full-day meetings with the attorney general and deputy attorney general.

As committee chairman, Sutton also will be called in to testify before Congress on how proposed legislation will affect law enforcement and the courts.

"I will be spending a lot more time in D.C.," Sutton says. "I will be spending a lot more time thinking about national policy."

Sutton will serve until the end of March 2007.

But even though he will be traveling more to D.C., Sutton says he is not trying to leverage this appointment to a position in Washington.

"I think my future (with the Justice Department) is in Texas," he says. "But you never say never. It's very exciting."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron Prosecutors Drop Some Charges And Rest Case (NYT)

By ALEXEI BARRIONUEVO

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

HOUSTON, March 28 — After more than eight weeks and 22 witnesses, the government rested its case on Tuesday against two former Enron chief executives, Jeffrey K. Skilling and Kenneth L. Lay, setting the stage for the defense to begin its bid to keep them out of prison.

When they present their first witness on Monday, the defense lawyers' burden will be a bit lighter, because the judge in the case, Simeon T. Lake III of Federal District Court, approved a government request to dismiss some of the criminal counts against the two men.

DOJ_NMG_0023177

Sean Berkowitz, the director of the Justice Department's Enron Task Force, said prosecutors chose not to present evidence on the dismissed charges "out of economy." Judge Lake said he had been "wondering where the evidence was" on some of the charges, "so now I don't have to ask."

The government rested its case early Tuesday after a former Enron employee testified about the apparent contradiction between Mr. Lay's rapid disposal of tens of millions of dollars in Enron stock and his public pronouncements that Enron shares were "an incredible bargain." The situation alarmed the employee, Joanne Cortez, enough that she told the Federal Bureau of Investigation about the trades.

Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling are accused of conspiring to defraud Enron's investors while enriching themselves. If convicted, they could spend decades in prison.

The judge closed the case for the rest of the week after Ms. Cortez left the stand, joking to jurors that it was "spring break." Defense lawyers agreed to use the time off to streamline their case, which they said they expected to last about four weeks. A defense lawyer said late Tuesday that Joannie Williamson, a former secretary of Mr. Lay's at Enron, would be their first witness. The much-anticipated testimony of Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay is expected to take about two weeks. Defense lawyers said Mr. Skilling would take the stand as early as the week of April 10, with Mr. Lay to follow.

The dismissed charges against Mr. Skilling include two counts of securities fraud involving an analyst call and a quarterly filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission, and one count of making false statements to auditors. For Mr. Lay, the judge dismissed one count of securities fraud for a Nov. 12, 2001, analyst conference call. Judge Lake denied a defense motion to dismiss four other counts against Mr. Lay.

Mr. Skilling is now charged with 28 counts of fraud, conspiracy and insider trading, and Mr. Lay with 6 counts of fraud and conspiracy.

Outside the courthouse, defense lawyers blasted the government's case, saying prosecutors had no choice but to drop the charges dismissed by the judge. Daniel Petrocelli, Mr. Skilling's lead lawyer, said the government case was "long on atmospherics and short on actual facts." He said Mr. Skilling was "very anxious to take the stand."

Michael Ramsey, Mr. Lay's lead lawyer, said he was surprised that the prosecutors had called Ms. Cortez when the government months ago failed to bring insider-trading charges against Mr. Lay. "That is unheard of in my experience," Mr. Ramsey said. Mr. Lay is scheduled to go on trial on bank fraud charges immediately after the current case.

Mr. Ramsey and Mr. Petrocelli told reporters that they continued to struggle to persuade potential witnesses, including former managers from Enron and the accounting firm Arthur Andersen, to testify on behalf of Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling. Mr. Petrocelli said fear of prosecution was the main reason most stayed away.

Mr. Ramsey sought to send a message to potential witnesses. "If you are going to make up your mind to win a case, now is the time to come forward," he said. "We need you down here at this courthouse to tell the truth about Enron."

In her testimony, Ms. Cortez, a former Enron employee who oversaw a line of credit the company had set up for Mr. Lay, said she was shocked to discover in 2001 that Enron's compensation committee had increased Mr. Lay's credit line to $7.5 million, from $4 million. The increase came a week after Enron reported large third-quarter losses in October 2001. By the end of the year, Mr. Lay maxed out the credit line, she said.

Mr. Lay repeatedly drew down the credit line and repaid it almost immediately with Enron shares he owned, Ms. Cortez said. "It made me question whether it was being used as somewhat of a tool to sell shares."

Ms. Cortez became so concerned that Mr. Lay's stock sales were not being disclosed that she hired a lawyer, who turned her records over to the F.B.I. "It's a clear indication of something going on for the C.E.O. to be selling so much stock," she said.

"I thought it was improper, " Ms. Cortez said. She conceded on cross-examination, however, that she had not known that Mr. Lay had used the line of credit to repay bank loans.

During 2001, Mr. Lay made withdrawals totaling $77.5 million and paid back just over $70 million, leaving a balance owed of $7.5 million, Bloomberg News reported.

While Mr. Lay has not been charged with insider trading, prosecutors have asserted that he enriched himself as the company descended into bankruptcy in late 2001.

DOJ_NMG_0023178

Enron Defense Is Set To Present 'No Crime' Tack (WSJ)

By Gary McWilliams

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

HOUSTON -- As the prosecution rested its case yesterday against former Enron Corp. top executives Kenneth Lay1 and Jeffrey Skilling2, the defense is gearing up to present its argument that essentially no crimes occurred at the onetime energy giant, which collapsed into bankruptcy in 2001.

Defense attorneys, who are scheduled to begin their case when the trial resumes on Monday, signaled before the proceedings began at the end of January that they planned to argue that Enron was a vigorous and growing company felled by outside forces.

Such an approach is unusual in the recent annals of big-time corporate-crime cases. In recent corporate scandals, such as at HealthSouth Corp. and WorldCom Inc., the former chief executives at those companies argued that they weren't aware of large frauds taking place at the company. HealthSouth's CEO Richard Scrushy was acquitted in his trial while WorldCom's Bernard Ebbers was convicted and sentenced to more than 20 years in prison.

Lawyers for Messrs. Lay and Skilling have been arguing that the only crimes at Enron were committed by a handful of subordinates who stole money from the company-unbeknownst to either of the defendants. Both men are expected to repeat this position when they take the stand in their own defense.

Yesterday, U.S. District Judge Sim Lake5 dismissed a securities fraud charge against Mr. Lay, leaving six counts of conspiracy and fraud. Judge Lake dismissed two securities fraud charges and a charge of making false statements to auditors against Mr. Skilling, leaving 28 counts of insider trading, conspiracy and fraud. The judge rejected defense motions for acquittal on all remaining counts.

Lead prosecutor Sean Berkowitz proposed dropping the four counts to speed up the case. The move is not unusual in a case this size. A securities-fraud count was dropped before deliberations began against Martha Stewart, who was ultimately convicted of obstruction of justice. Before concluding its case, prosecutors again hit at Mr. Lay's apparent contradiction in proclaiming Enron shares "an incredible bargain" while disposing of tens of millions of dollars of his Enron stock in late 2001.

In addition to their "no crime occurred" defense, the defendants will also likely argue that many of the company's most controversial activities were thoroughly vetted by attorneys and outside auditors and that they relied heavily on such expert advice. "They will have to educate the jury on just how vast their responsibilities were in the company," said Kent Schaffer, a Houston defense attorney not involved in the trial.

Meanwhile, in remarks outside the courtroom, Mr. Lay's lead defense attorney, Michael Ramsey6, yesterday blasted the prosecution for resting "with an allegation that does not exist -- insider trading." Mr. Lay's stock sales were approved and were in response to margin calls on investments, his attorneys have argued.

The first witness expected to be called by the defense is a former employee of Enron's office of the chairman and a friend of former Enron investor-relations chief Mark Koenig. During cross examination an attorney for Mr. Lay suggested that Mr. Koenig denied wrongdoing to Joannie Williamson during conversations. Mr. Koenig, who pleaded guilty to an Enron-related crime, said he hadn't made any such denial of guilt. Ms. Williamson couldn't be reached for comment.

Mr. Skilling's lead defense attorney, Daniel Petrocelli7, yesterday pleaded for help during an impromptu news conference outside the courthouse yesterday. Mr. Petrocelli blamed the government, which has suggested more indictments of Enron executives may be forthcoming, for a lack of witnesses. "People have been unwilling to risk their families and lives to take a position not in concert with the government's," he said. "It's tragic. It perverts our system of justice when witnesses with facts don't come forward." He said that Mr. Skilling will take the stand late in the week of April 10.

In testimony yesterday, Joanne Cortez, a former Enron employee who handled accounting for its executive loan program, said that she became alarmed in mid-2001 after Mr. Lay accelerated his borrowings at a time when questions were being raised about the company's prospects. After Mr. Skilling resigned in August, directors raised the maximum that Mr. Lay could borrow to $7.5 million from $4 million.

Ms. Cortez said she was concerned that "it isn't public knowledge that shares were being sold back to the company to repay his line of credit," and checked the proxy statement to see how Enron was publicly reporting the borrowings. Its 1999 proxy listed the maximum he was allowed to borrow at one time and his interest payments for loans that year, she said. The borrowings and repayments grew so frequently that she independently began tracking them, documenting some $77 million of borrowings by Mr. Lay in 2001.

Ms. Cortez said she didn't sell her own Enron stock, fearing her knowledge of Mr. Lay's unpublicized stock-swaps could expose her to some kind of legal jeopardy if she sold. "It was a clear indication something was going on," she told prosecutor John Hueston. "I was feeling not sure what he was doing so I didn't myself." She later asked her lawyer to contact the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Questioned by an attorney for Mr. Lay, Ms. Cortez said she did know Enron lawyers and accountants were aware of the loan program and stock swaps, but she said she had reservations about them nonetheless.

The trial adjourned until Monday, when the defense is to begin its case. Attorneys said they expect to call about two dozen witnesses, including Messrs. Lay and Skilling.

Act 1 Of Enron Case Wraps Up (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, March 29, 2006

And on the 32nd day, prosecutors rested.

The trial of former Enron CEOs Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling reached the midpoint Tuesday morning when the last of 22 prosecution witnesses stepped down from the stand.

Starting Monday, defense lawyers will make the case that instead of deceiving the investing public about the financial health of Enron — which the government accuses them of doing — Lay and Skilling were stand-up managers who believed in the company.

Their task got a little easier Tuesday when U.S. District Judge Sim Lake granted the government's request to drop three charges against Skilling and one against Lay. After that, Skilling now faces 28 counts of conspiracy, fraud and inside trading. Lay faces six counts of conspiracy and fraud.

In just over eight weeks of trial, consisting of 32 days in court, prosecutors put 17 former Enron employees on the stand, including eight witnesses who pleaded guilty to crimes related to their actions at Enron and agreed to cooperate with the government.

According to the government's charges, Lay and Skilling headed a conspiracy to deceive the investing public about Enron's financial condition. Most of the prosecution witnesses said they told Lay or Skilling of the company's problems, but none of them had any paperwork or memos that proved the case conclusively.

To outside observers, the government turned in a solid effort so far. “It's Act 1, but I think it's been a very successful Act 1,” says John Coffee, an expert in securities law at Columbia University. “Given what can go wrong in a trial, nothing has gone wrong so far.”

Defense lawyers will argue next week that there was no conspiracy and that Enron was a sound company that faltered in 2001 only after revelations that former CFO Andrew Fastow stole $25 million caused a crisis of confidence in the marketplace.

They will also argue that every transaction Enron entered into was approved by an army of lawyers and accountants, all of whom Fastow deceived.

“There has been a mythology that has evolved over the years about Enron and what Enron has now come to mean, and we'll do our best to crush that mythology and get the facts out,” said Dan Petrocelli, the lead attorney for Skilling, after the prosecution rested its case.

“We're looking forward to getting on the stand and getting our case out there — the positive case,” Lay told reporters outside the federal courthouse in Houston.

Former Enron employee Joanne Cortez, the government's final witness, testified that in 2001, as Enron's financial situation worsened, its board increased Lay's line of credit from $4 million to $7.5 million. Several times Lay borrowed the maximum amount and repaid it immediately with Enron stock.

“I thought it was improper,” Cortez testified.

DOJ_NMG_0023180

Enron Trial Made Simpler (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

HOUSTON, March 28 -- The prosecution wrapped up its case in the fraud trial of former Enron Corp. executives Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling on Tuesday, setting the stage for the defense to begin next week.

Over nine weeks, prosecutors called 22 witnesses, including many former Enron insiders, to paint a dire portrait of the company's financial health in the months before its collapse, contrasting the dismal view inside Enron with optimistic statements by Lay and Skilling to investors and employees at the same time.

In contrast to many other corporate fraud cases, prosecutors avoided getting bogged down in accounting detail -- the result of a major breakthrough before the trial even began.

Former Enron accounting chief Richard A. Causey had been expected to stand trial with his former bosses, who might have blamed him for misleading accounting in order to save themselves from long prison sentences.

Instead, in December, a month before the trial began, Causey pleaded guilty, raising the possibility that he might be a witness against Lay and Skilling.

Prosecutors did not call Causey to testify, despite his role as a middleman who had close contact with both Skilling and Lay. Still, the last-minute plea deal allowed prosecutors to streamline their case, scuttling scores of witnesses against Causey who would have spent weeks talking about complex accounting practices and byzantine deals. With no need to concentrate on convicting Causey alongside Lay and Skilling, prosecutors were able to keep the time spent on bookkeeping detail to a minimum.

The Justice Department's Enron Task Force called fewer than two dozen witnesses, only a few of whom delved into the murky world of accounting. Two former Arthur Andersen LLP partners on the stand last week stupefied jurors and spectators. Defense lawyers promptly turned the cross-examination into a seminar, hoping to muddy the waters and stressing that corporate finances are subject to countless estimates and assumptions -- hardly the basis for convictions that could send Lay and Skilling to prison for the rest of their lives, they argue.

Samuel W. Buell, a former Enron prosecutor who teaches law at the University of Texas, called the Causey plea a "no-brainer" in a blog entry on the Houston Chronicle Web site last week.

"To prove intent, you need to get the jury inside the head of the defendant," Buell said in telephone interview. "The head of this particular defendant is the head of an accountant. It would have been a trickier task for the government."

In focusing on alleged misstatements by Lay and Skilling, rather than on Enron's accounting, the prosecutors may be using lessons learned from other recent corporate scandals. The trials of former Tyco International Ltd. chief executive L. Dennis Kozlowski and Cendant chairman Walter A. Forbes both foundered on detail-ridden government presentations that dragged on for months. Neither jury reached a unanimous verdict, though a second, shorter trial of Kozlowski resulted in a conviction.

"It was just detail after detail, name after name," said Ken Premo, the jury foreman in the Cendant case. Premo said he voted to convict Forbes. "It seems like the Enron case is more about misrepresentation, [whether] they knew what was going on and they didn't act on that."

Nevertheless, the government has presented a case that is largely circumstantial and indirect, relying on the testimony of more than a half-dozen Enron insiders who pleaded guilty and agreed to testify in exchange for reduced prison sentences. No documents have emerged tying either Skilling or Lay to misconduct, an issue the defense emphasized repeatedly. Prosecutors are counting on the inferences jurors will draw after hearing 22 witnesses describe what they call improper practices in Enron's uppermost ranks.

In recent weeks, the trial has come to resemble more than anything else a case of dueling timelines. Prosecutors displayed colorful charts with plot points: board meetings, public statements, and stock sales made by the defendants in the months before the December 2001 bankruptcy-protection filing. The timelines are intended to advance the argument that Lay and Skilling knew about Enron's precarious health from multiple sources but painted too rosy a picture for investors.

The timelines raised frequent -- and prompt -- objections from the defense. On cross-examination, lawyers for Lay and Skilling projected their own charts on a courtroom screen, blaming Enron's collapse on a vicious brew of short sellers, skeptical reporters and doubts raised by the conduct of former chief financial officer Andrew S. Fastow. In short, the defense timelines illustrate their theory that Enron suffered from a liquidity crisis sparked by a "run on the bank."

Often, U.S. District Judge Simeon T. Lake III has told one side or the other to take down an offending chart. But the implications lingered.

On Tuesday, the judge consented to a prosecution request and dropped three criminal charges against Skilling and one against Lay. But he denied defense motions to throw out the case altogether. Instead, he declared a "spring break" and gave defense lawyers a chance to regroup before beginning their portion of the trial Monday.

Legal experts suggested that upcoming testimony by Skilling and Lay could be decisive in the case. While prosecutors need all 12 jurors to agree on at least one charge, defense lawyers need to raise doubt in the mind of only one juror to achieve a mistrial.

"Once the defendants take the stand, that changes the whole picture," said Michael J. Wynne, a former prosecutor who is now at the Houston law firm Yetter & Warden LLP. "By far the most important testimony will be the defendants'."

Meanwhile, neither defense lawyers nor prosecutors, who will put on a brief rebuttal case, have ruled out the possibility that Causey, who has been present in spirit but who has not appeared in the courtroom, will testify.

Prosecution Rests In Enron Trial (AFP-Y2)

AFP, March 29, 2006

The prosecution rested in the Enron fraud trial after two months of testimony aimed at depicting former chiefs Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling as greedy liars who deceived investors for personal gain.

US District Judge Sim Lake dismissed three of 31 charges against Skilling and one of Lay's seven charges. Prosecutors said they moved to dismiss the counts "for the purpose of economy and other reasons," a Justice Department official said.

Lake then declared a "spring break" and gave defense attorneys until Monday to prepare their rebuttal.

"There's been no case in this case," Michael Ramsey, Lay's lead lawyer, told reporters outside the courthouse.

"Everything (at Enron) was done according to the rules and that's what we're going to show."

Lay and Skilling, both of whom served as chief executives at Enron, are eager to take the stand, their lawyers said.

The defense teams plan on calling about 25 witnesses from an original list of 170 and expect testimony to last about four or five weeks.

"The government's case was long on atmosphere and short on facts and we are going to get the facts in front of the jury," said Daniel Petrocelli, Skilling's lead attorney, told reporters. "We are very hopeful and confident."

The dismissed charges include two counts of securities fraud and one count of making a false statement to auditors against Skilling and one count of securities fraud against Lay.

The judge denied defense motions to dismiss the other charges. Skilling faces 28 counts while Lay faces six in the trial.

Lay, 63, and Skilling, 52, have denied the charges, which carry long prison terms.

Enron collapsed in 2001 with estimated losses of more than 40 billion dollars.

What was then the biggest corporate collapse in history sent panic through Wall Street, and Enron's auditor, Arthur Andersen, folded after a criminal conviction, even though the verdict was overturned by the US Supreme Court.

Lay, who founded Enron and served as chairman and chief executive, faces charges of fraud and conspiracy. He also faces a separate trial on federal banking violations.

Skilling, a company veteran who served as chief executive for several months in 2001, faces allegations of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and lying to auditors about Enron's financial position.

Several Enron executives have already pleaded guilty and have been sentenced to prison, and some are helping prosecutors in their cases against Lay and Skilling.

Former Enron chief financial officer Andrew Fastow, seen as the architect of the secret partnerships that hid Enron's massive debts and who testified under a plea agreement, ended up as an effective witness, according to Jacob Frenkel, a former US prosecutor who has worked with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

DOJ_NMG_0023182

Although the defense wanted to make Fastow the scapegoat, the lawyers may have erred by being too tough on the former executive, said Frenkel.

"At the end of the day ... you have a jury of 12 human beings watching another human being being pummeled by a trained gladiator, the lawyer," said Frenkel.

"If the jury develops sympathy for that witness, then the cross-examination has failed."

John Coffee, a Columbia University law professor specializing in white-collar crime, said prosecutors have created a formidable task for the defense.

"I think the government should be fundamentally quite happy," said Coffee.

"They have put on a variety of witnesses that have communicated the same story ... each of those people have been cross-examined and have had to retreat a bit, but each one adds up, and it is cumulative."

Coffee said the prosecution avoided any major surprises or mistakes, and did not allow the case to get bogged down in financial minutiae.

"The worst thing that can happen (for the prosecution) is that the jury can become confused and bored," Coffee said. "A confused jury is less likely to convict."

Judge Dismisses Several Charges Against Lay, Skilling (LAW)

By Brenda Sapino Jeffreys, Texas Lawyer

Texas Lawyer, March 29, 2006

Kenneth Lay, former Enron Corp. chairman, and Jeffrey Skilling, the company's former chief executive officer, got a break Tuesday in their criminal trial when U.S. District Judge Sim Lake of Houston agreed to dismiss a few of the charges against them.

After the prosecution rested its case Tuesday morning, Lake granted a motion filed by the Enron Task Force to dismiss three of the 31 charges pending against Skilling and one of the seven charges Lay faces in the trial that started in late January.

According to a spokeswoman for the prosecution team, the government asked Lake to dismiss the charges for the purpose of economy and other reasons.

Lake agreed to dismiss Count 15 against Skilling, a securities fraud charge stemming from a 10Q filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission in May 2000; Count 21, a securities fraud charge related to an analyst conference call in April 2000; and count 33, a false-statements-to-auditors charge related to the May 2000 10Q.

Lake also dismissed Count 30 against Lay, which is a securities fraud charge related to an analyst conference call in November 2001.

Lawyers for Lay and Skilling also asked Lake to dismiss other charges, but he denied their requests.

Testimony in the trial, which began Feb. 1, is scheduled to resume April 3 with defense witnesses.

In United States v. Jeffrey K. Skilling, et al., prosecutors allege the former Enron executives participated in a conspiracy to misrepresent the true financial condition of the former high-flying energy company. The defendants have pleaded not guilty.

U.S. Grand Jury Subpoenas GM Over Handling Of Supplier Credits (WSJ)

By Lee Hawkins Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

General Motors Corp. said it received a subpoena from a federal grand jury investigating its handling of payments or "credits" from suppliers, and said it had found "material weaknesses" or "significant deficiencies" in certain areas of its accounting controls.

The world's largest auto maker by production also said it received a subpoena from the Securities and Exchange Commission in connection with a previously disclosed investigation of GM's transactions in precious-metal raw materials.

The disclosures, made yesterday in delayed annual filings with the SEC, are a setback for GM as it seeks to turn around its loss-plagued North American operations and hammer out agreements to reduce costs and quell labor strife at its No. 1 parts supplier Delphi Corp. (See related article.1) The disclosures also come as Chairman and Chief Executive Rick Wagoner faces growing pressure to restore investor confidence. (See filing.2)

The filings were made after the close of New York Stock Exchange composite trading, in which GM shares fell 18 cents to $22.75. In after-hours trading, GM was down 39 cents to $22.36.

Over the last six moths, GM has disclosed the receipt of six subpoenas from the SEC and two subpoenas from federal grand juries. Two of the SEC inquiries are related to GM's business dealings with Delphi, its former subsidiary. One federal grand jury matter is part of a broader investigation of the reinsurance business, including GM's General Motors Acceptance Corp. finance arm and many of its competitors. The supplier credits being investigated by the federal grand jury comprise a form of rebates.

Neither GM nor any GM executive has been accused of wrongdoing in connection with the SEC and grand jury probes. GM declined to disclose whether any individuals have been named in the federal subpoenas.

"Few large companies will escape SEC scrutiny at one time or another, but a federal grand jury is really perceived as several notches up from that. That really begins to erode investor's confidence in management," said Dan Genter, chief investment officer of RNC Genter, a Los Angeles investment-management firm, and a GM bondholder.

In another development, GM said the audit committee of its board of directors concluded on Monday that the company's financial statements for the years 2002-2004 and statements for the first three quarters of 2005 "should no longer be relied upon" because of accounting errors. The company filed corrected statements for those years with the SEC yesterday.

In yesterday's filings, GM said it has completed its internal investigation of accounting practices relating to the supplier credits. The company also looked at other matters, including how one of its subsidiaries classified cash flows relating to mortgage-loan sales and how it accounted for the value of cars GM leased to rental companies. GM said it found that the financial controls it uses to detect errors and possible fraud have been vulnerable to "material weaknesses" in the past.

GM said it will prevent such problems in the future using "enhanced" controls to aid in the correct "preparation, review, presentation and disclosures of our consolidated statement of cash flows." GM disclosed earlier this month that it would restate financial results going back to 2001 because of various accounting errors. GM also delayed filing its 2005 10(k) annual report until yesterday.

Some investors have said their confidence in GM's financial reporting is fading -- a reality that GM tried to counter in Tuesday's disclosure. "It's a high priority to win back investor confidence in GM," said GM spokeswoman Toni Simonetti.

While it is unclear what effect the rash of accounting problems will have on GM's day-to-day business, the company did caution that the problems with its financial statements could interfere with its ability to borrow money under a $5.6 billion unsecured credit facility. However, GM said it has "no current need or intention to draw" on the facility. It also said it is considering the possibility of amending or replacing the facility with new terms that would resolve any uncertainty regarding its ability to tap the line of credit.

Mr. Wagoner and his team have stepped up efforts to show progress toward a turnaround. GM disclosed in its filings yesterday that it expects to increase capital spending in 2006 to $8.7 billion, from about $8.4 billion in 2005. The added spending could speed new models to market as part of an effort to shore up market share.

The company said it expects to reduce its structural costs by $7 billion, on a running-rate basis, by the end of the year. That's up from $6 billion last year. "That's an indication of progress being made in North America, particularly on the structural cost side, even better than expected," Ms. Simonetti said.

GM also said its U.S. hourly and salaried pension plan is overfunded by about $7.5 billion as of the end of 2005. When including GM's executive plan, the plan is overfunded by $6.1 billion.

Yesterday, GM began laying off about 1% of its U.S. salaried work force of 36,000 as part of an overall plan to reduce the North American salaried work force by about 7% this year.

GM is continuing talks to sell a controlling interest in its auto financing subsidiary, General Motors Acceptance Corp., a deal that is being watched closely by Wall Street and credit-rating agencies.

GM Reveals More SEC Investigations (USAT)

By Sharon Silke Carty

USA Today, March 29, 2006

DETROIT — Adding to an already long list of problems, struggling automaker General Motors disclosed Tuesday that it now is the subject of seven investigations by the Securities and Exchange Commission rather than the five it previously said.

In a filing with the SEC, GM also warned that it might not be able to sell controlling interest in its GMAC finance arm to raise emergency cash and to restore the lender's credit rating. The money-losing automaker portrayed the disclosures as routine parts of its annual filing with the SEC. But that filing itself was delayed more than a week after GM at the last minute discovered financial irregularities at a unit called ResCap, which is part of GMAC.

At about the same time, the automaker said it would have to spend more than planned on its own restructuring and on lingering obligations to parts supplier Delphi, now under Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection. As a result, it added $2 billion to its losses last year, putting it $10.6 billion in the red for 2005.

Kevin Tynan, an analyst with Argus Research, said the issues trouble investors because GM's CEO, Rick Wagoner, has a background in accounting and finance. "You're talking about a guy who came from the finance side, and if the company has anything but squeaky clean finances, that's going to raise some eyebrows," Tynan says.

In the Tuesday disclosures, GM said the SEC has issued a subpoena seeking information about precious metal transactions. Additionally, GM said, the SEC and a federal grand jury have issued subpoenas to GMAC as part of industrywide investigations into insurance industry practices.

"A negative outcome of one or more of these investigations could require us to restate prior financial results (in addition to our recent restatements) and could result in fines, penalties, or other remedies being imposed on GM," the company said in its filing.

GM has been seeking a buyer for controlling interest in GMAC. GMAC has been a cash cow for GM, but the lending unit has been hurt by its ties to the money-losing car company, making it more expensive for GMAC to raise money.

Selling off most of it would raise cash for GM and could allow GMAC to improve its creditworthiness while it continues providing loan money for purchases of GM vehicles.

Tuesday, GM warned that it might not find a buyer, and even if it does, that "may not delink GMAC's credit rating from GM's credit rating."

GM spokesman Jerry Dubrowski said, "I don't think you should read too much into that, beyond the obvious, that there's always a risk factor."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Judge In Illinois Graft Case Denies Request For Mistrial (NYT)

By Gretchen Ruethling

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

CHICAGO, March 28 — A federal judge replaced two dismissed jurors on Tuesday in the criminal trial of former Gov. George Ryan and instructed the jury to begin deliberations anew, denying a request by the defense for a mistrial.

"To go forward right now, as difficult as it is, is not irrevocable," said the judge, Rebecca R. Pallmeyer of Federal District Court, in front of a packed courtroom. "That's one of the reasons it seemed appropriate to me."

Judge Pallmeyer had been investigating and interviewing jurors individually and having closed-door hearings with lawyers since last week, when The Chicago Tribune discovered that two jurors had lied on questionnaires about whether they had criminal records. Those jurors were dismissed Monday.

The judge called her decision to proceed "tentative" and said she had not "shut the door" on the possibility of a mistrial. She said the jurors had been diligent, had taken careful notes, had had perfect attendance over the past six months and had abided by her instructions.

"They have made extraordinary efforts to stay with us," she said before she began re-reading 148 pages of jury instructions on Tuesday afternoon. "At least for now, at least for this moment, we can proceed with these jurors."

It is going to be difficult for jurors to put eight days of deliberations completely out of their minds as the judge has ordered, experts say.

DOJ_NMG_0023185

"I think it makes a lot of sense from a legal theoretical point of view, and it makes very little sense from a human psychological point of view," said Patrick J. Cotter, a defense lawyer here and a former federal prosecutor in Brooklyn. "They spent eight very difficult days, and now somebody comes to them and says, Just push a button and erase all that."

Jean Rosenbluth, a law professor at the University of Southern California and a former federal prosecutor in Los Angeles, said defense lawyers in similar situations had argued that such dismissals were subterfuges involving jurors who were holding out for acquittal.

"You do have a danger when the jurors who are removed are sort of a lone voice for acquittal," Ms. Rosenbluth said. "Any good defense lawyer is going to try to make hay of this."

Difficulties in deliberations, which began two weeks ago, became apparent through an exchange of notes between jurors and Judge Pallmeyer indicating confusion about instructions and personal conflicts among jurors.

Mr. Ryan, 72, and Lawrence K. Warner, 67, are charged with 22 counts of racketeering, conspiracy, mail fraud and other charges. Mr. Ryan, a Republican, is accused of swapping state business for gifts, vacations and money. Both men have denied wrongdoing.

Judge Weighs Jury Alternates In Ryan Trial (FINDLAW/AP)

By Mike Robinson, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 29, 2006

(AP) - CHICAGO-A federal judge met behind closed doors with defense attorneys in former Gov. George Ryan's racketeering trial Tuesday, a day after she dismissed two of the jurors for allegedly lying on a court questionnaire.

After announcing the dismissals, U.S. District Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer said she wanted to talk with the remaining jurors before deciding whether to call in alternates. The jury has already struggled through two weeks of deliberations, and bringing in alternates would require them to start over.

Defense attorneys have argued in court papers that replacing the two jurors now would violate Ryan's rights.

"I haven't made any final decisions on whether or not we are going to be able to proceed, but I will tell you that we have excused two of the jurors," U.S. District Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer said before leaving court Monday.

Pallmeyer dismissed the jurors after the Chicago Tribune reported that they apparently had lied in saying on a questionnaire last September that they had never been charged with a crime.

Starting deliberations from scratch could add weeks to a trial that began last September. Pallmeyer met for hours with the attorneys Tuesday in an effort to resolve the crisis and avoid a mistrial.

She said pointedly that there had been "a very significant investment both public and private" in the trial that by any yardstick has cost millions of dollars.

"If we can proceed with this case fairly, if we can continue and continue with the jury and for them to deliberate fairly, that's what my goal would be," she said. "If I can proceed in a process that makes me comfortable, then that's what I intend to do."

Ryan, 72, and co-defendant Larry Warner, 67, are charged in a 22-count federal indictment with racketeering, mail fraud and other offenses. Prosecutors say that as secretary of state in the 1990s and later governor, Ryan steered leases and contracts to Warner and other friends.

Ryan and Warner deny anything they did was illegal.

Ryan Trial Deliberations To Resume (CHIT)

By Matt O'connor, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, March 29, 2006

A federal judge on Tuesday added two alternates to the jury deciding former Gov. George Ryan's fate and ordered deliberations to begin anew in the historic trial.

U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer made it clear her decision to reject a defense request for a mistrial was tentative and would depend on her continuing satisfaction that the process is fair to Ryan and lobbyist Lawrence Warner.

The judge's decision came a day after she excused two jurors following Tribune reports last week that uncovered both had apparently concealed their arrest records during jury selection in September.

The original jury had deliberated eight days amid signs of personal rancor before the judge suspended deliberations.

Deliberations in the six-month trial are set to begin again on Wednesday morning with the two new jurors, a divorced retail grocery manager and a mother who works part-time.

"The fact that there have been circumstances that led to the excusal of two jurors should not in any way enter into your deliberations," Pallmeyer told the new jury on Tuesday.

The dismissal of the two jurors and their replacement by two alternates didn't change the gender makeup of the six-man, six-woman jury but reduced its minority makeup to four members from five.

Returning to the courtroom for the first time since March 10, a grim-faced Ryan, with his wife, Lura Lynn, and son, George Jr., at his side, didn't appear pleased at the turn of events. But a gag order imposed by Pallmeyer in the trial's final days prevented him, Warner or lawyers in the case from commenting publicly.

On Monday, Ryan's lawyers publicly filed an objection to substituting alternate jurors, arguing it would be impossible for original jurors to start deliberations anew after two weeks of deliberations.

In that filing, Ryan's lawyers said notes signed last week by the jurors who ultimately were excused "indicated disagreement," suggesting that one or both had been holdouts for Ryan in the original deliberations.

Since the Tribune's revelations about the two jurors, Pallmeyer held hours of discussions behind closed doors, interviewing jurors individually and hearing legal arguments on pushing ahead with two alternates or declaring a mistrial.

In comments outside the new jury's presence, the judge defended her actions by saying she interviewed each juror behind closed doors to try to ensure that her questions were answered with candor.

She said she intends to release transcripts of the discussions as soon as possible, perhaps before the new jury reaches a verdict.

Acknowledging her decision was "relatively extraordinary," Pallmeyer disclosed that the defense had asked her to halt the proceedings and declare a mistrial. But she said she denied the request "without prejudice," meaning it could be reconsidered.

"I have not shut the door on this possibility," she told reporters and other spectators gathered in her courtroom. "I mean that with complete candor."

Jury room is 'cleansed'

To try to assist the new jury in starting deliberations anew, Pallmeyer said she ordered the jury room "cleansed" through the removal of any notes made during the earlier deliberations, any charts they may have created, and even a list of witnesses the original jury requested.

"To the extent that it's possible, I have directed that they resume their deliberations from moment one, and that means removing from the jury room any indications or reflections of the activity that's gone on up until then," she said.

Pallmeyer also issued a new instruction that jurors "must treat this case as if the prior deliberations did not occur."

"You also should not discuss or mention statements made during the prior deliberations during these news deliberations," she said.

Even though 10 of the jurors had heard them before, the jury listened intently as Pallmeyer took more than 1½ hours to read the same legal instructions she gave to the original jury more than two weeks ago.

Moments before she sent the jury from the courtroom, Pallmeyer directed jurors in "the sternest terms" to stay away from news media accounts, going so far as to instruct them "not even [to] pick up a newspaper." She said she would provide crossword puzzles to jurors herself if necessary.

Pallmeyer also mistakenly instructed jurors not to watch TV at all. When a lawyer pointed out she meant to restrict their viewing of TV news only, she hurried to the back to tell jurors before they departed. "They said they knew that," the judge said on her return to the bench.

One reason Pallmeyer said she decided against declaring a mistrial was that it would be an irrevocable move, while she could still change her mind about proceeding with the trial.

"If at any point I conclude that this procedure is not fair, I do intend to declare a mistrial if that's appropriate," the judge said. "I don't believe that step is appropriate right now."

Pallmeyer said no one was to blame for not catching the two jurors' apparent misrepresentations until deliberations had begun.

"We can all second-guess what might have been or could have been in terms of an investigation, but the fact is ... a criminal background investigation is not standard practice" in federal court in Chicago, she said.

A day after referring to the enormous public and private resources that have been devoted to the case, Pallmeyer said she wanted to make clear that wasn't the only reason she decided to proceed with the trial.

Goal is fairness, judge says

"The reason for that is that the No. 1 goal here is not that we not waste resources or that we obtain an expedient result," she said. "The No. 1 goal here is fairness."

Pallmeyer also defended the jurors' performance, noting their diligence and attention over the marathon trial.

"The reason you've got alternates is in case something like this happens," said Thomas Sullivan, a former U.S. attorney.

Mark Rotert, a criminal-defense lawyer and former federal prosecutor, said what happens next could be critical in any appeal if either Ryan or Warner is convicted.

If the new jury deliberates for a week or more and comes back with a mixed verdict, that might suggest that all 12 jurors were involved in a meaningful way, he said. But if they return in only a day or so with a verdict of guilty on all counts, Rotert said, "that gives real substance to the concerns" by Ryan's lawyers that the jury can't be expected to deliberate all over again.

Tribune staff reporter Michael Higgins contributed to this report

mo'connor@tribune.com

2 Jurors Replaced With Alternates (CHIST)

By NATASHA KORECKI, JANET RAUSA FULLER AND STEVE PATTERSON, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, March 29, 2006

The chance of a mistrial still looms, but former Gov. George Ryan's public corruption trial will go on after a federal judge on Tuesday -- admitting it was a rare move -- swapped two dismissed jurors with alternates.

U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer averted a mistrial for now but left wide open the possibility she still could grant one after tossing two jurors who didn't disclose their criminal backgrounds.

"If at any point I conclude that this procedure is not fair, I do intend to declare a mistrial," she told a packed courtroom without the jury present. But, she explained: "To go forward right now, as difficult as it is, is not irrevocable."

A mistrial is irreversible, she said. "At least for now, I'd like to see the process proceed."

THE JUDGE SPEAKS

Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer addressed her decision to replace two jurors with alternates.

"The No. 1 goal here is fairness. If at any point I conclude that this procedure is not fair, I do intend to declare a mistrial if that's appropriate."

"I think at least somebody in one of the media outlets that I happened to see referred to this situation as 'the judge's nightmare' or 'the judge's worst nightmare.' I don't know if that's an exaggeration, but I can certainly tell you this has been an enormous challenge for me."

"We can all second-guess what might have been or could have been in terms of an investigation, but the fact is ... a criminal background investigation is not standard practice, and it was not requested."

The two jurors were cut after the panel deliberated for eight days in what apparently became fractious talks, culminating with Pallmeyer telling them to treat each other with "dignity and respect."

The new panel will restart deliberations today. Pallmeyer said a fair trial is paramount -- no matter what Ryan's historic, nearly six-month trial has cost.

Her decision comes as the defense asked to "cease proceedings right now," she said.

She called in the new jury and told it to start from scratch. She said the jury room would be cleansed and jurors had to completely start over.

A black female and white male were replaced with a white male and white female.

Ousted juror 'wanted to stay on'

The consternation came after the Tribune reported last week that two jurors didn't disclose criminal backgrounds after the panel already deliberated for eight days. Pallmeyer tossed the two jurors Monday -- including one who "feels sorry for George Ryan because no one is on his side now," according to the juror's son.

In an interview with the Sun-Times Tuesday, the son said he was speaking for himself, not his mom. He said his mom has been stressed out because of "a lot of name-calling throughout the whole jury," and she's disappointed she was kicked off. "I think she wanted to stay on. That's what I believe," he said.

The woman was dismissed after public records revealed she didn't disclose on a sworn juror questionnaire a history of arrests and criminal charges. She was never convicted, but the juror marked a box that said she never had been charged with a crime. Her son explained why she did that: "I think she was confused. And she didn't think she was gonna get picked."

Public records show the juror was charged in a 1994 incident where she was among those "sitting at a kitchen table dividing a white rock like substance," according to a police report. She wasn't convicted. Court records also show arrests for disorderly conduct, assault and child neglect, among other charges. Her son didn't deny his mom has a rap sheet.

"The charges, they stand as what they are. If they weren't true, she wouldn't be off [the jury], right?"

But he said any child neglect charges were bogus.

The male juror who was dismissed had a history of DUI convictions, a revoked license and a weapons charge that he didn't disclose on the questionnaire. Disclosing DUI convictions is especially pertinent because Ryan served as secretary of state. The man, who said he couldn't talk because of a gag order, in recent years has had a clean record and also is instrumental in community fund-raisers.

Revamped jury told: 'Begin fresh'

Following revelations of the jurors' backgrounds, Pallmeyer ordered a criminal check on all jurors, she said. She also privately interviewed some jurors who had "blemishes" on their records to be sure they could proceed fairly.

There were four alternates to pick from -- but two had potential problems. One of the two alternates not selected also had a run-in with the law: a March 2004 drunken driving arrest in Wilmette, records show.

Unlike the ousted jurors, however, the alternate juror disclosed the DUI on his jury questionnaire.

The alternate juror, a North Shore man, was convicted in June 2004. His driver's license was revoked, according to the secretary of state's office. The man was eligible to have his license reinstated in April 2005, but there is no record he did so, secretary of state's office spokesman David Druker said. Court records indicate the DUI arrest was not his first offense.

Ryan left the courthouse Tuesday with his son and wife -- and a mob of media in tow -- before ducking into the Union League Club.

"You are to begin at the beginning," Pallmeyer told the new jury on its way out. "Begin fresh."

Contributing: Mark Konkol, Annie Sweeney

Prosecutors: Wiretap Evidence Points To Kincaid-Chauncey (KLAS-TV)

KLAS-TV, March 29, 2006

A new turn for the G-Sting political corruption trial -- Tuesday, prosecutors looked to strengthen their case against former Clark County Commissioners Dario Herrera and Mary Kincaid-Chauncey by playing wiretaps of someone else.

The big story was eye-opening wiretaps of Erin Kenny and a new attack on Lance Malone's credibility. Kenny, a former county commissioner, admits taking bribes from Mike Galardi in exchange for clearing licensing hurdles for Galardi's Jaguars strip club.

In an Oct. 2002 FBI wiretap, Kenny asks for money to finance her race for Lieutenant Governor. She tells Galardi lobbyist Lance Malone, quote, "I need money to finish this race off. I'm begging now, I'm on my knees. I've done for more Jaguars every day screaming at people than anyone else has."

Jerry Bernstein, Dario Herrera's attorney, said, "We listened to the tape. I think it speaks for itself and we heard the agents testimony."

Jerry Bernstein tells Eyewitness News the prosecution is focusing on Kenny because they can't pin much on his client. Bernstein questioned FBI Agent Christopher Byers who admitted no wiretaps exist of Herrera being offered specific dollar amounts in exchange for county commission votes. Byers also admitted the G-Sting investigation shows Galardi's lobbyist, Lance Malone, divorced his wife Rosemary but put all of his assets in her name, and still lives with her in the northwest valley.

The FBI believes Malone may be trying to protect his assets from any future court decisions in this case. The defense says it shows Malone is sneaky and can't be trusted -- a strike at the prosecutions case, which heavily depends on what Malone says on FBI wiretaps.

When court resumes Wednesday, the defense will take another crack at the prosecutions case. Defense attorneys tell Eyewitness News they believe there are weaknesses in the case.

Defense attorneys also played a wiretap of Lance Malone's father trying to convince him not to steal money from Galardi. Other wiretaps Tuesday reveal Dario Herrera also asked Mike Galardi to make contributions to his congressional campaign in 2002.

KLASTV.com will have periodic news flashes to keep you up to date with the G-Sting trial as is develops throughout the day.

George Federal Courthouse -- March 28 -- 1:00 p.m.

In an Aug. 2002 FBI wiretap, Mike Galardi is heard enticing former Clark County Commissioner Erin Kenny to help him on a licensing issue for Jaguars by telling her he has registered 300 strippers to vote. Galardi also promised another 10,000 strippers to register before the November election. At the time, Kenny was running for lt. governor.

Kenny told Galardi "I'm saying man that could swing an election." Prosecutors are spending much of this day focusing on Erin Kenny to solidify that a conspiracy did exist.

Prosecutors are also establishing a pattern that when issues important to Galardi appeared before the Clark County Commission, Galardi's lobbyist, Lance Malone would time and again make repeated calls to Erin Kenny, Dario Herrera and Mary Kincaid-Chauncey.

In an Aug. 2002 wiretap, Dario Herrera says to Lance Malone " I need you to hit up Mike for that commitment for me." Herrera was soliciting campaign contributions for his congressional run. Prosecutors imply Herrera used that race partially as a cover to accept bribes from Galardi.

Also in Aug. of 2002, Mary Kincaid-Chauncey discussed the reconsideration of an adult use ordinance. Mike didn't like this ordinance and feared it would hurt his business. Kincaid-Chauncey told Lance Malone "I think I got everything covered on it."

George Federal Courthouse -- March 28th -- 10 a.m.

Federal prosecutors continue presenting FBI wiretap evidence in the G-Sting political corruption trial of Dario Herrera and Mary Kincaid-Chauncey.

In a Sept. 2001 wiretap, strip club owner Mike Galardi tells his lobbyist Lance Malone that an upcoming liquor license extension for Jaguars should be a slam dunk because "we know we got Dario, Erin and Mary."

Prosecutors also worked to further prove a connection between Herrera and Galardi. In an Aug. 2002 wiretap, Herrera says to Lance Malone, "I need you to hit up Mike for that commitment for me." Herrera was referencing a contribution to his congressional campaign.

Malone tells Herrera, "I'll just get the money to you or someone else." Wiretaps also revealed today that Galardi frequently consulted on Jaguars licensing issues with former Las Vegas city Councilmen Michael Mack and Michael McDonald.

Email reporter Brian Allen at ballen@klastv.com

Evacuee Who Returned To New Orleans Arrested In Houston Killing (AP)

AP, March 29, 2006

NEW ORLEANS - A New Orleans evacuee has been arrested in connection with the murder of a Houston man in February, according to federal authorities.

Timothy D. Strong, 21, was arrested in New Orleans on Monday. An arrest warrant from Harris County accused him of murdering Daryl Cirk on Feb. 2 in Houston, the U.S. Marshals' office said.

Strong evacuated to Houston after Hurricane Katrina, and Cirk was a Houston-area native, Deputy U.S. Marshal Brian Fair said. Strong was arrested after Houston police and marshals in the southern district of Texas obtained information that he had returned to New Orleans.

Child-porn Charge Brings Guilty Plea (ORS)

The Orlando Sentinel, March 29, 2006

ORLANDO -- An east Orange County man accused of running a child-pornography Web site and charging monthly subscriptions pleaded guilty Monday in Orlando's federal court to one count of possessing the illicit material.

Earl A. Beach, 65, was indicted and arrested last month on charges of distributing and possessing child pornography. He signed a plea agreement March 18 with the U.S. Attorney's Office that will spare both sides of a trial.

Shackled at the waist and handcuffed while wearing a red jail jumpsuit, Beach told U.S. Magistrate Karla Spaulding he is guilty "because I committed the crime."

Beach faces up to 10 years in prison for the single count he pleaded to but could face an increase in his sentence because of convictions for similar crimes in Indiana in 1979 and in Orange County in 1986.

A tip from the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children in October about a Web site spurred an investigation by the U.S. Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement in Orlando. Beach was arrested after a search of his home found more than 400 images depicting children in sex acts.

"The Web site itself said it was illegal and contained images of rape and incest," Assistant U.S. Attorney Cynthia Hawkins said in court Monday.

Beach's case prompted the U.S. Attorney's Office to seek a search warrant under the USA Patriot Act for electronic records at Yahoo Inc. in the hope that it would uncover others using Beach's Web site. One federal judge twice denied such requests, but he was overruled by district judges both times.

Pedro Ruz Gutierrez, Tanya Pérez-Brennan and Sarah Lundy of the Sentinel staff contributed to this report.

Case Against Lawmaker Is Upheld (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 28 (AP) — A federal appeals court ruled Tuesday that Representative Jim McDermott violated federal law by giving reporters an illegally taped telephone call nearly a decade ago.

In a 2-to-1 opinion, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit upheld a lower court ruling that Mr. McDermott, Democrat of Washington, had violated the rights of Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio in a case involving a 1996 phone conversation with Representative Newt Gingrich of Georgia, when Mr. Gingrich was speaker of the House.

The court ordered Mr. McDermott to pay Mr. Boehner more than $700,000, which included $60,000 in damages.

The case stems from a tape that a Florida couple made in December 1996 and gave to Mr. McDermott the following month.

The tape included discussion by Mr. Gingrich about a House ethics committee investigation of him. Mr. McDermott was then the ranking Democrat on the ethics panel.

Mr. Gingrich is no longer in office, and Mr. Boehner is now the House majority leader. Both are Republicans.

A lawyer for Mr. McDermott had argued that Mr. McDermott's actions were allowed under the First Amendment and said a ruling against him would have "a huge chilling effect" on reporters and newsmakers.

Lawyers for 18 news organizations, including ABC, NBC, CBS, CNN, The Associated Press, The New York Times and The Washington Post, filed a brief in support of Mr. McDermott.

But Michael Calvin, a lawyer for Mr. Boehner, said that by leaking the tape Mr. McDermott had "chilled the free speech of others," namely Mr. Boehner and Mr. Gingrich.

In a statement, Mr. McDermott said he disagreed with the ruling. "The American people have a right to know when their government's leaders are plotting to deceive them, and that is exactly what was happening during a telephone call in 1996 involving Republican House leaders," he said.

Mr. Boehner hailed the ruling but said he said he expected the case to go to the Supreme Court.

Boehner Sees End Of Legal Battle (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, March 29, 2006

House Majority Leader John Boehner's (R-Ohio) legal victory Tuesday in his historic court fight with Rep. Jim McDermott (D-Wash.) means there finally may be a light at the end of the tunnel in the eight-year struggle between the two lawmakers.

A divided three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia ruled Tuesday that McDermott had "unlawfully" obtained a copy of an illegally intercepted phone conversation between Boehner and other House GOP leaders in December 1996.

A lower court has already ruled in Boehner's favor, ordering McDermott to pay him $60,000 in damages and also pick up the tab for "reasonable" attorneys' fees incurred by Boehner during the long-running case, which began in 1998. Boehner's legal fees exceed $500,000, while McDermott has set up a legal defense fund to help cover his lawyers' bills.

McDermott now has 14 days to ask for the full appeals court to take up the case. If that request is denied, the Washington Democrat would have 90 days to appeal for a hearing before the Supreme Court.

Michael Carvin, Boehner's lawyer, predicted that McDermott will be unsuccessful on either front. Carvin pointed out that the full appeals court has already twice denied McDermott's application for a hearing, and added that he does not see any issues at stake in the case that would merit intervention by the Supreme Court.

"We're obviously gratified by the victory," Carvin said. "This decision confirms that Congressman McDermott unlawfully obtained the tape and violated the law."

Boehner had not seen the court's decision when he spoke to reporters on Tuesday, but the Ohio Republican said he had made a number of attempts to settle the case with McDermott, most recently last summer, without success.

During those conversations, Boehner said he insisted on "three conditions that I outlined: one, that [McDermott] had to admit that he was wrong; two, that he needed to apologize to the House; and three, that he should make a $10,000 donation to a charity [and] that we would agree on [trying] to bring this to a close." Boehner added McDermott "could never come close" to signing onto such a deal and the legal fight continued. Boehner himself believes it may end up before the Supreme Court.

In a statement released by his office Tuesday evening, the Washington Democrat said he had made no decision at this point on whether to appeal the latest ruling, although he showed strong displeasure with the findings.

"Our legal counsel is studying the decision, and we will decide on a course of action in the days ahead," McDermott said.

The dispute revolves around McDermott's role in circulating an illegally taped phone call between House GOP leaders regarding an ethics charge against then-Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.). At that time, Boehner was chairman of the House Republican Conference.

As part of his agreement with the House Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, Gingrich pledged to abide by the panel's ruling. Boehner was in Florida on Dec. 21, 1996, taking part via mobile phone in a GOP leadership strategy session on how to spin the ethics committee's decision and its impact on Gingrich's hold on the Speaker's gavel, when a Florida couple, John and Alice Martin, illegally taped the call on their police scanner.

McDermott eventually received a copy of the tape and, as he has publicly acknowledged, leaked it to The New York Times, Atlanta Journal-Constitution and Roll Call. McDermott believed that the conversation proved Gingrich violated his agreement with the ethics committee. Boehner, with support from then-President Bill Clinton's Justice Department, sued McDermott for invasion of privacy in 1998, and the case has been bouncing back and forth between federal courts, including the Supreme Court, since then.

In his statement, McDermott continued to portray the issue as a First Amendment argument, and defended the right of a public official to reveal alleged wrongdoing within the government.

"The American people have a right to know when their government's leaders are plotting to deceive them, and that is exactly what was happening during a telephone call in 1996 involving Republican House leaders, including then Speaker of the House Newt Gingrich and Rep. John Boehner," McDermott said.

DOJ_NMG_0023192

The Washington Democrat noted that 18 media organizations, including ABC, NBC, CBS, CNN, The Associated Press, The New York Times and The Washington Post, filed a brief in support of his position prior to the latest appeals court ruling. McDermott has suggested that if the full appeals court and Supreme Court let Tuesday's ruling stand, the ability of reporters to ferret out information regarding potentially improper activities by government officials, even if the information comes from questionable sources, will be hindered.

But the appeals court disagreed with McDermott's arguments. In a 2-1 opinion, the court rejected McDermott's reliance on a 2001 decision by the Supreme Court, which held that the First Amendment protects the disclosure of illegally intercepted communications by parties who did not participate in the illegal interception.

Circuit Judge A. Raymond Randolph wrote that McDermott's use of the 2001 ruling as part of his defense is "quite implausible" and not germane to the case since he knew how the telephone call had been intercepted.

"It is the difference between someone who discovers a bag containing a diamond ring on the sidewalk and some who accepts the same bag from a thief, knowing the ring inside to have been stolen," Randolph added. "The former has committed no offense; the latter is receiving stolen property, even if the ring was intended only as a gift."

Circuit Judge David Sentelle strongly dissented with the majority's decision, arguing that to follow the logic used by Randolph and Chief Judge Douglas Ginsburg could lead to the censoring of news stories over fears about how sources obtained information.

"I see no distinction, nor has Representative Boehner suggested one, between the constitutionality of regulating communication of the contents of the tape by McDermott or by The Washington Post or The New York Times or any other media resource," Sentelle wrote in his dissent. "For that matter, every reader of the information in the newspapers also learned that it had been obtained by unlawful intercept."

Sentelle added: "Under the rule proposed by Representative Boehner, no one in the United States could communicate on this topic of public interest because of the defect in the chain of title. I do not believe the First Amendment permits this interdiction of public information either at the stage of the newspaper-reading public, of the newspaper-publishing communicators, or at the stage of Representative McDermott's disclosure to the news media."

Lawmaker Loses Phone Tape Appeal (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

The Washington Times, March 29, 2006

A federal appeals court yesterday upheld a lower court ruling that found Rep. Jim McDermott, Washington Democrat, violated federal law when he turned over an illegally taped phone conversation of House Republican leaders to reporters nearly a decade ago.

In its 2-1 opinion, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia backed the lawsuit against Mr. McDermott by Rep. John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican and now House majority leader, who was among those heard on the call.

Yesterday's ruling by Judge A. Raymond Randolph, who was appointed by the first President Bush, was supported by Chief Judge Douglas H. Ginsburg, who was tapped for the appellate bench in 1986 by President Reagan. The dissenting opinion was written by Judge David B. Sentelle, a 1987 Reagan appointee.

"I do not believe the First Amendment allows this interdiction of public information, either at the stage of the newspaper-reading public, of the newspaper-publishing communicators, or at the stage of Rep. McDermott's disclosure to the news media," Judge Sentelle wrote.

But the other two judges agreed with the August 2004 decision that Mr. McDermott "participated in an illegal transaction when he accepted the tape" from a Florida couple, knowing that the conversation on it had been unlawfully intercepted.

"It is the difference between someone who discovers a bag containing a diamond ring on the sidewalk, and someone who accepts the same bag from a thief, knowing the ring inside has been stolen. The former has committed no offense; the latter is guilty of receiving stolen property," Judge Randolph wrote.

The panel upheld the trial court's order that Mr. McDermott pay Mr. Boehner $60,000 in damages and at least $600,000 in legal fees in the lengthy legal battle.

DOJ_NMG_0023193

In a statement yesterday, Mr. McDermott said no legal strategy had been decided, but he praised "Judge Sentelle's strong opinion in support of the First Amendment."

"The American people have the right to know when their government's leaders are plotting to deceive them, and that is exactly what was happening," he said of the Dec. 21, 1996, conversation among House Republicans about an ethics probe of then-Speaker Newt Gingrich.

In 2001, the Supreme Court said the federal wiretap law could not be used to punish disclosure of information about matters of public concern by people who did not engage in obtaining the material illegally. The case was sent back to a lower court, where U.S. District Judge Thomas Hogan said Mr. McDermott was still at fault, since he released information he knew had been obtained illegally.

The ruling yesterday was a blow for the 18 news organizations that filed a brief supporting Mr. McDermott's right to release the tape, which he had received from Alice and John Martin. The list included the New York Times, The Washington Post, NBC, ABC, CBS, CNN and Associated Press.

"Under the rule proposed by Rep. Boehner, no one in the United States could communicate on this topic of public interest because of the defect in the chain of title," agreed Judge Sentelle in yesterday's opinion.

But Boehner attorney Michael Carvin said the Democrat's action was unlawful and said he "chilled" the free speech of persons such as Mr. Boehner and Mr. Gingrich. In the majority opinion, the appeals court called some of Mr. McDermott's arguments "implausible."

Aides close to Mr. Boehner said Mr. Carvin suffered a broken leg yesterday in an accident. As a result, Mr. Boehner did not know of his legal victory when he spoke to a group of reporters at a briefing yesterday morning.

"So they supported my position. Not a surprise. I think it is a good decision," Mr. Boehner said.

FBI Recorded Hutcherson Conversation (LYNCHNA)

By Conor Reilly

Lynchburg News & Advance, March 29, 2006

An FBI agent taped a phone conversation between Jerry Falwell Jr. and Lynchburg Mayor Carl Hutcherson in January 2005 without Falwell Jr.'s knowledge, a government motion filed Tuesday revealed.

Falwell Jr. said Tuesday evening that the government only recently told him that the call was recorded.

"It was a surprise to me," Falwell Jr. said. "(But) everything in that conversation is consistent with what we said later."

The mayor faces fraud charges related to a $32,500 donation from the Falwell ministries alleging that he used the money to improperly pay off tax debts, then lied to cover up his actions.

The 14-page document filed Tuesday says the government

FBI transcript of phone call

Download a copy of call between Mayor Hutcherson and Jerry Falwell Jr.

Government motion

Download a copy of the government motion. investigated "the possibility of public corruption by covertly recording a telephone call placed by Hutcherson at the government's direction to Jerry Falwell Jr."

The 13-minute conversation taped on Jan. 27, 2005 - the same day Hutcherson was first interviewed by the FBI - focused almost exclusively on the $32,500 gift from the Falwell ministries to a church group Hutcherson directed.

"The resultant taped conversation confirmed Hutcherson's denials of a bribery scheme," the motion says. "The taped conversation made clear that Falwell Jr. meant for the $32,500 to be a donation to Trinity CDC and not for Trinity CDC to be a mere shell or funnel for money to be given to Hutcherson."

Assistant U.S. Attorney Tom Bondurant is asking a judge to allow the conversation to be used as evidence at Hutcherson's trial, set to begin next month.

Defense attorney John Fishwick said in a prepared statement that Tuesday was the first time he had a chance to see the transcript.

DOJ_NMG_0023194

"We have always anticipated that the contents of the conversation are supportive of our case," he said in the statement. "We can't wait for the jury to hear it."

Bondurant argues that Hutcherson knew the money wasn't a loan to his funeral home.

The government says Hutcherson's defense team will likely argue that the Falwells intended the money to go to the mayor all along, so no criminal intent existed.

Prosecutors say in the motion the "conversation is relevant because it demonstrates Hutcherson's true criminal intent and refutes his potential defense."

Hutcherson made the initial contact with Falwell Jr.'s Liberty University office at 2:36 p.m. while FBI Special Agent Christian Pettyjohn was present.

The mayor begins the conversation by informing Falwell that an FBI agent was asking questions about the donation. The mayor then tells Falwell the agent "knew it was a direct loan, and uh, um, to me."

Here is one exchange between Hutcherson and Falwell Jr. from the transcript, which was posted on the federal court's Web site Tuesday along with a motion to introduce it as evidence.

Hutcherson: I didn't answer, I didn't answer a lot after that because uh, ultimately what they did was issue me a subpoena.

Falwell: Is that right?

Hutcherson: I just didn't know what to say or do.

Falwell: Alright, well we, it was a donation to that New Life, that's who we made the check out to, right?

Hutcherson: Yes, uh huh.

Falwell: So what's, I don't understand what's wrong with that.

Hutcherson: I don't, I don't know.

Over the course of the conversation, Falwell repeatedly says the money was given as a donation to the CDC, not a personal loan.

"They're just uh, but I just uh, I can't think, Carl, what it would be that uh, would be so bad," Falwell said. "Even if we had just loaned the funeral home."

Falwell also refers to a Wards Crossing West rezoning that initially drew the attention of federal investigators.

From the transcript:

"But at the time you voted on that rezoning for us, it was nothing, no business relationship at all," Falwell said.

"That's, no, no. There wasn't. No," Hutcherson said.

Falwell also said during the conversation "they're just trying to scare you."

Falwell said Tuesday that the Bank of the James, the institution where the donation was deposited, was responsible for the entire investigation beginning.

In the transcript, Falwell tells Hutcherson, "… Now, it's probably Bank of the James that's brought that up."

Hutcherson says "Probably so."

Falwell says, "Oh, yeah. I don't trust those people."

FBI Agents Testify About Dealings With Zimmermann (MINNST)

By Rochelle Olson, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, March 29, 2006

They detailed their initial visit with the then-City Council member accused of corruption and then a trip to his house.

Two FBI agents offered details in court Tuesday about their first meeting with then-Minneapolis City Council Member Dean Zimmermann to talk about allegations that he took cash in exchange for promises of political favors.

FBI special agents Timothy Bisswurm and David Kukura both testified about Sept. 8, 2005, the day they interviewed -- and tape-recorded -- Zimmermann for three hours at the Chicago Commons housing-retail development project.

Zimmermann rode home on his bike and then got a second visit from the FBI, whose agents seized envelopes with cash. Prosecutors say Zimmermann, who wasn't reelected last year, took cash from the developer of Chicago Commons in return for promises to help with zoning approval.

Zimmermann pleaded not guilty to four corruption-related charges in February and expects to go to trial in July.

At a hearing in federal court Tuesday, Zimmermann's attorney argued that a judge should forbid prosecutors from using the conversation with the FBI that day as evidence.

The content of the interview wasn't discussed Tuesday. The testimony sounded more routine than revelatory, but defense attorney Dan Scott said it may have significance later. The two agents were the only witnesses questioned on Scott's motion to suppress the statements made to them by Zimmermann.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Jeanne Graham didn't immediately rule on the motion, but Scott said he expects her to allow Zimmermann's statements to be used at trial.

Scott said the motion to suppress the conversation allowed him to question the agents about the circumstances under which Zimmermann spoke to them.

"Among other things, we get to find out they talked for 15 minutes after the tape was shut off," Scott said of Zimmermann and Kukura's conversation.

Bisswurm was questioned about the search of Zimmermann's home following the September interview. Bisswurm said that he asked Zimmermann about four specific campaign envelopes with cash and that the council member led him to the second floor of his home, where he retrieved them from a desk drawer.

Graham declined a defense motion to require the prosecution to produce for questioning Gary Carlson, the Chicago Commons developer who was the FBI's "cooperating witness" against Zimmermann.

"When someone is in a position Mr. Carlson is, they are often quite paranoid about being approached," Scott said.

The judge told Scott that if he wants to interview Carlson, he can get his phone number from prosecutors and find him.

Asked after the hearing how Carlson came to the attention of investigators, Scott said: "We only have tantalizing hints right now."

Scott doesn't expect to get more answers until the government is required to produce them in the days leading up to the trial, now scheduled for July 31 in U.S. District Judge Ann Montgomery's courtroom.

Zimmerman Appears In Court (KSTP-TV)

KSTP-TV, March 29, 2006

"This is something that was totally manufactured by the FBI, totally out of character for me, that's clear and obvious to everybody," Zimmermann told 5 EYEWITNESS NEWS. A former Minneapolis City Council Member tried to clear his name Tuesday in Federal court.

Dean Zimmermann was voted out of office shortly after being indicted for accepting bribes.

Today, attorneys and FBI agents talked about an informal recorded interview with Zimmermann. The judge heard and dismissed a number of defense motions to suppress evidence. Some of that evidence was gathered on Sept. 8, when FBI agents raided Zimmermann's home.

"This is something that was totally manufactured by the FBI, totally out of character for me, that's clear and obvious to everybody," Zimmerman told 5 EYEWITNESS NEWS.

3 Charged In Murder-for-hire Scheme (CHIT)

By Carlos Sadovi, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, March 29, 2006

Three Chicago men were ordered held on bail Tuesday for their involvement in a botched murder-for-hire scheme against a Harwoood Heights jeweler to whom a relative of one of the men owed cash.

Santos Ramirez, 34, was charged Monday with solicitation to commit murder for hire, said Tom Stanton, a spokesman for the Cook County state's attorney's office.

Anthony King, 27, and Robert Navarro, 39, were charged with conspiracy to commit murder for their role in the scheme, Stanton said.

Ramirez, of the 4000 block of West Nelson Street, was held on $700,000 bail Monday by Circuit Judge Raymond Myles. King, of the 3500 block of West Palmer Street, and Navarro, of the 2900 block of North Mulligan Avenue, were each held on $600,000 bail.

Stanton said that on March 18 during a narcotics transaction, Ramirez offered King $10,000 to kill the 49-year-old target to whom Ramirez's uncle allegedly owed money. The uncle has not been charged, Stanton said.

King recruited Navarro to help, in particular to act as a Spanish-language interpreter to communicate with Ramirez, Stanton said.

The three men staked out the man's business, and Ramirez allegedly showed the others a .38-caliber gun and pointed out the victim's car, according to Stanton. The three Chicago men allegedly hatched a scheme in which they would wait for the jeweler to leave the business and ram the jeweler's car with their vehicle. The jeweler would then be shot to death, Stanton said.

But on Sunday, as they attempted to follow the jeweler's car, the three men lost track of his vehicle and were arrested by Chicago police at a gas station in the 2400 block of North Milwaukee Avenue, Stanton said.

Stanton said the FBI had been tracking telephone conversations between the men, and that Ramirez was under surveillancein anotherinvestigation.

Navarro, who has seven felony convictions, and King, who has six felony convictions, are both on parole for drug charges. Ramirez was wanted on an outstanding warrant for a misdemeanor charge, Stanton said.

csadovi@tribune.com

Three Confess Huge Theft From Hudson Firm (AP)

AP, March 25, 2006

Newark, N.J. – Three former employees of Vectron International have admitted in guilty pleas that they cheated the company of up to $1 million.

The three are Chinese nationals who worked as sales representatives in China for Vectron, which is based in Hudson, N.H.

Zhen Zhang, who was based in Shanghai, was the mastermind, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office for New Jersey, which handled the case.

Zhang, 35, admitted Friday that he demanded bribe payments, as well as created front companies and falsified corporate records to cheat his employer, federal prosecutors said.

Pleading guilty in December and February, respectively, were Shiyi Zhang, 42, who is not related to Zhen Zhang, who was based in Beijing, and Zhuosen Tan, 31, who was based in Shenzhen.

According to court papers, Zhen Zhang took bribes from customers in exchange for lower prices and faster service, while those who did not pay saw bids delayed or declined.

By using straw buyers, which included existing companies in the United States and front companies that the schemers established in China, to hide the true value of and actual user of the products from Vectron, according to court papers.

As a result, the conspirators kept a portion of their sales proceeds from Vectron, prosecutors said.

The three were arrested June 6 in the United States.

Zhen Zhang faces up to 20 years in prison for wire fraud, and five years for conspiracy, when sentenced July 17 by U.S. District Judge Dickinson R. Debevoise. He could be fined could be up to twice the amount gained from the scheme.

Shiyi Zhang is to be sentenced on April 10 and Tan on May 12. They each pleaded to a conspiracy charge, and face up to five years in prison and the same possible fine.

Zhen Zhang and Shiyi Zhang remain incarcerated. Tan was freed on bail after his plea.

Vectron International makes high-tech equipment used to boost audio, video and data signals traveling through phone and cable lines.

Convicted Philly Councilman Released Pending Sentencing (AP)

AP, March 28, 2006

PHILADELPHIA (AP) — A city councilman jailed since his bribery conviction earlier this month was released Tuesday on orders from a judge to stay on his medication and continue with counseling.

"I'm fine," Councilman Rick Mariano told reporters as he left the federal courthouse after processing.

A psychiatrist who examined Mariano concluded that he is not a danger to himself or others, according to the order issued Tuesday by U.S. District Judge Lawrence F. Stengel.

Stengel had revoked Mariano's bond and detained him immediately after jurors convicted him of 18 bribery and corruption counts on March 17.

The judge questioned Mariano's emotional stability, given the long sentence he faces and a suicide scare he touched off days before his indictment, when he made a solitary trip to the observation deck of City Hall.

Prosecutors had not asked for Mariano to be detained pending his July 6 sentencing.

"His state of mind is excellent," defense lawyer Nino Tinari said. "We're going to go back to the office, review what his options are, prepare for court proceedings."

Mariano, a councilman for 10 years, was convicted of taking more than $28,000 from friends and businessmen in exchange for his help obtaining tax breaks, city contracts and real estate. He remains in office and, by law, can hold the $102,000-a-year job until his sentencing.

Lawyer: Mariano's 'Fine' After Psychiatric Tests (PHI)

By Chris Brennan & Michael Hinkelman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 29, 2006

City Councilman Rick Mariano's first words in public after being released from federal custody were, "I didn't do that."

Mariano's exclamation yesterday had nothing to do with his recent conviction on corruption charges or a judge's concern that he might be a danger to himself or others. Instead, he was talking about a newspaper photographer who took a hard fall while following him out of federal court. Mariano refused to say anything else as he jumped into a waiting taxi with his wife.

His defense attorney, Nino Tinari, said Mariano will immediately start contemplating "some factors that affect his entire life," including whether he will continue to serve on Council until his July 6 sentencing. Mariano spent 11 days in the Federal Detention Center because a federal judge feared that a looming prison term of six to 10 years might make him snap. Tinari said a psychiatric evaluation in jail showed Mariano's "state of mind is excellent." The lawyer also said he has heard that Mariano's former spokesman, Frank Keel, told the lead FBI special agent on the case that the councilman might be a danger to himself.

"It is very disturbing that a person who was his spokesman for a time says things that are inaccurate and inappropriate," Tinari said.

Keel expressed concern for Mariano's mental state immediately after a jury found him guilty on March 17 on 18 counts of conspiracy, corruption, bribery and filing a false tax return. Keel yesterday said he was glad U.S. District Judge Lawrence Stengel ordered the psychiatric evaluation and that Mariano is again free until he is sentenced. "He's a decent man who did some dumb things," Keel said. "I spent as much time with him during some very difficult days as anyone and was a witness to his increasingly dark mood swings."

Asked if he reported any of that to the FBI, Keel would only say, "As the councilman's former spokesperson, I had many conversations with federal authorities throughout the process, as did everyone else in Rick's circle."

FBI Special Agent Ray Manna declined to comment. Mariano sparked a suicide scare in the City Hall tower just days before he was indicted in October. He spent a weekend in a psychiatric ward but later claimed he was only up there taking pictures with a new camera. Stengel, in releasing Mariano yesterday, ordered that he continue psychological counseling and taking all prescribed medication. Those orders, which Tinari called "voluntary," will be monitored by federal authorities until July 6. Mariano, troubled by recent knee surgeries, was pale and looked like he had lost weight when he was released.

"His physical state is a little deteriorated because he's been in the special housing unit for 11 days," Tinari said. "He was going to come out here not in any way with his head down or limping or being a person that has been beaten down. He's fine. He really is."

Tinari declined to say if Mariano is considering cooperating with federal prosecutors in exchange for a lighter sentence. He said estimates of a six-to-10-year prison sentence "may not be realistic," but conceded that the high end was a daunting number. "I don't know if anyone can do 10 years in jail, let alone Mariano," Tinari said. Mayor Street, a longtime political ally, said he was glad to hear Mariano was freed.

DOJ_NMG_0023198

"Councilman Mariano made a mistake," said Street, who called on him to step down from Council upon conviction. "And believe me, our system will make sure that he pays for that mistake."

Mariano's staff has repeatedly said he will keep his post, as allowed by state law, and his city paycheck until he is sentenced. "I don't suspect that he'll be coming into City Hall on a regular basis," Street said. "But he might."

In First Public Appearance, Mariano Says 'I'm Fine,' But Nothing More (PHI)

By John Shiffman And Michael Currie Schaffer

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 29, 2006

City Councilman Rick Mariano emerged from jail yesterday, dazed and unshaven, 11 days after a federal jury convicted him on corruption charges and a judge ordered him held for a psychiatric evaluation.

Mariano's first public appearance since the verdict, a simple 20-foot walk from the federal courthouse in Center City to a waiting taxi, turned into a carnival. As he left, the councilman squeezed awkwardly through an aggressive pack of journalists. In the confusion, two photographers tumbled onto Market Street.

Mariano scowled and did not answer questions about whether he would resign from his $102,000-a-year post or appear at tomorrow's regular Council session.

He said only: "I'm fine."

The councilman, who had not seen his wife or family during his 11 days at the Federal Detention Center, looked pale and thinner than he had at trial.

U.S. District Judge Lawrence F. Stengel set Mariano free on bail after reviewing the results of a court-ordered psychiatric examination.

Stengel said that he was no longer worried that Mariano might be a danger to himself or others. Stengel had previously cited Mariano's climb to the observation deck on City Hall shortly before his indictment last year, and said that episode had never been fully explained.

The psychiatric report, by Dr. Pogos H. Voskanian of Drexel University College of Medicine, is confidential.

As a condition of bail, however, Mariano must continue psychological counseling and take all prescribed medications. He also must continue to report to court officials. If he flees before sentencing, he would forfeit homes in Philadelphia and at the Jersey Shore.

Sentencing is scheduled for July 6, but it could come earlier, people involved in the case said. He likely faces six to 10 years in prison.

After a nearly two-week trial earlier this month, jurors deliberated for about six hours before convicting Mariano of bribery, corruption, money-laundering and fraud. They concluded that he took bribes from five businessmen in exchange for help with city agencies, a schools contract, and access to city land at a discount.

Although prosecutors believe that Mariano faces at least six years in prison, defense lawyer Nino V. Tinari said yesterday that he believes the sentencing range will be lower.

Prosecutors declined comment on Mariano's release.

In the hour before Mariano left the federal complex yesterday, Tinari engaged in a bit of misdirection with reporters, apparently hoping the councilman might be able to avoid the cameras. But once his client was safely inside the taxi and en route to his office, Tinari gave an impromptu news conference.

"His state of mind is excellent," Tinari said. "We're going to go back to the office, review what his options are."

Tinari said he and the councilman had a great deal to talk about.

"We're going to discuss all of his options: his legal options, his employment option - anything we have to discuss, we will," Tinari said.

One of them is likely to be Mariano's status as a sitting councilman. According to a city legal opinion, Mariano is not required to relinquish his Council seat until he is sentenced.

DOJ_NMG_0023199

Mariano's chief of staff, Jay McCalla, has said the councilman will stay in his seat as long as possible. But Tinari said yesterday that no decision had been made.

"We're going to review all of that in the next few days," he said.

McCalla said Mariano would not be in Council tomorrow. He said he expected the councilman would work from his district office rather than come to City Hall.

Mariano, whose district includes parts of North and lower Northeast Philadelphia, is the first sitting councilman convicted of corruption since 1991.

Reached at his home last night on a quiet, treeless street in Juniata Park, Mariano, dressed in an olive-colored T-shirt, looked like he was relaxing - not expecting company.

He said he had no comment, and told a reporter: "Don't come to my house."

He then quickly shut the door.

Witness Links "Mafia Cop" To Murder (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, March 29, 2006

For nearly 20 years, Peter Franzone kept his terrible secret. Tuesday, the laborer from Flatbush told the whole world about digging graves and burying bodies at the behest of others.

Testifying in the "Mafia Cops" racketeering trial, Franzone said he was forced to bury a man killed in a gangland slaying and indicated that one of the defendants -- former NYPD detective Louis Eppolito -- may have been an accessory to the killing.

Speaking in a low voice that betrayed no emotion, Franzone, who now is in the witness protection program, told a Brooklyn federal court jury how he was coerced into digging a grave 5 feet deep in a garage space he owned and later was ordered to move another corpse for disposal elsewhere. In both incidents, Franzone said, Eppolito had driven into the parking area as other men arrived.

Franzone, 56, testified that Frank Santoro Jr., Eppolito's mob associate cousin, forced him to bury the body of a man he described as "Jewish," who had been escorted onto the premises sometime in 1985 or 1986. The man, whom prosecutors maintain was jeweler Israel Greenwald, was brought to Franzone's combination parking lot and body shop facility by Santoro and another man. Eppolito had driven onto the property moments before the other three men walked to the location, Franzone said.

Eppolito, 57, and his former partner, Stephen Caracappa, 64, are accused of taking part in eight gangland murders, including that of Greenwald in February 1986, for the Luchese crime family. Eppolito also is accused of taking part in the killing of Pasquale Varriale, the other man whose body allegedly was at the parking lot.

Franzone, under questioning by Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Henoch, did not say that Eppolito killed anyone.

Prosecutors, drawing out Franzone's description of Eppolito's proximity to the homicide scenes, are seeking to make the case that the former NYPD detective was an accessory to the crimes.

Franzone said that one of the two men who escorted the man believed to be Greenwald onto the property was tall, with a moustache and a face that was pockmarked on the right side.

About a half-hour later, Franzone said Santoro forced him to bury the Jewish man's corpse under pain of death.

"If I didn't help him, they would kill me and my -- -- family," Franzone said Santoro told him.

Franzone said he used a shovel as Santoro watched to dig a hole in one of the garage spaces he rented at 2232 Nostrand Ave. After the man's body was pushed into the ditch, Santoro first poured lime on the corpse and then wet cement, Franzone said. The hole was filled in.

In a second incident involving Santoro, Franzone said he was asked to lift a wrapped body into the trunk of a car. Investigators say the corpse was that of Varriale, who was killed after Eppolito allegedly tipped off the mob that Varriale was an informant.

Franzone said he didn't know the identity of the man he helped bury. The FBI unearthed Greenwald's body in April at the Nostrand Avenue location from beneath the garage floor. He said he was afraid to tell police about what happened because he feared Eppolito and Santoro, who died in 1987.

DOJ_NMG_0023200

"Who would believe me, what I did with a police officer?" Franzone said. "I figured he would kill me, lock me up and have somebody else kill me."

On cross-examination by Caracappa's attorney, Ed Hayes, Franzone insisted that one of the men who escorted the Jewish man before his death had a pockmarked face and hooked nose.

Caracappa, who is lean and stands under 6 feet tall, has smooth skin and a straight nose. Eppolito is short and heavy.

Witness Says Cops Told Him To Dig A Grave (AP)

By Tom Hays

AP, March 29, 2006

NEW YORK -- A tow truck driver testified Tuesday that he was forced to dig the grave of a jeweler who was allegedly kidnapped and killed in 1986 by two New York City detectives moonlighting as hit men for the mob.

A gangster involved in the Brooklyn slaying "told me that I had to help bury the dead man," Peter Franzone said at the federal trial of the former detectives, Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa. "He said if I told anybody, he'd kill me and my family."

The 56-year-old witness said he kept quiet for 19 years because he was convinced no one would believe that police were mixed up with the mob, and because he feared Eppolito might put him in his own grave.

"I was afraid of Louie Eppolito," he said.

Franzone broke his silence last year under questioning by federal authorities reinvestigating the slaying of Israel Greenwald, a Diamond District jeweler who ran afoul of the Luchese crime family.

Authorities allege Eppolito, 57, and Caracappa, 64, were involved in the killings of Greenwald and seven other victims between 1986 and 1990 while on the payroll both of the NYPD and Luchese underboss Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso. Prosecutors said the detectives committed killings for up to $65,000 a hit.

Greenwald was killed in 1986 after being pulled over by Eppolito and Caracappa and taken to a parking garage managed by Franzone, prosecutors said.

On the witness stand Tuesday, the tow truck driver told jurors he had seen a man in a pinstriped suit and a yarmulke being led inside a one-car garage by a Luchese associate, Frank Santoro, and a man fitting the description of Caracappa. Eppolito _ whom he had previously met _ was waiting in a car outside, he said.

Franzone said about 20 minutes later, the garage door opened, and Santoro and the other man emerged without Greenwald. The other man left with Eppolito, and then Santoro took Franzone into the garage, showed him the victim's body and ordered him to dig a 5-foot grave in the garage, the witness testified.

The body was dumped in the hole, and covered with cement. Santoro himself was killed the next year.

Greenwald's body was discovered last April after Franzone told investigators were to find it. Authorities said the jeweler had been shot in the head.

Franzone testified that in 1987 the mobsters used the same parking facility to wrap the body of another shooting victim in a tarp. He claimed Eppolito again served as a lookout.

Gravedigger's Secret Is Out, 20 Years Later, At Trial Of 2 Ex-Detectives (NYT)

By Alan Feuer

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

A 56-year-old man with a 20-year-old secret told it in public for the first time yesterday: how, in 1986, he dug a five-foot-deep hole in the floor of a parking garage he owned and, under pain of death, dumped in a dead man he believed that two detectives, Louis J. Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa, had just helped kill.

The man with the secret was Peter Franzone, a sixth-grade dropout, who testified at the detectives' trial that the worst things he had done before that day were take a car that did not belong to him and steal $65 he later spent on a cowboy hat and the rides at Coney Island.

Both were a moonshot's distance from burying a man, but Mr. Franzone told the jury in Federal District Court in Brooklyn that he watched one day as Mr. Eppolito's cousin and a man who looked like Mr. Caracappa marched their victim toward a garage on Nostrand Avenue near a collision shop he owned — then came out without him.

Minutes later, he said, the cousin, Frank Santora Jr., handed him a shovel, made him dig a grave, then forced him to push the dead man in and then pour lime and wet cement atop the body. "Frankie told me I gotta help him bury the body because I'm an accessory with it," Mr. Franzone said, "and if I didn't help him that he would kill me" and, he said, his family.

Beyond this experience, Mr. Franzone presented himself as a regular guy, a working man who left his city job with 17 years' worth of unused vacation time, and who looked in the Yellow Pages starting with A when he needed a lawyer in the case.

He was testifying yesterday at the detectives' trial, in which they stand accused of killing Israel Greenwald and seven other men for the mob. Though he said he never knew the name of the man he helped to bury, prosecutors say it was Mr. Greenwald, a Long Island jeweler who made the mistake of crossing Burton Kaplan, a criminal mastermind with whom he had a deal to sell stolen Treasury bills. When the deal went bad, the government says, Mr. Kaplan hired the two detectives and Mr. Santora (whom he knew from prison) to dispose of Mr. Greenwald for $30,000.

Mr. Franzone was already a friend of Mr. Santora's, having worked on his Oldsmobile at the collision shop.

In February 1986, the government says, the two detectives stopped Mr. Greenwald on the highway. They took him to the lot, where the witness said he saw Mr. Eppolito in a parked car as Mr. Santora and someone in a trench coat who looked like Mr. Caracappa led the jeweler to the garage, from which he never returned.

Within minutes, the witness said, Mr. Santora led him, too, to the garage, where he saw the dead man "leaning on the left wall with his legs spread and his hands on his side." Removing a pair of spade-tipped wooden shovels from the trunk of his white Cadillac, Mr. Santora forced Mr. Franzone to bury the jeweler in the dirt — a job, the witness said, that lasted hours.

"It was daylight when I went in," he said. "When I came out, it was night."

Mr. Franzone held onto his secret until a year ago, when federal prosecutors sought his testimony.

He said he met his lawyer, Alan Abramson, and confessed to him.

"That's when I couldn't hold it in," he said. "I told him the truth about the man buried in the garage."

In their opening statements, prosecutors said Mr. Greenwald — whose body was exhumed last year — had been buried with hands bound and a bag on his head, though on cross-examination (which relied, in part, on props like a shovel) Mr. Franzone said the jeweler had no bag on his head or binding on his hands.

Mr. Caracappa's lawyer, Edward Hayes, got the witness to admit that he had heard no gunshots at the garage that night.

It was Bruce Cutler, Mr. Eppolito's lawyer, who played the legal heavy, yelling at the witness — who had told the jury he was hard of hearing — and calling him a "nonunion, unpaid gravedigger."

With great theatrical effect, Mr. Cutler asked: "Did you even call your wife and tell her, 'Dear, I won't be home for dinner. I'm digging a grave—at my place of business?' "

The witness had no answer to that, though he did respond to another of the lawyer's fierce interrogations.

Mr. Cutler asked, "Day after day, Christmas after Christmas, Thanksgiving after Thanksgiving, confirmation after confirmation, year after year, you just stayed silent, yes?"

To which the witness replied, "Yes."

I DUG GRAVE FOR MOB COPS (NYPOST)

By Zach Haberman

The New York Post, March 29, 2006

An illiterate parking attendant-turned-gravedigger for the mob yesterday gave damaging testimony that placed two alleged Mafia cops at the scene of two gruesome slayings.

Peter Franzone said that after one 1986 killing at a Brooklyn car lot - in which ex-cop defendants Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa were on hand - he feared Eppolito so much that he kept quiet about the burial for 19 years.

"I was scared, because who is going to believe me if I mentioned a cop was involved?" Franzone said at the pair's federal racketeering trial in Brooklyn court.

"I figure [Eppolito] would kill me or arrest me and put me in jail and have somebody else kill me."

Franzone, a sixth-grade dropout, said that in the early 1970s, he got to know Eppolito's cousin Frank Santora Jr. - a mob associate who allegedly helped serve as an intermediary between the NYPD detectives and higher-level gangsters.

DOJ_NMG_0023202

Santora became acquainted with the garage keeper after getting tow services from him. They were so close that Santoro invited him to his home and introduced his cousin, Eppolito, to him.

The witness said that on Feb. 10, 1986, he watched as a mob hit involving Santora, Eppolito - and apparently Caracappa - took place at a single-car garage at his lot.

He said he was sitting in the lot's attendant's booth when Santora and a yarmulke-wearing mob associate known as Israel Greenwald walked into the lot with another man, who wore a trench coat with the collar pulled up.

"I saw his mustache, and I saw the pockmarks on his face," he said, implying the man looked like Caracappa.

He testified that he later saw Caracappa at a Sweet 16 party for Santora's daughter, and realized he was the man at the lot.

As they walked in, Eppolito parked nearby and watched the trio enter the garage. The three men were in there for about 20 minutes. Only two of them came out, driving off in Eppolito's car.

Santora came back to the lot a short time later.

"He said he wants to show me something," Franzone testified.

Santora"He opens the door a little way and says, 'Go in there,' " Franzone said. "I turned the light on, and I saw a man slumped against the wall."

It was Greenwald, shot and killed. Franzone pulled his Cadillac up. He took some shovels, a bag of lime and some cement out of the trunk.

"Frankie said I gotta help bury the body because I'm an accessory," Franzone said.

Franzone said he took the short-handled spade and dug a hole in the garage, where the body remained until it was unearthed last year.

"I was afraid that he might [make me] dig it deep enough and just leave me in there," he said.

SantoraHe said the Williamsburg man's body folded into a near fetal position as it plopped into the hole. Santora covered the body with lime. Then they filled the hole and laid a coat of cement.

A year later, Franzone said, Santora killed another man at his parking lot, again with Eppolito on the scene keeping watch.

He that after Santoro and some other gangsters killed a victim named Pasquale Varialle, they made him lift the blanket-bound body into the trunk of a car.

He said he kept quiet, even after Santora died in the late 1980s, out of fear.

Also yesterday, prosecutors said they got a letter from jailed mob boss Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso concerning the case. They did not give details.

Casso is considered mentally unstable, but a witness said he paid the two cops for mob-connected work on several occasions.

I've Got Info, Convict Sez (NYDN)

By John Marzulli

New York Daily News, March 29, 2006

Lawyers for the reputed Mafia cops will get a chance to chat by phone today with their clients' alleged benefactor, imprisoned gangster Anthony (Gaspipe) Casso.

Casso, who is serving a life term at the nation's most secure prison in Florence, Colo., originally outed retired NYPD Detectives Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa as rogue cops during his brief stint as a government cooperator in 1994.

The government rejected Casso's testimony because he was caught plotting violent crimes in prison, including the assassination of a federal judge and a prosecutor.

It took the feds more than a decade to build a case by flipping Casso's alleged middleman with the detectives, Burton Kaplan.

But Casso, 65, recently penned a letter to the feds saying he has "information favorable to the defense," prosecutor Daniel Wenner revealed yesterday.

Defense lawyers Edward Hayes and Bruce Cutler will listen to what the former Luchese crime underboss has to say, but Hayes indicated there was zero chance of calling Casso, who was involved in more than 30 murders, as a witness.

DOJ_NMG_0023203

Victim's Daughters To Testify Vs. G-man (NYDN)

By NANCIE L. KATZ, DAILY NEWS STAFF WRITER

New York Daily News, March 29, 2006

While her dad was alive, Mary Anne Lampasi claims she was oblivious to his mob ties.

That ended in 1992 when businessman Larry Lampasi was gunned down in a Mafia hit authorities now believe was set up by alleged rogue FBI agent Lindley DeVecchio.

Tomorrow, Mary Anne, 52, and her sister, Candace, 48, will be in Brooklyn Supreme Court, where they are hoping to confront the man investigators say is at least partly responsible for their father's death.

DeVecchio, 65, is scheduled to surrender tonight on an indictment that charges him with four gangland murders, according to law enforcement sources.

The murders were allegedly carried out after DeVecchio tipped off a secret mob informant, longtime Colombo crime family capo Gregory Scarpa Sr., the sources said.

DeVecchio has repeatedly denied any wrongdoing.

"I don't care if my legs go weak under me," said Lampasi, who now lives in Florida. "I will face this. It is harder to live not facing it. You can't run away."

In the Lampasi slaying, DeVecchio allegedly let Scarpa know where he could find the mobster, a former associate turned rival. "We were shielded," Mary Anne Lampasi said. "My father wanted us to have a better life than he had. He gave us all college educations and graduate school. Suddenly this hits us."

From the moment her father was riddled with bullets, Mary Anne Lampasi said her mother had a feeling he had been set up. Unarmed, the 66-year-old Lampasi was shot nine times.

She said the family's home in Queens was the target of several break-ins and the Lampasis came to believe they were being followed. But was it the mob or the feds?

At the time, a family friend told the sisters that there was an FBI coverup going on. The family relocated to Florida.

"We would like justice. I am so grateful that something is happening and the truth can come out," Mary Anne Lampasi said.

Feds Bugged Bedroom, Phones Of FIU Pair (MH)

By Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, March 29, 2006

Federal agents planted a bug in the bedroom of a Florida International University a couple of years ago, netting evidence to charge them as unregistered agents for the Cuban government, according to court records.

The FBI also wiretapped the home phones of Professor Carlos Alvarez and his counselor wife, Elsa Alvarez, from at least late 2001 until last summer, collecting electronic evidence on practically all of their conversations.

The reams of intercepts included mundane exchanges and even the private musings between husband and wife.

The FBI's eavesdropping of the couple's home goes far beyond what was first known about evidence in the case, which included alleged "confessions" to federal agents last summer and the confiscation of the Alvarezes' home and FIU computers. The surveillance evidence surfaced as part of their lawyers' efforts to revoke the couple's detention before their scheduled May 8 trial.

It's unclear from the court record how these thousands and thousands of surveillance intercepts will help the U.S. attorney's office prosecute the couple, who are suspected of reporting on the exile community and its leaders to Cuban leader Fidel Castro's government.

According to sources familiar with the case, the FBI had hoped the electronic intercepts would provide leads on alleged spying activity on behalf of the Cuban government. The evidence led only to the Alvarezes' arrests in January. It's unclear why prosecutors chose to charge them at that time.

The couple's lawyers say prosecutors have produced "about 200 supposedly pertinent conversations" recorded by the FBI, court records show. The evidence remains sealed from the public. But the Alvarezes' lawyers say the "majority deals only with mundane activities of daily life" -- such as conversations about the Alvarezes' dinner plans, the tenting of their South Miami home for termites and meetings at their Catholic church.

THE DEFENSE STANCE

The couple's lawyers, Steven Chaykin and Jane Moscowitz, argue their clients would not leave for Cuba if released because they have strong ties to the community, including five children and elderly parents.

They are challenging whether the FBI lawfully obtained warrants to conduct the electronic surveillance. The FBI obtained the warrants under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which allows the government to wiretap people in the United States suspected of being agents for a foreign government or involved in terrorist activity overseas.

In the war on terror, the Bush administration has attracted sharp criticism for authorizing warrantless domestic wiretaps without approval from the secretive FISA court -- an issue that doesn't apply to the Alvarez case.

It is not clear from court records how long the FBI conducted electronic surveillance of the couple's home. But it appears the FISA wiretaps of the Alvarezes may have begun years before the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. Post-9/11, Congress approved the USA Patriot Act that allows federal agencies to use foreign intelligence wiretap evidence for criminal investigations, such as the Alvarezes' case.

'On March 6, 2006, the government produced summaries of allegedly `pertinent' recorded conversations produced by that surveillance starting in December 2001 and ending July 4, 2005, although the government states that the eavesdropping began earlier and continued until the defendants' arrest on Jan. 6, 2006," the Alvarezes' lawyers wrote.

The attorneys, in their motion, asked the government to disclose the documents related to the wiretap warrants. They are trying to challenge evidence that could affect their clients' case before a jury.

They cited constitutional protections for Carlos Alvarez, 61, a psychology professor, and his wife, Elsa, 55, a psychology counselor, both U.S. citizens.

Referring to the FISA law, the attorneys said: No U.S. citizen ``may be considered an agent of a foreign power solely upon the basis of activities that are protected by the First Amendment. . . ."

For example, they argued, more than 40 of the "pertinent" FISA recordings are telephone conversations between Carlos Alvarez and an unidentified colleague regarding legally licensed culture-exchange programs between the United States and Cuba.

PROTECTIVE ORDER

This month, federal prosecutors refused to turn over documents for the FISA warrants to the Alvarezes' attorneys.

So far, U.S. District Judge K. Michael Moore has issued a protective order that allows only members of the legal teams and their staffs to review the declassified FISA intercepts for the upcoming trial.

Prosecutors apparently disclosed evidence about the FISA wiretaps to show the judge that the Alvarezes are a ``serious risk of flight."

Assistant U.S. attorney Brian Frazier cited Magistrate Judge Andrea Simonton's January ruling in which she said the couple would receive "a hero's welcome" in Cuba.

The prosecutor said the couple used their cover at FIU to infiltrate the exile community, spying on the university's president, Mitch Maidique, and other exile leaders. He said they secretly communicated with the Cuban intelligence directorate, using five-digit code in short-wave radio transmissions.

Once the messages were received, they would input them into their home computer, equipped with decryption technology.

Prosecutors say the couple traveled to Cuba, Mexico and other countries to exchange information with their handlers from the Cuban Directorate of Intelligence.

According to court filings, the Alvarezes reported on "community attitudes" after the FBI's 1998 arrests of 10 Cubans charged with spying. That high-profile espionage case was linked to the Cuban government's shoot-down of two Brothers to the Rescue exile planes over the Florida Straits that killed four Miami men two years earlier.

Muhammad 'Psychotic,' Medical Assessment Says (WP)

By Ernesto Londoño

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

Sniper John Allen Muhammad is not competent to stand trial, his attorneys argued in a motion filed yesterday along with a psychiatric evaluation that says the defendant should not be allowed to defend himself during his murder trial because he is "psychotic, delusional" and "paranoid."

The report -- the first public disclosure of a mental health expert's assessment of the sniper's mind -- was filed a day before Muhammad is scheduled to appear before a judge in Rockville to explain why he wants to fire his attorneys and defend himself during his Montgomery County trial, which is scheduled to start May 1.

Yale University psychiatrist Dorothy O. Lewis, the defense expert who interviewed Muhammad twice in September 2003 and for four hours Monday, said the sniper told her that he is innocent and believes "his arrest was the result of an elaborate scheme to frame him for the murders."

She wrote that Muhammad told her he also believes Lee Boyd Malvo -- his alleged accomplice in the series of slayings committed with a high-powered rifle in October 2002 -- was "fed information by the police and forced to make a false confession."

Lewis wrote that Muhammad's judgment and ability to think logically are "severely compromised" by brain dysfunction and that he probably suffers from "schizo-affective schizophrenia."

Muhammad has refused to assist his attorneys -- Montgomery public defender Paul DeWolfe and his deputy, Brian D. Shefferman -- and says that he can't share his "secret defense strategy" with his attorneys because "they cannot be trusted," Lewis wrote.

Montgomery Circuit Court Judge James L. Ryan will have to tackle the competency issue before deciding whether to allow Muhammad to represent himself -- a request he made in a handwritten letter delivered to the judge this month.

People in criminal proceedings have a constitutional right to represent themselves at trial, but to sign off on such requests, judges need to find that the defendant is competent and is making the decision knowingly and voluntarily.

Ryan could rule on the competency motion today, but he might choose to have Muhammad examined by an independent psychiatrist before deciding whether he's fit to stand trial; Lewis was hired by Muhammad's defense attorneys.

Deputy State's Attorney Katherine Winfree declined to comment on the motion yesterday. DeWolfe said the "report speaks for itself with respect for his competence to stand trial and his competence to waive counsel."

Maryland prosecutors hope to convince a jury that Muhammad was the architect of the sniper shootings, six of which occurred in Montgomery. Muhammad, 45, and Malvo, 21, were each convicted of one killing in separate trials in Virginia in 2003. Muhammad has been sentenced to death and Malvo to life in prison without the possibility of parole in that state.

Maryland prosecutors say a second set of convictions would give relatives of the people shot in Montgomery a taste of justice and secure the defendants' uninterrupted incarceration in case the Virginia convictions were overturned.

Lewis, the psychiatrist, wrote that Muhammad has no clear defense strategy. When asked how he would strike back at the overwhelming amount of evidence prosecutors could introduce to link him to the six slayings, he told her: "One piece at a time . . . you take all the pieces and add them up as a total."

During Monday's interview, Muhammad seemed paranoid, Lewis wrote. He insisted that his attorneys were withholding information that was key to his defense and told her: "It was never my intention to be represented by an attorney."

She wrote that Muhammad had short spurts of lucidity during their two interviews in September but that his behavior deteriorated unpredictably and that he rambled and made "inappropriate" requests, such as examining the physician's fingers and cuticles.

She said he became delusional when asked whether friends and relatives visited him and began speaking about people he knew in China and Russia. He told her that he had been in Germany when the Berlin Wall fell but that "the history books lied" about the date, Lewis wrote.

Anti-snitch Campaign Riles Police, Prosecutors (USAT)

By Rick Hampson

USA Today, March 29, 2006

PITTSBURGH — It was not the first time prosecutor Lisa Pellegrini had been enraged by the sight of the T-shirt with the traffic-sign message: STOP SNITCHING. But this guy was about to wear one into court, with matching baseball cap.

Worse, he was a witness — her witness — and the intended victim in an attempted murder case that had brought him, her and the defendants to court that day last fall.

This was Rayco "War" Saunders — ex-con, pro boxer and walking billboard for a street movement that has sparked a coast-to-coast beef involving everyone from professors to rappers.

Pellegrini, thinking "witness intimidation," told Saunders to lose the hat and reverse the shirt. Saunders, crying "First Amendment," refused. He left the courthouse, shirt in place. Case dismissed. "In almost every one of my homicides, this happens: 'I don't know nothin' about nothin', " the prosecutor says. "There is that attitude, 'Don't be a snitch.' And it's condoned by the community."

Omerta, the Mafia's blood oath of silence, has been broken by turncoat after turncoat. But the call to stop snitching — on other folks in the 'hood — is getting louder.

Is it an attempt by drug dealers and gangsters to intimidate witnesses?

Is it a legitimate protest against law enforcers' overreliance on self-serving criminal informers?

Or is it bigger than that?

Take the case of Busta Rhymes.

The hip-hop star has refused to cooperate with police investigating the slaying of his bodyguard Feb. 5 outside a Brooklyn studio where Rhymes was recording a video with performers such as Missy Elliott and Mary J. Blige. Police say that although Rhymes and as many as 50 others may have seen the shooting, no one came forward — an echo of the silence that followed the unsolved murders of rappers Tupac Shakur, the Notorious B.I.G. and Run-DMC's Jam Master Jay.

It's the code of the street: To be a credible rapper, you have to know when to shut up.

"Under pressure, I lie for ya, die for ya," Lil' Kim once rapped. Now she's in a federal jail in Philadelphia for failing to tell a grand jury what she knew about some friends involved in a shooting.

Rhymes' silence in the death of Israel Ramirez seemed to puzzle New York's seen-it-all police commissioner, Ray Kelly, an ex-Marine, career NYPD cop and U.S. Customs chief. "Your employee is murdered in front of you," he told reporters, so "you'd think he might want to talk to the police."

Not necessarily, says David Kennedy, director of the Center for Crime Prevention and Control at John Jay College of Criminal Justice in New York. "There's such animosity toward the police in some urban communities that even people who aren't afraid, and who hate crime, still feel cooperating is something good people don't do," Kennedy says. "That's the Busta Rhymes story. He has nothing to fear. He just doesn't want to talk. His reputation would take a dive if he did."

The code of silence, he says, "is breaking out in a way we've never seen before."

Saunders agrees: "It's a movement, that's what it is — a stop snitching movement."

The stigma against snitching is an old one, but the Mafia never took out newspaper ads to promote omerta. So why is an unwritten rule printed on thousands of T-shirts?

Start with the war on drugs. Over the past two decades, law enforcers have made more drug arrests and turned more defendants into informers than ever before. According to the U.S. Sentencing Commission, the agency that establishes federal court sentencing practices, about one-third of drug trafficking prosecutions involve informers' "substantial assistance." That makes them eligible for reduced sentences under otherwise inflexible federal sentencing guidelines.

Informers are a necessary evil, says Cmdr. Maurita Bryant, a 29-year veteran of the Pittsburgh Police Department. "We have to deal with who we have to deal with. … If a dealer needs to make a deal, he'll tell on his mother. It may not be right, but it's all we have."

Some criminal informers who are allowed to remain free commit more crimes; some return to crime after a shortened prison sentence; some frame others, or tell prosecutors what they want to hear. Boston defense lawyer Harvey Silverglate says the system encourages defendants "not only to sing, but to compose."

DOJ_NMG_0023207

According to a study by the Northwestern University Law School's Center on Wrongful Convictions, 51 of the 111 wrongful death penalty convictions since the 1970s were based in whole or in part on the testimony of witnesses who had an incentive to lie.

Alexandra Natapoff, a professor at Loyola Law School in Los Angeles, says that, based on federal statistics, one of every four black men from 20 to 29 is behind bars, on probation or on parole, and under pressure to snitch. She estimates one in 12 of all black men in the highest-crime neighborhoods are snitching.

She says informers strain the social fabric of poor minority neighborhoods, where as many as half the young men have been arrested. "Every family gathering, every party, every backyard barbecue probably has someone who's secretly working as an informer."

This is the world Rayco Saunders inhabits. It's filled, as he puts it, with "guys doin' all this crime and not doin' no time, because they're telling on the next man."

Hence a backlash — "stop snitching." The slogan appeared in Baltimore about two years ago as the title of an underground DVD featuring threatening, gun-wielding drug dealers and a brief appearance by NBA star and Baltimore native Carmelo Anthony. Anthony, who later said he didn't know the video's theme, told ESPN The Magazine that the dealer-turned-informer excoriated in the DVD "ran our neighborhood. Now he's working with the state and the feds. You can't do that. He turned his back on the 'hood."

The black community is divided. Rapper Chuck D of Public Enemy has blasted the Stop Snitching campaign on the hip-hop group's website: "The term 'snitch' was best applied to those that ratted revolutionaries like Huey P. Newton, Bobby Seale, Che Guevara. … Let's not let stupid cats use hip-hop to again twist this meaning for the sake of some 'innerganghood' violent drug thug crime dogs, who've sacrificed the black community's women and children."

Whatever its intent, the Stop Snitching movement has galvanized officials already apoplectic about witness reluctance and witness intimidation.

States and localities spend a fraction of what the federal government devotes to witness protection, although this month Pennsylvania restored $1 million for that purpose. The move came as more than a half-dozen witnesses recanted earlier testimony in the trial of men accused in the Philadelphia street shooting death of a third-grade boy.

"If the word 'snitch' comes out of someone's mouth, I go insane," says Pellegrini, the Pittsburgh prosecutor. "When young men and women see rappers refuse (to cooperate), they think it's cool. How do we tell them, 'we'll support you,' when they see that?"

Especially, she says, when the slogan is blatantly used to intimidate witnesses. Last year, supporters of an accused drug dealer on trial in Pittsburgh federal court wore T-shirts around town bearing witnesses' photos and the inscription "Stop Snitching." U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan says one, Garry Smith, had a $100,000 price on his head.

"Everybody in law enforcement is beside themselves," says Kennedy of John Jay College. "They can't investigate cases. They can't prosecute cases. The clearance rate for some serious crimes is tanking."

Stop Snitching T-shirts have been banned from a number of courthouses. Boston Mayor Thomas Menino, whose city recorded the most homicides in a decade last year, threatened to send police into stores to pull them off the shelves.

Following the furor over the Stop Snitchin' DVD, Maryland raised witness intimidation from a misdemeanor to a felony, and Baltimore police made a tape of their own, Keep Talking. "People have to snitch," says Peter Moskos, a former Baltimore street cop. "That's how criminals get caught."

Saunders' life may have been saved by a snitch.

Pellegrini says an informer told police that an ex-con had hired another man to kill Saunders because the boxer was having an affair with his girlfriend. The man and his accomplices were arrested before the hit could be carried out. They were scheduled for a court hearing the day last fall that Saunders showed up in his Stop Snitching T-shirt.

Saunders and Pellegrini agree he was there to warn the men not to testify in other pending cases. But they disagree on why: Pellegrini says Saunders, whom she calls a "thug," is in cahoots with other criminals who feared the men's testimony. Saunders says he thought the defendants would try to save themselves by selling out others.

DOJ_NMG_0023208

Saunders says he hates snitching so much that he not only wears the T-shirts himself but has given them as gifts to friends and relatives. "They love the T- shirts," he says. "It's way overdue for somebody to step up and speak about these things that's going on with these informants and these guys walking around here with immunity to do whatever they want to do."

At 31, Saunders has had a hard life. He says he never knew his father; his mother died of a drug overdose when he was 11. He was stabbed in the back at 15, shot in the chest at 21. He says he shot at people himself and dealt drugs. He was arrested six times from 1994 to 1997 and served four years in prison after a shootout with a police officer. He says he was framed.

Since leaving prison, he has pursued a career as a pro boxer, compiling a record of 15-7-2. In 2004 he won the North American Boxing Council cruiserweight championship. In an interview at the gym where he trains, he outlines a stop-snitching creed:

•Don't snitch on others just to save yourself. "Stop snitching is for those guys out there … selling more drugs than Noriega, and their only out is to tell on somebody. … If a (criminal) wants to be a Good Samaritan, OK. But send (him) to jail. Don't give him immunity to do what he wants on the street."

•Stop Snitching doesn't mean stop talking to police. "It's always misconstrued by the public, or the powers that be, that we're trying to intimidate the regular people or the law-abiding citizens. That's not what it's about. … If that is your only outlet, to call the police, that's what you do."

•But witnesses have no obligation to help police. "Do your job — you're the police. … I've been wronged by the system. Do you think I would help the system? … Do cops snitch on other cops?"

•The authorities can't protect witnesses. "What's happening to the innocent witness? They get dead or … terrorized for life."

•Sometimes you must right wrongs yourself. "I'm a man, and I can handle my own situations like a man. … I've done dirt. I'll admit that. So I can't run to the police."

Later, he's out on the street, wearing one of the T-shirts. Standing nearby is a woman dressed as the Statue of Liberty to advertise the services of her employer, Liberty Income Tax.

"The people who are snitching, a lot of them end up dead, a lot of them end up hurt," says Lady Liberty — Ernestine Whitaker of Wilkinsburg, whose nephew was threatened after he witnessed a crime. "So the snitching doesn't do anything for the person who's snitching."

She looks at Saunders, whose muscular chest bulges beneath the T. "I'd wear one of those," she says.

As Scams Go, This Is A Gem (LAT)

By Jessica Garrison, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 29, 2006

There was no heist. The dealer simply handed $14 million worth of diamonds to a stranger, relying on a tradition of trust.

Those not in the diamond trade might find it hard to understand why Emile Chayto, a Geneva dealer with more than 40 years of experience, gave $14 million worth of gems to a stranger who claimed to be the wife of the deceased president of the Congo — before she had paid him one penny.

Unfortunately for Chayto, she was not the widow of Mobutu Sese Seko. And her wire transfer never arrived.

As it turned out, the handoff of the stones triggered a series of transactions — detailed in lawsuits in Los Angeles and Israel — illuminating a strange and glamorous trade in which millions of dollars' worth of merchandise crisscrosses the globe on the strength of spoken promises.

Since the Middle Ages, when it was one of the few areas of commerce open to them in Europe, the diamond business has been dominated by Jews, and even today, though traders from India are increasingly moving into the industry, deals around the world are sealed with the traditional Yiddish phrase mazel und brocha, which means "luck and a blessing."

Hebrew is spoken along Hill Street in Los Angeles, the country's second-largest diamond market after New York, where some of the parties involved with Chayto in the disputed trades have offices. Every day at lunchtime, deliverymen bearing kosher food pour into the downtown jewelry exchange, a glittering, bustling hive filled with tiny offices and storefronts.

DOJ_NMG_0023209

David Marcus, president of the West Coast Diamond Club, a guild that arbitrates disputes among dealers and has its offices on the 16th floor of the exchange, said he knew, or knew of, most of the parties named in the lawsuits but that he hadn't heard much talk about the dispute itself.

That did not surprise him, he added. It was easy to see why all parties involved — many of whom have excellent reputations in the diamond world — would not want to broadcast details of such a fight, especially in a business in which reputation counts for so much.

"Look, I make a deal for millions, and all I do is shake hands. I don't even give a check. I give my word," he said. "Cases like this are very rare," he added.

According to court papers, the intrigue began a year ago, in February 2005, when Chayto was contacted by Albert Shamash, a resident of Marbella, Spain, a seaside playground of the rich on the fabled Costa del Sol.

Shamash told Chayto that he was calling on behalf of a woman who said she was Mrs. Mobutu Sese Seko, the widow of the ex-president of Zaire, now known as the Democratic Republic of Congo. Shamash said she "had a collection of uncut diamonds that she wished to sell," according to court papers. The war-torn African state is known for its diamonds, and Mobutu was infamous for plundering his country's assets, so it was plausible that his widow might have quite a nice collection.

In April, Chayto accepted Shamash's invitation for an all-expenses-paid trip to Marbella, according to court papers.

No deal happened on that trip. In fact, Chayto didn't even meet the woman. But a few weeks later, Shamash called Chayto again and told him that the purported Mrs. Mobutu wanted to throw a huge party for Congolese leaders and hand out precious watches and jewelry as party favors.

Court filings provide no explanation why the woman would buy diamonds when she first appeared as a seller. Through his Los Angeles attorney, Chayto declined to comment.

But according to court papers, Chayto began putting together a collection of gems to offer for sale. Most were owned by other people, but that is not unusual in the diamond trade. One was a 23.8-carat diamond, which Chayto claimed in court papers was worth $1.8 million.

That stone belonged to a New York diamond dealer named Ishaia Gol. And there was a 16.62-carat diamond worth $900,000, owned by Chayto and another New York dealer. There was also a 43-carat Burmese sapphire, along with a ruby-and-diamond necklace, diamond-encrusted Harry Winston watches, Bulgari watches with emeralds and a long list of other gold, platinum and diamond jewelry, according to court papers.

A 23.8-carat diamond is big, but not among the largest diamonds in the world. The Hope Diamond, for example, is 45 carats. That stone, on display in the Smithsonian Institution in Washington, D.C., once belonged to King Louis XIV, and legend says it brings bad luck to its owners. Even bigger is the 530-carat Star of Africa, one of the British crown jewels.

With permission from the various owners around the world to negotiate a sale, Chayto delivered all the gems to Shamash in Marbella in May and June to show to the woman, according to court papers.

In June, Shamash told Chayto that she wanted to buy them all. She would pay him 12.2 million euros ($14 million) and a 2.8-million euro commission — totaling about $17.8 million at the current rate of exchange.

As payment, a man claiming to be an English lawyer named Eduardo Martin gave Chayto a bank transfer document allegedly showing that the money would arrive in Chayto's Geneva bank account on June 7, according to court papers.

But the money never arrived.

"I complained to Shamash that I had been defrauded," he said in a court affidavit. "Shamash assured me that the problem was related to the embargo on Mrs. Mobutu's funds imposed by the Congolese government. Shamash counseled me to wait."

Shamash also gave Chayto two personal checks totaling 12.2 million euros signed by his wife. The checks were post-dated to July 7, but Chayto accepted them anyway.

Several days later, the woman claiming to be Mrs. Mobutu summoned Chayto from Switzerland to a London hotel, where she had reserved "the royal suite," according to court papers.

The woman apologized to Chayto for the delay in payment. But she had good news: Her relations were improving with the new president of the Congo, and the money would be coming soon. And in the event it didn't, she said, she had 20 million euros stashed in Morocco.

DOJ_NMG_0023210

Chayto never got his money (the checks did not clear), nor did the other owners of the diamonds, according to court papers. Spanish police, meanwhile, say they are investigating a man named Shamash for theft of the diamonds and for other crimes.

But where were the stones? According to the court documents, they had entered the worldwide rapids of large-carat diamond trading.

"Traditionally, the diamond trade has been … a small group that operates in a circle of trust," said Russell Shor, a senior diamond industry analyst with the Gemological Institute of America. "Everybody knows somebody who knows somebody, so if you violate that trust, you become a pariah, and you can't make a living."

Across the globe, there are relatively few people who deal in large diamonds; Shor estimates maybe a few hundred. They buy and sell with stunning speed, making a small margin of profit on each deal.

"You keep your ear to the ground," Shor said. "You know who's got the goods. You go get them. You seize the moment."

That is exactly what Ouri Shifman did when he heard through his brother-in-law in Casablanca about some large diamonds for sale last spring, according to court papers.

Shifman, a dealer whose company has offices in Los Angeles, New York and Israel, flew to Marbella on May 26, a week before Chayto completed his deal with Shamash and the woman. In a later court paper, Shifman said he met there with a diamond broker named Ali, who claimed to be acting on behalf of the wife of "a very wealthy man from one of the Persian Gulf emirates." She wanted to sell a 23.8-carat diamond, among other jewels.

Shifman and a business associate went to a heavily guarded home in Marbella and looked at the stone. A third-generation diamond dealer, Shifman did not usually deal in large diamonds, so he approached an old friend from Los Angeles, Oved Anter, for help with financing.

By May 31, he and Anter had put together $900,000 for the 23.8-carat diamond, and Shifman had taken the diamond to Las Vegas to give to Anter. (Shifman said he eventually paid a total of $1.38 million for the diamond; the other side says it appears that he paid less, according to court papers.) Later, Shifman also bought two other diamonds and a sapphire that had been among the jewels Chayto had delivered to Shamash. Many of the others have disappeared, according to Chayto's attorneys.

Anter and Shifman sold part ownership in the 23.8-carat stone to a New York dealer. Within days, according to court papers, a representative of that dealer met one of Chayto's partners and, not knowing about the stone, tried to sell it to him. That's when the lawsuits started flying.

Chayto and his partners say Anter and Shifman ought to have known it was a shady deal.

They maintain that Anter and Shifman paid about $1 million less than market value for the diamonds, which should have tipped them that something wasn't right. But even without the low price, they say, the "convoluted story … would have put even an ordinary person on notice that the wealthy Arabian matron may not have had clear ownership of the jewels."

But as Shifman countered in his deposition, the diamond market is full of "brokers and middlemen, and the identity of the principal is often unknown." There was no way to he could have known he was part of a scam, he said.

Ali seemed to be well known in Marbella. He had a house. He knew lots of people. And all of the meetings took place in restaurants and cafes (where Ali insisted upon picking up the check).

"These transactions were not carried out in the shadows," Shifman said in his declaration. He added: "The last thing I could imagine was that when I arrived with the diamond in Las Vegas and proudly showed it … that several months later I would find myself being summoned to a police interrogation regarding the circumstances of how the diamond came to be in my possession."

Now the stones bought by Anter and Shifman, which last year jetted from New York to Geneva to Marbella to Las Vegas, back to New York, then to Israel and finally to Los Angeles, are grounded. Late last month, a Los Angeles judge issued an injunction forbidding Anter and his diamond company, First International Diamond Inc., from selling them while both sides fight it out.

Anter and Shifman say they paid for the diamonds fair and square and that the suits are tarnishing their reputations, built up over decades in the business.

"We bought goods in good faith," said Sam Wieder, Shifman's partner. "We are going to fight this all the way to end."

DOJ_NMG_0023211

Earlier this month, Anter countersued Chayto and his New York partners, accusing them of negligence in the sale to Shamash, resulting in Anter's and Shifman's being defrauded. That suit also accuses Chayto and Ishaia Gol of slandering Anter's and Shifman's names. It seeks punitive damages. Lawyers for Chayto and Gol deny the allegations.

As the court filings continue to pile up, there is at least one thing both sides agree on: They've never been involved in anything as unusual as this suit.

"I've been in the business 30 years. I've never had such a strange thing happen to me," Wieder said.

"Never in my life," agreed Gol, the New York diamond dealer whose 23.8-carat diamond is at the heart of the dispute.

Now, Gol said, it is up to the courts. "Somewhere, somehow, somebody will have to decide who is honest and who is not."

Times special correspondent Cristina Mateo-Yanguas in Madrid contributed to this report.

Mr. Rosenbaum At Howard (WP)

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

THE LAST 46 hours of New York Times reporter David E. Rosenbaum's life can be segmented into three stages: his robbery and beating on Gramercy Street NW; the response of the D.C. Fire and Emergency Medical Services Department (FEMS); and his treatment at Howard University Hospital, where he died from a massive head injury. Mr. Rosenbaum's alleged assailants are in custody and awaiting trial. Possible missteps by FEMS have been reported. Now, thanks to an in-depth investigation by the D.C. Health Department, we learn what happened to Mr. Rosenbaum after he arrived at the emergency room of Howard University Hospital on the night of Jan. 6. It is a distressing account of across-the-board failures.

The Health Department found that:

· "Once Mr. Rosenbaum was transported to the Emergency Dept., the triage nurse failed to properly assess, evaluate and manage his clinical presentation" as required by protocols and patient care standards. "The triage nurse also failed to perform a neurological assessment to determine Mr. Rosenbaum's level of consciousness and the possibility of a brain injury, based on the low GCS scorings [suggestive of a severe brain injury] obtained by the EMS unit while on the scene."

· "The evening charge nurse then failed to assess and evaluate Mr. Rosenbaum's condition prior to assigning him to the hallway. Furthermore, she failed to alert and specifically assign his care to one of the ED nurses overseeing patients in that hallway."

· "Mr. Rosenbaum was . . . left unattended in the hallway for approximately one hour and 20 minutes after his arrival to the ED . . . after which time he was discovered to have a life-threatening brain injury which required emergency neurosurgical intervention."

· "There was no documented evidence that Mr. Rosenbaum's initial evaluation by the physician included a comprehensive head-to-toe assessment . . . that would have revealed any trauma to his head. . . . Concurrently, there was no evidence that [his] initial level of consciousness (documented as lethargy), along with his limited response to painful stimuli, was investigated by the physician to determine a possible cause."

The Health Department has notified Howard of several deficiencies in its patient treatment and has demanded an "acceptable plan of corrective action," D.C. Health Director Gregg A. Pane said yesterday. The Health Department has also notified the federal Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services of its findings and is weighing other options for holding the hospital accountable.

And to think: Howard University is asking that the city spend $200 million and that the federal government guarantee an additional $200 million so the university and the city can build a $400 million medical complex that Howard medical professionals will control and operate.

CIVIL LAW:

Big Tobacco Gets Favorable Ruling (WSJ)

By Vanessa O'Connell

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

An independent arbitrator ruled that the nation's big cigarette makers lost market share as a result of their 1998 legal settlement with 46 states.

The ruling increases the likelihood that Marlboro maker Philip Morris USA and its rivals will be able to cut $1.2 billion from the payment they owe the states next month, and possibly see similar reductions in future years.

The payment issue stems from a settlement reached eight years ago requiring Altria Group Inc.'s Philip Morris, Reynolds American Inc.'s RJR and Loews Corp.'s Lorillard to reimburse the states annually for the costs of caring for sick smokers. Each year's payment is calculated based on the previous year's cigarette-sales volume. So far, cigarette makers have paid the states $41.6 billion; another $6.5 billion is due April 17.

The latest ruling could usher in a new era of confrontation between major cigarette makers, which lately have benefited from a string of courtroom victories, and the states, which have grown increasingly dependent on annual tobacco-company payments to cover budget shortfalls.

The companies say the settlement allows them to cut their payments if their market share drops below certain thresholds. The companies say they hit that threshold in 2003: Their collective market share dropped to 92% from 99.6% in 1997 -- the year before the settlement -- amid gains by makers of bargain-priced generic cigarettes that have sprung up since 1998.

The states, however, claim the big cigarette makers lost share not because of the legal settlement, but because of outsize price increases.

Economist Daniel McFadden of the University of California at Berkeley, an independent analyst who served as an arbitrator in the dispute, affirmed his earlier ruling in favor of the companies. He found that the burdens of the settlement itself were a "significant factor" in causing the market-share losses.

No. 2 cigarette maker Reynolds, which sells Winston and Salem cigarettes, stands to gain the biggest sum -- roughly $567 million -- because it suffered the steepest loss in market share. The No. 1 maker, Philip Morris, of Richmond, Va., would be entitled to about $386 million, according to estimates by the settlement's designated auditor.

A loss of revenue is sure to hurt cash-strapped states that are counting on the tobacco billions to help fund health-care programs or pay other expenses.

The National Association of Attorneys General said yesterday that the states are negotiating with the tobacco companies to get the full payment and expect those negotiations to be successful. The states warn that, if necessary, they will sue the companies to get the full payment.

The dispute is likely to be closely followed by the bond markets. Many states and other municipalities have floated special bonds secured by the flow of future settlement payments by cigarette makers.

Negotiation On Tobacco Payment (NYT)

By Michael Janofsky

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 28 — Negotiations are under way between the states and the nation's largest tobacco companies over more than $1 billion of a payment the companies are legally bound to make to the states by mid-April.

The dispute arises out of a binding determination by an independent consultant made public on Tuesday that the $246 billion Master Settlement Agreement of 1998, which ended lawsuits against the companies over the health care costs of smoking, was a "significant factor" in the companies' loss of market share. From 1997 to 2003, smoking in the United States fell by 21 percent.

The 1998 agreement, which included major restrictions on cigarette marketing, listed three conditions that would reduce the amount companies had to pay. The consultants agreed that the first two had been met: the companies' market share fell more than 2 percent, and the settlement agreement played a major role in the decline.

But the companies are arguing that the states did not "diligently enforce" statutes that require companies not participating in the agreement to create escrow accounts to cover losses in any future litigation that might involve them, the third condition to win a reduction. The smaller companies generally sell discount cigarettes.

DOJ_NMG_0023213

The big companies say they are entitled to a reduction of $1.2 billion of the $6.5 billion they are scheduled to pay as the next installment of the settlement, which is due the states on April 17.

"We believe the states have diligently enforced their statutes," said Tom Miller, the Iowa attorney general and co-chairman of the National Association of Attorneys General tobacco committee.

"We are negotiating with the companies to make sure they pay the full amount," Mr. Miller said.

A spokeswoman for Philip Morris, the nation's largest tobacco company, said the company would have no comment on the negotiations. The next-largest company, Reynolds American, did not respond to a message seeking comment.

The Dim Halls Of Government Need More Sunlight (HILL)

By John F. Sturm

The Hill, March 29, 2006

Since 1966, the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) has been the public's principal means of looking into the workings of government, but over the years FOIA requests filed by the public and the news media increasingly have been rejected or mysteriously delayed.

This is why the Newspaper Association of America and others have formed the Sunshine in Government Initiative, a coalition of media groups committed to promoting policies that ensure the government is accessible, accountable and open.

Many members of Congress are looking closely at reforming and improving FOIA. Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas), Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) and Rep. Lamar Smith (R-Texas) have introduced the Openness Promotes Effectiveness in Our National (OPEN) Government Act of 2005 (S. 394 and H.R. 867) to provide meaningful FOIA reform and accountability, legislation that the coalition supports. Rep. Todd Platts (R-Pa.), chairman of the House Government Reform Subcommittee on Government Management, Finance and Accountability, also held a constructive hearing on this issue.

In an attempt to strengthen FOIA, the White House issued an executive order just before Christmas. But the order fails to address important issues that are covered by the proposed legislation.

Here are a few ways that the executive order doesn't measure up to true legislative reform such as OPEN.

• Lack of realistic alternatives to litigation. If a FOIA request is denied, often the only option available to the requester is litigation in federal court, meaning most individuals and small organizations have no realistic means of appeal. OPEN mandates creation of an office to serve as an ombudsman, offering mediation services. The executive order offers no specific ways to handle complaints.

• Requests are difficult to track. A common complaint among requesters is that they are unable to obtain information on the status of their requests. OPEN requires each agency to establish an individualized tracking-number system, and it must establish ways to track requests by phone or Internet. The executive order advises agencies to consider creating a tracking system.

• Attorneys' fees are too difficult to recover. The cost of fighting a denial of a FOIA request in federal court is expensive. FOIA allows for the recovery of legal fees only when a requester wins in court.

Often, an agency will wait until a court decision against it seems imminent and only then grant or settle the FOIA request. But that denies requesters any recovery of legal fees. Thus requesters, especially those with limited resources, are dissuaded from filing suit.

OPEN closes that loophole, allowing recovery of fees if the requester's court pursuit was the "catalyst" for the agency's granting the FOIA request. This discourages agencies from drawing out unnecessary litigation. The executive order fails to address the problem.

• No penalties for delaying requests. Agencies have no disincentives to drag their feet. As a result, some requests remain unprocessed for months, even years.

OPEN creates meaningful penalties for failing to comply with the current law's 20-day time limit on responding to FOIA requests. The executive order sets no firm time limits and imposes no penalties.

• Not even a slap on the wrist. Current law allows for disciplinary actions against officials who act arbitrarily or capriciously in denying FOIA requests. But in the 40-year history of the law, no one has ever been formally disciplined.

DOJ_NMG_0023214

OPEN requires the attorney general to notify Congress of any finding of arbitrary withholding. The executive order does not specifically address the issue of bad-faith denials.

• No agency oversight or enforcement. Though technically in charge of enforcing FOIA, the Department of Justice lacks the oversight necessary to correct problems or to enforce FOIA provisions properly. OPEN creates an ombudsman function to help mediate disputes between requesters and agencies and to review agency policy and procedures. The executive order relies on self-reporting, with no enforcement.

• Records frequently exempted without notice. Congress can exempt specific records from FOIA by statute, but that exemption often appears as a single paragraph buried in a bill hundreds of pages long, allowing it to be passed without debate and public notice. OPEN requires all proposed exemptions to be stated explicitly so that they can be openly scrutinized. The executive order is silent on exemptions.

The darkness of unwarranted secrecy can hide and encourage misdeeds, and breed discontent. Conversely, as Justice Louis Brandeis said, "Sunlight is the best of disinfectants." Let's reform FOIA and open the darkened files of government.

Sturm is president and CEO of the Newspaper Association of America. The association is a member of the Sunshine in Government Initiative (www.sunshineingovernment.com).

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Pizza Hut Franchisee To Make Restaurants Accessible To Disabled (AP)

By Sam Hananel

AP, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON - The nation's largest Pizza Hut franchisee has agreed to renovate hundreds of restaurants to settle claims they are inaccessible to the disabled, the Justice Department announced Tuesday.

NPC International Inc., which has executive offices in Lenexa, Kan., and its restaurant services center in Pittsburg, Kan., reached the settlement to resolve alleged violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act.

The agreement requires restaurants to repair parking lots, seating areas, bathrooms and self-service counters to bring them into compliance.

The company, which operates about 800 restaurants in 25 states, did not admit any violations of federal law and reached the settlement to avoid potential litigation, according to a copy of the settlement agreement.

"Too often, the ease and enjoyment of restaurant dining is not a reality for individuals with disabilities," said Wan J. Kim, assistant attorney general for the department's Civil Rights Division. "I commend NPC for their commitment to take the steps necessary to make its Pizza Hut restaurants accessible."

Under the settlement, NPC must alter or remodel all the Pizza Hut restaurants it owns to make them comply with the ADA and train all its employees and store managers on how to operate under the law.

NPC must also work with landlords at the 180 delivery and carryout restaurants it does not own to ensure they are accessible to disabled patrons.

The Justice Department discovered the violations during a compliance review prompted by complaints from private citizens in the Midwest, department spokesman Eric Holland said.

All improvements must be completed during a timetable that spans the next four years.

Earlier this month, NPC was sold to the private equity arm of Merrill Lynch & Co. Pizza Hut Inc. is a unit of Yum Brands Inc.

ON THE NET

http://www.npcinternational.com

Extension Of Voting Act Is Likely Despite Criticism (NYT)

By Rick Lyman

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0023215

ATLANTA, March 27 — Representative Lynn Westmoreland, a former builder who represents a jigsaw of predominantly white areas just south and west of Atlanta, acknowledges that the 1965 Voting Rights Act, a cornerstone achievement of the civil rights movement, was necessary in its day to register blacks and overturn decades of laws preventing them from voting.

But times have changed, Mr. Westmoreland said.

"It was set up to be temporary, just to get things to where they should be," he said. "And if you look at the results we have here in Georgia, I think you can see that it's worked. Its time has passed."

Mr. Westmoreland is one of many conservative Republicans who have serious problems with the law. Yet, even though his party controls the White House and Congress, the law seems in little danger of expiring. A multiyear campaign by civil rights leaders to reauthorize the act, parts of which expire in August 2007, appears to be on the verge of success.

Liberal supporters and conservative opponents say they expect it to be reauthorized and, probably, even strengthened in coming weeks, well ahead of the deadline.

"The Republicans know that if they question the wisdom of reauthorization the Democrats will relentlessly demagogue them on the issue," said Roger Clegg, president of the Center for Equal Opportunity, which opposes reauthorization. "They'll be called racist and accused of wanting to turn back the clock on civil rights. The Republicans would really like to have this off the table."

The Voting Rights Act, a follow-up to the Civil Rights Act of 1964, was intended to break down barriers that had kept blacks from registering to vote, mostly in the Deep South. It prohibits officials from disenfranchising blacks through gerrymandering or vote rigging.

Partly by outlawing poll taxes, literacy tests and other laws intended to keep minorities off the rolls, the act had an immediate effect on the numbers of blacks registered in the South. A Census report in 1982, the last time the law was reauthorized, found that the number of registered blacks in Mississippi had grown to 175,000 in 1966 from 22,000 in 1960. Similar increases occurred in Alabama, South Carolina and other Southern states.

More gradually, but as a direct result, the larger numbers of black voters produced a steady increase in elected minority candidates in the South and nationally.

Before the act, civil rights organizations estimate, there were fewer than 300 black elected officials in the United States, with virtually none in the South, said Daniel Levitas, who works with the Voting Rights Project of the American Civil Liberties Union in Georgia. The Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies in Washington found 1,469 black elected officials by 1970 and more than 9,500 today.

Representative John Lewis, a former Freedom Rider who was beaten in the march in Selma, Ala., that helped lead to the act, said the people who felt that the law had outlived its usefulness failed to understand what it had done and what it needed to do. Mr. Lewis's district, the Fifth Congressional, encompassing much of urban Atlanta, would look quite different had there been no act, he said, and he is certain that someone besides himself would have represented it for the last 20 years.

"Hundreds of thousands of people across America would still have been denied the right to vote," Mr. Lewis, a liberal Democrat, said. "So it's become almost like apple pie, really. This act has become like America."

President Bush has said he supports reauthorization, without specifying what changes in the law he might entertain.

The Republican Congressional leadership has shown little interest in battling to overturn it, despite many conservatives' concerns that the act has led to unconstitutional redistricting based on race. A bipartisan bill to renew the law is expected to arrive at the House Judiciary Committee in the next week or two.

The bill is also likely to include language intended to address Supreme Court decisions that many supporters say have weakened the act.

In a case involving a school board in Bossier Parish, La., the Supreme Court ruled in 1999 that even though officials had openly described their plan to change voting districts as intended to keep blacks off the board, the Voting Rights Act was not violated because the outcome did not make matters worse for blacks.

"There were zero black school board members before and zero afterward, so it hadn't been made worse," Laughlin McDonald, director of the Voting Rights Project, said. "That was clearly not Congress's intention when the act was passed in 1965, and I expect we will see language in this bill that makes this clear and overturns the Bossier decision."

DOJ_NMG_0023216

If the bill, as anticipated, emerges unscathed from the committee, it is expected to hit the House floor in the spring or early summer, where it will face opposition from some members like Mr. Westmoreland, who intend to submit amendments that the act's supporters say would weaken it or render it unconstitutional.

Many provisions are permanent. But some, including some of the most contentious, are temporary and have required subsequent Congressional votes to remain.

Congress reauthorized the act for five more years in 1970 and for seven years in 1975. In 1982, with President Ronald Reagan's support, it was reauthorized for 25 years.

Of the sections that require reauthorization, the two that have drawn the most attention are Section 5, which requires some jurisdictions to apply to the Justice Department before changing voting laws, and Section 203, which requires jurisdictions with high numbers of foreign-speaking voters to provide multilingual help at polls.

The "preclearance" in Section 5 has drawn the most complaints, especially from Southerners who feel that their region has made substantial progress since 1965 and no longer needs to be singled out.

Advocates of the act point out that although most of the covered jurisdictions are in the South, others are not, including New York City.

Mr. Westmoreland said he intended to propose an amendment to the reauthorization bill that would make preclearance nationwide. Rather than singling out places, like Georgia, it would require every jurisdiction to apply to the federal government to change its voting laws.

He said he was also likely to introduce an amendment that would make it easier for jurisdictions to leave the preclearance list, another move opposed by advocates of the act. Other congressmen are expected to offer amendments to dilute the foreign-language requirements of Section 203.

But at the moment it appears unlikely that any of his proposals will attract the necessary support, Mr. Westmoreland said, adding, "I'm afraid what's going to happen is this is going to be one of those middle-of-the-night deals where you're voting on it before you know it."

Blacks Losing Ground Financially, Study Finds (USAT)

By Larry Copeland

USA Today, March 29, 2006

Despite a rebounding economy, African-Americans are not making progress in achieving income, net worth, employment and homeownership levels equal to those of whites, according to a National Urban League report to be released today.

Blacks have just 56% of the economic status of whites, a slip of 1 percentage point from last year, according to the civil rights organization's annual “The State of Black America” report.

“The economic status of African-Americans is getting worse,” Urban League President Marc Morial says. “If things are stagnant in a growing economy … then we've got to say that progress is seriously lacking. … America is not America when millions of our citizens are still viewed as a fraction of a person.”

The sharpest economic disparity between black and whites is in median net worth, according to the report, which compiles data from many government sources, including the Census Bureau and the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

The median net worth for African-American families — half have more, half less — is less than one-tenth of the median for white families. That gap is driven largely by differences in homeownership. More than 70% of white families own their homes, compared with about 50% of blacks, the report says.

The unemployment rate for blacks is 10%, compared with 4.4% for whites. One promising finding in the report: The rate of black-owned businesses compared with white-owned ones is growing.

Morial, a former mayor of New Orleans, notes that this year's findings come in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, which he says exposed race and class gaps.

The report offers proposals for improving the economic conditions of blacks in four areas: homeownership, jobs, economic development and children's education and health. Morial says the proposals will be presented next year to 2008 presidential candidates.

DOJ_NMG_0023217

Black America's search for answers should begin “right in the mirror,” says Ronald Mincy, a professor of social policy and social work practice at Columbia University in New York City and author of the 2006 book Black Males Left Behind.

“A big part of it is us,” he says. “This is not to say there isn't racism. I'm not crazy. But we do need to look at these disparities and try to identify what are the sources.”

Much of the net worth disparity can be accounted for by the fact that many African-American households are headed by single parents, says Mincy, a visiting fellow at the Urban Institute, an economic and social policy research group in Washington.

ANTITRUST:

Lawmakers Voice Concerns Over McClatchy's Deal (MINNST)

Minneapolis Star Tribune, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON - Two Minnesota congressmen on Tuesday called for an antitrust review of Knight Ridder's sale to the McClatchy Co., saying they are "deeply concerned about the impact the proposed sale could have on our constituents."

Republican Mark Kennedy and Democrat Jim Oberstar released a letter they wrote to Thomas Barnett, assistant attorney general for antitrust at the Justice Department.

"This sale, should it go forward, would place in one company's hands the ownership of the two largest newspapers in our state," the letter said.

The letter made no mention of McClatchy's intent to sell the St. Paul Pioneer Press and 11 other Knight Ridder papers. McClatchy officials said when the deal was announced March 13 that they would divest those papers, with antitrust concerns specifically cited regarding the St. Paul paper.

But Kennedy said McClatchy's planned sale of the Pioneer Press doesn't allay his concerns.

"I'm pleased that McClatchy agrees with us that they shouldn't continue to own the Pioneer Press," he said.

"But being able to choose your rival and have that be a factor in the equation ... I would prefer that McClatchy just not buy those [12] papers, and make Knight Ridder sell them independently themselves."

McClatchy said Tuesday in a prepared statement that the company has "made clear from the earliest stages of our agreement to acquire Knight Ridder that we intend to sell the St. Paul Pioneer Press to avoid any concern about antitrust issues. We have already made appropriate filings with the U.S. Department of Justice and are confident that our plans to sell the paper will go forward smoothly."

Mary Kerr, a spokeswoman for Oberstar, said Kennedy's office is driving the effort to seek the antitrust review.

"For us, it's really just a concern about media consolidation," Kerr said. "We're concerned about the smaller papers."

A Justice Department spokeswoman said the department "will review the transaction carefully" as a matter of course.

Kennedy, Oberstar Call For Review Of Knight Ridder Sale (AP)

By Frederic J. Frommer

AP, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON - Minnesota Reps. Mark Kennedy and Jim Oberstar on Tuesday urged the Justice Department to review McClatchy Co.'s takeover of Knight Ridder Inc., expressing concerns about the impact of the sale on the Twin Cities.

Although McClatchy kicked off an auction Tuesday by accepting bids for the St. Paul Pioneer Press and 11 other newspapers it is selling, the lawmakers still expressed concern about McClatchy's ownership of the two largest newspapers in the state. McClatchy owns the Star Tribune of Minneapolis.

"We are concerned about the potential grave consequences such a dramatic consolidation could have on the people of Minnesota," wrote Kennedy, a Republican, and Oberstar, a Democrat, in a letter to Thomas Barnett, the assistant attorney general for antitrust.

"A monopoly in the newspaper industry is certainly no less dangerous, and is perhaps more so, than in any other American industry."

DOJ_NMG_0023218

In a telephone interview, Kennedy said he didn't think the upcoming sale of the Pioneer Press made the issue moot, noting that McClatchy will still decide on the next owner of the Pioneer Press.

"Would people be comfortable if I said, 'Well, I'm going to make sure I have a Democrat opponent in the upcoming race, but I'm going to choose that Democrat?'" asked Kennedy, who is running for Senate.

"There's an inherent conflict of interest here. When they're calculating the benefit of selling a paper, they get a benefit if they sell to somebody who's going to do less with it, rather than if they sell it to somebody who will really energize the Pioneer Press and make it a really vibrant competitor."

He said McClatchy should have left the Pioneer Press out of the sale altogether, and let Knight Ridder sell it separately.

Oberstar spokeswoman Mary Kerr said Oberstar signed on to the letter out of concern about the dangers of media consolidation.

Knight Ridder spokesman Polk Laffoon said McClatchy is filing for a Justice Department antitrust review.

McClatchy spokeswoman Christina Stenson confirmed the filing was submitted. Stenson also said, "We don't anticipate any antitrust issues." She declined to comment on Kennedy's concerns.

The Justice Department is planning to review the sale of Knight Ridder to McClatchy; newspaper analyst John Morton said the department looks at all big transactions like this one.

"But I don't see any big problems because McClatchy has already announced before they close the transaction, they intend to sell the St. Paul newspaper," which is the only one that presents a conflict with a McClatchy paper, he said.

Morton dismissed the possibility that McClatchy would deliberately sell the Pioneer Press to a weak owner.

"McClatchy will sell to the highest bidder," he said.

Sacramento, Calif-based McClatchy is retaining 20 other papers included in the Knight Ridder deal.

Coherent Inc: DOJ Requested Added Info On Excel Deal (DOW)

Dow Jones, March 29, 2006

Coherent Inc. (COHR) (COHR) after Tuesday's closing bell said the Department of Justice's antitrust division has requested more information and documentary material in connection with its review of Coherent's proposed $376 million acquisition of Excel Technology Inc. (XLTC) (XLTC).

The request, to which Coherent plans to promptly respond, extends the waiting period under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act of 1976.

-Ruth Mantell; 415-439-6456; AskNewswires@dowjones.com

In Patent Case, EBay Tries To Fight Its Way Out Of Paper Bag (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin And Mylene Mangalindan

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

What do 19th-century paper bags have in common with the 21st century's most successful Internet auction site?

Patent problems and the U.S. Supreme Court.

More than a century ago, in a patent case involving a machine to fold paper bags, the Supreme Court ruled that infringement of a patent could result in an injunction against a company using the invention -- even if the patent holder didn't use it. "Patents are property, and entitled to the same rights and sanctions as other property," Justice Joseph McKenna wrote for the court.

Today, eBay Inc. will ask the Supreme Court to revisit that decision. While patents may be property, the San Jose, Calif., Internet auctioneer argues, Congress never intended to give patent holders who don't use their inventions nearly insurmountable leverage over companies later found to infringe.

Although eBay disputed the validity of the patents central to the case, the issue isn't whether the patent holder is entitled to a court-ordered remedy, but whether that remedy extends beyond the payment of royalties and penalties to an injunction.

EBay says that even a loss in the high court won't affect its business, arguing that it has made changes to the site that no longer touch on the patent in question.

DOJ_NMG_0023219

But a ruling could have big implications for the patent world and the disputes around them, as evidenced by the bevy of friend-of-the-court briefs on both sides of the case.

Time Warner Inc., Nokia Corp. and Yahoo Inc. sided with eBay. But General Electric Co., 3M Co., and Procter & Gamble Co., along with the Bush administration, lined up with the patent holder. Each side says a ruling contrary to its preferred side could stifle innovation.

The eBay case was brought over the auctioneer's "Buy It Now" feature, a button on the auction site that lets buyers who don't choose to bid immediately purchase an item at a higher, fixed price. Introduced during the 2000 holiday shopping season, it quickly became popular with eBay customers who simply had to have a certain product.

In 2001, eBay was sued by MercExchange LLC, Great Falls, Va., a company started by engineer and patent attorney Thomas Woolston in 1995, shortly before eBay first went online. According to court papers, Mr. Woolston lacked the capital to launch the business himself but entered negotiations with eBay hoping for an arrangement where he could turn MercExchange from an idea into reality. EBay was only willing to consider buying MercExchange's patents, and those negotiations fell through.

Mr. Woolston prevailed on some infringement claims and won $29.5 million in damages. But the trial judge, Jerome Friedman of U.S. District Court in Norfolk, Va., refused to grant an injunction prohibiting eBay from using the business method underlying the Buy It Now feature.

But the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, the specialized court in Washington that hears patent appeals, said last year that an injunction should have been imposed. The appeals court said Judge Friedman had applied too high a standard for MercExchange to win an injunction. Among other reasons, "a general concern regarding business-method patents ... is not the type of important public need that justifies the unusual step of denying injunctive relief," Judge William Bryson wrote for a unanimous three-member panel.

Some technology companies siding with eBay, such as chip giant Intel Corp., want to see more judges use their discretion to withhold injunctions -- particularly in cases where a single patent could be used to block sales of a product like a computer chip containing thousands of patented inventions. David Simon, Intel's chief patent counsel, says it stopped counting the number of Intel patents covering its microprocessors when the number reached 1,500. "Now you have this person with one patent, and he can shut it down," Mr. Simon says. "It doesn't seem quite equitable."

Rembrandt IP Management, a Bala Cynwyd, Pa., company that invests in patents, opposed eBay in its supporting brief. Rembrandt said that entities such as itself play a "valuable role" in a free-enterprise system where property rights including intellectual property can be "freely tradable." They "allow inventors to concentrate on inventing while the [non-practicing entity] realizes the value of the patent through licensing and enforcement," Rembrandt said.

EBay acknowledges that injunctions are allowed under the Patent Act, as exemplified in the patent dispute that ended earlier this month when Research in Motion Ltd. of Waterloo, Ontario, agreed to pay $612.5 million in a settlement with Virginia-based patent holding company NTP Inc. or face an injunction that could have shut down RIM's BlackBerry email devices.

In the eBay case, underpinning MercExchange's argument was the century-old paper-bag case. The patent holder, Eastern Paper Bag Co., never used the invention, but rival Continental Paper Bag Co. was found to have done so, aiding a burgeoning retail industry that increasingly relied on providing customers easy ways to carry their purchases home.

The high court found no problem in denying society access to more efficiently produced self-opening paper bags. Justice McKenna wrote that the right to suppress use of one's invention was "the very essence of the right conferred by the patent, as it is the privilege of any owner of property to use it or not use it, without question of motive."

In its present day appeal over U.S. Patent No. 5,845,265, eBay argues that Continental Bag doesn't support the broad presumption for injunctions as applied by the Federal Circuit -- and if it does, then the 1908 case should be overruled.

The number of patents has grown tenfold, and "the relevant economic contexts have changed dramatically since Continental Bag was decided," eBay's brief argues. "As goods and services in our economy have become increasingly complex and technology has advanced, a patent holder's ability to leverage and abuse an automatic entitlement to an injunction has increased," the company argues.

MercExchange argues that reversing the Federal Circuit would impose a greater drag on innovation, diminishing the value of patents by effectively forcing inventors to license their discoveries to infringing rivals. "There is no good reason for this court to depart from Continental Paper Bag or the almost 100 years of precedent that followed it," its brief says. "Congress has chosen to 'promote progress' not by imposing a use requirement but by granting patent holders a statutory 'right to exclude' in return for disclosure of an invention." That injunctions give patent holders, even nonpracticing ones, leverage is precisely the point, MercExchange argues.

DOJ_NMG_0023220

EBay, meanwhile, has pursued a dual strategy in this case, which received a significant lift last Friday. Under a re-examination of MercExchange's '265 patent, the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office rejected MercExchange's claims. It is the second time that the U.S. Patent office has rejected MercExchange's patent claims under re-examination.

Justices To Hear EBay Patent Challenge (WT)

By Tom Ramstack

The Washington Times, March 29, 2006

The U.S. Supreme Court is scheduled to hear arguments today in a case involving Internet auctioneer EBay Inc. that is testing the methods patent owners use to protect their inventions.

The small Internet commerce company MercExchange LLC is trying to enforce an injunction against EBay to prevent the billion-dollar company from using the "Buy it now" software that lets customers purchase fixed-price items over the Internet. MercExchange says it owns the rights to that software under two patents.

The Supreme Court has agreed to decide the extent to which court orders can be used to protect patent rights. Injunctions are a fundamental tool of the patent system, allowing inventors to stop others from copying their technology.

Large companies like EBay say they sometimes are forced to pay off people who hold questionable patents merely to avoid the time and expense of lawsuits. They refer to the people and small companies that sue them seeking settlements as "patent trolls."

"They are in the business of filing lawsuits, not of inventing new products," said a coalition of technology companies led by the Business Software Alliance.

"Patent litigation firms typically do not assert infringement claims until the target of the claim has brought a product to market or a standard has been finalized by a standard-setting organization," the group said in a legal brief filed in support of EBay. "The reason for this behavior is simple: It maximizes the value of the infringement claim."

Unnecessary patent litigation inhibits innovation and development of new products, the business coalition said.

Companies that sue for infringement and independent inventors say they are merely protecting their patent rights, which they say are essential to private enterprise.

A brief filed by an independent inventors group countered that large corporations want courts to protect intellectual property rights "only for themselves and companies like theirs."

Patent experts say the case could play a pivotal role in determining how U.S. courts handle intellectual property rights.

"Injunctions are important to the private property system," said John Dudas, administrator of the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office, who spoke to students at Fort Hunt Elementary School in Alexandria yesterday.

The Bush administration filed a brief that largely supports an injunction in favor of MercExchange, saying that maintaining the integrity of the patent system should take precedence over the convenience of parties with a stake in the case.

Mr. Dudas said a problem with patent litigation is determining whether patent owners are merely seeking easy money or valid protection of their rights.

"It's hard to distinguish that," he said.

Even patent lawyers agree that the expense of litigation can be excessive.

Legal expenses for patent lawsuits can sometimes reach $100,000 per month, said Fred H. Perkins, a patent lawyer with Morrison Cohen LLP. Some of his clients give up rather than pay the legal bills.

Mr. Perkins described lawsuits by patent litigation firms as "a serious problem."

The EBay appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court case follows a recent court battle involving McLean-based patent holder NTP Inc., which sought an injunction against Research In Motion Ltd. from selling its popular BlackBerry wireless e-mail devices.

DOJ_NMG_0023221

Research in Motion settled the case for $612.5 million after a judge made it known that he would grant an injunction to NTP.

EBay is contesting a decision by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit that upheld an injunction requested by MercExchange. EBay says federal judges should have more discretion to deny injunctions and award money to patent holders instead.

The Supreme Court is expected to issue a ruling in the EBay case later this year.

EU Warns Microsoft Over Vista (WSJ)

By Mary Jacoby

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

BRUSSELS -- The European Union's top antitrust regulator has sent a letter to Microsoft Corp., warning the company that it won't be allowed to sell its new Windows Vista operating system in Europe if it comes prepackaged with certain features.

"We expect that Microsoft will design Vista in a way which is in line with the European competition laws," Neelie Kroes, the EU's antitrust commissioner, said in an interview. "It would be rather stupid to design something that is not."

Ms. Kroes said she sent Microsoft Chief Executive Steve Ballmer a letter last week outlining her concerns, which mirror those in a continuing, seven-year-long dispute between the EU and Microsoft over software packaged with its current Windows operating system.

Microsoft spokesman Tom Brookes said the company wasn't aware of the March 20 letter and was therefore unable to comment on the EU's specific concerns. "However, consumers are demanding a more secure, functional operating system. And Microsoft has developed Vista to respond to that demand, while respecting its legal responsibilities," said Mr. Brookes.

The EU notice follows Microsoft's announcement last week that it would delay release of Vista until January because it needs more time to test the software.

Ms. Kroes's spokesman, Jonathan Todd, said that the EU is concerned about Microsoft's plans for Internet search. Though Mr. Todd didn't elaborate, Google Inc. and other Internet-search services have said they are concerned that Microsoft could use its Internet Explorer 7 Web browser to unfairly direct computer users to Microsoft's own search service. Microsoft says it will include ways to set the browser to its competitors' services.

EU regulators have also warned Microsoft against putting certain software-security functions into the Vista system, according to Mr. Todd.

Symantec Corp., a Cupertino, Calif., maker of antivirus software, has told EU regulators it is worried that Microsoft could include antivirus software in Vista, making it automatically available to all users who boot up a new Vista-powered PC. That would put Symantec's products at a disadvantage, the company has said.

Microsoft says it has no plans to bundle antivirus software into Vista. But the company will include a tool called Windows Defender in the new operating system, which is designed to eliminate so-called spy-ware that secretly monitors activity by computer users or can use computers to perform malevolent tasks.

In February a group of rivals including International Business Machines Inc., Sun Microsystems Inc. and Oracle Corp., filed a formal complaint asking EU regulators to ensure Microsoft doesn't fold a variety of other functions into Vista.

Among the group's concerns: that the company could fold so-called digital rights management software into Vista, according to people familiar with the complaint. Such software allows users to restrict access to documents they have created. Microsoft's version would encode documents, PowerPoint presentations and spreadsheets so they could be opened only by other Microsoft users, according to these people. That could put companies like Sun at a disadvantage.

Beginning tomorrow, the European Commission, the EU's executive arm, will hold closed-door administrative hearings to decide whether Microsoft has complied with certain aspects of a March 2004 antitrust order.

In that 2004 decision, the EU fined Microsoft about $600 million, and ordered it to sell in Europe a version of its Windows XP computer operating system without its audio-visual software attached. The EU also ordered the Redmond, Wash., software maker to produce a kind of instruction manual for rival companies trying to write software that meshes with Windows.

DOJ_NMG_0023222

The commission has accused Microsoft of not complying with the order to write the how-to manual for its competitors. After hearings tomorrow and Friday, it could decide to fine the company $100 million or more in new penalties. In April, an EU court in Luxembourg is scheduled to hear Microsoft's appeal of the underlying March 2004 charges.

In the interview, Ms. Kroes said she hadn't decided yet whether to open a new, formal investigation of Microsoft and the Vista system.

Microsoft Cuts Internet Dial-Up Price To Lure AOL Users (WP)

By Sara Kehaulani Goo

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

Microsoft Corp.'s MSN made an aggressive bid yesterday to take dial-up Internet subscribers from America Online Inc., announcing that it would cut the price of a service that has been dwindling in popularity.

Microsoft's price cut, to $17.95 a month from $21.95 for a dial-up service that includes e-mail, parental monitoring and photo services, is a sharp departure from AOL's strategy of pushing dial-up customers to switch to broadband. Last month, Dulles-based AOL announced that it would increase the monthly fee it charges its dial-up subscribers by $2, to $25.90. The AOL price increase began taking effect earlier this month.

The long-term market for subscribers who log on to the Internet the old-fashioned way is not bright, as consumers switch to faster broadband service. The price war reflects the fierce competition for consumers among online portals that want to serve as users' home pages.

"We definitely think there's some opportunity for AOL dial-up subscribers to explore alternatives when they see a price increase," said Kevin Mizuhara, director of marketing for MSN Access dial-up service. "While it's a declining market, we do believe there's going to be a continued market for dial-up access."

As of 2005, 68 percent of North American households had Internet service, and that number is projected to be 78 percent by 2010, Forrester Research said. The company forecasts that by 2010, 62 percent of U.S. households will have broadband service, indicating that access to broadband and price will encourage many users to drop the slower dial-up service. There are more than 30 million dial-up households, Forrester said.

When AOL announced plans to raise its fees for dial-up service, the move was viewed as an effort to push subscribers into signing up for AOL's broadband services, which are bundled with Internet service providers via cable or DSL and offered for the new $25.90 price. AOL's base of dial-up subscribers has been shrinking rapidly; 7 million customers have dropped out in the past few years. By squeezing the difference between dial-up and broadband prices, AOL figured it could get its customers to upgrade.

An AOL spokeswoman declined to comment on the results of those efforts and about the competition from MSN.

For now, analyst Charles Golvin said, there are still a healthy number of dial-up users to make it worth MSN's effort. But the difficulty, he said, will be to convince AOL subscribers that it is worth the extra effort to change their e-mail address and contact lists to save a few bucks a month.

"People don't like to have to send an e-mail telling everyone about their new e-mail address," said Golvin, principal analyst at Forrester. "It's a really sticky point."

MSN said it will begin an online marketing campaign to lure AOL users and emphasize that those who switch can still keep some of their most treasured features of AOL: instant messaging and buddy lists.

Raycom Media Sells 12 TV Stations To Barrington Broadcasting (BIRMBIZ)

Birmingham (AL) Business Journal, March 29, 2006

Raycom Media Inc. and Barrington Broadcasting Corp. announced jointly that Barrington is buying 12 Raycom television stations in nine markets.

Barrington Broadcasting, which is based in Hoffman Estates, Ill., will pay a total of $262 million for the stations.

The transaction is subject to approval by the Federal Communications Commission and the Justice Department.

Barrington Broadcasting Corp. is part of the Pilot Group, a private equity firm.

The stations being acquired by Barrington include five NBC affiliates (WNWO-TV, Toledo, Ohio; WSTM-TV, Syracuse, N.Y.; WPBN-TV and WTOM-TV, Traverse City-Cheboygan, Mich.; and WLUC-TV, Marquette, Mich.), three FOX affiliates (WACH-TV, Columbia, S.C.; KXRM-TV, Colorado Springs, Colo.; and WFXL-TV, Albany, Ga.), two UPN affiliates (WSTQ, Syracuse, N.Y., and KXTU, Colorado Springs), one CBS affiliate (KGBT-TV, Harlingen, Texas) and one ABC affiliate (KTVO-TV, Kirksville, Mo).

Barrington president K. James Yager said in the companies' news release that Barrington Broadcasting looks forward to "working with the Raycom employees and managers at the stations we are acquiring. We believe these properties are a natural extension of our existing portfolio of stations in similarly sized markets."

Based in Montgomery, Raycom currently owns and operates 49 television stations in 22 states. Those stations cover more than 12.7 percent of U.S. households with televisions.

Cargill's Bid For Degussa Unit To Be Cleared By EU, People Say (BLOOM)

By Matthew Newman

Bloomberg, March 29, 2006

March 28 (Bloomberg) -- European Union regulators will clear plans by Cargill Inc., the largest U.S. agricultural company, to buy the food ingredients unit of German chemical maker Degussa AG, three people familiar with the investigation said.

The European Commission, the 25-nation EU's antitrust regulator in Brussels, will approve the transaction without asking for divestments, said the people, who declined to be identified because the ruling hasn't been made public. The decision will be announced tomorrow, the people said.

``The deal will help Degussa because they are selling off some assets to pay down debt," Andrew Benson, a chemicals analyst at Citigroup in London, said in a telephone interview.

Cargill, based in Wayzata, Minnesota, agreed to buy the maker of candy and drink flavors on Sept. 9 for $671 million as part of a plan to expand its range of ingredients for baked and dairy products, beverages, chocolates and other foods. The Degussa unit is the world's biggest supplier of lecithin, a soybean derivative used to enhance flavor and improve the shelf life of food.

The commission started an in-depth probe into the transaction on Dec. 14, saying the deal would combine two of the four leading suppliers of lecithin. The regulator said at the time that it wanted to ensure that customers such as food manufacturers wouldn't be harmed by the reduction in competition.

Early Clearance

The EU, which has until May 3 to reach a decision, will clear the case early because concerns about the lecithin market have been addressed, the people said.

Reinhard Scheiler, a spokesman at Degussa, the world's biggest specialty chemicals maker, had no comment. London-based Cargill spokeswoman Geraldine O'Shea also declined comment, as did commission spokesman Jonathan Todd.

The purchase of the unit from Dusseldorf, Germany-based Degussa would be the largest for Cargill since the 1.2 billion-euro ($1.4 billion) acquisition of Cerestar, a French maker of specialty starches and sweeteners, in 2002.

On March 20, RAG AG, which controls more than 95 percent of Degussa, asked the chemical company to arrange for the transfer of the remaining shares outstanding. Closely held RAG is buying Degussa as it changes focus from unprofitable mining to chemicals, power production and apartments.

The Problem With Patents (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

The Supreme Court will consider its second big patent case in a week today when oral arguments are heard in eBay v. MercExchange. While a technical case in some respects, the dispute is more important as another sign that there's something rotten in the U.S. patent system.

When the patent system works, it rewards entrepreneurs and inventors, encourages innovation and serves as a bulwark of property rights. The Founding Fathers considered patents important enough to provide for them in the Constitution. But the Founders left the implementation of patent rights up to Congress, which in turn vested patent authority in the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office and the courts. And there's the free-market rub.

The Constitution grants Congress the power to protect the rights of patent and copyright holders, but only "for limited times" and to "promote the progress of science and useful arts." It does not, by contrast, grant Congress the power to confer the right to real or personal property "to promote the cultivation of land" or "the accumulation of wealth." This distinction is important because royal patents in Britain were often granted to provide the favorites of the crown with a legal monopoly, and the Founders did not want Congress in that business. Patent rights are good insofar as they are useful, and the analogy with real or personal property goes only so far.

DOJ_NMG_0023224

A patent system, in turn, is only as good as the quality of patents that issue from it. If bad or dubious patents proliferate, they can have the opposite of their intended effect, which is to promote and reward innovation. Some of our free-market friends are so attached to patents as a vanguard of private property in theory that they ignore that the Patent Office is vulnerable to the usual failings and perverse incentives of any other government bureaucracy.

Which brings us back to the Supreme Court. A patent case last week involved Metabolite, which holds the right to license a blood test for vitamin B-12. But the patent also covers the relationship between B-12 and homocysteine, and between high homocysteine levels in the blood and heart disease. A patent on a blood test is a good thing. A patent on the relationship between a medical condition and what the test reveals is not. We hope the Supreme Court will come to the same conclusion.

Today's case, eBay v. MercExchange, turns on a purely technical question in the aftermath of a patent-infringement suit that eBay lost in 2003. The case concerns how much leeway judges should have in granting or denying permanent injunctions in patent cases. In the underlying litigation, the judge denied MercExchange's application for an injunction against eBay, arguing that the balance of interests did not support granting an injunction simply to give MercExchange leverage in any future licensing negotiations with eBay.

We don't have space to list the arguments for or against a possible injunction specifically against eBay, which in any case claims to have obviated the question by having "designed around" MercExchange's patent. But the larger issue of judicial discretion is the important one. The Patent Office is issuing an ever-increasing number of patents, and judicial discretion can be a useful constraint on patent abuse, especially when injunctions may cause undo harm to businesses and consumers. That is what we hope the Court will conclude.

Neither case will fix what's broken with the U.S. patent system, however. Bruce Lehman, Patent Office commissioner through much of the 1990s, once summed up the problem when he said, "We are the patent office, not the rejection office."

The Patent Office itself gets paid when it grants a patent, creating pressure on the staff to keep the money coming in. Patent examiners' bonuses are also based in part on the number of files they close in a year. But the only way to close a file for good is to grant the patent because an application that's been denied can always be modified and resubmitted, and frequently is. So examiners have a direct financial stake in closing application files by green-lighting the patent.

Today the Patent Office grants so many patents that half of the fees it generates are given back to the Treasury to spend on other things. Next month, Congressman Lamar Smith (R., Texas) will hold hearings on a patent-reform bill that has many good qualities, such as allowing third parties to submit evidence of "prior art" to show that an alleged innovation is not in fact novel -- before the patent is granted. It would also allow administrative review of questionable patents after they've been granted but before an infringement lawsuit is filed.

If this Congress wants to claim credit for doing something to help the economy ahead of November's elections, addressing the patent system would be a good place to start.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

How Environmentalists Lost The Battle Over TCE (LAT)

By Ralph Vartabedian

The Los Angeles Times, March 29, 2006

After massive underground plumes of an industrial solvent were discovered in the nation's water supplies, the Environmental Protection Agency mounted a major effort in the 1990s to assess how dangerous the chemical was to human health.

Following four years of study, senior EPA scientists came to an alarming conclusion: The solvent, trichloroethylene, or TCE, was as much as 40 times more likely to cause cancer than the EPA had previously believed.

DOJ_NMG_0023225

The preliminary report in 2001 laid the groundwork for tough new standards to limit public exposure to TCE. Instead of triggering any action, however, the assessment set off a high-stakes battle between the EPA and Defense Department, which had more than 1,000 military properties nationwide polluted with TCE.

By 2003, after a prolonged challenge orchestrated by the Pentagon, the EPA lost control of the issue and its TCE assessment was cast aside. As a result, any conclusion about whether millions of Americans were being contaminated by TCE was delayed indefinitely.

What happened with TCE is a stark illustration of a power shift that has badly damaged the EPA's ability to carry out one of its essential missions: assessing the health risks of toxic chemicals.

The agency's authority and its scientific stature have been eroded under a withering attack on its technical staff by the military and its contractors. Indeed, the Bush administration leadership at the EPA ultimately sided with the military.

After years on the defensive, the Pentagon — with help from NASA and the Energy Department — is taking a far tougher stand in challenging calls for environmental cleanups. It is using its formidable political leverage to demand greater proof that industrial substances cause cancer before ratcheting up costly cleanups at polluted bases.

The military says it is only striving to make smart decisions based on sound science and accuses the EPA of being unduly influenced by left-leaning scientists.

But critics say the defense establishment has manufactured unwarranted scientific doubt, used its powerful role in the executive branch to cause delays and forced a reduction in the margins of protection that traditionally guard public health.

If the EPA's 2001 draft risk assessment was correct, then possibly thousands of the nation's birth defects and cancers every year are due in part to TCE exposure, according to several academic experts.

"It is a World Trade Center in slow motion," said Boston University epidemiologist David Ozonoff, a TCE expert. "You would never notice it."

Senior officials in the Defense Department say much remains unknown about TCE.

"We are all forgetting the facts on the table," said Alex A. Beehler, the Pentagon's top environmental official. "Meanwhile, we have done everything we can to curtail use of TCE."

But in the last four years, the Pentagon, with help from the Energy Department and NASA, derailed tough EPA action on such water contaminants as the rocket fuel ingredient perchlorate. In response, state regulators in California and elsewhere have moved to impose their own rules.

The stakes are even higher with TCE. Half a dozen state, federal and international agencies classify TCE as a probable carcinogen.

California EPA regulators consider TCE a known carcinogen and issued their own 1999 risk assessment that reached the same conclusion as federal EPA regulators: TCE was far more toxic than previous scientific studies indicated.

TCE is the most widespread water contaminant in the nation. Huge swaths of California, New York, Texas and Florida, among other states, lie over TCE plumes. The solvent has spread under much of the San Gabriel and San Fernando valleys, as well as the shuttered El Toro Marine Corps base in Orange County.

Developed by chemists in the late 19th century, TCE was widely used to degrease metal parts and then dumped into nearby disposal pits at industrial plants and military bases, where it seeped into aquifers.

The public is exposed to TCE in several ways, including drinking or showering in contaminated water and breathing air in homes where TCE vapors have intruded from the soil. Limiting such exposures, even at current federal regulatory levels, requires elaborate treatment facilities that cost billions of dollars annually. In addition, some cities, notably Los Angeles, have high ambient levels of TCE in the air.

An internal Air Force report issued in 2003 warned that the Pentagon alone has 1,400 sites contaminated with TCE.

Among those, at least 46 have involved large-scale contamination or significant exposure to humans at military bases, according to a list compiled by the Natural Resources New Service, an environmental group based in Washington.

The Air Force was convinced that the EPA would toughen its allowable limit of TCE in drinking water of 5 parts per billion by at least fivefold. The service was already spending $5 billion a year to clean up TCE at its bases and tougher standards would drive that up by another $1.5 billion, according to an Air Force document. Some outside experts said that estimate was probably low.

DOJ_NMG_0023226

After the EPA issued the draft assessment, the Pentagon, Energy Department and NASA appealed their case directly to the White House. TCE has also contaminated 23 sites in the Energy Department's nuclear weapons complex — including Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory in the Bay Area, and NASA centers, including the Jet Propulsion Laboratory in La Cañada Flintridge.

The agencies argued that the EPA had produced junk science, its assumptions were badly flawed and that evidence exonerating TCE was ignored. They argued that the EPA could not be trusted to move ahead on its own and that top leaders in the agency did not have control of their own bureaucracy.

Bush administration appointees in the EPA — notably research director Paul Gilman — sided with the Pentagon and agreed to pull back the risk assessment. The matter was referred for a lengthy study by the National Academy of Sciences, which is due to issue a new report this summer. Any resolution of the cancer risk TCE poses will take years and any new regulation could take even longer.

The delay tactics have angered Republicans and Democrats who represent contaminated communities, where residents in some cases have elevated rates of cancer and birth defects but no direct proof that their illness is tied to TCE.

Half a dozen members of Congress last year wrote to the EPA, demanding that it issue interim standards for TCE, instead of waiting years while scientific battles are waged between competing federal agencies. EPA leaders have rejected those demands.

"The evidence on TCE is overwhelming," said Dr. Gina Solomon, an environmental medicine expert at UC San Francisco and a scientist at the Natural Resources Defense Council. "We have 80 epidemiological studies and hundreds of toxicology studies. They are fairly consistent in finding cancer risks that cover a range of tumors. It is hard to make all that human health risk go away."

But Raymond F. DuBois, former deputy undersecretary of Defense for installations and environment in the Bush administration, said the Pentagon had not been willing to accept whatever came out of the EPA, though it cared a great deal about base contamination.

"If you go down two or three levels in EPA, you have an awful lot of people that came onboard during the Clinton administration, to be perfectly blunt about it, and have a different approach than I do at Defense," DuBois said. "It doesn't mean I don't respect their opinions or judgments, but I have an obligation where our scientists question their scientists to bring it to the surface."

The military has virtually eliminated its use of TCE, purchasing only 11 gallons last year, said Beehler, an attorney who used to head environmental affairs for Koch Industries Inc., a large industrial conglomerate in Wichita, Kan.

In its fight against the 2001 risk assessment, the Pentagon has gone to the very fundamentals of cancer research: toxicology, the study of poisons; and epidemiology, the science of how diseases are distributed in the population. This scientific approach has worked better than past arguments that cleanups are a costly diversion from the Pentagon's mission to defend U.S. security.

A few months after the 2001 draft risk assessment came out, an Air Force rebuttal charged that the EPA had "misrepresented" data from animal and human health studies.

It said "there is no convincing evidence" that some groups of people, like children and diabetics, are more susceptible to TCE, a key part of the EPA's report. And it said the EPA had failed to consider viewpoints from "scientists who believe that TCE does not represent a human cancer risk at levels reasonably expected in the environment."

But comments such as these are outside the scientific mainstream. Other federal agencies have also expressed grave concern about TCE and some experts say it is only a matter of time before the chemical is universally recognized as a known carcinogen.

"Do I think TCE causes cancer? Yes," said Ozonoff, the Boston University TCE expert. "There is lots of evidence. Is there a dispute about it? Yes. Whenever the stakes are high, that's when there will be disputes about the science."

DOJ_NMG_0023227

The 2001 risk assessment found TCE was two to 40 times more likely to cause cancer than was found in an assessment conducted in 1986, a wide range that reflected many scientific uncertainties. Because cancer risk assessments are not an exact science, federal regulators have historically exercised great caution in protecting public health.

The California EPA, the nation's largest and best-funded state environment agency, assessed TCE in 1999 and also found reason for concern. Its risk assessment fell in the middle of the EPA risk range, according to the study's author, Joseph Brown.

Rodents fed TCE develop liver and kidney cancer, and humans exposed to TCE show elevated rates of many types of cancer and birth defects. But industry experts fire back that evidence on TCE is still weak. Just because rats and mice get cancer from high levels of TCE doesn't prove that humans will get cancer from low levels of TCE, they say. And the epidemiological research is less convincing than animal studies, they say.

The U.S. still uses about 100 tons of TCE annually, a fraction of the consumption before the mid-1980s, when it was first classified as a probable carcinogen. It was once widely used in consumer products, such as correction fluid for typewriters and spot cleaners.

"If TCE is a human carcinogen, it isn't much of one," said Paul Dugard, a toxicologist at the Halogenated Solvents Industry Alliance Inc., which represents TCE manufacturers. "People exposed at low levels shouldn't be concerned.

"EPA's philosophy is still one of being super conservative and that is being pushed back against."

EPA officials were braced for such a controversy when the TCE assessment was issued and quickly convened a scientific advisory board to review the work. The board included public health officials at state agencies, academics and chemical industry scientists.

About one year later, the board issued its findings, praising the risk assessment and urging the EPA to implement it as quickly as possible. But the board also suggested some changes, including stronger support for its calculations of TCE's health risks and a clearer disclosure of its underlying assumptions.

The report, particularly the request for additional work, was interpreted as a serious problem by Gilman, the EPA research director.

He said the board's findings represented a "red flag" and "raised very troubling issues," all of which were key arguments by Gilman and others for stopping the assessment.

But members of the scientific advisory team dispute Gilman's interpretation, saying they felt the 2001 risk assessment was good science and their recommended changes amounted to normal commentary for such a complex matter.

"I thought by and large we supported the EPA and that its risk assessment could be modified to move forward," said Dr. Henry Anderson, the chairman of the scientific advisory board and a physician with the Wisconsin Division of Public Health. "That movement to shuttle the issue to the National Academy of Sciences was nothing like what we had in mind."

By 2004, the matter was out of the EPA's hands. The National Academy of Sciences received a $680,00 contract from the Energy Department to study TCE — a decision dictated by a working group at the White House. The briefings to the national academy on how to evaluate TCE were given by White House staff as well as the EPA.

The White House originally formed the working group — made up of officials from the Pentagon, Energy Department and NASA — in 2002 to combat the EPA's assessment of another pollutant, perchlorate. That group stayed in business to fight the TCE risk assessment. The group was co-chaired by officials in the Office of Management and Budget and the White House Office of Science and Technology Policy. The officials declined requests for interviews.

Given the controversy and stakes involved, the issue was bound to end up with National Academy of Sciences, said Peter Preuss, director of the National Center for Environmental Analysis, the EPA organization that produced the 2001 risk assessment. "It got very difficult to proceed," Preuss said.

The lead author of the 2001 health risk assessment, V. James Cogliano, agreed that the findings ran into trouble when Defense Department officials went to the White House. "Most of it was behind the scenes," said Cogliano, now a senior official at the International Agency for Research on Cancer in Lyon, France.

He added: "The degree of opposition was not surprising given the degree of economic interests involved."

DOJ_NMG_0023228

The political maneuvering marked a significant change, Cogliano said. In the 1980s, Defense Department officials accepted every possible safeguard recommended by the EPA for incinerators to burn nerve gas and other chemical weapons, he recalled.

At that time, Defense Department officials said, "You put in every margin of safety, because we want to be sure it will be safe," he said. "There was no argument. There is a different spirit today."

Every health risk assessment is also getting more technically complex and more bureaucratically difficult, Preuss said.

When the EPA issued its first health risk assessment in 1976, it ran four pages and it was based in large part on studies that counted "bumps and lumps" on animals subjected to possible carcinogens. By contrast, EPA scientists now must show not only that a substance causes tumors, but the internal biological processes that are responsible. And the work is subject to greater scrutiny.

"It is true that there is more interagency review now of our work," Preuss said. "We have a couple steps where we send our assessments to the White House and they distribute them to other agencies. Each year, additional steps are taken."

All of the EPA's travails — the toughened scientific demands, the loss of authority, the interagency battles — have clearly taken a heavy toll and diminished the agency's stature.

"Inside the Beltway, it is an accepted fact that the science of EPA is not good," said Gilman, now director of the Oak Ridge Center for Advanced Studies in Tennessee, which conducts broad research on energy, the environment and other areas of science. Gilman said an entire consulting industry has sprung up in Washington to attack the EPA and sow seeds of doubt about its capabilities.

The delays in assessing TCE have also left many contaminated communities with few answers.

"My constituents who live at a recently named Superfund site … are forced to live everyday with contaminated groundwater, soil and air and can't afford to wait the years it would take for the results of your outsourced re-review," Rep. Sue W. Kelly (R-N.Y.) told EPA officials at a hearing last year.

"I have talked to a lot of sick people," said Rep. Maurice D. Hinchey (D-N.Y.), whose district includes hundreds of homes contaminated by TCE vapors, traced to an IBM Corp. factory. IBM has paid for air filtration systems for 400 homes, but has balked at more funding based on uncertainty over the health risk. "These people are deeply frustrated and increasingly angry," Hinchey said.

Meanwhile, many environmentalists are discouraged by what they view as a virtual emasculation of the EPA in this battle.

"The general public has no idea this is happening," said Erik Olson, a lawyer at the Natural Resources Defense Council. "The Defense Department has succeeded in undermining the basic scientific process at EPA. The DoD is the biggest polluter in the United States and they have made major investments to undercut the EPA."

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

The military and TCE

About 1,400 Defense Department sites across the nation are contaminated with trichloroethylene, or TCE, including military bases and depots. The map shows sites that have some of the heaviest contamination or were studied for possibly causing health hazards. A sampling of problems nationwide:

Contaminated sites

McClellan Air Force Base, Sacramento:

The Pentagon is cleaning up 12 different TCE plumes affecting about 25% of the former base's property. About a half dozen public water wells have been shut and the cleanup is expected to continue for decades.

*

F.E. Warren Air Force Base, Cheyenne, Wyo.:

TCE was discovered at 13 decommissioned Atlas missile silos in Wyoming, Colorado and Nebraska. Contamination at some of the sites reached 3,500 parts per billion. TCE polluted an aquifer that Cheyenne, Wyo., planned to use as a municipal water source.

*

DOJ_NMG_0023229

Twin Cities Army Ammunition Plant, Arden Hills, Minn.:

A TCE plume covered 25 square miles and spread to private residential wells. The water supply for a nearby trailer park contained 720 parts per billion TCE. The site is now undergoing a cleanup under Superfund program supervision.

*

Stratford Army Engine Plant, Stratford, Conn.:

Elevated TCE vapors were discovered in several buildings the Army planned to lease to private concerns. Federal health authorities judged the vapors too high for general public exposure. A cleanup is underway.

*

El Toro Marine Corps Air Station, Irvine, Calif.:

TCE contaminated the groundwater under the base, now closed, which long ago complicated plans to reuse the property for private housing and a public park. The government will retain about 900 contaminated acres to continue cleanup for the indefinite future.

*

Kelly Air Force Base, San Antonio:

TCE use at the shuttered aircraft repair depot contaminated a shallow aquifer that has migrated about 4 miles off the base, through a low-income neighborhood. Health authorities have found elevated rates of cancer and birth defects in the neighborhood.

*

Anniston Army Depot, Anniston, Ala.:

Extremely high concentrations of TCE, up to 200,000 parts per billion, were found by government investigators in groundwater under the depot, which included a number of dumps, a plating plant and other industrial activities. TCE levels above allowable drinking water standards have been found at springs and wells on the base.

*

Camp Lejeune, N.C.:

Tens of thousands of Marine families were exposed to TCE in the base's drinking water supply. A preliminary study has found elevated rates of leukemia among children conceived at the base. The TCE was discovered in 1980 but not disclosed until 1985.

*

Sources: Agency for Toxic Substances and Disease Registry, U.S. Environmental Protection Agency, Natural Resources News Service, Associated Press, California Department of Toxic Substances Control. Graphics reporting by Tom Reinken, Ralph Vartabedian

G.A.O. Sees Loss In Oil Royalties Of At Least $20 Billion (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 28 — Incentives for oil and gas companies that drill in the Gulf of Mexico will cost the federal government at least $20 billion over the next 25 years, according to the draft of a Congressional report obtained on Tuesday.

The new estimates, prepared by the Government Accountability Office, also warn that $80 billion in revenue could be lost over the same period if oil and gas companies won a new lawsuit that seeks a further reduction in their royalty payments.

The report, delivered in a private briefing late Monday to House and Senate staff members, startled some of the program's longtime supporters and infuriated some critics.

The report is the first attempt by a government agency to calculate the soaring costs of a 10-year-old program that was created to encourage deepwater drilling when energy prices were low.

The program, known as royalty relief, allows companies to avoid paying the government royalties on much of what they produce from federal leases in deepwater areas of the gulf.

DOJ_NMG_0023230

The Interior Department acknowledged last month that it would forgo about $7 billion in royalties over the next five years — even though it expected energy prices to remain near record highs.

The G.A.O., the nonpartisan investigative arm of Congress, came up with much higher cost estimates but over a longer stretch of time.

On a related matter, the agency's investigators cautiously endorsed the Interior Department's explanation about why royalty collections for natural gas had climbed far more slowly than market prices.

Such royalties were almost no higher in 2005, when gas prices reached records, than in 2001.

The New York Times reported in January that the main reason appeared to be a widening gap between the sales prices that companies were reporting to the government and the prices they were reporting to their own shareholders.

The G.A.O. disputed that, saying that the weak revenue collections last year appeared to result primarily from a decline in gas production that was more severe than the drop indicated in the Interior Department's published statistics.

The G.A.O. said the Interior Department's explanation was "quick and reasonable," and that royalties in 2005 had been held down by both a general decline in offshore production and the damage wrought by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

But the Congressional office cautioned that its analysis was based on a reshuffling by the Interior Department's Minerals Management Service of its published royalty statistics.

"We conducted limited verification of M.M.S. data and did not audit the accuracy of underlying M.M.S. records," the G.A.O. said.

On the larger question of the overall cost of royalty relief, the G.A.O. noted that the Interior Department, which runs the offshore leasing program, had never carried out a "robust" cost-benefit analysis of the original program or of incentives added in the last five years.

In what the G.A.O. said was a preliminary analysis, it estimated that the government would lose about $20 billion as a result of leases already signed.

But that loss would quadruple to $80 billion if the suit by energy companies succeeded.

In the lawsuit, filed by Kerr-McGee Exploration and Production the company argues that the Interior Department does not have the authority to suspend the royalty incentives if prices for oil and gas climb above certain "threshold" levels.

Members of Congress, including some who have supported the energy industry, said the G.A.O. figures raised new questions about the royalty relief program.

"I am extremely concerned about information that has recently come to light," Senator Jeff Bingaman, Democrat of New Mexico, the ranking minority member of the Senate Energy Committee, wrote in a letter on Tuesday to the departing interior secretary, Gale A. Norton.

"I write to inquire as to what you plan to do to address this situation and these significant potential losses to the taxpayers of our nation."

Critics of the program said they were infuriated.

"Every day, the news for taxpayers gets unbelievably worse," said Representative Carolyn B. Maloney, Democrat of New York, who has assailed the royalty-collection program for years. "When will we put a stop to this?"

The actual cost of such royalty relief has been shrouded in mystery almost since its inception.

Last month, the Interior Department confirmed that the costs were about to soar as a result of leasing blunders in the late 1990's and a court decision in 2003.

The G.A.O.'s most optimistic prediction calls for a loss to the government of $20 billion in royalties, even though this assumes that energy prices will be above the "threshold levels" over the next 25 years.

Half of that stems from a blunder during the Clinton administration, when officials omitted the price-threshold restriction from all offshore leases signed in 1998 and 1999.

The other half results from the legal victory by energy companies in 2003, which more than doubled the amount of royalty-free oil and gas they could produce.

DOJ_NMG_0023231

But those costs would be eclipsed if Kerr-McGee won its new lawsuit against the Bush administration. The G.A.O. estimated that a Kerr-McGee victory would cost $60 billion over 25 years, on top of the $20 billion the government is already expected to give up.

The G.A.O. said it based its estimate on the assumption that crude oil would sell for about $45 a barrel, a level well below the $66.07 next-month futures price in New York on Tuesday, and that oil and gas prices would climb 2.1 percent a year.

American Indians Cite Voter Intimidation (AP)

By MARY CLARE JALONICK, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 29, 2006

LAKE ANDES, S.D. — American Indian Charon Asetoyer says that when she went to vote a few years ago, a white man gave her the finger and asked her in vulgar terms what she was doing there.

She says she told him she had a right to vote, and she went back to her car to wait for him to leave. Only when he sped away did she walk inside.

"It's outright racism," said Asetoyer, who lives on the Yankton Sioux Indian Reservation in impoverished Charles Mix County, where Indians are about one-third of the population.

While the federal Voting Rights Act has brought them a long way from the days when some states required that they be "civilized" to cast ballots, many Indians around the country say they still face intimidation, restrictive voting requirements and long distances to reach polling places.

During the 2004 election, Senate Democratic Leader Tom Daschle's campaign obtained a restraining order in Charles Mix County against GOP poll watchers, accusing them of intimidating Indian voters. The Republicans denied that, saying the move was purely political. Daschle lost to Republican John Thune.

With parts of the Voting Rights Act set to expire in 2007 unless Congress reauthorizes them, some Indians say that the current federal and state protections need to be preserved and strengthened, too.

They cite, for example, South Dakota's new voter identification law, which requires photo identification at the polls, a problem for many on the reservations who do not have IDs. The law permits those without identification to sign an affidavit, but opponents argue there is confusion about what is allowed. The American Civil Liberties Union has challenged other voter ID statutes seen as burdensome to Indians in Albuquerque, N.M., and Minnesota.

"The tribes are still very concerned about the targeted efforts to disenfranchise their vote," said Jacqueline Johnson, executive director of the National Congress of American Indians.

Some Indians want the Voting Rights Act changed to bring more counties around the country under closer federal scrutiny and to expand bilingual assistance at polling places. Other suggest a larger number of polling places, more Indian poll-watchers and more general oversight on Election Day.

"If those federal protections weren't there, Indians wouldn't have a chance at voting," said former Republican Sen. Ben Nighthorse Campbell of Colorado, a member of the Northern Cheyenne Tribe. "The law probably ought to go farther."

Chris Nelson, who as South Dakota's Republican secretary of state is chief election officer, pointed to a big increase in Indian turnout in the past few years and said he has seen little evidence of voter intimidation. Nelson said some federal protections on South Dakota's reservations could safely be removed.

Under the Voting Rights Act, changes in election policy in most of the South and other places around the country with a history of discrimination need the approval of the U.S. Justice Department. That list includes South Dakota's Shannon and Todd Counties, with large numbers of Indians.

But Nelson said: "Has the preclearance requirement done anything to improve the ability of Indians to vote in those counties? The answer is no."

The debate comes as Indians show growing electoral clout.

During the 2002 Senate race in South Dakota, Democratic Sen. Tim Johnson won re-election by 524 votes with help from a huge increase in turnout on reservations. In Washington state, a surge of Indian votes helped lift Democratic Sen. Maria Cantwell to victory in 2000. In Arizona, reservations helped seat Democratic Gov. Janet Napolitano in 2002.

DOJ_NMG_0023232

Johnson said that Congress will have to maintain some protections to keep Indian voting levels high.

"There's still a lack of trust and confidence between Native Americans and state institutions," he said, "and keeping some federal oversight is something that Native Americans want to have."

Editorial: After Norton, Lowered Expectations (ICT)

Indian Country Today, March 29, 2006

In a C-SPAN television appearance after announcing her resignation, Interior Department Secretary Gale Norton mused that she had begun her tenure with a program of four "C's" but when she ended, they had been condensed to two. The fate of her buzzwords - "cooperation," "consultation" and the like - could stand as a metaphor for her six years in office. Whatever she had as a program, especially on Indian affairs, for better or worse contracted and stalled in the face of the administration's inertia.

Environmentalists will remonstrate that she displayed energy in pushing bad policies. Oil and mineral leasing on public lands is way up. Her "Healthy Forests" initiative would open old-growth forests to logging. The National Park Service is refocusing on commercial recreation. Snowmobilers are bothering wildlife. This might be so, but we don't see much point in demonizing a pleasant lady who has had a rough few years and who was neither as bad nor as good as she might have wished to be.

On Indian issues, always our primary concern, Norton occasionally talked a good game but almost never delivered. We think she was well-intentioned, but her record should be a caution to her likely successor, Dirk Kempthorne. In his previous career as U.S. senator and governor of Idaho, Kempthorne seems to have avoided displays of hostility to Native interests. (There are more than enough politicians out there who haven't.) The Nez Perce in Idaho say he has worked well with them. But the obstacles in Washington, D.C., are very high to conducting a decent Indian policy. In the absence of concentrated attention, they might be almost insurmountable.

The first trap that engulfed Norton was the Cobell v. Norton lawsuit. The new secretary can look forward to replacing her in the heading as the lead defendant, just as when she replaced Bruce Babbitt. He can also anticipate an almost inevitable contempt citation from Judge Royce C. Lamberth unless he somehow manages to change the administration's legal strategy. We could never understand how Norton accepted the obstructionism that has marked the government's response to this suit, unless she had little control over a strategy dictated by the Justice Department. If any private person were involved in a suit where the judge kept issuing contempt citations over legal tactics, one would think the first step would be to fire the lawyers. (The second and third steps might be to sue them for malpractice and grieve them to their bar associations.)

Norton made a number of efforts to improve management of the Individual Indian Money trust accounts and overcome the absurd fractionation of payments that was the end result of the vicious Allotment Act of 1887 - which is at the heart of the problem. But her most publicized initiative wound up looking like a reshuffling of boxes on the BIA organization chart (with some mid-level pay raises).

The change in leadership provides a chance for a toting-up of the changes that have been made and maybe a push for an equitable settlement. It's not reassuring, however, to hear that Interior's supervision of all its oil and gas leasing has been deteriorating, since this is how the trust money vanished.

Norton made other unkept promises to the tribes that Kempthorne should honor. In a September 2002 interview with Indian Country Today, she talked about giving the tribes a greater role in managing their forests and in competing for "stewardship contracts" on other public lands. It sounded good, but we haven't seen much follow-up. That same year, she made a well-publicized trip with then-Agriculture Secretary Ann Veneman to the Klamath River basin to try to settle the notorious "water war." In the course of her "charm offensive," she promised the Klamath Indian tribes to restore forest land that was stolen in the allotment period and mismanaged ever since. They might still be talking, but the land has not yet been restored.

Overall, it's hard to avoid the impression that Norton and the Bush administration simply lost interest in Indians after the 2004 election. Witness the leadership void at the BIA after the departure of Dave Anderson, or earlier. We grant that the office of assistant Interior secretary of Indian Affairs might be the single-worst job in the federal government, but there is still something wrong when it has been vacant for at least a third of Norton's tenure. Indian voices are markedly silent at the highest levels of Indian policy-making. And it's showing.

DOJ_NMG_0023233

The anti-Indian campaign is growing more strident and vicious, but Indian country has the strong sense that no one in the administration is truly committed to protecting Native interests. We hear that Norton was appropriately frosty when Connecticut Attorney General Richard Blumenthal tried to engage in a bit of illegal ex parte lobbying on recognition decisions. But the lower levels show every sign of having caved in to his sort of political pressure. The reversals of recognition for New England tribes over the past year, starting with the Nipmuc Nation decision, have been nothing less than an insult to our intelligence. They changed the rules mid-stream, applied impossible standards of evidence and showed such a malignant predisposition that we look forward to the forthcoming Administrative Procedures Act lawsuits.

Compounding this revival of the "termination" spirit, the leading figure on Indian Affairs, Associate Deputy Interior Secretary James Cason has shown an arrogance in his personal dealings with the tribes worthy of the days of the Indian agents. It's not simply a case of cultural insensitivity. His behavior has been bad manners in any language.

This leadership vacuum has opened the way to suspicions of the worst sort of influence peddling. And yes, our own manners are not so good that we will leave Jack Abramoff unmentioned. His impact on Interior has yet to be fully explored. But this notorious scandal is not the only one to flare on Norton's watch. The full story of her tenure would have to explain the abrupt dismissal of Wayne Smith, the BIA's one-time No. 2 man; the curious concern of Stephen Griles over Louisiana Indian casinos; the dinner parties thrown by Italia Federici; the frustration of the Gun Lake Band and other incidents still below the surface.

In the absence of a strong Indian advocate (Yes, we miss Kevin Gover), the host of lawyers, hustlers and casino sharpies now circling Indian country will do its best to corrupt that part of Interior's bureaucracy that has not been browbeaten and cowed by the vociferous anti-tribal lobby.

We don't think things are yet at this pass. Able people have been rising unscathed through the BIA's ranks. Some of the most breathless charges against it, such as the wanton granting of tribal recognition, have simply been false. But leadership at the top has been slipping. The most urgent task that Norton has left for Kempthorne in Indian policy is to rebuild a stable cadre of senior leaders drawn from Indian country and responsive to its needs.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Puerto Rico Asks Congress To Lean On FBI (WP)

By Elisabeth Goodridge

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Puerto Rico's attorney general asked Congress to pressure the FBI to cooperate with his investigation into raids by the bureau against independence advocates in the U.S. territory.

In a briefing for House Democrats, Attorney General Roberto J. Sanchez Ramos said Tuesday that bureau officials have stonewalled his investigation of an FBI raid that left one militant independence leader dead.

"Only through open and frank communication between Commonwealth and federal authorities can we hope to best service our common interest in the protection of our citizens," Sanchez Ramos said.

Rep. John Conyers of Michigan, the senior Democrat on the House Judiciary Committee, said he organized the briefing "to establish that there is a case."

In September 2005, FBI agents raided the house of Filiberto Ojeda Rios, a fugitive leader of a pro-independence militant group. Witnesses and his widow allege that the FBI shot Ojeda Rios and let him bleed to death. The FBI has said Ojeda Rios shot first.

During a raid last month that the FBI has said was to thwart a "domestic terrorist attack" planned by independence militants, witnesses allege that agents used pepper spray on reporters and protesters.

The raids sparked an anti-FBI rally Sunday in San Juan that drew more than 1,000.

The FBI has refused to disclose the identities of the agents who took part in the raids or to provide more than a minimal amount of information, Sanchez Ramos said.

Eduardo Bhatia, executive director of the Puerto Rico Federal Affairs Administration, read a statement from Puerto Rican Gov. Anibal Acevedo-Vila at the briefing.

"It must be clearly stated that in no way does the Commonwealth wish to impinge on any FBI investigation related to domestic terrorist activity nor to infringe on the FBI's ability to do its job," Acevedo-Vila said in the statement. "But just like the FBI must do its job, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, through its attorney general, has the right to require and obtain due cooperation from federal agencies when exercising its legitimate investigative powers."

Bill Carter, an FBI spokesman in Washington, said the complaints filed to the agency from members of Congress and Puerto Rican officials have been referred to the FBI Inspection Division for investigation and review.

"We can't comment further until that investigation is complete," Carter said.

At the request of FBI Director Robert Mueller, the U.S. Justice Department's inspector general, Glenn A. Fine, also is investigating Ojeda Rios' death.

Filiberto Pudo Ser Atendido (PRIMHORA)

Primera Hora, March 29, 2006

Sostiene Sánchez Ramos en sesión informativa

WASHINGTON.- El dirigente machetero Filiberto Ojeda Ríos pudo haber sobrevivido al disparo que le provocó la muerte por desangramiento si el FBI lo hubiera atendido a tiempo, sostuvo ayer el secretario de Justicia, Roberto J. Sánchez Ramos.

"La información que tenemos es que si él hubiera sido atendido, no hubiera muerto", declaró Sánchez Ramos de manera contundente en respuesta a una pregunta del representante Luis Gutiérrez, de Chicago, durante una sesión informativa efectuada por un grupo de congresistas demócratas para ventilar las quejas del Gobierno de Puerto Rico y de otros sectores sobre la presunta falta de cooperación del Negociado Federal de Investigaciones (FBI) en la investigación sobre la muerte de Ojeda Ríos y el maltrato a periodistas en un allanamiento el mes pasado.

En una carta leída por Eduardo Bhatia, director ejecutivo de la Oficina de Asuntos Federales de Puerto Rico en Washington (PRFAA por sus siglas en inglés), el gobernador Aníbal Acevedo Vilá criticó al FBI por su falta de transparencia. "Las acciones del FBI han provocado preguntas legítimas y sustanciales en nuestra sociedad. El interés público requiere de una sólida y saludable cooperación mutua entre las autoridades federales, estatales y locales. El Gobierno de Puerto Rico tiene el derecho a exigir la cooperación debida de las agencias federales cuando esté ejerciendo su legítimo derecho de investigación", dice la carta.

En tanto, Sánchez Ramos reiteró que "estamos tratando de llegar al grano de lo que sucedió y no están cooperando y creo que lo hacen en una manera ilegal y que no atiende al público que desea saber qué fue lo que pasó".

Ojeda Ríos murió desangrado el pasado 23 de septiembre en la casa en que residía clandestinamente en Hormigueros, luego de un enfrentamiento con agentes del FBI.

Sánchez Ramos reiteró en la sesión congresional que no solamente no ha recibido información del FBI y del Departamento federal de Justicia sobre el caso de Ojeda Ríos y de las agresiones contra la prensa, sino que "en ningún momento" desde que asumió su cargo el año pasado ha recibido de las autoridades federales cualquier tipo de información sobre posibles operativos federales en la Isla que pudieran estar vinculados con el tema de terrorismo. El FBI y otras agencias federales sostienen que los allanamientos efectuados el 10 de febrero forman parte de la llamada lucha contra el terrorismo.

Impacta a congresistas el vídeo

Dos periodistas, Oscar J. Serrano, presidente de la Asociación de Periodistas de Puerto Rico (Asppro), y Normando Valentín, de Televicentro, presentaron en la audiencia un vídeo grabado en las afueras del condominio de Río Piedras donde se llevó a cabo uno de los allanamientos y en el que se aprecia claramente el enfrentamiento de los agentes federales con una quincena de periodistas, Valentín entre ellos.

Durante la presentación del vídeo, varios de los congresistas se notaron visiblemente conmocionados.

"Queda muy claro que aquí hay suficiente evidencia para exigir una respuesta del FBI", dijo el congresista Bobby Scott, de Virginia.

Por otra parte, el Comité para Proteger Periodistas (CPJ, por sus siglas en inglés), emitió una declaración en la que dice que están "muy preocupados" por el incidente con los periodistas.

Ni el FBI ni el Departamento de Justicia federal enviaron representantes a la sesión congresional.

En una reciente audiencia privada en el Comité Judicial de la Cámara de Representantes, representantes del FBI dijeron que no habían avisado de antemano a las autoridades puertorriqueñas del operativo contra Ojeda Ríos porque no confiaban en ellos, algo que Bhatia dijo no tiene sentido. "En otros asuntos, como el narcotráfico y las pandillas callejeras, ha habido cooperación entre las autoridades federales y las de Puerto Rico, pero cuando se trata de este asunto, ¿cómo pueden decir que no tienen confianza en nosotros?".

La representante Nydia Velázquez, de Nueva York, se expresó "avergonzada" como congresista. "Se supone que el FBI guarde el orden y no esté atentando contra los derechos civiles de la gente. Como puertorriqueña, tengo un interés personal en que a los residentes de Puerto Rico se les trate como ciudadanos estadounidenses que son y no como ciudadanos de segunda clase", afirmó.

El congresista José Serrano, también de Nueva York, añadió que la ausencia del FBI de la sesión apunta a un "patrón de falta de respeto" hacia Puerto Rico. "Imagínense que esto hubiera ocurrido en una ciudad en Estados Unidos. Hubiera provocado una enorme indignación".

Los congresistas, además, apuntaron la ausencia del comisionado residente Luis Fortuño, quien en recientes días había cuestionado la necesidad de la audiencia y la calificó como parte de un intento de dañar la imagen de la Administración Bush.

"Es verdaderamente triste que aquí estemos discutiendo los derechos civiles del pueblo de Puerto Rico y tenemos al representante de la Isla cuestionando los motivos de la audiencia", comentó Velázquez.

La sesión congresional no pudo ser calificada como audiencia formal porque los demócratas no obtuvieron la cooperación de la mayoría republicana en el comité judicial, algo que los congresistas calificaron como "lamentable". No obstante, el representante Charles Rangel, de Nueva York, sostuvo que la sesión se llevó a cabo para recopilar información con miras a llevar a cabo audiencias en la Isla en una fecha por determinar, y prometió darle seguimiento.

"Cuando no hacemos nada, somos parte del problema", dijo Rangel.

Director Del FBI Defiende Actuación De Agentes (PRIMHORA)

Prima Hora, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON.- El director del FBI, Robert Mueller, defendió ayer la actuación de sus agentes en el operativo que terminó en la muerte del dirigente machetero Filiberto Ojeda Ríos, a la vez que indicó que se realiza una investigación interna de lo ocurrido.

En una audiencia del Comité de Asignaciones del Congreso realizada el mismo día que la sesión informativa auspiciada por congresistas demócratas sobre el operativo del 23 de septiembre pasado y sobre las agresiones a periodistas durante un allanamiento el 10 de febrero, Mueller habló del caso de Ojeda Ríos por primera vez desde que la agencia emitió un comunicado poco después de su muerte.

En respuesta a preguntas del congresista José Serrano, Mueller -que compareció a la audiencia para defender el presupuesto del FBI- dijo que los eventos tienen que colocarse en contexto.

"Hubo un agente (del FBI) que resultó herido en el estómago y otros que fueron lesionados. (Ojeda Ríos) estaba armado", dijo Mueller.

En el caso de los periodistas agredidos, sostuvo que a diferencia de lo que dice la prensa, sí había un perímetro establecido y que el FBI actuó para mantener el orden.

A la vez, declaró que "hay ocasiones en todas las jurisdicciones del FBI" en las que el FBI discrepa de autoridades locales y que en este caso no se trata necesariamente de desconfianza en las autoridades de Puerto Rico.

El pueblo de Puerto Rico, expuso, debería esperar a que se termine la investigación interna, aunque no indicó cuándo será eso.

Asimismo, disputó la aseveración del congresista Serrano de que el FBI pudiera estar comportándose en Puerto Rico "como en el pasado".

"Sí, nos importa mucho la imagen del FBI en Puerto Rico. Estoy sumamente decepcionado en que estos eventos hayan socavado la confianza que el pueblo de Puerto Rico tiene en el FBI", declaró Mueller.

FBI Director Says Preventing Terrorist Attacks Agency's Top Priority (VOA)

By Margaret Besheer

Voice of America, March 29, 2006

The director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation says his agency has transformed itself, and he does not believe the mistakes that led to the September 11 attacks on the United States would happen again.

Robert MuellerFBI Director Robert Mueller told a House of Representatives subcommittee Tuesday that since September 11, 2001, his agency's number one priority has been preventing terrorist attacks against the United States. He said the lack of information sharing within the FBI and with other agencies, which some say is to blame for the failure to not stop the attacks, is a thing of the past.

"I believe that what one saw happen in the days and weeks before September 11th would not happen again," said Robert Mueller. "That is not to say that we could not face another terrorist attack, but I believe we are far more efficient and effective, not only the FBI itself, but also the FBI in conjunction with the Department of Homeland Security, the CIA [Central Intelligence Agency], DIA [Defense Intelligence Agency], NSA [National Security Administration] and all those who play a role in protecting the public."

Director Mueller was responding to questions about the trial of admitted al-Qaida operative Zacarias Moussaoui. Moussaoui faces the death penalty in a U.S. court for his role in the September 11 attacks. Prosecutors charge that he lied about his al-Qaida membership and did not give authorities information about the planned attacks when federal agents arrested him weeks before they happened.

Mueller was on Capitol Hill to discuss the agency's 2007 budget request of $6 billion, which he said would go to support more than 31,000 jobs, as well as new technology and expanded facilities for the Bureau. He also answered lawmakers' questions about other national security issues.

He said China has a major spying program directed against the United States, which he called a "substantial threat."

The director also said the FBI is closely watching the case of former Liberian president and war crimes suspect Charles Taylor. The United States has expressed deep concern over reports that the former leader has disappeared from his Nigerian place of exile.

"We are monitoring what is happening in conjunction with the State Department, and to the extent that we are asked to provide any assistance in whatever way, we will," he said.

Director Mueller also talked about violence along the U.S.-Mexico border, where drug cartels and smugglers are responsible for a significant number of murders and other violence.

"To date, we have not had the same violence on this side of the border, that you have seen south of the border," said Director Mueller. "And we want to make certain that we do not see it and do everything we can to not only assure that it does not migrate to the United States, but also that we assist our Mexican colleagues to address it and disrupt and ultimately defeat that kind of violence."

The FBI director said his agency has made national security its top priority, but has not forgotten its crime fighting responsibilities. E-mail This Article

Federal Agents In Right Place, Right Time (NOTP)

By Paul Rioux, St. Tammany Bureau

New Orleans Times-Picayune, March 16, 2006

When shooting started, they took control

After Randall Breaux took his wife out to dinner at a Covington restaurant Friday night, they strolled to the Columbia Street Tap Room and Grill, where they met a couple of friends, including Carter Mansfield, Breaux's fellow federal narcotics agent.

The foursome grooved to the beat of The Boogiemen for a couple of hours and were about to leave about 11:15 p.m. when they heard a series of loud popping sounds coming from outside the club.

While many inside the packed bar figured someone had lit a string of firecrackers, the two veteran Drug Enforcement Administration agents immediately recognized the sound of gunfire.

DOJ_NMG_0023237

Breaux and Mansfield rushed outside and saw people pointing down the block at a man spraying the bar's stucco walls with rounds from a semiautomatic assault rifle, said William Renton, who heads the DEA's New Orleans office and on Wednesday gave the first detailed account of how the off-duty agents managed to subdue the gunman before anyone was injured.

Renton said Breaux drew a handgun, ran across the street and moved quickly toward the gunfire, using parked cars for cover, while Mansfield, who was not armed, made his way up the other side of the street.

The suspect had fired about 30 rounds and was trying to reload when Breaux popped up from behind a parked car and ordered him to drop the weapon, Renton said.

After the man tossed the AR-15 assault rifle on the trunk of a car, Mansfield rushed in and tackled him, detaining him until Covington police arrived a short while later.

Renton praised the agents, both of whom live in western St. Tammany Parish, for their lightning-quick response in going from enjoying a carefree night out one second to facing a life-or-death confrontation the next.

"They displayed tremendous heroism and courage in quickly advancing on a suspect who was much more heavily armed than they were," he said.

He said DEA guidelines prohibit Breaux, 43, and Mansfield, 35, from speaking publicly about the incident.

Tony R. Lambert, 34, of Covington, was booked with 10 charges, including two counts of attempted first-degree murder of a federal agent.

It's unclear what sparked the shooting, but police have said it may have involved an argument over a woman. A friend has said Lambert bought the rifle after hearing reports of looting in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

Richard Daniels, who is second in command at the DEA's New Orleans office, said Lambert was wearing a vest loaded with extra ammunition clips and was reaching for one when Breaux confronted him.

"I always think, 'What if he had another second or two to reload?' It could have been a major tragedy with a lot of people getting hurt," Daniels said, citing reports that 150 people were in the bar.

Renton said the agents are being hailed for defusing the situation without anyone getting hurt.

"Breaux used tremendous judgment and restraint at a time of great danger," Renton said. "He could have shot the guy and no one would have ever questioned it."

He emphasized that his praise of Breaux is not a criticism of how other agencies have handled recent controversial incidents, including one in December when New Orleans police officers shot and killed a 38-year-old mental patient who was armed with a knife on St. Charles Avenue.

"Don't get me wrong," Renton said. "Breaux would have been happy to shoot the guy had he turned his weapon on him."

While their co-workers have been patting them on the back all week, Breaux and Mansfield aren't sure what all the fuss is about, Daniels said.

"They're not the boastful type," he said. "They said they just did their job and let their training take over."

Renton said both agents will undoubtedly be nominated for some of the agency's highest awards for bravery and valor, a process that takes months.

In the meantime, Renton used his discretion as head of the New Orleans office to give them an On-the-Spot Award for going above the call of duty -- a commendation that includes a $500 bonus.

"I told them to enjoy a nice, quiet evening on us and, hopefully, not get shot at," Renton said.

Venezuela Frees Dominican Wanted By U.S. (AP)

By Natalie Obiko Pearson

AP, March 29, 2006

CARACAS, Venezuela -- Venezuela has freed a Dominican man wanted in the U.S. on drug charges, saying there was no guarantee U.S. authorities would agree to terms for his extradition.

Judge Hector Coronado Flores dismissed a previous order to extradite Mateo Holguin Ovalle and ruled that he be released, the Supreme Court said Monday in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0023238

The decision derailed a case cited earlier by American officials as a prime example of cooperation with Venezuela in the drug war. The two countries now are in a dispute over how to resume joint counter-trafficking efforts suspended since President Hugo Chavez last August accused Drug Enforcement Administration agents of spying.

American authorities allege Holguin Ovalle, arrested in 2003 after being indicted in the U.S. on charges of conspiring to import cocaine, directed a major drug ring that transported cocaine and heroin into the United States.

The Venezuela court previously authorized Holguin Ovalle's extradition on the condition that he not be sentenced to more than 30 years in prison.

"Since the term of punishment to be imposed on Mateo Juan Holguin Ovalle could not be guaranteed, the extradition ordered cannot be carried out," Coronado Flores ruled.

The U.S. Embassy in Caracas and the Drug Enforcement Administration in Washington did not immediately comment on the decision.

Hundreds of tons of Colombian cocaine cross Venezuela's porous borders each year, the State Department said March 1 in its annual narcotics report, citing "rampant corruption at the highest levels of law enforcement and a weak judicial system." The U.S. no longer considers Vezezuela an ally in the war on drugs, the report says.

Chavez defended Venezuela anti-drug efforts Tuesday, saying the military is eradicating fields of opium poppies along the border with Colombia.

The president also accused the U.S. of holding "a dictatorship" within the United Nations and predicted that the world would eventually revolt against U.S. hegemony.

"Sooner of later, we, the people, the nations, will break this scheme imposed in the United Nations so there are truly free and united countries, not the dictatorship there in the United Nations against the nations and people of the world," he said.

Valley Man Gets 50 Years For Drug Running (BHE)

By SERGIO CHAPA

Brownsville (TX)Herald, March 29, 2006

A federal judge on Tuesday denied a Gulf Cartel member's request to withdraw his guilty plea and sentenced him to 50 years for a cocaine trafficking charge.

Drug Enforcement Administration agents arrested Noel Exinia, 35, in January 2005 after he used his La Feria-based trucking business to move a massive quantity of marijuana and cocaine from Mexico across the United States.

"This case involves multiple, multiple states in a sophisticated operation involving large amounts of drugs," U.S. District Court Andrew S. Hanen said during Exinia's Tuesday afternoon sentencing.

Exinia and co-defendant Cesario Nuñez, 33, moved at least 275 pounds of cocaine a week from the Rio Grande Valley to New York City, according to a criminal complaint filed last year. Nuñez agreed to a plea agreement and was sentenced to three years in federal prison in January.

Court records show that FBI officials also investigated Exinia for an alleged plot to smuggle Middle Eastern terrorists into the United States, based on comments he made to a Michigan pilot, who worked as a confidential government source.

Exinia was cleared of terrorism charges, but federal prosecutors said the La Feria man was a local organizer for the Matamoros-based Gulf Cartel and had a violent criminal history that could not be ignored.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Charles Lewis told Hanen in open court that Exinia had multiple brushes with the law and served a five-year manslaughter sentence for beating a man with a statue of the Virgin Mary, shooting him twice and then stabbing him in the chest.

Lewis said Exinia did not stay out of trouble when he got out of jail in Florida.

"He had a primary role in the (Gulf Cartel's) distribution ring ... a trucking company that was a front for the distribution ring," Lewis said in court. "He was the one who chose who hired the drivers and decided how much to pay them."

Alleged death threats against Lewis and witnesses in the case prompted court officials to move Exinia's late September trial to Houston where the La Feria man fired his attorney William May for telling federal officials about the threats.

Court records show that Exinia pleaded guilty after the fourth day of representing himself in court.

DOJ_NMG_0023239

He filed a request to withdraw his guilty plea earlier this month, based on claims that his was poorly represented by May and that he was not in a sound mental condition at the time of his trial after spending a month in solitary confinement.

May testified Tuesday that extensive wiretapping evidence prompted him to advise Exinia to take a 15-year plea agreement instead of going to trial, but Exinia refused.

Exinia took the stand in his own defense Tuesday where his testimony contradicted an oral plea agreement made in October.

Court records show that Exinia pleaded guilty to trafficking cocaine but testified in court Tuesday that it was actually marijuana. He claims that he should receive a lesser charge for smuggling marijuana and testified that he never threatened anybody, adding that his emotional comments to May were taken out of context.

"I told him that people can kill and get less time than they want to give me," Exinia said.

Hanen sided with prosecutors and denied Exinia's request to withdraw his guilty plea. He will serve the 50-year sentence in a federal prison without the possibility of parole.

Exinia's attorney, John Blaylock, said he successfully argued to have part of his client's sentence reduced. "I'm relieved that he didn't get a life sentence," Blaylock said. "Given the evidence and events that transpired in this bizarre case, he was broken down to where he could say anything after a month of solitary confinement and the daily rigors of a four-day trial."

Blaylock said his client plans to file a motion to reconsider his sentence and file an appeal.

Will Glaspy with the DEA's office in McAllen said his agency was pleased with the sentencing and that agents continue to work on an investigation connected to Exinia's arrest.

"I think this case goes to show the hard work that our agents from the DEA, FBI and local law enforcement have done to successfully dismantle a major drug-trafficking operation that was based in the Rio Grande Valley," Glaspy said. "I think it is important for the public of the Rio Grande Valley to know that the law enforcement agencies are working to keep the public safe and eliminate drug trafficking through the area."

2 Held For Selling Cocaine To Agents (CHIST)

Chicago Sun-Times, March 28, 2006

Two men charged with selling more than $350,000 of cocaine to undercover agents were ordered held in federal custody Tuesday pending a detention hearing.

Melitone Carrera and Saul Rodriguez-Herrera, whose ages and addresses were not immediately available, were named in a criminal complaint charging them each with one count of conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute cocaine.

The two men made their initial court appearance Tuesday before U.S. Magistrate Judge Geraldine Soat Brown, who ordered the defendants to remain in federal custody pending a 1:30 p.m. detention hearing on Friday, according to Assistant U.S. Atty. Patrick McGovern.

Drug Enforcement Administration agents were put on the trail of the defendants when Carrera approached a confidential source in October 2005 and asked the source if he was interested in buying cocaine, according to the complaint. The source contacted the DEA after he was approached by Carrera.

During a March 22, 2006, meeting at a Melrose Park Dunkin' Donuts, Carrera and an unidentified person told the source and an undercover agent that they had access to large amounts of cocaine they could sell at $19,500 per kilogram, the complaint alleges.

The next day, Carrera and the source had a phone conversation, during which Carrera agreed to supply 20 kilograms of cocaine to the source at $19,500 per kilogram, the complaint alleges.

Carrera said he would deliver the drugs on Monday, March 27, and he and the source agreed to conduct the transaction in the parking lot of Tony's Finer Foods in Melrose Park. Carrera allegedly told the source that his cousin would arrive in the parking lot in a red car that contained 18 kilograms of cocaine rather than the 20 they had discussed, the complaint alleges.

The source and undercover agent, both wearing wires, were waiting in the parking lot when a red Mazda pulled in at 11:30 a.m. Monday, according to the complaint. The complaint alleges the Mazda was driven by Rodriguez-Herrera, who went into the store while Carrera slowly drove around the parking lot in a silver Dodge Intrepid.

DOJ_NMG_0023240

A few minutes later Rodriguez-Herrera came out of the store and gave the keys to the Mazda to the agent, the complaint alleges. He told the agent and the source that there were two hidden compartments in the rear seat of the Mazda where they would find the cocaine, according to the complaint.

The source and the agent drove the Mazda to another location, opened the two hidden compartments and found 18 kilogram-sized packages wrapped in plastic and tape. A field test determined the white powder in the packages was cocaine.

The source called Carrera and told him everything was fine and he would send the money back to the grocery store parking lot with the undercover agent, according to the complaint.

The undercover agent and other agents found Rodriguez-Herrera and Carrera at the store, the complaint states. Rodriguez-Herrera was arrested in the parking lot and Carrera was arrested inside the store.

7 Convicted In Meth Case (LYNCHNA)

By Zack Smith

Lynchburg News & Advance, March 29, 2006

Seven people have been convicted in what prosecutors are calling one of the biggest methamphetamine seizures in the area.

Travis Viar, 23, of Amherst, and June Garcia, 26, of Monroe, were convicted of conspiracy to distribute 500 grams or more of meth after a two-day trial in U.S. District Court in Lynchburg on March 21 and 22, according to a release from U.S. Attorney John L. Brownlee.

Ciro Gamaliel Garcia, 32, of Monroe; Randy Eldridge Ellington, 47, of Concord; Mark Shane Guill, 37, of Madison Heights; and Michael Cerillo, 35, of Rustburg, each pleaded guilty on March 20, before the trial started.

Brownlee said in the release that about half a kilogram of meth was seized from the various co-conspirators.

George Barbour, 37, of Madison Heights, pleaded guilty to a lesser charge of conspiracy to distribute 50 grams or more of meth.

He faces a mandatory minimum sentence of five years in prison, with a maximum sentence of 40 years, plus a maximum fine of $2 million.

The other co-defendants face a maximum sentence of life in prison and a maximum fine of $4 million.

Anthony Jamerson, 45, of Dillwyn, was initially indicted in the case, but was later charged in a different drug conspiracy.

The case was investigated by the Central Virginia Task Force, which includes agents and officers from the FBI, the U.S. Marshals Service, the Amherst County Sheriff's Office, the Appomattox County Sheriff's Office, the Virginia State Police and the Lynchburg Police Department.

Ciro Garcia, Ellington, Guill, Cerillo and Barbour will be sentenced on July 19. June Garcia and Viar will be sentenced on July 31.

Pair Who Ran Elaborate Marijuana-growing Operation In Caroline County Sentenced In Federal Court. (FLS)

By BILL FREEHLING

Free Lance-Star, March 28, 2006

Two men who participated in what authorities call one of the largest Central Virginia marijuana operations in the past decade were each sentenced to more than eight years in prison yesterday.

Luu Van Dinh, 35, of Tappahannock, and David Trac Luong, 36, of Colonial Heights, were both sentenced yesterday by Judge Henry E. Hudson in U.S. District Court in Richmond. Each pleaded guilty late last year to conspiracy to manufacture and possess with intent to distribute 1,000 or more marijuana plants.

The pair was involved in a large-scale marijuana-growing operation in Caroline and Powhatan counties that police discovered during raids last summer. Robert Scanlon, a special agent with the Drug Enforcement Administration, testified about the operation yesterday in court.

DOJ_NMG_0023241

Scanlon said marijuana was grown at a 3,000-square-foot house in Caroline located at 25308 Ruther Glen Road. He said marijuana filled most of the house, which he described as like a greenhouse inside. Floors had been cut out, windows were darkened and the home had been rewired.

Scanlon said the home in Powhatan was similarly outfitted. Police also searched a home in Tappahannock, but Scanlon said yesterday that Dinh and Luong couldn't be directly linked to that home. He said that house was in the name of a third person, who hasn't been charged but who Scanlon described as equally involved in the operation.

Scanlon said that police seized more than 1,400 marijuana plants at the homes in the three counties. More than half were at the Caroline house. Scanlon said each plant had a street value of about $3,500. He said the marijuana was extremely high grade.

"I've never seen a case anywhere near this level of sophistication," Judge Hudson said.

Luong, who was described as the daily caretaker of the plants in Caroline and Powhatan, was sentenced to serve 10 years in federal prison.

Judge Hudson determined that Dinh was less involved. Dinh was described as the person who bought and delivered supplies for the operation. Dinh got eight years and a month in prison.

Neither man had any prior criminal record, according to the evidence yesterday.

Through a translator, each man apologized yesterday. Hudson told them he'd consider amending their sentences at a later date if they helped authorities identify other people who were involved.

Dinh and Luong's charges were initially filed in Caroline but were later shifted to federal court because so many jurisdictions were involved and because penalties in federal drug cases are harsher, police said.

Court records show that the initial police searches were the result of a tip received by state police Special Agent Chris Crawford, who learned last April that Dinh was purchasing large quantities of pots and potting soil from a nursery in Hanover County.

Police had Dinh under surveillance when he and another man picked up the pots and took them to Luong's Ruther Glen home.

Crawford spotted marijuana clippings on the property that were consistent with a large growing operation. A large amount of potting soil and two 50-gallon barrels with water nozzles also were spotted, court records state.

Two Sentenced For Growing Marijuana (RTD)

By TOM CAMPBELL

Richmond (VA) Times Dispatch, March 28, 2006

A federal judge yesterday sentenced to prison two men who pleaded guilty to operating "grow houses" modified for cultivating marijuana.

David Trae Luong of Colonial Heights was sentenced to 10 years in prison and Luu Van Dinh of Tappahannock was sentenced to just more than eight years by U.S. District Judge Henry E. Hudson. The men pleaded guilty in December to conspiracy to cultivate and sell more than a thousand marijuana plants.

Hudson agreed with Assistant U.S. Attorney Rodney C. Young that the federal sentencing guidelines on both men failed to take into account the size and sophistication of the marijuana operation Luong and Dinh took part in. Hudson's sentences were well above the guidelines, which are advisory for judges.

Special Agent Robert J. Scanlon of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration said Luong cared for the plants on a regular basis. Dinh assisted and purchased supplies for the cultivation.

"Basically the whole house had been turned into a greenhouse . . . on all the square footage in the residence," Scanlon said.

The houses -- one in Caroline County, one in Powhatan County -- were modified for pot production with flooring removed to make room, industrial lighting to simulate sunlight, irrigation systems and ventilator fans to optimize conditions for the many hundreds of marijuana plants.

DOJ_NMG_0023242

Even the house wiring was modified, both to handle the extra power load and to get around the meter so that the large amount of electricity used would not be noticed. Windows were fitted with opaque coverings so nothing could be seen from the outside.

A third house in Tappahannock was similarly modified as part of the operation, authorities alleged. But Hudson ruled that evidence did not sufficiently connect either defendant to that house.

Authorities believe at least one other person was involved in the conspiracy. Plea agreements call for Luong and Dinh to cooperate with investigators, leaving open the possibility of a recommendation that their sentences be reduced.

Each plant at maturity would have been good for about one pound of high-quality, smokable marijuana, according to testimony.

"There's no doubt it was a large-scale, high-dollar, sophisticated operation," Young said.

Hudson said he has been in law enforcement and jurisprudence a long time and: "I've never seen a [marijuana cultivation] case anywhere near this in size . . . or sophistication."

Former Clemson Student Pleads Guilty To Drug Charges (AIM)

By Meryl Dillman

Anderson Independent Mail, March 28, 2006

A former Clemson University student has pleaded guilty in connection with one of the largest federal prosecutions in South Carolina history, according to the office of United States Attorney Reginald I. Lloyd.

Tremayne Graham, 32, of Marietta, Ga., pleaded guilty in federal court in Greenville to drug and money-laundering conspiracies, possession with intent to distribute 5 kilograms or more of cocaine, maintaining a "stash house" for the purpose of storing cocaine, and failure to appear in court as required by a condition of bond.

According to a release, authorities discovered 250 kilograms of cocaine and more than $1.8 million in cash during the search of the "stash house."

According to the release, Mr. Graham's co-defendant, Jerry Davis, 32, of Atlanta and Los Angeles, pleaded guilty to conspiracy to distribute and possess with intent to distribute 5 kilograms or more of cocaine and conspiracy to launder money.

The defendants' charges are also connected with a multi-state, multi-national drug conspiracy.

The maximum penalty Mr. Graham and Mr. Davis could receive is a $4 million fine and/or imprisonment for life, Mr. Lloyd stated. Both defendants also face a mandatory minimum term of 10 years in federal prison. Other charges are anticipated.

According to the release, testimony at the plea hearings established that Mr. Davis was the head of the "Sin City Mafia"— a major criminal enterprise with headquarters in Columbus, Ga., Atlanta, and Los Angeles. He obtained cocaine from California suppliers connected to major Mexican cartels and transported that cocaine to Atlanta. Once the cocaine reached Atlanta, it was packaged and shipped to various drug dealers operating along the East Coast, including Greenville, Spartanburg and Columbia in South Carolina.

According to the release, "Sin City Mafia" had ties to the Black Mafia Family— a criminal enterprise operating in Detroit, Atlanta, Orlando, Fla., St. Louis and elsewhere.

Evidence also established that Mr. Graham was one of Mr. Davis' primary distributors. According to the release, Mr. Graham supplied a number of South Carolina dealers he met at Clemson.

According to the release, evidence also established that Mr. Graham personally supplied more than 500 kilograms of cocaine sold in South Carolina.

The case was investigated by agents of the Drug Enforcement Administration of Greenville, Atlanta and Los Angeles; the Criminal Investigation Division of the Internal Revenue Service; the United States Marshal Service of Greenville, Atlanta and Los Angeles; the Greenville Police Department; the South Carolina Highway Patrol; and LA IMPACT of Los Angeles.

WASHINGTON Federal Sentencing Rules For Steroids Offenses Toughened (SFC)

By Cicero A. Estrella, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, March 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0023243

Federal officials made a temporary, emergency change to the federal sentencing guidelines Monday to stiffen penalties for steroids-related offenses.

The change by the U.S. Sentencing Commission means abusers of anabolic steroids will face the same sentences as those who abuse other controlled legal substances, categorized by the federal government as Schedule III drugs.

Schedule III drugs are substances that are accepted for medical use in the United States but have the potential for abuse and addiction. As listed by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, they include LSD, ketamine and certain codeine combinations.

The commission's amendment to provide harsher penalties for steroids use and distribution was prompted by a directive from Congress.

"We are hopeful that the enhanced penalties will help deter anabolic steroid trafficking and abuse," U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said.

The amendment to the sentencing guidelines also adds sentencing enhancements for athletes using masking agents to hide their steroid use, for coaches who pressure athletes into experimenting with the drug and for individuals who distribute to athletes.

The tougher guidelines would have made the sentences for those convicted in the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative scandal about five times longer, according to Luke Macaulay, spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office for the Northern District of California.

BALCO owner Victor Conte, for example, would have been sentenced to 37 to 46 months instead of the eight months that he served after pleading guilty to possession and conspiracy to distribute steroids in 2005, Macaulay said.

Previously, steroids-related sentences did not equal those for other Schedule III drugs. Distribution of 50 steroid pills, for example, was the equivalent of the illegal distribution of one Vicodin pill, Macaulay said.

In 2004, Congress passed the Anabolic Steroid Control Act, which directed the Sentencing Commission to review the federal sentencing guidelines and provide for increased penalties that reflect the seriousness of the offenses.

New York Mayor Bloomberg Takes Gun Fight To Congress (AP)

By DEVLIN BARRETT, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) - New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg blasted Congress on Tuesday for considering what he called a "God-awful piece of legislation" on guns. A congressman charged he was just trying to spur more lawsuits against the gun industry.

Bloomberg went to Washington to speak out against a bill offered by Rep. Lamar Smith, R-Texas, which would make permanent a bar on federal authorities' sharing gun trace data with local governments; the governments had used such information to launch lawsuits against gun manufacturers and dealers.

Congress has moved to squelch lawsuits brought by U.S. cities against gun manufacturers and dealers, charging they are misguided attempts to undercut the Second Amendment right to bear arms.

The mayor railed against the bill, telling a House judiciary subcommittee that it would lead to more shooting deaths of police officers and civilians.

Two members of the New York Police Department were killed last year with illegal guns, and two undercover detectives were killed three years ago during a gun buy-and-bust operation gone bad.

"I have been to too many police officers' funerals to believe that this bill actually has a prayer's chance in hell," Bloomberg said. "But if it does pass, the next time an officer is attacked by an illegal gun - and I say next time because until Congress gets serious about illegal guns, more police officers and many more citizens will be murdered - there can be no denying that those who vote for this bill will bear some of the responsibility."

Rep. Tom Feeney, R-Fla., described himself as "a big believer in the Second Amendment" and said that without such legislation local governments could change federal policy by filing multiple baseless lawsuits.

DOJ_NMG_0023244

"Individual jurisdictions are trying to set national policy by suing licensed gun dealers that have not committed a crime," said Feeney.

The mayor claimed Congress left him no choice.

"If we are depending on the federal government to drive this car, they are asleep at the wheel," said Bloomberg, a liberal Republican, who was invited to testify by panel Democrats.

The mayor has grown increasingly critical of Congress for blocking efforts by local authorities to collect gun sale records showing which dealers sell the majority of guns used in crimes.

New York and other cities have long complained that 1 percent of gun dealers are responsible for selling almost 60 percent of all guns used in crimes nationwide.

That trace data, compiled by the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, had been used in lawsuits and in proceedings to revoke the licenses of businesses that sell large numbers of guns later used in crimes.

In recent years, Congress has added language to spending bills to prevent the ATF from sharing such trace data. The ATF has interpreted such language to mean aggregate gun trace data cannot be shared with the public or the press. Smith's bill would make the prohibition permanent.

But a spokesman for Rep. Todd Tiahrt, R-Kan., who first authored that language in 2003, said Monday the ATF is free to release aggregate information about guns used in crimes. Tiahrt spokesman Chuck Knapp said a 2005 appropriations amendment clarified that such information as percentage breakdowns of where guns used in crimes were originally sold could be made public.

Sen. Robert Menendez and Rep. Steve Rothman, both New Jersey Democrats, said they would introduce legislation this week to ensure that data about guns used in crimes and illegal gun sales would be public.

The National Rifle Association supports Smith's bill, saying it would also make permanent a ban on taxes or user fees to pay for federal background checks.

Chris W. Cox, the NRA's chief lobbyist, dismissed Bloomberg's claims, saying the bill would streamline current laws and free up law enforcement resources.

Cox called it "shameless" for the mayor to pin police officers' deaths on federal gun laws.

"If you look at the individuals who were charged with murder of these two great police officers, they had a long criminal history," Cox said. "They never should have been released out of jail. Our focus is on putting people like that in jail. Let's focus on the criminal."

Associated Press Writer Bonnie Pfister in Trenton, N.J., contributed to this report.

ATF Agents Confident They'll Catch Bomber (RMN)

By Ellen Miller, Special to the News

Rocky Mountain News, March 29, 2006

GRAND JUNCTION — Agents with the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms said Tuesday they're confident they will capture a former air traffic controller suspected of planting five bombs at co-workers houses here last week.

"We'll get him," said Rich Marianos, an ATF agent in Washington, D.C.

Marianos said agents don't believe Robert L. Burke, 54, has left the country ``because he doesn't have the means. Indications are, he's been living in his van and he's probably out of resources."

Burke, who also has used the name Robert Pope, was fired in 2004 from his job with the Serco Group, which operates the air traffic tower at Walker Field Airport in Grand Junction and 55 other airports, mostly in the West and Alaska.

Burke gave notice to his landlord last October and left his apartment of four years sometime between then and December, Grand Junction police spokeswoman Linda Bowman said.

No one was injured when three of the bombs in Grand Junction exploded. On Sunday, the ATF linked a bomb that exploded at Serco's headquarters in Murfreesboro, Tenn., with the Grand Junction devices after finding strong similarities.

IMMIGRATION:

DOJ_NMG_0023245

Senate To Weigh Guest-Worker Proposal (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

With the Republican Party deeply divided, the Senate will take up a broad revision of the nation's immigration laws today amid signs that conservatives are ready to compromise on efforts to offer illegal immigrants new avenues to lawful employment.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) will move forward with his legislation to bolster border security and toughen laws against illegal immigration without a guest-worker program. But Frist agreed to allow Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) to quickly move to substitute the more lenient bill that passed his committee Monday, and Specter appears to have more than enough votes to do so.

That bill would couple border security measures with provisions that would allow millions of undocumented workers to apply for legal work visas and move toward U.S. citizenship, while offering hundreds of thousands of foreign workers access to the U.S. workplace.

The committee's bill is a sharp break from the get-tough approach approved by the House in December, which rebuffed President Bush's call for a guest-worker program and focuses exclusively on border security and immigration law enforcement.

The committee measure also places Frist -- a potential 2008 White House candidate -- in a difficult position. The panel approved its immigration overhaul by a comfortable 12 to 6 margin, with four Republicans siding with the panel's Democrats. But most committee Republicans opposed the bill. There may be as many as a dozen Republicans backing the Judiciary Committee bill in the full Senate, but on an issue so fraught with political consequences, it is not yet clear that Frist will allow the Senate to pass immigration legislation that cannot garner the support of most Republicans.

"Under the best of circumstances, most bills don't make it. And this bill is more complicated and in many ways more controversial than usual," warned Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.), who opposed the committee's bill.

Still, with voters clamoring for action and hundreds of thousands of immigrants marching against the House's proposals, GOP leaders signaled a willingness to compromise. The committee's bill, which largely mirrors legislation written by Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), goes considerably further than Bush's proposals, but after a meeting with the president, McCain declared, "I got the impression that he's happy."

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) said that he hopes the Senate will pass what he called "a responsible border security bill," but he indicated he is willing to rethink the House approach. After meeting with ranchers and law enforcement officers on the U.S.-Mexican border, Boehner said those living on the frontier do not think the House-passed border wall would work.

"If the people on the border don't believe that the wall will have the effect that people here think, then we ought to reconsider it," he said.

Boehner also said he knows of no promises that House GOP leaders have given to anti-immigration firebrands to block House consideration of a guest-worker program.

Under the Judiciary Committee bill, illegal immigrants who pay a $1,000 fine and back taxes would be able to apply for a three-year work visa, renewable for a second three-year period. In the fourth year of work, the visa holder could begin a five-year path toward citizenship. A second guest-worker program would open up legal agriculture jobs to 1.5 million undocumented farmworkers.

The measure would also add as many as 14,000 border patrol agents by 2011 to the current force of 11,300 agents and would authorize a "virtual wall" of unmanned vehicles, cameras and sensors to monitor the U.S.-Mexican border.

Unlike the House bill, it would not make illegal immigrants and those who assist them into felons, nor would it authorize the construction of massive new walls along 700 miles of the southern border.

Republican opponents of the committee bill said they would wait to see what amendments pass the Senate before they consider a filibuster of the measure. Citing the passion of his constituents, Sen. John Ensign (R-Nev.) hinted at how politically difficult a filibuster would be. "We need to do something," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0023246

"You don't filibuster away the problem of 11 million undocumented workers," warned Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.), a supporter of the bill. "You don't filibuster away the idea that our borders are broken and our legal system's a failure on immigration."

Immigration Bill Finds Bipartisan Support In Senate (KRT)

By Dave Montgomery

Knight Ridder, March 28, 2006

WASHINGTON - A comprehensive immigration bill that answers President Bush's call for a guest-worker program appears to have enough bipartisan support to pass the Senate, guaranteeing a legislative collision with an enforcement-oriented House bill, several advocates on both sides of the issue predicted Tuesday.

"We're in some trouble in the Senate," said Paul Egan, government-relations director of the Federation for American Immigration Reform (FAIR), which supports the House bill and opposes the guest-worker concept as a form of amnesty for illegal immigration.

The Senate may well deadlock with the House of Representatives because their positions differ so radically and the issue is too politically hot in this congressional election year for lawmakers on either side to compromise. That could doom all legislation to overhaul immigration this year.

The Senate Judiciary Committee voted 12-6 Monday to advance a comprehensive measure that would put millions of illegal immigrants on track to permanent legal status and allow up to 400,000 foreign workers each year to fill low-skilled jobs.

Egan said opponents of the measure put their hopes in the 435-member House, where a coalition of conservative Republicans has vowed to kill immigration legislation that includes a guest worker plan. The 94-member coalition blocked inclusion of a guest worker program in the immigration bill the House passed in December.

The House bill also makes illegal immigration a felony and calls for 700 miles of fences along the Southwest border.

"If the Senate follows the Judiciary Committee's lead, the prospects of getting a reform bill to the president's desk this year are slim, to say the least," said Rep. Tom Tancredo, R-Colorado, coalition leader. "No plan with amnesty and a massive increase in foreign workers will pass the House."

Egan said a "back-of-the-envelope" count of prospective votes in the Senate shows only about 10 solid votes, nearly all Republican, against the bill, while many other Republicans are undecided. The bill is thought to have strong support among Democrats.

Republicans have 55 seats in the Senate. Democrats have 44 and usually win support from the Senate's lone independent, James Jeffords of Vermont. Pro-immigrant groups believe they can count on support from at least nine Republicans, and possibly as many as 14. Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania and three other committee Republicans - Sens. Sam Brownback of Kansas, Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and Mike DeWine of Ohio - voted for the bill.

"I think the Senate is probably foolish enough to pass this bill or something very close to it," said Egan, "but I don't think the House will buy it."

Angela Kelley, deputy director of the National Immigration Forum, which supports the Senate Judiciary bill, offered a similar assessment from an opposing perspective. Democrats are "rather unified" behind the bill, she said. "You add in the Republicans who are supportive, and that's enough to put us over the finish line."

Backers of the bill said its inclusion of a separate guest worker program for up to 1.5 million agricultural workers could bring added votes from rural-state senators.

The measure became entangled in parliamentary uncertainty Tuesday after Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., indicated that he might press ahead with a more-limited border security measure similar to the one passed earlier by the House. Senators nevertheless are expected to begin debate this week - possibly as early as Wednesday - and may vote on both measures.

Specter said that Frist's plan is to allow a day of debate on the enforcement bill, followed by consideration of the committee bill.

DOJ_NMG_0023247

Some lawmakers said it's too early to predict the final outcome in the Senate. Several committee Republicans vowed to offer amendments to change the measure on the Senate floor, including Sens. John Cornyn, R-Tex., and Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., co-sponsors of a rival bill that would require illegal aliens to return home before being eligible to apply for a guest worker program.

The committee bill includes key elements of bipartisan legislation co-sponsored by Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Edward Kennedy, D-Mass. Specter said the bill also embraces Bush's proposed guest worker plan, although the president has not endorsed specific legislation.

"I think they (the White House) believe we're heading in the right direction," said Specter. "We've picked up essentially the president's idea on guest workers."

Asked if the president would veto legislation that does not include a guest worker provision, White House spokesman Scott McClellan reiterated Bush's belief that "any immigration reform ought to be comprehensive . . . including a guest worker program."

Boehner Hints A Back Down On 'Amnesty' (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, March 29, 2006

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner refused yesterday to rule out compromising with the Senate to expand the House border security bill to include a guest-worker program or provisions that opponents call "amnesty."

"Let's wait and see what the Senate can produce," he told reporters yesterday when asked whether House Republicans would reject the Senate Judiciary Committee's proposal to allow the estimated 12 million illegal aliens now in the U.S. to seek citizenship after paying a fine.

Since Monday's Judiciary vote, the Senate appears headed toward approving immigration legislation that strengthens border security some while creating a new guest-worker program and providing a path to U.S. citizenship for illegal aliens already in the country. Republican opponents of the proposal call it "amnesty" since it doesn't deport current illegals for breaking immigration laws.

"The American people are counting on us to secure our borders and restore the rule of law to our immigration system," Sen. Jeff Sessions, Alabama Republican and Judiciary Committee member, said Monday night after voting against the proposal.

He said the panel had "let the American people down by passing out a blanket amnesty bill. We've been down this path several times before, and it proved a failure."

Conservatives were especially appalled to see so many Republicans -- Sens. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, Mike DeWine of Ohio, Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and Sam Brownback of Kansas -- join panel Democrats to approve the proposal.

"It appears that the members of the committee who voted for this misguided legislation are more in tune with the thousands of protesters waving Mexican flags in the streets of Los Angeles than they are with the overwhelming majority of Americans who are demanding that America's borders and national security be protected," said Bill Lauderback, executive vice president of the American Conservative Union. "The first priority of any immigration reform bill must be to secure our borders. By contrast, this bill undermines respect for the rule of law and encourages more illegals to storm our borders."

The only solace for the conservatives has been the House, where many Republicans adamantly oppose any process that permits current illegals to apply for citizenship without first leaving the country. Also, they say Congress must prove to voters that they can enforce existing immigration laws and strengthen the borders before creating any guest-worker program that draws new immigrants.

Mr. Boehner and other House leaders said yesterday they still prefer their border-security-only bill.

"Border security is a huge, huge issue everywhere," said Majority Whip Roy Blunt, Missouri Republican. "House members are on the right side of the issue."

Mr. Blunt declined to give an opinion on the Senate proposal or even whether he considered it amnesty.

"I don't know what the Senate will finally do at the end of the process," he said.

But, like Mr. Boehner, Mr. Blunt indicated he is open to compromise.

DOJ_NMG_0023248

"The critical concern here is clearly securing the border," he said. "What else has to happen with that for the legislative process to work -- you know, we'll let the process work."

Mr. Blunt and House Republican Conference Chair Deborah Pryce of Ohio said yesterday they will be sharing recent polling that shows American voters overwhelmingly supporting the House position of shoring up the borders and enforcing current immigration laws.

"The poll numbers really shout loudly and clearly how the American people feel about this issue," Mrs. Pryce said.

Though Mr. Boehner repeatedly sidestepped reporters' questions about his -- or the House leadership's -- stance on the Senate proposal, he did say that he hopes that whatever is sent to President Bush more closely reflects the House bill.

"The House has passed a responsible border security bill," he said. "While this was a very difficult issue for this Congress, I think the American people expect us to strengthen our borders and so I'm hopeful the Senate will do the same."

Lawmakers Are Preparing For Big Battle On Immigrants (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 28 — Leading Congressional Republicans voiced serious reservations Tuesday about a new Senate immigration proposal as lawmakers braced for a difficult debate that will highlight ideological divisions among Senate Republicans as well as with their counterparts in the House.

The Senate was scheduled on Wednesday to turn to a plan by Senator Bill Frist, the majority leader, for tougher border controls and stricter law enforcement, with the expectation that a bipartisan proposal that allows illegal immigrants to qualify for citizenship would be proposed as an alternative.

Mr. Frist, a Tennessee Republican, said that bipartisan initiative, approved by the Judiciary Committee on Monday, was not satisfactory. "It went too far," he said.

Lawmakers acknowledged that the Senate faced days of contentious debate and that any final measure would be different from both the Frist plan and the Judiciary Committee proposal. It will also probably differ sharply with a House-approved plan that focused on slowing the influx of illegal immigrants.

Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the majority leader, said Tuesday that he did not want to rush to judgment on whether the House and Senate could eventually agree on a bill. But Mr. Boehner said the House would stand by its focus on law enforcement and border protection.

"Illegal immigration is just that, illegal," he said, "and Americans expect us to do something about illegal immigration."

Mr. Boehner said he was willing to reconsider a House-approved plan to construct a 700-mile-long fence along the nation's southwest border. But President Bush, in an interview with CNN on Tuesday, said he was opposed to that idea, saying it was impractical.

"I don't think anybody believes that you could totally fence off the border and be effective," Mr. Bush said. "But I do think we ought to be in a position to give our Border Patrol agents better tools, more effective ways to prevent people from smuggling people and/or drugs across our border."

Democrats were generally supportive of the Judiciary Committee plan, lawmakers said. But there were divisions among them as well, particularly with some labor leaders opposing a temporary worker program that they see as a threat to American jobs.

"I don't think there's 100 percent support in my caucus for what time of the day it is," said Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader. "But the vast majority of the Democrats support this bill."

Despite the looming political and policy fights, lawmakers in both parties said it was time for Congress to move ahead on the issue.

"We've put off this problem for too long," said Senator Jon Kyl, Republican of Arizona. "And I can tell you that in my state, we need a solution to this because every month that it is put off, the problem becomes more and more difficult to solve."

AFL-CIO Chief Slams Guest Worker Programs (AP)

By David Espo

The AP, March 28, 2006

The nation's largest labor organization on Tuesday criticized plans to expand guest worker programs for immigrants seeking to come to the United States, parting company with longtime Senate Democratic allies who pushed successfully to include them in broad-based immigration legislation.

"Guest worker programs are a bad idea and harm all workers," AFL-CIO President John Sweeney said in a statement released the day after the Senate Judiciary Committee cleared an immigration bill. "They cast workers into a perennial second-class status, and unfairly put their fates into their employers' hands."

Sweeney's statement praised numerous provisions of the overall immigration legislation, particularly a part that gives illegal aliens an opportunity to apply for citizenship. Still, his criticism underscored the unusual political pressures at work as President Bush and Congress grapple with an emotional issue in the run-up to midterm elections.

Republicans have long appeared divided over the immigration issue, with Bush and some GOP members of Congress supporting temporary worker programs that other Republicans attack as amnesty for lawbreakers.

On the other hand, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (news, bio, voting record), D-Mass., a longtime liberal, was the target of good-natured jokes during the committee meeting for his work with the U.S. Chamber of Commerce on the immigration measure. And while Sweeney criticized the temporary worker program, the Service Employees International Union issued a statement supporting the Judiciary Committee measure.

The legislation, to be debated on the Senate floor beginning Wednesday, includes two provisions that together could create room for nearly 2 million temporary workers.

One is a five-year temporary program for up to 1.5 million agricultural workers advanced by Sen. Dianne Feinstein (news, bio, voting record), D-Calif. Immigrants living in the U.S. illegally as well as those outside the country would be eligible.

The other, backed by Kennedy, would create a new temporary visa to allow as many as 400,000 foreign workers into the country.

In both cases, individuals would have an opportunity to apply for citizenship after several years.

All eight Democrats on the Judiciary Committee supported both guest worker provisions on Monday, and all of them frequently work in concert with organized labor.

Feinstein said during the committee meeting that the agriculture industry was "almost entirely dependent on undocumented workers," a reference to individuals in the country illegally. She described her proposal as an attempt to assure a legal workforce. "The people are here. They're going to work regardless," she said of thousands of illegal immigrants who pick crops.

Kennedy, arguably labor's strongest voice in Congress, noted that the proposal "has the support of agribusiness and farm workers." Sen. Patrick Leahy (news, bio, voting record) of Vermont, another longtime ally of labor, said he, too, was satisfied with the program, noting that it had provisions that would help his state's dairy industry. Sen. Charles Schumer (news, bio, voting record) of New York added that he had no difficulty with the provision, either, as long as there were no problems associated with farms in his state. The New York Democrat is chairman of the party's senatorial committee, which relies on labor's support.

Sweeney saw things differently.

"Guest worker programs "encourage employers to turn good jobs into temporary jobs at reduced wages and diminished working conditions and contribute to the growing class of workers laboring in poverty," he said.

Sweeney issued his statement as White House spokesman Scott McClellan told reporters that Bush wants a temporary worker program included in any immigration measure that clears Congress. "Because what a temporary worker program would do is help relieve pressure on the border. It will allow our law enforcement officials and Border Patrol agents to focus on those who are coming here for the wrong reasons, the criminals and the drug dealers and the terrorists," he said.

The House has yet to pass legislation dealing with immigration issues involving workers, although it has approved a bill that calls for building a fence along 700 miles of the border with Mexico.

Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, who voted to approve the fence project, indicated he may change his mind based on a recent trip to the Southwest. He told reporters he had met with farmers as well as law enforcement officials and "no one in the room thought the wall would work, because if you build the wall, then you have to police the wall."

DOJ_NMG_0023250

He added: "If the people on the border don't believe the wall will have the effect that people here think, then we ought to reconsider it."

Aid Groups Greet Panel's Illegals Bill (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, March 29, 2006

The immigration bill approved by the Senate Judiciary Committee on Monday eases the concerns of religious and humanitarian aid workers, who feared they would face criminal charges for helping illegal aliens.

But many religious and humanitarian aid groups still worry about a provision in the House-passed immigration bill that they say would criminalize such assistance.

The issue has become among the most debated in the immigration battle.

"We're not talking about a legal debate anymore; we're talking about a moral one," said Cristina Lopez, deputy executive director of the Center for Community Change, which organized an event Monday led by hundreds of clergy. "Scripture says you help your neighbor. That's what the Judeo-Christian tradition, the Muslim tradition ... is about," she said.

Democrats have seized on the religious community's concern, with Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York declaring last week that the House bill "would literally criminalize the good Samaritan and probably even Jesus himself," according to the Associated Press.

"I am not really surprised that Hillary Clinton doesn't know the first thing about the Bible," Rep. Tom Tancredo, Colorado Republican, retorted Sunday on ABC's "This Week." "Her impression, her analysis, her interpretation of both the law and the Bible are certainly wrong, to say the least."

The bill approved by the House in December would, among other things, modify a law that punishes anyone who helps foreigners sneak into the country or harbors illegal aliens from authorities.

Supporters of the House bill -- including its author, House Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., Wisconsin Republican -- say the provision is aimed at people who make a living trafficking foreigners into the country.

"I would hope everyone would embrace a good-faith effort to combat alien-smuggling gangs rather than engage in fear mongering that clergy and good Samaritans will be thrown in jail. That's absolutely false," Mr. Sensenbrenner said Monday.

However, Bernadette Passade Cisse, vice president for policy and advocacy at the Lutheran Immigration and Refugee Service, said the House provision would be "a huge stumbling block to very essential services."

Kevin Appleby, director of migration and refugee policy for the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, said the House bill "overreached" in several areas, including the provision on aid to illegal aliens.

"That was particularly offensive because it conflicts against the basic mission of the church," Mr. Appleby said.

He said the House bill "could criminalize minor acts of mercy," such as meals and first aid, and subject religious workers to prison.

"That's not the case at all," said Jeff Lungren, a spokesman for Mr. Sensenbrenner.

The government has no interest in spending time or money to prosecute priests, rabbis and other workers who offer food, shelter and assistance to illegal aliens, he said.

But the groups say verbal assurances aren't enough.

"We appreciate the spoken intent of the proponents. However, once a law is passed, it's on the books, and prosecutors and judges can interpret it however they'd like," Mr. Appleby said.

Republican Split On Immigration Reflects Nation's Struggle (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 28 — It is almost as if they are looking at two different Americas.

The Senate Republicans who voted on Monday to legalize the nation's illegal immigrants look at the waves of immigration reshaping this country and see a powerful work force, millions of potential voters and future Americans.

DOJ_NMG_0023251

The House Republicans who backed tough border security legislation in December look at the same group of people and see a flood of invaders and lawbreakers who threaten national security and American jobs and culture.

But both wings of the deeply divided Republican Party are responding to the same phenomenon: the demographic shift driven by immigration in recent decades, a wave that is quietly transforming small towns and cities across the country and underscoring pressures on many parts of the economy.

The United States has always been a nation of immigrants, but today the country has more than 33 million foreign-born residents, the largest number since the Census started keeping such statistics in 1850. In 2003, foreign-born residents made up 11.7 percent of the population, the highest percentage since 1910. And over the past 16 years, the newcomers, many of them illegal, have poured into places in the South and Midwest that have not seen sizeable numbers of new immigrants in generations.

The question of how to cope with the 11 million illegal immigrants believed to be living here — whether to integrate them, ignore them or try to send them home somehow — is a question gripping many ordinary citizens, religious leaders, state legislators and policy makers in the White House. And in their bitter, fractious debate, Republicans in Congress are reflecting what some describe as the nation's struggle to define itself and, to some degree, politically align itself, during a period of social change.

The Senate Republicans on the Judiciary Committee who emerged victorious on Monday with help from Democrats argue that those illegal immigrants who work, pay taxes and learn English should be fully incorporated into American society as citizens. The House Republicans who passed a far different bill in December are pushing to criminalize their presence in the United States. (The full Senate is expected to vote on immigration legislation next week. Any bill that passes the Senate will have to be reconciled with the House legislation.)

As the party struggles to reconcile these competing visions, frustrations over the stalemate are spilling onto the airwaves and into the streets as some conservatives on talk radio call for a wall to be built along the Mexican border and tens of thousands immigrants and their supporters march in favor of citizenship.

"Right now, we're seeing to some extent the political response to the demography," said Roberto Suro, executive director of the Pew Hispanic Center, a nonpartisan research group in Washington. "And even though the legislative proposals are seemingly technical and narrow, they touch these nerves about how we think of ourselves as a people."

"You end up, after a point, trying to balance our fundamental traditions, the need for order, law and security with a need for openness," he said. "Immigration policy, writ large, has always been partly a matter of national identity. It becomes a values-laden debate. Congress has a hard time with it."

That difficulty reflects, in part, the swiftness and the enormousness of the demographic shift.

In 1970, there were 9.6 million foreign-born residents in the country, census data show. By 1980, that figure had surged to 14.1 million. Between 1990 and 2000, the number of foreign-born residents jumped to 31.1 million from 19.8 million.

Senator Sam Brownback, Republican of Kansas, who voted for the legalization of illegal immigrants on Monday, says he has seen and felt the shift in his own state.

"Huge increase," he said of the number of new immigrants. "It's a big issue, and it's one where communities that have adapted to it are more accepting and others are more questioning about the scale of what's taking place."

But when he wrestled with the issue, Mr. Brownback decided that he could not join the ranks of those who wanted simply to push out illegal immigrants. "This is also about the hallmark of a compassionate society, what you do with the widows, the orphans and the foreigners among you," he said.

Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, echoed those thoughts in his defense of the legalization program, which would ultimately grant immigrants citizenship.

"Where is home?" Mr. Graham asked his colleagues Monday. "Their home is where they've raised their children. Their home is where they've lived their married lives."

"Whatever we do," he added, "we have to recognize that for several generations people have made America their home."

But to Representative Tom Tancredo, the Colorado Republican who helped spearhead the border security bill in the House, illegal immigrants are far from welcome or essential to this country.

DOJ_NMG_0023252

He was not moved when he saw the tens of thousands of immigrants, some illegal, and their supporters rallying against his bill. He said he was outraged that people he viewed as lawbreakers felt comfortable enough to stand without fear in front of the television cameras.

"For years, the government has turned a blind eye to illegal immigrants who break into this country," Mr. Tancredo said. "It isn't any wonder that illegal aliens now act as if they are entitled to the rights and privileges of citizenship."

Mr. Tancredo's view of the illegal immigrant as an unwanted outsider, an encroacher, is far from uncommon.

The National Conference of State Legislatures has reported a surge in recent years in legislation intended to crack down on illegal immigrants. As of Feb. 28, state legislators in 42 states had introduced 368 bills related to immigration or immigrants, and many of those bills were intended to limit or restrict illegal immigrants.

But some Republicans are warning now that tough anti-immigrant legislation may fuel a backlash and threaten the party's hard-won gains with Hispanics, whose numbers have surged in recent years.

Foreign-born Hispanics voted for President Bush in 2004 at a 40 percent greater rate than Hispanics born in the United States. Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform and a strategist close to the White House, warned that Republicans could squander what the party had gained if lawmakers did not embrace a more welcoming vision of America.

"There is a danger that if the face of the Republican Party is Tancredo that we could be weaker with Hispanics for generations," Mr. Norquist said. "If the face of the Republican Party is George Bush or Ronald Reagan, we win. This is up for grabs."

A GOP Faceoff Over Illegal Immigration (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON - Senate majority leader Bill Frist and GOP Sen. Sam Brownback stood together on trade, war, judges, guns, energy, abortion, and war, but they are bookends in this week's debate on "earned" amnesty for illegal aliens - the toughest issue before the Senate this year.

They illustrate the rift that runs through both parties, but especially the GOP, which controls both the House and Senate. That rift yawns so large that it could keep Congress from passing any immigration legislation this year.

Senator Frist, a prospect for a presidential run in 2008, wants a "virtual barrier" to secure borders first. It's about what it means to be a nation, he says: "A nation that can't secure its borders can't secure its destiny or administer its laws."

Senator Brownback, also a prospect for 2008, backs border security, but says he also wants a way to get 11 million undocumented people into a legalized status. It's about human dignity, he says: "One of the key measures in any society is what you do for the so-called least of these."

Polls show a strong majority of Republican voters oppose amnesty for those in the country illegally, but business groups, a core GOP constituency, want to assure a supply of low-wage workers for agriculture, construction, restaurant, and other services.

For Frist, who stumbled badly over his handling of the Terri Schiavo debacle a year ago, it's a chance to lead his party through a political mine field. "I'm here to solve problems, not stand around," he said in a statement on the floor of the Senate early Monday afternoon.

Frist had given the Senate Judiciary Committee an ultimatum: Produce a bill by end-of-day Monday, or the Senate would take up his own immigration reform plan. Brownback is one of four Republicans on the Senate Judiciary Committee, including chairman Arlen Specter (R) of Pennsylvania, to side with Democrats in a bid for comprehensive immigration reform this session of Congress.

The Judiciary Committee's bill opens a path to citizenship for at least 11 million people living in the United States illegally. It allows those who were in the US before 2004 to get a temporary work visa, if they pay a $1,000 fine and clear a criminal background check. After six years, they would be eligible for permanent legal residence, if they learn English and pay back taxes and another $1,000 fine.

DOJ_NMG_0023253

Frist's alternative, still in play, focuses exclusively on border security. That means more boots on the borders, unmanned aerial vehicles, cameras, sensors, and "a virtual barrier to cover every mile of our 1,950-mile long border with Mexico." (The House bill also includes a 700-mile wall along the southern border.)

The Frist bill also requires employers to verify the legal status of their workers, using a federal electronic database. Those employers engaging in a pattern of hiring illegal workers would face up to six months in jail. Those living in the country illegally are guilty of a misdemeanor; under the House bill, it's a felony.

Right up until the last vote late Monday afternoon, prospects for completing the complex bill looked unlikely. In the end, committee chairman Specter, as well as GOP Sens. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, Mike DeWine of Ohio, and Brownback of Kansas lined up with all eight Democrats on the panel to complete a bill. The 12-to-6 vote electrified pro-immigration groups, who jammed the back of the Judiciary panel's hearing room.

"I'm guessing we'll get 40 Democrats and 20 to 30 Republicans who will vote for comprehensive reform," says Frank Sharry, executive director of the National Immigration Forum, a Washington advocacy group. "The idea is to get the best possible product out of the Senate, either as a prelude to a conference that goes the Senate's way - or a train wreck," he adds.

About six months ago, Mr. Sharry says he asked Brownback why, as a potential presidential candidate, he would be willing to risk alienating conservative voters, especially in Iowa, an early caucus state. "He told us, 'It's in the Bible.' He has pages of Scripture that refer to welcoming the stranger," he says.

"In all our talking to politicians, I'd never heard that," Sharry adds.

Brownback says he doesn't recall that meeting but stands by the comment. "What makes it tough is that we want to be a nation of laws," he says. "As I talk to people across Iowa, a number of people have questioned me on the immigration system. People aren't anti-immigrant, but they don't want the laws broken."

Senators on both sides of the aisle are watching the massive mobilization of immigrants, legal and illegal, in the streets of major US cities. "There is no question that what happened out in Chicago and Michigan made a big difference," said Sen. Edward Kennedy (D) of Massachusetts, a cosponsor with Sen. John McCain (R) of Arizona of immigration reform that includes a path to legalization for illegals.

Frist had been gearing up for a procedural clash with Democratic leader Harry Reid, who had threatened a filibuster. Now, he must repair rifts in his own caucus. Opposing immigration bills

The Senate Judiciary Committee approved Monday an immigration bill that differs markedly from one passed by the House this past December. Here are key points:

• Judiciary - Illegal immigrants in the US before 2004 may work legally for six years if they pay a $1,000 fine and have no criminal record. They become eligible for permanent residence upon paying another $1,000 fine and any back taxes and learning English.

• House - Makes illegal presence in the US a felony. Requires detention of all non-Mexican illegal immigrants arrested when entering the US and mandatory sentences for those smuggling them in.

• Judiciary - Creates a pilot guest-worker program for some 1.5 million farm workers. New immigrants may obtain temporary work visas. Both groups can earn permanent residence.

• House - Does not include a guest-worker program. Requires all employers to use a database to verify Social Security numbers of employees within six years or face civil or criminal penalties.

• Judiciary - More than doubles the number of Border Patrol agents by 2011. Authorizes a "virtual wall" of unmanned vehicles, cameras, and sensors to monitor the US-Mexico border.

• House - Requires building two-layer fences along 700 miles of the 2,000-mile border between Mexico and the US.

Source: The Associated Press

Immigration Splits Republican Lawmakers (WSJ)

By June Kronholz And David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0023254

WASHINGTON -- With Congress embarked on a debate about immigration, and tens of thousands of protestors taking to the streets, the issue is exposing significant divisions among lawmakers.

The debate is gathering steam at a time when the country seems uncertain whether immigration is a net plus or minus for the nation. Those who worry most about security along borders find themselves aligned against foes -- including many in the business community -- who argue that the flow of workers is producing not only a vibrant economy but also a more vibrant nation.

Even in states with a deep interest in immigration matters -- Arizona, for example -- the divides are driving congressional colleagues from the same party into opposing corners. Those divides will become more apparent when Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee opens Senate floor debate today on immigration overhaul. Because of differences with the House over the treatment of future guest workers and the millions of undocumented immigrants already here, final enactment may be impossible this election year -- even if a package gets past the Senate.

Under an agreement reached yesterday, Mr. Frist will call up his own border-security bill first. But after a day's debate, the much broader measure reported from the Senate Judiciary Committee Monday will be offered as a substitute. The bill passed by a 12-6 vote, with the majority of Republicans on the panel opposing it.

Like Mr. Frist's proposal, the Judiciary bill would boost enforcement, but it goes further by establishing a regulatory framework for guest workers and inviting undocumented immigrants to come forward and try to legalize their position without having to first return home. This will surely meet resistance from the House, and despite strong ties to business interests supporting the Senate bill, House Majority Leader John Boehner of Ohio was hesitant to go as far as the language in the Judiciary bill.

"We are going to have to find a way to do what the American people expect of us, and that is pass a strong border-security bill," Mr. Boehner said. Asked if the public expects a guest-worker program as well, he said, "I don't know."

Democrats have their own divisions over immigration policy, but the splits among Republicans are more significant because they control the Congress and the White House. Some Republicans fear that to make short-term gains with conservatives in November, the party may damage itself permanently with the growing Hispanic vote. And the Senate jockeying between Sen. Frist and Sen. John McCain (R., Ariz.), who supports a more comprehensive approach to immigration overhaul, could be a prelude to the 2008 presidential campaign.

In the past week, President Bush has cautioned Congress against passing a bill that only toughens enforcement. After meeting with the president yesterday, Mr. McCain said, "His body language was good for me."

House Republicans are skittish and divided. The Arizona congressional delegation mirrors this rift. Thanks to its long, largely unfenced border with Mexico, the state is home to an estimated 500,000 illegal immigrants out of a population of six million.

For example, Jeff Flake, a conservative Republican congressman from Mesa, has allied with Mr. McCain and supports legislation close to the Judiciary bill. J.D. Hayworth, from Scottsdale, is another conservative Republican representative -- and one with opposing views. He has written a book that proposes building a fence along the U.S.-Mexico border, using the armed forces to help patrol the area and denying citizenship to the U.S.-born children of illegal immigrants.

Arizona's senators -- Jon Kyl and Mr. McCain -- both want to help the estimated 11 million illegal immigrants already here to stay in the U.S. legally, but they disagree over how. The Kyl approach wants illegal immigrants to go home before returning as guest workers, and doesn't offer them citizenship.

In the House, Republican John Shadegg, who represents Phoenix, favors a guest-worker program, but helped broker the House immigration bill that didn't include one. Jim Kolbe, also a Republican, wants employers to have access to thousands more legal immigrants.

With the Republicans at odds, the delegation's two Democrats find themselves largely bypassed in the debate, even though both are Hispanic.

Mr. Flake represents the pro-business wing of the Republican Party, which argues that the booming construction and service industries need perhaps a half-million new immigrants yearly to offset a shrinking supply of American workers.

DOJ_NMG_0023255

From his youth on a ranch in the 1970s, the congressman recalls that Mexicans working on farms and ranches in the border state routinely were hired for a couple of years, traveled home often and left for good after earning some money. His bill -- co-sponsored by Mr. Kolbe and close to the Judiciary bill -- proposes a guest-worker plan that would restore that pattern.

Because immigrants could travel home, they would be disinclined to settle in the U.S., easing the budget pressures and cultural tensions that fuel anti-immigrant sentiments now, Mr. Flake argues. That is a prediction the bill's critics dispute, however.

Mr. Hayworth represents the security-first wing of the party, which argues that the porous border is an invitation to another terrorist attack and a giveaway to employers who benefit from the low wages that unchecked immigration allows them to pay.

Mr. Hayworth argues that lax enforcement of immigration laws has created a vast illegal underground where terrorists hide and immigrants willing to work for low pay are depressing wages. That cheap labor, he says, enables employers to shift health and welfare costs to taxpayers. Without it, he says, employers either would pay higher wages or mechanize more jobs, a view endorsed by policy groups and economists who favor restricting immigration.

Business is a player: the U.S. Chamber of Commerce opposed the House enforcement provisions because of the adverse effect on employers. By contrast the business-sponsored National Immigration Forum described the bipartisan vote in the Senate panel as "a big day for immigrants, a bigger day for America."

AFL-CIO President John Sweeney yesterday joined in praising the Senate committee's broader approach. But he and others in organized labor warned their own Democratic allies that they are skeptical of the reliance on guest-employee regimens, which "cast workers into a perennial second-class status and unfairly put their fates into their employers' hands," Mr. Sweeney said.

How The GOP Can Survive The Immigration Debate (HILL)

By Dick Morris

The Hill, March 29, 2006

The immigration bill pending in Congress poses as crucial a test for GOP efforts to reach out to Hispanic voters as the 1964 Civil Rights Act did in determining the future partisan preferences of America's African-Americans.

In 1964, the Republican Party, led by Barry Goldwater, was painted as sacrificing the interests of civil rights to its goal of attracting Southern support, although Republicans backed the bill in far greater numbers than Democrats did. But when Goldwater ran for president rejecting civil rights legislation, it doomed GOP chances among black voters for at least the next 40 years.

Will the Republican need to appease its anti-immigration base similarly vitiate President Bush's efforts to appeal to Hispanic voters?

Hispanics, let's remember, were the swing voter group in 2004. Having voted for Al Gore by 30 points in 2000, they sufficiently trusted Bush to back Sen. John Kerry by only an eight-point margin. If the Republican Party now turns its back on these newly swing Latino voters, it may permanently lose its ability to win America's fastest-growing voter group, perhaps dooming the party altogether.

But the demands of the GOP base must also be accommodated. Here's how:

One must separately consider the three key elements of immigration reform under discussion: The border fence, the guest-worker program and the criminalization of illegal aliens and those who employ them.

The GOP base wants a fence. It is vital to the entire concept of whether or not we can control our borders. All efforts to beef up manpower on the border have failed to stem the daily flow of illegal immigrants from Mexico. A fence is the only way to do it. By backing a fence and demonstrably taking control of our southern border, the Republican Party will appease the demands of its base.

But to prevent disaster among Latino voters, it must accompany the fence with a more liberal policy on guest workers and criminalization.

Simply put, the fence must have a gate that swings open for immigrants we want and need. To avoid permanently antagonizing our southern neighbors and to keep the labor supply on which so much of American business and prosperity depend, we need a guest-worker program.

DOJ_NMG_0023256

The GOP base, happy with the fence, will probably go along with it. Whatever the Congress needs to do to differentiate the guest-worker program from amnesty it should do, but it must pass a generous guest-worker program. (If it is necessary for those here illegally to return to Mexico and reenter as registered and enrolled guest workers, to convince the right that a guest-worker program is not amnesty, so be it).

With a 4.7 percent unemployment rate, we will be slitting our own throats by denying our economy access to Mexican workers. We just need to make them legal, not illegal. With a border fence to enforce the difference, a guest-worker program will work politically.

And it is also important for the Republicans to avoid symbolic acts like making it a felony to be here illegally or to employ someone who is. The same practical deterrence is quite possible through the fence, and merely upgrading the jail time from a misdemeanor to a felony won't make much practical difference.

Judges, in any event, are not about to crowd our jails with millions of felony illegal entrants. Deportation is and will be the answer to those we catch — and deportation has new meaning with a fence in place.

Yes to the fence, yes to guest workers and no to greater criminalization are the keys to giving the Republican Party access to Latino votes in the future while coping with an issue that roils tens of millions of Americans.

Morris, a former political adviser to Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) and President Bill Clinton, is the author of Condi vs. Hillary: The Next Great Presidential Race.

The GOP Walks A Border Tightrope (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

Karl Rove must be seeing Pete Wilson in his nightmares.

President Bush's architect has been laboring to build up the GOP among Hispanic voters, and he's been succeeding: Bush won more than 40 percent of the Hispanic vote in 2004, double the level attained by Bob Dole eight years earlier. Some of that is attributable to Hispanic voters' particular affinity for Bush, a former border state governor. But the change has been marked enough to make some smart Democrats fear they're at risk of losing their hold on a large and fast-growing slice of voters.

Now, though, with thousands demonstrating against a House-passed immigration bill that is all crackdown and no mercy, Rove's project is imperiled. The GOP -- riven between an enforcement-only approach and Bush's kinder, gentler immigration reform -- is risking a national repeat of Wilson's experience as governor of California over a decade ago.

Wilson pushed for Proposition 187, the 1994 initiative to deny state services to illegal immigrants, and won -- with disastrous results for the California GOP. Hispanic turnout in the next election surged, and the GOP's share of the Hispanic vote fell, from 31 percent between 1988 and 1994 to 23 percent from 1996 through 2000.

The current immigration debate, said Leslie Sanchez, who advises Republicans on Hispanic issues, "is Prop. 187 on steroids. It's real easy for a lot of my fellow Republican pollsters to say, 'This is red meat for conservatives, let's go out and pound this issue.' The deeper ramifications are that it turns off women and other ethnic minorities and turns on Hispanics, who are now mobilized against us."

Former Republican National Committee chairman Ed Gillespie invokes as well the more recent experience of Virginia gubernatorial candidate Jerry Kilgore, who ran anti-immigration ads and lost. "Anti-immigration rhetoric is a political siren's song, and Republicans must resist its lure . . . or our majority will crash on its shoals," he told the Federalist Society last week.

The difficulty for Republicans, though, is that their short-term political interests -- winning in November -- are arguably at odds with their long-term viability as a majority party. Their base is demoralized about the party's performance and riled up about immigration. Pushing for tough restrictions and resisting anything that has the whiff of leniency toward those who entered the country illegally may be the best way for Republicans to get their voters to the polls in November. And the recent protests, as unnerving as they are for Rove's dream of a GOP-inclined Hispanic electorate, also have the perverse effect of further enraging those already inflamed about immigration.

DOJ_NMG_0023257

"White suburban voters who voted for George Bush are disaffected now," says Republican pollster Tony Fabrizio. "Would I rather be talking about immigration reform with these voters or the war? Immigration reform or gasoline prices? Sometimes, in order to avoid or avert the tidal wave, you have to do things that short-term make a little more sense than they do in the long term."

Public polls bear out Fabrizio's assessment. A recent NBC-Wall Street Journal poll, for example, found that 71 percent of voters said they would be more likely to favor a candidate who supports tighter controls on immigration; just 11 percent said that would tilt them to oppose. The percentage of voters who said the government was not doing enough to secure the nation's borders has gone from 54 percent in November 2001 to 78 percent, according to a Fox News poll.

And voters, especially Republicans, are hostile to proposals to ease the legal path for those in the country illegally. A February poll by the Quinnipiac University Polling Institute showed 62 percent (71 percent of Republicans and 55 percent of Democrats) opposed to making it easier for illegal immigrants to become citizens. A narrower majority, 54 percent (59 percent of Republicans, 52 percent of Democrats) opposed making it easier for illegal immigrants to work here. Some strategists argue that voters would support stepped-up enforcement plus reform, but that may contain more than a dollop of wishful thinking: Fueled by the kerosene of talk radio and cable news, this is not exactly a nuanced debate.

But if Republicans are about to hand Democrats a gift on immigration, Democrats have been treating the issue more like a hot potato. Spooked that immigration may become a GOP base-energizing issue, much like gay marriage in 2004, they are torn between trying to protect themselves against charges that they are soft on the issue and trying to seize the opportunity to attract Hispanic voters.

An illustration of that ambivalence came with the House vote in December in which 36 Democrats, including all the vulnerable incumbents, voted for the House bill. Much as with Democrats' self-imposed silence on the Bush tax cuts during the 2002 campaign, it's a bit hard to capitalize on an anti-immigration vote backed by some of your own troops.

And indeed, Democrats aren't doing much in the way of capitalizing. A New American Media poll of legal immigrants, released yesterday, found that while only 22 percent said the Republican Party was doing a good job on immigration, the approval rating for the Democrats wasn't all that impressive either: 38 percent. "There's anger out there" among immigrants, says Democratic pollster Sergio Bendixen, who conducted the survey. "But there's also a feeling that the Democrats are not much better."

Mexican Illegals Vs. American Voters (WT)

By Tony Blankley

The Washington Times, March 29, 2006

It is lucky America has more than two centuries of mostly calm experience with self-government. We are going to need to fall back on that invaluable patrimony if the immigration debate continues as it has started this season. The Senate is attempting to legislate into the teeth of the will of the American public. The Senate Judiciary Committeemen — and probably a majority of the Senate — are convinced that they know that the American people don't know what is best for them.

National polling data could not be more emphatic — and has been so for decades. Gallup Poll (March 27) finds 80 percent of the public wants the federal government to get tougher on illegal immigration. A Quinnipiac University Poll (March 3) finds 62 percent oppose making it easier for illegals to become citizens (72 percent in that poll don't even want illegals to be permitted to have driver's licenses). Time Magazine's recent poll (Jan. 24-26) found 75 percent favor "major penalties" on employers of illegals, 70 percent believe illegals increase the likelihood of terrorism and 57 percent would use military force at the Mexican-American border.

An NBC/Wall Street Journal poll (March 10-13) found 59 percent opposing a guest-worker proposal, and 71 percent would more likely vote for a congressional candidate who would tighten immigration controls.

An IQ Research poll (March 10) found 92 percent saying that securing the U.S. border should be a top priority of the White House and Congress.

Yet, according to a National Journal survey of Congress, 73 percent of Republican and 77 percent of Democratic congressmen and senators say they would support guest-worker legislation.

DOJ_NMG_0023258

I commend to all those presumptuous senators and congressmen the sardonic and wise words of Edmund Burke in his 1792 letter to Sir Hercules Langrishe: "No man will assert seriously, that when people are of a turbulent spirit, the best way to keep them in order is to furnish them with something substantial to complain of." The senators should remember that they are American senators, not Roman proconsuls. Nor is the chairman of the Judiciary Committee some latter-day Praetor Maximus.

But if they would be dictators, it would be nice if they could at least be wise (until such time as the people can electorally forcefully project with a violent pedal thrust their regrettable backsides out of town). It was gut-wrenching (which in my case is a substantial event) to watch the senators prattle on in their idle ignorance concerning the manifold economic benefits that will accrue to the body politic if we can just cram a few million more uneducated illegals into the country. (I guess ignorance loves company.) Beyond the Senate last week, in a remarkable example of intellectual integrity (in the face of the editorial positions of their newspapers) the chief economic columnists for the New York Times and The Washington Post — Paul Krugman and Robert Samuelson, respectively — laid out the sad facts regarding the economics of the matter. Senators, congressmen and Mr. President, please take note.

Regarding the Senate's and the president's guest-worker proposals, The Post's Robert Samuelson writes: "Gosh, they're all bad ideas ... We'd be importing poverty. This isn't because these immigrants aren't hardworking, many are. Nor is it because they don't assimilate, many do. But they generally don't go home, assimilation is slow and the ranks of the poor are constantly replenished ... [It] is a conscious policy of creating poverty in the United States while relieving it in Mexico ... The most lunatic notion is that admitting more poor Latino workers would ease the labor market strains of retiring baby boomers ? Far from softening the social problems of an aging society, more poor immigrants might aggravate them by pitting older retirees against younger Hispanics for limited government benefits ... [Moreover], [i]t's a myth that the U.S. economy 'needs' more poor immigrants.

"The illegal immigrants already here represent only about 4.9 percent of the labor force." (For all Mr. Samuelson's supporting statistics, see his Washington Post column of March 22, from which this is taken.) Likewise, a few days later, the very liberal and often partisan Paul Krugman of the New York Times courageously wrote : "Unfortunately, low-skill immigrants don't pay enough taxes to cover the cost of the [government] benefits they receive ? As the Swiss writer Max Frisch wrote about his own country's experience with immigration, 'We wanted a labor force, but human beings came.' " Mr. Krugman also observed — citing a leading Harvard study — "that U.S. high school dropouts would earn as much as 8 percent more if it weren't for Mexican immigration. That's why it's intellectually dishonest to say, as President Bush does, that immigrants 'do jobs that Americans will not do.' The willingness of Americans to do a job depends on how much that job pays — and the reason some jobs pay too little to attract native-born Americans is competition from poorly paid immigrants." Thusly do the two leading economic writers for the nation's two leading liberal newspapers summarily debunk the economic underpinning of the president's and the Senate's immigration proposals.

Under such circumstances, advocates of guest-worker/amnesty bills will find it frustratingly hard to defend their arrogant plans by their preferred tactic of slandering those who disagree with them as racist, nativist and xenophobic.

When the slandered ones include not only The Washington Post and the New York Times, but about 70 percent of the public, it is not only bad manners, but bad politics.

The public demand to protect our borders will triumph sooner or later. And, the more brazen the opposing politicians, the sooner will come the triumph.

So legislate on, you proud and foolish senators — and hasten your political demise.

It Isn't Amnesty (NYT)

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

Here's one way to kill a cow: take it into the woods in hunting season, paint the word "deer" on it and stand back.

Something like that is happening in the immigration debate in Washington. Attackers of a smart, tough Senate bill have smeared it with the most mealy-mouthed word in the immigration glossary — amnesty — in hopes of rendering it politically toxic. They claim that the bill would bestow an official federal blessing of forgiveness on an estimated 12 million people who are living here illegally, rewarding their brazen crimes and encouraging more of the same.

DOJ_NMG_0023259

That isn't true. The bill, approved by the Senate Judiciary Committee in a 12-to-6 vote on Monday, is one the country should be proud of. Four Republicans, including the committee's chairman, Arlen Specter, joined eight Democrats in endorsing a balanced approach to immigration reform. The bill does not ignore security and border enforcement. It would nearly double the number of Border Patrol agents, add resources for detaining illegal immigrants and deporting them more quickly, and expand state and local enforcement of immigration laws. It would create a system to verify workers' identities and impose tougher punishments on employers who defied it.

But unlike the bill's counterpart in the House, which makes a virtue out of being tough but not smart, the Specter bill would also take on the hard job of trying to sort out the immigrants who want to stay and follow the rules from those who don't. It would force them not into buses or jails but into line, where they could become lawful residents and — if they showed they deserved it — citizens. Instead of living off the books, they'd come into the system.

The path to citizenship laid out by the Specter bill wouldn't be easy. It would take 11 years, a clean record, a steady job, payment of a $2,000 fine and back taxes, and knowledge of English and civics. That's not "amnesty," with its suggestion of getting something for nothing. But the false label has muddied the issue, playing to people's fear and indignation, and stoking the opportunism of Bill Frist, the Senate majority leader. Mr. Frist has his enforcement-heavy bill in the wings, threatening to make a disgraceful end run around the committee's work.

The alternatives to the Specter bill are senseless. The enforcement-only approach — building a 700-mile wall and engaging in a campaign of mass deportation and harassment to rip 12 million people from the national fabric — would be an impossible waste of time and resources. It would destroy families and weaken the economy. An alternative favored by many businesses — creating a temporary-worker underclass that would do our dirtiest jobs and then have to go home, with no new path to citizenship — is a recipe for indentured servitude.

It is a weak country that feels it cannot secure its borders and impose law and order on an unauthorized population at the same time. And it is a foolish, insecure country that does not seek to channel the energy of an industrious, self-motivated population to its own ends, but tries instead to wall out "those people."

It's time for President Bush, who talks a good game on immigration, to use every means to clarify the issue and to lead this country out of the "amnesty" semantic trap. He dislikes amnesty. Mr. Frist dislikes amnesty. We dislike amnesty, too.

The Specter bill isn't amnesty. It's a victory for thoughtfulness and reason.

Poll Shows Growing Fear Among Immigrants (AP)

By Peter Prengaman

The AP, March 28, 2006

A majority of people who described themselves as legal immigrants for a poll released Tuesday said they believe anti-immigration sentiment is growing and are alarmed by the tone of the debate over reform.

Just under one-third of them said Congress and President Bush are doing a good job on the issue.

The findings come as the U.S. Senate considers immigration reform proposals, including legislation approved by the Senate Judiciary Committee on Monday that would clear the way for 11 million illegal aliens to seek U.S. citizenship.

Lawmakers are also considering legislation that would make it a felony to be in the U.S. illegally, impose new penalties on employers who hire illegals and build more fences along the U.S.-Mexican border.

The poll was conducted by the firm Bendixen & Associates between Feb. 24 and March 21. Researchers said they interviewed 800 people who described themselves as legal immigrants in 47 states and who were reached by random digit dialing in communities with large numbers of immigrants. The said the margin of error was plus or minus 3.4 percentage points.

When told about reform proposals in Congress, 68 percent of poll respondents said they supported temporary work permits for illegal immigrants and a way for them to apply for residency after learning English and paying a fine.

That seems to conflict with arguments by some lawmakers who argue that a legalization program would be unfair to legal residents who played by the rules.

DOJ_NMG_0023260

"Nobody comes here to get on welfare," said Perias Pillay, 43, who was 18 when he immigrated legally from Malaysia. He joined a massive immigration rally in Los Angeles. "They come here to work, and as long as we need workers we should let them come."

The immigration debate has sparked rallies around the nation by immigrant rights supporters, including the weekend rally in Los Angeles that drew an estimated 500,000 people. On Tuesday, hundreds of students in California and Texas staged a second day of school walkouts in protest.

The poll was commissioned by New America Media, a nonprofit San Francisco-based umbrella organization for more than 700 ethnic media outlets. Co-sponsors included the Center for American Progress, a liberal-leaning research group, and the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights Education Fund, an umbrella civil rights organization.

More than 60 percent of those interviewed said they were alarmed by the tone of the immigration reform debate. Sixty-seven percent said they believed anti-immigration sentiment was growing.

Asked about lawmakers' handling of immigration issues, 32 percent of those surveyed said Congress and President Bush were doing a good job. Democrats received the highest approval with 38 percent; Republicans garnered 22 percent.

On jobs, 81 percent of those surveyed said illegal immigrants accept low-end jobs that Americans don't want, and 73 percent said illegal immigrants aided the economy by supplying low-cost labor.

Delia Adene, 48, who immigrated legally from Mexico and joined the Los Angeles rally, said she was worried about the rhetoric.

"I feel like people see us as criminals now because we want to help our families," Adene said. "We do need more control of the border, but politicians need to talk about this with human justice in mind."

Immigration Debate Triggers More Protests (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely And Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, March 29, 2006

Thousands of students took to the streets in Los Angeles, Phoenix, Dallas and other cities Tuesday to protest a proposed toughening of immigration policy.

The demonstrations took place as Republican senators in Washington emerged from a meeting saying they will begin debating immigration legislation this week.

Tuesday's demonstrations, smaller than those that clogged streets over the weekend, were mostly peaceful, police said.

•In Los Angeles, 8,800 students walked out of class, said Susan Cox, a school district spokeswoman. They will have to make up the work they missed.

•In Dallas, as many as 3,000 students protested, many of them gathering at City Hall, said Lt. Rick Watson, a spokesman for the police department. Some of the students entered the building, but Watson said there were no incidents or arrests.

•In Phoenix, about 1,200 students gathered at the state Capitol, said Alan Ecker, a spokesman for the Arizona department of administration. The crowd dispersed without incident, he said.

“I'm here for my parents,” Juliana Rojo, 14, told the Associated Press. She said her parents are illegal immigrants. “They work hard. I just want them to be treated fairly.”

The Senate bill would allow the estimated 11 million illegal immigrants now in the USA to become citizens eventually. They would have to prove they have jobs, pass a criminal background check, learn English, and pay fines and back taxes.

Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., said he cannot support the bill approved Monday by the Senate Judiciary Committee because it offers a chance at citizenship to workers who are needed only temporarily.

Sen. Mel Martinez, R-Fla., a refugee from Cuba, said he made an emotional appeal for his colleagues to resist pressure to follow the lead of the House, which passed a bill that increases penalties and enforcement against illegal immigration and does not adjust the status of migrant workers, legal or illegal.

“I think we should have the courage to stand up for an issue, even if it isn't what those who scream the loudest want us to do,” Martinez said.

DOJ_NMG_0023261

House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, said the House bill emphasizes that U.S. borders must be brought under control.

"The House has passed a responsible border-security bill. … I think the American people expect us to strengthen our borders," he said.

A Catholic leader who has been a harsh critic of the House border-security measure praised the Senate Judiciary Committee's approach. Cardinal Roger Mahony, spiritual leader of 5 million Catholics in Los Angeles, said he is "very pleased" with the committee's bill.

"The church is going to continue our educational efforts," Mahony said.

Like a number of the Judiciary Committee bill's supporters, Mahony argued that it offers a more workable approach to a difficult problem. "How are you going to pick up and arrest 8 (million) to 11 million people?" he asked. "It's not realistic."

Schools Focus On Walkouts As A Teachable Moment (LAT)

By Joel Rubin And Erika Hayasaki

The Los Angeles Times, March 29, 2006

He was supposed to be talking about supply and demand. But like teachers all over Southern California, Mike Stryer shelved the regular lesson plan for his economics class at Fairfax High on Tuesday. In its place, he took up the hot topics of the week: immigration and the previous day's walkouts by students protesting proposed changes in federal law.

"I don't know why we're always talking about immigrants as if they're all bad or good," 17-year-old Chris Potter said after a classmate suggested that there should be no distinction between illegal and legal immigrants. "The whole issue here is about 12 million illegal immigrants."

Stryer worked hard to keep the discussion from getting personal — a struggle in a class that was roughly half Latino and half African American. Several of the Latino students indicated they had relatives who are living illegally in the country.

When an African American student said that undocumented workers were taking jobs from citizens, the conversation turned pointed.

"Do you work? Do you have a job?" demanded 18-year-old Lesly Quinta. "You don't know what it means to work a $4-an-hour job to support your family."

Educators call this "the teachable moment," that serendipitous instant when a student's interest in a topic can be parlayed into meaningful learning. Such moments were popping like toast Tuesday.

"It's fantastic to be able to take an issue that is both current and important to my students and discuss themes related to the topic," Stryer said. "The kids care. They see a relevance."

Fairfax and all other Los Angeles Unified School District high school and middle school campuses had begun the day on lockdown, with students kept in their classrooms to prevent a repeat of the mass walkouts of the day before.

By midmorning Tuesday, however, the lockdown had been lifted and Stryer started his class by having students read newspaper accounts of the contrasting Senate and House versions of the proposed immigration bill and of the protests.

A brief discussion about the differences between the House and Senate bills led to a refresher on how bills become law. The class turned into a spirited debate over the rights that should be afforded illegal immigrants. When the closing bell rang, students were still clamoring to talk.

"It's so much better than a regular class," said Diane Morales, 17. "Instead of talking about something that happened 300 years ago, you get to discuss something that is happening right now. Something you're living through."

At Kennedy High School in Granada Hills, Principal Christine Clark presided over a lunch forum on immigration, passing a microphone down a line of more than 50 students waiting in the aisles of the auditorium, each squirming to talk. They spoke to an audience of nearly 300 others, some waving Mexican flags, some periodically booing.

Grabbing the mike, walkout organizer Carlos Mendoza, 16, told the crowd that he immigrated illegally from Guatemala with his parents seven years ago for a better future, education and rights.

"I'm very proud of you," he said, speaking to some of the 900 students he had led through the streets Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0023262

Luis Gavilanes, 16, a Mexican immigrant, stood up, wearing a Che Guevara T-shirt. Why, he asked, are illegal immigrants treated like criminals? "Why should you compare something like wanting a better life to murder or robbery?" Students cheered in support.

The cheers turned to a mix of boos and applause when Jamielyn DeJesus, 17, spoke up.

"I'm very disappointed in anyone who walked out yesterday," she said. "I lost a day of my education because of it."

DeJesus, a Filipina, said she spent Monday discussing immigration in small classroom groups instead of learning other subjects she needs for college. "I do support [your cause], I really do," she said as a few classmates rolled their eyes. "We came here for a better future and a better education, but why leave school?"

A voice shouted from the seats: "Because we want to be heard!"

At Berendo Middle School near downtown Los Angeles, Principal Jeanette Stevens sent packets of hastily assembled instructional materials to all of her teachers Tuesday, and had them build lessons around issues of constitutional rights and how citizens in a democracy should express their grievances.

The teachers then linked the discussion to students' current studies of persuasive writing, and had many express their views by writing letters to elected officials.

"The feedback we got from the teachers was that the kids really appreciated being heard," Stevens said.

At Santa Ana's Saddleback High School, students were kept in their second-period class until fourth period — about two hours — while Santa Ana police stood by. Some students complained that the restrictions were overly severe and that an open forum would have been more effective.

Principal Esther Jones didn't disagree, telling students over a loudspeaker: "You had your demonstration yesterday. It was a bit disorganized. This is a time for reflection and discussion. Not to walk out."

Jones estimated that more than half of her students are illegal immigrants. She said that she didn't oppose the walkout Monday but that she wished the students were better informed about the issue. "Bless their hearts," she said. "I love these kids. I don't want anything to trivialize the impact of what this legislation will do to them and their families."

The discussion in Julie Brard's peer counseling class at Los Angeles' Marshall High began with the immigrant legislation but gradually broadened into other issues: lack of healthcare, education, stereotypes. Of the 27 students in the class, 22 said they had a parent who came from another country.

"Look at the sacrifice [your parents] made," she said. "Are you living up to their sacrifice?"

"Yes," the students answered in chorus.

"Those of you who are failing, doing drugs and alcohol — what are you doing to honor that [sacrifice]?" Brard asked.

"It is a question you need to ask yourself. You need to do more than walk down the street and protest. What else can you do?"

Said one student: "Keep on going. Further your education."

Students Walk Out In 2nd Day Of Immigration Rights Protest (WP)

By Tara Bahrampour And Maria Glod

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

Chanting, " Sí , se puede ," ("Yes, we can") and carrying "Latino Power" signs, hundreds of Northern Virginia high school students demonstrated for a second day yesterday against legislation that would crack down on illegal immigrants.

In Prince William County, about 350 students protested outside Freedom High School in Woodbridge. In Fairfax County, dozens of students marched out of JE.B. Stuart High School and into Arlington County, where they stopped at two more high schools, adding students at each stop.

Opponents of the legislation have demonstrated across the country, including 500,000 people in Los Angeles on Saturday. The legislation, passed by the House of Representatives, would make it a felony to be in the United States illegally and make it a crime to help illegal immigrants.

DOJ_NMG_0023263

The Fairfax march started at Stuart High in the Falls Church area about 9 a.m. "We started getting bigger, so we left the school," said Louie Martinez, 16, a sophomore at Stuart, whose student body is 40 percent Latino. "We were like, 'We'll just keep walking.' We're showing the government we're big."

The group marched to Wakefield High School and then, followed by police cars that blocked traffic, marched several miles up George Mason Drive to Washington-Lee High School.

After police told them they would be arrested if they strayed onto the Washington-Lee campus, the protesters demonstrated at a park across the street.

The school's doors were locked to prevent outsiders from entering, and at noon Principal Gregg Robertson announced that students who left would have unexcused absences. Still, about 40 students left to join the protest, which swelled to around 200 people.

School officials did not try to stop them. "Part of the Washington-Lee mission is to encourage students to take an active role in their community," Robertson said. As with earlier demonstrations, word of the protests was spread by cellphone and the Web site MySpace.com. Some students said they learned about the immigration debate from newspapers or in class. Others said friends convinced them that many of the proposals were unfair.

Raeshwan Greene, 17, a senior at Wakefield, which is 43.7 percent Latino, said: "Half of my friends came here a few years ago. . . . People have forgotten the meaning of America."

Caitlin Thomson, 17, a junior at Wakefield, said: "These people have worked really hard to get here. There might be economic problems or a dictatorship. People want to be free and have a new life. That's what we learn in history class."

Some had more personal connections to the issue. Ephram Lopez, 16, a sophomore at Stuart, is U.S.-born, but he worries that his mother, a baker, could be sent back to her native Guatemala.

"They are trying to deport her," Lopez said. "It's going to take her away from me and my two little brothers."

Lopez said everyone's quality of life in the Washington area is improved by immigrants. "We work at fast food restaurants. We paint houses. We mow lawns. Most people work without papers."

In Prince William, in addition to students from Freedom High School, many young people waving Mexican and El Salvadoran flags said they were from C.D. Hylton, Gar-Field and Woodbridge high schools, all in the eastern section of the county, where many Latinos live.

The students marched down Route 1 to Todos Supermarket, operated by Carlos Castro, a Salvadoran immigrant.

Arlington County Board member Walter Tejada (D), who joined the demonstration at Washington-Lee, said the students had been "itching to have their voices heard."

"They know that this bill unfairly cuts the legs of the working immigrant community," he said.

Christian Dorn, 16, a Salvadoran and a junior at Potomac High School in Dumfries, said the demonstrations had proved something.

"It got the word out that we're not going to be quiet," she said. "It's similar to what the African Americans did in the 1960s. . . . We shouldn't be treated like criminals."

Students In Virginia Protest Bill On Illegals (WT)

By Keyonna Summers

The Washington Times, March 29, 2006

Schools across Northern Virginia endured a second day of walkouts by hundreds of students protesting federal legislation that would crack down on illegal aliens.

About 400 students holding signs and flags from their home countries demonstrated yesterday in front of Freedom High School in Woodbridge, Va., said Phil Kavitz, a spokesman of Prince William County Public Schools. About 100 students from Woodbridge High School and about 60 from C.D. Hylton High School joined the protest.

About 150 students and community members had protested at Freedom on Monday.

"Kids were holding up their signs and chanting," Mr. Kavitz said. "At 11:30, they ended their demonstration and dispersed very peacefully."

DOJ_NMG_0023264

About 100 students in Fairfax County and several in Arlington also walked out of classes.

Twenty to 30 students walked out of Stuart High School in Falls Church at about 9 a.m., said Fairfax County Public Schools spokesman Paul Regnier. Some returned when ordered by school officials, and those who left were notified that they were in violation of school rules, he said.

School officials said the students reportedly walked to Arlington and picked up what one official said "seemed like millions" of students from Wakefield, Yorktown and Washington-Lee High Schools along the way. Arlington County Police drove alongside the students during their 3½-hour march to ensure their safety along some narrow streets. Police estimated that the number of marchers peaked at 200.

Dozens of Annandale High School students, eighth-graders at Edgar Allan Poe Middle School and some students from Washington-Lee High School also protested on Monday.

"I think it was clear that the purpose is they were protesting against immigration bills before Congress," Mr. Regnier said. "We believe in students' ability to express their views, [but] I think the issue here is of who has responsibility for the welfare of the kids.

"If the parents want to write notes to excuse them, that's one thing," he said. "In this case, the kids are at school, so the schools are responsible. If the kids are not in school, it's the parents."

The local rallies mirrored those in California, Las Vegas, Dallas, Phoenix, Detroit and Yakima, Wash., where thousands of students walked out of classes, ignoring rain and campus lockdowns to protest immigration legislation that they see as an attack on Hispanic rights.

The Senate Judiciary Committee approved legislation late Monday that clears the way for millions of undocumented workers to seek U.S. citizenship without having to leave the country first.

The committee also voted down proposed criminal penalties on people found to be in the country illegally. It approved a program allowing temporary entry for 1.5 million workers seeking jobs in the agriculture industry.

The next step is the full Senate, where Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican, is negotiating with other senators on how to handle the committee's bill and his own proposal, which focuses more on punishing employers who hire undocumented workers.

Yesterday morning, 2,610 students had left 23 schools in the Los Angeles Unified School District. Students carrying flags marched through the streets and along freeway ramps. In the 728,000-student school district, about 26,000 students walked out on Monday, at a cost of more than $500,000 in state attendance funds.

Fox Urges U.S., Canada To Accept Guest Workers (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, March 29, 2006

Mexican President Vicente Fox is calling on Canada to accept more low-skilled Mexican workers in its temporary work force, making his push for guest workers a continentwide affair.

"We should move out from agriculture to other services and other kinds of jobs, and we are working on this with the Canadian government," Mr. Fox said in yesterday's edition of the Toronto Globe and Mail newspaper.

He is asking U.S. officials to legalize the estimated 6 million illegal-alien Mexicans in the United States and wants Congress to create a guest-worker program for low-skilled foreigners.

Immigration promises to be a dominant issue in the run-up to the meeting this week among Mr. Fox, Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper and President Bush. White House spokesman Scott McClellan said the leaders will discuss guest-worker programs and cross-border security efforts.

"There are responsibilities on both sides, and we all need to work together to make sure those responsibilities are met," Mr. McClellan said.

The Senate is debating immigration and appears to be headed toward approving some form of a guest-worker program. In December, the House passed an immigration-enforcement bill that does not include guest-worker provisions.

DOJ_NMG_0023265

Mexican officials have been critical of the House bill, particularly an amendment that calls for building nearly 700 miles of fence along the border.

The Bush administration supported the House bill, but Mr. Bush told CNN Espanol yesterday that fencing off the border is "impractical." He did say that the U.S. Border Patrol needs more tools.

He also said he has told Mr. Fox that Mexico must work to secure its own southern border, through which hundreds of thousands pass illegally on their way to the United States.

Mr. Bush rejected the Mexican government's claim in U.S. newspaper advertisements to a role in the U.S. debate, saying that although "thoughtful suggestions" are welcome, Congress will write the bill.

The president is trying to keep a lid on simmering tensions over immigration, and has cautioned several times over the past week for a "civil" debate.

But some members of Congress say Mexican officials have crossed that line too often.

"Americans are tired of being told that they are bigots by the likes of President Fox and Foreign Minister [Luis Ernesto] Derbez," Rep. J.D. Hayworth, Arizona Republican, wrote in a letter yesterday to Mr. Bush.

"I respectfully request that you publicly make it clear to both men that their clumsy, over-the-top rhetoric about internal U.S. political matters pertaining to our border security is unwarranted and unacceptable."

Neither a spokesman at the Mexican Embassy in Washington nor a Canadian government spokesman could be reached for comment.

In his newspaper interview, Mr. Fox also disputed the size of the illegal Mexican population in the United States, saying it is between 3 million and 4 million, rather than 6.2 million as reported by the Pew Hispanic Center in March 2005.

Anchor-Advocate On Immigration Wins Viewers (NYT)

By Bill Carter And Jacques Steinberg

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

The nation's most prominent opponent of current immigration policy began his day yesterday on the "Today" show on NBC, debating a Hispanic defender of illegal immigrants. He moved on to "American Morning" on CNN to denounce a bill passed by the Senate Judiciary Committee on Monday as "an amnesty program."

By nightfall he was on a plane headed to Mexico, where he intended to assess critically the planned discussions on the issue between President Bush and President Vicente Fox of Mexico.

This central figure in the increasingly fractious debate over future immigration policy was not a senator or congressman, nor even a lobbyist on either side of the issue. It was instead, a television news anchor, Lou Dobbs of CNN.

In the course of insistently offering his ever more passionate views on immigration all across the television landscape in just one 24-hour period, Mr. Dobbs underscored that what works in cable television news is not an objective analysis of the day's events but hard-nosed, unstinting advocacy of a specific point of view on a sizzling-hot topic.

While its competitors, the Fox News Channel and to a lesser extent, MSNBC, have consistently built successful programs around aggressively opinionated hosts like Bill O'Reilly and Keith Olbermann, CNN has maintained that its mission remains offering straight news coverage, unseasoned with sharp points of view.

Except for Lou Dobbs. On CNN only Mr. Dobbs's 6 p.m. nightly news program comes accompanied with the disclaimer that it will contain "news, debate and opinion." That is not a new development for Mr. Dobbs. He has had that freedom at CNN for years and his advocacy approach on the immigration debate has been widely discussed in recent months.

But in the past several weeks, Mr. Dobbs has ratcheted up his criticism of Bush administration policies, first on the Dubai ports deal and now on immigration, to a point where in the view of many he has become a significant factor in shaping public opinion on these issues.

"He has got a lot of listenership, and he is not a nut," said Senator Trent Lott, Republican of Mississippi. "He is a very thoughtful guy, and he feels very strongly about this issue."

Representative Peter T. King, a New York Republican and a leading opponent of the Dubai port deal, appeared repeatedly on the Dobbs show during that controversy and said he believed lawmakers were watching closely.

DOJ_NMG_0023266

"He definitely influenced politicians who were watching him and listening to him," Mr. King said. "I think he had an impact."

Mr. King said that Mr. Dobbs was better able than other network reporters to "grab the issue, be able to keep it going and stay excited about it every night."

The management of CNN denied yesterday that Mr. Dobbs's soaring profile on the immigration issue — and the increased ratings he has garnered along with it — would steer the network toward adding more opinions on other news programs.

"Lou's show is not a harbinger of things to come at CNN," said Jonathan Klein, the president of CNN/U.S. "He is sui generis, one of a kind."

But CNN was hardly holding back yesterday on giving Mr. Dobbs opportunities to unleash opinions on the immigration debate, views that seem to have only grown more vociferous in reaction both to last weekend's mass marches in Los Angeles and other cities in support of illegal immigrants and the action Monday by the Senate committee.

On the CNN morning show he called the Senate bill "an unconscionable act" and "a sellout." He appeared again on CNN's midday "Live From..." program, saying, "I think illegal immigrants are a burden to the taxpayer, unequivocally."

Later, the network's "Situation Room" program displayed a clock counting down to the hour when Mr. Dobbs would be arriving in Mexico.

This followed by just a day a confrontation between Mr. Dobbs and a guest on his own program, Janet Murguia, the president of the Hispanic civil rights group National Council of La Raza, during which he lectured her on immigration policy.

"I want you to look me right in the eye, and I want you to hear me loud and clear," Mr. Dobbs said to Ms. Murguia, who replied, "I'm right here."

Yesterday, Ms. Murguia said, "There's no question he's branded a unique format."

Mr. Dobbs, who previously had a long-running and successful financial news-based program on CNN, said he had never held back on offering his opinions.

"I've been doing this three decades," he said. "I know whereof I speak on the political economy. I don't come to a conclusion out of thin air because of some partisan or ideological viewpoint, but rather with an analysis of the facts."

He said he did not believe that traditional objective journalism brought people closer to the truth. Asked if he himself knew what the truth was, Mr. Dobbs said: "I have strong feelings that I do. I have strong evidence I do."

CNN certainly has reason to celebrate Mr. Dobbs's expanding profile on the immigration issue. His program, which was up 24 percent in total viewers over the same period last year, is the only good news story in CNN's evening and prime-time lineup, which was otherwise down across the board in ratings for the past quarter.

Notably, for the first quarter of the year, Mr. Olbermann's show on MSNBC beat the 8 p.m. CNN show with Paula Zahn for the first time in the audience that matters most to news programs — viewers ages 25 to 54. But both still trailed far behind Mr. O'Reilly's dominant show at that hour.

Even as Mr. Klein conceded that "there is certainly a correlation between Lou's outspokenness and the ratings he has gotten," he reasserted that CNN would not be turning to opinion-based programs beyond the Dobbs newscast.

"Cable has always been, certainly for the past 10 years, a hospitable home to outspoken, over-the-top figures," Mr. Klein said. "It cuts through the clutter." But, he added, "What is suitable for Lou is not necessarily suitable for many other, if any other, talent on the network. It is not a signal for some sea change at CNN."

Safety Stings At Work Sites Will End, Officials Say (NYT)

By Steven Greenhouse

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

Federal officials told immigrant advocates in a letter made public yesterday that government immigration agents would discontinue using undercover sting operations involving health and safety programs to round up illegal immigrants.

Such an operation generated a storm of protest in July when federal agents arrested 48 workers at Seymour Johnson Air Force Base in North Carolina on illegal immigration charges after the agents tricked the workers into attending what was billed as a mandatory training session sponsored by the federal Occupational Safety and Health Administration.

DOJ_NMG_0023267

Worker advocates and immigrant groups complained that such activity would discourage immigrant workers from reporting safety violations or seeking help from safety officials at a time when Hispanics were suffering a disproportionately high rate of injuries and fatalities.

On March 17, Marcy M. Forman, director of investigations for the Department of Homeland Security's immigration and customs enforcement division, known as I.C.E., sent a letter to the United Food and Commercial Workers union, which had protested the ruse, to say federal officials were discontinuing the practice.

"This is exactly the action that I.C.E. should have taken," said Jackie Nowell, director of occupational safety for the food and commercial workers union. "Using health and safety as a ruse to catch workers is definitely the wrong way to go when immigrant workers are being killed and injured in far greater numbers than other workers."

TAX:

KPMG Settles Targus Audit Case (WSJ)

By David Reilly

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

KPMG LLP agreed to pay a former audit client $22.5 million as part of a legal settlement that also calls for a California judge to set aside a sanctions order imposed on the accounting giant last July, according to a person familiar with the matter and documents related to the case.

The settlement terms will allow KPMG to clear the legal record of a disciplinary action that could potentially be used against it by other parties who might sue the firm in the future. Orange County Superior Court Judge Geoffrey T. Glass sanctioned KPMG last summer for obstruction during pretrial proceedings.

The order emanated from proceedings related to a lawsuit brought against KPMG by former client Targus Group International Inc. The California-based computer-case maker sued the firm for malpractice, alleging KPMG's audit failed to spot alleged embezzlement by a former executive that cost the company as much as $50 million.

In settling the case, KPMG had proposed that Targus agree not to oppose a request for Judge Glass to vacate the sanctions order, according to a draft settlement proposal reviewed by The Wall Street Journal. The accounting firm also wanted records related to the case, as well as the sanctions order and its own appeal of that order, sealed, while precluding executives at Targus, or their attorneys, from speaking about or referring to the matter, according to the draft settlement proposal.

In a statement released yesterday, KPMG said: "The parties have reached a settlement. We cannot discuss the terms, which are confidential. We have settled the case to avoid more costly litigation." An attorney for Targus didn't return a call seeking comment. The company's general counsel, Michael Ward, was traveling outside the country and was unavailable for comment.

KPMG's efforts to clear the legal record in regard to the Targus case are an example of how big accounting firms are pursuing every means possible to limit their litigation liability and curtail the ability of clients to bring cases against them.

Home Sellers Face Unexpected Tax Hit (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

A growing number of homeowners, riding the crest of the real-estate boom, are getting hit by an unpleasant surprise when they sell: a hefty tax bill.

This development stems from a 1997 law that Treasury Department officials said at the time would eliminate capital-gains taxes for nearly everyone selling their primary residence. Under that law, most married couples who file jointly can exclude as much as $500,000 of their gain. For most singles, the limit is $250,000.

Adding trees and shrubs to your property can help cut your capital-gains bill when you sell.

But as home prices have surged, more people have been selling their home for bigger gains than the exclusion amount -- and thus are facing unexpectedly big tax bills, accountants and other tax professionals say. Besides getting hit by the top 15% rate on capital gains, some also are facing the loss of deductions, exemptions and credits. In some cases, they may even be drawn into the rapidly expanding web of the alternative minimum tax.

DOJ_NMG_0023268

Many sellers are startled to hear they owe any tax at all because they didn't realize the 1997 law erased a popular provision that had allowed them to avoid taxes. That provision generally allowed sellers to defer or eliminate capital-gains taxes by rolling over their proceeds within a specified time period into a new home costing as much or more than the old one. The law also deleted another provision that generally offered a once-in-a-lifetime $125,000 exclusion for people age 55 or older.

As a result, many people who thought they wouldn't owe taxes when they sell are now on the hook. Among those most likely to be affected are homeowners who bought many years ago and who live in hot real-estate markets such as California, New York, Hawaii, Florida and Washington, D.C. For example, the median price of an existing single-family home in the San Francisco area last year surged to $715,700 from $266,700 in 1996. The median price in Honolulu rose to $590,000 last year from $335,000 in 1996.

Though the Internal Revenue Service says it doesn't track how many people owe capital-gains taxes on their homes, accountants say more of their clients are paying them because many more high-priced homes are being sold. Last year, there were more than 827,000 single-family homes that sold for $500,000 or more, according to the National Association of Realtors -- up from 641,200 in 2004 and 66,100 in 1996. Though not all these home sellers will have cleared enough to have to pay the tax, many of them will.

These days, "it's not unusual at all" for an owner to have amassed a much bigger gain than the exclusion amount, says Richard Rampell, a certified public accountant in Palm Beach, Fla., and chief executive of Rampell & Rampell. In some cases, sellers don't discover this until after having sold.

One Florida couple, clients of Mr. Rampell, sold their home last year for $1.1 million. Their taxable gain was around $365,000, leaving them with an unexpected additional tax bill of about $60,000, which includes capital-gains taxes and the loss of certain other tax breaks, Mr. Rampell says.

"I rarely saw taxable gains on the sale of a home prior to the 1997 act," says Claudia Hill, an enrolled agent and the owner of Tax Mam Inc., a Cupertino, Calif. tax-services firm. Now, "at least 30% of my retirees are having to pay taxes when they sell the family home." Moreover, she says, many of her clients who have owned their home for lengthy periods are reluctant to sell because of the heavy tax hit they would take.

Under the 1997 law, to qualify for the full exclusion, you need to have owned the home and used it as your primary residence for at least two of the five years before the sale.

Alan E. Weiner, a CPA and tax partner at the firm of Holtz Rubenstein Reminick LLP, in Melville, N.Y., surveyed his firm's clients' tax returns and found these results: In the Manhattan office, 36 taxpayers sold their home in 2004 and 19 paid a tax. In 2001, 21 people sold their home and only six paid a tax.

The capital-gains tax isn't the only problem facing home sellers. A large capital gain can translate into even higher taxes for many people because of two other tax-law provisions, which are often referred to as "stealth taxes." These provisions limit your personal exemptions and certain itemized deductions once your income exceeds certain levels.

Here's how it works: Capital gains are included in your adjusted gross income. Once your adjusted gross income exceeds a certain level, you begin to lose certain itemized deductions and personal exemptions, adding another hit to your tax bill.

What's more, the higher income as a result of selling your house could force you to pay more by subjecting you to the alternative minimum tax. This parallel tax system -- which was originally designed to make sure high-income taxpayers couldn't avoid paying federal income taxes completely -- disallows personal exemptions and certain deductions, such as state and local taxes. Among those most likely to be hit by the tax are people with incomes between $200,000 and $500,000, according to the Tax Policy Center. Like the home-sale exclusion, the AMT wasn't indexed for inflation and is affecting increasing numbers of taxpayers.

For anyone thinking about selling, the rules underscore the importance of keeping good records of home-improvement costs, which typically can be added to your original purchase price -- and thus cut, or even eliminate, your tax bill. Examples of improvements include adding a bedroom or bathroom, putting up a new fence, installing new plumbing or wiring, and putting on a new roof. Even the cost of putting in shrubs and trees may qualify as "improvements" and raise your cost basis, according to the Ernst & Young Tax Guide 2006. But the cost of repairs, such as repainting your home or fixing gutters, can't be added to the purchase price of your property, the IRS says. For details, see IRS Publication 523 (www.irs.gov1).

DOJ_NMG_0023269

"When the $500,000 exclusion rule came into the law, a lot of people figured they'd never have that much gain, so they stopped keeping records of the improvements they made to the house," says Tom Ochsenschlager, vice president-taxation of the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants. "That could mean they'll wind up paying more tax than they should have." * * *

An IRS plan to hire private bill collectors runs into another delay.

IRS officials recently announced plans to hire three collection firms in the first phase of a controversial project to help the government recover large amounts of unpaid taxes. But the IRS says two companies that didn't get the contracts have protested, and the IRS has issued a "stop work" order to the three firms.

While the issue is being resolved, the IRS "will continue to prepare for debt-collection work to begin," a spokesman says. * * *

Here's a chance to talk back to the IRS.

The IRS is looking for "civic-minded" people to serve on its Taxpayer Advocacy Panel and make suggestions about IRS decision-making. Among the panel's tasks are to "identify and prioritize" taxpayer issues and make recommendations to the IRS and Treasury on customer-service issues.

To qualify, you must be a U.S. citizen and "able to commit 300 to 500 hours" during the year. You have to be current with your tax obligations and able to pass a criminal background check.

Facts And Folly (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

I was leaving for a trip the other day and scooped up some reading material off my desk for the plane ride. I found myself holding three documents: one was the Bush administration's National Security Strategy for 2006; another was a new study by the Economic Strategy Institute entitled "America's Technology Future at Risk," about how America is falling behind the world in broadband. And the third was "Teaching at Risk," a new report by the Teaching Commission, headed by the former I.B.M. chairman Louis Gerstner Jr., about the urgent need to upgrade the quality and pay of America's K-12 teachers.

The contrast was striking. The Bush strategy paper presupposes that we are a rich country and always will be, and that the only issue is how we choose to exercise our power. But what the teaching and telecom studies tell us is that key pillars of U.S. power are eroding, and unless we start tending to them in a strategic way, we aren't going to be able to project power anywhere.

Because we've long been rich, there is an abiding faith that we always will be, and those who dare question that are labeled "defeatists." I wouldn't call Lou Gerstner a defeatist. He saved I.B.M. by acknowledging its weaknesses and making dramatic changes — beginning with scrapping I.B.M.'s arrogant assumption that because it was such a great company, it could do extraordinary things with average people. Mr. Gerstner understood that an extraordinary company could stay that way only if it had a critical mass of extraordinary people. This is the message of his Teaching Commission: We cannot remain an extraordinary country without a critical mass of extraordinary teachers.

"If teaching remains a second-rate profession, America's economy will be driven by second-rate skills," Mr. Gerstner says. "We can wake up today — or we can have a rude awakening sooner than we think."

The Teaching Commission notes that "our schools are only as good as their teachers," yet this "occupation that makes all others possible is eroding at its foundations." Top students are far less likely to go into teaching today; salaries are stagnant; nearly 50 percent of new teachers leave within five years. To remedy this, the commission calls for raising teachers' base pay, finding ways to reward the best teachers, raising standards for acquiring a teaching degree and testing would-be teachers, on the basis of national standards, to be certain they have mastered the subjects they will teach (theteachingcommission.org).

Meanwhile, the report by the Economic Strategy Institute, a nonpartisan think tank, is equally harrowing. It notes that while the U.S. led the world in broadband Internet access in 2000, it has now fallen to 16th place. In 2000, 40 percent of the world's telecom equipment was produced in America. That share is now 21 percent and falling. The U.S. ranks 42nd for the percentage of people with cellphones.

In an age when connectivity means productivity, when communications infrastructure is at the heart of any innovation ecosystem, these things matter for job creation and growth. The lack of ultra-high-speed networks in the U.S. "makes it impossible for U.S.-based companies to enter key new business sectors" — one reason venture capitalists are moving their R.&D. start-ups to Asia, E.S.I. noted.

DOJ_NMG_0023270

"The wealth and long-term economic growth of the United States," it added, "have long depended upon technological advancement as a means of competing with our foreign rivals. ... America's emphasis has always been on achieving such high levels of productivity that it could be the low-cost producer while still paying high wages." The study offers a variety of regulatory and investment prescriptions (econstrat.org).

It's not surprising that the Bush strategy paper is largely silent about these educational and technological deficits, as well as about the investment we need to make in alternative fuels to end our oil addiction. Because to acknowledge these deficits is to acknowledge that we have to spend money to fix them, and the radical Bush tax cuts make that impossible. It would be one thing if we were going into debt to solve these problems that affect our underlying national strength. But we are going into debt to buy low-interest houses and more stuff made in China.

We're like a family that is overdrawn at the bank just when the parents need to send their kid to college, buy a computer and a D.S.L. line, and replace a gas-guzzling furnace. Whatever "strategic plan" that family has for advancement, it won't get anywhere until it rebalances its books.

Corzine The Canary (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

Jon Corzine, New Jersey's new Governor, isn't the first politician not to follow through on a campaign promise. But rarely is such dishonesty later presented as a virtue. The question for voters to contemplate is whether this is also an indication of what to expect if Democrats gain control of Congress in November.

Mr. Corzine won the Trenton statehouse last year by running as a tax cutter who'd raise property tax rebates by 40% over four years. "I'm not considering raising taxes. It's not on my agenda. We have a very high-rate tax structure. I'm not considering it," the then-U.S. Senator had vowed in October.

Well, last week Governor Corzine removed the Steve Forbes mask and submitted a record $30.9 billion budget that increases state spending by 9% and includes $1.5 billion in new levies. He wants to raise the already high state sales tax by 16% and extend it to services; hike taxes on cigarettes, alcohol and expensive cars; and create a new state water tax. And just so Garden State entrepreneurs don't feel left out, his budget would impose a corporate tax surcharge and a commercial property transfer tax. "There are no immediate plans," joked one local paper, "to tax the air we breathe -- not this year, at least."

And what about his pledge to more than double property tax rebates in a state where the average homeowner's tax bill has risen by $1,300 in the past four years? That's on ice for now, and perhaps until he's running for re-election. "I'll be the first to acknowledge that some things have to wait," said Mr. Corzine in his budget address.

His spending plan would give homeowners about 30 bucks extra, which would hardly cover the property tax hikes that have averaged 7% annually of late. New Jersey already has the highest property taxes in the country, and the new Governor wants to extend its lead.

While voters might feel misled by this 180-degree turn, Mr. Corzine is winning praise from fellow Democrats as a "straight shooter" brave enough to make "hard choices." Former Governor Jim Florio said, "I think this is an intellectually honest budget." Senator Robert Menendez, who was appointed to serve the remainder of Mr. Corzine's term, commended the Governor for submitting the "most honest, fiscally responsible budget in years."

These Democrats have an odd definition of truthfulness, but then Mr. Florio himself pushed through huge tax increases in the early 1990s after saying he wouldn't. It cost him re-election, though that was when the New Jersey GOP still had a pulse. Like Mr. Corzine, former Democratic Governor James McGreevey also campaigned on a promise to lower tax burdens. The day after winning office in 2001, he declared, "I am ruling out a tax increase," yet he went on to raise the state's top marginal rate by 41% and make New Jersey's top income tax rate the fifth-highest in the country.

Knowing that track record, New Jersey voters may be getting what they deserve if they were dumb enough to believe Mr. Corzine. But this tax flip-flop seems to take place wherever Democrats take power these days. Former Virginia Governor (and possible Presidential aspirant) Mark Warner also promised not to increase taxes during his campaign in 2001, only to raise them later.

DOJ_NMG_0023271

And now Democrats on Capitol Hill are promising they'll also cut taxes if they're elected to run Congress next year. Republicans have certainly given Democrats an opening by their failure to govern. But voters who might otherwise choose Democrats for a change might think twice if they conclude that Mr. Corzine is the canary in the coal mine of real Democratic tax intentions.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

More Tweak Than White House Shake-up (PHI)

By Dick Polman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 29, 2006

By one key measure, it is clear that George W. Bush is no Ronald Reagan.

Plagued by an unpopular war and big domestic headaches, and peppered with demands from Republican allies that he pierce his White House bubble and bring in new blood, President Bush responded yesterday by making one move. He replaced chief of staff Andrew Card, a veteran loyalist insider, with budget director Josh Bolten, a veteran loyalist insider.

Now flash back to 1987. Peppered with similar demands following the Iran-contra scandal, President Reagan responded by cleaning house. He installed, as chief of staff, Howard Baker, a former senator popular on Capitol Hill. He brought in a team of new advisers, including Maj. Gen. Colin Powell. He fired or eased out the big scandal players, notably Oliver North and John Poindexter. And he shared national security documents with Congress, waiving all claims of executive privilege.

Reagan's shake-up is prominent in the history books; the more minimal Bush response won't resonate nearly as much. After John Hinderaker, a lawyer and conservative blogger, heard the news, he headed his online remarks with one word: "Yawn." And he wrote: "I doubt that the change will make any difference, except maybe cosmetically."

It's questionable whether restive congressional Republicans will be satisfied by this move to the point where they will be eager to identify themselves as Bush loyalists as they run this year for reelection. They have long felt that this White House is too secretive - yet here is Bolten, as described in a Business Week profile: "[H]is penchant for secrecy befits the son of a career CIA officer."

As commentator Craig Crawford noted yesterday of Bolten, "He is inside the bubble of this White House and lacks the background and friendships on Capitol Hill that GOP leaders were hoping for in a new chief of staff."

Conservatives on the Hill have long complained that the Bush team spends too much money - and they remember Bolten's defense during one crucial episode in the battle over the Medicare drug-prescription plan. The original administration price tag for the plan was $400 billion over 10 years; after passage, it turned out to be roughly $535 billion. Yet Bolten testified last year that the old estimates were "completely consistent" with the new.

There is no outsider element in this personnel shuffle. Card, a longtime Bush family favorite who has served the President since his first stint as a candidate, will be replaced by a guy who has served the President since his first stint as a candidate.

There are other parallels. Card is strongly identified with the Bush agenda; he was a founding member of the White House Iraq Group and helped advance the arguments for war. In September 2002, when asked to explain why Bush was suddenly planning autumn speeches about the threat posed by Saddam Hussein, he replied: "From a marketing point of view, you don't introduce new products in August."

Bolten is similarly tied to the Bush agenda; he was a forceful advocate for Social Security privatization, writing guest columns even as the public - and Republicans on the Hill - were being scared off by the price tag.

As conservative commentator Kate O'Beirne noted yesterday: "There is no new blood in this 'shake up.' It's more like Andy Card put aside a vial of his own in the event the White House needed a transfusion."

Bush's move is less than sweeping for one big reason: In this White House, the chief of staff is not the most important bureaucratic player, job title notwithstanding. The real power is Karl Rove, the political strategist and policy deputy, and many observers say that unless or until he departs, there can be no substantive changes.

DOJ_NMG_0023272

Bruce Buchanan, a veteran Bush-watcher at the University of Texas, said yesterday: "Rove's leaving would signal a major sea change, but there's no solid evidence that he expects to be shown the door, or brought on the carpet by the special prosecutor," a reference to Patrick Fitzgerald's ongoing probe of Rove's possible role in the outing of a CIA employee who is married to a Bush critic.

But, Rove aside, a serious reshuffling would arguably involve some key Iraq war planners. Even Fred Barnes, a conservative commentator and Bush defender, wrote last week that Bush should set aside his "admirable but unrealistic" loyalty code and replace Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. Barnes also called for Vice President Cheney to quit.

We are more likely to see continuity; indeed, we have seen it already. When Cheney's top aide, Lewis "Scooter" Libby, quit last autumn after his indictment in the CIA outing scandal, he was merely replaced by his deputy, David Addington, an outspoken advocate of wartime presidential power who is known in some circles as "Cheney's Cheney" - as Libby himself had been.

Some conservatives, watching the Card departure, hope for the best from Bolten. Many long viewed Card with suspicion; they assigned him the blame for a number of debacles, notably the Harriet Miers nomination and the Dubai ports flap. They think that Bolten, despite the Medicare drug dispute, will be "a reasonable voice willing to control spending," someone who can cure Bush's "lame duck syndrome," in the words of redstate.org.

But Card/Bolten was not the most important event at the White House yesterday. Note, instead, that Bush brought his entire cabinet to the Rose Garden to stand with him while he assessed Iraq. It was a visual signal that there will be continuity, for good or ill, on the signature issue of his tenure.

As Texas analyst Buchanan put it: "Bush's future hinges on what happens in Iraq, not on who his top staffer is. It's the war that will really determine whether we will have a failed presidency spinning in the wind for the next three years."

Bush Taps Bolten To Succeed Card As White House Chief Of Staff (WSJ)

By John D. McKinnon And Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush, slumping in public-opinion polls and under pressure to make changes, announced a modest shake-up of his staff.

Mr. Bush said that Chief of Staff Andrew Card will leave the post he has held since the beginning of the presidency. He will be succeeded by budget director Joshua Bolten, another fiercely loyal and long-serving aide.

The White House said Mr. Card initiated the change, and there had long been speculation that he was close to giving up a grueling job that he has held for longer than average. Still, the change also comes when Republicans have been complaining about the president's political problems and calling for some fresh blood on the staff after a series of missteps. (Read the transcript of Mr. Bush's announcement.1)

But by itself, the switch to Mr. Bolten represents at most a mild change in a White House staff that remains unusually stable, and it isn't likely to satisfy those who were seeking a broader shake-up. Mr. Bolten, a 51-year-old former Goldman Sachs executive who joined Mr. Bush's presidential campaign in early 1999, even served under Mr. Card as deputy chief of staff during Mr. Bush's first term, until Mr. Bolten took over the Office of Management and Budget in mid-2003.

Mr. Bush didn't suggest any further changes are coming, though he didn't rule that out. In an interview with Cable News Network's CNN En Espanol, Mr. Bush said, "Josh's job is to design a White House staff that meets the needs of the president." Asked if any more staff changes were coming, Mr. Bush replied: "Josh has just begun to look at the White House structure."

With his elevation, Mr. Bolten is likely to become a bigger voice than his predecessor was in administration deliberations on a range of economic and trade issues. Mr. Bolten is an expert on policy -- particularly economic and fiscal policy -- and could help bring new prominence to those issues in an administration that has been focused on the unpopular war in Iraq in recent weeks.

And unlike Mr. Card, known for his passion for streamlining decision-making, Mr. Bolten may prove more adept at reaching out to lawmakers, thanks to a background that includes a stint as an aide on Capitol Hill. That could help avoid some of the costly mistakes that have plagued the administration recently, such as the blowups over the abortive nomination of Harriet Miers to the Supreme Court and a Dubai company's acquisition of some U.S. port operations.

DOJ_NMG_0023273

"The biggest distinction between Josh and Andy is that Josh's job has been primarily a policy job for the last five years, while Andy has been focused on management and administration," said Vin Weber, a former Republican congressman and occasional White House adviser. "That might mean some differences at the margin."

Still, much like Mr. Card, Mr. Bolten essentially is a government insider who isn't likely to foment confrontation or dissent among Bush advisers -- something that some vocal critics of the White House think is needed.

If Mr. Card "had been replaced by someone other than Josh, then the president would be sending a signal that he wants to go in a different direction," said Paul Light, a New York University professor and an expert on the federal bureaucracy.

Stylistically, Mr. Bush from the outset has relied on a tight circle of loyalists and hasn't consulted as much as his predecessors did with Congress, even his own Republican majority. Now those once-compliant Republicans, worried about election survival this fall, have turned mutinous on some issues, such as the Dubai ports deal.

More substantively, the costs of war, entitlement programs and reduced taxes have spawned deficits that constrain Mr. Bush from any major policy initiative that might re-energize his presidency.

Some Republicans privately suggest that the only way to break the fiscal impasse is for Mr. Bush to reach a bipartisan compromise with Democrats, one that would force him to balance spending cuts with revenue increases. But such a compromise seems unlikely, given the president's belief that just such a compromise in 1990 doomed his father by enraging the party's antitax conservatives.

Yesterday's announcement appeared designed to minimize the expectation of change. In a brief 8:30 a.m. EST Oval Office appearance with both men, Mr. Bush praised Mr. Card's "wise counsel, his calm in crisis, his absolute integrity and his tireless commitment to public service." Mr. Bolten went even further, describing Mr. Card as "among the finest public servants of his generation."

QUESTION OF THE DAY

3 • Vote: Who was the most effective of these chiefs of staff?4

Mr. Card, 58 years old, a former deputy chief of staff and transportation secretary in the administration of Mr. Bush's father, had been on track to become the longest-serving chief of staff since the creation of the post after World War II -- if he had lasted through the year. Mr. Bush said Mr. Card had raised the possibility of stepping down earlier this month, and over the weekend the president accepted his resignation.

Some observers predicted Mr. Card might consider a run for Massachusetts governor or for one of the state's Senate seats. Ron Kaufman, a Washington lobbyist and Mr. Card's brother-in-law, said it's too early for Mr. Card -- a former Massachusetts legislator -- to be thinking about that.

Meanwhile, speculation in Washington now will turn to the question of who will succeed Mr. Bolten as director of the Office of Management and Budget. Joel Kaplan, deputy OMB director, is a logical candidate. Another possibility: Clay Johnson, the deputy OMB director for management who was both a college classmate of Mr. Bush and a top adviser when he was Texas governor.

President's Chief Of Staff Resigns After Five Years (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush accepted the resignation Tuesday of his chief of staff, Andrew H. Card Jr., replacing him with Budget Director Joshua B. Bolten as the White House moved to regain a political footing deeply shaken by the war in Iraq and a rebellious and worried Republican majority in Congress.

The shift at the very top of the White House staff, the first since Bush took office five years ago, comes amid continuing pressure on the president to overhaul a team respected for its loyalty but exhausted from the grind of running the government and repeated setbacks in Iraq and, politically, at home.

No sooner was Bolten's appointment announced than administration critics, Republicans among them, began questioning whether he would offer the breadth of experience and respect that they say Bush needs now, with his political standing at the lowest point of his presidency.

DOJ_NMG_0023274

Challenging the move as falling short of a staff shake-up, Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.), said: "They still need men and women of stature and gravitas in a number of slots there in the White House. They need to bring in some experienced hands to get a handle on things."

In Bolten, Bush has promoted a Princeton-educated, motorcycle-riding lawyer who has been at his side since 1999 and, before that, was in his father's administration and on a Senate committee staff.

Bolten, 51, became director of the Office of Management and Budget in June 2003.

His closeness to Bush is perceived as both an asset, in terms of his knowledge of the president, and a detriment, given that critics and supporters of the administration are calling for new ideas.

"Josh is a good guy — just not what this White House needs. They need a renovation, not just a new front door," said a senior Republican who served in top positions in Ronald Reagan's White House and spoke on condition of anonymity because he continues to deal with the Bush White House.

"They need people who can give the president honest appraisals, and not just the same group that has gotten him in trouble in the second term," he said.

Lott said Bush needed to hear "more disparate voices."

Nicholas Calio, the White House liaison to Congress during Bush's first term, said Bolten was "the logical and best choice" because "he knows the president, he knows the issues, he knows the personalities."

Besides, he said, Bush is not "particularly susceptible to calls that he needs to shake things up for the sake of shaking things up."

As Card and Bolten stood on either side of Bush in the Oval Office Tuesday morning, the president said: "Josh is a creative policy thinker. He's an expert on the budget and our economy. He's respected by members of Congress from both parties. He's a strong advocate for effective accountable management in the federal budget."

Card, he said, "has served me and our country in historic times: on a terrible day when America was attacked, during economic recession and recovery, through storms of unprecedented destructive power, in peace and in war."

It was Card who leaned over the president in an elementary school classroom in Sarasota, Fla., on the morning of Sept. 11, 2001, and whispered that a second airplane had struck the World Trade Center. "America's under attack," he told the president.

He kept the staff working with clock-like efficiency and precision during the 2004 presidential campaign and guided the administration's efforts to revamp Medicare and education policy. He also led the staff to secure the Supreme Court nominations of Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr.

Card was also there for some of the White House's major stumbles: the inability to persuade Congress to go along with Bush's overhaul of Social Security, the administration's much-criticized response to Hurricane Katrina, and the doomed Supreme Court nomination of White House Counsel Harriet E. Miers.

As chief of staff since Bush was sworn in on Jan. 20, 2001, Card, 58, was closing in on the record set for longevity in that office: Sherman Adams, Dwight D. Eisenhower's staff chief, was in the job for five years and eight months.

Card, who served the president's father as deputy White House chief of staff and Transportation secretary, was among the first to arrive at the White House — at 5:30 a.m. — and would stay until the president retired for the night.

White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan said Tuesday that Card had approached Bush at the beginning of March and "raised the possibility of stepping down." They discussed it several times since, most recently on Saturday at Camp David when, he said, Bush "reluctantly accepted his resignation."

In an interview with CNN Español, Bush said Card's departure should not be seen as a sign of a larger shake-up. But, he added, "Josh's job is to design a White House staff that meets the needs of the president."

Asked if other changes were coming, he said: "Josh has just begun to take a look at the White House structure. And I haven't had a chance to talk to him about the future yet."

Replacing the chief of staff has become a standard operating procedure of a struggling White House. When his administration was weighed down by the Iran-Contra scandal, President Ronald Reagan replaced the rough-edged leadership of Donald T. Regan with the genteel manners and unquestioned integrity of Howard H. Baker Jr.

DOJ_NMG_0023275

Rich Bond, a Republican political consultant who helped elect President George H.W. Bush and then served as chairman of the Republican National Committee, said Bolten's task, above all else, would be to boost the president's political standing sufficiently to retain Republican majorities in the House and Senate.

"It would be the mother of all political ironies to see the administration picked apart by a Democratic Congress," he said, because that was the fate of the first President Bush — a course not lost on that president's son.

"They have got," he said, repeating the phrase for emphasis, "they have got to re-energize the Republican base."

Bolten 'Not A Change' (RC)

By Ben Pershing And Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, March 29, 2006

House and Senate Republicans lent public support Tuesday to President Bush's announcement that Josh Bolten would succeed Andrew Card as White House chief of staff, even as GOP lawmakers and aides across the Capitol suggested that the administration needs to do far more to repair its faltering public image and strained relationship with Congress.

Card's decision to resign after more than five years in his post came as Republicans both on and off Capitol Hill suggested that Bush needed to make wholesale changes to slow the administration's downward spiral.

But while Bolten is well-liked by Members who have worked closely with him as the head of the Office of Management and Budget, most Republicans considered him to already have been part of Bush's inner circle and not the "fresh face" some had hoped for.

"This is not a change — this is just Josh Bolten moving from the OMB to chief of staff," Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) said, later adding, "They still need men and women of stature and gravitas in a number of slots there at the White House. They need experienced people to give them a hand ... I do think they need more disparate voices in there."

While not all Republicans agreed with Lott and others that the White House needed to bring in a seasoned veteran with "stature," most do believe the White House needs a renewed focus on the political agenda.

"Maybe [Bolten] brings new energy, but does he bring new ideas? That remains to be seen," said a House GOP leadership aide.

Sen. John Sununu (R-N.H.) said he doesn't read too much into the move, saying replacing Card with Bolten "doesn't signal a change in the structure of the White House."

Sununu also doesn't believe the move will necessarily affect the level of coordination between the two branches: "I wouldn't blame [communications breakdowns] on Andy Card, and I don't think if there are communications issues in the future it will be the fault of Josh Bolten."

Lott, who talked to Bolten on Tuesday, had some advice for the new top White House aide: "If you get a call from a Senator, take it, or return it. Don't kick it down the hall to Congressional affairs."

The legislative affairs office has been the focus of criticism from Capitol Hill Republicans in recent weeks, particularly in the wake of the Dubai ports controversy. Some GOP officials expressed doubt that Bolten's job change would by itself improve Bush's relationship with Congress.

"What we also would need is some sort of sense of change or addition at White House legislative affairs," said a senior Republican leadership aide.

No such change appeared to be forthcoming Tuesday, despite some buzz to the contrary, as some Republicans said they did not blame Candi Wolff, head of legislative affairs at the White House, for the recent problems as much as they did her superiors. Hill veteran Sean O'Hollaren was recently named to head up Senate relations for the administration, and the House liaison, Brian Conklin, is generally well-liked by Republicans in that chamber.

Many Republicans are privately hoping that more change will come, not only with senior policy staff, but with communications personnel as well.

One senior GOP Senate staffer said more shakeups are a must to ensure the political health of the administration and the party, saying: "I think they've hit rock bottom."

DOJ_NMG_0023276

This aide said Card's departure is a mixed blessing: "The good thing is new ideas and a burst of energy is really needed. The bad is that it's more of the same. It's not someone new coming in. ... Let's just hope there will be more [changes], for all our sake."

Another Republican staffer was more specific, saying, "It would send a strong signal if John Bolten's first move is to is clean out the press operation starting with Dan Bartlett."

In December, House and Senate GOP leaders at their bicameral retreat in Maryland lambasted both Bartlett and Card for the administration's poor communications work, and that was before the Dubai controversy and Bush's suggestion earlier this month that Congress had underfunded the Hurricane Katrina recovery.

It is unclear what else the White House has planned in the coming days and months, but a few smaller changes affecting Capitol Hill already have occurred. In addition to naming O'Hollaren to head up the Senate liaison shop, the administration also just named Blain Rethmeier, the Senate Judiciary spokesman, to the White House communications office.

Democrats, meanwhile, took the move as a signal that the White House and Republicans recognize they are in political trouble, and a sea change at the top is critical to their midterm success. At the same time, however, they questioned whether Card's departure would be enough to fix the public view of the administration's policies.

"The good news is the administration has finally realized it needs to change its ways, but the problems go far deeper than one staffer," said Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.). "Simply rearranging the deck chairs on the Titanic by replacing Andy Card with Josh Bolten without a dramatic change in policy will not right this ship."

Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.), the No. 2 Senate Democrat, said Card was not the problem, calling him "reasonable, professional and a man of his word."

"If the White House is looking to change course, they picked the wrong person to toss overboard," Durbin said.

Card's resignation plans were kept under a tight lid by the White House until Tuesday morning. Card spoke at a Lincoln Day Dinner in House Majority Leader John Boehner's (R-Ohio) district Monday night but did not let the Ohioan in on his plans until Tuesday.

Senate Budget Chairman Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) said Card "set a standard that a chief of staff will be held to as we go forward in this administration. ... It is a high intensity position that requires that you know all the issues, that you know who the players are, that you put out the fires and communicate effectively."

Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.) said Card's departure is understandable given his record length of service, saying he had "run out of gas" and it was a "good time" to make a change.

Thune said even though Card has done a solid job, the change makes sense: "In a second term, typically the administration tends to need an infusion of new ideas, different perspectives.

"It's indicative of a White House that is looking to send signals that it's willing put new horses on the team and is willing to change."

Even as they praised Card, many lawmakers also expressed enthusiasm for Bolten, with whom they have worked closely during his two stints at the OMB and as White House deputy chief of staff.

"He's an impressive guy," said Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas). "He's moved up the ladder. We know him to be very solid and thoughtful."

Unlike his predecessor atop the OMB, Mitch Daniels, Bolten has forged a strong relationship with House and Senate appropriators. John Scofield, spokesman for House Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.), said Lewis "has had a fabulous working relationship with" Bolten.

At the same time, Bolten has maintained the respect of conservatives who are worried about runaway spending. House Chief Deputy Majority Whip Eric Cantor (R-Va.) on Tuesday called Bolten "a real champion of fiscal sanity in Washington."

Bolten has stepped up his interaction with Congressional Republicans recently, attending some Senate GOP Conference meetings and staying at the House Republican retreat in February past the point when some Members already had left.

Bolten will remain as the OMB director until April 14, and the White House has not yet announced who will succeed him in that post. Speculation among Congressional Republicans Tuesday focused on three current OMB officials — Deputy Director Joel Kaplan, Deputy Director for Management Clay Johnson and Executive Associate Director Austin Smythe.

Johnson enjoys a strong relationship with Bush and previously served as head of the White House personnel office. Kaplan, meanwhile, is perhaps Bolten's closest aide and could move over to the White House with his boss.

Bolten Replaces Card As White House Chief Of Staff (KRT)

By Ron Hutcheson And James Kuhnhenn

Knight Ridder, March 28, 2006

WASHINGTON - Ignoring calls for a dramatic White House shakeup, President Bush on Tuesday turned to Joshua Bolten, a trusted loyalist, to replace Andy Card as White House chief of staff.

The personnel shift fell far short of the kind of bold move that some Republicans say Bush needs to pull out of his second-term slump. If anything, Bolten's ascension signals that Bush intends to stay the course despite dismal poll numbers and growing dissension in Republican ranks over his leadership style, policy choices and inattention to election-year GOP sensitivities on Capitol Hill.

"This is not a change. This is just Josh Bolten moving" to a new job, Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., said. "That's not what they need."

Democrats were dismissive.

"I have always found Andy Card to be reasonable, professional and a man of his word. If the White House is looking to change course, they picked the wrong person to toss overboard," said Assistant Senate Democratic Leader Richard Durbin, D-Ill.

While some GOP lawmakers had pressed the White House to appoint a new top aide with close connections to Capitol Hill, opinions were mixed as to whether Bolten filled that bill any better than Card had. Bolten did serve as a legislative liaison to Congress under the first President Bush, but Card had lobbied Congress for Detroit's automakers in Washington through the `90s.

As the man in charge of ensuring that the White House ran effectively, Card bears some responsibility for failing to anticipate and staunch the political hemorrhaging that has left Bush's poll numbers anemic. Over the past year, the White House has suffered political setbacks involving Iraq, Social Security, Hurricane Katrina, the failed Supreme Court nomination of Harriet Miers, Vice President Dick Cheney's hunting accident and the Dubai ports deal.

Sen. Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., a frequent White House critic and a likely presidential candidate in 2008, said Bush should do more than shuffle advisers.

"It isn't just a matter of shaking up his staff. It's policy, it's direction, it's leadership, it's confidence in that leadership. Sure, staff and senior people like chief of staff to the president have an effect on that. But just changing personnel doesn't necessarily change the perception or policy," Hagel said.

Other Republicans and some conservative commentators welcomed the move as a first step toward reinvigorating the Bush presidency. Staff shakeups are often used to replace worn-out aides and bring new ideas to a second White House term.

"It's what the doctor ordered," said Robert Tyrrell, editor in chief of The American Spectator, a conservative magazine that has urged staff turnover in the White House. "Changes have to be made. ... I think there should be others."

White House officials and Republicans close to the White House downplayed speculation that Card's departure would lead to more dramatic changes.

The chief of staff plays a critical role in controlling the flow of information and visitors to the Oval Office and in overseeing the entire White House operation. He or she also typically serves as the president's loyalty enforcer.

Bolten, 51, has been one of Bush's top advisers since the early days of the 2000 campaign, when Bush was still governor of Texas. He served under Card as deputy chief of staff before shifting to his current role as White House budget director in 2003.

Bolten's devotion to Bush came through in a 2005 television interview as he recalled their initial meeting in Austin.

"I fell in love with the governor and the whole operation, the whole spirit of the operation," Bolten told C-SPAN, the public affairs cable network. "And I thought, boy, this would be terrific if I got a chance to work on this."

A self-described "policy geek," Bolten likes to work behind the scenes. He was one of the architects of Bush's failed plan to overhaul Social Security and of the more successful effort to cut federal income taxes.

"Josh is a creative policy thinker," Bush said, flanked by Card and Bolten in the Oval Office. "He's a man of candor and humor and directness."

DOJ_NMG_0023278

He also has a bit more flair than the typical policy wonk. The bachelor adviser rides a Harley-Davidson Fat Boy motorcycle to relieve stress and gladly took on the role of escort to actress Bo Derek when she campaigned for Bush.

Card, 58, is probably best known as the man who first told Bush about the terrorist attacks on Sept. 11, 2001, in a whispered message while Bush was reading with schoolchildren in Florida.

He's been in his demanding job since the day Bush took office, typically working before dawn until well into the evening. Had he stayed in the post through September, he would have become the longest-serving chief of staff in American history.

In an interview last month with Knight Ridder, Card hinted that his time at the White House was drawing short.

"If the president says goodbye to me tomorrow, I would still turn around and say thank you very much for yesterday," he said. "I am a pawn on somebody else's chessboard, and I'm perfectly comfortable. I don't want you to take this as arrogance, but I believe that if I cannot find another job, I don't deserve this one."

Loyal Bush Aide Chosen As New Chief Of Staff (FT)

By Edward Alden

Financial Times, March 29, 2006

President George W. Bush announced the resignation on Tueday of Andrew Card as his chief of staff but resisted demands for a shake-up by replacing him with another trusted aide, Joshua Bolten.

The resignation, effective on April 14, follows a series of mis-steps in Mr Bush's second term that have driven his poll ratings to the lowest of his presidency.

John Podesta, who was chief of staff for Bill Clinton, the Democratic president, said: "Somebody needed to take the spear. Things are going in the wrong direction for this administration."

Mr Card lauded the president on Tuesday as "good man" who had done "great things".

Mr Card, a former car industry lobbyist and Massachusetts legislator who has been close to the Bush family for two decades, operated quietly behind the scenes, coming into the public eye most famously when he whispered to Mr Bush news of the September 11 2001 attacks.

The chief of staff is responsible for managing the president's schedule and ensuring that the best political and policy advice reaches his ears.

The president has been under mounting pressure to clean house in an effort to revive his presidency and leave a strong legacy for the 2008 presidential elections. Critics, including some in the Republican party, have urged him to replace Donald Rumsfeld, the defence secretary, and perhaps even Dick Cheney, the vice-president.

Fred Barnes, the executive editor of The Weekly Standard, an influential conservative journal, has urged the president to undertake an overhaul that would include replacing Mr Cheney with Condoleezza Rice, the secretary of state, who many Republicans want to draft for the 2008 race.

The appointment of Mr Bolten, the director of the White House office of management and budget and former deputy chief of staff under Mr Card, is one of continuity rather than change, however. It showed little evidence that Mr Bush is considering a larger shake-up of his administration or is wavering in his loyalty to key aides.

His appointment will also do nothing to minimise the influence of Karl Rove, the White House political strategist who was hailed as the architect of Mr Bush's first-term successes and is now widely blamed for the president's second-term stumbles.

It will also do little to shore up Mr Bush's relations with Congress, where many Republicans have refused to support him on Social Security, immigration reform and the controversial Dubai Ports World deal.

Ronald Reagan, the last two-term Republican president and a hero to conservatives, brought in a respected former senator, Howard Baker, as his chief of staff in 1987. He helped engineer Mr Reagan's recovery from the Iran-Contra scandal.

Top Bush Aide Resigns (CHIT)

By Mark Silva

Chicago Tribune, March 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0023279

WASHINGTON -- In replacing long-serving chief of staff Andrew Card with another administration insider, President Bush has taken only a small step toward regaining the standing that he will need to salvage his second-term agenda, analysts said Tuesday.

The president has been under pressure, including from allies, to shake up his White House team with his job approval rating reaching an all-time low and the Iraq war increasingly unpopular. But experts say Bush presented little real change with his announcement that he will replace Card with another longtime aide, Budget Director Joshua Bolten, who followed Bush from Texas to Washington.

The appointment of Bolten, a policy expert who trained at Princeton and Stanford Law School and served in the administration of Bush's father, to one of the most powerful positions in government could be the start of a deeper reorganization, the White House has signaled. When Bolten assumes his new role April 15, he will have latitude to make more changes in the remaining 2 ½ years of this presidency.

Yet the swap of Bolten for Card, replacing one loyal insider with another, falls short of the bold stroke that some second-term presidents have made, such as Ronald Reagan's hiring of former Sen. Howard Baker of Tennessee in 1987.

Close observers of the presidency suggest that whatever reorganization is undertaken, it will be difficult for Bush to overcome his dual challenge: The weakening powers of a second-term president and a war entering its fourth year without an end in sight.

Bush's move struck many observers as a sign of continuity, not change, characteristic of a president who cherishes loyalty and stability. Even today, many of Bush's closest advisers date from his days as Texas governor, and he has resisted calls to jettison such controversial figures as political adviser Karl Rove and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

"Bolten and Card are the same person in the same suits," said Paul Light, professor of public service at New York University and an expert on government administration. "This is not the beginning of a shakeup, if a shakeup is defined as entirely new faces that assure the American public that the administration absolutely means business about learning from its mistakes."

In any case, Bush's problems reach beyond his staff, Light said.

"Second terms are fraught with havoc anyway, and Bush brought into the second term the Iraq war, which has hurt him," he said. "You have a combination of a tough issue coupled with the natural atrophy that comes with a second term."

Card has served longer than any recent White House chief of staff, starting with Bush's arrival at the White House in January 2001. As Bush noted Wednesday, Card has served him "in historic times—on a terrible day when America was attacked, during economic recession and recovery, through storms of unprecedented destructive power, in peace and in war."

The chief of staff, the most powerful among them anyway, serves as almost the chief operating officer of the nation, with a wide-ranging portfolio that includes keeping custody of one of the capital's most valuable commodities, the president's time.

It was Card who discreetly whispered in Bush's ear at a Florida elementary school on Sept. 11, 2001, that the second World Trade Center tower had been struck and that "America is under attack." Card also served through the run-up to a U.S.-led invasion of Iraq and through three years of war.

Renowned for starting work before dawn and quitting well after dark, Card has told audiences he has lived with war every day. "I wake up every morning understanding that," Card said at a U.S. Chamber of Commerce luncheon.

Card also has lived with the perceived failings of an administration widely criticized for its handling of Hurricane Katrina. And while Card helped Bush win confirmation of two Supreme Court justices, he also was involved in the botched nomination of Bush's counsel and friend Harriet Miers.

"There is a new season," Card said Tuesday, with an allusion to Ecclesiastes. "It is a different season, and Josh Bolten is the right person for that season."

Bolten, who served as policy director for Bush's first presidential campaign, had served as deputy chief of staff for policy at the White House from 2001 through June 2003, when he became director of the Office of Management and Budget. A staunch defender of the president's tax cuts, he has steered Bush's domestic budget cutting, a dramatic boost in defense spending and a nearly $400 billion war budget as the federal deficit reached a record this year.

DOJ_NMG_0023280

But with many within Bush's own party privately calling on the president to recruit a seasoned Washington hand from outside the White House to help steer a new course through the most difficult period of this presidency, critics say Bush has made no change at all.

"If the White House is looking to change course, they picked the wrong person to toss overboard," Senate Minority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) said. "The American people are looking for a new direction from the Bush administration. It remains to be seen whether Josh Bolten can put the White House on the right course."

Top Aide Leaves White House Job; Budget Chief In (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 28 — President Bush replaced his chief of staff, Andrew H. Card Jr., with another longtime loyalist on Tuesday, a step unlikely to satisfy calls within his own party for fresh thinking to address the administration's troubles.

In turning to Joshua B. Bolten, his budget director, as the new chief of staff, the president stayed within what one close associate called a "circle of comfort" and what Mr. Bush's critics consider a closed world that brooks little doubt or dissent.

Mr. Bolten worked for Mr. Bush's father on international trade and has filled important policy posts for Mr. Bush since 1999, when Mr. Bush began campaigning for the White House.

The White House left open the possibility that Mr. Bolten would, in turn, replace other senior members of the staff.

The change, however incremental, occurred at a crucial moment in Mr. Bush's presidency and, in a White House remarkable for the stability of its senior staff, represented at least a symbolic turning point.

With Mr. Bush's poll numbers at or near their lows, his agenda stalled, his party no longer staying in line behind him and the Iraq war overshadowing almost everything he does, the president has been under pressure to give his administration new energy and direction.

Mr. Card's departure and Mr. Bolten's appointment signaled a possible start to achieving those ends, but shed little light on whether more substantive changes were to come.

In interviews and public statements, Mr. Bush's aides said that the president had accepted Mr. Card's resignation reluctantly and that if there were shifts in policy to go along with Mr. Bolten's arrival, they would be gradual.

"The president's style is not Saturday Night Massacre," a senior White House official said Tuesday night, a reference to Richard M. Nixon's series of firings in the Watergate scandal. The official said Mr. Bolten had "been given full authority" to reshuffle the White House staff if he deemed it necessary.

Asked in an interview with CNN Español whether more changes were coming, Mr. Bush replied: "Josh has just begun to take a look at the White House structure. And I haven't had a chance to talk to him about the future yet."

Other officials said they would be surprised if the move foretold any major shifts of policy on Iraq, economic management or other elements of the domestic agenda.

People close to Mr. Bush said he deliberately chose an insider who understood how this White House operated, even at the risk of angering Republican members of Congress who have said the White House has failed to consult with them sufficiently and blundered on the response to Hurricane Katrina, the nomination of Harriet E. Miers for the Supreme Court and the handling of Dubai's effort to take over management of some American port terminal operations.

"The differences between Andy Card and Josh Bolten are at the margins," said Donald Evans, the former commerce secretary and one of Mr. Bush's closest friends. "Josh is somebody the president knows well, and he knows how he operates. He can hit the ground running, and that's what the president wants. Just like any C.E.O., he wants to promote from the inside."

But that may not satisfy the Republicans who have been calling for more wholesale change. Mr. Bolten, although not part of the Texas clique that has dominated the White House, has had a hand in nearly all big domestic policy initiatives.

And though he has little experience in the national security issues on which Mr. Bush's political fate probably rests, he is respected among Republicans on Capitol Hill, where the president has had trouble holding his party together.

Karl Rove, who serves both as Mr. Bush's chief political strategist and deputy chief of staff for policy, remains in his posts, despite lingering public uncertainty over whether he will be charged in the inquiry into the leak of a C.I.A. officer's name.

DOJ_NMG_0023281

On paper, Mr. Rove's policy position makes him subordinate to Mr. Bolten, who held the same job during Mr. Bush's first term, though in practice Mr. Rove has few rivals in influence or breadth of portfolio, especially with Mr. Card departing.

A former White House official said, "It's hard to imagine the two of them operating hand in glove," but noted that Mr. Rove and Mr. Card managed to work together, if warily.

At a brief ceremony in the Oval Office, Mr. Bush said Mr. Card, a Massachusetts Republican who appeared tired and emotional as he stood at the president's side, had approached him "and raised the possibility of stepping down."

White House officials said Mr. Card raised the possibility on March 8, just after the White House was taken by surprise by the ferocity of a Republican uproar over the Dubai controversy. That was the latest in a series of cases in which Republicans complained that the White House had been slow to detect approaching troubles, and Mr. Card had repeatedly said that if the White House staff made missteps, "it should be directed at me."

Mr. Bush made the final decision last weekend at Camp David, aides said.

"He thought it might be time to return to private life," Mr. Bush said of Mr. Bolten, who has served longer than any other chief of staff except Sherman Adams, who worked under President Dwight D. Eisenhower from 1953 to 1958.

While largely unseen in public, Mr. Card has been one of the most crucial members of Mr. Bush's team, arriving at 5:30 each morning to organize the president's agenda, act as gatekeeper to the Oval Office and provide advice.

He never sought the limelight, saying a few months ago on C-Span: "I'm very comfortable with the reality that I am a staffer. I'm just a staffer."

A year ago, he told a reporter, "The biggest mistake you can make in this job is to confuse yourself with one of the president's best friends."

Clearly there is a bond between the two men, forged in some respects on the morning of Sept. 11, 2001, when Mr. Card whispered into Mr. Bush's ear at an elementary school in Sarasota, Fla., that a second plane had hit the World Trade Center and that "America is under attack."

On Tuesday, Mr. Bush recalled that day and praised Mr. Card, citing "legislative achievements from education to Medicare," the successful confirmation of two Supreme Court justices and the response to the Sept. 11 attacks.

Mr. Bolten will start on April 15, continuing a steady path toward the center of Mr. Bush's innermost circle. Starting in 1999, after he left a senior post with the investment bank Goldman Sachs in London, Mr. Bolten was the policy director of the 2000 Bush campaign.

He was a deputy chief of staff under Mr. Card from 2001 to 2003 and since then has been the budget director.

Mr. Bush praised Mr. Bolten as "a man with broad experience, having worked on Capitol Hill and on Wall Street and in the White House" and described him as being respected by members of Congress of both parties.

Mr. Bolten is a graduate of Princeton University, the Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Affairs and the Stanford Law School.

While most Republicans welcomed the move, several made clear that they did not believe it went far enough.

"I'm one of those who has said I think they need some new blood, more people of stature in the White House," Senator Trent Lott, Republican of Mississippi, said on Fox News.

Mr. Bolten has not been a major player on Iraq policy, except for drawing up the budgets for the American troop presence there and the reconstruction. He will now become a significant player in the running debate in the White House over how Mr. Bush can begin to extract American troops.

As part of his job, he will sift through the intelligence that goes to Mr. Bush, and join many of the meetings on Iraq in the Situation Room. But the task of extracting troops over the next year will remain largely in the hands of Mr. Bush's longest-serving aides, who have now outlasted Mr. Card: Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, among others.

Newsview: Changing Chief Of Staff May Help (AP-Y2)

By Tom Raum

AP2, March 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0023282

Andrew Card's departure as White House chief of staff and the elevation of Budget Director Josh Bolten to that pressure-cooker job hardly seems like the major overhaul some Republicans had urged to revitalize President Bush's struggling presidency.

But it may represent a modest attempt at a fresh start for a White House that had stumbled recently, including the failed Supreme Court nomination of Harriet Miers, the Dubai ports fiasco and slow disclosure of Vice President Dick Cheney's hunting mishap.

"There's no question that since Katrina, there have been some missteps that have shaped the president's inability to get a message out," said GOP political consultant Scott Reed. "These are no one person's fault. But they happened. And now it's time to get back on the offensive."

Tuesday's shake-up came with Bush's political influence diminished by public unease over the war in Iraq and by GOP divisions. Increasingly, the White House has found itself isolated and estranged from many of its one-time allies on Capitol Hill.

The White House held out the possibility that Bolten's appointment could presage other staff changes.

Bolten may not be known to many Americans outside Washington, but as Bush's budget director he's familiar to members of Congress.

"Andy did a very good job, and he did the job exactly the way the president wanted. Both he and Josh are capable. Probably the difference between them is that Josh has more experience on Capitol Hill and stronger relationships with the Congress," said Charles Black, a longtime GOP adviser.

Some Republicans had pushed for Bush to bring in an elder GOP statesman to take charge of the White House operation, much as President Reagan did in 1987 when he named former Senate Majority Leader Howard Baker of Tennessee to be his chief of staff after the Iran-Contra affair.

But those familiar with how Bush operates suggested that was unlikely — so long as Cheney helped shape administration policy and so long as Bush's top political adviser, Karl Rove, remained on the job.

"Cheney is the de facto chief of staff. He's two steps down the hall. He's like a barnacle, he's not going anywhere," said Paul Light, a presidential historian at New York University. Few experienced Republican hands would be enthusiastic about taking on Cheney, Light suggested.

Beginning with Hurricane Katrina, the White House has failed to recognize the seriousness of a succession of troubles that analysts in both parties say should have raised early warning signs — especially for an administration that prided itself on discipline and political skills.

The administration failed to gauge the extent of GOP opposition last month, for example, to a plan to have an Arab company based in Dubai run terminals at some U.S. ports. Likewise, last fall it misjudged the depth of conservative rebellion to Bush's Supreme Court nomination of Miers, later withdrawn.

The administration has also had a difficult time with conservatives in Congress on immigration legislation. Bush's plans to overhaul Social Security and revamp the tax code remain stalled. And the program to provide prescription drug benefits to Medicare recipients got off to a difficult start.

"Part of the problem was, for whatever reason, they got a tin ear to the political consequences of such issues. You can't do that. You have to be ahead of that," said former Rep. Leon Panetta, D-Calif., a former budget director who served as President Clinton's second chief of staff.

Still, he praised Card for doing "an outstanding job" in a post for which "you get burned out pretty quickly."

Panetta said he himself benefited in going from the Office of Management and Budget to being White House chief of staff, and he predicted Bolton would, too. "That OMB job gives you a good perspective of the entire administration. You're making judgments every day as to what programs should be supported and which ones are not working," Panetta said.

Julian Zelizer, a history professor at Boston University, said the change is "as small a shake-up as one can imagine" in terms of significance to the public. "Part of me thinks this was just a badly calculated effort to respond to all the demands to `do something,'" Zelizer said.

For his part, Card, who has served at Bush's side since January 2001, said it was time to return to private life. "It is a different season, and Josh Bolten is the right person for that season," Card said.

"This is not a great shake-up. This is not the beginning of a great exodus. This is probably one person who stayed too long," said presidential scholar Stephen Hess, a former speechwriter for President Dwight Eisenhower and an adviser to Presidents Ford and Carter.

Card's Departure Seen As A Sign President Hears Words Of Critics (WP)

By Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

A few weeks ago, President Bush's spokesman dismissed talk of an impending staff change as "inside Washington babble."

White House Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr.'s resignation yesterday suggests that Bush was listening.

Through one full term and the first year of the second, a signature of this administration was the indifference -- even contempt -- it showed for the capital's political and media culture, and for the endless flow of commentary and unsolicited advice that its inhabitants deliver daily to all presidents.

Bush, his advisers say, has by no means changed his view of what he derisively calls the "chattering class." But the Card move is only the latest sign that -- with his presidency under the stress of low public approval ratings, an unpopular war and a stalled legislative agenda -- Bush is more often deferring to the expectations of Washington conventional wisdom.

On Iraq, he has not shifted policy but has modified his message in response to legislators and GOP operatives who said he needed to more directly address the arguments of opponents instead of simply disparaging them as defeatists. On his domestic agenda -- after last year proved that doubters of both parties on Capitol Hill were right when they said his planned overhaul of Social Security was far too ambitious -- Bush has returned this year with a series of small proposals such as incentives for alternative energy sources.

At the same time, the president who set out five years ago to circumvent what he considered the "filter" of Washington's mainstream media, has started having off-the-record, get-to-know-you-better chats with White House reporters.

"When you run into brick walls, you need to figure out ways around it," said a high-ranking administration official, who acknowledged that a White House that once prided itself on tuning out the views of op-ed pages and cable talk shows is now more likely to tune in. "Part of what you are seeing is some adjustment to the political realities."

These accommodations are of the sort that many presidents have made before, and Bush's steps should not be overstated. He has not summoned a respected Capitol Hill figure to join his staff, as Ronald Reagan did when he tapped Howard Baker as his chief of staff after the Iran-contra scandal in 1987. He did not invite a well-known figure from the other party into his fold, as Bill Clinton did when he recruited commentator David Gergen to help right a stumbling presidency in 1993.

What's more, Bush's team well knows that making nods to inside-Washington expectations can affect its political fortunes only at the margins. As Bush himself said at a news conference last week, his "political capital" is nearly all invested in Iraq, and that war is almost certainly what will determine his political success or failure in the balance of his presidency.

Still, longtime Bush observers are struck by the stylistic changes on display.

"The first term was about discipline, driven by a big event -- Sept. 11 -- that shaped the era, and maybe it saved them for a while," said Ed Rogers, a Republican with close ties to the White House. "It allowed them to do things that were inconsistent with the currents and ways of Washington. Now absent a big event that has upset the political order and laws of political physics, they are back playing by the rules that govern this universe."

Ari Fleischer, Bush's spokesman in the first term, said the president is simply conforming to a new political reality. "Tough times force you to adjust," he said. "When times are tough and poll numbers are down . . . the president is more open to change for whatever good comes with that change."

Fleischer said there is no doubt that the Card resignation was at least partly the result of Republican calls for a staff shake-up. "There was a drumbeat out there that the president's staff could not miss and Bush could not miss," he said. Publicly, White House officials said it was Card who decided to resign, but a top aide said Bush gradually came to the conclusion that it was the right thing to do.

DOJ_NMG_0023284

The president-vs.-Washington battle is not a new phenomenon. Washington has long had its own unique culture governed by a set of unspoken but generally understood political and social mores. By custom, presidents are expected to reach out to the social and political elite. The people in that elite almost always have the same advice: Listen to the top pundits, do more to reach across the partisan aisle, embrace foreign travel, shake up the staff when polls go in the tank. Most recent presidents, to some extent, came to town intent on playing by their own set of rules, and most end up striking some sort of truce.

"There are certain lessons you learn," said Leon E. Panetta, who became Clinton's second chief of staff in 1994 after an unseasoned White House staff made many errors in the first year. Presidents such as Bush and Clinton, who came from outside Washington, "kinda look down on Washington," Panetta added, but ultimately realize that "if you do not learn how to work in the Washington setting, it will basically eat you up."

Bush brings some personal history to the subject. After watching the travails of his father's presidency, he came to town with an attitude that bad decisions are often made when presidents pay too much attention to party insiders who wring their hands or don't dare to take chances, longtime aides said. He considered many in Washington too quick to turn on friends and their core principles during troubled times, and too scared to "shape history."

Bush's strategy often worked, according to John D. Podesta, a former Clinton chief of staff. But even some Republicans said it was less the result of Bush's strategy than the Sept. 11 attacks, which spurred twin emotions of fear and patriotism among voters and in Congress that allowed Bush to set the agenda and strike a defiant stance. One person close to Bush said this created a false sense of power and success at the highest reaches of the White House.

Bush's fatal mistake, Podesta said, was going too far in the direction of avoiding, if not alienating, important people in Washington. "You have to tip your hat enough to the chattering class so they don't spend every day thinking about how to flay you," Podesta said.

The Card resignation by itself does not signal a radical shift for this White House. But aides said more changes will come and that Bush is strongly considering adding one or two well-known Republicans to help soothe relations with Congress.

First Buddy (WP)

By Libby Copeland And Mark Leibovich

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

Andrew Card didn't lose a job yesterday, he made a friend.

"Mr. President, as the chief of staff, I know I was a staffer," Card said yesterday in his resignation speech, "and now I look forward to being your friend."

The bright line between working for the president and being friends with the president has always been a big deal to Card, who is known for being enthusiastically humble. He liked to emphasize the "staff" in his title, rather than the "chief." In an interview on C-SPAN last year (in which he twice called himself "just a staffer") Card said he fought a "great temptation" to become buddies with the leader of the free world.

This, it turns out, is a White House occupational hazard.

"It's always easy to assume a friendship that's not helpful because you're with the president so closely in so many tense situations -- it's like being in a foxhole together," says Marlin Fitzwater, who served as press secretary to Ronald Reagan and the first President Bush. "On airplanes, in holding rooms, getting ready to make a speech, late at night, early in the morning, when everyone's tired, and in a lot of human settings."

The human element always makes things messy. Presidential staffers have to remind themselves they serve the office as much as an individual. The president is always "Mr. President" unless one happens to be the first lady. To this day, Mack McLarty, Bill Clinton's first chief of staff, still calls his boyhood friend and former kindergarten classmate "Mr. President," even in private.

When he became president, Jimmy Carter insisted that the friends who followed him to the White House still call him "Jimmy," says Gerald Rafshoon, who served two years in the administration as communications director. Rafshoon, who had served Carter when he was governor of Georgia, demurred.

He also struggled with just how to speak to his "friend," after vowing to himself that he would give Carter unfiltered advice.

DOJ_NMG_0023285

"Once I got to the Oval Office, the atmosphere was such that I was intimidated," Rafshoon says. "If there were other people there, I would come back later."

The distinction between friend and Mr. President is more than semantic, as many who have served at the pleasure of presidents can testify. There's a respectful distance not only in the Oval Office, but during dinner with the president and his family, says former George H.W. Bush aide Mary Matalin. This protects the president -- and his staff, too.

"There are times when you have to be an SOB on behalf of the president," says Leon Panetta, who served as Clinton's chief of staff for 2 1/2 years. "It helps to have that professional distance."

A staffer who's not properly deferential, who doesn't emphasize the professional over the personal, risks assuming power he doesn't have, or not giving the president frank advice, or being surprised when the president decides his assistance is no longer needed.

Case in point: the late Don Regan, Reagan's imperious chief of staff, whom some used to call the "prime minister." Regan feuded with the first lady (once hanging up on her) and was said to have stormed out of the White House after learning he'd lost his job. Nancy Reagan later wrote that Regan, a former Merrill Lynch CEO, "often acted as if he were the president."

As a staffer, "you're always deferential, meaning you're not the decision-maker, meaning you don't take credit for decisions," Fitzwater says. "Don Regan had trouble with those things."

Card, who served for almost six years before being replaced yesterday by White House budget chief Joshua Bolten, never had that kind of trouble. He often reminds people about the lowfalutin jobs he has held: at a McDonald's in Columbia, S.C. (rising as high as night manager), and one summer as a sanitation worker near his home town of Holbrook, Mass. He romanticizes the work to underscore the importance of getting dirty jobs done, be it on a garbage truck or in the White House.

As for President Bush, he's always liked loyalists -- people like Card, whose ambitions are tied wholly to the president's own success. He and Card and their wives have known one another for more than 20 years. If the men haven't been friends, exactly, they've had about as close a nonfriendship as a boss and an employee can have.

"I worry about the care and feeding of the president," Card said last year in the C-SPAN interview. "I greet him first thing in the morning and I say good night to him when he goes off to go home for the night. He probably sees much more of me than he wants to."

Then Card added, in what sounds like a strange distinction to anyone who doesn't understand the relationship between the president and a chief of staff: "The president is my friend and I do not want to let him down. But I am not his friend, I am a staffer."

Bush's Chief To Consider Changes (USAT)

By David Jackson And Andrea Stone

USA Today, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush's new chief of staff will look at possible changes in White House operations and staff as the administration grapples with political problems that include falling approval ratings and strained relations with congressional Republicans.

President Bush said Tuesday he's naming budget director Joshua Bolten, 51, to replace current chief of staff Andy Card, who has served as Bush's top aide for more than five years.

Bush, who told reporters last week he was “satisfied” with his White House team, said Card, 58, approached him about leaving the exhausting post. Bush praised Card's “calm in crisis” and noted that he routinely put in the longest days at the White House.

Bolten, 51, is a lawyer who served as White House deputy chief of staff before becoming Bush's budget director. Bush called him a “creative policy thinker.”

“Josh's job is to design a White House staff that meets the needs of the president,” Bush told CNN en Espaol on Tuesday. “Josh has just begun to take a look at the White House structure, and I haven't had a chance to talk to him about the future yet.”

White House press secretary Scott McClellan said it was premature to say whether there would be any more staff departures. But McClellan noted that Bolten has the authority to “manage the White House staff and to look at personnel issues throughout the administration.”

DOJ_NMG_0023286

Bolten's appointment came after weeks of calls for staff changes from Republicans such as Sen. Norm Coleman of Minnesota and Rep. Pete King of New York. The demands intensified after Bush tried but failed to persuade the GOP-controlled Congress to accept a deal to let an Arab-owned company run some operations at ports in six states.

King greeted Bolten's appointment warmly. “Bolten is highly respected on Capitol Hill,” he said. “People feel they can deal with him.”

Others said Bush needs to do more. “This is not a change,” said Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss. He complained that swapping one White House insider for another was “not what they need. They still need men and women of stature and gravitas in a number of slots.”

Presidents have often changed chiefs of staff in difficult times. Only a few new hires have made enough change to give a White House new direction. For example, Leon Panetta, a former California congressman, was brought into the White House in Bill Clinton's second year to impose discipline and focus.

The Bush White House already is known for its discipline and managerial skill. Bolten will be coping with a restive GOP Congress, a difficult war in Iraq and the worst public opinion poll ratings of Bush's presidency.

Bush's staff change Tuesday reflected a hallmark of his management style: surrounding himself with trusted aides he knows well. Bolten served as policy director for Bush's 2000 presidential campaign before joining the administration at its outset.

OMB Head To Replace Card As Top Bush Aide (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

President Bush took the first step in what aides say may be a second-term overhaul of his beleaguered administration yesterday as he announced the departure of longtime Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr.

Card offered his resignation earlier this month, saying it would be best for the president.

Bush named Joshua B. Bolten, director of the Office of Management and Budget, to replace Card, and indicated that more changes are in the offing. Card's resignation comes after a series of political missteps that have contributed to Bush's sinking approval rating and prompted some Republicans to urge a staff shake-up.

White House officials emphasized that Bolten would have the prerogative to bring in fresh staff members and revamp operations to suit his leadership style. The White House must find a replacement for domestic policy adviser Claude A. Allen, who resigned after being accused of stealing from retail stores, and now a new budget director. At least one or two other senior officials are expected to leave for their own reasons by the end of the school year this spring, a senior official said.

White House press secretary Scott McClellan would not speculate on the future of other high-level White House staff members, including Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove, Bush's top political strategist, who has been under investigation by a special prosecutor in the CIA leak case.

"All of us here serve at the pleasure of the president. And that's important to keep in mind," McClellan said. ". . . But I think it's premature to try to speculate about what, if any, decisions might come."

Card, who served nearly 5 1/2 years as Bush's chief of staff, said he will stay on until April 14 to ease Bolten's transition. Speaking from the Oval Office, Bush thanked Card for his "wise counsel, his calm in crisis, his absolute integrity, and his tireless commitment to public service."

Bush went on to describe Bolten as a "creative policy thinker" who is an expert on the budget and economy and who has earned the respect of Congress and knows how to lead. "No person is better prepared for this important position," he said.

In picking Bolten, Bush once again chose not to reach beyond his inner circle to fill a critical post. With many Republicans concerned that Bush's flagging popularity will hurt them in this fall's midterm elections, some have been urging him to select a seasoned Washington veteran the way Ronald Reagan brought in former Senate majority leader Howard H. Baker Jr. (R-Tenn.) when his presidency's second term was listing.

But Bush instead turned to someone he knows and trusts implicitly. A confidant of the president's, Bolten, 51, served as deputy White House chief of staff in Bush's first term before moving to head the budget office at a time when spending on wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, as well as the expensive new Medicare prescription drug benefit and the recovery from Hurricane Katrina, caused deficits to spiral.

DOJ_NMG_0023287

In an attempt to accommodate the new spending demands, Bolten oversaw two consecutive budgets that reduced spending on many housing, education and other social-service programs. Still, many Republicans in Congress have complained that the administration has not done enough to rein in federal expenditures.

Taking the microphone after Bush's announcement, Bolten said he was "deeply honored" by the opportunity to succeed Card. "The agenda ahead is exciting," he said. ". . . I am anxious to get to work."

Card has held the top staff job at the White House longer than any person since Sherman Adams, under President Dwight D. Eisenhower, and Card has earned respect within the building and around Washington for his stamina and calm professionalism.

Largely invisible to the public, Card is best known for his role on Sept. 11, 2001, as the person who informed Bush that a second hijacked plane had struck the World Trade Center in New York. As Bush was reading to students in a Florida classroom, Card calmly approached and whispered in his ear.

As chief of staff in the current administration, Card has been instrumental in some of Bush's signature achievements, including tax cuts, a broad education-revision package and the appointment of two Supreme Court justices. But his stewardship has come under sharp questioning in recent months after a series of mishaps, including the failed Supreme Court nomination of Harriet Miers, the bungled federal response to Hurricane Katrina, the slow public disclosure of Vice President Cheney's shooting accident and the unexpected Republican revolt over a plan to turn over management at a half-dozen ports from a British firm to an Arab-owned company. Card also played a major role in the creation of the behemoth Department of Homeland Security, which has come under fire for profligate spending and its ineffective response to Katrina.

Card, 58, has been the focus of much speculation in Washington about how physically and politically exhausted the White House staff must be in the sixth year of a presidency buffeted by recession, terrorism and war. Card has told interviewers that he gets up every day at 4:20 a.m., arrives at the White House an hour or so later and works until 8 or 9 at night.

"On most days, Andy is the first one to arrive in the West Wing and the last one to leave," Bush said.

McClellan said Card initially told Bush that he wanted to resign on March 8, just one day before the port deal fell apart. Bush did not accept Card's resignation right away, but he did not reject it, either. "What the president did was examine it," a senior aide said. After thinking it through and pondering who would take over if Card left, the two talked again at Camp David on Saturday and finalized the move.

Some conservatives are glad to see Card go. Quin Hillyer, executive editor of the American Spectator magazine, offered a "friendly good riddance" to the chief of staff. "This White House is justly criticized for its insularity, and this little bit of shake-up may help break up that insularity just a little," he said. "Without saying anything bad about Andy Card, it's a good opportunity for the White House to get a new start."

Yesterday, Card's voice was thick with emotion as he left the Washington stage.

"Ecclesiastes reminds us that there are different seasons," he said. ". . . But it is a different season, and Josh Bolten is the right person for that season."

Card Resigns As Chief Of Staff (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, March 29, 2006

President Bush yesterday announced the resignation of his chief of staff, Andrew H. Card Jr., who had served in the White House's most demanding staff position for more than five years -- the second longest run in presidential history.

Mr. Bush appointed another longtime White House staffer, Joshua B. Bolten, 51, to fill the position. Mr. Bolten is the director of the Office of Management and Budget and a former deputy chief of staff under Mr. Card.

In an early morning televised announcement from the Oval Office, Mr. Bush said Mr. Card had come to him "and raised the possibility of stepping down."

DOJ_NMG_0023288

"He thought it might be time to return to private life," Mr. Bush said, adding that he decided to accept Mr. Card's resignation after a weekend stay at Camp David, the presidential retreat, with his longtime aide and confidant.

"I have relied on Andy's wise counsel, his calm in crisis, his absolute integrity and his tireless commitment to public service," said Mr. Bush, who is known for prizing loyalty.

"The next three years will demand much of those who serve our country. We have a global war to fight and win."

Mr. Card, 58, stood stiffly with his hands by his sides as Mr. Bush praised his years of service through the September 11 attacks, two wars and a string of crises and legislative challenges. In brief comments, Mr. Card quoted the Bible, saying the time has come "for a new season."

Gripping the podium, Mr. Card, his eyes welling, said in his farewell: "You're a good man, Mr. President, and you do great things."

"Working in the White House is a tremendous privilege. It's almost beyond description, the great privilege it is to work at the White House. But it is even a greater honor to serve as the president's chief of staff, especially to you, Mr. President," Mr. Card said.

"Mr. President, as a chief of staff, I know I was a staffer, and now I look forward to being your friend."

Mr. Card's exit came amid calls from Republicans for a White House shake-up. Many conservatives have been angered by what they see as the "tin ear" of the administration in recent months, pointing to the Supreme Court nomination of White House counsel Harriet Miers, quickly derailed by conservatives, and the backing of an Arab company's bid to operate terminals at six U.S. ports.

Democrats seized on the ports deal as proof that Mr. Bush has gone soft on security. The company dropped its bid because of the opposition.

But a senior White House official said Mr. Card's resignation -- and the president's decision to accept it -- had nothing to do with the Republican clamor for change. Instead, the official said, Mr. Card was simply ready to move on.

Mr. Card held the top White House staff job longer than anyone in 47 years, since Sherman Adams served President Eisenhower.

To the public, Mr. Card may be best-known as the aide who calmly walked into a Florida school room and whispered into Mr. Bush's ear that America was under attack on September 11. Known as a soft-spoken man who took time to praise even low-level staffers who performed well, Mr. Card brought a common-sense approach to the job, using a complex system to remember even the smallest details.

He also worked longer hours than nearly anyone else at the White House, rising at 4:20 a.m., arriving at his office less than an hour later and often working until 8 or 9 p.m.

Mr. Bolten will take over the job on April 14. Like Mr. Card, he is a longtime adviser, having served as a deputy chief of staff from 2001 to 2003 before becoming budget director.

Mr. Bush said yesterday that Mr. Bolten was "a man with broad experience, having worked on Capitol Hill and on Wall Street and in the White House" and was respected by members of Congress from both parties.

Mr. Bolten, speaking after Mr. Bush, said he looked forward to keeping on track an agenda he called "exciting" and was "deeply honored" to be succeeding Mr. Card

Mr. Bolten, who studied at Princeton University's Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Affairs and Stanford Law School, is well-respected in top political circles in Washington.

The pick shows that Mr. Bush plans to push his agenda through the next three years, even during the 2008 presidential campaign, said U.S. Trade Representative Rob Portman, who has known Mr. Bolten for years.

Known as a square dealer with both the press and members of Congress, Mr. Bolten should be adept at helping the administration get its message out, Mr. Portman said.

"Josh knows not just the ins and outs of government, but in particular he knows the ins and outs of the White House," Mr. Portman said. "He'll make some appropriate changes."

Bolten To Replace Card As Chief Of Staff (AP-Y2)

By Terence Hunt

AP2, March 28, 2006

Struggling to revive his troubled presidency, President Bush replaced longtime chief of staff Andy Card with budget director Joshua Bolten on Tuesday and gave Bolten authority to make further changes in a White House staff that even Republicans have complained is tired, insular and lacking fresh ideas.

Appearing with Bush in the Oval Office, Bolten gave no hint about what, if any, shake-up he might order. But White House officials said no one should doubt his ability to replace Bush aides. "He'll have all the authority he needs ... to make the decisions that he feels best, working with the president," White House spokesman Scott McClellan said.

Like Card, Bolten, 51, is a Washington insider whose ties reach back to Bush's 2000 campaign for the White House. Democrats — as well as some Republicans — grumbled that the new White House boss looked a lot like the old one.

Bush said of Bolten, "He's a man of candor and humor and directness, who's comfortable with responsibility and knows how to lead. No person is better prepared for this important position."

Before being named budget director in 2003, Bolten was Card's deputy chief of staff for policy, a colleague of such senior aides as top political adviser Karl Rove and White House counselor Dan Bartlett.

Alarmed by Bush's falling approval ratings and White House mistakes — from the bungled Hurricane Katrina reaction to the ill-fated deal to allow an Arab company to manage U.S. ports — Republicans have been urging the president to bring in new advisers with fresh energy. The GOP's concerns have been heightened by anxiety over midterm congressional elections in November. Card, as chief of staff, became a target for blame.

Democrats said Card's departure wasn't enough. "Simply rearranging the deck chairs on the Titanic by replacing Andy Card with Josh Bolten without a dramatic change in policy will not right this ship," said Sen. Charles Schumer (news, bio, voting record), D-N.Y.

Said Democratic National Committee communications director Karen Finney: "As the saying goes, you can put lipstick on a pig, but it's still a pig. Unfortunately for the American people, all President Bush did today was make it clear that they should expect nothing more than the same failed policies they have come to know all too well."

Once believed to harbor ambitions of surpassing Sherman Adams' nearly six-year record as the longest serving chief of staff — under Dwight Eisenhower — Card told Bush on March 8 he thought he should leave, McClellan said. Bush decided over the weekend at Camp David to accept the resignation and replace Card with Bolten, the spokesman said.

"Ecclesiastes reminds us that there are different seasons, and there is a new season," said Card, whose wife is a Methodist minister.

Bush, in an interview with CNN Espanol, declined to say if other changes were in the works. "Well, Josh has just begun to take a look at the White House structure," the president said. "And I haven't had a chance to talk to him about the future yet."

To the public, Card may be best known as the aide who calmly walked into a Florida classroom and whispered to Bush that America was under attack on Sept. 11, 2001. A veteran of every Republican administration back to Ronald Reagan's, Card is respected in Washington as fair, smart and hardworking — the first to arrive at the White House around 5:30 a.m. and often the last to leave at night.

Card, 58, stood stoically with his hands by his sides as Bush lauded his years of service. Then, gripping the podium, Card said in his farewell: "You're a good man, Mr. President."

Card's eyes were watery. He said he looked forward to just being Bush's friend. Bush then gave him five quick slaps on the back, and the two walked out of the Oval Office together.

"Andy Card, a longtime friend of mine, is tired," Sen. George Voinovich (news, bio, voting record), R-Ohio, told reporters later. "That he stayed in this job this long shows how much he cares about this country."

As chief of staff, Bolten will regulate the paper flow to Bush's desk, oversee his schedule and determine who gets in to see the president — although some longtime aides have unquestioned access.

Bolten was budget chief when the government ran its three largest deficits ever, including the record $413 billion shortfall in 2004 — though most of that was because of the economy and years of decision-making by presidents and lawmakers.

DOJ_NMG_0023290

"Josh Bolten has a record of failure," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev. "Look at what he's done with our national debt."

But Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (news, bio, voting record), D-Mass., said Bush had made a wise decision in picking Bolten. "His reputation among Democrats and Republicans alike is being a tough-minded, skilled conservative but also has an ability to work with Congress, work with Democrats as well as Republicans."

Rejecting charges of staff inertia, McClellan said half of Bush's senior aides have been replaced since the president's re-election in 2004. But some in Bush's inner circle — such as Texans Rove, Bartlett, Harriet Miers and McClellan himself — remain at the White House after 5 1/2 years.

'A Cool Hand' On The Switch At White House (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — Joshua Bolten is passionate about music and motorcycles, bowling and baseball. As President Bush's choice to be White House chief of staff, however, he will get a new chance to fulfill another passion: public service.

The son of a career CIA employee and a college professor, Bolten grew up in the worlds of government and academia. For most of the past 25 years, he has toiled inside the federal government.

Now, however, Bolten will take on a larger role inside a White House stricken by setbacks ranging from the war in Iraq to Hurricane Katrina.

"He is a very quick study, he is unflappable, and he is a cool hand," says Rep. John Spratt, D-S.C., the top Democrat on the House Budget Committee.

"People like him, and they trust him," says Sen. Chuck Hagel, R-Neb. "Those are the two currencies for success."

Bolten's friends describe a 51-year-old who also likes to ride Harley-Davidson motorcycles, organize bowling parties, play bass in a rock band and cheer on the Washington Redskins and Nationals.

"For all his success in the public sector, he is still a very regular guy," says Dan Price, a lawyer who worked with Bolten at the State Department and U.S. Trade Representative's Office in the 1980s and early 1990s. "He throws himself into bowling with the same enthusiasm that he approaches everything else."

During the 2000 presidential campaign, Bolten headed Bush's policy shop and earned the nickname "Wizard" from the would-be president. Bolten brought it with him to the White House, where he worked as deputy chief of staff for policy, then as director of the Office of Management and Budget (OMB).

In that job, Bolten has presided over federal budgets that expanded defense spending at the expense of some domestic programs — and sent deficits soaring to record levels. "He's been dealt some tough hands" such as Iraq and Katrina, says Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg, R-N.H. "You've got a Congress that likes to spend money."

Democrats like Bolten but not his $2.77 trillion budget. Sen. Kent Conrad, D-N.D., top Democrat on the budget panel, once asked him, "How can a guy as smart as you come up with such bad results?"

Throughout the give-and-take of the budget process, Bolten always stays on message. Asked last month whether a projected $423 billion deficit didn't call for higher taxes, he said: "A tax increase is the wrong prescription. … We are not an undertaxed society."

Bolten's experience at the OMB should help him in his new post, says Leon Panetta, who made the same transition under President Clinton. "It's not a bad credential to take into the White House," Panetta says. "When you're OMB director, you have a view of the entire government and the various programs, the ones that work and the ones that don't work."

Having succeeded Andy Card as chief of staff, Bolten will spend more time with the president than anyone else. He will set the pace at which the White House works, help shape policy and implement it, mediate internal disputes, convey Bush's agenda to Cabinet departments and Congress, and manage the president's time.

"Whoever works for (Bolten) should be single, they should not like their home, and they should not like to complain," says Ari Fleischer, Bush's first press secretary. "He's legendary for his long hours, especially at night."

DOJ_NMG_0023291

Bolten also has found time to rub shoulders with U2 frontman Bono and actress Bo Derek. An observant Jew, he recited the opening prayer in Hebrew at his first Cabinet meeting. He keeps a gas tank from a Harley-Davidson "Fat Boy" in his office. At Princeton reunions, "he's kind of a rock star," says classmate Mike McCurry, who worked in the Clinton White House.

In 2004, Bolten joined a band of current and former government workers that includes Tabetha Mueller, Card's daughter. The foursome plays '60s tunes at school fundraisers and government functions. "We're all kind of middle-aged people trying to resuscitate our high school years," says drummer and former White House staffer Bob McNally.

Shuffling The Deck (WP)

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

EVERY PRESIDENT is rich in unsolicited advice, and lately President Bush has cornered the market in one particular recommendation: Shake up your staff, bring in new blood, call the bullpen. Yesterday Mr. Bush responded to his unsought counselors as he usually does, by ignoring them. He accepted the resignation of his notoriously long-serving, notoriously hard-working chief of staff, Andrew H. Card Jr., but he did not exactly replace him with a fresh face. Joshua B. Bolten will have a shorter walk to his new office from his current perch at the Office of Management and Budget than a relief pitcher's jog to the mound. And as Mr. Bolten told C-SPAN's "Q&A" last year, he has been "a part of the president's senior team from the beginning, from the beginning of his 2000 campaign."

Is that a bad thing? It depends in part on what you hoped a shake-up might accomplish. Mr. Bolten is bright, dedicated, fair-minded and well-liked, so the threshhold question -- competence -- doesn't arise. And if you think Mr. Bush's second-term slide essentially is a management problem, maybe a new manager can help. The miscalculation on Harriet Miers, the failure to anticipate the Dubai ports deal controversy, the botched response to Hurricane Katrina -- maybe a fresher chief of staff could have done better. But Mr. Bolten, even if he doesn't rise seven days a week at 4:20 a.m., has been working nearly Card-like hours for as long as Mr. Card. And on Iraq -- the single issue on which the Bush presidency most depends, and that might benefit most from fresh thinking -- this personnel shift is unlikely to have an impact.

If you hoped that Mr. Bush might respond to some of his setbacks by adjusting some of his policies, this "shake-up" is even less likely to satisfy. We might dream that Mr. Bush would look at the mounting evidence of human-induced climate change and offer a policy response; or notice the baleful impact of high oil prices on his foreign policy and get serious about alternative energy; or acknowledge the plunge from fiscal surplus to deficit in his tenure with a shift in tax policy. But a prod for change is unlikely to come from Mr. Bolten, who told Brian Lamb in the same C-SPAN interview that what he brought to OMB was "a good appreciation of what is important to the president and how we can contribute to accomplishing his agenda." Other personnel changes may follow, but the lesson of this one is that Mr. Bush sees no need for new thinking.

Not Quite What We Had In Mind (NYT)

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

For months now, people have been urging President Bush to shake up his inner circle and bring in fresh air. Perhaps in response, the White House chief of staff, Andrew Card Jr., resigned yesterday. Mr. Bush opened the window — and in climbed his budget director, Joshua Bolten, who used to be Mr. Card's deputy.

If this is what passes for a shake-up in this administration, the next two and a half years are going to be grim indeed. This is a meaningless change, and it simply sends the message that Mr. Bush lacks the gumption to trade in anyone in the comforting, friendly cast of characters who have kept him cocooned since his first inauguration.

It's hard to figure out what unmet need this change is supposed to fill. There's been a lot of talk about how exhausted the original Bush team is. But Mr. Bolten ought to be as pooped as everybody else. It takes just as much energy to put together an out-of-whack, fiscally ruinous budget as it does to mess up an invasion or ignore a cataclysmic hurricane.

Mr. Bolten has been giving the president advice for years, and the result has been a deficit estimated at $371 billion. Perhaps he'll come up with a better approach in his new job. We've heard that under Mr. Card's watch, aides wound up showing Mr. Bush videos of TV news coverage of Hurricane Katrina to convince their boss that it really was a problem. Maybe Mr. Bolten can start the next budget discussion with some audiovisual aids — like an abacus.

DOJ_NMG_0023292

New White House Chief Of Staff Is A Harley-riding Policy Geek (KRT)

By Steven Thomma

Knight Ridder, March 28, 2006

WASHINGTON - In 1999, a rising star at Goldman Sachs had a choice: Go to work for the firm's chairman or take a gamble and work for a presidential campaign.

Joshua Bolten chose George W. Bush's campaign. He's been with Bush ever since and was tapped Tuesday to be Bush's new White House chief of staff.

Bolten, 51, is a hybrid for a Washington insider. A self-described "policy geek," the soft-spoken bachelor prefers life beneath the political radar. Yet his penchant for anonymity notwithstanding, he's no stranger to flamboyant gestures: He rides several motorcycles, and his favorite is the 2003 anniversary edition Harley-Davidson Fat Boy. He's entertained White House staff with his rock band, the irreverently named "Deficit Attention Disorder." And he's friendly with actress Bo Derek.

Bolten easily could have taken a different track to a very different place. The Goldman Sachs chairman whom Bolten shunned: Jon Corzine, who left the investment bank soon after that to enter politics himself as a Democrat. He's now the governor of New Jersey.

In hindsight, it's clear that Bolten was meant for public life, not banking. He was reared in Washington, D.C. His father served in World War II, then spent a career at the CIA.

Bolten calls his mother the smartest person he's ever met.

With a bachelor's degree from Princeton University's Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Affairs and a law degree from Stanford, Bolten clerked for a federal judge in San Francisco, then practiced law and worked in the State Department.

He became international trade counsel to the Senate Finance Committee in the 1980s before joining George H.W. Bush's White House as a counsel to the U.S. Trade Representative and deputy assistant to the president for legislative affairs.

After the elder Bush lost the White House in 1992, Bolten taught briefly at Yale, then joined Goldman Sachs for five years. A friend recommended him to the fledgling Bush campaign, and he warmed to the younger Bush immediately.

"I thought, boy, this would be terrific if I got a chance to work on this, even though I'd be forgoing this great opportunity to work . . . for the chairman of Goldman Sachs," Bolten recalled in an interview last year with C-SPAN.

After helping the campaign develop policy and assisting in the Florida recount that won Bush the White House, Bolten was named deputy chief of staff. In 2003, Bush named him director of the Office of Management and Budget.

His tenure there has been marked by the three largest federal budget deficits in history and soaring federal spending and debt that have angered conservatives in Bush's political base.

Bolten insists that the government is on track to cut the deficit in half within five years. But Democrats said his promotion represents a continuation of the same policies that produced record deficits. "As the saying goes, you can put lipstick on a pig, but it's still a pig," said Democratic National Committee spokeswoman Karen Finney.

If such criticism gets to him, Bolten can always escape on one of his motorcycles.

"I've been riding motorcycles for about 25 years," he told C-SPAN. "It's a form of relaxation and diversion that (is) beautiful and exhilarating. But you have to concentrate. So you need to clear your mind of everything else, because if you're not concentrating properly when you're riding a motorcycle, you're putting your life in danger."

For the full C-SPAN interview: www.q-and-a.org/Transcript/?ProgramID=1024

Outside The Office, Bolten Isn't The Usual West Wing Insider (LAT)

By Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — Joshua B. Bolten may be as much a loyalist as the rest of President Bush's inner circle, but he cuts a very distinct profile outside the West Wing: He rides a motorcycle, loves to bowl and keeps a copy of the children's book "Walter the Farting Dog" on his coffee table.

DOJ_NMG_0023293

That gives Bolten a rare dash of idiosyncrasy in a notoriously buttoned-down White House, where he will soon replace Andrew H. Card Jr. as chief of staff.

Bolten, 51, brings other attributes that could help the White House in these troubled times, with congressional Republicans in open revolt and Bush's policy agenda at sea. He has experience working on Capitol Hill and, as Bush's budget director the last three years, has mastered broad swaths of domestic policy.

Bolten also is one of the few non-Texans in Bush's tightknit group of advisors.

"He will reach out to a broader range of people to hear their point of view," said Robert D. Hormats, vice chairman of Goldman Sachs International and a Democrat who has worked with Bolten. "The worst way to serve the president is to narrow the range of advice he is exposed to."

But one thing Bolten does not bring to the White House is what some Republicans think is needed most — truly fresh blood. Like Card, Bolten has been a senior advisor to Bush without pause since his 2000 presidential campaign, and he also logged years working in Bush's father's White House.

Indeed, Bolten has worked for one Bush or the other for 11 of the last 18 years.

"He is very loyal, something this administration values," said G. William Hoagland, budget advisor to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.). "He keeps things pretty tight. If he disagrees [with Bush], he does not show it."

Bolten may help smooth the rough edges of the White House's relationship with Congress, where Republicans increasingly have complained that the administration gives short shrift to their views.

For Bolten, Capitol Hill is not unknown territory: He has worked closely with party leaders and budget writers since being named director of the Office and Management and Budget in 2003. His easygoing, nonconfrontational style was a welcome change from his predecessor as budget director, Mitch Daniels, who was often cutting and impatient in his dealings with lawmakers.

"We were in open warfare with his predecessor," said James Dyer, a lobbyist who was staff director of the House Appropriations Committee until 2005. Bolten "came to the Hill and sat down with the chairman and said, 'I'm really under orders to fix this relationship.' "

The son of a CIA employee, Bolten was born in Washington in 1954. He had a blue-chip education at St. Albans, the elite boys' school in Washington, followed by Princeton University and Stanford Law School.

After a stint on the trade staff of the Senate Finance Committee from 1985 until 1989, he served in the George H.W. Bush administration as general counsel to the U.S. trade representative and as White House lobbyist. He left government for a lucrative job in the London office of Goldman Sachs International, then joined the Bush-Cheney campaign in Austin, Texas, in 1999 as policy director on the recommendation of Robert B. Zoellick, now deputy secretary of State.

After Bush was elected, Bolten became White House deputy chief of staff, where he continued to play a central role in policy development. But after the Sept. 11 attacks he was asked to oversee a group to find ways to bolster domestic security.

In 2003, Bush picked him to succeed Daniels as OMB director at a particularly difficult time. The budget deficit was burgeoning and the economy was weak, yet lawmakers were still clamoring for more federal spending on farm subsidies, on projects that benefited individual congressional districts and on other politically sacrosanct programs.

"He has one of the most thankless jobs in this town," Hoagland said. "It's a job that nobody's going to give you great kudos for. You're either under attack here [on Capitol Hill] or the agencies."

Though Bolten's rise in government has been conventional by Washington terms, his interests have not. He owns two motorcycles, one of which he keeps at Bush's ranch near Crawford, Texas. In his OMB office, he displays a motorcycle gas tank commemorating the 100th anniversary of Harley-Davidson.

During the 2000 campaign, he formed "Bikers for Bush." Bolten, a bachelor, gained notoriety when he gave a motorcycle ride at one of the group's rallies to actress Bo Derek.

An avid bowler, he sponsored an annual tournament for several years. Bush is one of his regular opponents during his frequent visits to the presidential retreat at Camp David. As a holiday gift one year, Bolten gave his staff bowling balls.

Bringing Evolution, Not Revolution (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0023294

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

Joshua B. Bolten doesn't find it fun to say no. He once called himself a "softer person" than his predecessor as White House budget chief.

But he has found his own ways to make a point. He shows up at policy meetings with a giant calculator to add up the cost of anyone's ambitious ideas. And when someone strays off course, he throws a yellow penalty flag onto the conference table like a football referee.

Now it has fallen on this dry-witted Washington native to get the White House itself back on course. Tapped by President Bush yesterday to replace White House Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr., Bolten will take over a political operation gone astray -- mired in an overseas war, stalled in its domestic agenda, sagging in the polls and alienated from congressional Republican allies.

Like Card, Bolten is a Bush loyalist, known as self-effacing and efficient, not especially ideological, not a promoter of his own agenda, a quiet professional in a town filled with vast egos. Yet this workaholic bachelor and self-described "policy geek" in glasses is the picture of contradictions. Bolten, 51, spends his few off-hours racing down the highway on his prized Harley-Davidson Fat Boy or bowling in the White House alley or banging out tunes in a rock band he named Deficit Attention Disorder.

His office in the Dwight D. Eisenhower Executive Office Building adjacent to the White House attests to his personality. Rather than stock it with pictures of Bush, as many aides do, Bolten hung a large portrait of Eisenhower in military uniform above the fireplace and put a Harley-Davidson book on the mantle. Nearby is a motorcycle menorah. Not one to take himself too seriously, Bolten even hung a drawing by a niece that a visitor recalled was titled "Uncle Josh's Poop Calendar."

"He is very funny, he always kept the staff laughing," said Assistant Secretary of State Kristen Silverberg, who worked for Bolten during the 2000 presidential campaign and Bush's first term. At the same time, she said, "Josh has a great moral core" and a passion for bold ideas. "If you had to pick one person who was the architect of all the big first-term domestic policy initiatives," it would be Bolten.

Karl Rove, Bush's political adviser, said Bolten will reinvigorate the White House.

"People get energized -- new leadership has a way of doing that," Rove said. "He has strong views, but he is very adept at not allowing them to short-circuit a robust policy process." Bolten encourages aides to propose ideas he disagrees with, Rove added. "He would challenge them to think outside the box."

Yet Bolten was hardly an outside-the-box choice. He is not the Washington graybeard many Republicans urged Bush to recruit. By most accounts, Bolten will bring evolution, not revolution. Within hours of his appointment, talking points distributed among Democrats described his selection as rearranging deck chairs on the Titanic.

"He strikes me as pretty much cut from the same bolt as Andy Card, so I don't see this as a shift by the White House, replacing one insider with another," said Rep. John Spratt (S.C.), ranking Democrat on the House Budget Committee. But Spratt expressed "high regard" for Bolten: "He's bright, a quick study, yet cool and unflappable."

The son of a career CIA officer and a George Washington University teacher, Joshua Brewster Bolten grew up in Washington, attending public schools until enrolling at St. Albans for high school. After earning degrees at Princeton University and Stanford Law School, Bolten returned to Washington to work as a lawyer at the State Department and the Senate Finance Committee.

"He has this ethic of public service in his bones," said Daniel Price, a longtime friend.

Bolten joined the Bush team in 1989, working as general counsel of the U.S. trade representative and then as a White House lobbyist under President George H.W. Bush. He spent five years in London for Goldman Sachs International before being recruited at Christmas 1998 to go to Texas for the next Bush campaign. "I fell in love with the governor and the whole operation, the whole spirit of the operation," Bolten told C-SPAN last year.

Giving up the Goldman Sachs money, Bolten developed the campaign's policy platform, then helped enact it as deputy White House chief of staff in President Bush's first term. He was instrumental in pushing through tax cuts and the education plan known as No Child Left Behind. He also spearheaded a $15 billion plan to fight AIDS around the world, battling with Mitchell E. Daniels Jr., the director of the Office of Management and Budget, who objected to the cost.

DOJ_NMG_0023295

When Daniels resigned in 2003, Bush tapped Bolten to take over OMB and the annual $2.8 trillion federal budget.

Bolten produced two consecutive budgets that cut discretionary, nonsecurity spending, but the cost of wars in Iraq and Afghanistan as well as soaring Medicare expenses have pumped up deficits.

Within the administration, Bolten earned a reputation as tight-fisted and more "overtly demanding" than Card, as one colleague put it, while making few enemies. "He's well-liked by all who know him, even if they don't agree with every decision that he makes," said former commerce secretary Donald L. Evans. "You can't help but say Josh Bolten is a fair and good man."

And Bolten repaired some relations on Capitol Hill frayed under Daniels, who was seen as less deferential to congressional egos. Bolten stroked the likes of Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), terming him the "Incredible Hulk" of lawmakers. Bolten "is respected as a straight shooter and good listener," said Rob Portman, a member of the House leadership before becoming U.S trade representative last year.

Bolten views himself as an honest broker and eschews public attention. "It's best that you keep yourself out of the equation," he told C-SPAN, "and in that way make sure that others have confidence that you're not running your own agenda -- you're just running the president's agenda, which was my objective. Still is."

Still, he will not bring fresh legs to the assignment. Many Republicans around Washington attributed at least some of Bush's political problems to a tired White House staff that has remained largely intact since the beginning of his presidency. Card served longer than any other chief of staff in half a century.

Bolten has been with Bush since the start, as well, working as many if not more hours than Card. Although he gets into the office later than Card, just in time for the 7:30 a.m. senior staff meeting, Bolten is regularly seen at the office until 10 or 11 at night before climbing into his 12-year-old Ford pickup to drive home. (After long resistance, Bolten recently accepted the car and driver service entitled to high-ranking White House officials, according to colleagues.)

Nonetheless, some believe Bolten offers enough change to make a difference. "It's a significant change because he brings a different skill set than Andy did," said Cesar Conda, a former aide to Vice President Cheney. "Josh will bring some energy to the policymaking apparatus at the White House. And he'll bring good relations with the Hill."

Joshua Brewster Bolten: Longtime Ally, Now A Top Aide (NYT)

By Elisabeth Bumiller

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 28 — Joshua B. Bolten, the incoming White House chief of staff, would appear to have the insider credentials and ability to soothe Congress that the White House desperately needs.

He grew up in establishment Washington, the son of a C.I.A. officer, and graduated from the elite St. Albans School, former Vice President Al Gore's alma mater. As White House budget director, he amused his 500-member staff by renaming his weekend rock band Deficit Attention Disorder for a performance at the Office of Management and Budget. He has nurtured relationships on Capitol Hill, and is personally close to President Bush.

But the question is whether Mr. Bolten is the man to right a listing presidency, and whether his skills, instincts and access to Mr. Bush are enough to overcome public anger over the war in Iraq and the growing questions in Washington about the competence of the West Wing staff. Mr. Bolten, after all, has been with Mr. Bush from his first days as a presidential candidate, and in the last three years has presided over the biggest budget deficits in the history of the United States.

"The last time Josh was in here, I said, 'How can a guy as smart as you are come up with such bad results?' " said Senator Kent Conrad of North Dakota, the ranking Democrat on the Budget Committee. "He said, 'You can't pin this one on me.' "

Republicans in Congress reacted positively to the appointment but with barely stifled yawns.

"It's an indication that they're turning the page, which I think will be received favorably, but I don't think there's going to be any significant change in the way things are done over there," said Senator John Thune, Republican of South Dakota, who two weeks ago said that the White House staff lacked passion and urgency.

Still, Mr. Thune said, "he probably will do a better job of reaching out to Congress."

Supporters of Mr. Bolten insisted he would revitalize a moribund policy operation at a White House that failed in the past year to push a Social Security overhaul through Congress and is now facing strong resistance to Mr. Bush's plan to change immigration laws. They said Mr. Bolten, the influential but publicly invisible White House deputy chief of staff in Mr. Bush's first term, would help formulate and drive legislation in a way that Andrew H. Card Jr., the outgoing chief of staff, did not.

DOJ_NMG_0023296

As deputy chief of staff, Mr. Bolten scheduled the president's almost daily 45 minutes of domestic "policy time" in the Oval Office, and determined what issue was discussed, who was invited and in large part how it could be sold on Capitol Hill. In the first term he drove an agenda dominated by the tax cuts that the White House relentlessly pushed through Congress.

"Josh would have a calendar up in his office, where he would, in consultation with everybody else, map out when the president would be briefed on an issue, then tie it to events on the Hill and major announcements," said Cesar V. Conda, Vice President Dick Cheney's former top economic policy aide who worked closely with Mr. Bolten. "He was really the maestro of the policy process. I was there a month after Harriet Miers took over, and it wasn't the same."

Mr. Conda was referring to Mr. Bolten's replacement, now the White House counsel.

On Capitol Hill, Mr. Bolten, who worked in the White House Congressional liaison office of Mr. Bush's father, regularly stepped in as this administration's deal closer.

"I worked closely with him on everything from Medicare to the tax cuts," said Rob Portman, the United States trade representative and a former Republican congressman from Ohio who was a White House point man on Capitol Hill. "He was the one who ultimately pulled together the agency and White House folks and said, 'How do we get a result here?' He's not an ideologue."

Exactly what Mr. Bolten believes is something of a mystery, although he was considered a pragmatist who liked tax cuts and not a supply-side true believer in nearly six years at Goldman Sachs in the 1990's. He spent most of those years based in London, as the investment banking firm's chief lobbyist at the European Union's headquarters in Brussels, although he also worked for a short time there as the chief of staff to Jon Corzine, then the firm's co-chairman and now the Democratic governor of New Jersey.

When Mr. Bush named Mr. Bolten his budget director three years ago, Mr. Corzine, who was a United States senator from New Jersey at the time, called Mr. Bolten "on message and loyal to a fault."

Mr. Bolten, who described himself as a "policy geek" in an interview with Brian Lamb of C-Span late last year, has whitish-gray, closely cropped hair, round wire-rimmed glasses and the prosperous, buttoned-down look of a Washington corporate lawyer. At 51, he retains a slightly youthful look. At the White House, he is considered relatively mellow and more comfortable with reporters than Mr. Card.

Unlike other members of Mr. Bush's inner circle, Mr. Bolten makes occasional forays to the dinner parties of establishment Washington. He has turned up at the home of Ben Bradlee, the former executive editor of The Washington Post, and the writer Sally Quinn and has regularly dated women in the Bush administration. He distinguished himself at the 2000 Republican National Convention by appearing with the actress Bo Derek.

Mr. Bolten is also known for his motorcycle collection, although he most often rides a Harley.

"I've ridden motorcycles for a long time; it's not just a midlife crisis adoption," Mr. Bolten said on C-Span. "I've been riding motorcycles for about 25 years. And I enjoy it now I think especially because it's a form of relaxation and diversion that's beautiful and exhilarating. But you have to concentrate. So you need to clear your mind of everything else because if you're not concentrating properly when you're riding a motorcycle, you're putting your life in danger."

Joshua Brewster Bolten was born on Aug. 16, 1954. A graduate of Princeton and Stanford Law School, he grew up knowing little about the duties of his father, who worked in the C.I.A.'s directorate of operations, the agency's covert espionage arm. He plays bass guitar in his band, normally called the Compassionates. The lead singer is Tabitha Mueller, Mr. Card's daughter.

Washington Wire (WSJ)

By Various Writers

Wall Street Journal, March 27, 2006

March 28, 2006, 6:34 pm

Picking Up Static

DOJ_NMG_0023297

It didn't take long for the complaints to start flying about a draft telecom bill introduced Monday night by House Energy and Commerce Chairman Joe Barton, a Texas Republican.

The bill would establish a national video franchise, giving phone companies such as Verizon Communications Inc. and AT&T Inc. their biggest wish: the ability to avoid negotiating local agreements before offering cable-like television service. Barton found an ally in Democrat Congressman Bobby Rush of Illinois, but senior committee Democrats weren't as enthusiastic.

The Bells welcomed Barton's legislation, but continued to grumble it contained a provision on Internet neutrality, which drew scorn for another reason from consumer groups and Internet companies. They complained it would actually make it harder for the Federal Communications Commission to respond to complaints. Six high-tech companies, including Microsoft Corp., Google Inc., Yahoo! Inc., and eBay Inc., sent a letter to Barton complaining the bill would "fail to protect the Internet from discrimination and would deny consumers unfettered access" to Internet applications and services in the future.

A previous attempt to draft a bi-partisan bill fell apart after the cable industry complained it was unfair because it would impose new restrictions on cable providers.

Phone and cable companies have been trading jabs as the House telecom draft begins to move through committee. A cable industry-funded group, Broadband Everywhere, is preparing to release a report entitled "Frayed at the Edges: A Chronicle of the Bells' Decade-Long, Unfulfilled "Plan" for Fiber Deployment." The 18-page report provides a litany of examples detailing what it calls the phone companies' broken promises to provide high-speed Internet access. Complaining the Bells have been "nurtured on the mother's milk of government regulation and grants of exclusive telephone franchise rights," the group argues in the report that phone companies shouldn't be given help on video franchises now. –Amy Schatz

March 28, 2006, 5:32 pm

Outsourcing Outrage

House Democrats cry foul over bare-boned report on outsourcing of American technology jobs.

Tennessee Rep. Bart Gordon complains that the Commerce Department refuses to allow lawmakers to see the complete 200-page version of its Six-Month Assessment of Workforce Globalization in Certain Knowledge-Based Industries, finished in mid-2004 at a cost of $335,000. Instead, Commerce gave Congress a 12-page summary that Democrats suspect whitewashes the worst news about job migration to India and other countries.

"The taxpayers paid for an analysis on the state of U.S. jobs and off-shoring, and in return they've gotten twelve pages of essentially useless information," Mr. Gordon says. "In my book, any government report that costs $27,917 per page and says nothing is little more than a very expensive waste of time."

Mr. Gordon, the top Democrat on the House Science Committee, plans to employ a rare parliamentary procedure — called a Resolution of Inquiry — that he hopes will force Commerce to turn over the full report. The committee is scheduled to vote on his resolution Wednesday morning. If it passes, it will go to the House floor. "American workers deserve the full truth about the current and future state of their jobs — and that's all we are asking for," Mr. Gordon says. Science Committee Chairman Sherwood Boehlert (R., N.Y.) is rounding up fellow Republicans to try to defeat the Gordon resolution, noting the Commerce Department study has since been superseded by a massive outsourcing study by the National Academy of Public Administration.

Commerce spokeswoman Christine Gunderson declines to explain for print why the full version of the report wasn't released. As far as Commerce is concerned, she says, the 12-page summary is the final product. "The Democrats have that report, and it's publicly available," she says. –Michael M. Phillips

March 28, 2006, 3:58 pm

A Tax by Another Name

The Bush administration continues to strike out in its effort to trim the federal deficit by raising nontax revenues.

State trade directors from across the country are urging Congress to block a pending fee increase that they say would harm small businesses seeking to export goods overseas.

In a letter to key House and Senate committees, economic development officials from 41 states said companies that tap the Department of Commerce to help identify foreign buyers of American goods and services will soon have to pay as much as $2,500 for a single day of such "matchmaking" services, up from the current rate of $770. "These services … play a crucial role in linking exporters with foreign buyers," the letter states, adding that "thousands of small exporters will not be able to afford this increase."

DOJ_NMG_0023298

Congress intervened in 2005 when a similar fee increase was slated to go into effect, and Chris Whatley of the Council of State Governments says state officials hope for similar action this time around. –Deborah Solomon

March 28, 2006, 3:48 pm

Taxing Work

Republican tax-writers on Capitol Hill, hoping to spur approval of a two-year extension of the 15% rates on capital gains and dividends, thought they had hit on a plan to win over Senate Democrats. But some liberal groups and deficit hawks are urging Democrats to oppose the plan.

Republicans planned to pay for some of the costs of the investment rate cuts by allowing wealthy Americans to convert their traditional IRAs into Roth IRAs. Since funds transferred from traditional IRAs to Roth IRAs are taxed at the front end, allowing wealthy Americans to transfer their retirement funds to Roth IRAs would general billions of dollars in revenue for the Treasury.

But the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, the Committee for a Responsible Federal Budget, the Concord Coalition and the Committee for Economic Development warn that the plan is a "gimmick" that would increase the budget deficit in the long term. In a press conference today, the four groups called on Congress to reject the Republicans' plan. The groups acknowledged that allowing wealthy Americans to transfer retirement funds to Roth IRAs would raise money in the short term for the government. But it would cost far more money in the long term, they said. "People would elect to convert their traditional IRAs to Roth IRAs only if doing so would be to their advantage because it would lower their tax bills," said the groups "Anyone who expects that such a transaction would increase his or her tax bill simply would not make the transaction."

Republicans are likely to ignore the groups. But the deficit concerns could make it more difficult to Republicans to win votes from Democrats for the bill.

Competing versions of the tax bill passed the House and Senate last year. The bill is now in a Republican-run conference committee trying to iron out a final bill that can clear Congress this spring. In addition to the capital gains and dividends tax cuts, the bill would provide an exemption to the alternative minimum tax for millions of middle-class Americans and extend a range of business tax credits. –Brody Mullins

March 28, 2006, 9:33 am

Card's Real Ambition?

Card

In the wake of Andy Card's resignation as White House chief of staff, speculation will turn immediately to an intriguing question about his future: Is Card about to launch a campaign to become the next governor of Massachusetts, his home state? Acquaintances say Card has been telling them in recent months that would be his dream job. Popular incumbent Gov. Mitt Romney isn't running again this fall, and appears to be laying the groundwork to run for president instead. That makes Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey the current top Republican contender to replace Romney in this fall's election, but her campaign has struggled.

Healey has been trailing in the polls behind Attorney General Thomas Reilly, a Democrat. A recent poll showed Reilly ahead with 34% support and Healey with just 25%. An independent candidate, Christy Mihos, has also entered the mix, threatening to pull votes away from Healy. In a state with just 13% registered Republicans, Healey would need broad cross-party support to win. She has been troubled in part by news that her running mate, former state Rep. Reed Hillman, asked for a gubernatorial pardon for a constituent who was arrested three times for drunk driving.

Meanwhile, speculation in Washington will turn to who will replace new White House chief of staff Josh Bolten, who has been director of the Office of Management and Budget. Joel Kaplan, deputy OMB director, is a logical top choice. Another possibility: Clay Johnson, the deputy OMB director for management. –Gerald F. Seib and Deborah Solomon

March 28, 2006, 9:22 am

New Season

Bolten

DOJ_NMG_0023299

The elevation of Joshua Bolten – an administration veteran who's been with President Bush since the 2000 campaign – likely won't do much to silence critics who think that the White House is too insular and in need of new blood and fresh ideas. Still, the move signals that the administration is taking its political problems seriously.

The public comments of Bush and Bolten were carefully calculated to do minimal damage to Andrew Card's reputation, and to the administration's. Bolten described Card as "among the finest public servants of his generation." In brief comments of his own, Card quoted the biblical book of Ecclesiastes, saying simply, "It is a different season and Josh Bolten is the right person for that season." –John D. McKinnon

Selling U.S. Policy: Big Names For A Big Job (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

These are difficult times for America's image abroad. And the folks at the State Department's public diplomacy operation, especially in the Bureau of International Information Programs, are working overtime to meet their mandate to "deliver America's message to the world, counteracting negative preconceptions."

The "mission statement" on the 370-member IIP's Web site says it is to "Inform, engage, and influence international audiences about U.S. policy and society to advance America's interests."

But that's not easy. The White House, we hear, looked hard a while back to find some celebrity types to promote the president's vision for Iraq, but came up empty. IIP, run by Alexander C. Feldman , has a group trying to enlist some "big name" speakers, people with instant credibility, for the cause, according to an internal March 20 e-mail sent by an IIP aide.

The Democracy Dialogues group had drawn up a list of people they'd like to get, such as former CBS anchor Walter Cronkite , for example, to talk about a free press and well-known scholars to talk about other issues. Feldman, the e-mail said, "professed himself less than entirely satisfied with the list of prospective big name speakers . . . which he thought was 'uneven' " and lacking in "truly big names," especially "international figures."

"He threw out some suggestions of his own, which I pass along to give you all an idea of the terms in which Alex is thinking about this," the e-mail said. For women's rights, maybe Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice , retired Supreme Court justice Sandra Day O'Connor or Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg . For "judicial independence," maybe Justices Anthony Kennedy or Stephen G. Breyer , or maybe Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.).

But, the e-mail writer continues, "please be thinking about truly well-known international counterparts, e.g., Richard J. Goldstone , the former chief prosecutor of the International Tribunal for Rwanda and the former Yugoslavia -- people of that kind of stature" who would be known not just "in certain countries or regions."

So for "free and fair elections," we're told Feldman suggested former South African president Nelson Mandela or former president of Czechoslovakia Vaclav Havel . They'd certainly be willing to help advance America's interests.

For "freedom of worship: The Dali Lama [and] The Pope ."

Of course! Surely they'd at least be willing to do a Web chat for us? Hmm . . . Posting with the Pope. Kinda catchy?The Few, the Proud, the Cabinet Holdovers

Yesterday's announcement that Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr. is leaving sparked much chatter about other top-level departures at the White House. At the Cabinet level, though, don't expect major change.

But President Bush 's Cabinet has only three of the original 15 statutory chiefs from 2001: Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld , Labor Secretary Elaine L. Chao and Transportation Secretary Norman Y. Mineta . (A replacement for Treasury Secretary John W. Snow , not of the Class of 2001 anyway, has long been expected.)

Of the trio, Mineta -- a close friend of Card's back from the days when Card was secretary of transportation and Mineta chaired the House Transportation Committee -- has long been talked about as a likely departee before 2008. Unclear if Chao might depart at the traditional last departure window -- the midterm elections in November. If those two go, that would leave Rumsfeld, who has shown no inclination to leave.

DOJ_NMG_0023300

President Bill Clinton's Cabinet had several bitter-enders, including Interior Secretary Bruce Babbitt , Education Secretary Richard W. Riley , Health and Human Services Secretary Donna E. Shalala and Attorney General Janet Reno .At State, the Vacancy Sign Stays Lit

Still looking . . . Anyone who wants to be assistant secretary of state for nonproliferation, please contact Robert Joseph , undersecretary for arms control and international security, ASAP with your bona fides.

Stephen Rademaker has been "acting" in the job since September, but the search has gone on. Names that have come and gone include Mark Esper , a senior aide to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.); Marshall Billingslea , who's at NATO; and Susan Koch , a top adviser to Joseph. No signs any of them will be nominated any time soon. We hear Joseph has been telling people, even people he doesn't know, that he's not happy. Meanwhile, the operation bleeds talent as it merges arms control and nonproliferation bureaus into a new office called International Security and Nonproliferation.

Trouble May Be Brewing For GOP On Budget (AP-Y2)

By Andrew Taylor

AP2, March 29, 2006

A battle is shaping up between conservatives who want to cut government spending and moderates seeking to protect education and health programs as House Republicans start acting on President Bush's proposed budget for next year.

The conservative-dominated House Budget Committee was expected to act favorably Wednesday on a $2.8 trillion budget blueprint for the budget year that begins Oct. 1.

Moderates already are demanding a rewrite to boost popular domestic programs.

"I will not vote for a House budget resolution that would result in real cuts to critical federal investments in education, health care, housing veterans' services, social and community block grants and encourage my colleagues ... to do the same," Rep. Mike Castle, R-Del., told a cheering crowd of health and education advocates on Tuesday.

In a congressional session shortened by election-year politics, Congress probably will not wrap up its appropriations work before adjourning in October. A postelection lame duck session may be required.

The committee chairman, Rep. Jim Nussle (news, bio, voting record), R-Iowa, spent Tuesday polishing his budget plan ahead of what was shaping up as a full day of debate.

The plan was expected to adopt Bush's $873 billion proposal for Cabinet department and agency budgets that Congress renews annually.

That total does not include the $90 billion-plus in upcoming money for hurricane aid and the war in Iraq.

Democrats and moderate Republicans say popular domestic programs are being shortchanged. Their spending was cut slightly during last year's budget debate; Bush proposes an additional cut of about 1 percent this round.

The budget resolution is a nonbinding blueprint that establishes lawmakers' tax and spending priorities. It sets the outlines for bills that cut or raise taxes and spending.

With a resolution in place, the 100-member Senate can pass those bills with a simple majority rather than the 60 votes needed to overcome a filibuster.

It generally is assumed that Congress will not pass a major new round of tax cuts or push for more budget cuts after having an arduous time passing last year's $39 billion measure that trimmed Medicaid, Medicare and student loan subsidies.

While Nussle's budget plan probably will recommend a modest spending cut bill, senators are not likely to agree.

An amendment by Sen. Arlen Specter (news, bio, voting record), R-Pa., to add $7 billion for education, health and job training programs passed by a 73-27 vote, even attracting support from Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn.

Specter annually writes a huge spending measure for education and health programs and says the $7 billion would restore programs to their levels of two years ago. All told, senators added $16 billion above Bush's spending cap.

White House budget director Joshua Bolten — named Tuesday to succeed Andy Card as Bush's chief of staff next month — said in a statement that the president would seek to eliminate the additional money.

DOJ_NMG_0023301

In the House, GOP moderates are emboldened by Specter's success. Twenty-three lawmakers, led by Rep. Nancy Johnson (news, bio, voting record), R-Conn., signed a letter urging a 2 percent increase in domestic appropriations and warning that they "would have strong reservations voting for any budget that would result in real cuts in a number of programs."

Conservatives and GOP leaders such as House Majority Leader John Boehner of Ohio pledge to stick with Bush's spending cap, which may make it difficult to pass a budget. Even if the House does pass a budget that sticks to the Bush limits, Specter says he will not relent.

"I'm hopeful that the House conservatives can prevail, but I don't know that they have a working majority over there any more than our conservatives over here," said the chairman of the Senate Budget Committee, Sen. Judd Gregg (news, bio, voting record), R-N.H.

Lobby Vote Teed Up For Today (RC)

By Tory Newmyer

Roll Call, March 29, 2006

Senators will vote on final passage of a lobbying reform package today, after moving last night to drop two key provisions by cutting off debate on the matter.

To quickly wrap up work on the issue, Senators agreed to forgo votes on one provision that would crack down on lawmakers' use of corporate jets and another that would severely curtail the practice of earmarks.

Falling by the wayside with those two proposals was one calling for the creation of an independent Office of Public Integrity to oversee compliance with new lobbying rules. Though highlighted by outside watchdogs as critical to the overall reform effort, two-thirds of Senators voted to reject the plan, with some criticizing the office as too weak and others calling it an affront to the Senate Ethics Committee's authority.

Senators, however, added to the measure a ban on the longtime practice of allowing any lawmaker to stop legislation in its tracks with a secret hold.

Senators will work through about five to 10 remaining amendments to the bill this morning before deciding on the entire package, a senior GOP aide said. They have until the morning to submit germane amendments, at which point Senate leaders will meet to try to narrow the list, a leadership aide said.

Senators voted 81-16 to invoke cloture on the bill, after rejecting the independent ethics office in a 30-67 vote and adding the proposal banning secret holds by a margin of 84-13.

The Tuesday votes to limit the measure's scope disappointed some of the chamber's loudest advocates for reform.

"I have serious reservations about a bill" that doesn't address travel, earmarks and enforcement, said Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), his party's point man on the issue. "If those components are missing, I don't think we've gotten at the fundamental problem."

Obama said the Senate, which is under heavy pressure to take up the politically explosive issue of immigration reform, had moved too quickly on the lobbying rules overhaul.

Nevertheless, Senators supporting the travel and earmark provisions pledged to press ahead, planning to offer the proposals as amendments to future legislation.

"There will be an opportunity some other time to deal with it," said Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) a leader of the GOP reform efforts and a co-sponsor of the corporate-jet amendment.

He said despite failing to attach his proposal, he was satisfied with the final product, calling it a "very strong effort."

Although no deal on legislative vehicles for either amendment has been agreed to, a veteran GOP aide speculated that earmark reform could end up on a pending line-item veto bill, since attaching it to any other bill it would mean a 60-vote budget act point-of-order hurdle, as well as a cloture vote.

In the meantime, Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.), a leading earmark critic, said that any unauthorized earmarks added to bills will be challenged on the floor. "We're going to have some fun," he said.

To clear the Senate today, the bill will need 67 votes, the threshold required for changing the chamber's rules. If it passes, those changes — including the longstanding ban on secret holds — will become effective immediately.

DOJ_NMG_0023302

The measure being put to Senators today bans gifts from lobbyists and increases reporting requirements for lobbyists while doubling the frequency of those disclosures. It also tightens revolving door restrictions between Congress and K Street by expanding the one-year cooling-off period for former staffers and lawmakers who go to work as lobbyists. The bill also includes new disclosure requirements for groups that engage in grass-roots lobbying.

On the House side, Republican leaders were still hesitant to put a firm time frame on when the chamber would consider its version of lobbying and ethics reform.

"I would like to give you a firm date," House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) said during his weekly session with reporters. "I would like to tell you we will have it all finished by 'X.' But it is going to depend upon how quickly the committees can do their hearings, markup their bills and then some decision about how this is all brought to the floor."

The House Rules Committee has a hearing scheduled Thursday on lobbying reform, but no other committees currently have hearings or markups scheduled on the subject.

A group of House Republicans, led by Chief Deputy Majority Whip Eric Cantor (Va.) held a press conference Tuesday to push for the inclusion of 527 reform in the lobbying package, and to release a letter they wrote to IRS Commissioner Mark Everson demanding that his agency investigate reports that many 527 groups are not meeting disclosure requirements and not paying taxes they owe.

House Republican leaders decided Tuesday afternoon that they will put 527 reform on the floor next week, even if other portions of the broader lobbying reform package aren't ready for consideration yet.

The vote to attach the holds measure to the lobbying bill sets up a potentially landmark change for the Senate.

Bob Dove, a lawyer with Patton Boggs, said that during the eight years he served as parliamentary counsel to then-Minority Leader Bob Dole (R-Kan.), hold letters would come to Dole almost every day.

"Not all were the worst kind of holds, the 'I'm going to fight this with every strength of my being' kind," he said. But many would request that the Senator be notified before legislation moved forward, because the Senator might have an amendment he wanted included, he said.

"But they came almost every day," said Dove, who later served as Senate Parliamentarian.

Senate To Debate Lobbying Reform (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, March 29, 2006

The Senate today is expected to debate and start final consideration of a bill that would make sweeping changes to lobbying rules, with senators saying the vote is crucial to show that lawmakers are serious about "cleaning up" Washington.

Senators yesterday voted on two amendments to Sen. Trent Lott's bill to curb the influence of lobbyists, though there are nearly 80 proposed amendments on file. Late in the evening senators voted 81-16 to move on to final consideration of the measure, effectively limiting the amount of debate and amendments that can be taken up.

"This bill is not perfect but it contains important reforms," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, in urging his colleagues to move to a final vote.

Senators now have 30 hours to debate and then vote on Mr. Lott's bill, which bans gifts and meals paid for by lobbyists, requires lawmakers to attend an ethics training program and attempts to limit earmarks, called "pork-barrel" spending by critics. They will only consider amendments that are relevant to the bill.

Senators voted 67-30 to reject the creation of an independent Office of Public Integrity that would oversee congressional ethics, an amendment proposed by Sen. Susan Collins, Maine Republican.

"The public believes that investigation of our colleagues by our colleagues raises obvious conflicts of interest," she said. "Sunlight is the best disinfectant."

But Select Committee on Ethics members call the proposal "off target," saying it would replicate their work.

Senators did vote 84-13 for an amendment requiring senators to disclose their reasons for holding up legislation. The so-called "secret holds" targeted by this amendment are a "lobbyist jackpot," said Sen. Ron Wyden, Oregon Democrat.

DOJ_NMG_0023303

Mr. Lott, Mississippi Republican, balked at the number of amendments to his bill, saying most were irrelevant to lobbying reform.

"Are we serious ... or not?" he asked. "Some people I suspect would hope this would just slide off the face of the Earth [but] this issue is going to be dealt with."

The lobbying legislation was given priority in the wake of scandals surrounding lobbyist Jack Abramoff and the bribery conviction of former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, California Republican.

Key House members yesterday called for 527 groups -- so called for the Internal Revenue Service code that governs their nonprofit tax status -- to be subject to the campaign finance laws that govern lawmakers. Those groups, such as America Coming Together and the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, are mostly funded by a handful of wealthy activists.

"This is big money by a few people on a massive scale," said Rep. Tom Cole, Oklahoma Republican. The groups funneled $370 million into the 2004 election, with 46 persons giving more than $1 million each, lawmakers said.

The House expects a full vote on a new lobbying bill and the proposed 527 changes -- which are not included in the Senate version -- next week.

Lobbying-Overhaul Bill Nears Passage With Broad Support (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Lobbying-overhaul legislation is nearing Senate passage after both parties joined forces to kill a proposed enforcement office and to preserve an election-year perk: below-cost flights on corporate aircraft.

On a 67-30 roll call, senators rejected creating an independent office of public integrity intended to strengthen the existing ethics-committee process. Later, on a 81-16 vote, the joint leadership won a motion to begin to close down debate and effectively block any amendment on the corporate-jet issue.

Left in place are a set of tough new disclosure requirements for lobbyists, and lawmakers themselves would be subject to new rules making it harder to slip special-interest provisions into legislation at the last hour without prior debate.

Lobbyists would be barred from paying for meals or gifts for lawmakers, such as sports tickets. The level of detail in lobbying reports would be far greater, and all the data would be filed electronically to a centralized repository available on the Internet.

Yet without the proposed enforcement office, the effort may lose some of its credibility. And in further action today, there will be continued efforts to strike provisions requiring fuller disclosure of grass-roots lobbying campaigns, a powerful and often lucrative tool for interest groups, which lawmakers don't want to antagonize.

"Congress is always reluctant to reform itself," said Sen. Susan Collins (R., Maine), the bill's manager and one of those promoting the proposed integrity office. But she faced resistance in her own party leadership, while on the Democratic side, Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada appeared ready to shut down the debate and avoid a vote on the corporate-aircraft issue.

"No one needs to hang his head in shame about what we have done," Mr. Reid said. "This is a good piece of legislation. I don't think the perfect should get in the way of the good."

Mr. Reid said it was time to move onto new topics, such as immigration legislation. But his tone was far more accepting than the outcry in January, when Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff pleaded guilty to three felonies and promised to cooperate with a still ongoing Justice Department investigation of political corruption.

Sen. John McCain (R., Ariz.), who opposed the motion to cut off debate and limit amendments, vowed to come back on a future bill to address the corporate-aircraft issue. But the popularity of the perk -- and its usefulness to party leaders in the midst of political campaigns -- makes it hard to restrict.

The primary issue is one of cost: Lawmakers need only pay the jet's owners the equivalent of a first-class ticket. But access is also an issue because a company's executive can ride along with the lawmaker. Over the years the frequency of such flights has grown, and it has become a source of influence for business.

Senators Reject Proposal For Separate Ethics Investigators (USAT)

By Jim Drinkard

DOJ_NMG_0023304

USA Today, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Senate on Tuesday voted down a proposal to create an independent office to investigate alleged ethics violations as it struggled to revive a bill to tighten rules governing the ties between lobbyists and Congress.

Senators voted 67-30 to kill a plan to set up an office of public integrity that could interview witnesses, subpoena records and submit findings to federal prosecutors or the Ethics Committee for action.

Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, said the public has grown skeptical of Congress' ability to police itself and creating an independent ethics office would help restore confidence.

Senate Ethics Chairman George Voinovich, R-Ohio, called the idea "off target and unnecessary." He said the committee, which does not make its work public, handles ethics enforcement adequately.

Mary Boyle of the ethics watchdog group Common Cause said "it's very disappointing that the Senate would reject this very modest proposal. It does not bode well for the whole lobbying bill."

The bill was designed to boost public confidence in Congress, whose poll ratings have suffered under a lobbying-and-influence scandal. Former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who pleaded guilty to corruption and fraud charges in January, is scheduled to be sentenced today in a Florida federal courtroom.

Abramoff's gifts of travel, meals, sports tickets and campaign contributions to members of Congress triggered fears that the scandal would spread across Capitol Hill. Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, stepped down as chairman of the House Administration Committee because of his ties to Abramoff.

After Abramoff's guilty plea, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., and House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., ordered quick action to restrict gifts, travel and other lobbyist favors.

The push has slowed in recent weeks. The House has referred its legislation to five committees. The Senate bill stalled within hours when it was first brought up three weeks ago. Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., voiced frustration Tuesday. "Who wants to take the blame for not getting this done?" he asked.

The bill would ban gifts from lobbyists, including meals, to members of Congress and their staffs. It would require more frequent and thorough disclosure by lobbyists of their activities. It also would institute reporting requirements for travel aboard private jets and require advance approval for travel paid for by private sources.

Senate Votes Down Outside Ethics Office (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

The Senate rejected a proposal to establish an independent office to investigate ethics complaints against its members, and then cleared the way to pass a broad-based ethics and lobbying bill this week.

On a 67 to 30 vote, the Senate defeated a bipartisan proposal to create an office of public integrity, which its backers said was designed to strengthen enforcement of Senate rules and bolster voters' trust in Congress in the aftermath of the guilty plea in January of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

The Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee had killed a similar proposal March 2 after current and former members of the Senate's ethics committee called the office superfluous. The top Republican and the senior Democrat on the ethics panel led the successful effort to bury the proposal yesterday for a second time.

The rejected measure was devised by Sens. Susan Collins (R-Maine), Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.) and John McCain (R-Ariz.). They asserted that lobbying and ethics rules need to be better enforced for the public to regain trust in congressional officials.

"The fact remains that public confidence in Congress is near an all-time low," Collins said. "Strengthening the enforcement mechanism is critical" to improving lawmakers' reputations, she added.

Government watchdog groups reacted quickly and angrily to the vote. "The Senate today is refusing to acknowledge that Congress -- in the eyes of the public -- has failed to police itself," said Common Cause President Chellie Pingree.

Joan Claybrook, president of Public Citizen, said the vote against the office shows that the "Senate is out of touch."

DOJ_NMG_0023305

Opponents of the integrity office argued that the Senate's Select Committee on Ethics is already policing complaints thoroughly and without bias, and does not need an independent office to assist its investigations. "The laws and rules are enforced," said Sen. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio), chairman of the ethics committee. An office to conduct investigations before the ethics panel's consideration "would hurt the situation" rather than help it, Voinovich said.

Sen. Tim Johnson (S.D.), the senior Democrat on the ethics committee, agreed that a new office would "duplicate the ethics committee" and would "waste resources."

Lieberman said the proposal had been altered since committee deliberations to attract more support. The scope of the office's duties was narrowed to the Senate only, leaving the House out of the measure, and he reiterated that the office would be subordinate to the ethics committee. But Collins acknowledged that the measure from the start had faced an "uphill" climb.

The Senate also approved a proposal by Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.) to end the practice that allows a senator to block anonymously consideration of legislation. By an 84 to 13 vote, the Senate agreed to put a stop to what are known as secret holds.

The measure would require senators to disclose publicly within three days that they are objecting to the consideration of a bill. Currently, senators can place a hold on legislation without acknowledging their action to the public or to other senators.

The Senate agreed to work on the lobbying bill after voting 81 to 16 to limit the number of amendments it will consider. The procedural vote could allow the chamber to finish the legislation as early as today, lawmakers and staffers said.

McCain complained that some key amendments are being laid aside as a result of the vote. In particular, he said he regretted that amendments that would limit earmarks -- narrowly focused appropriations -- and that would, in effect, restrict lawmakers' use of chartered jets would not be voted on as part of the bill.

The legislation as it stands would bar lawmakers from accepting meals and gifts, including sports tickets, from registered lobbyists, and would increase the disclosure that lobbyists must make to the public.

Sens. Obama, Coburn Make Unlikely Duo (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, March 29, 2006

Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), a fast-rising leader in the Democratic Party, and Tom Coburn (R-Okla.), whom conservatives view as one of their most principled spokesmen, have forged an unlikely alliance in the debate on lobbying reform.

Both lawmakers have played prominent roles in the legislative wrangling over how to address lobbying abuses in the wake of lobbyist Jack Abramoff's crimes. Democratic leaders tapped Obama early on to spearhead the debate over reform, and Coburn has emerged as a leading critic of earmarks, teaming up with Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) in vowing to challenge colleagues' projects on the Senate floor.

Coburn has co-sponsored all five amendments that Obama has filed for the lobbying reform package. Obama has crafted a range of proposals:

- A prohibition on paid coordination of lobbying activities.
- A ban on lawmakers' negotiating future employment as lobbyists.
- A prohibition on advocating for earmarks in which the lawmaker has a financial interest.
- A prohibition on buying votes with earmarks.
- A requirement that earmarks be available for scrutiny during business days.

It is unclear when or whether the Senate will vote on the duo's amendments. Senate leaders scheduled votes on two different amendments to the reform package yesterday afternoon and had hoped to finish consideration of it quickly.

The unlikely pairing of Obama and Coburn has raised eyebrows in Senate leadership circles and among other observers.

"That's an odd alliance," remarked a senior Democratic leadership aide.

But an aide to Coburn said that his boss admires Obama's integrity.

"He has a lot of respect for him," said John Hart, Coburn's communications director. "He sees him as someone who has a good heart and principled and not mindlessly partisan. He sometimes finds it easier to work with a liberal Democrat than a Republican who isn't true to his principles."

DOJ_NMG_0023306

Coburn has not flinched from taking on powerful lawmakers in his own conference. Most famously, he offered an amendment on the floor last year that would have stripped more than a hundred million dollars' worth of funds for projects in Alaska, the home state of Senate President Pro Tempore Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), to defray post-Hurricane Katrina construction costs in Louisiana.

The daring move prompted an angry outburst by Stevens, who threatened to resign from Congress if the legislation passed.

In January, Coburn and McCain circulated a letter among colleagues warning them: "We are committed to doing all we can to halt this egregious earmarking practice and plan to challenge future legislative earmarks that come to the Senate floor."

And last year, before the debate over curbing lobbying abuses heated up in the Senate, Coburn pushed for an essential component of the pending reform package. At least five times in 2005 Coburn introduced amendments requiring that earmarks be visible in a conference report or joint statement accompanying the legislation, a principle that has garnered consensus in the chamber.

Obama, too, has taken positions not popular with other members of his party. After being chosen as the Democratic point person on lobbying reform, he introduced a bill that would create an independent commission to enforce lobbying rules. Good-government groups such as Public Citizen and Common Cause endorsed the proposal as their top priority, but only two senators endorsed Obama's legislation, Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.).

Obama has now thrown his weight behind the creation of an office of public integrity, headed by a single director, to enforce ethics rules. The Senate voted down the proposal yesterday.

But Obama has identified Coburn as someone perhaps more serious about reform than many of his colleagues.

"Senator Coburn is serious about wanting to clean up how we do business in Washington," Obama said. "I've worked with him on a number of projects dealing with transparency and accountability."

Still, Coburn's work on lobbying reform has been largely behind the scenes.

Advocacy groups pushing for strong reform such as Public Citizen and Common Cause say that they have had little interaction with Coburn, who has also taken a relatively low profile in the media, but they add his fingerprints are apparent.

"His name keeps coming up all the time in all the meetings I'm going to," said Craig Holman, a lobbyist for Public Citizen's Congress Watch, referring to Coburn. "His name keeps coming all the time, so I presume he's very active working with the senators."

Good-government advocates said they assumed that Coburn was not serious about lobbying reform because during the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee markup of the lobbying reform package Coburn offered a set of farcical amendments to criticize the process. Coburn also was the only member of the committee to vote against the reform bill in committee.

"We didn't make any efforts to contact Coburn because of the way he sounded at the committee markup," said Public Citizen's Holman, who added that Coburn's alliance with Obama is "something that really surprises me."

But Coburn's aide said that the lawmaker was dissatisfied with the reform bill because it did not do enough to safeguard against future abuses.

"He felt like the product was tilted too much to public relations and not enough to substantial reform," Hart said. "It's not enough to create the appearance of reform, he wanted to have the substance of reform. Unless we rein in earmarks and the ability of lawmakers to manipulate the earmark 'favor factor,' as Abramoff called it, we're not going to have real reform."

Obama and Coburn have teamed up before. Last year Obama supported Coburn's effort to create an office of chief financial officer to oversee reconstruction costs of Hurricane Katrina. In the House, Coburn worked with Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.) on healthcare issues, perhaps providing a partial explanation for his friendly relationship with Obama. Obama's legislative director is a former Waxman aide.

But an aide to Obama stressed that the relationship is personal. Their wives became friendly during the congressional orientation session that Obama and Coburn attended together after the 2004 election, the aide said.

Republicans Vow To Pass Limits On 527s (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, March 29, 2006

House Republicans yesterday sent a message to Democrats insistent on keeping restrictions on 527 groups out of the chamber's lobbying reform bill.

Five GOP members, led by Chief Deputy Whip Eric Cantor (R-Va.), declared they would use every opportunity to seek a crackdown on the 527s' potent political power.

Cantor said that Republicans want to rein in the hundreds of millions of dollars in unregulated donations flowing to 527s and that they will do so "whether as part of a larger reform package or as a stand-alone."

"If the state of the law is that there is no soft money in politics, it ought to be that way for the average American as well as the wealthy American," he said.

The groups are named after Section 527 of the tax code, which permits them to accept unlimited donations for the purpose of influencing federal elections.

Wealthy Democratic donors have poured more cash into 527s than Republicans since the groups first sprang up after 2002's McCain-Feingold campaign-finance law, sparking complaints from many Democrats that the GOP is pushing for stronger 527 regulations to serve its political purposes.

But the five House Republicans mounting yesterday's renewed 527 push challenged Democrats to support restricting the groups or risk being branded as dishonest for their support of campaign-finance reform.

"If people don't vote to eliminate these entities, it's hypocritical. You can't be for McCain-Feingold but for these entities as they are," said Rep. Tom Cole (R-Okla.).

Jennifer Crider, spokeswoman for House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), said Democrats welcome a debate on campaign-finance reform that is not mingled with lobbying and ethics legislation.

"If you want to do campaign-finance reform, do campaign-finance reform," Crider said. "But that doesn't substitute for the need for what Democrats have proposed, which is real lobbying reform that would end the Republican culture of corruption."

House Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier (R-Calif.) included new limits on 527s in the lobbying reform bill he introduced just before last week's recess, though it remains unclear when the bill would reach the floor.

The Senate, however, remains a question mark, as Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) has not decided whether to press his proposed amendment to the lobbying reform package that was in line for a final vote as quickly as last night.

McCain's amendment, which was introduced just before the Senate temporarily scuttled its consideration of lobbying reform, would restrict individual contributions to 527s to $25,000 per year, similar to the caps Dreier's bill would impose.

"It's not off the table, not off the table," McCain said yesterday when asked whether he would consider withdrawing his amendment.

Cantor and Cole, along with Reps. Marsha Blackburn (R-Tenn.), Patrick McHenry (R-N.C.) and Tom Price (R-Ga.), paired yesterday's push with a letter to Mark Everson, commissioner of the Internal Revenue Service, citing an August report from the Treasury Department's tax inspector general that found 527 groups have avoided tax bills totaling $9.4 million.

The five Republicans did not address the specifics of their desired 527-donation caps, focusing on heightened reporting requirements for the groups. Unlike 501(c)s, 527s must report donors' identities and contribution amounts.

"527s should at least have transparency and disclosure," McHenry said. While 501(c) nonprofit groups have also fielded charges of improper involvement in the political process, he said, "instead of eating the apple, we're trying to take a bite of the apple."

Crider noted that McHenry signed on to a letter sent earlier this month to House GOP leaders by members of the conservative Republican Study Committee (RSC), asking for any stronger 527 limits to be paired with relaxed rules in other areas of campaign-finance law.

"Now I'm thoroughly confused about what he thinks," Crider said.

Abramoff Gets Payback In Gaming Bill (HILL)

By Patrick O'Connor

The Hill, March 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0023308

A handful of gambling lobbyists have already called it Jack Abramoff's payback. Others are less direct.

But the central irony remains: The same Internet gambling legislation Abramoff fought so hard to defeat on behalf of a client that helped states conduct lotteries over the Internet now includes an exemption to protect those lotteries.

Now Abramoff's infamy and legal woes are driving anti-gambling legislation across Capitol Hill, even though one of the most prominent bills includes language that would protect his former client.

Two House bills, introduced separately by Reps. Bob Goodlatte (R-Va.) and Jim Leach (R-Iowa), seek to reinforce existing anti-gambling rules by respectively updating telecommunications and financial-services laws to give enforcement agents more power to prosecute gamblers who place bets on websites based outside the United States.

A previous version of Goodlatte's bill was defeated on the suspension calendar in July 2000 after a last-minute push by Abramoff and his team to spread misinformation about the bill on behalf of his client at the time, eLottery, a Connecticut-based firm.

Abramoff is now out of the picture, but gambling interests remain powerful on Capitol Hill and the current crop of anti-gambling legislation reflects that sway. Versions of this legislation have passed the House twice and the Senate twice, but never in the same year. Both chambers now appear intent on bringing bills to the floor this year.

The Goodlatte and Leach bills, along with legislation introduced in previous years by Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.), attempt to crack down on the estimated $12 billion annual overseas gambling business, but none of those bills would regulate some closely related industries, in an attempt to avoid potential roadblocks.

In addition to the lottery exemption in Goodlatte's bill, both pieces of legislation include language to protect fantasy sports from current anti-gambling laws, and the two bills also avoid a decades-long dispute between Congress and the Justice Department over the legality of interstate pari-mutuel betting on horse races.

"The underlying principle of this legislation is not to change the legality but to change the enforcement mechanisms," said Martin Gold, a lobbyist with Covington & Burling who represents the National Football League, an ardent supporter of anti-gambling legislation. "It doesn't make anything illegal that was legal, and it doesn't make anything that was legal illegal."

JUNE 2000

Goodlatte is staunchly opposed to gambling and first introduced a bill to improve the federal enforcement mechanisms for Internet gambling in 1997.

In June 2000, Abramoff and his team defeated the Goodlatte bill after a companion had already passed the Senate and his legislation appeared on its way to swift passage, according to a story in The Washington Post last fall.

Abramoff reportedly convinced a former aide to Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) to help get the bill on the suspension calendar, which would increase the number of votes necessary to approve it, and directed funds to various religious groups to help him pressure conservative members to oppose the bill on the grounds that it would actually expand Internet gambling — a false charge, Goodlatte maintains.

The bill eventually fell short by 25 votes.

"It's now clear to a great many members of Congress that they were hoodwinked by Mr. Abramoff," Goodlatte said. "He effectively killed it in [the] Judiciary [Committee] by getting some amendments offered."

In the intervening years, Goodlatte added language giving states the right to conduct lotteries over the Internet. The change was part of an ongoing effort by the lawmaker and his staff to craft the legislation around a specific task: to update the 1961 Wire Act to prohibit anyone from placing bets over the Internet so that the 45-year-old law would apply to current technology.

Goodlatte reintroduced the bill in February of this year, and the legislation now has 130 co-sponsors. The Judiciary Committee is expected to address it in the coming months.

"It is a bill we intend to consider," committee spokesman Jeff Lungren said.

HORSE RACING

In addition to updating the Wire Act, Goodlatte's bill also gives Treasury officials more oversight of financial institutions to track illegal bets. This latter provision is the entire thrust of Leach's bill, which parallels legislation Kyl is expected to introduce in the Senate sometime this year.

DOJ_NMG_0023309

The Leach and Kyl bills would require the Departments of the Treasury and Justice to establish "policies and procedures reasonably designed to identify and prevent restricted transactions" relative to Internet gambling. That would include monitoring of credit cards, electronic fund transfers and any checks or bank withdrawals.

Leach said his initial version of the legislation avoided any mention of horse racing, but the current version has a clause explicitly exempting any bet that adheres to the Interstate Horseracing Act.

Passed in 1978, the Interstate Horseracing Act governs all interstate betting on horses. The law creates a specific carve-out in the Wire Act to protect state-to-state betting on horse races provided it is legal in both the state where the bet is cast and the state where the race is run and provided all wagers are placed with a regulated pari-mutuel service.

Despite those protections, federal law-enforcement officials have argued that the law does not pertain to online betting.

In December 2000, despite strong protests from the Justice Department, Congress amended the Interstate Horseracing Act to include wagers placed "via telephone or other electronic media" provided both the sender and the receiver are licensed pari-mutuel providers.

Initially unaware of this dispute, Leach said, he was told early in the process to leave horse racing out of his legislation because it was a separate issue governed by previously established laws.

"It wasn't in the initial bill," Leach said of the horse racing exemption. The congressman said he wanted to limit his own legislation to betting that is already illegal under current law, adding, "Don't ever underestimate the power of the gambling lobby."

Goodlatte said he did not explicitly address the horse racing issue for the same reasons. "We don't address it, nor do we try to repeal it," he said.

The National Thoroughbred Racing Association (NTRA), which is both the trade association and governance body for breeders, owners and racing officials in the United States, sent out a release March 15 announcing that the organization "has secured language … to protect Internet and account wagering on horse racing" after Leach's bill passed through the House Financial Services Committee earlier this month.

The same release said that NTRA officials had worked with Goodlatte to "ensure that [his bill] also contained language that protects online and account pari-mutuel wagering."

The organization's political action committee had already contributed $79,000 to members of Congress this cycle as of Jan. 23 of this year, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. Neither Goodlatte nor Leach was a direct recipient of those funds, but Goodlatte's PAC, the Good Fund, did receive a $5,000 donation in July.

In addition, Federal Election Commission records show that Kyl refunded a $5,000 donation from the group late last year, according to politicalmoneyline.com. His office did not return repeated phone calls for comment.

FANTASY SPORTS

Almost 15 million people participate in fantasy sports leagues annually, according to the Fantasy Sports Trade Association (FSTA), which represents most of the online fantasy sport providers like CBS SportsLine and ESPN.com.

The average player participates in six separate leagues in two different sports each year, according to a recently completed survey by Prof. Kim Beason of the University of Mississippi. Participants are overwhelmingly male and spend an average of $493.60 on league fees every year.

The professional sports leagues, particularly the NFL and Major League Baseball, draw some revenue from fantasy sports participants, but much of that is tied up as part of larger broadcast or marketing deals.

The leagues now appear to be repositioning themselves after a recent boom in fantasy sports participation.

In 2005, big-league baseball paid its players union $50 million for the fantasy rights to its players for five years. Last year, St. Louis-based CBC Distribution and Marketing, Inc. sued the league for requiring companies to secure a license to operate fantasy baseball leagues online, arguing that statistics are part of the public record. That suit is pending.

In addition, the NFL has a deal with CBS SportsLine to operate its website, but the fantasy rights are up next month and the NFL can now renegotiate its deal.

Fantasy sports are protected in each piece of Internet gambling legislation because the results are an aggregation of individual statistics in multiple games over an entire season; therefore, backers argue, winning and losing is contingent on skill in picking players and the financial rewards are almost always determined before the season.

DOJ_NMG_0023310

The results of fantasy sports contests are nearly impossible to influence because the standings are determined by too many players over too many games for outsiders to influence those results, a number of lobbyists said on background.

Goodlatte said it is unfair to criticize the entire bill on the basis of the single exemptions.

"It all goes back to Abramoff," Goodlatte said. "We were never trying to expand gambling. Clearly, it would contract Internet gambling. … [The legislation is] tighter now that it has ever been."

Affordability, Student Transfers On The Table In Higher-education Bill (USAT)

By Mary Beth Marklein

USA Today, March 29, 2006

The Republican-led U.S. House is poised to consider a package of higher-education proposals today that proponents say would increase college access and affordability and make it easier for students to transfer to different schools.

Critics see things differently. In ads Tuesday in a Capitol Hill newspaper, a group of associations representing college registrars, faculty members and students suggest that the aid proposals don't go far enough and that the bill panders to special-interest groups including lenders and for-profit colleges.

The ad urges legislators to vote no on the House version of the bill to reauthorize the Higher Education Act, the law that governs most federal student-aid programs. A vote could come today. The Senate still needs to pass its bill.

Democrats, noting that Congress cut $12 billion in student aid in a deficit-reduction plan signed into law last month by President Bush, said they would push for stronger provisions to help families. Reps. George Miller, D-Calif., and Dale Kildee, D-Mich., said in a statement Tuesday that the House bill "misses an opportunity to make college more affordable."

A look at two key questions:

•Access and affordability. Howard McKeon (R-Calif.) chairman of the House Education Committee, says the bill would strengthen federal Pell Grants and access programs, especially for low- and middle-income students, and increase funding to minority-serving schools. Miller, the senior Democrat on the education committee, says Congress could boost student aid by billions over the next 10 years, at no cost to taxpayers, if it rewarded colleges that use a program through which the government makes loans directly to students rather than through banks.

•Ease of transfer. Noting that more than half of students attend multiple institutions, the bill would broaden the definition of "an institution of higher education" to include for-profit colleges, and "make it more difficult for academic credits earned by students to be wrongly denied," McKeon says. But the Washington-based American Association of Collegiate Registrars and Admissions Officers says the legislation could "open the door to fraud and abuse" and "dilute the high standards that have made American higher education the envy of the world."

States Have More Schools Falling Behind (WP)

By Paul Basken

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

More than a quarter of U.S. schools are failing under terms of President Bush's No Child Left Behind law, according to preliminary state-by-state statistics reported to the U.S. Department of Education.

At least 24,470 U.S. public schools, or 27 percent of the national total, did not meet the federal requirement for "adequate yearly progress" in 2004-2005. The percentage of failing schools rose by one point from the previous school year. Under the 2002 law, schools that do not make sufficient academic progress face penalties including the eventual replacement of their administrators and teachers.

The results raise doubts about whether the law is working and its results are fairly calculated, said Michael Petrilli, vice president for policy at the Thomas B. Fordham Foundation, a Washington-based research group.

"Most people thought that at this point in the law, we'd be seeing these numbers go way, way up" as standards toughen, said Petrilli, a former Education Department official who helped implement the law in 2002.

Bush achieved rare bipartisan support to get the No Child Left Behind law passed as part of his first-term agenda. Since then, the law has become a subject of dispute, with Democrats accusing Republicans of providing insufficient money for it.

DOJ_NMG_0023311

At the same time, there is evidence that states may be manipulating the numbers, Petrilli said. He cited Oklahoma, where the percentage of failing schools dropped to 3 percent from 25 percent a year earlier.

Under the law's "adequate yearly progress" measurements, states are required to show improvement in student test scores in reading and math. If they do not do so for two consecutive years, individual schools must let students transfer to another school. After a third year, schools must pay for tutoring for students from low-income families. Some states have complained that the federal government has not provided enough funding to cover costs such as tutoring.

The 2004-2005 rankings are just "one thing out of many things" that need to be considered when judging schools, said Chad Colby, a spokesman for the Education Department. A set of federal tests, the National Assessment of Educational Progress, gives policymakers another indication of scholastic achievement, Colby said.

The true test of the No Child Left Behind law will come in 2013-2014, when schools are required to bring all students to proficiency in math and reading, he said.

The Bush administration has expressed satisfaction with the rate of improvement under No Child Left Behind. Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings, in testimony last month before the Senate's education committee, cited statistics such as 9-year-olds making more progress in reading over the past five years than in the previous 28 years combined.

The law, however, allows states to adjust both their tests and the formulas by which they calculate "adequate yearly progress," leaving parents and policymakers unable to make definite conclusions about such numbers, analysts including Petrilli said.

"These stats are meaningless in the absence of a common test and common standards," said Diane Ravitch, a New York University professor who was an assistant secretary of education under President George H.W. Bush.

Among individual states, Florida placed last with 72 percent of its schools failing to show enough improvement, while Oklahoma led, according to the Education Department statistics provided to Bloomberg News. Rhode Island ranked second behind Oklahoma with 5 percent failing, with Iowa at 6 percent, Montana at 7 percent and New Hampshire, Tennessee and Wisconsin at 8 percent.

At the other end, Hawaii ranked second-worst with 66 percent of its schools failing to improve. Washington, D.C., came in third-worst with 60 percent, followed by Nevada at 56 percent and New Mexico at 53 percent.

Different states were required to submit the statistics to the Education Department by March 8. Federal officials plan to verify them and incorporate them into an annual report to Congress later this year, Colby said.

Math, Reading Crowd Out Other Classes In Test-Driven Schools (LAT)

By Seema Mehta

The Los Angeles Times, March 29, 2006

Science, social studies, music and arts classes are shrinking in the nation's schools, as educators concentrate on the reading and math curricula that gauge schools' performance on standardized tests under the federal No Child Left Behind Act, according to a study released Tuesday.

The report, by the Center on Education Policy, found this shift in instructional focus is among several profound changes in how schools operate that were prompted by the law, the centerpiece of President Bush's education agenda.

"The impact of the No Child Left Behind Act continued to broaden and deepen during 2005, the law's fourth year of implementation," said Jack Jennings, president of the Washington-based nonprofit that wrote the report. The law "affects a range of state and local activities: when and how students take tests, which textbooks districts adopt, which student receive extra attention…. Teaching and learning are changing as a result of No Child Left Behind."

Perhaps the most significant change is the increase in math and English offered in many districts, reducing the time students have for other subjects and electives, the report found.

Other main findings include:

• Overall student achievement has improved in the nation's schools since the law took effect, though some of the gains may be attributed to states changing how they determine whether a student is deemed proficient in English and math.

DOJ_NMG_0023312

• Urban districts are bearing the brunt of the punitive aspects of the law, with a disproportionate number being identified as needing improvement, partly because of higher levels of poverty in inner-city schools. Some 90% of schools that are being restructured after failing to meet requirements for several years are in urban districts.

• The report called for more funding and flexibility by the federal government.

"From the Capital to the Classroom: Year 4 of the No Child Left Behind Act" was drawn from surveys of education leaders in the 50 states, surveys of 299 school districts, and in-depth case studies of 38 districts and 42 schools.

Critics argue that the report's findings and recommendations are unreliable because the surveys do not provide a scientific, quantitative look at the act.

"It's the same thing they've come out with every year on No Child Left Behind. What they do is ask public school officials what's going on, and they turn around and report the claims as facts. So every year they say schools are desperately underfunded," said Greg Forster, a senior fellow with the pro-voucher Friedman Foundation in Indianapolis. The findings "should be taken as public-school system propaganda."

Still, among the most striking findings was that more than two-thirds of districts reported reducing social studies, science, art and music instruction in elementary school to make time for increased English and math.

Chad Colby, spokesman for the U.S. Department of Education, said these two subjects were vital because they formed the foundation for students' education.

"Children must first learn to read so they can read to learn for the rest of their lives," he said.

California educators agreed.

"It is important for us to remember that reading and math are gateway skills, fundamental to success in other subjects, in higher education and the workplace," said state Supt. of Public Instruction Jack O'Connell.

But some teacher groups argue that it is vital to instill a love of all subjects in students at an early age, when they are most receptive.

"The young child is the most close to the mentality of the scientist — they've got curiosity," said Gerry Wheeler, executive director of the National Science Teachers' Assn. in Arlington, Va.

At Havenscourt Middle School, one of the most troubled schools in Oakland, four of the seven daily periods are devoted to reading and math, a move Principal Jacqueline Phillips says was born of necessity. Poetry, drum lessons and drama are offered every day after school, and three-quarters of the school's 600 students participate.

"This is something that must be done for survival," she said. "We have so many students that are scoring so low and are not equipped to move to the next grade."

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

More equations

This school year, elementary school instruction in social studies--history, geography and civics--was cut the most as more time was spent on English, language arts and math.

Percent of districts reporting instructional time was cut "somewhat/to a great extent," by subject

Social studies (history, geography, civics): 33%

Science: 29%

Art and music: 22%

Physical education: 14%

Other subjects: 17%

Source: Center on Education Policy. Graphics reporting by Seema Mehta

Frist Cut A Debt Deal With Spending Hawks (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen

The Hill, March 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0023313

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) will give spending hawks floor time on budget-process reforms this year as part of a deal he cut to secure smooth passage of a debt-limit increase.

The conservatives, who agreed to withhold amendments to the debt-limit bill earlier this month, will have a chance to amend line-item veto legislation, according to Senate Budget Chairman Judd Gregg (R-N.H).

"We don't want to just keep passing increases in the debt ceiling," said Sen. John Ensign (R-Nev.), one of the conservatives who had eyed the debt-limit legislation as a vehicle for a budget overhaul. He voted against raising the cap when it passed March 16.

Without the deal, Senate conservatives, including Sens. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.), Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.) and Ensign, may have tried to attach amendments aimed at budget-process reform.

Any amendment would have sent the bill to the House for a politically uncomfortable vote — one that House Republican leaders had avoided by employing a parliamentary trick that allows the House to generate a debt-limit increase without a separate roll call.

Frist has often been criticized by House Republicans for past promises to recalcitrant senators, but there was little booing this time. The deal spared House leaders the pain of an election-year vote on raising the debt cap to $9 trillion.

"We appreciate them sending the president a clean debt-limit extension," said Ron Bonjean, the spokesman for House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.).

Senate Democrats had given strong signals that they might support budget-process amendments offered by Republicans to force the House to vote on the debt limit.

Frist, who promised floor time before the August recess, cut the debt-limit deal because "he believes strongly in line-item veto and [biennial] budgeting," according to his chief of staff, Eric Ueland.

Republican spending hawks say they have few weapons to fight against expansion of the federal government. The budget process, they argue, is wired to promote spending, so they want to change the system.

Most of their ideas have been kicking around for years, but they hope anger among party activists will provide a catalyst for enacting mechanisms to control spending.

The proposals include line-item veto authority for the president, biennial budgeting, altering the rules through which the Congressional Budget Office calculates the costs and benefits of legislation, and the creation of a panel to review and eliminate government programs.

Though many Senate conservatives think process is the problem when it comes to increased spending, they do not appear to have agreed on which remedies to try.

"As to which reforms he would like to see included in a package on the floor or what amendments will be offered or supported, we will be discussing those as we get closer to action," said Ensign spokesman Jack Finn.

Frist's own legislation for a line-item veto is likely to headline any such package on the Senate floor, according to Republican lawmakers and aides.

During a GOP retreat at the beginning of the year, Frist encouraged conservatives to round up a filibuster-proof majority for a biennial budgeting plan written by former Budget Committee Chairman Pete Domenici (R-N.M.).

Sessions has been a powerful force behind a resurrection of Domenici's long-standing effort.

Frist is a co-sponsor of the biennial budgeting legislation, and backers think they can win a floor vote.

Under Domenici's plan, lawmakers would adopt two-year fiscal blueprints and consider appropriations bills only in the first session of a Congress.

Proponents say that budgeting every two years would give lawmakers more time to evaluate the programs in their bills and identify targets for elimination.

"Committees would have longer to work on them," Sessions said. "We need to do a biennial budget."

Critics of biennial budgeting say that it would transfer authority unwisely from Congress to the president, a charge also leveled against several other proposals for budget-process reform. They also say any time saved by the maneuver would be negated by an increase in the need for supplemental appropriations bills.

Gregg spokesman Jeff Turcotte said there will be a hearing on the line-item veto on April 5.

DOJ_NMG_0023314

Democratic Senators Vow FDA Nominee Block (AP-Y2)

AP2, March 28, 2006

Two Democratic senators said Tuesday they will not stop blocking President Bush's nominee to lead the Food and Drug Administration until the agency decides whether the emergency contraceptive Plan B can go on sale without a prescription.

Sens. Patty Murray, D-Wash., and Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y, told reporters that they met Tuesday with Dr. Andrew von Eschenbach but were unable to get a Plan B update.

"He gave us no status and he couldn't give us any kind of timeline," Murray said.

The FDA has held off on a decision on Plan B since Barr Laboratories Inc. first applied to sell the pill without a prescription in 2003.

The Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee has not set a date for hearings on von Eschenbach, said Craig Orfield, a spokesman for the chairman, Sen. Mike Enzi, R-Wyo. Enzi has urged the White House to resolve the Plan B issue, Orfield said.

Nev. Senator Drops Coast Guard Opposition (AP-Y2)

AP2, March 28, 2006

Republican Sen. John Ensign (news, bio, voting record) of Nevada said Tuesday he is dropping his opposition to the promotion of a Coast Guard vice admiral who headed Hurricane Katrina recovery efforts.

Ensign, a former veterinarian who criticized pet evacuation efforts after the hurricane, had been blocking President Bush's nomination of Vice Adm. Thad W. Allen to be commandant of the Coast Guard.

Bush nominated Allen in January and the Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee approved the nomination earlier this month.

Ensign said in a statement that he met with Allen on Tuesday morning and discussed problems with the Katrina response. Ensign said his concerns were unrelated to pet treatment, but he didn't say what they were.

Under Senate procedures, any senator can block a vote on a confirmation or a piece of legislation by raising an objection.

Now that Ensign has lifted his hold, Allen's nomination can go to the full Senate for a vote. No timeline has been set.

Voinovich Warms To U.S. Ambassador To U.N. (AP-Y2)

By David Hammer

AP2, March 28, 2006

The Republican senator who upset the White House last year by opposing President Bush's choice for U.N. ambassador now says John Bolton is "a changed man" whom he might support should Bush try to renew the appointment.

Sen. George Voinovich (news, bio, voting record), R-Ohio, said Tuesday he has been watching Bolton closely since he became ambassador on Aug. 1. Bush temporarily installed Bolton while Congress was in recess after Voinovich joined most Democrats in blocking a Senate vote on the nomination last May.

At the time, Voinovich called him a bully who would make critical U.N. reforms harder to achieve.

"John Bolton at this point is a changed man," Voinovich told reporters. "I want reform of the United Nations, so I've worked with John and stayed on top of John to make sure he takes this wonderful opportunity."

Bolton's appointment expires next January. If Bush reappoints him, Voinovich said he "might not take the same position as last time."

Voinovich said he has been impressed with Bolton's flair for diplomacy since he got to the U.N., especially when the United States ran into opposition to some of its proposals for overhauling the international body.

"The old Bolton would have said this is terrible, but instead he said we don't agree but we're going to stick with it," Voinovich said. "It's a whole different attitude from the old attitude when John would have given them the back of his hand and walked out."

Boehner Changes Tune On Drug Benefit (HILL)

By Kelly McCormack

The Hill, March 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0023315

After calling the implementation of the Medicare prescription-drug program "horrendous" last month, House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) has been warming to the Bush administration's handling of the new benefit.

Over the past week, Boehner has issued three press releases condemning Democratic criticisms of the program and touting its success.

"Despite attempts by congressional Democrats to talk down the program, more and more Americans are signing up and paying far, far less for their medications than they were before," Boehner said Friday.

As recently as last month, he wasn't as positive.

"The implementation of the Medicare plan has been horrendous. We've made it far more complicated than it should be," Boehner said on "Fox News Sunday" in early February.

Since settling in as majority leader, Boehner has softened his stance on the drug program's implementation and begun to toe the party line.

"Recent polling reveals just how out of touch Democrats are with their relentless demagoguery." Boehner said in a press release Monday, referring to a Dutko Worldwide poll that found that most senior citizens who have signed up are satisfied with their drug coverage.

Boehner's February statement on Fox came as no surprise to Jennifer Crider, spokeswoman for House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.). Crider said that condemning the implementation is different from condemning the program but that Boehner was "absolutely correct."

"The implementation of the prescription-drug benefit has been horrendous, and that's why there should be a six-month enrollment extension," Crider said. The enrollment deadline is May 15.

"Boehner saw a lot of problems that many people have seen in the implementation of the benefit," said Boehner spokesman Kevin Smith. The federal Centers for Medicare & Medicaid Services "has made significant progress over the last couple of months, and there is growing evidence that as more seniors enroll the more they save on their prescription-drug costs."

Democrats Opening Assault On Bush Security Policies (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 28 — Seeking to capitalize on President Bush's troubles overseas, leading Democrats in Congress are unveiling a broad attack this week on the administration's security policies at home and overseas along with a set of proposals intended to demonstrate that they have a credible alternative.

In a set of policy papers titled "Real Security: Protecting America and Restoring Our Leadership in the World," Democratic leaders in the House and Senate plan to join with leading figures in the party, including former Secretary of State Madeleine K. Albright and Wesley K. Clark, the retired general and former presidential contender, in presenting the plan on Wednesday.

Their purpose, Democrats say, is to rebut the Republican accusation, echoed in some editorial columns, that with Mr. Bush's approval ratings sagging eight months before the next election, party leaders and candidates have not laid out a coherent set of alternatives, especially on Iraq and on dealing with nuclear proliferation.

The Democrats' material asserts that in combating terrorism, party leaders want to increase financing for Special Operations forces and interdicting terrorist financing and to spend more on economic development in troubled areas like the Middle East and South Asia.

Democrats also want to give greater powers to the office of the national intelligence director and to investigate accusations of abuse and torture of detainees. They say they want increased financing for screening containers at ports and securing nuclear and chemical plants and training emergency health workers.

Most of the proposals are not new. Many echo arguments put forward by Democrats and by their 2004 presidential nominee, Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, including a demand for more military equipment and body armor for troops and improved veterans' benefits.

DOJ_NMG_0023316

In the diplomatic field, the proposals say Democrats will "redouble efforts to stop nuclear weapons development in Iran and North Korea," but they offer few details that differ from the Bush administration's effort to get cooperation from allies in Asia, the Middle East and Europe to pressure those countries to abandon their nuclear programs.

"In these times of unprecedented challenge and change, real leadership demands preparing for the threats that exist today and those that will emerge tomorrow," said Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the House Democratic leader, who will be appearing with Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Senate Democratic leader.

"It demands tough and smart policies that recognize that a stronger America begins at home," Ms. Pelosi added.

In a statement to be released on Wednesday, Mr. Reid is to say: "Over the last century, Democrats have led America through two world wars, have stared down threats to our security at home and have defeated the ideals of Communism and Fascism. Today, Democrats are here to build on that record."

But Republicans, anticipating the Democratic attack, were already circulating their own counteroffensive on Capitol Hill on Tuesday. Senator Christopher S. Bond, Republican of Missouri, said he had just obtained a copy of the Democrats' plan and added, "It's taken them all this time to figure out what we've been doing for a long time."

Mr. Bond said that while Democrats sought to showcase their support of national security, they had tried to block renewal of the antiterrorism law known as the USA Patriot Act and the administration's program of wiretapping without warrants.

Democrats say that while their policies lack detail in some respects, they were able at least to put together a package of proposals to which all members of the party could subscribe, calling for more money to be spent on a broad array of items, including port security and foreign aid.

Meanwhile, the manifesto skirted divisive issues like whether the United States should set a timetable on the withdrawal of troops from Iraq, as advocated by Representative John P. Murtha, Democrat of Pennsylvania, but opposed or not endorsed by other members of his party.

Instead, it calls for making sure that 2006 "is a year of significant transition to full Iraqi sovereignty, with the Iraqis assuming primary responsibility for securing and governing their country and with the responsible redeployment of U.S. forces.<object.title class="Movie" idsrc="nyt_ttl" value="84897;220890">" Beyond "</object.title>redeployment," no mention is made of whether American troops should be taken out of Iraq.

The Democrats' paper also calls for the United States to achieve "energy independence" by 2020 by increasing production of alternative fuels.

A Party Waiting To Pounce (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

If you're a Democrat, life is good right now. The Republicans are mired in Iraq and domestic political difficulties. The White House is rearranging the deck chairs. For now, Democrats can sit back and watch the GOP self-destruct: "They're on fire," says one party strategist. "Don't say anything. Let them destroy themselves."

The experience of being out of power and being the targets of Karl Rove's relentless attacks has made the Democrats a tougher and more cynical party. They think more about winning than about governing. Some strategists even see a virtue in the party's lack of a clear agenda or leader -- since it denies the Republicans easy targets. This strategy may not serve the country in the long run, but for angry Democrats this year, there is only the short run -- taking back control of Congress in the midterms and the White House in 2008.

Today it's the Bush administration that's struggling with its image and credibility. Yesterday's announcement that OMB Director Josh Bolten will replace Andrew Card as White House chief of staff drew tart comments from Democrats. "They've reached all the way across the driveway for new blood," says John Podesta, who became Bill Clinton's chief of staff in 1998, during a similar period of disarray. "When you're in a deep hole, you have to do more than that."

If the Democrats have a problem, it's what I would call the "Clinton blockage." As of today Sen. Hillary Clinton is the clear front-runner for the 2008 presidential nomination. Clinton "hovers over the presidential field like the Statue of Liberty in New York harbor," writes political analyst Walter Shapiro this week in the online magazine Salon. The problem is that Clinton is casting such a big shadow that it blocks out the sunlight in which other candidates might grow.

DOJ_NMG_0023317

Clinton is building her own version of the Democratic National Committee, outside the control of accident-prone DNC Chairman Howard Dean. She has the best financial machine in American politics, and her fundraisers are signaling some big donors that the Clintons will be unhappy if they give to Hillary's rivals. Meanwhile, former White House aide Harold Ickes is creating a powerful database for grass-roots fundraising though his Data Warehouse project, and Podesta is building a solid policy-planning operation at his Center for American Progress.

Clinton's timetable is also a problem. Running for reelection to the Senate from New York this year, she has a strategy of campaigning as if she cares more about Utica and Schenectady than Washington. That's understandable, but it leaves the Democrats in a pickle. Clinton doesn't want to speak for the party right now, but she doesn't want anyone else to take center stage -- especially not her husband.

That is the most unfortunate blockage caused by Hillary Clinton's presidential ambitions. Her undeclared candidacy denies her party and the country the full benefit of Bill Clinton's leadership. Paradoxically, the Republicans are making better use of the former president than are the Democrats. It's endearing to see him pal around with former president George H.W. Bush and his son, but it blunts Bill Clinton's impact.

Democratic leaders in Congress are gathering the ammunition to win back the House and Senate this year. They have crafted an upbeat, patriotic (and also somewhat vapid) slogan: "America Can Do Better." And they are beginning to roll out the pieces of a low-key 2006 version of Newt Gingrich's "Contract With America," which helped the GOP capture the House in 1994. The first installment, on "Honest Leadership," was presented in January; the second, on "Real Security," is this week. Three more segments are planned, on "Economic and Retirement Security," "Affordable Health Care for All" and "Educational Excellence."

The Democrats think they can turn the tables this year because of GOP mistakes. A top aide to Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid says the party has been studying the formula for victory proposed in 2004 by Bush media adviser Mark McKinnon: "Who do you like? Who do you trust? Who's on your side?" This year, says the aide, that calculus plays for the Democrats. Even on their weak issue of national security, they have closed a 30-point gap in public trust to roughly four or five points, according to some polls. The Democratic message is: "The Republicans have gone too far. They're not on your side. They're not competent to lead."

The 2008 election is still a long way off -- too long, in terms of America's need for the clarity and change a new president could offer the country. Meanwhile, America is struggling with big problems, from Iraq to immigration. Will Democrats help the Bush administration find solutions? In the age of Karl Rove, are you kidding?

Inside Politics (WT)

By Greg Pierce

The Washington Times, March 29, 2006

Change of heart

The Republican senator who upset the White House last year by opposing President Bush's choice for U.N. ambassador now says John R. Bolton is "a changed man" whom he might support should Mr. Bush renew the appointment.

Ohio Sen. George V. Voinovich said yesterday he has been watching Mr. Bolton closely since he became ambassador on Aug. 1. Mr. Bush temporarily installed Mr. Bolton while Congress was in recess after Mr. Voinovich joined most Democrats in blocking a Senate vote on the nomination in May.

At the time, Mr. Voinovich called him a bully who would make critical U.N. reforms harder to achieve.

"John Bolton at this point is a changed man," Mr. Voinovich told reporters. "I want reform of the United Nations, so I've worked with John and stayed on top of John to make sure he takes this wonderful opportunity."

Mr. Bolton's appointment expires in January. If Bush renominates him, Mr. Voinovich said he "might not take the same position as last time."

DOJ_NMG_0023318

Mr. Voinovich said he has been impressed with Mr. Bolton's flair for diplomacy since he got to the United Nations, especially when the United States ran into opposition to some of its proposals for overhauling the international body, the Associated Press reports.

"The old Bolton would have said this is terrible, but instead he said we don't agree, but we're going to stick with it," Mr. Voinovich said. "It's a whole different attitude from the old attitude when John would have given them the back of his hand and walked out."

Pressing their case

A group of pro-life lawmakers and groups today will turn up the heat on their leaders and demand a House vote on a bill that would ban from the U.S. market the drug some refer to as the abortion pill, RU-486, or mifepristone.

Republican Reps. Mike Pence of Indiana, Christopher H. Smith of New Jersey, Joe Pitts of Pennsylvania and other lawmakers, will join Concerned Women for America, National Right to Life Committee, the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops and other pro-life groups today in demanding House action.

This coalition is particularly upset because the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) a few weeks ago learned that two women died after taking mifepristone. The news came after a warning by the FDA about the dangers of RU-486. And they point out that the government is still looking into the role of the drug in the death of four California women.

The bill that pro-lifers are demanding would withdraw FDA approval of RU-486 and subject it to a thorough review.

"In the meantime, this drug that endangers women's lives ... remains available despite ongoing investigations and continued warnings that have made it clear that the drug is not safe and should not remain available," read a release that Mr. Pence's office circulated.

The measure -- called Holly's law -- is named after 18-year-old Holly Patterson who died after taking the drug.

In denial

"The New York Times [yesterday] joined the debate about Iraqi documents with a front-page news article and an op-ed by Peter Bergen," Stephen Hayes writes at www.weeklystandard.com.

"It's been nearly two weeks since the first documents were released, but a belated acknowledgement of the news is better than nothing. One might have expected such a longtime champion of open government as the Times to have aggressively led the effort to have these once-secret documents released. Not this time," Mr. Hayes said.

"The front-page story seeks to dismiss the importance of the documents while the op-ed by Bergen seems to find them only significant enough to warrant an attempted deconstruction. Both of these efforts fail badly. Reading the two pieces together, one gets the unmistakable impression that the Times doesn't want to know more about the documents, their contents and what they tell us about prewar Iraq. The Times, it seems, has chosen ignorance.

"The news piece deserves little in the way of a response. Reporter Scott Shane casts the story as a battle between diehard supporters of the Bush administration and the truth, noting most helpfully that in other Internet projects 'volunteers have tested software, scanned chemical compounds for useful drugs and even searched radiotelescope data for signals from extraterrestrial life.'"

Reed's response

Ralph Reed, a Republican candidate for lieutenant governor of Georgia, has responded to a state senator who accused him of "stunning hypocrisy" on the property rights issue.

State Sen. Chip Pearson sent a letter to Mr. Reed, accusing him of mounting a false and unfair attack on Republican rival state Sen. Casey Cagle, "a proven defender of property rights."

Mr. Pearson also charged that, in an e-mail, Mr. Reed attacked his rival for accepting contributions from "those of us in the real estate industry."

Mr. Reed, in a "Dear Chip" letter, replied: "You do not address the question that Casey has declined to answer: Why did he leave the floor of the state Senate and miss the most important vote on private property rights in the 2005 legislative session? He voted seven times before and 14 times after the vote on S.B. 86. But when the time came to stand for private property rights, he left the floor, and he has yet to explain to the voters why he did so."

DOJ_NMG_0023319

Mr. Reed flatly denied that he had criticized Mr. Cagle for taking contributions from those in real estate or any other line of work.

DeLay's request

Rep. Tom DeLay, Texas Republican, wants his right to carry a firearm restored after the state of Texas revoked his permit following his indictment last year.

The former House majority leader's license to carry a concealed handgun was taken away after he was indicted on campaign-finance charges, but he has appealed the revocation, DeLay spokeswoman Shannon Flaherty said yesterday.

She would not say whether Mr. DeLay, a gun rights advocate who spoke last year at the National Rifle Association annual convention in Houston, carries a gun.

"That's the point of having a [concealed handgun license] in Texas -- potential criminals should assume everyone is [carrying]," the spokeswoman said.

Texas Department of Public Safety spokeswoman Tela Mange said she could not disclose how long Mr. DeLay has had the gun permit, but that state law dictates it be revoked upon indictment on felony charges.

Master of ceremonies

The Lynde and Harry Bradley Foundation announced that Pulitzer Prize-winning columnist George F. Will will serve as master of ceremonies for the 2006 Bradley Prizes.

The third annual awards ceremony will be held at the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts on May 25. Up to four persons will be honored, each receiving a stipend of $250,000.

Established in 2003, the Bradley Prizes honor outstanding individuals who have distinguished themselves in promoting democratic capitalism, freedom and the defense of American institutions. Mr. Will was named a Bradley Prize recipient last year.

Internet Firms Want FCC To Enforce Net Neutrality (WP)

By Arshad Mohammed

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

Internet companies yesterday criticized legislation that would give the Federal Communications Commission only limited ability to stop phone and cable companies from blocking access to Web sites, saying the proposal would endanger the open nature of the Web.

The bill, championed by House Commerce Committee Chairman Joe Barton (R-Tex.), would allow the FCC to decide disputes about Web access only case by case and would bar the agency from writing detailed rules on the subject. Open-Internet advocates said the bill would make the FCC toothless in the area of net neutrality, which is the concept that companies controlling Internet access should not use that power to block or slow particular Web services.

"We are extremely concerned that legislation before your committee would fail to protect the Internet from discrimination and would deny consumers unfettered access," six companies wrote in a letter to Barton and Rep. Fred Upton (R-Mich.), who is chairman of the panel's subcommittee on telecommunications and the Internet.

"We have urged Congress to adopt network neutrality requirements that are meaningful and enforceable. The provisions in the committee bill achieve neither goal," the letter said on behalf of Amazon.com Inc., eBay Inc., Google Inc., IAC/InterActiveCorp, Microsoft Corp. and Yahoo Inc.

As the major phone companies roll out high-speed data and video lines, some of them argue they should be able to charge such companies more to use their expensive networks.

The net-neutrality provisions are embedded in a broader bill whose main aim is to make it easier for phone companies to offer television service on new networks by freeing them from having to get video franchises from thousands of localities around the country.

The bill was released after months of negotiations failed to achieve a compromise between committee Republicans and senior Democrats John D. Dingell of Michigan and Edward J. Markey of Massachusetts.

Only one Democrat, Rep. Bobby L. Rush of Illinois, endorsed the bill when it was made public Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0023320

Independent analysts said it would be difficult to enact legislation on the issue this year, citing partisan differences, the absence of a consensus bill in the Senate and the short election-year congressional calendar.

Dingell raised questions about the legislation but kept his options open while Markey was openly critical.

"The 'network neutrality' section of the bill represents a body blow to the Internet community," Markey said. "It removes FCC authority to establish any future rules needed to ensure that consumers and competitors can avail themselves of the Internet experience they enjoy today."

A committee spokesman said the bill gave the FCC ample enforcement authority, including fines.

"The bill has more teeth than a pit bull, starting with full Title V enforcement authority for the FCC to investigate cases and slap violators with fines up to $25,000 a day," said Larry Neal, the committee's deputy staff director for communications.

"What it doesn't have is a blank check for bureaucrats to write so many regulations that they'll choke off brand-new services even before consumers try them out."

OPM Director Asks Congress For Help In Pruning Back Retirement Paperwork (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

The president's chief civil service adviser appeared before a House subcommittee yesterday with a file cabinet drawer. It was stuffed with paperwork -- a symbol of the rising number of retirement requests from federal employees.

In 2003, the Office of Personnel Management received 90,000 retirement claims to process, and in 2004 and 2005, about 100,000 each year. The claims are filed on behalf of employees from all three branches of government.

OPM projects modest increases in retirement claims in coming years but says the government could face a surge in 2008-2010 as more baby boomers hit retirement age.

Each retirement claim requires a tedious, and sometimes lengthy, search for personnel folders and other paperwork -- "a shameful way" of doing business, Linda M. Springer , director of OPM, told the House federal workforce subcommittee.

She urged the subcommittee, chaired by Rep. Jon Porter (R-Nev.), to support a fiscal 2007 budget proposal that would provide $26.7 million for OPM to undertake a "retirement systems modernization project."

Upgraded computer systems will make it easier for OPM to speed up pension payments and to reduce the time that a retiree remains on interim retirement pay while a final annuity is being calculated.

OPM cannot begin processing retirement claims until it receives data on the departing employees from their agencies, which can take more than 30 days. For February, Springer noted yesterday, OPM had about 12,000 retirement cases on hold, pending the receipt of employment and work history information.

Once the data arrives, OPM employees pull the rest of an employee's work history from records stored in a Pennsylvania mine. The personnel files fill 144,000 drawers in 28,000 file cabinets, Springer said.

The retirement program is a significant part of OPM's entitlement spending. The agency pays more than $52 billion per year in benefits to about 2.4 million retirees and their survivors.

Porter said he was pleased that the president's budget is seeking funds to create a more efficient system for processing retirement claims. But he expressed concern that OPM also will be absorbing $13.7 million in separate program reductions under the budget.

Springer said OPM would reduce staffing by 26 positions through attrition, delay some technology improvements and cut back on contractors as it tightened its budget.

Porter called the hearing to discuss OPM's new five-year strategic plan, and most subcommittee members praised Springer's approach to reaching goals through the use of deadlines that can be monitored by Congress.

Subcommittee Democrats, including Reps. Danny K. Davis (Ill.) and Elijah E. Cummings (Md.) and Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D.C.), told Springer they had concerns about some of the budget recommendations, including the president's pay proposal and plans to overhaul the civil service system.

DOJ_NMG_0023321

Davis said the president's proposed 2.2 percent pay raise in 2007 "is markedly lower" than raises provided in past years. He warned that the budget's plan to use part of the raise to finance higher salaries in hard-to-fill jobs would reduce the amount of money available for the rest of the workforce.

Norton counseled Springer to move cautiously on a proposal to overhaul the civil service system, noting that "a very big experiment" has begun at the Homeland Security and Defense departments to install a performance-based pay system and make other changes.

Pointing to federal court decisions that have upheld union complaints, Norton suggested that the administration has reached too far in allowing the departments to void collective-bargaining agreements and reduce employee protections in disciplinary actions.

OTHER NEWS:

Fed Raises Rate, Hints It's Not Done (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — Federal Reserve policymakers increased interest rates Tuesday for the 15th-consecutive meeting to the highest level in five years and suggested a 16th rise may be in the cards.

In his first meeting as Fed chairman, Ben Bernanke and his colleagues unanimously voted to raise their target for short-term interest rates a quarter percentage point to 4.75% in their bid to thwart inflation. That's the highest since March 2001 but still far below the recent peak of 6.5% seen in mid-2000.

In their post-meeting statement, Fed policymakers said the economy "rebounded strongly" after a slowdown at the end of last year, which they attributed to "temporary or special factors."

The Fed officials said economic growth would likely "moderate" to a healthy pace.

They said elevated energy prices, combined with a tight job market and a high usage of available resources, "have the potential" to stoke inflation. Therefore, the Fed officials repeated that "some further policy firming may be needed," a phrase they used at their last meeting in January. That suggested the Fed will raise rates again when they next meet May 10, says Richard Yamarone, director of economic research at Argus Research.

"Another rate hike is all but a done deal," Yamarone says. He expects Fed policymakers will raise rates to 5.5%.

Investors had been eagerly awaiting the statement for signs of when the Fed may end its rate-raising campaign that began in June 2004. Interest was high as Fed watchers attempt to glean how, if at all, the Fed may change under the leadership of Bernanke, who became chairman after Alan Greenspan retired two months ago.

But "I don't think there is really anything new in here," John Hancock economist Oscar Gonzalez says.

He expects the Fed will raise rates in May and then stop for the year. Investors in a market that bet on future Fed moves also expect the Fed has one more rate increase in this cycle, according to Moody's Economy.com.

Banks responded to the Fed move by raising the prime rate, to which most consumer lending is tied, to 7.75%.

Consumer loan rates have been climbing. Last week, the average rate on a 30-year mortgage was 6.32%, up from 6.01% a year ago, according to Freddie Mac. Other rates, such as those on variable-rate credit cards and home equity lines of credit, likely will continue to rise.

Savers, meanwhile, are benefiting. The average yield on a six-month CD rose to 5.02% this month, the first time it was above 5% since February 2001, according to the Fed.

Fed Lifts Rates A Further Quarter Point To 4.75% (FT)

By Andrew Balls And Ralph Atkins

Financial Times, March 29, 2006

The Federal Reserve raised interest rates by another quarter point at its first policymaking meeting chaired by Ben Bernanke, indicating that while it may have to have to raise rates further that it was close to the end of its tightening campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0023322

In its statement, the Federal Open Market Committee said that growth had rebounded in the first quarter after a weak end to 2005 but said it "appears likely to moderate to a more sustainable pace".

Sounding a slightly more confident note on the inflation outlook, the committee said that "as yet, the run-up in the prices of energy and other commodities appears to have had only a modest effect on core inflation". The statement added that continuing productivity gains had helped to keep a lid on unit labour costs and that inflation remain contained.

Retaining the focus on inflation risks, the committee repeated the warning that "increases in resource utilization" and high energy prices could feed into increased inflation pressures.

Using the same forward-looking language on the policy outlook as in January, it said "some further policy firming may be needed to keep the risks to the attainment of both sustainable economic growth and price stability roughly in balance".

Tuesday's announcement continued the campaign of quarter-point rate increases that started in January 2004 under Alan Greenspan, with the 15th consecutive increase bringing the federal funds rate to 4.75 per cent, and signalled a bias to raise rates further.

But it also gave an indication on the direction Mr Bernanke wishes to take the US central bank in terms of clearer communication, with a fuller assessment of the economic situation, and modest detail on the forecast.

"They changed not a hair of the forward looking guidance and obviously are leaning towards another 25 basis points in May," said Peter Hooper, chief US economist at Deutsche Bank. "At the same time there was a noticeable step forward in the clarity on the current economic juncture."

Bond prices dipped after the Fed's announcement and following earlier strong readings on US consumer confidence and European business confidence. The yield on the 10 year Treasury note rose eight basis points to 4.78 per cent and the dollar strengthened.

US consumer confidence reached its highest level last month in four years, according to an update from the Conference Board, the business information group. The assessment of current conditions was the strongest since 2001. Consumers also upgraded their assessment of the outlook, but the survey continued to reflect expectations that growth will slow.

In the latest indication of a strengthening global economic backdrop to the Fed's deliberations, German business confidence has reached a 15-year high, according to the leading European business climate index. The Munich-based Ifo institute's business climate index increased unexpectedly, marking its fourth consecutive monthly increase. A separate survey reported that Italian business confidene had risen to a five year high.

Fed Boosts Key Rate To 5-Year High (LAT)

By Joel Havemann

The Los Angeles Times, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — The chairman was new, but the result was the same: The Federal Reserve nudged its benchmark short-term interest rate up a quarter of a percentage point today and suggested that at least one more rate hike is coming.

It was the central bank's 15th consecutive rate hike since June 2004. The so-called federal funds rate — the interest that banks charge each other for overnight loans — now stands at 4.75%, up from a historic low of 1% two years ago.

And in its statement accompanying the announcement, the Fed, now chaired not by Alan Greenspan but by Ben S. Bernanke, repeated language from its last meeting Jan. 31 that "some further policy firming may be needed." That is Fed-speak for more rate increases in order to fend off inflation.

In a departure from its January statement, the Fed's policy-making committee said "economic growth has rebounded strongly" from the slowdown at the end of 2005.

"Inflation expectations remain contained," the committee said. "Still, possible increases in resource utilization, in combination with the elevated prices of energy and other commodities, have the potential to add to inflation pressures."

The suggestion of further rate hikes disappointed stock and bond market investors who had hoped for some signal that the rate hikes might be ending. Major stock market indexes fell immediately after the Fed's statement, while bond yields rose.

The increase in the federal funds rate, the only interest rate controlled by the Fed, has not translated into comparable increases in longer-term interest rates.

DOJ_NMG_0023323

Unlike ordinary circumstances, the interest rate on 10-year Treasury notes is now lower than the rate on three-month Treasury bills. Ordinarily, rates are higher on longer-term borrowings because investors demand a hedge against the possibility that rising inflation will eat some of their profits.

Bernanke has vowed to continue the policies of the popular Greenspan, who presided for 18 years until his retirement after the Jan. 31 Fed meeting. Economists had widely expected him to engineer another quarter-point rate increase at his first meeting.

"It's as close to a sure thing as you can get," Bernard Baumohl, executive director of the Economic Outlook Group, said before the Fed announcement.

From here on out, the decisions will get progressively trickier. Bernanke does not want to trigger a recession at the beginning of his term by raising rates so high that they choke off economic activity, nor does he want to be remembered as letting inflation rise out of control because rates were too low.

"With the benchmark rate at 4.75%, the easy work for the Fed is done," Baumohl said. "From this point on, monetary policy becomes increasingly treacherous."

So does predicting what the Fed will do. A Bloomberg survey on March 8 found a plurality who saw the Fed pushing rates up one more time to 5% and then stopping. Of the 74 forecasters polled by Bloomberg, 31 held this view.

Another 21 analysts forecast that the Fed would stop at 4.75%, and 21 predicted increases beyond 5%. (The 74th analyst had the Fed holding the line today at 4.5%.)

Nariman Behravesh, chief economist for the consulting firm Global Insight, supported the most common view. He pointed out that Bernanke, in a speech in New York on March 20, said he saw no signs of an economic slowdown — a statement that Behravesh interpreted as suggesting at least one more interest rate hike after today's. "Beyond that, however, I suspect no one — not even Bernanke — really knows," Behravesh said.

Lehman Brothers, at the hawkish end of the spectrum, forecasts that the Fed will not stop at 5%, but rather keep going to 5.5%. The main reason, said economist John Shin, is "the exceptional strength in growth. With lower unemployment, stronger growth and less excess productive capacity, the labor market should tighten up," Shin said, "pushing up wages and adding to inflationary pressures."

Inflationary pressures are already spouting in prices. Core consumer prices — excluding the volatile energy and food sectors — are rising slightly faster than 2% a year, which is the upper bound of Bernanke's inflation "comfort zone."

From Fed, More Of The Same (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

Alan Greenspan is gone, but Federal Reserve officials kept going yesterday, raising their benchmark short-term interest rate again and hinting they may lift it higher in coming months to keep the lid on inflation.

"Economic growth has rebounded strongly" this year from its temporary weakness in late 2005, the Fed's top policymakers said in a statement after their first meeting led by new Chairman Ben S. Bernanke, who succeeded Greenspan last month.

A former White House adviser and economics professor, Bernanke has repeatedly pledged "continuity" with Greenspan's interest rate policies and delivered yesterday in action and style.

The Fed's policymaking body, the Federal Open Market Committee, unanimously agreed to raise its benchmark interest rate to 4.75 percent from 4.5 percent, marking the 15th consecutive increase since June 2004.

And with unemployment low and energy prices high, "further policy firming may be needed" to keep inflation in check, the FOMC statement said, signaling that at least one more rate increase might be in store.

Bernanke's first FOMC statement adhered closely to the language of the last statement issued under Greenspan in January, providing a slightly more expansive assessment of the economy while avoiding any big surprise that might roil financial markets. And in one small sign of greater openness, the new chairman allowed photographs of the session to be publicly released -- as his predecessor did at his last meeting in January.

DOJ_NMG_0023324

But stock prices tumbled because the statement was so similar to the previous one, disappointing many investors who had hoped the Fed would signal it was nearly done raising interest rates. The Dow Jones industrial average fell 95.57, or 0.85 percent, to close at 11,154.54. The Fed's language strengthened analysts' expectations that the FOMC will nudge the rate to 5 percent in May and perhaps higher after that.

The statement indicated that the FOMC "felt itself no closer to the end of its sequence of tightening moves than it did in January," wrote Peter E. Kretzmer, a senior economist with Bank of America Corp.

The Bernanke Fed "continues with [the] Greenspan legacy of gradual, measured rate increases," wrote Brian Bethune, a U.S. economist at Global Insight Inc., which predicts another increase in May.

Low interest rates encourage consumers and businesses to borrow and spend, boosting economic growth, which can fan inflationary pressures. High interest rates do the opposite.

The Fed's benchmark federal funds rate, the rate on overnight loans between banks, influences many other borrowing costs in the economy. The rate is now at the highest level in five years. Major banks followed the Fed's action yesterday by raising the prime rate on business loans to 7.75 percent from 7.5 percent. Many consumer rates linked to the prime, such as on credit cards and home equity loans, are likely to rise as well. Banks and other institutions also may increase the rates they pay on money market funds and certificates of deposit.

However, long-term rates, such as those on mortgages and corporate debt, are determined by global financial markets and remain historically low. For example, the average rate on a 30-year mortgage was 6.32 percent last week, according to Freddie Mac. That's only slightly higher than its 6.29 percent level in June 2004 before the Fed started raising the federal funds rate.

U.S. economic growth slowed sharply in the last three months of 2005 to a 1.1 percent annual rate, but Fed officials did not read that as a sign of underlying weakness. Rather, they attributed the slump to temporary factors such as the effects of hurricanes Katrina and Rita, which devastated parts of the Gulf Coast, disrupting commerce through the region and causing energy prices to spike nationally. Auto sales also plunged in the fourth quarter after booming during the summer because of dealers' incentives.

The economy is likely to expand at about a 5 percent annual rate in the first quarter of this year, spurred in part by an unusually warm winter and reconstruction work in the Gulf states, according to many estimates. That's a robust pace, well above the roughly 3.25 percent annual rate that Fed officials think can be sustained over time with both low unemployment and low inflation.

Fed policymakers want and expect the economy to slow down in coming months because of higher interest rates and a cooling housing market. The FOMC has projected the economy will grow 3.5 percent this year, the same as last year.

But they do not yet know how high they will have to raise the rate to achieve that happy ending. If they raise it too little, inflation could take off; if they move it too high, they might trigger a slump.

For now, Fed policymakers are more worried about the possibility of higher inflation, the FOMC statement showed. The unemployment rate is at a low 4.8 percent, and businesses are using a higher-than-average share of their productive capacity. Oil was trading above $65 dollars a barrel yesterday, and gasoline prices have rebounded in the past month. Metals prices have climbed recently, as well.

So far, these developments have had "only a modest effect" on core consumer inflation, which excludes food and energy prices, the FOMC said. But, it added, if labor markets keep tightening and businesses ramp up production further, that could "add to inflation pressures."

Fed Raises Rates By ¼ Point, Hints More May Come (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

At his first policy meeting as Federal Reserve chairman, Ben Bernanke picked up where predecessor Alan Greenspan left off: with another quarter-point boost in interest rates, and a hint of more to come.

But Mr. Bernanke put a modest stamp of his own on the Fed's closely watched postmeeting statement, by including a more explicit view of where the nation's economy is headed. The statement's forecast that economic growth appears likely "to moderate to a more sustainable pace" may be an early, though small, sign of his efforts to make the central bank's thinking more transparent. (The Fed's statement1)

DOJ_NMG_0023325

The Fed raised its target for the federal-funds rate, charged on overnight loans between banks, to 4.75% from 4.5%. In its statement released after the two-day meeting, the Fed said "some further policy firming may be needed to keep" the risks to growth and of inflation "roughly in balance." The language was identical to that used in the statement released after Mr. Greenspan's last meeting, on Jan. 31. (Related story2)

Fed officials have indicated that saying policy firming "may be needed" simply keeps their options open on whether to raise rates again, and implies no commitment to do so. Nonetheless, financial markets, which had already thought it highly likely that the Fed would raise rates to 5% at its May 10 meeting, became even more convinced it would do so after reading the statement.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average, which had been up about 19 points before the Fed's afternoon announcement, finished the day down 95.57, or 0.9%, at 11154.54. The yield on the 10-year Treasury bond rose to 4.78% from 4.71% Monday.

Yesterday's move was the Fed's 15th consecutive quarter-point rate increase since June 2004, when it began to raise rates from a 46-year low. The increase reflects a continuing view at the Fed that robust growth abroad and an economy near full capacity at home create a risk that inflation, though tame, could rise.

The Fed said that while energy prices could boost underlying inflation, so far they have not, in part because of brisk productivity growth. "Still, possible increases in resource utilization, in combination with the elevated prices of energy and other commodities, have the potential to add to inflation pressures," it said, in words similar to its Jan. 31 statement.

The similarity of the policy-setting Federal Open Market Committee's words and actions to those of Mr. Greenspan's on Jan. 31 may have reflected Mr. Bernanke's stated desire to maintain "continuity."

But in one respect, the statement did break some new ground. It said the slowing growth of the nation's gross domestic product in the fourth quarter was due to "temporary or special factors. Economic growth has rebounded strongly in the current quarter but appears likely to moderate to a more sustainable pace."

The inclusion of an explicit forecast differed from previous statements, which generally stuck to a snapshot of current economic conditions. Its reference to "real GDP growth in the fourth quarter" was also far more specific than previous statements, which seldom specified what data they were referring to.

Mr. Bernanke has suggested that more discussion of the forecast would help markets more accurately predict the central bank's actions.

"What does it mean when the Fed is data-dependent?" Mr. Bernanke said after a speech in New York last week. It means, he said, that with each new economic report, the Fed reconsiders "where the economy is going to be a year down the road. The key statistic is the forecast." Changes in the forecast, he said, drive rate decisions.

In his earlier career as an academic, Mr. Bernanke worked extensively on economic modeling, which is used to make forecasts. And as a Fed governor from 2002 to 2005, he often met with Fed staff to discuss their forecast, dubbed the "green book." While Mr. Greenspan also considered forecasts important, he generally was reluctant to issue one, and often disagreed with the green book.

Mr. Bernanke has argued for more transparency at the Fed and suggested the FOMC should release forecasts more often than twice a year, the current practice. The modest change in yesterday's statement suggests Mr. Bernanke may pursue his transparency initiatives in small, incremental steps.

Other changes in the FOMC's communications and deliberations processes may have been considered at the meeting. Minutes of the discussion will be released April 18.

Laurence Meyer, a former Fed governor who now analyzes the Fed for Macroeconomic Advisers, a St. Louis forecasting firm, said the statement reflected "continuity in policy and innovation in communication." While the forecast of moderating growth wasn't news, its inclusion in the statement served to temper potential market overreaction to the Fed's upbeat assessment of current conditions, he said.

Fed officials have said their actions increasingly are driven by new economic data, which means they probably will soon stop giving hints about their next action on interest rates. David Greenlaw, an economist at Morgan Stanley, said more information on the Fed's forecast could help make up for such a loss of guidance on interest rates as markets try to figure out what the Fed will do next.

DOJ_NMG_0023326

The decision by the FOMC's 11 voting members was unanimous. Departing Federal Reserve Board Vice Chairman Roger Ferguson didn't attend. It is customary for departing FOMC members to skip their last meeting.

Eleven of the Fed's 12 regional reserve banks asked for the accompanying increase in the little-used discount rate, charged on short-term Fed loans to commercial banks, to 5.75% from 5.5%. The exception was the Kansas City Fed. Many commercial banks yesterday raised their prime rate -- a benchmark for many consumer and business loans -- to 7.75% from 7.5%.

Economists generally said that how much higher rates go depends mostly on whether the risk of inflation becomes reality. Ethan Harris, chief U.S. economist at Lehman Brothers, said, "I think you're going to see both...tightening capacity and some kind of pickup in inflation." He predicted the Fed will eventually lift its key rate to 5.5%.

Larry Kantor, co-head of research at Barclays Capital, said, "The financial environment is still stimulative: high stock prices, relatively low bond yields." He predicted that even if the Fed paused soon it would have to resume raising rates shortly afterward.

But Maury Harris, chief U.S. economist at UBS, said the Fed should stop raising rates now, arguing that the economy is already slowing. He noted that new-home sales and capital-goods orders, excluding aircraft and defense, dropped in February. Mr. Harris predicted growth will slow to an annual rate of 2.5% by the second half of the year from the current rate of about 4%.

If the Fed raises rates further, it risks overshooting and making the slowdown worse, he said. However, he added that inflation is low enough that it is unlikely any such overshooting would trigger a recession.

Fed Panel Raises Rate To 4.75% (NYT)

By Eduardo Porter

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 28 — At Ben S. Bernanke's first meeting as head of the Federal Reserve's policy-making committee, the watchword was no surprises.

As expected, the Federal Open Market Committee raised the benchmark federal funds rate on Tuesday by a quarter of a percentage point, to 4.75 percent, and suggested that at least one more increase was in the cards. It was the 15th such increase in consecutive meetings of the committee.

In its statement describing the decision, the central bank veered little from the Fed's prior assessments of the economy and the expected path of monetary policy, underscoring Mr. Bernanke's stated intention to maintain the course set by his predecessor as Fed chairman, Alan Greenspan.

Despite its predictability, the Fed's statement still modestly unsettled financial markets, bolstering the dollar in foreign exchange markets and sending the prices of stocks and government bonds lower. The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 0.64 percent, to 1,293.23. [Page C9.]

Though virtually all investors expected the rate increase, a substantial minority of operators on Wall Street had held hopes that the Fed would indicate that it would be the last one in the cycle that began in June 2004, when the benchmark rate stood at 1 percent. They were disappointed by the clear suggestion that the Fed still saw the need for further tightening.

"He was paving the way for another rate hike," said Mickey D. Levy, chief economist at Bank of America. "He knew full well that with this type of language the market would price in a hike to a 5 percent funds rate."

The Fed's statement relied on words nearly identical to those used after the committee's previous meeting in January, Mr. Greenspan's last after 18 years as head of the central bank. It said that "some further policy firming may be needed" to keep inflation under wraps.

It pointed out that the economy was growing robustly after a slowdown in the fourth quarter of last year. It noted that core inflation, beyond food and energy, had ticked up only modestly, but it warned that the rising prices of energy and other commodities could add to inflation pressures in the future.

Though the committee's statement was pored over by financial analysts for any hint of the new chairman's intentions, the market tremors appeared to have little to do with the new management at the Fed.

DOJ_NMG_0023327

Mr. Bernanke is expected to put his own stamp on the central bank eventually. He has long said that he supports more transparency, letting the markets know more clearly how the Fed reaches its decisions and what is the expected path of policy. He has argued in favor of setting a specific inflation target — within a range — to make explicit the Fed's goals.

He apparently judged Tuesday not to be the day for bold moves, however. Untested as Fed chairman, Mr. Bernanke had a clear interest in projecting continuity with the Greenspan Fed.

At most, the new statement provided a mere hint of Mr. Bernanke's desired transparency. "It was the same policy message but with a little innovation in communication," said Laurence H. Meyer, a former Fed governor who is now an economic forecaster at Macroeconomic Advisers in Washington.

The whiff of change came in the second paragraph of the Fed's five-paragraph statement, the passage often referred to as the "snapshot paragraph," in which the committee assesses current economic conditions. It offered a somewhat more detailed analysis of current conditions than the one issued in January.

Significantly, it calmed fears that wage increases might spur inflation by pointing out that productivity gains were holding down the growth in labor costs.

At the same time, the Fed went beyond the expected description of the economy's current status to elucidate what it saw as its likely future path. "Economic growth has rebounded strongly in the current quarter," it said, adding that growth appeared "likely to moderate to a more sustainable pace."

Mr. Bernanke comes to the helm of the nation's central bank at a delicate moment for monetary policy. Since the Fed started increasing interest rates, financial markets have come to expect a quarter-point rise in interest rates at pretty much every committee meeting.

But after 15 consecutive rate increases, the cycle of monetary tightening is reaching its peak as interest rates approach what is seen as a "neutral" rate that is not so high that it slows economic growth but not so low that it allows inflationary fears to come back to life.

With underlying inflation at 1.8 percent, excluding food and energy, the Fed's preferred measure is still within the range of 1 percent to 2 percent considered comfortable by most officials. That leaves the Fed debating how far to raise rates merely to counter the risk of higher inflation as opposed to the reality of prices rising too fast.

In a note to investors, a Goldman Sachs economist, Andrew Tilton, said that "the potential for disagreement on policy decisions increases now that the Fed is roughly at 'neutral' and the data become more important."

With the economy growing at a healthy clip but facing the potential headwind of a weakening housing market, the decision on when to end the cycle of rising interest rates will not be trivial.

The outlook for inflation is slightly worse than in January, with increases in producer prices and consumer price inflation. Payrolls have expanded by some 200,000 a month and retail sales have grown sharply.

Fed economists have argued that a slowing housing market is likely to dampen overall economic growth. Housing, however, is not sinking yet. Sales of existing homes rose in February, housing starts remain strong and by some measures home prices are still rising.

In testimony to Congress last month, Mr. Bernanke argued that in coming quarters the Fed's policy-setting committee "will have to make ongoing, provisional judgments about the risks to both inflation and growth, and monetary policy action will be increasingly dependent on incoming data."

Given such uncertainties, mused Ethan S. Harris, chief economist of Lehman Brothers, "Bernanke moved into the job right at the time it got interesting."

Fed Raises Interest Rates Again (WT)

By Patrice Hill

The Washington Times, March 29, 2006

The Federal Reserve yesterday raised short-term interest rates to the highest level in five years, giving no hint that it is nearing an end to its nearly two-year-long campaign to head off inflation.

DOJ_NMG_0023328

In the first meeting of its rate-setting committee led by new Chairman Ben S. Bernanke, the Fed by unanimous vote dismissed the sharp slowdown in the economy in the fall as "temporary" and cited high energy and commodity prices, as well as constraints on the labor force that limit the economy's ability to grow, as reasons for continued vigilance.

The Fed has raised rates by nearly four percentage points in 15 actions since June 2004, leaving the rates on credit cards, home equity loans and adjustable-rate mortgages in most cases equal to or higher than the rates on long-term loans such as 30-year mortgages, which last week averaged 6.3 percent. The prime lending rate, after yesterday's latest quarter-point increase, rose to 7.75 percent.

Although Fed watchers cheered the central bank's determination not to give ground to inflation, Wall Street and Main Street analysts increasingly fear the central bank is in danger of overdoing it and pushing the economy into a slump.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average fell 96 points after the Fed's announcement, while rates on Treasuries and other bonds shot up on signs of further rate increases ahead.

"The Fed is in danger of overshooting" because it "is more worried about inflation than economic growth," said economist Roger Kubarych of HVB Group. With core inflation -- excluding food and energy -- running about 2 percent, the inflation-adjusted level of interest rates is at levels that brought on recessions in the past, he said.

"Interest-rate-sensitive sectors, notably autos and housing, are already showing strains," he said, noting that both General Motors Corp. and Ford Motor Co. are in financial straits with sinking credit ratings and declining sales that many analysts fear will force the automakers into bankruptcy.

Although manufacturers are struggling, consumer confidence and spending have rebounded this year after hitting a 12-year low in the fall, buoyed by improving job prospects. The Conference Board reported yesterday that its measure of consumer confidence hit a four-year high this month.

"A miscalculation in interest rate policy could damage the economy and force the Fed to reverse course later in the year by giving back one or two rate hikes," said Bernard Baumohl, executive director of the Economic Outlook Group.

This is most likely to happen if Mr. Bernanke, a specialist on monetary policy whose background is primarily academic, is not as attuned as his predecessor Alan Greenspan was to subtle signs that the economy is moving toward a substantial slowdown later this year, he said.

One such sign is the steep decline in the housing market since the fall. The housing boom had been a major driver of economic growth in recent years, with fast-appreciating house prices providing an important source of strength to consumers, who have cashed out at least $750 billion from their home equity to spend on other things since 2001, he said. Consumer spending generates about 70 percent of economic activity.

Other signs that growth is sure to wane are consumers' high debt burdens and growing delinquencies among the many borrowers who took out adjustable-rate mortgages in recent years and are now facing sharply higher mortgage payments as a result of the Fed's actions, he said.

"Servicing all that debt was manageable when interest rates were low," Mr. Baumohl said. "But the Fed has been jacking up rates nonstop for 21 months, and the debt-service burden is starting to pinch."

Mr. Baumohl said the Fed would be overdoing it if it goes beyond raising the federal funds rate, its principal tool for influencing short-term rates, another quarter-point to 5 percent at the next meeting of its rate-setting committee in May. But he thinks it is more likely that the Fed will be convinced by then that the economy is slowing enough that further rate increases are not warranted.

Mark Vitner, senior economist at Wachovia Securities, agreed that the Fed is likely to pause after raising rates one more time in May, despite the likelihood that economic reports before then will show the economy rebounded to a robust rate of growth in excess of 5 percent during the first quarter from 1.6 percent at the end of last year.

"The Fed will not be unnerved by swings in the quarterly [growth] figures," Mr. Vitner said, though its goal is to cool growth to a little less than 3 percent.

Richard Yamarone, economist with Argus Research Corp., said he expects the Fed to raise rates three or more times.

DOJ_NMG_0023329

"History tells us that the Fed has always overshot its tightening goal," he said. "Central bankers like to know the cork is firmly implanted in the bottle so that the inflation genie doesn't sneak out. The worst thing a central bank can do when fighting inflation is fall behind the curve."

Bernanke Steps To The Plate (WSJ)

By Scott Patterson

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke made his presence felt on Wall Street Tuesday by stepping squarely into the shoes of his predecessor, Alan Greenspan.

Mr. Bernanke boosted the target for the federal-funds rate by a quarter-percentage point to 4.75%, the highest level since April 2001, and signaled more rate increases could be on the way at the Fed's next meeting on May 10.

Stocks reacted in much the same way they did to similar moves by Mr. Greenspan: They tumbled.

The Dow industrials, up 20 points before the decision, fell 95.57 points to 11154.54. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slid 8.38 to 1293.23 and the Nasdaq Composite Index declined 11.12 to 2304.46.

Treasury bonds, down before the statement was released at 2:15 p.m. EST, fell further. The 10-year Treasury note fell 20/32 point, or $6.25 per $1,000 invested, to yield 4.788%.

Language in the Fed's policy statement indicated continuing concerns about inflation amid a tightening labor market and high energy prices. "Economic growth has rebounded strongly in the current quarter but appears likely to moderate to a more sustainable pace," the rate-setting committee said. But increases in resource utilization and higher energy prices "have the potential to add to inflation pressures."

The upshot: Expect a 16th rate increase to 5% in May.

Analysts and economists saw little new or unexpected in the statement. "No surprise whatsoever," said David Wyss, chief economist at Standard & Poor's. Mr. Wyss expects the Fed to boost rates again in May and then stop.

"Looked like the old Fed to me," said Paul Kasriel, chief economist at Northern Trust, who said that unless employment data weakens by the May meeting, the Fed will raise rates again. "They said exactly the same thing they said last time," said Jeffrey Kleintop, chief investment strategist at PNC Advisors.

One source of investor dismay was the absence of any language in the statement regarding the housing market. Recent housing data, including a 10.5% decline in new-home sales in February, have raised concerns that the housing boom that helped drive economic growth is rapidly withering. Higher interest rates, which boost mortgage-lending rates, could accelerate the slump and potentially lead to a so-called hard landing in which home prices drop dramatically.

Prior to Tuesday's move, the Fed has lifted rates 14 times since June 2004 by quarter-point increment -- all under the stewardship of Mr. Greenspan, chairman of the central bank since 1987.

While Fed meetings are always an occasion for jangled nerves on Wall Street, investors were unusually jittery ahead of Tuesday's decision. They've grown accustomed to two decades of Greenspan leadership, and it remains to be seen how Mr. Bernanke reacts to challenging economic conditions. And since Fed officials have intimated that they are near the end of the current rate-lifting cycle, focusing on the minutia of the statement has become extreme.

A steep jump in crude-oil prices also jarred traders. Light, sweet crude surged $1.91 to $66.07 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Michael Guido, director of commodity strategy at Societe Generale, said a combination of factors -- a report on strong demand from China, production disruptions in Nigeria and a simmering conflict with Iran -- have kept oil prices rising steadily in recent weeks. "It's not one event that's moving this market, it's … little disruptions going on around the globe," he said.

The Conference Board's report on consumer confidence, which rose to a reading of 107.2, nearly a four-year high and above the 102 reading expected, added pressure to bond prices before the release of the Fed's statement.

In major market action:

Stocks fell7. On the New York Stock Exchange Monday, where 1.6 billion shares traded, 1,181 stocks rose and 2,123 fell. On the Nasdaq Stock Market, where 2 billion shares traded, 1,199 rose and 1,843 declined.

DOJ_NMG_0023330

Bonds slipped8. The benchmark 10-year Treasury fell 20/32 point, or $6.25 per $1,000 invested, to yield 4.788%. The 30-year bond lost 1 2/32 to yield 4.78%. Yields move inversely to prices.

The dollar was mixed.9 It traded at 117.85 yen, up slightly from 116.70 yen late Monday, while the euro rose to $1.2016 from $1.2011.

Prospect Of Higher Rates Sinks In (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, March 29, 2006

NEW YORK — It wasn't the fallout from the 15th interest rate increase that sent stock prices into a downward spiral Tuesday on Wall Street. It was the rising odds of a 16th and, perhaps, 17th rate boost by the Federal Reserve that prompted investors to bail out of stocks.

In its first meeting headed by Chairman Ben Bernanke, the Fed, as expected, raised the target on short-term interest rates for the 15th time, to 4.75%. But the Fed signaled that more "policy firming" might be needed to slow the economy and stamp out inflation, which dashed the hopes of investors who expected the Fed to hint that its rate-raising campaign was nearing an end. The Dow Jones industrials fell 96 points, or 0.8%, to 11,155.

"The market heard the Fed is not done yet, and they were disappointed," said Jeffrey Kleintop, chief investment strategist at PNC Advisors. Many strategists believe stocks will rally once the Fed conveys to investors that it is done raising rates.

Higher interest rates are a negative for stocks because they make it more expensive for individuals and businesses to borrow money, which crimps both consumer spending and corporate profit growth. There is also a fear that the Fed will raise rates too much and damage the economy.

Heading into this week's Fed meeting, the consensus on Wall Street was that the Fed would increase rates at its March meeting to 4.75% and then raise rates for the last time to 5% at its May meeting.

But the market now must factor in the possibility that the Fed will boost rates another quarter point at its June meeting, which would push rates up to 5.25%.

Pushing rates above 5% would suggest that the economy was stronger than expected, which would spark fears that inflation was getting out of control, says Fritz Reynolds, portfolio manager for the Reynolds fund family.

"If rates go higher than 5% that would worry the market and could create some weakness," Reynolds said.

The Fed's tough language Tuesday did not surprise everyone. Stuart Schweitzer, global market strategist at JPMorgan Asset & Wealth Management, said Bernanke had to "establish his inflation-fighting credentials," especially given the economy's strong rebound in the first quarter of 2006.

"The Fed will continue to tighten until growth slows and the job market cools," Schweitzer said.

The prospect of higher rates is a reality check for overly optimistic investors, said Michael Panzner, vice president at Rabo Securities USA. "Traders finally got the message they have been ignoring since January: The easy money game is over."

Consumer Confidence At Highest Point In Almost 4 Years (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — Consumer confidence jumped in March to the highest level in nearly four years, as Americans expressed rising optimism about both current economic conditions and the future outlook, a private report said Tuesday.

The New York-based Conference Board's consumer confidence index rose to 107.2 from 102.7 in February — the highest level since May 2002. Further, the index measuring consumers' expectations of growth six months down the line rose to 89.9 from the previous 84.2.

The percentage of consumers calling jobs "plentiful" was the highest since August 2001 — before the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

However, even as more Americans said work was easy to find, the percentage terming jobs "hard to get" also rose. Though expectations for future growth improved from February, consumers' outlook is still less rosy than last summer.

DOJ_NMG_0023331

While consumers are "optimistic in the here (and now), they're still somewhat cautious about the future," says Lynn Franco, director of the Conference Board Consumer Research Center.

The confidence index is based on a monthly survey of 5,000 households.

The current survey, completed March 21, found the share of consumers calling current economic conditions good rose to 28.3% from 26.4% in February.

Also, 28.4% of consumers said jobs were plentiful, up from 27.4% last month. At the same time, those calling jobs hard to get rose slightly to 20.7% from 20.2%.

"Consumers may be wobbly, owing to high energy prices, a vulnerable housing sector and increasingly uncertain medical and pension benefits, but there is nothing like the whiff of solid job growth to keep them on their feet," says Michael Gregory, senior economist at BMO Nesbitt Burns.

The share of consumers expecting conditions to improve in the next six months rose to 18% from 16.2% in February, and there was a slight increase in the number expecting more jobs to open up.

Franco said that consumer expectations, while better, were still somewhat subdued, suggesting "a cooling in activity in the latter half of this year."

The report comes amid government data showing strong hiring and a quickening pace of growth in the first three months of 2006, despite continued high energy prices and signs that the record housing market is slowing. The unemployment rate was 4.8% in February as employers added 243,000 jobs.

Economists said the numbers were another sign the economy has weathered the shock of last year's devastating hurricanes.

The percentage of consumers planning to buy a car in the next six months fell to 5.7% from 7.1% last month. But the share planning to buy a home rose to 4% from 3.4%.

Consumer Confidence Advances To Highest Level Since May 2002 (WSJ)

By Michael S. Derby

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

U.S. consumer confidence jumped to nearly a four-year high as households were cheered by a strong start for economic growth in 2006 and an improving job market, the Conference Board reported.

The private research group said its index of consumer confidence for March exceeded forecasters' expectations, rising to 107.2, from a revised 102.7 seen in February. Economists had expected a March reading of 102.

March was the second consecutive month of growth in the index, and the March index was the highest reading since May 2002, when the index hit 110.3.

The Conference Board said its present-situation index, which measures consumer perceptions about business conditions and employment, rose to 133.3 in March from a revised 130.3 in February. Meanwhile, the expectations index, which measures perceptions about business conditions, employment and income six months into the future, rose to 89.9 from February's revised 84.2.

"The improvement in consumers' assessment of present-day conditions is yet another sign that the economy gained steam in early 2006," said Lynn Franco, director of the Conference Board's Consumer Research Center. But she added, "consumer expectations, while improved, remain subdued and still suggest a cooling in activity in the latter half of this year."

Economists generally expect that economic growth will ease in the second half of the year amid higher interest rates and a cooling housing market. Still, analysts said that they expect consumer spending to hold up in 2006 with the support of job and wage growth.

The Conference Board said that in its survey, the proportion of those who deem current economic circumstances as "good" moved up to 28.3% in March from 26.4% in February. The proportion of those who saw conditions as "bad" fell to 14.7% from 15.4%. The proportion of survey respondents who said jobs are "plentiful" stood at 28.4%, up from 27.4%.

Bank Shares Lead Decline As Fed Raises Interest Rates (NYT/BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

DOJ_NMG_0023332

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

Stocks fell yesterday after the Federal Reserve raised interest rates for a 15th time and signaled that further increases are ahead.

Bank of America led a retreat in bank shares, which are among the most sensitive to rate changes, as bond yields climbed. Oil prices jumped to an eight-week high, also hurting the market.

The rate decision, the first since Ben S. Bernanke became Fed chairman, cut short a rally that had preceded the central bank's afternoon announcement. The Fed lifted the benchmark lending rate by a quarter- point, to 4.75 percent, and said in a statement that "further policy firming may be needed."

The Dow Jones industrial average fell 95.57 points, or 0.9 percent, to 11,154.54, for its worst performance since Feb. 28. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index dropped 8.38 points, or 0.6 percent, to 1,293.23, the steepest loss since March 6. The Nasdaq composite index declined 11.12, or 0.5 percent, to 2,304.46.

Stocks have stalled near five- year highs since mid-March on concern the economy and earnings will not be strong enough to overcome increases in borrowing costs.

The price of the benchmark 10-year Treasury note fell 19/32, to 97 26/32. The yield, which moves in the opposite direction of the price, rose to 4.78 percent, from 4.70 percent on Monday.

"People are under the impression that higher rates will draw money out of stocks" by making bonds more attractive, said Michael Panzner, head of sales trading at Rabo Securities USA in New York.

Earlier, a measure of consumer confidence added to concern that the economy was strong enough for the Fed to keep raising interest rates. The Conference Board's confidence index rose to 107.2 in March from 102.7 the previous month. Economists had expected a reading of 102.

Financial shares fell because higher rates curb demand for mortgages and loans. Bank of America slid 76 cents, to $46.06. J. P.Morgan Chase lost 55 cents, to $41.56.

After the Fed's decision, futures traders added to bets that the central bank would increase the benchmark rate to 5 percent at the next meeting on May 10. Interest rate futures now show a 90 percent chance of a quarter-point increase in May, up from 76 percent on Monday.

Crude oil for May delivery jumped 3 percent, to $66.07 a barrel in New York, the highest close since Feb. 1. Energy stocks advanced with the surge in oil. ConocoPhillips rose 65 cents, to $63.75. Schlumberger, the oil field services company, jumped $1.63, to $124.58. Eli Lilly dropped $2.29, to $56.38, after analysts cut their outlook for the stock on concern about slow sales of its Cymbalta depression drug.

Monsanto, a producer of genetically modified crops climbed $2.89, to $83.45 after P. J. Juvekar, an analyst at Citigroup Investment Research, said the company might get an earnings lift from ethanol.

Level 3 Communications, an operator of long-distance phone and data networks, rallied 71 cents, to $5.18. The company said it expected to exceed some of the first-quarter and full-year forecasts it gave last month.

Almost two stocks fell for every one that rose on the New York Stock Exchange. Some 1.56 billion shares changed hands on the Big Board, 6.2 percent below the three-month average.

Here are the results of yesterday's auction of four-week Treasury bills:

Oil Prices Top $66 A Barrel On Unrest (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — Oil prices rose above $66 a barrel for the first time in nearly two months Tuesday as tensions in oil-producing countries and expectations for a strong summer driving season lifted prices.

The price of a barrel of crude oil trading in New York rose $1.91, or 3%, to $66.07. That was up $4.66 from a month ago and the highest price since Feb. 1.

The increase in prices was led by political unrest in oil producers Nigeria and Iran, a potential labor strike in Norway and regular closures of refineries for maintenance.

DOJ_NMG_0023333

A report showing a sharp increase in consumer confidence in March also strengthened expectations that Americans would keep driving to shopping malls and would hit the roads for summer vacations. That would lead to higher demand of gasoline, and in turn, oil, says Phil Flynn, oil analyst at Alaron Trading in Chicago.

"The combination of all of that kept the markets under buying pressure," Flynn says.

He says oil prices may reach $69 a barrel as early as next week and could hit $75 a barrel this summer, particularly as investors keep an eye on expectations for a strong hurricane season, which could hamper U.S. production and slow imports.

For consumers, that will likely mean higher prices at the pump. Motor club AAA Tuesday said the average retail price for a gallon of regular gasoline was $2.50, up 26 cents from a month ago and 37 cents from the same time last year.

Brian Kahn, market analyst at First Enercast Financial in Denver, says a nationwide average of $3 a gallon, which was seen in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, is "very attainable." He notes the price of oil at the start of last summer's driving season was $57 a barrel. Oil accounts for about half of the cost of retail gasoline prices.

'War' On Christians Is Alleged (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

The "War on Christmas" has morphed into a "War on Christians."

Last December, some evangelical Christian groups declared that the religious celebration of Christmas -- and even the phrase "Merry Christmas" -- was under attack by the forces of secularism.

This week, radio commentator Rick Scarborough convened a two-day conference in Washington on the "War on Christians and the Values Voters in 2006." The opening session was devoted to "reports from the frontlines" on "persecution" of Christians in the United States and Canada, including an artist whose paintings were barred from a municipal art show in Deltona, Fla., because they contained religious themes.

"It doesn't rise to the level of persecution that we would see in China or North Korea," said Tristan Emmanuel, a Canadian activist. "But let's not pretend that it's okay."

Among the conference's speakers were former House majority leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) and Sens. John Cornyn (R-Tex.) and Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) as well as conservative Christian leaders Phyllis Schlafly, Rod Parsley, Gary Bauer, Janet Parshall and Alan Keyes.

To many of the 400 evangelicals packed into a small ballroom at the Omni Shoreham Hotel, it was a hard but necessary look at moral relativism, hedonism and Christophobia, or fear of Christ, to pick just a few terms offered by various speakers referring to the enemy.

To some outsiders, it illuminated the paranoia of the Christian right.

"Certainly religious persecution existed in our history, but to claim that these examples amount to religious persecution disrespects the experiences of people who have been jailed and died because of their faith," said K. Hollyn Hollman, general counsel of the Baptist Joint Committee for Religious Liberty.

"This is a skirmish over religious pluralism, and the inclination to see it as a war against Christianity strikes me as a spoiled-brat response by Christians who have always enjoyed the privileges of a majority position," said the Rev. Robert M. Franklin, a minister in the Church of God in Christ and professor of social ethics at Emory University.

White evangelicals make up about one-quarter of the U.S. population, and 85 percent of Americans identify themselves as Christians. But three-quarters of evangelicals believe they are a minority under siege and nearly half believe they are looked down upon by most of their fellow citizens, according to a 2004 poll.

In a luncheon speech yesterday, DeLay took issue with the "chattering classes" who think there is no war on Christians.

"We are after all a society that abides abortion on demand, that has killed millions of innocent children, that degrades the institution of marriage and often treats Christianity like some second-rate superstition. Seen from this perspective, of course there is a war on Christianity," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0023334

Much of the conference revolved around the difficulty of Christian parenting in a culture of sexual permissiveness. Don Feder, founder of a group called Jews Against Anti-Christian Defamation, urged the crowd not to blame "the liberal, self-hating Jews in Hollywood."

"Remember, the people in this audience are more Jewish than people like Barbra Streisand, because you embrace Jewish values, she doesn't," he said.

Another Jewish speaker, Michael Horowitz, told the conference that the "Christian decency of this country" saved him from becoming "a bar of soap" in Nazi Germany.

"You guys have become the Jews of the 21st century," said Horowitz, a senior fellow at the Hudson Institute in Washington, just before a false alarm interrupted his speech. Several attendees called the fire alarm suspicious, though a hotel spokesman said it resulted from a mechanical problem in a distant location.

In the session on recent cases of persecution, Navy Lt. Gordon James Klingenschmitt brought the crowd to its feet by introducing himself as a military chaplain "who prays in the name of Jesus."

Klingenschmitt said he was punished by a commander for offering sectarian prayers at a memorial service for a fallen sailor, and he compared himself to Abdur Rahman, an Afghan man who until this week faced possible execution for converting from Islam to Christianity.

"What do these two Christians have in common?" Klingenschmitt asked, showing slides first of himself, then of Rahman. "Perhaps we are persecuted. Perhaps we are no different than most Christians throughout history."

Lloyd Marcus, a painter, said he entered three paintings in a Black History Month art show at the City Hall of Deltona last month. But because the canvases showed a man wearing an "I love Jesus" cap and a minister holding a Bible, city officials deemed them inappropriate until the Alliance Defense Fund, a Christian legal group, threatened a lawsuit, he said.

The Rev. Tom Crouse, pastor of a Congregational Church in Holland, Mass., said that after hearing about a gay beauty pageant in California, he decided to hold a "Mr. Heterosexual Contest" in Worcester, Mass., on Feb. 18.

"It was just an event to proclaim the truth that God created us all heterosexual," he said. But to his surprise, he said, he received anonymous death threats, local officials condemned the contest, and "even Bible-believing churches were not on board. They said it wasn't loving."

DeLay Defends Religion In Politics (HILL)

By Carrie Sheffield

The Hill, March 29, 2006

Embattled Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) received three standing ovations yesterday when he spoke at a “War on Christians” conference in Washington.

Vision America is sponsoring the two-day conference. While introducing DeLay, Rick Scarborough, founder of Vision America, said, “Here is a man that I believe God has appointed.”

“God always does his best work after a crucifixion,” Scarborough said, referring to DeLay’s recent troubles. The former majority leader faces a difficult reelection race in the wake of his indictments on money-laundering and conspiracy in Texas.

Quoting former President Reagan, DeLay told the crowd, “As morality’s foundation is religion, religion and politics are necessarily related.”

Redemption Among The Faithful (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

There are those who would say Tom DeLay lost his job as House majority leader because he was indicted by a Texas grand jury on charges of money laundering and conspiracy, or because of his extensive ties to lawbreaking lobbyist Jack Abramoff. But they would be wrong.

In fact, the Texas Republican fell from power because he is a Christian.

That, at least, is the view of Rick Scarborough, convener of a conference this week called "The War on Christians."

DOJ_NMG_0023335

"I believe the most damaging thing that Tom DeLay has done in his life is take his faith seriously into public office, which made him a target for all those who despise the cause of Christ," Scarborough said, introducing DeLay yesterday. When DeLay finished, the host reminded the politician: "God always does his best work right after a crucifixion."

This would seem to be an odd time to declare Christianity under siege. A Christian conservative president has just nominated two Supreme Court justices who take an expansive view of religious rights, and religious conservatives are ascendant in a Republican Party that controls both chambers of Congress.

But, as Scarborough knows, believers will be more motivated to go to the polls in November (and to contribute money to his group) if they feel threatened. And so his forum offered all sorts of books and pamphlets proclaiming dire warnings: "The Criminalization of Christianity," "Liberalism Kills Kids" and "Same-Sex Marriage: Putting Every Household at Risk."

Gary Bauer, a Christian activist and former presidential candidate, argued in a speech that the "War on Christians" in America was even emboldening al-Qaeda. "They believe they can win, because they believe you and I are decadent; they think our civilization is fat and lazy," he said. "I believe they're wrong, but I understand why they're confused."

And why are they confused? Because American Christians are attacked by "elites" who think America is "a country of unbridled liberty, different strokes for different folks."

The agenda was similarly ominous, with forums on the threats from Hollywood, the judiciary, gays and, worst of all, the news media. "I can tell you that there probably is no greater megaphone for anti-faith values," conservative activist Paul Weyrich said in introducing a panel on the subject.

But when it came to providing evidence about this war on Christians, the examples were a bit stale. Don Irvine of the conservative media watchdog Accuracy in Media led off. He cited a "Jesus freaks" slur by former CNN boss Ted Turner (from 2001), a CBS employee's description of Bauer as a "little nut" (1999), a columnist's description of "Taliban-like" conservatives (2002) and a radio report linking conservative Christians to the anthrax attacks (2002).

Irvine's most recent example was an item Monday in USA Today taking issue with the name of the "War on Christians" conference. "I'm so relieved that USA Today has found this wonderful religion reporter," Irvine said, neglecting to mention it was an op-ed by somebody not on the paper's staff.

Also on the panel were Tim Graham of the Media Research Center, another conservative watchdog (he cited a 2001 survey of journalists), and Janet Folger of a group called Faith2Action. She cited a 13-year-old Washington Post article and a 17-year-old remark by Turner, and she tearfully recounted a bad experience she had on ABC's "Nightline" -- eight years ago.

Bill Fancher, an American Family Radio journalist, sought to explain the media's obtuseness. "The media doesn't understand [conservative Christians'] inability to compromise on principles," he said, adding: "I don't apologize for being narrow-minded."

Largely absent from the discussion was a mention of Fox News, Rush Limbaugh, Matt Drudge and the like. It fell to one of the questioners to point out that the fabled liberal media is "a shadow of what it once was."

Graham acknowledged: "We're making some great inroads."

These were only warm-up acts for DeLay, whose entrance caused a ripple of applause that spread into an extended standing ovation.

"This is a man that I believe God has appointed," Scarborough said, a view that might surprise the voters of the 22nd District of Texas. Scarborough, in his introduction, said DeLay had been "virtually destroyed in the press," and he urged the crowd to campaign for DeLay -- though he said nonprofit tax rules prevented him from actually "endorsing" DeLay.

The congressman started with a profession of faith, then went on a tour of the religious views of great presidents. He seemed to be on the verge of discussing his own troubles when he recalled Lincoln's view that men should "confess their sins and transgressions in humble sorrow."

But this was not the time for a DeLay confessional. Instead, he gave his view on the War on Christians. "Sides are being chosen, and the future of man hangs in the balance!" he warned. "The enemies of virtue may be on the march, but they have not won, and if we put our trust in Christ, they never will. . . . It is for us then to do as our heroes have always done and put our faith in the perfect redeeming love of Jesus Christ."

DOJ_NMG_0023336

DeLay basked in the rapturous ovation that followed. "Keep your eyes on Jesus," Scarborough called after the fallen leader as he departed the stage.

DeLay Says Justices 'Don't Get' Criticism (AP-Y2)

By Will Lester

AP2, March 28, 2006

Republican Rep. Tom DeLay said Tuesday that former and current Supreme Court Justices Sandra Day O'Connor and Ruth Bader Ginsburg "don't get it" when they complain about conservative criticism of judges.

"All wisdom doesn't reside in ... people in black robes," DeLay said.

In recent weeks, O'Connor has said the criticism has threatened judicial independence to deal with difficult issues such as gay marriage. Ginsburg said in a speech that a Web threat against her and O'Connor was apparently prompted by Republican proposals in Congress that tell judges to stop relying on foreign laws or court decisions.

Ginsburg said such actions by Congress "fuel the irrational fringe."

"Didn't you see the comments of Sandra Day O'Connor and Ruth Ginsburg over the last couple of weeks?" DeLay, R-Texas, asked reporters after a speech to a group of Christian conservatives. "There's still a problem, they don't get it. There are three branches of government. All wisdom doesn't reside in ... people in black robes."

Earlier, the former House majority leader told activists he agreed with their premise that there is a "war on Christianity.

"Our faith has always been in direct conflict with the values of the world," DeLay said. "We are, after all, a society that provides abortion on demand, has killed millions of innocent children, degrades the institution of marriage, and all but treats Christianity like some second-rate superstition."

DeLay was forced to abandon his job as majority leader while facing indictment on charges that he improperly funneled corporate donations to Republican candidates for the House and amid questions about his ties to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Reading About Buckham's Activities Takes Strong Stomach (RC)

By Norman Ornstein

Roll Call, March 29, 2006

For most of the past week, I grappled with a dilemma about this column: Where should I focus my indignation? Unfortunately, there is an excess of targets these days, including the farce of the "line-item veto."

But my dilemma was solved when I read the story by R. Jeffrey Smith in The Washington Post on Sunday about Ed Buckham and the U.S. Family Network. I have been around the track enough to have a pretty strong stomach when it comes to scandalous behavior here in the nation's capital, but I needed several antacids after digesting that piece.

For years, when I would chat with Republican leadership staff or Members who were close to the leadership, I would get strong warning signals about Buckham — about his tight relationship with and sway over former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas), and about his willingness to push the ethical envelope. But I could not have imagined the depth of the corruption before reading about the ways in which Buckham and his buddy, former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, manipulated the nonprofit rules and bilked large numbers of people — including Abramoff's clients, the National Republican Congressional Committee and firms that worked with Abramoff.

This was done, apparently, for personal gain, to scratch the back of Abramoff clients such as Northern Marianas sweatshop operator Willie Tan, and to give a nice monetary bonus to DeLay's wife, Christine, and the wife of another longtime DeLay employee, Tony Rudy. Rudy, an earlier Post story reported, had acted as a kind of "mole" for Abramoff inside DeLay's office to help one of his other clients, eLottery, head off legislation to ban Internet gambling. Soon after, Rudy left to take a lucrative lobbying job with Abramoff.

Along the way, the "nonprofit" U.S. Family Network bought expensive artwork, a fancy skybox at the then-MCI Center and lavish travel and entertainment for the Buckhams and their pals. Buckham and his wife allegedly skimmed $1 million of the $3 million raised by the network. Its receipts included a million-dollar payment from Russian energy interests, as well as money from

DOJ_NMG_0023337

Indian tribes, Marianas Islands employers, tobacco company RJ Reynolds, and a half-million shaken down from the NRCC, from which Buckham took a separate share of $200,000 off the top as a fundraising commission.

All the while, DeLay was carrying water for the Marianas sweatshops, the Russians and other interests, while aggressively raising money for his own charities and nonprofits.

Read these stories, along with the tales of Michael Scanlon, the former DeLay communications director and Abramoff crony who negotiated a plea deal with prosecutors, and reflect on what they all tell us about Tom DeLay. There are two possible explanations. One is that he is the most naive man ever to serve in Congress or any political office: Right under his nose, his closest and most trusted employees were running schemes to enrich themselves, subvert his office and repeatedly abuse his trust over many years. The second is that he knew what was going on, and saw their efforts as a nice way to enrich his friends, employees and family while helping accomplish his political goals.

If you accept the former explanation, you have to explain away the fact that DeLay was the most successful Whip in our lifetimes, thanks to his attention to detail, his keen understanding of people and his indefatigable energy and focus. I would like to hear how GOP Reps. Henry Bonilla (Texas), Jeb Hensarling (Texas), Eric Cantor (Va.) and all the other House Republicans who went out of their way to repeatedly laud DeLay and his standards now explain DeLay's conduct, after having learned about the doings of Buckham, Rudy and Scanlon.

Read these stories with one more issue in mind: the obvious goal of House and Senate leaders now to do as little reform of lobbying and ethics as possible. How dismaying, and how stupid. These stories are not going away, and are overwhelmingly likely to be followed by many more that are at least as damning — not all of which will be about staffers. There is little willingness on the part of the leadership to do anything to create a meaningful ethics process, or to deal effectively with the lobbyist-Member axis, or the larger issues of how money influences government and politics in Washington, D.C.

Clearly, we also need a serious and pointed focus on the misuse and abuse of nonprofits and charities by lawmakers, staffs and others. What ties do lawmakers have to pet charities or nonprofit organizations set up on their behalf or with their connivance? Where is the money coming from — and where is it going? How many staffers or family members of lawmakers are getting consulting fees or salaries from these or related organizations? DeLay, remember, fought aggressively to make sure that fundraising techniques for charities, via golf tournaments in lavish resorts and other ways of trading access for money, were not touched at all by prior rounds of campaign finance reform or other reforms.

Fundraising and spending by Member-connected charities and nonprofits cry out for a serious investigation by the Internal Revenue Service, the Senate Finance Committee, and the Ways and Means Committee. It can't limit itself to the U.S. Family Network — it ought to look at every organization that took soft money from one of the party groups, as well as every such organization that employs a spouse or family member or provides them with consulting fees, and every nonprofit linked to Abramoff, Scanlon, Rudy, DeLay, Buckham and their cronies.

Let me close with a piece of good news. The Federal Election Commission did what it should have done and is supposed to do by passing unanimously a rule on political activity and money and the Internet that is fair, balanced and constructive. Kudos to all the commissioners, and especially Chairman Michael Toner for rebounding from the earlier regulation that was rejected by a federal judge. The commission has created a much better alternative — one that now can relegate the Hensarling bill and any alternative pieces of legislation to the remainder bin. At least somebody was doing good work this week.

Norman Ornstein is a resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute.

Weinberger, 'An American Statesman,' Dies At 88 (WT)

By Jennifer Harper

The Washington Times, March 29, 2006

Caspar Weinberger, the stalwart defense secretary under President Reagan whose canny doctrine helped rebuild the nation's military, died of pneumonia yesterday in Bangor, Maine, with his family by his side. He was 88.

President Bush called Mr. Weinberger "an American statesman and a dedicated public servant."

DOJ_NMG_0023338

"He wore the uniform in World War II, held elected office and served in the Cabinets of three presidents. As secretary of defense for President Reagan, he worked to strengthen our military and win the Cold War. In all his years, this good man made many contributions to our nation. America is grateful for Caspar Weinberger's lifetime of service," the president said.

Of his predecessor, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said: "His support for the men and women in uniform and his central role in helping to win the Cold War leave a lasting legacy. He left the United States armed forces stronger, our country safer and the world more free."

Former first lady Nancy Reagan recalled her husband presenting Mr. Weinberger with the Presidential Medal of Freedom in 1987. "Ronnie said, 'His legacy is a strong and free America -- and for this, and for a lifetime of selfless service, a grateful nation thanks him.' I cannot think of any higher praise."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice recalled Mr. Weinberger's counsel during her earliest days in Washington and called him "a wise man."

Sen. Jon Kyl, Arizona Republican, observed, "Caspar Weinberger applied his considerable intellect to many of the nation's most critical problems. America has lost a true patriot."

A diligent Republican and conservative, Mr. Weinberger held a law degree from Harvard University but nevertheless joined the U.S. Army as a private in 1941. He was promoted to captain by the end of World War II while serving as an intelligence officer for Gen. Douglas MacArthur. The young officer never forgot the value of the experience.

"I think it gave me a whole different approach and understanding of the separate community that is the military," Mr. Weinberger once said.

He was quick to return to his hometown of San Francisco. He won a seat in the California Assembly in 1952 and the chairmanship of the California Republican Party 10 years later. Mr. Reagan, who was governor at the time, appointed Mr. Weinberger state director of finance in 1968.

Within two years, the deft administrator had arrived in Washington to serve in a series of high-powered positions in the Nixon and Ford administrations, including as chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, director of the Office of Management and Budget and secretary of health, education and welfare. He earned the moniker "Cap the Knife" for his finesse in keeping financial matters in check. In 1975, Mr. Weinberger became vice president and general counsel of the Bechtel Corp.

But public service still called. Mr. Weinberger joined the Reagan team as defense secretary in 1981, setting forth a vigorous state of military readiness that countered the Soviet threat through the Strategic Defense Initiative, the Air Force B-1B bomber and a 600-ship Navy. He resigned from the position seven years later. Mr. Weinberger was indicted later by an independent counsel along with five others on charges related to the Iran-Contra arms-for-hostages investigation, but was pardoned by President George Bush in 1992.

After leaving the Pentagon, Mr. Weinberger became the chairman of Forbes Inc. and remained a thoughtful writer and analyst at Forbes magazine and other publications, including The Washington Times.

"I'm an optimist. I think we will stay the course in Iraq," he wrote in a January Op-Ed column in Forbes. "We'll be strong enough, we'll have patience enough and we'll have sense enough not to listen to those whose only advice is to pull out, give up and not even try."

Mr. Weinberger is survived by his wife of 63 years, Jane; his son, Caspar Jr.; his daughter, Arlin; three grandchildren; and four great-grandchildren. Funeral arrangements are pending at Arlington National Cemetery.

Caspar W. Weinberger, 88; Reagan's Defense Secretary (WP)

By Adam Bernstein

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

Caspar W. Weinberger, 88, a veteran public servant who drastically raised the post-Vietnam War military budget as Ronald Reagan's secretary of defense and who later was indicted and then pardoned in the Iran-contra affair, died March 28 at Eastern Maine Medical Center in Bangor. He had kidney ailments and pneumonia.

DOJ_NMG_0023339

Briefly a California assemblyman, Mr. Weinberger was a background force in the state's Republican Party through the 1960s. Then-Gov. Reagan named Mr. Weinberger to important state positions overseeing finances, and he was regarded as a remarkably efficient administrator.

Summoned to Washington in 1970, Mr. Weinberger served under Presidents Richard M. Nixon and Gerald R. Ford as chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, director of the Office of Management and Budget and secretary of the old Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

His reputation for pruning public spending -- particularly on social programs -- led to an unflattering nickname ("Cap the Knife") and enduring resentment from those opposed to his approach.

After five years as an executive with Bechtel Group, the California-based engineering giant, he surfaced again in Washington when Reagan won the presidency in 1980. As secretary of defense from 1981 to 1987, Mr. Weinberger served longer than any Pentagon chief save for Robert S. McNamara during the Vietnam War.

Mr. Weinberger cumulatively raised the defense budget by $2 trillion, among its greatest peacetime jumps (prompting a new nickname, "Cap the Shovel"). This funding increase coincided with the decline of the Soviet Union, whose military morale was already crippled in Afghanistan. Mr. Weinberger and many others felt keenly the Pentagon's role in the fall of communism.

He revived the B-1 bomber program that went dormant during the Carter administration and lavished money on many more programs, including the MX missile and the "Star Wars" space-based missile defense system.

For all the military buildup and his reputation as a hawk, Mr. Weinberger resisted engaging in conflicts abroad unless absolutely unavoidable.

"Some thought it was incongruous that I did so much to build up our defenses but was reluctant to commit forces abroad," he wrote in his memoir "In the Arena" (2001). "I did not arm to attack. . . . We armed so that we could negotiate from strength, defend freedom and make war less likely."

As the years passed, Mr. Weinberger saw himself challenged more by Congress about his spending patterns. One-time aides also offered damning analyses.

Lawrence J. Korb, an assistant secretary of defense under Mr. Weinberger who became a defense policy analyst, wrote that "the defense budget and programs that he bequeathed to his successor, Frank Carlucci, were so far out of balance that his five-year plan had a shortfall of $500 billion. (In his first month in office, Carlucci had to make some $200 billion in reductions.)"

Several procurement scandals, in which screws and claw hammers were found to have cost more than $100 apiece, were deeply frustrating to the cost-conscious side of Mr. Weinberger.

Ultimately, what might have sidelined him in the White House was his penchant for scuttling arms talks he viewed as compromises to the Soviets. Political watchers noted that his decision to resign -- which he attributed to his wife's cancer treatment -- came shortly before a third meeting between Reagan and Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev.

After he left office, Mr. Weinberger became a leading figure in the Iran-contra affair, in which U.S. officials covertly sold arms to Iran to win the release of U.S. hostages in the Middle East and used some of the profits to support Nicaraguan rebels known as the contras. This went against stated U.S. policy.

An independent prosecutor, Lawrence E. Walsh, brought felony charges against Mr. Weinberger for obstructing justice by concealing voluminous notes, and Mr. Weinberger wrote that Walsh "was constructing a case against me to try to force me to implicate the president."

In June 1992, he was indicted by a federal grand jury, but in December, President George H.W. Bush pardoned Mr. Weinberger and called him "a true American patriot."

In recent years, Mr. Weinberger had joined Forbes magazine as publisher, chairman and columnist. He also was a commentator specializing in defense threats.

Caspar Willard Weinberger was born in San Francisco on Aug. 18, 1917. His father, a lawyer, nicknamed his son "Cap" based on a character in a popular novel of the day.

At Harvard University, Mr. Weinberger joined the Crimson newspaper, where he considered a triumph getting a backstage interview with the throaty actress Tallulah Bankhead. He graduated magna cum laude in 1938 and from Harvard's law school in 1941.

DOJ_NMG_0023340

During World War II, he served in the Army and was detached to Gen. Douglas MacArthur's intelligence staff headquarters variously in Australia, New Guinea and the Philippines.

During his Pentagon years, Mr. Weinberger frequently mentioned his fleeting encounters with the general, but his greatest hero remained British Prime Minister Winston Churchill, whose speeches he studied and whose resilience he admired. He liked to draw an analogy between Churchill and the Nazis and his own responsibilities against the Soviet Union.

Back in California in 1945, Mr. Weinberger wrote book reviews for the San Francisco Chronicle and clerked for U.S. Court of Appeals Judge William E. Orr. He joined the judge's prominent law firm in San Francisco, working his way to partner mostly as an anti-trust litigator.

Meanwhile, he began his political career. He was elected to the state assembly in 1952, representing a tony neighborhood of San Francisco. Regarded as a moderate Republican, he was reelected twice, culled a reputation as an able crusader against the liquor lobby, and then lost a bid for state attorney general in 1958 to a more-conservative opponent.

He went on to serve as chairman of the Republican State Central Committee. In the 1966 gubernatorial race, he backed Republican candidate George Christopher, a former mayor of San Francisco, but shifted his support to Reagan after the former actor won the nomination.

Many of Reagan's millionaire backers were skeptical about Mr. Weinberger's bona fides, noting his faint support in 1964 for the presidential bid of conservative Sen. Barry Goldwater (R-Ariz.).

But when asked to fix the state's financial plight, Mr. Weinberger lived up to his self-described fiscal Puritanism and was steeped in praise. Mr. Weinberger was applauded for a budget surplus in 1968, although some attributed it to an earlier tax increase.

Soon, he was in Washington, where he made key reforms at the Federal Trade Commission and prompted criticism at the Office of Management and Budget for his cost-cutting.

What he soon heralded as a $300 million budget surplus, despite an overall growth in the deficit, was reportedly gained by ending or greatly reducing appropriations for about 100 health, antipoverty and drug control programs. Mr. Weinberger said the social service efforts would be more effectively handled at the state and local level.

Eager for a political role in the Reagan administration, he became, in January 1981, the 15th secretary of defense. He oversaw limited-engagement strikes against the Caribbean island-nation of Grenada and against Libya.

He said he initially discouraged sending the Marine Corps as a peacekeeping force in Lebanon, calling it "an impossible mission." In October 1983, when 241 U.S. servicemen were killed in their barracks by suicide bombers, he likened the situation to a quagmire and pushed for withdrawal, which soon occurred.

In 1987, Mr. Weinberger received the Presidential Medal of Freedom, the nation's highest civilian medal.

In Washington, he cut a wiry figure and was known for wry, self-deprecating quips. He enjoyed the symphony and ballet. He lectured and wrote books, including two memoirs.

Survivors include his wife of 63 years, Jane Dalton Weinberger of Mount Desert, Maine; a son, Caspar Jr.; a daughter, Arlin; three grandchildren; and four great-grandchildren.

Caspar W. Weinberger, Who Served 3 Republican Presidents, Is Dead At 88 (NYT)

By David Stout

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

Caspar W. Weinberger, who held high positions under three Republican presidents and oversaw the biggest and costliest military buildup in peacetime history as Ronald Reagan's secretary of defense, died yesterday in Bangor, Me., after a brief illness. He was 88.

Mr. Weinberger lived nearby in Mount Desert, Me. His son, Caspar Jr., also of Mount Desert, said his father had been undergoing kidney dialysis for two years and died of pneumonia. His wife of 63 years, Jane, was by his side when he died, his son said.

DOJ_NMG_0023341

Until his death, Mr. Weinberger was chairman of Forbes Inc. He had continued to travel around the world until recently, his son said, and wrote a regular column for Forbes magazine. A book by Mr. Weinberger, "Home of the Brave: A Tribute to Unsung Heroes in the War on Terror," which he wrote with Wynton C. Hall, will be published in June by Forge Press.

A self-assured man and a tenacious debater, Mr. Weinberger served in Washington off and on for almost two decades. He was a crucial backer of Mr. Reagan's missile-based Strategic Defense Initiative, popularly known as Star Wars. He was also an implacable foe of the Soviet Union, a posture that put him increasingly at odds with Secretary of State George P. Shultz, who leaned more toward arms-control negotiations with Moscow.

By the time Mr. Weinberger left the Pentagon in 1987, Mr. Reagan had been swayed by Mr. Shultz (who had the president's wife, Nancy, in his corner). The president who had once derided the Soviet Union as "an evil empire" got along well with the Russian leader, Mikhail S. Gorbachev, who seemed cut from different cloth than his drab but ruthless predecessors.

Mr. Weinberger never lost his bone-deep suspicion of the Russians, and his comments after the collapse of the Soviet Union suggested that he still had more faith in arms than diplomacy, at least in dealing with the Kremlin.

Many felt that Mr. Weinberger's record was marred late in life by questions about his role in the Iran-contra affair — questions a presidential pardon left unresolved — but his résumé was impressive by any standard.

Under President Richard M. Nixon, he was chairman of the Federal Trade Commission; deputy director and later director of the Office of Management and Budget, where he earned the nickname Cap the Knife by smilingly arguing against requests for more money; and secretary of health, education and welfare.

He remained as secretary of the health and welfare agency under President Gerald R. Ford until 1975, when he left Washington for his native California. He said his wife could better cope with her arthritis there.

It was after he returned to the capital as defense secretary for Mr. Reagan in 1981 that Mr. Weinberger made his real mark. His mission, he said early on, was "to rearm America." His view was that previous efforts to get along with the Russians without demanding good behavior in return had reinforced "the Soviet prison wall," which stretched, he said, "from the Balkans to the Baltic."

The rise of the charismatic Mr. Gorbachev in the mid-1980's did not soften those views. "I don't think just because he wears Gucci shoes and smiles occasionally that the Soviet Union has changed its basic doctrines," Mr. Weinberger said in 1987, as he was leaving office.

So while other parts of the federal government were cringing under the cut-to-the-bone philosophy of the Reagan White House (as the old Cap the Knife might have desired), Mr. Weinberger demanded billions more for nuclear arms, ships, planes and tanks. "This is not a one-year program for summer soldiers," he warned in 1981.

He was true to his word. Year after year, he fought for big increases in Pentagon spending and usually won.

Mr. Weinberger also tried to alleviate the historic rivalries among the services. He ordered the branches to find more roles for women. He delegated more planning authority to the chiefs of staff and the service secretaries so that he could devote more time to policy.

A blemish in his 35 years of public service came in 1992, five years after he left the cabinet. That year, he was indicted on felony charges of perjury and obstruction of justice in connection with the covert sale of arms to Iran and the diversion of some of the proceeds to the Nicaraguan rebels, or contras.

The tangled transactions, which came to be known as the Iran-contra affair, were against the declared policy of the United States. Subsequent investigations depicted Mr. Reagan as determined to win the release of American hostages held in the Middle East and eager to obtain the help of Iranian "moderates" to do so.

Mr. Weinberger told a special committee of Congress in 1987 that he was aghast when he first heard White House aides talk about cultivating Iranian moderates. He testified that he had considered the idea "almost too absurd to comment on," and he said as much in a staff memorandum at the time. He told Congress that he thought, erroneously, that he had killed the proposal.

A special commission headed by John Tower, a former Republican senator from Texas, criticized Mr. Weinberger as not advising the president vigorously enough. Mr. Weinberger rejected the criticism as unfair.

The special Iran-contra prosecutor, Lawrence E. Walsh, obtained an indictment accusing Mr. Weinberger of concealing voluminous notes that would have cast more light on the roles of Mr. Reagan and Vice President George Bush in the scandal.

DOJ_NMG_0023342

The notes were scrawled in his almost illegible handwriting in some 5-by-7-inch notebooks that he had donated to the Library of Congress after leaving office.

The notebooks, some 1,700 of them, lay undisturbed until prosecutors learned of them. To Mr. Weinberger and his supporters, the little books were personal diaries, with jottings about the family dog as well as policy. To prosecutors, they were evidence the former secretary had tried to bury.

Mr. Weinberger furiously denied the charges, declaring that the prosecutor had pressed him to plead guilty to a lesser count in return for giving damaging testimony against Mr. Reagan, testimony that Mr. Weinberger said would have been false.

Mr. Weinberger was to have stood trial in 1993. But on Christmas Eve 1992, President George Bush ended Mr. Weinberger's legal troubles, pardoning him and several other officials caught up in the scandal.

Early in his tenure as defense secretary, Mr. Weinberger learned that he could not change the sprawling military bureaucracy overnight. In 1981, David A. Stockman, the Reagan budget director, pronounced the Pentagon "a swamp" of waste and inefficiency.

"Maybe he was talking about the Pentagon of a few years ago," Mr. Weinberger bristled. "The Pentagon is not a swamp. It is very dry land."

But two years later, Mr. Weinberger acknowledged that some spending absurdities had sprung up under his watch as well as under previous Democratic ones. A common metal bolt that cost 80 cents in 1980 had somehow become worth $17.59 in 1982, for instance.

Though he oversaw the spending of huge sums as Pentagon chief, Mr. Weinberger sometimes unleashed the budget-cutter in his political personality. Shortly after asking for $30 billion more in military spending for the first two years of the Reagan administration, he announced $1.7 billion in spending cuts through elimination of some projects and postponement of others.

In 1985, he canceled the development of an antiaircraft gun that had already cost $1.8 billion and was expected to cost $3 billion more. It just did not work very well, and there was no use throwing good money after bad, the secretary said.

Mr. Weinberger was soft-spoken, almost courtly in personal encounters. He showed a soft side in 1983, when he vetoed a plan for dogs to be shot so that military doctors could practice treating wounds. (He owned a collie at the time.)

By mid-1985, there were signs that his influence was waning. Some Congressional leaders had wearied of his demands for more and more money, and he was conspicuously omitted from Mr. Reagan's entourage to the Geneva summit meeting with Mr. Gorbachev.

Mr. Weinberger resigned on Nov. 5, 1987. His wife had undergone treatment for cancer, and he said he wanted to spend more time with her at home. "That's the long and the short and the tall of it," he said.

Not everyone believed him entirely. By many accounts, Mr. Weinberger differed often with Secretary of State Shultz, whom he considered too eager to negotiate with the Kremlin. And some of Mr. Weinberger's critics thought it was no coincidence that his resignation came just weeks after the stock market plunged, heralding a time of retrenching and the end of the Pentagon joy ride.

Caspar Willard Weinberger was born in San Francisco on Aug. 18, 1917. His father, Herman, was of Jewish Bohemian descent and worked his way through college to become a lawyer. His mother, Cerise, was from an English background. In his book "In the Arena: A Memoir of the 20th Century," written with Gretchen Roberts and published by Regnery in 2001, Mr. Weinberger said his father and grandfather had been indifferent to religion but that he himself had found his mother's Episcopalian faith "an enormous influence and comfort all my life."

Mr. Weinberger graduated magna cum laude from Harvard, where he was a member of Phi Beta Kappa, in 1938. He graduated from Harvard Law School in 1941 and enlisted in the Army the same year. Decades later, when men with stars on their shoulders had to defer to him, he ruefully recalled that one of his first jobs in the Army was at a camp in California digging ditches for sewers.

Mr. Weinberger went to officers' candidate school at Fort Benning, Ga., was sent to the Pacific after being commissioned, served more than three years with the 41st Infantry Division and landed on the intelligence staff of Gen. Douglas MacArthur.

DOJ_NMG_0023343

He was a clerk for a federal judge from 1945 to 1947, then started a private practice in the San Francisco area. He broke into politics in 1952, winning a seat in the California Assembly. He was re-elected without opposition in 1954 and 1956. A 1955 poll of newspaper reporters who covered the Legislature selected him as the most able California lawmaker.

Mr. Weinberger was defeated in a run for attorney general of California in 1958. From 1959 to 1968, he wrote a newspaper column on state government and was moderator of a public affairs television program. He was vice chairman of the Republican State Central Committee of California from 1960 to 1962 and chairman from 1962 to 1964.

Mr. Weinberger was chairman of a commission on reorganizing the California state government from 1966 to 1968 and was appointed state director of finance by Mr. Reagan, then the governor, early in 1968. The two had a warm relationship, even though in 1966 Mr. Weinberger had opposed Mr. Reagan in favor of a fellow San Franciscan in the Republican primary for governor. Mr. Weinberger was also considered a turncoat by some conservative Republicans because he gave only token support to Barry Goldwater's presidential campaign in 1964.

As California's finance director, Mr. Weinberger ran an office that had long been considered weak in the state government. By most accounts, he revitalized it.

Around that time, he was asked to sum up his political philosophy. He replied with a Republican bromide, "Liberal on human affairs and conservative on fiscal ones."

His service under Mr. Reagan in California, and their friendship, burnished Mr. Weinberger's credentials in conservative eyes, enough so that Nixon asked him to be chairman of the Federal Trade Commission. Taking office in January 1970, Mr. Weinberger promised to be an ally to consumers.

To the annoyance of some conservatives in the administration, Mr. Weinberger took on as an aide William Howard Taft 4th. Mr. Taft had the right name and the right Republican pedigree, but some businessmen thought he had a blemish on his résumé: he had been an investigator for Ralph Nader. (Mr. Taft later served as a deputy defense secretary under Mr. Weinberger.)

In the summer of 1970, Nixon named Mr. Weinberger deputy director of the new Office of Management and Budget. When the director, Mr. Shultz, became Treasury secretary in May 1972, Mr. Weinberger took Mr. Shultz's old job.

In November 1972, Nixon needed a new secretary of health, education and welfare to replace Elliot L. Richardson, who had moved to secretary of defense. Mr. Weinberger was a natural for the post, in view of Nixon's stated opinion that the health agency had become "bloated."

Democrats wondered, in the words of Senator Harold E. Hughes of Iowa, if Mr. Weinberger could "make the transition from budget hatchetman to advocate of people programs." He was confirmed by a vote of 61 to 10.

As his critics had predicted, Mr. Weinberger did try to kill or rein in dozens of programs, including some for hospital construction and school aid. But his stewardship was not marked by the wholesale federal retreat on health issues that some liberals had feared.

One reason was that Mr. Weinberger embraced some causes that liberals (and not a few conservatives) liked. He tried to get Congress to pass legislation limiting the tar and nicotine content of cigarettes. He envisioned national health insurance. He prodded his own department to protect the civil rights of mentally retarded people who were considered for sterilization. And at his insistence, a better American diet became official departmental policy.

Another reason he could not live up to his sobriquet of Cap the Knife as H.E.W. secretary was that much of the department's spending was simply beyond his control. The enormous sums paid out for Social Security, Medicare and welfare programs were fixed by law, and often included automatic cost-of-living increases.

So in the end, Mr. Weinberger presided over an expansion at the department, an irony that prompted him to warn upon his departure of the perils of big government.

After resigning from the Ford administration in 1975, Mr. Weinberger became a special counsel to the Bechtel engineering companies. As president-elect, Mr. Reagan turned to him in 1980 for advice on economic issues, opening the door for his career-culminating tenure at the Pentagon.

DOJ_NMG_0023344

Mr. Weinberger's novel, "Chain of Command," written with Peter Schweizer, was published by Artia Books, a subsidiary of Simon & Schuster, in 2005. He was also the co-author, with Mr. Schweizer, of "The Next War," an examination of defense strategy, published by Regnery in 1996.

Mr. Weinberger enjoyed the theater, opera and ballet and for a time reviewed books for California newspapers.

In addition to his wife and son, he is survived by a daughter, Arlin Weinberger; three grandchildren; and four great-grandchildren.

Mr. Weinberger was second only to Robert S. McNamara in longevity as defense secretary. Characteristically, he fired some parting shots in his farewell ceremony on Nov. 17, 1987, complaining that previous presidents and lawmakers had allowed the American military to become weak and flabby.

"We began by doubting the war in Vietnam," he lamented, "and we ended by doubting ourselves."

Not even his bitterest foes doubted his patriotism or his intellectual power. But many critics thought he had encouraged Pentagon spending that was wasteful by any standards.

In the summer of 1993, a three-year study by the General Accounting Office, an investigative arm of Congress, concluded that under Mr. Weinberger the Pentagon had understated the cost of some weapons by billions of dollars, overstated their effectiveness and exaggerated the threat of the Soviet Union.

Deriding the study as revisionist history written by bean-counters, Mr. Weinberger said its authors showed no understanding of how the world really was in the cold war era.

"Yes, we used a worst-case analysis," he said. "You should always use a worst-case analysis in this business. You can't afford to be wrong. In the end, we won the cold war, and if we won by too much, if it was overkill, so be it."

Ex US Defence Chief Caspar Weinberger Dies (FT)

By Claudia Luther

Financial Times, March 29, 2006

Caspar W. Weinberger, the anti-Soviet hawk who oversaw the nation's huge peacetime defense buildup as the secretary of Defense during most of President Reagan's two terms, died Tuesday. He was 88.

Weinberger had been hospitalized in Bangor, Maine for about a week with a high fever and pneumonia, his son Caspar Weinberger Jr. told the Associated Press. Jane Weinberger, his wife of 63-years, was with him at the time of his death.

"I was deeply disturbed to learn of the death of a great American and a dear friend," former Secretary of State Colin Powell told Associated Press. "Cap Weinberger was an indefatigable fighter for peace through strength. He served his nation in war and peace in so many ways."

As the nation's 15th defense seceratary, Weinberger doggedly opposed reducing nuclear weapons, although he was eventually overruled when Reagan sought a partnership in arms control with Soviet President Mikhail S. Gorbachev. Still, the Defense Department under Weinberger increased overall defense spending by 50%, adding 90 ships to the Navy and two divisions to the Army as well as the B-1 bomber and other new weapons systems to the Air Force.

A native Californian, Weinberger's long career in public service began with a stint in the state Assembly in the 1950s and included prominent roles in the Nixon and Ford administrations before Reagan named him secretary of Defense in 1981. He had the second-longest tenure in the post after, Robert S. McNamara, who served as secretary of defense during the Kennedy and Johnson administrations.

A complex figure, Weinberger was a hawk who also opposed excessive use of military force, earning him such high-level opponents in the Reagan administration as Secretary of State George P. Shultz, with whom Weinberger often tangled on defense issues.

"To Weinberger, as I heard him, our forces were to be constantly built up but not used," Shultz wrote in his memoirs.

Weinberger and Shultz's biggest dispute came in the early 1980s when Reagan deployed U.S. forces in Lebanon as part of a multi-national peacekeeping force trying to quell the violence in the civil war there. Shultz was a strong advocate of this deployment while Weinberger initially objected, believing that U.S. participation was not vital to U.S. interests and that there was not a carefully defined objective. In October 1983, 241 servicemen were killed in a suicide truck bombing at a Marine barracks in Beirut — the worst single casualty toll for the U.S. military since the Vietnam War.

DOJ_NMG_0023345

Though opposed to the operation in Lebanon, Weinberger endorsed the invasion of the Caribbean island nation of Grenada that same month, where a build-up of Cuban military forces was feared. That operation, while criticized by some as a diversion from the Lebanon debacle, helped restore a sense of confidence in the U.S. military.

A few years later, in April 1986, Weinberger also backed a U.S. strike against Libyan strongman Moammar Kadafi for two incidents: firing missiles at U.S. airplanes flying over the disputed Gulf of Sidra and the terrorist bombing — blamed on Kadafi — of a West Berlin discotheque frequented by U.S. servicemen, that left one American dead. The following year, during the summer of 1987, Weinberger also supported Reagan's decision to offer American help — including the protection of the U.S. flag — to Kuwaiti oil tankers in the Persian Gulf that feared attacks by Iranians.

During these years, Weinberger developed and put into use the "Weinberger Doctrine" — a set of six tests for when American troops should be deployed. Among the tests were the support of the American people, the willingness to employ overwhelming force and the use of forces as "a last resort."

Weinberger said he had formulated the policy on the uses of military power because of his strong disapproval of U.S. policy in Vietnam.

"Some thought it was incongruous that I did so much to build up our defenses but was reluctant to commit forces abroad," Weinberger wrote in "In the Arena: A Memoir of the 20th Century" (with Gretchen Roberts, 2001). But, he added, "I did not arm to attack. ¼ We armed so that we could negotiate from strength, defend freedom and make war less likely."

While widely endorsed by political conservatives and many in the defense establishment, Shultz dismissed the doctrine as "a counsel of inaction bordering on paralysis."

"There had to be some way to deal with violent threats that lay between doing nothing or launching an all-out conventional war," Shultz said. "The idea that force should be used 'only as a last resort' means that, by the time of use, force is the only resort and likely a much more costly one than if used earlier."

Weinberger's doctrine later evolved into the Powell Doctrine when it was reformulated by Powell — who had been a military advisor to Weinberger's in the Pentagon and later was chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff under President George H.W. Bush's secretary of state during President George W. Bush's first term.

During Weinberger's time in the Pentagon,defense spending reached $300 billion a year before leveling out. By some estimates, this peacetime defense buildup exceeded even that for the Vietnam War.

Among the major items pushed by Weinberger were the MX missile and the B-1 bomber — costly initiatives that Reagan considered essential to the development and delivery of the Pentagon's nuclear force.

Although initially a skeptic, Weinberger also strongly defended another of Reagan's proposals — the controversial Strategic Defense Initiative, a proposed space-based defense against ballistic missiles that never was proven to be workable.

SDI, commonly known as "Star Wars," soaked up what one defense expert estimated as $17 billion of the defense budget. It was abandoned by President Clinton in the 1990s, although President Bush has made efforts to revive it.

Weinberger was among the hard-liners in the Reagan administration to oppose most efforts at arms control agreements, but, urged by Shultz and others, the president went ahead anyway. Starting with a summit in Geneva 1985, Reagan met with Gorbachev and, finally, in 1987, the two leaders agreed to major weapons cutbacks that greatly altered the relationship between their two countries and hastened the end of the Cold War.

While at the time loyally praising the 1987 agreement as "very good," Weinberger told the New York Times shortly afterward that "the fact that Gorbachev came and didn't throw his shoes at anybody" may have been promising, but: "He's got claws and every once in a while those claws come out. He remembers to retract them, but it's like a person who has learned to speak very carefully, very well, and then every once in a while resorts to a guttural brogue.''

That same year, as Weinberger was leaving Defense, Reagan presented him with the Medal of Freedom, the highest civilian honor a president can give. But years after leaving the Pentagon, Weinberger was indicted in the Iran

-contra arms-for-hostages scandal that had dogged the Reagan administration's second term.

DOJ_NMG_0023346

The 1992 indictment charged Weinberger with lying during congressional and criminal investigations of Iran-contra — the Reagan administration's sale of arms to Iran in the hope that such a deal would help win the release of American hostages. The complicated scandal also involved the diversion of profits from the sale to support rebels fighting the leftist Sandinista government in Nicaragua.

Negotiating with terrorists was against American policy, and aid to the rebels was banned by Congress.

Weinberger, who ironically had strongly opposed the Iranian arms sale, maintained that he "did not lie to investigators about the state of my recollection" "In the Arena" about plans for the Iranian arms sales, but he was set for trial in early 1993. Before the court could convene, however, President George H.W. Bush granted pardons to Weinberger and several others in the Reagan administration who had been indicted by the Iran-contra independent counsel, Lawrence E. Walsh.

In granting Weinberger's pardon, Bush declared him "a true American patriot who has rendered long and extraordinary service to our country."

The scandal left a mark on an otherwise stellar career that had culminated with Weinberger's years beside Reagan during the final years of the Cold War.

Caspar Willard Weinberger was born Aug. 18, 1917, in San Francisco, the son of a lawyer. Many people assumed that, because of his name, the family was Jewish, but "Cap," as his father nicknamed him, was raised as an Episcopalian — his mother's faith.

A sickly child with persistent ear infections, Weinberger turned to books and playing mock battles with tin soldiers atop his bed. He had an early and strong interest in politics, following political conventions closely on the radio and attending campaign rallies with his father. He said the congressional record was his bedtime reading and, even as a child, he thought of himself as a Republican, like his father.

Weinberger earned his bachelor's and law degrees from Harvard in 1938 and 1941, respectively. A few months before the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor on Dec. 7, 1941, Weinberger entered the Army as a private in the infantry and served in the South Pacific during World War II. According to an official Pentagon biography, he was an officer on Gen. Douglas MacArthur's intelligence staff. He left the Army in 1945 with the rank of captain.

His experiences in the military would inform his later years at the Pentagon.

"I was trained on a wooden rifle with a little block of wood labeled `hand grenade,'" he told the Indianapolis Journal & Courier in 2002. "I just determined that if I had anything to do with it, I wouldn't want to have that kind of lack of training that we had at that time."

Also during the war, he met Army nurse Jane Dalton aboard ship on the way to the South Pacific. The couple married in 1942 and had a daughter, Arlin, and a son, Caspar Jr. All survive Weinberger, as do several grandchildren.

After the war, Weinberger returned to San Francisco as a law clerk to an appeals court judge before joining a law firm. But he was more interested in politics and, in 1952, he won a seat in the state Assembly representing a San Francisco area district.

In 1958, he ran in the GOP primary for state attorney general, but lost and returned to law practice. He kept a hand in Republican politics as chairman of the state Republican Party, gaining a reputation as a true believer in conservative principles.

Always interested in journalism — at Harvard, he was editor of the Crimson, the college's daily newspaper — he also at various times moderated a public affairs program on a San Francisco television station, wrote a newspaper column and did a radio commentary.

When Reagan was elected governor in 1966, Weinberger joined his administration, first as a member of the "Little Hoover Commission," an independent state panel that evaluates government for lawmakers, and, in 1968, as California's director of finance.

It was not long, however, before Weinberger made the jump to Washington as President Nixon's choice to head the Federal Trade Commission and, later, serve as deputy director and then director of the newly formed Office of Management and Budget.

At OMB, Weinberger's special targets were the Great Society programs put in place by Nixon's Democratic predecessor, Lyndon B. Johnson. He carried out his mandate at OMB with such energy that William Safire, then a presidential speechwriter, dubbed him "Cap the Knife." The nickname stuck.

DOJ_NMG_0023347

After the 1972 election gave Nixon a second term, the president moved Weinberger to a Cabinet post as secretary of Health, Education and Welfare. When Nixon resigned in the wake of the Watergate scandal, President Ford retained Weinberger in that post.

Following Ford's defeat by Jimmy Carter in 1976, Weinberger went to work at Bechtel Corp., a defense contractor in the San Francisco Bay Area. But by 1981, he was back in Washington when Reagan, who defeated Carter, tapped him for what would be the most important post of his career: secretary of Defense.

Alarmed about estimates of Soviet military strength, Reagan asked his old friend to oversee an immense expansion of military might. Weinberger enthusiastically complied, earning a new nickname — Cap the Ladle — as he spearheaded Reagan's "peace through strength" policy.

"The price of peace and freedom is high, but whatever it costs, it's worth it," he told the Washington Post in 1983. Post 10/9/83 He later wrote in "In the Arena": "I felt that I was able to make a difference and perhaps help set our nation on a more stable, secure course than it had previously been following."

After nearly seven years in the E Ring of the Pentagon, Weinberger, citing his wife's health, left his post in 1987. Five years later, he was indicted in the Iran-contra scandal.

When the idea of trading arms for hostages was first proposed, Weinberger said he had requested a meeting with Reagan during which he expressed his "very strong objection" to the Iran operation. He later told an aide that he believed "this baby had been strangled in its cradle."

But the arms sale continued, pushed by national security advisors Robert C. McFarlane and John M. Poindexter as well as Lt. Col. Oliver L. North, a staff assistant to the National Security Council.

In the indictment, Independent Counsel Walsh accused Weinberger of saying he did not know whether the sale of Hawk missiles to Iran was going to take place when, Walsh said, the secretary's personal notes at the time indicated that he did know. (Walsh also investigated Shultz's role in Iran-contra, but the secretary of State was never indicted.)

Weinberger spent the rest of his life fuming about having had his integrity questioned by Walsh, calling the charges against him "misguided" and "reckless."

After leaving the federal government, Weinberger became publisher and later chairman of Forbes, the business periodical, for which he also wrote a column. Besides "In the Arena," he also wrote "Fighting for Peace: Seven Critical Years in the Pentagon" (1990) and, with Peter Schweizer, "The Next War" (1996), which outlined five possible scenarios in which the U.S. would again go to war.

Also with Schweizer, he wrote the 2005 fiction thriller, "Chain of Command." The New York Times, in reviewing the book, called it "gripping."

This article appears by special arrangement with The Los Angeles Times

Former Defense Secretary Weinberger Dead At 88 (LAT)

By Claudia Luther

The Los Angeles Times, March 29, 2006

Caspar W. Weinberger, the anti-Soviet hawk who oversaw the nation's huge peacetime defense buildup as the secretary of Defense during most of President Ronald Reagan's two terms, died today. He was 88.

Weinberger had been hospitalized in Bangor, Maine for about a week with a high fever and pneumonia, his son Caspar Weinberger Jr. told the Associated Press. Jane Weinberger, his wife of 63 years, was with him at the time of his death.

"I was deeply disturbed to learn of the death of a great American and a dear friend," former Secretary of State Colin Powell told Associated Press. "Cap Weinberger was an indefatigable fighter for peace through strength. He served his nation in war and peace in so many ways."

As the nation's 15th defense secretary, Weinberger doggedly opposed reducing nuclear weapons, although he was eventually overruled when Reagan sought a partnership in arms control with Soviet President Mikhail S. Gorbachev. Still, the Defense Department under Weinberger increased defense spending by 50%, adding 90 ships to the Navy and two divisions to the Army, as well as the B-1 bomber and other new weapons systems to the Air Force.

DOJ_NMG_0023348

A native Californian, Weinberger's long career in public service began with a stint in the state Assembly in the 1950s and included prominent roles in the Richard Nixon and Gerald Ford administrations before Reagan named him secretary of Defense in 1981. Weinberger had the second-longest tenure in the post after Robert S. McNamara, who served as secretary of Defense during the John F. Kennedy and Lyndon B. Johnson administrations.

A complex figure, Weinberger was a hawk who also opposed excessive use of military force, earning him such high-level opponents in the Reagan administration as Secretary of State George P. Shultz, with whom Weinberger often tangled on defense issues.

"To Weinberger, as I heard him, our forces were to be constantly built up but not used," Shultz wrote in his memoirs.

Weinberger and Shultz's biggest dispute came in the early 1980s when Reagan deployed U.S. forces in Lebanon as part of a multinational peacekeeping team trying to quell the civil war there. Shultz was a strong advocate of this deployment while Weinberger initially objected, believing that U.S. participation was not vital to U.S. interests and that there was not a carefully defined objective.

In October 1983, 241 servicemen were killed in a suicide truck bombing at a Marine barracks in Beirut — the worst single casualty toll for the U.S. military since the Vietnam War.

However, Weinberger did endorse the invasion of the Caribbean island nation of Grenada that same month, where a buildup of Cuban military forces was feared. That operation, while criticized by some as a diversion from the Lebanon debacle, helped restore a sense of confidence in the U.S. military.

A few years later, in April 1986, Weinberger backed the U.S. strike against Libyan strongman Moammar Kadafi for two incidents: firing missiles at U.S. airplanes flying over the disputed Gulf of Sidra and the terrorist bombing — blamed on Kadafi — of a West Berlin discotheque frequented by U.S. servicemen that left one American dead.

The next year, during the summer of 1987, Weinberger supported Reagan's decision to offer American help — including the protection of the U.S. flag — to Kuwaiti oil tankers that feared attacks by Iranians in the Persian Gulf.

During those years, Weinberger developed and put into use the "Weinberger Doctrine" — a set of six tests for when American troops should be deployed. Among the tests were the support of the American people, the willingness to employ overwhelming force, and the use of forces as "a last resort."

Weinberger said he had formulated the policy on the uses of military power because of his strong disapproval of U.S. policy in Vietnam.

"Some thought it was incongruous that I did so much to build up our defenses but was reluctant to commit forces abroad," Weinberger wrote in "In the Arena: A Memoir of the 20th Century" (with Gretchen Roberts, 2001). But, he added: "I did not arm to attack We armed so that we could negotiate from strength, defend freedom and make war less likely."

While widely endorsed by political conservatives and many in the defense establishment, Shultz dismissed the doctrine as "a counsel of inaction bordering on paralysis."

"There had to be some way to deal with violent threats that lay between doing nothing or launching an all-out conventional war," Shultz said. "The idea that force should be used 'only as a last resort' means that, by the time of use, force is the only resort and likely a much more costly one than if used earlier."

Weinberger's doctrine evolved into the "Powell Doctrine" when it was reformulated by Powell — who had been a military advisor to Weinberger in the Pentagon and later was chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff under President George H.W. Bush's and secretary of State during President Bush's first term.

During Weinberger's time in the Pentagon, defense spending reached $300 billion a year before leveling out. By some estimates, this peacetime defense buildup exceeded that for the Vietnam War.

Among the major items pushed by Weinberger were the MX missile and the B-1 bomber — costly initiatives that Reagan considered essential to the development and delivery of the Pentagon's nuclear force.

Although initially a skeptic, Weinberger strongly defended another of Reagan's proposals — the controversial Strategic Defense Initiative, a proposed space-based defense against ballistic missiles that has not proven to be workable.

SDI, commonly known as "Star Wars," soaked up what one defense expert estimated as $17 billion of the defense budget. It was abandoned by President Bill Clinton in the 1990s, although President Bush has made efforts to revive it.

DOJ_NMG_0023349

Weinberger was among the hard-liners in the Reagan administration to oppose most efforts at arms control agreements, but, urged on by Shultz and others, the president went ahead. Starting with a summit in Geneva in 1985, Reagan met with Gorbachev, and in 1987 the two leaders agreed to major weapons cutbacks that greatly altered the relationship between the two countries and hastened the end of the Cold War.

While at the time loyally praising the 1987 agreement as "very good," Weinberger told the New York Times shortly afterward that "the fact that Gorbachev came and didn't throw his shoes at anybody" may have been promising, but: "He's got claws, and every once in a while those claws come out. He remembers to retract them, but it's like a person who has learned to speak very carefully, very well, and then every once in a while resorts to a guttural brogue."

That same year, as Weinberger was leaving Defense, Reagan presented him with the Medal of Freedom, the highest civilian honor a president can give. But years after leaving the Pentagon, Weinberger was indicted in the Iran-Contra arms-for-hostages scandal that had dogged the Reagan administration's second term.

The 1992 indictment charged Weinberger with lying during congressional and criminal investigations of Iran-Contra — the Reagan administration's sale of arms to Iran in the hope that such a deal would help win the release of American hostages. The complicated scandal also involved the diversion of profits from the sale to support rebels fighting the leftist Sandinista government in Nicaragua.

Negotiating with terrorists was against American policy, and aid to the rebels was banned by Congress.

Weinberger, who ironically had strongly opposed the Iranian arms sale, maintained that he "did not lie to investigators about the state of my recollection" in his book "In the Arena."

However, before the trial could convene in 1993, President George H.W. Bush granted pardons to Weinberger and several others in the Reagan administration who had been indicted by the Iran-Contra independent counsel, Lawrence E. Walsh.

In granting Weinberger's pardon, Bush declared him "a true American patriot who has rendered long and extraordinary service to our country."

The scandal left a mark on an otherwise stellar career that had culminated with Weinberger's years beside Reagan during the final years of the Cold War.

Caspar Willard Weinberger was born Aug. 18, 1917, in San Francisco, the son of a lawyer. Many people assumed that because of his name, the family was Jewish, but "Cap," as his father nicknamed him, was raised as an Episcopalian — his mother's faith.

A sickly child with persistent ear infections, Weinberger turned to books and playing mock battles with tin soldiers atop his bed. He had an early and strong interest in politics, following political conventions closely on the radio and attending campaign rallies with his father. He said the congressional record was his bedtime reading and, even as a child, he thought of himself as a Republican, like his father.

Weinberger earned his bachelor's and law degrees from Harvard University in 1938 and 1941. A few months before the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor on Dec. 7, 1941, Weinberger entered the Army as a private in the infantry and served in the South Pacific during World War II. According to an official Pentagon biography, he was an officer on Gen. Douglas MacArthur's intelligence staff. He left the Army in 1945 with the rank of captain.

His experiences in the military would inform his later years at the Pentagon.

"I was trained on a wooden rifle with a little block of wood labeled `hand grenade,'" he told the Indianapolis Journal & Courier in 2002. "I just determined that if I had anything to do with it, I wouldn't want to have that kind of lack of training that we had at that time."

During the war, he met Army nurse Jane Dalton aboard a ship on the way to the South Pacific. The couple married in 1942 and had a daughter, Arlin, and a son, Caspar Jr. All survive Weinberger, as do several grandchildren.

After the war, Weinberger returned to San Francisco as a law clerk to an appeals court judge before joining a law firm. He was more interested in politics and, in 1952, he won a seat in the state Assembly representing a San Francisco area district.

In 1958, Weinberger ran in the GOP primary for state attorney general, but lost and returned to law practice. He kept a hand in politics as chairman of the state Republican Party, gaining a reputation as a true believer in conservative principles.

DOJ_NMG_0023350

Always interested in journalism — at Harvard, he was editor of the Crimson, the college's daily newspaper — he at various times moderated a public affairs program on a San Francisco television station, wrote a newspaper column and did a radio commentary.

When Reagan was elected governor in 1966, Weinberger joined his administration, first as a member of the Little Hoover Commission, an independent state panel that evaluates government for lawmakers, and, in 1968, as California's director of finance.

It was not long before Weinberger made the jump to Washington as Nixon's choice to head the Federal Trade Commission. He later served as deputy director and then director of the newly formed Office of Management and Budget.

At OMB, Weinberger's special targets were the Great Society programs put in place by Nixon's Democratic predecessor, Johnson. Weinberger carried out his mandate at OMB with such energy that William Safire, then a presidential speechwriter, dubbed him "Cap the Knife." The nickname stuck.

After the 1972 election gave Nixon a second term, the president moved Weinberger to a Cabinet post as secretary of Health, Education and Welfare. When Nixon resigned amid the Watergate scandal, Ford retained Weinberger in that post.

After Ford's defeat by Jimmy Carter in 1976, Weinberger went to work at Bechtel Corp., a defense contractor in the San Francisco Bay Area. By 1981, he was back in Washington when Reagan, who defeated Carter, tapped him for what would be the most important post of his career: secretary of Defense.

Alarmed about estimates of Soviet military strength, Reagan asked his old friend to oversee an immense expansion of military might. Weinberger enthusiastically complied, earning a new nickname — Cap the Ladle — as he spearheaded Reagan's "peace through strength" policy.

"The price of peace and freedom is high, but whatever it costs, it's worth it," he told the Washington Post in 1983. He later wrote in "In the Arena": "I felt that I was able to make a difference and perhaps help set our nation on a more stable, secure course than it had previously been following."

After nearly seven years in the E Ring of the Pentagon, Weinberger, citing his wife's health, left his post in 1987. Five years later, he was indicted in the Iran-Contra scandal.

When the idea of trading arms for hostages was proposed, Weinberger said he had requested a meeting with Reagan during which he expressed his "very strong objection" to the Iran operation. He later told an aide that he believed "this baby had been strangled in its cradle."

The arms sale continued, pushed by national security advisors Robert C. McFarlane and John M. Poindexter, as well as Lt. Col. Oliver L. North, a staff assistant to the National Security Council.

In the indictment, independent counsel Walsh accused Weinberger of saying he did not know whether the sale of Hawk missiles to Iran was going to take place when, Walsh said, the secretary's personal notes indicated that he did know.

Weinberger spent the rest of his life fuming about having had his integrity questioned by Walsh, calling the charges against him "misguided" and "reckless."

After leaving the federal government, Weinberger became publisher and later chairman of Forbes, the business periodical, for which he also wrote a column. Besides "In the Arena," he wrote "Fighting for Peace: Seven Critical Years in the Pentagon" (1990) and, with Peter Schweizer, "The Next War" (1996), which outlined five possible scenarios in which the U.S. would again go to war.

Also with Schweizer, he wrote the 2005 fiction thriller, "Chain of Command." The New York Times, in reviewing the book, called it "gripping."

Cap Weinberger, R.I.P. (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

Writing in Forbes magazine last year on the legacy of George Kennan, Caspar Weinberger concluded: "Reagan realized that containment was not enough, that the U.S. had to win the Cold War. And thanks to his leadership, we did."

The use of the pronoun "his" was typically modest, for, other than the Gipper, no American played a bigger role in defeating Soviet Communism than Mr. Weinberger, who died yesterday at the age of 88. Reagan picked his fellow Californian to transform a Defense Department left in tatters by Jimmy Carter's Presidency. In his seven years as secretary, Mr. Weinberger presided over a roughly 70% increase in defense spending and directed the modernization of the military that later won the Gulf War in spectacular fashion and remains globally dominant today.

DOJ_NMG_0023351

Mr. Weinberger also exposed the false mystique of arms control as he helped put the first nails in the coffin of the Cold War MAD doctrine of mutually assured destruction. He was responsible for implementing Reagan's Strategic Defense Initiative -- and lived to see that vision become a reality 20 years later, with the U.S. withdrawal from the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty and the deployment of missile defenses.

After he left office, Mr. Weinberger served his country as well by refusing to accept a plea bargain in the politically motivated indictments by Independent Counsel Lawrence Walsh over the Iran-Contra affair. President George H.W. Bush pardoned him two weeks before he was to go to trial, and it's a tribute to Mr. Weinberger's patriotism and good will that that bitter experience never left him embittered. Perhaps he knew that his many contributions to liberty would be what history remembers.

Nofziger: A Friend With Whom It Was A Pleasure To Disagree (WP)

By Frank Mankiewicz

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

Until his death Monday, Lyn Nofziger and I, unlikely as it may seem, were good friends -- off and on -- for 50 years. During that time, I doubt we ever agreed on any public matter (except for one, on which I dwell below). His consistency in some other matters is worth noting: I never saw him without a tie, usually with some design variant of Mickey Mouse -- nor did I ever see his collar buttoned. The tie was always well knotted, but an inch or two below his throat. We first talked during the '50s, when he was a journalist at Copley Newspapers in San Diego and I was a sometime Democratic campaign functionary and an aspiring lawyer. We debated occasionally, although it was always hard for him to take the disputes as seriously as his colleagues did.

We came together, I recall ruefully, in 1967, when he was the press secretary for Ronald Reagan, the newly elected governor of California, and I had the same job for the newly elected Sen. Robert F. Kennedy of New York. Don Hewitt of CBS News, later to achieve great renown as the inventor and executive producer of "60 Minutes," had an idea that a debate between Reagan and Kennedy would be a wonderful way to display CBS's new and then-revolutionary technical wonder -- the satellite.

As Hewitt explained it, RFK in Washington and Reagan in California would answer questions, live, from students around the world -- some in London, some in the Middle East and others in Asia. Nofziger, who knew his boss better than I knew mine, thought it was a wonderful idea and embraced it eagerly. I saw no downside, and thought RFK would virtually destroy this "B-movie actor" who had somehow stumbled into the governorship of California. The debate, to Lyn's eternal delight, was a disaster for our side. Reagan, a master of on-camera speaking developed through years of introducing the "General Electric Theater," was in command from the beginning.

When the first question came in from London, about Vietnam, I sensed we were in trouble. Kennedy, predictably, thought about his answer, mentioned that there were difficult questions involved. He came down on the right side, to be sure, but only after a lengthy explanation and a good deal of thought, during none of which did he make eye contact with the camera. Gov. Reagan, well coached by Lyn, stepped into the camera and, making instant eye contact, answered clearly and quickly that, "We have always been a generous people, and we seek only to share the benefits of democracy and a healthy economy."

As the questions continued from students in India and elsewhere in Asia, it only got worse. And indeed, whenever a brisk discussion occurred later within RFK's staff over the wisdom or non-wisdom of a particular activity, he would often stop the discussion, and turn to me with the question, "Aren't you the fellow who urged me to debate Ronald Reagan?"

By 1980, after playing a major role in the presidential campaigns of Reagan in 1976 and 1980, Lyn became the assistant to President Reagan for political affairs.

So, during that first year of Reagan's presidency, I sent Lyn another copy of a column I had written a few years before, attacking and satirizing the attempt by some organized do-gooders to inflict the metric system on Americans, a view of mine Lyn had enthusiastically endorsed. So, in 1981, when I reminded him that a commission actually existed to further the adoption of the metric system and the damage we both felt this could wreak on our country, Lyn went to work with material provided by each of us. He was able, he told me, to prevail on the president to dissolve the commission and make sure that, at least in the Reagan presidency, there would be no further effort to sell metric.

DOJ_NMG_0023352

It was a signal victory, but one which we recognized would have to be shared only between the two of us, lest public opinion once again began to head toward metrification.

We debated after that from time to time on some cable show or other, but often found we agreed that our mutual respect for each other made the venom the talk shows sought (and alas, seek) disappear, and made our friendly participation less suitable for audiences accustomed to near-violence. In the past few years, we talked from time to time about the possibility of starting a program ourselves, but Lyn always begged off on the grounds he was overworked. I suspect, reading this week of his death from cancer, that the "overwork" may have consisted largely of his battle against the disease. When his doctor gave him the diagnosis, I'm betting he eventually chuckled, and then loosened his tie.

New U.N. Draft On Iran Softens Condemnation (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, March 28 — European and American diplomats circulated a new draft statement to the Security Council on Tuesday evening that weakens language condemning Iran's nuclear program but still calls on Tehran to abandon uranium enrichment activities, which the West believes are intended to make weapons.

The new draft, written by Britain and France and supported by the United States, eliminates or softens elements in earlier drafts that had raised objections from China and Russia.

The three Western nations hope the new version can be adopted Wednesday, a day before the foreign ministers of the five permanent Council members and Germany meet in Berlin to discuss strategy on Iran.

"We feel a sense of urgency," said John R. Bolton, the American ambassador, pointing out that it has been three weeks since Iran's case was delivered to the Council by the International Atomic Energy Agency, United Nations nuclear watchdog based in Vienna.

Negotiations to reach consensus on the relatively mild Security Council action of a nonbinding presidential statement have faltered over Chinese and Russian objections to language that they argue lays the groundwork for taking tougher action like sanctions, which they both oppose.

One of the changes in the text is a watering down of a phrase calling Iran's actions a possible "threat to international peace and security," a term that Beijing and Moscow said established a pretext for sanctions.

The new version simply notes the Council's "primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security."

The revised text also drops any mention of specific charges and demands against Iran, and instead refers to resolutions of the nuclear agency that incorporate them.

In another modification, it now requests a report back from the director of the nuclear agency on Iran's compliance with the Security Council statement in 30 days instead of the 14 days in the original text.

China had suggested a time frame of four to six weeks, and Russia had spoken of more than two months.

Mr. Bolton acknowledged that the wording disagreements might be difficult for most people to understand. "But they are important points about the role of the Security Council and the I.A.E.A., and it's important to get it right because we want to send a clear message to Iran," he said.

Germans Say 6 Companies Sold Nuclear Parts To Iran Network (NYT)

By Richard Bernstein

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

BERLIN, March 28 — German prosecutors are investigating whether six German companies sold electronic equipment to a clandestine procurement network established to supply Iran with equipment for its nuclear development program.

A prosecutor in the state of Brandenberg, Benedikt Welfens, told German television on Monday that several million dollars' worth of equipment that could be used for a nuclear program had been shipped from Germany to Iran, via a Russian company that operated in Berlin in 2003 and 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0023353

"Its main business is the supply of Iran's nuclear program," Mr. Welfens said on the ARD television network. He said the parts included special cables, pumps and transformers, worth about $3.6 million.

The Web site of the German newsmagazine Der Spiegel on Tuesday quoted Mr. Welfens as saying that prosecutors suspected that one of the companies knew where the equipment had been headed, while the others may have mistakenly believed the equipment had been destined for Russia, for which no export restrictions apply.

Germany maintains strict export restrictions on so-called dual-use technology — goods that can be bought ostensibly for civilian purposes but diverted to military use — to Iran.

"The material was not of crucial significance for the nuclear industry," Mr. Welfens said. "It was peripheral rather than core.

"It did not include centrifuges," he said, referring to the machines used to enrich uranium gas and produce bomb-grade nuclear fuel.

The Russian front company, which has been closed down, was staffed by seven citizens of the former Soviet Union, all of whom have now disappeared, Mr. Welfens said. No arrests have been made, but prosecutors want to question the seven after having seized records and equipment in raids at 41 sites in Germany this week.

The raids and the disclosure that material useful in a nuclear development program was provided to Iran was bound to be interpreted by European and American officials as further evidence of a widespread, clandestine effort by Iran to build nuclear weapons.

Iran says its nuclear program, which has now been referred to the United Nations Security Council for possible sanctions, is aimed only at generating electricity, an assertion that is openly disbelieved by governments in Europe and the United States.

On Thursday, Germany plays host to a meeting of the five permanent members of the Security Council that are seeking to coordinate a response to widespread accusations that Iran has failed to fully disclose its nuclear development activities.

Mr. Welfens said that the investigation into the procurement ring, which culminated in the raids, has been under way since September 2004, but that information that some material had made its way to Iran was received only recently, Der Spiegel reported.

"There are no signs that the Russian authorities knew anything about this," Mr. Welfens said. "We can't rule out that the Iranians approached Russian middlemen directly. It doesn't appear to have been handled very professionally. The middlemen would go around offering cash."

Head Of Arab League Pushes Nuke Programs (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

KHARTOUM, Sudan (AP) -- The head of the Arab League called on Arab states Tuesday to work toward "entering the nuclear club" by developing atomic energy -- a new concern for a Western world already trying to rein in Iran's nuclear ambitions and fretting about a possible Mideast arms race.

Amr Moussa's comments came as a surprise at a troubled Arab League summit meant to tackle crises ranging from Iraq to the Palestinian peace process.

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan warned Arab leaders that the Mideast faces one of its most critical periods.

"You are meeting today here while the whole Arab world and the region is witnessing turmoil," Annan said in a statement read by an envoy.

But Arab leaders seemed unlikely to take serious action. In private sessions before the summit, Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari castigated Arab governments, saying their promises at the summit to help Iraq were "rhetoric."

The summit has already been undermined by low attendance. Ten heads of state from the league's 22 members stayed away, most notably Egypt's president and Saudi Arabia's king -- two regional heavyweights and top U.S. allies.

Moussa spoke to the gathered leaders at the opening of the summit, saying, "I would like to call on the Arab world to enter into the world of peaceful use of nuclear energy with all speed and momentum."

"This is a legal right ensured for all states that are party to the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty," he said.

No Arab country is known to have a significant program for nuclear energy, and few have shown a drive to do so.

DOJ_NMG_0023354

But Moussa's call was likely to cause concern in the United States and Europe, which are pressing for U.N. Security Council action on Iran's nuclear program. Washington accuses Iran of seeking to develop nuclear weapons, an accusation Tehran denies, saying it seeks only to generate electricity.

The issue of Iran has divided Arab leaders.

Countries close to Iran, including Kuwait and the United Arab Emirates, have expressed concern over its program, focussing on safety issues and the threat of a possible regional arms race. Moussa, an Egyptian, quarreled publicly with the Emirates' foreign minister after he urged Gulf leaders to focus on Israel, not Iran.

Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir accused the West of double standards on the nuclear issue.

"This is an issue which should not be a subject of discrimination. For the international community to be honest, Israel should be pushed to sign the Nonproliferation Treaty and open its nuclear installations for inspection," he said in a speech to the summit Tuesday.

The issue of Iran's standoff with the West was on the agenda for the summit, but the political turmoil and violence in Iraq and the issue of how to deal with a new Hamas-led Palestinian government loomed larger.

The annual Arab summits regularly conclude with resolutions that often fail to yield concrete action. This year, though, leaders received messages asking them to be assertive.

Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan, whose country is not a member of the league but who was invited as a guest, encouraged the leaders to make democratic changes, respect human rights and accept accountability.

"After that, our efforts to maintain peace and security will be more effective," he told them.

Among the resolutions agreed upon is one that promises help for Iraq and to eventually open embassies there, a top demand of the Baghdad government.

But Iraq's Zebari dismissed the resolutions as "rhetoric" and told his Arab counterparts to deal realistically with Iraq, according to Arab diplomats who participated in the private discussions Sunday.

"You should learn from the mistakes of Saddam Hussein," he said when some of the ministers pressed for a more anti-Western stance in the summit resolutions, according to the diplomats, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the meeting was private.

When the ministers complained about his comments, Zebari retorted with an Iraqi proverb: "Ask an experienced man, not just a learned one."

Arabs Urged To Enter Nuke Club (WT/AP)

By Tanalee Smith, Associated Press

The Washington Times, March 29, 2006

KHARTOUM, Sudan -- Arab League Secretary General Amr Moussa called on Arab leaders yesterday to move toward a goal of "entering the nuclear club" and making use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes.

The absence of at least 10 heads of state, including President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt and Saudi Arabia's King Abdullah, raised concerns of a lackluster summit in a year in which many had hoped to see serious efforts at dealing with regional troubles.

The 22-member Arab League is contending with complex issues involving Iraq's future and how to deal with a Hamas-led government in the Palestinian territories.

The U.S. State Department has urged Arab leaders to "be as supportive as possible of the new Iraqi government" by sending ambassadors and providing economic assistance to Baghdad.

For their part, Arab governments -- already suspicious of non-Arab Iran -- have been irritated by plans for talks on Iraq between Iranian and U.S. officials.

Mr. Moussa was particularly emphatic about Iraq in his address.

"Any solution for the Iraqi problem cannot be reached without Arabs, and Arab participation," he said. "Any result of consultations without Arab participation will be considered insufficient and will not lead to a solution."

Mr. Moussa called on Arabs "to enter into the nuclear club and make use of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes," a plea that comes as the world is wary about Iran's nuclear ambitions.

DOJ_NMG_0023355

In his opening speech, Algerian President Abdelaziz Bouteflika, host of last year's summit, called on Iraqis to close ranks to avoid a sectarian conflict pitting the country's Shi'ite majority against the once-dominant Sunni Arab minority.

Iraq's neighbors, he said, should "honestly cooperate with the Iraqi people to preserve the country's integrity and unity."

Summit host, Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir, used his opening speech to praise Palestinian elections and denounce Israel and Western countries that have threatened to cut off aid in response to the victory of the militant Hamas.

"We say no to robbing the Palestinian people of their democratic choice, no to punishing the Palestinian people for exercising their right to choose who rules, and no to succumbing to Israel's violations of all the promises it made," he said, winning the applause of the audience of heads of state and delegates.

Hamas' landslide election victory in January has raised fears of a halt in the Mideast peace process. Yesterday, in Gaza City, Hamas moved a step closer to taking power, winning overwhelming parliamentary approval -- 71-36 -- for its 25-member Cabinet.

The United States and European Union have threatened to cut direct financial aid vital to keeping the Palestinian Authority running, and Washington has pressed its Arab allies to follow suit.

However, a resolution to be adopted by the leaders meeting in Khartoum will pledge continued Arab funding for the Palestinian Authority.

'The Last Helicopter' (WSJ)

By Amir Taheri

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

Hassan Abbasi has a dream -- a helicopter doing an arabesque in cloudy skies to avoid being shot at from the ground. On board are the last of the "fleeing Americans," forced out of the Dar al-Islam (The Abode of Islam) by "the Army of Muhammad." Presented by his friends as "The Dr. Kissinger of Islam," Mr. Abbasi is "professor of strategy" at the Islamic Republic's Revolutionary Guard Corps University and, according to Tehran sources, the principal foreign policy voice in President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's new radical administration.

For the past several weeks Mr. Abbasi has been addressing crowds of Guard and Baseej Mustadafin (Mobilization of the Dispossessed) officers in Tehran with a simple theme: The U.S. does not have the stomach for a long conflict and will soon revert to its traditional policy of "running away," leaving Afghanistan and Iraq, indeed the whole of the Middle East, to be reshaped by Iran and its regional allies.

To hear Mr. Abbasi tell it the entire recent history of the U.S. could be narrated with the help of the image of "the last helicopter." It was that image in Saigon that concluded the Vietnam War under Gerald Ford. Jimmy Carter had five helicopters fleeing from the Iranian desert, leaving behind the charred corpses of eight American soldiers. Under Ronald Reagan the helicopters carried the bodies of 241 Marines murdered in their sleep in a Hezbollah suicide attack. Under the first President Bush, the helicopter flew from Safwan, in southern Iraq, with Gen. Norman Schwarzkopf aboard, leaving behind Saddam Hussein's generals, who could not believe why they had been allowed live to fight their domestic foes, and America, another day. Bill Clinton's helicopter was a Black Hawk, downed in Mogadishu and delivering 16 American soldiers into the hands of a murderous crowd.

According to this theory, President George W. Bush is an "aberration," a leader out of sync with his nation's character and no more than a brief nightmare for those who oppose the creation of an "American Middle East." Messrs. Abbasi and Ahmadinejad have concluded that there will be no helicopter as long as George W. Bush is in the White House. But they believe that whoever succeeds him, Democrat or Republican, will revive the helicopter image to extricate the U.S. from a complex situation that few Americans appear to understand.

Mr. Ahmadinejad's defiant rhetoric is based on a strategy known in Middle Eastern capitals as "waiting Bush out." "We are sure the U.S. will return to saner policies," says Manuchehr Motakki, Iran's new Foreign Minister.

Mr. Ahmadinejad believes that the world is heading for a clash of civilizations with the Middle East as the main battlefield. In that clash Iran will lead the Muslim world against the "Crusader-Zionist camp" led by America. Mr. Bush might have led the U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0023356

into "a brief moment of triumph." But the U.S. is a "sunset" (ofuli) power while Iran is a sunrise (tolu'ee) one and, once Mr. Bush is gone, a future president would admit defeat and order a retreat as all of Mr. Bush's predecessors have done since Jimmy Carter.

Mr. Ahmadinejad also notes that Iran has just "reached the Mediterranean" thanks to its strong presence in Iraq, Syria, Lebanon and the Palestinian territories. He used that message to convince Syrian President Bashar al-Assad to adopt a defiant position vis-à-vis the U.N. investigation of the murder of Rafiq Hariri, a former prime minister of Lebanon. His argument was that once Mr. Bush is gone, the U.N., too, will revert to its traditional lethargy. "They can pass resolutions until they are blue in the face," Mr. Ahmadinejad told a gathering of Hezbollah, Hamas and other radical Arab leaders in Tehran last month.

According to sources in Tehran and Damascus, Mr. Assad had pondered the option of "doing a Gadhafi" by toning down his regime's anti-American posture. Since last February, however, he has revived Syria's militant rhetoric and dismissed those who advocated a rapprochement with Washington. Iran has rewarded him with a set of cut-price oil, soft loans and grants totaling $1.2 billion. In response Syria has increased its support for terrorists going to fight in Iraq and revived its network of agents in Lebanon, in a bid to frustrate that country's democratic ambitions.

It is not only in Tehran and Damascus that the game of "waiting Bush out" is played with determination. In recent visits to several regional capitals, this writer was struck by the popularity of this new game from Islamabad to Rabat. The general assumption is that Mr. Bush's plan to help democratize the heartland of Islam is fading under an avalanche of partisan attacks inside the U.S. The effect of this assumption can be witnessed everywhere.

In Pakistan, Pervez Musharraf has shelved his plan, forged under pressure from Washington, to foster a popular front to fight terrorism by lifting restrictions against the country's major political parties and allowing their exiled leaders to return. There is every indication that next year's elections will be choreographed to prevent the emergence of an effective opposition. In Afghanistan, Hamid Karzai, arguably the most pro-American leader in the region, is cautiously shaping his post-Bush strategy by courting Tehran and playing the Pushtun ethnic card against his rivals.

In Turkey, the "moderate" Islamist government of Recep Tayyip Erdogan is slowly but surely putting the democratization process into reverse gear. With the post-Bush era in mind, Mr. Erdogan has started a purge of the judiciary and a transfer of religious endowments to sections of the private sector controlled by his party's supporters. There are fears that next year's general election would not take place on a level playing field.

Even in Iraq the sentiment that the U.S. will not remain as committed as it has been under Mr. Bush is producing strange results. While Shiite politicians are rushing to Tehran to seek a reinsurance policy, some Sunni leaders are having second thoughts about their decision to join the democratization process. "What happens after Bush?" demands Salih al-Mutlak, a rising star of Iraqi Sunni leaders. The Iraqi Kurds have clearly decided to slow down all measures that would bind them closer to the Iraqi state. Again, they claim that they have to "take precautions in case the Americans run away."

There are more signs that the initial excitement created by Mr. Bush's democratization project may be on the wane. Saudi Arabia has put its national dialogue program on hold and has decided to focus on economic rather than political reform. In Bahrain, too, the political reform machine has been put into rear-gear, while in Qatar all talk of a new democratic constitution to set up a constitutional monarchy has subsided. In Jordan the security services are making a spectacular comeback, putting an end to a brief moment of hopes for reform. As for Egypt, Hosni Mubarak has decided to indefinitely postpone local elections, a clear sign that the Bush-inspired scenario is in trouble. Tunisia and Morocco, too, have joined the game by stopping much-advertised reform projects while Islamist radicals are regrouping and testing the waters at all levels.

But how valid is the assumption that Mr. Bush is an aberration and that his successor will "run away"? It was to find answers that this writer spent several days in the U.S., especially Washington and New York, meeting ordinary Americans and senior leaders, including potential presidential candidates from both parties. While Mr. Bush's approval ratings, now in free fall, and the increasingly bitter American debate on Iraq may lend some credence to the "helicopter" theory, I found no evidence that anyone in the American leadership elite supported a cut-and-run strategy.

The reason was that almost all realized that the 9/11 attacks have changed the way most Americans see the world and their own place in it. Running away from Saigon, the Iranian desert, Beirut, Safwan and Mogadishu was not hard to sell to the average American, because he was sure that the story would end there; the enemies left behind would not pursue their campaign within the U.S. itself. The enemies that America is now facing in the jihadist archipelago, however, are dedicated to the destruction of the U.S. as the world knows it today.

DOJ_NMG_0023357

Those who have based their strategy on waiting Mr. Bush out may find to their cost that they have, once again, misread not only American politics but the realities of a world far more complex than it was even a decade ago. Mr. Bush may be a uniquely decisive, some might say reckless, leader. But a visitor to the U.S. soon finds out that he represents the American mood much more than the polls suggest.

Mr. Taheri is author of "L'Irak: Le Dessous Des Cartes" (Editions Complexe, 2002).

Olmert Declares Victory In Israeli Elections (USAT)

By Matthew Gutman And Jeffrey Stinson

USA Today, March 29, 2006

JERUSALEM — Acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, who campaigned on a pledge to relinquish control of most of the West Bank after 39 years of Israeli occupation, declared victory in Israel's parliamentary elections Tuesday.

"In the coming period, we will move to set the final borders of the state of Israel, a Jewish state with a Jewish majority," he said. "We will try to achieve this in an agreement with the Palestinians."

Israel's Central Election Commission reported Olmert's centrist Kadima Party as the front-runner.

Based on near-final results, Kadima appeared likely to capture enough of the 120 parliamentary seats to name Olmert prime minister.

Election officials said the total vote count would not be completed until Friday, the Associated Press reported.

No party in Israel's history has won the 61 seats needed to govern by itself. As a result, the party with the most seats has had to form a coalition government.

Olmert has said he would welcome any party that supports his West Bank withdrawal plan.

The center-left Labor Party led by fiery union leader Amir Peretz, which was in second place, is a likely coalition partner. Labor has said it would also support a unilateral withdrawal. The conservative Likud Party, led by former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu, was far behind Labor, according to the election commission.

Olmert, 60, the mayor of Jerusalem from 1993 to 2003, assumed the leadership of Israel's government after Prime Minister Ariel Sharon was felled by a stroke Jan. 4.

Sharon, a former general who founded the Kadima Party in November, remains hospitalized in a coma. Olmert portrayed himself during the campaign as Sharon's natural successor.

Olmert has promised that within four years he would dismantle far-flung Jewish settlements, consolidate larger ones and return most of the West Bank to the overwhelmingly Arab Palestinian population.

The withdrawal plan would largely follow the 400-mile-long security barrier that Israel is building to protect itself from suicide bombers. The barrier would mark Israel's eastern border.

Olmert's plan follows the course undertaken by Sharon, who ordered the pullout of Israeli troops and about 9,500 settlers from Gaza and parts of the West Bank in August. Olmert said he would withdraw unilaterally if he was unable to negotiate territory with the Palestinians.

Negotiations appear increasingly unlikely following the Jan. 25 election of the militant group Hamas in Palestinian elections. Israel refuses to deal with a Hamas-led government unless the group recognizes Israel's right to exist, renounces violence against Israel and adheres to previous agreements made between Israel and the Palestinians.

The Hamas government, which was confirmed by the Palestinian parliament Tuesday, has refused to do that.

"This is an historical election," said Gidi Greenstein, president of Re'ut, a think tank in Tel Aviv. Greenstein said the election results herald the emergence of a "very pragmatic Israeli center" that reflects an electorate that is tired of the conflict with the Palestinians.

The roughly 5 million eligible voters had 31 political parties to pick from to fill 120 seats in the Israeli Knesset, or parliament.

DOJ_NMG_0023358

"We have no doubt that the Likud suffered a hard blow," Netanyahu told his party activists, according to AP. He blamed Sharon, who bolted from Likud to form Kadima, for leaving behind "a broken and shattered party."

Despite the historic issues that dominated the campaign, the turnout of 63% was the lowest ever for Israeli parliamentary elections, according to the election commission. The elections were Israel's sixth since 1992, and there was no dominant charismatic political figure in the race.

Sari Amoyal, 28, of Jerusalem didn't vote, preferring to sip coffee with a friend. "It doesn't matter whether I vote," she said. "The Israeli leaders aren't such a catch. Every leader seems to have the same program for peace."

One of those who did vote was Batya Yom Tov, 88, of Tel Aviv. She said she voted for the "sake of this country, for the future of my grandchildren."

Yom Tov, who said she has voted in every election since Israel's independence in 1948, said she voted for Kadima. She said she wants to see Israel out of the occupied territories. "Kadima was the only choice," she said.

Voters In Israel Support Parties Vowing Pullout (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger And Greg Myre

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

JERUSALEM, Wednesday, March 29 — Israelis voted Tuesday to bring to power a new centrist party, Kadima, which is committed to a further pullout from the occupied West Bank.

Kadima's leader, Ehud Olmert, will become prime minister, but his support proved tepid and he will find it harder than expected to impose his agenda on a larger coalition.

Kadima, founded in November by Ariel Sharon when he broke with the Likud Party, won the most seats in the 120-member Knesset, or Parliament. But with 99.7 percent of the vote counted Wednesday morning, Kadima is expected to win only 28 seats, fewer than voter polls had suggested.

At the same time, Israelis turned away from the right, and Mr. Olmert should be able to carry out his plan for another withdrawal, unilaterally if necessary, from the West Bank to reduce the costs of the continuing occupation.

The Labor Party, which supports a West Bank withdrawal, was second, with 20 seats, giving it a strong position to bargain with Kadima for a powerful role in a coalition government. The Labor leader, the Moroccan-born Amir Peretz, is expected to insist on key ministries like finance, social welfare and possibly defense.

A big surprise of the election was the far-right Russian-oriented Israel Beiteinu Party led by Avigdor Lieberman, which benefited from Likud's implosion and which took Russian votes that would have gone to Mr. Sharon. The party won 12 seats, one less than the religious Shas Party.

The voters repudiated Likud and its leader, former Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who warned against any new withdrawal as a victory for Palestinian terrorism. The party won only 11 seats and found itself once again on the fringes of Israeli politics after decades of being at the heart of things.

Before speaking to his supporters early Wednesday morning, Mr. Olmert, 60, went to the Western Wall to pray. He praised Mr. Sharon, who has been comatose since an extensive stroke in January, as "the man who had the courage, the strength, the will and the determination to see things differently and to create change."

Mr. Olmert then declared: "In the coming period, we will move to set the final borders of the State of Israel, a Jewish state with a Jewish majority." He said he would "work to do this through negotiations, in an agreement with the Palestinians."

Then, addressing the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, who was in Ramallah, Mr. Olmert said: "We are prepared to compromise, give up parts of our beloved land of Israel, remove, painfully, Jews who live there, to allow you the conditions to achieve your hopes and to live in a state in peace and quiet."

Mr. Olmert urged Palestinians, too, to recognize Israel, "to accept only part of their dream, to stop terror, to accept democracy and accept compromise and peace with us. We are prepared for this. We want this." If not, he said, Israel would act in its own interests, whether the world agreed or not. "The time has come to act," he said.

But a Palestinian Authority run by the radical Islamic group Hamas, which does not recognize Israel's right to exist, is not expected to become a peace partner any time soon.

DOJ_NMG_0023359

The other big surprise in the election was a protest vote, much of it from first-time voters, who gave the Pensioners Party, devoted to better rights for the elderly, seven seats and a likely role in government. The Pensioners seem likely to support Mr. Olmert's withdrawal plan.

Mr. Olmert will have to form a broader coalition than he had hoped, to achieve a working majority of 61 seats. The final shape of the coalition may not be clear for weeks, with most analysts suggesting that Mr. Olmert would join with Labor, the Pensioners and one or two religious parties, United Torah Judaism, with 6 seats, and Shas, with 13, to try to form a compact but stable government with the needed 61 seats.

Mr. Olmert might also try to take in Mr. Lieberman's Israel Beiteinu Party if it promises to support a West Bank withdrawal. If Mr. Netanyahu is pushed from Likud's leadership by the former foreign minister, Silvan Shalom, Likud could also be a partner if it too agreed to the pullback.

Mr. Olmert is not nearly as strong as he would like. But the new Parliament is diffuse, and the right wing opposed to withdrawal does not have enough votes to block it.

Mr. Olmert says his aim in the next four years will be to set Israel's borders with the Palestinians, unilaterally if necessary, and called the election a referendum on his intentions. But with Kadima's smaller total, he may find it necessary to have a national referendum on the issue — something Mr. Sharon always rejected — in order to carry it out with less protest, or even violence.

Palestinians fired its first Katyusha rocket from the Gaza Strip into Israel on Tuesday, according to the army. A spokesman said that the 122-millimeter shell struck near a kibbutz but caused no damage.

But the Katyusha has a range of up to 12 miles, about twice that of the makeshift Qassam rockets frequently aimed at Israel.

The voter turnout, though high by American standards, was a low for Israel: about 63.2 percent, compared with 67.8 percent in 2003. The lower figure hurt the larger parties, because it reduces the number of votes required for small parties to pass the threshold of 2 percent of the vote required to get seats.

Kadima was established by Prime Minister Sharon last November when he broke with the Likud Party, and he brought some of Likud's best politicians with him, along with the former Labor Party leader, Shimon Peres.

But Mr. Sharon's severe stroke on Jan. 4 put a pall on the campaign, and Mr. Olmert and his team, including his new deputy, Tzipi Livni, the foreign minister, faced the prospect of the party's collapse.

Mr. Netanyahu, leading the remnants of Likud, called Mr. Olmert's new pullout plan dangerous, especially after the victory of the radical Islamic group Hamas in the Palestinian legislative elections on Jan. 25. But Mr. Netanyahu appeared to get little traction with the public.

Kadima was also aided by the success of the army in preventing a spate of suicide bombings during the long campaign. Such attacks helped Mr. Netanyahu defeat Mr. Peres in 1996.

Mr. Sharon argued that Israel, in the absence of serious peace talks with the Palestinians, could move unilaterally to establish its own borders, largely defined by the separation barrier the army built to protect the country from suicide bombers.

But the route of the unfinished barrier also incorporates about 8 percent of the occupied West Bank and most of East Jerusalem, including a large majority of Israeli settlers, leading Palestinians to call it a land grab.

One major test of the new government will come from Hamas, considered a terrorist organization by the Israel, the United States and the European Union.

On Tuesday, election day in Israel, the Palestinian parliament voted to confirm the new Hamas government, led by Ismail Haniya, in a vote of 71 to 36. There were two abstentions.

Hamas has refused to meet American and European demands that it recognize Israel, forswear violence and accept previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements based on the idea of two states living side-by-side. President Abbas has also demanded that Hamas meet at least the last two demands, but he has agreed not to try to block the party from taking office.

Still, once the Hamas cabinet is sworn in, which could take place on Wednesday, the Palestinian Authority faces a cutoff of needed financial and development aid, though emergency aid will continue.

DOJ_NMG_0023360

Mr. Haniya, whose group has carried out dozens of suicide bombings in Israel over the past decade, said in a speech that the Palestinians were entitled to continue their armed fight for independence. "We were born from the womb of resistance, we will protect resistance and the arm of resistance will not be touched," he said.

Sharon's Party Is Winner In Israel (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

JERUSALEM, March 28 -- The Kadima party led by acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert won the most seats in Israel's parliamentary elections Tuesday, in a vote that hinged on his plan to draw the country's final borders through unilateral withdrawals from the Palestinian territories.

But the election, which drew one of the lowest voter turnouts in Israeli history, left Kadima with an uncertain mandate to move ahead with a program that once appeared to have clear support from Israelis.

With virtually all of the votes counted, Kadima, the centrist party that Ariel Sharon founded four months ago after evacuating Israeli settlers from the Gaza Strip, had won 28 seats in the 120-seat Knesset, Israel's parliament. Sharon remains in a coma after suffering a massive stroke in January, and Kadima's projected strength had slipped a dozen seats in pre-election opinion polls since then.

"It is up to us, all of us, to put a new stamp on the life of Israel," Olmert said to cheering supporters in a post-election call for unity.

Kadima did not win even half of the 61 seats necessary for a parliamentary majority, ensuring that Olmert will have to enlist other parties to form a coalition government. The most likely partner is the Labor Party under former union leader Amir Peretz, which finished second with 20 seats. Peretz expanded the founding Zionist movement's base in a campaign that emphasized raising the minimum wage, improving social services and pursuing negotiations with the Palestinians to end the conflict. The ultra-Orthodox Shas party finished third with 13 seats.

The results also signaled a dramatic shift within the political wing most opposed to leaving the Palestinian territories, a group now highly fragmented among sectarian, secular and religious-nationalist parties.

The Likud Party, led by former prime minister Binyamin Netanyahu, dropped further than any previous governing party, finishing in fifth place with 11 seats. Sharon led Likud to victory in the past two elections. But he left the party, long the primary sponsor of Israel's settlement movement, in November after alienating its base with his Gaza evacuation.

"The Likud has been dealt a heavy blow, the second that we have absorbed since the former head of the party left and left behind a broken, shattered movement," Netanyahu said to supporters. "We will rehabilitate our movement. We will continue on our path. We will cling to it."

The party Israel Is Our Home finished with 12 seats, making it the largest nationalist faction. The party is led by Avigdor Lieberman, an immigrant from Moldova who proposes redrawing Israel's border to exclude roughly 150,000 of the Jewish state's Arab citizens. His message attracted Israel's large bloc of Russian-speaking voters, who have traditionally supported Sharon.

"This is just the beginning of the future fight for Israel," Lieberman said to supporters. "I am proud that we have just become the largest party in the nationalist camp, and I am certain that next time we will be the ruling party."

Only 63.2 percent of Israel's roughly 5 million eligible voters cast ballots after a low-energy campaign that belied the pressing questions facing the next government. The next prime minister must determine Israel's new relationship with the Palestinian Authority, now led by the radical Islamic group Hamas, and decide how to proceed on matters of peace.

Olmert, a 60-year-old lawyer and former Jerusalem mayor, outlined plans to withdraw from scattered West Bank settlements and draw Israel's border roughly along the line of the separation barrier due to be completed next year. Jerusalem and the largest settlement blocs would remain in Israel's hands under Olmert's plan, which he said he intends to carry out before the end of his four-year term.

Under Sharon, Kadima was initially projected to win roughly 40 Knesset seats, a figure that spiked slightly after his stroke. Kadima activists were uncertain how to respond to Tuesday's results, and some focused on Likud's dismal showing rather than their party's less-than-overwhelming finish.

DOJ_NMG_0023361

To build his coalition, Olmert could turn to Labor, Shas and the other ultra-Orthodox party, United Torah Judaism, the dovish Meretz and the surprising Pensioners Party, which won seven seats on the issue of improving state retirement benefits. The combination would give him a broad government of more than 70 seats.

"The extremists in Israeli politics have lost today -- Likud, Netanyahu have been sent deep into the opposition," said Lior Chorev, a Kadima political strategist. "We have a duty to secure the state of Israel. This is the legacy of Sharon."

Many Israelis turned out to vote on Olmert's strategy, which he told supporters he would pursue only if he determines that negotiations with the Palestinians are not possible. He told supporters that "there is no substitute for a peace agreement."

"We will never turn our backs on our desire for those locations that were the cradle of our culture and where the dearest memories of our people exist," Olmert said in a passage of his speech that he addressed to the Palestinians. "But understanding the reality and understanding the circumstances, we are willing to compromise and give up part of the beloved land of Israel in which our best sons and fighters are buried, and to evacuate with great pain Jews who live there in order to create a reality for you, so you can achieve your dream and live side by side with us in a state of your own, in peace and quiet."

In the West Bank settlement of Efrat, south of Jerusalem, residents filed into a small elementary school to reject future Israeli withdrawals from the territories.

Although Efrat would remain part of Israel under Olmert's emerging blueprint, voters such as Yehuda David, 70, cast ballots for the National Union, a coalition of nationalist-religious parties that is now the chief advocate of the settlement movement. The party finished with nine seats.

"There is an uncertainty here because of all the statements we've been hearing," said David, a retired Interior Ministry official who has lived in the hillside settlement since its creation in 1983. "We've been told our bloc would not be returned. But we don't know. We can't trust them."

Kadima's showing means that for the first time in Israel's 58-year history neither Labor nor Likud will form the next government, culminating a political realignment set off by the Gaza evacuation that analysts here called "the big bang."

Sharon argued that Israel must act alone to draw its final borders in a way that would separate a Jewish majority from the Arab population of the West Bank and Gaza. In forming Kadima, Sharon brought along a number of Likud leaders, including Olmert, as well as some from Labor. Among them was Shimon Peres, the Nobel Peace laureate who left after losing Labor's leadership to Peretz.

"The monumental choices this election was supposed to be about were actually decided beforehand," said Yaron Ezrahi, a Hebrew University political science professor. "This election came to be a measure of confirmation of this choice."

Party officials and analysts say more than 1 million voters -- about 20 percent of the electorate -- may have backed new parties this year.

Among those that benefited from the drift was the new Pensioners Party, led by Rafi Eitan, a former Mossad agent. But with his strong showing, Lieberman will likely challenge Netanyahu for the position of opposition leader in the next Knesset. The Arab bloc won 10 seats.

In the Israeli city of Bet Shemesh, more than a dozen activists from Labor, Likud, Shas and other parties swarmed voters at a polling station inside a community gymnasium.

Eliyahu Ben-Lulu, 51, said he voted for Shas because he is "a believing Jew." In some previous elections, Ben-Lulu was able to vote for a Likud prime minister and Shas members of parliament. But in this election, and the last one, voters were allowed to select only a single party list.

"I saw no other possibility," said Ben-Lulu, who used to work in a factory making munitions for Israeli military aircraft. "If I have to choose between a political and a religious way, I always choose my belief."

Taxis plastered with Kadima posters sped through the streets near the polling station.

"Olmert will continue the way of Sharon," said Mordechai Edri, 38, a gardener in Bet Shemesh who voted for Likud in the last election and Kadima in this one. "I didn't like the games Netanyahu played during the disengagement from Gaza -- supporting Sharon, opposing Sharon. And economically he went too far to the right."

Israel's Centrist Kadima Wins Elections (FT)

DOJ_NMG_0023362

By Harvey Morris And Sharmila Devi

Financial Times, March 29, 2006

Israel's centrist Kadima on Tuesday night declared victory in the Israeli elections, claiming a mandate for Ehud Olmert's plan to fix the country's borders in the next four years after strategic withdrawals from the West Bank.

Despite a narrower-than-expected margin for the centrist party founded by the ailing Ariel Sharon only five months ago, a crushing defeat for the mainstream right left Kadima with no shortage of potential allies to help push through the plan.

With 99.7 per cent of votes counted, the party now led by Mr Olmert, acting prime minister, had secured 28 seats in the 120-member Knesset. Amir Peretz's Labour party, a likely coalition partner, looked set to finish second with 20 seats, at the higher end of opinion poll expectations. Calling for national unity, Mr Olmert told his party: "We have to start a new page by uniting the nation, to make peace among ourselves and then with our neighbours."

The big shock was a virtual meltdown of support for the former ruling Likud party, which looked likely to be pushed into fourth place by Yisrael Beitenu, a predominantly Russian immigrant party headed by Avigdor Lieberman which appeared to have won 12 seats.

There was speculation that a poor 11-seat showing by Benjamin Netanyahu's rightwing Likud could spell the end of the party or at least the end of its leader's political career despite his pledge last night to stay on."

Leaders of Mr Peretz's Labour said the party's showing, which might put him in line for a senior coalition cabinet post, was a victory for his social agenda to defend the poor.

The other surprise was that the newly created Pensioners' party, which could back Mr Olmert, apparently won seven seats. He might also call on the ultra-Orthodox Shas party, which should clinch 13 seats, to take his coalition above a 61-seat target.

Final results were likely to confirm Israel's shift to the centre in a political realignment analysts have dubbed the Big Bang, sparked by Mr Sharon's defection from the rightwing Likud last year. But with a turnout of 63.3 per cent, the lowest in an Israeli general election, the outcome also reflected uncertainty after decades of more clear-cut left-right politics.

Kadima Wins Israel Election; Coalition Is Needed (WSJ)

By Bill Spindle

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

The Kadima Party won Israel's national elections, but the party will have to form a coalition with other parties, perhaps forcing Kadima Party head Ehud Olmert to slow or modify his drive to unilaterally set Israel's borders.

In an election with lower turnout than any other in Israeli history, with 99.7% of the polling stations counted Mr. Olmert's Kadima Party was winning 28 seats in the 120-seat Knesset, Israel's parliament. The Labor Party, headed by Amir Peretz, was finishing second with 20 seats. Likud, the conservative party led by Benjamin Netanyahu, appeared to have won 11 seats.

For Kadima, a party formed by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon before he suffered a stroke in January, it was a remarkable debut. The party, which lured members from both the left-wing Labor Party and the right-wing Likud, reshaped Israel's political landscape during the election. Kadima didn't garner the 42 or so seats that some early polls showed its support might win.

That would have given Mr. Olmert, who will become prime minister, an extraordinarily strong hand. But Labor, which focused on Israel's economic problems and the poor, surged in the final weeks of the campaign, along with several other smaller parties. Israel Beitenu, a party led by a charismatic Russian immigrant, appeared to become the country's third-largest parliamentary bloc, winning about 14 seats with a platform that consisted largely of advocating moving Arabs out of Israel. Party chairman Avigdor Lieberman drew much of his support from the one million immigrants from the former Soviet Union who want a leader with a strong stand of security issues.

Likud, which has dominated Israeli politics recently under the leadership of Mr. Sharon, turned out to be the big loser in Kadima's successful opening run. It won 38 seats in Israel's last election in 2003 and controlled the government until recently.

Voters gave Mr. Olmert, who is Israel's acting prime minister, a green light on his plan for the Palestinian territories. Mr. Olmert offered to negotiate with Palestinians under certain circumstances over borders in his acceptance speech, but he has said Israel would move to establish Israel's borders within his four-year term even if no Palestinian negotiating partner emerges. That plan is controversial because it flies in the face of decades of Middle East peacemaking, which has envisioned mutually negotiated borders between Israeli and Palestinian states. Mr. Olmert has also made clear his plans include closing many West Bank Jewish settlements, though he has vowed to keep the biggest for Israel. Reacting to projections showing a Kadima Party victory, Hamas said it would resist the party's platform.

DOJ_NMG_0023363

Mr. Olmert needs a coalition of more than 60 seats to move forward, and to achieve that he will have to cut deals with other parties. That could require softening his plan or putting more emphasis on some other areas of policy, such as bolstering the country's welfare programs as Mr. Peretz would like to do, in order to win over partners for his government.

The election's turnout was the lowest in Israeli history with 63.3% of Israelis voting, reflecting a growing disenchantment with the candidates. That compares to 67% in the 2003 election.

Olmert Claims Victory In Israeli Election (AP)

By Ravi Nessman

AP, March 29, 2006

Acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert declared victory for his centrist Kadima party in Israel's elections Tuesday, vowing to act on his own if necessary to draw Israel's final borders and "painfully" uproot Jewish settlers if negotiations with the Palestinians are not possible.

Standing below a massive portrait of his mentor Ariel Sharon, Olmert addressed chanting Kadima members as it became clear the party had won enough seats in parliament to form a ruling coalition.

Building on the vision of Sharon, who formed the party shortly before succumbing to a devastating stroke that left him in a coma, Olmert claimed a mandate to withdraw from much of the West Bank and set Israel's borders, which he has said he will do by 2010.

With 99.7 percent of polling stations accounted for, Kadima was winning 28 of 120 seats in parliament, the Election Commission reported early Wednesday.

The turnout was the lowest in Israel's history, and the results showed voters turning away from conventional political parties to an assortment of third parties with agendas ranging from pensioner rights to the legalization of marijuana. The aftermath will likely be a period of difficult negotiations between Olmert and potential coalition partners.

"Today, Israeli democracy has spoken its piece, in a loud and clear voice," Olmert declared. "Israel wants Kadima," which means forward in Hebrew.

Labor leader Amirt Peretz and Likud chief Benjamin Netanyahu called Olmert to congratulate him, as did British Prime Minister Tony Blair.

Olmert said he was ready for new peace talks and was prepared to make painful compromises such as uprooting some Jewish settlements in the West Bank and allowing Palestinians to have a state. But he demanded that the Palestinians be willing to compromise in return.

"In the coming period, we will move to set the final borders of the state of Israel, a Jewish state with a Jewish majority," Olmert said. "We will try to achieve this in an agreement with the Palestinians."

Olmert has said he would govern only with parties that accept his program, and projections showed a center-left coalition capturing 61 to 65 seats in the 120-member parliament. The hawkish parties fell far short of their plan to win enough seats to block Olmert's program.

As Israel held its election, the Palestinian parliament approved a new Cabinet led by the Hamas militant group. Incoming Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh told Al-Jazeera television that he opposed Olmert's plan. "Such a plan definitely won't be accepted by the Palestinian people or the Palestinian government," he said.

Allies of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, a moderate from the Fatah Party, called for immediately renewing talks on the internationally backed "road map" peace plan under the auspices of the Palestine Liberation Organization, which he heads.

Olmert has said he supports the road map but will not wait indefinitely for a peace deal and would move unilaterally after a reasonable period of time.

Turning to the Palestinians, Olmert said: "We are prepared to compromise, give up parts of our beloved land of Israel, remove, painfully, Jews who live there, to allow you the conditions to achieve your hopes and to live in a state in peace and quiet."

DOJ_NMG_0023364

"The time has come for the Palestinians ... to relate to the existence of the state of Israel, to accept only part of their dream, to stop terror, to accept democracy and accept compromise and peace with us," he said.

Israeli officials have ruled out talks with Hamas unless the Islamic group renounces violence and accepts Israel's right to exist, demands Hamas has so far rejected. It remains unclear whether Olmert would negotiate with Abbas without a change in Hamas' position.

The leader of the largest party is traditionally asked first to try to form a ruling coalition. Whether Olmert chooses to form a government with dovish parties or more hardline factions could determine his ability to carry out his plan. With the results early Wednesday, Labor was winning 20 seats and Likud 11.

Olmert could form a coalition with Labor, the dovish Meretz and the party that advocates pensions for retirees, or he could add the ultra-Orthodox Shas or United Torah Judaism parties to his government.

Olmert, the vice prime minister and former mayor of Jerusalem, took over the party after Sharon suffered a devastating Jan. 4 stroke and immediately became the favorite to win the elections. Much of Kadima's campaign was built around Sharon, Israel's most popular politician, and his legacy resonated with many voters.

"It was important for me to vote, to continue the way of Sharon," said Rina Golan, 65, who voted for Kadima.

But Sharon had been much more circumspect than Olmert about his post-election plans. He never spoke of drawing final borders, and said there would not be an additional unilateral pullout in the West Bank.

Labor's total represented a strong showing by new party leader Peretz, who ran on a social platform advocating a higher minimum wage and guaranteed pensions for the elderly.

"The Labor Party has regained its credibility," said Labor lawmaker Colette Avital.

Likud, which had dominated Israeli politics for decades, was crushed, appearing to capture less than a third of the 38 seats it won in the last election. Netanyahu, the former prime minister and current party head, warned that further unilateral withdrawals would bring Hamas closer to Israel.

"We have no doubt that the Likud suffered a hard blow," Netanyahu told his party activists. He blamed Sharon, who bolted Likud to form Kadima, for leaving behind "a broken and shattered party."

A strong majority of voters turned away from Likud and Labor, the only two parties that have ever ruled Israel, to vote for the new Kadima and fringe parties. Though other attempts to create a strong centrist party in Israel have failed, analysts said Sharon's personal popularity gave Kadima its edge.

Two marginal parties posted strong showings.

The pensioners' party appeared to be the surprise protest vote of the election, taking seven seats. The party, headed by former Mossad spymaster Rafi Eitan, who oversaw a sensational espionage operation against the U.S. in the 1980s, was not represented in the last parliament. Kadima said the party was a natural coalition partner for Olmert.

The Shas party was projected to get 13 seats.

Elections officials said that even after 100 percent of the polling stations are accounted for, they would still have to count the votes of soldiers and Israelis who voted in locations other than their home stations, like invalids and election workers — so the total vote count would not be completed until Friday.

The record low voter turnout, 63.2 percent, was attributed partly to Kadima's dominance during the campaign. But the apathy was also a reflection of Israelis' disillusionment with rampant government corruption and veteran politicians' switching parties, which many saw as purely opportunistic.

Centrist Kadima Party Comes Out Ahead In Israeli Elections (KRT)

By Dion Nissenbaum And Michael Matza

Knight Ridder, March 28, 2006

JERUSALEM - Israel moved tentatively toward a new era of pragmatic politics in Tuesday's parliamentary elections by tepidly endorsing a strategic policy shift aimed at defining the Jewish nation's nebulous borders without talking peace with the Palestinians.

DOJ_NMG_0023365

Voters gave Israel's newest political party, Kadima, a smaller-than-expected plurality, but they nevertheless positioned it to build a coalition government that would formally absorb some contested Palestinian territory while giving up large swaths of the West Bank - and the dream of controlling currently occupied biblical land.

"This is a tectonic shift in the Israeli political system," said Gidi Grinstein, a onetime aide to former Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak who now runs the Re'ut Institute think tank in Tel Aviv.

While the election was billed as a referendum on Israel's national security options, voters appeared to be swayed more by bread-and-butter social issues closer to home: crime, retirement security, the minimum wage and government corruption.

Exit polls showed Kadima, the breakaway party founded by ailing Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, winning only 30 of the Israeli parliament's 120 seats, compared with projections of up to 40 seats at the start of the election campaign.

Acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, who took over as Kadima's leader in January after Sharon suffered a debilitating stroke, said during the campaign that winning fewer than 36 seats would be a disappointment.

In the waning days of the race, voters slipped away from Kadima and threw more support behind a spectrum of parties that focused largely on social issues. Labor, which focused on economic issues, won the second-largest number of seats, with 20 to 22. And in one of the biggest surprises of the race, a one-issue party committed to pension reform won as many as eight seats, according to exit polls.

Voters also soundly rejected the long-dominant Likud Party, which Sharon fled last year to form Kadima.

Likud, headed by former Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, barely broke double digits with an estimated 11 seats and fell behind the surging right-of-center Yisrael Beitenu party, which made crime and corruption main planks of its platform.

In the coming weeks, Kadima will try to build a governing coalition around the central tenet of its platform: shuttering smaller Israeli settlements in the occupied West Bank in exchange for international blessings to annex major Jewish communities closer to Jerusalem.

In his victory speech, Olmert said Israel was prepared to make painful concessions to reach peace with the Palestinians, and he called on their leaders to do the same. But Olmert signaled that he would move quickly to enact his unilateral plan. "We will not wait forever," he said. "The time has come to act."

While voters made it more challenging for Olmert to lead the effort, Grinstein said the results showed that Israel was ready to change direction.

"Across the spectrum the debate is no longer whether to do territorial compromise. It is no longer a debate on if, it's a debate on how," he said.

The Israeli daily newspaper Ma'ariv made the same point Tuesday by framing the election as the historic demise of "two shattered dreams":

"On the one hand, the shattered dream of the greater Land of Israel and of retaining the settlements for all of eternity and, on the other hand, the shattered dream of a final peace settlement between Israel and the Palestinians, an End-of-Time peace."

During the sleepy campaign, which left many Israelis uninspired, Olmert outlined plans to absorb the biggest Jewish settlements, which house about two-thirds of the Israelis living in the West Bank. The remaining 60,000 Jewish settlers in the West Bank would be removed and most of the land would be turned over to the Palestinians. Olmert still wants to keep the Israeli military in the West Bank valley between Israel and Jordan as a buffer against any potential threats from the east.

Hopes dimmed for resurrecting peace talks in January when the Islamist militant group Hamas - which refuses to accept Israel's right to exist - won control of the Palestinian government.

Kadima has said that it would give Hamas six months to a year to meet international demands that could pave the way for talks to resume.

If there's no movement, Kadima plans to move ahead with the West Bank pullout plan.

While the strategy mirrors last summer's successful shutdown of all 21 Israeli settlements in the Gaza Strip, this proposal likely will be more challenging.

While few Israelis felt an historic tie to the narrow Gaza Strip on the Mediterranean coast, many Jews feel emotionally bound to the West Bank, which is home to the tomb of the Jewish patriarch Abraham and other biblical sites.

DOJ_NMG_0023366

Many Jews who followed their nation's appeals to settle in the West Bank did so out of fiercely ideological and religious beliefs, and persuading them to leave could prove difficult.

The plan also faces long-term challenges. Even some of its supporters concede that a West Bank pullout won't lead to lasting peace. At best, they say, it will buy Israel a few years of relative stability that could lead to new peace talks - if and when the Hamas-led Palestinian government either moderates or is replaced.

Voter apathy resulted in a record-low turnout in Tuesday's election. Many voters were undecided heading to the polls.

In the upscale Germany Colony section of Jerusalem, Kinneret Gruber, 29, a mental health worker who traditionally has voted for Israel's small niche parties, was undecided up to the very last minute. But once in the voting booth she chose a Kadima slip.

The factor that tipped the balance, she said, was her desire for another round of settlement withdrawals.

"I wanted Olmert to win because of his West Bank pullout program," she said, "but I didn't know if I would be able to vote for him. He's very intelligent, but his personality is a bit arrogant."

Husband and wife Rachel and Nir Topper, both in their early 30s, were traditional supporters of the secular-left Meretz party. But much to their own surprise they found themselves drawn to Kadima.

"At the moment what the country needs is a strong center. We have enough parties on the margins. Kadima has some seriously competent people, and if they do everything they say they'll do, I will be happy," Rachel said.

Rabbi Amy Klein, 43, said she voted for Labor, hoping to make it the biggest partner in a Kadima-Labor-Meretz coalition.

"People are tired. They want the conflict to end, whether through a negotiated settlement or a unilateral withdrawal," she said.

Olmert, Kadima Party Emerge Victorious In Election (LAT)

By Laura King And Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, March 29, 2006

JERUSALEM -- Israelis set their country on course toward relinquishing dozens of settlements in the West Bank Tuesday, voting heavily for parties that favor further withdrawals from Palestinian territories.

The centrist Kadima Party founded last year by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon will have the largest number of parliamentary seats, just under 30, according to early returns. The showing was weaker than pre-election surveys had forecast, but still enough to make Sharon's deputy, Ehud Olmert, the next prime minister.

"We have to create a new chapter in the life of the state of Israel," Olmert told cheering, flag-waving supporters at his party headquarters early Wednesday. "In the coming period, we will move to set the final borders of the state of Israel, a Jewish state with a Jewish majority," he said.

He paid emotional tribute to Sharon, felled by a devastating stroke in January, calling him "even now, our prime minister."

In a stronger-than-expected second place was the left-leaning Labor Party, with which Olmert will likely seek to form a coalition. The night's most stunning defeat was dealt to the once-dominant Likud Party, whose leadership was taken up by former Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu after Sharon abandoned it last fall. The early returns showed Likud falling into fourth place.

The election was characterized by ennui and indecisiveness -- producing the lowest voter turnout ever -- 63.2 percent. Yet the vote, the fifth national ballot in a decade, was dominated by issues that will literally shape the country.

In the run-up to the election, Olmert made explicit the withdrawal plans that Sharon had kept vague. As a result, the election became, in effect, a test of his policy of unilaterally setting the nation's borders -- the clearest ballot in the nation's history on whether Israelis are willing to let go of land that many Jews regard as part of their biblical inheritance.

"Olmert did what Sharon would not have done on the eve of elections: he told the voters what he intends to do if they elect him," the country's premier political commentator, Nahum Barnea, wrote in Tuesday's editions of the Yediot Aharonot daily. "He turned these elections into a referendum on the future of Judea and Samaria" -- the biblical term for the West Bank.

Many observers considered the election a watershed in that voters chose a path yet untried by either Likud or Labor, which for decades have traded power in successive Israeli governments.

DOJ_NMG_0023367

The vote was "no longer a competition between the traditional left and the traditional right," said Shlomo Avineri, a professor at Hebrew University. "Each offered their own solutions for the conflict with the Palestinians, and each of their strategies have so far failed."

If carried through, Olmert's plan would "converge" Israel's West Bank settlements into a few large blocks lying relatively close to the 1967 armistice lines. That would uproot dozens of settlements -- a process that could be far more violent and contentious than Israel's exit from the Gaza Strip last summer, which the 78-year-old Sharon, the one-time godfather of the settlements, pushed through as his last major political act.

Addressing the Palestinians, Olmert said in his speech that "we are prepared to compromise, give up parts of our beloved land of Israel, remove, painfully, Jews who live there, to allow you the conditions to achieve your hopes and to live in a state in peace and quiet."

He said he hoped to accomplish that goal through negotiations, but would act unilaterally if necessary. That idea is strongly opposed by the Palestinians, who argue that boundaries can only be set by negotiation. Olmert has said he will not negotiate with a Palestinian government controlled by Hamas, the Islamist group, which refuses to recognizes Israel's right to exist.

As Israelis voted Tuesday, the Hamas-dominated parliament approved their proposed Cabinet, which is dominated by figures from the Islamist group. Some of the Hamas lawmakers cried out "God is great!" when the 71-36 vote was tallied.

The new Palestinian government could be sworn in as early as Wednesday, setting the stage for confrontation not only with Israel but with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. Abbas has urged Hamas to renounce its stated aim of Israel's destruction.

In Israel's entire history, no party has ever won an outright majority in the Knesset. This election was no different, so the 60-year-old Olmert, who was Sharon's longtime confidant and deputy, must turn to the complex task of building a stable governing coalition -- a difficult undertaking in Israel's traditionally fractious and combative political environment.

Labor's showing will increase its leverage in those coalition talks, which could last for several weeks. Jubilant scenes erupted at Labor headquarters when televised projections gave it up to 22 seats in the 120-member Knesset. The party's neophyte leader, Amir Peretz, had waged an energetic campaign calling for more social benefits for the poor and elderly and peace talks with the Palestinians.

By contrast, Netanyahu -- whose excellent English and command of television sound bites made him among the Israeli leaders best known in America -- could be at the end of his political career.

In a defiant speech at Likud headquarters, Netanyahu offered no sign of stepping aside. "We will see better days," he told supporters, some of them teary-eyed.

Likud appears to have lost votes not only to Kadima, but to another right-wing party led by a one-time Netanyahu protege, Avigdor Lieberman. Lieberman, an immigrant from Moldova who had strong appeal to fellow immigrants from the former Soviet Union, advocates swapping Arab-populated areas inside Israel for Jewish-settled areas of the West Bank. His party, Yisrael Beiteinu, and Likud would both end up with roughly 12 seats, early returns indicated.

(Begin optional trim)

Significantly, the combined strength of Likud, and other rightist parties leave them far short of a "blocking majority" in the Knesset.

"The right wing lost big time," said Reuven Hazan, a political scientist at Hebrew University.

(End optional trim)

Although the bulk of the attention was focused on the big parties, 31 political groupings contested the vote. In the Israeli parliamentary system, small parties can wield outsized clout in coalition-building.

One of the election's big surprises was the Pensioners' Party, winning at least half a dozen seats on what was effectively a single-issue campaign of increased benefits for retirees. The party swiftly declared support for withdrawals from the West Bank, making it a potential coalition partner.

Olmert is considered likeliest to ally himself with Labor, the leftist Meretz and perhaps the religious party Shas, whose constituency is mainly Orthodox Jews of Middle Eastern descent. He already has said that any governing partners must hew to his disengagement plans.

DOJ_NMG_0023368

But the unilateralism envisioned by Olmert could be moderated by Labor, which advocates a negotiated accord leading to Palestinian statehood.

Olmert Claims Election Victory (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, March 29, 2006

TEL AVIV -- Acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert declared victory last night for his centrist Kadima party in Israel's elections, vowing to act on his own if necessary to draw Israel's final borders and "painfully" uproot Jewish settlers if negotiations with the Palestinians are not possible.

But a weaker-than-expected showing could undermine his ability to push for new territorial concessions by Israel in the West Bank.

With more than 95 percent of the vote counted, the newly formed party won 28 seats in the 120-member Knesset, Israel's parliament. Labor was the second-largest bloc, with 20 seats; the Likud won 11 seats.

If the final results stand, they would leave Mr. Olmert dependent on a potentially unstable constellation of smaller parties to hold together a coalition.

For the first time in Israel's history, a party other than Labor or Likud will lead the government. Kadima, founded in late November after Prime Minister Sharon resigned from the ruling Likud Party over internal opposition to the withdrawal from the Gaza Strip, turned yesterday's vote into a referendum on the party's vow to fix Israel's final borders within four years, either by peace negotiations or unilaterally.

Mr. Sharon's defection proved devastating for the Likud and its new chairman, Benjamin Netanyahu. The party was projected to win 10 to 12 seats, about one-fourth the number won in elections three years ago.

The preliminary results suggested that Mr. Olmert's government could not be blocked by any alliance of right-wing parties, virtually all of whom have pledged to stand in the way of his proposal to evacuate unilaterally most Jewish settlements in the West Bank.

Mr. Olmert, who took over after Mr. Sharon suffered a massive stroke in January, began his victory speech by thanking the ailing prime minister.

Mr. Sharon's shadow hung over the campaign even though he remains in deep coma.

The new leader of Israel quickly turned to his goal of creating a final border with the Palestinians, and vowed that Israel would abandon its preference of peace negotiations in favor of unilateral actions if necessary.

In an appeal to Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, Mr. Olmert suggested that he would be ready for negotiations but warned that Palestinians needed to prepare for compromise.

"During thousands of years, we planted the dream of greater Israel in our hearts ... but in recognition of the reality, we are ready to compromise, and concede parts of the beloved land of Israel," Mr. Olmert said, "and evacuate with much sadness Jews living there to create the conditions that will allow you to achieve your dreams and build alongside us a state of your own."

In a jab at the newly elected Hamas government, Mr. Olmert said: "It's about time that the Palestinian public and its leaders adjust their dreams to a reality of the existence of the state of Israel as a Jewish state alongside them. It's time the Palestinian Authority resigns itself, just like us, to achieving only part of its dreams."

Voter turnout was at 57 percent, confirming widespread apathy amid an election campaign that was described as anemic and lackluster. The weak turnout was thought to have hurt Kadima -- which had been forecast to get as many as 39 seats a few weeks ago -- while strengthening smaller, niche parties with higher levels of voter loyalty.

"Ehud Olmert can't say that 'I got the mandate that I wanted,' " said Israeli political commentator Ben Caspit.

Led by Amir Peretz, a populist former union boss, Labor placed socioeconomic issues such as raising the minimum wage on par with questions of peace and security. In remarks that had the ring of a victory speech, Mr. Peretz promised to make good on policies aimed at helping Israel's poor and working class.

"We are going to create a new society," he said. "Today, the work is only starting."

DOJ_NMG_0023369

After ruling for most of the past three decades, Likud finished the campaign in disarray and blamed the press, the left and itself.

"The Likud has absorbed a huge blow," said Mr. Netanyahu in his concession speech.

Yisrael Beiteinu, a party combining Russian immigrants and right-wing hard-liners, finished with 12 to 14 seats, a surprise showing. Avigdor Lieberman, the chairman who has suggested ceding Israeli Arab towns to the Palestinians, said in a victory speech that he aspires to become the new leader of the Israeli nationalist political alliance.

The shocker of the elections was the Pensioner party, which won at least five seats, according to exit polls. It could be an important part of a coalition, analysts said.

Egypt Leader To Urge Israel On Peace Talks (AP)

By Nadia Abou El-magd

AP, March 29, 2006

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak said he will encourage the newly elected Israeli government to resume negotiations with Palestinians, warning that unilateral moves "won't achieve peace."

In an interview published in Wednesday's edition of Al-Mussawar magazine, the Egyptian leader also called on Israel to "stop besieging" the Palestinians economically and targeting their leaders.

Acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert declared victory in Israeli elections Tuesday, saying he will seek negotiations with the Palestinians but act on his own if necessary to draw final borders.

Before the election, the Israeli government had refused to deal with the incoming Palestinian government, led by the Islamic militant group Hamas.

Mubarak said he was waiting for the Israelis to form a new government before he contacts them to urge a resumption of the peace process.

Given the Israeli reluctance to deal with Hamas, Mubarak said the new government could negotiate with "the Palestinians that are represented by the Palestinian Liberation Organization and supervised by its leader Abu Mazen," as Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas is known.

The moderate Abbas favors peace negotiations with Israel while Hamas refuses to recognize Israel or renounce the use of violence against the Jewish state.

Mubarak urged Hamas to honor existing agreements with Israel. Hamas has refused to recognize the agreements, regarding them as conferring recognition on Israel.

Mubarak said Israel should stop "besieging Palestinians economically and not retain Palestinian customs revenue, which will subject Palestinians to more economic crises and, in turn, encourage more violence."

Mubarak also insisted Israel should "stop its military operations against the Palestinians and chasing their leaders." Although Israel and militant Palestinian groups declared an informal cease-fire early last year, Israel has continued to launch airstrikes against leaders of the Islamic Jihad group in particular.

Turning to other regional problems, Mubarak warned in the interview that any attempt to attack Iran's nuclear facilities would destabilize the Middle East and increase terrorism across the world.

He also said attempts to replace U.S. troops in Iraq with soldiers from Arab or Muslim-majority countries would not succeed because many of those countries don't want to be involved and Iraqis do not want any foreign interference in their country.

Hamas-Led Cabinet Is Approved (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

JERUSALEM, March 28 -- The Palestinian parliament on Tuesday endorsed a new cabinet led by Hamas, a political triumph for the radical Islamic movement that must now confront the myriad problems plaguing the Palestinian Authority.

The cabinet, headed by Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh and filled out by Hamas officials and independents allied with the organization, was approved by 71 legislators, most of them from Hamas and the radical Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine. Leading Hamas figures will run the powerful Interior, Foreign and Finance ministries, as well as the influential portfolios of Higher Education and Health.

DOJ_NMG_0023370

Not a single lawmaker from Fatah, the secular nationalist movement that Hamas ousted in the Jan. 25 parliamentary elections, voted for the cabinet.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, known commonly as Abu Mazen, had demanded that Hamas recognize Israel and endorse a two-state solution to the conflict before it assumed control of the 24 ministries. International donors have also demanded that Hamas accept those conditions or risk an end to the aid that the Palestinian Authority relies on to function.

But Hamas leaders have rejected those appeals. Saeb Erekat, a Fatah legislator, said Hamas's failure to agree to the conditions has created "one authority with two palaces, which is a grave development."

"I hope Mr. Haniyeh will act like the prime minister for all the Palestinians and not just Hamas," Erekat said. "I hope he will learn while in office the importance of accepting Abu Mazen's plan or risk international isolation that can only hurt the Palestinian people."

The vote marks the start of a political contest between Abbas and Hamas, whose leaders have no governing experience above the local level. Abbas declined to block Hamas's cabinet to give the party a chance to govern the territories on its own or suffer the political consequences if it fails, according to sources close to him.

Hamas won its parliamentary majority in part because of its reputation for effective local governance. But Abbas believes the party will fare no better than his Fatah movement in controlling Palestinian militias, improving the economy or easing the hardships of the Israeli occupation.

A source close to Abbas said the president hopes to "erode the reputation of Hamas" and perhaps win its agreement for new parliamentary elections in six months.

Hamas, formally known as the Islamic Resistance Movement, is designated a terrorist organization by the United States and the European Union for the armed campaign it has waged against Israel. While refusing to recognize Israel, Hamas leaders have said they would accept a long-term truce if Israel left the land it occupied in the 1967 Middle East war, released Palestinian prisoners and recognized the right of Palestinian refugees to return to property inside what is now the Jewish state.

Haniyeh said in a speech before the legislature this week that he would be willing to talk with the United States about ending the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. U.S. officials rejected the proposal.

"Regrettably, the U.S. administration is always hasty in making its decision and reaffirms its bias toward Israel and against the Palestinian people," Haniyeh told reporters Tuesday at the parliament building in the Gaza Strip.

Palestinian Parliament OKs Hamas Cabinet (AP)

By Sarah El Deeb

AP, March 29, 2006

The Islamic militant Hamas moved a step closer Tuesday to taking power, winning overwhelming parliamentary approval for its 25-member Cabinet.

The parliament met as Israelis voted in a historic election billed as a referendum on the future of the West Bank. Incoming Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh said he opposes plans by the Israeli front-runner, acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, to draw the country's final borders by 2010.

However, Haniyeh toned down Hamas' militant ideology, saying he was not interested in perpetuating the cycle of violence with Israel. Hamas has killed hundreds of Israelis in suicide attacks in recent years, but has largely stuck to a truce for the past year.

"We're not calling for conflict or the continuation of the bloodbath in this region. We are a government that looks out for the interests of the Palestinian people," Haniyeh said.

But even as the Cabinet was approved, Gaza militants for the first time fired a Katyusha rocket into Israel, the Israeli army said. The launching of the Katyusha, which has twice the range of the Palestinians' homemade Qassam rockets and is deadlier, raised fears that rocket fire could reach the southern Israeli city of Ashkelon.

DOJ_NMG_0023371

The militant group Islamic Jihad claimed responsibility and said the rocket attack, which caused no injuries, was timed to coincide with Israel's election. Israeli security officials said the rocket apparently was smuggled into Gaza from Egypt.

In Gaza City, Hamas lawmakers broke into chants of "God is great" after parliament voted 71-36, with two abstentions, to approve the new lineup. Palestinian legislators swarmed Haniyeh to congratulate him. After the vote, Haniyeh went to the house of Sheik Ahmed Yassin, the Hamas founder assassinated by Israel in 2004, to pray with other Hamas leaders.

On Tuesday evening, thousands of cheering and whistling Hamas supporters gathered at the parliament building in Gaza to celebrate the vote as Haniyeh stood on a balcony above and threw candy at the crowd.

"While elections are taking place in the Israeli entity, here the flags of the government of Hamas and the government of the Palestinians are rising high," he told the cheering crowd.

The new Cabinet is to be sworn in by Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas later this week.

Olmert has refused to deal with Hamas' incoming Cabinet and in his victory speech Tuesday night, he appealed to the Palestinians to accept a scaled-back dream as Israel has — as quickly as possible.

If they don't, "Israel will take its fate into its own hands," he said. "The time has come to act."

Haniyeh said he opposed Olmert's plan to draw Israel's final borders, with or without negotiations with the Palestinians. Olmert wants to withdraw from large parts of the West Bank and dismantle dozens of small Jewish settlements, but annex the large settlement blocs.

"We said from the beginning that any Israeli step that will impose facts on the ground or undermine Palestinian rights, such as creating so-called temporary borders, is rejected and unacceptable policy," Haniyeh said.

Hamas is listed as a terror group by the United States and European Union, and Western countries have threatened to cut off aid to the cash-strapped Palestinian Authority once Hamas takes over.

Marc Otte, the European Union's special envoy to the Middle East, said the EU would only work with a Palestinian government that "agrees to the platform of peace."

The new Cabinet includes 20 Hamas members and five independents. Twelve ministers are from Gaza and 13 from the West Bank. One is a woman and one a Coptic Christian. Nine are engineers and the rest have university degrees in other fields. Fourteen have spent time in Israeli prisons.

The Gaza session was hooked up via video link to a simultaneous session in the West Bank city of Ramallah, where members of the incoming Cabinet lined up to receive congratulatory kisses from lawmakers. An Israeli travel ban between Gaza and the West Bank prevents the whole legislature from meeting in one place.

Haniyeh said he intends to push for an independent Palestinian state with its capital in Jerusalem and the right of Palestinian refugees to return to their homes in what is now Israel.

Those demands are far more moderate than Hamas' traditional call to replace Israel with an Islamic state. However, the group, which won Jan. 25 elections in a landslide, has stopped far short of accepting demands by the international community to renounce violence and recognize Israel's right to exist.

Haniyeh said the new government planned a tour of Arab countries "to secure aid for the Palestinian people and the government and the authority."

Bush May Refuse To Meet Nigerian President (AP-Y2)

By George Gedda

AP2, March 29, 2006

The White House suggested Tuesday that President Bush might refuse to meet with Nigerian President Olesegun Obasanjo this week if answers are not forthcoming about the disappearance of indicted former Liberian President Charles Taylor.

Taylor has been indicted by a U.N. tribunal on charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity while in office.

He has been living in Nigeria under an agreement that helped end Liberia's civil war in 2003. Last week, Nigeria's government agreed reluctantly to surrender him to stand before a U.N. tribunal, but Nigerian officials said Tuesday that Taylor had vanished.

DOJ_NMG_0023372

Bush is scheduled to meet with Obasanjo on Wednesday in the Oval Office. Asked Tuesday whether the meeting was still on, White House press secretary Scott McClellan said, "Right now, we're looking for answers from the Nigerian government about the whereabouts of Charles Taylor."

On Capitol Hill, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told senators it would be a matter of "utmost seriousness" if reports of Taylor's escape are true.

Sen. Patrick Leahy (news, bio, voting record), D-Vt., said it would be inappropriate for Bush to receive Obasanjo under the circumstances. Rice, testifying before a Senate Appropriations Committee hearing, did not respond to Leahy's comment.

The charges against Taylor included aiding and directing a Sierra Leone rebel movement and trading guns and gems with the insurgents.

Taylor also has been accused of starting civil war in Liberia and of harboring al-Qaida suicide bombers who attacked U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania in 1998, killing 12 Americans and more than 200 Africans.

The United States, the United Nations and others have demanded that Taylor be handed over to the international war crimes tribunal in Sierra Leone.

Nigeria's government agreed last week to hand him over to Liberia, which almost certainly would have transferred him to Sierra Leone for trial.

McClellan directed questions about Taylor's whereabouts to Nigerian officials and refused to speculate about whether somebody within the Nigerian government was involved in Taylor's disappearance.

"It is the responsibility of the Nigerian government to see that he is conveyed to the special court in Sierra Leone," he said. "We expect the government of Nigeria to fulfill this commitment."

The State Department said there was deep concern about reports that Taylor had fled. Deputy spokesman Adam Ereli told reporters that U.S. officials are in contact with the government of Nigeria to determine Taylor's whereabouts.

Even though the Nigerian government has acknowledged Taylor's disappearance in a statement, Ereli said the United States was seeking final confirmation from Nigerian leaders.

US Raps Nigeria As Liberian Warlord Vanishes (FT)

By Dino Mahtani And Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, March 29, 2006

The Bush administration last night was considering cancelling a White House meeting scheduled for today with Olusegun Obasanjo, the Nigerian president, following the disappearance of Charles Taylor, the former Liberian president wanted for war crimes who had been given asylum in Nigeria.

A White House spokesman said the US was waiting to hear back from Nigeria on the whereabouts of Mr Taylor. Officials said Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state, would meet Mr Obasanjo but a meeting with President George W. Bush was in doubt.

The officials expressed dismay that Mr Taylor had vanished after Washington had delivered a strong message that Nigeria was responsible for handing him over for trial by a special UN-backed court in Sierra Leone for his role in the civil war there. Liberia's newly elected president, Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf, who visited the White House last week, had called for him to face justice.

Ms Rice called Mr Obasanjo on Friday to reinforce that message, a US official said.

Members of Congress were outraged that Nigeria had apparently let him slip away on Monday, just two days after it had complicatedthe situation by suggesting that Liberian officials should come and collect Mr Taylor.

"Nigeria reportedly has let a mass murderer with alleged links to al-Qaeda slip out the back door," declared Ed Royce, a California Republican, calling on Mr Bush to call off the meeting. Mr Royce warned of "serious sanctions" by Congress for any country that gave sanctuary to Mr Taylor who is seen as a serious threat to regional security.

Mr Taylor, who won elections in Liberia in 1997, was given asylum in Nigeria in 2003. African leaders and western governments brokered the deal to stop further bloodshed and end 14 years of war that had killed some 250,000 people.

Since Mr Taylor's arrival in his seaside villa in the Nigerian city of Calabar there have been allegations by prosecutors and investigators that he was breaking the terms of his asylum by arranging secret meetings and meddling in Liberian politics.

In 1985 Mr Taylor escaped from a US prison while awaiting extradition to Liberia on corruption charges.

DOJ_NMG_0023373

Security around his residence was reportedly lax during the days after Mrs Johnson-Sirleaf's request. Court prosecutors in Sierra Leone had made a request for Nigerian officials to arrest Mr Taylor. Nigeria said it would set up a panel to investigate his disappearance

"His disappearance could mean higher tensions in Liberia in the short term, but there are a lot of people who would rather see Taylor dead than alive, and everything that's happened is pointing more in that direction," said Mike Mc Govern, West Africa project manager of the International Crisis Group.

The Least Surprising Jailbreak Ever (NYT)

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

Charles Taylor, the Liberian warlord and former president, has disappeared from his Nigerian haven, just days after President Olusegun Obasanjo agreed to turn him over to a war crimes tribunal. The disappearance is a diplomatic disaster for Mr. Obasanjo, who is scheduled to meet with President Bush today. We hope it doesn't turn into something worse for West Africa.

The conflicts linked to Mr. Taylor from 1989 to 2003 cost an estimated 500,000 lives and spawned a generation of child soldiers. He supported rebels in Sierra Leone and Ivory Coast who hacked off the limbs of civilians; he received diamonds in return, which he used to finance fighting in Liberia. Mr. Obasanjo did West Africa a favor in 2003 when he took in Mr. Taylor, ending Liberia's civil war.

For years, Nigeria had resisted the idea of handing over Mr. Taylor, saying it would give him only to an elected Liberian government. When Liberia's newly elected president, Ellen Johnson Sirleaf, requested this month that Mr. Taylor be turned over to a war crimes tribunal in Sierra Leone, Nigeria replied that Liberia was free to take him.

Nigerian security forces let Mr. Taylor slip through their fingers on the same day that a State Department spokesman said it was Nigeria's responsibility to see that Mr. Taylor was arrested and sent to Sierra Leone.

It's hard to believe the Nigerians did much to stop him. A reporter with Agence France-Presse who recently visited Mr. Taylor at his plush villa in the southeastern city of Calabar saw no sign of any Nigerian security on the way in, and only one policeman on the way out.

Once, in an earlier incarnation, Mr. Taylor sawed his way out of a county jail in Boston and used a knotted sheet to climb to freedom. If ever there was a disappearance that could be predicted, this was it. Let's hope that Mr. Obasanjo's carelessness doesn't lead to a return of Taylor-style ethnic fighting in West Africa. That is something no one can afford — including the Nigerian president, whose country has had some sectarian and ethnic clashes of its own lately.

A War Criminal Escapes (WP)

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

ON MONDAY one of the world's most dangerous and despicable war criminals, Charles Taylor, escaped just as he was about to be brought to justice for his actions. His crimes include the incitement of wars in four West African countries; the enslavement, rape or dismemberment of thousands of children; and collaboration with al Qaeda. His freedom threatens the fragile stability of Liberia and its democratically elected president, Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf, as well as of Sierre Leone, Guinea and Ivory Coast.

The man responsible for this catastrophe, Nigerian President Olusegun Obasanjo, has an appointment at the White House today with President Bush. If the meeting goes forward, he deserves the frostiest of receptions. Under the guise of protective custody, Mr. Obasanjo shielded Mr. Taylor from justice and allowed him to continue meddling in West African affairs for more than two years. Now, having run out of excuses for refusing to turn him over to an international tribunal, the Nigerian has allowed Mr. Taylor to flee from the seaside villa where he was being held. Mr. Bush, who hosted Ms. Johnson-Sirleaf just two weeks ago, should tell Mr. Obasanjo that the United States will hold him personally accountable for Mr. Taylor's recapture.

Some prodding is clearly needed. Most governments would declare a national manhunt and consider sealing the borders if someone as dangerous as Charles Taylor were on the loose. Mr. Obasanjo's reaction was to issue a statement yesterday, many hours after the war criminal's escape Monday night, announcing his "disappearance" and the formation of a commission to investigate. It has two weeks to report back; perhaps Mr. Obasanjo believes that during that time any controversy will blow over.

DOJ_NMG_0023374

But as long as Mr. Taylor is free, years of efforts by the United Nations, the United States, European governments and Nigeria itself to stabilize West Africa will be at risk. It's not hard to foresee the warlord appearing at the head of yet another ragtag army, composed of drugged or brutalized children, in one of the several countries he has terrorized in the past decade.

Even if Mr. Taylor is soon captured, Mr. Obasanjo will merit some reevaluation. Though democratically elected, the two-term president may be seeking to transform himself into one of Africa's Big Men; he has done nothing to stop allies who are trying to change Nigeria's constitution so that he can remain in office. His offer of refuge to Mr. Taylor in late 2003 may have prevented a bloody end to a rebellion against his criminal regime in Monrovia. But when the Nigerian was asked to turn Mr. Taylor over to the U.N. tribunal in Sierre Leone, he produced a string of increasingly implausible excuses. First he said he would act only at the request of a democratic Liberian government. When Ms. Johnson-Sirleaf courageously made that request, he insisted that Liberians take custody of Mr. Taylor, even though he was to be moved from Nigeria to Sierra Leone.

Over the weekend Liberian and tribunal officials publicly pleaded with Mr. Obasanjo to arrest Mr. Taylor, warning that he would seek to escape. Mr. Obasanjo took no action. Perhaps he can't accept the idea that an African leader, even one as vile as Mr. Taylor, would be held accountable for his crimes. But if Mr. Taylor's escape leads to the murder, rape and dismemberment of more innocent Africans, their blood will be on Mr. Obasanjo's hands.

Taylor Said To Vanish In Nigeria (WP)

By Craig Timberg

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

LAGOS, Nigeria, March 28 -- Former Liberian president Charles Taylor has vanished from a guarded government compound in southeastern Nigeria, authorities reported Tuesday, just days after an announcement by officials here opened the way for his transfer to an international war crimes tribunal.

The whereabouts of Taylor, 58, who had lived in exile in Nigeria for 2 1/2 years, remained unknown by the end of the day. But it was clear his disappearance had scuttled plans for a quick turnover to a U.N.-backed tribunal in Sierra Leone. The court there has indicted him for war crimes and crimes against humanity, including mass rape and murder, stemming from a civil war in Sierra Leone that many blame him for fomenting.

Nigerian President Olusegun Obasanjo, who was due to meet President Bush in Washington on Wednesday, offered no immediate explanation for Taylor's disappearance, though Obasanjo convened a panel to investigate. A news release from his office said Taylor vanished on Monday night. A presidential spokeswoman said members of Taylor's Nigerian security detail had been arrested, according to the Associated Press.

News of the disappearance was greeted with alarm and anger by the special prosecutor in Sierra Leone, human rights groups and officials from the United States and the United Nations, all of whom had lobbied vigorously for Taylor to be turned over to the tribunal. Many officials had expressed fear that he might try to flee following Nigeria's announcement on Saturday that it would hand him over to Liberian custody.

"Today marks a step back on the road to accountability and justice. Charles Taylor is now an international fugitive," Desmond de Silva, special prosecutor at the Sierra Leone court, said in a statement. "For him now to disappear, on the eve of his transfer, is an affront to justice."

Separately, Scott McClellan, the White House press secretary, suggested Bush might not meet with the Nigerian president on Wednesday. "Right now, we're looking for answers from the Nigerian government about the whereabouts of Charles Taylor," McClellan told reporters. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said it was Nigeria's responsibility to hand over Taylor for prosecution, warning of "consequences" if that did not happen.

Rumors of Taylor sightings immediately spread through Nigeria, with some reports placing him at the airport in the seaport of Lagos. Others said he was with a police escort Monday night in Calabar, the riverfront city where he had been living in a lavish government complex since August 2003, following his departure from Liberia in the face of encroaching rebels.

It was unclear where Taylor might be heading, but he has purportedly amassed billions of dollars from a variety of business dealings, including illicit trade in diamonds, guns and timber.

DOJ_NMG_0023375

A coalition of Nigerian and international human rights groups issued a statement on Tuesday warning "that the disappearance of Mr. Taylor is capable of destabilizing the fragile peace in Liberia and reversing the gains of the just concluded transition to civil rule."

Obasanjo had long resisted pressure to turn over Taylor to a war crimes tribunal, maintaining that only a democratically elected government in Liberia could properly request his return. The country elected Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf in November, and she requested earlier this month that Taylor's asylum be terminated.

What followed was a contentious public debate over where Taylor should be taken. Obasanjo suggested Liberia, and his spokesman went so far as to say that Liberian authorities could enter Nigeria to arrest Taylor in Calabar. Johnson-Sirleaf pushed for direct transfer to Sierra Leone, home of the international court that indicted Taylor in June 2003, and where Taylor stoked a civil war that involved such brutal tactics as widespread use of child soldiers, sexual slavery and the chopping off of civilians' hands.

As the debate continued, de Silva urged Nigerian authorities to arrest Taylor immediately. That did not happen, leading some groups to charge that Obasanjo had aided in Taylor's disappearance, or at least failed to take steps to prevent it.

"There's absolutely no excuse for an indicted war criminal to be able to slip out in the middle of the night," said Corinne Dufka, a Human Rights Watch researcher, speaking from Dakar, Senegal. "It's just a disgrace."

David M. Crane, the former special prosecutor in Sierra Leone who issued the indictment against Taylor, said he believed Obasanjo allowed the former Liberian leader to flee in a bid to assuage other African leaders. Many were unhappy that Nigeria had given in to Western pressure against a head of state. Obasanjo "should be pilloried for this," Crane said by phone from Detroit, adding that Taylor's vanishing "is our worst nightmare."

The disappearance was not Taylor's first. He escaped a Boston jail in 1985 after being imprisoned on charges of embezzlement.

His past has many in West Africa worried that he may attempt to resume activity in the region. He is a close ally of the president of nearby Burkina Faso. He also reportedly has maintained ties with militant groups in Liberia and other countries.

When he left office in 2003, Taylor said, "God willing, I will be back."

Ex-warlord Escapes From Nigeria (CSM)

By Katharine Houreld

The Christian Science Monitor, March 29, 2006

LAGOS, NIGERIA - Nigerian President Olusegun Obasanjo's long-awaited trip to Washington Wednesday may be overshadowed by a controversy surrounding the whereabouts of another West African leader, former Liberian president Charles Tayor.

The Nigerian government confirmed that the ex-warlord Mr. Taylor - who was due to be handed over from Nigerian custody to the authorities at a war crimes court in Sierra Leone - had gone missing Tuesday, and said it had established a panel to "ascertain whether he escaped or was abducted."

Taylor's "spiritual advisor," Dr. Kilari Anand Paul, told the Monitor by telephone from the Ethiopian capital, Addis Ababa that Ethiopia is one of several countries he is lobbying to offer Taylor refuge. Mr. Paul said he is also trying to get Taylor into Libya, Venezuala, and Syria.

A UN-backed Special Court has charged Taylor with seventeen counts of crimes against humanity for backing rebel groups in Sierra Leone who tortured thousands of civilians during a struggle to control the country's diamond fields. No charges have yet been brought against him in his native Liberia, where he began a war that claimed up to a quarter of a million lives before he went into exile in Nigeria in 2003. At the request of a newly-elected Liberian President Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf, President Obasanjo agreed to transfer Taylor to Liberia custody last Saturday.

Mr. Obasanjo is likely to face "considerable criticism" from President Bush and members of Congress over the issue, according to Princeton Lyman, the director of the Africa program at the Council for Foreign Relations.

DOJ_NMG_0023376

"This is a grave situation. Secretary of State Condoleeza Rice has put a lot of emphasis on having Charles Taylor brought to justice," says Mr. Lyman. "There have already been worries that he might slip away and this suggests the Nigerians have not been nearly careful enough." Obasanjo's dilemma

The news comes at a time when the Nigerian President is already facing considerable criticism for refusing to rule out constitutional changes that would allow him to run for a third term. An insurgency in the oil-rich Niger Delta has also shut down a quarter of production in the fifth-largest supplier of crude to the United States.

"Obasanjo offered [Taylor] asylum and doesn't want to be seen as going back on his word, says Ayesha Kajee, of the South African Institute of International Affairs. "And in a sense one doesn't blame him. He probably feels Taylor was foisted on him - and now he's being forced to go back on his word to a fellow head of state."

This is particularly uncomfortable because of the lack of precedence for punishing former heads of state in Africa. "When you turn in a former peer, you immediately lay yourself open, firstly, to charges of overriding sovereignty, but also to the possibility that you might someday be in that boat, says Ms. Kajee. "And that's what many African heads of state fear more than anything." US pressure

The US is seen by analysts as the key force behind Ms. Johnson-Sirleaf's call for Taylor to be transferred to Sierra Leone, and the US push is two-fold. Taylor has such a bad reputation that many in Congress want him prosecuted. If Johnson-Sirleaf hadn't asked for Taylor to be sent to Sierra Leone, "There's a strong possibility that [the US] Congress would have voted against the aid Liberia so desperately needs to rebuild," says Kajee.

Also, the Bush administration may have its own self-interested motives: It's "keen to see quick prosecution of a globally recognized despot outside of the sphere of the International Criminal Court," which it opposes, says Kajee. "Then it would have legitimacy for saying that the prosecution of war criminals and those accused of crimes against humanity can take place outside the ICC." Destabilizing effect

Taylor's escape threatens to destabilize an already volatile region. "Not only is Taylor an indicted war criminal, he is associated with mayhem and murder throughout West Africa. Now that Taylor has gone missing on his watch, Obasanjo must redeem himself by conducting an immediate and vigorous search for and apprehend Taylor, who remains under a UN travel ban," says Corinne Dufka, the West Africa head of Human Rights Watch. "As a head of state and key player on the African continent, Mr. Obasanjo has a moral, political and legal responsibility to promote justice and stability in Africa, not undermine it."

Mike McGovern, the West Africa Project Director for the International Crisis Group, warns that despite the presence of 15,000 UN soldiers in Liberia, any delays in Taylor's trial will expose the new President, Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf, to possible retribution. "The Nigerian army is well trained, well funded, and they know what they are doing. If Taylor indeed disappeared, it is hard to believe that this was an accident," he says. "[This] gives pro-Taylor forces time to regroup and recruit."

Over 100,000 former fighters still roam the Liberian countryside. Now the escape of Taylor threatens even this fragile peace.

Nigeria Says Ex-President Of Liberia Has Disappeared (NYT)

By Lydia Polgreen

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

FREETOWN, Sierra Leone, March 28 — The former president of Liberia, Charles G. Taylor, vanished Monday night, two days after the Nigerian government said it would end his asylum and allow him to face an indictment by an international court here.

Mr. Taylor, the warlord-turned-president who unleashed a series of civil wars that engulfed much of West Africa in the 1990's, killing more than 300,000 people, disappeared from the seaside villa where he had been living in exile, according to a statement released Tuesday by Nigeria's government.

His sudden disappearance was a huge setback for the court, which is trying those suspected of atrocities in Sierra Leone's decade-long civil war, and a major embarrassment for the Nigerian president, Olusegun Obasanjo, just as he left for the United States to meet with President Bush. It was unclear late Tuesday whether Mr. Taylor fled to escape prosecution or had been abducted.

DOJ_NMG_0023377

"Taylor's disappearance is a disgrace," said Corinne Dufka, head of the West Africa office of Human Rights Watch, "not only for the victims for the brutal war in Sierra Leone, but also for efforts to establish the rule of law in West Africa."

Scott McClellan, the White House spokesman, said during a press briefing on Tuesday that Mr. Taylor's disappearance would not relieve the Nigerian government of its responsibility to turn him over to the special court in Sierra Leone. "We expect the government of Nigeria to fulfill this commitment," he said.

Kofi Annan, the United Nations secretary general, called on all countries in the region not to harbor Mr. Taylor, a United Nations spokesman said.

The news that the man who terrorized much of this region for more than two decades might be on the loose inspired dread, anger and awe. On the streets of Monrovia, Liberia's capital, rumors of a coup or an attack by Taylor supporters, several of whom hold seats in Liberia's newly elected Parliament, were rampant.

"Many people are frightened," said Cholo Brooks, a Liberian journalist, in a telephone interview from the capital. "They are worried he might cross over to Ivory Coast and use it as a base to cause havoc in Liberia."

In Sierra Leone, Desmond de Silva, the prosecutor of the international court waiting to try Mr. Taylor, called the disappearance "an affront to justice."

"Charles Taylor is a threat to the peace and security of West Africa," Mr. de Silva said in a statement. "His disappearance now from under the eye of a regional superpower only heightens that threat and puts the whole region on the highest alert."

Human rights advocates and politicians had harsh words for Nigeria's president for failing to arrest Mr. Taylor despite his long history of eluding capture. "Mr. Obasanjo is a key and influential player in Africa who should be promoting justice and stability instead of undermining it," said Ms. Dufka, who had urged Nigeria to tighten security around the house where Mr. Taylor and his entourage were living.

The development seemed bound to further undermine Nigeria's position as a regional power broker and enforcer of democratic norms, a role it played in helping to end the Liberian conflict in 2003 by accepting Mr. Taylor and in defusing recent crises in Togo and Ivory Coast.

But its influence has been waning as troubles at home have nipped at Mr. Obasanjo's globetrotting heels. A militant uprising in the oil-rich Niger Delta has slashed Nigeria's oil output, while sectarian violence killed more than 100 people last month. Speculation that Mr. Obasanjo will run for a third term despite a constitutional term limit has also heightened political tensions.

Mr. Taylor fled Liberia as a rebel insurgency tried to remove him from power in 2003, taking refuge in Nigeria after Mr. Obasanjo brokered a peace agreement. Mr. Taylor was already under indictment for his role in Sierra Leone's civil war, but the Nigerian government said it would turn Mr. Taylor over for prosecution only if requested by an elected Liberian government.

Liberia's new president, Ellen Johnson Sirleaf, said in an interview with The New York Times before her inauguration in January that Mr. Taylor's fate was a relatively low priority, given the myriad problems facing Liberia and the fragility of the peace there.

But under intense political pressure on a visit to the United States earlier this month, including a threat by Congress to withhold aid to Liberia if she did not act, she asked Nigeria to hand Mr. Taylor over.

Kayode Fayemi, a Nigerian political analyst who has worked with Ms. Johnson Sirleaf to secure peace in Liberia, said the United States might have made matters worse for Liberia by pushing the country to deal with Mr. Taylor before it was ready.

"She was actually literally harassed to do what she did," Mr. Fayemi said. "This is now going to make the situation much more complicated and so much worse."

K. A. Paul, an evangelical Christian who has acted as a spiritual adviser and spokesman for Mr. Taylor, said Tuesday that he had spoken to one of Mr. Taylor's aides and had been told that Mr. Taylor was in hiding somewhere in West Africa.

Backed by Libya and others, Mr. Taylor incited a civil war in Liberia in 1989, which spread to neighboring Sierra Leone. He is accused of trading guns with the rebels seeking to topple Sierra Leone's government.

Bush May Find Political Soul Mate In Canada's Harper (KRT)

By William Douglas

DOJ_NMG_0023378

Knight Ridder, March 28, 2006

CANCUN, Mexico - President Bush arrives in Cancun on Wednesday for a two-day summit with Mexican President Vicente Fox and new conservative Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper, a political soul mate who's bent on improving his country's frosty relations with Washington.

While talks with Fox about immigration are expected to dominate the session at this Yucatan vacation resort, Harper will be pushing his own agenda, and when Bush sits down with him on Thursday, he'll see a mirror image of himself.

Harper, a 46-year-old economist, rose to Canada's highest office by talking about his religious faith, vowing to cut taxes and end government corruption, and promising to reconsider a same-sex marriage law that Canada's Parliament approved last June - all themes that Bush campaigned on in 2000 and 2004.

In addition, Harper said he'll consider the White House's offer for Canada to join in fielding a continental ballistic missile shield, an invitation that former Canadian Prime Minister Paul Martin rejected.

"If George Bush can't get along with Stephen Harper, he can't get along with any world leader," said David Taras, a political science professor at the University of Calgary. "They're ideological cousins, if not twins."

Sworn into office last month, Harper borrowed a page from Bush's playbook and secretly traveled to Afghanistan earlier this month to meet with Canadian troops, highlight his country's contribution to the war on terrorism, and buck up domestic support for the mission.

The trip also sent a message to Washington, according to John Hulsman, an analyst for the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank.

"That was to show the cavalry is back in town, that they're not going to be anti-American," he said. "Harper, like Bush, has a black-and-white, good-and-evil view of the world - they're cut from the same cloth."

That's a huge difference from the tattered relationships that Bush had with former Canadian Prime Ministers Martin and Jean Chretien, both members of Canada's Liberal Party.

Bush's relationship with Chretien, which was never great, eroded further after Chretien refused to send troops to Iraq. The war also strained relations between Bush and Martin, and they hit bottom last December when Martin chastised the United States at a United Nations conference for not doing enough to combat global warming.

Angry U.S. officials accused Martin, who was running for re-election against Harper, of playing the anti-American card. David Wilkins, the U.S. ambassador to Canada, issued a rare public rebuke, saying that "the United States should not be on your ballot."

Hoping to rise above the acrimonious past, Harper wants a "mature relationship" with Bush in which both men understand that if "we have to differ, we differ in a very transparent way, so there is a good understanding of why we differ," Canadian Ambassador Michael Wilson said.

Harper and Bush may become fast friends, but they still have to overcome a number of economic hurdles.

For example, Canada is the United States' largest trading partner, but the two have been engaged in a decades-long battle over soft lumber. Canada has accused the United States of unfairly imposing anti-dumping duties on Canadian softwood lumber to protect the U.S. lumber industry. Washington contends that Canada subsidizes its softwood lumber exports in violation of world trade rules.

"Softwood lumber is more than an irritant - it's a psychological symbol related to the North American Free Trade Agreement and whether America will play by the rules or whether the U.S. really likes NAFTA," Taras said.

Still, Harper's presence on the world stage will be a welcome one for Bush, who's slowly finding more foreign leaders he feels comfortable with as old foes, such as Martin, German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder and French President Jacques Chirac, fade away through election defeats, retirements or term limits.

"The world is a friendlier place for the president, but the timing is wrong," Hulsman said. "When he was riding high, he had anti-Americans to deal with. Now, he's in a political zombie state, he gets people he can work with."

Can Turkey Bridge The Gap Between Islam And The West? (CSM)

By Yigal Schleifer

DOJ_NMG_0023379

The Christian Science Monitor, March 29, 2006

ISTANBUL, TURKEY - After decades of keeping the Arab and Muslim countries of the Middle East at arm's length, Turkey is trying to strengthen relations with its neighbors while at the same time recasting itself as a mediator in the region.

Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan delivered a speech at the opening of the Arab League summit in Khartoum, Sudan, where Turkey for the first time was given the status of "permanent guest" by the organization.

The prime minister's appearance at the summit - the first time a Turkish leader has done so - is the latest in a string of eyebrow-raising foreign policy moves: In February, a top Hamas official visited the capital, Ankara; soon after, Iraqi Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jafaari made a bridge-building trip; and the Turkish government recently announced that it was planning to host firebrand Shiite Iraqi cleric Moqtada al-Sadr for an official visit - since put on hold.

While the moves have ruffled feathers from Israel and Iraq to the US and European Union (EU) - which Turkey hopes to join - analysts say these aren't so much blunders as a reflection of a significant change in Turkey's Middle East foreign policy.

"Turkey wants to be a message-bringer from the Islamic world to the West," says Huseyin Bagci, a professor of international relations at Ankara's Middle East Technical University (METU). "The government really believes that it can be a bridge between East and West, and this is the foreign policy."

The Turkish government offered to act as a kind of mediator between the EU and the Islamic world regarding the controversial cartoons of the prophet Muhammad. Turkey has also suggested its ties to the West and its improving relations with Iran could help it act as a go-between in the diplomatic crisis over Tehran's disputed nuclear program.

"We have historical links to the region, to the Middle East at large," says a senior Turkish foreign ministry official. "Turkey also has another important quality in this regard, which is that it has relations with everybody [in the region]. We can effectively pass on messages. We have trust on both sides of various conflicts."

But critics warn that this new policy is flawed and carries with it the risk of alienating Turkey's Western allies. The Ankara visit of exiled Hamas political leader Khaled Mashaal was strongly denounced by both Israel, the only Middle Eastern country with which Turkey has a military alliance, and by members of US Congress. Meanwhile, some of Turkey's efforts to upgrade its relations with Syria have been viewed by Western diplomats as counterproductive to efforts to contain the regime of Syrian President Bashar al-Assad.

"You can see a split between the people who run the foreign ministry and the people who run foreign policy for the [governing Justice and Development Party], and that's really a struggle for the future course of Turkish foreign policy," says a Western diplomat based in Ankara, who asked not to be named because of the sensitivity of the issue. "This is a rather new phenomenon that has crept up over the last few months."

"Where [Turkey's new policy] doesn't work is that if you are going to become an intermediary, what you do has to have some support outside of one of the parties," says Henri Barkey, chairman of the international relations department at Lehigh University in Pennsylvania. "This doesn't bring results if you don't have that support, it makes you irrelevant."

It can also impact Turkey's interests, Professor Barkey says. "There are a lot of congressmen who have been very supportive of Turkey but will now [after the Mashal visit] not lift a finger when something comes up that Turkey cares about," he says.

Adds Barkey: "I don't think anyone in Washington expects [Turkey] to downgrade trade relations with Iran or Syria. I don't think anyone faults the Turks for having better relations than we have with Iran or Syria. But when there is an international consensus on something, that is a line that shouldn't be crossed."

Other critics suggest that while based on good intentions, Turkey's policy presumes other countries are acting in good faith, which may not be the case. "It seems like a well-meaning policy but it fails when checked against the real politick of the Middle East," says Soner Cagaptay, director of the Turkish Research Program at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy. "The policy works so long as the other side needs Turkey."

But Bagci says events in the Middle East have left Turkey with few options other than to pursue a revised regional policy. "The 21st century is going to be a new era where East and West try to understand each other in a different way and Turkey is a window of opportunity for the West to enter the Islamic world in a different way."

DOJ_NMG_0023380

Bolton Presses For New Method Of Calculating Dues At The U.N. (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, March 28 — John R. Bolton, the American ambassador, will outline a proposal for fundamental changes in calculating United Nations dues on Wednesday that he said would address Congressional concerns that "the United States doesn't get value for money."

The plan, which Mr. Bolton is to present before the House International Relations Committee, has circulated privately and infuriated China and Russia, whose dues would rise, while the obligations of the United States, Japan and major European countries would decline.

"Obviously, when any country's contribution goes up, that is not going to be popular," Mr. Bolton said in an interview on Tuesday.

"But the real question is, will the U.N. step out of an antiquated system that it is using now and use something that in the best judgment of most contemporary economists in the international field is a better method," he said.

That method, known by economists as purchasing power parity, or P.P.P., would determine a nation's ability to pay under a system that measures comparative standards of living, rather than using the existing method of basing contributions on gross national products.

"The real issue in calculating the scale of assessments is how you evaluate the strength, the size of economies that are in very different circumstances, with currencies which are often not directly convertible, and that have official exchange rates which are not reflective of the actual size and strength of the economy," Mr. Bolton said.

Mark Groombridge, an economic counselor at the United States mission, said he ran into fierce opposition from China, Russia, India and some developing countries when he discussed the proposal before the General Assembly's budget committee on Monday. "It is fair to say that the U.S. was subject to intense questioning and scrutiny on the matter," he said.

Mr. Bolton said the opponents argued that the collection of data was incomplete and imperfect, but he said that the same was true of the current system.

According to International Monetary Fund figures, the P.P.P. calculation would result in China's gross domestic product rising from its current position of 7th in the world to 2nd, and Russia's from 16th to 10th. India would go from 12th to 4th.

Japan has suggested its own reform plan, which has also drawn opposition from Beijing and Moscow because it would call for a minimum rate of 3 to 5 percent of the United Nations budget for the five permanent members of the Security Council.

The United States, which pays 22 percent, would be unaffected. So would Britain at 6.1 percent and France at 6 percent. But China's current rate is 2.1 and Russia's is 1.1 percent.

Japan, which is the second highest contributor at 19.5 percent, has seen its ambitions to become a permanent member thwarted this year, at least in part because of opposition by China.

New calculations of assessments are made every three years, and the current one is to be decided this summer by a panel of experts and sent to the General Assembly for adoption.

Mr. Bolton said the United States was prepared to "cushion" the effect on countries whose dues would rise the most by phasing them in over a three-to-five-year period. "That certainly eases the burden," he said. "We're prepared to take mitigating factors into account."

The United States estimates that its portion of the $1.9 billion budget would decline from 22 percent to 21.5 percent under its plan, a change that Mr. Bolton argued was so slight that it undermined claims that the American plan was devised to benefit Washington.

"That's why nobody can say we have an ulterior motive with respect to the United States in this," he said. "We think we have a reform that is consistent with the idea of advancing the ideals of all member governments. Member governments should really be assessed in accordance with their real world economic capacity."

He added: "The point about purchasing power parity is that it's not an effort to put the U.S. in a better position or to put somebody else in a worse position. It's an effort to say, 'How do we really capture the strength of economies in the real world, how do we find a better way to reflect that reality in setting the U.N. assessment rate?' "

DOJ_NMG_0023381

Trade Truce With China In The Senate (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 28 — Two of China's most relentless critics in Congress announced a temporary cease-fire on Tuesday in their long-running attack on China's foreign-exchange practices.

In an about-face, Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, and Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, dropped plans for a bill that would threaten steep tariffs on Chinese imports if Chinese leaders refuse to let their currency, the yuan, rise in value against the dollar.

Both lawmakers said they had become more optimistic as a result of their weeklong trip to China, where Chinese leaders emphasized their willingness to let their currency float more freely and to address other aspects of their nation's growing trade deficit with the United States.

"We learned that the Chinese have come to a conclusion that a fixed currency is no good for China," Mr. Schumer said Tuesday. "We believe that the progress we have seen in the last two or three weeks will continue."

Mr. Schumer and Mr. Graham said they would not demand a Senate vote on their bill, which would threaten China with a 27.5 percent tariff on all exports to the United States if it did not let its currency move in line with market forces.

Though they said that they reserved the right to push for a vote by the end of September, the two senators made it clear they hoped to let the matter drop.

China has kept its currency at an almost fixed exchange rate against the dollar for more than a decade, and American manufacturers have long complained that the yuan's low valuation has given Chinese imports an extra competitive edge.

Political anxiety about China's huge trade surplus and its competitive pressure on American producers has risen in many quarters of Congress. The Bush administration, though a staunch defender of trade with China, has bluntly criticized Chinese leaders for failing to address a long list of trade complaints and has hinted it might accuse China of engaging in "currency manipulation."

Mr. Schumer and Mr. Graham have been threatening to force a Senate vote on their bill for nearly two years, but they have repeatedly held back after receiving assurances that China was moving toward a more flexible exchange-rate policy.

Last July, China announced a 2.1 increase in the value of the yuan and said it was moving away from a fixed exchange rate. But the yuan barely budged again until earlier this month, when the government allowed it to edge up another 1 percent.

As a practical matter, American companies are ambivalent about the entire issue.

The National Association of Manufacturers has complained about China's exchange rates for years, but it has opposed the Schumer-Graham bill out of fear that it would imperil a trade relationship that is vital to many American companies.

The group estimates that about a quarter of all manufactured goods from China come from subsidiaries of American companies. But that estimate does not include large volumes of imports from Chinese companies working as subcontractors to American manufacturers.

Senator Charles Grassley of Iowa and Senator Max Baucus of Montana, respectively the top Republican and Democrat on the Senate Finance Committee, are pushing a separate bill that would focus more attention on currency policies but stop short of threatening tariffs on imported goods.

Citing Progress, Senate Backs Off Showdown With China Over Yuan (WSJ)

By Michael M. Phillips And Andrew Browne

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

The Senate stepped back from the brink in its face-off with China over Beijing's practice of keeping the yuan weak against the dollar.

Sens. Charles Schumer, a New York Democrat, and Lindsey Graham, a Republican from South Carolina, announced yesterday that they wouldn't force an immediate vote on a bill that would impose 27.5% tariffs on all imports from China in retaliation for the alleged advantage that Beijing's currency policies give to Chinese firms.

DOJ_NMG_0023382

Senate leaders had promised Messrs. Schumer and Graham that the full Senate would vote on their bill by Friday. Both men returned from a trip to China this month, however, persuaded that Beijing was moving gradually toward a more flexible exchange-rate policy and that their tariff bill would disrupt commercial and political relations between the two powers.

Meanwhile, the two top-ranking senators on the Finance Committee, Republican Charles Grassley of Iowa and Democrat Max Baucus of Montana, unveiled an alternative bill, which they hoped would drain support for the more severe Schumer-Graham version. Their bill would leave it up to the Treasury Department to decide if China deserved retaliation -- and would offer much milder sanctions.

The committee leaders' bill is intended to strengthen the hand of the administration of President Bush in negotiating with China over currency issues without igniting a trade war or disrupting Washington's relations with Beijing, as many fear the tougher alternative would do.

In July, Beijing raised the official exchange value of the yuan by 2.1% against the dollar and promised to allow the rate to reflect market forces. Since then, the yuan has crept up an additional 1%.

Even as Chinese officials reassure visiting U.S. delegations, they have been careful to avoid the appearance that they are caving into American pressure.

In newly released comments, China's central-bank governor, Zhou Xiaochuan, ruled out "shock therapy" to reduce the country's surging trade surplus with the U.S. "China will only consider to take the gradualist reform approach," Mr. Zhou said in a March 20 speech summarized yesterday on the People's Bank of China Web site.

US Senators Postpone Anti-China Tariffs Bill (AFP-Y2)

AFP, March 28, 2006

Two US senators said they were postponing a vote on a punitive tariffs bill against China after Beijing assured them that it is serious about reforming its currency regime.

Democratic Senator Chuck Schumer and his Republican colleague Lindsey Graham said they had agreed to put off a vote on their bill, which was due to take place this Friday, "to no later than September 29."

That effectively gives Beijing six months to adopt "real reforms," the senators told reporters after meeting with US Treasury Secretary John Snow to brief him about their visit to China last week.

"If the pace of currency reform slows before that date, the senators will be able to call their bill for a vote sooner," Schumer said.

"We hope there will be real movement in the coming months," the New York senator added.

"We came back from China with a real feeling that the Chinese realised that pegging the currency is not only bad for America but bad for China as well."

Graham warned: "If at the end of September, there is no movement of a serious nature, not only would we have a vote but we would have an overwhelming vote."

Joined by Republican Senator Tom Coburn, Schumer and Graham visited China last week to press Beijing to float its currency, the yuan, ahead of a March 20 visit by President Hu Jintao to the White House.

Their bill would slap a hefty tariff of 27.5 percent on all Chinese imports into the United States unless Beijing moves quickly to float the yuan.

The bill survived an attempt to kill it in the Senate by an overwhelming 67-33 vote a year ago, jolting both the US and Chinese authorities about the level of rage in Congress over China's trade practices.

In July last year, under intense pressure from the United States, China revalued the yuan by 2.1 percent against the dollar and replaced its system of pegging the unit to the greenback with a basket of currencies.

The move came shortly after Schumer and Graham last put off their bill, assuring colleagues that China would soon reform its currency.

But the yuan has since risen only by about three percent against the dollar, fuelling the anger of US lawmakers who argue that a distorted exchange rate leaves US companies at an unfair disadvantage to Chinese rivals.

DOJ_NMG_0023383

But the senators appear to have been won over -- at least for now -- by promises of reform they were given in Beijing by top officials including Commerce Minister Bo Xilai and central bank governor Zhou Xiaochuan.

"Governor Zhou convinced me that their consumption rate has to change, they are saving too much and the only way they can consume more is to have a free-floating currency," Graham said.

"I know they could not possibly overnight revalue their currency 20 or 30 percent but they can continue what they have done in a faster pace," he said.

The senators expect some movement on the yuan as early as next month.

"April is a defining month if the president (Hu) is going to embrace currency reform as his government's policy," Graham said.

"If we have a good report by Secretary Snow that we can agree with showing more change, then I think it would be a win-win for us."

The Treasury Department is due to issue a periodic report on global currency policies next month that many members of Congress have argued should label China a currency "manipulator", thus opening up the way to possible sanctions.

Another bipartisan bill was introduced in the Senate Tuesday that would give the US government new tools to check "harmful currency imbalances and trade problems" with trading partners, including China.

The bill would create a new assistant secretary of the Treasury to focus more directly on currency issues and exchange rates.

Sens. Delay Bill Aimed At China Currency (AP-Y2)

By Foster Klug

AP2, March 28, 2006

Two senators decided Tuesday to delay a vote on a bill that would punish China for restricting its exchange rate, saying they had seen signs of currency reform during a recent trip to China.

The bill, sponsored by Sens. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., and Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., would impose 27.5 percent tariffs on Chinese imports if the currency dispute is not settled.

The lawmakers said they would delay a vote to Sept. 29 at the latest. They said they would call the bill up for a vote if the pace of currency reform slowed before then.

"The jury is still out," Graham warned. "We will see in the next six months what the verdict is."

Schumer told reporters they "believe that the Chinese see the fact that manipulating their currency cannot continue."

"We expect continued progress on this issue," he said.

U.S. lawmakers want China to take steps to allow the yuan to strengthen against the dollar, saying the currency is undervalued by up to 40 percent.

The undervalued currency, U.S. manufacturers and politicians say, gives Chinese exports an unfair trade advantage, contributing to the United States' record $202 billion trade deficit with China last year.

China Signals Greater Currency Flexibility (WSJ)

By Andrew Browne

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

HONG KONG -- China's central-bank governor ruled out "shock therapy" to reduce the country's surging trade surplus with the U.S. But in carefully balanced remarks ahead of President Hu Jintao's planned visit to Washington next month, he suggested that China had become ready to allow greater currency flexibility.

Zhou Xiaochuan, in a summarized speech posted on the People's Bank of China Web site yesterday, also said Washington would be out of step with international opinion if it labeled Beijing a currency manipulator. The U.S. Treasury has hinted that it may do so in its next review of China's exchange-rate policy slated to occur about the time of Mr. Hu's trip.

Mr. Zhou's March 20 speech appeared aimed in part at damping expectations that China would succumb to U.S. pressure and allow significant appreciation of the yuan before Mr. Hu's visit. However, some economists say Beijing might try to improve the atmosphere by allowing more trading volatility, and by possibly letting the country's currency strengthen beyond the symbolically important level of eight yuan to the dollar. The yuan closed slightly higher yesterday at 8.0206.

DOJ_NMG_0023384

Potentially paving the way for slight strengthening of the yuan, Mr. Zhou said most Chinese companies "have adapted smoothly" to a 2.1% appreciation of the yuan against the dollar that occurred in July and to gains of slightly more than 1% in the past half year. Mr. Zhou said that smooth adjustment meant "market forces could be allowed gradually to play a greater role in the floating exchange rate."

But he rejected the "shock therapy" advice peddled to Russia during its economic transition. That policy of rapid overhauls in the early 1990s sent the ruble into an inflationary spiral, wiping out savings and pensions. "China will only consider to take the gradualist reform approach," he said.

He said deep-seated factors are behind China's trade imbalance, precluding short-term solutions through currency changes. These factors include the shift of global manufacturing to China, which swells Chinese exports, and huge investment in China by multinational companies selling into the domestic market, which reduces imports.

Mr. Zhou said it would take two to three years for China to achieve balanced trade, and even then, it would continue to run a bilateral surplus with the U.S.

A congressional vote had been promised by March 31 in Washington on a bill that would have imposed an across-the-board tariff of 27.5% on Chinese imports unless Beijing allows the yuan to appreciate substantially against the dollar. The sponsors of the bill, Sens. Charles Schumer, a New York Democrat, and Lindsey Graham, a South Carolina Republican, have said an undervalued yuan costs U.S. jobs by making Chinese exports unfairly inexpensive. Yesterday, however, Messrs. Schumer and Graham, just back from talks in Beijing, said they would hold off on their punitive-tariff bill.

The U.S. trade deficit with China exceeded $200 billion last year, by U.S. reckoning.

U.S. Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez, now visiting China, has called on Beijing to settle disputes over currency. He has said China risks a protectionist backlash in the U.S. if it fails to address concerns about the yuan.

Some economists say China's insistence that it doesn't manipulate its currency is undermined by the rapid buildup in its foreign-exchange reserves. To maintain a stable exchange rate, the central bank buys dollars as they flood in from exporters and investors, and sells yuan. The resulting yuan glut depresses the currency's value.

At the same time, dollar-buying has swelled China's foreign-exchange reserves.

The official China Business Daily, citing an unnamed source, yesterday said China's reserves hit $853.7 billion at the end of February compared with Japan's $850 billion. The central bank declined to comment on the newspaper report.

China Passes Japan In Foreign Exchange Reserves (NYT)

By Keith Bradsher

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

HONG KONG, Wednesday, March 29 — China's reserves of dollars and other foreign currencies hit $853.7 billion in February, an official Chinese newspaper said on Wednesday, allowing China to overtake Japan as the world's largest holder of foreign exchange reserves.

Japan's purchases in foreign currency markets to hold down the yen have been controversial for a quarter of a century. China's larger purchases to hold down the value of the yuan have caused similar anxieties from Washington to Brussels.

China Business News, a newspaper with close links to the government, reported that China's foreign reserves rose to $853.7 billion in February, from a previously announced total of $818.87 billion in December.

Japan, which has been doing little intervention lately, had previously reported $850.06 billion in reserves in February, barely up from $846.90 billion in December.

The latest figures show that the growth rate of China's reserves has slowed considerably in the last year, as speculative flows of money into China have faded, and that much of the remaining inflows reflect China's large and growing trade surplus.

Some economists contend that China's reserves effectively passed Japan's last year because more than $60 billion in reserves has been transferred to banks as swaps and injections of capital, with the money remaining partly under the control of the country's currency reserve managers.

DOJ_NMG_0023385

The International Monetary Fund requires member countries to disclose their foreign reserves regularly, but China's central bank has frequently lagged in officially disclosing figures. Instead, the figures often appear first in official newspapers, with no comment from the central bank, and are officially released days or weeks later.

U.S. And Europeans Consider Sanctions Against 40 Belarus Aides (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

MOSCOW, March 28 — The European Union and the United States are considering personal sanctions against more than 40 officials and state journalists in Belarus for their roles in election rigging and crackdowns on civil society there, according to Western diplomats and government officials.

A list of officials under consideration includes not only President Aleksandr G. Lukashenko and his top staff but also government ministers and security officials, as well as prosecutors and judges involved in trying antigovernment demonstrators and sentencing them to jail.

The European Union and the United States announced an intention to pursue punitive sanctions immediately after Mr. Lukashenko's landslide re-election victory on March 19, which the West and the opposition have denounced as a sham.

The draft list of officials, a copy of which was obtained by The New York Times, reflects the work of diplomats in Minsk, the capital of Belarus, in the days since the election, and after crackdowns against peaceful protesters on March 24 and 25. It includes 43 officials or state journalists by name, and four regional election officials by position.

"We have drawn up a list, as the European Union heads of mission, and sent it to Brussels," a Western ambassador in Minsk said by telephone on Tuesday, referring to the union's offices in Belgium.

The exact form European sanctions might take has not been determined and requires agreement by the entire union, but is likely to include bans on the officials' travel to the 25 European Union countries, the ambassador said. Other steps might be taken as well, including freezing of assets.

The ambassador spoke anonymously because deliberations about which officials should face sanctions are confidential. He declined to discuss any officials by name.

The list is expected to be reviewed, and perhaps adopted, when the foreign ministers from the union meet in Luxembourg on April 10.

American and European officials said that although some names would probably be removed and others added, the speed of the list's creation and the collaboration between Washington and European governments reflected a resolve to apply pressure to Mr. Lukashenko's circle.

The United States has already banned travel for several officials, and plans to add more. "We are thinking through the right people to target, and are doing this in very close contact with the European Union," David J. Kramer, deputy assistant secretary of state for European and Eurasian affairs, said by telephone. He added that the list might grow.

In contrast to the European Union, the United States is forbidden to disclose the names of people under sanctions. But Washington has already brought sanctions against several officials in Minsk, and is steadily adding more, Mr. Kramer said.

Before the election, he said, the number of officials was "fewer than a dozen, and it's going to go up significantly. It's going up pretty much on a daily basis."

Mr. Lukashenko, whose inauguration had been scheduled for Friday but was postponed without explanation on Tuesday, is often referred to as Europe's last remaining dictator. The United States and Europe have financed part of the opposition that has begun to challenge him.

He runs Belarus, a nation of 10 million people along Russia's northwest border, like a Soviet holdout, where the preponderance of the economy is under state control. He is widely accused of vote rigging, corruption and Soviet-style repression.

He has been largely out of the public eye since March 20, when, anticipating the fresh round of Western sanctions, he said he was undeterred by Western threats. His spokesman, Pavel N. Lyogky, echoed Mr. Lukashenko on Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0023386

Any new sanctions, Mr. Lyogky said in a telephone interview, "are simply funny. They first of all are groundless, and secondly, they will not bring about any expected effect."

In spite of the consensus in the West to apply pressure against the Belarussian authorities, one potential point of contention is what action, if any, to take against prominent government journalists in Belarus.

Washington has been more willing to try punishing the journalists, whom it regards as K.G.B. officers, Western officials said, while European nations are concerned that limits against Belarussian journalists could lead to fresh restrictions against Western news gathering in Belarus.

The names of 14 journalists are on the draft list, labeled as "key figures in the propaganda, distortion of facts and attacks on the democracies and their representatives in Belarus."

The list also includes Aleksandr M. Radkov, the education minister, for "expulsions of students and restrictions on their travel," and Stepan N. Sukhorenko, the chairman of Belarus's K.G.B.

Yushchenko Meets With Former Ally, Old Foe (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

KIEV, Ukraine (AP) -- President Viktor Yushchenko began a round of coalition talks Tuesday with a former Orange Revolution ally and an old adversary following weekend vote that soundly rejected the beleaguered leader's pro-Western party.

Yushchenko sat opposite his one-time partner, Yulia Tymoshenko, in what was their first formal meeting since he fired her as prime minister six months ago after accusing her of abuse of office. In brief video released by his office, Yushchenko ruffled through notes and took on a lecturing tone, while she stared at him, wide-eyed.

Before that, he hosted pro-Russian opposition leader Viktor Yanukovych, reviving memories of their bitter showdown in the 2004 election. Yanukovych's ballot-stuffing attempt to win that vote triggered the Orange Revolution, which turned the nation toward the West.

Now Yanukovych is back: His party was the top vote-getter in Sunday's parliamentary election, and he confidently declared that he -- and not the president -- would put together the coalition that will form the new government.

Yushchenko's office said both meetings were "preliminary."

Tymoshenko, the blond-braided icon of the 2004 mass protests, gave a more upbeat assessment, saying afterward that she and the president "have a common vision for Ukraine's future and for the future coalition."

Yushchenko's presidency is not at risk, but the electoral defeat weakened him. Under constitutional reforms, which Yushchenko accepted during the tense days of the 2004 protests, the president's power to pick his prime minister and much of the Cabinet passes to parliament, leaving Yushchenko at risk of creeping isolation.

With no party winning a majority in the 450-seat parliament, the 226 majority can be reached only via a coalition.

With nearly 85 percent of the vote counted, Yanukovych's Party of the Regions won about 31 percent. Tymoshenko's party had about 22 percent, followed by Yushchenko's Our Ukraine party, with about 15 percent.

Tymoshenko has argued that only a revived Orange Team can keep Yanukovych out and safeguard the reformist ideals championed in 2004. But while the Orange parties won more votes combined, it remains unclear whether they will be able to overcome deep personal animosity and forge a coalition after months of trading insults.

After the talks, Yanukovych told journalists that he and Yushchenko did not discuss a coalition, adding that his party would wait until there was a final vote count.

But with no result after some 45 hours of counting, the president criticized the slow pace and warned of potential fraud.

"This could be regarded as somebody's intentional effort to benefit this or that political force," Yushchenko said in a statement.

Central Election Commission head Yaroslav Davydovych denied a political motive, blaming short-staffed and incompetent regional commissions and poor technology.

Since her strong showing, Tymoshenko has tried to keep up the public pressure on Yushchenko to forge a coalition. She wants to be prime minister again and predicted that a deal could be signed within a week.

DOJ_NMG_0023387

Yushchenko has kept his options open, but has repeatedly emphasized the need to bridge Ukraine's divisions. Yanukovych's party dominates in the Russian-speaking east, while the Orange Team rules in the Ukrainian-speaking west and center -- and Yushchenko's time in office has done little to fix that.

Yushchenko, who retains the right to set the nation's foreign policy and appoint the foreign and defense ministers, pledged that Ukraine would continue on its West-leaning path. Yanukovych has called for closer ties with Moscow and an end to Kiev's bid to join NATO, but supports European Union membership.

London Mayor Lashes U.S. Ambassador As A 'Crook' (WP)

By Mary Jordan

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

LONDON, March 28 -- The mayor of London considered the virtues of the U.S. ambassador to Britain: "A chiseling little crook," Ken Livingstone concluded of Robert Holmes Tuttle on Monday, further dismissing the colonials' latest representative to Her Majesty's realm as a "car salesman."

Though Livingstone is known for contentious remarks -- he recently likened a Jewish newspaper reporter to a concentration camp guard -- splashing such verbal mud on Tuttle caused a flurry of amusement, embarrassment and tut-tutting among the British. Tuttle is a noted friend of President Bush and, it must be said, a purveyor of automobiles.

At issue is the U.S. government's refusal to pay more than a quarter of a million dollars in traffic congestion fees charged to cars that enter central London. The fees are a tax, the embassy says, and under international law, embassies don't pay taxes.

But Livingstone won't buy that line. "When British troops are putting their lives on the line for American foreign policy," he said Monday, "it would be quite nice if they paid the congestion charge."

Rick Roberts, a spokesman for the U.S. Embassy here, said he did "not want to dignify those remarks by responding to name-calling." But he noted: "We pay our parking tickets. We honor every commitment we have except tax. We are good citizens."

Other embassies in London also are refusing to pay the $14-per-car fee. "Our legal department in Berlin, like that of the State Department," concluded that the charge is a tax, said Michael Fluegger, a spokesman for the German Embassy.

A spokesman for the British Foreign Office said that "a large number of missions pay" and that Washington should, too. The spokesman added that the congestion fee "comes under the same category as parking fees and toll charges."

When diplomats have refused to pay parking tickets in New York and Washington, it has caused an uproar.

"It is absolutely not a tax," said Graham Goodwin, a spokesman for Transport for London, the city's public transportation agency. Goodwin said the United Arab Emirates also owed a considerable sum and was paying up.

The charge, implemented in February 2003, was designed to lessen traffic congestion in the city center and get more people to use the subway and buses.

Tuttle's family operates one of the largest automobile dealerships in the United States. He was sworn in as ambassador in mid-July, after the decision to stop paying the fee was made.

"This new ambassador is a car salesman and an ally of President Bush. This is clearly a political decision," Livingstone told reporters. On ITV television Monday night, he said: "It would actually be quite nice if the American ambassador in Britain could pay the charge that everybody else is paying and not actually try and skive out of it like some chiseling little crook."

On Tuesday a British civil liberties group, Liberty and Law, complained to a disciplinary board that the mayor had -- and not for the first time -- brought disrespect to his office.

"Ken Livingstone is an extremely left-wing, anti-American politician who delights in his anti-Americanism," said Gerald Hartup, director of Liberty and Law.

Livingstone was recently reported to the same disciplinary panel for his remarks to the Jewish reporter. The board suspended Livingstone from his duties for four weeks; he has remained in office pending the outcome of an appeal.

Meanwhile, the mayor last week tussled with two wealthy businessmen, telling them they should "go back to Iran and see if they can do better under the ayatollahs."

DOJ_NMG_0023388

His style has won admirers and detractors. "He is a bit of an idiot," said Stuart Alldrydge, 41, a London letter carrier. "If someone said something like that about him, all hell would break loose. The Yanks should have to pay the charge, though."

"Good on him," said Ann Love, 29, who works in financial services and supported Livingstone's tough words. "I think he just blurted it out -- he's just too honest to be a politician."

Municipal Workers Strike In Britain, Closing Schools And Offices (NYT)

By Sarah Lyall

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

LONDON, March 28 — Local government workers walked off their jobs across Britain on Tuesday, closing schools, libraries and other community centers in a one-day strike over reductions in pension benefits.

It was unclear how many people stayed away from work. The unions put the figure at more than a million, saying the walkout was the largest since the general strike in 1926, while the Local Government Association, which represents local councils, said the number was far less.

Ten unions are taking part in the strike, which also affected garbage collectors, traffic wardens, meat inspectors, street cleaners and social service workers, among others.

A spokesman for Unison, the largest union involved, said 15,000 of 21,000 primary and secondary schools around the country were closed. But a spokesman for the Local Government Association countered with figures showing that just 25 percent of its 1.6 million workers in all sectors had walked off their jobs.

"The vast majority of council services across England have not been affected," said the chairman of the Local Government Association, Sir Sandy Bruce-Lockhart. The group said it had no figures for Scotland, Wales or Northern Ireland.

At issue is the government's decision to abandon the so-called Rule of 85, which allows local government employees to retire at age 60 on full pensions, provided they have worked at least 25 years. The unions are arguing that the rule should continue to apply to current workers while being phased out for new employees, but the government says that with increasingly life expectancy, the cost to taxpayers for the current system could rise by as much as $10.5 billion in the next 15 years.

In a statement David Prentice, the general secretary of Unison, said other public-sector employees, like civil servants, teachers, police officers, firefighters and health care workers, have had their pension plans protected — unlike members of the Local Government Pension Scheme, whose pensions are at issue.

Most of affected workers are women whose salaries tend to be low anyway, he said. "There is absolutely no rhyme or reason in singling out L.G.P.S. members for such unfair and unjust treatment," Mr. Prentice said. "After a lifetime of dedicated service to their local communities, our members deserve the pensions they have already paid for."

Sir Digby Jones, the director general of the Confederation of British Industry, called the strike selfish, particularly in view of the fact that workers in the private sector are having to delay their own retirements.

"Private sector employers and their staff have had to get real, and recognize that longer life expectancies and the rising cost of providing pensions mean longer working lives," Sir Digby said in a statement.

Pocket Change Finally, A Healthy Japan Offers Lift For U.S., Asian Economies (WSJ)

By Sebastian Moffett And Yuka Hayashi

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

TOKYO -- Soichiro Takaoka, flush with cash from a successful consulting business, is an extreme example of the new Japanese consumer: He is splurging on expensive goods, many of which were imported. The 31-year-old just bought a $200,000 Ferrari Spider convertible and a $30,000 Cartier watch. He wears a pink and lavender Hermès cravat, green Berluti shoes and a brown Louis Vuitton suit.

Mr. Takaoka's spending shows how Japan's economy has started to grow in a way that could benefit the rest of the world. When Japan was booming nearly 20 years ago, the biggest indications were Tokyo's rocketing stock and land prices. Japanese people didn't buy as much from overseas as foreigners wanted. After a decade of slump, the recovery that began in 2002 was initially led by exports rather than domestic spending.

DOJ_NMG_0023389

Now, consumers and businesses are spending more. That's important, because their activity makes economic growth more sustainable: Even if exports were to slow because of problems in the U.S. or Chinese economies, domestic spending could keep Japan's economy chugging along.

The new spending reflects big structural changes in Japan. Local upstarts and foreign companies have taken advantage of the sharp drop in land prices during the 1990s downturn to buy stores or offices. Japan has also deregulated industries from financial services to food, sometimes under pressure from the U.S. It has loosened restrictions on large stores and opened the way for new types of financial products.

Once known as a fortress for home-grown products, Japan's market is now increasingly open to overseas companies and entrepreneurs. In the year ending March 31, 2005, imports were 10.2% of gross domestic product, the widest measure of economic activity, up from 6% a decade earlier. The figure is on track to reach 11% in Japan's current fiscal year, which ends Friday.

That means Japanese growth may this time be a boon for the rest of the world. The effects could be particularly strong in the rest of Asia, where Japan buys goods varying from clothes made in China to microchips made in South Korea.

To be sure, the world economy still depends heavily on purchases by American consumers. Because of their unabated appetite, the U.S. current-account deficit with Japan hit a record level of $99 billion last year. The figure reflects the total value of goods traded between the two countries as well as money flows in services such as tourism.

Japan's growth benefits other countries in ways besides trade. Some U.S. fund managers are scooping up Japanese household savings by offering new investment products with potentially higher returns than their Japanese competition. Pacific Investment Management Co., of Newport Beach, Calif., a unit of Germany's Allianz AG, has doubled the fixed-income assets it manages for Japanese clients to $40 billion over the past two years.

Japan's economy still has major long-term problems, including government debt that amounts to 160% of annual GDP -- the highest level of indebtedness in the developed world. Worse, the work force is declining as the number of elderly Japanese increases. That puts a greater burden on working people to support those who are retired.

But growth increases Japan's chances of coping successfully. It grew 2.7% last year -- close to the U.S. figure of 3.5% -- and economists forecast an even bigger Japanese expansion in 2006. Following several years of upturn in manufacturing, Japanese service industries are now investing more and demand for new homes is forecast to rise.

This new demand is benefiting companies around the world. Because of an increased desire for travel, plus new or expanded airports, Japanese airlines expect an increase in flights between Japan and mainland Asia during the next few years. Partly because of this, Japanese airlines are buying more planes from the world's two suppliers of big passenger jets, Airbus and Boeing Co. Boeing received orders for 197 airplanes from Japan between 2003 and 2005 -- more than the total in the previous decade.

In Japanese stores, consumers have an ever-wider array of choices -- and many of the new products are made overseas. For functional, low-cost wear, the big name in Japanese clothes is Fast Retailing Co., which makes most of its Uniqlo brand clothes in China. Foreign companies, from Gap Inc. to Prada Group NV of Italy, have multiplied their outlets in Japan, helped by falling land prices and the large-store deregulation. Overall, sales of imported consumer goods have risen about 40% since 2000, according to the Bank of Japan, while those made in Japan tumbled 20%.

The trend is most pronounced in big-ticket purchases. Cornes & Co., the Japanese importer for Italian sports-car maker Maserati, which is owned by Fiat SpA, says sales of the cars jumped to 400 last year from 238 in 2004. They cost $100,000 and up. "As well as our traditional customer base of people like doctors, we're getting a lot of new, younger customers recently," says Maki Abe, a Cornes spokeswoman. "A lot of them are entrepreneurs in fields like IT," or information technology.

Hirofumi Usui, president of a Tokyo company, e-Marketing Inc., that provides advice on marketing to the rich, says the biggest change for Japan is that people flaunt their wealth nowadays. The old Japanese desire for middle-class conformity has given way to a taste for flashy consumption, especially of prestige foreign items, he says.

"Japan used to be like a socialist country, and the Japanese thought the rich were boring, sneaky and lacking in taste," Mr. Usui says. "In the past, a lot of people would have been embarrassed to drive a Ferrari."

DOJ_NMG_0023390

Japanese consumers are also becoming more adventurous about investing. Rira Watabe, 37, got her highest bonus ever last year, as business took off at the Tokyo recruitment company where she works. At the same time, she's intent on building up her savings because jobs are less secure in Japan than they used to be and the pension system is strained. Japanese banks offer interest of just 0.03% on one-year time deposits, reflecting the supereasy monetary policy that the Bank of Japan adopted during the lean years and is only beginning to reverse.

Last year Ms. Watabe put about $3,000 in money-market funds denominated in Australian and U.S. dollars. One of these is an Australian-dollar fund that currently yields about 4.9% a year. She also puts about $250 a month in the Kokusai Global Sovereign Open Fund, which invests about a third of its funds in U.S. government bonds and most of the rest in European sovereign bonds. It returns 6% a year and its assets have more than tripled to $42.8 billion in the three years to Feb. 28, making it one of the world's largest bond mutual funds.

"I don't know what's going to happen to my job in the future and nobody knows what will become of the pension system," Ms. Watabe says. "We've got to protect ourselves."

Because of people like Ms. Watabe, Japanese purchases of U.S. stocks, non-Treasury bonds and financial derivatives totaled $62.8 billion in 2005, up 21% from the previous year.

The popularity of U.S. financial-services companies in Japan has been aided by a wave of deregulation since the late 1990s. Hartford Financial Services Group Inc.'s life-insurance arm entered Japan in 2000, soon after the government allowed Japanese brokerage firms to sell variable annuities to investors. These products resemble mutual funds except they offer tax advantages, benefits if the holder dies and sometimes protection from market losses. In the U.S., variable annuities have long been available and are sometimes criticized because of high fees and aggressive sales tactics, but they are a new concept in Japan.

In 2002, Japanese banks gained the ability to sell insurance products. This gave companies like Hartford relatively low-cost access to millions of potential customers. Hartford currently has 366,000 variable- and fixed-annuity accounts in Japan valued at $26 billion, nearly double the asset level a year ago. In a sign of how important the Japanese market has become, Hartford's Japan unit brought in $11.9 billion of new business in 2005, more than the $11.5 billion it recorded in new U.S. business.

"An enormous amount of wealth was handcuffed by risk aversion," says Stefan Reinwald, head of Japanese equities research at Calyon Capital Markets Asia. "Now it is put to work properly."

One factor reassuring average Japanese is the end of the long banking crisis that crippled earlier upturns. When Japan's stock-market and real-estate bubbles popped in the early 1990s, banks were left with mountains of bad loans on their books and they didn't want to lend money. Because Japanese businesses depend heavily on banks for financing, economic growth ground to a halt.

As banks finally cleaned up their books over the past three years, they began to lend again. Meanwhile, exports boosted profits at manufacturers, leading to higher wages -- which in turn are letting consumers spend more. The average household headed by a wage earner spent 74.5% of its income last year, the highest level since 1990, according to the government. Such a virtuous cycle is normal for a growing economy like the U.S., but in Japan, nothing like this has happened for more than a decade.

The good times are good news for Mr. Takaoka, whose consulting business gives investment advice to the wealthy. He used to work for giant trading house Mitsui & Co., but quit last year when he concluded Japanese investors were no longer satisfied with the safe options provided by big-name Japanese corporations. He says Japan's rich now want specialized services, which will make better use of their money. This will also give newcomers -- both foreigners and boutique services like his own -- the chance to manage Japan's new wealth.

"In the past, people went to big companies, so only these would get business," Mr. Takaoka says. Now, "people's field of vision has broadened. This is good for Japan."

Romania Backs Alternate Route For Pipeline To West (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, March 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0023391

Russia's New Year's Day cutoff of natural gas to Europe has boosted Romania's strategic value as the route for a competing pipeline, Romanian Foreign Minister Mihai-Razvan Ungureanu said yesterday.

Mr. Ungureanu, in Washington this week for talks with senior Bush administration officials, said the brief midwinter interruption in Russian gas supplies underscored Romania's argument about the importance of the Black Sea region to the security of Europe and the West.

"We have been talking about this idea for a long time, but for some in Europe, this was a political watershed," he said during a breakfast meeting with a small group of reporters.

"It takes quite a fuss to get even the heads of the governments of Europe to discuss the issue, but it was an event everyone could understand: 'Someone turned the taps off.' "

The cutoff, which sprang from a bitter pricing dispute between Russia's gas monopoly and Ukraine, focused new attention on the so-called Nabucco pipeline, a $6 billion, 1,760-mile project that would bypass Russia while delivering natural gas from Central Asia and the Middle East to European customers.

The planned route would pass through Turkey, Bulgaria, Romania, Hungary and Austria for distribution across Western Europe. Moscow has proposed a competing pipeline route from Russia through Turkey and to the West.

Despite the concerns, Mr. Ungureanu said, Romania did not favor a policy of shutting out Russia, as he said some other former Soviet-bloc states advocated.

"We don't think Russia's shortcoming can be addressed by isolating Russia," he said. "Russia needs its Western partners just as much as we need Russia."

Since joining NATO in 2004, Romania has championed the importance of the Black Sea region, saying the security, economic and environmental challenges facing the countries on its shores have a direct impact on the stability of Europe as a whole.

Mr. Ungureanu said the agreement signed in December to establish new U.S. military staging bases in Romania was a sign that Washington also appreciated the rising importance of the Black Sea region.

"There is actually now a bit of a competition between [the European Union] and Washington over who can deal better with the challenges in our region," he said.

The foreign minister said Romania is committed to keeping its 870 troops in Iraq, despite the withdrawals of several other nations in the U.S.-led coalition.

"There is certainly no weakening of the resolve of Romania about Iraq," he said. "We have said that until the day when the Iraqi authorities can deal fully with their own security ... we will be there."

The minister said bilateral relations with the United States were strong, but he expressed frustration that improved ties have not led to more American investment in Romania's economy.

He said direct U.S. investment in Romania was $800 million -- "practically nil" -- despite NATO membership and the vote of confidence shown by the basing agreement.

Students And Unions Jubilant At Paris Protests (FT)

By Martin Arnold

Financial Times, March 29, 2006

French students and trades unions were in jubilant mood on Tuesday after more than 1m people took to the streets in protest against government labour reforms.

Despite the record turnout, Dominique de Villepin, the embattled prime minister, appeared to stand firm, brushing aside calls from members of the governing party to reach a compromise about his youth employment law.

“The republic is not about preconditions, it is not about ultimatums,” he told parliament.

There is mounting speculation that President Jacques Chirac, who yesterday cancelled a trip to be able to remain in Paris, could intervene in regard to the crisis. However, the president seems unlikely to take a decision until a constitutional court ruling on Thursday upon the validity of the new law.

DOJ_NMG_0023392

Nicolas Sarkozy, interior minister and Mr de Villepin's biggest rival for next year's presidential election, on Tuesday suggested a temporary suspension of the law during negotiations with unions.

Violence erupted in central Paris again, adding a sour note to the demonstrations that students and unions said attracted 3m people across France.

In Paris, police arrested more than 100 people after gangs of youths – most from poor suburbs – disrupted the march.

Police stepped up their presence at railway stations to intercept the casseurs – or troublemakers – and used paint balls filled with indelible ink to identify the mostly hooded figures trying to rob student protesters and smashing shop windows. Police also fired teargas.

Bernard Thibault, head of the communist CGT union, said: "We are more than 3m people today in the streets; it is historic. It is unthinkable that the prime minister will keep up his limpet-like attachment to his position." Police estimates put the number of protesters considerably lower.

Unions will meet today to decide their next steps if the government were to refuse to accept their demands for withdrawal of the first job contract – the CPE – that would allow companies to sack young workers more easily during a two-year trial.

France was also hit by widespread strikes in public transport, schools and many state-owned companies. Air traffic was heavily disrupted after 30 per cent of air traffic controllers went on strike. In Paris, about two-thirds of metro trains, regional trains and buses were running.

The government may be hoping that the constitutional court gives it an exit route from the crisis by blocking the law.

However, few legal experts expect it to declare the law unconstitutional, either because it discriminates against people aged under 26 or because it allows people to be sacked for no reason.

Eric Woerth, a centre-right UMP deputy and close ally of Mr Sarkozy, said the idea of a temporary suspension of the labour law was "the best way for everyone to get out of this crisis with their heads held high".

Mr de Villepin triggered a walk-out of parliament by the centrist UDF party when he left questions from opposition parties to his ministers and only answered those from his own party.

He repeated his offer to "improve" the contract during talks with unions, without changing the contract's fundamental shape.

Jean-Marc Ayrault, leader of the parliamentary Socialist party, called on him to "forget your pride, make peace with the French people".

Huge Protest Puts France To The Test (WP)

By Molly Moore

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

PARIS, March 28 -- As many as 2.7 million demonstrators marched through the streets of French cities Tuesday in one of the country's largest protests in decades, as striking workers shut down the Eiffel Tower and the Paris Opera and disrupted train, bus and airline service nationwide in opposition to a new youth labor law.

The massive show of strength created new fissures in President Jacques Chirac's government, which early this month triggered the crisis by passing the measure to waive some of France's strict job protections and give employers new freedom to dismiss people under age 26.

Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin, author of the law, told Parliament on Tuesday that he would not give in to "the pressure of the streets." But Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy called for a delay in putting the law into effect to ease talks with labor unions.

Lawmakers from several parties warned that the size of the protests signaled a threat to the future of the government. The leader of the opposition Socialist Party, Francois Hollande, said the government was "running the risk of confrontation with a majority of the country." Bruno Julliard, president of the National Student Union, cautioned: "We are in front of a tidal wave."

The country's largest single demonstration -- a gathering in central Paris's Place de la Republique that unions estimated at 700,000 -- underscored the divisions in French society. Gangs of youths from poor suburban areas swarmed among the students and workers, snatching cellphones and knapsacks.

DOJ_NMG_0023393

Later, as screaming demonstrators ran from police water cannons and clouds of tear gas, men in business suits and women in fur coats watched from the balconies of luxury apartments high above the fray. Gray-haired diners at Les Freres Blancs restaurant sipped wine by candlelight, ignoring the frantic scenes unfolding outside the front windows.

The continuing protests also threaten to undermine France's tourism industry, just as it is starting to recover from a decline caused by rioting last fall in poor suburban communities populated primarily by immigrant families. Youths burned cars and attacked public and private buildings in what some said was anger at the government for ignoring their high unemployment rates and dismal living conditions.

On Tuesday, tourists inside the Holiday Inn fronting the Place de la Republique watched with expressions of horror as rows of black-suited riot police clashed with bottle-throwing demonstrators.

Thousands of other tourists suffered disruptions when striking workers closed the city's most famous tourist site, the Eiffel Tower, as well as the Paris Opera and other theaters. An estimated one-third of all flights to and from Paris airports were canceled and most others were delayed because air traffic controllers were striking, aviation officials said.

Parisians woke up to a morning without newspapers. The state-run radio, France-Info, one of the country's main news stations, played only music because technicians and reporters did not show up for work.

People who attempted to reach their workplaces grappled with commuting nightmares as only half of the suburban commuter trains were running and service on buses and subways was curtailed. Parents who took children to school found many teachers absent and some buildings locked. Services at banks, post offices and most government offices were limited.

Most of the demonstrations began in the afternoon. While official government estimates placed the number of protesters nationwide at about 1 million, unions put the figure at about 2.7 million. The government's figure of 92,000 participants in the Paris march seemed understated; broad columns of people marched into the square continuously for four hours.

The French government contends that the country's elaborate social safety net, including strict job protections, is too expensive and is holding the country back in global competition. Employers who have freedom to get rid of young employees they don't want would be more willing to hire in the first place, officials argue.

But Patrick Pion, a white-haired archaeology professor who joined Tuesday's demonstration in Paris, said the youth labor law has become a lightning rod for "all those who aren't satisfied with the current state of things" in France.

"It hit a very sensitive and symbolic target," Pion said. "The 16- to 26-year-olds -- our children -- and us workers."

"Everything's going wrong," agreed Khiter Sheba, 17, a high school student from a town east of Paris. "It's like France has the flu."

The protests are helping shape next year's presidential campaign. Prime Minister Villepin's likely chief rival for his party's nomination is Sarkozy, the interior minister, whose call for a delay in implementing the law, which is scheduled to take effect next month, represents a split with Villepin. A constitutional court is scheduled to rule Thursday on the law's validity.

The Interior Ministry said more than 4,000 uniformed and plainclothes law enforcement officers were deployed on Paris streets Tuesday in an effort to avoid the violence that accompanied a demonstration last Thursday in one of central Paris's most affluent districts. As that march was ending, stores were looted and vandalized and cars were set ablaze.

For much of Tuesday afternoon, the Paris demonstration resembled more of a festive parade than a protest. A jazz band aboard a truck led groups of demonstrators from across the country into the Place de la Republique, a traditional gathering spot for victorious politicians and protesters. The plaza features a statue of Marianne, a woman in flowing robes who symbolizes the republic and holds an olive branch aloft in her right hand.

But as the crowd swelled, chaos erupted. Riot police with shields and batons charged youths who were snatching cellphones. The thieves escaped by melting into the crowd.

Later, protesters threw bottles and sticks at police, who responded with tear gas and high-pressure streams of water. Some of the projectiles intended for the police smashed glass storefronts.

As one officer trained his water hose on protesters, he muttered to his colleagues: "Here we go -- the bad cops again."

Jobs Law Protests Shut Down Transit, Close Eiffel Tower (WT)

By Elizabeth Bryant

DOJ_NMG_0023394

The Washington Times, March 29, 2006

PARIS -- Protesters yesterday crippled France with massive demonstrations and a national strike, but failed to budge Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin from his steadfast defense of an unpopular new jobs law.

Chanting slogans and brandishing banners, hundreds of thousands of mainly young people spilled into the streets of Paris and other cities, denouncing the new law that makes it easier to hire and fire young workers.

The strikes disrupted transportation services as teachers and private-sector employees joined the walkouts. The Eiffel Tower was closed for fear of violence, and the U.S. State Department warned Americans to be wary of city crowds.

Police used tear gas and water cannons to break up scattered incidents of rock and bottle throwing last night. Police made 787 arrests around the country -- 488 of them in Paris -- National Police Chief Michel Gaudin told the Associated Press. Injuries in the capital were tallied at 46 demonstrators and nine police officers.

The demonstrations were the latest -- and largest -- expression of a fury that has spread from university campuses to Main Street France.

Mr. de Villepin issued a fresh call for political dialogue -- which was rejected outright by student and labor unions -- but showed no sign of backing down from the law, which calculates that companies will hire more young workers if they have more flexibility to fire them once they are on staff.

"The republic is not about preconditions," he said in the National Assembly. "It's not about ultimatums."

However, Mr. de Villepin's top conservative rival, Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy, proposed yesterday that the law be suspended while negotiations with the unions continue. The Constitutional Council is expected to rule tomorrow on its legality.

"I think we're heading toward some sort of compromise that won't be ideal, but will allow both sides to retain something," said Jerome Fourquet, studies director at the IFOP polling agency in Paris. "At the end, the law will be substantially changed."

Mr. de Villepin, who bulldozed the jobs law through parliament earlier this month, argues that the changes will slice youth unemployment, now at 23 percent. But critics argue it simply increases job insecurity by allowing businesses to fire young, first-time workers for any or no reason during their first two years of employment.

Several recent polls show a solid majority in all age groups oppose the legislation in its current form -- a sentiment echoed among the boisterous crowd that marched through Paris on a raw afternoon yesterday.

"I've held precarious jobs for the last 20 years," said 40-year-old educator Hishem Larach. "I don't want my children to end up with the same problems."

At universities like Paris 13, located in the grim suburb of Villetaneuse, there is little sign that student opposition to the law is waning. Banners denouncing the jobs law drape the cavernous campus center, along with flyers promoting yesterday's general strike.

"The government is going to have to repeal the law," said 20-year-old engineering student Abdoulaye Cisse, "because the students are not going to stop demonstrating."

Paris 13 has remained open while other schools are blockaded and shuttered, in part because its mainly immigrant, working-class students often juggle jobs and cannot make up study time lost through protests.

But its president, Alain Neuman, said: "I sense a real despair among my students. They're worried about the future."

Fear of the future is a continuing theme in France these days, particularly among the young. Nearly half the youths surveyed in an Ipsos poll last fall equated globalization with fear. Yet critics say France cannot afford to keep its generous social benefits and remain competitive. The economy is sluggish and unemployment hovers near 10 percent.

"We have privileges in our society we can't afford any more," said Julien Gomez, a history professor at Paris 13, who concedes he is in the minority on campus who support the jobs law. "Having a job for life is a privilege. People need to realize they have responsibilities."

In France, Systematized Revolt (CSM)

By Susan Sachs

The Christian Science Monitor, March 29, 2006

PARIS - In its choreographed and time-honed fashion, much of France went on strike Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0023395

A predetermined number of buses, subways, and trains did not run. Schools were ostensibly open, although teachers in certain grades had warned parents beforehand that they would skip class. In scores of cities and towns, about 1 million people marched peacefully - with only scattered post-march clashes between youths and police. No one expected to have mail delivered and, for the most part, they were right.

Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin, whose jobs plan for young people was the target of the nationwide protest, was already planning for the morning-after. He said he was open to discussing the details, but not the legitimacy, of his plan, and invited student and union leaders to meet when everyone goes back to work on Wednesday.

Indeed, for all its clamor and disruption, the latest political confrontation in France has a certain predictability to it.

Over the past 15 years, strikes and street demonstrations have become an integral part of the way public policy is made or, as is often the case, unmade, in a country that simultaneously fears and yearns for change.

With presidential elections scheduled for next year, the clash over the new labor contract has taken on the aspect of a dress rehearsal for the battles to come between Mr. Villepin, a potential candidate, and his rivals on the left and right wings of French politics.

But the latest eruption of public protest also has many people worried that politicians have lulled themselves into viewing such demonstrations as simply a form of popular referendum, especially after the surprise French rebellion against the European Constitution and the riots by suburban youth last year.

"Demonstrations are no longer even seen by the government as a sign of open crisis," says Danielle Tartakowski, a historian and professor at the University of Paris.

The prime minister, she adds, is flirting with danger. "If you make the demonstrations a quasi-norm of political life for resolving disputes," Mrs. Tartakowski says, "you can create a very strong destabilization of society and a strong sentiment of revolt."

The proposal that Villepin has been defending would add a new type of labor contract to the array of regulations that already govern relations between employers and employees.

The "first-employment" contract (CPE), as it is called, would permit companies to hire young people on the basis of a two-year probationary period with the freedom to fire them without cause at any time.

The prime minister described it as a reform to help reduce the 23 percent jobless rate among young people, but student groups have called it a contract of guaranteed insecurity for a single class of French worker.

Villepin pushed the proposal through the French parliament with little debate last month, prompting both union and some business leaders to complain that they should have been consulted before the law was written.

The process was itself an example of the country's dysfunctional system for finding consensus on social and economic reform, according to Jacques Julliard, a historian of contemporary French politics.

"Things are done in reverse here," he says. "First a law is passed and only afterwards is it discussed, in the street, chaotically and with a spectacular confrontation."

As the student and union protests over the law mounted over the past six weeks, Mr. Villepin also dug in his heels, saying he would not abandon the new law but was open to discussing changes that might provide better job protection.

A Socialist Party spokesman accused him of holding France "hostage to his presidential ambitions." Cartoonists for the French newspapers have taken to caricaturing him as imperial and imperious. And his chief rival in the center-right coalition government, Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy, has tried to exploit that image.

"One can be firm," said Mr. Sarkozy in a speech Monday evening that was billed as the start of his presidential campaign, "without being rigid."

But an opinion survey by the Ipsos polling firm and published in the daily newspaper Le Monde, suggested that Villepin's strategy in the face of the demonstrations has paid off in the short term.

Of the 959 people interviewed, 63 percent disapproved of his continued defense of the job plan. But 74 percent of those who identified themselves as supporters of the right-wing UMP, the party of both Villepin and Sarkozy, said they backed his stance.

DOJ_NMG_0023396

The opposition Socialists and other smaller left-wing parties, in the meantime, have thrown their support to the student and union demonstrators. Villepin, they said, must abandon the jobs plan completely or the demonstrations would continue.

The threats could be brinkmanship, a sort of "charade" with each side of the conflict taking a maximal position before a compromise, according to Mr. Julliard, who published a book called "Le Malheur Francais," or "The French Tragedy," last year. Or they could presage a serious government crisis.

"There are many people in the street and they are asking for nothing and proposing nothing," Julliard says. "They just want the law withdrawn. Yet at the same time, they expect a solution from the state. They distrust the political class and yet have this extraordinary confidence in the state. It's a particularly French form of immobility."

Liberte, Precarite: Labor Law Ignites Anxiety In France (WSJ)

By Andrew Higgins

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

PARIS -- On the edge of the Place de la Bastille, the symbolic starting point of France's 1789 revolution, Francois Brey waved a piece of soggy cardboard scrawled with his own call to revolt: "Death to Cows!"

A mild-mannered man with a stutter and a big beef, Mr. Brey joined more than a million people yesterday in a day of street protests and strikes across France triggered by a new youth labor law. It was the biggest day of protests after weeks of escalating agitation.

Mr. Brey, 51 years old, isn't affected by the proposed "first job contract." He was there to press his own idiosyncratic agenda. Alongside him in a rain-splattered Paris parade were a muddle of French anarchists, Kurdish Maoists, retirees nostalgic for the Soviet Union and teenagers from impoverished suburbs, who rioted late last year in a separate spasm of turbulence. Arguments and scuffles broke out among the groups. As night fell, order broke down and police clashed with bands of violent demonstrators.

The uproar began as a protest against a new law designed to relax a rigid French labor market that makes it difficult to fire anyone. In the process, however, the unrest has crystallized a deeper French anxiety. In better economic times, France maintained an elaborate system of social protections that cushioned citizens from the demands of the free market. The new law, which students call a symbol of "precarite," or precariousness, undermines that idea.

France's most famous period of violent protests in 1968 saw students rioting against what they saw as a rigid and smothering state. Today, it seems, they want the state back. Serge July, director of France's main left-of-center newspaper, Liberation, and a '68 veteran, says his country is gripped by "anguish about the future." It is also suffering from, he says, a "crisis of identity."

According to a recent poll, France is the only country among 20 surveyed where those who don't have faith in the free market outnumber those who do. Only 36% of those polled in France agreed with the proposition that the free market is the "best system on which to base the future of the world" -- compared with 71% in the U.S., 66% in Britain and 65% in Germany. In nominally communist China, 74% said they favored the free market, according to the University of Maryland's Program on International Policy Attitudes.

Police put the number of protesters yesterday across France at 1.05 million, more than twice as many as the previous biggest protest on March 16. Trade unions, which organized the rallies, put the figure at three million. A one-day strike to coincide with the protest disrupted hospitals, schools, rail services and air traffic, halted delivery of newspapers, dented production at France's biggest oil refinery and shut down the Eiffel Tower.

"We are all wreckers of this system," shouted students as they stormed into the Paris headquarters of the French news agency, Agence France-Presse. Earlier, in the southern city of Montpellier, students and anti-globalization activists took down a statue of Jean Jaures, a former socialist leader, saying they wanted to mourn the rise of capitalism.

In a rowdy gathering of the French Parliament yesterday, politicians traded hoots and insults, and disrupted an address by Dominique de Villepin, the aristocratic prime minister, poet and presidential hopeful who has staked his future on preserving at least fragments of the new law. Even some nominal allies on the right, including Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy, another likely presidential candidate, have sniped at the prime minister, who rammed the changes into law with scant debate or consultation with labor groups.

DOJ_NMG_0023397

Mr. Villepin says the new "first job contract," known by its French acronym CPE, will lower unemployment, which stands at 9.6% for the population as a whole and around 23% for young people. It allows employers to fire workers under the age of 26 without explanation during a two-year period of probation. The CPE would replace a complicated system that makes it hard to dismiss workers without big payoffs or expensive legal battles.

For many, though, arguments over what the measure will or won't do are irrelevant.

Mr. Brey, the man with the "Death to Cows" sign, said he doesn't have a gripe against animals but doesn't like French riot police, who huddled behind shields along the route of the march from Place d'Italie in the city's south to Place de la Republique. He says he adopted his slogan in homage to the 1968 revolt when protesters denounced police as cows, just as Americans sometimes use the slur "pigs."

His biggest fear is globalization, which he said would mean French people getting "eaten with a Chinese sauce." He believes France and the rest of Europe must focus on saving what they've earned behind a protective wall. "We can't make jeans for €2 a pair like the Chinese," said Mr. Brey, a television technician. "We can't win at this game."

Shafik Sarkaya, an immigrant from Turkey and a confirmed Marxist, said he doesn't know much about the proposed law. He does know, however, that it "defended the interests of bourgeoisie." He said he and a dozen "comrades," each carrying a red flag, wanted to show "our class solidarity with French workers." Mr. Sarkaya, a municipal worker, distributes a local government newsletter.

Another group of Marxists nearby waved red banners hailing the late Chinese leader Mao Zedong. Their "general secretary" says he disagreed with the rival group of non-Maoist Marxists led by Mr. Sarkaya but shared their "support for the fight of the French people."

Michael Haselli, a 24-year-old philosophy student, called himself a "resigned idealist," meaning he accepts the reality of the free market but would like something better. He joined in the march even though he's hoping to become a researcher and so is unlikely ever to need a "first job contract."

A group of pro-Palestinian activists handed out leaflets describing their opposition to Israel's role in the occupied territories as akin to the French labor "struggle." Anarchists set up a roadside stall stacked with stickers and fliers. "We want a rich life. Not a life of rich people," read one. Nearby, a group that champions immigrant rights chanted slogans denouncing the "first job contract" as an attempt to make "everyone an immigrant."

Taking shelter under a shop awning during a heavy downpour, a couple of French pensioners dressed in red jackets and wearing red stickers of the French Communist Party said they joined the march to protect the future of their 10 grandchildren.

Jacques Heller, 70, said he had some issues with the brutality of the old Soviet Union but also reminisced about the days when communism still "offered hope." His three children, he said, were not communists. Mr. Heller said he's not optimistic about his party ever winning power. Nonetheless, said his wife, Michelle, 68, a retired hospital worker, "we can't give up."

1 Million Across France March To Oppose Premier's Key Labor Law (LAT)

By Sebastian Rotella And Achrene Sicakyuz

The Los Angeles Times, March 29, 2006

PARIS — More than 1 million protesters marched through the streets of France on Tuesday in opposition to a labor law proposed by Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin, who has staked his political future on the outcome of the clash.

Strikes by transport workers, teachers and other public employees closed schools, slowed transit and disrupted services, but fell short of bringing the country to a stop. Despite an intense security deployment, there were scattered outbreaks of violence around the nation.

The protests culminated a five-week campaign by students who have shut down universities and high schools in an attempt to block a law that loosens job security safeguards in what De Villepin says is an effort to make it easier to hire young people.

"I'm here to show solidarity with the young people," said Nadia Kamech, 50, a biochemistry professor who marched despite intermittent showers in Paris. "I'm waiting for the government to retreat from its positions. If that's not the case, the movement will harden. It's not just the young people in the street, but everybody."

DOJ_NMG_0023398

The estimate of more than 1 million protesters nationwide was made by police; organizers said nearly three times that number of people participated.

During the afternoon, riot officers and volunteer union guards skirmished with dozens of youths in Paris who vandalized vehicles, smashed the windows of a supermarket and a cafe and roughed up protesters, stealing their cellphones, cameras and purses.

Police arrested at least 488 people in Paris and about 300 others elsewhere in connection with the protests. Authorities blamed some of the violence on gangs from outlying slums that have disrupted several recent protests, raising fears of a resurgence of the riots of last November by mostly Muslim residents of the housing projects.

As night fell and the march ended in the Place de la Republique, police used water cannons and tear gas to disperse protesters and others who refused to disband. Assailants threw bottles, stones and other objects at police, injuring one officer, who was hit in the face by a bottle rocket, authorities said. Eight other officers and 46 demonstrators were injured around the country.

Earlier, De Villepin had presided over unruly debate in the National Assembly. Legislators of the center-left opposition accused him of stoking social conflict. In response, the prime minister criticized labor representatives for refusing to negotiate two controversial details of the law: a two-year probation period for workers younger than 26 and the right of employers to dismiss those young employees without cause during that period.

"I am ready to engage in dialogue and modify the contract on two points," De Villepin declared over shouts and jeers of legislators. "They have refused my outstretched hand. I renew this offer here in front of all of you."

Union leaders rejected De Villepin's invitation to meet today and demanded that he accept talks about scuttling the law, which still has to be approved by a constitutional council and President Jacques Chirac.

De Villepin has refused to withdraw the measure, but has said he is willing to discuss reducing the probationary period and requiring employers to explain the grounds for dismissal.

The high-stakes dispute could decide the future of De Villepin's increasingly divided government and affect his chances of running for president next year.

An eloquent and mercurial technocrat, De Villepin, 52, has never run for office. He was appointed by Chirac, his mentor, last year.

De Villepin proposed the disputed labor law in response to last year's riots, which were blamed partly on France's youth unemployment rate, the highest in Western Europe. He used a special procedure to push it through the assembly without debate.

De Villepin has gambled that voters will agree that a system of extensive job security benefits has helped create a cadre of the hard-core unemployed, and must be curtailed. But he risks a popular backlash that has toppled previous leaders who tried to reform social welfare programs. In a nation that last year suffered its worst urban unrest in decades, the combination of street protests and lingering tension in the slums has caused deep concern. It also has aggravated De Villepin's intraparty feud with Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy, a longtime rival and fellow presidential contender.

Sarkozy, who leads the ruling center-right coalition, appeared to distance himself from De Villepin on Tuesday. He told coalition members that the government should hold off on implementing the law in order to advance negotiations, according to press reports.

De Villepin and Sarkozy are likely to be more concerned about their center-right voting base than with the demonstrators, mostly leftists unlikely to vote for either man. But polls show that more than half of voters disapprove of the labor law. And the Chirac government has been weakened by internal strife and a string of setbacks, including the riots and the defeat of the proposed European Union constitution in a national referendum last year.

Some protesters demanded that the government step down.

"Villepin resign!" chanted Eloi, a student wearing a scooter helmet. He pounded a drum in the Place de l'Italie in southeastern Paris, where rock music blared from speakers and the smell of hamburgers and sausages wafted from stands set up for the event.

DOJ_NMG_0023399

"I hope this demonstration brings about the withdrawal of the law," said Eloi, 19, who said he was a music student at the University of Vincennes-Saint Denis and declined to give his last name. "I hope it gets people talking to each other about globalization so they realize that's the real problem."

Labor leaders have warned of more strikes, including a possible general strike. Student leaders have threatened protests such as blocking roads and rail lines in the coming days.

Protests In France Over Youth Labor Law Turn Violent (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino And Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

PARIS, March 28 — France was racked by strikes and demonstrations that turned violent on Tuesday, the latest act in a nationwide political and social drama aimed at forcing the government to rescind a new youth labor law.

A 36-hour strike, which began Monday night, set the stage for demonstrations in more than 250 towns and cities across the country that brought more than a million people into the streets, according to the police. Some of the labor unions put the figure much higher — at close to three million.

The worst violence occurred in the heart of Paris, as the demonstrations were winding down and groups of youths confronted the riot police. One police officer was reported seriously injured when a large firecracker thrown by protesters exploded in his face. The police eventually turned to tear gas and water cannons to clear the protesters away.

The turnout was the largest since protests against the new law began last month, gradually backing Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin into a corner. France's students and unions are demanding that he rescind the law, which he pushed through Parliament without consulting the public.

The law is intended to encourage the hiring of people under 26 by allowing employers to dismiss them without cause within two years. "It's historic," Bernard Thibault, the leader of the Confédération Générale du Travail, a giant left-wing labor federation, said of the turnout. He added, "For us there is just one outcome, and that is withdrawal of this reform."

The strikes that formed the backdrop to the protests disrupted aspects of daily life from transportation to services. Many of the country's universities, schools, post offices, banks, government offices, shops and unemployment bureaus were closed or at least worked more slowly than usual.

The Eiffel Tower was closed. French newspapers were printed but not distributed. Mail was not delivered. The state-run all-news radio station, France Info, broadcast only music. The Paris National Opera even canceled its ballet performances on Tuesday evening.

Still, it was a strike of half-measures. In Paris, 70 percent of the subways and buses were running normally. So were two-thirds of the high-speed TGV trains and half the other train services throughout the country. A third of the flights from French airports were canceled, but most were domestic routes.

Strikes and demonstrations are part of the fabric of French society. But this protest movement, which began three weeks ago, has been crucial for two reasons. The political stakes are high; Mr. de Villepin's presidential hopes hang in the balance, as do the current government's ability to make serious changes to a social welfare system that the country cannot afford.

Then there is also the fear that violence on the margins of the protests could get worse and reignite the nightly ritual of riots, arson and vandalism that gripped the country's suburbs for several weeks last fall.

"I'm afraid that if this continues, the kids from the suburbs will descend on Paris," said José Rodríguez, 37, on the fringes of the demonstration. "I'm afraid of the violence."

In Paris, the police deployed 4,000 officers to maintain order. There were reports of trouble in a number of other cities, including Rennes, Nantes, La Rochelle, Grenoble and Bordeaux. By early evening, more than 380 people had been arrested throughout the country.

Even before the protest started, a group of youths threw rocks at the police in the Paris suburb of Savigny-sur-Orge. Police officers dispersed them with tear gas and made a number of arrests. In another incident near the protest route, about 100 people, known as casseurs, or smashers, in French, broke the windows of a cafe.

DOJ_NMG_0023400

On one Métro line in central Paris, someone pulled the emergency brake on a train after a fight broke out between groups of youths, trapping passengers in the darkened tunnel for five minutes.

The protest march itself was largely peaceful until it reached the Place de la République, where the violence began with brawls between rival groups of young French-Africans, many of them from the troubled suburbs. The violence quickly shifted to skirmishes between police officers and bands of young casseurs.

Youths harassed the police by throwing sticks, rocks and bottles, while the police periodically charged the most violent groups to snatch one or two people for arrest. One shop window was broken along the broad square and the police quickly converged to protect the store from looting.

The police were restrained in controlling the violence, spraying tear gas from aerosol cans to keep protesters at bay and firing paint balls to identify people for possible arrest later on.

Still, a number of young people did suffer blows, both by the police and by other young people. One young woman was knocked down and kicked severely by a small group of young men. The police rescued one journalist as he was being beaten up and also intervened after a band of youths stole cameras and cellphones from marchers. Ambulances took several of the injured away.

As the evening wore on and tempers frayed, the skirmishes grew more violent until the police used water cannons and tear gas canisters to disperse the crowds. With only a few dozen protesters remaining, the French interior minister, Nicolas Sarkozy, arrived with television cameras in tow to thank the police for their restraint and professionalism.

"I came to congratulate the police for changing their methods," he said, apparently referring to the fires and vandalism that followed a student march last Thursday and to the beating suffered by a union worker taking part in a protest earlier this month. Witnesses said police officers delivered that beating, which left the man in a coma. An investigation is under way.

The presidential election is 13 months away, and politicians from the right and left are using the crisis for political advantage.

In a passionate speech tinged with anger before the National Assembly across town, Mr. de Villepin, a political rival of Mr. Sarkozy, vowed never to give in to demands that he rescind the law, although he repeated his offer to open talks on ways to change it.

"What I do not approve of is to just stand with crossed arms in the face of unemployment and to focus on the past, while my compatriots look towards the future," said Mr. de Villepin, his voice so loud that he was shouting at times.

When opposition deputies tried to shout him down with cries of "Stop!" and "Sit down!" Mr. de Villepin accused his detractors of inaction, saying that when the Socialists were in power, they never addressed the problem.

Earlier in the day, Mr. de Villepin met with lawmakers from the governing party, the Union for a Popular Movement, including Mr. Sarkozy, the party's leader.

In a break with the prime minister, Mr. Sarkozy proposed a delay in carrying out the new youth labor law, which was supported by other lawmakers, according to Bernard Accoyer, who heads the party's bloc in the National Assembly.

President Jacques Chirac, who played host to the king and queen of Spain for lunch on Tuesday, and has kept his distance from the crisis, canceled appointments outside Paris for the rest of the week to stay at Élysée Palace and monitor developments.

The strikes on Tuesday may be only the first of other work disruptions if the government refuses to back down.

Certainly, the image of France abroad already has been damaged. "We are currently in a situation of blockage," Léon Bertrand, the French tourism minister, said in an interview. "This time, it's in the heart of Paris. That's the problem."

The ministry was forced to spend $1.2 million to repair the country's image as a safe destination after the riots last fall. In a letter last week to Mr. de Villepin, Bertrand Delanoë, the Socialist mayor of Paris who is running for re-election, asked for compensation for Paris businesses that had suffered revenue losses since the protests began.

On Sunday, the defense minister, Michèle Alliot-Marie, blamed the English-language press for being anti-French. "We have to get out of this situation," she told French journalists. "This is bad for France, its economy. People who don't like us, particularly the Anglo-Saxon newspapers, are using this to denigrate our image."

Well Exercised And Supple, French Unions Flex Muscles (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

PARIS, March 28 — Armed with hot dogs and baguettes, balloons, buttons, banners and, of course, gallons of red wine, France's major trade unions set out Tuesday to change the law, or to bring down a prime minister trying.

Responding to their rallying cry, more than a million people showed up in the streets, marching in the familiar protest parades that the unions sponsor from time to time. In Paris, the slow-moving street fair stretched for miles.

"The unions haven't been this united in 20 years," said Jean-Claude Mailly, general secretary of Force Ouvrière, as he prepared for the protests that are meant to force Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin to withdraw a contested law giving employers the right to fire recently hired young workers without cause.

Despite one of the lowest rates of unionization — only about 8 percent of the French work force are members — the unions have enormous leverage over the government. They play a unique organizational role in France's hierarchical society, rallying the populace accustomed to a confrontational relationship with leaders considered elitist. Spark-plug unions, some people call them.

Their mobilizations have killed efforts to change France's costly, rigid social welfare system before, and have hastened the end of the careers of politicians who got in the way.

But the unions, too, have their own troubles, rent by internal political and ideological battles that have cost them membership. The French have also been losing faith in the unions' ability to stop unpopular government programs after they failed to defeat painful pension reforms three years ago. The current protests and strikes present the unions with an opportunity to recover their reputation as the protectors of workers' rights.

In 1995, the last time France's unions were so united, they forced the withdrawal of a plan to trim pensions and curb health care costs, and were widely credited with causing the conservatives to lose elections two years later that left President Jacques Chirac in an awkward power-sharing arrangement with a Socialist prime minister, Lionel Jospin.

French trade unions got their start in the late 1800's, about the same time as in the United States. The country's first syndicate, the Confédération Générale du Travail, was formed in 1895, not long after Samuel Gompers organized the American Federation of Labor. But the arc of the two countries' labor movements diverged after World War II.

"American politics veered right while French politics veered left," said Gerald Friedman, an economist and author of "State-Making and Labor Movements: France and the United States, 1876-1914."

The French far right was discredited by its Nazi collaboration during the war, and the Communist Party emerged as a powerful force. It was able to put the right to strike into the French Constitution.

That clause makes all the difference: if workers strike in the United States, they risk losing their jobs, but strikers in France do not fear for their jobs, regardless of whether they are union members.

From the beginning, French unions have mobilized people to put pressure on the government instead of simply pressing employers. They have found a willing populace, thanks perhaps to the romantic legacy of the French Revolution.

Because French union organizers do not need the support of a majority of workers at an enterprise to form a union, a small minority of a company's workers can call a strike. When they do, many people take the day off regardless of whether they are union members. All they lose is a day's pay.

But most important, French unions have continued to play a leading role far beyond wage negotiations, fighting to shape a sort of workers' paradise and amassing entitlements for the broader population along the way. It is primarily because of the strength of the unions that all workers enjoy a minimum of five weeks of vacation, affordable health care and a 35-hour week.

"The unions are the origin of the great social conquests, the great entitlements enjoyed by France," said André Narritsens, a historian for the C.G.T., France's largest union.

That progress has won the unions a measure of popular support far larger than that enjoyed by American unions. Many people in the United States take a jaundiced view of strikes because union members are relatively better off than many private-sector employees. But French polls consistently show strong public support for striking workers, despite the havoc they may cause.

DOJ_NMG_0023402

And with strong ideological foundations, French unions have not become associated with organized crime, as has happened with some unions in the United States.

The Basque Spring (NYT)

By Bernardo Atxaga

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

Zalduondo, Spain

THE story that began when a group of university students founded Basque Homeland and Liberty, the organization known as ETA, has finally come to an end with its announcement last week of a permanent cease-fire. If a satellite could detect surges of relief and happiness rather than clouds or storm systems, then the entire southwestern part of Europe would appear on every television screen, and the weatherman of the hour would describe "a sudden reduction in the force of gravity in the region of the Pyrenees," along with breezes and winds that can cure any melancholy.

"These are uncommon phenomena," the weatherman would add, and he would certainly be right. Happiness is always rare, and even more so for the Basques, with 40 years of political violence behind us.

An old proverb has it that "if the thorn doesn't scratch when it first emerges, it will never scratch." The opposite can be said of the organization those students founded: it scratched from the beginning. Already in the early 1960's, its leaders spoke of the need for active resistance against Spain's dictator, Francisco Franco, "son of Adolf and Benito."

They defined, in passing, what they meant by the word "gogortasuna," or toughness: "It means sabotage, guerrilla warfare, frequent strikes, attacks against electrical plants. That is the path we must follow, that is the path of all peoples of the world, the path of liberty." The old-fashioned nationalists who'd taken the losing side in the Spanish Civil War were out of the game as those prepared to sacrifice themselves for Euskadi — the Basque homeland — took their stand.

For several years that attitude seemed little more than swagger, since "active resistance" amounted to some graffiti and the burning of a few Spanish flags. But then, on June 7, 1968, a 23-year-old named Xabier Etxebarrieta shot and killed an officer from the Guardia Civil, Spain's military police force, who'd asked him for his identification card. Hours later, a Guardia Civil patrol ended that young militant's life.

On that particular day, some bricklayers were working on our house. One of them turned to my father and asked, "Zer gertatuko da orain?" or, "What's going to happen now?" He suspected that the event had something to do with politics, and that it would affect us all.

The dead Guardia Civil officer, José Pardines, was buried in his native Galicia after a discreet funeral. As for Xabier Etxebarrieta, he was transformed into "the first martyr of the revolution." Pamphlets distributed during the days after his death waxed eloquent about his decision to abandon a promising career as an economist in order to be "closer to the People," comparing him to Che Guevara.

What was more, they promised revenge: "As of this moment we issue a warning. For us, Txabi Etxebarrieta is worth much more than all the members of the Guardia Civil put together. They have robbed us of him and for that they will be made to pay." The pamphlets were followed by poems and songs, and the image of Etxebarrieta — a skinny kid with nerdy glasses — became as ubiquitous as a popular singer's.

Forty years later, we need no special satellite to see the underside of that heroic posturing. Now our attention is fixed on the savage attacks the ETA perpetrated at the end of the 1980's — like the one in the Hipercor supermarket in Barcelona (21 dead) or the one at the Guardia Civil barracks in Zaragoza (11 dead, among them five little girls).

But back at the beginning, almost everyone accepted a vision of ETA as a band of young idealists prepared to risk their lives to defend a homeland and a language that since the bombardment of Guernica had been victimized by Franco. When, two months after Etxebarrieta's death, another of those young idealists assassinated a police inspector, Melitón Manzanas, the Spanish left publicly celebrated, saying that a "torturer of Communists, Catholics and many other people" had passed on to a better world.

Though we forget this, or don't want to accept it, a great many political nightmares begin as a dream, a shared notion of utopia. That's what happened with the Basques.

DOJ_NMG_0023403

Now, after the cease-fire, no satellite can send us a map of the future, but everyone wants to be a weatherman or a prophet. Some lovers of metaphor speak of Pandora's box and foresee great hatreds let loose. Others believe that pessimism is a sign of intelligence, and they recommend taking ETA's communiqué with many grains of salt. At the opposite extreme are those who call for a reconciliation, right this minute, between the country's two "sensibilities" — Basque nationalism and Spanish nationalism — starting with the creation of a monument that would record, together, the names of all the victims, those killed by ETA alongside ETA members killed by the police.

There are other positions, as well. Many other positions. But still and all, through the clamor of opinion, the feeling of happiness, of lightness, doesn't go away.

From my window I can see some bricklayers working on the facade of the house next door. They're talking boisterously, jumping from one scaffold to the next; they've got the radio turned up full volume. Their mood is nothing at all like that of the bricklayer who, in 1968, asked my father, "What's going to happen now?"

The Scandal Of 'Poor People's Diseases' (NYT)

By Tina Rosenberg

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

It's hard to imagine how a Rwandan woman with AIDS might be considered lucky, but in a way, she is. Effective drugs exist to treat her disease, and their price has dropped by more than 98 percent in the last six years. Research speeds ahead on treatments and vaccines. Although much more needs to be done, the world takes AIDS seriously: rich countries provide money, drug companies have lowered their prices and accepted generic competition, and poor countries like Rwanda are scrambling to provide free treatment to all who need it. None of this is true for people who suffer from malaria, tuberculosis, or a host of other diseases that citizens of rich countries haven't even heard of – like kala azar, sleeping sickness and Chagas disease. Even children with AIDS are out of luck compared to their parents.

All these diseases have been abandoned in some important way. For some, no good treatments exist and there is little attempt to invent them. For others, effective drugs exist, but aren't being made. Or those drugs are so expensive that poor people and poor countries have no hope of buying them. Most of these diseases are easily preventable and completely curable. Saving the lives of their sufferers is much cheaper and easier than treating AIDS. Yet millions of people die of them. Why the difference?

As fatal illnesses go, AIDS is the best one for a poor person to catch because rich people get it, too. The other diseases might as well hang out a sign: "Poor People Only." They offer researchers no profitable market. They have little political constituency. There is no well-connected group of sufferers who stage protests and lobby pharmaceutical companies and Congress to develop better medicines or make existing ones more available. The response to disease is political: the illnesses of invisible people usually stay invisible.

Five years ago, that would have been the end of the story. Today, however, for the best known of these diseases – malaria and tuberculosis – the bleak outlook is starting to change. They are slowly beginning to get the attention, money and research merited by the world's top killers.

People with AIDS all over the world are fortunate to have fellow sufferers in America and Europe. They are even more fortunate that many are middle-class gay men. These men have lots of education, leisure time and income (and usually no kids to spend it on). They are predominantly urban, well-connected and ultra-sophisticated. Their buying power provided pharmaceutical companies with a lucrative market for AIDS drugs. And they lobby. Groups such as ACT UP, which began in the 1980's fighting for the rights of their own members, are now savvy advocates for that woman in rural Rwanda. In poor countries as well, it helps that AIDS strikes all social classes. Brazil would never have become the first poor country to guarantee free AIDS treatment to all who need it without the activism of its many homosexual organizations. For every AIDS victim, though, there are many more suffering from diseases that lack this kind of constituency. Today, contracting a serious disease that affects only poor people is the worst luck of all.

I. How a Beauty Regime Salvaged a Cure for Sleeping Sickness

The story of sleeping sickness is a scandalous illustration of the politics of neglected diseases — and of how much wealthy people drive the global medical market. After malaria, sleeping sickness is the most deadly parasitic disease. It is endemic in 36

DOJ_NMG_0023404

African countries and is always fatal if it is not treated. The cure used in most places is melarsoprol – an arsenic-based drug so toxic that it collapses each vein into which it is injected and kills between two and eight percent of those who take it. There is another cure, eflornithine, so effective that it is called the "resurrection drug" – it makes people in comas get up and walk.

Eflornithine is an old anticancer drug that turned out to be not very effective against cancer. In the mid-1990's, the company that made the drug stopped making it. The fact that it was extraordinarily effective at treating sleeping sickness didn't matter, because victims of that disease had little money to pay for it. After it stopped production, the company, which is now known as Sanofi-Aventis, licensed the drug to the World Health Organization, which together with the medical charity Doctors Without Borders, searched for another manufacturer. But by 2000, the existing stocks of eflornithine were dwindling and no other manufacturer was interested.It looked as though the miracle cure would disappear. Then lightening struck. Eflornithine reappeared in a six-page ad in Cosmopolitan magazine as the active ingredient in the Bristol- Myers Squibb product, Vaniqa, a new cream that impedes the growth of women's facial hair. Doctors Without Borders, which had just won the Nobel Peace Prize and was launching an initiative to find cures for neglected diseases, seized the opportunity to launch a publicity campaign. Christiane Amanpour went to southern Sudan to report on eflornithine for "60 Minutes."

The predecessor to Sanofi-Aventis, which still controlled the rights to the drug, eventually agreed to donate a five-year supply, plus money for research, surveillance and training of health care workers, in a package totaling $25 million. The donation runs out this year, but there is a good chance it will be renewed. A Bristol-Myers Squibb spokesman inadvertently summed up the plight of sleeping sickness in 2001: "Before Vaniqa came on the scene, there was no reason to make eflornithine at all. Now there's a reason." The market agrees with him. Saving American complexions is a reason. Saving African lives, apparently, is not.

II. Why the Youngest AIDS Victims Suffer Most

AIDS in adults is a global focus of concern. AIDS in children, however, has been ignored.

Last year, 570,000 children died of the disease in poor countries, and 700,000 children became infected with H.I.V. Children should not be getting H.I.V. in the first place. Most of them acquire the virus in the womb, at birth or through breastfeeding. Infection is easily preventable with a drug that costs about a dollar per treatment. In many countries, the drug's producer, Boehringer-Ingelheim, provides it for free. It should be used everywhere in the world. But it is not. When children do become infected with H.I.V., there should be a good antiretroviral treatment for them, as there is with adults. But there isn't. Only about 40,000 children worldwide receive lifesaving antiretroviral drugs to combat AIDS. Children's antiretrovirals are expensive. Even in generic form, they cost three or four times the price of adult drugs. The syrups for young children taste terrible. The cheapest option for older children is to take the generic adult pills, broken by a caregiver into halves or thirds. But this poses a risk of underdosing or overdosing, as a half a pill doesn't necessary contain half its active ingredient.

Since most children with AIDS got the disease from their mothers, most sick kids are being raised by a grandmother or raising themselves. This makes having child-friendly medications even more crucial. One of the most important reasons the AIDS treatment revolution has bypassed kids is that pediatric AIDS is now almost exclusively a third-world disease. Virtually all pregnant women in Europe and North America get AIDS tests. Those who are H.I.V.-positive are either given antiretroviral therapy or a drug to cut mother-to-child transmission of the virus. In 1990, 321 infants were born with H.I.V. in New York City. In 2003, only five were. This is wonderful news for wealthy countries. But it has a deadly side effect: it means there is no more paying market for pediatric AIDS medicines, and no lobbying by those whose children have gotten sick. One result is a dearth of affordable child-friendly drugs. Former President Bill Clinton's foundation has negotiated cheaper prices for generic pediatric AIDS medicines from Cipla, an Indian manufacturer, but this only covers a few drugs.

The disappearance of pediatric AIDS from rich countries harms African children in more subtle ways as well. AIDS doctors and nurses in poor nations need clinical training in how to treat small patients whose doses must change as they grow. But there are few doctors with experience treating pediatric AIDS – they come from places that either don't have the problem, or that don't have the solution. Not much research exists about the long-term effects of antiretroviral drugs on kids. There has been little push to improve diagnostic tests or bring down their price – a serious problem, because the most widely used tests do not work in children under 18 months old.

III. Why One Million Africans a Year Die of Malaria

DOJ_NMG_0023405

Malaria used to be common as far north as Canada and Britain. It killed Oliver Cromwell. Shakespeare refers to it, as "ague," in eight of his plays. But today, many Americans don't even realize it is still around. Malaria is all but invisible despite the fact that it is one of the world's top killers, with over a million victims a year in Africa alone. It is the leading cause of death for children under five in Africa. Because rural children don't lobby, malaria is ignored even in Africa. Governments have come to accept a million child deaths as the natural order of things.

Malaria's victims suffer from their invisibility. One way is through lack of money to fight the disease. International organizations and aid agencies talk a lot about malaria. But they have not backed their talk with money. The solutions they push have been things poor people can buy for themselves, because most donors are unwilling to finance more effective measures. All over Africa, a main cure for malaria is chloroquine. The great advantage of chloroquine is that it costs only a few pennies, so even poor African families can buy it. It just has one small problem – in most places it doesn't work. The parasite has become resistant to it. There is a new, effective cure, called artemisinin-based combination therapy. Countries should be switching to it rapidly, but they are not, because it's much more expensive – around $1.40 for an adult cure, 40 cents for a child. That doesn't seem like much to save a life, but it's more than most malaria-stricken families can afford. That means rich-country donors would have to pay. Until recently, they haven't.

Now the United Nations' Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria is starting to help countries switch to a malaria cure that actually works. Wealthy nations are also eager to help prevent the spread of malaria – as long as it doesn't cost much. The hot prevention tool today is an insecticide-treated net to hang over a bed. These bed nets are very effective, if people can get them. But people can't, because donors don't want to give them away. Even at the subsidized price of three dollars, the cost is high enough so that people living on a dollar a day do not buy them. One survey asked rural Africans what they would buy if they had the money. A bed net was sixth on the list. The first three items were a radio, a bicycle and, heartbreakingly, a plastic bucket.

Bed net sale programs generally do not work. In contrast, the country of Togo in 2004 gave away bed nets during its national measles vaccination days. Everyone who brought a child to be inoculated got a free bed net, or a voucher for one. Virtually overnight, Togo acquired an effective form of malaria prevention for most of its young children. But this is a solution many donors seem unwilling to finance.

The United States, of course, didn't beat malaria with bed nets. It killed mosquitoes with insecticide – something that African nations also did with much success half a century ago. Today, South Africa and Mozambique have drastically reduced malaria cases with a program to spray the insides of houses with small amounts of insecticide once or twice a year. Why don't other nations do this? Because it requires government financing, and that means rich countries have to pay. So far, they remain reluctant.

The truth is that many malaria victims would be better off if America still had the disease. If malaria still existed in America, we would be attacking it with DDT . In fact, we did exactly that. America sprayed DDT in large quantities on crops and cities. This was extremely irresponsible and did terrible environmental harm. But now we know that DDT can beat malaria without environmental damage, if it is used as it is in South Africa, sprayed in tiny amounts inside houses. DDT, however, is banned in the United States and Europe. That means that Washington has not, until the last few months, financed its use anywhere else and it has blocked the World Health Organization from issuing recommendations to use DDT. American officials maintained it was hypocritical to push an insecticide overseas that is banned at home. Americans are beginning to realize, however, that it is more hypocritical to deny Africa the ability to use responsibly the tools we used irresponsibly to beat malaria. Last year, President Bush announced a new program to fight malaria in Africa that he says will provide an additional $1.2 billion over the next five years. Such promises have a way of drying up, especially when they concern programs with little political constituency. But the program is well-conceived. It will give away bed nets, buy malaria drugs that work and finance indoor spraying. Eight countries in Africa are due to start spraying this year, and three will use DDT as their primary insecticide.

IV. Tuberculosis, Another Overlooked Killer

To many, tuberculosis is a disease of the past, reminiscent of Keats, the Bronte sisters, and a time when it was it was a death sentence all over the world. But it is only the cure that is outdated.

DOJ_NMG_0023406

The current cure for TB involves taking a six- to nine-month course of four drugs, the newest of which is 40 years old. The currently used – and not very effective – TB vaccine was invented 80 years ago. The most commonly used diagnostic method is hit-or-miss, and it doesn't work at all on people with AIDS. Until very recently, there was no research designed to solve any of these problems. But while the treatment of TB remains mired in the past, TB is, unfortunately, a disease of the future. Once thought to be disappearing, it has roared back, propelled by AIDS. In sub-Saharan Africa, TB cases are rising at six percent a year. One third of the world lives with the TB bacillus in latent form. When AIDS degrades a person's immune system, it activates TB, which has now become the number one AIDS-related killer. In some parts of Africa, 75 percent of people with AIDS also have TB. And they tend to be the poorest. Sons of presidents get AIDS, too, but they are unlikely to get tuberculosis. That has helped keep the disease invisible even as the numbers soar.

Five years ago, however, something happened. With financing from the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation, researchers and public health officials created the TB Alliance. It scours universities and corporations for compounds – both existing drugs and brand new ideas – that might have promise against TB. It negotiates rights to these substances, then raises money to develop and test them, and to obtain regulatory approval – the things no drug company is interested in doing. A companion organization is doing the same for TB vaccines, and another one is taking on TB diagnostic tests. As a result, a drug pipeline that once held nothing now has several promising compounds in clinical trials that might allow a faster, less toxic TB cure.

The story of poor people's diseases has not been a happy one, but things are finally beginning to look up. From 1975 to 1999, only 13 new drugs for neglected diseases were invented. Since 2000, however, 63 new compounds have been put into development, including 18 that are in clinical trials. Most of these new compounds are being managed by groups like the TB Alliance, which go by the unwieldy name of public-private partnerships. These groups — including the Medicines for Malaria Venture , the Malaria Vaccine Initiative , and the International AIDS Vaccine Initiative — are starting to bring real hope to the problem of third world diseases. One World Health is a nonprofit pharmaceutical company that is trying to find cures for illnesses like diarrhea and Chagas disease. Its first product, a cure for a deadly tropical parasite called visceral leishmaniasis, which infects 500,000 people a year, is about to be submitted to India's drug regulatory agency for approval. Doctors Without Borders has its own organization, the Drugs for Neglected Diseases Initiative. The big pharmaceutical companies are also starting to pay more attention. Novartis, AstraZeneca and GlaxoSmithKline have established research labs dedicated to tropical diseases, and many of the largest drug companies are donating medicines. Several companies have programs to work on diseases in specific African countries.

One reason for the surge of interest is AIDS itself. Although many researchers who work on malaria and TB resent the fact that AIDS has hogged most of the attention and financing, the disease has awakened world interest in Africa and poor-country diseases. The pharmaceutical industry has also learned an important lesson with AIDS. Its efforts to maintain high prices and keep out cheap generic drugs – even from poor countries that would not be able to buy brand name medicines – led to worldwide notoriety, and even public comparisons with the tobacco companies. The industry has not reformed. The companies have successfully pushed Washington to negotiate clauses in free trade deals that will make it harder for some of the world's most miserable countries to get generic drugs. But they have begun programs of research and donations of drugs for neglected diseases in part as a way to burnish their image.

The AIDS pandemic has also given birth to the United Nations' Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria, which has become a remarkably efficient ongoing source of money, although one hobbled by wealthy governments' stinginess. The partnerships and the pharmaceutical companies can now be assured that someone with money will buy a new AIDS, TB or malaria drug. They may not make a profit, but they won't take a loss. The other reason for the sudden visibility of poor-country diseases is the establishment of the Gates Foundation, which has $5.8 billion in active global health grants at the moment. There is probably not a single major organization working on any kind of vaccine, diagnostic tool, cure or treatment for any poor country disease that does not get much or most of its financing from the Gates Foundation.

When he began his philanthropy in 1994, Bill Gates was looking to locate and fix market failures and get a lot of results for the buck. He certainly has done that. But how many people have died unnecessarily if one person – albeit one very rich person – can stimulate so much progress in reversing a planet's worth of neglect?

DOJ_NMG_0023407

A Dangerous Deal With India (WP)

By Jimmy Carter

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

During the past five years the United States has abandoned many of the nuclear arms control agreements negotiated since the administration of Dwight Eisenhower. This change in policies has sent uncertain signals to other countries, including North Korea and Iran, and may encourage technologically capable nations to choose the nuclear option. The proposed nuclear deal with India is just one more step in opening a Pandora's box of nuclear proliferation.

The only substantive commitment among nuclear-weapon states and others is the 1970 Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT), accepted by the five original nuclear powers and 182 other nations. Its key objective is "to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons and weapons technology . . . and to further the goal of achieving nuclear disarmament." At the five-year U.N. review conference in 2005, only Israel, North Korea, India and Pakistan were not participating -- three with proven arsenals.

Our government has abandoned the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty and spent more than $80 billion on a doubtful effort to intercept and destroy incoming intercontinental missiles, with annual costs of about $9 billion. We have also forgone compliance with the previously binding limitation on testing nuclear weapons and developing new ones, with announced plans for earth-penetrating "bunker busters," some secret new "small" bombs, and a move toward deployment of destructive weapons in space. Another long-standing policy has been publicly reversed by our threatening first use of nuclear weapons against non-nuclear states. These decisions have aroused negative responses from NPT signatories, including China, Russia and even our nuclear allies, whose competitive alternative is to upgrade their own capabilities without regard to arms control agreements.

Last year former defense secretary Robert McNamara summed up his concerns in Foreign Policy magazine: "I would characterize current U.S. nuclear weapons policy as immoral, illegal, militarily unnecessary, and dreadfully dangerous."

It must be remembered that there are no detectable efforts being made to seek confirmed reductions of almost 30,000 nuclear weapons worldwide, of which the United States possesses about 12,000, Russia 16,000, China 400, France 350, Israel 200, Britain 185, India and Pakistan 40 each -- and North Korea has sufficient enriched nuclear fuel for a half-dozen. A global holocaust is just as possible now, through mistakes or misjudgments, as it was during the depths of the Cold War.

Knowing for more than three decades of Indian leaders' nuclear ambitions, I and all other presidents included them in a consistent policy: no sales of civilian nuclear technology or uncontrolled fuel to any country that refused to sign the NPT .

There was some fanfare in announcing that India plans to import eight nuclear reactors by 2012, and that U.S. companies might win two of those reactor contracts, but this is a minuscule benefit compared with the potential costs. India may be a special case, but reasonable restraints are necessary. The five original nuclear powers have all stopped producing fissile material for weapons, and India should make the same pledge to cap its stockpile of nuclear bomb ingredients. Instead, the proposal for India would allow enough fissile material for as many as 50 weapons a year, far exceeding what is believed to be its current capacity.

So far India has only rudimentary technology for uranium enrichment or plutonium reprocessing, and Congress should preclude the sale of such technology to India. Former senator Sam Nunn said that the current agreement "certainly does not curb in any way the proliferation of weapons-grade nuclear material." India should also join other nuclear powers in signing the Comprehensive Nuclear Test Ban Treaty.

There is no doubt that condoning avoidance of the NPT encourages the spread of nuclear weaponry. Japan, Brazil, Indonesia, South Africa, Argentina and many other technologically advanced nations have chosen to abide by the NPT to gain access to foreign nuclear technology. Why should they adhere to self-restraint if India rejects the same terms? At the same time, Israel's uncontrolled and unmonitored weapons status entices neighboring leaders in Iran, Syria, Turkey, Saudi Arabia, Egypt and other states to seek such armaments, for status or potential use. The world has observed that among the "axis of evil," nonnuclear Iraq was invaded and a perhaps more threatening North Korea has not been attacked.

The global threat of proliferation is real, and the destructive capability of irresponsible nations -- and perhaps even some terrorist groups -- will be enhanced by a lack of leadership among nuclear powers that are not willing to restrain themselves or certain chosen partners. Like it or not, the United States is at the forefront in making these crucial strategic decisions. A world armed with nuclear weapons could be a terrible legacy of the wrong choices.

DOJ_NMG_0023408

Former president Carter, a Democrat, is founder of the Carter Center.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, MARCH 29, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

FBI Agent Says Moussaoui Sought Last-Minute Deal (LAT) 5
Moussaoui Offered To Implicate Himself (WP) 5
Moussaoui Wanted To Testify Vs. Himself (AP-Y2) 7
Defense Tries To Undo Damage Moussaoui Did (NYT) 8
A New Name In 9/11 Plot Surfaces (LAT) 9
Judges On Secretive Panel Speak Out On Spy Program (NYT) 10
Judges Back Bill Examining Domestic Spying (AP-Y2) 12
FISA Judges Say Bush Within Law (WT) 12
Friday's Censure Hearing Faces Possible Delay (RC) 13
Mr. President, Meet Your Censurer (MSNBC) 13
Censuring The President: Four In 10 Favor It (RC) 15
Democrats In Vermont To Weigh Impeachment (AP-Y2) 16
High Court Scrutinizes Military Tribunals Plan For Detainees Justices Challenge Notion That Law Voided Their Jurisdiction (USAT) 16
Justices Hint That They'll Rule On Challenge Filed By Detainee (NYT) 17
Case Tests Power Of Judiciary, President (WP) 18
Justices Hear Challenge To Plan For Guantanamo-Prisoner Trials (WSJ) 19
Tribunal Said To Violate Geneva (WT) 20
Supreme Court Hears Challenge To Military Tribunals (KRT) 21
Supreme Court Debates Plans For Military Trial For Osama Bin Laden Driver (FINDLAW/AP) 22
Military Tribunal Case Comes Before Skeptical Supreme Court (LAW) 23
Record Shows Senators' 'Debate' That Wasn't (WP) 24
Padilla Judge Restricts Classified Info (AP) 25
Prosecutors Rest Case In Terrorism Trial (LAT) 25
Terror Camp Allegedly Attended By Hamid Hayat Likely Exists, Analyst Says (LODINS) 27
SACRAMENTO Hazy Case Against Lodi Man Prosecution Rests -- Evidence Murkier Than First Described (SFC) 28

Homeland Response:

Brain Drain Hits Homeland Security (USAT) 29
GAO: Customs Failed 'Dirty Bomb' Test (WP) 30
Fake ID's At The Border Crossings (NYT) 31
Senators Urge Swifter Action To Strengthen Port Security (AP). 31
Senators Urge Tighter Border Security After Test Finds Flaw (USAT) 32
'Dirty Bombs' Called Threat To Shipping (WT) 32
Takeover Makeover (WSJ) 33
Xenophobia's Threat To Prosperity (WP) 34
"Spy Files" Include Antiwar Surveillance (DENP) 35
ACLU Says FBI Watched War Protesters In A 2003 Domestic Terrorism Probe (AP) 35
FOR THE RECORD (LAT) 36
After Hard Lessons, A New Game Plan For Hurricane Seasons (NYT) 36
La. Candidates Must Track Down Voters (USAT) 37

War News:

Bush Opposes Iraq's Premier, Shiites Report (NYT) 38
U.S. Appeals To Iraq's Top Cleric To Help End Political Impasse (KRT) 40
Negotiations Resume In Capital (WT) 41
True Or Not, Report Of 'Massacre' Angers Iraqis (CSM) 42
U.S. Displays Photos Of Weapons Seized In Baghdad Raid (KRT) 43
Codel Frustration On Iraq (HILL) 43
Bush Says Iraqis Resuming Government Talks (AP-Y2) 45
Thousands Of Iraqis Flee To Avoid Spread Of Violence (WP) ... 45
For Abu Ghraib, A Limited Prosecution (CSM) 46
Rice Asks Russians To Probe Spying Reports (AP-Y2) 48
Russia's Newfound Clout Pushes US To Rethink Ties (AFP) 49
Influence In Iraq Emerges As Key Issue As Arab Conference Opens (NYT) 49
Report Adds To Criticism Of Halliburton's Iraq Role (NYT) 50
Documents Trace KBR Billing Problems (WP) 51
Halliburton's Iraq Work Criticized (WSJ) 52
Documents Describe U.S. Auditors' Battles With Halliburton (LAT) 52
Christian Convert Goes Into Hiding; Italy Asylum Eyed (WT/AP) 53

DOJ:

U.S. Attorney General To Visit Yakamas (YAKHR) 54
U.S. Attorney General Appoints Local Prosecutor As Chair Of Justice Department Advisory Panel (SABJ) 55

Corporate Scandals:

Enron Prosecutors Drop Some Charges And Rest Case (NYT). 55
Enron Defense Is Set To Present 'No Crime' Tack (WSJ) 56
Act 1 Of Enron Case Wraps Up (USAT) 57

Enron Trial Made Simpler (WP) ... 58
Prosecution Rests In Enron Trial (AFP-Y2) ... 59
Judge Dismisses Several Charges Against Lay, Skilling (LAW) . 60
U.S. Grand Jury Subpoenas GM Over Handling Of Supplier Credits (WSJ) ... 60
GM Reveals More SEC Investigations (USAT) ... 61

Criminal Law:

Judge In Illinois Graft Case Denies Request For Mistrial (NYT) . 62
Judge Weighs Jury Alternates In Ryan Trial (FINDLAW/AP) ... 63
Ryan Trial Deliberations To Resume (CHIT) ... 63
2 Jurors Replaced With Alternates (CHIST) ... 64
Prosecutors: Wiretap Evidence Points To Kincaid-Chauncey (KLAS-TV) ... 66
Evacuee Who Returned To New Orleans Arrested In Houston Killing (AP) ... 67
Child-porn Charge Brings Guilty Plea (ORS) ... 67
Case Against Lawmaker Is Upheld (NYT/AP) ... 67
Boehner Sees End Of Legal Battle (RC) ... 68
Lawmaker Loses Phone Tape Appeal (WT) ... 69
FBI Recorded Hutcherson Conversation (LYNCHNA) ... 70
FBI Agents Testify About Dealings With Zimmermann (MINNST)71
Zimmerman Appears In Court (KSTP-TV) ... 72
3 Charged In Murder-for-hire Scheme (CHIT) ... 72
Three Confess Huge Theft From Hudson Firm (AP) ... 72
Convicted Philly Councilman Released Pending Sentencing (AP) ... 73
Lawyer: Mariano's 'Fine' After Psychiatric Tests (PHI) ... 73
In First Public Appearance, Mariano Says 'I'm Fine,' But Nothing More (PHI) ... 74
Witness Links "Mafia Cop" To Murder (NSDY) ... 75
Witness Says Cops Told Him To Dig A Grave (AP) ... 76
Gravedigger's Secret Is Out, 20 Years Later, At Trial Of 2 Ex-Detectives (NYT) ... 76
I DUG GRAVE FOR MOB COPS (NYPOST) ... 77
I've Got Info, Convict Sez (NYDN) ... 78
Victim's Daughters To Testify Vs. G-man (NYDN) ... 78
Feds Bugged Bedroom, Phones Of FIU Pair (MH) ... 79
Muhammad 'Psychotic,' Medical Assessment Says (WP) ... 80
Anti-snitch Campaign Riles Police, Prosecutors (USAT) ... 81
As Scams Go, This Is A Gem (LAT) ... 83
Mr. Rosenbaum At Howard (WP) ... 85

Civil Law:

Big Tobacco Gets Favorable Ruling (WSJ) ... 86
Negotiation On Tobacco Payment (NYT) ... 87
The Dim Halls Of Government Need More Sunlight (HILL) ... 87

Civil Rights:

Pizza Hut Franchisee To Make Restaurants Accessible To Disabled (AP) ... 88
Extension Of Voting Act Is Likely Despite Criticism (NYT) ... 88
Blacks Losing Ground Financially, Study Finds (USAT) ... 90

Antitrust:

Lawmakers Voice Concerns Over McClatchy's Deal (MINNST). 90
Kennedy, Oberstar Call For Review Of Knight Ridder Sale (AP) 91
Coherent Inc: DOJ Requested Added Info On Excel Deal (DOW) ... 92
In Patent Case, EBay Tries To Fight Its Way Out Of Paper Bag (WSJ) ... 92
Justices To Hear EBay Patent Challenge (WT) ... 93
EU Warns Microsoft Over Vista (WSJ) ... 94
Microsoft Cuts Internet Dial-Up Price To Lure AOL Users (WP). 95
Raycom Media Sells 12 TV Stations To Barrington Broadcasting (BIRMBIZ) ... 95
Cargill's Bid For Degussa Unit To Be Cleared By EU, People Say (BLOOM) ... 96
The Problem With Patents (WSJ) ... 96

Environment/Indian Affairs:

How Environmentalists Lost The Battle Over TCE (LAT) ... 97
G.A.O. Sees Loss In Oil Royalties Of At Least $20 Billion (NYT)101
American Indians Cite Voter Intimidation (AP) ... 103
Editorial: After Norton, Lowered Expectations (ICT) ... 103

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Puerto Rico Asks Congress To Lean On FBI (WP) ... 105
Filiberto Pudo Ser Atendido (PRIMHORA) ... 105
Director Del FBI Defiende Actuación De Agentes (PRIMHORA)106
FBI Director Says Preventing Terrorist Attacks Agency's Top Priority (VOA) ... 107
Federal Agents In Right Place, Right Time (NOTP) ... 108
Venezuela Frees Dominican Wanted By U.S. (AP) ... 108
Valley Man Gets 50 Years For Drug Running (BHE) ... 109
2 Held For Selling Cocaine To Agents (CHIST) ... 110
7 Convicted In Meth Case (LYNCHNA) ... 111
Pair Who Ran Elaborate Marijuana-growing Operation In Caroline County Sentenced In Federal Court. (FLS) ... 111
Two Sentenced For Growing Marijuana (RTD) ... 112
Former Clemson Student Pleads Guilty To Drug Charges (AIM)112
WASHINGTON Federal Sentencing Rules For Steroids Offenses Toughened (SFC) ... 113
New York Mayor Bloomberg Takes Gun Fight To Congress (AP)113
ATF Agents Confident They'll Catch Bomber (RMN) ... 114

Immigration:

Senate To Weigh Guest-Worker Proposal (WP) ... 115
Immigration Bill Finds Bipartisan Support In Senate (KRT) ... 116
Boehner Hints A Back Down On 'Amnesty' (WT) ... 117
Lawmakers Are Preparing For Big Battle On Immigrants (NYT)118
AFL-CIO Chief Slams Guest Worker Programs (AP) ... 118
Aid Groups Greet Panel's Illegals Bill (WT) ... 119
Republican Split On Immigration Reflects Nation's Struggle (NYT) ... 120
A GOP Faceoff Over Illegal Immigration (CSM) ... 121
Immigration Splits Republican Lawmakers (WSJ) ... 122
How The GOP Can Survive The Immigration Debate (HILL) ... 124
The GOP Walks A Border Tightrope (WP) ... 125
Mexican Illegals Vs. American Voters (WT) ... 126
It Isn't Amnesty (NYT) ... 127
Poll Shows Growing Fear Among Immigrants (AP) ... 127
Immigration Debate Triggers More Protests (USAT) ... 128

DOJ_NMG_0023411

Schools Focus On Walkouts As A Teachable Moment (LAT)... 129
Students Walk Out In 2nd Day Of Immigration Rights Protest (WP)... 130
Students In Virginia Protest Bill On Illegals (WT)... 131
Fox Urges U.S., Canada To Accept Guest Workers (WT)... 132
Anchor-Advocate On Immigration Wins Viewers (NYT)... 132
Safety Stings At Work Sites Will End, Officials Say (NYT)... 134

Tax:

KPMG Settles Targus Audit Case (WSJ)... 134
Home Sellers Face Unexpected Tax Hit (WSJ)... 134
Facts And Folly (NYT)... 136
Corzine The Canary (WSJ)... 137

Congress-Administration:

More Tweak Than White House Shake-up (PHI)... 137
Bush Taps Bolten To Succeed Card As White House Chief Of Staff (WSJ)... 139
President's Chief Of Staff Resigns After Five Years (LAT)... 140
Bolten 'Not A Change' (RC)... 141
Bolten Replaces Card As White House Chief Of Staff (KRT)... 143
Loyal Bush Aide Chosen As New Chief Of Staff (FT)... 144
Top Bush Aide Resigns (CHIT)... 144
Top Aide Leaves White House Job; Budget Chief In (NYT)... 145
Newsview: Changing Chief Of Staff May Help (AP-Y2)... 147
Card's Departure Seen As A Sign President Hears Words Of Critics (WP)... 148
First Buddy (WP)... 149
Bush's Chief To Consider Changes (USAT)... 150
OMB Head To Replace Card As Top Bush Aide (WP)... 151
Card Resigns As Chief Of Staff (WT)... 152
Bolten To Replace Card As Chief Of Staff (AP-Y2)... 153
'A Cool Hand' On The Switch At White House (USAT)... 154
Shuffling The Deck (WP)... 155
Not Quite What We Had In Mind (NYT)... 155
New White House Chief Of Staff Is A Harley-riding Policy Geek (KRT)... 156
Outside The Office, Bolten Isn't The Usual West Wing Insider (LAT)... 156
Bringing Evolution, Not Revolution (WP)... 157
Joshua Brewster Bolten: Longtime Ally, Now A Top Aide (NYT)159
Washington Wire (WSJ)... 160
Selling U.S. Policy: Big Names For A Big Job (WP)... 162
Trouble May Be Brewing For GOP On Budget (AP-Y2)... 163
Lobby Vote Teed Up For Today (RC)... 164
Senate To Debate Lobbying Reform (WT)... 165
Lobbying-Overhaul Bill Nears Passage With Broad Support (WSJ)... 165
Senators Reject Proposal For Separate Ethics Investigators (USAT)... 166
Senate Votes Down Outside Ethics Office (WP)... 166
Sens. Obama, Coburn Make Unlikely Duo (HILL)... 167
Republicans Vow To Pass Limits On 527s (HILL)... 169
Abramoff Gets Payback In Gaming Bill (HILL)... 169
Affordability, Student Transfers On The Table In Higher-education Bill (USAT)... 171
States Have More Schools Falling Behind (WP)... 172
Math, Reading Crowd Out Other Classes In Test-Driven Schools (LAT)... 173
Frist Cut A Debt Deal With Spending Hawks (HILL)... 174
Democratic Senators Vow FDA Nominee Block (AP-Y2)... 175
Nev. Senator Drops Coast Guard Opposition (AP-Y2)... 175
Voinovich Warms To U.S. Ambassador To U.N. (AP-Y2)... 175
Boehner Changes Tune On Drug Benefit (HILL)... 176
Democrats Opening Assault On Bush Security Policies (NYT). 176
A Party Waiting To Pounce (WP)... 177
Inside Politics (WT)... 178
Internet Firms Want FCC To Enforce Net Neutrality (WP)... 179
OPM Director Asks Congress For Help In Pruning Back Retirement Paperwork (WP)... 180

Other News:

Fed Raises Rate, Hints It's Not Done (USAT)... 181
Fed Lifts Rates A Further Quarter Point To 4.75% (FT)... 182
Fed Boosts Key Rate To 5-Year High (LAT)... 182
From Fed, More Of The Same (WP)... 183
Fed Raises Rates By ¼ Point, Hints More May Come (WSJ).. 184
Fed Panel Raises Rate To 4.75% (NYT)... 186
Fed Raises Interest Rates Again (WT)... 187
Bernanke Steps To The Plate (WSJ)... 188
Prospect Of Higher Rates Sinks In (USAT)... 189
Consumer Confidence At Highest Point In Almost 4 Years (USAT)... 189
Consumer Confidence Advances To Highest Level Since May 2002 (WSJ)... 190
Bank Shares Lead Decline As Fed Raises Interest Rates (NYT/BLOOM)... 190
Oil Prices Top $66 A Barrel On Unrest (USAT)... 191
'War' On Christians Is Alleged (WP)... 191
DeLay Defends Religion In Politics (HILL)... 193
Redemption Among The Faithful (WP)... 193
DeLay Says Justices 'Don't Get' Criticism (AP-Y2)... 194
Reading About Buckham's Activities Takes Strong Stomach (RC)... 194
Weinberger, 'An American Statesman,' Dies At 88 (WT)... 195
Caspar W. Weinberger, 88; Reagan's Defense Secretary (WP)196
Caspar W. Weinberger, Who Served 3 Republican Presidents, Is Dead At 88 (NYT)... 198
Ex US Defence Chief Caspar Weinberger Dies (FT)... 201
Former Defense Secretary Weinberger Dead At 88 (LAT)... 204
Cap Weinberger, R.I.P. (WSJ)... 207
Nofziger: A Friend With Whom It Was A Pleasure To Disagree (WP)... 207
New U.N. Draft On Iran Softens Condemnation (NYT)... 208
Germans Say 6 Companies Sold Nuclear Parts To Iran Network (NYT)... 208
Head Of Arab League Pushes Nuke Programs (NYT/AP)... 209
Arabs Urged To Enter Nuke Club (WT/AP)... 210
'The Last Helicopter' (WSJ)... 211
Olmert Declares Victory In Israeli Elections (USAT)... 212
Voters In Israel Support Parties Vowing Pullout (NYT)... 213

DOJ_NMG_0023412

Sharon's Party Is Winner In Israel (WP) 215
Israel's Centrist Kadima Wins Elections (FT) 216
Kadima Wins Israel Election; Coalition Is Needed (WSJ) 217
Olmert Claims Victory In Israeli Election (AP) 218
Centrist Kadima Party Comes Out Ahead In Israeli Elections (KRT) 219
Olmert, Kadima Party Emerge Victorious In Election (LAT)..... 220
Olmert Claims Election Victory (WT) 222
Egypt Leader To Urge Israel On Peace Talks (AP)..... 223
Hamas-Led Cabinet Is Approved (WP) 223
Palestinian Parliament OKs Hamas Cabinet (AP)..... 224
Bush May Refuse To Meet Nigerian President (AP-Y2) 225
US Raps Nigeria As Liberian Warlord Vanishes (FT)..... 226
The Least Surprising Jailbreak Ever (NYT) 226
A War Criminal Escapes (WP)..... 227
Taylor Said To Vanish In Nigeria (WP)..... 227
Ex-warlord Escapes From Nigeria (CSM)..... 228
Nigeria Says Ex-President Of Liberia Has Disappeared (NYT) 229
Bush May Find Political Soul Mate In Canada's Harper (KRT) . 230
Can Turkey Bridge The Gap Between Islam And The West? (CSM)..... 231
Bolton Presses For New Method Of Calculating Dues At The U.N. (NYT) 232
Trade Truce With China In The Senate (NYT) 233
Citing Progress, Senate Backs Off Showdown With China Over Yuan (WSJ)..... 234
US Senators Postpone Anti-China Tariffs Bill (AFP-Y2) 234
Sens. Delay Bill Aimed At China Currency (AP-Y2) 235
China Signals Greater Currency Flexibility (WSJ) 236
China Passes Japan In Foreign Exchange Reserves (NYT) 236
U.S. And Europeans Consider Sanctions Against 40 Belarus Aides (NYT) 237
Yushchenko Meets With Former Ally, Old Foe (NYT/AP)..... 238
London Mayor Lashes U.S. Ambassador As A 'Crook' (WP).... 238
Municipal Workers Strike In Britain, Closing Schools And Offices (NYT) 239
Pocket Change Finally, A Healthy Japan Offers Lift For U.S., Asian Economies (WSJ)..... 240
Romania Backs Alternate Route For Pipeline To West (WT).... 242
Students And Unions Jubilant At Paris Protests (FT)..... 242
Huge Protest Puts France To The Test (WP)..... 243
Jobs Law Protests Shut Down Transit, Close Eiffel Tower (WT)244
In France, Systematized Revolt (CSM) 245
Liberte, Precarite: Labor Law Ignites Anxiety In France (WSJ). 246
1 Million Across France March To Oppose Premier's Key Labor Law (LAT) 248
Protests In France Over Youth Labor Law Turn Violent (NYT). 249
Well Exercised And Supple, French Unions Flex Muscles (NYT)251
The Basque Spring (NYT)..... 251
The Scandal Of 'Poor People's Diseases' (NYT)..... 252
A Dangerous Deal With India (WP) 256

DOJ_NMG_0023413

TERRORISM NEWS:

FBI Agent Says Moussaoui Sought Last-Minute Deal (LAT)

By Richard A. Serrano

The Los Angeles Times, March 29, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — In an odd twist to an already bizarre trial, the last witness in Zacharias Moussaoui's trial today described a secret nighttime meeting last month at a local jail in which Moussaoui tried to strike a deal with the government to save his life.

FBI Special Agent Jim Fitzgerald, one of the lead agents in the Moussaoui case, told the jury he and federal prosecutors were summoned to the Alexandria City Jail by Moussaoui, who tried to persuade them he was worth more to them alive than he would be dead if they followed through on their effort to seek the death penalty.

But the meeting in the jail law library late on Feb. 6, one month before the trial began, broke down when the government demanded he provide "full and complete" cooperation, not just about his Al Qaeda activities but everything he knew about Osama bin Laden's organization.

Moussaoui came away from the clandestine meeting empty-handed, Fitzgerald said. Moussaoui told the FBI and prosecutors that he believed death at the hands of the U.S. government was not a fitting end to an avowed terrorist like himself.

"He states it was different to die in battle, like an F-16 pilot," Fitzgerald recalled, "than to die in jail like in a toilet."

Fitzgerald was the last witness in a stormy trial that included allegations of witness tampering by a government lawyer and a stunning admission from Moussaoui that he lied to the FBI about the 9/11 plot.

In testimony Monday, Moussaoui said he and Richard Reid, later arrested in a shoe-bombing attempt aboard a transatlantic flight — were slated to hijack a fifth airplane on Sept. 11, 2001, and fly it into the White House.

That assertion was contradicted by several imprisoned Al Qaeda operatives, including the 9/11 mastermind, Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, who said in an interrogation read aloud in court Monday that Moussaoui was too "problematic" and unreliable to join the 19 hijackers in their suicide mission. Mohammad said Moussaoui was being groomed for a second wave of attacks — first disclosed in March 2004 — that included the former Library Tower in Los Angeles and bridges in San Francisco and San Mateo.

Today, the government read more Al Qaeda prisoner interrogations into the record, with most saying that Moussaoui was more of a nuisance than a valuable operator, and playing down his role. Prosecutors also entered into the record the opinion of aviation experts that in the summer of 2001, security analysts were more concerned with traditional hijackers than suicide bombers using airlines to fly into buildings.

The testimony of aviation experts was called into question earlier in the trial, when a lawyer for the Transportation Security Administration, Carla Martin, was alleged to have coached several aviation witnesses.

Closing arguments are scheduled for Wednesday morning, and the jury is expected to begin deliberations in the afternoon.

The jury is deliberating only on the issue of whether Moussaoui is eligible for the death penalty — whether prosecutors have in effect proven their assertion that 9/11 might have been prevented if Moussaoui had not lied about what he knew of the plot when he was captured in August.

If jurors conclude that the French Algerian self-described terrorist could have prevented the attacks by disclosing what he knew — an argument made easier by his admission Monday that he lied to the FBI after he was arrested in Minnesota — then a second phase of deliberations begins on whether to sentence him to die.

Moussaoui is the only Al Qaeda operator to stand trial for the Sept. 11 attacks — and he has told his lawyers that he wants to die to become a martyr.

Asked by lead prosecutor Robert A. Spencer about the loss of life on 9/11, Moussaoui said, "You are Americans, and I consider every American to be my enemy."

Moussaoui Offered To Implicate Himself (WP)

By Jerry Markon And Timothy Dwyer

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

Zacarias Moussaoui wanted to be a witness for the prosecution -- and against himself.

DOJ_NMG_0023414

On the eve of his death penalty trial last month, Moussaoui met with prosecutors and offered to testify for them in exchange for better jail conditions before he was put to death, jurors were told late yesterday. The al-Qaeda operative withdrew the offer when he realized he had the right to testify on his own behalf and when prosecutors insisted that he also tell them about other terrorist plots.

"Have you ever heard of a defendant in a capital case offering to testify against himself?" defense attorney Edward B. MacMahon Jr. asked an FBI agent who took the stand after the news was revealed to the jury.

"No, not in my experience," said agent James M. Fitzgerald.

It was the latest bizarre turn in a trial that is expected to go to the jury today. Before defense attorneys rested their case that Moussaoui is not eligible for the death penalty, jurors heard testimony that one of Moussaoui's terrorist bosses thought he was "not right in the head" -- and that several disputed Moussaoui's testimony that he was supposed to crash a hijacked airplane into the White House on Sept. 11, 2001.

In an effort to save Moussaoui's life, his attorneys ended their case by trying to discredit their client. They told jurors that Moussaoui had said the opposite when he pleaded guilty last year to conspiring with al-Qaeda, insisting then that he was "not 9/11 material."

Prosecutors responded by coming to the defense of Moussaoui, whom they have been trying to execute over his role in the deadliest terrorist attack in U.S. history. They introduced evidence of the meeting Moussaoui requested four days before jury selection began in the trial.

Moussaoui, whose attorneys have vehemently objected to allowing him to take the stand, said he would testify for prosecutors about his plan to fly a fifth hijacked plane into the White House. In exchange for incriminating himself, he did not ask that his life be spared.

"He wanted better jail time between the time he was given a death sentence and the time he was executed," Fitzgerald told jurors. He said the meeting, described as civil, ended when prosecutors told Moussaoui he had an "absolute" constitutional right to testify.

It was unclear how jurors, some of whom were taking notes as they left the courtroom, would view the development. Prosecutors hope it reinforces that Moussaoui was telling the truth when he testified about his role because he would have told prosecutors the same thing. Moussaoui's defense appeared to be trying to signal to jurors that Moussaoui is untrustworthy and cannot be believed.

Moussaoui testified Monday that he was supposed to hijack a fifth plane Sept. 11 and attack the White House with a crew that included Richard Reid, the "shoe bomber." He also admitted to a key part of the government's case: that he had lied to the FBI when arrested in August 2001 to allow the Sept. 11 plot to go forward.

Even the judge indicated that Moussaoui's testimony may resonate with the jury. U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema, who threw out the death penalty in the case in 2003 before being overruled, declined a defense motion yesterday to toss it again.

"This case changed dramatically with Mr. Moussaoui's testimony," Brinkema said out of the presence of jurors.

Defense attorneys spent much of yesterday trying to overcome the damage Moussaoui had done to his case with his testimony. Even if Moussaoui was telling the truth about his role, his admissions did not address a fundamental part of the government's case -- that Sept. 11 could have been thwarted if Moussaoui had told the truth. Defense lawyers tried to hammer that point home -- that the government had plenty of warnings but could not stop it -- to the jury yesterday before resting their case.

Closing arguments are scheduled for this afternoon. If jurors find Moussaoui eligible for death, a second phase of the trial will determine whether he will be executed. Moussaoui, 37, pleaded guilty last year and is the only person convicted in the United States on charges stemming from Sept. 11.

In trying to overcome the image of Moussaoui calmly telling jurors Monday how he wants every American to die and rejoiced about the Sept. 11 attacks, defense attorneys returned to one of their core arguments. They introduced more evidence showing that the government could not stop the attacks, despite all the warnings, because of a pre-Sept. 11 mind-set. The defense argues that Moussaoui's information about the plot would not have helped.

Moussaoui's defense read into the record portions of the July 2001 "Phoenix memo," written by an FBI agent in Arizona, warning of suspicious individuals taking flight training in the United States, as the Sept. 11 hijackers did. The memo was not shared with the CIA or aviation and immigration authorities, and it generated little interest among top FBI officials.

The defense also showed the jury videotaped portions of then-national security adviser Condoleezza Rice's testimony before the independent commission that investigated the Sept. 11 attacks. At one point, Rice was asked by a commissioner whether Moussaoui's information could have helped stop the attacks, as prosecutors have argued at the trial.

DOJ_NMG_0023415

"I do not believe it is a good analysis to go back and presume that somehow we would have gotten lucky by going back and shaking the trees," Rice said. Prosecutors have argued that if Moussaoui had told the FBI about al-Qaeda's plans, the FBI would have scrambled and alerted federal aviation officials, who would have boosted security at the nation's airports.

The captured al-Qaeda members whose testimony was read to the jury did not speak highly of Moussaoui. Nurjaman Riduan Isamuddin, who is known as Hambali and was the chief strategist for a South Asian terror group with ties to al-Qaeda, said he worked with Moussaoui in Malaysia in 2000 and believed he was "very troubled, not right in the head."

Hambali, who was captured in 2003, told interrogators that Moussaoui "managed to annoy everyone he came in contact with." That drew a smile from Moussaoui, who otherwise did not visibly react to the testimony.

Mustafa al-Hawsawi, the financial and travel planner for Osama bin Laden's organization, said he saw Moussaoui at al-Qaeda training camps in Afghanistan but never helped him with flight arrangements to the United States -- as he did for the other hijackers who brought down the World Trade Center, damaged the Pentagon and crashed a plane into a field in Pennsylvania.

The statements, which were read to the jury by defense attorneys, climaxed a court battle that delayed the case for more than two years. Brinkema granted Moussaoui's lawyers access to a number of al-Qaeda detainees they said could help his defense. The government refused to produce them, for national security reasons, and a federal appeals court eventually said the detainees would not testify.

Instead, the court said, the statements they gave to interrogators would be read to the jury.

Moussaoui Wanted To Testify Vs. Himself (AP-Y2)

By Michael J. Sniffen, Associated Press Writer

AP2, March 29, 2006

Al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui offered last month to testify for prosecutors against himself at his death-penalty trial and told agents that he did not want to die in prison, according to last-minute testimony Tuesday.

The bizarre testimony capped a trial that has seen more than its share of the unusual over three tumultuous weeks. Introduced as part of a brief government rebuttal case, this testimony may be the firmest evidence the 37-year-old Frenchman of Moroccan descent hopes for martyrdom through execution and could provide fodder for the closing arguments of both prosecutors and Moussaoui's court-appointed defense attorneys.

U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema set Wednesday afternoon for closing arguments on whether the actions Moussaoui has admitted make him eligible for the death penalty. The jury must decide whether the only man charged in this country in the Sept. 11 plot will be executed or imprisoned for life.

Moussaoui offered on Feb. 2, just before jury selection began, to testify that he was to have hijacked and piloted a fifth plane on Sept. 11, 2001. He did not ask that prosecutors stop pursuing the death penalty in return. He sought only better conditions in prison and a promise not to be called to testify against other al-Qaida members.

FBI agent James Fitzgerald said Moussaoui told him — in a jailhouse meeting the defendant requested — that he did not want to die behind bars and it was "different to die in a battle ... than in a jail on a toilet." Moussaoui dropped this bid after he learned that he had an absolute right to testify in his own defense.

On Monday, he stunned the court by asserting that he was to fly a 747 jetliner into the White House on Sept. 11, despite having claimed for three years that he had no role in the plot. Instead, he had said he was to be part of a possible later assault.

The February meeting was to have been off the record but was introduced by prosecutors to rebut a defense exhibit. Closing its case Tuesday, the defense had introduced a partial transcript of Moussaoui's guilty plea last April.

In that 2005 pleading, Moussaoui said, "Everybody knows that I'm not 9/11 material." He said Sept. 11 "is not my conspiracy." He said he was going to attack the White House if the United States did not release radical Egyptian cleric Omar Abdel Rahman, imprisoned for other terrorist crimes.

The latest strange turn in Moussaoui's behavior could bolster the defense's claims that he would say anything to achieve martyrdom. Defense attorney Edward MacMahon told jurors in opening remarks that Moussaoui can only achieve that now if they vote to execute him. "Don't make him a hero," MacMahon pleaded.

Prosecutors got Brinkema to bar a repeat of that plea as an emotional rather than legal argument. But she agreed to allow MacMahon to argue Wednesday that evidence of a desire for martyrdom calls into question the credibility of Moussaoui's confession to being a part of Sept. 11.

The defense closed out its case Tuesday by using two high-ranking al-Qaida operatives to rebut their own client's claim that his plan to attack the White House was part of the Sept. 11 attacks.

The leaders of Osama bin Laden's terrorist group cast doubt on whether Moussaoui was part of Sept. 11, one portraying him as a misfit who refused to follow orders.

DOJ_NMG_0023416

Tuesday's proceedings were quite unusual for an American courtroom: Defense attorneys — appointed by the court to represent a client who despises them — tried to undermine the defendant's own bombshell testimony of Monday by using witnesses who were not present or seen in the courtroom, primarily because the government refused to allow captured al-Qaida members to appear for national security reasons.

Testimony from five al-Qaida members was read to the jury as defense attorneys tried to undo damage Moussaoui might have done to his case when he testified against their advice.

One terrorist, identified as Sayf al-Adl, a senior member of al-Qaida's military committee and close aide to bin Laden, stated sometime between Sept. 1, 2001, and late July 2004 that Moussaoui was "a confirmed jihadist but was absolutely not going to take part in the Sept. 11, 2001, mission." The 9/11 Commission reported the U.S. recovered from a safehouse in Pakistan a letter written by al-Adl describing the various candidates considered for the Sept. 11 attacks.

Another top terrorist witness — Waleed bin Attash, known as Khallad — is considered the mastermind of the 2000 suicide attack on the USS Cole and an early planner of the Sept. 11 plot. He said he knew of no part that Moussaoui was to have played in the Sept. 11 attacks. Khallad was captured in April 2003.

Their testimony supports that of another captive, Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, chief organizer of the Sept. 11 attacks. He said in testimony read Monday that Moussaoui had nothing to do with the Sept. 11 plot, but was to have been part of a later wave of attacks.

Most of the testimony of al-Qaida operatives was compiled from statements made during U.S. interrogations. The captives themselves have never spoken to either defense attorneys or prosecutors in this case, because prosecutors prevailed in the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals over the defense's request to question these witnesses live in court, or at least on videotape.

Also Tuesday, defense attorney Alan Yamamoto read portions of the joint Sept. 11 report by the Senate and House intelligence committees. The panel said that before Sept. 11, the U.S. intelligence community produced 12 reports between 1994 and 2001 "suggesting that terrorists might use airplanes as weapons." Later, the defense played videotape of then-National Security Adviser Condoleezza Rice and other top officials telling the 9/11 Commission they had no inkling al-Qaida had considered using airplanes as missiles.

This combination supported the defense theory that the government knew more beforehand than Moussaoui about Sept. 11 but ignored or bungled leads that might have unraveled the plot. Prosecutors contend Moussaoui's lying to FBI agents upon arrest prevented the FBI and the Federal Aviation Administration from identifying the hijackers and keeping them off airplanes on Sept. 11.

___

Associated Press Writer Matthew Barakat contributed to this report.

Defense Tries To Undo Damage Moussaoui Did (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va., March 28 — Defense lawyers trying to prevent the government from executing Zacarias Moussaoui for the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks ended their case on Tuesday with last-minute efforts to undo the damage he had inflicted on himself with testimony in which he calmly agreed to the charges against him.

The lawyers presented the accounts of senior Qaeda terrorists who gave statements from captivity to deflate Mr. Moussaoui's surprise claim on Monday that he was to have played a major role in the Sept. 11 attacks. The Qaeda officials, whose testimony was recited in court, portrayed Mr. Moussaoui as an unreliable and unstable colleague who was unconnected to the Sept. 11 plot.

"He had dreams about flying a plane into the White House," a South Asian terrorist known as Hambali, captured in 2003, was quoted as saying. Hambali said Mr. Moussaoui was known to be "not right in the head and having a bad character."

Besides the account of Hambali, the defense on Tuesday offered the recollections of Mustafa al-Hawsawi, a financial and travel planner for Al Qaeda who worked closely with the Sept. 11 hijackers; Mohammed al-Qahtani, who is widely believed to be the real missing "20th hijacker"; and a Qaeda operative known as Khallad, whom investigators have linked to the bombing of two American embassies in Africa in 1998 and the attack on the destroyer Cole in Yemen 2000, as well as to the Sept. 11 plot.

Mr. Al-Qahtani is imprisoned at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba; the others are being held in the secret detention system of the Central Intelligence Agency, which is believed to house about two dozen senior Qaeda officials.

All provided statements that Mr. Moussaoui was never meant to be part of the Sept. 11 plot.

Mr. Moussaoui's court-appointed lawyers, who did not want him to testify, put on less than two full days of testimony, far less than did prosecutors. In a brief rebuttal, prosecutors produced evidence that Mr. Moussaoui had offered to testify for them against himself if they would have agreed to see that he spent his time before execution in a more comfortable jail cell.

DOJ_NMG_0023417

The suddenly accelerated pace of the trial means that the jury will begin deliberating Wednesday afternoon.

After the jury departed for the day, Judge Leonie M. Brinkema turned away a defense bid to strike the death penalty, saying, "This case changed dramatically with Mr. Moussaoui's testimony Monday."

In his few hours on the witness stand that day, Mr. Moussaoui appeared to undo much of the defense that his lawyers had built since the beginning of the trial, which is solely to determine whether he will be put to death or spend the rest of his life in jail. Mr. Moussaoui not only agreed with prosecutors that he was in Al Qaeda, he also asserted that he knew most of the hijackers and was to have flown a fifth plane on Sept. 11 into the White House.

Prosecutors have argued that Mr. Moussaoui deserves to be executed because when he was arrested on Aug. 16 on immigration violations, he lied to investigators about his knowledge of Qaeda plans to fly planes into buildings. Had Mr. Moussaoui told the truth, the prosecutors have said, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Federal Aviation Administration would have taken quick action to thwart the plot.

Defense lawyers have pressed the idea that any information Mr. Moussaoui may have provided would have become part of the sea of unchecked leads in the days before the attacks. In completing their case Tuesday, the lawyers played a videotape for the jury of the testimony of Thomas J. Pickard, the acting F.B.I. director at the time of the attacks, before the commission investigating the attacks.

Mr. Pickard was asked what he would have done if he had known three facts that became apparent to senior officials only after the attacks: that Mr. Moussaoui was an Islamic extremist taking flying lessons; that two identified Qaeda terrorists were probably in the country in August 2001; and that an F.B.I. agent in Phoenix had drafted a memorandum saying that he noticed an unusual number of young Middle Eastern men were enrolling in American flight schools and might be planning some hijacking plot.

He replied that given the thousands of terrorism leads the bureau was evaluating in the summer of 2001, "I don't know, with all the information the F.B.I. collects, whether we would have had the ability to hone in specifically on those three items."

In addition to the issue of what the F.B.I. may have done if Mr. Moussaoui had not lied, a major question the jury will have to consider is his real stature in Al Qaeda. Under a complicated federal death penalty law, the jury will first have to consider whether Mr. Moussaoui is responsible for any deaths on Sept. 11. Only if jurors are unanimous in deciding that he was do they move to the next phase in which they consider whether he should be executed.

The Sept. 11 commission did not offer firm conclusions about Mr. Moussaoui's role, speculating that he might have been kept in reserve as a substitute pilot. But the commission noted that Al Qaeda had invested heavily in him, providing more than $30,000 for travel and pilot training.

Eleanor J. Hill, the staff director of the joint Congressional investigation of 9/11, said that the planners told participants little in advance about their respective roles, so it is possible that Mr. Moussaoui did not know what his Qaeda superiors would ultimately have ordered him to do.

Ms. Hill said Mr. Moussaoui's dramatic courtroom statements might well be self-aggrandizing exaggerations or outright inventions.

"He clearly wants the world to know he wants to kill Americans," said Ms. Hill, a Washington lawyer. "Why wouldn't he want to exaggerate and glorify his potential role in an attack he considers a huge success? If he's just a bystander, he doesn't get much of a place in history."

A New Name In 9/11 Plot Surfaces (LAT)

By Josh Meyer

The Los Angeles Times, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Shaikh Mohammed has told interrogators that at least 34 individuals were "participants" in the attacks on New York and the Pentagon, including a mysterious Jordanian who supposedly prepared 10 of the hijackers for their grisly task by training them to butcher camels and sheep with Swiss Army knives.

Mohammed's statements were read aloud in court this week during the sentencing trial of Zacarias Moussaoui, the only person charged in the United States as a co-conspirator in the terrorist attacks.

His disclosures, made public more than four years after the attacks, open a window into the inner workings of the Sept. 11 plot, both in terms of who allegedly participated in it and how it was carried out so successfully.

The government refused to allow Mohammed to testify in person. But questions from the prosecution and defense were put to him during interrogations at undisclosed locations overseas. At least some of the material was made available to members of the independent commission that investigated the Sept. 11 attacks, although the specifics of what the panel was provided were not immediately known.

DOJ_NMG_0023418

According to a 58-page summary read in court Monday, Mohammed broke the Sept. 11 participants into six groups, each having a different level of involvement in the plot or prior knowledge of it.

In the top tier were Osama bin Laden, his loyal aide and military commander Mohammed Atef and Mohammed himself, along with his designated liaison to the hijackers, Ramzi Binalshibh, the summary stated.

The only other member of the top tier was Abu Turab al-Urduni — a Jordanian who, according to Mohammed's statement, had "full knowledge" of the plot as trainer of 10 of the "muscle" hijackers; their job was to commandeer the planes, subdue the pilots and keep the passengers at bay.

Abu Turab, as he was referred to in the summary, had years of experience with Al Qaeda and was working at the terrorist network's Al Matar complex in Afghanistan in late 2000 and early 2001 when 10 would-be hijackers were given to him for training, Mohammed's interrogation summary said.

Abu Turab trained the men to hijack a plane, disarm air marshals and put together and use explosives, the summary said. He allegedly showed them how to gain strength through bodybuilding, and taught them basic English words and phrases.

And at a second Al Qaeda camp, Al Faruq, "Abu Turab also had each hijacker butcher a sheep and camel with a Swiss knife to prepare them for using their knives during the hijackings," the summary stated.

In consultation with Mohammed, the summary said, Abu Turab instructed the "muscle" hijackers to focus on seizing the cockpit first "and then worry about seizing control over the rest of the plane."

As part of his successful effort to maintain operational security, the summary continued, Abu Turab trained the hijackers in making truck bombs, blowing up buildings and hijacking trains so they would not know for sure what their assignment would be once they reached the United States.

The disclosures, if true, are significant in that one of the more senior co-conspirators of the Sept. 11 attacks — Abu Turab — has never been identified publicly until now despite years of investigations, public hearings and commission reports.

Mohammed also named two Al Qaeda officials, whose identities were known, as having played previously undisclosed but lesser roles in the attacks.

One is Ammar al-Baluchi, a nephew of Mohammed who rose to become one of Al Qaeda's top operatives before being captured in Pakistan in May 2003.

Mohammed identified Baluchi as a key travel and financial facilitator for the hijackers, along with Mustafa Ahmed al-Hawsawi, whose role as a United Arab Emirates-based paymaster for the attacks has been acknowledged by U.S. officials since he was captured with Mohammed in raids in Pakistan in March 2003.

The other operative whose role Mohammed detailed was Abd Al-Rahim Ghulam Rabbani, also known as Abu Ramah. Mohammed said Abu Ramah helped several of the hijackers go through Pakistan on their way in and out of Afghanistan.

The interrogation summary also alludes to seven lower-level participants who have not been publicly identified, but it did not include their names.

"They knew that they were involved in a martyrdom operation and that it involved traveling to the U.S., but they never learned the real purpose of the operation until after the 9/11 attacks," the summary said.

Several U.S. authorities said in interviews Tuesday that they viewed at least some of Mohammed's claims with skepticism because he had been proved a calculated expert at providing his interrogators with disinformation to send his pursuers down blind alleys and protect ongoing Al Qaeda plots.

But a U.S. intelligence official familiar with the continuing investigation into Sept. 11 confirmed the basic outlines of Mohammed's claims, particularly about Abu Turab. He said the Jordanian was killed by U.S. forces in Afghanistan in late 2001, around the time Atef was killed by a U.S. airstrike.

That official and others, however, said the true role that Abu Turab, Baluchi and others played in the attacks might never be fully known to U.S. authorities, unless key figures such as Bin Laden and his second in command, Ayman Zawahiri, were captured and could corroborate or deny Mohammed's claims.

"A whole lot of guys boiled to the surface after 9/11" and their roles are still being investigated, said one former federal law enforcement official who has spent years tracking Al Qaeda's leaders.

The current and former U.S. officials interviewed Tuesday all spoke on the condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to discuss such matters.

Judges On Secretive Panel Speak Out On Spy Program (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 28 — Five former judges on the nation's most secretive court, including one who resigned in apparent protest over President Bush's domestic eavesdropping, urged Congress on Tuesday to give the court a formal role in overseeing the surveillance program.

In a rare glimpse into the inner workings of the secretive court, known as the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, several former judges who served on the panel also voiced skepticism at a Senate hearing about the president's constitutional authority to order wiretapping on Americans without a court order. They also suggested that the program could imperil criminal prosecutions that grew out of the wiretaps.

Judge Harold A. Baker, a sitting federal judge in Illinois who served on the intelligence court until last year, said the president was bound by the law "like everyone else." If a law like the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act is duly enacted by Congress and considered constitutional, Judge Baker said, "the president ignores it at the president's peril."

Judge Baker and three other judges who served on the intelligence court testified at a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing in support of a proposal by Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, to give the court formal oversight of the National Security Agency's eavesdropping program. Committee members also heard parts of a letter in support of the proposal from a fifth judge, James Robertson, who left the court last December, days after the eavesdropping program was disclosed.

The intelligence court, created by Congress in 1978, meets in a tightly guarded, windowless office at the Justice Department. The court produces no public findings except for a single tally to Congress each year on the number of warrants it has issued — more than 1,600 in 2004. Even its roster of judges serving seven-year terms was, for a time, considered secret.

But Mr. Bush's decision effectively to bypass the court in permitting eavesdropping without warrants has raised the court's profile. That was underscored by the appearance on Tuesday of the four former FISA judges: Judge Baker; Judge Stanley S. Brotman, who left the panel in 2004; Judge John F. Keenan, who left in 2001; and Judge William H. Stafford Jr., who left in 2003. All four sit on the federal judiciary.

At a hearing lasting more than three hours, the former FISA judges discussed in detail their views on the standards of proof required by the court, its relations with the Justice Department, and the constitutional, balance-of-power issues at the heart of the debate over the N.S.A. program. The agency monitored the international communications of people inside the United States believed to be linked to Al Qaeda.

The public broadcasting of the court's business struck some court watchers as extraordinary. "This is unprecedented," said Magistrate Judge Allan Kornblum, who supervised Justice Department wiretap applications to the court for many years and testified alongside the four former judges.

But the most pointed testimony may have come from a man who was not at the hearing: Judge Robertson.

A sitting federal judge in Washington, Judge Robertson resigned from the intelligence court just days after the N.S.A. program was disclosed.

Colleagues say he resigned in frustration over the fact that none of the court's 11 judges, except for the presiding judge, were briefed on the program or knew of its existence. But Judge Robertson has remained silent, declining all requests for interviews, and his comments entered into The Congressional Record on Tuesday represented his first public remarks on the controversy.

In a March 23 letter in response to a query from Mr. Specter, the judge said he supported Mr. Specter's proposal "to give approval authority over the administration's electronic surveillance program" to the court.

The Bush administration, in its continued defense of the program, maintains that no change in the law is needed because the president has the inherent constitutional authority to order wiretaps without warrants in defense of the country.

Mr. Specter's proposal seeks to give the intelligence court a role in ruling on the legitimacy of the program. A competing proposal by Senator Mike DeWine, Republican of Ohio, would allow the president to authorize wiretaps for 45 days without Congressional oversight or judicial approval.

Judge Robertson made clear that he believed the FISA court should review the surveillance program. "Seeking judicial approval for government activities that implicate constitutional protections is, of course, the American way," he wrote.

But Judge Robertson argued that the court should not conduct a "general review" of the surveillance operation, as Mr. Specter proposed. Instead, he said the court should rule on individual warrant applications for eavesdropping under the program lasting 45 or 90 days.

Acknowledging the need for secrecy surrounding such a program, he said the FISA court was "best situated" for the task. "Its judges are independent, appropriately cleared, experienced in intelligence matters, and have a perfect security record," Judge Robertson said.

He did not weigh in on the ultimate question of whether he considered the N.S.A. program illegal. The judges at the committee hearing avoided that politically charged issue despite persistent questioning from Democrats, even as the judges raised concerns about how the program was put into effect.

Judge Baker said he felt most comfortable talking about possible changes to strengthen the foreign intelligence law. "Whether something's legal or illegal goes beyond that," he said, "and that's why I'm shying away from answering that."

Judges Back Bill Examining Domestic Spying (AP-Y2)

By Pete Yost

AP2, March 28, 2006

Five federal judges gave a boost Tuesday to legislation that would bring court scrutiny to the Bush administration's domestic spying program.

At a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing chaired by Sen. Arlen Specter (news, bio, voting record), R-Pa., the judges reacted favorably to his proposal that would require the secretive Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court to conduct regular reviews of the four-year-old program.

The existence of the warrantless surveillance by the National Security Agency was revealed by The New York Times three months ago.

The judges stressed that they were not offering their views on the NSA operation, which they said they knew nothing about.

But they said the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court has operated capably for 28 years and is fully able to protect civil liberties and give the administration all the speed and flexibility it needs to execute the war on terror.

The administration contends the president has inherent war powers under the Constitution to order eavesdropping without warrants.

"I am very wary of inherent authority" claimed by presidents, testified U.S. Magistrate Judge Allan Kornblum. "It sounds very much like King George."

Before word of the warrantless surveillance leaked publicly, the Bush administration revealed it to just eight members of Congress and to the presiding judge on the surveillance court.

The hearing Tuesday focused on Specter's bill. A rival approach, drafted by Senate Judiciary Committee member Mike DeWine of Ohio and three other Republicans, would allow the government to conduct warrantless surveillance for up to 45 days before seeking court or congressional approval.

Senate Intelligence Committee Chairman Pat Roberts, R-Kan., expressed interest in handling legislation on the NSA effort. But the Senate Parliamentarian gave Specter jurisdiction over his bill and DeWine's.

Senate Judiciary Committee member Russ Feingold, D-Wis., has urged censure of the president for authorizing the warrantless surveillance.

Under it, the NSA can monitor international calls — when one party is inside the United States — without first getting court approval. The NSA has been conducting the surveillance when calls and e-mails are thought to involve al-Qaida.

The others testifying before Specter's panel were U.S. District Judges Harold Baker of Urbana, Ill.; Stanley Brotman of Camden, N.J.; John Keenan of the southern district of New York City; and William Stafford of Pensacola, Fla.

The careers of all five judges have been steeped in the work of the secret surveillance court.

In an interview about the program with The Associated Press last week, Specter said administration officials want to do "just as they please, for as long as they can get away with it. I think what is going on now without congressional intervention or judicial intervention is just plain wrong."

FISA Judges Say Bush Within Law (WT)

By Brian DeBose

The Washington Times, March 29, 2006

A panel of former Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court judges yesterday told members of the Senate Judiciary Committee that President Bush did not act illegally when he created by executive order a wiretapping program conducted by the National Security Agency (NSA).

The five judges testifying before the committee said they could not speak specifically to the NSA listening program without being briefed on it, but that a Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act does not override the president's constitutional authority to spy on suspected international agents under executive order.

"If a court refuses a FISA application and there is not sufficient time for the president to go to the court of review, the president can under executive order act unilaterally, which he is doing now," said Judge Allan Kornblum, magistrate judge of the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Florida and an author of the 1978 FISA Act. "I think that the president would be remiss exercising his constitutional authority by giving all of that power over to a statute."

DOJ_NMG_0023421

The judges, however, said Mr. Bush's choice to ignore established law regarding foreign intelligence gathering was made "at his own peril," because ultimately he will have to answer to Congress and the Supreme Court if the surveillance was found not to be in the best interests of national security.

Judge Kornblum said before the 1978 FISA law, foreign surveillance was done by executive order and the law itself was altered by the orders of Presidents Ford, Carter and Reagan.

It has been three months since President Bush said publicly that the NSA was listening to phone conversations between suspected terrorists abroad and domestically. The actions raised concerns from Congress and civil liberties groups about domestic spying, but the judges said that given new threats from terrorists and new communications technologies, the FISA law should be changed to give the president more latitude.

Sen. Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican and committee chairman, called the hearing to get advice on his bill that would expand FISA to codify less stringent rules on wiretapping of domestic phone conversations with suspected foreign terrorists and include new technologies like the Internet and satellite communications.

Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat, said the Congress should pass new legislation to ease existing restrictions under FISA.

"However, we should not rush to give the administration new powers it has not deigned to request, based on concerns it has not articulated," Mr. Leahy said.

The panel of judges unanimously agreed that the law should have been changed before now to deal with new threats from terrorists and new communications technologies, a point made by Sen. Dianne Feinstein, California Democrat.

"It is confusing that if you take something off of a satellite it is legal, but if you take it off of a wiretap it's not," she said. "We need to include new technology."

Friday's Censure Hearing Faces Possible Delay (RC)

By Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, March 29, 2006

Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) on Tuesday left open the possibility that a hearing set for Friday on Sen. Russ Feingold's (D-Wis.) bill to censure President Bush could be delayed, saying there are "a lot of balls in the air."

Specter said he first wanted to talk to Feingold about the substance and direction of the hearing, as well as the White House, which he had asked to participate. The chairman also left open the possibility that the topic of immigration could still be on Judiciary's plate at the week's end — and push off consideration of the censure resolution.

"I want to talk to Sen. Feingold about it," Specter said. "I want to see what witnesses he wants to call, I want to see what the contours of the hearing will be."

Talk of possibly pushing off the hearing was the topic of conversation Tuesday after Specter suggested to the Judiciary Committee earlier in the day that Feingold could not be available Friday and thus the hearing would have to be rescheduled.

But Feingold said "there is no truth to that whatsoever" and he continues to plan on a hearing Friday. He said he is assembling his witnesses, including some constitutional scholars, and was "perplexed" by Specter's suggestion that he wanted to delay consideration of the bill.

"I don't know where he came up with that," Feingold said.

He added that he doesn't know whether Specter — who sent out a notice to hold the hearing last Friday — still wants the committee to meet on the matter. But he said Specter is the chairman and it is up to him to decide when and whether to proceed.

"I'm prepared to do it," Feingold said.

Feingold's resolution seeks to condemn the president for authorizing an illegal domestic wiretapping program and then misleading the public about its existence. The Wisconsin lawmaker's controversial measure has attracted the support of just two Senators, Democrats Barbara Boxer (Calif.) and Tom Harkin (Iowa).

The censure resolution remains on the Judiciary Committee calendar for Friday. Republican sources also said the Judiciary panel may discuss the bill in executive session on Thursday in advance of the scheduled hearing.

Specter said he remained unsure if the measure would get its day on Friday, but that it remains on the schedule.

"It's on the books," he said.

Mr. President, Meet Your Censurer (MSNBC)

By Tom Curry

MSNBC.com, March 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0023422

WASHINGTON - As Sen. Russ Feingold urges the Senate to censure President Bush, the alleged misdeed that moved the Wisconsin Democrat to propose censure continues: the Bush administration keeps conducting surveillance of calls by suspected al Qaida operatives to and from people in the U.S.

Feingold had to leave early from Tuesday's Senate Judiciary Committee hearing on how to legalize the National Security Agency surveillance program -- he had an appointment at the White House to meet with the man he wants to censure.

Just back from Iraq, Feingold was part of a group of senators who went to discuss their findings with President Bush.

Would this meeting be awkward?

"No," Feingold said as he hustled down a Senate hallway on his way to the White House. "The president and I and others who've been involved in government for a while know that each issue is different. And we have an obligation to each other and the country to treat each issue differently."

He added, "I appreciate the president's interest in the findings from the trip this weekend. In my mind, it won't be awkward. I respect the president, I respect him personally and I respect his office."

Meanwhile back at the Judiciary Committee, Chairman Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., has scheduled a Friday hearing on the censure proposal.

Specter opposes censure, as does Judiciary Committee Democrat Sen. Joe Biden of Delaware, who said at Tuesday's hearing, with exasperation in his voice, "The idea of censuring the president — we don't know what he did."

The politics of a censure vote

Friday's censure hearing sets up what both Feingold and Senate Majority leader Bill Frist want: a roll call vote on the Senate floor on censuring Bush.

This would force all 100 senators — and especially the potential Democratic presidential hopefuls — Sens. Biden, Evan Bayh, John Kerry and Hillary Clinton — to go in the spotlight and make their choice: either condemn Bush for taking an action which the president argues is necessary to defend the nation from al Qaida attacks — or give Feingold a potential weapon to use against them in the event that he too seeks the Democratic presidential nomination.

A "no" vote on censure would also incur the wrath of Democratic groups such as Moveon.org.

Even as he moves ahead on a censure showdown, Specter is also pressing forward on the bill he has drafted to put the NSA surveillance under the scrutiny of a special court established by the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA).

Under Specter's proposal, if, after finding out more about the program, the FISA court determined it was constitutional, then it could continue.

"I'm going to bring it up as the priority item when we come back after the Easter break," Specter said.

He said he'd conferred with Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and White House Counsel Harriet Miers on his bill. They see no need for it.

"Their position is that the president has inherent authority (to order the surveillance) and that's that," he said. Gonzales and Miers cite Bush's authority as commander-in-chief under Article II of the Constitution.

"They have an argument under Article II," Specter observed. "They don't really have an argument under the (2001 use of) force resolution."

Constitutional authority in question

Specter's view is that Bush has violated the 1978 FISA law by ordering the surveillance program but he adds, "It may well be that the program is within the president's inherent (constitutional) authority. But it seems to me that determination has to be made in accordance with tradition by a court, by judicial review."

Five federal judges came before Specter's committee Tuesday to lend their expertise. They have experience overseeing spying under the FISA law, which usually regulates surveillance of foreign agents inside the United States.

Each judge said he supported Specter's bill, although some suggested tweaks to it.

Another witness, New York attorney David Kris, who served as one of the top national security lawyers in the Justice Department from 2000 to 2003, told Specter's committee Tuesday: "I see this as a constitutional moment. I see it as a clash between the expressed will of Congress and the actions of the president."

Kris emphasized that he knew nothing about the operations of the NSA program and could only offer general comments based on what has been made public so far. He concurred with Specter that the program violated the FISA law.

While Specter pushes his solution, another option — Congress ending the NSA program by using its fiscal power — is languishing for now.

When Feingold was asked two weeks ago whether he would take action against the NSA program by cutting off funding for it, he replied, "Cutting off funding? How are you going to enforce that? If the president has inherent power, he'll just shift some money around. He'll just keep doing it. That's the problem with this doctrine. If the president isn't going to acknowledge that a law we passed such as FISA binds him, why should the cutting off of funding affect him?"

Hinting at the 2008 election, Feingold said, "An administration that is incompetent, that is dishonest, and doesn't respect the law, basically means that we should have a different kind of administration in the future."

Two weeks ago, Rep. Jay Inslee, D-Wash., was planning to offer an amendment to a military/hurricane Katrina spending bill to cut off funding for any surveillance program that doesn't comply with FISA.

But Inslee decided to wait until the House takes up another bill, the defense appropriations bill, after the April recess.

That, like the vote on Feingold's censure idea, will be a chance for members to go on the record.

Censuring The President: Four In 10 Favor It (RC)

By Karlyn Bowman

Roll Call, March 29, 2006

Should President Bush be censured by the Senate over the issue of warrantless wiretapping? According to one recent poll, the issue breaks along partisan lines, though not rigidly.

In a mid-March PSRA/Newsweek poll, 42 percent of respondents supported the censure of Bush, while 50 percent did not.

Twenty percent of Republicans, 42 percent of independents and 60 percent of Democrats supported censure. When asked about the motivations of the censure movement's primary spokesman, Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) and other Democrats, 53 percent of respondents said they were supporting censure more for partisan political advantage. Thirty-three percent said they were supporting it because it was right.

As for going a step further to impeachment of the president, 26 percent said they wanted Congress to impeach the president. Five percent of Republicans said so, as did 23 percent of independents and 49 percent of Democrats.

Feeling Proud About the War. Forty-six percent of respondents told CBS/New York Times interviewers that they were proud about what the United States was doing in the war with Iraq. Forty-eight percent said they were not. In September 2005, those responses were 43 percent and 49 percent, respectively.

CBS/New York Times pollsters also reported on the attitudes of "Iraq service families" — that is, cases in which the respondent or someone in his or her immediate family has served in Iraq, a description that fit 17 percent of those surveyed.

Fifty-six percent of this group were proud of U.S. involvement. The families also were more likely than the general population (60 percent versus 51 percent) to believe that the U.S. was likely to succeed there.

Demographically, nearly half of the "Iraq service families" in the poll were from the South (46 percent). One in five was African American. Twenty-six percent were from households earning less than $30,000 a year. Twenty-seven percent came from households in the $30,000 to $50,000 range, 29 percent from the $50,000 to $100,000 range and 12 percent from $100,000-and-up range.

War Protests. In a March 10-12 Gallup/CNN/USA Today poll, 13 percent of respondents said they had publicly opposed the war by participating in a demonstration or writing a letter to a public official.

A slightly smaller number — 11 percent — said they had publicly supported the war by doing these things.

The Draft. One-quarter of those surveyed in a March 9-12 CBS News/New York Times poll favored reinstating the draft. Thirty-four percent of Republicans and 16 percent of Democrats were in favor.

Twenty percent favored reinstating the draft to provide soldiers for the Iraq conflict (26 percent of Republicans, 12 percent of Democrats).

Americans in Mourning. In a March 10-12 Gallup/CNN/USA Today poll, 17 percent of those surveyed said they had attended a funeral or memorial service for Americans who died in Iraq.

Foreign Investment. In a March 8-12 Pew poll, 53 percent said that foreign-company investment in the U.S. was good for the U.S. and 36 percent said it was bad. Fifty-four percent of Democrats and 52 percent of Republicans said it was good.

Sixty-four percent said free trade was good for the U.S. and 27 percent said it was bad. Fifty-three percent said foreign investors owning U.S. companies was bad (33 percent said it was good). On outsourcing, 71 percent said it was bad and 20 percent said it was good.

South Dakota's Abortion Ban. In a new Pew poll, 21 percent of respondents said they were following the news about the South Dakota abortion ban very closely. Twenty-six percent weren't following it closely at all. By comparison, 43 percent were closely following news about Iraq, and 41 percent were closely following the Dubai ports deal.

Women (25 percent) were more likely than men (16 percent) to be watching South Dakota's action very closely. According to Pew, both anti-abortion and pro-abortion rights Americans were equally uninterested in the story, though on both sides, those who feel strongly about the issue paid closer attention.

Fifty-eight percent of Pew respondents opposed a national law like South Dakota's, while 34 percent were in favor. Sixty-six percent of moderate-to-liberal Republicans were opposed. Sixty-five percent of conservative Republicans were in favor. Pew found greater intensity in the anti-abortion camp.

DOJ_NMG_0023424

March Madness. Twenty-one percent of those surveyed in a March 8-14 Harris poll said they had at some point participated in an office pool for the NCAA basketball tournament. Thirteen percent indicated that they would be participating this year. There was no information on how many bet on George Mason University's Patriots.

Nicest Politicians. In mid-March, Fox News and Opinion Dynamics asked people to forget politics and the way they usually voted and simply pick the nicest person. Twenty-nine percent picked George W. Bush, 23 percent chose Sen. John McCain, 18 percent selected Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and 16 percent named Al Gore.

Karlyn Bowman is a resident fellow specializing in public opinion and polls at the American Enterprise Institute.

Democrats In Vermont To Weigh Impeachment (AP-Y2)

By David Gram

AP2, March 29, 2006

Leading Democrats in Vermont plan to decide in April whether to urge state lawmakers to petition for President Bush's impeachment using a little-known provision in the rules of the U.S. House.

Democratic committees in at least half of the state's 14 counties have passed resolutions calling for impeachment, citing a rule in "Jefferson's Manual," a book of parliamentary guidelines written by Thomas Jefferson that supplements U.S. House rules.

The anti-Bush movement is "genuinely bubbling up from the grass roots," said Jon Copans, the state party's executive director.

The state Democratic committee is scheduled to decide the issue in a special meeting April 8.

The resolutions accuse the Bush administration of lying about the case for war in Iraq and illegally engaging in electronic surveillance of Americans.

They rely on "Jefferson's Manual," which says impeachment proceedings can begin "by charges transmitted from the legislature of a state."

Democratic House Speaker Gaye Symington said lawmakers should stay focused on state issues and suggested Bush critics work to elect a different Congress in November "that could investigate the actions of the president and change the direction of the country."

James Barnett, chairman of the Vermont Republican Party, said presidents should not be impeached "because we disagree with them," adding that evidence for impeachment was drawn from "left-wing blogs and conspiracy theories."

A message seeking comment from the White House press office was not immediately returned.

High Court Scrutinizes Military Tribunals Plan For Detainees Justices Challenge Notion That Law Voided Their Jurisdiction (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — Supreme Court justices on Tuesday vigorously questioned President Bush's attempt to hold military trials for foreign terrorism suspects, as well as the administration's effort to keep federal judges from hearing claims from detainees held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

During a sometimes-heated, 90-minute session of arguments, most of the justices also made clear that they believe the judicial branch has a key role in reviewing Bush's legal strategies against terrorism, including the plan to hold military tribunals.

That sentiment led to some tense moments, as U.S. Solicitor General Paul Clement argued that the Detainee Treatment Act passed by Congress in December had stripped the high court of any power to hear claims from detainees at Guantanamo. Tuesday's case was brought by Salim Ahmed Hamdan, a Yemeni and former driver for Osama bin Laden.

Hamdan is challenging the administration's plan to hold tribunals at Guantanamo.

"It is an extraordinary act," Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg said, "to withdraw jurisdiction from this court in a pending case."

The dispute over military tribunals marks the first time since 2004 that the court is weighing a challenge to the administration's legal strategy stemming from America's response to the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. Two years ago, the court's majority rebuffed Bush's efforts to suppress detainees' legal challenges and said, in the words of then-justice Sandra Day O'Connor, that "a state of war is not a blank check for the president."

On Tuesday, five of the eight justices who heard the case seemed to embrace that idea. Ginsburg, along with Justices John Paul Stevens, Anthony Kennedy, David Souter and Stephen Breyer, expressed concern about the Pentagon-controlled trial planned for Hamdan, who is accused of conspiring with al-Qaeda to carry out attacks. Those justices — the court's four liberal members plus Kennedy, who is at the court's ideological center — also took aim at the idea that the December law snatched jurisdiction in the case from the court.

DOJ_NMG_0023425

The five justices questioned whether Hamdan could be charged with conspiracy, rather than an offense tied to a violation of the laws of war. They also wondered whether the tribunal system might wrongly shun procedural safeguards for defendants, such as letting them attend all hearings and see all evidence against them.

Chief Justice John Roberts, who succeeded William Rehnquist in September, did not participate because he ruled against Hamdan as a lower-court judge. Samuel Alito succeeded O'Connor in January. His questions seemed to favor the administration.

Justice Antonin Scalia seemed especially open to Clement's position that the president had the power to determine tribunal rules. Justice Clarence Thomas asked no questions.

Hamdan is one of 10 detainees at Guantanamo scheduled for a military tribunal. An additional 180 of the 490 detainees have been trying to challenge the constitutionality of their imprisonment in U.S. courts.

Souter asked Clement why Congress was not clearer on whether all claims from Guantanamo detainees were off limits for federal judges. Speaking loudly with unusual anger, Souter said it would have been “stupendously significant” for Congress to remove the court's power to hear a claim of wrongful imprisonment.

Hamdan's attorney, Georgetown University law professor Neal Katyal, argued that the president may not order military tribunals without a specific act of Congress.

Justices Hint That They'll Rule On Challenge Filed By Detainee (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 28 — As the justices of the Supreme Court took their seats Tuesday morning to hear Osama bin Laden's former driver challenge the Bush administration's plan to try him before a military commission, one question — perhaps the most important one — was how protective the justices would be of their jurisdiction to decide the case.

The answer emerged gradually, but by the end of the tightly packed 90-minute argument, it was fairly clear: highly protective.

At least five justices — Stephen G. Breyer, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, Anthony M. Kennedy, David H. Souter and John Paul Stevens — appeared ready to reject the administration's argument that the Detainee Treatment Act, passed and signed into law after the court accepted the case in November, had stripped the court of jurisdiction.

It was less certain by the end of the argument how the court would then go on to resolve the merits of the case, a multipronged attack on the validity of the military commissions themselves and on their procedures. Lawyers for the former driver, a Yemeni named Salim Ahmed Hamdan who is charged with conspiracy, also argue that he cannot properly be tried before any military commission for that crime because conspiracy is not recognized as a war crime.

Solicitor General Paul D. Clement was on the defensive throughout his argument. His stolid refusal to concede that any of the government's positions, on the jurisdictional as well as ultimate questions of the case, might present even theoretical problems provoked the normally soft-spoken Justice Souter into an outburst of anger.

What appeared to trouble Justice Souter most was Mr. Clement's discussion with Justice Stevens about whether Congress's removal of the federal courts' jurisdiction to hear habeas corpus petitions from detainees at the naval base at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, amounted to "suspending" the writ of habeas corpus.

Suspending habeas corpus is an action, limited by the Constitution to "cases of rebellion or invasion," that Congress has taken only four times in the country's history. Habeas corpus is the means by which prisoners can go to court to challenge the lawfulness of their confinement, and its suspension is historically regarded as a serious, if not drastic, step.

Mr. Clement's position was that Congress had not in fact suspended habeas corpus, but that it might constitutionally have done so given "the exigencies of 9/11." Addressing Justice Stevens, the solicitor general said, "My view would be that if Congress sort of stumbles upon a suspension of the writ, that the preconditions are satisfied, that would still be constitutionally valid."

Justice Souter interrupted. "Isn't there a pretty good argument that suspension of the writ of habeas corpus is just about the most stupendously significant act that the Congress of the United States can take," he asked, "and therefore we ought to be at least a little slow to accept your argument that it can be done from pure inadvertence?"

When Mr. Clement began to answer, Justice Souter persisted: "You are leaving us with the position of the United States that the Congress may validly suspend it inadvertently. Is that really your position?"

The solicitor general replied, "I think at least if you're talking about the extension of the writ to enemy combatants held outside the territory of the United States —— "

DOJ_NMG_0023426

"Now wait a minute!" Justice Souter interrupted, waving a finger. "The writ is the writ. There are not two writs of habeas corpus, for some cases and for other cases. The rights that may be asserted, the rights that may be vindicated, will vary with the circumstances, but jurisdiction over habeas corpus is jurisdiction over habeas corpus."

Justice Breyer, in his questioning of Mr. Clement, practically begged the solicitor general to endorse an alternative approach that would allow the court to avoid "the most terribly difficult and important constitutional question of whether Congress can constitutionally deprive this court of jurisdiction in habeas corpus cases."

The alternative at hand was the one offered by Mr. Hamdan's lawyer, Neal Katyal, a law professor at Georgetown University. That was to interpret the Detainee Treatment Act as applying only prospectively, stripping federal courts of hearing future cases brought by the detainees but allowing the Supreme Court to continue with at least this one.

The argument was a textual one, based on a slight change in wording from the measure originally proposed by Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, to the version the Senate eventually passed after Senator Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan, and others raised objections to taking the Hamdan case away from the Supreme Court.

Mr. Graham, who filed a brief in this case, and the administration maintain that the change was immaterial. But the justices appeared ready to embrace the ambiguity if it would allow them to retain jurisdiction and proceed with the case.

Only eight justices will vote in the case, Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, No. 05-184. Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. is not sitting, because he was a member of the three-judge panel of the federal appeals court here that rejected Mr. Hamdan's challenge to the military commissions in a decision last July.

Of the other members of the court, Justice Antonin Scalia appeared most supportive of the administration. He intervened several times to offer Mr. Clement a helping hand, something the solicitor general rarely needs but accepted gratefully.

For example, Justice Kennedy was questioning Mr. Clement on the government's position that even if the court had jurisdiction, it should abstain from ruling on the validity of the military commission until after Mr. Hamdan's trial.

Justice Kennedy said he found the argument troubling, pointing out that Mr. Hamdan was arguing that because the commissions lacked the procedures required by the Geneva Conventions, they were invalid. "The historic office of habeas corpus is to test whether or not you're being tried by a lawful tribunal," Justice Kennedy said. "And he says, under the Geneva Convention, as you know, that it isn't."

Mr. Clement replied that Mr. Hamdan could raise that argument later, before the military commission itself. He predicted that the argument would fail and said that in any event, there was no reason "why that claim has to be brought at this stage."

Justice Scalia then jumped in to support the solicitor general. "In the normal criminal suit," he said, "even if you claim that the forum is not properly constituted, that claim is not adjudicated immediately."

Along with Justice Scalia, Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. also appeared to support the argument that the court should allow the trial to go forward. Justice Clarence Thomas alone asked no questions.

Mr. Clement argued that the detainee law would allow a detainee to argue in federal court, after a conviction by a military commission, that the commission's procedures were illegal or unconstitutional.

Justice Ginsburg then asked him to "straighten me out." She said, "I thought it was the government's position that these enemy combatants do not have any rights under the Constitution and laws of the United States."

"That is true, Justice Ginsburg," the solicitor general answered.

Mr. Hamdan's lawyer, Mr. Katyal, appeared to get traction with his argument that conspiracy, with which Mr. Hamdan and nine other detainees awaiting military commissions have been charged, is not an appropriate crime for a trial before a military commission. If a majority agrees, this might provide a narrow way of resolving the case.

In many respects, the argument marked a resumption of the encounter between the court and the Bush administration two years ago, in cases that led to the court's rejection of the administration's claim to broad authority to proceed without judicial oversight. The administration was once again seeking "fundamentally open-ended authority," the "blank check" the court had rejected then, Mr. Katyal said.

Case Tests Power Of Judiciary, President (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

A long-awaited test of the judiciary's power during wartime came to the Supreme Court yesterday, and, contrary to the urgings of the Bush administration, the justices did not seem inclined to duck it.

During a 90-minute oral argument on the legality of the military commissions President Bush has set up to try terrorism suspects, most members of the court resisted -- sometimes sharply -- the administration's request to dismiss the case because of a new federal law circumscribing appeals by terrorism suspects.

DOJ_NMG_0023427

A key comment came from Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, the closely divided court's moderate-conservative swing voter. He told Solicitor General Paul D. Clement that he has "trouble with the argument" that, because of the new law, court challenges to the commissions must wait until the trials are over.

"I had thought that the historic function of habeas corpus is to . . . test the jurisdiction and legitimacy of a court," Kennedy said. Habeas corpus is the legal vehicle through which prisoners challenge the lawfulness of their detention by the executive branch.

The court's defense of its turf does not bode well for the Bush administration's broader arguments in defense of the military commissions, but it remained unclear how the justices might ultimately rule on the merits of the case.

Kennedy pitched one approach, under which the court might uphold the military commissions, as the administration wants, but require that they proceed in accordance with the Geneva Conventions -- international treaties that protect war detainees -- as its opponents urge. Then, he suggested, the court could "just remand it for [a lower court] to go into all these arguments."

Other members of the court seemed attracted to invoking the Geneva Conventions, saying that the administration's position creates a double standard because it accuses alleged terrorists of violating the laws of war while denying them the protections of international law.

"I don't see how you can have it both ways," Justice David H. Souter told Clement.

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. is not participating in the case because, as an appeals court judge, he was part of the panel whose ruling in favor of the commissions is now under review at the Supreme Court. If the remaining eight members of the court split 4 to 4 on the merits, the lower court's ruling would be affirmed.

In a Nov. 13, 2001, military order, Bush declared that military commissions will try foreign terrorism suspects for alleged war crimes, and sentence them to penalties including death.

The commissions immediately came under fire from civil libertarians and other critics who argued that the president's order was not properly authorized by Congress, violates the rights of prisoners under the Geneva Conventions, and provides for no effective appeals to the courts.

The case before the Supreme Court yesterday, Hamdan v. Rumsfeld , No. 05-184, arose from a petition for habeas corpus brought by Salim Ahmed Hamdan, a former chauffeur of Osama bin Laden who is represented by Georgetown University law professor Neal K. Katyal. Hamdan is one of 10 detainees from the U.S. prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, slated to face military trials so far. No commission has yet reached a judgment in a case.

The Bush administration argued that military commissions are a time-honored instrument of warfare, amply authorized by the president's constitutional powers as commander in chief, by laws on military justice and by a Sept. 14, 2001, congressional resolution sanctioning war in response to the al-Qaeda attacks three days earlier.

Clement's goal yesterday, though, was to persuade the court to avoid those issues -- some of the most momentous war-powers questions to reach the court since World War II -- by simply bowing out of the case.

The Detainee Treatment Act, a measure passed by Congress and signed by Bush after the court had agreed to hear Hamdan's case, creates sufficient due process for Hamdan and others, including the opportunity to appeal after their trials, Clement argued. Meanwhile, he said, it rules out habeas corpus petitions, so "the courts no longer have jurisdiction over this case."

But that contention immediately landed him in trouble with several justices, who found the terms of the act, a bipartisan compromise engineered with administration support, too vague to warrant cutting back what they regard as a vital judicial check on unlawful executive detentions.

Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg noted that it would be "an extraordinary act, I think, to withdraw jurisdiction over a pending case."

Souter was even more indignant, admonishing Clement that "given the significance of suspending the writ of habeas corpus, should we not have a pretty clear statement requirement?"

Clement replied that "just because Congress could have been clearer doesn't mean the government loses here."

Inevitably, perhaps, the court debate over executive authority indirectly reflected the recent controversies over Bush's conduct of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Justice Stephen G. Breyer spoke in strong terms about detainees at Guantanamo Bay who are "claiming -- some -- that they were tortured," and of the prospect that the president would use a commission to "pick up an alien and not have any trial at all except for that special commission."

A decision in the case is expected by July.

Justices Hear Challenge To Plan For Guantanamo-Prisoner Trials (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin

DOJ_NMG_0023428

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A government lawyer told the Supreme Court that prisoners held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, have no rights under the Constitution or federal law, as the justices heard a challenge to President Bush's plan for putting foreign detainees on trial before secretive military courts at the naval base.

The claim drew heavy questioning from a majority of the justices hearing the case, suggesting the military commissions could run afoul of the Supreme Court. In a separate Guantanamo case two years ago, the justices rejected administration claims that prisoners had no right to challenge their detentions, writing that a "state of war is not a blank check for the president." Solicitor General Paul Clement said the justices shouldn't even be hearing the case, citing recent legislation providing Guantanamo prisoners limited access to federal courts when contesting their detention.

Justice Samuel Alito, President Bush's most recent appointee to the court, and Justice Antonin Scalia both hinted that they agreed that if the prisoners have rights of appeal, their cases should be heard only following conviction by the Guantanamo courts. Under an order by President Bush, the commissions needn't afford defendants rights required in civilian courts and courts martial, such as attending all of one's trial and seeing all the evidence introduced by prosecutors.

When Mr. Clement asserted the president's inherent power to create the commissions under the "law of war," Justice David Souter questioned why the administration had declared that the 1949 Geneva Conventions, the bedrock treaty governing armed conflicts, didn't apply to the Guantanamo prisoners. "For purposes of determining the domestic authority to set up a commission, you say the president is operating under the laws of war recognized by Congress," Justice Souter said. But when it comes to prisoners' rights, "you're saying the laws of war don't apply. And I don't see how you can have it both ways."

Justice John Paul Stevens joined that view, questioning why the 10 Guantanamo prisoners set for trial have been charged with conspiracy -- a crime lawyer Neal Katyal, representing a Guantanamo prisoner challenging the commissions, said had been disallowed by war-crimes tribunals since World War II because it was too vague. Mr. Clement said the charge remained valid but even if it wasn't, the president could make it so "as a matter of pure constitutional power."

Tribunal Said To Violate Geneva (WT)

By Guy Taylor

The Washington Times, March 29, 2006

The attorney for Osama bin Laden's former driver yesterday told the Supreme Court the Bush administration never was given permission to create a special war crimes tribunal to try suspected terrorists at Guantanamo Bay.

Neal K. Katyal, a Georgetown University Law School professor representing Salim Ahmed Hamdan, said the tribunal is "literally unburdened by the laws, Constitution and treaties of the United States."

"This is an ad-hoc trial in which the procedures are all defined by the president," he said, arguing that Congress never gave President Bush authority to create the tribunal, and that its existence violates Geneva Convention rights of war prisoners.

Solicitor General Paul D. Clement dismissed those assertions, saying that in creating the tribunal Mr. Bush used "an authority that has essentially been invoked by every president in every war throughout the country's history."

The administration says al Qaeda is not a traditional army and that men like Hamdan are not POWs, but "enemy combatants," and thus not protected by the Geneva Convention.

"I don't think the Geneva Convention applies," said Mr. Clement, who argued the tribunal was bolstered by Congress' passage of the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005.

Hamdan, a 34-year-old native of Yemen, is one of 10 Guantanamo inmates charged with war crimes in the tribunal, and one of dozens who have filed petitions in U.S. federal courts challenging their detention at the naval base.

Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. said it seemed unusual for the Supreme Court to be weighing what sounded like an appeal to the conspiracy to commit war crimes, murder and terrorism charge before the case had fully played out in the tribunal.

"In criminal litigation, review after litigation is the general rule," he said.

Justice Stephen G. Breyer questioned the administration's authority to create the tribunal, asking what would stop the president from holding special trials in the future in any place he chose, such as "Toledo, Ohio," rather than exclusively at Guantanamo.

The tribunal is free of constraints that define trials in federal courts. A panel of military officers preside over each case, and military prosecutors are allowed to use classified evidence concealed from the detainees. Human rights groups say the design unfairly stacks the deck against defendants.

Months before the tribunal opened in November 2004, the Supreme Court ruled that U.S. federal courts have legal authority to preside over challenges brought by the some 500 foreign nationals held at Guantanamo.

DOJ_NMG_0023429

Mr. Katyal used the ruling to file a petition on Hamdan's behalf in U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia. The court ruled in favor of Hamdan, prompting the Pentagon to briefly halt all tribunal activity at Guantanamo. A federal appeals court then reversed the ruling and Hamdan petitioned the high court to review.

New Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. recused himself because as a federal appeals judge he ruled in favor of allowing the tribunal last year.

Supreme Court Hears Challenge To Military Tribunals (KRT)

By Carol Rosenberg

Knight Ridder, March 28, 2006

WASHINGTON - In a key test of President Bush's war powers, the Supreme Court grappled Tuesday with whether the Pentagon's plan to try Osama bin Laden's ex-driver before a special military commission violates international law and the U.S. Constitution.

Neal Katyal, the attorney for Salim Hamdan, argued that the Pentagon had concocted a charge - conspiracy - that isn't a war crime, had failed to grant Hamdan certain Geneva Conventions rights, such as prisoner-of-war status, and fell short of standards that Congress has set for how the United States must conduct either military or civilian justice.

"This is a military commission that is literally unbounded by the laws, Constitution and treaties of the United States," he told the court.

Solicitor General Paul Clement argued that Congress had given the president the power to craft the commission when it authorized the use of force after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. He called such commissions "part and parcel of the (presidential) war power for 200 years."

Chief Justice John G. Roberts' seat was vacant for the sharp, 90-minute round of questioning and arguments; as an appeals court judge, Roberts had sided with the White House on the issue. His absence creates the possibility of a 4-4 deadlock when the court decides this summer whether to let Hamdan's war-crimes trial go forward, in which case the appeals court ruling would stand.

Hamdan is one of 10 captives at the U.S. naval base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, who face trial by military commission. Pentagon officials have said 75 at most of the nearly 500 suspected terrorists at Guantanamo might be tried before the panels, which are composed of military officers whose identities are being kept secret.

Several justices, notably freshman Samuel Alito, asked why the Pentagon shouldn't proceed with its trials, and perhaps amend its conspiracy charge, then let civilian courts consider the case if Hamdan is convicted, as at a typical U.S. criminal trial.

"The commission is operating in totally uncharted waters; it's charging a violation in a stateless, territorial-less conflict, something which the full laws of war have never applied," replied Katyal, a Georgetown University Law Center professor who was a clerk for Justice Stephen Breyer a decade ago.

Uniformed American military officers were scattered throughout the gallery, among them lawyers from all four services - Marines, Air Force, Army and Navy - who in effect mutinied against their commander in chief by alleging that Bush's commissions strip foreign captives of fundamental rights.

"If you believe that these are full and fair trials, you believe that the Bill of Rights is irrelevant," Hamdan's Pentagon-appointed defense attorney, Navy Lt. Cmdr. Charles Swift, declared on the front steps of the marble-columned courthouse.

Retired military officers, civil liberties lawyers, former diplomats and international law experts all filed briefs on behalf of the 36-year-old Yemeni with a fourth-grade education, arguing that the Bush administration went too far by creating a commission outside an explicit framework set out by Congress and ignoring many of the protections of U.S. military justice, which has a provision for tribunals.

The justices seemed especially intrigued with the nature of the crime alleged, conspiring with al-Qaida. At least four justices asked questions related to the charge.

Katyal called the conspiracy charge so broad and unfocused that "a little old lady in Switzerland who donates money to al-Qaida, and that turns out to be a front for terrorist acts ... might be swept up within this broad definition. That's why international law has so rejected the concept of conspiracy."

Clement argued that the court shouldn't even be considering the case because Bush had signed a law Dec. 30 that effectively stripped Guantanamo captives of pre-commission habeas corpus challenge.

Some justices focused on whether Congress intentionally or inadvertently suspended the Writ of Habeas Corpus for captives in Cuba; Clement argued that Congress' intent was irrelevant, an argument that seemed to find favor from Justice Antonin Scalia, for whom Clement once clerked.

Hamdan claims through his lawyers that he never joined al-Qaida, wasn't a warrior and was merely a civilian driver who earned $200 a month driving a pickup from bin Laden's private farm. His lawyer said Afghan militiamen captured him along the

DOJ_NMG_0023430

Afghan border in 2001, after he evacuated his pregnant wife and 2-year-old daughter to Pakistan, and turned him over to U.S. troops who sent him to Guantanamo.

Breyer asked what would stop the president from "picking up an alien" and holding the same type of trial in Toledo, Ohio.

Justice Anthony Kennedy questioned whether Hamdan wasn't "uniquely vulnerable," and therefore not entitled to certain prisoner-of-war considerations under the Geneva Conventions.

"I don't think he's protected by the Geneva Conventions, but that's largely because he chose not to comply with the basic laws of war," Clement said. "Nobody has a claim here that they were part of the uniformed al-Qaida division that complied with all of the laws of war such that they are entitled to POW status."

Supreme Court Debates Plans For Military Trial For Osama Bin Laden Driver (FINDLAW/AP)

By Gina Holland, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 29, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-The Supreme Court sharply questioned plans for military trials for foreigners held at Guantanamo Bay, in a historic argument Tuesday over President George W. Bush's wartime powers.

Several justices seemed deeply concerned that the government had gone too far in its plans to hold a special trial for Osama bin Laden's former driver on a conspiracy charge.

Some were downright indignant over the Bush administration's claim that a new federal law bars the high court from ruling in the case of Salim Ahmed Hamdan.

Hamdan's lawyer, Neal Katyal, said that the president "has the keys to the federal courthouse" under the law.

Without Chief Justice John Roberts, a conservative Bush nominated last year, the argument seemed lopsided against the government. Roberts voted in the case on a lower court and had to withdraw. Justices Antonin Scalia and Samuel Alito hinted their support for the administration.

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy questioned Solicitor General Paul Clement about the legal safeguards for the trials. Justice Stephen Breyer also asked what would stop the president from holding the same type of trial in Toledo, Ohio, not just at the military prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Hamdan claims the military commissions established by the Pentagon on Bush's orders are flawed because they violate basic military justice protections.

"This is a military commission that is literally unburdened by the laws, Constitution and treaties of the United States," Katyal told justices.

Scalia rebuffed a recusal request by five retired generals who support Hamdan's arguments. In a letter to the court, the generals had asked Scalia to withdraw from participating in the case because of remarks he made in a recent speech in Switzerland about "enemy combatants." Speaking at the University of Freiberg in Switzerland on March 8, Scalia said foreigners waging war against the United States have no rights under the Constitution.

Alito, the newest justice, suggested the court should wait until Hamdan's trial is over to allow him to question whether charging him with conspiracy violates the laws of war, as Katyal contends.

But Katyal brushed aside the contention. "The government has had four years to get their charges together on Mr. Hamdan," he said.

Hamdan, a Yemeni who was captured in Afghanistan in November 2001, is charged with conspiracy to commit war crimes, murder and terrorism. He claims he is an innocent father of two young daughters and worked as a driver for bin Laden in Afghanistan only to eke out a living for his family.

The Bush administration says he is a trained terrorist who should be tried for war crimes before a special military commission, the first such trial since the aftermath of World War II.

Roberts left the bench before arguments began and won't be involved in the decision.

Hamdan is among about 490 foreigners being held as "enemy combatants" at the military prison in Guantanamo Bay. Ten of the men, including Hamdan, have been charged with crimes.

Justices ruled two years ago that the government could detain enemy combatants but not shut off their access to U.S. courts.

In this follow-up case, justices are considering the government's plans for trials before a panel of military officers.

Hamdan's trial was halted last fall when a federal judge ruled that he could not be tried by a U.S. military commission unless a "competent tribunal" determined first that he was not a prisoner of war under the 1949 Geneva Convention.

Roberts was on a three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit that said the trial could resume, and Hamdan's attorneys appealed to the Supreme Court.

DOJ_NMG_0023431

The court could dodge a major ruling in the case, on grounds that the new law stripped the justices' authority to consider it. The law passed late last year bars Guantanamo prisoners from filing petitions to fight their detentions, and the administration claims this law retroactively voided hundreds of lawsuits.

On the Net:

Supreme Court: http://www.supremecourtus.gov/

Military tribunals: http://www.defenselink.mil/news/commissions.html

Military Tribunal Case Comes Before Skeptical Supreme Court (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, March 29, 2006

The Bush administration ran into skepticism from the Supreme Court on Tuesday as justices heard debate over a landmark war powers dispute testing the legal rights of enemy combatants held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

At issue were military tribunals set up by the White House to try suspected terrorists, including Salim Hamdan, said to be the driver for Osama bin Laden, in the wake of the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks. Opponents claim the tribunals are an unlawful exercise of executive branch authority.

Justices seemed especially concerned about a law passed by Congress last year that the administration argues strips the high court of jurisdiction over habeas petitions filed by Guantanamo Bay detainees. The law created a limited appeals process for detainees that, the government says, excludes the Supreme Court -- even in pending cases like Hamdan's, argued Tuesday.

Justice Anthony Kennedy, likely the swing vote in the case Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, offered probing questions for both sides but seemed unwilling to accept that habeas petitions could be foreclosed by passage of the law, known as the Detainee Treatment Act.

"The historical function of habeas is to test the legitimacy" of the process that resulted in a prisoner's detention, Kennedy said, challenging Solicitor General Paul Clement. Justice David Souter also appeared irritated with Clement, suggesting that Congress, in passing the Detainee Treatment Act, had effectively suspended the writ of habeas corpus without saying so explicitly. "The writ is the writ," said Souter, with anger in his voice.

Justice Samuel Alito Jr. seemed more sympathetic toward Clement, suggesting in his questions that he thinks it is premature to rule on Hamdan's case until Hamdan is actually tried under the military commission procedures he is challenging.

Hamdan was captured by bounty hunters in Afghanistan in November 2001 and transferred to Guantánamo in June 2002. Thirteen months later, Hamdan was declared eligible to be tried by a military commission created by an order of President George W. Bush in November 2001. The commissions, which exist separately from courts-martial, operate under rules that allow the defendant to be excluded from trial and impose other limits on protections for defendants. Guilty verdicts and sentences are reviewable only by the president.

Hamdan filed a habeas petition in 2004, challenging the commissions as a violation of the Geneva Conventions and asking instead that he be treated as a prisoner of war and tried by a military court-martial.

Judge James Robertson of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia ruled for Hamdan. But a panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit reversed, ruling that the military commissions were authorized by the Uniform Code of Military Justice and by the congressional authorization of military force that was passed after the Sept. 11 attacks. The panel included then-Judge John Roberts Jr., who, now that he is chief justice, has decided to recuse himself in the case.

After the Supreme Court agreed to review the Hamdan case, the dispute took an unusual turn when Congress passed the Detainee Treatment Act. The Bush administration then filed a motion seeking dismissal of Hamdan's case, arguing that the new law applied to his and other pending cases. But lawyers for Hamdan argued that the law is prospective only. The high court added a half-hour to scheduled oral argument time to deal with the threshold jurisdiction issue raised by the law.

As the unusual 90-minute arguments began, Roberts stood up and left as expected, signaling his recusal. Justice Antonin Scalia also stood up, briefly causing a stir because it appeared he too might be recusing. Retired generals who filed a brief on Hamdan's side had requested Scalia's recusal on Monday because of comments he made in Switzerland on March 8 that seemed to signal his views on the legal rights of detainees.

But Scalia soon sat down and participated fully in the case. At times, Scalia appeared to take over Clement's argument, answering points made by Kennedy, Souter, and Justice Stephen Breyer.

"There were moments when Clement seemed to be a bystander," said Deborah Pearlstein of Human Rights First, which filed briefs in support of Hamdan. "Clement had a really tough day." Pearlstein predicted at least five votes against the government on the jurisdictional issue raised by the Detainee Treatment Act.

DOJ_NMG_0023432

If Scalia and Alito line up on the government's side and they are joined only by usual ally Justice Clarence Thomas, that would mean a loss for the administration. Souter, Breyer, and Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg seemed to be safe votes against the government position, and both Kennedy and Justice John Paul Stevens appeared mostly skeptical of Clement's arguments.

Clement cast the military commission process as nothing new, citing a long history going back to George Washington. "Congress has repeatedly recognized and sanctioned that authority," he said. As is customary for Clement, he spoke with no notes in front of him.

But Clement's invocation of presidential power and congressional approval did not seem to quiet the concerns of justices. Nor did he seem to convince the Court when he argued that the Detainee Treatment Act could validly eliminate Court jurisdiction even for pending cases like Hamdan's. "Just because Congress wasn't clear," Clement said, "doesn't mean the government loses here."

Breyer said accepting Clement's argument would draw the Court into the "horrifically difficult" position of ratifying the elimination of its own jurisdiction.

Hamdan's lead lawyer, Neal Katyal, a professor at Georgetown University Law Center, had planted the seeds of doubt earlier with a forceful presentation that outlined the ways in which the military commissions Bush established in the aftermath of Sept. 11 violated the Geneva Conventions, the laws of war, and the Uniform Code of Military Justice.

The president, Katyal said, was arguing for a parallel system of justice for the detainees "unburdened by laws, treaties, or the Constitution." To ratify the commissions, he added, would be "a blank check for years on end."

The Detainee Treatment Act, Katyal also said, does not amount to an endorsement of Bush's military commissions. "Approval by inference has never been sufficient," he said, in cases involving "the most awesome powers of government."

Record Shows Senators' 'Debate' That Wasn't (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

According to the official Congressional Record of Dec. 21, 2005, Sens. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) and Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) held a long conversation on the Senate floor about an amendment bearing Graham's name that restricts the legal rights of detainees in the military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

"I agree entirely," Graham responds to Kyl at one point. "I have just been handed a memorandum on this subject," Kyl says later. Another Republican senator, Sam Brownback of Kansas, interrupts the two with his own commentary.

But those exchanges never occurred. Instead, the debate -- which runs 15 pages and brims with conversational flourishes -- was inserted into the Congressional Record minutes before the Senate gave final approval to the legislation.

In legal briefs to the Supreme Court, which took up the issue yesterday, the Justice Department cites the material as evidence that Congress intended the Detainee Treatment Act to retroactively invalidate pending legal challenges by hundreds of detainees held at Guantanamo Bay. Graham and Kyl submitted a friend-of-the-court brief asserting the same thing.

Some Democrats, including Sen. Carl M. Levin (Mich.), whose name is also on the amendment to the law, have argued otherwise. They contend that the law was written to allow cases filed before its enactment to go forward.

The inserted floor debate, known in Senate parlance as a "colloquy," has since become an intriguing side issue in the case of Salim Ahmed Hamdan, Osama bin Laden's former driver, whose case was at issue before the court yesterday.

Hamdan's lawyers complained about the colloquy in a recent legal filing, and the origin of Graham's and Kyl's comments has drawn recent attention on legal Web sites and on Slate.com. The subject did not come up during yesterday's Supreme Court argument, which focused on broader issues.

The briefs filed in support of the government do not make clear that the Graham-Kyl debate was manufactured. In their friend-of-the-court brief, filed in February, Graham and Kyl note that the "Congressional Record is presumed to reflect live debate except when the statements therein are followed by a bullet . . . or are underlined."

The Graham-Kyl exchange is not marked in either way, although a C-SPAN recording and other records make clear that the discussion never happened.

Members of the House and Senate routinely insert lengthy statements into the Congressional Record without uttering them on the floor or anywhere else. But Senate historian Richard Baker said that colloquies -- contrived debates between two or more lawmakers -- are relatively rare. Baker said he could not recall another example that included feigned banter of the type found in the Graham and Kyl debate.

David H. Remes, a Washington lawyer who has helped Hamdan's defense team, called the colloquy "outrageous."

"This colloquy is critical to the government's legislative history argument, and it's entirely manufactured and misrepresented to the court as having occurred live on the Senate floor before a crucial vote," Remes said.

DOJ_NMG_0023433

Representatives from Kyl's and Graham's offices did not respond to telephone messages yesterday. A spokesman for Levin and a spokesman for the Justice Department declined to comment.

Padilla Judge Restricts Classified Info (AP)

By Curt Anderson

AP, March 29, 2006

MIAMI -- The federal judge overseeing the terrorism case against Jose Padilla imposed tight restrictions Tuesday on the handling of classified material to prevent disclosure of national security secrets when classified evidence is turned over to the defense.

U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke agreed to a prosecution motion on the information, expected to include secret FBI investigations, material provided to the United States by foreign governments and Padilla's own words from interrogations during his 3 1/2 years in military custody as an "enemy combatant."

The former Chicago gang member was once accused of plotting as an al-Qaida operative to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" inside the U.S., but those allegations weren't mentioned in the indictment.

Padilla and four others are charged with being part of a North American terror support cell that provided recruits, money and supplies to Islamic extremists worldwide. All have pleaded not guilty.

Cooke said the order would allow defense lawyers to begin examining secret evidence under special conditions so they can prepare for a trial scheduled for September.

"We've got to go forward," Cooke said at a hearing.

Padilla, a former Florida resident, was added to the Miami terror case late last year amid a legal struggle over President Bush's authority to hold him indefinitely as an "enemy combatant" without criminal charge.

In court documents, prosecutors outlined some of the classified material expected to come up in the trial:

_Results of surveillance conducted by the FBI in a separate investigation authorized by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, which oversees eavesdropping and other monitoring of suspected foreign agents in the United States.

_A request to limit defense questioning of a witness about the chain of custody of a specific piece of evidence. No details were given, but the defense has raised questions about a "mujahideen data form" Padilla allegedly filled out to attend an al-Qaida training camp in Afghanistan.

_Information provided to the U.S. by an unspecified foreign government. The material may eventually be declassified, prosecutors said.

_Written and recorded statements Padilla made while in military custody. Some information about Padilla's interrogations has already been made public and the Justice Department is seeking declassification of most of the remaining evidence.

Defense attorneys objected that Cooke's order was premature and overly broad. They were particularly incensed by a related government proposal that they sign a document verifying that they understand the laws regarding classified material and the potential penalties for violations.

"It chills us in our ability to prepare a defense. It's just overbearing," said Kenneth Swartz, who represents defendant Adham Amin Hassoun.

The judge agreed with defense lawyers on that point and asked prosecutors to come up with a less burdensome agreement for defense attorneys to sign.

Prosecutors Rest Case In Terrorism Trial (LAT)

By Rone Tempest

The Los Angeles Times, March 29, 2006

SACRAMENTO — Federal prosecutors rested their terrorism case Tuesday against a Lodi father and son by showing satellite images of a compound in remote, northeast Pakistan that closely resembled a training camp described by the son in an FBI interrogation.

Based on the satellite photographs and the videotaped questioning, Department of Defense image analyst Eric Benn concluded that the site was a "probable militant training camp." Earlier in the trial, a former Pakistani police chief testified that a militant writer — whose books were found in a search of the Lodi man's home — runs a training camp in that area.

It was the strongest evidence produced by government lawyers who have had problems with the credibility of their undercover FBI informant and the legitimacy of a purported confession obtained after hours of interrogation.

But the case against Lodi ice cream truck driver Umer Hayat, 48, and his junior high school dropout son Hamid Hayat, 23, has so far not lived up to its advance billing as a breakthrough in the war on terror.

DOJ_NMG_0023434

When the Hayats were arrested last June, federal investigators claimed they had shattered a trained Al Qaeda sleeper cell in California's agricultural heartland. And, in her opening remarks, Assistant U.S. Atty. Laura Ferris said Hamid Hayat was "awaiting orders" to commit a terrorist attack in the United States.

But no evidence has been presented that he or his father had any direct links to Al Qaeda or had specific plans to launch a terrorist attack.

During his interrogation by the FBI, Hamid Hayat, who speaks halting English, vaguely described a camp that he attended, though he never clearly indicated that he participated in any training.

Former Los Angeles federal prosecutor Jan Handzlik, now a private attorney, said the difference between the government's sensational claims and the relatively mundane drama unfolding on the 13th floor of the Sacramento federal courthouse stems from the "amorphous" charges against the two men. The younger Hayat is charged with attending a training camp in 2003; both men are charged with lying to the FBI.

"While the government asserts a vast conspiracy to harm U.S. interests," Handzlik said, "the charges against the Hayats are in fact very narrow. At issue is the truth or falsity of specific, limited statements made during lengthy FBI interrogations. Jurors sometimes sense this gap between perception and reality, and wonder why the government's proof has failed to live up to its advance billing."

The links to Al Qaeda are tenuous at best, traced by prosecutors through an array of fundamentalist Pakistan political parties that also are involved in the Pakistan-India conflict over Kashmir. A juror who heard all of the evidence before she was excused from the case last week said she was unconvinced by the videotaped confession, saying the younger Hayat appeared to have been "badgered" into saying what he thought agents wanted to hear.

Pedro Tenoch Aguilar, who had been an FBI agent less than a year when he was asked to lead the Lodi terrorism investigation, testified that the government had gathered no on-the-ground evidence from Pakistan that Hayat attended the camp, though undercover informant Naseem Khan told investigators that Hayat intended to go.

"The government," said retired FBI agent James J. Wedick Jr., who serves as chief investigator for the defense, "has failed to develop any evidence suggesting Hamid Hayat attended a terrorist training camp, despite the fact the FBI has an office in Islamabad, Pakistan, and had access to the resources of the CIA and the super-secret National Security Agency. And, they knew his name, address and phone number in Pakistan where he went to help his mother and get married."

The prosecution is fighting a defense motion to have Wedick, a decorated, 35-year FBI veteran, testify as an expert witness on proper techniques of effective investigation. Today, the trial switches to the defense side; the trial is expected to last at least two more weeks.

Even the alleged confessions of the father and son, obtained in separate interrogations, conflict on important facts. The younger Hayat told interrogators he attended a camp near Balakot, described in Tuesday's satellite testimony. His father claims the camp his son attended was only a few miles from a family home in Rawalpindi.

No evidence was produced about what training Hamid Hayat received. He said he spent his time in the kitchen, peeling vegetables.

The government also faces a serious credibility problem with Khan, the paid informant who shocked the courtroom when he testified that he saw Al Qaeda's No. 2 leader, Ayman Zawahiri, casually attending the Lodi mosque in 1999.

That surprising claim by the 32-year-old former Bend, Ore., convenience store clerk has been universally discounted by terrorism experts and government officials who say it is very unlikely that Zawahiri traveled in this country after 1995, and probably not after 1993.

The FBI provided Khan with a car and paid him nearly $230,000 in salary and expenses to infiltrate the Lodi Muslim community.

Some legal experts say the Lodi case fits a national pattern in which federal officials, eager to show progress in the Bush administration's "war on terror," exaggerate their anti-terror accomplishments only to get bogged down when it comes to proving them in court.

"The Hayat case is like a number of other cases in which the government has somewhat overstated the case going in but, when put to the proof, it has not always been so compelling," said Carl Tobias, a University of Richmond law professor who tracks terrorism prosecutions.

Last week, excused juror Andrea Clabaugh, a Sacramento engineering firm account executive, told reporters that, in her opinion, the government had failed so far to prove its charges against Hamid Hayat.

"It felt to me like he was being badgered and it felt to me, in some respects, he was giving the information because they refused to believe that he didn't know anything. He had to say something."

Even with difficulties facing the government, the two juries in the Hayat case — one for each defendant — may ultimately convict.

DOJ_NMG_0023435

The jury pool for the Eastern District of California, where the trial is taking place, draws from some of the state's most conservative areas, including the northern Sacramento River valley and Sierra foothills, which are overwhelmingly supportive of the Bush administration and its policies.

But as Clabaugh's reactions suggest, that is far from certain.

Terror Camp Allegedly Attended By Hamid Hayat Likely Exists, Analyst Says (LODINS)

By Layla Bohm, News-Sentinel Staff Writer

Lodi News-Sentinel, March 29, 2006

Defense attorney says uncertainty leaves reasonable doubt

SACRAMENTO — There is a 60 to 70 percent chance that Hamid Hayat attended a "militant training camp" in Pakistan and that the camp actually exists, a Department of Defense analyst told a federal jury today.

Eric Benn, who has viewed tens of thousands of surveillance images in his years with the department, spent hours going over satellite images of a mountainous region in northern Pakistan. It was there that 23-year-old Hayat allegedly spent several months in a training camp in 2003 before returning to the United States last summer.

The defense maintains that Hayat made up the account only after hours of repeated questioning of the FBI. And, defense attorney Wazhma Mojaddidi pointed out, jurors must have proof beyond a reasonable doubt. While Benn said the possibilities of the camp existing were high, Mojaddidi took a different angle.

"So that leaves the probability of 30 to 40 percent that it may not actually be a militant training camp, is that correct?" she asked Benn.

"That is correct," he replied.

Benn was the government's last witness, and prosecutors rested their case at 2:06 p.m. after nearly five weeks of trial. The defense portion of the case against Lodi residents Umer and Hamid Hayat is set to begin Wednesday.

Hamid Hayat is charged with lying to the FBI and providing material support to terrorists by attending a camp.

His father, Umer Hayat, 48, is charged with lying to the FBI. He was not in court most of today, as two juries are hearing the trial and only Hamid Hayat's jury was allowed to hear evidence of the alleged camp. The elder Hayat did appear in court later, when attorneys argued legal motions after jurors left for the day.

Showing the jury four poster-sized arial photos of a region near Balakot, Pakistan, Assistant U.S. Attorney David Deitch asked Benn to point out various landmarks. One was a paved, two-lane road that wound through tree-covered mountains. Another road, unpaved and more rugged, branched off the paved road, starting where several vehicles and a bus were parked.

"A bus has no business going up this road," Benn testified in response to a question by Deitch.

During FBI interviews last June, Hamid Hayat at one point said he traveled by bus to a camp, then had to walk several miles at night with a flashlight. Benn reviewed those interviews, and jurors saw short excerpts today.

The distance Hamid Hayat said he traveled was "consistent" with the arial photos, as was a vague description of a clearing with buildings in it, Benn testified.

Based on the photos and Hamid Hayat's interviews, "it's much more likely than not" that the site is a training camp, Benn said.

The area can be found on Google Earth, a mapping program that features satellite images of the world. Much of Pakistan is in low-resolution and details cannot be seen, but the area immediately surrounding the alleged training camp reveals more details, including blue rooftops on buildings near a clearing.

Benn also pointed to two distant buildings he believed could be guard shacks to limit access to the alleged camp. Satellite photos taken in October 2001 — also shown to jurors — showed that most of the buildings had not been constructed then, and Benn pointed to groups of tents.

The senior analyst began working with images and intelligence shortly after entering the U.S. Army in late 1976. He was soon conducting surveillance along the Germany-Czechoslovakia border at the height of the Cold War, then got a master's degree in geography when his stint in the Army ended. He went to work for the Defense Department in 1983.

Benn continued his surveillance work by watching North Korea and later the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan. He was ultimately promoted more than once and now holds the civilian rank equivalent to a two-star general.

His work consists of analyzing photos taken by camera and satellite, looking at them from various angles and enhancements, and also using other intelligence to interpret them.

"At the most pedestrian level it can be count the number of tanks in a garrison," he said, or it can extend to "look at a potentially adversary nation that may be developing nuclear weapons."

Whether the camp exists, and whether Hamid Hayat attended it, will ultimately be up to the jury to decide. Benn said today that he had never visited the camp, and that he knew of no government employee who had seen it.

Contact reporter Layla Bohm at layla@lodinews.com.

SACRAMENTO Hazy Case Against Lodi Man Prosecution Rests -- Evidence Murkier Than First Described (SFC)

By Demian Bulwa, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, March 29, 2006

Sacramento -- Returning to Lodi last summer after a two-year trip to Pakistan, Hamid Hayat was grilled by FBI agents who suspected he might be a terrorist. But the young man didn't seem to understand he was in trouble.

He was questioned three times in the course of a week. When agents told him he had failed a lie-detector test, he confessed to attending a terrorist training camp in Pakistan.

But as Hayat sat in a lobby in the bureau's Sacramento office, eating pizza and waiting to confess further, he invited the lead agent on his case to a party -- a reception to be held when his Pakistani bride arrived. He also complimented the agent on his shoes.

Such unusual details have infused the trials of Hayat and his father, which reached a critical point Tuesday when prosecutors wrapped up their six-week case before a pair of juries in U.S. District Court. The younger Hayat, 23, is charged with supporting terror by attending a paramilitary camp in late 2003 and with initially lying about it; Umer Hayat, 48, is charged with lying about his son's training.

Prosecutors rested after revealing a far murkier case than the government had laid out in documents supporting the charges.

The government showed that Hamid Hayat held some radical and anti-American views. Their last witness was a Defense Department analyst who said Tuesday that Hayat's description of the camp during his disputed confession -- he said it was in a mountaintop clearing outside the Pakistani city of Balakot -- was consistent with satellite images, which showed a "possible" camp in the area.

One of the prosecution's main witnesses, however, was an aggressive informant who raised eyebrows when he reported having seen Osama bin Laden's chief deputy at a Lodi mosque as late as 1999 -- a sighting that national security experts doubt was genuine.

Prosecutors also were forced to rely on the defendants' videotaped confessions, which they called "the meat of the case" but which featured conflicting and sometimes bizarre details.

Umer Hayat, for example, told FBI agents that he had visited his son's camp out of curiosity in late 2004. While the son spoke of training with as few as 35 men in a field, the father described an underground room in a different province of Pakistan where 1,000 masked men, including Americans, fired machine guns, swung curved swords and learned to pole vault across bodies of water.

"You didn't take that as a literal description of what was happening, did you?" the elder Hayat's attorney, Johnny Griffin, asked FBI agent Timothy Harrison.

"I believe at times that Umer Hayat was a poor judge of the distances involved in jumping with a pole," Harrison responded.

Defense attorneys, who expect their case to take about two weeks, say the Hayats never went to a training camp but lied when pressured in a misguided attempt to be helpful. As for Pentagon analyst Eric Benn's testimony Tuesday, Hamid Hayat's attorney, Wazhma Mojaddidi, pointed out that her client had also placed the camp in Kashmir and Afghanistan.

At the center of the prosecution's case is Pakistani American informant Naseem Khan, who was working at a fast-food outlet and convenience store in Bend, Ore., when the FBI came to him weeks after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

The agents asked whether he was involved in money laundering for a charity called the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development, which authorities suspected of funneling money to the Palestinian group Hamas, according to trial testimony.

Khan, 32, denied having anything to do with the charity, but volunteered to agents that while living in Lodi in 1999, he had seen al Qaeda's second-in-command, Ayman al-Zawahiri, at the Lodi mosque. Khan later told agents he had seen two other men on the FBI's list of most wanted terrorists in and around Lodi, an assertion that several terrorism experts regarded as unlikely.

By December 2001, Khan testified, he was working for the FBI in Lodi in a terrorism investigation that would eventually earn him more than $225,000 in salary and expenses. His code name: "Wildcat."

Though Khan did not disclose his targets, defense attorneys and Lodi residents said Khan got close to Muhammad Adil Khan and Shabbir Ahmed, Muslim clerics from Pakistan who were in Lodi on religious worker visas. The men were detained last summer, along with the Hayats, on immigration violations, and later agreed to be deported.

DOJ_NMG_0023437

Khan said that in the summer of 2002 he stumbled upon Hamid Hayat, a man with a sixth-grade education who was born in the United States but had spent half his life in Pakistan. Khan soon received permission to begin recording their conversations.

The men chatted about cricket, quitting smoking and Hayat's "jinxed" love life. When Khan posed as a would-be holy warrior, Hayat took the bait, expressing support for the Taliban and radical Sunni sectarian groups in Pakistan and showing off what prosecutors described as a "jihadi scrapbook" full of articles about militants.

Hayat told Khan that he planned to attend a training camp, but never indicated that he had actually gone.

"I have one objective now," Hayat told Khan on April 1, 2003, just before leaving Lodi. "If I went to Pakistan now, see, straight away, I'll stay at home for one or two weeks, then I'm going for training, friend."

In phone calls over the next couple of months, however, Khan scolded Hayat for "sitting idle" and "wasting time," and at one point told him to "be a man."

Khan testified the insults were a way "to make him talk."

The FBI was sufficiently interested in Hayat to divert his flight home last May to Japan, where the bureau's legal attache in Tokyo, Lawrence Futa, interviewed him. Futa recalled in testimony that Hayat was thin and "didn't appear to be someone who had gone through rigorous training recently."

A week later, however, Hayat confessed that he had attended an al Qaeda-run training camp and had returned to the United States "to carry out his jihadi mission," according to an affidavit signed by FBI agent Pedro Aguilar.

Umer Hayat, the agent wrote, admitted that his son had gone to a camp operated by Maulana Fazlur Rehman, the opposition leader in the Pakistani parliament -- a claim the defense calls outlandish. Initial news accounts of the arrests last year mistakenly assumed the reference was to Maulana Fazlur Rehman Khalil, the head of an outlawed militant group.

The information from father and son about who ran the camp was one of many conflicts in their statements to the FBI.

Hamid Hayat said he had been "fooled" into attending his camp, which he thought was a religious school, and escaped -- only to later become part of a budding terror cell in Lodi.

The young man gave five different answers when asked who ran the camp. He mentioned "big people ... taller than me, (more) educated than me"; a Pakistani group named Harakat-ul-Ansar that was first brought up by an FBI agent; al Qaeda; "maybe my uncle"; and "maybe my grandfather."

Both father and son seemed to have some trouble with English; they primarily speak Pashto in daily life. The agents did most of the talking during the interviews, and at times the Hayats seemed to parrot them.

For instance, when agent Harrison asked Hamid Hayat how he would get attack orders, Hayat responded, "Maybe, uh, send a letter or anything like that," according to a transcript prepared by Aguilar.

"No, I don't think they're gonna send a letter," Harrison said. "I think you're gonna have to talk to somebody here in Lodi."

"Yeah, maybe," Hayat said.

Because of rules regarding hearsay, Hamid Hayat's jury will not hear his father's confession, and vice versa. After closing arguments, the juries will render separate verdicts. Hamid Hayat faces up to 39 years in prison if convicted; his father faces up to 16 years.

Page B - 1

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Brain Drain Hits Homeland Security (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Homeland Security Department is losing top managers and rank-and-file employees in a brain drain that could affect morale and the nation's safety, according to members of Congress and labor experts.

Homeland Security is “hemorrhaging on the front lines and higher up,” says New York University professor Paul Light, an expert on the federal workforce. The turnover comes amid renewed threats of terrorism and as the department readies itself for another hurricane season.

Key vacancies include top leaders in the department's cybersecurity, technology and disaster response divisions.

The latest high-level departure came last week, when management chief Janet Hale announced she was leaving. She joined an exodus of top officials who have quit recently, many in the aftermath of Homeland Security's failures surrounding Hurricane Katrina last fall.

This month, operations chief Matthew Broderick resigned. Last month, Science and Technology Undersecretary Charles McQueary resigned. And in January, Chief Financial Officer Andy Maner quit.

DOJ_NMG_0023438

Meanwhile, the job of cybersecurity chief has been vacant since last summer. David Paulison has been the acting chief of the Federal Emergency Management Agency since Michael Brown resigned the $148,000 post in September; no permanent replacement has been found. FEMA is part of Homeland Security.

Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke acknowledged that the stress of top-level government security jobs can be grueling and "wear" on employees, who are expected to make "countless personal sacrifices." Nonetheless, he said he expects a number of the top jobs to be filled soon.

The impact is difficult to gauge. But a House investigation of Hurricane Katrina response recently cited personnel shortages at FEMA as a key part of the agency's failings during the disaster.

"It can't help morale for the rank-and-file employees when you have so much turnover," says Rep. Bennie Thompson, D-Miss., the top Democrat on the House Homeland Security Committee. "There just appears to be a continuous brain drain out of the agency."

FEMA typically has 2,500 full-time employees. When Katrina hit, it was down 500. Some of those positions have been filled, but the agency is still struggling to get back to full strength.

To prepare for the next hurricane season, officials in February announced a plan to ensure 95% of FEMA's jobs are filled by June 1.

Randall Larsen of the Institute for Homeland Security questions how the department will attract good people. Though many top-level jobs pay more than $100,000, "Who's going to give up a good job in the private sector to go into an organization that is criticized by the press and Congress and the American people?" he said.

GAO: Customs Failed 'Dirty Bomb' Test (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu And William Branigin

Washington Post, March 29, 2006

Congressional investigators testing U.S. port security smuggled enough radioactive material into the United States last year to make two radiological "dirty" bombs, officials told a Senate panel yesterday.

In December, undercover teams from the Government Accountability Office, Congress's audit arm, carried small amounts of cesium-137 -- a radioactive material used for cancer therapy, industrial gauges and well logging -- in the trunks of rental cars through border checkpoints in Texas and Washington state. The material triggered radiation alarms, but the smugglers used false documents to persuade U.S. Customs and Border Protection inspectors to let them through with it.

"These are documents my 20-year-old son could easily develop with a simple Internet search," said Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.), who chaired the hearing into covert nuclear threats before a Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs subcommittee yesterday. "It is a problem when it is tougher to buy cold medicine than it is to acquire enough material to construct a dirty bomb."

Jayson P. Ahern, an assistant commissioner for field operations for Customs and Border Protection, said U.S. customs officers were unable to confirm the validity of counterfeit Nuclear Regulatory Commission licenses presented by testers, but a system will be in place within 30 days to do so.

"All our systems worked, and officers appeared to follow our protocols," Ahern said. "But the bottom line is the material was allowed in with questionable documents."

The GAO report is the latest to find weaknesses in implementing detection systems for air travel and biological, chemical and radiological threats. Another GAO report yesterday found that foreign corruption, technical limitations, poor maintenance and lack of infrastructure compromise detection systems placed overseas by the United States. But Ahern said U.S. customs officers have scanned more than 80 million containers with radiation portal monitors since 2000, resolved 318,000 alarms and turned up no illegal material.

Homeland Security and Nuclear Regulatory Commission officials, while not discounting the economic and psychological effects of a conventional explosive laced with radioactive materials or "dirty bomb," said the amounts smuggled were minimal.

Michael Levi, a fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations, said the 150 microcuries of cesium-137 smuggled by each team would barely cause more than one death from cancer per million people exposed for 30 years.

The GAO also reported it is "unlikely" the Department of Homeland Security can install 3,034 new-generation radiation detectors by September 2009 as planned at border crossings, ports and mail facilities, and that the $1.2 billion program may incur a $342 million overrun.

In a separate report released yesterday, the Council on Foreign Relations reported that the government has not made prevention of nuclear terrorism its highest priority. Council fellow Charles D. Ferguson said more action is needed to address proliferation threats posed by highly enriched uranium and weapons in Pakistan, Russia and more than 100 civilian facilities.

DOJ_NMG_0023439

"Securing and eliminating vulnerable nuclear materials and weapons offer points of greatest leverage in preventing nuclear terrorism," Ferguson wrote. "The biggest impediment to reducing the threat of nuclear terrorism involving Pakistan is President [Pervez] Musharraf's expressed belief that terrorists cannot make nuclear weapons."

According to the International Atomic Energy Agency, there were more than 400 confirmed cases of illicit trafficking in materials that could be used to produce a dirty bomb between 1993 and 2004, and 21 that involved material that could be used to produce a nuclear bomb.

"The simple fact is that if a nuclear device is already in the U.S., it's too late," Sen. Daniel K. Akaka (D-Hawaii) said.

Fake ID's At The Border Crossings (NYT)

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

While federal officials have been scrambling to install enough radiation detectors to screen all cargo for dangerous nuclear materials, they have apparently left a glaring hole in this thin and spotty line of defense. Even when detectors signal the presence of a radioactive substance, border guards may be fooled into waving a shipment through based on fraudulent paperwork and glib talk by the drivers.

That disturbing lesson comes from a report issued this week by the Government Accountability Office, an investigative arm of Congress. Undercover testers put small amounts of cesium-137, a highly radioactive material, in the trunks of two vehicles and drove across the borders from Mexico and Canada at sites that had big stationary detectors.

The good news is that the detectors signaled the presence of radioactivity and that inspectors then questioned the undercover testers and subjected their vehicles to further inspection with hand-held devices. The bad news is that they allowed the shipments through anyway, apparently on the basis of counterfeit Nuclear Regulatory Commission documents, copied from the Internet, and fake shipping documents from a fictitious company.

The G.A.O. says the smuggled cesium was enough to make two "dirty bombs," which could contaminate an area and render it unusable for a long period. The N.R.C., on the other hand, says the amounts were far too small to worry about. Either way, it is disturbing that the guards let the shipments through. It is not clear whether the guards have gotten complacent in the wake of repeated false alarms triggered by natural radiation from bananas, ceramic tiles, fertilizer and other products, or were simply tricked by the phony documents. Red-faced officials insist that they will give border agents new tools to verify such documents shortly. The N.R.C. clearly needs to tighten its rules governing the purchase and security of small quantities of radioactive materials.

A dirty bomb uses ordinary explosives to disperse radioactive materials and contaminate the environment. An even greater, if less likely, threat would be posed by a real nuclear weapon or the fissile material to make one. Unfortunately, bomb-grade uranium is much harder to detect than cesium, and radioactive materials shielded by lead are much harder to detect than containers of cesium in cardboard boxes in vehicle trunks. The nation is far short of its goal to have radiation detectors at every portal. If border guards miss shipments of bombs or fissile material, the result could be catastrophic.

Senators Urge Swifter Action To Strengthen Port Security (AP)

By Liz Sidoti

The AP, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON --Senators said Tuesday the United States must act more quickly to strengthen security at U.S. entry points following the disclosure that undercover investigators breached security by slipping nuclear material into the United States.

"There are several gaps in our defense," Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., said, opening a Senate Homeland Security subcommittee hearing on the matter. "These issues must be addressed with a sense of urgency."

Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the panel's top Democrat, called the outcome of the Government Accountability Office's investigation "an alarming wake-up call."

"If terrorists were to obtain nuclear or radiological material and smuggle it into this country, the consequences could be catastrophic: a tremendous loss of life and a crippling blow to our economy," said Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, the chairwoman of the full Homeland Security Committee.

In a test last year, the small amounts of cesium-137, which is used in industrial gauges, triggered radiation alarms in Texas and Washington state. The material was enough to make two small "dirty bombs," officials said, yet U.S. customs agents permitted the investigators to enter the United States after being tricked with counterfeit documents.

The Bush administration said Tuesday that within 30 days it will give U.S. Customs and Border Protection agents the tools they need to verify such documents in the future.

DOJ_NMG_0023440

In a series of reports, the GAO, which is the investigative arm of Congress, found that the Homeland Security Department's goal of installing 3,034 radiation detectors by September 2009 across the United States -- at border crossings, seaports, airports and mail facilities -- was "unlikely."

Investigators also said the government probably will spend $342 million more than it expects to complete the job, given its current costs and pace. Between October 2000 and October 2005, they said, the government spent about $286 million installing radiation monitors inside the United States.

The commission, in charge of overseeing nuclear reactor and nuclear substance safety, defended its record.

"Security has been of prime importance for us on the materials front and the power plant front since 9/11," commission spokesman David McIntyre said.

Vayl Oxford, who heads the Homeland Security Department's Domestic Nuclear Detection Office, said Monday that the substance could have been used in a radiological weapon with limited effects. On Tuesday, he told lawmakers that his comment was not meant to discount the psychological and economic impact a dirty bomb could have.

Jayson Ahern, the assistant customs commissioner for field operations, said a system for U.S. customs agents to confirm the authenticity of government licenses will be in place within 30 days.

To test security at U.S. borders with Mexico and Canada, GAO investigators last year represented themselves as employees of a fake company and obtained cesium-137.

They attempted to cross into the United States with the substance -- enough to possibly create two crude radiological bombs that could spread radiation if spread by the blast of a conventional explosive.

When stopped, the investigators presented counterfeit shipping papers and NRC documents that allegedly permitted them to receive, acquire, possess and transfer radioactive substances.

Investigators found that customs agents weren't able to check whether a person caught with radioactive materials was permitted to possess the materials under a government-issued license.

"Unless nuclear smugglers in possession of faked license documents raised suspicions in some other way, CBP officers could follow agency guidelines yet unwittingly allow them to enter the country with their illegal nuclear cargo," a report said. It described this problem as "a significant gap" in the nation's safety procedures.

False radiation alarms are common -- sometimes occurring more than 100 times a day -- although the GAO said inspectors generally do a good job distinguishing nuisance alarms from actual ones. False alarms can be caused by ceramics, fertilizers, bananas and even patients who have recently undergone some types of medical procedures.

Senators Urge Tighter Border Security After Test Finds Flaw (USAT)

USA Today, March 29, 2006

The United States must act even more quickly to strengthen security at U.S. border entrances following the disclosure that undercover investigators were able to slip nuclear material into the country, senators said at a hearing Tuesday.

“There are several gaps in our defense,” said Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn. “These issues must be addressed with a sense of urgency.”

Michigan Sen. Carl Levin, the top Democrat on the Homeland Security subcommittee, called the investigation by the Government Accountability Office “an alarming wake-up call.”

In a test last year, small amounts of cesium-137, which is used in industrial gauges, triggered radiation alarms at border crossings in Texas and Washington state. The material was enough to make two small “dirty bombs,” a GAO report said, yet U.S. Customs agents permitted the investigators to enter the United States after being tricked with counterfeit documents.

A dirty bomb would use a conventional explosion to spread radioactive material. It would make an area unusable and cause economic havoc.

Thomas Kean, an ex-governor who chaired the 9/11 Commission, told senators “the size of the problem still totally dwarfs the policy response.”

The Bush administration said that within 45 days it will give U.S. Customs and Border Protection agents the tools they need to verify such documents in the future.

Republican Sen. John Ensign of Nevada said he is dropping his opposition to the promotion of Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen, who headed Hurricane Katrina recovery efforts. Ensign said that after discussing Katrina problems with Allen, he would no longer oppose him as commandant of the Coast Guard. Under Senate rules, any senator can block a vote on a confirmation. President Bush nominated Allen in January. The nomination now goes to the full Senate for a vote.

'Dirty Bombs' Called Threat To Shipping (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

DOJ_NMG_0023441

The Washington Times, March 29, 2006

The marine shipping industry will be devastated if foreign countries do not increase cargo screenings to protect against a "dirty bomb" terrorist attack, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff is telling Asian officials this week.

During a trip to Japan on Monday and China yesterday, Mr. Chertoff urged cooperation to strengthen the shipping industry and to protect the United States against a nuclear attack.

"I think we all know that if a container were used to bring a dirty bomb or something similar into the United States, in addition to the obviously catastrophic consequences in America, it would be absolutely devastating to marine shipping," Mr. Chertoff said during a press conference yesterday.

"We can only really build our own security if we build it in partnership with other countries," Mr. Chertoff said.

The International Atomic Energy Agency has reported 662 known attempts to smuggle nuclear or radiological material across borders around the world.

Mr. Chertoff said it would be a "mortal blow" if Asian ports failed to use nuclear radiation detection equipment on ships bound for the United States. Hong Kong ports are experimenting with technology for such a program.

On his first trip to Asia, the homeland security chief is examining cutting-edge technology used to secure foreign ports, including a visit to one of the largest ports of the world, Singapore.

"We're looking to build a stronger partnership overseas, particularly in port and container security," said Homeland Security spokesman Brian Doyle. "It will make us and them more secure."

On Capitol Hill, lawmakers criticized the department for failing to block nuclear-weapon smuggling in a sting set up by the Government Accountability Office.

Witnesses told the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs permanent subcommittee on investigations yesterday that enough nuclear material entered the country as part of the investigation to make two dirty bombs.

"The radiation detectors correctly alarmed," said Sen. Norm Coleman, Minnesota Republican and panel chairman. "This is the good news."

"The bad news, however, is that officers were fooled by fraudulent documents and didn't have the mechanisms to verify the documents. These are documents my 20-year-old son could easily develop with a simple Internet search. We cannot allow this potentially deadly material to transmit our borders with ease," Mr. Coleman said.

The forged documents showed the nuclear shipment was approved by federal officials.

Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the panel's ranking Democrat, said Homeland Security officials have made significant improvements to detect such materials at land- and seaports, but said the GAO report shows "much more can and should be done."

Takeover Makeover (WSJ)

By Richard C. Shelby

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Over the last three years, direct foreign investment in the U.S. has exceeded $530 billion. The benefits are substantial: In 2002 alone, foreign affiliates paid $17.8 billion in taxes, representing 12% of U.S. corporate tax revenue. The investment is a key engine of our continued economic growth and also helps sustain global partnerships with countries throughout the world. The leading foreign investor is our staunchest ally, the U.K. Other key foreign investors are Japan, the Netherlands and Germany. U.S. companies also have a substantial stake abroad, with $252 billion invested overseas in 2004. A policy of open foreign investment here is thus essential if we are to expect similar treatment from other nations.

Nevertheless, anyone within proximity of a television, newspaper or radio over the course of the last month is aware of the firestorm that erupted over the Dubai Ports acquisition. Aside from the heightened political rhetoric and the considerable misinformation surrounding this specific deal, the controversy focused the spotlight squarely on what has previously been an obscure process by which the U.S. approves foreign acquisitions: the Committee on Foreign Investment in the U.S., or CFIUS. More to the point, the Dubai controversy provided a revealing glimpse of inherent flaws in the CFIUS process. Along with the recent uproar over the attempted acquisition of a U.S. oil company by a state-owned Chinese firm, it should provide enough momentum for strong reform of CFIUS, without which there will be even more investment related altercations.

The Dubai deal highlighted a key CFIUS deficiency by demonstrating that many top officials were not aware of CFIUS's approval of the transaction. As chairman of the Senate Banking Committee, which has jurisdiction over the Defense Production Act and CFIUS, I learned of the approval as other lawmakers did -- through the media. In fact, the secretaries of Treasury, Defense and Homeland Security have all publicly stated that they were unaware of the approval until it made the evening headlines. It is precisely because of the inherently secretive nature of CFIUS that our highest officials were caught off guard, and it directly corresponds to the current lack of credibility in the process.

DOJ_NMG_0023442

The Senate Banking Committee has had long-standing concerns with the inadequacies of CFIUS. In early 2004, members of the committee requested that the GAO perform a study on the process and include recommendations for reform. We held two hearings on the substance of this report last year, in addition to a hearing held earlier this month devoted exclusively to the Dubai Ports issue. Drawing from the GAO analysis and the record established by these hearings, I intend to move legislation through the Banking Committee this week that should give Congress and the American people greater faith in the CFIUS process.

A strong reform will introduce transparency, accountability and oversight to ensure public confidence that the deals approved by CFIUS do not pose a threat to national security. Striking the appropriate balance between our open investment policy and legitimate concerns over national security is not an easy task. The U.S. can never subjugate our national security to economic interests. But just as important as ensuring that national security is properly weighed, the signals that we send to the rest of the world about our investment policies must also be given thoughtful consideration.

This can be accomplished by strengthening the process by which we consider these transactions in specific areas. Among the key elements of reform will be closing the "Byrd Amendment loophole" to require full investigations of foreign state-owned companies which seek to acquire a U.S. company. Contrary to congressional intent, the Treasury used a loose interpretation of the Byrd Amendment to avoid a full 45-day investigation in the Dubai Ports case. This loophole will be closed to remove any ambiguity.

The Banking Committee bill will formally establish CFIUS in statute, giving it increased visibility and accountability. In a significant structural change, the secretary of defense will be added as a vice chairman and the director of national intelligence will be added as a regular participant. To increase transparency, the legislation will enhance congressional oversight, requiring notice to the relevant congressional committees on proposed transactions, with a report due to the committees of jurisdiction upon the disposition of those cases. To ensure accountability from the administration and to avoid the lack of culpability expressed by public officials in the Dubai case, the law will require certification of these reports by the CFIUS chair, vice chair and lead agency responsible for the review. The legislation will also require a comprehensive annual report to the Senate Banking and House Financial Services Committees on all CFIUS transactions.

Given the massive importance of the issues at stake in this debate -- national security and economic stability and growth -- it is incumbent upon the Congress to act thoughtfully and deliberatively. This can be achieved through targeted and specific legislation that will give us the credible process the American people deserve without causing irreparable damage to our economy and global relationships.

Sen. Shelby of Alabama is chairman of the Senate Banking Committee.

Xenophobia's Threat To Prosperity (WP)

By Charles Prince

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

Citigroup employs 300,000 people in 100 countries. We are a guest in every one of those countries. We've bought companies in many of them and, with a few notable exceptions during periods of war and revolution, we've been welcomed with great hospitality everywhere for over a century -- just as the United States has welcomed many companies based in other countries. I sincerely hope things stay that way.

But that could prove a challenge in the current political environment. There are now upward of 30 proposals in Congress to make changes in the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States (CFIUS), a little-known body that has the authority to suspend or prohibit any acquisition, merger or takeover of a U.S. corporation that is deemed to threaten national security. The committee, made up of representatives from a dozen federal agencies, has recently come under intense scrutiny, even though it has not allowed a single breach of national security since it was established in 1988.

Some of the proposals would place new and potentially damaging restrictions on foreign investment in the United States. Legitimate national security concerns are one thing, but introducing overt political considerations into decisions regarding the allocation of capital has the potential to undermine investor confidence -- both domestic and foreign -- in U.S. markets and to jeopardize the continued vibrancy, depth and liquidity of those markets.

Like the investments made overseas by Citigroup, IBM, General Electric and countless other U.S.-based global firms, investment in the United States by companies based outside this country is essential for job creation and innovation. The same is true of individual and institutional investors in the United States and in other countries. U.S. assets owned by individuals or companies outside the United States total about $11.5 trillion. These investors have helped to finance the housing boom in the United States and have contributed significantly to the rise in home values and ownership. They bought nearly $227 billion of U.S. agency debt in 2005, and they currently hold more than $900 billion of such debt.

Non-U.S. companies established in the United States support nearly 5.3 million jobs in this country, spread throughout all 50 states. Put another way, 4.7 percent of Americans holding private-sector jobs are employed by companies based outside the United States. These employees receive compensation totaling $318 billion annually, and their numbers are growing rapidly. Indeed, the very presence of these companies in the United States creates a multiplier effect throughout local and national economies -- including tax revenue -- that benefits all Americans.

DOJ_NMG_0023443

In an increasingly global economy, labels such as "foreign" and "domestic" have become less relevant. Many non-U.S. multinational firms have moved their U.S. personnel into senior global positions. For instance, many chief executives of U.S. subsidiaries, most of whom are American citizens, have gone on to become CEOs of the global company, including Don Shepard of Aegon, Don Robert of Experian, Marjorie Scardino of Pearson and Klaus Kleinfeld of Siemens.

At the same time, many companies based outside the United States have moved senior managers with global responsibility for an entire business unit or function to the United States. The leadership role played by the employees of these companies, and their operations, benefit the U.S. economy and must be taken into account when balancing the value conferred by non-U.S. companies against notions of national interest.

I respectfully urge Congress to take only those actions that will enhance the security review process for foreign investment in the United States, and to avoid endorsing proposals that could undermine America's support for access to capital markets and the free movement of capital. We must avoid measures taken in the name of national security that are isolationist and xenophobic, and could have the effect of choking off vital investments in America. Such a path could threaten job creation in the United States, impede American economic growth and jeopardize U.S. efforts to open foreign markets for American companies, consumers and investors. Any changes to the CFIUS process should result from an informed, sober and fact-based assessment of all of our interests.

Genuine threats to U.S. national security must be met with resolve and purpose -- no deal can be worth the safety of our citizens. But at the same time, challenges to U.S. economic success must be met with the same commitment to international leadership and engagement that has for decades contributed to increasing prosperity in this country and throughout the world. This is not a choice between protecting vital national interests and building a more prosperous future. These two goals are vitally important, but they are also compatible, and Americans will hold their leaders accountable for working to achieve both of them.

The writer is CEO of Citigroup Inc.

"Spy Files" Include Antiwar Surveillance (DENP)

By Felisa Cardona, Denver Post Staff Writer

Denver Post, March 29, 2006

The ACLU has obtained more documents that show that the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force was watching antiwar groups in Denver as part of a domestic terrorism investigation.

The files were released to the ACLU's Colorado chapter under a Freedom of Information Act request filed in December 2004.

The records show FBI agents spent hours monitoring activist organizations such as Food Not Bombs, and the now-closed bookstore, Breakdown Books in Capitol Hill, among other groups.

FBI agents spent two hours outside the bookstore counting about 40 people who gathered there to carpool to an antiwar demonstration in Colorado Springs on Feb. 15, 2003. The report says agents noted the license plate numbers of a dozen nearby vehicles.

"This report raises more questions about the degree to which the FBI is unjustifiably regarding demonstrations and public dissent as potential terrorism," said Mark Silverstein, legal director of the ACLU's Colorado chapter.

Some of those groups, such as Making A Difference/Coloradans Opposed to War (MADCOW), have already disbanded since they were surveilled, Silverstein said.

In 2004, Denver activist Sarah Bardwell was questioned by agents regarding her association with Food Not Bombs, a group that the FBI characterized as having ties to the Anarchist Black Cross, a group that the FBI notes in the files as having a history of violence.

A flier for the Anarchist Black Cross was found on the Auraria campus in Denver and agents investigated a meeting that the group had on Lipan Street in 2004, the files show.

Silverstein said only a couple of people showed up for the meeting and ended up eating cookies.

The FBI contends that they do not watch groups or individuals unless agents receive intelligence that violent or disruptive activities are being planned.

Staff writer Felisa Cardona can be reached at 303-820-1219 or at fcardona@denverpost.com.

ACLU Says FBI Watched War Protesters In A 2003 Domestic Terrorism Probe (AP)

AP, March 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0023444

DENVER - FBI files on domestic terrorism show the agency monitored a meeting of anti-war activists in Denver in 2003, suggesting the government may treat dissent as "potential terrorism," the American Civil Liberties Union said Tuesday.

A document obtained by the ACLU this week under the Freedom of Information Act says the FBI also recorded the license numbers of vehicles "in the vicinity" of a now-closed bookstore where the activists met before carpooling to a demonstration in Colorado Springs.

More than 30 people were arrested at two anti-war demonstrations in Colorado Springs later that day, but it wasn't clear whether any of them had been at the Denver gathering.

The new document was the latest twist in a campaign by the ACLU to investigate surveillance by local and federal authorities of activists in Colorado, including peaceful groups, dating to the 1950s.

"We just have questions about why the FBI is surreptitiously staking out a bookstore in Denver and writing down the license numbers of people who are stopping there for the purpose of carpooling to an anti-war demonstration," said Mark Silverstein, legal director of the ACLU in Colorado.

FBI spokesman Bill Carter in Washington said he was not familiar with the bookstore surveillance, but he said the agency would not monitor a group simply because it is protesting.

"Our interest is not in the First Amendment activities the group is involved in," he said. The FBI would monitor a group only if participants might be planning or engaging in "violent criminal activity," he said.

The latest document obtained by the ACLU says a two-hour surveillance of Breakdown Books in February 2003 showed that at least 40 people "appeared to be involved" in the Revolutionary Anti-War Response demonstration planned later that day in Colorado Springs.

The one-page document does not mention any potential for criminal violence. The only blocked-out portions appear to be the names of four agents who conducted the surveillance and the license plates of 12 vehicles.

Later that day, police in Colorado Springs fired tear gas and at least one rubber bullet after an anti-war rally spilled out of a park and blocked a major street. At least two people were treated for minor injuries and 13 people were arrested. A second demonstration ended with 21 arrests but no tear gas.

The document does not mention a domestic terrorism investigation, but Silverstein said the file number corresponds to another FBI document the ACLU obtained in December that includes the designation "AOT," which he said stands for "acts of terrorism."

Silverstein said the FBI released the documents in response to an ACLU request for information about the agency's Joint Terrorism Task Force. The FBI has formed 66 such task forces with local law enforcement agencies across the nation, including Denver police.

FBI documents obtained earlier by the ACLU showed the agency had opened domestic terrorism investigations of peaceful demonstrators after reading websites announcing protests.

Among the groups the FBI investigated were the Colorado American Indian Movement and the Rocky Mountain Peace and Justice Center, the documents showed.

- The Associated Press

In 2003, the ACLU settled a lawsuit against the city of Denver for keeping so-called "spy files" on peaceful groups since at least the 1950s. The city agreed to collect information only if it can show a clear connection to criminal activity.

Silverstein said ACLU chapters nationwide are now requesting documents about FBI surveillance of peaceful protesters as the national organization tries to measure how extensive the monitoring has been.

He said he did not know where the effort might lead.

"Certainly I wouldn't rule out asking for legislation or doing more public education or litigation, if it's possible to do that," he said.

FOR THE RECORD (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, March 29, 2006

Monitoring of activists: In some copies of Monday's Section A, a front-page headline said, "Activists on Anti-Terror Watch List." The list referred to in the article was not a formal terrorist watch list, the FBI said, but was included in a Department of Justice presentation to a law class that listed groups terrorists might associate with. Two left-wing groups were included.

After Hard Lessons, A New Game Plan For Hurricane Seasons (NYT)

By Jeremy Alford

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

BATON ROUGE, La., March 28 — Federal and state emergency officials promised a different approach on Tuesday to the coming hurricane season, saying they would no longer use "last resort" shelters like the Superdome to house displaced residents.

Instead, they said, they will put into effect a better system of communication and evacuation to get residents away from the path of a storm.

"Our goal is to create an environment for all of the individuals to leave in the face of a storm rather than stay," said Terry Ebbert, the homeland security adviser for Orleans Parish, speaking at a news conference with federal officials regarding preparations for the 2006 season, which begins June 1.

To relocate a large number of people efficiently, Mr. Ebbert said, officials are planning an improved public education campaign, and are exploring new ways to use buses, trains, airlines and other evacuation routes. Those plans, however, are still in the conceptual stages and will probably not be ready until closer to the hurricane season, he said.

R. David Paulison, acting director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, said the new plans were a direct result of lessons learned from last year's disastrous Gulf Coast hurricanes. By retooling the agency and bringing in emergency resources before they are needed — supplies are being stockpiled at various locations off the Gulf of Mexico — the federal government will not repeat its mistakes, he vowed.

"We have a different situation now," Mr. Paulison said.

While the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration will not issue its official forecast for the new season until May, William Gray, a hurricane expert with Colorado State University, is predicting a tumultuous six months, although the season is not likely to rival last year's devastation. In his December outlook report, Mr. Gray predicted there would be 17 named storms, 9 hurricanes and 5 major events with winds exceeding 111 miles per hour.

Aside from these threatening conditions, moving people out of hurricane-prone areas will be more challenging than ever, Mr. Paulison said, because there are now more than 94,000 trailers housing evacuees in the Gulf Coast region alone that are largely unable to stand up to severe winds. People living in trailers will face a mandatory evacuation even for something as small as a tropical storm, he said.

Henry Rodriguez, president of St. Bernard Parish, a swampy area just east of New Orleans that was virtually destroyed by Hurricane Katrina, said he would wait to see the actual response before he started cheering the federal government, but expressed confidence that preparations would be improved over all.

He added that he hoped that preparedness for this year would not overshadow relief from the hurricanes that had already left their mark on the Gulf Coast.

"I hope that they have learned their lesson by now," Mr. Rodriguez said. "I hope they know that everyone is depending on them. They needed better planning, and it sounds like we're getting that. I just hope their response is better than their efforts at recovery, though. There has been no progress there — only progressively worse."

La. Candidates Must Track Down Voters (USAT)

By Anne Rochell Konigsmark

USA Today, March 29, 2006

ATLANTA — Seven candidates for mayor came here to debate tough issues, but they aren't hoping to lead this city. They want to be mayor of New Orleans.

“We miss you, and we want you back,” candidate Mitch Landrieu, who is also Louisiana's lieutenant governor, said recently to New Orleanians who have been living in Atlanta since Hurricane Katrina hit Aug. 29, flooding three-fourths of the city and emptying it of most residents.

In what could be a first in American politics, the New Orleans mayor's race may have more voters outside the city than inside. Candidates in the election April 22 are on a nationwide cat-and-mouse search for voters, who live in all 50 states.

“I just know of no precedent for it,” says Hastings Wyman, editor of the Southern Political Report.

The mayoral hopefuls are catching trains, chartering planes and taking daylong car trips to reach voters in cities with large numbers of evacuees, such as Houston, Atlanta, Dallas and Memphis.

“This is murder,” said candidate Johnny Adriani, who attended last weekend's Atlanta forum, which was hosted by evacuees. He said it took all day by train to reach Atlanta. “It was far too expensive to fly,” he said.

Adriani, who lives in Baton Rouge since his home in the Lakeview neighborhood flooded, attended another forum last weekend in Houston.

More than 250,000 of the 460,000 people who lived in New Orleans before the hurricane have not come home.

On Monday, a federal court refused a request from civil rights groups to delay the election, already postponed from February to April. The groups argue it is unfair to the thousands of displaced black residents.

DOJ_NMG_0023446

Jesse Jackson will lead a protest here Saturday.

Absentee-balloting rules have been relaxed somewhat for those living out of state; for those in Louisiana, there will be polling places statewide; more than 700,000 information packets have been sent to evacuees; and the state is running full-page ads in city newspapers around the Southeast. The Louisiana secretary of State's office commissioned a study that concluded about 80% of registered voters are living in or very near New Orleans.

The U.S. Justice Department, which oversees elections in Louisiana and other Southern states to prevent discrimination, has signed off on the election.

Candidates who are well-known and have money to travel have an advantage with displaced voters, says Ed Renwick, a political science professor at Loyola University in New Orleans. However, even a wealthy candidate "can't run television ad campaigns in all those cities," Renwick says.

"It's tricky," says Ashley Casey, who works for Audubon Nature Institute Director Ron Forman, one of the candidates. "You can't just walk down the street in another city and say, 'Hey! Voters!' "

This election is not easy for voters, either. Ferdinand Hines, who has been living in Atlanta since Katrina ruined his home in New Orleans East, was one of fewer than 100 attendees at the Atlanta forum.

Hines plans to vote but is worried about the absentee-balloting process, which requires voters to get a signed affidavit proving they are displaced. "It looked like if they could come up with an online system, that would be more efficient," he said.

Some evacuees plan to charter buses to return to Louisiana to vote, says Carla Allen, co-founder of the Coastal Gumbo Coalition, a grass-roots group for evacuees that hosted the Atlanta forum.

"We are telling people to go home to vote," she says. She hopes someone will donate buses to evacuees.

"If we don't vote, we don't have a voice," she says. "And the next four years are going to be a turning point for New Orleans."

Indeed, Katrina changed what probably would have been a sleepy re-election race — with incumbent Ray Nagin winning easily — into nationally intriguing political theater. Twenty-two candidates have jumped in to challenge Nagin. "One of the reasons I'm running is to be a part of history," the Rev. Tom Watson says.

Among the challengers:

·Kimberly Williamson-Butler, the New Orleans criminal court clerk who announced her candidacy on her way to jail. She was held for three days this month for refusing a court order regarding cleanup of a flooded evidence room.

·Forman, who runs the city's zoo and aquarium. His wife, Sally, was one of Nagin's top advisers until her husband decided to run against her boss.

Who's she supporting now? "My husband," she says.

·Marie Galatas, who says God told her to run and who claims to be able to see into the future.

·Landrieu, whose sister is U.S. Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., and whose father, "Moon," was the city's last white mayor when he left office 30 years ago.

·Roderick Dean, an election oddity: This Louisville resident is the only candidate in the race who doesn't live in Louisiana.

Many challengers are political newcomers. They're gambling that Nagin's popularity has waned, particularly among white voters who gave him broad support in his first election. Nagin apologized after his Martin Luther King Jr. Day speech in which he predicted that New Orleans would again be a "chocolate city" — predominantly black — because "that's how God wants it to be."

Loyola's Renwick predicts turnout will be low in other cities but very high among New Orleanians who have returned.

"People here are going to vote like crazy," he says. "Interest in this race is extremely high. We might wind up having a normal turnout overall."

In 2002, 45% of the 300,000 registered voters turned out to vote for mayor.

Candidates at the Atlanta forum appealed to voters' love of New Orleans.

"You are New Orleanians, and you don't belong here," Adriani said.

Candidate Shedrick White recited a poem he had written about New Orleans, which evoked city treasures such as brass bands and red beans and rice. The moderator, the Rev. Glenn Allen, was moved to tears.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Opposes Iraq's Premier, Shiites Report (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0023447

BAGHDAD, Iraq, March 28 — The American ambassador has told Shiite officials that President Bush does not want the Iraqi prime minister to remain the country's leader in the next government, senior Shiite politicians said Tuesday.

It is the first time the Americans have directly expressed a preference in the furious debate over the country's top job, the politicians said, and it is inflaming tensions between the Americans and some Shiite leaders.

The ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad, told the head of the main Shiite political bloc at a meeting on Saturday to pass on a "personal message from President Bush" to the interim prime minister, Ibrahim al-Jaafari, said Redha Jowad Taki, a Shiite member of Parliament who was at the meeting.

Mr. Khalilzad said Mr. Bush "doesn't want, doesn't support, doesn't accept" Mr. Jaafari as the next prime minister, according to Mr. Taki, a senior aide to Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, the head of the Shiite bloc. It was the first "clear and direct message" from the Americans on a specific candidate for prime minister, Mr. Taki said.

The Shiite bloc, which won a plurality in the parliamentary election in December, nominated Mr. Jaafari last month to retain his post for four more years.

American officials in Baghdad did not dispute the Shiite politicians' account of the conversation, though they would not discuss the details of the meeting. A spokeswoman for the American Embassy confirmed that Mr. Khalilzad met with Mr. Hakim on Saturday. But she declined to comment on what was said.

"The decisions about the choice of the prime minister are entirely up to the Iraqis," said the spokeswoman, Elizabeth Colton. "This will be an Iraqi decision."

In Washington, the State Department said it would not comment on diplomatic conversations, but Adam Ereli, the deputy spokesman, reiterated American support for "a government of national unity with strong leadership that can unify all Iraqis."

The Americans have harshly criticized the Jaafari government in recent months for supporting Shiite militias that have been fomenting sectarian violence and pushing Iraq closer to full-scale civil war.

Mr. Khalilzad has sharpened his criticism in the last week, saying the militias are now killing more people than the Sunni Arab-led insurgency. American officials have expressed growing concern that Mr. Jaafari is incapable of reining in the private armies, especially since Moktada al-Sadr, the anti-American cleric who leads the most volatile militia, is Mr. Jaafari's most powerful backer.

Haider al-Ubady, a spokesman for Mr. Jaafari, said the prime minister had received the ambassador's message and accused the Americans of trying to subvert Iraqi sovereignty.

Tensions between Shiite leaders and the American government, which had been rising for months, boiled over after an assault on Sunday night by American and Iraqi forces on a Shiite mosque compound in northern Baghdad.

Shiite leaders say at least 17 civilians were killed in the battle, most of them members of a Shiite political party. American commanders say the soldiers fought insurgents.

The reported American pressure over Mr. Jaafari's nomination is another sign of White House impatience over the deadlocked talks to form a new government. American officials say the impasse has created a power vacuum that has encouraged lawlessness and civil conflict.

The nomination has become one of the most contentious issues in those talks, with the main Kurdish, Sunni Arab and secular blocs calling for the Shiites to replace Mr. Jaafari. On Monday, Shiite leaders suspended their participation in the negotiations, saying they were enraged by the assault on the mosque complex.

In Baghdad on Tuesday, at least 21 people were abducted in four separate incidents in the biggest wave of kidnappings in a month, an Interior Ministry official said. In one incident, 15 men in Iraqi Army uniforms dragged at least six people from a money exchange shop and stole nearly $60,000. In two other cases, people wearing Interior Ministry commando uniforms snatched victims from two electronics shops.

The police in western Baghdad discovered 14 bodies on Tuesday, all killed execution-style with gunshots to the head, apparently the latest victims of sectarian bloodletting. On Monday, Iraqi forces found 18 bodies near Baquba with similar wounds. Earlier reports of 30 beheaded bodies found in that area were wrong, the Interior Ministry official said.

An American soldier was killed Tuesday by small-arms fire in Baghdad, and another was killed and three were wounded by a roadside bomb outside Habbaniya, the American military said.

The Iraqi security minister, Abdul Karim al-Enizi, said on the state-run Iraqiya network on Tuesday night that the Iraqi forces who had raided the mosque compound in Baghdad were not part of the Interior or Defense Ministry. A survivor said the soldiers did not speak Arabic well, implying they may have been Kurdish militiamen working with Americans, Mr. Enizi said.

At the Pentagon, senior officials defended the raid, releasing photographs they said proved that weapons and bomb-making materials had been seized inside the compound, which they described as a school complex that had been turned into a base for a "hostage ring."

DOJ_NMG_0023448

When the soldiers entered the compound, "they found that there was a building there that had a small minaret and a prayer room inside it," said Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. "Some people are calling that a mosque."

The surge in violence has shaken confidence in Mr. Jaafari, who has been widely criticized by Iraqis for failing to smash the Sunni-led insurgency, letting Shiite death squads run rampant and doing little on reconstruction.

Mr. Jaafari won the Shiite bloc's nomination for prime minister by one vote in a secret ballot of its members of Parliament, beating out the deputy of Mr. Hakim, the bloc's leader. As the largest bloc, with 130 of the 275 seats, the Shiites have the right to nominate the prime minister.

But a two-thirds vote of Parliament is required for approval of the new government. As long as the other major blocs oppose Mr. Jaafari, the process is at a standstill.

U.S. Appeals To Iraq's Top Cleric To Help End Political Impasse (KRT)

By Nancy A. Youssef And Warren P. Strobel

Knight Ridder, March 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - U.S. officials sent a message this week to Iraq's senior religious cleric asking that he help end the impasse over forming a new Iraqi government and strongly implying that the prime minister, Ibrahim al-Jafaari, should withdraw his candidacy for re-election, according to American officials.

The unusual decision by the White House to reach out to Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani suggested how eager the Bush administration is to jump-start negotiations that have failed to produce Iraq's first permanent postwar government more than three months after national elections.

But by contacting the revered Shiite Muslim leader, the administration risks further angering Iraqi leaders, who already complain that the United States is interfering too much with the process.

During a news conference Tuesday, Salim al-Maliki, the minister of transportation and a member of the dominant United Iraqi Alliance, said al-Jaafari was still the slate's candidate.

"We do not accept interference by the United States or any other foreign body because it is an internal decision of United Iraqi Alliance," al-Maliki said.

In Washington, two officials confirmed that the United States had passed a message through a third party to the reclusive al-Sistani, Iraq's top cleric and, in some ways, its ultimate political arbiter.

It wasn't known whether al-Jafaari was mentioned by name. But the clear message was that the prime minister's bid to keep his job was creating an impasse and the way to end it was for him to withdraw, one official said.

The gist of the message was "we need to find a way to address this process," an administration official in Washington said. "We need to find a way out of the impasse."

He spoke on condition of anonymity because the White House and State Department weren't publicly acknowledging the move.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan denied reports in Baghdad that President Bush had sent a letter to leading Shiite politician Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, a statement that, while true, was incomplete.

"What we are doing is encouraging the Iraqi leaders to move forward on a government of national unity, based on strong leadership. It is up to the Iraqi people to decide who the prime minister is," McClellan said. "I know of no letter."

It was unclear precisely how the message meant for al-Sistani was sent, but Haithem al-Husseini, a spokesman for al-Hakim, confirmed that the leader of the Shiite alliance bloc had received a message from the Bush administration. He wouldn't say whether al-Hakim or al-Sistani was the intended recipient.

Al-Sistani consistently has refused to meet with U.S. envoys.

Al-Hakim visited al-Sistani at his home in Najaf on Tuesday. Before a throng of supporters, al-Hakim promised that the Iraqi leadership would move quickly to form a government. When he mentioned a raid by U.S. and Iraqi forces that some charge occurred in a mosque, the crowds chanted: "No, no America."

The administration's outreach to al-Sistani underscored how much Bush has at stake in ending Iraq's political stalemate, which has gone on for months as violence continues.

"What it reflects - we are, we're deeper into this process," the administration official said.

Judith Yaphe, a Persian Gulf expert at the National Defense University in Washington, called the reported attempts to pressure al-Jafaari to resign "heavy-handed."

"They have to know that Sistani does not want to be seen as interfering in the political process," she said. "You're guaranteed to get the result that you don't want."

Elizabeth Colton, a U.S. Embassy spokeswoman, declined to comment about the message. American officials have said the Iraqis are leading the formation of the government and that the United States is supporting them.

DOJ_NMG_0023449

"This is an issue that Iraqis must determine, just like in other democratic systems," Colton said.

Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch, a multinational forces spokesman, said last week that the absence of a government was contributing to the surge of religious and ethnic violence.

On Tuesday, 24 people were kidnapped and more than 30 bodies were discovered throughout Baghdad, many of which had been tortured in apparent sectarian violence.

This week, there's been a growing chorus of complaints from Shiite politicians that the Bush administration doesn't want al-Jaafari as the next prime minister. They have charged that American officials are trying to usurp their election results, despite promising to bring democracy to Iraq.

Earlier this year, the United Iraqi Alliance, the largest Shiite slate, chose al-Jaafari to be its nominee for the top post in the permanent government. That virtually assured that he'd win, since the slate won nearly a majority of seats in the new parliament.

But widespread objections to al-Jaafari surfaced immediately from some, who charge that the Iranian-backed leader has been ineffective and divisive during the interim period. Opponents argued that the country's first democratically elected government since the fall of Saddam Hussein should have a more representative leader, particularly as religious and ethnic tensions worsen.

Adnan Ali, a top al-Jaafari adviser, said, "We have not received anything official objecting to Jaafari," adding that al-Jaafari has no intention of stepping aside.

Although a religious figure, al-Sistani has rescued the political process in the past, when he pushed for elections and the writing of the constitution, for example. But his aides have said he doesn't want to be seen as a politician. It's unclear how he'll respond to this outreach by U.S. officials.

Negotiations Resume In Capital (WT)

By Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, March 29, 2006

Negotiations for a new Iraqi government were back on track in Baghdad yesterday, despite continuing Shi'ite fury over an Iraqi-U.S. weekend raid on a complex used by loyalists of radical Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Pentagon officials showed reporters photographs from the operation that left at least 16 Iraqis dead, saying the evidence showed there were armed militiamen in the buildings, not unarmed men at prayer as Shi'ite clerics have insisted.

"This complex is an old school complex, I believe to hold, among other things, the hostage ring, people who grab people off the street for money," said Marine Gen. Peter Pace, pointing to a blown-up photograph of a group of buildings.

"This operation clearly was designed to go after a believed location of a kidnapping ring," said Gen. Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Iraqis contacted by telephone in Baghdad said Shi'ites were furious over the operation in Sadr City -- a poor, predominantly Shi'ite area that is home to the Mahdi Army, a militia loyal to Sheik al-Sadr, and the powerful Badr Brigades, the armed wing of the political party of the Supreme Council of Islamic Resistance in Iraq.

"The Iraqi people are angry about this Shi'ite mosque, they are angry at the American forces [and] accuse the Americans of killing Shi'ite people," said one young businessman who would give his name only as Ahmed.

Conflicting accounts of Sunday night's gunfight continued, with U.S. and Iraqi officials unable to agree even whether the scene of the conflict was a mosque.

Gen. Pace said Iraqi special forces, backed by U.S. special forces, found bomb parts, rocket-propelled grenades and a hostage when they entered the complex, which included a building that held a small minaret and prayer room. He told reporters he did not know whether people were killed in the prayer room.

Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld, referring to a photograph of the weapons, said, "Those are not religious instruments." He added that the Iraqi forces found two men with traces of explosives on their fingers.

Residents of Sadr City claimed that the Iraqi army special operations unit that conducted the raid was an all-Kurdish unit drawn from the fierce Kurdish Peshmerga militia.

Usually very outspoken, Sheik al-Sadr has not made any public statements on the raid.

One Sunni leader close to the talks on the formation of a new government said that Iraqi Shi'ite leaders, who suspended their participation in the negotiations on Monday, had returned to the table.

"Today they were sent back and there was a good four-hour negotiation, so it seems they are going ahead with the political process," said Ala'a Makky of the Iraqi Islamic Party. He said the special forces raid might have been designed to send a message to Shi'ite leaders that militia killings had to stop.

"Let me tell you that one of the main issues of the coming government is to abolish the militias and dissolve all the militias so the government can work nationally without any sectarian divisions," Mr. Makky said.

DOJ_NMG_0023450

True Or Not, Report Of 'Massacre' Angers Iraqis (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, March 29, 2006

BAGHDAD - The public perceptions swirling around a "massacre" - as some Iraqi officials have charged - are the latest incident to stall the creation of Iraq's new government.

Did US forces attack a mosque in a Shiite district of Baghdad Sunday night, killing 17 unarmed worshippers, an act that Iraq's Shiite interior minister called a "horrible violation" that has dominated Iraqi TV and sparked a political outcry?

Or, did Iraqi special forces, backed up by US advisers, take on a "terrorist cell" at an office complex, kill 16 "insurgents," and free an Iraqi hostage - only to have Iraqi provocateurs, as top US commanders allege, "set the scene up" to look like an atrocity?

The truth may be the latest war casualty as perceptions shape Iraq's political reality, and the prevailing view of a bloody US raid is undermining US-backed efforts to form a coalition government, while boosting the influence of anti-US cleric Moqtada al-Sadr.

"How could [Americans] come out of this mess?" asks Ghassan Atiyyah, head of the Iraq Foundation for Development and Democracy, who was reached in London. "Sadr is becoming a strong force in Iraqi politics. When he was weak, they could not deal with him, and now he is strong."

"I very much appreciate what [US Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad] is doing" to form a unity government, says Mr. Atiyyah. "It should have been done two and a half years ago, to balance these things."

Mr. Sadr conducted two popular revolts against US forces in 2004, and has become kingmaker by supporting Iraq's embattled Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari, against efforts by Kurdish, Sunni Arab, and secular parties - as well as, reportedly, the US - to see him go.

Sadr's Mahdi Army militia - which controls the Mustafa Husseiniya raided by US and Iraqi forces Sunday, and is accused of sectarian killings in Baghdad that mostly target Sunni Arabs - can deploy immediately in their thousands, and are often allowed to work unchecked by Iraq's Shiite-dominated security forces.

Underscoring the significance of the raid, President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, vowed to oversee an investigation. A Husseiniyeh is a Shiite place for prayer and other religious purposes. In Iraq it is considered virtually the same as a mosque.

"It is very important to clarify - an investigation could help defuse tension," says Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish MP who noted that Shiites did not turn up for talks Monday to form the government.

"Always people like Moqtada and extremists will benefit from this in the street, they will get sympathy from ordinary people," says Mr. Othman. "The last three years many things like this have happened: [Americans] hit a wedding ceremony, or hit the wrong house, or get wrong information - some anti-American people want them to make mistakes, to build on that."

The deputy US commander in Iraq, Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, early Tuesday dismissed reports that a mosque had been hit, or that the 50 Iraqi Special Operations forces, backed up by 25 US advisers, had chosen the wrong target. Besides capturing some weaponry, they released an Iraqi dental technician who had been kidnapped 12 hours earlier.

Inside the religious complex, with its minaret, are series of rooms for teaching the Koran, a large prayer room, and Imam's quarters, as well as offices of Mr. Jafaari's Dawa Party, which were also raided. Even two days later, an Iraqi employee of the Monitor could see four places where the pockmarks of bullet holes coincided with bloodstains, and other evidence of killings at the place.

Iraqi units "told us point blank that this was not a mosque," said Lt. Gen. Chiarelli, noting that, on US military maps, the Mustafa Mosque was in fact six blocks north of their target. He said that Iraqi forces "did the fighting," and there was "gunfire from every room."

"After the fact someone went in and made the scene look different than it was. There's been huge misinformation," Chiarelli said. "I think the [anti-US] backlash has been caused by the folks who set the scene up."

That explanation did not wash Tuesday in the angry Ur neighborhood of northeast Baghdad, near the poor Shiite enclave of Sadr City, where witnesses and residents said the bloodshed has boosted their support of Sadr and his Mahdi Army.

"I need the government that I voted for to protect us, but they failed," says Souad Mohammad, the deputy director of a school, whose second-floor apartment, across the street from the mosque, is riven with holes from small-caliber US armor-piercing rounds.

"They came and killed the young people, and we want the Imam Mahdi Army to protect us, because they are from us, they are Iraqi people," says Mrs. Mohammad. "When the Mahdi Army is here, it's very quiet, no one is assassinated in this area, there are no car bombs, and at night there are checkpoints to protect us."

DOJ_NMG_0023451

The popular view of US wrongdoing has been fed by the images on Al-Furat television - the station run by one of the most powerful Shiite parties in Iraq - of bags of explosives with wires poking out, that they allege US forces left behind.

The result has been a firestorm among the majority Shiite, which have borne the brunt of Sunni Arab-led insurgent attacks aimed at sparking a full-scale civil war, and who grate at US insistence on giving the minority Sunni Arabs a real political role.

Haidar al-Abbadi, an adviser to Jafaari, warned of "death squads working alongside US troops that execute people without any reason while they are praying," he told Al-Arabiya television.

True or not, that view is widely held. The US-Iraqi raid "means they are targeting Shiites, to stop the political process," says Jassim Mohamad Ali, whose face was scratched by jumping over a fence in the Mustafa compound, to hide from the raiders. "The only thing I witness from the Mahdi Army, they have honor and are loyal to this country, and they try to keep the Iraqi street clean," he says.

"People always say: The Americans never do these things, but when I saw them with helicopters and their Humvees and Bradleys, I am very sure now they are terrorists," says Mr. Ali, giving a stark opinion increasingly expressed on Iraqi airwaves following the raid. "We will fight terrorism, whether it is [extreme Sunni] Wahhabi or American."

U.S. Displays Photos Of Weapons Seized In Baghdad Raid (KRT)

By Drew Brown

Knight Ridder, March 28, 2006

WASHINGTON - Defense officials displayed photographs Tuesday of rocket-propelled grenade launchers and bomb-making materials that they said were captured during a bloody raid Sunday that's become a bitter point of contention between the United States and leading Iraqi officials.

The briefing by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, was intended to counter angry Shiite claims that U.S.-backed Iraqi commandos massacred at least 16 innocent worshippers at a Baghdad mosque.

"Those are not religious instruments," Rumsfeld said as the images were shown on a video screen.

U.S. officials say the raid was a successful operation by Iraqi special forces that eliminated a terrorist cell that engineered kidnappings and assassinations out of a former school complex in northeastern Baghdad.

But Iraqi Shiite leaders denounced the raid as an attempt by U.S. forces to distance themselves from Iraq's majority Muslim sect and to bolster minority Sunni Arabs in the stalled process to hammer out a new government.

Shiites make up 60 percent of Iraq's population, and the loss of their support would likely doom any U.S. hopes of working out a political compromise. Hostility between Shiites and the United States would place U.S. forces in Iraq in a difficult, if not untenable, position.

Rumsfeld and Pace said that the troops opened fire only after they were fired upon by fighters from Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's Mahdi Army militia.

With overhead satellite imagery posted on a video screen, Pace pointed out several buildings where he said the Iraqi security forces came under fire as they approached the compound.

Pace said one building had a "small minaret and a prayer room" inside of which were found several rocket-propelled grenade launchers and bomb-making materials. Iraqi forces also freed a hostage who said he'd been kidnapped, Pace said.

"When the hostage was released, he pointed to two of the individuals who the Iraqi security forces had detained as being his kidnappers," Pace said.

U.S. military officials in Baghdad said Monday that the Iraqi forces had killed 16 hostile fighters and detained 18 people.

At least two of those people had traces of explosives residue on their fingers, Rumsfeld said.

In Monday's statement, U.S. officials said the Iraqi forces found 32 AK-47 rifles, five grenades, four rocket-propelled grenades, two grenade launchers and two heavy machine guns, plus various items commonly used to make improvised bombs.

The raid threatened to further stall negotiations over the formation of a new Iraqi government, but Rumsfeld said that top U.S. officials in Baghdad had informed him Tuesday that those discussions were going forward.

Rumsfeld, who recently has focused many of his public comments on how the U.S. government was failing in the information war against terrorists, said that the incident had been distorted in the press.

"The people we're up against are vicious, and they lie," he said. "Obviously, they have media committees, they plan what they're going to do, they plan how they're going to manipulate the press, and they get out there fast and do it. And there's no penalty for that. Indeed, there's only rewards, because the information is around the world, while, as they say, truth is still putting its boots on."

Codel Frustration On Iraq (HILL)

DOJ_NMG_0023452

By Albert Eisele

The Hill, March 29, 2006

The chairman of the House Select Intelligence Committee returned from his seventh visit to Iraq last week "extremely frustrated" by the failure of Iraqi leaders to form a new unity government, which he called "the key to the future of Iraq."

Rep. Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.) also expressed disappointment at the poor performance of Iraqi security forces and the failure of private contractors to make more progress in rebuilding Iraq's war-damaged infrastructure.

"The thing I sense right now is a lack of urgency of the Iraqi leadership to form a government, and that's leading to a vacuum of influence at the top of the Iraqi government," he said.

Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner (R-Va.) and Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) echoed Hoekstra's concerns after they, Hoekstra and other lawmakers who visited Iraq and Afghanistan last week met with President Bush at the White House yesterday.

Hoekstra made the comments in a telephone interview from his district Monday before returning to Washington to meet with Bush. Three other House members who accompanied Hoekstra to the Persian Gulf region — John Shadegg (R-Ariz.), Mark Souder (R-Ind.) and Dutch Ruppersberger (D-Md.) — also took part in the White House meeting.

Shadegg praised Bush for "listening and reaching out to members of both parties who've been to Iraq and Afghanistan." He noted that two Democrats who oppose the war, Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) and Rep. Tom Udall (D-N.M.), had different suggestions, but Shadegg said, "The one consistent theme was the need for Iraq to complete the formation of a government of national unity."

Both Warner and McCain voiced similar concerns to Bush about the lack of progress in forming a new government.

Warner met separately afterward with the president, Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Peter Pace and urged Bush to rally his Cabinet behind the war in Iraq and Afghanistan.

"We need a total team effort to bring about continual gradual success in Iraq and Afghanistan," Warner said, adding that he made his appeal at the urging of U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Gen. John Abizaid, commander of U.S. forces in the region.

McCain told reporters that Bush "appreciates the urgency of forming a unity government" but warned that the process is "still very slow and very long and very tough."

Hoekstra said he was disappointed to hear Iraqi leaders say it could be six or more weeks before they have a working government. "I think one of the most important things that needs to be done is for the Iraqis to form a new coalition government. That is the key to the future of Iraq," he said.

Hoekstra said Iraqi leaders are unhurried about bridging their religious and ethnic differences to form a workable government. "They've got to send a signal to the Iraqi people and the world that they recognize the future of their country lies in their hands," he declared.

Nevertheless, Hoekstra said he saw signs of progress on a number of fronts, including the performance of the Iraqi army and coalition forces, the quality of U.S. military and diplomatic leaders and the cooperation of other Arab countries in fighting terrorism.

"I was in Libya in January, and they were talking about their contributions in fighting the war on terror, and on this trip, people were verifying their claims," he said.

But he was sharply critical of the Iraqi police and security forces and of the slow pace of private contractors in carrying out billions of dollars worth of reconstruction projects.

"I'm disappointed in the police," he said. "We have the ability at any given time to project our power everywhere in the country. We can go in and help them, but the local law-enforcement people are not able to fill that vacuum."

While some private contractors have done their jobs, most haven't, he said. He blamed that on a combination of "security problems and poor management" and said he will press Congress to investigate.

"We took names, and we will follow up on it," he said.

Ruppersberger, who has been to Iraq three times, said that the effort to train Iraqi forces "has come a long way" but said the reconstruction program has been "mismanaged from the beginning."

U.S. troops should no longer conduct patrols in Baghdad and other major urban areas but should operate from the perimeter, he said, adding "We can still be there to assist the Iraqis, but they have to realize they can't be dependent on us. By moving out of the urban areas, the Iraqi people will no longer think we are occupying the country."

Shadegg said he "got to talk with more Iraqi civilians" than he had in two previous trips "and they made it clear most Iraqis don't want us to leave too soon, before they're in a position to defend themselves."

Bush Says Iraqis Resuming Government Talks (AP-Y2)

AP2, March 28, 2006

President Bush on Tuesday directed his entire Cabinet, from the housing chief to the treasury secretary, to assist their Iraqi counterparts once a permanent government is formed.

"By making a broad commitment from the federal government, we'll help the Iraqis establish a democracy, we'll help them build the institutions necessary for a stable society, and we'll help defeat the terrorists," the president said.

The president was surrounded on the Rose Garden steps by more than a dozen department secretaries and Cabinet-rank officials from his administration.

While Bush spoke at the White House about a future government, talks in Iraq to make it a reality remained fragile.

After a one-day boycott, Shiite leaders returned to the negotiations on how to replace the current caretaker government with a broad-based national one representing all of Iraq's factions.

Bush said he was pleased the talks resumed. But Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish representatives are struggling over issues such as how to apportion the most powerful posts.

U.S. officials are eager for quick resolution on a unity government in hope it would quell the daily violence in Iraq and set the stage for the start of a drawdown of U.S. troops.

Bush's remarks followed a more than hourlong Cabinet meeting on Iraq and the fight against terrorism. Participants received a briefing from Gen. John Abizaid, the top U.S. commander in the Middle East; Gen. George Casey, the top commander in Iraq; and U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad.

White House press secretary Scott McClellan said Khalilzad told the president that the Iraqi negotiators "have made a lot of tough choices and ... reached a lot of compromises."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice brought up the need for each Cabinet member to build relationships with his eventual Iraqi counterpart, and Bush said he told them, "I expect them to follow through on that."

Bush also met Tuesday with three delegations of lawmakers from both parties who have recently visited Iraq. The president planned to speak about Iraq on Wednesday.

Thousands Of Iraqis Flee To Avoid Spread Of Violence (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

BAGHDAD, March 28 -- Sectarian violence has displaced more than 25,000 Iraqis since the Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite Muslim shrine, a U.N.-affiliated agency said Tuesday, and shelters and tent cities are springing up across central and southern Iraq to house homeless Sunni and Shiite families.

The flight is continuing, according to the International Organization for Migration, which works closely with the United Nations and other groups. The result has been a population exchange as Sunni and Shiite families flee mixed communities for the safety of areas where their own sects predominate.

"I definitely wouldn't say the displacement has peaked," said Dana Graber, an official of the migration agency in Amman, Jordan. "It's continuous."

The agency's figures were compiled from information provided by partner organizations working with displaced Iraqis. The government Ministry of Displacement and Migration puts the count higher, at more than 32,000.

"I was shocked to be threatened by people from the same place I had lived in for so many years," said Hussein Alwan, 53, a cafe owner, who said he was driven out of Latifiyah, a mixed Shiite-Sunni city in the area south of Baghdad known as the Triangle of Death.

Alwan, a Shiite, traveled with his wife, four daughters and three sons this month to the almost entirely Shiite city of Najaf, where local authorities have converted a vacant hotel into a shelter for the newcomers and say they are gathering tents for an outlying camp. Iraqi newspapers on Tuesday reported tents pitched in a field outside another southern city, Nasiriyah, for Shiite families arriving there in flight from sectarian violence.

Alwan told a story that already has grown familiar since the near-destruction of the Golden Mosque in Samarra, 65 miles north of Baghdad, touched off five weeks of Shiite-Sunni bloodletting. "They told me that I should leave within 24 hours or we will all get killed," Alwan said in an interview in Najaf. "So we left everything there and took only the bare things we need to live."

The mosque bombing greatly escalated steadily climbing sectarian and ethnic tensions in Iraq, where the Shiite majority and Sunni Arab and ethnic Kurdish minorities have been competing for a share of power and turf since the overthrow of President Saddam Hussein three years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0023454

During Hussein's rule, forced transfers of ethnic group members left close to 1 million Iraqis internally displaced, and the country has experienced large flows of displaced people since the U.S.-led invasion, said Graber, the agency official. The November 2004 U.S. offensive in Fallujah, for example, sent more than 40,000 residents fleeing the city, she said.

Since the Samarra bombing, threats or killings have spurred many families to flee their homes with nothing, not even their ration cards, Graber said. "And there's no certainty as to when it will be safe again to return, when they can return without their sons getting killed," she said.

Both Shiite and Sunni families make up the displaced, the immigration agency's figures show.

Many Sunni families are leaving Shiite or mixed communities to take refuge in heavily Sunni western Iraq, and many Shiite families are heading south to the country's Shiite heartland. In some places, the last remaining minorities have left otherwise homogenous places.

Within Baghdad, many families are moving between Sunni, Shiite and mixed neighborhoods.

Baghdad has taken in at least 220 Shiite families from Anbar province, a Sunni stronghold west of the capital, according to reports gathered by the agency. These families "represent a fairly high percentage of the total Shia community in Anbar," the agency noted.

In Fallujah, an overwhelmingly Sunni Arab city 35 miles west of Baghdad, only 37 Shiite families remain, persuaded by pleas from their Sunni neighbors to stay despite threats from foreign fighters, the agency said.

Another 15 or so miles to the west, in Habbaniyah, dozens of Sunni families have gathered to seek shelter.

Dhafir Sadoun, a 41-year-old shop owner who uprooted his household in Baghdad's Sadr City neighborhood and came to Habbaniyah, said he had felt no threat from the militias of Iraq's governing Shiite religious parties. But after months of kidnappings and killings of Sunni men blamed on the Shiite-dominated government security forces, it had become impossible to remain, he said.

"We did not fear the Mahdi Army," Sadoun said, referring to the militia loyal to Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, "because we've lived in Sadr City for 20 years, and everyone knows us and knows how we love the Shiites. But the Interior Ministry commandos arrest any Sunni. They don't just arrest them; they kill them."

Police in Baghdad discovered 17 corpses Tuesday, all men who were handcuffed and shot in the head, the Associated Press reported. Most had been dumped under a bridge.

Deaths reported publicly by police have represented a fraction of the total number of victims of execution-style, sectarian killings brought daily to Baghdad's morgue. Iraqi and international officials reported more than 1,000 people killed in central Iraq alone in the first week after the mosque bombing, and hundreds have died since.

Shiite-Sunni violence has intensified as Iraq drifts under the leadership of a caretaker government more than three months after national elections. In Baghdad, Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish political leaders resumed negotiations on forming a new government Tuesday, a day after the talks were interrupted by Shiites' outcry over a U.S.-Iraqi raid Sunday on what the U.S. military said was an armed faction and what the Shiites said were Shiite men at prayer in a mosque.

In Washington, top Pentagon officials said Tuesday that Sunday's raid did not mark the start of a broader crackdown on Shiite militias and said U.S. troops were unaware until after breaching the compound that it contained a place of worship.

At a Pentagon briefing, Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said the raid targeted a kidnapping ring. He said an Iraqi counterterrorism unit and its U.S. Special Forces advisers discovered an Iraqi hostage and numerous weapons inside the compound, as well as a small minaret and prayer room. U.S. forces "did not know that that minaret was there on the way in," Pace said.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld described the raid as a distinct, Iraqi-led operation. The Iraqi leaders engaged in negotiations over forming a new government, he said, were unlikely now to make any "big announcements on changes in policy" toward militias.

For Abu Ghraib, A Limited Prosecution (CSM)

By Mark Sappenfield

The Christian Science Monitor, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON - In May 2004, just weeks after the images of abuse at Abu Ghraib had become public, the commanding officer of American forces in the Middle East sat before Congress and shared what he considered to be a bedrock tenet of military leadership.

"Officers of the United States military are responsible," said Gen. John Abizaid. "Every officer is responsible for what his or her unit does or fails to do."

DOJ_NMG_0023455

Yet two years later, as the military nears the end of its efforts to prosecute those who staged the Abu Ghraib photographs, the responsibility for those crimes has fallen almost entirely on the lower ranks - at least publicly. The question of why has in many respects far overshadowed the rest of the legal process.

The reasons are many and begin with the obvious: Those who commit the crimes - on film, no less - are the easiest to snare. Yet many experts add that the lesson of the courts-martial of Abu Ghraib is: Once war's chaos descends, it becomes ever more difficult to trace the line of accountability upward through the ranks.

In this case, the confusion was not caused by bullets or bombs, but by the administration's decision to adopt new and undefined rules for detainee treatment before the war. With the new rules, the worst of war crept into the cellblock, and the chain of command all but evaporated.

"The fog of war does exist, and that's why you have to be so clear and drill, drill, drill," says Walter Huffman, who served as judge advocate general of the Army from 1997 to 2001. "When you inject uncertainty into a situation that was already filled with uncertainty, my experience is that this is exactly what happens."

Even in the best situations, establishing responsibility along the chain of command is among the thorniest of tasks for the military, whether the incident involves a ship run aground or a bungled battle plan. With Abu Ghraib, those bearing the public blame - and the jail time - have been enlisted men and women.

Last week, the 10th court-martial connected to Abu Ghraib concluded. As in every other case, the defendant was convicted and was not higher than the rank of staff sergeant. One final court-martial remains in May, also for a sergeant.

In some respects, that is typical, not least because soldiers on the ground are more likely than officers behind the lines to commit obvious war crimes. Yet experts note that officers are not exempt from discipline: It just comes in a different form.

Abu Ghraib has followed that pattern. The two highest-ranking officers known to be punished in connection with the scandal - Brig. Gen. Janis Karpinski and Col. Thomas Pappas - were given nonjudicial punishments that seriously blighted their careers. As a rule, though, nonjudicial punishments are not a matter of public record and therefore bring less attention than courts-martial.

To some, it is similar to what might happen to a police chief if he doesn't watch over his officers on the beat. "We do not yet hold people criminally responsible based on position alone," says William Eckhardt, who was the chief prosecutor in the My Lai cases, where two US soldiers were tried for leading a massacre of Vietnamese villagers in 1968. "It seems like things are working the way they should be," he adds.

Others, however, look at the Abu Ghraib proceedings and wonder what happened to the real-life "A Few Good Men" moment - when a plucky defense lawyer connected the dots between the crimes of enlisted men and the commands of a senior officer.

"Defense counsels are pretty good at defending their clients," says Mr. Huffman. "I was anticipating more higher-ranking officers called as witnesses of the defense."

It points to the limitations of the court-martial, which can essentially only hold senior officers to account if they gave an express order to abuse detainees. But that, in itself, is significant: It suggests to Huffman that high-level orders for abuse could not have been pervasive, or else defense lawyers would have found out about it.

In fact, the only general officer called during one of the courts-martial was Maj. Gen. Geoffrey Miller, who first oversaw Guantánamo before taking control of US detention facilities in Iraq in 2003. General Miller took the uncommon step of invoking his right against self-incrimination to avoid testifying.

"That was awfully unusually for a general officer," says Huffman. "That in itself sends an unfortunate signal."

As a result, what has emerged from the Abu Ghraib proceedings is a portrait of a problem more systemic than individual, a Hydra in reverse - a monster not with many heads, but none.

Like the 10 courts-martial, for instance, 12 Pentagon investigations of detainee treatment convened since Abu Ghraib speak in expansive terms about the dereliction of senior leadership but offer almost no specifics. Yet there is widespread agreement among experts that those convicted of crimes at Abu Ghraib were not simply "a few bad apples," as the administration suggested.

Instead, they were the product of a culture of uncertainty and neglect that blurred the lines of accountability. Critics go further. One of the Pentagon investigations, by Vice Adm. Albert Church, "says misconduct was pervasive, therefore there can be no singular cause," says John Hutson, a former judge advocate general of the Navy. "I would say it does prove a singular cause - an arguably criminal lack of leadership."

It is a broad swipe at Pentagon leaders and the administration, but it also gets at the frustrations of some Americans. Mr. Hutson's concerns are about the detainee doctrine laid out at the highest levels of government, and he acknowledges that in such instances, holding senior leaders responsible isn't necessarily a legal exercise.

After the Navy went through the Tailhook sexual-harassment scandal, the Navy's senior leadership simply resigned.

Adds Eugene Fidell of the National Institute for Military Justice: "Some of the accountability is accountability that can only be achieved politically."

Rice Asks Russians To Probe Spying Reports (AP-Y2)

By Anne Gearan

AP2, March 29, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Tuesday she had asked her Russian counterpart for an investigation into a report that Russian intelligence fed U.S. battle plans to Saddam Hussein before the 2003 invasion of Iraq.

"I have talked with the Russian foreign minister and asked them to look into this and to take it very seriously," Rice said.

At the same time, Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, raised the possibility that the allegation of Russian collusion might be "disinformation," which in military parlance could mean that American commanders had sought to spread false information about battle strategy in order to deceive Saddam about actual troop movements.

The allegation first became public last Friday with the release of a 210-page Pentagon report on how Saddam's government viewed the U.S. invasion.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who said he was briefed extensively on the report months ago, said Tuesday he was not aware of the allegation against the Russians until last Friday.

"It merits looking into," he said.

Rumsfeld declined to say whether he thought there should be a U.S. investigation into whether someone inside the U.S. military gave classified information to the Russians, as is suggested in the report.

"I'd have to go back and read it carefully and see what credence one ought to give to it, and see what we may have discovered through other channels, and then make a decision," Rumsfeld said.

Rice, testifying at a Senate hearing, said, "We take very seriously any implication that someone might have been passing information that endangered the operation at the outset of the war, and we will look for an answer back from the Russian government."

Rice and other U.S. officials made no direct accusations against Russia, whose government has an increasingly prickly and complicated relationship with the United States.

"We've wanted not to conclude before we've had the discussion, but it's obviously a very serious matter and we're taking it up with the Russians," Rice said.

She placed a telephone call Tuesday to Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov to ask for an investigation, said State Department spokesman Adam Ereli.

Russian officials have said the allegation is false, and Lavrov has called it politically motivated. The Russian government strongly opposed the U.S. invasion.

Pace, in his first public comments on the idea of Russian help to Saddam, expressed a degree of doubt about the veracity of the information as presented in a Joint Forces Command report. The report cited two Iraqi documents captured during the early days of the invasion — one of which said the Russian ambassador in Baghdad had passed sensitive information about U.S. battle plans to Saddam.

The other document said Russian intelligence had obtained information from "sources" inside U.S. Central Command's war-fighting headquarters hear Doha, Qatar, and passed it to Iraqi officials.

"We still don't know whether or not the translation itself is 100 percent accurate," Pace said. "We don't know if this is real information or disinformation. There's all kinds of pieces of this that need to be looked into."

The authors of the report, who briefed reporters on its details last Friday, said they saw no reason to doubt the authenticity of the information relating to alleged Russian collusion.

In at least one case, the report suggests that the information provided by the Russians did more harm than good for Saddam. In fact it may have reinforced in Saddam's mind a mistaken impression about the timing of the U.S. ground assault into Baghdad — an impression that permitted U.S. forces to preserve an element of surprise.

Referring to a Russian letter to Saddam that claimed the Russians had "sources" inside the U.S. Central Command, the Pentagon report said, "Such external sources of information were only one of the fog-generators obscuring the minds of Iraq's senior leadership."

That letter was dated March 24, five days into the war.

On the other hand, the Russians also reportedly told Saddam that the main focus of U.S. ground forces moving toward Baghdad from the southwest was the area around the city of Karbala. This was true. After crossing a bridge over the Euphrates River outside of Karbala, the 3rd Infantry Division had a clear path to the Iraqi capital.

DOJ_NMG_0023457

Russia's Newfound Clout Pushes US To Rethink Ties (AFP)

AFP, March 29, 2006

Russia's newfound diplomatic clout on the international scene and its slide away from democracy have forced the United States to rethink its relations with Moscow, analysts say.

They say if President George W. Bush were to peer into the soul of his Russian counterpart Vladimir Putin today -- as he famously claimed to have done during their first meeting in 2000 -- he was sure to find a much less kindred and trustworthy spirit.

"Russia arguably is the most important country in the world to go from semi-democratic to undemocratic during the Bush administration," Michael McFaul, a senior fellow at the Hoover Institution in Washington and a political science professor at Stanford University, told AFP.

"I'm sure Bush regrets saying what he did about Putin (in 2000)," McFaul added. "He had judged this guy one way and he was wrong about it.

"Now Bush is much more suspicious and he's disappointed."

The latest signs of trouble between the two countries emerged last week with a US Defense Department report suggesting that Moscow provided intelligence to Saddam Hussein at the start of the 2003 US-led invasion of Iraq.

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was expected to raise the issue when she meets later this week in Berlin with her Russian counterpart Sergei Lavrov, who has denied the accusations, saying they were politically motivated.

The Pentagon report came amid brewing tensions between the United States and Russia on a number of issues, notably Putin's recent invitation to the Palestinian militant group Hamas to come to Moscow, his refusal to back US-led moves for UN sanctions on Iran over its nuclear program, and his support of the authoritarian regime in Belarus.

Washington has also expressed concern about Moscow using its new status as an energy giant to intimidate its neighbors, and has criticized Russia's decision to sell uranium to India.

Andrew Kuchins, a senior associate in the Russia and Eurasia Program at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, said it was clear that Moscow's behaviour was aimed at asserting itself as an independent major power not subservient to the United States.

"The Russians don't want to be talked down to by the US," Kuchins told AFP. "They see themselves as an independent player and they certainly want to be viewed as a significant player in the Middle East -- from Iran, to Iraq to the Mideast peace process."

McFaul said Putin's invitation to Hamas reflected the Russian leader's bid to undercut the United States on the world stage.

"Putin looks at any actions that weaken the US as good for Russia and vice versa," he said.

The fact that Russia is preparing to host the Group of Eight summit in Saint Petersburg has also emboldened Putin, analysts say.

"Right now the Bush administration just wants to get through the G8 summit ... trying to make that as least negative an event as possible," McFaul said. "After that it's kind of over in terms of policy until new election in both countries (in 2008)."

Andrei Piontkovsky, a Russian political scientist who is a visiting fellow at the Hudson Institute in Washington, said the Putin administration's foreign policy decisions of recent months reflected its hostility to the United States and the West in general.

"I think the US needs to face reality and stop pretending that Putin is an ally," Piontkovsky told AFP. "Maybe several years ago Bush looked into (Putin's) soul and saw something there.

"But what really concerns me today is this very evident flight of Russian foreign policy from the West into the camp of anyone who is confronting the West."

Influence In Iraq Emerges As Key Issue As Arab Conference Opens (NYT)

By Abeer Allam

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

KHARTOUM, Sudan, March 28 — Concerns over growing Iranian influence in Iraq, and the lack of Arab involvement there, dominated the opening of the annual Arab League summit here on Tuesday.

"Any solution for the Iraqi problem cannot be reached without Arabs and Arab participation," Amr Moussa, secretary general of the Arab League, said in his opening speech. "Any consultations conducted without Arab participation will be considered unsatisfactory and will yield no solutions."

Arab countries have been fuming over an Iranian-American agreement this month to hold direct talks about sectarian violence in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0023458

"They fear Iraq is drifting from the Arabs, being divorced from the Arab world, and the increased influence of another neighboring country," said Hoshyar Zebari, the Iraqi foreign minister. "This time, we are seeing some positive moves by the Arab League toward more realization of the situation on Iraq."

In a draft resolution likely to be approved tomorrow, the group's 22 Arab nations have pledged to reopen diplomatic missions in Iraq. In November, the Arab League also started an effort to reconcile differences among Iraq's religious sects in hopes of ending the sectarian fighting there, as well as increasing the Arab presence. Still, many Arab governments said they felt powerless in the face of Iran's growing influence.

"Arabs have no cards to play with, while Iran has many," said Abdel Wahab Badrakhan, editor of Al Hayat, a newspaper based in London. "Iran can influence the situation in Iraq, Lebanon, world oil prices, and now can play the nuclear card."

Analysts in the region feel that Iran is being rewarded for adopting a confrontational approach. Even though Iran has supported terrorist groups and defied the West's admonition to abandon its nuclear program, Arab countries fear that the United States may cut a deal with Iran that further weakens Arab influence in Iraq.

On the other hand, said Mohammed el-Sayed Said, deputy director of the Ahram Center for Political and Strategic Studies, the Arab countries have complied with international obligations and received nothing from the American government in return.

A declaration expected to be approved by the Arab League on Wednesday pointedly called for "respecting the Iraqi sovereignty, territorial integrity, freedom and independence and noninterference in domestic affairs."

Report Adds To Criticism Of Halliburton's Iraq Role (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

Even as a Halliburton subsidiary was absorbing harsh criticism of its costs on a 2003 no-bid contract for work in Iraq, the government officials overseeing a second contract wrote that the company was running up exorbitant new expenses on similar work, according to a report issued yesterday by the staff for the Democrats on the House Government Reform Committee.

The report, prepared for a frequent critic of Halliburton, Representative Henry A. Waxman of California, is based on previously undisclosed correspondence and performance evaluations from 2004 and 2005.

The documents show that the government's contracting officers became increasingly frustrated as they tried to penetrate what they considered to be inaccurate or misleading progress reports and expense vouchers filed by the subsidiary, Kellogg Brown & Root.

In August 2004, one of the officers wrote to the company that "you have universally failed to provide adequate cost information as required."

A few months later, after the company was served with a "cure notice," in which the government threatened to terminate the contract if performance was not improved, or "cured," another officer said he was writing "in sheer frustration with the consistent lack of accurate data."

Kellogg Brown & Root's second contract, awarded in January 2004 for rebuilding oil infrastructure in southern Iraq, has a maximum value of $1.2 billion. A company spokeswoman, Melissa Norcross, said that the report was "as devoid of context as it is new information" and that many of the issues raised by the contracting officers had been resolved.

The company, Ms. Norcross said, was forced to work with an ever-shifting cast of oversight organizations and at least 15 government contracting officials. "With each change, the company adjusted to meet the needs of its customer," she said, "all while operating in an extremely hostile war zone."

But Mr. Waxman, the ranking Democrat on the committee, said the report showed that the company had "actually done a worse job under its second Iraq oil contract than it did under the original no-bid contract."

William L. Nash, a retired Army general who is a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations and an expert on post-conflict zones, said the unusually revealing documents laid bare "a microcosm of all the ills" of the Iraq rebuilding effort. "This a continuing example of the mismanagement of the Iraq reconstruction from the highest levels down to the contractors on the ground," he said.

The second contract was not terminated after the cure notice, and contracting officers later noted improvements in some areas. But the company received what appears to be a rebuke when it was given nothing out of a possible $7.9 million in socalled award fees for its first year of work on the contract. The award fees are incentives given by the government to reward good performance.

An award fee given for a later period, roughly the first half of 2005, was about 20 percent of the maximum, which Mr. Nash, who has been involved in determining such fees, described as extraordinarily low.

DOJ_NMG_0023459

Both Kellogg Brown & Root contracts called for things like repairing oil wells and pipelines, installing power generators at oil facilities and importing fuel to Iraq. The first contract, worth $2.4 billion, generated enormous controversy after Pentagon auditors questioned more than $200 million in fuel delivery costs.

Critics like Mr. Waxman called the challenged costs overcharges, a description rejected by the company, which claimed a measure of vindication last month when the Army overruled the auditors and reimbursed nearly all of the delivery charges.

The new report, which says that Pentagon auditors have questioned $45 million of the $365 million in costs they reviewed, may revive the battle. A spokesman for the Defense Contract Audit Agency confirmed those figures.

Responding to the numbers, an official with Kellogg Brown & Root said, "Audits are part of the normal contracting process, and it is important to note that the auditors' role in the process is advisory only."

But what are likely to be seen as the most striking portions of the report are those that cite the variously stern, heated and even anguished language of contracting officers trying to bring the company to heel.

"As I have said in numerous meetings, KBR's lack of cost containment and funds management is the single biggest detriment to this program," one officer, Maj. Michael V. Waggle, wrote in the cure notice. He noted that the company had listed an impossibly high cost overrun of $436,019,574 on one job, charges of $114,308 for an oil spill cleanup that failed to remove any oil and another set of tasks in which the overruns were 36.9 percent of all costs.

The slides used in presentations during the deliberations of the board that determined the first award fee are almost equally eye-catching. On one slide, covering the company's success at meeting its planned schedules, a section labeled "Strengths" bears only the notation "N/A," presumably meaning no answer or not applicable. The "Weaknesses" section contains four detailed items.

Documents Trace KBR Billing Problems (WP)

By Griff Witte

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

Halliburton Co. repeatedly overcharged the government and exhibited "profound systemic problems" under a $1.2 billion contract to restore oil services in Iraq, according to internal government documents released yesterday by one of the company's fiercest critics.

The documents, cited in a report by the staff of Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), depict government officials' increasing irritation with Halliburton subsidiary Kellogg Brown and Root Inc. as schedules slid, costs multiplied and the company balked at meeting demands for accurate cost estimates. Ultimately, contract overseers threatened to terminate the company's contract if it did not improve.

Pentagon auditors have challenged $45 million worth of company costs, out of $365 million in charges that were reviewed. Under the terms of its deal with the government, KBR earns its profit as a percentage of its costs.

In one case, the government's contracting officials reported that KBR attempted to inflate its cost estimates by paying a supplier more than it was due. In another, KBR cut its cost estimates in half after it was pressed on its true expenses. In a third, KBR billed for work performed by the Iraqi oil ministry.

"The government has made numerous attempts to work with KBR to bring their cost reporting procedures into minimal acceptable standards," a contracting officer wrote to the company in January 2005. He said that the company's "failure to deliver a useable, accurate cost report" was "endangering performance of the contract."

As the company's costs escalated and work fell behind schedule, federal officials in Iraq reported KBR was being "obstructive" toward officials trying to investigate what had gone wrong.

Melissa Norcross, a Halliburton spokeswoman, defended the company's performance under the oil contract, saying Waxman's report dredged up old issues that have already been resolved. Norcross pointed to a July report by the State Department that said Halliburton had been "satisfactorily addressing most of the issues" raised in previous evaluations.

She labeled the Waxman report "partisan" and said it does not take into account the numerous changes the government requested once work was already underway.

"After two years and from thousands of miles away, it is easy to criticize decisions and actions that were based on urgent mission requirements and severe time constraints," Norcross said in a statement.

KBR, the Pentagon's largest contractor in Iraq, has often been criticized for its work, including one deal for supporting U.S. troops with food, laundry and mail services. Yesterday's report was the first to look at the competitively awarded contract from 2004 under which KBR worked to restore oil services in the southern part of Iraq.

That contract was a follow-up to a no-bid 2003 deal that gave KBR that responsibility nationwide. The Pentagon's internal audit division -- the Defense Contract Audit Agency -- had warned the Army Corps of Engineers to contact auditors before negotiating with the company on the new contract because of "significant deficiencies" in KBR's ability to estimate its costs. The DCAA later said the Corps never did so.

DOJ_NMG_0023460

"Halliburton has pulled off the impossible: it has actually done a worse job under its second Iraq oil contract than it did under the original no-bid contract," Waxman said in a statement. "This new round of overcharges and dismal performance would have been avoided if the Bush Administration had listened to its own auditors."

Halliburton has said in the past it believes criticism of its performance in Iraq is politically motivated, in large part because Dick Cheney was the firm's chief executive before he became vice president.

A Defense Department spokesman had no immediate comment on the Waxman report.

Halliburton's Iraq Work Criticized (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

The U.S. government was so uneasy about Halliburton Corp.'s performance on a major Iraq reconstruction contract that it threatened to end the award unless the company's conduct improved, internal government documents show.

The findings prepared for Rep. Henry Waxman (D., Calif.) are the first to examine the company's contract to restore Iraq's southern oil fields.

Drawing on reams of government reports and correspondence, they show that U.S. contracting officials regularly expressed concerns about the quality, integrity and cost of Halliburton's work.

Pentagon auditors questioned $45 million of the $365 million Halliburton received for the work.

"Among the serious and persistent problems identified in the documents are repeated examples of apparently intentional overcharging, exorbitant costs, poor cost reporting, slipping schedules, and a refusal to cooperate with the government," the report noted.

Halliburton officials questioned the report's conclusions, noting that the State Department sent a report to Congress the following month crediting Halliburton with "satisfactorily addressing most of the issues" raised about its work.

"This partisan 'report' is as devoid of context as it is new information," the company said in a written statement stressing the dangers of working in wartime Iraq.

The report comes at a moment of transition for the U.S. effort to rebuild Iraq. The Bush administration recently chose not to seek additional money for reconstructing Iraq, even though the $20 billion spent to date has failed to restore the country's infrastructure to prewar levels. Law-enforcement officials are intensifying their probes into fraud and corruption that is believed to have occurred.

The report focuses on the "Restore Iraqi Oil 2" contract awarded in January 2004 to Halliburton's Kellogg, Brown & Root subsidiary. Halliburton said most issues have since been resolved.

In an Aug. 28, 2004, "letter of concern," officials in the Pentagon's Project and Contracting Office in Iraq accused Halliburton of "accruing exorbitant indirect costs at a rapid pace" and failing to properly track its expenses. In October of that year, contracting officials met with Halliburton personnel to complain that the company maintained too many support employees in Houston and Kuwait, according to a summary of the meeting included in the report. Near the end of 2004, a contractor charged with evaluating Halliburton's work concluded that the firm's progress reports about an oil-field project were "misleading" and "distorted," according to another document in the report.

The mounting concerns led contracting officials to take the rare step of sending Halliburton in January 2005 a so-called cure notice complaining that the company's "lack of cost containment and funds management is the single biggest detriment to this program" and threatening to terminate the contract if matters didn't improve.

The U.S. lifted the threat in June 2005, but sharply limited the bonuses Halliburton received for its work. For the first year of the contract, U.S. officials withheld all of the $7.9 million Halliburton was eligible for, accusing the company of misdeeds such as seeking reimbursement for construction work actually carried out by the Iraqi Oil Ministry, according to the report. The U.S. paid Halliburton just 20% of the award fees it was eligible for in the second phase of the contract, chiding the firm for slow progress in the field and overly expensive support personnel in Kuwait.

Mr. Waxman said the report showed the administration failed to properly oversee the rebuilding of Iraq.

"There were concerns raised about giving Halliburton more work, but the administration gave the company a blank check that essentially rewarded it for poor performance," he said.

Documents Describe U.S. Auditors' Battles With Halliburton (LAT)

By Walter F. Roche Jr.

The Los Angeles Times, March 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0023461

WASHINGTON — Frustrated government auditors pleaded, cajoled and finally threatened Halliburton Co. executives who repeatedly failed to comply with government reporting requirements under a key Iraq contract with a $1.2-billion potential price tag, newly released documents show.

The documents, along with a report, were issued Tuesday by the Democratic staff of the House Committee on Government Reform. Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles) had requested the report on the contract, considered crucial to the restoration of oil production capacity in southern Iraq.

The 15-page report cites findings by auditors that Halliburton overcharged — "apparently intentionally" — on the contract by using hidden calculations, and attempted in one instance to bill the government for $26 million in costs it did not incur. Auditors also challenged $45 million in other costs, labeling them as "unreasonable or unsupported," the report said.

The report blamed the Department of Defense for awarding the contract despite warnings from auditors that Halliburton's cost estimating system had "significant deficiencies." Although federal officials have criticized the company and threatened to cancel its contracts, Halliburton remains the largest private contractor in Iraq.

The contract, awarded in January 2004, was one of three Iraq pacts for the company once headed by Vice President Dick Cheney.

Although the other two agreements — one for supplies for U.S. troops and the other for fuel and oil industry repairs — have faced heavy criticism as no-bid contracts, Waxman and his staff said Tuesday's report was the first to focus on the third Halliburton contract, for the repair of oil fields in southern Iraq, which was awarded after a competitive bidding process.

"Halliburton has pulled off the impossible," Waxman, a staunch critic of the firm, said in releasing the report. "It has actually done a worse job under its second Iraq oil contract than it did under the original no-bid contract."

Melissa Norcross, a spokeswoman for Halliburton and a subsidiary, KBR, dismissed the report as partisan, and said it focused on issues that had been resolved. She said Waxman failed to include a State Department report to Congress that commended the company "for numerous improvements" to its cost reporting system.

In the days after the U.S. invasion in March 2003, Bush administration officials said the revitalization of Iraq oil fields would finance the country's reconstruction. Since then, though, oil output has failed to exceed prewar levels.

The documents released Tuesday review objective examinations of Halliburton's performance and compliance, including by the Pentagon's Defense Contract Audit Agency. The records provide details of the repeated efforts of government auditors to get Halliburton to comply with record-keeping and reporting requirements.

"You are hereby notified that the government considers that you have universally failed to provide adequate cost information as required under the subject contract," a U.S. contracting officer wrote in an Aug. 28, 2004, letter to an executive of KBR, the Halliburton unit formerly known as Kellogg Brown & Root. "Furthermore, this contract is accruing exorbitant indirect costs at a rapid rate."

Another memo stated: "KBR has done the minimum and has not shown initiative in providing the information required, despite repeated requests."

Other audit documents cite Halliburton's "lack of cost controls." In November 2004, citing the continued lack of required data from Halliburton, government auditors warned that noncompliance would result in "adverse contractual action" and the issuance of a so-called cure notice.

In late 2004, alarmed U.S. officials discovered that Halliburton, in a routine monthly report, had projected an estimated $436-million cost overrun on the project. "This," the government delinquency report states, "is unacceptable."

In late January 2005, the Pentagon's Project and Contracting Office formally issued the threatened cure notice, and warned Halliburton that unless the deficiencies were corrected, the contract could be canceled.

"To date, KBR has yet to produce a cost report that would meet minimal acceptable standards," the Jan. 29, 2005, notice states, adding that the company "is in violation of its basic contractual requirements."

KBR responded with a corrective action plan on Feb. 20, 2005, and promised "to take the necessary measures to correct deficiencies," adding that measures had been taken to identify "systemic deficiencies." KBR blamed delays on government requests for voluminous information.

In a March 7, 2005, response, an official of the Joint Contracting Command cited the "repeated failed attempts by the government to get factual data from the cost report. In sheer frustration with the consistent lack of data, the government has been pushed into the position of asking for everything possible in an attempt to be able to track the KBR costs."

Christian Convert Goes Into Hiding; Italy Asylum Eyed (WT/AP)

By Amir Shah, Associated Press

The Washington Times, March 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0023462

KABUL, Afghanistan -- An Afghan man who had faced the death penalty for abandoning Islam for Christianity went into hiding yesterday in Kabul after he was freed from prison. Italy said it may grant him asylum.

Abdul Rahman, 41, was released from the high-security Policharki prison on the outskirts of the capital late Monday after a court dropped charges of apostasy against him for lack of evidence and suspected mental illness. President Hamid Karzai had been under heavy international pressure to drop the case.

Muslim clerics condemned Mr. Rahman's release, saying it was a "betrayal of Islam." They threatened to incite violent protests.

Afghan Deputy Attorney General Mohammad Ishaq Aliko said Mr. Rahman was being held "at a special place and that is only for his own security," Agence France-Presse reported.

"The United Nations and the Afghanistan human rights commission are both aware and involved," Mr. Aliko said. Western diplomatic sources said it was thought the Christian convert was being held at a U.N. compound in Kabul.

U.S. officials have said they would help find Mr. Rahman a country that would provide him a "safe haven," but would not comment on whether U.S. forces were helping protect Mr. Rahman in Afghanistan.

"We are working with the appropriate authorities to ensure his well-being," a State Department spokeswoman said yesterday.

The Italian government said Foreign Minister Gianfranco Fini will use a Cabinet meeting today to press for Mr. Rahman to be granted asylum there.

Italy has close ties with Afghanistan, whose former king, Muhammad Zahir Shah, was allowed to live with his family in exile in Rome for 30 years. The former royals returned to Kabul after the fall of the Taliban regime in 2001.

An Italian diplomat in Kabul said no one from the Italian mission had been in contact with Mr. Rahman, but they had been assured his health was all right.

Mr. Rahman was put on trial last week for converting 16 years ago while he was a medical aid worker for an international Christian group helping Afghan refugees in Pakistan. He faced the death penalty under Afghanistan's Islamic laws.

The case caused an outcry in the United States and other nations that helped oust the hard-line Taliban regime in late 2001 and provide aid and military support for Mr. Karzai.

The outrage put Mr. Karzai in a difficult position because he also risked offending religious sensibilities in Afghanistan, where senior Muslim clerics have been united in calling for Mr. Rahman to be executed.

"This is a betrayal of Islam and the entire Afghan nation by our government," said Hamiddullah, a senior cleric in Kabul. "This will have very dangerous consequences for the government. Muslim leaders will react very strongly."

However, a preacher in northwestern Badghis province said the country's religious leaders should not incite violence. "Clerics shouldn't be calling for people to riot and damage our country," Mohammed Usman said.

DOJ:

U.S. Attorney General To Visit Yakamas (YAKHR)

By PHIL FEROLITO, YAKIMA HERALD-REPUBLIC

Yakima (WA) Herald Republic, March 28, 2006

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales will visit the Lower Yakima Valley on Wednesday to talk about drug and gang prevention with students and officials with the Yakama Nation.

An hour-long assembly with about 550 middle and high school students is planned for 10 a.m. at White Swan High School, Jonathan Black, a public affairs assistant for the attorney general's office, said in a phone interview Monday from Washington, D.C.

The event is open only to White Swan middle and high school students and school staff.

Later, Gonzales will meet tribal leaders in a closed gathering at the Yakama Nation Cultural Heritage Center in Toppenish. Tribal leaders have not said if other issues beyond drugs and gangs will be raised during their meeting with Gonzales.

As attorney general, Gonzales heads the federal Department of Justice, which is at the epicenter of issues such as immigration and the rights of detainees in the nation's war on terror.

When Gonzales was sworn in on Feb. 3, 2005, he became the nation's first Hispanic attorney general and the 80th person to hold that office.

Born in San Antonio, he was one of eight children of parents who were the children of Mexican immigrants. After obtaining his law degree from Harvard University, he went on to serve as Texas secretary of state under then-Gov. George W. Bush. He is 50 years old.

DOJ_NMG_0023463

His visit to the Lower Valley is his first stop in a swing through several Western states this week, including visits to Las Vegas, Los Angeles and San Jose, Calif.

U.S. Attorney General Appoints Local Prosecutor As Chair Of Justice Department Advisory Panel (SABJ)

San Antonio Business Journal, March 29, 2006

U.S. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales on Tuesday named Johnny Sutton to chair a key advisory committee that helps craft policy within the Justice Department.

Sutton is the U.S. Attorney for the Western District of Texas in San Antonio -- a position he has held since December 2001. In that role, he serves as the chief prosecutor for the federal government in San Antonio and West Texas.

Gonzales also appointed Susan Brooks, U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of Indiana, to serve as vice chair of the Advisory Committee of U.S. Attorneys.

"Johnny Sutton and Susan Brooks are experienced prosecutors who have served with distinction as United States Attorneys," Gonzales said in a statement.

"Together, we will work to combat terrorism, reduce violent crime and drug trafficking, prevent cybercrime and child exploitation, prosecute government and corporate corruption, and protect the civil rights of all Americans," the attorney general added.

Sutton has been a member of the Advisory Committee since 2002. He previously served as vice chairman of the panel and serves on the Border and Immigration Law Enforcement Subcommittee.

Sutton will be heading to Washington, D.C. every six to eight weeks for two full-day meetings with the attorney general and deputy attorney general.

As committee chairman, Sutton also will be called in to testify before Congress on how proposed legislation will affect law enforcement and the courts.

"I will be spending a lot more time in D.C.," Sutton says. "I will be spending a lot more time thinking about national policy."

Sutton will serve until the end of March 2007.

But even though he will be traveling more to D.C., Sutton says he is not trying to leverage this appointment to a position in Washington.

"I think my future (with the Justice Department) is in Texas," he says. "But you never say never. It's very exciting."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron Prosecutors Drop Some Charges And Rest Case (NYT)

By ALEXEI BARRIONUEVO

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

HOUSTON, March 28 — After more than eight weeks and 22 witnesses, the government rested its case on Tuesday against two former Enron chief executives, Jeffrey K. Skilling and Kenneth L. Lay, setting the stage for the defense to begin its bid to keep them out of prison.

When they present their first witness on Monday, the defense lawyers' burden will be a bit lighter, because the judge in the case, Simeon T. Lake III of Federal District Court, approved a government request to dismiss some of the criminal counts against the two men.

Sean Berkowitz, the director of the Justice Department's Enron Task Force, said prosecutors chose not to present evidence on the dismissed charges "out of economy." Judge Lake said he had been "wondering where the evidence was" on some of the charges, "so now I don't have to ask."

The government rested its case early Tuesday after a former Enron employee testified about the apparent contradiction between Mr. Lay's rapid disposal of tens of millions of dollars in Enron stock and his public pronouncements that Enron shares were "an incredible bargain." The situation alarmed the employee, Joanne Cortez, enough that she told the Federal Bureau of Investigation about the trades.

Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling are accused of conspiring to defraud Enron's investors while enriching themselves. If convicted, they could spend decades in prison.

The judge closed the case for the rest of the week after Ms. Cortez left the stand, joking to jurors that it was "spring break." Defense lawyers agreed to use the time off to streamline their case, which they said they expected to last about four weeks. A defense lawyer said late Tuesday that Joannie Williamson, a former secretary of Mr. Lay's at Enron, would be their first witness.

DOJ_NMG_0023464

The much-anticipated testimony of Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay is expected to take about two weeks. Defense lawyers said Mr. Skilling would take the stand as early as the week of April 10, with Mr. Lay to follow.

The dismissed charges against Mr. Skilling include two counts of securities fraud involving an analyst call and a quarterly filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission, and one count of making false statements to auditors. For Mr. Lay, the judge dismissed one count of securities fraud for a Nov. 12, 2001, analyst conference call. Judge Lake denied a defense motion to dismiss four other counts against Mr. Lay.

Mr. Skilling is now charged with 28 counts of fraud, conspiracy and insider trading, and Mr. Lay with 6 counts of fraud and conspiracy.

Outside the courthouse, defense lawyers blasted the government's case, saying prosecutors had no choice but to drop the charges dismissed by the judge. Daniel Petrocelli, Mr. Skilling's lead lawyer, said the government case was "long on atmospherics and short on actual facts." He said Mr. Skilling was "very anxious to take the stand."

Michael Ramsey, Mr. Lay's lead lawyer, said he was surprised that the prosecutors had called Ms. Cortez when the government months ago failed to bring insider-trading charges against Mr. Lay. "That is unheard of in my experience," Mr. Ramsey said. Mr. Lay is scheduled to go on trial on bank fraud charges immediately after the current case.

Mr. Ramsey and Mr. Petrocelli told reporters that they continued to struggle to persuade potential witnesses, including former managers from Enron and the accounting firm Arthur Andersen, to testify on behalf of Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling. Mr. Petrocelli said fear of prosecution was the main reason most stayed away.

Mr. Ramsey sought to send a message to potential witnesses. "If you are going to make up your mind to win a case, now is the time to come forward," he said. "We need you down here at this courthouse to tell the truth about Enron."

In her testimony, Ms. Cortez, a former Enron employee who oversaw a line of credit the company had set up for Mr. Lay, said she was shocked to discover in 2001 that Enron's compensation committee had increased Mr. Lay's credit line to $7.5 million, from $4 million. The increase came a week after Enron reported large third-quarter losses in October 2001. By the end of the year, Mr. Lay maxed out the credit line, she said.

Mr. Lay repeatedly drew down the credit line and repaid it almost immediately with Enron shares he owned, Ms. Cortez said. "It made me question whether it was being used as somewhat of a tool to sell shares."

Ms. Cortez became so concerned that Mr. Lay's stock sales were not being disclosed that she hired a lawyer, who turned her records over to the F.B.I. "It's a clear indication of something going on for the C.E.O. to be selling so much stock," she said.

"I thought it was improper, " Ms. Cortez said. She conceded on cross-examination, however, that she had not known that Mr. Lay had used the line of credit to repay bank loans.

During 2001, Mr. Lay made withdrawals totaling $77.5 million and paid back just over $70 million, leaving a balance owed of $7.5 million, Bloomberg News reported.

While Mr. Lay has not been charged with insider trading, prosecutors have asserted that he enriched himself as the company descended into bankruptcy in late 2001.

Enron Defense Is Set To Present 'No Crime' Tack (WSJ)

By Gary McWilliams

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

HOUSTON -- As the prosecution rested its case yesterday against former Enron Corp. top executives Kenneth Lay1 and Jeffrey Skilling2, the defense is gearing up to present its argument that essentially no crimes occurred at the onetime energy giant, which collapsed into bankruptcy in 2001.

Defense attorneys, who are scheduled to begin their case when the trial resumes on Monday, signaled before the proceedings began at the end of January that they planned to argue that Enron was a vigorous and growing company felled by outside forces.

Such an approach is unusual in the recent annals of big-time corporate-crime cases. In recent corporate scandals, such as at HealthSouth Corp. and WorldCom Inc., the former chief executives at those companies argued that they weren't aware of large frauds taking place at the company. HealthSouth's CEO Richard Scrushy was acquitted in his trial while WorldCom's Bernard Ebbers was convicted and sentenced to more than 20 years in prison.

Lawyers for Messrs. Lay and Skilling have been arguing that the only crimes at Enron were committed by a handful of subordinates who stole money from the company-unbeknownst to either of the defendants. Both men are expected to repeat this position when they take the stand in their own defense.

Yesterday, U.S. District Judge Sim Lake5 dismissed a securities fraud charge against Mr. Lay, leaving six counts of conspiracy and fraud. Judge Lake dismissed two securities fraud charges and a charge of making false statements to auditors against Mr. Skilling, leaving 28 counts of insider trading, conspiracy and fraud. The judge rejected defense motions for acquittal on all remaining counts.

Lead prosecutor Sean Berkowitz proposed dropping the four counts to speed up the case. The move is not unusual in a case this size. A securities-fraud count was dropped before deliberations began against Martha Stewart, who was ultimately convicted of obstruction of justice. Before concluding its case, prosecutors again hit at Mr. Lay's apparent contradiction in proclaiming Enron shares "an incredible bargain" while disposing of tens of millions of dollars of his Enron stock in late 2001.

In addition to their "no crime occurred" defense, the defendants will also likely argue that many of the company's most controversial activities were thoroughly vetted by attorneys and outside auditors and that they relied heavily on such expert advice. "They will have to educate the jury on just how vast their responsibilities were in the company," said Kent Schaffer, a Houston defense attorney not involved in the trial.

Meanwhile, in remarks outside the courtroom, Mr. Lay's lead defense attorney, Michael Ramsey6, yesterday blasted the prosecution for resting "with an allegation that does not exist -- insider trading." Mr. Lay's stock sales were approved and were in response to margin calls on investments, his attorneys have argued.

The first witness expected to be called by the defense is a former employee of Enron's office of the chairman and a friend of former Enron investor-relations chief Mark Koenig. During cross examination an attorney for Mr. Lay suggested that Mr. Koenig denied wrongdoing to Joannie Williamson during conversations. Mr. Koenig, who pleaded guilty to an Enron-related crime, said he hadn't made any such denial of guilt. Ms. Williamson couldn't be reached for comment.

Mr. Skilling's lead defense attorney, Daniel Petrocelli7, yesterday pleaded for help during an impromptu news conference outside the courthouse yesterday. Mr. Petrocelli blamed the government, which has suggested more indictments of Enron executives may be forthcoming, for a lack of witnesses. "People have been unwilling to risk their families and lives to take a position not in concert with the government's," he said. "It's tragic. It perverts our system of justice when witnesses with facts don't come forward." He said that Mr. Skilling will take the stand late in the week of April 10.

In testimony yesterday, Joanne Cortez, a former Enron employee who handled accounting for its executive loan program, said that she became alarmed in mid-2001 after Mr. Lay accelerated his borrowings at a time when questions were being raised about the company's prospects. After Mr. Skilling resigned in August, directors raised the maximum that Mr. Lay could borrow to $7.5 million from $4 million.

Ms. Cortez said she was concerned that "it isn't public knowledge that shares were being sold back to the company to repay his line of credit," and checked the proxy statement to see how Enron was publicly reporting the borrowings. Its 1999 proxy listed the maximum he was allowed to borrow at one time and his interest payments for loans that year, she said. The borrowings and repayments grew so frequently that she independently began tracking them, documenting some $77 million of borrowings by Mr. Lay in 2001.

Ms. Cortez said she didn't sell her own Enron stock, fearing her knowledge of Mr. Lay's unpublicized stock-swaps could expose her to some kind of legal jeopardy if she sold. "It was a clear indication something was going on," she told prosecutor John Hueston. "I was feeling not sure what he was doing so I didn't myself." She later asked her lawyer to contact the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Questioned by an attorney for Mr. Lay, Ms. Cortez said she did know Enron lawyers and accountants were aware of the loan program and stock swaps, but she said she had reservations about them nonetheless.

The trial adjourned until Monday, when the defense is to begin its case. Attorneys said they expect to call about two dozen witnesses, including Messrs. Lay and Skilling.

Act 1 Of Enron Case Wraps Up (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, March 29, 2006

And on the 32nd day, prosecutors rested.

The trial of former Enron CEOs Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling reached the midpoint Tuesday morning when the last of 22 prosecution witnesses stepped down from the stand.

Starting Monday, defense lawyers will make the case that instead of deceiving the investing public about the financial health of Enron — which the government accuses them of doing — Lay and Skilling were stand-up managers who believed in the company.

Their task got a little easier Tuesday when U.S. District Judge Sim Lake granted the government's request to drop three charges against Skilling and one against Lay. After that, Skilling now faces 28 counts of conspiracy, fraud and inside trading. Lay faces six counts of conspiracy and fraud.

DOJ_NMG_0023466

In just over eight weeks of trial, consisting of 32 days in court, prosecutors put 17 former Enron employees on the stand, including eight witnesses who pleaded guilty to crimes related to their actions at Enron and agreed to cooperate with the government.

According to the government's charges, Lay and Skilling headed a conspiracy to deceive the investing public about Enron's financial condition. Most of the prosecution witnesses said they told Lay or Skilling of the company's problems, but none of them had any paperwork or memos that proved the case conclusively.

To outside observers, the government turned in a solid effort so far. “It's Act 1, but I think it's been a very successful Act 1,” says John Coffee, an expert in securities law at Columbia University. “Given what can go wrong in a trial, nothing has gone wrong so far.”

Defense lawyers will argue next week that there was no conspiracy and that Enron was a sound company that faltered in 2001 only after revelations that former CFO Andrew Fastow stole $25 million caused a crisis of confidence in the marketplace.

They will also argue that every transaction Enron entered into was approved by an army of lawyers and accountants, all of whom Fastow deceived.

“There has been a mythology that has evolved over the years about Enron and what Enron has now come to mean, and we'll do our best to crush that mythology and get the facts out,” said Dan Petrocelli, the lead attorney for Skilling, after the prosecution rested its case.

“We're looking forward to getting on the stand and getting our case out there — the positive case,” Lay told reporters outside the federal courthouse in Houston.

Former Enron employee Joanne Cortez, the government's final witness, testified that in 2001, as Enron's financial situation worsened, its board increased Lay's line of credit from $4 million to $7.5 million. Several times Lay borrowed the maximum amount and repaid it immediately with Enron stock.

“I thought it was improper,” Cortez testified.

Enron Trial Made Simpler (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

HOUSTON, March 28 -- The prosecution wrapped up its case in the fraud trial of former Enron Corp. executives Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling on Tuesday, setting the stage for the defense to begin next week.

Over nine weeks, prosecutors called 22 witnesses, including many former Enron insiders, to paint a dire portrait of the company's financial health in the months before its collapse, contrasting the dismal view inside Enron with optimistic statements by Lay and Skilling to investors and employees at the same time.

In contrast to many other corporate fraud cases, prosecutors avoided getting bogged down in accounting detail -- the result of a major breakthrough before the trial even began.

Former Enron accounting chief Richard A. Causey had been expected to stand trial with his former bosses, who might have blamed him for misleading accounting in order to save themselves from long prison sentences.

Instead, in December, a month before the trial began, Causey pleaded guilty, raising the possibility that he might be a witness against Lay and Skilling.

Prosecutors did not call Causey to testify, despite his role as a middleman who had close contact with both Skilling and Lay. Still, the last-minute plea deal allowed prosecutors to streamline their case, scuttling scores of witnesses against Causey who would have spent weeks talking about complex accounting practices and byzantine deals. With no need to concentrate on convicting Causey alongside Lay and Skilling, prosecutors were able to keep the time spent on bookkeeping detail to a minimum.

The Justice Department's Enron Task Force called fewer than two dozen witnesses, only a few of whom delved into the murky world of accounting. Two former Arthur Andersen LLP partners on the stand last week stupefied jurors and spectators. Defense lawyers promptly turned the cross-examination into a seminar, hoping to muddy the waters and stressing that corporate finances are subject to countless estimates and assumptions -- hardly the basis for convictions that could send Lay and Skilling to prison for the rest of their lives, they argue.

Samuel W. Buell, a former Enron prosecutor who teaches law at the University of Texas, called the Causey plea a "no-brainer" in a blog entry on the Houston Chronicle Web site last week.

"To prove intent, you need to get the jury inside the head of the defendant," Buell said in telephone interview. "The head of this particular defendant is the head of an accountant. It would have been a trickier task for the government."

In focusing on alleged misstatements by Lay and Skilling, rather than on Enron's accounting, the prosecutors may be using lessons learned from other recent corporate scandals. The trials of former Tyco International Ltd. chief executive L. Dennis

Kozlowski and Cendant chairman Walter A. Forbes both foundered on detail-ridden government presentations that dragged on for months. Neither jury reached a unanimous verdict, though a second, shorter trial of Kozlowski resulted in a conviction.

"It was just detail after detail, name after name," said Ken Premo, the jury foreman in the Cendant case. Premo said he voted to convict Forbes. "It seems like the Enron case is more about misrepresentation, [whether] they knew what was going on and they didn't act on that."

Nevertheless, the government has presented a case that is largely circumstantial and indirect, relying on the testimony of more than a half-dozen Enron insiders who pleaded guilty and agreed to testify in exchange for reduced prison sentences. No documents have emerged tying either Skilling or Lay to misconduct, an issue the defense emphasized repeatedly. Prosecutors are counting on the inferences jurors will draw after hearing 22 witnesses describe what they call improper practices in Enron's uppermost ranks.

In recent weeks, the trial has come to resemble more than anything else a case of dueling timelines. Prosecutors displayed colorful charts with plot points: board meetings, public statements, and stock sales made by the defendants in the months before the December 2001 bankruptcy-protection filing. The timelines are intended to advance the argument that Lay and Skilling knew about Enron's precarious health from multiple sources but painted too rosy a picture for investors.

The timelines raised frequent -- and prompt -- objections from the defense. On cross-examination, lawyers for Lay and Skilling projected their own charts on a courtroom screen, blaming Enron's collapse on a vicious brew of short sellers, skeptical reporters and doubts raised by the conduct of former chief financial officer Andrew S. Fastow. In short, the defense timelines illustrate their theory that Enron suffered from a liquidity crisis sparked by a "run on the bank."

Often, U.S. District Judge Simeon T. Lake III has told one side or the other to take down an offending chart. But the implications lingered.

On Tuesday, the judge consented to a prosecution request and dropped three criminal charges against Skilling and one against Lay. But he denied defense motions to throw out the case altogether. Instead, he declared a "spring break" and gave defense lawyers a chance to regroup before beginning their portion of the trial Monday.

Legal experts suggested that upcoming testimony by Skilling and Lay could be decisive in the case. While prosecutors need all 12 jurors to agree on at least one charge, defense lawyers need to raise doubt in the mind of only one juror to achieve a mistrial.

"Once the defendants take the stand, that changes the whole picture," said Michael J. Wynne, a former prosecutor who is now at the Houston law firm Yetter & Warden LLP. "By far the most important testimony will be the defendants'."

Meanwhile, neither defense lawyers nor prosecutors, who will put on a brief rebuttal case, have ruled out the possibility that Causey, who has been present in spirit but who has not appeared in the courtroom, will testify.

Prosecution Rests In Enron Trial (AFP-Y2)

AFP, March 29, 2006

The prosecution rested in the Enron fraud trial after two months of testimony aimed at depicting former chiefs Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling as greedy liars who deceived investors for personal gain.

US District Judge Sim Lake dismissed three of 31 charges against Skilling and one of Lay's seven charges. Prosecutors said they moved to dismiss the counts "for the purpose of economy and other reasons," a Justice Department official said.

Lake then declared a "spring break" and gave defense attorneys until Monday to prepare their rebuttal.

"There's been no case in this case," Michael Ramsey, Lay's lead lawyer, told reporters outside the courthouse.

"Everything (at Enron) was done according to the rules and that's what we're going to show."

Lay and Skilling, both of whom served as chief executives at Enron, are eager to take the stand, their lawyers said.

The defense teams plan on calling about 25 witnesses from an original list of 170 and expect testimony to last about four or five weeks.

"The government's case was long on atmosphere and short on facts and we are going to get the facts in front of the jury," said Daniel Petrocelli, Skilling's lead attorney, told reporters. "We are very hopeful and confident."

The dismissed charges include two counts of securities fraud and one count of making a false statement to auditors against Skilling and one count of securities fraud against Lay.

The judge denied defense motions to dismiss the other charges. Skilling faces 28 counts while Lay faces six in the trial.

Lay, 63, and Skilling, 52, have denied the charges, which carry long prison terms.

Enron collapsed in 2001 with estimated losses of more than 40 billion dollars.

What was then the biggest corporate collapse in history sent panic through Wall Street, and Enron's auditor, Arthur Andersen, folded after a criminal conviction, even though the verdict was overturned by the US Supreme Court.

DOJ_NMG_0023468

Lay, who founded Enron and served as chairman and chief executive, faces charges of fraud and conspiracy. He also faces a separate trial on federal banking violations.

Skilling, a company veteran who served as chief executive for several months in 2001, faces allegations of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and lying to auditors about Enron's financial position.

Several Enron executives have already pleaded guilty and have been sentenced to prison, and some are helping prosecutors in their cases against Lay and Skilling.

Former Enron chief financial officer Andrew Fastow, seen as the architect of the secret partnerships that hid Enron's massive debts and who testified under a plea agreement, ended up as an effective witness, according to Jacob Frenkel, a former US prosecutor who has worked with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Although the defense wanted to make Fastow the scapegoat, the lawyers may have erred by being too tough on the former executive, said Frenkel.

"At the end of the day ... you have a jury of 12 human beings watching another human being being pummeled by a trained gladiator, the lawyer," said Frenkel.

"If the jury develops sympathy for that witness, then the cross-examination has failed."

John Coffee, a Columbia University law professor specializing in white-collar crime, said prosecutors have created a formidable task for the defense.

"I think the government should be fundamentally quite happy," said Coffee.

"They have put on a variety of witnesses that have communicated the same story ... each of those people have been cross-examined and have had to retreat a bit, but each one adds up, and it is cumulative."

Coffee said the prosecution avoided any major surprises or mistakes, and did not allow the case to get bogged down in financial minutiae.

"The worst thing that can happen (for the prosecution) is that the jury can become confused and bored," Coffee said. "A confused jury is less likely to convict."

Judge Dismisses Several Charges Against Lay, Skilling (LAW)

By Brenda Sapino Jeffreys, Texas Lawyer

Texas Lawyer, March 29, 2006

Kenneth Lay, former Enron Corp. chairman, and Jeffrey Skilling, the company's former chief executive officer, got a break Tuesday in their criminal trial when U.S. District Judge Sim Lake of Houston agreed to dismiss a few of the charges against them.

After the prosecution rested its case Tuesday morning, Lake granted a motion filed by the Enron Task Force to dismiss three of the 31 charges pending against Skilling and one of the seven charges Lay faces in the trial that started in late January.

According to a spokeswoman for the prosecution team, the government asked Lake to dismiss the charges for the purpose of economy and other reasons.

Lake agreed to dismiss Count 15 against Skilling, a securities fraud charge stemming from a 10Q filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission in May 2000; Count 21, a securities fraud charge related to an analyst conference call in April 2000; and count 33, a false-statements-to-auditors charge related to the May 2000 10Q.

Lake also dismissed Count 30 against Lay, which is a securities fraud charge related to an analyst conference call in November 2001.

Lawyers for Lay and Skilling also asked Lake to dismiss other charges, but he denied their requests.

Testimony in the trial, which began Feb. 1, is scheduled to resume April 3 with defense witnesses.

In United States v. Jeffrey K. Skilling, et al., prosecutors allege the former Enron executives participated in a conspiracy to misrepresent the true financial condition of the former high-flying energy company. The defendants have pleaded not guilty.

U.S. Grand Jury Subpoenas GM Over Handling Of Supplier Credits (WSJ)

By Lee Hawkins Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

General Motors Corp. said it received a subpoena from a federal grand jury investigating its handling of payments or "credits" from suppliers, and said it had found "material weaknesses" or "significant deficiencies" in certain areas of its accounting controls.

The world's largest auto maker by production also said it received a subpoena from the Securities and Exchange Commission in connection with a previously disclosed investigation of GM's transactions in precious-metal raw materials.

DOJ_NMG_0023469

The disclosures, made yesterday in delayed annual filings with the SEC, are a setback for GM as it seeks to turn around its loss-plagued North American operations and hammer out agreements to reduce costs and quell labor strife at its No. 1 parts supplier Delphi Corp. (See related article.1) The disclosures also come as Chairman and Chief Executive Rick Wagoner faces growing pressure to restore investor confidence. (See filing.2)

The filings were made after the close of New York Stock Exchange composite trading, in which GM shares fell 18 cents to $22.75. In after-hours trading, GM was down 39 cents to $22.36.

Over the last six moths, GM has disclosed the receipt of six subpoenas from the SEC and two subpoenas from federal grand juries. Two of the SEC inquiries are related to GM's business dealings with Delphi, its former subsidiary. One federal grand jury matter is part of a broader investigation of the reinsurance business, including GM's General Motors Acceptance Corp. finance arm and many of its competitors. The supplier credits being investigated by the federal grand jury comprise a form of rebates.

Neither GM nor any GM executive has been accused of wrongdoing in connection with the SEC and grand jury probes. GM declined to disclose whether any individuals have been named in the federal subpoenas.

"Few large companies will escape SEC scrutiny at one time or another, but a federal grand jury is really perceived as several notches up from that. That really begins to erode investor's confidence in management," said Dan Genter, chief investment officer of RNC Genter, a Los Angeles investment-management firm, and a GM bondholder.

In another development, GM said the audit committee of its board of directors concluded on Monday that the company's financial statements for the years 2002-2004 and statements for the first three quarters of 2005 "should no longer be relied upon" because of accounting errors. The company filed corrected statements for those years with the SEC yesterday.

In yesterday's filings, GM said it has completed its internal investigation of accounting practices relating to the supplier credits. The company also looked at other matters, including how one of its subsidiaries classified cash flows relating to mortgage-loan sales and how it accounted for the value of cars GM leased to rental companies. GM said it found that the financial controls it uses to detect errors and possible fraud have been vulnerable to "material weaknesses" in the past.

GM said it will prevent such problems in the future using "enhanced" controls to aid in the correct "preparation, review, presentation and disclosures of our consolidated statement of cash flows." GM disclosed earlier this month that it would restate financial results going back to 2001 because of various accounting errors. GM also delayed filing its 2005 10(k) annual report until yesterday.

Some investors have said their confidence in GM's financial reporting is fading -- a reality that GM tried to counter in Tuesday's disclosure. "It's a high priority to win back investor confidence in GM," said GM spokeswoman Toni Simonetti.

While it is unclear what effect the rash of accounting problems will have on GM's day-to-day business, the company did caution that the problems with its financial statements could interfere with its ability to borrow money under a $5.6 billion unsecured credit facility. However, GM said it has "no current need or intention to draw" on the facility. It also said it is considering the possibility of amending or replacing the facility with new terms that would resolve any uncertainty regarding its ability to tap the line of credit.

Mr. Wagoner and his team have stepped up efforts to show progress toward a turnaround. GM disclosed in its filings yesterday that it expects to increase capital spending in 2006 to $8.7 billion, from about $8.4 billion in 2005. The added spending could speed new models to market as part of an effort to shore up market share.

The company said it expects to reduce its structural costs by $7 billion, on a running-rate basis, by the end of the year. That's up from $6 billion last year. "That's an indication of progress being made in North America, particularly on the structural cost side, even better than expected," Ms. Simonetti said.

GM also said its U.S. hourly and salaried pension plan is overfunded by about $7.5 billion as of the end of 2005. When including GM's executive plan, the plan is overfunded by $6.1 billion.

Yesterday, GM began laying off about 1% of its U.S. salaried work force of 36,000 as part of an overall plan to reduce the North American salaried work force by about 7% this year.

GM is continuing talks to sell a controlling interest in its auto financing subsidiary, General Motors Acceptance Corp., a deal that is being watched closely by Wall Street and credit-rating agencies.

GM Reveals More SEC Investigations (USAT)

By Sharon Silke Carty

USA Today, March 29, 2006

DETROIT — Adding to an already long list of problems, struggling automaker General Motors disclosed Tuesday that it now is the subject of seven investigations by the Securities and Exchange Commission rather than the five it previously said.

In a filing with the SEC, GM also warned that it might not be able to sell controlling interest in its GMAC finance arm to raise emergency cash and to restore the lender's credit rating. The money-losing automaker portrayed the disclosures as routine parts of its annual filing with the SEC. But that filing itself was delayed more than a week after GM at the last minute discovered financial irregularities at a unit called ResCap, which is part of GMAC.

At about the same time, the automaker said it would have to spend more than planned on its own restructuring and on lingering obligations to parts supplier Delphi, now under Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection. As a result, it added $2 billion to its losses last year, putting it $10.6 billion in the red for 2005.

Kevin Tynan, an analyst with Argus Research, said the issues trouble investors because GM's CEO, Rick Wagoner, has a background in accounting and finance. “You're talking about a guy who came from the finance side, and if the company has anything but squeaky clean finances, that's going to raise some eyebrows,” Tynan says.

In the Tuesday disclosures, GM said the SEC has issued a subpoena seeking information about precious metal transactions. Additionally, GM said, the SEC and a federal grand jury have issued subpoenas to GMAC as part of industrywide investigations into insurance industry practices.

“A negative outcome of one or more of these investigations could require us to restate prior financial results (in addition to our recent restatements) and could result in fines, penalties, or other remedies being imposed on GM,” the company said in its filing.

GM has been seeking a buyer for controlling interest in GMAC. GMAC has been a cash cow for GM, but the lending unit has been hurt by its ties to the money-losing car company, making it more expensive for GMAC to raise money.

Selling off most of it would raise cash for GM and could allow GMAC to improve its creditworthiness while it continues providing loan money for purchases of GM vehicles.

Tuesday, GM warned that it might not find a buyer, and even if it does, that “may not delink GMAC's credit rating from GM's credit rating.”

GM spokesman Jerry Dubrowski said, “I don't think you should read too much into that, beyond the obvious, that there's always a risk factor.”

CRIMINAL LAW:

Judge In Illinois Graft Case Denies Request For Mistrial (NYT)

By Gretchen Ruethling

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

CHICAGO, March 28 — A federal judge replaced two dismissed jurors on Tuesday in the criminal trial of former Gov. George Ryan and instructed the jury to begin deliberations anew, denying a request by the defense for a mistrial.

"To go forward right now, as difficult as it is, is not irrevocable," said the judge, Rebecca R. Pallmeyer of Federal District Court, in front of a packed courtroom. "That's one of the reasons it seemed appropriate to me."

Judge Pallmeyer had been investigating and interviewing jurors individually and having closed-door hearings with lawyers since last week, when The Chicago Tribune discovered that two jurors had lied on questionnaires about whether they had criminal records. Those jurors were dismissed Monday.

The judge called her decision to proceed "tentative" and said she had not "shut the door" on the possibility of a mistrial. She said the jurors had been diligent, had taken careful notes, had had perfect attendance over the past six months and had abided by her instructions.

"They have made extraordinary efforts to stay with us," she said before she began re-reading 148 pages of jury instructions on Tuesday afternoon. "At least for now, at least for this moment, we can proceed with these jurors."

It is going to be difficult for jurors to put eight days of deliberations completely out of their minds as the judge has ordered, experts say.

"I think it makes a lot of sense from a legal theoretical point of view, and it makes very little sense from a human psychological point of view," said Patrick J. Cotter, a defense lawyer here and a former federal prosecutor in Brooklyn. "They spent eight very difficult days, and now somebody comes to them and says, Just push a button and erase all that."

Jean Rosenbluth, a law professor at the University of Southern California and a former federal prosecutor in Los Angeles, said defense lawyers in similar situations had argued that such dismissals were subterfuges involving jurors who were holding out for acquittal.

"You do have a danger when the jurors who are removed are sort of a lone voice for acquittal," Ms. Rosenbluth said. "Any good defense lawyer is going to try to make hay of this."

DOJ_NMG_0023471

Difficulties in deliberations, which began two weeks ago, became apparent through an exchange of notes between jurors and Judge Pallmeyer indicating confusion about instructions and personal conflicts among jurors.

Mr. Ryan, 72, and Lawrence K. Warner, 67, are charged with 22 counts of racketeering, conspiracy, mail fraud and other charges. Mr. Ryan, a Republican, is accused of swapping state business for gifts, vacations and money. Both men have denied wrongdoing.

Judge Weighs Jury Alternates In Ryan Trial (FINDLAW/AP)

By Mike Robinson, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 29, 2006

(AP) - CHICAGO-A federal judge met behind closed doors with defense attorneys in former Gov. George Ryan's racketeering trial Tuesday, a day after she dismissed two of the jurors for allegedly lying on a court questionnaire.

After announcing the dismissals, U.S. District Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer said she wanted to talk with the remaining jurors before deciding whether to call in alternates. The jury has already struggled through two weeks of deliberations, and bringing in alternates would require them to start over.

Defense attorneys have argued in court papers that replacing the two jurors now would violate Ryan's rights.

"I haven't made any final decisions on whether or not we are going to be able to proceed, but I will tell you that we have excused two of the jurors," U.S. District Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer said before leaving court Monday.

Pallmeyer dismissed the jurors after the Chicago Tribune reported that they apparently had lied in saying on a questionnaire last September that they had never been charged with a crime.

Starting deliberations from scratch could add weeks to a trial that began last September. Pallmeyer met for hours with the attorneys Tuesday in an effort to resolve the crisis and avoid a mistrial.

She said pointedly that there had been "a very significant investment both public and private" in the trial that by any yardstick has cost millions of dollars.

"If we can proceed with this case fairly, if we can continue and continue with the jury and for them to deliberate fairly, that's what my goal would be," she said. "If I can proceed in a process that makes me comfortable, then that's what I intend to do."

Ryan, 72, and co-defendant Larry Warner, 67, are charged in a 22-count federal indictment with racketeering, mail fraud and other offenses. Prosecutors say that as secretary of state in the 1990s and later governor, Ryan steered leases and contracts to Warner and other friends.

Ryan and Warner deny anything they did was illegal.

Ryan Trial Deliberations To Resume (CHIT)

By Matt O'connor, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, March 29, 2006

A federal judge on Tuesday added two alternates to the jury deciding former Gov. George Ryan's fate and ordered deliberations to begin anew in the historic trial.

U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer made it clear her decision to reject a defense request for a mistrial was tentative and would depend on her continuing satisfaction that the process is fair to Ryan and lobbyist Lawrence Warner.

The judge's decision came a day after she excused two jurors following Tribune reports last week that uncovered both had apparently concealed their arrest records during jury selection in September.

The original jury had deliberated eight days amid signs of personal rancor before the judge suspended deliberations.

Deliberations in the six-month trial are set to begin again on Wednesday morning with the two new jurors, a divorced retail grocery manager and a mother who works part-time.

"The fact that there have been circumstances that led to the excusal of two jurors should not in any way enter into your deliberations," Pallmeyer told the new jury on Tuesday.

The dismissal of the two jurors and their replacement by two alternates didn't change the gender makeup of the six-man, six-woman jury but reduced its minority makeup to four members from five.

Returning to the courtroom for the first time since March 10, a grim-faced Ryan, with his wife, Lura Lynn, and son, George Jr., at his side, didn't appear pleased at the turn of events. But a gag order imposed by Pallmeyer in the trial's final days prevented him, Warner or lawyers in the case from commenting publicly.

On Monday, Ryan's lawyers publicly filed an objection to substituting alternate jurors, arguing it would be impossible for original jurors to start deliberations anew after two weeks of deliberations.

In that filing, Ryan's lawyers said notes signed last week by the jurors who ultimately were excused "indicated disagreement," suggesting that one or both had been holdouts for Ryan in the original deliberations.

Since the Tribune's revelations about the two jurors, Pallmeyer held hours of discussions behind closed doors, interviewing jurors individually and hearing legal arguments on pushing ahead with two alternates or declaring a mistrial.

In comments outside the new jury's presence, the judge defended her actions by saying she interviewed each juror behind closed doors to try to ensure that her questions were answered with candor.

She said she intends to release transcripts of the discussions as soon as possible, perhaps before the new jury reaches a verdict.

Acknowledging her decision was "relatively extraordinary," Pallmeyer disclosed that the defense had asked her to halt the proceedings and declare a mistrial. But she said she denied the request "without prejudice," meaning it could be reconsidered.

"I have not shut the door on this possibility," she told reporters and other spectators gathered in her courtroom. "I mean that with complete candor."

Jury room is 'cleansed'

To try to assist the new jury in starting deliberations anew, Pallmeyer said she ordered the jury room "cleansed" through the removal of any notes made during the earlier deliberations, any charts they may have created, and even a list of witnesses the original jury requested.

"To the extent that it's possible, I have directed that they resume their deliberations from moment one, and that means removing from the jury room any indications or reflections of the activity that's gone on up until then," she said.

Pallmeyer also issued a new instruction that jurors "must treat this case as if the prior deliberations did not occur."

"You also should not discuss or mention statements made during the prior deliberations during these news deliberations," she said.

Even though 10 of the jurors had heard them before, the jury listened intently as Pallmeyer took more than 1½ hours to read the same legal instructions she gave to the original jury more than two weeks ago.

Moments before she sent the jury from the courtroom, Pallmeyer directed jurors in "the sternest terms" to stay away from news media accounts, going so far as to instruct them "not even [to] pick up a newspaper." She said she would provide crossword puzzles to jurors herself if necessary.

Pallmeyer also mistakenly instructed jurors not to watch TV at all. When a lawyer pointed out she meant to restrict their viewing of TV news only, she hurried to the back to tell jurors before they departed. "They said they knew that," the judge said on her return to the bench.

One reason Pallmeyer said she decided against declaring a mistrial was that it would be an irrevocable move, while she could still change her mind about proceeding with the trial.

"If at any point I conclude that this procedure is not fair, I do intend to declare a mistrial if that's appropriate," the judge said. "I don't believe that step is appropriate right now."

Pallmeyer said no one was to blame for not catching the two jurors' apparent misrepresentations until deliberations had begun.

"We can all second-guess what might have been or could have been in terms of an investigation, but the fact is ... a criminal background investigation is not standard practice" in federal court in Chicago, she said.

A day after referring to the enormous public and private resources that have been devoted to the case, Pallmeyer said she wanted to make clear that wasn't the only reason she decided to proceed with the trial.

Goal is fairness, judge says

"The reason for that is that the No. 1 goal here is not that we not waste resources or that we obtain an expedient result," she said. "The No. 1 goal here is fairness."

Pallmeyer also defended the jurors' performance, noting their diligence and attention over the marathon trial.

"The reason you've got alternates is in case something like this happens," said Thomas Sullivan, a former U.S. attorney.

Mark Rotert, a criminal-defense lawyer and former federal prosecutor, said what happens next could be critical in any appeal if either Ryan or Warner is convicted.

If the new jury deliberates for a week or more and comes back with a mixed verdict, that might suggest that all 12 jurors were involved in a meaningful way, he said. But if they return in only a day or so with a verdict of guilty on all counts, Rotert said, "that gives real substance to the concerns" by Ryan's lawyers that the jury can't be expected to deliberate all over again.

Tribune staff reporter Michael Higgins contributed to this report

mo'connor@tribune.com

2 Jurors Replaced With Alternates (CHIST)

By NATASHA KORECKI, JANET RAUSA FULLER AND STEVE PATTERSON, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, March 29, 2006

The chance of a mistrial still looms, but former Gov. George Ryan's public corruption trial will go on after a federal judge on Tuesday -- admitting it was a rare move -- swapped two dismissed jurors with alternates.

U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer averted a mistrial for now but left wide open the possibility she still could grant one after tossing two jurors who didn't disclose their criminal backgrounds.

"If at any point I conclude that this procedure is not fair, I do intend to declare a mistrial," she told a packed courtroom without the jury present. But, she explained: "To go forward right now, as difficult as it is, is not irrevocable."

A mistrial is irreversible, she said. "At least for now, I'd like to see the process proceed."

THE JUDGE SPEAKS

Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer addressed her decision to replace two jurors with alternates.

"The No. 1 goal here is fairness. If at any point I conclude that this procedure is not fair, I do intend to declare a mistrial if that's appropriate."

"I think at least somebody in one of the media outlets that I happened to see referred to this situation as 'the judge's nightmare' or 'the judge's worst nightmare.' I don't know if that's an exaggeration, but I can certainly tell you this has been an enormous challenge for me."

"We can all second-guess what might have been or could have been in terms of an investigation, but the fact is ... a criminal background investigation is not standard practice, and it was not requested."

The two jurors were cut after the panel deliberated for eight days in what apparently became fractious talks, culminating with Pallmeyer telling them to treat each other with "dignity and respect."

The new panel will restart deliberations today. Pallmeyer said a fair trial is paramount -- no matter what Ryan's historic, nearly six-month trial has cost.

Her decision comes as the defense asked to "cease proceedings right now," she said.

She called in the new jury and told it to start from scratch. She said the jury room would be cleansed and jurors had to completely start over.

A black female and white male were replaced with a white male and white female.

Ousted juror 'wanted to stay on'

The consternation came after the Tribune reported last week that two jurors didn't disclose criminal backgrounds after the panel already deliberated for eight days. Pallmeyer tossed the two jurors Monday -- including one who "feels sorry for George Ryan because no one is on his side now," according to the juror's son.

In an interview with the Sun-Times Tuesday, the son said he was speaking for himself, not his mom. He said his mom has been stressed out because of "a lot of name-calling throughout the whole jury," and she's disappointed she was kicked off. "I think she wanted to stay on. That's what I believe," he said.

The woman was dismissed after public records revealed she didn't disclose on a sworn juror questionnaire a history of arrests and criminal charges. She was never convicted, but the juror marked a box that said she never had been charged with a crime. Her son explained why she did that: "I think she was confused. And she didn't think she was gonna get picked."

Public records show the juror was charged in a 1994 incident where she was among those "sitting at a kitchen table dividing a white rock like substance," according to a police report. She wasn't convicted. Court records also show arrests for disorderly conduct, assault and child neglect, among other charges. Her son didn't deny his mom has a rap sheet.

"The charges, they stand as what they are. If they weren't true, she wouldn't be off [the jury], right?"

But he said any child neglect charges were bogus.

The male juror who was dismissed had a history of DUI convictions, a revoked license and a weapons charge that he didn't disclose on the questionnaire. Disclosing DUI convictions is especially pertinent because Ryan served as secretary of state. The man, who said he couldn't talk because of a gag order, in recent years has had a clean record and also is instrumental in community fund-raisers.

Revamped jury told: 'Begin fresh'

Following revelations of the jurors' backgrounds, Pallmeyer ordered a criminal check on all jurors, she said. She also privately interviewed some jurors who had "blemishes" on their records to be sure they could proceed fairly.

There were four alternates to pick from -- but two had potential problems. One of the two alternates not selected also had a run-in with the law: a March 2004 drunken driving arrest in Wilmette, records show.

Unlike the ousted jurors, however, the alternate juror disclosed the DUI on his jury questionnaire.

The alternate juror, a North Shore man, was convicted in June 2004. His driver's license was revoked, according to the secretary of state's office. The man was eligible to have his license reinstated in April 2005, but there is no record he did so, secretary of state's office spokesman David Druker said. Court records indicate the DUI arrest was not his first offense.

DOJ_NMG_0023474

Ryan left the courthouse Tuesday with his son and wife -- and a mob of media in tow -- before ducking into the Union League Club.

"You are to begin at the beginning," Pallmeyer told the new jury on its way out. "Begin fresh."

Contributing: Mark Konkol, Annie Sweeney

Prosecutors: Wiretap Evidence Points To Kincaid-Chauncey (KLAS-TV)

KLAS-TV, March 29, 2006

A new turn for the G-Sting political corruption trial -- Tuesday, prosecutors looked to strengthen their case against former Clark County Commissioners Dario Herrera and Mary Kincaid-Chauncey by playing wiretaps of someone else.

The big story was eye-opening wiretaps of Erin Kenny and a new attack on Lance Malone's credibility. Kenny, a former county commissioner, admits taking bribes from Mike Galardi in exchange for clearing licensing hurdles for Galardi's Jaguars strip club.

In an Oct. 2002 FBI wiretap, Kenny asks for money to finance her race for Lieutenant Governor. She tells Galardi lobbyist Lance Malone, quote, "I need money to finish this race off. I'm begging now, I'm on my knees. I've done for more Jaguars every day screaming at people than anyone else has."

Jerry Bernstein, Dario Herrera's attorney, said, "We listened to the tape. I think it speaks for itself and we heard the agents testimony."

Jerry Bernstein tells Eyewitness News the prosecution is focusing on Kenny because they can't pin much on his client. Bernstein questioned FBI Agent Christopher Byers who admitted no wiretaps exist of Herrera being offered specific dollar amounts in exchange for county commission votes. Byers also admitted the G-Sting investigation shows Galardi's lobbyist, Lance Malone, divorced his wife Rosemary but put all of his assets in her name, and still lives with her in the northwest valley.

The FBI believes Malone may be trying to protect his assets from any future court decisions in this case. The defense says it shows Malone is sneaky and can't be trusted -- a strike at the prosecutions case, which heavily depends on what Malone says on FBI wiretaps.

When court resumes Wednesday, the defense will take another crack at the prosecutions case. Defense attorneys tell Eyewitness News they believe there are weaknesses in the case.

Defense attorneys also played a wiretap of Lance Malone's father trying to convince him not to steal money from Galardi. Other wiretaps Tuesday reveal Dario Herrera also asked Mike Galardi to make contributions to his congressional campaign in 2002.

KLASTV.com will have periodic news flashes to keep you up to date with the G-Sting trial as is develops throughout the day.

George Federal Courthouse -- March 28 -- 1:00 p.m.

In an Aug. 2002 FBI wiretap, Mike Galardi is heard enticing former Clark County Commissioner Erin Kenny to help him on a licensing issue for Jaguars by telling her he has registered 300 strippers to vote. Galardi also promised another 10,000 strippers to register before the November election. At the time, Kenny was running for lt. governor.

Kenny told Galardi "I'm saying man that could swing an election." Prosecutors are spending much of this day focusing on Erin Kenny to solidify that a conspiracy did exist.

Prosecutors are also establishing a pattern that when issues important to Galardi appeared before the Clark County Commission, Galardi's lobbyist, Lance Malone would time and again make repeated calls to Erin Kenny, Dario Herrera and Mary Kincaid-Chauncey.

In an Aug. 2002 wiretap, Dario Herrera says to Lance Malone " I need you to hit up Mike for that commitment for me." Herrera was soliciting campaign contributions for his congressional run. Prosecutors imply Herrera used that race partially as a cover to accept bribes from Galardi.

Also in Aug. of 2002, Mary Kincaid-Chauncey discussed the reconsideration of an adult use ordinance. Mike didn't like this ordinance and feared it would hurt his business. Kincaid-Chauncey told Lance Malone "I think I got everything covered on it."

George Federal Courthouse -- March 28th -- 10 a.m.

Federal prosecutors continue presenting FBI wiretap evidence in the G-Sting political corruption trial of Dario Herrera and Mary Kincaid-Chauncey.

In a Sept. 2001 wiretap, strip club owner Mike Galardi tells his lobbyist Lance Malone that an upcoming liquor license extension for Jaguars should be a slam dunk because "we know we got Dario, Erin and Mary."

Prosecutors also worked to further prove a connection between Herrera and Galardi. In an Aug. 2002 wiretap, Herrera says to Lance Malone, "I need you to hit up Mike for that commitment for me." Herrera was referencing a contribution to his congressional campaign.

Malone tells Herrera, "I'll just get the money to you or someone else." Wiretaps also revealed today that Galardi frequently consulted on Jaguars licensing issues with former Las Vegas city Councilmen Michael Mack and Michael McDonald.

Email reporter Brian Allen at ballen@klastv.com

Evacuee Who Returned To New Orleans Arrested In Houston Killing (AP)

AP, March 29, 2006

NEW ORLEANS - A New Orleans evacuee has been arrested in connection with the murder of a Houston man in February, according to federal authorities.

Timothy D. Strong, 21, was arrested in New Orleans on Monday. An arrest warrant from Harris County accused him of murdering Daryl Cirk on Feb. 2 in Houston, the U.S. Marshals' office said.

Strong evacuated to Houston after Hurricane Katrina, and Cirk was a Houston-area native, Deputy U.S. Marshal Brian Fair said. Strong was arrested after Houston police and marshals in the southern district of Texas obtained information that he had returned to New Orleans.

Child-porn Charge Brings Guilty Plea (ORS)

The Orlando Sentinel, March 29, 2006

ORLANDO -- An east Orange County man accused of running a child-pornography Web site and charging monthly subscriptions pleaded guilty Monday in Orlando's federal court to one count of possessing the illicit material.

Earl A. Beach, 65, was indicted and arrested last month on charges of distributing and possessing child pornography. He signed a plea agreement March 18 with the U.S. Attorney's Office that will spare both sides of a trial.

Shackled at the waist and handcuffed while wearing a red jail jumpsuit, Beach told U.S. Magistrate Karla Spaulding he is guilty "because I committed the crime."

Beach faces up to 10 years in prison for the single count he pleaded to but could face an increase in his sentence because of convictions for similar crimes in Indiana in 1979 and in Orange County in 1986.

A tip from the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children in October about a Web site spurred an investigation by the U.S. Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement in Orlando. Beach was arrested after a search of his home found more than 400 images depicting children in sex acts.

"The Web site itself said it was illegal and contained images of rape and incest," Assistant U.S. Attorney Cynthia Hawkins said in court Monday.

Beach's case prompted the U.S. Attorney's Office to seek a search warrant under the USA Patriot Act for electronic records at Yahoo Inc. in the hope that it would uncover others using Beach's Web site. One federal judge twice denied such requests, but he was overruled by district judges both times.

Pedro Ruz Gutierrez, Tanya Pérez-Brennan and Sarah Lundy of the Sentinel staff contributed to this report.

Case Against Lawmaker Is Upheld (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 28 (AP) — A federal appeals court ruled Tuesday that Representative Jim McDermott violated federal law by giving reporters an illegally taped telephone call nearly a decade ago.

In a 2-to-1 opinion, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit upheld a lower court ruling that Mr. McDermott, Democrat of Washington, had violated the rights of Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio in a case involving a 1996 phone conversation with Representative Newt Gingrich of Georgia, when Mr. Gingrich was speaker of the House.

The court ordered Mr. McDermott to pay Mr. Boehner more than $700,000, which included $60,000 in damages.

The case stems from a tape that a Florida couple made in December 1996 and gave to Mr. McDermott the following month.

The tape included discussion by Mr. Gingrich about a House ethics committee investigation of him. Mr. McDermott was then the ranking Democrat on the ethics panel.

Mr. Gingrich is no longer in office, and Mr. Boehner is now the House majority leader. Both are Republicans.

A lawyer for Mr. McDermott had argued that Mr. McDermott's actions were allowed under the First Amendment and said a ruling against him would have "a huge chilling effect" on reporters and newsmakers.

Lawyers for 18 news organizations, including ABC, NBC, CBS, CNN, The Associated Press, The New York Times and The Washington Post, filed a brief in support of Mr. McDermott.

DOJ_NMG_0023476

But Michael Calvin, a lawyer for Mr. Boehner, said that by leaking the tape Mr. McDermott had "chilled the free speech of others," namely Mr. Boehner and Mr. Gingrich.

In a statement, Mr. McDermott said he disagreed with the ruling. "The American people have a right to know when their government's leaders are plotting to deceive them, and that is exactly what was happening during a telephone call in 1996 involving Republican House leaders," he said.

Mr. Boehner hailed the ruling but said he said he expected the case to go to the Supreme Court.

Boehner Sees End Of Legal Battle (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, March 29, 2006

House Majority Leader John Boehner's (R-Ohio) legal victory Tuesday in his historic court fight with Rep. Jim McDermott (D-Wash.) means there finally may be a light at the end of the tunnel in the eight-year struggle between the two lawmakers.

A divided three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia ruled Tuesday that McDermott had "unlawfully" obtained a copy of an illegally intercepted phone conversation between Boehner and other House GOP leaders in December 1996.

A lower court has already ruled in Boehner's favor, ordering McDermott to pay him $60,000 in damages and also pick up the tab for "reasonable" attorneys' fees incurred by Boehner during the long-running case, which began in 1998. Boehner's legal fees exceed $500,000, while McDermott has set up a legal defense fund to help cover his lawyers' bills.

McDermott now has 14 days to ask for the full appeals court to take up the case. If that request is denied, the Washington Democrat would have 90 days to appeal for a hearing before the Supreme Court.

Michael Carvin, Boehner's lawyer, predicted that McDermott will be unsuccessful on either front. Carvin pointed out that the full appeals court has already twice denied McDermott's application for a hearing, and added that he does not see any issues at stake in the case that would merit intervention by the Supreme Court.

"We're obviously gratified by the victory," Carvin said. "This decision confirms that Congressman McDermott unlawfully obtained the tape and violated the law."

Boehner had not seen the court's decision when he spoke to reporters on Tuesday, but the Ohio Republican said he had made a number of attempts to settle the case with McDermott, most recently last summer, without success.

During those conversations, Boehner said he insisted on "three conditions that I outlined: one, that [McDermott] had to admit that he was wrong; two, that he needed to apologize to the House; and three, that he should make a $10,000 donation to a charity [and] that we would agree on [trying] to bring this to a close." Boehner added McDermott "could never come close" to signing onto such a deal and the legal fight continued. Boehner himself believes it may end up before the Supreme Court.

In a statement released by his office Tuesday evening, the Washington Democrat said he had made no decision at this point on whether to appeal the latest ruling, although he showed strong displeasure with the findings.

"Our legal counsel is studying the decision, and we will decide on a course of action in the days ahead," McDermott said.

The dispute revolves around McDermott's role in circulating an illegally taped phone call between House GOP leaders regarding an ethics charge against then-Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.). At that time, Boehner was chairman of the House Republican Conference.

As part of his agreement with the House Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, Gingrich pledged to abide by the panel's ruling. Boehner was in Florida on Dec. 21, 1996, taking part via mobile phone in a GOP leadership strategy session on how to spin the ethics committee's decision and its impact on Gingrich's hold on the Speaker's gavel, when a Florida couple, John and Alice Martin, illegally taped the call on their police scanner.

McDermott eventually received a copy of the tape and, as he has publicly acknowledged, leaked it to The New York Times, Atlanta Journal-Constitution and Roll Call. McDermott believed that the conversation proved Gingrich violated his agreement with the ethics committee. Boehner, with support from then-President Bill Clinton's Justice Department, sued McDermott for invasion of privacy in 1998, and the case has been bouncing back and forth between federal courts, including the Supreme Court, since then.

In his statement, McDermott continued to portray the issue as a First Amendment argument, and defended the right of a public official to reveal alleged wrongdoing within the government.

"The American people have a right to know when their government's leaders are plotting to deceive them, and that is exactly what was happening during a telephone call in 1996 involving Republican House leaders, including then Speaker of the House Newt Gingrich and Rep. John Boehner," McDermott said.

The Washington Democrat noted that 18 media organizations, including ABC, NBC, CBS, CNN, The Associated Press, The New York Times and The Washington Post, filed a brief in support of his position prior to the latest appeals court ruling.

McDermott has suggested that if the full appeals court and Supreme Court let Tuesday's ruling stand, the ability of reporters to ferret out information regarding potentially improper activities by government officials, even if the information comes from questionable sources, will be hindered.

But the appeals court disagreed with McDermott's arguments. In a 2-1 opinion, the court rejected McDermott's reliance on a 2001 decision by the Supreme Court, which held that the First Amendment protects the disclosure of illegally intercepted communications by parties who did not participate in the illegal interception.

Circuit Judge A. Raymond Randolph wrote that McDermott's use of the 2001 ruling as part of his defense is "quite implausible" and not germane to the case since he knew how the telephone call had been intercepted.

"It is the difference between someone who discovers a bag containing a diamond ring on the sidewalk and some who accepts the same bag from a thief, knowing the ring inside to have been stolen," Randolph added. "The former has committed no offense; the latter is receiving stolen property, even if the ring was intended only as a gift."

Circuit Judge David Sentelle strongly dissented with the majority's decision, arguing that to follow the logic used by Randolph and Chief Judge Douglas Ginsburg could lead to the censoring of news stories over fears about how sources obtained information.

"I see no distinction, nor has Representative Boehner suggested one, between the constitutionality of regulating communication of the contents of the tape by McDermott or by The Washington Post or The New York Times or any other media resource," Sentelle wrote in his dissent. "For that matter, every reader of the information in the newspapers also learned that it had been obtained by unlawful intercept."

Sentelle added: "Under the rule proposed by Representative Boehner, no one in the United States could communicate on this topic of public interest because of the defect in the chain of title. I do not believe the First Amendment permits this interdiction of public information either at the stage of the newspaper-reading public, of the newspaper-publishing communicators, or at the stage of Representative McDermott's disclosure to the news media."

Lawmaker Loses Phone Tape Appeal (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

The Washington Times, March 29, 2006

A federal appeals court yesterday upheld a lower court ruling that found Rep. Jim McDermott, Washington Democrat, violated federal law when he turned over an illegally taped phone conversation of House Republican leaders to reporters nearly a decade ago.

In its 2-1 opinion, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia backed the lawsuit against Mr. McDermott by Rep. John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican and now House majority leader, who was among those heard on the call.

Yesterday's ruling by Judge A. Raymond Randolph, who was appointed by the first President Bush, was supported by Chief Judge Douglas H. Ginsburg, who was tapped for the appellate bench in 1986 by President Reagan. The dissenting opinion was written by Judge David B. Sentelle, a 1987 Reagan appointee.

"I do not believe the First Amendment allows this interdiction of public information, either at the stage of the newspaper-reading public, of the newspaper-publishing communicators, or at the stage of Rep. McDermott's disclosure to the news media," Judge Sentelle wrote.

But the other two judges agreed with the August 2004 decision that Mr. McDermott "participated in an illegal transaction when he accepted the tape" from a Florida couple, knowing that the conversation on it had been unlawfully intercepted.

"It is the difference between someone who discovers a bag containing a diamond ring on the sidewalk, and someone who accepts the same bag from a thief, knowing the ring inside has been stolen. The former has committed no offense; the latter is guilty of receiving stolen property," Judge Randolph wrote.

The panel upheld the trial court's order that Mr. McDermott pay Mr. Boehner $60,000 in damages and at least $600,000 in legal fees in the lengthy legal battle.

In a statement yesterday, Mr. McDermott said no legal strategy had been decided, but he praised "Judge Sentelle's strong opinion in support of the First Amendment."

"The American people have the right to know when their government's leaders are plotting to deceive them, and that is exactly what was happening," he said of the Dec. 21, 1996, conversation among House Republicans about an ethics probe of then-Speaker Newt Gingrich.

In 2001, the Supreme Court said the federal wiretap law could not be used to punish disclosure of information about matters of public concern by people who did not engage in obtaining the material illegally. The case was sent back to a lower court, where U.S. District Judge Thomas Hogan said Mr. McDermott was still at fault, since he released information he knew had been obtained illegally.

DOJ_NMG_0023478

The ruling yesterday was a blow for the 18 news organizations that filed a brief supporting Mr. McDermott's right to release the tape, which he had received from Alice and John Martin. The list included the New York Times, The Washington Post, NBC, ABC, CBS, CNN and Associated Press.

"Under the rule proposed by Rep. Boehner, no one in the United States could communicate on this topic of public interest because of the defect in the chain of title," agreed Judge Sentelle in yesterday's opinion.

But Boehner attorney Michael Carvin said the Democrat's action was unlawful and said he "chilled" the free speech of persons such as Mr. Boehner and Mr. Gingrich. In the majority opinion, the appeals court called some of Mr. McDermott's arguments "implausible."

Aides close to Mr. Boehner said Mr. Carvin suffered a broken leg yesterday in an accident. As a result, Mr. Boehner did not know of his legal victory when he spoke to a group of reporters at a briefing yesterday morning.

"So they supported my position. Not a surprise. I think it is a good decision," Mr. Boehner said.

FBI Recorded Hutcherson Conversation (LYNCHNA)

By Conor Reilly

Lynchburg News & Advance, March 29, 2006

An FBI agent taped a phone conversation between Jerry Falwell Jr. and Lynchburg Mayor Carl Hutcherson in January 2005 without Falwell Jr.'s knowledge, a government motion filed Tuesday revealed.

Falwell Jr. said Tuesday evening that the government only recently told him that the call was recorded.

"It was a surprise to me," Falwell Jr. said. "(But) everything in that conversation is consistent with what we said later."

The mayor faces fraud charges related to a $32,500 donation from the Falwell ministries alleging that he used the money to improperly pay off tax debts, then lied to cover up his actions.

The 14-page document filed Tuesday says the government

FBI transcript of phone call

Download a copy of call between Mayor Hutcherson and Jerry Falwell Jr.

Government motion

Download a copy of the government motion. investigated "the possibility of public corruption by covertly recording a telephone call placed by Hutcherson at the government's direction to Jerry Falwell Jr."

The 13-minute conversation taped on Jan. 27, 2005 - the same day Hutcherson was first interviewed by the FBI - focused almost exclusively on the $32,500 gift from the Falwell ministries to a church group Hutcherson directed.

"The resultant taped conversation confirmed Hutcherson's denials of a bribery scheme," the motion says. "The taped conversation made clear that Falwell Jr. meant for the $32,500 to be a donation to Trinity CDC and not for Trinity CDC to be a mere shell or funnel for money to be given to Hutcherson."

Assistant U.S. Attorney Tom Bondurant is asking a judge to allow the conversation to be used as evidence at Hutcherson's trial, set to begin next month.

Defense attorney John Fishwick said in a prepared statement that Tuesday was the first time he had a chance to see the transcript.

"We have always anticipated that the contents of the conversation are supportive of our case," he said in the statement. "We can't wait for the jury to hear it."

Bondurant argues that Hutcherson knew the money wasn't a loan to his funeral home.

The government says Hutcherson's defense team will likely argue that the Falwells intended the money to go to the mayor all along, so no criminal intent existed.

Prosecutors say in the motion the "conversation is relevant because it demonstrates Hutcherson's true criminal intent and refutes his potential defense."

Hutcherson made the initial contact with Falwell Jr.'s Liberty University office at 2:36 p.m. while FBI Special Agent Christian Pettyjohn was present.

The mayor begins the conversation by informing Falwell that an FBI agent was asking questions about the donation. The mayor then tells Falwell the agent "knew it was a direct loan, and uh, um, to me."

Here is one exchange between Hutcherson and Falwell Jr. from the transcript, which was posted on the federal court's Web site Tuesday along with a motion to introduce it as evidence.

Hutcherson: I didn't answer, I didn't answer a lot after that because uh, ultimately what they did was issue me a subpoena.

Falwell: Is that right?

Hutcherson: I just didn't know what to say or do.

Falwell: Alright, well we, it was a donation to that New Life, that's who we made the check out to, right?

Hutcherson: Yes, uh huh.

Falwell: So what's, I don't understand what's wrong with that.

Hutcherson: I don't, I don't know.

Over the course of the conversation, Falwell repeatedly says the money was given as a donation to the CDC, not a personal loan.

"They're just uh, but I just uh, I can't think, Carl, what it would be that uh, would be so bad," Falwell said. "Even if we had just loaned the funeral home."

Falwell also refers to a Wards Crossing West rezoning that initially drew the attention of federal investigators.

From the transcript:

"But at the time you voted on that rezoning for us, it was nothing, no business relationship at all," Falwell said.

"That's, no, no. There wasn't. No," Hutcherson said.

Falwell also said during the conversation "they're just trying to scare you."

Falwell said Tuesday that the Bank of the James, the institution where the donation was deposited, was responsible for the entire investigation beginning.

In the transcript, Falwell tells Hutcherson, "… Now, it's probably Bank of the James that's brought that up."

Hutcherson says "Probably so."

Falwell says, "Oh, yeah. I don't trust those people."

FBI Agents Testify About Dealings With Zimmermann (MINNST)

By Rochelle Olson, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, March 29, 2006

They detailed their initial visit with the then-City Council member accused of corruption and then a trip to his house.

Two FBI agents offered details in court Tuesday about their first meeting with then-Minneapolis City Council Member Dean Zimmermann to talk about allegations that he took cash in exchange for promises of political favors.

FBI special agents Timothy Bisswurm and David Kukura both testified about Sept. 8, 2005, the day they interviewed -- and tape-recorded -- Zimmermann for three hours at the Chicago Commons housing-retail development project.

Zimmermann rode home on his bike and then got a second visit from the FBI, whose agents seized envelopes with cash. Prosecutors say Zimmermann, who wasn't reelected last year, took cash from the developer of Chicago Commons in return for promises to help with zoning approval.

Zimmermann pleaded not guilty to four corruption-related charges in February and expects to go to trial in July.

At a hearing in federal court Tuesday, Zimmermann's attorney argued that a judge should forbid prosecutors from using the conversation with the FBI that day as evidence.

The content of the interview wasn't discussed Tuesday. The testimony sounded more routine than revelatory, but defense attorney Dan Scott said it may have significance later. The two agents were the only witnesses questioned on Scott's motion to suppress the statements made to them by Zimmermann.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Jeanne Graham didn't immediately rule on the motion, but Scott said he expects her to allow Zimmermann's statements to be used at trial.

Scott said the motion to suppress the conversation allowed him to question the agents about the circumstances under which Zimmermann spoke to them.

"Among other things, we get to find out they talked for 15 minutes after the tape was shut off," Scott said of Zimmermann and Kukura's conversation.

Bisswurm was questioned about the search of Zimmermann's home following the September interview. Bisswurm said that he asked Zimmermann about four specific campaign envelopes with cash and that the council member led him to the second floor of his home, where he retrieved them from a desk drawer.

Graham declined a defense motion to require the prosecution to produce for questioning Gary Carlson, the Chicago Commons developer who was the FBI's "cooperating witness" against Zimmermann.

"When someone is in a position Mr. Carlson is, they are often quite paranoid about being approached," Scott said.

The judge told Scott that if he wants to interview Carlson, he can get his phone number from prosecutors and find him.

Asked after the hearing how Carlson came to the attention of investigators, Scott said: "We only have tantalizing hints right now."

Scott doesn't expect to get more answers until the government is required to produce them in the days leading up to the trial, now scheduled for July 31 in U.S. District Judge Ann Montgomery's courtroom.

Zimmerman Appears In Court (KSTP-TV)

KSTP-TV, March 29, 2006

"This is something that was totally manufactured by the FBI, totally out of character for me, that's clear and obvious to everybody," Zimmermann told 5 EYEWITNESS NEWS. A former Minneapolis City Council Member tried to clear his name Tuesday in Federal court.

Dean Zimmermann was voted out of office shortly after being indicted for accepting bribes.

Today, attorneys and FBI agents talked about an informal recorded interview with Zimmermann. The judge heard and dismissed a number of defense motions to suppress evidence. Some of that evidence was gathered on Sept. 8, when FBI agents raided Zimmermann's home.

"This is something that was totally manufactured by the FBI, totally out of character for me, that's clear and obvious to everybody," Zimmerman told 5 EYEWITNESS NEWS.

3 Charged In Murder-for-hire Scheme (CHIT)

By Carlos Sadovi, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, March 29, 2006

Three Chicago men were ordered held on bail Tuesday for their involvement in a botched murder-for-hire scheme against a Harwoood Heights jeweler to whom a relative of one of the men owed cash.

Santos Ramirez, 34, was charged Monday with solicitation to commit murder for hire, said Tom Stanton, a spokesman for the Cook County state's attorney's office.

Anthony King, 27, and Robert Navarro, 39, were charged with conspiracy to commit murder for their role in the scheme, Stanton said.

Ramirez, of the 4000 block of West Nelson Street, was held on $700,000 bail Monday by Circuit Judge Raymond Myles. King, of the 3500 block of West Palmer Street, and Navarro, of the 2900 block of North Mulligan Avenue, were each held on $600,000 bail.

Stanton said that on March 18 during a narcotics transaction, Ramirez offered King $10,000 to kill the 49-year-old target to whom Ramirez's uncle allegedly owed money. The uncle has not been charged, Stanton said.

King recruited Navarro to help, in particular to act as a Spanish-language interpreter to communicate with Ramirez, Stanton said.

The three men staked out the man's business, and Ramirez allegedly showed the others a .38-caliber gun and pointed out the victim's car, according to Stanton. The three Chicago men allegedly hatched a scheme in which they would wait for the jeweler to leave the business and ram the jeweler's car with their vehicle. The jeweler would then be shot to death, Stanton said.

But on Sunday, as they attempted to follow the jeweler's car, the three men lost track of his vehicle and were arrested by Chicago police at a gas station in the 2400 block of North Milwaukee Avenue, Stanton said.

Stanton said the FBI had been tracking telephone conversations between the men, and that Ramirez was under surveillancein anotherinvestigation.

Navarro, who has seven felony convictions, and King, who has six felony convictions, are both on parole for drug charges. Ramirez was wanted on an outstanding warrant for a misdemeanor charge, Stanton said.

csadovi@tribune.com

Three Confess Huge Theft From Hudson Firm (AP)

AP, March 25, 2006

Newark, N.J. – Three former employees of Vectron International have admitted in guilty pleas that they cheated the company of up to $1 million.

The three are Chinese nationals who worked as sales representatives in China for Vectron, which is based in Hudson, N.H.

Zhen Zhang, who was based in Shanghai, was the mastermind, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office for New Jersey, which handled the case.

Zhang, 35, admitted Friday that he demanded bribe payments, as well as created front companies and falsified corporate records to cheat his employer, federal prosecutors said.

Pleading guilty in December and February, respectively, were Shiyi Zhang, 42, who is not related to Zhen Zhang, who was based in Beijing, and Zhuosen Tan, 31, who was based in Shenzhen.

According to court papers, Zhen Zhang took bribes from customers in exchange for lower prices and faster service, while those who did not pay saw bids delayed or declined.

By using straw buyers, which included existing companies in the United States and front companies that the schemers established in China, to hide the true value of and actual user of the products from Vectron, according to court papers.

As a result, the conspirators kept a portion of their sales proceeds from Vectron, prosecutors said.

The three were arrested June 6 in the United States.

Zhen Zhang faces up to 20 years in prison for wire fraud, and five years for conspiracy, when sentenced July 17 by U.S. District Judge Dickinson R. Debevoise. He could be fined could be up to twice the amount gained from the scheme.

Shiyi Zhang is to be sentenced on April 10 and Tan on May 12. They each pleaded to a conspiracy charge, and face up to five years in prison and the same possible fine.

Zhen Zhang and Shiyi Zhang remain incarcerated. Tan was freed on bail after his plea.

Vectron International makes high-tech equipment used to boost audio, video and data signals traveling through phone and cable lines.

Convicted Philly Councilman Released Pending Sentencing (AP)

AP, March 28, 2006

PHILADELPHIA (AP) — A city councilman jailed since his bribery conviction earlier this month was released Tuesday on orders from a judge to stay on his medication and continue with counseling.

"I'm fine," Councilman Rick Mariano told reporters as he left the federal courthouse after processing.

A psychiatrist who examined Mariano concluded that he is not a danger to himself or others, according to the order issued Tuesday by U.S. District Judge Lawrence F. Stengel.

Stengel had revoked Mariano's bond and detained him immediately after jurors convicted him of 18 bribery and corruption counts on March 17.

The judge questioned Mariano's emotional stability, given the long sentence he faces and a suicide scare he touched off days before his indictment, when he made a solitary trip to the observation deck of City Hall.

Prosecutors had not asked for Mariano to be detained pending his July 6 sentencing.

"His state of mind is excellent," defense lawyer Nino Tinari said. "We're going to go back to the office, review what his options are, prepare for court proceedings."

Mariano, a councilman for 10 years, was convicted of taking more than $28,000 from friends and businessmen in exchange for his help obtaining tax breaks, city contracts and real estate. He remains in office and, by law, can hold the $102,000-a-year job until his sentencing.

Lawyer: Mariano's 'Fine' After Psychiatric Tests (PHI)

By Chris Brennan & Michael Hinkelman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 29, 2006

City Councilman Rick Mariano's first words in public after being released from federal custody were, "I didn't do that."

Mariano's exclamation yesterday had nothing to do with his recent conviction on corruption charges or a judge's concern that he might be a danger to himself or others. Instead, he was talking about a newspaper photographer who took a hard fall while following him out of federal court. Mariano refused to say anything else as he jumped into a waiting taxi with his wife.

His defense attorney, Nino Tinari, said Mariano will immediately start contemplating "some factors that affect his entire life," including whether he will continue to serve on Council until his July 6 sentencing. Mariano spent 11 days in the Federal Detention Center because a federal judge feared that a looming prison term of six to 10 years might make him snap. Tinari said a psychiatric evaluation in jail showed Mariano's "state of mind is excellent." The lawyer also said he has heard that Mariano's former spokesman, Frank Keel, told the lead FBI special agent on the case that the councilman might be a danger to himself.

"It is very disturbing that a person who was his spokesman for a time says things that are inaccurate and inappropriate," Tinari said.

Keel expressed concern for Mariano's mental state immediately after a jury found him guilty on March 17 on 18 counts of conspiracy, corruption, bribery and filing a false tax return. Keel yesterday said he was glad U.S. District Judge Lawrence Stengel ordered the psychiatric evaluation and that Mariano is again free until he is sentenced. "He's a decent man who did some dumb things," Keel said. "I spent as much time with him during some very difficult days as anyone and was a witness to his increasingly dark mood swings."

Asked if he reported any of that to the FBI, Keel would only say, "As the councilman's former spokesperson, I had many conversations with federal authorities throughout the process, as did everyone else in Rick's circle."

FBI Special Agent Ray Manna declined to comment. Mariano sparked a suicide scare in the City Hall tower just days before he was indicted in October. He spent a weekend in a psychiatric ward but later claimed he was only up there taking pictures with a new camera. Stengel, in releasing Mariano yesterday, ordered that he continue psychological counseling and taking all prescribed medication. Those orders, which Tinari called "voluntary," will be monitored by federal authorities until July 6. Mariano, troubled by recent knee surgeries, was pale and looked like he had lost weight when he was released.

"His physical state is a little deteriorated because he's been in the special housing unit for 11 days," Tinari said. "He was going to come out here not in any way with his head down or limping or being a person that has been beaten down. He's fine. He really is."

Tinari declined to say if Mariano is considering cooperating with federal prosecutors in exchange for a lighter sentence. He said estimates of a six-to-10-year prison sentence "may not be realistic," but conceded that the high end was a daunting number. "I don't know if anyone can do 10 years in jail, let alone Mariano," Tinari said. Mayor Street, a longtime political ally, said he was glad to hear Mariano was freed.

"Councilman Mariano made a mistake," said Street, who called on him to step down from Council upon conviction. "And believe me, our system will make sure that he pays for that mistake."

Mariano's staff has repeatedly said he will keep his post, as allowed by state law, and his city paycheck until he is sentenced. "I don't suspect that he'll be coming into City Hall on a regular basis," Street said. "But he might."

In First Public Appearance, Mariano Says 'I'm Fine,' But Nothing More (PHI)

By John Shiffman And Michael Currie Schaffer

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 29, 2006

City Councilman Rick Mariano emerged from jail yesterday, dazed and unshaven, 11 days after a federal jury convicted him on corruption charges and a judge ordered him held for a psychiatric evaluation.

Mariano's first public appearance since the verdict, a simple 20-foot walk from the federal courthouse in Center City to a waiting taxi, turned into a carnival. As he left, the councilman squeezed awkwardly through an aggressive pack of journalists. In the confusion, two photographers tumbled onto Market Street.

Mariano scowled and did not answer questions about whether he would resign from his $102,000-a-year post or appear at tomorrow's regular Council session.

He said only: "I'm fine."

The councilman, who had not seen his wife or family during his 11 days at the Federal Detention Center, looked pale and thinner than he had at trial.

U.S. District Judge Lawrence F. Stengel set Mariano free on bail after reviewing the results of a court-ordered psychiatric examination.

Stengel said that he was no longer worried that Mariano might be a danger to himself or others. Stengel had previously cited Mariano's climb to the observation deck on City Hall shortly before his indictment last year, and said that episode had never been fully explained.

The psychiatric report, by Dr. Pogos H. Voskanian of Drexel University College of Medicine, is confidential.

As a condition of bail, however, Mariano must continue psychological counseling and take all prescribed medications. He also must continue to report to court officials. If he flees before sentencing, he would forfeit homes in Philadelphia and at the Jersey Shore.

Sentencing is scheduled for July 6, but it could come earlier, people involved in the case said. He likely faces six to 10 years in prison.

After a nearly two-week trial earlier this month, jurors deliberated for about six hours before convicting Mariano of bribery, corruption, money-laundering and fraud. They concluded that he took bribes from five businessmen in exchange for help with city agencies, a schools contract, and access to city land at a discount.

Although prosecutors believe that Mariano faces at least six years in prison, defense lawyer Nino V. Tinari said yesterday that he believes the sentencing range will be lower.

Prosecutors declined comment on Mariano's release.

In the hour before Mariano left the federal complex yesterday, Tinari engaged in a bit of misdirection with reporters, apparently hoping the councilman might be able to avoid the cameras. But once his client was safely inside the taxi and en route to his office, Tinari gave an impromptu news conference.

"His state of mind is excellent," Tinari said. "We're going to go back to the office, review what his options are."

Tinari said he and the councilman had a great deal to talk about.

"We're going to discuss all of his options: his legal options, his employment option - anything we have to discuss, we will," Tinari said.

DOJ_NMG_0023483

One of them is likely to be Mariano's status as a sitting councilman. According to a city legal opinion, Mariano is not required to relinquish his Council seat until he is sentenced.

Mariano's chief of staff, Jay McCalla, has said the councilman will stay in his seat as long as possible. But Tinari said yesterday that no decision had been made.

"We're going to review all of that in the next few days," he said.

McCalla said Mariano would not be in Council tomorrow. He said he expected the councilman would work from his district office rather than come to City Hall.

Mariano, whose district includes parts of North and lower Northeast Philadelphia, is the first sitting councilman convicted of corruption since 1991.

Reached at his home last night on a quiet, treeless street in Juniata Park, Mariano, dressed in an olive-colored T-shirt, looked like he was relaxing - not expecting company.

He said he had no comment, and told a reporter: "Don't come to my house."

He then quickly shut the door.

Witness Links "Mafia Cop" To Murder (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, March 29, 2006

For nearly 20 years, Peter Franzone kept his terrible secret. Tuesday, the laborer from Flatbush told the whole world about digging graves and burying bodies at the behest of others.

Testifying in the "Mafia Cops" racketeering trial, Franzone said he was forced to bury a man killed in a gangland slaying and indicated that one of the defendants -- former NYPD detective Louis Eppolito -- may have been an accessory to the killing.

Speaking in a low voice that betrayed no emotion, Franzone, who now is in the witness protection program, told a Brooklyn federal court jury how he was coerced into digging a grave 5 feet deep in a garage space he owned and later was ordered to move another corpse for disposal elsewhere. In both incidents, Franzone said, Eppolito had driven into the parking area as other men arrived.

Franzone, 56, testified that Frank Santoro Jr., Eppolito's mob associate cousin, forced him to bury the body of a man he described as "Jewish," who had been escorted onto the premises sometime in 1985 or 1986. The man, whom prosecutors maintain was jeweler Israel Greenwald, was brought to Franzone's combination parking lot and body shop facility by Santoro and another man. Eppolito had driven onto the property moments before the other three men walked to the location, Franzone said.

Eppolito, 57, and his former partner, Stephen Caracappa, 64, are accused of taking part in eight gangland murders, including that of Greenwald in February 1986, for the Luchese crime family. Eppolito also is accused of taking part in the killing of Pasquale Varriale, the other man whose body allegedly was at the parking lot.

Franzone, under questioning by Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Henoch, did not say that Eppolito killed anyone.

Prosecutors, drawing out Franzone's description of Eppolito's proximity to the homicide scenes, are seeking to make the case that the former NYPD detective was an accessory to the crimes.

Franzone said that one of the two men who escorted the man believed to be Greenwald onto the property was tall, with a moustache and a face that was pockmarked on the right side.

About a half-hour later, Franzone said Santoro forced him to bury the Jewish man's corpse under pain of death.

"If I didn't help him, they would kill me and my -- -- family," Franzone said Santoro told him.

Franzone said he used a shovel as Santoro watched to dig a hole in one of the garage spaces he rented at 2232 Nostrand Ave. After the man's body was pushed into the ditch, Santoro first poured lime on the corpse and then wet cement, Franzone said. The hole was filled in.

In a second incident involving Santoro, Franzone said he was asked to lift a wrapped body into the trunk of a car. Investigators say the corpse was that of Varriale, who was killed after Eppolito allegedly tipped off the mob that Varriale was an informant.

Franzone said he didn't know the identity of the man he helped bury. The FBI unearthed Greenwald's body in April at the Nostrand Avenue location from beneath the garage floor. He said he was afraid to tell police about what happened because he feared Eppolito and Santoro, who died in 1987.

"Who would believe me, what I did with a police officer?" Franzone said. "I figured he would kill me, lock me up and have somebody else kill me."

On cross-examination by Caracappa's attorney, Ed Hayes, Franzone insisted that one of the men who escorted the Jewish man before his death had a pockmarked face and hooked nose.

Caracappa, who is lean and stands under 6 feet tall, has smooth skin and a straight nose. Eppolito is short and heavy.

Witness Says Cops Told Him To Dig A Grave (AP)

By Tom Hays

AP, March 29, 2006

NEW YORK -- A tow truck driver testified Tuesday that he was forced to dig the grave of a jeweler who was allegedly kidnapped and killed in 1986 by two New York City detectives moonlighting as hit men for the mob.

A gangster involved in the Brooklyn slaying "told me that I had to help bury the dead man," Peter Franzone said at the federal trial of the former detectives, Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa. "He said if I told anybody, he'd kill me and my family."

The 56-year-old witness said he kept quiet for 19 years because he was convinced no one would believe that police were mixed up with the mob, and because he feared Eppolito might put him in his own grave.

"I was afraid of Louie Eppolito," he said.

Franzone broke his silence last year under questioning by federal authorities reinvestigating the slaying of Israel Greenwald, a Diamond District jeweler who ran afoul of the Luchese crime family.

Authorities allege Eppolito, 57, and Caracappa, 64, were involved in the killings of Greenwald and seven other victims between 1986 and 1990 while on the payroll both of the NYPD and Luchese underboss Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso. Prosecutors said the detectives committed killings for up to $65,000 a hit.

Greenwald was killed in 1986 after being pulled over by Eppolito and Caracappa and taken to a parking garage managed by Franzone, prosecutors said.

On the witness stand Tuesday, the tow truck driver told jurors he had seen a man in a pinstriped suit and a yarmulke being led inside a one-car garage by a Luchese associate, Frank Santoro, and a man fitting the description of Caracappa. Eppolito _ whom he had previously met _ was waiting in a car outside, he said.

Franzone said about 20 minutes later, the garage door opened, and Santoro and the other man emerged without Greenwald. The other man left with Eppolito, and then Santoro took Franzone into the garage, showed him the victim's body and ordered him to dig a 5-foot grave in the garage, the witness testified.

The body was dumped in the hole, and covered with cement. Santoro himself was killed the next year.

Greenwald's body was discovered last April after Franzone told investigators were to find it. Authorities said the jeweler had been shot in the head.

Franzone testified that in 1987 the mobsters used the same parking facility to wrap the body of another shooting victim in a tarp. He claimed Eppolito again served as a lookout.

Gravedigger's Secret Is Out, 20 Years Later, At Trial Of 2 Ex-Detectives (NYT)

By Alan Feuer

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

A 56-year-old man with a 20-year-old secret told it in public for the first time yesterday: how, in 1986, he dug a five-foot-deep hole in the floor of a parking garage he owned and, under pain of death, dumped in a dead man he believed that two detectives, Louis J. Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa, had just helped kill.

The man with the secret was Peter Franzone, a sixth-grade dropout, who testified at the detectives' trial that the worst things he had done before that day were take a car that did not belong to him and steal $65 he later spent on a cowboy hat and the rides at Coney Island.

Both were a moonshot's distance from burying a man, but Mr. Franzone told the jury in Federal District Court in Brooklyn that he watched one day as Mr. Eppolito's cousin and a man who looked like Mr. Caracappa marched their victim toward a garage on Nostrand Avenue near a collision shop he owned — then came out without him.

Minutes later, he said, the cousin, Frank Santora Jr., handed him a shovel, made him dig a grave, then forced him to push the dead man in and then pour lime and wet cement atop the body. "Frankie told me I gotta help him bury the body because I'm an accessory with it," Mr. Franzone said, "and if I didn't help him that he would kill me" and, he said, his family.

Beyond this experience, Mr. Franzone presented himself as a regular guy, a working man who left his city job with 17 years' worth of unused vacation time, and who looked in the Yellow Pages starting with A when he needed a lawyer in the case.

He was testifying yesterday at the detectives' trial, in which they stand accused of killing Israel Greenwald and seven other men for the mob. Though he said he never knew the name of the man he helped to bury, prosecutors say it was Mr. Greenwald, a Long Island jeweler who made the mistake of crossing Burton Kaplan, a criminal mastermind with whom he had a deal to sell stolen Treasury bills. When the deal went bad, the government says, Mr. Kaplan hired the two detectives and Mr. Santora (whom he knew from prison) to dispose of Mr. Greenwald for $30,000.

DOJ_NMG_0023485

Mr. Franzone was already a friend of Mr. Santora's, having worked on his Oldsmobile at the collision shop.

In February 1986, the government says, the two detectives stopped Mr. Greenwald on the highway. They took him to the lot, where the witness said he saw Mr. Eppolito in a parked car as Mr. Santora and someone in a trench coat who looked like Mr. Caracappa led the jeweler to the garage, from which he never returned.

Within minutes, the witness said, Mr. Santora led him, too, to the garage, where he saw the dead man "leaning on the left wall with his legs spread and his hands on his side." Removing a pair of spade-tipped wooden shovels from the trunk of his white Cadillac, Mr. Santora forced Mr. Franzone to bury the jeweler in the dirt — a job, the witness said, that lasted hours.

"It was daylight when I went in," he said. "When I came out, it was night."

Mr. Franzone held onto his secret until a year ago, when federal prosecutors sought his testimony.

He said he met his lawyer, Alan Abramson, and confessed to him.

"That's when I couldn't hold it in," he said. "I told him the truth about the man buried in the garage."

In their opening statements, prosecutors said Mr. Greenwald — whose body was exhumed last year — had been buried with hands bound and a bag on his head, though on cross-examination (which relied, in part, on props like a shovel) Mr. Franzone said the jeweler had no bag on his head or binding on his hands.

Mr. Caracappa's lawyer, Edward Hayes, got the witness to admit that he had heard no gunshots at the garage that night.

It was Bruce Cutler, Mr. Eppolito's lawyer, who played the legal heavy, yelling at the witness — who had told the jury he was hard of hearing — and calling him a "nonunion, unpaid gravedigger."

With great theatrical effect, Mr. Cutler asked: "Did you even call your wife and tell her, 'Dear, I won't be home for dinner. I'm digging a grave—at my place of business?' "

The witness had no answer to that, though he did respond to another of the lawyer's fierce interrogations.

Mr. Cutler asked, "Day after day, Christmas after Christmas, Thanksgiving after Thanksgiving, confirmation after confirmation, year after year, you just stayed silent, yes?"

To which the witness replied, "Yes."

I DUG GRAVE FOR MOB COPS (NYPOST)

By Zach Haberman

The New York Post, March 29, 2006

An illiterate parking attendant-turned-gravedigger for the mob yesterday gave damaging testimony that placed two alleged Mafia cops at the scene of two gruesome slayings.

Peter Franzone said that after one 1986 killing at a Brooklyn car lot - in which ex-cop defendants Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa were on hand - he feared Eppolito so much that he kept quiet about the burial for 19 years.

"I was scared, because who is going to believe me if I mentioned a cop was involved?" Franzone said at the pair's federal racketeering trial in Brooklyn court.

"I figure [Eppolito] would kill me or arrest me and put me in jail and have somebody else kill me."

Franzone, a sixth-grade dropout, said that in the early 1970s, he got to know Eppolito's cousin Frank Santora Jr. - a mob associate who allegedly helped serve as an intermediary between the NYPD detectives and higher-level gangsters.

Santora became acquainted with the garage keeper after getting tow services from him. They were so close that Santoro invited him to his home and introduced his cousin, Eppolito, to him.

The witness said that on Feb. 10, 1986, he watched as a mob hit involving Santora, Eppolito - and apparently Caracappa - took place at a single-car garage at his lot.

He said he was sitting in the lot's attendant's booth when Santora and a yarmulke-wearing mob associate known as Israel Greenwald walked into the lot with another man, who wore a trench coat with the collar pulled up.

"I saw his mustache, and I saw the pockmarks on his face," he said, implying the man looked like Caracappa.

He testified that he later saw Caracappa at a Sweet 16 party for Santora's daughter, and realized he was the man at the lot.

As they walked in, Eppolito parked nearby and watched the trio enter the garage. The three men were in there for about 20 minutes. Only two of them came out, driving off in Eppolito's car.

Santora came back to the lot a short time later.

"He said he wants to show me something," Franzone testified.

Santora"He opens the door a little way and says, 'Go in there,' " Franzone said. "I turned the light on, and I saw a man slumped against the wall."

It was Greenwald, shot and killed. Franzone pulled his Cadillac up. He took some shovels, a bag of lime and some cement out of the trunk.

"Frankie said I gotta help bury the body because I'm an accessory," Franzone said.

Franzone said he took the short-handled spade and dug a hole in the garage, where the body remained until it was unearthed last year.

"I was afraid that he might [make me] dig it deep enough and just leave me in there," he said.

SantoraHe said the Williamsburg man's body folded into a near fetal position as it plopped into the hole. Santora covered the body with lime. Then they filled the hole and laid a coat of cement.

A year later, Franzone said, Santora killed another man at his parking lot, again with Eppolito on the scene keeping watch.

He that after Santoro and some other gangsters killed a victim named Pasquale Varialle, they made him lift the blanket-bound body into the trunk of a car.

He said he kept quiet, even after Santora died in the late 1980s, out of fear.

Also yesterday, prosecutors said they got a letter from jailed mob boss Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso concerning the case. They did not give details.

Casso is considered mentally unstable, but a witness said he paid the two cops for mob-connected work on several occasions.

I've Got Info, Convict Sez (NYDN)

By John Marzulli

New York Daily News, March 29, 2006

Lawyers for the reputed Mafia cops will get a chance to chat by phone today with their clients' alleged benefactor, imprisoned gangster Anthony (Gaspipe) Casso.

Casso, who is serving a life term at the nation's most secure prison in Florence, Colo., originally outed retired NYPD Detectives Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa as rogue cops during his brief stint as a government cooperator in 1994.

The government rejected Casso's testimony because he was caught plotting violent crimes in prison, including the assassination of a federal judge and a prosecutor.

It took the feds more than a decade to build a case by flipping Casso's alleged middleman with the detectives, Burton Kaplan.

But Casso, 65, recently penned a letter to the feds saying he has "information favorable to the defense," prosecutor Daniel Wenner revealed yesterday.

Defense lawyers Edward Hayes and Bruce Cutler will listen to what the former Luchese crime underboss has to say, but Hayes indicated there was zero chance of calling Casso, who was involved in more than 30 murders, as a witness.

Victim's Daughters To Testify Vs. G-man (NYDN)

By NANCIE L. KATZ, DAILY NEWS STAFF WRITER

New York Daily News, March 29, 2006

While her dad was alive, Mary Anne Lampasi claims she was oblivious to his mob ties.

That ended in 1992 when businessman Larry Lampasi was gunned down in a Mafia hit authorities now believe was set up by alleged rogue FBI agent Lindley DeVecchio.

Tomorrow, Mary Anne, 52, and her sister, Candace, 48, will be in Brooklyn Supreme Court, where they are hoping to confront the man investigators say is at least partly responsible for their father's death.

DeVecchio, 65, is scheduled to surrender tonight on an indictment that charges him with four gangland murders, according to law enforcement sources.

The murders were allegedly carried out after DeVecchio tipped off a secret mob informant, longtime Colombo crime family capo Gregory Scarpa Sr., the sources said.

DeVecchio has repeatedly denied any wrongdoing.

"I don't care if my legs go weak under me," said Lampasi, who now lives in Florida. "I will face this. It is harder to live not facing it. You can't run away."

In the Lampasi slaying, DeVecchio allegedly let Scarpa know where he could find the mobster, a former associate turned rival. "We were shielded," Mary Anne Lampasi said. "My father wanted us to have a better life than he had. He gave us all college educations and graduate school. Suddenly this hits us."

From the moment her father was riddled with bullets, Mary Anne Lampasi said her mother had a feeling he had been set up. Unarmed, the 66-year-old Lampasi was shot nine times.

She said the family's home in Queens was the target of several break-ins and the Lampasis came to believe they were being followed. But was it the mob or the feds?

At the time, a family friend told the sisters that there was an FBI coverup going on. The family relocated to Florida.

"We would like justice. I am so grateful that something is happening and the truth can come out," Mary Anne Lampasi said.

Feds Bugged Bedroom, Phones Of FIU Pair (MH)

By Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, March 29, 2006

Federal agents planted a bug in the bedroom of a Florida International University a couple of years ago, netting evidence to charge them as unregistered agents for the Cuban government, according to court records.

The FBI also wiretapped the home phones of Professor Carlos Alvarez and his counselor wife, Elsa Alvarez, from at least late 2001 until last summer, collecting electronic evidence on practically all of their conversations.

The reams of intercepts included mundane exchanges and even the private musings between husband and wife.

The FBI's eavesdropping of the couple's home goes far beyond what was first known about evidence in the case, which included alleged "confessions" to federal agents last summer and the confiscation of the Alvarezes' home and FIU computers. The surveillance evidence surfaced as part of their lawyers' efforts to revoke the couple's detention before their scheduled May 8 trial.

It's unclear from the court record how these thousands and thousands of surveillance intercepts will help the U.S. attorney's office prosecute the couple, who are suspected of reporting on the exile community and its leaders to Cuban leader Fidel Castro's government.

According to sources familiar with the case, the FBI had hoped the electronic intercepts would provide leads on alleged spying activity on behalf of the Cuban government. The evidence led only to the Alvarezes' arrests in January. It's unclear why prosecutors chose to charge them at that time.

The couple's lawyers say prosecutors have produced "about 200 supposedly pertinent conversations" recorded by the FBI, court records show. The evidence remains sealed from the public. But the Alvarezes' lawyers say the "majority deals only with mundane activities of daily life" -- such as conversations about the Alvarezes' dinner plans, the tenting of their South Miami home for termites and meetings at their Catholic church.

THE DEFENSE STANCE

The couple's lawyers, Steven Chaykin and Jane Moscowitz, argue their clients would not leave for Cuba if released because they have strong ties to the community, including five children and elderly parents.

They are challenging whether the FBI lawfully obtained warrants to conduct the electronic surveillance. The FBI obtained the warrants under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which allows the government to wiretap people in the United States suspected of being agents for a foreign government or involved in terrorist activity overseas.

In the war on terror, the Bush administration has attracted sharp criticism for authorizing warrantless domestic wiretaps without approval from the secretive FISA court -- an issue that doesn't apply to the Alvarez case.

It is not clear from court records how long the FBI conducted electronic surveillance of the couple's home. But it appears the FISA wiretaps of the Alvarezes may have begun years before the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. Post-9/11, Congress approved the USA Patriot Act that allows federal agencies to use foreign intelligence wiretap evidence for criminal investigations, such as the Alvarezes' case.

'On March 6, 2006, the government produced summaries of allegedly `pertinent' recorded conversations produced by that surveillance starting in December 2001 and ending July 4, 2005, although the government states that the eavesdropping began earlier and continued until the defendants' arrest on Jan. 6, 2006," the Alvarezes' lawyers wrote.

The attorneys, in their motion, asked the government to disclose the documents related to the wiretap warrants. They are trying to challenge evidence that could affect their clients' case before a jury.

They cited constitutional protections for Carlos Alvarez, 61, a psychology professor, and his wife, Elsa, 55, a psychology counselor, both U.S. citizens.

Referring to the FISA law, the attorneys said: No U.S. citizen ``may be considered an agent of a foreign power solely upon the basis of activities that are protected by the First Amendment. . . ."

For example, they argued, more than 40 of the "pertinent" FISA recordings are telephone conversations between Carlos Alvarez and an unidentified colleague regarding legally licensed culture-exchange programs between the United States and Cuba.

PROTECTIVE ORDER

This month, federal prosecutors refused to turn over documents for the FISA warrants to the Alvarezes' attorneys.

So far, U.S. District Judge K. Michael Moore has issued a protective order that allows only members of the legal teams and their staffs to review the declassified FISA intercepts for the upcoming trial.

Prosecutors apparently disclosed evidence about the FISA wiretaps to show the judge that the Alvarezes are a ``serious risk of flight."

Assistant U.S. attorney Brian Frazier cited Magistrate Judge Andrea Simonton's January ruling in which she said the couple would receive "a hero's welcome" in Cuba.

The prosecutor said the couple used their cover at FIU to infiltrate the exile community, spying on the university's president, Mitch Maidique, and other exile leaders. He said they secretly communicated with the Cuban intelligence directorate, using five-digit code in short-wave radio transmissions.

Once the messages were received, they would input them into their home computer, equipped with decryption technology.

Prosecutors say the couple traveled to Cuba, Mexico and other countries to exchange information with their handlers from the Cuban Directorate of Intelligence.

According to court filings, the Alvarezes reported on "community attitudes" after the FBI's 1998 arrests of 10 Cubans charged with spying. That high-profile espionage case was linked to the Cuban government's shoot-down of two Brothers to the Rescue exile planes over the Florida Straits that killed four Miami men two years earlier.

Muhammad 'Psychotic,' Medical Assessment Says (WP)

By Ernesto Londoño

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

Sniper John Allen Muhammad is not competent to stand trial, his attorneys argued in a motion filed yesterday along with a psychiatric evaluation that says the defendant should not be allowed to defend himself during his murder trial because he is "psychotic, delusional" and "paranoid."

The report -- the first public disclosure of a mental health expert's assessment of the sniper's mind -- was filed a day before Muhammad is scheduled to appear before a judge in Rockville to explain why he wants to fire his attorneys and defend himself during his Montgomery County trial, which is scheduled to start May 1.

Yale University psychiatrist Dorothy O. Lewis, the defense expert who interviewed Muhammad twice in September 2003 and for four hours Monday, said the sniper told her that he is innocent and believes "his arrest was the result of an elaborate scheme to frame him for the murders."

She wrote that Muhammad told her he also believes Lee Boyd Malvo -- his alleged accomplice in the series of slayings committed with a high-powered rifle in October 2002 -- was "fed information by the police and forced to make a false confession."

Lewis wrote that Muhammad's judgment and ability to think logically are "severely compromised" by brain dysfunction and that he probably suffers from "schizo-affective schizophrenia."

Muhammad has refused to assist his attorneys -- Montgomery public defender Paul DeWolfe and his deputy, Brian D. Shefferman -- and says that he can't share his "secret defense strategy" with his attorneys because "they cannot be trusted," Lewis wrote.

Montgomery Circuit Court Judge James L. Ryan will have to tackle the competency issue before deciding whether to allow Muhammad to represent himself -- a request he made in a handwritten letter delivered to the judge this month.

People in criminal proceedings have a constitutional right to represent themselves at trial, but to sign off on such requests, judges need to find that the defendant is competent and is making the decision knowingly and voluntarily.

Ryan could rule on the competency motion today, but he might choose to have Muhammad examined by an independent psychiatrist before deciding whether he's fit to stand trial; Lewis was hired by Muhammad's defense attorneys.

Deputy State's Attorney Katherine Winfree declined to comment on the motion yesterday. DeWolfe said the "report speaks for itself with respect for his competence to stand trial and his competence to waive counsel."

Maryland prosecutors hope to convince a jury that Muhammad was the architect of the sniper shootings, six of which occurred in Montgomery. Muhammad, 45, and Malvo, 21, were each convicted of one killing in separate trials in Virginia in 2003. Muhammad has been sentenced to death and Malvo to life in prison without the possibility of parole in that state.

Maryland prosecutors say a second set of convictions would give relatives of the people shot in Montgomery a taste of justice and secure the defendants' uninterrupted incarceration in case the Virginia convictions were overturned.

Lewis, the psychiatrist, wrote that Muhammad has no clear defense strategy. When asked how he would strike back at the overwhelming amount of evidence prosecutors could introduce to link him to the six slayings, he told her: "One piece at a time . . . you take all the pieces and add them up as a total."

During Monday's interview, Muhammad seemed paranoid, Lewis wrote. He insisted that his attorneys were withholding information that was key to his defense and told her: "It was never my intention to be represented by an attorney."

DOJ_NMG_0023489

She wrote that Muhammad had short spurts of lucidity during their two interviews in September but that his behavior deteriorated unpredictably and that he rambled and made "inappropriate" requests, such as examining the physician's fingers and cuticles.

She said he became delusional when asked whether friends and relatives visited him and began speaking about people he knew in China and Russia. He told her that he had been in Germany when the Berlin Wall fell but that "the history books lied" about the date, Lewis wrote.

Anti-snitch Campaign Riles Police, Prosecutors (USAT)

By Rick Hampson

USA Today, March 29, 2006

PITTSBURGH — It was not the first time prosecutor Lisa Pellegrini had been enraged by the sight of the T-shirt with the traffic-sign message: STOP SNITCHING. But this guy was about to wear one into court, with matching baseball cap.

Worse, he was a witness — her witness — and the intended victim in an attempted murder case that had brought him, her and the defendants to court that day last fall.

This was Rayco "War" Saunders — ex-con, pro boxer and walking billboard for a street movement that has sparked a coast-to-coast beef involving everyone from professors to rappers.

Pellegrini, thinking "witness intimidation," told Saunders to lose the hat and reverse the shirt. Saunders, crying "First Amendment," refused. He left the courthouse, shirt in place. Case dismissed. "In almost every one of my homicides, this happens: 'I don't know nothin' about nothin', " the prosecutor says. "There is that attitude, 'Don't be a snitch.' And it's condoned by the community."

Omerta, the Mafia's blood oath of silence, has been broken by turncoat after turncoat. But the call to stop snitching — on other folks in the 'hood — is getting louder.

Is it an attempt by drug dealers and gangsters to intimidate witnesses?

Is it a legitimate protest against law enforcers' overreliance on self-serving criminal informers?

Or is it bigger than that?

Take the case of Busta Rhymes.

The hip-hop star has refused to cooperate with police investigating the slaying of his bodyguard Feb. 5 outside a Brooklyn studio where Rhymes was recording a video with performers such as Missy Elliott and Mary J. Blige. Police say that although Rhymes and as many as 50 others may have seen the shooting, no one came forward — an echo of the silence that followed the unsolved murders of rappers Tupac Shakur, the Notorious B.I.G. and Run-DMC's Jam Master Jay.

It's the code of the street: To be a credible rapper, you have to know when to shut up.

"Under pressure, I lie for ya, die for ya," Lil' Kim once rapped. Now she's in a federal jail in Philadelphia for failing to tell a grand jury what she knew about some friends involved in a shooting.

Rhymes' silence in the death of Israel Ramirez seemed to puzzle New York's seen-it-all police commissioner, Ray Kelly, an ex-Marine, career NYPD cop and U.S. Customs chief. "Your employee is murdered in front of you," he told reporters, so "you'd think he might want to talk to the police."

Not necessarily, says David Kennedy, director of the Center for Crime Prevention and Control at John Jay College of Criminal Justice in New York. "There's such animosity toward the police in some urban communities that even people who aren't afraid, and who hate crime, still feel cooperating is something good people don't do," Kennedy says. "That's the Busta Rhymes story. He has nothing to fear. He just doesn't want to talk. His reputation would take a dive if he did."

The code of silence, he says, "is breaking out in a way we've never seen before."

Saunders agrees: "It's a movement, that's what it is — a stop snitching movement."

The stigma against snitching is an old one, but the Mafia never took out newspaper ads to promote omerta. So why is an unwritten rule printed on thousands of T-shirts?

Start with the war on drugs. Over the past two decades, law enforcers have made more drug arrests and turned more defendants into informers than ever before. According to the U.S. Sentencing Commission, the agency that establishes federal court sentencing practices, about one-third of drug trafficking prosecutions involve informers' "substantial assistance." That makes them eligible for reduced sentences under otherwise inflexible federal sentencing guidelines.

Informers are a necessary evil, says Cmdr. Maurita Bryant, a 29-year veteran of the Pittsburgh Police Department. "We have to deal with who we have to deal with. … If a dealer needs to make a deal, he'll tell on his mother. It may not be right, but it's all we have."

DOJ_NMG_0023490

Some criminal informers who are allowed to remain free commit more crimes; some return to crime after a shortened prison sentence; some frame others, or tell prosecutors what they want to hear. Boston defense lawyer Harvey Silverglate says the system encourages defendants "not only to sing, but to compose."

According to a study by the Northwestern University Law School's Center on Wrongful Convictions, 51 of the 111 wrongful death penalty convictions since the 1970s were based in whole or in part on the testimony of witnesses who had an incentive to lie.

Alexandra Natapoff, a professor at Loyola Law School in Los Angeles, says that, based on federal statistics, one of every four black men from 20 to 29 is behind bars, on probation or on parole, and under pressure to snitch. She estimates one in 12 of all black men in the highest-crime neighborhoods are snitching.

She says informers strain the social fabric of poor minority neighborhoods, where as many as half the young men have been arrested. "Every family gathering, every party, every backyard barbecue probably has someone who's secretly working as an informer."

This is the world Rayco Saunders inhabits. It's filled, as he puts it, with "guys doin' all this crime and not doin' no time, because they're telling on the next man."

Hence a backlash — "stop snitching." The slogan appeared in Baltimore about two years ago as the title of an underground DVD featuring threatening, gun-wielding drug dealers and a brief appearance by NBA star and Baltimore native Carmelo Anthony. Anthony, who later said he didn't know the video's theme, told ESPN The Magazine that the dealer-turned-informer excoriated in the DVD "ran our neighborhood. Now he's working with the state and the feds. You can't do that. He turned his back on the 'hood."

The black community is divided. Rapper Chuck D of Public Enemy has blasted the Stop Snitching campaign on the hip-hop group's website: "The term 'snitch' was best applied to those that ratted revolutionaries like Huey P. Newton, Bobby Seale, Che Guevara. … Let's not let stupid cats use hip-hop to again twist this meaning for the sake of some 'innerganghood' violent drug thug crime dogs, who've sacrificed the black community's women and children."

Whatever its intent, the Stop Snitching movement has galvanized officials already apoplectic about witness reluctance and witness intimidation.

States and localities spend a fraction of what the federal government devotes to witness protection, although this month Pennsylvania restored $1 million for that purpose. The move came as more than a half-dozen witnesses recanted earlier testimony in the trial of men accused in the Philadelphia street shooting death of a third-grade boy.

"If the word 'snitch' comes out of someone's mouth, I go insane," says Pellegrini, the Pittsburgh prosecutor. "When young men and women see rappers refuse (to cooperate), they think it's cool. How do we tell them, 'we'll support you,' when they see that?"

Especially, she says, when the slogan is blatantly used to intimidate witnesses. Last year, supporters of an accused drug dealer on trial in Pittsburgh federal court wore T-shirts around town bearing witnesses' photos and the inscription "Stop Snitching. " U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan says one, Garry Smith, had a $100,000 price on his head.

"Everybody in law enforcement is beside themselves," says Kennedy of John Jay College. "They can't investigate cases. They can't prosecute cases. The clearance rate for some serious crimes is tanking."

Stop Snitching T-shirts have been banned from a number of courthouses. Boston Mayor Thomas Menino, whose city recorded the most homicides in a decade last year, threatened to send police into stores to pull them off the shelves.

Following the furor over the Stop Snitchin' DVD, Maryland raised witness intimidation from a misdemeanor to a felony, and Baltimore police made a tape of their own, Keep Talking. "People have to snitch," says Peter Moskos, a former Baltimore street cop. "That's how criminals get caught."

Saunders' life may have been saved by a snitch.

Pellegrini says an informer told police that an ex-con had hired another man to kill Saunders because the boxer was having an affair with his girlfriend. The man and his accomplices were arrested before the hit could be carried out. They were scheduled for a court hearing the day last fall that Saunders showed up in his Stop Snitching T-shirt.

Saunders and Pellegrini agree he was there to warn the men not to testify in other pending cases. But they disagree on why: Pellegrini says Saunders, whom she calls a "thug," is in cahoots with other criminals who feared the men's testimony. Saunders says he thought the defendants would try to save themselves by selling out others.

Saunders says he hates snitching so much that he not only wears the T-shirts himself but has given them as gifts to friends and relatives. "They love the T- shirts," he says. "It's way overdue for somebody to step up and speak about these things that's going on with these informants and these guys walking around here with immunity to do whatever they want to do."

At 31, Saunders has had a hard life. He says he never knew his father; his mother died of a drug overdose when he was 11. He was stabbed in the back at 15, shot in the chest at 21. He says he shot at people himself and dealt drugs. He was arrested six times from 1994 to 1997 and served four years in prison after a shootout with a police officer. He says he was framed.

DOJ_NMG_0023491

Since leaving prison, he has pursued a career as a pro boxer, compiling a record of 15-7-2. In 2004 he won the North American Boxing Council cruiserweight championship. In an interview at the gym where he trains, he outlines a stop-snitching creed:

·Don't snitch on others just to save yourself. “Stop snitching is for those guys out there … selling more drugs than Noriega, and their only out is to tell on somebody. … If a (criminal) wants to be a Good Samaritan, OK. But send (him) to jail. Don't give him immunity to do what he wants on the street.”

·Stop Snitching doesn't mean stop talking to police. “It's always misconstrued by the public, or the powers that be, that we're trying to intimidate the regular people or the law-abiding citizens. That's not what it's about. … If that is your only outlet, to call the police, that's what you do.”

·But witnesses have no obligation to help police. “Do your job — you're the police. … I've been wronged by the system. Do you think I would help the system? … Do cops snitch on other cops?”

·The authorities can't protect witnesses. “What's happening to the innocent witness? They get dead or … terrorized for life.”

·Sometimes you must right wrongs yourself. “I'm a man, and I can handle my own situations like a man. … I've done dirt. I'll admit that. So I can't run to the police.”

Later, he's out on the street, wearing one of the T-shirts. Standing nearby is a woman dressed as the Statue of Liberty to advertise the services of her employer, Liberty Income Tax.

“The people who are snitching, a lot of them end up dead, a lot of them end up hurt,” says Lady Liberty — Ernestine Whitaker of Wilkinsburg, whose nephew was threatened after he witnessed a crime. “So the snitching doesn't do anything for the person who's snitching.”

She looks at Saunders, whose muscular chest bulges beneath the T. “I'd wear one of those,” she says.

As Scams Go, This Is A Gem (LAT)

By Jessica Garrison, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 29, 2006

There was no heist. The dealer simply handed $14 million worth of diamonds to a stranger, relying on a tradition of trust.

Those not in the diamond trade might find it hard to understand why Emile Chayto, a Geneva dealer with more than 40 years of experience, gave $14 million worth of gems to a stranger who claimed to be the wife of the deceased president of the Congo — before she had paid him one penny.

Unfortunately for Chayto, she was not the widow of Mobutu Sese Seko. And her wire transfer never arrived.

As it turned out, the handoff of the stones triggered a series of transactions — detailed in lawsuits in Los Angeles and Israel — illuminating a strange and glamorous trade in which millions of dollars' worth of merchandise crisscrosses the globe on the strength of spoken promises.

Since the Middle Ages, when it was one of the few areas of commerce open to them in Europe, the diamond business has been dominated by Jews, and even today, though traders from India are increasingly moving into the industry, deals around the world are sealed with the traditional Yiddish phrase mazel und brocha, which means "luck and a blessing."

Hebrew is spoken along Hill Street in Los Angeles, the country's second-largest diamond market after New York, where some of the parties involved with Chayto in the disputed trades have offices. Every day at lunchtime, deliverymen bearing kosher food pour into the downtown jewelry exchange, a glittering, bustling hive filled with tiny offices and storefronts.

David Marcus, president of the West Coast Diamond Club, a guild that arbitrates disputes among dealers and has its offices on the 16th floor of the exchange, said he knew, or knew of, most of the parties named in the lawsuits but that he hadn't heard much talk about the dispute itself.

That did not surprise him, he added. It was easy to see why all parties involved — many of whom have excellent reputations in the diamond world — would not want to broadcast details of such a fight, especially in a business in which reputation counts for so much.

"Look, I make a deal for millions, and all I do is shake hands. I don't even give a check. I give my word," he said. "Cases like this are very rare," he added.

According to court papers, the intrigue began a year ago, in February 2005, when Chayto was contacted by Albert Shamash, a resident of Marbella, Spain, a seaside playground of the rich on the fabled Costa del Sol.

Shamash told Chayto that he was calling on behalf of a woman who said she was Mrs. Mobutu Sese Seko, the widow of the ex-president of Zaire, now known as the Democratic Republic of Congo. Shamash said she "had a collection of uncut diamonds that she wished to sell," according to court papers. The war-torn African state is known for its diamonds, and Mobutu was infamous for plundering his country's assets, so it was plausible that his widow might have quite a nice collection.

DOJ_NMG_0023492

In April, Chayto accepted Shamash's invitation for an all-expenses-paid trip to Marbella, according to court papers.

No deal happened on that trip. In fact, Chayto didn't even meet the woman. But a few weeks later, Shamash called Chayto again and told him that the purported Mrs. Mobutu wanted to throw a huge party for Congolese leaders and hand out precious watches and jewelry as party favors.

Court filings provide no explanation why the woman would buy diamonds when she first appeared as a seller. Through his Los Angeles attorney, Chayto declined to comment.

But according to court papers, Chayto began putting together a collection of gems to offer for sale. Most were owned by other people, but that is not unusual in the diamond trade. One was a 23.8-carat diamond, which Chayto claimed in court papers was worth $1.8 million.

That stone belonged to a New York diamond dealer named Ishaia Gol. And there was a 16.62-carat diamond worth $900,000, owned by Chayto and another New York dealer. There was also a 43-carat Burmese sapphire, along with a ruby-and-diamond necklace, diamond-encrusted Harry Winston watches, Bulgari watches with emeralds and a long list of other gold, platinum and diamond jewelry, according to court papers.

A 23.8-carat diamond is big, but not among the largest diamonds in the world. The Hope Diamond, for example, is 45 carats. That stone, on display in the Smithsonian Institution in Washington, D.C., once belonged to King Louis XIV, and legend says it brings bad luck to its owners. Even bigger is the 530-carat Star of Africa, one of the British crown jewels.

With permission from the various owners around the world to negotiate a sale, Chayto delivered all the gems to Shamash in Marbella in May and June to show to the woman, according to court papers.

In June, Shamash told Chayto that she wanted to buy them all. She would pay him 12.2 million euros ($14 million) and a 2.8-million euro commission — totaling about $17.8 million at the current rate of exchange.

As payment, a man claiming to be an English lawyer named Eduardo Martin gave Chayto a bank transfer document allegedly showing that the money would arrive in Chayto's Geneva bank account on June 7, according to court papers.

But the money never arrived.

"I complained to Shamash that I had been defrauded," he said in a court affidavit. "Shamash assured me that the problem was related to the embargo on Mrs. Mobutu's funds imposed by the Congolese government. Shamash counseled me to wait."

Shamash also gave Chayto two personal checks totaling 12.2 million euros signed by his wife. The checks were post-dated to July 7, but Chayto accepted them anyway.

Several days later, the woman claiming to be Mrs. Mobutu summoned Chayto from Switzerland to a London hotel, where she had reserved "the royal suite," according to court papers.

The woman apologized to Chayto for the delay in payment. But she had good news: Her relations were improving with the new president of the Congo, and the money would be coming soon. And in the event it didn't, she said, she had 20 million euros stashed in Morocco.

Chayto never got his money (the checks did not clear), nor did the other owners of the diamonds, according to court papers. Spanish police, meanwhile, say they are investigating a man named Shamash for theft of the diamonds and for other crimes.

But where were the stones? According to the court documents, they had entered the worldwide rapids of large-carat diamond trading.

"Traditionally, the diamond trade has been … a small group that operates in a circle of trust," said Russell Shor, a senior diamond industry analyst with the Gemological Institute of America. "Everybody knows somebody who knows somebody, so if you violate that trust, you become a pariah, and you can't make a living."

Across the globe, there are relatively few people who deal in large diamonds; Shor estimates maybe a few hundred. They buy and sell with stunning speed, making a small margin of profit on each deal.

"You keep your ear to the ground," Shor said. "You know who's got the goods. You go get them. You seize the moment."

That is exactly what Ouri Shifman did when he heard through his brother-in-law in Casablanca about some large diamonds for sale last spring, according to court papers.

Shifman, a dealer whose company has offices in Los Angeles, New York and Israel, flew to Marbella on May 26, a week before Chayto completed his deal with Shamash and the woman. In a later court paper, Shifman said he met there with a diamond broker named Ali, who claimed to be acting on behalf of the wife of "a very wealthy man from one of the Persian Gulf emirates." She wanted to sell a 23.8-carat diamond, among other jewels.

DOJ_NMG_0023493

Shifman and a business associate went to a heavily guarded home in Marbella and looked at the stone. A third-generation diamond dealer, Shifman did not usually deal in large diamonds, so he approached an old friend from Los Angeles, Oved Anter, for help with financing.

By May 31, he and Anter had put together $900,000 for the 23.8-carat diamond, and Shifman had taken the diamond to Las Vegas to give to Anter. (Shifman said he eventually paid a total of $1.38 million for the diamond; the other side says it appears that he paid less, according to court papers.) Later, Shifman also bought two other diamonds and a sapphire that had been among the jewels Chayto had delivered to Shamash. Many of the others have disappeared, according to Chayto's attorneys.

Anter and Shifman sold part ownership in the 23.8-carat stone to a New York dealer. Within days, according to court papers, a representative of that dealer met one of Chayto's partners and, not knowing about the stone, tried to sell it to him. That's when the lawsuits started flying.

Chayto and his partners say Anter and Shifman ought to have known it was a shady deal.

They maintain that Anter and Shifman paid about $1 million less than market value for the diamonds, which should have tipped them that something wasn't right. But even without the low price, they say, the "convoluted story … would have put even an ordinary person on notice that the wealthy Arabian matron may not have had clear ownership of the jewels."

But as Shifman countered in his deposition, the diamond market is full of "brokers and middlemen, and the identity of the principal is often unknown." There was no way to he could have known he was part of a scam, he said.

Ali seemed to be well known in Marbella. He had a house. He knew lots of people. And all of the meetings took place in restaurants and cafes (where Ali insisted upon picking up the check).

"These transactions were not carried out in the shadows," Shifman said in his declaration. He added: "The last thing I could imagine was that when I arrived with the diamond in Las Vegas and proudly showed it … that several months later I would find myself being summoned to a police interrogation regarding the circumstances of how the diamond came to be in my possession."

Now the stones bought by Anter and Shifman, which last year jetted from New York to Geneva to Marbella to Las Vegas, back to New York, then to Israel and finally to Los Angeles, are grounded. Late last month, a Los Angeles judge issued an injunction forbidding Anter and his diamond company, First International Diamond Inc., from selling them while both sides fight it out.

Anter and Shifman say they paid for the diamonds fair and square and that the suits are tarnishing their reputations, built up over decades in the business.

"We bought goods in good faith," said Sam Wieder, Shifman's partner. "We are going to fight this all the way to end."

Earlier this month, Anter countersued Chayto and his New York partners, accusing them of negligence in the sale to Shamash, resulting in Anter's and Shifman's being defrauded. That suit also accuses Chayto and Ishaia Gol of slandering Anter's and Shifman's names. It seeks punitive damages. Lawyers for Chayto and Gol deny the allegations.

As the court filings continue to pile up, there is at least one thing both sides agree on: They've never been involved in anything as unusual as this suit.

"I've been in the business 30 years. I've never had such a strange thing happen to me," Wieder said.

"Never in my life," agreed Gol, the New York diamond dealer whose 23.8-carat diamond is at the heart of the dispute.

Now, Gol said, it is up to the courts. "Somewhere, somehow, somebody will have to decide who is honest and who is not."

Times special correspondent Cristina Mateo-Yanguas in Madrid contributed to this report.

Mr. Rosenbaum At Howard (WP)

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

THE LAST 46 hours of New York Times reporter David E. Rosenbaum's life can be segmented into three stages: his robbery and beating on Gramercy Street NW; the response of the D.C. Fire and Emergency Medical Services Department (FEMS); and his treatment at Howard University Hospital, where he died from a massive head injury. Mr. Rosenbaum's alleged assailants are in custody and awaiting trial. Possible missteps by FEMS have been reported. Now, thanks to an in-depth investigation by the D.C. Health Department, we learn what happened to Mr. Rosenbaum after he arrived at the emergency room of Howard University Hospital on the night of Jan. 6. It is a distressing account of across-the-board failures.

The Health Department found that:

· "Once Mr. Rosenbaum was transported to the Emergency Dept., the triage nurse failed to properly assess, evaluate and manage his clinical presentation" as required by protocols and patient care standards. "The triage nurse also failed to perform a neurological assessment to determine Mr. Rosenbaum's level of consciousness and the possibility of a brain injury, based on the low GCS scorings [suggestive of a severe brain injury] obtained by the EMS unit while on the scene."

· "The evening charge nurse then failed to assess and evaluate Mr. Rosenbaum's condition prior to assigning him to the hallway. Furthermore, she failed to alert and specifically assign his care to one of the ED nurses overseeing patients in that hallway."

· "Mr. Rosenbaum was . . . left unattended in the hallway for approximately one hour and 20 minutes after his arrival to the ED . . . after which time he was discovered to have a life-threatening brain injury which required emergency neurosurgical intervention."

· "There was no documented evidence that Mr. Rosenbaum's initial evaluation by the physician included a comprehensive head-to-toe assessment . . . that would have revealed any trauma to his head. . . . Concurrently, there was no evidence that [his] initial level of consciousness (documented as lethargy), along with his limited response to painful stimuli, was investigated by the physician to determine a possible cause."

The Health Department has notified Howard of several deficiencies in its patient treatment and has demanded an "acceptable plan of corrective action," D.C. Health Director Gregg A. Pane said yesterday. The Health Department has also notified the federal Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services of its findings and is weighing other options for holding the hospital accountable.

And to think: Howard University is asking that the city spend $200 million and that the federal government guarantee an additional $200 million so the university and the city can build a $400 million medical complex that Howard medical professionals will control and operate.

CIVIL LAW:

Big Tobacco Gets Favorable Ruling (WSJ)

By Vanessa O'Connell

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

An independent arbitrator ruled that the nation's big cigarette makers lost market share as a result of their 1998 legal settlement with 46 states.

The ruling increases the likelihood that Marlboro maker Philip Morris USA and its rivals will be able to cut $1.2 billion from the payment they owe the states next month, and possibly see similar reductions in future years.

The payment issue stems from a settlement reached eight years ago requiring Altria Group Inc.'s Philip Morris, Reynolds American Inc.'s RJR and Loews Corp.'s Lorillard to reimburse the states annually for the costs of caring for sick smokers. Each year's payment is calculated based on the previous year's cigarette-sales volume. So far, cigarette makers have paid the states $41.6 billion; another $6.5 billion is due April 17.

The latest ruling could usher in a new era of confrontation between major cigarette makers, which lately have benefited from a string of courtroom victories, and the states, which have grown increasingly dependent on annual tobacco-company payments to cover budget shortfalls.

The companies say the settlement allows them to cut their payments if their market share drops below certain thresholds. The companies say they hit that threshold in 2003: Their collective market share dropped to 92% from 99.6% in 1997 -- the year before the settlement -- amid gains by makers of bargain-priced generic cigarettes that have sprung up since 1998.

The states, however, claim the big cigarette makers lost share not because of the legal settlement, but because of outsize price increases.

Economist Daniel McFadden of the University of California at Berkeley, an independent analyst who served as an arbitrator in the dispute, affirmed his earlier ruling in favor of the companies. He found that the burdens of the settlement itself were a "significant factor" in causing the market-share losses.

No. 2 cigarette maker Reynolds, which sells Winston and Salem cigarettes, stands to gain the biggest sum -- roughly $567 million -- because it suffered the steepest loss in market share. The No. 1 maker, Philip Morris, of Richmond, Va., would be entitled to about $386 million, according to estimates by the settlement's designated auditor.

A loss of revenue is sure to hurt cash-strapped states that are counting on the tobacco billions to help fund health-care programs or pay other expenses.

The National Association of Attorneys General said yesterday that the states are negotiating with the tobacco companies to get the full payment and expect those negotiations to be successful. The states warn that, if necessary, they will sue the companies to get the full payment.

The dispute is likely to be closely followed by the bond markets. Many states and other municipalities have floated special bonds secured by the flow of future settlement payments by cigarette makers.

DOJ_NMG_0023495

Negotiation On Tobacco Payment (NYT)

By Michael Janofsky

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 28 — Negotiations are under way between the states and the nation's largest tobacco companies over more than $1 billion of a payment the companies are legally bound to make to the states by mid-April.

The dispute arises out of a binding determination by an independent consultant made public on Tuesday that the $246 billion Master Settlement Agreement of 1998, which ended lawsuits against the companies over the health care costs of smoking, was a "significant factor" in the companies' loss of market share. From 1997 to 2003, smoking in the United States fell by 21 percent.

The 1998 agreement, which included major restrictions on cigarette marketing, listed three conditions that would reduce the amount companies had to pay. The consultants agreed that the first two had been met: the companies' market share fell more than 2 percent, and the settlement agreement played a major role in the decline.

But the companies are arguing that the states did not "diligently enforce" statutes that require companies not participating in the agreement to create escrow accounts to cover losses in any future litigation that might involve them, the third condition to win a reduction. The smaller companies generally sell discount cigarettes.

The big companies say they are entitled to a reduction of $1.2 billion of the $6.5 billion they are scheduled to pay as the next installment of the settlement, which is due the states on April 17.

"We believe the states have diligently enforced their statutes," said Tom Miller, the Iowa attorney general and co-chairman of the National Association of Attorneys General tobacco committee.

"We are negotiating with the companies to make sure they pay the full amount," Mr. Miller said.

A spokeswoman for Philip Morris, the nation's largest tobacco company, said the company would have no comment on the negotiations. The next-largest company, Reynolds American, did not respond to a message seeking comment.

The Dim Halls Of Government Need More Sunlight (HILL)

By John F. Sturm

The Hill, March 29, 2006

Since 1966, the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) has been the public's principal means of looking into the workings of government, but over the years FOIA requests filed by the public and the news media increasingly have been rejected or mysteriously delayed.

This is why the Newspaper Association of America and others have formed the Sunshine in Government Initiative, a coalition of media groups committed to promoting policies that ensure the government is accessible, accountable and open.

Many members of Congress are looking closely at reforming and improving FOIA. Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas), Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) and Rep. Lamar Smith (R-Texas) have introduced the Openness Promotes Effectiveness in Our National (OPEN) Government Act of 2005 (S. 394 and H.R. 867) to provide meaningful FOIA reform and accountability, legislation that the coalition supports. Rep. Todd Platts (R-Pa.), chairman of the House Government Reform Subcommittee on Government Management, Finance and Accountability, also held a constructive hearing on this issue.

In an attempt to strengthen FOIA, the White House issued an executive order just before Christmas. But the order fails to address important issues that are covered by the proposed legislation.

Here are a few ways that the executive order doesn't measure up to true legislative reform such as OPEN.

· Lack of realistic alternatives to litigation. If a FOIA request is denied, often the only option available to the requester is litigation in federal court, meaning most individuals and small organizations have no realistic means of appeal. OPEN mandates creation of an office to serve as an ombudsman, offering mediation services. The executive order offers no specific ways to handle complaints.

· Requests are difficult to track. A common complaint among requesters is that they are unable to obtain information on the status of their requests. OPEN requires each agency to establish an individualized tracking-number system, and it must establish ways to track requests by phone or Internet. The executive order advises agencies to consider creating a tracking system.

· Attorneys' fees are too difficult to recover. The cost of fighting a denial of a FOIA request in federal court is expensive. FOIA allows for the recovery of legal fees only when a requester wins in court.

Often, an agency will wait until a court decision against it seems imminent and only then grant or settle the FOIA request. But that denies requesters any recovery of legal fees. Thus requesters, especially those with limited resources, are dissuaded from filing suit.

DOJ_NMG_0023496

OPEN closes that loophole, allowing recovery of fees if the requester's court pursuit was the "catalyst" for the agency's granting the FOIA request. This discourages agencies from drawing out unnecessary litigation. The executive order fails to address the problem.

· No penalties for delaying requests. Agencies have no disincentives to drag their feet. As a result, some requests remain unprocessed for months, even years.

OPEN creates meaningful penalties for failing to comply with the current law's 20-day time limit on responding to FOIA requests. The executive order sets no firm time limits and imposes no penalties.

· Not even a slap on the wrist. Current law allows for disciplinary actions against officials who act arbitrarily or capriciously in denying FOIA requests. But in the 40-year history of the law, no one has ever been formally disciplined.

OPEN requires the attorney general to notify Congress of any finding of arbitrary withholding. The executive order does not specifically address the issue of bad-faith denials.

· No agency oversight or enforcement. Though technically in charge of enforcing FOIA, the Department of Justice lacks the oversight necessary to correct problems or to enforce FOIA provisions properly. OPEN creates an ombudsman function to help mediate disputes between requesters and agencies and to review agency policy and procedures. The executive order relies on self-reporting, with no enforcement.

· Records frequently exempted without notice. Congress can exempt specific records from FOIA by statute, but that exemption often appears as a single paragraph buried in a bill hundreds of pages long, allowing it to be passed without debate and public notice. OPEN requires all proposed exemptions to be stated explicitly so that they can be openly scrutinized. The executive order is silent on exemptions.

The darkness of unwarranted secrecy can hide and encourage misdeeds, and breed discontent. Conversely, as Justice Louis Brandeis said, "Sunlight is the best of disinfectants." Let's reform FOIA and open the darkened files of government.

Sturm is president and CEO of the Newspaper Association of America. The association is a member of the Sunshine in Government Initiative (www.sunshineingovernment.com).

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Pizza Hut Franchisee To Make Restaurants Accessible To Disabled (AP)

By Sam Hananel

AP, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON - The nation's largest Pizza Hut franchisee has agreed to renovate hundreds of restaurants to settle claims they are inaccessible to the disabled, the Justice Department announced Tuesday.

NPC International Inc., which has executive offices in Lenexa, Kan., and its restaurant services center in Pittsburg, Kan., reached the settlement to resolve alleged violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act.

The agreement requires restaurants to repair parking lots, seating areas, bathrooms and self-service counters to bring them into compliance.

The company, which operates about 800 restaurants in 25 states, did not admit any violations of federal law and reached the settlement to avoid potential litigation, according to a copy of the settlement agreement.

"Too often, the ease and enjoyment of restaurant dining is not a reality for individuals with disabilities," said Wan J. Kim, assistant attorney general for the department's Civil Rights Division. "I commend NPC for their commitment to take the steps necessary to make its Pizza Hut restaurants accessible."

Under the settlement, NPC must alter or remodel all the Pizza Hut restaurants it owns to make them comply with the ADA and train all its employees and store managers on how to operate under the law.

NPC must also work with landlords at the 180 delivery and carryout restaurants it does not own to ensure they are accessible to disabled patrons.

The Justice Department discovered the violations during a compliance review prompted by complaints from private citizens in the Midwest, department spokesman Eric Holland said.

All improvements must be completed during a timetable that spans the next four years.

Earlier this month, NPC was sold to the private equity arm of Merrill Lynch & Co. Pizza Hut Inc. is a unit of Yum Brands Inc.

ON THE NET

http://www.npcinternational.com

Extension Of Voting Act Is Likely Despite Criticism (NYT)

By Rick Lyman

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

ATLANTA, March 27 — Representative Lynn Westmoreland, a former builder who represents a jigsaw of predominantly white areas just south and west of Atlanta, acknowledges that the 1965 Voting Rights Act, a cornerstone achievement of the civil rights movement, was necessary in its day to register blacks and overturn decades of laws preventing them from voting.

But times have changed, Mr. Westmoreland said.

"It was set up to be temporary, just to get things to where they should be," he said. "And if you look at the results we have here in Georgia, I think you can see that it's worked. Its time has passed."

Mr. Westmoreland is one of many conservative Republicans who have serious problems with the law. Yet, even though his party controls the White House and Congress, the law seems in little danger of expiring. A multiyear campaign by civil rights leaders to reauthorize the act, parts of which expire in August 2007, appears to be on the verge of success.

Liberal supporters and conservative opponents say they expect it to be reauthorized and, probably, even strengthened in coming weeks, well ahead of the deadline.

"The Republicans know that if they question the wisdom of reauthorization the Democrats will relentlessly demagogue them on the issue," said Roger Clegg, president of the Center for Equal Opportunity, which opposes reauthorization. "They'll be called racist and accused of wanting to turn back the clock on civil rights. The Republicans would really like to have this off the table."

The Voting Rights Act, a follow-up to the Civil Rights Act of 1964, was intended to break down barriers that had kept blacks from registering to vote, mostly in the Deep South. It prohibits officials from disenfranchising blacks through gerrymandering or vote rigging.

Partly by outlawing poll taxes, literacy tests and other laws intended to keep minorities off the rolls, the act had an immediate effect on the numbers of blacks registered in the South. A Census report in 1982, the last time the law was reauthorized, found that the number of registered blacks in Mississippi had grown to 175,000 in 1966 from 22,000 in 1960. Similar increases occurred in Alabama, South Carolina and other Southern states.

More gradually, but as a direct result, the larger numbers of black voters produced a steady increase in elected minority candidates in the South and nationally.

Before the act, civil rights organizations estimate, there were fewer than 300 black elected officials in the United States, with virtually none in the South, said Daniel Levitas, who works with the Voting Rights Project of the American Civil Liberties Union in Georgia. The Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies in Washington found 1,469 black elected officials by 1970 and more than 9,500 today.

Representative John Lewis, a former Freedom Rider who was beaten in the march in Selma, Ala., that helped lead to the act, said the people who felt that the law had outlived its usefulness failed to understand what it had done and what it needed to do. Mr. Lewis's district, the Fifth Congressional, encompassing much of urban Atlanta, would look quite different had there been no act, he said, and he is certain that someone besides himself would have represented it for the last 20 years.

"Hundreds of thousands of people across America would still have been denied the right to vote," Mr. Lewis, a liberal Democrat, said. "So it's become almost like apple pie, really. This act has become like America."

President Bush has said he supports reauthorization, without specifying what changes in the law he might entertain.

The Republican Congressional leadership has shown little interest in battling to overturn it, despite many conservatives' concerns that the act has led to unconstitutional redistricting based on race. A bipartisan bill to renew the law is expected to arrive at the House Judiciary Committee in the next week or two.

The bill is also likely to include language intended to address Supreme Court decisions that many supporters say have weakened the act.

In a case involving a school board in Bossier Parish, La., the Supreme Court ruled in 1999 that even though officials had openly described their plan to change voting districts as intended to keep blacks off the board, the Voting Rights Act was not violated because the outcome did not make matters worse for blacks.

"There were zero black school board members before and zero afterward, so it hadn't been made worse," Laughlin McDonald, director of the Voting Rights Project, said. "That was clearly not Congress's intention when the act was passed in 1965, and I expect we will see language in this bill that makes this clear and overturns the Bossier decision."

If the bill, as anticipated, emerges unscathed from the committee, it is expected to hit the House floor in the spring or early summer, where it will face opposition from some members like Mr. Westmoreland, who intend to submit amendments that the act's supporters say would weaken it or render it unconstitutional.

Many provisions are permanent. But some, including some of the most contentious, are temporary and have required subsequent Congressional votes to remain.

Congress reauthorized the act for five more years in 1970 and for seven years in 1975. In 1982, with President Ronald Reagan's support, it was reauthorized for 25 years.

Of the sections that require reauthorization, the two that have drawn the most attention are Section 5, which requires some jurisdictions to apply to the Justice Department before changing voting laws, and Section 203, which requires jurisdictions with high numbers of foreign-speaking voters to provide multilingual help at polls.

The "preclearance" in Section 5 has drawn the most complaints, especially from Southerners who feel that their region has made substantial progress since 1965 and no longer needs to be singled out.

Advocates of the act point out that although most of the covered jurisdictions are in the South, others are not, including New York City.

Mr. Westmoreland said he intended to propose an amendment to the reauthorization bill that would make preclearance nationwide. Rather than singling out places, like Georgia, it would require every jurisdiction to apply to the federal government to change its voting laws.

He said he was also likely to introduce an amendment that would make it easier for jurisdictions to leave the preclearance list, another move opposed by advocates of the act. Other congressmen are expected to offer amendments to dilute the foreign-language requirements of Section 203.

But at the moment it appears unlikely that any of his proposals will attract the necessary support, Mr. Westmoreland said, adding, "I'm afraid what's going to happen is this is going to be one of those middle-of-the-night deals where you're voting on it before you know it."

Blacks Losing Ground Financially, Study Finds (USAT)

By Larry Copeland

USA Today, March 29, 2006

Despite a rebounding economy, African-Americans are not making progress in achieving income, net worth, employment and homeownership levels equal to those of whites, according to a National Urban League report to be released today.

Blacks have just 56% of the economic status of whites, a slip of 1 percentage point from last year, according to the civil rights organization's annual “The State of Black America” report.

“The economic status of African-Americans is getting worse,” Urban League President Marc Morial says. “If things are stagnant in a growing economy … then we've got to say that progress is seriously lacking. … America is not America when millions of our citizens are still viewed as a fraction of a person.”

The sharpest economic disparity between black and whites is in median net worth, according to the report, which compiles data from many government sources, including the Census Bureau and the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

The median net worth for African-American families — half have more, half less — is less than one-tenth of the median for white families. That gap is driven largely by differences in homeownership. More than 70% of white families own their homes, compared with about 50% of blacks, the report says.

The unemployment rate for blacks is 10%, compared with 4.4% for whites. One promising finding in the report: The rate of black-owned businesses compared with white-owned ones is growing.

Morial, a former mayor of New Orleans, notes that this year's findings come in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, which he says exposed race and class gaps.

The report offers proposals for improving the economic conditions of blacks in four areas: homeownership, jobs, economic development and children's education and health. Morial says the proposals will be presented next year to 2008 presidential candidates.

Black America's search for answers should begin “right in the mirror,” says Ronald Mincy, a professor of social policy and social work practice at Columbia University in New York City and author of the 2006 book Black Males Left Behind.

“A big part of it is us,” he says. “This is not to say there isn't racism. I'm not crazy. But we do need to look at these disparities and try to identify what are the sources.”

Much of the net worth disparity can be accounted for by the fact that many African-American households are headed by single parents, says Mincy, a visiting fellow at the Urban Institute, an economic and social policy research group in Washington.

ANTITRUST:

Lawmakers Voice Concerns Over McClatchy's Deal (MINNST)

Minneapolis Star Tribune, March 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0023499

WASHINGTON - Two Minnesota congressmen on Tuesday called for an antitrust review of Knight Ridder's sale to the McClatchy Co., saying they are "deeply concerned about the impact the proposed sale could have on our constituents."

Republican Mark Kennedy and Democrat Jim Oberstar released a letter they wrote to Thomas Barnett, assistant attorney general for antitrust at the Justice Department.

"This sale, should it go forward, would place in one company's hands the ownership of the two largest newspapers in our state," the letter said.

The letter made no mention of McClatchy's intent to sell the St. Paul Pioneer Press and 11 other Knight Ridder papers. McClatchy officials said when the deal was announced March 13 that they would divest those papers, with antitrust concerns specifically cited regarding the St. Paul paper.

But Kennedy said McClatchy's planned sale of the Pioneer Press doesn't allay his concerns.

"I'm pleased that McClatchy agrees with us that they shouldn't continue to own the Pioneer Press," he said.

"But being able to choose your rival and have that be a factor in the equation ... I would prefer that McClatchy just not buy those [12] papers, and make Knight Ridder sell them independently themselves."

McClatchy said Tuesday in a prepared statement that the company has "made clear from the earliest stages of our agreement to acquire Knight Ridder that we intend to sell the St. Paul Pioneer Press to avoid any concern about antitrust issues. We have already made appropriate filings with the U.S. Department of Justice and are confident that our plans to sell the paper will go forward smoothly."

Mary Kerr, a spokeswoman for Oberstar, said Kennedy's office is driving the effort to seek the antitrust review.

"For us, it's really just a concern about media consolidation," Kerr said. "We're concerned about the smaller papers."

A Justice Department spokeswoman said the department "will review the transaction carefully" as a matter of course.

Kennedy, Oberstar Call For Review Of Knight Ridder Sale (AP)

By Frederic J. Frommer

AP, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON - Minnesota Reps. Mark Kennedy and Jim Oberstar on Tuesday urged the Justice Department to review McClatchy Co.'s takeover of Knight Ridder Inc., expressing concerns about the impact of the sale on the Twin Cities.

Although McClatchy kicked off an auction Tuesday by accepting bids for the St. Paul Pioneer Press and 11 other newspapers it is selling, the lawmakers still expressed concern about McClatchy's ownership of the two largest newspapers in the state. McClatchy owns the Star Tribune of Minneapolis.

"We are concerned about the potential grave consequences such a dramatic consolidation could have on the people of Minnesota," wrote Kennedy, a Republican, and Oberstar, a Democrat, in a letter to Thomas Barnett, the assistant attorney general for antitrust.

"A monopoly in the newspaper industry is certainly no less dangerous, and is perhaps more so, than in any other American industry."

In a telephone interview, Kennedy said he didn't think the upcoming sale of the Pioneer Press made the issue moot, noting that McClatchy will still decide on the next owner of the Pioneer Press.

"Would people be comfortable if I said, 'Well, I'm going to make sure I have a Democrat opponent in the upcoming race, but I'm going to choose that Democrat?'" asked Kennedy, who is running for Senate.

"There's an inherent conflict of interest here. When they're calculating the benefit of selling a paper, they get a benefit if they sell to somebody who's going to do less with it, rather than if they sell it to somebody who will really energize the Pioneer Press and make it a really vibrant competitor."

He said McClatchy should have left the Pioneer Press out of the sale altogether, and let Knight Ridder sell it separately.

Oberstar spokeswoman Mary Kerr said Oberstar signed on to the letter out of concern about the dangers of media consolidation.

Knight Ridder spokesman Polk Laffoon said McClatchy is filing for a Justice Department antitrust review.

McClatchy spokeswoman Christina Stenson confirmed the filing was submitted. Stenson also said, "We don't anticipate any antitrust issues." She declined to comment on Kennedy's concerns.

The Justice Department is planning to review the sale of Knight Ridder to McClatchy; newspaper analyst John Morton said the department looks at all big transactions like this one.

"But I don't see any big problems because McClatchy has already announced before they close the transaction, they intend to sell the St. Paul newspaper," which is the only one that presents a conflict with a McClatchy paper, he said.

Morton dismissed the possibility that McClatchy would deliberately sell the Pioneer Press to a weak owner.

"McClatchy will sell to the highest bidder," he said.

Sacramento, Calif-based McClatchy is retaining 20 other papers included in the Knight Ridder deal.

Coherent Inc: DOJ Requested Added Info On Excel Deal (DOW)

Dow Jones, March 29, 2006

Coherent Inc. (COHR) (COHR) after Tuesday's closing bell said the Department of Justice's antitrust division has requested more information and documentary material in connection with its review of Coherent's proposed $376 million acquisition of Excel Technology Inc. (XLTC) (XLTC).

The request, to which Coherent plans to promptly respond, extends the waiting period under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act of 1976.

-Ruth Mantell; 415-439-6456; AskNewswires@dowjones.com

In Patent Case, EBay Tries To Fight Its Way Out Of Paper Bag (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin And Mylene Mangalindan

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

What do 19th-century paper bags have in common with the 21st century's most successful Internet auction site?

Patent problems and the U.S. Supreme Court.

More than a century ago, in a patent case involving a machine to fold paper bags, the Supreme Court ruled that infringement of a patent could result in an injunction against a company using the invention -- even if the patent holder didn't use it. "Patents are property, and entitled to the same rights and sanctions as other property," Justice Joseph McKenna wrote for the court.

Today, eBay Inc. will ask the Supreme Court to revisit that decision. While patents may be property, the San Jose, Calif., Internet auctioneer argues, Congress never intended to give patent holders who don't use their inventions nearly insurmountable leverage over companies later found to infringe.

Although eBay disputed the validity of the patents central to the case, the issue isn't whether the patent holder is entitled to a court-ordered remedy, but whether that remedy extends beyond the payment of royalties and penalties to an injunction.

EBay says that even a loss in the high court won't affect its business, arguing that it has made changes to the site that no longer touch on the patent in question.

But a ruling could have big implications for the patent world and the disputes around them, as evidenced by the bevy of friend-of-the-court briefs on both sides of the case.

Time Warner Inc., Nokia Corp. and Yahoo Inc. sided with eBay. But General Electric Co., 3M Co., and Procter & Gamble Co., along with the Bush administration, lined up with the patent holder. Each side says a ruling contrary to its preferred side could stifle innovation.

The eBay case was brought over the auctioneer's "Buy It Now" feature, a button on the auction site that lets buyers who don't choose to bid immediately purchase an item at a higher, fixed price. Introduced during the 2000 holiday shopping season, it quickly became popular with eBay customers who simply had to have a certain product.

In 2001, eBay was sued by MercExchange LLC, Great Falls, Va., a company started by engineer and patent attorney Thomas Woolston in 1995, shortly before eBay first went online. According to court papers, Mr. Woolston lacked the capital to launch the business himself but entered negotiations with eBay hoping for an arrangement where he could turn MercExchange from an idea into reality. EBay was only willing to consider buying MercExchange's patents, and those negotiations fell through.

Mr. Woolston prevailed on some infringement claims and won $29.5 million in damages. But the trial judge, Jerome Friedman of U.S. District Court in Norfolk, Va., refused to grant an injunction prohibiting eBay from using the business method underlying the Buy It Now feature.

But the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, the specialized court in Washington that hears patent appeals, said last year that an injunction should have been imposed. The appeals court said Judge Friedman had applied too high a standard for MercExchange to win an injunction. Among other reasons, "a general concern regarding business-method patents ... is not the type of important public need that justifies the unusual step of denying injunctive relief," Judge William Bryson wrote for a unanimous three-member panel.

Some technology companies siding with eBay, such as chip giant Intel Corp., want to see more judges use their discretion to withhold injunctions -- particularly in cases where a single patent could be used to block sales of a product like a computer chip containing thousands of patented inventions. David Simon, Intel's chief patent counsel, says it stopped counting the number of Intel patents covering its microprocessors when the number reached 1,500. "Now you have this person with one patent, and he can shut it down," Mr. Simon says. "It doesn't seem quite equitable."

DOJ_NMG_0023501

Rembrandt IP Management, a Bala Cynwyd, Pa., company that invests in patents, opposed eBay in its supporting brief. Rembrandt said that entities such as itself play a "valuable role" in a free-enterprise system where property rights including intellectual property can be "freely tradable." They "allow inventors to concentrate on inventing while the [non-practicing entity] realizes the value of the patent through licensing and enforcement," Rembrandt said.

EBay acknowledges that injunctions are allowed under the Patent Act, as exemplified in the patent dispute that ended earlier this month when Research in Motion Ltd. of Waterloo, Ontario, agreed to pay $612.5 million in a settlement with Virginia-based patent holding company NTP Inc. or face an injunction that could have shut down RIM's BlackBerry email devices.

In the eBay case, underpinning MercExchange's argument was the century-old paper-bag case. The patent holder, Eastern Paper Bag Co., never used the invention, but rival Continental Paper Bag Co. was found to have done so, aiding a burgeoning retail industry that increasingly relied on providing customers easy ways to carry their purchases home.

The high court found no problem in denying society access to more efficiently produced self-opening paper bags. Justice McKenna wrote that the right to suppress use of one's invention was "the very essence of the right conferred by the patent, as it is the privilege of any owner of property to use it or not use it, without question of motive."

In its present day appeal over U.S. Patent No. 5,845,265, eBay argues that Continental Bag doesn't support the broad presumption for injunctions as applied by the Federal Circuit -- and if it does, then the 1908 case should be overruled.

The number of patents has grown tenfold, and "the relevant economic contexts have changed dramatically since Continental Bag was decided," eBay's brief argues. "As goods and services in our economy have become increasingly complex and technology has advanced, a patent holder's ability to leverage and abuse an automatic entitlement to an injunction has increased," the company argues.

MercExchange argues that reversing the Federal Circuit would impose a greater drag on innovation, diminishing the value of patents by effectively forcing inventors to license their discoveries to infringing rivals. "There is no good reason for this court to depart from Continental Paper Bag or the almost 100 years of precedent that followed it," its brief says. "Congress has chosen to 'promote progress' not by imposing a use requirement but by granting patent holders a statutory 'right to exclude' in return for disclosure of an invention." That injunctions give patent holders, even nonpracticing ones, leverage is precisely the point, MercExchange argues.

EBay, meanwhile, has pursued a dual strategy in this case, which received a significant lift last Friday. Under a re-examination of MercExchange's '265 patent, the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office rejected MercExchange's claims. It is the second time that the U.S. Patent office has rejected MercExchange's patent claims under re-examination.

Justices To Hear EBay Patent Challenge (WT)

By Tom Ramstack

The Washington Times, March 29, 2006

The U.S. Supreme Court is scheduled to hear arguments today in a case involving Internet auctioneer EBay Inc. that is testing the methods patent owners use to protect their inventions.

The small Internet commerce company MercExchange LLC is trying to enforce an injunction against EBay to prevent the billion-dollar company from using the "Buy it now" software that lets customers purchase fixed-price items over the Internet. MercExchange says it owns the rights to that software under two patents.

The Supreme Court has agreed to decide the extent to which court orders can be used to protect patent rights. Injunctions are a fundamental tool of the patent system, allowing inventors to stop others from copying their technology.

Large companies like EBay say they sometimes are forced to pay off people who hold questionable patents merely to avoid the time and expense of lawsuits. They refer to the people and small companies that sue them seeking settlements as "patent trolls."

"They are in the business of filing lawsuits, not of inventing new products," said a coalition of technology companies led by the Business Software Alliance.

"Patent litigation firms typically do not assert infringement claims until the target of the claim has brought a product to market or a standard has been finalized by a standard-setting organization," the group said in a legal brief filed in support of EBay. "The reason for this behavior is simple: It maximizes the value of the infringement claim."

Unnecessary patent litigation inhibits innovation and development of new products, the business coalition said.

Companies that sue for infringement and independent inventors say they are merely protecting their patent rights, which they say are essential to private enterprise.

A brief filed by an independent inventors group countered that large corporations want courts to protect intellectual property rights "only for themselves and companies like theirs."

Patent experts say the case could play a pivotal role in determining how U.S. courts handle intellectual property rights.

"Injunctions are important to the private property system," said John Dudas, administrator of the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office, who spoke to students at Fort Hunt Elementary School in Alexandria yesterday.

The Bush administration filed a brief that largely supports an injunction in favor of MercExchange, saying that maintaining the integrity of the patent system should take precedence over the convenience of parties with a stake in the case.

Mr. Dudas said a problem with patent litigation is determining whether patent owners are merely seeking easy money or valid protection of their rights.

"It's hard to distinguish that," he said.

Even patent lawyers agree that the expense of litigation can be excessive.

Legal expenses for patent lawsuits can sometimes reach $100,000 per month, said Fred H. Perkins, a patent lawyer with Morrison Cohen LLP. Some of his clients give up rather than pay the legal bills.

Mr. Perkins described lawsuits by patent litigation firms as "a serious problem."

The EBay appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court case follows a recent court battle involving McLean-based patent holder NTP Inc., which sought an injunction against Research In Motion Ltd. from selling its popular BlackBerry wireless e-mail devices.

Research in Motion settled the case for $612.5 million after a judge made it known that he would grant an injunction to NTP.

EBay is contesting a decision by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit that upheld an injunction requested by MercExchange. EBay says federal judges should have more discretion to deny injunctions and award money to patent holders instead.

The Supreme Court is expected to issue a ruling in the EBay case later this year.

EU Warns Microsoft Over Vista (WSJ)

By Mary Jacoby

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

BRUSSELS -- The European Union's top antitrust regulator has sent a letter to Microsoft Corp., warning the company that it won't be allowed to sell its new Windows Vista operating system in Europe if it comes prepackaged with certain features.

"We expect that Microsoft will design Vista in a way which is in line with the European competition laws," Neelie Kroes, the EU's antitrust commissioner, said in an interview. "It would be rather stupid to design something that is not."

Ms. Kroes said she sent Microsoft Chief Executive Steve Ballmer a letter last week outlining her concerns, which mirror those in a continuing, seven-year-long dispute between the EU and Microsoft over software packaged with its current Windows operating system.

Microsoft spokesman Tom Brookes said the company wasn't aware of the March 20 letter and was therefore unable to comment on the EU's specific concerns. "However, consumers are demanding a more secure, functional operating system. And Microsoft has developed Vista to respond to that demand, while respecting its legal responsibilities," said Mr. Brookes.

The EU notice follows Microsoft's announcement last week that it would delay release of Vista until January because it needs more time to test the software.

Ms. Kroes's spokesman, Jonathan Todd, said that the EU is concerned about Microsoft's plans for Internet search. Though Mr. Todd didn't elaborate, Google Inc. and other Internet-search services have said they are concerned that Microsoft could use its Internet Explorer 7 Web browser to unfairly direct computer users to Microsoft's own search service. Microsoft says it will include ways to set the browser to its competitors' services.

EU regulators have also warned Microsoft against putting certain software-security functions into the Vista system, according to Mr. Todd.

Symantec Corp., a Cupertino, Calif., maker of antivirus software, has told EU regulators it is worried that Microsoft could include antivirus software in Vista, making it automatically available to all users who boot up a new Vista-powered PC. That would put Symantec's products at a disadvantage, the company has said.

Microsoft says it has no plans to bundle antivirus software into Vista. But the company will include a tool called Windows Defender in the new operating system, which is designed to eliminate so-called spy-ware that secretly monitors activity by computer users or can use computers to perform malevolent tasks.

In February a group of rivals including International Business Machines Inc., Sun Microsystems Inc. and Oracle Corp., filed a formal complaint asking EU regulators to ensure Microsoft doesn't fold a variety of other functions into Vista.

Among the group's concerns: that the company could fold so-called digital rights management software into Vista, according to people familiar with the complaint. Such software allows users to restrict access to documents they have created. Microsoft's version would encode documents, PowerPoint presentations and spreadsheets so they could be opened only by other Microsoft users, according to these people. That could put companies like Sun at a disadvantage.

DOJ_NMG_0023503

Beginning tomorrow, the European Commission, the EU's executive arm, will hold closed-door administrative hearings to decide whether Microsoft has complied with certain aspects of a March 2004 antitrust order.

In that 2004 decision, the EU fined Microsoft about $600 million, and ordered it to sell in Europe a version of its Windows XP computer operating system without its audio-visual software attached. The EU also ordered the Redmond, Wash., software maker to produce a kind of instruction manual for rival companies trying to write software that meshes with Windows.

The commission has accused Microsoft of not complying with the order to write the how-to manual for its competitors. After hearings tomorrow and Friday, it could decide to fine the company $100 million or more in new penalties. In April, an EU court in Luxembourg is scheduled to hear Microsoft's appeal of the underlying March 2004 charges.

In the interview, Ms. Kroes said she hadn't decided yet whether to open a new, formal investigation of Microsoft and the Vista system.

Microsoft Cuts Internet Dial-Up Price To Lure AOL Users (WP)

By Sara Kehaulani Goo

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

Microsoft Corp.'s MSN made an aggressive bid yesterday to take dial-up Internet subscribers from America Online Inc., announcing that it would cut the price of a service that has been dwindling in popularity.

Microsoft's price cut, to $17.95 a month from $21.95 for a dial-up service that includes e-mail, parental monitoring and photo services, is a sharp departure from AOL's strategy of pushing dial-up customers to switch to broadband. Last month, Dulles-based AOL announced that it would increase the monthly fee it charges its dial-up subscribers by $2, to $25.90. The AOL price increase began taking effect earlier this month.

The long-term market for subscribers who log on to the Internet the old-fashioned way is not bright, as consumers switch to faster broadband service. The price war reflects the fierce competition for consumers among online portals that want to serve as users' home pages.

"We definitely think there's some opportunity for AOL dial-up subscribers to explore alternatives when they see a price increase," said Kevin Mizuhara, director of marketing for MSN Access dial-up service. "While it's a declining market, we do believe there's going to be a continued market for dial-up access."

As of 2005, 68 percent of North American households had Internet service, and that number is projected to be 78 percent by 2010, Forrester Research said. The company forecasts that by 2010, 62 percent of U.S. households will have broadband service, indicating that access to broadband and price will encourage many users to drop the slower dial-up service. There are more than 30 million dial-up households, Forrester said.

When AOL announced plans to raise its fees for dial-up service, the move was viewed as an effort to push subscribers into signing up for AOL's broadband services, which are bundled with Internet service providers via cable or DSL and offered for the new $25.90 price. AOL's base of dial-up subscribers has been shrinking rapidly; 7 million customers have dropped out in the past few years. By squeezing the difference between dial-up and broadband prices, AOL figured it could get its customers to upgrade.

An AOL spokeswoman declined to comment on the results of those efforts and about the competition from MSN.

For now, analyst Charles Golvin said, there are still a healthy number of dial-up users to make it worth MSN's effort. But the difficulty, he said, will be to convince AOL subscribers that it is worth the extra effort to change their e-mail address and contact lists to save a few bucks a month.

"People don't like to have to send an e-mail telling everyone about their new e-mail address," said Golvin, principal analyst at Forrester. "It's a really sticky point."

MSN said it will begin an online marketing campaign to lure AOL users and emphasize that those who switch can still keep some of their most treasured features of AOL: instant messaging and buddy lists.

Raycom Media Sells 12 TV Stations To Barrington Broadcasting (BIRMBIZ)

Birmingham (AL) Business Journal, March 29, 2006

Raycom Media Inc. and Barrington Broadcasting Corp. announced jointly that Barrington is buying 12 Raycom television stations in nine markets.

Barrington Broadcasting, which is based in Hoffman Estates, Ill., will pay a total of $262 million for the stations.

The transaction is subject to approval by the Federal Communications Commission and the Justice Department.

Barrington Broadcasting Corp. is part of the Pilot Group, a private equity firm.

The stations being acquired by Barrington include five NBC affiliates (WNWO-TV, Toledo, Ohio; WSTM-TV, Syracuse, N.Y.; WPBN-TV and WTOM-TV, Traverse City-Cheboygan, Mich.; and WLUC-TV, Marquette, Mich.), three FOX affiliates

DOJ_NMG_0023504

(WACH-TV, Columbia, S.C.; KXRM-TV, Colorado Springs, Colo.; and WFXL-TV, Albany, Ga.), two UPN affiliates (WSTQ, Syracuse, N.Y., and KXTU, Colorado Springs), one CBS affiliate (KGBT-TV, Harlingen, Texas) and one ABC affiliate (KTVO-TV, Kirksville, Mo).

Barrington president K. James Yager said in the companies' news release that Barrington Broadcasting looks forward to "working with the Raycom employees and managers at the stations we are acquiring. We believe these properties are a natural extension of our existing portfolio of stations in similarly sized markets."

Based in Montgomery, Raycom currently owns and operates 49 television stations in 22 states. Those stations cover more than 12.7 percent of U.S. households with televisions.

Cargill's Bid For Degussa Unit To Be Cleared By EU, People Say (BLOOM)

By Matthew Newman

Bloomberg, March 29, 2006

March 28 (Bloomberg) -- European Union regulators will clear plans by Cargill Inc., the largest U.S. agricultural company, to buy the food ingredients unit of German chemical maker Degussa AG, three people familiar with the investigation said.

The European Commission, the 25-nation EU's antitrust regulator in Brussels, will approve the transaction without asking for divestments, said the people, who declined to be identified because the ruling hasn't been made public. The decision will be announced tomorrow, the people said.

``The deal will help Degussa because they are selling off some assets to pay down debt,'' Andrew Benson, a chemicals analyst at Citigroup in London, said in a telephone interview.

Cargill, based in Wayzata, Minnesota, agreed to buy the maker of candy and drink flavors on Sept. 9 for $671 million as part of a plan to expand its range of ingredients for baked and dairy products, beverages, chocolates and other foods. The Degussa unit is the world's biggest supplier of lecithin, a soybean derivative used to enhance flavor and improve the shelf life of food.

The commission started an in-depth probe into the transaction on Dec. 14, saying the deal would combine two of the four leading suppliers of lecithin. The regulator said at the time that it wanted to ensure that customers such as food manufacturers wouldn't be harmed by the reduction in competition.

Early Clearance

The EU, which has until May 3 to reach a decision, will clear the case early because concerns about the lecithin market have been addressed, the people said.

Reinhard Scheiler, a spokesman at Degussa, the world's biggest specialty chemicals maker, had no comment. London-based Cargill spokeswoman Geraldine O'Shea also declined comment, as did commission spokesman Jonathan Todd.

The purchase of the unit from Dusseldorf, Germany-based Degussa would be the largest for Cargill since the 1.2 billion-euro ($1.4 billion) acquisition of Cerestar, a French maker of specialty starches and sweeteners, in 2002.

On March 20, RAG AG, which controls more than 95 percent of Degussa, asked the chemical company to arrange for the transfer of the remaining shares outstanding. Closely held RAG is buying Degussa as it changes focus from unprofitable mining to chemicals, power production and apartments.

The Problem With Patents (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

The Supreme Court will consider its second big patent case in a week today when oral arguments are heard in eBay v. MercExchange. While a technical case in some respects, the dispute is more important as another sign that there's something rotten in the U.S. patent system.

When the patent system works, it rewards entrepreneurs and inventors, encourages innovation and serves as a bulwark of property rights. The Founding Fathers considered patents important enough to provide for them in the Constitution. But the Founders left the implementation of patent rights up to Congress, which in turn vested patent authority in the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office and the courts. And there's the free-market rub.

The Constitution grants Congress the power to protect the rights of patent and copyright holders, but only "for limited times" and to "promote the progress of science and useful arts." It does not, by contrast, grant Congress the power to confer the right to real or personal property "to promote the cultivation of land" or "the accumulation of wealth." This distinction is important because royal patents in Britain were often granted to provide the favorites of the crown with a legal monopoly, and the Founders did not want Congress in that business. Patent rights are good insofar as they are useful, and the analogy with real or personal property goes only so far.

DOJ_NMG_0023505

A patent system, in turn, is only as good as the quality of patents that issue from it. If bad or dubious patents proliferate, they can have the opposite of their intended effect, which is to promote and reward innovation. Some of our free-market friends are so attached to patents as a vanguard of private property in theory that they ignore that the Patent Office is vulnerable to the usual failings and perverse incentives of any other government bureaucracy.

Which brings us back to the Supreme Court. A patent case last week involved Metabolite, which holds the right to license a blood test for vitamin B-12. But the patent also covers the relationship between B-12 and homocysteine, and between high homocysteine levels in the blood and heart disease. A patent on a blood test is a good thing. A patent on the relationship between a medical condition and what the test reveals is not. We hope the Supreme Court will come to the same conclusion.

Today's case, eBay v. MercExchange, turns on a purely technical question in the aftermath of a patent-infringement suit that eBay lost in 2003. The case concerns how much leeway judges should have in granting or denying permanent injunctions in patent cases. In the underlying litigation, the judge denied MercExchange's application for an injunction against eBay, arguing that the balance of interests did not support granting an injunction simply to give MercExchange leverage in any future licensing negotiations with eBay.

We don't have space to list the arguments for or against a possible injunction specifically against eBay, which in any case claims to have obviated the question by having "designed around" MercExchange's patent. But the larger issue of judicial discretion is the important one. The Patent Office is issuing an ever-increasing number of patents, and judicial discretion can be a useful constraint on patent abuse, especially when injunctions may cause undo harm to businesses and consumers. That is what we hope the Court will conclude.

Neither case will fix what's broken with the U.S. patent system, however. Bruce Lehman, Patent Office commissioner through much of the 1990s, once summed up the problem when he said, "We are the patent office, not the rejection office."

The Patent Office itself gets paid when it grants a patent, creating pressure on the staff to keep the money coming in. Patent examiners' bonuses are also based in part on the number of files they close in a year. But the only way to close a file for good is to grant the patent because an application that's been denied can always be modified and resubmitted, and frequently is. So examiners have a direct financial stake in closing application files by green-lighting the patent.

Today the Patent Office grants so many patents that half of the fees it generates are given back to the Treasury to spend on other things. Next month, Congressman Lamar Smith (R., Texas) will hold hearings on a patent-reform bill that has many good qualities, such as allowing third parties to submit evidence of "prior art" to show that an alleged innovation is not in fact novel -- before the patent is granted. It would also allow administrative review of questionable patents after they've been granted but before an infringement lawsuit is filed.

If this Congress wants to claim credit for doing something to help the economy ahead of November's elections, addressing the patent system would be a good place to start.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

How Environmentalists Lost The Battle Over TCE (LAT)

By Ralph Vartabedian

The Los Angeles Times, March 29, 2006

After massive underground plumes of an industrial solvent were discovered in the nation's water supplies, the Environmental Protection Agency mounted a major effort in the 1990s to assess how dangerous the chemical was to human health.

Following four years of study, senior EPA scientists came to an alarming conclusion: The solvent, trichloroethylene, or TCE, was as much as 40 times more likely to cause cancer than the EPA had previously believed.

The preliminary report in 2001 laid the groundwork for tough new standards to limit public exposure to TCE. Instead of triggering any action, however, the assessment set off a high-stakes battle between the EPA and Defense Department, which had more than 1,000 military properties nationwide polluted with TCE.

By 2003, after a prolonged challenge orchestrated by the Pentagon, the EPA lost control of the issue and its TCE assessment was cast aside. As a result, any conclusion about whether millions of Americans were being contaminated by TCE was delayed indefinitely.

What happened with TCE is a stark illustration of a power shift that has badly damaged the EPA's ability to carry out one of its essential missions: assessing the health risks of toxic chemicals.

The agency's authority and its scientific stature have been eroded under a withering attack on its technical staff by the military and its contractors. Indeed, the Bush administration leadership at the EPA ultimately sided with the military.

DOJ_NMG_0023506

After years on the defensive, the Pentagon — with help from NASA and the Energy Department — is taking a far tougher stand in challenging calls for environmental cleanups. It is using its formidable political leverage to demand greater proof that industrial substances cause cancer before ratcheting up costly cleanups at polluted bases.

The military says it is only striving to make smart decisions based on sound science and accuses the EPA of being unduly influenced by left-leaning scientists.

But critics say the defense establishment has manufactured unwarranted scientific doubt, used its powerful role in the executive branch to cause delays and forced a reduction in the margins of protection that traditionally guard public health.

If the EPA's 2001 draft risk assessment was correct, then possibly thousands of the nation's birth defects and cancers every year are due in part to TCE exposure, according to several academic experts.

"It is a World Trade Center in slow motion," said Boston University epidemiologist David Ozonoff, a TCE expert. "You would never notice it."

Senior officials in the Defense Department say much remains unknown about TCE.

"We are all forgetting the facts on the table," said Alex A. Beehler, the Pentagon's top environmental official. "Meanwhile, we have done everything we can to curtail use of TCE."

But in the last four years, the Pentagon, with help from the Energy Department and NASA, derailed tough EPA action on such water contaminants as the rocket fuel ingredient perchlorate. In response, state regulators in California and elsewhere have moved to impose their own rules.

The stakes are even higher with TCE. Half a dozen state, federal and international agencies classify TCE as a probable carcinogen.

California EPA regulators consider TCE a known carcinogen and issued their own 1999 risk assessment that reached the same conclusion as federal EPA regulators: TCE was far more toxic than previous scientific studies indicated.

TCE is the most widespread water contaminant in the nation. Huge swaths of California, New York, Texas and Florida, among other states, lie over TCE plumes. The solvent has spread under much of the San Gabriel and San Fernando valleys, as well as the shuttered El Toro Marine Corps base in Orange County.

Developed by chemists in the late 19th century, TCE was widely used to degrease metal parts and then dumped into nearby disposal pits at industrial plants and military bases, where it seeped into aquifers.

The public is exposed to TCE in several ways, including drinking or showering in contaminated water and breathing air in homes where TCE vapors have intruded from the soil. Limiting such exposures, even at current federal regulatory levels, requires elaborate treatment facilities that cost billions of dollars annually. In addition, some cities, notably Los Angeles, have high ambient levels of TCE in the air.

An internal Air Force report issued in 2003 warned that the Pentagon alone has 1,400 sites contaminated with TCE.

Among those, at least 46 have involved large-scale contamination or significant exposure to humans at military bases, according to a list compiled by the Natural Resources New Service, an environmental group based in Washington.

The Air Force was convinced that the EPA would toughen its allowable limit of TCE in drinking water of 5 parts per billion by at least fivefold. The service was already spending $5 billion a year to clean up TCE at its bases and tougher standards would drive that up by another $1.5 billion, according to an Air Force document. Some outside experts said that estimate was probably low.

After the EPA issued the draft assessment, the Pentagon, Energy Department and NASA appealed their case directly to the White House. TCE has also contaminated 23 sites in the Energy Department's nuclear weapons complex — including Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory in the Bay Area, and NASA centers, including the Jet Propulsion Laboratory in La Cañada Flintridge.

The agencies argued that the EPA had produced junk science, its assumptions were badly flawed and that evidence exonerating TCE was ignored. They argued that the EPA could not be trusted to move ahead on its own and that top leaders in the agency did not have control of their own bureaucracy.

Bush administration appointees in the EPA — notably research director Paul Gilman — sided with the Pentagon and agreed to pull back the risk assessment. The matter was referred for a lengthy study by the National Academy of Sciences, which is due to issue a new report this summer. Any resolution of the cancer risk TCE poses will take years and any new regulation could take even longer.

The delay tactics have angered Republicans and Democrats who represent contaminated communities, where residents in some cases have elevated rates of cancer and birth defects but no direct proof that their illness is tied to TCE.

Half a dozen members of Congress last year wrote to the EPA, demanding that it issue interim standards for TCE, instead of waiting years while scientific battles are waged between competing federal agencies. EPA leaders have rejected those demands.

DOJ_NMG_0023507

"The evidence on TCE is overwhelming," said Dr. Gina Solomon, an environmental medicine expert at UC San Francisco and a scientist at the Natural Resources Defense Council. "We have 80 epidemiological studies and hundreds of toxicology studies. They are fairly consistent in finding cancer risks that cover a range of tumors. It is hard to make all that human health risk go away."

But Raymond F. DuBois, former deputy undersecretary of Defense for installations and environment in the Bush administration, said the Pentagon had not been willing to accept whatever came out of the EPA, though it cared a great deal about base contamination.

"If you go down two or three levels in EPA, you have an awful lot of people that came onboard during the Clinton administration, to be perfectly blunt about it, and have a different approach than I do at Defense," DuBois said. "It doesn't mean I don't respect their opinions or judgments, but I have an obligation where our scientists question their scientists to bring it to the surface."

The military has virtually eliminated its use of TCE, purchasing only 11 gallons last year, said Beehler, an attorney who used to head environmental affairs for Koch Industries Inc., a large industrial conglomerate in Wichita, Kan.

In its fight against the 2001 risk assessment, the Pentagon has gone to the very fundamentals of cancer research: toxicology, the study of poisons; and epidemiology, the science of how diseases are distributed in the population. This scientific approach has worked better than past arguments that cleanups are a costly diversion from the Pentagon's mission to defend U.S. security.

A few months after the 2001 draft risk assessment came out, an Air Force rebuttal charged that the EPA had "misrepresented" data from animal and human health studies.

It said "there is no convincing evidence" that some groups of people, like children and diabetics, are more susceptible to TCE, a key part of the EPA's report. And it said the EPA had failed to consider viewpoints from "scientists who believe that TCE does not represent a human cancer risk at levels reasonably expected in the environment."

But comments such as these are outside the scientific mainstream. Other federal agencies have also expressed grave concern about TCE and some experts say it is only a matter of time before the chemical is universally recognized as a known carcinogen.

"Do I think TCE causes cancer? Yes," said Ozonoff, the Boston University TCE expert. "There is lots of evidence. Is there a dispute about it? Yes. Whenever the stakes are high, that's when there will be disputes about the science."

The 2001 risk assessment found TCE was two to 40 times more likely to cause cancer than was found in an assessment conducted in 1986, a wide range that reflected many scientific uncertainties. Because cancer risk assessments are not an exact science, federal regulators have historically exercised great caution in protecting public health.

The California EPA, the nation's largest and best-funded state environment agency, assessed TCE in 1999 and also found reason for concern. Its risk assessment fell in the middle of the EPA risk range, according to the study's author, Joseph Brown.

Rodents fed TCE develop liver and kidney cancer, and humans exposed to TCE show elevated rates of many types of cancer and birth defects. But industry experts fire back that evidence on TCE is still weak. Just because rats and mice get cancer from high levels of TCE doesn't prove that humans will get cancer from low levels of TCE, they say. And the epidemiological research is less convincing than animal studies, they say.

The U.S. still uses about 100 tons of TCE annually, a fraction of the consumption before the mid-1980s, when it was first classified as a probable carcinogen. It was once widely used in consumer products, such as correction fluid for typewriters and spot cleaners.

"If TCE is a human carcinogen, it isn't much of one," said Paul Dugard, a toxicologist at the Halogenated Solvents Industry Alliance Inc., which represents TCE manufacturers. "People exposed at low levels shouldn't be concerned.

"EPA's philosophy is still one of being super conservative and that is being pushed back against."

EPA officials were braced for such a controversy when the TCE assessment was issued and quickly convened a scientific advisory board to review the work. The board included public health officials at state agencies, academics and chemical industry scientists.

About one year later, the board issued its findings, praising the risk assessment and urging the EPA to implement it as quickly as possible. But the board also suggested some changes, including stronger support for its calculations of TCE's health risks and a clearer disclosure of its underlying assumptions.

The report, particularly the request for additional work, was interpreted as a serious problem by Gilman, the EPA research director.

He said the board's findings represented a "red flag" and "raised very troubling issues," all of which were key arguments by Gilman and others for stopping the assessment.

DOJ_NMG_0023508

But members of the scientific advisory team dispute Gilman's interpretation, saying they felt the 2001 risk assessment was good science and their recommended changes amounted to normal commentary for such a complex matter.

"I thought by and large we supported the EPA and that its risk assessment could be modified to move forward," said Dr. Henry Anderson, the chairman of the scientific advisory board and a physician with the Wisconsin Division of Public Health. "That movement to shuttle the issue to the National Academy of Sciences was nothing like what we had in mind."

By 2004, the matter was out of the EPA's hands. The National Academy of Sciences received a $680,00 contract from the Energy Department to study TCE — a decision dictated by a working group at the White House. The briefings to the national academy on how to evaluate TCE were given by White House staff as well as the EPA.

The White House originally formed the working group — made up of officials from the Pentagon, Energy Department and NASA — in 2002 to combat the EPA's assessment of another pollutant, perchlorate. That group stayed in business to fight the TCE risk assessment. The group was co-chaired by officials in the Office of Management and Budget and the White House Office of Science and Technology Policy. The officials declined requests for interviews.

Given the controversy and stakes involved, the issue was bound to end up with National Academy of Sciences, said Peter Preuss, director of the National Center for Environmental Analysis, the EPA organization that produced the 2001 risk assessment. "It got very difficult to proceed," Preuss said.

The lead author of the 2001 health risk assessment, V. James Cogliano, agreed that the findings ran into trouble when Defense Department officials went to the White House. "Most of it was behind the scenes," said Cogliano, now a senior official at the International Agency for Research on Cancer in Lyon, France.

He added: "The degree of opposition was not surprising given the degree of economic interests involved."

The political maneuvering marked a significant change, Cogliano said. In the 1980s, Defense Department officials accepted every possible safeguard recommended by the EPA for incinerators to burn nerve gas and other chemical weapons, he recalled.

At that time, Defense Department officials said, "You put in every margin of safety, because we want to be sure it will be safe," he said. "There was no argument. There is a different spirit today."

Every health risk assessment is also getting more technically complex and more bureaucratically difficult, Preuss said.

When the EPA issued its first health risk assessment in 1976, it ran four pages and it was based in large part on studies that counted "bumps and lumps" on animals subjected to possible carcinogens. By contrast, EPA scientists now must show not only that a substance causes tumors, but the internal biological processes that are responsible. And the work is subject to greater scrutiny.

"It is true that there is more interagency review now of our work," Preuss said. "We have a couple steps where we send our assessments to the White House and they distribute them to other agencies. Each year, additional steps are taken."

All of the EPA's travails — the toughened scientific demands, the loss of authority, the interagency battles — have clearly taken a heavy toll and diminished the agency's stature.

"Inside the Beltway, it is an accepted fact that the science of EPA is not good," said Gilman, now director of the Oak Ridge Center for Advanced Studies in Tennessee, which conducts broad research on energy, the environment and other areas of science. Gilman said an entire consulting industry has sprung up in Washington to attack the EPA and sow seeds of doubt about its capabilities.

The delays in assessing TCE have also left many contaminated communities with few answers.

"My constituents who live at a recently named Superfund site … are forced to live everyday with contaminated groundwater, soil and air and can't afford to wait the years it would take for the results of your outsourced re-review," Rep. Sue W. Kelly (R-N.Y.) told EPA officials at a hearing last year.

"I have talked to a lot of sick people," said Rep. Maurice D. Hinchey (D-N.Y.), whose district includes hundreds of homes contaminated by TCE vapors, traced to an IBM Corp. factory. IBM has paid for air filtration systems for 400 homes, but has balked at more funding based on uncertainty over the health risk. "These people are deeply frustrated and increasingly angry," Hinchey said.

Meanwhile, many environmentalists are discouraged by what they view as a virtual emasculation of the EPA in this battle.

"The general public has no idea this is happening," said Erik Olson, a lawyer at the Natural Resources Defense Council. "The Defense Department has succeeded in undermining the basic scientific process at EPA. The DoD is the biggest polluter in the United States and they have made major investments to undercut the EPA."

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

The military and TCE

DOJ_NMG_0023509

About 1,400 Defense Department sites across the nation are contaminated with trichloroethylene, or TCE, including military bases and depots. The map shows sites that have some of the heaviest contamination or were studied for possibly causing health hazards. A sampling of problems nationwide:

Contaminated sites

McClellan Air Force Base, Sacramento:

The Pentagon is cleaning up 12 different TCE plumes affecting about 25% of the former base's property. About a half dozen public water wells have been shut and the cleanup is expected to continue for decades.

*

F.E. Warren Air Force Base, Cheyenne, Wyo.:

TCE was discovered at 13 decommissioned Atlas missile silos in Wyoming, Colorado and Nebraska. Contamination at some of the sites reached 3,500 parts per billion. TCE polluted an aquifer that Cheyenne, Wyo., planned to use as a municipal water source.

*

Twin Cities Army Ammunition Plant, Arden Hills, Minn.:

A TCE plume covered 25 square miles and spread to private residential wells. The water supply for a nearby trailer park contained 720 parts per billion TCE. The site is now undergoing a cleanup under Superfund program supervision.

*

Stratford Army Engine Plant, Stratford, Conn.:

Elevated TCE vapors were discovered in several buildings the Army planned to lease to private concerns. Federal health authorities judged the vapors too high for general public exposure. A cleanup is underway.

*

El Toro Marine Corps Air Station, Irvine, Calif.:

TCE contaminated the groundwater under the base, now closed, which long ago complicated plans to reuse the property for private housing and a public park. The government will retain about 900 contaminated acres to continue cleanup for the indefinite future.

*

Kelly Air Force Base, San Antonio:

TCE use at the shuttered aircraft repair depot contaminated a shallow aquifer that has migrated about 4 miles off the base, through a low-income neighborhood. Health authorities have found elevated rates of cancer and birth defects in the neighborhood.

*

Anniston Army Depot, Anniston, Ala.:

Extremely high concentrations of TCE, up to 200,000 parts per billion, were found by government investigators in groundwater under the depot, which included a number of dumps, a plating plant and other industrial activities. TCE levels above allowable drinking water standards have been found at springs and wells on the base.

*

Camp Lejeune, N.C.:

Tens of thousands of Marine families were exposed to TCE in the base's drinking water supply. A preliminary study has found elevated rates of leukemia among children conceived at the base. The TCE was discovered in 1980 but not disclosed until 1985.

*

Sources: Agency for Toxic Substances and Disease Registry, U.S. Environmental Protection Agency, Natural Resources News Service, Associated Press, California Department of Toxic Substances Control. Graphics reporting by Tom Reinken, Ralph Vartabedian

G.A.O. Sees Loss In Oil Royalties Of At Least $20 Billion (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 28 — Incentives for oil and gas companies that drill in the Gulf of Mexico will cost the federal government at least $20 billion over the next 25 years, according to the draft of a Congressional report obtained on Tuesday.

The new estimates, prepared by the Government Accountability Office, also warn that $80 billion in revenue could be lost over the same period if oil and gas companies won a new lawsuit that seeks a further reduction in their royalty payments.

DOJ_NMG_0023510

The report, delivered in a private briefing late Monday to House and Senate staff members, startled some of the program's longtime supporters and infuriated some critics.

The report is the first attempt by a government agency to calculate the soaring costs of a 10-year-old program that was created to encourage deepwater drilling when energy prices were low.

The program, known as royalty relief, allows companies to avoid paying the government royalties on much of what they produce from federal leases in deepwater areas of the gulf.

The Interior Department acknowledged last month that it would forgo about $7 billion in royalties over the next five years — even though it expected energy prices to remain near record highs.

The G.A.O., the nonpartisan investigative arm of Congress, came up with much higher cost estimates but over a longer stretch of time.

On a related matter, the agency's investigators cautiously endorsed the Interior Department's explanation about why royalty collections for natural gas had climbed far more slowly than market prices.

Such royalties were almost no higher in 2005, when gas prices reached records, than in 2001.

The New York Times reported in January that the main reason appeared to be a widening gap between the sales prices that companies were reporting to the government and the prices they were reporting to their own shareholders.

The G.A.O. disputed that, saying that the weak revenue collections last year appeared to result primarily from a decline in gas production that was more severe than the drop indicated in the Interior Department's published statistics.

The G.A.O. said the Interior Department's explanation was "quick and reasonable," and that royalties in 2005 had been held down by both a general decline in offshore production and the damage wrought by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

But the Congressional office cautioned that its analysis was based on a reshuffling by the Interior Department's Minerals Management Service of its published royalty statistics.

"We conducted limited verification of M.M.S. data and did not audit the accuracy of underlying M.M.S. records," the G.A.O. said.

On the larger question of the overall cost of royalty relief, the G.A.O. noted that the Interior Department, which runs the offshore leasing program, had never carried out a "robust" cost-benefit analysis of the original program or of incentives added in the last five years.

In what the G.A.O. said was a preliminary analysis, it estimated that the government would lose about $20 billion as a result of leases already signed.

But that loss would quadruple to $80 billion if the suit by energy companies succeeded.

In the lawsuit, filed by Kerr-McGee Exploration and Production the company argues that the Interior Department does not have the authority to suspend the royalty incentives if prices for oil and gas climb above certain "threshold" levels.

Members of Congress, including some who have supported the energy industry, said the G.A.O. figures raised new questions about the royalty relief program.

"I am extremely concerned about information that has recently come to light," Senator Jeff Bingaman, Democrat of New Mexico, the ranking minority member of the Senate Energy Committee, wrote in a letter on Tuesday to the departing interior secretary, Gale A. Norton.

"I write to inquire as to what you plan to do to address this situation and these significant potential losses to the taxpayers of our nation."

Critics of the program said they were infuriated.

"Every day, the news for taxpayers gets unbelievably worse," said Representative Carolyn B. Maloney, Democrat of New York, who has assailed the royalty-collection program for years. "When will we put a stop to this?"

The actual cost of such royalty relief has been shrouded in mystery almost since its inception.

Last month, the Interior Department confirmed that the costs were about to soar as a result of leasing blunders in the late 1990's and a court decision in 2003.

The G.A.O.'s most optimistic prediction calls for a loss to the government of $20 billion in royalties, even though this assumes that energy prices will be above the "threshold levels" over the next 25 years.

Half of that stems from a blunder during the Clinton administration, when officials omitted the price-threshold restriction from all offshore leases signed in 1998 and 1999.

The other half results from the legal victory by energy companies in 2003, which more than doubled the amount of royalty-free oil and gas they could produce.

But those costs would be eclipsed if Kerr-McGee won its new lawsuit against the Bush administration. The G.A.O. estimated that a Kerr-McGee victory would cost $60 billion over 25 years, on top of the $20 billion the government is already expected to give up.

The G.A.O. said it based its estimate on the assumption that crude oil would sell for about $45 a barrel, a level well below the $66.07 next-month futures price in New York on Tuesday, and that oil and gas prices would climb 2.1 percent a year.

American Indians Cite Voter Intimidation (AP)

By MARY CLARE JALONICK, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 29, 2006

LAKE ANDES, S.D. — American Indian Charon Asetoyer says that when she went to vote a few years ago, a white man gave her the finger and asked her in vulgar terms what she was doing there.

She says she told him she had a right to vote, and she went back to her car to wait for him to leave. Only when he sped away did she walk inside.

"It's outright racism," said Asetoyer, who lives on the Yankton Sioux Indian Reservation in impoverished Charles Mix County, where Indians are about one-third of the population.

While the federal Voting Rights Act has brought them a long way from the days when some states required that they be "civilized" to cast ballots, many Indians around the country say they still face intimidation, restrictive voting requirements and long distances to reach polling places.

During the 2004 election, Senate Democratic Leader Tom Daschle's campaign obtained a restraining order in Charles Mix County against GOP poll watchers, accusing them of intimidating Indian voters. The Republicans denied that, saying the move was purely political. Daschle lost to Republican John Thune.

With parts of the Voting Rights Act set to expire in 2007 unless Congress reauthorizes them, some Indians say that the current federal and state protections need to be preserved and strengthened, too.

They cite, for example, South Dakota's new voter identification law, which requires photo identification at the polls, a problem for many on the reservations who do not have IDs. The law permits those without identification to sign an affidavit, but opponents argue there is confusion about what is allowed. The American Civil Liberties Union has challenged other voter ID statutes seen as burdensome to Indians in Albuquerque, N.M., and Minnesota.

"The tribes are still very concerned about the targeted efforts to disenfranchise their vote," said Jacqueline Johnson, executive director of the National Congress of American Indians.

Some Indians want the Voting Rights Act changed to bring more counties around the country under closer federal scrutiny and to expand bilingual assistance at polling places. Other suggest a larger number of polling places, more Indian poll-watchers and more general oversight on Election Day.

"If those federal protections weren't there, Indians wouldn't have a chance at voting," said former Republican Sen. Ben Nighthorse Campbell of Colorado, a member of the Northern Cheyenne Tribe. "The law probably ought to go farther."

Chris Nelson, who as South Dakota's Republican secretary of state is chief election officer, pointed to a big increase in Indian turnout in the past few years and said he has seen little evidence of voter intimidation. Nelson said some federal protections on South Dakota's reservations could safely be removed.

Under the Voting Rights Act, changes in election policy in most of the South and other places around the country with a history of discrimination need the approval of the U.S. Justice Department. That list includes South Dakota's Shannon and Todd Counties, with large numbers of Indians.

But Nelson said: "Has the preclearance requirement done anything to improve the ability of Indians to vote in those counties? The answer is no."

The debate comes as Indians show growing electoral clout.

During the 2002 Senate race in South Dakota, Democratic Sen. Tim Johnson won re-election by 524 votes with help from a huge increase in turnout on reservations. In Washington state, a surge of Indian votes helped lift Democratic Sen. Maria Cantwell to victory in 2000. In Arizona, reservations helped seat Democratic Gov. Janet Napolitano in 2002.

Johnson said that Congress will have to maintain some protections to keep Indian voting levels high.

"There's still a lack of trust and confidence between Native Americans and state institutions," he said, "and keeping some federal oversight is something that Native Americans want to have."

Editorial: After Norton, Lowered Expectations (ICT)

Indian Country Today, March 29, 2006

In a C-SPAN television appearance after announcing her resignation, Interior Department Secretary Gale Norton mused that she had begun her tenure with a program of four "C's" but when she ended, they had been condensed to two. The fate of her buzzwords - "cooperation," "consultation" and the like - could stand as a metaphor for her six years in office. Whatever she had as a program, especially on Indian affairs, for better or worse contracted and stalled in the face of the administration's inertia.

DOJ_NMG_0023512

Environmentalists will remonstrate that she displayed energy in pushing bad policies. Oil and mineral leasing on public lands is way up. Her "Healthy Forests" initiative would open old-growth forests to logging. The National Park Service is refocusing on commercial recreation. Snowmobilers are bothering wildlife. This might be so, but we don't see much point in demonizing a pleasant lady who has had a rough few years and who was neither as bad nor as good as she might have wished to be.

On Indian issues, always our primary concern, Norton occasionally talked a good game but almost never delivered. We think she was well-intentioned, but her record should be a caution to her likely successor, Dirk Kempthorne. In his previous career as U.S. senator and governor of Idaho, Kempthorne seems to have avoided displays of hostility to Native interests. (There are more than enough politicians out there who haven't.) The Nez Perce in Idaho say he has worked well with them. But the obstacles in Washington, D.C., are very high to conducting a decent Indian policy. In the absence of concentrated attention, they might be almost insurmountable.

The first trap that engulfed Norton was the Cobell v. Norton lawsuit. The new secretary can look forward to replacing her in the heading as the lead defendant, just as when she replaced Bruce Babbitt. He can also anticipate an almost inevitable contempt citation from Judge Royce C. Lamberth unless he somehow manages to change the administration's legal strategy. We could never understand how Norton accepted the obstructionism that has marked the government's response to this suit, unless she had little control over a strategy dictated by the Justice Department. If any private person were involved in a suit where the judge kept issuing contempt citations over legal tactics, one would think the first step would be to fire the lawyers. (The second and third steps might be to sue them for malpractice and grieve them to their bar associations.)

Norton made a number of efforts to improve management of the Individual Indian Money trust accounts and overcome the absurd fractionation of payments that was the end result of the vicious Allotment Act of 1887 - which is at the heart of the problem. But her most publicized initiative wound up looking like a reshuffling of boxes on the BIA organization chart (with some mid-level pay raises).

The change in leadership provides a chance for a toting-up of the changes that have been made and maybe a push for an equitable settlement. It's not reassuring, however, to hear that Interior's supervision of all its oil and gas leasing has been deteriorating, since this is how the trust money vanished.

Norton made other unkept promises to the tribes that Kempthorne should honor. In a September 2002 interview with Indian Country Today, she talked about giving the tribes a greater role in managing their forests and in competing for "stewardship contracts" on other public lands. It sounded good, but we haven't seen much follow-up. That same year, she made a well-publicized trip with then-Agriculture Secretary Ann Veneman to the Klamath River basin to try to settle the notorious "water war." In the course of her "charm offensive," she promised the Klamath Indian tribes to restore forest land that was stolen in the allotment period and mismanaged ever since. They might still be talking, but the land has not yet been restored.

Overall, it's hard to avoid the impression that Norton and the Bush administration simply lost interest in Indians after the 2004 election. Witness the leadership void at the BIA after the departure of Dave Anderson, or earlier. We grant that the office of assistant Interior secretary of Indian Affairs might be the single-worst job in the federal government, but there is still something wrong when it has been vacant for at least a third of Norton's tenure. Indian voices are markedly silent at the highest levels of Indian policy-making. And it's showing.

The anti-Indian campaign is growing more strident and vicious, but Indian country has the strong sense that no one in the administration is truly committed to protecting Native interests. We hear that Norton was appropriately frosty when Connecticut Attorney General Richard Blumenthal tried to engage in a bit of illegal ex parte lobbying on recognition decisions. But the lower levels show every sign of having caved in to his sort of political pressure. The reversals of recognition for New England tribes over the past year, starting with the Nipmuc Nation decision, have been nothing less than an insult to our intelligence. They changed the rules mid-stream, applied impossible standards of evidence and showed such a malignant predisposition that we look forward to the forthcoming Administrative Procedures Act lawsuits.

Compounding this revival of the "termination" spirit, the leading figure on Indian Affairs, Associate Deputy Interior Secretary James Cason has shown an arrogance in his personal dealings with the tribes worthy of the days of the Indian agents. It's not simply a case of cultural insensitivity. His behavior has been bad manners in any language.

This leadership vacuum has opened the way to suspicions of the worst sort of influence peddling. And yes, our own manners are not so good that we will leave Jack Abramoff unmentioned. His impact on Interior has yet to be fully explored. But this notorious scandal is not the only one to flare on Norton's watch. The full story of her tenure would have to explain the abrupt dismissal of Wayne Smith, the BIA's one-time No. 2 man; the curious concern of Stephen Griles over Louisiana Indian casinos; the dinner parties thrown by Italia Federici; the frustration of the Gun Lake Band and other incidents still below the surface.

DOJ_NMG_0023513

In the absence of a strong Indian advocate (Yes, we miss Kevin Gover), the host of lawyers, hustlers and casino sharpies now circling Indian country will do its best to corrupt that part of Interior's bureaucracy that has not been browbeaten and cowed by the vociferous anti-tribal lobby.

We don't think things are yet at this pass. Able people have been rising unscathed through the BIA's ranks. Some of the most breathless charges against it, such as the wanton granting of tribal recognition, have simply been false. But leadership at the top has been slipping. The most urgent task that Norton has left for Kempthorne in Indian policy is to rebuild a stable cadre of senior leaders drawn from Indian country and responsive to its needs.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Puerto Rico Asks Congress To Lean On FBI (WP)

By Elisabeth Goodridge

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Puerto Rico's attorney general asked Congress to pressure the FBI to cooperate with his investigation into raids by the bureau against independence advocates in the U.S. territory.

In a briefing for House Democrats, Attorney General Roberto J. Sanchez Ramos said Tuesday that bureau officials have stonewalled his investigation of an FBI raid that left one militant independence leader dead.

"Only through open and frank communication between Commonwealth and federal authorities can we hope to best service our common interest in the protection of our citizens," Sanchez Ramos said.

Rep. John Conyers of Michigan, the senior Democrat on the House Judiciary Committee, said he organized the briefing "to establish that there is a case."

In September 2005, FBI agents raided the house of Filiberto Ojeda Rios, a fugitive leader of a pro-independence militant group. Witnesses and his widow allege that the FBI shot Ojeda Rios and let him bleed to death. The FBI has said Ojeda Rios shot first.

During a raid last month that the FBI has said was to thwart a "domestic terrorist attack" planned by independence militants, witnesses allege that agents used pepper spray on reporters and protesters.

The raids sparked an anti-FBI rally Sunday in San Juan that drew more than 1,000.

The FBI has refused to disclose the identities of the agents who took part in the raids or to provide more than a minimal amount of information, Sanchez Ramos said.

Eduardo Bhatia, executive director of the Puerto Rico Federal Affairs Administration, read a statement from Puerto Rican Gov. Anibal Acevedo-Vila at the briefing.

"It must be clearly stated that in no way does the Commonwealth wish to impinge on any FBI investigation related to domestic terrorist activity nor to infringe on the FBI's ability to do its job," Acevedo-Vila said in the statement. "But just like the FBI must do its job, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, through its attorney general, has the right to require and obtain due cooperation from federal agencies when exercising its legitimate investigative powers."

Bill Carter, an FBI spokesman in Washington, said the complaints filed to the agency from members of Congress and Puerto Rican officials have been referred to the FBI Inspection Division for investigation and review.

"We can't comment further until that investigation is complete," Carter said.

At the request of FBI Director Robert Mueller, the U.S. Justice Department's inspector general, Glenn A. Fine, also is investigating Ojeda Rios' death.

Filiberto Pudo Ser Atendido (PRIMHORA)

Primera Hora, March 29, 2006

Sostiene Sánchez Ramos en sesión informativa

WASHINGTON.- El dirigente machetero Filiberto Ojeda Ríos pudo haber sobrevivido al disparo que le provocó la muerte por desangramiento si el FBI lo hubiera atendido a tiempo, sostuvo ayer el secretario de Justicia, Roberto J. Sánchez Ramos.

"La información que tenemos es que si él hubiera sido atendido, no hubiera muerto", declaró Sánchez Ramos de manera contundente en respuesta a una pregunta del representante Luis Gutiérrez, de Chicago, durante una sesión informativa efectuada por un grupo de congresistas demócratas para ventilar las quejas del Gobierno de Puerto Rico y de otros sectores sobre la presunta falta de cooperación del Negociado Federal de Investigaciones (FBI) en la investigación sobre la muerte de Ojeda Ríos y el maltrato a periodistas en un allanamiento el mes pasado.

DOJ_NMG_0023514

En una carta leída por Eduardo Bhatia, director ejecutivo de la Oficina de Asuntos Federales de Puerto Rico en Washington (PRFAA por sus siglas en inglés), el gobernador Aníbal Acevedo Vilá criticó al FBI por su falta de transparencia. "Las acciones del FBI han provocado preguntas legítimas y sustanciales en nuestra sociedad. El interés público requiere de una sólida y saludable cooperación mutua entre las autoridades federales, estatales y locales. El Gobierno de Puerto Rico tiene el derecho a exigir la cooperación debida de las agencias federales cuando esté ejerciendo su legítimo derecho de investigación", dice la carta.

En tanto, Sánchez Ramos reiteró que "estamos tratando de llegar al grano de lo que sucedió y no están cooperando y creo que lo hacen en una manera ilegal y que no atiende al público que desea saber qué fue lo que pasó".

Ojeda Ríos murió desangrado el pasado 23 de septiembre en la casa en que residía clandestinamente en Hormigueros, luego de un enfrentamiento con agentes del FBI.

Sánchez Ramos reiteró en la sesión congresional que no solamente no ha recibido información del FBI y del Departamento federal de Justicia sobre el caso de Ojeda Ríos y de las agresiones contra la prensa, sino que "en ningún momento" desde que asumió su cargo el año pasado ha recibido de las autoridades federales cualquier tipo de información sobre posibles operativos federales en la Isla que pudieran estar vinculados con el tema de terrorismo. El FBI y otras agencias federales sostienen que los allanamientos efectuados el 10 de febrero forman parte de la llamada lucha contra el terrorismo.

Impacta a congresistas el vídeo

Dos periodistas, Oscar J. Serrano, presidente de la Asociación de Periodistas de Puerto Rico (Asppro), y Normando Valentín, de Televicentro, presentaron en la audiencia un vídeo grabado en las afueras del condominio de Río Piedras donde se llevó a cabo uno de los allanamientos y en el que se aprecia claramente el enfrentamiento de los agentes federales con una quincena de periodistas, Valentín entre ellos.

Durante la presentación del vídeo, varios de los congresistas se notaron visiblemente conmocionados.

"Queda muy claro que aquí hay suficiente evidencia para exigir una respuesta del FBI", dijo el congresista Bobby Scott, de Virginia.

Por otra parte, el Comité para Proteger Periodistas (CPJ, por sus siglas en inglés), emitió una declaración en la que dice que están "muy preocupados" por el incidente con los periodistas.

Ni el FBI ni el Departamento de Justicia federal enviaron representantes a la sesión congresional.

En una reciente audiencia privada en el Comité Judicial de la Cámara de Representantes, representantes del FBI dijeron que no habían avisado de antemano a las autoridades puertorriqueñas del operativo contra Ojeda Ríos porque no confiaban en ellos, algo que Bhatia dijo no tiene sentido. "En otros asuntos, como el narcotráfico y las pandillas callejeras, ha habido cooperación entre las autoridades federales y las de Puerto Rico, pero cuando se trata de este asunto, ¿cómo pueden decir que no tienen confianza en nosotros?".

La representante Nydia Velázquez, de Nueva York, se expresó "avergonzada" como congresista. "Se supone que el FBI guarde el orden y no esté atentando contra los derechos civiles de la gente. Como puertorriqueña, tengo un interés personal en que a los residentes de Puerto Rico se les trate como ciudadanos estadounidenses que son y no como ciudadanos de segunda clase", afirmó.

El congresista José Serrano, también de Nueva York, añadió que la ausencia del FBI de la sesión apunta a un "patrón de falta de respeto" hacia Puerto Rico. "Imagínense que esto hubiera ocurrido en una ciudad en Estados Unidos. Hubiera provocado una enorme indignación".

Los congresistas, además, apuntaron la ausencia del comisionado residente Luis Fortuño, quien en recientes días había cuestionado la necesidad de la audiencia y la calificó como parte de un intento de dañar la imagen de la Administración Bush.

"Es verdaderamente triste que aquí estemos discutiendo los derechos civiles del pueblo de Puerto Rico y tenemos al representante de la Isla cuestionando los motivos de la audiencia", comentó Velázquez.

La sesión congresional no pudo ser calificada como audiencia formal porque los demócratas no obtuvieron la cooperación de la mayoría republicana en el comité judicial, algo que los congresistas calificaron como "lamentable". No obstante, el representante Charles Rangel, de Nueva York, sostuvo que la sesión se llevó a cabo para recopilar información con miras a llevar a cabo audiencias en la Isla en una fecha por determinar, y prometió darle seguimiento.

"Cuando no hacemos nada, somos parte del problema", dijo Rangel.

Director Del FBI Defiende Actuación De Agentes (PRIMHORA)

Prima Hora, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON.- El director del FBI, Robert Mueller, defendió ayer la actuación de sus agentes en el operativo que terminó en la muerte del dirigente machetero Filiberto Ojeda Ríos, a la vez que indicó que se realiza una investigación interna de lo ocurrido.

En una audiencia del Comité de Asignaciones del Congreso realizada el mismo día que la sesión informativa auspiciada por congresistas demócratas sobre el operativo del 23 de septiembre pasado y sobre las agresiones a periodistas durante un allanamiento el 10 de febrero, Mueller habló del caso de Ojeda Ríos por primera vez desde que la agencia emitió un comunicado poco después de su muerte.

En respuesta a preguntas del congresista José Serrano, Mueller -que compareció a la audiencia para defender el presupuesto del FBI- dijo que los eventos tienen que colocarse en contexto.

"Hubo un agente (del FBI) que resultó herido en el estómago y otros que fueron lesionados. (Ojeda Ríos) estaba armado", dijo Mueller.

En el caso de los periodistas agredidos, sostuvo que a diferencia de lo que dice la prensa, sí había un perímetro establecido y que el FBI actuó para mantener el orden.

A la vez, declaró que "hay ocasiones en todas las jurisdicciones del FBI" en las que el FBI discrepa de autoridades locales y que en este caso no se trata necesariamente de desconfianza en las autoridades de Puerto Rico.

El pueblo de Puerto Rico, expuso, debería esperar a que se termine la investigación interna, aunque no indicó cuándo será eso.

Asimismo, disputó la aseveración del congresista Serrano de que el FBI pudiera estar comportándose en Puerto Rico "como en el pasado".

"Sí, nos importa mucho la imagen del FBI en Puerto Rico. Estoy sumamente decepcionado en que estos eventos hayan socavado la confianza que el pueblo de Puerto Rico tiene en el FBI", declaró Mueller.

FBI Director Says Preventing Terrorist Attacks Agency's Top Priority (VOA)

By Margaret Besheer

Voice of America, March 29, 2006

The director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation says his agency has transformed itself, and he does not believe the mistakes that led to the September 11 attacks on the United States would happen again.

Robert MuellerFBI Director Robert Mueller told a House of Representatives subcommittee Tuesday that since September 11, 2001, his agency's number one priority has been preventing terrorist attacks against the United States. He said the lack of information sharing within the FBI and with other agencies, which some say is to blame for the failure to not stop the attacks, is a thing of the past.

"I believe that what one saw happen in the days and weeks before September 11th would not happen again," said Robert Mueller. "That is not to say that we could not face another terrorist attack, but I believe we are far more efficient and effective, not only the FBI itself, but also the FBI in conjunction with the Department of Homeland Security, the CIA [Central Intelligence Agency], DIA [Defense Intelligence Agency], NSA [National Security Administration] and all those who play a role in protecting the public."

Director Mueller was responding to questions about the trial of admitted al-Qaida operative Zacarias Moussaoui. Moussaoui faces the death penalty in a U.S. court for his role in the September 11 attacks. Prosecutors charge that he lied about his al-Qaida membership and did not give authorities information about the planned attacks when federal agents arrested him weeks before they happened.

Mueller was on Capitol Hill to discuss the agency's 2007 budget request of $6 billion, which he said would go to support more than 31,000 jobs, as well as new technology and expanded facilities for the Bureau. He also answered lawmakers' questions about other national security issues.

He said China has a major spying program directed against the United States, which he called a "substantial threat."

The director also said the FBI is closely watching the case of former Liberian president and war crimes suspect Charles Taylor. The United States has expressed deep concern over reports that the former leader has disappeared from his Nigerian place of exile.

"We are monitoring what is happening in conjunction with the State Department, and to the extent that we are asked to provide any assistance in whatever way, we will," he said.

Director Mueller also talked about violence along the U.S.-Mexico border, where drug cartels and smugglers are responsible for a significant number of murders and other violence.

"To date, we have not had the same violence on this side of the border, that you have seen south of the border," said Director Mueller. "And we want to make certain that we do not see it and do everything we can to not only assure that it does not migrate to the United States, but also that we assist our Mexican colleagues to address it and disrupt and ultimately defeat that kind of violence."

DOJ_NMG_0023516

The FBI director said his agency has made national security its top priority, but has not forgotten its crime fighting responsibilities. E-mail This Article

Federal Agents In Right Place, Right Time (NOTP)

By Paul Rioux, St. Tammany Bureau

New Orleans Times-Picayune, March 16, 2006

When shooting started, they took control

After Randall Breaux took his wife out to dinner at a Covington restaurant Friday night, they strolled to the Columbia Street Tap Room and Grill, where they met a couple of friends, including Carter Mansfield, Breaux's fellow federal narcotics agent.

The foursome grooved to the beat of The Boogiemen for a couple of hours and were about to leave about 11:15 p.m. when they heard a series of loud popping sounds coming from outside the club.

While many inside the packed bar figured someone had lit a string of firecrackers, the two veteran Drug Enforcement Administration agents immediately recognized the sound of gunfire.

Breaux and Mansfield rushed outside and saw people pointing down the block at a man spraying the bar's stucco walls with rounds from a semiautomatic assault rifle, said William Renton, who heads the DEA's New Orleans office and on Wednesday gave the first detailed account of how the off-duty agents managed to subdue the gunman before anyone was injured.

Renton said Breaux drew a handgun, ran across the street and moved quickly toward the gunfire, using parked cars for cover, while Mansfield, who was not armed, made his way up the other side of the street.

The suspect had fired about 30 rounds and was trying to reload when Breaux popped up from behind a parked car and ordered him to drop the weapon, Renton said.

After the man tossed the AR-15 assault rifle on the trunk of a car, Mansfield rushed in and tackled him, detaining him until Covington police arrived a short while later.

Renton praised the agents, both of whom live in western St. Tammany Parish, for their lightning-quick response in going from enjoying a carefree night out one second to facing a life-or-death confrontation the next.

"They displayed tremendous heroism and courage in quickly advancing on a suspect who was much more heavily armed than they were," he said.

He said DEA guidelines prohibit Breaux, 43, and Mansfield, 35, from speaking publicly about the incident.

Tony R. Lambert, 34, of Covington, was booked with 10 charges, including two counts of attempted first-degree murder of a federal agent.

It's unclear what sparked the shooting, but police have said it may have involved an argument over a woman. A friend has said Lambert bought the rifle after hearing reports of looting in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

Richard Daniels, who is second in command at the DEA's New Orleans office, said Lambert was wearing a vest loaded with extra ammunition clips and was reaching for one when Breaux confronted him.

"I always think, 'What if he had another second or two to reload?' It could have been a major tragedy with a lot of people getting hurt," Daniels said, citing reports that 150 people were in the bar.

Renton said the agents are being hailed for defusing the situation without anyone getting hurt.

"Breaux used tremendous judgment and restraint at a time of great danger," Renton said. "He could have shot the guy and no one would have ever questioned it."

He emphasized that his praise of Breaux is not a criticism of how other agencies have handled recent controversial incidents, including one in December when New Orleans police officers shot and killed a 38-year-old mental patient who was armed with a knife on St. Charles Avenue.

"Don't get me wrong," Renton said. "Breaux would have been happy to shoot the guy had he turned his weapon on him."

While their co-workers have been patting them on the back all week, Breaux and Mansfield aren't sure what all the fuss is about, Daniels said.

"They're not the boastful type," he said. "They said they just did their job and let their training take over."

Renton said both agents will undoubtedly be nominated for some of the agency's highest awards for bravery and valor, a process that takes months.

In the meantime, Renton used his discretion as head of the New Orleans office to give them an On-the-Spot Award for going above the call of duty -- a commendation that includes a $500 bonus.

"I told them to enjoy a nice, quiet evening on us and, hopefully, not get shot at," Renton said.

Venezuela Frees Dominican Wanted By U.S. (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0023517

By Natalie Obiko Pearson
AP, March 29, 2006

CARACAS, Venezuela -- Venezuela has freed a Dominican man wanted in the U.S. on drug charges, saying there was no guarantee U.S. authorities would agree to terms for his extradition.

Judge Hector Coronado Flores dismissed a previous order to extradite Mateo Holguin Ovalle and ruled that he be released, the Supreme Court said Monday in a statement.

The decision derailed a case cited earlier by American officials as a prime example of cooperation with Venezuela in the drug war. The two countries now are in a dispute over how to resume joint counter-trafficking efforts suspended since President Hugo Chavez last August accused Drug Enforcement Administration agents of spying.

American authorities allege Holguin Ovalle, arrested in 2003 after being indicted in the U.S. on charges of conspiring to import cocaine, directed a major drug ring that transported cocaine and heroin into the United States.

The Venezuela court previously authorized Holguin Ovalle's extradition on the condition that he not be sentenced to more than 30 years in prison.

"Since the term of punishment to be imposed on Mateo Juan Holguin Ovalle could not be guaranteed, the extradition ordered cannot be carried out," Coronado Flores ruled.

The U.S. Embassy in Caracas and the Drug Enforcement Administration in Washington did not immediately comment on the decision.

Hundreds of tons of Colombian cocaine cross Venezuela's porous borders each year, the State Department said March 1 in its annual narcotics report, citing "rampant corruption at the highest levels of law enforcement and a weak judicial system." The U.S. no longer considers Vezezuela an ally in the war on drugs, the report says.

Chavez defended Venezuela anti-drug efforts Tuesday, saying the military is eradicating fields of opium poppies along the border with Colombia.

The president also accused the U.S. of holding "a dictatorship" within the United Nations and predicted that the world would eventually revolt against U.S. hegemony.

"Sooner of later, we, the people, the nations, will break this scheme imposed in the United Nations so there are truly free and united countries, not the dictatorship there in the United Nations against the nations and people of the world," he said.

Valley Man Gets 50 Years For Drug Running (BHE)

By SERGIO CHAPA
Brownsville (TX)Herald, March 29, 2006

A federal judge on Tuesday denied a Gulf Cartel member's request to withdraw his guilty plea and sentenced him to 50 years for a cocaine trafficking charge.

Drug Enforcement Administration agents arrested Noel Exinia, 35, in January 2005 after he used his La Feria-based trucking business to move a massive quantity of marijuana and cocaine from Mexico across the United States.

"This case involves multiple, multiple states in a sophisticated operation involving large amounts of drugs," U.S. District Court Andrew S. Hanen said during Exinia's Tuesday afternoon sentencing.

Exinia and co-defendant Cesario Nuñez, 33, moved at least 275 pounds of cocaine a week from the Rio Grande Valley to New York City, according to a criminal complaint filed last year. Nuñez agreed to a plea agreement and was sentenced to three years in federal prison in January.

Court records show that FBI officials also investigated Exinia for an alleged plot to smuggle Middle Eastern terrorists into the United States, based on comments he made to a Michigan pilot, who worked as a confidential government source.

Exinia was cleared of terrorism charges, but federal prosecutors said the La Feria man was a local organizer for the Matamoros-based Gulf Cartel and had a violent criminal history that could not be ignored.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Charles Lewis told Hanen in open court that Exinia had multiple brushes with the law and served a five-year manslaughter sentence for beating a man with a statue of the Virgin Mary, shooting him twice and then stabbing him in the chest.

Lewis said Exinia did not stay out of trouble when he got out of jail in Florida.

"He had a primary role in the (Gulf Cartel's) distribution ring ... a trucking company that was a front for the distribution ring," Lewis said in court. "He was the one who chose who hired the drivers and decided how much to pay them."

Alleged death threats against Lewis and witnesses in the case prompted court officials to move Exinia's late September trial to Houston where the La Feria man fired his attorney William May for telling federal officials about the threats.

Court records show that Exinia pleaded guilty after the fourth day of representing himself in court.

DOJ_NMG_0023518

He filed a request to withdraw his guilty plea earlier this month, based on claims that his was poorly represented by May and that he was not in a sound mental condition at the time of his trial after spending a month in solitary confinement.

May testified Tuesday that extensive wiretapping evidence prompted him to advise Exinia to take a 15-year plea agreement instead of going to trial, but Exinia refused.

Exinia took the stand in his own defense Tuesday where his testimony contradicted an oral plea agreement made in October.

Court records show that Exinia pleaded guilty to trafficking cocaine but testified in court Tuesday that it was actually marijuana. He claims that he should receive a lesser charge for smuggling marijuana and testified that he never threatened anybody, adding that his emotional comments to May were taken out of context.

"I told him that people can kill and get less time than they want to give me," Exinia said.

Hanen sided with prosecutors and denied Exinia's request to withdraw his guilty plea. He will serve the 50-year sentence in a federal prison without the possibility of parole.

Exinia's attorney, John Blaylock, said he successfully argued to have part of his client's sentence reduced. "I'm relieved that he didn't get a life sentence," Blaylock said. "Given the evidence and events that transpired in this bizarre case, he was broken down to where he could say anything after a month of solitary confinement and the daily rigors of a four-day trial."

Blaylock said his client plans to file a motion to reconsider his sentence and file an appeal.

Will Glaspy with the DEA's office in McAllen said his agency was pleased with the sentencing and that agents continue to work on an investigation connected to Exinia's arrest.

"I think this case goes to show the hard work that our agents from the DEA, FBI and local law enforcement have done to successfully dismantle a major drug-trafficking operation that was based in the Rio Grande Valley," Glaspy said. "I think it is important for the public of the Rio Grande Valley to know that the law enforcement agencies are working to keep the public safe and eliminate drug trafficking through the area."

2 Held For Selling Cocaine To Agents (CHIST)

Chicago Sun-Times, March 28, 2006

Two men charged with selling more than $350,000 of cocaine to undercover agents were ordered held in federal custody Tuesday pending a detention hearing.

Melitone Carrera and Saul Rodriguez-Herrera, whose ages and addresses were not immediately available, were named in a criminal complaint charging them each with one count of conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute cocaine.

The two men made their initial court appearance Tuesday before U.S. Magistrate Judge Geraldine Soat Brown, who ordered the defendants to remain in federal custody pending a 1:30 p.m. detention hearing on Friday, according to Assistant U.S. Atty. Patrick McGovern.

Drug Enforcement Administration agents were put on the trail of the defendants when Carrera approached a confidential source in October 2005 and asked the source if he was interested in buying cocaine, according to the complaint. The source contacted the DEA after he was approached by Carrera.

During a March 22, 2006, meeting at a Melrose Park Dunkin' Donuts, Carrera and an unidentified person told the source and an undercover agent that they had access to large amounts of cocaine they could sell at $19,500 per kilogram, the complaint alleges.

The next day, Carrera and the source had a phone conversation, during which Carrera agreed to supply 20 kilograms of cocaine to the source at $19,500 per kilogram, the complaint alleges.

Carrera said he would deliver the drugs on Monday, March 27, and he and the source agreed to conduct the transaction in the parking lot of Tony's Finer Foods in Melrose Park. Carrera allegedly told the source that his cousin would arrive in the parking lot in a red car that contained 18 kilograms of cocaine rather than the 20 they had discussed, the complaint alleges.

The source and undercover agent, both wearing wires, were waiting in the parking lot when a red Mazda pulled in at 11:30 a.m. Monday, according to the complaint. The complaint alleges the Mazda was driven by Rodriguez-Herrera, who went into the store while Carrera slowly drove around the parking lot in a silver Dodge Intrepid.

A few minutes later Rodriguez-Herrera came out of the store and gave the keys to the Mazda to the agent, the complaint alleges. He told the agent and the source that there were two hidden compartments in the rear seat of the Mazda where they would find the cocaine, according to the complaint.

The source and the agent drove the Mazda to another location, opened the two hidden compartments and found 18 kilogram-sized packages wrapped in plastic and tape. A field test determined the white powder in the packages was cocaine.

The source called Carrera and told him everything was fine and he would send the money back to the grocery store parking lot with the undercover agent, according to the complaint.

DOJ_NMG_0023519

The undercover agent and other agents found Rodriguez-Herrera and Carrera at the store, the complaint states. Rodriguez-Herrera was arrested in the parking lot and Carrera was arrested inside the store.

7 Convicted In Meth Case (LYNCHNA)

By Zack Smith

Lynchburg News & Advance, March 29, 2006

Seven people have been convicted in what prosecutors are calling one of the biggest methamphetamine seizures in the area.

Travis Viar, 23, of Amherst, and June Garcia, 26, of Monroe, were convicted of conspiracy to distribute 500 grams or more of meth after a two-day trial in U.S. District Court in Lynchburg on March 21 and 22, according to a release from U.S. Attorney John L. Brownlee.

Ciro Gamaliel Garcia, 32, of Monroe; Randy Eldridge Ellington, 47, of Concord; Mark Shane Guill, 37, of Madison Heights; and Michael Cerillo, 35, of Rustburg, each pleaded guilty on March 20, before the trial started.

Brownlee said in the release that about half a kilogram of meth was seized from the various co-conspirators.

George Barbour, 37, of Madison Heights, pleaded guilty to a lesser charge of conspiracy to distribute 50 grams or more of meth.

He faces a mandatory minimum sentence of five years in prison, with a maximum sentence of 40 years, plus a maximum fine of $2 million.

The other co-defendants face a maximum sentence of life in prison and a maximum fine of $4 million.

Anthony Jamerson, 45, of Dillwyn, was initially indicted in the case, but was later charged in a different drug conspiracy.

The case was investigated by the Central Virginia Task Force, which includes agents and officers from the FBI, the U.S. Marshals Service, the Amherst County Sheriff's Office, the Appomattox County Sheriff's Office, the Virginia State Police and the Lynchburg Police Department.

Ciro Garcia, Ellington, Guill, Cerillo and Barbour will be sentenced on July 19. June Garcia and Viar will be sentenced on July 31.

Pair Who Ran Elaborate Marijuana-growing Operation In Caroline County Sentenced In Federal Court. (FLS)

By BILL FREEHLING

Free Lance-Star, March 28, 2006

Two men who participated in what authorities call one of the largest Central Virginia marijuana operations in the past decade were each sentenced to more than eight years in prison yesterday.

Luu Van Dinh, 35, of Tappahannock, and David Trac Luong, 36, of Colonial Heights, were both sentenced yesterday by Judge Henry E. Hudson in U.S. District Court in Richmond. Each pleaded guilty late last year to conspiracy to manufacture and possess with intent to distribute 1,000 or more marijuana plants.

The pair was involved in a large-scale marijuana-growing operation in Caroline and Powhatan counties that police discovered during raids last summer. Robert Scanlon, a special agent with the Drug Enforcement Administration, testified about the operation yesterday in court.

Scanlon said marijuana was grown at a 3,000-square-foot house in Caroline located at 25308 Ruther Glen Road. He said marijuana filled most of the house, which he described as like a greenhouse inside. Floors had been cut out, windows were darkened and the home had been rewired.

Scanlon said the home in Powhatan was similarly outfitted. Police also searched a home in Tappahannock, but Scanlon said yesterday that Dinh and Luong couldn't be directly linked to that home. He said that house was in the name of a third person, who hasn't been charged but who Scanlon described as equally involved in the operation.

Scanlon said that police seized more than 1,400 marijuana plants at the homes in the three counties. More than half were at the Caroline house. Scanlon said each plant had a street value of about $3,500. He said the marijuana was extremely high grade.

"I've never seen a case anywhere near this level of sophistication," Judge Hudson said.

Luong, who was described as the daily caretaker of the plants in Caroline and Powhatan, was sentenced to serve 10 years in federal prison.

Judge Hudson determined that Dinh was less involved. Dinh was described as the person who bought and delivered supplies for the operation. Dinh got eight years and a month in prison.

Neither man had any prior criminal record, according to the evidence yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0023520

Through a translator, each man apologized yesterday. Hudson told them he'd consider amending their sentences at a later date if they helped authorities identify other people who were involved.

Dinh and Luong's charges were initially filed in Caroline but were later shifted to federal court because so many jurisdictions were involved and because penalties in federal drug cases are harsher, police said.

Court records show that the initial police searches were the result of a tip received by state police Special Agent Chris Crawford, who learned last April that Dinh was purchasing large quantities of pots and potting soil from a nursery in Hanover County.

Police had Dinh under surveillance when he and another man picked up the pots and took them to Luong's Ruther Glen home.

Crawford spotted marijuana clippings on the property that were consistent with a large growing operation. A large amount of potting soil and two 50-gallon barrels with water nozzles also were spotted, court records state.

Two Sentenced For Growing Marijuana (RTD)

By TOM CAMPBELL

Richmond (VA) Times Dispatch, March 28, 2006

A federal judge yesterday sentenced to prison two men who pleaded guilty to operating "grow houses" modified for cultivating marijuana.

David Trae Luong of Colonial Heights was sentenced to 10 years in prison and Luu Van Dinh of Tappahannock was sentenced to just more than eight years by U.S. District Judge Henry E. Hudson. The men pleaded guilty in December to conspiracy to cultivate and sell more than a thousand marijuana plants.

Hudson agreed with Assistant U.S. Attorney Rodney C. Young that the federal sentencing guidelines on both men failed to take into account the size and sophistication of the marijuana operation Luong and Dinh took part in. Hudson's sentences were well above the guidelines, which are advisory for judges.

Special Agent Robert J. Scanlon of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration said Luong cared for the plants on a regular basis. Dinh assisted and purchased supplies for the cultivation.

"Basically the whole house had been turned into a greenhouse . . . on all the square footage in the residence," Scanlon said.

The houses -- one in Caroline County, one in Powhatan County -- were modified for pot production with flooring removed to make room, industrial lighting to simulate sunlight, irrigation systems and ventilator fans to optimize conditions for the many hundreds of marijuana plants.

Even the house wiring was modified, both to handle the extra power load and to get around the meter so that the large amount of electricity used would not be noticed. Windows were fitted with opaque coverings so nothing could be seen from the outside.

A third house in Tappahannock was similarly modified as part of the operation, authorities alleged. But Hudson ruled that evidence did not sufficiently connect either defendant to that house.

Authorities believe at least one other person was involved in the conspiracy. Plea agreements call for Luong and Dinh to cooperate with investigators, leaving open the possibility of a recommendation that their sentences be reduced.

Each plant at maturity would have been good for about one pound of high-quality, smokable marijuana, according to testimony.

"There's no doubt it was a large-scale, high-dollar, sophisticated operation," Young said.

Hudson said he has been in law enforcement and jurisprudence a long time and: "I've never seen a [marijuana cultivation] case anywhere near this in size . . . or sophistication."

Former Clemson Student Pleads Guilty To Drug Charges (AIM)

By Meryl Dillman

Anderson Independent Mail, March 28, 2006

A former Clemson University student has pleaded guilty in connection with one of the largest federal prosecutions in South Carolina history, according to the office of United States Attorney Reginald I. Lloyd.

Tremayne Graham, 32, of Marietta, Ga., pleaded guilty in federal court in Greenville to drug and money-laundering conspiracies, possession with intent to distribute 5 kilograms or more of cocaine, maintaining a "stash house" for the purpose of storing cocaine, and failure to appear in court as required by a condition of bond.

According to a release, authorities discovered 250 kilograms of cocaine and more than $1.8 million in cash during the search of the "stash house."

DOJ_NMG_0023521

According to the release, Mr. Graham's co-defendant, Jerry Davis, 32, of Atlanta and Los Angeles, pleaded guilty to conspiracy to distribute and possess with intent to distribute 5 kilograms or more of cocaine and conspiracy to launder money.

The defendants' charges are also connected with a multi-state, multi-national drug conspiracy.

The maximum penalty Mr. Graham and Mr. Davis could receive is a $4 million fine and/or imprisonment for life, Mr. Lloyd stated. Both defendants also face a mandatory minimum term of 10 years in federal prison. Other charges are anticipated.

According to the release, testimony at the plea hearings established that Mr. Davis was the head of the "Sin City Mafia"— a major criminal enterprise with headquarters in Columbus, Ga., Atlanta, and Los Angeles. He obtained cocaine from California suppliers connected to major Mexican cartels and transported that cocaine to Atlanta. Once the cocaine reached Atlanta, it was packaged and shipped to various drug dealers operating along the East Coast, including Greenville, Spartanburg and Columbia in South Carolina.

According to the release, "Sin City Mafia" had ties to the Black Mafia Family— a criminal enterprise operating in Detroit, Atlanta, Orlando, Fla., St. Louis and elsewhere.

Evidence also established that Mr. Graham was one of Mr. Davis' primary distributors. According to the release, Mr. Graham supplied a number of South Carolina dealers he met at Clemson.

According to the release, evidence also established that Mr. Graham personally supplied more than 500 kilograms of cocaine sold in South Carolina.

The case was investigated by agents of the Drug Enforcement Administration of Greenville, Atlanta and Los Angeles; the Criminal Investigation Division of the Internal Revenue Service; the United States Marshal Service of Greenville, Atlanta and Los Angeles; the Greenville Police Department; the South Carolina Highway Patrol; and LA IMPACT of Los Angeles.

WASHINGTON Federal Sentencing Rules For Steroids Offenses Toughened (SFC)

By Cicero A. Estrella, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, March 28, 2006

Federal officials made a temporary, emergency change to the federal sentencing guidelines Monday to stiffen penalties for steroids-related offenses.

The change by the U.S. Sentencing Commission means abusers of anabolic steroids will face the same sentences as those who abuse other controlled legal substances, categorized by the federal government as Schedule III drugs.

Schedule III drugs are substances that are accepted for medical use in the United States but have the potential for abuse and addiction. As listed by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, they include LSD, ketamine and certain codeine combinations.

The commission's amendment to provide harsher penalties for steroids use and distribution was prompted by a directive from Congress.

"We are hopeful that the enhanced penalties will help deter anabolic steroid trafficking and abuse," U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said.

The amendment to the sentencing guidelines also adds sentencing enhancements for athletes using masking agents to hide their steroid use, for coaches who pressure athletes into experimenting with the drug and for individuals who distribute to athletes.

The tougher guidelines would have made the sentences for those convicted in the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative scandal about five times longer, according to Luke Macaulay, spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office for the Northern District of California.

BALCO owner Victor Conte, for example, would have been sentenced to 37 to 46 months instead of the eight months that he served after pleading guilty to possession and conspiracy to distribute steroids in 2005, Macaulay said.

Previously, steroids-related sentences did not equal those for other Schedule III drugs. Distribution of 50 steroid pills, for example, was the equivalent of the illegal distribution of one Vicodin pill, Macaulay said.

In 2004, Congress passed the Anabolic Steroid Control Act, which directed the Sentencing Commission to review the federal sentencing guidelines and provide for increased penalties that reflect the seriousness of the offenses.

New York Mayor Bloomberg Takes Gun Fight To Congress (AP)

By DEVLIN BARRETT, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) - New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg blasted Congress on Tuesday for considering what he called a "God-awful piece of legislation" on guns. A congressman charged he was just trying to spur more lawsuits against the gun industry.

DOJ_NMG_0023522

Bloomberg went to Washington to speak out against a bill offered by Rep. Lamar Smith, R-Texas, which would make permanent a bar on federal authorities' sharing gun trace data with local governments; the governments had used such information to launch lawsuits against gun manufacturers and dealers.

Congress has moved to squelch lawsuits brought by U.S. cities against gun manufacturers and dealers, charging they are misguided attempts to undercut the Second Amendment right to bear arms.

The mayor railed against the bill, telling a House judiciary subcommittee that it would lead to more shooting deaths of police officers and civilians.

Two members of the New York Police Department were killed last year with illegal guns, and two undercover detectives were killed three years ago during a gun buy-and-bust operation gone bad.

"I have been to too many police officers' funerals to believe that this bill actually has a prayer's chance in hell," Bloomberg said. "But if it does pass, the next time an officer is attacked by an illegal gun - and I say next time because until Congress gets serious about illegal guns, more police officers and many more citizens will be murdered - there can be no denying that those who vote for this bill will bear some of the responsibility."

Rep. Tom Feeney, R-Fla., described himself as "a big believer in the Second Amendment" and said that without such legislation local governments could change federal policy by filing multiple baseless lawsuits.

"Individual jurisdictions are trying to set national policy by suing licensed gun dealers that have not committed a crime," said Feeney.

The mayor claimed Congress left him no choice.

"If we are depending on the federal government to drive this car, they are asleep at the wheel," said Bloomberg, a liberal Republican, who was invited to testify by panel Democrats.

The mayor has grown increasingly critical of Congress for blocking efforts by local authorities to collect gun sale records showing which dealers sell the majority of guns used in crimes.

New York and other cities have long complained that 1 percent of gun dealers are responsible for selling almost 60 percent of all guns used in crimes nationwide.

That trace data, compiled by the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, had been used in lawsuits and in proceedings to revoke the licenses of businesses that sell large numbers of guns later used in crimes.

In recent years, Congress has added language to spending bills to prevent the ATF from sharing such trace data. The ATF has interpreted such language to mean aggregate gun trace data cannot be shared with the public or the press. Smith's bill would make the prohibition permanent.

But a spokesman for Rep. Todd Tiahrt, R-Kan., who first authored that language in 2003, said Monday the ATF is free to release aggregate information about guns used in crimes. Tiahrt spokesman Chuck Knapp said a 2005 appropriations amendment clarified that such information as percentage breakdowns of where guns used in crimes were originally sold could be made public.

Sen. Robert Menendez and Rep. Steve Rothman, both New Jersey Democrats, said they would introduce legislation this week to ensure that data about guns used in crimes and illegal gun sales would be public.

The National Rifle Association supports Smith's bill, saying it would also make permanent a ban on taxes or user fees to pay for federal background checks.

Chris W. Cox, the NRA's chief lobbyist, dismissed Bloomberg's claims, saying the bill would streamline current laws and free up law enforcement resources.

Cox called it "shameless" for the mayor to pin police officers' deaths on federal gun laws.

"If you look at the individuals who were charged with murder of these two great police officers, they had a long criminal history," Cox said. "They never should have been released out of jail. Our focus is on putting people like that in jail. Let's focus on the criminal."

Associated Press Writer Bonnie Pfister in Trenton, N.J., contributed to this report.

ATF Agents Confident They'll Catch Bomber (RMN)

By Ellen Miller, Special to the News

Rocky Mountain News, March 29, 2006

GRAND JUNCTION — Agents with the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms said Tuesday they're confident they will capture a former air traffic controller suspected of planting five bombs at co-workers houses here last week.

"We'll get him," said Rich Marianos, an ATF agent in Washington, D.C.

Marianos said agents don't believe Robert L. Burke, 54, has left the country ``because he doesn't have the means. Indications are, he's been living in his van and he's probably out of resources."

Burke, who also has used the name Robert Pope, was fired in 2004 from his job with the Serco Group, which operates the air traffic tower at Walker Field Airport in Grand Junction and 55 other airports, mostly in the West and Alaska.

Burke gave notice to his landlord last October and left his apartment of four years sometime between then and December, Grand Junction police spokeswoman Linda Bowman said.

No one was injured when three of the bombs in Grand Junction exploded. On Sunday, the ATF linked a bomb that exploded at Serco's headquarters in Murfreesboro, Tenn., with the Grand Junction devices after finding strong similarities.

IMMIGRATION:

Senate To Weigh Guest-Worker Proposal (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

With the Republican Party deeply divided, the Senate will take up a broad revision of the nation's immigration laws today amid signs that conservatives are ready to compromise on efforts to offer illegal immigrants new avenues to lawful employment.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) will move forward with his legislation to bolster border security and toughen laws against illegal immigration without a guest-worker program. But Frist agreed to allow Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) to quickly move to substitute the more lenient bill that passed his committee Monday, and Specter appears to have more than enough votes to do so.

That bill would couple border security measures with provisions that would allow millions of undocumented workers to apply for legal work visas and move toward U.S. citizenship, while offering hundreds of thousands of foreign workers access to the U.S. workplace.

The committee's bill is a sharp break from the get-tough approach approved by the House in December, which rebuffed President Bush's call for a guest-worker program and focuses exclusively on border security and immigration law enforcement.

The committee measure also places Frist -- a potential 2008 White House candidate -- in a difficult position. The panel approved its immigration overhaul by a comfortable 12 to 6 margin, with four Republicans siding with the panel's Democrats. But most committee Republicans opposed the bill. There may be as many as a dozen Republicans backing the Judiciary Committee bill in the full Senate, but on an issue so fraught with political consequences, it is not yet clear that Frist will allow the Senate to pass immigration legislation that cannot garner the support of most Republicans.

"Under the best of circumstances, most bills don't make it. And this bill is more complicated and in many ways more controversial than usual," warned Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.), who opposed the committee's bill.

Still, with voters clamoring for action and hundreds of thousands of immigrants marching against the House's proposals, GOP leaders signaled a willingness to compromise. The committee's bill, which largely mirrors legislation written by Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), goes considerably further than Bush's proposals, but after a meeting with the president, McCain declared, "I got the impression that he's happy."

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) said that he hopes the Senate will pass what he called "a responsible border security bill," but he indicated he is willing to rethink the House approach. After meeting with ranchers and law enforcement officers on the U.S.-Mexican border, Boehner said those living on the frontier do not think the House-passed border wall would work.

"If the people on the border don't believe that the wall will have the effect that people here think, then we ought to reconsider it," he said.

Boehner also said he knows of no promises that House GOP leaders have given to anti-immigration firebrands to block House consideration of a guest-worker program.

Under the Judiciary Committee bill, illegal immigrants who pay a $1,000 fine and back taxes would be able to apply for a three-year work visa, renewable for a second three-year period. In the fourth year of work, the visa holder could begin a five-year path toward citizenship. A second guest-worker program would open up legal agriculture jobs to 1.5 million undocumented farmworkers.

The measure would also add as many as 14,000 border patrol agents by 2011 to the current force of 11,300 agents and would authorize a "virtual wall" of unmanned vehicles, cameras and sensors to monitor the U.S.-Mexican border.

Unlike the House bill, it would not make illegal immigrants and those who assist them into felons, nor would it authorize the construction of massive new walls along 700 miles of the southern border.

DOJ_NMG_0023524

Republican opponents of the committee bill said they would wait to see what amendments pass the Senate before they consider a filibuster of the measure. Citing the passion of his constituents, Sen. John Ensign (R-Nev.) hinted at how politically difficult a filibuster would be. "We need to do something," he said.

"You don't filibuster away the problem of 11 million undocumented workers," warned Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.), a supporter of the bill. "You don't filibuster away the idea that our borders are broken and our legal system's a failure on immigration."

Immigration Bill Finds Bipartisan Support In Senate (KRT)

By Dave Montgomery

Knight Ridder, March 28, 2006

WASHINGTON - A comprehensive immigration bill that answers President Bush's call for a guest-worker program appears to have enough bipartisan support to pass the Senate, guaranteeing a legislative collision with an enforcement-oriented House bill, several advocates on both sides of the issue predicted Tuesday.

"We're in some trouble in the Senate," said Paul Egan, government-relations director of the Federation for American Immigration Reform (FAIR), which supports the House bill and opposes the guest-worker concept as a form of amnesty for illegal immigration.

The Senate may well deadlock with the House of Representatives because their positions differ so radically and the issue is too politically hot in this congressional election year for lawmakers on either side to compromise. That could doom all legislation to overhaul immigration this year.

The Senate Judiciary Committee voted 12-6 Monday to advance a comprehensive measure that would put millions of illegal immigrants on track to permanent legal status and allow up to 400,000 foreign workers each year to fill low-skilled jobs.

Egan said opponents of the measure put their hopes in the 435-member House, where a coalition of conservative Republicans has vowed to kill immigration legislation that includes a guest worker plan. The 94-member coalition blocked inclusion of a guest worker program in the immigration bill the House passed in December.

The House bill also makes illegal immigration a felony and calls for 700 miles of fences along the Southwest border.

"If the Senate follows the Judiciary Committee's lead, the prospects of getting a reform bill to the president's desk this year are slim, to say the least," said Rep. Tom Tancredo, R-Colorado, coalition leader. "No plan with amnesty and a massive increase in foreign workers will pass the House."

Egan said a "back-of-the-envelope" count of prospective votes in the Senate shows only about 10 solid votes, nearly all Republican, against the bill, while many other Republicans are undecided. The bill is thought to have strong support among Democrats.

Republicans have 55 seats in the Senate. Democrats have 44 and usually win support from the Senate's lone independent, James Jeffords of Vermont. Pro-immigrant groups believe they can count on support from at least nine Republicans, and possibly as many as 14. Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania and three other committee Republicans - Sens. Sam Brownback of Kansas, Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and Mike DeWine of Ohio - voted for the bill.

"I think the Senate is probably foolish enough to pass this bill or something very close to it," said Egan, "but I don't think the House will buy it."

Angela Kelley, deputy director of the National Immigration Forum, which supports the Senate Judiciary bill, offered a similar assessment from an opposing perspective. Democrats are "rather unified" behind the bill, she said. "You add in the Republicans who are supportive, and that's enough to put us over the finish line."

Backers of the bill said its inclusion of a separate guest worker program for up to 1.5 million agricultural workers could bring added votes from rural-state senators.

The measure became entangled in parliamentary uncertainty Tuesday after Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., indicated that he might press ahead with a more-limited border security measure similar to the one passed earlier by the House. Senators nevertheless are expected to begin debate this week - possibly as early as Wednesday - and may vote on both measures.

Specter said that Frist's plan is to allow a day of debate on the enforcement bill, followed by consideration of the committee bill.

Some lawmakers said it's too early to predict the final outcome in the Senate. Several committee Republicans vowed to offer amendments to change the measure on the Senate floor, including Sens. John Cornyn, R-Tex., and Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., co-sponsors of a rival bill that would require illegal aliens to return home before being eligible to apply for a guest worker program.

DOJ_NMG_0023525

The committee bill includes key elements of bipartisan legislation co-sponsored by Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Edward Kennedy, D-Mass. Specter said the bill also embraces Bush's proposed guest worker plan, although the president has not endorsed specific legislation.

"I think they (the White House) believe we're heading in the right direction," said Specter. "We've picked up essentially the president's idea on guest workers."

Asked if the president would veto legislation that does not include a guest worker provision, White House spokesman Scott McClellan reiterated Bush's belief that "any immigration reform ought to be comprehensive . . . including a guest worker program."

Boehner Hints A Back Down On 'Amnesty' (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, March 29, 2006

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner refused yesterday to rule out compromising with the Senate to expand the House border security bill to include a guest-worker program or provisions that opponents call "amnesty."

"Let's wait and see what the Senate can produce," he told reporters yesterday when asked whether House Republicans would reject the Senate Judiciary Committee's proposal to allow the estimated 12 million illegal aliens now in the U.S. to seek citizenship after paying a fine.

Since Monday's Judiciary vote, the Senate appears headed toward approving immigration legislation that strengthens border security some while creating a new guest-worker program and providing a path to U.S. citizenship for illegal aliens already in the country. Republican opponents of the proposal call it "amnesty" since it doesn't deport current illegals for breaking immigration laws.

"The American people are counting on us to secure our borders and restore the rule of law to our immigration system," Sen. Jeff Sessions, Alabama Republican and Judiciary Committee member, said Monday night after voting against the proposal.

He said the panel had "let the American people down by passing out a blanket amnesty bill. We've been down this path several times before, and it proved a failure."

Conservatives were especially appalled to see so many Republicans -- Sens. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, Mike DeWine of Ohio, Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and Sam Brownback of Kansas -- join panel Democrats to approve the proposal.

"It appears that the members of the committee who voted for this misguided legislation are more in tune with the thousands of protesters waving Mexican flags in the streets of Los Angeles than they are with the overwhelming majority of Americans who are demanding that America's borders and national security be protected," said Bill Lauderback, executive vice president of the American Conservative Union. "The first priority of any immigration reform bill must be to secure our borders. By contrast, this bill undermines respect for the rule of law and encourages more illegals to storm our borders."

The only solace for the conservatives has been the House, where many Republicans adamantly oppose any process that permits current illegals to apply for citizenship without first leaving the country. Also, they say Congress must prove to voters that they can enforce existing immigration laws and strengthen the borders before creating any guest-worker program that draws new immigrants.

Mr. Boehner and other House leaders said yesterday they still prefer their border-security-only bill.

"Border security is a huge, huge issue everywhere," said Majority Whip Roy Blunt, Missouri Republican. "House members are on the right side of the issue."

Mr. Blunt declined to give an opinion on the Senate proposal or even whether he considered it amnesty.

"I don't know what the Senate will finally do at the end of the process," he said.

But, like Mr. Boehner, Mr. Blunt indicated he is open to compromise.

"The critical concern here is clearly securing the border," he said. "What else has to happen with that for the legislative process to work -- you know, we'll let the process work."

Mr. Blunt and House Republican Conference Chair Deborah Pryce of Ohio said yesterday they will be sharing recent polling that shows American voters overwhelmingly supporting the House position of shoring up the borders and enforcing current immigration laws.

"The poll numbers really shout loudly and clearly how the American people feel about this issue," Mrs. Pryce said.

Though Mr. Boehner repeatedly sidestepped reporters' questions about his -- or the House leadership's -- stance on the Senate proposal, he did say that he hopes that whatever is sent to President Bush more closely reflects the House bill.

"The House has passed a responsible border security bill," he said. "While this was a very difficult issue for this Congress, I think the American people expect us to strengthen our borders and so I'm hopeful the Senate will do the same."

DOJ_NMG_0023526

Lawmakers Are Preparing For Big Battle On Immigrants (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 28 — Leading Congressional Republicans voiced serious reservations Tuesday about a new Senate immigration proposal as lawmakers braced for a difficult debate that will highlight ideological divisions among Senate Republicans as well as with their counterparts in the House.

The Senate was scheduled on Wednesday to turn to a plan by Senator Bill Frist, the majority leader, for tougher border controls and stricter law enforcement, with the expectation that a bipartisan proposal that allows illegal immigrants to qualify for citizenship would be proposed as an alternative.

Mr. Frist, a Tennessee Republican, said that bipartisan initiative, approved by the Judiciary Committee on Monday, was not satisfactory. "It went too far," he said.

Lawmakers acknowledged that the Senate faced days of contentious debate and that any final measure would be different from both the Frist plan and the Judiciary Committee proposal. It will also probably differ sharply with a House-approved plan that focused on slowing the influx of illegal immigrants.

Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the majority leader, said Tuesday that he did not want to rush to judgment on whether the House and Senate could eventually agree on a bill. But Mr. Boehner said the House would stand by its focus on law enforcement and border protection.

"Illegal immigration is just that, illegal," he said, "and Americans expect us to do something about illegal immigration."

Mr. Boehner said he was willing to reconsider a House-approved plan to construct a 700-mile-long fence along the nation's southwest border. But President Bush, in an interview with CNN on Tuesday, said he was opposed to that idea, saying it was impractical.

"I don't think anybody believes that you could totally fence off the border and be effective," Mr. Bush said. "But I do think we ought to be in a position to give our Border Patrol agents better tools, more effective ways to prevent people from smuggling people and/or drugs across our border."

Democrats were generally supportive of the Judiciary Committee plan, lawmakers said. But there were divisions among them as well, particularly with some labor leaders opposing a temporary worker program that they see as a threat to American jobs.

"I don't think there's 100 percent support in my caucus for what time of the day it is," said Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader. "But the vast majority of the Democrats support this bill."

Despite the looming political and policy fights, lawmakers in both parties said it was time for Congress to move ahead on the issue.

"We've put off this problem for too long," said Senator Jon Kyl, Republican of Arizona. "And I can tell you that in my state, we need a solution to this because every month that it is put off, the problem becomes more and more difficult to solve."

AFL-CIO Chief Slams Guest Worker Programs (AP)

By David Espo

The AP, March 28, 2006

The nation's largest labor organization on Tuesday criticized plans to expand guest worker programs for immigrants seeking to come to the United States, parting company with longtime Senate Democratic allies who pushed successfully to include them in broad-based immigration legislation.

"Guest worker programs are a bad idea and harm all workers," AFL-CIO President John Sweeney said in a statement released the day after the Senate Judiciary Committee cleared an immigration bill. "They cast workers into a perennial second-class status, and unfairly put their fates into their employers' hands."

Sweeney's statement praised numerous provisions of the overall immigration legislation, particularly a part that gives illegal aliens an opportunity to apply for citizenship. Still, his criticism underscored the unusual political pressures at work as President Bush and Congress grapple with an emotional issue in the run-up to midterm elections.

Republicans have long appeared divided over the immigration issue, with Bush and some GOP members of Congress supporting temporary worker programs that other Republicans attack as amnesty for lawbreakers.

On the other hand, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (news, bio, voting record), D-Mass., a longtime liberal, was the target of good-natured jokes during the committee meeting for his work with the U.S. Chamber of Commerce on the immigration measure. And while Sweeney criticized the temporary worker program, the Service Employees International Union issued a statement supporting the Judiciary Committee measure.

DOJ_NMG_0023527

The legislation, to be debated on the Senate floor beginning Wednesday, includes two provisions that together could create room for nearly 2 million temporary workers.

One is a five-year temporary program for up to 1.5 million agricultural workers advanced by Sen. Dianne Feinstein (news, bio, voting record), D-Calif. Immigrants living in the U.S. illegally as well as those outside the country would be eligible.

The other, backed by Kennedy, would create a new temporary visa to allow as many as 400,000 foreign workers into the country.

In both cases, individuals would have an opportunity to apply for citizenship after several years.

All eight Democrats on the Judiciary Committee supported both guest worker provisions on Monday, and all of them frequently work in concert with organized labor.

Feinstein said during the committee meeting that the agriculture industry was "almost entirely dependent on undocumented workers," a reference to individuals in the country illegally. She described her proposal as an attempt to assure a legal workforce. "The people are here. They're going to work regardless," she said of thousands of illegal immigrants who pick crops.

Kennedy, arguably labor's strongest voice in Congress, noted that the proposal "has the support of agribusiness and farm workers." Sen. Patrick Leahy (news, bio, voting record) of Vermont, another longtime ally of labor, said he, too, was satisfied with the program, noting that it had provisions that would help his state's dairy industry. Sen. Charles Schumer (news, bio, voting record) of New York added that he had no difficulty with the provision, either, as long as there were no problems associated with farms in his state. The New York Democrat is chairman of the party's senatorial committee, which relies on labor's support.

Sweeney saw things differently.

"Guest worker programs "encourage employers to turn good jobs into temporary jobs at reduced wages and diminished working conditions and contribute to the growing class of workers laboring in poverty," he said.

Sweeney issued his statement as White House spokesman Scott McClellan told reporters that Bush wants a temporary worker program included in any immigration measure that clears Congress. "Because what a temporary worker program would do is help relieve pressure on the border. It will allow our law enforcement officials and Border Patrol agents to focus on those who are coming here for the wrong reasons, the criminals and the drug dealers and the terrorists," he said.

The House has yet to pass legislation dealing with immigration issues involving workers, although it has approved a bill that calls for building a fence along 700 miles of the border with Mexico.

Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, who voted to approve the fence project, indicated he may change his mind based on a recent trip to the Southwest. He told reporters he had met with farmers as well as law enforcement officials and "no one in the room thought the wall would work, because if you build the wall, then you have to police the wall."

He added: "If the people on the border don't believe the wall will have the effect that people here think, then we ought to reconsider it."

Aid Groups Greet Panel's Illegals Bill (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, March 29, 2006

The immigration bill approved by the Senate Judiciary Committee on Monday eases the concerns of religious and humanitarian aid workers, who feared they would face criminal charges for helping illegal aliens.

But many religious and humanitarian aid groups still worry about a provision in the House-passed immigration bill that they say would criminalize such assistance.

The issue has become among the most debated in the immigration battle.

"We're not talking about a legal debate anymore; we're talking about a moral one," said Cristina Lopez, deputy executive director of the Center for Community Change, which organized an event Monday led by hundreds of clergy. "Scripture says you help your neighbor. That's what the Judeo-Christian tradition, the Muslim tradition ... is about," she said.

Democrats have seized on the religious community's concern, with Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York declaring last week that the House bill "would literally criminalize the good Samaritan and probably even Jesus himself," according to the Associated Press.

"I am not really surprised that Hillary Clinton doesn't know the first thing about the Bible," Rep. Tom Tancredo, Colorado Republican, retorted Sunday on ABC's "This Week." "Her impression, her analysis, her interpretation of both the law and the Bible are certainly wrong, to say the least."

The bill approved by the House in December would, among other things, modify a law that punishes anyone who helps foreigners sneak into the country or harbors illegal aliens from authorities.

Supporters of the House bill -- including its author, House Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., Wisconsin Republican -- say the provision is aimed at people who make a living trafficking foreigners into the country.

DOJ_NMG_0023528

"I would hope everyone would embrace a good-faith effort to combat alien-smuggling gangs rather than engage in fear mongering that clergy and good Samaritans will be thrown in jail. That's absolutely false," Mr. Sensenbrenner said Monday.

However, Bernadette Passade Cisse, vice president for policy and advocacy at the Lutheran Immigration and Refugee Service, said the House provision would be "a huge stumbling block to very essential services."

Kevin Appleby, director of migration and refugee policy for the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, said the House bill "overreached" in several areas, including the provision on aid to illegal aliens.

"That was particularly offensive because it conflicts against the basic mission of the church," Mr. Appleby said.

He said the House bill "could criminalize minor acts of mercy," such as meals and first aid, and subject religious workers to prison.

"That's not the case at all," said Jeff Lungren, a spokesman for Mr. Sensenbrenner.

The government has no interest in spending time or money to prosecute priests, rabbis and other workers who offer food, shelter and assistance to illegal aliens, he said.

But the groups say verbal assurances aren't enough.

"We appreciate the spoken intent of the proponents. However, once a law is passed, it's on the books, and prosecutors and judges can interpret it however they'd like," Mr. Appleby said.

Republican Split On Immigration Reflects Nation's Struggle (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 28 — It is almost as if they are looking at two different Americas.

The Senate Republicans who voted on Monday to legalize the nation's illegal immigrants look at the waves of immigration reshaping this country and see a powerful work force, millions of potential voters and future Americans.

The House Republicans who backed tough border security legislation in December look at the same group of people and see a flood of invaders and lawbreakers who threaten national security and American jobs and culture.

But both wings of the deeply divided Republican Party are responding to the same phenomenon: the demographic shift driven by immigration in recent decades, a wave that is quietly transforming small towns and cities across the country and underscoring pressures on many parts of the economy.

The United States has always been a nation of immigrants, but today the country has more than 33 million foreign-born residents, the largest number since the Census started keeping such statistics in 1850. In 2003, foreign-born residents made up 11.7 percent of the population, the highest percentage since 1910. And over the past 16 years, the newcomers, many of them illegal, have poured into places in the South and Midwest that have not seen sizeable numbers of new immigrants in generations.

The question of how to cope with the 11 million illegal immigrants believed to be living here — whether to integrate them, ignore them or try to send them home somehow — is a question gripping many ordinary citizens, religious leaders, state legislators and policy makers in the White House. And in their bitter, fractious debate, Republicans in Congress are reflecting what some describe as the nation's struggle to define itself and, to some degree, politically align itself, during a period of social change.

The Senate Republicans on the Judiciary Committee who emerged victorious on Monday with help from Democrats argue that those illegal immigrants who work, pay taxes and learn English should be fully incorporated into American society as citizens. The House Republicans who passed a far different bill in December are pushing to criminalize their presence in the United States. (The full Senate is expected to vote on immigration legislation next week. Any bill that passes the Senate will have to be reconciled with the House legislation.)

As the party struggles to reconcile these competing visions, frustrations over the stalemate are spilling onto the airwaves and into the streets as some conservatives on talk radio call for a wall to be built along the Mexican border and tens of thousands immigrants and their supporters march in favor of citizenship.

"Right now, we're seeing to some extent the political response to the demography," said Roberto Suro, executive director of the Pew Hispanic Center, a nonpartisan research group in Washington. "And even though the legislative proposals are seemingly technical and narrow, they touch these nerves about how we think of ourselves as a people."

"You end up, after a point, trying to balance our fundamental traditions, the need for order, law and security with a need for openness," he said. "Immigration policy, writ large, has always been partly a matter of national identity. It becomes a values-laden debate. Congress has a hard time with it."

That difficulty reflects, in part, the swiftness and the enormousness of the demographic shift.

DOJ_NMG_0023529

In 1970, there were 9.6 million foreign-born residents in the country, census data show. By 1980, that figure had surged to 14.1 million. Between 1990 and 2000, the number of foreign-born residents jumped to 31.1 million from 19.8 million.

Senator Sam Brownback, Republican of Kansas, who voted for the legalization of illegal immigrants on Monday, says he has seen and felt the shift in his own state.

"Huge increase," he said of the number of new immigrants. "It's a big issue, and it's one where communities that have adapted to it are more accepting and others are more questioning about the scale of what's taking place."

But when he wrestled with the issue, Mr. Brownback decided that he could not join the ranks of those who wanted simply to push out illegal immigrants. "This is also about the hallmark of a compassionate society, what you do with the widows, the orphans and the foreigners among you," he said.

Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, echoed those thoughts in his defense of the legalization program, which would ultimately grant immigrants citizenship.

"Where is home?" Mr. Graham asked his colleagues Monday. "Their home is where they've raised their children. Their home is where they've lived their married lives."

"Whatever we do," he added, "we have to recognize that for several generations people have made America their home."

But to Representative Tom Tancredo, the Colorado Republican who helped spearhead the border security bill in the House, illegal immigrants are far from welcome or essential to this country.

He was not moved when he saw the tens of thousands of immigrants, some illegal, and their supporters rallying against his bill. He said he was outraged that people he viewed as lawbreakers felt comfortable enough to stand without fear in front of the television cameras.

"For years, the government has turned a blind eye to illegal immigrants who break into this country," Mr. Tancredo said. "It isn't any wonder that illegal aliens now act as if they are entitled to the rights and privileges of citizenship."

Mr. Tancredo's view of the illegal immigrant as an unwanted outsider, an encroacher, is far from uncommon.

The National Conference of State Legislatures has reported a surge in recent years in legislation intended to crack down on illegal immigrants. As of Feb. 28, state legislators in 42 states had introduced 368 bills related to immigration or immigrants, and many of those bills were intended to limit or restrict illegal immigrants.

But some Republicans are warning now that tough anti-immigrant legislation may fuel a backlash and threaten the party's hard-won gains with Hispanics, whose numbers have surged in recent years.

Foreign-born Hispanics voted for President Bush in 2004 at a 40 percent greater rate than Hispanics born in the United States. Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform and a strategist close to the White House, warned that Republicans could squander what the party had gained if lawmakers did not embrace a more welcoming vision of America.

"There is a danger that if the face of the Republican Party is Tancredo that we could be weaker with Hispanics for generations," Mr. Norquist said. "If the face of the Republican Party is George Bush or Ronald Reagan, we win. This is up for grabs."

A GOP Faceoff Over Illegal Immigration (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON - Senate majority leader Bill Frist and GOP Sen. Sam Brownback stood together on trade, war, judges, guns, energy, abortion, and war, but they are bookends in this week's debate on "earned" amnesty for illegal aliens - the toughest issue before the Senate this year.

They illustrate the rift that runs through both parties, but especially the GOP, which controls both the House and Senate. That rift yawns so large that it could keep Congress from passing any immigration legislation this year.

Senator Frist, a prospect for a presidential run in 2008, wants a "virtual barrier" to secure borders first. It's about what it means to be a nation, he says: "A nation that can't secure its borders can't secure its destiny or administer its laws."

Senator Brownback, also a prospect for 2008, backs border security, but says he also wants a way to get 11 million undocumented people into a legalized status. It's about human dignity, he says: "One of the key measures in any society is what you do for the so-called least of these."

Polls show a strong majority of Republican voters oppose amnesty for those in the country illegally, but business groups, a core GOP constituency, want to assure a supply of low-wage workers for agriculture, construction, restaurant, and other services.

For Frist, who stumbled badly over his handling of the Terri Schiavo debacle a year ago, it's a chance to lead his party through a political mine field. "I'm here to solve problems, not stand around," he said in a statement on the floor of the Senate early Monday afternoon.

DOJ_NMG_0023530

Frist had given the Senate Judiciary Committee an ultimatum: Produce a bill by end-of-day Monday, or the Senate would take up his own immigration reform plan. Brownback is one of four Republicans on the Senate Judiciary Committee, including chairman Arlen Specter (R) of Pennsylvania, to side with Democrats in a bid for comprehensive immigration reform this session of Congress.

The Judiciary Committee's bill opens a path to citizenship for at least 11 million people living in the United States illegally. It allows those who were in the US before 2004 to get a temporary work visa, if they pay a $1,000 fine and clear a criminal background check. After six years, they would be eligible for permanent legal residence, if they learn English and pay back taxes and another $1,000 fine.

Frist's alternative, still in play, focuses exclusively on border security. That means more boots on the borders, unmanned aerial vehicles, cameras, sensors, and "a virtual barrier to cover every mile of our 1,950-mile long border with Mexico." (The House bill also includes a 700-mile wall along the southern border.)

The Frist bill also requires employers to verify the legal status of their workers, using a federal electronic database. Those employers engaging in a pattern of hiring illegal workers would face up to six months in jail. Those living in the country illegally are guilty of a misdemeanor; under the House bill, it's a felony.

Right up until the last vote late Monday afternoon, prospects for completing the complex bill looked unlikely. In the end, committee chairman Specter, as well as GOP Sens. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, Mike DeWine of Ohio, and Brownback of Kansas lined up with all eight Democrats on the panel to complete a bill. The 12-to-6 vote electrified pro-immigration groups, who jammed the back of the Judiciary panel's hearing room.

"I'm guessing we'll get 40 Democrats and 20 to 30 Republicans who will vote for comprehensive reform," says Frank Sharry, executive director of the National Immigration Forum, a Washington advocacy group. "The idea is to get the best possible product out of the Senate, either as a prelude to a conference that goes the Senate's way - or a train wreck," he adds.

About six months ago, Mr. Sharry says he asked Brownback why, as a potential presidential candidate, he would be willing to risk alienating conservative voters, especially in Iowa, an early caucus state. "He told us, 'It's in the Bible.' He has pages of Scripture that refer to welcoming the stranger," he says.

"In all our talking to politicians, I'd never heard that," Sharry adds.

Brownback says he doesn't recall that meeting but stands by the comment. "What makes it tough is that we want to be a nation of laws," he says. "As I talk to people across Iowa, a number of people have questioned me on the immigration system. People aren't anti-immigrant, but they don't want the laws broken."

Senators on both sides of the aisle are watching the massive mobilization of immigrants, legal and illegal, in the streets of major US cities. "There is no question that what happened out in Chicago and Michigan made a big difference," said Sen. Edward Kennedy (D) of Massachusetts, a cosponsor with Sen. John McCain (R) of Arizona of immigration reform that includes a path to legalization for illegals.

Frist had been gearing up for a procedural clash with Democratic leader Harry Reid, who had threatened a filibuster. Now, he must repair rifts in his own caucus. Opposing immigration bills

The Senate Judiciary Committee approved Monday an immigration bill that differs markedly from one passed by the House this past December. Here are key points:

· Judiciary - Illegal immigrants in the US before 2004 may work legally for six years if they pay a $1,000 fine and have no criminal record. They become eligible for permanent residence upon paying another $1,000 fine and any back taxes and learning English.

· House - Makes illegal presence in the US a felony. Requires detention of all non-Mexican illegal immigrants arrested when entering the US and mandatory sentences for those smuggling them in.

· Judiciary - Creates a pilot guest-worker program for some 1.5 million farm workers. New immigrants may obtain temporary work visas. Both groups can earn permanent residence.

· House - Does not include a guest-worker program. Requires all employers to use a database to verify Social Security numbers of employees within six years or face civil or criminal penalties.

· Judiciary - More than doubles the number of Border Patrol agents by 2011. Authorizes a "virtual wall" of unmanned vehicles, cameras, and sensors to monitor the US-Mexico border.

· House - Requires building two-layer fences along 700 miles of the 2,000-mile border between Mexico and the US.

Source: The Associated Press

Immigration Splits Republican Lawmakers (WSJ)

By June Kronholz And David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON -- With Congress embarked on a debate about immigration, and tens of thousands of protestors taking to the streets, the issue is exposing significant divisions among lawmakers.

The debate is gathering steam at a time when the country seems uncertain whether immigration is a net plus or minus for the nation. Those who worry most about security along borders find themselves aligned against foes -- including many in the business community -- who argue that the flow of workers is producing not only a vibrant economy but also a more vibrant nation.

Even in states with a deep interest in immigration matters -- Arizona, for example -- the divides are driving congressional colleagues from the same party into opposing corners. Those divides will become more apparent when Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee opens Senate floor debate today on immigration overhaul. Because of differences with the House over the treatment of future guest workers and the millions of undocumented immigrants already here, final enactment may be impossible this election year -- even if a package gets past the Senate.

Under an agreement reached yesterday, Mr. Frist will call up his own border-security bill first. But after a day's debate, the much broader measure reported from the Senate Judiciary Committee Monday will be offered as a substitute. The bill passed by a 12-6 vote, with the majority of Republicans on the panel opposing it.

Like Mr. Frist's proposal, the Judiciary bill would boost enforcement, but it goes further by establishing a regulatory framework for guest workers and inviting undocumented immigrants to come forward and try to legalize their position without having to first return home. This will surely meet resistance from the House, and despite strong ties to business interests supporting the Senate bill, House Majority Leader John Boehner of Ohio was hesitant to go as far as the language in the Judiciary bill.

"We are going to have to find a way to do what the American people expect of us, and that is pass a strong border-security bill," Mr. Boehner said. Asked if the public expects a guest-worker program as well, he said, "I don't know."

Democrats have their own divisions over immigration policy, but the splits among Republicans are more significant because they control the Congress and the White House. Some Republicans fear that to make short-term gains with conservatives in November, the party may damage itself permanently with the growing Hispanic vote. And the Senate jockeying between Sen. Frist and Sen. John McCain (R., Ariz.), who supports a more comprehensive approach to immigration overhaul, could be a prelude to the 2008 presidential campaign.

In the past week, President Bush has cautioned Congress against passing a bill that only toughens enforcement. After meeting with the president yesterday, Mr. McCain said, "His body language was good for me."

House Republicans are skittish and divided. The Arizona congressional delegation mirrors this rift. Thanks to its long, largely unfenced border with Mexico, the state is home to an estimated 500,000 illegal immigrants out of a population of six million.

For example, Jeff Flake, a conservative Republican congressman from Mesa, has allied with Mr. McCain and supports legislation close to the Judiciary bill. J.D. Hayworth, from Scottsdale, is another conservative Republican representative -- and one with opposing views. He has written a book that proposes building a fence along the U.S.-Mexico border, using the armed forces to help patrol the area and denying citizenship to the U.S.-born children of illegal immigrants.

Arizona's senators -- Jon Kyl and Mr. McCain -- both want to help the estimated 11 million illegal immigrants already here to stay in the U.S. legally, but they disagree over how. The Kyl approach wants illegal immigrants to go home before returning as guest workers, and doesn't offer them citizenship.

In the House, Republican John Shadegg, who represents Phoenix, favors a guest-worker program, but helped broker the House immigration bill that didn't include one. Jim Kolbe, also a Republican, wants employers to have access to thousands more legal immigrants.

With the Republicans at odds, the delegation's two Democrats find themselves largely bypassed in the debate, even though both are Hispanic.

Mr. Flake represents the pro-business wing of the Republican Party, which argues that the booming construction and service industries need perhaps a half-million new immigrants yearly to offset a shrinking supply of American workers.

From his youth on a ranch in the 1970s, the congressman recalls that Mexicans working on farms and ranches in the border state routinely were hired for a couple of years, traveled home often and left for good after earning some money. His bill -- co-sponsored by Mr. Kolbe and close to the Judiciary bill -- proposes a guest-worker plan that would restore that pattern.

Because immigrants could travel home, they would be disinclined to settle in the U.S., easing the budget pressures and cultural tensions that fuel anti-immigrant sentiments now, Mr. Flake argues. That is a prediction the bill's critics dispute, however.

Mr. Hayworth represents the security-first wing of the party, which argues that the porous border is an invitation to another terrorist attack and a giveaway to employers who benefit from the low wages that unchecked immigration allows them to pay.

DOJ_NMG_0023532

Mr. Hayworth argues that lax enforcement of immigration laws has created a vast illegal underground where terrorists hide and immigrants willing to work for low pay are depressing wages. That cheap labor, he says, enables employers to shift health and welfare costs to taxpayers. Without it, he says, employers either would pay higher wages or mechanize more jobs, a view endorsed by policy groups and economists who favor restricting immigration.

Business is a player: the U.S. Chamber of Commerce opposed the House enforcement provisions because of the adverse effect on employers. By contrast the business-sponsored National Immigration Forum described the bipartisan vote in the Senate panel as "a big day for immigrants, a bigger day for America."

AFL-CIO President John Sweeney yesterday joined in praising the Senate committee's broader approach. But he and others in organized labor warned their own Democratic allies that they are skeptical of the reliance on guest-employee regimens, which "cast workers into a perennial second-class status and unfairly put their fates into their employers' hands," Mr. Sweeney said.

How The GOP Can Survive The Immigration Debate (HILL)

By Dick Morris

The Hill, March 29, 2006

The immigration bill pending in Congress poses as crucial a test for GOP efforts to reach out to Hispanic voters as the 1964 Civil Rights Act did in determining the future partisan preferences of America's African-Americans.

In 1964, the Republican Party, led by Barry Goldwater, was painted as sacrificing the interests of civil rights to its goal of attracting Southern support, although Republicans backed the bill in far greater numbers than Democrats did. But when Goldwater ran for president rejecting civil rights legislation, it doomed GOP chances among black voters for at least the next 40 years.

Will the Republican need to appease its anti-immigration base similarly vitiate President Bush's efforts to appeal to Hispanic voters?

Hispanics, let's remember, were the swing voter group in 2004. Having voted for Al Gore by 30 points in 2000, they sufficiently trusted Bush to back Sen. John Kerry by only an eight-point margin. If the Republican Party now turns its back on these newly swing Latino voters, it may permanently lose its ability to win America's fastest-growing voter group, perhaps dooming the party altogether.

But the demands of the GOP base must also be accommodated. Here's how:

One must separately consider the three key elements of immigration reform under discussion: The border fence, the guest-worker program and the criminalization of illegal aliens and those who employ them.

The GOP base wants a fence. It is vital to the entire concept of whether or not we can control our borders. All efforts to beef up manpower on the border have failed to stem the daily flow of illegal immigrants from Mexico. A fence is the only way to do it. By backing a fence and demonstrably taking control of our southern border, the Republican Party will appease the demands of its base.

But to prevent disaster among Latino voters, it must accompany the fence with a more liberal policy on guest workers and criminalization.

Simply put, the fence must have a gate that swings open for immigrants we want and need. To avoid permanently antagonizing our southern neighbors and to keep the labor supply on which so much of American business and prosperity depend, we need a guest-worker program.

The GOP base, happy with the fence, will probably go along with it. Whatever the Congress needs to do to differentiate the guest-worker program from amnesty it should do, but it must pass a generous guest-worker program. (If it is necessary for those here illegally to return to Mexico and reenter as registered and enrolled guest workers, to convince the right that a guest-worker program is not amnesty, so be it).

With a 4.7 percent unemployment rate, we will be slitting our own throats by denying our economy access to Mexican workers. We just need to make them legal, not illegal. With a border fence to enforce the difference, a guest-worker program will work politically.

And it is also important for the Republicans to avoid symbolic acts like making it a felony to be here illegally or to employ someone who is. The same practical deterrence is quite possible through the fence, and merely upgrading the jail time from a misdemeanor to a felony won't make much practical difference.

Judges, in any event, are not about to crowd our jails with millions of felony illegal entrants. Deportation is and will be the answer to those we catch — and deportation has new meaning with a fence in place.

Yes to the fence, yes to guest workers and no to greater criminalization are the keys to giving the Republican Party access to Latino votes in the future while coping with an issue that roils tens of millions of Americans.

DOJ_NMG_0023533

Morris, a former political adviser to Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) and President Bill Clinton, is the author of Condi vs. Hillary: The Next Great Presidential Race.

The GOP Walks A Border Tightrope (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

Karl Rove must be seeing Pete Wilson in his nightmares.

President Bush's architect has been laboring to build up the GOP among Hispanic voters, and he's been succeeding: Bush won more than 40 percent of the Hispanic vote in 2004, double the level attained by Bob Dole eight years earlier. Some of that is attributable to Hispanic voters' particular affinity for Bush, a former border state governor. But the change has been marked enough to make some smart Democrats fear they're at risk of losing their hold on a large and fast-growing slice of voters.

Now, though, with thousands demonstrating against a House-passed immigration bill that is all crackdown and no mercy, Rove's project is imperiled. The GOP -- riven between an enforcement-only approach and Bush's kinder, gentler immigration reform -- is risking a national repeat of Wilson's experience as governor of California over a decade ago.

Wilson pushed for Proposition 187, the 1994 initiative to deny state services to illegal immigrants, and won -- with disastrous results for the California GOP. Hispanic turnout in the next election surged, and the GOP's share of the Hispanic vote fell, from 31 percent between 1988 and 1994 to 23 percent from 1996 through 2000.

The current immigration debate, said Leslie Sanchez, who advises Republicans on Hispanic issues, "is Prop. 187 on steroids. It's real easy for a lot of my fellow Republican pollsters to say, 'This is red meat for conservatives, let's go out and pound this issue.' The deeper ramifications are that it turns off women and other ethnic minorities and turns on Hispanics, who are now mobilized against us."

Former Republican National Committee chairman Ed Gillespie invokes as well the more recent experience of Virginia gubernatorial candidate Jerry Kilgore, who ran anti-immigration ads and lost. "Anti-immigration rhetoric is a political siren's song, and Republicans must resist its lure . . . or our majority will crash on its shoals," he told the Federalist Society last week.

The difficulty for Republicans, though, is that their short-term political interests -- winning in November -- are arguably at odds with their long-term viability as a majority party. Their base is demoralized about the party's performance and riled up about immigration. Pushing for tough restrictions and resisting anything that has the whiff of leniency toward those who entered the country illegally may be the best way for Republicans to get their voters to the polls in November. And the recent protests, as unnerving as they are for Rove's dream of a GOP-inclined Hispanic electorate, also have the perverse effect of further enraging those already inflamed about immigration.

"White suburban voters who voted for George Bush are disaffected now," says Republican pollster Tony Fabrizio. "Would I rather be talking about immigration reform with these voters or the war? Immigration reform or gasoline prices? Sometimes, in order to avoid or avert the tidal wave, you have to do things that short-term make a little more sense than they do in the long term."

Public polls bear out Fabrizio's assessment. A recent NBC-Wall Street Journal poll, for example, found that 71 percent of voters said they would be more likely to favor a candidate who supports tighter controls on immigration; just 11 percent said that would tilt them to oppose. The percentage of voters who said the government was not doing enough to secure the nation's borders has gone from 54 percent in November 2001 to 78 percent, according to a Fox News poll.

And voters, especially Republicans, are hostile to proposals to ease the legal path for those in the country illegally. A February poll by the Quinnipiac University Polling Institute showed 62 percent (71 percent of Republicans and 55 percent of Democrats) opposed to making it easier for illegal immigrants to become citizens. A narrower majority, 54 percent (59 percent of Republicans, 52 percent of Democrats) opposed making it easier for illegal immigrants to work here. Some strategists argue that voters would support stepped-up enforcement plus reform, but that may contain more than a dollop of wishful thinking: Fueled by the kerosene of talk radio and cable news, this is not exactly a nuanced debate.

But if Republicans are about to hand Democrats a gift on immigration, Democrats have been treating the issue more like a hot potato. Spooked that immigration may become a GOP base-energizing issue, much like gay marriage in 2004, they are torn between trying to protect themselves against charges that they are soft on the issue and trying to seize the opportunity to attract Hispanic voters.

An illustration of that ambivalence came with the House vote in December in which 36 Democrats, including all the vulnerable incumbents, voted for the House bill. Much as with Democrats' self-imposed silence on the Bush tax cuts during the 2002 campaign, it's a bit hard to capitalize on an anti-immigration vote backed by some of your own troops.

And indeed, Democrats aren't doing much in the way of capitalizing. A New American Media poll of legal immigrants, released yesterday, found that while only 22 percent said the Republican Party was doing a good job on immigration, the approval rating for the Democrats wasn't all that impressive either: 38 percent. "There's anger out there" among immigrants, says Democratic pollster Sergio Bendixen, who conducted the survey. "But there's also a feeling that the Democrats are not much better."

DOJ_NMG_0023534

Mexican Illegals Vs. American Voters (WT)

By Tony Blankley

The Washington Times, March 29, 2006

It is lucky America has more than two centuries of mostly calm experience with self-government. We are going to need to fall back on that invaluable patrimony if the immigration debate continues as it has started this season. The Senate is attempting to legislate into the teeth of the will of the American public. The Senate Judiciary Committeemen — and probably a majority of the Senate — are convinced that they know that the American people don't know what is best for them.

National polling data could not be more emphatic — and has been so for decades. Gallup Poll (March 27) finds 80 percent of the public wants the federal government to get tougher on illegal immigration. A Quinnipiac University Poll (March 3) finds 62 percent oppose making it easier for illegals to become citizens (72 percent in that poll don't even want illegals to be permitted to have driver's licenses). Time Magazine's recent poll (Jan. 24-26) found 75 percent favor "major penalties" on employers of illegals, 70 percent believe illegals increase the likelihood of terrorism and 57 percent would use military force at the Mexican-American border.

An NBC/Wall Street Journal poll (March 10-13) found 59 percent opposing a guest-worker proposal, and 71 percent would more likely vote for a congressional candidate who would tighten immigration controls.

An IQ Research poll (March 10) found 92 percent saying that securing the U.S. border should be a top priority of the White House and Congress.

Yet, according to a National Journal survey of Congress, 73 percent of Republican and 77 percent of Democratic congressmen and senators say they would support guest-worker legislation.

I commend to all those presumptuous senators and congressmen the sardonic and wise words of Edmund Burke in his 1792 letter to Sir Hercules Langrishe: "No man will assert seriously, that when people are of a turbulent spirit, the best way to keep them in order is to furnish them with something substantial to complain of." The senators should remember that they are American senators, not Roman proconsuls. Nor is the chairman of the Judiciary Committee some latter-day Praetor Maximus.

But if they would be dictators, it would be nice if they could at least be wise (until such time as the people can electorally forcefully project with a violent pedal thrust their regrettable backsides out of town). It was gut-wrenching (which in my case is a substantial event) to watch the senators prattle on in their idle ignorance concerning the manifold economic benefits that will accrue to the body politic if we can just cram a few million more uneducated illegals into the country. (I guess ignorance loves company.) Beyond the Senate last week, in a remarkable example of intellectual integrity (in the face of the editorial positions of their newspapers) the chief economic columnists for the New York Times and The Washington Post — Paul Krugman and Robert Samuelson, respectively — laid out the sad facts regarding the economics of the matter. Senators, congressmen and Mr. President, please take note.

Regarding the Senate's and the president's guest-worker proposals, The Post's Robert Samuelson writes: "Gosh, they're all bad ideas ... We'd be importing poverty. This isn't because these immigrants aren't hardworking, many are. Nor is it because they don't assimilate, many do. But they generally don't go home, assimilation is slow and the ranks of the poor are constantly replenished ... [It] is a conscious policy of creating poverty in the United States while relieving it in Mexico ... The most lunatic notion is that admitting more poor Latino workers would ease the labor market strains of retiring baby boomers ? Far from softening the social problems of an aging society, more poor immigrants might aggravate them by pitting older retirees against younger Hispanics for limited government benefits ... [Moreover], [i]t's a myth that the U.S. economy 'needs' more poor immigrants.

"The illegal immigrants already here represent only about 4.9 percent of the labor force." (For all Mr. Samuelson's supporting statistics, see his Washington Post column of March 22, from which this is taken.) Likewise, a few days later, the very liberal and often partisan Paul Krugman of the New York Times courageously wrote : "Unfortunately, low-skill immigrants don't pay enough taxes to cover the cost of the [government] benefits they receive ? As the Swiss writer Max Frisch wrote about his own country's experience with immigration, 'We wanted a labor force, but human beings came.' " Mr. Krugman also observed — citing a leading Harvard study — "that U.S. high school dropouts would earn as much as 8 percent more if it weren't for Mexican immigration. That's why it's intellectually dishonest to say, as President Bush does, that immigrants 'do jobs that Americans will not do.' The willingness of Americans to do a job depends on how much that job pays — and the reason some jobs pay too little to attract native-born Americans is competition from poorly paid immigrants." Thusly do the two leading economic writers for the nation's two leading liberal newspapers summarily debunk the economic underpinning of the president's and the Senate's immigration proposals.

DOJ_NMG_0023535

Under such circumstances, advocates of guest-worker/amnesty bills will find it frustratingly hard to defend their arrogant plans by their preferred tactic of slandering those who disagree with them as racist, nativist and xenophobic.

When the slandered ones include not only The Washington Post and the New York Times, but about 70 percent of the public, it is not only bad manners, but bad politics.

The public demand to protect our borders will triumph sooner or later. And, the more brazen the opposing politicians, the sooner will come the triumph.

So legislate on, you proud and foolish senators — and hasten your political demise.

It Isn't Amnesty (NYT)

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

Here's one way to kill a cow: take it into the woods in hunting season, paint the word "deer" on it and stand back.

Something like that is happening in the immigration debate in Washington. Attackers of a smart, tough Senate bill have smeared it with the most mealy-mouthed word in the immigration glossary — amnesty — in hopes of rendering it politically toxic. They claim that the bill would bestow an official federal blessing of forgiveness on an estimated 12 million people who are living here illegally, rewarding their brazen crimes and encouraging more of the same.

That isn't true. The bill, approved by the Senate Judiciary Committee in a 12-to-6 vote on Monday, is one the country should be proud of. Four Republicans, including the committee's chairman, Arlen Specter, joined eight Democrats in endorsing a balanced approach to immigration reform. The bill does not ignore security and border enforcement. It would nearly double the number of Border Patrol agents, add resources for detaining illegal immigrants and deporting them more quickly, and expand state and local enforcement of immigration laws. It would create a system to verify workers' identities and impose tougher punishments on employers who defied it.

But unlike the bill's counterpart in the House, which makes a virtue out of being tough but not smart, the Specter bill would also take on the hard job of trying to sort out the immigrants who want to stay and follow the rules from those who don't. It would force them not into buses or jails but into line, where they could become lawful residents and — if they showed they deserved it — citizens. Instead of living off the books, they'd come into the system.

The path to citizenship laid out by the Specter bill wouldn't be easy. It would take 11 years, a clean record, a steady job, payment of a $2,000 fine and back taxes, and knowledge of English and civics. That's not "amnesty," with its suggestion of getting something for nothing. But the false label has muddied the issue, playing to people's fear and indignation, and stoking the opportunism of Bill Frist, the Senate majority leader. Mr. Frist has his enforcement-heavy bill in the wings, threatening to make a disgraceful end run around the committee's work.

The alternatives to the Specter bill are senseless. The enforcement-only approach — building a 700-mile wall and engaging in a campaign of mass deportation and harassment to rip 12 million people from the national fabric — would be an impossible waste of time and resources. It would destroy families and weaken the economy. An alternative favored by many businesses — creating a temporary-worker underclass that would do our dirtiest jobs and then have to go home, with no new path to citizenship — is a recipe for indentured servitude.

It is a weak country that feels it cannot secure its borders and impose law and order on an unauthorized population at the same time. And it is a foolish, insecure country that does not seek to channel the energy of an industrious, self-motivated population to its own ends, but tries instead to wall out "those people."

It's time for President Bush, who talks a good game on immigration, to use every means to clarify the issue and to lead this country out of the "amnesty" semantic trap. He dislikes amnesty. Mr. Frist dislikes amnesty. We dislike amnesty, too.

The Specter bill isn't amnesty. It's a victory for thoughtfulness and reason.

Poll Shows Growing Fear Among Immigrants (AP)

By Peter Prengaman

The AP, March 28, 2006

A majority of people who described themselves as legal immigrants for a poll released Tuesday said they believe anti-immigration sentiment is growing and are alarmed by the tone of the debate over reform.

Just under one-third of them said Congress and President Bush are doing a good job on the issue.

The findings come as the U.S. Senate considers immigration reform proposals, including legislation approved by the Senate Judiciary Committee on Monday that would clear the way for 11 million illegal aliens to seek U.S. citizenship.

DOJ_NMG_0023536

Lawmakers are also considering legislation that would make it a felony to be in the U.S. illegally, impose new penalties on employers who hire illegals and build more fences along the U.S.-Mexican border.

The poll was conducted by the firm Bendixen & Associates between Feb. 24 and March 21. Researchers said they interviewed 800 people who described themselves as legal immigrants in 47 states and who were reached by random digit dialing in communities with large numbers of immigrants. The said the margin of error was plus or minus 3.4 percentage points.

When told about reform proposals in Congress, 68 percent of poll respondents said they supported temporary work permits for illegal immigrants and a way for them to apply for residency after learning English and paying a fine.

That seems to conflict with arguments by some lawmakers who argue that a legalization program would be unfair to legal residents who played by the rules.

"Nobody comes here to get on welfare," said Perias Pillay, 43, who was 18 when he immigrated legally from Malaysia. He joined a massive immigration rally in Los Angeles. "They come here to work, and as long as we need workers we should let them come."

The immigration debate has sparked rallies around the nation by immigrant rights supporters, including the weekend rally in Los Angeles that drew an estimated 500,000 people. On Tuesday, hundreds of students in California and Texas staged a second day of school walkouts in protest.

The poll was commissioned by New America Media, a nonprofit San Francisco-based umbrella organization for more than 700 ethnic media outlets. Co-sponsors included the Center for American Progress, a liberal-leaning research group, and the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights Education Fund, an umbrella civil rights organization.

More than 60 percent of those interviewed said they were alarmed by the tone of the immigration reform debate. Sixty-seven percent said they believed anti-immigration sentiment was growing.

Asked about lawmakers' handling of immigration issues, 32 percent of those surveyed said Congress and President Bush were doing a good job. Democrats received the highest approval with 38 percent; Republicans garnered 22 percent.

On jobs, 81 percent of those surveyed said illegal immigrants accept low-end jobs that Americans don't want, and 73 percent said illegal immigrants aided the economy by supplying low-cost labor.

Delia Adene, 48, who immigrated legally from Mexico and joined the Los Angeles rally, said she was worried about the rhetoric.

"I feel like people see us as criminals now because we want to help our families," Adene said. "We do need more control of the border, but politicians need to talk about this with human justice in mind."

Immigration Debate Triggers More Protests (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely And Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, March 29, 2006

Thousands of students took to the streets in Los Angeles, Phoenix, Dallas and other cities Tuesday to protest a proposed toughening of immigration policy.

The demonstrations took place as Republican senators in Washington emerged from a meeting saying they will begin debating immigration legislation this week.

Tuesday's demonstrations, smaller than those that clogged streets over the weekend, were mostly peaceful, police said.

·In Los Angeles, 8,800 students walked out of class, said Susan Cox, a school district spokeswoman. They will have to make up the work they missed.

·In Dallas, as many as 3,000 students protested, many of them gathering at City Hall, said Lt. Rick Watson, a spokesman for the police department. Some of the students entered the building, but Watson said there were no incidents or arrests.

·In Phoenix, about 1,200 students gathered at the state Capitol, said Alan Ecker, a spokesman for the Arizona department of administration. The crowd dispersed without incident, he said.

“I'm here for my parents,” Juliana Rojo, 14, told the Associated Press. She said her parents are illegal immigrants. “They work hard. I just want them to be treated fairly.”

The Senate bill would allow the estimated 11 million illegal immigrants now in the USA to become citizens eventually. They would have to prove they have jobs, pass a criminal background check, learn English, and pay fines and back taxes.

Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., said he cannot support the bill approved Monday by the Senate Judiciary Committee because it offers a chance at citizenship to workers who are needed only temporarily.

Sen. Mel Martinez, R-Fla., a refugee from Cuba, said he made an emotional appeal for his colleagues to resist pressure to follow the lead of the House, which passed a bill that increases penalties and enforcement against illegal immigration and does not adjust the status of migrant workers, legal or illegal.

DOJ_NMG_0023537

"I think we should have the courage to stand up for an issue, even if it isn't what those who scream the loudest want us to do," Martinez said.

House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, said the House bill emphasizes that U.S. borders must be brought under control.

"The House has passed a responsible border-security bill. … I think the American people expect us to strengthen our borders," he said.

A Catholic leader who has been a harsh critic of the House border-security measure praised the Senate Judiciary Committee's approach. Cardinal Roger Mahony, spiritual leader of 5 million Catholics in Los Angeles, said he is "very pleased" with the committee's bill.

"The church is going to continue our educational efforts," Mahony said.

Like a number of the Judiciary Committee bill's supporters, Mahony argued that it offers a more workable approach to a difficult problem. "How are you going to pick up and arrest 8 (million) to 11 million people?" he asked. "It's not realistic."

Schools Focus On Walkouts As A Teachable Moment (LAT)

By Joel Rubin And Erika Hayasaki

The Los Angeles Times, March 29, 2006

He was supposed to be talking about supply and demand. But like teachers all over Southern California, Mike Stryer shelved the regular lesson plan for his economics class at Fairfax High on Tuesday. In its place, he took up the hot topics of the week: immigration and the previous day's walkouts by students protesting proposed changes in federal law.

"I don't know why we're always talking about immigrants as if they're all bad or good," 17-year-old Chris Potter said after a classmate suggested that there should be no distinction between illegal and legal immigrants. "The whole issue here is about 12 million illegal immigrants."

Stryer worked hard to keep the discussion from getting personal — a struggle in a class that was roughly half Latino and half African American. Several of the Latino students indicated they had relatives who are living illegally in the country.

When an African American student said that undocumented workers were taking jobs from citizens, the conversation turned pointed.

"Do you work? Do you have a job?" demanded 18-year-old Lesly Quinta. "You don't know what it means to work a $4-an-hour job to support your family."

Educators call this "the teachable moment," that serendipitous instant when a student's interest in a topic can be parlayed into meaningful learning. Such moments were popping like toast Tuesday.

"It's fantastic to be able to take an issue that is both current and important to my students and discuss themes related to the topic," Stryer said. "The kids care. They see a relevance."

Fairfax and all other Los Angeles Unified School District high school and middle school campuses had begun the day on lockdown, with students kept in their classrooms to prevent a repeat of the mass walkouts of the day before.

By midmorning Tuesday, however, the lockdown had been lifted and Stryer started his class by having students read newspaper accounts of the contrasting Senate and House versions of the proposed immigration bill and of the protests.

A brief discussion about the differences between the House and Senate bills led to a refresher on how bills become law. The class turned into a spirited debate over the rights that should be afforded illegal immigrants. When the closing bell rang, students were still clamoring to talk.

"It's so much better than a regular class," said Diane Morales, 17. "Instead of talking about something that happened 300 years ago, you get to discuss something that is happening right now. Something you're living through."

At Kennedy High School in Granada Hills, Principal Christine Clark presided over a lunch forum on immigration, passing a microphone down a line of more than 50 students waiting in the aisles of the auditorium, each squirming to talk. They spoke to an audience of nearly 300 others, some waving Mexican flags, some periodically booing.

Grabbing the mike, walkout organizer Carlos Mendoza, 16, told the crowd that he immigrated illegally from Guatemala with his parents seven years ago for a better future, education and rights.

"I'm very proud of you," he said, speaking to some of the 900 students he had led through the streets Monday.

Luis Gavilanes, 16, a Mexican immigrant, stood up, wearing a Che Guevara T-shirt. Why, he asked, are illegal immigrants treated like criminals? "Why should you compare something like wanting a better life to murder or robbery?" Students cheered in support.

The cheers turned to a mix of boos and applause when Jamielyn DeJesus, 17, spoke up.

"I'm very disappointed in anyone who walked out yesterday," she said. "I lost a day of my education because of it."

DOJ_NMG_0023538

DeJesus, a Filipina, said she spent Monday discussing immigration in small classroom groups instead of learning other subjects she needs for college. "I do support [your cause], I really do," she said as a few classmates rolled their eyes. "We came here for a better future and a better education, but why leave school?"

A voice shouted from the seats: "Because we want to be heard!"

At Berendo Middle School near downtown Los Angeles, Principal Jeanette Stevens sent packets of hastily assembled instructional materials to all of her teachers Tuesday, and had them build lessons around issues of constitutional rights and how citizens in a democracy should express their grievances.

The teachers then linked the discussion to students' current studies of persuasive writing, and had many express their views by writing letters to elected officials.

"The feedback we got from the teachers was that the kids really appreciated being heard," Stevens said.

At Santa Ana's Saddleback High School, students were kept in their second-period class until fourth period — about two hours — while Santa Ana police stood by. Some students complained that the restrictions were overly severe and that an open forum would have been more effective.

Principal Esther Jones didn't disagree, telling students over a loudspeaker: "You had your demonstration yesterday. It was a bit disorganized. This is a time for reflection and discussion. Not to walk out."

Jones estimated that more than half of her students are illegal immigrants. She said that she didn't oppose the walkout Monday but that she wished the students were better informed about the issue. "Bless their hearts," she said. "I love these kids. I don't want anything to trivialize the impact of what this legislation will do to them and their families."

The discussion in Julie Brard's peer counseling class at Los Angeles' Marshall High began with the immigrant legislation but gradually broadened into other issues: lack of healthcare, education, stereotypes. Of the 27 students in the class, 22 said they had a parent who came from another country.

"Look at the sacrifice [your parents] made," she said. "Are you living up to their sacrifice?"

"Yes," the students answered in chorus.

"Those of you who are failing, doing drugs and alcohol — what are you doing to honor that [sacrifice]?" Brard asked.

"It is a question you need to ask yourself. You need to do more than walk down the street and protest. What else can you do?"

Said one student: "Keep on going. Further your education."

Students Walk Out In 2nd Day Of Immigration Rights Protest (WP)

By Tara Bahrampour And Maria Glod

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

Chanting, " Sí , se puede ," ("Yes, we can") and carrying "Latino Power" signs, hundreds of Northern Virginia high school students demonstrated for a second day yesterday against legislation that would crack down on illegal immigrants.

In Prince William County, about 350 students protested outside Freedom High School in Woodbridge. In Fairfax County, dozens of students marched out of JE.B. Stuart High School and into Arlington County, where they stopped at two more high schools, adding students at each stop.

Opponents of the legislation have demonstrated across the country, including 500,000 people in Los Angeles on Saturday. The legislation, passed by the House of Representatives, would make it a felony to be in the United States illegally and make it a crime to help illegal immigrants.

The Fairfax march started at Stuart High in the Falls Church area about 9 a.m. "We started getting bigger, so we left the school," said Louie Martinez, 16, a sophomore at Stuart, whose student body is 40 percent Latino. "We were like, 'We'll just keep walking.' We're showing the government we're big."

The group marched to Wakefield High School and then, followed by police cars that blocked traffic, marched several miles up George Mason Drive to Washington-Lee High School.

After police told them they would be arrested if they strayed onto the Washington-Lee campus, the protesters demonstrated at a park across the street.

The school's doors were locked to prevent outsiders from entering, and at noon Principal Gregg Robertson announced that students who left would have unexcused absences. Still, about 40 students left to join the protest, which swelled to around 200 people.

School officials did not try to stop them. "Part of the Washington-Lee mission is to encourage students to take an active role in their community," Robertson said. As with earlier demonstrations, word of the protests was spread by cellphone and the Web site MySpace.com. Some students said they learned about the immigration debate from newspapers or in class. Others said friends convinced them that many of the proposals were unfair.

DOJ_NMG_0023539

Raeshwan Greene, 17, a senior at Wakefield, which is 43.7 percent Latino, said: "Half of my friends came here a few years ago. . . . People have forgotten the meaning of America."

Caitlin Thomson, 17, a junior at Wakefield, said: "These people have worked really hard to get here. There might be economic problems or a dictatorship. People want to be free and have a new life. That's what we learn in history class."

Some had more personal connections to the issue. Ephram Lopez, 16, a sophomore at Stuart, is U.S.-born, but he worries that his mother, a baker, could be sent back to her native Guatemala.

"They are trying to deport her," Lopez said. "It's going to take her away from me and my two little brothers."

Lopez said everyone's quality of life in the Washington area is improved by immigrants. "We work at fast food restaurants. We paint houses. We mow lawns. Most people work without papers."

In Prince William, in addition to students from Freedom High School, many young people waving Mexican and El Salvadoran flags said they were from C.D. Hylton, Gar-Field and Woodbridge high schools, all in the eastern section of the county, where many Latinos live.

The students marched down Route 1 to Todos Supermarket, operated by Carlos Castro, a Salvadoran immigrant.

Arlington County Board member Walter Tejada (D), who joined the demonstration at Washington-Lee, said the students had been "itching to have their voices heard."

"They know that this bill unfairly cuts the legs of the working immigrant community," he said.

Christian Dorn, 16, a Salvadoran and a junior at Potomac High School in Dumfries, said the demonstrations had proved something.

"It got the word out that we're not going to be quiet," she said. "It's similar to what the African Americans did in the 1960s. . . . We shouldn't be treated like criminals."

Students In Virginia Protest Bill On Illegals (WT)

By Keyonna Summers

The Washington Times, March 29, 2006

Schools across Northern Virginia endured a second day of walkouts by hundreds of students protesting federal legislation that would crack down on illegal aliens.

About 400 students holding signs and flags from their home countries demonstrated yesterday in front of Freedom High School in Woodbridge, Va., said Phil Kavitz, a spokesman of Prince William County Public Schools. About 100 students from Woodbridge High School and about 60 from C.D. Hylton High School joined the protest.

About 150 students and community members had protested at Freedom on Monday.

"Kids were holding up their signs and chanting," Mr. Kavitz said. "At 11:30, they ended their demonstration and dispersed very peacefully."

About 100 students in Fairfax County and several in Arlington also walked out of classes.

Twenty to 30 students walked out of Stuart High School in Falls Church at about 9 a.m., said Fairfax County Public Schools spokesman Paul Regnier. Some returned when ordered by school officials, and those who left were notified that they were in violation of school rules, he said.

School officials said the students reportedly walked to Arlington and picked up what one official said "seemed like millions" of students from Wakefield, Yorktown and Washington-Lee High Schools along the way. Arlington County Police drove alongside the students during their 3½-hour march to ensure their safety along some narrow streets. Police estimated that the number of marchers peaked at 200.

Dozens of Annandale High School students, eighth-graders at Edgar Allan Poe Middle School and some students from Washington-Lee High School also protested on Monday.

"I think it was clear that the purpose is they were protesting against immigration bills before Congress," Mr. Regnier said. "We believe in students' ability to express their views, [but] I think the issue here is of who has responsibility for the welfare of the kids.

"If the parents want to write notes to excuse them, that's one thing," he said. "In this case, the kids are at school, so the schools are responsible. If the kids are not in school, it's the parents."

The local rallies mirrored those in California, Las Vegas, Dallas, Phoenix, Detroit and Yakima, Wash., where thousands of students walked out of classes, ignoring rain and campus lockdowns to protest immigration legislation that they see as an attack on Hispanic rights.

The Senate Judiciary Committee approved legislation late Monday that clears the way for millions of undocumented workers to seek U.S. citizenship without having to leave the country first.

DOJ_NMG_0023540

The committee also voted down proposed criminal penalties on people found to be in the country illegally. It approved a program allowing temporary entry for 1.5 million workers seeking jobs in the agriculture industry.

The next step is the full Senate, where Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican, is negotiating with other senators on how to handle the committee's bill and his own proposal, which focuses more on punishing employers who hire undocumented workers.

Yesterday morning, 2,610 students had left 23 schools in the Los Angeles Unified School District. Students carrying flags marched through the streets and along freeway ramps. In the 728,000-student school district, about 26,000 students walked out on Monday, at a cost of more than $500,000 in state attendance funds.

Fox Urges U.S., Canada To Accept Guest Workers (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, March 29, 2006

Mexican President Vicente Fox is calling on Canada to accept more low-skilled Mexican workers in its temporary work force, making his push for guest workers a continentwide affair.

"We should move out from agriculture to other services and other kinds of jobs, and we are working on this with the Canadian government," Mr. Fox said in yesterday's edition of the Toronto Globe and Mail newspaper.

He is asking U.S. officials to legalize the estimated 6 million illegal-alien Mexicans in the United States and wants Congress to create a guest-worker program for low-skilled foreigners.

Immigration promises to be a dominant issue in the run-up to the meeting this week among Mr. Fox, Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper and President Bush. White House spokesman Scott McClellan said the leaders will discuss guest-worker programs and cross-border security efforts.

"There are responsibilities on both sides, and we all need to work together to make sure those responsibilities are met," Mr. McClellan said.

The Senate is debating immigration and appears to be headed toward approving some form of a guest-worker program. In December, the House passed an immigration-enforcement bill that does not include guest-worker provisions.

Mexican officials have been critical of the House bill, particularly an amendment that calls for building nearly 700 miles of fence along the border.

The Bush administration supported the House bill, but Mr. Bush told CNN Espanol yesterday that fencing off the border is "impractical." He did say that the U.S. Border Patrol needs more tools.

He also said he has told Mr. Fox that Mexico must work to secure its own southern border, through which hundreds of thousands pass illegally on their way to the United States.

Mr. Bush rejected the Mexican government's claim in U.S. newspaper advertisements to a role in the U.S. debate, saying that although "thoughtful suggestions" are welcome, Congress will write the bill.

The president is trying to keep a lid on simmering tensions over immigration, and has cautioned several times over the past week for a "civil" debate.

But some members of Congress say Mexican officials have crossed that line too often.

"Americans are tired of being told that they are bigots by the likes of President Fox and Foreign Minister [Luis Ernesto] Derbez," Rep. J.D. Hayworth, Arizona Republican, wrote in a letter yesterday to Mr. Bush.

"I respectfully request that you publicly make it clear to both men that their clumsy, over-the-top rhetoric about internal U.S. political matters pertaining to our border security is unwarranted and unacceptable."

Neither a spokesman at the Mexican Embassy in Washington nor a Canadian government spokesman could be reached for comment.

In his newspaper interview, Mr. Fox also disputed the size of the illegal Mexican population in the United States, saying it is between 3 million and 4 million, rather than 6.2 million as reported by the Pew Hispanic Center in March 2005.

Anchor-Advocate On Immigration Wins Viewers (NYT)

By Bill Carter And Jacques Steinberg

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

The nation's most prominent opponent of current immigration policy began his day yesterday on the "Today" show on NBC, debating a Hispanic defender of illegal immigrants. He moved on to "American Morning" on CNN to denounce a bill passed by the Senate Judiciary Committee on Monday as "an amnesty program."

By nightfall he was on a plane headed to Mexico, where he intended to assess critically the planned discussions on the issue between President Bush and President Vicente Fox of Mexico.

DOJ_NMG_0023541

This central figure in the increasingly fractious debate over future immigration policy was not a senator or congressman, nor even a lobbyist on either side of the issue. It was instead, a television news anchor, Lou Dobbs of CNN.

In the course of insistently offering his ever more passionate views on immigration all across the television landscape in just one 24-hour period, Mr. Dobbs underscored that what works in cable television news is not an objective analysis of the day's events but hard-nosed, unstinting advocacy of a specific point of view on a sizzling-hot topic.

While its competitors, the Fox News Channel and to a lesser extent, MSNBC, have consistently built successful programs around aggressively opinionated hosts like Bill O'Reilly and Keith Olbermann, CNN has maintained that its mission remains offering straight news coverage, unseasoned with sharp points of view.

Except for Lou Dobbs. On CNN only Mr. Dobbs's 6 p.m. nightly news program comes accompanied with the disclaimer that it will contain "news, debate and opinion." That is not a new development for Mr. Dobbs. He has had that freedom at CNN for years and his advocacy approach on the immigration debate has been widely discussed in recent months.

But in the past several weeks, Mr. Dobbs has ratcheted up his criticism of Bush administration policies, first on the Dubai ports deal and now on immigration, to a point where in the view of many he has become a significant factor in shaping public opinion on these issues.

"He has got a lot of listenership, and he is not a nut," said Senator Trent Lott, Republican of Mississippi. "He is a very thoughtful guy, and he feels very strongly about this issue."

Representative Peter T. King, a New York Republican and a leading opponent of the Dubai port deal, appeared repeatedly on the Dobbs show during that controversy and said he believed lawmakers were watching closely.

"He definitely influenced politicians who were watching him and listening to him," Mr. King said. "I think he had an impact."

Mr. King said that Mr. Dobbs was better able than other network reporters to "grab the issue, be able to keep it going and stay excited about it every night."

The management of CNN denied yesterday that Mr. Dobbs's soaring profile on the immigration issue — and the increased ratings he has garnered along with it — would steer the network toward adding more opinions on other news programs.

"Lou's show is not a harbinger of things to come at CNN," said Jonathan Klein, the president of CNN/U.S. "He is sui generis, one of a kind."

But CNN was hardly holding back yesterday on giving Mr. Dobbs opportunities to unleash opinions on the immigration debate, views that seem to have only grown more vociferous in reaction both to last weekend's mass marches in Los Angeles and other cities in support of illegal immigrants and the action Monday by the Senate committee.

On the CNN morning show he called the Senate bill "an unconscionable act" and "a sellout." He appeared again on CNN's midday "Live From..." program, saying, "I think illegal immigrants are a burden to the taxpayer, unequivocally."

Later, the network's "Situation Room" program displayed a clock counting down to the hour when Mr. Dobbs would be arriving in Mexico.

This followed by just a day a confrontation between Mr. Dobbs and a guest on his own program, Janet Murguia, the president of the Hispanic civil rights group National Council of La Raza, during which he lectured her on immigration policy.

"I want you to look me right in the eye, and I want you to hear me loud and clear," Mr. Dobbs said to Ms. Murguia, who replied, "I'm right here."

Yesterday, Ms. Murguia said, "There's no question he's branded a unique format."

Mr. Dobbs, who previously had a long-running and successful financial news-based program on CNN, said he had never held back on offering his opinions.

"I've been doing this three decades," he said. "I know whereof I speak on the political economy. I don't come to a conclusion out of thin air because of some partisan or ideological viewpoint, but rather with an analysis of the facts."

He said he did not believe that traditional objective journalism brought people closer to the truth. Asked if he himself knew what the truth was, Mr. Dobbs said: "I have strong feelings that I do. I have strong evidence I do."

CNN certainly has reason to celebrate Mr. Dobbs's expanding profile on the immigration issue. His program, which was up 24 percent in total viewers over the same period last year, is the only good news story in CNN's evening and prime-time lineup, which was otherwise down across the board in ratings for the past quarter.

Notably, for the first quarter of the year, Mr. Olbermann's show on MSNBC beat the 8 p.m. CNN show with Paula Zahn for the first time in the audience that matters most to news programs — viewers ages 25 to 54. But both still trailed far behind Mr. O'Reilly's dominant show at that hour.

Even as Mr. Klein conceded that "there is certainly a correlation between Lou's outspokenness and the ratings he has gotten," he reasserted that CNN would not be turning to opinion-based programs beyond the Dobbs newscast.

DOJ_NMG_0023542

"Cable has always been, certainly for the past 10 years, a hospitable home to outspoken, over-the-top figures," Mr. Klein said. "It cuts through the clutter." But, he added, "What is suitable for Lou is not necessarily suitable for many other, if any other, talent on the network. It is not a signal for some sea change at CNN."

Safety Stings At Work Sites Will End, Officials Say (NYT)

By Steven Greenhouse

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

Federal officials told immigrant advocates in a letter made public yesterday that government immigration agents would discontinue using undercover sting operations involving health and safety programs to round up illegal immigrants.

Such an operation generated a storm of protest in July when federal agents arrested 48 workers at Seymour Johnson Air Force Base in North Carolina on illegal immigration charges after the agents tricked the workers into attending what was billed as a mandatory training session sponsored by the federal Occupational Safety and Health Administration.

Worker advocates and immigrant groups complained that such activity would discourage immigrant workers from reporting safety violations or seeking help from safety officials at a time when Hispanics were suffering a disproportionately high rate of injuries and fatalities.

On March 17, Marcy M. Forman, director of investigations for the Department of Homeland Security's immigration and customs enforcement division, known as I.C.E., sent a letter to the United Food and Commercial Workers union, which had protested the ruse, to say federal officials were discontinuing the practice.

"This is exactly the action that I.C.E. should have taken," said Jackie Nowell, director of occupational safety for the food and commercial workers union. "Using health and safety as a ruse to catch workers is definitely the wrong way to go when immigrant workers are being killed and injured in far greater numbers than other workers."

TAX:

KPMG Settles Targus Audit Case (WSJ)

By David Reilly

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

KPMG LLP agreed to pay a former audit client $22.5 million as part of a legal settlement that also calls for a California judge to set aside a sanctions order imposed on the accounting giant last July, according to a person familiar with the matter and documents related to the case.

The settlement terms will allow KPMG to clear the legal record of a disciplinary action that could potentially be used against it by other parties who might sue the firm in the future. Orange County Superior Court Judge Geoffrey T. Glass sanctioned KPMG last summer for obstruction during pretrial proceedings.

The order emanated from proceedings related to a lawsuit brought against KPMG by former client Targus Group International Inc. The California-based computer-case maker sued the firm for malpractice, alleging KPMG's audit failed to spot alleged embezzlement by a former executive that cost the company as much as $50 million.

In settling the case, KPMG had proposed that Targus agree not to oppose a request for Judge Glass to vacate the sanctions order, according to a draft settlement proposal reviewed by The Wall Street Journal. The accounting firm also wanted records related to the case, as well as the sanctions order and its own appeal of that order, sealed, while precluding executives at Targus, or their attorneys, from speaking about or referring to the matter, according to the draft settlement proposal.

In a statement released yesterday, KPMG said: "The parties have reached a settlement. We cannot discuss the terms, which are confidential. We have settled the case to avoid more costly litigation." An attorney for Targus didn't return a call seeking comment. The company's general counsel, Michael Ward, was traveling outside the country and was unavailable for comment.

KPMG's efforts to clear the legal record in regard to the Targus case are an example of how big accounting firms are pursuing every means possible to limit their litigation liability and curtail the ability of clients to bring cases against them.

Home Sellers Face Unexpected Tax Hit (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

A growing number of homeowners, riding the crest of the real-estate boom, are getting hit by an unpleasant surprise when they sell: a hefty tax bill.

DOJ_NMG_0023543

This development stems from a 1997 law that Treasury Department officials said at the time would eliminate capital-gains taxes for nearly everyone selling their primary residence. Under that law, most married couples who file jointly can exclude as much as $500,000 of their gain. For most singles, the limit is $250,000.

Adding trees and shrubs to your property can help cut your capital-gains bill when you sell.

But as home prices have surged, more people have been selling their home for bigger gains than the exclusion amount -- and thus are facing unexpectedly big tax bills, accountants and other tax professionals say. Besides getting hit by the top 15% rate on capital gains, some also are facing the loss of deductions, exemptions and credits. In some cases, they may even be drawn into the rapidly expanding web of the alternative minimum tax.

Many sellers are startled to hear they owe any tax at all because they didn't realize the 1997 law erased a popular provision that had allowed them to avoid taxes. That provision generally allowed sellers to defer or eliminate capital-gains taxes by rolling over their proceeds within a specified time period into a new home costing as much or more than the old one. The law also deleted another provision that generally offered a once-in-a-lifetime $125,000 exclusion for people age 55 or older.

As a result, many people who thought they wouldn't owe taxes when they sell are now on the hook. Among those most likely to be affected are homeowners who bought many years ago and who live in hot real-estate markets such as California, New York, Hawaii, Florida and Washington, D.C. For example, the median price of an existing single-family home in the San Francisco area last year surged to $715,700 from $266,700 in 1996. The median price in Honolulu rose to $590,000 last year from $335,000 in 1996.

Though the Internal Revenue Service says it doesn't track how many people owe capital-gains taxes on their homes, accountants say more of their clients are paying them because many more high-priced homes are being sold. Last year, there were more than 827,000 single-family homes that sold for $500,000 or more, according to the National Association of Realtors -- up from 641,200 in 2004 and 66,100 in 1996. Though not all these home sellers will have cleared enough to have to pay the tax, many of them will.

These days, "it's not unusual at all" for an owner to have amassed a much bigger gain than the exclusion amount, says Richard Rampell, a certified public accountant in Palm Beach, Fla., and chief executive of Rampell & Rampell. In some cases, sellers don't discover this until after having sold.

One Florida couple, clients of Mr. Rampell, sold their home last year for $1.1 million. Their taxable gain was around $365,000, leaving them with an unexpected additional tax bill of about $60,000, which includes capital-gains taxes and the loss of certain other tax breaks, Mr. Rampell says.

"I rarely saw taxable gains on the sale of a home prior to the 1997 act," says Claudia Hill, an enrolled agent and the owner of Tax Mam Inc., a Cupertino, Calif. tax-services firm. Now, "at least 30% of my retirees are having to pay taxes when they sell the family home." Moreover, she says, many of her clients who have owned their home for lengthy periods are reluctant to sell because of the heavy tax hit they would take.

Under the 1997 law, to qualify for the full exclusion, you need to have owned the home and used it as your primary residence for at least two of the five years before the sale.

Alan E. Weiner, a CPA and tax partner at the firm of Holtz Rubenstein Reminick LLP, in Melville, N.Y., surveyed his firm's clients' tax returns and found these results: In the Manhattan office, 36 taxpayers sold their home in 2004 and 19 paid a tax. In 2001, 21 people sold their home and only six paid a tax.

The capital-gains tax isn't the only problem facing home sellers. A large capital gain can translate into even higher taxes for many people because of two other tax-law provisions, which are often referred to as "stealth taxes." These provisions limit your personal exemptions and certain itemized deductions once your income exceeds certain levels.

Here's how it works: Capital gains are included in your adjusted gross income. Once your adjusted gross income exceeds a certain level, you begin to lose certain itemized deductions and personal exemptions, adding another hit to your tax bill.

What's more, the higher income as a result of selling your house could force you to pay more by subjecting you to the alternative minimum tax. This parallel tax system -- which was originally designed to make sure high-income taxpayers couldn't avoid paying federal income taxes completely -- disallows personal exemptions and certain deductions, such as state and local taxes. Among those most likely to be hit by the tax are people with incomes between $200,000 and $500,000, according to the Tax Policy Center. Like the home-sale exclusion, the AMT wasn't indexed for inflation and is affecting increasing numbers of taxpayers.

For anyone thinking about selling, the rules underscore the importance of keeping good records of home-improvement costs, which typically can be added to your original purchase price -- and thus cut, or even eliminate, your tax bill. Examples of improvements include adding a bedroom or bathroom, putting up a new fence, installing new plumbing or wiring, and putting on a new roof. Even the cost of putting in shrubs and trees may qualify as "improvements" and raise your cost basis, according to the Ernst & Young Tax Guide 2006. But the cost of repairs, such as repainting your home or fixing gutters, can't be added to the purchase price of your property, the IRS says. For details, see IRS Publication 523 (www.irs.gov1).

DOJ_NMG_0023544

"When the $500,000 exclusion rule came into the law, a lot of people figured they'd never have that much gain, so they stopped keeping records of the improvements they made to the house," says Tom Ochsenschlager, vice president-taxation of the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants. "That could mean they'll wind up paying more tax than they should have."

* * *

An IRS plan to hire private bill collectors runs into another delay.

IRS officials recently announced plans to hire three collection firms in the first phase of a controversial project to help the government recover large amounts of unpaid taxes. But the IRS says two companies that didn't get the contracts have protested, and the IRS has issued a "stop work" order to the three firms.

While the issue is being resolved, the IRS "will continue to prepare for debt-collection work to begin," a spokesman says.

* * *

Here's a chance to talk back to the IRS.

The IRS is looking for "civic-minded" people to serve on its Taxpayer Advocacy Panel and make suggestions about IRS decision-making. Among the panel's tasks are to "identify and prioritize" taxpayer issues and make recommendations to the IRS and Treasury on customer-service issues.

To qualify, you must be a U.S. citizen and "able to commit 300 to 500 hours" during the year. You have to be current with your tax obligations and able to pass a criminal background check.

Facts And Folly (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

I was leaving for a trip the other day and scooped up some reading material off my desk for the plane ride. I found myself holding three documents: one was the Bush administration's National Security Strategy for 2006; another was a new study by the Economic Strategy Institute entitled "America's Technology Future at Risk," about how America is falling behind the world in broadband. And the third was "Teaching at Risk," a new report by the Teaching Commission, headed by the former I.B.M. chairman Louis Gerstner Jr., about the urgent need to upgrade the quality and pay of America's K-12 teachers.

The contrast was striking. The Bush strategy paper presupposes that we are a rich country and always will be, and that the only issue is how we choose to exercise our power. But what the teaching and telecom studies tell us is that key pillars of U.S. power are eroding, and unless we start tending to them in a strategic way, we aren't going to be able to project power anywhere.

Because we've long been rich, there is an abiding faith that we always will be, and those who dare question that are labeled "defeatists." I wouldn't call Lou Gerstner a defeatist. He saved I.B.M. by acknowledging its weaknesses and making dramatic changes — beginning with scrapping I.B.M.'s arrogant assumption that because it was such a great company, it could do extraordinary things with average people. Mr. Gerstner understood that an extraordinary company could stay that way only if it had a critical mass of extraordinary people. This is the message of his Teaching Commission: We cannot remain an extraordinary country without a critical mass of extraordinary teachers.

"If teaching remains a second-rate profession, America's economy will be driven by second-rate skills," Mr. Gerstner says. "We can wake up today — or we can have a rude awakening sooner than we think."

The Teaching Commission notes that "our schools are only as good as their teachers," yet this "occupation that makes all others possible is eroding at its foundations." Top students are far less likely to go into teaching today; salaries are stagnant; nearly 50 percent of new teachers leave within five years. To remedy this, the commission calls for raising teachers' base pay, finding ways to reward the best teachers, raising standards for acquiring a teaching degree and testing would-be teachers, on the basis of national standards, to be certain they have mastered the subjects they will teach (theteachingcommission.org).

Meanwhile, the report by the Economic Strategy Institute, a nonpartisan think tank, is equally harrowing. It notes that while the U.S. led the world in broadband Internet access in 2000, it has now fallen to 16th place. In 2000, 40 percent of the world's telecom equipment was produced in America. That share is now 21 percent and falling. The U.S. ranks 42nd for the percentage of people with cellphones.

In an age when connectivity means productivity, when communications infrastructure is at the heart of any innovation ecosystem, these things matter for job creation and growth. The lack of ultra-high-speed networks in the U.S. "makes it impossible for U.S.-based companies to enter key new business sectors" — one reason venture capitalists are moving their R.&D. start-ups to Asia, E.S.I. noted.

"The wealth and long-term economic growth of the United States," it added, "have long depended upon technological advancement as a means of competing with our foreign rivals. ... America's emphasis has always been on achieving such high levels of productivity that it could be the low-cost producer while still paying high wages." The study offers a variety of regulatory and investment prescriptions (econstrat.org).

DOJ_NMG_0023545

It's not surprising that the Bush strategy paper is largely silent about these educational and technological deficits, as well as about the investment we need to make in alternative fuels to end our oil addiction. Because to acknowledge these deficits is to acknowledge that we have to spend money to fix them, and the radical Bush tax cuts make that impossible. It would be one thing if we were going into debt to solve these problems that affect our underlying national strength. But we are going into debt to buy low-interest houses and more stuff made in China.

We're like a family that is overdrawn at the bank just when the parents need to send their kid to college, buy a computer and a D.S.L. line, and replace a gas-guzzling furnace. Whatever "strategic plan" that family has for advancement, it won't get anywhere until it rebalances its books.

Corzine The Canary (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

Jon Corzine, New Jersey's new Governor, isn't the first politician not to follow through on a campaign promise. But rarely is such dishonesty later presented as a virtue. The question for voters to contemplate is whether this is also an indication of what to expect if Democrats gain control of Congress in November.

Mr. Corzine won the Trenton statehouse last year by running as a tax cutter who'd raise property tax rebates by 40% over four years. "I'm not considering raising taxes. It's not on my agenda. We have a very high-rate tax structure. I'm not considering it," the then-U.S. Senator had vowed in October.

Well, last week Governor Corzine removed the Steve Forbes mask and submitted a record $30.9 billion budget that increases state spending by 9% and includes $1.5 billion in new levies. He wants to raise the already high state sales tax by 16% and extend it to services; hike taxes on cigarettes, alcohol and expensive cars; and create a new state water tax. And just so Garden State entrepreneurs don't feel left out, his budget would impose a corporate tax surcharge and a commercial property transfer tax. "There are no immediate plans," joked one local paper, "to tax the air we breathe -- not this year, at least."

And what about his pledge to more than double property tax rebates in a state where the average homeowner's tax bill has risen by $1,300 in the past four years? That's on ice for now, and perhaps until he's running for re-election. "I'll be the first to acknowledge that some things have to wait," said Mr. Corzine in his budget address.

His spending plan would give homeowners about 30 bucks extra, which would hardly cover the property tax hikes that have averaged 7% annually of late. New Jersey already has the highest property taxes in the country, and the new Governor wants to extend its lead.

While voters might feel misled by this 180-degree turn, Mr. Corzine is winning praise from fellow Democrats as a "straight shooter" brave enough to make "hard choices." Former Governor Jim Florio said, "I think this is an intellectually honest budget." Senator Robert Menendez, who was appointed to serve the remainder of Mr. Corzine's term, commended the Governor for submitting the "most honest, fiscally responsible budget in years."

These Democrats have an odd definition of truthfulness, but then Mr. Florio himself pushed through huge tax increases in the early 1990s after saying he wouldn't. It cost him re-election, though that was when the New Jersey GOP still had a pulse. Like Mr. Corzine, former Democratic Governor James McGreevey also campaigned on a promise to lower tax burdens. The day after winning office in 2001, he declared, "I am ruling out a tax increase," yet he went on to raise the state's top marginal rate by 41% and make New Jersey's top income tax rate the fifth-highest in the country.

Knowing that track record, New Jersey voters may be getting what they deserve if they were dumb enough to believe Mr. Corzine. But this tax flip-flop seems to take place wherever Democrats take power these days. Former Virginia Governor (and possible Presidential aspirant) Mark Warner also promised not to increase taxes during his campaign in 2001, only to raise them later.

And now Democrats on Capitol Hill are promising they'll also cut taxes if they're elected to run Congress next year. Republicans have certainly given Democrats an opening by their failure to govern. But voters who might otherwise choose Democrats for a change might think twice if they conclude that Mr. Corzine is the canary in the coal mine of real Democratic tax intentions.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

More Tweak Than White House Shake-up (PHI)

By Dick Polman

DOJ_NMG_0023546

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 29, 2006

By one key measure, it is clear that George W. Bush is no Ronald Reagan.

Plagued by an unpopular war and big domestic headaches, and peppered with demands from Republican allies that he pierce his White House bubble and bring in new blood, President Bush responded yesterday by making one move. He replaced chief of staff Andrew Card, a veteran loyalist insider, with budget director Josh Bolten, a veteran loyalist insider.

Now flash back to 1987. Peppered with similar demands following the Iran-contra scandal, President Reagan responded by cleaning house. He installed, as chief of staff, Howard Baker, a former senator popular on Capitol Hill. He brought in a team of new advisers, including Maj. Gen. Colin Powell. He fired or eased out the big scandal players, notably Oliver North and John Poindexter. And he shared national security documents with Congress, waiving all claims of executive privilege.

Reagan's shake-up is prominent in the history books; the more minimal Bush response won't resonate nearly as much. After John Hinderaker, a lawyer and conservative blogger, heard the news, he headed his online remarks with one word: "Yawn." And he wrote: "I doubt that the change will make any difference, except maybe cosmetically."

It's questionable whether restive congressional Republicans will be satisfied by this move to the point where they will be eager to identify themselves as Bush loyalists as they run this year for reelection. They have long felt that this White House is too secretive - yet here is Bolten, as described in a Business Week profile: "[H]is penchant for secrecy befits the son of a career CIA officer."

As commentator Craig Crawford noted yesterday of Bolten, "He is inside the bubble of this White House and lacks the background and friendships on Capitol Hill that GOP leaders were hoping for in a new chief of staff."

Conservatives on the Hill have long complained that the Bush team spends too much money - and they remember Bolten's defense during one crucial episode in the battle over the Medicare drug-prescription plan. The original administration price tag for the plan was $400 billion over 10 years; after passage, it turned out to be roughly $535 billion. Yet Bolten testified last year that the old estimates were "completely consistent" with the new.

There is no outsider element in this personnel shuffle. Card, a longtime Bush family favorite who has served the President since his first stint as a candidate, will be replaced by a guy who has served the President since his first stint as a candidate.

There are other parallels. Card is strongly identified with the Bush agenda; he was a founding member of the White House Iraq Group and helped advance the arguments for war. In September 2002, when asked to explain why Bush was suddenly planning autumn speeches about the threat posed by Saddam Hussein, he replied: "From a marketing point of view, you don't introduce new products in August."

Bolten is similarly tied to the Bush agenda; he was a forceful advocate for Social Security privatization, writing guest columns even as the public - and Republicans on the Hill - were being scared off by the price tag.

As conservative commentator Kate O'Beirne noted yesterday: "There is no new blood in this 'shake up.' It's more like Andy Card put aside a vial of his own in the event the White House needed a transfusion."

Bush's move is less than sweeping for one big reason: In this White House, the chief of staff is not the most important bureaucratic player, job title notwithstanding. The real power is Karl Rove, the political strategist and policy deputy, and many observers say that unless or until he departs, there can be no substantive changes.

Bruce Buchanan, a veteran Bush-watcher at the University of Texas, said yesterday: "Rove's leaving would signal a major sea change, but there's no solid evidence that he expects to be shown the door, or brought on the carpet by the special prosecutor," a reference to Patrick Fitzgerald's ongoing probe of Rove's possible role in the outing of a CIA employee who is married to a Bush critic.

But, Rove aside, a serious reshuffling would arguably involve some key Iraq war planners. Even Fred Barnes, a conservative commentator and Bush defender, wrote last week that Bush should set aside his "admirable but unrealistic" loyalty code and replace Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. Barnes also called for Vice President Cheney to quit.

We are more likely to see continuity; indeed, we have seen it already. When Cheney's top aide, Lewis "Scooter" Libby, quit last autumn after his indictment in the CIA outing scandal, he was merely replaced by his deputy, David Addington, an outspoken advocate of wartime presidential power who is known in some circles as "Cheney's Cheney" - as Libby himself had been.

Some conservatives, watching the Card departure, hope for the best from Bolten. Many long viewed Card with suspicion; they assigned him the blame for a number of debacles, notably the Harriet Miers nomination and the Dubai ports flap. They think that Bolten, despite the Medicare drug dispute, will be "a reasonable voice willing to control spending," someone who can cure Bush's "lame duck syndrome," in the words of redstate.org.

But Card/Bolten was not the most important event at the White House yesterday. Note, instead, that Bush brought his entire cabinet to the Rose Garden to stand with him while he assessed Iraq. It was a visual signal that there will be continuity, for good or ill, on the signature issue of his tenure.

DOJ_NMG_0023547

As Texas analyst Buchanan put it: "Bush's future hinges on what happens in Iraq, not on who his top staffer is. It's the war that will really determine whether we will have a failed presidency spinning in the wind for the next three years."

Bush Taps Bolten To Succeed Card As White House Chief Of Staff (WSJ)

By John D. McKinnon And Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush, slumping in public-opinion polls and under pressure to make changes, announced a modest shake-up of his staff.

Mr. Bush said that Chief of Staff Andrew Card will leave the post he has held since the beginning of the presidency. He will be succeeded by budget director Joshua Bolten, another fiercely loyal and long-serving aide.

The White House said Mr. Card initiated the change, and there had long been speculation that he was close to giving up a grueling job that he has held for longer than average. Still, the change also comes when Republicans have been complaining about the president's political problems and calling for some fresh blood on the staff after a series of missteps. (Read the transcript of Mr. Bush's announcement.1)

But by itself, the switch to Mr. Bolten represents at most a mild change in a White House staff that remains unusually stable, and it isn't likely to satisfy those who were seeking a broader shake-up. Mr. Bolten, a 51-year-old former Goldman Sachs executive who joined Mr. Bush's presidential campaign in early 1999, even served under Mr. Card as deputy chief of staff during Mr. Bush's first term, until Mr. Bolten took over the Office of Management and Budget in mid-2003.

Mr. Bush didn't suggest any further changes are coming, though he didn't rule that out. In an interview with Cable News Network's CNN En Espanol, Mr. Bush said, "Josh's job is to design a White House staff that meets the needs of the president." Asked if any more staff changes were coming, Mr. Bush replied: "Josh has just begun to look at the White House structure."

With his elevation, Mr. Bolten is likely to become a bigger voice than his predecessor was in administration deliberations on a range of economic and trade issues. Mr. Bolten is an expert on policy -- particularly economic and fiscal policy -- and could help bring new prominence to those issues in an administration that has been focused on the unpopular war in Iraq in recent weeks.

And unlike Mr. Card, known for his passion for streamlining decision-making, Mr. Bolten may prove more adept at reaching out to lawmakers, thanks to a background that includes a stint as an aide on Capitol Hill. That could help avoid some of the costly mistakes that have plagued the administration recently, such as the blowups over the abortive nomination of Harriet Miers to the Supreme Court and a Dubai company's acquisition of some U.S. port operations.

"The biggest distinction between Josh and Andy is that Josh's job has been primarily a policy job for the last five years, while Andy has been focused on management and administration," said Vin Weber, a former Republican congressman and occasional White House adviser. "That might mean some differences at the margin."

Still, much like Mr. Card, Mr. Bolten essentially is a government insider who isn't likely to foment confrontation or dissent among Bush advisers -- something that some vocal critics of the White House think is needed.

If Mr. Card "had been replaced by someone other than Josh, then the president would be sending a signal that he wants to go in a different direction," said Paul Light, a New York University professor and an expert on the federal bureaucracy.

Stylistically, Mr. Bush from the outset has relied on a tight circle of loyalists and hasn't consulted as much as his predecessors did with Congress, even his own Republican majority. Now those once-compliant Republicans, worried about election survival this fall, have turned mutinous on some issues, such as the Dubai ports deal.

More substantively, the costs of war, entitlement programs and reduced taxes have spawned deficits that constrain Mr. Bush from any major policy initiative that might re-energize his presidency.

Some Republicans privately suggest that the only way to break the fiscal impasse is for Mr. Bush to reach a bipartisan compromise with Democrats, one that would force him to balance spending cuts with revenue increases. But such a compromise seems unlikely, given the president's belief that just such a compromise in 1990 doomed his father by enraging the party's antitax conservatives.

Yesterday's announcement appeared designed to minimize the expectation of change. In a brief 8:30 a.m. EST Oval Office appearance with both men, Mr. Bush praised Mr. Card's "wise counsel, his calm in crisis, his absolute integrity and his tireless commitment to public service." Mr. Bolten went even further, describing Mr. Card as "among the finest public servants of his generation."

QUESTION OF THE DAY

3 · Vote: Who was the most effective of these chiefs of staff?4

Mr. Card, 58 years old, a former deputy chief of staff and transportation secretary in the administration of Mr. Bush's father, had been on track to become the longest-serving chief of staff since the creation of the post after World War II -- if he had lasted through the year. Mr. Bush said Mr. Card had raised the possibility of stepping down earlier this month, and over the weekend the president accepted his resignation.

DOJ_NMG_0023548

Some observers predicted Mr. Card might consider a run for Massachusetts governor or for one of the state's Senate seats. Ron Kaufman, a Washington lobbyist and Mr. Card's brother-in-law, said it's too early for Mr. Card -- a former Massachusetts legislator -- to be thinking about that.

Meanwhile, speculation in Washington now will turn to the question of who will succeed Mr. Bolten as director of the Office of Management and Budget. Joel Kaplan, deputy OMB director, is a logical candidate. Another possibility: Clay Johnson, the deputy OMB director for management who was both a college classmate of Mr. Bush and a top adviser when he was Texas governor.

President's Chief Of Staff Resigns After Five Years (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush accepted the resignation Tuesday of his chief of staff, Andrew H. Card Jr., replacing him with Budget Director Joshua B. Bolten as the White House moved to regain a political footing deeply shaken by the war in Iraq and a rebellious and worried Republican majority in Congress.

The shift at the very top of the White House staff, the first since Bush took office five years ago, comes amid continuing pressure on the president to overhaul a team respected for its loyalty but exhausted from the grind of running the government and repeated setbacks in Iraq and, politically, at home.

No sooner was Bolten's appointment announced than administration critics, Republicans among them, began questioning whether he would offer the breadth of experience and respect that they say Bush needs now, with his political standing at the lowest point of his presidency.

Challenging the move as falling short of a staff shake-up, Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.), said: "They still need men and women of stature and gravitas in a number of slots there in the White House. They need to bring in some experienced hands to get a handle on things."

In Bolten, Bush has promoted a Princeton-educated, motorcycle-riding lawyer who has been at his side since 1999 and, before that, was in his father's administration and on a Senate committee staff.

Bolten, 51, became director of the Office of Management and Budget in June 2003.

His closeness to Bush is perceived as both an asset, in terms of his knowledge of the president, and a detriment, given that critics and supporters of the administration are calling for new ideas.

"Josh is a good guy — just not what this White House needs. They need a renovation, not just a new front door," said a senior Republican who served in top positions in Ronald Reagan's White House and spoke on condition of anonymity because he continues to deal with the Bush White House.

"They need people who can give the president honest appraisals, and not just the same group that has gotten him in trouble in the second term," he said.

Lott said Bush needed to hear "more disparate voices."

Nicholas Calio, the White House liaison to Congress during Bush's first term, said Bolten was "the logical and best choice" because "he knows the president, he knows the issues, he knows the personalities."

Besides, he said, Bush is not "particularly susceptible to calls that he needs to shake things up for the sake of shaking things up."

As Card and Bolten stood on either side of Bush in the Oval Office Tuesday morning, the president said: "Josh is a creative policy thinker. He's an expert on the budget and our economy. He's respected by members of Congress from both parties. He's a strong advocate for effective accountable management in the federal budget."

Card, he said, "has served me and our country in historic times: on a terrible day when America was attacked, during economic recession and recovery, through storms of unprecedented destructive power, in peace and in war."

It was Card who leaned over the president in an elementary school classroom in Sarasota, Fla., on the morning of Sept. 11, 2001, and whispered that a second airplane had struck the World Trade Center. "America's under attack," he told the president.

He kept the staff working with clock-like efficiency and precision during the 2004 presidential campaign and guided the administration's efforts to revamp Medicare and education policy. He also led the staff to secure the Supreme Court nominations of Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr.

DOJ_NMG_0023549

Card was also there for some of the White House's major stumbles: the inability to persuade Congress to go along with Bush's overhaul of Social Security, the administration's much-criticized response to Hurricane Katrina, and the doomed Supreme Court nomination of White House Counsel Harriet E. Miers.

As chief of staff since Bush was sworn in on Jan. 20, 2001, Card, 58, was closing in on the record set for longevity in that office: Sherman Adams, Dwight D. Eisenhower's staff chief, was in the job for five years and eight months.

Card, who served the president's father as deputy White House chief of staff and Transportation secretary, was among the first to arrive at the White House — at 5:30 a.m. — and would stay until the president retired for the night.

White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan said Tuesday that Card had approached Bush at the beginning of March and "raised the possibility of stepping down." They discussed it several times since, most recently on Saturday at Camp David when, he said, Bush "reluctantly accepted his resignation."

In an interview with CNN Español, Bush said Card's departure should not be seen as a sign of a larger shake-up. But, he added, "Josh's job is to design a White House staff that meets the needs of the president."

Asked if other changes were coming, he said: "Josh has just begun to take a look at the White House structure. And I haven't had a chance to talk to him about the future yet."

Replacing the chief of staff has become a standard operating procedure of a struggling White House. When his administration was weighed down by the Iran-Contra scandal, President Ronald Reagan replaced the rough-edged leadership of Donald T. Regan with the genteel manners and unquestioned integrity of Howard H. Baker Jr.

Rich Bond, a Republican political consultant who helped elect President George H.W. Bush and then served as chairman of the Republican National Committee, said Bolten's task, above all else, would be to boost the president's political standing sufficiently to retain Republican majorities in the House and Senate.

"It would be the mother of all political ironies to see the administration picked apart by a Democratic Congress," he said, because that was the fate of the first President Bush — a course not lost on that president's son.

"They have got," he said, repeating the phrase for emphasis, "they have got to re-energize the Republican base."

Bolten 'Not A Change' (RC)

By Ben Pershing And Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, March 29, 2006

House and Senate Republicans lent public support Tuesday to President Bush's announcement that Josh Bolten would succeed Andrew Card as White House chief of staff, even as GOP lawmakers and aides across the Capitol suggested that the administration needs to do far more to repair its faltering public image and strained relationship with Congress.

Card's decision to resign after more than five years in his post came as Republicans both on and off Capitol Hill suggested that Bush needed to make wholesale changes to slow the administration's downward spiral.

But while Bolten is well-liked by Members who have worked closely with him as the head of the Office of Management and Budget, most Republicans considered him to already have been part of Bush's inner circle and not the "fresh face" some had hoped for.

"This is not a change — this is just Josh Bolten moving from the OMB to chief of staff," Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) said, later adding, "They still need men and women of stature and gravitas in a number of slots there at the White House. They need experienced people to give them a hand ... I do think they need more disparate voices in there."

While not all Republicans agreed with Lott and others that the White House needed to bring in a seasoned veteran with "stature," most do believe the White House needs a renewed focus on the political agenda.

"Maybe [Bolten] brings new energy, but does he bring new ideas? That remains to be seen," said a House GOP leadership aide.

Sen. John Sununu (R-N.H.) said he doesn't read too much into the move, saying replacing Card with Bolten "doesn't signal a change in the structure of the White House."

Sununu also doesn't believe the move will necessarily affect the level of coordination between the two branches: "I wouldn't blame [communications breakdowns] on Andy Card, and I don't think if there are communications issues in the future it will be the fault of Josh Bolten."

Lott, who talked to Bolten on Tuesday, had some advice for the new top White House aide: "If you get a call from a Senator, take it, or return it. Don't kick it down the hall to Congressional affairs."

The legislative affairs office has been the focus of criticism from Capitol Hill Republicans in recent weeks, particularly in the wake of the Dubai ports controversy. Some GOP officials expressed doubt that Bolten's job change would by itself improve Bush's relationship with Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0023550

"What we also would need is some sort of sense of change or addition at White House legislative affairs," said a senior Republican leadership aide.

No such change appeared to be forthcoming Tuesday, despite some buzz to the contrary, as some Republicans said they did not blame Candi Wolff, head of legislative affairs at the White House, for the recent problems as much as they did her superiors. Hill veteran Sean O'Hollaren was recently named to head up Senate relations for the administration, and the House liaison, Brian Conklin, is generally well-liked by Republicans in that chamber.

Many Republicans are privately hoping that more change will come, not only with senior policy staff, but with communications personnel as well.

One senior GOP Senate staffer said more shakeups are a must to ensure the political health of the administration and the party, saying: "I think they've hit rock bottom."

This aide said Card's departure is a mixed blessing: "The good thing is new ideas and a burst of energy is really needed. The bad is that it's more of the same. It's not someone new coming in. ... Let's just hope there will be more [changes], for all our sake."

Another Republican staffer was more specific, saying, "It would send a strong signal if John Bolten's first move is to is clean out the press operation starting with Dan Bartlett."

In December, House and Senate GOP leaders at their bicameral retreat in Maryland lambasted both Bartlett and Card for the administration's poor communications work, and that was before the Dubai controversy and Bush's suggestion earlier this month that Congress had underfunded the Hurricane Katrina recovery.

It is unclear what else the White House has planned in the coming days and months, but a few smaller changes affecting Capitol Hill already have occurred. In addition to naming O'Hollaren to head up the Senate liaison shop, the administration also just named Blain Rethmeier, the Senate Judiciary spokesman, to the White House communications office.

Democrats, meanwhile, took the move as a signal that the White House and Republicans recognize they are in political trouble, and a sea change at the top is critical to their midterm success. At the same time, however, they questioned whether Card's departure would be enough to fix the public view of the administration's policies.

"The good news is the administration has finally realized it needs to change its ways, but the problems go far deeper than one staffer," said Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.). "Simply rearranging the deck chairs on the Titanic by replacing Andy Card with Josh Bolten without a dramatic change in policy will not right this ship."

Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.), the No. 2 Senate Democrat, said Card was not the problem, calling him "reasonable, professional and a man of his word."

"If the White House is looking to change course, they picked the wrong person to toss overboard," Durbin said.

Card's resignation plans were kept under a tight lid by the White House until Tuesday morning. Card spoke at a Lincoln Day Dinner in House Majority Leader John Boehner's (R-Ohio) district Monday night but did not let the Ohioan in on his plans until Tuesday.

Senate Budget Chairman Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) said Card "set a standard that a chief of staff will be held to as we go forward in this administration. ... It is a high intensity position that requires that you know all the issues, that you know who the players are, that you put out the fires and communicate effectively."

Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.) said Card's departure is understandable given his record length of service, saying he had "run out of gas" and it was a "good time" to make a change.

Thune said even though Card has done a solid job, the change makes sense: "In a second term, typically the administration tends to need an infusion of new ideas, different perspectives.

"It's indicative of a White House that is looking to send signals that it's willing put new horses on the team and is willing to change."

Even as they praised Card, many lawmakers also expressed enthusiasm for Bolten, with whom they have worked closely during his two stints at the OMB and as White House deputy chief of staff.

"He's an impressive guy," said Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas). "He's moved up the ladder. We know him to be very solid and thoughtful."

Unlike his predecessor atop the OMB, Mitch Daniels, Bolten has forged a strong relationship with House and Senate appropriators. John Scofield, spokesman for House Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.), said Lewis "has had a fabulous working relationship with" Bolten.

At the same time, Bolten has maintained the respect of conservatives who are worried about runaway spending. House Chief Deputy Majority Whip Eric Cantor (R-Va.) on Tuesday called Bolten "a real champion of fiscal sanity in Washington."

Bolten has stepped up his interaction with Congressional Republicans recently, attending some Senate GOP Conference meetings and staying at the House Republican retreat in February past the point when some Members already had left.

Bolten will remain as the OMB director until April 14, and the White House has not yet announced who will succeed him in that post. Speculation among Congressional Republicans Tuesday focused on three current OMB officials — Deputy Director Joel Kaplan, Deputy Director for Management Clay Johnson and Executive Associate Director Austin Smythe.

Johnson enjoys a strong relationship with Bush and previously served as head of the White House personnel office. Kaplan, meanwhile, is perhaps Bolten's closest aide and could move over to the White House with his boss.

Bolten Replaces Card As White House Chief Of Staff (KRT)

By Ron Hutcheson And James Kuhnhenn

Knight Ridder, March 28, 2006

WASHINGTON - Ignoring calls for a dramatic White House shakeup, President Bush on Tuesday turned to Joshua Bolten, a trusted loyalist, to replace Andy Card as White House chief of staff.

The personnel shift fell far short of the kind of bold move that some Republicans say Bush needs to pull out of his second-term slump. If anything, Bolten's ascension signals that Bush intends to stay the course despite dismal poll numbers and growing dissension in Republican ranks over his leadership style, policy choices and inattention to election-year GOP sensitivities on Capitol Hill.

"This is not a change. This is just Josh Bolten moving" to a new job, Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., said. "That's not what they need."

Democrats were dismissive.

"I have always found Andy Card to be reasonable, professional and a man of his word. If the White House is looking to change course, they picked the wrong person to toss overboard," said Assistant Senate Democratic Leader Richard Durbin, D-Ill.

While some GOP lawmakers had pressed the White House to appoint a new top aide with close connections to Capitol Hill, opinions were mixed as to whether Bolten filled that bill any better than Card had. Bolten did serve as a legislative liaison to Congress under the first President Bush, but Card had lobbied Congress for Detroit's automakers in Washington through the `90s.

As the man in charge of ensuring that the White House ran effectively, Card bears some responsibility for failing to anticipate and staunch the political hemorrhaging that has left Bush's poll numbers anemic. Over the past year, the White House has suffered political setbacks involving Iraq, Social Security, Hurricane Katrina, the failed Supreme Court nomination of Harriet Miers, Vice President Dick Cheney's hunting accident and the Dubai ports deal.

Sen. Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., a frequent White House critic and a likely presidential candidate in 2008, said Bush should do more than shuffle advisers.

"It isn't just a matter of shaking up his staff. It's policy, it's direction, it's leadership, it's confidence in that leadership. Sure, staff and senior people like chief of staff to the president have an effect on that. But just changing personnel doesn't necessarily change the perception or policy," Hagel said.

Other Republicans and some conservative commentators welcomed the move as a first step toward reinvigorating the Bush presidency. Staff shakeups are often used to replace worn-out aides and bring new ideas to a second White House term.

"It's what the doctor ordered," said Robert Tyrrell, editor in chief of The American Spectator, a conservative magazine that has urged staff turnover in the White House. "Changes have to be made. ... I think there should be others."

White House officials and Republicans close to the White House downplayed speculation that Card's departure would lead to more dramatic changes.

The chief of staff plays a critical role in controlling the flow of information and visitors to the Oval Office and in overseeing the entire White House operation. He or she also typically serves as the president's loyalty enforcer.

Bolten, 51, has been one of Bush's top advisers since the early days of the 2000 campaign, when Bush was still governor of Texas. He served under Card as deputy chief of staff before shifting to his current role as White House budget director in 2003.

Bolten's devotion to Bush came through in a 2005 television interview as he recalled their initial meeting in Austin.

"I fell in love with the governor and the whole operation, the whole spirit of the operation," Bolten told C-SPAN, the public affairs cable network. "And I thought, boy, this would be terrific if I got a chance to work on this."

A self-described "policy geek," Bolten likes to work behind the scenes. He was one of the architects of Bush's failed plan to overhaul Social Security and of the more successful effort to cut federal income taxes.

"Josh is a creative policy thinker," Bush said, flanked by Card and Bolten in the Oval Office. "He's a man of candor and humor and directness."

He also has a bit more flair than the typical policy wonk. The bachelor adviser rides a Harley-Davidson Fat Boy motorcycle to relieve stress and gladly took on the role of escort to actress Bo Derek when she campaigned for Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0023552

Card, 58, is probably best known as the man who first told Bush about the terrorist attacks on Sept. 11, 2001, in a whispered message while Bush was reading with schoolchildren in Florida.

He's been in his demanding job since the day Bush took office, typically working before dawn until well into the evening. Had he stayed in the post through September, he would have become the longest-serving chief of staff in American history.

In an interview last month with Knight Ridder, Card hinted that his time at the White House was drawing short.

"If the president says goodbye to me tomorrow, I would still turn around and say thank you very much for yesterday," he said. "I am a pawn on somebody else's chessboard, and I'm perfectly comfortable. I don't want you to take this as arrogance, but I believe that if I cannot find another job, I don't deserve this one."

Loyal Bush Aide Chosen As New Chief Of Staff (FT)

By Edward Alden

Financial Times, March 29, 2006

President George W. Bush announced the resignation on Tueday of Andrew Card as his chief of staff but resisted demands for a shake-up by replacing him with another trusted aide, Joshua Bolten.

The resignation, effective on April 14, follows a series of mis-steps in Mr Bush's second term that have driven his poll ratings to the lowest of his presidency.

John Podesta, who was chief of staff for Bill Clinton, the Democratic president, said: "Somebody needed to take the spear. Things are going in the wrong direction for this administration."

Mr Card lauded the president on Tuesday as "good man" who had done "great things".

Mr Card, a former car industry lobbyist and Massachusetts legislator who has been close to the Bush family for two decades, operated quietly behind the scenes, coming into the public eye most famously when he whispered to Mr Bush news of the September 11 2001 attacks.

The chief of staff is responsible for managing the president's schedule and ensuring that the best political and policy advice reaches his ears.

The president has been under mounting pressure to clean house in an effort to revive his presidency and leave a strong legacy for the 2008 presidential elections. Critics, including some in the Republican party, have urged him to replace Donald Rumsfeld, the defence secretary, and perhaps even Dick Cheney, the vice-president.

Fred Barnes, the executive editor of The Weekly Standard, an influential conservative journal, has urged the president to undertake an overhaul that would include replacing Mr Cheney with Condoleezza Rice, the secretary of state, who many Republicans want to draft for the 2008 race.

The appointment of Mr Bolten, the director of the White House office of management and budget and former deputy chief of staff under Mr Card, is one of continuity rather than change, however. It showed little evidence that Mr Bush is considering a larger shake-up of his administration or is wavering in his loyalty to key aides.

His appointment will also do nothing to minimise the influence of Karl Rove, the White House political strategist who was hailed as the architect of Mr Bush's first-term successes and is now widely blamed for the president's second-term stumbles.

It will also do little to shore up Mr Bush's relations with Congress, where many Republicans have refused to support him on Social Security, immigration reform and the controversial Dubai Ports World deal.

Ronald Reagan, the last two-term Republican president and a hero to conservatives, brought in a respected former senator, Howard Baker, as his chief of staff in 1987. He helped engineer Mr Reagan's recovery from the Iran-Contra scandal.

Top Bush Aide Resigns (CHIT)

By Mark Silva

Chicago Tribune, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON -- In replacing long-serving chief of staff Andrew Card with another administration insider, President Bush has taken only a small step toward regaining the standing that he will need to salvage his second-term agenda, analysts said Tuesday.

The president has been under pressure, including from allies, to shake up his White House team with his job approval rating reaching an all-time low and the Iraq war increasingly unpopular. But experts say Bush presented little real change with his announcement that he will replace Card with another longtime aide, Budget Director Joshua Bolten, who followed Bush from Texas to Washington.

The appointment of Bolten, a policy expert who trained at Princeton and Stanford Law School and served in the administration of Bush's father, to one of the most powerful positions in government could be the start of a deeper reorganization, the White House has signaled. When Bolten assumes his new role April 15, he will have latitude to make more changes in the remaining 2 ½ years of this presidency.

DOJ_NMG_0023553

Yet the swap of Bolten for Card, replacing one loyal insider with another, falls short of the bold stroke that some second-term presidents have made, such as Ronald Reagan's hiring of former Sen. Howard Baker of Tennessee in 1987.

Close observers of the presidency suggest that whatever reorganization is undertaken, it will be difficult for Bush to overcome his dual challenge: The weakening powers of a second-term president and a war entering its fourth year without an end in sight.

Bush's move struck many observers as a sign of continuity, not change, characteristic of a president who cherishes loyalty and stability. Even today, many of Bush's closest advisers date from his days as Texas governor, and he has resisted calls to jettison such controversial figures as political adviser Karl Rove and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

"Bolten and Card are the same person in the same suits," said Paul Light, professor of public service at New York University and an expert on government administration. "This is not the beginning of a shakeup, if a shakeup is defined as entirely new faces that assure the American public that the administration absolutely means business about learning from its mistakes."

In any case, Bush's problems reach beyond his staff, Light said.

"Second terms are fraught with havoc anyway, and Bush brought into the second term the Iraq war, which has hurt him," he said. "You have a combination of a tough issue coupled with the natural atrophy that comes with a second term."

Card has served longer than any recent White House chief of staff, starting with Bush's arrival at the White House in January 2001. As Bush noted Wednesday, Card has served him "in historic times—on a terrible day when America was attacked, during economic recession and recovery, through storms of unprecedented destructive power, in peace and in war."

The chief of staff, the most powerful among them anyway, serves as almost the chief operating officer of the nation, with a wide-ranging portfolio that includes keeping custody of one of the capital's most valuable commodities, the president's time.

It was Card who discreetly whispered in Bush's ear at a Florida elementary school on Sept. 11, 2001, that the second World Trade Center tower had been struck and that "America is under attack." Card also served through the run-up to a U.S.-led invasion of Iraq and through three years of war.

Renowned for starting work before dawn and quitting well after dark, Card has told audiences he has lived with war every day. "I wake up every morning understanding that," Card said at a U.S. Chamber of Commerce luncheon.

Card also has lived with the perceived failings of an administration widely criticized for its handling of Hurricane Katrina. And while Card helped Bush win confirmation of two Supreme Court justices, he also was involved in the botched nomination of Bush's counsel and friend Harriet Miers.

"There is a new season," Card said Tuesday, with an allusion to Ecclesiastes. "It is a different season, and Josh Bolten is the right person for that season."

Bolten, who served as policy director for Bush's first presidential campaign, had served as deputy chief of staff for policy at the White House from 2001 through June 2003, when he became director of the Office of Management and Budget. A staunch defender of the president's tax cuts, he has steered Bush's domestic budget cutting, a dramatic boost in defense spending and a nearly $400 billion war budget as the federal deficit reached a record this year.

But with many within Bush's own party privately calling on the president to recruit a seasoned Washington hand from outside the White House to help steer a new course through the most difficult period of this presidency, critics say Bush has made no change at all.

"If the White House is looking to change course, they picked the wrong person to toss overboard," Senate Minority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) said. "The American people are looking for a new direction from the Bush administration. It remains to be seen whether Josh Bolten can put the White House on the right course."

Top Aide Leaves White House Job; Budget Chief In (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 28 — President Bush replaced his chief of staff, Andrew H. Card Jr., with another longtime loyalist on Tuesday, a step unlikely to satisfy calls within his own party for fresh thinking to address the administration's troubles.

In turning to Joshua B. Bolten, his budget director, as the new chief of staff, the president stayed within what one close associate called a "circle of comfort" and what Mr. Bush's critics consider a closed world that brooks little doubt or dissent.

Mr. Bolten worked for Mr. Bush's father on international trade and has filled important policy posts for Mr. Bush since 1999, when Mr. Bush began campaigning for the White House.

The White House left open the possibility that Mr. Bolten would, in turn, replace other senior members of the staff.

DOJ_NMG_0023554

The change, however incremental, occurred at a crucial moment in Mr. Bush's presidency and, in a White House remarkable for the stability of its senior staff, represented at least a symbolic turning point.

With Mr. Bush's poll numbers at or near their lows, his agenda stalled, his party no longer staying in line behind him and the Iraq war overshadowing almost everything he does, the president has been under pressure to give his administration new energy and direction.

Mr. Card's departure and Mr. Bolten's appointment signaled a possible start to achieving those ends, but shed little light on whether more substantive changes were to come.

In interviews and public statements, Mr. Bush's aides said that the president had accepted Mr. Card's resignation reluctantly and that if there were shifts in policy to go along with Mr. Bolten's arrival, they would be gradual.

"The president's style is not Saturday Night Massacre," a senior White House official said Tuesday night, a reference to Richard M. Nixon's series of firings in the Watergate scandal. The official said Mr. Bolten had "been given full authority" to reshuffle the White House staff if he deemed it necessary.

Asked in an interview with CNN Español whether more changes were coming, Mr. Bush replied: "Josh has just begun to take a look at the White House structure. And I haven't had a chance to talk to him about the future yet."

Other officials said they would be surprised if the move foretold any major shifts of policy on Iraq, economic management or other elements of the domestic agenda.

People close to Mr. Bush said he deliberately chose an insider who understood how this White House operated, even at the risk of angering Republican members of Congress who have said the White House has failed to consult with them sufficiently and blundered on the response to Hurricane Katrina, the nomination of Harriet E. Miers for the Supreme Court and the handling of Dubai's effort to take over management of some American port terminal operations.

"The differences between Andy Card and Josh Bolten are at the margins," said Donald Evans, the former commerce secretary and one of Mr. Bush's closest friends. "Josh is somebody the president knows well, and he knows how he operates. He can hit the ground running, and that's what the president wants. Just like any C.E.O., he wants to promote from the inside."

But that may not satisfy the Republicans who have been calling for more wholesale change. Mr. Bolten, although not part of the Texas clique that has dominated the White House, has had a hand in nearly all big domestic policy initiatives.

And though he has little experience in the national security issues on which Mr. Bush's political fate probably rests, he is respected among Republicans on Capitol Hill, where the president has had trouble holding his party together.

Karl Rove, who serves both as Mr. Bush's chief political strategist and deputy chief of staff for policy, remains in his posts, despite lingering public uncertainty over whether he will be charged in the inquiry into the leak of a C.I.A. officer's name.

On paper, Mr. Rove's policy position makes him subordinate to Mr. Bolten, who held the same job during Mr. Bush's first term, though in practice Mr. Rove has few rivals in influence or breadth of portfolio, especially with Mr. Card departing.

A former White House official said, "It's hard to imagine the two of them operating hand in glove," but noted that Mr. Rove and Mr. Card managed to work together, if warily.

At a brief ceremony in the Oval Office, Mr. Bush said Mr. Card, a Massachusetts Republican who appeared tired and emotional as he stood at the president's side, had approached him "and raised the possibility of stepping down."

White House officials said Mr. Card raised the possibility on March 8, just after the White House was taken by surprise by the ferocity of a Republican uproar over the Dubai controversy. That was the latest in a series of cases in which Republicans complained that the White House had been slow to detect approaching troubles, and Mr. Card had repeatedly said that if the White House staff made missteps, "it should be directed at me."

Mr. Bush made the final decision last weekend at Camp David, aides said.

"He thought it might be time to return to private life," Mr. Bush said of Mr. Bolten, who has served longer than any other chief of staff except Sherman Adams, who worked under President Dwight D. Eisenhower from 1953 to 1958.

While largely unseen in public, Mr. Card has been one of the most crucial members of Mr. Bush's team, arriving at 5:30 each morning to organize the president's agenda, act as gatekeeper to the Oval Office and provide advice.

He never sought the limelight, saying a few months ago on C-Span: "I'm very comfortable with the reality that I am a staffer. I'm just a staffer."

A year ago, he told a reporter, "The biggest mistake you can make in this job is to confuse yourself with one of the president's best friends."

Clearly there is a bond between the two men, forged in some respects on the morning of Sept. 11, 2001, when Mr. Card whispered into Mr. Bush's ear at an elementary school in Sarasota, Fla., that a second plane had hit the World Trade Center and that "America is under attack."

On Tuesday, Mr. Bush recalled that day and praised Mr. Card, citing "legislative achievements from education to Medicare," the successful confirmation of two Supreme Court justices and the response to the Sept. 11 attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0023555

Mr. Bolten will start on April 15, continuing a steady path toward the center of Mr. Bush's innermost circle. Starting in 1999, after he left a senior post with the investment bank Goldman Sachs in London, Mr. Bolten was the policy director of the 2000 Bush campaign.

He was a deputy chief of staff under Mr. Card from 2001 to 2003 and since then has been the budget director.

Mr. Bush praised Mr. Bolten as "a man with broad experience, having worked on Capitol Hill and on Wall Street and in the White House" and described him as being respected by members of Congress of both parties.

Mr. Bolten is a graduate of Princeton University, the Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Affairs and the Stanford Law School.

While most Republicans welcomed the move, several made clear that they did not believe it went far enough.

"I'm one of those who has said I think they need some new blood, more people of stature in the White House," Senator Trent Lott, Republican of Mississippi, said on Fox News.

Mr. Bolten has not been a major player on Iraq policy, except for drawing up the budgets for the American troop presence there and the reconstruction. He will now become a significant player in the running debate in the White House over how Mr. Bush can begin to extract American troops.

As part of his job, he will sift through the intelligence that goes to Mr. Bush, and join many of the meetings on Iraq in the Situation Room. But the task of extracting troops over the next year will remain largely in the hands of Mr. Bush's longest-serving aides, who have now outlasted Mr. Card: Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, among others.

Newsview: Changing Chief Of Staff May Help (AP-Y2)

By Tom Raum

AP2, March 28, 2006

Andrew Card's departure as White House chief of staff and the elevation of Budget Director Josh Bolten to that pressure-cooker job hardly seems like the major overhaul some Republicans had urged to revitalize President Bush's struggling presidency.

But it may represent a modest attempt at a fresh start for a White House that had stumbled recently, including the failed Supreme Court nomination of Harriet Miers, the Dubai ports fiasco and slow disclosure of Vice President Dick Cheney's hunting mishap.

"There's no question that since Katrina, there have been some missteps that have shaped the president's inability to get a message out," said GOP political consultant Scott Reed. "These are no one person's fault. But they happened. And now it's time to get back on the offensive."

Tuesday's shake-up came with Bush's political influence diminished by public unease over the war in Iraq and by GOP divisions. Increasingly, the White House has found itself isolated and estranged from many of its one-time allies on Capitol Hill.

The White House held out the possibility that Bolten's appointment could presage other staff changes.

Bolten may not be known to many Americans outside Washington, but as Bush's budget director he's familiar to members of Congress.

"Andy did a very good job, and he did the job exactly the way the president wanted. Both he and Josh are capable. Probably the difference between them is that Josh has more experience on Capitol Hill and stronger relationships with the Congress," said Charles Black, a longtime GOP adviser.

Some Republicans had pushed for Bush to bring in an elder GOP statesman to take charge of the White House operation, much as President Reagan did in 1987 when he named former Senate Majority Leader Howard Baker of Tennessee to be his chief of staff after the Iran-Contra affair.

But those familiar with how Bush operates suggested that was unlikely — so long as Cheney helped shape administration policy and so long as Bush's top political adviser, Karl Rove, remained on the job.

"Cheney is the de facto chief of staff. He's two steps down the hall. He's like a barnacle, he's not going anywhere," said Paul Light, a presidential historian at New York University. Few experienced Republican hands would be enthusiastic about taking on Cheney, Light suggested.

Beginning with Hurricane Katrina, the White House has failed to recognize the seriousness of a succession of troubles that analysts in both parties say should have raised early warning signs — especially for an administration that prided itself on discipline and political skills.

The administration failed to gauge the extent of GOP opposition last month, for example, to a plan to have an Arab company based in Dubai run terminals at some U.S. ports. Likewise, last fall it misjudged the depth of conservative rebellion to Bush's Supreme Court nomination of Miers, later withdrawn.

The administration has also had a difficult time with conservatives in Congress on immigration legislation. Bush's plans to overhaul Social Security and revamp the tax code remain stalled. And the program to provide prescription drug benefits to Medicare recipients got off to a difficult start.

"Part of the problem was, for whatever reason, they got a tin ear to the political consequences of such issues. You can't do that. You have to be ahead of that," said former Rep. Leon Panetta, D-Calif., a former budget director who served as President Clinton's second chief of staff.

Still, he praised Card for doing "an outstanding job" in a post for which "you get burned out pretty quickly."

Panetta said he himself benefited in going from the Office of Management and Budget to being White House chief of staff, and he predicted Bolton would, too. "That OMB job gives you a good perspective of the entire administration. You're making judgments every day as to what programs should be supported and which ones are not working," Panetta said.

Julian Zelizer, a history professor at Boston University, said the change is "as small a shake-up as one can imagine" in terms of significance to the public. "Part of me thinks this was just a badly calculated effort to respond to all the demands to `do something,'" Zelizer said.

For his part, Card, who has served at Bush's side since January 2001, said it was time to return to private life. "It is a different season, and Josh Bolten is the right person for that season," Card said.

"This is not a great shake-up. This is not the beginning of a great exodus. This is probably one person who stayed too long," said presidential scholar Stephen Hess, a former speechwriter for President Dwight Eisenhower and an adviser to Presidents Ford and Carter.

Card's Departure Seen As A Sign President Hears Words Of Critics (WP)

By Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

A few weeks ago, President Bush's spokesman dismissed talk of an impending staff change as "inside Washington babble."

White House Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr.'s resignation yesterday suggests that Bush was listening.

Through one full term and the first year of the second, a signature of this administration was the indifference -- even contempt -- it showed for the capital's political and media culture, and for the endless flow of commentary and unsolicited advice that its inhabitants deliver daily to all presidents.

Bush, his advisers say, has by no means changed his view of what he derisively calls the "chattering class." But the Card move is only the latest sign that -- with his presidency under the stress of low public approval ratings, an unpopular war and a stalled legislative agenda -- Bush is more often deferring to the expectations of Washington conventional wisdom.

On Iraq, he has not shifted policy but has modified his message in response to legislators and GOP operatives who said he needed to more directly address the arguments of opponents instead of simply disparaging them as defeatists. On his domestic agenda -- after last year proved that doubters of both parties on Capitol Hill were right when they said his planned overhaul of Social Security was far too ambitious -- Bush has returned this year with a series of small proposals such as incentives for alternative energy sources.

At the same time, the president who set out five years ago to circumvent what he considered the "filter" of Washington's mainstream media, has started having off-the-record, get-to-know-you-better chats with White House reporters.

"When you run into brick walls, you need to figure out ways around it," said a high-ranking administration official, who acknowledged that a White House that once prided itself on tuning out the views of op-ed pages and cable talk shows is now more likely to tune in. "Part of what you are seeing is some adjustment to the political realities."

These accommodations are of the sort that many presidents have made before, and Bush's steps should not be overstated. He has not summoned a respected Capitol Hill figure to join his staff, as Ronald Reagan did when he tapped Howard Baker as his chief of staff after the Iran-contra scandal in 1987. He did not invite a well-known figure from the other party into his fold, as Bill Clinton did when he recruited commentator David Gergen to help right a stumbling presidency in 1993.

What's more, Bush's team well knows that making nods to inside-Washington expectations can affect its political fortunes only at the margins. As Bush himself said at a news conference last week, his "political capital" is nearly all invested in Iraq, and that war is almost certainly what will determine his political success or failure in the balance of his presidency.

Still, longtime Bush observers are struck by the stylistic changes on display.

"The first term was about discipline, driven by a big event -- Sept. 11 -- that shaped the era, and maybe it saved them for a while," said Ed Rogers, a Republican with close ties to the White House. "It allowed them to do things that were inconsistent with the currents and ways of Washington. Now absent a big event that has upset the political order and laws of political physics, they are back playing by the rules that govern this universe."

DOJ_NMG_0023557

Ari Fleischer, Bush's spokesman in the first term, said the president is simply conforming to a new political reality. "Tough times force you to adjust," he said. "When times are tough and poll numbers are down . . . the president is more open to change for whatever good comes with that change."

Fleischer said there is no doubt that the Card resignation was at least partly the result of Republican calls for a staff shake-up. "There was a drumbeat out there that the president's staff could not miss and Bush could not miss," he said. Publicly, White House officials said it was Card who decided to resign, but a top aide said Bush gradually came to the conclusion that it was the right thing to do.

The president-vs.-Washington battle is not a new phenomenon. Washington has long had its own unique culture governed by a set of unspoken but generally understood political and social mores. By custom, presidents are expected to reach out to the social and political elite. The people in that elite almost always have the same advice: Listen to the top pundits, do more to reach across the partisan aisle, embrace foreign travel, shake up the staff when polls go in the tank. Most recent presidents, to some extent, came to town intent on playing by their own set of rules, and most end up striking some sort of truce.

"There are certain lessons you learn," said Leon E. Panetta, who became Clinton's second chief of staff in 1994 after an unseasoned White House staff made many errors in the first year. Presidents such as Bush and Clinton, who came from outside Washington, "kinda look down on Washington," Panetta added, but ultimately realize that "if you do not learn how to work in the Washington setting, it will basically eat you up."

Bush brings some personal history to the subject. After watching the travails of his father's presidency, he came to town with an attitude that bad decisions are often made when presidents pay too much attention to party insiders who wring their hands or don't dare to take chances, longtime aides said. He considered many in Washington too quick to turn on friends and their core principles during troubled times, and too scared to "shape history."

Bush's strategy often worked, according to John D. Podesta, a former Clinton chief of staff. But even some Republicans said it was less the result of Bush's strategy than the Sept. 11 attacks, which spurred twin emotions of fear and patriotism among voters and in Congress that allowed Bush to set the agenda and strike a defiant stance. One person close to Bush said this created a false sense of power and success at the highest reaches of the White House.

Bush's fatal mistake, Podesta said, was going too far in the direction of avoiding, if not alienating, important people in Washington. "You have to tip your hat enough to the chattering class so they don't spend every day thinking about how to flay you," Podesta said.

The Card resignation by itself does not signal a radical shift for this White House. But aides said more changes will come and that Bush is strongly considering adding one or two well-known Republicans to help soothe relations with Congress.

First Buddy (WP)

By Libby Copeland And Mark Leibovich

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

Andrew Card didn't lose a job yesterday, he made a friend.

"Mr. President, as the chief of staff, I know I was a staffer," Card said yesterday in his resignation speech, "and now I look forward to being your friend."

The bright line between working for the president and being friends with the president has always been a big deal to Card, who is known for being enthusiastically humble. He liked to emphasize the "staff" in his title, rather than the "chief." In an interview on C-SPAN last year (in which he twice called himself "just a staffer") Card said he fought a "great temptation" to become buddies with the leader of the free world.

This, it turns out, is a White House occupational hazard.

"It's always easy to assume a friendship that's not helpful because you're with the president so closely in so many tense situations -- it's like being in a foxhole together," says Marlin Fitzwater, who served as press secretary to Ronald Reagan and the first President Bush. "On airplanes, in holding rooms, getting ready to make a speech, late at night, early in the morning, when everyone's tired, and in a lot of human settings."

The human element always makes things messy. Presidential staffers have to remind themselves they serve the office as much as an individual. The president is always "Mr. President" unless one happens to be the first lady. To this day, Mack McLarty, Bill Clinton's first chief of staff, still calls his boyhood friend and former kindergarten classmate "Mr. President," even in private.

When he became president, Jimmy Carter insisted that the friends who followed him to the White House still call him "Jimmy," says Gerald Rafshoon, who served two years in the administration as communications director. Rafshoon, who had served Carter when he was governor of Georgia, demurred.

He also struggled with just how to speak to his "friend," after vowing to himself that he would give Carter unfiltered advice.

DOJ_NMG_0023558

"Once I got to the Oval Office, the atmosphere was such that I was intimidated," Rafshoon says. "If there were other people there, I would come back later."

The distinction between friend and Mr. President is more than semantic, as many who have served at the pleasure of presidents can testify. There's a respectful distance not only in the Oval Office, but during dinner with the president and his family, says former George H.W. Bush aide Mary Matalin. This protects the president -- and his staff, too.

"There are times when you have to be an SOB on behalf of the president," says Leon Panetta, who served as Clinton's chief of staff for 2 1/2 years. "It helps to have that professional distance."

A staffer who's not properly deferential, who doesn't emphasize the professional over the personal, risks assuming power he doesn't have, or not giving the president frank advice, or being surprised when the president decides his assistance is no longer needed.

Case in point: the late Don Regan, Reagan's imperious chief of staff, whom some used to call the "prime minister." Regan feuded with the first lady (once hanging up on her) and was said to have stormed out of the White House after learning he'd lost his job. Nancy Reagan later wrote that Regan, a former Merrill Lynch CEO, "often acted as if he were the president."

As a staffer, "you're always deferential, meaning you're not the decision-maker, meaning you don't take credit for decisions," Fitzwater says. "Don Regan had trouble with those things."

Card, who served for almost six years before being replaced yesterday by White House budget chief Joshua Bolten, never had that kind of trouble. He often reminds people about the lowfalutin jobs he has held: at a McDonald's in Columbia, S.C. (rising as high as night manager), and one summer as a sanitation worker near his home town of Holbrook, Mass. He romanticizes the work to underscore the importance of getting dirty jobs done, be it on a garbage truck or in the White House.

As for President Bush, he's always liked loyalists -- people like Card, whose ambitions are tied wholly to the president's own success. He and Card and their wives have known one another for more than 20 years. If the men haven't been friends, exactly, they've had about as close a nonfriendship as a boss and an employee can have.

"I worry about the care and feeding of the president," Card said last year in the C-SPAN interview. "I greet him first thing in the morning and I say good night to him when he goes off to go home for the night. He probably sees much more of me than he wants to."

Then Card added, in what sounds like a strange distinction to anyone who doesn't understand the relationship between the president and a chief of staff: "The president is my friend and I do not want to let him down. But I am not his friend, I am a staffer."

Bush's Chief To Consider Changes (USAT)

By David Jackson And Andrea Stone

USA Today, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush's new chief of staff will look at possible changes in White House operations and staff as the administration grapples with political problems that include falling approval ratings and strained relations with congressional Republicans.

President Bush said Tuesday he's naming budget director Joshua Bolten, 51, to replace current chief of staff Andy Card, who has served as Bush's top aide for more than five years.

Bush, who told reporters last week he was “satisfied” with his White House team, said Card, 58, approached him about leaving the exhausting post. Bush praised Card's “calm in crisis” and noted that he routinely put in the longest days at the White House.

Bolten, 51, is a lawyer who served as White House deputy chief of staff before becoming Bush's budget director. Bush called him a “creative policy thinker.”

“Josh's job is to design a White House staff that meets the needs of the president,” Bush told CNN en Espaol on Tuesday. “Josh has just begun to take a look at the White House structure, and I haven't had a chance to talk to him about the future yet.”

White House press secretary Scott McClellan said it was premature to say whether there would be any more staff departures. But McClellan noted that Bolten has the authority to “manage the White House staff and to look at personnel issues throughout the administration.”

Bolten's appointment came after weeks of calls for staff changes from Republicans such as Sen. Norm Coleman of Minnesota and Rep. Pete King of New York. The demands intensified after Bush tried but failed to persuade the GOP-controlled Congress to accept a deal to let an Arab-owned company run some operations at ports in six states.

King greeted Bolten's appointment warmly. “Bolten is highly respected on Capitol Hill,” he said. “People feel they can deal with him.”

DOJ_NMG_0023559

Others said Bush needs to do more. “This is not a change,” said Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss. He complained that swapping one White House insider for another was “not what they need. They still need men and women of stature and gravitas in a number of slots.”

Presidents have often changed chiefs of staff in difficult times. Only a few new hires have made enough change to give a White House new direction. For example, Leon Panetta, a former California congressman, was brought into the White House in Bill Clinton's second year to impose discipline and focus.

The Bush White House already is known for its discipline and managerial skill. Bolten will be coping with a restive GOP Congress, a difficult war in Iraq and the worst public opinion poll ratings of Bush's presidency.

Bush's staff change Tuesday reflected a hallmark of his management style: surrounding himself with trusted aides he knows well. Bolten served as policy director for Bush's 2000 presidential campaign before joining the administration at its outset.

OMB Head To Replace Card As Top Bush Aide (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

President Bush took the first step in what aides say may be a second-term overhaul of his beleaguered administration yesterday as he announced the departure of longtime Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr.

Card offered his resignation earlier this month, saying it would be best for the president.

Bush named Joshua B. Bolten, director of the Office of Management and Budget, to replace Card, and indicated that more changes are in the offing. Card's resignation comes after a series of political missteps that have contributed to Bush's sinking approval rating and prompted some Republicans to urge a staff shake-up.

White House officials emphasized that Bolten would have the prerogative to bring in fresh staff members and revamp operations to suit his leadership style. The White House must find a replacement for domestic policy adviser Claude A. Allen, who resigned after being accused of stealing from retail stores, and now a new budget director. At least one or two other senior officials are expected to leave for their own reasons by the end of the school year this spring, a senior official said.

White House press secretary Scott McClellan would not speculate on the future of other high-level White House staff members, including Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove, Bush's top political strategist, who has been under investigation by a special prosecutor in the CIA leak case.

"All of us here serve at the pleasure of the president. And that's important to keep in mind," McClellan said. ". . . But I think it's premature to try to speculate about what, if any, decisions might come."

Card, who served nearly 5 1/2 years as Bush's chief of staff, said he will stay on until April 14 to ease Bolten's transition. Speaking from the Oval Office, Bush thanked Card for his "wise counsel, his calm in crisis, his absolute integrity, and his tireless commitment to public service."

Bush went on to describe Bolten as a "creative policy thinker" who is an expert on the budget and economy and who has earned the respect of Congress and knows how to lead. "No person is better prepared for this important position," he said.

In picking Bolten, Bush once again chose not to reach beyond his inner circle to fill a critical post. With many Republicans concerned that Bush's flagging popularity will hurt them in this fall's midterm elections, some have been urging him to select a seasoned Washington veteran the way Ronald Reagan brought in former Senate majority leader Howard H. Baker Jr. (R-Tenn.) when his presidency's second term was listing.

But Bush instead turned to someone he knows and trusts implicitly. A confidant of the president's, Bolten, 51, served as deputy White House chief of staff in Bush's first term before moving to head the budget office at a time when spending on wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, as well as the expensive new Medicare prescription drug benefit and the recovery from Hurricane Katrina, caused deficits to spiral.

In an attempt to accommodate the new spending demands, Bolten oversaw two consecutive budgets that reduced spending on many housing, education and other social-service programs. Still, many Republicans in Congress have complained that the administration has not done enough to rein in federal expenditures.

Taking the microphone after Bush's announcement, Bolten said he was "deeply honored" by the opportunity to succeed Card. "The agenda ahead is exciting," he said. ". . . I am anxious to get to work."

Card has held the top staff job at the White House longer than any person since Sherman Adams, under President Dwight D. Eisenhower, and Card has earned respect within the building and around Washington for his stamina and calm professionalism.

Largely invisible to the public, Card is best known for his role on Sept. 11, 2001, as the person who informed Bush that a second hijacked plane had struck the World Trade Center in New York. As Bush was reading to students in a Florida classroom, Card calmly approached and whispered in his ear.

DOJ_NMG_0023560

As chief of staff in the current administration, Card has been instrumental in some of Bush's signature achievements, including tax cuts, a broad education-revision package and the appointment of two Supreme Court justices. But his stewardship has come under sharp questioning in recent months after a series of mishaps, including the failed Supreme Court nomination of Harriet Miers, the bungled federal response to Hurricane Katrina, the slow public disclosure of Vice President Cheney's shooting accident and the unexpected Republican revolt over a plan to turn over management at a half-dozen ports from a British firm to an Arab-owned company. Card also played a major role in the creation of the behemoth Department of Homeland Security, which has come under fire for profligate spending and its ineffective response to Katrina.

Card, 58, has been the focus of much speculation in Washington about how physically and politically exhausted the White House staff must be in the sixth year of a presidency buffeted by recession, terrorism and war. Card has told interviewers that he gets up every day at 4:20 a.m., arrives at the White House an hour or so later and works until 8 or 9 at night.

"On most days, Andy is the first one to arrive in the West Wing and the last one to leave," Bush said.

McClellan said Card initially told Bush that he wanted to resign on March 8, just one day before the port deal fell apart. Bush did not accept Card's resignation right away, but he did not reject it, either. "What the president did was examine it," a senior aide said. After thinking it through and pondering who would take over if Card left, the two talked again at Camp David on Saturday and finalized the move.

Some conservatives are glad to see Card go. Quin Hillyer, executive editor of the American Spectator magazine, offered a "friendly good riddance" to the chief of staff. "This White House is justly criticized for its insularity, and this little bit of shake-up may help break up that insularity just a little," he said. "Without saying anything bad about Andy Card, it's a good opportunity for the White House to get a new start."

Yesterday, Card's voice was thick with emotion as he left the Washington stage.

"Ecclesiastes reminds us that there are different seasons," he said. ". . . But it is a different season, and Josh Bolten is the right person for that season."

Card Resigns As Chief Of Staff (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, March 29, 2006

President Bush yesterday announced the resignation of his chief of staff, Andrew H. Card Jr., who had served in the White House's most demanding staff position for more than five years -- the second longest run in presidential history.

Mr. Bush appointed another longtime White House staffer, Joshua B. Bolten, 51, to fill the position. Mr. Bolten is the director of the Office of Management and Budget and a former deputy chief of staff under Mr. Card.

In an early morning televised announcement from the Oval Office, Mr. Bush said Mr. Card had come to him "and raised the possibility of stepping down."

"He thought it might be time to return to private life," Mr. Bush said, adding that he decided to accept Mr. Card's resignation after a weekend stay at Camp David, the presidential retreat, with his longtime aide and confidant.

"I have relied on Andy's wise counsel, his calm in crisis, his absolute integrity and his tireless commitment to public service," said Mr. Bush, who is known for prizing loyalty.

"The next three years will demand much of those who serve our country. We have a global war to fight and win."

Mr. Card, 58, stood stiffly with his hands by his sides as Mr. Bush praised his years of service through the September 11 attacks, two wars and a string of crises and legislative challenges. In brief comments, Mr. Card quoted the Bible, saying the time has come "for a new season."

Gripping the podium, Mr. Card, his eyes welling, said in his farewell: "You're a good man, Mr. President, and you do great things."

"Working in the White House is a tremendous privilege. It's almost beyond description, the great privilege it is to work at the White House. But it is even a greater honor to serve as the president's chief of staff, especially to you, Mr. President," Mr. Card said.

"Mr. President, as a chief of staff, I know I was a staffer, and now I look forward to being your friend."

Mr. Card's exit came amid calls from Republicans for a White House shake-up. Many conservatives have been angered by what they see as the "tin ear" of the administration in recent months, pointing to the Supreme Court nomination of White House counsel Harriet Miers, quickly derailed by conservatives, and the backing of an Arab company's bid to operate terminals at six U.S. ports.

Democrats seized on the ports deal as proof that Mr. Bush has gone soft on security. The company dropped its bid because of the opposition.

DOJ_NMG_0023561

But a senior White House official said Mr. Card's resignation -- and the president's decision to accept it -- had nothing to do with the Republican clamor for change. Instead, the official said, Mr. Card was simply ready to move on.

Mr. Card held the top White House staff job longer than anyone in 47 years, since Sherman Adams served President Eisenhower.

To the public, Mr. Card may be best-known as the aide who calmly walked into a Florida school room and whispered into Mr. Bush's ear that America was under attack on September 11. Known as a soft-spoken man who took time to praise even low-level staffers who performed well, Mr. Card brought a common-sense approach to the job, using a complex system to remember even the smallest details.

He also worked longer hours than nearly anyone else at the White House, rising at 4:20 a.m., arriving at his office less than an hour later and often working until 8 or 9 p.m.

Mr. Bolten will take over the job on April 14. Like Mr. Card, he is a longtime adviser, having served as a deputy chief of staff from 2001 to 2003 before becoming budget director.

Mr. Bush said yesterday that Mr. Bolten was "a man with broad experience, having worked on Capitol Hill and on Wall Street and in the White House" and was respected by members of Congress from both parties.

Mr. Bolten, speaking after Mr. Bush, said he looked forward to keeping on track an agenda he called "exciting" and was "deeply honored" to be succeeding Mr. Card

Mr. Bolten, who studied at Princeton University's Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Affairs and Stanford Law School, is well-respected in top political circles in Washington.

The pick shows that Mr. Bush plans to push his agenda through the next three years, even during the 2008 presidential campaign, said U.S. Trade Representative Rob Portman, who has known Mr. Bolten for years.

Known as a square dealer with both the press and members of Congress, Mr. Bolten should be adept at helping the administration get its message out, Mr. Portman said.

"Josh knows not just the ins and outs of government, but in particular he knows the ins and outs of the White House," Mr. Portman said. "He'll make some appropriate changes."

Bolten To Replace Card As Chief Of Staff (AP-Y2)

By Terence Hunt

AP2, March 28, 2006

Struggling to revive his troubled presidency, President Bush replaced longtime chief of staff Andy Card with budget director Joshua Bolten on Tuesday and gave Bolten authority to make further changes in a White House staff that even Republicans have complained is tired, insular and lacking fresh ideas.

Appearing with Bush in the Oval Office, Bolten gave no hint about what, if any, shake-up he might order. But White House officials said no one should doubt his ability to replace Bush aides. "He'll have all the authority he needs ... to make the decisions that he feels best, working with the president," White House spokesman Scott McClellan said.

Like Card, Bolten, 51, is a Washington insider whose ties reach back to Bush's 2000 campaign for the White House. Democrats — as well as some Republicans — grumbled that the new White House boss looked a lot like the old one.

Bush said of Bolten, "He's a man of candor and humor and directness, who's comfortable with responsibility and knows how to lead. No person is better prepared for this important position."

Before being named budget director in 2003, Bolten was Card's deputy chief of staff for policy, a colleague of such senior aides as top political adviser Karl Rove and White House counselor Dan Bartlett.

Alarmed by Bush's falling approval ratings and White House mistakes — from the bungled Hurricane Katrina reaction to the ill-fated deal to allow an Arab company to manage U.S. ports — Republicans have been urging the president to bring in new advisers with fresh energy. The GOP's concerns have been heightened by anxiety over midterm congressional elections in November. Card, as chief of staff, became a target for blame.

Democrats said Card's departure wasn't enough. "Simply rearranging the deck chairs on the Titanic by replacing Andy Card with Josh Bolten without a dramatic change in policy will not right this ship," said Sen. Charles Schumer (news, bio, voting record), D-N.Y.

Said Democratic National Committee communications director Karen Finney: "As the saying goes, you can put lipstick on a pig, but it's still a pig. Unfortunately for the American people, all President Bush did today was make it clear that they should expect nothing more than the same failed policies they have come to know all too well."

Once believed to harbor ambitions of surpassing Sherman Adams' nearly six-year record as the longest serving chief of staff — under Dwight Eisenhower — Card told Bush on March 8 he thought he should leave, McClellan said. Bush decided over the weekend at Camp David to accept the resignation and replace Card with Bolten, the spokesman said.

"Ecclesiastes reminds us that there are different seasons, and there is a new season," said Card, whose wife is a Methodist minister.

Bush, in an interview with CNN Espanol, declined to say if other changes were in the works. "Well, Josh has just begun to take a look at the White House structure," the president said. "And I haven't had a chance to talk to him about the future yet."

To the public, Card may be best known as the aide who calmly walked into a Florida classroom and whispered to Bush that America was under attack on Sept. 11, 2001. A veteran of every Republican administration back to Ronald Reagan's, Card is respected in Washington as fair, smart and hardworking — the first to arrive at the White House around 5:30 a.m. and often the last to leave at night.

Card, 58, stood stoically with his hands by his sides as Bush lauded his years of service. Then, gripping the podium, Card said in his farewell: "You're a good man, Mr. President."

Card's eyes were watery. He said he looked forward to just being Bush's friend. Bush then gave him five quick slaps on the back, and the two walked out of the Oval Office together.

"Andy Card, a longtime friend of mine, is tired," Sen. George Voinovich (news, bio, voting record), R-Ohio, told reporters later. "That he stayed in this job this long shows how much he cares about this country."

As chief of staff, Bolten will regulate the paper flow to Bush's desk, oversee his schedule and determine who gets in to see the president — although some longtime aides have unquestioned access.

Bolten was budget chief when the government ran its three largest deficits ever, including the record $413 billion shortfall in 2004 — though most of that was because of the economy and years of decision-making by presidents and lawmakers.

"Josh Bolten has a record of failure," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev. "Look at what he's done with our national debt."

But Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (news, bio, voting record), D-Mass., said Bush had made a wise decision in picking Bolten. "His reputation among Democrats and Republicans alike is being a tough-minded, skilled conservative but also has an ability to work with Congress, work with Democrats as well as Republicans."

Rejecting charges of staff inertia, McClellan said half of Bush's senior aides have been replaced since the president's re-election in 2004. But some in Bush's inner circle — such as Texans Rove, Bartlett, Harriet Miers and McClellan himself — remain at the White House after 5 1/2 years.

‘A Cool Hand' On The Switch At White House (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — Joshua Bolten is passionate about music and motorcycles, bowling and baseball. As President Bush's choice to be White House chief of staff, however, he will get a new chance to fulfill another passion: public service.

The son of a career CIA employee and a college professor, Bolten grew up in the worlds of government and academia. For most of the past 25 years, he has toiled inside the federal government.

Now, however, Bolten will take on a larger role inside a White House stricken by setbacks ranging from the war in Iraq to Hurricane Katrina.

“He is a very quick study, he is unflappable, and he is a cool hand,” says Rep. John Spratt, D-S.C., the top Democrat on the House Budget Committee.

“People like him, and they trust him,” says Sen. Chuck Hagel, R-Neb. “Those are the two currencies for success.”

Bolten's friends describe a 51-year-old who also likes to ride Harley-Davidson motorcycles, organize bowling parties, play bass in a rock band and cheer on the Washington Redskins and Nationals.

“For all his success in the public sector, he is still a very regular guy,” says Dan Price, a lawyer who worked with Bolten at the State Department and U.S. Trade Representative's Office in the 1980s and early 1990s. “He throws himself into bowling with the same enthusiasm that he approaches everything else.”

During the 2000 presidential campaign, Bolten headed Bush's policy shop and earned the nickname “Wizard” from the would-be president. Bolten brought it with him to the White House, where he worked as deputy chief of staff for policy, then as director of the Office of Management and Budget (OMB).

In that job, Bolten has presided over federal budgets that expanded defense spending at the expense of some domestic programs — and sent deficits soaring to record levels. “He's been dealt some tough hands” such as Iraq and Katrina, says Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg, R-N.H. “You've got a Congress that likes to spend money.”

Democrats like Bolten but not his $2.77 trillion budget. Sen. Kent Conrad, D-N.D., top Democrat on the budget panel, once asked him, “How can a guy as smart as you come up with such bad results?”

DOJ_NMG_0023563

Throughout the give-and-take of the budget process, Bolten always stays on message. Asked last month whether a projected $423 billion deficit didn't call for higher taxes, he said: “A tax increase is the wrong prescription. … We are not an undertaxed society.”

Bolten's experience at the OMB should help him in his new post, says Leon Panetta, who made the same transition under President Clinton. “It's not a bad credential to take into the White House,” Panetta says. “When you're OMB director, you have a view of the entire government and the various programs, the ones that work and the ones that don't work.”

Having succeeded Andy Card as chief of staff, Bolten will spend more time with the president than anyone else. He will set the pace at which the White House works, help shape policy and implement it, mediate internal disputes, convey Bush's agenda to Cabinet departments and Congress, and manage the president's time.

“Whoever works for (Bolten) should be single, they should not like their home, and they should not like to complain,” says Ari Fleischer, Bush's first press secretary. “He's legendary for his long hours, especially at night.”

Bolten also has found time to rub shoulders with U2 frontman Bono and actress Bo Derek. An observant Jew, he recited the opening prayer in Hebrew at his first Cabinet meeting. He keeps a gas tank from a Harley-Davidson “Fat Boy” in his office. At Princeton reunions, “he's kind of a rock star,” says classmate Mike McCurry, who worked in the Clinton White House.

In 2004, Bolten joined a band of current and former government workers that includes Tabetha Mueller, Card's daughter. The foursome plays '60s tunes at school fundraisers and government functions. “We're all kind of middle-aged people trying to resuscitate our high school years,” says drummer and former White House staffer Bob McNally.

Shuffling The Deck (WP)

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

EVERY PRESIDENT is rich in unsolicited advice, and lately President Bush has cornered the market in one particular recommendation: Shake up your staff, bring in new blood, call the bullpen. Yesterday Mr. Bush responded to his unsought counselors as he usually does, by ignoring them. He accepted the resignation of his notoriously long-serving, notoriously hard-working chief of staff, Andrew H. Card Jr., but he did not exactly replace him with a fresh face. Joshua B. Bolten will have a shorter walk to his new office from his current perch at the Office of Management and Budget than a relief pitcher's jog to the mound. And as Mr. Bolten told C-SPAN's "Q&A" last year, he has been "a part of the president's senior team from the beginning, from the beginning of his 2000 campaign."

Is that a bad thing? It depends in part on what you hoped a shake-up might accomplish. Mr. Bolten is bright, dedicated, fair-minded and well-liked, so the threshhold question -- competence -- doesn't arise. And if you think Mr. Bush's second-term slide essentially is a management problem, maybe a new manager can help. The miscalculation on Harriet Miers, the failure to anticipate the Dubai ports deal controversy, the botched response to Hurricane Katrina -- maybe a fresher chief of staff could have done better. But Mr. Bolten, even if he doesn't rise seven days a week at 4:20 a.m., has been working nearly Card-like hours for as long as Mr. Card. And on Iraq -- the single issue on which the Bush presidency most depends, and that might benefit most from fresh thinking -- this personnel shift is unlikely to have an impact.

If you hoped that Mr. Bush might respond to some of his setbacks by adjusting some of his policies, this "shake-up" is even less likely to satisfy. We might dream that Mr. Bush would look at the mounting evidence of human-induced climate change and offer a policy response; or notice the baleful impact of high oil prices on his foreign policy and get serious about alternative energy; or acknowledge the plunge from fiscal surplus to deficit in his tenure with a shift in tax policy. But a prod for change is unlikely to come from Mr. Bolten, who told Brian Lamb in the same C-SPAN interview that what he brought to OMB was "a good appreciation of what is important to the president and how we can contribute to accomplishing his agenda." Other personnel changes may follow, but the lesson of this one is that Mr. Bush sees no need for new thinking.

Not Quite What We Had In Mind (NYT)

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

For months now, people have been urging President Bush to shake up his inner circle and bring in fresh air. Perhaps in response, the White House chief of staff, Andrew Card Jr., resigned yesterday. Mr. Bush opened the window — and in climbed his budget director, Joshua Bolten, who used to be Mr. Card's deputy.

If this is what passes for a shake-up in this administration, the next two and a half years are going to be grim indeed. This is a meaningless change, and it simply sends the message that Mr. Bush lacks the gumption to trade in anyone in the comforting, friendly cast of characters who have kept him cocooned since his first inauguration.

It's hard to figure out what unmet need this change is supposed to fill. There's been a lot of talk about how exhausted the original Bush team is. But Mr. Bolten ought to be as pooped as everybody else. It takes just as much energy to put together an out-of-whack, fiscally ruinous budget as it does to mess up an invasion or ignore a cataclysmic hurricane.

DOJ_NMG_0023564

Mr. Bolten has been giving the president advice for years, and the result has been a deficit estimated at $371 billion. Perhaps he'll come up with a better approach in his new job. We've heard that under Mr. Card's watch, aides wound up showing Mr. Bush videos of TV news coverage of Hurricane Katrina to convince their boss that it really was a problem. Maybe Mr. Bolten can start the next budget discussion with some audiovisual aids — like an abacus.

New White House Chief Of Staff Is A Harley-riding Policy Geek (KRT)

By Steven Thomma

Knight Ridder, March 28, 2006

WASHINGTON - In 1999, a rising star at Goldman Sachs had a choice: Go to work for the firm's chairman or take a gamble and work for a presidential campaign.

Joshua Bolten chose George W. Bush's campaign. He's been with Bush ever since and was tapped Tuesday to be Bush's new White House chief of staff.

Bolten, 51, is a hybrid for a Washington insider. A self-described "policy geek," the soft-spoken bachelor prefers life beneath the political radar. Yet his penchant for anonymity notwithstanding, he's no stranger to flamboyant gestures: He rides several motorcycles, and his favorite is the 2003 anniversary edition Harley-Davidson Fat Boy. He's entertained White House staff with his rock band, the irreverently named "Deficit Attention Disorder." And he's friendly with actress Bo Derek.

Bolten easily could have taken a different track to a very different place. The Goldman Sachs chairman whom Bolten shunned: Jon Corzine, who left the investment bank soon after that to enter politics himself as a Democrat. He's now the governor of New Jersey.

In hindsight, it's clear that Bolten was meant for public life, not banking. He was reared in Washington, D.C. His father served in World War II, then spent a career at the CIA.

Bolten calls his mother the smartest person he's ever met.

With a bachelor's degree from Princeton University's Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Affairs and a law degree from Stanford, Bolten clerked for a federal judge in San Francisco, then practiced law and worked in the State Department.

He became international trade counsel to the Senate Finance Committee in the 1980s before joining George H.W. Bush's White House as a counsel to the U.S. Trade Representative and deputy assistant to the president for legislative affairs.

After the elder Bush lost the White House in 1992, Bolten taught briefly at Yale, then joined Goldman Sachs for five years. A friend recommended him to the fledgling Bush campaign, and he warmed to the younger Bush immediately.

"I thought, boy, this would be terrific if I got a chance to work on this, even though I'd be forgoing this great opportunity to work . . . for the chairman of Goldman Sachs," Bolten recalled in an interview last year with C-SPAN.

After helping the campaign develop policy and assisting in the Florida recount that won Bush the White House, Bolten was named deputy chief of staff. In 2003, Bush named him director of the Office of Management and Budget.

His tenure there has been marked by the three largest federal budget deficits in history and soaring federal spending and debt that have angered conservatives in Bush's political base.

Bolten insists that the government is on track to cut the deficit in half within five years. But Democrats said his promotion represents a continuation of the same policies that produced record deficits. "As the saying goes, you can put lipstick on a pig, but it's still a pig," said Democratic National Committee spokeswoman Karen Finney.

If such criticism gets to him, Bolten can always escape on one of his motorcycles.

"I've been riding motorcycles for about 25 years," he told C-SPAN. "It's a form of relaxation and diversion that (is) beautiful and exhilarating. But you have to concentrate. So you need to clear your mind of everything else, because if you're not concentrating properly when you're riding a motorcycle, you're putting your life in danger."

For the full C-SPAN interview: www.q-and-a.org/Transcript/?ProgramID=1024

Outside The Office, Bolten Isn't The Usual West Wing Insider (LAT)

By Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — Joshua B. Bolten may be as much a loyalist as the rest of President Bush's inner circle, but he cuts a very distinct profile outside the West Wing: He rides a motorcycle, loves to bowl and keeps a copy of the children's book "Walter the Farting Dog" on his coffee table.

That gives Bolten a rare dash of idiosyncrasy in a notoriously buttoned-down White House, where he will soon replace Andrew H. Card Jr. as chief of staff.

DOJ_NMG_0023565

Bolten, 51, brings other attributes that could help the White House in these troubled times, with congressional Republicans in open revolt and Bush's policy agenda at sea. He has experience working on Capitol Hill and, as Bush's budget director the last three years, has mastered broad swaths of domestic policy.

Bolten also is one of the few non-Texans in Bush's tightknit group of advisors.

"He will reach out to a broader range of people to hear their point of view," said Robert D. Hormats, vice chairman of Goldman Sachs International and a Democrat who has worked with Bolten. "The worst way to serve the president is to narrow the range of advice he is exposed to."

But one thing Bolten does not bring to the White House is what some Republicans think is needed most — truly fresh blood. Like Card, Bolten has been a senior advisor to Bush without pause since his 2000 presidential campaign, and he also logged years working in Bush's father's White House.

Indeed, Bolten has worked for one Bush or the other for 11 of the last 18 years.

"He is very loyal, something this administration values," said G. William Hoagland, budget advisor to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.). "He keeps things pretty tight. If he disagrees [with Bush], he does not show it."

Bolten may help smooth the rough edges of the White House's relationship with Congress, where Republicans increasingly have complained that the administration gives short shrift to their views.

For Bolten, Capitol Hill is not unknown territory: He has worked closely with party leaders and budget writers since being named director of the Office and Management and Budget in 2003. His easygoing, nonconfrontational style was a welcome change from his predecessor as budget director, Mitch Daniels, who was often cutting and impatient in his dealings with lawmakers.

"We were in open warfare with his predecessor," said James Dyer, a lobbyist who was staff director of the House Appropriations Committee until 2005. Bolten "came to the Hill and sat down with the chairman and said, 'I'm really under orders to fix this relationship.' "

The son of a CIA employee, Bolten was born in Washington in 1954. He had a blue-chip education at St. Albans, the elite boys' school in Washington, followed by Princeton University and Stanford Law School.

After a stint on the trade staff of the Senate Finance Committee from 1985 until 1989, he served in the George H.W. Bush administration as general counsel to the U.S. trade representative and as White House lobbyist. He left government for a lucrative job in the London office of Goldman Sachs International, then joined the Bush-Cheney campaign in Austin, Texas, in 1999 as policy director on the recommendation of Robert B. Zoellick, now deputy secretary of State.

After Bush was elected, Bolten became White House deputy chief of staff, where he continued to play a central role in policy development. But after the Sept. 11 attacks he was asked to oversee a group to find ways to bolster domestic security.

In 2003, Bush picked him to succeed Daniels as OMB director at a particularly difficult time. The budget deficit was burgeoning and the economy was weak, yet lawmakers were still clamoring for more federal spending on farm subsidies, on projects that benefited individual congressional districts and on other politically sacrosanct programs.

"He has one of the most thankless jobs in this town," Hoagland said. "It's a job that nobody's going to give you great kudos for. You're either under attack here [on Capitol Hill] or the agencies."

Though Bolten's rise in government has been conventional by Washington terms, his interests have not. He owns two motorcycles, one of which he keeps at Bush's ranch near Crawford, Texas. In his OMB office, he displays a motorcycle gas tank commemorating the 100th anniversary of Harley-Davidson.

During the 2000 campaign, he formed "Bikers for Bush." Bolten, a bachelor, gained notoriety when he gave a motorcycle ride at one of the group's rallies to actress Bo Derek.

An avid bowler, he sponsored an annual tournament for several years. Bush is one of his regular opponents during his frequent visits to the presidential retreat at Camp David. As a holiday gift one year, Bolten gave his staff bowling balls.

Bringing Evolution, Not Revolution (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

Joshua B. Bolten doesn't find it fun to say no. He once called himself a "softer person" than his predecessor as White House budget chief.

But he has found his own ways to make a point. He shows up at policy meetings with a giant calculator to add up the cost of anyone's ambitious ideas. And when someone strays off course, he throws a yellow penalty flag onto the conference table like a football referee.

Now it has fallen on this dry-witted Washington native to get the White House itself back on course. Tapped by President Bush yesterday to replace White House Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr., Bolten will take over a political operation gone astray -

DOJ_NMG_0023566

- mired in an overseas war, stalled in its domestic agenda, sagging in the polls and alienated from congressional Republican allies.

Like Card, Bolten is a Bush loyalist, known as self-effacing and efficient, not especially ideological, not a promoter of his own agenda, a quiet professional in a town filled with vast egos. Yet this workaholic bachelor and self-described "policy geek" in glasses is the picture of contradictions. Bolten, 51, spends his few off-hours racing down the highway on his prized Harley-Davidson Fat Boy or bowling in the White House alley or banging out tunes in a rock band he named Deficit Attention Disorder.

His office in the Dwight D. Eisenhower Executive Office Building adjacent to the White House attests to his personality. Rather than stock it with pictures of Bush, as many aides do, Bolten hung a large portrait of Eisenhower in military uniform above the fireplace and put a Harley-Davidson book on the mantle. Nearby is a motorcycle menorah. Not one to take himself too seriously, Bolten even hung a drawing by a niece that a visitor recalled was titled "Uncle Josh's Poop Calendar."

"He is very funny, he always kept the staff laughing," said Assistant Secretary of State Kristen Silverberg, who worked for Bolten during the 2000 presidential campaign and Bush's first term. At the same time, she said, "Josh has a great moral core" and a passion for bold ideas. "If you had to pick one person who was the architect of all the big first-term domestic policy initiatives," it would be Bolten.

Karl Rove, Bush's political adviser, said Bolten will reinvigorate the White House.

"People get energized -- new leadership has a way of doing that," Rove said. "He has strong views, but he is very adept at not allowing them to short-circuit a robust policy process." Bolten encourages aides to propose ideas he disagrees with, Rove added. "He would challenge them to think outside the box."

Yet Bolten was hardly an outside-the-box choice. He is not the Washington graybeard many Republicans urged Bush to recruit. By most accounts, Bolten will bring evolution, not revolution. Within hours of his appointment, talking points distributed among Democrats described his selection as rearranging deck chairs on the Titanic.

"He strikes me as pretty much cut from the same bolt as Andy Card, so I don't see this as a shift by the White House, replacing one insider with another," said Rep. John Spratt (S.C.), ranking Democrat on the House Budget Committee. But Spratt expressed "high regard" for Bolten: "He's bright, a quick study, yet cool and unflappable."

The son of a career CIA officer and a George Washington University teacher, Joshua Brewster Bolten grew up in Washington, attending public schools until enrolling at St. Albans for high school. After earning degrees at Princeton University and Stanford Law School, Bolten returned to Washington to work as a lawyer at the State Department and the Senate Finance Committee.

"He has this ethic of public service in his bones," said Daniel Price, a longtime friend.

Bolten joined the Bush team in 1989, working as general counsel of the U.S. trade representative and then as a White House lobbyist under President George H.W. Bush. He spent five years in London for Goldman Sachs International before being recruited at Christmas 1998 to go to Texas for the next Bush campaign. "I fell in love with the governor and the whole operation, the whole spirit of the operation," Bolten told C-SPAN last year.

Giving up the Goldman Sachs money, Bolten developed the campaign's policy platform, then helped enact it as deputy White House chief of staff in President Bush's first term. He was instrumental in pushing through tax cuts and the education plan known as No Child Left Behind. He also spearheaded a $15 billion plan to fight AIDS around the world, battling with Mitchell E. Daniels Jr., the director of the Office of Management and Budget, who objected to the cost.

When Daniels resigned in 2003, Bush tapped Bolten to take over OMB and the annual $2.8 trillion federal budget.

Bolten produced two consecutive budgets that cut discretionary, nonsecurity spending, but the cost of wars in Iraq and Afghanistan as well as soaring Medicare expenses have pumped up deficits.

Within the administration, Bolten earned a reputation as tight-fisted and more "overtly demanding" than Card, as one colleague put it, while making few enemies. "He's well-liked by all who know him, even if they don't agree with every decision that he makes," said former commerce secretary Donald L. Evans. "You can't help but say Josh Bolten is a fair and good man."

And Bolten repaired some relations on Capitol Hill frayed under Daniels, who was seen as less deferential to congressional egos. Bolten stroked the likes of Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), terming him the "Incredible Hulk" of lawmakers. Bolten "is respected as a straight shooter and good listener," said Rob Portman, a member of the House leadership before becoming U.S trade representative last year.

Bolten views himself as an honest broker and eschews public attention. "It's best that you keep yourself out of the equation," he told C-SPAN, "and in that way make sure that others have confidence that you're not running your own agenda -- you're just running the president's agenda, which was my objective. Still is."

Still, he will not bring fresh legs to the assignment. Many Republicans around Washington attributed at least some of Bush's political problems to a tired White House staff that has remained largely intact since the beginning of his presidency. Card served longer than any other chief of staff in half a century.

DOJ_NMG_0023567

Bolten has been with Bush since the start, as well, working as many if not more hours than Card. Although he gets into the office later than Card, just in time for the 7:30 a.m. senior staff meeting, Bolten is regularly seen at the office until 10 or 11 at night before climbing into his 12-year-old Ford pickup to drive home. (After long resistance, Bolten recently accepted the car and driver service entitled to high-ranking White House officials, according to colleagues.)

Nonetheless, some believe Bolten offers enough change to make a difference. "It's a significant change because he brings a different skill set than Andy did," said Cesar Conda, a former aide to Vice President Cheney. "Josh will bring some energy to the policymaking apparatus at the White House. And he'll bring good relations with the Hill."

Joshua Brewster Bolten: Longtime Ally, Now A Top Aide (NYT)

By Elisabeth Bumiller

The New York Times, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 28 — Joshua B. Bolten, the incoming White House chief of staff, would appear to have the insider credentials and ability to soothe Congress that the White House desperately needs.

He grew up in establishment Washington, the son of a C.I.A. officer, and graduated from the elite St. Albans School, former Vice President Al Gore's alma mater. As White House budget director, he amused his 500-member staff by renaming his weekend rock band Deficit Attention Disorder for a performance at the Office of Management and Budget. He has nurtured relationships on Capitol Hill, and is personally close to President Bush.

But the question is whether Mr. Bolten is the man to right a listing presidency, and whether his skills, instincts and access to Mr. Bush are enough to overcome public anger over the war in Iraq and the growing questions in Washington about the competence of the West Wing staff. Mr. Bolten, after all, has been with Mr. Bush from his first days as a presidential candidate, and in the last three years has presided over the biggest budget deficits in the history of the United States.

"The last time Josh was in here, I said, 'How can a guy as smart as you are come up with such bad results?' " said Senator Kent Conrad of North Dakota, the ranking Democrat on the Budget Committee. "He said, 'You can't pin this one on me.' "

Republicans in Congress reacted positively to the appointment but with barely stifled yawns.

"It's an indication that they're turning the page, which I think will be received favorably, but I don't think there's going to be any significant change in the way things are done over there," said Senator John Thune, Republican of South Dakota, who two weeks ago said that the White House staff lacked passion and urgency.

Still, Mr. Thune said, "he probably will do a better job of reaching out to Congress."

Supporters of Mr. Bolten insisted he would revitalize a moribund policy operation at a White House that failed in the past year to push a Social Security overhaul through Congress and is now facing strong resistance to Mr. Bush's plan to change immigration laws. They said Mr. Bolten, the influential but publicly invisible White House deputy chief of staff in Mr. Bush's first term, would help formulate and drive legislation in a way that Andrew H. Card Jr., the outgoing chief of staff, did not.

As deputy chief of staff, Mr. Bolten scheduled the president's almost daily 45 minutes of domestic "policy time" in the Oval Office, and determined what issue was discussed, who was invited and in large part how it could be sold on Capitol Hill. In the first term he drove an agenda dominated by the tax cuts that the White House relentlessly pushed through Congress.

"Josh would have a calendar up in his office, where he would, in consultation with everybody else, map out when the president would be briefed on an issue, then tie it to events on the Hill and major announcements," said Cesar V. Conda, Vice President Dick Cheney's former top economic policy aide who worked closely with Mr. Bolten. "He was really the maestro of the policy process. I was there a month after Harriet Miers took over, and it wasn't the same."

Mr. Conda was referring to Mr. Bolten's replacement, now the White House counsel.

On Capitol Hill, Mr. Bolten, who worked in the White House Congressional liaison office of Mr. Bush's father, regularly stepped in as this administration's deal closer.

"I worked closely with him on everything from Medicare to the tax cuts," said Rob Portman, the United States trade representative and a former Republican congressman from Ohio who was a White House point man on Capitol Hill. "He was the one who ultimately pulled together the agency and White House folks and said, 'How do we get a result here?' He's not an ideologue."

Exactly what Mr. Bolten believes is something of a mystery, although he was considered a pragmatist who liked tax cuts and not a supply-side true believer in nearly six years at Goldman Sachs in the 1990's. He spent most of those years based in London, as the investment banking firm's chief lobbyist at the European Union's headquarters in Brussels, although he also worked for a short time there as the chief of staff to Jon Corzine, then the firm's co-chairman and now the Democratic governor of New Jersey.

When Mr. Bush named Mr. Bolten his budget director three years ago, Mr. Corzine, who was a United States senator from New Jersey at the time, called Mr. Bolten "on message and loyal to a fault."

Mr. Bolten, who described himself as a "policy geek" in an interview with Brian Lamb of C-Span late last year, has whitish-gray, closely cropped hair, round wire-rimmed glasses and the prosperous, buttoned-down look of a Washington corporate lawyer. At 51, he retains a slightly youthful look. At the White House, he is considered relatively mellow and more comfortable with reporters than Mr. Card.

Unlike other members of Mr. Bush's inner circle, Mr. Bolten makes occasional forays to the dinner parties of establishment Washington. He has turned up at the home of Ben Bradlee, the former executive editor of The Washington Post, and the writer Sally Quinn and has regularly dated women in the Bush administration. He distinguished himself at the 2000 Republican National Convention by appearing with the actress Bo Derek.

Mr. Bolten is also known for his motorcycle collection, although he most often rides a Harley.

"I've ridden motorcycles for a long time; it's not just a midlife crisis adoption," Mr. Bolten said on C-Span. "I've been riding motorcycles for about 25 years. And I enjoy it now I think especially because it's a form of relaxation and diversion that's beautiful and exhilarating. But you have to concentrate. So you need to clear your mind of everything else because if you're not concentrating properly when you're riding a motorcycle, you're putting your life in danger."

Joshua Brewster Bolten was born on Aug. 16, 1954. A graduate of Princeton and Stanford Law School, he grew up knowing little about the duties of his father, who worked in the C.I.A.'s directorate of operations, the agency's covert espionage arm. He plays bass guitar in his band, normally called the Compassionates. The lead singer is Tabitha Mueller, Mr. Card's daughter.

Washington Wire (WSJ)

By Various Writers

Wall Street Journal, March 27, 2006

March 28, 2006, 6:34 pm

Picking Up Static

It didn't take long for the complaints to start flying about a draft telecom bill introduced Monday night by House Energy and Commerce Chairman Joe Barton, a Texas Republican.

The bill would establish a national video franchise, giving phone companies such as Verizon Communications Inc. and AT&T Inc. their biggest wish: the ability to avoid negotiating local agreements before offering cable-like television service. Barton found an ally in Democrat Congressman Bobby Rush of Illinois, but senior committee Democrats weren't as enthusiastic.

The Bells welcomed Barton's legislation, but continued to grumble it contained a provision on Internet neutrality, which drew scorn for another reason from consumer groups and Internet companies. They complained it would actually make it harder for the Federal Communications Commission to respond to complaints. Six high-tech companies, including Microsoft Corp., Google Inc., Yahoo! Inc., and eBay Inc., sent a letter to Barton complaining the bill would "fail to protect the Internet from discrimination and would deny consumers unfettered access" to Internet applications and services in the future.

A previous attempt to draft a bi-partisan bill fell apart after the cable industry complained it was unfair because it would impose new restrictions on cable providers.

Phone and cable companies have been trading jabs as the House telecom draft begins to move through committee. A cable industry-funded group, Broadband Everywhere, is preparing to release a report entitled "Frayed at the Edges: A Chronicle of the Bells' Decade-Long, Unfulfilled "Plan" for Fiber Deployment." The 18-page report provides a litany of examples detailing what it calls the phone companies' broken promises to provide high-speed Internet access. Complaining the Bells have been "nurtured on the mother's milk of government regulation and grants of exclusive telephone franchise rights," the group argues in the report that phone companies shouldn't be given help on video franchises now. –Amy Schatz

March 28, 2006, 5:32 pm

Outsourcing Outrage

House Democrats cry foul over bare-boned report on outsourcing of American technology jobs.

Tennessee Rep. Bart Gordon complains that the Commerce Department refuses to allow lawmakers to see the complete 200-page version of its Six-Month Assessment of Workforce Globalization in Certain Knowledge-Based Industries, finished in mid-2004 at a cost of $335,000. Instead, Commerce gave Congress a 12-page summary that Democrats suspect whitewashes the worst news about job migration to India and other countries.

"The taxpayers paid for an analysis on the state of U.S. jobs and off-shoring, and in return they've gotten twelve pages of essentially useless information," Mr. Gordon says. "In my book, any government report that costs $27,917 per page and says nothing is little more than a very expensive waste of time."

Mr. Gordon, the top Democrat on the House Science Committee, plans to employ a rare parliamentary procedure — called a Resolution of Inquiry — that he hopes will force Commerce to turn over the full report. The committee is scheduled to vote on his resolution Wednesday morning. If it passes, it will go to the House floor. “American workers deserve the full truth about the current and future state of their jobs — and that’s all we are asking for,” Mr. Gordon says. Science Committee Chairman Sherwood Boehlert (R., N.Y.) is rounding up fellow Republicans to try to defeat the Gordon resolution, noting the Commerce Department study has since been superseded by a massive outsourcing study by the National Academy of Public Administration.

DOJ_NMG_0023569

Commerce spokeswoman Christine Gunderson declines to explain for print why the full version of the report wasn’t released. As far as Commerce is concerned, she says, the 12-page summary is the final product. “The Democrats have that report, and it’s publicly available,” she says. –Michael M. Phillips

March 28, 2006, 3:58 pm

A Tax by Another Name

The Bush administration continues to strike out in its effort to trim the federal deficit by raising nontax revenues.

State trade directors from across the country are urging Congress to block a pending fee increase that they say would harm small businesses seeking to export goods overseas.

In a letter to key House and Senate committees, economic development officials from 41 states said companies that tap the Department of Commerce to help identify foreign buyers of American goods and services will soon have to pay as much as $2,500 for a single day of such “matchmaking” services, up from the current rate of $770. “These services … play a crucial role in linking exporters with foreign buyers,” the letter states, adding that “thousands of small exporters will not be able to afford this increase.”

Congress intervened in 2005 when a similar fee increase was slated to go into effect, and Chris Whatley of the Council of State Governments says state officials hope for similar action this time around. –Deborah Solomon

March 28, 2006, 3:48 pm

Taxing Work

Republican tax-writers on Capitol Hill, hoping to spur approval of a two-year extension of the 15% rates on capital gains and dividends, thought they had hit on a plan to win over Senate Democrats. But some liberal groups and deficit hawks are urging Democrats to oppose the plan.

Republicans planned to pay for some of the costs of the investment rate cuts by allowing wealthy Americans to convert their traditional IRAs into Roth IRAs. Since funds transferred from traditional IRAs to Roth IRAs are taxed at the front end, allowing wealthy Americans to transfer their retirement funds to Roth IRAs would general billions of dollars in revenue for the Treasury.

But the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, the Committee for a Responsible Federal Budget, the Concord Coalition and the Committee for Economic Development warn that the plan is a “gimmick” that would increase the budget deficit in the long term. In a press conference today, the four groups called on Congress to reject the Republicans’ plan. The groups acknowledged that allowing wealthy Americans to transfer retirement funds to Roth IRAs would raise money in the short term for the government. But it would cost far more money in the long term, they said. “People would elect to convert their traditional IRAs to Roth IRAs only if doing so would be to their advantage because it would lower their tax bills,” said the groups “Anyone who expects that such a transaction would increase his or her tax bill simply would not make the transaction.”

Republicans are likely to ignore the groups. But the deficit concerns could make it more difficult to Republicans to win votes from Democrats for the bill.

Competing versions of the tax bill passed the House and Senate last year. The bill is now in a Republican-run conference committee trying to iron out a final bill that can clear Congress this spring. In addition to the capital gains and dividends tax cuts, the bill would provide an exemption to the alternative minimum tax for millions of middle-class Americans and extend a range of business tax credits. –Brody Mullins

March 28, 2006, 9:33 am

Card’s Real Ambition?

Card

In the wake of Andy Card’s resignation as White House chief of staff, speculation will turn immediately to an intriguing question about his future: Is Card about to launch a campaign to become the next governor of Massachusetts, his home state? Acquaintances say Card has been telling them in recent months that would be his dream job. Popular incumbent Gov. Mitt Romney isn’t running again this fall, and appears to be laying the groundwork to run for president instead. That makes Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey the current top Republican contender to replace Romney in this fall’s election, but her campaign has struggled.

Healey has been trailing in the polls behind Attorney General Thomas Reilly, a Democrat. A recent poll showed Reilly ahead with 34% support and Healey with just 25%. An independent candidate, Christy Mihos, has also entered the mix, threatening to pull votes away from Healy. In a state with just 13% registered Republicans, Healey would need broad cross-party support to win. She has been troubled in part by news that her running mate, former state Rep. Reed Hillman, asked for a gubernatorial pardon for a constituent who was arrested three times for drunk driving.

DOJ_NMG_0023570

Meanwhile, speculation in Washington will turn to who will replace new White House chief of staff Josh Bolten, who has been director of the Office of Management and Budget. Joel Kaplan, deputy OMB director, is a logical top choice. Another possibility: Clay Johnson, the deputy OMB director for management. –Gerald F. Seib and Deborah Solomon

March 28, 2006, 9:22 am

New Season

Bolten

The elevation of Joshua Bolten – an administration veteran who's been with President Bush since the 2000 campaign – likely won't do much to silence critics who think that the White House is too insular and in need of new blood and fresh ideas. Still, the move signals that the administration is taking its political problems seriously.

The public comments of Bush and Bolten were carefully calculated to do minimal damage to Andrew Card's reputation, and to the administration's. Bolten described Card as "among the finest public servants of his generation." In brief comments of his own, Card quoted the biblical book of Ecclesiastes, saying simply, "It is a different season and Josh Bolten is the right person for that season." –John D. McKinnon

Selling U.S. Policy: Big Names For A Big Job (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

These are difficult times for America's image abroad. And the folks at the State Department's public diplomacy operation, especially in the Bureau of International Information Programs, are working overtime to meet their mandate to "deliver America's message to the world, counteracting negative preconceptions."

The "mission statement" on the 370-member IIP's Web site says it is to "Inform, engage, and influence international audiences about U.S. policy and society to advance America's interests."

But that's not easy. The White House, we hear, looked hard a while back to find some celebrity types to promote the president's vision for Iraq, but came up empty. IIP, run by Alexander C. Feldman , has a group trying to enlist some "big name" speakers, people with instant credibility, for the cause, according to an internal March 20 e-mail sent by an IIP aide.

The Democracy Dialogues group had drawn up a list of people they'd like to get, such as former CBS anchor Walter Cronkite , for example, to talk about a free press and well-known scholars to talk about other issues. Feldman, the e-mail said, "professed himself less than entirely satisfied with the list of prospective big name speakers . . . which he thought was 'uneven' " and lacking in "truly big names," especially "international figures."

"He threw out some suggestions of his own, which I pass along to give you all an idea of the terms in which Alex is thinking about this," the e-mail said. For women's rights, maybe Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice , retired Supreme Court justice Sandra Day O'Connor or Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg . For "judicial independence," maybe Justices Anthony Kennedy or Stephen G. Breyer , or maybe Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.).

But, the e-mail writer continues, "please be thinking about truly well-known international counterparts, e.g., Richard J. Goldstone , the former chief prosecutor of the International Tribunal for Rwanda and the former Yugoslavia -- people of that kind of stature" who would be known not just "in certain countries or regions."

So for "free and fair elections," we're told Feldman suggested former South African president Nelson Mandela or former president of Czechoslovakia Vaclav Havel . They'd certainly be willing to help advance America's interests.

For "freedom of worship: The Dali Lama [and] The Pope ."

Of course! Surely they'd at least be willing to do a Web chat for us? Hmm . . . Posting with the Pope. Kinda catchy?The Few, the Proud, the Cabinet Holdovers

Yesterday's announcement that Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr. is leaving sparked much chatter about other top-level departures at the White House. At the Cabinet level, though, don't expect major change.

But President Bush 's Cabinet has only three of the original 15 statutory chiefs from 2001: Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld , Labor Secretary Elaine L. Chao and Transportation Secretary Norman Y. Mineta . (A replacement for Treasury Secretary John W. Snow , not of the Class of 2001 anyway, has long been expected.)

Of the trio, Mineta -- a close friend of Card's back from the days when Card was secretary of transportation and Mineta chaired the House Transportation Committee -- has long been talked about as a likely departee before 2008. Unclear if Chao might depart at the traditional last departure window -- the midterm elections in November. If those two go, that would leave Rumsfeld, who has shown no inclination to leave.

DOJ_NMG_0023571

President Bill Clinton's Cabinet had several bitter-enders, including Interior Secretary Bruce Babbitt , Education Secretary Richard W. Riley , Health and Human Services Secretary Donna E. Shalala and Attorney General Janet Reno .At State, the Vacancy Sign Stays Lit

Still looking . . . Anyone who wants to be assistant secretary of state for nonproliferation, please contact Robert Joseph , undersecretary for arms control and international security, ASAP with your bona fides.

Stephen Rademaker has been "acting" in the job since September, but the search has gone on. Names that have come and gone include Mark Esper , a senior aide to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.); Marshall Billingslea , who's at NATO; and Susan Koch , a top adviser to Joseph. No signs any of them will be nominated any time soon. We hear Joseph has been telling people, even people he doesn't know, that he's not happy. Meanwhile, the operation bleeds talent as it merges arms control and nonproliferation bureaus into a new office called International Security and Nonproliferation.

Trouble May Be Brewing For GOP On Budget (AP-Y2)

By Andrew Taylor

AP2, March 29, 2006

A battle is shaping up between conservatives who want to cut government spending and moderates seeking to protect education and health programs as House Republicans start acting on President Bush's proposed budget for next year.

The conservative-dominated House Budget Committee was expected to act favorably Wednesday on a $2.8 trillion budget blueprint for the budget year that begins Oct. 1.

Moderates already are demanding a rewrite to boost popular domestic programs.

"I will not vote for a House budget resolution that would result in real cuts to critical federal investments in education, health care, housing veterans' services, social and community block grants and encourage my colleagues ... to do the same," Rep. Mike Castle, R-Del., told a cheering crowd of health and education advocates on Tuesday.

In a congressional session shortened by election-year politics, Congress probably will not wrap up its appropriations work before adjourning in October. A postelection lame duck session may be required.

The committee chairman, Rep. Jim Nussle (news, bio, voting record), R-Iowa, spent Tuesday polishing his budget plan ahead of what was shaping up as a full day of debate.

The plan was expected to adopt Bush's $873 billion proposal for Cabinet department and agency budgets that Congress renews annually.

That total does not include the $90 billion-plus in upcoming money for hurricane aid and the war in Iraq.

Democrats and moderate Republicans say popular domestic programs are being shortchanged. Their spending was cut slightly during last year's budget debate; Bush proposes an additional cut of about 1 percent this round.

The budget resolution is a nonbinding blueprint that establishes lawmakers' tax and spending priorities. It sets the outlines for bills that cut or raise taxes and spending.

With a resolution in place, the 100-member Senate can pass those bills with a simple majority rather than the 60 votes needed to overcome a filibuster.

It generally is assumed that Congress will not pass a major new round of tax cuts or push for more budget cuts after having an arduous time passing last year's $39 billion measure that trimmed Medicaid, Medicare and student loan subsidies.

While Nussle's budget plan probably will recommend a modest spending cut bill, senators are not likely to agree.

An amendment by Sen. Arlen Specter (news, bio, voting record), R-Pa., to add $7 billion for education, health and job training programs passed by a 73-27 vote, even attracting support from Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn.

Specter annually writes a huge spending measure for education and health programs and says the $7 billion would restore programs to their levels of two years ago. All told, senators added $16 billion above Bush's spending cap.

White House budget director Joshua Bolten — named Tuesday to succeed Andy Card as Bush's chief of staff next month — said in a statement that the president would seek to eliminate the additional money.

In the House, GOP moderates are emboldened by Specter's success. Twenty-three lawmakers, led by Rep. Nancy Johnson (news, bio, voting record), R-Conn., signed a letter urging a 2 percent increase in domestic appropriations and warning that they "would have strong reservations voting for any budget that would result in real cuts in a number of programs."

Conservatives and GOP leaders such as House Majority Leader John Boehner of Ohio pledge to stick with Bush's spending cap, which may make it difficult to pass a budget. Even if the House does pass a budget that sticks to the Bush limits, Specter says he will not relent.

"I'm hopeful that the House conservatives can prevail, but I don't know that they have a working majority over there any more than our conservatives over here," said the chairman of the Senate Budget Committee, Sen. Judd Gregg (news, bio, voting record), R-N.H.

DOJ_NMG_0023572

Lobby Vote Teed Up For Today (RC)

By Tory Newmyer

Roll Call, March 29, 2006

Senators will vote on final passage of a lobbying reform package today, after moving last night to drop two key provisions by cutting off debate on the matter.

To quickly wrap up work on the issue, Senators agreed to forgo votes on one provision that would crack down on lawmakers' use of corporate jets and another that would severely curtail the practice of earmarks.

Falling by the wayside with those two proposals was one calling for the creation of an independent Office of Public Integrity to oversee compliance with new lobbying rules. Though highlighted by outside watchdogs as critical to the overall reform effort, two-thirds of Senators voted to reject the plan, with some criticizing the office as too weak and others calling it an affront to the Senate Ethics Committee's authority.

Senators, however, added to the measure a ban on the longtime practice of allowing any lawmaker to stop legislation in its tracks with a secret hold.

Senators will work through about five to 10 remaining amendments to the bill this morning before deciding on the entire package, a senior GOP aide said. They have until the morning to submit germane amendments, at which point Senate leaders will meet to try to narrow the list, a leadership aide said.

Senators voted 81-16 to invoke cloture on the bill, after rejecting the independent ethics office in a 30-67 vote and adding the proposal banning secret holds by a margin of 84-13.

The Tuesday votes to limit the measure's scope disappointed some of the chamber's loudest advocates for reform.

"I have serious reservations about a bill" that doesn't address travel, earmarks and enforcement, said Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), his party's point man on the issue. "If those components are missing, I don't think we've gotten at the fundamental problem."

Obama said the Senate, which is under heavy pressure to take up the politically explosive issue of immigration reform, had moved too quickly on the lobbying rules overhaul.

Nevertheless, Senators supporting the travel and earmark provisions pledged to press ahead, planning to offer the proposals as amendments to future legislation.

"There will be an opportunity some other time to deal with it," said Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) a leader of the GOP reform efforts and a co-sponsor of the corporate-jet amendment.

He said despite failing to attach his proposal, he was satisfied with the final product, calling it a "very strong effort."

Although no deal on legislative vehicles for either amendment has been agreed to, a veteran GOP aide speculated that earmark reform could end up on a pending line-item veto bill, since attaching it to any other bill it would mean a 60-vote budget act point-of-order hurdle, as well as a cloture vote.

In the meantime, Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.), a leading earmark critic, said that any unauthorized earmarks added to bills will be challenged on the floor. "We're going to have some fun," he said.

To clear the Senate today, the bill will need 67 votes, the threshold required for changing the chamber's rules. If it passes, those changes — including the longstanding ban on secret holds — will become effective immediately.

The measure being put to Senators today bans gifts from lobbyists and increases reporting requirements for lobbyists while doubling the frequency of those disclosures. It also tightens revolving door restrictions between Congress and K Street by expanding the one-year cooling-off period for former staffers and lawmakers who go to work as lobbyists. The bill also includes new disclosure requirements for groups that engage in grass-roots lobbying.

On the House side, Republican leaders were still hesitant to put a firm time frame on when the chamber would consider its version of lobbying and ethics reform.

"I would like to give you a firm date," House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) said during his weekly session with reporters. "I would like to tell you we will have it all finished by 'X.' But it is going to depend upon how quickly the committees can do their hearings, markup their bills and then some decision about how this is all brought to the floor."

The House Rules Committee has a hearing scheduled Thursday on lobbying reform, but no other committees currently have hearings or markups scheduled on the subject.

A group of House Republicans, led by Chief Deputy Majority Whip Eric Cantor (Va.) held a press conference Tuesday to push for the inclusion of 527 reform in the lobbying package, and to release a letter they wrote to IRS Commissioner Mark Everson demanding that his agency investigate reports that many 527 groups are not meeting disclosure requirements and not paying taxes they owe.

DOJ_NMG_0023573

House Republican leaders decided Tuesday afternoon that they will put 527 reform on the floor next week, even if other portions of the broader lobbying reform package aren't ready for consideration yet.

The vote to attach the holds measure to the lobbying bill sets up a potentially landmark change for the Senate.

Bob Dove, a lawyer with Patton Boggs, said that during the eight years he served as parliamentary counsel to then-Minority Leader Bob Dole (R-Kan.), hold letters would come to Dole almost every day.

"Not all were the worst kind of holds, the 'I'm going to fight this with every strength of my being' kind," he said. But many would request that the Senator be notified before legislation moved forward, because the Senator might have an amendment he wanted included, he said.

"But they came almost every day," said Dove, who later served as Senate Parliamentarian.

Senate To Debate Lobbying Reform (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, March 29, 2006

The Senate today is expected to debate and start final consideration of a bill that would make sweeping changes to lobbying rules, with senators saying the vote is crucial to show that lawmakers are serious about "cleaning up" Washington.

Senators yesterday voted on two amendments to Sen. Trent Lott's bill to curb the influence of lobbyists, though there are nearly 80 proposed amendments on file. Late in the evening senators voted 81-16 to move on to final consideration of the measure, effectively limiting the amount of debate and amendments that can be taken up.

"This bill is not perfect but it contains important reforms," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, in urging his colleagues to move to a final vote.

Senators now have 30 hours to debate and then vote on Mr. Lott's bill, which bans gifts and meals paid for by lobbyists, requires lawmakers to attend an ethics training program and attempts to limit earmarks, called "pork-barrel" spending by critics. They will only consider amendments that are relevant to the bill.

Senators voted 67-30 to reject the creation of an independent Office of Public Integrity that would oversee congressional ethics, an amendment proposed by Sen. Susan Collins, Maine Republican.

"The public believes that investigation of our colleagues by our colleagues raises obvious conflicts of interest," she said. "Sunlight is the best disinfectant."

But Select Committee on Ethics members call the proposal "off target," saying it would replicate their work.

Senators did vote 84-13 for an amendment requiring senators to disclose their reasons for holding up legislation. The so-called "secret holds" targeted by this amendment are a "lobbyist jackpot," said Sen. Ron Wyden, Oregon Democrat.

Mr. Lott, Mississippi Republican, balked at the number of amendments to his bill, saying most were irrelevant to lobbying reform.

"Are we serious ... or not?" he asked. "Some people I suspect would hope this would just slide off the face of the Earth [but] this issue is going to be dealt with."

The lobbying legislation was given priority in the wake of scandals surrounding lobbyist Jack Abramoff and the bribery conviction of former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, California Republican.

Key House members yesterday called for 527 groups -- so called for the Internal Revenue Service code that governs their nonprofit tax status -- to be subject to the campaign finance laws that govern lawmakers. Those groups, such as America Coming Together and the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, are mostly funded by a handful of wealthy activists.

"This is big money by a few people on a massive scale," said Rep. Tom Cole, Oklahoma Republican. The groups funneled $370 million into the 2004 election, with 46 persons giving more than $1 million each, lawmakers said.

The House expects a full vote on a new lobbying bill and the proposed 527 changes -- which are not included in the Senate version -- next week.

Lobbying-Overhaul Bill Nears Passage With Broad Support (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Lobbying-overhaul legislation is nearing Senate passage after both parties joined forces to kill a proposed enforcement office and to preserve an election-year perk: below-cost flights on corporate aircraft.

On a 67-30 roll call, senators rejected creating an independent office of public integrity intended to strengthen the existing ethics-committee process. Later, on a 81-16 vote, the joint leadership won a motion to begin to close down debate and effectively block any amendment on the corporate-jet issue.

DOJ_NMG_0023574

Left in place are a set of tough new disclosure requirements for lobbyists, and lawmakers themselves would be subject to new rules making it harder to slip special-interest provisions into legislation at the last hour without prior debate.

Lobbyists would be barred from paying for meals or gifts for lawmakers, such as sports tickets. The level of detail in lobbying reports would be far greater, and all the data would be filed electronically to a centralized repository available on the Internet.

Yet without the proposed enforcement office, the effort may lose some of its credibility. And in further action today, there will be continued efforts to strike provisions requiring fuller disclosure of grass-roots lobbying campaigns, a powerful and often lucrative tool for interest groups, which lawmakers don't want to antagonize.

"Congress is always reluctant to reform itself," said Sen. Susan Collins (R., Maine), the bill's manager and one of those promoting the proposed integrity office. But she faced resistance in her own party leadership, while on the Democratic side, Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada appeared ready to shut down the debate and avoid a vote on the corporate-aircraft issue.

"No one needs to hang his head in shame about what we have done," Mr. Reid said. "This is a good piece of legislation. I don't think the perfect should get in the way of the good."

Mr. Reid said it was time to move onto new topics, such as immigration legislation. But his tone was far more accepting than the outcry in January, when Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff pleaded guilty to three felonies and promised to cooperate with a still ongoing Justice Department investigation of political corruption.

Sen. John McCain (R., Ariz.), who opposed the motion to cut off debate and limit amendments, vowed to come back on a future bill to address the corporate-aircraft issue. But the popularity of the perk -- and its usefulness to party leaders in the midst of political campaigns -- makes it hard to restrict.

The primary issue is one of cost: Lawmakers need only pay the jet's owners the equivalent of a first-class ticket. But access is also an issue because a company's executive can ride along with the lawmaker. Over the years the frequency of such flights has grown, and it has become a source of influence for business.

Senators Reject Proposal For Separate Ethics Investigators (USAT)

By Jim Drinkard

USA Today, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Senate on Tuesday voted down a proposal to create an independent office to investigate alleged ethics violations as it struggled to revive a bill to tighten rules governing the ties between lobbyists and Congress.

Senators voted 67-30 to kill a plan to set up an office of public integrity that could interview witnesses, subpoena records and submit findings to federal prosecutors or the Ethics Committee for action.

Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, said the public has grown skeptical of Congress' ability to police itself and creating an independent ethics office would help restore confidence.

Senate Ethics Chairman George Voinovich, R-Ohio, called the idea “off target and unnecessary.” He said the committee, which does not make its work public, handles ethics enforcement adequately.

Mary Boyle of the ethics watchdog group Common Cause said “it's very disappointing that the Senate would reject this very modest proposal. It does not bode well for the whole lobbying bill.”

The bill was designed to boost public confidence in Congress, whose poll ratings have suffered under a lobbying-and-influence scandal. Former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who pleaded guilty to corruption and fraud charges in January, is scheduled to be sentenced today in a Florida federal courtroom.

Abramoff's gifts of travel, meals, sports tickets and campaign contributions to members of Congress triggered fears that the scandal would spread across Capitol Hill. Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, stepped down as chairman of the House Administration Committee because of his ties to Abramoff.

After Abramoff's guilty plea, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., and House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., ordered quick action to restrict gifts, travel and other lobbyist favors.

The push has slowed in recent weeks. The House has referred its legislation to five committees. The Senate bill stalled within hours when it was first brought up three weeks ago. Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., voiced frustration Tuesday. “Who wants to take the blame for not getting this done?” he asked.

The bill would ban gifts from lobbyists, including meals, to members of Congress and their staffs. It would require more frequent and thorough disclosure by lobbyists of their activities. It also would institute reporting requirements for travel aboard private jets and require advance approval for travel paid for by private sources.

Senate Votes Down Outside Ethics Office (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

DOJ_NMG_0023575

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

The Senate rejected a proposal to establish an independent office to investigate ethics complaints against its members, and then cleared the way to pass a broad-based ethics and lobbying bill this week.

On a 67 to 30 vote, the Senate defeated a bipartisan proposal to create an office of public integrity, which its backers said was designed to strengthen enforcement of Senate rules and bolster voters' trust in Congress in the aftermath of the guilty plea in January of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

The Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee had killed a similar proposal March 2 after current and former members of the Senate's ethics committee called the office superfluous. The top Republican and the senior Democrat on the ethics panel led the successful effort to bury the proposal yesterday for a second time.

The rejected measure was devised by Sens. Susan Collins (R-Maine), Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.) and John McCain (R-Ariz.). They asserted that lobbying and ethics rules need to be better enforced for the public to regain trust in congressional officials.

"The fact remains that public confidence in Congress is near an all-time low," Collins said. "Strengthening the enforcement mechanism is critical" to improving lawmakers' reputations, she added.

Government watchdog groups reacted quickly and angrily to the vote. "The Senate today is refusing to acknowledge that Congress -- in the eyes of the public -- has failed to police itself," said Common Cause President Chellie Pingree.

Joan Claybrook, president of Public Citizen, said the vote against the office shows that the "Senate is out of touch."

Opponents of the integrity office argued that the Senate's Select Committee on Ethics is already policing complaints thoroughly and without bias, and does not need an independent office to assist its investigations. "The laws and rules are enforced," said Sen. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio), chairman of the ethics committee. An office to conduct investigations before the ethics panel's consideration "would hurt the situation" rather than help it, Voinovich said.

Sen. Tim Johnson (S.D.), the senior Democrat on the ethics committee, agreed that a new office would "duplicate the ethics committee" and would "waste resources."

Lieberman said the proposal had been altered since committee deliberations to attract more support. The scope of the office's duties was narrowed to the Senate only, leaving the House out of the measure, and he reiterated that the office would be subordinate to the ethics committee. But Collins acknowledged that the measure from the start had faced an "uphill" climb.

The Senate also approved a proposal by Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.) to end the practice that allows a senator to block anonymously consideration of legislation. By an 84 to 13 vote, the Senate agreed to put a stop to what are known as secret holds.

The measure would require senators to disclose publicly within three days that they are objecting to the consideration of a bill. Currently, senators can place a hold on legislation without acknowledging their action to the public or to other senators.

The Senate agreed to work on the lobbying bill after voting 81 to 16 to limit the number of amendments it will consider. The procedural vote could allow the chamber to finish the legislation as early as today, lawmakers and staffers said.

McCain complained that some key amendments are being laid aside as a result of the vote. In particular, he said he regretted that amendments that would limit earmarks -- narrowly focused appropriations -- and that would, in effect, restrict lawmakers' use of chartered jets would not be voted on as part of the bill.

The legislation as it stands would bar lawmakers from accepting meals and gifts, including sports tickets, from registered lobbyists, and would increase the disclosure that lobbyists must make to the public.

Sens. Obama, Coburn Make Unlikely Duo (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, March 29, 2006

Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), a fast-rising leader in the Democratic Party, and Tom Coburn (R-Okla.), whom conservatives view as one of their most principled spokesmen, have forged an unlikely alliance in the debate on lobbying reform.

Both lawmakers have played prominent roles in the legislative wrangling over how to address lobbying abuses in the wake of lobbyist Jack Abramoff's crimes. Democratic leaders tapped Obama early on to spearhead the debate over reform, and Coburn has emerged as a leading critic of earmarks, teaming up with Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) in vowing to challenge colleagues' projects on the Senate floor.

Coburn has co-sponsored all five amendments that Obama has filed for the lobbying reform package. Obama has crafted a range of proposals:

· A prohibition on paid coordination of lobbying activities.

· A ban on lawmakers' negotiating future employment as lobbyists.

· A prohibition on advocating for earmarks in which the lawmaker has a financial interest.

DOJ_NMG_0023576

· A prohibition on buying votes with earmarks.

· A requirement that earmarks be available for scrutiny during business days.

It is unclear when or whether the Senate will vote on the duo's amendments. Senate leaders scheduled votes on two different amendments to the reform package yesterday afternoon and had hoped to finish consideration of it quickly.

The unlikely pairing of Obama and Coburn has raised eyebrows in Senate leadership circles and among other observers.

"That's an odd alliance," remarked a senior Democratic leadership aide.

But an aide to Coburn said that his boss admires Obama's integrity.

"He has a lot of respect for him," said John Hart, Coburn's communications director. "He sees him as someone who has a good heart and principled and not mindlessly partisan. He sometimes finds it easier to work with a liberal Democrat than a Republican who isn't true to his principles."

Coburn has not flinched from taking on powerful lawmakers in his own conference. Most famously, he offered an amendment on the floor last year that would have stripped more than a hundred million dollars' worth of funds for projects in Alaska, the home state of Senate President Pro Tempore Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), to defray post-Hurricane Katrina construction costs in Louisiana.

The daring move prompted an angry outburst by Stevens, who threatened to resign from Congress if the legislation passed.

In January, Coburn and McCain circulated a letter among colleagues warning them: "We are committed to doing all we can to halt this egregious earmarking practice and plan to challenge future legislative earmarks that come to the Senate floor."

And last year, before the debate over curbing lobbying abuses heated up in the Senate, Coburn pushed for an essential component of the pending reform package. At least five times in 2005 Coburn introduced amendments requiring that earmarks be visible in a conference report or joint statement accompanying the legislation, a principle that has garnered consensus in the chamber.

Obama, too, has taken positions not popular with other members of his party. After being chosen as the Democratic point person on lobbying reform, he introduced a bill that would create an independent commission to enforce lobbying rules. Good-government groups such as Public Citizen and Common Cause endorsed the proposal as their top priority, but only two senators endorsed Obama's legislation, Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.).

Obama has now thrown his weight behind the creation of an office of public integrity, headed by a single director, to enforce ethics rules. The Senate voted down the proposal yesterday.

But Obama has identified Coburn as someone perhaps more serious about reform than many of his colleagues.

"Senator Coburn is serious about wanting to clean up how we do business in Washington," Obama said. "I've worked with him on a number of projects dealing with transparency and accountability."

Still, Coburn's work on lobbying reform has been largely behind the scenes.

Advocacy groups pushing for strong reform such as Public Citizen and Common Cause say that they have had little interaction with Coburn, who has also taken a relatively low profile in the media, but they add his fingerprints are apparent.

"His name keeps coming up all the time in all the meetings I'm going to," said Craig Holman, a lobbyist for Public Citizen's Congress Watch, referring to Coburn. "His name keeps coming all the time, so I presume he's very active working with the senators."

Good-government advocates said they assumed that Coburn was not serious about lobbying reform because during the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee markup of the lobbying reform package Coburn offered a set of farcical amendments to criticize the process. Coburn also was the only member of the committee to vote against the reform bill in committee.

"We didn't make any efforts to contact Coburn because of the way he sounded at the committee markup," said Public Citizen's Holman, who added that Coburn's alliance with Obama is "something that really surprises me."

But Coburn's aide said that the lawmaker was dissatisfied with the reform bill because it did not do enough to safeguard against future abuses.

"He felt like the product was tilted too much to public relations and not enough to substantial reform," Hart said. "It's not enough to create the appearance of reform, he wanted to have the substance of reform. Unless we rein in earmarks and the ability of lawmakers to manipulate the earmark 'favor factor,' as Abramoff called it, we're not going to have real reform."

Obama and Coburn have teamed up before. Last year Obama supported Coburn's effort to create an office of chief financial officer to oversee reconstruction costs of Hurricane Katrina. In the House, Coburn worked with Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.) on healthcare issues, perhaps providing a partial explanation for his friendly relationship with Obama. Obama's legislative director is a former Waxman aide.

DOJ_NMG_0023577

But an aide to Obama stressed that the relationship is personal. Their wives became friendly during the congressional orientation session that Obama and Coburn attended together after the 2004 election, the aide said.

Republicans Vow To Pass Limits On 527s (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, March 29, 2006

House Republicans yesterday sent a message to Democrats insistent on keeping restrictions on 527 groups out of the chamber's lobbying reform bill.

Five GOP members, led by Chief Deputy Whip Eric Cantor (R-Va.), declared they would use every opportunity to seek a crackdown on the 527s' potent political power.

Cantor said that Republicans want to rein in the hundreds of millions of dollars in unregulated donations flowing to 527s and that they will do so "whether as part of a larger reform package or as a stand-alone."

"If the state of the law is that there is no soft money in politics, it ought to be that way for the average American as well as the wealthy American," he said.

The groups are named after Section 527 of the tax code, which permits them to accept unlimited donations for the purpose of influencing federal elections.

Wealthy Democratic donors have poured more cash into 527s than Republicans since the groups first sprang up after 2002's McCain-Feingold campaign-finance law, sparking complaints from many Democrats that the GOP is pushing for stronger 527 regulations to serve its political purposes.

But the five House Republicans mounting yesterday's renewed 527 push challenged Democrats to support restricting the groups or risk being branded as dishonest for their support of campaign-finance reform.

"If people don't vote to eliminate these entities, it's hypocritical. You can't be for McCain-Feingold but for these entities as they are," said Rep. Tom Cole (R-Okla.).

Jennifer Crider, spokeswoman for House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), said Democrats welcome a debate on campaign-finance reform that is not mingled with lobbying and ethics legislation.

"If you want to do campaign-finance reform, do campaign-finance reform," Crider said. "But that doesn't substitute for the need for what Democrats have proposed, which is real lobbying reform that would end the Republican culture of corruption."

House Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier (R-Calif.) included new limits on 527s in the lobbying reform bill he introduced just before last week's recess, though it remains unclear when the bill would reach the floor.

The Senate, however, remains a question mark, as Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) has not decided whether to press his proposed amendment to the lobbying reform package that was in line for a final vote as quickly as last night.

McCain's amendment, which was introduced just before the Senate temporarily scuttled its consideration of lobbying reform, would restrict individual contributions to 527s to $25,000 per year, similar to the caps Dreier's bill would impose.

"It's not off the table, not off the table," McCain said yesterday when asked whether he would consider withdrawing his amendment.

Cantor and Cole, along with Reps. Marsha Blackburn (R-Tenn.), Patrick McHenry (R-N.C.) and Tom Price (R-Ga.), paired yesterday's push with a letter to Mark Everson, commissioner of the Internal Revenue Service, citing an August report from the Treasury Department's tax inspector general that found 527 groups have avoided tax bills totaling $9.4 million.

The five Republicans did not address the specifics of their desired 527-donation caps, focusing on heightened reporting requirements for the groups. Unlike 501(c)s, 527s must report donors' identities and contribution amounts.

"527s should at least have transparency and disclosure," McHenry said. While 501(c) nonprofit groups have also fielded charges of improper involvement in the political process, he said, "instead of eating the apple, we're trying to take a bite of the apple."

Crider noted that McHenry signed on to a letter sent earlier this month to House GOP leaders by members of the conservative Republican Study Committee (RSC), asking for any stronger 527 limits to be paired with relaxed rules in other areas of campaign-finance law.

"Now I'm thoroughly confused about what he thinks," Crider said.

Abramoff Gets Payback In Gaming Bill (HILL)

By Patrick O'Connor

The Hill, March 29, 2006

A handful of gambling lobbyists have already called it Jack Abramoff's payback. Others are less direct.

DOJ_NMG_0023578

But the central irony remains: The same Internet gambling legislation Abramoff fought so hard to defeat on behalf of a client that helped states conduct lotteries over the Internet now includes an exemption to protect those lotteries.

Now Abramoff's infamy and legal woes are driving anti-gambling legislation across Capitol Hill, even though one of the most prominent bills includes language that would protect his former client.

Two House bills, introduced separately by Reps. Bob Goodlatte (R-Va.) and Jim Leach (R-Iowa), seek to reinforce existing anti-gambling rules by respectively updating telecommunications and financial-services laws to give enforcement agents more power to prosecute gamblers who place bets on websites based outside the United States.

A previous version of Goodlatte's bill was defeated on the suspension calendar in July 2000 after a last-minute push by Abramoff and his team to spread misinformation about the bill on behalf of his client at the time, eLottery, a Connecticut-based firm.

Abramoff is now out of the picture, but gambling interests remain powerful on Capitol Hill and the current crop of anti-gambling legislation reflects that sway. Versions of this legislation have passed the House twice and the Senate twice, but never in the same year. Both chambers now appear intent on bringing bills to the floor this year.

The Goodlatte and Leach bills, along with legislation introduced in previous years by Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.), attempt to crack down on the estimated $12 billion annual overseas gambling business, but none of those bills would regulate some closely related industries, in an attempt to avoid potential roadblocks.

In addition to the lottery exemption in Goodlatte's bill, both pieces of legislation include language to protect fantasy sports from current anti-gambling laws, and the two bills also avoid a decades-long dispute between Congress and the Justice Department over the legality of interstate pari-mutuel betting on horse races.

"The underlying principle of this legislation is not to change the legality but to change the enforcement mechanisms," said Martin Gold, a lobbyist with Covington & Burling who represents the National Football League, an ardent supporter of anti-gambling legislation. "It doesn't make anything illegal that was legal, and it doesn't make anything that was legal illegal."

JUNE 2000

Goodlatte is staunchly opposed to gambling and first introduced a bill to improve the federal enforcement mechanisms for Internet gambling in 1997.

In June 2000, Abramoff and his team defeated the Goodlatte bill after a companion had already passed the Senate and his legislation appeared on its way to swift passage, according to a story in The Washington Post last fall.

Abramoff reportedly convinced a former aide to Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) to help get the bill on the suspension calendar, which would increase the number of votes necessary to approve it, and directed funds to various religious groups to help him pressure conservative members to oppose the bill on the grounds that it would actually expand Internet gambling — a false charge, Goodlatte maintains.

The bill eventually fell short by 25 votes.

"It's now clear to a great many members of Congress that they were hoodwinked by Mr. Abramoff," Goodlatte said. "He effectively killed it in [the] Judiciary [Committee] by getting some amendments offered."

In the intervening years, Goodlatte added language giving states the right to conduct lotteries over the Internet. The change was part of an ongoing effort by the lawmaker and his staff to craft the legislation around a specific task: to update the 1961 Wire Act to prohibit anyone from placing bets over the Internet so that the 45-year-old law would apply to current technology.

Goodlatte reintroduced the bill in February of this year, and the legislation now has 130 co-sponsors. The Judiciary Committee is expected to address it in the coming months.

"It is a bill we intend to consider," committee spokesman Jeff Lungren said.

HORSE RACING

In addition to updating the Wire Act, Goodlatte's bill also gives Treasury officials more oversight of financial institutions to track illegal bets. This latter provision is the entire thrust of Leach's bill, which parallels legislation Kyl is expected to introduce in the Senate sometime this year.

The Leach and Kyl bills would require the Departments of the Treasury and Justice to establish "policies and procedures reasonably designed to identify and prevent restricted transactions" relative to Internet gambling. That would include monitoring of credit cards, electronic fund transfers and any checks or bank withdrawals.

Leach said his initial version of the legislation avoided any mention of horse racing, but the current version has a clause explicitly exempting any bet that adheres to the Interstate Horseracing Act.

Passed in 1978, the Interstate Horseracing Act governs all interstate betting on horses. The law creates a specific carve-out in the Wire Act to protect state-to-state betting on horse races provided it is legal in both the state where the bet is cast and the state where the race is run and provided all wagers are placed with a regulated pari-mutuel service.

Despite those protections, federal law-enforcement officials have argued that the law does not pertain to online betting.

In December 2000, despite strong protests from the Justice Department, Congress amended the Interstate Horseracing Act to include wagers placed "via telephone or other electronic media" provided both the sender and the receiver are licensed pari-mutuel providers.

Initially unaware of this dispute, Leach said, he was told early in the process to leave horse racing out of his legislation because it was a separate issue governed by previously established laws.

"It wasn't in the initial bill," Leach said of the horse racing exemption. The congressman said he wanted to limit his own legislation to betting that is already illegal under current law, adding, "Don't ever underestimate the power of the gambling lobby."

Goodlatte said he did not explicitly address the horse racing issue for the same reasons. "We don't address it, nor do we try to repeal it," he said.

The National Thoroughbred Racing Association (NTRA), which is both the trade association and governance body for breeders, owners and racing officials in the United States, sent out a release March 15 announcing that the organization "has secured language … to protect Internet and account wagering on horse racing" after Leach's bill passed through the House Financial Services Committee earlier this month.

The same release said that NTRA officials had worked with Goodlatte to "ensure that [his bill] also contained language that protects online and account pari-mutuel wagering."

The organization's political action committee had already contributed $79,000 to members of Congress this cycle as of Jan. 23 of this year, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. Neither Goodlatte nor Leach was a direct recipient of those funds, but Goodlatte's PAC, the Good Fund, did receive a $5,000 donation in July.

In addition, Federal Election Commission records show that Kyl refunded a $5,000 donation from the group late last year, according to politicalmoneyline.com. His office did not return repeated phone calls for comment.

FANTASY SPORTS

Almost 15 million people participate in fantasy sports leagues annually, according to the Fantasy Sports Trade Association (FSTA), which represents most of the online fantasy sport providers like CBS SportsLine and ESPN.com.

The average player participates in six separate leagues in two different sports each year, according to a recently completed survey by Prof. Kim Beason of the University of Mississippi. Participants are overwhelmingly male and spend an average of $493.60 on league fees every year.

The professional sports leagues, particularly the NFL and Major League Baseball, draw some revenue from fantasy sports participants, but much of that is tied up as part of larger broadcast or marketing deals.

The leagues now appear to be repositioning themselves after a recent boom in fantasy sports participation.

In 2005, big-league baseball paid its players union $50 million for the fantasy rights to its players for five years. Last year, St. Louis-based CBC Distribution and Marketing, Inc. sued the league for requiring companies to secure a license to operate fantasy baseball leagues online, arguing that statistics are part of the public record. That suit is pending.

In addition, the NFL has a deal with CBS SportsLine to operate its website, but the fantasy rights are up next month and the NFL can now renegotiate its deal.

Fantasy sports are protected in each piece of Internet gambling legislation because the results are an aggregation of individual statistics in multiple games over an entire season; therefore, backers argue, winning and losing is contingent on skill in picking players and the financial rewards are almost always determined before the season.

The results of fantasy sports contests are nearly impossible to influence because the standings are determined by too many players over too many games for outsiders to influence those results, a number of lobbyists said on background.

Goodlatte said it is unfair to criticize the entire bill on the basis of the single exemptions.

"It all goes back to Abramoff," Goodlatte said. "We were never trying to expand gambling. Clearly, it would contract Internet gambling. … [The legislation is] tighter now that it has ever been."

Affordability, Student Transfers On The Table In Higher-education Bill (USAT)

By Mary Beth Marklein

USA Today, March 29, 2006

The Republican-led U.S. House is poised to consider a package of higher-education proposals today that proponents say would increase college access and affordability and make it easier for students to transfer to different schools.

Critics see things differently. In ads Tuesday in a Capitol Hill newspaper, a group of associations representing college registrars, faculty members and students suggest that the aid proposals don't go far enough and that the bill panders to special-interest groups including lenders and for-profit colleges.

DOJ_NMG_0023580

The ad urges legislators to vote no on the House version of the bill to reauthorize the Higher Education Act, the law that governs most federal student-aid programs. A vote could come today. The Senate still needs to pass its bill.

Democrats, noting that Congress cut $12 billion in student aid in a deficit-reduction plan signed into law last month by President Bush, said they would push for stronger provisions to help families. Reps. George Miller, D-Calif., and Dale Kildee, D-Mich., said in a statement Tuesday that the House bill "misses an opportunity to make college more affordable."

A look at two key questions:

·Access and affordability. Howard McKeon (R-Calif.) chairman of the House Education Committee, says the bill would strengthen federal Pell Grants and access programs, especially for low- and middle-income students, and increase funding to minority-serving schools. Miller, the senior Democrat on the education committee, says Congress could boost student aid by billions over the next 10 years, at no cost to taxpayers, if it rewarded colleges that use a program through which the government makes loans directly to students rather than through banks.

·Ease of transfer. Noting that more than half of students attend multiple institutions, the bill would broaden the definition of "an institution of higher education" to include for-profit colleges, and "make it more difficult for academic credits earned by students to be wrongly denied," McKeon says. But the Washington-based American Association of Collegiate Registrars and Admissions Officers says the legislation could "open the door to fraud and abuse" and "dilute the high standards that have made American higher education the envy of the world."

States Have More Schools Falling Behind (WP)

By Paul Basken

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

More than a quarter of U.S. schools are failing under terms of President Bush's No Child Left Behind law, according to preliminary state-by-state statistics reported to the U.S. Department of Education.

At least 24,470 U.S. public schools, or 27 percent of the national total, did not meet the federal requirement for "adequate yearly progress" in 2004-2005. The percentage of failing schools rose by one point from the previous school year. Under the 2002 law, schools that do not make sufficient academic progress face penalties including the eventual replacement of their administrators and teachers.

The results raise doubts about whether the law is working and its results are fairly calculated, said Michael Petrilli, vice president for policy at the Thomas B. Fordham Foundation, a Washington-based research group.

"Most people thought that at this point in the law, we'd be seeing these numbers go way, way up" as standards toughen, said Petrilli, a former Education Department official who helped implement the law in 2002.

Bush achieved rare bipartisan support to get the No Child Left Behind law passed as part of his first-term agenda. Since then, the law has become a subject of dispute, with Democrats accusing Republicans of providing insufficient money for it.

At the same time, there is evidence that states may be manipulating the numbers, Petrilli said. He cited Oklahoma, where the percentage of failing schools dropped to 3 percent from 25 percent a year earlier.

Under the law's "adequate yearly progress" measurements, states are required to show improvement in student test scores in reading and math. If they do not do so for two consecutive years, individual schools must let students transfer to another school. After a third year, schools must pay for tutoring for students from low-income families. Some states have complained that the federal government has not provided enough funding to cover costs such as tutoring.

The 2004-2005 rankings are just "one thing out of many things" that need to be considered when judging schools, said Chad Colby, a spokesman for the Education Department. A set of federal tests, the National Assessment of Educational Progress, gives policymakers another indication of scholastic achievement, Colby said.

The true test of the No Child Left Behind law will come in 2013-2014, when schools are required to bring all students to proficiency in math and reading, he said.

The Bush administration has expressed satisfaction with the rate of improvement under No Child Left Behind. Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings, in testimony last month before the Senate's education committee, cited statistics such as 9-year-olds making more progress in reading over the past five years than in the previous 28 years combined.

The law, however, allows states to adjust both their tests and the formulas by which they calculate "adequate yearly progress," leaving parents and policymakers unable to make definite conclusions about such numbers, analysts including Petrilli said.

"These stats are meaningless in the absence of a common test and common standards," said Diane Ravitch, a New York University professor who was an assistant secretary of education under President George H.W. Bush.

Among individual states, Florida placed last with 72 percent of its schools failing to show enough improvement, while Oklahoma led, according to the Education Department statistics provided to Bloomberg News. Rhode Island ranked second behind Oklahoma with 5 percent failing, with Iowa at 6 percent, Montana at 7 percent and New Hampshire, Tennessee and Wisconsin at 8 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0023581

At the other end, Hawaii ranked second-worst with 66 percent of its schools failing to improve. Washington, D.C., came in third-worst with 60 percent, followed by Nevada at 56 percent and New Mexico at 53 percent.

Different states were required to submit the statistics to the Education Department by March 8. Federal officials plan to verify them and incorporate them into an annual report to Congress later this year, Colby said.

Math, Reading Crowd Out Other Classes In Test-Driven Schools (LAT)

By Seema Mehta

The Los Angeles Times, March 29, 2006

Science, social studies, music and arts classes are shrinking in the nation's schools, as educators concentrate on the reading and math curricula that gauge schools' performance on standardized tests under the federal No Child Left Behind Act, according to a study released Tuesday.

The report, by the Center on Education Policy, found this shift in instructional focus is among several profound changes in how schools operate that were prompted by the law, the centerpiece of President Bush's education agenda.

"The impact of the No Child Left Behind Act continued to broaden and deepen during 2005, the law's fourth year of implementation," said Jack Jennings, president of the Washington-based nonprofit that wrote the report. The law "affects a range of state and local activities: when and how students take tests, which textbooks districts adopt, which student receive extra attention…. Teaching and learning are changing as a result of No Child Left Behind."

Perhaps the most significant change is the increase in math and English offered in many districts, reducing the time students have for other subjects and electives, the report found.

Other main findings include:

· Overall student achievement has improved in the nation's schools since the law took effect, though some of the gains may be attributed to states changing how they determine whether a student is deemed proficient in English and math.

· Urban districts are bearing the brunt of the punitive aspects of the law, with a disproportionate number being identified as needing improvement, partly because of higher levels of poverty in inner-city schools. Some 90% of schools that are being restructured after failing to meet requirements for several years are in urban districts.

· The report called for more funding and flexibility by the federal government.

"From the Capital to the Classroom: Year 4 of the No Child Left Behind Act" was drawn from surveys of education leaders in the 50 states, surveys of 299 school districts, and in-depth case studies of 38 districts and 42 schools.

Critics argue that the report's findings and recommendations are unreliable because the surveys do not provide a scientific, quantitative look at the act.

"It's the same thing they've come out with every year on No Child Left Behind. What they do is ask public school officials what's going on, and they turn around and report the claims as facts. So every year they say schools are desperately underfunded," said Greg Forster, a senior fellow with the pro-voucher Friedman Foundation in Indianapolis. The findings "should be taken as public-school system propaganda."

Still, among the most striking findings was that more than two-thirds of districts reported reducing social studies, science, art and music instruction in elementary school to make time for increased English and math.

Chad Colby, spokesman for the U.S. Department of Education, said these two subjects were vital because they formed the foundation for students' education.

"Children must first learn to read so they can read to learn for the rest of their lives," he said.

California educators agreed.

"It is important for us to remember that reading and math are gateway skills, fundamental to success in other subjects, in higher education and the workplace," said state Supt. of Public Instruction Jack O'Connell.

But some teacher groups argue that it is vital to instill a love of all subjects in students at an early age, when they are most receptive.

"The young child is the most close to the mentality of the scientist — they've got curiosity," said Gerry Wheeler, executive director of the National Science Teachers' Assn. in Arlington, Va.

At Havenscourt Middle School, one of the most troubled schools in Oakland, four of the seven daily periods are devoted to reading and math, a move Principal Jacqueline Phillips says was born of necessity. Poetry, drum lessons and drama are offered every day after school, and three-quarters of the school's 600 students participate.

"This is something that must be done for survival," she said. "We have so many students that are scoring so low and are not equipped to move to the next grade."

DOJ_NMG_0023582

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

More equations

This school year, elementary school instruction in social studies--history, geography and civics--was cut the most as more time was spent on English, language arts and math.

Percent of districts reporting instructional time was cut "somewhat/to a great extent," by subject

Social studies (history, geography, civics): 33%

Science: 29%

Art and music: 22%

Physical education: 14%

Other subjects: 17%

Source: Center on Education Policy. Graphics reporting by Seema Mehta

Frist Cut A Debt Deal With Spending Hawks (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen

The Hill, March 29, 2006

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) will give spending hawks floor time on budget-process reforms this year as part of a deal he cut to secure smooth passage of a debt-limit increase.

The conservatives, who agreed to withhold amendments to the debt-limit bill earlier this month, will have a chance to amend line-item veto legislation, according to Senate Budget Chairman Judd Gregg (R-N.H).

"We don't want to just keep passing increases in the debt ceiling," said Sen. John Ensign (R-Nev.), one of the conservatives who had eyed the debt-limit legislation as a vehicle for a budget overhaul. He voted against raising the cap when it passed March 16.

Without the deal, Senate conservatives, including Sens. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.), Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.) and Ensign, may have tried to attach amendments aimed at budget-process reform.

Any amendment would have sent the bill to the House for a politically uncomfortable vote — one that House Republican leaders had avoided by employing a parliamentary trick that allows the House to generate a debt-limit increase without a separate roll call.

Frist has often been criticized by House Republicans for past promises to recalcitrant senators, but there was little booing this time. The deal spared House leaders the pain of an election-year vote on raising the debt cap to $9 trillion.

"We appreciate them sending the president a clean debt-limit extension," said Ron Bonjean, the spokesman for House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.).

Senate Democrats had given strong signals that they might support budget-process amendments offered by Republicans to force the House to vote on the debt limit.

Frist, who promised floor time before the August recess, cut the debt-limit deal because "he believes strongly in line-item veto and [biennial] budgeting," according to his chief of staff, Eric Ueland.

Republican spending hawks say they have few weapons to fight against expansion of the federal government. The budget process, they argue, is wired to promote spending, so they want to change the system.

Most of their ideas have been kicking around for years, but they hope anger among party activists will provide a catalyst for enacting mechanisms to control spending.

The proposals include line-item veto authority for the president, biennial budgeting, altering the rules through which the Congressional Budget Office calculates the costs and benefits of legislation, and the creation of a panel to review and eliminate government programs.

Though many Senate conservatives think process is the problem when it comes to increased spending, they do not appear to have agreed on which remedies to try.

"As to which reforms he would like to see included in a package on the floor or what amendments will be offered or supported, we will be discussing those as we get closer to action," said Ensign spokesman Jack Finn.

Frist's own legislation for a line-item veto is likely to headline any such package on the Senate floor, according to Republican lawmakers and aides.

During a GOP retreat at the beginning of the year, Frist encouraged conservatives to round up a filibuster-proof majority for a biennial budgeting plan written by former Budget Committee Chairman Pete Domenici (R-N.M.).

Sessions has been a powerful force behind a resurrection of Domenici's long-standing effort.

Frist is a co-sponsor of the biennial budgeting legislation, and backers think they can win a floor vote.

DOJ_NMG_0023583

Under Domenici's plan, lawmakers would adopt two-year fiscal blueprints and consider appropriations bills only in the first session of a Congress.

Proponents say that budgeting every two years would give lawmakers more time to evaluate the programs in their bills and identify targets for elimination.

"Committees would have longer to work on them," Sessions said. "We need to do a biennial budget."

Critics of biennial budgeting say that it would transfer authority unwisely from Congress to the president, a charge also leveled against several other proposals for budget-process reform. They also say any time saved by the maneuver would be negated by an increase in the need for supplemental appropriations bills.

Gregg spokesman Jeff Turcotte said there will be a hearing on the line-item veto on April 5.

Democratic Senators Vow FDA Nominee Block (AP-Y2)

AP2, March 28, 2006

Two Democratic senators said Tuesday they will not stop blocking President Bush's nominee to lead the Food and Drug Administration until the agency decides whether the emergency contraceptive Plan B can go on sale without a prescription.

Sens. Patty Murray, D-Wash., and Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y, told reporters that they met Tuesday with Dr. Andrew von Eschenbach but were unable to get a Plan B update.

"He gave us no status and he couldn't give us any kind of timeline," Murray said.

The FDA has held off on a decision on Plan B since Barr Laboratories Inc. first applied to sell the pill without a prescription in 2003.

The Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee has not set a date for hearings on von Eschenbach, said Craig Orfield, a spokesman for the chairman, Sen. Mike Enzi, R-Wyo. Enzi has urged the White House to resolve the Plan B issue, Orfield said.

Nev. Senator Drops Coast Guard Opposition (AP-Y2)

AP2, March 28, 2006

Republican Sen. John Ensign (news, bio, voting record) of Nevada said Tuesday he is dropping his opposition to the promotion of a Coast Guard vice admiral who headed Hurricane Katrina recovery efforts.

Ensign, a former veterinarian who criticized pet evacuation efforts after the hurricane, had been blocking President Bush's nomination of Vice Adm. Thad W. Allen to be commandant of the Coast Guard.

Bush nominated Allen in January and the Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee approved the nomination earlier this month.

Ensign said in a statement that he met with Allen on Tuesday morning and discussed problems with the Katrina response. Ensign said his concerns were unrelated to pet treatment, but he didn't say what they were.

Under Senate procedures, any senator can block a vote on a confirmation or a piece of legislation by raising an objection.

