Suspect In Soldiers' Torture, Murder Apprehended Near Baghdad. The New York Times (12/29, Santora, 1.16M) reports US and Iraqi officials said the man believed to be behind the June kidnapping, torture, and murder of Pfc. Kristian Menchaca and Pfc. Thomas L. Tucker "was seized in a raid in a town just south" of Baghdad Tuesday. The "abduction of the two Americans, who were captured when insurgents ambushed a traffic checkpoint their platoon had set up in the town of Yusufiya, set off one of the largest manhunts of the war, with 8,000 troops involved." USA Today/AP (12/29, 6A) also reports on the apprehension of the suspect.

Baghdad's River Patrol Works To Recover Bodies Of Insurgency's Victims. The Los Angeles Times (12/29, Hennessey-Fiske, 850K) profiles Baghdad's river patrol, which guards the stretch of the Tigris River flowing through the city. The group's members routinely pull bodies from the waters. "Death on the Tigris is almost always violent, the river patrol commander says. Some causes of deaths are unchanging: People jump from bridges, or get tangled in weeds while swimming and drown. And then there are the dumped bodies, an increasingly frequent sight and a barometer of violence in a city that has become the epicenter of the country's sectarian strife: stripped of identification, blindfolded, handcuffed, shot and often badly decayed. The river patrols, created by Saddam Hussein to retrieve casualties of his regime from the Tigris in the 1970s, have returned to body detail because of the city's civil war."

Heroic Navy Corpsman Severely Injured By Sniper Fire. The New York Times (12/29, Chivers, 1.16M) reports Navy corpsman Dustin Kirby, "whose efforts to save a wounded marine in Iraq were covered in an article published Nov. 2 in The New York Times, was severely wounded by an Iraqi sniper on Christmas afternoon." A bullet "struck the left side of his face while he was on the roof of Outpost Omar" in Anbar. Kirby's jaw and upper palate "were damaged extensively, but after several operations he was conscious and on a ventilator in a military hospital in Germany."

Iraqis Face Major Housing Crisis. The New York Times (12/29, Luo, 1.16M) writes that "along with its many other desperate problems, Iraq is in the midst of a housing crisis that is worsening by the day." It began "right after the toppling of Saddam Hussein, when many landlords took advantage of the removal of his economic controls and raised rents substantially." And now, "after more than 10 months of brutal sectarian reprisals, many more Iraqis have fled their neighborhoods, only to wind up often in places that are just as wretched in other ways. While 1.8 million Iraqis are living outside the country, 1.6 million more have been displaced within Iraq since the war began. Since February, about 50,000 per month have moved within the country."

British Prince Harry To Deploy To Basra. The London Daily Telegraph (12/29) reports that Great Britain's Prince Harry, a second lieutenant in the nation's military, is scheduled to deploy with his unit to Basra, "and will likely be assigned to patrol the border with Iran." Prince Harry "is determined to go, despite reports of resistance from many in the military who fear he would be a fat prize for terrorists. They're also worried he would attract attention and put his fellow soldiers in greater danger."

Great War Leaders' Hypothetical Iraq Strategies Considered. In the Los Angeles Times, four scholars consider how "four of the greatest war leaders in history" would have handled Iraq. Macalester College anthropologist Jack Weatherford says Genghis Khan would have recognized "that victory came by conquering people, not land or cities." Historian Adrian Goldsworthy writes, "What would Julius Caesar do in Iraq? 'He'd win' is the simplest answer." Author Harold Holzer says Abraham Lincoln would "focus on the real enemy: terrorists," "embrace flexibility," communicate objectives "with frequency, passion and precision," "spend more time at the front," and "abandon the notion of divine will to justify war." As for George Washington, historian Joseph J. Ellis said he "would recognize the strategic problem immediately" -- that the US faces the same situation as the British that Washington fought. No matter "how many battles the British army won, it could not sustain control over the countryside unless it was enlarged tenfold, at a cost that British voters would never support."

Karzai Denounces Pakistan's Plans For Border Mines, Fences. The New York Times (12/29, Gall, 1.16M) reports Afghan President Hamid Karzai "voiced strong opposition" to Pakistan's plans to "lay mines and erect fences along its border with Afghanistan. He said the moves would only hurt the people living in the region and would not stem cross-border terrorism."

Aid Groups Assisting In Iraq, Afghanistan Reconstruction Praised. In his "Wonder Land" column in the Wall Street Journal (12/29, A8, 2.04M), Daniel Henninger writes about the efforts of Spirit of America, a group "organized by Jim Hake, to provide citizen-supported aid to the troops serving in Iraq and Afghanistan" and similar organizations to overcome public disengagement with the wars and to raise money to continue their efforts. "Jim Hake says Spirit of America's contributions have fallen off since 2004 owing to general fatigue with Iraq, 'but under the circumstances people continue to be quite generous.' An end-of-the-year funding request raised more than $150,000." Henninger concludes, "Groups such as the Spirit of America and the Business Council for Peace may yet be driven out. It is to this country's credit that early on, they voted with their feet to go in, and regret nothing."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Apple Probe Finds No Options Misconduct By Managers. The Wall Street Journal (12/29, Goldstein) reports, "Apple Computer Inc. said in a filing to the Securities and Exchange Commission that CEO Steve Jobs was aware or recommended the selection of some favorable stock-option grant dates, but didn't personally benefit from it." The Journal continues, "In a delayed annual filing made with the SEC, the company said a special committee of the board of directors appointed to look into past stock-option grants concluded that while Mr. Jobs was 'aware or recommended the selection of some favorable grant dates, he did not receive or financially benefit from these grants or appreciate the accounting implications.'" The Journal adds, "The special committee of Cupertino, Calif.-based company also found that the investigation had raised serious concerns regarding the actions of two former officers in connection with the accounting, recording and reporting of stock-option grants. … Apple is also restating financial statements from 2004-2006. In total, Apple is restating earnings after tax by $4 million in 2006, $7 million in 2005 and $10 million in 2004. The company also plans to take an $84 million noncash charge as a result."

The New York Times (12/29, Markoff, Helft) reports, "Apple Computer and its charismatic chief executive, Steven P. Jobs, are expected to make a big announcement about a new product at the Macworld conference next month. Before that, however, the company has some other highly anticipated information to share." The Times continues, "The company is likely to answer questions about backdated options granted to Mr. Jobs and other executives in a delayed annual report that Apple said it would file with securities regulators on Friday." The Times adds, "Apple is among dozens of companies, many of them in Silicon Valley, which have come under scrutiny for assigning favorable grant dates to stock options to inflate their value. … So far, Apple, which is known for obsessively guarding information about new products, appears to have applied the same secrecy to its handling of the stock option issues. Publicly, it has confined its response to a few terse statements. This week it continued to maintain its silence as reports about possible falsified documents rattled shareholders. … The company has said that Mr. Jobs knew of some backdated grants, but that he did not knowingly receive any of them and had not benefited from the practice."

The AP (12/29, Wong) reports, "Apple is among nearly 200 companies ensnared in the scandal and that have disclosed SEC, Justice Department or internal investigations. … In June Apple began an internal review of its grants, including one to Jobs. Apple said in October that it found 15 misdated grants from 1997 to 2002. The Recorder, a San Francisco-based legal newspaper, first reported Wednesday on the discovery of possibly falsified documents related to options." The AP adds, 'Full details of Apple's options troubles have yet to emerge, but the Cupertino, Calif.-based company largely exonerated Jobs in October when it said an internal investigation had not found any misconduct by current management. The investigation did raise serious questions, however, about two former officers, the company said. … Experts who would speak only generally without any facts about the Apple imbroglio say that if Jobs knew about the falsification of documents, he could be in trouble."

The San Francisco Chronicle (12/29, Guynn, Writer) reports, "Rarely before in the business world has the filing of a company's annual report been as widely anticipated as the one Apple Computer Inc. is expected to submit today amid a deepening stock options scandal that has raised questions about CEO Steve Jobs." The Chronicle continues, "Apple was rocked this week by reports of forged documents connected with an award Jobs received in 2001 of millions of options to buy Apple stock. What happens to Jobs, one of the technology world's commanding figures, could depend on what he knew about options problems at Apple and when he knew it. … Apple watchers will pore over Apple's filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission in search of assurances that Jobs had no direct involvement in any stock-options shenanigans." The Chronicle notes, "Jobs holds an unusual place in corporate America. He is more cult than corporate leader, credited with creating must-have products and reinvigorating the Cupertino maker of iPods and Macintosh. … But Jobs and his company have been plunged into scandal in recent months after disclosures that Apple may have improperly granted stock options to Jobs and other executives."

Pixar Is Also Subject Of Options Probe. The Financial Times (12/29, Nuttall) reports, "Another company founded by Steve Jobs - Pixar, the animation studio - is also being investigated by the SEC over stock option awards but Mr Jobs never received any options himself." The Times continues, "Walt Disney, which acquired the company in May, said last month that its board was carrying out an independent review of stock option practices at Pixar after receiving inquiries from the SEC and Justice Department, although it played down any likely financial impact from the issue." The Times adds, "Richard Farmer, Merrill Lynch analyst, in a research report earlier this year into whether Steve Jobs might have been involved in options regularities, said: 'Our review of Pixar disclosures does not allow us to rule out the possibility, given Jobs was a member of the board that made options decisions, and our analysis suggests these may contain irregularities.' .. His research found that, between 1997 and 2004, four out of seven awards were recorded at the lowest possible price in the fiscal years they were granted - with the odds of this happening by chance being 112m to one."

Compensation Packages Allow Executives Low-Risk Departures. The New York Times (12/29, Creswell) reports, "It's called the 'golden hello.' … For a chief executive of a large corporation, it is the one thing — more than the corporate jet or any other perk — that must be guaranteed before the executive will move to run another company." The Times continues, "W. James McNerney Jr., a former superstar manager at General Electric, received not one, but two such deals in recent years, worth tens of millions of dollars. In each deal, he was given any bonuses, stock options, restricted stock and pension benefits that he would have abandoned by leaving his previous employer." The Times adds, "Such golden hello payments are intended to make the executive 'whole' — in essence to treat the executive as if his career were one smooth ascent with no costly interruptions. And these multimillion-dollar payments and perks are used to draw in not only chief executives, but virtually every member of the executive suite. If 'golden parachutes' — rich exit packages of extra cash, stock or retirement benefits — are needed at times to kick out chief executives, golden hellos are increasingly needed to get them in the door." The Times notes, "Such golden hellos are not new, but lawyers representing executives at the negotiating table are constantly coming up with quirky ways to make clients whole. Matching salaries, guaranteed bonuses and millions of dollars in stock options are typical. On top of that, chief executives are made whole on lucrative pension benefits, often being credited at the new company for years of service elsewhere — a perk rarely available to nonexecutive employees. … These days, though, some executives are demanding that companies make up losses they may face from the sale of a home if they relocate, or that they receive price protection on losses they might incur in stock they own in the company they are leaving."

GE To Disclose More Information On Pay Advice. The Wall Street Journal (12/29, A2, Whitehouse) reports, "General Electric Co., agreeing to an effort by some investors to increase scrutiny on executive pay, will disclose more information on the advice it gets from compensation consultants." The Journal continues, "The Fairfield, Conn., conglomerate agreed to go beyond regulatory requirements and disclose any business ties it may have with the firms that advise it on how to pay its top executives." The Journal adds, "Under new Securities and Exchange Commission rules put in place this year, companies will be required to disclose in public filings the name of their compensation consultants, but not their other business relationships. … In 2006, GE's board of directors used the services of New York compensation consulting firm Frederic W. Cook & Co., which also advises the company's human resources on its broader pay programs, said Peter O'Toole, a GE spokesman. The company will make this information available in its coming proxy statement, he said."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Domestic Violence Rates In US Fall Sharply. The Washington Post (12/29, A14, Hsu) reports, "Domestic violence rates in the United States dropped sharply between 1993 and 2004 but showed recent signs of a rebound, the Justice Department reported yesterday." The Post continues, "The number of domestic homicides fell 32 percent from 1993 to 2004, and the frequency of nonfatal violence between domestic partners dropped by more than 50 percent, from 5.8 attacks per 1,000 U.S. residents age 12 or older, to 2.6 attacks, according to the Bureau of Justice Statistics." The Post adds, "Men benefited from the decline more than women, and black victims more than white women. The number of women killed by current or former partners fell from 1,572 in 1993 to 1,159 in 2004, or 26 percent. The number of men killed dropped from 698 to 385, or 45 percent. … 'The best news overall is that 'intimate partner violence' has declined since 1993, but there's still too much of it,' said bureau statistician Shannan M. Catalano, author of the Justice Department online report. The report did not address violence among other household members or relatives." The Post notes, "Noting that current or former partners account for 22 percent of violence against women, but 3 percent of violence against men, Catalano said, 'It still is a crime against women. . . . Women are more often victimized by someone they know. Men are more often victimized by strangers.' … The report did not offer an explanation for the trend, but experts said it continued a decline in domestic violence recorded since 1976 and mirrored a drop in violent crime overall in the past decade."

The AP (12/29) reports, "Some experts attribute the decline to better training for police and more funding for prosecution, two key elements of the 1994 Violence Against Women Act. Investigators increasingly are better trained to handle abuse cases and bring them to court. … 'For the first time, there are entire domestic violence units in law enforcement,' said Lonna Stevens, director of the Sheila Wellstone Institute, a Minnesota-based domestic violence organization. 'We've had protocols and policies developed for responding to this.'" The AP notes, "In 1993, there were about 5.8 incidents of nonfatal violence for every 1,000 U.S. residents above the age of 12. By 2004, that number had fallen to 2.6, the agency said. Homicides fell by about 30 percent, from 2,269 in 1993 to 1,544 in 2004. … The Justice Department defines intimate partner violence as violence by a current or former spouse, boyfriend or girlfriend or a same-sex partner. … Stevens said police have been less successful responding to and deterring abusive behavior in some minority communities, where racism and cultural differences can keep reporting rates low." The Washington Times (12/29, Apuzzo, 88K) also reports this story.

International Cooperation Brings War Crime Indictments For Two Bosnian Serbs. The Christian Science Monitor (12/29, Kampschror) reports from Sarajevo, Bosnia-Herzegovina, "Mladen Blagojevic and Zdravko Bozic would probably be living unassuming lives as Bosnia Serb refugees in the Arizona desert if it weren't for a landmark international detective effort to track down war-crime suspects. … Instead, they're in custody in wintry Bosnia, where they were charged last week in connection with the 1995 Srebrenica massacre." The Monitor continues, "The case, say court sources, marks a precedent in international cooperation in the prosecution of war crimes, and could show the way forward for both the US and other countries that may be unwittingly hosting war-crimes suspects on their territory. … 'I would describe the cooperation with the US as unprecedented, as these are the first cases where war-crimes suspects have been returned to the country where the crimes were committed to face charges,' says Toby Cadman, counsel to the prosecutor at Bosnia's war-crimes chamber." The Monitor adds, "Mr. Blagojevic and Mr. Bozic were deported to Bosnia earlier this year after being arrested in the US for not disclosing their service in the Bosnian Serb military when its forces overran the Bosnian Muslim enclave of Srebrenica and killed up to 8,000 men and boys - a crime ruled genocide by the UN war-crimes tribunal in The Hague. On Dec. 21, they were indicted for crimes against humanity by Bosnia's war-crimes chamber and charged with the detention, murders, and forcible transfer of Srebrenica Muslims. International cooperation led to 56 arrests … In the past two years, 56 Bosnian Serbs have been arrested on charges of similar immigration fraud or making false statements over omitting their military service on immigration applications. Agents from the Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) most recently raided homes in at least five US cities earlier this month, bringing in at least 16more people . Mr. Cadman says the ICE's Operation No Safe Haven could prove a model for other countries, which, like the US, took in large numbers of refugees and asylum seekers from the former Yugoslavia during and after the 1990s Balkan wars."

Duke Rape Case Prosecutor Charged With Ethics Violations. The AP (12/29, Beard) reports, "The North Carolina bar filed ethics charges Thursday against the prosecutor in the Duke lacrosse case, accusing him of saying misleading or inflammatory things to the news media about the athletes under suspicion." District Attorney Mike Nifong "was accused of violating was a prohibition against making comments 'that have a substantial likelihood of heightening public condemnation of the accused.' In a statement, the bar said it opened a case against Nifong on March 30, a little more than two weeks after a 28-year-old woman hired to perform as a stripper at a lacrosse team party said she was gang-raped." The CBS Evening News (12/28, story 4, 0:20, Mitchell) noted, "He could face disbarment. Last week, Nifong dropped rape charges," but the three lacrosse players "still face charges of kidnapping and sexual offense."

The New York Times (12/29, Barstow, Wilson) adds, "In perhaps the most serious accusation, the bar also said Mr. Nifong had engaged in 'dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation' by suggesting to reporters that a condom was used in the alleged attack when he had in his possession a sexual assault examination report that indicated otherwise. Mr. Nifong spoke about condoms after laboratory tests failed to find semen from any Duke player on the accuser." Newsday (12/29, Maloney) also reports on the ethics charges, and the Washington Post (12/29, A8) runs the AP story.

Jones Hopes To Discuss Duke Case With Gonzales. WLFL-TV, Raleigh, Durham, NC (12/28, 10:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "Meanwhile North Carolina Congressman Walter Jones hopes to meet with Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez about the Duke case when Congress reconvenes in two weeks. Jones has written letters to Gonzalez, calling on him to investigate Durham DA Mike Nifong's conduct." WTVD-TV, Raleigh, Durham, NC (12/28, 11:00 p.m.) also broadcasted this story.

Former CyberNet Executive Pleads Not Guilty To Fraud Charges. Grand Rapids Press (12/28, Agar) reported, "A former vice president at the collapsed firm CyberNET in Grand Rapids pleaded not guilty Wednesday to federal charges related to an $81.7 million fraud case." Paul Nathan Wright "is accused of conspiracy, bank fraud, money laundering and mail fraud." The Press noted, "Last week, James Horton, the former CyberNET president, was sentenced to 7 1/2 years in prison. He pleaded guilty to conspiracy, bank fraud and money laundering, and has cooperated with the government. … The government alleges that CyberNET deceived lending institutions to obtain financing under false pretenses, and expended 'a substantial amount of effort to prevent lenders from discovering that they had been deceived,' the indictment said."

FBI Says North Carolina Woman Took Abducted Children To Canada. WRAL-TV Raleigh (12/28) reported on its Web site, "The FBI said Thursday that 17-month-old twins allegedly taken by their birth mother last week were spotted crossing the Canadian border. According to a news release issued early Thursday evening, FBI investigators have determined that Allison Quets crossed the border last Saturday with the toddlers, Tyler and Holly Needham. All three are believed to still be in Canada, investigators said." WRAL added, "FBI officials said they are working jointly with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the FBI legal attache's office in the U.S. Embassy in Ottawa, and the Durham Police Department. They also have enlisted the assistance of the National Center for Missing/Exploited Children, along with Child Find Canada." The AP (12/29) notes, "Quets, 49, of Durham, is suspected of taking Tyler Lee and Holly Ann Needham, who had lived in Apex with their adoptive parents, FBI officials said Thursday in a written statement. … Quets had monthly visitation rights as a part of a custody agreement, but now faces federal charges of international parental kidnapping." McClatchy (12/29, Ovaska) reports the story, under the headline "FBI: Missing Kids Were Taken To Canada."

Sheehan Arrested Outside Bush Ranch In Texas. CNN.com (12/29) reports, "Anti-war protester Cindy Sheehan was arrested Thursday afternoon outside President Bush's ranch, according to a law enforcement official." Sheehan, "who in the past has camped out for weeks in protest outside the ranch in Crawford, Texas, was arrested for blocking the road leading to the property, Texas Department of Public Safety's Tela Mange told CNN. Four others were also arrested after law enforcement officials asked the group to move and they refused, Mange said." Mange "said Vice President Dick Cheney's motorcade was delayed leaving the ranch while officers removed the protesters."

Seven New Orleans Policemen Face Murder Charges Over Katrina Shootings. The New York Times (12/29, Dewan, 1.16M) reports, "Seven New Orleans police officers were indicted Thursday on charges of first-degree murder or attempted murder in connection with the deaths of two men on a bridge six days after Hurricane Katrina struck." Four other civilians "suffered gunshot wounds in the episode, which took place on Sept. 4, 2005. No officers were hurt." The shootings "occurred while much of the New Orleans area was still under water, communication among officers was poor and the city was chaotic. The New Orleans Police Department's initial account — that officers were responding to reports of snipers firing on contractors — seemed to confirm fears of rampant lawlessness in the city."

NBC Nightly News (12/28, story 5, 0:40, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "A New Orleans grand jury indicted four police officers on charges of first degree murder and three others on charges of attempted murders in the bridge incident stemming from the shooting of two men during the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. The men were killed in what police say was a gun battle with officers claiming they were fired upon and appropriately returning fire. Witnesses dispute that account. No guns were found on the victims, and the coroners report showed a man was shot five times in the back." The AP (12/29) and the New Orleans Times-Picayune (12/29, Maggi) also report this story.

CIVIL LAW:

FEC Doubles Civil Penalties Imposed In 2006. The AP (12/29) reports the Federal Election Commission "more than doubled its civil penalties in 2006, imposing $6.2 million in fines for campaign-law violations." More than half – "$3.8 million -- came from penalties against Freddie Mac, the federal mortgage corporation, accused of making illegal contributions to political committees, according to year-end numbers released yesterday." But even "without the record Freddie Mac fine, the FEC issued 12 penalties of more than $100,000, or almost a quarter of all six-figure fines in the agency's 31-year history." FEC Chairman Michael Toner said, "I'm very pleased with the vigorous enforcement record the FEC compiled in 2006. The numbers speak for themselves." The AP adds advocates, 'however, said the numbers 'don't tell the whole story.'"

WPost Criticizes FEC For Pursuing NASCAR Driver. The Washington Post (12/29, A26, 690K) criticizes the FEC in an editorial for considering the case of Kirk Shelmerdine, the NASCAR driver who pasted a Bush-Cheney '04 bumper sticker on his race car. Shelmerdine's "decal resulted in a complaint to the FEC that he had violated federal election law by failing to file the report required of anyone who makes an independent expenditure valued at $250 or more in support of a candidate for federal office." The FEC "agreed -- in an action made public this week -- to take the step that ought to have been obvious from the start: to send Mr. Shelmerdine a letter of admonishment warning him not to do it again. Our customary criticism of the FEC is for doing too little to go after election law violations, not too much. But l'affaire Shelmerdine seems simply silly."

Court Praised For Ruling Issue Ads Permissible Before Elections. The Wall Street Journal (12/29, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "A federal court decision last week upheld the right of citizens to petition their government -- a right taken for granted before the 2002 McCain-Feingold campaign-finance law codified speech restrictions." The ruling "is overly narrow but welcome all the same. And if it's appealed, as expected, the Supreme Court will have another chance to weigh in on Congress's efforts to chip away at First Amendment free-speech guarantees in the name of 'reform.'" The 2004 case resulted "when Wisconsin Right to Life ran television and radio spots informing the public that U.S. Senators were filibustering President Bush's judicial nominees." In "a 2-1 opinion, the court held that certain 'issue' ads are permissible during campaign season, even if they (gasp) refer to candidates seeking re-election. And while we agree with the result, the justification for the court's finding is still troublesome and revealing of McCain-Feingold's assault on political speech."

FEC Fines Taylor For 2004 Campaign Violation. Roll Call (12/28, Duran) reports on its Web site that the FEC "fined the 2004 campaign of Rep. Charles Taylor (R-N.C.) $91,000 for failing to properly comply with provisions of the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act." Taylor won in 2004 but was defeated this year by Democrat Heath Shuler.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Man Sues St Paul Over Alleged Police Assault. The St. Paul Pioneer Press (12/29, Prather) reports, "A man who alleges he suffered an 'inhumane beating' during a traffic stop two years ago in St. Paul sued the city this week." The Pioneer Press continues, "Leon Nins filed a federal civil rights suit Wednesday, two years to the day after the Dec. 27, 2004, confrontation. Nins was 85 at the time. … In the suit, Nins makes a variety of claims, including excessive force, battery and assault. The filing states Nins suffered permanent damage to his eyes and legs as well as psychological injuries, including depression, anxiety and panic attacks. … Nins seeks more than $50,000, plus punitive damages." The Pioneer Press adds, "The incident, involving a black motorist and a white police officer, riled local civil rights leaders. Police Chief John Harrington, relying on witness statements and a squad car audio recording, defended officer Michael Lee, who said Nins kicked and spit at him. … Nins, who was arrested, spent three days in jail. Prosecutors charged Nins with assaulting the officer and obstructing the legal process, but dropped the charges and allowed him to admit to driving without a license. Nins had no criminal record. .. According to a criminal complaint originally filed by prosecutors, Nins would not open his window for the officer. Lee opened the vehicle door and Nins began yelling that he would not show his driver's license, began swearing and refused to get out of the car. Nins spit at Lee as the officer pulled him out of the car, handcuffed him and placed him in the back of the squad car. … Subsequent investigations by the Bloomington Police Department and the U.S. Justice Department cleared Lee of criminal wrongdoing."

Judge Says DC Juvenile Detention Improvements Too Slow. The Washington Post (12/29, Cauvin) reports, "A D.C. Superior Court judge said yesterday that the District had failed to do enough to improve conditions for juvenile offenders, particularly at the long-troubled Oak Hill detention facility." The Post continues, "Judge Herbert B. Dixon Jr. said the city's slow progress in making changes that were agreed to more than two years ago left him no choice but to step squarely back into the case, which began in 1985 as a class-action lawsuit filed on behalf of juveniles held at the city-run Oak Hill facility in Laurel. … 'In light of the recurring delays meeting the requirements imposed in this case, and the impact such delays have on the children in defendants' custody, the court concludes that its more direct and active oversight of the remedial process is warranted,' Dixon wrote in a nine-page order." The Post adds, "The lawsuit -- Jerry M. vs. the District of Columbia-- has cast a long shadow over the juvenile justice system. A consent decree, reached in 1986, was supposed to settle the suit, but problems persisted. The case appeared on its way to resolution in spring 2004, when the plaintiffs and the city agreed to the appointment of an independent monitor who would report back to Dixon. The D.C. government's appointment in early 2005 of a highly regarded juvenile justice director added to the optimism that changes were near. … But Dixon, who has overseen the case since 2001, felt compelled to act after receiving the most recent reports from the monitor, Grace M. Lopes. Although noting 'clear progress,' she found the city's efforts wanting in many areas, from a failure to ensure pest control services at Oak Hill despite 'chronic infestations' to persistent staffing problems even in new, more-therapeutic units. … Oak Hill's population has dropped from an overcrowded 245 youths in February 2005 to fewer than 100 in recent months as the city has found alternatives to housing juveniles there for extended periods."

WSJournal Criticizes Massachusetts Court Over Gay Marriage Amendment Decision. The Wall Street Journal (12/29, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "Nearly three years ago, the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts read between the lines of the state constitution to discover a right to same-sex marriage previously undetected across the decades. The court then gave the legislature six months to rewrite state law to accommodate its diktat. On Wednesday, however, the same court suddenly rediscovered the humility so lacking in its previous foray into the marriage debate." The Journal criticizes the court for not compelling the state legislature to vote on petitions to amend the state constitution to ban same-sex marriage, noting it "agreed that the legislature's duty to vote on the measure was 'unambiguous.' But it claimed to be powerless to compel a vote. So the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, whose own arrogation of power created this mess, has suddenly discovered the limits of its power to clean it up."

AT&T Offers New Concessions To Get Merger Approval From FCC. The AP (12/29, Dunbar) reports, "AT&T Inc. has offered a new set of concessions that are expected to satisfy the two Democrats on the Federal Communications Commission and lead to approval of the company's $85 billion buyout of BellSouth Corp. … Approval by the full commission could happen as soon as Friday." The AP continues, "AT&T filed a letter of commitment with the agency Thursday night that adds a number of new conditions to the deal, including a promise to observe 'network neutrality' principles, an offer of affordable stand-alone digital subscriber line service and a promise to give up some wireless spectrum. … Final approval still requires a vote of the commissioners, which can happen at any time via computer. The proposed deal is the largest telecommunications merger in U.S. history." The AP adds, 'AT&T offered the concessions after a little more than a week of marathon negotiations with lawyers who work for the two Democrats on the commission, Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein, documents show. … Consumer advocates are praising the compromise. Gene Kimmelman, vice president of federal and international affairs for Consumers Union, who has worked closely with the Democrats, said AT&T's new concessions are 'an enormous improvement from where we were a month ago.' … The agreement came together 10 days after Republican Commissioner Robert McDowell announced that he would not vote on the deal, despite being authorized to do so by the FCC's general counsel."

The Wall Street Journal (12/29, A3, Schatz, Grant) reports, "In a 19-page letter filed with the agency last night, the phone giant promised to observe numerous "network neutrality" principles so it would treat all Internet content equally. Consumer groups and some Internet companies have been pressing the FCC for weeks to make this a condition of approving the merger." The Journal continues, "In addition, AT&T agreed to do such things as upgrade the availability of high-speed Internet service in the areas it serves and adhere to price caps on high-volume data lines used by business customers. In a concession to labor unions, the company agreed to repatriate 3,000 jobs outsourced by BellSouth outside the U.S., locating at least 200 of them in the New Orleans area. … The deal has some longer-term implications for all phone companies because of the focus by the FCC's Democrats on net neutrality and rates charged to businesses for high-volume data lines. Democrats felt emboldened to take a hard line during negotiations because of their new control of Congress, where Democrats have been riled up about the net-neutrality issue."

Bloomberg (12/29, Stern, Peterson) reports, "The offer may end a three-month stalemate between FCC Chairman Kevin Martin, fellow Republican Deborah Taylor Tate and the panel's two Democrats, who have sought price controls and other concessions. Buying BellSouth lets San Antonio-based AT&T expand its local service to 22 states, gain full control of Cingular Wireless LLC and compete with cable television companies offering phone service as well as Web access and TV. … 'AT&T really wanted to get it done this year,' said Paul Glenchur, an analyst with Stanford Washington Research Group, an investor advisory firm. 'I suspect the Democrats didn't want to look like they were standing in the way.'" Bloomberg adds, "The concessions by AT&T go beyond those the company proposed in October. AT&T offered, for example, to sell fast Internet access known as DSL for $19.95 a month without requiring customers to buy phone service, the letter said. … The company also said it would repatriate 3,000 BellSouth jobs now outside the U.S. and pledged 200 jobs for New Orleans. … Democratic Commissioners Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein gained leverage in seeking tougher conditions after the fifth commissioner, Republican Robert McDowell, said he would abstain from voting because of his past work as a lobbyist for smaller companies that compete with AT&T."

FTC Challenges General Dynamics' Purchase Of Canadian Ammo Maker. The Washington Post (12/29, D3, Merle) reports, "Federal antitrust authorities, citing concerns about higher prices and less competition, challenged General Dynamics' plans yesterday to buy a Canadian ammunition maker." The Post continues, "The Federal Trade Commission ruled that to buy SNC Technologies of Quebec, General Dynamics must divest its interest in one of the two other competitors in the market. Otherwise, 'General Dynamics could unilaterally raise prices or otherwise engage in anticompetitive conduct,' the FTC said in a statement. … The company, headquartered in Falls Church, has agreed to those terms." The Post adds, "It is at least the third time this year that federal regulators have expressed concern about diminishing competition among military contactors. The agency took more than a year to approve a plan by Lockheed Martin and Boeing to merge their government rocket businesses, acknowledging that creating a monopoly in a multibillion-dollar market would probably lead to higher prices and lower quality. The FTC approved General Dynamics' $2.2 billion acquisition of technology firm Anteon in June only after Anteon agreed to sell a unit that raised conflict-of-interest concerns. … In February, General Dynamics announced that it would buy SNC Technologies for $275 million. SNC is one of three makers of mortar rounds, relatively inexpensive shells used by infantry troops, for the U.S. military. The others are Day & Zimmerman of Philadelphia and American Ordnance of Pittsburg, Kan., which is jointly owned by General Dynamics and Day & Zimmerman."

Judge Orders Intel To Produce International Evidence In AMD Suit. The AP (12/29) reports, "Chip-maker Intel Corp. said it would not object to a court order to produce documents related to its international business practices, as part of an antitrust case filed by rival Advanced Micro Devices Inc. .. AMD said the court order issued Wednesday was a 'significant legal victory.'" The AP continues, "In a letter to Judge Joseph Farnan in the U.S. Federal District Court in Delaware, Intel said it plans to cooperate with the court order and that it does not plan to file an objection. … Intel also noted that a court-appointed Special Master explicitly said it was not making decisions about whether the evidence would be admissible in court." The AP adds, "In September, a federal judge ruled that if AMD wins the antitrust case filed in the U.S., it cannot receive damages for Intel's alleged monopolistic practices overseas."

Market Watch (12/29, Andrejczak) reports that Judge Farnan "had previously sided with Intel, opining that the court lacked jurisdiction over AMD's foreign conduct claims. But a special master appointed to oversee discovery disputes in the case agreed with AMD that the PC-chip market is global, with 68% of the world's computers sold to non-U.S. customers. … Sunnyvale, Calif.-based AMD said it thinks this latest development will bolster it claims that Intel used anticompetitive practices in the sale of PC chips worldwide." Market Watch adds, "AMD has subpoenaed roughly 70 parties so far in the case, and as a result of this court order, it is likely AMD will target Intel's business partners in Japan, where antitrust regulators there have suggested Intel abused its position as the world's No. 1 computer-chip maker. … AMD originally filed its antitrust suit against Intel in June 2005. The suit accused Intel of bullying a range of computer makers, distributors and retailers from Europe to Asia into not selling or supporting AMD products. Intel has denied the charges."

US Charges Massachusetts Bus Company With Breaking Pollution Law. The Boston Herald (12/29, Goodison) reports, "Chelsea-based Paul Revere Transportation faces federal penalties for alleged repeat violations of a state law forbidding buses from idling more than five minutes." The Herald continues, "The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency and the U.S. Justice Department filed suit in district court on Tuesday, alleging the transportation company left its diesel buses idling for a total of more than 100 hours at its Roxbury bus yard and a shuttle bus location on Brookline Avenue. … 'Given the extremely high asthma rates in Roxbury, it is unacceptable that diesel buses and other vehicles are left idling for more than an hour at a time,' Robert Varney, New England EPA administrator, said in a statement. 'Diesel pollution is very harmful, especially for sensitive populations such as the young, elderly and people who suffer from asthma.'" The Herald adds, "The EPA witnessed the alleged idling during eight weekly inspections in April and March. At times, more than 20 vehicles were found idling - some for more than an hour and, in one case, for more than two hours, according to the agency."

FDA Approves Cloned Animals Products For Human Consumption. The FDA announced Thursday that it has approved meat and milk products from cloned animals fit for human consumption. ABC World News (12/28, story 7, 2:25, Gibson, 8.78M) called the move "controversial," noting that "a recent poll shows a majority of Americans, 64%, are uncomfortable with the whole idea of cloned animals -- much less eating food that comes from them." The CBS Evening News (12/28, story 3, 2:05, Mitchell, 7.66M) noted the FDA's decision is "not going down well with critics who say the government is going too far, too fast."

On its front page, the New York Times (12/29, Pollack, Martin, 1.16M) says the moved "touched off an immediate storm of criticism from consumer groups, as well as some concerns from meat and dairy companies worried about consumer reaction." The Washington Post (12/29, A1, Weiss, 690K) says the decision "represents a crucial milestone" for biotech companies, but noted that "in apparent recognition of consumer distrust of cloned food," the FDA "took the unprecedented step of posting all the raw scientific data it used to come to its conclusion." The Los Angeles Times (12/29, Kaplan, 850K) notes the report "didn't address the contentious issue of whether products derived from clones would require special labeling."

Meanwhile, NBC Nightly News (12/28, story 10, 0:30, Brown, 9.87M) noted that it "could be years before cloned food shows up on store shelves." USA Today (12/29, 5B, Weise, 2.27M) says the announcement is "just the beginning of what will be a year or more process of public input and discussion before these products can be sold." However, the Washington Times (12/29, A1, Lopes, 88K) reports food products made from cloned animals could be "on grocery shelves late next year."

In a front page article, the Wall Street Journal (12/29, Zhang, Kilman, Etter, 2.04M) says federal regulators have "opened the door to far-reaching changes in livestock production," which may limit US meat exports, "already buffeted by concerns in some countries about mad-cow disease." The Financial Times (12/29, Cookson) and the Christian Science Monitor (12/29, Spotts, 59K) also report on the FDA's announcement.

LATimes Says Polar Bears Could Force Global Warming Policy Shift. The Los Angeles Times (12/29, 850K) writes in an editorial, "Is it possible that the polar bear can do what the scientists cannot? What the polar bear could do, essentially, is force the administration to take steps to curb global warming. With its proposal, announced Wednesday, to list polar bears as a threatened species, the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service for the first time acknowledged that global warming is the driving force behind an animal's potential extinction. If the polar bear is listed as endangered, then the U.S. government would be bound by law to protect it -- and protecting it may require regulations to reduce greenhouse gas emissions. … If the administration wants to avoid more than a few legal and political headaches, it should use the time to revisit its antiscientific approach to the world's most pressing environmental problem."

In Virginia, Two Plead Guilty In Sheriff's Department Corruption, Racketeering Case. There are more than 100 media references to guilty pleas entered in connection with a Henry County Sheriff's Office drug conspiracy case. The AP (12/29) reports two former officers with the sheriff's department "pleaded guilty Thursday to charges that they took part in a scheme with their boss and ten colleagues to sell drugs seized from criminals." The two are among 20 people "indicted in October in the investigation of corruption and racketeering conspiracy. Former deputy David Allan King pleaded guilty to charges of racketeering conspiracy and drug conspiracy. James Alden Vaught, a former sergeant, pleaded guilty to racketeering conspiracy." Former Henry County Sheriff H. Franklin Cassell "has pleaded not guilty to impeding investigation and money laundering." FOX News, the Washington Times, San Diego Union Tribune, and Houston Chronicle are among the news outlets that used the AP story.

The Roanoke (VA) Times (12/29) reports a DEA investigation out of Philadelphia "led authorities to Vaught in early 2005, court records show. When the DEA delivered a package containing the sedative ketamine to a house in Martinsville, William Randall Reed accepted delivery and was arrested. Reed, who did not work for the sheriff's office, told police he rented the house from Vaught and paid the sergeant in drugs and money to use the house as a drug drop, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Tom Bondurant."

The Richmond (VA) Times-Dispatch (12/29) reports King and Vaught "were among 20 people indicted in October after prosecutors alleged that members of the sheriff's department were reselling drugs they had seized from dealers, trafficking in steroids and prescription pills, pilfering firearms from the evidence room and covering up their illicit activities by lying to federal investigators. … Vaught agreed to cooperate with federal investigators and secretly recorded more than 90 conversations with 25 people," Assistant U.S. Attorney Tom Bondurant said. Bondurant "added that Vaught is now receiving federal protection."

More Charges Filed Against Former Sergeant. The Martinsville (VA) Bulletin (12/28) reported a federal grand jury "has issued a new, six-count indictment against former Henry County sheriff's sergeant Robert Keith Adams in connection with alleged corruption in the sheriff's office. … That indictment, filed in U.S. District Court in Abingdon, alleges that Adams, who worked as a school resource officer and as sergeant in charge of investigations in the criminal division of the sheriff's office, helped cover up the crimes of former sergeant James Alden Vaught and lied to FBI agents who were investigating alleged drug and racketeering crimes at the sheriff's office."

Tennessee Doctor Accused Of Conspiring To Peddle OxyContin Surrenders License. The Knoxville (TN) News Sentinel (12/29, Satterfield) reports a Knoxville doctor "accused of peddling powerful pain-killing pills surrendered his license to dispense legal dope Thursday. Sanford K. Myers appeared before U.S. District Magistrate Judge Bruce Guyton Thursday and voluntarily surrendered his U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration certificate that authorized the Knoxville physician to issue prescriptions for narcotic drugs. … In the nine-count indictment, Myers, who operated a clinic on Kingston Pike in West Knoxville, is accused of conspiring with Jay Christopher Ridenour, Charles Ridenour and William Larry Cummings to peddle OxyContin from February 2005 to December 2005."

One-Year Suspension Recommended For Tucson Attorney Indicted On Federal Drug Charges. The Arizona Daily Star (12/28) reported a Tucson attorney who "was indicted on federal drug charges along with a doctor later convicted of conspiracy in a murder case should be suspended for a year," according to the recommendation of a hearing officer. The State Bar of Arizona "filed a complaint against Lourdes Lopez in November 2005, saying she had engaged in criminal conduct that 'reflects adversely on the lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer in other respects.'" Maret Vessella, deputy chief bar counsel, "said that not only did Lopez commit prescription drug fraud and insurance fraud, lie to the DEA and violate a federal judge's order…but the former Pima County prosecutor also discussed the plot to kill" a man.

MLB Players' Union To Fight Court Ruling On Drug Tests. The AP (12/29) reports Major League Baseball's players association "will fight a federal appeals court's decision to give prosecutors access to the names and urine samples of about 100 players who tested positive for steroids in 2003. If Wednesday's decision 'is allowed to stand it will effectively repeal the Fourth Amendment for confidential electronic records,' wrote Donald Fehr, executive director of the Major League Baseball Players Association."

The Washington Post (12/29, E5, Shipley) reports Fehr "said…he would consult with legal counsel to determine how to keep [the] records out of the hands of federal investigators. … The ruling means more professional baseball players could be ensnared in the drug probe known as BALCO that has already resulted in more than a dozen athlete suspensions and five criminal convictions. San Francisco Giants slugger Barry Bonds is the subject of a perjury investigation in connection with BALCO."

Bloomberg (12/28, Rosenblatt) reported Fehr "said in a statement that prosecutors investigating steroid use seized records for every player as well as 'confidential records of thousands of other people with no connection to baseball, including many with no connection to sports.' … Fehr reiterated arguments the union made in court that the seizure violated the players' constitutional rights against unreasonable searches and seizures."

Report: Federal Agencies Aren't Linking Information To Track Drug Trade, Immigration. The Inland Valley Daily Bulletin (12/29) reports, "In 2005, the Border Patrol apprehended approximately 1.2 million people in the U.S. illegally. Of those, 165,000 were from countries other than Mexico, and roughly 650 were…from special-interest countries, according to the Border Patrol. Those interviewed by the Daily Bulletin say agencies including the FBI and CIA are not using information from Border Patrol and Drug Enforcement Administration agents to make connections between the drug trade, illegal immigration and terrorist organizations. … 'The DEA has made a conscious effort to generate predictive intelligence so policy makers can be aware and plan ahead for significant changes in narcotics and smuggling operations,' said a DEA official who asked to remain anonymous. 'Anytime you send in a predictive piece of intelligence that has merit and it's ignored, then the consequences of that can be devastating to national security.'"

Government Officials Accused Of Remaining In "Willful Ignorance." The Inland Valley Daily Bulletin (12/29) editorializes, "The increased smuggling of drugs, humans and who-knows-what-else through a burgeoning international trade route through Nuevo Laredo, Mexico, and Laredo, Texas, is unsettling. So is the human carnage in the all-out battles among Mexican drug-smuggling cartels to control the Mexican trade route. … But perhaps most unsettling is the disconnect between those on the border's front lines and the higher echelons of the U.S. government, where a seemingly willful ignorance persists. … The FBI and CIA are not using information from Border Patrol and Drug Enforcement Administration agents to make connections among the drug trade, illegal immigration and terrorist organizations."

In Bolivia, US Senators Meet With Morales, Discuss Drug Trafficking. The AP (12/29) reports a delegation of six U.S. senators "led by incoming Majority Leader Harry Reid met Thursday with Bolivian President Evo Morales, seeking to smooth relations with the South American country's left-leaning government." Morales "announced earlier this month that he would seek to significantly expand the area for the legal cultivation of coca. The announcement drew sharp criticism from Washington, which has strenuously objected to any increase in coca production. The two nations, however, signed an agreement guaranteeing $34 million in U.S. anti-narcotics aid for next year." Reid "said the Andean country was 'moving forward' in its fight against drug trafficking."

Authorities Say 19 Killed In Attacks By Brazil Drug Gangs. The AP (12/29) reports drug gangs "set fire to buses and opened fire on police stations and posts around Rio de Janeiro early Thursday in a wave of violence that killed 19 people and wounded 21," according to the state's top law enforcement officer. The victims "included seven who were burned to death in one of four torched buses and two policemen, said Roberto Precioso, head of Rio's Public Safety Department. … Precioso said the attacks were apparently a show of force staged before a new governor is sworn in on Jan. 1. Police intelligence had warned the gangs were planning the attacks for some time." The Wall Street Journal used the AP story.

The New York Times (12/29, Rohter) reports drug gangs "unleashed a wave of attacks on police stations and public roads …Thursday, and at least 19 people were killed in the confrontations. … Brazilian news organizations said the wave of violence was meant as a warning to the new governor of the state of Rio de Janeiro, Sérgio Cabral. Elected in October after a hard-hitting campaign in which crime, drugs and public insecurity were the principal issues, Mr. Cabral takes office on Monday."

BBC News (12/28) reported officials "said the coordinated attacks had probably been planned from jail by imprisoned gang leaders. … Two police officers were among the dead, as well as seven gang members," Precioso said. He "said three suspects had been arrested and added police had occupied ten shantytowns, or favelas, which were controlled by drug gangs."

Bloomberg (12/29, Brasileiro, Blount) reported the violence "comes just four days before New Year's beach festivities and two months before February's Carnival parades, two of the world's largest events and key sources of revenue for the Brazilian city's tourism industry. 'The attacks were meant to destabilize the power of the state, but we have the situation under control and we're prepared to protect the population with added troops,' Precioso said. Rio won't cancel events planned for the weekend because of the attacks, he added."

The UK's Guardian (12/29) reports, "The city's prison secretary suggested that the violence had been planned by criminals from the Mangueira shantytown, a community thought to have links with the First Command of the Capital crime faction in Sao Paulo."

The UK's Independent (12/29) reports Rio's Mayor, Cesar Maia, "said gangs appeared to be retaliating against militias - reportedly run by off-duty police officers - that in recent months have been battling the gangs in slum areas and charging residents for protection."

Three Former Students Plead Guilty To Alabama Church Arsons. The AP (12/21, Rawls) reported, "Three former college students pleaded guilty Wednesday to federal arson charges for burning nine churches in a series of blazes that alarmed rural congregations across Alabama. Matthew Cloyd, Benjamin Nathan Moseley and Russell Lee DeBusk entered the guilty pleas to federal arson and conspiracy charges in the string of church fires set on two nights in February." US District Judge David Proctor "told them they all face minimum seven-year sentences." The AP noted, "The three are also charged with state crimes," and "defense attorneys have been discussing a similar plea deal with county prosecutors, but none has been reached."

Judge Rules Against IRS In Keeping Asset Case In State Court. The Buffalo News (12/29, Habuda) reports, "Rebuffing the Internal Revenue Service, a federal judge Wednesday returned the receivership case involving St. Augustine Center to state court." The News continues, "The nonprofit human services agency that served Buffalo's black community was ordered closed in February by State Supreme Court Justice John A. Michalek because of financial problems. .. Since then, attorney Adam W. Perry, a court-appointed receiver, developed a plan to pay off creditors and obtain compensation for 85 employees who worked months without pay." The News adds, "After Perry presented his report last month about distributing the center's available assets - including more than $127,000 in unpaid wages - the IRS sought to move the case to federal court. … The IRS argued that the actions contemplated by the receiver would be adverse to the IRS's tax lien of almost $900,000 against St. Augustine and that the receivership action has become one 'against' the United States. … Further, attorneys for the U.S. Justice Department, representing the IRS, threatened last week to sue the former employees and the receiver if the lien wasn't honored." The News notes, "Perry argued before U.S. District Judge John V. Elfvin on Friday to keep the case in Michalek's court. … Elfvin agreed. In a decision issued Wednesday, Elfvin concluded that removing the case from state court had been improper. The judge also denied a conditional petition/motion for emergency injunctive relief that was filed by the IRS after the court clerk's office closed Friday for the holiday weekend. The IRS sought to prevent the receiver from distributing any St. Augustine assets until 10 days after the state court decides another IRS motion."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Vows To "Try To Do Big Things" Despite Lame Duck Status. USA Today (12/29, Page, Jackson, 2.27M) writes on its front page that President Bush, "embattled by the Iraq war, barred from seeking another term in office and facing an emboldened, Democratic-controlled Congress," fits the "textbook definition" of "a lame duck. His final two years in the Oval Office seem destined to be dramatically different and more difficult than his first six. Republicans in Congress, once loyal, have begun to fracture. Democrats in Congress, once powerless, vow to use their new authority to investigate the administration, challenge its policies and chart their own course." But Bush, "calculating how to maneuver during his remaining time in office, insists he can score achievements -- and says he plans to try. 'Look, I came to do big things, and we're still going to try to do big things,' Bush told a private gathering of Republicans after November's election setbacks, according to GOP strategist Charlie Black, who was there. 'Regardless of my popularity and the Congress, I'm going to try to do big things.'"

Bush Tops AP Poll For Both Top Hero, Top Villain Of 2006. The AP (12/28, Superville) writes, "Bad guy of 2006: President Bush. Good guy of 2006: President Bush. When people were asked in an AP-AOL News poll to name the villains and heroes of the year, Bush topped both lists, in a sign of these polarized times." Bush "won the villain sweepstakes by a landslide, with one in four respondents putting him at the top of that list," but "was picked as hero of the year by a much smaller margin. In the poll, 13 percent named him as their favorite, while 6 percent cited the troops in Iraq." Fox News Special Report (12/28, story 7, 0:15, Hume) briefly mentioned the poll.

Roberts Taking His Time In Reshaping Court. The Legal Times (12/29, Mauro) reports, "At the end of John Roberts Jr.'s first full year as chief justice, his tenure is taking shape, framed by sometimes conflicting goals of collegiality, continuity and change." The Times continues, "He leads the nation's highest court more openly and with a lighter touch than his predecessor, the late William Rehnquist, and has quickly endeared himself to Supreme Court staff. But his imprint on the Court as an institution has been measured in small increments so far, as the realization sets in that major change -- such as increasing the size of the Court's docket and reforming the law-clerk-pooling arrangement -- may take years to accomplish. … 'He is trying to bring the old traditions of the Court into the 21st century,' says former Court official Harvey Rishikof. 'It's going to take awhile.'" The Times adds, "Nearly everywhere he goes, Roberts speaks of his desire to preside over a more cohesive and unanimous Court. But with resignation in his voice, he notes that he cannot achieve that goal without active help from his colleagues. … 'I think we're most effective when we operate and function as a court rather than nine separate individuals,' Roberts said at the University of Miami on Nov. 13, adding pointedly, 'I think we all need to do what we can to work toward that end.' … And when, at the Miami talk, ABC News reporter Jan Crawford Greenburg asked him how it felt to join the high court as its boss, Roberts gently corrected her. 'The chief justice really doesn't have a lot of authority of the sort that would cause you to refer to him as a boss.' … But Roberts is not losing sleep over this fact of Supreme Court life. Already steeped in the ways of the Court, Roberts knows that unlike a modern corporate executive who must produce quarterly gains, as a life-tenured chief justice, he can pace himself for the long haul."

Johnson Said To Be Improving. The New York Times (12/29, Zernike, 1.16M) reports Democratic Sen. Tim Johnson "marked his 60th birthday Thursday in the intensive care unit at George Washington University Hospital, where he remains in critical but stable condition two weeks after surgery to stop bleeding in his brain." Neurosurgeon Vivek Deshmukh said, "Senator Johnson's overall general medical condition has improved, and he is gradually being weaned from the sedation. He is opening his eyes and is responsive to his wife." The Times adds Johnson is "expected to undergo more testing in the next few days, and his office said it would release information afterward."

The Washington Post/AP (12/29, A17) reports Julianne Fisher, "a spokeswoman for the senator, said Johnson will not be present in the first days of the new Congress next week but is continuing to improve. She said he is responsive to directions from his wife but has not yet spoken." In a statement yesterday, Johnson's doctors "said he remains in intensive care at George Washington University Hospital. They have released few new details about Johnson's condition and prognosis since the days after the Dec. 13 surgery to stop bleeding in his brain."

Pelosi May Consider Issue Of Bathrooms For Female Representatives. McClatchy (12/29, McClatchy) writes, "When nature calls during a debate or vote in the House of Representatives, what's a member of Congress to do? The answer, even as the first female speaker of the House prepares to be sworn in next month, depends on gender." Male members have an easily accessible restroom, but "reaching the women's equivalent entails traversing a hall where tourists gather, or entering the minority leader's office, navigating a corridor that winds past secretarial desks and punching in a keypad code to ensure restricted access." Incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi "may revisit…the question of potty parity."

Safire Says "Subpoena" To Be Word Most Heard In 110th Congress. In his annual New York Times (12/29, 1.16M) "Office Pool" column, on the question of the "word most often heard in 110th Congress," Safire offers: "(a) sellout (b) compromise (c) subpoena (d) civility (e) payback," selecting (c).

OTHER NEWS:

Economy Could Face "Uphill Climb" In 2007. The Christian Science Monitor (12/29, Scherer, 59K) writes, "It looks as if it will be an uphill climb for the economy next year. Growth could be the slowest in the past five years. The unemployment rate, already at a low level, is likely to rise. Business, which has been on a spending spree, is expected to cut back somewhat. The consumer, the bulwark of the economy, may not be spending quite as freely." But "despite this economic slo-mo, most economists expect a recession-free 2007, the sixth consecutive year without a downturn."

Existing Home Sales Rose In November. The Wall Street Journal (12/29, Conkey, 2.04M) reports sales of existing homes "rose for the second consecutive month in November, a sign of rebounding demand that suggests the economic fallout from the housing market's slump will be limited next year." The National Association of Realtors said sales of existing homes "increased 0.6% from October to an annual rate of 6.28 million units, down 10.7% from a year earlier." The Financial Times (12/29, Cameron) says "most of the rise in existing-home business was driven by sales in the north-east, and volumes continued to fall in the south of the country, which accounted for 38 per cent of nationwide transactions in 2005."

Stocks Down Slightly. NBC Nightly News (12/28, story 7, 0:15, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street today stocks were down slightly. The Dow lost nine points [to close at 12,501.52]. The Nasdaq was down more than five points [to close at 2,425.57]."

Ruling In Ohio Workers Compensation Case Sparks Debate. The New York Times (12/29, Driehaus) reports, "The Ohio Supreme Court has upheld a KFC franchise's petition to deny workers' compensation payments to a teenage boy who was severely burned while cleaning a pressure cooker, raising questions from lawyers and the dissenting judges about the basic no-fault tenet of the state's workers' compensation." The Times continues, "The majority in the 5-to-2 decision on Wednesday accepted the argument by the restaurant owner that the boy, David M. Gross, then 16, had voluntarily abandoned his job when he ignored repeated warnings not to boil water in the cooker to clean it. That meant he was not entitled to workers' compensation payments because he no longer had a job when he was injured, the ruling said. … 'This is the worst decision I've seen since I've been practicing law,' said Philip J. Fulton, a workers' compensation lawyer and past president of the Ohio Academy of Trial Lawyers. 'It changes the whole substance of what workers' compensation is supposed to be.'" The Times adds, "Mr. Gross was working at a Dayton-area KFC on Nov. 26, 2003, when boiling water spewed from a pressure cooker and caused third-degree burns around his hip and groin and second-degree burns on his arms, torso and back. Two co-workers were also burned. … A company investigation found that Mr. Gross had ignored warnings in the employee handbook and on the cooker as well as repeated warnings by two co-workers and a supervisor. … The Supreme Court majority said Mr. Gross had violated his employment agreement and forfeited his job by ignoring safety instructions: 'Gross willfully ignored repeated warnings not to engage in the proscribed conduct, yet still wishes to ascribe his behavior to simple negligence or inadvertence,' the court wrote. … Edna Scheuer, the lawyer for the restaurant's owner, Food, Folks and Fun, said Thursday that the ruling applied to a very narrow set of circumstances and sought to deny only Mr. Gross's disability claim, which would have paid him 72 percent of his wages for the first three months and then two-thirds of his wages until he recovered."

Ford-Nixon Friendship Seen As One Reason Underlying Pardon. In a 1,200-word front-page Washington Post story (12/29), Bob Woodward reports, "Previously unpublished transcripts of their calls, documents and personal letters provide a portrait of an intensely personal friendship" between former Presidents Gerald Ford and Richard Nixon "dating to the late 1940s but so hidden that few others were even aware of it." Tapes, documents and "two lengthy recent interviews with Ford before his death this week, conducted for a future book and embargoed until after his death, show that the close political alliance between the two men seriously influenced Ford's eventual decision to pardon Nixon, the most momentous decision of his short presidency and almost certainly the one that cost him any chance of winning the White House in his own right two years later." In a 2005 interview, Ford said, "I looked upon him as my personal friend. And I always treasured our relationship. And I had no hesitancy about granting the pardon, because I felt that we had this relationship and that I didn't want to see my real friend have the stigma."

The New York Times (12/29, Shane, 1.16M) reports Ford's decision to pardon Nixon "for any crimes he might have been charged with because of Watergate is seen by many historians as the central event of his 896-day presidency. It also appears to have left him with an uncharacteristic need for self-justification, though friends say he never wavered in his insistence that the pardon was a wise and necessary act and that it had not resulted from any secret deal with his disgraced predecessor." But over "the last three decades, as emotions have cooled, many who were initially critical of the pardon have come to share Mr. Ford's judgment that it was the best way to stanch the open wound of Watergate."

Ford's Misgivings About Iraq War Garner Coverage. In their coverage of the death of former President Ford, both ABC and NBC cover Ford's comments to journalist Bob Woodward on the Iraq war. ABC World News (12/28, lead story, 3:45, Stephanopoulos, 8.78M) reported, "Bob Woodward knows how to get powerful people to talk. It was a four-hour conversation in July 2004. And Woodward came away convinced that the former President was telling him what he really thought about Iraq. Ford told Woodward that President Bush fought the wrong war --" Ford: "I don't think I would have ordered the Iraq war." Stephanopoulos: "-- for the wrong reasons." Ford: "I think Rumsfeld , Cheney, and the President made a big mistake in justifying going into the war in Iraq. They put the emphasis on weapons of mass destruction. I've never publicly said that I thought they made a mistake, but I felt very strongly that it was an error."

NBC Nightly News (12/28, story 3, 2:15, Mitchell, 9.87M) reported, "Gerald Ford, loyal to the end to his closest former aides, Dick Cheney and Donald Rumsfeld, was privately torn about their most controversial policy, the Iraq war. Only weeks before his last visit to Washington in 2004 he told author Bob Woodward he strongly disagreed with the decision to invade Iraq. Woodward taped the interview with the former President's knowledge. … The former President didn't know George W. Bush very well and is not known to have offered him advice on Iraq, but he told Woodward -- " Ford: "And I just don't think we should go hellfire damnation around the globe freeing people unless it is directly related to our own national security."

Bush To Miss Saturday Night Capitol Ceremony. The Washington Post (12/29, A19, Abramowitz, Layton, 690K) reports President Bush "declared a national day of mourning and ordered the federal government to close Tuesday to mark the death of Gerald R. Ford. Financial markets will be partially closed in observation of his passing as well." Though Bush "opted not to cut short a week-long stay at his ranch here to return for Saturday night's ceremony, when Ford's body will be brought to the Rotunda of the U.S. Capitol," he and the First Lady "will head immediately to the Capitol upon their return to Andrews Air Force Base on Monday to pay respects at the casket."

The CBS Evening News (12/28, story 6, 2:30, Whitaker, 7.66M) reported, "All US Presidents are entitled to a state funeral with military pomp and public ceremony, but Gerald Ford, a humble man, had to be persuaded." Still, "it will be simpler than some in recent memory."

The Washington Times/AP (12/29, Woodward) reports, "Less pomp, more circumstance. Gerald R. Ford's state funeral is missing some of the grandeur of the one for Ronald Reagan two years ago, a reflection of the 38th president's modest ways and lesser imprint on the nation, according to further planning details released Thursday." Part of it "will be missing President Bush, too."

USA Today (12/29, 4A, Kasindorf, 2.27M) reports the nation "begins six days of farewells to President Gerald Ford in state funeral ceremonies stretching from the California desert to the U.S. Capitol and a Michigan hillside." Observances are "scheduled to begin with a private prayer ceremony for the Ford family at St. Margaret's Episcopal Church in Palm Desert, Calif., where Ford and his wife, Betty, worshiped together for 29 years."

DC Mayor-Elect Delays Inaugural Celebration For Ford Day Of Mourning. The Washington Post (12/29, B1, Silverman, 690K) reports DC Mayor-elect Adrian M. Fenty "decided yesterday to postpone his inaugural celebrations, including a party that was expected to draw up to 15,000 people, because Tuesday has been declared a national day of mourning for former president Gerald R. Ford." Fenty will "still become mayor that day, taking the oath and succeeding Anthony A. Williams in a private ceremony. But he pushed back a public inauguration for himself and the D.C. Council until Wednesday and reset his inaugural ball for Jan. 6."

Ford Didn't Recommend Himself As Agnew Replacement. ABC World News (12/28, story 2, 2:05, Reynolds, 8.78M) reported, "Beyond the standard trappings of chief executive memorabilia" at the Ford Presidential Museum in Grand Rapids, Michigan, "the truly unprecedented nature of the Ford Presidency and Vice Presidency becomes more and more apparent with every step you take." On "one wall can be found a 1973 note from then-Congressman Ford to President Richard Nixon, touting candidates as vice presidential replacements for the disgraced Spiro Agnew. Note that Ford's own name is not on the list."

Hometown Remembers Ford For Accomplishments, Not Pardon. The New York Times (12/29, Bunkley, 1.16M) reports that in Grand Rapids, Michigan, some residents "had to be reminded by news reports about Mr. Ford's death that he is best remembered in most other parts of the United States for pardoning his predecessor, Richard M. Nixon. They have always known him as the athletic Eagle Scout who lost his bid to be president of South High School's senior class before serving them in Congress for 25 years, ascending to the White House and helping to heal a nation scarred by the Watergate scandal."

Ford Asked Carter To Speak At Funeral. The New York Times (12/29, Kornblut, 1.16M) reports that as he "helped in recent years arrange the details of his own funeral, Gerald R. Ford reached out to an old adversary: Jimmy Carter, who defeated him for the presidency in 1976." Ford "asked whether his successor might consider speaking at his funeral and offered, lightheartedly, to do the same for Mr. Carter, depending on who died first."

Ford Was Active Civically At Local Level. The Washington Post (12/29, A18, Pomfret, Geis, 690K) reports that in Ford's "regular-guy lifestyle distinguished him from other former presidents," and his "biggest achievement -- helping his wife found the Betty Ford Center, the internationally known substance-abuse rehabilitation facility -- could be said to pale in comparison. But in his quiet unhurried way, friends and others said, the ex-president, who died here Tuesday, was a model citizen, known for the courtesy with which he treated people and the sincerity with which he lent his time and money."

Ford Widely Appreciated In DC Area. The Washington Post (12/29, A18, Montes, 690K) reports, "Long before the rest of the nation recognized his signature qualities -- his hardworking manner, his kind regard for others, his basic decency -- friends and associates in the D.C. area knew that Gerry Ford was a prince of a guy."

Betty Ford's Resilience, Independence Noted. The Washington Post (12/29, C1, Tucker, 690K) profiles former First Lady Betty Ford's resilience in the face of adversity, saying she "didn't become the most admired woman in America during one of the most turbulent periods in national history because she made nice. She was so admired in the mid-1970s, and is beloved by a wide swath of the nation today, because she was bluntly honest and because, after everything life has thrown at her, she never quit."

The Dallas Morning News (12/29, Harris, 500K) reports, "Not since the days of Eleanor Roosevelt had any first lady spoken so freely on topical issues." ABC World News (12/28, story 6, 2:55, Snow, 8.78M) reported, "If her husband was the accidental President, Betty Ford was an accidental First Lady. At a time when the country yearned for truth, her disarming openness distinguished her."

Ford Demonstrated Good Humor Despite Portrayal As "Klutz" On SNL. The New York Times (12/29, Leibovich, 1.16M) reports, "No one did more to solidify Mr. Ford's unfortunate, and perhaps unfair, standing as the nation's First Klutz than" Chevy Chase, "the 'Saturday Night Live' cast member who routinely portrayed the president committing all manner of trips, flails and lurches." Ford's "cheerful reaction to the sendup included doing a cameo for 'Saturday Night Live' from the Oval Office; sending his press secretary, Ron Nessen, on the show; and appearing with Mr. Chase at a political dinner. That type of reaction became a benchmark of what would come to be an essential presidential image-making skill: an ability to laugh at oneself."

Dionne Says Bush Praise For Ford Is Right. In his Washington Post column (12/29, A27), E.J. Dionne reviews readers' email from the year, concluding, "Finally, a great many readers were frustrated that I have been rather consistently critical of President Bush -- though a few wanted more criticism. So please permit me to end the year in the conciliatory spirit of Gerald Ford." Speaking "on Wednesday morning, Bush declared that Ford 'came along when we needed him most' and that Americans came to know him 'as a man of complete integrity who led our country with common sense and kind instincts.' President Bush is entirely right."

Kondracke Recalls Ford's Honesty. In his Roll Call column (12/29), Morton Kondracke says former President Ford was "straightforward, honest, uncomplicated, salt-of-the-earth Midwestern, an Eagle Scout nearly incapable of dissembling. He was just what the country needed after the traumas of Watergate — the product of former President Richard Nixon's deviousness and paranoia." But Ford's "straight-forwardness limited his imagination, too. As a regular Republican Congressional leader, he voted against federally funded housing, aid to education, the Medicare program and former President Lyndon Johnson's war on poverty."

Ben-Veniste Says Ford Should Have Required Nixon Acknowledge Wrongdoing. In a Washington Post op-ed (12/29, A27), Watergate prosecutor Richard Ben-Veniste says, "While I do not believe Ford was wrong to pardon Nixon, the timing of the pardon was premature and may have cost Ford the margin of victory in the 1976 election. Had Ford kept to his original plan and allowed time for formal charges to be lodged against Nixon, spelling out the specifics of his culpability, it would have been up to Nixon to either accept the pardon or fight the charges in court. But pardoning Nixon without requiring at least an acknowledgment of responsibility for serious misconduct and for lying to the public left the door open for the spate of revisionist books and articles that followed the resignation."

Edwards Enters Presidential Race With Announcement In New Orleans. Former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, the 2004 Democratic vice presidential nominee, on Thursday officially entered the 2008 race for president, announcing his bid from the Hurricane Katrina-ravaged Lower Ninth Ward in New Orleans. ABC World News (12/28, story 4, :45, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "There was, today, still another entry into the race to succeed President Bush." John Edwards: "I'm candidate for the presidency of the United States." Gibson: "Edwards made the announcement in a New Orleans neighborhood, devastated by Hurricane Katrina. He praised volunteers who helped rebuild there. And called it an example for national action." John Edwards: "If we want to change this country, and we want to move America in the way it needs to move, we're going to have to do it, all of us together. Instead of staying home and complaining, we're asking people to help."

NBC Nightly News (12/28, story 6, 2:10, Brown, 9.87M) reported on Edwards' presidential bid announcement. NBC (Reid) related, "John Edwards said he chose New Orleans to announce because of the deep poverty revealed by Hurricane Katrina, still raw 16 months later." Edwards: "New Orleans in so many ways shows the two Americas that I have talked about in the past." Reid: "If that sounds familiar two Americas, one rich and one poor it is the same theme he ran on in 2004 and lost. The question now, what is the difference this time around?" Edwards: "You learn a lot from going through a national campaign. I certainly learned a lot."

Fox News Special Report (12/28, story 5, 3:30, Hume) also reported on Edwards' announcement that he will make a second run for the White House. Fox News (Garrett) noted that Edwards "endorsed the idea of universal health care, but provided no details. And even though economic growth, driven in part by Bush tax cuts has generated tens of billions in new and unexpected revenue, Edwards called for higher taxes on the wealthy and big oil companies." Edwards: "We do need, in my judgment, to get rid of some of the tax cuts that have been put in place, particularly for people at the top. I think that it may be necessary to put in place a tax on some of the windfall profits that oil companies are making." Garrett: "Edwards said higher taxes fit into a model of sacrifice Americans should embrace. Another example, increasing energy conservation." Edwards: "We need to ask Americans to be willing to be patriotic about something beyond war."

Appearing on Fox News (12/28, Chetry), Edwards said, "Anybody who's considering running for president, I hope, is doing it because they want to serve this country. And speaking for myself as an American, that's why I'm running for president. And I think we need the best possible president in 2009. I hope we have the best possible candidates, both on my side, the Democrats, and on the Republican side, because the American people need to have real choices. … I think that Sen. Obama, Sen. Clinton, other people who've talked about running on our side, and some of the people who it looks like are going to run on the other side, are all good people and I think we want those kind of choices in the race. I think it's for America to decide what it is I have to offer."

The AP (12/29, Pickler) reports that Edwards announced his bid "with new ideas that make him a very different candidate the second time around. In 2004, Edwards was the moderate southern senator who promoted middle class tax cuts and tried to position himself as the best general election alternative to President Bush. This time the 53-year-old faces a tougher fight for the Democratic nomination and has a more progressive campaign of eliminating poverty, reducing global warming and providing universal health care for all Americans." In 2004, Edwards "stressed his up-from-the-bootstraps biography that turned the son of a mill worker into a successful trial attorney and then senator. This time around, Edwards didn't mention one word about his personal story. He talked less about what he wanted to do as president and more about how everyone can change the country."

The New York Times (12/29, Nossiter, 1.16M) reports Edwards kicked off his 2008 campaign "with an appeal to citizens to take on challenges like the one represented by this still-devastated city." The choice of the "battered New Orleans neighborhood for Mr. Edwards's unconventional announcement, with student volunteers at his side, was intended to highlight what, in broad terms, would be a central theme of his campaign: the need for a fresh wave of citizen activism to 'change this country.'" Edwards "seemed at pains to begin on a positive note. He delivered a Kennedy-like appeal for grass-roots volunteerism rather than a broadside against President Bush, though he called Mr. Bush's foreign policy team 'an absolute disaster' in the question-and-answer session afterward."

McClatchy (12/29, Christensen) reports, "The Ninth Ward section of the city is still strewn with boarded-up homes and piles of debris 16 months after the area was flooded by Hurricane Katrina. 'New Orleans in so many ways shows the two Americas that I have talked about in the past,' Edwards said. Edwards said it wasn't just the business of government to rebuild destroyed neighborhoods, although he criticized the Bush administration for doing too little. He said he would use his campaign as a 'call to action' to encourage private groups to help those in need in New Orleans and elsewhere. … 'If you walk around these neighborhoods, what you'll hear is that most of the good that has been done in New Orleans has been done by faith-based groups, charity groups and volunteers,' Edwards said."

The Washington Times (12/29, Hurt, 88K) reports that Edwards "took the opportunity yesterday to criticize the Bush administration for its handling of the post-hurricane rescue efforts, cleanup and rebuilding in New Orleans. 'I think if the president of the United States had come to New Orleans, spent some time here -- I mean, the president has a lot of responsibilities, he can't stake himself out for the long term in New Orleans -- but he should have spent a period of days here, saw what was actually happening on the ground and then demanded action,' Mr. Edwards said."

The Los Angeles Times (12/29, Finnegan, 850K) reports that Edwards' "announcement came as no surprise; he has been preparing for the campaign for more than two years. To maximize media exposure, he timed his announcement for the normally slow news week before New Year's. The death this week of former President Gerald Ford complicated that plan, but Edwards still drew more than 20 news crews to his chilly morning announcement in New Orleans."

Edwards Says US Should Begin Troop Withdrawal From Iraq, Blasts Bush On Foreign Policy. The Washington Post (12/29, A1, Balz, 690K) reports in a front page story that Edwards kicked off his second presidential bid "with a call for the United States to reduce its troop presence in Iraq and a plea for citizen action to combat poverty, global warming and America's reliance on foreign oil." Edwards was "sharply critical of the administration for its conduct of the war in Iraq, and he again recanted his own vote authorizing President Bush to take the country to war, which he called a mistake." Edwards said, "The biggest responsibility of the next president of the United States is to reestablish America's leadership role in the world, starting with Iraq. We need to make it clear that we intend to leave Iraq and turn over the responsibility of Iraq to the Iraqi people."

USA Today (12/29, Lawrence, 2.27M) reports that Edwards "called his vote to authorize the Iraq war 'a mistake' for which he takes full responsibility. The one-term senator said he has been "all over the world" in the last two years and has increased his depth of knowledge of world affairs. He said it's fair to question his level of experience but said that doesn't guarantee vision or good judgment. He cited President Bush, Vice President Cheney and former Defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld prove his point. They were 'extraordinarily experienced,' he said, but their tenure has been 'an absolute disaster by any measure.' He criticized the Bush administration for making it difficult to engage other countries on international problems. 'The world is literally in chaos,' he said. 'When America doesn't lead, there is no stability. We are the stabilizing force in the world.'""

The Financial Times (12/29, Sevastopuloin) reports that Edwards "said his top priority would be restoring America's image. 'The biggest responsibility of the next president of the United States is to re-establish America's leadership role in the world, starting with Iraq,' said Mr Edwards. 'We have to show that we have the moral authority to lead. You can't lead through raw power.'" Edwards "said the US needed to get more involved in solving the crisis in Darfur and said America should join the International Criminal Court."

Edwards Launches Nationwide Tour To Promote His Candidacy. Bloomberg (12/29, Johnston) reports that Edwards "embarked on a cross-country campaign to promote his new presidential bid after getting the jump on some fellow Democrats by announcing his populist candidacy in hurricane-ravaged New Orleans. Seeking to build support against a formidable slate of possible opponents," Edwards "appeared at a town hall meeting in" Des Moines, Iowa, "home to the nation's first presidential caucus, before heading to New Hampshire, site of the first primary election in 2008.

In Iowa, Edwards is tied in early polls with Barack Obama and ahead of Hillary Clinton, two senators who are likely to join the race soon.

The Des Moines Register (12/29, Simons, 160K) reports that Edwards, speaking in Des Moines "during the 90-minute town hall meeting," said that he's "working on a true universal health care plan, not just access to health care or affordable health care. It's part of taking care of the nation's people and America proving itself once again as a model for the rest of the world, he said. 'We need to be patriotic for something other than just war,' he said."

Edwards Announcement Seen As Putting Pressure On Kerry To Make Decision. The Boston Globe (12/29, Milligan, 413K) reports that Edwards' "entry into the race as the third candidate for the Democratic nomination puts pressure on" Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry (D), Edwards' former running mate, "to make his decision, since the two former colleagues and running mates will be competing for a finite pool of money and support, analysts said. … 'It's one more indication that if Kerry's going to get in, he needs to get in fairly quickly,' said Merle Black, a political science professor and campaign specialist at Emory University in Atlanta. 'He's going to have trouble raising money and getting staff.' Kerry spokesman David Wade said the senator would announce his intentions after New Year's Day but felt no need to rush his decision."

Edwards Said To Be Pushing "Old-Fashioned Latin Populism." In her Wall Street Journal (12/29, A9, O'Grady, 2.04M) column, Mary Anastasia O'Grady compares Edwards with the recent class of Latin American populists, saying that "old-fashioned Latin populism -- what John Edwards is hawking to the U.S. electorate for 2008 -- is as chic in the region today as it was 25 years ago, and its persistence is seriously threatening Latin progress."

Obama Expresses Opposition To US Troop Surge In Iraq. The Washington Times (12/29, Bellantoni, 88K) reports that Illinois Sen. Barack Obama on Thursday "joined a chorus of potential Democratic presidential candidates criticizing U.S. policy in Iraq, telling supporters he opposes sending more troops and urging them to send letters to persuade President Bush to change the course of the war." President Bush "is thought to favor sending 20,000 to 40,000 additional troops to Baghdad, an idea several Democratic White House prospects have criticized. In an e-mail titled 'Escalation is not the answer,' Mr. Obama yesterday asked voters to tell Mr. Bush 'our soldiers are not numbers to add just because someone couldn't think of a better idea.'" Obama's "message includes a link to the White House's 'contact' page."

Franks Backs Hunter Over McCain In GOP White House Race. The Arizona Republic (12/29, House) reports, "One of Arizona's most conservative U.S. House members is endorsing a California congressman over Sen. John McCain for the 2008 GOP presidential nomination, saying it is 'what's right for America.' 'I think the senator knows there's nothing personal on my part,'" AZ2 Rep. Trent Franks (R) "said of his support of" CA52 Rep. Duncan Hunter (R), the "outgoing chairman of the House Armed Services Committee." Franks said that "he already has stumped alongside Hunter, who advocates in favor of strong military and for border security. Hunter announced the formation of his presidential exploratory committee in October." The Republic notes that "without criticizing McCain directly, Franks described Hunter as a candidate who 'is an unequivocal social conservative and fiscal conservative and has a consistent conservative voting record.' 'He is one of the true Reagan Revolutionaries in Congress,' Franks said."

Krugman Says "Radical Right" Failed To Govern. In his New York Times column (12/29), Paul Krugman criticizes the "Republican Revolution" of 1994, saying, "As long as people like" Dick Armey, Newt Gingrich and Tom DeLay "were out of power, they could run on promises to eliminate vast government waste that existed only in the public's imagination — all those welfare queens driving Cadillacs. But once in power, they couldn't deliver. That's why government by the radical right has been an utter failure even on its own terms: the government hasn't shrunk. Federal outlays other than interest payments and defense spending are a higher percentage of G.D.P. today than they were when Mr. Armey wrote his book: 14.8 percent in fiscal 2006, compared with 13.8 percent in fiscal 1995."

Latino Political Power Said To Have Emerged In 2006. In a USA Today op-ed (12/29, 13A), Raul Reyes, a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors, says, "2006 was the 'Year of the Immigrant,' driven by a fierce national debate over what the country should do about 12 million undocumented immigrants. The subsequent restrictive policy proposals were not surprising. But the massive pro-immigrant marches were astonishing, and invigorating." By fall, "the intolerant tone of conservatives only served to remind us of our own roots. So did passage of several restrictive local laws aimed at illegal aliens, as well as congressional approval of a 700-mile fence along the U.S.-Mexico border. So in the congressional elections, Latinos deserted the party of The Fence." Democrats now "have the challenge of retaining a Hispanic constituency that is increasingly complicated."

Ignatius Notes Key Challenges, People For 2007. In his Washington Post column (12/29, A27), David Ignatius writes on "three people who symbolize for me some of the difficulties of the year we have just lived through and also the promise and potential of the one ahead. Each of them reminds me that we are walking into the future balanced on a tightrope." Mohammad Baqer Qalibaf, the mayor of Tehran, "embodies Iran's potential to become a great nation -- and perhaps to escape the apocalyptic confrontation with the West that is proclaimed by his political rival, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad." In listening to Sallai Meridor, the new Israeli ambassador to Washington, "I sense that for his generation of Israelis, there is a dawning recognition that a Palestinian state living in peace with Israel is crucial for its future as a democratic Jewish state." And Secretary of Homeland Security Michael Chertoff "wants to stay focused on the biggest risks out over the horizon -- the nuclear or biological attacks that could kill hundreds of thousands of Americans. I admire Chertoff's dedication, but I have a nagging worry that his collection of bureaucratic agencies isn't up to the job of keeping America safe."

Schwarzenegger Recovering From Surgery. Fox News Special Report (12/28, story 8, 0:20, Hume) reported Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "continues to recover from surgery to repair a leg he broke in a skiing accident last weekend. Schwarzenegger says he has been meeting with his staff while he is hospitalized and is working on his state of the state address." The Los Angeles Times (12/29, 850K) says Schwarzenegger's office "released two photographs of the governor in his hospital bed, surrounded by monitors. He was dressed in hospital garb with a sheet covering his legs, and he appeared to be signing or editing documents. An intravenous tube was protruding from his right hand, and a laptop computer was perched at his bedside. 'I woke up feeling great,' he said in a statement. He said he was looking forward to his inauguration next month 'even if it means I have to walk into my swearing-in ceremony on crutches.'"

Many New State, Local Laws Take Effect Monday. The Christian Science Monitor (12/29, Wood, 59K) and USA Today (12/29, Cauchon, 2.27M) both looks at some of the state and local laws that will take effect on Monday. The Monitor says that "besides providing creative solutions to mundane problems like frustration over automated phone attendants, the laws that go into effect next Monday in 32 states reveal several trends: Five states will increase their minimum wages, nine states will implement more stringent policies on citizens' privacy to curb problems associated with identity theft, and five states will mandate new recreation regulations."

Minnesota Politics In Upheaval After 2006 State Elections. The New York Times (12/29, Johnson, 1.16M) reports on the changing political situation in Minnesota, where Democrats flipped the state House, increased their majority in the state Senate, and came within 22,000 votes of defeating Republican Gov. Tim Pawlenty. Minnesota's capital "'is in many ways the perfect petri dish for testing what the nation's new political landscape may produce. Once predictably Democratic in national politics, the anchor of Upper Midwest liberal populism from the 1920s through Hubert Humphrey and Walter Mondale, Minnesota is now considered a battleground, with the Republicans scheduled to hold their national convention in 2008 in Minneapolis and St. Paul around that declaration." The Democrats "won big here," but "they emerged divided, too, owing much of their surge to newly elected moderates from the suburbs who are unlikely to embrace a pure liberal agenda. The Republicans lost big, but were pushed toward the center as well, led by Mr. Pawlenty, who has said since the election that many of his second-term priorities will overlap with those of the Democrats he fiercely battled in his first four years."

Virginia Republicans Conferring To Solve Divisions On Transportation. The Washington Post (12/29, A1, Shear, 690K) reports top Virginia Republicans, "including the state's attorney general and the party's former national chairman, have been holding secret meetings for weeks in the hopes of finding an end to the war among their party's lawmakers and reaching a compromise on funding for transportation, several participants said." Some of the GOP's "biggest names from outside the General Assembly fear that the rift between leaders in the GOP-led House of Delegates and state Senate will cause Republicans to lose big in elections in November, especially in Northern Virginia, unless something is done to ease congestion."

WPost Says Maryland Must Raise Taxes To Bridge Deficit. The Washington Post (12/29, A26, 690K) says in an editorial that Maryland's "fiscal problems are gathering like thunderheads." Despite Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley's "dismissive treatment of projected deficits during the fall campaign, it seems increasingly likely that his term in office will be marked not by the hundreds of millions of dollars in initiatives and new spending he liked to talk about on the stump but by his ability to manage and contain shortfalls estimated to run into billions of dollars." O'Malley "has not ruled out new taxes, which will inevitably be part of any solution to a fiscal problem on the scale of Maryland's. But he seems determined to defer a major push on revenue until his second year in office, perhaps by naming a commission to 'study' the problem." O'Malley is "looking increasingly cavalier, and possibly foolish, to postpone a serious reckoning."

Somali Transitional Government Troops Remove Islamists From Power. The New York Times (12/29, Gettleman, 1.16M) reports that in Somalia, "thousands of troops of the transitional government marched into" Mogadishu Thursday "in a stunning reversal of fortune." In five days, "the internationally recognized government, a fledging authority that had been so weak it was marooned in a provincial market town, captured the formidable capital and most of Somalia," with "more than a little help from Ethiopia." The Islamists were "vanquished," or removed from power "faster than anyone had expected." The Ethiopians say "they have no intention of staying and that their mission to neutralize the threat in Somalia has been mostly accomplished."

The Los Angeles Times (12/29, Sanders, Albadri, 850K) reports on Thursday morning, "residents awoke this morning to find the Ethiopians and troops of Somalia's UN-backed transitional government taking positions." Government officials "spent most of Thursday meeting with clan leaders to ensure there would be no remnants of the Islamic forces hiding in Mogadishu when they entered, and that the local population would welcome their soldiers." US and Ethiopian officials had "accused the Islamists of plotting to establish a Taliban-style regime and use Somalia as a base to launch terrorist attacks." Prime minister of the transitional government, Ali Mohammed Gedi, declared, "The fighting is over."

Transition Stirs Uneasiness In Somalia. The Washington Times/AP (12/29, Hassan) reports, "Ethiopian soldiers stopped on the outskirts of town, after providing much of the military might in the offensive that shattered what had seemed an unbeatable Islamist militia. Islamist fighters fled south vowing to continue the battle." Amidst celebrations, "many in overwhelmingly Muslim Somalia are suspicious of the transitional government's reliance on neighboring Ethiopia, a traditional rival with a large Christian population and one of East Africa's biggest armies."

The Christian Science Monitor (12/29, Crilly, 59K) reports, "Residents said they feared a return to 15 years of anarchy," and analysts warn that "the quick victory over the Islamists…leaves a dangerous vacuum in a country that has only recently seen calm." Analysts contend that "without a political strategy," Somalia "risks becoming a quagmire that sucks in neighboring countries." They also said that "if the Ethiopians withdraw quickly," then "radical elements within the courts…might run a guerrilla campaign, drawing in foreign fighters."

US Pitch For Iran Sanctions Receives "Tepid" Response. The Wall Street Journal (12/29, A4, King, 2.04M) reports, "Armed at last with a set of limited United Nations sanctions against Iran's nuclear program, the Bush administration has been stepping up efforts to persuade countries in Europe and Asia to go further and cut off bank lending and other financial interactions with Iran." International response has been "tepid," and European officials want to first "implement and enforce Saturday's package of limited sanctions on Iran." Senior US officials say that the Dec. 23 UN resolution is "crucial because it provides countries with the legal justification to push for tighter financial controls against Iran within their own systems."

Israel Says Egypt Sends Abbas Weapons. The New York Times (12/29, Erlanger, 1.16M) reports, "After coordination with Israel and the United States, Egypt has sent weapons and ammunition into the Gaza Strip to forces loyal to the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah," Israeli officials said Thursday. Senior Palestinian officials "denied the report." The Bush Administration is "seeking Congressional support for up to $100 million, mostly for salaries and training, to strengthen Mr. Abbas and his security forces and extend their control over the Gaza crossing points." A senior US official "insisted that the point was not to promote civil war with Hamas, but to help Mr. Abbas and Fatah and 'to provide deterrence and balance' in Gaza, where Hamas is especially strong." The arms shipment is "part of a broader American and Israeli effort."

Beirut Celebrates Holidays Despite Struggles. The New York Times (12/29, Fattah, 1.16M) reports that though holiday cheer "lent downtown Beirut the feel of a Christmas fair for much of this week," even the Christmas celebration "turned political." Rallies have been "muted in recent days so families could celebrate Christmas or prepare for Id al-Adha, the Muslim Feast of Sacrifice, at the weekend." However, opposition leaders "threaten to raise the pitch next week, suggesting that they may block highways and access to Beirut's airport."

Russia, Belarus Prepare For Gas Showdown. The Wall Street Journal (12/29, A3, Cullison, Crawford, Miller, 2.04M) reports, "Russia and the former Soviet state of Belarus are heading toward a showdown over natural-gas prices that both sides warn could lead to a New Year's Day pipeline shut-off similar to the one that hit Ukraine a year ago, which had ripple effects across Europe." However, analysts say there is "less likelihood of a political firestorm over any Russian cutoff this year."

USA Today (12/29, 8A, Stinson, 2.27M) reports, "Gazprom, Russia's state-controlled natural gas monopoly, has told Belarus to pay double the current price for gas by

New Year's Day or supplies will be cut." The company also "demanded a stake in the pipeline carrying gas from Belarus to other European customers." Belarus has "rejected the demands," even though Gazprom is the world's "biggest gas producer," and "provides 25% of the natural gas consumed by Europe." Analysts say the dispute shows how Russia is "tightening its grip on energy production and distribution to squeeze higher prices from its neighbors."

Bulgaria, Romania Enter EU On Monday. The Christian Science Monitor (12/29, Jordan, 59K) reports "despite Western fears that hordes of desperate, job-seeking Bulgarians and Romanians will again flood the European Union when their countries become members on Jan. 1," but many "have compelling reasons to stay home." Krassen Stanchev, executive director of the Institute for Market Economics in Sofia, said, "Some believe 'paradise' is in Western Europe, but some of this paradise will soon be coming here." Both Bulgaria and Romania expect "a multibillion-euro infusion of EU aid and foreign investment after New Year's," and already, their economies "are roaring, growing at 7 percent and 6 percent, respectively."

Turkmen Leader's Death Could Lead To Chaos. In a Wall Street Journal (12/29, A8, 2.04M) op-ed, Uzbek journalist and novelist Hamid Ismailov eulogizes Saparmurat Niyazov, Turkmenistan's president who died last week: "Turkmenbashi ('Head of all Turkmen')…was, as his foreign obituarists noted, 'eccentric' even by Central Asia's high standards. Niyazov abolished opera, ballet and circus, arts that were foreign, according to him, to the Turkmen mentality; to nurture this 'mentality,' he wrote 'Ruhname' (Book of Spirit), a compilation of reinvented history, folklore and pseudo-philosophical maxims to rival the Quran." Ismailov lists a number of further perceived eccentricities, noting however that "mesmerized with his notorious idiosyncrasies, the outside world paid less attention to the dark side of Turkmen reality. Politicians and journalists who dared think independently disappeared." Ismailov predicts a chaotic transition of power, possibly to Niyazov's son Murad, "who upon the news of the old man's death swiftly imprisoned his rival and constitutionally next-in-line, the parliament speaker, and declared himself acting president."

Buddhists Flee Bangkok From Militant Insurgency. The Washington Times (12/29, Ehrlich, 88K) reports, "Buddhists are fleeing their homes in southern Thailand in the face of an increasingly militant Muslim insurgency that has begun calling for an independent and pure Islamist nation in the impoverished region bordering Malaysia." Bangkok has "developed into a battle reflecting extremism in Iraq and Afghanistan, including beheadings and the burning of schools." In addition, "200 Buddhist villagers in the Yala province have fled."

China's Economy Likely To Have Expanded 10.5% This Year. The Wall Street Journal (12/29, Zheng, Ruan, 2.04M) reports, "China's economy is likely to have expanded 10.5% in 2006, the chief economist of the National Bureau of Statistics said yesterday." Yao Jingyuan, senior official of the statistics bureau said that "combined value of China's imports and exports likely rose 25% in 2006 to $1.7 trillion." He warned that the economy is "still facing risks of overheating," but the government "should also guard against any big slowdown in growth."

USA Today Says Ban's UN Obstacles Are "Not Impossible." The USA Today (12/29, 11A, 2.27M) editorializes that even though Ban Ki Moon faces immediate challenges as he takes over as the UN's secretary-general, Ban's mission "is not impossible." His challenges "cry out for a strong and authoritative figure," and Ban's reputation is "that of a self-effacing bureaucrat." To "rebuilt the trust of the UN," Ban can start by "focusing on making the UN bureaucracy more accountable," "making a new diplomatic push to halt the genocide in Sudan's Darfur region," and "start gathering troops for quick deployment if and when Sudan's leaders accept them."

WSJournal Says Bush AIDS, Malaria Initiative Shows Progress. The Wall Street Journal (12/29, A8, 2.04M) editorializes that 2006 was "a year of progress on both fronts," on AIDS and malaria. The White House's malaria summit this month had a message of "accountability," and not just "spending more money." Since President Bush "launched his $15 billion plan for AIDS relief in 2003," the US "has provided life-saving antiretroviral drugs for 822,000 people," while providing care for "another 4.5 million people such as AIDS orphans." This is "only a fraction of the 39 million HIV infections world-wide, 62% of them in sub-Saharan Africa," but the Bush Administration is "showing with AIDS and malaria is that a well managed effort can save millions from an early grave."

LATimes Chides Archbishop Of Canterbury For "Selective" Critique Of Mideast. The Los Angeles Times (12/29, 850K) editorializes, "In blaming an exodus of Christians from the Middle East on the 'short-sightedness and ignorance' that led to the war in Iraq," Archbishop of Canterbury Rowan Williams "has identified a part -- but only a part -- of the sad phenomenon he rightly decries." In a Times of London essay, the Church of England head "notes that opponents of the Iraq war had warned that Western military action 'would put Christians in the whole Middle East at risk.'

Williams says that events since the 2003 invasion of Iraq, including the departure from Iraq of thousands of Christians, have made prophets of war critics. 'The first Christian believers were Middle Easterners,' Williams writes. 'It's a very sobering thought that we might live to see the last native Christian believers in the region.'" There is "some truth in Williams' sermon," but his "critique is selective."

TERRORISM NEWS:

5 From Lackawanna Six Sent To Indiana Prison (BUFFNEWS)

By Dan Herbeck, News Staff Reporter

Buffalo News, December 29, 2006

Five of the six members of the Lackawanna Six have been transferred to a federal prison in Indiana, and their families are trying to find out why.

Their attorneys confirmed Wednesday that Shafal A. Mosed, 28; Mukhtar al-Bakri, 26; Yasein A. Taher, 29; Faysal H. Galab, 30; and Sahim Alwan, 34; were all recently moved to the Federal Correctional Institution in Terre Haute, Ind. The U.S. Bureau of Prisons also verified that the men are being held there.

Family members of the five men are upset because most of them were held previously in facilities much closer to Western New York. Now family members will have to drive 570 miles - more than nine hours - to visit the convicted conspirators in Terre Haute. They also could take a flight to Indianapolis, about 70 miles from Terre Haute.

Some supporters of the men wonder if the move is part of a government effort to toughen the punishment they already are receiving for traveling to Afghanistan and training with the al-Qaida terrorist group.

"They were all snatched up and moved [earlier this month]," said Alwan's attorney, James P. Harrington. "This makes it extraordinarily hard for their families to visit them. From what we understand, their telephone and visitation time are being drastically cut, too."

Harrington and other defense attorneys are trying to find out the reason for the move and whether it is punitive.

Harrington said he has heard that the government wants to keep all federal prisoners from terrorism-related prosecutions in one facility.

"This is very unusual, because the Bureau of Prisons rarely puts multiple defendants from one criminal case in the same prison," said Galab's attorney, Joseph M. LaTona. "They usually keep them separated."

Aside from verifying that the five men are at the medium-security prison in Terre Haute, U.S. Bureau of Prisons officials had no comment on the move Wednesday. A prison spokesman, Michael Truman, said he was unaware of any plan to move all the convicts from terrorism-related cases to one facility.

The medium-security prison is part of the Terre Haute Federal Correctional Complex, which also includes a high-security institution and the nation's only federal death row and execution center, which the prison calls its "special confinement unit." Oklahoma City bomber Timothy J. McVeigh, a native of Pendleton, was put to death at Terre Haute in June 2001.

About 3,000 inmates are confined at the complex, authorities said.

President Bush and members of his administration have often cited the Lackawanna Six as a major success story in the fight against terrorism in the United States.

But critics have assailed the government for imprisoning men for "thought crimes" or "crimes of association."

The six men had traveled to Afghanistan prior to Sept. 11, 2001, and trained at a terrorist camp under the supervision of Osama bin Laden, architect of the 9/11 terrorist strikes.

The Lackawanna men have repeatedly denied they had any intention of taking part in any terrorist act.

Ultimately, five pleaded guilty to providing material support to al-Qaida. Galab pleaded guilty to a lesser charge of engaging in a transaction with prohibited individuals.

When the six men agreed to plead guilty in 2003, sentencing Judge William M. Skretny and the U.S. Justice Department agreed to recommend that they be held in prisons as close as possible to Western New York.

"It's very disconcerting that, after the judge and prosecutors agreed to do that, the prison system now seems to be ignoring it," said Mosed's attorney, Patrick J. Brown.

The whereabouts of the sixth man who traveled to Afghanistan - Yahya A. Goba, 29 - are a mystery. He is the only one of the six no longer listed on the "inmate locater" on the Bureau of Prisons Web site.

Officials of the bureau said they could not comment when asked whether Goba is in protective custody or the witness-protection program because of assistance he has given to the government.

Goba was identified by the government as one of the leaders and organizers of the al-Qaida trip. In court papers filed in 2003, a prosecutor said Goba had provided extensive help and detail on al-Qaida's "leaders, trainers and recruits."

Goba's attorney, Marianne Mariano of the federal public defender's office, was out of town and could not be reached Wednesday.

Galab is scheduled to be the first of the Lackawanna group to be released from federal prison, sometime in January 2009, but he could be freed several months sooner if his prison behavior is good.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Report Chides FBI Handling Of OKC Bombing (WFTV)

WFTV-TV, December 29, 2006

OKLAHOMA CITY -- Nearly a dozen years after the Oklahoma City bombing, another chapter has closed in its investigation.

A complete congressional report was released this week. In the report, investigators chastised the FBI for how it handled the investigation of the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building bombing on April 19, 1995.

Among the report's conclusions:

"The original date of the 2001 execution of Timothy McVeigh was postponed by 30 days, following the belated discovery of more than 3000 documents. The files related primarily to the question of John Doe Two and eyewitness sightings. These documents did not raise significant doubt about McVeigh's guilt. Their disappearance, nevertheless, demonstrated that, despite multiple admonitions from the presiding judge and reassurances from law enforcement, the authorities missed key files in what was then the most prominent case in US legal history. We know now they even missed a second stash of explosives hidden in the Nichols house."

"A close look at the findings of this subcommittee suggests that it is reasonable to question if all leads were thoroughly pursued, all evidence gathered and properly analyzed. While the desire of most of the victims' families for swift justice is understandable, with the benefit of hindsight, the McVeigh execution should have been further delayed until there was greater consensus on the subject of John Doe Two. As is clear by their documents (which the Oversight and Investigations Subcommittee has had access to for the first time), his own defense team had significant internal doubts about McVeigh's candor with them on this subject. His only failure on a polygraph test involved his response to a question on whether he had additional help with the bombing. The question persists, and the only person who might have shed light on it is gone."

"We have found no conclusive evidence of a foreign connection, but there remain questions that need to be answered before this final chapter can justifiably be closed. This investigation determined that many pieces of so-called evidence backing various theories of a foreign involvement were not based in fact."

Two Who Tried McVeigh, Nichols Vouch For FBI's Diligence (DENP)

By Howard Pankratz, Denver Post Staff Writer

Denver Post, December 29, 2006

Two former federal prosecutors who tried Oklahoma City bombers Timothy McVeigh and Terry Nichols said Wednesday that they disagreed with a report by a congressional subcommittee slamming the FBI for failing to follow up on potential leads.

One of McVeigh's defense lawyers also said he placed little credibility in the report by the House International Relations investigative subcommittee. A second McVeigh lawyer, however, said he agreed with the report's speculation that foreign conspirators might have been involved.

The report said the leads might have shown that an international conspiracy was behind the Oklahoma City bombing. It found no conclusive evidence of a foreign connection but said questions remained.

"I saw the report online and said, 'Oh my goodness, this is old news,'" said former prosecutor Larry Mackey of Indianapolis, who is skiing in Colorado. "Every question raised by the report was researched thoroughly."

Denver lawyer Nathan Chambers, who represented McVeigh in the months before he was executed, said McVeigh repeatedly made public statements that the bombing was a homegrown operation.

"I'm very suspicious of claims of an international conspiracy," Chambers said. "I never saw any evidence that convinced me that was true."

Sean Connelly, a Denver-based lawyer who prosecuted Nichols and McVeigh, said the FBI did "an exceptionally thorough" job in investigating any foreign links to the bombing. He said the FBI concluded that the bomb plot was limited to McVeigh and Nichols with their acquaintance Michael Fortier, who had some knowledge of the plans.

But Stephen Jones, the lawyer who represented McVeigh during the Denver trial, said he believes the circle of conspirators extended beyond Nichols, McVeigh and Fortier to others both in the U.S. and abroad.

He said he believes McVeigh played a relatively minor role.

"I think the evidence established that Mr. McVeigh's role was not a leadership role, but it was - as the term is used - a mule role," Jones said.

The subcommittee, headed by Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif., cited four shortcomings of the investigation:

The FBI was not justified in calling off any further investigation into the existence of John Doe 2, a man witnesses said they saw with McVeigh before the bombing.

The FBI didn't thoroughly investigate potential involvement of an Iraqi living in Oklahoma City and a German national living in northeastern Oklahoma.

Authorities erred in allowing McVeigh to move forward the time of his execution while major questions remained.

The FBI didn't look closely enough at the phone records of Ramzi Yousef, who masterminded the bombing of the World Trade Center in 1993.

The report noted phone calls Yousef allegedly made in the months before the 1993 bombing to a Filipina neighbor and close friend of Terry Nichols' in-laws in Queens, N.Y.

Rohrabacher said his subcommittee "found no conclusive evidence of a foreign connection, but there remain questions that need to be answered before this final chapter can justifiably be closed.

"This investigation determined that many pieces of so- called evidence backing various theories of foreign involvement were not based in fact. ... The overall assessment is inconclusive on the varied theories."

KPIX-TV, December 29, 2006

(CBS 5) SAN FRANCISCO A decade after the feds tracked him down, CBS 5 Investigates has uncovered exclusive new information about Unabomber Ted Kaczynski, including a secret code he developed, and the confessions revealed as the code is broken.

When Federal Bureau of Investigation agents swooped down on Kaczynski's Montana cabin in 1996, they found much more than they expected, according to lead agent Max Noel.

There were "lots of writings, lots of journals, lots of notebooks," recalled Noel, now retired.

Among them, he said, was one notebook in particular that interested all of the agents at the scene because "it just contained lots of numbers," according to Noel.

Noel believes Kaczynski wrote in code out of concern that someone might break into his cabin and discover his current and past activities, which may have included plans for future attacks.

"I thoroughly believe that he was going to begin a much more prolific bombing attack," he said.

The FBI eventually found itself trying to unscramble a code that the National Security Agency would later describe as one of the more sophisticated codes it had ever seen, said Noel.

In fact, it was a code that could not be broken at all until, searching through Kaczynski's cabin, FBI agents found Kaczynski's own key to unmasking the hidden messages.

CBS 5 Investigates has obtained portions of that key along with the Unabomber's coded writings.

The coded writings initially appear to be sets of numbers, commas, and spaces placed in random order. But they are actually part of a very complex mathematical code, also called a cipher.

"It's very clear that this isn't a normal cipher," said Bruce Schneier, a nationally known expert on cryptography who was asked to review photos of the writings.

Schneier described the code as so complicated that "it would not surprise me if this was the most complex cipher the FBI has seen since World War II."

Schneier said with that code, Kaczynski could certainly be successful in keeping information away from the authorities.

But Kaczynski succeeded only up to a point.

Agents discovered the first of many clues to solving the puzzle in one of Kaczynski's notebooks, on a page labeled, "Unscrambling Sequence."

On the handwritten page, arrows appear to show the direction that a page packed with numbers should be read. Then, in a complex series of decoding steps that Kaczynski calls "phases," numbers are added, subtracted, and married, revealing a new set of numbers that translate to letters and word fragments.

"This clearly takes many steps," Schneier said. "Four steps are listed here, and that's not all. There are at least six steps and could be even more then that."

The FBI's decoding of the notebook revealed a virtual catalog of destruction.

Kaczynski's comments on one page, translated, discussed his feelings about one bombing this way:

"I sent a bomb to a computer expert ... revenge attempts have been gobbling much time, impeding other work. But I must succeed, must get revenge."

Another note translated into a discussion of a July 2, 1982 bombing at the University of California at Berkeley, where Kaczynski said, "I went to U. of California Berkeley and placed in Computer Science Building a bomb consisting of a pipebomb in a gallon can of gasoline."

On another page, Kaczynski described his failed attempt to blow up a commercial airplane on Nov. 15, 1979, saying, "I constructed device ... rigged barometer so device would explode at 2000 ft."

Noel said decoding the notebook led to terrible but important revelations.

"The contents of that small notebook was a detailed confession of all of the past bombings that had been attributed to the Unabomber," Noel said.

Kaczynski's own notes indicate he did not want people to be able to read those confessions.

Some speculate he may have wanted authorities to find the key later if he was killed or captured in order to take credit for his acts.

Idaho Professor Charged With Making Hoax In Bankruptcy Case (SDUT/AP)

By Jennifer Dobner, Associated Press

The San Diego Union-Tribune, December 29, 2006

SALT LAKE CITY – An Idaho professor was charged with falsely claiming that he had mailed a dangerous substance to a trustee overseeing his bankruptcy case in Utah, federal authorities said Thursday.

Thomas Hale warned the trustee Nov. 16 that she would be exposed to hantavirus, a potentially fatal disease passed through rodent droppings, prosecutors said.

But after a six-hour exam, the white substance turned out to be baby powder, said Dennis McKone, assistant to the Salt Lake City fire chief.

Hale, 61, pleaded not guilty in federal court Thursday, two days after he was arrested at Salt Lake City International Airport after a flight from Chicago.

He is a history professor at Idaho State University in Pocatello, Idaho, and owns a house in Salt Lake City. In October 2005, Hale filed for Chapter 13 bankruptcy protection, which allowed him to propose a plan to pay his creditors.

A judge, however, rejected the plan, converted the case to Chapter 7 and appointed trustee Elizabeth Loveridge to control Hale's finances.

A three-count indictment charges Hale with committing a hoax with the threat of a dangerous substance, giving a false statement in the bankruptcy case, and concealing his ownership of the Salt Lake City home, which he was selling for $395,000.

The hoax charge carries a maximum penalty of 30 years in prison. The others each carry a five-year maximum punishment.

Hale sent Loveridge a fax telling her that he planned to send bankruptcy documents and a hazardous substance, the FBI said.

Loveridge received the envelope on Nov. 20 and contacted Salt Lake City police. A bomb squad and the fire department's hazardous-materials team took the envelope and found it contained nothing harmful, FBI spokesman O. Scott Wall said.

Loveridge declined to comment. Hale has been a professor at Idaho State for 23 years.

The school issued a statement, saying the allegations "did not appear to be connected with Hale's employment."

"The university will respond appropriately as more information becomes available," Idaho State said.

Utah FBI Agents Arrest And Charge Idaho Professor For Bankruptcy, Hantavirus Hoax (KTVX)

KTVX-TV, December 29, 2006

An Idaho State University professor is in hot water for allegedly mailing a false biological agent to an attorney overseeing his bankruptcy case.

Thomas Francis Hale, a history professor with 34 years of tenure at ISU, is accused of sending an envelope with some sort of substance to Elizabeth Loveridge at her downtown law office November 20th, 2006.

Federal investigators say Hale sent a fax, warning to the bankruptcy attorney several days before warning her to "beware" of hazardous materials coming in the mail, and that envelope would include the deadly Hantavirus. Days later an orange envelope arrived. In it was a substance, experts later determined it was not harmful.

The FBI says they quickly tracked the fax back to Hale.

Hale filed for bankruptcy in 1996 and Loveridge was appointed trustee over the case. Investigators say she later determined that Hale had lied about his assets.

On December 28th a federal judge ordered that Hale be released from jail pending trial. He was released with conditions, including that he undergo a mental evaluation.

Professor Charged In Hantavirus Hoax (SLT)

By Michael N. Westley And Jeremiah Stettler, The Salt Lake Tribune

Salt Lake Tribune, December 29, 2006

His lawyer says claiming to mail hazardous material is inappropriate, not criminal

An Idaho State University history professor appeared before a federal magistrate Thursday on charges he mailed an envelope to a bankruptcy trustee claiming it may contain the deadly hantavirus.

Thomas Francis Hale, 61, was indicted earlier this month by a federal grand jury, accused of providing false information and perpetrating a hoax regarding a hazardous material, filing a false bankruptcy oath and concealment of property.

The indictment, unsealed Thursday, accuses Hale of attempting to hide a home he owns in Salt Lake City near 2000 South and 1000 East from bankruptcy proceedings and lying about that ownership while under oath.

The document also states that Hale sent an envelope Nov. 16 to a federal bankruptcy trustee warning that its contents - a plastic bag containing a brown substance - may harbor hantavirus, a disease usually spread by rodent feces.

The trustee never opened the envelope. Hale had told her in an earlier fax that he was mailing a hazardous material, authorities say.

A bomb squad seized the package and discovered a note wrapped around a plastic bag that read, "Termites or hantavirus from mice?" prosecutors said. Laboratory tests revealed no hazardous materials, according to the FBI.

Hale's attorney, Larry Keller, said his client simply was seeking redress for an unresolved termite and mice problem. He said the act was "inappropriate" in today's terrorism-charged climate, but not criminal.

Agents arrested the Idaho man Tuesday at the Salt Lake City International Airport after Hale arrived on a flight from Chicago. He was booked into the Salt Lake County jail.

Hale, a tenured professor and attorney, has taught history at Idaho State University for 23 years, according to ISU officials. He is scheduled to teach three classes next semester, including courses on the French Revolution and the foundations of Western civilizations.

ISU Provost Robert A. Wharton said the university has not taken action against Hale or changed its class schedule. Officials need more information first.

"We are just gathering information and considering our options right now," he said.

Wharton declined to comment on whether Hale has been the subject of past disciplinary actions or investigations. Authorities say the professor has no criminal history.

Despite arguments by U.S. Attorney Trina A. Higgins that Hale is a "danger to the community" and should be detained until his trial in March - a position she justified because of the hantavirus threat - U.S. Magistrate Judge Paul Warner ordered his release late Thursday.

The decision hinged on the six-week gap between Hale's alleged threat and the filing of criminal charges. If the professor were dangerous, Warner asked, why didn't authorities apprehend him immediately?

Hale pleaded not guilty to all three charges Thursday and now plans to return home to Pocatello. Warner has set a three-day trial for March 5 before U.S. District Judge Ted Stewart.

If convicted, Hale could face up to 20 years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office in Salt Lake City.

Idaho Professor Is Accused Of Hantavirus Hoax (DESERET)

By Ben Winslow, Deseret Morning News

Deseret Morning News, December 29, 2006

Federal prosecutors said the fax suggested that federal bankruptcy trustee Elizabeth Loveridge should check out the "Hazmat" that would be coming in an orange envelope.

Thomas Hale That was Nov. 16. A few days later, an envelope arrived with the word "caution" written on it.

Inside, federal prosecutors allege, Idaho State University history professor Thomas Francis Hale sent a note that said "Termites or hantavirus from mice?"

"It was wrapped around a baggie containing small, brown, mouse poopy-type things," assistant U.S. Attorney Trina Higgins said Thursday, adding that it was not hantavirus but was believed to be termites.

The note is part of a federal indictment handed down against Hale, 61, charging him with making the phony hantavirus hoax, lying to federal authorities and hiding assets during bankruptcy proceedings. The indictment was unsealed on Thursday.

Hale was arrested by the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force on Tuesday at the Salt Lake City International Airport after stepping off a flight from Chicago.

"He was surprised to be arrested," FBI Special Agent-in-Charge Tim Fuhrman said.

However, Hale's attorney offered a surprising explanation for the hantavirus scare. The tenants of a property Hale owned in Salt Lake City's Sugar House neighborhood had said there were termites in the basement and he had sent a sample to Loveridge, who had been placed in charge of his financial matters by the bankruptcy court.

"He was saying, 'Here is something you should look at,'" attorney Larry Keller told the judge. "Not 'I'm going to kill you.' Why would he put his name and address on it?"

Keller said Hale had been frustrated with Loveridge and believed she was mismanaging his affairs. A hearing on that issue is scheduled next month in U.S. Bankruptcy Court.

Federal prosecutors countered that Hale would show up at her office, barge past the receptionist and confront her about his case. The U.S. Attorney's Office alleges that Hale also lied about the value of his property — claiming it was valued at $190,000 and then trying to sell it for $395,000.

Keller questioned why the FBI waited more than a month to arrest his client.

"If I'm a terrorist and I threaten somebody, they're going to want to get me off the streets right away," he said.

Higgins responded that they were waiting for the test results to show if the substance was really hantavirus, a rare and potentially deadly disease spread by mouse droppings.

During a pair of appearances before U.S. Magistrate Judge Paul Warner, Hale sat quietly in his seat. He pleaded not guilty to the charges and a three-day jury trial was set for March 5.

"I find counsel's explanation to be ... interesting," Warner said.

The magistrate judge ordered Hale to be released from the Salt Lake County Jail but then dressed down Hale with a number of conditions of release — including that he have no contact with Loveridge except through her attorney and that he undergo mental health therapy.

"Ms. Loveridge is very frightened," Higgins said.

Hale is a history professor at Idaho State University in Pocatello, where he has taught for 23 years. He is also a lawyer who operates a legal clinic dispensing advice to indigent people.

Federal authorities contend Hale wanted to send a message.

"He clearly wanted to register some type of objection to his bankruptcy proceeding," Fuhrman said.

The charge of providing false information and perpetrating a hoax is a fairly recent one, arising out of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and the anthrax scares that happened shortly afterward, the FBI said.

FBI Investigates Paradise Man For Alleged Threats (PARAPOST)

Paradise (CA) Post, December 29, 2006

A Paradise man is being held in Sacramento in relation to alleged threats made to hotels, Jewish museums, and other locations. According to a Department of Justice press release, a federal grand jury returned a nine-count indictment Thursday charging Scott R. Hudson, 52, with making a series of threatening phone calls between August and November of this year. Hudson was arrested on Dec. 20.

The FBI is investigating the case with the help of police departments in New York City, Rochester, Minn., Philadelphia, Penn. and Riverside and Irvine.

Assistant United States Attorney Benjamin B. Wagner, who is prosecuting the case, said Hudson is charged with calling in bomb threats to two hotels in New York City, making threatening calls to a Rabbi in Long Beach, New York, the National Museum of American Jewish History in Philadelphia and a Jewish congregation in Irvine.

He also allegedly made threatening calls to a graduate school in Minnesota. According to the indictment he threatened to shoot people and to burn down or blow up various buildings. Other documents in the case allege Hudson made calls to a church in Riverside and threatened to kill the pastor.

He is charged with seven counts of threatening

the use of fire or explosives, each of which carries a maximum possible sentence of 10 years in prison and a $250,000 fine and two counts of threatening communications, each of which carries a maximum of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

The actual sentence will be determined at the discretion of the court after consideration of the Federal Sentencing Guidelines, which take into account a number of variables, and any applicable statutory sentencing factors.

The press release also indicated Hudson had previously been convicted of similar conduct. In 2001, he pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court in Sacramento to making a telephone call to Arizona and threatened to kill a player for the Arizona Diamondbacks baseball team. He served a total of 34 months on that conviction.

The new charges are only accusations, noted the United States Attorney's Office, and the defendant is presumed innocent until and unless proven guilty beyond a reasonable doubt.

Messages To Spies Are Coded But Not Hidden (WP)

By James Gordon Meek

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

It turns out that anybody can tune in to the world's top spy agencies talking to operatives. All you need is a cheap shortwave-radio receiver, the kind available at any drugstore.

Tune it to 6855 or 8010 kHz.

On the hour, you might hear a girlish voice repeating strings of numbers monotonously in Spanish. "Nueve, uno, nueve, tres, cinco-cinco, cuatro, cinco, tres, dos . . .," went one seemingly harmless message heard last month on a Grundig radio.

It was the Cuban Intelligence Directorate or Russian FSB broadcasting coded instructions from Havana to spies inside the United States.

Turn the dial up to 11545 kHz, and you might hear a few notes of an obscure English folk song, "Lincolnshire Poacher," followed by a voice repeating strings of numbers. That's believed to be British Secret Intelligence Service, MI6, broadcasting from Cyprus.

On 6840 kHz, you may hear a voice reading groups of letters. That's a station nicknamed "E10," thought to be Israel's Mossad intelligence.

Chris Smolinski runs SpyNumbers.com and the "Spooks" e-mail list, where "number stations" hobbyists log hundreds of shortwave messages transmitted every month. "It's like a puzzle. They're mystery stations," explained Smolinski, who has tracked the spy broadcasts for 30 years.

While hobbyists guess at the meaning of each cryptic message or which spy service sent it, it's no mystery to intelligence officials, who confirmed the purpose is espionage.

The signals are too strong to be made by amateurs and are often on licensed frequencies. The State Department once complained to the Israeli Embassy in Washington that "E10" was blocking a U.S. broadcast, a source said.

"I can't imagine who else would waste the time in front of a microphone reading numbers" but a spy, said James Bamford, who has written about intelligence. Bamford calls number stations "simple but effective" spycraft.

"It's extremely effective," agreed a senior intelligence official. "If you have a one-time pad, the code can't be broken, and you can send out dummy broadcasts as much as you want to confuse your enemy."

A "one-time pad" is the key to unlocking coded shortwave messages that the CIA calls "one-way voice link."

It is low-risk because it's known only to the sender and the recipient and used just once before being destroyed, said retired CIA officer Tony Mendez.

Mendez said he would often imprint the code on microfilm or even a cigarette paper. Once inside the target country, a CIA operative could make a shortwave receiver out of simple materials. "The voices are not real people," he added. "They're computer-generated."

A CIA spokeswoman declined to comment.

One-time pads and coded radio began in World War I, said Thomas Boghardt, a historian at the International Spy Museum. Little has changed since, judging by recent espionage cases involving shortwave radios, including that of a man detained in Canada last month and accused of being a Russian spy.

In Miami last week, Carlos and Elsa Alvarez pleaded guilty to lesser charges after the United States accused them of spying for Cuba. A prosecutor alleged in a court hearing this summer that they received shortwave "messages in five-digit groupings." An FBI interview transcript shows Alvarez admitted going into his bathroom "on Fridays to listen at 11" for messages aimed at the couple, code-named "David" and "Deborah."

DNI Awards $2 Million In Hush-Hush Money (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte awarded $200,000 grants earlier this month to 10 scientists in the intelligence community, one of whom could not be named and several of whom declined to be interviewed, for projects whose details remain secret.

The DNI office issued a news release with nine of the recipients' names, agencies, job titles and educational backgrounds. One awardee's information was omitted "because of the sensitive position he occupies in his organization," the release said.

This is the second annual DNI Fellows award program. Last year's recipients, the release says, "made significant progress with technology to locate terrorists and to extract intelligence from remote areas."

How they did that remains secret.

"We want to keep that spark of innovation alive and healthy," said Eric C. Haseltine, associate director of national intelligence for science and technology, whose office selected the grant recipients.

But "we haven't talked yet about any specific things the fellows have done," he said.

The Department of Homeland Security and science and technology branches of intelligence agencies -- including the FBI, CIA, National Security Agency, National Reconnaissance Office, Defense Intelligence Agency and National Geospatial-Intelligence Agency -- nominated employees. The criteria, Haseltine said, are "first and foremost, virtuoso technical achievement," plus risk-taking, innovation and "teamwork, because sometimes virtuosos don't play well with others."

Playing well with reporters is not a criterion. All of the CIA awardees declined interviews; ditto for the NSA, whose spokesman, Ken White, said the agency's grantees are "not in a position of wanting to go there." Other fellows couldn't be located, or persuaded, by deadline.

"It's great news," said one agency representative, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because discussing the reasons for not discussing the projects could violate secrecy rules. "But because it's classified, you can't talk about it."

Last try: the Department of Homeland Security, which doesn't fall under the traditional intelligence structure. Its awardee, Michelle Keeney, was downright chatty about how she will spend her grant money.

"The plan is kind of generally to sponsor a research project on the evolution of radical movements over time and their adoption of violence as a strategy," she said, in order to document patterns of rhetoric or behavior -- such as acquisition of materials -- that could be used to predict a move toward violence in other groups.

"We want to really try and look at all movements that have occurred over history, make comparisons and contrast" them, Keeney said.

"It's not an intelligence exercise but a research project using information that is historically gathered in the public domain."

That's why she can talk about it.

Controversial Bush Appointee Leaving Government (MCT)

By Philip Dine, St. Louis Post-Dispatch

McClatchy Newspapers, December 29, 2006

WASHINGTON - Tracy Henke, the Missourian who stirred controversy in a top homeland security job, has left the government to join her former boss, John Ashcroft, at The Ashcroft Group.

Earlier this year, President Bush appointed Henke to coordinate U.S. national-disaster and anti-terrorist efforts with state and local officials. Lawmakers of both parties questioned her experience, as well as Bush's bypassing of the Senate confirmation process.

But that criticism was nothing compared to the uproar when Henke, from Moscow Mills, Mo., decreased homeland security grants for New York and Washington, while increasing them for some smaller cities and towns.

"SHE GAVE US THE AX: New York's money cut by a woman from the sticks," complained a headline in The New York Daily News.

Rep. Peter King, R-N.Y., then-chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, said: "As far as I'm concerned, the Department of Homeland Security has declared war on New York City."

A Washington Post columnist blasted the decision to reduce funding for the two cities hit on Sept. 11 while increasing it for "those terrorism magnets of Kansas City and St. Louis - both by happenstance in Henke's home state of Missouri."

In a telephone interview this week from Moscow Mills, Henke said that though she had held several high-profile positions in government, she was taken aback by the criticism.

"One of the things that was surprising was the level of animosity and the personal attacks as it related to grant awards," she said.

She said even with the reductions, New York still got the most money of any city for homeland security. She also noted that Congress had provided $600 million less in homeland security funding than the year before, making some cuts necessary.

Henke, 37, cited two reasons for her departure:

DOJ_NMG_0110013

_The chance to rejoin Ashcroft, for whom she had worked at the Justice Department when he was attorney general.

_A reorganization of homeland security functions, which would put her office under the Federal Emergency Management Agency early next year. Henke said she had neither the time nor the energy to oversee the changes.

Among her accomplishments, she said, was getting states and cities "to think more comprehensively about homeland security, more regionally."

Jim Carafano, an expert in homeland security at the Heritage Foundation, said Henke deserved praise, despite the public criticism.

"I think the office did great stuff, and they really swam upstream against, quite frankly, people who were quite interested in how much money they could get for their district, rather than looking at risk," Carafano said.

Henke left the department on Oct. 31 and joined Ashcroft's firm a few weeks ago. As a senior adviser, she will focus on homeland-security and criminal-justice issues.

"There will be much more consulting than lobbying; lobbying, however, might be part of it, depending on the needs," she said. The hours will certainly be "a little more normal," she said, noting that homeland security was a "seven-day-a-week job."

Depending on the nature of the Homeland Security reorganization, she may be exempted from prohibitions against lobbying her former agency, she said.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Considers Up To 20,000 More Troops For Iraq (NYT)

By David S. Cloud And Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 28 — The Bush administration is considering an increase in troop levels in Iraq of 17,000 to 20,000, which would be accomplished in part by delaying the departure of two Marine regiments now deployed in Anbar Province, Pentagon officials said Thursday.

The option was among those discussed in Crawford, Tex., on Thursday as President Bush met there with his national security team, and it has emerged as a likely course as he considers a strategy shift in Iraq, the officials said.

Most of the additional troops would probably be employed in and around Baghdad, the officials said.

With the continuing high levels of violence there, senior officials increasingly say additional American forces will be needed as soon as possible to clear neighborhoods and to conduct other combat operations to regain control of the capital, rather than primarily to train Iraqi forces.

“The mission that most people are settling on has to do with using them in a security role to quell violence in Baghdad and the surrounding area,” said a senior Pentagon official involved in the planning.

Any plan to add to American forces in Baghdad would have to be negotiated with the government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, which has expressed interest in using Iraqi forces, not American ones, to assert more control over the capital.

The idea of extending the deployments of two Marine units has emerged in part because most of the marines in Iraq are on seven-month rotations and keeping them there longer is considered more palatable than holding over Army brigades, which are already serving tours of a year or longer, one official said.

Additional troops would come from sending into Iraq a brigade of the 82nd Airborne Division headed for the region next month and possibly by speeding up the deployment of several Army brigades now scheduled to go to Iraq by next spring.

But officials said a brigade of the First Armored Division now in Anbar Province would probably go home as planned in January, because the unit had already been kept in Iraq more than 40 days beyond its scheduled tour.

Other options remain under consideration, the officials said, noting that a decision to speed up deployment schedules would put more strain on Army and Marine equipment and personnel. But other options, like mobilizing reserve units, would take months, officials said.

After meeting with his top military and diplomatic advisers at his Texas ranch, Mr. Bush said his administration was making "good progress" in fashioning a revised Iraq strategy. But he said he intended to consult with Congress when it convenes next week before presenting his plan to the nation.

"I fully understand it's important to have both Republicans and Democrats understanding the importance of this mission," Mr. Bush said, speaking to reporters after a three-hour meeting. "It's important for the American people to understand success in Iraq is vital for our own security."

The meeting, according to a senior administration official, focused on the security, economic and political situation in Iraq. But the bulk of the discussions focused on the security issue and the option of sending more American troops to Baghdad, the official said.

Vice President Dick Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, emerged from the meeting with the president. The national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, and his top deputy, J. D. Crouch, also attended the meeting and joined the others for a working lunch at the ranch.

The White House initially intended to announce a new Iraq policy before Christmas but delayed those plans so the president could consider a range of diverging views inside his administration. For weeks his advisers have been locked in internal debates about how to proceed, but it is an open question whether the meeting on Thursday brought clarity to the discussions.

"I've got more consultation to do until I talk to the country about the plan," said Mr. Bush, who did not elaborate or take questions from reporters.

Mr. Bush said he had received a briefing from Mr. Gates, his new defense secretary, and General Pace, who recently returned from Iraq. White House aides said the president did not want to offer his new plan for Iraq before Mr. Gates had an opportunity to study conditions on the ground in Iraq.

"It's an important part of coming to closure on a way forward in Iraq that will help us achieve our objective," Mr. Bush said, "which is a country that can govern itself, sustain itself and defend itself."

How additional American troops would be employed in Baghdad remains a central point of discussion among Mr. Bush's top advisers and top ground commanders in Iraq, officials said. But two officials said there was growing agreement that most would not be attached to American teams training Iraqi Army and police units, because doing so would not necessarily yield the quick improvements in security the White House wants.

But it is also unclear to what extent the additional forces would be employed to curb the power of militias associated with Shiite groups that form a key constituency for Mr. Maliki.

The two units whose stay could be extended are the Marines' Fifth and Seventh Regiment combat teams in Anbar Province, which are scheduled to begin leaving Iraq in February when two replacement regiments are due to arrive, officials said.

It is unclear which Army brigades could be sent early. A 3,500-soldier brigade of the Third Infantry Division, based at Fort Stewart, Ga., is scheduled to arrive in Iraq in mid-January, followed in subsequent months by units from the First Infantry Division, at Fort Riley, Kan., and the Second Infantry Division, at Fort Lewis, Wash.

The Third Brigade of the Third Infantry Division, based at Fort Benning, Ga., is scheduled to go to Iraq in the spring, according to a spokesman, Kevin Larson, who said he had not heard any discussion of accelerating that timetable. But he said, "We're ready to answer whatever call may come up."

How long beyond February the Marine units would remain is unclear, but officials emphasized that the goal was a temporary increase in the American presence. It is also unclear whether a decision to speed up the deployment of two Army brigades would mean that other units scheduled to be deployed would go to Iraq earlier than planned later next year. Currently there are about 134,000 American troops in Iraq.

Bush Considers Economic Package For Iraq (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz And Robin Wright

DOJ_NMG_0110015

CRAWFORD, Tex., Dec. 28 -- As he puts the finishing touches on his revised Iraq plan, President Bush is considering new economic initiatives to go along with a possible increase in troops to help stabilize the country, according to officials familiar with the administration's review.

Among the steps being considered are short-term jobs and loan programs aimed at winning back the waning local support for the U.S. presence in Iraq, the officials said. They described the ideas as part of a classic effort to quell an insurgency through a combination of economic, political and military means.

"The president is looking at a variety of ways to work with the Iraq government to provide new economic opportunities for Iraqis, which will be essential to sustaining security gains and draining the influence of extremists," said Gordon Johndroe, the spokesman for the National Security Council.

That view underscores how Bush is looking beyond just military issues as he gears up for one, potentially final, try to achieve stability in Iraq. Officials said economic and political issues were among the key elements discussed Thursday when Bush huddled here with his top national security advisers to discuss the situation in Iraq.

The president emerged after three hours to tell reporters that he has made "good progress" on developing a new plan to stanch sectarian violence and strengthen the Iraqi government. But he said that he intends to hold more consultations with Iraqi leaders and U.S. lawmakers before formally unveiling his plan sometime next month.

"The plan is taking shape," said one senior administration official who briefed reporters outside the president's ranch, where Bush is spending the holidays.

The senior official said Bush heard an extensive presentation about military conditions in Iraq from Robert M. Gates, the new defense secretary, and Marine Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who had just returned after their fact-finding mission there. One idea gaining currency in the administration is to send between 15,000 and 30,000 additional troops to Iraq, at least on a temporary basis, to help improve security, but there are questions among senior military leaders about how effective this move would be.

The Pentagon has pressed for political and economic plans to complement such a possible surge in troops.

The political component of the emerging Bush package would set up benchmarks for long-overdue steps, such as amending the constitution to help address the objections of Iraq's Sunni minority and dismantling 23 predominantly Shiite militias. But it is unclear whether the Iraqi government would go along with such milestones, which were among the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group.

Some U.S. officials think an economic package may be the most promising element of a revised strategy, since it would deal with the Iraqis' deteriorating conditions and growing disillusionment with the U.S. intervention. Others, however, have severe questions about whether such a package would work almost four years after the American invasion and after previous botched efforts to stimulate economic activity.

The economic package now on the table focuses on three elements, and is separate from the long-term jobs-creation program being promoted by the U.S. military. One senior official cautioned that all three elements have been discussed in some manner but that the final package has not been determined.

One element, traditionally linked to a counterinsurgency strategy, is to follow up any military sweep with a short-term work program that would immediately hire people in the neighborhood to clear up trash or do other small civil-affairs jobs.

This project would begin within hours rather than days of a military operation and would help signal a return to normalcy. It might also help wean young unemployed Iraqi men from the militias or prevent them from joining any of the armed factions that are fueling Iraq's escalating sectarian strife.

The second part would be a micro-loan program -- involving modest loans to help individuals get businesses going -- to generate new economic activity in poor neighborhoods. Unemployment is worse today than during the rule of Saddam Hussein, Iraq's ousted leader.

The third part of the package, which has been developed in part by the Treasury Department, would review dormant state-owned industries to try and determine which ones are economically viable and worth reopening. The package would be a shift from the large-scale and long-term development projects that, in the past, relied heavily on Western contractors and expertise.

In brief comments to reporters here, the president made clear that the focus of his review is to strengthen the government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, which has been struggling to quell militia violence and bring about political reconciliation between Sunnis and Shiites.

"The key to success in Iraq is to have a government that's willing to deal with the elements there that are trying to prevent this young democracy from succeeding," Bush said. "We want to help them succeed."

Bush, clad in an open-neck shirt and sport jacket, was flanked by Gates and Pace, as well as by Vice President Cheney and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. Joining the five at Thursday's meeting were White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten, presidential counselor Dan Bartlett, national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley and his deputy, J.D. Crouch, who is managing the White House's Iraq review.

Administration officials said they expect the president to unveil his full plan for Iraq sometime in the early part of January, but Bush and his advisers made clear that more consultations are planned with U.S. lawmakers and Iraqi leaders -- and that there could well be another meeting of the National Security Council before the plan is released.

"I fully understand it's important to have both Republicans and Democrats understanding the importance of this mission," Bush told reporters.

Bush: More Consultation Needed On Iraq Policy (HC/AP)

By Deb Riechmann

Houston Chronicle, December 29, 2006

CRAWFORD — President Bush worked nearly three hours at his Texas ranch today to design a new U.S. policy in Iraq, then emerged to say that he and his advisers need more time to craft the plan he'll announce in the new year.

Burdened by low approval ratings on his handling of the war, the president is under mounting pressure to come up with a new blueprint for U.S. involvement in Iraq where the execution of Saddam Hussein — perhaps as early as this weekend — could incite further violence.

"We've got more consultation to do until I talk to the country about the plan," Bush said, appearing outside an office building at his ranch.

"Obviously, we'll continue to work with the Iraqi government. The key to success in Iraq is to have a government that's willing to deal with the elements there that are trying to prevent this young democracy from succeeding."

Vice President Dick Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and Secretary of Defense Robert Gates stood by Bush as he made his three-minute statement on a dirt road lined with cactus, then turned away, ignoring a reporter's question about the pending execution.

He thanked U.S. troops for their service, yet offered no hint that he was poised to send more of them to war.

"As I think about this plan, I always have our troops in mind," Bush said.

The president is considering the so-called surge option: increasing the number of troops in Iraq and embedding more U.S. advisers in Iraqi units in hopes of quelling violence to provide a window of opportunity for political reconciliation and rebuilding.

"I think the debate is really coming down to: Surge large. Surge small. Surge short. Surge longer," said Tom Donnelly, a defense and security expert at the conservative American Enterprise Institute. "I think the smart money would say that the range of options is fairly narrow and driven by the situation on the ground in Iraq."

Initially, White House advisers said Bush would announce a plan before Christmas. Then, they said it was more likely after the first of the year. His speech now is to occur in the early weeks of January.

James Carafano, senior fellow at the conservative Heritage Foundation, said that if Bush is delaying his announcement, it has less to do with events in the United States and more to do with the situation in Iraq.

"If it were just picking a troop number, they'd be done by now," Carafano said. "My guess is that it (Bush's plan) has to synchronize with some kind of Iraqi domestic political situation in Iraq."

Some military experts support a surge in troop levels beyond the 140,000 already on the ground in Iraq. They contend this will provide a window of opportunity for rebuilding and a political reconciliation between the Sunni and Shiite factions.

Democrats and others in the military community say sending more troops only increases the Iraqis' dependence on U.S. forces and allows them to delay making the painful political compromises needed to end the violence. Democrats are calling on Bush to end America's open-ended commitment in Iraq and some want to see Congress put restrictions on funding any large increases in U.S. troops there.

"A surge which is not part of an overall program of troop reduction that begins in the next four to six months would be a mistake," said Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., who will take over the Armed Services Committee when the new Congress convenes on Jan. 4. "Even if the president is going to propose to temporarily add troops, he should make that conditional on the Iraqis reaching a political settlement that effectively ends the sectarian violence."

The president's unexpected remarks last week that he backs future expansion of the overall size of the Army and Marine Corps to lessen strain on ground forces was viewed as a possible hint that he plans to send in more troops.

In an action that might also foreshadow an increase in troops, the Pentagon on Wednesday announced that the 2nd Brigade, 82nd Airborne Division, based at Fort Bragg, N.C., will deploy to Kuwait to serve as the reserve force early next year.

Bush said his New Year's resolution is that U.S. troops will be safe and that the United States, in 2007, helps Iraq move closer to being able to sustain, govern and defend itself.

"My resolution is, is that they'll be safe and that we'll come closer to our objective, that we'll be able to help this young democracy survive and thrive and, therefore, we'll be writing a chapter of peace," Bush said.

As he spoke, the administration was preparing for the execution of Saddam as early as this weekend. That prediction was based on information that U.S. officials in Baghdad were receiving from the Iraqi government, according to a senior administration official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he didn't want to overshadow the president's remarks.

The official said Bush would likely hold another National Security Council session before announcing his new strategy in Iraq in the first few weeks of January.

At the meeting here today, Gates and Pace, who just returned from Iraq, elaborated on the briefing they gave the president at the Camp David presidential retreat in Maryland before Christmas. The bulk of the meeting focused on improving security in Iraq, but the president and his advisers also talked about economic and political issues.

Along a road leading to the ranch, about 20 anti-war protesters, including one wearing a pink wig, shouted "War Criminals!" and waved signs that read "Out of Iraq Now!" and "Bush Lied Troops Died."

Bush plans to return to Washington on Jan. 1. He and first lady Laura Bush will go immediately from Andrews Air Force Base to the Capitol to pay their respects to former President Gerald R. Ford, whose casket will be on public display in the Rotunda.

New Strategy For Iraq War Still A Work In Progress (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, December 29, 2006

More than six weeks after Americans turned Congress over to Democrats, President Bush yesterday said he still does not have a plan for securing Iraq, although he said he is "making good progress toward coming up" with one.

After meeting yesterday with top White House officials and military advisers at his Crawford, Texas, ranch during a vacation, the president said he is continuing to compile information and build a plan to deal with rampant sectarian violence that has left 100 American troops dead this month.

"I'm making good progress toward coming up with a plan that we think will help us achieve our objective," said Mr. Bush, flanked by Vice President Dick Cheney; Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice; Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff; and Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates.

"I've got more consultation to do until I talk to the country about the plan," he added. "The key to success in Iraq is to have a government that's willing to deal with the elements there that are trying to prevent this young democracy from succeeding."

The president's approval rating has plummeted, and Americans delivered both chambers of Congress last month to the Democrats in an election widely viewed as a rebuke of the administration's Iraq policy.

Mr. Bush has a small window in which to change course in Iraq on his own terms: Congress returns early next month, and the president plans to deliver his State of the Union address on Jan. 23. Although the White House promised quick action after the bipartisan Iraq Study Group early this month called for the withdrawal of most combat troops by early 2008, the president changed his mind and pushed the plan off until next year.

"Not only will I continue to reach out to Congress, but members of my team will do so, as well. I fully understand it's important to have both Republicans and Democrats understanding the importance of this mission," the president said.

The president is considering what military advisers call the "surge" option: increasing the number of troops in Iraq and embedding more U.S. analysts in Iraqi units to quell violence in order to provide an opportunity for political reconciliation and rebuilding.

The Pentagon said Wednesday that it will send about 3,500 troops to Kuwait to serve as a standby force for use in Iraq or elsewhere in the region. The deployment order was sent to a brigade of the 82nd Airborne Division at Fort Bragg, N.C.

In addition, the president announced earlier this month that he supports expanding the Army and the Marine Corps, a move some military analysts took as a hint that he plans to send more troops into Iraq.

Meanwhile in Iraq, a bomb killed an American soldier and wounded another yesterday while they were on patrol north of Baghdad. Three soldiers also died from roadside bombs in the capital, and a Marine was killed in western Anbar province on Wednesday, the military said. With 100 American troops dead so far this month, December is the second-deadliest month of 2006 for U.S. military personnel. At least 105 troops died in October.

A senior administration official said yesterday's meeting lasted nearly three hours and was followed by a lunch. Another National Security Council session is likely before Mr. Bush announces his plan in the first few weeks of January, the official said.

The official said that Mr. Gates and Gen. Pace, who just returned from Iraq, elaborated on the briefing they gave the president at Camp David before Christmas and talked more about what they saw and heard on the ground.

Bush Cites Progress In Talks On Iraq (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, December 29, 2006

CRAWFORD, TEXAS — President Bush said Thursday that he was "making good progress" toward redrawing his strategy for Iraq, a plan aides said would encompass economic and political elements as well as new security procedures to stem sectarian violence and counter a thriving insurgency.

It appeared increasingly likely, but not certain, that the latest effort to shore up the Iraq campaign would include sending additional U.S. troops there, and that the president would launch his strategy in a speech to the nation when Congress returns to Washington next Thursday or soon after.

Democratic leaders reiterated their opposition to any increase in the number of U.S. troops in Iraq.

Bush held a morning-long meeting with key members of the National Security Council at his office on his Texas ranch, continuing the discussions at lunch. Before making final decisions, Bush said, he wants to have additional consultations, including with members of Congress.

The administration has attached great importance not only to the substance of the plan but to the way it is presented to — and received by — the public, a tacit acknowledgment of the continuing decline in popular support for the war. Officials also are concerned with the impact Congress could have on the president's ability to conduct the war once Democratic majorities take control of the agenda in the House and Senate.

Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), incoming chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said Thursday that most Democrats would oppose any plan calling for a "surge" in the number of U.S. troops.

"The main direction has got to be troop reductions," Levin said on CNN, standing by what he said was the primary Democratic proposal to begin withdrawing troops in "four to six months."

In a three-minute statement to reporters at his ranch after the morning meeting, Bush pledged to "reach out to Congress."

"I fully understand it's important to have both Republicans and Democrats understanding the importance of this mission," he said. Bush was joined by Vice President Dick Cheney; Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice; Defense Secretary Robert M.

DOJ_NMG_0110019

Gates; Marine Corps Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff; and four senior White House aides: Stephen Hadley, national security advisor; J.D. Crouch, deputy national security advisor; White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten; and White House Counselor Dan Bartlett.

"I'm making good progress toward coming up with a plan that we think will help us achieve our objective," the president said.

A senior administration official, speaking on condition of anonymity because he was discussing internal deliberations and decisions that have not been made final, said Bush was "driving toward making final decisions."

But he said that more information was being sought and that officials were "drilling down into the real details of the various elements — political, economic, security — and how these parts fit together."

"The security element is obviously very complicated," involving the movement of equipment and troops, he added.

The official indicated that at least a temporary troop increase was part of the discussion. Others have said that as many as 20,000 or perhaps 30,000 troops would be added to the approximately 140,000 there now by holding over some units scheduled to come home and moving up the dispatch of others.

"You'd expect that would be an element," he said of the consideration of a so-called surge.

Bush said last week that he was considering increasing the deployment. But a troop increase would present him with a steep challenge as he seeks to regain public support after the midterm election, which has been widely interpreted as a rejection of his conduct of the Iraq war.

Though Sen. John McCain of Arizona has called for sending more troops, other Republicans have challenged such a course. The idea is drawing sharp criticism from Democrats, setting the stage for a showdown at the start of a period in which both sides have proclaimed a new devotion to bipartisanship.

Levin's comments Thursday were the latest from Democrats warning against troop increases. On Tuesday, Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, incoming chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, said such a boost would be "the absolute wrong strategy," a comment that drew a sharp retort from the White House a day later.

In addition to talking with members of Congress, Bush said, he will continue consultations with the Iraqi government, emphasizing the necessity of having a government there willing to deal with insurgents and sectarian violence.

Bush called the meeting Thursday "an important part of coming to closure" as he completes his new policy. Gates, Pace, Rice and Cheney stood behind him, all in casual sports clothes, as he spoke.

The timing of Bush's announcement of a new policy is tied to several factors: He is scheduled to return to Washington on New Year's Day after a week in Texas and will take part the next day in the funeral of former President Ford at Washington National Cathedral.

Also, Congress returns to open a new session on Thursday, although Bush can consult with its members before the formal opening.

Few New Ideas In Army's Surge Options For Iraq (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, December 29, 2006

The U.S. Army is studying a number of options for surging troops into Iraq if President Bush picks that approach as his centerpiece for a new war strategy, military officials said yesterday.

One official who was sent the briefing slides for various surge options said he was struck with the lack of new ideas after an intense three-month review process inside the Bush administration. "Some of this stuff is what the old Coalition Provisional Authority looked at," said the official, referring to the U.S. government organization that ran Iraq from 2003 to 2004.

There are now about 135,000 American forces in Iraq. Surge options range from a brigade of some 5,000 soldiers to as many as five brigades, or nearly 30,000 troops.

If Mr. Bush, who met yesterday at his Texas ranch with Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and other national security advisers, chooses that option, the main target would be to take control of the capital. Since last summer, Baghdad has been the scene of killings by Shi'ite and Sunni death squads, and by al Qaeda. A build up of both Iraqi and American forces there this summer did not achieve the desired reduction in violence. Commanders have said the next six months will be a critical time: the violence will either recede or Iraq will descend into civil war.

To surge by five brigades, the Army will have to keep some units in Iraq longer than their normal 13-month deployments, and accelerate the redeployment of brigades who already have served there. The Army will also call up more reserves and may tap forces stationed in other overseas regions, military officials said.

"The Army has been looking at this for months," said a second official. "[Former Defense Secretary Donald H.] Rumsfeld held a number of briefings on, if we need more troops, how do we do it."

Mr. Bush is said to be particularly impressed by a briefing he received at the White House Dec. 11 from retired Gen. John M. Keane, former Army vice chief of staff. Gen. Keane advocates a surge of troops for a significant period of time to secure Baghdad.

The Army has increased troops in Iraq in the past to improve security for last winter's national elections and for the Baghdad offensive this summer.

Officials said Mr. Bush is also looking at an economic component and may ask Congress to fund a new round of reconstruction projects. Officials have mentioned a figure of $5 billion. But they warn that starting more projects at a time of deteriorating security will not work. Congress has approved over $30 billion in reconstruction and development money for Iraq.

Another factor is the state of Iraq's new ministries. After operating for nearly 30 years in Saddam Hussein's top-down management style, there is no seasoned cadre of bureaucrats who know how to move the machinery of government to get things done.

As a result, ministries are failing to spend budget funds on much-needed projects. "They have not yet learned how to make decisions and act on them," said the first official.

Mr. Bush is weighing scores of options from a number of sources, including the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the National Security Council, his commanders in Iraq and retired officers such as Gen. Keane. Also weighing in was the 10-member Iraq Study Group, which recommended virtually all combat units be out of Iraq by early 2008. The White House and the Joint Chiefs are described as cool to that idea.

The government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki also has submitted proposals for how the Iraqi Security Forces can take over more missions, and do it faster.

Why We Need More Troops In Iraq (WP)

By Joseph Lieberman

I've just spent 10 days traveling in the Middle East and speaking to leaders there, all of which has made one thing clearer to me than ever: While we are naturally focused on Iraq, a larger war is emerging. On one side are extremists and terrorists led and sponsored by Iran, on the other moderates and democrats supported by the United States. Iraq is the most deadly battlefield on which that conflict is being fought. How we end the struggle there will affect not only the region but the worldwide war against the extremists who attacked us on Sept. 11, 2001.

Because of the bravery of many Iraqi and coalition military personnel and the recent coming together of moderate political forces in Baghdad, the war is winnable. We and our Iraqi allies must do what is necessary to win it.

The American people are justifiably frustrated by the lack of progress, and the price paid by our heroic troops and their families has been heavy. But what is needed now, especially in Washington and Baghdad, is not despair but decisive action -- and soon.

The most pressing problem we face in Iraq is not an absence of Iraqi political will or American diplomatic initiative, both of which are increasing and improving; it is a lack of basic security. As long as insurgents and death squads terrorize Baghdad, Iraq's nascent democratic institutions cannot be expected to function, much less win the trust of the people. The fear created by gang murders and mass abductions ensures that power will continue to flow to the very thugs and extremists who have the least interest in peace and reconciliation.

This bloodshed, moreover, is not the inevitable product of ancient hatreds. It is the predictable consequence of a failure to ensure basic security and, equally important, of a conscious strategy by al-Qaeda and Iran, which have systematically aimed to undermine Iraq's fragile political center. By ruthlessly attacking the Shiites in particular over the past three years, al-Qaeda has sought to provoke precisely the dynamic of reciprocal violence that threatens to consume the country.

On this point, let there be no doubt: If Iraq descends into full-scale civil war, it will be a tremendous battlefield victory for al-Qaeda and Iran. Iraq is the central front in the global and regional war against Islamic extremism.

To turn around the crisis we need to send more American troops while we also train more Iraqi troops and strengthen the moderate political forces in the national government. After speaking with our military commanders and soldiers there, I strongly believe that additional U.S. troops must be deployed to Baghdad and Anbar province -- an increase that will at last allow us to establish security throughout the Iraqi capital, hold critical central neighborhoods in the city, clamp down on the insurgency and defeat al-Qaeda in that province.

In Baghdad and Ramadi, I found that it was the American colonels, even more than the generals, who were asking for more troops. In both places these soldiers showed a strong commitment to the cause of stopping the extremists. One colonel followed me out of the meeting with our military leaders in Ramadi and said with great emotion, "Sir, I regret that I did not have the chance to speak in the meeting, but I want you to know on behalf of the soldiers in my unit and myself that we believe in why we are fighting here and we want to finish this fight. We know we can win it."

In nearly four years of war, there have never been sufficient troops dispatched to accomplish our vital mission. The troop surge should be militarily meaningful in size, with a clearly defined mission.

More U.S. forces might not be a guarantee of success in this fight, but they are certainly its prerequisite. Just as the continuing carnage in Baghdad empowers extremists on all sides, establishing security there will open possibilities for compromise and cooperation on the Iraqi political front -- possibilities that simply do not exist today because of the fear gripping all sides.

I saw firsthand evidence in Iraq of the development of a multiethnic, moderate coalition against the extremists of al-Qaeda and against the Mahdi Army, which is sponsored and armed by Iran and has inflamed the sectarian violence. We cannot abandon these brave Iraqi patriots who have stood up and fought the extremists and terrorists.

The addition of more troops must be linked to a comprehensive new military, political and economic strategy that provides security for the population so that training of Iraqi troops and the development of a democratic government can move forward.

In particular we must provide the vital breathing space for moderate Shiites and Sunnis to turn back the radicals in their communities. There are Iraqi political leaders who understand their responsibility to do this. In Anbar province we have made encouraging progress in winning over local Sunni tribal leaders in the fight against al-Qaeda and other terrorists. With more troops to support them, our forces in Anbar and their Sunni allies can achieve a major victory over al-Qaeda.

As the hostile regimes in Iran and Syria appreciate -- at times, it seems, more keenly than we do -- failure in Iraq would be a strategic and moral catastrophe for the United States and its allies. Radical Islamist terrorist groups, both Sunni and Shiite, would reap victories simultaneously symbolic and tangible, as Iraq became a safe haven in which to train and strengthen their foot soldiers and Iran's terrorist agents. Hezbollah and Hamas would be greatly strengthened against their moderate opponents. One moderate Palestinian leader told me that a premature U.S. exit from Iraq would be a victory for Iran and the groups it is supporting in the region. Meanwhile, the tens of thousands of Iraqis who have bravely stood with us in the hope of a democratic future would face the killing fields.

In Iraq today we have a responsibility to do what is strategically and morally right for our nation over the long term -- not what appears easier in the short term. The daily scenes of death and destruction are heartbreaking and infuriating. But there is no better strategic and moral alternative for America than standing with the moderate Iraqis until the country is stable and they can take over their security. Rather than engaging in hand-wringing, carping or calls for withdrawal, we must summon the vision, will and courage to take the difficult and decisive steps needed for success and, yes, victory in Iraq. That will greatly advance the cause of moderation and freedom throughout the Middle East and protect our security at home.

Lawyer Told To Pick Up Hussein's Personal Effects (CNN)

CNN.com, December 29, 2006

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Saddam Hussein's lawyer said Friday the U.S. military has asked that he arrange for Hussein's personal belongings to be picked up.

But Hussein has not been handed over to Iraq authorities for execution and remained in U.S. custody Friday, according to Iraqi Deputy Justice Ministry Bosho Ibrahim.

Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri Al-Maliki said Friday that nothing will stop or delay the execution, according to Iraqi national television.

Al-Maliki told reporters that there be "no reviews or delays in the execution of the criminal Saddam," Al-Iraqiya TV reported.

Under Iraqi law, his defense lawyers and family would be notified before the death sentence is carried out, and there has apparently been no such notification.

"The American side has just called me and asked me to either send someone to pick up the personal effects of Saddam Hussein and his [half] brother Barzan al-Tikriti, or to give them an address to which they can send them," said lead defense attorney Khalil al-Dulaimi.

He said when he asked the U.S. military if this meant that Hussein had already been transferred to Iraqi custody for his execution, they refused to answer.

Another defense lawyer, Badie Aref, told CNN that Hussein met with two of his half-brothers in his prison cell on Thursday and passed on messages and instructions to his family.

"President Saddam was just bracing for the worst, so he wanted to see his brothers and pass on some messages and instructions to his family," Aref said. The half brothers who visited were Sabawi and Wathban Ibrahim Hassan al-Tikriti, he said.

Another of Hussein's half-brothers, Barzan al-Tikriti, has been sentenced to death and is being held in Iraq under the same charges as Hussein.

Aref said the U.S. soldiers guarding Hussein took away a radio he kept in his cell on Tuesday so he could not hear news reports about his death sentence.

His death sentence was upheld Tuesday by an appellate court. (Full story)

"They did not want him to hear the news from the appeals court upholding the sentence," he said. "They gave him back the radio on Wednesday."

Aref said Saddam found out about the appeals court verdict "a few hours after it was announced."

On Thursday, Bush administration officials told CNN Hussein is expected to be executed "this weekend."

Hussein would be transferred from U.S. to Iraqi custody within the next day, one official said.

More than one administration source confirmed the impending transfer.

But Homeland Security Advisor Fran Townsend on CNN cautioned that the timing of the execution is up to the Iraqi government.

Two defense attorneys Thursday met with Hussein in his jail cell.

"He believes in his fate, and his only concern is the unity of the Iraqi people," al-Dulaimi told CNN in Amman, Jordan.

Al-Dulaimi described the former Iraqi dictator's morale as "normal."

Hussein was convicted on November 5 for crimes against humanity in connection with the killings of 148 people after an attempt on his life.

Hussein's execution by hanging must take place before January 27 -- or within 30 days after the Iraqi High Tribunal upheld the death sentence -- according to chief Judge Aref Shaheen. (Watch tensions escalate over Hussein's imminent execution)

"He believes in his destiny," the attorney said.

Al-Dulaimi said Thursday that neither the defense team nor Hussein's family have been given an execution date.

The U.S. State Department also says it has not been told when Hussein will be executed.

A senior Bush administration official said Thursday that the execution is likely to be "a couple of days" from now.

Hussein was sentenced to death for his role in the 1982 killings of 148 people in Dujail, a mostly Shiite town north of Baghdad, following an attempt on his life.

The dictator was found guilty of murder, torture, and forced deportation.

The Dujail episode falls within 12 of the worst cases out of the 500 documented "baskets of crimes" during the Hussein regime.

The U.S. State Department says torture and extrajudicial killings followed the Dujail killings and that 550 men, women and children were arrested without warrants. A Web warning to U.S.

On the day Hussein's death sentence was confirmed, the Baath party that he led warned that it would retaliate against the United States and its interests as well as against members of the Iraqi High Tribunal if the execution is carried out.

It said the United States will suffer "grave consequences" if Hussein is executed.

The party also vowed to shut down peace negotiations with coalition forces, according to the statement the group released on an Arabic-language Web site.

The Baathists have been operating as part of the insurgency against the U.S. and its allies since Hussein's regime fell in 2003.

In a farewell letter posted Wednesday on the former Baath Party's Web site, Hussein bid farewell to Iraqis and called on them not to hate the U.S.-led forces. (Watch Hussein try to get in the last word)

Calling Iraq a "loyal and honorable nation," Hussein says, "I bid you farewell and submit myself to the merciful and ever-faithful Lord." (Full story)Trial itself was on trial

The White House has praised the court's decision, calling the day a milestone.

"Saddam has received due process and the legal rights that he denied the Iraqi people," said Scott Stanzel, deputy White House press secretary.

Al-Dulaimi, called the ruling "crazy," and said it came from "an illegitimate and unconstitutional court."

While proponents of the Iraqi High Tribunal hail it for taking steps to ensure accountability for atrocities committed during Hussein's regime, critics have pointed to the lack of safety for attorneys and questioned the judiciary's independence and impartiality.

Three defense lawyers were killed during the Dujail trial, and another fled the country after being seriously wounded. (Watch to see why many consider the trial flawed)

Human Rights Watch, which had regularly issued reports about the Hussein regime's brutality, also criticized the Iraqi High Tribunal for an over-reliance on anonymous witnesses.

Hussein and others also are being tried in another case, the killings of up to 100,000 Kurds during the 1988 Anfal campaign against Kurdish rebels. The allegations include the use of poison gas against Kurdish towns in northern Iraq.

Hussein Could Be Hanged Within Days (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 28 — Preparations for the execution of Saddam Hussein began taking on a sense of urgency late Thursday as American and Iraqi officials suggested that he could be hanged within a span of days rather than weeks.

After upholding the death sentence against Mr. Hussein on Tuesday for the execution of 148 Shiite men and boys in 1982, an Iraqi appeals court ruled that he must be sent to the gallows within 30 days. But Mr. Hussein may not have even that long to live, officials said.

A senior administration official said that the execution would probably not take place in the next 24 hours, but that the timing would be swift. “It may be another day or so,” the official said.

In Iraq, where the Constitution requires that the Iraqi president and his two deputies sign all execution orders, officials said it was unlikely that legal formalities would stand in the way. The president, Jalal Talabani, had not received the documents by late Thursday.

But a government official familiar with the process said that little objection would be raised if the execution took place almost immediately. “Even if it happens tonight, no one is going to make an issue out of the procedure,” the official said.

Mowaffak al-Rubaie, the national security adviser, said there would be no advance notice of the execution because of fears that any announcement could set off violence. When asked who would be invited to attend the hanging, Mr. Rubaie said: “No television. No press. Nothing.”

He said the execution would be videotaped but that it was unlikely that the tape would be released.

Even with the security fears, there was little appetite among Iraqi officialdom to spare Mr. Hussein for much longer. “I hope the decision should be implemented very soon,” said Qasim Daoud, a former national security adviser. “Sooner is better because it sends a message that we are determined — we want to get ahead step by step to building a new Iraq, and these messages will help.”

Some rights advocacy groups have criticized the haste of the trial and the appeal. Mr. Hussein was sentenced to death on Nov. 5 by a court specially set up to judge his years in power, and the appeals court handed down its ruling less than two months later. Mr. Hussein, along with two co-defendants, received his death sentence on a narrow case involving only the killings of the 148 Shiites, in the town of Dujail. Further cases were pending, and his trial on charges that he ordered the killings of tens of thousands of Kurds has already started.

Since the appeals court upheld the death sentences, rumors have swept Baghdad that the Iraqi government would move quickly to put Mr. Hussein to death. Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki has drawn protests of political meddling in recent months by suggesting publicly that the former dictator should die at the earliest possible date.

Public pronouncements by American officials have been much more muted, as all formal queries have been referred to the government of Iraq, or G.O.I. in Baghdad jargon.

“Saddam Hussein is still in detention in a coalition facility,” the United States military in Baghdad said in a statement late Thursday, referring to the American-led coalition of forces. “He will continue to remain in a coalition facility until G.O.I. determines to change that status.”

“This is primarily a G.O.I. issue. As for any potential transfer, we do not discuss any coordination” between American military forces and the Iraqis, the statement said.

One American official who works closely with the Iraqi justice system expressed frustration over the criticism that Mr. Hussein’s trial has received. Considering the difficult security situation in a country emerging from a dictatorship — Mr. Hussein’s — the trial has been conducted as fairly as possible by the Iraqis, the official said. “I’m sure they gave it full deliberation and I have full confidence in them,” the official said.

Hussein May Be Hanged In A 'Day Or So' (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-fiske

The Los Angeles Times, December 29, 2006

BAGHDAD — Saddam Hussein met with two of his half brothers and his lawyers Thursday at a U.S. detention facility as a senior U.S. official said his execution could come within "a couple more days."

The former Iraqi president has been in U.S. custody in a cell at Camp Cropper near Baghdad's international airport. He is to be officially turned over to Iraqi custody shortly before the death sentence is carried out, as ordered by an Iraqi court.

The execution could occur in "another day or so" — before the start of the Muslim holiday of Eid al-Adha, said the U.S. official, who spoke on condition of anonymity. Iraqi officials have said their government would be loath to carry out an execution during the Eid festival, and have suggested that it would not take place until the holiday ends next week. The U.S. official noted that the Bush administration had been "in close contact with the government of Iraq" on Hussein's fate.

As speculation rose that the execution is near, the condemned former president met at Camp Cropper with his half brothers Sabawi and Watban Ibrahim Hassan, both of whom are also in U.S. custody, said one of his attorneys, Bushra Khalil.

"He met with them and he gave them some things. I'm not sure what," said Khalil, speaking by phone from Amman, Jordan, where she plans to meet today with Hussein's eldest daughter, Raghad.

Hussein's lawyers said they had not been notified of the execution date.

Hussein, 69, seemed in high spirits Thursday as he shared untitled poems he wrote recently and well wishes for the Iraqi people with his visitors over lunch, said attorney Wadood Fawzi, one of those who met with Hussein.

Fawzi said that during the two-hour meeting, Hussein asked about the welfare of the country and his family but made no requests and asked no questions, not even about his execution. "He wasn't sad; he was very normal," Fawzi said.

Hussein's lead attorney, Khalil Dulaimi, said he did not expect Hussein to invite family members to witness his execution.

Hussein was sentenced Nov. 5 to hang for crimes against humanity in connection with the killing of 148 men and boys from the Shiite Muslim town of Dujayl after an attempt there to assassinate him in 1982. Two of his seven codefendants also received death sentences.

Dulaimi called Hussein's trial illegal and politically motivated. He called on U.S. and world leaders to acknowledge that, saying that otherwise they risked alienating not just Iraqis but the rest of the Muslim world.

"I would like to advise the American administration and President Bush: Do not make mistakes again," Dulaimi said. "This is not advice from Saddam Hussein's lawyer, but from an Iraqi citizen."

Elsewhere in Baghdad, violence continued to claim the lives of some of Iraq's poorest citizens.

Bystanders pulled an 8-year-old boy from the charred wreckage of a marketplace where the poor come to buy used clothes and household goods, the scene of two of three explosions in the city that left at least 17 people dead, including the boy's parents.

Vendors said the bombs, which killed seven people, were planted in wooden carts by two strangers who set up shop near the entrance and exit to the market and left just before the explosions. After the initial shock over the explosions, shoppers and vendors resumed haggling over underwear and socks.

"If I would go home, then what would my family eat?" said vendor Jabbar Shnawa, 35, who sold a CD after the explosion for 500 dinars, about 40 cents.

Across town, a bomb planted under a parked car exploded at 11 a.m. at a gas station where people waited to buy kerosene. The blast killed 10 people.

During the 24-hour period that ended Thursday, 41 bodies were recovered in the capital, according to the Interior Ministry.

Three U.S. Marines were killed in Fallouja by small-arms fire. They were with the 1st Battalion, 24th Marine Regiment, a reserve group from the Midwest. Members of the battalion are among the final 300 Marines in Fallouja, where many patrols recently have been turned over to Iraqi forces. A U.S. soldier was killed by a roadside bomb while on a combat foot patrol north of the capital, the military said.

The deaths bring to 2,991 the total number of U.S. forces killed in Iraq since 2003, according to icasualties.org.

The military also announced Thursday that soldiers conducted a raid Tuesday south of Baghdad and detained an Al Qaeda in Iraq cell leader suspected of killing two U.S. soldiers found dead in June, Pfc. Kristian Menchaca of Houston and Pfc. Thomas Tucker of Madras, Ore.

Meanwhile, audio from a videotape of four American hostages was made public Thursday by McClatchy Newspapers in which the security contractors and an Austrian plead for their release. The five were kidnapped Nov. 16 near the southern city of Safwan.

Lou Fintor, a U.S. Embassy spokesman, confirmed that the men were still being held and said U.S. officials were investigating the recording. Fintor said a previously unknown Iranian group, the Islamic Mujahedin Battalion, initially claimed responsibility for the kidnapping. He could not say whether the group was still holding the men.

On tape, the five men ask the U.S. government to withdraw troops from Iraq. They identify themselves as Josh Munz, a former Marine from California who was stationed in Fallouja; John Young, 44, of Kansas City, Mo.; Jonathan Cote, 23, of Gainesville, Fla.; Paul Reuben, 39, of Buffalo, Minn.; and Bert Nussbaumer, 25, of Vienna.

SADDAM: DEAD BY SUNDAY (NYPOST)

The New York Post, December 29, 2006

December 28, 2006 -- Saddam Hussein, sentenced to death for his role in 148 killings in 1982, will be hanged within the next 48 hours, a U.S. military officer reportedly said Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0110026

NBC and CBS News are reporting that the officer revealed Saddam will be hanged before the start of the Eid religious holiday, which begins Sunday.

Earlier Thursday, Saddam's chief lawyer made a last-ditch effort to impede his execution, beseeching world leaders to prevent the United States from handing over the ousted dictator to Iraqi authorities who plan to hang him.

The plea came as the U.S. military reported the deaths of five more troops and announced that Iraqi forces, backed by American forces, captured an al-Qaida in Iraq cell leader believed responsible for the June kidnapping of two soldiers who were found tortured and killed.

With at least 72 more Iraqis killed in sectarian violence, U.S. officials and Iraqis expressed concern about the potential for even worse bloodshed following Saddam's execution. The lawyer, Khalil al-Dulaimi, said transferring Saddam to Iraqi authorities could be the trigger.

"If the American administration insists in handing the president to the Iraqis, it would commit a great strategic mistake which would lead to the escalation of the violence in Iraq and the eruption of a destructive civil war," al-Dulaimi told The Associated Press in a telephone interview.

Iraq's highest court on Tuesday rejected Saddam's appeal against his conviction and death sentence for the killing of 148 Shiites in the northern city of Dujail in 1982. The court said the former president should be hanged within 30 days.

The White House was preparing for Saddam's execution as early as this weekend, based on information that U.S. officials in Baghdad were receiving from the Iraqi government, a senior administration official said in Washington.

But Iraq's deputy justice minister, Bosho Ibrahim, said Saddam shouldn't be hanged for another few weeks. "The law does not say within 30 days, it says after the lapse of 30 days," Ibrahim said.

He did not explain the discrepancy between his interpretation and the court's, nor could he give a specific execution date.

Al-Dulaimi, Saddam's lawyer, said the ousted leader should enjoy protection from his enemies as a "prisoner of war" and remain in U.S. custody.

"According to the international conventions, it is forbidden to hand a prisoner of war to his adversary," al-Dulaimi said.

"I urge all the international and legal organizations, the United Nations secretary-general, the Arab League and all the leaders of the world to rapidly prevent the American administration from handing the president to the Iraqi authorities," al-Dulaimi said.

An official close to Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has said Saddam would remain in a U.S. military prison until he is delivered to Iraqi authorities on the day of his execution. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the press.

Iraqi government offices shut down ahead of an Islamic holiday this weekend, and there was confusion over when Saddam would be executed and whether President Jalal Talabani was required to approve such action.

Raed Juhi, a spokesman for the High Tribunal that convicted Saddam, said that with approval from Talabani, Saddam could be put to death within 30 days. Otherwise, the execution would be held after that period, he said.

But Hiwa Osman, a spokesman for Talabani, has said the execution might not need the president's signature.

International reaction to the denial of Saddam's appeal has been relatively muted.

Cardinal Renato Martino, Pope Benedict XVI's top prelate for justice issues and a former Vatican envoy to the U.N., condemned the death sentence in a newspaper interview published Thursday, saying capital punishment goes against the teachings of the Roman Catholic Church.

After Saddam's death sentence was handed down last month, Louise Arbour, the U.N. high commissioner for human rights, urged Iraq to ensure a fair appeals process and to refrain from executing Saddam even if the sentence is upheld.

Some international legal observers and human rights groups have also called Saddam's trial unfair because of alleged interference by the Shiite-dominated government.

But State Department Deputy Spokesman Tom Casey said Thursday the Bush administration believes the trial was held in accordance with international and Iraqi laws.

"(The Iraqis) carried out their work in a transparent and open manner and they arrived at a verdict based on the facts in the case," Casey said.

In Dujail, home to the 148 victims of the 1982 killings, townspeople were divided over Saddam's execution.

"America is using him to increase sedition among Iraqis, but we are thinking only of how Iraq can get rid of its problems and achieve security," said Hussein Abases, a Shiite farmer.

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman acknowledged there was concern about a possible surge of violence after the execution. "I'm sure the Iraqi government is thinking through that and working with the coalition in terms of the impact that could have," he said in Washington.

U.S. Preparing For Saddam's Execution (AP)

The timetable was based on information that U.S. officials in Baghdad received from the Iraqi government. But, there were differing accounts.

At least 30 Iraqis died Thursday in bombings and shootings, including a suicide bombing in a crowd of people waiting to buy kerosene near a stadium in Baghdad that killed 10, according to police. Police also said 42 bodies of tortured men were found dumped in the Iraqi capital Thursday.

The U.S. military in Iraq announced five more American troop deaths: four soldiers hit by roadside bombs on patrol and a Marine killed in combat in volatile western Iraq. The Department of Defense also identified three more American servicemen who died in Iraq this week that hadn't been previously reported, according to an AP analysis.

The figures raised the U.S. troop deaths this month to 103, second only to the 105 service members who died in October. At least 2,991 members of the U.S. military have been killed since the Iraq war began in March 2003, according to an AP count.

The al-Qaida in Iraq cell leader allegedly responsible for the deaths of two of the servicemen was arrested Tuesday in a raid south of Baghdad, the military said. Al-Qaida in Iraq had claimed it killed the two U.S. soldiers found dead in June - Pfc. Kristian Menchaca of Houston and Pfc. Thomas Tucker of Madras, Ore. Their bodies were recovered after a search by 8,000 U.S. and Iraqi soldiers, dubbed Operation Fallen Eagle.

The Rush To Hang Saddam Hussein (NYT)

The important question was never really about whether Saddam Hussein was guilty of crimes against humanity. The public record is bulging with the lengthy litany of his vile and unforgivable atrocities: genocidal assaults against the Kurds; aggressive wars against Iran and Kuwait; use of internationally banned weapons like nerve gas; systematic torture of countless thousands of political prisoners.

What really mattered was whether an Iraq freed from his death grip could hold him accountable in a way that nurtured hope for a better future. A carefully conducted, scrupulously fair trial could have helped undo some of the damage inflicted by his rule. It could have set a precedent for the rule of law in a country scarred by decades of arbitrary vindictiveness. It could have fostered a new national unity in an Iraq long manipulated through its religious and ethnic divisions.

It could have, but it didn't. After a flawed, politicized and divisive trial, Mr. Hussein was handed his sentence: death by hanging. This week, in a cursory 15-minute proceeding, an appeals court upheld that sentence and ordered that it be carried out posthaste. Most Iraqis are now so preoccupied with shielding their families from looming civil war that they seem to have little emotion left to spend on Mr. Hussein or, more important, on their own fading dreams of a new and better Iraq.

What might have been a watershed now seems another lost opportunity. After nearly four years of war and thousands of American and Iraqi deaths, it is ever harder to be sure whether anything fundamental has changed for the better in Iraq.

This week began with a story of British and Iraqi soldiers storming a police station that hid a secret dungeon in Basra. More than 100 men, many of them viciously tortured, were rescued from almost certain execution. It might have been a story from the final days of Baathist rule in March 2003, when British and American troops entered Basra believing they were liberating the subjugated Shiite south. But it was December 2006, and the wretched men being liberated were prisoners of the new Iraqi Shiite authorities.

Toppling Saddam Hussein did not automatically create a new and better Iraq. Executing him won't either.

A Death Sentence Affirmed (WP)

WITH TUESDAY'S decision by an Iraqi appeals body to affirm the death sentence of Saddam Hussein, the execution of the former tyrant could take place within weeks. Under Iraqi law, a death sentence must be carried out within a month of its confirmation; though Iraqi officials have made conflicting statements about timing, the country's Shiite-dominated government is unlikely to show mercy. For those who oppose the death penalty, as we do, any execution is regrettable -- and this one, should it come to pass, will follow highly imperfect judicial proceedings and may in the short term inflame sectarian divisions. But it's hard to imagine the death penalty existing anywhere for any crime and not for Saddam Hussein -- a man who, with the possible exception of Kim Jong Il, has more blood on his hands than anyone else alive. Should the world see his end in the coming days, the justice will be imperfect. But it will still be justice.

To be sure, this was not the accountability that one would hope for Saddam Hussein. For one thing, the crime for which he has been condemned -- the killing of 148 men and boys from the town of Dujail after an assassination attempt against him there in 1982 -- will be but a footnote in the volume detailing his atrocities. And his execution will cut short his trial for the crimes that would fill out that volume: the so-called Anfal campaign, in which tens of thousands of Kurds were murdered.

What's more, his trial was in no sense the model of civilized justice that would have showcased a new, democratic Iraq -- in large measure because that new Iraq has yet to materialize. Several defense lawyers were murdered; judges had to be replaced. Political interference was evident. Even this week, the appeals tribunal sent back one life sentence as insufficiently tough, in effect demanding death for one of the co-defendants.

Still, there is something unreal about the cries of foul from human rights groups demanding perfect procedural justice from a country struggling with civil war, daily bombings and death-squad killings. The reality is that by the trial's end, there was no significant factual dispute between prosecution and defense: Saddam Hussein acknowledged on national television that he had signed the death warrants after only the most cursory look at the evidence against his victims. That, he testified proudly, "is the right of the head of state." Exactly what would a perfect trial be capable of discovering?

Marines Deny Airstrikes Used Against Insurgents In Ramadi (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, December 29, 2006

BAGHDAD — A large-scale U.S. military operation in Ramadi last month did not target suspected insurgents with airstrikes, U.S. military officials said.

Witness statements reported by The Times on Nov. 15 indicated that a U.S. airstrike might have killed at least 30 people, including women and children.

But Marine spokesman Lt. Col. Bryan Salas said in a written response to inquiries about the incident that an airstrike Nov. 14 hit a bridge about 10 miles east of Ramadi and resulted in no casualties.

Salas said Marines killed at least 16 suspected insurgents during Ramadi operations Nov. 13 and 14 in which tank rounds and 25-millimeter guns were fired. Main tank guns can hit targets miles away with explosive ordnance.

"The 13th and the morning of the 14th of November was very lethal for the insurgency," he said.

Salas said insurgents fired at least three rocket-propelled grenades but overshot and missed U.S. forces. Insurgents and U.S. forces also traded mortar fire, Salas said, but there were no reports of casualties in that exchange.

He acknowledged that news photos showed "alleged bodies of civilians killed by coalition forces in Ramadi," and did not dispute reports of collateral damage.

Recent interviews by a Times correspondent in Ramadi supported earlier eyewitness accounts of civilian deaths during the clashes.

"The actual number eventually reached 35 people, including children and women," said Yasir Hussein, 40, a Ramadi electrical worker. Hussein said the initial tally of 30 dead increased as injured people died of their wounds.

"I saw three women and two children killed," said Khalid Jasim, 49, a school guard. "We took their bodies to the hospital using blankets due to the fact that several of them were dismembered."

The Marines did not immediately respond to inquiries about the number of civilian dead, but acknowledged that it was often difficult to distinguish between insurgents and civilians.

Recent interviews with Ramadi residents also supported initial reports that homes were destroyed during the November fighting. Marines did not respond to inquiries from The Times regarding the number of homes destroyed or tank rounds fired in the fighting.

Residents said the houses were in an old Iraqi army officers quarters, and that one of them, in which a number of civilians were killed, was being used as an Internet cafe.

"Six houses were leveled to the ground and 10 others were damaged to varying degrees," said Ahmad Hummadi, 50, a laborer. "But all of the houses were abandoned because they were no longer suitable for habitation."

Several residents said they saw helicopters and a jet fighter during the confrontations and assumed that some of the explosions were caused by airstrikes. U.S. ground units often are accompanied by air support during military operations.

A special correspondent in Ramadi contributed to this report.

A Suspect In The Killings Of 2 Americans Is Captured In Iraq (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 28 — The man believed to be behind the kidnapping, brutal torture and killing of two American soldiers in June was seized in a raid in a town just south of the capital on Tuesday, American and Iraqi officials said Thursday.

The abduction of the two Americans, who were captured when insurgents ambushed a traffic checkpoint their platoon had set up in the town of Yusufiya, set off one of the largest manhunts of the war, with 8,000 troops involved.

The soldiers' savaged remains were eventually found not far from where the soldiers were taken.

A group called the Mujahedeen Shura Council, which is linked to Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, later released a graphic video showing the decapitation of one of the Americans. At one point, the arm of one insurgent is shown picking up the soldier's head as another insurgent steps on the face of the other soldier.

The two slain soldiers were identified as Pfc. Kristian Menchaca, 23, of Houston and Pfc. Thomas L. Tucker, of Madras, Ore. A third soldier, Specialist David J. Babineau, 25 of Springfield, Mass., was killed during the attack on June 16 that resulted in the abduction.

In a country where killers seldom are brought to justice, the capture of the man believed to be responsible for the soldiers' deaths, whose name was not released, would be a clear triumph for American forces.

Meg Tucker, Private Tucker's mother, struggled to hold back tears when told the news about the capture. "I'm glad that they caught him if indeed they did, but it doesn't bring my son back," she said. "We have just gone through the holidays. It has been really tough. We miss him very much. We still get cards and letters from all over the United States, and we appreciate that very much."

The raid was prompted by a tip the Americans received about a video that had been shown at the Yusufiya mosque, Iraqi and American military officials said. In the video, a man is seen commenting on the kidnapping. It is this man, military officials said, who was taken into custody.

He is also believed to have directed and participated in other kidnappings, killings and violent crimes, the military said in a statement.

Although the military's statement said that the Iraqi Special Forces led the operation, an Iraqi military official indicated that the man was in American custody and that American forces directed the assault.

No casualties involving either American or Iraqi troops were reported in the raid.

American and Iraqi forces staged another major raid on Tuesday in the nearby town of Mahmudiya, arresting 30 people suspected of being insurgents. It was unclear if the two raids were connected.

Yet even as they tried to stem the violence, Americans forces continued to come under sustained attack.

Four Americans were killed in attacks on Wednesday, bringing the total number of Americans killed in December to 100, according to The Associated Press and making this one of the deadliest months for the military in the past three years.

One marine was killed battling insurgents on Wednesday in Anbar Province, the Sunni stronghold in the west of the country.

Two soldiers were killed on Wednesday when a roadside bomb exploded near their patrol in southwestern Baghdad. In a separate bombing in the capital, another American soldier was killed.

Scores of Iraqis also continued to die in bombings, clashes and kidnappings.

At least 19 Iraqi civilians were killed Thursday in three separate bombings in Baghdad.

In one attack, on a popular market in central Baghdad, two roadside bombs exploded one after the other, timed to inflict as much damage as possible, Iraqi officials said. At least nine people were killed and 35 were wounded, officials said.

Separately, a suicide bomber, who disguised himself in a large crowd of people waiting for fuel at a gas station near a large sports stadium in central Baghdad, blew himself up and killed at least 10 people and wounded 25.

The authorities found 51 bodies in Baghdad on Wednesday and 41 more on Thursday, most likely the latest victims of sectarian violence.

With the violence continuing unabated, the beleaguered Iraqi security forces also came under attack across the country.

North of Baghdad, in Baquba, a police captain was assassinated and two other officers were wounded in a drive-by shooting, officials said.

In Kirkuk, four armed men wearing Iraqi Army uniforms clashed with the police, killing at least one officer and wounding another. Southwest of Kirkuk, in Hawija, a roadside bomb seriously wounded three policemen.

The Iraqi Army also came under assault. An army checkpoint in Tikrit was attacked and two soldiers were killed and one was wounded, Iraqi military officials said.

Al-Qaeda In Iraq Cell Leader Caught In Raid, Military Says (USAT/AP)

USA Today, December 29, 2006

BAGHDAD — The U.S. military said Thursday that a joint raid by Iraqi and U.S. forces resulted in the capture of the al-Qaeda in Iraq cell leader who was behind the abduction, torture and killing of two U.S. soldiers in June.

The announcement came as Saddam Hussein's lawyer made a last-ditch effort Thursday to impede his execution. The U.S. military reported the deaths of five more troops.

Lawyer Khalil al-Dulaimi beseeched world leaders to prevent the United States from handing over the ousted dictator to Iraqi authorities who plan to hang him.

Al-Dulaimi said transferring Saddam to Iraqi authorities could trigger more bloodshed.

Iraq's highest court on Tuesday rejected Saddam's appeal of his conviction and death sentence for the killing of 148 Shiites in the northern city of Dujail in 1982. The court said the former president should be hanged within 30 days.

The White House was preparing for Saddam's execution as early as this weekend, based on information that U.S. officials in Baghdad were receiving from the Iraqi government, a senior administration official said in Washington.

Iraq's deputy justice minister, Bosho Ibrahim, said Saddam shouldn't be hanged for another few weeks.

An official close to Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki told the Associated Press that Saddam would remain in a U.S. military prison until he is delivered to Iraqi authorities on the day of his execution. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the press.

The U.S. military said it captured the al-Qaeda in Iraq figure in a raid south of Baghdad.

Al-Qaeda in Iraq had claimed it killed the two U.S. soldiers found dead in June: Pfc. Kristian Menchaca of Houston and Pfc. Thomas Tucker of Madras, Ore.

The two were abducted when insurgents overran their checkpoint in the town of Youssifiyah. Spec. David Babineau of Springfield, Mass., was killed in that attack.

The Mujahadeen Shura Council, a collection of insurgent groups that includes al-Qaeda in Iraq, later released video purporting to show the decapitation of one of the soldiers. Their bodies were recovered after a search by 8,000 U.S. and Iraqi soldiers. Also Thursday:

•At least 30 Iraqis died in bombings and shootings, including a suicide bombing in a crowd of people waiting to buy kerosene near a stadium in Baghdad that killed 10, according to police. Police also said 42 bodies of tortured men were found dumped in the Iraqi capital Thursday.

•The U.S. military announced that five American servicemembers had been killed: four soldiers hit by roadside bombs on patrol and a Marine killed in combat in volatile western Iraq. That raised the number of U.S. troop deaths in December to 100, the second-highest monthly total this year. There were 105 U.S. deaths in October.

Iraqi River Police Patrol The Tigris (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-fiske, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 29, 2006

Trained in the U.S., the officers bring out the dead and guard a violent stretch of waterway.

BAGHDAD — Divers call it "the burial ground," an impenetrably dark stretch of the Tigris River, about 20 feet deep, passing through the heart of Baghdad.

Cruising the river on a recent day strapped into life jackets that double as body armor, members of Baghdad's river patrol pointed to bridges near where they swam as children and now recover the city's dead.

"Violence, terror — it is part of what is going on here in Iraq," said a river patrol captain who would not give his name, fearing that insurgents in his neighborhood would discover that he works with the police. He said he gave up swimming in the river years ago and bought a pool.

The patrol's commander, Lt. Col. Alaa Saleh Ibrahim, has learned this much patrolling the stretch of muddy river the last two years: It takes at least 10 days for bodies to surface in winter. Men float faceup, women facedown.

Fishermen find bodies tangled in the 10-foot-tall green reeds that line the sandy banks.

"This month we are relieved," Ibrahim said. "We don't have so many dead bodies."

Death on the Tigris is almost always violent, the river patrol commander says. Some causes of deaths are unchanging: People jump from bridges, or get tangled in weeds while swimming and drown.

And then there are the dumped bodies, an increasingly frequent sight and a barometer of violence in a city that has become the epicenter of the country's sectarian strife: stripped of identification, blindfolded, handcuffed, shot and often badly decayed.

Rising body count

The river patrols, created by Saddam Hussein to retrieve casualties of his regime from the Tigris in the 1970s, have returned to body detail because of the city's civil war.

Ibrahim insists that his patrols find only three or four bodies a month. But he starts describing all of the dumped bodies he has seen recently — the suicides and swimmers gone awry — and the number grows to a dozen.

A week ago, fishermen led the patrol to the bodies of two men dumped among the reeds, one blindfolded and handcuffed, the other too decomposed to tell what had happened. They were still unidentified a week later.

But the number of bodies that Ibrahim sees is small compared with that at the major collection point, about 25 miles south of the capital in Suwayrah, where steel nets installed to siphon a river-choking weed called Nile Flower catch the dead — 366 bodies this year through November, the most recent data from the Health Ministry. The total included five women and two children.

Most of the victims were killed execution-style: handcuffed, blindfolded and shot. The bodies also showed signs of torture. A few were beheaded. Of the 366 found, 50 have been identified, police said, including that of human rights activist Margaret Hassan.

The number of bodies recovered in Suwayrah has decreased recently, health officials said. They think it's because killers in Baghdad are dumping bodies closer to home.

Baghdad families still search for loved ones at the morgue near Suwayrah. But they also leave photographs of the missing at river patrol headquarters, a whitewashed concrete compound on the east bank of the Tigris.

The new U.S. Embassy is under construction on the opposite bank, within view of the docks where the patrol's staff of 267, including 16 rescue divers, board their patrol boats.

They don't investigate deaths — other members of the Iraqi police handle that. The river patrol is too busy staffing 10 checkpoints to investigate suspicious boats for explosives, weapons and drugs.

In some cases, the dead are easily identified. After a 25-year-old man jumped from the Sinak Bridge in downtown Baghdad this month, the river patrol retrieved his body and identified him by a photograph on file.

The week before, a man came looking for his son, who was last seen swimming in the Tigris (which is against the law and a cause for arrest). The river patrol later found the youth, drowned.

Members of the patrol wear caps that say "police" in Arabic and English. Last spring, 16 of them took an advanced river patrol training course at Stennis Space Center in Mississippi, about 50 miles north of New Orleans, the same course that U.S. Coast Guard and Navy sailors attend. Another Iraqi group will arrive in April.

During the last year, U.S. military trainers, mostly retired police officers, have worked with patrols on the Tigris.

"To be out on the river, basically open, it was a kind of a freedom you don't usually have on the streets, especially with the military set up the way they are now — you're kind of locked in your little tuna cans," said Richard Eaton of Frisco, Colo., who served with the Civilian Police Transition Team and trained members of the river patrol in the spring and summer.

The revived river patrol has trained members of 10 other patrols along other stretches of the Tigris. They are preparing to train units from the northern cities of Mosul and Salahuddin in a few weeks, Ibrahim said.

"As they seal off the road and highways, the rivers are going to be the next focus," Eaton said. "They need to shut them down, control the flow of people just like they do at checkpoints on the roads."

Eaton, a retired police detective, trained as a river patrol officer while serving on a destroyer in the Vietnam War. He likened Tigris patrols to those along Vietnam's Mekong Delta.

'Targeted all the time'

On the water, the river patrol officers look more like soldiers than police officers, with their helmets, body armor and long black rifles. Their old boats were looted or destroyed after Hussein's fall. They have 16 new ones, including five from the U.S. military that hit the river this month with machine guns at bow and stern.

"Because of the terrorists, we are targeted all the time. People come out from the bushes," said the captain who didn't want to be identified.

In the summer, Eaton was out with two boats patrolling a stretch of river in northern Baghdad at the U.S. Army's request when they came under machine-gun fire from insurgents on the banks. Attackers shot a member of the patrol in the leg and Eaton in the chest.

"Things were flying," Eaton said.

The bullet didn't penetrate Eaton's body armor, but it shattered his utility knife, sending fragments into his hand. He was flown back to the U.S. for treatment. The injured patrol member, Ali Fadhil, was treated at a local hospital and returned to duty.

Ali Abdullah, 22, who trained in Mississippi and followed his older brother into the river patrol, shrugged when asked about the hazards of the job. "Any kind of work is dangerous now," he said.

On the docks this month, divers shook off their black wetsuits and flippers in the winter sun, trying to warm up after a morning of practice dives.

Asad Saffar Abid, 22, has been diving for the patrol for four years and suspects there are hundreds of bodies at the bottom of the river that may never surface.

Veteran diver Mohammed Khazali knows better. He has been diving "the burial ground" for 24 years. In the 6,000-year-old Tigris, as in Iraq, history always resurfaces.

Iraqi Sniper Fire Forces A Healer To Tend His Own Wound (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

Petty Officer Third Class Dustin E. Kirby, a Navy corpsman whose efforts to save a wounded marine in Iraq were covered in an article published Nov. 2 in The New York Times, was severely wounded by an Iraqi sniper on Christmas afternoon, his family and the Marine Corps said yesterday.

The bullet struck the left side of his face while he was on the roof of Outpost Omar, the position his unit occupies in Karma, a city near Falluja in Anbar Province.

His jaw and upper palate were damaged extensively, but after several operations he was conscious and on a ventilator in a military hospital in Germany, his battalion commander, Lt. Col. Kenneth M. DeTreux, said by telephone.

Petty Officer Kirby, 22, of Hiram, Ga., was assigned to Weapons Company, Second Battalion, Eighth Marines, serving as the trauma medic for the company's Second Mobile Assault Platoon. It was his second tour in Iraq. He had married weeks before leaving the United States in July.

He was expected to arrive today at Bethesda Naval Medical Center in Maryland, where his wife, Lauren Kirby, and his parents, Gail and Jack Kirby, planned to meet him.

Although Petty Officer Kirby cannot speak because of his injuries, his mother said she had communicated with him through his brother-in-law, a serviceman who is stationed in Germany and has been at his bedside, holding a phone to Petty Officer Kirby's ear.

Petty Officer Kirby listened to his mother and replied by writing notes, which his brother-in-law read aloud.

"He told me, 'Don't cry, Mama,' " Ms. Kirby said by telephone. "I said, 'I have to. I'm a mom. That's what moms do.' "

She added, "He wrote, 'Be strong for me and Lauren.' "

In another note, she said, he wrote, simply, "Milkshake."

Colonel DeTreux said Petty Officer Kirby began writing within minutes of being shot, when he jotted a note to his platoon before being evacuated by helicopter.

In the first note he apologized to the company's senior enlisted man for being wounded, the colonel said. He then refused a stretcher and insisted on walking to the helicopter.

"He's tough," Colonel DeTreux said. "He showed his character, walking onto the aircraft himself."

The article last month was about the battlefield treatment Petty Officer Kirby provided, and the prayers he said, for a marine who had been shot through the head by an Iraqi sniper.

The marine, Lance Cpl. Colin Smith, had been his roommate in North Carolina before their unit returned to Iraq. Lance Corporal Smith was shot at the end of a raid both men participated in on Karma's outskirts. He remains under treatment and evaluation for injuries to his skull and brain.

Petty Officer Kirby was wounded when a sniper fired one shot on an otherwise quiet Christmas afternoon, Colonel DeTreux said. He was near one of several rooftop bunkers the company staffs to defend Outpost Omar, which has been attacked by insurgents several times, including once by a truck bomb.

He was the second member of his family to be grievously wounded in Iraq. A cousin, Petty Officer Joseph D. Worley, lost his left leg and suffered gunshot wounds to his right leg in 2004. He also was a corpsman in a Marine Corps unit.

The National Envelope Corporation, of Austell, Ga., where Petty Officer Kirby's father is a janitor, is taking donations to help his family.

Kathleen Childs, an executive assistant at the company who was helping to manage the donations, said collections began when it was uncertain whether the family could afford to visit Petty Officer Kirby from the moment he arrived in the United States.

Even before Gail Kirby arranged a plane ticket, Ms. Childs said, it was clear she was headed to his bedside, whether she had the money or not.

"His mother said there was no way she was going to stay at home while her boy was that close," Ms. Childs said. "She was going to start out on foot and walk."

Crisis In Housing Adds To Miseries Of Iraq Mayhem (NYT)

By Michael Luo

BAGHDAD — Along with its many other desperate problems, Iraq is in the midst of a housing crisis that is worsening by the day.

It began right after the toppling of Saddam Hussein, when many landlords took advantage of the removal of his economic controls and raised rents substantially, forcing out thousands of families who took shelter in abandoned government buildings and military bases. As the chaos in Iraq grew and the ranks of the jobless swelled, even more Iraqis migrated to squalid squatter encampments. Still others constructed crude shantytowns on empty plots where conditions were even worse.

Now, after more than 10 months of brutal sectarian reprisals, many more Iraqis have fled their neighborhoods, only to wind up often in places that are just as wretched in other ways. While 1.8 million Iraqis are living outside the country, 1.6 million more have been displaced within Iraq since the war began. Since February, about 50,000 per month have moved within the country.

Shelter is their most pressing need, aid organizations say. Some have been able to occupy homes left by members of the opposing sect or group; others have not been so fortunate. The longer the violence persists, the more Iraqis are running out of money and options.

Shatha Talib, 30, her husband and five children, are among about a thousand struggling Iraqi families that have taken up residence in the bombed-out remains of the former Iraqi Air Defense headquarters and air force club in the center of Baghdad. "Nobody should live in such a place," she said. "But we don't have any other option."

With many families in such encampments or worse, and many others doubled or tripled up in friends' or relatives' homes, the deputy housing minister, Istabraq al-Shouk, puts the shortage at two million dwellings across Iraq.

Iraqi officials say that after security, housing is a priority, but plans to address the problem are minimal. The Housing Ministry is building 17 complexes with 500 apartments each across the country for government employees and families of those killed by militants, Mr. Shouk said. That would be 8,500 homes.

Housing officials hope to attract foreign contractors to build about 350,000 more over the next few years, he said, but that depends largely on whether conditions can be made safe enough for them to work.

The shortage exists in many parts of Iraq, Mr. Shouk said. In Kirkuk, many Kurds driven out by Saddam Hussein in the 1980s who returned after the American-led invasion live in tent cities or hastily built houses. A survey of displaced people in Kirkuk by the International Organization for Migration found that more than 20 percent squat in government buildings or improvised settlements.

In Najaf, a southern city, throngs of destitute Shiite families have claimed buildings abandoned by the Baath Party and the government. Any trip across Baghdad, where the problem is particularly acute, reveals dozens of encampments.

The crisis appears more pronounced among Shiites than Sunnis because of the years of economic marginalization they endured under Mr. Hussein. At least two dozen Shiite families are living in an abandoned army hospital in southern Baghdad, having fled Sunni Arab insurgents in the Abu Ghraib area to the west. Hundreds of other Shiite families are camped in other buildings on the sprawling former army base known as Camp Rashid.

Jabir Munther, his two wives and nine children live in a dank room in a building that used to be the base hospital's radiology department. Rugs are the only furnishings. Outside Mr. Munther's open window is a pond of raw sewage.

He showed a visitor a creased leaflet signed by a Sunni insurgent group that warned Shiites to leave the Abu Ghraib area. A Sunni friend warned him that he would be killed the next day, so he fled, with the help of the network of the radical Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr.

Mr. Munther earns about $120 a month as a guard for a government ministry, he said, about half of what he needs to rent an apartment. He is grateful that he found the hospital, which has spotty electricity but usually reliable running water.

"It's better than living in a tent," he said.

Other Shiite refugees at Camp Rashid include former residents of Ramadi and Falluja in Anbar Province, centers of the Sunni insurgency. The former hospital is in the center of a bizarre moonscape of rubble, the result of contractors dumping debris on the hospital grounds. Children play all day amid the piles. They cannot go to school because no school is nearby. At other encampments, people say they have trouble enrolling their children because they have no permanent address.

On a recent morning, water trucks from Baghdad's municipal government arrived at the base; residents had been without water for a week after a pipe ruptured during construction of a nearby electrical substation. Women in black chadors flocked to the vehicles to fill their plastic containers.

One man who identified himself only by his nickname, Abu Firas, 54, said he was a member of the camp's unofficial city council. Before the government's fall, he lived in southern Baghdad. Laws under Mr. Hussein's rule protected him from eviction, he said, but after the invasion his landlord kicked him out.

Dozens of poor Shiite families have built ramshackle shelters out of rubble, corrugated tin and other materials on an empty stretch of land northeast of Sadr City, the Shiite district. They have no electricity. For water, they fill giant cisterns at a nearby water pipe.

Jassim Muhammad Marid, 65, said most residents of the shantytown were victims of the spiraling cost of living and the shortage of adequately paying jobs.

Many Iraqi families who do have housing are now living with three or even four generations under one roof. A dispute with his wife's family in Kut, a southern city, drove Ahmed Mishaan Battah, 22, and his wife to the former air force club.

In October, they moved onto the grounds, paying the previous occupants of their new home, the second floor of a severely damaged building, $50. It has become increasingly common for rooms in squatter encampments to be bought and sold like regular real estate.

The Battahs got one room with walls, where they sleep, but the others are exposed. They cook meals on a small gas burner, tiptoeing around a precipice. As Iraq's winter chill sets in, the Battahs, who are expecting their first child in a few months, are worried.

"I don't know what I'm going to do when the rains come," Mr. Battah said.

Nearly every family living here has some Dickensian tale of woe to share. In one of the main buildings, there is the family of a police officer killed in late fall. He took the job to try to scrape together the cash to move his wife, four children and niece out of this netherworld of trash and raw sewage. But a bomb in a booby-trapped body killed him.

Jameela Hashim, 48, who lives downstairs from them, has sold her family's heater, refrigerator and stove to help make ends meet. Her husband suffers from mental illness from his time in the military during the Iran-Iraq war. The couple guarded a hotel after the invasion in exchange for a place to live. But they lost that job and wound up at the air force club.

In an arrangement that is at once tragic and comic, Muhammad Ubaid, a carpenter; his wife, Ms. Talib; and their five children have ensconced themselves on the stage of the club's former theater. Like so many others, Mr. Ubaid struggled to find work after the American-led invasion. The family at first moved from their home in Dora to a less expensive neighborhood. But they soon lost that home, as well as Mr. Ubaid's carpentry shop.

A friend suggested they try the theater, which was unoccupied. Mr. Ubaid built a makeshift shelter for his family on the stage. It includes a front window that looks out on the empty auditorium with no seats. After the invasion, looters ripped out every one in a matter of hours.

Mr. Ubaid still takes occasional furniture orders from customers. A fancy set of sofas was parked on stage on a recent afternoon. But the meager income he earns is not enough to move his family out. The Ubaids remain on the stage, living out their own drama.

Prince Harry Off To Iraq (DT)

The Daily Telegragh, December 29, 2006

Harry will be stationed near the southern port city of Basra and will likely be assigned to patrol the border with Iran.

London's Daily Telegraph said Harry, 22, is determined to go, despite reports of resistance from many in the military who fear he would be a fat prize for terrorists.

They're also worried he would attract attention and put his fellow soldiers in greater danger.

The Telegraph said officials are trying to figure out how to minimise the danger without giving Harry special treatment.

As a second lieutenant, he will have command of 11 men and four light tanks.

Meanwhile, the Prince has joined girlfriend Chelsy Davy, 21, and her family on Bazaruto Island, off Mozambique, for the third year running for a holiday courtesy of safari operator Charles Davy.

Harry has become increasingly close to the Zimbabwean-born tycoon, who has been widely criticised for his links to Robert Mugabe.

Mr Davy is one of the country's biggest landowners and is thought to control about 1 per cent of all agricultural land at a time when many white farmers are being brutally forced out of their livelihood.

Harry has refused to hear a word against him and has once more chosen to abandon the Royal Family's traditional New Year at Sandringham in favour of spending his holiday with the Davy clan.

Genghis Khan: Law And Order (LAT)

By Jack Weatherford

The Los Angeles Times, December 29, 2006

IN HIS FINAL televised speech to the Iraqi people in 2003, Saddam Hussein denounced the invading Americans as "the Mongols of this age," a reference to the last time infidels had conquered his country, in 1258. But the comparison isn't very apt — unlike the Mongols, the Americans don't have the organizational genius of Genghis Khan.

In the 13th century, Temujin — better known by his title, Genghis Khan ("world leader") — headed a tribal nation smaller than the workforce of Wal-Mart, yet he conquered and ruled more people than anyone in history. After Genghis Khan's death, his grandson, Hulegu, further expanded the empire, easily conquering most of the Middle East and achieving the Mongols' aim: the establishment of a trade corridor from Korea on the Pacific to Syria on the Mediterranean, one part of their goal of controlling the world.

So that every warrior knew his place within the struggle, Genghis Khan began each campaign with meetings to communicate to his approximately 100,000 soldiers where and why they would fight. The legal justification for the Mongol invasion of Iraq derived from the reluctance of the caliph of Baghdad to control the Shiite Cult of the Assassins, whom the Mongols accused of attempting to kill their khan.

The assassins operated from a series of fortified mountain camps spread from contemporary Afghanistan to Iraq, and the Baghdad invasion did not begin until the Mongols had eradicated the threat from the assassins and destroyed their fortresses. For the final attack on the caliph, the Mongols assembled a coalition of nations, and as their main army invaded Iraq in two columns from the east and the south, their allies approached from the north and west.

Genghis Khan recognized that victory came by conquering people, not land or cities. In contrast to the Americans in 2003, who sought to take the largest cities first in a campaign of shock and awe, the Mongols in 1258 took the smallest settlements first, gradually working toward the capital. Both the Mongols and the Americans used heavy bombardment to topple Baghdad, but whereas the Americans rushed into the capital in a triumphant victory celebration, the Mongols wisely decided not to enter the defeated — but still dangerous — city. They ordered the residents to evacuate, and then they sent in Christian and Muslim allies, who seethed with a variety of resentments against the caliph, to expunge any pockets of resistance and secure the capital. The Americans ended up as occupiers; the Mongols pulled strings, watching from camps in the countryside.

The Mongols also immediately executed the caliph and his sons on charges that they spent too much money on their palaces and not enough defending their nation. They killed most members of the court and administration. The Mongols took no prisoners and allowed no torture, but they executed swiftly and efficiently, including the soldiers of the defeated army who, they believed, would be a constant source of future problems if allowed to live. The first several months of a Mongol invasion were bloody, but once the takeover ended, the bloodshed ended.

By contrast, the American military campaign was quick, with comparatively few Iraqi (or coalition) casualties, but the bloodshed has continued for years. Constrained from decisively dispatching enemies of a new Iraq, the United States has allowed Iraqi terrorists to select who lives and who dies, including women and children, in a slow-motion massacre.

And while the violence continues, the U.S. can't come close to establishing a government that rivals what the Mongols achieved. They exercised a genius for speaking to people in terms that they understood. When conquering Muslims, Genghis

Khan always announced that Allah willed the Mongol victory as divine punishment; to resist the Mongols was to defy the will of God.

Just as the Mongols perfected the list of who to kill in a conquered land, they knew whom to reward and how to do it. In Baghdad, Hulegu installed a government under Ata Malik Juvaini, a devout Persian Muslim, who governed for most of the next 20 years and whose writings survive as some of the great scholarly works of the Muslim world.

The Mongols spared anyone with a craft, such as carpentry, writing, pottery, weaving or metal working. They fiercely enforced religious freedom, which created an essentially secular state. In Baghdad, they gave many of the caliph's palaces to Mongol allies for more practical uses. They lowered taxes for merchants and eliminated them for religious, medical and educational professionals. They educated women along with men. For all subjects, they instituted harsh laws enforced equally under nearly incorruptible officials.

Fundamentalist Muslims look back at Mongol secularism as a scourge. But, although U.S. rule in Iraq has produced a constant flow of refugees, particularly religious minorities, out of the country, under Mongol rule Christian, Muslim, Jewish and even Buddhist immigrants poured into the newly conquered Iraq to live under the Great Law of Genghis Khan. It was said that during this time a virgin could cross the length of the Mongol Empire with a pot of gold on her head and never be molested.

By the time of the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, the political achievements of the Mongols had been forgotten, and only the destructive fury of their wars was remembered. Yet under the Mongols — and the legacy of Genghis Khan — Iraq enjoyed a century of peace and a renaissance that brought the region to a level of prosperity and cultural sophistication higher than it enjoyed before or after. Any country with a bent for empire could do worse than learn from Genghis Khan.

Caesar: Diplomacy And Power (LAT)

By Adrian Goldsworthy

The Los Angeles Times, December 29, 2006

WHAT WOULD Julius Caesar do in Iraq? "He'd win" is the simplest answer. How he would do it is harder to say — after all, just how would a man like that behave in the modern world? We can never know, but his campaigns in Gaul give us a fair idea.

When Caesar led his legions into Gaul — basically present-day France and Belgium — in 58 BC, many of the tribes there greeted him as a liberator. Six years later, almost all of them rebelled against him in a war fought with appalling savagery. Through skill and luck, Caesar won. He then spent the better part of two years in painstaking diplomacy. As one of his own officers put it: "Caesar had one main aim, keeping the tribes friendly and giving them neither the opportunity nor cause for war." It worked, and Gaul remained at peace when he left in 49 BC.

From the start, Caesar backed his campaigns with concerted and highly personal diplomacy. He met the tribal leaders as a council at least once a year and visited them individually more often. The great rebellion in 52 BC was all the more surprising because it was led by chieftains who had done very well out of their alliance with Caesar. They had decided that they would do even better if the Romans were expelled. Allies, and especially those in an occupied country, may not necessarily have the same long-term ambitions.

Of course, Gaul in the 1st century BC was a very different place from Iraq today. The many mutually hostile tribes of Gaul, divided by language if not religion, had never been combined into a single nation. Caesar came as a conqueror, the agent of a blatantly imperialistic Roman Republic that had already occupied much of the Mediterranean world. There was no talk of creating a free democracy, still less of exit strategies. Gaul would remain part of Rome's empire for more than five centuries.

Caesar was effectively a free agent because there was no way that the Senate could have directed events from Rome when messages took weeks to reach Gaul. He also combined supreme civil and military power in his office as proconsul, so that he both devised and implemented political and military strategy. There was a single mind and purpose behind Roman policy in Gaul. Despite his power, Caesar couldn't lose and get away with it. Failure would have meant exile or death. Put simply, Caesar could not afford to consider withdrawal.

Even without 24-hour news and an international community watching his every move, Caesar was acutely aware of the need to win over public opinion. Each winter he produced an account of the year's campaign, designed to be read aloud and to thrill an audience of Romans. From the beginning, these were acknowledged as one of the highest expressions of the Latin language.

The Bush administration has been far less effective in selling the war to the U.S. public, and Tony Blair's government has made even more of a mess of winning over domestic opinion in Britain. More seriously, from the beginning there were major errors in strategy. The coalition forces have performed superbly, but too few troops were sent, especially because insufficient attention was paid to reconstructing Iraq.

When Caesar suffered one of his few defeats and lost 1 1/2 legions in the winter of 54-53 BC, his response was to replace them with twice as many men. The idea was to show that Roman resources and determination were inexhaustible.

Caesar knew that soldiers could only do so much and that lasting peace needed a political settlement. In Gaul, the tribes were left to govern themselves in their day-to-day affairs — that was the Roman way. In the long term, the leaders would be absorbed into Rome's aristocracy. In the short term, they had to be treated fairly and persuaded that accepting Roman rule was more attractive than resorting to violence.

At times, Caesar was ruthless in ways that would and should be utterly unacceptable to the United States and its allies. One prominent chieftain who displeased him died "resisting capture." Another was publicly flogged and beheaded without the formality of a trial. These were misjudgments and helped provoke the great rebellion in 52 BC. Other brutal warnings of the price of opposing Rome were more effective — the defenders of one captured town had their hands cut off. Caesar also launched attacks on neighboring Germans and Britons because he felt that they threatened the peace in Gaul. Today he would presumably be more ready than seems sensible to make similar strikes on Iran or Syria.

Caesar made mistakes in Gaul, and came very close to defeat, but he never doubted his ultimate success. This was not just a question of staying the course. Caesar was able to admit when he had made a mistake. He adapted, changed his plans to meet a situation and threw every resource — including his own massive energy — into achieving his aim. In a few years in Gaul, initial victory turned to apparent disaster, and that was turned into lasting success.

Caesar's experience shows how a seemingly desperate situation can be salvaged, but it does not suggest that this is easy, and there is a lot about his example we would not want to follow. The time it took for Caesar to turn the situation around in Gaul shifted the political balance in Rome hugely in favor of his bitterest opponents. Victorious in Gaul, he still saw his career threatened with extinction. He didn't hesitate. He left Gaul to make war on his own country. Mavericks like Caesar make effective war leaders — but can be dangerous if a state fails to control them.

Lincoln: Focus On The Real Foe (LAT)

By Harold Holzer

The Los Angeles Times, December 29, 2006

PRESIDENT BUSH has often cited Lincolnian resolve to justify staying the course in Iraq. He takes inspiration from the knowledge that Abraham Lincoln too endured failure, frustration and dissent, not to mention more American casualties on a single day at Antietam than we've lost in all four years in Iraq. Yet Lincoln still persuaded the North to persevere "until every drop of blood drawn with the lash, shall be paid by another drawn with the sword."

Such comparisons are not all inapt. Just as Bush widened (diluted?) the war against terrorism by invading Iraq, Lincoln broadened American goals mid-conflict. The war to save the Union became a war to end slavery. Both presidents sought increased powers at home. Lincoln not only imposed the military tribunals that Bush dreams about, he once allowed troops to shut down an unfriendly New York newspaper and imprison its editor. Bush has never gone that far — much as he might like to.

Nor did Lincoln seek preemptive war; it sought him. "You can have no conflict," he said at his first inaugural, "without being yourselves the aggressors." But when war "came," as he later put it, Lincoln proved far nimbler than Bush, quickly shifting course when necessary. As soon as the first 75,000 Union volunteers proved inadequate, he called for 300,000 more. When 90-day recruits went home, he ordered three-year service instead. When white soldiers alone could not win, he welcomed "colored" troops into the ranks. And when even this vast volunteer army could not restore the Union, Lincoln imposed the nation's first military draft.

Unlike Bush, who waited six years to remove Donald Rumsfeld, Lincoln jettisoned his first, failed secretary of war in just 10 months. He elevated and dismissed generals rapidly, even ruthlessly, until he found the right one in Ulysses S. Grant.

He even surpassed Bush when it came to finding weapons of mass destruction — albeit for his own use. He encouraged innovations such as rifled artillery and ironclad warships. The president famous for espousing "malice toward none" argued that the war could not be won with "elder-stalk squirts, charged with rose water." He wanted cities leveled, enemies destroyed.

Most important, Lincoln understood that "public sentiment is everything" (he said it in his first debate with Stephen Douglas). He was not only decider in chief but communicator in chief. In his brilliant speeches defining the nature of democracy and sacrifice — all widely published — Lincoln kept Americans informed and inspired.

So what might Lincoln do today?

First, focus on the real enemy: terrorists. When advisors suggested he start a war with England merely to woo patriotic Southerners back into the Union, Lincoln replied: "One war at a time." He also rejected adventurism against French-controlled Mexico. Today Lincoln would fight only the war that needs fighting.

Second, embrace flexibility. Seek the right generals, strategies, troop levels and weaponry, and be willing to change course and personnel swiftly.

Third, communicate objectives with frequency, passion and precision. No one can match Lincoln's eloquence, but no president should abandon Lincoln's commitment to engage the public.

Fourth, spend more time at the front. Lincoln visited the troops often, absorbing their pain and boosting their morale. Maybe his case was better, but his manner of symbolizing it was best.

Finally, abandon the notion of divine will to justify war. Even the pious Lincoln came to realize it was fruitless, even sacrilegious, to invoke God as his ally. "In great contests each party claims to act in accordance with the will of God," he lamented. "Both may be, and one must be, wrong." As Lincoln understood: "The Almighty has his own purposes."

Washington: The Crying Game (LAT)

By Joseph J. Ellis

The Los Angeles Times, December 29, 2006

IT'S A RIDICULOUS question: "What would George Washington do about Iraq?" Well, if you plopped him down in Baghdad, he would be utterly lost. He couldn't find Iraq on a map. Show him a cellphone, a helicopter or a Humvee and he wouldn't order them into action, he'd be mesmerized. He is simply unavailable for a conversation about Iraq.

But suppose you could contact him, and suppose you posed a question to him that never mentioned Iraq specifically yet described the fundamental strategic dilemma facing the United States. It might go like this:

"Can a powerful army sustain control over a widely dispersed foreign population that contains a militant minority prepared to resist subjugation at any cost?"

Washington would recognize the strategic problem immediately, because it is a description of the predicament facing the British army in the colonies' War for Independence.

And, more than anyone else, Washington's experience during the war as the leader of an American insurgency allowed him to appreciate the inherently intractable problems that faced an army of occupation in any protracted conflict.

Until the winter of 1777-78 at Valley Forge, Washington thought of the war against Britain as a contest between two armies. When the British army presented itself for battle, as it did on Long Island in the summer of 1776, Washington felt honor-bound to fight — a decision that proved calamitous on that occasion and nearly lost the war at the very start. That's because the British had a force of 32,000 men against his 12,000. If Washington had not changed his thinking, the American Revolution almost surely would have failed because the Continental Army was no match for the British leviathan.

But at Valley Forge, Washington began to grasp an elemental idea: Namely, he did not have to win the war. Time and space were on his side. And no matter how many battles the British army won, it could not sustain control over the countryside unless it was enlarged tenfold, at a cost that British voters would never support. Eventually the British would recognize that they faced an impossibly open-ended mission and would decide to abandon their North American empire. Which is exactly what happened.

The implications for U.S. policy in Iraq are reasonably clear, and they pretty much endorse the recommendations of the Baker-Hamilton Iraq Study Group. Like the British decision to subjugate the American colonies, the Bush decision to democratize Iraq has been misguided from the start. The administration never appreciated the odds against its success, and it disastrously confused conventional military superiority with the demands imposed on an army of occupation.

No man in American history understood those lessons better than Washington, who viewed them as manifestations of British imperial arrogance, which he described as "founded equally in Malice, absurdity, and error." If dropped into Baghdad, he would weep at our replication of the same imperial scenario.

Afghan Angry At Pakistan's Plan For Mines And Fence On Border (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Dec. 28 — President Hamid Karzai voiced strong opposition on Thursday to Pakistan's announcement that it would lay mines and erect fences along its border with Afghanistan. He said the moves would only hurt the people living in the region and would not stem cross-border terrorism.

"Thousands and thousands and thousands of people have been maimed and killed by mines," Mr. Karzai said in comments to journalists at the Presidential Palace, "and we are strongly against this idea. We are politically against it, and in humanitarian terms we are against it.

"Mines will not prevent terrorism crossing the border into Afghanistan, or militants who come and kill our people. Laying mines or fencing the border will only separate people and families from each other. Rather than helping, it will cause people difficulty in movement in trade and meeting each other."

Mr. Karzai has for months been accusing Pakistan of being a source of terrorism and of providing a haven to insurgent groups that, he says, recruit, organize and train fighters and suicide bombers who are then sent into Afghanistan.

"If we want to prevent terrorism as a whole, forever eradicate them and defeat them," he said, "then you must remove their sanctuaries, then you must remove the places they are being trained, their sources of finance, equipment and training. That is the best way."

Pakistan has denied the existence of training camps and the presence of Taliban or insurgent groups on its side of the border.

The Pakistani government has also deployed more than 80,000 soldiers in its border provinces to try to stem cross-border infiltration, and has now started to mine and fence the border to seal it more effectively, Riaz Mohammed Khan, the foreign secretary, said Tuesday at a briefing in Islamabad, the capital.

The border, known as the Durand Line, for a British official who demarcated the boundary between Afghanistan and British India, has never been recognized by Afghanistan and remains contested at many points along its 1,500-mile length. It cuts through mountains and divides tribes and extended families of the region, many of them ethnic Pashtun like Mr. Karzai.

"The same families are living on this side and on that side," he said. "It is only going to prevent movement by civilian families and tribes."

Cut-and-Run Is Not In Their Vocabulary (WSJ)

By Daniel Henninger

The Wall Street Journal, December 29, 2006

If someone this weekend says "Happy New Year" in Iraq or Afghanistan, would anyone in the world hear it? For many, the people of Iraq and Afghanistan have become like trees falling in an empty forest. The world doesn't want to hear it. Indeed, the one apparent accomplishment of the Baker-Hamilton report is that it freed people to say that Iraq is a "failure." Afghanistan, with fewer suicide bombings, never became much of a story in our domestic political wars, and so has largely receded into the mists.

It is ironic that despite the years of our daily engagement in these places, the "information age" has brought us so little knowledge about the people of Iraq and Afghanistan. Psychologically, much of America has already cut and run from these two countries.

Some Americans, though, simply won't.

In April 2004, this column told the story of Spirit of America, organized by Jim Hake, to provide citizen-supported aid to the troops serving in Iraq and Afghanistan. Then in May 2005 this space was given over to an account of American businesswomen working to help women in post-Taliban Afghanistan.

Here in the U.S., the political new year will fill up fast enough with politicians and pundits offering ways to unwind and spindle the commitments America made to Iraq and Afghanistan. So this seemed a good moment to revisit the folks running Spirit of America and the Business Council for Peace. They're not going to leave.

Spirit of America's experience in Iraq has followed the same rugged timeline of events as the war. Recall that in April 2004 it raised sufficient monies to rebuild TV stations in Al Anbar province, staffed by Iraqis, to counterbalance propaganda from the likes of al-Jazeera. Those TV stations were built. And they have been destroyed. A sewing center for Iraqi women was similarly destroyed.

This past year, the group got a request from the Army 451st Battalion to help restore the medical facilities at the Najaf Teaching Hospital. The Mahdi militia had occupied it for a time. Spirit of America sent seven cardiac monitors to the hospital's director, Safaa Hamedi. In October, gunmen killed Dr. Hamedi outside his home.

Still, requests from the Marines and Army continue to arrive at Spirit of America. An Army captain in Afghanistan's Parwan province asked for medical textbooks for local doctors. SoA sent bee serum to inoculate honeybees at a business in Iraq's Diyala region. Marine Lt. Jim Wilmott got camping equipment for 200 Iraqi Boy Scouts. At the request of U.S. Embassy personnel, SoA has sent clothing and school supplies for orphans in Baghdad and Basra. They've sent thousands of kids' backpacks and school supplies requested by soldiers around the country. With the SonoSite ultrasound company, SoA delivered handheld ultrasound machines to the primary hospital in Al Qaim, Iraq, near the Syrian border. "Before this," said Mr. Hake, "they were using sea shells to listen to the sounds of a pregnant mother and baby; the Marines couldn't believe it."

Jim Hake says Spirit of America's contributions have fallen off since 2004 owing to general fatigue with Iraq, "but under the circumstances people continue to be quite generous." An end-of-the-year funding request raised more than $150,000. "The emails we send to donors are not a good-news operation," says Mr. Hake. "We don't want to put a happy face on it. But the information is more encouraging than what they typically hear. The destroyed projects are hardly good news, but there are lots of guys and gals in the military there who are not just marking time, who want to see this work." * * *

It was about 19 months ago to the day that 13 women from Afghanistan were looking out the windows of the 29th floor of the Empire State Building in midtown Manhattan, brought there by a group of American businesswomen who call themselves the Business Council for Peace (Bpeace). One of the women remarked that New York looked "very new." The idea was to expose the Afghans, most of them college graduates, to basic business know-how. Bpeace had identified the Afghans as "fast runners," women with entrepreneurial instincts. Kate Bruggeln, a Council member and retailing specialist, just returned from Kabul, her fourth trip there. Three other Bpeace women were with her.

"These trips to Afghanistan always stagger you in the best way," she said this week. "Afghanistan is a longer road than our election cycle can endure, but these women are the future of Afghanistan. This isn't a replay of the last decade. Our group's been working with them for almost two years. They are making progress."

The big event on this trip was the preparations to open Rangeen Kaman Artisans, a for-profit cooperative run by 10 of the Bpeace "associates." Another associate, Afifa, has opened a fitness center for women; it shares electrical power with the RKA store. The Americans are also working with the Afghan Women's Business Federation to create a business-formation curriculum across the country.

"The thing Afghans fear most is that we're going to leave," Ms. Brugelln says. "Not only do they fear it, they predict it, because everyone has done it before. This fourth trip by our group was profoundly meaningful to them. In the face of all the instability, we showed up again. Bpeace won't be part of the downward spiral."

Could this determination be a variant of the much-mocked "stay the course"? It is at least an interesting irony that the people who have had their faces deepest in Iraq and Afghanistan the longest, as soldiers or volunteers like these, are the ones inclined to stick it out; while many here whose experience comes off the bloody front page every day are the ones looking for a way to -- there is no other phrase -- cut and run.

Groups such as the Spirit of America and the Business Council for Peace may yet be driven out. It is to this country's credit that early on, they voted with their feet to go in, and regret nothing.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Apple Probe Finds Jobs Was Aware Of Some Grants (WSJ)

By Steve Goldstein

The Wall Street Journal, December 29, 2006

Apple Computer Inc. said in a filing to the Securities and Exchange Commission that CEO Steve Jobs was aware or recommended the selection of some favorable stock-option grant dates, but didn't personally benefit from it.

FOCUS ON JOBS

From company filings made this morning:

Although the investigation found that CEO Steve Jobs was aware or recommended the selection of some favorable grant dates, he did not receive or financially benefit from these grants or appreciate the accounting implications. The Special Committee also found that the investigation had raised serious concerns regarding the actions of two former officers in connection with the accounting, recording and reporting of stock option grants. Read more1.

In a delayed annual filing made with the SEC, the company said a special committee of the board of directors appointed to look into past stock-option grants concluded that while Mr. Jobs was "aware or recommended the selection of some favorable grant dates, he did not receive or financially benefit from these grants or appreciate the accounting implications." (See details of Apple's filing2.)

"The special committee, its independent counsel and forensic accountants have performed an exhaustive investigation of Apple's stock option granting practices," former Vice President Al Gore, chair of the special committee, and Jerome York, chair of Apple's Audit and Finance Committee, said in a joint statement. "The board of directors is confident that the company has corrected the problems that led to the restatement, and it has complete confidence in Steve Jobs and the senior management team."

The special committee of Cupertino, Calif.-based company also found that the investigation had raised serious concerns regarding the actions of two former officers in connection with the accounting, recording and reporting of stock-option grants.

Apple is also restating financial statements from 2004-2006. In total, Apple is restating earnings after tax by $4 million in 2006, $7 million in 2005 and $10 million in 2004. The company also plans to take an $84 million noncash charge as a result.

The filing was widely anticipated. The company revealed in June that some stock options awarded to employees might have been mishandled. It launched an investigation that found accounting irregularities between 1997 and 2002 and showed that Mr. Jobs was aware of some options backdating. In August, the company said it would likely have to restate past financial results.

• Options Scorecard: Companies under scrutiny3

• Perfect Payday: Complete coverage4

The three-month probe identified a number of grants for which grant dates were intentionally selected in order to obtain favorable exercise prices, the company said. Of 42,077 stock-option grants made on 259 dates between October 1996 and January 2003, 6,428 grants on 42 dates are not the proper measurement dates. And of two option grants awarded to Mr. Jobs, one was improperly dated Oct. 19, 2001, with an exercise price of $18.03, instead of the correct date of Dec. 18, when Apple was trading at $21.01. That stock-option grant was for 7.5 million shares. The SEC and the U.S. Attorney's Office have been informed of the results of its probe, Apple said.

Apple Filing To Tell All On Options (NYT)

By John Markoff And Miguel Helft

DOJ_NMG_0110044

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Dec. 28 — Apple Computer and its charismatic chief executive, Steven P. Jobs, are expected to make a big announcement about a new product at the Macworld conference next month. Before that, however, the company has some other highly anticipated information to share.

The company is likely to answer questions about backdated options granted to Mr. Jobs and other executives in a delayed annual report that Apple said it would file with securities regulators on Friday.

Apple is among dozens of companies, many of them in Silicon Valley, which have come under scrutiny for assigning favorable grant dates to stock options to inflate their value.

So far, Apple, which is known for obsessively guarding information about new products, appears to have applied the same secrecy to its handling of the stock option issues. Publicly, it has confined its response to a few terse statements. This week it continued to maintain its silence as reports about possible falsified documents rattled shareholders.

"What we want a company to do is to get good information in the marketplace as soon as it has that information," said Patrick McGurn, executive vice president of Institutional Shareholder Services, which advises its clients on corporate governance issues. "Obviously the information has dribbled in fits and starts out of Apple. It has been more of a piecemeal approach."

But Mr. McGurn noted that Apple faced unique challenges.

"Apple is in a much more difficult position than other companies in the backdating morass, because a significant portion of its market valuation is based on Steve Jobs staying at his job," he said.

The company has said that Mr. Jobs knew of some backdated grants, but that he did not knowingly receive any of them and had not benefited from the practice.

As part of its annual report, the company will most likely say more about the findings of a three-month investigation it commissioned to look into its accounting for stock options. One former Securities and Exchange Commission official said that if Mr. Jobs signs the document, as he is required to do under Sarbanes-Oxley, and Apple's auditors endorse that signature, it would indicate that the auditors feel he is not in jeopardy.

"The fact that the auditors would accept the Jobs certification reflects that they were satisfied that the internal investigation had been thorough and that the results of the internal report could be relied upon," said Michael D. Mann, a partner at the New York law firm of Richards Kibbe & Orbe and a former director of the Office of International Affairs at the S.E.C.

Apple's auditor, KPMG, has been trying to avoid controversy since it reached a deferred-prosecution agreement with the Justice Department last year in a case involving illegal tax shelters. Analysts said that would lead the firm to be particularly vigilant in its auditing of options cases.

James D. Cox, a professor of corporate and securities law at Duke University, said the report could still contain some unpleasant surprises. "The mere fact that he is producing a report with his signature doesn't mean the report doesn't contain damning information," Professor Cox said. "Assuming the report identifies false documents, does it make clear statements as to who is responsible and, equally, as to who is not responsible, and why?"

The options issues at Apple, which the company first disclosed in June, came back into the spotlight this week when The Recorder, a San Francisco newspaper owned by American Lawyer Media, reported that the investigation conducted by a law firm on Apple's behalf had found that options documents had been falsified to increase the value of grants to Apple executives.

On Thursday, The Financial Times reported that investigators had discovered an options grant to Mr. Jobs that had not been properly authorized by the company's board.

The two reports, which did not name sources, sent shares of Apple on a roller-coaster ride. The shares declined 65 cents, to $80.87 on Thursday, and are down 1.6 percent for the week after falling as low as $76.77 on Wednesday.

A spokesman for Apple, Steve Dowling, said the company planned to meet its target for filing the report, and declined to comment further. "We're providing all details to the S.E.C. and not commenting," Mr. Dowling said.

In an e-mail message, a spokesman for the United States attorney's office in San Francisco, which in July created a special joint task force with the Federal Bureau of Investigation to investigate stock option backdating, declined to comment.

After the review of its options accounting practices, Apple said in October that while there had been 15 instances of backdating, the review had found no misconduct by any member of Apple's current management team.

The language of Apple's statement, coupled with the simultaneous resignation from the board of Fred D. Anderson, the company's former chief financial officer, led analysts to believe that Apple and Mr. Jobs were attempting to distance themselves from any blame in the case.

Analysts have also focused on the possible role of Nancy Heinen, Apple's former general counsel, in the options grants. Ms. Heinen left the company without a public announcement in May and declined to comment on the reason for her departure.

Both Ms. Heinen and Mr. Anderson have retained their own lawyers.

"Nancy Heinen has a well-earned reputation over 20 years for honesty and integrity, and any rumors to the contrary are without foundation," said Cristina C. Arguedas, Ms. Heinen's lawyer.

Mr. Anderson's lawyer did not return calls, but an associate of Mr. Anderson's who declined to be identified because of the complexity of the legal situation, said that because of the way the options granting process worked at Apple, it was unlikely that Mr. Anderson would have been in a position to alter option dates.

Although he resigned from the job of chief financial officer in 2004 and went on to help found Elevation Partners, a private equity firm, Mr. Anderson spent time at Apple this year reviewing the options matters before resigning from the board.

Gene Munster, an analyst with Piper Jaffray who follows Apple, said he did not expect the investigations into Apple's options practices to implicate Mr. Jobs, who he said had not historically been involved in compensation issues.

"Everything we know about Apple is that the compensation side is not something Jobs has ever been involved in," Mr. Munster said. "The key thing, and the only thing Wall Street cares about, is whether Jobs will be impacted, and we don't believe he will be." Piper Jaffray has an outperform rating on Apple stock.

In a research note on Wednesday, Benjamin Reitzes, an analyst at UBS Investment Research, said there was little to fear.

"Investors seem to be reacting to the mention of Steve Jobs," Mr. Reitzes wrote. "We believe it could make sense to obtain counsel given his immense personal fortune and influence."

Jobs Possibly A Part Of Apple Options Inquiry (AP)

By May Wong, THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, December 29, 2006

SAN JOSE, Calif. -- Shares of Apple Computer Inc. had another wild ride Thursday after new details of a federal investigation into the company's stock options practices raised questions about the role played by its charismatic chief exedutive, Steve Jobs.

Shares of the iPod and Macintosh computer maker closed at $80.87, down 65 cents, or less than 1 percent, after falling more than 2 percent during the day. On Wednesday, shares slid 5 percent before rebounding.

Citing unnamed people familiar with the matter, the Financial Times reported that Jobs received 7.5 million stock options in 2001 without the required board authorization and that documents were later falsified to indicate otherwise.

The Securities and Exchange Commission is looking at those documents among other evidence in its review of Apple's backdating of stock options, the British newspaper said.

"It does create a certain amount of doubt as to whether Steve Jobs can stay with the company," Rob Enderle of the research firm Enderle Group said Thursday. "It looks more and more serious."

Backdating is the manipulation of the timing of stock options to bolster the profits of executives and employees. Apple is among nearly 200 companies ensnared in the scandal and that have disclosed SEC, Justice Department or internal investigations.

In June Apple began an internal review of its grants, including one to Jobs. Apple said in October that it found 15 misdated grants from 1997 to 2002. The Recorder, a San Francisco-based legal newspaper, first reported Wednesday on the discovery of possibly falsified documents related to options.

Full details of Apple's options troubles have yet to emerge, but the Cupertino, Calif.-based company largely exonerated Jobs in October when it said an internal investigation had not found any misconduct by current management. The investigation did raise serious questions, however, about two former officers, the company said.

Experts who would speak only generally without any facts about the Apple imbroglio say that if Jobs knew about the falsification of documents, he could be in trouble.

"Any CEO that has falsified documents and filed or certified false statements made to investors and the SEC will put themselves in the cross hairs of law enforcement agencies," Lynn Turner, a former SEC chief accountant, said in an e-mail.

But even if Jobs was aware, proving it would be a challenge, said Dennis Codon, a lawyer at Robins, Kaplan, Miller & Ciresi LLP in Los Angeles.

Jobs later surrendered those options without exercising them and realized no financial benefit.

Faking documents to make it look like a meeting occurred to support backdating has happened in corporate America and is not a surprise, said Codon, whose office aids companies in crisis management.

At the same time, the falsification of records could have been done by others without an executive's knowledge, he said.

Codon said he knows of top executives who truly were unaware of some of the accounting implications in backdating, which Apple said in October was the case for Jobs.

"I could see how a chairman would not have a clue," Codon said. "I'm not convinced Jobs is in trouble, but he could be if he knew and participated in putting that situation together."

SEC spokesman John Heine, and Luke Macauley, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in the Northern District of California, which created a stock-options task force in July, both declined to comment.

Financial analysts have largely shrugged off the reports, seeing little impact as long as Jobs, Apple's iconic co-founder and CEO, remained unscathed.

Apple's 2006 Report Could Hold Clues In Options Scandal (SFC)

By Jessica Guynn, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, December 29, 2006

Rarely before in the business world has the filing of a company's annual report been as widely anticipated as the one Apple Computer Inc. is expected to submit today amid a deepening stock options scandal that has raised questions about CEO Steve Jobs.

Apple was rocked this week by reports of forged documents connected with an award Jobs received in 2001 of millions of options to buy Apple stock. What happens to Jobs, one of the technology world's commanding figures, could depend on what he knew about options problems at Apple and when he knew it.

Apple watchers will pore over Apple's filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission in search of assurances that Jobs had no direct involvement in any stock-options shenanigans.

Jobs holds an unusual place in corporate America. He is more cult than corporate leader, credited with creating must-have products and reinvigorating the Cupertino maker of iPods and Macintosh.

"Steve is a one-man revolution," said longtime Silicon Valley watcher Paul Saffo. "He is not your average money-grubbing, hired gun corporate CEO. There is probably no one out there other than Bill Gates and the folks (at Microsoft) who want to see him distracted from his job."

But Jobs and his company have been plunged into scandal in recent months after disclosures that Apple may have improperly granted stock options to Jobs and other executives.

Apple spokesman Steve Dowling declined to comment except to say that Apple is providing "all details" of its internal investigation of the matter to the SEC. Federal prosecutors are reportedly also looking at possible wrongdoing in Apple's options program.

As many as 200 U.S. companies have been tarred with similar revelations of misconduct in reporting options granted to executives and other employees. Many of those companies have been forced to restate financial results. Well-known executives in technology and other sectors have resigned because of improper conduct related to options. At two companies, officers have been criminally indicted.

But none of the companies affected so far has such a famous name or plays such a central role in the technology world as Apple Computer and its storied CEO. That has raised the stakes of corporate America's options scandal, bringing it to the highest level of Silicon Valley.

Stock options are a form of compensation commonly used in the technology industry in which the option to buy shares of stock at a predetermined price are granted to an employee. The recipient can later exercise the options, usually after a minimum waiting period, after the stock has increased in value. Companies can backdate options as long as they disclose the practice and properly account for it, which many companies fail to do.

Apple's scandal took a potentially dangerous turn this week when the Financial Times reported that Jobs received 7.5 million stock options in November 2001 even though Apple's board of directors did not give the required approval until December, suggesting the options were backdated and documents forged. Jobs later surrendered the options without exercising them.

"That is the kind of thing that gets the government's attention," said former Colorado U.S. Attorney William Leone, who now has a private practice in Denver.

Apple may disclose more details surrounding the 2001 options grant to Jobs in its filings today, which is also expected to restate its financial results from previous years.

The company has not made any public comment since October when it released a statement summarizing the key findings of a three-month internal investigation which cleared of wrongdoing all current management, including Jobs. The October statement also contained a public apology from Jobs "for these problems which happened on my watch."

Uncertainty shrouding his future has raised pressure on Apple even as the company gains market share in personal computers, dominates the music and video player market, and releases new software for photos, movies and music. The company is also preparing for Macworld Expo, its annual event next month in San Francisco to showcase new products, one of which may be the long-anticipated release of a cell phone. Jobs always takes center stage at Macworld.

Analysts already are turning their attention to next month's event. They generally shrug off the possibility that Jobs will be swept up in the stock-options scandal. They are not expecting any major bombshells to jeopardize Jobs' position.

"Our contention is that, as long as Jobs is not implicated, either in the filings or by government actions -- which seems like the likely outcome based on current public documents -- then the issue will pass without significant or any lasting consequence to the stock," Bank of America analyst Keith Bachman wrote.

Apple launched its internal investigation, led by a special committee of board members, after management discovered irregularities in how options were granted between 1997 and 2002. The investigation took three months, examined more than 650,000 e-mails and documents, and conducted interviews with more than 40 current and former employees, directors and advisers.

In October, Apple announced that the investigation found several instances where options appeared to have been granted before the grants were approved. That raised concerns that the options were backdated to a day when the stock was trading at a lower price, potentially boosting the windfall for executives.

Apple took pains to distance Jobs from the controversy, saying that, in some cases, Jobs was aware of the practice, but that he was unaware of the accounting implications and did not personally benefit. Apple did say the investigation "raised serious concerns" about the actions of two former officers whom the company did not identify.

Apple has attempted to shield Jobs from the scandal because he is its most valuable asset. An Apple co-founder, Jobs left the company in the mid-1980s but returned a decade later to lift its fortunes to new heights.

Pixar Is Also Subject Of Probe (FT)

By Chris Nuttall In San Francisco

Financial Times, December 29, 2006

Another company founded by Steve Jobs - Pixar, the animation studio - is also being investigated by the SEC over stock option awards but Mr Jobs never received any options himself.

Walt Disney, which acquired the company in May, said last month that its board was carrying out an independent review of stock option practices at Pixar after receiving inquiries from the SEC and Justice Department, although it played down any likely financial impact from the issue.

Richard Farmer, Merrill Lynch analyst, in a research report earlier this year into whether Steve Jobs might have been involved in options regularities, said: "Our review of Pixar disclosures does not allow us to rule out the possibility, given Jobs was a member of the board that made options decisions, and our analysis suggests these may contain irregularities."

His research found that, between 1997 and 2004, four out of seven awards were recorded at the lowest possible price in the fiscal years they were granted - with the odds of this happening by chance being 112m to one.

Pixar's compensation committee did not meet between 1997 and 2004 but acted by written consent in two of those years, according to proxy filings.

Pay Packages Allow Executives To Jump Ship With Less Risk (NYT)

It's called the "golden hello."

For a chief executive of a large corporation, it is the one thing — more than the corporate jet or any other perk — that must be guaranteed before the executive will move to run another company.

W. James McNerney Jr., a former superstar manager at General Electric, received not one, but two such deals in recent years, worth tens of millions of dollars. In each deal, he was given any bonuses, stock options, restricted stock and pension benefits that he would have abandoned by leaving his previous employer.

Such golden hello payments are intended to make the executive "whole" — in essence to treat the executive as if his career were one smooth ascent with no costly interruptions. And these multimillion-dollar payments and perks are used to draw in not only chief executives, but virtually every member of the executive suite. If "golden parachutes" — rich exit packages of extra cash, stock or retirement benefits — are needed at times to kick out chief executives, golden hellos are increasingly needed to get them in the door.

The career path of Mr. McNerney illustrates the phenomenon. In late 2000, after losing out in the race to become chief executive at G.E., Mr. McNerney jumped to 3M, where he received a pay package worth more than $34 million in guaranteed salary, bonus, option grants and restricted stock to make up for what he left behind at G.E., according to an analysis by Equilar, a compensation research company in San Mateo, Calif.

Five years later, in the summer of 2005, Boeing, which had been rocked by scandals, was on the hunt for a squeaky-clean chief executive. It offered Mr. McNerney, who was a director on its board, a pay package worth more than $52 million, which included $25.3 million of restricted shares and $22 million to replace his 3M pension. A Boeing spokesman said that Mr. McNerney's compensation was in line with that of other chief executives.

Such golden hellos are not new, but lawyers representing executives at the negotiating table are constantly coming up with quirky ways to make clients whole. Matching salaries, guaranteed bonuses and millions of dollars in stock options are typical. On top of that, chief executives are made whole on lucrative pension benefits, often being credited at the new company for years of service elsewhere — a perk rarely available to nonexecutive employees.

These days, though, some executives are demanding that companies make up losses they may face from the sale of a home if they relocate, or that they receive price protection on losses they might incur in stock they own in the company they are leaving.

The problem with make-whole payments, critics say, is that they have become so common and widespread that lesser-known chief executives from smaller companies can demand multimillion-dollar foundations on which other benefits and perks are layered.

The existence of the golden hello undermines the very reason stock options and executive pensions are offered in the first place — to encourage executives to hit performance targets and then to stick around to receive the full value of their compensation package.

"The whole rationale for giving larger bonuses and larger payouts to executives is that their total pay package is supposed to be riskier than that of the average worker," says Eleanor Bloxham, president of the Value Alliance, a group that advises companies on corporate governance. "What's happening with these make-whole packages is that they have no relationship with performance at the new company. You're paying people, really, a guaranteed bonus or, in fact, a guaranteed everything."

At most companies, the stock options and restricted stock typically awarded to executives are tied to performance targets or, at the very least, require many years of service to vest. They are not sure things, particularly stock options, as they may take years to vest and could be worthless if the company's stock falls or the chief executive fails to hit major performance targets.

Yet, an executive who jumps ship can virtually guarantee a multimillion-dollar payout by the new company. While new chief executives these days are typically not given huge cash payouts as soon as they walk through the door, they usually are awarded the value of the pay package they left behind simply by sticking around for three to five years, executive pay watchdogs note.

Furthermore, the huge pension benefit packages and other retirement perks that chief executives are demanding come at a time when many corporations are severely reducing pension benefits for employees. While top executives are credited for years of service they did not work in order to more rapidly vest their supplemental executive retirement plans, or SERPs, employees of several large corporations have seen their traditional defined-benefit plans frozen or sharply reduced this year in favor of less-generous 401(k) plans that do not offer the same guaranteed payouts.

At Boeing, efforts are under way to move more employees out of defined-benefit plans and into defined-contribution plans, says Charles Bofferding, the executive director at the Society of Professional Engineering Employees in Aerospace, the union that represents 21,000 Boeing employees.

"They're doing that to everyone but the big dogs, who continue to get defined-benefit plans," Mr. Bofferding said. "When you have a different set of principles for the top people versus the rest of the employees, it undermines the top people's moral authority to lead."

Executive recruiters, compensation lawyers and analysts argue, however, that even companies that are reducing benefits to their work forces must offer golden hellos and other perks simply to compete for the limited pool of top-tier chief executive talent in the marketplace. For instance, Boeing, like so many companies that wind up paying big price tags for chief executives, was in desperate need of an outsider with a stellar reputation to earn back the trust of shareholders and Wall Street. In addition, Boeing was concerned about government investigators.

In 2003, the chief executive, Philip M. Condit, resigned in the wake of an investigation into Pentagon contracts. His successor, Harry C. Stonecipher, was forced out in March 2005 for having an affair with a female executive.

At 3M, Mr. McNerney was turning in a stellar performance and cashing in on the stock options he had been granted since joining the company. In the six months before he jumped over to Boeing, Mr. McNerney exercised more than 2.1 million stock options for gains of more than $32.3 million, according to Equilar. Also, about 40 percent of Mr. McNerney's restricted stock had vested, as well as about half of his $22 million pension.

To match what Mr. McNerney was leaving behind at 3M, Boeing's board offered him $25.2 million worth of restricted shares that vest in three-, five- and six-year increments, as well as the equivalent of full funding of his entire 3M pension, although he needs to remain at Boeing for five years to be eligible for it.

But McNerney's pension could grow even bigger. A clause in his contract says that his pension will be based on the three consecutive years within the 10 years before leaving Boeing when he received the highest pay, whether that occurred at Boeing, at 3M or even General Electric.

"Boeing has gone further into territory that even I have not seen before," says Paul Hodgson, a senior research associate at the Corporate Library, an institutional advisory firm in Portland, Me. "Boeing shareholders are being asked to fund a pension potentially based on what 3M and G.E. paid McNerney, rather than what they themselves paid him. Such an arrangement would seem to take inappropriate to a new level."

John Dern, a spokesman for Boeing, said: "Jim McNerney's compensation is generally equivalent to what he was receiving at his previous company and in keeping with compensation practices at other large companies. It recognizes the value that he brings to Boeing and the company's performance has borne that out."

For shareholders, the high price Boeing paid to lure Mr. McNerney has yielded results. He has moved to put many of Boeing's ethical lapses behind it: the company agreed this summer with federal prosecutors in California and Virginia to pay $615 million to settle allegations concerning use of competitors' information to bid on government contracts, and improper conduct in the hiring of a former government procurement officer.

Operationally, the company is beating its archrival, Airbus, in airplane orders this year. Its stock has soared 44 percent since Mr. McNerney got the job, compared with an 18 percent gain by the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index.

"I'm fine with McNerney's pay from a shareholder perspective," said Don Delves, a Chicago-based corporate governance and executive pay consultant. "I'm a shareholder at Boeing and we've been through a tumultuous time. Yeah, McNerney is expensive, but we're getting one of the top three people in the horse race to replace Jack Welch at G.E."

Yet even less-well-known chief executives are getting perks to make up for what they had in their previous jobs.

For instance, after ousting Carleton S. Fiorina as chief executive in 2005, Hewlett-Packard's board turned to Mark V. Hurd, a little-known executive at NCR, to replace her.

Mr. Hurd, who had already exercised stock options at NCR in 2005 worth $14.7 million, received a $2 million signing bonus; relocation benefits worth $2.7 million; 450,000 stock option shares worth $2.4 million; and 400,000 restricted shares worth about $8.1 million, according to Equilar.

But Mr. Hurd's employment agreement included an interesting twist. If NCR's stock fell by any amount up to 20 percent within 90 days of Mr. Hurd's leaving the company, Hewlett-Packard agreed to reimburse him for the losses he would have incurred on the 850,000 shares of NCR stock he still held. Hewlett-Packard said it paid Mr. Hurd a little more than $5 million for his losses in NCR stock.

"This isn't inside the norm," said Jack Dolmat-Connell, a compensation adviser in Waltham, Mass. "But because he knew he was leaving, that was probably considered inside information, so he actually could not do anything with those shares."

Executives are not only getting price protection on stock, but they are also demanding price protection on the sale of homes if they have to relocate.

Take Robert H. Swan, who joined eBay in March as its chief financial officer. Several months after leaving his post as finance chief of Electronic Data Systems, Mr. Swan was granted a supplemental relocation benefit by eBay's board "in light of the condition of the Plano, Texas, residential real estate market," according to a regulatory filing.

If Mr. Swan's Texas home sold for less than $3 million, the company would pay the difference, up to $700,000. (While Texas records indicate the home was sold in late August, the state does not make residential price information public.)

A spokeswoman for eBay said details of any payment made to Mr. Swan for his home would be made public when the company files its proxy next year.

GE Accedes To More Disclosure On Pay Advice (WSJ)

By Kaja Whitehouse

The Wall Street Journal, December 29, 2006

General Electric Co., agreeing to an effort by some investors to increase scrutiny on executive pay, will disclose more information on the advice it gets from compensation consultants.

The Fairfield, Conn., conglomerate agreed to go beyond regulatory requirements and disclose any business ties it may have with the firms that advise it on how to pay its top executives.

Under new Securities and Exchange Commission rules put in place this year, companies will be required to disclose in public filings the name of their compensation consultants, but not their other business relationships.

In 2006, GE's board of directors used the services of New York compensation consulting firm Frederic W. Cook & Co., which also advises the company's human resources on its broader pay programs, said Peter O'Toole, a GE spokesman. The company will make this information available in its coming proxy statement, he said.

"They provide us with limited intelligence on compensation trends and each year we participate in their long-term incentive survey," said Mr. O'Toole. "We have a very limited engagement with them," he said.

A Cook spokesman said the firm provides additional work for a company only with consent of the chairman of the board's compensation committee.

News of GE's additional disclosure was reported yesterday by Bloomberg News.

In October, a group of 13 institutional investors sent a joint letter to the 25 largest companies in the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index, including GE, seeking this information. In addition to helping the board of directors hammer out pay for top executives, consulting firms can also be hired by management for other work, such as crafting the benefits plan for rank-and-file workers. The shareholders worry consultants may be reluctant to provide objective advice on executive pay if they rely on management's approval to win other business at the company.

"It is critical...that a compensation consultant be free of any conflict of interest, perceived or actual," said the Oct. 23 letter signed by shareholders representing $850 billion in assets, including London money manager F&C Asset Management, the Connecticut Treasurer's Office and union group AFL-CIO.

The group of 13 shareholders plans to announce Tuesday the results of their letter campaign, said Bernard Kavaler, spokesman for Connecticut Treasurer Denise L. Nappier. The shareholders may submit proposals asking investors to vote in favor of such disclosure if companies don't volunteer to make the information public, Mr. Kavaler said.

It isn't clear whether other companies have agreed to the measure. Others approached include Hewlett-Packard Co., Exxon Mobil Corp., Morgan Stanley, Wal-Mart Stores Inc., Pfizer Inc. and Home Depot Inc. None of these companies was available for comment.

Two-thirds of the 25 companies have responded to the letter, said Mr. Kavaler, who didn't specify how many will make the information available next year.

The shareholders behind the letter have likened such ties to when auditing firms provided consulting work for the companies they were auditing -- a situation some critics have said made accounting scandals like those at Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc. more likely.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Domestic-Partner Violence In U.S. Fell Sharply (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

Domestic violence rates in the United States dropped sharply between 1993 and 2004 but showed recent signs of a rebound, the Justice Department reported yesterday.

The number of domestic homicides fell 32 percent from 1993 to 2004, and the frequency of nonfatal violence between domestic partners dropped by more than 50 percent, from 5.8 attacks per 1,000 U.S. residents age 12 or older, to 2.6 attacks, according to the Bureau of Justice Statistics.

Men benefited from the decline more than women, and black victims more than white women. The number of women killed by current or former partners fell from 1,572 in 1993 to 1,159 in 2004, or 26 percent. The number of men killed dropped from 698 to 385, or 45 percent.

"The best news overall is that 'intimate partner violence' has declined since 1993, but there's still too much of it," said bureau statistician Shannan M. Catalano, author of the Justice Department online report. The report did not address violence among other household members or relatives.

Noting that current or former partners account for 22 percent of violence against women, but 3 percent of violence against men, Catalano said, "It still is a crime against women. . . . Women are more often victimized by someone they know. Men are more often victimized by strangers."

The report did not offer an explanation for the trend, but experts said it continued a decline in domestic violence recorded since 1976 and mirrored a drop in violent crime overall in the past decade.

Other theories credit increased policing, neighborhood-watch and victim-assistance programs, and awareness raised by the 1994 Violence Against Women Act.

Analysts worry that declines may have bottomed out, however. Although overall rates remained unchanged between 2003 and 2004, violence against black women and white men increased slightly.

"The crime rates have kind of flattened out in the past couple of years. That could be of some concern," said Michael R. Rand, chief of victimization statistics for the bureau.

On average, 18.2 of 1,000 American Indian and native Alaskan women were victimized a year, nearly three times the rate among white women and twice the rate among black women. The least violence was reported against Asian men, white men and people age 50 and older.

Justice Department report covering 1993-2004 notes racial disparities

WASHINGTON - Domestic violence rates fell sharply between 1993 and 2004, the Justice Department said Thursday, noting that American Indian women and native Alaskan women are far more likely to be victimized than whites and other minorities.

The Bureau of Justice Statistics said that "intimate partner violence" rates fell by more than 50 percent. The decline mirrored a decade-long trend in other violent crimes, and the department did not suggest a cause.

"There's still generally no consensus about why any crime in general has dropped," said Shannan Catalano, the study's author. "It's safe to say it's more than one factor that went into it."

Story continues below ? advertisement

Some experts attribute the decline to better training for police and more funding for prosecution, two key elements of the 1994 Violence Against Women Act. Investigators increasingly are better trained to handle abuse cases and bring them to court.

"For the first time, there are entire domestic violence units in law enforcement," said Lonna Stevens, director of the Sheila Wellstone Institute, a Minnesota-based domestic violence organization. "We've had protocols and policies developed for responding to this."

In 1993, there were about 5.8 incidents of nonfatal violence for every 1,000 U.S. residents above the age of 12. By 2004, that number had fallen to 2.6, the agency said. Homicides fell by about 30 percent, from 2,269 in 1993 to 1,544 in 2004.

The Justice Department defines intimate partner violence as violence by a current or former spouse, boyfriend or girlfriend or a same-sex partner.

Stevens said police have been less successful responding to and deterring abusive behavior in some minority communities, where racism and cultural differences can keep reporting rates low.

Over the 12-year reporting period, about 18 out of every 1,000 American Indian and native Alaskan women were victimized — a violence rate three times higher than among white women.

Black women were more likely than white women to be abused but the study also found that they were more likely to report their abuse to the police than white women.

Women in their early 20s and women who were divorced or separated had the greatest risk of being abused, the study found. Violence was also more common in low-income households.

Asian males, white males and the elderly reported the lowest rates of partner violence.

Bosnian Serbs Deported By US Are Indicted For War-crimes (CSM)

By Beth Kampschror, Correspondent of The Christian Science Monitor

The Christian Science Monitor, December 29, 2006

As a result of landmark international cooperation, the two men were charged last week in connection with the 1995 Srebrenica massacre.

SARAJEVO, BOSNIA-HERZEGOVINA -- Mladen Blagojevic and Zdravko Bozic would probably be living unassuming lives as Bosnia Serb refugees in the Arizona desert if it weren't for a landmark international detective effort to track down war-crime suspects.

Instead, they're in custody in wintry Bosnia, where they were charged last week in connection with the 1995 Srebrenica massacre.

The case, say court sources, marks a precedent in international cooperation in the prosecution of war crimes, and could show the way forward for both the US and other countries that may be unwittingly hosting war-crimes suspects on their territory.

"I would describe the cooperation with the US as unprecedented, as these are the first cases where war-crimes suspects have been returned to the country where the crimes were committed to face charges," says Toby Cadman, counsel to the prosecutor at Bosnia's war-crimes chamber.

Mr. Blagojevic and Mr. Bozic were deported to Bosnia earlier this year after being arrested in the US for not disclosing their service in the Bosnian Serb military when its forces overran the Bosnian Muslim enclave of Srebrenica and killed up to 8,000 men and boys - a crime ruled genocide by the UN war-crimes tribunal in The Hague. On Dec. 21, they were indicted for crimes against humanity by Bosnia's war-crimes chamber and charged with the detention, murders, and forcible transfer of Srebrenica Muslims. International cooperation led to 56 arrests

In the past two years, 56 Bosnian Serbs have been arrested on charges of similar immigration fraud or making false statements over omitting their military service on immigration applications. Agents from the Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) most recently raided homes in at least five US cities earlier this month, bringing in at least 16more people . Mr. Cadman says the ICE's Operation No Safe Haven could prove a model for other countries, which, like the US, took in large numbers of refugees and asylum seekers from the former Yugoslavia during and after the 1990s Balkan wars.

The operation began in 2004, when ICE officials were nearly two years into investigating a Boston-area Bosnian, Marko Boskic - whose name had appeared in testimony at the UN war-crimes tribunal as well as press reports involving Srebrenica - on suspicion that he'd omitted his Bosnian Serb military service when applying for refugee status in the US. A former US military intelligence analyst who'd worked on the Srebrenica case in The Hague offered the investigators a list of 14,000 people who were suspected of having served in the Bosnian Serb military. Officials checked the names against immigration databases. The leads generated were distributed to their offices nationwide.

"A lot of our cases have actually developed because of the access to that list," says Michael Keegan, a spokesman at the Human Rights Violators and Public Safety Unit at the ICE, which has, since its creation in 2003, investigated immigrants who are not US citizens. Finding war criminals in a haystack of refugees

A December 2004 law - the Anti-Atrocity Alien Deportation Act - also gave the Justice Department's Office of Special Investigations powers to go after naturalized US citizens suspected of crimes committed before they entered the country. Federal investigators had previously tracked only Nazi-era suspects to prevent them from entering the US.

"I think the United States prides itself on being a refuge for people running away from persecution, and some of these human rights violators will come to the United States seeking the same refuge as their victims," Mr. Keegan says. "And that's not hard to believe, since most of them were at the site where the atrocities were committed, so they know the details. So when they're going through their interview, it's possible for them to describe the scene and be credible."

Operation No Safe Haven will continue indefinitely, Keegan says. It also appears to be bringing in more Srebrenica suspects than any other attempts. The Hague tribunal, for example, has been able to try only seven high-ranking Bosnian Serb military and police officers in a trial that began in July, because several of the men had been brought in under so-called "voluntary surrenders." The tribunal's two most-wanted men - Bosnian Serb political and military heads Radovan Karadzic and Ratko Mladic - remain fugitives.

Blagojevic, Bozic, and two others who were arrested in Bosnia, are the latest defendants in Bosnia's national war-crimes chamber - established in 2005 to take on mid- and lower-level ranking suspects - to be charged with alleged crimes at Srebrenica. Eleven others have been on trial for genocide since May, a trial that Damir Petrovic, a public-information lawyer at Bosnia's state court where the war-crimes chamber is housed,called "the largest criminal case in Europe right now." Critics say the US has gone too far

A lawyer for Nedjo Ikonic, a Bosnian Serb arrested outside Milwaukee earlier this month who pleaded not guilty this week to making false statements, says that US officials are targeting too widely, and that the sting is sparking fears among the Serbian diaspora in the US.

"There's one lady in Salt Lake City who was a cook paid by the Republika Srpska Army. That's stretching the party to a crime concept. It seems like the [Bosnian] government wants to investigate every one of them," says Nikola Kostich, senior partner at the Milwaukee law firm Kostich, LeBell, Dobroski, & Morgan. Mr. Kostich defended several prominent Serb suspects in The Hague and has advised many of those arrested in the past 24 months.

"I've also given a lot of advice to people who have not been charged - people who have called me because they're not sleeping well, and they think there's going to be a knock on the door in the night, and they don't know what to do," he says.

North Carolina Bar Association Files Charges Against Duke Prosecutor (USAT/AP)

By Aaron Beard, Associated Press

USA Today, December 29, 2006

RALEIGH, N.C. — The North Carolina bar filed ethics charges Thursday against the prosecutor in the Duke lacrosse case, accusing him of saying misleading or inflammatory things to the news media about the athletes under suspicion.

The punishment for ethics violations can range from admonishment to disbarment. The complaint could also force District Attorney Mike Nifong off the case by creating a conflict of interest.

"He's got this hanging over his head," said Thomas Metzloff, a Duke law professor and member of the bar's ethics committee for the past 10 years. "It relates so much to his underlying conduct in the case."

DOJ_NMG_0110055

Among the four rules of professional conduct that Nifong was accused of violating was a prohibition against making comments "that have a substantial likelihood of heightening public condemnation of the accused."

In a statement, the bar said it opened a case against Nifong on March 30, a little more than two weeks after a 28-year-old woman hired to perform as a stripper at a lacrosse team party said she was gang-raped.

The ethics charges will be heard by an independent body called the Disciplinary Hearing Commission, made up of both lawyers and non-lawyers. A date for the hearing has not yet been set.

Nifong did not immediately return a call for comment.

The bar cited 40 quotations and eight paraphrased statements made to newspaper and TV reporters, saying many of them amounted to "improper commentary about the character, credibility and reputation of the accused" or their alleged unwillingness to cooperate. Most of the comments were in March and April, in the early days of the case.

Among them:

• Nifong referred to the lacrosse players as "a bunch of hooligans."

• He declared: "I am convinced there was a rape, yes, sir."

• He told ESPN: "One would wonder why one needs an attorney if one was not charged and had not done anything wrong."

• He told The New York Times: "I'm disappointed that no one has been enough of a man to come forward. And if they would have spoken up at the time, this may never have happened."

Nifong was also charged with breaking a rule against "dishonesty, fraud, deceit and misrepresentation." The bar said that when DNA testing failed to find any evidence a lacrosse player raped the accuser, Nifong told a reporter the players might have used a condom.

According to the bar, Nifong knew that assertion was misleading, because he had received a report from an emergency room nurse in which the accuser said her attackers did not use a condom.

Defense attorney Joseph Cheshire, who represents one of the three athletes, declined to comment Thursday.

Last week, Nifong dropped the rape charges against the athletes after the stripper wavered in her story, saying she was longer certain she was penetrated vaginally with a penis, as she had claimed several times before. The men still face charges of kidnapping and sexual offense.

In recent months — and especially after last week — legal experts and even Nifong's own colleagues have warned openly that the case appears pitifully weak.

"One wonders what the effect of this will be," Stan Goldman, who teaches criminal law at Loyola Law School in Los Angeles, said after the ethics charges were filed. "Is this going to result in him treating the case more gingerly and deciding it's not worth pursuing, or is he going to get his back up and decide he's got to pursue this case to the end regardless?"

The athletes, Reade Seligmann, Collin Finnerty and David Evans, have maintained their innocence and called the charges "fantastic lies." The case is not expected to go to trial until at least the spring.

The weaknesses in the case include the lack of DNA evidence; the accuser's ever-shifting story; one player's claim to have an alibi supported by receipts and time-stamped photos; and the defense's insistence that the photo lineup that was used to identify the defendants violated police procedures and was skewed against the men.

Before the ethics charges were filed, Bob Brown, an attorney in private practice who once worked with Nifong in the prosecutor's office, predicted the case would be a "bloodbath" for the prosecution if it went to trial.

Among other questions raised in recent weeks: Why did it take months for anyone from Nifong's office to interview the accuser? And why did Nifong initially withhold from the defense DNA test results that found genetic material from several men — none of them Duke lacrosse players — on the accuser's underwear and body?

"I don't see how any member of the public can have confidence in this case. I think it's making a mockery of our criminal justice system to permit this guy to keep fumbling along," Duke University law professor James Coleman, one of Nifong's leading critics, said before the ethics charges were filed. "It's either total incompetence or it's misconduct on a scale that is extraordinary."

Prosecutor In Duke Sexual Assault Case Faces Ethics Complaint From State Bar (NYT)

By David Barstow And Duff Wilson

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

The North Carolina State Bar filed a formal ethics complaint yesterday against the prosecutor in the Duke lacrosse sexual assault case, accusing him of making inflammatory remarks about the team to the news media and misleading the public about evidence.

The 17-page complaint took issue with a long list of public comments by the prosecutor, Michael B. Nifong, the Durham district attorney. Since March, when a stripper first accused three Duke lacrosse players of gang-raping her at a late-night team party, Mr. Nifong has granted dozens of interviews with the news media, including one with The New York Times last week.

But according to the state bar, which regulates lawyers in North Carolina, many of Mr. Nifong's comments were unethical because they included "improper commentary" about the defendants and the evidence.

In perhaps the most serious accusation, the bar also said Mr. Nifong had engaged in "dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation" by suggesting to reporters that a condom was used in the alleged attack when he had in his possession a sexual assault examination report that indicated otherwise.

Mr. Nifong spoke about condoms after laboratory tests failed to find semen from any Duke player on the accuser.

The complaint was filed with the state bar's Disciplinary Hearing Commission, which can impose a variety of sanctions, from censure to disbarment. According to bar rules, the commission must take up the complaint within 90 to 150 days.

Mr. Nifong did not respond to telephone and e-mail messages last night, but North Carolina's courts have traditionally granted district attorneys broad leeway in making public comments that "serve a legitimate law enforcement purpose."

In previous interviews Mr. Nifong has given two main reasons for speaking out, especially in the first weeks of the case. First, he has said he was trying to encourage and pressure possible witnesses on the team to come forward. Second, he has said he was trying to assure the community that as the county's top law enforcement official, he was taking the woman's complaint seriously.

But he has also admitted going too far in some of his public comments. In his interview with The Times last week, for example, Mr. Nifong said he was wrong to have described members of the lacrosse team as "a bunch of hooligans."

According to the bar complaint, the "hooligan" remark was one of many comments by Mr. Nifong that violated ethics rules because they were likely to heighten "public condemnation of the accused."

Defense lawyers said last night that they had decided not to comment on the complaint. But they have made no secret of their desire to see Mr. Nifong removed from the case, working to fan public criticism of him — a strategy that has helped provoke dozens of ethics complaints against Mr. Nifong with the state bar's grievance committee.

With yesterday's action, the grievance committee was indicating that it found merit in many of those complaints.

In addition to the bar complaint, Mr. Nifong is likely to face a separate accusation of prosecutorial misconduct before W. Osmond Smith III, the judge presiding over the sexual assault case. Defense lawyers have said they are preparing a motion seeking sanctions against Mr. Nifong for failing to reveal for seven months that tests had found DNA material from several men, none of them members of the lacrosse team, on rape kit swabs taken from the woman hours after the alleged attack.

Defense lawyers are likely to use the bar's complaint as still more evidence that Mr. Nifong has a clear conflict of interest that makes his continued involvement in the case untenable.

Ethics Probe In Duke Lacrosse Case Involves DA (NSDY)

By Jennifer Maloney

Long Island Newsday, December 29, 2006

The North Carolina bar Thursday filed ethics charges against the prosecutor in the Duke lacrosse sexual assualt case, accusing him of making misleading and inflammatory remarks to the media about the athletes under suspicion.

The complaint could force District Attorney Mike Nifong off the case by creating a conflict of interest. He could also face punishments ranging from admonishment to disbarment.

The bar accused Nifong of violating four rules of professional conduct, including a prohibition against making comments "that have a substantial likelihood of heightening public condemnation of the accused" and a rule against "dishonesty, fraud, deceit and misrepresentation."

In a statement, the bar said it opened a case against Nifong on March 30, about two weeks after a 28-year-old woman hired to perform as a stripper at a lacrosse team party said she was gang-raped.

The ethics charges will be heard by an independent body called the Disciplinary Hearing Commission, comprised of lawyers and non-lawyers. A date for the hearing has not been set.

Nifong could not be reached Thursday. In an October interview with The Associated Press, he said his only regret in handling the case was speaking so often to the media in the investigation's early days.

"Certainly what I was trying to do was to reassure the community, to encourage people with information to come forward," Nifong said. "And that was clearly not the effect."

The accused athletes, Reade Seligmann, Collin Finnerty and David Evans, have maintained their innocence and called the charges "fantastic lies." The Finnerty family, of Garden City, could not be reached Thursday. The defendants' attorneys also could not be reached. Last week, Nifong dropped the rape charges against the athletes after the stripper wavered in her story. The men still face charges of kidnapping and sexual offense.

The bar cited 41 quotations and eight paraphrased statements Nifong made to newspaper and TV reporters, saying many amounted to "improper commentary about the character, credibility and reputation of the accused" or their alleged unwillingness to cooperate.

The bar said that when DNA testing failed to find any evidence a lacrosse player raped the accuser, Nifong told a reporter the players might have used a condom.

According to the bar, Nifong knew that that assertion was misleading because he had received a report from an emergency room nurse in which the accuser said her attackers did not use a condom.

Duke Rape Case Prosecutor Faces Ethics Charges (WP/AP)

By Aaron Beard

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

RALEIGH, N.C., Dec. 28 -- The North Carolina Bar Association filed ethics charges Thursday against the prosecutor in the Duke University rape case, accusing him of saying misleading and inflammatory things to the media about the lacrosse players under suspicion.

The punishment for ethics violations can range from admonishment to disbarment.

Among the four rules of professional conduct that District Attorney Mike Nifong was accused of violating was a prohibition against making comments "that have a substantial likelihood of heightening public condemnation of the accused."

In a statement, the bar said it opened a case against Nifong on March 30, a little more than two weeks after a 28-year-old woman hired to perform as a stripper at a lacrosse team party said she was gang-raped.

The ethics charges will be heard by an independent body called the Disciplinary Hearing Commission, made up of both lawyers and non-lawyers.

Nifong did not immediately return a call to comment.

The bar cited 40 quotations and eight paraphrased statements made to newspaper and television reporters, saying many of them amounted to "improper commentary about the character, credibility and reputation of the accused" or their alleged unwillingness to cooperate. Most of the comments were made in March and April, in the early days of the case.

Among them:

Â· Nifong referred to the lacrosse players as "a bunch of hooligans."

Â· He declared, "I am convinced there was a rape, yes, sir."

Â· He told ESPN: "One would wonder why one needs an attorney if one was not charged and had not done anything wrong."

Â· He told the New York Times: "I'm disappointed that no one has been enough of a man to come forward. And if they would have spoken up at the time, this may never have happened."

Nifong was also charged with breaking a rule against "dishonesty, fraud, deceit and misrepresentation." The bar said that when DNA testing failed to find evidence a lacrosse player raped the accuser, Nifong told a reporter the players might have used condoms.

According to the bar, Nifong knew that assertion was misleading, because he had received a report from an emergency room nurse in which the accuser said her attackers did not use condoms.

Defense attorney Joseph Cheshire, who represents one of the three athletes, declined to comment Thursday.

Last week, Nifong dropped the rape charges against the athletes after the stripper wavered in her story, saying she was no longer certain she was penetrated vaginally with a penis, as she had alleged several times before. The men still face charges of kidnapping and sexual offense.

In recent months -- and especially after last week -- legal experts and even Nifong's own colleagues have warned openly that the case appears weak.

"One wonders what the effect of this will be," Stanley A. Goldman, who teaches criminal law at Loyola Law School in Los Angeles, said after the ethics charges were filed. "Is this going to result in him treating the case more gingerly and deciding it's not worth pursuing, or is he going to get his back up and decide he's got to pursue this case to the end regardless?"

The athletes -- Reade Seligmann, Collin Finnerty and David Evanshave maintained their innocence and called the charges "fantastic lies." The case is not expected to go to trial until at least the spring.

The weaknesses in the case include the lack of DNA evidence; the accuser's ever-shifting story; one player's claim to have an alibi supported by receipts and time-stamped photos; and the defense's insistence that the photo lineup used to identify the defendants violated police procedures and was skewed against the men.

CyberNet Suspect Pleads Not Guilty (GRPRESS)

By John Agar, The Grand Rapids Press

Grand Rapids Press (MI), December 29, 2006

GRAND RAPIDS -- A former vice president at the collapsed firm CyberNET in Grand Rapids pleaded not guilty Wednesday to federal charges related to an $81.7 million fraud case.

Paul Nathan Wright, 57, is accused of conspiracy, bank fraud, money laundering and mail fraud. The charges carry penalties ranging from five to 30 years in prison, and fines ranging from $250,000 to $1 million, plus restitution, if he is convicted.

Wright pleaded "not guilty to each and every count he's charged (with)," his court-appointed attorney, Paul Mitchell, told U.S. District Magistrate Judge Ellen Carmody.

Barton Watson, CyberNET chairman, killed himself in his Ada Township home just days after a November 2004 raid at company headquarters. His wife, Krista Kotlarz-Watson, and mother, Geraldine Watson, were recently indicted and await arraignment next month in federal court.

Last week, James Horton, the former CyberNET president, was sentenced to 7 1/2 years in prison. He pleaded guilty to conspiracy, bank fraud and money laundering, and has cooperated with the government. Horton's cooperation led to a lesser sentence, and he has agreed to testify, if necessary, at others' trials.

The government alleges that CyberNET deceived lending institutions to obtain financing under false pretenses, and expended "a substantial amount of effort to prevent lenders from discovering that they had been deceived," the indictment said.

The company had a complex system, using false records, shell corporations and telephone systems to intercept calls from lenders to suggest that the company had many customers. The company overstated its finances to show it netted millions of dollars a year, when it actually was losing $500,000 to $7.6 million each month from 2002 to 2004, the indictment said.

Wright assisted by setting up shell companies, and "played an active role in deceiving lenders dealing with CyberNET," the indictment said. He would place bricks into empty computer boxes prior to lenders' inspections of collateral, the indictment said.

Employees who were not involved in the alleged fraud, and only discovered it later, were "paid substantial sums ... for their agreement not to report the fraud to law enforcement authorities," the government said.

Wright, on bond, left the courthouse with his attorney after the brief hearing. His attorney would not comment.

Durham Police Seek Kidnapped Twins (WRAL)

WRAL-TV, December 29, 2006

FBI Believes Twins, Birth Mother in Canada

The FBI said Thursday that 17-month-old twins allegedly taken by their birth mother last week were spotted crossing the Canadian border.

According to a news release issued early Thursday evening, FBI investigators have determined that Allison Quets crossed the border last Saturday with the toddlers, Tyler and Holly Needham. All three are believed to still be in Canada, investigators said.

The twins were taken from their adoptive parents in Apex last Friday for a scheduled monthly visitation with Quets. Police said Tuesday that Quets, 49, never returned Sunday evening.

On Wednesday, a federal warrant was issued charging Quets with violating an international parental kidnapping law. Additionally, federal investigators filed a provisional arrest warrant application with Canadian authorities to assist in locating Quets and returning the two children to the United States.

FBI officials said they are working jointly with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the FBI legal attache's office in the U.S. Embassy in Ottawa, and the Durham Police Department. They also have enlisted the assistance of the National Center for Missing/Exploited Children, along with Child Find Canada.

Quets had been embroiled in a custody dispute with Kevin and Denise Needham , who live in Apex, in Jacksonville, Fla., where Quets lived.

The FBI said that matters concerning custody and parental rights would be determined by the appropriate authorities in the state of Florida.

FBI Says Missing Apex Twins Taken By Biological Mother To Canada (CO)

The Charlotte Observer, December 29, 2006

RALEIGH, N.C. - The FBI has joined in the search for 17-month-old twins who authorities think were taken to Canada by their biological mother.

Allison Lee Quets, 49, of Durham, is suspected of taking Tyler Lee and Holly Ann Needham, who had lived in Apex with their adoptive parents, FBI officials said Thursday in a written statement. Apex is a suburb west of Raleigh.

Quets had monthly visitation rights as a part of a custody agreement, but now faces federal charges of international parental kidnapping.

A custody order allowed Quets to take the twins on Dec. 22 and return them Dec. 24 to adoptive parents Denise and Kevin Needham. Quets did not return the children, and an investigation shows she crossed the Canadian border with the twins on Dec. 23, the FBI said.

Authorities are seeking public assistance to locate and safely return the twins to the United States.

Other agencies involved in the search included the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Durham Police Department, the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, and Child Find Canada.

FBI: Missing Kids Were Taken To Canada (MBSN)

Myrtle Beach (SC) Sun News, December 29, 2006

RALEIGH, N.C. - A woman accused of abducting a pair of 17-month-old Apex, N.C., twins has taken them to Canada, the FBI said late Thursday.

Allison Quets, 49, is wanted by federal authorities on criminal charges of international parental kidnapping. The FBI released a statement that said Quets crossed the Canadian border on Saturday with two children.

Quets gave birth to Tyler and Holly Needham but gave them up for adoption approximately a month after they were born, her sister Gail Quets said. Quets, who conceived the children through in-vitro fertilization, become severely ill during her pregnancy and worried about her ability to care for the children.

Denise and Kevin Needham, an Apex couple, adopted the twins after meeting Quets through a mutual friend, Gail Quets said. Quets was in the process of appealing the adoption and had been granted visitation rights pending a decision by a Florida court.

The Needhams last saw their adopted children on Friday when Quets picked them up from their Apex home. The couple planned on seeing their children again on Sunday, when Quets was scheduled to meet them at the Streets at Southpoint mall in Durham. The Needhams contacted Durham police a half-hour after Quets failed to meet them.

However, an alert about the missing children was not put out until 24 hours later when another police agency, the Apex Police Department, got involved.

Protesting Mom Cindy Sheehan Arrested At Bush Ranch (CNN)

CNN.com, December 29, 2006

CRAWFORD, Texas (CNN) -- Anti-war protester Cindy Sheehan was arrested Thursday afternoon outside President Bush's ranch, according to a law enforcement official.

Sheehan, who in the past has camped out for weeks in protest outside the ranch in Crawford, Texas, was arrested for blocking the road leading to the property, Texas Department of Public Safety's Tela Mange told CNN.

Four others were also arrested after law enforcement officials asked the group to move and they refused, Mange said.

"[Sheehan] told us if you want us to get out of the road, you're going to have to arrest us," Mange said. "So we did."

The protesters lay in the road about 20 minutes before being taken into custody, she said.

Sheehan and the others were taken to the McLennan County Sheriff's Department, booked and jailed.

It's not known if any of the protesters made bail.

Sheehan and the others are charged with obstructing a highway, a misdemeanor punishable by up to a $2,000 fine and six months in jail, Mange said.

Mange said Vice President Dick Cheney's motorcade was delayed leaving the ranch while officers removed the protesters.

Sheehan's 24-year-old son, Casey, was killed in Iraq in 2004.

She has been arrested previously. She and three other women were convicted earlier this month in New York of trespassing, The Associated Press reported. (Full story)

They had attempted in March 2005 to deliver an anti-Iraq war petition to the United Nations U.S. Mission and ignored signals to disperse, the AP said.

The four were acquitted of disorderly conduct, resisting arrest and obstructing government administration. The Manhattan judge fined them $95 and gave them a conditional discharge.

That meant that if any of the women were arrested again they could face a tougher sentence.

Police Officers Charged In Deaths In Hurricane's Aftermath (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

ATLANTA, Dec. 28 — Seven New Orleans police officers were indicted Thursday on charges of first-degree murder or attempted murder in connection with the deaths of two men on a bridge six days after Hurricane Katrina struck.

Four other civilians suffered gunshot wounds in the episode, which took place on Sept. 4, 2005. No officers were hurt.

The shootings occurred while much of the New Orleans area was still under water, communication among officers was poor and the city was chaotic. The New Orleans Police Department's initial account — that officers were responding to reports of snipers firing on contractors — seemed to confirm fears of rampant lawlessness in the city.

But that account was repeatedly revised. At one point, the police said they were responding to reports that two officers had been shot. The victims, for their part, said they had simply been seeking help after the storm left them stranded.

Frank Zibilich, a lawyer for one of the police officers, said that although first-degree murder in Louisiana did not require proof of premeditation, the charges were harsh.

"It's mind-boggling to me that officers, under the intense circumstances that were going on in New Orleans at this time, that seven officers decide simultaneously that they're going to go commit murder," Mr. Zibilich said.

Two families were involved in the shootings. At the base of the bridge, the officers encountered the Bartholomew family: a couple and their teenage daughter and nephew, and the nephew's friend James Brissette, 19. The family, which filed a civil lawsuit against the officers and the police department, said in court papers that it was trying to reach a grocery store on the other side of the bridge when the police officers began firing at them. Mr. Brissette died, while the nephew, Jose Holmes Jr., 19, jumped behind a barricade. As he lay on the ground, according to the court papers, he was shot at from a distance and then approached by a man who shot him point blank in the abdomen.

Mr. Holmes wound up partly paralyzed with a colostomy bag. Susan Bartholomew, the mother, lost her right arm.

"The police in this case used the devastation of the storm to behave in a criminal manner," said Gary W. Bizal, a lawyer who is representing Mr. Holmes in the civil case. "They held themselves above the law, and now it's coming back to roost."

Near the top of the bridge, according to a statement issued by the office of Eddie Jordan, the Orleans Parish district attorney, the police encountered Ronald Madison, a mentally retarded man, and his brother Lance, who had been employed by Federal Express for 25 years. The brothers had been forced to swim through floodwaters and had been trying to reach their mother's house across the bridge, their family said in its civil lawsuit. The family said the brothers were on the bridge with other people they did not know when a rental truck pulled up and a group of heavily armed officers jumped out and began firing.

Ronald Madison, 40, died after being shot seven times in the back. His brother was arrested at the scene and charged with eight counts of attempted murder of a police officer, though no weapon was recovered. The grand jury that handed down Thursday's indictments declined to indict Lance Madison.

A spokeswoman for Warren J. Riley, the superintendent of police, said he would not comment on the case.

AP, December 29, 2006

(AP) - NEW ORLEANS-Four New Orleans police officers were charged with first-degree murder in connection with two fatal shootings during Hurricane Katrina's chaotic aftermath.

Three other officers were charged with attempted murder in the shootings, which also injured four civilians. A state district judge Thursday gave the officers 24 hours to surrender.

The shootings became one of the most widely cited examples of the chaos that ensued after Katrina flooded 80 percent of the city in August 2005.

"We cannot allow our police officers to shoot and kill our citizens without justification like rabid dogs," District Attorney Eddie Jordan said.

At a news conference late Thursday, Police Superintendent Warren Riley said the indictments were only the first step in the judicial process and "not where it ends."

"A jury of their peers will decide their guilt or innocent," Riley said, calling Jordan's comments "highly unprofessional, highly prejudicial and highly undignified."

"We want justice first and foremost, " he said. "But for the district attorney to try and prejudice the community against these officers before all the evidence is heard is really, I think, a sad day for the city."

The indictments were the latest blow to the police department's reputation. Police Superintendent Warren Riley has said the majority of his 1,500-member force performed heroically during and after Katrina, but he has acknowledged more than 200 were disciplined for various offenses, including failure to show up after the storm. Some were accused of looting.

Defense attorneys for the indicted officers said their clients are innocent. "As a wise man once said, a district attorney can get a grand jury to indict a ham sandwich," said Franz Zibilich, attorney for officer Robert Faulcon, who is charged with murder. "They heard only one side of the story."

Authorities first said Ronald Madison, a 40-year-old mentally retarded man, and James Brissette, 19, were killed in a gun battle with police on a bridge connecting two predominantly black - and flooded - neighborhoods.

At the time, six days after the hurricane, the city was still littered with dead bodies as rescuers tried to save stranded residents and prevent looters.

According to a police report, several officers responded to a radio call of two officers down. They were told the shooters were headed west. When they arrived, seven people were running in that direction and four began firing at police, the report said. The officers returned fire.

After weeks of testimony, the grand jury deliberated for two hours Thursday before issuing the charges. The panel's foreman, Lee Madare, declined to comment in detail as he left the courthouse but asked a reporter, "Do you understand the word cover-up?"

A spokesman for Mayor Ray Nagin declined to comment on the indictments. Police Superintendent Warren Riley and a police department spokeswoman did not immediately return messages from The Associated Press.

Faulcon was charged with first-degree murder in Madison's death. Faulcon and three others - Sgt. Kenneth Bowen, officer Anthony Villavaso and officer Robert Gisevius - were charged with first-degree murder in Brissette's death.

Officer Robert Barrios faces multiple counts of attempted first-degree murder, officer Mike Hunter is charged with two counts of attempted first-degree murder and officer Ignatius Hills is charged with attempted second-degree murder.

7 N.O. Cops Indicted In Killings On Bridge (NOTP)

By Laura Maggi, Staff Writer

New Orleans Times-Picayune, December 29, 2006

SHOOTING DEATHS CAME 6 DAYS AFTER KATRINA

Seven New Orleans police officers were indicted Thursday on an array of murder and attempted-murder charges stemming from a shooting on the Danziger Bridge six days after Hurricane Katrina, which victims have portrayed as an ambush by police that left two dead and four wounded.

The state grand jury refuted the New Orleans Police Department account of what happened on Sept. 4, 2005, which had been portrayed by officers as an appropriate response to reports of both sniper fire and people shooting at police officers near the bridge, on Chef Menteur Highway in eastern New Orleans.

The grand jury separately cleared Lance Madison, a man whom police arrested that day and booked with attempted first-degree murder for allegedly shooting at law enforcement.

Four police officers -- Sgt. Kenneth Bowen, Sgt. Robert Gisevius, officer Anthony Villavaso and officer Robert Faulcon -- were charged with the first-degree murder of James Brissette, 19. Faulcon was also charged with the first-degree murder of Ronald Madison, a 40-year-old mentally retarded man whose body was found riddled with seven gunshot wounds to his back. Three more officers face attempted-murder charges.

The charge of first-degree murder carries a potential death sentence, which prosecutors said was warranted because the accused had shot the men while trying to harm or kill others. Chief Judge Raymond Bigelow, who received the grand jury indictments, said he would not set bond for the officers facing the first-degree murder charges.

Criticizing Jordan

In a written statement, the only one he would make about the indictments on Thursday, Orleans Parish District Attorney Eddie Jordan said, "We cannot allow our police officers to shoot and kill our citizens without justification, like rabid dogs. The rules governing the use of lethal force are not suspended during a state of emergency. Everyone, including police officers, must abide by the law of the land."

New Orleans Police Superintendent Warren Riley asked the public to remember that all seven officers will have their days in court. He called the indictments one the saddest days in the department's history.

"I would like to remind everyone, this is but one step in the judicial process that will determine the future of these officers. This is not when it ends," he said at an evening news conference.

Riley also objected to the statement by Jordan that people had been shot "like rabid dogs," calling the phrase "unprofessional, highly prejudicial and highly undignified."

Representatives for both police unions -- the Police Association of New Orleans and the Fraternal Order of Police -- said their groups stand behind the indicted officers, pointing out that grand juries as a practice hear only the prosecution's evidence, and so heard no testimony defending the police.

The four officers facing murder charges also face varying counts of attempted first-degree murder for allegedly shooting other people wounded on the bridge.

In addition, Robert Barrios was charged with four counts of attempted first-degree murder. Michael Hunter was charged with two counts of attempted first-degree murder. Ignatius Hills was charged with one count of attempted second-degree murder. Bigelow gave all the officers 24 hours to turn themselves in to the Sheriff's Office, setting bail at $100,000 for each attempted-murder count.

One-sided hearing?

Only Eric Hessler, the attorney for Gisevius, attended the afternoon proceedings in Bigelow's courtroom. Afterward, Hessler said his client is innocent, pointing out that all of the officers were cleared by an internal Police Department investigation.

"The grand jury only heard evidence that the district attorney wants them to see," Hessler said. The indictments do not lay out prosecutors' case against the seven officers, only charging them with the fatal shooting or attempted murder of specific victims. But the version of events by several people who survived the incident has been detailed in three federal lawsuits brought in late summer against the city government and Police Department.

These lawsuits portray a group of people who were trying to survive with scant food and water after Katrina, stranded along a strip of Chef Menteur that was surrounded by flood waters.

On Sept. 4 about 9 a.m., Ronald and Lance Madison walked near the top of the Danziger Bridge, returning to their brother's dental office on Chef Menteur Highway after a failed attempt to go to their mother's home in eastern New Orleans. Ronald Madison, who was severely retarded, had insisted on staying in the city because he could not bear to leave behind the family dachshunds, Bobbi and Sushi. His older brother, Lance, decided to stay with him, according to the lawsuit.

At the same time, according to the lawsuits, another group of people was walking at the base of the bridge on a trek to a nearby Winn Dixie to retrieve food and water. The group of six had been staying at the Friendly Inn Motel, located next to the dentist's office where the Madisons had camped out.

Suddenly, the people on the bridge were confronted by a hail of gunfire coming from a group of men in "dark clothing" who had emerged from the back of a rental truck at the foot of the bridge, the lawsuits said.

These men turned out to be the seven heavily armed, out-of-uniform police officers indicted on Thursday, although in the lawsuits, the victims say they never identified themselves as such.

In his lawsuit, Jose Holmes Jr. describes jumping behind a concrete barrier to escape the bullets. Officers shot Holmes several times even though he lay prone on the ground, the lawsuit alleges, One officer stood over him and shot him twice in the abdomen, according to the suit.

During the shooting, Holmes' friend James Brissette -- called James Barsett in the lawsuit -- was killed. His uncle, Leonard Bartholomew III, and cousin, Lesha Bartholomew, also were shot several times. His aunt, Susan Bartholomew, lost her arm after being shot by a "large-caliber" weapon. The gunmen also fired on Leonard Bartholomew IV, Holmes' 15-year-old cousin, but missed.

In his portrayal of the events that morning, Lance Madison has backed up police claims that there was gunfire near the bridge, testifying at a Sept. 28, 2005, magistrate court hearing that six teenagers in white T-shirts shot at him and his brother.

"We tried to run for our life," Madison told a magistrate judge.

But then the truckload of NOPD officers appeared, shooting Ronald Madison in the shoulder. Lance Madison testified that the teenagers never shot at police.

Although the Madisons kept trying to run down the bridge to get out of the line of fire, at least one of the officers pursued, shooting Ronald Madison seven times in the back, according to a lawsuit filed by Lance Madison and his mother, Fuki Madison.

Shipped to prison

After his brother was killed, Lance Madison was surrounded by Louisiana State Police officers. A 25-year employee of Federal Express with no criminal record, Madison was arrested and booked that day with eight counts of attempted murder for allegedly shooting at police officers and another man on the bridge that day.

Madison was booked at Camp Greyhound, the temporary jail set up after Katrina and later shipped to Hunt Correctional Center in St. Gabriel. At the Sept. 28 proceeding at Hunt, Orleans Parish Magistrate Court Judge Gerard Hansen found probable cause for Madison's arrest because of a police report that he had tossed a gun into the Industrial Canal from the Danziger Bridge. Police said they found the weapon the next day in the canal.

But at that same hearing, Hansen lowered Madison's bond -- he was later released without any bond -- and said he didn't believe police had caught a guilty man.

"I could be wrong, but I've been doing this for 32 years, and I think I have a gut reaction on this," he said, according to a transcript. "If I actually thought you were up there shooting, I would raise the bond to $2 million."

Police accounts of the events on Sept. 4 have been starkly different from those of Holmes, the Bartholomews and Lance Madison.

A department news release dated Oct. 4, 2005, offered this version of events:

The seven officers rushed to Danziger Bridge in the rental truck in response to radio reports of two police officers who were "down" under the bridge. Police also had a request for assistance from David Ryder, self-identified as a St. Landry Parish sheriff's deputy, who reported that several people on the bridge were shooting at rescue workers. When officers arrived, they were "met with gunfire" from four people on the bridge, the news release stated. At that point, the police returned fire.

In the six-page police report filed for the Madison arrest, Sgt. Arthur Kaufman gave a similar account, although at one point he says 7 people on the bridge that morning "opened fire" on the 7th District officers who arrived on the scene. The report describes two of the shooters continuing to fire as they ran over the Danziger Bridge toward the Friendly Inn Motel, which is where Lance Madison was arrested.

After the "scene was secured," Ryder arrived and identified Lance Madison as one of the people who shot at rescue workers.

Police impersonator?

But according to documents gathered by the attorneys representing Madison and the other victims, Ryder was not in fact a sheriff's deputy, from St. Landry or anywhere else. Indeed, he has a criminal record that includes a conviction for false imprisonment, arrests for battery on a police officer and possession of cocaine, according to court documents from Nacogdoches County, Texas.

"The public expected first responders to stay and protect, and they did that," said Michael Glasser, PANO president.

Both Donovan Livaccari, FOP employee representative, and Glasser called the indictments a political gambit by Jordan to win the allegiance of voters distrustful of police officers. Both also said that Jordan misled several of the officers involved, granting them immunity so they would testify and then indicting them.

For Lance Madison and his family, the indictments proved that he should never have been arrested on the bridge or charged with firing at police, his attorney said Thursday. "They are relieved that Lance has been vindicated," said Mary Howell.

The Madisons hope additional witnesses will come forward now that charges have been filed against police officers, a sentiment echoed by Anthony Radosti with the Metropolitan Crime Commission, a watchdog group that has been directing potential witnesses to the district attorney's office. "We know that there were a lot of people out there who saw and heard what happened," said Howell.

CIVIL LAW:

FEC Assessed A Record $6.2 Million In Penalties In 2006 (AP)

AP, December 29, 2006

The Federal Election Commission more than doubled its civil penalties in 2006, imposing $6.2 million in fines for campaign-law violations.

More than half -- $3.8 million -- came from penalties against Freddie Mac, the federal mortgage corporation, accused of making illegal contributions to political committees, according to year-end numbers released yesterday. Even without the record Freddie Mac fine, the FEC issued 12 penalties of more than $100,000, or almost a quarter of all six-figure fines in the agency's 31-year history.

"I'm very pleased with the vigorous enforcement record the FEC compiled in 2006. The numbers speak for themselves," FEC Chairman Michael Toner said in an interview. "It means strong confidence the FEC is properly prioritizing the most important cases and willing to pursue them to conclusion."

The year-end total included three cases against advocacy groups that the FEC settled for a combined $603,000. Swift Vets and POWs for Truth, the MoveOn.org Voter Fund, and the League of Conservation Voters failed "to register and file disclosure reports as federal political committees and accepted contributions in violation of federal limits and source prohibitions" during the 2004 presidential campaign, according to a unanimous agency ruling.

Advocates, however, said the numbers "don't tell the whole story."

"The penalties discussed in the FEC release reflect a mixed record," said Fred Wertheimer, president and chief executive of Democracy 21, a nonprofit, nonpartisan group that aims to reduce the influence of money in politics.

"The size of the fine will act as a warning to outside groups about the potential costs of violating the law," he said, but he added: "In other cases, like the penalties imposed on 527 groups, that does not reflect success but rather failure of law enforcement because it came years after the violations and represented a small portion of the tens of millions of dollars that were illegally spent in the 2004 presidential election."

The agency processed almost 78,000 financial filings totaling 3.9 million pages and detailing $2.7 billion in campaign spending.

Big Decal (WP)

KIRK SHELMERDINE is no political activist; in fact, he says he isn't even registered to vote. Rather, Mr. Shelmerdine is a NASCAR driver, albeit not a particularly successful one. He is, by his own description, "considered to be a 'field filler' as my race cars and race team are underfunded and have no realistic chance of winning a race." But two years ago, Mr. Shelmerdine took a step that caused him to crash head-on into the authorities at the Federal Election Commission: Unable to sell the space to a corporate sponsor, he put a Bush-Cheney '04 decal on the rear quarter-panel of his car for four races. It's not clear exactly what motivated Mr. Shelmerdine. He told a newspaper reporter at the time that "I'm very much against liberal ways when it comes to politics. This was the way to make our little statement." He later told the FEC that he had heard rumors that President Bush was going to be at the first race and figured the $50 decal would bring "publicity for me and the car."

Mr. Shelmerdine's decal resulted in a complaint to the FEC that he had violated federal election law by failing to file the report required of anyone who makes an independent expenditure valued at $250 or more in support of a candidate for federal office. The general counsel's office investigated; the commissioners tangled over how the decals should be valued: By considering Mr. Shelmerdine's cost in acquiring them? By averaging the amount Mr. Shelmerdine received from other sponsors when he did manage to sell the space? Finally, they agreed -- in an action made public this week -- to take the step that ought to have been obvious from the start: to send Mr. Shelmerdine a letter of admonishment warning him not to do it again.

Our customary criticism of the FEC is for doing too little to go after election law violations, not too much. But l'affaire Shelmerdine seems simply silly. None of the policies underlying the reporting requirements -- the need for transparency in campaign spending, the avoidance of secret efforts to curry favor with candidates -- were implicated here. There has to be a better use of FEC resources than investigating bumper stickers.

McCain-Feingold In The Dock (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0110066

A federal court decision last week upheld the right of citizens to petition their government -- a right taken for granted before the 2002 McCain-Feingold campaign-finance law codified speech restrictions. The ruling is overly narrow but welcome all the same. And if it's appealed, as expected, the Supreme Court will have another chance to weigh in on Congress's efforts to chip away at First Amendment free-speech guarantees in the name of "reform."

The case dates to 2004, when Wisconsin Right to Life ran television and radio spots informing the public that U.S. Senators were filibustering President Bush's judicial nominees. The ads said Wisconsinites should contact Democrats Herb Kohl and Russ Feingold and urge them to oppose the filibusters. McCain-Feingold bans certain kinds of political ads in the 30 days before a primary and 60 days before a general election, and the anti-abortion group sued on the grounds that its ads should be exempt from the blackout period.

Last year a district court rejected that argument, ruling that the Supreme Court's 2003 McConnell decision upholding McCain-Feingold precluded such exemptions. Wisconsin Right to Life appealed, and in January the Supreme Court said McConnell does in fact allow for exemptions and that the district court should reconsider its ruling.

Last week a federal court did just that and reversed course. In a 2-1 opinion, the court held that certain "issue" ads are permissible during campaign season, even if they (gasp) refer to candidates seeking re-election. And while we agree with the result, the justification for the court's finding is still troublesome and revealing of McCain-Feingold's assault on political speech.

The ads are acceptable, said the court, because they urge voters to call both Senators instead of just one, "do not comment on either Senator's past or current position regarding [filibusters]" and don't "reveal either Senator's thinking on the issue." In other words, campaign finance "reform" has left us with a system that allows corporations, unions and other special interest groups to petition government on issues of public importance so long as they don't expressly advocate the election or defeat of an actual politician.

The good news is that the Federal Election Commission is likely to appeal to the Supreme Court, which will get a chance to reconsider its muddled rulings on campaign funding and political speech. Since the 5-4 McConnell decision upholding the campaign finance law, Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito have joined the High Court. It's not certain how far either would move in a deregulatory direction, but it's encouraging that both voted with the 6-3 majority in last term's Randell v. Sorrell decision, which struck down Vermont's expenditure and contribution limits.

McCain-Feingold's backers claimed the law would rein in large donors and facilitate political campaigns that are less expensive, less negative and less influenced by special interests. If that nirvana has arrived, we haven't noticed. Proponents also promised that reform wouldn't hurt the ability of grassroots organizations to run ads that inform the public and hold politicians accountable. The folks at Wisconsin Right to Life beg to differ.

Perhaps the lesson is that limiting political speech isn't the cure for whatever supposedly ails the electoral system. Let's hope the Supreme Court seizes this opportunity to start dismantling the speech-regulation regime known as McCain-Feingold.

FEC Fines Outgoing Rep. Taylor For '04 Violation (RC)

By Nicole Duran

Roll Call, December 29, 2006

The Federal Election Commission on Wednesday fined the 2004 campaign of Rep. Charles Taylor (R-N.C.) $91,000 for failing to properly comply with provisions of the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act.

Taylor poured more than $800,000 of his own money into his 2004 re-election campaign but did not notify the FEC or his opponent in a timely matter, according to the FEC.

Taylor ran afoul of one of the most talked about, and misunderstood, provisions of BCRA, the "Millionaires' Amendment."

Among other requirements, House candidates must alert the FEC and their opponents within 24 hours if they spend more than $350,000 of their own money.

Taylor's campaign missed the initial 24-hour notification and four others.

The fine is especially painful considering that Taylor lost his seat in the midterm elections and is about to be replaced by Rep.-elect Heath Shuler (D-N.C.).

Taylor's office did not immediately respond to a request for a comment for this story.

DOJ_NMG_0110067

In another case, the commission dismissed a complaint against the Leadership Forum, a 527 group, last week.

Several watchdog groups had complained that the Leadership Forum actually was created to help specific GOP candidates during the 2004 cycle and therefore should have registered as a political action committee.

The group, led by Susan Hirschmann, a former chief of staff to former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas), came under fire when the National Republican Congressional Committee transferred $1 million to it in 2002, just days before such transfers were outlawed by BCRA.

The group returned the money two months later.

During the course of its investigation into the matter, the FEC said it found no evidence that the now-defunct group received contributions or made expenditures that would have required it to register as PAC.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Lawsuit Alleges St. Paul Officer Assaulted 85-year-old Man During Traffic Stop (STPPP)

By Shannon Prather

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, December 29, 2006

A man who alleges he suffered an "inhumane beating" during a traffic stop two years ago in St. Paul sued the city this week.

Leon Nins filed a federal civil rights suit Wednesday, two years to the day after the Dec. 27, 2004, confrontation. Nins was 85 at the time.

In the suit, Nins makes a variety of claims, including excessive force, battery and assault. The filing states Nins suffered permanent damage to his eyes and legs as well as psychological injuries, including depression, anxiety and panic attacks.

Nins seeks more than $50,000, plus punitive damages.

The incident, involving a black motorist and a white police officer, riled local civil rights leaders. Police Chief John Harrington, relying on witness statements and a squad car audio recording, defended officer Michael Lee, who said Nins kicked and spit at him.

Nins, who was arrested, spent three days in jail. Prosecutors charged Nins with assaulting the officer and obstructing the legal process, but dropped the charges and allowed him to admit to driving without a license. Nins had no criminal record.

Nins, a WWII veteran, was on his way to visit his wife at a nursing home when Lee pulled him over for expired tags near the corner of Dale Street and Selby Avenue in the Summit-University neighborhood.

Police and Nins have given conflicting accounts of what happened next.

According to the suit filed Wednesday, Nins said he tried to step out of the car, but said the officer grabbed the sac k lunch Nins had prepared for his ailing wife and threw it onto the ground.

Nins states he asked Lee why he threw the food and Lee responded by grabbing him and assaulting him. The suit states Nins never resisted the officer, but did question his actions.

Nins accused the officer of punching, kicking and striking him with a flashlight or baton. The officer also sprayed Nins with a chemical irritant.

According to a criminal complaint originally filed by prosecutors, Nins would not open his window for the officer. Lee opened the vehicle door and Nins began yelling that he would not show his driver's license, began swearing and refused to get out of the car. Nins spit at Lee as the officer pulled him out of the car, handcuffed him and placed him in the back of the squad car.

Nins kicked the squad car door open, hitting Lee in the face, and then kicked the officer's legs.

Subsequent investigations by the Bloomington Police Department and the U.S. Justice Department cleared Lee of criminal wrongdoing.

The lawsuit names the city, the police department, Harrington and Lee.

Conditions Improving Too Slowly, Judge Says (WP)

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

Court to Step Up Oversight of Case

A D.C. Superior Court judge said yesterday that the District had failed to do enough to improve conditions for juvenile offenders, particularly at the long-troubled Oak Hill detention facility.

Judge Herbert B. Dixon Jr. said the city's slow progress in making changes that were agreed to more than two years ago left him no choice but to step squarely back into the case, which began in 1985 as a class-action lawsuit filed on behalf of juveniles held at the city-run Oak Hill facility in Laurel.

"In light of the recurring delays meeting the requirements imposed in this case, and the impact such delays have on the children in defendants' custody, the court concludes that its more direct and active oversight of the remedial process is warranted," Dixon wrote in a nine-page order.

The lawsuit -- Jerry M. vs. the District of Columbia-- has cast a long shadow over the juvenile justice system. A consent decree, reached in 1986, was supposed to settle the suit, but problems persisted. The case appeared on its way to resolution in spring 2004, when the plaintiffs and the city agreed to the appointment of an independent monitor who would report back to Dixon. The D.C. government's appointment in early 2005 of a highly regarded juvenile justice director added to the optimism that changes were near.

But Dixon, who has overseen the case since 2001, felt compelled to act after receiving the most recent reports from the monitor, Grace M. Lopes. Although noting "clear progress," she found the city's efforts wanting in many areas, from a failure to ensure pest control services at Oak Hill despite "chronic infestations" to persistent staffing problems even in new, more-therapeutic units.

Oak Hill's population has dropped from an overcrowded 245 youths in February 2005 to fewer than 100 in recent months as the city has found alternatives to housing juveniles there for extended periods.

The May 2004 agreement that led to the appointment of Lopes called for parties in the case to draft a comprehensive plan to address the substantial shortcomings in how juvenile offenders are housed and cared for by the District. But the master plan has yet to materialize, the judge said.

Instead, the parties have produced a string of short-term plans, and even those efforts, intended to address urgent issues, often are accompanied by requests for extensions, Dixon stated. Such delays "are consistent with the defendants' performance throughout the two-decade history of this class action lawsuit," he said.

The parties in the case -- the District, the D.C. Public Defender Service, the American Civil Liberties Union and the law firm of Covington & Burling -- had asked the judge to scale back the role of the monitor and set criteria to take the place of a comprehensive plan.

Alan Pemberton, the Covington & Burling partner working on the case, said the parties believed that with the work done during the last couple of years, the monitoring could have been relaxed.

"There has been tremendous progress in some areas of the consent decree, probably more progress than in the previous 18 years," Pemberton said.

But the judge said such a framework would not give him the timelines and other information that he needs to ensure compliance with the consent decree. Instead, Dixon ordered the long-sought comprehensive plan to be filed by the end of April.

Contempt In Boston (WSJ)

Nearly three years ago, the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts read between the lines of the state constitution to discover a right to same-sex marriage previously undetected across the decades. The court then gave the legislature six months to rewrite state law to accommodate its diktat.

On Wednesday, however, the same court suddenly rediscovered the humility so lacking in its previous foray into the marriage debate. Before the court was a case brought by the governor together with citizens who had presented an initiative to amend the state constitution and so define marriage as a pact between a man and a woman. The petitioners had gathered more than 150,000 signatures. According to the state constitution, the legislature must now vote twice on the measure in successive legislative sessions before the amendment can be put on the ballot for a vote by the electorate.

The constitution only requires that 25% of both houses of the legislature vote to put the measure on the ballot, a bar set deliberately low to ensure that the people would have their say in all but the most extreme cases. But the legislature has so far refused to vote on the measure at all. In November, its members recessed until next Tuesday, the last day of the current legislative session, and to all appearances the politicians intend to adjourn the session without voting on the measure at all -- thus letting it die.

Departing Governor Mitt Romney has threatened to withhold approval of legislators' raises for next year unless they vote on the initiative, but this has purely symbolic value. Thanks to a voter-passed constitutional amendment from 1998, legislators are guaranteed raises every two years. Yet this is that same constitutional-amendment procedure that is now being flouted by legislators who lack the votes to defeat the measure on a straight vote.

The petitioners sued the legislature for abrogating its constitutional duty, and the state Supreme Judicial Court took the case. In its ruling this week, it agreed that the legislature's duty to vote on the measure was "unambiguous." But it claimed to be powerless to compel a vote. So the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, whose own arrogation of power created this mess, has suddenly discovered the limits of its power to clean it up.

All in all, this is quite the political spectacle. First judges usurp the power of the legislature to dictate their own social policy. Then the legislature uses a procedural ruse to deny voters a say on the gay-marriage issue. And these are some of the same people who say Iraqis aren't ready for democracy.

ANTITRUST:

AT&T Compromise May Get Merger Approved (AP)

By John Dunbar, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 29, 2006

AT&T Inc. has offered a new set of concessions that are expected to satisfy the two Democrats on the Federal Communications Commission and lead to approval of the company's $85 billion buyout of BellSouth Corp.

Approval by the full commission could happen as soon as Friday.

AT&T filed a letter of commitment with the agency Thursday night that adds a number of new conditions to the deal, including a promise to observe "network neutrality" principles, an offer of affordable stand-alone digital subscriber line service and a promise to give up some wireless spectrum.

Final approval still requires a vote of the commissioners, which can happen at any time via computer. The proposed deal is the largest telecommunications merger in U.S. history.

AT&T offered the concessions after a little more than a week of marathon negotiations with lawyers who work for the two Democrats on the commission, Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein, documents show.

Consumer advocates are praising the compromise. Gene Kimmelman, vice president of federal and international affairs for Consumers Union, who has worked closely with the Democrats, said AT&T's new concessions are "an enormous improvement from where we were a month ago."

Commissioners Adelstein and Copps and representatives of AT&T were not immediately available for comment Thursday evening.

The agreement came together 10 days after Republican Commissioner Robert McDowell announced that he would not vote on the deal, despite being authorized to do so by the FCC's general counsel.

McDowell, a Republican, had decided not to participate in the negotiations because of his former position as a lobbyist for Comptel, a trade organization that opposes the merger.

Republican FCC Chairman Kevin Martin, who supported approval of the merger without conditions, was betting that McDowell would vote in favor of the deal following the legal opinion and break a 2-2 partisan deadlock.

DOJ_NMG_0110070

But with McDowell's firm declaration that he would not vote, the pressure shifted to AT&T, which had hoped to close the transaction by the end of the year, a development that put the two Democrats in a much stronger position.

Pressure was added by Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., the incoming chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, who, in a veiled warning to Democrats, said negotiations should proceed "fairly and openly and in a way that avoids imposing burdens that have nothing to do with the transaction."

In an effort to get the merger approved, AT&T submitted a set of concessions on Oct. 13, but they were rejected by the Democrats as insufficient.

In AT&T's letter of commitment, authored by the company's senior vice president in charge of regulatory affairs, Robert W. Quinn Jr., he noted that the new concessions were "significantly more extensive than those submitted on Oct. 13."

For starters, the new offer extends the lifespan of many conditions from 30 months under the old deal to 42 months or longer in some cases.

Among the promises made by the company:

-An offer of stand-alone, high-speed Internet service to customers in its service area for $19.95 per month for 30 months. The "naked DSL (digital subscriber line)" offer would allow those who live in AT&T and BellSouth's service areas to sign up for fast Internet access without being required to buy a package of other services.

-A greater commitment to network neutrality, or nondiscrimination involving Internet traffic. AT&T said it would "maintain a neutral network and neutral routing in its wireline broadband Internet access service" for two years.

-To freeze rates for "special access" customers, usually competitors and large businesses that pay to connect directly to a regional phone company's central office via a dedicated fiber optic line, for 48 months.

-To "assign and/or transfer to an unaffiliated third party" all of its 2.5 GHZ spectrum currently licensed to BellSouth within one year of the merger closing date.

-To "repatriate" 3,000 jobs that were outsourced by BellSouth outside the U.S. by Dec. 31, 2008, with at least 200 of those jobs to be located in New Orleans.

Ben Scott, legislative director for Free Press, a reform group that has fought the merger, said the network neutrality provision was a "big step forward for the supporters of an open Internet."

The creation of the new telecommunications giant was approved by the Justice Department on Oct. 11 without conditions.

After the Oct. 13 offer of concessions from AT&T, negotiations stalled. Martin, declaring an impasse, asked the agency's general counsel to issue an opinion on McDowell's status, a move that drew harsh criticism from Democrats.

General Counsel Sam Feder issued his opinion, but McDowell called a press conference soon after announcing he had no intention to vote, saying that he was being used "as a pawn to forgo meaningful and sincere negotiations."

The combination of San Antonio-based AT&T and Atlanta-based BellSouth would have operations in 22 states. AT&T estimates that about 10,000 jobs would be phased out over three years.

Combined, the companies generate about $117 billion in revenue and operate 68.7 million local phone lines stretching coast to coast across the southern United States and up through the Midwest.

The buyout will also give AT&T complete control over Cingular Wireless, the nation's largest wireless telecommunications provider, which it owns in partnership with BellSouth.

AT&T Yields To Seal BellSouth Deal (WSJ)

By Amy Schatz And Peter Grant

The Wall Street Journal, December 29, 2006

AT&T Inc. made numerous new consumer-friendly concessions on the terms of its proposed $85 billion merger with BellSouth Corp. in an effort to get approval by the Federal Communications Commission before the end of the year.

In a 19-page letter filed with the agency last night, the phone giant promised to observe numerous "network neutrality" principles so it would treat all Internet content equally. Consumer groups and some Internet companies have been pressing the FCC for weeks to make this a condition of approving the merger.

In addition, AT&T agreed to do such things as upgrade the availability of high-speed Internet service in the areas it serves and adhere to price caps on high-volume data lines used by business customers. In a concession to labor unions, the company agreed to repatriate 3,000 jobs outsourced by BellSouth outside the U.S., locating at least 200 of them in the New Orleans area.

"This is a real capitulation by AT&T-BellSouth," said Harold Feld, senior vice president of Media Access Project, a Washington public-interest law firm.

The proposed deal, the largest in U.S. telecommunications-merger history, could be approved by the full commission as early as today. An AT&T spokesman declined to comment.

The deal has some longer-term implications for all phone companies because of the focus by the FCC's Democrats on net neutrality and rates charged to businesses for high-volume data lines. Democrats felt emboldened to take a hard line during negotiations because of their new control of Congress, where Democrats have been riled up about the net-neutrality issue.

AT&T's concessions come after weeks of negotiations with the FCC, which reached an impasse with two Democrats on the five-member commission pushing for additional conditions and the two remaining Republicans opposing them. The fifth commissioner, Robert McDowell, a Republican who many thought would break the tie, decided to abstain because he had previously lobbied on behalf of CompTel, a trade group that represents smaller phone companies.

Mr. McDowell's decision to abstain precipitated an intense round of negotiations, which lasted through the Christmas holiday. The FCC's Democrats insisted that AT&T abide by Internet nondiscrimination rules and essentially came up with a new one as part of this deal. AT&T basically agreed that it wouldn't prioritize Internet traffic once it reached the two dozen or so hubs around the country that process Internet traffic. From that point until it reaches a customer's home, the traffic must be treated equally.

That condition expires in two years. The combined company will have about 11.5 million high-speed Internet subscribers.

From a financial perspective, a more significant condition involves reinstituting FCC price caps dropped after industry deregulation on high-volume data lines used by corporate customers throughout the combined company's 22 state territory. Previously, price caps were required only in areas where the FCC determined that no significant competition existed. Under this deal, the use of price caps for these "special access lines" would expand significantly. The condition is far more extensive than what was required last year when SBC Communications Inc. acquired AT&T Corp, and also stays in place longer, for four years.

The deal would also help consumers and start-up Internet phone companies, like Vonage Holdings Corp., by requiring AT&T to offer stand-alone DSL Internet service for up to $20 a month. That would give consumers access to basically the slowest broadband Internet access available, 768 kilobits per second. But that is fast enough to use Internet phone services provided by AT&T rivals.

AT&T also agreed to divest itself of wireless spectrum that was intended to be used for wireless broadband services, a condition that competitors like Clearwire Corp. have been advocating. Critics have claimed that AT&T and BellSouth had so much spectrum between them others wouldn't be able to compete.

AT&T Offers New Concessions To FCC In BellSouth Deal (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Christopher Stern And Molly Peterson

Bloomberg, December 29, 2006

Dec. 28 (Bloomberg) -- AT&T Inc., the largest U.S. phone company, agreed to new concessions including some price controls to win regulatory approval for its $86 billion purchase of BellSouth Corp.

AT&T made the offer in a letter filed today with the U.S. Federal Communications Commission, a move designed to win the agency approval of the deal as early as tomorrow and clear the last hurdle to completing the purchase.

The offer may end a three-month stalemate between FCC Chairman Kevin Martin, fellow Republican Deborah Taylor Tate and the panel's two Democrats, who have sought price controls and other concessions. Buying BellSouth lets San Antonio-based AT&T expand its local service to 22 states, gain full control of Cingular Wireless LLC and compete with cable television companies offering phone service as well as Web access and TV.

``AT&T really wanted to get it done this year," said Paul Glenchur, an analyst with Stanford Washington Research Group, an investor advisory firm. ``I suspect the Democrats didn't want to look like they were standing in the way."

Shares of AT&T rose 8 cents to $35.50 at 4:27 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. They have gained 45 percent this year. Atlanta-based BellSouth rose 18 cents to $46.80 and has gained 73 percent this year.

DSL Service

The concessions by AT&T go beyond those the company proposed in October. AT&T offered, for example, to sell fast Internet access known as DSL for $19.95 a month without requiring customers to buy phone service, the letter said.

The company also said it would repatriate 3,000 BellSouth jobs now outside the U.S. and pledged 200 jobs for New Orleans.

Democratic Commissioners Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein gained leverage in seeking tougher conditions after the fifth commissioner, Republican Robert McDowell, said he would abstain from voting because of his past work as a lobbyist for smaller companies that compete with AT&T.

Under the proposed deal, AT&T wouldn't raise prices on some ``special access'' lines that provide high-capacity phone and data services for large businesses for four years.

The company also agreed to divest some wireless licenses in BellSouth's nine-state region. The licenses cover airwaves suitable for high-speed Internet access. Atlanta-based Cingular, co-owned by AT&T and BellSouth, is the biggest U.S. wireless services company.

Network Neutrality

In a bow to backers of ``network neutrality,'' AT&T said it would refrain from charging Web companies such as Google Inc. premium fees for faster subscriber access. Neutrality supporters have urged Congress not to let phone companies charge higher fees for faster service, which they liken to the creation of tolls on the Internet.

The new concessions ``are significantly more extensive than those submitted on October 13,'' AT&T Senior Vice President Robert W. Quinn said in the letter.

The transaction won unconditional approval from the Justice Department and 18 states.

BellSouth investors will get 1.325 AT&T shares for each they now own, representing an 18 percent premium based on the companies' stock prices on March 3, the last trading day before the deal was announced. While that put the value of the deal at about $67 billion, AT&T shares have risen 27 percent since then.

AT&T's 5.1 percent notes maturing in September 2014 rose 0.71 cent to 97.37 cents on the dollar to yield to 5.52 percent, according to Trace, the bond reporting system of the NASD. BellSouth's 5.2 percent notes due in September 2014 fell 0.64 cent to 97.21 cents to yield 5.65 percent.

General Dynamics' Purchase Challenged (WP)

By Renae Merle, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

Federal antitrust authorities, citing concerns about higher prices and less competition, challenged General Dynamics' plans yesterday to buy a Canadian ammunition maker.

The Federal Trade Commission ruled that to buy SNC Technologies of Quebec, General Dynamics must divest its interest in one of the two other competitors in the market. Otherwise, "General Dynamics could unilaterally raise prices or otherwise engage in anticompetitive conduct," the FTC said in a statement.

The company, headquartered in Falls Church, has agreed to those terms.

It is at least the third time this year that federal regulators have expressed concern about diminishing competition among military contactors. The agency took more than a year to approve a plan by Lockheed Martin and Boeing to merge their government rocket businesses, acknowledging that creating a monopoly in a multibillion-dollar market would probably lead to higher prices and lower quality. The FTC approved General Dynamics' $2.2 billion acquisition of technology firm Anteon in June only after Anteon agreed to sell a unit that raised conflict-of-interest concerns.

In February, General Dynamics announced that it would buy SNC Technologies for $275 million. SNC is one of three makers of mortar rounds, relatively inexpensive shells used by infantry troops, for the U.S. military. The others are Day &

Zimmerman of Philadelphia and American Ordnance of Pittsburg, Kan., which is jointly owned by General Dynamics and Day & Zimmerman.

Unconditionally allowing the acquisition of SNC would give General Dynamics control of two of the three competitors in the market, the FTC said. Day & Zimmerman's market position also is in doubt since the ammunition plant it operates in Kansas is slated to close under the 2005 Base Closure and Realignment legislation, according to the FTC. The lack of competition would also increase the likelihood that General Dynamics could "unilaterally exercise market power" and raise prices, the agency's complaint said.

The FTC has approved a consent decree calling for General Dynamics to divest its 50 percent stake in American Ordnance and allow the agency to appoint a monitor to oversee compliance, the statement said. The commission will vote after a 30-day comment period on whether to make the agreement final.

"Mortars and artillery are critical components in the U.S. military's arsenal," Jeffrey Schmidt, director of the FTC's Bureau of Competition, said in a statement. Requiring the sale "will ensure that our war fighters continue to benefit from competition and do not pay more for the ammunition."

General Dynamics has not found a buyer for its stake in American Ordnance yet, said Rob Doolittle, a General Dynamics spokesman. "We'll make an announcement when we have a buyer," he said. "I can't speculate about when that might be at this point."

The weapons maker is also awaiting approval by the Canadian government. The acquisition, which was originally expected to close in the middle of this year, is now expected to close within the first few months of 2007, Doolittle said.

General Dynamics is already one of the largest suppliers of medium- and large-caliber ammunition for tanks and helicopters used by the U.S. military. Its ordnance and tactical systems unit recorded $615 million in munitions and other sales in 2005, the FTC said. The deal, if approved, would bring new customers, including the Canadian government.

AP, December 29, 2006

SUNNYVALE, Calif. (AP) - Chip-maker Intel Corp. said it would not object to a court order to produce documents related to its international business practices, as part of an antitrust case filed by rival Advanced Micro Devices Inc.

AMD said the court order issued Wednesday was a "significant legal victory."

In a letter to Judge Joseph Farnan in the U.S. Federal District Court in Delaware, Intel said it plans to cooperate with the court order and that it does not plan to file an objection.

Intel also noted that a court-appointed Special Master explicitly said it was not making decisions about whether the evidence would be admissible in court.

In September, a federal judge ruled that if AMD wins the antitrust case filed in the U.S., it cannot receive damages for Intel's alleged monopolistic practices overseas.

The lawsuit dates to June 2005, when AMD initiated an antitrust case against Intel, alleging that its business was harmed by Intel's practice of offering rebates, discounts and other incentives to persuade PC makers to use chips from Intel instead of AMD. AMD argued that Intel sustains a monopoly that allows it to charge higher prices.

Intel responded that AMD's problems were rooted in its reputation for being an unreliable supplier and that it failed to adequately invest in its business.

Shares of AMD slipped 13 cents to close at $20.57 on the New York Stock Exchange, while Intel shares rose 2 cents to end at $20.42 on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

AMD Claims Key Legal Victory In Intel Antitrust Fight (MRKTWTCH)

By Matt Andrejczak, MarketWatch

Market Watch, December 29, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO (MarketWatch) - Advanced Micro Devices Inc. on Thursday claimed a key legal victory in its ongoing antitrust suit against its bigger rival Intel Corp.

A Delaware federal court has ruled that Intel must produce documents and other evidence related to its foreign dealings with PC makers, distributors and others. The ruling overturns Intel's prior objections.

"This ruling removes any basis for Intel or its foreign customers to withhold evidence of Intel's exclusion, regardless of where it occurred," said Tom McCoy, AMD's chief legal officer, in a statement.

U.S. District Judge Joseph Farnan had previously sided with Intel, opining that the court lacked jurisdiction over AMD's foreign conduct claims. But a special master appointed to oversee discovery disputes in the case agreed with AMD that the PC-chip market is global, with 68% of the world's computers sold to non-U.S. customers.

Sunnyvale, Calif.-based AMD said it thinks this latest development will bolster it claims that Intel used anticompetitive practices in the sale of PC chips worldwide.

AMD has subpoenaed roughly 70 parties so far in the case, and as a result of this court order, it is likely AMD will target Intel's business partners in Japan, where antitrust regulators there have suggested Intel abused its position as the world's No. 1 computer-chip maker.

AMD originally filed its antitrust suit against Intel in June 2005. The suit accused Intel of bullying a range of computer makers, distributors and retailers from Europe to Asia into not selling or supporting AMD products. Intel has denied the charges.

This week's ruling is a setback for Intel, which elected not to challenge the decision of the Special Master Vincent Poppiti.

"While Intel obviously had hoped for a different outcome regarding discovery, Intel of course will comply with the Special Master's decision and will respond as the Special Master directs," Richard L. Horwitz, an attorney representing Intel, told Judge Farnan, Jr. in a letter dated Dec. 27.

Still, the latest ruling is not clear legal victory for AMD, which controls roughly 20% of the PC-chip market worldwide.

It's not known whether any evidence AMD digs up pertaining to Intel's foreign business dealings will be heard in the court trial set for April 2009.

Special Master Poppiti, appointed by Judge Joseph Farnan, Jr. to oversee all discovery disputes in the case, has left that up in the air.

"In this regard, the Special Master does not opine on the ultimate admissibility" of any foreign conduct material "for the purposes of trial," Poppiti wrote in his ruling.

This sets the stage for other legal battles ahead of the trial. Intel said it plans to address evidentiary issues with the court when the time comes.

In midafternoon trading Thursday, AMD shares fell 13 cents to $20.57. Intel shares rose 1 cent to $20.41. Matt Andrejczak is a reporter for MarketWatch in San Francisco.

EPA Charges Bus Co. Broke Pollution Law (BOSH)

By Donna Goodison

Boston Herald, December 29, 2006

Chelsea-based Paul Revere Transportation faces federal penalties for alleged repeat violations of a state law forbidding buses from idling more than five minutes.

The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency and the U.S. Justice Department filed suit in district court on Tuesday, alleging the transportation company left its diesel buses idling for a total of more than 100 hours at its Roxbury bus yard and a shuttle bus location on Brookline Avenue.

“Given the extremely high asthma rates in Roxbury, it is unacceptable that diesel buses and other vehicles are left idling for more than an hour at a time,” Robert Varney, New England EPA administrator, said in a statement. “Diesel pollution is very harmful, especially for sensitive populations such as the young, elderly and people who suffer from asthma.”

Paul Revere Transportation could not be immediately reached for comment. The company is a joint venture of Alternate Concepts Inc. and Modern Continental Construction, its Web site says.

The EPA witnessed the alleged idling during eight weekly inspections in April and March. At times, more than 20 vehicles were found idling - some for more than an hour and, in one case, for more than two hours, according to the agency.

Follow-up inquiries suggested violations may have been ongoing for several years, it said.

Paul Revere Transportation is liable for civil penalties of up to $32,500 per day for each violation that occurred after March 15, 2004, and $27,500 per day for each violation before that, according to the court complaint.

The EPA previously fined the company in 2002 for illegal idling of its shuttle buses at Boston's Logan International Airport.

FDA Tentatively Declares Food From Cloned Animals To Be Safe (NYT)

By Andrew Pollack And Andrew Martin

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

After years of delay, the Food and Drug Administration tentatively concluded yesterday that milk and meat from some cloned farm animals are safe to eat. That finding could make the United States the first country to allow products from cloned livestock to be sold in grocery stores.

Even if the agency's assessment is formally approved next year, consumers will not see many steaks or pork chops from cloned animals because the technology is still too expensive to be used widely.

But the F.D.A.'s draft policy touched off an immediate storm of criticism from consumer groups, as well as some concerns from meat and dairy companies worried about consumer reaction.

"At the end of the day, F.D.A. is looking out for a few cloning companies and not for consumers or the dairy industry," said Joseph Mendelson, legal director for the Center for Food Safety, an advocacy group.

Mr. Mendelson and other consumer representatives argue that the science backing the F.D.A.'s decision is shaky and that consumer surveys show that most people are opposed to cloning animals, let alone eating them. Some also said that cloning causes harm to the animals involved and could pave the way for human cloning.

Opponents hope to bring Congressional pressure to bear to derail the policy before it becomes final or at least to require that such foods be labeled so consumers can choose to avoid them. F.D.A. officials said that it was unlikely that labeling would be required because food from cloned animals is indistinguishable from other food, although a final decision about labeling has not been made.

Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, yesterday called for a "careful, deliberative and open process" before cloned animals are approved for food.

The F.D.A.'s finding comes more than six years after the agency first decided to study the matter, after recognizing that the advent of cloned farm animals raised a food safety issue. After that study, the agency in 2003 gave a tentative approval to cloned animals for food. But the F.D.A. retreated after its own advisory panel found there was insufficient scientific backing for that conclusion.

This time, F.D.A. officials said they had substantial new data, which they presented yesterday in a nearly 700-page "draft risk assessment."

The officials denied the contention from some critics that the policy was announced during a holiday week in order to reduce publicity, saying it had taken until now to analyze the data and obtain comment from other government agencies.

The assessment concluded that milk and meat from cloned cows, pigs and goats, and from their offspring, were "as safe to eat as the food we eat every day," Stephen F. Sundlof, the F.D.A.'s chief of veterinary medicine, said in a telephone call with reporters.

Mr. Sundlof said that by law the agency could consider only the scientific issues, not consumer demand or the ethics of cloning.

While animal cloning has always been legal, since 2001 there has been a voluntary moratorium on the sales of milk or meat from such animals to give the F.D.A. time to study the matter. Some experts say that some products from clones or their offspring have probably nonetheless made their way into the food supply.

The moratorium will stay in place until the new policy is completed, after a 90-day period for public comment and additional time for the F.D.A. to review the comments. Mr. Sundlof said he could not say when the final policy would be ready, though it might be by the end of 2007.

Even then, the moratorium would remain for products from sheep, the F.D.A. said, because there was not enough evidence of their safety. No one has yet succeeded in cloning chickens or other poultry.

The finding was hailed by cloning companies, which have been struggling to build a business. It also drew praise from some farmers and breeders who have already made clones of their prized livestock but have had to pour milk down the drain and keep their meat off the market.

They say that cloning is just another breeding technique, like artificial insemination or in-vitro fertilization.

"This just sort of lifts the stigma of the clones," said Bob Schauf, a Holstein breeder and dairy farmer in Barron, Wis., who had two of his prized cows cloned. He said his family and the families of his employees have been drinking the milk from those clones rather than see it go to waste. But dairy marketers have expressed concern.

A survey conducted last summer by the International Dairy Foods Association, an industry trade group, found that 14 percent of women would turn away from all dairy products if milk from clones were introduced into the food supply. The association surveyed women because its research has found them to be the main household decision makers on dairy products.

The American Meat Institute, while saying yesterday that cloning was safe, also urged the F.D.A. to be cautious about approval "if most consumers are unwilling to accept the technology."

A poll this month from the nonprofit Pew Initiative on Food and Biotechnology found that while most consumers knew little about animal cloning, 64 percent said they were uncomfortable with it, with 46 percent saying they were "strongly uncomfortable."

F.D.A. officials said no other country had yet approved food from cloned livestock, although some are considering it. That raised the prospect that American exports of milk or meat could be blocked by certain countries if they contain products from cloned animals. An official in the Washington delegation of the European Union said politicians and consumers in Europe would no doubt debate the issue.

Carol Tucker Foreman, director for food policy at the Consumer Federation of America, said consumer groups would ask food companies, retailers and restaurant chains to shun products from cloned livestock.

That raises the possibility that some food companies will label their products "clone free," just as some now label milk as not coming from cows injected with growth hormone.

Cloning involves putting an animal's DNA into an egg thats own DNA has been removed. The resulting embryo, after being implanted into a surrogate mother, makes a genetically identical copy of the original animal.

But even if two animals have identical genes, they can turn out differently if those genes are turned on or off at different times. And studies have shown that patterns of gene activity are different in embryos created by cloning compared with embryos created by the fusing of sperm and egg.

These differences are presumed to account in large measure for the low success rate of cloning. Fetuses can grow unusually large, posing a risk to the surrogate mother. Many clones die during gestation or shortly after birth. Some are born with deformed heads or limbs or problems with their hearts, lungs or other organs.

But the F.D.A. said that obviously sick and deformed animals were already barred from the food supply. It added that clones that survived past the first few days "appear to grow and develop normally" and that healthy adult clones were "virtually indistinguishable" from noncloned livestock, making their meat or milk safe.

The draft assessment based its conclusions on an extensive review of scientific literature on cloning as well as on studies, some done by cloning companies, comparing the composition of the milk, meat and blood of cloned animals and conventional animals.

Mr. Sundlof said the agency also found that cloning "poses no unique risks to the health of animals" beyond those seen with other forms of assisted reproduction such as in-vitro fertilization. The frequency of problems is higher with cloning, however, perhaps because it is a newer technology. The first cloned mammal, Dolly the sheep, was born in 1996.

The F.D.A.'s announcement, by paving the way for the end of the moratorium, could make it easier to persuade farmers and breeders to pay $15,000 to copy a prized bull or dairy cow.

“I think that this draft is going to provide the industry the comfort it needs,” said Mark Walton, president of ViaGen, a cloning company based in Austin, Tex., that has yet to turn a profit after five years.

Industry officials estimate there are now only about 500 or 600 cloned cows in the United States, out of tens of millions of beef and dairy cows. There are roughly 200 cloned pigs.

Experts say that cloning is too expensive to be used to make animals only to then grind them into hamburger or even to milk them. Rather, farmers and breeders are cloning prized livestock so they can then be used for breeding using more conventional means of reproduction.

That means that most food from cloning would come from the sexually produced offspring of the cloned animals. The F.D.A. said milk and meat from such offspring were safe, because any abnormalities in clones do not carry into the next generation.

The agency’s assessment did not include genetically modified animals, in which a foreign gene is introduced. The agency is still deciding whether to allow the first of those, a fast-growing fish, into the food supply.

FDA Says Clones Are Safe To Eat (WP)

By Rick Weiss

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

Taking a long-awaited stand in an emotionally fraught food fight, the Food and Drug Administration yesterday released a 678-page analysis concluding that milk and meat from cloned animals pose no unique risks to consumers.

The decision, subject to change after a period of public comment, stops short of approving the sale of food from clones and leaves in place for now a long-standing government request that farmers keep their clones off the market.

But it represents a crucial milestone for the handful of biotechnology companies that see cloning as a welcome opportunity to sidestep the vagaries of sexual reproduction and instead mass-produce some of the nation's finest meat- and milk-producing animals.

"The higher-end breeders are going to start signing up and taking advantage of this," said Mark Walton, president of Austin-based ViaGen, which has produced about 250 cloned cattle and pigs in preparation for what the company hopes will be a robust market in farm clones. "They've been interested, but they've been skeptical that we'd ever get the regulatory process dealt with."

Opponents, however -- including some who doubt the safety of cloned food and others concerned about the welfare of the animals -- vowed to fight the new momentum toward approval.

"This is a lose-lose decision for consumers and the dairy industry," said Joseph Mendelson, legal director at the Center for Food Safety in Washington, which has petitioned the FDA to regulate cloned farm animals one type at a time, much as it regulates new drugs.

Release of the draft risk assessment was delayed for years, in part by a coalition of big-name dairy companies concerned that the "yuck factor" surrounding cloned animals might tarnish milk's image and undermine sales. Surveys have consistently found that a majority of consumers are wary of food from clones, with many saying they would avoid it.

Yet study after study reviewed by the FDA failed to find any scientific reason to keep meat or milk from clones off store shelves.

"Extensive evaluation of the available data has not identified any food consumption risks or subtle hazards in healthy clones of cattle, swine, or goats," the FDA risk assessment concludes.

In apparent recognition of consumer distrust of cloned food -- and of widespread public misunderstanding about the science of cloning -- the agency posted on its Web site not only the detailed technical report but also several lay-language documents that aim to debunk negative "myths" about clones, which the agency notes are copies of existing animals and are not engineered to have new traits.

The agency also took the unprecedented step of posting all the raw scientific data it used to come to its conclusion, along with unedited copies of comments it received from independent experts who were asked to review the report in advance.

"We have looked very, very closely," Stephen F. Sundlof, the FDA's chief of veterinary medicine, said in a telephone news conference. "There's just not anything there that is conceivably hazardous to the public health."

Sundlof declined to predict when the agency might come to a final decision. With public comment allowed through April 2, and with the agency's need to thoroughly review those comments, a decision could come by the end of 2007, he said.

Even if a positive decision sails through, consumers will have to wait awhile for their first clone burger. Fewer than 1,000 cloned animals are living on U.S. farms, out of tens of millions of cattle and pigs. And it takes about two years to produce a cloned steer for slaughter and even longer to grow a cloned dairy cow old enough to be milked.

Moreover, with price tags up to $15,000 apiece, clones are currently too valuable to kill or milk directly. So most will initially be used as breeding stock to make high-quality offspring for slaughter or milking, a process that will take an extra couple of years.

"Everything is basically two to three years away, even if it all opens up tomorrow," said Steve Mower, director of marketing at Cyagra, a livestock-cloning company in Elizabethtown, Pa.

To make a clone, scientists take a single skin cell from an animal they want to replicate. They fuse it with a cow egg that has had its DNA removed, resulting in the creation of an embryo that can be transferred to the womb of a surrogate mother animal. The resulting newborn is a twin of the animal that donated the initial cell.

Opponents of food from clones note that the animals harbor subtle molecular differences in their DNA as a result of having been produced from a single parent. They also point to higher rates of problems during fetal development, resulting in birth defects and a high miscarriage rate, which in turn poses risks to the surrogate mother.

Some also question the economic sense of using cloning to make superproductive dairy cows.

Carol Tucker Foreman of the Consumer Federation of America said U.S. farmers produce more milk than Americans can drink, and the government must buy the surplus. "Since 1999, dairy support programs have cost taxpayers over $5 billion," she said in a statement.

Supporters counter that DNA differences in clones do not translate into discernible differences in the chemical composition of their milk or meat, as shown in many studies that have measured thousands of variables, including protein, fatty acid and vitamin levels.

The developmental problems are not different from those seen in animals produced by commonly used assisted reproductive techniques such as in vitro fertilization and artificial insemination, FDA officials said. And although the rates of those problems are higher in clones, they are declining as techniques improve.

Although some may doubt that cloned food is cost-efficient -- and others worry that the presence of cloned products in the U.S. food supply could hurt exports if other countries, none of which has approved food from clones, reject those products -- economics are not under the FDA's purview, officials said.

In conjunction with the risk assessment, the FDA yesterday released a risk-management plan, which outlines how the agency would track newly emerging concerns about food from clones in coming years. It includes a proposal to create a publicly accessible database of all new findings as companies scale up their operations.

Although ViaGen and Cyagra volunteered large amounts of data to the FDA for its risk analysis and have offered to continue cooperating, officials at both companies said this week they will have to consider whether they can promise public release of all their findings.

Several groups are pushing for a requirement that cloned food be labeled as such, allowing consumers to avoid it. Sundlof said such labels would be inconsistent with a long-standing FDA policy to reserve labels for scientifically substantive issues. But he said the agency would be open to "clone-free" labels on foods that come from other sources.

Congress could also get involved. This month, Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) and six other senators wrote to Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt, asking that the FDA run the new risk assessment past an additional scientific review board and study the global trade implications.

In statements released yesterday, Leahy and Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski (D-Md.) -- who has expressed reservations about food from clones -- encouraged Americans to send their opinions to the FDA.

FDA Rules Meat From Cloned Animals Is Safe To Eat (LAT)

By Karen Kaplan

The Los Angeles Times, December 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0110079

The Food and Drug Administration on Thursday formally endorsed the safety of meat and milk from cloned cattle, pigs and goats, but the agency's 678-page report failed to satisfy critics who say their opposition is rooted in concerns over ethics, not science.

"Neither the agency nor animal scientists are qualified to tell us whether and when it is ethically acceptable for humans to alter the essential nature of animals," said Carol Tucker Foreman of the Food Policy Institute at the Consumer Federation of America in Washington.

She and others said the time has come for a national discussion about the wisdom of creating tailor-made animals in laboratories, regardless of whether it is scientifically possible to do so.

"Congressional hearings might start a robust societal dialogue on those issues," said Gregory Jaffe, biotechnology director at the Center for Science in the Public Interest.

Polls show Americans are hardly clamoring for bacon cheeseburgers made from cloned animals or their offspring. A survey this month by the Pew Initiative on Food and Biotechnology found that 64% of respondents are uncomfortable with the idea of cloning animals, let alone eating them.

Such concerns were outside the scope of the FDA's scientific review.

The agency's Center for Veterinary Medicine focused on the health of cloned animals and their progeny, tracking them with physical examinations and blood tests and comparing the results to animals bred conventionally. Researchers also subjected meat and milk from clones and their offspring to detailed chemical analysis.

"We looked at essential elements like vitamins, fatty acids -- a whole array of different components -- to try to determine if there was any distinguishable difference between foods from clones and their offspring compared to foods from conventionally raised animals," said Stephen F. Sundlof, director of the Center for Veterinary Medicine. "There was no difference."

The report didn't address the contentious issue of whether products derived from clones would require special labeling.

Cloning allows farmers and ranchers to create an identical twin of prized animal -- perhaps a dairy cow that's an unusually prolific milk producer or a bull whose offspring make for consistently lean and juicy steaks.

A voluntary moratorium has kept most cloned animals and their offspring out of the food supply, though ranchers say at least a few dozen have gone to slaughterhouses. The moratorium will remain in effect until the FDA issues its final ruling, possibly by the end of 2007.

If the report is adopted, the United States would become the first country to approve the use of animal cloning in food production, Sundlof said.

To create a clone, a normal egg is removed from a donor cow and the genes are replaced with DNA from the animal to be copied. An electric shock induces the egg to grow into a genetic copy of the original. It is then implanted into the womb of a surrogate mother.

Cloning is simply an extension of assisted reproduction technologies that ranchers have been using since the 1950s, said Amy lager,Ö co-owner of a mid-sized dairy farm in Fulton, Md.

Since clones cost about $20,000 to produce, they are used primarily for breeding while their offspring head to slaughterhouses or milking barns.

The FDA's risk assessment found that cloned animals are more likely to suffer from birth defects and other health problems that can lead to death in utero or shortly after birth. But those problems have already been seen with other breeding technologies, and current federal inspections would keep any unsuitable animals out of the food supply, Sundlof said.

In fact, he said, there's no reason to treat a clone differently from the rest of a herd.

That conclusion makes consumer advocates fear that products from clones will wind up in grocery stores and restaurants without special labeling that would give shoppers the opportunity to avoid the products.

Sundlof said the FDA only has the authority to require labeling if a food includes a harmful substance or is missing an essential element -- neither of which appears to be the case with cloned animal products.

Still, he said, the agency will hold off on making a decision on labeling until it reviews public comments that are received over the next 90 days.

In the absence of mandatory labeling, some producers may be able to advertise that their products are not derived through cloning, just as milk producers can say that their animals were not treated with supplemental bovine growth hormone, he said.

FDA Backs Safety Of Meat, Milk From Cloned Animals (USAT)

By Elizabeth Weise

USA Today, December 29, 2006

As expected, the Food and Drug Administration announced Thursday that its scientific assessment of meat and milk from cloned animals determined they were safe for human consumption. The announcement, coming after four years of review and research, is just the beginning of what will be a year or more process of public input and discussion before these products can be sold. USA TODAY's Elizabeth Weise explains the issues involved.

Q: How are clones made?

A: Let's use a cow as an example, as cattle are the most commonly cloned farm animals right now. A single cell is taken from an adult cow. Its genetic material is inserted into another cow's egg that has had its genetic material removed. A jolt of electricity tricks the egg into thinking it has been fertilized and it begins to grow. The resulting embryo is implanted into the uterus of a surrogate cow, which gives birth to the cloned calf.

Q: Will cloned meat and milk be on supermarket shelves soon?

A: No. After public comment is collected during a 90-day period, the agency has to go through it all and incorporate it into its guidelines for the industry. FDA doesn't expect to finish that process until the end of 2007 at the earliest. The voluntary moratorium on the sale of meat and milk from cloned animals will remain in effect until that happens, so nothing should arrive in stores until at least 2008.

Q: So in 2008 all our meat and milk will be from clones?

A: No. Clones are expensive to produce, about $20,000 per animal. For example, there are only about 150 cloned cows in the USA today. They're too pricey and too rare to use as meat or really even as milking cows. Instead, they'll be used like elite breeding stock, "to pass on naturally occurring, desirable traits such as disease resistance and higher-quality meat to production herds," in the FDA's words.

Q: We won't be eating clones?

A: Very few. What we'll likely get is some meat and milk from the offspring of clones. If a cloned cow or bull is at the end of its life span, it might end up as hamburger, but it will be a microscopic amount of the nation's meat supply.

Q: Are clones dangerous to eat?

A: The FDA says all its research shows that you can't tell a cloned animal from a conventionally bred one even down to the chemical level, so they're not more dangerous than a normal cow, pig or goat. One French study found that some cloned cows reached puberty later and had slightly different fat metabolism than normal cattle and suggested a need for further research.

Q: What about the ethical and moral issues?

A: FDA's mandate is to ensure that the U.S. food supply is safe and wholesome. Its research looks only at safety. But numerous animal welfare groups believe that cloning is unethical because it harms animals. Cloned animals have a higher rate of birth defects and abnormalities than conventionally bred animals.

Q: What does FDA say?

A: FDA's position is that none of the problems seen with clones are different from problems that occur in many of the assisted reproductive technologies commonly used today on farms.

Q: What countries allow the sale of meat and milk from cloned animals?

A: None. The USA will be the first, though numerous other countries are watching FDA's process closely.

Q: Will cloned meat and milk be labeled at the store?

A: Probably not. FDA says that it hasn't yet decided whether it will require labeling. In general, the agency requires products to be labeled only if they might be misleading (butter vs. margarine) or for nutritional labeling (canola oil that is genetically engineered to have high oleic acid). Because FDA has said that meat and milk from cloned animals is indistinguishable from conventionally bred animals, there appears to be no basis for the agency to require labeling.

Q: How can I throw in my opinion during the 90-day period of public comment?

A: To submit electronic comments, visit www.accessdata.fda.gov/scripts/oc/dockets/comments/commentdocket.cfm?AGENCY=FDA and search for docket 2006P-0415. Written comments: Division of Dockets Management (HFA-305), Food and Drug Administration, 5630 Fishers Lane, Rm. 1061, Rockville, MD 20852. Comments must be received by April 2 and should include the docket number 2006P-0415.

FDA Clears Cloned Foods (WT)

By Gregory Lopes

The Washington Times, December 29, 2006

The Food and Drug Administration said yesterday that meat and milk from cloned animals is safe, opening the door for pork chops and milk from clones to be sold on grocery shelves late next year.

A risk assessment released yesterday by the FDA shows that there is no public health risk from eating cloned foods. If that report withstands the federal regulatory process, Americans could become the first people in the world to serve bacon and hamburgers from cloned animals.

Federal officials would not say exactly when sales of the cloned-animal products -- from cows, pigs and goats -- could become a reality, but "it is conceivable" that late next year a moratorium banning cloned-animal products could be lifted.

"It is almost inconceivable with what we know that this technology will introduce hazards to public health," said Stephen Sundlof, director of the Center for Veterinary Medicine at FDA. "We have looked for hazards, and they just are not there."

The FDA's research focused solely on cloned animals and did not include studies on how humans reacted to eating foods from genetically engineered animals, Dr. Sundlof said.

Because of unknown health risks associated with cloning, the FDA put a voluntary moratorium on the sale of meat and milk from cloned animals in 2001.

Cloning lets farmers and ranchers make copies of exceptional animals, such as pigs that fatten rapidly or cows that are superior milk producers. Cloning currently is not practiced specifically to produce food; rather, farmers generally use cloned cows or pigs to breed.

"It remains to be seen whether dairy farmers will choose to use [cloning technology]. There is currently no consumer benefits in milk from cloned cows," the International Dairy Foods Association said yesterday.

The FDA does not keep a registry of how many cloned animals there are in the country, but industry officials estimate there could be as many as 600 cloned cows in the United States and 200 pigs. The cost of cloning an animal is steep, about $20,000 each to produce.

The likelihood of cloned meat and dairy products entering the food supply will remain slight in the short term even if the moratorium is lifted. Because of the high cost of the technology, cloned animals are primarily used for breeding, not for food, Dr. Sundlof said. Therefore, consumers would mostly get food from their offspring and not the clones themselves.

Cloned animals are derived from the healthiest animals in the herd and therefore are more disease-resistant and offer leaner meat than conventionally produced animals, Dr. Sundlof said.

But that assertion is disputed by the Consumers Union, a nonprofit consumer-safety organization that says the cloning process produces a sick animal that often dies soon after being reproduced. Furthermore, the organization contends that cloning weakens animals' disease resistance because the cloned animals need more antibiotics to survive.

"There is a significant concern that we will be getting animals that are more prone to disease," said Jean Halloran, a food-policy specialist with Consumers Union.

If the FDA does approve the cloned-animal food products, the agency does not think the products will have to be labeled as coming from cloned animals or their offspring.

Rep. Rosa DeLauro, Connecticut Democrat, who will head the House Appropriations agriculture subcommittee, said lawmakers should consider whether disclosure and labeling are appropriate for food from cloned animals.

Consumer groups, including Consumers Union, are adamantly in favor of a labeling requirement.

"Consumers are going to be having a product that has potential safety issues and has a whole load of ethical issues tied to it, without any labeling," said Joseph Mendelson, legal director of the Center for Food Safety, a Washington environmental advocacy organization.

The FDA has not made a final decision on the labeling requirement but did say that retailers and manufacturers may be able to label food products "clone free," if the label is "truthful and does not imply it is safer than other products," Dr. Sundlof said.

The FDA decision is based on substantial data from a number of studies, all of which have concluded that milk and meat from cloned animals is virtually identical to products from conventional animals.

"None of the studies ... identify any remarkable nutritionally or toxicologically important differences in the composition of the meat or milk," according to a draft of the risk assessment to be published Monday in Theriogenology, a scientific journal on animal reproduction. The paper was written by scientists at the FDA's Center for Veterinary Medicine.

Dr. Sundlof said the FDA currently does not have enough information to decide whether food from sheep clones is safe.

Squeamish Consumers May Balk As FDA Backs Cloned Meat, Milk (WSJ)

By Jane Zhang, Scott Kilman And Lauren Etter

By declaring milk and meat from cloned farm animals safe to eat, federal regulators have opened the door to far-reaching changes in livestock production. But industry concerns about consumer squeamishness toward cloning suggest cloned beef and pork won't be on sale at supermarket meat counters anytime soon.

In a long-awaited decision announced yesterday, the Food and Drug Administration said it couldn't find any differences between meat and milk from healthy conventionally bred adult cattle, pigs and goats and that from healthy cloned animals and their offspring. As a result, the agency said it would probably allow the meat and milk of these cloned animals and their offspring to be sold without any special labeling to alert consumers.

Cloning, or producing an identical copy of an animal using the genetic material of the original, would give farmers a way to upgrade their livestock herds by replicating their prized animals. It would allow them to preserve valuable traits, such as high meat or milk production, superior fertility or disease resistance.

That could be a boon to the livestock industry, which so far has largely missed out on the biotechnology revolution that swept through plant agriculture a decade ago. Meatpackers, for example, might prefer to buy the offspring of a cloned pig with loins the perfect size for making pork chops or cattle with just the right amount of fat in the steak. Improved, consistent quality, in turn, could boost consumer demand.

Recent opinion polls show that most Americans know little about cloning but are wary of foods from cloned animals, with many citing ethical, religious and social concerns. Mindful of such reservations, large meat and dairy producers and their trade associations are taking a wait-and-see attitude. And a spokesman for Wal-Mart Stores Inc. said yesterday that the nation's largest food retailer has no plans to sell products made from cloned livestock.

"It's an issue of interest to us and the rest of the meatpacking industry, and something that we'll be following closely in the months ahead," said Archie Schaffer, spokesman for meat and poultry processor Tyson Foods Inc. Smithfield Foods Inc., the nation's largest pork producer, wouldn't comment yesterday, but in 2003, the company said it had "severe skepticism about the consumer reaction" to cloned animals.

The FDA, which has been studying the safety of food derived from cloned animals for four years, concluded that meat and dairy from cloned animals "are as safe as food we eat every day." The agency also indicated that if such foods go into production, it would be unlikely to recommend special labeling, the same policy it has adopted with genetically modified crops already on the market.

U.S. meat exports, already buffeted by concerns in some countries about mad-cow disease, could hang in the balance. The FDA has consulted major U.S. trading partners and agencies such as the U.S. Trade Representative on the cloning issue. But it isn't clear if that would help the U.S. livestock industry, should it embrace cloning, to win over foreign consumers.

Even though cloned animals exist in countries such as Japan, New Zealand and Australia, none have gone so far as the U.S. now has in nudging them toward the market. A French assessment of cloning reached the same conclusions as the FDA's, but that hasn't translated into public policy. European consumers, more than their American counterparts, are skeptical about genetically modified foods and biotechnology in general.

Canice Nolan, head of food safety, health and consumer affairs at the European Commission Delegation in Washington, said it was premature to talk about the impact of the FDA's decision on trade. However, he noted that cloning raises legal, ethical and social concerns.

According to a recent report to the European Union's executive arm by the Danish Centre for Bioethics and Risk Assessment, "Groups of citizens, and even some member states, would be likely to resist the import and/or marketing [labeled or unlabeled] of cloned animals and their products."

In South Korea, one of the largest export markets for U.S. beef, cloned foods "are not positive," said Sockjoong Yoon, minister for public affairs at the South Korean Embassy in Washington. Chong Ghee Ahn, the embassy's economic counselor, said it was too early to say what impact cloning might have on U.S. exports. However, he added that in the wake of mad-cow disease and avian flu, "Korean customers are getting very, very sensitive."

The FDA's safety assessment, which the agency calls "strictly a scientific evaluation," requires a 90-day period for public comment. Biotechnology experts said it would take at least three or four years after that for products made from cloned animals and their offspring to land on grocery shelves.

"There's no doubt that in the long run, probably in the immediate run, that this will be a substantial boon to producers of milk and meat, not only in the United States but around the world," said Val Giddings, a biotechnology consultant and a former senior staff geneticist at the U.S. Agriculture Department. "It frees the producers of milk and meat to use more fully and effectively the very best breeding stock available. They can use their healthiest animals, use animals with high resistance to disease."

Consumer and animal-rights groups said yesterday that consumers have little to gain from the FDA ruling, and that safety considerations alone don't make good public policy. "Cloning will not produce safer or cheaper milk and meat," said Carol Tucker-Foreman, director of food policy at Consumer Federation of America. "Having cloned cows produce more milk won't reduce milk prices."

The FDA said ethical issues were beyond the agency's jurisdiction, but it took pains to address consumer concerns. "Cloning poses no unique risks to animal health when compared to other assisted reproductive technologies," such as in vitro fertilization, said Stephen F. Sundlof, director of the FDA's Center for Veterinary Medicine.

The agency added that cloning was just another assisted reproductive technology -- much like in vitro fertilization. While clones are more likely to have health problems at birth than traditionally bred animals, "They seem to become just as healthy and strong as other animals of the same age," it said.

Cloning of animals often has a low success rate, and unsuccessful procedures can cause abnormalities, premature deaths and other problems. Milk and meat from clones with the most severe cloning errors would be unlikely to enter the food supply, because they would "either die, fail to reproduce, or fail government examination and meat inspection," the FDA said. Moreover, because cloned animals are expected to be used mainly for breeding purposes, most of the products sold wouldn't be from cloned animals themselves, but from their offspring.

Modern livestock breeding already is highly regimented. Much of the beef and pork on the market today is the product of such techniques as artificial insemination, embryo transfer, embryo splitting and in vitro fertilization. That gives breeders control over the selection of parents.

Animal cloning remains relatively expensive, however. ViaGen Inc., a livestock cloning company based in Austin, Texas, charges $15,000 for the first copy of a cow, $12,500 for the second copy of the same animal, and $6,000 for the sixth and beyond. In the past two years, the five-year-old company has cloned 250 animals, including about 150 beef cattle, mainly for exhibition, and 100 pigs, mainly for research purposes, said Mark Walton, its president.

With a surge in demand, Mr. Walton said cloning prices would go down, eventually to as little as $5,000 to $6,000 per animal. Farmers could use more-conventional breeding methods to produce offspring from those cloned animals, and replace their breeding stock every few years. That could make cloning financially appealing for meat and milk producers, Mr. Walton said.

The FDA began looking at the safety of foods from cloned animals a few years after the successful cloning of Dolly the sheep in Scotland in 1997. The cloning prompted inquiries from companies planning to use the technique. In 2002, the FDA asked the National Academy of Sciences to look at the issue. A panel at the academy said foods from cloned animals and their offspring didn't present a food-safety concern, but recommended that the agency evaluate the composition of those foods.

The FDA assembled a committee that year to look at hundreds of studies on the issue, and cloning companies such as ViaGen and Cyagra Inc., of Elizabethtown, Pa., promised to send samples for research.

The bulk of samples didn't arrive until 2005 and were then sent to an independent lab at Cornell University and an Agriculture Department lab for controlled studies, extending the review process to this year. Because of public concern about cloning, the FDA waited until after it had briefed other agencies, including the USTR and the Agriculture Department, and U.S. trade partners on the issue before disclosing its findings.

US Says Food From Cloned Animals Safe (FT)

By Clive Cookson

Financial Times, December 29, 2006

The US Food and Drug Administration on Thursday took a big step towards approving the sale of meat and milk from cloned animals and their offspring without special labelling.

A draft FDA risk assessment found that food from clones of cattle, pigs and goats was as safe to eat as food from conventionally bred animals.

However, cloned meat and milk is unlikely to reach the shops before late 2007, at the earliest. Agricultural biotechnology and livestock companies will continue to observe a moratorium on their commercial introduction until the FDA has assessed public comments on the draft assessment and issued a final ruling.

The agency will receive hostile comments from some influential groups, such as the Center for Food Safety and the Consumer Federation of America, which accused the FDA of "imposing these products on a public that opposes cloning technology and does not want to consume cloned foods".

But the Biotechnology Industry Organisation welcomed the long-awaited FDA assessment. Jim Greenwood, BIO president, said: "Animal cloning is the latest step in a long history of reproductive tools for farmers and ranchers, and can effectively help livestock producers deliver what consumers want: high-quality, safe, abundant and nutritious foods in a conscientious and consistent manner."

Stephen Sundlof, director of the FDA's Center for Veterinary Medicine, said: "Based on FDA analysis of hundreds of peer-reviewed publications and other studies on the health and food composition of clones and their offspring, the draft risk assessment has determined that meat and milk from clones and their offspring are as safe as food we eat every day. Cloning poses no unique risks to animal health when compared to other assisted reproductive technologies currently in use in US agriculture."

If given final approval, the ruling would allow the sale of food from cloned cattle, pigs and goats, but not sheep, for the first time in the United States.

"No unique risks for human food consumption were identified in cattle, swine or goat clones," the FDA said in a draft risk assessment, which now enters a public comment period before the agency makes its final decision.

FDA Plan Would OK Cloned Meat (CSM)

By Peter N. Spotts

The Christian Science Monitor, December 29, 2006

Meat counters and dairy cases are likely to become the latest battlegrounds for the use of biotechnology down on the farm.

Thursday, the US government released a draft report concluding that food from cloned cattle, pigs, and other livestock is as safe to eat as food products from conventionally bred animals. The safety assessment paves the way for ranchers to use clones for their breeding stock, using cloning techniques similar to those that created Dolly the sheep in 1996.

The decision is not likely to create a flood of cloned livestock in the short term, several analysts say. The assessment, from the US Food and Drug Administration's Center for Veterinary Medicine, must still endure 60 days of public comment. And the

FDA still must weigh issues, such as whether to label meat products from the offspring of cloned animals or track the clones themselves if they move into the food system after their usefulness as breeding stock ends. It may take a year or two after the comment period ends for breeders to start using clones.

Still, the assessment represents a significant step toward approving a technology that several specialists say will lead to more consistent, and higher quality meat and dairy products. And it is galvanizing opposition from consumer and food-safety groups. They hold that the health-risk studies fall short of what's needed to ensure that such products are safe.

"The FDA has taken a very long time to analyze this in a way that is still incomplete," says Jaydee Hanson, a policy analyst with the Center for Food Safety, a biotech watchdog group in Washington. The group has filed a petition with the FDA asking it to conduct safety studies for food products from cloned livestock as rigorously as it does studies for animal-derived drugs that humans use.

The current concern over cloned livestock arises from the technique used to produce them. For years, breeders increased the number of their prized animals by dividing early embryos, then implanting them into a mother to produce artificial twins.

But the results are still hit-and-miss, says Michael Pariza, director of the Food Research Institute at the University of Wisconsin at Madison. And while breeders also currently use artificial insemination and fertilize eggs in a test tube, the bull providing sperm for the procedure has a finite lifespan. But with cloning, breeders can store the bull's DNA for use long after he has been put out to pasture.

When researchers in Scotland cloned the sheep Dolly in 1996, Dr. Pariza continues, they implanted genetic material from an adult into an egg nucleus, then inserted the altered egg into a surrogate mother. Breeders recognized that this approach would eliminate the uncertainty. "You now have a new cow with a known pedigree," he says. And by storing samples of an animal's DNA, the line can be cloned repeatedly.

But the approach has its drawbacks. The technique used to derive the clones is inefficient and often leads to stillborn or deformed offspring. This prompts opponents to call the process unethical. Others wonder if Dolly-like cloning introduces subtle, potentially harmful changes that current testing techniques can't find.

Proponents hold that cloning is no more dangerous to the parent or offspring than the "test-tube calf" approaches breeders currently use. And so far, a range of studies - from chemical assays of cloned meat and milk to tests where lab rats consume meat and milk from clones - indicate that food from cloned animals is as safe as food from noncloned animals. Several of these studies appear in the Jan. 1, 2007, issue of the journal Theriogenology, which focuses on animal reproduction.

"These are edible animals to begin with - they are not going to suddenly start producing toxins," Pariza says.

Whether such results satisfy the public is an open question. Some dairy groups and meat producers have reportedly expressed private concerns that they will loose business if cloned meats and milk work their way into burgers and shakes.

Proponents point to polls showing that a majority of consumers are willing to buy or consider buying food from cloned animals.

Opponents turn to other polls that suggest a general public revulsion at the idea.

Some specialists say the FDA needs to improve its ability to detect and assess the impact of any unintended changes that could render food from cloned animals unfit to eat.

The National Academy of Sciences has recommended that the FDA set up a public database of compounds in foods derived from animal clones. It adds that the government should set up a way to identify and track products from cloned animals as they move from the field to the market.

Global Warming's Poster Cubs (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 29, 2006

CONSIDER THE humble polar bear: Ursus maritimus to the scientists who admire it for its intelligence. Now consider President Bush, who might be classified as Executum obstreperum by the thousands of scientists who say his administration fails to appreciate the gravity of global warming. Is it possible that the polar bear can do what the scientists cannot?

What the polar bear could do, essentially, is force the administration to take steps to curb global warming. With its proposal, announced Wednesday, to list polar bears as a threatened species, the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service for the first time acknowledged that global warming is the driving force behind an animal's potential extinction. If the polar bear is listed as endangered, then the U.S. government would be bound by law to protect it — and protecting it may require regulations to reduce greenhouse gas emissions.

In the polar bear, the administration may have met its match. This isn't just any animal — it is a creature at once majestic and cuddly, the star attraction at countless zoos and featured in so many TV commercials it practically qualifies for a SAG card. If that's not enough, the same type of habitat loss threatening the bears' survival also endangers the penguin, which had a better year at the box office than all but a few humans.

Less popular is the administration's stance on global warming. Bush has acknowledged the phenomenon, but he's reluctant to require industry to cut greenhouse gas emissions. If the polar bear is listed as an endangered species, would the government have to crack down on the carbon emissions that are threatening its existence?

Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne passed the buck on that question, saying such regulations fall to other departments. That's arguable; Fish and Wildlife is the lead agency charged with protecting species from the effects of pollution. If nothing else, a listing for the polar bear would expose Fish and Wildlife to lawsuits from environmentalists similar to the one against the Environmental Protection Agency that is now before the Supreme Court; a dozen states, including California, say the agency is ignoring its duty to protect public health by not regulating greenhouse gases.

The bear complicates administration policy on another issue as well: drilling for oil in Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. Polar bears spend most of their lives on sea ice, which is rapidly melting as the oceans get warmer, but pregnant females retreat to dens on land (including in the refuge) to give birth. If the bears are listed as threatened, it would certainly complicate oil companies' efforts to operate in the refuge.

It will be a year before a decision is made on listing the polar bear. If the administration wants to avoid more than a few legal and political headaches, it should use the time to revisit its antiscientific approach to the world's most pressing environmental problem.

Officers Plead Guilty To Trying To Sell Seized Drugs (AP)

By Sue Lindsey

AP, December 29, 2006

ROANOKE, Va. - Two former officers with a rural sheriff's department pleaded guilty Thursday to charges that they took part in a scheme with their boss and 10 colleagues to sell drugs seized from criminals.

The pair were among 20 people indicted in October in the investigation of corruption and racketeering conspiracy.

Former deputy David Allan King pleaded guilty to charges of racketeering conspiracy and drug conspiracy. James Alden Vaught, a former sergeant, pleaded guilty to racketeering conspiracy.

King faces up to 40 years in prison and Vaught 20 years, but the sentences could be lowered if they testify in other cases.

Henry County Sheriff H. Franklin Cassell stepped down after he was accused of looking the other way as officers sold drugs seized in criminal investigations and stole guns and other evidence for personal use and resale. He has pleaded not guilty to impeding investigation and money laundering.

Vaught, 33, pleaded guilty because he has "a contrite heart," said his attorney, Bruce Welch.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Tom Bondurant said Vaught, who agreed to cooperate with investigators, was paid by the ring for use of a house he owned for drug distribution.

King, 49, was once in charge of the vice unit and had been a school resource officer with the department. Bondurant said King falsified destruction orders for drugs seized by the department and he and other officers then resold them.

Scandal's Key Figure Enters Guilty Plea (ROT)

By Lindsey Nair

Roanoke Times, December 29, 2006

James Alden Vaught, who turned informant in the Henry County case, faces 20 years in prison.

If the Henry County Sheriff's Office corruption scandal were a target, former Sgt. James Alden Vaught would be the bull's-eye.

Authorities say Vaught, 33, went from organizing drug deals and providing a house for drug drops and philandering to informing for the government on many of the 19 other defendants who would eventually be charged.

On Thursday, the man prosecutors said was "right in the middle of it" pleaded guilty to one felony charge in federal court.

Vaught will likely be called to testify against several of his co-defendants if they go to trial. Others charged in the 48-count indictment include 11 current and former deputies, former Sheriff Frank Cassell and seven civilians.

In exchange for pleading guilty to a racketeering conspiracy count, one charge of drug conspiracy against Vaught was dropped. He is facing up to 20 years in prison on the racketeering charge, but he may get a break for cooperating with the government.

A Drug Enforcement Administration investigation out of Philadelphia led authorities to Vaught in early 2005, court records show. When the DEA delivered a package containing the sedative Ketamine to a house in Martinsville, William Randall Reed accepted delivery and was arrested.

Reed, who did not work for the sheriff's office, told police he rented the house from Vaught and paid the sergeant in drugs and money to use the house as a drug drop, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Tom Bondurant.

Reed also said he had helped Vaught sell 2 kilograms of cocaine that Vaught had taken from a drug dealer, according to the indictment.

Vaught resigned from the sheriff's office in March 2005 and began working with federal authorities soon after. Bondurant says Vaught wore a wire and covertly recorded some 90 conversations with 25 different people, including Cassell, who retired after he was charged.

Vaught was even wearing a wire when Cassell one day expressed respect for him.

"Quite frankly, and I've told you this, I always thought a lot of you and I, and I still do," Cassell said on the recording.

Vaught told federal agents that his rental house had been used by some of his co-workers as a place to have extramarital affairs. He also said he and other deputies engaged in several cocaine, crack, marijuana and steroid transactions.

Prosecutors have said that one canine officer in the department took drugs intended for dog training purposes and gave them to Vaught to be sold.

Vaught obtained $15,000 to $17,000 from the sale of the 2 kilograms of cocaine, and it is safe to estimate that tens of thousands of dollars' worth of drug deals occurred, Bondurant said.

Investigators say that former vice officer and school resource officer David Allan King falsified destruction orders for drugs taken into evidence, then sold them with the help of Vaught and several civilians who have also been charged, including Reed.

King pleaded guilty Thursday to racketeering and drug conspiracy. Two counts of obstructing justice and one count of making false statements were dropped. He could serve up to 40 years in prison.

The indictment accuses other deputies of dealing and using steroids, taking guns and money from evidence and lying to agents.

Cassell is charged with knowing about many of the illegal activities but ignoring them or covering them up.

Vaught and King were released on bond pending sentencing, which likely will not take place until the case is finished.

Two other defendants in the case had already entered pleas: Reed and former Deputy Bradley Scott Martin, who was accused of distributing drugs.

Vaught's attorney, Bruce Welch, said Thursday that his client was relieved to enter his plea because he knew that both he and others in the department had done wrong.

Still, it was difficult for Vaught, from a personal standpoint, to be in the position of informant, Welch added.

"These were his mentors and his friends and his employer."

Two Guilty In Henry Drug Ring (RTD)

Richmond (VA) Times-Dispatch, December 29, 2006

Henry sheriff's sergeant faces new charges

ROANOKE -- Two former officers with the Henry County sheriff's department pleaded guilty yesterday to participating in a drug-selling ring that prosecutors say involved the sheriff and numerous deputies.

Deputy David Allan King, formerly head of the department's vice unit, and former sergeant James Alden Vaught, whose confession to investigators allegedly implicated the sheriff and 12 officers, entered guilty pleas in U.S. District Court.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Tom Bondurant said the coming weeks may see more guilty pleas as the corruption scandal that has shocked rural Henry, once the center of the state's textile industry, makes its way through federal court.

King and Vaught were among 20 people indicted in October after prosecutors alleged that members of the sheriff's department were reselling drugs they had seized from dealers, trafficking in steroids and prescription pills, pilfering firearms from the evidence room and covering up their illicit activities by lying to federal investigators. The indictment named 12 current or former sheriff's officers, plus the sheriff himself, H. Franklin Cassell, who has since resigned.

Yesterday, Bruce Welch, Vaught's attorney, said Vaught agreed to plead guilty to one count of racketeering conspiracy because he has "a contrite heart."

"He knows what he did, and he's sorry for having done it," Welch said.

An investigation into the department began last year when federal agents intercepted a 2-kilogram package of ketamine -- an anesthetic used recreationally and sometimes as a date-rape drug -- at a Martinsville house owned by Vaught. The dealer who used the house to receive drugs, William Randall Reed, pleaded guilty last month to racketeering conspiracy and acknowledged paying Vaught in drugs and money to use the house as a drop-off point.

Vaught agreed to cooperate with federal investigators and secretly recorded more than 90 conversations with 25 people, said Bondurant, who added that Vaught is now receiving federal protection. "He's the one who talked first. There's no doubt that he was right in the middle of it and very actively involved."

Bondurant said members of the department sold tens of thousands of dollars worth of illegal drugs, either stolen from the evidence room or ordered online.

As part of a plea agreement, Bondurant dropped one charge against Vaught, who faces up to 20 years in prison and a fine of $250,000 when he is sentenced. King pleaded guilty to racketeering conspiracy and conspiracy to distribute steroids and ketamine. He faces up to 40 years in prison and a fine of $1.25 million when he is sentenced.

Cassell has pleaded not guilty to all five charges against him: two counts of obstructing justice, money laundering, making a false statement, and misprison, or unprofessional conduct.

Ex-officer Faces More Charges (MARTBULL)

By Amanda Buck

Martinsville (VA) Bulletin, December 29, 2006

One count dropped; six others added

A federal grand jury has issued a new, six-count indictment against former Henry County sheriff's sergeant Robert Keith Adams in connection with alleged corruption in the sheriff's office, court records state.

As a result, Senior U.S. District Judge James C. Turk dismissed Adams' original charge of making a false statement, records show.

In an order signed Dec. 21, Turk dismissed the charge of false statement at the request of U.S. Attorney John L. Brownlee, according to court records. That was the only charge Adams had faced.

In his motion, Brownlee said the charge should be dismissed because it was incorporated in a new indictment returned Dec. 19, court records state.

That indictment, filed in U.S. District Court in Abingdon, alleges that Adams, who worked as a school resource officer and as sergeant in charge of investigations in the criminal division of the sheriff's office, helped cover up the crimes of former sergeant James Alden Vaught and lied to FBI agents who were investigating alleged drug and racketeering crimes at the sheriff's office, court records state.

Thirteen then-current and former sheriff's office employees, including former sheriff H. Frank Cassell, were charged in a 48-count indictment unsealed Nov. 2.

The new indictment returned Dec. 19 alleges that in 2001, Vaught stole about two kilograms of cocaine from a drug dealer and distributed the drugs through William Randall Reed, Wilbert Herman Brown and Rayfield Moore.

"Adams learned of the drug crime and believed that James Alden Vaught had stolen two kilograms of cocaine and $40,000 in drug money," the indictment states. Instead of turning Vaught in, it alleges that Adams "requested that James Alden Vaught pay him $20,000 of the drug money."

Vaught refused to pay Adams, the indictment states.

Later, in January of this year, Vaught asked Adams to help him locate Brown so Vaught could sell Brown about 1/2 kilogram of cocaine, the indictment alleges.

Adams allegedly encouraged Brown not to talk to Vaught because Adams believed Vaught was "wearing a body recorder and working as an informant in a federal investigation," the indictment alleges.

It further alleges that on March 24, Adams "falsely stated to a federal agent that he had not received payoffs and that he did not know why (Vaught) was looking for (Brown)" on or about Jan. 23.

The indictment alleges that between 2001 and 2006, Adams assisted Vaught "in order to hinder and prevent the offender's apprehension, trial and punishment."

It also charges him with concealing a felony, attempting to obstruct an official proceeding by encouraging a potential witness to withhold and/or present false evidence to federal investigators, making false statements and attempting to mislead federal investigators, and alleges that he lied about payoffs he received from Moore, whom the indictment describes as "a large-scale cocaine dealer in Henry County," court records state.

Moore died Nov. 3 in a car accident in Franklin County. He was helping federal authorities in their investigation of the sheriff's office, his attorney, Robert Rider of Roanoke, said in earlier reports.

Reed pleaded guilty in November to racketeering conspiracy on condition that the government dismiss other charges against him, which included false statement, drug conspiracy and attempted drug distribution.

According to court records, Adams is scheduled for a pretrial motions hearing Friday in Roanoke.

Doctor Forfeits Drug License (KNOXNS)

By Jamie Satterfield

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), December 29, 2006

Man accused of peddling Oxycontin free until trial but must live with mother

A Knoxville doctor accused of peddling powerful pain-killing pills surrendered his license to dispense legal dope Thursday.

Sanford K. Myers appeared before U.S. District Magistrate Judge Bruce Guyton Thursday and voluntarily surrendered his U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration certificate that authorized the Knoxville physician to issue prescriptions for narcotic drugs.

That move, coupled with an agreement by defense attorney James A.H. Bell that Myers live with his mother, led Guyton to allow Myers to be freed on bond pending a February trial on charges he led a conspiracy to push Oxycontin, a powerful opiate-based prescription painkiller.

"We've worked out all our differences," Bell told Guyton.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Cynthia Davidson told the judge that authorities had "concerns about the residence" Myers listed as his own and would only agree to his release if he committed to living with his mother.

Myers has been jailed since last week, when he was arrested on a federal indictment drafted by Davidson and issued by a grand jury.

In the nine-count indictment, Myers, who operated a clinic on Kingston Pike in West Knoxville, is accused of conspiring with Jay Christopher Ridenour, Charles Ridenour and William Larry Cummings to peddle Oxycontin from February 2005 to December 2005.

It's not clear why it has taken a year to file charges in the case, headed up by DEA Agent Dexter McGee. It's also not yet known if the two Ridenours are related.

The indictment makes clear that Myers is accused of supplying the pills to the Ridenours and Cummings, all three of whom appear from court records to be cooperating with authorities in the probe.

When asked Thursday whether he would agree if freed to stay away from his alleged co-conspirators, Myers answered with an emphatic, "Yes." Bell added, "Especially given what they're apparently saying about him."

Myers has been licensed to practice medicine in Tennessee since 1985. However, he allowed his medical license to expire in late September.

He told Guyton that he was currently unemployed but drawing $5,700 in disability payments from a private insurer. He also admitted owing the Internal Revenue Service $27,000 in back taxes.

"I was in the process of making (payments)," Myers said of his tax bill.

Myers wanted taxpayers to pick up his defense tab. Guyton tentatively agreed but added that he likely will require Myers to pay at least a portion of Bell's bill.

"It does appear you might fall in the category of people who must make some (payment toward) your defense," Guyton said.

Bell entered a plea of innocent on behalf of Myers. The Ridenours and Cummings are all free on bond.

Year-long Suspension Recommended For Tucson Attorney (ADS)

Arizona Daily Star, December 28, 2006

A Tucson attorney who was indicted on federal drug charges along with a doctor later convicted of conspiracy in a murder case should be suspended for a year, a hearing officer has recommended.

The State Bar of Arizona filed a complaint against Lourdes Lopez in November 2005 saying she had engaged in criminal conduct that "reflects adversely on the lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer in other respects."

The State Bar said that Lopez not only was indicted in September 2002 on prescription-drug-fraud charges along with Bradley Schwartz, but that she continued a relationship with Schwartz despite being ordered not to and lied about it.

Schwartz is serving a life sentence for conspiracy to commit murder in the October 2004 slaying of his former medical office associate, Dr. David Brian Stidham.

Last month, State Bar attorneys called for Lopez to be disbarred during a two-day hearing before hearing officer Bruce Macdonald. Lopez violated numerous standards set by the State Bar and the American Bar Association, said Maret Vessella, deputy chief bar counsel.

Lopez's attorney, Mark Harrison, acknowledged Lopez behaved inappropriately, but asked for a six-month suspension.

Vessella said that not only did Lopez commit prescription drug fraud and insurance fraud, lie to the DEA and violate a federal judge's order to stay away from Schwartz, but the former Pima County prosecutor also discussed the plot to kill Stidham with Schwartz prior to Stidham's death.

Macdonald, in a 36-page report released Thursday, however, said "any such conversations" between Schwartz and Lopez in the Stidham matter weren't relevant to the matter at hand.

He also found that that a one-year suspension is more appropriate than disbarment or a six-month suspension.

"There is no question about the impropriety of (Lopez's) behavior. However, it is important to this hearing officer that the respondent's conduct, which gives rise to the allegations by the state bar uniformly occurred within the context of a personal, emotional, and ill-fated relationship with Bradley Schwartz, and not when she was engaged in the practice of law," Macdonald wrote.

Macdonald also noted that disciplining attorneys is about protecting the public and deterring future misconduct, not punishment. "The recommended sanction is not disproportionate to sanctioning in cases involving similar conduct under the cited circumstances," Macdonald wrote.

Bob Van Wyck, chief bar counsel, said his office intends to appeal Macdonald's recommendation, but declined to comment further. Harrison called Macdonald's report and recommendation "extremely fair."

Players Association Will Fight Court Ruling (AP)

AP, December 29, 2006

Major League Baseball's players association will fight a federal appeals court's decision to give prosecutors access to the names and urine samples of about 100 players who tested positive for steroids in 2003.

If Wednesday's decision "is allowed to stand it will effectively repeal the Fourth Amendment for confidential electronic records," wrote Donald Fehr, executive director of the Major-League Baseball Players Association, in a statement yesterday.

The court's 2-1 ruling could help authorities pinpoint the source of steroids in professional baseball. It also could bolster the perjury case against Giants slugger Barry Bonds, who is under investigation for telling a grand jury he never knowingly used performance-enhancing drugs.

Michael Rains, Bonds' attorney, disagreed. "It doesn't help their case against him," he said.

Fehr said he was consulting with union attorneys to "determine what our next step should be in our fight to protect the constitutional rights, including the basic right to privacy, of our members."

Options include asking the San Francisco-based 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to rehear the case with the same three judges, petitioning the court to hear the case with 15 judges or appealing to the U.S. Supreme Court. Any appeal, even if unsuccessful, could delay the government from getting the records for months or more.

The samples were collected at the league's direction as part of a survey to gauge the prevalence of steroid use. Players and owners agreed in their labor contract that the results would be confidential.

The players' union sued to keep the government from accessing the records, saying the seizures violated the players' constitutional rights.

Union Will Fight Ruling On Steroids (WP)

By Amy Shipley, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

Claiming the union wanted to protect the privacy rights of more than 100 baseball players who flunked drug tests in 2003, MLB Players Association Executive Director Donald Fehr said in a statement yesterday he would consult with legal counsel to determine how to keep those records out of the hands of federal investigators.

A federal appeals court ruled Wednesday that investigators could keep the 100-plus confidential records they found commingled in computer files with the drug test results of eight of 11 players who were the intended target of a search warrant. Wednesday's ruling, which included a lengthy dissent from one of the three judges on the panel, partially overturned decisions from three lower courts.

The ruling means more professional baseball players could be ensnared in the drug probe known as BALCO that has already resulted in more than a dozen athlete suspensions and five criminal convictions. San Francisco Giants slugger Barry Bonds is the subject of a perjury investigation in connection with BALCO.

"Under a search warrant seeking information about only 11 baseball players, confidential records for every player were seized, along with confidential records of thousands of other people with no connection to baseball, including many with no connection to sports," Fehr said in the statement. "We will consult with our counsel, and then determine what our next step should be in our fight to protect the Constitutional rights -- including the basic right to privacy -- of our members."

Steroid Probe Ruling Threatens Non-Athletes, MLB Official Says (BLOOM)

By Joel Rosenblatt

Bloomberg, December 29, 2006

Dec. 28 (Bloomberg) -- Confidential records of baseball players and non-athletes will be available to government investigators if a federal appeals court ruling isn't challenged, the Major Baseball League Players Association said today.

Donald M. Fehr, the association's executive director, said in a statement that prosecutors investigating steroid use seized records for every player as well as ``confidential records of thousands of other people with no connection to baseball, including many with no connection to sports."

The ruling, issued yesterday by the U.S. Court of Appeals in San Francisco, held that lower courts were wrong to require government investigators to return files taken from Major League Baseball's drug-testing laboratories in California and Nevada as part of their probe of the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, a Burlingame, California, company known as Balco.

Grand juries in the government's investigation have indicted Balco's co-founders, two track coaches and a trainer for baseball All-Star Barry Bonds. Jurors have heard testimony regarding steroid use from Bonds and other athletes, including baseball's Jason Giambi, without returning charges against them.

Fehr reiterated arguments the union made in court that the seizure violated the players' constitutional rights against unreasonable searches and seizures.

Using a search warrant seeking information about 11 players, investigators collected private information about ``thousands of people'' who aren't being investigated for criminal behavior, Fehr said in the statement. He didn't say if the association would appeal the ruling.

Greg Bouris, a lawyer for the players association, declined to comment.

Luke Macaulay, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in San Francisco, didn't immediately return a call seeking comment.

The ruling applies to three cases: U.S. v. Comprehensive Drug Testing, No. 05-10067; Major League Baseball Players Association v. U.S., No. 05-15006; and In Re: Search Warrants, 05-55354; all at the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, San Francisco.

Of Special Interest (IVDB)

By Sara A. Carter

Inland Valley Daily Bulletin, December 29, 2006

COLUMBUS, N.M. - On Sept. 5, a man calling himself Miguel Alfonso Salinas was apprehended off a deserted highway near the U.S.-Mexico border.

The tinted windows on Alfonso Salinas' vehicle aroused the suspicion of Border Patrol agents patrolling a dark and desolate stretch of Highway 9, which runs parallel to the border and is the site of large numbers of illegal crossings.

The agents discovered three Mexican migrants in the vehicle with Alfonso Salinas.

But what they discovered several days later made a far greater impression.

Alfonso Salinas was not who he seemed, according to U.S. Department of Justice and Department of Homeland Security documents. He lied to the agents about who he was, where he came from and what he was doing.

It would take nearly a week of interviews with federal agents before Alfonso Salinas would give his real name: Ayman Sulmane Kamal, a Muslim born in Egypt - a country designated as "special-interest" by the United States for sponsoring terrorism.

Kamal's case is not an isolated one.

Evidence of "special-interest aliens" using the Mexican border to gain entry to the United States has been kept secret from the American public, according to federal law enforcement agents, terrorism experts and critics of U.S. foreign policy with Mexico.

In 2005, the Border Patrol apprehended approximately 1.2 million people in the U.S. illegally. Of those, 165,000 were from countries other than Mexico, and roughly 650 were, like Kamal, from special-interest countries, according to the Border Patrol.

Those interviewed by the Daily Bulletin say agencies including the FBI and CIA are not using information from Border Patrol and Drug Enforcement Administration agents to make connections between the drug trade, illegal immigration and terrorist organizations.

"For us to believe that Mexican smugglers will not assist, knowingly or unknowingly, foreign terrorists trying to enter the United States is incomprehensible," said Rep. Ted Poe, R-Texas, who, along with other congressional representatives, has pushed for stricter border security policies.

Whether Kamal had ties to a terrorist group is not known. No information about him, including his current whereabouts, is available aside from what is in Justice Department and Homeland Security documents.

But the links between illegal immigration, expanded trade, Mexican narcotics organizations and terrorist groups has already been assessed by U.S. federal law enforcement agencies, according to DEA documents obtained by the Daily Bulletin.

According to an intelligence report written by the DEA, "La Entrada al Pac fico (Gateway to the Pacific)" - also the name of a Texas-Mexico plan to expand border trade - Asian narcotics traffickers, in collusion with Mexican drug trafficking organizations and terrorist groups, could use expanded trade routes to bring contraband into the United States.

"The DEA has made a conscious effort to generate predictive intelligence so policy makers can be aware and plan ahead for significant changes in narcotics and smuggling operations," said a DEA official who asked to remain anonymous. "Any time you send in a predictive piece of intelligence that has merit and it's ignored, then the consequences of that can be devastating to national security."

According to DEA intelligence reports, the link between terrorism and narcotics has been well known since the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks in New York, Washington, D.C., and Pennsylvania.

But federal agents say getting bureaucrats to understand the growing danger is difficult when most lawmakers won't even acknowledge many of the problems already happening along the U.S. border.

BORDER BATTLES

One of those problems was on full display in Texas earlier this year.

Sheriff Arvin West of Hudspeth County - a border area 50 miles east of El Paso - and other Texas border sheriffs had complained for more than a year that Mexican military personnel were helping cartels smuggle humans and contraband across the Rio Grande and into the U.S.

The Daily Bulletin first published Department of Homeland Security documents and maps from the U.S. Office of National Drug Control Policy in January, showing 226 Mexican military incursions into the United States since 1996. That information led to a call for congressional investigations and hearings to determine the extent of the intrusions.

Shortly afterward, West was confronted with another incursion. This time, local law enforcement officials videotaped the event and went public with it.

"We had video and photographs," West said. "We went to Congress and testified before them with the evidence in hand. And we were told by Congressman (Silvestre) Reyes (D-El Paso) that we were either lying or mistaken."

Reyes, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, and U.S. and Mexican government officials tried to play down the documents and the incident in Hudspeth County. They stated publicly that the cartels were dressing like Mexican military to damage relations between the U.S. and Mexico.

Reyes, who recently was appointed chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, did not return phone calls seeking comment.

"The bureaucrats don't understand what a dangerous game they are playing with American lives if they don't do something to fix the situation at the border," said Michael Cutler, a former special agent with Immigration and Naturalization Services, who testified before the 9-11 Commission.

According to Border Patrol agents in Texas and Arizona, the Department of Homeland Security has stopped agents from filing full-disclosure incident reports if they see Mexican military involved in an alleged smuggling operation.

In some parts of Texas, if Mexican military personnel are suspected of assisting narcotics traffickers or smuggling humans, they are not processed, but instead are taken to a port of entry and released into Mexico.

An unnamed Border Patrol agent in Arizona said he witnessed a Mexican military helicopter shooting at a fellow agent in pursuit of a vehicle along the Arizona border with Mexico.

The supervisors would not let the agent put the Mexican military's involvement in the incident report, the agent said.

Michael Friel, a spokesman for the Border Patrol, said he had no knowledge of such an incident.

It's not just the cartels' connections to Mexican government officials and military that have U.S. intelligence officials and law enforcement worried. It's also the growing evidence that terrorist organizations have become increasingly dependent on narcotics and weapons sales to support their activities, and that they see the Southwest border as an incubator for their activities.

"Intelligence indicates that terrorist organizations are increasingly probing the U.S.-Mexico border," El Paso County Sheriff Leo Samaniego told the House Judiciary Committee in August, during hearings about border security.

"The large international border creates tremendous smuggling opportunities for terrorists and is fertile ground for recruitment and development of support networks for terrorist organizations," Samaniego said. "The Mexican drug trafficking and human smuggling organizations use their knowledge of the border to assist terrorist cell members in their attempts to exploit the United States.

"The multicultural aspect of the border area also appeals to the terrorists. There are many nationalities, many of them transients, who live and interact in the border setting. This provides the terrorists the opportunity to blend into the community.

"The Southwest border may not be a priority target for a terrorist attack, but it is prime territory for the cultivation, recruitment, transportation and stashing of terrorist cell members," Samaniego concluded.

Samaniego and his colleagues aren't the only ones with such beliefs.

A DEA official said terrorist incidents such as the Madrid train bombings in March 2004 would be easy to duplicate in the United States, with the Southwest border as the best place to smuggle in those who would carry out such a plot.

In the train bombings, 10 synchronized explosions killed 191 people and wounded more than 1,700. An Islamic extremist group that funded the operation with narcotics sales was pinpointed as the perpetrator of the bombings.

"A former DEA director explained the problem best. During the cold war the threat was ABC: atomic, biological and chemical," said an intelligence official with the DEA, speaking on condition of anonymity. "If you apply that formula now to post 9/11 ... it becomes ABCD: atomic, biological, chemical and drugs. The drugs provide the funding for terrorism."

TERRORIST CULTURE

Additionally troubling to U.S. authorities are the growing cultural similarities between Mexican drug cartels and established terrorist groups.

Like Islamic extremists and other terrorist organizations that use suicide bombings or decapitations to strike fear into their enemies, drug-trafficking organizations have developed cultural associations with death over the past several years.

The Sinaloa Cartel, headed by Joaqu n "El Chapo" Guzm n, is now known by federal law enforcement officials as the "Federation" or "Golden Triangle." The long-running war between the Sinaloa and Gulf cartels for control of the Nuevo Laredo border forced Sinaloa to build alliances with numerous other drug trafficking organizations throughout Mexico, making the Sinaloa Cartel one of the most powerful in the country.

The Sinaloa Cartel, along with the help of Vicente Carrillo Fuentes, head of the Juarez Cartel, moves the majority of its narcotics through Ciudad Ju rez, which borders El Paso, Texas.

Along the streets of Ciudad Ju rez, Mexico, statues of La Santa Muerte - the saint of death - can be found at almost any local shop. The robed skeleton with a sickle clutched in its bony fingers is worshiped by many drug runners in Mexico and the United States.

The empty-eyed deity is particularly haunting in a city known for the brutal murders of nearly 500 women since 1995. Many Mexican and U.S. law enforcement officials have attributed the murders to drug traffickers, some of whom have been arrested. But the murders continue, and women still live in fear.

"Women shouldn't be on the street after dark," said Lalo, 81, who sat with his wife at their empty shop in downtown Ciudad Ju rez.

Danger signs are everywhere. Billboards follow passers-by like shadows, warning women to be vigilant. Every man begins to look like a predator.

"There is so much death," Lalo sighed. "I'm beginning to think the saint is real."

The attitudes and actions represented by worship of La Santa Muerte culturally connect Mexico's drug cartels to terrorist groups, according to DEA officials.

Like Hezbollah and al-Qaida, which promise martyrs that their family members will be provided for after suicide bombings, Mexican drug trafficking organizations promise high-level members that if they die in the name of the cartel, their families will be provided for. Other similarities include the growing number of beheadings of Mexican police officials by the cartels to instill terror.

In cities all along the U.S.-Mexico border, the popularity of the death deity is growing. From Tijuana to Laredo's violent sister city Nuevo Laredo, La Santa Muerte is found in statues, stickers and trinkets.

"Widespread and unchecked violence creates a palpable sense of fear and tears at the social, cultural, and economic fabric of Nuevo Laredo," stated a June 2006 report, "State of Siege: Drug-Related Violence and Corruption in Mexico," written by the Washington Office on Latin America, a nonprofit organization promoting human rights.

"As the war between cartels rages, no one - not police, not journalists, not ordinary citizens - knows whom they can trust, so they trust no one."

In Nuevo Laredo, the saint haunts cemeteries where worshippers have left offerings of food. The deity also is seen on the back of bulletproof SUVs driven by narco-traffickers who cruise through the city, and even in graffiti along the city's walls.

Now the saint is gaining popularity in Laredo. Eerie evidence of ritualistic ceremonies performed by illegal immigrants in stash houses was discovered by Webb County sheriff's deputies after one raid. Pictures of members of a Mexican military unit lay in a bowl of blood, sprinkled with herbs and roots.

"This really spooked us," said Webb County sheriff's spokesman Tom Sanchez as he sifted through the photographs taken by the deputies who conducted the raid. "I mean, there was an altar filled with everything you can imagine to this Santisima Muerte. It's a culture of death."

And it's something U.S lawmakers should pay attention to, DEA and Border Patrol field agents said: Drug traffickers accepting death as a glorious end to their violent lives.

"We pray for a good death," said Jose, 21, a young worshiper of La Santa Muerte in Tijuana. He stood stoic by his white-boned statue of the death saint, and pointed to his charm necklace, where a smaller version of the saint hung.

"I pray that I will die in a hail of bullets or fighting for my last breath against my enemy. I'm not afraid to die. I welcome death."

Border Threat: Leaders Look The Other Way (IVDB)

Inland Valley Daily Bulletin, December 29, 2006

Daily Bulletin reporter Sara Carter's three-day installment of Beyond Borders was an unsettling way to end 2006.

The increased smuggling of drugs, humans and who-knows-what-else through a burgeoning international trade route through Nuevo Laredo, Mexico, and Laredo, Texas, is unsettling. So is the human carnage in the all-out battles among Mexican drug-smuggling cartels to control the Mexican trade route. Even more unsettling are the border crossings by "special-interest aliens" - persons from countries that sponsor terrorism - and the "culture of death" catching hold among drug smugglers, a culture that appears to share characteristics with terrorist fanaticism.

But perhaps most unsettling is the disconnect between those on the border's front lines and the higher echelons of the U.S. government, where a seemingly willful ignorance persists.

In 2005 the Border Patrol apprehended about 650 people in the U.S. illegally from special-interest countries - who knows how many weren't caught - yet Carter was told the FBI and CIA are not using information from Border Patrol and Drug Enforcement Administration agents to make connections among the drug trade, illegal immigration and terrorist organizations.

The DEA warns in an intelligence report that Asian narcotics traffickers, in collusion with Mexican drug cartels and terrorist groups, could use the so-called Gateway to the Pacific - a plan to expand border trade through the two Laredos - to bring contraband into the United States.

"Contraband can be anything from narcotics, pirated videos, humans or weapons of mass destruction," said a DEA spokesman.

Meanwhile, we can't take 4 ounces of shampoo on an airplane. Is that supposed to make us feel safer?

Carter reported in January on repeated incursions by Mexican military personnel into the United States - 226 since 1996 - apparently to help cartels smuggle humans and drugs. Shortly thereafter, local law enforcement officials videotaped and photographed an incursion in Hudspeth County, Texas, and Sheriff Arvin West and others testified before a congressional committee with evidence in hand.

Rep. Silvestre Reyes, D-El Paso, told West and the others they were "lying or mistaken," West said, and Reyes, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and other U.S. and Mexican government officials played down the incursion documents obtained by the Daily Bulletin as well as the Hudspeth County incident.

(Reyes has since been appointed incoming chairman of the House Intelligence Committee and promptly displayed his ignorance of Al-Qaida and Hezbollah. Will somebody please buy this guy a newspaper subscription before he takes over the committee known as "Intelligence"?)

El Paso County Sheriff Leo Samaniego told a House committee in August that terrorist organizations are probing the border with the help of Mexican smugglers.

Webb County, Texas, Sheriff Rick Flores testified before Congress about the growing violence in Laredo, which is spilling over from Nuevo Laredo. But former Laredo Mayor Elizabeth Flores said the increasing cross-border trade is "about growth, not death."

And that might be the crux of the official downplaying of the border violence and terror threat. There's a lot of money to be made.

Wal-Mart, for example, and a Hong Kong-based company have invested $300 million to expand a Mexico container port that feeds the Gateway to the Pacific route. The plan is to get more goods from Asia into the United States, in the process redirecting half of the East Coast-bound Asian cargo from the ports of Long Beach and Los Angeles to Mexico. More trade routes and competition among ports help Wal-Mart keep its prices down.

But U.S. consumers might be paying a higher price in terms of lost security. At least the threat appears considerably greater than the one from that 4 ounce bottle of shampoo you had to leave at home.

Reid Seeks Better U.S. - Bolivia Relations (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

Filed at 12:20 a.m. ET

LA PAZ, Bolivia (AP) -- A delegation of six U.S. senators led by incoming Majority Leader Harry Reid met Thursday with Bolivian President Evo Morales, seeking to smooth relations with the South American country's left-leaning government.

Relations have been tense since Morales' election a year ago, with the U.S. wary of his friendship with Presidents Fidel Castro of Cuba and Hugo Chavez of Venezuela. Morales has been critical of U.S. attempts to eradicate coca in the region.

Reid said the United States must pay more attention to Latin America, blaming the region's recent populist shift in part on U.S. neglect.

"I believe that the U.S. needs to be heavily involved in Latin America, and we're not," Reid told The Associated Press after what he called a "long, intense conversation" with Morales. "I believe that Bolivia is looking for help, and I think we can be an agent for help."

At a news conference earlier, Reid said it was not an accident that he chose Bolivia as the first country to visit as Democrats prepare to take control of Congress in the wake of last month's elections.

"We're here as Democrats and Republicans to help North America appreciate the potential of this mighty little country," he said.

The Nevada Democrat later praised Morales' "magnetic personality," saying he "could be, if things work out right, the best leader this country ever had."

But the senator cautioned that Morales' sweeping populist reforms must leave Bolivia's democracy intact. "The one thing we're going to do is make sure that this is democratic government," he told the AP.

Earlier, Sen. Ken Salazar, a Colorado Democrat, told reporters in fluent Spanish that the visit "signals a different direction" for U.S.-Bolivian relations.

"I believe all of us want the same thing, to help lift up the people of Latin America so that they can achieve the human dignity they deserve," Salazar said.

Like Chavez, Morales has railed against U.S. foreign policy and occasionally accused the Bush administration of plotting to overthrow his government or even assassinate him.

But he also sent Vice President Alvaro Garcia Linera to Washington twice to negotiate an extension of a key trade agreement with the U.S. -- which President Bush himself eventually backed and Congress passed earlier this month.

Morales announced earlier this month that he would seek to significantly expand the area for the legal cultivation of coca, which is commonly used in Bolivia as a mild stimulant but also is processed into cocaine.

The announcement drew sharp criticism from Washington, which has strenuously objected to any increase in coca production. The two nations, however, signed an agreement guaranteeing $34 million in U.S. anti-narcotics aid for next year.

After meeting with U.S. and Bolivian officials, Reid said the Andean country was "moving forward" in its fight against drug trafficking.

The six-member delegation travels next to Ecuador where it will meet Saturday with President-elect Rafael Correa, another U.S. critic and Chavez ally who has said he will not sign a free trade agreement with Washington. Correa has also recently criticized U.S. backed fumigation of coca crops in Colombia along the border with Ecuador.

The senators will then travel to Peru for talks with center-left Peruvian President Alan Garcia.

AP, December 29, 2006

Two burnt buses are seen at the Cidade Alta slum, in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, on Thursday, Dec 28, 2006. Drug gangs set fire to two interstate buses and opened fire on police stations and posts around Rio de Janeiro early Thursday, killing 15 people, including two policemen, according to local news media. Police said they could not immediately confirm the number of dead but that the state security chief would hold a press conference Thursday morning to discuss the violence. (AP Photo/Silvia Izquierdo)

ir RIO DE JANEIRO, Brazil - Drug gangs set fire to buses and opened fire on police stations and posts around Rio de Janeiro early Thursday in a wave of violence that killed 19 people and wounded 21, the state's top law enforcement officer said.

The victims included seven who burned to death in one of six torched buses and three policemen, said Roberto Precioso, head of Rio's Public Safety Department.

Two other civilians died, including a street vendor caught in the crossfire of a shootout in Rio's Botafogo district, and seven alleged gang members were killed, he said. Fourteen civilians and seven police officers were injured, he added.

Precioso said gang members used handguns, machine guns and grenades in 12 attacks on police stations and outposts that began in the early morning.

The attacks were apparently a show of force staged before a new governor is sworn in Monday, Precioso said. Police intelligence had warned that gangs were planning attacks for some time.

"It is very difficult to prevent these types of attacks that were practically kamikaze," Precioso said at a news conference. "Police action prevented the situation from getting much worse."

He said the attacks had apparently been ordered from inside one of the state's prisons, but did not elaborate.

Rio's governor said gangs intended the attacks to be far bloodier.

"The idea was to kill hundreds of police and dozens of innocent people," Rio de Janeiro State Gov. Rosinha Matheus told reporters.

Most of the violence occurred on Rio's poor north side, although a policeman was killed in the upscale Lagoa district and a woman died during an attack on a police booth in the Botafogo district near downtown.

Mayor Cesar Maia said gangs appeared to be retaliating against militias _ reportedly run by off-duty police officers _ that in recent months have been battling drug gangs in slums and charging residents for protection.

"The reason for what's happening is that militias have grown and the drug gangs are leaving," Maia told reporters. "To maintain their income, the gangs are increasing crime on the street."

Precioso said early action by police prevented the violence from reaching levels seen in Sao Paulo, Brazil's largest city, in May when an organized crime group launched similar attacks that killed nearly 200 people, including some 40 police officers and dozens of alleged gang members.

Retired Judge Walter Fanganiello Maierovitch, an expert on organized crime and Brazil's former drug czar, said the violence shows "Brazil's public safety polices are in shambles."

Precioso said that police were working to contain further attacks and that they did not present a danger to the millions expected to welcome the New Year on Rio's beaches Sunday night.

19 Are Killed As Drug Gangs Conduct Attacks In Brazil (NYT)

By Larry Rohter

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

RIO DE JANEIRO, Dec. 28 — Heavily armed drug gangs unleashed a wave of attacks on police stations and public roads here early on Thursday, and at least 19 people were killed in the confrontations.

Seven died in a single incident, a predawn assault on an interstate bus bound for São Paulo. Survivors said that about eight armed men stopped and boarded the bus, robbed those aboard and then set fire to it before the 28 passengers could get off.

At least eight police stations and street posts were also reported to have been attacked by gangs with grenades and machine guns. The dead included not only criminals and police officers involved in the shootouts, but also street vendors, pedestrians and people filing complaints at police stations.

Confrontations between the military police and gangs continued throughout the day. Police units sent into at least a dozen of the squatter slums in the hills overlooking the city were met with armed resistance, and a shootout that disrupted car traffic on a main street in a working-class neighborhood was also reported.

The attacks here coincided with the start of the summer tourist season, an important source of income. The mayor of this city of 5.5 million, César Maia, promised that the violence would not interfere with the famous New Year's celebration on the Copacabana beach. But he said that police units would need to be reinforced and that he would welcome army troops on key roads.

Brazilian news organizations said the wave of violence was meant as a warning to the new governor of the state of Rio de Janeiro, Sérgio Cabral. Elected in October after a hard-hitting campaign in which crime, drugs and public insecurity were the principal issues, Mr. Cabral takes office on Monday.

"We're going through a change of government," including a new team that will be in charge of prisons, Roberto Precioso, the secretary of public security for the state of Rio de Janeiro, told reporters at a news conference on Thursday morning. Imprisoned gang leaders are "creating pressure in order to negotiate concessions and privileges," he added. "They are afraid of a tougher disciplinary regimen, which they want to avoid at all costs."

But Mr. Maia and other officials said the gangs were also reacting against the presence of private "militias" in the squatter slums that were their stronghold. These militias are composed largely of off-duty police officers, who are said to ignore the legal niceties required of them when they are in uniform and to be demanding payment from slum residents in return for killing or expelling gang kingpins.

Such militias “are highly pernicious to public administration,” the state director of prisons, Astério Pereira dos Santos, said at a news conference here. He added, “The militias take control of what belonged to the traffickers, and so something heretofore unthinkable is happening: criminal factions are uniting to confront the militias.” Since May, attacks by criminal gangs in São Paulo, the country’s largest city, have left more than 200 people dead.

Rio Hit By Deadly Gang Violence (BBC)

BBC News, December 28, 2006

Gang attacks on buses and police stations in the Brazilian city of Rio de Janeiro have left at least 18 people dead, officials say.

In one incident, seven passengers were burnt to death when gunmen attacked their bus and torched it.

The wave of violence across the city started on Wednesday night and continued into Thursday morning.

Officials said the co-ordinated attacks had probably been planned from jail by imprisoned gang leaders.

The gangs were trying to put pressure on the authorities ahead of the swearing-in of a new state governor on 1 January, Rio state Security Secretary Roberto Precioso told reporters.

"It is very difficult to prevent these types of attacks that were practically kamikaze. Police action prevented the situation from getting much worse," he said.

Favelas occupied

One local media report has spoken of an atmosphere of war in the city, which is preparing for a huge New Year's Eve beach party.

At least 12 police stations and posts in different parts of Rio were attacked with grenades and automatic fire.

Four buses were set on fire, and gunmen are reported to have stopped emergency workers from getting close to the scene.

"I don't know how, but I gathered my strength, got myself into the aisle of the bus and jumped through the window. I felt like I was being toasted," a woman who escaped one of the burning buses said.

As military police and gunmen exchanged fire on some of Rio's streets, motorists fled their cars to seek shelter.

Two police officers were among the dead, as well as seven gang members, Mr Precioso said.

He said three suspects had been arrested and added police had occupied 10 shantytowns, or favelas, which were controlled by drug gangs.

Rio is reputed to be one of the most violent cities in the world.

Its favelas, are frequently the scene of shoot-outs between officers and gang members, as are poor neighbourhoods in other Brazilian cities.

In May, more than 120 people died in Sao Paulo after a wave of gang attacks. These triggered a heavy police backlash, which was blamed for many of the deaths.

Rio Attacks Leave 18 Dead, Raising Tourism Concern (BLOOM)

By Adriana Brasileiro And Jeb Blount

Bloomberg, December 29, 2006

Dec. 28 - A night of violence in Rio de Janeiro left 18 dead after drug gangs retaliated against police efforts to oust them from several of the city's slums, raising concern that New Year's celebrations this weekend may be disturbed.

Rio's public safety chief, Roberto Precioso, said two police officers, nine civilians and seven gang members were killed in 12 attacks in different areas of the city. Seven of the nine civilians were burned to death on an interstate bus.

The violence comes just four days before New Year's beach festivities and two months before February's Carnival parades, two of the world's largest events and key sources of revenue for the Brazilian city's tourism industry.

``The attacks were meant to destabilize the power of the state, but we have the situation under control and we're prepared to protect the population with added troops," Precioso said. Rio won't cancel events planned for the weekend because of the attacks, he added.

Precioso said police are increasing by 20 percent the number of troops patrolling the city during a period when hundreds of thousands of people flock to the beaches. Ricardo Hallack, Rio's civil police chief, said the corporation is ready to surround favelas, the Portuguese term for slums, in the next few days to quell the wave of violence.

``We won't let them get away with the shocking violence we've seen," Hallack said in a televised press conference today.

Bus Burned

In the worst attack, seven people burned to death on a bus traveling to the neighboring state of Espirito Santo early today. Precioso said about 10 assailants surrounded the bus on a major highway that links downtown Rio to poor suburbs and tossed gasoline-filled bottles inside. The attackers set the bus on fire and prevented the 28 passengers from getting off.

Fearing more attacks will occur in the next few days, hospitals in Rio requested extra blood supplies from the city's main blood bank, Hemorio. Supplies are dangerously low, Hemorio spokesman Marcos Araujo said.

``We won't be able to keep up with demand if it continues like this over the next few days," Araujo said in a phone interview. ``We provide blood products to 180 public hospitals in the greater Rio area, and they are all trying to prepare for more violence this weekend."

Tourism Concerns

``This is very disturbing," said Alicia Laumann of wholesale tour company Galapagos Holidays in Toronto. ``I have four Canadian clients vacationing in Rio right now and I'm really thinking twice about sending more people there anytime soon."

Intelligence services warned officials for weeks that attacks could happen as a new government prepares take office on Jan. 1, Precioso said.

``They are taking advantage of the fact we are in a transition, and they believed we would be more vulnerable," he said. The state government received anonymous phone calls warning of attacks by gang members over the holidays, Precioso said.

Residents of Rio's slums also have prepared for possible attacks in their communities.

In Cordovil and Cidade Alta slums, where the Academy Award- winning movie ``City of God" was filmed, armed men pulled pistols and automatic weapons on a car bringing Christmas food baskets to poor families on Dec. 16. They put them away after realizing one of the car's four occupants was a neighbor.

At the time, people in Cidade Alta's bars and stores were talking about an expected invasion by police or police-linked militias to expel drug traffickers who lived in the community.

Similar Attacks

The violence in Rio is similar to attacks ordered earlier this year by drug gangs in Sao Paulo, Brazil's largest city and business center, to protest prison conditions in the state.

On several occasions from May to August, gang members attacked Sao Paulo's transportation system, burning buses and shooting at bus stops in actions that left about 4 million commuters stranded for days. They also targeted crowded gasoline stations, bank branches and automatic-teller machines, forcing business owners to shut their doors for days.

``These gangs here are not organized like what we saw in Sao Paulo," Precioso said. They were retaliating against stepped up repression of drug trafficking in Rio's 712 favelas, he said. ``In recent months, they felt the financial losses from our actions in the favelas and they decided to scare the population."

Civilians And Police Killed In Rio Violence (GUA)

Guardian, December 29, 2006

A coordinated wave of attacks against police and civilians in Rio de Janeiro left at least 18 dead yesterday after drug traffickers went on the rampage with machine guns and petrol bombs.

With Rio gearing up for one of the world's largest New Year's Eve celebrations, criminals launched simultaneous attacks on police stations and buses across Brazil's second largest city.

The attacks began in the early hours of yesterday when two buses were set on fire near Cidade Alta, an impoverished housing estate on the city's outskirts where much of the movie City of God was filmed.

The violence then spread across the city, including to the wealthy southern beach districts.

In Botafogo gang members opened fire on a police position, just metres from several youth hostels popular with European tourists, killing a street vendor.

In Lagoa, one of Rio's most upmarket neighbourhoods located a few blocks from Ipanema beach, a policeman was shot 12 times. Two bus passengers were burnt alive when their bus was set on fire.

The city's prison secretary suggested that the violence had been planned by criminals from the Mangueira shantytown, a community thought to have links with the First Command of the Capital crime faction in Sao Paulo.

Independent, December 29, 2006

Violence across Brazil's second largest city killed 18 people yesterday, as drug gangs set fire to buses and fired on police stations.

The victims included seven people who were burned to death in one of four torched buses, as well as two policemen. Two other civilians were shot dead, including a street vendor caught in the crossfire during a gunfight in Rio's Botafogo district. Seven alleged gang members were also killed.

Roberto Precioso, the head of Rio de Janeiro's public safety department, said gang members used handguns, machine guns and grenades in 12 attacks against police stations and outposts that started early yesterday morning.

Fourteen civilians and eight police officers were injured, he added.

The attacks were a show of force by the city's gangs, staged before a new governor is sworn in on 1 January, Mr Precioso said. Police intelligence had warned that the gangs were planning attacks for some time.

"It is very difficult to prevent these types of attacks, that were practically kamikaze," Precioso said at a news conference. "Police action prevented the situation from getting much worse."

He said the attacks were apparently ordered from inside one of the state's prisons, but did not elaborate.

According to the website of the O Globo newspaper, the attacks began on the Washington Luiz highway that links Rio de Janeiro with the nearby mountain resort of Petropolis.

Most of the violence occurred on Rio's poor north side, although a policeman was killed in the upmarket Lagoa district, and a woman was killed in an attack on a police post in the Botafogo area of the city.

Rio's Mayor, Cesar Maia, said gangs appeared to be retaliating against militias - reportedly run by off-duty police officers - that in recent months have been battling the gangs in slum areas - and charging residents for protection.

"The reason for what's happening is that militias have grown and the drug gangs are leaving," Mayor Maia said. "To maintain their income, the gangs are increasing crime on the street."

Mr Precioso said early action by Rio's police had prevented the violence from reaching levels seen in Sao Paulo in May, when an organised crime group launched similar attacks that left nearly 200 people dead, including some 40 police and dozens of gang members. Walter Fanganiello Maierovitch, an expert on organised crime and Brazil's former top anti-drugs official, said police in Rio did a better job of containing the attacks.

"Precioso did not try to fool anyone and took to the offensive immediately," Maierovitch told CBN radio. "In Sao Paulo, the authorities downplayed the attacks at first, saying they were isolated incidents."

Still, he said, the violence showed that "Brazil's public safety policies are in shambles".

Mr Precioso said police were working to contain ongoing attacks, and that they did not present a danger to the millions of people who are expected to celebrate New Year on Rio's beaches. But he declined to answer a reporter's question about whether the police are prepared to handle security during the 2007 Pan American Games which will take place here.

Rio de Janeiro is one of the most violent cities in the world, with an annual murder rate of about 50 per 100,000 residents.

3 Plead Guilty In Alabama Church Arsons (BVND)

By Phillip Rawls

The Belleville News Democrat, December 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0110102

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. - Three former college students pleaded guilty Wednesday to federal arson charges for burning nine churches in a series of blazes that alarmed rural congregations across Alabama.

Matthew Cloyd, Benjamin Nathan Moseley and Russell Lee DeBusk entered the guilty pleas to federal arson and conspiracy charges in the string of church fires set on two nights in February.

The three wore orange jail jumpsuits and leg chains as they stood before U.S. District Judge David Proctor, who told them they all face minimum seven-year sentences.

Cloyd, 21, and Moseley, 20, had a plea agreement with federal prosecutors that called for them to recommend a sentence of up to eight years and one month, but not less than seven years.

DeBusk, 20, did not have an agreement on a sentence with his plea but decided to plead guilty "to help those congregations and others hurt by his behavior continue to heal," defense attorney Brett Bloomston said. A prosecutor said he expects DeBusk to get a shorter sentence because he participated in only five fires.

Defense lawyer Tommy Spina said Cloyd "is incredibly remorseful, and he regrets creating this much misery in people's lives."

The three are also charged with state crimes in Bibb, Pickens, Greene and Sumter counties, including arson, burglary, criminal mischief and cruelty to animals for killing a cow. Defense attorneys have been discussing a similar plea deal with county prosecutors, but none has been reached.

Prosecutors said that the first fires occurred during a night of illegal hunting and underage drinking, and that the second fires were set to throw off investigators.

All the churches have either rebuilt or are in the process after receiving an outpouring of donations.

The Rev. James Posey suffered a stroke and had to step down as pastor after Morning Star Baptist Church in Eutaw was destroyed. Posey, who blames his stroke on the stress of the fire, was pleased to hear of the pleas.

"It sends a message out that you are not going to run amok and not desecrate and destroy property, especially God's church," he said.

Fate Of Assets Ordered Back To State Court (BUFFNEWS)

By JANICE L. HABUDA, News Staff Reporter

Buffalo News, December 29, 2006

Rebuffing the Internal Revenue Service, a federal judge Wednesday returned the receivership case involving St. Augustine Center to state court.

The nonprofit human services agency that served Buffalo's black community was ordered closed in February by State Supreme Court Justice John A. Michalek because of financial problems.

Since then, attorney Adam W. Perry, a court-appointed receiver, developed a plan to pay off creditors and obtain compensation for 85 employees who worked months without pay.

After Perry presented his report last month about distributing the center's available assets - including more than $127,000 in unpaid wages - the IRS sought to move the case to federal court.

The IRS argued that the actions contemplated by the receiver would be adverse to the IRS's tax lien of almost $900,000 against St. Augustine and that the receivership action has become one "against" the United States.

Further, attorneys for the U.S. Justice Department, representing the IRS, threatened last week to sue the former employees and the receiver if the lien wasn't honored.

Perry argued before U.S. District Judge John V. Elfvin on Friday to keep the case in Michalek's court.

Elfvin agreed. In a decision issued Wednesday, Elfvin concluded that removing the case from state court had been improper. The judge also denied a conditional petition/motion for emergency injunctive relief that was filed by the IRS after the court clerk's office closed Friday for the holiday weekend. The IRS sought to prevent the receiver from distributing any St. Augustine assets until 10 days after the state court decides another IRS motion.

Elfvin wrote that he lacks jurisdiction over the receivership action and that the IRS can petition the state court for such relief.

"Justice prevailed, and the employees so far have prevailed," Perry said Wednesday.

He said he will ask Michalek to take back the case and to be discharged as receiver.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Lame Duck Bush Entering Rougher Waters (USAT)

By Susan Page And David Jackson

USA Today, December 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — Embattled by the Iraq war, barred from seeking another term in office and facing an emboldened, Democratic-controlled Congress, President Bush fits the textbook definition: a lame duck.

His final two years in the Oval Office seem destined to be dramatically different and more difficult than his first six. Republicans in Congress, once loyal, have begun to fracture. Democrats in Congress, once powerless, vow to use their new authority to investigate the administration, challenge its policies and chart their own course.

Nevertheless, the president, calculating how to maneuver during his remaining time in office, insists he can score achievements — and says he plans to try. "Look, I came to do big things, and we're still going to try to do big things," Bush told a private gathering of Republicans after November's election setbacks, according to GOP strategist Charlie Black, who was there. "Regardless of my popularity and the Congress, I'm going to try to do big things."

Those "big things" include reauthorizing his signature No Child Left Behind law, winning passage of immigration legislation that provides a path to legal status for undocumented workers and taking steps toward adding individual investment accounts to Social Security. White House officials are exploring the prospects for limiting congressional "earmarks" in the budget process and encouraging new and expanded sources of energy.

But the war overshadows it all.

The conflict in Iraq is costing an estimated $8 billion a month, straining the Army and Marine Corps and sapping Bush's job-approval rating, now at 38% in a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll. A turnaround in the security and political situation there could invigorate his presidency, but growing violence and chaos might well make it hard for him to focus on anything else.

What Bush will propose in the State of the Union address next month and how he'll pursue those priorities will depend in part on how conciliatory Democrats are, White House officials say. They're preparing "soft" and "hard" approaches — from cooperation to confrontation — after studying how other presidents dealt with opposition Congresses.

"With the majority comes responsibility," White House strategist Karl Rove said in an interview. "In our system, the president governs. The president is the chief executive, and the Congress has the responsibility to legislate. But the Congress cannot legislate without the concurrence of the president, and vice versa. If Congress legislates and it does not have the concurrence of the president, it's called a veto."

The ferocity of the war in Iraq and its impact on U.S. relations around the globe limit Bush's ability to use a strategy other second-termers have employed during their final two years in office: Turn to foreign policy — where a president's powers remain largely unfettered — and change the subject from whatever is bedeviling your presidency.

"Iraq is still there; it's always there," says Frank Donatelli, a Republican consultant and former White House political director for Ronald Reagan. "Unless it starts getting better, it's like a 10-pound weight" on the president.

When presidents get to the final two years of their second term, their administrations often are running out of gas and into trouble.

The proposals that drove their first elections generally have either been enacted (such as Reagan's defense buildup and tax cuts) or run aground (such as Bill Clinton's health-care overhaul). Many of the advisers who helped them get to the Oval Office have moved on, and members of Congress in their party usually lose big in the election midway through the second term. The administration has had enough time in power for malfeasance to take place — and be uncovered.

"The metaphor I'd use is barnacles on the ship of state," says Steven Schier, a political scientist at Carleton College in Northfield, Minn., and author of High Risk and Big Ambition: The Presidency of George W. Bush. With grievances accumulating, he says, "you encounter more and more resistance as you try to move forward."

In the sixth year of his presidency, Dwight Eisenhower had to accept the resignation of chief of staff Sherman Adams amid scandal. The congressional inquiry into the Iran-contra affair opened Reagan's final two years in office. Clinton began his last two years with an impeachment trial.

Yet both of Bush's most recent two-term predecessors bounced back after damaging midterm elections to reach successes that helped shape their legacies.

In Reagan's final two years, he embraced Soviet reformer Mikhail Gorbachev and negotiated the destruction of hundreds of intermediate-range nuclear weapons.

After Democrats lost control of the House and Senate in 1994, the election midway through Clinton's first term, the president brokered deals with Republicans that revamped welfare and balanced the federal budget. Those measures at times put Clinton at odds with leaders in his own party — for instance, then-New York Sen. Daniel Patrick Moynihan — and presumably would have been more difficult to complete if Democrats had still controlled Congress.

For Bush, the Democratic takeover could make it easier for him to enact the immigration plan that was blocked by House Republicans this year. The new political realities could push him to be more flexible and bipartisan.

"I felt like we had a pretty successful couple of years when it comes to legislation," Bush said at a year-end news conference. "However, that doesn't mean necessarily that we are able to achieve the same kind of results without a different kind of approach."

He noted he had worked collegially with a Democratic state Legislature as governor of Texas.

White House officials are also girded for confrontations with the incoming Democratic majority in Congress. The debate over federal funding for embryonic stem-cell research — the subject of Bush's only veto to date — could spark an early showdown. A move to loosen the rules for funding would prompt another veto, aides say.

Bipartisanship "has to work both ways," White House spokesman Tony Snow warns.

Still, Bush's aides say that even after GOP ranks shrank by 13 seats in the Senate and 48 in the House in the 1958 elections, during Eisenhower's sixth year in office, the president could cajole the Democratic Congress to rein in spending.

"The president is very pragmatic," GOP consultant Mark McKinnon, a longtime adviser, says of Bush. "He wants to get things done, and he understands that to get things done, he needs Democrats."

The most difficult issue seems sure to be Iraq. It is "the whale in the bathtub," Schier says.

The bipartisan Iraq Study Group this month recommended the withdrawal of most U.S. combat troops by March 2008, and most Democrats have called for a drawdown of forces before then. But Bush has vowed to stay "until the job is done" and is weighing proposals to send more troops.

He met with Vice President Cheney, Defense Secretary Robert Gates and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice Thursday at his Texas ranch to discuss the war and a speech to the nation about it next month. "I've got more consultation to do until I talk to the country about the plan," he told reporters.

The confrontation over the issue isn't waiting. Incoming Senate Foreign Relations Chairman Joseph Biden told reporters Tuesday that he would oppose any effort to increase U.S. troop levels. The Delaware Democrat said he couldn't "imagine there being … significant support for the president's positions" — not only among Democrats but also Republicans. In a sign of how times are about to change, he plans to call Rice before the committee next month for what seems likely to be tough questioning.

Even so, Democratic leaders including House Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., have said the new congressional majority won't use its most powerful tool, denying funding for U.S. troops.

The prospects for congressional action — and cooperation with the White House — are greater when it comes to domestic issues.

Among Bush's top priorities:

DOJ_NMG_0110105

•Modify Social Security. Since the 2000 campaign, Bush has talked about allowing workers to divert some of their payroll taxes to individual investment accounts within the Social Security system. The idea was so volatile that even the Republican-controlled Congress never brought it to a vote.

The president seems ready to try again. The day after the midterm elections, he announced he had instructed Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson "to reach out to folks on the Hill to see if we can't at least get a dialogue started" about the long-term fiscal stability of Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid.

•Move toward energy independence. The administration is considering the possibility of a deal with Democrats: Increase funding for such alternative sources of energy as solar and wind power if more exploration is allowed for oil and natural gas off the Alaskan coast and in the Gulf of Mexico. Bush also wants to build more nuclear plants.

•Reauthorize No Child Left Behind. Bush wants to reauthorize the education bill that was the first major bipartisan legislation enacted in his first term. The White House wants the revised program to maintain current testing standards for students. Key Democrats including Massachusetts Sen. Edward Kennedy and Rep. George Miller of California say they are willing to support renewing the bill but want it to reflect more of their priorities, including increased federal funding for struggling schools.

•Revisit immigration. In October, Bush signed a law authorizing construction of 700 miles of fence along the Mexican border, but it lacked provisions he supported to allow illegal immigrants now in the USA to gain legal status.

"I think the Democrats would partner with him on that," says John Podesta, a former Clinton White House chief of staff. The apparent backlash last November from Hispanic voters may boost Bush's plan among Republicans, too: Hispanic support for Republican congressional candidates fell by nearly a third from 2004.

Even without bipartisan cooperation, Podesta notes that the Clinton White House found ways to take action over the objections of an opposition Congress.

Clinton used the Antiquities Act of 1906 to declare 1.9 million acres in southern Utah as the Grand Staircase-Escalante National Monument, shielding it from new mining and other development. During his final weeks in office, he cited his authority under a 1996 health-care bill to set landmark rules governing medical privacy.

After Republicans took control of Congress, they "learned the hard way" that Clinton retained considerable powers as president, recalls Ed Gillespie, then an aide to House Majority Leader Dick Armey and later Republican national chairman.

"The veto pen is a pretty powerful tool," Gillespie says. "Executive orders are a pretty potent way to make policy. And the megaphone is still pretty big."

Meanwhile, in Washington, attention has begun to shift from the current president to speculation about his successor. Rove predicts the next presidential contest will be only a minor distraction in 2007, and he says Bush can score achievements even after the campaign is underway in 2008 by getting enough momentum behind ideas.

"I'm going to work hard," Bush declared last week. "I'm going to sprint to the finish."

Bush Tops Survey As Hero, Villain Of The Year (DENP/AP)

By Darlene Superville

Denver Post/AP, December 29, 2006

Washington - Bad guy of 2006: President Bush. Good guy of 2006: President Bush.

When people were asked in an AP-AOL News poll to name the villains and heroes of the year, Bush topped both lists, in a sign of these polarized times.

Among entertainers, Oprah Winfrey edged out Michael J. Fox as best celebrity role model, while Britney Spears outdistanced Paris Hilton as the worst.

Bush won the villain sweepstakes by a landslide, with one in four respondents putting him at the top of that list. When people were asked to name the candidate for villain that first came to mind, Bush outdistanced even Osama bin Laden, the terrorist leader in hiding, and former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein, who is scheduled for execution.

Bush was picked as hero of the year by a much smaller margin. In the poll, 13 percent named him as their favorite, while 6 percent cited the troops in Iraq.

Among celebrities, 29 percent of adults, when asked to choose from a list of names, bestowed the honor of worst celebrity on Spears. The 25-year-old pop singer and mother of two recently filed for divorce from Kevin Federline, her husband of two years.

She then followed with highly publicized nights out with party girls Hilton and Lindsay Lohan, including photos of Spears wearing no underpants.

Second-worst celebrity billing went to Hilton, 18 percent. The 25-year-old celebutante was arrested for drunken driving in Los Angeles in September.

Mel Gibson, 50, was third- worst celebrity with 12 percent, after his anti-Semitic tirade at police in Malibu, Calif., during his arrest on suspicion of drunken driving. He later apologized and said he harbored no animosity toward Jews.

In the best celebrity role model category, 29 percent of adults chose talk-show host Winfrey. The philanthropist and entertainment mogul contributed $40 million toward the establishment of a school for girls in South Africa, which is scheduled to open next month.

The telephone poll of 1,004 adults was conducted Dec. 19-21. The margin of sampling error was plus or minus 3.1 percentage points.

A Matter Of Degrees: Roberts Taking His Time To Reshape High Court (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, December 29, 2006

At the end of John Roberts Jr.'s first full year as chief justice, his tenure is taking shape, framed by sometimes conflicting goals of collegiality, continuity and change.

He leads the nation's highest court more openly and with a lighter touch than his predecessor, the late William Rehnquist, and has quickly endeared himself to Supreme Court staff. But his imprint on the Court as an institution has been measured in small increments so far, as the realization sets in that major change -- such as increasing the size of the Court's docket and reforming the law-clerk-pooling arrangement -- may take years to accomplish.

"He is trying to bring the old traditions of the Court into the 21st century," says former Court official Harvey Rishikof. "It's going to take awhile."

Nearly everywhere he goes, Roberts speaks of his desire to preside over a more cohesive and unanimous Court. But with resignation in his voice, he notes that he cannot achieve that goal without active help from his colleagues.

"I think we're most effective when we operate and function as a court rather than nine separate individuals," Roberts said at the University of Miami on Nov. 13, adding pointedly, "I think we all need to do what we can to work toward that end."

And when, at the Miami talk, ABC News reporter Jan Crawford Greenburg asked him how it felt to join the high court as its boss, Roberts gently corrected her. "The chief justice really doesn't have a lot of authority of the sort that would cause you to refer to him as a boss."

But Roberts is not losing sleep over this fact of Supreme Court life. Already steeped in the ways of the Court, Roberts knows that unlike a modern corporate executive who must produce quarterly gains, as a life-tenured chief justice, he can pace himself for the long haul.

E. Barrett Prettyman Jr., a longtime friend of Roberts, recalls that when Warren Burger became chief justice in 1969, he ruffled feathers and made enemies quickly by changing internal procedures and using -- some say abusing -- his power to assign opinions as a way to reward and punish colleagues.

"That isn't John," says Prettyman, who is of counsel at Hogan & Hartson, Roberts' former firm. "He may end up making the same changes, but they'll hardly notice it because he'll stretch it out over years."

A MEASURE OF CHANGE

Some small changes have already taken place. Oral arguments are more advocate-friendly, lawyers say. For example, Roberts has been more willing than Rehnquist was to spontaneously grant extra argument time to advocates when fairness seems to require it.

Even better, at least from the advocates' perspective, is that they are now able to get a few more words in edgewise before a justice asks a question.

According to a new study by University of Kansas professor Lawrence Wrightsman, the number of words advocates are able to speak before being interrupted by a justice has jumped nearly 50 percent under Roberts. That trend has been attributed to the retirement in January of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who was usually first with a question. But Wrightsman's numbers indicate the increase started even while O'Connor was on the bench. Wrightsman is the author of a new book, "The Psychology of the Supreme Court."

Perhaps the most visible change Roberts has wrought was the decision to release oral argument transcripts promptly on the same day that they occur. Scholars and journalists had asked for this change for years without success. But when Roberts arrived, the request made sense to him, and with the agreement of the Court, he ordered it done.

But bigger changes have proved more elusive. Like many veteran Supreme Court advocates, Roberts was a critic of the Court's "cert pool" arrangement, under which all the justices except Justice John Paul Stevens pool their clerks to summarize incoming petitions. The pool means that many petitions are scrutinized only by two clerks and no justices, causing concern that clerks have too much power.

In spite of his views, Roberts has joined the pool in both his terms on the Court -- though each time he has indicated that his decision covered only that term. Reforming the pool is an example of the kind of change that would rankle colleagues if Roberts were to undertake it too quickly, so he appears to be biding his time.

But the toughest nut so far for Roberts appears to be increasing the number of cases the Court reviews each term. During his confirmation hearing in September 2005, Roberts said the Court could help clarify the law by taking more cases -- closer to 100 per term, rather than the 75 to 80 it has ruled on in recent years. Instead, last term -- Roberts' first -- it ruled on even fewer cases, 69, and this term the number could sink even lower. The Court canceled an argument day in December, and on three out of the five argument days this coming February, only one case will be heard instead of the usual two.

Why the dearth of cases? Lawyers in the Solicitor General's Office and elsewhere reject one popular theory, namely that when the conservative Bush administration and the Court's like-minded members look out over the conservative appeals court landscape, they see fewer decisions that need fixing.

"I strongly disagree that this is the end of history, that there are no issues left to resolve," says Thomas Goldstein of Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld, a close student of the Court's docket. Goldstein points to several factors to explain the slowdown, including the possible reluctance of the Court's liberals to seek reviews of cases that, because of the new lineup, they might lose.

Goldstein also suggests that O'Connor's retirement may be a reason, noting that she "kept the Court abreast of the docket" in courts nationwide. With her gone, the Court may be more willing to let issues percolate longer without its intervention. (Goldstein writes a column for Legal Times.)

Roberts himself has not offered a theory publicly, but those who have spoken with him say he rejects the view that the Court is ducking major, festering issues.

Several justices have also said they have not seen many review-worthy petitions cross their desks recently. Of course, if enough justices express that view, which might not have been shared by O'Connor, it alone would provide an answer to the mystery: The vote of four justices is needed to review a case.

Roberts has brought in his own team to help administer the Court itself and to lead the federal judiciary: Jeff Minear as his administrative assistant at the Court, and James Duff to head the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts.

A PUBLIC PRESENCE

Roberts has become a ubiquitous ambassador for the Court, speaking to bar groups, broadcast interviewers and book authors at a brisker pace than his more reserved predecessor, Rehnquist. Roberts has held two press conferences and will be seen frequently on a PBS special on the Court airing in January. "He believes that it is good for the Court to have a chief justice who is not afraid of appearing in public," says Prettyman. "He goes everywhere." There are limits to this openness, however: Roberts is declining press interviews for now, a spokeswoman said when asked for comments for this story.

Inside the building, Court employees speak of "a breath of fresh air" and a less formal atmosphere. But even as staffers praise Roberts, they hesitate to do it openly, not wanting to imply criticism of the late Rehnquist, who was also popular.

How has the job changed Roberts personally? Friends say he has been struck with the gravity of the position and how much there is to do. In the ABC interview, Roberts joked that his new job has given him a good excuse when his wife, Jane, asks him to run household errands.

But Roberts has still been able to stay grounded and in touch with friends, says Prettyman, who offers poignant evidence. About six weeks ago, when Prettyman's wife, Maureen, was hospitalized in Washington, she was pleasantly surprised by an hourlong visit from Roberts, his wife and their two young children. "It did her so much good," says Prettyman. "It was the John Roberts we've always known."

Ailing Senator Exhibits Signs Of Improving (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 28 — Senator Tim Johnson of South Dakota marked his 60th birthday Thursday in the intensive care unit at George Washington University Hospital, where he remains in critical but stable condition two weeks after surgery to stop bleeding in his brain.

“Senator Johnson’s overall general medical condition has improved, and he is gradually being weaned from the sedation,” Vivek Deshmukh, the neurosurgeon who performed the operation, said in a statement released by Mr. Johnson’s office. “He is opening his eyes and is responsive to his wife.”

Mr. Johnson was joined on his birthday by his wife, Barbara, his daughter and one of his two sons. He is expected to undergo more testing in the next few days, and his office said it would release information afterward.

Mr. Johnson, a Democrat, began to stutter on Dec. 13 during his weekly conference call with reporters, but then recovered well enough to walk across the street from the Capitol to his office, his staff said. After being examined by the Capitol physician, he was taken by ambulance to the hospital and admitted with what the physician called the symptoms of a stroke.

His illness set off speculation that Democrats might lose the new, narrow majority they are expected to have in the Senate next month. South Dakota’s governor, a Republican, would appoint a new senator to fill any vacancy, and Democrats worried that he might appoint a member of his own party.

But a senator is replaced only if he dies or steps down, according to Senate precedent, and senators have remained in office despite being absent because of illness for months or even years. If Mr. Johnson is unable to vote in January, Democrats are still expected to hold a 50-to-49 majority.

Mr. Johnson's doctors said the bleeding was the result of a rare congenital tangling of the blood vessels in the brain, known as an arteriovenous malformation. The surgery, performed about 12 hours after his first apparent symptoms, stopped the bleeding, doctors said, and relieved the pressure on his brain.

Doctors said after the surgery that Mr. Johnson would remain in the hospital until the swelling in his brain, which they described as normal after such an operation, receded. They have said that he is expected to undergo physical therapy to address weakness in his right side.

Sen. Johnson Improves, Is Expected To Miss Start Of Congress (WP/AP)

Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) turned 60 yesterday, two weeks after emergency surgery to repair a brain hemorrhage that has left him in critical condition.

Julianne Fisher, a spokeswoman for the senator, said Johnson will not be present in the first days of the new Congress next week but is continuing to improve. She said he is responsive to directions from his wife but has not yet spoken.

It is too soon to tell how long recovery will take, Fisher said.

In a statement yesterday, Johnson's doctors said he remains in intensive care at George Washington University Hospital. They have released few new details about Johnson's condition and prognosis since the days after the Dec. 13 surgery to stop bleeding in his brain.

Vivek Deshmukh, head of Johnson's surgical team, said in a statement that the senator's overall condition has improved and that he is gradually being weaned off sedation to help his brain heal.

Johnson's wife, Barbara, said that her husband "continues to give us great hope" and that two of the couple's three grown children were at the hospital on his birthday.

Johnson was diagnosed with arteriovenous malformation, a condition that causes arteries and veins to grow abnormally large, become tangled and sometimes burst. He was rushed to the hospital after becoming disoriented during a call with reporters.

His illness raised questions about the Democrats' one-vote majority in the upcoming Senate session. Should Johnson's seat become vacant, South Dakota Gov. Mike Rounds, a Republican, could replace him with a Republican.

A Republican appointee would create a 50-50 tie and effectively allow the GOP to retain Senate control because of Vice President Cheney's tie-breaking vote. But there is precedent for senators to continue to hold office while incapacitated.

When Nature Calls, Women In House Hike (DENP)

By Margaret Talev McClatchy

Denver Post, December 29, 2006

Washington - When nature calls during a debate or vote in the House of Representatives, what's a member of Congress to do? The answer, even as the first female speaker of the House prepares to be sworn in next month, depends on gender.

The members-only House men's room, with its shoeshine stand, fireplace and television tuned to floor proceedings, is nestled a few paces from the House chamber, beside the speaker's lounge, flanked by Capitol police. How convenient.

Reaching the women's equivalent entails traversing a hall where tourists gather, or entering the minority leader's office, navigating a corridor that winds past secretarial desks and punching in a keypad code to ensure restricted access.

When Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., takes the gavel, she may revisit, along with the Iraq war and raising the minimum wage, the question of potty parity.

Starting in January, the 435- member House will have a record 71 women. (The 100- member Senate will have 16 women, also a record.) Asked whether female House members should also get a loo off the chamber, Pelosi said, "I'm all for it - let's find a spot." Mischievously, she said she's eyeing the men's room just steps from the chamber, "but the gentlemen, they just won't get out of there."

There are arguably more pressing matters for Congress when it returns to a pivotal wartime session and Democratic control for the first time in a dozen years.

"We've got a lot of other problems ahead of this, starting with the minimum wage, health care, education," said Rep. Carolyn Maloney, D-N.Y., who'll be vice chairwoman of the Joint Economic Committee.

But the very mention of rest room access is a reminder of the institution's male-dominated legacy, and it stirs lingering sensitivities.

At least one incoming female freshman representative may take up the cause.

Rep.-elect Yvette Clarke, a Democratic New York City councilwoman, was lead sponsor of that city's Women's Restroom Equity Bill, signed into law in 2005. It requires a 2-to-1 ratio for women's bathrooms to men's in new construction and major building renovations.

Clarke said she wouldn't try to impose such mandates on historic structures like the Capitol. But she thinks women should have at least one toilet off the House chamber, rather than having to run down the hall.

Rep. Marsha Blackburn, R-Tenn., said women "are adaptable; it's a balancing act." She paces herself when she knows she'll be on the House floor for long stretches. In case of emergency, she said, "I'm a runner."

Rep. Alcee Hastings, D-Fla., said that perhaps Pelosi could partition the men's restroom to make room for women.

That's what happened with the members-only restroom off the Senate chamber after the 1992 elections, when female representation shot from two to seven, said Senate associate historian Donald A. Ritchie. Previously, female senators went up one floor or to their offices, or used public restrooms.

OTHER NEWS:

US '07 Economic Outlook: Slow Growth, No Recession (CSM)

By Ron Scherer
The Christian Science Monitor, December 29, 2006
NEW YORK
It looks as if it will be an uphill climb for the economy next year.

Growth could be the slowest in the past five years. The unemployment rate, already at a low level, is likely to rise. Business, which has been on a spending spree, is expected to cut back somewhat. The consumer, the bulwark of the economy, may not be spending quite as freely.

Despite this economic slo-mo, most economists expect a recession-free 2007, the sixth consecutive year without a downturn.

"There are risks ahead, but the basics look reasonably good," says Robert Hormats, vice chairman of Goldman Sachs International. "Many people thought the sharp weakening in housing would have a more crushing effect on the economy, but mercifully it hasn't."

Managing the slower economy will be a challenge for the Federal Reserve. It will have less leeway for mistakes. At the moment, many economists are anticipating that the Fed will cut interest rates starting in the spring.

"We are anticipating the Fed will make two cuts starting in March," says Jason Schenker, an economist at Wachovia Corporation in Charlotte, N.C. "The Fed will be under a lot of pressure to hit the cut button."

Exactly how much the economy slows - and when - is still a matter of dispute among economists. "There is a real tug of war over the outlook," says Robert Brusca of Fact and Opinion Economics in New York. "A lot of indicators are moving in different directions, so it's not surprising there is a lot of discord in the outlook."

On the negative side are a small group of economists who still think the economy will sputter into a recession next year. A member of the recession contingent is Hugh Moore, a partner at Guerite Advisors in Greenville, S.C.

He is focusing on a number of quantitative economic statistics, which he believes are signaling negative growth ahead. "We don't think it's dire, we don't think the economy will crumble," he says. "But we think the decline in housing construction and the reduction in home equity withdrawals [borrowing against a home's increased value] will be enough to put the economy into a recession in the second half of 2007."

Others think the economy will just barely get by without a downturn. Wachovia, for example, expects the nation's gross domestic product (GDP) will grow only 1.9 percent next year. The bank predicts the unemployment rate will rise from 4.5 percent to 5 percent.

Mr. Brusca thinks the weakness is short term. He sees the economy scraping by and building momentum by year-end. "By this time next year it will feel like a year of improvement," he says.

However, one sector that does not expect to see much improvement is manufacturing. Over the past two years, the sector has grown faster than the economy as a whole, says Dave Huether, chief economist at the National Association of Manufacturers in Washington. But in 2007, he expects manufacturing to grow 2.8 percent compared with 4.5 percent this year. "That's a significant slowdown," he says.

The sector's problems would be eased quite a bit by a strong end to this year's holiday season, says Brusca, who points to excess inventories at the nation's manufacturers. "If the consumer shows up, the problems fade away. If not, it's harder to get rid of the inventory," he says.

However, some consumers will be in for a rude shock, says David Kotok, of Cumberland Advisors in Vineland, N.J. Some $1 trillion in low-interest mortgages will reset at a higher interest rate in 2007 and another $1 trillion in 2008. "About 4 million to 5 million households will be negatively impacted," he estimates. "This is mainly people in the lower and middle class, the Wal-Mart shopper, not the Tiffany shopper."

In 2006, there was also a large uptick in interest costs for some borrowers. But the higher costs were partly offset by lower energy costs.

Economists say higher energy costs next year would pose a risk to the economy. Economist Mark Zandi of Moody's Economy.com estimates the gap between global production and global demand is only 1.5 million barrels of oil per day. "With such a thin cushion, any substantial geopolitical or weather event could send prices spiraling higher," he writes in an analysis.

In the past, the economy absorbed higher energy prices without much damage. However, Mr. Zandi thinks the next oil price spike could be more difficult to digest. Instead of prices rising because of demand, he cautions they could rise because of shortages of supply "with very different economic implications."

One of the implications, he says, would be inflationary as business passes higher costs on to the consumer. "It is the combination of higher energy prices and interest rates that has undermined past economic expansions," he concludes.

However, even on the future price of oil there is disagreement. Wachovia, for example, expects the price of oil to average $60 a barrel or about where the price is currently. "Falling prices are predicated on OPEC keeping a tight rein on production," says Mr. Schenker. With oil prices at these levels, speculators will shift their attention elsewhere, easing the volatility in prices, he adds.

Home Sales Bode Well For Big Picture (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

WASHINGTON -- Sales of existing homes rose for the second consecutive month in November, a sign of rebounding demand that suggests the economic fallout from the housing market's slump will be limited next year.

The National Association of Realtors said sales of existing homes last month increased 0.6% from October to an annual rate of 6.28 million units, down 10.7% from a year earlier. Spurred by lower interest rates and home prices, sales have now increased in back-to-back months for the first time in more than a year.

Together with a recent upturn in the rate of new-home sales, the modest rise in existing-home sales indicates that home-buying activity may be stabilizing after a yearlong downturn. (See related article.1)

"The change was small, but the results were encouraging nonetheless because they suggested activity is beginning to form a bottom" said Michael Moran, chief economist at Daiwa Securities America Inc.

If the housing slump is indeed bottoming out and starts to reverse itself in the months ahead, it would gradually lift a great weight off the broader economy. Housing-related industries have been shedding thousands of jobs in recent months, and builders have been forced to scale back construction to match waning demand. That has been a major factor behind the slowing economy this year, and many economists say growth -- now running at an inflation-adjusted annual rate of about 2.0% -- won't fully bounce back until the housing correction has run its course.

Of course, it is far from certain that the housing slump is over. Inventories of unsold homes remained large in November, with a 7.3-month supply on the market at current sales rates, according to NAR data, up from a five-month supply a year earlier. That suggests builders will continue to cut production until supply is better aligned with demand. In the meantime, large inventories will continue to put downward pressure on prices.

Last month's median home price -- the price at which half of homes sold for more and half sold for less -- was down 3.1% from a year earlier. November was the fourth month in a row that median home prices were down from a year earlier. NAR President Pat Vredevoogd Combs described current conditions as a "window for buyers" to re-enter the market.

Additional support for a rebound is coming from the competitive labor market, which is producing solid wage gains and lifting consumer sentiment. Yesterday, the Conference Board, a private research group in New York, said its gauge of consumer confidence rose to 109 in December from 105.3 in November.

As with the recent data on housing, which generated more relief than enthusiasm among economists, the improved sentiment reading was due more to a moderation in pessimism than any surge in optimism. Indeed, the proportion of those surveyed who said economic conditions are "good" fell slightly to 27.2% this month from 27.5% in November, but that was more than offset by a sharper decline -- to 14.6% from 16.2% in November -- in the number who said the climate is "bad."

More than anything, the data suggest the nation's economy will be able to maintain its current pace of slow-to-moderate growth as the housing imbalance is corrected. "There's nothing signaling a severe downturn or a severe upturn," said Lynn Franco, who oversees the Conference Board survey.

Meanwhile, the number of people filing initial claims for unemployment benefits rose slightly, to 317,000 last week from 316,000 the week before. The figures point to steady job growth.

Existing-home Sales Edge Higher In US (FT)

By Doug Cameron

Financial Times, December 29, 2006

Sales of existing US homes rose slightly in November, though activity in the crucial southern market remained depressed in a sign that the nationwide market has yet to reach its nadir.

The National Association of Realtors said on Thursday that sales of all existing homes rose 0.6 per cent in November – the second consecutive monthly rise – with median prices dipping slightly and the inventory of unsold properties also dropping 1 per cent from recent highs.

The data follow a small rise in sales of new homes during November suggesting that falling prices and rising incentives are tempting buyers back to the market, eroding what homebuilding executives view as the “bad psychology” affecting the business.

However, most of the rise in existing-home business was driven by sales in the north-east, and volumes continued to fall in the south of the country, which accounted for 38 per cent of nationwide transactions in 2005.

The south and west of the US also account for three-quarters of new-home sales, and analysts remain concerned about the pace of building in the two regions, despite signals from homebuilders that they were cutting construction following the exit of speculative buyers from the market.

Most of the large homebuilders believe the excess inventory will not be cleared until the second half of next year, paving the way for a recovery in the broader market in 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0110115

The NAR was more bullish in its assessment of the housing market, which is being closely monitored by policymakers because of its potential spillover into a slowing US economy.

The association suggested the November data provide evidence of "a turn in the market", with lower median prices driving a gradual rise in sales in 2007.

"It looks like we may have reached the low point of the current cycle in September," said David Lereah, NAR chief economist, in a statement accompanying the November data.

However, falling mortgage applications and the slight rise in new-home sales last month have left other analysts more cautious.

Gregory Gieber at AG Edwards said in a report that the new-home statistics were "uninspiring" and fell "well short of "significantly reducing the industry's current inventory overhang".

The supply of new homes still remains above six months, at current sales rates, while the existing-home inventory dipped to 7.3 months in November from 7.4 months the previous month, well above the five-month level a year ago. The supply of condominiums and multi-family homes still remains above nine months.

Ohio Ruling Denying Pay In Job Injury Draws Debate (NYT)

By Bob Driehaus

COLUMBUS, Ohio, Dec. 28 — The Ohio Supreme Court has upheld a KFC franchise's petition to deny workers' compensation payments to a teenage boy who was severely burned while cleaning a pressure cooker, raising questions from lawyers and the dissenting judges about the basic no-fault tenet of the state's workers' compensation.

The majority in the 5-to-2 decision on Wednesday accepted the argument by the restaurant owner that the boy, David M. Gross, then 16, had voluntarily abandoned his job when he ignored repeated warnings not to boil water in the cooker to clean it. That meant he was not entitled to workers' compensation payments because he no longer had a job when he was injured, the ruling said.

"This is the worst decision I've seen since I've been practicing law," said Philip J. Fulton, a workers' compensation lawyer and past president of the Ohio Academy of Trial Lawyers. "It changes the whole substance of what workers' compensation is supposed to be."

Mr. Gross was working at a Dayton-area KFC on Nov. 26, 2003, when boiling water spewed from a pressure cooker and caused third-degree burns around his hip and groin and second-degree burns on his arms, torso and back. Two co-workers were also burned.

A company investigation found that Mr. Gross had ignored warnings in the employee handbook and on the cooker as well as repeated warnings by two co-workers and a supervisor.

Mr. Gross's disability payments were canceled after the restaurant fired him in February 2004 and successfully argued before the Industrial Commission of Ohio that Mr. Gross had abandoned his job by flouting the safety rules.

He is now able to work at a construction job, said his mother, Angelia Dussia.

The Supreme Court majority said Mr. Gross had violated his employment agreement and forfeited his job by ignoring safety instructions: "Gross willfully ignored repeated warnings not to engage in the proscribed conduct, yet still wishes to ascribe his behavior to simple negligence or inadvertence," the court wrote.

Edna Scheuer, the lawyer for the restaurant's owner, Food, Folks and Fun, said Thursday that the ruling applied to a very narrow set of circumstances and sought to deny only Mr. Gross's disability claim, which would have paid him 72 percent of his wages for the first three months and then two-thirds of his wages until he recovered.

"I don't think the ruling rested solely on Mr. Gross's fault," she said. She said she thought the court would have ruled differently if the employer had not provided a written warning on that specific safety violation.

But Mr. Fulton predicted that the decision would embolden employers to try to challenge claims by making any unsafe practice punishable by instant termination.

In a dissent, Justice Evelyn Lundberg Stratton expressed concern that the ruling represented a slippery slope. “Should the employee’s fault preclude his receiving temporary total disability? The answer to this question is no. Our workers’ compensation laws do not permit the introduction of fault,” she wrote.

James J. Brudney, an Ohio State University law professor and labor expert, said the decision could upset a balance struck by workers’ compensation laws, which offer workers payments without assessing blame and generally preclude an injured worker from suing his employer.

Gary Plunkett, a lawyer representing Mr. Gross, envisions a situation in which a truck driver injured in an accident is denied benefits because he was driving nominally faster than the speed limit in violation of company safety rules.

Ty Pine, who heads the Ohio chapter of the National Federation of Independent Business, disagreed with the notion that the ruling was a major shift. “We think it is an appropriate decision that keeps intact the integrity of the system,” Mr. Pine said. “The court sent a clear message that safety is very important in the workplace.”

He added, “It will be in those limited areas where an employee knowingly, flagrantly disobeys orders that claims will be challenged.”

Ford, Nixon Sustained Friendship For Decades (WP)

By Bob Woodward

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

Months before Richard M. Nixon set a relatively unknown Michigan congressman named Gerald R. Ford on the path to the White House, Nixon turned to Ford, who called himself the embattled president's "only real friend," to get him out of trouble.

During one of the darkest days of the Watergate scandal, Nixon secretly confided in Ford, at the time the House minority leader. He begged for help. He complained about fair-weather friends and swore at perceived rivals in his own party. "Tell the guys, goddamn it, to get off their ass and start fighting back," Nixon pleaded with Ford in one call recorded by the president's secret taping system.

And Ford did. "Anytime you want me to do anything, under any circumstances, you give me a call, Mr. President," he told Nixon during that May 1, 1973, conversation. "We'll stand by you morning, noon and night."

This and other previously unpublished transcripts of their calls, documents and personal letters provide a portrait of an intensely personal friendship dating to the late 1940s but so hidden that few others were even aware of it. Until now, the relationship between the two presidents has been portrayed largely as a matter of political necessity, with Nixon tapping Ford for the vice presidency in late 1973 because he was a confirmable choice on Capitol Hill.

But the tapes, documents and two lengthy recent interviews with Ford before his death this week, conducted for a future book and embargoed until after his death, show that the close political alliance between the two men seriously influenced Ford's eventual decision to pardon Nixon, the most momentous decision of his short presidency and almost certainly the one that cost him any chance of winning the White House in his own right two years later. Ford became president on Aug. 9, 1974; he pardoned Nixon just a month later. "I think that Nixon felt I was about the only person he could really trust on the Hill," Ford said during the 2005 interview.

Ford returned the feeling.

"I looked upon him as my personal friend. And I always treasured our relationship. And I had no hesitancy about granting the pardon, because I felt that we had this relationship and that I didn't want to see my real friend have the stigma," Ford said in the interview.

That acknowledgment represents a significant shift from Ford's previous portrayals of the pardon that absolved Nixon of any Watergate-related crimes. In earlier statements, Ford had emphasized the decision as an effort to move the country beyond the partisan divisions of the Watergate era, playing down the personal dimension.

A key window into their close friendship and political alliance was that May 1973 call. It was the day after Nixon had gone on national television to announce the resignations of his two top aides, H.R. "Bob" Haldeman and John D. Ehrlichman, and the Watergate coverup was unraveling. The president knew it and was eager for Ford's reassurance that his political situation on Capitol Hill was not as grave as it seemed.

"You've got a hell of a lot of friends up here," Ford told him, "both Republican and Democrat, and don't worry about anybody being sunshine soldiers or summer patriots."

"Well, never Jerry Ford," Nixon replied. "But if you could get a few congressmen and senators to speak up and say a word, for Christ's sakes."

Ford was played a copy of that tape in 2005. Although the existence of Nixon's secret taping system had been publicly disclosed in 1973, no such tapes of Ford had come to public attention, and the former president seemed stunned. "I remember vividly that," he said, recalling how Nixon often turned to him to get things done on the Hill. He added that he considered himself to be Nixon's "only real friend."

At times, their friendship was the gossipy sort, as two longtime politicians sorted through the Washington rumor mill. They were so comfortable with each other that they openly traded nasty personal assessments of others.

On April 6, 1971, for example, Nixon called Ford to find out what was going on with House Majority Leader Hale Boggs (D-La.). Boggs had just taken to the House floor alleging that FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover was regularly wiretapping members of Congress, and Nixon wanted to know why Boggs was going public.

"He's nuts," Ford told Nixon in the call picked up by Nixon's secret taping.

"He's on the sauce," Nixon said, suggesting the majority leader was drinking. "Isn't that it?"

"Well, I'm afraid that's right, Mr. President."

"Or is he crazy?" Nixon asked.

"Well, he's either drinking too much or he's taking some pills that are upsetting him mentally," Ford replied.

In their personal correspondence, extending over decades, the two men conveyed a sense of personal bond that went beyond public niceties, demonstrated in dozens of letters in Ford's confidential files that he allowed a reporter to review and copy.

Two months before Nixon resigned, he sent Ford, by then his vice president, a personal thank-you. "Dear Jerry," he wrote on June 8, 1974, "this is just a note to tell you how much I appreciated your superb and courageous support over the past difficult months. How much easier it would be for you to pander to the press and others who desperately are trying to drive a wedge between the president and vice president. It's tough going now, but history will I am sure record you as one of the most capable, courageous and honorable vice presidents we have had."

Their friendly notes to each other continued until not long before Nixon's death in 1994. In 1978, for example, Nixon wrote to buck up Ford after Ford's former press secretary wrote a tell-all memoir, "It Sure Looks Different From the Inside," in which he gave details of Betty Ford's addiction to alcohol and various medications. "Dear Jerry, I thought Ron Nessen's comments on Betty were contemptible. Tell Betty her many friends won't believe him and for her few enemies -- The hell with them. Sincerely, Dick."

And in a handwritten letter on his personal stationery on June 1, 1990, Nixon wrote Ford urging him to attend the dedication of the Nixon library along with then-President George H.W. Bush and former president Ronald Reagan. Once Ford came, Nixon followed up with another note: "Our friendship goes back further than all the others and the event would not have been complete without you."

On June 28, 1993, Nixon wrote Ford again, this time thanking him for attending the funeral of Nixon's wife, Pat.

"As you undoubtedly noted, the emotion had caught up with me by the time we met after the services, and I did not adequately express my thanks to you then," Nixon wrote.

Then he turned back decades, to their own long friendship and a small gesture by Ford he had carried with him, not as momentous as the pardon that would come later but still vivid 31 years after it happened.

"One action of yours for which I will always be grateful was your going on a TV program when ABC had the bad manners to put Alger Hiss on to nail my coffin shut after my defeat for governor of California," Nixon wrote, remembering the sting of his 1962 loss.

"I have often said that when you win, you hear from everyone -- when you lose, you hear from your friends," he wrote. "You have always measured up in that respect, and I shall always be grateful."

For Ford, Pardon Decision Was Always Clear-Cut (NYT)

By Scott Shane

WASHINGTON, Dec. 28 — President Gerald R. Ford was never one for second-guessing, but for many years after leaving office in 1977, he carried in his wallet a scrap of a 1915 Supreme Court ruling. A pardon, the excerpt said, "carries an imputation of guilt," and acceptance of a pardon is "a confession of it."

Mr. Ford's decision to pardon Richard M. Nixon for any crimes he might have been charged with because of Watergate is seen by many historians as the central event of his 896-day presidency. It also appears to have left him with an uncharacteristic need for self-justification, though friends say he never wavered in his insistence that the pardon was a wise and necessary act and that it had not resulted from any secret deal with his disgraced predecessor.

"I must have talked to him 20 times about the pardon, and there was never a shred of doubt that he'd done the right thing," said James Cannon, a Ford domestic policy adviser and author of a 1994 book about his presidency. During one of their discussions, Mr. Ford pulled out the 1915 clipping, from Burdick v. United States. "It was a comfort to him," Mr. Cannon said. "It was legal justification that he was right."

Over the last three decades, as emotions have cooled, many who were initially critical of the pardon have come to share Mr. Ford's judgment that it was the best way to stanch the open wound of Watergate. In 2001, a bipartisan panel selected Mr. Ford as recipient of the Profile in Courage Award from the John F. Kennedy Library, singling out for praise his pardon decision, which Mr. Ford later said he believed was a major factor in his failure to win election to the presidency in 1976.

In a 2004 interview with Bob Woodward, reported Thursday night on The Washington Post's Web site, Mr. Ford offered another, less lofty motive for the pardon: his friendship with Nixon, which lasted for two decades after the pardon and which letters show was closer than publicly understood.

"I had no hesitancy about granting the pardon," Mr. Ford told Mr. Woodward, "because I felt that we had this relationship and that I didn't want to see my real friend have the stigma."

Few dramas in American political history remain more riveting than that of Nixon's exit and Mr. Ford's reaction, at first halting and then decisive, to the looming possibility of a former president on criminal trial for months on end.

"At the time, I thought this was going to cause a problem with the public and the press, and of course it did," said Robert T. Hartmann, a former Ford aide. "I thought he was right. But it's also important to be seen as right and remembered in history as having done the right thing."

Since the Ford years, the tradeoff between exacting justice and political peace has repeatedly arisen around the world, as Chile, East Germany, South Africa and other countries have confronted dark periods in their histories. The crimes have been bloodier and their scale far greater than those of Watergate, but the question has echoed the one posed to the Ford White House in 1974.

The contradictions posed by the pardon were evident when Mr. Ford announced it on Sept. 8, 1974. "I deeply believe in equal justice for all Americans, whatever their station or former station," Mr. Ford said. A moment later he made clear that Nixon would not face equal justice.

"My conscience tells me clearly and certainly that I cannot prolong the bad dreams that continue to reopen a chapter that is closed," he said, though the major Watergate trials for Nixon aides were still weeks away. In the resulting firestorm, many Americans asked why, in return for a pardon, Mr. Ford had not at least demanded an admission of wrongdoing from Nixon.

The pardon drama had begun six weeks earlier, with a visit to then-Vice President Ford from Alexander M. Haig, Nixon's chief of staff.

Mr. Haig told Mr. Ford that White House tapes would soon prove Nixon's role in the Watergate cover-up and outlined several possibilities for Nixon's departure. He handed Mr. Ford two pieces of paper: a description of the presidential power to pardon and a blank pardon form.

Mr. Ford later said he had given no definitive answer. But when he described the meeting to his aides, they were alarmed at the implication: that Nixon, through Mr. Haig, might be offering Mr. Ford the presidency in return for a pardon.

"We didn't want a situation where he'd agreed to a pardon and there would be an appearance of a quid pro quo," said John O. Marsh, a former Virginia congressman who had become a top aide to Mr. Ford.

Mr. Haig has often denied that he was making any kind of a "sleazy approach," as he put it in an appearance on CNN on Wednesday night. "You know, the president never, never was offered a deal."

Mr. Ford, too, in his memoir and in interviews, said he did not believe that Mr. Haig had explicitly offered a trade of the presidency for a pardon. But his aides feared the meeting would be viewed that way.

"There was a strong naïve streak in Jerry Ford," Mr. Cannon said. "He didn't always see the danger in things." Mr. Ford later told him that he had destroyed the two papers Mr. Haig had given him, Mr. Cannon said.

Nixon resigned a week after Mr. Haig's visit, and Mr. Ford was sworn in as president on Aug. 9. An accumulation of policy troubles confronted the president, Mr. Marsh recalled.

"We were coming out of the Arab oil embargo," Mr. Marsh said. "The economy was going sour. We were in the wind-down of the Vietnam war, and that was a bad situation." Meanwhile, he said, "Watergate was affecting everything."

At his first news conference, on Aug. 28, reporters pressed Mr. Ford on Nixon's fate, and his answers were ambiguous. Until any charges were filed against Nixon, he said, "I think it is unwise and untimely for me to make any commitment."

Afterward, Mr. Ford was angry that he had not prepared better for Nixon questions, Mr. Cannon said.

"He felt he'd bungled it royally," Mr. Cannon added. "He told me he just sat there fuming for two days, and then he decided on the pardon."

In the office of Leon Jaworski, the Watergate special prosecutor, news of the pardon divided the staff, said Richard J. Davis, then a 28-year-old assistant to Mr. Jaworski who had written legal memorandums outlining the criminal case against Nixon for obstruction of justice.

"Some people were furious," Mr. Davis said Thursday. "But I was very torn." If Nixon were to face charges, "we would have been living with Watergate every day for two or three more years," he said.

What upset Mr. Davis and some colleagues even more than the pardon, he said, was Mr. Ford's agreement to turn over the White House tapes and other documents to Nixon, appearing to extend the cover-up. The decision was reversed in December 1974, when Mr. Ford signed a law assuring government control over Watergate-related materials.

By then, Mr. Ford had visited the House, where he had served for 25 years, to defend the pardon. His toughest questioner was Elizabeth Holtzman, 31, a New York congresswoman, whose turn to question the president came last. The pardon, she said, created "very dark suspicions" that "made people question whether or not in fact there was a deal."

Mr. Ford cut off her question, declaring, "There was no deal, period, under no circumstances."

In an interview Thursday, Ms. Holtzman acknowledged the public affection being expressed for Mr. Ford, but she declined to join the chorus of praise for the pardon.

"I felt it set up a dual standard of justice, one for the president, and one for everyone else," Ms. Holtzman said. "I haven't changed my view."

Despite his experience with others second-guessing him, Mr. Ford offered a critique of President Bush's invasion of Iraq in an interview in May with Thomas M. DeFrank of the Daily News and the one in July 2004 with Mr. Woodward of The Washington Post.

He included in his criticism Vice President Dick Cheney and former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, both of whom had served him as chief of staff.

"Rumsfeld and Cheney and the president made a big mistake in justifying going into the war in Iraq," Mr. Ford said, The Post reported Thursday. "They put the emphasis on weapons of mass destruction. And now, I've never publicly said I thought they made a mistake, but I felt very strongly it was an error in how they should justify what they were going to do."

President Declares Tuesday A National Day Of Mourning (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz And Lyndsey Layton

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

CRAWFORD, Tex., Dec. 28 -- President Bush declared a national day of mourning and ordered the federal government to close Tuesday to mark the death of Gerald R. Ford. Financial markets will be partially closed in observation of his passing as well.

Bush opted not to cut short a week-long stay at his ranch here to return for Saturday night's ceremony, when Ford's body will be brought to the Rotunda of the U.S. Capitol. But Bush and first lady Laura Bush will head immediately to the Capitol upon their return to Andrews Air Force Base on Monday to pay respects at the casket.

Bush will also deliver remarks at Ford's funeral service at the Washington National Cathedral on Tuesday, the White House announced. Spokesman Scott Stanzel said Vice President Cheney, a former Ford White House chief of staff, will speak Saturday at the Capitol ceremony.

Stanzel refused to be drawn into a discussion of whether the president considered abridging his time in Crawford.

The president "will look forward on Monday and Tuesday to honoring the life of President Ford," Stanzel said. He noted that Bush's participation will mirror his involvement in Ronald Reagan's funeral in June 2004 and added that the president offered the Ford family one of the executive jets normally used as Air Force One.

Bush will not be the only major political figure to miss the Saturday ceremony. Most of the Democratic leaders, who take over Congress next Thursday, will be absent. Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) will not be at the Capitol on Saturday but will attend the cathedral service Tuesday, her office said. Incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) and Majority Whip Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.) are traveling in Latin America, along with Republican Sens. Judd Gregg (N.H.) and Robert F. Bennett (Utah), and are not due back until Tuesday evening, meaning they will miss all the Ford events.

House Majority Leader-elect Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) will be on hand to greet Ford's body on Saturday, as will most leading Republicans, including outgoing House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (Ill.), incoming House Minority Leader John A. Boehner (Ohio), incoming House Minority Whip Roy Blunt (Mo.) and incoming Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (Ky.), according to aides.

Bush has offered words of praise for Ford since his death on Tuesday, but the president had reason to be unhappy with sentiments expressed by the 38th president and published Thursday in The Washington Post. In an interview with The Post's Bob Woodward in 2004, Ford said Bush and his team "made a mistake" in how they justified the Iraq war and said he would not have ordered the 2003 invasion, which toppled Saddam Hussein and has led to more than 3 1/2 years of warfare.

Ford gave the interview on the condition that his remarks not be reported until after his death. The White House made no comment on the former president's criticism.

A Subdued Ford Funeral (WT/AP)

By Calvin Woodward

The Washington Times, December 29, 2006

Gerald R. Ford's state funeral is missing some of grandeur of the one for Ronald Reagan two years ago, a reflection of the 38th president's modest ways and lesser imprint on the nation, according to further planning details released yesterday.

Part of it will be missing President Bush, too. The president will not attend Mr. Ford's state funeral in the Rotunda tomorrow night but will return to Washington from his Texas ranch on Monday. Mr. Bush will pay respects to Mr. Ford while his remains lie in state at the Capitol and speak Tuesday at services for Mr. Ford at the National Cathedral.

Mr. Bush yesterday declared Tuesday as a national day of mourning for Mr. Ford.

"I call on the American people to assemble on that day in their respective places of worship, there to pay homage to the memory of President Ford," he said in a proclamation he issued from Crawford, Texas. "I invite the people of the world who share our grief to join us in this solemn observance."

In a separate executive order, Mr. Bush ordered the closure Tuesday of federal departments and other governmental agencies not connected with the national security or defense of the nation or essential to public business -- as a mark of respect for Mr. Ford.

Also yesterday, the Nasdaq Stock Market said it would observe the national day of mourning by closing for Tuesday's Washington funeral. The New York Stock Exchange is expected to do the same.

If some of the funeral formalities are toned down, Mr. Ford's goodbye is packed with events tied to the touchstones of his life.

DOJ_NMG_0110121

A prayer service and public viewing today in Palm Desert, Calif., near Mr. Ford's retirement haven for 30 years, begins a five-day chain of ceremonies that includes two funeral services in Washington; yet another, in Grand Rapids, Mich., adopted hometown of the Nebraska native, and additional commemorations in the Capitol.

Readying itself in a hurry, the nation's capital prepared to receive Mr. Ford's remains and honor the memory of the congressional veteran who achieved the highest office after being appointed vice president in 1973 by President Nixon, who resigned in 1974.

The convergence of foreign and U.S. dignitaries, the large public presence, and the national symbolism all marked the ceremonies as a potential target for terrorism, prompting the government to designate the funeral a special security event. That expedites a range of extraordinary measures overseen by the Secret Service.

Even so, some of the most regal touches of a state funeral -- those most burned in the consciousness of Americans old enough to remember the clicking hooves and the faces of grief of John F. Kennedy's funeral procession -- are being bypassed, by request of his family and, most likely, according to Mr. Ford's own wishes.

Although the family has kept the former president's final days private, his pastor at St. Margaret's Episcopal Church, the Rev. Robert Certain, shared some details yesterday. All four of Mr. Ford's children made a pilgrimage to their parents' California home to say goodbye, the pastor said.

Betty Ford, the former president's wife of 58 years, and the couple's three sons -- Michael, John and Steven -- were at his bedside when he died Tuesday at 93, Mr. Certain said. The couple's daughter, Susan, had returned to Albuquerque, N.M., the day before Christmas to spend the holiday with her family.

"I think he deliberately held on until Christmas was over," said Mr. Certain, who said he last saw Mr. Ford Dec. 16 when he went to the family's home for a Communion service. "He didn't want to spoil anyone's holiday."

Memorials For Ford Will Span The Country (USAT)

By Martin Kasindorf

USA Today, December 29, 2006

LOS ANGELES — The nation today begins six days of farewells to President Gerald Ford in state funeral ceremonies stretching from the California desert to the U.S. Capitol and a Michigan hillside.

Ford, the 38th president and the longest-lived former president, died Tuesday at age 93 at his home in Rancho Mirage, Calif.

Observances are scheduled to begin with a private prayer ceremony for the Ford family at St. Margaret's Episcopal Church in Palm Desert, Calif., where Ford and his wife, Betty, worshiped together for 29 years. From 4 p.m. today to 8 a.m. Saturday, the public is to be admitted to view the closed casket.

A military plane will fly Ford's remains Saturday to Andrews Air Force Base, Md. At dusk, a hearse will transport the casket in a motorcade to the Capitol, pausing at the National World War II Memorial to honor Ford's wartime service. After a funeral in the Capitol Rotunda, Ford will lie in state there through Monday night. The National Park Service says the public can expect to wait for up to six hours.

Ford's body will be taken to Washington National Cathedral for services Tuesday. The U.S. Army Military District of Washington says that "at family request" the flag-draped casket will travel in a hearse, not on the artillery caisson that carried presidents Ronald Reagan in 2004, Lyndon Johnson in 1973, Dwight Eisenhower in 1969 and John Kennedy in 1963.

The casket will go from the cathedral later Tuesday to the Ford presidential museum in Grand Rapids, Mich. The body will lie in public repose through the night. Funeral services Wednesday will be followed by interment at a hillside site at the museum.

Meanwhile, The Washington Post reported online late Thursday that interviews with Ford revealed a friendship with Richard Nixon that influenced Ford to pardon Nixon. "I had no hesitancy, … I didn't want to see my real friend have the stigma," Ford said.

The Post and the New York Daily News on Thursday released interviews that Ford granted on condition that they not be released until after his death. In them, he criticized the Bush administration for citing weapons of mass destruction in Iraq as the justification for the invasion in 2003.

Fenty Postpones Inaugural Festivities (WP)

By Elissa Silverman

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

D.C. Mayor-elect Adrian M. Fenty decided yesterday to postpone his inaugural celebrations, including a party that was expected to draw up to 15,000 people, because Tuesday has been declared a national day of mourning for former president Gerald R. Ford.

Fenty will still become mayor that day, taking the oath and succeeding Anthony A. Williams in a private ceremony. But he pushed back a public inauguration for himself and the D.C. Council until Wednesday and reset his inaugural ball for Jan. 6.

"We're really humbled and honored to have the opportunity to do something to help honor and recognize the service of former president Gerald Ford," said Fenty (D), who plans to attend the service Tuesday morning at Washington National Cathedral.

President Bush issued a proclamation making Tuesday a day of mourning for the 38th president. He also ordered that federal offices be closed that day in honor of Ford, who died at his California home Tuesday night at age 93.

Ford's body will arrive in Washington tomorrow, and officials yesterday were firming up the route his motorcade will take from Andrews Air Force Base to the Capitol. Vice President Cheney plans to speak at the state funeral tomorrow night at the Capitol.

The public has been invited to pay respects tomorrow evening, Sunday and Monday at the Capitol Rotunda. Bush and the first lady will go to the Capitol on Monday afternoon, and Bush will speak at the Washington National Cathedral service Tuesday.

While military and law enforcement authorities were making preparations and dignitaries from the United States and abroad were making plans to come to Washington, Fenty and his aides were sorting out the logistics of putting off the public swearing-in and gala.

D.C. and regional officials were also dealing with transportation concerns. The decision to close federal offices affects about 388,000 civilian employees in the region, which should ease any traffic crush. Street closings will take effect to accommodate events tomorrow and Tuesday. Officials urged people to rely on Metro, which will run its usual weekday schedule Tuesday.

The biggest potential for traffic tie-ups will be Tuesday. Ford's body is scheduled to leave the Capitol at 9:15 a.m. for the cathedral service an hour later and then depart about 11:30 for the trip to Andrews and the flight to the presidential museum in Grand Rapids, Mich.

John B. Townsend, spokesman for AAA-Mid Atlantic, said the mix of commuters and tourists could make for a "tight fit." But, he added, "whatever happens, I think people will understand that they will be witnesses to history."

Fenty and his team expressed a similar view. When Fenty learned of Ford's death, he told his top aides that they would "err on the side of moving" the ceremonies to pay respects and give "proper deference" to the former president.

Fenty and his aides devised several options for the ceremonies but waited to make final plans until the day of mourning was announced.

Dan Tangherlini, who is to become Fenty's city administrator, said early yesterday that it would be inappropriate to "have people cutting the rug" during a national day of mourning. Once Bush made the declaration, the party was rescheduled. More than 15,000 tickets had been distributed for the event at the Washington Convention Center.

Fenty spoke on the phone yesterday with White House Deputy Chief of Staff Joe Hagin to discuss plans. Stephanie Scott, Fenty's designee as secretary of the District, remained in touch with the White House as she and other inaugural planners visited Washington Convention Center to explore options.

Finding a new date for the inaugural ball was not easy. The convention center has other activities throughout next week, including a revival that is expected to draw 10,000 people. The next available date was Jan. 6.

Fenty's spokeswoman, Carrie Brooks, said the changes have created other challenges, such as getting entertainers, caterers and other vendors to work on the new date. She said invitations have gone out to go-go legend Chuck Brown and R&B singers Anthony Hamilton and Brian McKnight, but they have not confirmed whether they are available for the new date.

The mayor-elect's team joined incoming council Chairman Vincent C. Gray (D) to make other changes. A prayer service set for Tuesday was rescheduled for Wednesday morning. And the public swearing-in, a ceremony to include Gray and other council members elected in November, will now take place at 10 a.m. Wednesday at the convention center. Like Fenty, the council members will be sworn in privately Tuesday.

Fenty, who was 6 years old when Ford left office, said he wasn't upset about the changes and worked closely with the White House. "I think it's an honor," he said. "It makes being the mayor of the District of Columbia such a special thing."

Back Home, Ford Is Proudly Remembered For His Service, Not For His Pardon (NYT)

By Nick Bunkley

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

GRAND RAPIDS, Mich., Dec. 28 — Here, Gerald R. Ford is not known as the "accidental president." People in this city say he was "our president."

Some had to be reminded by news reports about Mr. Ford's death that he is best remembered in most other parts of the United States for pardoning his predecessor, Richard M. Nixon. They have always known him as the athletic Eagle Scout who lost his bid to be president of South High School's senior class before serving them in Congress for 25 years, ascending to the White House and helping to heal a nation scarred by the Watergate scandal.

That Mr. Ford, the only president from Michigan, was never elected to that office does not matter in Grand Rapids, where he spent much of his boyhood and got his start in politics. What matters to people here is that this city bore a president who followed his values and beliefs, even though his actions were unpopular at the time.

"I always looked up to him," said one resident, John Frey, 47. "I wish we had more people like him in power."

Mr. Frey was among the thousands of people who have visited the Gerald R. Ford Presidential Museum, on the western bank of the Grand River, since Mr. Ford's death on Tuesday to pay respects and reflect on the loss of this city's de facto royalty.

The museum is closed so Christmas decorations can be replaced with black bunting, but the lobby, where there is a large portrait of Mr. Ford and a table with two condolence books, will remain open around the clock until Mr. Ford's body arrives Tuesday.

Outside the museum, where a metal sculpture depicting Mr. Ford in his University of Michigan football uniform belies the "Saturday Night Live" skits portraying him as a klutz, mourners left campaign buttons and bumper stickers from Mr. Ford's unsuccessful 1976 presidential campaign, Michigan football mementos and Boy Scout patches.

"Grand Rapids loves you, Jerry!" read one poster-size sign left in the grass near the museum's sign. Another took one of Mr. Ford's most famous quotes — "I'm a Ford, not a Lincoln" — a step further: "You were named Ford: a member of the party of Lincoln but a Cadillac among presidents."

"He was the most truthful president I think we ever had," said Roberta Clinton, 78, of Grand Rapids.

There is actually a rivalry between Grand Rapids and East Grand Rapids, a leafy suburb just up the hill from its big-city neighbor, over which can claim Mr. Ford as its own. East Grand Rapids declares itself on its Web site and on signs around town to be the hometown of Mr. Ford, who spent time in both places.

In the years since he left office, Grand Rapids has honored Mr. Ford by naming its airport, a downtown freeway, the federal courthouse and the local Boy Scout Council for him. Likewise, although he had not lived here since 1978, Mr. Ford made clear his affinity for the city on numerous occasions, ultimately choosing to be buried on a grassy hillside north of his museum.

"It will be a very emotional homecoming," said David G. Frey, treasurer of the Gerald R. Ford Foundation, who will be one of Mr. Ford's honorary pallbearers. "It's a remarkable bond between this man and the people of west Michigan."

Mr. Ford's friends say he never got caught up in Washington politics, despite spending the better part of three decades there as a congressman, vice president and president.

"He had this sense of values that never left him that he took from Grand Rapids," said Marty Allen, chairman emeritus of the Gerald R. Ford Foundation. "When he came back to visit, I'd always say, 'Welcome home, Mr. President,' and he'd say, 'It's good to be home.' "

DOJ_NMG_0110124

In 1994, Mr. Ford arranged to revisit the grayish-blue house in the Heritage Hill historic district where he lived from about the time he was 8 until he was 17. Tim England, its current owner, recalls seeing Mr. Ford's eyes light up while touring the home and the carriage house in its backyard that the former president had used as a neighborhood clubhouse.

"You'll never know what this means to my Jerry," Mr. England recalls Betty Ford telling him.

When Mr. England learned early Wednesday of Mr. Ford's death, he immediately hung a huge American flag across the front porch. Within half an hour, he saw cars start to pull up in front of the house.

"People take great pride in the fact that this city produced a president, no matter how he ascended to that office," Mr. England said. "For him to be president during such a difficult time, he did the state of Michigan and the city of Grand Rapids proud."

It is that sentiment that drew people from all parts of Michigan to the museum Wednesday and Thursday. Many had personal stories to share.

Evelyn Thompson treasures a campaign potholder that Mr. Ford gave to her mother when he first ran for Congress, and Helen Skinner's son was awarded his Eagle Scout designation by Mr. Ford.

Sharon Knight carried a thick album filled with articles about Mr. Ford and has a collection of mugs, plates and other memorabilia bearing his name and picture at home.

Rhonda Mort, 38, who lives in Covert, about an hour southwest of Grand Rapids, brought her 3-year-old son, Noah, to the museum and intends to return next week for Mr. Ford's funeral.

"We'll wait in line, spend the night — whatever we have to," Ms. Mort said.

Ford Arranged His Funeral To Reflect Himself And Drew In A Former Adversary (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 28 — As he helped in recent years arrange the details of his own funeral, Gerald R. Ford reached out to an old adversary: Jimmy Carter, who defeated him for the presidency in 1976.

Mr. Ford asked whether his successor might consider speaking at his funeral and offered, lightheartedly, to do the same for Mr. Carter, depending on who died first.

The invitation was decades in the making, associates of Mr. Ford's said. And, they said, it was typical for Mr. Ford, who came to his own funeral-planning sessions adamant that his coffin not be carried to the Capitol in an elaborate horse-drawn caisson but a motorcade instead.

During services for Mr. Ford, the 38th president, over the next few days, the simplicity he sought will be on display in Washington and, later, in Michigan, where he will be buried. His coffin is expected to be carried into the Capitol through the House of Representatives, where he served for 25 years, rather than up the sweeping front staircase. A band will play a somber version of the University of Michigan fight song, a Ford favorite from his undergraduate alma mater, and a song he preferred to "Hail to the Chief" while he was president.

There will be plenty of pomp, to be sure. Vice President Dick Cheney, who was President Ford's chief of staff, is planning to attend virtually all of the services, meeting his former boss's family at Andrews Air Force Base on Saturday, serving as an honorary pallbearer and delivering a eulogy at the Capitol.

On Tuesday, after services at the National Cathedral, Mr. Cheney will accompany the Ford family to Grand Rapids for a final farewell, aides to the vice president said.

Yet the service is expected to have the distinct feel of Mr. Ford, emphasizing his service in Congress and his desire to heal the country when he assumed the presidency after President Richard M. Nixon resigned.

"It's a memorial, an appreciation, a celebration more than anything else," said James Cannon, who wrote a biography of Mr. Ford.

Shari Lawrence, a spokeswoman for the Joint Force Headquarters for the Capital Region, which organizes state funerals, said, "It's an honor that we pay the past president, it will be a solemn affair, with everything that President Ford and his family had asked for."

DOJ_NMG_0110125

"They kept it pretty basic, which was a reflection of him," Ms. Lawrence said.

The Ford family has not released all details of the services, which begin in California and end in Michigan, with the former president lying in state in the Capitol for two days in between.

Advisers to Mr. Carter did not return calls seeking comment about his plans for Mr. Ford's funeral. But according to associates of Mr. Ford, Mr. Carter is expected to play a role in the service, as are several other high-profile guests, including former Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger and the news anchor Tom Brokaw.

The two ex-presidents developed a friendship soon after Mr. Carter left office, starting with a long-haul flight together from Cairo after the funeral of the Egyptian president, Anwar el-Sadat, in 1981. They found a mutual interest in the presidential library system, and agreed to work on projects at each other's institutions. They compared notes on public policy and their families, and over time, their wives became friends.

And they shared a mutual rival: Ronald Reagan.

Theirs, Mr. Cannon said, was "an open and complementary friendship, no question about it."

"I think part of the reason for the bond was, both of them had been defeated by Reagan, and they shared a disregard for Reagan," Mr. Cannon said, alluding to Republican primaries in 1976 as well as the 1980 presidential election. But the friendship went even deeper, he said: "It was sincere, no question about that. Both of them had been there, and both of them had a continuing interest in what other presidents did."

Richard Norton Smith, the presidential historian and a friend of the Fords, said: "There was that kind of comfortable back and forth. It extended to the wives and the families, and it became this very nice, autumnal reconciliation, which blossomed into a real friendship."

President Bush and Laura Bush will pay their respects to Mr. Ford on Monday afternoon, after returning from their Texas ranch. Scott Stanzel, a White House spokesman, declined to say whether Mr. Bush had considered returning home on Saturday to participate as Mr. Ford is laid in repose at the Capitol.

Mr. Bush was originally scheduled to return on Monday evening. He is leaving Texas a few hours earlier so he and Mrs. Bush can pay tribute to Mr. Ford in the Capitol.

The White House has provided the use of the presidential plane to the Ford family, Mr. Stanzel said, the same accommodation made to the Reagan family. The plane, a 747, will fly Mr. Ford's body to Washington from California.

A Regular Guy Who Showed A Devotion To Local Causes (WP)

By John Pomfret And Sonya Geis

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

RANCHO MIRAGE, Calif. -- Gerald R. Ford thought globally as a president, but in a salubrious 30-year retirement spent on ski slopes and putting greens, he acted locally, serving on charities, donning sneakers for the first Desert AIDS Walk, speaking to the Boys and Girls Club and leading the annual Fourth of July parade.

Ford's regular-guy lifestyle distinguished him from other former presidents. Richard M. Nixon, who handed the presidency to Ford, wrote books to buff up his reputation. Ford's former adversary, Jimmy Carter, has built homes for the indigent and crisscrossed the globe brokering cease-fires and monitoring elections. Bill Clinton globe-trots as well, promoting AIDS awareness and, with George H.W. Bush, raising money for victims of the 2004 tsunami and Hurricane Katrina.

In comparison, Ford's biggest achievement -- helping his wife found the Betty Ford Center, the internationally known substance-abuse rehabilitation facility -- could be said to pale in comparison. But in his quiet unhurried way, friends and others said, the ex-president, who died here Tuesday, was a model citizen, known for the courtesy with which he treated people and the sincerity with which he lent his time and money.

In the years after losing to Carter in 1976, Ford's relationship with his wife dominated his life, said Mark K. Updegrove, author of "Second Acts: Presidential Lives and Legacies After the White House."

"His wife had a much more difficult time transitioning from the White House to private life than did her husband," Updegrove said, "leading to an addiction to painkillers and alcohol."

DOJ_NMG_0110126

Betty Ford underwent rehabilitation "in full partnership with her husband," Updegrove said. Statistically, nine of 10 marriages collapse when a wife runs afoul of drugs, Updegrove said, but in the Fords' case it strengthened the family bond -- bringing the marriage together, in Betty Ford's words, "like a magnet."

A former congressional staffer and friend, Leon Parma, called the 58 years that the Fords were married "the greatest love story of our time." Because of his wife's well-known struggle with alcohol, Ford also stopped drinking.

Parma and his wife often vacationed with the Fords. When Parma traveled alone with Ford, "there was always a call home in the morning and evening. He was in constant contact."

Another friend, Wayne Hoffman, noted that Ford was rare for a politician in that he seemed to lack malice. Hoffman, 83, recalled speaking to him on the phone the day after he lost the 1976 presidential election, when Ford called him to make a golf date.

"He didn't show any bitterness" about losing the election, said Hoffman, former chairman of Tiger International and Flying Tiger Line, the largest air cargo carrier in the nation before it was sold to FedEx. "And he didn't afterward, though his heart was broken."

Updegrove said Ford's friendship with Carter, formed during a shared airplane ride to and from the funeral for assassinated Egyptian President Anwar Sadat in 1981, showed the "fundamental decency of the man."

The pair wrote occasional pieces for newspapers, including one, during the Reagan administration, that advocated dealing with the Palestine Liberation Organization as a political entity -- a policy that was adopted years later.

Ford grew fond of the desert in the 1960s during vacations when he was a congressman. Parma, then chief of staff for Rep. Bob Wilson of San Diego, invited him for golf outings near San Diego. Ford also hit the links in nearby Rancho Mirage, known as the "Playground of the Presidents," frequented by Nixon and Ronald Reagan and entertainers Frank Sinatra and Bob Hope.

When Ford retired in 1976, Leonard K. Firestone, president of the eponymous tire company, persuaded him to move to Rancho Mirage. Ford bought a one-story ranch house just off the fairway at the Thunderbird Country Club, a private oasis in a land of desert scrub.

Ford's office was next door to the home he shared with his wife. There Ford answered mail, kept up with his duties on several corporate boards, managed investments, planned speaking engagements around the country and set up foursomes for his favorite game.

"He was a very good golfer, actually. He was maligned by the comics, though," said Parma, now 79. "Bob Hope used to say, 'You're never sure which golf course he's going to play until he teed off.' Well, even Tiger Woods hits some out of bounds."

William Whyte, 91, a former lobbyist for U.S. Steel and a member of Ford's "kitchen cabinet," used to book Ford's golf games. Whyte recalled there was intense competition for a chance to play with the ex-president.

"He'd call me at about 11 in the morning and say, 'Line up a foursome,' " Whyte recalled. "In the opinion of some people, since I didn't book them, I was an SOB."

Ford helped raise money for the local Boys and Girls Club and waived his hefty speaking fee for groups of students or the Boy Scouts. He participated in the first Desert AIDS Walk in 1987, supported charities to protect the bighorn sheep and helped fund a children's museum in the desert.

The Fords later spent summers and occasional winter skiing holidays at two homes near Vail, Colo.

Tom Audley was general manager of a Polo Ralph Lauren store in Vail, near where Ford had bought a home. He recalled meeting the ex-president on five occasions. Each time, Ford came in with a present from a friend -- a size-large shirt that Ford would exchange for an extra-large. "He never wanted to tell his friend he needed an XL," Audley wrote in an e-mail reminiscing about the ex-president.

Ford's favorite restaurant in Vail was the Left Bank, a gourmet French restaurant. It was open only for dinner and it did not have an answering machine. Ford would call Audley and ask him to walk next door to the restaurant to make a reservation for him, often for a party of nine.

"I could give you a list of famous folks I've met and helped over the years, and not a single one ever gave me the respect and time that Pres. Ford gave me and my staff," Audley wrote. "Say what you want about him as a president. As a human, I never met a nicer guy (well maybe my dad)."

Warm Memories Of A Leader In Everyday Life (WP)

By Sue Anne Pressley Montes

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

Even in the barber's chair, he brought along a handful of papers to work on.

In his Alexandria neighborhood, he was an ephemeral figure, known for his early-morning splash in the swimming pool before he reported to Capitol Hill. At night, neighbors would note the limousine idling outside the red-brick Colonial, waiting to take him to another function or another vote, his long workday not yet over.

Gerald R. Ford returns to Washington tomorrow, a setting where he was both the most powerful man in the world and Everyman. The longtime congressman and 38th president of the United States spent nearly three decades in the Washington area and has been gone for three decades more. But long before the rest of the nation recognized his signature qualities -- his hardworking manner, his kind regard for others, his basic decency -- friends and associates in the D.C. area knew that Gerry Ford was a prince of a guy.

"Oh, he was the nicest man who ever lived," said Nancy Smith of Alexandria, the Ford family's "backdoor neighbor" for many years.

Many of the people who knew Ford well are gone now. But as Americans mourn the passing of a leader who soothed a troubled nation at a critical time, those whose lives intersected with his in the Washington area cherish a special collection of memories.

Every 10 days, like clockwork, Ford would settle into Joseph Quattrone's big leather chair at the congressional barbershop for a 75-cent trim. Between cuts yesterday, Quattrone, 72, recalled his former customer "with a tear in my eye."

"I have all nice people, but he was exceptional," said Quattrone, who manages the Rayburn Building shop and cut Ford's hair from 1970, when he was House minority leader, until he became president in 1974. "Maybe it was because of how he grew up or where he came from, but he was a gentleman and a half."

Ford would always hurry in with a sheaf of papers to study, but he never failed to ask Quattrone how he was doing. "We didn't talk about politics," the barber said. "Sometimes I would say, someday he's going to be a good speaker of the House, and he would say, 'It would be nice.' "

Those plans, of course, did not work out. After Ford became vice president in 1973, "I said, 'Now I'm going to lose you,' " Quattrone recalled. "And he said, 'No, you'll never lose me.' He came back after he was vice president. He came to me until the day before he got sworn in as president.

"He didn't talk too much that day -- he was kind of sad."

For years, neighbor Nancy Smith could practically tell time from the sounds of the future president doing his morning swim in the pool outside her kitchen window. "I'd hear him hit the water when I was getting breakfast," said Smith, now 76, whose family moved into the Fords' neighborhood in 1962.

Ford did not make it to many community cookouts or parties, she said.

"My sense was they just didn't have time to do neighborhood things -- they were too busy." When he was present, Smith added, "we would talk about our kids. He was never the big shot, which was very nice. He didn't have any inflated opinions of his own importance, as so many politicians do."

James Cannon, a former Newsweek editor who served as Ford's domestic policy adviser, said that description was always apt -- sometimes to the president's detriment.

"He was not a charismatic man. He was a workhorse, not a show horse, and he was much better in person than on television," said Cannon, a Georgetown resident who wrote the 1994 book "Time and Chance: Gerald Ford's Appointment With History."

"The White House is the first stage of the world, and the president, whether it's Reagan or Clinton or Kennedy, [is a performer], and Ford was not a very good performer. He was a plain-spoken Midwesterner, and acting was not among his attributes," Cannon said.

Sometimes, attempts to jazz up the stolid Ford image backfired. Former White House photographer David Hume Kennerly recalled the time he enlisted Los Angeles comic Don Penny to coach the president on his speech delivery during the 1976 campaign. "It took a lot for him to be angry," Kennerly said.

But during a practice speech in the Cabinet Room, after Penny had interrupted the president several times, instructing him to speak his words as if he meant them, Ford blew up. He reached into a pocket, pulled out a Cross pen and lobbed it at the comedian, missing and chipping the wall above Penny's head.

"He always had such a calm about him; it was great to get a rise out of him," Penny said yesterday. "It was a pleasure to work with him. He was a wonderful man."

Even his political opponents agreed. For 17 years, Ford and U.S. Rep. John D. Dingell both represented Michigan in Congress -- Ford as a Republican, Dingell as a Democrat.

"Gerry Ford was a good, hard fighter, but he also knew how to come together on a set of common purposes," said Dingell, the longest-serving current member of Congress.

"From time to time, events happen that change the outlook, that cause people to reflect and perhaps change the way they function," Dingell said. "And frankly, Gerry Ford in his passing has reminded people that a White House and a Congress, even if they are opposing parties, can work together in the public interest of the country."

Betty Ford, Again Putting On A Brave Face (WP)

By Neely Tucker

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

There is an old saying that you don't know who you are in this life until you get knocked down.

Betty Ford has been getting knocked down for a long time, by things that ruin lives and flatten people. Divorce. Cancer. Alcohol. Addiction. And now, the death of her beloved spouse.

She has always taken the punch and done it one better. You would not want to go to the wall with Betty Ford on resilience. She didn't become the most admired woman in America during one of the most turbulent periods in national history because she made nice. She was so admired in the mid-1970s, and is beloved by a wide swath of the nation today, because she was bluntly honest and because, after everything life has thrown at her, she never quit.

"Betty Ford did things that public women hadn't done before, not just first ladies," says John Robert Greene, one of her biographers. "She had three debilitating diseases -- arthritis, alcoholism, cancer -- and she survived all of them."

Now 88, she will be in Washington once again this week for the processions and funeral for Gerald Ford, the football star she wowed back in Grand Rapids, Mich.

Hemingway, a man who wrote well but lived badly, famously described courage as "grace under pressure."

This has not been Elizabeth Ann Bloomer Ford's forte. Pressure ate her up.

She suffered from the solitude, while her husband traveled as congressman and vice president and president. With recurring pain from a pinched nerve in 1964, and the prescription pills she became addicted to. Raising four kids almost alone. Breast cancer. The Watergate-era laser light of media coverage. She drank. Popped Valium. She was late to everything.

Her great strength was to beat all of that. She was more like the rest of us than many public figures like to let on, human and flawed, not bulletproof and immune. And she was open about all of it, the depression and foibles and addictions and brandy, and it touched a country polarized by cynicism and the government mendacity of the Nixon years.

She had a breast removed, a devastating emotional and physical blow. Here was her response: She invited photographers into her hospital suite and let them photograph her in her housecoat. She then became a national spokeswoman for cancer awareness, for the importance of women doing self-examinations. When asked how she would handle her daughter having a premarital affair, or her kids smoking marijuana, she said she'd talk with them about it.

"They brought such a sense of humanity back to the White House," Sheila Rabb Weidenfeld, Betty Ford's press secretary during her years as first lady, said yesterday. "They were real people who lived there."

Betty Ford was born in Chicago and, although Episcopalian, was raised in the predominantly Dutch Calvinist town of Grand Rapids. Her dad, Bill Bloomer, was a traveling salesman for the Royal Rubber Co. He was successful and always gone, and he drank and drank and drank. He died when she was a teenager, either the result of an accident in the family garage or suicide by carbon monoxide poisoning.

She was headstrong, a tomboy. She smoked cigarettes at 14. She played hockey and football with the boys, until her brothers made her stop. She was beautiful and blew off the idea of college to move to New York to become a dancer for Martha Graham. She returned home, married and divorced before she was 30.

The first time she had a date with Jerry Ford, it was for a drink in a bar. (In a McCall's interview in 1975, she said reporters had asked her everything but how often she slept with her husband, "and if they'd asked me that I would have told them." And her answer? "As often as possible.")

Later, on the national stage, she spoke up for women's rights and for abortion rights: "It has to be understood that that there are extenuating circumstances where a woman must have the right to make decisions about her own body."

In 1975, she was one of 11 women Time magazine named "Man of the Year" that year. She topped Good Housekeeping's poll to determine the most admired woman in America. People named her one of the three most intriguing people in the nation.

But by 1978, a year out of the White House, the painkillers and the alcohol were eating her up. Her family called a meeting and presented her with the ugly truth. She was not pleased. When the doctor told her she was a "a drunk," the former president later recounted of his wife: "She was mad as hell."

She managed to detox at a naval center, then founded the Betty Ford Clinic, a rehabilitation center ($21,000 for 30 days) that is the premier such institution in the country. Her name became synonymous with recovery from drug and alcohol addiction. Took a punch, gave back one better.

She never made any bones about her struggle.

"I liked alcohol, it made me feel warm," she wrote in her autobiography, "Betty: A Glad Awakening." "And I loved pills, they took away my tension and my pain. So the thing I have to know is that I haven't got this problem licked; to my dying day, I'll be recovering."

In November 1987, when she was 69, she underwent quadruple-bypass heart surgery. It required pain medication, but she had to wean herself off it quickly, lest she become addicted again.

"There were a lot of sleepless nights where I just walked the floor."

And now, she'll lead the nation through the mourning of her husband, partner and friend.

You don't have to wonder how she'll handle it.

Resilience. You can't fake it. Not for a lifetime.

Betty Ford Had Her Own Voice, And She Used It (DMN)

By Joyce Sáenz Harris

The Dallas Morning News, December 29, 2006

For 58 years, they were a couple whose love story was the bedrock of their lives. So it was no surprise that Betty Ford herself broke the news to the nation that the 38th president, "Gerald Ford, our beloved husband, father, grandfather and great-grandfather," had died at age 93.

Mrs. Ford, 88, will return to the national spotlight Friday as several days of services for her husband begin with private prayers for the family at St. Margaret's Episcopal Church in Palm Desert, Calif.

She was her husband's biggest fan, but when he was thrust into the White House in August 1974 by a quirk of history, she carved her own distinctive niche as first lady. Not since the days of Eleanor Roosevelt had any first lady spoken so freely on topical issues.

She was an overt feminist who worked for passage of the Equal Rights Amendment and supported the Supreme Court's 1973 Roe vs. Wade decision that legalized abortion. She also encouraged her husband to appoint women to Cabinet-level posts and major ambassadorships.

Before her White House years, though, Betty Ford was a fairly anonymous congressional wife. She married Gerald Ford just before his first election to Congress in 1948. He was a Navy veteran-turned-lawyer in Grand Rapids, Mich.; she was a former Powers model and Martha Graham dancer, recently divorced.

Mr. Ford hadn't even told his bride about his political ambitions, but she coped gamely with the demands of Washington life. The Fords moved to suburban Alexandria, Va., where they raised their four children during his long career in Congress.

All those years, they lived modestly in a large two-story colonial in Alexandria. They didn't move to the White House for 10 days after the president was sworn into office in 1974. On Mr. Ford's first night as president, Dallasites Margaret and Trammell F. Crow were among the close friends who gathered at the Ford home for an informal dinner. The only change she noticed, Mrs. Crow recalled this week, was that a couple of White House servants came over to help prepare and clean up.

A call to duty

Though the Fords had agreed he wouldn't run for Congress again after 1974, Mr. Ford felt compelled to accept when he was asked to be Richard Nixon's vice president after Spiro Agnew resigned amid scandal. Mrs. Ford supported his decision, despite her deep ambivalence about remaining in public life – a reluctance that would be underscored two years later when, as president, her husband survived two assassination attempts within 17 days.

Former White House staff assistant Andy Stern, now chairman of Sunwest Communications in Dallas, vividly recalls the second attempt in September 1975 in San Francisco. Afterward, Mr. Ford was hustled into a limousine and rushed to the airport to board Air Force One.

Mrs. Ford, who'd just arrived from a day in Monterey, was waiting for her husband in the plane's private quarters. Some 40 minutes after takeoff, she emerged to find the White House staff and press pool in the main cabin, watching television coverage of the assassination attempt.

That, Mr. Stern said, was the first that Mrs. Ford had even heard about it.

"And she was absolutely furious," he added with a laugh. "But the president's answer was, 'Hey, I'm here! I'm OK.'

"It was typical that neither one of them wanted to burden the other. They were a remarkable couple."

Now hear this

Shortly after moving into the White House in August 1974, Mrs. Ford held a formal news conference, something no first lady had done since 1952. She announced her plans to support the arts and to help underprivileged and mentally challenged children. But she startled the press corps when she voiced support for the Equal Rights Amendment and Roe vs. Wade, and when she said she wanted more women to get involved in politics.

Gerald R. Ford Presidential Library and Museum Gerald Ford met Elizabeth Bloomer Warren while practicing law in Grand Rapids, Mich., after World War II. They were married on Oct. 15, 1948, just before his election to Congress.

Suddenly, everyone knew where Betty Ford stood on women's issues, and everyone had an opinion about her. The president's opinion was that the first lady was entitled to speak her mind.

"Jerry has supported me in the things I've said," Mrs. Ford said at the time. "At least he hasn't stepped on my toes yet." She was beginning to enjoy the power of her new influence: "After 25 years of coping, it's very satisfying."

The next public shock came when Mrs. Ford learned she had breast cancer, six weeks after her husband took office. In her 1978 autobiography, The Times of My Life, Mrs. Ford wrote that "there had been so much cover-up during Watergate that we wanted to be sure there would be no cover-up in the Ford administration. So rather than continue this traditional silence about breast cancer, we felt we had to be very public."

Her candid disclosure and her willingness to discuss her mastectomy were unprecedented. The news sent millions of women for screenings that saved lives – including that of Happy Rockefeller, the wife of Mr. Ford's newly appointed vice president, Nelson Rockefeller.

Mrs. Ford later served as co-chairwoman in 1982 when Nancy Brinker formed the Dallas-based Susan G. Komen Foundation.

The Komen Foundation is named after Ms. Brinker's sister, who died of breast cancer. As Ms. Brinker wrote on the foundation's Web site: "A major turning point in Suzy's struggle for survival came from a surprising source, Mrs. Betty Ford. ... Her bravery touched a place inside of Suzy that none of us could possibly understand because we hadn't gone through it ourselves."

When Ms. Brinker faced breast cancer in 1984, Mrs. Ford was among the first people to call her.

"I can't tell you what it meant to me to hear her voice," said Ms. Brinker, who now lives in Palm Beach, Fla. "Betty has always been a role model to me, and she's an extraordinary person. When someone who has blazed a trail turns around and gives you a hand, it's the greatest gift you can receive.

"My heart is so heavy for Betty now. It didn't get better than President Ford – he was the most supportive husband. He was a really compassionate man. They were an amazing couple."

Drugs and alcohol

After she left the White House in 1977, Mrs. Ford disclosed that she had struggled with alcohol and drug dependencies and depression since 1970. She thought she had conquered her problems, but she went through another low period after returning to private life and once again slipped into dependency.

This time, after a family intervention and hospital rehabilitation, Mrs. Ford emerged with a new cause: championing drug and alcohol rehab services. In 1982, she co-founded the Betty Ford Center for Drug and Alcohol Rehabilitation in Rancho Mirage, Calif., which has become arguably the best-known institution of its kind in the world. Of this achievement, her husband often said, "I couldn't be more proud."

"He truly wanted this to be her place, her mission, so he purposely stayed in the background, but he was always there," said John Schwarzlose, the center's president. "They were just two down-to-earth Americans who wanted to give alcoholics and addicts a chance to get well."

Mr. Ford always acknowledged the depth of their personal and public partnership. In April 1997, at the rededication of the Gerald R. Ford Museum in Grand Rapids, he said: "In my first remarks as president, delivered at a time of national as well as personal soul-searching, I said I was 'indebted to no man, and only to one woman, my dear wife.'

"In truth, there are no words to fully express how much I owe to Betty. For almost 50 years she has borne with my shortcomings, and I have rejoiced in her graces."

Chevy Chase As The Klutz In Chief, And A President Who Was In On The Joke (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 28 — While the events leading to Gerald Ford's ascent to the White House tarred him as an accidental president, he will also be remembered as an accident-prone president.

And for this he could thank the comedian Chevy Chase, or blame him, or (as he would eventually choose) laugh along.

No one did more to solidify Mr. Ford's unfortunate, and perhaps unfair, standing as the nation's First Klutz than Mr. Chase, the "Saturday Night Live" cast member who routinely portrayed the president committing all manner of trips, flails and lurches.

Mr. Ford's cheerful reaction to the sendup included doing a cameo for "Saturday Night Live" from the Oval Office; sending his press secretary, Ron Nessen, on the show; and appearing with Mr. Chase at a political dinner. That type of reaction became a benchmark of what would come to be an essential presidential image-making skill: an ability to laugh at oneself.

People in the political and entertainment worlds recall Mr. Ford as a contemporary hero in this regard.

"He was just so incredibly decent and good-natured about the skit," said Lorne Michaels, the longtime producer of "Saturday Night Live." Mr. Ford sent a signal, Mr. Michaels said, that it was all right to be lighthearted about the presidency after the ordeal of the Watergate years.

"You couldn't imagine Nixon signaling that this was O.K.," Mr. Michaels said. In a sense, he added, Mr. Ford was telling the country that "we could all move on from this."

"This" referred to Watergate, and Mr. Ford, who was acutely aware of the public mood, was adept at using humor as a balm.

"At the time," Mr. Ford wrote in his book "Humor and the Presidency," "the media and general public still resented any hint of 'imperial' trappings in connection with the presidency or the White House."

Mr. Ford avoided any evidence of magisterial bearing with his understated manner and game efforts in the fledgling realm of presidential stand-up. At the Radio and Television Correspondents' Association dinner in 1975, he surreptitiously grabbed the tablecloth on the way to the podium and sent silverware flying toward Mr. Chase.

"Ford looked back with this great look of wonderment at what had happened," recalled Robert Orben, a television comedy writer who became a top aide to Mr. Ford. "He was someone who was not afraid to have fun at his own expense."

Mr. Ford was an accomplished football player, skier and golfer and was not considered unusually awkward by those around him. But he contributed to his own boneheaded persona in a few ill-timed episodes of camera-range clumsiness, like stumbling down the steps of Air Force One in Austria, wiping out on the slopes in Vail, Colo., and getting zonked on the head by a passing chairlift.

Mr. Chase whacked home the clumsy caricature on a weekly basis, in a way that became indelibly affixed to Mr. Ford's legacy.

The parody "just absolutely stuck in the public consciousness," said Landon Parvin, who has written humorous speeches for Presidents Bush and Ronald Reagan.

It became so ingrained that Mr. Ford had no choice but to play along.

"He was very smart about trying to get out ahead of the joke," said Mark Katz, a speechwriter who specialized in preparing President Bill Clinton for appearances at lighthearted Washington affairs, like the Gridiron and the White House Correspondents' Association Dinner.

"Now, every politician is lining up to make fun of themselves on Letterman and Jon Stewart's couch," Mr. Katz said.

Mr. Ford was hardly the first president to mock himself publicly. Even Richard M. Nixon was open to the ritual, once appearing on "Rowan & Martin's Laugh-In" to solemnly utter the show's catchphrase, "Sock it to me." Nor was Mr. Chase the first comedian to impersonate a president on television. The impersonator Vaughn Meader lampooned John F. Kennedy on "The Ed Sullivan Show" multiple times.

But Mr. Chase was the first comedian to make fun of a president in what would become television's signature forum for that, "Saturday Night Live."

"Ford is so inept that the quickest laugh is the cheapest laugh, and the cheapest is the physical joke," Mr. Chase told Time magazine in 1976. (A spokesman for Mr. Chase, who was skiing in Colorado on Thursday, said he would not be available for comment.)

In "Humor and the Presidency," an exploration of the role comedy has played in American presidencies, namely his own, Mr. Ford wrote, "It wouldn't surprise me if there was a measurable correlation between humor in an administration and the popularity of that administration's policies."

He also admitted he was stung at first by Mr. Chase's parody, but acknowledged its effectiveness. "The portrayal of me as an oafish ex-jock made for good copy," Mr. Ford wrote. "It was also funny."

Mr. Chase made no effort to look, dress or talk like Mr. Ford. He merely fell, with lurching exaggeration, "giving the sense that he was someone who wasn't in control of his limbs," Mr. Michaels, the producer, said.

His fall complete, Mr. Chase would then open the show with the signature line, "Live from New York, it's Saturday Night."

Bush Is Right -- And Other Lessons (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

The tributes to Gerald Ford's great achievement in bringing a divided and disappointed country together seem oddly appropriate at the end of a tumultuous political year in which an Era of Angry Feelings led to a major shift of power in Washington.

It is said there is now a new longing for the civility and warmth that Ford represented. There is a certain truth to this, but having reviewed thousands of e-mails sent my way this year by readers, it's also clear that many Americans are deeply invested in political battles that they see as too important to admit of easy compromise.

True, citizens who e-mail columnists are more engaged in public life and care so passionately that they invest time to share their views -- often in learned detail.

I love these folks and thank them. I appreciate their commitment, which is why, once a year, I like to thank not only those who wrote generously and warmly but also the many dissenters represented succinctly by the reader who simply called me an "idiot."

Many critics offered useful challenges. "Perhaps, Mr. Dionne, you would also support the right of conservatives to appear without harassment, verbal and physical, at our nation's leading so-called institutions of higher learning controlled by your . . . fellow leftists." I do: It is wrong -- and illiberal -- to block those with whom you disagree from university platforms.

In response to a column on evangelical pastor Rick Warren, a reader from Portage, Wis., wrote: "Evangelical churches I have been associated with have been reaching out to people throughout the world since before you were born. Missionaries don't just run around in funny clothes and wave their Bible in the air. They teach basic health and sanitation, provide basic medical care. . . . The very idea that evangelicals have been negligent in these areas is simply liberal prejudice."

Judging from my mail, many liberals and Democrats who once liked Sen. John McCain have been pushed away by his opening to the right over the past year or so -- but conservatives are responding positively. "McCain is soon to be Maverick non grata" -- nice line -- "amongst the circles of smug, rich white liberals that you run in," one reader wrote. "But don't worry. We'll support him if he becomes our nominee."

Many conservatives are frustrated with the Bush administration and the outgoing Republican Congress. Their views were captured by one reader who wrote: "Conservatism, like Christianity, has not failed. Neither has ever been tried, especially by this administration."

A columnist's e-mail trove is not a scientific sample that would pass the muster of social science. But it does provide clues as to where the politically active invest their energies. Judging by how many people offered their views on nominations to the U.S. Supreme Court, the conventional wisdom is entirely right in seeing this as a blockbuster issue.

When I wrote critically of Samuel Alito's evasiveness during his Senate confirmation hearing to become an associate justice, the floodgates opened. One reader after another suggested that Alito had been no more evasive than Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg had been during her hearings in the 1990s. "Gosh, E.J.," a friendly critic from South Carolina said, "how many times do you have to be reminded? We won, you lost. I didn't hear you moaning over Ginsburg's evasions or whining about how [Stephen] Breyer would move the court to the left; turnabout is fair play. Relax, maybe your gang will get back in one day." Indeed.

Also striking was how angry liberals were at the performance of Democratic senators on the Judiciary Committee. One reader, representing many others, complained that "all they did was read from redundant and sterile scripts and badger him with the same questions ad nauseam. They have become like the 'pods' in 'Invasion of the Body Snatchers.' "

And thanks to the reader who wrote: "I would like to congratulate you for identifying yourself as a liberal. Many in your crowd are running from that word these days." It's a sign of weakness to embrace only poll-tested and focus-grouped labels.

Finally, a great many readers were frustrated that I have been rather consistently critical of President Bush -- though a few wanted more criticism. So please permit me to end the year in the conciliatory spirit of Gerald Ford.

Speaking on Wednesday morning, Bush declared that Ford "came along when we needed him most" and that Americans came to know him "as a man of complete integrity who led our country with common sense and kind instincts."

Straightforwardness Was Ford's Virtue — And His Limitation (RC)

Roll Call, December 29, 2006

In an Oval Office interview in 1976, I asked President Gerald Ford about charges made to me and many others by Indira Gandhi, prime minister of India, that the CIA was trying to overthrow her.

Ford said it was nonsense but declared that Gandhi was pro-Soviet and no friend of the United States. As he spoke, an aide sitting by got noticeably fidgety.

"Ah, excuse me," the aide said. "Can we please make that off the record? It will cause no end of trouble with India."

I agreed — then put the question to Ford again for what I expected would be a more diplomatic answer. The second answer was practically identical with the first and the aide just threw up his hands.

That was Ford — straightforward, honest, uncomplicated, salt-of-the-earth Midwestern, an Eagle Scout nearly incapable of dissembling.

He was just what the country needed after the traumas of Watergate — the product of former President Richard Nixon's deviousness and paranoia.

Ford's pardon of Nixon also was pure Ford. He saw that Nixon's fate — prosecution and possible suicide — would preoccupy the country and dominate his presidency.

"This American tragedy could go on and on," he told the country. "Someone must write an end to it. I have concluded that only I can do it, and if I can, I must."

The pardon cost Ford dearly in political support, but he thought it was the right thing to do and he did it. As history has proved, it was not part of a deal to make him president — though one was offered to him — and it was the right decision to heal the nation.

He was straightforward and right-minded, too, in handling the country's second great trauma — Vietnam. When North Vietnam launched its final offensive against the South in 1975, Ford wanted to stand by an ally in distress and asked Congress for $650 million in emergency military aid.

Congress refused. South Vietnam's army collapsed and all Ford could do was rescue as many Vietnamese as possible. When some American communities balked at accepting refugees, he said such attitudes were unworthy of America.

Ford's straight-forwardness limited his imagination, too. As a regular Republican Congressional leader, he voted against federally funded housing, aid to education, the Medicare program and former President Lyndon Johnson's war on poverty.

Johnson, a highly complex character, declared that "Jerry Ford can't fart and chew gum at the same time," which the press cleaned up to read "walk and chew gum."

When Ford was president, his first domestic preoccupation was inflation, which rose to 7 percent. Ford termed it a menace to the country as great as any foreign enemy and launched the ill-fated "Whip Inflation Now" campaign that had no effect whatsoever.

Then when unemployment rose to 9 percent, Ford kept to his conservative fiscal principles and tried to restrain federal spending, which Democrats thought could temper the recession.

Ford vetoed 66 bills passed by the Democratic Congress, most of them appropriations designed to relieve unemployment. Ford said he'd saved the Treasury $9 billion.

In foreign policy, Ford was a realist, not an idealist like Presidents Ronald Reagan or George W. Bush. Ford followed the guidance of his (and Nixon's) secretary of State, Henry Kissinger, who had a pessimistic view of human nature and the prospects of the West.

Kissinger believed that détente and co-existence with the Soviet Union were the best arrangement the U.S. could achieve. Reagan, by contrast, thought that the West could defeat the "evil empire."

Reagan, it turns out, was right. And Ford's détente policy, as much as the pardon, may have cost him his presidency.

Ford turned back Reagan's challenge in GOP primaries in 1976, but questions about détente undoubtedly caused the debate gaffe that elected President Jimmy Carter.

In 1976, Ford signed the Helsinki Accords, which critics attacked as guaranteeing Soviet control of Eastern Europe. Ford was trying to refute that charge in the debate when he denied that Poland was Soviet-dominated.

Going into that debate, Ford had pulled even with Carter. The gaffe — and his stubborn refusal to walk back from it for days — caused him to lose the election by a hair.

If Ford had won, chances are he would have been at constant war with Congress. And, probably, Reagan never would have been president. He would have won the 1980 GOP nomination, but the country would have blamed Republicans, not Carter, for the nation's stagnant economy and would have wanted a change after 12 years of GOP rule.

In character, Ford presided over one of the most open White Houses ever. His first chief of staff, Donald Rumsfeld, was capable of intrigue, constantly trying to oust Treasury Secretary William Simon with leaks.

But after Rumsfeld became Defense secretary, Ford installed Dick Cheney as chief of staff, and Cheney was one of the most accessible figures ever to hold that job — amazing as that now seems, given Cheney's now-deserved reputation for secrecy.

The Washington Post's Bob Woodward reports that Ford told him — in an interview to be published only after his death — that he opposed the Iraq War launched by his old protégés and President Bush.

It's a mark of Ford's decency that he didn't try to undermine a successor by speaking out as Bush was preparing for war. But it's also a flaw: He might have given the country pause.

The Pardon In History's Hindsight (WP)

By Richard Ben-veniste

Gerald R. Ford was a decent and honorable man. Under his steady hand, the nation began the process of recovering from the terrible trauma of Watergate -- the lies, distortions, coverups, misuses of federal agencies to exact political revenge, illegal wiretapping, burglaries. . . . The list went on and on -- all in the midst of the deeply divisive Vietnam War. Did Ford make the right decision in pardoning his predecessor? The answer to that question is more nuanced than either the howls of outrage that greeted the pardon three decades ago or the general acceptance with which it is viewed now.

When Richard M. Nixon resigned and Ford became the 38th president of the United States, the Watergate Special Prosecutor's Office, of which I was a member, was preparing for the criminal trials of Nixon's top aides -- H.R. Haldeman, John Ehrlichman and John Mitchell. We had accumulated significant evidence showing Nixon's active participation in a conspiracy to obstruct the FBI and grand jury investigation of the Watergate break-in and the related "White House horrors," to use Mitchell's famous description. Nixon himself had been named an "unindicted co-conspirator" by the grand jury -- even before the Supreme Court compelled disclosure of the "smoking gun" tape.

It was our collective view that so long as Nixon held the office of president, the constitutionally sanctioned process of impeachment should trump any suggestion that a sitting president be indicted. But there was considerable disagreement within the special prosecutor's office on the proper way to discharge our responsibilities vis-a-vis private citizen Nixon.

Some, including Special Prosecutor Leon Jaworski, were of the view that Nixon's precipitous fall from the highest office was punishment enough. An indictment conjured up the prospect of unprecedented pretrial publicity, making it unlikely that an impartial jury could be selected in the near future. On the other hand, Nixon's personal involvement in the same criminal conspiracy for which his aides were soon to be tried (and convicted) put to the test the maxim that no man is above the law.

Upon taking office as president, Gerald Ford gave reason to believe that any decision regarding a pardon for his predecessor would be made carefully and deliberately. Nineteen days after taking the oath of office, he responded to a press inquiry about a possible Nixon pardon, saying that until any legal process was undertaken it would be "unwise and untimely for me to make any commitment," adding that "until the matter reaches me, I am not going to make any comment during the process of whatever charges are made."

Yet, only 11 days later, Ford reversed course. Citing reasons of national reconciliation, the difficulty Nixon would have in obtaining a fair trial by jury, and the suffering that Nixon and his family had already endured, Ford announced that he had pardoned Richard Nixon for all crimes he committed or "may have committed" while president. The same day, Nixon issued a statement admitting only to "mistakes" and "misjudgments," saying that he "was wrong in not acting more decisively and more forthrightly in dealing with Watergate."

The pardon decision was met with strident criticism by much of the media. The Post equated Ford's pardon to another chapter in the coverup; the New York Times called it "profoundly unwise, divisive and unjust" and "a body blow to [Ford's] credibility." With the benefit of more than 30 years of perspective, the public's view of Ford's decision has softened considerably.

While I do not believe Ford was wrong to pardon Nixon, the timing of the pardon was premature and may have cost Ford the margin of victory in the 1976 election. Had Ford kept to his original plan and allowed time for formal charges to be lodged against Nixon, spelling out the specifics of his culpability, it would have been up to Nixon to either accept the pardon or fight the charges in court. But pardoning Nixon without requiring at least an acknowledgment of responsibility for serious misconduct and for lying to the public left the door open for the spate of revisionist books and articles that followed the resignation.

At bottom, the decision to pardon Nixon was a political judgment properly within the bounds of Ford's constitutional authority. The specter of a former president in the criminal dock as our country moved into its bicentennial year was profoundly disturbing. I believe Jerry Ford acted in accord with what he sincerely felt were the best interests of the country; that there was no secret quid pro quo with Nixon for a pardon in return for resignation; and that Ford, a compassionate man, was moved by the palpable suffering of a man who had lost so much.

The release of a slew of additional Nixon tapes has not been kind to the diminishing ranks of Nixon loyalists -- providing ever more evidence of Watergate-related mendacity. In the end, Ford may have been correct in believing the facts would sort themselves out well enough. Yet, because Ford did not condition his pardon on a formal acknowledgment of culpability by Nixon, historians will have to go to the underlying evidence to make their judgments on Nixon's responsibility for the criminal conduct and constitutional transgressions that left him with the stark choice between resignation and certain removal from office.

Edwards Seeks To Make 2nd Time A Charm (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, December 29, 2006

Two years older and he says wiser, too, John Edwards announced a repeat presidential campaign Thursday with new ideas that make him a very different candidate the second time around.

In 2004, Edwards was the moderate southern senator who promoted middle class tax cuts and tried to position himself as the best general election alternative to President Bush.

This time the 53-year-old faces a tougher fight for the Democratic nomination and has a more progressive campaign of eliminating poverty, reducing global warming and providing universal health care for all Americans.

He's apologizing for his vote to send troops to Iraq — which he stood by steadfastly in the 2004 campaign — and is calling for 40,000-50,000 troops to come home immediately.

And those middle class tax cuts he campaigned on in 2004? "At this point, it's hard to see how to do that," Edwards said in an interview after his campaign kickoff in New Orleans.

The unorthodox campaign launch site — the middle of a neighborhood still devastated more than a year after Hurricane Katrina — itself demonstrated how Edwards campaign has changed. In 2004, he had an official kickoff in his hometown of Robbins, N.C. for a campaign that stressed his up-from-the-bootstraps biography that turned the son of a mill worker into a successful trial attorney and then senator.

This time around, Edwards didn't mention one word about his personal story. He talked less about what he wanted to do as president and more about how everyone can change the country.

"That's why I'm in New Orleans," said Edwards, standing before student volunteers working to rebuild a home, "is to show what's possible when we as Americans, instead of staying home and complaining about somebody else not doing what they're supposed to, we actually take responsibility and we take action."

Edwards wore blue jeans and an open-necked shirt and stood casually before a line of television cameras and reporters to make his announcement. There was no TelePrompTer, no American flag backdrop and no cheering crowd that is typical of a presidential kickoff.

Edwards' advisers scheduled a six-state announcement tour between Christmas and New Year's Day with the hopes that news would be slow and he could dominate media coverage. Over three days, Edwards also planned to travel to Iowa, New Hampshire, Nevada, South Carolina and his home state of North Carolina.

Edwards was trying to make a unique entrance into what is bound to be a competitive race for president. Only two others have officially announced their candidacies — Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack and Rep. Dennis Kucinich — but several others are expected to join the race in the new year.

The most dominant figures are Sens. Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama, and Edwards' first question from the gathered reporters was about how he intends to compete with them. "I want the best human beings possible to run for president of the United States," Edwards said.

The race also might include Edwards' former partner on the Democratic ticket — 2004 presidential nominee John Kerry.

In an interview later in a nearby home that is almost completely rebuilt, Edwards brushed aside any suggestion that it might be awkward to take on the man who chose him for the national ticket last time around.

Edwards said the biggest responsibility of the next president will be to restore America's moral leadership in the world. He said the Bush administration's leadership in Iraq has been a disaster and that it would be a mistake to send in more troops, which Bush is considering in the new year.

Edwards said it's a "fair question" to ask about his lack of foreign policy experience after just one term in the Senate. But he said he's spend the last two years since he left office traveling the world. "It's given me some depth and understanding that didn't exist before that time," he said.

And he noted that the Bush administration has included such experienced foreign policy hands as Vice President Dick Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and "they've been an absolute disaster by any measure."

Edwards said it's not just Iraq that it is chaos and in need of moral leadership from the United States. He said the United States should be leading an end to genocide in Sudan and to atrocities in northern Uganda. He also said the United States should be part of the International Criminal Court, something that Bush has fought against to keep Americans from facing politically motivated prosecutions.

He also said the country should end its dependence on foreign oil. He said he would tax oil company profits and eliminate Bush's tax cuts to pay for his priorities.

In the interview later, Edwards said he will have a health care plan that will provide coverage for every American, something that few presidential candidates have considered a winning issue because of the high cost.

"I didn't have a universal health care plan (last time). Nobody did," Edwards said. "I shouldn't say nobody. I think Dennis Kucinich may have."

Kucinich, the most liberal presidential candidate in 2004 and 2008, wants national health insurance providing single-payer universal health care. He also wants to replace the Department of Defense with a Department of Peace and is a long-shot candidate for president.

Edwards said he's still working out the details of his health care plan and doesn't yet have a cost estimate.

New Orleans Is Exhibit A As Edwards Opens His Presidential Campaign (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Dec. 28 — Framed by two ruined houses and a dead tree, John Edwards inaugurated his 2008 presidential campaign here on Thursday with an appeal to citizens to take on challenges like the one represented by this still-devastated city.

The choice of a battered New Orleans neighborhood for Mr. Edwards's unconventional announcement, with student volunteers at his side, was intended to highlight what, in broad terms, would be a central theme of his campaign: the need for a fresh wave of citizen activism to "change this country."

The message, delivered without notes, was as loose and generalized as the setting was informal. Clad in shirt-sleeves, blue jeans and work boots, and standing in the muddy backyard of a homeowner struggling to come back from the destruction of Hurricane Katrina, Mr. Edwards explained to reporters gathered in the morning chill that "the basis for my campaign will be a ground-up campaign, where we ask people to take action."

As one of the first to enter the barely nascent campaign — his most likely competitors, Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois, have yet to announce — Mr. Edwards, the losing vice-presidential candidate in 2004, seemed at pains to begin on a positive note. He delivered a Kennedy-like appeal for grass-roots volunteerism rather than a broadside against President Bush, though he called Mr. Bush's foreign policy team "an absolute disaster" in the question-and-answer session afterward.

Though Mr. Edwards's central theme in the 2004 campaign was poverty, that was not the case on Thursday, as he made only a passing reference to the "two Americas," his slogan two years ago. Instead of choosing to announce from the Lower Ninth Ward, the impoverished neighborhood that has become a symbol for the devastation of Hurricane Katrina, Mr. Edwards, a former

North Carolina senator, opted for middle-class East New Orleans, and an area of solid, single-story tan-brick homes that are salvageable, unlike the flimsy frame buildings in the Lower Ninth Ward.

The house outside which he spoke belongs to a quality-assurance inspector at Luzianne, a local coffee and tea maker. The homeowner, Orelia Tyler, had floodwater up to her roof and has been living in a FEMA trailer. Dazzled by the senator's attention, Ms. Tyler said, "I'm hoping and praying he's doing it to help me get back in my house, and not for publicity."

As Mr. Edwards spoke, limbs from the dead tree in back of him, which were pushed down by the storm, still rested on the chain-link fence at the yard's edge; in the distance was a toppled basketball goal; a giant rusting ventilator fan lay on the ground.

"We need to call on Americans to be patriotic for something other than war," Mr. Edwards said.

Implicit in his brief remarks was criticism of the Bush administration's handling of New Orleans's foundering recovery. In Mr. Edwards's telling, the city was exemplary in both positive and negative senses, as a symbol of citizen action and government inaction. This was his fourth visit since the storm, and he spent part of the well-photographed previous day shoveling mud outside the same house.

Thursday, the ex-senator praised the army of volunteers that has gutted hundreds of houses and removed debris, but he pointedly omitted any recognition of the patchy official efforts.

He saved his criticism of Mr. Bush's New Orleans role for a question-and-answer session afterwards, telling reporters, "This is a place where presidential leadership would have been critical."

Asked how he would have handled New Orleans, Mr. Edwards responded: "I would have had somebody coming into my office every morning, and I would say to him, 'What did you do in New Orleans yesterday?' And then the next day, 'What did you do yesterday? What steps do we need to take? What are we not doing? What are the people in New Orleans telling us that we're not doing?' "

He said the next president would "need to re-establish America's leadership role in the world," called for quick withdrawal of 40,000 to 50,000 troops from Iraq, and said it "would be a mistake for America to escalate its role in Iraq."

Roundly denouncing the administration's approach, he said, "You can't lead through raw power."

He expressed regret for his Senate vote to authorize force in Iraq. "My vote was a mistake," he said. "I should never have voted for the war."

Afterward, Mr. Edwards headed for Iowa and a town-hall-style meeting in Des Moines. He has assiduously courted the electorate in Iowa, the first state to hold a presidential vote; this visit will be his 16th since the 2004 election. Several recent local polls have shown him in a leading position in Iowa, where he finished second in the 2004 caucuses.

Edwards Kicks Off Campaign With Focus On Poverty, Inequality (MCT)

By Rob Christensen

McClatchy Newspapers, December 29, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — John Edwards began his second quest for president Thursday by calling on the country to address the problems of poverty and inequality in America.

Edwards, 53, the 2004 Democratic vice presidential nominee and a former senator from North Carolina, used a hurricane-ravaged neighborhood in New Orleans as the backdrop for his announcement. The Ninth Ward section of the city is still strewn with boarded-up homes and piles of debris 16 months after the area was flooded by Hurricane Katrina.

"New Orleans in so many ways shows the two Americas that I have talked about in the past," Edwards said.

Edwards said it wasn't just the business of government to rebuild destroyed neighborhoods, although he criticized the Bush administration for doing too little. He said he would use his campaign as a "call to action" to encourage private groups to help those in need in New Orleans and elsewhere. Standing behind Edwards was a group of Baton Rouge, La., students who have been volunteering in New Orleans.

"If you walk around these neighborhoods, what you'll hear is that most of the good that has been done in New Orleans has been done by faith-based groups, charity groups and volunteers," Edwards said.

Edwards also called for universal health care coverage, more opportunities for young people to go to college and beginning the withdrawal of American troops from Iraq while seeking a political solution to the conflict. Edwards said he favors rolling back some of the tax cuts for well-to-do Americans pushed by the Bush administration. He spoke in broad terms, offering few specifics on how he would bring about the changes he proposed.

Edwards begins the Democratic primary trailing New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, according to national polls, even though they haven't declared their candidacy. But Edwards is better known than most of the other Democrats considering the 2008 race.

Edwards left New Orleans for a three-day tour that was to take him through the key primary and caucus states of Iowa, New Hampshire, Nevada and South Carolina, before finishing Saturday with a rally near his new 102-acre estate in Chapel Hill, N.C.

The spectacle of a presidential announcement, with its congregation of TV trucks, drew few onlookers because so much of the Ninth Ward has been abandoned. The area looks like a battle zone, with Federal Emergency Management Agency trailers sitting outside half-destroyed homes and neighborhoods patrolled by military police in Humvees.

A half-block away, Michael Knight, a 31-year-old electrician who grew up in the neighborhood that locals called Checkerboard, ignored the hoopla.

"I don't think it makes a big difference to me," Knight said of the Edwards visit. "I really don't see it doing nothing. He's not the first one to come down here."

Edwards, a mill worker's son who became a millionaire trial lawyer, has linked himself to the issue of poverty. He's made three previous trips to New Orleans to help residents with rebuilding projects. During his 2004 campaign, Edwards emphasized his Two Americas theme, highlighting the inequalities in America. In 2005, Edwards created the Center on Poverty, Work and Opportunity at the University of North Carolina in Chapel Hill. He has compared his stance to that of the late Sen. Robert Kennedy, who ran for president in 1968.

But addressing poverty, rather than the problems of the struggling middle class, can be tricky politically.

"It's clearly not the main mover of most voters," said Lee Miringoff, director of the Marist Institute for Public Opinion in New York. "People are interested in the war in Iraq. The question is whether he can talk about the quality of life for Americans as part of the specialized focus on people who are poor."

The last major presidential candidate to focus on poverty was Jesse Jackson in 1988. The so-called "New Democrats" such as Bill Clinton and Al Gore largely wrote off the issue.

"Politically, it's a marginal strategy," said Allan Lichtman, a presidential scholar at American University. "Whether that is going to appeal to the base of the Democratic Party is an interesting question."

Some fellow Democrats wonder whether emphasizing poverty and populism is the way to win the party's nomination.

"He is defining himself as the little people's friend," said Dick Hartpootlian, a former South Carolina Democratic chairman. "That works in the courtroom. I don't think that will work across the country."

Edwards Confirms Plan To Run For White House (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, December 29, 2006

Former Democratic vice presidential nominee John Edwards yesterday made his first public announcement that he will again seek his party's nomination for president.

The one-term senator from North Carolina, who made a hefty fortune as a personal injury lawyer, chose as the backdrop of his speech the squalor left in New Orleans by Hurricane Katrina more than a year ago.

"New Orleans, in so many ways, shows the two Americas that I have talked about in the past and something that I feel very personally," he said yesterday, touching on the theme of class division that defined his 2004 primary campaign. "It also exemplifies something that I've learned since the last election, which is that it's great to see a problem and to understand it; it's more important to actually take action and do something about it."

Asked by a reporter whether he was announcing from the now-famous 9th Ward to help New Orleans or so that New Orleans could help his political career, Mr. Edwards replied, "Yeah, well I hope so."

"In the worst-hit areas of New Orleans, as everyone in New Orleans knows -- they certainly don't need me to tell them -- you don't see much change," he said. "So if we can help bring Americans to New Orleans to help rebuild this great city and get people to pay attention to what's actually going on here, I feel like we've done a good thing."

Mr. Edwards faces a field dramatically altered from the one he faced leading up to the 2004 presidential elections. Then, he was a fresh face who was still sitting in the Senate. He held a great deal of promise as a Democrat from the South who might help break the Republican stranglehold on Dixie.

Today, he is no longer a fresh face and has spent the past two years out of office running a poverty center in North Carolina. Also, he proved ineffective at making inroads in the South, failing even to deliver his home state to the 2004 Democrat ticket headed by Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts.

Still dominating the field are two potential candidates who haven't even announced their intentions: Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois.

Mr. Edwards had planned to announce his candidacy yesterday, but a computer mishap that put his campaign Web site on the Internet on Wednesday forced his team to say that day that he was running. He also sent an e-mail to supporters Wednesday night to that effect.

Mr. Edwards has another obstacle in his path to the White House: He voted for the Iraq war.

"My vote was a mistake, and I should never have voted for this war," he said yesterday. "I do think it's important to note for anybody who voted for the war that we didn't conduct the war. [President] Bush, [Vice President Dick] Cheney, those people -- [former Defense Secretary Donald H.] Rumsfeld -- they conducted the war, and they've been an absolute disaster in the conducting of the war. But none of that changes or affects my responsibility. I'm responsible for what I did, and I believe that my vote was a mistake."

He also said he opposes any increase in the number of troops serving in Iraq.

Mr. Edwards also took the opportunity yesterday to criticize the Bush administration for its handling of the post-hurricane rescue efforts, cleanup and rebuilding in New Orleans.

"I think if the president of the United States had come to New Orleans, spent some time here -- I mean, the president has a lot of responsibilities, he can't stake himself out for the long term in New Orleans -- but he should have spent a period of days here, saw what was actually happening on the ground and then demanded action," Mr. Edwards said.

Hurricane Katrina hit during the final days of August last year.

On Sept. 15, President Bush delivered a prime-time address to the nation after reviewing the damage.

Edwards Hopes Persistence Pays Off In Presidency (LAT)

By Michael Finnegan, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 29, 2006

The 2004 candidate is seeking the Democratic nomination for 2008, saying Americans have a responsibility to help one another.

NEW ORLEANS — With the ruins of New Orleans as his backdrop, former Democratic vice presidential nominee John Edwards on Thursday called on Americans to take action against poverty, global warming and other troubles as he officially launched his 2008 campaign for president.

"We can't wait for someone else to do this for us," the onetime U.S. senator from North Carolina said from a muddy 9th Ward backyard where volunteers were fixing a home gutted by Hurricane Katrina.

Dressed in blue jeans, sneakers and a work shirt, Edwards outlined his vision of the presidency as a moral force to promote universal healthcare, higher wages for the working poor and other steps.

New Orleans, he said, illustrates the "two Americas" that he lamented in his 2004 run for president — one for the privileged, and one for those struggling to get by.

Reprising that theme for 2008, Edwards this time is stressing "personal responsibility." In a setting of flood-ravaged houses with boarded-up windows and punctured walls — which he said the government had done too little to repair — he urged Americans to volunteer for anti-poverty work and cut fuel use to ease global warming.

"Instead of staying home and complaining, we're asking people to help," he said in the drawl that became familiar to the nation during his four-month stint as running mate to 2004 Democratic presidential nominee John F. Kerry after Edwards' own presidential bid failed.

Edwards also called for the immediate withdrawal of 40,000 to 50,000 U.S. troops from the war in Iraq, saying the move would begin to restore America's standing as a world leader.

Campaigning hours later in Des Moines, Edwards took a swipe at a leading Republican contender for president, Sen. John McCain of Arizona, for saying the U.S. should send more troops to Iraq.

"It would be an enormous mistake to adopt the McCain doctrine and escalate this war in Iraq," he said to cheers from several hundred people packed into the central atrium of a downtown museum.

As he has in the past, Edwards voiced regret for his Senate vote to authorize the U.S. invasion of Iraq. "I should have never voted for this war," he said.

Iowa was the first stop on his three-day swing to the first states to hold Democratic nomination contests. Edwards plans to campaign in New Hampshire and Nevada today and in South Carolina on Saturday.

By starting in Des Moines, Edwards underscored Iowa's crucial role in his campaign. His surprisingly strong second-place finish in the 2004 Iowa caucuses was a major lift to his presidential candidacy that year, and a poor showing here in 2008 could doom his candidacy. He has visited Iowa 16 times since the 2004 election, and polls suggest he holds an early edge in the state.

"He's been here as much as, if not more than, anybody else, and he's highly regarded by a lot of Democrats in Iowa," said Peverill Squire, a University of Iowa political science professor.

Edwards, 53, is the third Democrat officially in the race for president, following Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack and Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich of Ohio. He is also the best known nationally.

But like more than half a dozen Democrats still weighing a White House run, he faces a tough struggle for money and visibility in a contest dominated so far by two Democrats who have not formally announced intentions — Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois.

"Obama and Clinton are taking up an enormous amount of political space," said Democratic strategist Steve Elmendorf. Edwards "has to hope that one of the two of them falters."

The Edwards announcement came as no surprise; he has been preparing for the campaign for more than two years. (His campaign website also accidentally went live Wednesday, a day early, tipping his hand.)

To maximize media exposure, he timed his announcement for the normally slow news week before New Year's. The death this week of President Ford complicated that plan, but Edwards still drew more than 20 news crews to his chilly morning announcement in New Orleans.

Forgoing a customary campaign launch with balloons and cheering supporters, Edwards appeared alone on the bleak 9th Ward lawn of Orelia Tyler, who has lived in a frontyard trailer for months as repairs continued on her hurricane-wrecked home.

The early announcement — the opening 2008 contest in Iowa is more than a year away — enables Edwards to jump-start fundraising by showing donors that his candidacy is a sure thing. But he starts with debt lingering from 2004, and it will cost him tens of millions of dollars to compete seriously for the party nomination.

Edwards is no longer the fresh face he was in 2004 as a first-term senator whose candidacy for president was strong enough to keep him in the Democratic race longer than anyone but Kerry.

But since then, Edwards has worked to sharpen his profile for an encore campaign. He has aggressively cultivated union leaders, heightening his appeal to labor with efforts to fight poverty and increase the minimum wage. But Clinton and other potential Democratic contenders also have strong union ties.

Working to fill a widely noted gap in his 2004 resume, Edwards has also traveled the world to strengthen his image on foreign policy. In New Orleans, he called for stronger U.S. leadership in stopping "huge atrocities" in northern Uganda, where he met with relief workers a few weeks ago, and the genocide in Sudan.

"We said after Rwanda we'd never let anything like this happen again," he said. "Well, it's happening right now."

In Iowa, Edwards mentioned his recent trips to Israel and Britain and hammered the Bush administration for refusing to negotiate with adversaries.

DOJ_NMG_0110142

"It is in my judgment sheer stupidity to say we will not deal with our enemies," Edwards said.

A South Carolina native and the son and grandson of millworkers, Edwards was raised in rural North Carolina. He was the first in his family to attend college.

In two decades as a trial lawyer, Edwards made millions litigating cases against corporations for injured plaintiffs. His first run for public office was a 1998 campaign for U.S. Senate. He defeated Republican incumbent Lauch Faircloth of North Carolina and served one term.

Now, Edwards casts himself as a Washington outsider. Known in 2004 for his discipline in sticking to a poll-tested message, he vowed in a video on his campaign website to say more than just "what's safe."

"We're conditioned to be political, and it's hard to shed all that," he said. "I can be in the middle of being what feels real and authentic to me, and I'll get into a little reel in my head. I can see it happening, and I have to pull myself back out."

Edwards Formally Joins 2008 Presidential Race (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Dec. 28 -- Former senator John Edwards of North Carolina launched his second campaign for the White House from this flood-ravaged city Thursday with a call for the United States to reduce its troop presence in Iraq and a plea for citizen action to combat poverty, global warming and America's reliance on foreign oil.

Edwards was sharply critical of the administration for its conduct of the war in Iraq, and he again recanted his own vote authorizing President Bush to take the country to war, which he called a mistake.

"The biggest responsibility of the next president of the United States is to reestablish America's leadership role in the world, starting with Iraq," Edwards told reporters during his morning announcement. "We need to make it clear that we intend to leave Iraq and turn over the responsibility of Iraq to the Iraqi people."

Edwards said he favors withdrawing 40,000 to 50,000 troops from Iraq as a signal to Iraqis that the United States intends to turn over responsibility for the conflict to the government there. Wading into the current debate in Washington about Iraq, he forcefully rejected proposals to send more troops to help quell the bloody sectarian violence there.

"I want to be absolutely clear about this," he said. "It is a mistake for America to escalate its role in Iraq. It is a mistake to surge troops into Iraq. It sends exactly the wrong signal to the Iraqis and the rest of the world about what our intentions are there."

Edwards also said he favors rolling back some of the tax cuts given to the wealthiest Americans by the Bush administration, and he proposed a windfall profits tax on the oil industry, saying additional money will be needed to pay for vital domestic needs.

"I think it's also really important that we be honest with people," he said. "We've gotten in a deep hole, in terms of our deficit. We have investments that need to be made." He cited help for middle-class Americans, anti-poverty programs, universal health care and energy initiatives as examples.

From his choice of setting to his message, Edwards used the opening day of his 2008 bid to signal that he intends to run a populist, insurgent campaign designed to show that he is not a candidate of Washington, in contrast to his likely Democratic rivals -- including Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois.

"This campaign will be a grass-roots, ground-up campaign, where we ask people to take action," he said.

Edwards staged his announcement in the city's Ninth Ward, which was devastated by Hurricane Katrina last year. He spoke from a debris-strewn property where a home was heavily damaged by Katrina's floodwaters; it was adjacent to a newly renovated property where he spent several hours Wednesday working with young volunteers to landscape the back yard.

Edwards said no city better symbolizes the "two Americas" -- haves and have-nots -- that he spoke about during his 2004 campaign. But he said New Orleans also shows the good that can come when people act for themselves, rather than relying solely on the government.

The day was shorn of most of the trappings of traditional presidential campaign announcements. The candidate appeared wearing blue jeans and a blue shirt, standing alone rather than surrounded by family or supporters. The only people in the background were the young volunteers he had worked with on Wednesday.

The announcement also highlighted the changing shape of political communication. Edwards had no prepared text, spoke briefly and took a few questions from reporters. But before that, he had declared his candidacy with a video posted through his campaign Web site on YouTube, with an e-mail sent overnight to supporters and with five interviews on morning television shows.

Edwards picked a traditionally slow news week to declare his candidacy, hoping to draw more attention to what is often a well-scripted ritual lacking in suspense. By moving early, Edwards also avoided being overshadowed by the anticipated entries of celebrities Clinton and Obama, who will make their intentions known in January.

Edwards begins his campaign well positioned to compete for the nomination. He tops public opinion polls of Democrats in Iowa, which will hold the first caucuses of 2008; retains a base in South Carolina, whose primary he won in 2004; and has built good relationships with organized labor in Nevada, which is scheduled to hold the second set of caucuses of the election season.

One question mark among the early states is New Hampshire, which holds the nation's first primary. Edwards finished fourth there in 2004, but aides say he has improved his standing there since that primary.

Another question surrounding Edwards's candidacy is whether he will be able to compete against Clinton and Obama in fundraising.

Edwards has been running steadily for president since he and Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) lost to Bush and Vice President Cheney in 2004. He made his first post-election trip to New Hampshire in February 2005 and campaigned tirelessly for Democrats running in the midterm elections.

He set up a poverty institute at the University of North Carolina and, when Hurricane Katrina focused attention on the plight of the underclass in America, renewed his calls for a new commitment to eliminate poverty. He also campaigned on behalf of ballot initiatives calling for an increase in the minimum wage.

He sought to strengthen his foreign policy credentials -- a notable weakness in his first campaign -- through involvement with the Council on Foreign Relations. Asked Thursday about his national security rÃ©sumÃ©, Edwards said experience is no substitute for good judgment and cited the administration's record as evidence.

"We've had one of the most experienced foreign policy teams in American history," he said, pointing to Cheney and former defense secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. "They've been an absolute disaster by any measure."

Edwards, 53, made millions of dollars as a trial lawyer in North Carolina before entering politics in 1998. He won a Senate seat that year, defeating incumbent Republican Sen. Lauch Faircloth. He established a reputation as a quick study, a shrewd and tough questioner, and one of the party's rising stars -- prompting him to run for president after just four years in public life.

His 2004 campaign lagged for months but caught fire just before the Iowa caucuses, where he finished second to Kerry. He parlayed that success into a victory in South Carolina, and his performance in the primaries earned him a slot on the Democratic ticket.

After events in New Orleans on Thursday, Edwards flew to Iowa for a more traditional campaign rally in Des Moines, marking his 16th visit to Iowa since the end of the 2004 campaign.

At a town hall meeting, he fielded questions on energy, education, the deficit, Iraq and his past support for the war. "At the end of the day, I voted yes and I should not have," he said. "I'm the one who's responsible for that."

Edwards Launches Presidential Bid From New Orleans (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, December 28, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — John Edwards launched his second bid for the Democratic presidential nomination this morning amid the wreckage of Hurricane Katrina, saying the next president's most important task will be to provide moral leadership at home and abroad.

"We need to be the example for the rest of the world," Edwards, dressed in jeans and work boots, said as he stood with a cadre of student volunteers in a muddy yard in New Orleans' 9th Ward, between two houses gutted by the August 2005 disaster.

The former North Carolina senator, his party's 2004 vice presidential nominee, said he is committed to universal health care, ending poverty and showing the world that "we have the moral authority to lead."

Edwards, 53, made the unconventional choice of New Orleans during a holiday week to announce his 2008 candidacy. The location highlighted his longtime theme of "two Americas," one for the 'haves' and the other for the 'have-nots,' and a new call to grassroots action. The timing was meant to grab some attention before the Democratic field swells in coming weeks.

New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama say they'll announce their plans after the holidays. Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack and Rep. Dennis Kucinich of Ohio already are in the race. Other prospects include New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson and Sens. Joe Biden of Delaware, Christopher Dodd of Connecticut and 2004 nominee John Kerry of Massachusetts.

As president, Edwards said, he would make investments in health, education and other areas that would require rolling back some tax cuts for the wealthy. But he also said Americans should take steps now to rebuild New Orleans, help the poor, reduce global warming and use less energy rather than waiting for the federal government or the next president to do it.

Edwards called his vote to authorize the Iraq war "a mistake" for which he takes full responsibility. The one-term senator said he has been "all over the world" in the last two years and has increased his depth of knowledge of world affairs.

He said it's fair to question his level of experience but said that doesn't guarantee vision or good judgment. He cited President Bush, Vice President Cheney and former Defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld prove his point. They were "extraordinarily experienced," he said, but their tenure has been "an absolute disaster by any measure."

He criticized the Bush administration for making it difficult to engage other countries on international problems. "The world is literally in chaos," he said. "When America doesn't lead, there is no stability. We are the stabilizing force in the world."

New Orleans was the first stop on a three-day tour that was taking Edwards to all four early primary-season states — Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada — before arriving home in Chapel Hill, N.C. for a welcome rally Saturday.

Edwards is no longer a new face on the national stage, and this time around his rivals may well include two presidential newcomers — Obama and Clinton — with significant star power. Still, Edwards is not quite David taking on two Goliaths, as Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh characterized himself when he abruptly quit the race earlier this month.

Polls of the states that kick off the primary season, Iowa and New Hampshire, show Edwards holding his own. In Iowa he is leading or tied for first place in polls taken in June, October and December. In New Hampshire, a Concord Monitor poll this month found Clinton and Obama at 22% and 21% respectively, followed by Edwards at 16%. Everyone else in single digits.

"As with his polling in Iowa, he's showing a certain strength here in New Hampshire as well. He's certainly going to be a contender," said Ray Buckley, the incoming chairman of the New Hampshire Democratic Party.

Since the 2004 election, Edwards has headed a new Center on Poverty, Work and Opportunity at the University of North Carolina and started a College for Everyone tuition program now being tested in a county in North Carolina. In June he proposed tax cuts for low-income families, incentives to save, a last-chance temporary jobs program, $1 million in housing vouchers for poor families and other steps as part of a plan to end poverty by 2036.

Edwards also has traveled the country cultivating labor support and promoting minimum wage hikes, part of his anti-poverty plan. He helped fellow Democrats raise $8.5 million for their campaigns and parties. He visited London, Russia, India, Brussels, Israel, Uganda and China.

Edwards' wife, Elizabeth, underwent treatments for breast cancer that was diagnosed the day after the 2004 election. He said Thursday that she is in good health.

Edwards Vows To Restore US Image In Bid For Presidency (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo in Washington

Financial Times, December 29, 2006

John Edwards, the former North Carolina senator and Democratic vice-presidential nominee, yesterday became the fourth Democrat to enter the 2008 race for the White House.

Mr Edwards vowed to run on a platform of de-feating poverty and combating global warming. But he said his top priority would be restoring America's image.

"The biggest responsibility of the next president of the United States is to re-establish America's leadership role in the world, starting with Iraq," said Mr Edwards. "We have to show that we have the moral authority to lead. You can't lead through raw power."

Mr Edwards, who became John Kerry's running mate in 2004 after failing to secure the Democratic presidential nomination, spoke just hours before President George W. Bush held a national security meeting at his Texas ranch to discuss options for Iraq.

Mr Edwards joined Joseph Biden, the incoming Democratic chairman of the Senate foreign relations committee who this week also announced his intention to run for the White House, in opposing more US troops for Iraq, an option considered by Mr Bush.

National polls of voters in Democratic primary elections show Mr Edwards running in third position behind Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama, both of whom are mulling running for the White House.

A recent NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll found that 14 per cent of respondents favoured Mr Edwards, compared with 18 per cent for Mr Obama. Ms Clinton led the pack with 37 per cent. However, a recent poll of voters in Iowa - a key state as it holds the first primary - showed Mr Edwards tied with Mr Obama at 22 per cent, ahead of Ms Clinton with 10 per cent.

In announcing his candidacy, Mr Edwards ap-peared to model himself on John F. Kennedy, who famously called on Americans to "ask not what your country can do for you, ask what you can do for your country". Dressed in jeans as he spoke from the hurricane-ravaged city of New Orleans, Mr Edwards said: "If . . . we want to move America that way it needs to move, we're going to have to do it, all of us, together. Instead of staying home and complaining, we're asking people to help."

In 2004 Mr Edwards ran on an anti-poverty populist campaign of two Americas - the haves and have-nots. Yesterday he focused more on foreign policy. He said the US needed to get more involved in solving the crisis in Darfur and said America should join the International Criminal Court. Asked about his relative inexperience in foreign policy, Mr Edwards replied that "one of the most experienced foreign policy teams in American history" - Donald Rumsfeld and Dick Cheney - had been "an absolute disaster".

Edwards Embarks On Cross-Country Tour To Advance His Candidacy (BLOOM)

By Nicholas Johnston

Bloomberg, December 29, 2006

Dec. 29 (Bloomberg) -- Former Senator John Edwards embarked on a cross-country campaign to promote his new presidential bid after getting the jump on some fellow Democrats by announcing his populist candidacy in hurricane-ravaged New Orleans.

Seeking to build support against a formidable slate of possible opponents, the North Carolina Democrat appeared at a town hall meeting in Iowa, home to the nation's first presidential caucus, before heading to New Hampshire, site of the first primary election in 2008. In Iowa, Edwards is tied in early polls with Barack Obama and ahead of Hillary Clinton, two senators who are likely to join the race soon.

``Man, it's great to be back in Iowa," Edwards told several hundred people who packed the Iowa State Historical Museum in Des Moines last night. ``I've been to Iowa a time or two," he said to laughter from the crowd. It was Edwards's 16th trip to the state in the past two years.

The holiday-season entry into the race and early campaign foray by Edwards are designed to lessen the advantage Clinton and Obama enjoy as early favorites.

The Democratic contest ``is being presented so generally in the media as a race between Hillary and Obama," said Stephen Hess, a presidential scholar at the Brookings Institution in Washington. Edwards is well-positioned for ``somebody slipping on a banana peel."

Rob Tully, an attorney who helped run Edwards's 2004 presidential campaign in Iowa, said there is a lot of ``hype" surrounding other candidates. Edwards, by practicing ``retail politics" now in key states, will have the organization and connection with voters to win the early contests, he said.

Second-Place Finish

Edwards, 53, placed second in Iowa in 2004 and fourth in New Hampshire before dropping out to become the vice-presidential running mate of the victor in both states, Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts.

``It's still Iowa and New Hampshire in terms of momentum," Tully said. ``You can just ask President Dean how important the Iowa caucuses are."

Former Vermont Governor Howard Dean, an early media favorite in 2004, placed third in Iowa, second in New Hampshire the following week and withdrew soon after.

``I'm doing my by best to allow people to see who I am and what it is I believe and how important I think it is to engage Americans and bring about the changes we need," Edwards said in an interview.

Iraq War

At the Iowa rally, Edwards said he would work to ``restore America's moral leadership in the world" by beginning to pull U.S. forces from Iraq and again acknowledged he was wrong to vote to authorize the war as a senator in 2002. ``It was a mistake and I take responsibility for that," Edwards said.

He kicked off his campaign yesterday in the backyard of Oleria Tyler of New Orleans, whose home was severely damaged by Hurricane Katrina in 2005. Edwards accused the Bush administration of neglecting poorer residents trying to recover from the storm.

``New Orleans, in so many ways, shows the two Americas that I have talked about in the past," Edwards said, returning to his theme of a nation divided by wealth and poverty.

In a recent survey of 400 Iowa Democrats who are likely to attend the state's presidential caucuses in January 2008, Edwards polled 22 percent, tied for first with Obama. Iowa Governor Tom Vilsack came in second with 12 percent and Clinton was third with 10 percent.

In New Hampshire

The survey, conducted Dec. 18-20 by polling firm Research 2000, has a margin of error of 5 percentage points.

After his appearance in Iowa, Edwards flew to Portsmouth, New Hampshire, where today he holds a town hall meeting at an elementary school.

A poll of 400 New Hampshire Democrats conducted by Research 2000 found Clinton and Obama virtually tied with 22 percent and 21 percent respectively. Edwards polled third with 16 percent.

``He has a certain degree of name recognition and a pretty fat Rolodex," Hess said. ``He's still very much a player and, very obviously, he's a very attractive person and a very good speaker."

Edwards is making his 10th trip to New Hampshire since the 2004 election, and the current campaign swing also includes stops in Nevada and South Carolina, which hold early contests for the Democratic nomination.

Since the 2004 election, Edwards has visited 39 states and raised more then $8.5 million for Democratic candidates in this year's congressional elections.

Tully said Edwards, a trial lawyer and seasoned politician, has the speaking skills to help him in Iowa where the winner is picked in public meetings. The system requires successful candidates to generate enthusiasm among caucus-goers to get them to speak on their behalf to other voters.

``It really is about touching these people to make them want to not only go there and stand and say, `I'm for John Edwards,' but to actually voice their reasoning why," Tully said. ``The people who show up are going to be there because they want this guy to be president of the United States."

Edwards Brings Campaign Launch Tour To Des Moines (DMR)

By Abby Simons

Des Moines Register, December 29, 2006

Greeting cheering supporters the day he announced his second bid for the presidency, former vice presidential candidate John Edwards stripped off his jacket and said it's great to be back in Iowa.

"And I have to tell you, it's even better to be back as candidate for president of the United States," he said at a Thursday evening town hall meeting at the Iowa State Historical Building in Des Moines.

Touting the slogan "Tomorrow Begins Today," Edwards, 53, a former senator from North Carolina, pledged a grass-roots campaign that begins with domestic issues, such as eliminating poverty and strengthening the middle class — hence Thursday morning's campaign announcement in Katrina-ravaged New Orleans.

Edwards said that he is working on a true universal health care plan, not just access to health care or affordable health care. It's part of taking care of the nation's people and America proving itself once again as a model for the rest of the world, he said.

"We need to be patriotic for something other than just war," he said.

Edwards also spoke about foreign policy issues, including beginning the process of removing troops from Iraq.

"There is so much we need to do, starting with America's moral leadership in the world," he said.

"That morality begins with Iraq, and it would be an enormous mistake to begin with the McCain doctrine," he said of Arizona Republican Sen. John McCain's proposal to put more troops in Iraq. "It needs to be made clear that our troops are not going to stay in Iraq, and the best way to make that clear is to actually start leaving."

Edwards repeatedly pointed out that he voted for the occupation of Iraq in 2003, but he said he did so because of information received while he was a member of the Senate Intelligence Committee. He maintains that he has spoken out against it since.

"I'm not responsible for the condition of this war. That's Bush, Cheney and Rumsfeld," he said referring to the president, the vice president, and the former secretary of defense.

He also focused on the dangers of global warming and America's energy crisis and addiction to oil. Each issue had one unifying factor, he pointed out. Every American could take part in making the country better not just by supporting him, but by taking action of their own.

"I don't want us to stand by and wait for the next election and the next president to solve these problems — although we have some hopes for that — but we want to start taking responsibility now, and doi ng things now," he said.

Taking questions Edwards answered several questions from supporters during the 90-minute town hall meeting, ranging from the federal No Child Left Behind education law to the situation in the Middle East.

The first question concerned his position on immigration. Edwards conceded that while the nation's southern border does need to be secured, law-abiding immigrants who have entered the country illegally should be allowed to stay, after paying a fine and learning to speak English.

Supporter Gary Smith, 56, of Iowa City asked Edwards about the nation's ever-growing deficit and what he would do to fix it. Edwards responded that while it was a concern, eliminating poverty, global warming and other domestic issues took precedence. While not the answer Smith was looking for, he said his support for Edwards didn't waver.

"I was a little disappointed that he didn't have much to say about the Chinese in the context of our national deficit and how we've mortgaged our debt to them," Smith said. "It's not a very sexy issue, but we could find ourselves destroying our economy, and these guys hold most of it."

Smith, who caucused for John Kerry in 2004, calls Edwards an attractive candidate, but said he will see what other campaigns bring. Regardless, he didn't think Edwards announcement was too early.

About unions Pat and Theresa Navin of Winterset, both labor union supporters, agreed with much of what Edwards had to say, but most of all agreed with his several mentions of expanding unions. The Navins believe it's important for more than just the workers themselves.

"I think he was great before, and he'll be great again," Theresa Navin said. "Anyone who is pro-union, pro-worker and pro-family has my support. Strong unions equate with a strong middle class. Everyone just wants a livable wage. The middle class is supporting the entire country, and we're tired of it."

Edwards Announces Run For Presidency (BOS)

By Susan Milligan, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, December 29, 2006

Pressure is on Kerry to decide

WASHINGTON -- Former senator John Edwards formally announced his candidacy for president yesterday, further crowding an early Democratic field for the nomination and putting added pressure on his former running mate, Massachusetts Senator John Kerry, to decide whether he will make a second bid for president.

Speaking in New Orleans to showcase the problems still facing the city ravaged by Hurricane Katrina, a blue jeans-clad Edwards called for greater volunteer participation by the public and new leadership from the government -- starting with an immediate, gradual pull out from Iraq.

"We need to make it clear that we intend to leave Iraq and turn over the responsibility of Iraq to the Iraqi people," said Edwards, 53, a former North Carolina senator. "The best way to make that clear is to actually start leaving," he said, beginning with the removal of 40,000 to 50,000 troops. Edwards rejected the idea of a "surge" of extra troops to stabilize Iraq, a plan under consideration by the Bush administration.

The 2004 Democratic vice presidential nominee repeated his regret over having voted to authorize the war in Iraq in 2002 but said the Bush administration -- including Vice President Dick Cheney and former defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld -- were to blame for the way the Iraq war has played out over the last three and a half years.

"It's important to note, for anybody who voted for the war, that we didn't conduct the war," Edwards said. "Bush, Cheney, those people -- Rumsfeld, they conducted the war. And they have been an absolute disaster in the conducting of the war."

Edwards' entry into the race as the third candidate for the Democratic nomination puts pressure on Kerry to make his decision, since the two former colleagues and running mates will be competing for a finite pool of money and support, analysts said. Former Iowa Governor Tom Vilsack and Ohio Representative Dennis Kucinich have already announced their candidacies for the Democratic nomination, and observers believe early front-runners Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Senator Barack Obama of Illinois may not be far behind. New Mexico Governor Bill Richardson and Democratic Senators Christopher Dodd of Connecticut and Joseph Biden of Delaware have also broadcast their interest in the race.

"It's one more indication that if Kerry's going to get in, he needs to get in fairly quickly," said Merle Black , a political science professor and campaign specialist at Emory University in Atlanta. "He's going to have trouble raising money and getting staff."

Kerry spokesman David Wade said the senator would announce his intentions after New Year's Day but felt no need to rush his decision.

"Senator Kerry, having run before, has a national network of donors, supporters, and operatives, which have hung together these last two years . . . [He] is certainly in a position to wait until January to make a decision," Wade said, quickly adding that the announcement would not necessarily come in January.

"His decision will have absolutely nothing to do with other candidates." Wade said.

Kerry has campaigned assiduously for key Democrats in state and local races since he lost the presidency in 2004 and has given out and raised $14 million for Democratic contenders across the country, seeking to build loyalties that could be critical in a crowded Democratic primary. But Kerry is still haunted by his loss in 2004, a race many Democrats feel was his to lose.

"Kerry would be upstaged by Edwards now, I think. There's no discernible support for a second Kerry effort," Black said.

Edwards is doing well in early polls in Iowa, but Kerry supporters say the Massachusetts senator has a natural regional advantage in the first-primary state of New Hampshire, which Kerry won in 2004. Either man could position himself to be the candidate-in-waiting, should Democratic voters decide that Clinton is unelectable and Obama too inexperienced for the job, said Lee Miringoff, director of the Marist Institute for Public Opinion in Poughkeepsie, N.Y.

"The difficulty Kerry has is that people now have other places to go, and they're going there," said Peter Fenn , a Democratic consultant. But Kerry, more than any other candidate, can afford to wait longer to announce because of his 2004 experience, Fenn said.

The 2008 race has attracted numerous presidential hopefuls but is already narrowing; some candidates have pulled out of the race even earlier than candidates used to announce their intentions to run in earlier presidential contests.

Former president Bill Clinton did not start campaigning in earnest in New Hampshire until late 1991, just a few months ahead of the 1992 primary, but would-be 2008 contenders have already started visiting the Granite State and assessing support.

Senator Clinton, the former president's wife, is expected in New Hampshire in February, a state party official said.

"I think that folks who are serious about this will probably want a year before the primary to build their organizations and to be working hard in New Hampshire," said Paul Hodes , a Democrat who will officially become one of his state's two congressmen when he takes the oath of office next week.

"They are honing their messages and figuring out what is or is not resonating."

Senator Evan Bayh , an Indiana Democrat who recently withdrew from the 2008 race, was approached about running for president soon after Kerry lost in 2004, Bayh's former spokesman, Dan Pfeiffer said.

In earlier election cycles, Bayh might have waited to gauge support for a presidential run, but this year, he had to start early because of the immense pressure to raise campaign cash, Pfeiffer said.

"You have to start raising money, hiring staff, and courting activists almost two years ahead of the first primary," Pfeiffer said.

"They're forced to get in [the race] before they can make any rational analysis" of whether they can win, he said.

The Populist Persuasion (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'Grady

The Wall Street Journal, December 29, 2006

There were 11 presidential elections in Latin America in the past 13 months and left-of-center candidates captured the vast majority. Yet while extremists like Venezuela's President Hugo Chávez and Bolivia's Evo Morales got most of the headline ink, it is not true that the region is undergoing a democratically led shift to the hard left.

The survival of competitive democracy under a rule of law in most of the region is the good news at the start of 2007. The bad news is that old-fashioned Latin populism -- what John Edwards is hawking to the U.S. electorate for 2008 -- is as chic in the region today as it was 25 years ago, and its persistence is seriously threatening Latin progress.

As we embark on 2007, chavismo is widely considered the mother of all worrying trends in Latin America, and it should be. The Venezuelan weapons buildup has terrifying implications. Yet those who value democracy and freedom would be well advised to pay at least as much attention to the intransigence of populism -- a more insidious but equally dangerous source of poverty and instability -- in the rest of Latin political culture.

To make a proper analysis of the political scene at the start of 2007, let's first dispel the myth that Latin Americans rushed to embrace Marxist revolution at the polls in 2006. There were hard-left "victories" in Venezuela and Bolivia but neither of those elections qualify as democratic. The Venezuelan contest was riddled with irregularities, including an unaudited voter registry, a

Chávez-controlled judiciary and electoral council, and the incumbent's unlimited use of state oil revenues in the campaign. It is impossible to divine voter preferences in that race.

In Bolivia, Mr. Morales was chosen at the polls but only after he led, from the streets, a violent overthrow of two constitutional governments and showed that he was willing to paralyze the nation with more violence if he didn't get power. Many working Bolivians said that they voted for him because they saw it as the only way to end the chaos. Mr. Morales was also strengthened by his defense of coca growers who see the U.S. war on drugs as an assault on their family income.

What more than doubled the number of "leftist" victories in the region in 2006 were the electoral outcomes in Brazil, Chile, Peru and Costa Rica. Yet none of the winners in these races can be lumped together with the megalomaniacal Mr. Chávez -- who now says he wants to do away with profits and adopt a barter economy. Brazil's Luiz Inácio "Lula" da Silva, Chile's Michelle Bachelet, Peru's Alan García and Costa Rica's Oscar Arias are all social democrats who recognize their constitutional limits and have taken a pragmatic approach to the political economy, acknowledging the importance of global capital flows, international trade and macroeconomic stability. Even Nicaragua's Sandinista President-elect Daniel Ortega claims that he has had an epiphany on macroeconomic matters.

Perhaps we ought to be grateful for so much enlightenment among Latin leftists who once swore allegiance to wacky socialist economics. Yet it's still not time to celebrate. Class warfare, utopian egalitarianism, and public monopolies remain the staples of the Latin left's political diet. And even reformers like Colombia's Álvaro Uribe and Mexico's Felipe Calderón appear ill-equipped to make a clean break from state paternalism. Among the more troublesome signs of this retrograde thinking is Ms. Bachelet's pledge to expand the Chilean welfare state à la Europe, just at the time when Europe is frantically trying to figure out how to dismantle the same.

The politics of public choice explains part of this backwardness. Special interests will fight to the death to preserve their privileges and the attack on "neo-liberalism" is at bottom little more than a reaction from the biggest special interest of all -- the state -- to threats to its power.

But there is another reason too, I think, that Latin America cannot seem to get out of the spin cycle of populism. And that is the intellectual impoverishment the region suffered in the second half of the 20th century, when the state got control of academia and liberal debate about what constitutes a free society was silenced. The observation of Venezuelan-born journalist Carlos Ball in this column on Jan. 5, 2001 -- that after 40 years of far-left control of "the schools, universities and arts" in Venezuela "the general public [had] fallen under a well-organized system of leftist indoctrination" -- applies to the vast majority of Latin nations.

Manuel Ayau, a founder of the academically prestigious, and private, Francisco Marroquín University in Guatemala City, recognized this threat in the late 1950s at the state-run San Carlos University. That school, he says, was based on "populist norms" and "was leading our society to radicalization and intolerance." He started Marroquín based on the conviction that "universities need to place themselves beyond the conflicts of their time so that science and academic freedom -- which humankind will need at all times -- may be preserved." This, of course, could not occur once Latin America's universities became political tools.

The most famous counter-punch to this demise of intellectual rigor was the exchange program between the University of Chicago and Catholic University in Chile, which began in the 1950s under the guidance of Theodore Schultz. That effort produced the intellectual heft Chile needed to implement liberal economic reform in the 1970s and 1980s.

Defeating chavismo is as much about refuting an ideology that rejects individual liberty as it is about containing a military threat. This requires a challenge to the populist paradigm that now pervades Latin political thought. It is an achievable goal but one that, as Mr. Ayau can attest after years of hard work, won't come easy. Until we get such an intellectual breakthrough, expect persistent instability and lots of Latin emigrants, with or without Mr. Chávez.

Obama Joins '08 Hopefuls In Call Against Troop Surge (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, December 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0110151

Sen. Barack Obama yesterday joined a chorus of potential Democratic presidential candidates criticizing U.S. policy in Iraq, telling supporters he opposes sending more troops and urging them to send letters to persuade President Bush to change the course of the war.

Democrats considering White House bids have spent the past several weeks outlining, clarifying and strengthening their positions on Iraq as Mr. Bush weighs his options.

The president, who met yesterday with key advisers, plans to announce a new strategy for the war early next month. He is thought to favor sending 20,000 to 40,000 additional troops to Baghdad, an idea several Democratic White House prospects have criticized.

In an e-mail titled "Escalation is not the answer," Mr. Obama yesterday asked voters to tell Mr. Bush "our soldiers are not numbers to add just because someone couldn't think of a better idea."

The Illinois Democrat's message includes a link to the White House's "contact" page.

"They are our sons and daughters, our brothers and sisters, our neighbors and friends who are willing to wave goodbye to everything they've ever known just for the chance to serve their country," Mr. Obama said of the troops. "Our men and women in uniform are doing a terrific job under extremely difficult conditions. But our government has failed them so many times over the last few years, and we simply cannot afford to do it again. We must not multiply the mistakes of yesterday, we must end them today."

He repeated his call to begin a phased troop withdrawal and send a signal "that ours is not an open-ended commitment."

It is a message more hopefuls and potential candidates are echoing as the 2008 election nears.

"Iraq is a question that dominates the political focus of both parties," said Rep. Duncan Hunter of California, who will seek the Republican presidential nomination.

Mr. Obama, who used the term "quagmire" to describe Iraq, reminds supporters that he has spoken against the war since 2002.

It's a subtle dig at likely Democratic candidate Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, who each voted for the war but now oppose it.

Mr. Edwards, the 2004 vice presidential nominee, announced yesterday that he is making another bid for the presidency.

Last year, Mr. Edwards said in an editorial that voting for the war in October 2002 was a mistake. He wants to withdraw 40,000 troops immediately.

"What we need to do is make it clear that we're not going to stay there forever as an occupying force," he said on CNN's "American Morning."

Mrs. Clinton said last week on NBC's "Today" show that she cannot support increasing troop levels unless it is part of a larger plan to end the violence in Iraq.

But the idea of a surge in troops has at least one prominent supporter -- likely Republican presidential contender Sen. John McCain of Arizona.

Mr. McCain's call for more troops prompted Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, an announced 2008 Democratic candidate, to start his own letter-writing petition.

"Your suggestion to deploy additional American servicemen and women to Iraq would make a big mistake even bigger," Mr. Vilsack wrote in a letter to Mr. McCain that he has asked supporters to sign.

Democratic Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich of Ohio, also seeking the nomination as an anti-war candidate, has proposed completely cutting off funds for the war as a way to end it.

"We should not be thinking about spending more money and sending more troops," he says on his Web site.

Other Democratic presidential hopefuls opposing a surge are incoming Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and Sen. Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut.

Mr. Hunter, the outgoing chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, said yesterday that he recommended that Mr. Bush hold off on a troop surge and instead send equipped and trained Iraqi battalions into Baghdad.

"Nothing matures a military force quicker than actual combat operations," he said, adding that those Iraqi troops could use the experience, and are "a truck ride away from battle."

"If you push the insurgency back in Baghdad with an American force that is temporary, you achieve only a temporary stability," he said.

Franks Backs A McCain Rival For White House (AR)

By Billy House

Arizona Republic, December 29, 2006

WASHINGTON - One of Arizona's most conservative U.S. House members is endorsing a California congressman over Sen. John McCain for the 2008 GOP presidential nomination, saying it is "what's right for America."

"I think the senator knows there's nothing personal on my part," Rep. Trent Franks said of his support of Rep. Duncan Hunter. Hunter, outgoing chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, begins his 14th term next month as a congressman from the San Diego area.

Franks said he already has stumped alongside Hunter, who advocates in favor of strong military and for border security. Hunter announced the formation of his presidential exploratory committee in October.

advertisement

Craig Goldman, a spokesman for McCain's presidential exploratory committee, had no comment on Franks' endorsement.

Franks said he knows that his early backing of the lesser-known Hunter will raise eyebrows, given that his own state's senior senator is considering a run for the White House.

But without criticizing McCain directly, Franks described Hunter as a candidate who "is an unequivocal social conservative and fiscal conservative and has a consistent conservative voting record."

"He is one of the true Reagan Revolutionaries in Congress," Franks said.

McCain is considered a leading candidate for the 2008 GOP nomination. His contrary positions on issues important to conservatives, including campaign finance, the environment, judicial nominees and gun control, have led to strained relations with some in the party. But for more than a year, McCain has been saddling up more often with President Bush and reaching out to the hard-core Republican base and Religious Right.

Hunter was one of a few House members to endorse McCain in the 2000 GOP presidential primaries, although he voiced objection to McCain's attack on evangelical leaders. Franks was not a member of Congress then.

Sen. Jon Kyl and Rep. Jeff Flake, two of Arizona's four other Republicans in the new Congress that begins next week, said Thursday that they are backing McCain. Reps. John Shadegg and Rick Renzi could not be reached.

"I will play whatever role he asks me to play," Kyl said of McCain.

"It's a poor secret that I will be endorsing him," Flake said. As for Franks' endorsement of Hunter, Flake said "that's certainly his choice; McCain is not going to have a heavy hand here."

Franks' decision to endorse Hunter over his fellow Arizonan is not much of a blow to McCain, one analyst said.

"Trent Franks seems to be acting on principle because he's certainly not going with the easy winner," said David Mark, politics editor at a new Capitol Hill newspaper and Web site that will launch next month. "Most people haven't heard of Duncan Hunter, nor have they heard of Trent Franks, with all due respect."

Franks described Hunter as "a bold, Valley Forge, Ronald Reagan Republican who holds the temperament and philosophical foundations to lead this country to its greatest heights yet."

He noted that Hunter, a Vietnam War veteran and recipient of the Bronze Star, also is "an expert in national defense and matters surrounding the war on terror, as much as anyone in Congress." As Armed Services chairman, Hunter has had a big say on military issues. But he loses that post when Democrats take control of the House.

Franks, who is entering his third term in Congress, has worked with Hunter as a member of that committee.

McCain, himself a decorated Vietnam veteran, will be the ranking Republican on the Senate's Armed Services Committee in the new Congress and is viewed as an expert on defense issues.

Franks noted that Hunter played a leading role in legislation calling for a fence, which is nearing construction, along the U.S.-Mexican border near San Diego, and co-authored legislation to extend that fence as much as 700 miles, including into Arizona.

McCain voted in favor of the fence.

When Hunter announced the formation of his exploratory committee in San Diego, Franks was the only member of Congress to appear at the event.

"Looking at the makeup of the (GOP presidential) field right now, I see an awful lot of room on the conservative side of the ledger," Franks said.

"When people understand who Duncan Hunter is, he will go from long shot to someone people will be paying a whole lot of attention to."

And if that doesn't happen?

"If Senator McCain gains the momentum, I will adopt him," Franks said. "In the meantime, I'm endorsing Duncan Hunter."

A Failed Revolution (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

After first attempting to deny the scale of last month's defeat, the apologists have settled on a story line that sounds just like Marxist explanations for the failure of the Soviet Union. What happened, you see, was that the noble ideals of the Republican revolution of 1994 were undermined by Washington's corrupting ways. And the recent defeat was a good thing, because it will force a return to the true conservative path.

But the truth is that the movement that took power in 1994 — a movement that had little to do with true conservatism — was always based on a lie.

The lie is right there in "The Freedom Revolution," the book that Dick Armey, who had just become the House majority leader, published in 1995. He declares that most government programs don't do anything "to help American families with the needs of everyday life," and that "very few American families would notice their disappearance." He goes on to assert that "there is no reason we cannot, by the time our children come of age, reduce the federal government by half as a percentage of gross domestic product."

Right. Somehow, I think more than a few families would notice the disappearance of Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid — and those three programs alone account for a majority of nondefense, noninterest spending. The truth is that the government delivers services and security that people want. Yes, there's some waste — just as there is in any large organization. But there are no big programs that are easy to cut.

As long as people like Mr. Armey, Newt Gingrich and Tom DeLay were out of power, they could run on promises to eliminate vast government waste that existed only in the public's imagination — all those welfare queens driving Cadillacs. But once in power, they couldn't deliver.

That's why government by the radical right has been an utter failure even on its own terms: the government hasn't shrunk. Federal outlays other than interest payments and defense spending are a higher percentage of G.D.P. today than they were when Mr. Armey wrote his book: 14.8 percent in fiscal 2006, compared with 13.8 percent in fiscal 1995.

Unable to make good on its promises, the G.O.P., like other failed revolutionary movements, tried to maintain its grip by exploiting its position of power. Friends were rewarded with patronage: Jack Abramoff began building his web of corruption almost as soon as Republicans took control. Adversaries were harassed with smear campaigns and witch hunts: Congress spent six years and many millions of dollars investigating a failed land deal, and Bill Clinton was impeached over a consensual affair.

But it wasn't enough. Without 9/11, the Republican revolution would probably have petered out quietly, with the loss of Congress in 2002 and the White House in 2004. Instead, the atrocity created a window of opportunity: four extra years gained by drowning out unfavorable news with terror alerts, starting a gratuitous war, and accusing Democrats of being weak on national security.

Yet the Bush administration failed to convert this electoral success into progress on a right-wing domestic agenda. The collapse of the push to privatize Social Security recapitulated the failure of the Republican revolution as a whole. Once the administration was forced to get specific about the details, it became obvious that private accounts couldn't produce something for nothing, and the public's support vanished.

In the end, Republicans didn't shrink the government. But they did degrade it. Baghdad and New Orleans are the arrival destinations of a movement based on deep contempt for governance.

Is that the end for the radical right? Probably not. As a long-suffering civil servant once told me, bad policy ideas are like cockroaches: you can flush them down the toilet, but they keep coming back. Many of the ideas that failed in the Bush years had previously failed in the Reagan years. So there's no reason to assume they're gone for good.

Indeed, it appears that loss of power and the ensuing lack of accountability is liberating right-wingers to lie yet again: since last month's election, I've noticed a number of Social Security privatizers propounding the same free-lunch falsehoods that the Bush administration had to abandon in the face of demands that it present an actual plan.

Still, the Republican revolution of 1994 is over. And not a moment too soon.

Latinos: Can You Hear Us Now? (USAT)

By Raul Reyes

USA Today, December 29, 2006

In my East Los Angeles high school, dividing lines among student groups were common, even among Latinos. Gang members were known as Lowriders, Spanish-speaking kids were called Beaners, and assimilated Hispanics like me were derisively referred to as Coconuts — brown on the outside, white on the inside.

The only thing we had in common was that we all looked down on another group: our immigrant classmates who occupied the bottom rung of the social ladder and were practically invisible.

How times have changed: 2006 was the "Year of the Immigrant," driven by a fierce national debate over what the country should do about 12 million undocumented immigrants. The subsequent restrictive policy proposals were not surprising. But the massive pro-immigrant marches were astonishing, and invigorating.

As the grandson of an illegal alien, I was proud to see so many aspiring Americans coming out of the shadows and participating in democracy. The debate motivated Hispanics to flex their political muscle. This summer, the Pew Center found that 75% of Latinos believed their ethnic group would be more likely to vote in the fall elections, and two-thirds thought the protests could lead to a new social movement. But a majority also reported seeing a rise in discrimination. Maybe the nascent immigrant rights movement came on too strong. Was it the Mexican flags at rallies? Or the Spanish version of The Star-Spangled Banner?

Of course, not all Hispanics support the rights of undocumented workers. Like other Americans, we're split on the issue. But by fall, the intolerant tone of conservatives only served to remind us of our own roots. So did passage of several restrictive local laws aimed at illegal aliens, as well as congressional approval of a 700-mile fence along the U.S.-Mexico border.

So in the congressional elections, Latinos deserted the party of The Fence. According to national exit polls, 69% of Hispanics voted Democratic, while 29% went Republican. This was a significant shift for Latinos, who in 2004 gave President Bush 44% of their votes. Democrats now have the challenge of retaining a Hispanic constituency that is increasingly complicated. No doubt, the immigration issue will not fade. But for me, hope arrived Oct. 17 at 7:46 a.m. in New York, where Emanuel Plata was born. Heralded as the 300 millionth American, he's a perfect symbol of his time: born to Mexican immigrants, in Queens, the nation's most diverse county, with lingering questions about his milestone status. But Emanuel will come of age in a society where Hispanics have more influence and visibility than ever. That's because in 2006, Latinos emerged in force and made sure their voices were heard.

Walking A Tightrope Into 2007 (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

As the new year approaches, I think of three people who symbolize for me some of the difficulties of the year we have just lived through and also the promise and potential of the one ahead. Each of them reminds me that we are walking into the future balanced on a tightrope.

DOJ_NMG_0110155

The first is Mohammad Baqer Qalibaf, the mayor of Tehran. As an official of the Islamic Republic of Iran, he is part of a regime that posed the biggest strategic challenge to the United States in 2006. But he also embodies Iran's potential to become a great nation -- and perhaps to escape the apocalyptic confrontation with the West that is proclaimed by his political rival, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

For all of Ahmadinejad's headline-grabbing fulminations this year, it was Qalibaf who was the big political winner. His slate won a majority in the City Council election in Tehran this month, while Ahmadinejad's faction managed to win just two of 15 seats. The hotheaded president also fared poorly in elections around the country, as Iranians looked past his defiant rhetoric and focused on his poor performance in managing the economy.

Qalibaf's program has been about delivering services rather than tirades. A former general in the Revolutionary Guards air force, he made his name cleaning up Iran's national police. He angered reformers by advocating a crackdown on student demonstrators in 1999. But now, as mayor of Tehran, he has concentrated on filling potholes, collecting the garbage, and building new parks and recreation areas in the poorest areas of South Tehran.

The second person I think of as the year turns is Sallai Meridor, the new Israeli ambassador to Washington. We had several long talks over the past month, and these discussions helped me understand the forces that animate and haunt Israel. The first is the living reality of the Holocaust. Meridor somberly named for me the members of his own family who perished in the camps. "I feel like we are in the 1930s again," he said, speaking about the threats by Ahmadinejad and other Iranian leaders to destroy Israel. If the world allows such a nation to acquire nuclear weapons, he says, "We will have betrayed our children."

Israel is a dialectic of fear and hope, and Meridor's hopeful side surfaces when he discusses the Palestinian issue. He told me several weeks ago that Prime Minister Ehud Olmert was determined to resume negotiations to create a Palestinian state -- and now, at year-end, the frozen wheels of the peace process are indeed turning again. Israel will have to stop expanding settlements on the West Bank if it is serious this time. But listening to Meridor, who is 51, I sense that for his generation of Israelis, there is a dawning recognition that a Palestinian state living in peace with Israel is crucial for its future as a democratic Jewish state.

As I think about the promise of the year ahead, I will remember Meridor's description of running ecstatically through the streets of Jerusalem in 1977 to welcome Egyptian President Anwar Sadat.

My final man on the tightrope is Michael Chertoff, the secretary of homeland security. He embodies a new year's reality we know in our gut but rarely speak out loud: The terrorists who struck America on Sept. 11, 2001, will hit us again -- perhaps with even more destructive power. It's Chertoff's terrible responsibility to prepare for that nightmare while the rest of us go about our business.

I visited with Chertoff several times this year, and each time I thought to myself: Thank God I don't have his job. He spends his days sifting different scenarios of mass destruction: We are inspecting more cargo vessels, but what about private yachts? We scrutinize people boarding commercial flights, but what about private planes? The temptation is to focus on the threats that are easiest to protect against -- thus the overkill in airport security -- but Chertoff knows that's wrong. And he admits he can't do everything. "Risk management doesn't mean risk elimination," he told me in one of our talks.

As Chertoff thinks about the new year, he wants to stay focused on the biggest risks out over the horizon -- the nuclear or biological attacks that could kill hundreds of thousands of Americans. I admire Chertoff's dedication, but I have a nagging worry that his collection of bureaucratic agencies isn't up to the job of keeping America safe.

Will Iran find a stable place in the world? Will Israel and the Palestinians finally get it right? Will a battered America make wise decisions about its national security? People living on a tightrope probably shouldn't be drinking champagne, but what the heck? Here's to a peaceful and prosperous 2007.

Schwarzenegger 'Feeling Great' After Surgery (LAT/AP)

The Los Angeles Times, December 29, 2006

The Terminator is looking all too human these days.

DOJ_NMG_0110156

The shattered leg that Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger suffered in a fall on an icy ski slope was the latest in a list of injuries and ailments to befall the actor-bodybuilder-politician.

The seven-time Mr. Olympia whose broad shoulders and tree-trunk legs earned him the moniker "the Austrian Oak" has a medical chart you might find at a senior citizens' home.

Schwarzenegger, who turns 60 in July, has had a hip and a heart valve replaced. He had rotator cuff surgery in 2003. A rapid heartbeat sent him to a hospital last year. One motorcycle crash in 2001 left him with several broken ribs, and another last January resulted in 15 stitches in his lip.

Now he is on crutches while the right thigh bone he broke while skiing with his family over the holidays in Sun Valley, Idaho, heals. Doctors used screws and wires to repair his leg Tuesday, and he is expected to be released from the hospital by week's end.

Despite Schwarzenegger's travails, his doctor says he is in great shape for a man his age, though few details about the governor's condition are ever released. Schwarzenegger's office says such information is private.

The governor "is in excellent physical condition and his health is very good. He has fantastic muscle tone, excellent bone health and is in great cardiovascular shape. The governor's health is in the top 5 percent of people his age," said Dr. Kevin Ehrhart, his orthopedic surgeon.

His office Thursday released two photographs of the governor in his hospital bed, surrounded by monitors. He was dressed in hospital garb with a sheet covering his legs, and he appeared to be signing or editing documents. An intravenous tube was protruding from his right hand, and a laptop computer was perched at his bedside.

"I woke up feeling great," he said in a statement. He said he was looking forward to his inauguration next month "even if it means I have to walk into my swearing-in ceremony on crutches."

Schwarzenegger has carefully cultivated an image of vitality and strength, and his best-known Hollywood roles were built around his rippling biceps and deltoids.

In a tailored suit and a pair of his finely tooled cowboy boots, Schwarzenegger still looks younger than his 59 years. His cordovan hair appears impervious to gray, and his skin is remarkably smooth and unblemished for a man his age.

But he is not in the championship form of his youth. Photos surface occasionally showing a mushy midriff and arms that only faintly resemble the 22-inch biceps of his prime.

Schwarzenegger has acknowledged using steroids in his bodybuilding days, before they became illegal without a prescription in 1991. But he has never provided details about his usage, and it is unknown whether the drugs -- which can cause heart problems -- have had anything to do with any of his health problems.

Charles Yesalis, professor emeritus of health and human development at Penn State University and an expert on performance-enhancing drugs, said for someone who is athletic and not overweight, Schwarzenegger "appears to have a lot of health problems."

But "a lot of very healthy people who exercise a lot and look robust have bad health problems. It's hard to tie it together in any meaningful way," Yesalis said.

In addition to the physical toll exacted by professional bodybuilding, Schwarzenegger suffered his share of bangs and bruises in movie stunts.

At a 2005 appearance in front of medical workers in Burbank, Schwarzenegger credited nurses with making his hospital stays more tolerable.

"I was in the hospital three times in a row these last 10 years -- for open heart surgery, with a hip replacement and with shoulder surgery," the governor said at the time.

"This is what happens when you are the Terminator," he added. "They switch body parts."

State Lawmakers Take The Lead On Minimum Wage, ID Theft (CSM)

By Daniel B. Wood

The Christian Science Monitor, December 29, 2006

LOS ANGELES

DOJ_NMG_0110157

Beginning Jan. 1, Illinoisans will be able to request a live phone operator when they call a state agency. Michiganders will be able to surf the Web to discover where illegal meth labs are located. And New Hampshirites will be allowed to use a leashed dog to track wounded deer, moose, or bear.

While the 109th Congress has been dubbed "the biggest do-nothing Congress" since 1948, state legislatures have had one of their most productive years in decades, experts say.

Besides providing creative solutions to mundane problems like frustration over automated phone attendants, the laws that go into effect next Monday in 32 states reveal several trends: Five states will increase their minimum wages, nine states will implement more stringent policies on citizens' privacy to curb problems associated with identity theft, and five states will mandate new recreation regulations.

"The biggest observation going into what makes up next year's new laws is the sheer diversity of issues that these legislatures are dealing with - from criminal justice to minimum wages to election reform to human services," says Bill Wyatt, who authored the National Conference of State Legislatures' survey of new state laws.

He says there is no apparent partisan bent in the new laws.

"My experience in watching state legislators over the years is that once they get into the Capitol building, they take off their partisan hats and roll up their sleeves to solve problems of constituents," says Mr. Wyatt. "This year's legislators have been called upon to become experts in a very wide set of complicated issues in a short time."

The new laws, in part, are born out of necessity for states to move forward where the federal government has stalled.

"The states have been much more productive than Congress in tackling the laundry list of items of the stuff that is concerning them most right now," says Larry Sabato, a political scientist at the University of Virginia. "If you go down the list, you can see what Americans are pressuring their state legislators to deal with that Congress won't or hasn't." Minimum wage hikes

Some laws such as the minimum wage increases in North Carolina, Hawaii, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, and Connecticut reflect the same political shift that led to the Democrats taking over the US House and Senate in November, many experts say.

"Raising the minimum wage is an issue that has worked for Democrats ... and the big tax revolt of recent years appears to be waning," says Steven Schier, a political scientist at Carleton College in Northfield, Minn. "That sort of tells you the issue agenda has changed with more voters going for Democrats than Republicans."

This year, states have also been tackling several "hardy perennial issues" such as healthcare, according to Dr. Schier, Dr. Sabato, and other analysts. Healthcare plans

Come next week, health plans in Rhode Island will be required to cover programs that help people stop smoking. And licensed care facilities in the state must designate a 'safe patient handling committee' and develop written plans to prevent injuries to patients and to healthcare workers responsible for moving patients.

Health insurers in Michigan will be permitted to offer premium rebates or reductions in payments in exchange for participation by the insured in wellness programs that their employers provide. Water recreation activities

Meanwhile, water recreation activities will be subject to additional regulations in North Carolina, Oklahoma, Maine, New Hampshire, and New Mexico as concern grows about accidents and noise generated from watercraft, such as jet skis.

"Many towns have gone to the state legislature with their concerns, and have asked for action," says Andrea Erskine of the Maine Department of Inland Fisheries and Wildlife.

In Maine, new watercraft regulations will require 16- and 17-year-olds to complete a boating safety education course to operate motorboats or sailboats.

"As more and more people convert their camps on lakes into year-round housing, development on the water is forcing the issue more and more. Legislators see this as a way to talk about the rules of navigation because right now anyone can hop into a boat with no license," Ms. Erskine adds. Governmental ethics

Some states also are moving to restore ethics in government - sparked, in part, by several Congressional scandals, according to analysts.

North Carolina, for instance, is instituting tougher reporting and disclosure requirements for lobbyists, a direct response to the Jack Abramoff scandal in Washington. Lobbyists will be required to disclose each month, while the legislature is in session, the amount of money they are spending to lobby lawmakers. Legislators, in turn, will be able to opt-in to a "no gift registry" to let lobbyists and clients know they do not wish to receive gifts or free meals.

Generally, the new state laws "do reflect the public's uneasy mood toward government institutions," says Kareem Crayton, a political scientist at the University of Southern California. "The states seem to be responding to the national sentiment that appears to run in favor of reform."

• Michigan residents will be able to surf the Web to discover the locations of illegal methamphetamine labs.

• Anyone arrested in New Mexico for a felony will be required to provide a DNA sample to law enforcement. The state is creating a DNA identification system to aid in solving crimes, tracking sex offenders, and identifying missing persons.

• Health plans in Rhode Island will be required to cover plans that help people stop smoking.

• Colorado employers will have 20 days to verify the legal work status of a new employee. Employers who don't maintain the documentation could receive fines of up to $5,000 for the first offense and $25,000 for additional offenses.

• Maryland employers will not be permitted to print employees' social security numbers on their paychecks or any part of their pay stubs.

Hundreds Of Laws Kick In Monday (USAT)

By Dennis Cauchon

USA Today, December 29, 2006

In California, driving with people in the trunk will be illegal. In Alabama, landlords will have to provide livable conditions for tenants.

In Illinois, state agencies will have to provide people to answer phones, not just automated messages.

These are among the hundreds of laws that will take effect Monday. Each New Year's Day, a flurry of legal experiments begin that shape Americans' lives in ways big and small.

The U.S. government spends twice as much money as state and local governments combined, but state government has the greatest effect on Americans' everyday routines — how they drive, how they get married and divorced, how they hunt and fish, and how they buy cigarettes and beer.

This year, new laws include minimum wage hikes, tighter protections on personal privacy and expanded health care rights for consumers. The minimum wage will rise Monday in eight states: to $6.15 an hour in North Carolina, to $7.65 in Connecticut and to somewhere in between in Delaware, Hawaii, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Rhode Island. Raising the federal minimum wage — $5.15 an hour — is a priority of Democrats, who will take control of Congress in January.

More than a dozen states will move to protect personal privacy. Arkansas will make it illegal to publicly show someone's Social Security number. Maryland will order Social Security numbers removed from paychecks.

Eight states will let victims of identity theft freeze their credit reports, so the information can't be released in ways that would hurt their reputation or let crooks get more credit.

States also will address complex moral issues, such as how people die.

Idaho, for example, will become the 10th state to create a central registry for medical directives and living wills that control end-of-life care.

In Minnesota, Case Study For Political Shake-Up (NYT)

By Kirk Johnson

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

ST. PAUL — Somehow over the years it became embedded in the culture of the Minnesota Legislature that the party in control of the House of Representatives was entitled to the fourth- and fifth-floor offices across the street from the Capitol.

The minority party, on the other hand, was relegated to the second and third floors, which are pretty much identical, legislators say, but for the connotations of history.

Now the upstairs-downstairs shift is on. Democrats, having taken power, are even shopping for the best digs on the upper floors while the current occupants are still inside.

"It's really a free-for-all," said State Representative Nora Slawik, a Democrat from the Minneapolis suburbs.

Who ends up where is only the beginning of the tumult under the Capitol dome here as eager new faces and deeply practiced old ones contemplate what Minnesota voters said on Election Day. Money, policy and tactical choices are all in play: how best to spend a $2 billion surplus and address what both parties see as a mandate for improving public education, health care and transportation and for making taxes more fair.

Nationally, the Democrats picked up more than 350 seats in state legislatures in November, 25 of them in Minnesota, and gained control of 10 chambers, including the Minnesota House. Two other states shifted either to Republican control or to a tie. The cumulative impact, deeper and broader than any election's since the Republican landslide of 1994, is still unfolding.

Minnesota's capital is in many ways the perfect petri dish for testing what the nation's new political landscape may produce. Once predictably Democratic in national politics, the anchor of Upper Midwest liberal populism from the 1920s through Hubert Humphrey and Walter Mondale, Minnesota is now considered a battleground, with the Republicans scheduled to hold their national convention in 2008 in Minneapolis and St. Paul around that declaration.

A long tradition of social policy innovation in matters like welfare and health care sits alongside newer forces that are less predictable. Minnesota in recent years has elected as governor Jesse Ventura, an independent, and as senators, Paul Wellstone, a Democrat, and Norm Coleman, a Republican. And some political scholars say that much of the nation's next political direction could be forged here as well.

"Nothing is for certain in Minnesota anymore," said Paul C. Light, a professor of political science at New York University, "and that's a lesson for everybody."

But if Minnesota's capital, with all of its local quirks and traditions, shows where the election's wave may lead, it also confounds much of what may be expected.

The Democrats won big here — taking the House for the first time since 1998, expanding their majority in the Senate, winning the secretary of state's and attorney general's offices and nearly defeating Gov. Tim Pawlenty, a Republican.

But they emerged divided, too, owing much of their surge to newly elected moderates from the suburbs who are unlikely to embrace a pure liberal agenda. The Republicans lost big, but were pushed toward the center as well, led by Mr. Pawlenty, who has said since the election that many of his second-term priorities will overlap with those of the Democrats he fiercely battled in his first four years.

And those pincer forces, both pushing toward the political center, will set the stage for everything to come when the Legislature convenes in January, elected officials and political experts here say. In the first Pawlenty term, a $4.5 billion budget shortfall was resolved through deep cuts in spending for health care, education and other programs, capped by a bitter shutdown of the government in 2005 when Mr. Pawlenty and the Legislature could not agree.

The fight of 2007 will revolve around restoring some of the cut programs, and how far to go beyond that in pushing what both parties say is pent-up demand for property tax relief and for spending increases on education, health care and transportation.

One of the first tests could be a Democratic Party plan to extend health care benefits to 70,000 low-income children not covered by the MinnesotaCare program. That alone would cost hundreds of millions of dollars.

And the magnifying glass of national politics hovers at the backdrop of everything.

Mr. Pawlenty, a 46-year-old son of working-class South St. Paul, is frequently mentioned as a possible contender for vice president in 2008. Senator John McCain of Arizona, a likely Republican presidential candidate, has already come to call since the election, offering praise and congratulations.

"The dynamic is one we've never had — not in my lifetime, anyway," said Wyman L. Spano, a former lobbyist, now director of the Center for Advocacy and Political Leadership at the University of Minnesota, Duluth.

"On the one hand, I see Democrats who are very much wanting not to look like classic Democrats, not wanting to raise taxes," Mr. Spano said. "The flip side of the coin is that this governor really wants to get along because he'd like to have a nice high approval rating going into that convention."

Mr. Pawlenty, known for a sharp tongue and a sharper wit (he once quipped to a political opponent that "everybody has the right to be wrong, but you do abuse the privilege"), barely kept his job in November, winning by a margin of about 22,000 votes of 2.2 million cast.

In an interview in his dark-wood-paneled office in the Capitol, its large windows giving a sweeping view of the city, Mr. Pawlenty said the election had to be read as new marching orders for every Republican.

"Republicans love to talk about markets — well, the market just told Republicans something," he said. "The market just told them, 'We're not interested much in your product, and we're choosing to go to your competitor.' We need to hear that message."

One seemingly odd result of Minnesota's political shift, scholars and people in both parties say, is that the new Democratic majority, in keeping to a middle-ground agenda that its moderate members can support, could raise Mr. Pawlenty's profile in the process.

The incoming speaker of the House, Margaret Anderson Kelliher, a Democrat from Minneapolis, said she had no problem with that. If the governor's interests mesh with the Democratic majority's, for whatever reason, Ms. Kelliher said, it will be a victory for Minnesota.

"He has a real incentive to make his next four years work and gain some national attention," she said. "Making this a state that gets things done will garner him national attention, and us, too."

Ms. Kelliher, who grew up on a dairy farm and can still recite the rhymes about cheese that she learned in 4-H, said her election as speaker reflected Democratic efforts to balance the factions of rural and urban, progressive and moderate in the caucus.

So does the party's legislative plan, she said, called the "stick to the basics agenda," which was put forward by Democrats at the Minnesota State Fair, before the election. Its goals were outlined on homey hand-held signs in the shape of the state, promising to improve public education, increase access to health care and provide property tax relief.

How far the Democrats go with their "basics" agenda will be the real test in the year to come, political scholars say.

"This is not a progressive or liberal majority; the seats they picked up are in moderate or conservative districts," said Lawrence R. Jacobs, a professor of political science and director of the Center for the Study of Politics and Governance at the University of Minnesota.

"The Democratic leadership is very much aware that they've got to be careful, that if they go for what they want in their heart of hearts they may end up with a two-year run."

But there is also still vehement debate here about what the voters were really saying on Election Day.

The departing speaker, Steve Sviggum, a Republican who will begin his 15th two-year term in the House when the session starts Jan. 3, said that in reading the election, Minnesota Republicans would be wrong to abandon their message of fiscal restraint and economic freedom or to see the vote as an endorsement of all things Democratic.

"It was about George W. Bush," Mr. Sviggum said in his office, which was lined with boxes ready for his move downstairs.

Governor Pawlenty seems to go further in his interpretation. The message, he said recently at a news conference in talking about the road ahead, is that people want certain basic things from government, and "other than that," he added, they want government to "get out of my face," an indication that socially conservative debates about abortion or same-sex marriage will not find center stage in his next term.

"I'm a Midwestern governor from a state that prides itself on a certain measure of populism, not to be confused with liberalism, but populism meaning stuff that helps people," Mr. Pawlenty said in an interview. "That's what we've got to stand up for."

But the camaraderie of a Legislature that still prides itself on citizen-lawmaker traditions — and enough old Scandinavian names to require a handy pronunciation list in the legislative guide book — is not to be underestimated in shaping how the new terrain in St. Paul might unfold.

Representative Kathy Tingelstad, a fourth-floor Republican, recently learned, for example, that when she goes downstairs, Ms. Slawik, a friend from across the aisle whose family goes to the same Y.M.C.A. camp each summer with the Tingelstads, will be taking her space. That has made Ms. Tingelstad happy.

"It's nice to know," she said. "Nora will be a good caretaker."

Secret Talks Seek Unity For Feuding Va. GOP (WP)

By Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

RICHMOND, Dec. 28 -- Top Republicans in Virginia, including the state's attorney general and the party's former national chairman, have been holding secret meetings for weeks in the hopes of finding an end to the war among their party's lawmakers and reaching a compromise on funding for transportation, several participants said.

Some of the party's biggest names from outside the General Assembly fear that the rift between leaders in the GOP-led House of Delegates and state Senate will cause Republicans to lose big in elections in November, especially in Northern Virginia, unless something is done to ease congestion.

Attorney General Robert F. McDonnell has brought both sides together for direct talks. U.S. Reps. Thomas M. Davis III and Frank R. Wolf have met with House leaders to urge action. And Ed Gillespie, former chairman of the National Republican Committee, who took the helm of the Virginia GOP this month, is courting both senators and delegates.

"We're just saying you need a deal and it's got to be something substantive. The inability to reach an agreement blows back on everybody," Davis said Thursday. "Instead of pointing fingers, we're trying to get everyone to understand what's at stake."

The meetings were confirmed by Davis, House Majority Leader H. Morgan Griffith (R-Salem), Senate Finance Chairman John H. Chichester (R-Northumberland) and Sen. Jeannemarie Devolites Davis (R-Fairfax). Several other participants discussed the meetings but said they did not want to be identified because the meetings were private. Others who were briefed about them also discussed the meetings but did not want to be named because they did not attend.

Participants said the talks are an attempt to spur action in next month's Assembly session, which is expected to again be dominated by transportation. This year, deadlock over road and rail funding held up a state budget for months and prompted a special session that ended in failure.

Those involved in the meetings said the refusal to come together to confront the transportation crisis is becoming the kind of issue for Virginia Republicans that the war in Iraq has become for the GOP nationally: one that pushes independents and moderates to the other side of the political aisle.

The chasm between the two wings of the party is based partly on an ideological divide over taxes -- Senate Republicans want them, House Republicans do not. The resulting perception is of Washington-style gridlock that two Democratic governors have used to blame the GOP and that has helped Democrats gain six seats in the House in the past three years.

The rift is also fostered by personal dislike. A GOP senator once called House Republican budget negotiators "dumb as rocks." House GOP leaders often deride their Senate counterparts as arrogant, patronizing and mean.

Sources in both camps expressed some optimism that the talks have helped. But getting both sides to compromise after more than five years at each other's throats is proving difficult. No agreements have been reached, they said.

"It's like marriage counseling, and transportation is the adulterous affair," said one Republican familiar with the meetings but not authorized to talk about them. "If you don't deal with that first, nothing else matters."

McDonnell, his deputy and his pollster met with five top Republicans in the House and Senate on Dec. 5 and on Dec. 15, according to several participants and others briefed on the meetings. If the party war continues, participants said McDonnell's pollster told both sides, Republicans could easily lose their majority.

McDonnell, who is widely believed to be preparing for a 2009 run for governor, would not confirm Thursday that any meetings took place. But he said he is determined to help his party retain control of the legislature.

"The Republican Party worked for 130 years to take a majority. In the last six, as we have assumed the mantle of governing Virginia, there has been a lot of very public and acerbic disagreements," he said. "I want to make sure our party stays in power and wins in 2007. The way to do that is to have a very productive 2007 session on the key issues that Virginians care about."

Davis participated in McDonnell's Dec. 5 meeting by telephone. Wolf and Davis have met privately with House Speaker William J. Howell (R-Stafford) to urge action. And Gillespie met with Senate Republicans on Dec. 15 after a breakfast fundraiser.

The meetings reflect a new recognition by some Republicans of the party's vulnerability after last month's elections. Although such incumbents as Davis and Wolf held on, the party's standard-bearer, Sen. George Allen, was defeated, faring especially poorly in Northern Virginia.

"The equation is pretty simple," Davis said. "If they come back empty-handed, the Democrats will say these guys can't deliver transportation. Up here [in Northern Virginia], it's going to be very tough sledding."

Gillespie would not comment on meetings he has had with lawmakers, saying those would be confidential. "I do believe that it's important that Republicans in the House of Delegates and the Senate are seen to be working together," he said in a brief interview.

Devolites Davis, who attended a meeting with Gillespie and senior Senate Republicans, said the new party chairman made it clear he intends to be an honest broker.

"He just wants to bring the party back together," she said. "He understands how bad the traffic is and how strongly people feel. Anyone who is in a leadership position outside the bodies sees how important it is to get something done."

J. Scott Leake, a chief aide to Senate Republicans, said, "What has gone on certainly hasn't hurt and can only help."

Participants in McDonnell's meetings said he and Deputy Attorney General William C. Mims have offered a number of transportation proposals, including tax and fee increases supported by senators and borrowing favored by House Republicans.

Chichester, who said he has met with McDonnell privately in recent weeks, said the talks have not produced any real movement.

"What I gather, nothing is happening," Chichester said. "I think they are honest brokers. But until we get some new money on the table, we haven't really gone anywhere. [The House] is still holding their 'no new revenue' stance."

Griffith called the talks "very cordial" but would not comment specifically because participants were told that the meetings would be kept confidential.

"Clearly there's movement or we wouldn't be talking," he said.

Pay Now Or Pay Later (WP)

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

WHEN MARYLAND Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley announced last week that T. Eloise Foster was his choice to be the state's budget czar, he lauded her as a "courageous soul." Well, let's hope so, because the state's fiscal problems are gathering like thunderheads. Despite Mr. O'Malley's dismissive treatment of projected deficits during the fall campaign, it seems increasingly likely that his term in office will be marked not by the hundreds of millions of dollars in initiatives and new spending he liked to talk about on the stump but by his ability to manage and contain shortfalls estimated to run into billions of dollars.

Sensibly, Mr. O'Malley, who takes office next month, has not ruled out new taxes, which will inevitably be part of any solution to a fiscal problem on the scale of Maryland's. But he seems determined to defer a major push on revenue until his second year in office, perhaps by naming a commission to "study" the problem. It may be the case that he wants to get his political sea legs before embarking on what could be one of the toughest fights of his term. And in mathematical terms, he may be able to get away with holding off for a year on raising taxes, since leftover surpluses from the recent boom times will cover the still-modest shortfall expected in the fiscal year starting next summer. Still, Mr. O'Malley is looking increasingly cavalier, and possibly foolish, to postpone a serious reckoning.

The original sin of what is referred to in Annapolis as the state's "structural deficit" was an income tax cut sponsored by then-Gov. Parris N. Glendening nearly a decade ago that made no distinction between rich and poor and has since cost Maryland billions in lost revenue. The irresponsible Glendening cut -- an act of political expediency designed to stave off a conservative challenge to his reelection -- was compounded five years later by a huge, legislatively mandated increase in education spending for which no funding source was specified. Thanks to the housing boom and Maryland's generally sunny economic climate, disaster has been kept at bay for the past few years, despite soaring Medicaid costs. But now the bill is coming due: Starting in 2008 the state's annual revenue shortfall is expected to reach $1.6 billion, or about 10 percent of anticipated spending. Mr. O'Malley can talk of shaving programs, trimming waste and optimizing efficiencies all he wants, but that will not solve a problem of such dimensions.

What's needed, as we've written before, is a top-to-bottom revision of Maryland's obsolete tax system, conceived in the 1960s and barely updated since then. The elements of such an overhaul might include a more progressive personal income tax, since the current one is virtually flat and therefore favors the rich; tougher corporate income tax collections to eliminate shelters; an increase in the gas tax, last raised 15 years ago, to yield badly needed funding for the state's roads and mass transit; and a levy on services, most of which remain inexplicably untaxed even though they constitute the backbone of Maryland's economy.

Certainly, there are pitfalls facing Mr. O'Malley as he contemplates such changes. The state Senate president, Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr. (D-Calvert), might subvert any attempt at tax reform by tying it to his pet project of expanding slot machine gambling -- a potential deal killer. Republicans in the General Assembly would doubtless object to any significant tax increase, as might some Democrats. But sooner or later, Mr. O'Malley will have to come to grips with the state's projected funding shortfall, so why not sooner?

Somalia Forces Retake Capital From Islamists (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

NAIROBI, Kenya, Dec. 28 — Just hours after Islamist fighters abandoned Mogadishu, the capital from which they ruled much of Somalia, thousands of troops of the transitional government marched into the city on Thursday in a stunning reversal of fortune.

The government soldiers and the Ethiopian infantrymen who have been backing them poured in from the outskirts, residents said. The only gunshots fired were long celebratory bursts into the air.

In a country with such a troubled recent history, including famine, anarchy, isolation and war, a potentially viable government has suddenly emerged.

In a matter of five days, the internationally recognized government, a fledging authority that had been so weak it was marooned in a provincial market town, captured the formidable capital and most of Somalia — with more than a little help from Ethiopia.

The Islamists, whom many Western nations had considered a grave and growing regional threat with terrorist connections, were vanquished faster than anyone had expected, or at least removed from power.

“We always knew these Islamists weren’t all they were cracked up to be,” said Abdirizak Adam Hassan, chief of staff for the transitional president, Abdullahi Yusuf Ahmed. “And now we are where they used to be, in control of Mogadishu — well, as much as anyone can be in control of Mogadishu.”

On Thursday morning, before most of the troops arrived, the city exploded in anarchy as armed bandits rushed into the streets and fragmented militia units began to fight each other for the spoils of war.

Witnesses said that an intense gun battle raged around a former Islamist ammunition dump, and that clan warlords instantly reverted to setting up roadside checkpoints and shaking down motorists, reminiscent of the years of chaos before the Islamists pacified the city in June.

Still, Mogadishu has been almost a holy grail for the government.

For months, leaders cooped up 150 miles inland in the market town, Baidoa, had spoken of their dreams of returning to the once-beautiful (and now bullet-pocked) city by the sea. But they were blocked on all sides by the Islamist forces, which dominated most of south-central Somalia, including the capital, their stronghold.

All that changed on Sunday when Ethiopia, with tacit approval from the United States, carried out an aggressive counterattack against the Islamist forces. Ethiopia sided with the government because the Islamists had vowed to invade Somali-speaking areas of Ethiopia and wage a holy war against it.

By Wednesday, the Islamist military had been decimated by Ethiopian airstrikes and mass desertions. Clan elders, traditionally the pillars of Somali society, pulled their troops and firepower out of the Union of Islamic Courts, or U.I.C., after a string of back-to-back military loses in which more than 1,000 fighters, mostly teenage boys, were quickly mowed down by the better-trained and equipped Ethiopian-backed forces.

“Our children were getting annihilated,” said Abdi Hulow, an elder with the powerful Hawiye clan. “We couldn’t sustain it.”

By Thursday, government officials said, many of the Islamist leaders had fled into the thickly forested areas to the south, where the government plans to hunt them down. But there were also worries that the Islamists would wage guerrilla warfare, as they have threatened.

DOJ_NMG_0110164

"The U.I.C. may have decided not to fight the Ethiopians and their allies this time around," said Ted Dagne, an Africa specialist for Congressional Research Service. But he added: "This does not mean the U.I.C. is finished. The U.I.C. fighters simply changed their uniform to a civilian cloth."

Sheik Sharif Sheik Ahmed, an Islamist leader, said Thursday that his forces had surrendered Mogadishu to avoid a bloodbath. "We don't want to see Mogadishu destroyed," he told Al Jazeera television by telephone from an undisclosed location.

Even before the government troops had planted themselves in downtown Mogadishu, the political negotiations began.

Mr. Hulow and other elders said they had asked transitional leaders for positions in the new government in exchange for support. Ali Mohammed Gedi, the prime minister, told the elders that first he needed help in disarming the militias.

Mr. Gedi also gave a short news conference on the outskirts of Mogadishu in which he reached out to the Somali diaspora, saying: "We need your help. It's time to come home."

One group was noticeably absent from all these talks: conservative clerics, who seemed to have overplayed their cards.

Under their leadership, the Islamist movement grew from a grass-roots network of clan-based courts to a force powerful enough to overthrow Mogadishu's warlords in June. The Islamists impressed residents as the first to establish a semblance of law and order, which had been missing since Somalia's central government collapsed in 1991.

A few months ago, government officials were begging the Islamists to return to peace talks and to share power. Sheik Sharif was considered likely to be prime minister of a new joint government. The Islamists were thought to have a committed, disciplined army, taking town after town, often with very little resistance.

But in July, Ethiopia began secretly slipping troops into Somalia to protect the transitional government, itself a mix of clan elders and former warlords who had been brought together two years ago with the help of United Nations officials. The Islamists responded with angry threats, calling the Ethiopians infidel invaders. Ethiopia is a country with a long Christian history, while Somalia is almost entirely Muslim.

The Islamists also reached out for help from Arab countries and from Eritrea, Ethiopia's bitter enemy.

But despite a United Nations report that there were thousands of foreign fighters in Somalia, American officials now believe that a far smaller number answered the call to jihad, probably just a few hundred. In the end, they did not make much of a difference, at least not in this phase of conventional war.

It seems that many people, inside Somalia and outside, overrated the Islamists' strength and popularity. Part of the reason, analysts now say, is that the Islamists had an excellent propaganda machine, controlling most media outlets in Somalia.

Another factor was that many Somalis supported the Islamists because they had no option. After Ethiopia got involved, that changed, with the transitional government becoming strong enough to be a realistic alternative.

The Islamist leaders may have also miscalculated the appetite among Somalis for the harsh brand of Islam they were pushing. On Thursday, to celebrate the departure of the Islamists, many Mogadishu residents stuffed their mouths with khat, a mildly narcotic plant that the Islamists had outlawed, and cranked up Western music, which some clerics had tried to ban.

Diplomats in the region are urging the government to be magnanimous and reach out to the former Islamist leaders. Several international organizations, including the Arab League and the African Union, are pressing Ethiopia to leave.

The Ethiopians say that they have no intention of staying and that their mission to neutralize the threat in Somalia has been mostly accomplished.

"Things have gone well," said Solomon Abebe, a spokesman for Ethiopia's Foreign Ministry. "And much faster than we expected."

Government Troops Take Somalian Capital (LAT)

By Edmund Sanders And Abukar Albadri

The Los Angeles Times, December 29, 2006

MOGADISHU, Somalia — Somalia's beleaguered capital fell early today to Ethiopian and Somali government troops who marched quietly into the city before dawn and took control without firing a shot.

DOJ_NMG_0110165

An Islamic alliance that had controlled Mogadishu and much of the country evaporated Thursday after a string of military losses, and in the security vacuum, violent looting broke out in the capital. Residents awoke this morning to find the Ethiopians and troops of Somalia's U.N.-backed transitional government taking positions.

The transitional government was formed in 2004 to give the Horn of Africa country its first effective, nationwide administration since 1991, but today was the first time its troops were actually able to enter Mogadishu.

"The fighting is over," Ali Mohammed Gedi, prime minister of the transitional government, declared late Thursday, shortly before hundreds of troops began pouring into the city.

Officials of the government spent most of Thursday meeting with clan leaders to ensure there would be no remnants of the Islamic forces hiding in Mogadishu when they entered, and that the local population would welcome their soldiers.

Mogadishu temporarily reverted to its familiar clan-based chaos as the Islamic Courts Union disintegrated and former warlords attempted to resume their former positions of power. Angry youths rampated in the streets, stealing mobile phones, looting homes and setting up checkpoints. Clan militias reclaimed their old neighborhoods. Offices and homes of the leaders of the former Islamic alliance bore the brunt of the looting.

It was unclear whether the weak transitional government and its small military force could impose order on Mogadishu, much less the rest of Somalia. Officials of neighboring Ethiopia, who provided most of the firepower to oust the Islamic alliance, said they would help, but that they would not remain in Somalia for a long period.

Mogadishu residents said the looting Thursday made them fearful of another long period of instability.

"We are going back to the former chaos and violence," said Ilyas Ahmed, whose brother was killed Thursday during a cell-phone robbery. "The courts were not good, but at least we had security."

Gedi called for the looting and violence to end. "Anybody found disturbing the security will be met with swift punishment," he said.

U.S. and Ethiopian officials accused the Islamists of plotting to establish a Taliban-style regime and use Somalia as a base to launch terrorist attacks. Islamists said they were merely trying to restore peace and stability to Somalia. Over the past six months they had seized Mogadishu and most of southern Somalia.

On Thursday, after days of military losses that left it bottled up in Mogadishu, the Islamic Courts Union officially disbanded. As he left Mogadishu, Sheik Sharif Sheik Ahmed, the chairman of the courts, said Islamists were leaving to avoid a battle that might have killed civilians. Former fighters, many of whom ditched their uniforms and shaved their beards, expressed disappointment.

"I joined them because I thought they wanted to install an Islamic government in Somalia,"' said Mursal Mohammed, 27. "But they had different ambitions. They wanted to fight against Ethiopia and get back Somali territory. They misled me."

Some extremist elements of the courts union were reportedly refusing to give up and were seen heading south toward the port city of Kismayo, where they may attempt to regroup or escape. As many as 4,000 fighters, including the fundamentalist Shabab faction that is accused of killing an Italian nun in September, have refused to give up, officials said.

Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi said Thursday his soldiers were in hot pursuit of the fighters, which he said included Eritreans and other foreigners.

Meles said his troops would assist the transitional government restore peace in Mogadishu.

"We will not let Mogadishu burn," he said. But he added that the international community must finish the job of putting Somalia back on its feet. He said Ethiopia would not become bogged down in an Iraq-style occupation.

"We don't believe is it our mission to reconstruct Somalia, militarily, politically or otherwise," Meles said. "What Somalia needs is beyond our capacity now. What Somalia needs now is massive humanitarian assistance. We cannot provide that."

He predicted that Ethiopian troops would remain in Somali for a matter of days or weeks. "We are certainly not planning to stay there for months," he said.

Ethiopia formally entered Somalia's worsening civil war a week ago, siding with the transitional government against the alliance of religious leaders.

Amid reports that former Mogadishu clan leaders were reassuming positions of power, Meles warned against allowing the city to fracture into the tribal fiefdoms that have existed for years.

DOJ_NMG_0110166

"The transitional government should not allow warlordism to crop up again in Mogadishu," he said.

Ethiopian leaders say the decision to take military action in Somalia was an effort to prevent the spread of religious extremism. But some worry that Ethiopia will now become a target for Islamic extremists. Ethiopia's population is about evenly split between Christians and Muslims, and the war has been unpopular with some of the country's Muslims.

Ethiopian-led troops began their assault near the border and reached the capital Wednesday.

Up to 3,000 Islamist fighters were killed and up to 5,000 wounded, Meles said. Ethiopian casualties totaled between 100 and 500, he said.

Thousands have fled the fighting, worsening Somalia's already dire conditions. At least 17 people were killed and 140 were missing after Yemeni security forces opened fire on two boats packed with people fleeing Somalia, according to the U.N. Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs.

Times staff writer Sanders reported from Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, and special correspondent Albadri from Mogadishu.

Somalia, U.N. Regain Mogadishu (WT/AP)

By Mohamed Olad Hassan

The Washington Times, December 29, 2006

MOGADISHU, Somalia -- Jubilant Somalis cheered as troops of the U.N.-backed interim government rolled into Mogadishu unopposed yesterday, putting an end to six months of domination of the capital by a radical Islamist movement.

Ethiopian soldiers stopped on the outskirts of town, after providing much of the military might in the offensive that shattered what had seemed an unbeatable Islamist militia. Islamist fighters fled south vowing to continue the battle.

"We are in Mogadishu," Prime Minister Mohamed Ali Gedi declared after meeting with local clan leaders to discuss the peaceful transfer of the city.

Despite the celebrations in the streets, worries about the future were widespread in a country that hasn't had an effective national government since clan warlords toppled a longtime dictator 15 years ago.

Many in overwhelmingly Muslim Somalia are suspicious of the transitional government's reliance on neighboring Ethiopia, a traditional rival with a large Christian population and one of East Africa's biggest armies. Witnesses said crowds threw rocks at Ethiopian troops on the city's northern edge.

Somalia's complex clan politics also are a big worry, having undone at least 14 attempts to install a central government in this violent, anarchic nation.

Mr. Gedi's government, set up in 2004 with U.N. backing, is riddled with clan rivalries, most notably between the young prime minister and elderly president.

Mr. Gedi later said his government was seeking approval from the interim parliament to impose martial law across Somalia while its forces attempt to restore order. Weapons will be confiscated, he said, without giving details.

A chilling reminder of the chaos Somalia has known came as clan militiamen and criminal groups began looting almost anything they could after the Islamist forces fled. At least four persons were killed in the melee, said one witness, Abdullahi Adow.

President Abdullahi Yusuf Ahmed, whose shaky acting administration has spent the last year in a temporary capital, Baidoa, 150 miles west of Mogadishu, said government troops are not a threat to the city's people.

"The government is committed to solving every problem that may face Somalia through dialogue and peaceful ways," he said.

But gunfire was heard for most of the day in the city. The United Nations flew out 14 aid workers and one U.N. staff member because of deteriorating security.

Ethiopian troops, who pledged not to enter the capital, were stoned by crowds on the northern edge of the city, witnesses said. "How could we welcome an invading enemy?" said one protester, Faiza Ali Nur.

Relations between Somalia and Ethiopia have long been strained. They fought a bloody war over their disputed border in 1977.

DOJ_NMG_0110167

After starting an offensive against the Islamist forces Sunday, Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi said his army would go home once it defeated the Islamist movement, whose fighters had extended their control over much of southern Somalia in the past six months.

Mr. Meles vowed yesterday not to give up the fight until extremists and foreign fighters supporting the Islamist movement had been crushed.

Speaking in Ethiopia's capital, Addis Ababa, he said 2,000 to 3,000 Islamist fighters had been killed and 4,000 to 5,000 wounded. Ethiopia suffered a few hundred casualties, he told reporters.

Islamist militiamen, who had said they would defend Mogadishu to the last man, retreated toward the southern port of Kismayo.

The fighters had gone from door to door in Kismayo recruiting children as young as 12 to make a last stand on behalf of the Islamist movement, according to a confidential U.N. report, citing the families of boys taken to the front line town of Jilib, 65 miles north of Kismayo.

The Islamist movement took Mogadishu in a battle with clan warlords in June and then advanced across most of the south, often without fighting.

When Ethiopia began providing military aid to the transitional government, Islamist leaders issued a call for foreign Muslims to join their "holy war" against the Ethiopians. Somalis living on the coast reported seeing hundreds of foreigners entering the country.

The International Committee of the Red Cross said that over the past few days, hospitals and other medical facilities in southern and central Somalia had admitted more than 800 wounded people.

The U.N. refugee agency said yesterday that two boats carrying Somalis and Ethiopians across the Gulf of Aden from northern Somalia capsized late Wednesday as they were being pursued by Yemen's coast guard. At least 17 persons drowned, and 140 were thought missing, it said.

The refugee agency said some of the 357 survivors claimed to be fleeing the fighting in central Somalia. But their boats sailed from ports far to the north in a relatively peaceful area of Somalia, from where a steady stream of economic migrants has set sail in recent years.

Uneasy Political Shift In Somalia (CSM)

By Rob Crilly

The Christian Science Monitor, December 29, 2006

NAIROBI, KENYA

Somali government forces entered Mogadishu Thursday after a whirlwind advance against Islamist militias who were forced to retreat after sustained losses.

The city echoed with gunfire as clan-based militias returned to the streets, settling old scores and looting. Residents said they feared a return to 15 years of anarchy that ended with the rise of the Union of Islamic Courts, which took over just six months ago.

The quick victory over the Islamists, analysts warn, leaves a dangerous vacuum in a country that has only recently seen calm. Without a political strategy for winning the peace, they say, Somalia risks becoming a quagmire that sucks in neighboring countries. If the Ethiopians keep their word and withdraw quickly, radical elements within the courts - such as the young fighters of the Shabbab, led by Afghanistan-trained Aden Hashi Ayro - might run a guerrilla campaign, drawing in foreign fighters.

"The risks are that if Ethiopia and Somalia are unable to politically consolidate their military victory, then we are back at square one with the conditions that gave rise to the courts in the first place," says Matt Bryden, a consultant to the International Crisis Group.

The Union of Islamic Courts had managed to win crucial clan support as they moved across the country, but that appeared to evaporate in the face of Ethiopia's military dominance. Elders switched sides, hastening the demise of the Islamists.

Convoys of Islamists' pickups mounted with antiaircraft guns or heavy machine guns were seen leaving the city on Wednesday night and heading towards Kismayo, an Indian Ocean port still held by the Union of Islamic Courts. Government officials spent part of Thursday meeting elders near Mogadishu discussing the terms by which troops might enter the capital. In the afternoon, as the Monitor went to press, Somali Prime Minister Ali Mohammed Gedi had flown to a town near the capital as the government declared a state of emergency.

"Things here are very tense now," said Abdiaziz Adow, a Mogadishu shopkeeper, by telephone. "No one wants things to go back to the way things were, but we have already heard about people being shot and all the shops are closed."

Last June, a network of sharia courts seized control of the capital following months of fighting against a coalition of warlords, who received covert support from the United States.

The rise of the courts was lauded by residents who endured years of violence at the hands of the military strongmen. Among them, the warlords had carved the city into a network of personal fiefdoms riddled with roadblocks and no-go areas.

Gradually, the city took on an air of peace. The checkpoints were dismantled, the international airport was reopened, and teams of women were deployed to repair streets.

Militias loyal to the courts fanned out across the country. Mostly, they were welcomed by clan elders keen to see some sort of order restored.

Meanwhile, a weak transitional government - established with UN and international backing - found itself isolated and unable to command support outside its stronghold of Baidoa.

The growing power of the courts was greeted with concern in Ethiopia, which feared the rise of radical Islam on its doorstep, and the US, which accused the courts of harboring Al Qaeda terrorists. Ten days ago, as the courts moved to within 40 miles of the government seat, Ethiopia openly intervened.

As Ethiopian warplanes began bombing Islamist positions last weekend, the Islamic leadership said their forces were falling back to Mogadishu to begin preparing for a long guerrilla war.

But as Somali government forces and Ethiopian soldiers took control of Balad, the last town on the road to Mogadishu, the Islamists prepared to flee.

Before leaving the city, Sheikh Sharif Ahmed, who heads the courts' executive committee, told Al Jazeera television that his militias were leaving Mogadishu to avert bloodshed. "We have withdrawn our forces and there are no Islamic Court forces (there). It is the Somali people who are resisting," he said. "We left [the capital] to avert heavy bombing because Ethiopian forces are practicing genocide against the Somali people."

As they left, much of their weapons and fighters were handed over to clan leaders who took control of the airport and seaport.

The fall of Mogadishu came after a night of frantic telephone diplomacy. Islamist leaders spoke with government officials, saying they would be welcome in Mogadishu if they did not launch an attack.

At the same time, government officials were telephoning clan elders in the city, urging them to withdraw their support for the Union of Islamic Courts.

Abdirahman Dinari, a government spokesman, said popular support had melted away from the courts as they began to introduce a hard-line form of sharia law. He claimed the government was now in control of 95 percent of the country.

"The courts were not powerful. It was the international media who gave them false credibility," he said by phone from Baidoa. "It is the people of Mogadishu who are powerful. Now [the courts] have lost support, they have disappeared into thin air."

U.S. Bid To Limit Iran Gets Wary Response (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, December 29, 2006

Plan to Curb Trade, Lending Beyond U.N. Sanctions Has Yet To Stir Action Overseas

WASHINGTON -- Armed at last with a set of limited United Nations sanctions against Iran's nuclear program, the Bush administration has been stepping up efforts to persuade countries in Europe and Asia to go further and cut off bank lending and other financial interactions with Iran.

But the response overseas to the U.S. push to clamp down on trade with Iran beyond the U.N. resolution has been tepid. European officials say their first desire is to implement and enforce Saturday's package of limited sanctions on Iran. Any moves to limit bank lending or to curtail export credits also could run afoul of the sizable trade between Iran and countries such as Germany, Italy, Japan and China.

China's trade with Iran is up more than 40% this year, and while trade between the European Union and Iran has stagnated, it is still set to top $25 billion in 2006. The U.S., having imposed a series of unilateral sanctions on Tehran over the past 25 years, has only minuscule trade ties with Iran.

"Now is the time for all the actors to be very cautious in their dealings with Iran to make sure that they don't violate the U.N. resolution," said a senior European diplomat in Washington. A senior EU official said all energies for now will focus on ensuring that the EU's 25 member states use the same rules to enforce the U.N. measure.

Tougher Pressure

The U.S. strategy to pressure countries and private banks to curb their dealings with Iran underscores a conviction within the Bush administration that getting Iran to compromise on its nuclear work will require much tougher pressure than the U.N. Security Council is likely to stomach.

The strategy, which has been months in the works, is a spinoff from a campaign launched in 2005 against Asian banks that helped to financially isolate North Korea. After the Treasury Department targeted one bank in Macau with sanctions, numerous other banks broke off their dealings with Pyongyang. More Chinese banks have severed ties with North Korea since the U.N. passed a sanctions package in October in response to Pyongyang's nuclear test. It is a pattern the U.S. now hopes to see repeated with Iran.

Senior U.S. officials say that the Dec. 23 U.N. resolution is crucial because it provides countries with the legal justification to push for tighter financial controls against Iran within their own systems. The measure falls under a provision of Chapter 7 of the U.N. Charter that makes enforcement mandatory but restricts the response to nonmilitary means.

"It's certainly a significant step to have a unanimous resolution backed by 15 countries under Chapter 7," said Stuart Levey, the Treasury Department's undersecretary for terrorism and financial intelligence, who has led the drive to squeeze Iran's access to international financial channels. "I think we will be able to get some real impact from this resolution."

To that end, the Bush administration is now looking to push ahead mainly on two fronts.

U.S. officials hope that countries with the greatest economic leverage over Iran -- primarily Germany, Italy, France, Japan and China -- will separately make clear to their own banks the risks involved in doing business with Iran. The Treasury Department for several months has been trying to persuade international lenders to help isolate a network of Iranian-controlled banks and companies that the U.S. suspects Tehran is using to acquire sophisticated weapons technology. Several large European banks, such as UBS AG and ABN Amro Holding NV, broke off all ties with Iran during the past year.

The Bush administration also would like to see about a dozen European countries end or at least curtail their export-credit-guarantee programs for companies doing business in Iran. Germany alone granted companies working in Iran credit guarantees of $1.9 billion in 2005, putting Iran third on Germany's guarantee list after Russia and China. Britain also has issued a number of large guarantees to cover the risk for British companies doing business in Iran. (Export-credit guarantees greatly diminish the risk a company faces when doing business abroad by insuring against the chance of nonpayment.)

Reluctance to Act

"This export-credit issue is pretty significant," Mr. Levey said, adding that movement on this front would probably have to come from within the EU, as individual countries might be reluctant to act on their own. "It is hard for one of these countries to act for fear that the others will move in to fill the gap," he said.

European diplomats and officials, however, say the EU isn't likely to take additional actions quickly. The EU's first step will be to pass rules implementing the new U.N. resolution, which is itself highly complex, and then to see whether the new pressures spark a debate within Iran over the wisdom of rebelling against the international community.

Europe and the U.S. have been trying for more than two years to get Iran to agree to steps to ensure that its nuclear program is strictly for civilian purposes -- and not a cover for developing a nuclear weapon. Iran insists it isn't pursuing nuclear weapons, but it also has refused to suspend an increasingly elaborate uranium-enrichment program. Highly enriched uranium is a key ingredient for a nuclear bomb.

The aim of the U.N. resolution -- but even more so the additional steps being pushed by the U.S. -- is to ramp up the economic pain on Iran so that significant voices within the country begin to question the value of having a domestic uranium-enrichment program.

The new sanctions package was nothing if not hard-fought. When Iran refused to suspend its uranium-enrichment work by Aug. 31, as required by an earlier U.N. resolution, the U.S. hoped to win a set of punishments within weeks to show Iran that the Security Council meant business. Instead, amid significant resistance from Russia, the council spent nearly four months feuding over multiple drafts before it hit on a measure that won the support of all five permanent members as well as the council's 10 rotating members.

The resolution that emerged Saturday is meant to put the squeeze on Iran's nuclear program but isn't likely to cause much pain on its own. The package prohibits countries from supplying Iran with materials that would benefit its uranium-enrichment efforts or improve its missile systems. But the package is much looser on so-called dual-use items that can be for either military or civilian purposes. The resolution also imposes an asset freeze on 11 organizations and 12 individuals involved in Iran's nuclear and missile programs.

Avoiding Financial Interactions

The Bush administration was particularly pleased by the move to target specific Iranian individuals and companies, because the shortened U.N. list overlaps partially with a longer watch list that Mr. Levey has been showing banks and finance ministries around Europe, urging them to avoid financial interactions with entities that the U.S. believes are supporting Iran's weapons programs or terror groups.

Both European and U.S. officials cite evidence that Iran already is feeling the pinch of increased economic isolation. A new study from Johns Hopkins University concludes that Iran's oil production is actually falling amid rapidly declining investments in its petroleum sector. And Iran's oil minister said recently that the country would have to dip into a special stabilization fund to finance increased production.

Beyond Europe, the U.S. also is trying to persuade certain Persian Gulf states such as Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates to exert pressure on China to distance itself from Iran. China has become a major trading partner with Iran during recent years, as well as a growing investor in Iran's oil and natural-gas fields.

Israel Says Egypt Sends Weapons To Abbas's Forces, With Israeli And U.S. Approval (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

JERUSALEM, Dec. 28 — After coordination with Israel and the United States, Egypt has sent weapons and ammunition into the Gaza Strip to forces loyal to the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah, Israeli officials said Thursday.

Senior Palestinian officials, including Mr. Abbas's spokesman, Nabil Abu Rudeineh, denied the report. Mr. Abu Rudeineh called it "Israeli propaganda aimed at aggravating the situation between Fatah and Hamas."

But Israeli officials knowledgeable about the shipment confirmed a report in the daily Haaretz that Prime Minister Ehud Olmert had approved the shipment in his meeting Saturday evening with Mr. Abbas.

They said four trucks with 2,000 automatic rifles, 20,000 ammunition clips and two million bullets had passed from Egypt through the Israeli-controlled Kerem Shalom crossing, where Gaza, Israel and Egypt meet. The shipment was turned over to Mr. Abbas's Presidential Guard at the Karni crossing between Gaza and Israel, the officials said.

Benjamin Ben-Eliezer, a cabinet member and former defense minister, told Israeli Army Radio that the weapons were intended to give Mr. Abbas "the capability to hold his own against those organizations that are trying to spoil everything."

That was apparently a reference to Hamas, the militant faction that gained control of the Palestinian government by winning parliamentary elections in January. Hamas refuses to recognize Israel's right to exist and rejects previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements that call for a permanent two-state solution.

American officials were circumspect but said various moves to support Mr. Abbas's forces were taking place, including the provision of money for training the Presidential Guard and Israeli approval for the return to the Palestinian territories of a thousand or so well-trained but aging Fatah fighters, the Badr Brigade of the Palestine Liberation Organization. They have been barred from returning and are living in Jordan.

The Bush administration is seeking Congressional support for up to $100 million, mostly for salaries and training, to strengthen Mr. Abbas and his security forces and extend their control over the Gaza crossing points.

A senior American official who deals with the Palestinians insisted that the point was not to promote civil war with Hamas, but to help Mr. Abbas and Fatah and "to provide deterrence and balance" in Gaza, where Hamas is especially strong.

The arms shipment is part of a broader American and Israeli effort, in coordination with moderate Arab countries like Egypt, Jordan and Saudi Arabia, to strengthen Mr. Abbas, weaken Hamas and show some movement on the stalled issue of Israeli-Palestinian peace.

At his meeting Saturday with Mr. Abbas, Mr. Olmert also promised to eliminate some West Bank checkpoints and turn over to Mr. Abbas $100 million of the roughly $500 million that the Israelis have collected for the Palestinians but have refused to turn over since Hamas took power.

But officials involved consider their efforts something short of a plan. That, they say, is because Fatah remains weak, Mr. Abbas is unpredictable and too wedded to the Fatah old guard, and conditions are not ripe for a major effort to reach a comprehensive settlement.

Still, the officials say, given the problems of the region — the American difficulties in Iraq, the growing influence of Iran, Israel's summer war with Iranian- and Syrian-backed Hezbollah in southern Lebanon and Hamas's sway over Gaza — efforts are needed to alter the status quo and promote moderate Palestinian political goals.

"The most important thing for us is to get a process going between Abbas and the Israelis," the American official said. "If the Palestinians end up with a consensus supporting Hamas, you push off any real peace process for a long, long time. If they opt for this kind of unity, fine, but then there is nothing we can do for them, and there will be no Palestinian state, and it's not a good outcome."

Mr. Abbas has called for early presidential and parliamentary elections, which Hamas opposes. The Americans were pleased by his call, though they would have liked him to have confronted Hamas six months ago, the official said.

"The longer that goes by, the harder it is for him," the official said. "We've been trying to explain to him that every option is risky now but that the status quo also has its downside. Doing nothing and getting weaker does not help."

The Israeli foreign minister, Tzipi Livni, in essence has been suggesting talks with Mr. Abbas that would result in a Palestinian state with temporary borders — effectively the second stage of the moribund peace plan known as the road map — with Israel pulling back in the West Bank to the current route of the separation barrier it is building there.

In an interview in Haaretz's weekend magazine, she talked gingerly about "a detailed operative plan" to negotiate with Mr. Abbas, ideas she has discussed with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Abbas aides. "My vision says that the two-nation-state principle is not only an Israeli gift to the Palestinians but advances Israeli interests," she said.

Mr. Olmert does not like grandstanding by his cabinet ministers, and some aides were dismissive about the notion of a new plan. But Mr. Olmert largely shares Ms. Livni's thesis: that Israel, the West and moderate Arab countries want Mr. Abbas and Fatah, whatever their weaknesses, to win out over Hamas, a Foreign Ministry official said.

"So they should have guns, and resources for patronage, and there should be a political vision and framework for moving forward, so that if Palestinians do choose the right path, there is something real and tangible for those who believe in a two-state solution," the official said.

Mr. Abbas has repeatedly rejected the idea of a Palestinian state in temporary borders, seeing it as a trap, because there would be no guarantee that Israel would move further toward a final settlement.

"But it's possible that now Palestinian moderates need some political ammunition to show people that negotiations will bear real and tangible results," the official said.

Then, he suggested, with such results in hand and a period of visible reform in Fatah, new elections could result in Hamas's defeat, and then a stronger move to dismantle Palestinian militant organizations — as called for in the first stage of the road map, which did not foresee one of those organizations, Hamas, running the Palestinian Authority.

There are many difficulties with such a course of action, beginning with the refusal of Hamas to sanction early elections and the risk that Mr. Abbas continues to be seen by too many Palestinians as an agent of Israeli and American interests.

Mr. Abbas is committed to a Palestinian state on roughly the pre-1967 borders, with its capital in Jerusalem, and a "just solution" to the refugee issue. So approving the current West Bank barrier route, which keeps 10 percent of the land, including East Jerusalem, on the Israeli side, even as a temporary border would be very risky for him.

"Abbas has got a lot of work to do — in Fatah, in his own office, with the security forces," the American official said. "We'll continue to help," he added, pointing to a likely visit next month by Ms. Rice. "But Abbas has to make some choices."

Mr. Olmert is already facing criticism from his right wing for his concessions to Mr. Abbas, given the involvement of Fatah militants like Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades in firing rockets into Israel. Israeli opinion, after the summer war and the Gaza rockets, is generally opposed to handing back large portions of the West Bank to the Palestinians, especially given the chaos in the Palestinian Authority.

Despite A Lull At Holidays, Beirut Digs In For A Struggle (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Dec. 28 — Sleigh bells jingled, Christmas carols blared from loudspeakers and dancing Santa Clauses and street vendors offering Christmas trinkets lent downtown Beirut the feel of a Christmas fair for much of this week.

If not for the razor wire and heavily armed soldiers ringing much of the area and the posters of the Hezbollah leader, Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, one could almost have forgotten the continuing crisis in this country.

But even the Christmas celebration turned political.

"We are Muslims and Christians standing together to tell the world this is Lebanon," a speaker with the opposition Free Patriotic Movement announced, shortly before the cutting of a cake about 30 yards long in celebration of Christmas on Monday night. "The future is ours, and after the feast, we will resume our protest until victory."

Almost one month since Hezbollah and Christian opposition parties took over the center of Beirut seeking to bring down the government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora, they have dug in for a long fight. After the war between Hezbollah and Israel during the summer, from which Hezbollah emerged stronger and the Lebanese government weaker, Hezbollah and its allies — Christian groups and a Druse group that were once mortal enemies — began to press for more power.

In Riyadh al Solh square, where protesters have camped out in a tent city, Hezbollah and its allies are demanding that Mr. Siniora resign and are saying he should be put on trial for treason and corruption. Last week, they ratcheted up their demands, calling for early parliamentary elections. Up above in the Grand Serail, the government headquarters, Mr. Siniora, urged to stand firm by Saudi Arabia and the United States, shows no signs of wavering, insisting that Hezbollah and its allies come off the streets and return to the negotiating table.

"Their sit-in did not produce what they thought it would," said Marwan Hamadeh, minister of telecommunications, who predicted the crisis could last until Lebanon's presidential elections next November. "They simply cannot win."

The rallies have been muted in recent days so families could celebrate Christmas or prepare for Id al-Adha, the Muslim Feast of Sacrifice, at the weekend. But opposition leaders threaten to raise the pitch next week, suggesting that they may block highways and access to Beirut's airport.

The business of governing Lebanon has come to a virtual halt, with President Émile Lahoud unwilling to consider any legislation offered by the cabinet, the cabinet unwilling to speak to Mr. Lahoud, and the speaker of Parliament, the Shiite Amal leader Nabih Berri, unwilling to convene a session or speak to the president. Opposition members of Parliament walked out in late November and have not returned.

"Each side is supported by people that don't want them to give up a thing," said Paul Salem, director of the Carnegie Middle East Center, speaking of both internal and foreign backers. "It's becoming more likely that a very long, drawn-out stalemate will take hold."

Gradually, Mr. Salem and others here say, Beirutis are growing used to the demonstrations in the center of town, finding ways around the traffic snarl the protests have caused, and feeling less urgency to resolve the standoff. Some restaurants are asking their patrons — and individual Lebanese are asking their friends — not to discuss politics.

"The easiest thing for people to do now is to postpone, to stall," Mr. Salem said.

Hezbollah and its allies took to the streets on Dec. 1 after the governing coalition led by Mr. Siniora rejected their demands. They set upon the center of Beirut with a noisy but peaceful protest mirroring the one led by the March 14 movement last year that forced Syria out of Lebanon and swept its leaders into power.

Much like the March 14 movement, the opposition has sought to emphasize its sectarian mix, insisting it represents the true Lebanese.

The protests continue to sap Lebanon's economy, already damaged by Israel's bombardment of the country during the summer. Store owners in downtown Beirut briefly opened this week but they saw few customers.

"We will carry on with this campaign until we topple the government," said Nabil Nicola, a Parliament member with the Free Patriotic Movement of Michel Aoun, a Christian allied with the opposition. "We still have not used all the peaceful weapons available to us, and it's just the beginning of the road."

On Saturday, Amr Moussa, the secretary general of the Arab League, said he had been unable to negotiate a solution in two weeks of shuttle diplomacy but promised to resume his efforts after the Muslim holiday. He said the impasse had been made worse by the fact that the sides refused to communicate with each other. Hezbollah accuses him of backing the governing coalition.

"Unfortunately Amr Moussa was taking a side during his last round of negotiations and unfortunately some Arab countries are taking sides too, but there are talks about a new, less biased Arab initiative," said Nawar Sahili, one of Hezbollah's members of Parliament. "We are hoping it will solve the crisis."

Analysts and officials close to the discussion said the most contentious issue remains a bill rushed through to Parliament days after the opposition walked out. The ruling coalition has a majority in Parliament but Mr. Berri has refused to hold a meeting of Parliament. The bill calls for formation of an international tribunal with sweeping powers to prosecute suspects implicated in the February 2005 assassination of the former prime minister, Rafiq Hariri, and other assassinations.

Mr. Moussa, speaking to reporters in Beirut on Saturday, said he had managed to coax both sides to agree to the outlines of a national unity cabinet in which major decisions would be made by consensus.

But in Riyadh al Solh square, many said they were ready for a long fight. "When Omar Karami was prime minister, one person said a word and he resigned," Ali al-Faqih, a protester, said of the interim prime minister forced to resign during the anti-Syrian protests. "Now, one million people have come and said 'Leave,' but this guy is still clinging on. He's no gentleman."

Russia, Belarus Near Gas Showdown (WSJ)

By Alan Cullison, David Crawford And John W. Miller

The Wall Street Journal, December 29, 2006

Russia and the former Soviet state of Belarus are heading toward a showdown over natural-gas prices that both sides warn could lead to a New Year's Day pipeline shut-off similar to the one that hit Ukraine a year ago, which had ripple effects across Europe.

But analysts say there is less likelihood of a political firestorm over any Russian cutoff this year. European governments and Russia have carefully stockpiled gas in anticipation of any disruption. And in any case, Russia only exports about a fifth of its natural gas to Europe through Belarus pipelines.

Moreover, Belarus is unlikely to receive the same Western sympathy extended to Kiev during its spat with Russian state-controlled gas giant OAO Gazprom, which briefly suspended supplies to Ukraine early in 2006. While Ukraine's government was pro-Western, Belarussian President Alexander Lukashenko is a pariah in the West who is often referred to as Europe's last dictator.

Still, Gazprom's willingness to threaten yet another midwinter fuel cutoff is reinforcing fears across Western Europe about the Continent's reliance on Russia for the energy that powers the region. After raising gas prices for its neighbors over the past year, Russia has been accused by the U.S. of using energy as a tool of blackmail and intimidation.

Yesterday, European Union Energy Commissioner Andris Piebalgs urged Belarus and Russia to quickly resolve their differences, which he said "may affect gas supplies" to the EU. "I call on the two parties to reach as soon as possible a satisfactory agreement that does not put in question gas transits to the EU," he said.

Moscow has responded that it wants to do away with Soviet-era subsidies and put its relations with neighbors on a market-oriented footing. Besides winning price increases from Ukraine, Russia has also pushed to raise prices for the former Soviet republics of Georgia, Azerbaijan and Moldova. Belarus has until recently been largely spared Gazprom's hardball negotiating tactics, leading some in the West to accuse Moscow of a double standard. Belarus pays $47 per 1,000 cubic meters for gas from Russia, well below the $264 that Gazprom says its European customers pay. Gazprom has been demanding that Belarus pay more than double the current price, and pay part of the bill by surrendering shares in its gas-distribution system.

"I don't believe that you will see the same reaction in the West if there is a cut-off this time," said Valery Nesterov, an energy analyst at Troika Dialog brokerage firm in Moscow. "Moscow will no longer be subsidizing a regime that is not popular in the West nowadays."

Gazprom began talks with Belarus this summer. When they ended without an agreement Tuesday, the company warned it could cut supplies to Belarus Monday morning. Minsk said it may respond by disrupting deliveries of Russian gas through its pipelines to Lithuania, Poland, Germany, the Czech Republic and the Russian enclave of Kaliningrad.

Industry officials across Europe and Russia have scrambled to reassure governments that there would be no repeat of the drama of the Ukraine cutoff. Gazprom said it had stockpiled supplies in Europe, while Ukraine's gas-transport company told the EU it had 24 billion cubic meters set aside to replenish pipelines to Europe if necessary.

Analysts say that Belarus, whose industrial sector is sorely dependent on Russian energy, can't withstand a cutoff of gas of more than a few days. In Europe, government officials say such a short disruption would be more psychological than material, and that countries can soften the impact by tapping reserves or shifting supplies among themselves.

German energy company RWE AG has accumulated supplies that will last several weeks in the event of an interruption, company spokesman Jürgen Frech said. Belarussian pipelines provide only a modest share of Germany's diverse gas supplies, which include deliveries via the Czech Republic, Ukraine, Norway and the Netherlands, he said.

"Eighty percent of Russian gas exports go through the Ukraine, while Belarus is only one pipeline," said EU Energy Commission spokesman Ferran Tarradellas. Still, he said the bloc's Gas Coordination Group has called a special meeting Jan. 4 to assess the situation and "to determine the extent of solidarity" among EU countries.

Government officials warned the political ramifications could be more lasting, however. "The Belarus dispute demonstrates Russia's tactics for enforcing its bargaining position hasn't changed since the conflict last January with the Ukraine," a Polish official said.

Russia Tightens Grip On Gas, Threatens To Cut Supply (USAT)

By Jeffrey Stinson

USA Today, December 29, 2006

LONDON — It's getting cold in Europe, and Russia is threatening to turn off the heat — for the second straight winter.

Gazprom, Russia's state-controlled natural gas monopoly, has told Belarus to pay double the current price for gas by New Year's Day or supplies will be cut. Gazprom also demanded a stake in the pipeline carrying gas from Belarus to other European customers.

Belarus has rejected the demands. Moscow warned Poland, Germany and Lithuania on Wednesday to expect shortages if the dispute continues. It also warned Belarus not to siphon gas from the Yamal-Europe pipeline.

Gazprom, the world's biggest gas producer, provides 25% of the natural gas consumed by Europe.

The price dispute shows how Russia is tightening its grip on energy production and distribution to squeeze higher prices from its neighbors. Analysts say it also shows how Russia uses its energy muscle to achieve political goals and deflect criticism of its policies.

Georgia, faced with the threat of a supply cut, agreed last week to pay Gazprom more than double its previous price for gas. Before signing the deal, Georgia accused Russia of using gas to punish the former Soviet republic for its Western-leaning policies.

Last New Year's, Ukraine's pro-Western government was locked in a similar standoff over pricing. When Gazprom cut supplies to Ukraine, the move also curtailed gas shipments through Ukraine to Poland, Hungary and Italy.

Roughly 80% of Gazprom's exports to Europe flow through Ukraine; the rest go through Belarus. "Belarus is a microcosm of very worrisome behavior," says Clifford Kupchan, an expert on Russian energy with the Eurasia Group, a New York-based consulting firm.

Russia's grip on energy supplies could eventually be felt in the USA: The Russian government pressured Royal Dutch Shell and its Japanese financial partners this month to relinquish control of a project off Russia's Pacific Coast. The project is to supply liquefied natural gas to Japan, South Korea, China and the United States.

"Gazprom, across the board, is acting like a bully," Kupchan says. "There is very little difference between Gazprom and the Russian state."

In May, Vice President Cheney accused Russia of using its energy resources as a tool of intimidation.

Gazprom insists it seeks only market prices. In announcing price hikes Nov. 8, Gazprom export chief Alexander Medvedev told Russian news agency RIA Novosti that "no political motives" were involved.

Russia's energy muscle has allowed it to bully Georgia, drag its feet on halting Iran's nuclear program and offer diplomatic support to North Korea, says David Satter, Russia expert at the Hudson Institute think tank in Washington.

Some European nations are trying to wean themselves. Sweden has announced ambitious biofuel programs; others, such as Great Britain, have turned to nuclear power. In the past month, Sweden said it would not approve construction of an underwater gas pipeline from Russia to Germany that it could have tapped for power.

However, France's state-owned gas utility, Gaz de France, signed with Gazprom on Dec. 18 to provide Russian gas directly to French consumers for the next 24 years. On Nov. 14, Eni, Italy's biggest oil and gas company, reached a long-term agreement to boost its own gas supplies and for Gazprom to enter the Italian market.

As EU Gates Open, 'Paradise' Flows East (CSM)

By Michael J. Jordan

The Christian Science Monitor, December 29, 2006

SOFIA, BULGARIA; AND BUCHAREST, ROMANIA

Thirty miles south of the Bulgarian capital, along winding, wintry mountain roads, Lalo Zifritov stands guard outside the skeleton of a three-story home being built in the sleepy town of Samokov. The owner pays him the equivalent of $13 per day to keep an eye on the site round-the-clock.

His pay goes chiefly to food, diapers, and a few sweets for his three kids - ages 7, 4, and 1. They live without central heating.

When his aunt and cousins migrated to Italy last year, they invited him to join them. He declined. One deterrent, says the 28-year-old, was the cost of the passport, visa, and travel.

"Poverty ruins everything," says Mr. Zifritov, as his wife chops wood nearby. "But we're not so courageous to just move abroad."

The last time the EU opened its doors to new members in 2004, hundreds of thousands of Eastern Europeans pushed westward. But despite Western fears that hordes of desperate, job-seeking Bulgarians and Romanians will again flood the European Union when their countries become members on Jan. 1, many - like Zifritov - have compelling reasons to stay home.

"Some believe 'paradise' is in Western Europe, but some of this paradise will soon be coming here," says Krassen Stanchev, executive director of the Institute for Market Economics in Sofia.

Indeed, both countries expect a multibillion-euro infusion of EU aid and foreign investment after New Year's. And already, the Romanian and Bulgarian economies are roaring, growing at 7 percent and 6 percent, respectively. In addition, average salaries are on the rise - though still only about a third of Western European incomes in terms of purchasing power.

It was those higher-income economies that the 2004 wave of immigrants targeted. Uneasy at the prospect of absorbing yet another wave, 10 of the 15 "older" EU members - led by Britain, which received more than 500,000 migrants - have imposed temporary restrictions on Romanians and Bulgarians freely entering their labor markets.

But the Balkan countries may have already unleashed their wave of immigrants: According to the International Organization of Migration (IOM), of the estimated 6 million who have poured into Western Europe from Eastern Europe since the Berlin Wall fell in 1989, some 2 million have hailed from Romania.

"Those who had the possibility and the interest have already left," says Cristian Ghinea, a Romanian commentator.

In fact, with tens of thousands of Moldovans and Macedonians reportedly seeking Romanian and Bulgarian citizenship, respectively, and legions of others farther to the east desperate for work, EU membership could turn this Balkan pair - like Spain since it joined in 1987 - from migrant source to destination country, says Jean-Philippe Chauzy, spokesman for the IOM.

"In due time, their economies will become more attractive to non-EU migrants," he says, adding that the scale of migration is difficult to predict.

Meanwhile, as Romanians and Bulgarians grow savvier about the risks as well as the rewards of leaving one's homeland behind, they no longer believe that the streets of London, Rome, and Madrid are paved with gold.

"There are lots of stories about Romanian owners of a successful construction company in England or restaurant in Spain, but also of those living out of garbage bins in Rome, too proud to come home," says Mihaela Danga, of the Center for Independent Journalism in Bucharest.

Still, locals here predict that when their countrymen receive their EU passports, some will be tempted to set out in search of better-paying opportunities.

"Immigration will likely come from the extremes," says Anca Ciuca, president of the Foundation for Democratic Change. "If you have no place to work where you live and see no future for your family, this is one source. The other will be among the highly educated who have little civic spirit, with no concern to help this society, but only care about a higher standard of living for them and their families."

Observers agree that broadly categorized, three groups to date have generated most migrants: laborers from devastated agricultural and industrial sectors; urban professionals in search of greater compensation for their talents (the IOM's Chauzy notes that his dentist in Geneva is Romanian); and Roma, also referred to as Gypsies.

A new source may be Moldovans. A majority of citizens in Moldova - an impoverished country that was part of Romania until 1940 - claim Romanian descent, and as many as 400,000 have obtained Romanian citizenship in recent months.

Still, the decision to go remains deeply personal.

"I'm in my dream job right now," says Boris Shirov, a Bulgarian who works in radio-satellite communications in Sofia. "I can live off my salary, I'm happy with my friends, and I can visit 10 clubs in this area without getting into a taxi. But I miss my girlfriend, because she works in Brussels. So I may try to find a job there."

Across the border in Calarasi, Romania, a run-down industrial town near the southern bend of the Danube River, a mud-splattered ditch digger named Ion Bodeanu has a different take. Recently back from Italy, where he had to work 14-hour days, seven days a week, for 750 euros a month - despite having been promised 40-hour weeks for 950 euros monthly - Mr. Bodeanu says he wouldn't discourage other emigrants.

His young colleague, Ilie Inu, says he'd do it, with one condition.

"I'd want someone whom I trust to tell me that it's OK, you go and it's safe," says Mr. Inu. "I make 200 euros here, so if I at least know what to expect, I'd do it for 700 euros."

It's young people like Inu whom Silvia Luminita Nastase would like to keep in Calarasi. Industrial collapse has reduced the population by 75 percent in the past two decades, so Ms. Nastase - the city's director of community development - says she's trying to lure foreign investors. She recently returned from a trip to China for that purpose.

"I hope we can create opportunities for young people to come back to town - or at least keep them here - with challenging, well-paying jobs," says Nastase.

Her only child, Ciprian, is surfing the Internet for college scholarships in France, where he visited last summer. There's no guarantee he would return to Calarasi, says his mother. "I'd put it at 50-50 that he stays or goes," says Nastase. "And if he goes," she says with a laugh, "maybe I'd go with him."

Turkmenbashi (WSJ)

By Hamid Ismailov

The Wall Street Journal, December 29, 2006

Mahtumkuli, your soul is a visitor to a volatile body, / Good has many friends, but for evil there are no brethren. / But these days everything is upside down: heels replace heads, / And one can't recognize who is good, and who is bad.

--Mahtumkuli, 18th century * * *

When I first met Saparmurat Niyazov in person, at an Islamic Conference in Tehran 1997, I had my killer question for the Turkmen president (something about Caspian oil and gas) all ready when I suddenly got a closer look at his hair. It was freshly dyed, with henna, a shocking punky red! I have no idea now what I asked, or what he said into my radio mike. The next time I met him, at the press conference of a Central Asian meeting, his hair was suddenly, unbelievably, black -- apparently dyed, this time, with basma. Again, I recall nothing else about the encounter.

Turkmenbashi ("Head of all Turkmen"), who died last week, was, as his foreign obituarists noted, "eccentric" even by Central Asia's high standards. Niyazov abolished opera, ballet and circus, arts that were foreign, according to him, to the Turkmen mentality; to nurture this "mentality," he wrote "Ruhname" (Book of Spirit), a compilation of reinvented history, folklore and pseudo-philosophical maxims to rival the Quran. January was renamed "Turkmenbashi," April "Gorban Soltan Edge," the name of his mother. He replaced street names in Ashgabat, the capital, with numbers. He declared unlawful a host of infectious diseases, including AIDS and cholera. He ordered foreigners to pay the state $50,000 to marry Turkmen girls. He built the biggest mosque in Central Asia, standing usually empty, and planned an ice castle in the middle of the desert. He . . . A casual imagination fails to follow the list. * * *

What could have possibly produced this sort of man? A Turkmen proverb says: "A bird copies what it sees in the nest." Niyazov, born in 1940, lost his father in World War II and his mother in the Ashgabat earthquake of 1948. He was brought up in an orphanage, like several other Central Asian leaders. It's no surprise these men emerged well-steeled for politics from a tough life in postwar orphanages, which on the surface nurtured an ultrapure Soviet ideology, but in reality were ruled by a "first come, first gets" philosophy that taught boys like Niyazov ruthless survival skills.

In his isolated republic, Niyazov mastered both the "form and essence" -- the haircut and what goes under it -- of what it means to be Soviet. He built a cult of personality that would make Stalin and Brezhnev go green with envy: His golden statue rotates after the sun; a crater on the moon and an asteroid bear, in Turkmenistan, his name; his poems are inscribed on the walls of mosques. Yet he almost humbly called on journalists to tone down their praise for a man who, in one go, fulfilled the great Communist prophecy of Khrushchev: free electricity, water and salt for the whole population until 2030!

Appropriately, Turkmenbashi died on Stalin's birthday, when nostalgic war veterans were also celebrating the centenary of Brezhnev's birth. In the hereafter, these two would probably have all the right to shake the hand of the comrade who, per Marxist-Leninist cant, "relayed their deeds to new shining heights."

Mesmerized with his notorious idiosyncrasies, the outside world paid less attention to the dark side of Turkmen reality. Politicians and journalists who dared think independently disappeared. A former prime minister, Boris Shikhmuradov, languishes in jail, his fate and condition unknown. A correspondent for Radio Liberty, Ogulsapar Muradova, was detained this June with several human-rights activists; her corpse was returned to her family in September.

The U.S.S.R. might be dead, but its legacy lives on, not just in a Turkmen bouffant hairdo. Give me your freedom and I'll send you off to paradise! In the Central Asia of independent states, the only difference is that the insignificant local pawns of the old days, who meekly followed orders from the Kremlin, suddenly turned into kings at the time of the Soviet breakup. And it went to their heads. Do you want to be president for life? Here you are! You want to make the nation's great (oil or gas) wealth your own personal fortune? No problem! Create a ruling family dynasty that will outlive you? You got it!

What happens next in Turkmenistan -- a huge country, larger than Germany, with enormous gas reserves that Europe and China covet, and a small population of five million -- is anyone's guess. But a good one is that "the Family," in the person of Turkmenbashi's son, Murad, may seek to carry on the line, in the spirit of the Aliyevs across the Caspian in Azerbaijan. Niyazov fils has a flashy bon vivant's reputation and access to his father's wealth. Another ambitious man is moving in as well, a former vice prime minister and minister of health named Gurbanguly Berdimuhammedov, who upon the news of the old man's death swiftly imprisoned his rival and constitutionally next-in-line, the parliament speaker, and declared himself acting president. A Turkmen opposition scattered all over the world may try to make a comeback. More likely, the defense and security force, who've closed the frontiers, will want to have their say in who takes over now.

Turkmenbashi brought his people low, and the fear and distrust won't leave the earth with him. But don't underestimate Turkmen yearning for liberty. In researching my last novel, I came across archival documents about rebellious Turkmen tribes enslaved by the Russians in the 19th century and forced to lay railways in the desert. These men turned iron rails meant to go into the ground vertically up and tied three slippers between -- their symbol -- showing defiance for which they paid with their lives. So strong was their passion for freedom! Has the iron road of the communism and post-communism forever ironed this passion away?

Several years ago, when I visited Turkmenistan, I decided to go to Turkmenbashi's giant mosque and pray for these men, who lay buried nearby. We drove in unbearable heat to the mosque, which lies a few dozen miles from Ashgabat in the desert. Suddenly, in the middle of nowhere, we came across thousands of schoolchildren brought by military trucks, standing under the ruthless sun along the road holding up bunches of flowers. In spite of the absurdity of their situation, they were full of joy and life. "Is there a foreign delegation passing by?" I asked my driver, aware of Soviet customs. "No, he goes for his lunch," he answered matter-of-factly.

This past Sunday, when the body of the same man was driven by the same route to be buried in a mausoleum next to Central Asia's biggest mosque, somber soldiers lined the road, holding rifles and guns in their hands, this time in a forcefully monolithic and faceless row. I immediately thought: "These must be those schoolchildren again . . ."

Thai Insurgency Targets Buddhists (WT)

By Richard Ehrlich

The Washington Times, December 29, 2006

BANGKOK -- Buddhists are fleeing their homes in southern Thailand in the face of an increasingly militant Muslim insurgency that has begun calling for an independent and pure Islamist nation in the impoverished region bordering Malaysia.

What began as an indigenous protest against heavy-handed rule from the mainly Buddhist capital, Bangkok, has developed into a battle reflecting extremism in Iraq and Afghanistan, including beheadings and the burning of schools.

"This land must be separated between Muslims and the nonbelievers. This land must be liberated, and an Islamic system must be its foundation," warned a leaflet recently distributed in the south that the Thai military showed to reporters.

"This is a land of war that is no different from Palestine and Afghanistan," said the leaflet, signed by an obscure jihadist group known as the Islamic Warriors of Pattani State.

"This land is not the land of the Thais, but the land of Fathoni Darulsalam," it said, using an old Arabic name for the mainly Muslim region of southern Thailand.

Other fliers instruct Muslims not to buy or benefit financially from lands abandoned by Buddhists, saying the properties will be distributed to needy Malays once the region is liberated from the "occupying Siamese," according to a Bangkok newspaper, the Nation.

DOJ_NMG_0110179

Authorities say 1,730 persons have died in three years of unrest, more than 1,000 of them Muslims, including many killed by confused and poorly disciplined government forces. Others were killed as a warning to other Muslims not to cooperate with the government.

The dead also include about 680 Buddhists who appear to have been slaughtered to disrupt their work and frighten other Buddhists into leaving, according to the respected Prince of Songkhla University in Pattani.

The killers' tactics have grown increasingly brutal, including the decapitation of 25 persons since 2004.

Insurgents also assassinate saffron-robed Buddhist monks who collect alms during barefoot walks through villages and towns, even when armed troops escort the clergymen.

Shocked by the sight of blood-splattered monks sprawled in the street and reports of nearby assaults, about 200 Buddhist villagers in Yala province have fled.

Carrying meager belongings, they clustered in Buddhist temples, grateful for sacks of supplies sent by Queen Sirikit, and hoping for financial compensation and resettlement.

Military efforts against the ethnic Malay insurgents have been ineffective, and negotiations have been hindered because the rebels refuse to identify their leaders. Bangkok is now worried that the shadowy force will hoist flags above a self-declared "Islamic Pattani Nation," further demoralizing security forces and Thailand's 64 million people.

"If the situation is left like this, in three years, we'll see a new country in the deep south," said Prasit Meksuwan, an adviser to the south's Teachers Federation, which is encouraging Buddhist teachers not to flee.

Schools have become a favored target of the insurgents, who complain that the institutions tell lies about the three southern provinces -- Pattani, Yala and Narathiwat -- which formed part of an independent Malay kingdom before Thailand annexed the rubber-rich region about 100 years ago.

The Malay-speaking Islamists also oppose the schools' curriculum, which absorbs youngsters into a modern Thai-speaking society, obedient to a god-free Buddhist philosophy and Bangkok's monarchy. They demand that the schools focus instead on lessons gleaned from the Koran.

The government has given guns and training to hundreds of teachers who are willing to stay in rebel-infiltrated zones, while soldiers transport teachers to and from well-guarded schools. But more than 1,000 isolated schools shut down at the beginning of a term last month.

During one of the assaults last month, a 48-year-old teacher was shot and burned to death at his school in Pattani province while colleagues and students watched in horror.

China Estimates Growth In 2006 Was Likely 10.5% (WSJ)

By Tracy Zheng And Victoria Ruan

The Wall Street Journal, December 29, 2006

BEIJING -- China's economy is likely to have expanded 10.5% in 2006, the chief economist of the National Bureau of Statistics said yesterday.

The estimate is in line with the government's recent forecast. China's gross domestic product grew 10.2% in 2005.

Yao Jingyuan, the senior official of the statistics bureau, said at a financial forum that the combined value of China's imports and exports likely rose 25% in 2006 to $1.7 trillion.

Mr. Yao's forecast suggests economic growth slowed slightly but remained rapid in the fourth quarter. The economy surged 10.7% in the first three quarters from the same period a year ago.

In 2006, China's government took a series of measures to prevent the economy from overheating, such as interest-rate rises and increases in banks' deposit-reserve-requirement ratio to curb excessive liquidity and rapid growth in fixed-asset investment.

Mr. Yao said the economy will likely maintain a "fast and steady growth" in 2007, with the growth rate likely to slow to around 10%.

He cautioned that the economy is still facing risks of overheating. However, the government should also guard against any big slowdown in growth, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0110180

There are still a few prominent problems in the economy, such as "overly high credit growth, excessively rapid investment growth, and a large trade surplus," he said.

Mr. Yao said he expects China's trade surplus, which hit a few monthly record highs in 2006, to total $170 billion, up from $102 billion in 2005.

"While credit growth has stabilized a bit in the third quarter, it remains at a high level," said Mr. Yao, who predicted that new yuan loans will total three trillion yuan ($384 billion) for 2006. That would exceed the 2.5 trillion yuan annual target for new yuan loans set by the central bank at the beginning of the year.

Industrial output is likely to have grown 17%, faster than an 11.4% rise in the previous year, Mr. Yao said.

Retail sales are likely to have risen 13% to seven trillion yuan in 2006, he said. That would be basically unchanged from 12.9% growth in 2005.

He also estimated China's urban fixed-asset investment likely grew by 26% to 27%, compared with the previous year's urban FAI growth of 27.2%.

New Chief At U.N. Offers New Chance For Change (USAT)

USA Today, December 29, 2006

At the United Nations this weekend, it's out with the old and in with the new. At midnight on Dec. 31, Ban Ki Moon of South Korea takes over from Kofi Annan of Ghana as secretary-general.

Ban, 62, inherits a world body plagued by corruption scandals and at odds with its largest contributor, the United States.

His biggest immediate challenge is to restore the U.N.'s credibility. His biggest obstacle is that, like the Queen of England, his job comes with a big microphone and minimal power.

Unlike the CEO of a company, the U.N. secretary-general has little hiring and firing authority. He depends on a high-level board (the Security Council) to make major decisions and on the U.N.'s 192 members (the General Assembly) to endorse structural and other changes.

Though the challenges cry out for a strong and authoritative figure, Ban's reputation is that of a self-effacing bureaucrat. The United States and other Security Council members who chose him — and who wouldn't relish their interests being forcefully challenged — hope he will be, as the Economist magazine put it, more "secretary" than "general."

Even so, Ban's mission is not impossible. To rebuild trust in the U.N., he could start by:

•Focusing on making the U.N. bureaucracy more accountable. Fitful reform efforts and several reports by Congress have identified where the inefficiency, incompetence and corruption lie. Some of it has been addressed by axing jobs, closing several U.N. information centers and creating an ethics committee. But that's just a beginning.

An investigation, led by former Federal Reserve chief Paul Volcker, into the kickback-plagued Iraqi oil-for-food program highlighted failures of leadership and supervision by Annan. Ban could make it a cause to shine the spotlight on waste, mismanagement and inefficiency. That would help establish his authority and placate critics.

•Making a new diplomatic push to halt the genocide in Sudan's Darfur region. Though stopping the slaughter there is a priority of the U.N. and the United States, both have been stymied. The Security Council authorized the deployment of U.N. peacekeepers, but Sudan's leaders won't let them in. It can take months or years to persuade countries to provide and fund peacekeepers.

Ban could start gathering troops for quick deployment if and when Sudan's leaders accept them. China has been maddeningly ambivalent about which is more important: its major oil interests in Sudan or its desire to be seen as upholding responsibilities befitting an emerging power. A request from Ban for troops could make it choose.

Ban's predecessor began his decade-long tenure amid high hopes but ends with a mixed record. Annan, 68, and the U.N. won the Nobel Peace Prize in 2001 for "their work for a better organized and more peaceful world." But he soon faced growing problems: the Iraq war, which he opposed, the oil-for-food scandal and deteriorating relations with the Bush administration and U.S. conservatives who called for his dismissal.

His greatest achievements were enshrining a U.N. responsibility to protect civilians when their rulers cannot or will not, and his fights against poverty and AIDS. His final years were notable more for speeches — often ill-considered, particularly when attacking the United States, which supplies nearly a quarter of the U.N. budget — than for the kind of staff supervision and back-channel cajoling needed to effect real change.

Six weeks after Annan took the job, he complained that he was being criticized for not yet reforming the United Nations. The Russian ambassador joked that he had already had more time than God did to create the heavens and the earth. Yes, agreed Annan, but God had one big advantage: He worked alone, without a General Assembly, a Security Council and the committees.

The anecdote shows the limitations the new secretary-general faces. If Ban can work successfully within them, an increasingly dangerous world will be better off.

The Other War (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 29, 2006

Stories about AIDS and malaria don't typically carry good news, but 2006 was a year of progress on both fronts thanks to some new thinking about how foreign aid can best be spent.

The White House held a malaria summit this month, and the message was one of accountability, not just spending more money. The U.S. malaria initiative targets 15 of the hardest hit countries in Africa with the goal of cutting mortality rates in half. The plan is to spend $1.2 billion over five years on indoor insecticide spraying, bed nets and medicines to combat a preventable disease that kills a million people in the Third World each year. An additional goal is to work with the private sector; the Gates Foundation and ExxonMobil are among those taking the lead.

"Transparency" and "accountability" are not terms heard often today in discussions of global health; the focus usually is on how much money is being spent. "We are insisting on measuring," President Bush said at the summit. "We can determine whether or not nets are being distributed or medicine is being provided. But more important, we can measure whether or not we're saving lives."

This emphasis may seem obvious. Yet it's long been neglected by aid organizations -- including the U.S. Agency for International Development -- and has led to such travesties as the conscious distribution of ineffective anti-malarial drugs. Another problem has been an unwillingness among global health groups to pursue such politically incorrect measures as indoor spraying of the insecticide DDT, the cheapest and most effective weapon against malaria. Admiral Tim Ziemer, the U.S. malaria coordinator, says the U.S. will promote DDT spraying to fight the disease.

This malaria effort builds on successes in dealing with AIDS, particularly in light of new evidence that malaria tends to increase the HIV viral load that causes AIDS. Since Mr. Bush launched his $15 billion plan for AIDS relief in 2003, the U.S. has provided life-saving antiretroviral drugs for 822,000 people -- a number growing by 50,000 a month -- while providing care for another 4.5 million people such as AIDS orphans. That's still only a fraction of the 39 million HIV infections world-wide, 62% of them in sub-Saharan Africa. But as U.S. AIDS relief coordinator Mark Dybul says, this is "as much as all other developed countries combined."

Here too, the work has been distinguished by a focus on what Dr. Dybul calls "a culture of accountability." The U.S. global AIDS bureaucracy, previously divided along country and bureaucratic lines, now has a uniform funding and administrative approach. The U.S. has also insisted on regular reporting requirements from its overseas partners, 80% of which are private or non-governmental organizations.

At the HIV clinic of South Africa's McCord Hospital, for instance, a computer-based monitoring and evaluation system allowed doctors to notice abnormal fatality rates among overweight, middle-aged female patients on the antiretroviral Stavudine. The drug was discontinued, the problem was eliminated and the rest of the hospital adopted the reporting system. As a result of such efforts focused on behavior modification, at least some African countries are beginning to see sustained reductions in HIV infection rates: 10% in Botswana, 23% in Zimbabwe, 30% in Kenya.

That won't be close to enough to save every HIV-infected person, and matters haven't been helped by the fashionable demonization of the drug industry, which has led to resistance to antiretrovirals in places like South Africa. But what the Bush Administration is showing with AIDS and malaria is that a well managed effort can save millions from an early grave.

Middle East Exodus Part Deux (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 29, 2006

IN BLAMING AN exodus of Christians from the Middle East on the "short-sightedness and ignorance" that led to the war in Iraq, the spiritual head of the Church of England has identified a part — but only a part — of the sad phenomenon he rightly decries.

In a Christmas-season column published in the Times of London, Archbishop of Canterbury Rowan Williams notes that opponents of the Iraq war had warned that Western military action "would put Christians in the whole Middle East at risk." Williams says that events since the 2003 invasion of Iraq, including the departure from Iraq of thousands of Christians, have made prophets of war critics. "The first Christian believers were Middle Easterners," Williams writes. "It's a very sobering thought that we might live to see the last native Christian believers in the region."

There is some truth in Williams' sermon. Under Saddam Hussein, Iraq was relatively tolerant of its Christian minority (one of his chief advisors, Tarik Aziz, was a Chaldean Catholic). Now the growing power of Muslim militias in Iraq — and the dislocations that are part of any war — have contributed to a departure of Christians from a country in which they have ancient roots.

Iraq isn't the only nation in which Christians, affluent and poor alike, have come to depend on the sufferance of a political strongman. The same is true of Syria and of Egypt, where portraits of President Hosni Mubarak in church vestibules reflect the fact that his regime is viewed by many Christians as a buffer against the sort of Islamic extremism that has been stoked by the war in Iraq.

Yet Williams' critique is selective, and he undermines its credibility further by coupling his comments about Iraq with a denunciation of the "security fence" built by Israel to protect Israelis from terrorist attacks. The fence is no substitute for an Israeli-Palestinian peace agreement, and Williams is correct that the barrier has exacerbated the plight of Palestinians, including Christians, in Bethlehem.

Palestinian Christians, like their Muslim neighbors, have suffered under an often heavy-handed Israeli occupation. But Israel has not declared war on Christianity, as have some Muslim extremists, and it has a generally good record of safeguarding Christian holy places. And Israeli occupation persists in part because the Palestinian government, controlled by the Islamic Hamas party, refuses to recognize Israel's right to exist. Hamas itself undoubtedly alienates many Palestinian Christians, who played a significant role in the secular Palestine Liberation Organization.

Preachers take pride in speaking the truth, and there is some truth in Williams' excoriation of the West and Israel for the departure of Christians from the Middle East. But it's not the whole truth.

TERRORISM NEWS:

5 From Lackawanna Six Sent To Indiana Prison (BUFFNEWS)

By Dan Herbeck, News Staff Reporter

Buffalo News, December 29, 2006

Five of the six members of the Lackawanna Six have been transferred to a federal prison in Indiana, and their families are trying to find out why.

Their attorneys confirmed Wednesday that Shafal A. Mosed, 28; Mukhtar al-Bakri, 26; Yasein A. Taher, 29; Faysal H. Galab, 30; and Sahim Alwan, 34; were all recently moved to the Federal Correctional Institution in Terre Haute, Ind. The U.S. Bureau of Prisons also verified that the men are being held there.

Family members of the five men are upset because most of them were held previously in facilities much closer to Western New York. Now family members will have to drive 570 miles - more than nine hours - to visit the convicted conspirators in Terre Haute. They also could take a flight to Indianapolis, about 70 miles from Terre Haute.

Some supporters of the men wonder if the move is part of a government effort to toughen the punishment they already are receiving for traveling to Afghanistan and training with the al-Qaida terrorist group.

"They were all snatched up and moved [earlier this month]," said Alwan's attorney, James P. Harrington. "This makes it extraordinarily hard for their families to visit them. From what we understand, their telephone and visitation time are being drastically cut, too."

Harrington and other defense attorneys are trying to find out the reason for the move and whether it is punitive.

Harrington said he has heard that the government wants to keep all federal prisoners from terrorism-related prosecutions in one facility.

"This is very unusual, because the Bureau of Prisons rarely puts multiple defendants from one criminal case in the same prison," said Galab's attorney, Joseph M. LaTona. "They usually keep them separated."

Aside from verifying that the five men are at the medium-security prison in Terre Haute, U.S. Bureau of Prisons officials had no comment on the move Wednesday. A prison spokesman, Michael Truman, said he was unaware of any plan to move all the convicts from terrorism-related cases to one facility.

The medium-security prison is part of the Terre Haute Federal Correctional Complex, which also includes a high-security institution and the nation's only federal death row and execution center, which the prison calls its "special confinement unit." Oklahoma City bomber Timothy J. McVeigh, a native of Pendleton, was put to death at Terre Haute in June 2001.

About 3,000 inmates are confined at the complex, authorities said.

President Bush and members of his administration have often cited the Lackawanna Six as a major success story in the fight against terrorism in the United States.

But critics have assailed the government for imprisoning men for "thought crimes" or "crimes of association."

The six men had traveled to Afghanistan prior to Sept. 11, 2001, and trained at a terrorist camp under the supervision of Osama bin Laden, architect of the 9/11 terrorist strikes.

The Lackawanna men have repeatedly denied they had any intention of taking part in any terrorist act.

Ultimately, five pleaded guilty to providing material support to al-Qaida. Galab pleaded guilty to a lesser charge of engaging in a transaction with prohibited individuals.

When the six men agreed to plead guilty in 2003, sentencing Judge William M. Skretny and the U.S. Justice Department agreed to recommend that they be held in prisons as close as possible to Western New York.

"It's very disconcerting that, after the judge and prosecutors agreed to do that, the prison system now seems to be ignoring it," said Mosed's attorney, Patrick J. Brown.

The whereabouts of the sixth man who traveled to Afghanistan - Yahya A. Goba, 29 - are a mystery. He is the only one of the six no longer listed on the "inmate locater" on the Bureau of Prisons Web site.

Officials of the bureau said they could not comment when asked whether Goba is in protective custody or the witness-protection program because of assistance he has given to the government.

Goba was identified by the government as one of the leaders and organizers of the al-Qaida trip. In court papers filed in 2003, a prosecutor said Goba had provided extensive help and detail on al-Qaida's "leaders, trainers and recruits."

Goba's attorney, Marianne Mariano of the federal public defender's office, was out of town and could not be reached Wednesday.

Galab is scheduled to be the first of the Lackawanna group to be released from federal prison, sometime in January 2009, but he could be freed several months sooner if his prison behavior is good.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Report Chides FBI Handling Of OKC Bombing (WFTV)

WFTV-TV, December 29, 2006

OKLAHOMA CITY -- Nearly a dozen years after the Oklahoma City bombing, another chapter has closed in its investigation.

A complete congressional report was released this week. In the report, investigators chastised the FBI for how it handled the investigation of the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building bombing on April 19, 1995.

Among the report's conclusions:

"The original date of the 2001 execution of Timothy McVeigh was postponed by 30 days, following the belated discovery of more than 3000 documents. The files related primarily to the question of John Doe Two and eyewitness sightings. These documents did not raise significant doubt about McVeigh's guilt. Their disappearance, nevertheless, demonstrated that, despite multiple admonitions from the presiding judge and reassurances from law enforcement, the authorities missed key files in what was then the most prominent case in US legal history. We know now they even missed a second stash of explosives hidden in the Nichols house."

"A close look at the findings of this subcommittee suggests that it is reasonable to question if all leads were thoroughly pursued, all evidence gathered and properly analyzed. While the desire of most of the victims' families for swift justice is understandable, with the benefit of hindsight, the McVeigh execution should have been further delayed until there was greater consensus on the subject of John Doe Two. As is clear by their documents (which the Oversight and Investigations Subcommittee has had access to for the first time), his own defense team had significant internal doubts about McVeigh's candor with them on this subject. His only failure on a polygraph test involved his response to a question on whether he had additional help with the bombing. The question persists, and the only person who might have shed light on it is gone."

"We have found no conclusive evidence of a foreign connection, but there remain questions that need to be answered before this final chapter can justifiably be closed. This investigation determined that many pieces of so-called evidence backing various theories of a foreign involvement were not based in fact."

Two Who Tried McVeigh, Nichols Vouch For FBI's Diligence (DENP)

By Howard Pankratz, Denver Post Staff Writer

DOJ_NMG_0110187

Denver Post, December 29, 2006

Two former federal prosecutors who tried Oklahoma City bombers Timothy McVeigh and Terry Nichols said Wednesday that they disagreed with a report by a congressional subcommittee slamming the FBI for failing to follow up on potential leads.

One of McVeigh's defense lawyers also said he placed little credibility in the report by the House International Relations investigative subcommittee. A second McVeigh lawyer, however, said he agreed with the report's speculation that foreign conspirators might have been involved.

The report said the leads might have shown that an international conspiracy was behind the Oklahoma City bombing. It found no conclusive evidence of a foreign connection but said questions remained.

"I saw the report online and said, 'Oh my goodness, this is old news,'" said former prosecutor Larry Mackey of Indianapolis, who is skiing in Colorado. "Every question raised by the report was researched thoroughly."

Denver lawyer Nathan Chambers, who represented McVeigh in the months before he was executed, said McVeigh repeatedly made public statements that the bombing was a homegrown operation.

"I'm very suspicious of claims of an international conspiracy," Chambers said. "I never saw any evidence that convinced me that was true."

Sean Connelly, a Denver-based lawyer who prosecuted Nichols and McVeigh, said the FBI did "an exceptionally thorough" job in investigating any foreign links to the bombing. He said the FBI concluded that the bomb plot was limited to McVeigh and Nichols with their acquaintance Michael Fortier, who had some knowledge of the plans.

But Stephen Jones, the lawyer who represented McVeigh during the Denver trial, said he believes the circle of conspirators extended beyond Nichols, McVeigh and Fortier to others both in the U.S. and abroad.

He said he believes McVeigh played a relatively minor role.

"I think the evidence established that Mr. McVeigh's role was not a leadership role, but it was - as the term is used - a mule role," Jones said.

The subcommittee, headed by Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif., cited four shortcomings of the investigation:

The FBI was not justified in calling off any further investigation into the existence of John Doe 2, a man witnesses said they saw with McVeigh before the bombing.

The FBI didn't thoroughly investigate potential involvement of an Iraqi living in Oklahoma City and a German national living in northeastern Oklahoma.

Authorities erred in allowing McVeigh to move forward the time of his execution while major questions remained.

The FBI didn't look closely enough at the phone records of Ramzi Yousef, who masterminded the bombing of the World Trade Center in 1993.

The report noted phone calls Yousef allegedly made in the months before the 1993 bombing to a Filipina neighbor and close friend of Terry Nichols' in-laws in Queens, N.Y.

Rohrabacher said his subcommittee "found no conclusive evidence of a foreign connection, but there remain questions that need to be answered before this final chapter can justifiably be closed.

"This investigation determined that many pieces of so- called evidence backing various theories of foreign involvement were not based in fact. ... The overall assessment is inconclusive on the varied theories."

Exclusive: Unabomber's Secret Code Cracked (KPIX)

KPIX-TV, December 29, 2006

(CBS 5) SAN FRANCISCO A decade after the feds tracked him down, CBS 5 Investigates has uncovered exclusive new information about Unabomber Ted Kaczynski, including a secret code he developed, and the confessions revealed as the code is broken.

When Federal Bureau of Investigation agents swooped down on Kaczynski's Montana cabin in 1996, they found much more than they expected, according to lead agent Max Noel.

There were "lots of writings, lots of journals, lots of notebooks," recalled Noel, now retired.

Among them, he said, was one notebook in particular that interested all of the agents at the scene because "it just contained lots of numbers," according to Noel.

Noel believes Kaczynski wrote in code out of concern that someone might break into his cabin and discover his current and past activities, which may have included plans for future attacks.

"I thoroughly believe that he was going to begin a much more prolific bombing attack," he said.

The FBI eventually found itself trying to unscramble a code that the National Security Agency would later describe as one of the more sophisticated codes it had ever seen, said Noel.

In fact, it was a code that could not be broken at all until, searching through Kaczynski's cabin, FBI agents found Kaczynski's own key to unmasking the hidden messages.

CBS 5 Investigates has obtained portions of that key along with the Unabomber's coded writings.

The coded writings initially appear to be sets of numbers, commas, and spaces placed in random order. But they are actually part of a very complex mathematical code, also called a cipher.

"It's very clear that this isn't a normal cipher," said Bruce Schneier, a nationally known expert on cryptography who was asked to review photos of the writings.

Schneier described the code as so complicated that "it would not surprise me if this was the most complex cipher the FBI has seen since World War II."

Schneier said with that code, Kaczynski could certainly be successful in keeping information away from the authorities.

But Kaczynski succeeded only up to a point.

Agents discovered the first of many clues to solving the puzzle in one of Kaczynski's notebooks, on a page labeled, "Unscrambling Sequence."

On the handwritten page, arrows appear to show the direction that a page packed with numbers should be read. Then, in a complex series of decoding steps that Kaczynski calls "phases," numbers are added, subtracted, and married, revealing a new set of numbers that translate to letters and word fragments.

"This clearly takes many steps," Schneier said. "Four steps are listed here, and that's not all. There are at least six steps and could be even more then that."

The FBI's decoding of the notebook revealed a virtual catalog of destruction.

Kaczynski's comments on one page, translated, discussed his feelings about one bombing this way:

"I sent a bomb to a computer expert ... revenge attempts have been gobbling much time, impeding other work. But I must succeed, must get revenge."

Another note translated into a discussion of a July 2, 1982 bombing at the University of California at Berkeley, where Kaczynski said, "I went to U. of California Berkeley and placed in Computer Science Building a bomb consisting of a pipebomb in a gallon can of gasoline."

On another page, Kaczynski described his failed attempt to blow up a commercial airplane on Nov. 15, 1979, saying, "I constructed device ... rigged barometer so device would explode at 2000 ft."

Noel said decoding the notebook led to terrible but important revelations.

"The contents of that small notebook was a detailed confession of all of the past bombings that had been attributed to the Unabomber," Noel said.

Kaczynski's own notes indicate he did not want people to be able to read those confessions.

Some speculate he may have wanted authorities to find the key later if he was killed or captured in order to take credit for his acts.

Idaho Professor Charged With Making Hoax In Bankruptcy Case (SDUT/AP)

By Jennifer Dobner, Associated Press

The San Diego Union-Tribune, December 29, 2006

SALT LAKE CITY – An Idaho professor was charged with falsely claiming that he had mailed a dangerous substance to a trustee overseeing his bankruptcy case in Utah, federal authorities said Thursday.

Thomas Hale warned the trustee Nov. 16 that she would be exposed to hantavirus, a potentially fatal disease passed through rodent droppings, prosecutors said.

But after a six-hour exam, the white substance turned out to be baby powder, said Dennis McKone, assistant to the Salt Lake City fire chief.

Hale, 61, pleaded not guilty in federal court Thursday, two days after he was arrested at Salt Lake City International Airport after a flight from Chicago.

He is a history professor at Idaho State University in Pocatello, Idaho, and owns a house in Salt Lake City. In October 2005, Hale filed for Chapter 13 bankruptcy protection, which allowed him to propose a plan to pay his creditors.

A judge, however, rejected the plan, converted the case to Chapter 7 and appointed trustee Elizabeth Loveridge to control Hale's finances.

A three-count indictment charges Hale with committing a hoax with the threat of a dangerous substance, giving a false statement in the bankruptcy case, and concealing his ownership of the Salt Lake City home, which he was selling for $395,000.

The hoax charge carries a maximum penalty of 30 years in prison. The others each carry a five-year maximum punishment.

DOJ_NMG_0110189

Hale sent Loveridge a fax telling her that he planned to send bankruptcy documents and a hazardous substance, the FBI said.

Loveridge received the envelope on Nov. 20 and contacted Salt Lake City police. A bomb squad and the fire department's hazardous-materials team took the envelope and found it contained nothing harmful, FBI spokesman O. Scott Wall said.

Loveridge declined to comment. Hale has been a professor at Idaho State for 23 years.

The school issued a statement, saying the allegations "did not appear to be connected with Hale's employment."

"The university will respond appropriately as more information becomes available," Idaho State said.

Utah FBI Agents Arrest And Charge Idaho Professor For Bankruptcy, Hantavirus Hoax (KTVX)

KTVX-TV, December 29, 2006

An Idaho State University professor is in hot water for allegedly mailing a false biological agent to an attorney overseeing his bankruptcy case.

Thomas Francis Hale, a history professor with 34 years of tenure at ISU, is accused of sending an envelope with some sort of substance to Elizabeth Loveridge at her downtown law office November 20th, 2006.

Federal investigators say Hale sent a fax, warning to the bankruptcy attorney several days before warning her to "beware" of hazardous materials coming in the mail, and that envelope would include the deadly Hantavirus. Days later an orange envelope arrived. In it was a substance, experts later determined it was not harmful.

The FBI says they quickly tracked the fax back to Hale.

Hale filed for bankruptcy in 1996 and Loveridge was appointed trustee over the case. Investigators say she later determined that Hale had lied about his assets.

On December 28th a federal judge ordered that Hale be released from jail pending trial. He was released with conditions, including that he undergo a mental evaluation.

Professor Charged In Hantavirus Hoax (SLT)

By Michael N. Westley And Jeremiah Stettler, The Salt Lake Tribune

Salt Lake Tribune, December 29, 2006

His lawyer says claiming to mail hazardous material is inappropriate, not criminal

An Idaho State University history professor appeared before a federal magistrate Thursday on charges he mailed an envelope to a bankruptcy trustee claiming it may contain the deadly hantavirus.

Thomas Francis Hale, 61, was indicted earlier this month by a federal grand jury, accused of providing false information and perpetrating a hoax regarding a hazardous material, filing a false bankruptcy oath and concealment of property.

The indictment, unsealed Thursday, accuses Hale of attempting to hide a home he owns in Salt Lake City near 2000 South and 1000 East from bankruptcy proceedings and lying about that ownership while under oath.

The document also states that Hale sent an envelope Nov. 16 to a federal bankruptcy trustee warning that its contents - a plastic bag containing a brown substance - may harbor hantavirus, a disease usually spread by rodent feces.

The trustee never opened the envelope. Hale had told her in an earlier fax that he was mailing a hazardous material, authorities say.

A bomb squad seized the package and discovered a note wrapped around a plastic bag that read, "Termites or hantavirus from mice?" prosecutors said. Laboratory tests revealed no hazardous materials, according to the FBI.

Hale's attorney, Larry Keller, said his client simply was seeking redress for an unresolved termite and mice problem. He said the act was "inappropriate" in today's terrorism-charged climate, but not criminal.

Agents arrested the Idaho man Tuesday at the Salt Lake City International Airport after Hale arrived on a flight from Chicago. He was booked into the Salt Lake County jail.

Hale, a tenured professor and attorney, has taught history at Idaho State University for 23 years, according to ISU officials. He is scheduled to teach three classes next semester, including courses on the French Revolution and the foundations of Western civilizations.

ISU Provost Robert A. Wharton said the university has not taken action against Hale or changed its class schedule. Officials need more information first.

"We are just gathering information and considering our options right now," he said.

Wharton declined to comment on whether Hale has been the subject of past disciplinary actions or investigations. Authorities say the professor has no criminal history.

Despite arguments by U.S. Attorney Trina A. Higgins that Hale is a "danger to the community" and should be detained until his trial in March - a position she justified because of the hantavirus threat - U.S. Magistrate Judge Paul Warner ordered his release late Thursday.

The decision hinged on the six-week gap between Hale's alleged threat and the filing of criminal charges. If the professor were dangerous, Warner asked, why didn't authorities apprehend him immediately?

Hale pleaded not guilty to all three charges Thursday and now plans to return home to Pocatello. Warner has set a three-day trial for March 5 before U.S. District Judge Ted Stewart.

If convicted, Hale could face up to 20 years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office in Salt Lake City.

Idaho Professor Is Accused Of Hantavirus Hoax (DESERET)

By Ben Winslow, Deseret Morning News

Deseret Morning News, December 29, 2006

Federal prosecutors said the fax suggested that federal bankruptcy trustee Elizabeth Loveridge should check out the "Hazmat" that would be coming in an orange envelope.

Thomas Hale That was Nov. 16. A few days later, an envelope arrived with the word "caution" written on it.

Inside, federal prosecutors allege, Idaho State University history professor Thomas Francis Hale sent a note that said "Termites or hantavirus from mice?"

"It was wrapped around a baggie containing small, brown, mouse poopy-type things," assistant U.S. Attorney Trina Higgins said Thursday, adding that it was not hantavirus but was believed to be termites.

The note is part of a federal indictment handed down against Hale, 61, charging him with making the phony hantavirus hoax, lying to federal authorities and hiding assets during bankruptcy proceedings. The indictment was unsealed on Thursday.

Hale was arrested by the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force on Tuesday at the Salt Lake City International Airport after stepping off a flight from Chicago.

"He was surprised to be arrested," FBI Special Agent-in-Charge Tim Fuhrman said.

However, Hale's attorney offered a surprising explanation for the hantavirus scare. The tenants of a property Hale owned in Salt Lake City's Sugar House neighborhood had said there were termites in the basement and he had sent a sample to Loveridge, who had been placed in charge of his financial matters by the bankruptcy court.

"He was saying, 'Here is something you should look at,'" attorney Larry Keller told the judge. "Not 'I'm going to kill you.' Why would he put his name and address on it?"

Keller said Hale had been frustrated with Loveridge and believed she was mismanaging his affairs. A hearing on that issue is scheduled next month in U.S. Bankruptcy Court.

Federal prosecutors countered that Hale would show up at her office, barge past the receptionist and confront her about his case. The U.S. Attorney's Office alleges that Hale also lied about the value of his property — claiming it was valued at $190,000 and then trying to sell it for $395,000.

Keller questioned why the FBI waited more than a month to arrest his client.

"If I'm a terrorist and I threaten somebody, they're going to want to get me off the streets right away," he said.

Higgins responded that they were waiting for the test results to show if the substance was really hantavirus, a rare and potentially deadly disease spread by mouse droppings.

During a pair of appearances before U.S. Magistrate Judge Paul Warner, Hale sat quietly in his seat. He pleaded not guilty to the charges and a three-day jury trial was set for March 5.

"I find counsel's explanation to be ... interesting," Warner said.

The magistrate judge ordered Hale to be released from the Salt Lake County Jail but then dressed down Hale with a number of conditions of release — including that he have no contact with Loveridge except through her attorney and that he undergo mental health therapy.

"Ms. Loveridge is very frightened," Higgins said.

Hale is a history professor at Idaho State University in Pocatello, where he has taught for 23 years. He is also a lawyer who operates a legal clinic dispensing advice to indigent people.

Federal authorities contend Hale wanted to send a message.

"He clearly wanted to register some type of objection to his bankruptcy proceeding," Fuhrman said.

The charge of providing false information and perpetrating a hoax is a fairly recent one, arising out of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and the anthrax scares that happened shortly afterward, the FBI said.

FBI Investigates Paradise Man For Alleged Threats (PARAPOST)

Paradise (CA) Post, December 29, 2006

A Paradise man is being held in Sacramento in relation to alleged threats made to hotels, Jewish museums, and other locations. According to a Department of Justice press release, a federal grand jury returned a nine-count indictment Thursday charging Scott R. Hudson, 52, with making a series of threatening phone calls between August and November of this year. Hudson was arrested on Dec. 20.

The FBI is investigating the case with the help of police departments in New York City, Rochester, Minn., Philadelphia, Penn. and Riverside and Irvine.

Assistant United States Attorney Benjamin B. Wagner, who is prosecuting the case, said Hudson is charged with calling in bomb threats to two hotels in New York City, making threatening calls to a Rabbi in Long Beach, New York, the National Museum of American Jewish History in Philadelphia and a Jewish congregation in Irvine.

He also allegedly made threatening calls to a graduate school in Minnesota. According to the indictment he threatened to shoot people and to burn down or blow up various buildings. Other documents in the case allege Hudson made calls to a church in Riverside and threatened to kill the pastor.

He is charged with seven counts of threatening

the use of fire or explosives, each of which carries a maximum possible sentence of 10 years in prison and a $250,000 fine and two counts of threatening communications, each of which carries a maximum of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

The actual sentence will be determined at the discretion of the court after consideration of the Federal Sentencing Guidelines, which take into account a number of variables, and any applicable statutory sentencing factors.

The press release also indicated Hudson had previously been convicted of similar conduct. In 2001, he pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court in Sacramento to making a telephone call to Arizona and threatened to kill a player for the Arizona Diamondbacks baseball team. He served a total of 34 months on that conviction.

The new charges are only accusations, noted the United States Attorney's Office, and the defendant is presumed innocent until and unless proven guilty beyond a reasonable doubt.

Messages To Spies Are Coded But Not Hidden (WP)

By James Gordon Meek

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

It turns out that anybody can tune in to the world's top spy agencies talking to operatives. All you need is a cheap shortwave-radio receiver, the kind available at any drugstore.

Tune it to 6855 or 8010 kHz.

On the hour, you might hear a girlish voice repeating strings of numbers monotonously in Spanish. "Nueve, uno, nueve, tres, cinco-cinco, cuatro, cinco, tres, dos . . .," went one seemingly harmless message heard last month on a Grundig radio.

It was the Cuban Intelligence Directorate or Russian FSB broadcasting coded instructions from Havana to spies inside the United States.

Turn the dial up to 11545 kHz, and you might hear a few notes of an obscure English folk song, "Lincolnshire Poacher," followed by a voice repeating strings of numbers. That's believed to be British Secret Intelligence Service, MI6, broadcasting from Cyprus.

On 6840 kHz, you may hear a voice reading groups of letters. That's a station nicknamed "E10," thought to be Israel's Mossad intelligence.

Chris Smolinski runs SpyNumbers.com and the "Spooks" e-mail list, where "number stations" hobbyists log hundreds of shortwave messages transmitted every month. "It's like a puzzle. They're mystery stations," explained Smolinski, who has tracked the spy broadcasts for 30 years.

While hobbyists guess at the meaning of each cryptic message or which spy service sent it, it's no mystery to intelligence officials, who confirmed the purpose is espionage.

The signals are too strong to be made by amateurs and are often on licensed frequencies. The State Department once complained to the Israeli Embassy in Washington that "E10" was blocking a U.S. broadcast, a source said.

"I can't imagine who else would waste the time in front of a microphone reading numbers" but a spy, said James Bamford, who has written about intelligence. Bamford calls number stations "simple but effective" spycraft.

"It's extremely effective," agreed a senior intelligence official. "If you have a one-time pad, the code can't be broken, and you can send out dummy broadcasts as much as you want to confuse your enemy."

A "one-time pad" is the key to unlocking coded shortwave messages that the CIA calls "one-way voice link."

It is low-risk because it's known only to the sender and the recipient and used just once before being destroyed, said retired CIA officer Tony Mendez.

Mendez said he would often imprint the code on microfilm or even a cigarette paper. Once inside the target country, a CIA operative could make a shortwave receiver out of simple materials. "The voices are not real people," he added. "They're computer-generated."

A CIA spokeswoman declined to comment.

One-time pads and coded radio began in World War I, said Thomas Boghardt, a historian at the International Spy Museum. Little has changed since, judging by recent espionage cases involving shortwave radios, including that of a man detained in Canada last month and accused of being a Russian spy.

In Miami last week, Carlos and Elsa Alvarez pleaded guilty to lesser charges after the United States accused them of spying for Cuba. A prosecutor alleged in a court hearing this summer that they received shortwave "messages in five-digit groupings." An FBI interview transcript shows Alvarez admitted going into his bathroom "on Fridays to listen at 11" for messages aimed at the couple, code-named "David" and "Deborah."

DNI Awards $2 Million In Hush-Hush Money (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte awarded $200,000 grants earlier this month to 10 scientists in the intelligence community, one of whom could not be named and several of whom declined to be interviewed, for projects whose details remain secret.

The DNI office issued a news release with nine of the recipients' names, agencies, job titles and educational backgrounds. One awardee's information was omitted "because of the sensitive position he occupies in his organization," the release said.

This is the second annual DNI Fellows award program. Last year's recipients, the release says, "made significant progress with technology to locate terrorists and to extract intelligence from remote areas."

How they did that remains secret.

"We want to keep that spark of innovation alive and healthy," said Eric C. Haseltine, associate director of national intelligence for science and technology, whose office selected the grant recipients.

But "we haven't talked yet about any specific things the fellows have done," he said.

The Department of Homeland Security and science and technology branches of intelligence agencies -- including the FBI, CIA, National Security Agency, National Reconnaissance Office, Defense Intelligence Agency and National Geospatial-Intelligence Agency -- nominated employees. The criteria, Haseltine said, are "first and foremost, virtuoso technical achievement," plus risk-taking, innovation and "teamwork, because sometimes virtuosos don't play well with others."

Playing well with reporters is not a criterion. All of the CIA awardees declined interviews; ditto for the NSA, whose spokesman, Ken White, said the agency's grantees are "not in a position of wanting to go there." Other fellows couldn't be located, or persuaded, by deadline.

"It's great news," said one agency representative, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because discussing the reasons for not discussing the projects could violate secrecy rules. "But because it's classified, you can't talk about it."

Last try: the Department of Homeland Security, which doesn't fall under the traditional intelligence structure. Its awardee, Michelle Keeney, was downright chatty about how she will spend her grant money.

"The plan is kind of generally to sponsor a research project on the evolution of radical movements over time and their adoption of violence as a strategy," she said, in order to document patterns of rhetoric or behavior -- such as acquisition of materials -- that could be used to predict a move toward violence in other groups.

"We want to really try and look at all movements that have occurred over history, make comparisons and contrast" them, Keeney said.

"It's not an intelligence exercise but a research project using information that is historically gathered in the public domain."

That's why she can talk about it.

Controversial Bush Appointee Leaving Government (MCT)

By Philip Dine, St. Louis Post-Dispatch

McClatchy Newspapers, December 29, 2006

WASHINGTON - Tracy Henke, the Missourian who stirred controversy in a top homeland security job, has left the government to join her former boss, John Ashcroft, at The Ashcroft Group.

DOJ_NMG_0110193

Earlier this year, President Bush appointed Henke to coordinate U.S. national-disaster and anti-terrorist efforts with state and local officials. Lawmakers of both parties questioned her experience, as well as Bush's bypassing of the Senate confirmation process.

But that criticism was nothing compared to the uproar when Henke, from Moscow Mills, Mo., decreased homeland security grants for New York and Washington, while increasing them for some smaller cities and towns.

"SHE GAVE US THE AX: New York's money cut by a woman from the sticks," complained a headline in The New York Daily News.

Rep. Peter King, R-N.Y., then-chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, said: "As far as I'm concerned, the Department of Homeland Security has declared war on New York City."

A Washington Post columnist blasted the decision to reduce funding for the two cities hit on Sept. 11 while increasing it for "those terrorism magnets of Kansas City and St. Louis - both by happenstance in Henke's home state of Missouri."

In a telephone interview this week from Moscow Mills, Henke said that though she had held several high-profile positions in government, she was taken aback by the criticism.

"One of the things that was surprising was the level of animosity and the personal attacks as it related to grant awards," she said.

She said even with the reductions, New York still got the most money of any city for homeland security. She also noted that Congress had provided $600 million less in homeland security funding than the year before, making some cuts necessary.

Henke, 37, cited two reasons for her departure:

_The chance to rejoin Ashcroft, for whom she had worked at the Justice Department when he was attorney general.

_A reorganization of homeland security functions, which would put her office under the Federal Emergency Management Agency early next year. Henke said she had neither the time nor the energy to oversee the changes.

Among her accomplishments, she said, was getting states and cities "to think more comprehensively about homeland security, more regionally."

Jim Carafano, an expert in homeland security at the Heritage Foundation, said Henke deserved praise, despite the public criticism.

"I think the office did great stuff, and they really swam upstream against, quite frankly, people who were quite interested in how much money they could get for their district, rather than looking at risk," Carafano said.

Henke left the department on Oct. 31 and joined Ashcroft's firm a few weeks ago. As a senior adviser, she will focus on homeland-security and criminal-justice issues.

"There will be much more consulting than lobbying; lobbying, however, might be part of it, depending on the needs," she said. The hours will certainly be "a little more normal," she said, noting that homeland security was a "seven-day-a-week job."

Depending on the nature of the Homeland Security reorganization, she may be exempted from prohibitions against lobbying her former agency, she said.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Considers Up To 20,000 More Troops For Iraq (NYT)

By David S. Cloud And Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 28 — The Bush administration is considering an increase in troop levels in Iraq of 17,000 to 20,000, which would be accomplished in part by delaying the departure of two Marine regiments now deployed in Anbar Province, Pentagon officials said Thursday.

The option was among those discussed in Crawford, Tex., on Thursday as President Bush met there with his national security team, and it has emerged as a likely course as he considers a strategy shift in Iraq, the officials said.

Most of the additional troops would probably be employed in and around Baghdad, the officials said.

With the continuing high levels of violence there, senior officials increasingly say additional American forces will be needed as soon as possible to clear neighborhoods and to conduct other combat operations to regain control of the capital, rather than primarily to train Iraqi forces.

“The mission that most people are settling on has to do with using them in a security role to quell violence in Baghdad and the surrounding area,” said a senior Pentagon official involved in the planning.

Any plan to add to American forces in Baghdad would have to be negotiated with the government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, which has expressed interest in using Iraqi forces, not American ones, to assert more control over the capital.

DOJ_NMG_0110194

The idea of extending the deployments of two Marine units has emerged in part because most of the marines in Iraq are on seven-month rotations and keeping them there longer is considered more palatable than holding over Army brigades, which are already serving tours of a year or longer, one official said.

Additional troops would come from sending into Iraq a brigade of the 82nd Airborne Division headed for the region next month and possibly by speeding up the deployment of several Army brigades now scheduled to go to Iraq by next spring.

But officials said a brigade of the First Armored Division now in Anbar Province would probably go home as planned in January, because the unit had already been kept in Iraq more than 40 days beyond its scheduled tour.

Other options remain under consideration, the officials said, noting that a decision to speed up deployment schedules would put more strain on Army and Marine equipment and personnel. But other options, like mobilizing reserve units, would take months, officials said.

After meeting with his top military and diplomatic advisers at his Texas ranch, Mr. Bush said his administration was making "good progress" in fashioning a revised Iraq strategy. But he said he intended to consult with Congress when it convenes next week before presenting his plan to the nation.

"I fully understand it's important to have both Republicans and Democrats understanding the importance of this mission," Mr. Bush said, speaking to reporters after a three-hour meeting. "It's important for the American people to understand success in Iraq is vital for our own security."

The meeting, according to a senior administration official, focused on the security, economic and political situation in Iraq. But the bulk of the discussions focused on the security issue and the option of sending more American troops to Baghdad, the official said.

Vice President Dick Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, emerged from the meeting with the president. The national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, and his top deputy, J. D. Crouch, also attended the meeting and joined the others for a working lunch at the ranch.

The White House initially intended to announce a new Iraq policy before Christmas but delayed those plans so the president could consider a range of diverging views inside his administration. For weeks his advisers have been locked in internal debates about how to proceed, but it is an open question whether the meeting on Thursday brought clarity to the discussions.

"I've got more consultation to do until I talk to the country about the plan," said Mr. Bush, who did not elaborate or take questions from reporters.

Mr. Bush said he had received a briefing from Mr. Gates, his new defense secretary, and General Pace, who recently returned from Iraq. White House aides said the president did not want to offer his new plan for Iraq before Mr. Gates had an opportunity to study conditions on the ground in Iraq.

"It's an important part of coming to closure on a way forward in Iraq that will help us achieve our objective," Mr. Bush said, "which is a country that can govern itself, sustain itself and defend itself."

How additional American troops would be employed in Baghdad remains a central point of discussion among Mr. Bush's top advisers and top ground commanders in Iraq, officials said. But two officials said there was growing agreement that most would not be attached to American teams training Iraqi Army and police units, because doing so would not necessarily yield the quick improvements in security the White House wants.

But it is also unclear to what extent the additional forces would be employed to curb the power of militias associated with Shiite groups that form a key constituency for Mr. Maliki.

The two units whose stay could be extended are the Marines' Fifth and Seventh Regiment combat teams in Anbar Province, which are scheduled to begin leaving Iraq in February when two replacement regiments are due to arrive, officials said.

It is unclear which Army brigades could be sent early. A 3,500-soldier brigade of the Third Infantry Division, based at Fort Stewart, Ga., is scheduled to arrive in Iraq in mid-January, followed in subsequent months by units from the First Infantry Division, at Fort Riley, Kan., and the Second Infantry Division, at Fort Lewis, Wash.

The Third Brigade of the Third Infantry Division, based at Fort Benning, Ga., is scheduled to go to Iraq in the spring, according to a spokesman, Kevin Larson, who said he had not heard any discussion of accelerating that timetable. But he said, "We're ready to answer whatever call may come up."

How long beyond February the Marine units would remain is unclear, but officials emphasized that the goal was a temporary increase in the American presence. It is also unclear whether a decision to speed up the deployment of two Army brigades would mean that other units scheduled to be deployed would go to Iraq earlier than planned later next year. Currently there are about 134,000 American troops in Iraq.

Bush Considers Economic Package For Iraq (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz And Robin Wright

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

CRAWFORD, Tex., Dec. 28 -- As he puts the finishing touches on his revised Iraq plan, President Bush is considering new economic initiatives to go along with a possible increase in troops to help stabilize the country, according to officials familiar with the administration's review.

Among the steps being considered are short-term jobs and loan programs aimed at winning back the waning local support for the U.S. presence in Iraq, the officials said. They described the ideas as part of a classic effort to quell an insurgency through a combination of economic, political and military means.

"The president is looking at a variety of ways to work with the Iraq government to provide new economic opportunities for Iraqis, which will be essential to sustaining security gains and draining the influence of extremists," said Gordon Johndroe, the spokesman for the National Security Council.

That view underscores how Bush is looking beyond just military issues as he gears up for one, potentially final, try to achieve stability in Iraq. Officials said economic and political issues were among the key elements discussed Thursday when Bush huddled here with his top national security advisers to discuss the situation in Iraq.

The president emerged after three hours to tell reporters that he has made "good progress" on developing a new plan to stanch sectarian violence and strengthen the Iraqi government. But he said that he intends to hold more consultations with Iraqi leaders and U.S. lawmakers before formally unveiling his plan sometime next month.

"The plan is taking shape," said one senior administration official who briefed reporters outside the president's ranch, where Bush is spending the holidays.

The senior official said Bush heard an extensive presentation about military conditions in Iraq from Robert M. Gates, the new defense secretary, and Marine Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who had just returned after their fact-finding mission there. One idea gaining currency in the administration is to send between 15,000 and 30,000 additional troops to Iraq, at least on a temporary basis, to help improve security, but there are questions among senior military leaders about how effective this move would be.

The Pentagon has pressed for political and economic plans to complement such a possible surge in troops.

The political component of the emerging Bush package would set up benchmarks for long-overdue steps, such as amending the constitution to help address the objections of Iraq's Sunni minority and dismantling 23 predominantly Shiite militias. But it is unclear whether the Iraqi government would go along with such milestones, which were among the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group.

Some U.S. officials think an economic package may be the most promising element of a revised strategy, since it would deal with the Iraqis' deteriorating conditions and growing disillusionment with the U.S. intervention. Others, however, have severe questions about whether such a package would work almost four years after the American invasion and after previous botched efforts to stimulate economic activity.

The economic package now on the table focuses on three elements, and is separate from the long-term jobs-creation program being promoted by the U.S. military. One senior official cautioned that all three elements have been discussed in some manner but that the final package has not been determined.

One element, traditionally linked to a counterinsurgency strategy, is to follow up any military sweep with a short-term work program that would immediately hire people in the neighborhood to clear up trash or do other small civil-affairs jobs.

This project would begin within hours rather than days of a military operation and would help signal a return to normalcy. It might also help wean young unemployed Iraqi men from the militias or prevent them from joining any of the armed factions that are fueling Iraq's escalating sectarian strife.

The second part would be a micro-loan program -- involving modest loans to help individuals get businesses going -- to generate new economic activity in poor neighborhoods. Unemployment is worse today than during the rule of Saddam Hussein, Iraq's ousted leader.

The third part of the package, which has been developed in part by the Treasury Department, would review dormant state-owned industries to try and determine which ones are economically viable and worth reopening. The package would be a shift from the large-scale and long-term development projects that, in the past, relied heavily on Western contractors and expertise.

In brief comments to reporters here, the president made clear that the focus of his review is to strengthen the government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, which has been struggling to quell militia violence and bring about political reconciliation between Sunnis and Shiites.

"The key to success in Iraq is to have a government that's willing to deal with the elements there that are trying to prevent this young democracy from succeeding," Bush said. "We want to help them succeed."

Bush, clad in an open-neck shirt and sport jacket, was flanked by Gates and Pace, as well as by Vice President Cheney and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. Joining the five at Thursday's meeting were White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten, presidential counselor Dan Bartlett, national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley and his deputy, J.D. Crouch, who is managing the White House's Iraq review.

Administration officials said they expect the president to unveil his full plan for Iraq sometime in the early part of January, but Bush and his advisers made clear that more consultations are planned with U.S. lawmakers and Iraqi leaders -- and that there could well be another meeting of the National Security Council before the plan is released.

"I fully understand it's important to have both Republicans and Democrats understanding the importance of this mission," Bush told reporters.

Bush: More Consultation Needed On Iraq Policy (HC/AP)

By Deb Riechmann

Houston Chronicle, December 29, 2006

CRAWFORD — President Bush worked nearly three hours at his Texas ranch today to design a new U.S. policy in Iraq, then emerged to say that he and his advisers need more time to craft the plan he'll announce in the new year.

Burdened by low approval ratings on his handling of the war, the president is under mounting pressure to come up with a new blueprint for U.S. involvement in Iraq where the execution of Saddam Hussein — perhaps as early as this weekend — could incite further violence.

"We've got more consultation to do until I talk to the country about the plan," Bush said, appearing outside an office building at his ranch.

"Obviously, we'll continue to work with the Iraqi government. The key to success in Iraq is to have a government that's willing to deal with the elements there that are trying to prevent this young democracy from succeeding."

Vice President Dick Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and Secretary of Defense Robert Gates stood by Bush as he made his three-minute statement on a dirt road lined with cactus, then turned away, ignoring a reporter's question about the pending execution.

He thanked U.S. troops for their service, yet offered no hint that he was poised to send more of them to war.

"As I think about this plan, I always have our troops in mind," Bush said.

The president is considering the so-called surge option: increasing the number of troops in Iraq and embedding more U.S. advisers in Iraqi units in hopes of quelling violence to provide a window of opportunity for political reconciliation and rebuilding.

"I think the debate is really coming down to: Surge large. Surge small. Surge short. Surge longer," said Tom Donnelly, a defense and security expert at the conservative American Enterprise Institute. "I think the smart money would say that the range of options is fairly narrow and driven by the situation on the ground in Iraq."

Initially, White House advisers said Bush would announce a plan before Christmas. Then, they said it was more likely after the first of the year. His speech now is to occur in the early weeks of January.

James Carafano, senior fellow at the conservative Heritage Foundation, said that if Bush is delaying his announcement, it has less to do with events in the United States and more to do with the situation in Iraq.

"If it were just picking a troop number, they'd be done by now," Carafano said. "My guess is that it (Bush's plan) has to synchronize with some kind of Iraqi domestic political situation in Iraq."

Some military experts support a surge in troop levels beyond the 140,000 already on the ground in Iraq. They contend this will provide a window of opportunity for rebuilding and a political reconciliation between the Sunni and Shiite factions.

Democrats and others in the military community say sending more troops only increases the Iraqis' dependence on U.S. forces and allows them to delay making the painful political compromises needed to end the violence. Democrats are calling on Bush to end America's open-ended commitment in Iraq and some want to see Congress put restrictions on funding any large increases in U.S. troops there.

"A surge which is not part of an overall program of troop reduction that begins in the next four to six months would be a mistake," said Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., who will take over the Armed Services Committee when the new Congress convenes on Jan. 4. "Even if the president is going to propose to temporarily add troops, he should make that conditional on the Iraqis reaching a political settlement that effectively ends the sectarian violence."

The president's unexpected remarks last week that he backs future expansion of the overall size of the Army and Marine Corps to lessen strain on ground forces was viewed as a possible hint that he plans to send in more troops.

DOJ_NMG_0110197

In an action that might also foreshadow an increase in troops, the Pentagon on Wednesday announced that the 2nd Brigade, 82nd Airborne Division, based at Fort Bragg, N.C., will deploy to Kuwait to serve as the reserve force early next year.

Bush said his New Year's resolution is that U.S. troops will be safe and that the United States, in 2007, helps Iraq move closer to being able to sustain, govern and defend itself.

"My resolution is, is that they'll be safe and that we'll come closer to our objective, that we'll be able to help this young democracy survive and thrive and, therefore, we'll be writing a chapter of peace," Bush said.

As he spoke, the administration was preparing for the execution of Saddam as early as this weekend. That prediction was based on information that U.S. officials in Baghdad were receiving from the Iraqi government, according to a senior administration official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he didn't want to overshadow the president's remarks.

The official said Bush would likely hold another National Security Council session before announcing his new strategy in Iraq in the first few weeks of January.

At the meeting here today, Gates and Pace, who just returned from Iraq, elaborated on the briefing they gave the president at the Camp David presidential retreat in Maryland before Christmas. The bulk of the meeting focused on improving security in Iraq, but the president and his advisers also talked about economic and political issues.

Along a road leading to the ranch, about 20 anti-war protesters, including one wearing a pink wig, shouted "War Criminals!" and waved signs that read "Out of Iraq Now!" and "Bush Lied Troops Died."

Bush plans to return to Washington on Jan. 1. He and first lady Laura Bush will go immediately from Andrews Air Force Base to the Capitol to pay their respects to former President Gerald R. Ford, whose casket will be on public display in the Rotunda.

New Strategy For Iraq War Still A Work In Progress (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, December 29, 2006

More than six weeks after Americans turned Congress over to Democrats, President Bush yesterday said he still does not have a plan for securing Iraq, although he said he is "making good progress toward coming up" with one.

After meeting yesterday with top White House officials and military advisers at his Crawford, Texas, ranch during a vacation, the president said he is continuing to compile information and build a plan to deal with rampant sectarian violence that has left 100 American troops dead this month.

"I'm making good progress toward coming up with a plan that we think will help us achieve our objective," said Mr. Bush, flanked by Vice President Dick Cheney; Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice; Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff; and Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates.

"I've got more consultation to do until I talk to the country about the plan," he added. "The key to success in Iraq is to have a government that's willing to deal with the elements there that are trying to prevent this young democracy from succeeding."

The president's approval rating has plummeted, and Americans delivered both chambers of Congress last month to the Democrats in an election widely viewed as a rebuke of the administration's Iraq policy.

Mr. Bush has a small window in which to change course in Iraq on his own terms: Congress returns early next month, and the president plans to deliver his State of the Union address on Jan. 23. Although the White House promised quick action after the bipartisan Iraq Study Group early this month called for the withdrawal of most combat troops by early 2008, the president changed his mind and pushed the plan off until next year.

"Not only will I continue to reach out to Congress, but members of my team will do so, as well. I fully understand it's important to have both Republicans and Democrats understanding the importance of this mission," the president said.

The president is considering what military advisers call the "surge" option: increasing the number of troops in Iraq and embedding more U.S. analysts in Iraqi units to quell violence in order to provide an opportunity for political reconciliation and rebuilding.

The Pentagon said Wednesday that it will send about 3,500 troops to Kuwait to serve as a standby force for use in Iraq or elsewhere in the region. The deployment order was sent to a brigade of the 82nd Airborne Division at Fort Bragg, N.C.

In addition, the president announced earlier this month that he supports expanding the Army and the Marine Corps, a move some military analysts took as a hint that he plans to send more troops into Iraq.

Meanwhile in Iraq, a bomb killed an American soldier and wounded another yesterday while they were on patrol north of Baghdad. Three soldiers also died from roadside bombs in the capital, and a Marine was killed in western Anbar province on Wednesday, the military said. With 100 American troops dead so far this month, December is the second-deadliest month of 2006 for U.S. military personnel. At least 105 troops died in October.

DOJ_NMG_0110198

A senior administration official said yesterday's meeting lasted nearly three hours and was followed by a lunch. Another National Security Council session is likely before Mr. Bush announces his plan in the first few weeks of January, the official said.

The official said that Mr. Gates and Gen. Pace, who just returned from Iraq, elaborated on the briefing they gave the president at Camp David before Christmas and talked more about what they saw and heard on the ground.

Bush Cites Progress In Talks On Iraq (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, December 29, 2006

CRAWFORD, TEXAS — President Bush said Thursday that he was "making good progress" toward redrawing his strategy for Iraq, a plan aides said would encompass economic and political elements as well as new security procedures to stem sectarian violence and counter a thriving insurgency.

It appeared increasingly likely, but not certain, that the latest effort to shore up the Iraq campaign would include sending additional U.S. troops there, and that the president would launch his strategy in a speech to the nation when Congress returns to Washington next Thursday or soon after.

Democratic leaders reiterated their opposition to any increase in the number of U.S. troops in Iraq.

Bush held a morning-long meeting with key members of the National Security Council at his office on his Texas ranch, continuing the discussions at lunch. Before making final decisions, Bush said, he wants to have additional consultations, including with members of Congress.

The administration has attached great importance not only to the substance of the plan but to the way it is presented to — and received by — the public, a tacit acknowledgment of the continuing decline in popular support for the war. Officials also are concerned with the impact Congress could have on the president's ability to conduct the war once Democratic majorities take control of the agenda in the House and Senate.

Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), incoming chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said Thursday that most Democrats would oppose any plan calling for a "surge" in the number of U.S. troops.

"The main direction has got to be troop reductions," Levin said on CNN, standing by what he said was the primary Democratic proposal to begin withdrawing troops in "four to six months."

In a three-minute statement to reporters at his ranch after the morning meeting, Bush pledged to "reach out to Congress."

"I fully understand it's important to have both Republicans and Democrats understanding the importance of this mission," he said. Bush was joined by Vice President Dick Cheney; Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice; Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates; Marine Corps Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff; and four senior White House aides: Stephen Hadley, national security advisor; J.D. Crouch, deputy national security advisor; White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten; and White House Counselor Dan Bartlett.

"I'm making good progress toward coming up with a plan that we think will help us achieve our objective," the president said.

A senior administration official, speaking on condition of anonymity because he was discussing internal deliberations and decisions that have not been made final, said Bush was "driving toward making final decisions."

But he said that more information was being sought and that officials were "drilling down into the real details of the various elements — political, economic, security — and how these parts fit together."

"The security element is obviously very complicated," involving the movement of equipment and troops, he added.

The official indicated that at least a temporary troop increase was part of the discussion. Others have said that as many as 20,000 or perhaps 30,000 troops would be added to the approximately 140,000 there now by holding over some units scheduled to come home and moving up the dispatch of others.

"You'd expect that would be an element," he said of the consideration of a so-called surge.

Bush said last week that he was considering increasing the deployment. But a troop increase would present him with a steep challenge as he seeks to regain public support after the midterm election, which has been widely interpreted as a rejection of his conduct of the Iraq war.

Though Sen. John McCain of Arizona has called for sending more troops, other Republicans have challenged such a course. The idea is drawing sharp criticism from Democrats, setting the stage for a showdown at the start of a period in which both sides have proclaimed a new devotion to bipartisanship.

Levin's comments Thursday were the latest from Democrats warning against troop increases. On Tuesday, Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, incoming chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, said such a boost would be "the absolute wrong strategy," a comment that drew a sharp retort from the White House a day later.

In addition to talking with members of Congress, Bush said, he will continue consultations with the Iraqi government, emphasizing the necessity of having a government there willing to deal with insurgents and sectarian violence.

Bush called the meeting Thursday "an important part of coming to closure" as he completes his new policy. Gates, Pace, Rice and Cheney stood behind him, all in casual sports clothes, as he spoke.

The timing of Bush's announcement of a new policy is tied to several factors: He is scheduled to return to Washington on New Year's Day after a week in Texas and will take part the next day in the funeral of former President Ford at Washington National Cathedral.

Also, Congress returns to open a new session on Thursday, although Bush can consult with its members before the formal opening.

Few New Ideas In Army's Surge Options For Iraq (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, December 29, 2006

The U.S. Army is studying a number of options for surging troops into Iraq if President Bush picks that approach as his centerpiece for a new war strategy, military officials said yesterday.

One official who was sent the briefing slides for various surge options said he was struck with the lack of new ideas after an intense three-month review process inside the Bush administration. "Some of this stuff is what the old Coalition Provisional Authority looked at," said the official, referring to the U.S. government organization that ran Iraq from 2003 to 2004.

There are now about 135,000 American forces in Iraq. Surge options range from a brigade of some 5,000 soldiers to as many as five brigades, or nearly 30,000 troops.

If Mr. Bush, who met yesterday at his Texas ranch with Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and other national security advisers, chooses that option, the main target would be to take control of the capital. Since last summer, Baghdad has been the scene of killings by Shi'ite and Sunni death squads, and by al Qaeda. A build up of both Iraqi and American forces there this summer did not achieve the desired reduction in violence. Commanders have said the next six months will be a critical time: the violence will either recede or Iraq will descend into civil war.

To surge by five brigades, the Army will have to keep some units in Iraq longer than their normal 13-month deployments, and accelerate the redeployment of brigades who already have served there. The Army will also call up more reserves and may tap forces stationed in other overseas regions, military officials said.

"The Army has been looking at this for months," said a second official. "[Former Defense Secretary Donald H.] Rumsfeld held a number of briefings on, if we need more troops, how do we do it."

Mr. Bush is said to be particularly impressed by a briefing he received at the White House Dec. 11 from retired Gen. John M. Keane, former Army vice chief of staff. Gen. Keane advocates a surge of troops for a significant period of time to secure Baghdad.

The Army has increased troops in Iraq in the past to improve security for last winter's national elections and for the Baghdad offensive this summer.

Officials said Mr. Bush is also looking at an economic component and may ask Congress to fund a new round of reconstruction projects. Officials have mentioned a figure of $5 billion. But they warn that starting more projects at a time of deteriorating security will not work. Congress has approved over $30 billion in reconstruction and development money for Iraq.

Another factor is the state of Iraq's new ministries. After operating for nearly 30 years in Saddam Hussein's top-down management style, there is no seasoned cadre of bureaucrats who know how to move the machinery of government to get things done.

As a result, ministries are failing to spend budget funds on much-needed projects. "They have not yet learned how to make decisions and act on them," said the first official.

Mr. Bush is weighing scores of options from a number of sources, including the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the National Security Council, his commanders in Iraq and retired officers such as Gen. Keane. Also weighing in was the 10-member Iraq Study Group, which recommended virtually all combat units be out of Iraq by early 2008. The White House and the Joint Chiefs are described as cool to that idea.

The government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki also has submitted proposals for how the Iraqi Security Forces can take over more missions, and do it faster.

Why We Need More Troops In Iraq (WP)

By Joseph Lieberman

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

I've just spent 10 days traveling in the Middle East and speaking to leaders there, all of which has made one thing clearer to me than ever: While we are naturally focused on Iraq, a larger war is emerging. On one side are extremists and terrorists led and sponsored by Iran, on the other moderates and democrats supported by the United States. Iraq is the most deadly battlefield on which that conflict is being fought. How we end the struggle there will affect not only the region but the worldwide war against the extremists who attacked us on Sept. 11, 2001.

Because of the bravery of many Iraqi and coalition military personnel and the recent coming together of moderate political forces in Baghdad, the war is winnable. We and our Iraqi allies must do what is necessary to win it.

The American people are justifiably frustrated by the lack of progress, and the price paid by our heroic troops and their families has been heavy. But what is needed now, especially in Washington and Baghdad, is not despair but decisive action -- and soon.

The most pressing problem we face in Iraq is not an absence of Iraqi political will or American diplomatic initiative, both of which are increasing and improving; it is a lack of basic security. As long as insurgents and death squads terrorize Baghdad, Iraq's nascent democratic institutions cannot be expected to function, much less win the trust of the people. The fear created by gang murders and mass abductions ensures that power will continue to flow to the very thugs and extremists who have the least interest in peace and reconciliation.

This bloodshed, moreover, is not the inevitable product of ancient hatreds. It is the predictable consequence of a failure to ensure basic security and, equally important, of a conscious strategy by al-Qaeda and Iran, which have systematically aimed to undermine Iraq's fragile political center. By ruthlessly attacking the Shiites in particular over the past three years, al-Qaeda has sought to provoke precisely the dynamic of reciprocal violence that threatens to consume the country.

On this point, let there be no doubt: If Iraq descends into full-scale civil war, it will be a tremendous battlefield victory for al-Qaeda and Iran. Iraq is the central front in the global and regional war against Islamic extremism.

To turn around the crisis we need to send more American troops while we also train more Iraqi troops and strengthen the moderate political forces in the national government. After speaking with our military commanders and soldiers there, I strongly believe that additional U.S. troops must be deployed to Baghdad and Anbar province -- an increase that will at last allow us to establish security throughout the Iraqi capital, hold critical central neighborhoods in the city, clamp down on the insurgency and defeat al-Qaeda in that province.

In Baghdad and Ramadi, I found that it was the American colonels, even more than the generals, who were asking for more troops. In both places these soldiers showed a strong commitment to the cause of stopping the extremists. One colonel followed me out of the meeting with our military leaders in Ramadi and said with great emotion, "Sir, I regret that I did not have the chance to speak in the meeting, but I want you to know on behalf of the soldiers in my unit and myself that we believe in why we are fighting here and we want to finish this fight. We know we can win it."

In nearly four years of war, there have never been sufficient troops dispatched to accomplish our vital mission. The troop surge should be militarily meaningful in size, with a clearly defined mission.

More U.S. forces might not be a guarantee of success in this fight, but they are certainly its prerequisite. Just as the continuing carnage in Baghdad empowers extremists on all sides, establishing security there will open possibilities for compromise and cooperation on the Iraqi political front -- possibilities that simply do not exist today because of the fear gripping all sides.

I saw firsthand evidence in Iraq of the development of a multiethnic, moderate coalition against the extremists of al-Qaeda and against the Mahdi Army, which is sponsored and armed by Iran and has inflamed the sectarian violence. We cannot abandon these brave Iraqi patriots who have stood up and fought the extremists and terrorists.

The addition of more troops must be linked to a comprehensive new military, political and economic strategy that provides security for the population so that training of Iraqi troops and the development of a democratic government can move forward.

In particular we must provide the vital breathing space for moderate Shiites and Sunnis to turn back the radicals in their communities. There are Iraqi political leaders who understand their responsibility to do this. In Anbar province we have made encouraging progress in winning over local Sunni tribal leaders in the fight against al-Qaeda and other terrorists. With more troops to support them, our forces in Anbar and their Sunni allies can achieve a major victory over al-Qaeda.

As the hostile regimes in Iran and Syria appreciate -- at times, it seems, more keenly than we do -- failure in Iraq would be a strategic and moral catastrophe for the United States and its allies. Radical Islamist terrorist groups, both Sunni and Shiite, would reap victories simultaneously symbolic and tangible, as Iraq became a safe haven in which to train and strengthen their foot soldiers and Iran's terrorist agents. Hezbollah and Hamas would be greatly strengthened against their moderate opponents. One moderate Palestinian leader told me that a premature U.S. exit from Iraq would be a victory for Iran and the groups it is supporting in the region. Meanwhile, the tens of thousands of Iraqis who have bravely stood with us in the hope of a democratic future would face the killing fields.

In Iraq today we have a responsibility to do what is strategically and morally right for our nation over the long term -- not what appears easier in the short term. The daily scenes of death and destruction are heartbreaking and infuriating. But there is no better strategic and moral alternative for America than standing with the moderate Iraqis until the country is stable and they can take over their security. Rather than engaging in hand-wringing, carping or calls for withdrawal, we must summon the vision, will and courage to take the difficult and decisive steps needed for success and, yes, victory in Iraq. That will greatly advance the cause of moderation and freedom throughout the Middle East and protect our security at home.

Lawyer Told To Pick Up Hussein's Personal Effects (CNN)

CNN.com, December 29, 2006

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Saddam Hussein's lawyer said Friday the U.S. military has asked that he arrange for Hussein's personal belongings to be picked up.

But Hussein has not been handed over to Iraq authorities for execution and remained in U.S. custody Friday, according to Iraqi Deputy Justice Ministry Bosho Ibrahim.

Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri Al-Maliki said Friday that nothing will stop or delay the execution, according to Iraqi national television.

Al-Maliki told reporters that there be "no reviews or delays in the execution of the criminal Saddam," Al-Iraqiya TV reported.

Under Iraqi law, his defense lawyers and family would be notified before the death sentence is carried out, and there has apparently been no such notification.

"The American side has just called me and asked me to either send someone to pick up the personal effects of Saddam Hussein and his [half] brother Barzan al-Tikriti, or to give them an address to which they can send them," said lead defense attorney Khalil al-Dulaimi.

He said when he asked the U.S. military if this meant that Hussein had already been transferred to Iraqi custody for his execution, they refused to answer.

Another defense lawyer, Badie Aref, told CNN that Hussein met with two of his half-brothers in his prison cell on Thursday and passed on messages and instructions to his family.

"President Saddam was just bracing for the worst, so he wanted to see his brothers and pass on some messages and instructions to his family," Aref said. The half brothers who visited were Sabawi and Wathban Ibrahim Hassan al-Tikriti, he said.

Another of Hussein's half-brothers, Barzan al-Tikriti, has been sentenced to death and is being held in Iraq under the same charges as Hussein.

Aref said the U.S. soldiers guarding Hussein took away a radio he kept in his cell on Tuesday so he could not hear news reports about his death sentence.

His death sentence was upheld Tuesday by an appellate court. (Full story)

"They did not want him to hear the news from the appeals court upholding the sentence," he said. "They gave him back the radio on Wednesday."

Aref said Saddam found out about the appeals court verdict "a few hours after it was announced."

On Thursday, Bush administration officials told CNN Hussein is expected to be executed "this weekend."

Hussein would be transferred from U.S. to Iraqi custody within the next day, one official said.

More than one administration source confirmed the impending transfer.

But Homeland Security Advisor Fran Townsend on CNN cautioned that the timing of the execution is up to the Iraqi government.

Two defense attorneys Thursday met with Hussein in his jail cell.

"He believes in his fate, and his only concern is the unity of the Iraqi people," al-Dulaimi told CNN in Amman, Jordan.

Al-Dulaimi described the former Iraqi dictator's morale as "normal."

Hussein was convicted on November 5 for crimes against humanity in connection with the killings of 148 people after an attempt on his life.

Hussein's execution by hanging must take place before January 27 -- or within 30 days after the Iraqi High Tribunal upheld the death sentence -- according to chief Judge Aref Shaheen. (Watch tensions escalate over Hussein's imminent execution)

"He believes in his destiny," the attorney said.

Al-Dulaimi said Thursday that neither the defense team nor Hussein's family have been given an execution date.

The U.S. State Department also says it has not been told when Hussein will be executed.

A senior Bush administration official said Thursday that the execution is likely to be "a couple of days" from now.

Hussein was sentenced to death for his role in the 1982 killings of 148 people in Dujail, a mostly Shiite town north of Baghdad, following an attempt on his life.

DOJ_NMG_0110202

The dictator was found guilty of murder, torture, and forced deportation.

The Dujail episode falls within 12 of the worst cases out of the 500 documented "baskets of crimes" during the Hussein regime.

The U.S. State Department says torture and extrajudicial killings followed the Dujail killings and that 550 men, women and children were arrested without warrants. A Web warning to U.S.

On the day Hussein's death sentence was confirmed, the Baath party that he led warned that it would retaliate against the United States and its interests as well as against members of the Iraqi High Tribunal if the execution is carried out.

It said the United States will suffer "grave consequences" if Hussein is executed.

The party also vowed to shut down peace negotiations with coalition forces, according to the statement the group released on an Arabic-language Web site.

The Baathists have been operating as part of the insurgency against the U.S. and its allies since Hussein's regime fell in 2003.

In a farewell letter posted Wednesday on the former Baath Party's Web site, Hussein bid farewell to Iraqis and called on them not to hate the U.S.-led forces. (Watch Hussein try to get in the last word)

Calling Iraq a "loyal and honorable nation," Hussein says, "I bid you farewell and submit myself to the merciful and ever-faithful Lord." (Full story)Trial itself was on trial

The White House has praised the court's decision, calling the day a milestone.

"Saddam has received due process and the legal rights that he denied the Iraqi people," said Scott Stanzel, deputy White House press secretary.

Al-Dulaimi, called the ruling "crazy," and said it came from "an illegitimate and unconstitutional court."

While proponents of the Iraqi High Tribunal hail it for taking steps to ensure accountability for atrocities committed during Hussein's regime, critics have pointed to the lack of safety for attorneys and questioned the judiciary's independence and impartiality.

Three defense lawyers were killed during the Dujail trial, and another fled the country after being seriously wounded. (Watch to see why many consider the trial flawed)

Human Rights Watch, which had regularly issued reports about the Hussein regime's brutality, also criticized the Iraqi High Tribunal for an over-reliance on anonymous witnesses.

Hussein and others also are being tried in another case, the killings of up to 100,000 Kurds during the 1988 Anfal campaign against Kurdish rebels. The allegations include the use of poison gas against Kurdish towns in northern Iraq.

Hussein Could Be Hanged Within Days (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 28 — Preparations for the execution of Saddam Hussein began taking on a sense of urgency late Thursday as American and Iraqi officials suggested that he could be hanged within a span of days rather than weeks.

After upholding the death sentence against Mr. Hussein on Tuesday for the execution of 148 Shiite men and boys in 1982, an Iraqi appeals court ruled that he must be sent to the gallows within 30 days. But Mr. Hussein may not have even that long to live, officials said.

A senior administration official said that the execution would probably not take place in the next 24 hours, but that the timing would be swift. “It may be another day or so,” the official said.

In Iraq, where the Constitution requires that the Iraqi president and his two deputies sign all execution orders, officials said it was unlikely that legal formalities would stand in the way. The president, Jalal Talabani, had not received the documents by late Thursday.

But a government official familiar with the process said that little objection would be raised if the execution took place almost immediately. “Even if it happens tonight, no one is going to make an issue out of the procedure,” the official said.

Mowaffak al-Rubaie, the national security adviser, said there would be no advance notice of the execution because of fears that any announcement could set off violence. When asked who would be invited to attend the hanging, Mr. Rubaie said: “No television. No press. Nothing.”

He said the execution would be videotaped but that it was unlikely that the tape would be released.

Even with the security fears, there was little appetite among Iraqi officialdom to spare Mr. Hussein for much longer. “I hope the decision should be implemented very soon,” said Qasim Daoud, a former national security adviser. “Sooner is better because it sends a message that we are determined — we want to get ahead step by step to building a new Iraq, and these messages will help.”

Some rights advocacy groups have criticized the haste of the trial and the appeal. Mr. Hussein was sentenced to death on Nov. 5 by a court specially set up to judge his years in power, and the appeals court handed down its ruling less than two months later. Mr. Hussein, along with two co-defendants, received his death sentence on a narrow case involving only the killings of the 148 Shiites, in the town of Dujail. Further cases were pending, and his trial on charges that he ordered the killings of tens of thousands of Kurds has already started.

Since the appeals court upheld the death sentences, rumors have swept Baghdad that the Iraqi government would move quickly to put Mr. Hussein to death. Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki has drawn protests of political meddling in recent months by suggesting publicly that the former dictator should die at the earliest possible date.

Public pronouncements by American officials have been much more muted, as all formal queries have been referred to the government of Iraq, or G.O.I. in Baghdad jargon.

“Saddam Hussein is still in detention in a coalition facility,” the United States military in Baghdad said in a statement late Thursday, referring to the American-led coalition of forces. “He will continue to remain in a coalition facility until G.O.I. determines to change that status.”

“This is primarily a G.O.I. issue. As for any potential transfer, we do not discuss any coordination” between American military forces and the Iraqis, the statement said.

One American official who works closely with the Iraqi justice system expressed frustration over the criticism that Mr. Hussein’s trial has received. Considering the difficult security situation in a country emerging from a dictatorship — Mr. Hussein’s — the trial has been conducted as fairly as possible by the Iraqis, the official said. “I’m sure they gave it full deliberation and I have full confidence in them,” the official said.

Hussein May Be Hanged In A 'Day Or So' (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-fiske

The Los Angeles Times, December 29, 2006

BAGHDAD — Saddam Hussein met with two of his half brothers and his lawyers Thursday at a U.S. detention facility as a senior U.S. official said his execution could come within "a couple more days."

The former Iraqi president has been in U.S. custody in a cell at Camp Cropper near Baghdad's international airport. He is to be officially turned over to Iraqi custody shortly before the death sentence is carried out, as ordered by an Iraqi court.

The execution could occur in "another day or so" — before the start of the Muslim holiday of Eid al-Adha, said the U.S. official, who spoke on condition of anonymity. Iraqi officials have said their government would be loath to carry out an execution during the Eid festival, and have suggested that it would not take place until the holiday ends next week. The U.S. official noted that the Bush administration had been "in close contact with the government of Iraq" on Hussein's fate.

As speculation rose that the execution is near, the condemned former president met at Camp Cropper with his half brothers Sabawi and Watban Ibrahim Hassan, both of whom are also in U.S. custody, said one of his attorneys, Bushra Khalil.

"He met with them and he gave them some things. I'm not sure what," said Khalil, speaking by phone from Amman, Jordan, where she plans to meet today with Hussein's eldest daughter, Raghad.

Hussein's lawyers said they had not been notified of the execution date.

Hussein, 69, seemed in high spirits Thursday as he shared untitled poems he wrote recently and well wishes for the Iraqi people with his visitors over lunch, said attorney Wadood Fawzi, one of those who met with Hussein.

Fawzi said that during the two-hour meeting, Hussein asked about the welfare of the country and his family but made no requests and asked no questions, not even about his execution. "He wasn't sad; he was very normal," Fawzi said.

Hussein's lead attorney, Khalil Dulaimi, said he did not expect Hussein to invite family members to witness his execution.

Hussein was sentenced Nov. 5 to hang for crimes against humanity in connection with the killing of 148 men and boys from the Shiite Muslim town of Dujayl after an attempt there to assassinate him in 1982. Two of his seven codefendants also received death sentences.

Dulaimi called Hussein's trial illegal and politically motivated. He called on U.S. and world leaders to acknowledge that, saying that otherwise they risked alienating not just Iraqis but the rest of the Muslim world.

"I would like to advise the American administration and President Bush: Do not make mistakes again," Dulaimi said. "This is not advice from Saddam Hussein's lawyer, but from an Iraqi citizen."

Elsewhere in Baghdad, violence continued to claim the lives of some of Iraq's poorest citizens.

Bystanders pulled an 8-year-old boy from the charred wreckage of a marketplace where the poor come to buy used clothes and household goods, the scene of two of three explosions in the city that left at least 17 people dead, including the boy's parents.

DOJ_NMG_0110204

Vendors said the bombs, which killed seven people, were planted in wooden carts by two strangers who set up shop near the entrance and exit to the market and left just before the explosions. After the initial shock over the explosions, shoppers and vendors resumed haggling over underwear and socks.

"If I would go home, then what would my family eat?" said vendor Jabbar Shnawa, 35, who sold a CD after the explosion for 500 dinars, about 40 cents.

Across town, a bomb planted under a parked car exploded at 11 a.m. at a gas station where people waited to buy kerosene. The blast killed 10 people.

During the 24-hour period that ended Thursday, 41 bodies were recovered in the capital, according to the Interior Ministry.

Three U.S. Marines were killed in Fallouja by small-arms fire. They were with the 1st Battalion, 24th Marine Regiment, a reserve group from the Midwest. Members of the battalion are among the final 300 Marines in Fallouja, where many patrols recently have been turned over to Iraqi forces. A U.S. soldier was killed by a roadside bomb while on a combat foot patrol north of the capital, the military said.

The deaths bring to 2,991 the total number of U.S. forces killed in Iraq since 2003, according to icasualties.org.

The military also announced Thursday that soldiers conducted a raid Tuesday south of Baghdad and detained an Al Qaeda in Iraq cell leader suspected of killing two U.S. soldiers found dead in June, Pfc. Kristian Menchaca of Houston and Pfc. Thomas Tucker of Madras, Ore.

Meanwhile, audio from a videotape of four American hostages was made public Thursday by McClatchy Newspapers in which the security contractors and an Austrian plead for their release. The five were kidnapped Nov. 16 near the southern city of Safwan.

Lou Fintor, a U.S. Embassy spokesman, confirmed that the men were still being held and said U.S. officials were investigating the recording. Fintor said a previously unknown Iranian group, the Islamic Mujahedin Battalion, initially claimed responsibility for the kidnapping. He could not say whether the group was still holding the men.

On tape, the five men ask the U.S. government to withdraw troops from Iraq. They identify themselves as Josh Munz, a former Marine from California who was stationed in Fallouja; John Young, 44, of Kansas City, Mo.; Jonathan Cote, 23, of Gainesville, Fla.; Paul Reuben, 39, of Buffalo, Minn.; and Bert Nussbaumer, 25, of Vienna.

SADDAM: DEAD BY SUNDAY (NYPOST)

The New York Post, December 29, 2006

December 28, 2006 -- Saddam Hussein, sentenced to death for his role in 148 killings in 1982, will be hanged within the next 48 hours, a U.S. military officer reportedly said Thursday.

NBC and CBS News are reporting that the officer revealed Saddam will be hanged before the start of the Eid religious holiday, which begins Sunday.

Earlier Thursday, Saddam's chief lawyer made a last-ditch effort to impede his execution, beseeching world leaders to prevent the United States from handing over the ousted dictator to Iraqi authorities who plan to hang him.

The plea came as the U.S. military reported the deaths of five more troops and announced that Iraqi forces, backed by American forces, captured an al-Qaida in Iraq cell leader believed responsible for the June kidnapping of two soldiers who were found tortured and killed.

With at least 72 more Iraqis killed in sectarian violence, U.S. officials and Iraqis expressed concern about the potential for even worse bloodshed following Saddam's execution. The lawyer, Khalil al-Dulaimi, said transferring Saddam to Iraqi authorities could be the trigger.

"If the American administration insists in handing the president to the Iraqis, it would commit a great strategic mistake which would lead to the escalation of the violence in Iraq and the eruption of a destructive civil war," al-Dulaimi told The Associated Press in a telephone interview.

Iraq's highest court on Tuesday rejected Saddam's appeal against his conviction and death sentence for the killing of 148 Shiites in the northern city of Dujail in 1982. The court said the former president should be hanged within 30 days.

The White House was preparing for Saddam's execution as early as this weekend, based on information that U.S. officials in Baghdad were receiving from the Iraqi government, a senior administration official said in Washington.

But Iraq's deputy justice minister, Bosho Ibrahim, said Saddam shouldn't be hanged for another few weeks. "The law does not say within 30 days, it says after the lapse of 30 days," Ibrahim said.

He did not explain the discrepancy between his interpretation and the court's, nor could he give a specific execution date.

Al-Dulaimi, Saddam's lawyer, said the ousted leader should enjoy protection from his enemies as a "prisoner of war" and remain in U.S. custody.

"According to the international conventions, it is forbidden to hand a prisoner of war to his adversary," al-Dulaimi said.

"I urge all the international and legal organizations, the United Nations secretary-general, the Arab League and all the leaders of the world to rapidly prevent the American administration from handing the president to the Iraqi authorities," al-Dulaimi said.

An official close to Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has said Saddam would remain in a U.S. military prison until he is delivered to Iraqi authorities on the day of his execution. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the press.

Iraqi government offices shut down ahead of an Islamic holiday this weekend, and there was confusion over when Saddam would be executed and whether President Jalal Talabani was required to approve such action.

Raed Juhi, a spokesman for the High Tribunal that convicted Saddam, said that with approval from Talabani, Saddam could be put to death within 30 days. Otherwise, the execution would be held after that period, he said.

But Hiwa Osman, a spokesman for Talabani, has said the execution might not need the president's signature.

International reaction to the denial of Saddam's appeal has been relatively muted.

Cardinal Renato Martino, Pope Benedict XVI's top prelate for justice issues and a former Vatican envoy to the U.N., condemned the death sentence in a newspaper interview published Thursday, saying capital punishment goes against the teachings of the Roman Catholic Church.

After Saddam's death sentence was handed down last month, Louise Arbour, the U.N. high commissioner for human rights, urged Iraq to ensure a fair appeals process and to refrain from executing Saddam even if the sentence is upheld.

Some international legal observers and human rights groups have also called Saddam's trial unfair because of alleged interference by the Shiite-dominated government.

But State Department Deputy Spokesman Tom Casey said Thursday the Bush administration believes the trial was held in accordance with international and Iraqi laws.

"(The Iraqis) carried out their work in a transparent and open manner and they arrived at a verdict based on the facts in the case," Casey said.

In Dujail, home to the 148 victims of the 1982 killings, townspeople were divided over Saddam's execution.

"America is using him to increase sedition among Iraqis, but we are thinking only of how Iraq can get rid of its problems and achieve security," said Hussein Abases, a Shiite farmer.

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman acknowledged there was concern about a possible surge of violence after the execution. "I'm sure the Iraqi government is thinking through that and working with the coalition in terms of the impact that could have," he said in Washington.

The timetable was based on information that U.S. officials in Baghdad received from the Iraqi government. But, there were differing accounts.

The plea from Saddam's attorney came as the U.S. military reported the deaths of eight more troops and announced that Iraqi forces, backed by American forces, captured an al-Qaida in Iraq cell leader believed responsible for the June kidnapping of two soldiers who were found tortured and killed.

Iraq's deputy justice minister, Bosho Ibrahim, said Saddam shouldn't be hanged for another few weeks. "The law does not say within 30 days, it says after the lapse of 30 days," Ibrahim said.

He did not explain the discrepancy between his interpretation and the court's, nor could he give a specific execution date.

With at least 72 more Iraqis killed in sectarian violence, U.S. officials and Iraqis expressed concern about the potential for even worse bloodshed following Saddam's execution. His lawyer, Khalil al-Dulaimi, said transferring Saddam to Iraqi authorities could be the trigger.

DOJ_NMG_0110206

"If the American administration insists in handing the president to the Iraqis, it would commit a great strategic mistake which would lead to the escalation of the violence in Iraq and the eruption of a destructive civil war," al-Dulaimi told The Associated Press in a telephone interview.

Iraq's highest court on Tuesday rejected Saddam's appeal against his conviction and death sentence for the killing of 148 Shiites in the northern city of Dujail in 1982. The court said the former president should be hanged within 30 days.

Al-Dulaimi, Saddam's lawyer, said the ousted leader should enjoy protection from his enemies as a "prisoner of war" and remain in U.S. custody.

"According to the international conventions, it is forbidden to hand a prisoner of war to his adversary," al-Dulaimi said.

"I urge all the international and legal organizations, the United Nations secretary-general, the Arab League and all the leaders of the world to rapidly prevent the American administration from handing the president to the Iraqi authorities," al-Dulaimi said.

An official close to Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has said Saddam would remain in a U.S. military prison until he is delivered to Iraqi authorities on the day of his execution. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the press.

Iraqi government offices shut down ahead of an Islamic holiday this weekend, and there was confusion over when Saddam would be executed and whether President Jalal Talabani was required to approve such action.

Raed Juhi, a spokesman for the High Tribunal that convicted Saddam, said that with approval from Talabani, Saddam could be put to death within 30 days. Otherwise, the execution would be held after that period, he said.

But Hiwa Osman, a spokesman for Talabani, has said the execution might not need the president's signature.

International reaction to the denial of Saddam's appeal has been relatively muted.

Cardinal Renato Martino, Pope Benedict XVI's top prelate for justice issues and a former Vatican envoy to the U.N., condemned the death sentence in a newspaper interview published Thursday, saying capital punishment goes against the teachings of the Roman Catholic Church.

After Saddam's death sentence was handed down last month, Louise Arbour, the U.N. high commissioner for human rights, urged Iraq to ensure a fair appeals process and to refrain from executing Saddam even if the sentence is upheld.

Some international legal observers and human rights groups have also called Saddam's trial unfair because of alleged interference by the Shiite-dominated government.

But State Department Deputy Spokesman Tom Casey said Thursday the Bush administration believes the trial was held in accordance with international and Iraqi laws.

"(The Iraqis) carried out their work in a transparent and open manner and they arrived at a verdict based on the facts in the case," Casey said.

In Dujail, home to the 148 victims of the 1982 killings, townspeople were divided over Saddam's execution.

"America is using him to increase sedition among Iraqis, but we are thinking only of how Iraq can get rid of its problems and achieve security," said Hussein Abases, a Shiite farmer.

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman acknowledged there was concern about a possible surge of violence after the execution. "I'm sure the Iraqi government is thinking through that and working with the coalition in terms of the impact that could have," he said in Washington.

At least 30 Iraqis died Thursday in bombings and shootings, including a suicide bombing in a crowd of people waiting to buy kerosene near a stadium in Baghdad that killed 10, according to police. Police also said 42 bodies of tortured men were found dumped in the Iraqi capital Thursday.

The U.S. military in Iraq announced five more American troop deaths: four soldiers hit by roadside bombs on patrol and a Marine killed in combat in volatile western Iraq. The Department of Defense also identified three more American servicemen who died in Iraq this week that hadn't been previously reported, according to an AP analysis.

The figures raised the U.S. troop deaths this month to 103, second only to the 105 service members who died in October. At least 2,991 members of the U.S. military have been killed since the Iraq war began in March 2003, according to an AP count.

The al-Qaida in Iraq cell leader allegedly responsible for the deaths of two of the servicemen was arrested Tuesday in a raid south of Baghdad, the military said. Al-Qaida in Iraq had claimed it killed the two U.S. soldiers found dead in June - Pfc. Kristian Menchaca of Houston and Pfc. Thomas Tucker of Madras, Ore. Their bodies were recovered after a search by 8,000 U.S. and Iraqi soldiers, dubbed Operation Fallen Eagle.

The Rush To Hang Saddam Hussein (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0110207

The important question was never really about whether Saddam Hussein was guilty of crimes against humanity. The public record is bulging with the lengthy litany of his vile and unforgivable atrocities: genocidal assaults against the Kurds; aggressive wars against Iran and Kuwait; use of internationally banned weapons like nerve gas; systematic torture of countless thousands of political prisoners.

What really mattered was whether an Iraq freed from his death grip could hold him accountable in a way that nurtured hope for a better future. A carefully conducted, scrupulously fair trial could have helped undo some of the damage inflicted by his rule. It could have set a precedent for the rule of law in a country scarred by decades of arbitrary vindictiveness. It could have fostered a new national unity in an Iraq long manipulated through its religious and ethnic divisions.

It could have, but it didn't. After a flawed, politicized and divisive trial, Mr. Hussein was handed his sentence: death by hanging. This week, in a cursory 15-minute proceeding, an appeals court upheld that sentence and ordered that it be carried out posthaste. Most Iraqis are now so preoccupied with shielding their families from looming civil war that they seem to have little emotion left to spend on Mr. Hussein or, more important, on their own fading dreams of a new and better Iraq.

What might have been a watershed now seems another lost opportunity. After nearly four years of war and thousands of American and Iraqi deaths, it is ever harder to be sure whether anything fundamental has changed for the better in Iraq.

This week began with a story of British and Iraqi soldiers storming a police station that hid a secret dungeon in Basra. More than 100 men, many of them viciously tortured, were rescued from almost certain execution. It might have been a story from the final days of Baathist rule in March 2003, when British and American troops entered Basra believing they were liberating the subjugated Shiite south. But it was December 2006, and the wretched men being liberated were prisoners of the new Iraqi Shiite authorities.

Toppling Saddam Hussein did not automatically create a new and better Iraq. Executing him won't either.

A Death Sentence Affirmed (WP)

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

WITH TUESDAY'S decision by an Iraqi appeals body to affirm the death sentence of Saddam Hussein, the execution of the former tyrant could take place within weeks. Under Iraqi law, a death sentence must be carried out within a month of its confirmation; though Iraqi officials have made conflicting statements about timing, the country's Shiite-dominated government is unlikely to show mercy. For those who oppose the death penalty, as we do, any execution is regrettable -- and this one, should it come to pass, will follow highly imperfect judicial proceedings and may in the short term inflame sectarian divisions. But it's hard to imagine the death penalty existing anywhere for any crime and not for Saddam Hussein -- a man who, with the possible exception of Kim Jong Il, has more blood on his hands than anyone else alive. Should the world see his end in the coming days, the justice will be imperfect. But it will still be justice.

To be sure, this was not the accountability that one would hope for Saddam Hussein. For one thing, the crime for which he has been condemned -- the killing of 148 men and boys from the town of Dujail after an assassination attempt against him there in 1982 -- will be but a footnote in the volume detailing his atrocities. And his execution will cut short his trial for the crimes that would fill out that volume: the so-called Anfal campaign, in which tens of thousands of Kurds were murdered.

What's more, his trial was in no sense the model of civilized justice that would have showcased a new, democratic Iraq -- in large measure because that new Iraq has yet to materialize. Several defense lawyers were murdered; judges had to be replaced. Political interference was evident. Even this week, the appeals tribunal sent back one life sentence as insufficiently tough, in effect demanding death for one of the co-defendants.

Still, there is something unreal about the cries of foul from human rights groups demanding perfect procedural justice from a country struggling with civil war, daily bombings and death-squad killings. The reality is that by the trial's end, there was no significant factual dispute between prosecution and defense: Saddam Hussein acknowledged on national television that he had signed the death warrants after only the most cursory look at the evidence against his victims. That, he testified proudly, "is the right of the head of state." Exactly what would a perfect trial be capable of discovering?

Marines Deny Airstrikes Used Against Insurgents In Ramadi (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, December 29, 2006

BAGHDAD — A large-scale U.S. military operation in Ramadi last month did not target suspected insurgents with airstrikes, U.S. military officials said.

Witness statements reported by The Times on Nov. 15 indicated that a U.S. airstrike might have killed at least 30 people, including women and children.

DOJ_NMG_0110208

But Marine spokesman Lt. Col. Bryan Salas said in a written response to inquiries about the incident that an airstrike Nov. 14 hit a bridge about 10 miles east of Ramadi and resulted in no casualties.

Salas said Marines killed at least 16 suspected insurgents during Ramadi operations Nov. 13 and 14 in which tank rounds and 25-millimeter guns were fired. Main tank guns can hit targets miles away with explosive ordnance.

"The 13th and the morning of the 14th of November was very lethal for the insurgency," he said.

Salas said insurgents fired at least three rocket-propelled grenades but overshot and missed U.S. forces. Insurgents and U.S. forces also traded mortar fire, Salas said, but there were no reports of casualties in that exchange.

He acknowledged that news photos showed "alleged bodies of civilians killed by coalition forces in Ramadi," and did not dispute reports of collateral damage.

Recent interviews by a Times correspondent in Ramadi supported earlier eyewitness accounts of civilian deaths during the clashes.

"The actual number eventually reached 35 people, including children and women," said Yasir Hussein, 40, a Ramadi electrical worker. Hussein said the initial tally of 30 dead increased as injured people died of their wounds.

"I saw three women and two children killed," said Khalid Jasim, 49, a school guard. "We took their bodies to the hospital using blankets due to the fact that several of them were dismembered."

The Marines did not immediately respond to inquiries about the number of civilian dead, but acknowledged that it was often difficult to distinguish between insurgents and civilians.

Recent interviews with Ramadi residents also supported initial reports that homes were destroyed during the November fighting. Marines did not respond to inquiries from The Times regarding the number of homes destroyed or tank rounds fired in the fighting.

Residents said the houses were in an old Iraqi army officers quarters, and that one of them, in which a number of civilians were killed, was being used as an Internet cafe.

"Six houses were leveled to the ground and 10 others were damaged to varying degrees," said Ahmad Hummadi, 50, a laborer. "But all of the houses were abandoned because they were no longer suitable for habitation."

Several residents said they saw helicopters and a jet fighter during the confrontations and assumed that some of the explosions were caused by airstrikes. U.S. ground units often are accompanied by air support during military operations.

A special correspondent in Ramadi contributed to this report.

A Suspect In The Killings Of 2 Americans Is Captured In Iraq (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 28 — The man believed to be behind the kidnapping, brutal torture and killing of two American soldiers in June was seized in a raid in a town just south of the capital on Tuesday, American and Iraqi officials said Thursday.

The abduction of the two Americans, who were captured when insurgents ambushed a traffic checkpoint their platoon had set up in the town of Yusufiya, set off one of the largest manhunts of the war, with 8,000 troops involved.

The soldiers' savaged remains were eventually found not far from where the soldiers were taken.

A group called the Mujahedeen Shura Council, which is linked to Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, later released a graphic video showing the decapitation of one of the Americans. At one point, the arm of one insurgent is shown picking up the soldier's head as another insurgent steps on the face of the other soldier.

The two slain soldiers were identified as Pfc. Kristian Menchaca, 23, of Houston and Pfc. Thomas L. Tucker, of Madras, Ore. A third soldier, Specialist David J. Babineau, 25 of Springfield, Mass., was killed during the attack on June 16 that resulted in the abduction.

In a country where killers seldom are brought to justice, the capture of the man believed to be responsible for the soldiers' deaths, whose name was not released, would be a clear triumph for American forces.

Meg Tucker, Private Tucker's mother, struggled to hold back tears when told the news about the capture. "I'm glad that they caught him if indeed they did, but it doesn't bring my son back," she said. "We have just gone through the holidays. It has been really tough. We miss him very much. We still get cards and letters from all over the United States, and we appreciate that very much."

The raid was prompted by a tip the Americans received about a video that had been shown at the Yusufiya mosque, Iraqi and American military officials said. In the video, a man is seen commenting on the kidnapping. It is this man, military officials said, who was taken into custody.

He is also believed to have directed and participated in other kidnappings, killings and violent crimes, the military said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0110209

Although the military's statement said that the Iraqi Special Forces led the operation, an Iraqi military official indicated that the man was in American custody and that American forces directed the assault.

No casualties involving either American or Iraqi troops were reported in the raid.

American and Iraqi forces staged another major raid on Tuesday in the nearby town of Mahmudiya, arresting 30 people suspected of being insurgents. It was unclear if the two raids were connected.

Yet even as they tried to stem the violence, Americans forces continued to come under sustained attack.

Four Americans were killed in attacks on Wednesday, bringing the total number of Americans killed in December to 100, according to The Associated Press and making this one of the deadliest months for the military in the past three years.

One marine was killed battling insurgents on Wednesday in Anbar Province, the Sunni stronghold in the west of the country.

Two soldiers were killed on Wednesday when a roadside bomb exploded near their patrol in southwestern Baghdad. In a separate bombing in the capital, another American soldier was killed.

Scores of Iraqis also continued to die in bombings, clashes and kidnappings.

At least 19 Iraqi civilians were killed Thursday in three separate bombings in Baghdad.

In one attack, on a popular market in central Baghdad, two roadside bombs exploded one after the other, timed to inflict as much damage as possible, Iraqi officials said. At least nine people were killed and 35 were wounded, officials said.

Separately, a suicide bomber, who disguised himself in a large crowd of people waiting for fuel at a gas station near a large sports stadium in central Baghdad, blew himself up and killed at least 10 people and wounded 25.

The authorities found 51 bodies in Baghdad on Wednesday and 41 more on Thursday, most likely the latest victims of sectarian violence.

With the violence continuing unabated, the beleaguered Iraqi security forces also came under attack across the country.

North of Baghdad, in Baquba, a police captain was assassinated and two other officers were wounded in a drive-by shooting, officials said.

In Kirkuk, four armed men wearing Iraqi Army uniforms clashed with the police, killing at least one officer and wounding another. Southwest of Kirkuk, in Hawija, a roadside bomb seriously wounded three policemen.

The Iraqi Army also came under assault. An army checkpoint in Tikrit was attacked and two soldiers were killed and one was wounded, Iraqi military officials said.

Al-Qaeda In Iraq Cell Leader Caught In Raid, Military Says (USAT/AP)

USA Today, December 29, 2006

BAGHDAD — The U.S. military said Thursday that a joint raid by Iraqi and U.S. forces resulted in the capture of the al-Qaeda in Iraq cell leader who was behind the abduction, torture and killing of two U.S. soldiers in June.

The announcement came as Saddam Hussein's lawyer made a last-ditch effort Thursday to impede his execution. The U.S. military reported the deaths of five more troops.

Lawyer Khalil al-Dulaimi beseeched world leaders to prevent the United States from handing over the ousted dictator to Iraqi authorities who plan to hang him.

Al-Dulaimi said transferring Saddam to Iraqi authorities could trigger more bloodshed.

Iraq's highest court on Tuesday rejected Saddam's appeal of his conviction and death sentence for the killing of 148 Shiites in the northern city of Dujail in 1982. The court said the former president should be hanged within 30 days.

The White House was preparing for Saddam's execution as early as this weekend, based on information that U.S. officials in Baghdad were receiving from the Iraqi government, a senior administration official said in Washington.

Iraq's deputy justice minister, Bosho Ibrahim, said Saddam shouldn't be hanged for another few weeks.

An official close to Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki told the Associated Press that Saddam would remain in a U.S. military prison until he is delivered to Iraqi authorities on the day of his execution. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the press.

The U.S. military said it captured the al-Qaeda in Iraq figure in a raid south of Baghdad.

Al-Qaeda in Iraq had claimed it killed the two U.S. soldiers found dead in June: Pfc. Kristian Menchaca of Houston and Pfc. Thomas Tucker of Madras, Ore.

The two were abducted when insurgents overran their checkpoint in the town of Youssifiyah. Spec. David Babineau of Springfield, Mass., was killed in that attack.

The Mujahadeen Shura Council, a collection of insurgent groups that includes al-Qaeda in Iraq, later released video purporting to show the decapitation of one of the soldiers. Their bodies were recovered after a search by 8,000 U.S. and Iraqi soldiers. Also Thursday:

Iraqi River Police Patrol The Tigris (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-fiske, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 29, 2006

Trained in the U.S., the officers bring out the dead and guard a violent stretch of waterway.

BAGHDAD — Divers call it "the burial ground," an impenetrably dark stretch of the Tigris River, about 20 feet deep, passing through the heart of Baghdad.

Cruising the river on a recent day strapped into life jackets that double as body armor, members of Baghdad's river patrol pointed to bridges near where they swam as children and now recover the city's dead.

"Violence, terror — it is part of what is going on here in Iraq," said a river patrol captain who would not give his name, fearing that insurgents in his neighborhood would discover that he works with the police. He said he gave up swimming in the river years ago and bought a pool.

The patrol's commander, Lt. Col. Alaa Saleh Ibrahim, has learned this much patrolling the stretch of muddy river the last two years: It takes at least 10 days for bodies to surface in winter. Men float faceup, women facedown.

Fishermen find bodies tangled in the 10-foot-tall green reeds that line the sandy banks.

"This month we are relieved," Ibrahim said. "We don't have so many dead bodies."

Death on the Tigris is almost always violent, the river patrol commander says. Some causes of deaths are unchanging: People jump from bridges, or get tangled in weeds while swimming and drown.

And then there are the dumped bodies, an increasingly frequent sight and a barometer of violence in a city that has become the epicenter of the country's sectarian strife: stripped of identification, blindfolded, handcuffed, shot and often badly decayed.

Rising body count

The river patrols, created by Saddam Hussein to retrieve casualties of his regime from the Tigris in the 1970s, have returned to body detail because of the city's civil war.

Ibrahim insists that his patrols find only three or four bodies a month. But he starts describing all of the dumped bodies he has seen recently — the suicides and swimmers gone awry — and the number grows to a dozen.

A week ago, fishermen led the patrol to the bodies of two men dumped among the reeds, one blindfolded and handcuffed, the other too decomposed to tell what had happened. They were still unidentified a week later.

But the number of bodies that Ibrahim sees is small compared with that at the major collection point, about 25 miles south of the capital in Suwayrah, where steel nets installed to siphon a river-choking weed called Nile Flower catch the dead — 366 bodies this year through November, the most recent data from the Health Ministry. The total included five women and two children.

Most of the victims were killed execution-style: handcuffed, blindfolded and shot. The bodies also showed signs of torture. A few were beheaded. Of the 366 found, 50 have been identified, police said, including that of human rights activist Margaret Hassan.

The number of bodies recovered in Suwayrah has decreased recently, health officials said. They think it's because killers in Baghdad are dumping bodies closer to home.

Baghdad families still search for loved ones at the morgue near Suwayrah. But they also leave photographs of the missing at river patrol headquarters, a whitewashed concrete compound on the east bank of the Tigris.

The new U.S. Embassy is under construction on the opposite bank, within view of the docks where the patrol's staff of 267, including 16 rescue divers, board their patrol boats.

They don't investigate deaths — other members of the Iraqi police handle that. The river patrol is too busy staffing 10 checkpoints to investigate suspicious boats for explosives, weapons and drugs.

In some cases, the dead are easily identified. After a 25-year-old man jumped from the Sinak Bridge in downtown Baghdad this month, the river patrol retrieved his body and identified him by a photograph on file.

The week before, a man came looking for his son, who was last seen swimming in the Tigris (which is against the law and a cause for arrest). The river patrol later found the youth, drowned.

DOJ_NMG_0110211

Members of the patrol wear caps that say "police" in Arabic and English. Last spring, 16 of them took an advanced river patrol training course at Stennis Space Center in Mississippi, about 50 miles north of New Orleans, the same course that U.S. Coast Guard and Navy sailors attend. Another Iraqi group will arrive in April.

During the last year, U.S. military trainers, mostly retired police officers, have worked with patrols on the Tigris.

"To be out on the river, basically open, it was a kind of a freedom you don't usually have on the streets, especially with the military set up the way they are now — you're kind of locked in your little tuna cans," said Richard Eaton of Frisco, Colo., who served with the Civilian Police Transition Team and trained members of the river patrol in the spring and summer.

The revived river patrol has trained members of 10 other patrols along other stretches of the Tigris. They are preparing to train units from the northern cities of Mosul and Salahuddin in a few weeks, Ibrahim said.

"As they seal off the road and highways, the rivers are going to be the next focus," Eaton said. "They need to shut them down, control the flow of people just like they do at checkpoints on the roads."

Eaton, a retired police detective, trained as a river patrol officer while serving on a destroyer in the Vietnam War. He likened Tigris patrols to those along Vietnam's Mekong Delta.

'Targeted all the time'

On the water, the river patrol officers look more like soldiers than police officers, with their helmets, body armor and long black rifles. Their old boats were looted or destroyed after Hussein's fall. They have 16 new ones, including five from the U.S. military that hit the river this month with machine guns at bow and stern.

"Because of the terrorists, we are targeted all the time. People come out from the bushes," said the captain who didn't want to be identified.

In the summer, Eaton was out with two boats patrolling a stretch of river in northern Baghdad at the U.S. Army's request when they came under machine-gun fire from insurgents on the banks. Attackers shot a member of the patrol in the leg and Eaton in the chest.

"Things were flying," Eaton said.

The bullet didn't penetrate Eaton's body armor, but it shattered his utility knife, sending fragments into his hand. He was flown back to the U.S. for treatment. The injured patrol member, Ali Fadhil, was treated at a local hospital and returned to duty.

Ali Abdullah, 22, who trained in Mississippi and followed his older brother into the river patrol, shrugged when asked about the hazards of the job. "Any kind of work is dangerous now," he said.

On the docks this month, divers shook off their black wetsuits and flippers in the winter sun, trying to warm up after a morning of practice dives.

Asad Saffar Abid, 22, has been diving for the patrol for four years and suspects there are hundreds of bodies at the bottom of the river that may never surface.

Veteran diver Mohammed Khazali knows better. He has been diving "the burial ground" for 24 years. In the 6,000-year-old Tigris, as in Iraq, history always resurfaces.

Iraqi Sniper Fire Forces A Healer To Tend His Own Wound (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

Petty Officer Third Class Dustin E. Kirby, a Navy corpsman whose efforts to save a wounded marine in Iraq were covered in an article published Nov. 2 in The New York Times, was severely wounded by an Iraqi sniper on Christmas afternoon, his family and the Marine Corps said yesterday.

The bullet struck the left side of his face while he was on the roof of Outpost Omar, the position his unit occupies in Karma, a city near Falluja in Anbar Province.

His jaw and upper palate were damaged extensively, but after several operations he was conscious and on a ventilator in a military hospital in Germany, his battalion commander, Lt. Col. Kenneth M. DeTreux, said by telephone.

Petty Officer Kirby, 22, of Hiram, Ga., was assigned to Weapons Company, Second Battalion, Eighth Marines, serving as the trauma medic for the company's Second Mobile Assault Platoon. It was his second tour in Iraq. He had married weeks before leaving the United States in July.

He was expected to arrive today at Bethesda Naval Medical Center in Maryland, where his wife, Lauren Kirby, and his parents, Gail and Jack Kirby, planned to meet him.

Although Petty Officer Kirby cannot speak because of his injuries, his mother said she had communicated with him through his brother-in-law, a serviceman who is stationed in Germany and has been at his bedside, holding a phone to Petty Officer Kirby's ear.

Petty Officer Kirby listened to his mother and replied by writing notes, which his brother-in-law read aloud.

"He told me, 'Don't cry, Mama,' " Ms. Kirby said by telephone. "I said, 'I have to. I'm a mom. That's what moms do.' "

She added, "He wrote, 'Be strong for me and Lauren.' "

In another note, she said, he wrote, simply, "Milkshake."

Colonel DeTreux said Petty Officer Kirby began writing within minutes of being shot, when he jotted a note to his platoon before being evacuated by helicopter.

In the first note he apologized to the company's senior enlisted man for being wounded, the colonel said. He then refused a stretcher and insisted on walking to the helicopter.

"He's tough," Colonel DeTreux said. "He showed his character, walking onto the aircraft himself."

The article last month was about the battlefield treatment Petty Officer Kirby provided, and the prayers he said, for a marine who had been shot through the head by an Iraqi sniper.

The marine, Lance Cpl. Colin Smith, had been his roommate in North Carolina before their unit returned to Iraq. Lance Corporal Smith was shot at the end of a raid both men participated in on Karma's outskirts. He remains under treatment and evaluation for injuries to his skull and brain.

Petty Officer Kirby was wounded when a sniper fired one shot on an otherwise quiet Christmas afternoon, Colonel DeTreux said. He was near one of several rooftop bunkers the company staffs to defend Outpost Omar, which has been attacked by insurgents several times, including once by a truck bomb.

He was the second member of his family to be grievously wounded in Iraq. A cousin, Petty Officer Joseph D. Worley, lost his left leg and suffered gunshot wounds to his right leg in 2004. He also was a corpsman in a Marine Corps unit.

The National Envelope Corporation, of Austell, Ga., where Petty Officer Kirby's father is a janitor, is taking donations to help his family.

Kathleen Childs, an executive assistant at the company who was helping to manage the donations, said collections began when it was uncertain whether the family could afford to visit Petty Officer Kirby from the moment he arrived in the United States.

Even before Gail Kirby arranged a plane ticket, Ms. Childs said, it was clear she was headed to his bedside, whether she had the money or not.

"His mother said there was no way she was going to stay at home while her boy was that close," Ms. Childs said. "She was going to start out on foot and walk."

Crisis In Housing Adds To Miseries Of Iraq Mayhem (NYT)

By Michael Luo

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

BAGHDAD — Along with its many other desperate problems, Iraq is in the midst of a housing crisis that is worsening by the day.

It began right after the toppling of Saddam Hussein, when many landlords took advantage of the removal of his economic controls and raised rents substantially, forcing out thousands of families who took shelter in abandoned government buildings and military bases. As the chaos in Iraq grew and the ranks of the jobless swelled, even more Iraqis migrated to squalid squatter encampments. Still others constructed crude shantytowns on empty plots where conditions were even worse.

Now, after more than 10 months of brutal sectarian reprisals, many more Iraqis have fled their neighborhoods, only to wind up often in places that are just as wretched in other ways. While 1.8 million Iraqis are living outside the country, 1.6 million more have been displaced within Iraq since the war began. Since February, about 50,000 per month have moved within the country.

Shelter is their most pressing need, aid organizations say. Some have been able to occupy homes left by members of the opposing sect or group; others have not been so fortunate. The longer the violence persists, the more Iraqis are running out of money and options.

Shatha Talib, 30, her husband and five children, are among about a thousand struggling Iraqi families that have taken up residence in the bombed-out remains of the former Iraqi Air Defense headquarters and air force club in the center of Baghdad. "Nobody should live in such a place," she said. "But we don't have any other option."

With many families in such encampments or worse, and many others doubled or tripled up in friends' or relatives' homes, the deputy housing minister, Istabraq al-Shouk, puts the shortage at two million dwellings across Iraq.

Iraqi officials say that after security, housing is a priority, but plans to address the problem are minimal. The Housing Ministry is building 17 complexes with 500 apartments each across the country for government employees and families of those killed by militants, Mr. Shouk said. That would be 8,500 homes.

Housing officials hope to attract foreign contractors to build about 350,000 more over the next few years, he said, but that depends largely on whether conditions can be made safe enough for them to work.

The shortage exists in many parts of Iraq, Mr. Shouk said. In Kirkuk, many Kurds driven out by Saddam Hussein in the 1980s who returned after the American-led invasion live in tent cities or hastily built houses. A survey of displaced people in Kirkuk by the International Organization for Migration found that more than 20 percent squat in government buildings or improvised settlements.

In Najaf, a southern city, throngs of destitute Shiite families have claimed buildings abandoned by the Baath Party and the government. Any trip across Baghdad, where the problem is particularly acute, reveals dozens of encampments.

The crisis appears more pronounced among Shiites than Sunnis because of the years of economic marginalization they endured under Mr. Hussein. At least two dozen Shiite families are living in an abandoned army hospital in southern Baghdad, having fled Sunni Arab insurgents in the Abu Ghraib area to the west. Hundreds of other Shiite families are camped in other buildings on the sprawling former army base known as Camp Rashid.

Jabir Munther, his two wives and nine children live in a dank room in a building that used to be the base hospital's radiology department. Rugs are the only furnishings. Outside Mr. Munther's open window is a pond of raw sewage.

He showed a visitor a creased leaflet signed by a Sunni insurgent group that warned Shiites to leave the Abu Ghraib area. A Sunni friend warned him that he would be killed the next day, so he fled, with the help of the network of the radical Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr.

Mr. Munther earns about $120 a month as a guard for a government ministry, he said, about half of what he needs to rent an apartment. He is grateful that he found the hospital, which has spotty electricity but usually reliable running water.

"It's better than living in a tent," he said.

Other Shiite refugees at Camp Rashid include former residents of Ramadi and Falluja in Anbar Province, centers of the Sunni insurgency. The former hospital is in the center of a bizarre moonscape of rubble, the result of contractors dumping debris on the hospital grounds. Children play all day amid the piles. They cannot go to school because no school is nearby. At other encampments, people say they have trouble enrolling their children because they have no permanent address.

On a recent morning, water trucks from Baghdad's municipal government arrived at the base; residents had been without water for a week after a pipe ruptured during construction of a nearby electrical substation. Women in black chadors flocked to the vehicles to fill their plastic containers.

One man who identified himself only by his nickname, Abu Firas, 54, said he was a member of the camp's unofficial city council. Before the government's fall, he lived in southern Baghdad. Laws under Mr. Hussein's rule protected him from eviction, he said, but after the invasion his landlord kicked him out.

Dozens of poor Shiite families have built ramshackle shelters out of rubble, corrugated tin and other materials on an empty stretch of land northeast of Sadr City, the Shiite district. They have no electricity. For water, they fill giant cisterns at a nearby water pipe.

Jassim Muhammad Marid, 65, said most residents of the shantytown were victims of the spiraling cost of living and the shortage of adequately paying jobs.

Many Iraqi families who do have housing are now living with three or even four generations under one roof. A dispute with his wife's family in Kut, a southern city, drove Ahmed Mishaan Battah, 22, and his wife to the former air force club.

In October, they moved onto the grounds, paying the previous occupants of their new home, the second floor of a severely damaged building, $50. It has become increasingly common for rooms in squatter encampments to be bought and sold like regular real estate.

The Battahs got one room with walls, where they sleep, but the others are exposed. They cook meals on a small gas burner, tiptoeing around a precipice. As Iraq's winter chill sets in, the Battahs, who are expecting their first child in a few months, are worried.

"I don't know what I'm going to do when the rains come," Mr. Battah said.

Nearly every family living here has some Dickensian tale of woe to share. In one of the main buildings, there is the family of a police officer killed in late fall. He took the job to try to scrape together the cash to move his wife, four children and niece out of this netherworld of trash and raw sewage. But a bomb in a booby-trapped body killed him.

Jameela Hashim, 48, who lives downstairs from them, has sold her family's heater, refrigerator and stove to help make ends meet. Her husband suffers from mental illness from his time in the military during the Iran-Iraq war. The couple guarded a hotel after the invasion in exchange for a place to live. But they lost that job and wound up at the air force club.

In an arrangement that is at once tragic and comic, Muhammad Ubaid, a carpenter; his wife, Ms. Talib; and their five children have ensconced themselves on the stage of the club's former theater. Like so many others, Mr. Ubaid struggled to find work after the American-led invasion. The family at first moved from their home in Dora to a less expensive neighborhood. But they soon lost that home, as well as Mr. Ubaid's carpentry shop.

DOJ_NMG_0110214

A friend suggested they try the theater, which was unoccupied. Mr. Ubaid built a makeshift shelter for his family on the stage. It includes a front window that looks out on the empty auditorium with no seats. After the invasion, looters ripped out every one in a matter of hours.

Mr. Ubaid still takes occasional furniture orders from customers. A fancy set of sofas was parked on stage on a recent afternoon. But the meager income he earns is not enough to move his family out. The Ubaids remain on the stage, living out their own drama.

Prince Harry Off To Iraq (DT)

The Daily Telegragh, December 29, 2006

Harry will be stationed near the southern port city of Basra and will likely be assigned to patrol the border with Iran.

London's Daily Telegraph said Harry, 22, is determined to go, despite reports of resistance from many in the military who fear he would be a fat prize for terrorists.

They're also worried he would attract attention and put his fellow soldiers in greater danger.

The Telegraph said officials are trying to figure out how to minimise the danger without giving Harry special treatment.

As a second lieutenant, he will have command of 11 men and four light tanks.

Meanwhile, the Prince has joined girlfriend Chelsy Davy, 21, and her family on Bazaruto Island, off Mozambique, for the third year running for a holiday courtesy of safari operator Charles Davy.

Harry has become increasingly close to the Zimbabwean-born tycoon, who has been widely criticised for his links to Robert Mugabe.

Mr Davy is one of the country's biggest landowners and is thought to control about 1 per cent of all agricultural land at a time when many white farmers are being brutally forced out of their livelihood.

Harry has refused to hear a word against him and has once more chosen to abandon the Royal Family's traditional New Year at Sandringham in favour of spending his holiday with the Davy clan.

Genghis Khan: Law And Order (LAT)

By Jack Weatherford

The Los Angeles Times, December 29, 2006

IN HIS FINAL televised speech to the Iraqi people in 2003, Saddam Hussein denounced the invading Americans as "the Mongols of this age," a reference to the last time infidels had conquered his country, in 1258. But the comparison isn't very apt — unlike the Mongols, the Americans don't have the organizational genius of Genghis Khan.

In the 13th century, Temujin — better known by his title, Genghis Khan ("world leader") — headed a tribal nation smaller than the workforce of Wal-Mart, yet he conquered and ruled more people than anyone in history. After Genghis Khan's death, his grandson, Hulegu, further expanded the empire, easily conquering most of the Middle East and achieving the Mongols' aim: the establishment of a trade corridor from Korea on the Pacific to Syria on the Mediterranean, one part of their goal of controlling the world.

So that every warrior knew his place within the struggle, Genghis Khan began each campaign with meetings to communicate to his approximately 100,000 soldiers where and why they would fight. The legal justification for the Mongol invasion of Iraq derived from the reluctance of the caliph of Baghdad to control the Shiite Cult of the Assassins, whom the Mongols accused of attempting to kill their khan.

The assassins operated from a series of fortified mountain camps spread from contemporary Afghanistan to Iraq, and the Baghdad invasion did not begin until the Mongols had eradicated the threat from the assassins and destroyed their fortresses. For the final attack on the caliph, the Mongols assembled a coalition of nations, and as their main army invaded Iraq in two columns from the east and the south, their allies approached from the north and west.

Genghis Khan recognized that victory came by conquering people, not land or cities. In contrast to the Americans in 2003, who sought to take the largest cities first in a campaign of shock and awe, the Mongols in 1258 took the smallest settlements first, gradually working toward the capital. Both the Mongols and the Americans used heavy bombardment to topple Baghdad, but whereas the Americans rushed into the capital in a triumphant victory celebration, the Mongols wisely decided not to enter the defeated — but still dangerous — city. They ordered the residents to evacuate, and then they sent in Christian and Muslim allies, who seethed with a variety of resentments against the caliph, to expunge any pockets of resistance and secure the capital. The Americans ended up as occupiers; the Mongols pulled strings, watching from camps in the countryside.

The Mongols also immediately executed the caliph and his sons on charges that they spent too much money on their palaces and not enough defending their nation. They killed most members of the court and administration. The Mongols took no prisoners and allowed no torture, but they executed swiftly and efficiently, including the soldiers of the defeated army who, they believed, would be a constant source of future problems if allowed to live. The first several months of a Mongol invasion were bloody, but once the takeover ended, the bloodshed ended.

By contrast, the American military campaign was quick, with comparatively few Iraqi (or coalition) casualties, but the bloodshed has continued for years. Constrained from decisively dispatching enemies of a new Iraq, the United States has allowed Iraqi terrorists to select who lives and who dies, including women and children, in a slow-motion massacre.

And while the violence continues, the U.S. can't come close to establishing a government that rivals what the Mongols achieved. They exercised a genius for speaking to people in terms that they understood. When conquering Muslims, Genghis Khan always announced that Allah willed the Mongol victory as divine punishment; to resist the Mongols was to defy the will of God.

Just as the Mongols perfected the list of who to kill in a conquered land, they knew whom to reward and how to do it. In Baghdad, Hulegu installed a government under Ata Malik Juvaini, a devout Persian Muslim, who governed for most of the next 20 years and whose writings survive as some of the great scholarly works of the Muslim world.

The Mongols spared anyone with a craft, such as carpentry, writing, pottery, weaving or metal working. They fiercely enforced religious freedom, which created an essentially secular state. In Baghdad, they gave many of the caliph's palaces to Mongol allies for more practical uses. They lowered taxes for merchants and eliminated them for religious, medical and educational professionals. They educated women along with men. For all subjects, they instituted harsh laws enforced equally under nearly incorruptible officials.

Fundamentalist Muslims look back at Mongol secularism as a scourge. But, although U.S. rule in Iraq has produced a constant flow of refugees, particularly religious minorities, out of the country, under Mongol rule Christian, Muslim, Jewish and even Buddhist immigrants poured into the newly conquered Iraq to live under the Great Law of Genghis Khan. It was said that during this time a virgin could cross the length of the Mongol Empire with a pot of gold on her head and never be molested.

By the time of the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, the political achievements of the Mongols had been forgotten, and only the destructive fury of their wars was remembered. Yet under the Mongols — and the legacy of Genghis Khan — Iraq enjoyed a century of peace and a renaissance that brought the region to a level of prosperity and cultural sophistication higher than it enjoyed before or after. Any country with a bent for empire could do worse than learn from Genghis Khan.

Caesar: Diplomacy And Power (LAT)

By Adrian Goldsworthy

The Los Angeles Times, December 29, 2006

WHAT WOULD Julius Caesar do in Iraq? "He'd win" is the simplest answer. How he would do it is harder to say — after all, just how would a man like that behave in the modern world? We can never know, but his campaigns in Gaul give us a fair idea.

When Caesar led his legions into Gaul — basically present-day France and Belgium — in 58 BC, many of the tribes there greeted him as a liberator. Six years later, almost all of them rebelled against him in a war fought with appalling savagery. Through skill and luck, Caesar won. He then spent the better part of two years in painstaking diplomacy. As one of his own officers put it: "Caesar had one main aim, keeping the tribes friendly and giving them neither the opportunity nor cause for war." It worked, and Gaul remained at peace when he left in 49 BC.

From the start, Caesar backed his campaigns with concerted and highly personal diplomacy. He met the tribal leaders as a council at least once a year and visited them individually more often. The great rebellion in 52 BC was all the more surprising because it was led by chieftains who had done very well out of their alliance with Caesar. They had decided that they would do even better if the Romans were expelled. Allies, and especially those in an occupied country, may not necessarily have the same long-term ambitions.

Of course, Gaul in the 1st century BC was a very different place from Iraq today. The many mutually hostile tribes of Gaul, divided by language if not religion, had never been combined into a single nation. Caesar came as a conqueror, the agent of a blatantly imperialistic Roman Republic that had already occupied much of the Mediterranean world. There was no talk of creating a free democracy, still less of exit strategies. Gaul would remain part of Rome's empire for more than five centuries.

Caesar was effectively a free agent because there was no way that the Senate could have directed events from Rome when messages took weeks to reach Gaul. He also combined supreme civil and military power in his office as proconsul, so that he both devised and implemented political and military strategy. There was a single mind and purpose behind Roman policy in Gaul. Despite his power, Caesar couldn't lose and get away with it. Failure would have meant exile or death. Put simply, Caesar could not afford to consider withdrawal.

Even without 24-hour news and an international community watching his every move, Caesar was acutely aware of the need to win over public opinion. Each winter he produced an account of the year's campaign, designed to be read aloud and to thrill an audience of Romans. From the beginning, these were acknowledged as one of the highest expressions of the Latin language.

The Bush administration has been far less effective in selling the war to the U.S. public, and Tony Blair's government has made even more of a mess of winning over domestic opinion in Britain. More seriously, from the beginning there were major errors in strategy. The coalition forces have performed superbly, but too few troops were sent, especially because insufficient attention was paid to reconstructing Iraq.

When Caesar suffered one of his few defeats and lost 1 1/2 legions in the winter of 54-53 BC, his response was to replace them with twice as many men. The idea was to show that Roman resources and determination were inexhaustible.

Caesar knew that soldiers could only do so much and that lasting peace needed a political settlement. In Gaul, the tribes were left to govern themselves in their day-to-day affairs — that was the Roman way. In the long term, the leaders would be absorbed into Rome's aristocracy. In the short term, they had to be treated fairly and persuaded that accepting Roman rule was more attractive than resorting to violence.

At times, Caesar was ruthless in ways that would and should be utterly unacceptable to the United States and its allies. One prominent chieftain who displeased him died "resisting capture." Another was publicly flogged and beheaded without the formality of a trial. These were misjudgments and helped provoke the great rebellion in 52 BC. Other brutal warnings of the price of opposing Rome were more effective — the defenders of one captured town had their hands cut off. Caesar also launched attacks on neighboring Germans and Britons because he felt that they threatened the peace in Gaul. Today he would presumably be more ready than seems sensible to make similar strikes on Iran or Syria.

Caesar made mistakes in Gaul, and came very close to defeat, but he never doubted his ultimate success. This was not just a question of staying the course. Caesar was able to admit when he had made a mistake. He adapted, changed his plans to meet a situation and threw every resource — including his own massive energy — into achieving his aim. In a few years in Gaul, initial victory turned to apparent disaster, and that was turned into lasting success.

Caesar's experience shows how a seemingly desperate situation can be salvaged, but it does not suggest that this is easy, and there is a lot about his example we would not want to follow. The time it took for Caesar to turn the situation around in Gaul shifted the political balance in Rome hugely in favor of his bitterest opponents. Victorious in Gaul, he still saw his career threatened with extinction. He didn't hesitate. He left Gaul to make war on his own country. Mavericks like Caesar make effective war leaders — but can be dangerous if a state fails to control them.

Lincoln: Focus On The Real Foe (LAT)

By Harold Holzer

The Los Angeles Times, December 29, 2006

PRESIDENT BUSH has often cited Lincolnian resolve to justify staying the course in Iraq. He takes inspiration from the knowledge that Abraham Lincoln too endured failure, frustration and dissent, not to mention more American casualties on a single day at Antietam than we've lost in all four years in Iraq. Yet Lincoln still persuaded the North to persevere "until every drop of blood drawn with the lash, shall be paid by another drawn with the sword."

Such comparisons are not all inapt. Just as Bush widened (diluted?) the war against terrorism by invading Iraq, Lincoln broadened American goals mid-conflict. The war to save the Union became a war to end slavery. Both presidents sought increased powers at home. Lincoln not only imposed the military tribunals that Bush dreams about, he once allowed troops to shut down an unfriendly New York newspaper and imprison its editor. Bush has never gone that far — much as he might like to.

Nor did Lincoln seek preemptive war; it sought him. "You can have no conflict," he said at his first inaugural, "without being yourselves the aggressors." But when war "came," as he later put it, Lincoln proved far nimbler than Bush, quickly shifting course when necessary. As soon as the first 75,000 Union volunteers proved inadequate, he called for 300,000 more. When 90-day recruits went home, he ordered three-year service instead. When white soldiers alone could not win, he welcomed "colored" troops into the ranks. And when even this vast volunteer army could not restore the Union, Lincoln imposed the nation's first military draft.

Unlike Bush, who waited six years to remove Donald Rumsfeld, Lincoln jettisoned his first, failed secretary of war in just 10 months. He elevated and dismissed generals rapidly, even ruthlessly, until he found the right one in Ulysses S. Grant.

He even surpassed Bush when it came to finding weapons of mass destruction — albeit for his own use. He encouraged innovations such as rifled artillery and ironclad warships. The president famous for espousing "malice toward none" argued that the war could not be won with "elder-stalk squirts, charged with rose water." He wanted cities leveled, enemies destroyed.

Most important, Lincoln understood that "public sentiment is everything" (he said it in his first debate with Stephen Douglas). He was not only decider in chief but communicator in chief. In his brilliant speeches defining the nature of democracy and sacrifice — all widely published — Lincoln kept Americans informed and inspired.

So what might Lincoln do today?

First, focus on the real enemy: terrorists. When advisors suggested he start a war with England merely to woo patriotic Southerners back into the Union, Lincoln replied: "One war at a time." He also rejected adventurism against French-controlled Mexico. Today Lincoln would fight only the war that needs fighting.

Second, embrace flexibility. Seek the right generals, strategies, troop levels and weaponry, and be willing to change course and personnel swiftly.

Third, communicate objectives with frequency, passion and precision. No one can match Lincoln's eloquence, but no president should abandon Lincoln's commitment to engage the public.

Fourth, spend more time at the front. Lincoln visited the troops often, absorbing their pain and boosting their morale. Maybe his case was better, but his manner of symbolizing it was best.

Finally, abandon the notion of divine will to justify war. Even the pious Lincoln came to realize it was fruitless, even sacrilegious, to invoke God as his ally. "In great contests each party claims to act in accordance with the will of God," he lamented. "Both may be, and one must be, wrong." As Lincoln understood: "The Almighty has his own purposes."

Washington: The Crying Game (LAT)

By Joseph J. Ellis

The Los Angeles Times, December 29, 2006

IT'S A RIDICULOUS question: "What would George Washington do about Iraq?" Well, if you plopped him down in Baghdad, he would be utterly lost. He couldn't find Iraq on a map. Show him a cellphone, a helicopter or a Humvee and he wouldn't order them into action, he'd be mesmerized. He is simply unavailable for a conversation about Iraq.

But suppose you could contact him, and suppose you posed a question to him that never mentioned Iraq specifically yet described the fundamental strategic dilemma facing the United States. It might go like this:

"Can a powerful army sustain control over a widely dispersed foreign population that contains a militant minority prepared to resist subjugation at any cost?"

Washington would recognize the strategic problem immediately, because it is a description of the predicament facing the British army in the colonies' War for Independence.

And, more than anyone else, Washington's experience during the war as the leader of an American insurgency allowed him to appreciate the inherently intractable problems that faced an army of occupation in any protracted conflict.

Until the winter of 1777-78 at Valley Forge, Washington thought of the war against Britain as a contest between two armies. When the British army presented itself for battle, as it did on Long Island in the summer of 1776, Washington felt honor-bound to fight — a decision that proved calamitous on that occasion and nearly lost the war at the very start. That's because the British had a force of 32,000 men against his 12,000. If Washington had not changed his thinking, the American Revolution almost surely would have failed because the Continental Army was no match for the British leviathan.

But at Valley Forge, Washington began to grasp an elemental idea: Namely, he did not have to win the war. Time and space were on his side. And no matter how many battles the British army won, it could not sustain control over the countryside unless it was enlarged tenfold, at a cost that British voters would never support. Eventually the British would recognize that they faced an impossibly open-ended mission and would decide to abandon their North American empire. Which is exactly what happened.

The implications for U.S. policy in Iraq are reasonably clear, and they pretty much endorse the recommendations of the Baker-Hamilton Iraq Study Group. Like the British decision to subjugate the American colonies, the Bush decision to democratize Iraq has been misguided from the start. The administration never appreciated the odds against its success, and it disastrously confused conventional military superiority with the demands imposed on an army of occupation.

No man in American history understood those lessons better than Washington, who viewed them as manifestations of British imperial arrogance, which he described as "founded equally in Malice, absurdity, and error." If dropped into Baghdad, he would weep at our replication of the same imperial scenario.

Afghan Angry At Pakistan's Plan For Mines And Fence On Border (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Dec. 28 — President Hamid Karzai voiced strong opposition on Thursday to Pakistan's announcement that it would lay mines and erect fences along its border with Afghanistan. He said the moves would only hurt the people living in the region and would not stem cross-border terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0110218

“Thousands and thousands and thousands of people have been maimed and killed by mines,” Mr. Karzai said in comments to journalists at the Presidential Palace, “and we are strongly against this idea. We are politically against it, and in humanitarian terms we are against it.

“Mines will not prevent terrorism crossing the border into Afghanistan, or militants who come and kill our people. Laying mines or fencing the border will only separate people and families from each other. Rather than helping, it will cause people difficulty in movement in trade and meeting each other.”

Mr. Karzai has for months been accusing Pakistan of being a source of terrorism and of providing a haven to insurgent groups that, he says, recruit, organize and train fighters and suicide bombers who are then sent into Afghanistan.

“If we want to prevent terrorism as a whole, forever eradicate them and defeat them,” he said, “then you must remove their sanctuaries, then you must remove the places they are being trained, their sources of finance, equipment and training. That is the best way.”

Pakistan has denied the existence of training camps and the presence of Taliban or insurgent groups on its side of the border.

The Pakistani government has also deployed more than 80,000 soldiers in its border provinces to try to stem cross-border infiltration, and has now started to mine and fence the border to seal it more effectively, Riaz Mohammed Khan, the foreign secretary, said Tuesday at a briefing in Islamabad, the capital.

The border, known as the Durand Line, for a British official who demarcated the boundary between Afghanistan and British India, has never been recognized by Afghanistan and remains contested at many points along its 1,500-mile length. It cuts through mountains and divides tribes and extended families of the region, many of them ethnic Pashtun like Mr. Karzai.

“The same families are living on this side and on that side,” he said. “It is only going to prevent movement by civilian families and tribes.”

Cut-and-Run Is Not In Their Vocabulary (WSJ)

By Daniel Henninger

The Wall Street Journal, December 29, 2006

If someone this weekend says "Happy New Year" in Iraq or Afghanistan, would anyone in the world hear it? For many, the people of Iraq and Afghanistan have become like trees falling in an empty forest. The world doesn't want to hear it. Indeed, the one apparent accomplishment of the Baker-Hamilton report is that it freed people to say that Iraq is a "failure." Afghanistan, with fewer suicide bombings, never became much of a story in our domestic political wars, and so has largely receded into the mists.

It is ironic that despite the years of our daily engagement in these places, the "information age" has brought us so little knowledge about the people of Iraq and Afghanistan. Psychologically, much of America has already cut and run from these two countries.

Some Americans, though, simply won't.

In April 2004, this column told the story of Spirit of America, organized by Jim Hake, to provide citizen-supported aid to the troops serving in Iraq and Afghanistan. Then in May 2005 this space was given over to an account of American businesswomen working to help women in post-Taliban Afghanistan.

Here in the U.S., the political new year will fill up fast enough with politicians and pundits offering ways to unwind and spindle the commitments America made to Iraq and Afghanistan. So this seemed a good moment to revisit the folks running Spirit of America and the Business Council for Peace. They're not going to leave.

Spirit of America's experience in Iraq has followed the same rugged timeline of events as the war. Recall that in April 2004 it raised sufficient monies to rebuild TV stations in Al Anbar province, staffed by Iraqis, to counterbalance propaganda from the likes of al-Jazeera. Those TV stations were built. And they have been destroyed. A sewing center for Iraqi women was similarly destroyed.

This past year, the group got a request from the Army 451st Battalion to help restore the medical facilities at the Najaf Teaching Hospital. The Mahdi militia had occupied it for a time. Spirit of America sent seven cardiac monitors to the hospital's director, Safaa Hamedi. In October, gunmen killed Dr. Hamedi outside his home.

Still, requests from the Marines and Army continue to arrive at Spirit of America. An Army captain in Afghanistan's Parwan province asked for medical textbooks for local doctors. SoA sent bee serum to inoculate honey bees at a business in Iraq's Diyala region. Marine Lt. Jim Wilmott got camping equipment for 200 Iraqi Boy Scouts. At the request of U.S. Embassy personnel, SoA has sent clothing and school supplies for orphans in Baghdad and Basra. They've sent thousands of kids' backpacks and school supplies requested by soldiers around the country. With the SonoSite ultrasound company, SoA delivered handheld ultrasound machines to the primary hospital in Al Qaim, Iraq, near the Syrian border. "Before this," said Mr. Hake, "they were using seashells to listen to the sounds of a pregnant mother and baby; the Marines couldn't believe it."

Jim Hake says Spirit of America's contributions have fallen off since 2004 owing to general fatigue with Iraq, "but under the circumstances people continue to be quite generous." An end-of-the-year funding request raised more than $150,000. "The emails we send to donors are not a good-news operation," says Mr. Hake. "We don't want to put a happy face on it. But the information is more encouraging than what they typically hear. The destroyed projects are hardly good news, but there are lots of guys and gals in the military there who are not just marking time, who want to see this work." * * *

It was about 19 months ago to the day that 13 women from Afghanistan were looking out the windows of the 29th floor of the Empire State Building in midtown Manhattan, brought there by a group of American businesswomen who call themselves the Business Council for Peace (Bpeace). One of the women remarked that New York looked "very new." The idea was to expose the Afghans, most of them college graduates, to basic business know-how. Bpeace had identified the Afghans as "fast runners," women with entrepreneurial instincts. Kate Bruggeln, a Council member and retailing specialist, just returned from Kabul, her fourth trip there. Three other Bpeace women were with her.

"These trips to Afghanistan always stagger you in the best way," she said this week. "Afghanistan is a longer road than our election cycle can endure, but these women are the future of Afghanistan. This isn't a replay of the last decade. Our group's been working with them for almost two years. They are making progress."

The big event on this trip was the preparations to open Rangeen Kaman Artisans, a for-profit cooperative run by 10 of the Bpeace "associates." Another associate, Afifa, has opened a fitness center for women; it shares electrical power with the RKA store. The Americans are also working with the Afghan Women's Business Federation to create a business-formation curriculum across the country.

"The thing Afghans fear most is that we're going to leave," Ms. Brugelln says. "Not only do they fear it, they predict it, because everyone has done it before. This fourth trip by our group was profoundly meaningful to them. In the face of all the instability, we showed up again. Bpeace won't be part of the downward spiral."

Could this determination be a variant of the much-mocked "stay the course"? It is at least an interesting irony that the people who have had their faces deepest in Iraq and Afghanistan the longest, as soldiers or volunteers like these, are the ones inclined to stick it out; while many here whose experience comes off the bloody front page every day are the ones looking for a way to -- there is no other phrase -- cut and run.

Groups such as the Spirit of America and the Business Council for Peace may yet be driven out. It is to this country's credit that early on, they voted with their feet to go in, and regret nothing.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Apple Probe Finds Jobs Was Aware Of Some Grants (WSJ)

By Steve Goldstein

The Wall Street Journal, December 29, 2006

Apple Computer Inc. said in a filing to the Securities and Exchange Commission that CEO Steve Jobs was aware or recommended the selection of some favorable stock-option grant dates, but didn't personally benefit from it.

FOCUS ON JOBS

From company filings made this morning:

Although the investigation found that CEO Steve Jobs was aware or recommended the selection of some favorable grant dates, he did not receive or financially benefit from these grants or appreciate the accounting implications. The Special Committee also found that the investigation had raised serious concerns regarding the actions of two former officers in connection with the accounting, recording and reporting of stock option grants. Read more1.

In a delayed annual filing made with the SEC, the company said a special committee of the board of directors appointed to look into past stock-option grants concluded that while Mr. Jobs was "aware or recommended the selection of some favorable grant dates, he did not receive or financially benefit from these grants or appreciate the accounting implications." (See details of Apple's filing2.)

"The special committee, its independent counsel and forensic accountants have performed an exhaustive investigation of Apple's stock option granting practices," former Vice President Al Gore, chair of the special committee, and Jerome York, chair of Apple's Audit and Finance Committee, said in a joint statement. "The board of directors is confident that the company has corrected the problems that led to the restatement, and it has complete confidence in Steve Jobs and the senior management team."

The special committee of Cupertino, Calif.-based company also found that the investigation had raised serious concerns regarding the actions of two former officers in connection with the accounting, recording and reporting of stock-option grants.

Apple is also restating financial statements from 2004-2006. In total, Apple is restating earnings after tax by $4 million in 2006, $7 million in 2005 and $10 million in 2004. The company also plans to take an $84 million noncash charge as a result.

The filing was widely anticipated. The company revealed in June that some stock options awarded to employees might have been mishandled. It launched an investigation that found accounting irregularities between 1997 and 2002 and showed that Mr. Jobs was aware of some options backdating. In August, the company said it would likely have to restate past financial results.

The three-month probe identified a number of grants for which grant dates were intentionally selected in order to obtain favorable exercise prices, the company said. Of 42,077 stock-option grants made on 259 dates between October 1996 and January 2003, 6,428 grants on 42 dates are not the proper measurement dates. And of two option grants awarded to Mr. Jobs, one was improperly dated Oct. 19, 2001, with an exercise price of $18.03, instead of the correct date of Dec. 18, when Apple was trading at $21.01. That stock-option grant was for 7.5 million shares. The SEC and the U.S. Attorney's Office have been informed of the results of its probe, Apple said.

Apple Filing To Tell All On Options (NYT)

By John Markoff And Miguel Helft

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Dec. 28 — Apple Computer and its charismatic chief executive, Steven P. Jobs, are expected to make a big announcement about a new product at the Macworld conference next month. Before that, however, the company has some other highly anticipated information to share.

The company is likely to answer questions about backdated options granted to Mr. Jobs and other executives in a delayed annual report that Apple said it would file with securities regulators on Friday.

Apple is among dozens of companies, many of them in Silicon Valley, which have come under scrutiny for assigning favorable grant dates to stock options to inflate their value.

So far, Apple, which is known for obsessively guarding information about new products, appears to have applied the same secrecy to its handling of the stock option issues. Publicly, it has confined its response to a few terse statements. This week it continued to maintain its silence as reports about possible falsified documents rattled shareholders.

“What we want a company to do is to get good information in the marketplace as soon as it has that information,” said Patrick McGurn, executive vice president of Institutional Shareholder Services, which advises its clients on corporate governance issues. “Obviously the information has dribbled in fits and starts out of Apple. It has been more of a piecemeal approach.”

But Mr. McGurn noted that Apple faced unique challenges.

“Apple is in a much more difficult position than other companies in the backdating morass, because a significant portion of its market valuation is based on Steve Jobs staying at his job,” he said.

The company has said that Mr. Jobs knew of some backdated grants, but that he did not knowingly receive any of them and had not benefited from the practice.

As part of its annual report, the company will most likely say more about the findings of a three-month investigation it commissioned to look into its accounting for stock options. One former Securities and Exchange Commission official said that if Mr. Jobs signs the document, as he is required to do under Sarbanes-Oxley, and Apple’s auditors endorse that signature, it would indicate that the auditors feel he is not in jeopardy.

“The fact that the auditors would accept the Jobs certification reflects that they were satisfied that the internal investigation had been thorough and that the results of the internal report could be relied upon,” said Michael D. Mann, a partner at the New York law firm of Richards Kibbe & Orbe and a former director of the Office of International Affairs at the S.E.C.

Apple’s auditor, KPMG, has been trying to avoid controversy since it reached a deferred-prosecution agreement with the Justice Department last year in a case involving illegal tax shelters. Analysts said that would lead the firm to be particularly vigilant in its auditing of options cases.

James D. Cox, a professor of corporate and securities law at Duke University, said the report could still contain some unpleasant surprises. “The mere fact that he is producing a report with his signature doesn’t mean the report doesn’t contain damning information,” Professor Cox said. “Assuming the report identifies false documents, does it make clear statements as to who is responsible and, equally, as to who is not responsible, and why?”

The options issues at Apple, which the company first disclosed in June, came back into the spotlight this week when The Recorder, a San Francisco newspaper owned by American Lawyer Media, reported that the investigation conducted by a law firm on Apple's behalf had found that options documents had been falsified to increase the value of grants to Apple executives.

On Thursday, The Financial Times reported that investigators had discovered an options grant to Mr. Jobs that had not been properly authorized by the company's board.

The two reports, which did not name sources, sent shares of Apple on a roller-coaster ride. The shares declined 65 cents, to $80.87 on Thursday, and are down 1.6 percent for the week after falling as low as $76.77 on Wednesday.

A spokesman for Apple, Steve Dowling, said the company planned to meet its target for filing the report, and declined to comment further. "We're providing all details to the S.E.C. and not commenting," Mr. Dowling said.

In an e-mail message, a spokesman for the United States attorney's office in San Francisco, which in July created a special joint task force with the Federal Bureau of Investigation to investigate stock option backdating, declined to comment.

After the review of its options accounting practices, Apple said in October that while there had been 15 instances of backdating, the review had found no misconduct by any member of Apple's current management team.

The language of Apple's statement, coupled with the simultaneous resignation from the board of Fred D. Anderson, the company's former chief financial officer, led analysts to believe that Apple and Mr. Jobs were attempting to distance themselves from any blame in the case.

Analysts have also focused on the possible role of Nancy Heinen, Apple's former general counsel, in the options grants. Ms. Heinen left the company without a public announcement in May and declined to comment on the reason for her departure.

Both Ms. Heinen and Mr. Anderson have retained their own lawyers.

"Nancy Heinen has a well-earned reputation over 20 years for honesty and integrity, and any rumors to the contrary are without foundation," said Cristina C. Arguedas, Ms. Heinen's lawyer.

Mr. Anderson's lawyer did not return calls, but an associate of Mr. Anderson's who declined to be identified because of the complexity of the legal situation, said that because of the way the options granting process worked at Apple, it was unlikely that Mr. Anderson would have been in a position to alter option dates.

Although he resigned from the job of chief financial officer in 2004 and went on to help found Elevation Partners, a private equity firm, Mr. Anderson spent time at Apple this year reviewing the options matters before resigning from the board.

Gene Munster, an analyst with Piper Jaffray who follows Apple, said he did not expect the investigations into Apple's options practices to implicate Mr. Jobs, who he said had not historically been involved in compensation issues.

"Everything we know about Apple is that the compensation side is not something Jobs has ever been involved in," Mr. Munster said. "The key thing, and the only thing Wall Street cares about, is whether Jobs will be impacted, and we don't believe he will be." Piper Jaffray has an outperform rating on Apple stock.

In a research note on Wednesday, Benjamin Reitzes, an analyst at UBS Investment Research, said there was little to fear.

"Investors seem to be reacting to the mention of Steve Jobs," Mr. Reitzes wrote. "We believe it could make sense to obtain counsel given his immense personal fortune and influence."

Jobs Possibly A Part Of Apple Options Inquiry (AP)

By May Wong, THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, December 29, 2006

SAN JOSE, Calif. -- Shares of Apple Computer Inc. had another wild ride Thursday after new details of a federal investigation into the company's stock options practices raised questions about the role played by its charismatic chief exedutive, Steve Jobs.

Shares of the iPod and Macintosh computer maker closed at $80.87, down 65 cents, or less than 1 percent, after falling more than 2 percent during the day. On Wednesday, shares slid 5 percent before rebounding.

Citing unnamed people familiar with the matter, the Financial Times reported that Jobs received 7.5 million stock options in 2001 without the required board authorization and that documents were later falsified to indicate otherwise.

The Securities and Exchange Commission is looking at those documents among other evidence in its review of Apple's backdating of stock options, the British newspaper said.

"It does create a certain amount of doubt as to whether Steve Jobs can stay with the company," Rob Enderle of the research firm Enderle Group said Thursday. "It looks more and more serious."

Backdating is the manipulation of the timing of stock options to bolster the profits of executives and employees. Apple is among nearly 200 companies ensnared in the scandal and that have disclosed SEC, Justice Department or internal investigations.

DOJ_NMG_0110222

In June Apple began an internal review of its grants, including one to Jobs. Apple said in October that it found 15 misdated grants from 1997 to 2002. The Recorder, a San Francisco-based legal newspaper, first reported Wednesday on the discovery of possibly falsified documents related to options.

Full details of Apple's options troubles have yet to emerge, but the Cupertino, Calif.-based company largely exonerated Jobs in October when it said an internal investigation had not found any misconduct by current management. The investigation did raise serious questions, however, about two former officers, the company said.

Experts who would speak only generally without any facts about the Apple imbroglio say that if Jobs knew about the falsification of documents, he could be in trouble.

"Any CEO that has falsified documents and filed or certified false statements made to investors and the SEC will put themselves in the cross hairs of law enforcement agencies," Lynn Turner, a former SEC chief accountant, said in an e-mail.

But even if Jobs was aware, proving it would be a challenge, said Dennis Codon, a lawyer at Robins, Kaplan, Miller & Ciresi LLP in Los Angeles.

Jobs later surrendered those options without exercising them and realized no financial benefit.

Faking documents to make it look like a meeting occurred to support backdating has happened in corporate America and is not a surprise, said Codon, whose office aids companies in crisis management.

At the same time, the falsification of records could have been done by others without an executive's knowledge, he said.

Codon said he knows of top executives who truly were unaware of some of the accounting implications in backdating, which Apple said in October was the case for Jobs.

"I could see how a chairman would not have a clue," Codon said. "I'm not convinced Jobs is in trouble, but he could be if he knew and participated in putting that situation together."

SEC spokesman John Heine, and Luke Macauley, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in the Northern District of California, which created a stock-options task force in July, both declined to comment.

Financial analysts have largely shrugged off the reports, seeing little impact as long as Jobs, Apple's iconic co-founder and CEO, remained unscathed.

Apple's 2006 Report Could Hold Clues In Options Scandal (SFC)

By Jessica Guynn, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, December 29, 2006

Rarely before in the business world has the filing of a company's annual report been as widely anticipated as the one Apple Computer Inc. is expected to submit today amid a deepening stock options scandal that has raised questions about CEO Steve Jobs.

Apple was rocked this week by reports of forged documents connected with an award Jobs received in 2001 of millions of options to buy Apple stock. What happens to Jobs, one of the technology world's commanding figures, could depend on what he knew about options problems at Apple and when he knew it.

Apple watchers will pore over Apple's filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission in search of assurances that Jobs had no direct involvement in any stock-options shenanigans.

Jobs holds an unusual place in corporate America. He is more cult than corporate leader, credited with creating must-have products and reinvigorating the Cupertino maker of iPods and Macintosh.

"Steve is a one-man revolution," said longtime Silicon Valley watcher Paul Saffo. "He is not your average money-grubbing, hired gun corporate CEO. There is probably no one out there other than Bill Gates and the folks (at Microsoft) who want to see him distracted from his job."

But Jobs and his company have been plunged into scandal in recent months after disclosures that Apple may have improperly granted stock options to Jobs and other executives.

Apple spokesman Steve Dowling declined to comment except to say that Apple is providing "all details" of its internal investigation of the matter to the SEC. Federal prosecutors are reportedly also looking at possible wrongdoing in Apple's options program.

As many as 200 U.S. companies have been tarred with similar revelations of misconduct in reporting options granted to executives and other employees. Many of those companies have been forced to restate financial results. Well-known executives in technology and other sectors have resigned because of improper conduct related to options. At two companies, officers have been criminally indicted.

But none of the companies affected so far has such a famous name or plays such a central role in the technology world as Apple Computer and its storied CEO. That has raised the stakes of corporate America's options scandal, bringing it to the highest level of Silicon Valley.

Stock options are a form of compensation commonly used in the technology industry in which the option to buy shares of stock at a predetermined price are granted to an employee. The recipient can later exercise the options, usually after a minimum waiting period, after the stock has increased in value. Companies can backdate options as long as they disclose the practice and properly account for it, which many companies fail to do.

Apple's scandal took a potentially dangerous turn this week when the Financial Times reported that Jobs received 7.5 million stock options in November 2001 even though Apple's board of directors did not give the required approval until December, suggesting the options were backdated and documents forged. Jobs later surrendered the options without exercising them.

"That is the kind of thing that gets the government's attention," said former Colorado U.S. Attorney William Leone, who now has a private practice in Denver.

Apple may disclose more details surrounding the 2001 options grant to Jobs in its filings today, which is also expected to restate its financial results from previous years.

The company has not made any public comment since October when it released a statement summarizing the key findings of a three-month internal investigation which cleared of wrongdoing all current management, including Jobs. The October statement also contained a public apology from Jobs "for these problems which happened on my watch."

Uncertainty shrouding his future has raised pressure on Apple even as the company gains market share in personal computers, dominates the music and video player market, and releases new software for photos, movies and music. The company is also preparing for Macworld Expo, its annual event next month in San Francisco to showcase new products, one of which may be the long-anticipated release of a cell phone. Jobs always takes center stage at Macworld.

Analysts already are turning their attention to next month's event. They generally shrug off the possibility that Jobs will be swept up in the stock-options scandal. They are not expecting any major bombshells to jeopardize Jobs' position.

"Our contention is that, as long as Jobs is not implicated, either in the filings or by government actions -- which seems like the likely outcome based on current public documents -- then the issue will pass without significant or any lasting consequence to the stock," Bank of America analyst Keith Bachman wrote.

Apple launched its internal investigation, led by a special committee of board members, after management discovered irregularities in how options were granted between 1997 and 2002. The investigation took three months, examined more than 650,000 e-mails and documents, and conducted interviews with more than 40 current and former employees, directors and advisers.

In October, Apple announced that the investigation found several instances where options appeared to have been granted before the grants were approved. That raised concerns that the options were backdated to a day when the stock was trading at a lower price, potentially boosting the windfall for executives.

Apple took pains to distance Jobs from the controversy, saying that, in some cases, Jobs was aware of the practice, but that he was unaware of the accounting implications and did not personally benefit. Apple did say the investigation "raised serious concerns" about the actions of two former officers whom the company did not identify.

Apple has attempted to shield Jobs from the scandal because he is its most valuable asset. An Apple co-founder, Jobs left the company in the mid-1980s but returned a decade later to lift its fortunes to new heights.

Pixar Is Also Subject Of Probe (FT)

By Chris Nuttall In San Francisco

Financial Times, December 29, 2006

Another company founded by Steve Jobs - Pixar, the animation studio - is also being investigated by the SEC over stock option awards but Mr Jobs never received any options himself.

Walt Disney, which acquired the company in May, said last month that its board was carrying out an independent review of stock option practices at Pixar after receiving inquiries from the SEC and Justice Department, although it played down any likely financial impact from the issue.

Richard Farmer, Merrill Lynch analyst, in a research report earlier this year into whether Steve Jobs might have been involved in options regularities, said: "Our review of Pixar disclosures does not allow us to rule out the possibility, given Jobs was a member of the board that made options decisions, and our analysis suggests these may contain irregularities."

His research found that, between 1997 and 2004, four out of seven awards were recorded at the lowest possible price in the fiscal years they were granted - with the odds of this happening by chance being 112m to one.

Pixar's compensation committee did not meet between 1997 and 2004 but acted by written consent in two of those years, according to proxy filings.

Pay Packages Allow Executives To Jump Ship With Less Risk (NYT)

By Julie Creswell

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

It's called the "golden hello."

For a chief executive of a large corporation, it is the one thing — more than the corporate jet or any other perk — that must be guaranteed before the executive will move to run another company.

W. James McNerney Jr., a former superstar manager at General Electric, received not one, but two such deals in recent years, worth tens of millions of dollars. In each deal, he was given any bonuses, stock options, restricted stock and pension benefits that he would have abandoned by leaving his previous employer.

Such golden hello payments are intended to make the executive "whole" — in essence to treat the executive as if his career were one smooth ascent with no costly interruptions. And these multimillion-dollar payments and perks are used to draw in not only chief executives, but virtually every member of the executive suite. If "golden parachutes" — rich exit packages of extra cash, stock or retirement benefits — are needed at times to kick out chief executives, golden hellos are increasingly needed to get them in the door.

The career path of Mr. McNerney illustrates the phenomenon. In late 2000, after losing out in the race to become chief executive at G.E., Mr. McNerney jumped to 3M, where he received a pay package worth more than $34 million in guaranteed salary, bonus, option grants and restricted stock to make up for what he left behind at G.E., according to an analysis by Equilar, a compensation research company in San Mateo, Calif.

Five years later, in the summer of 2005, Boeing, which had been rocked by scandals, was on the hunt for a squeaky-clean chief executive. It offered Mr. McNerney, who was a director on its board, a pay package worth more than $52 million, which included $25.3 million of restricted shares and $22 million to replace his 3M pension. A Boeing spokesman said that Mr. McNerney's compensation was in line with that of other chief executives.

Such golden hellos are not new, but lawyers representing executives at the negotiating table are constantly coming up with quirky ways to make clients whole. Matching salaries, guaranteed bonuses and millions of dollars in stock options are typical. On top of that, chief executives are made whole on lucrative pension benefits, often being credited at the new company for years of service elsewhere — a perk rarely available to nonexecutive employees.

These days, though, some executives are demanding that companies make up losses they may face from the sale of a home if they relocate, or that they receive price protection on losses they might incur in stock they own in the company they are leaving.

The problem with make-whole payments, critics say, is that they have become so common and widespread that lesser-known chief executives from smaller companies can demand multimillion-dollar foundations on which other benefits and perks are layered.

The existence of the golden hello undermines the very reason stock options and executive pensions are offered in the first place — to encourage executives to hit performance targets and then to stick around to receive the full value of their compensation package.

"The whole rationale for giving larger bonuses and larger payouts to executives is that their total pay package is supposed to be riskier than that of the average worker," says Eleanor Bloxham, president of the Value Alliance, a group that advises companies on corporate governance. "What's happening with these make-whole packages is that they have no relationship with performance at the new company. You're paying people, really, a guaranteed bonus or, in fact, a guaranteed everything."

At most companies, the stock options and restricted stock typically awarded to executives are tied to performance targets or, at the very least, require many years of service to vest. They are not sure things, particularly stock options, as they may take years to vest and could be worthless if the company's stock falls or the chief executive fails to hit major performance targets.

Yet, an executive who jumps ship can virtually guarantee a multimillion-dollar payout by the new company. While new chief executives these days are typically not given huge cash payouts as soon as they walk through the door, they usually are awarded the value of the pay package they left behind simply by sticking around for three to five years, executive pay watchdogs note.

Furthermore, the huge pension benefit packages and other retirement perks that chief executives are demanding come at a time when many corporations are severely reducing pension benefits for employees. While top executives are credited for years of service they did not work in order to more rapidly vest their supplemental executive retirement plans, or SERPs, employees of several large corporations have seen their traditional defined-benefit plans frozen or sharply reduced this year in favor of less-generous 401(k) plans that do not offer the same guaranteed payouts.

DOJ_NMG_0110225

At Boeing, efforts are under way to move more employees out of defined-benefit plans and into defined-contribution plans, says Charles Bofferding, the executive director at the Society of Professional Engineering Employees in Aerospace, the union that represents 21,000 Boeing employees.

"They're doing that to everyone but the big dogs, who continue to get defined-benefit plans," Mr. Bofferding said. "When you have a different set of principles for the top people versus the rest of the employees, it undermines the top people's moral authority to lead."

Executive recruiters, compensation lawyers and analysts argue, however, that even companies that are reducing benefits to their work forces must offer golden hellos and other perks simply to compete for the limited pool of top-tier chief executive talent in the marketplace. For instance, Boeing, like so many companies that wind up paying big price tags for chief executives, was in desperate need of an outsider with a stellar reputation to earn back the trust of shareholders and Wall Street. In addition, Boeing was concerned about government investigators.

In 2003, the chief executive, Philip M. Condit, resigned in the wake of an investigation into Pentagon contracts. His successor, Harry C. Stonecipher, was forced out in March 2005 for having an affair with a female executive.

At 3M, Mr. McNerney was turning in a stellar performance and cashing in on the stock options he had been granted since joining the company. In the six months before he jumped over to Boeing, Mr. McNerney exercised more than 2.1 million stock options for gains of more than $32.3 million, according to Equilar. Also, about 40 percent of Mr. McNerney's restricted stock had vested, as well as about half of his $22 million pension.

To match what Mr. McNerney was leaving behind at 3M, Boeing's board offered him $25.2 million worth of restricted shares that vest in three-, five- and six-year increments, as well as the equivalent of full funding of his entire 3M pension, although he needs to remain at Boeing for five years to be eligible for it.

But McNerney's pension could grow even bigger. A clause in his contract says that his pension will be based on the three consecutive years within the 10 years before leaving Boeing when he received the highest pay, whether that occurred at Boeing, at 3M or even General Electric.

"Boeing has gone further into territory that even I have not seen before," says Paul Hodgson, a senior research associate at the Corporate Library, an institutional advisory firm in Portland, Me. "Boeing shareholders are being asked to fund a pension potentially based on what 3M and G.E. paid McNerney, rather than what they themselves paid him. Such an arrangement would seem to take inappropriate to a new level."

John Dern, a spokesman for Boeing, said: "Jim McNerney's compensation is generally equivalent to what he was receiving at his previous company and in keeping with compensation practices at other large companies. It recognizes the value that he brings to Boeing and the company's performance has borne that out."

For shareholders, the high price Boeing paid to lure Mr. McNerney has yielded results. He has moved to put many of Boeing's ethical lapses behind it: the company agreed this summer with federal prosecutors in California and Virginia to pay $615 million to settle allegations concerning use of competitors' information to bid on government contracts, and improper conduct in the hiring of a former government procurement officer.

Operationally, the company is beating its archrival, Airbus, in airplane orders this year. Its stock has soared 44 percent since Mr. McNerney got the job, compared with an 18 percent gain by the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index.

"I'm fine with McNerney's pay from a shareholder perspective," said Don Delves, a Chicago-based corporate governance and executive pay consultant. "I'm a shareholder at Boeing and we've been through a tumultuous time. Yeah, McNerney is expensive, but we're getting one of the top three people in the horse race to replace Jack Welch at G.E."

Yet even less-well-known chief executives are getting perks to make up for what they had in their previous jobs.

For instance, after ousting Carleton S. Fiorina as chief executive in 2005, Hewlett-Packard's board turned to Mark V. Hurd, a little-known executive at NCR, to replace her.

Mr. Hurd, who had already exercised stock options at NCR in 2005 worth $14.7 million, received a $2 million signing bonus; relocation benefits worth $2.7 million; 450,000 stock option shares worth $2.4 million; and 400,000 restricted shares worth about $8.1 million, according to Equilar.

But Mr. Hurd's employment agreement included an interesting twist. If NCR's stock fell by any amount up to 20 percent within 90 days of Mr. Hurd's leaving the company, Hewlett-Packard agreed to reimburse him for the losses he would have incurred on the 850,000 shares of NCR stock he still held. Hewlett-Packard said it paid Mr. Hurd a little more than $5 million for his losses in NCR stock.

"This isn't inside the norm," said Jack Dolmat-Connell, a compensation adviser in Waltham, Mass. "But because he knew he was leaving, that was probably considered inside information, so he actually could not do anything with those shares."

Executives are not only getting price protection on stock, but they are also demanding price protection on the sale of homes if they have to relocate.

DOJ_NMG_0110226

Take Robert H. Swan, who joined eBay in March as its chief financial officer. Several months after leaving his post as finance chief of Electronic Data Systems, Mr. Swan was granted a supplemental relocation benefit by eBay's board "in light of the condition of the Plano, Texas, residential real estate market," according to a regulatory filing.

If Mr. Swan's Texas home sold for less than $3 million, the company would pay the difference, up to $700,000. (While Texas records indicate the home was sold in late August, the state does not make residential price information public.)

A spokeswoman for eBay said details of any payment made to Mr. Swan for his home would be made public when the company files its proxy next year.

GE Accedes To More Disclosure On Pay Advice (WSJ)

By Kaja Whitehouse

The Wall Street Journal, December 29, 2006

General Electric Co., agreeing to an effort by some investors to increase scrutiny on executive pay, will disclose more information on the advice it gets from compensation consultants.

The Fairfield, Conn., conglomerate agreed to go beyond regulatory requirements and disclose any business ties it may have with the firms that advise it on how to pay its top executives.

Under new Securities and Exchange Commission rules put in place this year, companies will be required to disclose in public filings the name of their compensation consultants, but not their other business relationships.

In 2006, GE's board of directors used the services of New York compensation consulting firm Frederic W. Cook & Co., which also advises the company's human resources on its broader pay programs, said Peter O'Toole, a GE spokesman. The company will make this information available in its coming proxy statement, he said.

"They provide us with limited intelligence on compensation trends and each year we participate in their long-term incentive survey," said Mr. O'Toole. "We have a very limited engagement with them," he said.

A Cook spokesman said the firm provides additional work for a company only with consent of the chairman of the board's compensation committee.

News of GE's additional disclosure was reported yesterday by Bloomberg News.

In October, a group of 13 institutional investors sent a joint letter to the 25 largest companies in the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index, including GE, seeking this information. In addition to helping the board of directors hammer out pay for top executives, consulting firms can also be hired by management for other work, such as crafting the benefits plan for rank-and-file workers. The shareholders worry consultants may be reluctant to provide objective advice on executive pay if they rely on management's approval to win other business at the company.

"It is critical...that a compensation consultant be free of any conflict of interest, perceived or actual," said the Oct. 23 letter signed by shareholders representing $850 billion in assets, including London money manager F&C Asset Management, the Connecticut Treasurer's Office and union group AFL-CIO.

The group of 13 shareholders plans to announce Tuesday the results of their letter campaign, said Bernard Kavaler, spokesman for Connecticut Treasurer Denise L. Nappier. The shareholders may submit proposals asking investors to vote in favor of such disclosure if companies don't volunteer to make the information public, Mr. Kavaler said.

It isn't clear whether other companies have agreed to the measure. Others approached include Hewlett-Packard Co., Exxon Mobil Corp., Morgan Stanley, Wal-Mart Stores Inc., Pfizer Inc. and Home Depot Inc. None of these companies was available for comment.

Two-thirds of the 25 companies have responded to the letter, said Mr. Kavaler, who didn't specify how many will make the information available next year.

The shareholders behind the letter have likened such ties to when auditing firms provided consulting work for the companies they were auditing -- a situation some critics have said made accounting scandals like those at Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc. more likely.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Domestic-Partner Violence In U.S. Fell Sharply (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

Domestic violence rates in the United States dropped sharply between 1993 and 2004 but showed recent signs of a rebound, the Justice Department reported yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0110227

The number of domestic homicides fell 32 percent from 1993 to 2004, and the frequency of nonfatal violence between domestic partners dropped by more than 50 percent, from 5.8 attacks per 1,000 U.S. residents age 12 or older, to 2.6 attacks, according to the Bureau of Justice Statistics.

Men benefited from the decline more than women, and black victims more than white women. The number of women killed by current or former partners fell from 1,572 in 1993 to 1,159 in 2004, or 26 percent. The number of men killed dropped from 698 to 385, or 45 percent.

"The best news overall is that 'intimate partner violence' has declined since 1993, but there's still too much of it," said bureau statistician Shannan M. Catalano, author of the Justice Department online report. The report did not address violence among other household members or relatives.

Noting that current or former partners account for 22 percent of violence against women, but 3 percent of violence against men, Catalano said, "It still is a crime against women. . . . Women are more often victimized by someone they know. Men are more often victimized by strangers."

The report did not offer an explanation for the trend, but experts said it continued a decline in domestic violence recorded since 1976 and mirrored a drop in violent crime overall in the past decade.

Other theories credit increased policing, neighborhood-watch and victim-assistance programs, and awareness raised by the 1994 Violence Against Women Act.

Analysts worry that declines may have bottomed out, however. Although overall rates remained unchanged between 2003 and 2004, violence against black women and white men increased slightly.

"The crime rates have kind of flattened out in the past couple of years. That could be of some concern," said Michael R. Rand, chief of victimization statistics for the bureau.

On average, 18.2 of 1,000 American Indian and native Alaskan women were victimized a year, nearly three times the rate among white women and twice the rate among black women. The least violence was reported against Asian men, white men and people age 50 and older.

Domestic Violence Rates Fall (AP)

AP, December 29, 2006

Justice Department report covering 1993-2004 notes racial disparities

WASHINGTON - Domestic violence rates fell sharply between 1993 and 2004, the Justice Department said Thursday, noting that American Indian women and native Alaskan women are far more likely to be victimized than whites and other minorities.

The Bureau of Justice Statistics said that "intimate partner violence" rates fell by more than 50 percent. The decline mirrored a decade-long trend in other violent crimes, and the department did not suggest a cause.

"There's still generally no consensus about why any crime in general has dropped," said Shannan Catalano, the study's author. "It's safe to say it's more than one factor that went into it."

Some experts attribute the decline to better training for police and more funding for prosecution, two key elements of the 1994 Violence Against Women Act. Investigators increasingly are better trained to handle abuse cases and bring them to court.

"For the first time, there are entire domestic violence units in law enforcement," said Lonna Stevens, director of the Sheila Wellstone Institute, a Minnesota-based domestic violence organization. "We've had protocols and policies developed for responding to this."

In 1993, there were about 5.8 incidents of nonfatal violence for every 1,000 U.S. residents above the age of 12. By 2004, that number had fallen to 2.6, the agency said. Homicides fell by about 30 percent, from 2,269 in 1993 to 1,544 in 2004.

The Justice Department defines intimate partner violence as violence by a current or former spouse, boyfriend or girlfriend or a same-sex partner.

Stevens said police have been less successful responding to and deterring abusive behavior in some minority communities, where racism and cultural differences can keep reporting rates low.

Over the 12-year reporting period, about 18 out of every 1,000 American Indian and native Alaskan women were victimized — a violence rate three times higher than among white women.

Black women were more likely than white women to be abused but the study also found that they were more likely to report their abuse to the police than white women.

Women in their early 20s and women who were divorced or separated had the greatest risk of being abused, the study found. Violence was also more common in low-income households.

Asian males, white males and the elderly reported the lowest rates of partner violence.

Justice Reports Sharp Decline In 'Intimate Partner Violence' (WT/AP)

Bosnian Serbs Deported By US Are Indicted For War-crimes (CSM)

By Beth Kampschror, Correspondent of The Christian Science Monitor

The Christian Science Monitor, December 29, 2006

As a result of landmark international cooperation, the two men were charged last week in connection with the 1995 Srebrenica massacre.

SARAJEVO, BOSNIA-HERZEGOVINA -- Mladen Blagojevic and Zdravko Bozic would probably be living unassuming lives as Bosnia Serb refugees in the Arizona desert if it weren't for a landmark international detective effort to track down war-crime suspects.

Instead, they're in custody in wintry Bosnia, where they were charged last week in connection with the 1995 Srebrenica massacre.

The case, say court sources, marks a precedent in international cooperation in the prosecution of war crimes, and could show the way forward for both the US and other countries that may be unwittingly hosting war-crimes suspects on their territory.

"I would describe the cooperation with the US as unprecedented, as these are the first cases where war-crimes suspects have been returned to the country where the crimes were committed to face charges," says Toby Cadman, counsel to the prosecutor at Bosnia's war-crimes chamber.

Mr. Blagojevic and Mr. Bozic were deported to Bosnia earlier this year after being arrested in the US for not disclosing their service in the Bosnian Serb military when its forces overran the Bosnian Muslim enclave of Srebrenica and killed up to 8,000 men and boys - a crime ruled genocide by the UN war-crimes tribunal in The Hague. On Dec. 21, they were indicted for crimes against humanity by Bosnia's war-crimes chamber and charged with the detention, murders, and forcible transfer of Srebrenica Muslims. International cooperation led to 56 arrests

In the past two years, 56 Bosnian Serbs have been arrested on charges of similar immigration fraud or making false statements over omitting their military service on immigration applications. Agents from the Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) most recently raided homes in at least five US cities earlier this month, bringing in at least 16more people .

Mr. Cadman says the ICE's Operation No Safe Haven could prove a model for other countries, which, like the US, took in large numbers of refugees and asylum seekers from the former Yugoslavia during and after the 1990s Balkan wars.

The operation began in 2004, when ICE officials were nearly two years into investigating a Boston-area Bosnian, Marko Boskic - whose name had appeared in testimony at the UN war-crimes tribunal as well as press reports involving Srebrenica - on suspicion that he'd omitted his Bosnian Serb military service when applying for refugee status in the US. A former US military intelligence analyst who'd worked on the Srebrenica case in The Hague offered the investigators a list of 14,000 people who were suspected of having served in the Bosnian Serb military. Officials checked the names against immigration databases. The leads generated were distributed to their offices nationwide.

"A lot of our cases have actually developed because of the access to that list," says Michael Keegan, a spokesman at the Human Rights Violators and Public Safety Unit at the ICE, which has, since its creation in 2003, investigated immigrants who are not US citizens. Finding war criminals in a haystack of refugees

A December 2004 law - the Anti-Atrocity Alien Deportation Act - also gave the Justice Department's Office of Special Investigations powers to go after naturalized US citizens suspected of crimes committed before they entered the country. Federal investigators had previously tracked only Nazi-era suspects to prevent them from entering the US.

"I think the United States prides itself on being a refuge for people running away from persecution, and some of these human rights violators will come to the United States seeking the same refuge as their victims," Mr. Keegan says. "And that's not hard to believe, since most of them were at the site where the atrocities were committed, so they know the details. So when they're going through their interview, it's possible for them to describe the scene and be credible."

Operation No Safe Haven will continue indefinitely, Keegan says. It also appears to be bringing in more Srebrenica suspects than any other attempts. The Hague tribunal, for example, has been able to try only seven high-ranking Bosnian Serb military and police officers in a trial that began in July, because several of the men had been brought in under so-called "voluntary surrenders." The tribunal's two most-wanted men - Bosnian Serb political and military heads Radovan Karadzic and Ratko Mladic - remain fugitives.

Blagojevic, Bozic, and two others who were arrested in Bosnia, are the latest defendants in Bosnia's national war-crimes chamber - established in 2005 to take on mid- and lower-level ranking suspects - to be charged with alleged crimes at Srebrenica. Eleven others have been on trial for genocide since May, a trial that Damir Petrovic, a public-information lawyer at Bosnia's state court where the war-crimes chamber is housed,called "the largest criminal case in Europe right now." Critics say the US has gone too far

A lawyer for Nedjo Ikonic, a Bosnian Serb arrested outside Milwaukee earlier this month who pleaded not guilty this week to making false statements, says that US officials are targeting too widely, and that the sting is sparking fears among the Serbian diaspora in the US.

"There's one lady in Salt Lake City who was a cook paid by the Republika Srpska Army. That's stretching the party to a crime concept. It seems like the [Bosnian] government wants to investigate every one of them," says Nikola Kostich, senior partner at the Milwaukee law firm Kostich, LeBell, Dobroski, & Morgan. Mr. Kostich defended several prominent Serb suspects in The Hague and has advised many of those arrested in the past 24 months.

"I've also given a lot of advice to people who have not been charged - people who have called me because they're not sleeping well, and they think there's going to be a knock on the door in the night, and they don't know what to do," he says.

North Carolina Bar Association Files Charges Against Duke Prosecutor (USAT/AP)

By Aaron Beard, Associated Press

USA Today, December 29, 2006

RALEIGH, N.C. — The North Carolina bar filed ethics charges Thursday against the prosecutor in the Duke lacrosse case, accusing him of saying misleading or inflammatory things to the news media about the athletes under suspicion.

The punishment for ethics violations can range from admonishment to disbarment. The complaint could also force District Attorney Mike Nifong off the case by creating a conflict of interest.

"He's got this hanging over his head," said Thomas Metzloff, a Duke law professor and member of the bar's ethics committee for the past 10 years. "It relates so much to his underlying conduct in the case."

Among the four rules of professional conduct that Nifong was accused of violating was a prohibition against making comments "that have a substantial likelihood of heightening public condemnation of the accused."

In a statement, the bar said it opened a case against Nifong on March 30, a little more than two weeks after a 28-year-old woman hired to perform as a stripper at a lacrosse team party said she was gang-raped.

The ethics charges will be heard by an independent body called the Disciplinary Hearing Commission, made up of both lawyers and non-lawyers. A date for the hearing has not yet been set.

Nifong did not immediately return a call for comment.

The bar cited 40 quotations and eight paraphrased statements made to newspaper and TV reporters, saying many of them amounted to "improper commentary about the character, credibility and reputation of the accused" or their alleged unwillingness to cooperate. Most of the comments were in March and April, in the early days of the case.

Among them:

· Nifong referred to the lacrosse players as "a bunch of hooligans."

· He declared: "I am convinced there was a rape, yes, sir."

· He told ESPN: "One would wonder why one needs an attorney if one was not charged and had not done anything wrong."

· He told The New York Times: "I'm disappointed that no one has been enough of a man to come forward. And if they would have spoken up at the time, this may never have happened."

Nifong was also charged with breaking a rule against "dishonesty, fraud, deceit and misrepresentation." The bar said that when DNA testing failed to find any evidence a lacrosse player raped the accuser, Nifong told a reporter the players might have used a condom.

According to the bar, Nifong knew that assertion was misleading, because he had received a report from an emergency room nurse in which the accuser said her attackers did not use a condom.

Defense attorney Joseph Cheshire, who represents one of the three athletes, declined to comment Thursday.

Last week, Nifong dropped the rape charges against the athletes after the stripper wavered in her story, saying she was longer certain she was penetrated vaginally with a penis, as she had claimed several times before. The men still face charges of kidnapping and sexual offense.

In recent months — and especially after last week — legal experts and even Nifong's own colleagues have warned openly that the case appears pitifully weak.

"One wonders what the effect of this will be," Stan Goldman, who teaches criminal law at Loyola Law School in Los Angeles, said after the ethics charges were filed. "Is this going to result in him treating the case more gingerly and deciding it's not worth pursuing, or is he going to get his back up and decide he's got to pursue this case to the end regardless?"

The athletes, Reade Seligmann, Collin Finnerty and David Evans, have maintained their innocence and called the charges "fantastic lies." The case is not expected to go to trial until at least the spring.

The weaknesses in the case include the lack of DNA evidence; the accuser's ever-shifting story; one player's claim to have an alibi supported by receipts and time-stamped photos; and the defense's insistence that the photo lineup that was used to identify the defendants violated police procedures and was skewed against the men.

Before the ethics charges were filed, Bob Brown, an attorney in private practice who once worked with Nifong in the prosecutor's office, predicted the case would be a "bloodbath" for the prosecution if it went to trial.

Among other questions raised in recent weeks: Why did it take months for anyone from Nifong's office to interview the accuser? And why did Nifong initially withhold from the defense DNA test results that found genetic material from several men — none of them Duke lacrosse players — on the accuser's underwear and body?

"I don't see how any member of the public can have confidence in this case. I think it's making a mockery of our criminal justice system to permit this guy to keep fumbling along," Duke University law professor James Coleman, one of Nifong's leading critics, said before the ethics charges were filed. "It's either total incompetence or it's misconduct on a scale that is extraordinary."

Prosecutor In Duke Sexual Assault Case Faces Ethics Complaint From State Bar (NYT)

By David Barstow And Duff Wilson

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

The North Carolina State Bar filed a formal ethics complaint yesterday against the prosecutor in the Duke lacrosse sexual assault case, accusing him of making inflammatory remarks about the team to the news media and misleading the public about evidence.

The 17-page complaint took issue with a long list of public comments by the prosecutor, Michael B. Nifong, the Durham district attorney. Since March, when a stripper first accused three Duke lacrosse players of gang-raping her at a late-night team party, Mr. Nifong has granted dozens of interviews with the news media, including one with The New York Times last week.

But according to the state bar, which regulates lawyers in North Carolina, many of Mr. Nifong's comments were unethical because they included "improper commentary" about the defendants and the evidence.

In perhaps the most serious accusation, the bar also said Mr. Nifong had engaged in "dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation" by suggesting to reporters that a condom was used in the alleged attack when he had in his possession a sexual assault examination report that indicated otherwise.

Mr. Nifong spoke about condoms after laboratory tests failed to find semen from any Duke player on the accuser.

The complaint was filed with the state bar's Disciplinary Hearing Commission, which can impose a variety of sanctions, from censure to disbarment. According to bar rules, the commission must take up the complaint within 90 to 150 days.

Mr. Nifong did not respond to telephone and e-mail messages last night, but North Carolina's courts have traditionally granted district attorneys broad leeway in making public comments that "serve a legitimate law enforcement purpose."

In previous interviews Mr. Nifong has given two main reasons for speaking out, especially in the first weeks of the case. First, he has said he was trying to encourage and pressure possible witnesses on the team to come forward. Second, he has said he was trying to assure the community that as the county's top law enforcement official, he was taking the woman's complaint seriously.

But he has also admitted going too far in some of his public comments. In his interview with The Times last week, for example, Mr. Nifong said he was wrong to have described members of the lacrosse team as "a bunch of hooligans."

According to the bar complaint, the "hooligan" remark was one of many comments by Mr. Nifong that violated ethics rules because they were likely to heighten "public condemnation of the accused."

Defense lawyers said last night that they had decided not to comment on the complaint. But they have made no secret of their desire to see Mr. Nifong removed from the case, working to fan public criticism of him — a strategy that has helped provoke dozens of ethics complaints against Mr. Nifong with the state bar's grievance committee.

With yesterday's action, the grievance committee was indicating that it found merit in many of those complaints.

In addition to the bar complaint, Mr. Nifong is likely to face a separate accusation of prosecutorial misconduct before W. Osmond Smith III, the judge presiding over the sexual assault case. Defense lawyers have said they are preparing a motion seeking sanctions against Mr. Nifong for failing to reveal for seven months that tests had found DNA material from several men, none of them members of the lacrosse team, on rape kit swabs taken from the woman hours after the alleged attack.

Defense lawyers are likely to use the bar's complaint as still more evidence that Mr. Nifong has a clear conflict of interest that makes his continued involvement in the case untenable.

Ethics Probe In Duke Lacrosse Case Involves DA (NSDY)

By Jennifer Maloney

Long Island Newsday, December 29, 2006

The North Carolina bar Thursday filed ethics charges against the prosecutor in the Duke lacrosse sexual assualt case, accusing him of making misleading and inflammatory remarks to the media about the athletes under suspicion.

The complaint could force District Attorney Mike Nifong off the case by creating a conflict of interest. He could also face punishments ranging from admonishment to disbarment.

The bar accused Nifong of violating four rules of professional conduct, including a prohibition against making comments "that have a substantial likelihood of heightening public condemnation of the accused" and a rule against "dishonesty, fraud, deceit and misrepresentation."

In a statement, the bar said it opened a case against Nifong on March 30, about two weeks after a 28-year-old woman hired to perform as a stripper at a lacrosse team party said she was gang-raped.

The ethics charges will be heard by an independent body called the Disciplinary Hearing Commission, comprised of lawyers and non-lawyers. A date for the hearing has not been set.

Nifong could not be reached Thursday. In an October interview with The Associated Press, he said his only regret in handling the case was speaking so often to the media in the investigation's early days.

"Certainly what I was trying to do was to reassure the community, to encourage people with information to come forward," Nifong said. "And that was clearly not the effect."

The accused athletes, Reade Seligmann, Collin Finnerty and David Evans, have maintained their innocence and called the charges "fantastic lies." The Finnerty family, of Garden City, could not be reached Thursday. The defendants' attorneys also could not be reached. Last week, Nifong dropped the rape charges against the athletes after the stripper wavered in her story. The men still face charges of kidnapping and sexual offense.

The bar cited 41 quotations and eight paraphrased statements Nifong made to newspaper and TV reporters, saying many amounted to "improper commentary about the character, credibility and reputation of the accused" or their alleged unwillingness to cooperate.

Duke Rape Case Prosecutor Faces Ethics Charges (WP/AP)

CyberNet Suspect Pleads Not Guilty (GRPRESS)

By John Agar, The Grand Rapids Press

Grand Rapids Press (MI), December 29, 2006

GRAND RAPIDS -- A former vice president at the collapsed firm CyberNET in Grand Rapids pleaded not guilty Wednesday to federal charges related to an $81.7 million fraud case.

Paul Nathan Wright, 57, is accused of conspiracy, bank fraud, money laundering and mail fraud. The charges carry penalties ranging from five to 30 years in prison, and fines ranging from $250,000 to $1 million, plus restitution, if he is convicted.

DOJ_NMG_0110233

Wright pleaded "not guilty to each and every count he's charged (with)," his court-appointed attorney, Paul Mitchell, told U.S. District Magistrate Judge Ellen Carmody.

Barton Watson, CyberNET chairman, killed himself in his Ada Township home just days after a November 2004 raid at company headquarters. His wife, Krista Kotlarz-Watson, and mother, Geraldine Watson, were recently indicted and await arraignment next month in federal court.

Last week, James Horton, the former CyberNET president, was sentenced to 7 1/2 years in prison. He pleaded guilty to conspiracy, bank fraud and money laundering, and has cooperated with the government. Horton's cooperation led to a lesser sentence, and he has agreed to testify, if necessary, at others' trials.

The government alleges that CyberNET deceived lending institutions to obtain financing under false pretenses, and expended "a substantial amount of effort to prevent lenders from discovering that they had been deceived," the indictment said.

The company had a complex system, using false records, shell corporations and telephone systems to intercept calls from lenders to suggest that the company had many customers. The company overstated its finances to show it netted millions of dollars a year, when it actually was losing $500,000 to $7.6 million each month from 2002 to 2004, the indictment said.

Wright assisted by setting up shell companies, and "played an active role in deceiving lenders dealing with CyberNET," the indictment said. He would place bricks into empty computer boxes prior to lenders' inspections of collateral, the indictment said.

Employees who were not involved in the alleged fraud, and only discovered it later, were "paid substantial sums ... for their agreement not to report the fraud to law enforcement authorities," the government said.

Wright, on bond, left the courthouse with his attorney after the brief hearing. His attorney would not comment.

Durham Police Seek Kidnapped Twins (WRAL)

WRAL-TV, December 29, 2006

FBI Believes Twins, Birth Mother in Canada

The FBI said Thursday that 17-month-old twins allegedly taken by their birth mother last week were spotted crossing the Canadian border.

According to a news release issued early Thursday evening, FBI investigators have determined that Allison Quets crossed the border last Saturday with the toddlers, Tyler and Holly Needham. All three are believed to still be in Canada, investigators said.

The twins were taken from their adoptive parents in Apex last Friday for a scheduled monthly visitation with Quets. Police said Tuesday that Quets, 49, never returned Sunday evening.

On Wednesday, a federal warrant was issued charging Quets with violating an international parental kidnapping law. Additionally, federal investigators filed a provisional arrest warrant application with Canadian authorities to assist in locating Quets and returning the two children to the United States.

FBI officials said they are working jointly with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the FBI legal attache's office in the U.S. Embassy in Ottawa, and the Durham Police Department. They also have enlisted the assistance of the National Center for Missing/Exploited Children, along with Child Find Canada.

Quets had been embroiled in a custody dispute with Kevin and Denise Needham , who live in Apex, in Jacksonville, Fla., where Quets lived.

The FBI said that matters concerning custody and parental rights would be determined by the appropriate authorities in the state of Florida.

FBI Says Missing Apex Twins Taken By Biological Mother To Canada (CO)

The Charlotte Observer, December 29, 2006

RALEIGH, N.C. - The FBI has joined in the search for 17-month-old twins who authorities think were taken to Canada by their biological mother.

Allison Lee Quets, 49, of Durham, is suspected of taking Tyler Lee and Holly Ann Needham, who had lived in Apex with their adoptive parents, FBI officials said Thursday in a written statement. Apex is a suburb west of Raleigh.

Quets had monthly visitation rights as a part of a custody agreement, but now faces federal charges of international parental kidnapping.

A custody order allowed Quets to take the twins on Dec. 22 and return them Dec. 24 to adoptive parents Denise and Kevin Needham. Quets did not return the children, and an investigation shows she crossed the Canadian border with the twins on Dec. 23, the FBI said.

Authorities are seeking public assistance to locate and safely return the twins to the United States.

Other agencies involved in the search included the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Durham Police Department, the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, and Child Find Canada.

FBI: Missing Kids Were Taken To Canada (MBSN)

By Sarah Ovaska

Myrtle Beach (SC) Sun News, December 29, 2006

RALEIGH, N.C. - A woman accused of abducting a pair of 17-month-old Apex, N.C., twins has taken them to Canada, the FBI said late Thursday.

Allison Quets, 49, is wanted by federal authorities on criminal charges of international parental kidnapping. The FBI released a statement that said Quets crossed the Canadian border on Saturday with two children.

Quets gave birth to Tyler and Holly Needham but gave them up for adoption approximately a month after they were born, her sister Gail Quets said. Quets, who conceived the children through in-vitro fertilization, become severely ill during her pregnancy and worried about her ability to care for the children.

Denise and Kevin Needham, an Apex couple, adopted the twins after meeting Quets through a mutual friend, Gail Quets said. Quets was in the process of appealing the adoption and had been granted visitation rights pending a decision by a Florida court.

The Needhams last saw their adopted children on Friday when Quets picked them up from their Apex home. The couple planned on seeing their children again on Sunday, when Quets was scheduled to meet them at the Streets at Southpoint mall in Durham. The Needhams contacted Durham police a half-hour after Quets failed to meet them.

However, an alert about the missing children was not put out until 24 hours later when another police agency, the Apex Police Department, got involved.

Protesting Mom Cindy Sheehan Arrested At Bush Ranch (CNN)

CNN.com, December 29, 2006

CRAWFORD, Texas (CNN) -- Anti-war protester Cindy Sheehan was arrested Thursday afternoon outside President Bush's ranch, according to a law enforcement official.

Sheehan, who in the past has camped out for weeks in protest outside the ranch in Crawford, Texas, was arrested for blocking the road leading to the property, Texas Department of Public Safety's Tela Mange told CNN.

Four others were also arrested after law enforcement officials asked the group to move and they refused, Mange said.

"[Sheehan] told us if you want us to get out of the road, you're going to have to arrest us," Mange said. "So we did."

The protesters lay in the road about 20 minutes before being taken into custody, she said.

Sheehan and the others were taken to the McLennan County Sheriff's Department, booked and jailed.

It's not known if any of the protesters made bail.

Sheehan and the others are charged with obstructing a highway, a misdemeanor punishable by up to a $2,000 fine and six months in jail, Mange said.

Mange said Vice President Dick Cheney's motorcade was delayed leaving the ranch while officers removed the protesters.

Sheehan's 24-year-old son, Casey, was killed in Iraq in 2004.

She has been arrested previously. She and three other women were convicted earlier this month in New York of trespassing, The Associated Press reported. (Full story)

They had attempted in March 2005 to deliver an anti-Iraq war petition to the United Nations U.S. Mission and ignored signals to disperse, the AP said.

The four were acquitted of disorderly conduct, resisting arrest and obstructing government administration. The Manhattan judge fined them $95 and gave them a conditional discharge.

That meant that if any of the women were arrested again they could face a tougher sentence.

Police Officers Charged In Deaths In Hurricane's Aftermath (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

ATLANTA, Dec. 28 — Seven New Orleans police officers were indicted Thursday on charges of first-degree murder or attempted murder in connection with the deaths of two men on a bridge six days after Hurricane Katrina struck.

Four other civilians suffered gunshot wounds in the episode, which took place on Sept. 4, 2005. No officers were hurt.

DOJ_NMG_0110235

The shootings occurred while much of the New Orleans area was still under water, communication among officers was poor and the city was chaotic. The New Orleans Police Department's initial account — that officers were responding to reports of snipers firing on contractors — seemed to confirm fears of rampant lawlessness in the city.

But that account was repeatedly revised. At one point, the police said they were responding to reports that two officers had been shot. The victims, for their part, said they had simply been seeking help after the storm left them stranded.

Frank Zibilich, a lawyer for one of the police officers, said that although first-degree murder in Louisiana did not require proof of premeditation, the charges were harsh.

"It's mind-boggling to me that officers, under the intense circumstances that were going on in New Orleans at this time, that seven officers decide simultaneously that they're going to go commit murder," Mr. Zibilich said.

Two families were involved in the shootings. At the base of the bridge, the officers encountered the Bartholomew family: a couple and their teenage daughter and nephew, and the nephew's friend James Brissette, 19. The family, which filed a civil lawsuit against the officers and the police department, said in court papers that it was trying to reach a grocery store on the other side of the bridge when the police officers began firing at them. Mr. Brissette died, while the nephew, Jose Holmes Jr., 19, jumped behind a barricade. As he lay on the ground, according to the court papers, he was shot at from a distance and then approached by a man who shot him point blank in the abdomen.

Mr. Holmes wound up partly paralyzed with a colostomy bag. Susan Bartholomew, the mother, lost her right arm.

"The police in this case used the devastation of the storm to behave in a criminal manner," said Gary W. Bizal, a lawyer who is representing Mr. Holmes in the civil case. "They held themselves above the law, and now it's coming back to roost."

Near the top of the bridge, according to a statement issued by the office of Eddie Jordan, the Orleans Parish district attorney, the police encountered Ronald Madison, a mentally retarded man, and his brother Lance, who had been employed by Federal Express for 25 years. The brothers had been forced to swim through floodwaters and had been trying to reach their mother's house across the bridge, their family said in its civil lawsuit. The family said the brothers were on the bridge with other people they did not know when a rental truck pulled up and a group of heavily armed officers jumped out and began firing.

Ronald Madison, 40, died after being shot seven times in the back. His brother was arrested at the scene and charged with eight counts of attempted murder of a police officer, though no weapon was recovered. The grand jury that handed down Thursday's indictments declined to indict Lance Madison.

A spokeswoman for Warren J. Riley, the superintendent of police, said he would not comment on the case.

7 Police Officers Indicted In Post-Katrina Shootings In New Orleans (AP)

AP, December 29, 2006

(AP) - NEW ORLEANS-Four New Orleans police officers were charged with first-degree murder in connection with two fatal shootings during Hurricane Katrina's chaotic aftermath.

Three other officers were charged with attempted murder in the shootings, which also injured four civilians. A state district judge Thursday gave the officers 24 hours to surrender.

The shootings became one of the most widely cited examples of the chaos that ensued after Katrina flooded 80 percent of the city in August 2005.

"We cannot allow our police officers to shoot and kill our citizens without justification like rabid dogs," District Attorney Eddie Jordan said.

At a news conference late Thursday, Police Superintendent Warren Riley said the indictments were only the first step in the judicial process and "not where it ends."

"A jury of their peers will decide their guilt or innocent," Riley said, calling Jordan's comments "highly unprofessional, highly prejudicial and highly undignified."

"We want justice first and foremost, " he said. "But for the district attorney to try and prejudice the community against these officers before all the evidence is heard is really, I think, a sad day for the city."

The indictments were the latest blow to the police department's reputation. Police Superintendent Warren Riley has said the majority of his 1,500-member force performed heroically during and after Katrina, but he has acknowledged more than 200 were disciplined for various offenses, including failure to show up after the storm. Some were accused of looting.

Defense attorneys for the indicted officers said their clients are innocent. "As a wise man once said, a district attorney can get a grand jury to indict a ham sandwich," said Franz Zibilich, attorney for officer Robert Faulcon, who is charged with murder. "They heard only one side of the story."

Authorities first said Ronald Madison, a 40-year-old mentally retarded man, and James Brissette, 19, were killed in a gun battle with police on a bridge connecting two predominantly black - and flooded - neighborhoods.

DOJ_NMG_0110236

At the time, six days after the hurricane, the city was still littered with dead bodies as rescuers tried to save stranded residents and prevent looters.

According to a police report, several officers responded to a radio call of two officers down. They were told the shooters were headed west. When they arrived, seven people were running in that direction and four began firing at police, the report said. The officers returned fire.

After weeks of testimony, the grand jury deliberated for two hours Thursday before issuing the charges. The panel's foreman, Lee Madare, declined to comment in detail as he left the courthouse but asked a reporter, "Do you understand the word cover-up?"

A spokesman for Mayor Ray Nagin declined to comment on the indictments. Police Superintendent Warren Riley and a police department spokeswoman did not immediately return messages from The Associated Press.

Faulcon was charged with first-degree murder in Madison's death. Faulcon and three others - Sgt. Kenneth Bowen, officer Anthony Villavaso and officer Robert Gisevius - were charged with first-degree murder in Brissette's death.

Officer Robert Barrios faces multiple counts of attempted first-degree murder, officer Mike Hunter is charged with two counts of attempted first-degree murder and officer Ignatius Hills is charged with attempted second-degree murder.

7 N.O. Cops Indicted In Killings On Bridge (NOTP)

By Laura Maggi, Staff Writer

New Orleans Times-Picayune, December 29, 2006

SHOOTING DEATHS CAME 6 DAYS AFTER KATRINA

Seven New Orleans police officers were indicted Thursday on an array of murder and attempted-murder charges stemming from a shooting on the Danziger Bridge six days after Hurricane Katrina, which victims have portrayed as an ambush by police that left two dead and four wounded.

The state grand jury refuted the New Orleans Police Department account of what happened on Sept. 4, 2005, which had been portrayed by officers as an appropriate response to reports of both sniper fire and people shooting at police officers near the bridge, on Chef Menteur Highway in eastern New Orleans.

The grand jury separately cleared Lance Madison, a man whom police arrested that day and booked with attempted first-degree murder for allegedly shooting at law enforcement.

Four police officers -- Sgt. Kenneth Bowen, Sgt. Robert Gisevius, officer Anthony Villavaso and officer Robert Faulcon -- were charged with the first-degree murder of James Brissette, 19. Faulcon was also charged with the first-degree murder of Ronald Madison, a 40-year-old mentally retarded man whose body was found riddled with seven gunshot wounds to his back. Three more officers face attempted-murder charges.

The charge of first-degree murder carries a potential death sentence, which prosecutors said was warranted because the accused had shot the men while trying to harm or kill others. Chief Judge Raymond Bigelow, who received the grand jury indictments, said he would not set bond for the officers facing the first-degree murder charges.

Criticizing Jordan

In a written statement, the only one he would make about the indictments on Thursday, Orleans Parish District Attorney Eddie Jordan said, "We cannot allow our police officers to shoot and kill our citizens without justification, like rabid dogs. The rules governing the use of lethal force are not suspended during a state of emergency. Everyone, including police officers, must abide by the law of the land."

New Orleans Police Superintendent Warren Riley asked the public to remember that all seven officers will have their days in court. He called the indictments one the saddest days in the department's history.

"I would like to remind everyone, this is but one step in the judicial process that will determine the future of these officers. This is not when it ends," he said at an evening news conference.

Riley also objected to the statement by Jordan that people had been shot "like rabid dogs," calling the phrase "unprofessional, highly prejudicial and highly undignified."

Representatives for both police unions -- the Police Association of New Orleans and the Fraternal Order of Police -- said their groups stand behind the indicted officers, pointing out that grand juries as a practice hear only the prosecution's evidence, and so heard no testimony defending the police.

The four officers facing murder charges also face varying counts of attempted first-degree murder for allegedly shooting other people wounded on the bridge.

In addition, Robert Barrios was charged with four counts of attempted first-degree murder. Michael Hunter was charged with two counts of attempted first-degree murder. Ignatius Hills was charged with one count of attempted second-degree murder.

DOJ_NMG_0110237

Bigelow gave all the officers 24 hours to turn themselves in to the Sheriff's Office, setting bail at $100,000 for each attempted-murder count.

One-sided hearing?

Only Eric Hessler, the attorney for Gisevius, attended the afternoon proceedings in Bigelow's courtroom. Afterward, Hessler said his client is innocent, pointing out that all of the officers were cleared by an internal Police Department investigation.

"The grand jury only heard evidence that the district attorney wants them to see," Hessler said. The indictments do not lay out prosecutors' case against the seven officers, only charging them with the fatal shooting or attempted murder of specific victims. But the version of events by several people who survived the incident has been detailed in three federal lawsuits brought in late summer against the city government and Police Department.

These lawsuits portray a group of people who were trying to survive with scant food and water after Katrina, stranded along a strip of Chef Menteur that was surrounded by flood waters.

On Sept. 4 about 9 a.m., Ronald and Lance Madison walked near the top of the Danziger Bridge, returning to their brother's dental office on Chef Menteur Highway after a failed attempt to go to their mother's home in eastern New Orleans. Ronald Madison, who was severely retarded, had insisted on staying in the city because he could not bear to leave behind the family dachshunds, Bobbi and Sushi. His older brother, Lance, decided to stay with him, according to the lawsuit.

At the same time, according to the lawsuits, another group of people was walking at the base of the bridge on a trek to a nearby Winn Dixie to retrieve food and water. The group of six had been staying at the Friendly Inn Motel, located next to the dentist's office where the Madisons had camped out.

Suddenly, the people on the bridge were confronted by a hail of gunfire coming from a group of men in "dark clothing" who had emerged from the back of a rental truck at the foot of the bridge, the lawsuits said.

These men turned out to be the seven heavily armed, out-of-uniform police officers indicted on Thursday, although in the lawsuits, the victims say they never identified themselves as such.

In his lawsuit, Jose Holmes Jr. describes jumping behind a concrete barrier to escape the bullets. Officers shot Holmes several times even though he lay prone on the ground, the lawsuit alleges, One officer stood over him and shot him twice in the abdomen, according to the suit.

During the shooting, Holmes' friend James Brissette -- called James Barsett in the lawsuit -- was killed. His uncle, Leonard Bartholomew III, and cousin, Lesha Bartholomew, also were shot several times. His aunt, Susan Bartholomew, lost her arm after being shot by a "large-caliber" weapon. The gunmen also fired on Leonard Bartholomew IV, Holmes' 15-year-old cousin, but missed.

In his portrayal of the events that morning, Lance Madison has backed up police claims that there was gunfire near the bridge, testifying at a Sept. 28, 2005, magistrate court hearing that six teenagers in white T-shirts shot at him and his brother.

"We tried to run for our life," Madison told a magistrate judge.

But then the truckload of NOPD officers appeared, shooting Ronald Madison in the shoulder. Lance Madison testified that the teenagers never shot at police.

Although the Madisons kept trying to run down the bridge to get out of the line of fire, at least one of the officers pursued, shooting Ronald Madison seven times in the back, according to a lawsuit filed by Lance Madison and his mother, Fuki Madison.

Shipped to prison

After his brother was killed, Lance Madison was surrounded by Louisiana State Police officers. A 25-year employee of Federal Express with no criminal record, Madison was arrested and booked that day with eight counts of attempted murder for allegedly shooting at police officers and another man on the bridge that day.

Madison was booked at Camp Greyhound, the temporary jail set up after Katrina and later shipped to Hunt Correctional Center in St. Gabriel. At the Sept. 28 proceeding at Hunt, Orleans Parish Magistrate Court Judge Gerard Hansen found probable cause for Madison's arrest because of a police report that he had tossed a gun into the Industrial Canal from the Danziger Bridge. Police said they found the weapon the next day in the canal.

But at that same hearing, Hansen lowered Madison's bond -- he was later released without any bond -- and said he didn't believe police had caught a guilty man.

"I could be wrong, but I've been doing this for 32 years, and I think I have a gut reaction on this," he said, according to a transcript. "If I actually thought you were up there shooting, I would raise the bond to $2 million."

Police accounts of the events on Sept. 4 have been starkly different from those of Holmes, the Bartholomews and Lance Madison.

A department news release dated Oct. 4, 2005, offered this version of events:

The seven officers rushed to Danziger Bridge in the rental truck in response to radio reports of two police officers who were "down" under the bridge. Police also had a request for assistance from David Ryder, self-identified as a St. Landry Parish sheriff's deputy, who reported that several people on the bridge were shooting at rescue workers. When officers arrived, they were "met with gunfire" from four people on the bridge, the news release stated. At that point, the police returned fire.

In the six-page police report filed for the Madison arrest, Sgt. Arthur Kaufman gave a similar account, although at one point he says 7 people on the bridge that morning "opened fire" on the 7th District officers who arrived on the scene. The report describes two of the shooters continuing to fire as they ran over the Danziger Bridge toward the Friendly Inn Motel, which is where Lance Madison was arrested.

After the "scene was secured," Ryder arrived and identified Lance Madison as one of the people who shot at rescue workers.

Police impersonator?

But according to documents gathered by the attorneys representing Madison and the other victims, Ryder was not in fact a sheriff's deputy, from St. Landry or anywhere else. Indeed, he has a criminal record that includes a conviction for false imprisonment, arrests for battery on a police officer and possession of cocaine, according to court documents from Nacogdoches County, Texas.

"The public expected first responders to stay and protect, and they did that," said Michael Glasser, PANO president.

Both Donovan Livaccari, FOP employee representative, and Glasser called the indictments a political gambit by Jordan to win the allegiance of voters distrustful of police officers. Both also said that Jordan misled several of the officers involved, granting them immunity so they would testify and then indicting them.

For Lance Madison and his family, the indictments proved that he should never have been arrested on the bridge or charged with firing at police, his attorney said Thursday. "They are relieved that Lance has been vindicated," said Mary Howell.

The Madisons hope additional witnesses will come forward now that charges have been filed against police officers, a sentiment echoed by Anthony Radosti with the Metropolitan Crime Commission, a watchdog group that has been directing potential witnesses to the district attorney's office. "We know that there were a lot of people out there who saw and heard what happened," said Howell.

CIVIL LAW:

FEC Assessed A Record $6.2 Million In Penalties In 2006 (AP)

AP, December 29, 2006

The Federal Election Commission more than doubled its civil penalties in 2006, imposing $6.2 million in fines for campaign-law violations.

More than half -- $3.8 million -- came from penalties against Freddie Mac, the federal mortgage corporation, accused of making illegal contributions to political committees, according to year-end numbers released yesterday. Even without the record Freddie Mac fine, the FEC issued 12 penalties of more than $100,000, or almost a quarter of all six-figure fines in the agency's 31-year history.

"I'm very pleased with the vigorous enforcement record the FEC compiled in 2006. The numbers speak for themselves," FEC Chairman Michael Toner said in an interview. "It means strong confidence the FEC is properly prioritizing the most important cases and willing to pursue them to conclusion."

The year-end total included three cases against advocacy groups that the FEC settled for a combined $603,000. Swift Vets and POWs for Truth, the MoveOn.org Voter Fund, and the League of Conservation Voters failed "to register and file disclosure reports as federal political committees and accepted contributions in violation of federal limits and source prohibitions" during the 2004 presidential campaign, according to a unanimous agency ruling.

Advocates, however, said the numbers "don't tell the whole story."

"The penalties discussed in the FEC release reflect a mixed record," said Fred Wertheimer, president and chief executive of Democracy 21, a nonprofit, nonpartisan group that aims to reduce the influence of money in politics.

"The size of the fine will act as a warning to outside groups about the potential costs of violating the law," he said, but he added: "In other cases, like the penalties imposed on 527 groups, that does not reflect success but rather failure of law enforcement because it came years after the violations and represented a small portion of the tens of millions of dollars that were illegally spent in the 2004 presidential election."

The agency processed almost 78,000 financial filings totaling 3.9 million pages and detailing $2.7 billion in campaign spending.

Big Decal (WP)

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

KIRK SHELMERDINE is no political activist; in fact, he says he isn't even registered to vote. Rather, Mr. Shelmerdine is a NASCAR driver, albeit not a particularly successful one. He is, by his own description, "considered to be a 'field filler' as my race cars and race team are underfunded and have no realistic chance of winning a race." But two years ago, Mr. Shelmerdine took a step that caused him to crash head-on into the authorities at the Federal Election Commission: Unable to sell the space to a corporate sponsor, he put a Bush-Cheney '04 decal on the rear quarter-panel of his car for four races. It's not clear exactly what motivated Mr. Shelmerdine. He told a newspaper reporter at the time that "I'm very much against liberal ways when it comes to politics. This was the way to make our little statement." He later told the FEC that he had heard rumors that President Bush was going to be at the first race and figured the $50 decal would bring "publicity for me and the car."

Mr. Shelmerdine's decal resulted in a complaint to the FEC that he had violated federal election law by failing to file the report required of anyone who makes an independent expenditure valued at $250 or more in support of a candidate for federal office. The general counsel's office investigated; the commissioners tangled over how the decals should be valued: By considering Mr. Shelmerdine's cost in acquiring them? By averaging the amount Mr. Shelmerdine received from other sponsors when he did manage to sell the space? Finally, they agreed -- in an action made public this week -- to take the step that ought to have been obvious from the start: to send Mr. Shelmerdine a letter of admonishment warning him not to do it again.

Our customary criticism of the FEC is for doing too little to go after election law violations, not too much. But l'affaire Shelmerdine seems simply silly. None of the policies underlying the reporting requirements -- the need for transparency in campaign spending, the avoidance of secret efforts to curry favor with candidates -- were implicated here. There has to be a better use of FEC resources than investigating bumper stickers.

McCain-Feingold In The Dock (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 29, 2006

A federal court decision last week upheld the right of citizens to petition their government -- a right taken for granted before the 2002 McCain-Feingold campaign-finance law codified speech restrictions. The ruling is overly narrow but welcome all the same. And if it's appealed, as expected, the Supreme Court will have another chance to weigh in on Congress's efforts to chip away at First Amendment free-speech guarantees in the name of "reform."

The case dates to 2004, when Wisconsin Right to Life ran television and radio spots informing the public that U.S. Senators were filibustering President Bush's judicial nominees. The ads said Wisconsinites should contact Democrats Herb Kohl and Russ Feingold and urge them to oppose the filibusters. McCain-Feingold bans certain kinds of political ads in the 30 days before a primary and 60 days before a general election, and the anti-abortion group sued on the grounds that its ads should be exempt from the blackout period.

Last year a district court rejected that argument, ruling that the Supreme Court's 2003 McConnell decision upholding McCain-Feingold precluded such exemptions. Wisconsin Right to Life appealed, and in January the Supreme Court said McConnell does in fact allow for exemptions and that the district court should reconsider its ruling.

Last week a federal court did just that and reversed course. In a 2-1 opinion, the court held that certain "issue" ads are permissible during campaign season, even if they (gasp) refer to candidates seeking re-election. And while we agree with the result, the justification for the court's finding is still troublesome and revealing of McCain-Feingold's assault on political speech.

The ads are acceptable, said the court, because they urge voters to call both Senators instead of just one, "do not comment on either Senator's past or current position regarding [filibusters]" and don't "reveal either Senator's thinking on the issue." In other words, campaign finance "reform" has left us with a system that allows corporations, unions and other special interest groups to petition government on issues of public importance so long as they don't expressly advocate the election or defeat of an actual politician.

The good news is that the Federal Election Commission is likely to appeal to the Supreme Court, which will get a chance to reconsider its muddled rulings on campaign funding and political speech. Since the 5-4 McConnell decision upholding the campaign finance law, Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito have joined the High Court. It's not certain how far either would move in a deregulatory direction, but it's encouraging that both voted with the 6-3 majority in last term's Randell v. Sorrell decision, which struck down Vermont's expenditure and contribution limits.

McCain-Feingold's backers claimed the law would rein in large donors and facilitate political campaigns that are less expensive, less negative and less influenced by special interests. If that nirvana has arrived, we haven't noticed. Proponents also promised that reform wouldn't hurt the ability of grassroots organizations to run ads that inform the public and hold politicians accountable. The folks at Wisconsin Right to Life beg to differ.

Perhaps the lesson is that limiting political speech isn't the cure for whatever supposedly ails the electoral system. Let's hope the Supreme Court seizes this opportunity to start dismantling the speech-regulation regime known as McCain-Feingold.

FEC Fines Outgoing Rep. Taylor For '04 Violation (RC)

By Nicole Duran

Roll Call, December 29, 2006

The Federal Election Commission on Wednesday fined the 2004 campaign of Rep. Charles Taylor (R-N.C.) $91,000 for failing to properly comply with provisions of the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act.

Taylor poured more than $800,000 of his own money into his 2004 re-election campaign but did not notify the FEC or his opponent in a timely matter, according to the FEC.

Taylor ran afoul of one of the most talked about, and misunderstood, provisions of BCRA, the "Millionaires' Amendment."

Among other requirements, House candidates must alert the FEC and their opponents within 24 hours if they spend more than $350,000 of their own money.

Taylor's campaign missed the initial 24-hour notification and four others.

The fine is especially painful considering that Taylor lost his seat in the midterm elections and is about to be replaced by Rep.-elect Heath Shuler (D-N.C.).

Taylor's office did not immediately respond to a request for a comment for this story.

In another case, the commission dismissed a complaint against the Leadership Forum, a 527 group, last week.

Several watchdog groups had complained that the Leadership Forum actually was created to help specific GOP candidates during the 2004 cycle and therefore should have registered as a political action committee.

The group, led by Susan Hirschmann, a former chief of staff to former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas), came under fire when the National Republican Congressional Committee transferred $1 million to it in 2002, just days before such transfers were outlawed by BCRA.

The group returned the money two months later.

During the course of its investigation into the matter, the FEC said it found no evidence that the now-defunct group received contributions or made expenditures that would have required it to register as PAC.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Lawsuit Alleges St. Paul Officer Assaulted 85-year-old Man During Traffic Stop (STPPP)

By Shannon Prather

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, December 29, 2006

A man who alleges he suffered an "inhumane beating" during a traffic stop two years ago in St. Paul sued the city this week.

Leon Nins filed a federal civil rights suit Wednesday, two years to the day after the Dec. 27, 2004, confrontation. Nins was 85 at the time.

In the suit, Nins makes a variety of claims, including excessive force, battery and assault. The filing states Nins suffered permanent damage to his eyes and legs as well as psychological injuries, including depression, anxiety and panic attacks.

Nins seeks more than $50,000, plus punitive damages.

The incident, involving a black motorist and a white police officer, riled local civil rights leaders. Police Chief John Harrington, relying on witness statements and a squad car audio recording, defended officer Michael Lee, who said Nins kicked and spit at him.

Nins, who was arrested, spent three days in jail. Prosecutors charged Nins with assaulting the officer and obstructing the legal process, but dropped the charges and allowed him to admit to driving without a license. Nins had no criminal record.

Nins, a WWII veteran, was on his way to visit his wife at a nursing home when Lee pulled him over for expired tags near the corner of Dale Street and Selby Avenue in the Summit-University neighborhood.

Police and Nins have given conflicting accounts of what happened next.

According to the suit filed Wednesday, Nins said he tried to step out of the car, but said the officer grabbed the sack lunch Nins had prepared for his ailing wife and threw it onto the ground.

DOJ_NMG_0110241

Nins states he asked Lee why he threw the food and Lee responded by grabbing him and assaulting him. The suit states Nins never resisted the officer, but did question his actions.

Nins accused the officer of punching, kicking and striking him with a flashlight or baton. The officer also sprayed Nins with a chemical irritant.

According to a criminal complaint originally filed by prosecutors, Nins would not open his window for the officer. Lee opened the vehicle door and Nins began yelling that he would not show his driver's license, began swearing and refused to get out of the car. Nins spit at Lee as the officer pulled him out of the car, handcuffed him and placed him in the back of the squad car.

Nins kicked the squad car door open, hitting Lee in the face, and then kicked the officer's legs.

Subsequent investigations by the Bloomington Police Department and the U.S. Justice Department cleared Lee of criminal wrongdoing.

The lawsuit names the city, the police department, Harrington and Lee.

Conditions Improving Too Slowly, Judge Says (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

Court to Step Up Oversight of Case

A D.C. Superior Court judge said yesterday that the District had failed to do enough to improve conditions for juvenile offenders, particularly at the long-troubled Oak Hill detention facility.

Judge Herbert B. Dixon Jr. said the city's slow progress in making changes that were agreed to more than two years ago left him no choice but to step squarely back into the case, which began in 1985 as a class-action lawsuit filed on behalf of juveniles held at the city-run Oak Hill facility in Laurel.

"In light of the recurring delays meeting the requirements imposed in this case, and the impact such delays have on the children in defendants' custody, the court concludes that its more direct and active oversight of the remedial process is warranted," Dixon wrote in a nine-page order.

The lawsuit -- Jerry M. vs. the District of Columbia-- has cast a long shadow over the juvenile justice system. A consent decree, reached in 1986, was supposed to settle the suit, but problems persisted. The case appeared on its way to resolution in spring 2004, when the plaintiffs and the city agreed to the appointment of an independent monitor who would report back to Dixon. The D.C. government's appointment in early 2005 of a highly regarded juvenile justice director added to the optimism that changes were near.

But Dixon, who has overseen the case since 2001, felt compelled to act after receiving the most recent reports from the monitor, Grace M. Lopes. Although noting "clear progress," she found the city's efforts wanting in many areas, from a failure to ensure pest control services at Oak Hill despite "chronic infestations" to persistent staffing problems even in new, more-therapeutic units.

Oak Hill's population has dropped from an overcrowded 245 youths in February 2005 to fewer than 100 in recent months as the city has found alternatives to housing juveniles there for extended periods.

The May 2004 agreement that led to the appointment of Lopes called for parties in the case to draft a comprehensive plan to address the substantial shortcomings in how juvenile offenders are housed and cared for by the District. But the master plan has yet to materialize, the judge said.

Instead, the parties have produced a string of short-term plans, and even those efforts, intended to address urgent issues, often are accompanied by requests for extensions, Dixon stated. Such delays "are consistent with the defendants' performance throughout the two-decade history of this class action lawsuit," he said.

The parties in the case -- the District, the D.C. Public Defender Service, the American Civil Liberties Union and the law firm of Covington & Burling -- had asked the judge to scale back the role of the monitor and set criteria to take the place of a comprehensive plan.

Alan Pemberton, the Covington & Burling partner working on the case, said the parties believed that with the work done during the last couple of years, the monitoring could have been relaxed.

"There has been tremendous progress in some areas of the consent decree, probably more progress than in the previous 18 years," Pemberton said.

But the judge said such a framework would not give him the timelines and other information that he needs to ensure compliance with the consent decree. Instead, Dixon ordered the long-sought comprehensive plan to be filed by the end of April.

Contempt In Boston (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0110242

The Wall Street Journal, December 29, 2006

Nearly three years ago, the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts read between the lines of the state constitution to discover a right to same-sex marriage previously undetected across the decades. The court then gave the legislature six months to rewrite state law to accommodate its diktat.

On Wednesday, however, the same court suddenly rediscovered the humility so lacking in its previous foray into the marriage debate. Before the court was a case brought by the governor together with citizens who had presented an initiative to amend the state constitution and so define marriage as a pact between a man and a woman. The petitioners had gathered more than 150,000 signatures. According to the state constitution, the legislature must now vote twice on the measure in successive legislative sessions before the amendment can be put on the ballot for a vote by the electorate.

The constitution only requires that 25% of both houses of the legislature vote to put the measure on the ballot, a bar set deliberately low to ensure that the people would have their say in all but the most extreme cases. But the legislature has so far refused to vote on the measure at all. In November, its members recessed until next Tuesday, the last day of the current legislative session, and to all appearances the politicians intend to adjourn the session without voting on the measure at all -- thus letting it die.

Departing Governor Mitt Romney has threatened to withhold approval of legislators' raises for next year unless they vote on the initiative, but this has purely symbolic value. Thanks to a voter-passed constitutional amendment from 1998, legislators are guaranteed raises every two years. Yet this is that same constitutional-amendment procedure that is now being flouted by legislators who lack the votes to defeat the measure on a straight vote.

The petitioners sued the legislature for abrogating its constitutional duty, and the state Supreme Judicial Court took the case. In its ruling this week, it agreed that the legislature's duty to vote on the measure was "unambiguous." But it claimed to be powerless to compel a vote. So the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, whose own arrogation of power created this mess, has suddenly discovered the limits of its power to clean it up.

All in all, this is quite the political spectacle. First judges usurp the power of the legislature to dictate their own social policy. Then the legislature uses a procedural ruse to deny voters a say on the gay-marriage issue. And these are some of the same people who say Iraqis aren't ready for democracy.

AT&T Inc. has offered a new set of concessions that are expected to satisfy the two Democrats on the Federal Communications Commission and lead to approval of the company's $85 billion buyout of BellSouth Corp.

Approval by the full commission could happen as soon as Friday.

AT&T filed a letter of commitment with the agency Thursday night that adds a number of new conditions to the deal, including a promise to observe "network neutrality" principles, an offer of affordable stand-alone digital subscriber line service and a promise to give up some wireless spectrum.

Final approval still requires a vote of the commissioners, which can happen at any time via computer. The proposed deal is the largest telecommunications merger in U.S. history.

AT&T offered the concessions after a little more than a week of marathon negotiations with lawyers who work for the two Democrats on the commission, Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein, documents show.

Consumer advocates are praising the compromise. Gene Kimmelman, vice president of federal and international affairs for Consumers Union, who has worked closely with the Democrats, said AT&T's new concessions are "an enormous improvement from where we were a month ago."

Commissioners Adelstein and Copps and representatives of AT&T were not immediately available for comment Thursday evening.

The agreement came together 10 days after Republican Commissioner Robert McDowell announced that he would not vote on the deal, despite being authorized to do so by the FCC's general counsel.

McDowell, a Republican, had decided not to participate in the negotiations because of his former position as a lobbyist for Comptel, a trade organization that opposes the merger.

Republican FCC Chairman Kevin Martin, who supported approval of the merger without conditions, was betting that McDowell would vote in favor of the deal following the legal opinion and break a 2-2 partisan deadlock.

But with McDowell's firm declaration that he would not vote, the pressure shifted to AT&T, which had hoped to close the transaction by the end of the year, a development that put the two Democrats in a much stronger position.

Pressure was added by Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., the incoming chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, who, in a veiled warning to Democrats, said negotiations should proceed "fairly and openly and in a way that avoids imposing burdens that have nothing to do with the transaction."

In an effort to get the merger approved, AT&T submitted a set of concessions on Oct. 13, but they were rejected by the Democrats as insufficient.

In AT&T's letter of commitment, authored by the company's senior vice president in charge of regulatory affairs, Robert W. Quinn Jr., he noted that the new concessions were "significantly more extensive than those submitted on Oct. 13."

For starters, the new offer extends the lifespan of many conditions from 30 months under the old deal to 42 months or longer in some cases.

Among the promises made by the company:

-An offer of stand-alone, high-speed Internet service to customers in its service area for $19.95 per month for 30 months. The "naked DSL (digital subscriber line)" offer would allow those who live in AT&T and BellSouth's service areas to sign up for fast Internet access without being required to buy a package of other services.

-A greater commitment to network neutrality, or nondiscrimination involving Internet traffic. AT&T said it would "maintain a neutral network and neutral routing in its wireline broadband Internet access service" for two years.

-To freeze rates for "special access" customers, usually competitors and large businesses that pay to connect directly to a regional phone company's central office via a dedicated fiber optic line, for 48 months.

-To "assign and/or transfer to an unaffiliated third party" all of its 2.5 GHZ spectrum currently licensed to BellSouth within one year of the merger closing date.

-To "repatriate" 3,000 jobs that were outsourced by BellSouth outside the U.S. by Dec. 31, 2008, with at least 200 of those jobs to be located in New Orleans.

Ben Scott, legislative director for Free Press, a reform group that has fought the merger, said the network neutrality provision was a "big step forward for the supporters of an open Internet."

The creation of the new telecommunications giant was approved by the Justice Department on Oct. 11 without conditions.

After the Oct. 13 offer of concessions from AT&T, negotiations stalled. Martin, declaring an impasse, asked the agency's general counsel to issue an opinion on McDowell's status, a move that drew harsh criticism from Democrats.

General Counsel Sam Feder issued his opinion, but McDowell called a press conference soon after announcing he had no intention to vote, saying that he was being used "as a pawn to forgo meaningful and sincere negotiations."

The combination of San Antonio-based AT&T and Atlanta-based BellSouth would have operations in 22 states. AT&T estimates that about 10,000 jobs would be phased out over three years.

Combined, the companies generate about $117 billion in revenue and operate 68.7 million local phone lines stretching coast to coast across the southern United States and up through the Midwest.

The buyout will also give AT&T complete control over Cingular Wireless, the nation's largest wireless telecommunications provider, which it owns in partnership with BellSouth.

AT&T Yields To Seal BellSouth Deal (WSJ)

By Amy Schatz And Peter Grant

The Wall Street Journal, December 29, 2006

AT&T Inc. made numerous new consumer-friendly concessions on the terms of its proposed $85 billion merger with BellSouth Corp. in an effort to get approval by the Federal Communications Commission before the end of the year.

In a 19-page letter filed with the agency last night, the phone giant promised to observe numerous "network neutrality" principles so it would treat all Internet content equally. Consumer groups and some Internet companies have been pressing the FCC for weeks to make this a condition of approving the merger.

In addition, AT&T agreed to do such things as upgrade the availability of high-speed Internet service in the areas it serves and adhere to price caps on high-volume data lines used by business customers. In a concession to labor unions, the company agreed to repatriate 3,000 jobs outsourced by BellSouth outside the U.S., locating at least 200 of them in the New Orleans area.

"This is a real capitulation by AT&T-BellSouth," said Harold Feld, senior vice president of Media Access Project, a Washington public-interest law firm.

The proposed deal, the largest in U.S. telecommunications-merger history, could be approved by the full commission as early as today. An AT&T spokesman declined to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0110244

The deal has some longer-term implications for all phone companies because of the focus by the FCC's Democrats on net neutrality and rates charged to businesses for high-volume data lines. Democrats felt emboldened to take a hard line during negotiations because of their new control of Congress, where Democrats have been riled up about the net-neutrality issue.

AT&T's concessions come after weeks of negotiations with the FCC, which reached an impasse with two Democrats on the five-member commission pushing for additional conditions and the two remaining Republicans opposing them. The fifth commissioner, Robert McDowell, a Republican who many thought would break the tie, decided to abstain because he had previously lobbied on behalf of CompTel, a trade group that represents smaller phone companies.

Mr. McDowell's decision to abstain precipitated an intense round of negotiations, which lasted through the Christmas holiday. The FCC's Democrats insisted that AT&T abide by Internet nondiscrimination rules and essentially came up with a new one as part of this deal. AT&T basically agreed that it wouldn't prioritize Internet traffic once it reached the two dozen or so hubs around the country that process Internet traffic. From that point until it reaches a customer's home, the traffic must be treated equally.

That condition expires in two years. The combined company will have about 11.5 million high-speed Internet subscribers.

From a financial perspective, a more significant condition involves reinstituting FCC price caps dropped after industry deregulation on high-volume data lines used by corporate customers throughout the combined company's 22 state territory. Previously, price caps were required only in areas where the FCC determined that no significant competition existed. Under this deal, the use of price caps for these "special access lines" would expand significantly. The condition is far more extensive than what was required last year when SBC Communications Inc. acquired AT&T Corp, and also stays in place longer, for four years.

The deal would also help consumers and start-up Internet phone companies, like Vonage Holdings Corp., by requiring AT&T to offer stand-alone DSL Internet service for up to $20 a month. That would give consumers access to basically the slowest broadband Internet access available, 768 kilobits per second. But that is fast enough to use Internet phone services provided by AT&T rivals.

AT&T also agreed to divest itself of wireless spectrum that was intended to be used for wireless broadband services, a condition that competitors like Clearwire Corp. have been advocating. Critics have claimed that AT&T and BellSouth had so much spectrum between them others wouldn't be able to compete.

AT&T Offers New Concessions To FCC In BellSouth Deal (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Christopher Stern And Molly Peterson

Bloomberg, December 29, 2006

Dec. 28 (Bloomberg) -- AT&T Inc., the largest U.S. phone company, agreed to new concessions including some price controls to win regulatory approval for its $86 billion purchase of BellSouth Corp.

AT&T made the offer in a letter filed today with the U.S. Federal Communications Commission, a move designed to win the agency approval of the deal as early as tomorrow and clear the last hurdle to completing the purchase.

The offer may end a three-month stalemate between FCC Chairman Kevin Martin, fellow Republican Deborah Taylor Tate and the panel's two Democrats, who have sought price controls and other concessions. Buying BellSouth lets San Antonio-based AT&T expand its local service to 22 states, gain full control of Cingular Wireless LLC and compete with cable television companies offering phone service as well as Web access and TV.

``AT&T really wanted to get it done this year," said Paul Glenchur, an analyst with Stanford Washington Research Group, an investor advisory firm. ``I suspect the Democrats didn't want to look like they were standing in the way."

Shares of AT&T rose 8 cents to $35.50 at 4:27 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. They have gained 45 percent this year. Atlanta-based BellSouth rose 18 cents to $46.80 and has gained 73 percent this year.

DSL Service

The concessions by AT&T go beyond those the company proposed in October. AT&T offered, for example, to sell fast Internet access known as DSL for $19.95 a month without requiring customers to buy phone service, the letter said.

The company also said it would repatriate 3,000 BellSouth jobs now outside the U.S. and pledged 200 jobs for New Orleans.

Democratic Commissioners Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein gained leverage in seeking tougher conditions after the fifth commissioner, Republican Robert McDowell, said he would abstain from voting because of his past work as a lobbyist for smaller companies that compete with AT&T.

Under the proposed deal, AT&T wouldn't raise prices on some ``special access" lines that provide high-capacity phone and data services for large businesses for four years.

DOJ_NMG_0110245

The company also agreed to divest some wireless licenses in BellSouth's nine-state region. The licenses cover airwaves suitable for high-speed Internet access. Atlanta-based Cingular, co-owned by AT&T and BellSouth, is the biggest U.S. wireless services company.

Network Neutrality

In a bow to backers of ``network neutrality," AT&T said it would refrain from charging Web companies such as Google Inc. premium fees for faster subscriber access. Neutrality supporters have urged Congress not to let phone companies charge higher fees for faster service, which they liken to the creation of tolls on the Internet.

The new concessions ``are significantly more extensive than those submitted on October 13," AT&T Senior Vice President Robert W. Quinn said in the letter.

The transaction won unconditional approval from the Justice Department and 18 states.

BellSouth investors will get 1.325 AT&T shares for each they now own, representing an 18 percent premium based on the companies' stock prices on March 3, the last trading day before the deal was announced. While that put the value of the deal at about $67 billion, AT&T shares have risen 27 percent since then.

AT&T's 5.1 percent notes maturing in September 2014 rose 0.71 cent to 97.37 cents on the dollar to yield to 5.52 percent, according to Trace, the bond reporting system of the NASD. BellSouth's 5.2 percent notes due in September 2014 fell 0.64 cent to 97.21 cents to yield 5.65 percent.

General Dynamics' Purchase Challenged (WP)

By Renae Merle, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

Federal antitrust authorities, citing concerns about higher prices and less competition, challenged General Dynamics' plans yesterday to buy a Canadian ammunition maker.

The Federal Trade Commission ruled that to buy SNC Technologies of Quebec, General Dynamics must divest its interest in one of the two other competitors in the market. Otherwise, "General Dynamics could unilaterally raise prices or otherwise engage in anticompetitive conduct," the FTC said in a statement.

The company, headquartered in Falls Church, has agreed to those terms.

It is at least the third time this year that federal regulators have expressed concern about diminishing competition among military contactors. The agency took more than a year to approve a plan by Lockheed Martin and Boeing to merge their government rocket businesses, acknowledging that creating a monopoly in a multibillion-dollar market would probably lead to higher prices and lower quality. The FTC approved General Dynamics' $2.2 billion acquisition of technology firm Anteon in June only after Anteon agreed to sell a unit that raised conflict-of-interest concerns.

In February, General Dynamics announced that it would buy SNC Technologies for $275 million. SNC is one of three makers of mortar rounds, relatively inexpensive shells used by infantry troops, for the U.S. military. The others are Day & Zimmerman of Philadelphia and American Ordnance of Pittsburg, Kan., which is jointly owned by General Dynamics and Day & Zimmerman.

Unconditionally allowing the acquisition of SNC would give General Dynamics control of two of the three competitors in the market, the FTC said. Day & Zimmerman's market position also is in doubt since the ammunition plant it operates in Kansas is slated to close under the 2005 Base Closure and Realignment legislation, according to the FTC. The lack of competition would also increase the likelihood that General Dynamics could "unilaterally exercise market power" and raise prices, the agency's complaint said.

The FTC has approved a consent decree calling for General Dynamics to divest its 50 percent stake in American Ordnance and allow the agency to appoint a monitor to oversee compliance, the statement said. The commission will vote after a 30-day comment period on whether to make the agreement final.

"Mortars and artillery are critical components in the U.S. military's arsenal," Jeffrey Schmidt, director of the FTC's Bureau of Competition, said in a statement. Requiring the sale "will ensure that our war fighters continue to benefit from competition and do not pay more for the ammunition."

General Dynamics has not found a buyer for its stake in American Ordnance yet, said Rob Doolittle, a General Dynamics spokesman. "We'll make an announcement when we have a buyer," he said. "I can't speculate about when that might be at this point."

The weapons maker is also awaiting approval by the Canadian government. The acquisition, which was originally expected to close in the middle of this year, is now expected to close within the first few months of 2007, Doolittle said.

General Dynamics is already one of the largest suppliers of medium- and large-caliber ammunition for tanks and helicopters used by the U.S. military. Its ordnance and tactical systems unit recorded $615 million in munitions and other sales in 2005, the FTC said. The deal, if approved, would bring new customers, including the Canadian government.

Intel Ordered To Produce International Evidence In AMD Antitrust Case (AP)

AP, December 29, 2006

SUNNYVALE, Calif. (AP) - Chip-maker Intel Corp. said it would not object to a court order to produce documents related to its international business practices, as part of an antitrust case filed by rival Advanced Micro Devices Inc.

AMD said the court order issued Wednesday was a "significant legal victory."

In a letter to Judge Joseph Farnan in the U.S. Federal District Court in Delaware, Intel said it plans to cooperate with the court order and that it does not plan to file an objection.

Intel also noted that a court-appointed Special Master explicitly said it was not making decisions about whether the evidence would be admissible in court.

In September, a federal judge ruled that if AMD wins the antitrust case filed in the U.S., it cannot receive damages for Intel's alleged monopolistic practices overseas.

The lawsuit dates to June 2005, when AMD initiated an antitrust case against Intel, alleging that its business was harmed by Intel's practice of offering rebates, discounts and other incentives to persuade PC makers to use chips from Intel instead of AMD. AMD argued that Intel sustains a monopoly that allows it to charge higher prices.

Intel responded that AMD's problems were rooted in its reputation for being an unreliable supplier and that it failed to adequately invest in its business.

Shares of AMD slipped 13 cents to close at $20.57 on the New York Stock Exchange, while Intel shares rose 2 cents to end at $20.42 on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

AMD Claims Key Legal Victory In Intel Antitrust Fight (MRKTWTCH)

By Matt Andrejczak, MarketWatch

Market Watch, December 29, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO (MarketWatch) - Advanced Micro Devices Inc. on Thursday claimed a key legal victory in its ongoing antitrust suit against its bigger rival Intel Corp.

A Delaware federal court has ruled that Intel must produce documents and other evidence related to its foreign dealings with PC makers, distributors and others. The ruling overturns Intel's prior objections.

"This ruling removes any basis for Intel or its foreign customers to withhold evidence of Intel's exclusion, regardless of where it occurred," said Tom McCoy, AMD's chief legal officer, in a statement.

U.S. District Judge Joseph Farnan had previously sided with Intel, opining that the court lacked jurisdiction over AMD's foreign conduct claims. But a special master appointed to oversee discovery disputes in the case agreed with AMD that the PC-chip market is global, with 68% of the world's computers sold to non-U.S. customers.

Sunnyvale, Calif.-based AMD said it thinks this latest development will bolster it claims that Intel used anticompetitive practices in the sale of PC chips worldwide.

AMD has subpoenaed roughly 70 parties so far in the case, and as a result of this court order, it is likely AMD will target Intel's business partners in Japan, where antitrust regulators there have suggested Intel abused its position as the world's No. 1 computer-chip maker.

AMD originally filed its antitrust suit against Intel in June 2005. The suit accused Intel of bullying a range of computer makers, distributors and retailers from Europe to Asia into not selling or supporting AMD products. Intel has denied the charges.

This week's ruling is a setback for Intel, which elected not to challenge the decision of the Special Master Vincent Poppiti.

"While Intel obviously had hoped for a different outcome regarding discovery, Intel of course will comply with the Special Master's decision and will respond as the Special Master directs," Richard L. Horwitz, an attorney representing Intel, told Judge Farnan, Jr. in a letter dated Dec. 27.

Still, the latest ruling is not clear legal victory for AMD, which controls roughly 20% of the PC-chip market worldwide.

It's not known whether any evidence AMD digs up pertaining to Intel's foreign business dealings will be heard in the court trial set for April 2009.

Special Master Poppiti, appointed by Judge Joseph Farnan, Jr. to oversee all discovery disputes in the case, has left that up in the air.

"In this regard, the Special Master does not opine on the ultimate admissibility" of any foreign conduct material "for the purposes of trial," Poppiti wrote in his ruling.

This sets the stage for other legal battles ahead of the trial. Intel said it plans to address evidentiary issues with the court when the time comes.

In midafternoon trading Thursday, AMD shares fell 13 cents to $20.57. Intel shares rose 1 cent to $20.41. Matt Andrejczak is a reporter for MarketWatch in San Francisco.

EPA Charges Bus Co. Broke Pollution Law (BOSH)

By Donna Goodison

Boston Herald, December 29, 2006

Chelsea-based Paul Revere Transportation faces federal penalties for alleged repeat violations of a state law forbidding buses from idling more than five minutes.

The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency and the U.S. Justice Department filed suit in district court on Tuesday, alleging the transportation company left its diesel buses idling for a total of more than 100 hours at its Roxbury bus yard and a shuttle bus location on Brookline Avenue.

"Given the extremely high asthma rates in Roxbury, it is unacceptable that diesel buses and other vehicles are left idling for more than an hour at a time," Robert Varney, New England EPA administrator, said in a statement. "Diesel pollution is very harmful, especially for sensitive populations such as the young, elderly and people who suffer from asthma."

Paul Revere Transportation could not be immediately reached for comment. The company is a joint venture of Alternate Concepts Inc. and Modern Continental Construction, its Web site says.

The EPA witnessed the alleged idling during eight weekly inspections in April and March. At times, more than 20 vehicles were found idling - some for more than an hour and, in one case, for more than two hours, according to the agency.

Follow-up inquiries suggested violations may have been ongoing for several years, it said.

Paul Revere Transportation is liable for civil penalties of up to $32,500 per day for each violation that occurred after March 15, 2004, and $27,500 per day for each violation before that, according to the court complaint.

The EPA previously fined the company in 2002 for illegal idling of its shuttle buses at Boston's Logan International Airport.

FDA Tentatively Declares Food From Cloned Animals To Be Safe (NYT)

By Andrew Pollack And Andrew Martin

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

After years of delay, the Food and Drug Administration tentatively concluded yesterday that milk and meat from some cloned farm animals are safe to eat. That finding could make the United States the first country to allow products from cloned livestock to be sold in grocery stores.

Even if the agency's assessment is formally approved next year, consumers will not see many steaks or pork chops from cloned animals because the technology is still too expensive to be used widely.

But the F.D.A.'s draft policy touched off an immediate storm of criticism from consumer groups, as well as some concerns from meat and dairy companies worried about consumer reaction.

"At the end of the day, F.D.A. is looking out for a few cloning companies and not for consumers or the dairy industry," said Joseph Mendelson, legal director for the Center for Food Safety, an advocacy group.

Mr. Mendelson and other consumer representatives argue that the science backing the F.D.A.'s decision is shaky and that consumer surveys show that most people are opposed to cloning animals, let alone eating them. Some also said that cloning causes harm to the animals involved and could pave the way for human cloning.

Opponents hope to bring Congressional pressure to bear to derail the policy before it becomes final or at least to require that such foods be labeled so consumers can choose to avoid them. F.D.A. officials said that it was unlikely that labeling would be required because food from cloned animals is indistinguishable from other food, although a final decision about labeling has not been made.

Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, yesterday called for a "careful, deliberative and open process" before cloned animals are approved for food.

The F.D.A.'s finding comes more than six years after the agency first decided to study the matter, after recognizing that the advent of cloned farm animals raised a food safety issue. After that study, the agency in 2003 gave a tentative approval to cloned animals for food. But the F.D.A. retreated after its own advisory panel found there was insufficient scientific backing for that conclusion.

DOJ_NMG_0110248

This time, F.D.A. officials said they had substantial new data, which they presented yesterday in a nearly 700-page "draft risk assessment."

The officials denied the contention from some critics that the policy was announced during a holiday week in order to reduce publicity, saying it had taken until now to analyze the data and obtain comment from other government agencies.

The assessment concluded that milk and meat from cloned cows, pigs and goats, and from their offspring, were "as safe to eat as the food we eat every day," Stephen F. Sundlof, the F.D.A.'s chief of veterinary medicine, said in a telephone call with reporters.

Mr. Sundlof said that by law the agency could consider only the scientific issues, not consumer demand or the ethics of cloning.

While animal cloning has always been legal, since 2001 there has been a voluntary moratorium on the sales of milk or meat from such animals to give the F.D.A. time to study the matter. Some experts say that some products from clones or their offspring have probably nonetheless made their way into the food supply.

The moratorium will stay in place until the new policy is completed, after a 90-day period for public comment and additional time for the F.D.A. to review the comments. Mr. Sundlof said he could not say when the final policy would be ready, though it might be by the end of 2007.

Even then, the moratorium would remain for products from sheep, the F.D.A. said, because there was not enough evidence of their safety. No one has yet succeeded in cloning chickens or other poultry.

The finding was hailed by cloning companies, which have been struggling to build a business. It also drew praise from some farmers and breeders who have already made clones of their prized livestock but have had to pour milk down the drain and keep their meat off the market.

They say that cloning is just another breeding technique, like artificial insemination or in-vitro fertilization.

"This just sort of lifts the stigma of the clones," said Bob Schauf, a Holstein breeder and dairy farmer in Barron, Wis., who had two of his prized cows cloned. He said his family and the families of his employees have been drinking the milk from those clones rather than see it go to waste. But dairy marketers have expressed concern.

A survey conducted last summer by the International Dairy Foods Association, an industry trade group, found that 14 percent of women would turn away from all dairy products if milk from clones were introduced into the food supply. The association surveyed women because its research has found them to be the main household decision makers on dairy products.

The American Meat Institute, while saying yesterday that cloning was safe, also urged the F.D.A. to be cautious about approval "if most consumers are unwilling to accept the technology."

A poll this month from the nonprofit Pew Initiative on Food and Biotechnology found that while most consumers knew little about animal cloning, 64 percent said they were uncomfortable with it, with 46 percent saying they were "strongly uncomfortable."

F.D.A. officials said no other country had yet approved food from cloned livestock, although some are considering it. That raised the prospect that American exports of milk or meat could be blocked by certain countries if they contain products from cloned animals. An official in the Washington delegation of the European Union said politicians and consumers in Europe would no doubt debate the issue.

Carol Tucker Foreman, director for food policy at the Consumer Federation of America, said consumer groups would ask food companies, retailers and restaurant chains to shun products from cloned livestock.

That raises the possibility that some food companies will label their products "clone free," just as some now label milk as not coming from cows injected with growth hormone.

Cloning involves putting an animal's DNA into an egg thats own DNA has been removed. The resulting embryo, after being implanted into a surrogate mother, makes a genetically identical copy of the original animal.

But even if two animals have identical genes, they can turn out differently if those genes are turned on or off at different times. And studies have shown that patterns of gene activity are different in embryos created by cloning compared with embryos created by the fusing of sperm and egg.

These differences are presumed to account in large measure for the low success rate of cloning. Fetuses can grow unusually large, posing a risk to the surrogate mother. Many clones die during gestation or shortly after birth. Some are born with deformed heads or limbs or problems with their hearts, lungs or other organs.

But the F.D.A. said that obviously sick and deformed animals were already barred from the food supply. It added that clones that survived past the first few days "appear to grow and develop normally" and that healthy adult clones were "virtually indistinguishable" from noncloned livestock, making their meat or milk safe.

The draft assessment based its conclusions on an extensive review of scientific literature on cloning as well as on studies, some done by cloning companies, comparing the composition of the milk, meat and blood of cloned animals and conventional animals.

Mr. Sundlof said the agency also found that cloning “poses no unique risks to the health of animals” beyond those seen with other forms of assisted reproduction such as in-vitro fertilization. The frequency of problems is higher with cloning, however, perhaps because it is a newer technology. The first cloned mammal, Dolly the sheep, was born in 1996.

The F.D.A.’s announcement, by paving the way for the end of the moratorium, could make it easier to persuade farmers and breeders to pay $15,000 to copy a prized bull or dairy cow.

“I think that this draft is going to provide the industry the comfort it needs,” said Mark Walton, president of ViaGen, a cloning company based in Austin, Tex., that has yet to turn a profit after five years.

Industry officials estimate there are now only about 500 or 600 cloned cows in the United States, out of tens of millions of beef and dairy cows. There are roughly 200 cloned pigs.

Experts say that cloning is too expensive to be used to make animals only to then grind them into hamburger or even to milk them. Rather, farmers and breeders are cloning prized livestock so they can then be used for breeding using more conventional means of reproduction.

That means that most food from cloning would come from the sexually produced offspring of the cloned animals. The F.D.A. said milk and meat from such offspring were safe, because any abnormalities in clones do not carry into the next generation.

The agency’s assessment did not include genetically modified animals, in which a foreign gene is introduced. The agency is still deciding whether to allow the first of those, a fast-growing fish, into the food supply.

FDA Says Clones Are Safe To Eat (WP)

By Rick Weiss

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

Taking a long-awaited stand in an emotionally fraught food fight, the Food and Drug Administration yesterday released a 678-page analysis concluding that milk and meat from cloned animals pose no unique risks to consumers.

The decision, subject to change after a period of public comment, stops short of approving the sale of food from clones and leaves in place for now a long-standing government request that farmers keep their clones off the market.

But it represents a crucial milestone for the handful of biotechnology companies that see cloning as a welcome opportunity to sidestep the vagaries of sexual reproduction and instead mass-produce some of the nation's finest meat- and milk-producing animals.

"The higher-end breeders are going to start signing up and taking advantage of this," said Mark Walton, president of Austin-based ViaGen, which has produced about 250 cloned cattle and pigs in preparation for what the company hopes will be a robust market in farm clones. "They've been interested, but they've been skeptical that we'd ever get the regulatory process dealt with."

Opponents, however -- including some who doubt the safety of cloned food and others concerned about the welfare of the animals -- vowed to fight the new momentum toward approval.

"This is a lose-lose decision for consumers and the dairy industry," said Joseph Mendelson, legal director at the Center for Food Safety in Washington, which has petitioned the FDA to regulate cloned farm animals one type at a time, much as it regulates new drugs.

Release of the draft risk assessment was delayed for years, in part by a coalition of big-name dairy companies concerned that the "yuck factor" surrounding cloned animals might tarnish milk's image and undermine sales. Surveys have consistently found that a majority of consumers are wary of food from clones, with many saying they would avoid it.

Yet study after study reviewed by the FDA failed to find any scientific reason to keep meat or milk from clones off store shelves.

"Extensive evaluation of the available data has not identified any food consumption risks or subtle hazards in healthy clones of cattle, swine, or goats," the FDA risk assessment concludes.

In apparent recognition of consumer distrust of cloned food -- and of widespread public misunderstanding about the science of cloning -- the agency posted on its Web site not only the detailed technical report but also several lay-language documents that aim to debunk negative "myths" about clones, which the agency notes are copies of existing animals and are not engineered to have new traits.

The agency also took the unprecedented step of posting all the raw scientific data it used to come to its conclusion, along with unedited copies of comments it received from independent experts who were asked to review the report in advance.

"We have looked very, very closely," Stephen F. Sundlof, the FDA's chief of veterinary medicine, said in a telephone news conference. "There's just not anything there that is conceivably hazardous to the public health."

Sundlof declined to predict when the agency might come to a final decision. With public comment allowed through April 2, and with the agency's need to thoroughly review those comments, a decision could come by the end of 2007, he said.

Even if a positive decision sails through, consumers will have to wait awhile for their first clone burger. Fewer than 1,000 cloned animals are living on U.S. farms, out of tens of millions of cattle and pigs. And it takes about two years to produce a cloned steer for slaughter and even longer to grow a cloned dairy cow old enough to be milked.

Moreover, with price tags up to $15,000 apiece, clones are currently too valuable to kill or milk directly. So most will initially be used as breeding stock to make high-quality offspring for slaughter or milking, a process that will take an extra couple of years.

"Everything is basically two to three years away, even if it all opens up tomorrow," said Steve Mower, director of marketing at Cyagra, a livestock-cloning company in Elizabethtown, Pa.

To make a clone, scientists take a single skin cell from an animal they want to replicate. They fuse it with a cow egg that has had its DNA removed, resulting in the creation of an embryo that can be transferred to the womb of a surrogate mother animal. The resulting newborn is a twin of the animal that donated the initial cell.

Opponents of food from clones note that the animals harbor subtle molecular differences in their DNA as a result of having been produced from a single parent. They also point to higher rates of problems during fetal development, resulting in birth defects and a high miscarriage rate, which in turn poses risks to the surrogate mother.

Some also question the economic sense of using cloning to make superproductive dairy cows.

Carol Tucker Foreman of the Consumer Federation of America said U.S. farmers produce more milk than Americans can drink, and the government must buy the surplus. "Since 1999, dairy support programs have cost taxpayers over $5 billion," she said in a statement.

Supporters counter that DNA differences in clones do not translate into discernible differences in the chemical composition of their milk or meat, as shown in many studies that have measured thousands of variables, including protein, fatty acid and vitamin levels.

The developmental problems are not different from those seen in animals produced by commonly used assisted reproductive techniques such as in vitro fertilization and artificial insemination, FDA officials said. And although the rates of those problems are higher in clones, they are declining as techniques improve.

Although some may doubt that cloned food is cost-efficient -- and others worry that the presence of cloned products in the U.S. food supply could hurt exports if other countries, none of which has approved food from clones, reject those products -- economics are not under the FDA's purview, officials said.

In conjunction with the risk assessment, the FDA yesterday released a risk-management plan, which outlines how the agency would track newly emerging concerns about food from clones in coming years. It includes a proposal to create a publicly accessible database of all new findings as companies scale up their operations.

Although ViaGen and Cyagra volunteered large amounts of data to the FDA for its risk analysis and have offered to continue cooperating, officials at both companies said this week they will have to consider whether they can promise public release of all their findings.

Several groups are pushing for a requirement that cloned food be labeled as such, allowing consumers to avoid it. Sundlof said such labels would be inconsistent with a long-standing FDA policy to reserve labels for scientifically substantive issues. But he said the agency would be open to "clone-free" labels on foods that come from other sources.

Congress could also get involved. This month, Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) and six other senators wrote to Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt, asking that the FDA run the new risk assessment past an additional scientific review board and study the global trade implications.

In statements released yesterday, Leahy and Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski (D-Md.) -- who has expressed reservations about food from clones -- encouraged Americans to send their opinions to the FDA.

FDA Rules Meat From Cloned Animals Is Safe To Eat (LAT)

By Karen Kaplan

The Los Angeles Times, December 29, 2006

The Food and Drug Administration on Thursday formally endorsed the safety of meat and milk from cloned cattle, pigs and goats, but the agency's 678-page report failed to satisfy critics who say their opposition is rooted in concerns over ethics, not science.

DOJ_NMG_0110251

"Neither the agency nor animal scientists are qualified to tell us whether and when it is ethically acceptable for humans to alter the essential nature of animals," said Carol Tucker Foreman of the Food Policy Institute at the Consumer Federation of America in Washington.

She and others said the time has come for a national discussion about the wisdom of creating tailor-made animals in laboratories, regardless of whether it is scientifically possible to do so.

"Congressional hearings might start a robust societal dialogue on those issues," said Gregory Jaffe, biotechnology director at the Center for Science in the Public Interest.

Polls show Americans are hardly clamoring for bacon cheeseburgers made from cloned animals or their offspring. A survey this month by the Pew Initiative on Food and Biotechnology found that 64% of respondents are uncomfortable with the idea of cloning animals, let alone eating them.

Such concerns were outside the scope of the FDA's scientific review.

The agency's Center for Veterinary Medicine focused on the health of cloned animals and their progeny, tracking them with physical examinations and blood tests and comparing the results to animals bred conventionally. Researchers also subjected meat and milk from clones and their offspring to detailed chemical analysis.

"We looked at essential elements like vitamins, fatty acids -- a whole array of different components -- to try to determine if there was any distinguishable difference between foods from clones and their offspring compared to foods from conventionally raised animals," said Stephen F. Sundlof, director of the Center for Veterinary Medicine. "There was no difference."

The report didn't address the contentious issue of whether products derived from clones would require special labeling.

Cloning allows farmers and ranchers to create an identical twin of prized animal -- perhaps a dairy cow that's an unusually prolific milk producer or a bull whose offspring make for consistently lean and juicy steaks.

A voluntary moratorium has kept most cloned animals and their offspring out of the food supply, though ranchers say at least a few dozen have gone to slaughterhouses. The moratorium will remain in effect until the FDA issues its final ruling, possibly by the end of 2007.

If the report is adopted, the United States would become the first country to approve the use of animal cloning in food production, Sundlof said.

To create a clone, a normal egg is removed from a donor cow and the genes are replaced with DNA from the animal to be copied. An electric shock induces the egg to grow into a genetic copy of the original. It is then implanted into the womb of a surrogate mother.

Cloning is simply an extension of assisted reproduction technologies that ranchers have been using since the 1950s, said Amy lager,Ö co-owner of a mid-sized dairy farm in Fulton, Md.

Since clones cost about $20,000 to produce, they are used primarily for breeding while their offspring head to slaughterhouses or milking barns.

The FDA's risk assessment found that cloned animals are more likely to suffer from birth defects and other health problems that can lead to death in utero or shortly after birth. But those problems have already been seen with other breeding technologies, and current federal inspections would keep any unsuitable animals out of the food supply, Sundlof said.

In fact, he said, there's no reason to treat a clone differently from the rest of a herd.

That conclusion makes consumer advocates fear that products from clones will wind up in grocery stores and restaurants without special labeling that would give shoppers the opportunity to avoid the products.

Sundlof said the FDA only has the authority to require labeling if a food includes a harmful substance or is missing an essential element -- neither of which appears to be the case with cloned animal products.

Still, he said, the agency will hold off on making a decision on labeling until it reviews public comments that are received over the next 90 days.

In the absence of mandatory labeling, some producers may be able to advertise that their products are not derived through cloning, just as milk producers can say that their animals were not treated with supplemental bovine growth hormone, he said.

FDA Backs Safety Of Meat, Milk From Cloned Animals (USAT)

By Elizabeth Weise

USA Today, December 29, 2006

As expected, the Food and Drug Administration announced Thursday that its scientific assessment of meat and milk from cloned animals determined they were safe for human consumption. The announcement, coming after four years of review and research, is just the beginning of what will be a year or more process of public input and discussion before these products can be sold. USA TODAY's Elizabeth Weise explains the issues involved.

Q: How are clones made?

DOJ_NMG_0110252

A: Let's use a cow as an example, as cattle are the most commonly cloned farm animals right now. A single cell is taken from an adult cow. Its genetic material is inserted into another cow's egg that has had its genetic material removed. A jolt of electricity tricks the egg into thinking it has been fertilized and it begins to grow. The resulting embryo is implanted into the uterus of a surrogate cow, which gives birth to the cloned calf.

Q: Will cloned meat and milk be on supermarket shelves soon?

A: No. After public comment is collected during a 90-day period, the agency has to go through it all and incorporate it into its guidelines for the industry. FDA doesn't expect to finish that process until the end of 2007 at the earliest. The voluntary moratorium on the sale of meat and milk from cloned animals will remain in effect until that happens, so nothing should arrive in stores until at least 2008.

Q: So in 2008 all our meat and milk will be from clones?

A: No. Clones are expensive to produce, about $20,000 per animal. For example, there are only about 150 cloned cows in the USA today. They're too pricey and too rare to use as meat or really even as milking cows. Instead, they'll be used like elite breeding stock, "to pass on naturally occurring, desirable traits such as disease resistance and higher-quality meat to production herds," in the FDA's words.

Q: We won't be eating clones?

A: Very few. What we'll likely get is some meat and milk from the offspring of clones. If a cloned cow or bull is at the end of its life span, it might end up as hamburger, but it will be a microscopic amount of the nation's meat supply.

Q: Are clones dangerous to eat?

A: The FDA says all its research shows that you can't tell a cloned animal from a conventionally bred one even down to the chemical level, so they're not more dangerous than a normal cow, pig or goat. One French study found that some cloned cows reached puberty later and had slightly different fat metabolism than normal cattle and suggested a need for further research.

Q: What about the ethical and moral issues?

A: FDA's mandate is to ensure that the U.S. food supply is safe and wholesome. Its research looks only at safety. But numerous animal welfare groups believe that cloning is unethical because it harms animals. Cloned animals have a higher rate of birth defects and abnormalities than conventionally bred animals.

Q: What does FDA say?

A: FDA's position is that none of the problems seen with clones are different from problems that occur in many of the assisted reproductive technologies commonly used today on farms.

Q: What countries allow the sale of meat and milk from cloned animals?

A: None. The USA will be the first, though numerous other countries are watching FDA's process closely.

Q: Will cloned meat and milk be labeled at the store?

A: Probably not. FDA says that it hasn't yet decided whether it will require labeling. In general, the agency requires products to be labeled only if they might be misleading (butter vs. margarine) or for nutritional labeling (canola oil that is genetically engineered to have high oleic acid). Because FDA has said that meat and milk from cloned animals is indistinguishable from conventionally bred animals, there appears to be no basis for the agency to require labeling.

Q: How can I throw in my opinion during the 90-day period of public comment?

A: To submit electronic comments, visit www.accessdata.fda.gov/scripts/oc/dockets/comments/commentdocket.cfm?AGENCY=FDA and search for docket 2006P-0415. Written comments: Division of Dockets Management (HFA-305), Food and Drug Administration, 5630 Fishers Lane, Rm. 1061, Rockville, MD 20852. Comments must be received by April 2 and should include the docket number 2006P-0415.

FDA Clears Cloned Foods (WT)

By Gregory Lopes

The Washington Times, December 29, 2006

The Food and Drug Administration said yesterday that meat and milk from cloned animals is safe, opening the door for pork chops and milk from clones to be sold on grocery shelves late next year.

A risk assessment released yesterday by the FDA shows that there is no public health risk from eating cloned foods. If that report withstands the federal regulatory process, Americans could become the first people in the world to serve bacon and hamburgers from cloned animals.

Federal officials would not say exactly when sales of the cloned-animal products -- from cows, pigs and goats -- could become a reality, but "it is conceivable" that late next year a moratorium banning cloned-animal products could be lifted.

"It is almost inconceivable with what we know that this technology will introduce hazards to public health," said Stephen Sundlof, director of the Center for Veterinary Medicine at FDA. "We have looked for hazards, and they just are not there."

The FDA's research focused solely on cloned animals and did not include studies on how humans reacted to eating foods from genetically engineered animals, Dr. Sundlof said.

Because of unknown health risks associated with cloning, the FDA put a voluntary moratorium on the sale of meat and milk from cloned animals in 2001.

Cloning lets farmers and ranchers make copies of exceptional animals, such as pigs that fatten rapidly or cows that are superior milk producers. Cloning currently is not practiced specifically to produce food; rather, farmers generally use cloned cows or pigs to breed.

"It remains to be seen whether dairy farmers will choose to use [cloning technology]. There is currently no consumer benefits in milk from cloned cows," the International Dairy Foods Association said yesterday.

The FDA does not keep a registry of how many cloned animals there are in the country, but industry officials estimate there could be as many as 600 cloned cows in the United States and 200 pigs. The cost of cloning an animal is steep, about $20,000 each to produce.

The likelihood of cloned meat and dairy products entering the food supply will remain slight in the short term even if the moratorium is lifted. Because of the high cost of the technology, cloned animals are primarily used for breeding, not for food, Dr. Sundlof said. Therefore, consumers would mostly get food from their offspring and not the clones themselves.

Cloned animals are derived from the healthiest animals in the herd and therefore are more disease-resistant and offer leaner meat than conventionally produced animals, Dr. Sundlof said.

But that assertion is disputed by the Consumers Union, a nonprofit consumer-safety organization that says the cloning process produces a sick animal that often dies soon after being reproduced. Furthermore, the organization contends that cloning weakens animals' disease resistance because the cloned animals need more antibiotics to survive.

"There is a significant concern that we will be getting animals that are more prone to disease," said Jean Halloran, a food-policy specialist with Consumers Union.

If the FDA does approve the cloned-animal food products, the agency does not think the products will have to be labeled as coming from cloned animals or their offspring.

Rep. Rosa DeLauro, Connecticut Democrat, who will head the House Appropriations agriculture subcommittee, said lawmakers should consider whether disclosure and labeling are appropriate for food from cloned animals.

Consumer groups, including Consumers Union, are adamantly in favor of a labeling requirement.

"Consumers are going to be having a product that has potential safety issues and has a whole load of ethical issues tied to it, without any labeling," said Joseph Mendelson, legal director of the Center for Food Safety, a Washington environmental advocacy organization.

The FDA has not made a final decision on the labeling requirement but did say that retailers and manufacturers may be able to label food products "clone free," if the label is "truthful and does not imply it is safer than other products," Dr. Sundlof said.

The FDA decision is based on substantial data from a number of studies, all of which have concluded that milk and meat from cloned animals is virtually identical to products from conventional animals.

"None of the studies ... identify any remarkable nutritionally or toxicologically important differences in the composition of the meat or milk," according to a draft of the risk assessment to be published Monday in Theriogenology, a scientific journal on animal reproduction. The paper was written by scientists at the FDA's Center for Veterinary Medicine.

Dr. Sundlof said the FDA currently does not have enough information to decide whether food from sheep clones is safe.

Squeamish Consumers May Balk As FDA Backs Cloned Meat, Milk (WSJ)

By Jane Zhang, Scott Kilman And Lauren Etter

The Wall Street Journal, December 29, 2006

By declaring milk and meat from cloned farm animals safe to eat, federal regulators have opened the door to far-reaching changes in livestock production. But industry concerns about consumer squeamishness toward cloning suggest cloned beef and pork won't be on sale at supermarket meat counters anytime soon.

In a long-awaited decision announced yesterday, the Food and Drug Administration said it couldn't find any differences between meat and milk from healthy conventionally bred adult cattle, pigs and goats and that from healthy cloned animals and their offspring. As a result, the agency said it would probably allow the meat and milk of these cloned animals and their offspring to be sold without any special labeling to alert consumers.

Cloning, or producing an identical copy of an animal using the genetic material of the original, would give farmers a way to upgrade their livestock herds by replicating their prized animals. It would allow them to preserve valuable traits, such as high meat or milk production, superior fertility or disease resistance.

That could be a boon to the livestock industry, which so far has largely missed out on the biotechnology revolution that swept through plant agriculture a decade ago. Meatpackers, for example, might prefer to buy the offspring of a cloned pig with loins the perfect size for making pork chops or cattle with just the right amount of fat in the steak. Improved, consistent quality, in turn, could boost consumer demand.

Recent opinion polls show that most Americans know little about cloning but are wary of foods from cloned animals, with many citing ethical, religious and social concerns. Mindful of such reservations, large meat and dairy producers and their trade associations are taking a wait-and-see attitude. And a spokesman for Wal-Mart Stores Inc. said yesterday that the nation's largest food retailer has no plans to sell products made from cloned livestock.

"It's an issue of interest to us and the rest of the meatpacking industry, and something that we'll be following closely in the months ahead," said Archie Schaffer, spokesman for meat and poultry processor Tyson Foods Inc. Smithfield Foods Inc., the nation's largest pork producer, wouldn't comment yesterday, but in 2003, the company said it had "severe skepticism about the consumer reaction" to cloned animals.

The FDA, which has been studying the safety of food derived from cloned animals for four years, concluded that meat and dairy from cloned animals "are as safe as food we eat every day." The agency also indicated that if such foods go into production, it would be unlikely to recommend special labeling, the same policy it has adopted with genetically modified crops already on the market.

U.S. meat exports, already buffeted by concerns in some countries about mad-cow disease, could hang in the balance. The FDA has consulted major U.S. trading partners and agencies such as the U.S. Trade Representative on the cloning issue. But it isn't clear if that would help the U.S. livestock industry, should it embrace cloning, to win over foreign consumers.

Even though cloned animals exist in countries such as Japan, New Zealand and Australia, none have gone so far as the U.S. now has in nudging them toward the market. A French assessment of cloning reached the same conclusions as the FDA's, but that hasn't translated into public policy. European consumers, more than their American counterparts, are skeptical about genetically modified foods and biotechnology in general.

Canice Nolan, head of food safety, health and consumer affairs at the European Commission Delegation in Washington, said it was premature to talk about the impact of the FDA's decision on trade. However, he noted that cloning raises legal, ethical and social concerns.

According to a recent report to the European Union's executive arm by the Danish Centre for Bioethics and Risk Assessment, "Groups of citizens, and even some member states, would be likely to resist the import and/or marketing [labeled or unlabeled] of cloned animals and their products."

In South Korea, one of the largest export markets for U.S. beef, cloned foods "are not positive," said Sockjoong Yoon, minister for public affairs at the South Korean Embassy in Washington. Chong Ghee Ahn, the embassy's economic counselor, said it was too early to say what impact cloning might have on U.S. exports. However, he added that in the wake of mad-cow disease and avian flu, "Korean customers are getting very, very sensitive."

The FDA's safety assessment, which the agency calls "strictly a scientific evaluation," requires a 90-day period for public comment. Biotechnology experts said it would take at least three or four years after that for products made from cloned animals and their offspring to land on grocery shelves.

"There's no doubt that in the long run, probably in the immediate run, that this will be a substantial boon to producers of milk and meat, not only in the United States but around the world," said Val Giddings, a biotechnology consultant and a former senior staff geneticist at the U.S. Agriculture Department. "It frees the producers of milk and meat to use more fully and effectively the very best breeding stock available. They can use their healthiest animals, use animals with high resistance to disease."

Consumer and animal-rights groups said yesterday that consumers have little to gain from the FDA ruling, and that safety considerations alone don't make good public policy. "Cloning will not produce safer or cheaper milk and meat," said Carol Tucker-Foreman, director of food policy at Consumer Federation of America. "Having cloned cows produce more milk won't reduce milk prices."

The FDA said ethical issues were beyond the agency's jurisdiction, but it took pains to address consumer concerns. "Cloning poses no unique risks to animal health when compared to other assisted reproductive technologies," such as in vitro fertilization, said Stephen F. Sundlof, director of the FDA's Center for Veterinary Medicine.

The agency added that cloning was just another assisted reproductive technology -- much like in vitro fertilization. While clones are more likely to have health problems at birth than traditionally bred animals, "They seem to become just as healthy and strong as other animals of the same age," it said.

Cloning of animals often has a low success rate, and unsuccessful procedures can cause abnormalities, premature deaths and other problems. Milk and meat from clones with the most severe cloning errors would be unlikely to enter the food supply, because they would "either die, fail to reproduce, or fail government examination and meat inspection," the FDA said. Moreover, because cloned animals are expected to be used mainly for breeding purposes, most of the products sold wouldn't be from cloned animals themselves, but from their offspring.

Modern livestock breeding already is highly regimented. Much of the beef and pork on the market today is the product of such techniques as artificial insemination, embryo transfer, embryo splitting and in vitro fertilization. That gives breeders control over the selection of parents.

Animal cloning remains relatively expensive, however. ViaGen Inc., a livestock cloning company based in Austin, Texas, charges $15,000 for the first copy of a cow, $12,500 for the second copy of the same animal, and $6,000 for the sixth and beyond. In the past two years, the five-year-old company has cloned 250 animals, including about 150 beef cattle, mainly for exhibition, and 100 pigs, mainly for research purposes, said Mark Walton, its president.

With a surge in demand, Mr. Walton said cloning prices would go down, eventually to as little as $5,000 to $6,000 per animal. Farmers could use more-conventional breeding methods to produce offspring from those cloned animals, and replace their breeding stock every few years. That could make cloning financially appealing for meat and milk producers, Mr. Walton said.

The FDA began looking at the safety of foods from cloned animals a few years after the successful cloning of Dolly the sheep in Scotland in 1997. The cloning prompted inquiries from companies planning to use the technique. In 2002, the FDA asked the National Academy of Sciences to look at the issue. A panel at the academy said foods from cloned animals and their offspring didn't present a food-safety concern, but recommended that the agency evaluate the composition of those foods.

The FDA assembled a committee that year to look at hundreds of studies on the issue, and cloning companies such as ViaGen and Cyagra Inc., of Elizabethtown, Pa., promised to send samples for research.

The bulk of samples didn't arrive until 2005 and were then sent to an independent lab at Cornell University and an Agriculture Department lab for controlled studies, extending the review process to this year. Because of public concern about cloning, the FDA waited until after it had briefed other agencies, including the USTR and the Agriculture Department, and U.S. trade partners on the issue before disclosing its findings.

US Says Food From Cloned Animals Safe (FT)

By Clive Cookson

Financial Times, December 29, 2006

The US Food and Drug Administration on Thursday took a big step towards approving the sale of meat and milk from cloned animals and their offspring without special labelling.

A draft FDA risk assessment found that food from clones of cattle, pigs and goats was as safe to eat as food from conventionally bred animals.

However, cloned meat and milk is unlikely to reach the shops before late 2007, at the earliest. Agricultural biotechnology and livestock companies will continue to observe a moratorium on their commercial introduction until the FDA has assessed public comments on the draft assessment and issued a final ruling.

The agency will receive hostile comments from some influential groups, such as the Center for Food Safety and the Consumer Federation of America, which accused the FDA of “imposing these products on a public that opposes cloning technology and does not want to consume cloned foods”.

But the Biotechnology Industry Organisation welcomed the long-awaited FDA assessment. Jim Greenwood, BIO president, said: “Animal cloning is the latest step in a long history of reproductive tools for farmers and ranchers, and can effectively help livestock producers deliver what consumers want: high-quality, safe, abundant and nutritious foods in a conscientious and consistent manner.”

Stephen Sundlof, director of the FDA’s Center for Veterinary Medicine, said: “Based on FDA analysis of hundreds of peer-reviewed publications and other studies on the health and food composition of clones and their offspring, the draft risk assessment has determined that meat and milk from clones and their offspring are as safe as food we eat every day. Cloning poses no unique risks to animal health when compared to other assisted reproductive technologies currently in use in US agriculture.”

If given final approval, the ruling would allow the sale of food from cloned cattle, pigs and goats, but not sheep, for the first time in the United States.

“No unique risks for human food consumption were identified in cattle, swine or goat clones,” the FDA said in a draft risk assessment, which now enters a public comment period before the agency makes its final decision.

FDA Plan Would OK Cloned Meat (CSM)

DOJ_NMG_0110256

By Peter N. Spotts

The Christian Science Monitor, December 29, 2006

Meat counters and dairy cases are likely to become the latest battlegrounds for the use of biotechnology down on the farm.

Thursday, the US government released a draft report concluding that food from cloned cattle, pigs, and other livestock is as safe to eat as food products from conventionally bred animals. The safety assessment paves the way for ranchers to use clones for their breeding stock, using cloning techniques similar to those that created Dolly the sheep in 1996.

The decision is not likely to create a flood of cloned livestock in the short term, several analysts say. The assessment, from the US Food and Drug Administration's Center for Veterinary Medicine, must still endure 60 days of public comment. And the FDA still must weigh issues, such as whether to label meat products from the offspring of cloned animals or track the clones themselves if they move into the food system after their usefulness as breeding stock ends. It may take a year or two after the comment period ends for breeders to start using clones.

Still, the assessment represents a significant step toward approving a technology that several specialists say will lead to more consistent, and higher quality meat and dairy products. And it is galvanizing opposition from consumer and food-safety groups. They hold that the health-risk studies fall short of what's needed to ensure that such products are safe.

"The FDA has taken a very long time to analyze this in a way that is still incomplete," says Jaydee Hanson, a policy analyst with the Center for Food Safety, a biotech watchdog group in Washington. The group has filed a petition with the FDA asking it to conduct safety studies for food products from cloned livestock as rigorously as it does studies for animal-derived drugs that humans use.

The current concern over cloned livestock arises from the technique used to produce them. For years, breeders increased the number of their prized animals by dividing early embryos, then implanting them into a mother to produce artificial twins.

But the results are still hit-and-miss, says Michael Pariza, director of the Food Research Institute at the University of Wisconsin at Madison. And while breeders also currently use artificial insemination and fertilize eggs in a test tube, the bull providing sperm for the procedure has a finite lifespan. But with cloning, breeders can store the bull's DNA for use long after he has been put out to pasture.

When researchers in Scotland cloned the sheep Dolly in 1996, Dr. Pariza continues, they implanted genetic material from an adult into an egg nucleus, then inserted the altered egg into a surrogate mother. Breeders recognized that this approach would eliminate the uncertainty. "You now have a new cow with a known pedigree," he says. And by storing samples of an animal's DNA, the line can be cloned repeatedly.

But the approach has its drawbacks. The technique used to derive the clones is inefficient and often leads to stillborn or deformed offspring. This prompts opponents to call the process unethical. Others wonder if Dolly-like cloning introduces subtle, potentially harmful changes that current testing techniques can't find.

Proponents hold that cloning is no more dangerous to the parent or offspring than the "test-tube calf" approaches breeders currently use. And so far, a range of studies - from chemical assays of cloned meat and milk to tests where lab rats consume meat and milk from clones - indicate that food from cloned animals is as safe as food from noncloned animals. Several of these studies appear in the Jan. 1, 2007, issue of the journal Theriogenology, which focuses on animal reproduction.

"These are edible animals to begin with - they are not going to suddenly start producing toxins," Pariza says.

Whether such results satisfy the public is an open question. Some dairy groups and meat producers have reportedly expressed private concerns that they will loose business if cloned meats and milk work their way into burgers and shakes.

Proponents point to polls showing that a majority of consumers are willing to buy or consider buying food from cloned animals.

Opponents turn to other polls that suggest a general public revulsion at the idea.

Some specialists say the FDA needs to improve its ability to detect and assess the impact of any unintended changes that could render food from cloned animals unfit to eat.

The National Academy of Sciences has recommended that the FDA set up a public database of compounds in foods derived from animal clones. It adds that the government should set up a way to identify and track products from cloned animals as they move from the field to the market.

Global Warming's Poster Cubs (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 29, 2006

CONSIDER THE humble polar bear: Ursus maritimus to the scientists who admire it for its intelligence. Now consider President Bush, who might be classified as Executum obstreperum by the thousands of scientists who say his administration fails to appreciate the gravity of global warming. Is it possible that the polar bear can do what the scientists cannot?

DOJ_NMG_0110257

What the polar bear could do, essentially, is force the administration to take steps to curb global warming. With its proposal, announced Wednesday, to list polar bears as a threatened species, the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service for the first time acknowledged that global warming is the driving force behind an animal's potential extinction. If the polar bear is listed as endangered, then the U.S. government would be bound by law to protect it — and protecting it may require regulations to reduce greenhouse gas emissions.

In the polar bear, the administration may have met its match. This isn't just any animal — it is a creature at once majestic and cuddly, the star attraction at countless zoos and featured in so many TV commercials it practically qualifies for a SAG card. If that's not enough, the same type of habitat loss threatening the bears' survival also endangers the penguin, which had a better year at the box office than all but a few humans.

Less popular is the administration's stance on global warming. Bush has acknowledged the phenomenon, but he's reluctant to require industry to cut greenhouse gas emissions. If the polar bear is listed as an endangered species, would the government have to crack down on the carbon emissions that are threatening its existence?

Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne passed the buck on that question, saying such regulations fall to other departments. That's arguable; Fish and Wildlife is the lead agency charged with protecting species from the effects of pollution. If nothing else, a listing for the polar bear would expose Fish and Wildlife to lawsuits from environmentalists similar to the one against the Environmental Protection Agency that is now before the Supreme Court; a dozen states, including California, say the agency is ignoring its duty to protect public health by not regulating greenhouse gases.

The bear complicates administration policy on another issue as well: drilling for oil in Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. Polar bears spend most of their lives on sea ice, which is rapidly melting as the oceans get warmer, but pregnant females retreat to dens on land (including in the refuge) to give birth. If the bears are listed as threatened, it would certainly complicate oil companies' efforts to operate in the refuge.

It will be a year before a decision is made on listing the polar bear. If the administration wants to avoid more than a few legal and political headaches, it should use the time to revisit its antiscientific approach to the world's most pressing environmental problem.

Officers Plead Guilty To Trying To Sell Seized Drugs (AP)

By Sue Lindsey

AP, December 29, 2006

ROANOKE, Va. - Two former officers with a rural sheriff's department pleaded guilty Thursday to charges that they took part in a scheme with their boss and 10 colleagues to sell drugs seized from criminals.

The pair were among 20 people indicted in October in the investigation of corruption and racketeering conspiracy.

Former deputy David Allan King pleaded guilty to charges of racketeering conspiracy and drug conspiracy. James Alden Vaught, a former sergeant, pleaded guilty to racketeering conspiracy.

King faces up to 40 years in prison and Vaught 20 years, but the sentences could be lowered if they testify in other cases.

Henry County Sheriff H. Franklin Cassell stepped down after he was accused of looking the other way as officers sold drugs seized in criminal investigations and stole guns and other evidence for personal use and resale. He has pleaded not guilty to impeding investigation and money laundering.

Vaught, 33, pleaded guilty because he has "a contrite heart," said his attorney, Bruce Welch.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Tom Bondurant said Vaught, who agreed to cooperate with investigators, was paid by the ring for use of a house he owned for drug distribution.

King, 49, was once in charge of the vice unit and had been a school resource officer with the department. Bondurant said King falsified destruction orders for drugs seized by the department and he and other officers then resold them.

Scandal's Key Figure Enters Guilty Plea (ROT)

James Alden Vaught, who turned informant in the Henry County case, faces 20 years in prison.

If the Henry County Sheriff's Office corruption scandal were a target, former Sgt. James Alden Vaught would be the bull's-eye.

DOJ_NMG_0110258

Authorities say Vaught, 33, went from organizing drug deals and providing a house for drug drops and philandering to informing for the government on many of the 19 other defendants who would eventually be charged.

On Thursday, the man prosecutors said was "right in the middle of it" pleaded guilty to one felony charge in federal court.

Vaught will likely be called to testify against several of his co-defendants if they go to trial. Others charged in the 48-count indictment include 11 current and former deputies, former Sheriff Frank Cassell and seven civilians.

In exchange for pleading guilty to a racketeering conspiracy count, one charge of drug conspiracy against Vaught was dropped. He is facing up to 20 years in prison on the racketeering charge, but he may get a break for cooperating with the government.

A Drug Enforcement Administration investigation out of Philadelphia led authorities to Vaught in early 2005, court records show. When the DEA delivered a package containing the sedative Ketamine to a house in Martinsville, William Randall Reed accepted delivery and was arrested.

Reed, who did not work for the sheriff's office, told police he rented the house from Vaught and paid the sergeant in drugs and money to use the house as a drug drop, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Tom Bondurant.

Reed also said he had helped Vaught sell 2 kilograms of cocaine that Vaught had taken from a drug dealer, according to the indictment.

Vaught resigned from the sheriff's office in March 2005 and began working with federal authorities soon after. Bondurant says Vaught wore a wire and covertly recorded some 90 conversations with 25 different people, including Cassell, who retired after he was charged.

Vaught was even wearing a wire when Cassell one day expressed respect for him.

"Quite frankly, and I've told you this, I always thought a lot of you and I, and I still do," Cassell said on the recording.

Vaught told federal agents that his rental house had been used by some of his co-workers as a place to have extramarital affairs. He also said he and other deputies engaged in several cocaine, crack, marijuana and steroid transactions.

Prosecutors have said that one canine officer in the department took drugs intended for dog training purposes and gave them to Vaught to be sold.

Vaught obtained $15,000 to $17,000 from the sale of the 2 kilograms of cocaine, and it is safe to estimate that tens of thousands of dollars' worth of drug deals occurred, Bondurant said.

Investigators say that former vice officer and school resource officer David Allan King falsified destruction orders for drugs taken into evidence, then sold them with the help of Vaught and several civilians who have also been charged, including Reed.

King pleaded guilty Thursday to racketeering and drug conspiracy. Two counts of obstructing justice and one count of making false statements were dropped. He could serve up to 40 years in prison.

The indictment accuses other deputies of dealing and using steroids, taking guns and money from evidence and lying to agents.

Cassell is charged with knowing about many of the illegal activities but ignoring them or covering them up.

Vaught and King were released on bond pending sentencing, which likely will not take place until the case is finished.

Two other defendants in the case had already entered pleas: Reed and former Deputy Bradley Scott Martin, who was accused of distributing drugs.

Vaught's attorney, Bruce Welch, said Thursday that his client was relieved to enter his plea because he knew that both he and others in the department had done wrong.

Still, it was difficult for Vaught, from a personal standpoint, to be in the position of informant, Welch added.

"These were his mentors and his friends and his employer."

Two Guilty In Henry Drug Ring (RTD)

Richmond (VA) Times-Dispatch, December 29, 2006

Henry sheriff's sergeant faces new charges

ROANOKE -- Two former officers with the Henry County sheriff's department pleaded guilty yesterday to participating in a drug-selling ring that prosecutors say involved the sheriff and numerous deputies.

Deputy David Allan King, formerly head of the department's vice unit, and former sergeant James Alden Vaught, whose confession to investigators allegedly implicated the sheriff and 12 officers, entered guilty pleas in U.S. District Court.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Tom Bondurant said the coming weeks may see more guilty pleas as the corruption scandal that has shocked rural Henry, once the center of the state's textile industry, makes its way through federal court.

King and Vaught were among 20 people indicted in October after prosecutors alleged that members of the sheriff's department were reselling drugs they had seized from dealers, trafficking in steroids and prescription pills, pilfering firearms from the evidence room and covering up their illicit activities by lying to federal investigators. The indictment named 12 current or former sheriff's officers, plus the sheriff himself, H. Franklin Cassell, who has since resigned.

Yesterday, Bruce Welch, Vaught's attorney, said Vaught agreed to plead guilty to one count of racketeering conspiracy because he has "a contrite heart."

"He knows what he did, and he's sorry for having done it," Welch said.

An investigation into the department began last year when federal agents intercepted a 2-kilogram package of ketamine -- an anesthetic used recreationally and sometimes as a date-rape drug -- at a Martinsville house owned by Vaught. The dealer who used the house to receive drugs, William Randall Reed, pleaded guilty last month to racketeering conspiracy and acknowledged paying Vaught in drugs and money to use the house as a drop-off point.

Vaught agreed to cooperate with federal investigators and secretly recorded more than 90 conversations with 25 people, said Bondurant, who added that Vaught is now receiving federal protection. "He's the one who talked first. There's no doubt that he was right in the middle of it and very actively involved."

Bondurant said members of the department sold tens of thousands of dollars worth of illegal drugs, either stolen from the evidence room or ordered online.

As part of a plea agreement, Bondurant dropped one charge against Vaught, who faces up to 20 years in prison and a fine of $250,000 when he is sentenced. King pleaded guilty to racketeering conspiracy and conspiracy to distribute steroids and ketamine. He faces up to 40 years in prison and a fine of $1.25 million when he is sentenced.

Cassell has pleaded not guilty to all five charges against him: two counts of obstructing justice, money laundering, making a false statement, and misprison, or unprofessional conduct.

Ex-officer Faces More Charges (MARTBULL)

By Amanda Buck

Martinsville (VA) Bulletin, December 29, 2006

One count dropped; six others added

A federal grand jury has issued a new, six-count indictment against former Henry County sheriff's sergeant Robert Keith Adams in connection with alleged corruption in the sheriff's office, court records state.

As a result, Senior U.S. District Judge James C. Turk dismissed Adams' original charge of making a false statement, records show.

In an order signed Dec. 21, Turk dismissed the charge of false statement at the request of U.S. Attorney John L. Brownlee, according to court records. That was the only charge Adams had faced.

In his motion, Brownlee said the charge should be dismissed because it was incorporated in a new indictment returned Dec. 19, court records state.

That indictment, filed in U.S. District Court in Abingdon, alleges that Adams, who worked as a school resource officer and as sergeant in charge of investigations in the criminal division of the sheriff's office, helped cover up the crimes of former sergeant James Alden Vaught and lied to FBI agents who were investigating alleged drug and racketeering crimes at the sheriff's office, court records state.

Thirteen then-current and former sheriff's office employees, including former sheriff H. Frank Cassell, were charged in a 48-count indictment unsealed Nov. 2.

The new indictment returned Dec. 19 alleges that in 2001, Vaught stole about two kilograms of cocaine from a drug dealer and distributed the drugs through William Randall Reed, Wilbert Herman Brown and Rayfield Moore.

"Adams learned of the drug crime and believed that James Alden Vaught had stolen two kilograms of cocaine and $40,000 in drug money," the indictment states. Instead of turning Vaught in, it alleges that Adams "requested that James Alden Vaught pay him $20,000 of the drug money."

Vaught refused to pay Adams, the indictment states.

Later, in January of this year, Vaught asked Adams to help him locate Brown so Vaught could sell Brown about 1/2 kilogram of cocaine, the indictment alleges.

Adams allegedly encouraged Brown not to talk to Vaught because Adams believed Vaught was "wearing a body recorder and working as an informant in a federal investigation," the indictment alleges.

It further alleges that on March 24, Adams "falsely stated to a federal agent that he had not received payoffs and that he did not know why (Vaught) was looking for (Brown)" on or about Jan. 23.

The indictment alleges that between 2001 and 2006, Adams assisted Vaught "in order to hinder and prevent the offender's apprehension, trial and punishment."

It also charges him with concealing a felony, attempting to obstruct an official proceeding by encouraging a potential witness to withhold and/or present false evidence to federal investigators, making false statements and attempting to mislead federal investigators, and alleges that he lied about payoffs he received from Moore, whom the indictment describes as "a large-scale cocaine dealer in Henry County," court records state.

Moore died Nov. 3 in a car accident in Franklin County. He was helping federal authorities in their investigation of the sheriff's office, his attorney, Robert Rider of Roanoke, said in earlier reports.

Reed pleaded guilty in November to racketeering conspiracy on condition that the government dismiss other charges against him, which included false statement, drug conspiracy and attempted drug distribution.

According to court records, Adams is scheduled for a pretrial motions hearing Friday in Roanoke.

Doctor Forfeits Drug License (KNOXNS)

By Jamie Satterfield

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), December 29, 2006

Man accused of peddling Oxycontin free until trial but must live with mother

A Knoxville doctor accused of peddling powerful pain-killing pills surrendered his license to dispense legal dope Thursday.

Sanford K. Myers appeared before U.S. District Magistrate Judge Bruce Guyton Thursday and voluntarily surrendered his U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration certificate that authorized the Knoxville physician to issue prescriptions for narcotic drugs.

That move, coupled with an agreement by defense attorney James A.H. Bell that Myers live with his mother, led Guyton to allow Myers to be freed on bond pending a February trial on charges he led a conspiracy to push Oxycontin, a powerful opiate-based prescription painkiller.

"We've worked out all our differences," Bell told Guyton.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Cynthia Davidson told the judge that authorities had "concerns about the residence" Myers listed as his own and would only agree to his release if he committed to living with his mother.

Myers has been jailed since last week, when he was arrested on a federal indictment drafted by Davidson and issued by a grand jury.

In the nine-count indictment, Myers, who operated a clinic on Kingston Pike in West Knoxville, is accused of conspiring with Jay Christopher Ridenour, Charles Ridenour and William Larry Cummings to peddle Oxycontin from February 2005 to December 2005.

It's not clear why it has taken a year to file charges in the case, headed up by DEA Agent Dexter McGee. It's also not yet known if the two Ridenours are related.

The indictment makes clear that Myers is accused of supplying the pills to the Ridenours and Cummings, all three of whom appear from court records to be cooperating with authorities in the probe.

When asked Thursday whether he would agree if freed to stay away from his alleged co-conspirators, Myers answered with an emphatic, "Yes." Bell added, "Especially given what they're apparently saying about him."

Myers has been licensed to practice medicine in Tennessee since 1985. However, he allowed his medical license to expire in late September.

He told Guyton that he was currently unemployed but drawing $5,700 in disability payments from a private insurer. He also admitted owing the Internal Revenue Service $27,000 in back taxes.

"I was in the process of making (payments)," Myers said of his tax bill.

Myers wanted taxpayers to pick up his defense tab. Guyton tentatively agreed but added that he likely will require Myers to pay at least a portion of Bell's bill.

"It does appear you might fall in the category of people who must make some (payment toward) your defense," Guyton said.

Bell entered a plea of innocent on behalf of Myers. The Ridenours and Cummings are all free on bond.

Year-long Suspension Recommended For Tucson Attorney (ADS)

Arizona Daily Star, December 28, 2006

A Tucson attorney who was indicted on federal drug charges along with a doctor later convicted of conspiracy in a murder case should be suspended for a year, a hearing officer has recommended.

The State Bar of Arizona filed a complaint against Lourdes Lopez in November 2005 saying she had engaged in criminal conduct that "reflects adversely on the lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer in other respects."

The State Bar said that Lopez not only was indicted in September 2002 on prescription-drug-fraud charges along with Bradley Schwartz, but that she continued a relationship with Schwartz despite being ordered not to and lied about it.

Schwartz is serving a life sentence for conspiracy to commit murder in the October 2004 slaying of his former medical office associate, Dr. David Brian Stidham.

Last month, State Bar attorneys called for Lopez to be disbarred during a two-day hearing before hearing officer Bruce Macdonald. Lopez violated numerous standards set by the State Bar and the American Bar Association, said Maret Vessella, deputy chief bar counsel.

Lopez's attorney, Mark Harrison, acknowledged Lopez behaved inappropriately, but asked for a six-month suspension.

Vessella said that not only did Lopez commit prescription drug fraud and insurance fraud, lie to the DEA and violate a federal judge's order to stay away from Schwartz, but the former Pima County prosecutor also discussed the plot to kill Stidham with Schwartz prior to Stidham's death.

Macdonald, in a 36-page report released Thursday, however, said "any such conversations" between Schwartz and Lopez in the Stidham matter weren't relevant to the matter at hand.

He also found that that a one-year suspension is more appropriate than disbarment or a six-month suspension.

"There is no question about the impropriety of (Lopez's) behavior. However, it is important to this hearing officer that the respondent's conduct, which gives rise to the allegations by the state bar uniformly occurred within the context of a personal, emotional, and ill-fated relationship with Bradley Schwartz, and not when she was engaged in the practice of law," Macdonald wrote.

Macdonald also noted that disciplining attorneys is about protecting the public and deterring future misconduct, not punishment. "The recommended sanction is not disproportionate to sanctioning in cases involving similar conduct under the cited circumstances," Macdonald wrote.

Bob Van Wyck, chief bar counsel, said his office intends to appeal Macdonald's recommendation, but declined to comment further. Harrison called Macdonald's report and recommendation "extremely fair."

Players Association Will Fight Court Ruling (AP)

AP, December 29, 2006

Major League Baseball's players association will fight a federal appeals court's decision to give prosecutors access to the names and urine samples of about 100 players who tested positive for steroids in 2003.

If Wednesday's decision "is allowed to stand it will effectively repeal the Fourth Amendment for confidential electronic records," wrote Donald Fehr, executive director of the Major-League Baseball Players Association, in a statement yesterday.

The court's 2-1 ruling could help authorities pinpoint the source of steroids in professional baseball. It also could bolster the perjury case against Giants slugger Barry Bonds, who is under investigation for telling a grand jury he never knowingly used performance-enhancing drugs.

Michael Rains, Bonds' attorney, disagreed. "It doesn't help their case against him," he said.

Fehr said he was consulting with union attorneys to "determine what our next step should be in our fight to protect the constitutional rights, including the basic right to privacy, of our members."

Options include asking the San Francisco-based 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to rehear the case with the same three judges, petitioning the court to hear the case with 15 judges or appealing to the U.S. Supreme Court. Any appeal, even if unsuccessful, could delay the government from getting the records for months or more.

The samples were collected at the league's direction as part of a survey to gauge the prevalence of steroid use. Players and owners agreed in their labor contract that the results would be confidential.

The players' union sued to keep the government from accessing the records, saying the seizures violated the players' constitutional rights.

Union Will Fight Ruling On Steroids (WP)

By Amy Shipley, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

Claiming the union wanted to protect the privacy rights of more than 100 baseball players who flunked drug tests in 2003, MLB Players Association Executive Director Donald Fehr said in a statement yesterday he would consult with legal counsel to determine how to keep those records out of the hands of federal investigators.

A federal appeals court ruled Wednesday that investigators could keep the 100-plus confidential records they found commingled in computer files with the drug test results of eight of 11 players who were the intended target of a search warrant.

Wednesday's ruling, which included a lengthy dissent from one of the three judges on the panel, partially overturned decisions from three lower courts.

The ruling means more professional baseball players could be ensnared in the drug probe known as BALCO that has already resulted in more than a dozen athlete suspensions and five criminal convictions. San Francisco Giants slugger Barry Bonds is the subject of a perjury investigation in connection with BALCO.

"Under a search warrant seeking information about only 11 baseball players, confidential records for every player were seized, along with confidential records of thousands of other people with no connection to baseball, including many with no connection to sports," Fehr said in the statement. "We will consult with our counsel, and then determine what our next step should be in our fight to protect the Constitutional rights -- including the basic right to privacy -- of our members."

Steroid Probe Ruling Threatens Non-Athletes, MLB Official Says (BLOOM)

By Joel Rosenblatt

Bloomberg, December 29, 2006

Dec. 28 (Bloomberg) -- Confidential records of baseball players and non-athletes will be available to government investigators if a federal appeals court ruling isn't challenged, the Major Baseball League Players Association said today.

Donald M. Fehr, the association's executive director, said in a statement that prosecutors investigating steroid use seized records for every player as well as ``confidential records of thousands of other people with no connection to baseball, including many with no connection to sports."

The ruling, issued yesterday by the U.S. Court of Appeals in San Francisco, held that lower courts were wrong to require government investigators to return files taken from Major League Baseball's drug-testing laboratories in California and Nevada as part of their probe of the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, a Burlingame, California, company known as Balco.

Grand juries in the government's investigation have indicted Balco's co-founders, two track coaches and a trainer for baseball All-Star Barry Bonds. Jurors have heard testimony regarding steroid use from Bonds and other athletes, including baseball's Jason Giambi, without returning charges against them.

Fehr reiterated arguments the union made in court that the seizure violated the players' constitutional rights against unreasonable searches and seizures.

Using a search warrant seeking information about 11 players, investigators collected private information about ``thousands of people" who aren't being investigated for criminal behavior, Fehr said in the statement. He didn't say if the association would appeal the ruling.

Greg Bouris, a lawyer for the players association, declined to comment.

Luke Macaulay, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in San Francisco, didn't immediately return a call seeking comment.

The ruling applies to three cases: U.S. v. Comprehensive Drug Testing, No. 05-10067; Major League Baseball Players Association v. U.S., No. 05-15006; and In Re: Search Warrants, 05-55354; all at the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, San Francisco.

Of Special Interest (IVDB)

By Sara A. Carter

Inland Valley Daily Bulletin, December 29, 2006

COLUMBUS, N.M. - On Sept. 5, a man calling himself Miguel Alfonso Salinas was apprehended off a deserted highway near the U.S.-Mexico border.

The tinted windows on Alfonso Salinas' vehicle aroused the suspicion of Border Patrol agents patrolling a dark and desolate stretch of Highway 9, which runs parallel to the border and is the site of large numbers of illegal crossings.

The agents discovered three Mexican migrants in the vehicle with Alfonso Salinas.

But what they discovered several days later made a far greater impression.

Alfonso Salinas was not who he seemed, according to U.S. Department of Justice and Department of Homeland Security documents. He lied to the agents about who he was, where he came from and what he was doing.

It would take nearly a week of interviews with federal agents before Alfonso Salinas would give his real name: Ayman Sulmane Kamal, a Muslim born in Egypt - a country designated as "special-interest" by the United States for sponsoring terrorism.

Kamal's case is not an isolated one.

DOJ_NMG_0110263

Evidence of "special-interest aliens" using the Mexican border to gain entry to the United States has been kept secret from the American public, according to federal law enforcement agents, terrorism experts and critics of U.S. foreign policy with Mexico.

In 2005, the Border Patrol apprehended approximately 1.2 million people in the U.S. illegally. Of those, 165,000 were from countries other than Mexico, and roughly 650 were, like Kamal, from special-interest countries, according to the Border Patrol.

Those interviewed by the Daily Bulletin say agencies including the FBI and CIA are not using information from Border Patrol and Drug Enforcement Administration agents to make connections between the drug trade, illegal immigration and terrorist organizations.

"For us to believe that Mexican smugglers will not assist, knowingly or unknowingly, foreign terrorists trying to enter the United States is incomprehensible," said Rep. Ted Poe, R-Texas, who, along with other congressional representatives, has pushed for stricter border security policies.

Whether Kamal had ties to a terrorist group is not known. No information about him, including his current whereabouts, is available aside from what is in Justice Department and Homeland Security documents.

But the links between illegal immigration, expanded trade, Mexican narcotics organizations and terrorist groups has already been assessed by U.S. federal law enforcement agencies, according to DEA documents obtained by the Daily Bulletin.

According to an intelligence report written by the DEA, "La Entrada al Pac fico (Gateway to the Pacific)" - also the name of a Texas-Mexico plan to expand border trade - Asian narcotics traffickers, in collusion with Mexican drug trafficking organizations and terrorist groups, could use expanded trade routes to bring contraband into the United States.

"The DEA has made a conscious effort to generate predictive intelligence so policy makers can be aware and plan ahead for significant changes in narcotics and smuggling operations," said a DEA official who asked to remain anonymous. "Any time you send in a predictive piece of intelligence that has merit and it's ignored, then the consequences of that can be devastating to national security."

According to DEA intelligence reports, the link between terrorism and narcotics has been well known since the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks in New York, Washington, D.C., and Pennsylvania.

But federal agents say getting bureaucrats to understand the growing danger is difficult when most lawmakers won't even acknowledge many of the problems already happening along the U.S. border.

BORDER BATTLES

One of those problems was on full display in Texas earlier this year.

Sheriff Arvin West of Hudspeth County - a border area 50 miles east of El Paso - and other Texas border sheriffs had complained for more than a year that Mexican military personnel were helping cartels smuggle humans and contraband across the Rio Grande and into the U.S.

The Daily Bulletin first published Department of Homeland Security documents and maps from the U.S. Office of National Drug Control Policy in January, showing 226 Mexican military incursions into the United States since 1996. That information led to a call for congressional investigations and hearings to determine the extent of the intrusions.

Shortly afterward, West was confronted with another incursion. This time, local law enforcement officials videotaped the event and went public with it.

"We had video and photographs," West said. "We went to Congress and testified before them with the evidence in hand. And we were told by Congressman (Silvestre) Reyes (D-El Paso) that we were either lying or mistaken."

Reyes, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, and U.S. and Mexican government officials tried to play down the documents and the incident in Hudspeth County. They stated publicly that the cartels were dressing like Mexican military to damage relations between the U.S. and Mexico.

Reyes, who recently was appointed chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, did not return phone calls seeking comment.

"The bureaucrats don't understand what a dangerous game they are playing with American lives if they don't do something to fix the situation at the border," said Michael Cutler, a former special agent with Immigration and Naturalization Services, who testified before the 9-11 Commission.

According to Border Patrol agents in Texas and Arizona, the Department of Homeland Security has stopped agents from filing full-disclosure incident reports if they see Mexican military involved in an alleged smuggling operation.

In some parts of Texas, if Mexican military personnel are suspected of assisting narcotics traffickers or smuggling humans, they are not processed, but instead are taken to a port of entry and released into Mexico.

An unnamed Border Patrol agent in Arizona said he witnessed a Mexican military helicopter shooting at a fellow agent in pursuit of a vehicle along the Arizona border with Mexico.

The supervisors would not let the agent put the Mexican military's involvement in the incident report, the agent said.

DOJ_NMG_0110264

Michael Friel, a spokesman for the Border Patrol, said he had no knowledge of such an incident.

It's not just the cartels' connections to Mexican government officials and military that have U.S. intelligence officials and law enforcement worried. It's also the growing evidence that terrorist organizations have become increasingly dependent on narcotics and weapons sales to support their activities, and that they see the Southwest border as an incubator for their activities.

"Intelligence indicates that terrorist organizations are increasingly probing the U.S.-Mexico border," El Paso County Sheriff Leo Samaniego told the House Judiciary Committee in August, during hearings about border security.

"The large international border creates tremendous smuggling opportunities for terrorists and is fertile ground for recruitment and development of support networks for terrorist organizations," Samaniego said. "The Mexican drug trafficking and human smuggling organizations use their knowledge of the border to assist terrorist cell members in their attempts to exploit the United States.

"The multicultural aspect of the border area also appeals to the terrorists. There are many nationalities, many of them transients, who live and interact in the border setting. This provides the terrorists the opportunity to blend into the community.

"The Southwest border may not be a priority target for a terrorist attack, but it is prime territory for the cultivation, recruitment, transportation and stashing of terrorist cell members," Samaniego concluded.

Samaniego and his colleagues aren't the only ones with such beliefs.

A DEA official said terrorist incidents such as the Madrid train bombings in March 2004 would be easy to duplicate in the United States, with the Southwest border as the best place to smuggle in those who would carry out such a plot.

In the train bombings, 10 synchronized explosions killed 191 people and wounded more than 1,700. An Islamic extremist group that funded the operation with narcotics sales was pinpointed as the perpetrator of the bombings.

"A former DEA director explained the problem best. During the cold war the threat was ABC: atomic, biological and chemical," said an intelligence official with the DEA, speaking on condition of anonymity. "If you apply that formula now to post 9/11 ... it becomes ABCD: atomic, biological, chemical and drugs. The drugs provide the funding for terrorism."

TERRORIST CULTURE

Additionally troubling to U.S. authorities are the growing cultural similarities between Mexican drug cartels and established terrorist groups.

Like Islamic extremists and other terrorist organizations that use suicide bombings or decapitations to strike fear into their enemies, drug-trafficking organizations have developed cultural associations with death over the past several years.

The Sinaloa Cartel, headed by Joaqu n "El Chapo" Guzm n, is now known by federal law enforcement officials as the "Federation" or "Golden Triangle." The long-running war between the Sinaloa and Gulf cartels for control of the Nuevo Laredo border forced Sinaloa to build alliances with numerous other drug trafficking organizations throughout Mexico, making the Sinaloa Cartel one of the most powerful in the country.

The Sinaloa Cartel, along with the help of Vicente Carrillo Fuentes, head of the Juarez Cartel, moves the majority of its narcotics through Ciudad Ju rez, which borders El Paso, Texas.

Along the streets of Ciudad Ju rez, Mexico, statues of La Santa Muerte - the saint of death - can be found at almost any local shop. The robed skeleton with a sickle clutched in its bony fingers is worshiped by many drug runners in Mexico and the United States.

The empty-eyed deity is particularly haunting in a city known for the brutal murders of nearly 500 women since 1995. Many Mexican and U.S. law enforcement officials have attributed the murders to drug traffickers, some of whom have been arrested. But the murders continue, and women still live in fear.

"Women shouldn't be on the street after dark," said Lalo, 81, who sat with his wife at their empty shop in downtown Ciudad Ju rez.

Danger signs are everywhere. Billboards follow passers-by like shadows, warning women to be vigilant. Every man begins to look like a predator.

"There is so much death," Lalo sighed. "I'm beginning to think the saint is real."

The attitudes and actions represented by worship of La Santa Muerte culturally connect Mexico's drug cartels to terrorist groups, according to DEA officials.

Like Hezbollah and al-Qaida, which promise martyrs that their family members will be provided for after suicide bombings, Mexican drug trafficking organizations promise high-level members that if they die in the name of the cartel, their families will be provided for. Other similarities include the growing number of beheadings of Mexican police officials by the cartels to instill terror.

In cities all along the U.S.-Mexico border, the popularity of the death deity is growing. From Tijuana to Laredo's violent sister city Nuevo Laredo, La Santa Muerte is found in statues, stickers and trinkets.

DOJ_NMG_0110265

"Widespread and unchecked violence creates a palpable sense of fear and tears at the social, cultural, and economic fabric of Nuevo Laredo," stated a June 2006 report, "State of Siege: Drug-Related Violence and Corruption in Mexico," written by the Washington Office on Latin America, a nonprofit organization promoting human rights.

"As the war between cartels rages, no one - not police, not journalists, not ordinary citizens - knows whom they can trust, so they trust no one."

In Nuevo Laredo, the saint haunts cemeteries where worshippers have left offerings of food. The deity also is seen on the back of bulletproof SUVs driven by narco-traffickers who cruise through the city, and even in graffiti along the city's walls.

Now the saint is gaining popularity in Laredo. Eerie evidence of ritualistic ceremonies performed by illegal immigrants in stash houses was discovered by Webb County sheriff's deputies after one raid. Pictures of members of a Mexican military unit lay in a bowl of blood, sprinkled with herbs and roots.

"This really spooked us," said Webb County sheriff's spokesman Tom Sanchez as he sifted through the photographs taken by the deputies who conducted the raid. "I mean, there was an altar filled with everything you can imagine to this Santisima Muerte. It's a culture of death."

And it's something U.S lawmakers should pay attention to, DEA and Border Patrol field agents said: Drug traffickers accepting death as a glorious end to their violent lives.

"We pray for a good death," said Jose, 21, a young worshiper of La Santa Muerte in Tijuana. He stood stoic by his white-boned statue of the death saint, and pointed to his charm necklace, where a smaller version of the saint hung.

"I pray that I will die in a hail of bullets or fighting for my last breath against my enemy. I'm not afraid to die. I welcome death."

Border Threat: Leaders Look The Other Way (IVDB)

Inland Valley Daily Bulletin, December 29, 2006

Daily Bulletin reporter Sara Carter's three-day installment of Beyond Borders was an unsettling way to end 2006.

The increased smuggling of drugs, humans and who-knows-what-else through a burgeoning international trade route through Nuevo Laredo, Mexico, and Laredo, Texas, is unsettling. So is the human carnage in the all-out battles among Mexican drug-smuggling cartels to control the Mexican trade route. Even more unsettling are the border crossings by "special-interest aliens" - persons from countries that sponsor terrorism - and the "culture of death" catching hold among drug smugglers, a culture that appears to share characteristics with terrorist fanaticism.

But perhaps most unsettling is the disconnect between those on the border's front lines and the higher echelons of the U.S. government, where a seemingly willful ignorance persists.

In 2005 the Border Patrol apprehended about 650 people in the U.S. illegally from special-interest countries - who knows how many weren't caught - yet Carter was told the FBI and CIA are not using information from Border Patrol and Drug Enforcement Administration agents to make connections among the drug trade, illegal immigration and terrorist organizations.

The DEA warns in an intelligence report that Asian narcotics traffickers, in collusion with Mexican drug cartels and terrorist groups, could use the so-called Gateway to the Pacific - a plan to expand border trade through the two Laredos - to bring contraband into the United States.

"Contraband can be anything from narcotics, pirated videos, humans or weapons of mass destruction," said a DEA spokesman.

Meanwhile, we can't take 4 ounces of shampoo on an airplane. Is that supposed to make us feel safer?

Carter reported in January on repeated incursions by Mexican military personnel into the United States - 226 since 1996 - apparently to help cartels smuggle humans and drugs. Shortly thereafter, local law enforcement officials videotaped and photographed an incursion in Hudspeth County, Texas, and Sheriff Arvin West and others testified before a congressional committee with evidence in hand.

Rep. Silvestre Reyes, D-El Paso, told West and the others they were "lying or mistaken," West said, and Reyes, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and other U.S. and Mexican government officials played down the incursion documents obtained by the Daily Bulletin as well as the Hudspeth County incident.

(Reyes has since been appointed incoming chairman of the House Intelligence Committee and promptly displayed his ignorance of Al-Qaida and Hezbollah. Will somebody please buy this guy a newspaper subscription before he takes over the committee known as "Intelligence"?)

El Paso County Sheriff Leo Samaniego told a House committee in August that terrorist organizations are probing the border with the help of Mexican smugglers.

Webb County, Texas, Sheriff Rick Flores testified before Congress about the growing violence in Laredo, which is spilling over from Nuevo Laredo. But former Laredo Mayor Elizabeth Flores said the increasing cross-border trade is "about growth, not death."

And that might be the crux of the official downplaying of the border violence and terror threat. There's a lot of money to be made.

Wal-Mart, for example, and a Hong Kong-based company have invested $300 million to expand a Mexico container port that feeds the Gateway to the Pacific route. The plan is to get more goods from Asia into the United States, in the process redirecting half of the East Coast-bound Asian cargo from the ports of Long Beach and Los Angeles to Mexico. More trade routes and competition among ports help Wal-Mart keep its prices down.

But U.S. consumers might be paying a higher price in terms of lost security. At least the threat appears considerably greater than the one from that 4 ounce bottle of shampoo you had to leave at home.

Reid Seeks Better U.S. - Bolivia Relations (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

Filed at 12:20 a.m. ET

LA PAZ, Bolivia (AP) -- A delegation of six U.S. senators led by incoming Majority Leader Harry Reid met Thursday with Bolivian President Evo Morales, seeking to smooth relations with the South American country's left-leaning government.

Relations have been tense since Morales' election a year ago, with the U.S. wary of his friendship with Presidents Fidel Castro of Cuba and Hugo Chavez of Venezuela. Morales has been critical of U.S. attempts to eradicate coca in the region.

Reid said the United States must pay more attention to Latin America, blaming the region's recent populist shift in part on U.S. neglect.

"I believe that the U.S. needs to be heavily involved in Latin America, and we're not," Reid told The Associated Press after what he called a "long, intense conversation" with Morales. "I believe that Bolivia is looking for help, and I think we can be an agent for help."

At a news conference earlier, Reid said it was not an accident that he chose Bolivia as the first country to visit as Democrats prepare to take control of Congress in the wake of last month's elections.

"We're here as Democrats and Republicans to help North America appreciate the potential of this mighty little country," he said.

The Nevada Democrat later praised Morales' "magnetic personality," saying he "could be, if things work out right, the best leader this country ever had."

But the senator cautioned that Morales' sweeping populist reforms must leave Bolivia's democracy intact. "The one thing we're going to do is make sure that this is democratic government," he told the AP.

Earlier, Sen. Ken Salazar, a Colorado Democrat, told reporters in fluent Spanish that the visit "signals a different direction" for U.S.-Bolivian relations.

DOJ_NMG_0110267

"I believe all of us want the same thing, to help lift up the people of Latin America so that they can achieve the human dignity they deserve," Salazar said.

Like Chavez, Morales has railed against U.S. foreign policy and occasionally accused the Bush administration of plotting to overthrow his government or even assassinate him.

But he also sent Vice President Alvaro Garcia Linera to Washington twice to negotiate an extension of a key trade agreement with the U.S. -- which President Bush himself eventually backed and Congress passed earlier this month.

Morales announced earlier this month that he would seek to significantly expand the area for the legal cultivation of coca, which is commonly used in Bolivia as a mild stimulant but also is processed into cocaine.

The announcement drew sharp criticism from Washington, which has strenuously objected to any increase in coca production. The two nations, however, signed an agreement guaranteeing $34 million in U.S. anti-narcotics aid for next year.

After meeting with U.S. and Bolivian officials, Reid said the Andean country was "moving forward" in its fight against drug trafficking.

The six-member delegation travels next to Ecuador where it will meet Saturday with President-elect Rafael Correa, another U.S. critic and Chavez ally who has said he will not sign a free trade agreement with Washington. Correa has also recently criticized U.S. backed fumigation of coca crops in Colombia along the border with Ecuador.

The senators will then travel to Peru for talks with center-left Peruvian President Alan Garcia.

Joining Reid and Salazar are incoming Majority Whip Richard Durbin, D-Ill., Sen. Kent Conrad, D-ND; Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H.; and Sen. Robert Bennett, R-Utah.

Brazilian Drug Gangs' Attacks Kill 19 (AP)

AP, December 29, 2006

Two burnt buses are seen at the Cidade Alta slum, in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, on Thursday, Dec 28, 2006. Drug gangs set fire to two interstate buses and opened fire on police stations and posts around Rio de Janeiro early Thursday, killing 15 people, including two policemen, according to local news media. Police said they could not immediately confirm the number of dead but that the state security chief would hold a press conference Thursday morning to discuss the violence. ir RIO DE JANEIRO, Brazil - Drug gangs set fire to buses and opened fire on police stations and posts around Rio de Janeiro early Thursday in a wave of violence that killed 19 people and wounded 21, the state's top law enforcement officer said.

The victims included seven who burned to death in one of six torched buses and three policemen, said Roberto Precioso, head of Rio's Public Safety Department.

Two other civilians died, including a street vendor caught in the crossfire of a shootout in Rio's Botafogo district, and seven alleged gang members were killed, he said. Fourteen civilians and seven police officers were injured, he added.

Precioso said gang members used handguns, machine guns and grenades in 12 attacks on police stations and outposts that began in the early morning.

The attacks were apparently a show of force staged before a new governor is sworn in Monday, Precioso said. Police intelligence had warned that gangs were planning attacks for some time.

"It is very difficult to prevent these types of attacks that were practically kamikaze," Precioso said at a news conference. "Police action prevented the situation from getting much worse."

He said the attacks had apparently been ordered from inside one of the state's prisons, but did not elaborate.

Rio's governor said gangs intended the attacks to be far bloodier.

"The idea was to kill hundreds of police and dozens of innocent people," Rio de Janeiro State Gov. Rosinha Matheus told reporters.

Most of the violence occurred on Rio's poor north side, although a policeman was killed in the upscale Lagoa district and a woman died during an attack on a police booth in the Botafogo district near downtown.

Mayor Cesar Maia said gangs appeared to be retaliating against militias _ reportedly run by off-duty police officers _ that in recent months have been battling drug gangs in slums and charging residents for protection.

"The reason for what's happening is that militias have grown and the drug gangs are leaving," Maia told reporters. "To maintain their income, the gangs are increasing crime on the street."

Precioso said early action by police prevented the violence from reaching levels seen in Sao Paulo, Brazil's largest city, in May when an organized crime group launched similar attacks that killed nearly 200 people, including some 40 police officers and dozens of alleged gang members.

Retired Judge Walter Fanganiello Maierovitch, an expert on organized crime and Brazil's former drug czar, said the violence shows "Brazil's public safety polices are in shambles."

Precioso said that police were working to contain further attacks and that they did not present a danger to the millions expected to welcome the New Year on Rio's beaches Sunday night.

19 Are Killed As Drug Gangs Conduct Attacks In Brazil (NYT)

By Larry Rohter

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

RIO DE JANEIRO, Dec. 28 — Heavily armed drug gangs unleashed a wave of attacks on police stations and public roads here early on Thursday, and at least 19 people were killed in the confrontations.

Seven died in a single incident, a predawn assault on an interstate bus bound for São Paulo. Survivors said that about eight armed men stopped and boarded the bus, robbed those aboard and then set fire to it before the 28 passengers could get off.

At least eight police stations and street posts were also reported to have been attacked by gangs with grenades and machine guns. The dead included not only criminals and police officers involved in the shootouts, but also street vendors, pedestrians and people filing complaints at police stations.

Confrontations between the military police and gangs continued throughout the day. Police units sent into at least a dozen of the squatter slums in the hills overlooking the city were met with armed resistance, and a shootout that disrupted car traffic on a main street in a working-class neighborhood was also reported.

The attacks here coincided with the start of the summer tourist season, an important source of income. The mayor of this city of 5.5 million, César Maia, promised that the violence would not interfere with the famous New Year's celebration on the Copacabana beach. But he said that police units would need to be reinforced and that he would welcome army troops on key roads.

Brazilian news organizations said the wave of violence was meant as a warning to the new governor of the state of Rio de Janeiro, Sérgio Cabral. Elected in October after a hard-hitting campaign in which crime, drugs and public insecurity were the principal issues, Mr. Cabral takes office on Monday.

"We're going through a change of government," including a new team that will be in charge of prisons, Roberto Precioso, the secretary of public security for the state of Rio de Janeiro, told reporters at a news conference on Thursday morning. Imprisoned gang leaders are "creating pressure in order to negotiate concessions and privileges," he added. "They are afraid of a tougher disciplinary regimen, which they want to avoid at all costs."

But Mr. Maia and other officials said the gangs were also reacting against the presence of private "militias" in the squatter slums that were their stronghold. These militias are composed largely of off-duty police officers, who are said to ignore the legal niceties required of them when they are in uniform and to be demanding payment from slum residents in return for killing or expelling gang kingpins.

Such militias "are highly pernicious to public administration," the state director of prisons, Astério Pereira dos Santos, said at a news conference here. He added, "The militias take control of what belonged to the traffickers, and so something heretofore unthinkable is happening: criminal factions are uniting to confront the militias." Since May, attacks by criminal gangs in São Paulo, the country's largest city, have left more than 200 people dead.

Rio Hit By Deadly Gang Violence (BBC)

BBC News, December 28, 2006

Gang attacks on buses and police stations in the Brazilian city of Rio de Janeiro have left at least 18 people dead, officials say.

In one incident, seven passengers were burnt to death when gunmen attacked their bus and torched it.

The wave of violence across the city started on Wednesday night and continued into Thursday morning.

Officials said the co-ordinated attacks had probably been planned from jail by imprisoned gang leaders.

The gangs were trying to put pressure on the authorities ahead of the swearing-in of a new state governor on 1 January, Rio state Security Secretary Roberto Precioso told reporters.

"It is very difficult to prevent these types of attacks that were practically kamikaze. Police action prevented the situation from getting much worse," he said.

Favelas occupied

One local media report has spoken of an atmosphere of war in the city, which is preparing for a huge New Year's Eve beach party.

At least 12 police stations and posts in different parts of Rio were attacked with grenades and automatic fire.

DOJ_NMG_0110269

Four buses were set on fire, and gunmen are reported to have stopped emergency workers from getting close to the scene.

"I don't know how, but I gathered my strength, got myself into the aisle of the bus and jumped through the window. I felt like I was being toasted," a woman who escaped one of the burning buses said.

As military police and gunmen exchanged fire on some of Rio's streets, motorists fled their cars to seek shelter.

Two police officers were among the dead, as well as seven gang members, Mr Precioso said.

He said three suspects had been arrested and added police had occupied 10 shantytowns, or favelas, which were controlled by drug gangs.

Rio is reputed to be one of the most violent cities in the world.

Its favelas, are frequently the scene of shoot-outs between officers and gang members, as are poor neighbourhoods in other Brazilian cities.

In May, more than 120 people died in Sao Paulo after a wave of gang attacks. These triggered a heavy police backlash, which was blamed for many of the deaths.

Rio Attacks Leave 18 Dead, Raising Tourism Concern (BLOOM)

By Adriana Brasileiro And Jeb Blount

Bloomberg, December 29, 2006

Dec. 28 - A night of violence in Rio de Janeiro left 18 dead after drug gangs retaliated against police efforts to oust them from several of the city's slums, raising concern that New Year's celebrations this weekend may be disturbed.

Rio's public safety chief, Roberto Precioso, said two police officers, nine civilians and seven gang members were killed in 12 attacks in different areas of the city. Seven of the nine civilians were burned to death on an interstate bus.

The violence comes just four days before New Year's beach festivities and two months before February's Carnival parades, two of the world's largest events and key sources of revenue for the Brazilian city's tourism industry.

``The attacks were meant to destabilize the power of the state, but we have the situation under control and we're prepared to protect the population with added troops," Precioso said. Rio won't cancel events planned for the weekend because of the attacks, he added.

Precioso said police are increasing by 20 percent the number of troops patrolling the city during a period when hundreds of thousands of people flock to the beaches. Ricardo Hallack, Rio's civil police chief, said the corporation is ready to surround favelas, the Portuguese term for slums, in the next few days to quell the wave of violence.

``We won't let them get away with the shocking violence we've seen," Hallack said in a televised press conference today.

Bus Burned

In the worst attack, seven people burned to death on a bus traveling to the neighboring state of Espirito Santo early today. Precioso said about 10 assailants surrounded the bus on a major highway that links downtown Rio to poor suburbs and tossed gasoline-filled bottles inside. The attackers set the bus on fire and prevented the 28 passengers from getting off.

Fearing more attacks will occur in the next few days, hospitals in Rio requested extra blood supplies from the city's main blood bank, Hemorio. Supplies are dangerously low, Hemorio spokesman Marcos Araujo said.

``We won't be able to keep up with demand if it continues like this over the next few days," Araujo said in a phone interview. ``We provide blood products to 180 public hospitals in the greater Rio area, and they are all trying to prepare for more violence this weekend."

Tourism Concerns

``This is very disturbing," said Alicia Laumann of wholesale tour company Galapagos Holidays in Toronto. ``I have four Canadian clients vacationing in Rio right now and I'm really thinking twice about sending more people there anytime soon."

Intelligence services warned officials for weeks that attacks could happen as a new government prepares take office on Jan. 1, Precioso said.

``They are taking advantage of the fact we are in a transition, and they believed we would be more vulnerable," he said. The state government received anonymous phone calls warning of attacks by gang members over the holidays, Precioso said.

Residents of Rio's slums also have prepared for possible attacks in their communities.

In Cordovil and Cidade Alta slums, where the Academy Award- winning movie ``City of God" was filmed, armed men pulled pistols and automatic weapons on a car bringing Christmas food baskets to poor families on Dec. 16. They put them away after realizing one of the car's four occupants was a neighbor.

At the time, people in Cidade Alta's bars and stores were talking about an expected invasion by police or police-linked militias to expel drug traffickers who lived in the community.

Similar Attacks

DOJ_NMG_0110270

The violence in Rio is similar to attacks ordered earlier this year by drug gangs in Sao Paulo, Brazil's largest city and business center, to protest prison conditions in the state.

On several occasions from May to August, gang members attacked Sao Paulo's transportation system, burning buses and shooting at bus stops in actions that left about 4 million commuters stranded for days. They also targeted crowded gasoline stations, bank branches and automatic-teller machines, forcing business owners to shut their doors for days.

``These gangs here are not organized like what we saw in Sao Paulo," Precioso said. They were retaliating against stepped up repression of drug trafficking in Rio's 712 favelas, he said. ``In recent months, they felt the financial losses from our actions in the favelas and they decided to scare the population."

Civilians And Police Killed In Rio Violence (GUA)

Guardian, December 29, 2006

A coordinated wave of attacks against police and civilians in Rio de Janeiro left at least 18 dead yesterday after drug traffickers went on the rampage with machine guns and petrol bombs.

With Rio gearing up for one of the world's largest New Year's Eve celebrations, criminals launched simultaneous attacks on police stations and buses across Brazil's second largest city.

The attacks began in the early hours of yesterday when two buses were set on fire near Cidade Alta, an impoverished housing estate on the city's outskirts where much of the movie City of God was filmed.

Article continues

The violence then spread across the city, including to the wealthy southern beach districts.

In Botafogo gang members opened fire on a police position, just metres from several youth hostels popular with European tourists, killing a street vendor.

In Lagoa, one of Rio's most upmarket neighbourhoods located a few blocks from Ipanema beach, a policeman was shot 12 times. Two bus passengers were burnt alive when their bus was set on fire.

The city's prison secretary suggested that the violence had been planned by criminals from the Mangueira shantytown, a community thought to have links with the First Command of the Capital crime faction in Sao Paulo.

18 Dead As Rio Gangs Clash With Police In Violent Show Of Force (IND)

Independent, December 29, 2006

Violence across Brazil's second largest city killed 18 people yesterday, as drug gangs set fire to buses and fired on police stations.

The victims included seven people who were burned to death in one of four torched buses, as well as two policemen. Two other civilians were shot dead, including a street vendor caught in the crossfire during a gunfight in Rio's Botafogo district. Seven alleged gang members were also killed.

Roberto Precioso, the head of Rio de Janeiro's public safety department, said gang members used handguns, machine guns and grenades in 12 attacks against police stations and outposts that started early yesterday morning.

Fourteen civilians and eight police officers were injured, he added.

The attacks were a show of force by the city's gangs, staged before a new governor is sworn in on 1 January, Mr Precioso said. Police intelligence had warned that the gangs were planning attacks for some time.

"It is very difficult to prevent these types of attacks, that were practically kamikaze," Precioso said at a news conference. "Police action prevented the situation from getting much worse."

He said the attacks were apparently ordered from inside one of the state's prisons, but did not elaborate.

According to the website of the O Globo newspaper, the attacks began on the Washington Luiz highway that links Rio de Janeiro with the nearby mountain resort of Petropolis.

Most of the violence occurred on Rio's poor north side, although a policeman was killed in the upmarket Lagoa district, and a woman was killed in an attack on a police post in the Botafogo area of the city.

Rio's Mayor, Cesar Maia, said gangs appeared to be retaliating against militias - reportedly run by off-duty police officers - that in recent months have been battling the gangs in slum areas - and charging residents for protection.

of gang members. Walter Fanganiello Maierovitch, an expert on organised crime and Brazil's former top anti-drugs official, said police in Rio did a better job of containing the attacks.

"Precioso did not try to fool anyone and took to the offensive immediately," Maierovitch told CBN radio. "In Sao Paulo, the authorities downplayed the attacks at first, saying they were isolated incidents."

Still, he said, the violence showed that "Brazil's public safety policies are in shambles".

Mr Precioso said police were working to contain ongoing attacks, and that they did not present a danger to the millions of people who are expected to celebrate New Year on Rio's beaches. But he declined to answer a reporter's question about whether the police are prepared to handle security during the 2007 Pan American Games which will take place here.

Rio de Janeiro is one of the most violent cities in the world, with an annual murder rate of about 50 per 100,000 residents.

3 Plead Guilty In Alabama Church Arsons (BVND)

By Phillip Rawls

The Belleville News Democrat, December 21, 2006

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. - Three former college students pleaded guilty Wednesday to federal arson charges for burning nine churches in a series of blazes that alarmed rural congregations across Alabama.

Matthew Cloyd, Benjamin Nathan Moseley and Russell Lee DeBusk entered the guilty pleas to federal arson and conspiracy charges in the string of church fires set on two nights in February.

The three wore orange jail jumpsuits and leg chains as they stood before U.S. District Judge David Proctor, who told them they all face minimum seven-year sentences.

Cloyd, 21, and Moseley, 20, had a plea agreement with federal prosecutors that called for them to recommend a sentence of up to eight years and one month, but not less than seven years.

DeBusk, 20, did not have an agreement on a sentence with his plea but decided to plead guilty "to help those congregations and others hurt by his behavior continue to heal," defense attorney Brett Bloomston said. A prosecutor said he expects DeBusk to get a shorter sentence because he participated in only five fires.

Defense lawyer Tommy Spina said Cloyd "is incredibly remorseful, and he regrets creating this much misery in people's lives."

The three are also charged with state crimes in Bibb, Pickens, Greene and Sumter counties, including arson, burglary, criminal mischief and cruelty to animals for killing a cow. Defense attorneys have been discussing a similar plea deal with county prosecutors, but none has been reached.

Prosecutors said that the first fires occurred during a night of illegal hunting and underage drinking, and that the second fires were set to throw off investigators.

All the churches have either rebuilt or are in the process after receiving an outpouring of donations.

The Rev. James Posey suffered a stroke and had to step down as pastor after Morning Star Baptist Church in Eutaw was destroyed. Posey, who blames his stroke on the stress of the fire, was pleased to hear of the pleas.

"It sends a message out that you are not going to run amok and not desecrate and destroy property, especially God's church," he said.

Fate Of Assets Ordered Back To State Court (BUFFNEWS)

By JANICE L. HABUDA, News Staff Reporter

Buffalo News, December 29, 2006

Rebuffing the Internal Revenue Service, a federal judge Wednesday returned the receivership case involving St. Augustine Center to state court.

The nonprofit human services agency that served Buffalo's black community was ordered closed in February by State Supreme Court Justice John A. Michalek because of financial problems.

Since then, attorney Adam W. Perry, a court-appointed receiver, developed a plan to pay off creditors and obtain compensation for 85 employees who worked months without pay.

After Perry presented his report last month about distributing the center's available assets - including more than $127,000 in unpaid wages - the IRS sought to move the case to federal court.

The IRS argued that the actions contemplated by the receiver would be adverse to the IRS's tax lien of almost $900,000 against St. Augustine and that the receivership action has become one "against" the United States.

Further, attorneys for the U.S. Justice Department, representing the IRS, threatened last week to sue the former employees and the receiver if the lien wasn't honored.

Perry argued before U.S. District Judge John V. Elfvin on Friday to keep the case in Michalek's court.

Elfvin agreed. In a decision issued Wednesday, Elfvin concluded that removing the case from state court had been improper. The judge also denied a conditional petition/motion for emergency injunctive relief that was filed by the IRS after the court clerk's office closed Friday for the holiday weekend. The IRS sought to prevent the receiver from distributing any St. Augustine assets until 10 days after the state court decides another IRS motion.

Elfvin wrote that he lacks jurisdiction over the receivership action and that the IRS can petition the state court for such relief.

"Justice prevailed, and the employees so far have prevailed," Perry said Wednesday.

He said he will ask Michalek to take back the case and to be discharged as receiver.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Lame Duck Bush Entering Rougher Waters (USAT)

By Susan Page And David Jackson

USA Today, December 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — Embattled by the Iraq war, barred from seeking another term in office and facing an emboldened, Democratic-controlled Congress, President Bush fits the textbook definition: a lame duck.

His final two years in the Oval Office seem destined to be dramatically different and more difficult than his first six. Republicans in Congress, once loyal, have begun to fracture. Democrats in Congress, once powerless, vow to use their new authority to investigate the administration, challenge its policies and chart their own course.

Nevertheless, the president, calculating how to maneuver during his remaining time in office, insists he can score achievements — and says he plans to try. "Look, I came to do big things, and we're still going to try to do big things," Bush told a private gathering of Republicans after November's election setbacks, according to GOP strategist Charlie Black, who was there. "Regardless of my popularity and the Congress, I'm going to try to do big things."

Those "big things" include reauthorizing his signature No Child Left Behind law, winning passage of immigration legislation that provides a path to legal status for undocumented workers and taking steps toward adding individual investment accounts to Social Security. White House officials are exploring the prospects for limiting congressional "earmarks" in the budget process and encouraging new and expanded sources of energy.

But the war overshadows it all.

The conflict in Iraq is costing an estimated $8 billion a month, straining the Army and Marine Corps and sapping Bush's job-approval rating, now at 38% in a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll. A turnaround in the security and political situation there could invigorate his presidency, but growing violence and chaos might well make it hard for him to focus on anything else.

What Bush will propose in the State of the Union address next month and how he'll pursue those priorities will depend in part on how conciliatory Democrats are, White House officials say. They're preparing "soft" and "hard" approaches — from cooperation to confrontation — after studying how other presidents dealt with opposition Congresses.

"With the majority comes responsibility," White House strategist Karl Rove said in an interview. "In our system, the president governs. The president is the chief executive, and the Congress has the responsibility to legislate. But the Congress cannot legislate without the concurrence of the president, and vice versa. If Congress legislates and it does not have the concurrence of the president, it's called a veto."

The ferocity of the war in Iraq and its impact on U.S. relations around the globe limit Bush's ability to use a strategy other second-termers have employed during their final two years in office: Turn to foreign policy — where a president's powers remain largely unfettered — and change the subject from whatever is bedeviling your presidency.

"Iraq is still there; it's always there," says Frank Donatelli, a Republican consultant and former White House political director for Ronald Reagan. "Unless it starts getting better, it's like a 10-pound weight" on the president.

When presidents get to the final two years of their second term, their administrations often are running out of gas and into trouble.

The proposals that drove their first elections generally have either been enacted (such as Reagan's defense buildup and tax cuts) or run aground (such as Bill Clinton's health-care overhaul). Many of the advisers who helped them get to the Oval Office have moved on, and members of Congress in their party usually lose big in the election midway through the second term. The administration has had enough time in power for malfeasance to take place — and be uncovered.

DOJ_NMG_0110273

"The metaphor I'd use is barnacles on the ship of state," says Steven Schier, a political scientist at Carleton College in Northfield, Minn., and author of High Risk and Big Ambition: The Presidency of George W. Bush. With grievances accumulating, he says, "you encounter more and more resistance as you try to move forward."

In the sixth year of his presidency, Dwight Eisenhower had to accept the resignation of chief of staff Sherman Adams amid scandal. The congressional inquiry into the Iran-contra affair opened Reagan's final two years in office. Clinton began his last two years with an impeachment trial.

Yet both of Bush's most recent two-term predecessors bounced back after damaging midterm elections to reach successes that helped shape their legacies.

In Reagan's final two years, he embraced Soviet reformer Mikhail Gorbachev and negotiated the destruction of hundreds of intermediate-range nuclear weapons.

After Democrats lost control of the House and Senate in 1994, the election midway through Clinton's first term, the president brokered deals with Republicans that revamped welfare and balanced the federal budget. Those measures at times put Clinton at odds with leaders in his own party — for instance, then-New York Sen. Daniel Patrick Moynihan — and presumably would have been more difficult to complete if Democrats had still controlled Congress.

For Bush, the Democratic takeover could make it easier for him to enact the immigration plan that was blocked by House Republicans this year. The new political realities could push him to be more flexible and bipartisan.

"I felt like we had a pretty successful couple of years when it comes to legislation," Bush said at a year-end news conference. "However, that doesn't mean necessarily that we are able to achieve the same kind of results without a different kind of approach."

He noted he had worked collegially with a Democratic state Legislature as governor of Texas.

White House officials are also girded for confrontations with the incoming Democratic majority in Congress. The debate over federal funding for embryonic stem-cell research — the subject of Bush's only veto to date — could spark an early showdown. A move to loosen the rules for funding would prompt another veto, aides say.

Bipartisanship "has to work both ways," White House spokesman Tony Snow warns.

Still, Bush's aides say that even after GOP ranks shrank by 13 seats in the Senate and 48 in the House in the 1958 elections, during Eisenhower's sixth year in office, the president could cajole the Democratic Congress to rein in spending.

"The president is very pragmatic," GOP consultant Mark McKinnon, a longtime adviser, says of Bush. "He wants to get things done, and he understands that to get things done, he needs Democrats."

The most difficult issue seems sure to be Iraq. It is "the whale in the bathtub," Schier says.

The bipartisan Iraq Study Group this month recommended the withdrawal of most U.S. combat troops by March 2008, and most Democrats have called for a drawdown of forces before then. But Bush has vowed to stay "until the job is done" and is weighing proposals to send more troops.

He met with Vice President Cheney, Defense Secretary Robert Gates and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice Thursday at his Texas ranch to discuss the war and a speech to the nation about it next month. "I've got more consultation to do until I talk to the country about the plan," he told reporters.

The confrontation over the issue isn't waiting. Incoming Senate Foreign Relations Chairman Joseph Biden told reporters Tuesday that he would oppose any effort to increase U.S. troop levels. The Delaware Democrat said he couldn't "imagine there being … significant support for the president's positions" — not only among Democrats but also Republicans. In a sign of how times are about to change, he plans to call Rice before the committee next month for what seems likely to be tough questioning.

Even so, Democratic leaders including House Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., have said the new congressional majority won't use its most powerful tool, denying funding for U.S. troops.

The prospects for congressional action — and cooperation with the White House — are greater when it comes to domestic issues.

Among Bush's top priorities:

·Modify Social Security. Since the 2000 campaign, Bush has talked about allowing workers to divert some of their payroll taxes to individual investment accounts within the Social Security system. The idea was so volatile that even the Republican-controlled Congress never brought it to a vote.

The president seems ready to try again. The day after the midterm elections, he announced he had instructed Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson "to reach out to folks on the Hill to see if we can't at least get a dialogue started" about the long-term fiscal stability of Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid.

·Move toward energy independence. The administration is considering the possibility of a deal with Democrats: Increase funding for such alternative sources of energy as solar and wind power if more exploration is allowed for oil and natural gas off the Alaskan coast and in the Gulf of Mexico. Bush also wants to build more nuclear plants.

·Reauthorize No Child Left Behind. Bush wants to reauthorize the education bill that was the first major bipartisan legislation enacted in his first term. The White House wants the revised program to maintain current testing standards for students. Key Democrats including Massachusetts Sen. Edward Kennedy and Rep. George Miller of California say they are willing to support renewing the bill but want it to reflect more of their priorities, including increased federal funding for struggling schools.

·Revisit immigration. In October, Bush signed a law authorizing construction of 700 miles of fence along the Mexican border, but it lacked provisions he supported to allow illegal immigrants now in the USA to gain legal status.

"I think the Democrats would partner with him on that," says John Podesta, a former Clinton White House chief of staff. The apparent backlash last November from Hispanic voters may boost Bush's plan among Republicans, too: Hispanic support for Republican congressional candidates fell by nearly a third from 2004.

Even without bipartisan cooperation, Podesta notes that the Clinton White House found ways to take action over the objections of an opposition Congress.

Clinton used the Antiquities Act of 1906 to declare 1.9 million acres in southern Utah as the Grand Staircase-Escalante National Monument, shielding it from new mining and other development. During his final weeks in office, he cited his authority under a 1996 health-care bill to set landmark rules governing medical privacy.

After Republicans took control of Congress, they "learned the hard way" that Clinton retained considerable powers as president, recalls Ed Gillespie, then an aide to House Majority Leader Dick Armey and later Republican national chairman.

"The veto pen is a pretty powerful tool," Gillespie says. "Executive orders are a pretty potent way to make policy. And the megaphone is still pretty big."

Meanwhile, in Washington, attention has begun to shift from the current president to speculation about his successor. Rove predicts the next presidential contest will be only a minor distraction in 2007, and he says Bush can score achievements even after the campaign is underway in 2008 by getting enough momentum behind ideas.

"I'm going to work hard," Bush declared last week. "I'm going to sprint to the finish."

Bush Tops Survey As Hero, Villain Of The Year (DENP/AP)

By Darlene Superville

Denver Post/AP, December 29, 2006

Washington - Bad guy of 2006: President Bush. Good guy of 2006: President Bush.

When people were asked in an AP-AOL News poll to name the villains and heroes of the year, Bush topped both lists, in a sign of these polarized times.

Among entertainers, Oprah Winfrey edged out Michael J. Fox as best celebrity role model, while Britney Spears outdistanced Paris Hilton as the worst.

Bush won the villain sweepstakes by a landslide, with one in four respondents putting him at the top of that list. When people were asked to name the candidate for villain that first came to mind, Bush outdistanced even Osama bin Laden, the terrorist leader in hiding, and former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein, who is scheduled for execution.

Bush was picked as hero of the year by a much smaller margin. In the poll, 13 percent named him as their favorite, while 6 percent cited the troops in Iraq.

Among celebrities, 29 percent of adults, when asked to choose from a list of names, bestowed the honor of worst celebrity on Spears. The 25-year-old pop singer and mother of two recently filed for divorce from Kevin Federline, her husband of two years.

She then followed with highly publicized nights out with party girls Hilton and Lindsay Lohan, including photos of Spears wearing no underpants.

Second-worst celebrity billing went to Hilton, 18 percent. The 25-year-old celebutante was arrested for drunken driving in Los Angeles in September.

Mel Gibson, 50, was third- worst celebrity with 12 percent, after his anti-Semitic tirade at police in Malibu, Calif., during his arrest on suspicion of drunken driving. He later apologized and said he harbored no animosity toward Jews.

In the best celebrity role model category, 29 percent of adults chose talk-show host Winfrey. The philanthropist and entertainment mogul contributed $40 million toward the establishment of a school for girls in South Africa, which is scheduled to open next month.

The telephone poll of 1,004 adults was conducted Dec. 19-21. The margin of sampling error was plus or minus 3.1 percentage points.

A Matter Of Degrees: Roberts Taking His Time To Reshape High Court (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, December 29, 2006

At the end of John Roberts Jr.'s first full year as chief justice, his tenure is taking shape, framed by sometimes conflicting goals of collegiality, continuity and change.

He leads the nation's highest court more openly and with a lighter touch than his predecessor, the late William Rehnquist, and has quickly endeared himself to Supreme Court staff. But his imprint on the Court as an institution has been measured in small increments so far, as the realization sets in that major change -- such as increasing the size of the Court's docket and reforming the law-clerk-pooling arrangement -- may take years to accomplish.

"He is trying to bring the old traditions of the Court into the 21st century," says former Court official Harvey Rishikof. "It's going to take awhile."

Nearly everywhere he goes, Roberts speaks of his desire to preside over a more cohesive and unanimous Court. But with resignation in his voice, he notes that he cannot achieve that goal without active help from his colleagues.

"I think we're most effective when we operate and function as a court rather than nine separate individuals," Roberts said at the University of Miami on Nov. 13, adding pointedly, "I think we all need to do what we can to work toward that end."

And when, at the Miami talk, ABC News reporter Jan Crawford Greenburg asked him how it felt to join the high court as its boss, Roberts gently corrected her. "The chief justice really doesn't have a lot of authority of the sort that would cause you to refer to him as a boss."

But Roberts is not losing sleep over this fact of Supreme Court life. Already steeped in the ways of the Court, Roberts knows that unlike a modern corporate executive who must produce quarterly gains, as a life-tenured chief justice, he can pace himself for the long haul.

E. Barrett Prettyman Jr., a longtime friend of Roberts, recalls that when Warren Burger became chief justice in 1969, he ruffled feathers and made enemies quickly by changing internal procedures and using -- some say abusing -- his power to assign opinions as a way to reward and punish colleagues.

"That isn't John," says Prettyman, who is of counsel at Hogan & Hartson, Roberts' former firm. "He may end up making the same changes, but they'll hardly notice it because he'll stretch it out over years."

A MEASURE OF CHANGE

Some small changes have already taken place. Oral arguments are more advocate-friendly, lawyers say. For example, Roberts has been more willing than Rehnquist was to spontaneously grant extra argument time to advocates when fairness seems to require it.

Even better, at least from the advocates' perspective, is that they are now able to get a few more words in edgewise before a justice asks a question.

According to a new study by University of Kansas professor Lawrence Wrightsman, the number of words advocates are able to speak before being interrupted by a justice has jumped nearly 50 percent under Roberts. That trend has been attributed to the retirement in January of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who was usually first with a question. But Wrightsman's numbers indicate the increase started even while O'Connor was on the bench. Wrightsman is the author of a new book, "The Psychology of the Supreme Court."

Perhaps the most visible change Roberts has wrought was the decision to release oral argument transcripts promptly on the same day that they occur. Scholars and journalists had asked for this change for years without success. But when Roberts arrived, the request made sense to him, and with the agreement of the Court, he ordered it done.

But bigger changes have proved more elusive. Like many veteran Supreme Court advocates, Roberts was a critic of the Court's "cert pool" arrangement, under which all the justices except Justice John Paul Stevens pool their clerks to summarize incoming petitions. The pool means that many petitions are scrutinized only by two clerks and no justices, causing concern that clerks have too much power.

In spite of his views, Roberts has joined the pool in both his terms on the Court -- though each time he has indicated that his decision covered only that term. Reforming the pool is an example of the kind of change that would rankle colleagues if Roberts were to undertake it too quickly, so he appears to be biding his time.

But the toughest nut so far for Roberts appears to be increasing the number of cases the Court reviews each term. During his confirmation hearing in September 2005, Roberts said the Court could help clarify the law by taking more cases -- closer to 100 per term, rather than the 75 to 80 it has ruled on in recent years. Instead, last term -- Roberts' first -- it ruled on even fewer cases, 69, and this term the number could sink even lower. The Court canceled an argument day in December, and on three out of the five argument days this coming February, only one case will be heard instead of the usual two.

Why the dearth of cases? Lawyers in the Solicitor General's Office and elsewhere reject one popular theory, namely that when the conservative Bush administration and the Court's like-minded members look out over the conservative appeals court landscape, they see fewer decisions that need fixing.

"I strongly disagree that this is the end of history, that there are no issues left to resolve," says Thomas Goldstein of Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld, a close student of the Court's docket. Goldstein points to several factors to explain the slowdown, including the possible reluctance of the Court's liberals to seek reviews of cases that, because of the new lineup, they might lose.

Goldstein also suggests that O'Connor's retirement may be a reason, noting that she "kept the Court abreast of the docket" in courts nationwide. With her gone, the Court may be more willing to let issues percolate longer without its intervention. (Goldstein writes a column for Legal Times.)

Roberts himself has not offered a theory publicly, but those who have spoken with him say he rejects the view that the Court is ducking major, festering issues.

Several justices have also said they have not seen many review-worthy petitions cross their desks recently. Of course, if enough justices express that view, which might not have been shared by O'Connor, it alone would provide an answer to the mystery: The vote of four justices is needed to review a case.

Roberts has brought in his own team to help administer the Court itself and to lead the federal judiciary: Jeff Minear as his administrative assistant at the Court, and James Duff to head the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts.

A PUBLIC PRESENCE

Roberts has become a ubiquitous ambassador for the Court, speaking to bar groups, broadcast interviewers and book authors at a brisker pace than his more reserved predecessor, Rehnquist. Roberts has held two press conferences and will be seen frequently on a PBS special on the Court airing in January. "He believes that it is good for the Court to have a chief justice who is not afraid of appearing in public," says Prettyman. "He goes everywhere." There are limits to this openness, however: Roberts is declining press interviews for now, a spokeswoman said when asked for comments for this story.

Inside the building, Court employees speak of "a breath of fresh air" and a less formal atmosphere. But even as staffers praise Roberts, they hesitate to do it openly, not wanting to imply criticism of the late Rehnquist, who was also popular.

How has the job changed Roberts personally? Friends say he has been struck with the gravity of the position and how much there is to do. In the ABC interview, Roberts joked that his new job has given him a good excuse when his wife, Jane, asks him to run household errands.

But Roberts has still been able to stay grounded and in touch with friends, says Prettyman, who offers poignant evidence. About six weeks ago, when Prettyman's wife, Maureen, was hospitalized in Washington, she was pleasantly surprised by an hourlong visit from Roberts, his wife and their two young children. "It did her so much good," says Prettyman. "It was the John Roberts we've always known."

Ailing Senator Exhibits Signs Of Improving (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0110277

WASHINGTON, Dec. 28 — Senator Tim Johnson of South Dakota marked his 60th birthday Thursday in the intensive care unit at George Washington University Hospital, where he remains in critical but stable condition two weeks after surgery to stop bleeding in his brain.

"Senator Johnson's overall general medical condition has improved, and he is gradually being weaned from the sedation," Vivek Deshmukh, the neurosurgeon who performed the operation, said in a statement released by Mr. Johnson's office. "He is opening his eyes and is responsive to his wife."

Mr. Johnson was joined on his birthday by his wife, Barbara, his daughter and one of his two sons. He is expected to undergo more testing in the next few days, and his office said it would release information afterward.

Mr. Johnson, a Democrat, began to stutter on Dec. 13 during his weekly conference call with reporters, but then recovered well enough to walk across the street from the Capitol to his office, his staff said. After being examined by the Capitol physician, he was taken by ambulance to the hospital and admitted with what the physician called the symptoms of a stroke.

His illness set off speculation that Democrats might lose the new, narrow majority they are expected to have in the Senate next month. South Dakota's governor, a Republican, would appoint a new senator to fill any vacancy, and Democrats worried that he might appoint a member of his own party.

But a senator is replaced only if he dies or steps down, according to Senate precedent, and senators have remained in office despite being absent because of illness for months or even years. If Mr. Johnson is unable to vote in January, Democrats are still expected to hold a 50-to-49 majority.

Mr. Johnson's doctors said the bleeding was the result of a rare congenital tangling of the blood vessels in the brain, known as an arteriovenous malformation. The surgery, performed about 12 hours after his first apparent symptoms, stopped the bleeding, doctors said, and relieved the pressure on his brain.

Doctors said after the surgery that Mr. Johnson would remain in the hospital until the swelling in his brain, which they described as normal after such an operation, receded. They have said that he is expected to undergo physical therapy to address weakness in his right side.

Sen. Johnson Improves, Is Expected To Miss Start Of Congress (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) turned 60 yesterday, two weeks after emergency surgery to repair a brain hemorrhage that has left him in critical condition.

Julianne Fisher, a spokeswoman for the senator, said Johnson will not be present in the first days of the new Congress next week but is continuing to improve. She said he is responsive to directions from his wife but has not yet spoken.

It is too soon to tell how long recovery will take, Fisher said.

In a statement yesterday, Johnson's doctors said he remains in intensive care at George Washington University Hospital. They have released few new details about Johnson's condition and prognosis since the days after the Dec. 13 surgery to stop bleeding in his brain.

Vivek Deshmukh, head of Johnson's surgical team, said in a statement that the senator's overall condition has improved and that he is gradually being weaned off sedation to help his brain heal.

Johnson's wife, Barbara, said that her husband "continues to give us great hope" and that two of the couple's three grown children were at the hospital on his birthday.

Johnson was diagnosed with arteriovenous malformation, a condition that causes arteries and veins to grow abnormally large, become tangled and sometimes burst. He was rushed to the hospital after becoming disoriented during a call with reporters.

His illness raised questions about the Democrats' one-vote majority in the upcoming Senate session. Should Johnson's seat become vacant, South Dakota Gov. Mike Rounds, a Republican, could replace him with a Republican.

A Republican appointee would create a 50-50 tie and effectively allow the GOP to retain Senate control because of Vice President Cheney's tie-breaking vote. But there is precedent for senators to continue to hold office while incapacitated.

When Nature Calls, Women In House Hike (DENP)

By Margaret Talev McClatchy

Denver Post, December 29, 2006

Washington - When nature calls during a debate or vote in the House of Representatives, what's a member of Congress to do? The answer, even as the first female speaker of the House prepares to be sworn in next month, depends on gender.

The members-only House men's room, with its shoeshine stand, fireplace and television tuned to floor proceedings, is nestled a few paces from the House chamber, beside the speaker's lounge, flanked by Capitol police. How convenient.

DOJ_NMG_0110278

Reaching the women's equivalent entails traversing a hall where tourists gather, or entering the minority leader's office, navigating a corridor that winds past secretarial desks and punching in a keypad code to ensure restricted access.

When Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., takes the gavel, she may revisit, along with the Iraq war and raising the minimum wage, the question of potty parity.

Starting in January, the 435- member House will have a record 71 women. (The 100- member Senate will have 16 women, also a record.) Asked whether female House members should also get a loo off the chamber, Pelosi said, "I'm all for it - let's find a spot." Mischievously, she said she's eyeing the men's room just steps from the chamber, "but the gentlemen, they just won't get out of there."

There are arguably more pressing matters for Congress when it returns to a pivotal wartime session and Democratic control for the first time in a dozen years.

"We've got a lot of other problems ahead of this, starting with the minimum wage, health care, education," said Rep. Carolyn Maloney, D-N.Y., who'll be vice chairwoman of the Joint Economic Committee.

But the very mention of rest room access is a reminder of the institution's male-dominated legacy, and it stirs lingering sensitivities.

At least one incoming female freshman representative may take up the cause.

Rep.-elect Yvette Clarke, a Democratic New York City councilwoman, was lead sponsor of that city's Women's Restroom Equity Bill, signed into law in 2005. It requires a 2-to-1 ratio for women's bathrooms to men's in new construction and major building renovations.

Clarke said she wouldn't try to impose such mandates on historic structures like the Capitol. But she thinks women should have at least one toilet off the House chamber, rather than having to run down the hall.

Rep. Marsha Blackburn, R-Tenn., said women "are adaptable; it's a balancing act." She paces herself when she knows she'll be on the House floor for long stretches. In case of emergency, she said, "I'm a runner."

Rep. Alcee Hastings, D-Fla., said that perhaps Pelosi could partition the men's restroom to make room for women.

That's what happened with the members-only restroom off the Senate chamber after the 1992 elections, when female representation shot from two to seven, said Senate associate historian Donald A. Ritchie. Previously, female senators went up one floor or to their offices, or used public restrooms.

US '07 Economic Outlook: Slow Growth, No Recession (CSM)

By Ron Scherer
The Christian Science Monitor, December 29, 2006
NEW YORK
It looks as if it will be an uphill climb for the economy next year.

Growth could be the slowest in the past five years. The unemployment rate, already at a low level, is likely to rise. Business, which has been on a spending spree, is expected to cut back somewhat. The consumer, the bulwark of the economy, may not be spending quite as freely.

Despite this economic slo-mo, most economists expect a recession-free 2007, the sixth consecutive year without a downturn.

"There are risks ahead, but the basics look reasonably good," says Robert Hormats, vice chairman of Goldman Sachs International. "Many people thought the sharp weakening in housing would have a more crushing effect on the economy, but mercifully it hasn't."

Managing the slower economy will be a challenge for the Federal Reserve. It will have less leeway for mistakes. At the moment, many economists are anticipating that the Fed will cut interest rates starting in the spring.

"We are anticipating the Fed will make two cuts starting in March," says Jason Schenker, an economist at Wachovia Corporation in Charlotte, N.C. "The Fed will be under a lot of pressure to hit the cut button."

Exactly how much the economy slows - and when - is still a matter of dispute among economists. "There is a real tug of war over the outlook," says Robert Brusca of Fact and Opinion Economics in New York. "A lot of indicators are moving in different directions, so it's not surprising there is a lot of discord in the outlook."

On the negative side are a small group of economists who still think the economy will sputter into a recession next year. A member of the recession contingent is Hugh Moore, a partner at Guerite Advisors in Greenville, S.C.

He is focusing on a number of quantitative economic statistics, which he believes are signaling negative growth ahead. "We don't think it's dire, we don't think the economy will crumble," he says. "But we think the decline in housing construction and the reduction in home equity withdrawals [borrowing against a home's increased value] will be enough to put the economy into a recession in the second half of 2007."

Others think the economy will just barely get by without a downturn. Wachovia, for example, expects the nation's gross domestic product (GDP) will grow only 1.9 percent next year. The bank predicts the unemployment rate will rise from 4.5 percent to 5 percent.

Mr. Brusca thinks the weakness is short term. He sees the economy scraping by and building momentum by year-end. "By this time next year it will feel like a year of improvement," he says.

However, one sector that does not expect to see much improvement is manufacturing. Over the past two years, the sector has grown faster than the economy as a whole, says Dave Huether, chief economist at the National Association of Manufacturers in Washington. But in 2007, he expects manufacturing to grow 2.8 percent compared with 4.5 percent this year. "That's a significant slowdown," he says.

The sector's problems would be eased quite a bit by a strong end to this year's holiday season, says Brusca, who points to excess inventories at the nation's manufacturers. "If the consumer shows up, the problems fade away. If not, it's harder to get rid of the inventory," he says.

However, some consumers will be in for a rude shock, says David Kotok, of Cumberland Advisors in Vineland, N.J. Some $1 trillion in low-interest mortgages will reset at a higher interest rate in 2007 and another $1 trillion in 2008. "About 4 million to 5 million households will be negatively impacted," he estimates. "This is mainly people in the lower and middle class, the Wal-Mart shopper, not the Tiffany shopper."

In 2006, there was also a large uptick in interest costs for some borrowers. But the higher costs were partly offset by lower energy costs.

Economists say higher energy costs next year would pose a risk to the economy. Economist Mark Zandi of Moody's Economy.com estimates the gap between global production and global demand is only 1.5 million barrels of oil per day. "With such a thin cushion, any substantial geopolitical or weather event could send prices spiraling higher," he writes in an analysis.

In the past, the economy absorbed higher energy prices without much damage. However, Mr. Zandi thinks the next oil price spike could be more difficult to digest. Instead of prices rising because of demand, he cautions they could rise because of shortages of supply "with very different economic implications."

One of the implications, he says, would be inflationary as business passes higher costs on to the consumer. "It is the combination of higher energy prices and interest rates that has undermined past economic expansions," he concludes.

However, even on the future price of oil there is disagreement. Wachovia, for example, expects the price of oil to average $60 a barrel or about where the price is currently. "Falling prices are predicated on OPEC keeping a tight rein on production," says Mr. Schenker. With oil prices at these levels, speculators will shift their attention elsewhere, easing the volatility in prices, he adds.

Home Sales Bode Well For Big Picture (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, December 29, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Sales of existing homes rose for the second consecutive month in November, a sign of rebounding demand that suggests the economic fallout from the housing market's slump will be limited next year.

The National Association of Realtors said sales of existing homes last month increased 0.6% from October to an annual rate of 6.28 million units, down 10.7% from a year earlier. Spurred by lower interest rates and home prices, sales have now increased in back-to-back months for the first time in more than a year.

Together with a recent upturn in the rate of new-home sales, the modest rise in existing-home sales indicates that home-buying activity may be stabilizing after a yearlong downturn. (See related article.1)

"The change was small, but the results were encouraging nonetheless because they suggested activity is beginning to form a bottom" said Michael Moran, chief economist at Daiwa Securities America Inc.

If the housing slump is indeed bottoming out and starts to reverse itself in the months ahead, it would gradually lift a great weight off the broader economy. Housing-related industries have been shedding thousands of jobs in recent months, and builders have been forced to scale back construction to match waning demand. That has been a major factor behind the slowing economy this year, and many economists say growth -- now running at an inflation-adjusted annual rate of about 2.0% -- won't fully bounce back until the housing correction has run its course.

Of course, it is far from certain that the housing slump is over. Inventories of unsold homes remained large in November, with a 7.3-month supply on the market at current sales rates, according to NAR data, up from a five-month supply a year earlier. That suggests builders will continue to cut production until supply is better aligned with demand. In the meantime, large inventories will continue to put downward pressure on prices.

Last month's median home price -- the price at which half of homes sold for more and half sold for less -- was down 3.1% from a year earlier. November was the fourth month in a row that median home prices were down from a year earlier. NAR President Pat Vredevoogd Combs described current conditions as a "window for buyers" to re-enter the market.

Additional support for a rebound is coming from the competitive labor market, which is producing solid wage gains and lifting consumer sentiment. Yesterday, the Conference Board, a private research group in New York, said its gauge of consumer confidence rose to 109 in December from 105.3 in November.

As with the recent data on housing, which generated more relief than enthusiasm among economists, the improved sentiment reading was due more to a moderation in pessimism than any surge in optimism. Indeed, the proportion of those surveyed who said economic conditions are "good" fell slightly to 27.2% this month from 27.5% in November, but that was more than offset by a sharper decline -- to 14.6% from 16.2% in November -- in the number who said the climate is "bad."

More than anything, the data suggest the nation's economy will be able to maintain its current pace of slow-to-moderate growth as the housing imbalance is corrected. "There's nothing signaling a severe downturn or a severe upturn," said Lynn Franco, who oversees the Conference Board survey.

Meanwhile, the number of people filing initial claims for unemployment benefits rose slightly, to 317,000 last week from 316,000 the week before. The figures point to steady job growth.

Existing-home Sales Edge Higher In US (FT)

By Doug Cameron

Financial Times, December 29, 2006

Sales of existing US homes rose slightly in November, though activity in the crucial southern market remained depressed in a sign that the nationwide market has yet to reach its nadir.

The National Association of Realtors said on Thursday that sales of all existing homes rose 0.6 per cent in November – the second consecutive monthly rise – with median prices dipping slightly and the inventory of unsold properties also dropping 1 per cent from recent highs.

The data follow a small rise in sales of new homes during November suggesting that falling prices and rising incentives are tempting buyers back to the market, eroding what homebuilding executives view as the “bad psychology” affecting the business.

However, most of the rise in existing-home business was driven by sales in the north-east, and volumes continued to fall in the south of the country, which accounted for 38 per cent of nationwide transactions in 2005.

The south and west of the US also account for three-quarters of new-home sales, and analysts remain concerned about the pace of building in the two regions, despite signals from homebuilders that they were cutting construction following the exit of speculative buyers from the market.

Most of the large homebuilders believe the excess inventory will not be cleared until the second half of next year, paving the way for a recovery in the broader market in 2008.

The NAR was more bullish in its assessment of the housing market, which is being closely monitored by policymakers because of its potential spillover into a slowing US economy.

The association suggested the November data provide evidence of “a turn in the market”, with lower median prices driving a gradual rise in sales in 2007.

“It looks like we may have reached the low point of the current cycle in September,” said David Lereah, NAR chief economist, in a statement accompanying the November data.

However, falling mortgage applications and the slight rise in new-home sales last month have left other analysts more cautious.

Gregory Gieber at AG Edwards said in a report that the new-home statistics were “uninspiring” and fell “well short of “significantly reducing the industry’s current inventory overhang”.

The supply of new homes still remains above six months, at current sales rates, while the existing-home inventory dipped to 7.3 months in November from 7.4 months the previous month, well above the five-month level a year ago. The supply of condominiums and multi-family homes still remains above nine months.

Ohio Ruling Denying Pay In Job Injury Draws Debate (NYT)

By Bob Driehaus

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

COLUMBUS, Ohio, Dec. 28 — The Ohio Supreme Court has upheld a KFC franchise’s petition to deny workers’ compensation payments to a teenage boy who was severely burned while cleaning a pressure cooker, raising questions from lawyers and the dissenting judges about the basic no-fault tenet of the state’s workers’ compensation.

The majority in the 5-to-2 decision on Wednesday accepted the argument by the restaurant owner that the boy, David M. Gross, then 16, had voluntarily abandoned his job when he ignored repeated warnings not to boil water in the cooker to clean it. That meant he was not entitled to workers’ compensation payments because he no longer had a job when he was injured, the ruling said.

“This is the worst decision I’ve seen since I’ve been practicing law,” said Philip J. Fulton, a workers’ compensation lawyer and past president of the Ohio Academy of Trial Lawyers. “It changes the whole substance of what workers’ compensation is supposed to be.”

DOJ_NMG_0110283

Mr. Gross was working at a Dayton-area KFC on Nov. 26, 2003, when boiling water spewed from a pressure cooker and caused third-degree burns around his hip and groin and second-degree burns on his arms, torso and back. Two co-workers were also burned.

A company investigation found that Mr. Gross had ignored warnings in the employee handbook and on the cooker as well as repeated warnings by two co-workers and a supervisor.

Mr. Gross's disability payments were canceled after the restaurant fired him in February 2004 and successfully argued before the Industrial Commission of Ohio that Mr. Gross had abandoned his job by flouting the safety rules.

He is now able to work at a construction job, said his mother, Angelia Dussia.

The Supreme Court majority said Mr. Gross had violated his employment agreement and forfeited his job by ignoring safety instructions: "Gross willfully ignored repeated warnings not to engage in the proscribed conduct, yet still wishes to ascribe his behavior to simple negligence or inadvertence," the court wrote.

Edna Scheuer, the lawyer for the restaurant's owner, Food, Folks and Fun, said Thursday that the ruling applied to a very narrow set of circumstances and sought to deny only Mr. Gross's disability claim, which would have paid him 72 percent of his wages for the first three months and then two-thirds of his wages until he recovered.

"I don't think the ruling rested solely on Mr. Gross's fault," she said. She said she thought the court would have ruled differently if the employer had not provided a written warning on that specific safety violation.

But Mr. Fulton predicted that the decision would embolden employers to try to challenge claims by making any unsafe practice punishable by instant termination.

In a dissent, Justice Evelyn Lundberg Stratton expressed concern that the ruling represented a slippery slope. "Should the employee's fault preclude his receiving temporary total disability? The answer to this question is no. Our workers' compensation laws do not permit the introduction of fault," she wrote.

James J. Brudney, an Ohio State University law professor and labor expert, said the decision could upset a balance struck by workers' compensation laws, which offer workers payments without assessing blame and generally preclude an injured worker from suing his employer.

Gary Plunkett, a lawyer representing Mr. Gross, envisions a situation in which a truck driver injured in an accident is denied benefits because he was driving nominally faster than the speed limit in violation of company safety rules.

Ty Pine, who heads the Ohio chapter of the National Federation of Independent Business, disagreed with the notion that the ruling was a major shift. "We think it is an appropriate decision that keeps intact the integrity of the system," Mr. Pine said. "The court sent a clear message that safety is very important in the workplace."

He added, "It will be in those limited areas where an employee knowingly, flagrantly disobeys orders that claims will be challenged."

Ford, Nixon Sustained Friendship For Decades (WP)

By Bob Woodward

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

Months before Richard M. Nixon set a relatively unknown Michigan congressman named Gerald R. Ford on the path to the White House, Nixon turned to Ford, who called himself the embattled president's "only real friend," to get him out of trouble.

During one of the darkest days of the Watergate scandal, Nixon secretly confided in Ford, at the time the House minority leader. He begged for help. He complained about fair-weather friends and swore at perceived rivals in his own party. "Tell the guys, goddamn it, to get off their ass and start fighting back," Nixon pleaded with Ford in one call recorded by the president's secret taping system.

And Ford did. "Anytime you want me to do anything, under any circumstances, you give me a call, Mr. President," he told Nixon during that May 1, 1973, conversation. "We'll stand by you morning, noon and night."

This and other previously unpublished transcripts of their calls, documents and personal letters provide a portrait of an intensely personal friendship dating to the late 1940s but so hidden that few others were even aware of it. Until now, the relationship between the two presidents has been portrayed largely as a matter of political necessity, with Nixon tapping Ford for the vice presidency in late 1973 because he was a confirmable choice on Capitol Hill.

But the tapes, documents and two lengthy recent interviews with Ford before his death this week, conducted for a future book and embargoed until after his death, show that the close political alliance between the two men seriously influenced Ford's eventual decision to pardon Nixon, the most momentous decision of his short presidency and almost certainly the one that cost him any chance of winning the White House in his own right two years later. Ford became president on Aug. 9, 1974; he pardoned Nixon just a month later. "I think that Nixon felt I was about the only person he could really trust on the Hill," Ford said during the 2005 interview.

Ford returned the feeling.

"I looked upon him as my personal friend. And I always treasured our relationship. And I had no hesitancy about granting the pardon, because I felt that we had this relationship and that I didn't want to see my real friend have the stigma," Ford said in the interview.

That acknowledgment represents a significant shift from Ford's previous portrayals of the pardon that absolved Nixon of any Watergate-related crimes. In earlier statements, Ford had emphasized the decision as an effort to move the country beyond the partisan divisions of the Watergate era, playing down the personal dimension.

A key window into their close friendship and political alliance was that May 1973 call. It was the day after Nixon had gone on national television to announce the resignations of his two top aides, H.R. "Bob" Haldeman and John D. Ehrlichman, and the Watergate coverup was unraveling. The president knew it and was eager for Ford's reassurance that his political situation on Capitol Hill was not as grave as it seemed.

"You've got a hell of a lot of friends up here," Ford told him, "both Republican and Democrat, and don't worry about anybody being sunshine soldiers or summer patriots."

"Well, never Jerry Ford," Nixon replied. "But if you could get a few congressmen and senators to speak up and say a word, for Christ's sakes."

Ford was played a copy of that tape in 2005. Although the existence of Nixon's secret taping system had been publicly disclosed in 1973, no such tapes of Ford had come to public attention, and the former president seemed stunned. "I remember vividly that," he said, recalling how Nixon often turned to him to get things done on the Hill. He added that he considered himself to be Nixon's "only real friend."

At times, their friendship was the gossipy sort, as two longtime politicians sorted through the Washington rumor mill. They were so comfortable with each other that they openly traded nasty personal assessments of others.

On April 6, 1971, for example, Nixon called Ford to find out what was going on with House Majority Leader Hale Boggs (D-La.). Boggs had just taken to the House floor alleging that FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover was regularly wiretapping members of Congress, and Nixon wanted to know why Boggs was going public.

"He's nuts," Ford told Nixon in the call picked up by Nixon's secret taping.

"He's on the sauce," Nixon said, suggesting the majority leader was drinking. "Isn't that it?"

"Well, I'm afraid that's right, Mr. President."

"Or is he crazy?" Nixon asked.

"Well, he's either drinking too much or he's taking some pills that are upsetting him mentally," Ford replied.

In their personal correspondence, extending over decades, the two men conveyed a sense of personal bond that went beyond public niceties, demonstrated in dozens of letters in Ford's confidential files that he allowed a reporter to review and copy.

Two months before Nixon resigned, he sent Ford, by then his vice president, a personal thank-you. "Dear Jerry," he wrote on June 8, 1974, "this is just a note to tell you how much I appreciated your superb and courageous support over the past difficult months. How much easier it would be for you to pander to the press and others who desperately are trying to drive a wedge between the president and vice president. It's tough going now, but history will I am sure record you as one of the most capable, courageous and honorable vice presidents we have had."

Their friendly notes to each other continued until not long before Nixon's death in 1994. In 1978, for example, Nixon wrote to buck up Ford after Ford's former press secretary wrote a tell-all memoir, "It Sure Looks Different From the Inside," in which he gave details of Betty Ford's addiction to alcohol and various medications. "Dear Jerry, I thought Ron Nessen's comments on Betty were contemptible. Tell Betty her many friends won't believe him and for her few enemies -- The hell with them. Sincerely, Dick."

And in a handwritten letter on his personal stationery on June 1, 1990, Nixon wrote Ford urging him to attend the dedication of the Nixon library along with then-President George H.W. Bush and former president Ronald Reagan. Once Ford came, Nixon followed up with another note: "Our friendship goes back further than all the others and the event would not have been complete without you."

On June 28, 1993, Nixon wrote Ford again, this time thanking him for attending the funeral of Nixon's wife, Pat.

"As you undoubtedly noted, the emotion had caught up with me by the time we met after the services, and I did not adequately express my thanks to you then," Nixon wrote.

Then he turned back decades, to their own long friendship and a small gesture by Ford he had carried with him, not as momentous as the pardon that would come later but still vivid 31 years after it happened.

DOJ_NMG_0110285

"One action of yours for which I will always be grateful was your going on a TV program when ABC had the bad manners to put Alger Hiss on to nail my coffin shut after my defeat for governor of California," Nixon wrote, remembering the sting of his 1962 loss.

"I have often said that when you win, you hear from everyone -- when you lose, you hear from your friends," he wrote. "You have always measured up in that respect, and I shall always be grateful."

For Ford, Pardon Decision Was Always Clear-Cut (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 28 — President Gerald R. Ford was never one for second-guessing, but for many years after leaving office in 1977, he carried in his wallet a scrap of a 1915 Supreme Court ruling. A pardon, the excerpt said, "carries an imputation of guilt," and acceptance of a pardon is "a confession of it."

Mr. Ford's decision to pardon Richard M. Nixon for any crimes he might have been charged with because of Watergate is seen by many historians as the central event of his 896-day presidency. It also appears to have left him with an uncharacteristic need for self-justification, though friends say he never wavered in his insistence that the pardon was a wise and necessary act and that it had not resulted from any secret deal with his disgraced predecessor.

"I must have talked to him 20 times about the pardon, and there was never a shred of doubt that he'd done the right thing," said James Cannon, a Ford domestic policy adviser and author of a 1994 book about his presidency. During one of their discussions, Mr. Ford pulled out the 1915 clipping, from Burdick v. United States. "It was a comfort to him," Mr. Cannon said. "It was legal justification that he was right."

Over the last three decades, as emotions have cooled, many who were initially critical of the pardon have come to share Mr. Ford's judgment that it was the best way to stanch the open wound of Watergate. In 2001, a bipartisan panel selected Mr. Ford as recipient of the Profile in Courage Award from the John F. Kennedy Library, singling out for praise his pardon decision, which Mr. Ford later said he believed was a major factor in his failure to win election to the presidency in 1976.

In a 2004 interview with Bob Woodward, reported Thursday night on The Washington Post's Web site, Mr. Ford offered another, less lofty motive for the pardon: his friendship with Nixon, which lasted for two decades after the pardon and which letters show was closer than publicly understood.

"I had no hesitancy about granting the pardon," Mr. Ford told Mr. Woodward, "because I felt that we had this relationship and that I didn't want to see my real friend have the stigma."

Few dramas in American political history remain more riveting than that of Nixon's exit and Mr. Ford's reaction, at first halting and then decisive, to the looming possibility of a former president on criminal trial for months on end.

"At the time, I thought this was going to cause a problem with the public and the press, and of course it did," said Robert T. Hartmann, a former Ford aide. "I thought he was right. But it's also important to be seen as right and remembered in history as having done the right thing."

Since the Ford years, the tradeoff between exacting justice and political peace has repeatedly arisen around the world, as Chile, East Germany, South Africa and other countries have confronted dark periods in their histories. The crimes have been bloodier and their scale far greater than those of Watergate, but the question has echoed the one posed to the Ford White House in 1974.

The contradictions posed by the pardon were evident when Mr. Ford announced it on Sept. 8, 1974. "I deeply believe in equal justice for all Americans, whatever their station or former station," Mr. Ford said. A moment later he made clear that Nixon would not face equal justice.

"My conscience tells me clearly and certainly that I cannot prolong the bad dreams that continue to reopen a chapter that is closed," he said, though the major Watergate trials for Nixon aides were still weeks away. In the resulting firestorm, many Americans asked why, in return for a pardon, Mr. Ford had not at least demanded an admission of wrongdoing from Nixon.

The pardon drama had begun six weeks earlier, with a visit to then-Vice President Ford from Alexander M. Haig, Nixon's chief of staff.

Mr. Haig told Mr. Ford that White House tapes would soon prove Nixon's role in the Watergate cover-up and outlined several possibilities for Nixon's departure. He handed Mr. Ford two pieces of paper: a description of the presidential power to pardon and a blank pardon form.

Mr. Ford later said he had given no definitive answer. But when he described the meeting to his aides, they were alarmed at the implication: that Nixon, through Mr. Haig, might be offering Mr. Ford the presidency in return for a pardon.

"We didn't want a situation where he'd agreed to a pardon and there would be an appearance of a quid pro quo," said John O. Marsh, a former Virginia congressman who had become a top aide to Mr. Ford.

DOJ_NMG_0110286

Mr. Haig has often denied that he was making any kind of a "sleazy approach," as he put it in an appearance on CNN on Wednesday night. "You know, the president never, never was offered a deal."

Mr. Ford, too, in his memoir and in interviews, said he did not believe that Mr. Haig had explicitly offered a trade of the presidency for a pardon. But his aides feared the meeting would be viewed that way.

"There was a strong naïve streak in Jerry Ford," Mr. Cannon said. "He didn't always see the danger in things." Mr. Ford later told him that he had destroyed the two papers Mr. Haig had given him, Mr. Cannon said.

Nixon resigned a week after Mr. Haig's visit, and Mr. Ford was sworn in as president on Aug. 9. An accumulation of policy troubles confronted the president, Mr. Marsh recalled.

"We were coming out of the Arab oil embargo," Mr. Marsh said. "The economy was going sour. We were in the wind-down of the Vietnam war, and that was a bad situation." Meanwhile, he said, "Watergate was affecting everything."

At his first news conference, on Aug. 28, reporters pressed Mr. Ford on Nixon's fate, and his answers were ambiguous. Until any charges were filed against Nixon, he said, "I think it is unwise and untimely for me to make any commitment."

Afterward, Mr. Ford was angry that he had not prepared better for Nixon questions, Mr. Cannon said.

"He felt he'd bungled it royally," Mr. Cannon added. "He told me he just sat there fuming for two days, and then he decided on the pardon."

In the office of Leon Jaworski, the Watergate special prosecutor, news of the pardon divided the staff, said Richard J. Davis, then a 28-year-old assistant to Mr. Jaworski who had written legal memorandums outlining the criminal case against Nixon for obstruction of justice.

"Some people were furious," Mr. Davis said Thursday. "But I was very torn." If Nixon were to face charges, "we would have been living with Watergate every day for two or three more years," he said.

What upset Mr. Davis and some colleagues even more than the pardon, he said, was Mr. Ford's agreement to turn over the White House tapes and other documents to Nixon, appearing to extend the cover-up. The decision was reversed in December 1974, when Mr. Ford signed a law assuring government control over Watergate-related materials.

By then, Mr. Ford had visited the House, where he had served for 25 years, to defend the pardon. His toughest questioner was Elizabeth Holtzman, 31, a New York congresswoman, whose turn to question the president came last. The pardon, she said, created "very dark suspicions" that "made people question whether or not in fact there was a deal."

Mr. Ford cut off her question, declaring, "There was no deal, period, under no circumstances."

In an interview Thursday, Ms. Holtzman acknowledged the public affection being expressed for Mr. Ford, but she declined to join the chorus of praise for the pardon.

"I felt it set up a dual standard of justice, one for the president, and one for everyone else," Ms. Holtzman said. "I haven't changed my view."

Despite his experience with others second-guessing him, Mr. Ford offered a critique of President Bush's invasion of Iraq in an interview in May with Thomas M. DeFrank of the Daily News and the one in July 2004 with Mr. Woodward of The Washington Post.

He included in his criticism Vice President Dick Cheney and former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, both of whom had served him as chief of staff.

"Rumsfeld and Cheney and the president made a big mistake in justifying going into the war in Iraq," Mr. Ford said, The Post reported Thursday. "They put the emphasis on weapons of mass destruction. And now, I've never publicly said I thought they made a mistake, but I felt very strongly it was an error in how they should justify what they were going to do."

President Declares Tuesday A National Day Of Mourning (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz And Lyndsey Layton

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

CRAWFORD, Tex., Dec. 28 -- President Bush declared a national day of mourning and ordered the federal government to close Tuesday to mark the death of Gerald R. Ford. Financial markets will be partially closed in observation of his passing as well.

Bush opted not to cut short a week-long stay at his ranch here to return for Saturday night's ceremony, when Ford's body will be brought to the Rotunda of the U.S. Capitol. But Bush and first lady Laura Bush will head immediately to the Capitol upon their return to Andrews Air Force Base on Monday to pay respects at the casket.

Bush will also deliver remarks at Ford's funeral service at the Washington National Cathedral on Tuesday, the White House announced. Spokesman Scott Stanzel said Vice President Cheney, a former Ford White House chief of staff, will speak Saturday at the Capitol ceremony.

Stanzel refused to be drawn into a discussion of whether the president considered abridging his time in Crawford.

DOJ_NMG_0110287

The president "will look forward on Monday and Tuesday to honoring the life of President Ford," Stanzel said. He noted that Bush's participation will mirror his involvement in Ronald Reagan's funeral in June 2004 and added that the president offered the Ford family one of the executive jets normally used as Air Force One.

Bush will not be the only major political figure to miss the Saturday ceremony. Most of the Democratic leaders, who take over Congress next Thursday, will be absent. Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) will not be at the Capitol on Saturday but will attend the cathedral service Tuesday, her office said. Incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) and Majority Whip Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.) are traveling in Latin America, along with Republican Sens. Judd Gregg (N.H.) and Robert F. Bennett (Utah), and are not due back until Tuesday evening, meaning they will miss all the Ford events.

House Majority Leader-elect Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) will be on hand to greet Ford's body on Saturday, as will most leading Republicans, including outgoing House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (Ill.), incoming House Minority Leader John A. Boehner (Ohio), incoming House Minority Whip Roy Blunt (Mo.) and incoming Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (Ky.), according to aides.

Bush has offered words of praise for Ford since his death on Tuesday, but the president had reason to be unhappy with sentiments expressed by the 38th president and published Thursday in The Washington Post. In an interview with The Post's Bob Woodward in 2004, Ford said Bush and his team "made a mistake" in how they justified the Iraq war and said he would not have ordered the 2003 invasion, which toppled Saddam Hussein and has led to more than 3 1/2 years of warfare.

Ford gave the interview on the condition that his remarks not be reported until after his death. The White House made no comment on the former president's criticism.

A Subdued Ford Funeral (WT/AP)

By Calvin Woodward

The Washington Times, December 29, 2006

Gerald R. Ford's state funeral is missing some of grandeur of the one for Ronald Reagan two years ago, a reflection of the 38th president's modest ways and lesser imprint on the nation, according to further planning details released yesterday.

Part of it will be missing President Bush, too. The president will not attend Mr. Ford's state funeral in the Rotunda tomorrow night but will return to Washington from his Texas ranch on Monday. Mr. Bush will pay respects to Mr. Ford while his remains lie in state at the Capitol and speak Tuesday at services for Mr. Ford at the National Cathedral.

Mr. Bush yesterday declared Tuesday as a national day of mourning for Mr. Ford.

"I call on the American people to assemble on that day in their respective places of worship, there to pay homage to the memory of President Ford," he said in a proclamation he issued from Crawford, Texas. "I invite the people of the world who share our grief to join us in this solemn observance."

In a separate executive order, Mr. Bush ordered the closure Tuesday of federal departments and other governmental agencies not connected with the national security or defense of the nation or essential to public business -- as a mark of respect for Mr. Ford.

Also yesterday, the Nasdaq Stock Market said it would observe the national day of mourning by closing for Tuesday's Washington funeral. The New York Stock Exchange is expected to do the same.

If some of the funeral formalities are toned down, Mr. Ford's goodbye is packed with events tied to the touchstones of his life.

A prayer service and public viewing today in Palm Desert, Calif., near Mr. Ford's retirement haven for 30 years, begins a five-day chain of ceremonies that includes two funeral services in Washington; yet another, in Grand Rapids, Mich., adopted hometown of the Nebraska native, and additional commemorations in the Capitol.

Readying itself in a hurry, the nation's capital prepared to receive Mr. Ford's remains and honor the memory of the congressional veteran who achieved the highest office after being appointed vice president in 1973 by President Nixon, who resigned in 1974.

The convergence of foreign and U.S. dignitaries, the large public presence, and the national symbolism all marked the ceremonies as a potential target for terrorism, prompting the government to designate the funeral a special security event. That expedites a range of extraordinary measures overseen by the Secret Service.

Even so, some of the most regal touches of a state funeral -- those most burned in the consciousness of Americans old enough to remember the clicking hooves and the faces of grief of John F. Kennedy's funeral procession -- are being bypassed, by request of his family and, most likely, according to Mr. Ford's own wishes.

Although the family has kept the former president's final days private, his pastor at St. Margaret's Episcopal Church, the Rev. Robert Certain, shared some details yesterday. All four of Mr. Ford's children made a pilgrimage to their parents' California home to say goodbye, the pastor said.

Betty Ford, the former president's wife of 58 years, and the couple's three sons -- Michael, John and Steven -- were at his bedside when he died Tuesday at 93, Mr. Certain said. The couple's daughter, Susan, had returned to Albuquerque, N.M., the day before Christmas to spend the holiday with her family.

"I think he deliberately held on until Christmas was over," said Mr. Certain, who said he last saw Mr. Ford Dec. 16 when he went to the family's home for a Communion service. "He didn't want to spoil anyone's holiday."

Memorials For Ford Will Span The Country (USAT)

By Martin Kasindorf

USA Today, December 29, 2006

LOS ANGELES — The nation today begins six days of farewells to President Gerald Ford in state funeral ceremonies stretching from the California desert to the U.S. Capitol and a Michigan hillside.

Ford, the 38th president and the longest-lived former president, died Tuesday at age 93 at his home in Rancho Mirage, Calif.

Observances are scheduled to begin with a private prayer ceremony for the Ford family at St. Margaret's Episcopal Church in Palm Desert, Calif., where Ford and his wife, Betty, worshiped together for 29 years. From 4 p.m. today to 8 a.m. Saturday, the public is to be admitted to view the closed casket.

A military plane will fly Ford's remains Saturday to Andrews Air Force Base, Md. At dusk, a hearse will transport the casket in a motorcade to the Capitol, pausing at the National World War II Memorial to honor Ford's wartime service. After a funeral in the Capitol Rotunda, Ford will lie in state there through Monday night. The National Park Service says the public can expect to wait for up to six hours.

Ford's body will be taken to Washington National Cathedral for services Tuesday. The U.S. Army Military District of Washington says that "at family request" the flag-draped casket will travel in a hearse, not on the artillery caisson that carried presidents Ronald Reagan in 2004, Lyndon Johnson in 1973, Dwight Eisenhower in 1969 and John Kennedy in 1963.

The casket will go from the cathedral later Tuesday to the Ford presidential museum in Grand Rapids, Mich. The body will lie in public repose through the night. Funeral services Wednesday will be followed by interment at a hillside site at the museum.

Meanwhile, The Washington Post reported online late Thursday that interviews with Ford revealed a friendship with Richard Nixon that influenced Ford to pardon Nixon. "I had no hesitancy, … I didn't want to see my real friend have the stigma," Ford said.

The Post and the New York Daily News on Thursday released interviews that Ford granted on condition that they not be released until after his death. In them, he criticized the Bush administration for citing weapons of mass destruction in Iraq as the justification for the invasion in 2003.

Fenty Postpones Inaugural Festivities (WP)

By Elissa Silverman

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

D.C. Mayor-elect Adrian M. Fenty decided yesterday to postpone his inaugural celebrations, including a party that was expected to draw up to 15,000 people, because Tuesday has been declared a national day of mourning for former president Gerald R. Ford.

Fenty will still become mayor that day, taking the oath and succeeding Anthony A. Williams in a private ceremony. But he pushed back a public inauguration for himself and the D.C. Council until Wednesday and reset his inaugural ball for Jan. 6.

"We're really humbled and honored to have the opportunity to do something to help honor and recognize the service of former president Gerald Ford," said Fenty (D), who plans to attend the service Tuesday morning at Washington National Cathedral.

President Bush issued a proclamation making Tuesday a day of mourning for the 38th president. He also ordered that federal offices be closed that day in honor of Ford, who died at his California home Tuesday night at age 93.

Ford's body will arrive in Washington tomorrow, and officials yesterday were firming up the route his motorcade will take from Andrews Air Force Base to the Capitol. Vice President Cheney plans to speak at the state funeral tomorrow night at the Capitol.

The public has been invited to pay respects tomorrow evening, Sunday and Monday at the Capitol Rotunda. Bush and the first lady will go to the Capitol on Monday afternoon, and Bush will speak at the Washington National Cathedral service Tuesday.

While military and law enforcement authorities were making preparations and dignitaries from the United States and abroad were making plans to come to Washington, Fenty and his aides were sorting out the logistics of putting off the public swearing-in and gala.

D.C. and regional officials were also dealing with transportation concerns. The decision to close federal offices affects about 388,000 civilian employees in the region, which should ease any traffic crush. Street closings will take effect to accommodate events tomorrow and Tuesday. Officials urged people to rely on Metro, which will run its usual weekday schedule Tuesday.

The biggest potential for traffic tie-ups will be Tuesday. Ford's body is scheduled to leave the Capitol at 9:15 a.m. for the cathedral service an hour later and then depart about 11:30 for the trip to Andrews and the flight to the presidential museum in Grand Rapids, Mich.

John B. Townsend, spokesman for AAA-Mid Atlantic, said the mix of commuters and tourists could make for a "tight fit." But, he added, "whatever happens, I think people will understand that they will be witnesses to history."

Fenty and his team expressed a similar view. When Fenty learned of Ford's death, he told his top aides that they would "err on the side of moving" the ceremonies to pay respects and give "proper deference" to the former president.

Fenty and his aides devised several options for the ceremonies but waited to make final plans until the day of mourning was announced.

Dan Tangherlini, who is to become Fenty's city administrator, said early yesterday that it would be inappropriate to "have people cutting the rug" during a national day of mourning. Once Bush made the declaration, the party was rescheduled. More than 15,000 tickets had been distributed for the event at the Washington Convention Center.

Fenty spoke on the phone yesterday with White House Deputy Chief of Staff Joe Hagin to discuss plans. Stephanie Scott, Fenty's designee as secretary of the District, remained in touch with the White House as she and other inaugural planners visited Washington Convention Center to explore options.

Finding a new date for the inaugural ball was not easy. The convention center has other activities throughout next week, including a revival that is expected to draw 10,000 people. The next available date was Jan. 6.

Fenty's spokeswoman, Carrie Brooks, said the changes have created other challenges, such as getting entertainers, caterers and other vendors to work on the new date. She said invitations have gone out to go-go legend Chuck Brown and R&B singers Anthony Hamilton and Brian McKnight, but they have not confirmed whether they are available for the new date.

The mayor-elect's team joined incoming council Chairman Vincent C. Gray (D) to make other changes. A prayer service set for Tuesday was rescheduled for Wednesday morning. And the public swearing-in, a ceremony to include Gray and other council members elected in November, will now take place at 10 a.m. Wednesday at the convention center. Like Fenty, the council members will be sworn in privately Tuesday.

Fenty, who was 6 years old when Ford left office, said he wasn't upset about the changes and worked closely with the White House. "I think it's an honor," he said. "It makes being the mayor of the District of Columbia such a special thing."

Back Home, Ford Is Proudly Remembered For His Service, Not For His Pardon (NYT)

By Nick Bunkley

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

GRAND RAPIDS, Mich., Dec. 28 — Here, Gerald R. Ford is not known as the “accidental president.” People in this city say he was “our president.”

Some had to be reminded by news reports about Mr. Ford’s death that he is best remembered in most other parts of the United States for pardoning his predecessor, Richard M. Nixon. They have always known him as the athletic Eagle Scout who lost his bid to be president of South High School’s senior class before serving them in Congress for 25 years, ascending to the White House and helping to heal a nation scarred by the Watergate scandal.

That Mr. Ford, the only president from Michigan, was never elected to that office does not matter in Grand Rapids, where he spent much of his boyhood and got his start in politics. What matters to people here is that this city bore a president who followed his values and beliefs, even though his actions were unpopular at the time.

“I always looked up to him,” said one resident, John Frey, 47. “I wish we had more people like him in power.”

Mr. Frey was among the thousands of people who have visited the Gerald R. Ford Presidential Museum, on the western bank of the Grand River, since Mr. Ford’s death on Tuesday to pay respects and reflect on the loss of this city’s de facto royalty.

The museum is closed so Christmas decorations can be replaced with black bunting, but the lobby, where there is a large portrait of Mr. Ford and a table with two condolence books, will remain open around the clock until Mr. Ford’s body arrives Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0110290

Outside the museum, where a metal sculpture depicting Mr. Ford in his University of Michigan football uniform belies the "Saturday Night Live" skits portraying him as a klutz, mourners left campaign buttons and bumper stickers from Mr. Ford's unsuccessful 1976 presidential campaign, Michigan football mementos and Boy Scout patches.

"Grand Rapids loves you, Jerry!" read one poster-size sign left in the grass near the museum's sign. Another took one of Mr. Ford's most famous quotes — "I'm a Ford, not a Lincoln" — a step further: "You were named Ford: a member of the party of Lincoln but a Cadillac among presidents."

"He was the most truthful president I think we ever had," said Roberta Clinton, 78, of Grand Rapids.

There is actually a rivalry between Grand Rapids and East Grand Rapids, a leafy suburb just up the hill from its big-city neighbor, over which can claim Mr. Ford as its own. East Grand Rapids declares itself on its Web site and on signs around town to be the hometown of Mr. Ford, who spent time in both places.

In the years since he left office, Grand Rapids has honored Mr. Ford by naming its airport, a downtown freeway, the federal courthouse and the local Boy Scout Council for him. Likewise, although he had not lived here since 1978, Mr. Ford made clear his affinity for the city on numerous occasions, ultimately choosing to be buried on a grassy hillside north of his museum.

"It will be a very emotional homecoming," said David G. Frey, treasurer of the Gerald R. Ford Foundation, who will be one of Mr. Ford's honorary pallbearers. "It's a remarkable bond between this man and the people of west Michigan."

Mr. Ford's friends say he never got caught up in Washington politics, despite spending the better part of three decades there as a congressman, vice president and president.

"He had this sense of values that never left him that he took from Grand Rapids," said Marty Allen, chairman emeritus of the Gerald R. Ford Foundation. "When he came back to visit, I'd always say, 'Welcome home, Mr. President,' and he'd say, 'It's good to be home.' "

In 1994, Mr. Ford arranged to revisit the grayish-blue house in the Heritage Hill historic district where he lived from about the time he was 8 until he was 17. Tim England, its current owner, recalls seeing Mr. Ford's eyes light up while touring the home and the carriage house in its backyard that the former president had used as a neighborhood clubhouse.

"You'll never know what this means to my Jerry," Mr. England recalls Betty Ford telling him.

When Mr. England learned early Wednesday of Mr. Ford's death, he immediately hung a huge American flag across the front porch. Within half an hour, he saw cars start to pull up in front of the house.

"People take great pride in the fact that this city produced a president, no matter how he ascended to that office," Mr. England said. "For him to be president during such a difficult time, he did the state of Michigan and the city of Grand Rapids proud."

It is that sentiment that drew people from all parts of Michigan to the museum Wednesday and Thursday. Many had personal stories to share.

Evelyn Thompson treasures a campaign potholder that Mr. Ford gave to her mother when he first ran for Congress, and Helen Skinner's son was awarded his Eagle Scout designation by Mr. Ford.

Sharon Knight carried a thick album filled with articles about Mr. Ford and has a collection of mugs, plates and other memorabilia bearing his name and picture at home.

Rhonda Mort, 38, who lives in Covert, about an hour southwest of Grand Rapids, brought her 3-year-old son, Noah, to the museum and intends to return next week for Mr. Ford's funeral.

"We'll wait in line, spend the night — whatever we have to," Ms. Mort said.

Ford Arranged His Funeral To Reflect Himself And Drew In A Former Adversary (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 28 — As he helped in recent years arrange the details of his own funeral, Gerald R. Ford reached out to an old adversary: Jimmy Carter, who defeated him for the presidency in 1976.

Mr. Ford asked whether his successor might consider speaking at his funeral and offered, lightheartedly, to do the same for Mr. Carter, depending on who died first.

The invitation was decades in the making, associates of Mr. Ford's said. And, they said, it was typical for Mr. Ford, who came to his own funeral-planning sessions adamant that his coffin not be carried to the Capitol in an elaborate horse-drawn caisson but a motorcade instead.

During services for Mr. Ford, the 38th president, over the next few days, the simplicity he sought will be on display in Washington and, later, in Michigan, where he will be buried. His coffin is expected to be carried into the Capitol through the House of Representatives, where he served for 25 years, rather than up the sweeping front staircase. A band will play a somber version of the University of Michigan fight song, a Ford favorite from his undergraduate alma mater, and a song he preferred to "Hail to the Chief" while he was president.

There will be plenty of pomp, to be sure. Vice President Dick Cheney, who was President Ford's chief of staff, is planning to attend virtually all of the services, meeting his former boss's family at Andrews Air Force Base on Saturday, serving as an honorary pallbearer and delivering a eulogy at the Capitol.

On Tuesday, after services at the National Cathedral, Mr. Cheney will accompany the Ford family to Grand Rapids for a final farewell, aides to the vice president said.

Yet the service is expected to have the distinct feel of Mr. Ford, emphasizing his service in Congress and his desire to heal the country when he assumed the presidency after President Richard M. Nixon resigned.

"It's a memorial, an appreciation, a celebration more than anything else," said James Cannon, who wrote a biography of Mr. Ford.

Shari Lawrence, a spokeswoman for the Joint Force Headquarters for the Capital Region, which organizes state funerals, said, "It's an honor that we pay the past president, it will be a solemn affair, with everything that President Ford and his family had asked for."

"They kept it pretty basic, which was a reflection of him," Ms. Lawrence said.

The Ford family has not released all details of the services, which begin in California and end in Michigan, with the former president lying in state in the Capitol for two days in between.

Advisers to Mr. Carter did not return calls seeking comment about his plans for Mr. Ford's funeral. But according to associates of Mr. Ford, Mr. Carter is expected to play a role in the service, as are several other high-profile guests, including former Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger and the news anchor Tom Brokaw.

The two ex-presidents developed a friendship soon after Mr. Carter left office, starting with a long-haul flight together from Cairo after the funeral of the Egyptian president, Anwar el-Sadat, in 1981. They found a mutual interest in the presidential library system, and agreed to work on projects at each other's institutions. They compared notes on public policy and their families, and over time, their wives became friends.

And they shared a mutual rival: Ronald Reagan.

Theirs, Mr. Cannon said, was "an open and complementary friendship, no question about it."

"I think part of the reason for the bond was, both of them had been defeated by Reagan, and they shared a disregard for Reagan," Mr. Cannon said, alluding to Republican primaries in 1976 as well as the 1980 presidential election. But the friendship went even deeper, he said: "It was sincere, no question about that. Both of them had been there, and both of them had a continuing interest in what other presidents did."

Richard Norton Smith, the presidential historian and a friend of the Fords, said: "There was that kind of comfortable back and forth. It extended to the wives and the families, and it became this very nice, autumnal reconciliation, which blossomed into a real friendship."

President Bush and Laura Bush will pay their respects to Mr. Ford on Monday afternoon, after returning from their Texas ranch. Scott Stanzel, a White House spokesman, declined to say whether Mr. Bush had considered returning home on Saturday to participate as Mr. Ford is laid in repose at the Capitol.

Mr. Bush was originally scheduled to return on Monday evening. He is leaving Texas a few hours earlier so he and Mrs. Bush can pay tribute to Mr. Ford in the Capitol.

The White House has provided the use of the presidential plane to the Ford family, Mr. Stanzel said, the same accommodation made to the Reagan family. The plane, a 747, will fly Mr. Ford's body to Washington from California.

A Regular Guy Who Showed A Devotion To Local Causes (WP)

By John Pomfret And Sonya Geis

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

RANCHO MIRAGE, Calif. -- Gerald R. Ford thought globally as a president, but in a salubrious 30-year retirement spent on ski slopes and putting greens, he acted locally, serving on charities, donning sneakers for the first Desert AIDS Walk, speaking to the Boys and Girls Club and leading the annual Fourth of July parade.

Ford's regular-guy lifestyle distinguished him from other former presidents. Richard M. Nixon, who handed the presidency to Ford, wrote books to buff up his reputation. Ford's former adversary, Jimmy Carter, has built homes for the indigent and crisscrossed the globe brokering cease-fires and monitoring elections. Bill Clinton globe-trots as well, promoting AIDS awareness and, with George H.W. Bush, raising money for victims of the 2004 tsunami and Hurricane Katrina.

In comparison, Ford's biggest achievement -- helping his wife found the Betty Ford Center, the internationally known substance-abuse rehabilitation facility -- could be said to pale in comparison. But in his quiet unhurried way, friends and others said, the ex-president, who died here Tuesday, was a model citizen, known for the courtesy with which he treated people and the sincerity with which he lent his time and money.

In the years after losing to Carter in 1976, Ford's relationship with his wife dominated his life, said Mark K. Updegrove, author of "Second Acts: Presidential Lives and Legacies After the White House."

"His wife had a much more difficult time transitioning from the White House to private life than did her husband," Updegrove said, "leading to an addiction to painkillers and alcohol."

Betty Ford underwent rehabilitation "in full partnership with her husband," Updegrove said. Statistically, nine of 10 marriages collapse when a wife runs afoul of drugs, Updegrove said, but in the Fords' case it strengthened the family bond -- bringing the marriage together, in Betty Ford's words, "like a magnet."

A former congressional staffer and friend, Leon Parma, called the 58 years that the Fords were married "the greatest love story of our time." Because of his wife's well-known struggle with alcohol, Ford also stopped drinking.

Parma and his wife often vacationed with the Fords. When Parma traveled alone with Ford, "there was always a call home in the morning and evening. He was in constant contact."

Another friend, Wayne Hoffman, noted that Ford was rare for a politician in that he seemed to lack malice. Hoffman, 83, recalled speaking to him on the phone the day after he lost the 1976 presidential election, when Ford called him to make a golf date.

"He didn't show any bitterness" about losing the election, said Hoffman, former chairman of Tiger International and Flying Tiger Line, the largest air cargo carrier in the nation before it was sold to FedEx. "And he didn't afterward, though his heart was broken."

Updegrove said Ford's friendship with Carter, formed during a shared airplane ride to and from the funeral for assassinated Egyptian President Anwar Sadat in 1981, showed the "fundamental decency of the man."

The pair wrote occasional pieces for newspapers, including one, during the Reagan administration, that advocated dealing with the Palestine Liberation Organization as a political entity -- a policy that was adopted years later.

Ford grew fond of the desert in the 1960s during vacations when he was a congressman. Parma, then chief of staff for Rep. Bob Wilson of San Diego, invited him for golf outings near San Diego. Ford also hit the links in nearby Rancho Mirage, known as the "Playground of the Presidents," frequented by Nixon and Ronald Reagan and entertainers Frank Sinatra and Bob Hope.

When Ford retired in 1976, Leonard K. Firestone, president of the eponymous tire company, persuaded him to move to Rancho Mirage. Ford bought a one-story ranch house just off the fairway at the Thunderbird Country Club, a private oasis in a land of desert scrub.

Ford's office was next door to the home he shared with his wife. There Ford answered mail, kept up with his duties on several corporate boards, managed investments, planned speaking engagements around the country and set up foursomes for his favorite game.

"He was a very good golfer, actually. He was maligned by the comics, though," said Parma, now 79. "Bob Hope used to say, 'You're never sure which golf course he's going to play until he teed off.' Well, even Tiger Woods hits some out of bounds."

William Whyte, 91, a former lobbyist for U.S. Steel and a member of Ford's "kitchen cabinet," used to book Ford's golf games. Whyte recalled there was intense competition for a chance to play with the ex-president.

"He'd call me at about 11 in the morning and say, 'Line up a foursome,' " Whyte recalled. "In the opinion of some people, since I didn't book them, I was an SOB."

Ford helped raise money for the local Boys and Girls Club and waived his hefty speaking fee for groups of students or the Boy Scouts. He participated in the first Desert AIDS Walk in 1987, supported charities to protect the bighorn sheep and helped fund a children's museum in the desert.

The Fords later spent summers and occasional winter skiing holidays at two homes near Vail, Colo.

Tom Audley was general manager of a Polo Ralph Lauren store in Vail, near where Ford had bought a home. He recalled meeting the ex-president on five occasions. Each time, Ford came in with a present from a friend -- a size-large shirt that Ford would exchange for an extra-large. "He never wanted to tell his friend he needed an XL," Audley wrote in an e-mail reminiscing about the ex-president.

Ford's favorite restaurant in Vail was the Left Bank, a gourmet French restaurant. It was open only for dinner and it did not have an answering machine. Ford would call Audley and ask him to walk next door to the restaurant to make a reservation for him, often for a party of nine.

"I could give you a list of famous folks I've met and helped over the years, and not a single one ever gave me the respect and time that Pres. Ford gave me and my staff," Audley wrote. "Say what you want about him as a president. As a human, I never met a nicer guy (well maybe my dad)."

Warm Memories Of A Leader In Everyday Life (WP)

By Sue Anne Pressley Montes

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

Even in the barber's chair, he brought along a handful of papers to work on.

In his Alexandria neighborhood, he was an ephemeral figure, known for his early-morning splash in the swimming pool before he reported to Capitol Hill. At night, neighbors would note the limousine idling outside the red-brick Colonial, waiting to take him to another function or another vote, his long workday not yet over.

Gerald R. Ford returns to Washington tomorrow, a setting where he was both the most powerful man in the world and Everyman. The longtime congressman and 38th president of the United States spent nearly three decades in the Washington area and has been gone for three decades more. But long before the rest of the nation recognized his signature qualities -- his hardworking manner, his kind regard for others, his basic decency -- friends and associates in the D.C. area knew that Gerry Ford was a prince of a guy.

"Oh, he was the nicest man who ever lived," said Nancy Smith of Alexandria, the Ford family's "backdoor neighbor" for many years.

Many of the people who knew Ford well are gone now. But as Americans mourn the passing of a leader who soothed a troubled nation at a critical time, those whose lives intersected with his in the Washington area cherish a special collection of memories.

Every 10 days, like clockwork, Ford would settle into Joseph Quattrone's big leather chair at the congressional barbershop for a 75-cent trim. Between cuts yesterday, Quattrone, 72, recalled his former customer "with a tear in my eye."

"I have all nice people, but he was exceptional," said Quattrone, who manages the Rayburn Building shop and cut Ford's hair from 1970, when he was House minority leader, until he became president in 1974. "Maybe it was because of how he grew up or where he came from, but he was a gentleman and a half."

Ford would always hurry in with a sheaf of papers to study, but he never failed to ask Quattrone how he was doing. "We didn't talk about politics," the barber said. "Sometimes I would say, someday he's going to be a good speaker of the House, and he would say, 'It would be nice.' "

Those plans, of course, did not work out. After Ford became vice president in 1973, "I said, 'Now I'm going to lose you,' " Quattrone recalled. "And he said, 'No, you'll never lose me.' He came back after he was vice president. He came to me until the day before he got sworn in as president.

"He didn't talk too much that day -- he was kind of sad."

For years, neighbor Nancy Smith could practically tell time from the sounds of the future president doing his morning swim in the pool outside her kitchen window. "I'd hear him hit the water when I was getting breakfast," said Smith, now 76, whose family moved into the Fords' neighborhood in 1962.

Ford did not make it to many community cookouts or parties, she said.

"My sense was they just didn't have time to do neighborhood things -- they were too busy." When he was present, Smith added, "we would talk about our kids. He was never the big shot, which was very nice. He didn't have any inflated opinions of his own importance, as so many politicians do."

James Cannon, a former Newsweek editor who served as Ford's domestic policy adviser, said that description was always apt -- sometimes to the president's detriment.

"He was not a charismatic man. He was a workhorse, not a show horse, and he was much better in person than on television," said Cannon, a Georgetown resident who wrote the 1994 book "Time and Chance: Gerald Ford's Appointment With History."

"The White House is the first stage of the world, and the president, whether it's Reagan or Clinton or Kennedy, [is a performer], and Ford was not a very good performer. He was a plain-spoken Midwesterner, and acting was not among his attributes," Cannon said.

Sometimes, attempts to jazz up the stolid Ford image backfired. Former White House photographer David Hume Kennerly recalled the time he enlisted Los Angeles comic Don Penny to coach the president on his speech delivery during the 1976 campaign. "It took a lot for him to be angry," Kennerly said.

But during a practice speech in the Cabinet Room, after Penny had interrupted the president several times, instructing him to speak his words as if he meant them, Ford blew up. He reached into a pocket, pulled out a Cross pen and lobbed it at the comedian, missing and chipping the wall above Penny's head.

"He always had such a calm about him; it was great to get a rise out of him," Penny said yesterday. "It was a pleasure to work with him. He was a wonderful man."

DOJ_NMG_0110294

Even his political opponents agreed. For 17 years, Ford and U.S. Rep. John D. Dingell both represented Michigan in Congress -- Ford as a Republican, Dingell as a Democrat.

"Gerry Ford was a good, hard fighter, but he also knew how to come together on a set of common purposes," said Dingell, the longest-serving current member of Congress.

"From time to time, events happen that change the outlook, that cause people to reflect and perhaps change the way they function," Dingell said. "And frankly, Gerry Ford in his passing has reminded people that a White House and a Congress, even if they are opposing parties, can work together in the public interest of the country."

Betty Ford, Again Putting On A Brave Face (WP)

By Neely Tucker

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

There is an old saying that you don't know who you are in this life until you get knocked down.

Betty Ford has been getting knocked down for a long time, by things that ruin lives and flatten people. Divorce. Cancer. Alcohol. Addiction. And now, the death of her beloved spouse.

She has always taken the punch and done it one better. You would not want to go to the wall with Betty Ford on resilience. She didn't become the most admired woman in America during one of the most turbulent periods in national history because she made nice. She was so admired in the mid-1970s, and is beloved by a wide swath of the nation today, because she was bluntly honest and because, after everything life has thrown at her, she never quit.

"Betty Ford did things that public women hadn't done before, not just first ladies," says John Robert Greene, one of her biographers. "She had three debilitating diseases -- arthritis, alcoholism, cancer -- and she survived all of them."

Now 88, she will be in Washington once again this week for the processions and funeral for Gerald Ford, the football star she wowed back in Grand Rapids, Mich.

Hemingway, a man who wrote well but lived badly, famously described courage as "grace under pressure."

This has not been Elizabeth Ann Bloomer Ford's forte. Pressure ate her up.

She suffered from the solitude, while her husband traveled as congressman and vice president and president. With recurring pain from a pinched nerve in 1964, and the prescription pills she became addicted to. Raising four kids almost alone. Breast cancer. The Watergate-era laser light of media coverage. She drank. Popped Valium. She was late to everything.

Her great strength was to beat all of that. She was more like the rest of us than many public figures like to let on, human and flawed, not bulletproof and immune. And she was open about all of it, the depression and foibles and addictions and brandy, and it touched a country polarized by cynicism and the government mendacity of the Nixon years.

She had a breast removed, a devastating emotional and physical blow. Here was her response: She invited photographers into her hospital suite and let them photograph her in her housecoat. She then became a national spokeswoman for cancer awareness, for the importance of women doing self-examinations. When asked how she would handle her daughter having a premarital affair, or her kids smoking marijuana, she said she'd talk with them about it.

"They brought such a sense of humanity back to the White House," Sheila Rabb Weidenfeld, Betty Ford's press secretary during her years as first lady, said yesterday. "They were real people who lived there."

Betty Ford was born in Chicago and, although Episcopalian, was raised in the predominantly Dutch Calvinist town of Grand Rapids. Her dad, Bill Bloomer, was a traveling salesman for the Royal Rubber Co. He was successful and always gone, and he drank and drank and drank. He died when she was a teenager, either the result of an accident in the family garage or suicide by carbon monoxide poisoning.

She was headstrong, a tomboy. She smoked cigarettes at 14. She played hockey and football with the boys, until her brothers made her stop. She was beautiful and blew off the idea of college to move to New York to become a dancer for Martha Graham. She returned home, married and divorced before she was 30.

The first time she had a date with Jerry Ford, it was for a drink in a bar. (In a McCall's interview in 1975, she said reporters had asked her everything but how often she slept with her husband, "and if they'd asked me that I would have told them." And her answer? "As often as possible.")

Later, on the national stage, she spoke up for women's rights and for abortion rights: "It has to be understood that that there are extenuating circumstances where a woman must have the right to make decisions about her own body."

In 1975, she was one of 11 women Time magazine named "Man of the Year" that year. She topped Good Housekeeping's poll to determine the most admired woman in America. People named her one of the three most intriguing people in the nation.

But by 1978, a year out of the White House, the painkillers and the alcohol were eating her up. Her family called a meeting and presented her with the ugly truth. She was not pleased. When the doctor told her she was a "a drunk," the former president later recounted of his wife: "She was mad as hell."

DOJ_NMG_0110295

She managed to detox at a naval center, then founded the Betty Ford Clinic, a rehabilitation center ($21,000 for 30 days) that is the premier such institution in the country. Her name became synonymous with recovery from drug and alcohol addiction. Took a punch, gave back one better.

She never made any bones about her struggle.

"I liked alcohol, it made me feel warm," she wrote in her autobiography, "Betty: A Glad Awakening." "And I loved pills, they took away my tension and my pain. So the thing I have to know is that I haven't got this problem licked; to my dying day, I'll be recovering."

In November 1987, when she was 69, she underwent quadruple-bypass heart surgery. It required pain medication, but she had to wean herself off it quickly, lest she become addicted again.

"There were a lot of sleepless nights where I just walked the floor."

And now, she'll lead the nation through the mourning of her husband, partner and friend.

You don't have to wonder how she'll handle it.

Resilience. You can't fake it. Not for a lifetime.

Betty Ford Had Her Own Voice, And She Used It (DMN)

By Joyce Sáenz Harris

The Dallas Morning News, December 29, 2006

For 58 years, they were a couple whose love story was the bedrock of their lives. So it was no surprise that Betty Ford herself broke the news to the nation that the 38th president, "Gerald Ford, our beloved husband, father, grandfather and great-grandfather," had died at age 93.

Mrs. Ford, 88, will return to the national spotlight Friday as several days of services for her husband begin with private prayers for the family at St. Margaret's Episcopal Church in Palm Desert, Calif.

She was her husband's biggest fan, but when he was thrust into the White House in August 1974 by a quirk of history, she carved her own distinctive niche as first lady. Not since the days of Eleanor Roosevelt had any first lady spoken so freely on topical issues.

She was an overt feminist who worked for passage of the Equal Rights Amendment and supported the Supreme Court's 1973 Roe vs. Wade decision that legalized abortion. She also encouraged her husband to appoint women to Cabinet-level posts and major ambassadorships.

Before her White House years, though, Betty Ford was a fairly anonymous congressional wife. She married Gerald Ford just before his first election to Congress in 1948. He was a Navy veteran-turned-lawyer in Grand Rapids, Mich.; she was a former Powers model and Martha Graham dancer, recently divorced.

Mr. Ford hadn't even told his bride about his political ambitions, but she coped gamely with the demands of Washington life. The Fords moved to suburban Alexandria, Va., where they raised their four children during his long career in Congress.

All those years, they lived modestly in a large two-story colonial in Alexandria. They didn't move to the White House for 10 days after the president was sworn into office in 1974. On Mr. Ford's first night as president, Dallasites Margaret and Trammell F. Crow were among the close friends who gathered at the Ford home for an informal dinner. The only change she noticed, Mrs. Crow recalled this week, was that a couple of White House servants came over to help prepare and clean up.

A call to duty

Though the Fords had agreed he wouldn't run for Congress again after 1974, Mr. Ford felt compelled to accept when he was asked to be Richard Nixon's vice president after Spiro Agnew resigned amid scandal. Mrs. Ford supported his decision, despite her deep ambivalence about remaining in public life – a reluctance that would be underscored two years later when, as president, her husband survived two assassination attempts within 17 days.

Former White House staff assistant Andy Stern, now chairman of Sunwest Communications in Dallas, vividly recalls the second attempt in September 1975 in San Francisco. Afterward, Mr. Ford was hustled into a limousine and rushed to the airport to board Air Force One.

Mrs. Ford, who'd just arrived from a day in Monterey, was waiting for her husband in the plane's private quarters. Some 40 minutes after takeoff, she emerged to find the White House staff and press pool in the main cabin, watching television coverage of the assassination attempt.

That, Mr. Stern said, was the first that Mrs. Ford had even heard about it.

"And she was absolutely furious," he added with a laugh. "But the president's answer was, 'Hey, I'm here! I'm OK.'

"It was typical that neither one of them wanted to burden the other. They were a remarkable couple."

Now hear this

DOJ_NMG_0110296

Shortly after moving into the White House in August 1974, Mrs. Ford held a formal news conference, something no first lady had done since 1952. She announced her plans to support the arts and to help underprivileged and mentally challenged children. But she startled the press corps when she voiced support for the Equal Rights Amendment and Roe vs. Wade, and when she said she wanted more women to get involved in politics.

Gerald R. Ford Presidential Library and Museum Gerald Ford met Elizabeth Bloomer Warren while practicing law in Grand Rapids, Mich., after World War II. They were married on Oct. 15, 1948, just before his election to Congress.

Suddenly, everyone knew where Betty Ford stood on women's issues, and everyone had an opinion about her. The president's opinion was that the first lady was entitled to speak her mind.

"Jerry has supported me in the things I've said," Mrs. Ford said at the time. "At least he hasn't stepped on my toes yet." She was beginning to enjoy the power of her new influence: "After 25 years of coping, it's very satisfying."

The next public shock came when Mrs. Ford learned she had breast cancer, six weeks after her husband took office. In her 1978 autobiography, The Times of My Life, Mrs. Ford wrote that "there had been so much cover-up during Watergate that we wanted to be sure there would be no cover-up in the Ford administration. So rather than continue this traditional silence about breast cancer, we felt we had to be very public."

Her candid disclosure and her willingness to discuss her mastectomy were unprecedented. The news sent millions of women for screenings that saved lives – including that of Happy Rockefeller, the wife of Mr. Ford's newly appointed vice president, Nelson Rockefeller.

Mrs. Ford later served as co-chairwoman in 1982 when Nancy Brinker formed the Dallas-based Susan G. Komen Foundation.

The Komen Foundation is named after Ms. Brinker's sister, who died of breast cancer. As Ms. Brinker wrote on the foundation's Web site: "A major turning point in Suzy's struggle for survival came from a surprising source, Mrs. Betty Ford. ... Her bravery touched a place inside of Suzy that none of us could possibly understand because we hadn't gone through it ourselves."

When Ms. Brinker faced breast cancer in 1984, Mrs. Ford was among the first people to call her.

"I can't tell you what it meant to me to hear her voice," said Ms. Brinker, who now lives in Palm Beach, Fla. "Betty has always been a role model to me, and she's an extraordinary person. When someone who has blazed a trail turns around and gives you a hand, it's the greatest gift you can receive.

"My heart is so heavy for Betty now. It didn't get better than President Ford – he was the most supportive husband. He was a really compassionate man. They were an amazing couple."

Drugs and alcohol

After she left the White House in 1977, Mrs. Ford disclosed that she had struggled with alcohol and drug dependencies and depression since 1970. She thought she had conquered her problems, but she went through another low period after returning to private life and once again slipped into dependency.

This time, after a family intervention and hospital rehabilitation, Mrs. Ford emerged with a new cause: championing drug and alcohol rehab services. In 1982, she co-founded the Betty Ford Center for Drug and Alcohol Rehabilitation in Rancho Mirage, Calif., which has become arguably the best-known institution of its kind in the world. Of this achievement, her husband often said, "I couldn't be more proud."

"He truly wanted this to be her place, her mission, so he purposely stayed in the background, but he was always there," said John Schwarzlose, the center's president. "They were just two down-to-earth Americans who wanted to give alcoholics and addicts a chance to get well."

Mr. Ford always acknowledged the depth of their personal and public partnership. In April 1997, at the rededication of the Gerald R. Ford Museum in Grand Rapids, he said: "In my first remarks as president, delivered at a time of national as well as personal soul-searching, I said I was 'indebted to no man, and only to one woman, my dear wife.'

"In truth, there are no words to fully express how much I owe to Betty. For almost 50 years she has borne with my shortcomings, and I have rejoiced in her graces."

Chevy Chase As The Klutz In Chief, And A President Who Was In On The Joke (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 28 — While the events leading to Gerald Ford's ascent to the White House tarred him as an accidental president, he will also be remembered as an accident-prone president.

And for this he could thank the comedian Chevy Chase, or blame him, or (as he would eventually choose) laugh along.

DOJ_NMG_0110297

No one did more to solidify Mr. Ford's unfortunate, and perhaps unfair, standing as the nation's First Klutz than Mr. Chase, the "Saturday Night Live" cast member who routinely portrayed the president committing all manner of trips, flails and lurches.

Mr. Ford's cheerful reaction to the sendup included doing a cameo for "Saturday Night Live" from the Oval Office; sending his press secretary, Ron Nessen, on the show; and appearing with Mr. Chase at a political dinner. That type of reaction became a benchmark of what would come to be an essential presidential image-making skill: an ability to laugh at oneself.

People in the political and entertainment worlds recall Mr. Ford as a contemporary hero in this regard.

"He was just so incredibly decent and good-natured about the skit," said Lorne Michaels, the longtime producer of "Saturday Night Live." Mr. Ford sent a signal, Mr. Michaels said, that it was all right to be lighthearted about the presidency after the ordeal of the Watergate years.

"You couldn't imagine Nixon signaling that this was O.K.," Mr. Michaels said. In a sense, he added, Mr. Ford was telling the country that "we could all move on from this."

"This" referred to Watergate, and Mr. Ford, who was acutely aware of the public mood, was adept at using humor as a balm.

"At the time," Mr. Ford wrote in his book "Humor and the Presidency," "the media and general public still resented any hint of 'imperial' trappings in connection with the presidency or the White House."

Mr. Ford avoided any evidence of magisterial bearing with his understated manner and game efforts in the fledgling realm of presidential stand-up. At the Radio and Television Correspondents' Association dinner in 1975, he surreptitiously grabbed the tablecloth on the way to the podium and sent silverware flying toward Mr. Chase.

"Ford looked back with this great look of wonderment at what had happened," recalled Robert Orben, a television comedy writer who became a top aide to Mr. Ford. "He was someone who was not afraid to have fun at his own expense."

Mr. Ford was an accomplished football player, skier and golfer and was not considered unusually awkward by those around him. But he contributed to his own boneheaded persona in a few ill-timed episodes of camera-range clumsiness, like stumbling down the steps of Air Force One in Austria, wiping out on the slopes in Vail, Colo., and getting zonked on the head by a passing chairlift.

Mr. Chase whacked home the clumsy caricature on a weekly basis, in a way that became indelibly affixed to Mr. Ford's legacy.

The parody "just absolutely stuck in the public consciousness," said Landon Parvin, who has written humorous speeches for Presidents Bush and Ronald Reagan.

It became so ingrained that Mr. Ford had no choice but to play along.

"He was very smart about trying to get out ahead of the joke," said Mark Katz, a speechwriter who specialized in preparing President Bill Clinton for appearances at lighthearted Washington affairs, like the Gridiron and the White House Correspondents' Association Dinner.

"Now, every politician is lining up to make fun of themselves on Letterman and Jon Stewart's couch," Mr. Katz said.

Mr. Ford was hardly the first president to mock himself publicly. Even Richard M. Nixon was open to the ritual, once appearing on "Rowan & Martin's Laugh-In" to solemnly utter the show's catchphrase, "Sock it to me." Nor was Mr. Chase the first comedian to impersonate a president on television. The impersonator Vaughn Meader lampooned John F. Kennedy on "The Ed Sullivan Show" multiple times.

But Mr. Chase was the first comedian to make fun of a president in what would become television's signature forum for that, "Saturday Night Live."

"Ford is so inept that the quickest laugh is the cheapest laugh, and the cheapest is the physical joke," Mr. Chase told Time magazine in 1976. (A spokesman for Mr. Chase, who was skiing in Colorado on Thursday, said he would not be available for comment.)

In "Humor and the Presidency," an exploration of the role comedy has played in American presidencies, namely his own, Mr. Ford wrote, "It wouldn't surprise me if there was a measurable correlation between humor in an administration and the popularity of that administration's policies."

He also admitted he was stung at first by Mr. Chase's parody, but acknowledged its effectiveness. "The portrayal of me as an oafish ex-jock made for good copy," Mr. Ford wrote. "It was also funny."

Mr. Chase made no effort to look, dress or talk like Mr. Ford. He merely fell, with lurching exaggeration, "giving the sense that he was someone who wasn't in control of his limbs," Mr. Michaels, the producer, said.

His fall complete, Mr. Chase would then open the show with the signature line, "Live from New York, it's Saturday Night."

Bush Is Right -- And Other Lessons (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

DOJ_NMG_0110298

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

The tributes to Gerald Ford's great achievement in bringing a divided and disappointed country together seem oddly appropriate at the end of a tumultuous political year in which an Era of Angry Feelings led to a major shift of power in Washington.

It is said there is now a new longing for the civility and warmth that Ford represented. There is a certain truth to this, but having reviewed thousands of e-mails sent my way this year by readers, it's also clear that many Americans are deeply invested in political battles that they see as too important to admit of easy compromise.

True, citizens who e-mail columnists are more engaged in public life and care so passionately that they invest time to share their views -- often in learned detail.

I love these folks and thank them. I appreciate their commitment, which is why, once a year, I like to thank not only those who wrote generously and warmly but also the many dissenters represented succinctly by the reader who simply called me an "idiot."

Many critics offered useful challenges. "Perhaps, Mr. Dionne, you would also support the right of conservatives to appear without harassment, verbal and physical, at our nation's leading so-called institutions of higher learning controlled by your . . . fellow leftists." I do: It is wrong -- and illiberal -- to block those with whom you disagree from university platforms.

In response to a column on evangelical pastor Rick Warren, a reader from Portage, Wis., wrote: "Evangelical churches I have been associated with have been reaching out to people throughout the world since before you were born. Missionaries don't just run around in funny clothes and wave their Bible in the air. They teach basic health and sanitation, provide basic medical care. . . . The very idea that evangelicals have been negligent in these areas is simply liberal prejudice."

Judging from my mail, many liberals and Democrats who once liked Sen. John McCain have been pushed away by his opening to the right over the past year or so -- but conservatives are responding positively. "McCain is soon to be Maverick non grata" -- nice line -- "amongst the circles of smug, rich white liberals that you run in," one reader wrote. "But don't worry. We'll support him if he becomes our nominee."

Many conservatives are frustrated with the Bush administration and the outgoing Republican Congress. Their views were captured by one reader who wrote: "Conservatism, like Christianity, has not failed. Neither has ever been tried, especially by this administration."

A columnist's e-mail trove is not a scientific sample that would pass the muster of social science. But it does provide clues as to where the politically active invest their energies. Judging by how many people offered their views on nominations to the U.S. Supreme Court, the conventional wisdom is entirely right in seeing this as a blockbuster issue.

When I wrote critically of Samuel Alito's evasiveness during his Senate confirmation hearing to become an associate justice, the floodgates opened. One reader after another suggested that Alito had been no more evasive than Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg had been during her hearings in the 1990s. "Gosh, E.J.," a friendly critic from South Carolina said, "how many times do you have to be reminded? We won, you lost. I didn't hear you moaning over Ginsburg's evasions or whining about how [Stephen] Breyer would move the court to the left; turnabout is fair play. Relax, maybe your gang will get back in one day." Indeed.

Also striking was how angry liberals were at the performance of Democratic senators on the Judiciary Committee. One reader, representing many others, complained that "all they did was read from redundant and sterile scripts and badger him with the same questions ad nauseam. They have become like the 'pods' in 'Invasion of the Body Snatchers.' "

And thanks to the reader who wrote: "I would like to congratulate you for identifying yourself as a liberal. Many in your crowd are running from that word these days." It's a sign of weakness to embrace only poll-tested and focus-grouped labels.

Finally, a great many readers were frustrated that I have been rather consistently critical of President Bush -- though a few wanted more criticism. So please permit me to end the year in the conciliatory spirit of Gerald Ford.

Speaking on Wednesday morning, Bush declared that Ford "came along when we needed him most" and that Americans came to know him "as a man of complete integrity who led our country with common sense and kind instincts."

Straightforwardness Was Ford's Virtue — And His Limitation (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, December 29, 2006

In an Oval Office interview in 1976, I asked President Gerald Ford about charges made to me and many others by Indira Gandhi, prime minister of India, that the CIA was trying to overthrow her.

Ford said it was nonsense but declared that Gandhi was pro-Soviet and no friend of the United States. As he spoke, an aide sitting by got noticeably fidgety.

"Ah, excuse me," the aide said. "Can we please make that off the record? It will cause no end of trouble with India."

DOJ_NMG_0110299

I agreed — then put the question to Ford again for what I expected would be a more diplomatic answer. The second answer was practically identical with the first and the aide just threw up his hands.

That was Ford — straightforward, honest, uncomplicated, salt-of-the-earth Midwestern, an Eagle Scout nearly incapable of dissembling.

He was just what the country needed after the traumas of Watergate — the product of former President Richard Nixon's deviousness and paranoia.

Ford's pardon of Nixon also was pure Ford. He saw that Nixon's fate — prosecution and possible suicide — would preoccupy the country and dominate his presidency.

"This American tragedy could go on and on," he told the country. "Someone must write an end to it. I have concluded that only I can do it, and if I can, I must."

The pardon cost Ford dearly in political support, but he thought it was the right thing to do and he did it. As history has proved, it was not part of a deal to make him president — though one was offered to him — and it was the right decision to heal the nation.

He was straightforward and right-minded, too, in handling the country's second great trauma — Vietnam. When North Vietnam launched its final offensive against the South in 1975, Ford wanted to stand by an ally in distress and asked Congress for $650 million in emergency military aid.

Congress refused. South Vietnam's army collapsed and all Ford could do was rescue as many Vietnamese as possible. When some American communities balked at accepting refugees, he said such attitudes were unworthy of America.

Ford's straight-forwardness limited his imagination, too. As a regular Republican Congressional leader, he voted against federally funded housing, aid to education, the Medicare program and former President Lyndon Johnson's war on poverty.

Johnson, a highly complex character, declared that "Jerry Ford can't fart and chew gum at the same time," which the press cleaned up to read "walk and chew gum."

When Ford was president, his first domestic preoccupation was inflation, which rose to 7 percent. Ford termed it a menace to the country as great as any foreign enemy and launched the ill-fated "Whip Inflation Now" campaign that had no effect whatsoever.

Then when unemployment rose to 9 percent, Ford kept to his conservative fiscal principles and tried to restrain federal spending, which Democrats thought could temper the recession.

Ford vetoed 66 bills passed by the Democratic Congress, most of them appropriations designed to relieve unemployment. Ford said he'd saved the Treasury $9 billion.

In foreign policy, Ford was a realist, not an idealist like Presidents Ronald Reagan or George W. Bush. Ford followed the guidance of his (and Nixon's) secretary of State, Henry Kissinger, who had a pessimistic view of human nature and the prospects of the West.

Kissinger believed that détente and co-existence with the Soviet Union were the best arrangement the U.S. could achieve. Reagan, by contrast, thought that the West could defeat the "evil empire."

Reagan, it turns out, was right. And Ford's détente policy, as much as the pardon, may have cost him his presidency.

Ford turned back Reagan's challenge in GOP primaries in 1976, but questions about détente undoubtedly caused the debate gaffe that elected President Jimmy Carter.

In 1976, Ford signed the Helsinki Accords, which critics attacked as guaranteeing Soviet control of Eastern Europe. Ford was trying to refute that charge in the debate when he denied that Poland was Soviet-dominated.

Going into that debate, Ford had pulled even with Carter. The gaffe — and his stubborn refusal to walk back from it for days — caused him to lose the election by a hair.

If Ford had won, chances are he would have been at constant war with Congress. And, probably, Reagan never would have been president. He would have won the 1980 GOP nomination, but the country would have blamed Republicans, not Carter, for the nation's stagnant economy and would have wanted a change after 12 years of GOP rule.

In character, Ford presided over one of the most open White Houses ever. His first chief of staff, Donald Rumsfeld, was capable of intrigue, constantly trying to oust Treasury Secretary William Simon with leaks.

But after Rumsfeld became Defense secretary, Ford installed Dick Cheney as chief of staff, and Cheney was one of the most accessible figures ever to hold that job — amazing as that now seems, given Cheney's now-deserved reputation for secrecy.

The Washington Post's Bob Woodward reports that Ford told him — in an interview to be published only after his death — that he opposed the Iraq War launched by his old protégés and President Bush.

It's a mark of Ford's decency that he didn't try to undermine a successor by speaking out as Bush was preparing for war. But it's also a flaw: He might have given the country pause.

The Pardon In History's Hindsight (WP)

By Richard Ben-veniste

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

Gerald R. Ford was a decent and honorable man. Under his steady hand, the nation began the process of recovering from the terrible trauma of Watergate -- the lies, distortions, coverups, misuses of federal agencies to exact political revenge, illegal wiretapping, burglaries. . . . The list went on and on -- all in the midst of the deeply divisive Vietnam War. Did Ford make the right decision in pardoning his predecessor? The answer to that question is more nuanced than either the howls of outrage that greeted the pardon three decades ago or the general acceptance with which it is viewed now.

When Richard M. Nixon resigned and Ford became the 38th president of the United States, the Watergate Special Prosecutor's Office, of which I was a member, was preparing for the criminal trials of Nixon's top aides -- H.R. Haldeman, John Ehrlichman and John Mitchell. We had accumulated significant evidence showing Nixon's active participation in a conspiracy to obstruct the FBI and grand jury investigation of the Watergate break-in and the related "White House horrors," to use Mitchell's famous description. Nixon himself had been named an "unindicted co-conspirator" by the grand jury -- even before the Supreme Court compelled disclosure of the "smoking gun" tape.

It was our collective view that so long as Nixon held the office of president, the constitutionally sanctioned process of impeachment should trump any suggestion that a sitting president be indicted. But there was considerable disagreement within the special prosecutor's office on the proper way to discharge our responsibilities vis-a-vis private citizen Nixon.

Some, including Special Prosecutor Leon Jaworski, were of the view that Nixon's precipitous fall from the highest office was punishment enough. An indictment conjured up the prospect of unprecedented pretrial publicity, making it unlikely that an impartial jury could be selected in the near future. On the other hand, Nixon's personal involvement in the same criminal conspiracy for which his aides were soon to be tried (and convicted) put to the test the maxim that no man is above the law.

Upon taking office as president, Gerald Ford gave reason to believe that any decision regarding a pardon for his predecessor would be made carefully and deliberately. Nineteen days after taking the oath of office, he responded to a press inquiry about a possible Nixon pardon, saying that until any legal process was undertaken it would be "unwise and untimely for me to make any commitment," adding that "until the matter reaches me, I am not going to make any comment during the process of whatever charges are made."

Yet, only 11 days later, Ford reversed course. Citing reasons of national reconciliation, the difficulty Nixon would have in obtaining a fair trial by jury, and the suffering that Nixon and his family had already endured, Ford announced that he had pardoned Richard Nixon for all crimes he committed or "may have committed" while president. The same day, Nixon issued a statement admitting only to "mistakes" and "misjudgments," saying that he "was wrong in not acting more decisively and more forthrightly in dealing with Watergate."

The pardon decision was met with strident criticism by much of the media. The Post equated Ford's pardon to another chapter in the coverup; the New York Times called it "profoundly unwise, divisive and unjust" and "a body blow to [Ford's] credibility." With the benefit of more than 30 years of perspective, the public's view of Ford's decision has softened considerably.

While I do not believe Ford was wrong to pardon Nixon, the timing of the pardon was premature and may have cost Ford the margin of victory in the 1976 election. Had Ford kept to his original plan and allowed time for formal charges to be lodged against Nixon, spelling out the specifics of his culpability, it would have been up to Nixon to either accept the pardon or fight the charges in court. But pardoning Nixon without requiring at least an acknowledgment of responsibility for serious misconduct and for lying to the public left the door open for the spate of revisionist books and articles that followed the resignation.

At bottom, the decision to pardon Nixon was a political judgment properly within the bounds of Ford's constitutional authority. The specter of a former president in the criminal dock as our country moved into its bicentennial year was profoundly disturbing. I believe Jerry Ford acted in accord with what he sincerely felt were the best interests of the country; that there was no secret quid pro quo with Nixon for a pardon in return for resignation; and that Ford, a compassionate man, was moved by the palpable suffering of a man who had lost so much.

The release of a slew of additional Nixon tapes has not been kind to the diminishing ranks of Nixon loyalists -- providing ever more evidence of Watergate-related mendacity. In the end, Ford may have been correct in believing the facts would sort themselves out well enough. Yet, because Ford did not condition his pardon on a formal acknowledgment of culpability by Nixon, historians will have to go to the underlying evidence to make their judgments on Nixon's responsibility for the criminal conduct and constitutional transgressions that left him with the stark choice between resignation and certain removal from office.

Edwards Seeks To Make 2nd Time A Charm (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, December 29, 2006

Two years older and he says wiser, too, John Edwards announced a repeat presidential campaign Thursday with new ideas that make him a very different candidate the second time around.

In 2004, Edwards was the moderate southern senator who promoted middle class tax cuts and tried to position himself as the best general election alternative to President Bush.

This time the 53-year-old faces a tougher fight for the Democratic nomination and has a more progressive campaign of eliminating poverty, reducing global warming and providing universal health care for all Americans.

He's apologizing for his vote to send troops to Iraq — which he stood by steadfastly in the 2004 campaign — and is calling for 40,000-50,000 troops to come home immediately.

And those middle class tax cuts he campaigned on in 2004? "At this point, it's hard to see how to do that," Edwards said in an interview after his campaign kickoff in New Orleans.

The unorthodox campaign launch site — the middle of a neighborhood still devastated more than a year after Hurricane Katrina — itself demonstrated how Edwards campaign has changed. In 2004, he had an official kickoff in his hometown of Robbins, N.C. for a campaign that stressed his up-from-the-bootstraps biography that turned the son of a mill worker into a successful trial attorney and then senator.

This time around, Edwards didn't mention one word about his personal story. He talked less about what he wanted to do as president and more about how everyone can change the country.

"That's why I'm in New Orleans," said Edwards, standing before student volunteers working to rebuild a home, "is to show what's possible when we as Americans, instead of staying home and complaining about somebody else not doing what they're supposed to, we actually take responsibility and we take action."

Edwards wore blue jeans and an open-necked shirt and stood casually before a line of television cameras and reporters to make his announcement. There was no TelePrompTer, no American flag backdrop and no cheering crowd that is typical of a presidential kickoff.

Edwards' advisers scheduled a six-state announcement tour between Christmas and New Year's Day with the hopes that news would be slow and he could dominate media coverage. Over three days, Edwards also planned to travel to Iowa, New Hampshire, Nevada, South Carolina and his home state of North Carolina.

Edwards was trying to make a unique entrance into what is bound to be a competitive race for president. Only two others have officially announced their candidacies — Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack and Rep. Dennis Kucinich — but several others are expected to join the race in the new year.

The most dominant figures are Sens. Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama, and Edwards' first question from the gathered reporters was about how he intends to compete with them. "I want the best human beings possible to run for president of the United States," Edwards said.

The race also might include Edwards' former partner on the Democratic ticket — 2004 presidential nominee John Kerry.

In an interview later in a nearby home that is almost completely rebuilt, Edwards brushed aside any suggestion that it might be awkward to take on the man who chose him for the national ticket last time around.

Edwards said the biggest responsibility of the next president will be to restore America's moral leadership in the world. He said the Bush administration's leadership in Iraq has been a disaster and that it would be a mistake to send in more troops, which Bush is considering in the new year.

Edwards said it's a "fair question" to ask about his lack of foreign policy experience after just one term in the Senate. But he said he's spend the last two years since he left office traveling the world. "It's given me some depth and understanding that didn't exist before that time," he said.

And he noted that the Bush administration has included such experienced foreign policy hands as Vice President Dick Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and "they've been an absolute disaster by any measure."

Edwards said it's not just Iraq that it is chaos and in need of moral leadership from the United States. He said the United States should be leading an end to genocide in Sudan and to atrocities in northern Uganda. He also said the United States should be part of the International Criminal Court, something that Bush has fought against to keep Americans from facing politically motivated prosecutions.

He also said the country should end its dependence on foreign oil. He said he would tax oil company profits and eliminate Bush's tax cuts to pay for his priorities.

DOJ_NMG_0110302

In the interview later, Edwards said he will have a health care plan that will provide coverage for every American, something that few presidential candidates have considered a winning issue because of the high cost.

"I didn't have a universal health care plan (last time). Nobody did," Edwards said. "I shouldn't say nobody. I think Dennis Kucinich may have."

Kucinich, the most liberal presidential candidate in 2004 and 2008, wants national health insurance providing single-payer universal health care. He also wants to replace the Department of Defense with a Department of Peace and is a long-shot candidate for president.

Edwards said he's still working out the details of his health care plan and doesn't yet have a cost estimate.

New Orleans Is Exhibit A As Edwards Opens His Presidential Campaign (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Dec. 28 — Framed by two ruined houses and a dead tree, John Edwards inaugurated his 2008 presidential campaign here on Thursday with an appeal to citizens to take on challenges like the one represented by this still-devastated city.

The choice of a battered New Orleans neighborhood for Mr. Edwards's unconventional announcement, with student volunteers at his side, was intended to highlight what, in broad terms, would be a central theme of his campaign: the need for a fresh wave of citizen activism to "change this country."

The message, delivered without notes, was as loose and generalized as the setting was informal. Clad in shirt-sleeves, blue jeans and work boots, and standing in the muddy backyard of a homeowner struggling to come back from the destruction of Hurricane Katrina, Mr. Edwards explained to reporters gathered in the morning chill that "the basis for my campaign will be a ground-up campaign, where we ask people to take action."

As one of the first to enter the barely nascent campaign — his most likely competitors, Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois, have yet to announce — Mr. Edwards, the losing vice-presidential candidate in 2004, seemed at pains to begin on a positive note. He delivered a Kennedy-like appeal for grass-roots volunteerism rather than a broadside against President Bush, though he called Mr. Bush's foreign policy team "an absolute disaster" in the question-and-answer session afterward.

Though Mr. Edwards's central theme in the 2004 campaign was poverty, that was not the case on Thursday, as he made only a passing reference to the "two Americas," his slogan two years ago. Instead of choosing to announce from the Lower Ninth Ward, the impoverished neighborhood that has become a symbol for the devastation of Hurricane Katrina, Mr. Edwards, a former North Carolina senator, opted for middle-class East New Orleans, and an area of solid, single-story tan-brick homes that are salvageable, unlike the flimsy frame buildings in the Lower Ninth Ward.

The house outside which he spoke belongs to a quality-assurance inspector at Luzianne, a local coffee and tea maker. The homeowner, Orelia Tyler, had floodwater up to her roof and has been living in a FEMA trailer. Dazzled by the senator's attention, Ms. Tyler said, "I'm hoping and praying he's doing it to help me get back in my house, and not for publicity."

As Mr. Edwards spoke, limbs from the dead tree in back of him, which were pushed down by the storm, still rested on the chain-link fence at the yard's edge; in the distance was a toppled basketball goal; a giant rusting ventilator fan lay on the ground.

"We need to call on Americans to be patriotic for something other than war," Mr. Edwards said.

Implicit in his brief remarks was criticism of the Bush administration's handling of New Orleans's foundering recovery. In Mr. Edwards's telling, the city was exemplary in both positive and negative senses, as a symbol of citizen action and government inaction. This was his fourth visit since the storm, and he spent part of the well-photographed previous day shoveling mud outside the same house.

Thursday, the ex-senator praised the army of volunteers that has gutted hundreds of houses and removed debris, but he pointedly omitted any recognition of the patchy official efforts.

He saved his criticism of Mr. Bush's New Orleans role for a question-and-answer session afterwards, telling reporters, "This is a place where presidential leadership would have been critical."

Asked how he would have handled New Orleans, Mr. Edwards responded: "I would have had somebody coming into my office every morning, and I would say to him, 'What did you do in New Orleans yesterday?' And then the next day, 'What did you do yesterday? What steps do we need to take? What are we not doing? What are the people in New Orleans telling us that we're not doing?' "

He said the next president would "need to re-establish America's leadership role in the world," called for quick withdrawal of 40,000 to 50,000 troops from Iraq, and said it "would be a mistake for America to escalate its role in Iraq."

Roundly denouncing the administration's approach, he said, "You can't lead through raw power."

DOJ_NMG_0110303

He expressed regret for his Senate vote to authorize force in Iraq. “My vote was a mistake,” he said. “I should never have voted for the war.”

Afterward, Mr. Edwards headed for Iowa and a town-hall-style meeting in Des Moines. He has assiduously courted the electorate in Iowa, the first state to hold a presidential vote; this visit will be his 16th since the 2004 election. Several recent local polls have shown him in a leading position in Iowa, where he finished second in the 2004 caucuses.

Edwards Kicks Off Campaign With Focus On Poverty, Inequality (MCT)

By Rob Christensen

McClatchy Newspapers, December 29, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — John Edwards began his second quest for president Thursday by calling on the country to address the problems of poverty and inequality in America.

Edwards, 53, the 2004 Democratic vice presidential nominee and a former senator from North Carolina, used a hurricane-ravaged neighborhood in New Orleans as the backdrop for his announcement. The Ninth Ward section of the city is still strewn with boarded-up homes and piles of debris 16 months after the area was flooded by Hurricane Katrina.

"New Orleans in so many ways shows the two Americas that I have talked about in the past," Edwards said.

Edwards said it wasn't just the business of government to rebuild destroyed neighborhoods, although he criticized the Bush administration for doing too little. He said he would use his campaign as a "call to action" to encourage private groups to help those in need in New Orleans and elsewhere. Standing behind Edwards was a group of Baton Rouge, La., students who have been volunteering in New Orleans.

"If you walk around these neighborhoods, what you'll hear is that most of the good that has been done in New Orleans has been done by faith-based groups, charity groups and volunteers," Edwards said.

Edwards also called for universal health care coverage, more opportunities for young people to go to college and beginning the withdrawal of American troops from Iraq while seeking a political solution to the conflict. Edwards said he favors rolling back some of the tax cuts for well-to-do Americans pushed by the Bush administration. He spoke in broad terms, offering few specifics on how he would bring about the changes he proposed.

Edwards begins the Democratic primary trailing New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, according to national polls, even though they haven't declared their candidacy. But Edwards is better known than most of the other Democrats considering the 2008 race.

Edwards left New Orleans for a three-day tour that was to take him through the key primary and caucus states of Iowa, New Hampshire, Nevada and South Carolina, before finishing Saturday with a rally near his new 102-acre estate in Chapel Hill, N.C.

The spectacle of a presidential announcement, with its congregation of TV trucks, drew few onlookers because so much of the Ninth Ward has been abandoned. The area looks like a battle zone, with Federal Emergency Management Agency trailers sitting outside half-destroyed homes and neighborhoods patrolled by military police in Humvees.

A half-block away, Michael Knight, a 31-year-old electrician who grew up in the neighborhood that locals called Checkerboard, ignored the hoopla.

"I don't think it makes a big difference to me," Knight said of the Edwards visit. "I really don't see it doing nothing. He's not the first one to come down here."

Edwards, a mill worker's son who became a millionaire trial lawyer, has linked himself to the issue of poverty. He's made three previous trips to New Orleans to help residents with rebuilding projects. During his 2004 campaign, Edwards emphasized his Two Americas theme, highlighting the inequalities in America. In 2005, Edwards created the Center on Poverty, Work and Opportunity at the University of North Carolina in Chapel Hill. He has compared his stance to that of the late Sen. Robert Kennedy, who ran for president in 1968.

But addressing poverty, rather than the problems of the struggling middle class, can be tricky politically.

"It's clearly not the main mover of most voters," said Lee Miringoff, director of the Marist Institute for Public Opinion in New York. "People are interested in the war in Iraq. The question is whether he can talk about the quality of life for Americans as part of the specialized focus on people who are poor."

The last major presidential candidate to focus on poverty was Jesse Jackson in 1988. The so-called "New Democrats" such as Bill Clinton and Al Gore largely wrote off the issue.

"Politically, it's a marginal strategy," said Allan Lichtman, a presidential scholar at American University. "Whether that is going to appeal to the base of the Democratic Party is an interesting question."

Some fellow Democrats wonder whether emphasizing poverty and populism is the way to win the party's nomination.

DOJ_NMG_0110304

"He is defining himself as the little people's friend," said Dick Hartpootlian, a former South Carolina Democratic chairman. "That works in the courtroom. I don't think that will work across the country."

Edwards Confirms Plan To Run For White House (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, December 29, 2006

Former Democratic vice presidential nominee John Edwards yesterday made his first public announcement that he will again seek his party's nomination for president.

The one-term senator from North Carolina, who made a hefty fortune as a personal injury lawyer, chose as the backdrop of his speech the squalor left in New Orleans by Hurricane Katrina more than a year ago.

"New Orleans, in so many ways, shows the two Americas that I have talked about in the past and something that I feel very personally," he said yesterday, touching on the theme of class division that defined his 2004 primary campaign. "It also exemplifies something that I've learned since the last election, which is that it's great to see a problem and to understand it; it's more important to actually take action and do something about it."

Asked by a reporter whether he was announcing from the now-famous 9th Ward to help New Orleans or so that New Orleans could help his political career, Mr. Edwards replied, "Yeah, well I hope so."

"In the worst-hit areas of New Orleans, as everyone in New Orleans knows -- they certainly don't need me to tell them -- you don't see much change," he said. "So if we can help bring Americans to New Orleans to help rebuild this great city and get people to pay attention to what's actually going on here, I feel like we've done a good thing."

Mr. Edwards faces a field dramatically altered from the one he faced leading up to the 2004 presidential elections. Then, he was a fresh face who was still sitting in the Senate. He held a great deal of promise as a Democrat from the South who might help break the Republican stranglehold on Dixie.

Today, he is no longer a fresh face and has spent the past two years out of office running a poverty center in North Carolina. Also, he proved ineffective at making inroads in the South, failing even to deliver his home state to the 2004 Democrat ticket headed by Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts.

Still dominating the field are two potential candidates who haven't even announced their intentions: Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois.

Mr. Edwards had planned to announce his candidacy yesterday, but a computer mishap that put his campaign Web site on the Internet on Wednesday forced his team to say that day that he was running. He also sent an e-mail to supporters Wednesday night to that effect.

Mr. Edwards has another obstacle in his path to the White House: He voted for the Iraq war.

"My vote was a mistake, and I should never have voted for this war," he said yesterday. "I do think it's important to note for anybody who voted for the war that we didn't conduct the war. [President] Bush, [Vice President Dick] Cheney, those people -- [former Defense Secretary Donald H.] Rumsfeld -- they conducted the war, and they've been an absolute disaster in the conducting of the war. But none of that changes or affects my responsibility. I'm responsible for what I did, and I believe that my vote was a mistake."

He also said he opposes any increase in the number of troops serving in Iraq.

Mr. Edwards also took the opportunity yesterday to criticize the Bush administration for its handling of the post-hurricane rescue efforts, cleanup and rebuilding in New Orleans.

"I think if the president of the United States had come to New Orleans, spent some time here -- I mean, the president has a lot of responsibilities, he can't stake himself out for the long term in New Orleans -- but he should have spent a period of days here, saw what was actually happening on the ground and then demanded action," Mr. Edwards said.

Hurricane Katrina hit during the final days of August last year.

On Sept. 15, President Bush delivered a prime-time address to the nation after reviewing the damage.

Edwards Hopes Persistence Pays Off In Presidency (LAT)

By Michael Finnegan, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 29, 2006

The 2004 candidate is seeking the Democratic nomination for 2008, saying Americans have a responsibility to help one another.

NEW ORLEANS — With the ruins of New Orleans as his backdrop, former Democratic vice presidential nominee John Edwards on Thursday called on Americans to take action against poverty, global warming and other troubles as he officially launched his 2008 campaign for president.

DOJ_NMG_0110305

"We can't wait for someone else to do this for us," the onetime U.S. senator from North Carolina said from a muddy 9th Ward backyard where volunteers were fixing a home gutted by Hurricane Katrina.

Dressed in blue jeans, sneakers and a work shirt, Edwards outlined his vision of the presidency as a moral force to promote universal healthcare, higher wages for the working poor and other steps.

New Orleans, he said, illustrates the "two Americas" that he lamented in his 2004 run for president — one for the privileged, and one for those struggling to get by.

Reprising that theme for 2008, Edwards this time is stressing "personal responsibility." In a setting of flood-ravaged houses with boarded-up windows and punctured walls — which he said the government had done too little to repair — he urged Americans to volunteer for anti-poverty work and cut fuel use to ease global warming.

"Instead of staying home and complaining, we're asking people to help," he said in the drawl that became familiar to the nation during his four-month stint as running mate to 2004 Democratic presidential nominee John F. Kerry after Edwards' own presidential bid failed.

Edwards also called for the immediate withdrawal of 40,000 to 50,000 U.S. troops from the war in Iraq, saying the move would begin to restore America's standing as a world leader.

Campaigning hours later in Des Moines, Edwards took a swipe at a leading Republican contender for president, Sen. John McCain of Arizona, for saying the U.S. should send more troops to Iraq.

"It would be an enormous mistake to adopt the McCain doctrine and escalate this war in Iraq," he said to cheers from several hundred people packed into the central atrium of a downtown museum.

As he has in the past, Edwards voiced regret for his Senate vote to authorize the U.S. invasion of Iraq. "I should have never voted for this war," he said.

Iowa was the first stop on his three-day swing to the first states to hold Democratic nomination contests. Edwards plans to campaign in New Hampshire and Nevada today and in South Carolina on Saturday.

By starting in Des Moines, Edwards underscored Iowa's crucial role in his campaign. His surprisingly strong second-place finish in the 2004 Iowa caucuses was a major lift to his presidential candidacy that year, and a poor showing here in 2008 could doom his candidacy. He has visited Iowa 16 times since the 2004 election, and polls suggest he holds an early edge in the state.

"He's been here as much as, if not more than, anybody else, and he's highly regarded by a lot of Democrats in Iowa," said Peverill Squire, a University of Iowa political science professor.

Edwards, 53, is the third Democrat officially in the race for president, following Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack and Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich of Ohio. He is also the best known nationally.

But like more than half a dozen Democrats still weighing a White House run, he faces a tough struggle for money and visibility in a contest dominated so far by two Democrats who have not formally announced intentions — Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois.

"Obama and Clinton are taking up an enormous amount of political space," said Democratic strategist Steve Elmendorf. Edwards "has to hope that one of the two of them falters."

The Edwards announcement came as no surprise; he has been preparing for the campaign for more than two years. (His campaign website also accidentally went live Wednesday, a day early, tipping his hand.)

To maximize media exposure, he timed his announcement for the normally slow news week before New Year's. The death this week of President Ford complicated that plan, but Edwards still drew more than 20 news crews to his chilly morning announcement in New Orleans.

Forgoing a customary campaign launch with balloons and cheering supporters, Edwards appeared alone on the bleak 9th Ward lawn of Orelia Tyler, who has lived in a frontyard trailer for months as repairs continued on her hurricane-wrecked home.

The early announcement — the opening 2008 contest in Iowa is more than a year away — enables Edwards to jump-start fundraising by showing donors that his candidacy is a sure thing. But he starts with debt lingering from 2004, and it will cost him tens of millions of dollars to compete seriously for the party nomination.

Edwards is no longer the fresh face he was in 2004 as a first-term senator whose candidacy for president was strong enough to keep him in the Democratic race longer than anyone but Kerry.

But since then, Edwards has worked to sharpen his profile for an encore campaign. He has aggressively cultivated union leaders, heightening his appeal to labor with efforts to fight poverty and increase the minimum wage. But Clinton and other potential Democratic contenders also have strong union ties.

Working to fill a widely noted gap in his 2004 resume, Edwards has also traveled the world to strengthen his image on foreign policy. In New Orleans, he called for stronger U.S. leadership in stopping "huge atrocities" in northern Uganda, where he met with relief workers a few weeks ago, and the genocide in Sudan.

"We said after Rwanda we'd never let anything like this happen again," he said. "Well, it's happening right now."

DOJ_NMG_0110306

In Iowa, Edwards mentioned his recent trips to Israel and Britain and hammered the Bush administration for refusing to negotiate with adversaries.

"It is in my judgment sheer stupidity to say we will not deal with our enemies," Edwards said.

A South Carolina native and the son and grandson of millworkers, Edwards was raised in rural North Carolina. He was the first in his family to attend college.

In two decades as a trial lawyer, Edwards made millions litigating cases against corporations for injured plaintiffs. His first run for public office was a 1998 campaign for U.S. Senate. He defeated Republican incumbent Lauch Faircloth of North Carolina and served one term.

Now, Edwards casts himself as a Washington outsider. Known in 2004 for his discipline in sticking to a poll-tested message, he vowed in a video on his campaign website to say more than just "what's safe."

"We're conditioned to be political, and it's hard to shed all that," he said. "I can be in the middle of being what feels real and authentic to me, and I'll get into a little reel in my head. I can see it happening, and I have to pull myself back out."

Edwards Formally Joins 2008 Presidential Race (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Dec. 28 -- Former senator John Edwards of North Carolina launched his second campaign for the White House from this flood-ravaged city Thursday with a call for the United States to reduce its troop presence in Iraq and a plea for citizen action to combat poverty, global warming and America's reliance on foreign oil.

Edwards was sharply critical of the administration for its conduct of the war in Iraq, and he again recanted his own vote authorizing President Bush to take the country to war, which he called a mistake.

"The biggest responsibility of the next president of the United States is to reestablish America's leadership role in the world, starting with Iraq," Edwards told reporters during his morning announcement. "We need to make it clear that we intend to leave Iraq and turn over the responsibility of Iraq to the Iraqi people."

Edwards said he favors withdrawing 40,000 to 50,000 troops from Iraq as a signal to Iraqis that the United States intends to turn over responsibility for the conflict to the government there. Wading into the current debate in Washington about Iraq, he forcefully rejected proposals to send more troops to help quell the bloody sectarian violence there.

"I want to be absolutely clear about this," he said. "It is a mistake for America to escalate its role in Iraq. It is a mistake to surge troops into Iraq. It sends exactly the wrong signal to the Iraqis and the rest of the world about what our intentions are there."

Edwards also said he favors rolling back some of the tax cuts given to the wealthiest Americans by the Bush administration, and he proposed a windfall profits tax on the oil industry, saying additional money will be needed to pay for vital domestic needs.

"I think it's also really important that we be honest with people," he said. "We've gotten in a deep hole, in terms of our deficit. We have investments that need to be made." He cited help for middle-class Americans, anti-poverty programs, universal health care and energy initiatives as examples.

From his choice of setting to his message, Edwards used the opening day of his 2008 bid to signal that he intends to run a populist, insurgent campaign designed to show that he is not a candidate of Washington, in contrast to his likely Democratic rivals -- including Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois.

"This campaign will be a grass-roots, ground-up campaign, where we ask people to take action," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0110307

Edwards staged his announcement in the city's Ninth Ward, which was devastated by Hurricane Katrina last year. He spoke from a debris-strewn property where a home was heavily damaged by Katrina's floodwaters; it was adjacent to a newly renovated property where he spent several hours Wednesday working with young volunteers to landscape the back yard.

Edwards said no city better symbolizes the "two Americas" -- haves and have-nots -- that he spoke about during his 2004 campaign. But he said New Orleans also shows the good that can come when people act for themselves, rather than relying solely on the government.

The day was shorn of most of the trappings of traditional presidential campaign announcements. The candidate appeared wearing blue jeans and a blue shirt, standing alone rather than surrounded by family or supporters. The only people in the background were the young volunteers he had worked with on Wednesday.

The announcement also highlighted the changing shape of political communication. Edwards had no prepared text, spoke briefly and took a few questions from reporters. But before that, he had declared his candidacy with a video posted through his campaign Web site on YouTube, with an e-mail sent overnight to supporters and with five interviews on morning television shows.

Edwards picked a traditionally slow news week to declare his candidacy, hoping to draw more attention to what is often a well-scripted ritual lacking in suspense. By moving early, Edwards also avoided being overshadowed by the anticipated entries of celebrities Clinton and Obama, who will make their intentions known in January.

Edwards begins his campaign well positioned to compete for the nomination. He tops public opinion polls of Democrats in Iowa, which will hold the first caucuses of 2008; retains a base in South Carolina, whose primary he won in 2004; and has built good relationships with organized labor in Nevada, which is scheduled to hold the second set of caucuses of the election season.

One question mark among the early states is New Hampshire, which holds the nation's first primary. Edwards finished fourth there in 2004, but aides say he has improved his standing there since that primary.

Another question surrounding Edwards's candidacy is whether he will be able to compete against Clinton and Obama in fundraising.

Edwards has been running steadily for president since he and Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) lost to Bush and Vice President Cheney in 2004. He made his first post-election trip to New Hampshire in February 2005 and campaigned tirelessly for Democrats running in the midterm elections.

He set up a poverty institute at the University of North Carolina and, when Hurricane Katrina focused attention on the plight of the underclass in America, renewed his calls for a new commitment to eliminate poverty. He also campaigned on behalf of ballot initiatives calling for an increase in the minimum wage.

He sought to strengthen his foreign policy credentials -- a notable weakness in his first campaign -- through involvement with the Council on Foreign Relations. Asked Thursday about his national security rÃ©sumÃ©, Edwards said experience is no substitute for good judgment and cited the administration's record as evidence.

"We've had one of the most experienced foreign policy teams in American history," he said, pointing to Cheney and former defense secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. "They've been an absolute disaster by any measure."

Edwards, 53, made millions of dollars as a trial lawyer in North Carolina before entering politics in 1998. He won a Senate seat that year, defeating incumbent Republican Sen. Lauch Faircloth. He established a reputation as a quick study, a shrewd and tough questioner, and one of the party's rising stars -- prompting him to run for president after just four years in public life.

His 2004 campaign lagged for months but caught fire just before the Iowa caucuses, where he finished second to Kerry. He parlayed that success into a victory in South Carolina, and his performance in the primaries earned him a slot on the Democratic ticket.

After events in New Orleans on Thursday, Edwards flew to Iowa for a more traditional campaign rally in Des Moines, marking his 16th visit to Iowa since the end of the 2004 campaign.

At a town hall meeting, he fielded questions on energy, education, the deficit, Iraq and his past support for the war. "At the end of the day, I voted yes and I should not have," he said. "I'm the one who's responsible for that."

Edwards Launches Presidential Bid From New Orleans (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, December 28, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — John Edwards launched his second bid for the Democratic presidential nomination this morning amid the wreckage of Hurricane Katrina, saying the next president's most important task will be to provide moral leadership at home and abroad.

DOJ_NMG_0110308

"We need to be the example for the rest of the world," Edwards, dressed in jeans and work boots, said as he stood with a cadre of student volunteers in a muddy yard in New Orleans' 9th Ward, between two houses gutted by the August 2005 disaster.

The former North Carolina senator, his party's 2004 vice presidential nominee, said he is committed to universal health care, ending poverty and showing the world that "we have the moral authority to lead."

Edwards, 53, made the unconventional choice of New Orleans during a holiday week to announce his 2008 candidacy. The location highlighted his longtime theme of "two Americas," one for the 'haves' and the other for the 'have-nots,' and a new call to grassroots action. The timing was meant to grab some attention before the Democratic field swells in coming weeks.

New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama say they'll announce their plans after the holidays. Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack and Rep. Dennis Kucinich of Ohio already are in the race. Other prospects include New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson and Sens. Joe Biden of Delaware, Christopher Dodd of Connecticut and 2004 nominee John Kerry of Massachusetts.

As president, Edwards said, he would make investments in health, education and other areas that would require rolling back some tax cuts for the wealthy. But he also said Americans should take steps now to rebuild New Orleans, help the poor, reduce global warming and use less energy rather than waiting for the federal government or the next president to do it.

Edwards called his vote to authorize the Iraq war "a mistake" for which he takes full responsibility. The one-term senator said he has been "all over the world" in the last two years and has increased his depth of knowledge of world affairs.

He said it's fair to question his level of experience but said that doesn't guarantee vision or good judgment. He cited President Bush, Vice President Cheney and former Defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld prove his point. They were "extraordinarily experienced," he said, but their tenure has been "an absolute disaster by any measure."

He criticized the Bush administration for making it difficult to engage other countries on international problems. "The world is literally in chaos," he said. "When America doesn't lead, there is no stability. We are the stabilizing force in the world."

New Orleans was the first stop on a three-day tour that was taking Edwards to all four early primary-season states — Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada — before arriving home in Chapel Hill, N.C. for a welcome rally Saturday.

Edwards is no longer a new face on the national stage, and this time around his rivals may well include two presidential newcomers — Obama and Clinton — with significant star power. Still, Edwards is not quite David taking on two Goliaths, as Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh characterized himself when he abruptly quit the race earlier this month.

Polls of the states that kick off the primary season, Iowa and New Hampshire, show Edwards holding his own. In Iowa he is leading or tied for first place in polls taken in June, October and December. In New Hampshire, a Concord Monitor poll this month found Clinton and Obama at 22% and 21% respectively, followed by Edwards at 16%. Everyone else in single digits.

"As with his polling in Iowa, he's showing a certain strength here in New Hampshire as well. He's certainly going to be a contender," said Ray Buckley, the incoming chairman of the New Hampshire Democratic Party.

Since the 2004 election, Edwards has headed a new Center on Poverty, Work and Opportunity at the University of North Carolina and started a College for Everyone tuition program now being tested in a county in North Carolina. In June he proposed tax cuts for low-income families, incentives to save, a last-chance temporary jobs program, $1 million in housing vouchers for poor families and other steps as part of a plan to end poverty by 2036.

Edwards also has traveled the country cultivating labor support and promoting minimum wage hikes, part of his anti-poverty plan. He helped fellow Democrats raise $8.5 million for their campaigns and parties. He visited London, Russia, India, Brussels, Israel, Uganda and China.

Edwards' wife, Elizabeth, underwent treatments for breast cancer that was diagnosed the day after the 2004 election. He said Thursday that she is in good health.

Edwards Vows To Restore US Image In Bid For Presidency (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopuloin Washington

Financial Times, December 29, 2006

John Edwards, the former North Carolina senator and Democratic vice-presidential nominee, yesterday became the fourth Democrat to enter the 2008 race for the White House.

Mr Edwards vowed to run on a platform of de-feating poverty and combating global warming. But he said his top priority would be restoring America's image.

"The biggest responsibility of the next president of the United States is to re-establish America's leadership role in the world, starting with Iraq," said Mr Edwards. "We have to show that we have the moral authority to lead. You can't lead through raw power."

DOJ_NMG_0110309

Mr Edwards, who became John Kerry's running mate in 2004 after failing to secure the Democratic presidential nomination, spoke just hours before President George W. Bush held a national security meeting at his Texas ranch to discuss options for Iraq.

Mr Edwards joined Joseph Biden, the incoming Democratic chairman of the Senate foreign relations committee who this week also announced his intention to run for the White House, in opposing more US troops for Iraq, an option considered by Mr Bush.

National polls of voters in Democratic primary elections show Mr Edwards running in third position behind Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama, both of whom are mulling running for the White House.

A recent NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll found that 14 per cent of respondents favoured Mr Edwards, compared with 18 per cent for Mr Obama. Ms Clinton led the pack with 37 per cent. However, a recent poll of voters in Iowa - a key state as it holds the first primary - showed Mr Edwards tied with Mr Obama at 22 per cent, ahead of Ms Clinton with 10 per cent.

In announcing his candidacy, Mr Edwards ap-peared to model himself on John F. Kennedy, who famously called on Americans to "ask not what your country can do for you, ask what you can do for your country". Dressed in jeans as he spoke from the hurricane-ravaged city of New Orleans, Mr Edwards said: "If . . . we want to move America that way it needs to move, we're going to have to do it, all of us, together. Instead of staying home and complaining, we're asking people to help."

In 2004 Mr Edwards ran on an anti-poverty populist campaign of two Americas - the haves and have-nots. Yesterday he focused more on foreign policy. He said the US needed to get more involved in solving the crisis in Darfur and said America should join the International Criminal Court. Asked about his relative inexperience in foreign policy, Mr Edwards replied that "one of the most experienced foreign policy teams in American history" - Donald Rumsfeld and Dick Cheney - had been "an absolute disaster".

Edwards Embarks On Cross-Country Tour To Advance His Candidacy (BLOOM)

By Nicholas Johnston

Bloomberg, December 29, 2006

Dec. 29 (Bloomberg) -- Former Senator John Edwards embarked on a cross-country campaign to promote his new presidential bid after getting the jump on some fellow Democrats by announcing his populist candidacy in hurricane-ravaged New Orleans.

Seeking to build support against a formidable slate of possible opponents, the North Carolina Democrat appeared at a town hall meeting in Iowa, home to the nation's first presidential caucus, before heading to New Hampshire, site of the first primary election in 2008. In Iowa, Edwards is tied in early polls with Barack Obama and ahead of Hillary Clinton, two senators who are likely to join the race soon.

``Man, it's great to be back in Iowa," Edwards told several hundred people who packed the Iowa State Historical Museum in Des Moines last night. ``I've been to Iowa a time or two," he said to laughter from the crowd. It was Edwards's 16th trip to the state in the past two years.

The holiday-season entry into the race and early campaign foray by Edwards are designed to lessen the advantage Clinton and Obama enjoy as early favorites.

The Democratic contest ``is being presented so generally in the media as a race between Hillary and Obama," said Stephen Hess, a presidential scholar at the Brookings Institution in Washington. Edwards is well-positioned for ``somebody slipping on a banana peel."

Rob Tully, an attorney who helped run Edwards's 2004 presidential campaign in Iowa, said there is a lot of ``hype" surrounding other candidates. Edwards, by practicing ``retail politics" now in key states, will have the organization and connection with voters to win the early contests, he said.

Second-Place Finish

Edwards, 53, placed second in Iowa in 2004 and fourth in New Hampshire before dropping out to become the vice-presidential running mate of the victor in both states, Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts.

``It's still Iowa and New Hampshire in terms of momentum," Tully said. ``You can just ask President Dean how important the Iowa caucuses are."

Former Vermont Governor Howard Dean, an early media favorite in 2004, placed third in Iowa, second in New Hampshire the following week and withdrew soon after.

``I'm doing my by best to allow people to see who I am and what it is I believe and how important I think it is to engage Americans and bring about the changes we need," Edwards said in an interview.

Iraq War

DOJ_NMG_0110310

At the Iowa rally, Edwards said he would work to ``restore America's moral leadership in the world'' by beginning to pull U.S. forces from Iraq and again acknowledged he was wrong to vote to authorize the war as a senator in 2002. ``It was a mistake and I take responsibility for that,'' Edwards said.

He kicked off his campaign yesterday in the backyard of Oleria Tyler of New Orleans, whose home was severely damaged by Hurricane Katrina in 2005. Edwards accused the Bush administration of neglecting poorer residents trying to recover from the storm.

``New Orleans, in so many ways, shows the two Americas that I have talked about in the past,'' Edwards said, returning to his theme of a nation divided by wealth and poverty.

In a recent survey of 400 Iowa Democrats who are likely to attend the state's presidential caucuses in January 2008, Edwards polled 22 percent, tied for first with Obama. Iowa Governor Tom Vilsack came in second with 12 percent and Clinton was third with 10 percent.

In New Hampshire

The survey, conducted Dec. 18-20 by polling firm Research 2000, has a margin of error of 5 percentage points.

After his appearance in Iowa, Edwards flew to Portsmouth, New Hampshire, where today he holds a town hall meeting at an elementary school.

A poll of 400 New Hampshire Democrats conducted by Research 2000 found Clinton and Obama virtually tied with 22 percent and 21 percent respectively. Edwards polled third with 16 percent.

``He has a certain degree of name recognition and a pretty fat Rolodex,'' Hess said. ``He's still very much a player and, very obviously, he's a very attractive person and a very good speaker.''

Edwards is making his 10th trip to New Hampshire since the 2004 election, and the current campaign swing also includes stops in Nevada and South Carolina, which hold early contests for the Democratic nomination.

Since the 2004 election, Edwards has visited 39 states and raised more then $8.5 million for Democratic candidates in this year's congressional elections.

Tully said Edwards, a trial lawyer and seasoned politician, has the speaking skills to help him in Iowa where the winner is picked in public meetings. The system requires successful candidates to generate enthusiasm among caucus-goers to get them to speak on their behalf to other voters.

``It really is about touching these people to make them want to not only go there and stand and say, `I'm for John Edwards,' but to actually voice their reasoning why,'' Tully said. ``The people who show up are going to be there because they want this guy to be president of the United States.''

Edwards Brings Campaign Launch Tour To Des Moines (DMR)

By Abby Simons

Des Moines Register, December 29, 2006

Greeting cheering supporters the day he announced his second bid for the presidency, former vice presidential candidate John Edwards stripped off his jacket and said it's great to be back in Iowa.

"And I have to tell you, it's even better to be back as candidate for president of the United States," he said at a Thursday evening town hall meeting at the Iowa State Historical Building in Des Moines.

Touting the slogan "Tomorrow Begins Today," Edwards, 53, a former senator from North Carolina, pledged a grass-roots campaign that begins with domestic issues, such as eliminating poverty and strengthening the middle class — hence Thursday morning's campaign announcement in Katrina-ravaged New Orleans.

Edwards said that he is working on a true universal health care plan, not just access to health care or affordable health care. It's part of taking care of the nation's people and America proving itself once again as a model for the rest of the world, he said.

"We need to be patriotic for something other than just war," he said.

Edwards also spoke about foreign policy issues, including beginning the process of removing troops from Iraq.

"There is so much we need to do, starting with America's moral leadership in the world," he said.

"That morality begins with Iraq, and it would be an enormous mistake to begin with the McCain doctrine," he said of Arizona Republican Sen. John McCain's proposal to put more troops in Iraq. "It needs to be made clear that our troops are not going to stay in Iraq, and the best way to make that clear is to actually start leaving."

Edwards repeatedly pointed out that he voted for the occupation of Iraq in 2003, but he said he did so because of information received while he was a member of the Senate Intelligence Committee. He maintains that he has spoken out against it since.

DOJ_NMG_0110311

"I'm not responsible for the condition of this war. That's Bush, Cheney and Rumsfeld," he said referring to the president, the vice president, and the former secretary of defense.

He also focused on the dangers of global warming and America's energy crisis and addiction to oil. Each issue had one unifying factor, he pointed out. Every American could take part in making the country better not just by supporting him, but by taking action of their own.

"I don't want us to stand by and wait for the next election and the next president to solve these problems — although we have some hopes for that — but we want to start taking responsibility now, and doi ng things now," he said.

Taking questions Edwards answered several questions from supporters during the 90-minute town hall meeting, ranging from the federal No Child Left Behind education law to the situation in the Middle East.

The first question concerned his position on immigration. Edwards conceded that while the nation's southern border does need to be secured, law-abiding immigrants who have entered the country illegally should be allowed to stay, after paying a fine and learning to speak English.

Supporter Gary Smith, 56, of Iowa City asked Edwards about the nation's ever-growing deficit and what he would do to fix it. Edwards responded that while it was a concern, eliminating poverty, global warming and other domestic issues took precedence. While not the answer Smith was looking for, he said his support for Edwards didn't waver.

"I was a little disappointed that he didn't have much to say about the Chinese in the context of our national deficit and how we've mortgaged our debt to them," Smith said. "It's not a very sexy issue, but we could find ourselves destroying our economy, and these guys hold most of it."

Smith, who caucused for John Kerry in 2004, calls Edwards an attractive candidate, but said he will see what other campaigns bring. Regardless, he didn't think Edwards announcement was too early.

About unions Pat and Theresa Navin of Winterset, both labor union supporters, agreed with much of what Edwards had to say, but most of all agreed with his several mentions of expanding unions. The Navins believe it's important for more than just the workers themselves.

"I think he was great before, and he'll be great again," Theresa Navin said. "Anyone who is pro-union, pro-worker and pro-family has my support. Strong unions equate with a strong middle class. Everyone just wants a livable wage. The middle class is supporting the entire country, and we're tired of it."

Edwards Announces Run For Presidency (BOS)

By Susan Milligan, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, December 29, 2006

Pressure is on Kerry to decide

WASHINGTON -- Former senator John Edwards formally announced his candidacy for president yesterday, further crowding an early Democratic field for the nomination and putting added pressure on his former running mate, Massachusetts Senator John Kerry, to decide whether he will make a second bid for president.

Speaking in New Orleans to showcase the problems still facing the city ravaged by Hurricane Katrina, a blue jeans-clad Edwards called for greater volunteer participation by the public and new leadership from the government -- starting with an immediate, gradual pull out from Iraq.

"We need to make it clear that we intend to leave Iraq and turn over the responsibility of Iraq to the Iraqi people," said Edwards, 53, a former North Carolina senator. "The best way to make that clear is to actually start leaving," he said, beginning with the removal of 40,000 to 50,000 troops. Edwards rejected the idea of a "surge" of extra troops to stabilize Iraq, a plan under consideration by the Bush administration.

The 2004 Democratic vice presidential nominee repeated his regret over having voted to authorize the war in Iraq in 2002 but said the Bush administration -- including Vice President Dick Cheney and former defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld -- were to blame for the way the Iraq war has played out over the last three and a half years.

"It's important to note, for anybody who voted for the war, that we didn't conduct the war," Edwards said. "Bush, Cheney, those people -- Rumsfeld, they conducted the war. And they have been an absolute disaster in the conducting of the war."

Edwards' entry into the race as the third candidate for the Democratic nomination puts pressure on Kerry to make his decision, since the two former colleagues and running mates will be competing for a finite pool of money and support, analysts said. Former Iowa Governor Tom Vilsack and Ohio Representative Dennis Kucinich have already announced their candidacies for the Democratic nomination, and observers believe early front-runners Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Senator Barack Obama of Illinois may not be far behind. New Mexico Governor Bill Richardson and Democratic Senators Christopher Dodd of Connecticut and Joseph Biden of Delaware have also broadcast their interest in the race.

DOJ_NMG_0110312

"It's one more indication that if Kerry's going to get in, he needs to get in fairly quickly," said Merle Black , a political science professor and campaign specialist at Emory University in Atlanta. "He's going to have trouble raising money and getting staff."

Kerry spokesman David Wade said the senator would announce his intentions after New Year's Day but felt no need to rush his decision.

"Senator Kerry, having run before, has a national network of donors, supporters, and operatives, which have hung together these last two years . . . [He] is certainly in a position to wait until January to make a decision," Wade said, quickly adding that the announcement would not necessarily come in January.

"His decision will have absolutely nothing to do with other candidates." Wade said.

Kerry has campaigned assiduously for key Democrats in state and local races since he lost the presidency in 2004 and has given out and raised $14 million for Democratic contenders across the country, seeking to build loyalties that could be critical in a crowded Democratic primary. But Kerry is still haunted by his loss in 2004, a race many Democrats feel was his to lose.

"Kerry would be upstaged by Edwards now, I think. There's no discernible support for a second Kerry effort," Black said.

Edwards is doing well in early polls in Iowa, but Kerry supporters say the Massachusetts senator has a natural regional advantage in the first-primary state of New Hampshire, which Kerry won in 2004. Either man could position himself to be the candidate-in-waiting, should Democratic voters decide that Clinton is unelectable and Obama too inexperienced for the job, said Lee Miringoff, director of the Marist Institute for Public Opinion in Poughkeepsie, N.Y.

"The difficulty Kerry has is that people now have other places to go, and they're going there," said Peter Fenn , a Democratic consultant. But Kerry, more than any other candidate, can afford to wait longer to announce because of his 2004 experience, Fenn said.

The 2008 race has attracted numerous presidential hopefuls but is already narrowing; some candidates have pulled out of the race even earlier than candidates used to announce their intentions to run in earlier presidential contests.

Former president Bill Clinton did not start campaigning in earnest in New Hampshire until late 1991, just a few months ahead of the 1992 primary, but would-be 2008 contenders have already started visiting the Granite State and assessing support.

Senator Clinton, the former president's wife, is expected in New Hampshire in February, a state party official said.

"I think that folks who are serious about this will probably want a year before the primary to build their organizations and to be working hard in New Hampshire," said Paul Hodes , a Democrat who will officially become one of his state's two congressmen when he takes the oath of office next week.

"They are honing their messages and figuring out what is or is not resonating."

Senator Evan Bayh , an Indiana Democrat who recently withdrew from the 2008 race, was approached about running for president soon after Kerry lost in 2004, Bayh's former spokesman, Dan Pfeiffer said.

In earlier election cycles, Bayh might have waited to gauge support for a presidential run, but this year, he had to start early because of the immense pressure to raise campaign cash, Pfeiffer said.

"You have to start raising money, hiring staff, and courting activists almost two years ahead of the first primary," Pfeiffer said.

"They're forced to get in [the race] before they can make any rational analysis" of whether they can win, he said.

The Populist Persuasion (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'Grady

The Wall Street Journal, December 29, 2006

There were 11 presidential elections in Latin America in the past 13 months and left-of-center candidates captured the vast majority. Yet while extremists like Venezuela's President Hugo Chávez and Bolivia's Evo Morales got most of the headline ink, it is not true that the region is undergoing a democratically led shift to the hard left.

On the contrary, in those countries where democratic institutions held steady, this year's presidential winners were overwhelmingly either moderates from the center-left or the center-right. Gains by hard-left reactionaries occurred only where institutions had collapsed.

The survival of competitive democracy under a rule of law in most of the region is the good news at the start of 2007. The bad news is that old-fashioned Latin populism -- what John Edwards is hawking to the U.S. electorate for 2008 -- is as chic in the region today as it was 25 years ago, and its persistence is seriously threatening Latin progress.

As we embark on 2007, chavismo is widely considered the mother of all worrying trends in Latin America, and it should be. The Venezuelan weapons buildup has terrifying implications. Yet those who value democracy and freedom would be well advised to pay at least as much attention to the intransigence of populism -- a more insidious but equally dangerous source of poverty and instability -- in the rest of Latin political culture.

To make a proper analysis of the political scene at the start of 2007, let's first dispel the myth that Latin Americans rushed to embrace Marxist revolution at the polls in 2006. There were hard-left "victories" in Venezuela and Bolivia but neither of those elections qualify as democratic. The Venezuelan contest was riddled with irregularities, including an unaudited voter registry, a Chávez-controlled judiciary and electoral council, and the incumbent's unlimited use of state oil revenues in the campaign. It is impossible to divine voter preferences in that race.

In Bolivia, Mr. Morales was chosen at the polls but only after he led, from the streets, a violent overthrow of two constitutional governments and showed that he was willing to paralyze the nation with more violence if he didn't get power. Many working Bolivians said that they voted for him because they saw it as the only way to end the chaos. Mr. Morales was also strengthened by his defense of coca growers who see the U.S. war on drugs as an assault on their family income.

What more than doubled the number of "leftist" victories in the region in 2006 were the electoral outcomes in Brazil, Chile, Peru and Costa Rica. Yet none of the winners in these races can be lumped together with the megalomaniacal Mr. Chávez -- who now says he wants to do away with profits and adopt a barter economy. Brazil's Luiz Inácio "Lula" da Silva, Chile's Michelle Bachelet, Peru's Alan García and Costa Rica's Oscar Arias are all social democrats who recognize their constitutional limits and have taken a pragmatic approach to the political economy, acknowledging the importance of global capital flows, international trade and macroeconomic stability. Even Nicaragua's Sandinista President-elect Daniel Ortega claims that he has had an epiphany on macroeconomic matters.

Perhaps we ought to be grateful for so much enlightenment among Latin leftists who once swore allegiance to wacky socialist economics. Yet it's still not time to celebrate. Class warfare, utopian egalitarianism, and public monopolies remain the staples of the Latin left's political diet. And even reformers like Colombia's Álvaro Uribe and Mexico's Felipe Calderón appear ill-equipped to make a clean break from state paternalism. Among the more troublesome signs of this retrograde thinking is Ms. Bachelet's pledge to expand the Chilean welfare state à la Europe, just at the time when Europe is frantically trying to figure out how to dismantle the same.

The politics of public choice explains part of this backwardness. Special interests will fight to the death to preserve their privileges and the attack on "neo-liberalism" is at bottom little more than a reaction from the biggest special interest of all -- the state -- to threats to its power.

But there is another reason too, I think, that Latin America cannot seem to get out of the spin cycle of populism. And that is the intellectual impoverishment the region suffered in the second half of the 20th century, when the state got control of academia and liberal debate about what constitutes a free society was silenced. The observation of Venezuelan-born journalist Carlos Ball in this column on Jan. 5, 2001 -- that after 40 years of far-left control of "the schools, universities and arts" in Venezuela "the general public [had] fallen under a well-organized system of leftist indoctrination" -- applies to the vast majority of Latin nations.

Manuel Ayau, a founder of the academically prestigious, and private, Francisco Marroquín University in Guatemala City, recognized this threat in the late 1950s at the state-run San Carlos University. That school, he says, was based on "populist norms" and "was leading our society to radicalization and intolerance." He started Marroquín based on the conviction that "universities need to place themselves beyond the conflicts of their time so that science and academic freedom -- which humankind will need at all times -- may be preserved." This, of course, could not occur once Latin America's universities became political tools.

The most famous counter-punch to this demise of intellectual rigor was the exchange program between the University of Chicago and Catholic University in Chile, which began in the 1950s under the guidance of Theodore Schultz. That effort produced the intellectual heft Chile needed to implement liberal economic reform in the 1970s and 1980s.

Defeating chavismo is as much about refuting an ideology that rejects individual liberty as it is about containing a military threat. This requires a challenge to the populist paradigm that now pervades Latin political thought. It is an achievable goal but one that, as Mr. Ayau can attest after years of hard work, won't come easy. Until we get such an intellectual breakthrough, expect persistent instability and lots of Latin emigrants, with or without Mr. Chávez.

Obama Joins '08 Hopefuls In Call Against Troop Surge (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, December 29, 2006

Sen. Barack Obama yesterday joined a chorus of potential Democratic presidential candidates criticizing U.S. policy in Iraq, telling supporters he opposes sending more troops and urging them to send letters to persuade President Bush to change the course of the war.

Democrats considering White House bids have spent the past several weeks outlining, clarifying and strengthening their positions on Iraq as Mr. Bush weighs his options.

DOJ_NMG_0110314

The president, who met yesterday with key advisers, plans to announce a new strategy for the war early next month. He is thought to favor sending 20,000 to 40,000 additional troops to Baghdad, an idea several Democratic White House prospects have criticized.

In an e-mail titled "Escalation is not the answer," Mr. Obama yesterday asked voters to tell Mr. Bush "our soldiers are not numbers to add just because someone couldn't think of a better idea."

The Illinois Democrat's message includes a link to the White House's "contact" page.

"They are our sons and daughters, our brothers and sisters, our neighbors and friends who are willing to wave goodbye to everything they've ever known just for the chance to serve their country," Mr. Obama said of the troops. "Our men and women in uniform are doing a terrific job under extremely difficult conditions. But our government has failed them so many times over the last few years, and we simply cannot afford to do it again. We must not multiply the mistakes of yesterday, we must end them today."

He repeated his call to begin a phased troop withdrawal and send a signal "that ours is not an open-ended commitment."

It is a message more hopefuls and potential candidates are echoing as the 2008 election nears.

"Iraq is a question that dominates the political focus of both parties," said Rep. Duncan Hunter of California, who will seek the Republican presidential nomination.

Mr. Obama, who used the term "quagmire" to describe Iraq, reminds supporters that he has spoken against the war since 2002.

It's a subtle dig at likely Democratic candidate Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, who each voted for the war but now oppose it.

Mr. Edwards, the 2004 vice presidential nominee, announced yesterday that he is making another bid for the presidency.

Last year, Mr. Edwards said in an editorial that voting for the war in October 2002 was a mistake. He wants to withdraw 40,000 troops immediately.

"What we need to do is make it clear that we're not going to stay there forever as an occupying force," he said on CNN's "American Morning."

Mrs. Clinton said last week on NBC's "Today" show that she cannot support increasing troop levels unless it is part of a larger plan to end the violence in Iraq.

But the idea of a surge in troops has at least one prominent supporter -- likely Republican presidential contender Sen. John McCain of Arizona.

Mr. McCain's call for more troops prompted Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, an announced 2008 Democratic candidate, to start his own letter-writing petition.

"Your suggestion to deploy additional American servicemen and women to Iraq would make a big mistake even bigger," Mr. Vilsack wrote in a letter to Mr. McCain that he has asked supporters to sign.

Democratic Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich of Ohio, also seeking the nomination as an anti-war candidate, has proposed completely cutting off funds for the war as a way to end it.

"We should not be thinking about spending more money and sending more troops," he says on his Web site.

Other Democratic presidential hopefuls opposing a surge are incoming Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and Sen. Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut.

Mr. Hunter, the outgoing chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, said yesterday that he recommended that Mr. Bush hold off on a troop surge and instead send equipped and trained Iraqi battalions into Baghdad.

"Nothing matures a military force quicker than actual combat operations," he said, adding that those Iraqi troops could use the experience, and are "a truck ride away from battle."

"If you push the insurgency back in Baghdad with an American force that is temporary, you achieve only a temporary stability," he said.

Franks Backs A McCain Rival For White House (AR)

By Billy House

Arizona Republic, December 29, 2006

WASHINGTON - One of Arizona's most conservative U.S. House members is endorsing a California congressman over Sen. John McCain for the 2008 GOP presidential nomination, saying it is "what's right for America."

"I think the senator knows there's nothing personal on my part," Rep. Trent Franks said of his support of Rep. Duncan Hunter. Hunter, outgoing chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, begins his 14th term next month as a congressman from the San Diego area.

DOJ_NMG_0110315

Franks said he already has stumped alongside Hunter, who advocates in favor of strong military and for border security. Hunter announced the formation of his presidential exploratory committee in October.

advertisement

Craig Goldman, a spokesman for McCain's presidential exploratory committee, had no comment on Franks' endorsement.

Franks said he knows that his early backing of the lesser-known Hunter will raise eyebrows, given that his own state's senior senator is considering a run for the White House.

But without criticizing McCain directly, Franks described Hunter as a candidate who "is an unequivocal social conservative and fiscal conservative and has a consistent conservative voting record."

"He is one of the true Reagan Revolutionaries in Congress," Franks said.

McCain is considered a leading candidate for the 2008 GOP nomination. His contrary positions on issues important to conservatives, including campaign finance, the environment, judicial nominees and gun control, have led to strained relations with some in the party. But for more than a year, McCain has been saddling up more often with President Bush and reaching out to the hard-core Republican base and Religious Right.

Hunter was one of a few House members to endorse McCain in the 2000 GOP presidential primaries, although he voiced objection to McCain's attack on evangelical leaders. Franks was not a member of Congress then.

Sen. Jon Kyl and Rep. Jeff Flake, two of Arizona's four other Republicans in the new Congress that begins next week, said Thursday that they are backing McCain. Reps. John Shadegg and Rick Renzi could not be reached.

"I will play whatever role he asks me to play," Kyl said of McCain.

"It's a poor secret that I will be endorsing him," Flake said. As for Franks' endorsement of Hunter, Flake said "that's certainly his choice; McCain is not going to have a heavy hand here."

Franks' decision to endorse Hunter over his fellow Arizonan is not much of a blow to McCain, one analyst said.

"Trent Franks seems to be acting on principle because he's certainly not going with the easy winner," said David Mark, politics editor at a new Capitol Hill newspaper and Web site that will launch next month. "Most people haven't heard of Duncan Hunter, nor have they heard of Trent Franks, with all due respect."

Franks described Hunter as "a bold, Valley Forge, Ronald Reagan Republican who holds the temperament and philosophical foundations to lead this country to its greatest heights yet."

He noted that Hunter, a Vietnam War veteran and recipient of the Bronze Star, also is "an expert in national defense and matters surrounding the war on terror, as much as anyone in Congress." As Armed Services chairman, Hunter has had a big say on military issues. But he loses that post when Democrats take control of the House.

Franks, who is entering his third term in Congress, has worked with Hunter as a member of that committee.

McCain, himself a decorated Vietnam veteran, will be the ranking Republican on the Senate's Armed Services Committee in the new Congress and is viewed as an expert on defense issues.

Franks noted that Hunter played a leading role in legislation calling for a fence, which is nearing construction, along the U.S.-Mexican border near San Diego, and co-authored legislation to extend that fence as much as 700 miles, including into Arizona.

McCain voted in favor of the fence.

When Hunter announced the formation of his exploratory committee in San Diego, Franks was the only member of Congress to appear at the event.

"Looking at the makeup of the (GOP presidential) field right now, I see an awful lot of room on the conservative side of the ledger," Franks said.

"When people understand who Duncan Hunter is, he will go from long shot to someone people will be paying a whole lot of attention to."

And if that doesn't happen?

"If Senator McCain gains the momentum, I will adopt him," Franks said. "In the meantime, I'm endorsing Duncan Hunter."

A Failed Revolution (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

After first attempting to deny the scale of last month's defeat, the apologists have settled on a story line that sounds just like Marxist explanations for the failure of the Soviet Union. What happened, you see, was that the noble ideals of the Republican revolution of 1994 were undermined by Washington's corrupting ways. And the recent defeat was a good thing, because it will force a return to the true conservative path.

DOJ_NMG_0110316

But the truth is that the movement that took power in 1994 — a movement that had little to do with true conservatism — was always based on a lie.

The lie is right there in "The Freedom Revolution," the book that Dick Armey, who had just become the House majority leader, published in 1995. He declares that most government programs don't do anything "to help American families with the needs of everyday life," and that "very few American families would notice their disappearance." He goes on to assert that "there is no reason we cannot, by the time our children come of age, reduce the federal government by half as a percentage of gross domestic product."

Right. Somehow, I think more than a few families would notice the disappearance of Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid — and those three programs alone account for a majority of nondefense, noninterest spending. The truth is that the government delivers services and security that people want. Yes, there's some waste — just as there is in any large organization. But there are no big programs that are easy to cut.

As long as people like Mr. Armey, Newt Gingrich and Tom DeLay were out of power, they could run on promises to eliminate vast government waste that existed only in the public's imagination — all those welfare queens driving Cadillacs. But once in power, they couldn't deliver.

That's why government by the radical right has been an utter failure even on its own terms: the government hasn't shrunk. Federal outlays other than interest payments and defense spending are a higher percentage of G.D.P. today than they were when Mr. Armey wrote his book: 14.8 percent in fiscal 2006, compared with 13.8 percent in fiscal 1995.

Unable to make good on its promises, the G.O.P., like other failed revolutionary movements, tried to maintain its grip by exploiting its position of power. Friends were rewarded with patronage: Jack Abramoff began building his web of corruption almost as soon as Republicans took control. Adversaries were harassed with smear campaigns and witch hunts: Congress spent six years and many millions of dollars investigating a failed land deal, and Bill Clinton was impeached over a consensual affair.

But it wasn't enough. Without 9/11, the Republican revolution would probably have petered out quietly, with the loss of Congress in 2002 and the White House in 2004. Instead, the atrocity created a window of opportunity: four extra years gained by drowning out unfavorable news with terror alerts, starting a gratuitous war, and accusing Democrats of being weak on national security.

Yet the Bush administration failed to convert this electoral success into progress on a right-wing domestic agenda. The collapse of the push to privatize Social Security recapitulated the failure of the Republican revolution as a whole. Once the administration was forced to get specific about the details, it became obvious that private accounts couldn't produce something for nothing, and the public's support vanished.

In the end, Republicans didn't shrink the government. But they did degrade it. Baghdad and New Orleans are the arrival destinations of a movement based on deep contempt for governance.

Is that the end for the radical right? Probably not. As a long-suffering civil servant once told me, bad policy ideas are like cockroaches: you can flush them down the toilet, but they keep coming back. Many of the ideas that failed in the Bush years had previously failed in the Reagan years. So there's no reason to assume they're gone for good.

Indeed, it appears that loss of power and the ensuing lack of accountability is liberating right-wingers to lie yet again: since last month's election, I've noticed a number of Social Security privatizers propounding the same free-lunch falsehoods that the Bush administration had to abandon in the face of demands that it present an actual plan.

Still, the Republican revolution of 1994 is over. And not a moment too soon.

Latinos: Can You Hear Us Now? (USAT)

By Raul Reyes

USA Today, December 29, 2006

In my East Los Angeles high school, dividing lines among student groups were common, even among Latinos. Gang members were known as Lowriders, Spanish-speaking kids were called Beaners, and assimilated Hispanics like me were derisively referred to as Coconuts — brown on the outside, white on the inside.

The only thing we had in common was that we all looked down on another group: our immigrant classmates who occupied the bottom rung of the social ladder and were practically invisible.

How times have changed: 2006 was the "Year of the Immigrant," driven by a fierce national debate over what the country should do about 12 million undocumented immigrants. The subsequent restrictive policy proposals were not surprising. But the massive pro-immigrant marches were astonishing, and invigorating.

As the grandson of an illegal alien, I was proud to see so many aspiring Americans coming out of the shadows and participating in democracy. The debate motivated Hispanics to flex their political muscle. This summer, the Pew Center found that 75% of Latinos believed their ethnic group would be more likely to vote in the fall elections, and two-thirds thought the protests could lead to a new social movement. But a majority also reported seeing a rise in discrimination. Maybe the nascent immigrant rights movement came on too strong. Was it the Mexican flags at rallies? Or the Spanish version of The Star-Spangled Banner?

Of course, not all Hispanics support the rights of undocumented workers. Like other Americans, we're split on the issue. But by fall, the intolerant tone of conservatives only served to remind us of our own roots. So did passage of several restrictive local laws aimed at illegal aliens, as well as congressional approval of a 700-mile fence along the U.S.-Mexico border.

So in the congressional elections, Latinos deserted the party of The Fence. According to national exit polls, 69% of Hispanics voted Democratic, while 29% went Republican. This was a significant shift for Latinos, who in 2004 gave President Bush 44% of their votes. Democrats now have the challenge of retaining a Hispanic constituency that is increasingly complicated. No doubt, the immigration issue will not fade. But for me, hope arrived Oct. 17 at 7:46 a.m. in New York, where Emanuel Plata was born. Heralded as the 300 millionth American, he's a perfect symbol of his time: born to Mexican immigrants, in Queens, the nation's most diverse county, with lingering questions about his milestone status. But Emanuel will come of age in a society where Hispanics have more influence and visibility than ever. That's because in 2006, Latinos emerged in force and made sure their voices were heard.

Walking A Tightrope Into 2007 (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

As the new year approaches, I think of three people who symbolize for me some of the difficulties of the year we have just lived through and also the promise and potential of the one ahead. Each of them reminds me that we are walking into the future balanced on a tightrope.

The first is Mohammad Baqer Qalibaf, the mayor of Tehran. As an official of the Islamic Republic of Iran, he is part of a regime that posed the biggest strategic challenge to the United States in 2006. But he also embodies Iran's potential to become a great nation -- and perhaps to escape the apocalyptic confrontation with the West that is proclaimed by his political rival, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

For all of Ahmadinejad's headline-grabbing fulminations this year, it was Qalibaf who was the big political winner. His slate won a majority in the City Council election in Tehran this month, while Ahmadinejad's faction managed to win just two of 15 seats. The hotheaded president also fared poorly in elections around the country, as Iranians looked past his defiant rhetoric and focused on his poor performance in managing the economy.

Qalibaf's program has been about delivering services rather than tirades. A former general in the Revolutionary Guards air force, he made his name cleaning up Iran's national police. He angered reformers by advocating a crackdown on student demonstrators in 1999. But now, as mayor of Tehran, he has concentrated on filling potholes, collecting the garbage, and building new parks and recreation areas in the poorest areas of South Tehran.

The second person I think of as the year turns is Sallai Meridor, the new Israeli ambassador to Washington. We had several long talks over the past month, and these discussions helped me understand the forces that animate and haunt Israel. The first is the living reality of the Holocaust. Meridor somberly named for me the members of his own family who perished in the camps. "I feel like we are in the 1930s again," he said, speaking about the threats by Ahmadinejad and other Iranian leaders to destroy Israel. If the world allows such a nation to acquire nuclear weapons, he says, "We will have betrayed our children."

Israel is a dialectic of fear and hope, and Meridor's hopeful side surfaces when he discusses the Palestinian issue. He told me several weeks ago that Prime Minister Ehud Olmert was determined to resume negotiations to create a Palestinian state -- and now, at year-end, the frozen wheels of the peace process are indeed turning again. Israel will have to stop expanding settlements on the West Bank if it is serious this time. But listening to Meridor, who is 51, I sense that for his generation of Israelis, there is a dawning recognition that a Palestinian state living in peace with Israel is crucial for its future as a democratic Jewish state.

As I think about the promise of the year ahead, I will remember Meridor's description of running ecstatically through the streets of Jerusalem in 1977 to welcome Egyptian President Anwar Sadat.

My final man on the tightrope is Michael Chertoff, the secretary of homeland security. He embodies a new year's reality we know in our gut but rarely speak out loud: The terrorists who struck America on Sept. 11, 2001, will hit us again -- perhaps with even more destructive power. It's Chertoff's terrible responsibility to prepare for that nightmare while the rest of us go about our business.

I visited with Chertoff several times this year, and each time I thought to myself: Thank God I don't have his job. He spends his days sifting different scenarios of mass destruction: We are inspecting more cargo vessels, but what about private yachts?

We scrutinize people boarding commercial flights, but what about private planes? The temptation is to focus on the threats that are easiest to protect against -- thus the overkill in airport security -- but Chertoff knows that's wrong. And he admits he can't do everything. "Risk management doesn't mean risk elimination," he told me in one of our talks.

As Chertoff thinks about the new year, he wants to stay focused on the biggest risks out over the horizon -- the nuclear or biological attacks that could kill hundreds of thousands of Americans. I admire Chertoff's dedication, but I have a nagging worry that his collection of bureaucratic agencies isn't up to the job of keeping America safe.

Will Iran find a stable place in the world? Will Israel and the Palestinians finally get it right? Will a battered America make wise decisions about its national security? People living on a tightrope probably shouldn't be drinking champagne, but what the heck? Here's to a peaceful and prosperous 2007.

Schwarzenegger 'Feeling Great' After Surgery (LAT/AP)

The Los Angeles Times, December 29, 2006

The Terminator is looking all too human these days.

The shattered leg that Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger suffered in a fall on an icy ski slope was the latest in a list of injuries and ailments to befall the actor-bodybuilder-politician.

The seven-time Mr. Olympia whose broad shoulders and tree-trunk legs earned him the moniker "the Austrian Oak" has a medical chart you might find at a senior citizens' home.

Schwarzenegger, who turns 60 in July, has had a hip and a heart valve replaced. He had rotator cuff surgery in 2003. A rapid heartbeat sent him to a hospital last year. One motorcycle crash in 2001 left him with several broken ribs, and another last January resulted in 15 stitches in his lip.

Now he is on crutches while the right thigh bone he broke while skiing with his family over the holidays in Sun Valley, Idaho, heals. Doctors used screws and wires to repair his leg Tuesday, and he is expected to be released from the hospital by week's end.

Despite Schwarzenegger's travails, his doctor says he is in great shape for a man his age, though few details about the governor's condition are ever released. Schwarzenegger's office says such information is private.

The governor "is in excellent physical condition and his health is very good. He has fantastic muscle tone, excellent bone health and is in great cardiovascular shape. The governor's health is in the top 5 percent of people his age," said Dr. Kevin Ehrhart, his orthopedic surgeon.

His office Thursday released two photographs of the governor in his hospital bed, surrounded by monitors. He was dressed in hospital garb with a sheet covering his legs, and he appeared to be signing or editing documents. An intravenous tube was protruding from his right hand, and a laptop computer was perched at his bedside.

"I woke up feeling great," he said in a statement. He said he was looking forward to his inauguration next month "even if it means I have to walk into my swearing-in ceremony on crutches."

Schwarzenegger has carefully cultivated an image of vitality and strength, and his best-known Hollywood roles were built around his rippling biceps and deltoids.

In a tailored suit and a pair of his finely tooled cowboy boots, Schwarzenegger still looks younger than his 59 years. His cordovan hair appears impervious to gray, and his skin is remarkably smooth and unblemished for a man his age.

But he is not in the championship form of his youth. Photos surface occasionally showing a mushy midriff and arms that only faintly resemble the 22-inch biceps of his prime.

Schwarzenegger has acknowledged using steroids in his bodybuilding days, before they became illegal without a prescription in 1991. But he has never provided details about his usage, and it is unknown whether the drugs -- which can cause heart problems -- have had anything to do with any of his health problems.

Charles Yesalis, professor emeritus of health and human development at Penn State University and an expert on performance-enhancing drugs, said for someone who is athletic and not overweight, Schwarzenegger "appears to have a lot of health problems."

But "a lot of very healthy people who exercise a lot and look robust have bad health problems. It's hard to tie it together in any meaningful way," Yesalis said.

In addition to the physical toll exacted by professional bodybuilding, Schwarzenegger suffered his share of bangs and bruises in movie stunts.

At a 2005 appearance in front of medical workers in Burbank, Schwarzenegger credited nurses with making his hospital stays more tolerable.

DOJ_NMG_0110319

"I was in the hospital three times in a row these last 10 years -- for open heart surgery, with a hip replacement and with shoulder surgery," the governor said at the time.

"This is what happens when you are the Terminator," he added. "They switch body parts."

State Lawmakers Take The Lead On Minimum Wage, ID Theft (CSM)

By Daniel B. Wood

The Christian Science Monitor, December 29, 2006

LOS ANGELES

Beginning Jan. 1, Illinoisans will be able to request a live phone operator when they call a state agency. Michiganders will be able to surf the Web to discover where illegal meth labs are located. And New Hampshirites will be allowed to use a leashed dog to track wounded deer, moose, or bear.

While the 109th Congress has been dubbed "the biggest do-nothing Congress" since 1948, state legislatures have had one of their most productive years in decades, experts say.

Besides providing creative solutions to mundane problems like frustration over automated phone attendants, the laws that go into effect next Monday in 32 states reveal several trends: Five states will increase their minimum wages, nine states will implement more stringent policies on citizens' privacy to curb problems associated with identity theft, and five states will mandate new recreation regulations.

"The biggest observation going into what makes up next year's new laws is the sheer diversity of issues that these legislatures are dealing with - from criminal justice to minimum wages to election reform to human services," says Bill Wyatt, who authored the National Conference of State Legislatures' survey of new state laws.

He says there is no apparent partisan bent in the new laws.

"My experience in watching state legislators over the years is that once they get into the Capitol building, they take off their partisan hats and roll up their sleeves to solve problems of constituents," says Mr. Wyatt. "This year's legislators have been called upon to become experts in a very wide set of complicated issues in a short time."

The new laws, in part, are born out of necessity for states to move forward where the federal government has stalled.

"The states have been much more productive than Congress in tackling the laundry list of items of the stuff that is concerning them most right now," says Larry Sabato, a political scientist at the University of Virginia. "If you go down the list, you can see what Americans are pressuring their state legislators to deal with that Congress won't or hasn't." Minimum wage hikes

Some laws such as the minimum wage increases in North Carolina, Hawaii, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, and Connecticut reflect the same political shift that led to the Democrats taking over the US House and Senate in November, many experts say.

"Raising the minimum wage is an issue that has worked for Democrats ... and the big tax revolt of recent years appears to be waning," says Steven Schier, a political scientist at Carleton College in Northfield, Minn. "That sort of tells you the issue agenda has changed with more voters going for Democrats than Republicans."

This year, states have also been tackling several "hardy perennial issues" such as healthcare, according to Dr. Schier, Dr. Sabato, and other analysts. Healthcare plans

Come next week, health plans in Rhode Island will be required to cover programs that help people stop smoking. And licensed care facilities in the state must designate a 'safe patient handling committee' and develop written plans to prevent injuries to patients and to healthcare workers responsible for moving patients.

Health insurers in Michigan will be permitted to offer premium rebates or reductions in payments in exchange for participation by the insured in wellness programs that their employers provide. Water recreation activities

Meanwhile, water recreation activities will be subject to additional regulations in North Carolina, Oklahoma, Maine, New Hampshire, and New Mexico as concern grows about accidents and noise generated from watercraft, such as jet skis.

"Many towns have gone to the state legislature with their concerns, and have asked for action," says Andrea Erskine of the Maine Department of Inland Fisheries and Wildlife.

In Maine, new watercraft regulations will require 16- and 17-year-olds to complete a boating safety education course to operate motorboats or sailboats.

"As more and more people convert their camps on lakes into year-round housing, development on the water is forcing the issue more and more. Legislators see this as a way to talk about the rules of navigation because right now anyone can hop into a boat with no license," Ms. Erskine adds. Governmental ethics

Some states also are moving to restore ethics in government - sparked, in part, by several Congressional scandals, according to analysts.

DOJ_NMG_0110320

North Carolina, for instance, is instituting tougher reporting and disclosure requirements for lobbyists, a direct response to the Jack Abramoff scandal in Washington. Lobbyists will be required to disclose each month, while the legislature is in session, the amount of money they are spending to lobby lawmakers. Legislators, in turn, will be able to opt-in to a "no gift registry" to let lobbyists and clients know they do not wish to receive gifts or free meals.

Generally, the new state laws "do reflect the public's uneasy mood toward government institutions," says Kareem Crayton, a political scientist at the University of Southern California. "The states seem to be responding to the national sentiment that appears to run in favor of reform."

· Michigan residents will be able to surf the Web to discover the locations of illegal methamphetamine labs.

· Anyone arrested in New Mexico for a felony will be required to provide a DNA sample to law enforcement. The state is creating a DNA identification system to aid in solving crimes, tracking sex offenders, and identifying missing persons.

· Health plans in Rhode Island will be required to cover plans that help people stop smoking.

· Colorado employers will have 20 days to verify the legal work status of a new employee. Employers who don't maintain the documentation could receive fines of up to $5,000 for the first offense and $25,000 for additional offenses.

· Maryland employers will not be permitted to print employees' social security numbers on their paychecks or any part of their pay stubs.

Hundreds Of Laws Kick In Monday (USAT)

By Dennis Cauchon

USA Today, December 29, 2006

In California, driving with people in the trunk will be illegal. In Alabama, landlords will have to provide livable conditions for tenants.

In Illinois, state agencies will have to provide people to answer phones, not just automated messages.

These are among the hundreds of laws that will take effect Monday. Each New Year's Day, a flurry of legal experiments begin that shape Americans' lives in ways big and small.

The U.S. government spends twice as much money as state and local governments combined, but state government has the greatest effect on Americans' everyday routines — how they drive, how they get married and divorced, how they hunt and fish, and how they buy cigarettes and beer.

This year, new laws include minimum wage hikes, tighter protections on personal privacy and expanded health care rights for consumers. The minimum wage will rise Monday in eight states: to $6.15 an hour in North Carolina, to $7.65 in Connecticut and to somewhere in between in Delaware, Hawaii, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Rhode Island. Raising the federal minimum wage — $5.15 an hour — is a priority of Democrats, who will take control of Congress in January.

More than a dozen states will move to protect personal privacy. Arkansas will make it illegal to publicly show someone's Social Security number. Maryland will order Social Security numbers removed from paychecks.

Eight states will let victims of identity theft freeze their credit reports, so the information can't be released in ways that would hurt their reputation or let crooks get more credit.

States also will address complex moral issues, such as how people die.

Idaho, for example, will become the 10th state to create a central registry for medical directives and living wills that control end-of-life care.

In Minnesota, Case Study For Political Shake-Up (NYT)

By Kirk Johnson

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

ST. PAUL — Somehow over the years it became embedded in the culture of the Minnesota Legislature that the party in control of the House of Representatives was entitled to the fourth- and fifth-floor offices across the street from the Capitol.

The minority party, on the other hand, was relegated to the second and third floors, which are pretty much identical, legislators say, but for the connotations of history.

Now the upstairs-downstairs shift is on. Democrats, having taken power, are even shopping for the best digs on the upper floors while the current occupants are still inside.

“It’s really a free-for-all,” said State Representative Nora Slawik, a Democrat from the Minneapolis suburbs.

Who ends up where is only the beginning of the tumult under the Capitol dome here as eager new faces and deeply practiced old ones contemplate what Minnesota voters said on Election Day. Money, policy and tactical choices are all in play:

how best to spend a $2 billion surplus and address what both parties see as a mandate for improving public education, health care and transportation and for making taxes more fair.

Nationally, the Democrats picked up more than 350 seats in state legislatures in November, 25 of them in Minnesota, and gained control of 10 chambers, including the Minnesota House. Two other states shifted either to Republican control or to a tie. The cumulative impact, deeper and broader than any election's since the Republican landslide of 1994, is still unfolding.

Minnesota's capital is in many ways the perfect petri dish for testing what the nation's new political landscape may produce. Once predictably Democratic in national politics, the anchor of Upper Midwest liberal populism from the 1920s through Hubert Humphrey and Walter Mondale, Minnesota is now considered a battleground, with the Republicans scheduled to hold their national convention in 2008 in Minneapolis and St. Paul around that declaration.

A long tradition of social policy innovation in matters like welfare and health care sits alongside newer forces that are less predictable. Minnesota in recent years has elected as governor Jesse Ventura, an independent, and as senators, Paul Wellstone, a Democrat, and Norm Coleman, a Republican. And some political scholars say that much of the nation's next political direction could be forged here as well.

"Nothing is for certain in Minnesota anymore," said Paul C. Light, a professor of political science at New York University, "and that's a lesson for everybody."

But if Minnesota's capital, with all of its local quirks and traditions, shows where the election's wave may lead, it also confounds much of what may be expected.

The Democrats won big here — taking the House for the first time since 1998, expanding their majority in the Senate, winning the secretary of state's and attorney general's offices and nearly defeating Gov. Tim Pawlenty, a Republican.

But they emerged divided, too, owing much of their surge to newly elected moderates from the suburbs who are unlikely to embrace a pure liberal agenda. The Republicans lost big, but were pushed toward the center as well, led by Mr. Pawlenty, who has said since the election that many of his second-term priorities will overlap with those of the Democrats he fiercely battled in his first four years.

And those pincer forces, both pushing toward the political center, will set the stage for everything to come when the Legislature convenes in January, elected officials and political experts here say. In the first Pawlenty term, a $4.5 billion budget shortfall was resolved through deep cuts in spending for health care, education and other programs, capped by a bitter shutdown of the government in 2005 when Mr. Pawlenty and the Legislature could not agree.

The fight of 2007 will revolve around restoring some of the cut programs, and how far to go beyond that in pushing what both parties say is pent-up demand for property tax relief and for spending increases on education, health care and transportation.

One of the first tests could be a Democratic Party plan to extend health care benefits to 70,000 low-income children not covered by the MinnesotaCare program. That alone would cost hundreds of millions of dollars.

And the magnifying glass of national politics hovers at the backdrop of everything.

Mr. Pawlenty, a 46-year-old son of working-class South St. Paul, is frequently mentioned as a possible contender for vice president in 2008. Senator John McCain of Arizona, a likely Republican presidential candidate, has already come to call since the election, offering praise and congratulations.

"The dynamic is one we've never had — not in my lifetime, anyway," said Wyman L. Spano, a former lobbyist, now director of the Center for Advocacy and Political Leadership at the University of Minnesota, Duluth.

"On the one hand, I see Democrats who are very much wanting not to look like classic Democrats, not wanting to raise taxes," Mr. Spano said. "The flip side of the coin is that this governor really wants to get along because he'd like to have a nice high approval rating going into that convention."

Mr. Pawlenty, known for a sharp tongue and a sharper wit (he once quipped to a political opponent that "everybody has the right to be wrong, but you do abuse the privilege"), barely kept his job in November, winning by a margin of about 22,000 votes of 2.2 million cast.

In an interview in his dark-wood-paneled office in the Capitol, its large windows giving a sweeping view of the city, Mr. Pawlenty said the election had to be read as new marching orders for every Republican.

"Republicans love to talk about markets — well, the market just told Republicans something," he said. "The market just told them, 'We're not interested much in your product, and we're choosing to go to your competitor.' We need to hear that message."

One seemingly odd result of Minnesota's political shift, scholars and people in both parties say, is that the new Democratic majority, in keeping to a middle-ground agenda that its moderate members can support, could raise Mr. Pawlenty's profile in the process.

DOJ_NMG_0110322

The incoming speaker of the House, Margaret Anderson Kelliher, a Democrat from Minneapolis, said she had no problem with that. If the governor's interests mesh with the Democratic majority's, for whatever reason, Ms. Kelliher said, it will be a victory for Minnesota.

"He has a real incentive to make his next four years work and gain some national attention," she said. "Making this a state that gets things done will garner him national attention, and us, too."

Ms. Kelliher, who grew up on a dairy farm and can still recite the rhymes about cheese that she learned in 4-H, said her election as speaker reflected Democratic efforts to balance the factions of rural and urban, progressive and moderate in the caucus.

So does the party's legislative plan, she said, called the "stick to the basics agenda," which was put forward by Democrats at the Minnesota State Fair, before the election. Its goals were outlined on homey hand-held signs in the shape of the state, promising to improve public education, increase access to health care and provide property tax relief.

How far the Democrats go with their "basics" agenda will be the real test in the year to come, political scholars say.

"This is not a progressive or liberal majority; the seats they picked up are in moderate or conservative districts," said Lawrence R. Jacobs, a professor of political science and director of the Center for the Study of Politics and Governance at the University of Minnesota.

"The Democratic leadership is very much aware that they've got to be careful, that if they go for what they want in their heart of hearts they may end up with a two-year run."

But there is also still vehement debate here about what the voters were really saying on Election Day.

The departing speaker, Steve Sviggum, a Republican who will begin his 15th two-year term in the House when the session starts Jan. 3, said that in reading the election, Minnesota Republicans would be wrong to abandon their message of fiscal restraint and economic freedom or to see the vote as an endorsement of all things Democratic.

"It was about George W. Bush," Mr. Sviggum said in his office, which was lined with boxes ready for his move downstairs.

Governor Pawlenty seems to go further in his interpretation. The message, he said recently at a news conference in talking about the road ahead, is that people want certain basic things from government, and "other than that," he added, they want government to "get out of my face," an indication that socially conservative debates about abortion or same-sex marriage will not find center stage in his next term.

"I'm a Midwestern governor from a state that prides itself on a certain measure of populism, not to be confused with liberalism, but populism meaning stuff that helps people," Mr. Pawlenty said in an interview. "That's what we've got to stand up for."

But the camaraderie of a Legislature that still prides itself on citizen-lawmaker traditions — and enough old Scandinavian names to require a handy pronunciation list in the legislative guide book — is not to be underestimated in shaping how the new terrain in St. Paul might unfold.

Representative Kathy Tingelstad, a fourth-floor Republican, recently learned, for example, that when she goes downstairs, Ms. Slawik, a friend from across the aisle whose family goes to the same Y.M.C.A. camp each summer with the Tingelstads, will be taking her space. That has made Ms. Tingelstad happy.

"It's nice to know," she said. "Nora will be a good caretaker."

Secret Talks Seek Unity For Feuding Va. GOP (WP)

By Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

RICHMOND, Dec. 28 -- Top Republicans in Virginia, including the state's attorney general and the party's former national chairman, have been holding secret meetings for weeks in the hopes of finding an end to the war among their party's lawmakers and reaching a compromise on funding for transportation, several participants said.

Some of the party's biggest names from outside the General Assembly fear that the rift between leaders in the GOP-led House of Delegates and state Senate will cause Republicans to lose big in elections in November, especially in Northern Virginia, unless something is done to ease congestion.

Attorney General Robert F. McDonnell has brought both sides together for direct talks. U.S. Reps. Thomas M. Davis III and Frank R. Wolf have met with House leaders to urge action. And Ed Gillespie, former chairman of the National Republican Committee, who took the helm of the Virginia GOP this month, is courting both senators and delegates.

"We're just saying you need a deal and it's got to be something substantive. The inability to reach an agreement blows back on everybody," Davis said Thursday. "Instead of pointing fingers, we're trying to get everyone to understand what's at stake."

DOJ_NMG_0110323

The meetings were confirmed by Davis, House Majority Leader H. Morgan Griffith (R-Salem), Senate Finance Chairman John H. Chichester (R-Northumberland) and Sen. Jeannemarie Devolites Davis (R-Fairfax). Several other participants discussed the meetings but said they did not want to be identified because the meetings were private. Others who were briefed about them also discussed the meetings but did not want to be named because they did not attend.

Participants said the talks are an attempt to spur action in next month's Assembly session, which is expected to again be dominated by transportation. This year, deadlock over road and rail funding held up a state budget for months and prompted a special session that ended in failure.

Those involved in the meetings said the refusal to come together to confront the transportation crisis is becoming the kind of issue for Virginia Republicans that the war in Iraq has become for the GOP nationally: one that pushes independents and moderates to the other side of the political aisle.

The chasm between the two wings of the party is based partly on an ideological divide over taxes -- Senate Republicans want them, House Republicans do not. The resulting perception is of Washington-style gridlock that two Democratic governors have used to blame the GOP and that has helped Democrats gain six seats in the House in the past three years.

The rift is also fostered by personal dislike. A GOP senator once called House Republican budget negotiators "dumb as rocks." House GOP leaders often deride their Senate counterparts as arrogant, patronizing and mean.

Sources in both camps expressed some optimism that the talks have helped. But getting both sides to compromise after more than five years at each other's throats is proving difficult. No agreements have been reached, they said.

"It's like marriage counseling, and transportation is the adulterous affair," said one Republican familiar with the meetings but not authorized to talk about them. "If you don't deal with that first, nothing else matters."

McDonnell, his deputy and his pollster met with five top Republicans in the House and Senate on Dec. 5 and on Dec. 15, according to several participants and others briefed on the meetings. If the party war continues, participants said McDonnell's pollster told both sides, Republicans could easily lose their majority.

McDonnell, who is widely believed to be preparing for a 2009 run for governor, would not confirm Thursday that any meetings took place. But he said he is determined to help his party retain control of the legislature.

"The Republican Party worked for 130 years to take a majority. In the last six, as we have assumed the mantle of governing Virginia, there has been a lot of very public and acerbic disagreements," he said. "I want to make sure our party stays in power and wins in 2007. The way to do that is to have a very productive 2007 session on the key issues that Virginians care about."

Davis participated in McDonnell's Dec. 5 meeting by telephone. Wolf and Davis have met privately with House Speaker William J. Howell (R-Stafford) to urge action. And Gillespie met with Senate Republicans on Dec. 15 after a breakfast fundraiser.

The meetings reflect a new recognition by some Republicans of the party's vulnerability after last month's elections. Although such incumbents as Davis and Wolf held on, the party's standard-bearer, Sen. George Allen, was defeated, faring especially poorly in Northern Virginia.

"The equation is pretty simple," Davis said. "If they come back empty-handed, the Democrats will say these guys can't deliver transportation. Up here [in Northern Virginia], it's going to be very tough sledding."

Gillespie would not comment on meetings he has had with lawmakers, saying those would be confidential. "I do believe that it's important that Republicans in the House of Delegates and the Senate are seen to be working together," he said in a brief interview.

Devolites Davis, who attended a meeting with Gillespie and senior Senate Republicans, said the new party chairman made it clear he intends to be an honest broker.

"He just wants to bring the party back together," she said. "He understands how bad the traffic is and how strongly people feel. Anyone who is in a leadership position outside the bodies sees how important it is to get something done."

J. Scott Leake, a chief aide to Senate Republicans, said, "What has gone on certainly hasn't hurt and can only help."

Participants in McDonnell's meetings said he and Deputy Attorney General William C. Mims have offered a number of transportation proposals, including tax and fee increases supported by senators and borrowing favored by House Republicans.

Chichester, who said he has met with McDonnell privately in recent weeks, said the talks have not produced any real movement.

"What I gather, nothing is happening," Chichester said. "I think they are honest brokers. But until we get some new money on the table, we haven't really gone anywhere. [The House] is still holding their 'no new revenue' stance."

Griffith called the talks "very cordial" but would not comment specifically because participants were told that the meetings would be kept confidential.

"Clearly there's movement or we wouldn't be talking," he said.

Pay Now Or Pay Later (WP)

The Washington Post, December 29, 2006

WHEN MARYLAND Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley announced last week that T. Eloise Foster was his choice to be the state's budget czar, he lauded her as a "courageous soul." Well, let's hope so, because the state's fiscal problems are gathering like thunderheads. Despite Mr. O'Malley's dismissive treatment of projected deficits during the fall campaign, it seems increasingly likely that his term in office will be marked not by the hundreds of millions of dollars in initiatives and new spending he liked to talk about on the stump but by his ability to manage and contain shortfalls estimated to run into billions of dollars.

Sensibly, Mr. O'Malley, who takes office next month, has not ruled out new taxes, which will inevitably be part of any solution to a fiscal problem on the scale of Maryland's. But he seems determined to defer a major push on revenue until his second year in office, perhaps by naming a commission to "study" the problem. It may be the case that he wants to get his political sea legs before embarking on what could be one of the toughest fights of his term. And in mathematical terms, he may be able to get away with holding off for a year on raising taxes, since leftover surpluses from the recent boom times will cover the still-modest shortfall expected in the fiscal year starting next summer. Still, Mr. O'Malley is looking increasingly cavalier, and possibly foolish, to postpone a serious reckoning.

The original sin of what is referred to in Annapolis as the state's "structural deficit" was an income tax cut sponsored by then-Gov. Parris N. Glendening nearly a decade ago that made no distinction between rich and poor and has since cost Maryland billions in lost revenue. The irresponsible Glendening cut -- an act of political expediency designed to stave off a conservative challenge to his reelection -- was compounded five years later by a huge, legislatively mandated increase in education spending for which no funding source was specified. Thanks to the housing boom and Maryland's generally sunny economic climate, disaster has been kept at bay for the past few years, despite soaring Medicaid costs. But now the bill is coming due: Starting in 2008 the state's annual revenue shortfall is expected to reach $1.6 billion, or about 10 percent of anticipated spending. Mr. O'Malley can talk of shaving programs, trimming waste and optimizing efficiencies all he wants, but that will not solve a problem of such dimensions.

What's needed, as we've written before, is a top-to-bottom revision of Maryland's obsolete tax system, conceived in the 1960s and barely updated since then. The elements of such an overhaul might include a more progressive personal income tax, since the current one is virtually flat and therefore favors the rich; tougher corporate income tax collections to eliminate shelters; an increase in the gas tax, last raised 15 years ago, to yield badly needed funding for the state's roads and mass transit; and a levy on services, most of which remain inexplicably untaxed even though they constitute the backbone of Maryland's economy.

Certainly, there are pitfalls facing Mr. O'Malley as he contemplates such changes. The state Senate president, Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr. (D-Calvert), might subvert any attempt at tax reform by tying it to his pet project of expanding slot machine gambling -- a potential deal killer. Republicans in the General Assembly would doubtless object to any significant tax increase, as might some Democrats. But sooner or later, Mr. O'Malley will have to come to grips with the state's projected funding shortfall, so why not sooner?

Somalia Forces Retake Capital From Islamists (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

NAIROBI, Kenya, Dec. 28 — Just hours after Islamist fighters abandoned Mogadishu, the capital from which they ruled much of Somalia, thousands of troops of the transitional government marched into the city on Thursday in a stunning reversal of fortune.

The government soldiers and the Ethiopian infantrymen who have been backing them poured in from the outskirts, residents said. The only gunshots fired were long celebratory bursts into the air.

In a country with such a troubled recent history, including famine, anarchy, isolation and war, a potentially viable government has suddenly emerged.

In a matter of five days, the internationally recognized government, a fledging authority that had been so weak it was marooned in a provincial market town, captured the formidable capital and most of Somalia — with more than a little help from Ethiopia.

The Islamists, whom many Western nations had considered a grave and growing regional threat with terrorist connections, were vanquished faster than anyone had expected, or at least removed from power.

“We always knew these Islamists weren’t all they were cracked up to be,” said Abdirizak Adam Hassan, chief of staff for the transitional president, Abdullahi Yusuf Ahmed. “And now we are where they used to be, in control of Mogadishu — well, as much as anyone can be in control of Mogadishu.”

DOJ_NMG_0110325

On Thursday morning, before most of the troops arrived, the city exploded in anarchy as armed bandits rushed into the streets and fragmented militia units began to fight each other for the spoils of war.

Witnesses said that an intense gun battle raged around a former Islamist ammunition dump, and that clan warlords instantly reverted to setting up roadside checkpoints and shaking down motorists, reminiscent of the years of chaos before the Islamists pacified the city in June.

Still, Mogadishu has been almost a holy grail for the government.

For months, leaders cooped up 150 miles inland in the market town, Baidoa, had spoken of their dreams of returning to the once-beautiful (and now bullet-pocked) city by the sea. But they were blocked on all sides by the Islamist forces, which dominated most of south-central Somalia, including the capital, their stronghold.

All that changed on Sunday when Ethiopia, with tacit approval from the United States, carried out an aggressive counterattack against the Islamist forces. Ethiopia sided with the government because the Islamists had vowed to invade Somali-speaking areas of Ethiopia and wage a holy war against it.

By Wednesday, the Islamist military had been decimated by Ethiopian airstrikes and mass desertions. Clan elders, traditionally the pillars of Somali society, pulled their troops and firepower out of the Union of Islamic Courts, or U.I.C., after a string of back-to-back military loses in which more than 1,000 fighters, mostly teenage boys, were quickly mowed down by the better-trained and equipped Ethiopian-backed forces.

"Our children were getting annihilated," said Abdi Hulow, an elder with the powerful Hawiye clan. "We couldn't sustain it."

By Thursday, government officials said, many of the Islamist leaders had fled into the thickly forested areas to the south, where the government plans to hunt them down. But there were also worries that the Islamists would wage guerrilla warfare, as they have threatened.

"The U.I.C. may have decided not to fight the Ethiopians and their allies this time around," said Ted Dagne, an Africa specialist for Congressional Research Service. But he added: "This does not mean the U.I.C. is finished. The U.I.C. fighters simply changed their uniform to a civilian cloth."

Sheik Sharif Sheik Ahmed, an Islamist leader, said Thursday that his forces had surrendered Mogadishu to avoid a bloodbath. "We don't want to see Mogadishu destroyed," he told Al Jazeera television by telephone from an undisclosed location.

Even before the government troops had planted themselves in downtown Mogadishu, the political negotiations began.

Mr. Hulow and other elders said they had asked transitional leaders for positions in the new government in exchange for support. Ali Mohammed Gedi, the prime minister, told the elders that first he needed help in disarming the militias.

Mr. Gedi also gave a short news conference on the outskirts of Mogadishu in which he reached out to the Somali diaspora, saying: "We need your help. It's time to come home."

One group was noticeably absent from all these talks: conservative clerics, who seemed to have overplayed their cards.

Under their leadership, the Islamist movement grew from a grass-roots network of clan-based courts to a force powerful enough to overthrow Mogadishu's warlords in June. The Islamists impressed residents as the first to establish a semblance of law and order, which had been missing since Somalia's central government collapsed in 1991.

A few months ago, government officials were begging the Islamists to return to peace talks and to share power. Sheik Sharif was considered likely to be prime minister of a new joint government. The Islamists were thought to have a committed, disciplined army, taking town after town, often with very little resistance.

But in July, Ethiopia began secretly slipping troops into Somalia to protect the transitional government, itself a mix of clan elders and former warlords who had been brought together two years ago with the help of United Nations officials. The Islamists responded with angry threats, calling the Ethiopians infidel invaders. Ethiopia is a country with a long Christian history, while Somalia is almost entirely Muslim.

The Islamists also reached out for help from Arab countries and from Eritrea, Ethiopia's bitter enemy.

But despite a United Nations report that there were thousands of foreign fighters in Somalia, American officials now believe that a far smaller number answered the call to jihad, probably just a few hundred. In the end, they did not make much of a difference, at least not in this phase of conventional war.

It seems that many people, inside Somalia and outside, overrated the Islamists' strength and popularity. Part of the reason, analysts now say, is that the Islamists had an excellent propaganda machine, controlling most media outlets in Somalia.

Another factor was that many Somalis supported the Islamists because they had no option. After Ethiopia got involved, that changed, with the transitional government becoming strong enough to be a realistic alternative.

The Islamist leaders may have also miscalculated the appetite among Somalis for the harsh brand of Islam they were pushing. On Thursday, to celebrate the departure of the Islamists, many Mogadishu residents stuffed their mouths with khat, a mildly narcotic plant that the Islamists had outlawed, and cranked up Western music, which some clerics had tried to ban.

DOJ_NMG_0110326

Diplomats in the region are urging the government to be magnanimous and reach out to the former Islamist leaders. Several international organizations, including the Arab League and the African Union, are pressing Ethiopia to leave.

The Ethiopians say that they have no intention of staying and that their mission to neutralize the threat in Somalia has been mostly accomplished.

“Things have gone well,” said Solomon Abebe, a spokesman for Ethiopia’s Foreign Ministry. “And much faster than we expected.”

Government Troops Take Somalian Capital (LAT)

By Edmund Sanders And Abukar Albadri

The Los Angeles Times, December 29, 2006

MOGADISHU, Somalia — Somalia's beleaguered capital fell early today to Ethiopian and Somali government troops who marched quietly into the city before dawn and took control without firing a shot.

An Islamic alliance that had controlled Mogadishu and much of the country evaporated Thursday after a string of military losses, and in the security vacuum, violent looting broke out in the capital. Residents awoke this morning to find the Ethiopians and troops of Somalia's U.N.-backed transitional government taking positions.

The transitional government was formed in 2004 to give the Horn of Africa country its first effective, nationwide administration since 1991, but today was the first time its troops were actually able to enter Mogadishu.

"The fighting is over," Ali Mohammed Gedi, prime minister of the transitional government, declared late Thursday, shortly before hundreds of troops began pouring into the city.

Officials of the government spent most of Thursday meeting with clan leaders to ensure there would be no remnants of the Islamic forces hiding in Mogadishu when they entered, and that the local population would welcome their soldiers.

Mogadishu temporarily reverted to its familiar clan-based chaos as the Islamic Courts Union disintegrated and former warlords attempted to resume their former positions of power. Angry youths rampated in the streets, stealing mobile phones, looting homes and setting up checkpoints. Clan militias reclaimed their old neighborhoods. Offices and homes of the leaders of the former Islamic alliance bore the brunt of the looting.

It was unclear whether the weak transitional government and its small military force could impose order on Mogadishu, much less the rest of Somalia. Officials of neighboring Ethiopia, who provided most of the firepower to oust the Islamic alliance, said they would help, but that they would not remain in Somalia for a long period.

Mogadishu residents said the looting Thursday made them fearful of another long period of instability.

"We are going back to the former chaos and violence," said Ilyas Ahmed, whose brother was killed Thursday during a cell-phone robbery. "The courts were not good, but at least we had security."

Gedi called for the looting and violence to end. "Anybody found disturbing the security will be met with swift punishment," he said.

U.S. and Ethiopian officials accused the Islamists of plotting to establish a Taliban-style regime and use Somalia as a base to launch terrorist attacks. Islamists said they were merely trying to restore peace and stability to Somalia. Over the past six months they had seized Mogadishu and most of southern Somalia.

On Thursday, after days of military losses that left it bottled up in Mogadishu, the Islamic Courts Union officially disbanded. As he left Mogadishu, Sheik Sharif Sheik Ahmed, the chairman of the courts, said Islamists were leaving to avoid a battle that might have killed civilians. Former fighters, many of whom ditched their uniforms and shaved their beards, expressed disappointment.

"I joined them because I thought they wanted to install an Islamic government in Somalia,"' said Mursal Mohammed, 27. "But they had different ambitions. They wanted to fight against Ethiopia and get back Somali territory. They misled me."

Some extremist elements of the courts union were reportedly refusing to give up and were seen heading south toward the port city of Kismayo, where they may attempt to regroup or escape. As many as 4,000 fighters, including the fundamentalist Shabab faction that is accused of killing an Italian nun in September, have refused to give up, officials said.

Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi said Thursday his soldiers were in hot pursuit of the fighters, which he said included Eritreans and other foreigners.

Meles said his troops would assist the transitional government restore peace in Mogadishu.

"We will not let Mogadishu burn," he said. But he added that the international community must finish the job of putting Somalia back on its feet. He said Ethiopia would not become bogged down in an Iraq-style occupation.

"We don't believe is it our mission to reconstruct Somalia, militarily, politically or otherwise," Meles said. "What Somalia needs is beyond our capacity now. What Somalia needs now is massive humanitarian assistance. We cannot provide that."

DOJ_NMG_0110327

He predicted that Ethiopian troops would remain in Somali for a matter of days or weeks. "We are certainly not planning to stay there for months," he said.

Ethiopia formally entered Somalia's worsening civil war a week ago, siding with the transitional government against the alliance of religious leaders.

Amid reports that former Mogadishu clan leaders were reassuming positions of power, Meles warned against allowing the city to fracture into the tribal fiefdoms that have existed for years.

"The transitional government should not allow warlordism to crop up again in Mogadishu," he said.

Ethiopian leaders say the decision to take military action in Somalia was an effort to prevent the spread of religious extremism. But some worry that Ethiopia will now become a target for Islamic extremists. Ethiopia's population is about evenly split between Christians and Muslims, and the war has been unpopular with some of the country's Muslims.

Ethiopian-led troops began their assault near the border and reached the capital Wednesday.

Up to 3,000 Islamist fighters were killed and up to 5,000 wounded, Meles said. Ethiopian casualties totaled between 100 and 500, he said.

Thousands have fled the fighting, worsening Somalia's already dire conditions. At least 17 people were killed and 140 were missing after Yemeni security forces opened fire on two boats packed with people fleeing Somalia, according to the U.N. Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs.

Times staff writer Sanders reported from Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, and special correspondent Albadri from Mogadishu.

Somalia, U.N. Regain Mogadishu (WT/AP)

By Mohamed Olad Hassan

The Washington Times, December 29, 2006

MOGADISHU, Somalia -- Jubilant Somalis cheered as troops of the U.N.-backed interim government rolled into Mogadishu unopposed yesterday, putting an end to six months of domination of the capital by a radical Islamist movement.

Ethiopian soldiers stopped on the outskirts of town, after providing much of the military might in the offensive that shattered what had seemed an unbeatable Islamist militia. Islamist fighters fled south vowing to continue the battle.

"We are in Mogadishu," Prime Minister Mohamed Ali Gedi declared after meeting with local clan leaders to discuss the peaceful transfer of the city.

Despite the celebrations in the streets, worries about the future were widespread in a country that hasn't had an effective national government since clan warlords toppled a longtime dictator 15 years ago.

Many in overwhelmingly Muslim Somalia are suspicious of the transitional government's reliance on neighboring Ethiopia, a traditional rival with a large Christian population and one of East Africa's biggest armies. Witnesses said crowds threw rocks at Ethiopian troops on the city's northern edge.

Somalia's complex clan politics also are a big worry, having undone at least 14 attempts to install a central government in this violent, anarchic nation.

Mr. Gedi's government, set up in 2004 with U.N. backing, is riddled with clan rivalries, most notably between the young prime minister and elderly president.

Mr. Gedi later said his government was seeking approval from the interim parliament to impose martial law across Somalia while its forces attempt to restore order. Weapons will be confiscated, he said, without giving details.

A chilling reminder of the chaos Somalia has known came as clan militiamen and criminal groups began looting almost anything they could after the Islamist forces fled. At least four persons were killed in the melee, said one witness, Abdullahi Adow.

President Abdullahi Yusuf Ahmed, whose shaky acting administration has spent the last year in a temporary capital, Baidoa, 150 miles west of Mogadishu, said government troops are not a threat to the city's people.

"The government is committed to solving every problem that may face Somalia through dialogue and peaceful ways," he said.

But gunfire was heard for most of the day in the city. The United Nations flew out 14 aid workers and one U.N. staff member because of deteriorating security.

Ethiopian troops, who pledged not to enter the capital, were stoned by crowds on the northern edge of the city, witnesses said. "How could we welcome an invading enemy?" said one protester, Faiza Ali Nur.

Relations between Somalia and Ethiopia have long been strained. They fought a bloody war over their disputed border in 1977.

DOJ_NMG_0110328

After starting an offensive against the Islamist forces Sunday, Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi said his army would go home once it defeated the Islamist movement, whose fighters had extended their control over much of southern Somalia in the past six months.

Mr. Meles vowed yesterday not to give up the fight until extremists and foreign fighters supporting the Islamist movement had been crushed.

Speaking in Ethiopia's capital, Addis Ababa, he said 2,000 to 3,000 Islamist fighters had been killed and 4,000 to 5,000 wounded. Ethiopia suffered a few hundred casualties, he told reporters.

Islamist militiamen, who had said they would defend Mogadishu to the last man, retreated toward the southern port of Kismayo.

The fighters had gone from door to door in Kismayo recruiting children as young as 12 to make a last stand on behalf of the Islamist movement, according to a confidential U.N. report, citing the families of boys taken to the front line town of Jilib, 65 miles north of Kismayo.

The Islamist movement took Mogadishu in a battle with clan warlords in June and then advanced across most of the south, often without fighting.

When Ethiopia began providing military aid to the transitional government, Islamist leaders issued a call for foreign Muslims to join their "holy war" against the Ethiopians. Somalis living on the coast reported seeing hundreds of foreigners entering the country.

The International Committee of the Red Cross said that over the past few days, hospitals and other medical facilities in southern and central Somalia had admitted more than 800 wounded people.

The U.N. refugee agency said yesterday that two boats carrying Somalis and Ethiopians across the Gulf of Aden from northern Somalia capsized late Wednesday as they were being pursued by Yemen's coast guard. At least 17 persons drowned, and 140 were thought missing, it said.

The refugee agency said some of the 357 survivors claimed to be fleeing the fighting in central Somalia. But their boats sailed from ports far to the north in a relatively peaceful area of Somalia, from where a steady stream of economic migrants has set sail in recent years.

Uneasy Political Shift In Somalia (CSM)

By Rob Crilly

The Christian Science Monitor, December 29, 2006

NAIROBI, KENYA

Somali government forces entered Mogadishu Thursday after a whirlwind advance against Islamist militias who were forced to retreat after sustained losses.

The city echoed with gunfire as clan-based militias returned to the streets, settling old scores and looting. Residents said they feared a return to 15 years of anarchy that ended with the rise of the Union of Islamic Courts, which took over just six months ago.

The quick victory over the Islamists, analysts warn, leaves a dangerous vacuum in a country that has only recently seen calm. Without a political strategy for winning the peace, they say, Somalia risks becoming a quagmire that sucks in neighboring countries. If the Ethiopians keep their word and withdraw quickly, radical elements within the courts - such as the young fighters of the Shabbab, led by Afghanistan-trained Aden Hashi Ayro - might run a guerrilla campaign, drawing in foreign fighters.

"The risks are that if Ethiopia and Somalia are unable to politically consolidate their military victory, then we are back at square one with the conditions that gave rise to the courts in the first place," says Matt Bryden, a consultant to the International Crisis Group.

The Union of Islamic Courts had managed to win crucial clan support as they moved across the country, but that appeared to evaporate in the face of Ethiopia's military dominance. Elders switched sides, hastening the demise of the Islamists.

Convoys of Islamists' pickups mounted with antiaircraft guns or heavy machine guns were seen leaving the city on Wednesday night and heading towards Kismayo, an Indian Ocean port still held by the Union of Islamic Courts. Government officials spent part of Thursday meeting elders near Mogadishu discussing the terms by which troops might enter the capital. In the afternoon, as the Monitor went to press, Somali Prime Minister Ali Mohammed Gedi had flown to a town near the capital as the government declared a state of emergency.

"Things here are very tense now," said Abdiaziz Adow, a Mogadishu shopkeeper, by telephone. "No one wants things to go back to the way things were, but we have already heard about people being shot and all the shops are closed."

Last June, a network of sharia courts seized control of the capital following months of fighting against a coalition of warlords, who received covert support from the United States.

The rise of the courts was lauded by residents who endured years of violence at the hands of the military strongmen. Among them, the warlords had carved the city into a network of personal fiefdoms riddled with roadblocks and no-go areas.

Gradually, the city took on an air of peace. The checkpoints were dismantled, the international airport was reopened, and teams of women were deployed to repair streets.

Militias loyal to the courts fanned out across the country. Mostly, they were welcomed by clan elders keen to see some sort of order restored.

Meanwhile, a weak transitional government - established with UN and international backing - found itself isolated and unable to command support outside its stronghold of Baidoa.

The growing power of the courts was greeted with concern in Ethiopia, which feared the rise of radical Islam on its doorstep, and the US, which accused the courts of harboring Al Qaeda terrorists. Ten days ago, as the courts moved to within 40 miles of the government seat, Ethiopia openly intervened.

As Ethiopian warplanes began bombing Islamist positions last weekend, the Islamic leadership said their forces were falling back to Mogadishu to begin preparing for a long guerrilla war.

But as Somali government forces and Ethiopian soldiers took control of Balad, the last town on the road to Mogadishu, the Islamists prepared to flee.

Before leaving the city, Sheikh Sharif Ahmed, who heads the courts' executive committee, told Al Jazeera television that his militias were leaving Mogadishu to avert bloodshed. "We have withdrawn our forces and there are no Islamic Court forces (there). It is the Somali people who are resisting," he said. "We left [the capital] to avert heavy bombing because Ethiopian forces are practicing genocide against the Somali people."

As they left, much of their weapons and fighters were handed over to clan leaders who took control of the airport and seaport.

The fall of Mogadishu came after a night of frantic telephone diplomacy. Islamist leaders spoke with government officials, saying they would be welcome in Mogadishu if they did not launch an attack.

At the same time, government officials were telephoning clan elders in the city, urging them to withdraw their support for the Union of Islamic Courts.

Abdirahman Dinari, a government spokesman, said popular support had melted away from the courts as they began to introduce a hard-line form of sharia law. He claimed the government was now in control of 95 percent of the country.

"The courts were not powerful. It was the international media who gave them false credibility," he said by phone from Baidoa. "It is the people of Mogadishu who are powerful. Now [the courts] have lost support, they have disappeared into thin air."

U.S. Bid To Limit Iran Gets Wary Response (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, December 29, 2006

Plan to Curb Trade, Lending Beyond U.N. Sanctions Has Yet To Stir Action Overseas

WASHINGTON -- Armed at last with a set of limited United Nations sanctions against Iran's nuclear program, the Bush administration has been stepping up efforts to persuade countries in Europe and Asia to go further and cut off bank lending and other financial interactions with Iran.

But the response overseas to the U.S. push to clamp down on trade with Iran beyond the U.N. resolution has been tepid. European officials say their first desire is to implement and enforce Saturday's package of limited sanctions on Iran. Any moves to limit bank lending or to curtail export credits also could run afoul of the sizable trade between Iran and countries such as Germany, Italy, Japan and China.

China's trade with Iran is up more than 40% this year, and while trade between the European Union and Iran has stagnated, it is still set to top $25 billion in 2006. The U.S., having imposed a series of unilateral sanctions on Tehran over the past 25 years, has only minuscule trade ties with Iran.

"Now is the time for all the actors to be very cautious in their dealings with Iran to make sure that they don't violate the U.N. resolution," said a senior European diplomat in Washington. A senior EU official said all energies for now will focus on ensuring that the EU's 25 member states use the same rules to enforce the U.N. measure.

Tougher Pressure

The U.S. strategy to pressure countries and private banks to curb their dealings with Iran underscores a conviction within the Bush administration that getting Iran to compromise on its nuclear work will require much tougher pressure than the U.N. Security Council is likely to stomach.

The strategy, which has been months in the works, is a spinoff from a campaign launched in 2005 against Asian banks that helped to financially isolate North Korea. After the Treasury Department targeted one bank in Macau with sanctions, numerous other banks broke off their dealings with Pyongyang. More Chinese banks have severed ties with North Korea since the U.N. passed a sanctions package in October in response to Pyongyang's nuclear test. It is a pattern the U.S. now hopes to see repeated with Iran.

Senior U.S. officials say that the Dec. 23 U.N. resolution is crucial because it provides countries with the legal justification to push for tighter financial controls against Iran within their own systems. The measure falls under a provision of Chapter 7 of the U.N. Charter that makes enforcement mandatory but restricts the response to nonmilitary means.

"It's certainly a significant step to have a unanimous resolution backed by 15 countries under Chapter 7," said Stuart Levey, the Treasury Department's undersecretary for terrorism and financial intelligence, who has led the drive to squeeze Iran's access to international financial channels. "I think we will be able to get some real impact from this resolution."

To that end, the Bush administration is now looking to push ahead mainly on two fronts.

U.S. officials hope that countries with the greatest economic leverage over Iran -- primarily Germany, Italy, France, Japan and China -- will separately make clear to their own banks the risks involved in doing business with Iran. The Treasury Department for several months has been trying to persuade international lenders to help isolate a network of Iranian-controlled banks and companies that the U.S. suspects Tehran is using to acquire sophisticated weapons technology. Several large European banks, such as UBS AG and ABN Amro Holding NV, broke off all ties with Iran during the past year.

The Bush administration also would like to see about a dozen European countries end or at least curtail their export-credit-guarantee programs for companies doing business in Iran. Germany alone granted companies working in Iran credit guarantees of $1.9 billion in 2005, putting Iran third on Germany's guarantee list after Russia and China. Britain also has issued a number of large guarantees to cover the risk for British companies doing business in Iran. (Export-credit guarantees greatly diminish the risk a company faces when doing business abroad by insuring against the chance of nonpayment.)

Reluctance to Act

"This export-credit issue is pretty significant," Mr. Levey said, adding that movement on this front would probably have to come from within the EU, as individual countries might be reluctant to act on their own. "It is hard for one of these countries to act for fear that the others will move in to fill the gap," he said.

European diplomats and officials, however, say the EU isn't likely to take additional actions quickly. The EU's first step will be to pass rules implementing the new U.N. resolution, which is itself highly complex, and then to see whether the new pressures spark a debate within Iran over the wisdom of rebelling against the international community.

Europe and the U.S. have been trying for more than two years to get Iran to agree to steps to ensure that its nuclear program is strictly for civilian purposes -- and not a cover for developing a nuclear weapon. Iran insists it isn't pursuing nuclear weapons, but it also has refused to suspend an increasingly elaborate uranium-enrichment program. Highly enriched uranium is a key ingredient for a nuclear bomb.

The aim of the U.N. resolution -- but even more so the additional steps being pushed by the U.S. -- is to ramp up the economic pain on Iran so that significant voices within the country begin to question the value of having a domestic uranium-enrichment program.

The new sanctions package was nothing if not hard-fought. When Iran refused to suspend its uranium-enrichment work by Aug. 31, as required by an earlier U.N. resolution, the U.S. hoped to win a set of punishments within weeks to show Iran that the Security Council meant business. Instead, amid significant resistance from Russia, the council spent nearly four months feuding over multiple drafts before it hit on a measure that won the support of all five permanent members as well as the council's 10 rotating members.

The resolution that emerged Saturday is meant to put the squeeze on Iran's nuclear program but isn't likely to cause much pain on its own. The package prohibits countries from supplying Iran with materials that would benefit its uranium-enrichment efforts or improve its missile systems. But the package is much looser on so-called dual-use items that can be for either military or civilian purposes. The resolution also imposes an asset freeze on 11 organizations and 12 individuals involved in Iran's nuclear and missile programs.

Avoiding Financial Interactions

The Bush administration was particularly pleased by the move to target specific Iranian individuals and companies, because the shortened U.N. list overlaps partially with a longer watch list that Mr. Levey has been showing banks and finance ministries around Europe, urging them to avoid financial interactions with entities that the U.S. believes are supporting Iran's weapons programs or terror groups.

Both European and U.S. officials cite evidence that Iran already is feeling the pinch of increased economic isolation. A new study from Johns Hopkins University concludes that Iran's oil production is actually falling amid rapidly declining investments in its petroleum sector. And Iran's oil minister said recently that the country would have to dip into a special stabilization fund to finance increased production.

DOJ_NMG_0110331

Beyond Europe, the U.S. also is trying to persuade certain Persian Gulf states such as Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates to exert pressure on China to distance itself from Iran. China has become a major trading partner with Iran during recent years, as well as a growing investor in Iran's oil and natural-gas fields.

Israel Says Egypt Sends Weapons To Abbas's Forces, With Israeli And U.S. Approval (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

JERUSALEM, Dec. 28 — After coordination with Israel and the United States, Egypt has sent weapons and ammunition into the Gaza Strip to forces loyal to the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah, Israeli officials said Thursday.

Senior Palestinian officials, including Mr. Abbas's spokesman, Nabil Abu Rudeineh, denied the report. Mr. Abu Rudeineh called it "Israeli propaganda aimed at aggravating the situation between Fatah and Hamas."

But Israeli officials knowledgeable about the shipment confirmed a report in the daily Haaretz that Prime Minister Ehud Olmert had approved the shipment in his meeting Saturday evening with Mr. Abbas.

They said four trucks with 2,000 automatic rifles, 20,000 ammunition clips and two million bullets had passed from Egypt through the Israeli-controlled Kerem Shalom crossing, where Gaza, Israel and Egypt meet. The shipment was turned over to Mr. Abbas's Presidential Guard at the Karni crossing between Gaza and Israel, the officials said.

Benjamin Ben-Eliezer, a cabinet member and former defense minister, told Israeli Army Radio that the weapons were intended to give Mr. Abbas "the capability to hold his own against those organizations that are trying to spoil everything."

That was apparently a reference to Hamas, the militant faction that gained control of the Palestinian government by winning parliamentary elections in January. Hamas refuses to recognize Israel's right to exist and rejects previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements that call for a permanent two-state solution.

American officials were circumspect but said various moves to support Mr. Abbas's forces were taking place, including the provision of money for training the Presidential Guard and Israeli approval for the return to the Palestinian territories of a thousand or so well-trained but aging Fatah fighters, the Badr Brigade of the Palestine Liberation Organization. They have been barred from returning and are living in Jordan.

The Bush administration is seeking Congressional support for up to $100 million, mostly for salaries and training, to strengthen Mr. Abbas and his security forces and extend their control over the Gaza crossing points.

A senior American official who deals with the Palestinians insisted that the point was not to promote civil war with Hamas, but to help Mr. Abbas and Fatah and "to provide deterrence and balance" in Gaza, where Hamas is especially strong.

The arms shipment is part of a broader American and Israeli effort, in coordination with moderate Arab countries like Egypt, Jordan and Saudi Arabia, to strengthen Mr. Abbas, weaken Hamas and show some movement on the stalled issue of Israeli-Palestinian peace.

At his meeting Saturday with Mr. Abbas, Mr. Olmert also promised to eliminate some West Bank checkpoints and turn over to Mr. Abbas $100 million of the roughly $500 million that the Israelis have collected for the Palestinians but have refused to turn over since Hamas took power.

But officials involved consider their efforts something short of a plan. That, they say, is because Fatah remains weak, Mr. Abbas is unpredictable and too wedded to the Fatah old guard, and conditions are not ripe for a major effort to reach a comprehensive settlement.

Still, the officials say, given the problems of the region — the American difficulties in Iraq, the growing influence of Iran, Israel's summer war with Iranian- and Syrian-backed Hezbollah in southern Lebanon and Hamas's sway over Gaza — efforts are needed to alter the status quo and promote moderate Palestinian political goals.

"The most important thing for us is to get a process going between Abbas and the Israelis," the American official said. "If the Palestinians end up with a consensus supporting Hamas, you push off any real peace process for a long, long time. If they opt for this kind of unity, fine, but then there is nothing we can do for them, and there will be no Palestinian state, and it's not a good outcome."

Mr. Abbas has called for early presidential and parliamentary elections, which Hamas opposes. The Americans were pleased by his call, though they would have liked him to have confronted Hamas six months ago, the official said.

"The longer that goes by, the harder it is for him," the official said. "We've been trying to explain to him that every option is risky now but that the status quo also has its downside. Doing nothing and getting weaker does not help."

The Israeli foreign minister, Tzipi Livni, in essence has been suggesting talks with Mr. Abbas that would result in a Palestinian state with temporary borders — effectively the second stage of the moribund peace plan known as the road map — with Israel pulling back in the West Bank to the current route of the separation barrier it is building there.

DOJ_NMG_0110332

In an interview in Haaretz's weekend magazine, she talked gingerly about "a detailed operative plan" to negotiate with Mr. Abbas, ideas she has discussed with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Abbas aides. "My vision says that the two-nation-state principle is not only an Israeli gift to the Palestinians but advances Israeli interests," she said.

Mr. Olmert does not like grandstanding by his cabinet ministers, and some aides were dismissive about the notion of a new plan. But Mr. Olmert largely shares Ms. Livni's thesis: that Israel, the West and moderate Arab countries want Mr. Abbas and Fatah, whatever their weaknesses, to win out over Hamas, a Foreign Ministry official said.

"So they should have guns, and resources for patronage, and there should be a political vision and framework for moving forward, so that if Palestinians do choose the right path, there is something real and tangible for those who believe in a two-state solution," the official said.

Mr. Abbas has repeatedly rejected the idea of a Palestinian state in temporary borders, seeing it as a trap, because there would be no guarantee that Israel would move further toward a final settlement.

"But it's possible that now Palestinian moderates need some political ammunition to show people that negotiations will bear real and tangible results," the official said.

Then, he suggested, with such results in hand and a period of visible reform in Fatah, new elections could result in Hamas's defeat, and then a stronger move to dismantle Palestinian militant organizations — as called for in the first stage of the road map, which did not foresee one of those organizations, Hamas, running the Palestinian Authority.

There are many difficulties with such a course of action, beginning with the refusal of Hamas to sanction early elections and the risk that Mr. Abbas continues to be seen by too many Palestinians as an agent of Israeli and American interests.

Mr. Abbas is committed to a Palestinian state on roughly the pre-1967 borders, with its capital in Jerusalem, and a "just solution" to the refugee issue. So approving the current West Bank barrier route, which keeps 10 percent of the land, including East Jerusalem, on the Israeli side, even as a temporary border would be very risky for him.

"Abbas has got a lot of work to do — in Fatah, in his own office, with the security forces," the American official said. "We'll continue to help," he added, pointing to a likely visit next month by Ms. Rice. "But Abbas has to make some choices."

Mr. Olmert is already facing criticism from his right wing for his concessions to Mr. Abbas, given the involvement of Fatah militants like Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades in firing rockets into Israel. Israeli opinion, after the summer war and the Gaza rockets, is generally opposed to handing back large portions of the West Bank to the Palestinians, especially given the chaos in the Palestinian Authority.

Despite A Lull At Holidays, Beirut Digs In For A Struggle (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, December 29, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Dec. 28 — Sleigh bells jingled, Christmas carols blared from loudspeakers and dancing Santa Clauses and street vendors offering Christmas trinkets lent downtown Beirut the feel of a Christmas fair for much of this week.

If not for the razor wire and heavily armed soldiers ringing much of the area and the posters of the Hezbollah leader, Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, one could almost have forgotten the continuing crisis in this country.

But even the Christmas celebration turned political.

"We are Muslims and Christians standing together to tell the world this is Lebanon," a speaker with the opposition Free Patriotic Movement announced, shortly before the cutting of a cake about 30 yards long in celebration of Christmas on Monday night. "The future is ours, and after the feast, we will resume our protest until victory."

Almost one month since Hezbollah and Christian opposition parties took over the center of Beirut seeking to bring down the government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora, they have dug in for a long fight. After the war between Hezbollah and Israel during the summer, from which Hezbollah emerged stronger and the Lebanese government weaker, Hezbollah and its allies — Christian groups and a Druse group that were once mortal enemies — began to press for more power.

In Riyadh al Solh square, where protesters have camped out in a tent city, Hezbollah and its allies are demanding that Mr. Siniora resign and are saying he should be put on trial for treason and corruption. Last week, they ratcheted up their demands, calling for early parliamentary elections. Up above in the Grand Serail, the government headquarters, Mr. Siniora, urged to stand firm by Saudi Arabia and the United States, shows no signs of wavering, insisting that Hezbollah and its allies come off the streets and return to the negotiating table.

"Their sit-in did not produce what they thought it would," said Marwan Hamadeh, minister of telecommunications, who predicted the crisis could last until Lebanon's presidential elections next November. "They simply cannot win."

The rallies have been muted in recent days so families could celebrate Christmas or prepare for Id al-Adha, the Muslim Feast of Sacrifice, at the weekend. But opposition leaders threaten to raise the pitch next week, suggesting that they may block highways and access to Beirut's airport.

DOJ_NMG_0110333

The business of governing Lebanon has come to a virtual halt, with President Émile Lahoud unwilling to consider any legislation offered by the cabinet, the cabinet unwilling to speak to Mr. Lahoud, and the speaker of Parliament, the Shiite Amal leader Nabih Berri, unwilling to convene a session or speak to the president. Opposition members of Parliament walked out in late November and have not returned.

"Each side is supported by people that don't want them to give up a thing," said Paul Salem, director of the Carnegie Middle East Center, speaking of both internal and foreign backers. "It's becoming more likely that a very long, drawn-out stalemate will take hold."

Gradually, Mr. Salem and others here say, Beirutis are growing used to the demonstrations in the center of town, finding ways around the traffic snarl the protests have caused, and feeling less urgency to resolve the standoff. Some restaurants are asking their patrons — and individual Lebanese are asking their friends — not to discuss politics.

"The easiest thing for people to do now is to postpone, to stall," Mr. Salem said.

Hezbollah and its allies took to the streets on Dec. 1 after the governing coalition led by Mr. Siniora rejected their demands. They set upon the center of Beirut with a noisy but peaceful protest mirroring the one led by the March 14 movement last year that forced Syria out of Lebanon and swept its leaders into power.

Much like the March 14 movement, the opposition has sought to emphasize its sectarian mix, insisting it represents the true Lebanese.

The protests continue to sap Lebanon's economy, already damaged by Israel's bombardment of the country during the summer. Store owners in downtown Beirut briefly opened this week but they saw few customers.

"We will carry on with this campaign until we topple the government," said Nabil Nicola, a Parliament member with the Free Patriotic Movement of Michel Aoun, a Christian allied with the opposition. "We still have not used all the peaceful weapons available to us, and it's just the beginning of the road."

On Saturday, Amr Moussa, the secretary general of the Arab League, said he had been unable to negotiate a solution in two weeks of shuttle diplomacy but promised to resume his efforts after the Muslim holiday. He said the impasse had been made worse by the fact that the sides refused to communicate with each other. Hezbollah accuses him of backing the governing coalition.

"Unfortunately Amr Moussa was taking a side during his last round of negotiations and unfortunately some Arab countries are taking sides too, but there are talks about a new, less biased Arab initiative," said Nawar Sahili, one of Hezbollah's members of Parliament. "We are hoping it will solve the crisis."

Analysts and officials close to the discussion said the most contentious issue remains a bill rushed through to Parliament days after the opposition walked out. The ruling coalition has a majority in Parliament but Mr. Berri has refused to hold a meeting of Parliament. The bill calls for formation of an international tribunal with sweeping powers to prosecute suspects implicated in the February 2005 assassination of the former prime minister, Rafiq Hariri, and other assassinations.

Mr. Moussa, speaking to reporters in Beirut on Saturday, said he had managed to coax both sides to agree to the outlines of a national unity cabinet in which major decisions would be made by consensus.

But in Riyadh al Solh square, many said they were ready for a long fight. "When Omar Karami was prime minister, one person said a word and he resigned," Ali al-Faqih, a protester, said of the interim prime minister forced to resign during the anti-Syrian protests. "Now, one million people have come and said 'Leave,' but this guy is still clinging on. He's no gentleman."

Russia, Belarus Near Gas Showdown (WSJ)

By Alan Cullison, David Crawford And John W. Miller

The Wall Street Journal, December 29, 2006

Russia and the former Soviet state of Belarus are heading toward a showdown over natural-gas prices that both sides warn could lead to a New Year's Day pipeline shut-off similar to the one that hit Ukraine a year ago, which had ripple effects across Europe.

But analysts say there is less likelihood of a political firestorm over any Russian cutoff this year. European governments and Russia have carefully stockpiled gas in anticipation of any disruption. And in any case, Russia only exports about a fifth of its natural gas to Europe through Belarus pipelines.

Moreover, Belarus is unlikely to receive the same Western sympathy extended to Kiev during its spat with Russian state-controlled gas giant OAO Gazprom, which briefly suspended supplies to Ukraine early in 2006. While Ukraine's government was pro-Western, Belarussian President Alexander Lukashenko is a pariah in the West who is often referred to as Europe's last dictator.

DOJ_NMG_0110334

Still, Gazprom's willingness to threaten yet another midwinter fuel cutoff is reinforcing fears across Western Europe about the Continent's reliance on Russia for the energy that powers the region. After raising gas prices for its neighbors over the past year, Russia has been accused by the U.S. of using energy as a tool of blackmail and intimidation.

Yesterday, European Union Energy Commissioner Andris Piebalgs urged Belarus and Russia to quickly resolve their differences, which he said "may affect gas supplies" to the EU. "I call on the two parties to reach as soon as possible a satisfactory agreement that does not put in question gas transits to the EU," he said.

Moscow has responded that it wants to do away with Soviet-era subsidies and put its relations with neighbors on a market-oriented footing. Besides winning price increases from Ukraine, Russia has also pushed to raise prices for the former Soviet republics of Georgia, Azerbaijan and Moldova. Belarus has until recently been largely spared Gazprom's hardball negotiating tactics, leading some in the West to accuse Moscow of a double standard. Belarus pays $47 per 1,000 cubic meters for gas from Russia, well below the $264 that Gazprom says its European customers pay. Gazprom has been demanding that Belarus pay more than double the current price, and pay part of the bill by surrendering shares in its gas-distribution system.

"I don't believe that you will see the same reaction in the West if there is a cut-off this time," said Valery Nesterov, an energy analyst at Troika Dialog brokerage firm in Moscow. "Moscow will no longer be subsidizing a regime that is not popular in the West nowadays."

Gazprom began talks with Belarus this summer. When they ended without an agreement Tuesday, the company warned it could cut supplies to Belarus Monday morning. Minsk said it may respond by disrupting deliveries of Russian gas through its pipelines to Lithuania, Poland, Germany, the Czech Republic and the Russian enclave of Kaliningrad.

Industry officials across Europe and Russia have scrambled to reassure governments that there would be no repeat of the drama of the Ukraine cutoff. Gazprom said it had stockpiled supplies in Europe, while Ukraine's gas-transport company told the EU it had 24 billion cubic meters set aside to replenish pipelines to Europe if necessary.

Analysts say that Belarus, whose industrial sector is sorely dependent on Russian energy, can't withstand a cutoff of gas of more than a few days. In Europe, government officials say such a short disruption would be more psychological than material, and that countries can soften the impact by tapping reserves or shifting supplies among themselves.

German energy company RWE AG has accumulated supplies that will last several weeks in the event of an interruption, company spokesman Jürgen Frech said. Belarussian pipelines provide only a modest share of Germany's diverse gas supplies, which include deliveries via the Czech Republic, Ukraine, Norway and the Netherlands, he said.

"Eighty percent of Russian gas exports go through the Ukraine, while Belarus is only one pipeline," said EU Energy Commission spokesman Ferran Tarradellas. Still, he said the bloc's Gas Coordination Group has called a special meeting Jan. 4 to assess the situation and "to determine the extent of solidarity" among EU countries.

Government officials warned the political ramifications could be more lasting, however. "The Belarus dispute demonstrates Russia's tactics for enforcing its bargaining position hasn't changed since the conflict last January with the Ukraine," a Polish official said.

Russia Tightens Grip On Gas, Threatens To Cut Supply (USAT)

By Jeffrey Stinson

USA Today, December 29, 2006

LONDON — It's getting cold in Europe, and Russia is threatening to turn off the heat — for the second straight winter.

Gazprom, Russia's state-controlled natural gas monopoly, has told Belarus to pay double the current price for gas by New Year's Day or supplies will be cut. Gazprom also demanded a stake in the pipeline carrying gas from Belarus to other European customers.

Belarus has rejected the demands. Moscow warned Poland, Germany and Lithuania on Wednesday to expect shortages if the dispute continues. It also warned Belarus not to siphon gas from the Yamal-Europe pipeline.

Gazprom, the world's biggest gas producer, provides 25% of the natural gas consumed by Europe.

The price dispute shows how Russia is tightening its grip on energy production and distribution to squeeze higher prices from its neighbors. Analysts say it also shows how Russia uses its energy muscle to achieve political goals and deflect criticism of its policies.

Georgia, faced with the threat of a supply cut, agreed last week to pay Gazprom more than double its previous price for gas. Before signing the deal, Georgia accused Russia of using gas to punish the former Soviet republic for its Western-leaning policies.

Last New Year's, Ukraine's pro-Western government was locked in a similar standoff over pricing. When Gazprom cut supplies to Ukraine, the move also curtailed gas shipments through Ukraine to Poland, Hungary and Italy.

DOJ_NMG_0110335

Roughly 80% of Gazprom's exports to Europe flow through Ukraine; the rest go through Belarus. "Belarus is a microcosm of very worrisome behavior," says Clifford Kupchan, an expert on Russian energy with the Eurasia Group, a New York-based consulting firm.

Russia's grip on energy supplies could eventually be felt in the USA: The Russian government pressured Royal Dutch Shell and its Japanese financial partners this month to relinquish control of a project off Russia's Pacific Coast. The project is to supply liquefied natural gas to Japan, South Korea, China and the United States.

"Gazprom, across the board, is acting like a bully," Kupchan says. "There is very little difference between Gazprom and the Russian state."

In May, Vice President Cheney accused Russia of using its energy resources as a tool of intimidation.

Gazprom insists it seeks only market prices. In announcing price hikes Nov. 8, Gazprom export chief Alexander Medvedev told Russian news agency RIA Novosti that "no political motives" were involved.

Russia's energy muscle has allowed it to bully Georgia, drag its feet on halting Iran's nuclear program and offer diplomatic support to North Korea, says David Satter, Russia expert at the Hudson Institute think tank in Washington.

Some European nations are trying to wean themselves. Sweden has announced ambitious biofuel programs; others, such as Great Britain, have turned to nuclear power. In the past month, Sweden said it would not approve construction of an underwater gas pipeline from Russia to Germany that it could have tapped for power.

However, France's state-owned gas utility, Gaz de France, signed with Gazprom on Dec. 18 to provide Russian gas directly to French consumers for the next 24 years. On Nov. 14, Eni, Italy's biggest oil and gas company, reached a long-term agreement to boost its own gas supplies and for Gazprom to enter the Italian market.

As EU Gates Open, 'Paradise' Flows East (CSM)

By Michael J. Jordan

The Christian Science Monitor, December 29, 2006

SOFIA, BULGARIA; AND BUCHAREST, ROMANIA

Thirty miles south of the Bulgarian capital, along winding, wintry mountain roads, Lalo Zifritov stands guard outside the skeleton of a three-story home being built in the sleepy town of Samokov. The owner pays him the equivalent of $13 per day to keep an eye on the site round-the-clock.

His pay goes chiefly to food, diapers, and a few sweets for his three kids - ages 7, 4, and 1. They live without central heating.

When his aunt and cousins migrated to Italy last year, they invited him to join them. He declined. One deterrent, says the 28-year-old, was the cost of the passport, visa, and travel.

"Poverty ruins everything," says Mr. Zifritov, as his wife chops wood nearby. "But we're not so courageous to just move abroad."

The last time the EU opened its doors to new members in 2004, hundreds of thousands of Eastern Europeans pushed westward. But despite Western fears that hordes of desperate, job-seeking Bulgarians and Romanians will again flood the European Union when their countries become members on Jan. 1, many - like Zifritov - have compelling reasons to stay home.

"Some believe 'paradise' is in Western Europe, but some of this paradise will soon be coming here," says Krassen Stanchev, executive director of the Institute for Market Economics in Sofia.

Indeed, both countries expect a multibillion-euro infusion of EU aid and foreign investment after New Year's. And already, the Romanian and Bulgarian economies are roaring, growing at 7 percent and 6 percent, respectively. In addition, average salaries are on the rise - though still only about a third of Western European incomes in terms of purchasing power.

It was those higher-income economies that the 2004 wave of immigrants targeted. Uneasy at the prospect of absorbing yet another wave, 10 of the 15 "older" EU members - led by Britain, which received more than 500,000 migrants - have imposed temporary restrictions on Romanians and Bulgarians freely entering their labor markets.

But the Balkan countries may have already unleashed their wave of immigrants: According to the International Organization of Migration (IOM), of the estimated 6 million who have poured into Western Europe from Eastern Europe since the Berlin Wall fell in 1989, some 2 million have hailed from Romania.

"Those who had the possibility and the interest have already left," says Cristian Ghinea, a Romanian commentator.

In fact, with tens of thousands of Moldovans and Macedonians reportedly seeking Romanian and Bulgarian citizenship, respectively, and legions of others farther to the east desperate for work, EU membership could turn this Balkan pair - like Spain since it joined in 1987 - from migrant source to destination country, says Jean-Philippe Chauzy, spokesman for the IOM.

"In due time, their economies will become more attractive to non-EU migrants," he says, adding that the scale of migration is difficult to predict.

Meanwhile, as Romanians and Bulgarians grow savvier about the risks as well as the rewards of leaving one's homeland behind, they no longer believe that the streets of London, Rome, and Madrid are paved with gold.

"There are lots of stories about Romanian owners of a successful construction company in England or restaurant in Spain, but also of those living out of garbage bins in Rome, too proud to come home," says Mihaela Danga, of the Center for Independent Journalism in Bucharest.

Still, locals here predict that when their countrymen receive their EU passports, some will be tempted to set out in search of better-paying opportunities.

"Immigration will likely come from the extremes," says Anca Ciuca, president of the Foundation for Democratic Change. "If you have no place to work where you live and see no future for your family, this is one source. The other will be among the highly educated who have little civic spirit, with no concern to help this society, but only care about a higher standard of living for them and their families."

Observers agree that broadly categorized, three groups to date have generated most migrants: laborers from devastated agricultural and industrial sectors; urban professionals in search of greater compensation for their talents (the IOM's Chauzy notes that his dentist in Geneva is Romanian); and Roma, also referred to as Gypsies.

A new source may be Moldovans. A majority of citizens in Moldova - an impoverished country that was part of Romania until 1940 - claim Romanian descent, and as many as 400,000 have obtained Romanian citizenship in recent months.

Still, the decision to go remains deeply personal.

"I'm in my dream job right now," says Boris Shirov, a Bulgarian who works in radio-satellite communications in Sofia. "I can live off my salary, I'm happy with my friends, and I can visit 10 clubs in this area without getting into a taxi. But I miss my girlfriend, because she works in Brussels. So I may try to find a job there."

Across the border in Calarasi, Romania, a run-down industrial town near the southern bend of the Danube River, a mud-splattered ditch digger named Ion Bodeanu has a different take. Recently back from Italy, where he had to work 14-hour days, seven days a week, for 750 euros a month - despite having been promised 40-hour weeks for 950 euros monthly - Mr. Bodeanu says he wouldn't discourage other emigrants.

His young colleague, Ilie Inu, says he'd do it, with one condition.

"I'd want someone whom I trust to tell me that it's OK, you go and it's safe," says Mr. Inu. "I make 200 euros here, so if I at least know what to expect, I'd do it for 700 euros."

It's young people like Inu whom Silvia Luminita Nastase would like to keep in Calarasi. Industrial collapse has reduced the population by 75 percent in the past two decades, so Ms. Nastase - the city's director of community development - says she's trying to lure foreign investors. She recently returned from a trip to China for that purpose.

"I hope we can create opportunities for young people to come back to town - or at least keep them here - with challenging, well-paying jobs," says Nastase.

Her only child, Ciprian, is surfing the Internet for college scholarships in France, where he visited last summer. There's no guarantee he would return to Calarasi, says his mother. "I'd put it at 50-50 that he stays or goes," says Nastase. "And if he goes," she says with a laugh, "maybe I'd go with him."

Turkmenbashi (WSJ)

By Hamid Ismailov

The Wall Street Journal, December 29, 2006

Mahtumkuli, your soul is a visitor to a volatile body, / Good has many friends, but for evil there are no brethren. / But these days everything is upside down: heels replace heads, / And one can't recognize who is good, and who is bad.

--Mahtumkuli, 18th century * * *

When I first met Saparmurat Niyazov in person, at an Islamic Conference in Tehran 1997, I had my killer question for the Turkmen president (something about Caspian oil and gas) all ready when I suddenly got a closer look at his hair. It was freshly dyed, with henna, a shocking punky red! I have no idea now what I asked, or what he said into my radio mike. The next time I met him, at the press conference of a Central Asian meeting, his hair was suddenly, unbelievably, black -- apparently dyed, this time, with basma. Again, I recall nothing else about the encounter.

Turkmenbashi ("Head of all Turkmen"), who died last week, was, as his foreign obituarists noted, "eccentric" even by Central Asia's high standards. Niyazov abolished opera, ballet and circus, arts that were foreign, according to him, to the Turkmen mentality; to nurture this "mentality," he wrote "Ruhname" (Book of Spirit), a compilation of reinvented history, folklore and pseudo-philosophical maxims to rival the Quran. January was renamed "Turkmenbashi," April "Gorban Soltan Edge," the name of his mother. He replaced street names in Ashgabat, the capital, with numbers. He declared unlawful a host of infectious diseases, including AIDS and cholera. He ordered foreigners to pay the state $50,000 to marry Turkmen girls. He built the biggest mosque in Central Asia, standing usually empty, and planned an ice castle in the middle of the desert. He . . . A casual imagination fails to follow the list. * * *

What could have possibly produced this sort of man? A Turkmen proverb says: "A bird copies what it sees in the nest." Niyazov, born in 1940, lost his father in World War II and his mother in the Ashgabat earthquake of 1948. He was brought up in an orphanage, like several other Central Asian leaders. It's no surprise these men emerged well-steeled for politics from a tough life in postwar orphanages, which on the surface nurtured an ultrapure Soviet ideology, but in reality were ruled by a "first come, first gets" philosophy that taught boys like Niyazov ruthless survival skills.

In his isolated republic, Niyazov mastered both the "form and essence" -- the haircut and what goes under it -- of what it means to be Soviet. He built a cult of personality that would make Stalin and Brezhnev go green with envy: His golden statue rotates after the sun; a crater on the moon and an asteroid bear, in Turkmenistan, his name; his poems are inscribed on the walls of mosques. Yet he almost humbly called on journalists to tone down their praise for a man who, in one go, fulfilled the great Communist prophecy of Khrushchev: free electricity, water and salt for the whole population until 2030!

Appropriately, Turkmenbashi died on Stalin's birthday, when nostalgic war veterans were also celebrating the centenary of Brezhnev's birth. In the hereafter, these two would probably have all the right to shake the hand of the comrade who, per Marxist-Leninist cant, "relayed their deeds to new shining heights."

Mesmerized with his notorious idiosyncrasies, the outside world paid less attention to the dark side of Turkmen reality. Politicians and journalists who dared think independently disappeared. A former prime minister, Boris Shikhmuradov, languishes in jail, his fate and condition unknown. A correspondent for Radio Liberty, Ogulsapar Muradova, was detained this June with several human-rights activists; her corpse was returned to her family in September.

The U.S.S.R. might be dead, but its legacy lives on, not just in a Turkmen bouffant hairdo. Give me your freedom and I'll send you off to paradise! In the Central Asia of independent states, the only difference is that the insignificant local pawns of the old days, who meekly followed orders from the Kremlin, suddenly turned into kings at the time of the Soviet breakup. And it went to their heads. Do you want to be president for life? Here you are! You want to make the nation's great (oil or gas) wealth your own personal fortune? No problem! Create a ruling family dynasty that will outlive you? You got it!

What happens next in Turkmenistan -- a huge country, larger than Germany, with enormous gas reserves that Europe and China covet, and a small population of five million -- is anyone's guess. But a good one is that "the Family," in the person of Turkmenbashi's son, Murad, may seek to carry on the line, in the spirit of the Aliyevs across the Caspian in Azerbaijan. Niyazov fils has a flashy bon vivant's reputation and access to his father's wealth. Another ambitious man is moving in as well, a former vice prime minister and minister of health named Gurbanguly Berdimuhammedov, who upon the news of the old man's death swiftly imprisoned his rival and constitutionally next-in-line, the parliament speaker, and declared himself acting president. A Turkmen opposition scattered all over the world may try to make a comeback. More likely, the defense and security force, who've closed the frontiers, will want to have their say in who takes over now.

Turkmenbashi brought his people low, and the fear and distrust won't leave the earth with him. But don't underestimate Turkmen yearning for liberty. In researching my last novel, I came across archival documents about rebellious Turkmen tribes enslaved by the Russians in the 19th century and forced to lay railways in the desert. These men turned iron rails meant to go into the ground vertically up and tied three slippers between -- their symbol -- showing defiance for which they paid with their lives. So strong was their passion for freedom! Has the iron road of the communism and post-communism forever ironed this passion away?

Several years ago, when I visited Turkmenistan, I decided to go to Turkmenbashi's giant mosque and pray for these men, who lay buried nearby. We drove in unbearable heat to the mosque, which lies a few dozen miles from Ashgabat in the desert. Suddenly, in the middle of nowhere, we came across thousands of schoolchildren brought by military trucks, standing under the ruthless sun along the road holding up bunches of flowers. In spite of the absurdity of their situation, they were full of joy and life. "Is there a foreign delegation passing by?" I asked my driver, aware of Soviet customs. "No, he goes for his lunch," he answered matter-of-factly.

This past Sunday, when the body of the same man was driven by the same route to be buried in a mausoleum next to Central Asia's biggest mosque, somber soldiers lined the road, holding rifles and guns in their hands, this time in a forcefully monolithic and faceless row. I immediately thought: "These must be those schoolchildren again . . ."

Thai Insurgency Targets Buddhists (WT)

By Richard Ehrlich

The Washington Times, December 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0110338

BANGKOK -- Buddhists are fleeing their homes in southern Thailand in the face of an increasingly militant Muslim insurgency that has begun calling for an independent and pure Islamist nation in the impoverished region bordering Malaysia.

What began as an indigenous protest against heavy-handed rule from the mainly Buddhist capital, Bangkok, has developed into a battle reflecting extremism in Iraq and Afghanistan, including beheadings and the burning of schools.

"This land must be separated between Muslims and the nonbelievers. This land must be liberated, and an Islamic system must be its foundation," warned a leaflet recently distributed in the south that the Thai military showed to reporters.

"This is a land of war that is no different from Palestine and Afghanistan," said the leaflet, signed by an obscure jihadist group known as the Islamic Warriors of Pattani State.

"This land is not the land of the Thais, but the land of Fathoni Darulsalam," it said, using an old Arabic name for the mainly Muslim region of southern Thailand.

Other fliers instruct Muslims not to buy or benefit financially from lands abandoned by Buddhists, saying the properties will be distributed to needy Malays once the region is liberated from the "occupying Siamese," according to a Bangkok newspaper, the Nation.

Authorities say 1,730 persons have died in three years of unrest, more than 1,000 of them Muslims, including many killed by confused and poorly disciplined government forces. Others were killed as a warning to other Muslims not to cooperate with the government.

The dead also include about 680 Buddhists who appear to have been slaughtered to disrupt their work and frighten other Buddhists into leaving, according to the respected Prince of Songkhla University in Pattani.

The killers' tactics have grown increasingly brutal, including the decapitation of 25 persons since 2004.

Insurgents also assassinate saffron-robed Buddhist monks who collect alms during barefoot walks through villages and towns, even when armed troops escort the clergymen.

Shocked by the sight of blood-splattered monks sprawled in the street and reports of nearby assaults, about 200 Buddhist villagers in Yala province have fled.

Carrying meager belongings, they clustered in Buddhist temples, grateful for sacks of supplies sent by Queen Sirikit, and hoping for financial compensation and resettlement.

Military efforts against the ethnic Malay insurgents have been ineffective, and negotiations have been hindered because the rebels refuse to identify their leaders. Bangkok is now worried that the shadowy force will hoist flags above a self-declared "Islamic Pattani Nation," further demoralizing security forces and Thailand's 64 million people.

"If the situation is left like this, in three years, we'll see a new country in the deep south," said Prasit Meksuwan, an adviser to the south's Teachers Federation, which is encouraging Buddhist teachers not to flee.

Schools have become a favored target of the insurgents, who complain that the institutions tell lies about the three southern provinces -- Pattani, Yala and Narathiwat -- which formed part of an independent Malay kingdom before Thailand annexed the rubber-rich region about 100 years ago.

The Malay-speaking Islamists also oppose the schools' curriculum, which absorbs youngsters into a modern Thai-speaking society, obedient to a god-free Buddhist philosophy and Bangkok's monarchy. They demand that the schools focus instead on lessons gleaned from the Koran.

The government has given guns and training to hundreds of teachers who are willing to stay in rebel-infiltrated zones, while soldiers transport teachers to and from well-guarded schools. But more than 1,000 isolated schools shut down at the beginning of a term last month.

During one of the assaults last month, a 48-year-old teacher was shot and burned to death at his school in Pattani province while colleagues and students watched in horror.

China Estimates Growth In 2006 Was Likely 10.5% (WSJ)

By Tracy Zheng And Victoria Ruan

The Wall Street Journal, December 29, 2006

BEIJING -- China's economy is likely to have expanded 10.5% in 2006, the chief economist of the National Bureau of Statistics said yesterday.

The estimate is in line with the government's recent forecast. China's gross domestic product grew 10.2% in 2005.

Yao Jingyuan, the senior official of the statistics bureau, said at a financial forum that the combined value of China's imports and exports likely rose 25% in 2006 to $1.7 trillion.

Mr. Yao's forecast suggests economic growth slowed slightly but remained rapid in the fourth quarter. The economy surged 10.7% in the first three quarters from the same period a year ago.

DOJ_NMG_0110339

In 2006, China's government took a series of measures to prevent the economy from overheating, such as interest-rate rises and increases in banks' deposit-reserve-requirement ratio to curb excessive liquidity and rapid growth in fixed-asset investment.

Mr. Yao said the economy will likely maintain a "fast and steady growth" in 2007, with the growth rate likely to slow to around 10%.

He cautioned that the economy is still facing risks of overheating. However, the government should also guard against any big slowdown in growth, he said.

There are still a few prominent problems in the economy, such as "overly high credit growth, excessively rapid investment growth, and a large trade surplus," he said.

Mr. Yao said he expects China's trade surplus, which hit a few monthly record highs in 2006, to total $170 billion, up from $102 billion in 2005.

"While credit growth has stabilized a bit in the third quarter, it remains at a high level," said Mr. Yao, who predicted that new yuan loans will total three trillion yuan ($384 billion) for 2006. That would exceed the 2.5 trillion yuan annual target for new yuan loans set by the central bank at the beginning of the year.

Industrial output is likely to have grown 17%, faster than an 11.4% rise in the previous year, Mr. Yao said.

Retail sales are likely to have risen 13% to seven trillion yuan in 2006, he said. That would be basically unchanged from 12.9% growth in 2005.

He also estimated China's urban fixed-asset investment likely grew by 26% to 27%, compared with the previous year's urban FAI growth of 27.2%.

New Chief At U.N. Offers New Chance For Change (USAT)

USA Today, December 29, 2006

At the United Nations this weekend, it's out with the old and in with the new. At midnight on Dec. 31, Ban Ki Moon of South Korea takes over from Kofi Annan of Ghana as secretary-general.

Ban, 62, inherits a world body plagued by corruption scandals and at odds with its largest contributor, the United States.

His biggest immediate challenge is to restore the U.N.'s credibility. His biggest obstacle is that, like the Queen of England, his job comes with a big microphone and minimal power.

Unlike the CEO of a company, the U.N. secretary-general has little hiring and firing authority. He depends on a high-level board (the Security Council) to make major decisions and on the U.N.'s 192 members (the General Assembly) to endorse structural and other changes.

Though the challenges cry out for a strong and authoritative figure, Ban's reputation is that of a self-effacing bureaucrat. The United States and other Security Council members who chose him — and who wouldn't relish their interests being forcefully challenged — hope he will be, as the Economist magazine put it, more "secretary" than "general."

Even so, Ban's mission is not impossible. To rebuild trust in the U.N., he could start by:

·Focusing on making the U.N. bureaucracy more accountable. Fitful reform efforts and several reports by Congress have identified where the inefficiency, incompetence and corruption lie. Some of it has been addressed by axing jobs, closing several U.N. information centers and creating an ethics committee. But that's just a beginning.

An investigation, led by former Federal Reserve chief Paul Volcker, into the kickback-plagued Iraqi oil-for-food program highlighted failures of leadership and supervision by Annan. Ban could make it a cause to shine the spotlight on waste, mismanagement and inefficiency. That would help establish his authority and placate critics.

·Making a new diplomatic push to halt the genocide in Sudan's Darfur region. Though stopping the slaughter there is a priority of the U.N. and the United States, both have been stymied. The Security Council authorized the deployment of U.N. peacekeepers, but Sudan's leaders won't let them in. It can take months or years to persuade countries to provide and fund peacekeepers.

Ban could start gathering troops for quick deployment if and when Sudan's leaders accept them. China has been maddeningly ambivalent about which is more important: its major oil interests in Sudan or its desire to be seen as upholding responsibilities befitting an emerging power. A request from Ban for troops could make it choose.

Ban's predecessor began his decade-long tenure amid high hopes but ends with a mixed record. Annan, 68, and the U.N. won the Nobel Peace Prize in 2001 for "their work for a better organized and more peaceful world." But he soon faced growing problems: the Iraq war, which he opposed, the oil-for-food scandal and deteriorating relations with the Bush administration and U.S. conservatives who called for his dismissal.

His greatest achievements were enshrining a U.N. responsibility to protect civilians when their rulers cannot or will not, and his fights against poverty and AIDS. His final years were notable more for speeches — often ill-considered, particularly when attacking the United States, which supplies nearly a quarter of the U.N. budget — than for the kind of staff supervision and back-channel cajoling needed to effect real change.

Six weeks after Annan took the job, he complained that he was being criticized for not yet reforming the United Nations. The Russian ambassador joked that he had already had more time than God did to create the heavens and the earth. Yes, agreed Annan, but God had one big advantage: He worked alone, without a General Assembly, a Security Council and the committees.

The anecdote shows the limitations the new secretary-general faces. If Ban can work successfully within them, an increasingly dangerous world will be better off.

The Other War (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 29, 2006

Stories about AIDS and malaria don't typically carry good news, but 2006 was a year of progress on both fronts thanks to some new thinking about how foreign aid can best be spent.

The White House held a malaria summit this month, and the message was one of accountability, not just spending more money. The U.S. malaria initiative targets 15 of the hardest hit countries in Africa with the goal of cutting mortality rates in half. The plan is to spend $1.2 billion over five years on indoor insecticide spraying, bed nets and medicines to combat a preventable disease that kills a million people in the Third World each year. An additional goal is to work with the private sector; the Gates Foundation and ExxonMobil are among those taking the lead.

"Transparency" and "accountability" are not terms heard often today in discussions of global health; the focus usually is on how much money is being spent. "We are insisting on measuring," President Bush said at the summit. "We can determine whether or not nets are being distributed or medicine is being provided. But more important, we can measure whether or not we're saving lives."

This emphasis may seem obvious. Yet it's long been neglected by aid organizations -- including the U.S. Agency for International Development -- and has led to such travesties as the conscious distribution of ineffective anti-malarial drugs. Another problem has been an unwillingness among global health groups to pursue such politically incorrect measures as indoor spraying of the insecticide DDT, the cheapest and most effective weapon against malaria. Admiral Tim Ziemer, the U.S. malaria coordinator, says the U.S. will promote DDT spraying to fight the disease.

This malaria effort builds on successes in dealing with AIDS, particularly in light of new evidence that malaria tends to increase the HIV viral load that causes AIDS. Since Mr. Bush launched his $15 billion plan for AIDS relief in 2003, the U.S. has provided life-saving antiretroviral drugs for 822,000 people -- a number growing by 50,000 a month -- while providing care for another 4.5 million people such as AIDS orphans. That's still only a fraction of the 39 million HIV infections world-wide, 62% of them in sub-Saharan Africa. But as U.S. AIDS relief coordinator Mark Dybul says, this is "as much as all other developed countries combined."

Here too, the work has been distinguished by a focus on what Dr. Dybul calls "a culture of accountability." The U.S. global AIDS bureaucracy, previously divided along country and bureaucratic lines, now has a uniform funding and administrative approach. The U.S. has also insisted on regular reporting requirements from its overseas partners, 80% of which are private or non-governmental organizations.

At the HIV clinic of South Africa's McCord Hospital, for instance, a computer-based monitoring and evaluation system allowed doctors to notice abnormal fatality rates among overweight, middle-aged female patients on the antiretroviral Stavudine. The drug was discontinued, the problem was eliminated and the rest of the hospital adopted the reporting system. As a result of such efforts focused on behavior modification, at least some African countries are beginning to see sustained reductions in HIV infection rates: 10% in Botswana, 23% in Zimbabwe, 30% in Kenya.

That won't be close to enough to save every HIV-infected person, and matters haven't been helped by the fashionable demonization of the drug industry, which has led to resistance to antiretrovirals in places like South Africa. But what the Bush Administration is showing with AIDS and malaria is that a well managed effort can save millions from an early grave.

Middle East Exodus Part Deux (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 29, 2006

IN BLAMING AN exodus of Christians from the Middle East on the "short-sightedness and ignorance" that led to the war in Iraq, the spiritual head of the Church of England has identified a part — but only a part — of the sad phenomenon he rightly decries.

In a Christmas-season column published in the Times of London, Archbishop of Canterbury Rowan Williams notes that opponents of the Iraq war had warned that Western military action "would put Christians in the whole Middle East at risk."

Williams says that events since the 2003 invasion of Iraq, including the departure from Iraq of thousands of Christians, have made prophets of war critics. "The first Christian believers were Middle Easterners," Williams writes. "It's a very sobering thought that we might live to see the last native Christian believers in the region."

There is some truth in Williams' sermon. Under Saddam Hussein, Iraq was relatively tolerant of its Christian minority (one of his chief advisors, Tarik Aziz, was a Chaldean Catholic). Now the growing power of Muslim militias in Iraq — and the dislocations that are part of any war — have contributed to a departure of Christians from a country in which they have ancient roots.

Iraq isn't the only nation in which Christians, affluent and poor alike, have come to depend on the sufferance of a political strongman. The same is true of Syria and of Egypt, where portraits of President Hosni Mubarak in church vestibules reflect the fact that his regime is viewed by many Christians as a buffer against the sort of Islamic extremism that has been stoked by the war in Iraq.

Yet Williams' critique is selective, and he undermines its credibility further by coupling his comments about Iraq with a denunciation of the "security fence" built by Israel to protect Israelis from terrorist attacks. The fence is no substitute for an Israeli-Palestinian peace agreement, and Williams is correct that the barrier has exacerbated the plight of Palestinians, including Christians, in Bethlehem.

Palestinian Christians, like their Muslim neighbors, have suffered under an often heavy-handed Israeli occupation. But Israel has not declared war on Christianity, as have some Muslim extremists, and it has a generally good record of safeguarding Christian holy places. And Israeli occupation persists in part because the Palestinian government, controlled by the Islamic Hamas party, refuses to recognize Israel's right to exist. Hamas itself undoubtedly alienates many Palestinian Christians, who played a significant role in the secular Palestine Liberation Organization.

Preachers take pride in speaking the truth, and there is some truth in Williams' excoriation of the West and Israel for the departure of Christians from the Middle East. But it's not the whole truth.

Today's Events In Washington ... 33

TERRORISM NEWS:

Leahy Criticizes DOJ For Refusing Terror Document Request. The Washington Times (1/3, Seper) reports, "The incoming chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee yesterday described as 'disappointing' the Justice Department's refusal to release documents detailing the Bush administration's interrogation and detention policy for terrorism suspects." The Times continues, "Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat, called on the department and the White House to "reconsider their response" and work with the committee 'to promptly share this information, with any appropriate confidentiality safeguards.' … Mr. Leahy, who bitterly criticized FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III last month during a committee hearing for refusing to discuss the Bush administration's domestic terrorist-surveillance program, has promised that as chairman he will target what he called the 'unprecedented' efforts by the administration to 'hide its own activities from the public.' … 'The department's decision to brush off my request for information about the administration's troubling interrogation policies is not the constructive step toward bipartisanship that I had hoped for, given President Bush's promise to work with us,' he said."

The Los Angeles Times (1/3, Schmitt) reports, "Setting up what could become the first showdown between the Bush administration and the new Democratic Congress, the Justice Department has refused to turn over two secret documents, describing the CIA's detention and interrogation policies for suspected terrorists, to the incoming chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee." The Times reports that Leahy "said Tuesday that the department's response suggested that President Bush's promise to work with the new Congress 'may have been only political lip service.' … Leahy has said he might use subpoenas to get the material." The Times adds, "The administration notified Leahy on Dec. 22 that it would not release a presidential directive signed by Bush authorizing the CIA to set up secret prisons overseas for suspected terrorists or a 2002 Justice Department legal memorandum outlining "aggressive interrogation techniques." … Leahy waited until the week that Democrats take control of Congress to release — and denounce — the response. The department's letter to Leahy was sent during Congress' holiday recess, when most lawmakers were out of town. … The exchange is an inauspicious start to what some lawmakers and administration officials had hoped would be a period of bipartisanship following the November election, in which Republicans lost control of both houses of Congress."

FBI Documents Detail Guantanamo Detainee Abuse Allegations. Under the headline "FBI Reports Duct-Taping, 'Baptizing' At Guantanamo," the Washington Post (1/3, Eggen, 690K) reports in a front-page story, "FBI agents witnessed possible mistreatment of the Koran at the military prison at Guantanamo…including at least one instance in which an interrogator squatted over Islam's holy text in an apparent attempt to offend a captive, according to bureau documents released yesterday" for "an ongoing lawsuit by the American Civil Liberties Union." The Post notes, "In a previously unreported allegation, one interrogator bragged to an FBI agent that he had forced a prisoner to listen to 'Satanic black metal music for hours,' then dressed as a Catholic priest before 'baptizing' him." Pentagon spokesman Lt. Cmdr. Joe Carpenter "said in a statement last night that 'the issues and facts raised' in the documents 'are not new' and that 12 reviews have showed there were no Defense Department policies that condoned abuse."

The AP (1/3, Apuzzo) reports, "FBI agents documented more than two dozen incidents of possible mistreatment at the Guantanamo Bay military base, including one detainee whose head was wrapped in duct tape for chanting the Quran and another who pulled out his hair after hours in a sweltering room." The AP continues, "Documents released Tuesday by the FBI offered new details about the harsh interrogation practices used by military officials and contractors when questioning so-called enemy combatants." The AP adds, 'The reports describe a female guard who detainees said handled their genitals and wiped menstrual blood on their face. Another interrogator reportedly bragged to an FBI agent about dressing as a Catholic priest and 'baptizing' a prisoner. … Some military officials and contractors told FBI agents that the interrogation techniques had been approved by the Defense Department, including directly by former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld." The AP notes, "The documents were released in response to a public records request by the American Civil Liberties Union, which is suing Rumsfeld and others on behalf of former military detainees who say they were abused. Many of the incidents in the FBI documents have already been reported and are summarized in the ACLU's lawsuit. … President Bush signed legislation in October that authorized aggressive interrogation tactics but did not define them. ACLU lawyer Jameel Jaffer said the court documents show that stricter congressional oversight is needed."

CNN.com (1/2) reported, "The FBI surveyed all 493 FBI personnel who had been assigned to the military prison facility in the aftermath of the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and determined no FBI agent or support personnel had participated in any of the controversial practices. 'This thorough internal assessment shows the FBI was not involved in these activities in any way,' said chief FBI spokesman Richard Kolko." The bureau "stressed that most of the findings had already been reported elsewhere. 'Note these documents have been vetted by both DoD [Department of Defense] and FBI, and that FBI believes this or substantially similar information has already been released in this litigation,' the FBI said." ABC News (1/2, Ryan) noted on its Web site, "In May 2004, FBI director Robert Mueller told the Senate Judiciary Committee that 'It is the FBI's policy to prohibit interrogation by force, threats of force or coercion.

Where we have conducted interviews, we have adhered to that policy.'" BBC World Service (1/3) also is reporting on the FBI documents this morning, saying that they "apparently contradict" President Bush's assertions that the US does not engage in torture.

7th Circuit Allows Expanded Use Of FISA Wiretaps. The National Law Journal (1/3, Maclean) reports, "Federal prosecutors may use wiretap evidence obtained under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act in spy cases for criminal prosecutions unrelated to the original espionage purpose of the wiretap, the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals has held." The Journal continues, "The ruling is the first outside the special FISA court itself to interpret the law as expanding the ability of prosecutors to use the act in a variety of criminal contexts, according to defense attorney James Geis, a Chicago solo practitioner representing Ning Wen, who was convicted of violating export-control laws. … 'Unless there is a constitutional problem in domestic use of evidence seized as part of an international investigation, there is no basis for suppression,' wrote Chief Judge Frank Easterbrook in U.S. v. Wen, No. 06-1385. … 'I think this holding makes it virtually impossible to challenge a FISA search,' said Geis. 'This pretty much makes it bulletproof.'" The Journal adds, "The ruling could be significant given the government's increased focus on economic espionage and international theft of U.S. technology. Last month, two men, Fei Ye and Ming Zhong, pleaded guilty in San Francisco to stealing trade secrets from Sun Microsystems Inc. and Transmeta Corp., with the intent of benefiting the People's Republic of China. … Justice Department spokesman Dean Boyd said the department is pleased with the outcome, but he declined to elaborate on its broader potential application."

Albany Mosque Leader Asks Judge To Grant New Trial. The AP (1/3, Virtanen) reports, "Two mosque leaders convicted last fall after a terrorism-related sting have asked the trial judge to set aside the verdicts or else grant them new trials." Yassin Aref and Mohammed Hossain "were caught in a 2004 FBI sting involving a fictional terror strike. The government never accused the pair of actual violence, but said they participated in a money-laundering scheme that included an FBI informant posing as an illegal arms dealer." In Sunday's motion, Hossain lawyer Kevin Luibrand said the convictions "should be set aside because Hossain was entrapped, authorities induced the crime, the pizzeria owner had 'no predisposition' to join in, and improper testimony from an unqualified prosecution expert witness made Hossain's political affiliation appear sinister." The AP notes, "The FBI has acknowledged Aref was the ultimate target of the sting, not Hossain." Capital News 9 Albany (1/2) also reported on the defense motion.

US Military Looking To Business For Strategies In War On Terror. USA Today (1/3, 1B, Jones, 2.27M) reports that in a reversal of what "has been largely a one-way street" in their relationship with business, the US military is now "paying closer attention to business than business is paying to the military, because the world of geopolitics has discovered itself to be on the same road that business has been on for some time. That road is flatter, more networked and more decentralized than ever." The fate of "large, traditional companies" in their fight against "disruptive competitors, including YouTube, Kazaa, Skype and Wikipedia" may provide valuable lessons for "developing a strategy against al-Qaeda."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

DHS Finds Most Cities Need To Improve Interoperable Communications. In an article appearing on more than 150 news websites, the AP (1/2, Barrett) reported, "Only six of 75 US metropolitan areas won the highest grades for their emergency agencies' ability to communicate during a disaster," according to a DHS study to be released Wednesday by Secretary Michael Chertoff. "A draft portion of the report…gives the best ratings to Washington, DC; San Diego; Minneapolis-St. Paul; Columbus, Ohio; Sioux Falls, SD; and Laramie County, Wyo." The report "cautioned" that while "all 75 areas surveyed have policies in place for helping their emergency workers communicate," regular testing and exercises are required "to effectively link disparate systems." The AP added that the news "was likely to add fuel to what looms as a battle in Congress this year," with Democrats vowing to fix the problem of emergency communications, but not saying "specifically what they will do, how much it will cost or how they will pay for it." DHS spokesman Russ Knocke would say only that in releasing the report, Chertoff "will 'talk about nationwide assessments for interoperable communications.'"

USA Today (1/3, 3A, Hall, 2.27M) reports Chertoff said last month that "the country has made 'a significant amount of progress' toward better communication systems" since 9/11. "But in regions where there are still gaps, he said, leaders of cities and towns with incompatible systems need to work to develop a better system that would help communication during a disaster. Since 2003, Homeland Security has handed out $2.9 billion in grants for interoperable communications systems, and Chertoff said his department's grant programs will be heavily focused on communications improvements over the next two years. The survey, he said, was designed to identify the gaps so they can be closed 'as quickly as possible.'" Rep. Peter King said "the report shows 'how difficult an issue this is.'"

The CBS Evening News (1/2, story 9, 0:25, Couric, 7.66M) broadcasted that the "disturbing report" found that in the event of "another 9/11 or a disaster like Katrina" emergency agencies may not be able to talk to each other. NBC Nightly News (1/2, story 8, 1:15, P. Williams, 9.87M) broadcasted that the report did not say the cities that did not receive a top score "are unprepared, just that they have to do better to plan for disaster response."

German Muslim Businessman Denied Entry To US After Four-Day Detention. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/3, Burke) reports, "A German businessman of Syrian descent who wanted to surprise his daughter with a holiday visit was detained for four days in a Las Vegas holding cell before being sent back home without explanation." The Council on American-Islamic Relations "called authorities' treatment of Majed Shehadeh a case of anti-Muslim discrimination." CBP spokeswoman Roxanne Hercules "confirmed Tuesday that Shehadeh was denied entry, but would not discuss specifics of his case. She said Shehadeh's visa waiver could have been denied because 'he could have a criminal record, or it could be a terrorism issue.'" The AP notes, "After being interrogated by Border Protection and FBI agents for more than 12 hours at the airport, Shehadeh said he was handcuffed and transported in the back of police car to a North Las Vegas jail."

Judge Sets Plea Hearing In SUV Attack As Defense Seeks FBI Evidence. The Durham Herald-Sun (1/3, Velliquette) reports, "If the FBI turns over the evidence it collected after Mohammed Taheri-Azar allegedly attempted to kill people on the UNC campus by running over them in an SUV, Taheri-Azar will enter a plea at his next court hearing on Jan. 24. … During a short court appearance…Tuesday, Taheri-Azar appeared to want the case to move along faster and said he wished there weren't so many short pretrial hearings he had to attend." Public Defender James Williams told Superior Court Judge Carl Fox yesterday that "he wants to see the interviews that FBI agents conducted in Charlotte with Taheri-Azar's family and others and to see any evidence, including computer files, that the agents may have collected in the case. Orange-Chatham District Attorney Jim Woodall said he has been attempting to get that evidence without a court order, but so far has not been successful. … Fox said he would give Woodall 14 days to try to get the evidence for Williams. If he doesn't get the information from the FBI, Fox said he would sign a court order to obtain it." WRAL-TV Raleigh (1/2) also reported on yesterday's hearing and the request for the FBI evidence.

Mall Security Guards To Receive Anti-Terrorism Training. The Washington Post (1/3, D1, Mui) reports, "The job of a shopping mall security guard normally involves controlling rowdy teenagers, finding lost children and patrolling parking lots. But starting this month, malls across the country will begin training guards for another task: fighting terrorism." The Post continues, "The 14-hour program is being developed by the International Council of Shopping Centers, a trade group, and the Homeland Security Policy Institute at George Washington University at a cost of $2 million. It is the first standardized anti-terrorism curriculum written for the nation's estimated 20,000 mall security guards." The Post adds, "Developers of the program say it is crucial to safeguarding shopping centers, which have significant economic import -- as evidenced by the billions of dollars spent at malls during the holiday season -- and have emerged as modern-day town centers, with movie theaters, restaurants, and now grocery stores and gyms. … Not everyone agrees, however, that America's malls face a serious threat of terrorism. And some critics question the effectiveness of the training when the private security industry suffers from high turnover -- most guards leave the job within a year and some in as little as four months, according to estimates from the Service Employees International Union."

DHS Tracking System To Monitor IT Workers. Government Computer News (1/3, Lipowicz) reports, "A new records system is being designed to allow the Homeland Security Department to monitor the names, passwords, citizenship information and other data on thousands of IT workers with access to the department's systems." GCN continues, "In a notice posted Dec. 29, DHS announced it is creating a new sensitive, but unclassified, database as part of its General Information Technology Access Account Records System. The department made the notice to comply with the Privacy Act of 1974, which regulates how the government collects and uses personal information." GCN adds, "The new database will collect personal information from IT employees, contractors, grantees and others, including people who serve on DHS advisory committees or are listed as points of contact for facilities. … The system will include names, user names, citizenship, business affiliation, contact information and passwords. It also will include home addresses, e-mail addresses, and names and phone numbers of people listed as contacts. … The information will be routinely used by DHS contractors and consultants, facility operators, congressional offices, National Archives, Justice Department or other federal agencies conducting litigations or proceedings involving DHS."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Set To Announce Deployment Of Some 20,000 Additional Troops To Iraq. NBC Nightly News (1/2, story 4, 2:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "NBC news Pentagon correspondent Jim Miklaszewski has learned that President Bush is prepared to announce what is being called a strategy of 'surge and accelerate' in Iraq, which would involve some 20,000 additional American troops being sent to Iraq." NBC (Miklaszewski) added, "Administration officials told us today that President Bush has now all but decided to surge those additional troops into Baghdad to try to" gain control "over the violence there and only then could they accelerate the turnover of territory to Iraqi security forces." The plan would "also throw more US money at Iraq for reconstruction and a jobs program. Interestingly enough, one administration official admitted to us today that this surge option is more of a political decision than a military one because the American people have run out of patience and President Bush is running out of time to achieve some kind of success in Iraq. While this plan will clearly draw some stiff opposition on Capitol Hill, the President is expected to announce it a week from today."

Former GOP Sen. Alan Simpson, an Iraq Study Group member, was asked on MSNBC's Hardball (1/2) if he supports a troop surge. Simpson answered, "I can go along with that. We talked about that. I think we said go from 4,000 to 20,000. I can't remember the numbers. But we did not reject a surge."

Most '08 Candidates, Marginal Members Not Backing Iraq Troop Surge. The Hill (1/3, Blake) reports, "Few Republicans sprinted to Sen. John McCain's (R-Ariz.) side when he first came out in support of a troop surge in Iraq several months ago, and some of those who did wound up backing off amid campaign-season criticism." The proposal "still isn't popular among Republicans," and "among Democrats, there is a similar brand of hesitance, despite varying degrees of support expressed by leaders including incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), incoming Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee Chairman Joe Lieberman (I-Conn.) and incoming House Intelligence Committee Chairman Silvestre Reyes (D-Texas)." Democratic presidential candidates "and lawmakers who are likely to face some of the most competitive races in 2008 are largely joining with Republicans in resistance to the idea of adding troops, citing the need for a political solution instead." Sens. Joseph Biden and Barack Obama and former Sen. John Edwards "became the latest to come out forcefully against a surge in Iraq. They and other presidential candidates appear ready to make 'The McCain Doctrine,' as Edwards dubbed it Sunday, one of the first big issues of the 2008 campaign."

Iraq Launches Probe Into Saddam Execution As Criticism Grows. Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki Tuesday ordered an investigation into the events surrounding Saddam Hussein's execution, notably how on a film cell phone camera was permitted. ABC World News (1/2, story 4, 2:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The execution was supposed to be a solemn proceeding. Instead, it became a spectacle, something of a circus, outraging Sunnis and making the goal of reconciliation in Iraq even more elusive." ABC (McCarthy) added, "The anger is spreading" as "demonstrations have broken out in Sunni towns across central Iraq." The execution "was rushed" and carried out "against the advice of the US ambassador, who wanted a delay." In a separate report from the White House, ABC World News (1/2, story 5, 1:00, Raddatz, 8.78M) said "there are some officials that are furious about" the execution, arguing it "was an opportunity for Maliki to step up and say, 'It's time for national reconciliation.' Instead, one official said,

'The execution was nothing more than an act of revenge and political grandstanding.'"

NBC Nightly News (1/2, story 5, 2:40 Engel, 9.87M) reported that the investigation was launched "under political pressure." Meanwhile, one Iraqi official today "blew the whistle" on the events surrounding the video's release. Sami Al-Askari, an Iraqi government advisor, said: "One of the attendants -- probably from the guards -- smuggled his mobile phone and took that film secretly and no one noticed." The CBS Evening News (1/2, story 4, 2:25, Couric, 7.66M) said with the events surrounding the execution, "Iraq's government may have done something it had not intended to do -- turned a tyrant into a folk hero."

On its front page, the New York Times (1/3, A1, Burns, Glanz, 1.16M) reports Iraqi officials "said a three-man Interior Ministry committee would look into the scenes that have caused outrage and public demonstrations." Meanwhile, "As the shock of those scenes reached a new crescendo in Iraq, American officials said that they had worked until the last hours of Mr. Hussein's life to persuade" Maliki "to delay the execution." The officials "said they appealed to Mr. Maliki not to execute Mr. Hussein at dawn on Saturday because of the onset of a major Islamic festival, and because of constitutional and legal questions that the Americans believed threw the legitimacy of the execution into doubt." An American official said that Maliki "had never fully explained his urgency in carrying out the death sentence," but the prime minister "gave one explanation that appeared to weigh heavily on his mind, the American said, and that was his fear that Mr. Hussein might be the subject of an insurgent attempt to free him if the procedural wrangling over the execution were protracted."

The Washington Post (1/3, A1, Raghavan, Trejos, 690K) reports the probe "could implicate senior Iraqi officials." Munqith al-Faroun, the deputy prosecutor in Hussein's trial, "said in a telephone interview Tuesday that he saw two official observers using their cellphones to record Hussein's last moments." The two men, he said, were "recording through their mobiles openly." The AP (1/3, Torchia) says the incident "dealt a blow to Iraq's efforts to prove it was a neutral enforcer of the law," noting that the Iraqi government "did not say what, if any, punishment would await anyone uncovered" in the probe. USA Today (1/3, 8A, 2.27M) files a similar report.

Execution Draws International Condemnation. The New York Times (1/3, A6, Lyall, 1.16M) reports British deputy Prime Minister John Prescott said Tuesday that "the taunting and baiting" that occurred at the execution "was unacceptable and that the people responsible should be condemned for taking part." The Times notes that Blair "has not spoken publicly about Mr. Hussein's death, an omission that has been seized on by antiwar members of his Labor Party as another misstep in a long succession of them on Iraq."

Ban's Comments On Execution Stirs Controversy. Meanwhile, the AP (1/3, Chang) reports at the United Nations, Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon "ran into trouble on his first day of work when he failed to state the UN's official stance opposing capital punishment and said it should be a decision of individual countries." His "ambiguous answer" put "a question mark over the UN's stance on the death penalty, although Ban's spokeswoman said there was no change in policy." The Los Angeles Times (1/3, Farley, 850K) says Ban "stepped back from the United Nations' long-standing opposition to the death penalty." Similarly, the New York Times (1/3, A6, Preston, 1.16M) says Ban "seemed to have tripped in his effort to tread lightly on the political views of the many United Nations members," and "also seemed to show that Mr. Ban…had not completed the transition from representing his country to leading the United Nations."

The Washington Post (1/3, A15, Lynch, 690K) writes, "Ban's first public reaction to Hussein's execution signaled a sharp break from his predecessor, Kofi Annan, an ardent death-penalty critic who opposed UN participation in the Iraqi war crimes tribunal that sentenced Hussein to die." The Washington Times (1/3, A1, Pisik, Behn, 88K) also reports on Ban's comments.

More Commentary. The New York Times' (1/3) Thomas Friedman says the execution "resembled a tribal revenge ritual rather than the culmination of a constitutional process in which America should be proud to have participated." The "raw tribal theatrics of Saddam's hanging highlight just how few" of America's "values Iraq has imported." However, Friedman says, "We are to blame for not creating the security needed for those values to take hold. But not enough of our Iraqi allies have risen to the occasion, either. It was our closest Iraqi partners who oversaw Saddam's tribal hanging. We have to look that in the eye." Friedman goes on to note that "now President Bush wants a 'surge' of more US troops to Baghdad, in one last attempt to bring order," cautioning that "if the underlying willingness to share power and resources is not present among the major communities in Iraq, adding more US troops won't help either. Adding more troops makes sense only if it's to buy more time for positive trends that have already begun to appear on the horizon. I don't see them."

Marty Peretz, editor-in-chief of The New Republic, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/3, 2.04M), "Saddam has already swung from the ropes," and "the question, then, is not whether Iraq will recover from the oppressor's death. The question is whether Iraq will recover from the oppressor's rule. The execution of this monstrous man was not intended to be a deterrent to evil. There are probably no deterrents to real evil and real evildoers. But a community can punish its own pharaohs. That punishment will be the most significant sovereign act the people of Iraq have ever done. This is an act of recovery by itself."

The Houston Chronicle (1/3, 530K) editorializes, "Unfortunately, like so much else that has occurred since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion, the tyrant's death turned into another fiasco and missed opportunity. ... Rather than looking like the cowering vagrant that U.S. troops pulled out of a hole, the well-groomed fallen dictator exhibited nonchalance and sarcasm. ... the authorities' conduct at the execution only served notice how far the new Iraq has to go in meeting the standards of democratic justice."

The Norfolk Virginian Pilot (1/3) editorializes, "The execution early Saturday is cold comfort to the U.S. troops now stuck in Iraq, trying to impose stability on a fractured nation that seems to want none of it. ... When the history of this war is written in years to come, this weekend's hanging may be no more than a footnote."

Author and former ambassador Peter Galbraith writes in an op-ed for the Boston Globe (1/3, 413K), "The manner of Saddam's execution made it clear that Iraq's Shi'ite leaders -- and in particular Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki -- were more interested in revenge than justice. ... According to his former foreign minister, Tariq Azziz, Saddam apparently intended to make an issue of western support in his trial. This could also have been awkward for some in the current administration. ... it would have made an enormous difference to have had an irrefutable record that Saddam was responsible for the genocide against the Kurds."

Syndicated columnist Cal Thomas writes in the Washington Times (1/3, 88K), "That was a shorter summation than most prosecutors deliver in court, but in the end Saddam's execution wasn't about revenge. It was about justice."

Columnist Bruce Fein writes in the Washington Times (1/3, 88K), "The moral universe is celebrating his execution by hanging." However, "Saddam, like Afghanistan's Taliban and Osama bin Laden, was a partial creation of the United States. That should be remembered whenever America contemplates bolstering a dictator under the banner of Realpolitik."

Iraq Reports 12,000 Civilian Deaths In 2006.

The AP (1/3, Hurst) reports, "Iraq reported Tuesday that about 12,000 civilians were killed last year — the third full year since the U.S.-led invasion — with a dramatic rise in the last three months, when 5,000 died. Only about half as many Iraqi soldiers died in 2006 as American troops. ... In all, the Iraqi ministries of Health, Defense and Interior reported a total of 13,896 Iraqi civilians, police and soldiers died last year, 162 more than the tally kept by The Associated Press." However, "Counts kept by other groups, including the United Nations, list far higher death tolls, which are disputed by the Iraqi government." The AP adds, "Life for Iraqis, especially in Baghdad and cities and towns in the center of the country, has become increasingly untenable. ... professionals — especially professors, physicians, politicians and journalists — are falling to sectarian killers at a stunning pace."

Earlier AP coverage gave a higher total: The AP (1/2, Frayer) reported, "Government officials reported that 16,273 Iraqi civilians, soldiers and police died violent deaths in 2006 ... The tabulation by the Iraqi ministries of Health, Defense and Interior, showed that 14,298 civilians, 1,348 police and 627 soldiers were killed in the violence that raged in the country last year."

Civilian Deaths Hit New Monthly High. The Financial Times (1/3, Negus) reports, "The tally of civilian deaths in Iraq hit a new high of 1,930 in December, suggesting sectarian violence that surged in the summer remains at peak levels." The figures "may be a significant underestimate as many deaths go unreported. ... All Iraqi death toll figures are controversial and are often difficult to reconcile with one another. Ministries, depending on who controls them, often have an incentive either to reduce or to inflate figures." The FT adds, "There had been fears that the execution of Saddam Hussein on Saturday would lead to an upsurge in violence, but a resident of a mixed Sunni-Shia neighbourhood told the Financial Times that the Eid holiday since the weekend had brought a lull. However, he expected the battle to resume shortly."

The Los Angeles Times (1/3, Hennessy-Fiske, 850K) reports, "The surge in civilian fatalities has been attributed largely to the rising tide of sectarian violence in Baghdad and beyond. ... Many believe the Iraqi government underestimates civilian casualties. The United Nations, for example, estimates that 100 Iraqis die in violence daily. On the other hand, an Interior Ministry spokesman said Tuesday that the latest figures were too high."

Diyala Province Becomes "Tinderbox." Under the headline "A Promising Iraqi Province Is Now A Tinderbox," the Los Angeles Times (1/3, Moore, 850K) reports, "When US forces killed the leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq, Abu Musab Zarqawi, six months ago in a village near here, they hoped security would improve in this strategic province just north of Baghdad. Instead, security has collapsed in Diyala province, which now ranks as one of Iraq's most troubled regions. Insurgent attacks have more than doubled in the last year. ... Assassinations have claimed the lives of mayors, tribal chieftains, police officials and judges. ... Many government officials here sleep on cots in their offices because driving home is too dangerous." US and Iraqi officials "blamed the sharp downturn on a combination of US neglect and abuses by the Iraqi army."

Ignatius Fears Abandonment Of Iraqis Who Helped US. Washington Post (1/3, A19, 690K) columnist David Ignatius writes, "However long the United States stays in Iraq and whatever success it achieves there, we should agree we have a moral responsibility to the Iraqis who risked their lives and families to be America's allies." Ignatius cites the undesirable precedent of Vietnam: "America's ragged withdrawal from Vietnam was chronicled by Frank Snepp, a CIA analyst in Saigon at the time." The CIA's Vietnamese employees "were, in practical terms, left to die." That said, Vietnamese who fled "are among our nation's great success stories ... one of the worst effects of the [Iraq] war is that it is destroying the educated middle class of Iraq -- driving doctors, teachers and business people into desperate exile. When Iraq comes back together some day, will these educated Iraqis be America's friends, or will they despise us? Whatever we do in Iraq in coming months, it should include a bipartisan commitment to keep faith with the people who risked everything for a new Iraq -- by making room for them in America, if necessary."

Former CNN Exec Challenges AP To Authenticate Iraqi Source. Fox News' Special Report (1/2, Hume) reported, "A former top executive at CNN is calling out the Associated Press saying he could find no evidence that one of its top Iraqi sources actually exists. Eason Jordan, who runs a website devoted to Iraq news, said neither he or anyone trying to track down Iraqi police captain Jamil Hussein have been able to turn up a family member, friend, or colleague, and the A.P. isn't helping. A spokesman says Hussein, who has been quoted in dozens of A.P. stories and is often critical of the U.S., is someone they had talked to for years, but they would not respond to the U.S. demands to prove his existence."

Civilians Answer Call To Serve In Iraq. The Washington Post's (1/3, D1, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports that generally, "federal agencies prefer to rely on volunteers like Needham and Walsh for duty in war zones," but "with the Iraq war in its fourth year, there has been some concern that the ranks of civil service volunteers are growing thin." The Post adds that while the "Iraq Study Group," recommended "that agencies order civilian employees to fill key jobs in Iraq if not enough volunteers step forward," American Federation of Government Employees president John Gage, "questions how civil service employees could be ordered to Iraq when the violence in Baghdad makes it exceedingly difficult to move around and perform jobs."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Timing Of Apple Options Led To Windfalls. The Los Angeles Times (1/3, Chmielewski) reports, "In August 1997, Apple Computer Inc. handed four top executives options to buy a total of nearly 1 million shares. The next day, the value of those options jumped a staggering 48%, or $7.7 million. … This was no coincidence, according to a shareholder lawsuit filed against executives and directors of the Cupertino, Calif.-based company in federal court in Northern California. Rather, the options were granted to coincide with good news that would give the four executives an overnight windfall." The Times continues, "The stock soared when co-founder Steve Jobs announced that Apple's sworn enemy, Microsoft Corp., threw the struggling company a life raft in the form of a $150-million cash infusion. In exchange, Apple gave Microsoft a stake in the company and agreed to use the software giant's Web browser on its Mac personal computers. … The investment rocked the high-tech world at the time but became only a footnote in the astonishing comeback of a company as celebrated today for its marketing and design prowess as Nike, Prada or Mercedes-Benz. … But the grants are an example of the fast-and-loose practices that went unchecked in a corporate culture fashioned by Jobs to revive Apple, which by 1997 was hemorrhaging money, according to the lawsuit, a combination of 11 shareholder complaints." The Times adds, "Filed days before Christmas, it alleges that Apple engaged in widespread manipulation of option grants to allow employees to buy shares at low prices. Apple "spring-loaded" options in advance of good news and "backdated" other grants to days when the stock traded at low prices to create an automatic paper profit, claims the suit, which has only recently come to light. … On Friday, Apple absolved Jobs of wrongdoing after a three-month internal investigation of its option practices. The company, however, acknowledged 6,428 instances of improperly dating option grants over a six-year period, when it had 'insufficient safeguards' to prevent stock manipulation, according to a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission. The first incident occurred on Dec. 29, 1997, just a few months after Jobs had returned to the company and taken the title of 'interim' chief executive. … The company's admissions have raised new questions among securities lawyers and corporate governance experts about Jobs' role in the controversy."

Forecasters See Tough Year Ahead For CEOs. The Financial Times (1/3, Guerrera) reports, "American chief executives are bracing themselves for a tough year, with corporate governance issues, shareholder activism, and a more difficult operating environment likely to test their leadership and business skills." The Times continues, "Corporate experts predict that US chief executives will see their once undisputed authority further eroded in 2007 by the growing desire from institutional and retail investors to have a bigger influence on company matters." The Times adds, "Over the past year, this trend has been strengthened by the explosion of the options backdating scandal, increased shareholder anger at lavish executive compensation and attacks from activist hedge funds. … 'The pressure is not going to relent on CEOs in 2007,' says John Challenger of the recruitment firm Challenger Gray & Christmas. 'The days of the imperial chief executive are over.'" The Times notes, "The increased pressure on America's corporate leaders has led to unprecedented levels of chief executive turnover. In 2006, more than 1,340 US chief executives left their jobs – the highest on record – according to Mr Challenger's firm. … The options backdating scandal, which has engulfed more than 180 companies, has forced more than 15 chief executives to resign and more could follow. … The controversy – coupled with more investor scrutiny of executive pay and the ongoing impact of the Sarbanes-Oxley legislation – are rapidly changing the US's corporate governance landscape."

More Commentary. In his column for the Wall Street Journal (1/3, A12), Holman W. Jenkins, Jr., writes, "The markets have finally had their say about the wonderfully overblown backdating scandal. When Apple filed its latest mea culpa on Friday along with a board expression of confidence in Steve Jobs's leadership, the company's shares jumped four bucks. Message: The market doesn't give a hoot about backdating. It gives a hoot whether Mr. Jobs might be run out of his job." Jenkins continues, "This ought to cast a light on whether the drop in market prices of companies in the backdating scandal reflects the shock and horror of investors at the details of backdating -- or shock and horror at the meal that trial lawyers, prosecutors and the media are making of companies caught up in this episode. … Whether Mr. Jobs is safely out of woods remains to be seen. It didn't help that just a week earlier, the Associated Press reported that SEC Chairman Chris Cox has been averring that, in sorting through dozens of backdating cases, his agency would save its legal firepower for 'cases of serious fraud, with elements such as deliberately lying or forging documents.' … Uh oh. In granting Mr. Jobs options on 7.5 million shares, somebody at Apple pencil-whipped a technical requirement of a board meeting to approve the grant. Of course, Mr. Jobs was already a billionaire. Does anybody think he engaged in theft to pad his net worth by a faction of a percent?" Jenkins concludes, "Now, not all CEOs are as pivotal to a company's performance as Mr. Jobs is perceived to be, but this has nothing to do with the CEO pay calculus. All CEOs sit at the switch: They make the calls by which shareholder wealth is preserved or squandered. Should a company sacrifice short-term profits in order to invest more in customer service? Should it embark on a bold product redesign or milk an aging product line a bit longer? … The market wants a CEO in whom it has confidence, and who is responsive to the share price. The media's relentless appetite is for evidence that CEO pay fails the 'fairness heuristic.' This basic disjunction is why one of the signal phenomena of the age, the towering increase in executive compensation, remains unexplained to the American people despite the massive amount of journalism spent on subjects like backdating."

Former Enron Accounting Head Causey Heads For Prison. The Washington Post/Bloomberg (1/3, D1, Calkins) reports, "Richard A. Causey, Enron's former chief accounting officer, was on his way Tuesday to a federal prison in Bastrop, Tex., to begin a 5 1/2 -year sentence for his role in the fraud that destroyed the company." Bloomberg continues, "Causey, 46, pleaded guilty to one count of securities fraud in December 2005, less than a month before he was to stand trial with former Enron chief executives Jeffrey K. Skilling and Kenneth L. Lay, both of whom were found guilty. … 'A lot of improper things were done at Enron,' Causey said as he was sentenced in November. 'Some of those were done by me, and for that I am profoundly sorry.'" Bloomberg adds, "Causey was the last of 16 former executives to plead guilty to crimes at Enron, which was the world's largest energy-trading company before it went bankrupt in December 2001 as widespread accounting fraud came to light. … More than 5,000 jobs and $1 billion in employee pensions were wiped out when Enron collapsed. Investors are suing to recover more than $30 billion. … Causey was assigned to the prison he requested. Bastrop is three hours from his home in Houston, where Enron was based, and 30 miles from Austin, where the oldest of his three children attends college."

Cox, Frank Take Diverse Approaches To Financial Issues. The Washington Post (1/3, Johnson, 690K) reports that from their "years at Harvard Law School to their tenure in the House of Representatives, Barney Frank and Christopher Cox chose markedly different approaches to reach their destinations." Their paths "cross again as Frank, a Massachusetts Democrat, assumes control of the House Financial Services Committee, which oversees the Securities and Exchange Commission -- led by Cox, a former Republican lawmaker from California." Despite "similar resumes, the men could hardly be more divergent in ideology and personal style." Frank's "support for predatory-lending reforms, minimum-wage increases and universal health care mark him as one of the most left-leaning lawmakers on Capitol Hill." Cox "cut his teeth in the Reagan White House, and his votes in Congress earned him an 87 percent lifetime rating from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce before he became chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission." Already, "they have clashed over a change to an SEC rule that some investor advocates say will reduce disclosure of executive pay in the form of certain stock awards."

Sarbanes-Oxley Act Seen As Counterproductive. In a New York Times (1/3, 1.16M) op-ed, William Niskanen of the Cato Institute says while the Sarbanes-Oxley Act "was surely well intentioned," it has "proven counterproductive in the extreme, and Congress would best honor the departing lawmakers by repealing it. Sarbanes-Oxley has seriously harmed American corporations and financial markets without increasing investor confidence. The section of the law requiring companies to perform internal audits has turned out to be far more costly than proponents projected, especially for smaller firms. These costs have led some small companies to go private, hardly a victory for public oversight, and some foreign firms to withdraw their stocks from American exchanges."

CRIMINAL LAW:

FBI Subpoenas Records Of Investment Firm Connected To Bruno. The New York Daily News (1/3, Mahoney, 729K) reports, "The FBI has subpoenaed an investment firm for documents related to state Senate Majority Leader Joe Bruno in a widening probe of the state's top Republican, the Daily News learned yesterday. A source familiar with the investigation said the firm, McGinn, Smith & Co. of Albany, is 'one of the groups Sen. Bruno did consulting for' through his own business." The Daily News notes, "The FBI is also reviewing subpoenaed documents relating to land transactions made by now-dissolved First Grafton Corp., a real estate investment firm that Bruno helped to start, as well as plane rides arranged for Bruno by a wealthy friend, Jared Abbruzzese, sources said.

FBI Investigating Murder Of Arizona Tribal Chairwoman's Brother. The Arizona Daily Star (1/3, McCombs, 128K) reports, "The FBI is investigating the New Year's Day death of the brother of the chairwoman of the Pascua Yaqui Tribe as a homicide, an FBI spokeswoman in Phoenix said Tuesday. Gabriel Frias, the 32-year-old brother of chairwoman Herminia Frias, died from shotgun blast to the midsection, an autopsy performed Tuesday by the Pima County Medical Examiner's Office revealed, said Deborah McCarley, an FBI spokeswoman in Phoenix." The Daily Star adds, "The FBI remained tight lipped about the events leading up to the shooting, possible suspects or motives, citing the need to protect the ongoing investigation, McCarley said. They haven't arrested anyone, she said."

New Orleans Police Officers Surrender For Booking On Murder Charges. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (1/3, Maggi, McCarthy) reports, "Surrounded by colleagues offering hugs, handshakes and shouts of support, seven New Orleans police officers walked into central lock-up Tuesday morning to be booked on murder and attempted murder charges, stemming from their shooting of six people a week after Hurricane Katrina. Steady applause broke out as the officers, accompanied by their attorneys and union representatives, began the slow march to jail." However, "not everyone offered comfort: A handful of protesters, marching outside the ring of support, pronounced the officers guilty and called them terrorists and thugs. And shouts from inside the jail could be heard on the street below — a handful of voices screaming out obscenities and warnings.

Gulf Coast Officials Warn Homeowners Of Hurricane Repair Scams. USA Today (1/3, Heath, 2.27M) reports, "Officials along the Gulf Coast are warning homeowners that they will likely face a wave of contractor scams in the coming months as they begin collecting billions of dollars in government grants to rebuild what Hurricane Katrina destroyed. Mississippi has hired six investigators to target schemes aimed at recipients. Louisiana will send out vans to warn consumers about scams and take complaints. Both states are filling the airwaves with warnings about common schemes, and regularly warn aid recipients to research contractors and put work agreements in writing." USA notes, "Officials expect contracting schemes will make up the next wave of fraud, in part because taking money from homeowners is already proving far less complicated than scamming the government-run grants, Mississippi State Auditor Phil Bryant says."

New Jersey Panel Recommends Abolishing Death Penalty. The New York Times (1/3, Mansnerus, 1.16M) reports a legislative commission "recommended on Tuesday that New Jersey become the first state to abolish the death penalty since states began reinstating their capital punishment laws 35 years ago." The commission report "found 'no compelling evidence' that capital punishment serves a legitimate purpose, and increasing evidence that it 'is inconsistent with evolving standards of decency.'" Death penalty experts "said that New Jersey was the first state to receive an official recommendation that capital punishment be abandoned, and it lands in a state where legislators have a Democratic majority along with a Democratic governor who supports repeal of the statute." There is "ample opposition to capital punishment in both houses of the Legislature, and Senate President Richard J. Codey said in an interview that he expected to ask for a vote, although he would not discuss a timetable."

The AP (1/3, Hester) reports, "The report, obtained by The Associated Press, found no compelling evidence that New Jersey's death penalty, which has not been used in more than four decades, serves any purpose. … It also found abolishing the death penalty would eliminate the danger of executing an innocent person, and said the death penalty costs taxpayers more than prisoners serving life terms without parole." The AP notes, "One member of the group, former Senator John F. Russo, who wrote the state's death penalty statute when executions were reinstated in 1982, dissented from the commission's findings. … The 13-member commission was formed earlier this year to study capital punishment in a state that has not executed anyone since 1963. Nine men are on death row in New Jersey, but the legislation that created the commission imposed a moratorium on executions until 60 days after the panel completed its work. No execution was imminent when the moratorium was imposed."

US Helps North Carolina Prosecutors In Child Sex Cases. The AP (1/3) reports, "Until the (North Carolina) Legislature changes prison sentences for people who distribute child pornography, local prosecutors are getting help from federal officials in putting pedophiles in prison." The AP continues, "Investigators in Harnett County discovered 228 video clips and 124 still photos of child pornography - including some involving a toddler - on Christopher Paul Brady's computer. … In state court, the 31-year-old Brady received three years of supervised probation. … 'I got the most I could get,' said Assistant District Attorney Mary Wilson. .. But federal prosecutors stepped in and charged the Lillington man with trafficking in child pornography. After being convicted, Brady was sentenced to more than 15 years in prison. … 'We're saving some people some trauma. We're going to get a good sentence,' said Assistant U.S. Attorney Jay Exum, who works with prosecutors on child pornography cases in eastern North Carolina." The AP notes, "Exum works under Project Safe Childhood, a U.S. Justice Department program which was started last year and aims to put pedophiles in prison on lengthy sentences. … FBI statistics show child pornography and exploitation cases increased nationally from 113 in 1996 to 2,135 last year and prosecutors have seen a similar increase in cases coming to court - from 344 in 1995 to 1,576 in 2005. … The state Legislature convenes Jan. 24 and one task is to seek tougher penalties for child pornography charges. State law currently gives prison time to people who make child pornography, but a special legislative committee recommended tougher sentences."

CIVIL LAW:

Texas Professor Sues Federal Government, Seeks Information On Drug-Related Case. The El Paso Times (1/2) reported a University of Texas, El Paso professor "is suing the federal government hoping to force the release of documents surrounding the case of 'Lalo,' the former Immigration and Customs Enforcement informant involved in drug-related murders in Juárez. Bill Weaver, an associate professor of political science at UTEP, filed the suit in mid-November against the Drug Enforcement Administration and the Department of Justice because the agencies did not answer his Freedom of Information Act requests from 2005, court documents showed." The professor "said he wants to use the information for an upcoming book."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Attorney Pleads For Life Of Man Convicted In Human Smuggling Deaths. The AP (1/3, Lozano) reports from Houston, "A truck driver convicted for his role in the deadliest immigrant smuggling attempt in the U.S. should not be sentenced to death because he is not the 'worst of the worst,' his defense attorney told jurors Tuesday. … But prosecutors said Tyrone Williams, 35, a Jamaican citizen living in New York state, should be executed because he committed a deliberate act of violence in a depraved manner that resulted in the deaths of 19 illegal immigrants trapped inside a sweltering tractor-trailer. … 'The only justifiable punishment in this case should be death,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Rodriguez said." The AP continues, "After a nearly monthlong break due to the illness of an attorney and the holidays, the punishment phase in Williams' retrial resumed on Tuesday with opening statements. … Williams was convicted on Dec. 4 for his role in the May 2003 deaths of the illegal immigrants, who succumbed to the deadly heat in the back of his tractor-trailer as he was smuggling them from southern Texas to Houston. … Jurors now have to decide if Williams, who was convicted on all 58 counts of conspiracy, harboring and transporting, should be sentenced to death or up to life in prison."

Number Of Minority Coaches In NCAA Division I-A Grows To Seven. USA Today (1/3, O'Toole) reports, "Floyd Keith isn't ready to proclaim great strides when it comes to hiring minority head football coaches in NCAA Division I-A. But with two moves already this month, the executive director of the Black Coaches Association said Wednesday that he is encouraged by what is happening. … 'At the end of the day I still have to wait and see where the numbers end up,' he said. 'With two I-A hires, that brings it to seven, which, if there is one more hire, would equal the most.'" USA continues, "Mario Cristobal, who is Cuban-American, was hired at Florida International, and Randy Shannon, who is African-American, was hired at Miami (Fla.). They join five other current I-A minority head coaches. In 1998 there were eight. As recently as the 2005 season there were three. Eighteen of the 119 jobs in I-A have opened this season, with all but three filled." USA adds, "Keith's organization began issuing an annual report card on hiring practice in 2004 as a way to bring pressure on schools to at least consider minority candidates. The group also wants recruits and their families to consider a school's BCA grade before signing. .. The grade emphasizes minorities brought into the interview process as well as those hired. The third report card, which grades individual schools, was issued in September."

Massachusetts Lawmakers Keep Gay Marriage Amendment Alive. The AP (1/3, Leblanc) reports that in a "suspense-filled final day of the legislative session, Massachusetts lawmakers kept alive a proposed constitutional amendment Tuesday that would put a stop to gay marriage in the only state that allows same-sex couples to wed." With a "combination of parliamentary maneuvering, flip-flopping and brinksmanship, lawmakers gave the first round of approval necessary for the amendment to appear on the ballot in 2008. The measure still needs the endorsement of the next legislative session." If the amendment "makes it onto the ballot and residents approve it, it will leave Massachusetts' 8,000 existing gay marriages intact but ban any new ones."

The New York Times (1/3, Belluck, 1.16M) reports the amendment "now requires the approval of at least 50 legislators in another vote in the 2007-8 session. Then it would be placed on the November 2008 ballot as a referendum question." The "swiftness of the vote on Tuesday surprised people on both sides of the issue, taking place without any debate, just minutes after the constitutional convention had been gaveled into session. Proponents of the amendment needed just 50 of the legislature's 200 lawmakers to support it; the final vote was 61 in favor of the amendment and 132 opposed."

The Washington Post (1/3, A3, Powell, Shulman, 690K) reports Massachusetts legislators "approved a measure yesterday that next year could allow voters to overturn a historic same-sex marriage law in the only state in the nation where such unions are legal." Glen Lavy, "a senior counsel with the Alliance Defense Fund, which strongly favors banning same-sex marriage," said, "It's in the best interests of children and society for marriage to be defined as between a man and woman. The battle to preserve marriage in Massachusetts as between a man and a woman is alive and well." The Post adds, "Yesterday's vote fell like a hammer on gay-rights advocates, who have fought a half-decade-long war to gain the right to same-sex marriage in Massachusetts."

The Washington Times (1/3, Wetzstein, 88K) reports "yesterday's votes brought relief to supporters." Kris Mineau, "president of the Massachusetts Family Institute and spokesman for VoteOnMarriage.org, which led the 2005 petition drive that garnered 170,000 signatures in favor of the amendment," said, "Today's victory is about restoring the integrity and authority of the people's constitutional right to petition their government."

ANTITRUST:

Korean Antitrust Authorities Scrutinizing Qualcomm. The New York Times (1/3, Sang-Hun) reports, "The South Korean antitrust agency has formed a task force to investigate the licensing and business practices of the wireless technology company Qualcomm, the latest in a string of legal battles for the company, officials said on Tuesday." The Times continues, "In Japan, Europe and the United States, Qualcomm, which is based in San Diego, faces accusations by rivals that it has abused its market dominance in wireless technology to demand excessive royalties and block fair competition." The Times adds, "Qualcomm is known for developing code-division multiple access, or CDMA, wireless technology, which is a rival standard to the global system for mobile communications, or GSM, technology. It makes money by selling chips that power cellphones, as well as collecting royalties or licensing its technology to other chip makers and cellphone manufacturers. … The creation of a task force, which is modeled after the one investigating antitrust complaints against Microsoft, means that the case in question merits a full-blown investigation, said Na Yang-ju, a spokesman for the South Korean antitrust watchdog agency, the Fair Trade Commission. … But commission officials also acknowledged that the case against Qualcomm was more complicated than they had expected. A year ago, the commission ruled that Microsoft was guilty of breaching fair trade rules, a decision the company is appealing."

Defunct Online Movie Distributor Sues Leading Tech Firms. The New York Times (1/3, Markoff, Helft) reports, "In 1997, Jonathan T. Taplin, a veteran film and television producer, stood up at a cable industry convention and asserted that in the future all movies would be distributed over the Internet. He recalls being laughed out of the room." The Times continues, "Mr. Taplin may laugh last. Online distribution of movies has arrived, at places like Apple Computer's iTunes Store. And even though Mr. Taplin's own video-on-demand company, Intertainer, shut down operations five years ago, it says it deserves some credit — and cash. … Last week, Intertainer filed a broad lawsuit asserting that Apple, Google and Napster are infringing on a 2005 patent that covers the commercial distribution of audio and video over the Internet." The Times adds, "Founded by Mr. Taplin and two other Hollywood entertainment executives in 1996, Intertainer developed technology to distribute movies on demand through cable and phone lines for viewing on televisions and personal computers. It gained investors including Intel, Microsoft, Sony, NBC and Comcast. … Theodore Stevenson, a partner at McKool Smith, the Dallas firm representing Intertainer, said the company filed suit against Apple, Google and Napster because they were perceived as leaders in the market for digital downloads. He declined to specify the damages that Intertainer was seeking." The Times notes, "Intertainer's tale is somewhat different than other intellectual property suits brought by technology licensing firms. By 2002 the company seemed to have a growing business, with 125,000 Internet subscribers for its servers and 35,000 TV subscribers through the Comcast cable system. … But in the fall of 2002, the company shut down its service and filed a lawsuit against some of the backers of Movielink, a competitor backed by five Hollywood studios, including Sony, Universal and Warner Brother. At the time Mr. Taplin said the studios were using Movielink as a price-fixing vehicle to kill Intertainer. … An antitrust investigation by the Justice Department into Movielink was dropped in 2004."

Nucor To Purchase Harris Steel Of Canada For $1.07 Billion. The New York Times/AP (1/3) reports, "The Nucor Corporation, the maker of steel products, said Tuesday that it had agreed to acquire the Harris Steel Group of Canada for $1.07 billion." The AP continues, "Nucor, which makes steel from recycled metal at its minimill operations across the United States, said the deal would broaden its geographic reach and give it opportunities to grow. … Nucor bid 46.25 Canadian dollars ($39.69) for each Harris Steel share, a 6 percent premium over the Friday closing price of 43.49 Canadian dollars ($37.32) for Harris shares on the Toronto Stock Exchange." The AP adds, "The deal requires regulatory approval in the United States and Canada. Nucor, which is based in Charlotte, plans to allow Harris Steel to operate as a separate, wholly owned subsidiary once the deal is completed. … Nucor, which has operations in 18 states, expects the acquisition to bolster earnings immediately."

The Wall Street Journal (1/3, A3, Glader) reports, "With its $1.07 billion acquisition of Harris Steel Group Inc. in Canada, Nucor Corp. is breaking from its nonunion tradition and offering a glimpse of where it sees growth in the steel industry." The Journal continues, "The move by the Charlotte, N.C., steelmaker also answers a question that has followed Nucor and other steelmakers: where to invest sizable cash reserves from three years of strong steel prices? With this deal, Nucor shows it sees opportunity in finishing steel products for its customers and in distribution rather than adding steelmaking capacity." The Journal adds, "The deal comes amid rising concern by some in the steel industry over the potential for raw steelmaking overcapacity. Nucor had said fourth-quarter earnings would be less than expected because of lower shipments and prices. … While many large steel companies are buying other primary steelmakers around the world, Nucor -- which had $1.69 billion in cash on its balance sheet in the third quarter -- is focusing its investment and growth largely in North America's manufacturing infrastructure. Nucor said it sees the construction market growing, with increasing demand for bridges, tunnels, airports and hospitals. … Harris -- which fabricates steel into reinforced steel bar, platform grating and wire mesh for construction products ranging from bridges to airports and stadiums -- serves that market. "

Seminole Tribe's Purchase Of Hard Rock Challenged. The Wall Street Journal (1/3, B3) reports, "Baltimore development firm Cordish Co. and affiliate Power Plant Entertainment LLC filed suit in Broward County Circuit Court in Florida, claiming the Seminole Tribe of Florida was able to buy the Hard Rock chain of cafes and casinos through collusion and bid rigging." The Journal continues, "The plaintiffs allege Hard Rock Cafe International Inc. management secretly negotiated with the Seminoles for seven months before plans to sell were announced in July. Power Plant, a partnership between Cordish and Coastal Development LLC, was the original developer of two Seminole Hard Rock casinos and hotels in Tampa and Hollywood, Florida." The Journal adds, "The Seminoles last month agreed to buy the chain for $965 million from the U.K.'s Rank Group PLC. In a statement, the Seminoles accused Cordish of being 'a sore loser' and insisted the deal went through 'a lengthy and open bidding process.' They said the lawsuit 'has no merit.' Rank Group shareholders are scheduled Monday to vote on the sale."

NYTimes Calls On Congress To Pass Net Neutrality. The New York Times (1/3, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "One of the big winners in the last election may turn out to be the principle, known as net neutrality, that Internet service providers should not be able to favor some content over others. Democrats who are moving into the majority in Congress — led by Ron Wyden in the Senate and Edward Markey in the House — say they plan to fight hard to pass a net neutrality bill, and we hope that they do. It is vital to preserve the Internet's role in promoting entrepreneurship and free expression." Cable and telephone companies "are talking, however, about creating a two-tiered Internet with a fast lane and a slow lane. Companies that pay hefty fees would have their Web pages delivered to Internet users in the current speedy fashion. Companies and individuals that do not would be relegated to the slow lane. Creating these sorts of tiers would destroy the democratic quality of the Internet. Big, wealthy voices would start to overpower the smaller, poorer ones. Innovation would be threatened if start-ups and small companies could not afford the new fees."

ENVIRONMENT:

Judge To Decide Oklahoma Land Dispute. The AP (1/3) reports from El Reno, OK, "A federal judge in Washington will decide whether the federal government wrongfully took about 7,000 acres of land belonging to the Cheyenne-Arapaho Tribes of Oklahoma." The AP continues, "Attorneys for the Cheyenne-Arapaho filed an 18-page response on Friday to the government's motion to dismiss the tribes' lawsuit over the land. The tribes want to do oil exploration on the land and use it for development of retail, offices and possibly a casino, Cheyenne-Arapaho Gov. Darrell Flyingman said. … 'It's valuable land,' he said. 'There's hundreds of oil and gas wells right around Fort Reno. That's one of the reasons they're trying to keep it.'" The AP adds, "According to the government, which is seeking to dismiss the tribes' lawsuit, the Cheyenne-Arapaho claim on the land died in 1891, when the reservation was allotted and the tribes signed an agreement ceding the remaining 400,000 acres, which then were opened to non-Indian settlement. … The tribes received 2 cents per acre in 1891, then $15 million more in 1965 after filing a lawsuit under the Indian Claims Commission Act, which was designed to correct past injustices in land dealings with Indian tribes. .. The tribes say the payment covered the rest of the old reservation, excluding the Fort Reno land."

US Changes Prosecution Timetable In Ohio Reactor Case. The Toledo Blade (OH) (1/3, Henry) reports, "Federal prosecutors veered off their timetable for having criminal charges against two former Davis-Besse engineers and a contractor heard in U.S. District Court by the end of this fall - partly because of the complexity of the case, and partly because of recent finger-pointing among the trio. … The case now may be split into at least two trials." The Blade continues, "Defendants Andrew Siemaszko, of Spring, Texas; David Geisen, of DePere, Wis., and Rodney N. Cook, of Millington, Tenn., face up to five years in prison and $250,000 in fines if convicted on charges of making false statements to a federal agency. … Mr. Siemaszko and Mr. Geisen are former Davis-Besse engineers. Mr. Cook is a contractor who had been associated with the Ottawa County nuclear plant for years." The Blade adds, "Each is accused of jeopardizing northern Ohio's safety five years ago by lying about Davis-Besse's old reactor head when the Nuclear Regulatory Commission was debating whether the plant was too dangerous to keep operating in the fall of 2001. … The NRC, based on what it learned in subsequent months, said acid melted so much steel off the massive lid that it nearly blew open and allowed radioactive steam to form in containment for the first time since the partial meltdown of Three Mile Island Unit 2 in 1979. … The agency ultimately said there's no question FirstEnergy Corp., in hindsight, should have shut down the plant at least six weeks earlier than it did on Feb. 16, 2002."

Energy Independence A Central Theme Of Bush's State Of The Union Speech. The Financial Times (1/3, Daniel) reports, "Energy will be a central theme of President George W. Bush's state of the union speech this month, as it was in last year's address when he briefly caught national attention with the claim that the country was 'addicted to oil.'" Yet, "his critics doubt that he will do much more than call for more spending on alternative fuels, and again fail to embrace international efforts to agree a post-Kyoto regime to tackle greenhouse emissions." One "senior energy industry lobbyist" said, "Energy policy has been the creation of Congress. Almost anything Bush says in the speech is irrelevant the day after he says it." But one senior Administration official rejected that, saying, "It's a lot more than rhetorical: what was done with the 2005 act was substantial." And "Al Hubbard, chairman of the National Economic Council, who is co-ordinating White House energy policy, has also raised expectations. In a speech at De Pauw University he predicted 'headlines above the fold that will knock your socks off in terms of our commitment to energy independence.'"

US Dependence On OPEC Soars As Angola Enters Cartel. The Financial Times (1/3, Crooks, Blas) reports US dependence on OPEC "for its oil imports has risen to its highest level in 15 years, following Angola's arrival this week as the 12th member of the oil producers' group." Angola's entry "comes at a time when Opec is trying to exert more influence, as seen in its decision at the December meeting to cut 500,000 barrels a day from its output from February." Angola "is particularly significant because it is one of the fastest-growing producers." But its "entry into Opec is unlikely to have much impact on the price of oil. It has yet to agree a production limit with the group, and Opec officials have suggested that its planned production increase is likely to be accommodated by the group."

New Maryland AG Pledges To Crack Down On Bay Polluters. The Washington Post (1/3, B4, Rich) reports, "Douglas F. Gansler, Montgomery County's longtime prosecutor, pledged an 'all-out assault' on those who pollute the Chesapeake Bay as he was sworn into office yesterday as Maryland's first new attorney general in two decades." The Post continues, "In the Senate's marbled chamber in Annapolis, where the outgoing Republican governor administered the oath of office, Gansler, a Democrat, ticked off a list of the estuary's environmental woes. He cited swimming bans at Sandy Point State Park in Annapolis and declining oyster harvests, saying, 'Some fish don't even know if they're boys or girls anymore -- it's gotten that bad. … We're going to wage an all-out assault on those who pollute our air and water,' Gansler said." The Post adds, "The pledges echoed campaign promises that helped carry Gansler to a comfortable victory in November in his bid to fill the seat left vacant by J. Joseph Curran Jr., a fellow Democrat who, after two decades as the state's chief legal officer, decided not to run for another term. … Gansler, 44, had been Montgomery state's attorney since 1998. He drew attention last year by winning convictions against John Allen Muhammad and Lee Boyd Malvo, the snipers who terrorized the region in 2002. … Despite the dire proclamations about the health of the bay, yesterday's ceremony in many respects had the feeling of a family affair. Gansler spoke of his wife, Laura, and their two sons, who, he jokingly said, did not understand the concept of spending $2 million to win a job that pays $125,000 a year."

Feds, States At Odds Over Paying For Forest Fire Fighting. The New York Times (1/3, Johnson, 1.16M) reports, "The steeply rising cost of preventing and suppressing wildfires, which burned more of the American landscape in 2006 than in any other year since at least 1960, is creating a rift between Washington and state and local governments over how the burden ought to be shouldered." A study "issued in November by the inspector general's office of the United States Department of Agriculture, the parent agency of the Forest Service, said the nature of the wildfire threat was changing as private homes and communities pushed ever closer to the boundaries of once-remote public lands. Those communities and landowners, rather than federal taxpayers, should have to pay for more of their own fire protection, the report concluded." But states and local governments "are gearing up to fight back in Congress, arguing that decades of federal mismanagement of national forests and open spaces, not development, created the threat and that little communities with few resources are neither responsible for it nor equipped to make a difference."

Mayfield Leaving Government With Warning Of Impending Natural Disaster. The Los Angeles Times (1/3, Williams, 850K) reports National Hurricane Center chief Max Mayfield will end his 34-year government career tomorrow, and he is "more convinced than ever that US residents of the Southeast are risking unprecedented tragedy by continuing to build vulnerable homes in the tropical storm zone and failing to plan escape routes. … 'We're eventually going to get a strong enough storm in a densely populated area to have a major disaster,' he said. 'I know people don't want to hear this, and I'm generally a very positive person, but we're setting ourselves up for this major disaster.'" Mayfield, who "hopes to launch a second career as a consultant in emergency planning and disaster response," says the US lacks "the political will to make and impose hard decisions on building codes and land use in the face of resistance from the influential building industry and a public still willing to gamble that the big one will never hit."

Administration Criticized For Listing Polar Bear As Threatened. The Wall Street Journal (1/3,

2.04M) says in an editorial, "Unless you've been hibernating for the winter, you have no doubt heard the many alarms about global warming. Now even the Bush Administration is getting into the act, at least judging from last week's decision by Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne to recommend that the majestic polar bear be listed as 'threatened' under the Endangered Species Act. The closer you inspect this decision, however, the more it looks like the triumph of politics over science." It "also turns out that most of the alarm over the polar bear's future stems from a single, peer-reviewed study, which found that the bear population had declined by some 250, or 25%, in Western Hudson Bay in the last decade. But the polar bear's range is far more extensive than Hudson Bay. A 2002 U.S. Geological Survey of wildlife in the Arctic Refuge Coastal Plain concluded that the ice bear populations 'may now be near historic highs.'"

Wal-Mart Praised For Pushing Fluorescent Light Bulbs. The New York Times (1/3, 1.16M) says in an editorial that it is "great news that Wal-Mart is putting its considerable heft behind one of the easiest ways to reduce energy consumption and the production of global-warming gases: the corkscrew-shaped light bulbs of the future." Switching from familiar bulbs to longer-lasting, energy-saving compact fluorescent lamps makes sense economically and environmentally." Wal-Mart "is pushing to sell 100 million compact fluorescents a year. Because they use 75 percent less electricity, that would save customers $3 billion on their electricity bills and save the world from 20 million metric tons of greenhouse gases."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

In Florida, Attorney Claims Agents Used "Coercive Tactics" Against Client. The Tampa Tribune (1/3) reports Scott Schweickert's attorney "is asking a judge to block the prosecution from introducing at trial Schweickert's statements about how he helped Steven Lorenzo drug, sexually torture and kill two men. Defense attorney Pedro Amador argues in court papers that Schweickert's statements 'were made as a result of coercive tactics employed by government agents.' … Schweickert faces a federal trial next week on charges of conspiracy and drug facilitated crimes of violence." According to an arrest affidavit Schweickert "was interviewed by U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration Agent Scott A. Albrecht and other detectives on May 10 and 19 in 2005, after being advised of his Miranda rights."

Arizona Called Gateway For Marijuana Smuggling. The Arizona Republic (1/2) reported Arizona "is gaining another dubious distinction: marijuana smuggling gateway. The Border Patrol said agents seized over 331 tons (662,650 pounds) of marijuana worth $530 million last fiscal year, ending Sept. 30. That set a record for the fifth straight year. It nearly equaled the 350 tons seized in California, Texas and New Mexico combined."

The AP (1/3) reports that since Oct. 1, agents "have seized more than 106 tons of pot worth $170 million. That's nearly 20 tons more than the same period the previous year."

In a report similar to the AP's the Arizona Daily Star (1/2) wrote that agents with the U.S. Border Patrol "have seized a record amount of marijuana from smugglers along the Arizona-Mexico border for the fifth year in a row."

City Council In California Considers Banning Marijuana Dispensaries. The AP (1/2) reported Azusa "is poised to join several others across California in banning medical marijuana dispensaries. The City Council planned to vote Tuesday on an ordinance designed to prohibit the so-called 'pot clubs.' Officials approved the new rule unanimously on its first reading last month." Advocates for the clubs "say regulating them is more effective than banning them."

Federal Government's Drug Use Statistics Criticized. In a New York Times op-ed (1/3), Mike Males says, "When releasing last week's Monitoring the Future survey on drug use, John P. Walters, the director of the Office of National Drug Control Policy, boasted that 'broad' declines in teenage drug use promise 'enormous beneficial consequences not only for our children now, but for the rest of their lives.' Actually, anybody who has looked carefully at the report and other recent federal studies would see a dramatically different picture: skyrocketing illicit drug abuse and related deaths among teenagers and adults alike." According to "the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, the number of Americans dying from the abuse of illegal drugs has leaped by 400 percent in the last two decades, reaching a record 28,000 in 2004." It's "time to end the obsession with hyping teenage drug use. The meaningless surveys that policy makers now rely on should be replaced with a comprehensive 'drug abuse index' that pulls together largely ignored data on drug-related deaths, hospital emergencies, crime, diseases and similar practical measures."

Calderon Sends Troops, Police To Tijuana In Crackdown On Drug Gangs. The AP (1/3) reports the Mexican government "is sending more than 3,000 soldiers and federal police officers to fight drug gangs in the violent border city of Tijuana, the latest offensive by President Felipe Calderon who has vowed to crack down on organized crime. The force, backed by 28 boats, 21 planes and nine helicopters, will hunt down suspected traffickers, patrol the coast and man checkpoints in a city that is a popular smuggling route for cocaine, methamphetamine and marijuana entering the United States," according to Interior Secretary Francisco Ramirez Acuna. The troops "have arrested more than 50 people, including several suspected leaders of the feuding cartels, and seized large quantities of gold, bulletproof vests, military equipment and shirts with federal and municipal police logos."

ATF Probing Explosive Devices Found After Texas Standoff. The Texarkana (TX) Gazette (1/3, Richardson) reports, "The investigation into explosive devices found in the home of a man who gave himself up after a four-hour, Texas-side standoff will be made by the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives. … 'Components of explosive devices were found in the building. It is unknown at this time what the intent of (the homeowner) was regarding the explosive components,' said Shawn Fitzgerald, spokesman for the Texarkana, Texas, Police Department." The Gazette continues, "Texas-side police have not released the man's name, but neighbors and co-workers identified him as Todd Gingrich, 43. … Police were dispatched to Gingrich's home at 5814 Larry Drive at 12:37 a.m. Saturday to provide assistance to thwart a possible suicide. They were notified that he allegedly had access to a large number of weapons. … Family members said the collection included automatic and semi-automatic weapons, so the Metro SWAT Team was activated to negotiate with Gingrich. … Negotiators attempted to contact Gingrich over the next four hours, but were unsuccessful. … Fortunately, at 4:50 a.m., officers were able to take Gingrich into custody without injury after he reportedly became ill and exited the building on his own." The Gazette notes, "Criminal charges are not being sought by police because the only person clearly threatened during the standoff was Gingrich. … 'A large cache of weapons was discovered in the building where the victim had been staying during the incident, but it is unknown at this time what the reason or intent was regarding the weapons,' said Fitzgerald. … The Dallas Bureau of the ATF was contacted and responded to the scene. The ATF confiscated all weapons and devices, and the case has since been turned over to that agency, police said."

TAX:

Democrats To Target Oil And Gas Companies Early. The Hill (1/3, Snyder) reports, "Among the first items Democrats want to pass are measures that at least some oil and gas companies oppose, such as a measure to repeal certain tax breaks included in a broad energy bill passed in 2005 and a bill to collect royalties on existing drilling leases. Provisions that could cost the industry even more money, such as one imposing a windfall-profit tax, could follow in the Democratic-led Congress, although some of the harsher measures may strain caucus unity." The Hill adds that Drew Hammill, a spokesman for Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi, "said Democrats have not decided on the exact oil and gas provisions that will be included in their package for the 100-hour legislative push. But Democrats are intent on setting up the energy reserve for renewable energy and conservation, repealing certain tax breaks, and forcing oil companies to renegotiate the 1998 and 1999 Gulf leases."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Urges Bipartisanship, Announces He Will Propose Balanced Budget Plan. With Democrats ready to take control of Congress tomorrow, President Bush is calling for a bipartisan approach to governing in the nation's capital. Writing in the Wall Street Journal this morning (1/3, A13), Bush says of Democrats, "I will have the privilege of working with them for the next two years -- one quarter of my presidency, plenty of time to accomplish important things for the American people. … To do that, however, we can't play politics as usual." Bush adds, "My principles are no secret. I have campaigned on them in my races for governor and in two presidential contests, and I have worked hard during my presidency to translate these principles into sound policy." Most notably, Bush says he will propose a plan to "balance the federal budget by 2012 while funding our priorities and making the tax cuts permanent." He also urges consensus on anti-terror policies, makes his case for continuing involvement in Iraq, and calls for entitlement reform and for ending "the secretive process by which Washington insiders are able to slip into legislation billions of dollars of pork-barrel projects that have never been reviewed or voted on by Congress."

In its analysis of Bush's op-ed, the Wall Street Journal (1/3, A3, McKinnon, 2.04M) focuses on Bush's remarks on taxes, saying he "sent a strong signal of his continued opposition to tax increases." Bush's "comments reflect his administration's reliance on tax cuts as both an economic elixir and a political weapon. … A senior aide to Mr. Bush said the president wasn't firing a fiscal shot across the bow at Democrats, but was simply 'articulating a long-held view that tax relief has worked.' He added that Americans 'want their leaders in Washington to cut wasteful spending. The president's budget will do just that.'" The Washington Post/AP (1/3, Hunt) reports that while Bush sounded "a tone of bipartisanship," he "repeated long-held positions on the war in Iraq, tax cuts and other issues often criticized by Democrats."

The President will meet with Democratic leaders today. CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/2) reported, "We are told by sources that it is really a meeting to talk about the year ahead." Iraq is expected to be central to the discussions. As the AP (1/3, Flaherty) reports, "Democrats will inherit an agenda dominated by the war in Iraq when the new Congress convenes Thursday, increasing their exposure to what has mostly been a politically damaging issue for Republicans.

The bipartisan spirit Bush is urging in his op-ed may prove elusive. The Washington Post (1/3, A3, Weisman, 690K) reports "Democratic leaders set to take control of Congress tomorrow are facing mounting pressure from liberal activists to chart a more confrontational course on Iraq and the issues of human rights and civil liberties, with some even calling for the impeachment of President Bush." The Post adds, "The carefully calibrated legislative blitz that Democrats have devised for the first 100 hours of power has left some activists worried the passion that swept the party to power in November is already dissipating. A cluster of protesters will greet the new congressional leaders at the Capitol tomorrow. They will not be disgruntled conservatives wary of Democratic control, but liberals demanding a ban on torture, an end to warrantless domestic spying and a restoration of curbed civil liberties." The protest "will be followed by an evening forum calling for the president's impeachment, led by the Center for Constitutional Rights, antiwar activist Cindy Sheehan and a pro-impeachment group called World Can't Wait."

Also criticizing the Democrats' "limited" agenda, Mario Cuomo writes in USA Today's website (1/3), "After years of chaos in Iraq, which has led to neglect of many critical domestic issues, voters are looking for dramatic ideas and courageous leadership to deal with the nation's most difficult challenges. Will Democratic leaders step forward with big ideas and seize the opportunity they have been given?" So far, the Democratic agenda "for the 110th Congress, which opens Thursday, offers a laudable but light list of issues, such as increasing the minimum wage, greater stem cell availability, job training benefits and adopting ethics reforms. I doubt that kind of agenda would be enough to keep control of the Congress, let alone to win the next presidency." Cuomo says the Democratic presidential candidates "need to confront the most difficult questions of the day," such as the war on terrorism, economic inequality, the "energy crisis," and Cuomo adds, "Don't fear taxes."

Democrats Seek Legislative Victories Before State Of The Union. Gannett News Service (1/3, Berry) reports incoming House speaker Rep. Nancy Pelosi "has vowed to push six key measures during the first 100 legislative hours of the 110th Congress, which begins Thursday. … Political experts, however, question whether the agenda can be accomplished in 100 legislative hours, which could take several weeks. And while several agenda items are not controversial, some will face strong opposition from the administration, experts say."

The New York Times (1/3, Hulse, 1.16M) reports, "House Democrats intend to kick off their new regime with a 100-hour legislative blitz that would allow them to post a series of quick victories before President Bush even delivers his State of the Union address toward the end of this month." However, "even as Democrats filtered back to Capitol Hill on Tuesday in anticipation of the opening of the 110th Congress on Thursday, there was a bit of confusion about just when the 100 hours would officially begin." Republicans are "growing increasingly agitated about the Democratic timetable. They said that the rush by Democrats to force through legislation on national security, the minimum wage, student loan costs and energy without a full slate of hearings -- and with limits on the ability of Republicans to offer alternatives -- undercut the pledges of Democrats to run things in a more transparent, collegial way than the Republicans had when they were in power." Democrats "eventually decided Tuesday that the 100-hour timer would be started next Tuesday, when the House is scheduled to take up H.R. 1, a measure enacting recommendations from the bipartisan Sept. 11 commission that never made it out of the Republican-controlled Congress."

The Hill (1/3, Kaplan, Kucinich) says "House Democrats hurried yesterday to put the finishing touches on ethics reforms that would ban lawmakers and staffers from accepting trips, gifts and meals from lobbyists and prevent the new majority from holding votes open to change the outcome." Democrats "will adopt and then amend the House Rules package tomorrow to ban all travel paid for by lobbyists or organizations that employ lobbyists, require the ethics committee to pre-approve travel paid for by outside groups, enact a total gift ban, and require lawmakers to pay the market cost of flying on a corporate jet, said Democratic staffers and officials with government watchdog groups."

Coalition Mobilizing To Oppose Grassroots Lobbying Disclosure Bill. The Hill (1/3, Schor) reports that as the new Democratic Congress "prepares to take up a package of lobbying and ethics rules changes, a coalition of nonprofits and communications firms is renewing the push against new grassroots lobbying disclosure rules and not ruling out a future court challenge to the provisions." The Free Speech Coalition "is now leading the fight against proposals for mandatory reporting by any group involved in paid efforts to stimulate grassroots communications — another term for the proverbial pleas to voters to 'contact your congressman' on a particular issue. Led by conservative fixtures such as direct-mail guru Richard Viguerie and Free Congress Foundation chief Paul Weyrich, the coalition is pulling no punches." Lawmakers "supporting grassroots disclosure have aimed their calls for reform at so-called 'astroturf' campaigns, funded by corporate interests but portrayed as genuine citizen drives." But the coalition "contends that the new rules would provide a loophole for corporations that confine their grassroots communications to employees and shareholders."

Davis Warns Against Creation Of Independent Ethics Office. In an op-ed in The Hill (1/3), Lanny J. Davis says, "The current congressional-reformer rage is to create an independent office that would investigate and file ethics charges. This is the 'solution' to the problem of the inherent conflict of interest in members of Congress investigating their colleagues, much less members of their own party. Such an office, reformers argue, would be 'above politics' and avoid that conflict. Hmmmmm. Seems like déjà vu all over again." Davis says the Watergate scandal led to the creation of the Office of the Special Prosecutor, later called the Independent Counsel. The result: "A constitutional monstrosity who couldn't be hired or fired by someone voters elected (in this case, the president); and when he or she abused power, there was no political accountability. Indeed, no accountability at all."

Poll Finds Support For Minimum Wage Hike, Stem Cell Measure, Drug Reimportation. The AP (1/3, Superville) reports, "Two of the Democrats' top goals -- a higher minimum wage and federal funding of embryonic stem cell research -- enjoy broad public support as the party takes control of Congress for the first time in a dozen years. An overwhelming majority also supports making it easier for people to buy prescription drugs from other countries." But "the jury is out on incoming…Pelosi. Most people say they do not know enough yet to have an opinion of the California Democrat who will be the first woman in that office, an Associated Press-AOL News poll found." 80% of respondents support increasing the minimum wage, "nearly seven of 10 adults, 69 percent, favor the government taking steps to make it easier for people to buy prescription drugs from other countries, where some medicines cost significantly less than in the US." And "some 56 percent of adults support easing restrictions on using federal money to pay for research on embryonic stem cells." USA Today (1/3, 4A, 2.27M) runs a truncated version of the AP story on the poll this morning.

Pelosi Praised For Rejecting Free Rein For CSPAN Cameras. In a USA Today op-ed (1/3), Donald Wolfensberger, director of the Congress Project at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars, says, "Granting C-SPAN free gazing rights on the House floor is a terrible idea. Incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi is right to reject the request. Such free-roaming lens-groping would defeat the original purpose of broadcasting House debates. According to the final Rules Committee report on the issue in February 1978, that purpose 'is to provide a complete, uninterrupted, and accurate record of the official proceedings and business of the House — a kind of visual and audio parallel to the Congressional Record.'"

WPost Accuses Democrats Of "High-Handed Mistreatment" Of Minority Republicans. In an editorial, the Washington Post (1/3, A18, 690K) praises he House Democrats' "ambitious plan for its first 100 hours in power, from increasing the minimum wage to strengthening ethics rules to having the federal government negotiate prescription drug prices. Unfortunately, its plans don't include getting those provisions passed in the democratic fashion that the Democrats promised to adhere to once in the majority. When Republicans took over in 1995, they at least went through the motions of putting their 'Contract With America' proposals through the normal committee process." Democrats "have decided not to bother with that, nor to let Republicans offer amendments on the floor, nor even to put a GOP alternative up for a vote. This is exactly the kind of high-handed mistreatment that Democrats complained about, justifiably, when they were in the minority." The Post adds that "if they don't reconsider," Democrats "will set an unfortunate precedent that fairness will be offered on sufferance, when the majority finds it convenient, and not as a matter of principle. That would not be a good start for the 110th Congress."

Pentagon Increasingly Relying On Supplementals. The Wall Street Journal (1/3, A5, Karp, 2.04M) reports, "The Pentagon's supplemental budgets traditionally pay for war costs such as personnel, equipment repairs and ammunition. But as the Joint Strike Fighter request shows, the coming supplemental is being used by the military services for more than replacing what has been lost in Iraq and Afghanistan. It is being used to acquire future weapons that normally would be funded through the regular Pentagon budget. ... An October directive from Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England opened the floodgates by allowing the services to request emergency funds to replace equipment and upgrade to newer models for the 'overall efforts related to the global war on terror,' not just operations in Iraq and Afghanistan." An unnamed army official called the situation a "feeding frenzy." The Journal adds, "It is unclear whether new Defense Secretary Robert Gates will seek to change the supplemental budget, which awaits White House approval. The new largess is a turnaround from two years ago, when the Pentagon tried unsuccessfully to rein in weapons spending. Defense officials say they hope the prospect of defense-industry jobs will help ease passage in Congress."

Nuland Noted As Possible Bolton Replacement. The Washington Post's (1/3, A17) Al Kamen writes in his "In the Loop" column that "idle chatterers are talking about Victoria Nuland, now ambassador to NATO, as a possible choice to succeed John R. Bolton." Kamen notes that Nuland, "who is a career Foreign Service officer and is married to Robert Kagan, a contributor to the Washington Post op-ed page, was top foreign policy adviser to Vice President Cheney and before that an aide to Clinton confidante Strobe Talbott when he was deputy secretary of state."

State Department Military Advisor Resigns. In its "Washington Wire" online column, the Wall Street Journal (1/3, King, 2.04M) reports, "In yet another high-level departure from the State Department, Condoleezza Rice's energetic head of political-military relations, John Hillen, has told his colleagues he is leaving the administration this month." In an email to colleagues the day after Christmas, Hillen, who served as "the principal link between State and the Pentagon and was leading the administration's effort to build better security ties with Arab allies in the Persian Gulf in a bid to contain Iran's growing influence," said that he and his family decided that it was best not "to commit to being in the administration until 2009." The note "suggests that the White House has requested that all top appointees either commit to staying through the end of the administration, or leave as soon as possible."

Observers Look For Shifts By Medicare Part D Enrollees. The Hill (1/3, Young) reports the "sign-up period for prescription-drug coverage under Medicare Part D ended Sunday, and the Bush administration and observers of the program are eagerly waiting to see whether beneficiaries enrolled in plans best suited to their needs." Encouraging "elderly and disabled participants to reevaluate their 2006 plans, which changed in many cases, and compare them to other options on the market was the chief challenge during the second year of the program." The Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS), "lawmakers, members of the health-insurance industry, and beneficiaries' advocates widely predicted that most people enrolled in Part D would stick with the coverage they selected during the inaugural enrollment period, between November 2005 and May 2006." The Administration "has expressed confidence that beneficiaries were smart shoppers during the six-week sign-up period."

Clyburn Said To Represent Rising Class Of Southern Black Lawmakers. The Wall Street Journal (1/3, A5, Rogers, 2.04M) reports Rep. James Clyburn, "a minister's son from South Carolina, takes his place tomorrow as the House Majority Whip -- the No. 3 Democratic post and highest ever held by an African-American from a Southern district." Clyburn "symbolizes the rise of a set of Southern black lawmakers, shaped by the region and with a distinctive approach to politics separate from that of black leaders representing urban Northern districts." Other southern black lawmakers cited by the Journal include Reps. John Lewis, Bennie Thompson, and Mel Watt. Their "often rural roots and the black educational and religious institutions that sustained them through segregation still influence their politics." Southern black lawmakers "also tend to be more conservative than their Northern counterparts on social issues. Political necessity has required them to reach out to business and agricultural interests to gain white support. And growing up under segregation put a premium on personal relationships, with both blacks and whites, that can make them adept at building coalitions in the new Congress."

House Ethics Panel Ends Investigation Of Conyers. The Washington Times (1/3, Miller, 88K) reports, "The Republican-led House ethics committee -- in possibly its last action before Democrats take over Congress -- closed the three-year investigation of Rep. John Conyers Jr. after he agreed to stop using staffers for campaign work and personal errands." Conyers "acknowledged a 'lack of clarity' in his dealing with the taxpayer-financed staffers, who reportedly worked on political campaigns and performed other nonofficial jobs, including baby-sitting Mr. Conyers' children and tutoring his wife." The "case against Mr. Conyers was closed without punitive action or a letter of reproval from the Committee on Standards of Conduct, the ethics panel, which is comprised of five Democrats and five Republicans." Last month, "the ethics committee decided not to take action against Rep. Jim McDermott, despite finding that the Washington Democrat broke ethics rules in 1997 by giving reporters illegally taped telephone calls involving House leaders." A Republican lawmaker "familiar with both cases said Democrats on the committee blocked punitive action against their colleagues."

Buchanan To Take House Seat Under Challenge. The Washington Times (1/3, Ward, 88K) reports Republican Vern Buchanan, "who narrowly won a disputed election" in Florida's 13th CD, "will take his place with the new House tomorrow, but Democrats will continue to fight in the courts for a new election." Rep. Rush D. Holt "will stand on the chamber floor and ask House leaders to recognize a court challenge against" Rep. Buchanan. Jennifer Crider, a spokeswoman for Speaker Nancy Pelosi, said, "Mr. Holt's action will make clear that the swearing in of any member does not prejudice the legal case or the congressional investigations." The Times adds Democrat Christine Jennings, "who lost to Mr. Buchanan by 369 votes, is fighting in court the results of the race" and has "filed a notice of contest with the House Administration Committee."

Miller Bill Would Extend Minimum Wage To Mariana Islands. The Hill (1/3, Crabtree) reports House Democrats "led by Education and the Workforce Committee Chairman George Miller (D-Calif.) are aiming to undo a controversial vestige of the Jack Abramoff era in the first 100 hours of the 110th Congress." Miller plans "to include language raising wages in the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands in a broader bill increasing the U.S. minimum wage." Former Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) and Rep. John Doolittle (R-Calif.) "have been scrutinized for their ties to Abramoff and their alleged efforts to block legislation aimed at raising labor and immigration standards in the islands."

Ellison To Use Thomas Jefferson's Copy Of The Koran For Swearing-In. In its "Reliable Source" column, the Washington Post (1/3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 690K) reports, "Thomas Rep.-elect Keith Ellison, the first Muslim elected to Congress, found himself under attack last month when he announced he'd take his oath of office on the Koran -- especially from Virginia Rep. Virgil Goode, who called it a threat to American values." However, "the holy book at tomorrow's ceremony has an unassailably all-American provenance. We've learned that the new congressman -- in a savvy bit of political symbolism -- will hold the personal copy once owned by Thomas Jefferson. … Jefferson's copy is an English translation by George Sale published in the 1750s."

Pelosi's Links To California's Burtons Noted. In his Washington Post column (1/3, A19), Harold Meyerson examines incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi's political legacy. Meyerson notes that Pelosi fills the seat of Rep. Phil Burton. After his death in 1983, Burton's widow, Sala Burton, succeeded him in a special election, but "just four years later, in January 1987, Sala herself lay dying of cancer. She asked Phil's brother, John Burton, who had represented an adjoining congressional district in San Francisco, to come to the hospital and told him that she wanted 'Nancy' to succeed her. For a moment, John Burton was unsure which Nancy she was referring to, but as she explained to family and friends at her bedside, the woman in question was the former California Democratic Party chair Nancy Pelosi." The "Burtonistas -- with different causes and methods for a new era, to be sure -- are back. Score two for you, Sala."

OTHER NEWS:

Nation Honors President Ford. Amid universal praise, former presidents and senior aides paid homage to President Gerald Ford yesterday. Much of the coverage notes the atmosphere of national unity yesterday, and described Ford as the embodiment of an era of bipartisan cooperation. As ABC World News (1/2, lead story, 4:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "It is not often you find a day when this city of Washington is free of rancor and there is no partisan divide. Today, however, was one of those days as Republican and Democrat alike united in admiration of Gerald Ford." The CBS Evening News (1/2, lead story, 4:10, Schieffer, 7.66M) said there was a "genuine outpouring of good will. It was very obvious people were fond of President Ford, and he's going to be remembered fondly. I always said he's the nicest person I ever met in public life and I think today we saw there were many people who felt the same way."

The New York Times (1/3, Shane, 1.16M) notes the "soaring tribute to a modest man," as Ford "was remembered on Tuesday as bringing the ordinary virtues of decency, integrity and humility to mend a broken government after the pain of war and scandal." Former President Bush "called Mr. Ford 'a Norman Rockwell painting come to life'; Tom Brokaw, the former television anchor, described 'Citizen Ford' as a 'champion of Main Street values'; and Henry A. Kissinger said the man he served as secretary of state 'had the virtues of small-town America.'" President Bush, "overseeing a deeply unpopular war in Iraq and perhaps pondering his own legacy, lauded Mr. Ford's 'firm resolve' in sending the Marines to rescue the crew of the American merchant ship Mayagüez when it was seized by Cambodia. He suggested that some acts widely condemned during Mr. Ford's administration in the 1970s had come to look wiser in historical perspective, including his pardon for his immediate predecessor, Richard M. Nixon."

The Chicago Tribune (1/3, Neikirk, 617K) says "eulogists from President Bush to former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger praised the nation's 38th president for using old-fashioned Midwestern qualities to cool the nation's Watergate passions." But "in their laudatory remarks at Washington's National Cathedral, there also appeared to be an undercurrent of unspoken regret that such values have become rarer in America's politics. Indeed, analysts have criticized a higher degree of nastiness and lack of authenticity in today's politics."

On NBC Nightly News (1/2, story 3, 2:35, Williams, 9.87M), Tom Brokaw said, "As I rode through the streets of Washington and looked at all those people of every color and stripe and standing in America with their hands over their heart or saluting him, not one of them had a sign that said I'm a Republican or I'm a Democrat. I think it's instructive that we're at our best when we come together on these occasions and Gerald Ford was constantly striving to bring us together." NBC Nightly News (1/2, story 2, 2:25, Williams, 9.87M) also said Ford's death "reminded us perhaps of a different era, perhaps a greater generation, even a profile in courage."

The Washington Post (1/3, A1, Baker, 690K) reports "the state funeral was a classic Washington affair, soaked in power and pageantry even if not quite as elaborate as the one held for Ronald Reagan in June 2004." The Washington Times (1/3, Curl, 88K) notes the "humble yet extraordinary life of Gerald R. Ford," and McClatchy (1/3, Douglas) says he is being remembered for his "decency." Similar assessments appear in the Los Angeles Times (1/3, Reynolds, Schmitt, 850K), New York Times (1/3, Swarns, 1.16M) and The Hill (1/3, Kucinich, McCormack), among other newspapers. Less complimentary was New York Times columnist Maureen Dowd (1/3), who wrote this morning, "None of the eulogists [of President Ford] noted the irony that the man who ushered out one long national nightmare had ushered in another, the one we're living in now. It was Gerald Ford, after all, who gave America the gift of Dick Cheney and Donald Rumsfeld -- the gift that keeps on taking."

Tom Shales, in the Washington Post (1/3, C1, 690K), surveys the TV coverage of the event, and concludes, "It was a memorable morning, a national gathering by television, and a reminder that for all the talk about blogs and YouTube and MySpace, there are still moments and events that only the networks can adequately convey. This, obviously, was one of them."

Stories in USA Today (1/3, Lawrence, 2.27M) and Washington Post (1/3, A9, Tucker, 690K) praise Betty Ford's performance as first lady and her demeanor since her husband's passing

Ford's Brand Of Conservatism No Longer The GOP Norm. The Washington Post (1/3, A8, Balz, Broder, 690K) reports, "The honorary pallbearers who walked slowly up the aisle at Washington National Cathedral yesterday at the funeral of former president Gerald R. Ford were as familiar as when they served the 38th president, symbolizing continuity through four decades of Republican administrations. The names included Cheney, Rumsfeld, Baker, Greenspan and Scowcroft, officials who have served multiple Republican presidents." But "their presence masked a far different reality, which is that the Republican Party that spawned Ford and his brand of Midwestern conservatism barely exists today." In "sharp contrast to the commentary after the death of former president Ronald Reagan, there were no remembrances of Ford as an architect of modern conservatism or a force behind the GOP's ascendance. The Republican Party has turned away from Ford's conservatism, moving sharply to the right ideologically and to the South and West geographically."

Iraq Said To Have Fractured Group Of Living Presidents. USA Today (1/3, 2.27M) reports, "The war in Iraq has fractured even the fraternity of presidents. After they exit the Oval Office, presidents generally limit criticism of their successors, at least in public. When President Bush and predecessors Jimmy Carter, George H.W. Bush and Bill Clinton gathered Tuesday at the National Cathedral for President Gerald Ford's funeral, it was a show of solidarity and affection for one of the few who knew firsthand how difficult the job can be. … The tradition of what historian Robert Dallek calls "a code of silence" among presidents has been strained by the escalating violence in Iraq, however. The war has divided the international community, the American public, members of Congress." Ford "joined that debate, albeit after his death. He criticized Bush's justification for the war in an interview conducted in 2004 and released when he died last week, joining critiques by Clinton and Carter." Their views "underscore Bush's isolation on the war."

Meanwhile, the New York Times (1/3, Kornblut, Broder, 1.16M) reports, "In a moment of presidential empathy, former President George Bush recalled a skill he had learned from Gerald R. Ford: how to handle being ridiculed on 'Saturday Night Live.' … As the 82-year-old former president imitated his own impersonator, there were only three people in the audience who knew exactly how it felt to be ridiculed, as a sitting president, on late-night television. Former President Bill Clinton responded with a hearty laugh from his seat in the Washington National Cathedral, while former President Jimmy Carter, in a neighboring pew, looked on with a smile. Seated nearby was President Bush, who has been relentlessly skewered by TV comics as well." The Times adds, "With Mr. Ford's death last week, the group of living former presidents has shrunk to three, down from five in the early 1990s. Since 1994, Richard M. Nixon, Ronald Reagan and, now, Mr. Ford have left the stage, while Mr. Clinton has joined the ranks of former chief executives. The dynamic among the former presidents is perpetually evolving, as people age, rivalries fade and former political opponents discover they share more similarities than differences."

Ford's Body Back In Michigan For Burial. USA Today (1/3, Keen, Nichols, 2.27M) reports, "Gerald Ford's hometown welcomed him back to his beloved Midwest for the last time Tuesday, hours after a final and affectionate farewell in the nation's capital." Ford "will be buried Wednesday on a hillside at his presidential museum, ending a week-long national tribute to the 38th president. Thousands of silent people lined the streets of this city of 194,000 to watch the passage of the hearse carrying Ford's body." NBC Nightly News (1/2, lead story, 3:40, Williams, 9.87M), ABC World News (1/2, story 2, 3:00, Gibson, 8.78M) and the CBS Evening News (1/2, story 2, 1:25, Couric, 7.66M) also reported on the Michigan service,

Hypothetical Media Role In A Bush Eulogy Pondered. In his "Washington Sketch" column for the Washington Post (1/3, A2, 690K), Dana Milbank notes Tom Brokaw eulogized Ford, and adds, "For Bush, it must have been a jarring moment. The current president would probably have Hugo Chavez deliver his eulogy before he would bestow the honor on a member of the White House press corps." Milbank goes on to recount a series of anecdotes illustrating Bush's bumpy relationship with White House correspondents, and says "probably the most promising chicken-head story" for a Bush eulogy "was provided by Dick Keil, the former Bloomberg News reporter Bush called 'Stretch.' The 6-foot-5 Stretch recalled a 2001 news conference on the Bush ranch in Texas, when an unusually talkative Bush exhausted all questions and was finally asked what he had done that day. Recalled Keil: 'He noted that he had begun his morning by spending some "quality time with the first lady."' Following a dramatic pause for effect, he got that wry grin, and said, 'Usually, I go running.'"

Manufacturers' Optimism Expected To Be Down For Start Of 2007. The Wall Street Journal (1/3, Lahart, 2.04M) reports if manufacturers "seem downbeat as the new year starts, it's partly because they were too upbeat at the beginning of the old one." When the Institute for Supply Management "releases its monthly report on manufacturing activity today, that unhappy message is likely to come out clearly. The ISM's manufacturing index -- based on surveys of purchasing managers -- dropped sharply through the fall and by November hit its lowest level in more than three years. At 49.5, the index had dipped into terrain that signals a manufacturing contraction and was lower than comparable indexes in other countries." Economists "polled by Dow Jones peg today's report for December's ISM at 50 -- essentially a 'we're-still-on-vacation-here' forecast of no change."

US Automakers Expected To Report Decline In Market Share. The Wall Street Journal (1/3, Stoll, 2.04M) reports as "auto makers report December U.S. sales on Wednesday, a decline in fleet sales to rental agencies and significant weakness at Ford Motor Co. are expected to fuel an overall market pullback for the month." Analysts "forecast that December industry sales will slide as much as 6%, aided by what could be a double-digit percentage decline at Ford, despite heavy year-end sales incentives and an expected uptick in luxury car sales. Other domestic auto makers are seen posting nearly flat sales for the month, while recent sales gains are expected to continue for Asian auto makers such as Toyota Motor Corp. and Honda Motor Co."

Productivity Growth Seen As Declining In Future. In his Washington Post column (1/3, A19), Robert Samuelson says, "The good news is that productivity has been growing strongly; the bad news is that it may be moving to a much slower path." Productivity growth "seems to be decreasing. In the past year it's been only 1.4 percent. By contrast, it averaged about 3 percent from 2000 to 2005. The fall-off partly reflects a mature business cycle. As the economy slows, so do productivity gains. But some long-term forecasts project that the poor performance will continue. In Moody's Economy.com's outlook, productivity growth averages 1.4 percent a year from 2005 to 2035. The main reason: stunted business investment in new machinery, technologies and buildings, says chief economist Mark Zandi." As global investors "shift to other markets, big federal budget deficits will compete increasingly with private companies for credit. Higher interest rates will crowd out some business investment. Productivity will suffer."

Law Firm Merger Leads To Exodus Of Partners. The Wall Street Journal (1/3, B2, Lattman) reports, "Two major law firms have been talking marriage, but partners are leaving before the firms reach the altar." The Journal continues, "Dewey Ballantine has lost at least nine partners since the news last fall of its plans to merge with San Francisco's Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe. A defection this week is a biggie: Michael Aiello, a top Dewey mergers-and-acquisitions partner and a member of the management committee, joined Weil, Gotshal & Manges. Already, the Dewey-Orrick merger vote had been postponed as the two sides attempt to iron out differences on management authority and other topics." The Journal adds, "Orrick has wanted to join forces with Dewey in large part because of Dewey's strong M&A practice, but in December, Jack Bodner, another former Dewey M&A partner, left for Covington & Burling in New York. Messrs. Aiello and Bodner were considered two of the top deputies to Morton Pierce, the head of Dewey's M&A practice. … Also in December, Pierre Hubert, a former IP litigation partner in Dewey's Austin, Texas, office, left for McKool Smith, a Texas-based firm."

Document Outlines Giuliani's Presidential Plans. The Washington Post (1/3, A4, Cillizza, 690K) reports former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani (R) "has been exploring a run for president for just over a month, but the planning behind a national candidacy has been going on much longer, according to an internal strategy memo." The "140-page document, which was leaked to the New York Daily News by a rival 2008 campaign, provides a broad look at Giuliani's prospects for the Republican nomination -- including the potential hurdles of his stormy personal life and his association with disgraced former New York City police commissioner Bernard B. Kerik." The memo "also details a fundraising plan for Giuliani that includes raising $100 million this year, including $25 million in the first three months alone, according to the Daily News." Giuliani spokeswoman Sunny Mindel "alleged that the memo was obtained through a series of 'political dirty tricks.'"

ABC World News (1/2, story 7, :25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported the leak of the strategy document was an "embarrassing disclosure," and the New York Daily News "says it got the plan from someone sympathetic to a rival campaign. The Giuliani camp says it was stolen."

NBC Nightly News (1/2, story 9, 0:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported Giuliani's "campaign has apparently made a whopper of a mistake. A 140-page binder containing top-secret plans for plans of his campaign was sent to the 'New York Daily News." The campaign plan "lists bullet points listing his political vulnerabilities, including his business ties and previous marriages."

The New York Times (1/3, Healy, 1.16M) reports Giuliani advisers said "someone infiltrated the Giuliani camp last fall and stole a document about his presidential prospects and political liabilities. It was then leaked, they said, as a 'dirty trick' to embarrass Mr. Giuliani and highlight such headaches as his controversial former aide, Bernard B. Kerik, and one of his ex-wives, Donna Hanover." The document "warns that Mr. Giuliani might face 'insurmountable' problems, including questions about Mr. Kerik and Ms. Hanover." The "public disclosure of the document is potentially damaging for Mr. Giuliani, not least because since 9/11, he has built a business as a private consultant on security issues while creating an image as a political leader capable of combating terrorism. Indeed, an adviser to one of his possible rivals in 2008, Senator John McCain of Arizona, half-joked yesterday that it was interesting that Mr. Giuliani's businesses included security consulting."

Romney To File Exploratory Committee Papers. The Washington Post (1/3, A4, Cillizza, 690K) reports Mitt Romney will "let one of the least well-kept secrets of the 2008 campaign out of the bag today when he formally registers a presidential exploratory committee with the Federal Election Commission." The "filing of the paperwork is largely formulaic, as Romney has long been expected to run for president and has been putting into place a national organization to prepare for such a bid." Romney's "latest hire is Carolyn Weyforth, who most recently served as press secretary for outgoing Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.). Weyforth will be Romney's deputy communications director."

The Washington Times (1/3, Dinan, 88K) reports Romney "has spent recent months moving steadily to try to occupy the conservative ground in the Republican presidential field. His entry into the ranks of Republicans officially exploring a run for the presidency underscores the strange nature of the field at this point -- there is no candidate able to claim the position of the clear conservative standard-bearer, so all of the candidates think they can win a sizable chunk of those all-important primary voters."

Impact Of Obama's Confession Of Cocaine Use Analyzed. The Washington Post (1/3, A1, Romano, 690K) reports in a front page story that Democratic Sen. Barack Obama confessed to his illicit drug use in his memoir, "Dreams From My Father, A Story of Race and Inheritance," 11 years ago. At the time, "20,000 copies were printed and the book seemed destined for the remainders stacks." But Obama is now "near the top of polls on potential Democratic presidential contenders," and the book "has regularly been on the bestseller lists, with 800,000 copies in print. Taken along with his latest bestseller, 'The Audacity of Hope: Thoughts on Reclaiming the American Dream,' Obama has become a genuine publishing phenomenon." Obama's revelations "were not an issue during his Senate campaign two years ago. But now his open narrative of early, bad choices, including drug use starting in high school and ending in college, as well as his tortured search for racial identity, are sure to receive new scrutiny." What "remains to be seen is whether the candor he offered in his early memoir will be greeted with a new-style acceptance by voters." Through his book, Obama "has become the first potential presidential contender to admit trying cocaine."

Morris Says Obama Seen As Tabula Rasa. In his column in The Hill (1/3), Dick Morris says, "Those who deride Sen. Barack Obama's (D-Ill.) lack of experience and criticize the broad generalities and banalities that festoon his best-selling book miss the key point: His inexperience is an asset because he enters national politics as a blank canvas on which he can paint whatever he chooses." With only "two years in the Senate, he is less like a politician running for president than like a general — think Eisenhower in 1952 or even the abortive candidacy of Colin Powell in 1995 — or a businessman, like Ross Perot in 1992." Obama's record "doesn't really matter because it is so short." So far, Obama

"seems very conscious that his liberal, party-line voting record is not a good foundation for his national ambitions. He seems aware that the country wants more of a post-partisan, embodying the consensus to which Americans have come over these recent dangerous and bitter years." Obama has "the opportunity to embody the emerging consensus, a broad national agreement reached from observation of trial and error over the past half decade."

Morris Predicts Clinton Will Be Pressured To Choose Obama For VP. Political analyst Dick Morris, on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (1/2), predicted, "The ticket in '08 is [Sens.] Hillary [Clinton] and [Barack] Obama. Hillary because she's definitely going to run and probably going to win. She brings out single women who otherwise would not vote. The idea of the first woman will capture the ether and the reason she is going to put Obama on the ticket is after she beats him she can't then turn around and ask the African Americans to support the ticket unless she gives them something."

Obama Urged To Wait To Run. In her Washington Post column (1/3, A19), Ruth Marcus says, "I do think that Obama would be a better candidate, and ultimately a better president, in 2012 or 2016 than in 2008. He will have learned more -- about the world, about domestic policy, about how to maneuver successfully in Washington." The "main argument for Obama to run in 2008 involves the shelf-life theory of politics: That the Obama magic might fade, that an opportunity this good might never present itself again. Maybe, but I think that Obama has more promise than that, more staying power and more self-knowledge."

Schwarzenegger To Outline Vision For Future In Four Key Speeches. The Los Angeles Times (1/3, Nicholas, 850K) reports that over the "next seven days, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, new crutches close at hand, will give a series of speeches that lay out his policy ambitions for the next four years: broader access to healthcare coverage, cleaner skies and improved roads." Schwarzenegger, "still recovering from a broken right leg suffered in a holiday skiing accident, will deliver his inaugural address outlining a long-term vision for California when he is sworn in for a second term Friday. He is also expected on Monday to put forward his plan for revamping the state's healthcare system." The following day, he "will make his annual State of the State speech, and his budget proposal is scheduled the day after." In these "four speeches, Schwarzenegger will offer his most concrete proposals yet for insuring the millions of Californians who lack healthcare coverage, the centerpiece of his 2007 agenda. But he also hopes to establish a legacy as a builder on a par with former Gov. Pat Brown."

LATimes Criticizes Schwarzenegger For Veto Of Gay Marriage Bill. The Los Angeles Times (1/3, 850K) says in an editorial, "If Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger had signed a bill in 2005 legalizing same-sex marriage instead of vetoing it, the California Supreme Court would have been spared the task of deciding, as it probably will this year, whether a voter-approved ban violates the state Constitution's guarantee of equal protection under the law. But Schwarzenegger said he had to respect Proposition 22, approved in 2000, which states: 'Only marriage between a man and a woman is valid or recognized in California.'"

Lefkowitz's Post-White House Career Examined. The Washington Post (1/3, A17, Goldstein, 690K) asks, "Whatever happened to Jay P. Lefkowitz?" Before the 9/11 attacks, President Bush assigned the job of designing a policy to "allow federal money to pay for a limited amount of research on stem cells from human embryos" to Lefkowitz, "who was working as general counsel in the White House's Office of Management and Budget. Eight months later, Bush would promote Lefkowitz to deputy assistant to the president overseeing domestic policy. Many White House watchers expected that the cerebral neoconservative, whose judgment the president so clearly trusted, would rise further still." Instead, Lefkowitz "decamped from the White House -- and Washington -- in 2003. And although he is reluctant to discuss it, he has twice since then declined to return to top West Wing jobs." He "went back to his old law firm, Kirkland & Ellis, where he has a partnership and an eclectic mix of cases." Lefkowitz "still has a part-time role in government" as "the president's special envoy on human rights in North Korea."

NYTimes Praises Spitzer's Focus On Reform. The New York Times (1/3, 1.16M) says in an editorial that New York Gov. Eliot Spitzer, "who has built his career on reform, is arriving in a state capital that desperately needs it." New York's government "has slipped from a beacon for other states into a cautionary tale. So when Mr. Spitzer spoke of change in his inaugural address — an end to government 'that works for those who hold office, not those who put them there' — he hit precisely the right note. With a passion and energy that Albany has not seen in years, this governor has promised to wake what he has labeled the 'Rip van Winkle' government of the last decade."

Spitzer Urged To Keep Building Plan For Ground Zero. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (1/3, A13), Brian Carney, a member of the Wall Street Journal's Editorial Board, says, "Eliot Spitzer has been telling us for -- well, it seems like forever -- that 'on Day 1, everything changes.' Here's one thing that shouldn't: the Ground Zero rebuilding plan. The current master plan for those 16 acres in lower Manhattan isn't perfect. In fact, it's real far from perfect. It barely qualifies as OK. But it has this virtue -- it exists. And it is being built." The "real act of leadership here would be to declare that we're moving forward, that this scar in the fabric of Manhattan is going to be repaired. So, look all you want, Mr. Spitzer. But keep the concrete mixers mixing and the steel rising. New Yorkers have waited too long as it is."

Pat Robertson Predicts Massive Terror Attack In Late 2007. The AP (1/3) reports, "In what has become an annual tradition of prognostications, religious broadcaster Pat Robertson said Tuesday God has told him that a terrorist attack on the United States would result in 'mass killing' late in 2007. 'I'm not necessarily saying it's going to be nuclear,' he said during his news-and-talk television show 'The 700 Club' on the Christian Broadcasting Network. 'The Lord didn't say nuclear. But I do believe it will be something like that.'"

Ahmadinejad Downplays UN Sanctions. Fox News' Special Report (1/2, Hume) reported, "Iran's president also had a lot to say about the UN's latest move to pressure him into abandoning his nuclear program." Fox continued, "UN sanctions: not fair, but not a problem. That's what Iranian President Ahmadinejad wants his fellow countrymen and the world to know. Speaking to a crowd in a southwestern Iranian city, Ahmadinejad said the sanctions which ban the sale of nuclear materials or technology to Iran are not valid, and that the Iranian people give them no weight. As some in the crowd chanted 'Death to America,' Ahmadinejad insisted, again, that Iran would pursue its nuclear work despite pressure from the West." The AP (1/3) reports Ahmadinejad said the US was "the main power behind the resolution," and warned Washington: "I want you to know that the Iranian nation has humiliated you many times, and it will humiliate you in future."

Israeli Think Tank Warns That "Barring Military Action," Iran Will Get Nukes. Fox News' Special Report (1/2, Hume) reported, "Israel says Iran will develop a nuclear bomb if someone doesn't step in militarily." Iranian President Ahmadinejad "said he wants Israel wiped off the map, and a respected Israeli think tank in Tel Aviv University is taking him seriously. In its annual report on the strategic balance in the middle east just out today, the Tel Aviv Institute for National Military Studies concluded that 'time is working in Iran's favor, and barring military action, Iran's possession of nuclear weapons is only a matter of time.' The group stopped short of calling for Israel to launch a military strike in Iran.."

Russia Says Weapons Sales To Syria, Iran On Schedule. AFP (1/3) reports, "Controversial Russian contracts to sell anti-aircraft weapons to Syria and Iran are being fulfilled on schedule," Russian officials said Tuesday. Russia's ITAR-TASS quoted a defense ministry official as saying "at least half of the 29 Tor-M1 missile systems bought by Iran for $1.4 billion had been delivered." The air defense systems "are being stationed around Iran's civilian nuclear sites," according to ITAR-TASS. Meanwhile, Interfax news agency quoted Valery Kashin, head of weapons maker Engineering Design Bureau, "as saying that Russia met all its commitments in 2006 under the contract to supply Syria with the Strelets anti-aircraft system" without providing further details.

Ethiopia To Withdraw Troops From Somalia "Within Weeks." The Financial Times (1/3, England) reports Ethiopian troops could be pulled out of Somalia "within a few weeks," Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi said on Tuesday, "adding that the victors of Somalia's two-week war were now 'mopping up remnants' of the country's former Islamist leaders." Despite "promises of a swift withdrawal, doubts remain about when Mr. Meles would be willing or able to pull back his troops." The New York Times (1/3, A3, Gettleman, 1.16M) reports Zenawi said his country "could not afford to keep troops in Somalia much longer and that it was ill equipped to play the role of peacekeeper there." Meanwhile, Somali Prime Minister Ali Mohammed Gedi "reiterated his plea for the nation's many gunmen to turn in their weapons. But few seemed to be listening."

In an interview with the Washington Post (1/3, A14, McCrummen, 690K), Somali Interior Minister Hussein Farah

Aideed "said lawmakers would return this week to their town of exile, Baidoa, to approve Gedi's declaration of martial law and a plan to allow 90 days -- instead of Gedi's original timeline of three days -- to disarm militias." In "what amounted to an appeal for outside help," Aideed also "conceded that the transitional government was weak," saying "We have a symbolic government. Ministries we don't have, a military we don't have. We're limited."

The Los Angeles Times (1/3, Sanders, 850K) reports that the government-mandated disarmament program, which it calls "the first major test of Somalia's transitional government," got under way Tuesday "without much of a bang." At one designated weapons drop-off point in the Somali capital, "bored-looking Ethiopian soldiers mulled about with little to do," while c second collection site "closed early because 'no one showed up,' according to a Somali government soldier." Meanwhile, the Christian Science Monitor (1/3, Crilly, 59K) says Ethiopia's "preemptive offensive signals the opening of a new front in the global struggle against Islamist militants. And the speed of the Islamists' retreat is reminiscent of how insurgencies began in both Iraq and Afghanistan, say analysts." USA Today (1/3, 4A, 2.27M) also reports briefly on the events.

Envoys To Meet On Peacekeeping Force. Separately, the Washington Post (1/3, A14, Deyoung, 690K) says the "rapidly unfolding events in Somalia have opened a window of opportunity to establish a viable government there, according to the Bush administration and its European and African allies. But there is little optimism that the international political will and resources needed to exploit it will emerge before the window slams shut." Diplomats from the United States and other nations in the Somalia Contact Group will meet today in Brussels "to examine ways to quickly install an all-African peacekeeping force." Also under discussion "is an effort to persuade cooperative elements of the newly ensconced Transitional Federal Government to open unity talks with certain moderate leaders of the fundamentalist forces."

Huddleston Says Victory Is Opportunity To Prevent Somalia From Becoming Terror Haven. Former acting Ambassador in Addis Ababa, Vicki Huddleston, writes in the Washington Times (1/3, 88K) that Ethiopia's and the Somali government's "surprisingly easy victories have given Somalia -- and the West -- a second chance to get things right. We cannot afford to lose this opportunity." In response, Huddleston urges international relief agencies to "enhance shipments of food into the towns and villages now under the Transitional Government's control." Second, she urges the African Union, "with logistic help from the United States and European Union," to "immediately deploy peacekeepers to reinforce the government." Lastly, the Ambassador says "the region under the auspices of the Intergovernmental Authority on Development should prepare for a transition to a broad based government that excludes the Islamic militants but includes the moderates from all of Somalia's clans." With "strong US leadership," Huddleston says we "will prevent Somalia from becoming a haven for al Qaeda terrorism in Africa."

North Korean Foreign Minister Dies. The AP (1/3) reports Paek Nam Sun, North Korea's foreign minister and the country's top diplomat "for nearly 10 years, has died at the age of 78," official media reported Wednesday. North Korean leader Kim Jong Il "expressed his condolences," but the "one-sentence dispatch did not elaborate on when or how Paek died." Although it "was unclear who would succeed him," Paek's death was "not expected to change North Korea's foreign policy."

Israeli General Admits Errors In Lebanon. The New York Times (1/3, A3, Erlanger, 1.16M) reports Israeli chief of staff, Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz, "conceded Tuesday that the military had made serious errors during last summer's war against Hezbollah in Lebanon but said he would not resign his post." General Halutz said Israel "had badly damaged Hezbollah in southern Lebanon" and killed "hundreds of terrorists." But he said Israel was "not successful in reducing the short-range rocket fire on Israel's north until the cease-fire." However, he rejected calls from critics for his resignation, saying he would stay on "to correct what can be corrected," and said to resign now would be "running away."

Israel Considers Abandoning Own Missiles For US System. AFP (1/3) reports Israel is "considering halting the development of a new generation of its Arrow defense missiles due to the high costs involved in favor of US-made missiles." Following negotiations in recent months, Israeli leaders "will make a final decision on whether to phase out the Arrow, or Hetz, missiles and opt instead for the US-made THAAD missile defense system in the coming year," the Haaretz newspaper reported Tuesday. The THAAD missile, made by Lockheed Martin, could be delivered to Israel in 2009, according to sources in Washington quoted by the newspaper.

UN To Probe Sexual Abuse Allegations In Sudan. The AP (1/3, Moore) reports the UN said Tuesday it will investigate "a report of allegations of sexual abuse and child rape by peacekeepers operating in southern Sudan." Jane Holl Lute, the UN assistant secretary-general who oversees peacekeeping operations, said the allegations, reported by British newspaper The Daily Telegraph, "if shown to be true would not be tolerated." The Daily Telegraph, "citing an internal UNICEF report along with interviews with more than 20 alleged abuse victims, reported that several children, some as young as 12, had been sexually abused by UN peacekeepers and civilian workers."

New Secretary General Says UN Must Accept Reforms. The Financial Times (1/3, Turner) reports, "Ban Ki-moon, the eighth United Nations secretary-general, arrived for his first day at work on Tuesday with a tough appeal for staff to embrace change and restore trust in the organisation." Ban's "core message was delivered to a closed meeting of UN staff. He praised their professionalism, but warned that the UN's 'sense of pride is not to be taken for granted; it must be earned. We are all here for reasons greater than our own personal advancement or national interest.'" Ban "promised to build a more mobile staff, which moved between headquarters and field posts – addressing the fact that many UN officials, on reaching New York and Geneva, remain in place for years, while field positions often go unfilled." The Washington Times (1/3, Pisik, 88K) says Ban "pledged to pursue predecessor Kofi Annan's stalled reform suggestions, some of which were more popular with the staff than others."

Reid Discusses Trade Pact With Peruvian President. The AP (1/3, Vecchio) reports, "Incoming US Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said Tuesday he had fallen in love with Peru during a short visit, but made no pronouncements on a key issue facing the two nations, free trade. In a meeting with the bipartisan senate delegation led by Reid, President Alan Garcia stressed Peru's desire for a free trade pact." Republicans "have largely supported the free trade deal signed last April as a step in advancing commerce within the Western Hemisphere, while Democrats have expressed reservations about its ratification over what they see as a lack of protection for Peruvian workers. "

Merkel To Push For US-EU Trade Talks. The Financial Times (1/3, Benoit, Peel) reports, "Angela Merkel, German chancellor, will this month launch a sweeping initiative for the harmonisation of US and European legislation to boost investment flows and trade between the world's largest economic blocs. Initial talks will review financial market regulations, including delisting rules, which many US-listed European companies feel are too cumbersome, as well as intellectual property law. Ms Merkel is also seeking mutual recognition of technical standards for products such as cars." The Times adds, "In her first interview with an international newspaper since becoming chancellor, Ms Merkel told the Financial Times she would make achieving a 'transatlantic economic partnership' central to Germany's presidency of the European Union, which began this week." Merkel's "ambition is to create a single transatlantic market for investors."

Dobbs Blasts DaimlerChrysler Over Alliance With China. CNN's Lou Dobbs, on Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/2), said, "DaimlerChrysler is now teaming up with communist China's cherry automobile, the Chinese company will be manufacturing a small car for the U.S. market because DaimlerChrysler executives say they can't make a profit if they build them in this country. They apparently can sell them here. … The deal has critics of Bush's trade and industrial policy alarmed." Peter Morici, University of Maryland: "Within ten years, China could wipe out the lower end of the U.S. market. It's not astounding, not when you consider how jugheaded U.S. policy has been towards China. We let them in the WTO, gave them free access to this market. They maintain high tariffs there. They require U.S. automakers to make their cars there." Dobbs added, "Just when you think U.S. trade policy can't get any dumber or more antithetical to the American worker…"

Yuan's Rise Hurting Chinese Exporters. The Wall Street Journal (1/3, A2, Areddy, 2.04M) reports from Shanghai, "The Chinese currency's rising value has started to pinch an increasing number of businesses here, eroding already thin profit margins, forcing them to reduce expenses and sometimes costing them business. The tightly controlled Chinese yuan has crept up 6% since July 2005, when the government loosened its link to the US dollar." The Journal adds "US companies that have extensive operations in China are also feeling the effects."

Biden Urges "Responsible Russian Approach" To Kosovo. Sen. Joe Biden, the incoming chairman of the US Senate foreign relations committee, writes in the Financial Times (1/3), "Years of hand-wringing and chest-thumping over the future status of Kosovo may finally be drawing to a close. In the next few months, adroit diplomacy to secure Kosovo's independence could yield a victory for Muslim democracy, a better future for south-east Europe and validation for the judicious use of American power." But "along with the potential for triumph in Kosovo, there is a growing risk that Serbia and Russia will conspire to seize defeat from the jaws of victory." Biden adds that "success in Kosovo, if realised, will have implications far beyond the Balkans. A responsible Russian approach to the issue could demonstrate the Kremlin's commitment to global order at a time when its credibility is in tatters."

Western Powers Urged To Push For Transition To Democracy In Turkmenistan. Nurmuhammet Hanamov, the founding chairman of the Republican Party of Turkmenistan in exile, writes in a Washington Post op-ed (1/3, A19) titled "A New Beginning For Turkmenistan" that with the death of dictator Saparmurad Niyazov, "the West has a historic second chance to help our country make a peaceful transition to democracy. … The United States must send a clear message to Niyazov's holdouts in the 'interim government' in Ashgabat: that they will not have its support unless they agree to hold free and fair elections -- ones that allow all citizens of Turkmenistan, including exiled opposition leaders and political prisoners, to take part."

Gazprom-Belarus Deal Sparks Commentary. The New York Times (1/3, 1.16M) editorializes, "A year after Russia put the gas squeeze on Ukraine, it was Belarus's turn. Unlike Ukraine, Belarus blinked two minutes before the Jan. 1 deadline and Russia had its booty: a 50 percent share of Belarus's pipeline network and a more than doubling of the price Belarus will now pay for Russian gas." This "latest squeeze is another warning that the Kremlin will let nothing — personal loyalty, contracts, the law — halt its drive to reimpose state control on Russia's energy sector. It is also another reminder that the West, a big consumer of Russian energy, remains vulnerable to President Vladimir Putin's whims."

In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (1/3, 2.04M) writes that "this latest rendition of Moscow's spigot shakedown carries a blueprint for its strategy toward the rest of the Continent, and Europe's leaders ignore it at their peril." Gazprom "has been transparent about its aim to own the pipes that connect its gas fields to its customers. This is one of the main reasons Moscow refuses to ratify the International Energy Charter, which requires free access to pipeline networks, and why it is lobbying hard against European Union plans to liberalize its gas market. As part of that reform, the EU would likely prohibit gas suppliers from owning pipelines, and vice versa." The Journal concludes, "We'll get an idea of how European policy makers size up the threat from Russia on Thursday, when the EU's Gas Coordination Group meets, and next week when the European Commission unveils its energy sector review. No news on the liberalization front will be bad news."

In an editorial, the Washington Post (1/3, A18, 690K) says the deal advances "Russia's disturbing campaign to monopolize energy supplies to Europe." The Post adds, "Belarusan President Alexander Lukashenko is widely known as Europe's last dictator. What's less well known is that he has been resisting pressure from Russia to annex his country." Putin "is consequently using 'market pricing' to extract what he wants from Belarus."

LATimes Praises Sinn Fein For Accepting Police Force. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (1/3, 850K) praises Sinn Fein leader Gerry Adams for asking "a party conference to approve a motion supporting the 'police services' in both Northern Ireland and the predominantly Catholic Irish Republic. A recognition by Sinn Fein of the new Police Service of Northern Ireland — a replacement for the Royal Ulster Constabulary long distrusted by Catholics — would be a momentous step. It would add the final piece to the jigsaw puzzle of a new arrangement in which the North's pro-British Protestant majority shares power with the Catholic minority." If "power sharing is revived, credit will belong not only to Northern Ireland's erstwhile enemies but to the United States."

Today's Events In Washington 29

TERRORISM NEWS:

Leahy Criticizes DOJ For Refusing Terror Document Request. The Washington Times (1/3, Seper) reports, "The incoming chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee yesterday described as 'disappointing' the Justice Department's refusal to release documents detailing the Bush administration's interrogation and detention policy for terrorism suspects." The Times continues, "Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat, called on the department and the White House to "reconsider their response" and work with the committee 'to promptly share this information, with any appropriate confidentiality safeguards.' … Mr. Leahy, who bitterly criticized FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III last month during a committee hearing for refusing to discuss the Bush administration's domestic terrorist-surveillance program, has promised that as chairman he will target what he called the 'unprecedented' efforts by the administration to 'hide its own activities from the public.' … 'The department's decision to brush off my request for information about the administration's troubling interrogation policies is not the constructive step toward bipartisanship that I had hoped for, given President Bush's promise to work with us,' he said."

The Los Angeles Times (1/3, Schmitt) reports, "Setting up what could become the first showdown between the Bush administration and the new Democratic Congress, the Justice Department has refused to turn over two secret documents, describing the CIA's detention and interrogation policies for suspected terrorists, to the incoming chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee." The Times reports that Leahy "said Tuesday that the department's response suggested that President Bush's promise to work with the new Congress 'may have been only political lip service.' … Leahy has said he might use subpoenas to get the material." The Times adds, "The administration notified Leahy on Dec. 22 that it would not release a presidential directive signed by Bush authorizing the CIA to set up secret prisons overseas for suspected terrorists or a 2002 Justice Department legal memorandum outlining "aggressive interrogation techniques." … Leahy waited until the week that Democrats take control of Congress to release — and denounce — the response. The department's letter to Leahy was sent during Congress' holiday recess, when most lawmakers were out of town. … The exchange is an inauspicious start to what some lawmakers and administration officials had hoped would be a period of bipartisanship following the November election, in which Republicans lost control of both houses of Congress."

FBI Documents Detail Guantanamo Detainee Abuse Allegations. Under the headline "FBI Reports Duct-Taping, 'Baptizing' At Guantanamo," the Washington Post (1/3, Eggen, 690K) reports in a front-page story, "FBI agents witnessed possible mistreatment of the Koran at the military prison at Guantanamo…including at least one instance in which an interrogator squatted over Islam's holy text in an apparent attempt to offend a captive, according to bureau documents released yesterday" for "an ongoing lawsuit by the American Civil Liberties Union." The Post notes, "In a previously unreported allegation, one interrogator bragged to an FBI agent that he had forced a prisoner to listen to 'Satanic black metal music for hours,' then dressed as a Catholic priest before 'baptizing' him." Pentagon spokesman Lt. Cmdr. Joe Carpenter "said in a statement last night that 'the issues and facts raised' in the documents 'are not new' and that 12 reviews have showed there were no Defense Department policies that condoned abuse."

The AP (1/3, Apuzzo) reports, "FBI agents documented more than two dozen incidents of possible mistreatment at the Guantanamo Bay military base, including one detainee whose head was wrapped in duct tape for chanting the Quran and another who pulled out his hair after hours in a sweltering room." The AP continues, "Documents released Tuesday by the FBI offered new details about the harsh interrogation practices used by military officials and contractors when questioning so-called enemy combatants." The AP adds, 'The reports describe a female guard who detainees said handled their genitals and wiped menstrual blood on their face. Another interrogator reportedly bragged to an FBI agent about dressing as a Catholic priest and 'baptizing' a prisoner. … Some military officials and contractors told FBI agents that the interrogation techniques had been approved by the Defense Department, including directly by former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld." The AP notes, "The documents were released in response to a public records request by the American Civil Liberties Union, which is suing Rumsfeld and others on behalf of former military detainees who say they were abused. Many of the incidents in the FBI documents have already been reported and are summarized in the ACLU's lawsuit. … President Bush signed legislation in October that authorized aggressive interrogation tactics but did not define them. ACLU lawyer Jameel Jaffer said the court documents show that stricter congressional oversight is needed."

CNN.com (1/2) reported, "The FBI surveyed all 493 FBI personnel who had been assigned to the military prison facility in the aftermath of the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and determined no FBI agent or support personnel had participated in any of the controversial practices. 'This thorough internal assessment shows the FBI was not involved in these activities in any way,' said chief FBI spokesman Richard Kolko." The bureau "stressed that most of the findings had already been reported elsewhere. 'Note these documents have been vetted by both DoD [Department of Defense] and FBI, and that FBI believes this or substantially similar information has already been released in this litigation,' the FBI said." ABC News (1/2, Ryan) noted on its Web site, "In May 2004, FBI director Robert Mueller told the Senate Judiciary Committee that 'It is the FBI's policy to prohibit interrogation by force, threats of force or coercion. Where we have conducted interviews, we have adhered to that policy.'" BBC World Service (1/3) also is reporting on the FBI documents this morning, saying that they "apparently contradict" President Bush's assertions that the US does not engage in torture.

7th Circuit Allows Expanded Use Of FISA Wiretaps. The National Law Journal (1/3, Maclean) reports, "Federal prosecutors may use wiretap evidence obtained under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act in spy cases for criminal prosecutions unrelated to the original espionage purpose of the wiretap, the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals has held." The Journal continues, "The ruling is the first outside the special FISA court itself to interpret the law as expanding the ability of prosecutors to use the act in a variety of criminal contexts, according to defense attorney James Geis, a Chicago solo practitioner representing Ning Wen, who was convicted of violating export-control laws. … 'Unless there is a constitutional problem in domestic use of evidence seized as part of an international investigation, there is no basis for suppression,' wrote Chief Judge Frank Easterbrook in U.S. v. Wen, No. 06-1385. … 'I think this holding makes it virtually impossible to challenge a FISA search,' said Geis. 'This pretty much makes it bulletproof.'" The Journal adds, "The ruling could be significant given the government's increased focus on economic espionage and international theft of U.S. technology. Last month, two men, Fei Ye and Ming Zhong, pleaded guilty in San Francisco to stealing trade secrets from Sun Microsystems Inc. and Transmeta Corp., with the intent of benefiting the People's Republic of China. … Justice Department spokesman Dean Boyd said the department is pleased with the outcome, but he declined to elaborate on its broader potential application."

Albany Mosque Leader Asks Judge To Grant New Trial. The AP (1/3, Virtanen) reports, "Two mosque leaders convicted last fall after a terrorism-related sting have asked the trial judge to set aside the verdicts or else grant them new trials." Yassin Aref and Mohammed Hossain "were caught in a 2004 FBI sting involving a fictional terror strike. The government never accused the pair of actual violence, but said they participated in a money-laundering scheme that included an FBI informant posing as an illegal arms dealer." In Sunday's motion, Hossain lawyer Kevin Luibrand said the convictions "should be set aside because Hossain was entrapped, authorities induced the crime, the pizzeria owner had 'no predisposition' to join in, and improper testimony from an unqualified prosecution expert witness made Hossain's political affiliation appear sinister." The AP notes, "The FBI has acknowledged Aref was the ultimate target of the sting, not Hossain." Capital News 9 Albany (1/2) also reported on the defense motion.

US Military Looking To Business For Strategies In War On Terror. USA Today (1/3, 1B, Jones, 2.27M) reports that in a reversal of what "has been largely a one-way street" in their relationship with business, the US military is now "paying closer attention to business than business is paying to the military, because the world of geopolitics has discovered itself to be on the same road that business has been on for some time. That road is flatter, more networked and more decentralized than ever." The fate of "large, traditional companies" in their fight against "disruptive competitors, including YouTube, Kazaa, Skype and Wikipedia" may provide valuable lessons for "developing a strategy against al-Qaeda."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

DHS Finds Most Cities Need To Improve Interoperable Communications. In an article appearing on more than 150 news websites, the AP (1/2, Barrett) reported, "Only six of 75 US metropolitan areas won the highest grades for their emergency agencies' ability to communicate during a disaster," according to a DHS study to be released Wednesday by Secretary Michael Chertoff. "A draft portion of the report…gives the best ratings to Washington, DC; San Diego; Minneapolis-St. Paul; Columbus, Ohio; Sioux Falls, SD; and Laramie County, Wyo." The report "cautioned" that while "all 75 areas surveyed have policies in place for helping their emergency workers communicate," regular testing and exercises are required "to effectively link disparate systems." The AP added that the news "was likely to add fuel to what looms as a battle in Congress this year," with Democrats vowing to fix the problem of emergency communications, but not saying "specifically what they will do, how much it will cost or how they will pay for it." DHS spokesman Russ Knocke would say only that in releasing the report, Chertoff "will 'talk about nationwide assessments for interoperable communications.'"

USA Today (1/3, 3A, Hall, 2.27M) reports Chertoff said last month that "the country has made 'a significant amount of progress' toward better communication systems" since 9/11. "But in regions where there are still gaps, he said, leaders of cities and towns with incompatible systems need to work to develop a better system that would help communication during a disaster. Since 2003, Homeland Security has handed out $2.9 billion in grants for interoperable communications systems, and Chertoff said his department's grant programs will be heavily focused on communications improvements over the next two years. The survey, he said, was designed to identify the gaps so they can be closed 'as quickly as possible.'" Rep. Peter King said "the report shows 'how difficult an issue this is.'"

The CBS Evening News (1/2, story 9, 0:25, Couric, 7.66M) broadcasted that the "disturbing report" found that in the event of "another 9/11 or a disaster like Katrina" emergency agencies may not be able to talk to each other. NBC Nightly News (1/2, story 8, 1:15, P. Williams, 9.87M) broadcasted that the report did not say the cities that did not receive a top score "are unprepared, just that they have to do better to plan for disaster response."

German Muslim Businessman Denied Entry To US After Four-Day Detention. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/3, Burke) reports, "A German businessman of Syrian descent who wanted to surprise his daughter with a holiday visit was detained for four days in a Las Vegas holding cell before being sent back home without explanation." The Council on American-Islamic Relations "called authorities' treatment of Majed Shehadeh a case of anti-Muslim discrimination." CBP spokeswoman Roxanne Hercules "confirmed Tuesday that Shehadeh was denied entry, but would not discuss specifics of his case. She said Shehadeh's visa waiver could have been denied because 'he could have a criminal record, or it could be a terrorism issue.'" The AP notes, "After being interrogated by Border Protection and FBI agents for more than 12 hours at the airport, Shehadeh said he was handcuffed and transported in the back of police car to a North Las Vegas jail."

Judge Sets Plea Hearing In SUV Attack As Defense Seeks FBI Evidence. The Durham Herald-Sun (1/3, Velliquette) reports, "If the FBI turns over the evidence it collected after Mohammed Taheri-Azar allegedly attempted to kill people on the UNC campus by running over them in an SUV, Taheri-Azar will enter a plea at his next court hearing on Jan. 24. … During a short court appearance…Tuesday, Taheri-Azar appeared to want the case to move along faster and said he wished there weren't so many short pretrial hearings he had to attend." Public Defender James Williams told Superior Court Judge Carl Fox yesterday that "he wants to see the interviews that FBI agents conducted in Charlotte with Taheri-Azar's family and others and to see any evidence, including computer files, that the agents may have collected in the case. Orange-Chatham District Attorney Jim Woodall said he has been attempting to get that evidence without a court order, but so far has not been successful. … Fox said he would give Woodall 14 days to try to get the evidence for Williams. If he doesn't get the information from the FBI, Fox said he would sign a court order to obtain it." WRAL-TV Raleigh (1/2) also reported on yesterday's hearing and the request for the FBI evidence.

Mall Security Guards To Receive Anti-Terrorism Training. The Washington Post (1/3, D1, Mui) reports, "The job of a shopping mall security guard normally involves controlling rowdy teenagers, finding lost children and patrolling parking lots. But starting this month, malls across the country will begin training guards for another task: fighting terrorism." The Post continues, "The 14-hour program is being developed by the International Council of Shopping Centers, a trade group, and the Homeland Security Policy Institute at George Washington University at a cost of $2 million. It is the first standardized anti-terrorism curriculum written for the nation's estimated 20,000 mall security guards." The Post adds, "Developers of the program say it is crucial to safeguarding shopping centers, which have significant economic import -- as evidenced by the billions of dollars spent at malls during the holiday season -- and have emerged as modern-day town centers, with movie theaters, restaurants, and now grocery stores and gyms. … Not everyone agrees, however, that America's malls face a serious threat of terrorism. And some critics question the effectiveness of the training when the private security industry suffers from high turnover -- most guards leave the job within a year and some in as little as four months, according to estimates from the Service Employees International Union."

DHS Tracking System To Monitor IT Workers. Government Computer News (1/3, Lipowicz) reports, "A new records system is being designed to allow the Homeland Security Department to monitor the names, passwords, citizenship information and other data on thousands of IT workers with access to the department's systems." GCN continues, "In a notice posted Dec. 29, DHS announced it is creating a new sensitive, but unclassified, database as part of its General Information Technology Access Account Records System. The department made the notice to comply with the Privacy Act of 1974, which regulates how the government collects and uses personal information." GCN adds, "The new database will collect personal information from IT employees, contractors, grantees and others, including people who serve on DHS advisory committees or are listed as points of contact for facilities. … The system will include names, user names, citizenship, business affiliation, contact information and passwords. It also will include home addresses, e-mail addresses, and names and phone numbers of people listed as contacts. … The information will be routinely used by DHS contractors and consultants, facility operators, congressional offices, National Archives, Justice Department or other federal agencies conducting litigations or proceedings involving DHS."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Set To Announce Deployment Of Some 20,000 Additional Troops To Iraq. NBC Nightly News (1/2, story 4, 2:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "NBC news Pentagon correspondent Jim Miklaszewski has learned that President Bush is prepared to announce what is being called a strategy of 'surge and accelerate' in Iraq, which would involve some 20,000 additional American troops being sent to Iraq." NBC (Miklaszewski) added, "Administration officials told us today that President Bush has now all but decided to surge those additional troops into Baghdad to try to" gain control "over the violence there and only then could they accelerate the turnover of territory to Iraqi security forces." The plan would "also throw more US money at Iraq for reconstruction and a jobs program. Interestingly enough, one administration official admitted to us today that this surge option is more of a political decision than a military one because the American people have run out of patience and President Bush is running out of time to achieve some kind of success in Iraq. While this plan will clearly draw some stiff opposition on Capitol Hill, the President is expected to announce it a week from today."

Former GOP Sen. Alan Simpson, an Iraq Study Group member, was asked on MSNBC's Hardball (1/2) if he supports a troop surge. Simpson answered, "I can go along with that. We talked about that. I think we said go from 4,000 to 20,000. I can't remember the numbers. But we did not reject a surge."

Most '08 Candidates, Marginal Members Not Backing Iraq Troop Surge. The Hill (1/3, Blake) reports, "Few Republicans sprinted to Sen. John McCain's (R-Ariz.) side when he first came out in support of a troop surge in Iraq several months ago, and some of those who did wound up backing off amid campaign-season criticism." The proposal "still isn't popular among Republicans," and "among Democrats, there is a similar brand of hesitance, despite varying degrees of support expressed by leaders including incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), incoming Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee Chairman Joe Lieberman (I-Conn.) and incoming House Intelligence Committee Chairman Silvestre Reyes (D-Texas)." Democratic presidential candidates "and lawmakers who are likely to face some of the most competitive races in 2008 are largely joining with Republicans in resistance to the idea of adding troops, citing the need for a political solution instead." Sens. Joseph Biden and Barack Obama and former Sen. John Edwards "became the latest to come out forcefully against a surge in Iraq. They and other presidential candidates appear ready to make 'The McCain Doctrine,' as Edwards dubbed it Sunday, one of the first big issues of the 2008 campaign."

Iraq Launches Probe Into Saddam Execution As Criticism Grows. Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki Tuesday ordered an investigation into the events surrounding Saddam Hussein's execution, notably how on a film cell phone camera was permitted. ABC World News (1/2, story 4, 2:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The execution was supposed to be a solemn proceeding. Instead, it became a spectacle, something of a circus, outraging Sunnis and making the goal of reconciliation in Iraq even more elusive." ABC (McCarthy) added, "The anger is spreading" as "demonstrations have broken out in Sunni towns across central Iraq." The execution "was rushed" and carried out "against the advice of the US ambassador, who wanted a delay." In a separate report from the White House, ABC World News (1/2, story 5, 1:00, Raddatz, 8.78M) said "there are some officials that are furious about" the execution, arguing it "was an opportunity for Maliki to step up and say, 'It's time for national reconciliation.' Instead, one official said, 'The execution was nothing more than an act of revenge and political grandstanding.'"

NBC Nightly News (1/2, story 5, 2:40 Engel, 9.87M) reported that the investigation was launched "under political pressure." Meanwhile, one Iraqi official today "blew the whistle" on the events surrounding the video's release. Sami Al-Askari, an Iraqi government advisor, said: "One of the attendants -- probably from the guards -- smuggled his mobile phone and took that film secretly and no one noticed." The CBS Evening News (1/2, story 4, 2:25, Couric, 7.66M) said with the events surrounding the execution, "Iraq's government may have done something it had not intended to do -- turned a tyrant into a folk hero."

On its front page, the New York Times (1/3, A1, Burns, Glanz, 1.16M) reports Iraqi officials "said a three-man Interior Ministry committee would look into the scenes that have caused outrage and public demonstrations." Meanwhile, "As the shock of those scenes reached a new crescendo in Iraq, American officials said that they had worked until the last hours of Mr. Hussein's life to persuade" Maliki "to delay the execution." The officials "said they appealed to Mr. Maliki not to execute Mr. Hussein at dawn on Saturday because of the onset of a major Islamic festival, and because of constitutional and legal questions that the Americans believed threw the legitimacy of the execution into doubt." An American official said that Maliki "had never fully explained his urgency in carrying out the death sentence," but the prime minister "gave one explanation that appeared to weigh heavily on his mind, the American said, and that was his fear that Mr. Hussein might be the subject of an insurgent attempt to free him if the procedural wrangling over the execution were protracted."

The Washington Post (1/3, A1, Raghavan, Trejos, 690K) reports the probe "could implicate senior Iraqi officials." Munqith al-Faroun, the deputy prosecutor in Hussein's trial, "said in a telephone interview Tuesday that he saw two official observers using their cellphones to record Hussein's last moments." The two men, he said, were "recording through their mobiles openly." The AP (1/3, Torchia) says the incident "dealt a blow to Iraq's efforts to prove it was a neutral enforcer of the law," noting that the Iraqi government "did not say what, if any, punishment would await anyone uncovered" in the probe. USA Today (1/3, 8A, 2.27M) files a similar report.

Execution Draws International Condemnation. The New York Times (1/3, A6, Lyall, 1.16M) reports British deputy Prime Minister John Prescott said Tuesday that "the taunting and baiting" that occurred at the execution "was unacceptable and that the people responsible should be condemned for taking part." The Times notes that Blair "has not spoken publicly about Mr. Hussein's death, an omission that has been seized on by antiwar members of his Labor Party as another misstep in a long succession of them on Iraq."

Ban's Comments On Execution Stirs Controversy. Meanwhile, the AP (1/3, Chang) reports at the United Nations, Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon "ran into trouble on his first day of work when he failed to state the UN's official stance opposing capital punishment and said it should be a decision of individual countries." His "ambiguous answer" put "a question mark over the UN's stance on the death penalty, although Ban's spokeswoman said there was no change in policy." The Los Angeles Times (1/3, Farley, 850K) says Ban "stepped back from the United Nations' long-standing opposition to the death penalty." Similarly, the New York Times (1/3, A6, Preston, 1.16M) says Ban "seemed to have tripped in his effort to tread lightly on the political views of the many United Nations members," and "also seemed to show that Mr. Ban…had not completed the transition from representing his country to leading the United Nations."

The Washington Post (1/3, A15, Lynch, 690K) writes, "Ban's first public reaction to Hussein's execution signaled a sharp break from his predecessor, Kofi Annan, an ardent death-penalty critic who opposed UN participation in the Iraqi war crimes tribunal that sentenced Hussein to die." The Washington Times (1/3, A1, Pisik, Behn, 88K) also reports on Ban's comments.

More Commentary. The New York Times' (1/3) Thomas Friedman says the execution "resembled a tribal revenge ritual rather than the culmination of a constitutional process in which America should be proud to have participated." The "raw tribal theatrics of Saddam's hanging highlight just how few" of America's "values Iraq has imported." However, Friedman says, "We are to blame for not creating the security needed for those values to take hold. But not enough of our Iraqi allies have risen to the occasion, either. It was our closest Iraqi partners who oversaw Saddam's tribal hanging. We have to look that in the eye." Friedman goes on to note that "now President Bush wants a 'surge' of more US troops to Baghdad, in one last attempt to bring order," cautioning that "if the underlying willingness to share power and resources is not present among the major communities in Iraq, adding more US troops won't help either. Adding more troops makes sense only if it's to buy more time for positive trends that have already begun to appear on the horizon. I don't see them."

Marty Peretz, editor-in-chief of The New Republic, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/3, 2.04M), "Saddam has already swung from the ropes," and "the question, then, is not whether Iraq will recover from the oppressor's death. The question is whether Iraq will recover from the oppressor's rule. The execution of this monstrous man was not intended to be a deterrent to evil. There are probably no deterrents to real evil and real evildoers. But a community can punish its own pharaohs. That punishment will be the most significant sovereign act the people of Iraq have ever done. This is an act of recovery by itself."

The Houston Chronicle (1/3, 530K) editorializes, "Unfortunately, like so much else that has occurred since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion, the tyrant's death turned into another fiasco and missed opportunity. ... Rather than looking like the cowering vagrant that U.S. troops pulled out of a hole, the well-groomed fallen dictator exhibited nonchalance and sarcasm. ... the authorities' conduct at the execution only served notice how far the new Iraq has to go in meeting the standards of democratic justice."

The Norfolk Virginian Pilot (1/3) editorializes, "The execution early Saturday is cold comfort to the U.S. troops now stuck in Iraq, trying to impose stability on a fractured nation that seems to want none of it. ... When the history of this war is written in years to come, this weekend's hanging may be no more than a footnote."

Author and former ambassador Peter Galbraith writes in an op-ed for the Boston Globe (1/3, 413K), "The manner of Saddam's execution made it clear that Iraq's Shi'ite leaders -- and in particular Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki -- were more interested in revenge than justice. ... According to his former foreign minister, Tariq Azziz, Saddam apparently intended to make an issue of western support in his trial. This could also have been awkward for some in the current administration. ... it would have made an enormous difference to have had an irrefutable record that Saddam was responsible for the genocide against the Kurds."

Syndicated columnist Cal Thomas writes in the Washington Times (1/3, 88K), "That was a shorter summation than most prosecutors deliver in court, but in the end Saddam's execution wasn't about revenge. It was about justice."

Columnist Bruce Fein writes in the Washington Times (1/3, 88K), "The moral universe is celebrating his execution by hanging." However, "Saddam, like Afghanistan's Taliban and Osama bin Laden, was a partial creation of the United States. That should be remembered whenever America contemplates bolstering a dictator under the banner of Realpolitik."

Iraq Reports 12,000 Civilian Deaths In 2006. The AP (1/3, Hurst) reports, "Iraq reported Tuesday that about 12,000 civilians were killed last year — the third full year since the U.S.-led invasion — with a dramatic rise in the last three months, when 5,000 died. Only about half as many Iraqi soldiers died in 2006 as American troops. ... In all, the Iraqi ministries of Health, Defense and Interior reported a total of 13,896 Iraqi civilians, police and soldiers died last year, 162 more than the tally kept by The Associated Press." However, "Counts kept by other groups, including the United Nations, list far higher death tolls, which are disputed by the Iraqi government." The AP adds, "Life for Iraqis, especially in Baghdad and cities and towns in the center of the country, has become increasingly untenable. ... professionals — especially professors, physicians, politicians and journalists — are falling to sectarian killers at a stunning pace."

Earlier AP coverage gave a higher total: The AP (1/2, Frayer) reported, "Government officials reported that 16,273 Iraqi civilians, soldiers and police died violent deaths in 2006 ... The tabulation by the Iraqi ministries of Health, Defense and Interior, showed that 14,298 civilians, 1,348 police and 627 soldiers were killed in the violence that raged in the country last year."

Civilian Deaths Hit New Monthly High. The Financial Times (1/3, Negus) reports, "The tally of civilian deaths in Iraq hit a new high of 1,930 in December, suggesting sectarian violence that surged in the summer remains at peak levels." The figures "may be a significant underestimate as many deaths go unreported. ... All Iraqi death toll figures are controversial and are often difficult to reconcile with one another. Ministries, depending on who controls them, often have an incentive either to reduce or to inflate figures." The FT adds, "There had been fears that the execution of Saddam Hussein on Saturday would lead to an upsurge in violence, but a resident of a mixed Sunni-Shia neighbourhood told the Financial Times that the Eid holiday since the weekend had brought a lull. However, he expected the battle to resume shortly."

The Los Angeles Times (1/3, Hennessy-Fiske, 850K) reports, "The surge in civilian fatalities has been attributed largely to the rising tide of sectarian violence in Baghdad and beyond. ... Many believe the Iraqi government underestimates civilian casualties. The United Nations, for example, estimates that 100 Iraqis die in violence daily. On the other hand, an Interior Ministry spokesman said Tuesday that the latest figures were too high."

Diyala Province Becomes "Tinderbox." Under the headline "A Promising Iraqi Province Is Now A Tinderbox," the Los Angeles Times (1/3, Moore, 850K) reports, "When US forces killed the leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq, Abu Musab Zarqawi, six months ago in a village near here, they hoped security would improve in this strategic province just north of Baghdad. Instead, security has collapsed in Diyala province, which now ranks as one of Iraq's most troubled regions. Insurgent attacks have more than doubled in the last year. ... Assassinations have claimed the lives of mayors, tribal chieftains, police officials and judges. ... Many government officials here sleep on cots in their offices because driving home is too dangerous." US and Iraqi officials "blamed the sharp downturn on a combination of US neglect and abuses by the Iraqi army."

Ignatius Fears Abandonment Of Iraqis Who Helped US. Washington Post (1/3, A19, 690K) columnist David Ignatius writes, "However long the United States stays in Iraq and whatever success it achieves there, we should agree we have a moral responsibility to the Iraqis who risked their lives and families to be America's allies." Ignatius cites the undesirable precedent of Vietnam: "America's ragged withdrawal from Vietnam was chronicled by Frank Snepp, a CIA analyst in Saigon at the time." The CIA's Vietnamese employees "were, in practical terms, left to die." That said, Vietnamese who fled "are among our nation's great success stories ... one of the worst effects of the [Iraq] war is that it is destroying the educated middle class of Iraq -- driving doctors, teachers and business people into desperate exile. When Iraq comes back together some day, will these educated Iraqis be America's friends, or will they despise us? Whatever we do in Iraq in coming months, it should include a bipartisan commitment to keep faith with the people who risked everything for a new Iraq -- by making room for them in America, if necessary."

Former CNN Exec Challenges AP To Authenticate Iraqi Source. Fox News' Special Report (1/2, Hume) reported, "A former top executive at CNN is calling out the Associated Press saying he could find no evidence that one of its top Iraqi sources actually exists. Eason Jordan, who runs a website devoted to Iraq news, said neither he or anyone trying to track down Iraqi police captain Jamil Hussein have been able to turn up a family member, friend, or colleague, and the A.P. isn't helping. A spokesman says Hussein, who has been quoted in dozens of A.P. stories and is often critical of the U.S., is someone they had talked to for years, but they would not respond to the U.S. demands to prove his existence."

Civilians Answer Call To Serve In Iraq. The Washington Post's (1/3, D1, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports that generally, "federal agencies prefer to rely on volunteers like Needham and Walsh for duty in war zones," but "with the Iraq war in its fourth year, there has been some concern that the ranks of civil service volunteers are growing thin." The Post adds that while the "Iraq Study Group," recommended "that agencies order civilian employees to fill key jobs in Iraq if not enough volunteers step forward," American Federation of Government Employees president John Gage, "questions how civil service employees could be ordered to Iraq when the violence in Baghdad makes it exceedingly difficult to move around and perform jobs."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Timing Of Apple Options Led To Windfalls. The Los Angeles Times (1/3, Chmielewski) reports, "In August 1997, Apple Computer Inc. handed four top executives options to buy a total of nearly 1 million shares. The next day, the value of those options jumped a staggering 48%, or $7.7 million. … This was no coincidence, according to a shareholder lawsuit filed against executives and directors of the Cupertino, Calif.-based company in federal court in Northern California. Rather, the options were granted to coincide with good news that would give the four executives an overnight windfall." The Times continues, "The stock soared when co-founder Steve Jobs announced that Apple's sworn enemy, Microsoft Corp., threw the struggling company a life raft in the form of a $150-million cash infusion. In exchange, Apple gave Microsoft a stake in the company and agreed to use the software giant's Web browser on its Mac personal computers. … The investment rocked the high-tech world at the time but became only a footnote in the astonishing comeback of a company as celebrated today for its marketing and design prowess as Nike, Prada or Mercedes-Benz. … But the grants are an example of the fast-and-loose practices that went unchecked in a corporate culture fashioned by Jobs to revive Apple, which by 1997 was hemorrhaging money, according to the lawsuit, a combination of 11 shareholder complaints." The Times adds, "Filed days before Christmas, it alleges that Apple engaged in widespread manipulation of option grants to allow employees to buy shares at low prices. Apple "spring-loaded" options in advance of good news and "backdated" other grants to days when the stock traded at low prices to create an automatic paper profit, claims the suit, which has only recently come to light. … On Friday, Apple absolved Jobs of wrongdoing after a three-month internal investigation of its option practices.

The company, however, acknowledged 6,428 instances of improperly dating option grants over a six-year period, when it had 'insufficient safeguards' to prevent stock manipulation, according to a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission. The first incident occurred on Dec. 29, 1997, just a few months after Jobs had returned to the company and taken the title of 'interim' chief executive. … The company's admissions have raised new questions among securities lawyers and corporate governance experts about Jobs' role in the controversy."

Forecasters See Tough Year Ahead For CEOs. The Financial Times (1/3, Guerrera) reports, "American chief executives are bracing themselves for a tough year, with corporate governance issues, shareholder activism, and a more difficult operating environment likely to test their leadership and business skills." The Times continues, "Corporate experts predict that US chief executives will see their once undisputed authority further eroded in 2007 by the growing desire from institutional and retail investors to have a bigger influence on company matters." The Times adds, "Over the past year, this trend has been strengthened by the explosion of the options backdating scandal, increased shareholder anger at lavish executive compensation and attacks from activist hedge funds. … 'The pressure is not going to relent on CEOs in 2007,' says John Challenger of the recruitment firm Challenger Gray & Christmas. 'The days of the imperial chief executive are over.'" The Times notes, "The increased pressure on America's corporate leaders has led to unprecedented levels of chief executive turnover. In 2006, more than 1,340 US chief executives left their jobs – the highest on record – according to Mr Challenger's firm. … The options backdating scandal, which has engulfed more than 180 companies, has forced more than 15 chief executives to resign and more could follow. … The controversy – coupled with more investor scrutiny of executive pay and the ongoing impact of the Sarbanes-Oxley legislation – are rapidly changing the US's corporate governance landscape."

More Commentary. In his column for the Wall Street Journal (1/3, A12), Holman W. Jenkins, Jr., writes, "The markets have finally had their say about the wonderfully overblown backdating scandal. When Apple filed its latest mea culpa on Friday along with a board expression of confidence in Steve Jobs's leadership, the company's shares jumped four bucks. Message: The market doesn't give a hoot about backdating. It gives a hoot whether Mr. Jobs might be run out of his job." Jenkins continues, "This ought to cast a light on whether the drop in market prices of companies in the backdating scandal reflects the shock and horror of investors at the details of backdating -- or shock and horror at the meal that trial lawyers, prosecutors and the media are making of companies caught up in this episode. … Whether Mr. Jobs is safely out of woods remains to be seen. It didn't help that just a week earlier, the Associated Press reported that SEC Chairman Chris Cox has been averring that, in sorting through dozens of backdating cases, his agency would save its legal firepower for 'cases of serious fraud, with elements such as deliberately lying or forging documents.' … Uh oh. In granting Mr. Jobs options on 7.5 million shares, somebody at Apple pencil-whipped a technical requirement of a board meeting to approve the grant. Of course, Mr. Jobs was already a billionaire. Does anybody think he engaged in theft to pad his net worth by a faction of a percent?" Jenkins concludes, "Now, not all CEOs are as pivotal to a company's performance as Mr. Jobs is perceived to be, but this has nothing to do with the CEO pay calculus. All CEOs sit at the switch: They make the calls by which shareholder wealth is preserved or squandered. Should a company sacrifice short-term profits in order to invest more in customer service? Should it embark on a bold product redesign or milk an aging product line a bit longer? … The market wants a CEO in whom it has confidence, and who is responsive to the share price. The media's relentless appetite is for evidence that CEO pay fails the 'fairness heuristic.' This basic disjunction is why one of the signal phenomena of the age, the towering increase in executive compensation, remains unexplained to the American people despite the massive amount of journalism spent on subjects like backdating."

Former Enron Accounting Head Causey Heads For Prison. The Washington Post/Bloomberg (1/3, D1, Calkins) reports, "Richard A. Causey, Enron's former chief accounting officer, was on his way Tuesday to a federal prison in Bastrop, Tex., to begin a 5 1/2 -year sentence for his role in the fraud that destroyed the company." Bloomberg continues, "Causey, 46, pleaded guilty to one count of securities fraud in December 2005, less than a month before he was to stand trial with former Enron chief executives Jeffrey K. Skilling and Kenneth L. Lay, both of whom were found guilty. … 'A lot of improper things were done at Enron,' Causey said as he was sentenced in November. 'Some of those were done by me, and for that I am profoundly sorry.'" Bloomberg adds, "Causey was the last of 16 former executives to plead guilty to crimes at Enron, which was the world's largest energy-trading company before it went bankrupt in December 2001 as widespread accounting fraud came to light. … More than 5,000 jobs and $1 billion in employee pensions were wiped out when Enron collapsed. Investors are suing to recover more than $30 billion. … Causey was assigned to the prison he requested. Bastrop is three hours from his home in Houston, where Enron was based, and 30 miles from Austin, where the oldest of his three children attends college."

Cox, Frank Take Diverse Approaches To Financial Issues. The Washington Post (1/3, Johnson, 690K) reports that from their "years at Harvard Law School to their tenure in the House of Representatives, Barney Frank and Christopher Cox chose markedly different approaches to reach their destinations." Their paths "cross again as Frank, a Massachusetts Democrat, assumes control of the House Financial Services Committee, which oversees the Securities and Exchange Commission -- led by Cox, a former Republican lawmaker from California." Despite "similar resumes, the men could hardly be more divergent in ideology and personal style." Frank's "support for predatory-lending reforms, minimum-wage increases and universal health care mark him as one of the most left-leaning lawmakers on Capitol Hill." Cox "cut his teeth in the Reagan White House, and his votes in Congress earned him an 87 percent lifetime rating from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce before he became chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission." Already, "they have clashed over a change to an SEC rule that some investor advocates say will reduce disclosure of executive pay in the form of certain stock awards."

Sarbanes-Oxley Act Seen As Counterproductive. In a New York Times (1/3, 1.16M) op-ed, William Niskanen of the Cato Institute says while the Sarbanes-Oxley Act "was surely well intentioned," it has "proven counterproductive in the extreme, and Congress would best honor the departing lawmakers by repealing it. Sarbanes-Oxley has seriously harmed American corporations and financial markets without increasing investor confidence. The section of the law requiring companies to perform internal audits has turned out to be far more costly than proponents projected, especially for smaller firms. These costs have led some small companies to go private, hardly a victory for public oversight, and some foreign firms to withdraw their stocks from American exchanges."

CRIMINAL LAW:

FBI Subpoenas Records Of Investment Firm Connected To Bruno. The New York Daily News (1/3, Mahoney, 729K) reports, "The FBI has subpoenaed an investment firm for documents related to state Senate Majority Leader Joe Bruno in a widening probe of the state's top Republican, the Daily News learned yesterday. A source familiar with the investigation said the firm, McGinn, Smith & Co. of Albany, is 'one of the groups Sen. Bruno did consulting for' through his own business." The Daily News notes, "The FBI is also reviewing subpoenaed documents relating to land transactions made by now-dissolved First Grafton Corp., a real estate investment firm that Bruno helped to start, as well as plane rides arranged for Bruno by a wealthy friend, Jared Abbruzzese, sources said.

FBI Investigating Murder Of Arizona Tribal Chairwoman's Brother. The Arizona Daily Star (1/3, McCombs, 128K) reports, "The FBI is investigating the New Year's Day death of the brother of the chairwoman of the Pascua Yaqui Tribe as a homicide, an FBI spokeswoman in Phoenix said Tuesday. Gabriel Frias, the 32-year-old brother of chairwoman Herminia Frias, died from shotgun blast to the midsection, an autopsy performed Tuesday by the Pima County Medical Examiner's Office revealed, said Deborah McCarley, an FBI spokeswoman in Phoenix." The Daily Star adds, "The FBI remained tight lipped about the events leading up to the shooting, possible suspects or motives, citing the need to protect the ongoing investigation, McCarley said. They haven't arrested anyone, she said."

New Orleans Police Officers Surrender For Booking On Murder Charges. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (1/3, Maggi, McCarthy) reports, "Surrounded by colleagues offering hugs, handshakes and shouts of support, seven New Orleans police officers walked into central lock-up Tuesday morning to be booked on murder and attempted murder charges, stemming from their shooting of six people a week after Hurricane Katrina. Steady applause broke out as the officers, accompanied by their attorneys and union representatives, began the slow march to jail." However, "not everyone offered comfort: A handful of protesters, marching outside the ring of support, pronounced the officers guilty and called them terrorists and thugs. And shouts from inside the jail could be heard on the street below — a handful of voices screaming out obscenities and warnings.

Gulf Coast Officials Warn Homeowners Of Hurricane Repair Scams. USA Today (1/3, Heath, 2.27M) reports, "Officials along the Gulf Coast are warning homeowners that they will likely face a wave of contractor scams in the coming months as they begin collecting billions of dollars in government grants to rebuild what Hurricane Katrina destroyed. Mississippi has hired six investigators to target schemes aimed at recipients. Louisiana will send out vans to warn consumers about scams and take complaints. Both states are filling the airwaves with warnings about common schemes, and regularly warn aid recipients to research contractors and put work agreements in writing." USA notes, "Officials expect contracting schemes will make up the next wave of fraud, in part because taking money from homeowners is already proving far less complicated than scamming the government-run grants, Mississippi State Auditor Phil Bryant says."

New Jersey Panel Recommends Abolishing Death Penalty. The New York Times (1/3, Mansnerus, 1.16M) reports a legislative commission "recommended on Tuesday that New Jersey become the first state to abolish the death penalty since states began reinstating their capital punishment laws 35 years ago." The commission report "found 'no compelling evidence' that capital punishment serves a legitimate purpose, and increasing evidence that it 'is inconsistent with evolving standards of decency.'" Death penalty experts "said that New Jersey was the first state to receive an official recommendation that capital punishment be abandoned, and it lands in a state where legislators have a Democratic majority along with a Democratic governor who supports repeal of the statute." There is "ample opposition to capital punishment in both houses of the Legislature, and Senate President Richard J. Codey said in an interview that he expected to ask for a vote, although he would not discuss a timetable."

The AP (1/3, Hester) reports, "The report, obtained by The Associated Press, found no compelling evidence that New Jersey's death penalty, which has not been used in more than four decades, serves any purpose. … It also found abolishing the death penalty would eliminate the danger of executing an innocent person, and said the death penalty costs taxpayers more than prisoners serving life terms without parole." The AP notes, "One member of the group, former Senator John F. Russo, who wrote the state's death penalty statute when executions were reinstated in 1982, dissented from the commission's findings. … The 13-member commission was formed earlier this year to study capital punishment in a state that has not executed anyone since 1963. Nine men are on death row in New Jersey, but the legislation that created the commission imposed a moratorium on executions until 60 days after the panel completed its work. No execution was imminent when the moratorium was imposed."

US Helps North Carolina Prosecutors In Child Sex Cases. The AP (1/3) reports, "Until the (North Carolina) Legislature changes prison sentences for people who distribute child pornography, local prosecutors are getting help from federal officials in putting pedophiles in prison." The AP continues, "Investigators in Harnett County discovered 228 video clips and 124 still photos of child pornography - including some involving a toddler - on Christopher Paul Brady's computer. … In state court, the 31-year-old Brady received three years of supervised probation. … 'I got the most I could get,' said Assistant District Attorney Mary Wilson. .. But federal prosecutors stepped in and charged the Lillington man with trafficking in child pornography. After being convicted, Brady was sentenced to more than 15 years in prison. … 'We're saving some people some trauma. We're going to get a good sentence,' said Assistant U.S. Attorney Jay Exum, who works with prosecutors on child pornography cases in eastern North Carolina." The AP notes, "Exum works under Project Safe Childhood, a U.S. Justice Department program which was started last year and aims to put pedophiles in prison on lengthy sentences. … FBI statistics show child pornography and exploitation cases increased nationally from 113 in 1996 to 2,135 last year and prosecutors have seen a similar increase in cases coming to court - from 344 in 1995 to 1,576 in 2005. … The state Legislature convenes Jan. 24 and one task is to seek tougher penalties for child pornography charges. State law currently gives prison time to people who make child pornography, but a special legislative committee recommended tougher sentences."

Texas Professor Sues Federal Government, Seeks Information On Drug-Related Case. The El Paso Times (1/2) reported a University of Texas, El Paso professor "is suing the federal government hoping to force the release of documents surrounding the case of 'Lalo,' the former Immigration and Customs Enforcement informant involved in drug-related murders in Juárez. Bill Weaver, an associate professor of political science at UTEP, filed the suit in mid-November against the Drug Enforcement Administration and the Department of Justice because the agencies did not answer his Freedom of Information Act requests from 2005, court documents showed." The professor "said he wants to use the information for an upcoming book."

Attorney Pleads For Life Of Man Convicted In Human Smuggling Deaths. The AP (1/3, Lozano) reports from Houston, "A truck driver convicted for his role in the deadliest immigrant smuggling attempt in the U.S. should not be sentenced to death because he is not the 'worst of the worst,' his defense attorney told jurors Tuesday. … But prosecutors said Tyrone Williams, 35, a Jamaican citizen living in New York state, should be executed because he committed a deliberate act of violence in a depraved manner that resulted in the deaths of 19 illegal immigrants trapped inside a sweltering tractor-trailer. … 'The only justifiable punishment in this case should be death,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Rodriguez said." The AP continues, "After a nearly monthlong break due to the illness of an attorney and the holidays, the punishment phase in Williams' retrial resumed on Tuesday with opening statements. … Williams was convicted on Dec. 4 for his role in the May 2003 deaths of the illegal immigrants, who succumbed to the deadly heat in the back of his tractor-trailer as he was smuggling them from southern Texas to Houston. … Jurors now have to decide if Williams, who was convicted on all 58 counts of conspiracy, harboring and transporting, should be sentenced to death or up to life in prison."

Number Of Minority Coaches In NCAA Division I-A Grows To Seven. USA Today (1/3, O'Toole) reports, "Floyd Keith isn't ready to proclaim great strides when it comes to hiring minority head football coaches in NCAA Division I-A. But with two moves already this month, the executive director of the Black Coaches Association said Wednesday that he is encouraged by what is happening. … 'At the end of the day I still have to wait and see where the numbers end up,' he said. 'With two I-A hires, that brings it to seven, which, if there is one more hire, would equal the most.'" USA continues, "Mario Cristobal, who is Cuban-American, was hired at Florida International, and Randy Shannon, who is African-American, was hired at Miami (Fla.). They join five other current I-A minority head coaches. In 1998 there were eight. As recently as the 2005 season there were three. Eighteen of the 119 jobs in I-A have opened this season, with all but three filled." USA adds, "Keith's organization began issuing an annual report card on hiring practice in 2004 as a way to bring pressure on schools to at least consider minority candidates. The group also wants recruits and their families to consider a school's BCA grade before signing. .. The grade emphasizes minorities brought into the interview process as well as those hired. The third report card, which grades individual schools, was issued in September."

Massachusetts Lawmakers Keep Gay Marriage Amendment Alive. The AP (1/3, Leblanc) reports that in a "suspense-filled final day of the legislative session, Massachusetts lawmakers kept alive a proposed constitutional amendment Tuesday that would put a stop to gay marriage in the only state that allows same-sex couples to wed." With a "combination of parliamentary maneuvering, flip-flopping and brinksmanship, lawmakers gave the first round of approval necessary for the amendment to appear on the ballot in 2008. The measure still needs the endorsement of the next legislative session." If the amendment "makes it onto the ballot and residents approve it, it will leave Massachusetts' 8,000 existing gay marriages intact but ban any new ones."

The New York Times (1/3, Belluck, 1.16M) reports the amendment "now requires the approval of at least 50 legislators in another vote in the 2007-8 session. Then it would be placed on the November 2008 ballot as a referendum question." The "swiftness of the vote on Tuesday surprised people on both sides of the issue, taking place without any debate, just minutes after the constitutional convention had been gaveled into session. Proponents of the amendment needed just 50 of the legislature's 200 lawmakers to support it; the final vote was 61 in favor of the amendment and 132 opposed."

The Washington Post (1/3, A3, Powell, Shulman, 690K) reports Massachusetts legislators "approved a measure yesterday that next year could allow voters to overturn a historic same-sex marriage law in the only state in the nation where such unions are legal." Glen Lavy, "a senior counsel with the Alliance Defense Fund, which strongly favors banning same-sex marriage," said, "It's in the best interests of children and society for marriage to be defined as between a man and woman. The battle to preserve marriage in Massachusetts as between a man and a woman is alive and well." The Post adds, "Yesterday's vote fell like a hammer on gay-rights advocates, who have fought a half-decade-long war to gain the right to same-sex marriage in Massachusetts."

The Washington Times (1/3, Wetzstein, 88K) reports "yesterday's votes brought relief to supporters." Kris Mineau, "president of the Massachusetts Family Institute and spokesman for VoteOnMarriage.org, which led the 2005 petition drive that garnered 170,000 signatures in favor of the amendment," said, "Today's victory is about restoring the integrity and authority of the people's constitutional right to petition their government."

ANTITRUST:

Korean Antitrust Authorities Scrutinizing Qualcomm. The New York Times (1/3, Sang-Hun) reports, "The South Korean antitrust agency has formed a task force to investigate the licensing and business practices of the wireless technology company Qualcomm, the latest in a string of legal battles for the company, officials said on Tuesday." The Times continues, "In Japan, Europe and the United States, Qualcomm, which is based in San Diego, faces accusations by rivals that it has abused its market dominance in wireless technology to demand excessive royalties and block fair competition." The Times adds, "Qualcomm is known for developing code-division multiple access, or CDMA, wireless technology, which is a rival standard to the global system for mobile communications, or GSM, technology. It makes money by selling chips that power cellphones, as well as collecting royalties or licensing its technology to other chip makers and cellphone manufacturers. … The creation of a task force, which is modeled after the one investigating antitrust complaints against Microsoft, means that the case in question merits a full-blown investigation, said Na Yang-ju, a spokesman for the South Korean antitrust watchdog agency, the Fair Trade Commission. … But commission officials also acknowledged that the case against Qualcomm was more complicated than they had expected. A year ago, the commission ruled that Microsoft was guilty of breaching fair trade rules, a decision the company is appealing."

Defunct Online Movie Distributor Sues Leading Tech Firms. The New York Times (1/3, Markoff, Helft) reports, "In 1997, Jonathan T. Taplin, a veteran film and television producer, stood up at a cable industry convention and asserted that in the future all movies would be distributed over the Internet. He recalls being laughed out of the room." The Times continues, "Mr. Taplin may laugh last. Online distribution of movies has arrived, at places like Apple Computer's iTunes Store. And even though Mr. Taplin's own video-on-demand company, Intertainer, shut down operations five years ago, it says it deserves some credit — and cash. … Last week, Intertainer filed a broad lawsuit asserting that Apple, Google and Napster are infringing on a 2005 patent that covers the commercial distribution of audio and video over the Internet." The Times adds, "Founded by Mr. Taplin and two other Hollywood entertainment executives in 1996, Intertainer developed technology to distribute movies on demand through cable and phone lines for viewing on televisions and personal computers. It gained investors including Intel, Microsoft, Sony, NBC and Comcast. … Theodore Stevenson, a partner at McKool Smith, the Dallas firm representing Intertainer, said the company filed suit against Apple, Google and Napster because they were perceived as leaders in the market for digital downloads. He declined to specify the damages that Intertainer was seeking." The Times notes, "Intertainer's tale is somewhat different than other intellectual property suits brought by technology licensing firms. By 2002 the company seemed to have a growing business, with 125,000 Internet subscribers for its servers and 35,000 TV subscribers through the Comcast cable system. … But in the fall of 2002, the company shut down its service and filed a lawsuit against some of the backers of Movielink, a competitor backed by five Hollywood studios, including Sony, Universal and Warner Brother. At the time Mr. Taplin said the studios were using Movielink as a price-fixing vehicle to kill Intertainer. … An antitrust investigation by the Justice Department into Movielink was dropped in 2004."

Nucor To Purchase Harris Steel Of Canada For $1.07 Billion. The New York Times/AP (1/3) reports, "The Nucor Corporation, the maker of steel products, said Tuesday that it had agreed to acquire the Harris Steel Group of Canada for $1.07 billion." The AP continues, "Nucor, which makes steel from recycled metal at its minimill operations across the United States, said the deal would broaden its geographic reach and give it opportunities to grow. … Nucor bid 46.25 Canadian dollars ($39.69) for each Harris Steel share, a 6 percent premium over the Friday closing price of 43.49 Canadian dollars ($37.32) for Harris shares on the Toronto Stock Exchange." The AP adds, "The deal requires regulatory approval in the United States and Canada. Nucor, which is based in Charlotte, plans to allow Harris Steel to operate as a separate, wholly owned subsidiary once the deal is completed. … Nucor, which has operations in 18 states, expects the acquisition to bolster earnings immediately."

The Wall Street Journal (1/3, A3, Glader) reports, "With its $1.07 billion acquisition of Harris Steel Group Inc. in Canada, Nucor Corp. is breaking from its nonunion tradition and offering a glimpse of where it sees growth in the steel industry." The Journal continues, "The move by the Charlotte, N.C., steelmaker also answers a question that has followed Nucor and other steelmakers: where to invest sizable cash reserves from three years of strong steel prices? With this deal, Nucor shows it sees opportunity in finishing steel products for its customers and in distribution rather than adding steelmaking capacity." The Journal adds, "The deal comes amid rising concern by some in the steel industry over the potential for raw steelmaking overcapacity. Nucor had said fourth-quarter earnings would be less than expected because of lower shipments and prices. … While many large steel companies are buying other primary steelmakers around the world, Nucor -- which had $1.69 billion in cash on its balance sheet in the third quarter -- is focusing its investment and growth largely in North America's manufacturing infrastructure. Nucor said it sees the construction market growing, with increasing demand for bridges, tunnels, airports and hospitals. … Harris -- which fabricates steel into reinforced steel bar, platform grating and wire mesh for construction products ranging from bridges to airports and stadiums -- serves that market. "

Seminole Tribe's Purchase Of Hard Rock Challenged. The Wall Street Journal (1/3, B3) reports, "Baltimore development firm Cordish Co. and affiliate Power Plant Entertainment LLC filed suit in Broward County Circuit Court in Florida, claiming the Seminole Tribe of Florida was able to buy the Hard Rock chain of cafes and casinos through collusion and bid rigging." The Journal continues, "The plaintiffs allege Hard Rock Cafe International Inc. management secretly negotiated with the Seminoles for seven months before plans to sell were announced in July.

DOJ_NMG_0110391

Power Plant, a partnership between Cordish and Coastal Development LLC, was the original developer of two Seminole Hard Rock casinos and hotels in Tampa and Hollywood, Florida." The Journal adds, "The Seminoles last month agreed to buy the chain for $965 million from the U.K.'s Rank Group PLC. In a statement, the Seminoles accused Cordish of being 'a sore loser' and insisted the deal went through 'a lengthy and open bidding process.' They said the lawsuit 'has no merit.' Rank Group shareholders are scheduled Monday to vote on the sale."

NYTimes Calls On Congress To Pass Net Neutrality. The New York Times (1/3, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "One of the big winners in the last election may turn out to be the principle, known as net neutrality, that Internet service providers should not be able to favor some content over others. Democrats who are moving into the majority in Congress — led by Ron Wyden in the Senate and Edward Markey in the House — say they plan to fight hard to pass a net neutrality bill, and we hope that they do. It is vital to preserve the Internet's role in promoting entrepreneurship and free expression." Cable and telephone companies "are talking, however, about creating a two-tiered Internet with a fast lane and a slow lane. Companies that pay hefty fees would have their Web pages delivered to Internet users in the current speedy fashion. Companies and individuals that do not would be relegated to the slow lane. Creating these sorts of tiers would destroy the democratic quality of the Internet. Big, wealthy voices would start to overpower the smaller, poorer ones. Innovation would be threatened if start-ups and small companies could not afford the new fees."

Judge To Decide Oklahoma Land Dispute. The AP (1/3) reports from El Reno, OK, "A federal judge in Washington will decide whether the federal government wrongfully took about 7,000 acres of land belonging to the Cheyenne-Arapaho Tribes of Oklahoma." The AP continues, "Attorneys for the Cheyenne-Arapaho filed an 18-page response on Friday to the government's motion to dismiss the tribes' lawsuit over the land. The tribes want to do oil exploration on the land and use it for development of retail, offices and possibly a casino, Cheyenne-Arapaho Gov. Darrell Flyingman said. … 'It's valuable land,' he said. 'There's hundreds of oil and gas wells right around Fort Reno. That's one of the reasons they're trying to keep it.'" The AP adds, "According to the government, which is seeking to dismiss the tribes' lawsuit, the Cheyenne-Arapaho claim on the land died in 1891, when the reservation was allotted and the tribes signed an agreement ceding the remaining 400,000 acres, which then were opened to non-Indian settlement. … The tribes received 2 cents per acre in 1891, then $15 million more in 1965 after filing a lawsuit under the Indian Claims Commission Act, which was designed to correct past injustices in land dealings with Indian tribes. .. The tribes say the payment covered the rest of the old reservation, excluding the Fort Reno land."

US Changes Prosecution Timetable In Ohio Reactor Case. The Toledo Blade (OH) (1/3, Henry) reports, "Federal prosecutors veered off their timetable for having criminal charges against two former Davis-Besse engineers and a contractor heard in U.S. District Court by the end of this fall - partly because of the complexity of the case, and partly because of recent finger-pointing among the trio. … The case now may be split into at least two trials." The Blade continues, "Defendants Andrew Siemaszko, of Spring, Texas; David Geisen, of DePere, Wis., and Rodney N. Cook, of Millington, Tenn., face up to five years in prison and $250,000 in fines if convicted on charges of making false statements to a federal agency. … Mr. Siemaszko and Mr. Geisen are former Davis-Besse engineers. Mr. Cook is a contractor who had been associated with the Ottawa County nuclear plant for years." The Blade adds, "Each is accused of jeopardizing northern Ohio's safety five years ago by lying about Davis-Besse's old reactor head when the Nuclear Regulatory Commission was debating whether the plant was too dangerous to keep operating in the fall of 2001. … The NRC, based on what it learned in subsequent months, said acid melted so much steel off the massive lid that it nearly blew open and allowed radioactive steam to form in containment for the first time since the partial meltdown of Three Mile Island Unit 2 in 1979. … The agency ultimately said there's no question FirstEnergy Corp., in hindsight, should have shut down the plant at least six weeks earlier than it did on Feb. 16, 2002."

Energy Independence A Central Theme Of Bush's State Of The Union Speech. The Financial Times (1/3, Daniel) reports, "Energy will be a central theme of President George W. Bush's state of the union speech this month, as it was in last year's address when he briefly caught national attention with the claim that the country was 'addicted to oil.'" Yet, "his critics doubt that he will do much more than call for more spending on alternative fuels, and again fail to embrace international efforts to agree a post-Kyoto regime to tackle greenhouse emissions." One "senior energy industry lobbyist" said, "Energy policy has been the creation of Congress. Almost anything Bush says in the speech is irrelevant the day after he says it." But one senior Administration official rejected that, saying, "It's a lot more than rhetorical: what was done with the 2005 act was substantial." And "Al Hubbard, chairman of the National Economic Council, who is co-ordinating White House energy policy, has also raised expectations. In a speech at De Pauw University he predicted 'headlines above the fold that will knock your socks off in terms of our commitment to energy independence.'"

US Dependence On OPEC Soars As Angola Enters Cartel. The Financial Times (1/3, Crooks, Blas) reports US dependence on OPEC "for its oil imports has risen to its highest level in 15 years, following Angola's arrival this week as the 12th member of the oil producers' group." Angola's entry "comes at a time when Opec is trying to exert more influence, as seen in its decision at the December meeting to cut 500,000 barrels a day from its output from February." Angola "is particularly significant because it is one of the fastest-growing producers." But its "entry into Opec is unlikely to have much impact on the price of oil. It has yet to agree a production limit with the group, and Opec officials have suggested that its planned production increase is likely to be accommodated by the group."

New Maryland AG Pledges To Crack Down On Bay Polluters. The Washington Post (1/3, B4, Rich) reports, "Douglas F. Gansler, Montgomery County's longtime prosecutor, pledged an 'all-out assault' on those who pollute the Chesapeake Bay as he was sworn into office yesterday as Maryland's first new attorney general in two decades." The Post continues, "In the Senate's marbled chamber in Annapolis, where the outgoing Republican governor administered the oath of office, Gansler, a Democrat, ticked off a list of the estuary's environmental woes. He cited swimming bans at Sandy Point State Park in Annapolis and declining oyster harvests, saying, 'Some fish don't even know if they're boys or girls anymore -- it's gotten that bad. … We're going to wage an all-out assault on those who pollute our air and water,' Gansler said." The Post adds, "The pledges echoed campaign promises that helped carry Gansler to a comfortable victory in November in his bid to fill the seat left vacant by J. Joseph Curran Jr., a fellow Democrat who, after two decades as the state's chief legal officer, decided not to run for another term. … Gansler, 44, had been Montgomery state's attorney since 1998. He drew attention last year by winning convictions against John Allen Muhammad and Lee Boyd Malvo, the snipers who terrorized the region in 2002. … Despite the dire proclamations about the health of the bay, yesterday's ceremony in many respects had the feeling of a family affair. Gansler spoke of his wife, Laura, and their two sons, who, he jokingly said, did not understand the concept of spending $2 million to win a job that pays $125,000 a year."

Feds, States At Odds Over Paying For Forest Fire Fighting. The New York Times (1/3, Johnson, 1.16M) reports, "The steeply rising cost of preventing and suppressing wildfires, which burned more of the American landscape in 2006 than in any other year since at least 1960, is creating a rift between Washington and state and local governments over how the burden ought to be shouldered." A study "issued in November by the inspector general's office of the United States Department of Agriculture, the parent agency of the Forest Service, said the nature of the wildfire threat was changing as private homes and communities pushed ever closer to the boundaries of once-remote public lands. Those communities and landowners, rather than federal taxpayers, should have to pay for more of their own fire protection, the report concluded." But states and local governments "are gearing up to fight back in Congress, arguing that decades of federal mismanagement of national forests and open spaces, not development, created the threat and that little communities with few resources are neither responsible for it nor equipped to make a difference."

Mayfield Leaving Government With Warning Of Impending Natural Disaster. The Los Angeles Times (1/3, Williams, 850K) reports National Hurricane Center chief Max Mayfield will end his 34-year government career tomorrow, and he is "more convinced than ever that US residents of the Southeast are risking unprecedented tragedy by continuing to build vulnerable homes in the tropical storm zone and failing to plan escape routes. … 'We're eventually going to get a strong enough storm in a densely populated area to have a major disaster,' he said. 'I know people don't want to hear this, and I'm generally a very positive person, but we're setting ourselves up for this major disaster.'" Mayfield, who "hopes to launch a second career as a consultant in emergency planning and disaster response," says the US lacks "the political will to make and impose hard decisions on building codes and land use in the face of resistance from the influential building industry and a public still willing to gamble that the big one will never hit."

Administration Criticized For Listing Polar Bear As Threatened. The Wall Street Journal (1/3, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "Unless you've been hibernating for the winter, you have no doubt heard the many alarms about global warming. Now even the Bush Administration is getting into the act, at least judging from last week's decision by Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne to recommend that the majestic polar bear be listed as 'threatened' under the Endangered Species Act. The closer you inspect this decision, however, the more it looks like the triumph of politics over science." It "also turns out that most of the alarm over the polar bear's future stems from a single, peer-reviewed study, which found that the bear population had declined by some 250, or 25%, in Western Hudson Bay in the last decade. But the polar bear's range is far more extensive than Hudson Bay. A 2002 U.S. Geological Survey of wildlife in the Arctic Refuge Coastal Plain concluded that the ice bear populations 'may now be near historic highs.'"

Wal-Mart Praised For Pushing Fluorescent Light Bulbs. The New York Times (1/3, 1.16M) says in an editorial that it is "great news that Wal-Mart is putting its considerable heft behind one of the easiest ways to reduce energy consumption and the production of global-warming gases: the corkscrew-shaped light bulbs of the future." Switching from familiar bulbs to longer-lasting, energy-saving compact fluorescent lamps makes sense economically and environmentally." Wal-Mart "is pushing to sell 100 million compact fluorescents a year. Because they use 75 percent less electricity, that would save customers $3 billion on their electricity bills and save the world from 20 million metric tons of greenhouse gases."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

In Florida, Attorney Claims Agents Used "Coercive Tactics" Against Client. The Tampa Tribune (1/3) reports Scott Schweickert's attorney "is asking a judge to block the prosecution from introducing at trial Schweickert's statements about how he helped Steven Lorenzo drug, sexually torture and kill two men. Defense attorney Pedro Amador argues in court papers that Schweickert's statements 'were made as a result of coercive tactics employed by government agents.' … Schweickert faces a federal trial next week on charges of conspiracy and drug facilitated crimes of violence." According to an arrest affidavit Schweickert "was interviewed by U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration Agent Scott A. Albrecht and other detectives on May 10 and 19 in 2005, after being advised of his Miranda rights."

Arizona Called Gateway For Marijuana Smuggling. The Arizona Republic (1/2) reported Arizona "is gaining another dubious distinction: marijuana smuggling gateway. The Border Patrol said agents seized over 331 tons (662,650 pounds) of marijuana worth $530 million last fiscal year, ending Sept. 30. That set a record for the fifth straight year. It nearly equaled the 350 tons seized in California, Texas and New Mexico combined."

The AP (1/3) reports that since Oct. 1, agents "have seized more than 106 tons of pot worth $170 million. That's nearly 20 tons more than the same period the previous year."

In a report similar to the AP's the Arizona Daily Star (1/2) wrote that agents with the U.S. Border Patrol "have seized a record amount of marijuana from smugglers along the Arizona-Mexico border for the fifth year in a row."

City Council In California Considers Banning Marijuana Dispensaries. The AP (1/2) reported Azusa "is poised to join several others across California in banning medical marijuana dispensaries. The City Council planned to vote Tuesday on an ordinance designed to prohibit the so-called 'pot clubs.' Officials approved the new rule unanimously on its first reading last month." Advocates for the clubs "say regulating them is more effective than banning them."

Federal Government's Drug Use Statistics Criticized. In a New York Times op-ed (1/3), Mike Males says, "When releasing last week's Monitoring the Future survey on drug use, John P. Walters, the director of the Office of National Drug Control Policy, boasted that 'broad' declines in teenage drug use promise 'enormous beneficial consequences not only for our children now, but for the rest of their lives.' Actually, anybody who has looked carefully at the report and other recent federal studies would see a dramatically different picture: skyrocketing illicit drug abuse and related deaths among teenagers and adults alike." According to "the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, the number of Americans dying from the abuse of illegal drugs has leaped by 400 percent in the last two decades, reaching a record 28,000 in 2004." It's "time to end the obsession with hyping teenage drug use. The meaningless surveys that policy makers now rely on should be replaced with a comprehensive 'drug abuse index' that pulls together largely ignored data on drug-related deaths, hospital emergencies, crime, diseases and similar practical measures."

Calderon Sends Troops, Police To Tijuana In Crackdown On Drug Gangs. The AP (1/3) reports the Mexican government "is sending more than 3,000 soldiers and federal police officers to fight drug gangs in the violent border city of Tijuana, the latest offensive by President Felipe Calderon who has vowed to crack down on organized crime. The force, backed by 28 boats, 21 planes and nine helicopters, will hunt down suspected traffickers, patrol the coast and man checkpoints in a city that is a popular smuggling route for cocaine, methamphetamine and marijuana entering the United States," according to Interior Secretary Francisco Ramirez Acuna. The troops "have arrested more than 50 people, including several suspected leaders of the feuding cartels, and seized large quantities of gold, bulletproof vests, military equipment and shirts with federal and municipal police logos."

ATF Probing Explosive Devices Found After Texas Standoff. The Texarkana (TX) Gazette (1/3, Richardson) reports, "The investigation into explosive devices found in the home of a man who gave himself up after a four-hour, Texas-side standoff will be made by the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives. … 'Components of explosive devices were found in the building. It is unknown at this time what the intent of (the homeowner) was regarding the explosive components,' said Shawn Fitzgerald, spokesman for the Texarkana, Texas, Police Department." The Gazette continues, "Texas-side police have not released the man's name, but neighbors and co-workers identified him as Todd Gingrich, 43. … Police were dispatched to Gingrich's home at 5814 Larry Drive at 12:37 a.m. Saturday to provide assistance to thwart a possible suicide. They were notified that he allegedly had access to a large number of weapons. … Family members said the collection included automatic and semi-automatic weapons, so the Metro SWAT Team was activated to negotiate with Gingrich. … Negotiators attempted to contact Gingrich over the next four hours, but were unsuccessful. … Fortunately, at 4:50 a.m., officers were able to take Gingrich into custody without injury after he reportedly became ill and exited the building on his own." The Gazette notes, "Criminal charges are not being sought by police because the only person clearly threatened during the standoff was Gingrich. … 'A large cache of weapons was discovered in the building where the victim had been staying during the incident, but it is unknown at this time what the reason or intent was regarding the weapons,' said Fitzgerald. … The Dallas Bureau of the ATF was contacted and responded to the scene. The ATF confiscated all weapons and devices, and the case has since been turned over to that agency, police said."

TAX:

Democrats To Target Oil And Gas Companies Early. The Hill (1/3, Snyder) reports, "Among the first items Democrats want to pass are measures that at least some oil and gas companies oppose, such as a measure to repeal certain tax breaks included in a broad energy bill passed in 2005 and a bill to collect royalties on existing drilling leases. Provisions that could cost the industry even more money, such as one imposing a windfall-profit tax, could follow in the Democratic-led Congress, although some of the harsher measures may strain caucus unity." The Hill adds that Drew Hammill, a spokesman for Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi, "said Democrats have not decided on the exact oil and gas provisions that will be included in their package for the 100-hour legislative push. But Democrats are intent on setting up the energy reserve for renewable energy and conservation, repealing certain tax breaks, and forcing oil companies to renegotiate the 1998 and 1999 Gulf leases."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Urges Bipartisanship, Announces He Will Propose Balanced Budget Plan. With Democrats ready to take control of Congress tomorrow, President Bush is calling for a bipartisan approach to governing in the nation's capital. Writing in the Wall Street Journal this morning (1/3, A13), Bush says of Democrats, "I will have the privilege of working with them for the next two years -- one quarter of my presidency, plenty of time to accomplish important things for the American people. … To do that, however, we can't play politics as usual." Bush adds, "My principles are no secret. I have campaigned on them in my races for governor and in two presidential contests, and I have worked hard during my presidency to translate these principles into sound policy." Most notably, Bush says he will propose a plan to "balance the federal budget by 2012 while funding our priorities and making the tax cuts permanent." He also urges consensus on anti-terror policies, makes his case for continuing involvement in Iraq, and calls for entitlement reform and for ending "the secretive process by which Washington insiders are able to slip into legislation billions of dollars of pork-barrel projects that have never been reviewed or voted on by Congress."

In its analysis of Bush's op-ed, the Wall Street Journal (1/3, A3, McKinnon, 2.04M) focuses on Bush's remarks on taxes, saying he "sent a strong signal of his continued opposition to tax increases." Bush's "comments reflect his administration's reliance on tax cuts as both an economic elixir and a political weapon. … A senior aide to Mr. Bush said the president wasn't firing a fiscal shot across the bow at Democrats, but was simply 'articulating a long-held view that tax relief has worked.' He added that Americans 'want their leaders in Washington to cut wasteful spending. The president's budget will do just that.'" The Washington Post/AP (1/3, Hunt) reports that while Bush sounded "a tone of bipartisanship," he "repeated long-held positions on the war in Iraq, tax cuts and other issues often criticized by Democrats."

The President will meet with Democratic leaders today. CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/2) reported, "We are told by sources that it is really a meeting to talk about the year ahead." Iraq is expected to be central to the discussions. As the AP (1/3, Flaherty) reports, "Democrats will inherit an agenda dominated by the war in Iraq when the new Congress convenes Thursday, increasing their exposure to what has mostly been a politically damaging issue for Republicans.

The bipartisan spirit Bush is urging in his op-ed may prove elusive. The Washington Post (1/3, A3, Weisman, 690K) reports "Democratic leaders set to take control of Congress tomorrow are facing mounting pressure from liberal activists to chart a more confrontational course on Iraq and the issues of human rights and civil liberties, with some even calling for the impeachment of President Bush." The Post adds, "The carefully calibrated legislative blitz that Democrats have devised for the first 100 hours of power has left some activists worried the passion that swept the party to power in November is already dissipating. A cluster of protesters will greet the new congressional leaders at the Capitol tomorrow. They will not be disgruntled conservatives wary of Democratic control, but liberals demanding a ban on torture, an end to warrantless domestic spying and a restoration of curbed civil liberties." The protest "will be followed by an evening forum calling for the president's impeachment, led by the Center for Constitutional Rights, antiwar activist Cindy Sheehan and a pro-impeachment group called World Can't Wait."

Also criticizing the Democrats' "limited" agenda, Mario Cuomo writes in USA Today's website (1/3), "After years of chaos in Iraq, which has led to neglect of many critical domestic issues, voters are looking for dramatic ideas and courageous leadership to deal with the nation's most difficult challenges. Will Democratic leaders step forward with big ideas and seize the opportunity they have been given?" So far, the Democratic agenda "for the 110th Congress, which opens Thursday, offers a laudable but light list of issues, such as increasing the minimum wage, greater stem cell availability, job training benefits and adopting ethics reforms. I doubt that kind of agenda would be enough to keep control of the Congress, let alone to win the next presidency." Cuomo says the Democratic presidential candidates "need to confront the most difficult questions of the day," such as the war on terrorism, economic inequality, the "energy crisis," and Cuomo adds, "Don't fear taxes."

Democrats Seek Legislative Victories Before State Of The Union. Gannett News Service (1/3, Berry) reports incoming House speaker Rep. Nancy Pelosi "has vowed to push six key measures during the first 100 legislative hours of the 110th Congress, which begins Thursday. … Political experts, however, question whether the agenda can be accomplished in 100 legislative hours, which could take several weeks. And while several agenda items are not controversial, some will face strong opposition from the administration, experts say."

The New York Times (1/3, Hulse, 1.16M) reports, "House Democrats intend to kick off their new regime with a 100-hour legislative blitz that would allow them to post a series of quick victories before President Bush even delivers his State of the Union address toward the end of this month." However, "even as Democrats filtered back to Capitol Hill on Tuesday in anticipation of the opening of the 110th Congress on Thursday, there was a bit of confusion about just when the 100 hours would officially begin." Republicans are "growing increasingly agitated about the Democratic timetable. They said that the rush by Democrats to force through legislation on national security, the minimum wage, student loan costs and energy without a full slate of hearings -- and with limits on the ability of Republicans to offer alternatives -- undercut the pledges of Democrats to run things in a more transparent, collegial way than the Republicans had when they were in power." Democrats "eventually decided Tuesday that the 100-hour timer would be started next Tuesday, when the House is scheduled to take up H.R. 1, a measure enacting recommendations from the bipartisan Sept. 11 commission that never made it out of the Republican-controlled Congress."

The Hill (1/3, Kaplan, Kucinich) says "House Democrats hurried yesterday to put the finishing touches on ethics reforms that would ban lawmakers and staffers from accepting trips, gifts and meals from lobbyists and prevent the new majority from holding votes open to change the outcome." Democrats "will adopt and then amend the House Rules package tomorrow to ban all travel paid for by lobbyists or organizations that employ lobbyists, require the ethics committee to pre-approve travel paid for by outside groups, enact a total gift ban, and require lawmakers to pay the market cost of flying on a corporate jet, said Democratic staffers and officials with government watchdog groups."

Coalition Mobilizing To Oppose Grassroots Lobbying Disclosure Bill. The Hill (1/3, Schor) reports that as the new Democratic Congress "prepares to take up a package of lobbying and ethics rules changes, a coalition of nonprofits and communications firms is renewing the push against new grassroots lobbying disclosure rules and not ruling out a future court challenge to the provisions." The Free Speech Coalition "is now leading the fight against proposals for mandatory reporting by any group involved in paid efforts to stimulate grassroots communications — another term for the proverbial pleas to voters to 'contact your congressman' on a particular issue. Led by conservative fixtures such as direct-mail guru Richard Viguerie and Free Congress Foundation chief Paul Weyrich, the coalition is pulling no punches." Lawmakers "supporting grassroots disclosure have aimed their calls for reform at so-called 'astroturf' campaigns, funded by corporate interests but portrayed as genuine citizen drives." But the coalition "contends that the new rules would provide a loophole for corporations that confine their grassroots communications to employees and shareholders."

Davis Warns Against Creation Of Independent Ethics Office. In an op-ed in The Hill (1/3), Lanny J. Davis says, "The current congressional-reformer rage is to create an independent office that would investigate and file ethics charges. This is the 'solution' to the problem of the inherent conflict of interest in members of Congress investigating their colleagues, much less members of their own party. Such an office, reformers argue, would be 'above politics' and avoid that conflict. Hmmmmm. Seems like déjà vu all over again." Davis says the Watergate scandal led to the creation of the Office of the Special Prosecutor, later called the Independent Counsel. The result: "A constitutional monstrosity who couldn't be hired or fired by someone voters elected (in this case, the president); and when he or she abused power, there was no political accountability. Indeed, no accountability at all."

Poll Finds Support For Minimum Wage Hike, Stem Cell Measure, Drug Reimportation. The AP (1/3, Superville) reports, "Two of the Democrats' top goals -- a higher minimum wage and federal funding of embryonic stem cell research -- enjoy broad public support as the party takes control of Congress for the first time in a dozen years. An overwhelming majority also supports making it easier for people to buy prescription drugs from other countries." But "the jury is out on incoming…Pelosi. Most people say they do not know enough yet to have an opinion of the California Democrat who will be the first woman in that office, an Associated Press-AOL News poll found." 80% of respondents support increasing the minimum wage, "nearly seven of 10 adults, 69 percent, favor the government taking steps to make it easier for people to buy prescription drugs from other countries, where some medicines cost significantly less than in the US." And "some 56 percent of adults support easing restrictions on using federal money to pay for research on embryonic stem cells." USA Today (1/3, 4A, 2.27M) runs a truncated version of the AP story on the poll this morning.

Pelosi Praised For Rejecting Free Rein For CSPAN Cameras. In a USA Today op-ed (1/3), Donald Wolfensberger, director of the Congress Project at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars, says, "Granting C-SPAN free gazing rights on the House floor is a terrible idea. Incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi is right to reject the request. Such free-roaming lens-groping would defeat the original purpose of broadcasting House debates. According to the final Rules Committee report on the issue in February 1978, that purpose 'is to provide a complete, uninterrupted, and accurate record of the official proceedings and business of the House — a kind of visual and audio parallel to the Congressional Record.'"

WPost Accuses Democrats Of "High-Handed Mistreatment" Of Minority Republicans. In an editorial, the Washington Post (1/3, A18, 690K) praises he House Democrats' "ambitious plan for its first 100 hours in power, from increasing the minimum wage to strengthening ethics rules to having the federal government negotiate prescription drug prices. Unfortunately, its plans don't include getting those provisions passed in the democratic fashion that the Democrats promised to adhere to once in the majority. When Republicans took over in 1995, they at least went through the motions of putting their 'Contract With America' proposals through the normal committee process." Democrats "have decided not to bother with that, nor to let Republicans offer amendments on the floor, nor even to put a GOP alternative up for a vote. This is exactly the kind of high-handed mistreatment that Democrats complained about, justifiably, when they were in the minority." The Post adds that "if they don't reconsider," Democrats "will set an unfortunate precedent that fairness will be offered on sufferance, when the majority finds it convenient, and not as a matter of principle. That would not be a good start for the 110th Congress."

Pentagon Increasingly Relying On Supplementals. The Wall Street Journal (1/3, A5, Karp, 2.04M) reports, "The Pentagon's supplemental budgets traditionally pay for war costs such as personnel, equipment repairs and ammunition. But as the Joint Strike Fighter request shows, the coming supplemental is being used by the military services for more than replacing what has been lost in Iraq and Afghanistan. It is being used to acquire future weapons that normally would be funded through the regular Pentagon budget. ... An October directive from Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England opened the floodgates by allowing the services to request emergency funds to replace equipment and upgrade to newer models for the 'overall efforts related to the global war on terror,' not just operations in Iraq and Afghanistan." An unnamed army official called the situation a "feeding frenzy." The Journal adds, "It is unclear whether new Defense Secretary Robert Gates will seek to change the supplemental budget, which awaits White House approval. The new largess is a turnaround from two years ago, when the Pentagon tried unsuccessfully to rein in weapons spending. Defense officials say they hope the prospect of defense-industry jobs will help ease passage in Congress."

Nuland Noted As Possible Bolton Replacement. The Washington Post's (1/3, A17) Al Kamen writes in his "In the Loop" column that "idle chatterers are talking about Victoria Nuland, now ambassador to NATO, as a possible choice to succeed John R. Bolton." Kamen notes that Nuland, "who is a career Foreign Service officer and is married to Robert Kagan, a contributor to the Washington Post op-ed page, was top foreign policy adviser to Vice President Cheney and before that an aide to Clinton confidante Strobe Talbott when he was deputy secretary of state."

State Department Military Advisor Resigns. In its "Washington Wire" online column, the Wall Street Journal (1/3, King, 2.04M) reports, "In yet another high-level departure from the State Department, Condoleezza Rice's energetic head of political-military relations, John Hillen, has told his colleagues he is leaving the administration this month." In an email to colleagues the day after Christmas, Hillen, who served as "the principal link between State and the Pentagon and was leading the administration's effort to build better security ties with Arab allies in the Persian Gulf in a bid to contain Iran's growing influence," said that he and his family decided that it was best not "to commit to being in the administration until 2009." The note "suggests that the White House has requested that all top appointees either commit to staying through the end of the administration, or leave as soon as possible."

Observers Look For Shifts By Medicare Part D Enrollees. The Hill (1/3, Young) reports the "sign-up period for prescription-drug coverage under Medicare Part D ended Sunday, and the Bush administration and observers of the program are eagerly waiting to see whether beneficiaries enrolled in plans best suited to their needs." Encouraging "elderly and disabled participants to reevaluate their 2006 plans, which changed in many cases, and compare them to other options on the market was the chief challenge during the second year of the program." The Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS), "lawmakers, members of the health-insurance industry, and beneficiaries' advocates widely predicted that most people enrolled in Part D would stick with the coverage they selected during the inaugural enrollment period, between November 2005 and May 2006." The Administration "has expressed confidence that beneficiaries were smart shoppers during the six-week sign-up period."

Clyburn Said To Represent Rising Class Of Southern Black Lawmakers. The Wall Street Journal (1/3, A5, Rogers, 2.04M) reports Rep. James Clyburn, "a minister's son from South Carolina, takes his place tomorrow as the House Majority Whip -- the No. 3 Democratic post and highest ever held by an African-American from a Southern district." Clyburn "symbolizes the rise of a set of Southern black lawmakers, shaped by the region and with a distinctive approach to politics separate from that of black leaders representing urban Northern districts." Other southern black lawmakers cited by the Journal include Reps. John Lewis, Bennie Thompson, and Mel Watt. Their "often rural roots and the black educational and religious institutions that sustained them through segregation still influence their politics." Southern black lawmakers "also tend to be more conservative than their Northern counterparts on social issues. Political necessity has required them to reach out to business and agricultural interests to gain white support. And growing up under segregation put a premium on personal relationships, with both blacks and whites, that can make them adept at building coalitions in the new Congress."

House Ethics Panel Ends Investigation Of Conyers. The Washington Times (1/3, Miller, 88K) reports, "The Republican-led House ethics committee -- in possibly its last action before Democrats take over Congress -- closed the three-year investigation of Rep. John Conyers Jr. after he agreed to stop using staffers for campaign work and personal errands." Conyers "acknowledged a 'lack of clarity' in his dealing with the taxpayer-financed staffers, who reportedly worked on political campaigns and performed other nonofficial jobs, including baby-sitting Mr. Conyers' children and tutoring his wife." The "case against Mr. Conyers was closed without punitive action or a letter of reproval from the Committee on Standards of Conduct, the ethics panel, which is comprised of five Democrats and five Republicans." Last month, "the ethics committee decided not to take action against Rep. Jim McDermott, despite finding that the Washington Democrat broke ethics rules in 1997 by giving reporters illegally taped telephone calls involving House leaders." A Republican lawmaker "familiar with both cases said Democrats on the committee blocked punitive action against their colleagues."

Buchanan To Take House Seat Under Challenge. The Washington Times (1/3, Ward, 88K) reports Republican Vern Buchanan, "who narrowly won a disputed election" in Florida's 13th CD, "will take his place with the new House tomorrow, but Democrats will continue to fight in the courts for a new election." Rep. Rush D. Holt "will stand on the chamber floor and ask House leaders to recognize a court challenge against" Rep. Buchanan. Jennifer Crider, a spokeswoman for Speaker Nancy Pelosi, said, "Mr. Holt's action will make clear that the swearing in of any member does not prejudice the legal case or the congressional investigations." The Times adds Democrat Christine Jennings, "who lost to Mr. Buchanan by 369 votes, is fighting in court the results of the race" and has "filed a notice of contest with the House Administration Committee."

Miller Bill Would Extend Minimum Wage To Mariana Islands. The Hill (1/3, Crabtree) reports House Democrats "led by Education and the Workforce Committee Chairman George Miller (D-Calif.) are aiming to undo a controversial vestige of the Jack Abramoff era in the first 100 hours of the 110th Congress." Miller plans "to include language raising wages in the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands in a broader bill increasing the U.S. minimum wage." Former Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) and Rep. John Doolittle (R-Calif.) "have been scrutinized for their ties to Abramoff and their alleged efforts to block legislation aimed at raising labor and immigration standards in the islands."

Ellison To Use Thomas Jefferson's Copy Of The Koran For Swearing-In. In its "Reliable Source" column, the Washington Post (1/3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 690K) reports, "Thomas Rep.-elect Keith Ellison, the first Muslim elected to Congress, found himself under attack last month when he announced he'd take his oath of office on the Koran -- especially from Virginia Rep. Virgil Goode, who called it a threat to American values." However, "the holy book at tomorrow's ceremony has an unassailably all-American provenance. We've learned that the new congressman -- in a savvy bit of political symbolism -- will hold the personal copy once owned by Thomas Jefferson. … Jefferson's copy is an English translation by George Sale published in the 1750s."

Pelosi's Links To California's Burtons Noted. In his Washington Post column (1/3, A19), Harold Meyerson examines incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi's political legacy. Meyerson notes that Pelosi fills the seat of Rep. Phil Burton. After his death in 1983, Burton's widow, Sala Burton, succeeded him in a special election, but "just four years later, in January 1987, Sala herself lay dying of cancer. She asked Phil's brother, John Burton, who had represented an adjoining congressional district in San Francisco, to come to the hospital and told him that she wanted 'Nancy' to succeed her. For a moment, John Burton was unsure which Nancy she was referring to, but as she explained to family and friends at her bedside, the woman in question was the former California Democratic Party chair Nancy Pelosi." The "Burtonistas -- with different causes and methods for a new era, to be sure -- are back. Score two for you, Sala."

OTHER NEWS:

Nation Honors President Ford. Amid universal praise, former presidents and senior aides paid homage to President Gerald Ford yesterday. Much of the coverage notes the atmosphere of national unity yesterday, and described Ford as the embodiment of an era of bipartisan cooperation. As ABC World News (1/2, lead story, 4:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "It is not often you find a day when this city of Washington is free of rancor and there is no partisan divide. Today, however, was one of those days as Republican and Democrat alike united in admiration of Gerald Ford." The CBS Evening News (1/2, lead story, 4:10, Schieffer, 7.66M) said there was a "genuine outpouring of good will. It was very obvious people were fond of President Ford, and he's going to be remembered fondly. I always said he's the nicest person I ever met in public life and I think today we saw there were many people who felt the same way."

The New York Times (1/3, Shane, 1.16M) notes the "soaring tribute to a modest man," as Ford "was remembered on Tuesday as bringing the ordinary virtues of decency, integrity and humility to mend a broken government after the pain of war and scandal." Former President Bush "called Mr. Ford 'a Norman Rockwell painting come to life'; Tom Brokaw, the former television anchor, described 'Citizen Ford' as a 'champion of Main Street values'; and Henry A. Kissinger said the man he served as secretary of state 'had the virtues of small-town America.'" President Bush, "overseeing a deeply unpopular war in Iraq and perhaps pondering his own legacy, lauded Mr. Ford's 'firm resolve' in sending the Marines to rescue the crew of the American merchant ship Mayagüez when it was seized by Cambodia. He suggested that some acts widely condemned during Mr. Ford's administration in the 1970s had come to look wiser in historical perspective, including his pardon for his immediate predecessor, Richard M. Nixon."

The Chicago Tribune (1/3, Neikirk, 617K) says "eulogists from President Bush to former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger praised the nation's 38th president for using old-fashioned Midwestern qualities to cool the nation's Watergate passions." But "in their laudatory remarks at Washington's National Cathedral, there also appeared to be an undercurrent of unspoken regret that such values have become rarer in America's politics. Indeed, analysts have criticized a higher degree of nastiness and lack of authenticity in today's politics."

On NBC Nightly News (1/2, story 3, 2:35, Williams, 9.87M), Tom Brokaw said, "As I rode through the streets of Washington and looked at all those people of every color and stripe and standing in America with their hands over their heart or saluting him, not one of them had a sign that said I'm a Republican or I'm a Democrat. I think it's instructive that we're at our best when we come together on these occasions and Gerald Ford was constantly striving to bring us together." NBC Nightly News (1/2, story 2, 2:25, Williams, 9.87M) also said Ford's death "reminded us perhaps of a different era, perhaps a greater generation, even a profile in courage."

The Washington Post (1/3, A1, Baker, 690K) reports "the state funeral was a classic Washington affair, soaked in power and pageantry even if not quite as elaborate as the one held for Ronald Reagan in June 2004." The Washington Times (1/3, Curl, 88K) notes the "humble yet extraordinary life of Gerald R. Ford," and McClatchy (1/3, Douglas) says he is being remembered for his "decency." Similar assessments appear in the Los Angeles Times (1/3, Reynolds, Schmitt, 850K), New York Times (1/3, Swarns, 1.16M) and The Hill (1/3, Kucinich, McCormack), among other newspapers. Less complimentary was New York Times columnist Maureen Dowd (1/3), who wrote this morning, "None of the eulogists [of President Ford] noted the irony that the man who ushered out one long national nightmare had ushered in another, the one we're living in now. It was Gerald Ford, after all, who gave America the gift of Dick Cheney and Donald Rumsfeld -- the gift that keeps on taking."

Tom Shales, in the Washington Post (1/3, C1, 690K), surveys the TV coverage of the event, and concludes, "It was a memorable morning, a national gathering by television, and a reminder that for all the talk about blogs and YouTube and MySpace, there are still moments and events that only the networks can adequately convey. This, obviously, was one of them."

Stories in USA Today (1/3, Lawrence, 2.27M) and Washington Post (1/3, A9, Tucker, 690K) praise Betty Ford's performance as first lady and her demeanor since her husband's passing

Ford's Brand Of Conservatism No Longer The GOP Norm. The Washington Post (1/3, A8, Balz, Broder, 690K) reports, "The honorary pallbearers who walked slowly up the aisle at Washington National Cathedral yesterday at the funeral of former president Gerald R. Ford were as familiar as when they served the 38th president, symbolizing continuity through four decades of Republican administrations. The names included Cheney, Rumsfeld, Baker, Greenspan and Scowcroft, officials who have served multiple Republican presidents." But "their presence masked a far different reality, which is that the Republican Party that spawned Ford and his brand of Midwestern conservatism barely exists today." In "sharp contrast to the commentary after the death of former president Ronald Reagan, there were no remembrances of Ford as an architect of modern conservatism or a force behind the GOP's ascendance. The Republican Party has turned away from Ford's conservatism, moving sharply to the right ideologically and to the South and West geographically."

Iraq Said To Have Fractured Group Of Living Presidents. USA Today (1/3, 2.27M) reports, "The war in Iraq has fractured even the fraternity of presidents. After they exit the Oval Office, presidents generally limit criticism of their successors, at least in public. When President Bush and predecessors Jimmy Carter, George H.W. Bush and Bill Clinton gathered Tuesday at the National Cathedral for President Gerald Ford's funeral, it was a show of solidarity and affection for one of the few who knew firsthand how difficult the job can be. … The tradition of what historian Robert Dallek calls "a code of silence" among presidents has been strained by the escalating violence in Iraq, however. The war has divided the international community, the American public, members of Congress." Ford "joined that debate, albeit after his death. He criticized Bush's justification for the war in an interview conducted in 2004 and released when he died last week, joining critiques by Clinton and Carter." Their views "underscore Bush's isolation on the war."

Meanwhile, the New York Times (1/3, Kornblut, Broder, 1.16M) reports, "In a moment of presidential empathy, former President George Bush recalled a skill he had learned from Gerald R. Ford: how to handle being ridiculed on 'Saturday Night Live.' … As the 82-year-old former president imitated his own impersonator, there were only three people in the audience who knew exactly how it felt to be ridiculed, as a sitting president, on late-night television. Former President Bill Clinton responded with a hearty laugh from his seat in the Washington National Cathedral, while former President Jimmy Carter, in a neighboring pew, looked on with a smile. Seated nearby was President Bush, who has been relentlessly skewered by TV comics as well." The Times adds, "With Mr. Ford's death last week, the group of living former presidents has shrunk to three, down from five in the early 1990s. Since 1994, Richard M. Nixon, Ronald Reagan and, now, Mr. Ford have left the stage, while Mr. Clinton has joined the ranks of former chief executives. The dynamic among the former presidents is perpetually evolving, as people age, rivalries fade and former political opponents discover they share more similarities than differences."

Ford's Body Back In Michigan For Burial. USA Today (1/3, Keen, Nichols, 2.27M) reports, "Gerald Ford's hometown welcomed him back to his beloved Midwest for the last time Tuesday, hours after a final and affectionate farewell in the nation's capital." Ford "will be buried Wednesday on a hillside at his presidential museum, ending a week-long national tribute to the 38th president. Thousands of silent people lined the streets of this city of 194,000 to watch the passage of the hearse carrying Ford's body." NBC Nightly News (1/2, lead story, 3:40, Williams, 9.87M), ABC World News (1/2, story 2, 3:00, Gibson, 8.78M) and the CBS Evening News (1/2, story 2, 1:25, Couric, 7.66M) also reported on the Michigan service,

Hypothetical Media Role In A Bush Eulogy Pondered. In his "Washington Sketch" column for the Washington Post (1/3, A2, 690K), Dana Milbank notes Tom Brokaw eulogized Ford, and adds, "For Bush, it must have been a jarring moment. The current president would probably have Hugo Chavez deliver his eulogy before he would bestow the honor on a member of the White House press corps." Milbank goes on to recount a series of anecdotes illustrating Bush's bumpy relationship with White House correspondents, and says "probably the most promising chicken-head story" for a Bush eulogy "was provided by Dick Keil, the former Bloomberg News reporter Bush called 'Stretch.' The 6-foot-5 Stretch recalled a 2001 news conference on the Bush ranch in Texas, when an unusually talkative Bush exhausted all questions and was finally asked what he had done that day. Recalled Keil: 'He noted that he had begun his morning by spending some "quality time with the first lady."' Following a dramatic pause for effect, he got that wry grin, and said, 'Usually, I go running.'"

Manufacturers' Optimism Expected To Be Down For Start Of 2007. The Wall Street Journal (1/3, Lahart, 2.04M) reports if manufacturers "seem downbeat as the new year starts, it's partly because they were too upbeat at the beginning of the old one." When the Institute for Supply Management "releases its monthly report on manufacturing activity today, that unhappy message is likely to come out clearly. The ISM's manufacturing index -- based on surveys of purchasing managers -- dropped sharply through the fall and by November hit its lowest level in more than three years. At 49.5, the index had dipped into terrain that signals a manufacturing contraction and was lower than comparable indexes in other countries." Economists "polled by Dow Jones peg today's report for December's ISM at 50 -- essentially a 'we're-still-on-vacation-here' forecast of no change."

US Automakers Expected To Report Decline In Market Share. The Wall Street Journal (1/3, Stoll, 2.04M) reports as "auto makers report December U.S. sales on Wednesday, a decline in fleet sales to rental agencies and significant weakness at Ford Motor Co. are expected to fuel an overall market pullback for the month." Analysts "forecast that December industry sales will slide as much as 6%, aided by what could be a double-digit percentage decline at Ford, despite heavy year-end sales incentives and an expected uptick in luxury car sales. Other domestic auto makers are seen posting nearly flat sales for the month, while recent sales gains are expected to continue for Asian auto makers such as Toyota Motor Corp. and Honda Motor Co."

Productivity Growth Seen As Declining In Future. In his Washington Post column (1/3, A19), Robert Samuelson says, "The good news is that productivity has been growing strongly; the bad news is that it may be moving to a much slower path." Productivity growth "seems to be decreasing. In the past year it's been only 1.4 percent. By contrast, it averaged about 3 percent from 2000 to 2005. The fall-off partly reflects a mature business cycle. As the economy slows, so do productivity gains. But some long-term forecasts project that the poor performance will continue. In Moody's Economy.com's outlook, productivity growth averages 1.4 percent a year from 2005 to 2035. The main reason: stunted business investment in new machinery, technologies and buildings, says chief economist Mark Zandi." As global investors "shift to other markets, big federal budget deficits will compete increasingly with private companies for credit. Higher interest rates will crowd out some business investment. Productivity will suffer."

Law Firm Merger Leads To Exodus Of Partners. The Wall Street Journal (1/3, B2, Lattman) reports, "Two major law firms have been talking marriage, but partners are leaving before the firms reach the altar." The Journal continues, "Dewey Ballantine has lost at least nine partners since the news last fall of its plans to merge with San Francisco's Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe. A defection this week is a biggie: Michael Aiello, a top Dewey mergers-and-acquisitions partner and a member of the management committee, joined Weil, Gotshal & Manges. Already, the Dewey-Orrick merger vote had been postponed as the two sides attempt to iron out differences on management authority and other topics." The Journal adds, "Orrick has wanted to join forces with Dewey in large part because of Dewey's strong M&A practice, but in December, Jack Bodner, another former Dewey M&A partner, left for Covington & Burling in New York. Messrs. Aiello and Bodner were considered two of the top deputies to Morton Pierce, the head of Dewey's M&A practice. … Also in December, Pierre Hubert, a former IP litigation partner in Dewey's Austin, Texas, office, left for McKool Smith, a Texas-based firm."

Document Outlines Giuliani's Presidential Plans. The Washington Post (1/3, A4, Cillizza, 690K) reports former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani (R) "has been exploring a run for president for just over a month, but the planning behind a national candidacy has been going on much longer, according to an internal strategy memo." The "140-page document, which was leaked to the New York Daily News by a rival 2008 campaign, provides a broad look at Giuliani's prospects for the Republican nomination -- including the potential hurdles of his stormy personal life and his association with disgraced former New York City police commissioner Bernard B. Kerik." The memo "also details a fundraising plan for Giuliani that includes raising $100 million this year, including $25 million in the first three months alone, according to the Daily News." Giuliani spokeswoman Sunny Mindel "alleged that the memo was obtained through a series of 'political dirty tricks.'"

ABC World News (1/2, story 7, :25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported the leak of the strategy document was an "embarrassing disclosure," and the New York Daily News "says it got the plan from someone sympathetic to a rival campaign. The Giuliani camp says it was stolen."

NBC Nightly News (1/2, story 9, 0:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported Giuliani's "campaign has apparently made a whopper of a mistake. A 140-page binder containing top-secret plans for plans of his campaign was sent to the 'New York Daily News." The campaign plan "lists bullet points listing his political vulnerabilities, including his business ties and previous marriages."

The New York Times (1/3, Healy, 1.16M) reports Giuliani advisers said "someone infiltrated the Giuliani camp last fall and stole a document about his presidential prospects and political liabilities. It was then leaked, they said, as a 'dirty trick' to embarrass Mr. Giuliani and highlight such headaches as his controversial former aide, Bernard B. Kerik, and one of his ex-wives, Donna Hanover." The document "warns that Mr. Giuliani might face 'insurmountable' problems, including questions about Mr. Kerik and Ms. Hanover." The "public disclosure of the document is potentially damaging for Mr. Giuliani, not least because since 9/11, he has built a business as a private consultant on security issues while creating an image as a political leader capable of combating terrorism. Indeed, an adviser to one of his possible rivals in 2008, Senator John McCain of Arizona, half-joked yesterday that it was interesting that Mr. Giuliani's businesses included security consulting."

Romney To File Exploratory Committee Papers. The Washington Post (1/3, A4, Cillizza, 690K) reports Mitt Romney will "let one of the least well-kept secrets of the 2008 campaign out of the bag today when he formally registers a presidential exploratory committee with the Federal Election Commission." The "filing of the paperwork is largely formulaic, as Romney has long been expected to run for president and has been putting into place a national organization to prepare for such a bid." Romney's "latest hire is Carolyn Weyforth, who most recently served as press secretary for outgoing Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.). Weyforth will be Romney's deputy communications director."

The Washington Times (1/3, Dinan, 88K) reports Romney "has spent recent months moving steadily to try to occupy the conservative ground in the Republican presidential field. His entry into the ranks of Republicans officially exploring a run for the presidency underscores the strange nature of the field at this point -- there is no candidate able to claim the position of the clear conservative standard-bearer, so all of the candidates think they can win a sizable chunk of those all-important primary voters."

Impact Of Obama's Confession Of Cocaine Use Analyzed. The Washington Post (1/3, A1, Romano, 690K) reports in a front page story that Democratic Sen. Barack Obama confessed to his illicit drug use in his memoir, "Dreams From My Father, A Story of Race and Inheritance," 11 years ago. At the time, "20,000 copies were printed and the book seemed destined for the remainders stacks." But Obama is now "near the top of polls on potential Democratic presidential contenders," and the book "has regularly been on the bestseller lists, with 800,000 copies in print. Taken along with his latest bestseller, 'The Audacity of Hope: Thoughts on Reclaiming the American Dream,' Obama has become a genuine publishing phenomenon." Obama's revelations "were not an issue during his Senate campaign two years ago. But now his open narrative of early, bad choices, including drug use starting in high school and ending in college, as well as his tortured search for racial identity, are sure to receive new scrutiny." What "remains to be seen is whether the candor he offered in his early memoir will be greeted with a new-style acceptance by voters." Through his book, Obama "has become the first potential presidential contender to admit trying cocaine."

Morris Says Obama Seen As Tabula Rasa. In his column in The Hill (1/3), Dick Morris says, "Those who deride Sen. Barack Obama's (D-Ill.) lack of experience and criticize the broad generalities and banalities that festoon his best-selling book miss the key point: His inexperience is an asset because he enters national politics as a blank canvas on which he can paint whatever he chooses." With only "two years in the Senate, he is less like a politician running for president than like a general — think Eisenhower in 1952 or even the abortive candidacy of Colin Powell in 1995 — or a businessman, like Ross Perot in 1992." Obama's record "doesn't really matter because it is so short." So far, Obama "seems very conscious that his liberal, party-line voting record is not a good foundation for his national ambitions. He seems aware that the country wants more of a post-partisan, embodying the consensus to which Americans have come over these recent dangerous and bitter years." Obama has "the opportunity to embody the emerging consensus, a broad national agreement reached from observation of trial and error over the past half decade."

Morris Predicts Clinton Will Be Pressured To Choose Obama For VP. Political analyst Dick Morris, on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (1/2), predicted, "The ticket in '08 is [Sens.] Hillary [Clinton] and [Barack] Obama. Hillary because she's definitely going to run and probably going to win. She brings out single women who otherwise would not vote. The idea of the first woman will capture the ether and the reason she is going to put Obama on the ticket is after she beats him she can't then turn around and ask the African Americans to support the ticket unless she gives them something."

Obama Urged To Wait To Run. In her Washington Post column (1/3, A19), Ruth Marcus says, "I do think that Obama would be a better candidate, and ultimately a better president, in 2012 or 2016 than in 2008. He will have learned more -- about the world, about domestic policy, about how to maneuver successfully in Washington." The "main argument for Obama to run in 2008 involves the shelf-life theory of politics: That the Obama magic might fade, that an opportunity this good might never present itself again. Maybe, but I think that Obama has more promise than that, more staying power and more self-knowledge."

Schwarzenegger To Outline Vision For Future In Four Key Speeches. The Los Angeles Times (1/3, Nicholas, 850K) reports that over the "next seven days, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, new crutches close at hand, will give a series of speeches that lay out his policy ambitions for the next four years: broader access to healthcare coverage, cleaner skies and improved roads." Schwarzenegger, "still recovering from a broken right leg suffered in a holiday skiing accident, will deliver his inaugural address outlining a long-term vision for California when he is sworn in for a second term Friday. He is also expected on Monday to put forward his plan for revamping the state's healthcare system." The following day, he "will make his annual State of the State speech, and his budget proposal is scheduled the day after." In these "four speeches, Schwarzenegger will offer his most concrete proposals yet for insuring the millions of Californians who lack healthcare coverage, the centerpiece of his 2007 agenda. But he also hopes to establish a legacy as a builder on a par with former Gov. Pat Brown."

LATimes Criticizes Schwarzenegger For Veto Of Gay Marriage Bill. The Los Angeles Times (1/3, 850K) says in an editorial, "If Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger had signed a bill in 2005 legalizing same-sex marriage instead of vetoing it, the California Supreme Court would have been spared the task of deciding, as it probably will this year, whether a voter-approved ban violates the state Constitution's guarantee of equal protection under the law. But Schwarzenegger said he had to respect Proposition 22, approved in 2000, which states: 'Only marriage between a man and a woman is valid or recognized in California.'"

Lefkowitz's Post-White House Career Examined. The Washington Post (1/3, A17, Goldstein, 690K) asks, "Whatever happened to Jay P. Lefkowitz?" Before the 9/11 attacks, President Bush assigned the job of designing a policy to "allow federal money to pay for a limited amount of research on stem cells from human embryos" to Lefkowitz, "who was working as general counsel in the White House's Office of Management and Budget. Eight months later, Bush would promote Lefkowitz to deputy assistant to the president overseeing domestic policy. Many White House watchers expected that the cerebral neoconservative, whose judgment the president so clearly trusted, would rise further still." Instead, Lefkowitz "decamped from the White House -- and Washington -- in 2003. And although he is reluctant to discuss it, he has twice since then declined to return to top West Wing jobs." He "went back to his old law firm, Kirkland & Ellis, where he has a partnership and an eclectic mix of cases." Lefkowitz "still has a part-time role in government" as "the president's special envoy on human rights in North Korea."

NYTimes Praises Spitzer's Focus On Reform. The New York Times (1/3, 1.16M) says in an editorial that New York Gov. Eliot Spitzer, "who has built his career on reform, is arriving in a state capital that desperately needs it." New York's government "has slipped from a beacon for other states into a cautionary tale. So when Mr. Spitzer spoke of change in his inaugural address — an end to government 'that works for those who hold office, not those who put them there' — he hit precisely the right note. With a passion and energy that Albany has not seen in years, this governor has promised to wake what he has labeled the 'Rip van Winkle' government of the last decade."

Spitzer Urged To Keep Building Plan For Ground Zero. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (1/3, A13), Brian Carney, a member of the Wall Street Journal's Editorial Board, says, "Eliot Spitzer has been telling us for -- well, it seems like forever -- that 'on Day 1, everything changes.' Here's one thing that shouldn't: the Ground Zero rebuilding plan. The current master plan for those 16 acres in lower Manhattan isn't perfect. In fact, it's real far from perfect. It barely qualifies as OK. But it has this virtue -- it exists. And it is being built." The "real act of leadership here would be to declare that we're moving forward, that this scar in the fabric of Manhattan is going to be repaired. So, look all you want, Mr. Spitzer. But keep the concrete mixers mixing and the steel rising. New Yorkers have waited too long as it is."

Pat Robertson Predicts Massive Terror Attack In Late 2007. The AP (1/3) reports, "In what has become an annual tradition of prognostications, religious broadcaster Pat Robertson said Tuesday God has told him that a terrorist attack on the United States would result in 'mass killing' late in 2007. 'I'm not necessarily saying it's going to be nuclear,' he said during his news-and-talk television show 'The 700 Club' on the Christian Broadcasting Network. 'The Lord didn't say nuclear. But I do believe it will be something like that.'"

Ahmadinejad Downplays UN Sanctions. Fox News' Special Report (1/2, Hume) reported, "Iran's president also had a lot to say about the UN's latest move to pressure him into abandoning his nuclear program." Fox continued, "UN sanctions: not fair, but not a problem. That's what Iranian President Ahmadinejad wants his fellow countrymen and the world to know. Speaking to a crowd in a southwestern Iranian city, Ahmadinejad said the sanctions which ban the sale of nuclear materials or technology to Iran are not valid, and that the Iranian people give them no weight. As some in the crowd chanted 'Death to America,' Ahmadinejad insisted, again, that Iran would pursue its nuclear work despite pressure from the West." The AP (1/3) reports Ahmadinejad said the US was "the main power behind the resolution," and warned Washington: "I want you to know that the Iranian nation has humiliated you many times, and it will humiliate you in future."

Israeli Think Tank Warns That "Barring Military Action," Iran Will Get Nukes. Fox News' Special Report (1/2, Hume) reported, "Israel says Iran will develop a nuclear bomb if someone doesn't step in militarily." Iranian President

Ahmadinejad "said he wants Israel wiped off the map, and a respected Israeli think tank in Tel Aviv University is taking him seriously. In its annual report on the strategic balance in the middle east just out today, the Tel Aviv Institute for National Military Studies concluded that 'time is working in Iran's favor, and barring military action, Iran's possession of nuclear weapons is only a matter of time.' The group stopped short of calling for Israel to launch a military strike in Iran.."

Russia Says Weapons Sales To Syria, Iran On Schedule. AFP (1/3) reports, "Controversial Russian contracts to sell anti-aircraft weapons to Syria and Iran are being fulfilled on schedule," Russian officials said Tuesday. Russia's ITAR-TASS quoted a defense ministry official as saying "at least half of the 29 Tor-M1 missile systems bought by Iran for $1.4 billion had been delivered." The air defense systems "are being stationed around Iran's civilian nuclear sites," according to ITAR-TASS. Meanwhile, Interfax news agency quoted Valery Kashin, head of weapons maker Engineering Design Bureau, "as saying that Russia met all its commitments in 2006 under the contract to supply Syria with the Strelets anti-aircraft system" without providing further details.

Ethiopia To Withdraw Troops From Somalia "Within Weeks." The Financial Times (1/3, England) reports Ethiopian troops could be pulled out of Somalia "within a few weeks," Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi said on Tuesday, "adding that the victors of Somalia's two-week war were now 'mopping up remnants' of the country's former Islamist leaders." Despite "promises of a swift withdrawal, doubts remain about when Mr. Meles would be willing or able to pull back his troops." The New York Times (1/3, A3, Gettleman, 1.16M) reports Zenawi said his country "could not afford to keep troops in Somalia much longer and that it was ill equipped to play the role of peacekeeper there." Meanwhile, Somali Prime Minister Ali Mohammed Gedi "reiterated his plea for the nation's many gunmen to turn in their weapons. But few seemed to be listening."

In an interview with the Washington Post (1/3, A14, McCrummen, 690K), Somali Interior Minister Hussein Farah Aideed "said lawmakers would return this week to their town of exile, Baidoa, to approve Gedi's declaration of martial law and a plan to allow 90 days -- instead of Gedi's original timeline of three days -- to disarm militias." In "what amounted to an appeal for outside help," Aideed also "conceded that the transitional government was weak," saying "We have a symbolic government. Ministries we don't have, a military we don't have. We're limited."

The Los Angeles Times (1/3, Sanders, 850K) reports that the government-mandated disarmament program, which it calls "the first major test of Somalia's transitional government," got under way Tuesday "without much of a bang." At one designated weapons drop-off point in the Somali capital, "bored-looking Ethiopian soldiers mulled about with little to do," while c second collection site "closed early because 'no one showed up,' according to a Somali government soldier." Meanwhile, the Christian Science Monitor (1/3, Crilly, 59K) says Ethiopia's "preemptive offensive signals the opening of a new front in the global struggle against Islamist militants. And the speed of the Islamists' retreat is reminiscent of how insurgencies began in both Iraq and Afghanistan, say analysts." USA Today (1/3, 4A, 2.27M) also reports briefly on the events.

Envoys To Meet On Peacekeeping Force. Separately, the Washington Post (1/3, A14, Deyoung, 690K) says the "rapidly unfolding events in Somalia have opened a window of opportunity to establish a viable government there, according to the Bush administration and its European and African allies. But there is little optimism that the international political will and resources needed to exploit it will emerge before the window slams shut." Diplomats from the United States and other nations in the Somalia Contact Group will meet today in Brussels "to examine ways to quickly install an all-African peacekeeping force." Also under discussion "is an effort to persuade cooperative elements of the newly ensconced Transitional Federal Government to open unity talks with certain moderate leaders of the fundamentalist forces."

Huddleston Says Victory Is Opportunity To Prevent Somalia From Becoming Terror Haven. Former acting Ambassador in Addis Ababa, Vicki Huddleston, writes in the Washington Times (1/3, 88K) that Ethiopia's and the Somali government's "surprisingly easy victories have given Somalia -- and the West -- a second chance to get things right. We cannot afford to lose this opportunity." In response, Huddleston urges international relief agencies to "enhance shipments of food into the towns and villages now under the Transitional Government's control." Second, she urges the African Union, "with logistic help from the United States and European Union," to "immediately deploy peacekeepers to reinforce the government." Lastly, the Ambassador says "the region under the auspices of the Intergovernmental Authority on Development should prepare for a transition to a broad based government that excludes the Islamic militants but includes the moderates from all of Somalia's clans." With "strong US leadership," Huddleston says we "will prevent Somalia from becoming a haven for al Qaeda terrorism in Africa."

North Korean Foreign Minister Dies. The AP (1/3) reports Paek Nam Sun, North Korea's foreign minister and the country's top diplomat "for nearly 10 years, has died at the age of 78," official media reported Wednesday. North Korean leader Kim Jong Il "expressed his condolences," but the "one-sentence dispatch did not elaborate on when or how

Paek died." Although it "was unclear who would succeed him," Paek's death was "not expected to change North Korea's foreign policy."

Israeli General Admits Errors In Lebanon. The New York Times (1/3, A3, Erlanger, 1.16M) reports Israeli chief of staff, Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz, "conceded Tuesday that the military had made serious errors during last summer's war against Hezbollah in Lebanon but said he would not resign his post." General Halutz said Israel "had badly damaged Hezbollah in southern Lebanon" and killed "hundreds of terrorists." But he said Israel was "not successful in reducing the short-range rocket fire on Israel's north until the cease-fire." However, he rejected calls from critics for his resignation, saying he would stay on "to correct what can be corrected," and said to resign now would be "running away."

Israel Considers Abandoning Own Missiles For US System. AFP (1/3) reports Israel is "considering halting the development of a new generation of its Arrow defense missiles due to the high costs involved in favor of US-made missiles." Following negotiations in recent months, Israeli leaders "will make a final decision on whether to phase out the Arrow, or Hetz, missiles and opt instead for the US-made THAAD missile defense system in the coming year," the Haaretz newspaper reported Tuesday. The THAAD missile, made by Lockheed Martin, could be delivered to Israel in 2009, according to sources in Washington quoted by the newspaper.

UN To Probe Sexual Abuse Allegations In Sudan. The AP (1/3, Moore) reports the UN said Tuesday it will investigate "a report of allegations of sexual abuse and child rape by peacekeepers operating in southern Sudan." Jane Holl Lute, the UN assistant secretary-general who oversees peacekeeping operations, said the allegations, reported by British newspaper The Daily Telegraph, "if shown to be true would not be tolerated." The Daily Telegraph, "citing an internal UNICEF report along with interviews with more than 20 alleged abuse victims, reported that several children, some as young as 12, had been sexually abused by UN peacekeepers and civilian workers."

New Secretary General Says UN Must Accept Reforms. The Financial Times (1/3, Turner) reports, "Ban Ki-moon, the eighth United Nations secretary-general, arrived for his first day at work on Tuesday with a tough appeal for staff to embrace change and restore trust in the organisation." Ban's "core message was delivered to a closed meeting of UN staff. He praised their professionalism, but warned that the UN's 'sense of pride is not to be taken for granted; it must be earned. We are all here for reasons greater than our own personal advancement or national interest.'" Ban "promised to build a more mobile staff, which moved between headquarters and field posts – addressing the fact that many UN officials, on reaching New York and Geneva, remain in place for years, while field positions often go unfilled." The Washington Times (1/3, Pisik, 88K) says Ban "pledged to pursue predecessor Kofi Annan's stalled reform suggestions, some of which were more popular with the staff than others."

Reid Discusses Trade Pact With Peruvian President. The AP (1/3, Vecchio) reports, "Incoming US Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said Tuesday he had fallen in love with Peru during a short visit, but made no pronouncements on a key issue facing the two nations, free trade. In a meeting with the bipartisan senate delegation led by Reid, President Alan Garcia stressed Peru's desire for a free trade pact." Republicans "have largely supported the free trade deal signed last April as a step in advancing commerce within the Western Hemisphere, while Democrats have expressed reservations about its ratification over what they see as a lack of protection for Peruvian workers. "

Merkel To Push For US-EU Trade Talks. The Financial Times (1/3, Benoit, Peel) reports, "Angela Merkel, German chancellor, will this month launch a sweeping initiative for the harmonisation of US and European legislation to boost investment flows and trade between the world's largest economic blocs. Initial talks will review financial market regulations, including delisting rules, which many US-listed European companies feel are too cumbersome, as well as intellectual property law. Ms Merkel is also seeking mutual recognition of technical standards for products such as cars." The Times adds, "In her first interview with an international newspaper since becoming chancellor, Ms Merkel told the Financial Times she would make achieving a 'transatlantic economic partnership' central to Germany's presidency of the European Union, which began this week." Merkel's "ambition is to create a single transatlantic market for investors."

Dobbs Blasts DaimlerChrysler Over Alliance With China. CNN's Lou Dobbs, on Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/2), said, "DaimlerChrysler is now teaming up with communist China's cherry automobile, the Chinese company will be manufacturing a small car for the U.S. market because DaimlerChrysler executives say they can't make a profit if they build them in this country. They apparently can sell them here. … The deal has critics of Bush's trade and industrial policy alarmed." Peter Morici, University of Maryland: "Within ten years, China could wipe out the lower end of the U.S. market. It's not astounding, not when you consider how jugheaded U.S. policy has been towards China. We let them in the WTO, gave them free access to this market. They maintain high tariffs there. They require U.S. automakers to make their cars there." Dobbs added, "Just when you think U.S. trade policy can't get any dumber or more antithetical to the American worker…"

Yuan's Rise Hurting Chinese Exporters. The Wall Street Journal (1/3, A2, Areddy, 2.04M) reports from Shanghai, "The Chinese currency's rising value has started to pinch an increasing number of businesses here, eroding already thin profit margins, forcing them to reduce expenses and sometimes costing them business. The tightly controlled Chinese yuan has crept up 6% since July 2005, when the government loosened its link to the US dollar." The Journal adds "US companies that have extensive operations in China are also feeling the effects."

Biden Urges "Responsible Russian Approach" To Kosovo. Sen. Joe Biden, the incoming chairman of the US Senate foreign relations committee, writes in the Financial Times (1/3), "Years of hand-wringing and chest-thumping over the future status of Kosovo may finally be drawing to a close. In the next few months, adroit diplomacy to secure Kosovo's independence could yield a victory for Muslim democracy, a better future for south-east Europe and validation for the judicious use of American power." But "along with the potential for triumph in Kosovo, there is a growing risk that Serbia and Russia will conspire to seize defeat from the jaws of victory." Biden adds that "success in Kosovo, if realised, will have implications far beyond the Balkans. A responsible Russian approach to the issue could demonstrate the Kremlin's commitment to global order at a time when its credibility is in tatters."

Western Powers Urged To Push For Transition To Democracy In Turkmenistan. Nurmuhammet Hanamov, the founding chairman of the Republican Party of Turkmenistan in exile, writes in a Washington Post op-ed (1/3, A19) titled "A New Beginning For Turkmenistan" that with the death of dictator Saparmurad Niyazov, "the West has a historic second chance to help our country make a peaceful transition to democracy. … The United States must send a clear message to Niyazov's holdouts in the 'interim government' in Ashgabat: that they will not have its support unless they agree to hold free and fair elections -- ones that allow all citizens of Turkmenistan, including exiled opposition leaders and political prisoners, to take part."

Gazprom-Belarus Deal Sparks Commentary. The New York Times (1/3, 1.16M) editorializes, "A year after Russia put the gas squeeze on Ukraine, it was Belarus's turn. Unlike Ukraine, Belarus blinked two minutes before the Jan. 1 deadline and Russia had its booty: a 50 percent share of Belarus's pipeline network and a more than doubling of the price Belarus will now pay for Russian gas." This "latest squeeze is another warning that the Kremlin will let nothing — personal loyalty, contracts, the law — halt its drive to reimpose state control on Russia's energy sector. It is also another reminder that the West, a big consumer of Russian energy, remains vulnerable to President Vladimir Putin's whims."

In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (1/3, 2.04M) writes that "this latest rendition of Moscow's spigot shakedown carries a blueprint for its strategy toward the rest of the Continent, and Europe's leaders ignore it at their peril." Gazprom "has been transparent about its aim to own the pipes that connect its gas fields to its customers. This is one of the main reasons Moscow refuses to ratify the International Energy Charter, which requires free access to pipeline networks, and why it is lobbying hard against European Union plans to liberalize its gas market. As part of that reform, the EU would likely prohibit gas suppliers from owning pipelines, and vice versa." The Journal concludes, "We'll get an idea of how European policy makers size up the threat from Russia on Thursday, when the EU's Gas Coordination Group meets, and next week when the European Commission unveils its energy sector review. No news on the liberalization front will be bad news."

In an editorial, the Washington Post (1/3, A18, 690K) says the deal advances "Russia's disturbing campaign to monopolize energy supplies to Europe." The Post adds, "Belarusan President Alexander Lukashenko is widely known as Europe's last dictator. What's less well known is that he has been resisting pressure from Russia to annex his country." Putin "is consequently using 'market pricing' to extract what he wants from Belarus."

LATimes Praises Sinn Fein For Accepting Police Force. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (1/3, 850K) praises Sinn Fein leader Gerry Adams for asking "a party conference to approve a motion supporting the 'police services' in both Northern Ireland and the predominantly Catholic Irish Republic. A recognition by Sinn Fein of the new Police Service of Northern Ireland — a replacement for the Royal Ulster Constabulary long distrusted by Catholics — would be a momentous step. It would add the final piece to the jigsaw puzzle of a new arrangement in which the North's pro-British Protestant majority shares power with the Catholic minority." If "power sharing is revived, credit will belong not only to Northern Ireland's erstwhile enemies but to the United States."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Leahy Warns Justice Over Terror Policies (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, January 3, 2007

The incoming chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee yesterday described as "disappointing" the Justice Department's refusal to release documents detailing the Bush administration's interrogation and detention policy for terrorism suspects.

Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat, called on the department and the White House to "reconsider their response" and work with the committee "to promptly share this information, with any appropriate confidentiality safeguards."

Mr. Leahy, who bitterly criticized FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III last month during a committee hearing for refusing to discuss the Bush administration's domestic terrorist-surveillance program, has promised that as chairman he will target what he called the "unprecedented" efforts by the administration to "hide its own activities from the public."

"The department's decision to brush off my request for information about the administration's troubling interrogation policies is not the constructive step toward bipartisanship that I had hoped for, given President Bush's promise to work with us," he said.

Mr. Leahy said he requested documents in November concerning CIA interrogation methods and described the administration's offer to work with Congress after Democrats take over tomorrow as "political lip service."

"I have advised the attorney general that I plan to pursue this matter further at the committee's first oversight hearing of the Department of Justice," he said.

In November, Mr. Leahy told Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales that the CIA had disclosed the existence of two interrogation-related documents -- a presidential directive regarding the agency's interrogation methods and detention facilities located outside of the United States, and a Justice Department memo regarding CIA interrogation methods.

The CIA disclosures came during an ongoing Freedom of Information Act lawsuit brought by the American Civil Liberties Union.

"Prisoner abuse is one aspect of a broader problem, which includes the use of so-called 'extraordinary renditions' to send people to other countries where they will be subject to torture," Mr. Leahy said. "We diminish our own values as a nation -- and lose credibility as an advocate of human rights around the world -- by engaging in, or outsourcing, torture."

His request for documents included records describing CIA interrogation methods or policies for the treatment of detainees, including a directive signed by Mr. Bush governing CIA interrogation methods. He also sought documents regarding the legality of specific interrogation tactics.

In September, the Republican-controlled Congress passed a bill giving Mr. Bush wide latitude in interrogating and detaining captured enemy combatants. Democrats opposed the measure and have vowed to revisit the issue once they take control of Congress.

Mr. Leahy, joined by several Democrats and outgoing Republican Chairman Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, have challenged a provision in the bill that prohibits a detainee from protesting his detention in court. They have argued that it is unconstitutional.
