At a forum on both referendums Wednesday night, Gay and Ryerson made their case for keeping troops in Iraq, and two members of Veterans for Peace argued against the war. Withdrawal is "logical, practical and absolutely necessary" and should be followed with humanitarian aid, said David Giffey, a Vietnam War veteran from nearby Arena. "If we leave, (Iraq) belongs to the insurgency," Gay said. "Part of the cost of freedom is sometimes people have to risk their lives."

Special education teacher Robin Van Rooy, 41, listened attentively. "I'd like to see the troops come back now, but I guess I worry about the consequences," she says. She's dismayed by the growing number of U.S. dead in Iraq. However, she worries that withdrawal would leave Iraq "a big mess."

Heather Heinzer, 28, a mom who works from home selling custom photo albums, shares Van Rooy's concerns. "It's not a cut-and-dried issue," she said at the forum. "I could sit here and cry at the thought of all the things the people serving in Iraq are missing. But if we leave, where does that leave the Iraqi people?"

Nurse Barbara Buttchen, 56, isn't sure how she'll vote but says giving people a chance to have their say is important: "The president is supposed to listen to all of us."

Philip Stephens: Democracy Requires Patience (FT)

By Philip Stephens

Financial Times, March 31, 2006

There is an interesting and, for outsiders, rather amusing spat raging in Washington between neo-conservatives past and present. Francis Fukuyama, once a celebrated cheerleader for the muscular interventionism that led the US into war with Iraq, has recanted. The invasion was a mistake. The US cannot remake the tyrannies of the world in its own democratic image.

Such apostasy has greatly irritated those who believe that the mission to spread freedom and democracy around the world is George W. Bush's last chance for an enduring legacy. Power never flows faster than away from a second-term president. Mr Bush has exhausted his political capital earlier than most. This week the president looked on helplessly as Republicans in Congress fought themselves to a standstill about immigration.

Mr Fukuyama's rediscovery of himself as something called a Wilsonian realist has drawn a sharp response from erstwhile allies. Charles Krauthammer, a high priest of the neo-conservative faith, used his column in The Washington Post the other day to launch a scathing counter-attack. It was the latest of many.

Yet the neo-cons have been in broad retreat for some time. Many, particularly those once clustered around Dick Cheney, the vice-president, and Donald Rumsfeld, the defence secretary, have left the administration. Mr Rumsfeld himself is blamed by just about everybody in Washington for the incompetence that has led to the chaos in Iraq.

So we might simply smile at this latest falling out among erstwhile friends and move on. Mr Fukuyama hardly has a hotline to the president. Nor is he well known for consistency. In the acerbic observation of a fellow academic, he has made an excellent living from changing his mind.

I thought that a little unkind. Mr Fukuyama's conversion to the efficacy of soft power as an instrument of foreign policy is to be applauded. "Wilsonian realism" sounds uncannily like the "liberal internationalism" that some in the European Union have been advocating for the past several decades.

What makes the schism among neo-cons interesting is that it parallels a serious political debate, inside and outside the administration, about whether the US can align a foreign policy constructed around values with the more pressing daily concerns of geopolitics. As the presidency stumbles, the so-called Bush doctrine is under increasing fire.

The president has not changed his mind. He is as firm as ever in his conviction that America must use its power for a moral purpose. The administration's latest National Security Strategy sets as the first pillar of US foreign policy "promoting freedom, justice and human dignity". In a conscious echo of the president's second inaugural address of January 2005, the new strategy sets out in some detail why the spread of democracy is the answer to terrorism. In deference to the growing unpopularity of the Iraq war, the paper does tone down military dimensions of the policy, embracing in its place "transformational diplomacy". But the objective remains.

If the debacle in Iraq has demonstrated the limits of US military power, Mr Bush's democracy agenda still attests to the power of ideas in politics. Democrats will concede that one of the reasons American foreign policy drifted during Bill Clinton's presidency is because the administration eschewed any binding philosophy. If nothing else, the neo-conservatives set the terms of a new debate.

In other circumstances, one would expect the party of Woodrow Wilson to support Mr Bush's ambitions, if not his means. One Clinton-era foreign policy adviser told me this week there was little in Mr Bush's second inaugural address with which he could disagree. But the Democrats have not forgiven themselves for supporting the Iraq war. Proselytising for democracy sounds too much these days like military adventurism.

In any event, the Democrats' loathing of the president transcends policy considerations. Recent political battles, not least over the proposed takeover of some US container terminals by Dubai Ports World, have seen the minority party retreat, quite shamelessly, into a foreign policy based on fortress America.

There are plenty of Republicans who are similarly inclined. The party's traditional realists in Congress have been joined by those who see self-interested nationalism as the best way to defend their seats in the coming mid-term elections.

Within the administration, meanwhile, officials are struggling to give policy substance to Mr Bush's foreign policy idealism. In the words of one senior figure the challenge is to "operationalise" the new security strategy. The signs are that they have not gone very far. Word has it that attempts by Mr Bush's National Security Council to set out what it implies for each of America's myriad global relationships have run into the sands of inter-agency dispute. Values are too often colliding with short-term interests.

The jolt to the strategy delivered by the victory of Hamas in the Palestinian elections is still evident. Mr Bush is said to be unrepentant about his insistence the elections should go ahead. Yet there is precious little evidence that the administration knows how to deal with the new political realities in the region.

The relationship with Russia poses a different set of problems. No one pretends that Vladimir Putin has done anything other than reverse Russia's always uncertain march towards democracy. But equally, Mr Bush needs Mr Putin's help to keep up the pressure on Iran over its nuclear programme. As for the drive to democratise the greater Middle East, where does the balance lie between freedom and oil?

Quiz the administration officials charged with striking these balances and they will tell you that there are never easy trade-offs. Promoting democracy, in the words of one senior official, was always going to be "messy". It is a generational project. If some had made the mistake of overestimating how much could be done in the short term, it would be equally foolish to underestimate what could be achieved over the long term. Maybe. But the frequent talk in this administration about legacy raises the suspicion that it has become a substitute for hard policy choices now. Wilsonian realism, liberal internationalism, call it what you will, requires consistency and patience. These are hard to find in a weakened presidency.

Inside The Ring (WT)

By Bill Gertz And Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, March 31, 2006

Unrestricted warfare

Two of China's most notorious military strategists are coming to the United States, not as guests of the Pentagon, but under a State Department program.

Col. Qiao Liang and Col. Wang Xiangsui are authors of the 1999 book "Unrestricted Warfare," which advocates China's use all forms of warfare, including state-supported terrorism, to win future conflicts.

"From a military standpoint, then, the traditional terror war is characterized by the use of limited resources to fight an unlimited war," they wrote.

The colonels' visit, expected in the next few weeks, comes amid questions about the Pentagon's military exchange program with China led by Adm. William J. Fallon, head of the U.S. Pacific Command.

Pentagon officials tell us China's military for nearly a decade has failed to cooperate with the United States in its selection of military officers for exchanges.

Policy-oriented military leaders have been blocked from the exchange program and their identity within an officer corps, estimated to be as many as 300,000 officers, remains a secret.

Instead, the Chinese military only sends officers who either seek information on U.S. warfighting weaknesses, or older generals who soon retire and thus cannot influence the future of China's military.

In one case several years ago, a Chinese officer asked a U.S. Navy officer during a visit to identify the key weakness of a U.S. aircraft carrier, a major Chinese target in any U.S.-Chinese conflict over Taiwan.

The officer was naively told that the weakest point is under the hull, and that it also happens to be closest to where its ammunition is stored.

Within two years of the disclosure, U.S. intelligence agencies detected Chinese military purchases of Russian wake-homing torpedoes that target ships from the rear and explode underneath the hull.

"The whole exchange program has been a nightmare," said one official.

The challenge for Adm. Fallon is to prevent China from spying on U.S. military secrets and to persuade Beijing to send influential younger officers to learn the full extent of U.S. military power with the goal of avoiding any future miscalculation.

The new Chinese general in charge of the exchanges is Maj. Gen. Zhang Qinsheng, who recently replaced Lt. Gen. Xiong Guangkai, the Chinese military intelligence chief who in the past chose all the Chinese military exchange visitors.

If Gen. Zhang is also named to replace Gen. Xiong as military intelligence chief, Pentagon officials tell us they expect more of the same from the exchanges.

Lion tale

It was one of those accusations against American soldiers that was readily believed by the press. Two Iraqis said in November they were thrown to the lions when being detained in 2003.

But there did not appear to be any corroboration for such a bizarre tale. Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld singled out the press' acceptance of the story as an example of the American media wanting to believe the worst in the U.S. military.

"We've arrived at a strange time in this country where the worst about America and our military seems to so quickly be taken as truth by the press and reported and spread around the world, often with little context and little scrutiny, let alone correction or accountability after the fact," Mr. Rumsfeld said in a speech last December.

"Recently there were claims by two Iraqis on a speaking tour that U.S. soldiers attacked them with lions. It was widely reported around the United States. It is still without substantiation. And yet that story was spread across the globe."

The Army pledged to investigate. Col. Joe Curtin, an Army spokesman at the Pentagon, tells us the probe came up empty.

"Army [criminal investigative division] reviewed the allegations concerning the lions and determined there was insufficient information upon which to initiate an investigation," Col. Curtin said.

The late Uday Hussein, one of Saddam's sadistic sons, owned lions as pets. They were moved to a reopened Baghdad zoo in 2003.

Poppy season

"You have a confluence in Helmand of criminals and Taliban and poor farmers, and the poor farmers raise poppy because the Helmand River gives them a water source, the soil is good, and the climate is very good for growing poppy. And so they can produce a rather large amount of poppy with a very small investment of time and labor in their fields.

"That poppy then is produced by primarily narco-trafficking organizations that move it out of Helmand and into other parts of the country and then out of the country. And with the funding that they get, they then can provide money to primarily Taliban, not so much al Qaeda, in Helmand. They can provide funds to the Taliban to recruit fighters, to train fighters, to buy weapons and arms. And in many cases, some of the farmers are threatened by the Taliban to either continue to grow the poppy to generate the funds or face death."

Terror training

The more documents that emerge from Saddam Hussein's reign of terror, the more evidence stacks up that his regime was in lockstep with international terrorists.

Newly released papers seized after the March 2003 U.S.-led invasion reveal contacts made between Saddam's top aides and Osama bin Laden, particularly during the al Qaeda leader's stay in Sudan.

The huge collection also gave a history of the regime put out last week by U.S. Forces Command.

The command told of meticulously kept files by the Gestapolike Fedayeen Saddam, which the dictator put in place to prevent military coups and to enforce his rule through threats and killings.

The documents show the fanatical Fedayeen operated bustling terror training camps for recruits from all over the Middle East.

The book, titled, "The Iraqi Perspective Project," states:

"Beginning in 1994, the Fedayeen Saddam opened its own paramilitary training camps for volunteers, graduating more than 7,200 'good men racing full with courage and enthusiasm' in the first year. Beginning in 1998, these camps began hosting 'Arab volunteers from Egypt, Palestine, Jordan, the Gulf and Syria.' It is not clear from available evidence where all of these non-Iraqi volunteers who were 'sacrificing for the cause' went to ply their newfound skills.

"Before the summer of 2002, most volunteers went home upon the completion of training. But these training camps were humming with frenzied activity in the months immediately prior to the war. As late as January 2003, the volunteers participated in a special event called the 'Heroes Attack.'

"This training event was designed in part to prepare regional Fedayeen Saddam commands to 'obstruct the enemy from achieving his goal and to support keeping peace and stability in the province.' "

Overseen by Saddam's son, Uday, the Fedayeen trained foreign "heroes" and Iraqis in commando tactics, surveillance and explosives. The Iraqi Intelligence Service supplied the Fedayeen with silencers, training in explosives and booby-trapping cars, and timers.

"The only apparent use for all of this ... equipment was to conduct commando or terrorist operations," the Joint Forces history said.

Afghan Convert Thanks Pope For Intervening (AP-Y2)

By Maria Sanminiatelli

AP2, March 30, 2006

An Afghan who faced the death penalty in his homeland for converting from Islam to Christianity said Thursday he was certain he would have been killed had he stayed there, and he thanked Pope Benedict XVI for intervening on his behalf.

"In Kabul, they would have killed me, I'm sure of it," said Abdul Rahman, who was spirited out of Afghanistan to a secret location in Italy. "If you are not a Muslim in an Islamic country like mine, they kill you. There are no doubts."

He said his case was to serve as an example "to others who dared rebel."

Rahman's comments, in a short interview to Italian journalists, came hours after Italy formally granted him asylum, citing religious persecution, the ministry said.

Video on Italian television evening news showed a few people gathered around a small table. It never showed Rahman's face and the Interior Ministry has said that Rahman was "under protection."

Premier Silvio Berlusconi said Rahman arrived in Italy before dawn Wednesday, hours before the conservative leader announced that the government would take him in.

His case has attracted wide attention in the West and led to calls by the U.S. and other governments for the Afghan government to protect the convert.

The pope had appealed to Afghan President Hamid Karzai, and the United Nations sought a country to take him in after Muslim clerics in Afghanistan threatened his life, saying his conversion was a "betrayal to Islam."

Benedict wrote to Karzai on March 22 that dropping the case "would bestow great honor upon the Afghan people and would raise a chorus of admiration in the international community."

Since his arrival in Italy, the Vatican has made no comment. There was no indication of any plan to arrange a meeting between Rahman and the pope.

"Thanks to the (Italian) government. And thanks to Pope Benedict XVI. The pontiff took an interest in my case, and thanks to him, the U.N. intervened," Rahman told reporters.

He was released from prison Monday after a court dismissed charges of apostasy against him for of a lack of evidence and suspicions he might be mentally ill.

Conversion is a crime under Afghanistan's Islamic law. Rahman, 41, was arrested last month after police discovered him with a Bible. He was brought to trial last week for converting 16 years ago while working as a medical aid worker for an international Christian group helping Afghan refugees in Pakistan.

Rahman also said he was worried for his family, still in Afghanistan.

"On the streets, you still have Taliban and they kill those who are not Muslims," Rahman said. "I'm a father. My children are still there."

Italy has close ties with Afghanistan, whose former king, Mohammed Zaher Shah, was allowed to live with his family in exile in Rome for 30 years. The former royals returned to Kabul after the fall of the Taliban regime.

Italian troops were sent into Afghanistan after the U.S.-led invasion of the country in 2001 to help with reconstruction and Italy still has 1,775 troops there.

Rahman's ordeal began as a custody battle for his two daughters, now 13 and 14. The girls lived with their grandparents, but Rahman sought custody when he returned to Afghanistan in 2002 after living in Germany for nine years. The matter was later taken to police, and during questioning, it emerged that Rahman was a Christian and was carrying a Bible. He was immediately arrested and charged.

Pentagon To Test A Huge Conventional Bomb (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

A huge mushroom cloud of dust is expected to rise over Nevada's desert in June when the Pentagon plans to detonate a gigantic 700-ton explosive -- the biggest open-air chemical blast ever at the Nevada Test Site -- as part of the research into developing weapons that can destroy deeply buried military targets, officials said yesterday.

The test, code-named "Divine Strake," will occur on June 2 about 90 miles northwest of Las Vegas in a high desert valley bounded by mountains, according to Pentagon and Energy Department officials.

"This is the largest single explosive we could imagine doing," said James A. Tegnelia, director of the Pentagon's Defense Threat Reduction Agency, which is conducting the test.

The test is aimed at determining how well a massive conventional bomb would perform against fortified underground targets -- such as military headquarters, biological or chemical weapons stockpiles, and long-range missiles -- that the Pentagon says are proliferating among potential adversaries around the world.

Tegnelia said there is a range of technical hurdles to overcome. He suggested that big conventional bombs are unlikely to solve the overall problem of buried threats. "It's a lot easier to dig your tunnel 50 feet deeper" than to develop weapons that can destroy it, he told a meeting of defense reporters.

Such a bomb would be a conventional alternative to a nuclear weapon proposed by the Bush administration, which has run into opposition on Capitol Hill. The Pentagon for several years has sought funding for research into the Robust Nuclear Earth Penetrator (RNEP) -- also known as the "bunker buster" -- after the administration's 2001 Nuclear Posture Review stated that no weapon in the U.S. arsenal could threaten a growing number of buried targets. Congress, however, has repeatedly refused to grant funding for a study on a nuclear bunker buster, instead directing money toward conventional alternatives.

The June test will detonate 700 tons of heavy ammonium nitrate-fuel oil emulsion -- creating a blast equivalent to 593 tons of TNT -- in a 36-foot-deep hole near a tunnel in the center of the Nevada Test Site, according to official reports. It aims to allow scientists to model the type of ground shock that will be created, and to weigh the effectiveness of such a weapon against its collateral impact.

"To my knowledge, this will be the largest open-air chemical explosion that we've conducted," said Darwin Morgan, spokesman for the Energy Department's test site. Larger blasts have been carried out at the White Sands Missile Range in New Mexico, including the nation's biggest open-air detonation, in 1985, a Pentagon spokeswoman said.

The blast is not likely to be felt or heard outside the 1,375-square-mile test site, and the cloud of dust is expected to dissipate quickly from view, Morgan said. "They don't think people will see it in the base camp on the south end of the test site," he said.

Officials took pains to differentiate between the June conventional experiment and past nuclear testing. "The U.S. has no plans to conduct a nuclear test. President Bush supports a continued moratorium on nuclear testing," said Irene Smith, a spokeswoman for the Defense Threat Reduction Agency (DTRA). The Pentagon agency is charged with countering threats to the United States from chemical, biological, radiological and nuclear weapons.

On a related topic, Tegnelia said the State Department and the Pentagon are developing a proposal for a $100 million effort to help Libya get rid of tons of mustard gas and some precursor chemicals being stored in the Libyan desert. "The Libyans requested some support" from the U.S. government, and a DTRA team has visited Libya to consider various options for eliminating the weapons, he said.

DOJ:

Attorney General Warns Kids About Online Thievery (AP)

SAN JOSE, Calif. (AP) - U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales brought a simple message to middle school students on Thursday: Don't steal.

``I'm the top cop in the U.S. and I want you to know that if you illegally download a game or music or a video it's stealing, just as if you went into a store and stole blue jeans," Gonzales told 7th and 8th graders at Windmill Springs School in the heart of California's Silicon Valley.

The lesson culminated an unusual four-day lesson on intellectual property and copyright infringement during which the nation's top law enforcement official became a classroom teacher.

Most children these days are exposed to Internet safety messages, both in television and in the classroom, but curriculum has only recently been developed about software piracy, copyright laws and intellectual property.

Entertainment software corporate leaders have repeatedly said the public simply doesn't understand that there are rules when it comes to usage of the Internet and computers.

But Windmill Springs students said Thursday that they got the message.

``Most kids know it's wrong to download some movies or songs or copy games and CDs but they figure that if they can do it on a computer then they will," said Andrew Lopez, 13. ``But not me. You can get a fine. You can go to jail."

Gonzales said the consequences of intellectual property theft are just starting to be understood.

``I'm not kidding myself that we have a lot of work to do, but that doesn't mean we shouldn't try," he said.

The Justice Department's Intellectual Property task force was established just two years ago. Since then the number of people prosecuted for intellectual property offenses has almost doubled as investigators have targeted hackers and counterfeiters.

Is it legal to copy games just for your friends?

``No, it's not," said Hirsch.

``You shouldn't do it, but you probably won't get in trouble," said Hirsch.

Why do computers even have CD burners on them?

``People think one song, one game, what difference does it make," said Hirsch. ``Unfortunately the nature of this industry is that you can bleed to death from thousands of papercuts."

Jon Dudas, director of the U.S. Patents and Trade Office, joined Gonzales at the school, telling students that while everyone understands why they shouldn't steal cars, understanding the law can be a bit more complicated when it comes to games, movies and music.

``If you steal your friend's car, they don't have a car anymore, but if you take a copy of a friend's video game they still have a copy," he said. ``You're not stealing the game, you're stealing ideas."

The school event was video taped by Court TV for an upcoming public affairs program on intellectual property theft.

U.S. Attorney General Assures Portlanders He's Up On Security (OREG)

The Oregonian, March 31, 2006

Visit - Alberto Gonzales outlines administration priorities at a business alliance breakfast Attorney General Alberto Gonzales gave the Portland Business Alliance a quick review Thursday of the Bush administration's priorities, saying, "Every day, I ask m

Making his first trip to Portland, Gonzales spoke to the city business group at a breakfast meeting, then he said he planned to "review the troops" in the U.S. attorney's office in Portland.

On Wednesday, he visited the Yakama Indian reservation in Washington; he was scheduled to go on to Texas and California later.

At a brief news conference after the business breakfast, Gonzales said he would not comment on an Oregon lawsuit by an Islamic charity in Ashland that says it was a target of secret federal wiretapping and searches.

Public access to documents in the case has been prohibited, and Gonzales said that in cases such as the lawsuit, records "can be and should be withheld." Of Oregon's assisted-suicide law, which the Justice Department has fought and lost before the U.S. Supreme Court, Gonzales said: "That matter has been decided by the courts, and the courts have indicated what the law prevents." -- Anne Saker

Attorney General Asserts Internet Privacy 'Balance' (STREET)

By Troy Wolverton, TheStreet.com Senior Writer

TheStreet.com, March 31, 2006

SAN JOSE, Calif. -- In town to talk with kids about respecting intellectual property, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez found himself addressing questions about the government's respect for online privacy.

In the middle of a legal dispute with Google (GOOG:Nasdaq - news - research - Cramer's Take) over access to search records, the government has come under criticism from consumer privacy advocates. Gonzalez sought to assure critics that the government was trying to strike a "good faith" balance between privacy interests and protecting the public.

Even though a federal judge recently restricted the amount of data the government will potentially have access to in the Google case, Gonzalez appeared unabashed by the government's request. Indeed, in determining the balance between privacy protection and how much information the government will request from private information keepers, the Department of Justice, instead of setting its own limits, will take its lead from Congress and the courts, he said.

"Sometimes the courts will agree, and sometimes they will disagree," he said.

The issue of how much information private companies should hand over to the federal government has come up repeatedly in recent years. Following the 9/11 terrorist attacks, numerous airlines handed over passenger data to federal transportation officials seeking to determine patterns that might lead to finding potential hijackers.

More recently, the Department of Justice has sought data from Internet search engines last year in an effort to determine the prevalence of pornography on the Web. The effort was part of the government's move to defend the Child Online Protection Act, which bans access to material that could be "harmful to children."

While Google has resisted the justice department's request, other Internet search engines, such as those operated by Yahoo! (YHOO:Nasdaq - news - research - Cramer's Take), Microsoft (MSFT:Nasdaq - news - research - Cramer's Take) and Time Warner's (TWX:NYSE - news - research - Cramer's Take) America Online, complied with it.

And they're not alone: the DOJ has subpoenaed 34 other companies for related data, according to published reports.

US AG Gonzales Says Google Case Points To Govt's Limits (DOW)

Dow Jones, March 31, 2006

SAN JOSE -(Dow Jones)- U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said he was pleased with a federal judge's decision in the Google Inc. (GOOG) (GOOG) case two weeks ago, but that it showed there are limits to the kind of information the government can get from Internet companies.

During an appearance here at the Windmill Springs Middle School, Gonzales reiterated that the government had not sought personal information on people using Google's (GOOG) Internet search engine when it subpoenaed the company in August.

"We're not interested in any kind of user information," he said.

In the case, the Bush administration asked for 1 million Web addresses and a week's worth of search queries from the Silicon Valley company. Federal District Judge James Ware reduced that number to 50,000 addresses in his decision on March 17 but said the company would not be compelled to hand over a sample of users' search queries.

Gonzales said the judge's decision recognized that the information the government sought was relevant to its defense of the embattled Child Online Protection Act.

"We're happy with the judge's decision," Gonzales said, but "there are limits to what kind of information the government can get."

Separately, Gonzales said he pressed Chinese officials on intellectual property protection when he was in that country several months ago.

Chinese readers at the highest level of government recognize the need for greater protection, said Jon Dudas, undersecretary of Commerce for intellectual property. But "the results are not carried through yet," Dudas said.

In 2005, 70% of counterfeit goods seized at U.S. borders came from mainland China, Dudas said. That was up from 63% in 2004.

Gonzales Says Files In Islamic Case To Remain Sealed (AP)

By JOSEPH B. FRAZIER, The Associated Press

AP, March 30, 2006

PORTLAND, Ore. (AP) — Evidence in a dismissed case against an Ashland branch of an Islamic charity will remain confidential, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Thursday.

Gonzales was in Portland to meet with the U.S. attorney's office in Oregon and to address a breakfast meeting of the Portland Business Alliance.

He said "certain kinds of information can be and should be withheld."

He declined further comment on the case, saying it is in litigation.

A federal lawsuit seeks to shut down electronic surveillance by the National Security Agency, claiming the government illegally wiretapped conversations between the director of the Islamic charity Al-Haramain and two of the charity's attorneys.

The charity had been indicted on tax charges related to money laundering in 2004, but the charges were dismissed.

Lawyers for the charity opposed the dismissal, saying they wanted to know what evidence the government had.

One secret document in the lawsuit has been ordered held in a secure facility in Seattle at least for now.

U.S. District Judge Garr King decided that the document couldn't be held securely in a federal courthouse in Portland, and shouldn't be held at the local office of the FBI, which is a defendant in the case.

Gonzales did not elaborate on the broader NSA wiretapping controversy beyond repeating President Bush's position that it is legal.

"I can only talk about what the president has disclosed to the American public in December of last year," he said.

"We have been very, very forthcoming about his authorities," he said. He said members of Congress continue to get briefings.

On immigration reform, Gonzales said Congress should "keep in mind the president's broad principles."

He said Bush favors a guest worker program but opposes amnesty.

What constitutes amnesty, he said, is under discussion in Congress.

"The president says he will not support a program that provides amnesty to those who have broken the law," Gonzales said.

"We need to find a way to reach a solution here that takes into account the reality that we have 11 (million)-12 million people in this country who are providing service," he said.

But he said the policy also must stress that laws need to be followed.

U.S. Attorney General Speaks At Portland Breakfast (KOIN-TV)

By Lynn Huston, KOIN News 6

KOIN-TV, CBS 6, Portland, March 31, 2006

PORTLAND -- It could be winter before Congress passes an immigration bill. That's because there is a growing split among Republicans over what to do about it.

One of President Bush's point men on the issue was in Portland Thursday morning.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales certainly has been one of the president's must trusted advisors on the issue, but he stuck with what has been the White House script.

Speaking to a morning breakfast for the Portland Business Alliance, Gonzales praised the local U.S. Attorney's Office for a recent meth bust which was the largest in state history. He also pledged to continue to pursue sexual predators who use the Internet, corruption in government and gang violence.

After his speech, Gonzales restated his support for immigration reform, including a guest worker program. But he offered no opinion on the legal definition of amnesty for illegal immigrants.

"The president says he will not support a program that provides amnesty to those who have broken the law and come into our country unlawfully. But as to how you define it, that's part of the ongoing debate within the Congress," Gonzales said.

Leaders of both parties seem to agree that it will probably be sometime after the November election before any final decision is made on immigration reform.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Judges Order Release On Bail For Ex-Broker In Enron Case (NYT)

By Julie Creswell And Landon Thomas Jr.

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

In a surprise move, the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit in Houston late yesterday ordered that a former Merrill Lynch executive, William Fuhs, be immediately released on bail awaiting final decision on his appeal.

Mr. Fuhs was one of four former Merrill employees convicted in 2004 on fraud and conspiracy charges involving a 1999 sale by Enron of power generators mounted on barges in Nigeria. Prosecutors argued during the trial that the Merrill executives were guilty of conspiring to defraud investors in an effort to win future banking business from Enron.

The appellate court said the conditions of Mr. Fuhs's release will be established today in a hearing before a federal magistrate judge.

Last May, Judge Ewing Werlein Jr. of the United States District Court in Houston sentenced Mr. Fuhs to three years and one month in prison. In most white-collar criminal cases, the defendants are generally allowed to remain free on bail while their appeals are heard. But Mr. Fuhs and the other former Merrill executives who were convicted were ordered to prison immediately.

Mr. Fuhs was sent to a federal transfer facility in Oklahoma City, where maximum security prisoners are housed for temporary periods. The facility is nearly 700 miles away from Denver, where his wife and two small children live.

Mr. Fuhs's lawyers had argued that the distance violated federal prison policies and was harsher than what was received by the other defendants, all of whom were sent to prisons closer to their families. His lawyers had also argued that the Oklahoma facility had a much higher security level than was required for someone with the "custody classification level" of Mr. Fuhs.

Lawyers for Mr. Fuhs and the other Merrill defendants recently presented oral arguments on their appeals. Lawyers for Mr. Fuhs subsequently filed a motion to have their client released on bail. Calls to Mr. Fuhs's lawyers were not returned last night.

The decision to release Mr. Fuhs on bail, awaiting the outcome of his appeal, could be a recognition of the specific factors that related to Mr. Fuhs's incarceration, said Lawrence Robbins, the lawyer for Daniel H. Bayly, Merrill's former investment banking chief and one of the four convicted in the case.

But Tom Kirkendall, a Houston lawyer who has closely followed the Enron case and has represented clients in other Enron-related cases, interpreted the move as a sign that the appeals court may have been persuaded by the arguments presented to them.

"This is a strong signal that he has a winner on appeal," Mr. Kirkendall said.

Prosecutors contend that Mr. Fuhs and the other Merrill executives conspired with Enron in December 1999 in the purchase of three Nigerian power barges. The government alleged that there was an unspoken deal cut between Mr. Bayly and Andrew S. Fastow, Enron's former chief financial officer, that Enron would buy back the barges from Merrill after six months.

That made the deal, according to prosecutors, a scheme to bolster earnings and hide debt for Enron, rather than a legal transaction.

"We are hopeful that the decision to grant bail for Mr. Fuhs reflects the court's judgment that the claim we made for Mr. Bayly has merit," Mr. Robbins said. Mr. Bayly is serving 30 months at a prison in Virginia.

Possible Snag In An Enron Case (WSJ)

By John R. Emshwiller

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

In the middle of its capstone criminal trial of former Enron Corp. top executives, the federal government has been dealt a possible setback in a related case involving the 2004 conviction of four former executives of Merrill Lynch & Co.

A federal appeals court yesterday ordered that bail be given to former Merrill executive William Fuhs, pending its ruling on the appeal of his conviction in the "Nigerian Barge" case. David Spears, one of Mr. Fuhs's attorneys, said he took the ruling as a hopeful sign that the court, which recently heard oral arguments in the case, will overturn the conviction.

In the 2004 criminal trial, involving the four former Merrill officials and two former Enron officials, the government alleged that Enron had falsely reported income from a bogus sale to Merrill of some electricity-producing barges off the coast of Nigeria. Prosecutors argued that Enron had secretly promised Merrill that it would be quickly taken out of the deal at a profit, which meant a "true sale" never took place because the brokerage giant assumed no risk. The jury also convicted one Enron official and acquitted the other.

The four Merrill officials appealed their convictions and unsuccessfully sought to stay out of prison pending those appeals. All four are currently incarcerated. Only Mr. Fuhs recently reapplied for bail pending the appeal. Attorneys for the other three Merrill officials declined to comment or couldn't be reached.

A Justice Department spokeswoman declined to comment.

People familiar with the barge case say that even if Mr. Fuhs's conviction were overturned, it wouldn't necessarily mean the others would be, too.

The government's biggest Enron case is currently unfolding in a Houston federal court, where the company's former chairman, Kenneth Lay, and former president, Jeffrey Skilling, face conspiracy and fraud charges. Prosecutors rested their case earlier this week, and the trial is scheduled to resume Monday with the defense beginning its presentation.

Skilling Lawyer Could Be Key For Lay, Too (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

HOUSTON, March 30 -- Daniel M. Petrocelli is no stranger to the national stage. But he's more at home representing entertainers such as Lisa Marie Presley and John Travolta than defending former corporate executives trying to stay out of prison.

The California attorney is acting as a criminal defense lawyer for the first time, on behalf of former Enron Corp. chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling, accused of leading one of the most complicated white-collar conspiracies in history.

And as the defense prepares to begin its case Monday, Petrocelli has emerged as perhaps the most potent factor on behalf of both his client and former chairman Kenneth L. Lay. Both men face multiple fraud charges that could send them to prison for decades.

There are two teams of defense lawyers, but during the prosecution's case, Petrocelli dominated the cross-examination of the government's witnesses, in part because Lay's top lawyer had health problems.

Defense lawyers are engaging in careful choreography in a trial where their clients' interests sometimes converge and sometimes conflict. In the course of the nine-week-old trial, the defendants have displayed a few subtle disruptions in their alliance. But to the surprise of some legal experts, Skilling and Lay have stuck together for the most part, despite acute differences in their personal styles and in the evidence against them.

The critical question is whether they will point fingers at each other when they each take the witness stand in coming weeks. Of the approximately two dozen witnesses the defense expects to call, the defendants are far and away the most important. In a real sense, their lives are in their own hands.

The 52-year-old Skilling, who led day-to-day operations at Enron for years, will testify as soon as the week of April 10. Lay, 63, will take the stand shortly thereafter, defense lawyers said. In between, their defense teams will call lesser-known Enron employees to support their arguments that Enron was not a "house of cards" but rather a "shining star," as Petrocelli argued in opening statements.

"We're looking forward to getting on the stand and getting our case out there, get the positive case out," Lay told reporters earlier this week. His lawyer, Michael W. Ramsey, predicted Thursday that Lay will be his own star witness in a performance that "will win the case for us."

Skilling has remained silent, on the advice of his lawyers. They said they would do nothing to alter the demeanor of their client, who is known for his bluntness, in advance of his turn on the witness stand.

On cross-examination, prosecutors are likely to press both men about their knowledge of Enron's financial troubles in August 2001, as Skilling departed and handed the reins to Lay. Skilling probably also will face questions about inconsistencies in more than 2,000 pages of sworn testimony he gave to the Securities and Exchange Commission and to Congress, including the reasons he sold a half-million shares of Enron stock that September.

The defendants say they are operating at a disadvantage because important potential witnesses, including former retail unit leader Lou Pai, former treasurer Jeffrey McMahon, onetime vice chairman Lawrence "Greg" Whalley and former trading chief John Lavorato, have signaled they will invoke their Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination rather than testify.

That leaves defense lawyers relying on documents and on such figures as Joannie Williamson, a former subordinate in the investor relations unit who went on to work for Lay. Williamson, who is scheduled to be the defense's first witness Monday, is likely to tell jurors that she heard her friend Mark E. Koenig say he did nothing wrong at the company but pleaded guilty anyway under government pressure.

That appears to contradict testimony by former investor relations head Koenig and supports a key defense argument: that company insiders did not believe they were breaking the law at the time, only coming to view their activity in that light under pressure from federal investigations. The conspiracy counts against Lay and Skilling are based on the notion that they were in league with 16 other Enron executives who have acknowledged that what they did was wrong. So defense lawyers are attacking the credibility of those pleas.

Each defendant will be allowed to call up to five character witnesses, a limit U.S. District Judge Simeon T. Lake III said is designed to avoid jurors listening to the "whole panoply of Houston society." Lay had hoped to call the owner of the Houston Astros baseball team, a pioneering heart surgeon, a former Commerce Department secretary and several religious leaders. Expert witnesses also will testify on the defendants' behalf. In part because he is backed by a vast team of partners, associates, paralegals and researchers from his 1,000-lawyer firm, O'Melveny & Myers LLP, and more than $23 million in fees from his client, Petrocelli and his team have taken the lead for the defense.

Ramsey, the lead lawyer for Lay, has somewhat fewer resources at his disposal, relying on a team composed of Dallas securities lawyer Bruce W. Collins, prominent Houston appeals court specialist George "Mac" Secrest and former local prosecutor Chip B. Lewis. In his four-decade career, Ramsey, a folksy litigator who bonds with local juries, has pulled out a series of victories, including a 2003 acquittal of real estate heir Robert Durst. Durst was accused of killing his neighbor, dismembering the body and throwing it into the Gulf of Mexico.

On Lay's behalf, Ramsey has pursued a bold, all-or-nothing strategy, arguing that Lay should not be held criminally responsible for the failure of his business nor the optimistic statements he made in an effort to save it. In essence, the defense suggests that focusing on the positive to calm employees and the markets is common practice, even a duty, of corporate leaders. "Do you want a Chicken Little at the helm of a company like Enron, every time it rains a little bit, saying, 'Oh, my God. The sky is falling?' " Ramsey asked in opening statements. "You want somebody with a steady hand on the helm, with guts enough to stay steady in the midst of a storm."

Ramsey revealed Tuesday that he had had heart problems since at least the third week of the trial and that he had a stent put in one of his arteries last week. He had questioned fewer than a half-dozen of the 22 government witnesses before the surgery.

As a result, the bonds between the Skilling and Lay defense teams grew stronger, as Petrocelli handled the heavy lifting, including most of last week's cross-examination of former treasurer Ben F. Glisan Jr., even though Glisan provided more testimony about Lay than Skilling.

Petrocelli acknowledged the point, noting that he was asking about a key internal meeting more than two weeks after Skilling resigned and Lay took over. The defense lawyer said he hoped he was not encroaching on his co-counsel's turf. But the Lay team didn't object. "That's okay," Lay mouthed to his daughter, Elizabeth Vittor, a lawyer who is part of his defense team and who typically sits between Lay and Skilling at the defense table.

Perhaps most important, Petrocelli has won the confidence of Lake, who told the defense lawyer last month that "you're making a pretty good showing for yourself" in his first attempt at criminal defense.

Until the eight-woman, four-man jury renders its verdict, it is difficult to know how jurors are evaluating the lawyers. Petrocelli's personal style is more Century City than Old West, despite the black alligator cowboy boots he has taken to wearing. In an episode known as "cologne-gate" among trial participants, a female juror took the unusual step of sending a note to the judge last month saying she was overwhelmed by the lawyer's cologne. During a court break, Petrocelli washed off the cologne and has not worn it since.

Outside the courthouse Tuesday, after prosecutors rested their case, Petrocelli jokingly hinted at his desire to return to his roots. "Five or six weeks from now, hopefully we can get through with this, Mr. Skilling can get on with the rest of his life, and I can take off these cowboy boots," he said.

By Mary Williams Walsh

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

The board that writes accounting rules for American business is proposing a new method of reporting pension obligations that is likely to show that many companies have a lot more debt than was obvious before.

In some cases, particularly at old industrial companies like automakers, the newly disclosed obligations are likely to be so large that they will wipe out the net worth of the company.

The panel, the Financial Accounting Standards Board, said the new method, which it plans to issue today for public comment, would address a widespread complaint about the current pension accounting method: that it exposes shareholders and employees to billions of dollars in risks that they cannot easily see or evaluate. The new accounting rule would also apply to retirees' health plans and other benefits.

A member of the accounting board, George Batavick, said, "We took on this project because the current accounting standards just don't provide complete information about these obligations."

The board is moving ahead with the proposed pension changes even as Congress remains bogged down on much broader revisions of the law that governs company pension plans. In fact, Representative John A. Boehner, Republican of Ohio and the new House majority leader, who has been a driving force behind pension changes in Congress, said yesterday that he saw little chance of a finished bill before a deadline for corporate pension contributions in mid-April.

Congress is trying to tighten the rules that govern how much money companies are to set aside in advance to pay for benefits. The accounting board is working with a different set of rules that govern what companies tell investors about their retirement plans.

The new method proposed by the accounting board would require companies to take certain pension values they now report deep in the footnotes of their financial statements and move the information onto their balance sheets — where all their assets and liabilities are reflected. The pension values that now appear on corporate balance sheets are almost universally derided as of little use in understanding the status of a company's retirement plan.

Mr. Batavick of the accounting board said the new rule would also require companies to measure their pension funds' values on the same date they measure all their other corporate obligations. Companies now have delays as long as three months between the time they calculate their pension values and when they measure everything else. That can yield misleading results as market fluctuations change the values.

"Old industrial, old economy companies with heavily unionized work forces" would be affected most sharply by the new rule, said Janet Pegg, an accounting analyst with Bear, Stearns. A recent report by Ms. Pegg and other Bear, Stearns analysts found that the companies with the biggest balance-sheet changes were likely to include General Motors, Ford, Verizon, BellSouth and General Electric.

Using information in the footnotes of Ford's 2005 financial statements, Ms. Pegg said that if the new rule were already in effect, Ford's balance sheet would reflect about $20 billion more in obligations than it now does. The full recognition of health care promised to Ford's retirees accounts for most of the difference. Ford now reports a net worth of $14 billion. That would be wiped out under the new rule. Ford officials said they had not evaluated the effect of the new accounting rule and therefore could not comment.

Applying the same method to General Motors' balance sheet suggests that if the accounting rule had been in effect at the end of 2005, there would be a swing of about $37 billion. At the end of 2005, the company reported a net worth of $14.6 billion. A G.M. spokesman declined to comment, noting that the new accounting rule had not yet been issued.

Many complaints about the way obligations are now reported revolve around the practice of spreading pension figures over many years. Calculating pensions involves making many assumptions about the future, and at the end of every year there are differences between the assumptions and what actually happened. Actuaries keep track of these differences in a running balance, and incorporate them into pension calculations slowly.

That practice means that many companies' pension disclosures do not yet show the full impact of the bear market of 2000-3, because they are easing the losses onto their books a little at a time. The new accounting rule will force them to bring the pension values up to date immediately, and use the adjusted numbers on their balance sheets.

Not all companies would be adversely affected by the new rule. A small number might even see improvement in their balance sheets. One appears to be Berkshire Hathaway. Even though its pension fund has a shortfall of $501 million, adjusting the numbers on its balance sheet means reducing an even larger shortfall of $528 million that the company recognized at the end of 2005.

Berkshire Hathaway's pension plan differs from that of many other companies because it is invested in assets that tend to be less volatile. Its assumptions about investment returns are also lower, and it will not have to make a big adjustment for earlier-year losses when the accounting rule takes effect. Berkshire also looks less indebted than other companies because it does not have retiree medical plans.

Mr. Batavick said he did not know what kind of public comments to expect, but hoped to have a final standard completed by the third quarter of the year. Companies would then be expected to use it for their 2006 annual reports. The rule will also apply to nonprofit institutions like universities and museums, as well as privately held companies.

The rule would not have any effect on corporate profits, only on the balance sheets. The accounting board plans to make additional pension accounting changes after this one takes effect. Those are expected to affect the bottom line and could easily be more contentious.

Pity The Boss, Treated Worse Than Terrorists (NYT)

By Floyd Norris

PITY the oppressed boss.

Suddenly there is a wave of sympathy for overregulated corporate executives. Not only are some going to jail, but the Securities and Exchange Commission is making them pay large fines.

The S.E.C. also wants to force more disclosure of executive compensation. The commission denies that the purpose is to hold down pay, but few bosses believe that.

To hear some people tell it, corporate officials are being victimized in ways that can only inspire sympathy.

The United States Chamber of Commerce is calling on the S.E.C. to stop penalizing companies for refusing to cooperate in investigations and to give companies a break if they can show that some lawyer or accountant blessed the activity the S.E.C. deems illegal.

A new book by John Hasnas, a Georgetown professor who teaches ethics to business students, is called "Trapped: When Acting Ethically Is Against the Law," and concludes we would be better off if there were no criminal enforcement of laws requiring businesses to be honest.

The book, published by the Cato Institute, features the following endorsement by Mark R. Levin, a radio talk show host: "Did you know that in many ways the terrorists detained at Guantánamo Bay have more rights than corporate C.E.O.'s and their employees?"

The book is not as ridiculous as the blurb. Mr. Hasnas does a good job of explaining the current state of criminal law for corporations, which have no Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination, as well as Justice Department policies that offer leniency only to companies that cooperate by turning in employees.

KPMG, the accounting firm, escaped prosecution only by admitting wrongdoing and cutting off defense funds for its former partners accused of wrongdoing. "We pressure the company to be part of the prosecution team," said Mr. Hasnas, thus violating the company's ethical responsibilities to employees who may be innocent.

He conceded that his remedy — halting criminal prosecutions — might go too far. But he said he wanted to be provocative.

As for that blurb by Mr. Levin, Mr. Hasnas said it was solicited by Cato, and was not his business. Does he agree? "It is not just an exaggeration," he said. "It is clearly wrong."

Just four years ago, as WorldCom was collapsing, President Bush endorsed "corporate responsibility" and signed the Sarbanes-Oxley act with vigor. One poll then found that about two-thirds of both Democrats and Republicans thought business leaders had low standards of honesty and ethics. Politicians and even journalists received better marks.

But now many people hope to push aside the Sarbanes-Oxley reforms.

An S.E.C. advisory committee thinks bosses of companies traded on the over-the-counter bulletin board should not be asked to say whether their internal controls are adequate.

LAWYERS including Kenneth W. Starr — of Whitewater fame — are pushing a suit to declare unconstitutional the law's way of regulating accountants.

And some hope the S.E.C. itself, under Christopher Cox, will rein in the enforcement division. They were encouraged when Mr. Cox publicly chastised the enforcement director, Linda C. Thomsen, for subpoenaing journalists without commission approval. It is not that they like journalists, it is just that they would love to see the commissioners voting on every subpoena, offering opportunities to delay and derail investigations.

Next year, when both named authors of the Sarbanes-Oxley act will be out of Congress, there is likely to be a legislative push. It will be called an effort to reduce the cost of compliance with Sarbanes-Oxley, but don't be surprised if the real goal is to make life easier for those who would bend or break the rules.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Ex-FBI Agent Indicted In Mob Killings (AP)

By TOM HAYS

AP, March 30, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) — A retired FBI agent was indicted on murder charges Thursday for allegedly taking bribes from a mobster to supply him with inside information that led to four underworld slayings in Brooklyn.

R. Lindley DeVecchio, 65, was arrested in a case of "confidential leaks, payoffs and death" dating back two decades, District Attorney Charles Hynes said.

DeVecchio pleaded not guilty and was released on $1 million bail. He did not speak at his arraignment. One of the two alleged mob hitmen behind the slayings was jailed without bail. The other was in Florida, awaiting extradition.

Colleagues of the FBI veteran were quick to defend him against the charges.

"We all know Lin, and we all know he's not capable of doing these kinds of things," James Kossler, a former supervisor with the FBI's New York office, said Wednesday. "It's so sad it could happen to a guy like this."

Hynes said the charges stemmed from the unusually close relationship between DeVecchio — then head of the FBI's Colombo crime family squad — and Gregory Scarpa Sr., a government informant and Colombo captain nicknamed "The Grim Reaper."

The pair met each week during the 1980s and '90s and discussed a bloody civil war within the Colombo family. In exchange for bribes, DeVecchio "counseled Scarpa to protect himself by eliminating imminent threats," Hynes said.

In 1984, DeVecchio allegedly warned Scarpa that the girlfriend of a high-ranking Colombo figure was cooperating with federal authorities. As a result, authorities say, she was shot and killed in a Brooklyn social club — a pattern prosecutors said was repeated in three slayings of Scarpa rivals, the last one in 1992.

Scarpa gave DeVecchio weekly payments and also enhanced the agent's reputation within the FBI by helping him solve important cases, Hynes said.

DeVecchio surrendered Wednesday night at the Brooklyn district attorney's office. He had no comment as he entered.

Kossler, former FBI Assistant Director James Kallstrom, ex-agent Joe Pistone, known for infiltrating the mob as Donnie Brasco, and other supporters in law enforcement have begun raising money for DeVecchio's defense on a Web site.

The site notes that the agent was cleared in previous investigations, and it attributes the renewed allegations to convicted mobsters eager to lie in exchange for leniency.

DeVecchio retired in 1996. Scarpa died in prison in 1994.

Retired F.B.I. Agent Is Accused Of Role In Killings (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

When R. Lindley DeVecchio, a 65-year-old retired F.B.I. supervisor, stood up in a courtroom in Brooklyn yesterday to face charges that he had helped his prized Mafia informant commit four murders, the tension was clear.

DOJ_NMG_0024477

On one side of the gallery, filling roughly two-thirds of the blond wood benches, were nearly four dozen mostly gray-haired men in dark-colored suits. Retired F.B.I. agents who had once been Mr. DeVecchio's colleagues, they were now his supporters. Most sat stiffly upright and spoke little.

In front of them, at the prosecution table in the well of the courtroom, sat two somber senior prosecutors from the office of the Brooklyn district attorney, Charles J. Hynes. Mr. Hynes, after a 13-month investigation, had hours earlier announced the indictment of Mr. DeVecchio on charges that he had helped his informant commit four mob murders in the 1980's and early 1990's, accepting weekly payoffs totaling more than $66,000.

Also in the gallery were several more prosecutors and investigators who had worked on the case.

After Mr. DeVecchio's lawyer entered a plea of not guilty on his behalf, one of the prosecutors, Michael F. Vecchione, who is the chief of the district attorney's investigations division, outlined the charges in the case. Mr. Hynes had said the investigation had "uncovered a troubling path of confidential leaks, payoffs and death," and he called the case "the most stunning example of official corruption that I have ever seen."

Mr. Vecchione, in arguing against bail for Mr. DeVecchio, went through each of the murders, detailing for State Supreme Court Justice Gustin L. Reichbach what he said was Mr. DeVecchio's direct role and his reasons for "instructing" his informant, Gregory Scarpa Sr., to commit the killings.

In most of the cases, including the slaying of another mobster's former girlfriend, Mary Bari, the prosecutor said, it was because the victims had begun talking to the authorities and posed a threat to Mr. Scarpa or his relatives. Mr. Scarpa, who contracted AIDS from a transfusion and died in prison in 1994, was a captain in the Colombo crime family.

But it was Mr. Vecchione's argument that former F.B.I. agents had sought to intimidate witnesses on Mr. DeVecchio's behalf, and his contention that a network of former agents who had once worked overseas made him a flight risk, that transformed the hard-fought argument into a pitched battle with the defense.

The contention that the former agents would help Mr. DeVecchio flee prompted groans, angry grumbling and some laughter from retired agents in the gallery.

And Mr. DeVecchio's lawyer, Douglas E. Grover, belittled Mr. Vecchione, contending that his office was unaccustomed to making organized crime cases, a charge Mr. Vecchione sharply disputed.

Mr. DeVecchio is charged with four counts of second-degree murder for acting in concert in the killings and could face a sentence of up to 25 years to life.

Wearing a gray checked button-down shirt with the collar open and dark slacks, Mr. DeVecchio did not speak during the hourlong hearing and sat impassively. Mr. Grover called him an honest lawman who had played a key role in the bureau's battle against organized crime.

Ultimately, Justice Reichbach released Mr. DeVecchio on $1 million bail, co-signed by 5 of the 45 former agents who Mr. Grover said were willing to step forward. The judge ordered that Mr. DeVecchio surrender his passport and that his movements in and out of his home in Sarasota, Fla., be monitored with an electronic bracelet.

One of two other defendants, John Sinagra, 38, an accused mob figure charged in one of the killings, pleaded not guilty and was held without bail pending a hearing on Monday. Another defendant, Craig Sobel, 39, was being held in Florida pending extradition.

After the bitter argument over Mr. DeVecchio's bail, the spectacular charges against him still resonated in the courtroom, though some of the accusations first surfaced more than a decade ago, when fellow agents told their superiors of their suspicions that he was funneling secret information to Mr. Scarpa.

Internal investigations into those allegations by the F.B.I.'s Office of Professional Responsibility and prosecutors with the Department of Justice — inquiries that several former federal officials have criticized as deficient — failed to uncover enough evidence to charge Mr. DeVecchio with a crime or even to discipline him.

Mr. Hynes said his investigation began in February 2005 after a member of the House Judiciary Committee, William Delahunt, Democrat of Massachusetts, brought allegations involving Mr. DeVecchio to his attention. Mr. Delahunt was investigating allegations against F.B.I. agents involved in organized crime cases.

In the new case, one law enforcement official said the key witness was Linda Schiro, Mr. Scarpa's companion of many years. She knew details about the relationship between the gangster and the lawman because Mr. Scarpa had confided in her, and she was present for telephone calls and meetings between the men in which they discussed their crimes, the official said.

Mr. Grover cited her at the arraignment and dismissed her testimony, saying that during the earlier inquiries she had said she knew nothing about the murders. He quoted her as saying then, "I stay out of the kitchen," a reference to the room in Mr. Scarpa's Brooklyn home where Mr. DeVecchio and his informant had their weekly meetings.

But another law enforcement official said that Ms. Schiro has reported that during the earlier investigation she felt intimidated by other F.B.I. agents who were associated with Mr. DeVecchio. Both law enforcement officials were given anonymity because the investigation is continuing. Mr. Grover also said at the arraignment that transcripts of testimony by several Colombo family turncoats in trials during the 1990's contradicted the theories about Mr. DeVecchio's role in the murders.

The killings detailed by Mr. Vecchione began in 1984, with the slaying of Ms. Bari, 31, the former girlfriend of a fugitive mob figure. She was shot to death by Mr. Scarpa and others in his Brooklyn social club after Mr. DeVecchio warned him that she was talking to the authorities and might reveal the whereabouts of her former boyfriend, Mr. Vecchione said.

In 1987, prosecutors said, Mr. DeVecchio provided information that led to the killing of a Colombo soldier, Joseph DeDomenico. The agent told Mr. Scarpa that Mr. DeDomenico was using drugs, committing crimes without sharing the proceeds with Mr. Scarpa and flirting with born-again Christianity, all of them lapses that Mr. DeVecchio said made him a threat, the prosecutor said.

Two years later, a group of teenagers — including Mr. Scarpa's son Joseph — were joyriding on Halloween when one of them shot and killed 17-year-old Dominick Masseria after a fight that started over thrown eggs, according to the indictment.

Mr. Masseria had no ties to organized crime, and prosecutors concede that Mr. DeVecchio had no role in his death. But when Patrick Porco, 18, one of the youngsters in the car, was interviewed by the police about the killing in 1990, Mr. DeVecchio warned Mr. Scarpa that Mr. Porco posed a threat to Joseph, the prosecutor said. So Mr. Porco, too, was killed. Mr. Sinagra was charged yesterday with that crime.

The last killing, on May 22, 1992, was part of the bloody Colombo war of that era. Mr. Vecchione said Mr. DeVecchio, using information he gleaned from his agents' surveillance of a Scarpa rival, Lorenzo Lampasi, told Mr. Scarpa that Mr. Lampasi would get out of his car before dawn each morning to lock a gate when he left his home, leaving him vulnerable to attack.

Before the hearing yesterday, Chris Mattiace, 58, who worked with Mr. DeVecchio for 25 years and was one of the retired agents who later crowded into the courtroom, said: "We don't believe it. We believe in him. We believe that the charges are frivolous."

But members of Mr. Masseria's family, who attended the district attorney's news conference, took a different view. Even though Mr. DeVecchio was not charged in the young man's killing, they suggested that suspicions that the retired supervisor had a role in the Porco killing had kept the truth from coming to light. "If we can't trust the F.B.I., who can we trust," said Dorothy Garuccio, a sister of Mr. Masseria.

Ex-FBI Agent Suspected Of NY Mob Ties Indicted On Murder Charges (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, March 31, 2006

NEW YORK -- Ex-FBI agent Roy Lindley DeVecchio, once a major force in the agency's fight against the mob, was indicted by a Brooklyn grand jury Thursday on charges he engineered four gangland killings involving the Colombo crime family.

After spending a night in custody, DeVecchio, 65, was freed late Thursday afternoon on $1 million bail by Brooklyn Supreme Court Justice Gustin Reichbach after he entered a plea of not guilty to second degree murder charges.

Calling the case the most "stunning example of official corruption I have ever seen," Brooklyn District Attorney Charles Hynes outlined at a news conference how DeVecchio allegedly provided Colombo crime family member Greg Scarpa with information about rivals and informants who were murdered between September 1984 and May 1992.

"Each of the informants and rivals exposed by DeVecchio posed an imminent threat to Scarpa, Scarpa's family and Scarpa's crew," said Hynes.

Among the four people killed were Mary Bari, 31, girlfriend of Colombo crime family consiglieri Alphonse Persico, the brother of then-crime family boss Carmine Persico, said Hynes. Bari was killed after DeVecchio told Scarpa that "the beautiful woman" was speaking to federal officials about the location of Alphonse, who was on the lam, said Hynes.

According to Hynes, DeVecchio told Scarpa that Bari should "be taken care of." She was shot and killed on Sept. 25, 1984.

Another slaying, that of Dominick Masseria, 17, who was gunned down by Scarpa's teenage son Joseph and two others because of a Halloween night egg-throwing incident, sparked another killing that the indictment tied to DeVecchio, said Hynes.

One of the suspected slayers of Masseria, Dominick Porco, was fingered by DeVecchio as talking to police about the Masseria slaying. Investigators say Porco was shot dead in May 1990 by mob associate John Sinagra, who was also charged and has pleaded not guilty.

Earlier, defense attorney Douglas Grover said the prosecution was resurrecting stale allegations that had been discredited in earlier federal probes.

"The district attorney of Kings County doesn't know what they are getting into when they get into these organized crime cases," said Grover.

As DeVecchio was arraigned Thursday, more than 40 retired FBI agents filled the courtroom as a show of support for their old colleague. When executive assistant district attorney Michael Vecchione suggested the network of former agents could help DeVecchio flee, a loud collective groan went up in the courtroom.

Reichbach was concerned about the possibility that DeVecchio, who lives in Florida, might flee but was convinced by Grover to grant the ex-agent $1 million bail, secured by $100,000 cash from DeVecchio's brother. Five former FBI agents also signed on the bond, as did DeVecchio, who embraced his old colleagues after he made bail.

G-man Denies Errands For Mob (NYDN)

By Nancie L. Katz, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, March 31, 2006

An ex-FBI agent pleaded not guilty yesterday to charges he helped a Mafia informer carry out four murders - even as sources said he could soon be linked to more mob slayings.

Brooklyn District Attorney Charles Hynes called the case of retired G-man Lindley DeVecchio "the most stunning example of official corruption I have ever seen."

"Four people were murdered with the help of a federal law enforcement agent who was charged with keeping them safe," Hynes said after the indictment against DeVecchio was unsealed in Brooklyn Supreme Court. "The allegations are pretty shocking."

DeVecchio, 65, pleaded not guilty at his arraignment, where prosecutor Michael Vecchione argued he should be jailed without bail.

But a judge released him on $1 million bond after DeVecchio agreed to submit to electronic monitoring.

If a jury finds him guilty, DeVecchio, who spent 33 years with FBI, could easily spend the rest of his days behind bars.

Hynes said his investigation was ongoing, including allegations that the DeVecchio took "weekly payoffs" from Scarpa - the agent's prize Mafia informant from 1980 to 1992, when he led an elite FBI-NYPD squad that specialized in the mob.

In exchange, Hynes said, DeVecchio provided Scarpa with "detailed confidential information about law enforcement ... and [about] criminal rivals."

The murder victims were identified as Mafia moll Mary Bari, 31, shot dead in 1984; Colombo family cohort Joseph DeDomenico, killed in 1987; 18-year-old Patrick Porco, an suspected informant killed in 1990, and businessman Lorenzo (Larry) Lampesi, 66, a mob associate gunned down in May 1992.

"Each rival presented a threat to Scarpa, to Scarpa's family and Scarpa's crew," Hynes said.

Sources told The Daily News yesterday that DeVecchio could face charges in as many as three other gangland murders, two of them on Long Island.

The slayings are believed to be tied to a intra-clan conflict that decimated the Colombo family in the early 1990s, the source said.

"This is only one little piece in Brooklyn," a source said. "There are murders involved in Nassau County. There were murders in other areas."

In one case, a convicted felon has confessed to two slayings for which three other men may have been wrongly convicted, the source said.

The indictment announced yesterday caps years of investigations, including a 1996 Justice Department probe that found "insufficient evidence" to charge DeVecchio.

Hynes also announced the arrests of two Colombo family associates in the slayings of Porco and Dominick Masseria, who was gunned down in 1989. John Sinagra, 38, was charged with killing Masseria, and Porco's killer was identified as Craig Sobel, 41.

In a courtroom packed with former FBI agents who gathered to support DeVecchio, defense lawyer Douglas Grover called the charges "nonsense." He said his client was an honest investigator who played a key role in the war on organized crime.

DeVecchio "was and always will be a man of the law," he added.

Retired FBI agent Chris Mattiace, who worked with DeVecchio for 25 years, said: "We believe in him. We believe the charges are frivolous."

In an exclusive interview with The News as he flew from his Florida home to New York Wednesday, DeVecchio said the charges were a mystery to him.

"Maybe you can tell me what it's all about," he told a reporter.

Dead guys & a gal

MARY BARI, 31

Drop-dead gorgeous lover of a top Colombo crime family mobster was shot and killed by Greg Scarpa and pals at a Brooklyn social club on Sept. 25, 1984, after FBI agent Lindley DeVecchio allegedly told Scarpa she was a paid FBI informant.

JOSEPH (JOE BREWSTER) DeDOMENICO, 45

Colombo wiseguy was shot dead on Sept. 17, 1987, by Scarpa-led hit team after DeVecchio convinced Scarpa he was a threat because he had been using drugs, committing secret burglaries and not sharing the booty - and dating a born-again Christian.

PATRICK PORCO, 18

Pal of Scarpa's son Joseph was shot dead by John Sinagra in May 1990 after DeVecchio allegedly told the elder Scarpa the teen was telling cops about his son's involvement in the 1989 murder of Dominick Masseria, 17.

LORENZO (Larry) LAMPESI, 66

Associate of rival Colombo family faction whom Scarpa wanted dead. He was shot nine times on May 22, 1992, on the driveway of his Brooklyn home after DeVecchio provided Scarpa with his whereabouts based on FBI surveillance information.

PROBERS BARE 'MOB MOLE' MOTIVE

HE DIDN'T just do it for the money. FBI hotshot Lindley DeVecchio was indicted yesterday on charges he traded secrets with a murderous Mafia chieftain for more than a decade - a relationship he built primarily so he could burnish his own rising star within the Justice Department, investigators revealed.

That was the portrait Brooklyn prosecutors painted when unveiling sensational charges that DeVecchio, 65, was a double agent for the mob.

He is accused of participating in four gangland murders and selling inside information to protect their brutal empire. Sources say that every week, DeVecchio visited the Brooklyn home of Gregory Scarpa Sr., the Colombo family's ruthless acting boss who was also a celebrated FBI informant.

DeVecchio allegedly was given an envelope stuffed with cash - sometimes with his own agents sitting in the house in another room.

He is suspected of receiving hundreds of thousands of dollars - and keeping another $66,598 in FBI informant funds that was earmarked to pay Scarpa.

"He received a weekly stipend," Michael Vecchione, the head of Brooklyn District Attorney Joe Hynes' investigations bureau, said at DeVecchio's arraignment yesterday in Brooklyn Supreme Court.

"But there was also his desire to feather his own nest within the FBI to rise to greater prominence."

DeVecchio "was dealing with one of the premier informants in the history of the FBI," one source said, referring to Scarpa's incredible role working with the bureau to solve two 1960s civil-rights murder mysteries, including the 1964 murder of three civil-rights activists in Mississippi.

Hynes, at a press conference claiming that DeVecchio would receive a treasure trove of mob secrets if Scarpa filled the Colombos' No. 2 spot, said, "There was the expectation on the part of DeVecchio that maybe, someday, Scarpa might become [the permanent] underboss." And along the way, DeVecchio became so enamored of the mob that he went from a mild-mannered "country bumpkin" to a flashy, double-breasted-suit-wearing G-man who adopted the swagger and patter of the hoods he was supposed to police, Hynes said.

DeVecchio, who retired in 1996 and lives in Sarasota, Fla., appeared tanned but tired as he stood before Judge Gustin Reichbach, in the same black slacks and light buttoned shirt and black shoes he wore the night before when he flew to the Big Apple and surrendered to authorities.

The courtroom seats were packed with DeVecchio's supporters and former FBI colleagues, who could be heard voicing their annoyance as prosecutors laid out the allegations that he succumbed to the venal temptations of hoodlums such as Scarpa.

DeVecchio's lawyer, Douglas Grover, blasted the DA's "new evidence as old evidence - and it is false evidence."

He was referring to a previous FBI internal probe a decade ago, when corruption allegations first surfaced against DeVecchio.

He entered a "not guilty" plea to the charges, which Reichbach described as "shocking."

The judge denied the prosecutors' request that DeVecchio be remanded to prison, and instead granted an extraordinary bail package of $100,000.

The bail will be guaranteed by five former FBI colleagues of DeVecchio's, who will ultimately be responsible for $1 million if he flees.

The judge also ordered DeVecchio to wear a monitoring device before releasing him.

DeVecchio was then trailed by reporters who chased him into a nearby parking garage seeking comment, which he did not provide.

Hynes said DeVecchio was directly involved in four killings:

* The brutal 1984 slaying of Mary Bari - ex-girlfriend of Colombo power Alphonse "Allie Boy" Persico - who they feared was ratting them out.

* The 1990 execution of Patrick Porco, 18, who was suspected of carrying out another homicide along with Scarpa's stepson.

* The 1987 slaying of Joseph DeDomenico, who DeVecchio said was keeping money from Scarpa.

Sources said that one Friday night, DeDomenico, who was also known as Joe Brewster, led a gang of robbers who specialized in breaking into banks. The robbers were able to remain inside for the weekend.

They positioned one member as a lookout and used another merely to run out for food to sustain the rest of the mob.

The gang wielded sophisticated tools and blowtorches to free from their wall moorings an entire unit of safe-deposit boxes.

Once the bank of boxes toppled on the floor, effectively exposing the rear of every receptacle, they easily scooped out the riches of cash, jewels and other valuables from inside.

They found the World Series ring belonging to Yankees Hall of Fame pitcher Whitey Ford - and Scarpa had it returned to legendary hurler, the sources said.

The DA's seven-month probe produced 30 witnesses on both sides of the law, including FBI agents suspicious of DeVecchio who testified before the grand jury.

"The probe uncovered a troubling past of confidential leaks payoff and death, and has also led to the solving of several cold-case homicides," Hynes said.

The DA questioned how DeVecchio was able to get FBI funds to pay Scarpa without going through traditional channels that required the signatures of federal higher-ups.

He said his probe was continuing.

In addition to the charges leveled against DeVecchio, authorities believe he tipped off Scarpa back in 1987 that his mobster son, Gregory Jr., was about to be indicted by the feds on narcotics charges.

The inside info enabled the younger Scarpa to flee before the case was unsealed.

Scarpa Jr. remained on the lam for more than a year - apparently thanks to constant tips from DeVecchio - before finally being grabbed with his wife and child in a New Jersey motel by agents from the Drug Enforcement Administration, and not the FBI.

During the elder Scarpa's reign, he always appeared to be protected from law enforcement, serving only 30 days in jail for 10 arrests, including playing a key role in the theft of $4 million in stocks and bonds.

He was finally convicted of racketeering in 1994 - two years before he died of AIDS he contracted during emergency surgery for a bleeding ulcer.

United Press International, March 31, 2006

NEW YORK, March 30 (UPI) -- A retired FBI agent was charged Thursday in New York with feeding information to an organized crime boss that was used to kill four people.

R. Lindley DeVecchio was expected to be released on $1 million bail after his arraignment, The New York Times reported, combining $100,000 in cash with guarantees from five retired agents. About 45 of DeVecchio's former colleagues packed a courtroom in Brooklyn to support him.

Brooklyn District Attorney Charles Hynes said DeVecchio developed a close relationship with Gregory Scarpa Sr., a captain in the Colombo crime family. Scarpa died in 1994 in prison.

"This is the most stunning example of official corruption I have ever seen," Hynes said.

Hynes said his investigation began with information from a Massachusetts congressman who has been investigating FBI involvement with organized crime.

DeVecchio's supporters say he has already been exonerated by a Justice Department investigation.

2 Hit Man Suspects Reeled In (NYDN)

By WILLIAM SHERMAN, DAILY NEWS STAFF WRITER

One of the alleged hit men is a 39-year-old Las Vegas limousine dispatcher who is on antidepressants and suffers from high cholesterol.

The other is a 41-year-old Florida charter fishing-boat captain with a Web site called reelfishy.com - a site that ultimately led to his capture.

"His first job is to love me, his second job is to kill people and any time you wanna die, just call me," a friend once screamed out in a bar, referring to fishing-boat captain Craig Sobel, according to a police report.

More than 16 years ago, Sobel and John Sinagra were young men involved with Brooklyn Mafia capo Greg Scarpa and his sons in the drugs and murder business, prosecutors say.

The two alleged hit men are embroiled in the case charging retired FBI agent Lindley DeVecchio with helping Scarpa murder mob rivals and informants.

Now Sobel and Sinagra are joined again in two seemingly senseless but inextricably related murder cases.

At 11:30 p.m. Halloween night 1989, Sobel allegedly killed Dominick Masseria, 18, with a shotgun in a driveby shooting, according to an indictment unsealed yesterday.

The gunshot - fired from a white limousine - was in retaliation for a minor fight two hours earlier between two groups of teenage boys throwing eggs at each other on a Bensonhurst street, prosecutors said.

Limo passenger Patrick Porco, 18, was picked up by detectives.

"I told him if he didn't talk, he'd be killed," Detective Al Lombardo recalled yesterday at the Brooklyn District Attorney's office.

"Porco started to cry, but he didn't talk," said Lombardo. "I told him again, 'You'll be killed,' but he never did [talk]."

Lombardo was right.

A few weeks later, Porco was shot five times in the head - allegedly by Sinagra, according to his indictment, also unsealed yesterday.

Sinagra was allegedly acting on orders from Greg Scarpa, who was told by DeVecchio that Porco was talking to the cops and would turn in Scarpa's son Joey, who was along for the limo ride, prosecutors say.

Sinagra, short and pudgy, was silent at his arraignment yesterday.

"He [Sinagra] was the ultimate wanna-be [Mafioso] who never could be," said Noel Downey, chief of the Brooklyn district attorney's Rackets Division, who is running the DeVecchio case. "The only way he [Sinagra] could be associated with Greg Scarpa was to kill for him."

But he did his best - he even married Scarpa's niece, according to investigators. The marriage broke up, he moved to Las Vegas and got a job with a limousine company.

"He's on Zoloft [antidepressant] and takes medication for high cholesterol," said his lawyer Joseph Giaramita, as his client was denied bail yesterday in Brooklyn Criminal Court.

Sobel was not in the courtroom. He was in a Hudson, Fla., jail cell, fighting extradition to New York.

He might never have been caught if not for his Web site. "I had his name, that's all, and Googled him and came up with the site," said Downey.

In the courtroom yesterday, there were eight people more anxious than anyone else to get a look at Sobel.

They were Dominick Masseria's family: his mother, three sisters, two nieces and two brothers-in-law.

"You know, they shot him right in front of Our Lady of Guadalupe Church [in Bensonhurst], that's where he went to grammar school," his ailing mother, Rose Marie Masseria, said yesterday.

"Dominick was never in any trouble, never in any drug gangs," said Joan Pistola, Dominick's sister. "He was working in a lumberyard on the corner where we lived."

He had just taken the NYPD test.

"After he died, we got a notice that he was accepted. He would have been a police officer, that's what he wanted," said Janet Tamborra, another sister of Dominick's.

"There won't be real closure until Sobel is sentenced - sentenced to the maximum," said Dorothy Garuccio, the third of Dominick's sisters.

Ex-Blues Player Denied Transfer To Canadian Prison (AP)

Danton Serving Time in New Jersey Following Foiled Plan to Have Agent Killed

EAST ST. LOUIS, Ill. (March 30) - The U.S. government rejected the request by former NHL player Mike Danton to be transferred to his native Canada to serve a prison sentence for his foiled attempt to have his agent killed.

The move "would not serve the ends of justice," said the Justice Department.

The decision was made last week by the Justice Department's prisoner-transfer unit and revealed on Wednesday in federal court filings. It assures that Danton will for now remain inmate No. 10096-111 at a prison in Fort Dix, New Jersey.

When Danton was sentenced in 2004 to 7 1/2 years after pleading guilty to murder conspiracy charges, prosecutors agreed not to oppose Danton's deportation to Canada, where he said he wanted to get behind-bars surgical treatment for a shoulder injury and therapy for what his sentencing request called his "grave mental disorders."

Danton sued the U.S. government last November, contending that he unfairly has not been transferred to Canada. He asked to be resentenced.

The Justice Department countered that Danton waived his right to appeal by pleading guilty in July 2004 to orchestrating a conspiracy to commit an interstate killing targeting his agent, David Frost. The government also has insisted no regulations require action on international transfers within a specified time, and that Danton's deal did not require a transfer, only that he be considered for one.

In a letter dated March 24 to the Correctional Service of Canada, Paula Wolff - chief of the Justice Department's international prisoner-transfer unit - said the transfer bid was scuttled because it "would not serve the ends of justice and because of the seriousness of the offense."

Wolff wrote that Danton could reapply for transfer in two years, with that application "more likely to be approved in the future if the prisoner has maintained the best possible prison record and has attempted to address those reasons for denial over which the prisoner has some control." Wolff did not elaborate.

In September 2004, a federal jury acquitted American Katie Wolfmeyer, 19, of charges she took part in the plot.

F.B.I. To Investigate Red Cross Over Accusations Of Wrongdoing (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, March 30 — The F.B.I. office here will look into possible improprieties in the distribution of millions of dollars' worth of Red Cross relief supplies, the bureau's New Orleans chief said Thursday.

The Red Cross has already dismissed three volunteers in connection with the accusations, which center on charges that supplies were improperly diverted, felons were hired in the relief effort, and the organization's rules were not followed.

"We are going to launch a probe to surface the facts," said Jim Bernazzani, the special agent in charge in New Orleans for the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Mr. Bernazzani said the case would be investigated by the Katrina Fraud Task Force, a consolidated group of local, state and federal law enforcement agencies charged with looking into abuses in the continuing relief effort.

Accusations of wrongdoing were made by other Red Cross volunteers disturbed by what appeared to be misuse of agency supplies. Mr. McGuire, in his statement, urged any volunteers "who may have information" to come forward. He said that about $2 million in emergency financial assistance that was fraudulently obtained or mistakenly distributed had already been returned to the Red Cross.

Several Red Cross workers who first raised the issue of possible wrongdoing in the New Orleans operation said they were not only initially ignored, but also barred from further relief work. One accusation is that many more meals were ordered for a particular New Orleans neighborhood, Bywater, than were actually needed.

Results Of Internal Katrina Probe Going To FBI, Red Cross Says (WP)

By Jacqueline L. Salmon

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

The American Red Cross, plagued by continuing controversy over its Hurricane Katrina relief effort, said yesterday that it is turning over to federal law enforcement officials results of its investigation into possible wrongdoing at a food and warehouse operation in New Orleans.

It also thanked volunteers who brought the matter to their attention.

"We've conducted a broad investigation, and we have seen enough to be able to turn it over to the FBI," said Jack McGuire, interim chief executive for the charity, which last week ousted three New Orleans volunteers after allegations surfaced that food and supplies for storm victims had been diverted.

But two Red Cross volunteers, who wrote a detailed report in December accusing New Orleans relief workers of operating a "rogue" operation using donated goods and equipment, said yesterday that they have already reported their findings to the FBI. And they expressed bitterness that the charity has not contacted them.

"I have not heard one word from the Red Cross -- not one word," said Jerome Nickerson, a Baltimore lawyer who, with partner Michael Wolters, looked into the operation at the request of the Red Cross last year before, they say, the charity forced them to stop. "This is nonsense."

McGuire declined to comment on Nickerson's and Wolters's claims but said that weeks ago the charity began a probe, whose results the FBI will get.

McGuire declined to say what that probe uncovered, but Nickerson said he and Wolters had found "rogue warehouses" in New Orleans filled with Red Cross supplies that they believed were being sold and that a Red Cross kitchen in New Orleans was ordering meals that clearly were not needed.

"I don't want to bash the Red Cross, because they do good for the people, but they need to change their practices and policies," said Wolters, a Wisconsin security guard. When he and Nickerson tried to investigate the New Orleans operation, he said, "the resistance from management and other workers there was just unbelievable."

The embattled charity has spent much of the last six months defending how it used $2.1 billion in donations it received for victims of hurricanes Katrina, Rita and Wilma.

Hurricane evacuees have complained that the charity's response was slow and chaotic. Minority groups are angry at the charity over its perceived poor treatment of blacks and Hispanics in shelters. Its management is in turmoil after the sudden departure of its chief executive in December. The Senate Finance Committee and the Louisiana attorney general are investigating. And Congress is considering overhauling the Red Cross's 105-year-old charter.

Red Cross Says FBI Will Handle The Probe Of Fraud Allegations (BLOOM)

By Samantha Zee

Bloomberg, March 31, 2006

March 30 (Bloomberg) -- The American Red Cross said today the FBI will look into allegations of fraud stemming from the charity's work in the New Orleans area following Hurricane Katrina.

The Red Cross, the largest U.S. disaster-relief group, is investigating allegations that millions of dollars in supplies were diverted improperly during Hurricane Katrina relief efforts. The Federal Bureau of Investigation in New Orleans has agreed to take charge of all allegations of fraud and wrongdoing, the charity said.

``The Red Cross takes these allegations very seriously and is committed to being the best stewards of the donated dollar," Jack McGuire, interim Red Cross president and chief executive officer, said in a statement distributed by PR Newswire.

The American Red Cross was part of the Justice Department's Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force after the storm struck the U.S. Gulf Coast at the end of August. The charity said it is working with law enforcement groups to seek out and prosecute fraud, waste and abuse.

American Red Cross spokeswomen Devorah Goldburg and Carrie Martin didn't immediately return calls seeking comment.

Appeals Court Judges Mull Federal Death Penalty Request (AP)

By Daniel Yee

AP, March 31, 2006

ATLANTA - Lawyers for a man accused of killing a Florida deputy asked the 11th Circuit Court of Appeals Thursday to throw out the government's request for the death penalty, saying they were not given sufficient notice.

DOJ_NMG_0024486

Jeffrey Lamken, an attorney for Kenneth Wilk, asked a three-judge panel to throw out the request because the government informed Wilk and his defense team it would seek the death penalty less than two months before Wilk's scheduled trial date last April.

"An indictment was released six months before the trial date, yet the Justice Department did not sign off on the death penalty," Lamken said.

Wilk, 43, is charged with killing Broward County sheriff's Deputy Todd Fatta, 33, by using a high-powered hunting rifle with a bullet that pierced the officer's protective vest when deputies raided Wilk's home in August 2004. A second deputy, Angelo Cedeno, was shot in the hand and lost a finger.

Federal law requires the government to inform defendants of its intent to seek the death penalty "a reasonable time before trial." In previous cases, the government has provided notice about 11 months before trial, Lamken said.

Assistant U.S. Attorney E.J. Yera told the panel the 58-day notice was sufficient. The government filed the request on Feb. 18, 2005. The trial had been set to open April 18, 2005. The trial is expected to be held after the panel issues its opinion.

Federal death penalty cases are not common. There are 43 federal inmates now on death row, but more than 3,300 nonfederal inmates were on death row in the 50 states as of January, according to the Washington-based Death Penalty Information Center.

Currently the government has 65 death penalty cases pending or in trial, said Kevin McNally of the Federal Death Penalty Resource Council in Frankfort, Ky.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales had to sign off on federal prosecutors' request for the death penalty in the Wilk case. Prosecutors previously listed 11 factors warranting Wilk's execution, including premeditation and his risk for causing future danger. The government has filed for the death penalty 10 times in Florida cases, has not won a death verdict from a jury.

A unanimous jury is required for a federal death verdict; a majority vote is sufficient in Florida's state death penalty cases. Wilk could face a murder charge in state court regardless of what happens in the federal case.

The anti-pornography task force of federal and local officers who raided Wilk's home didn't know of a Fort Lauderdale police computer notice warning officers "to use extreme caution" when approaching the house because of previous threats to officers and a ready-made SWAT raid plan.

Wilk once listed "hunting cops" as a hobby on an Internet profile, and city police had noted seeing rifles and handguns in the house. His partner, Kelly Ray Jones, already was jailed on pornography charges.

The government currently is seeking the death penalty against confessed al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui. A jury in Alexandria, Va., resumed deliberations Thursday in his case and must decide if Moussaoui is a terrorist responsible for the deaths of Americans on Sept. 11, 2001.

End Of The Affair Behind Unraveling Of DeLay's Team, A Jilted Fiancée (WSJ)

By Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The engagement of Emily Miller and Michael Scanlon was supposed to mark the coming out of a new Washington power couple.

The two had met on Capitol Hill, where they worked as press secretaries to Rep. Tom DeLay, the feared Texas Republican. They got engaged in September 2001 on the beach in Santa Monica, Calif., and planned an August 2002 wedding. As the date approached, Mr. Scanlon bought a $4.7 million oceanside mansion and guest house, formerly part of the DuPont estate, in Rehoboth Beach, Del. He furnished it down to the monogrammed towels and presented it to his bride-to-be.

Then, with the wedding a few months away, he called off the engagement and started dating a 24-year-old waitress.

Mr. Scanlon and Ms. Miller, now both 35 years old, were among a tight-knit group of aides who helped Mr. DeLay rise to the pinnacle of Capitol Hill in the 1990s and cement his power as House majority leader. Some of those aides provided a link between their boss and Jack Abramoff, a Republican lobbyist.

The end of the engagement was part of that group's unraveling -- which has had significant consequences for official Washington. The aides have since turned on one another, feeding the ethics scandal surrounding Mr. Abramoff that now roils the capital. Mr. Abramoff has admitted he directed Native American clients to pay huge sums to Mr. Scanlon's public-relations firm. Mr. Scanlon secretly gave Mr. Abramoff half of his profits.

Prosecutors came to Ms. Miller to help them build a case that drove her ex-fiancé to plead guilty, according to a person familiar with the situation. Mr. Scanlon's testimony in turn helped force Mr. Abramoff into a guilty plea. Another former DeLay aide, Tony Rudy, has been cited by prosecutors in the investigation. Now Washington is wondering whether prosecutors will use testimony from Messrs. Scanlon and Rudy to go after Mr. DeLay, who has resigned as majority leader.

While Mr. Abramoff has become well-known as a symbol of the excesses of Washington influence-peddling, the story of the DeLay aides and their role in the scandal is less-known. People who have spoken to Ms. Miller say that after her breakup she began questioning how Mr. Scanlon could afford a lavish lifestyle while working summers as a beach lifeguard and doing seemingly little work at his public-relations firm. She talked about the beach house he had presented to her, the private jet he flew around in and the $17,000-a-month apartment he rented at the Ritz-Carlton in Washington. Prosecutors would later ask the same questions, and discover Mr. Abramoff's deals with the Indian tribes.

Ms. Miller, who hasn't been accused of wrongdoing, declined to comment through her attorney, Dan French, who said the "details of Ms. Miller's past personal life are not relevant to the criminal actions of Mr. Scanlon and Mr. Abramoff." Mr. Abramoff was sentenced this week in Florida to five years and 10 months in prison over fraud in a casino deal, but his ultimate prison term won't be known until he is sentenced in the corruption scandal in Washington.

The story of the star-crossed Capitol Hill romance -- and its repercussions in national politics -- begins in 1997, when Mr. Scanlon arrived in Rep. DeLay's office as press secretary. There he worked closely with Mr. Rudy. Both press aides were veterans of Republican politics and eager sportsmen. Mr. Scanlon, a native of suburban Washington, could run five miles in under 30 minutes, while Mr. Rudy, of Brooklyn, N.Y., played in an amateur ice-hockey league.

The two shared a pit-bull political style and pushed Mr. DeLay to lead the charge in 1998 for the impeachment of President Clinton. "This whole thing about not kicking someone when they are down is B.S.," Mr. Scanlon once wrote to Mr. Rudy in an email published in "The Breach," a book by Peter Baker about the impeachment. "Not only do you kick him -- you kick him until he passes out -- then beat him over the head with a baseball bat -- then roll him up in an old rug -- and throw him off a cliff into the pound surf below!!!!!"

The two staffers often lent a hand to Mr. Abramoff, according to court documents and former colleagues. The lobbyist helped Mr. DeLay raise millions of dollars. Mr. Abramoff frequently treated Mr. DeLay to dinner at his sushi restaurant on Capitol Hill and took the congressman on trips overseas. Mr. Abramoff spoiled Mr. DeLay's aides, too, taking them on trips to casinos and golf courses owned by his clients, according to travel disclosure forms.

The aides returned the favor. In the fall of 1998, Mr. Abramoff wanted to help a Republican, Joe Ada, get elected as governor in Guam, even though he was trailing incumbent Gov. Carl Gutierrez badly in the polls.

Just after lunch on Oct. 26, 1998, Mr. Abramoff emailed Mr. Rudy: "We want to know if there is anyway to get Tom to call for an investigation of the misuse of federal funds on Guam by this governor," he wrote in a message reviewed by The Wall Street Journal. Mr. Abramoff said he would draft a statement for Mr. DeLay and suggested that if Mr. Rudy could "issue a press release and letter requesting an Inspector General (I guess from Interior?) to investigate these matters, it should have a major impact on the election next week."

Within a few hours, Messrs. Rudy and Scanlon released a statement from Mr. DeLay and a letter to the Department of the Interior's inspector general calling for a federal investigation into the Democratic governor. "The allegations and materials I reviewed point to serious corruption" by the governor, Mr. DeLay said in the letter.

Despite their efforts, Mr. Ada lost the race, and the department didn't conduct an investigation. After leaving office, Mr. Gutierrez was tried on corruption charges but acquitted on all counts. Mr. DeLay's spokeswoman said he declined to comment. Mr. Rudy's lawyer didn't return phone calls.

In late 1998, Mr. Rudy was promoted to deputy chief of staff and Mr. Scanlon was elevated to communications director, reporting to Mr. Rudy. To fill the void in the press office, Mr. Scanlon soon hired Ms. Miller, a Georgetown University graduate who had worked as an ABC News associate producer and as a press secretary for Rep. Rick Lazio, a New York Republican.

Ms. Miller shared the pugnacious style of her new colleagues. She was once quoted in a Washington Post profile of Mr. DeLay yelling at a reporter: "You lied!... You betrayed him! You twisted his words!... We don't know you. You don't exist... You are dead to us."

Ms. Miller and Mr. Scanlon soon became close friends. Mr. Scanlon, married at the time, would sometimes bring his newborn son into the office, and Ms. Miller enjoyed watching over him, according to DeLay staffers.

By the end of 1999, Mr. Scanlon's marriage was falling apart, and he moved out of the one-story bungalow he shared with his wife. He left the DeLay office for a private-sector job in public relations. In March 2000, Mr. Abramoff hired Mr. Scanlon to work with him in the Washington, D.C., lobbying office of Seattle-based law firm Preston Gates Ellis LLP.

Mr. Abramoff frequently sought Mr. Rudy's help to influence legislation on behalf of his clients. In exchange, Mr. Abramoff offered the DeLay aide meals, expensive trips and cash, according to Mr. Abramoff and prosecutors. In June 2000, Mr. Abramoff took Mr. Rudy to watch Tiger Woods win the U.S. Open golf championship at Pebble Beach.

Shortly afterward, Mr. Rudy helped arrange for Mr. DeLay to send a U.S. flag that had flown above the Capitol to the owner of the SunCruz Casinos gambling fleet, which Mr. Abramoff wanted to buy. When the SunCruz owners agreed to sell to Mr. Abramoff for $147.5 million, the lobbyist listed Mr. Rudy as a reference on his $60 million loan application. Mr. Abramoff later pleaded guilty to faking a wire transfer to get financing for the deal, which led to his sentencing in Florida this week.

In March 2001, Mr. Abramoff and Mr. Scanlon joined Greenberg Traurig, a Miami-based law firm looking to build a lobbying practice in Washington. One of Mr. Abramoff's first hires there was Mr. Rudy. The two former DeLay press secretaries, once allies, became fierce rivals.

Mr. Rudy bad-mouthed Mr. Scanlon among colleagues, according to other Greenberg Traurig lobbyists. Mr. Scanlon fought back by leaking unfavorable tidbits about Mr. Rudy to the press. Mr. Scanlon was now dating Ms. Miller, who had been promoted to Mr. DeLay's communications director.

Using Ms. Miller as his eyes and ears in the DeLay office, Mr. Scanlon, according to DeLay staffers and journalists, told reporters that Mr. Rudy often visited Mr. DeLay's office in 2001, a possible violation of lobbying rules. Former congressional aides must wait a year before lobbying their former colleagues. Mr. Scanlon also told reporters that when Mr. Rudy worked as a House aide, Mr. Rudy urged House Republicans to steer political work to his wife's firm.

When Mr. DeLay heard about the squabbling among his former aides, he was "livid" and threatened to get Mr. Scanlon booted from his lobbying job, according to a March 29, 2001, email from Mr. Rudy to Mr. Abramoff. Mr. Abramoff got Mr. Scanlon to stop the leaks, and no stories came out at the time about Mr. Scanlon's allegations.

Around this time, Mr. Abramoff's bet that SunCruz revenue would allow him to pay back the $60 million loan wasn't panning out. In June 2001, SunCruz filed for bankruptcy, and Mr. Abramoff's lender demanded payment. To resolve the matter, Mr. Abramoff needed to come up with millions of dollars. He hatched a plan to bilk his clients.

Most of Mr. Abramoff's Native American clients operated gambling casinos and wanted to block rival tribes from invading their turf. The tribes also worried that the federal government would tax their casino revenues. Mr. Abramoff told his tribal clients to hire Mr. Scanlon, who had set up his own public-relations firm and would soon leave the lobbying practice. Mr. Scanlon then secretly routed half of his net profits back to Mr. Abramoff. While Mr. Scanlon's actions didn't violate any laws, Mr. Abramoff admitted that he defrauded his clients by receiving kickbacks and not telling them.

As the friendship between Messrs. Abramoff and Scanlon deepened, they teased each other about their regular racquetball matches. "You better start pulling some real opponents or I am going to beat your ass to a pulp next time we get out there!" Mr. Scanlon told Mr. Abramoff in one trash-talking email. Mr. Scanlon was "afraid of a real man!" Mr. Abramoff answered in an email sprinkled with obscenities.

Mr. Scanlon reveled in his newfound wealth. In September 2001, he bought two houses in Washington for a total of $1.2 million, according to court papers. In November 2001, he bought a $1.6 million beach house in Rehoboth Beach and completely renovated it. A few months later, in March, he paid $4.7 million in cash for a place for him and Ms. Miller to live. The beachfront mansion had a weight room, sauna and a three-bedroom guest house. Mr. Scanlon mounted lights on the deck so he could hold parties on the beach at night, according to his surfing friends. He also bought vacation homes on the Caribbean island of St. Barts, including one villa he rented out for $50,000 a week.

The celebration never came. Mr. Scanlon broke off the engagement that spring and began dating a 24-year-old waitress at a Rehoboth Beach seafood restaurant.

Mr. Scanlon returned to his summer lifeguard job at Rehoboth Beach, occasionally visiting Washington and staying at his Ritz-Carlton apartment. In November 2002, Mr. Scanlon quietly married his new girlfriend.

Ms. Miller was devastated, according to friends. She spent hours at the gym. Two weeks after her planned wedding date, she started a blog with beauty and diet tips for women.

Three weeks after Mr. Scanlon got married, Ms. Miller was a bridesmaid at the Houston wedding of another former DeLay aide. Ms. Miller confessed to friends at the reception that she had helped Mr. Scanlon spread negative stories about Mr. Rudy, according to people who attended. When she saw Mr. DeLay and his wife, Ms. Miller tearfully apologized and said she had been used as a pawn in Mr. Scanlon's fight with Mr. Rudy, to whom she also expressed remorse.

Mr. DeLay accepted Ms. Miller's apology, according to wedding guests, and embraced her, saying: "We are all a part of the DeLay family." A DeLay spokeswoman, Shannon Flaherty, said Mr. DeLay couldn't recall his exact words.

After flying back to Washington, Ms. Miller called Mr. Scanlon's ex-wife, Carrie Anne Liipfert. People familiar with Ms. Miller's thinking say she missed spending time with Mr. Scanlon's son. She also sought the comfort of another woman hurt by Mr. Scanlon. Over the next few months, the two spoke frequently and became friends.

Ms. Miller told Ms. Liipfert about the millions of dollars Mr. Scanlon was making and about the properties he had purchased, according to people who know both women.

When Mr. Scanlon and Ms. Liipfert, who declined to comment, separated three years earlier, Mr. Scanlon was making $155,000 as Mr. DeLay's communications director and had $39,000 in debt, including $19,400 on his credit cards, according to court records. His child-support payment was set at $1,680 a month.

Now he had millions of dollars in beach houses and flew around in a private jet. In February 2003, Mr. Scanlon's ex-wife filed a motion in a suburban Washington court to increase the child-support payments. Mr. Scanlon's "financial circumstances...have improved dramatically," Ms. Liipfert told the court, according to records. "It is believed he earns millions of dollars per year now."

Mr. Scanlon fought his ex-wife's request and refused to tell the court how much he made. He said his ex-wife "has been in direct contact with third parties concerning his finances and business enterprises, apparently seeking to embarrass" him, according to court records.

In April, Ms. Liipfert asked the court to subpoena former yoga instructor Brian Mann, a move that suggested she had knowledge about her ex-husband's work with Mr. Abramoff. Federal investigators later discovered Mr. Mann was the director of a fake think tank that Messrs. Abramoff and Scanlon used to collect fees from clients.

At the end of the summer of 2003, Mr. Scanlon reached an out-of-court settlement with his ex-wife. Under the settlement, the two aren't permitted to discuss the terms.

Just as Mr. Scanlon was being pressed by his ex-wife for more money, Mr. Abramoff was starting to show the stress of being pinched by his lenders.

"Mike!!! I need the money TODAY! I AM BOUNCING CHECKS!!!" he emailed Mr. Scanlon on Feb. 19, 2003, as the latter vacationed in St. Barts, according to an email released by Senate investigators. After Mr. Scanlon promised to send a kickback check, Mr. Abramoff wrote: "Sorry I got nuts, but it's a little crazy for me right now. I am not kidding that I was literally on the verge of collapse. I hate all the s--t I'm into."

On Feb. 22, 2004, the Washington Post in a front-page article reported that Messrs. Abramoff and Scanlon charged four Indian tribes $45 million for lobbying and public-relations work over three years. The sum rivaled the lobbying fees of the biggest U.S. corporations.

Mr. Abramoff's world quickly caved in. The next week, he was fired from his lobbying job. On Capitol Hill, Sen. John McCain opened a Senate probe into his business.

The Justice Department, already investigating Mr. Abramoff's SunCruz deal in Florida, expanded its investigation to include his work in Washington with Mr. Scanlon and the Indian tribes. Federal prosecutors soon found out that Mr. Abramoff and Mr. Scanlon received more than $80 million from the tribes.

Mr. Scanlon at first seemed unfazed. In the months after the story broke, he bought a pair of $2 million beach houses and returned to his lifeguard job. In July 2005, he sold the beach house he bought for Ms. Miller for a $1 million profit, according to court records.

But pressure was mounting on him. Justice Department prosecutors secretly approached Ms. Miller to help build a case against her ex-fiancé, says a person familiar with the case. Last November, Mr. Scanlon pleaded guilty to bribery charges. He agreed to go to jail for as long as five years and pay back nearly $20 million to the tribes. Mr. Scanlon also implicated Mr. Abramoff.

Six weeks later, Mr. Abramoff pleaded guilty to corruption and bribery charges and agreed to pay the tribes $26 million. Depending on his sentence in Washington, he may spend a decade behind bars. In his plea agreement, Mr. Abramoff said he sought to bribe Mr. Rudy "to perform a series of official acts" by offering him golf trips, meals and a $50,000 payment to his wife.

Days later, Mr. DeLay announced he wouldn't seek another term in the Republican leadership in the House. He faces a re-election fight this fall. Mr. Rudy quit his lobbying job.

Until the summer of 2005, Ms. Miller worked as a spokeswoman at the State Department. In May 2004, she earned a bit of fame when she cut off a live interview on NBC's "Meet the Press" with then-Secretary of State Colin Powell. Ms. Miller hasn't held a steady job since leaving the State Department. She blames talk about her involvement with the investigation.

Friends say Ms. Miller still has Mr. Scanlon's four-carat engagement ring.

For Jack's A Jolly Good Fellow! (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

The extraordinary outpouring of letters on behalf of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff must have played a part in persuading U.S. District Judge Paul C. Huck to give Abramoff the minimum possible sentence Wednesday for fraud and conspiracy in buying casino boats in Florida.

The sheer volume -- 262 letters were ginned up by Abramoff's lawyers -- was impressive. So was the range -- from family members to old friends to religious folks to a member of Congress (Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif.).

All asked for leniency for a great guy who lost his way. They focused on Abramoff's good deeds -- local physician Gene Colice 's letter talked about neighbor Abramoff "trying to find a lost hamster on a Friday night" -- to his contributions to Jewish charities and religious institutions.

Some of the letters at first glance seem risky, raising the possibility of backfire. For example, there were two from the Northern Mariana Islands, Abramoff clients who were battling congressional efforts to impose federal control.

Northern Mariana Gov. Benigno R. Fitial wrote that Abramoff lobbied for the U.S. territory "during one of the darkest periods in our short history as a largely self-governing" commonwealth, a time when unions and other misguided do-gooders were demanding federal control of immigration -- which fuels the territory's growing sex trade -- and application of minimum-wage and other worker protections to the clothing factories there. Critics say the factories, which produce "Made in USA" goods, are little more than sweatshops.

Another letter came from Willie Tan , who introduced himself as someone "engaged in various international business enterprises," including "apparel manufacturing."

A letter from well-known Washington attorney Nathan Lewin risked reminding Huck that Abramoff opened a kosher deli in downtown D.C. "at great personal sacrifice." Would have been less "sacrifice" if the failed operation had served better food. The real danger was that Huck might have dined there and had one of those potato knishes apparently microwaved so much that the potato filling was liquefied. If so, Huck would have been thinking summary execution, not leniency.

And there was a warm letter from Rabbi Daniel Lapin , urging leniency and noting Abramoff was not your "average criminal." Problem is, Lapin's letter might have reminded Huck that Abramoff contributed money to Lapin's group, Toward Tradition, to pay the salary of the wife of a top aide to then-House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.).

Even worse, Lapin's letter might have reminded Huck of the hilarious September 2000 e-mail exchange, funnier than anything even the morally and ethically bankrupt protagonists in "The Producers" might have concocted:

"I hate to ask you for your help with something so silly," Abramoff wrote, "but I've been nominated for membership in the Cosmos Club, which is a very distinguished club in Washington, DC, comprised of Nobel Prize winners, etc. Problem for me is that most prospective members have received awards and I have received none.

"I was wondering," Abramoff continued, " if you thought it possible that I could put that I have received an award from Toward Tradition with a sufficiently academic title, perhaps something like Scholar of Talmudic Studies?

"Indeed, it would be even better if it were possible that I received these in years past, if you know what I mean," Abramoff wrote. Ah, yes, a backdated, phony award.

No problem. "I just need to know what needs to be produced," Lapin responded. "Letters? Plaques?" Lapin now says he was joking, but one news report said Abramoff did get awards from Toward Tradition.

Well, the risks must have paid off. Huck went as low as legally possible on the sentence, five years and 10 months.

There is some chatter that Reps. Martin O. Sabo (D-Minn.) and Michael G. Oxley (R-Ohio), who are retiring next year, have resigned from the House gym. Talk was these moves might have been in protest of new House rules that prohibit former members-turned-lobbyists from going there.

Our colleague Jeffrey Birnbaum placed three phone calls to each office, calls that produced no confirmation or denial from either member's staff. That non-response is a violation of the venerable Loop Three-Call Rule, thus permitting us to write about this unconfirmed, undenied rumor. (No doubt we'll be writing about this for Monday's column.)And One More . . .

Monday's column should have included Navy pilot Michael Scott Speicher , who was shot down over Iraq on the first day of the 1991 Persian Gulf War, as still listed as "missing-captured." A U.S. intelligence team in Iraq last year found no clues to his fate.

AP2, March 30, 2006

A U.S. District Court has issued grand jury subpoenas to six aides to Rep. William Jefferson (news, bio, voting record), a Louisiana Democrat who has been implicated in a bribery case.

In statements read on the House floor Thursday, the aides notified House Speaker Dennis Hastert that they had been served with grand jury subpoenas for testimony issued by the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia.

The court, located in Alexandria, Va., is set to hand down a sentence to a former aide to Jefferson, Brett Pfeffer, who last January pleaded guilty to aiding and abetting bribery of a public official and conspiracy.

Pfeffer, 37, who faces up to 20 years in prison, said a congressman demanded bribes in exchange for his assistance in brokering two African telecommunications deals. Court documents make clear that Jefferson is the accused congressman without specifically naming him.

Jefferson, who has not been charged with a crime, has denied the allegation, saying he has never demanded or accepted anything to perform a service for which he was elected.

The six staff members — a district manager, a legislative assistant and four congressional aides — said in their statements that they had consulted with the Office of General Counsel and determined that compliance with the subpoena "is consistent with the precedents and privileges of the House."

A U.S. District Court has issued grand jury subpoenas to six aides to Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.) who has been implicated in a bribery case.

In statements read on the House floor yesterday, the aides notified House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) that they had been served with subpoenas for testimony issued by the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia.

CBS 2 Chicago, March 31, 2006

(STNG) CHICAGO A North Side man was on the lam after a communication glitch caused him to be accidentally released from the downtown federal jail, authorities said Wednesday.

U.S. District Judge Matthew F. Kennelly issued a warrant for the Siessi's arrest Wednesday when he did not show up to court.

The U.S. Marshals Service mistakenly believed the court had released Siessi on bond. They released him without his bond discharge papers, a violation of protocol, according to Deputy U.S. Marshal Michael Prout.

"At the time we had transmitted incorrect information that he was to be released on bond, when in fact he was to appear in court today for a bond hearing," Prout said.

Siessi, a grocery store owner, had been held since March 7 when he was arrested by the U.S. Department of Agriculture on fraud charges, the second fraud case brought against him since December. He is accused of defrauding the Link card program, which provides taxpayer money to the poor so they can buy food.

Siessi's lawyer, Joe DiNatale, said his client went home to his wife after the Monday night release. She said she last saw him at 1 p.m. Tuesday.

CBS 2 Chicago, March 31, 2006

(CBS) CHICAGO A conman who pulled off elaborate scams while he was supposed to be monitored by federal agencies has done it again.

Michael Anthony Nelson's Chicago swindle was exposed last year by the CBS 2 Investigators, and it has now resulted in a new fraud indictment.

But as CBS 2's Pam Zekman reports, the feds missed a chance to keep him in jail, and now he is running a new scam.

Nelson is now pictured on an FBI "wanted" poster. It includes mug shots of how he looked for his past scams, posing as a banker, lawyer, and business consultant, to pull off one con after another.

It is a history that amazes even Chicago FBI Special Agent-In-Charge Robert Grant.

"He's a conman," Grant said. "He is a professional conman. He is very smooth. He is very articulate. He can con the socks off of you."

As we disclosed last year, Nelson opened a business consulting company called the Cano Company in the River North neighborhood, while on probation for a Florida swindle.

He called himself Dr. Anthony Zamora. He faked degrees, City Hall clout, and corporate connections to cheat his employees, a bank, small business operators, and church parishioners out of hundreds of thousands of dollars.

"You know to be hoodwinked or taken advantage of like this," said Pastor George Henderson of the Greater Garfield Park Church. "It's just almost, you know, devastating."

After our report, Nelson was returned to prison in Atlanta to finish the 13 months remaining on his sentence in a Florida swindle.

Federal officials promised the Chicago victims and CBS 2 that after he finished his time, Nelson would be brought back to Chicago to face new charges.

"I was told he would never walkout of jail," said Rene Sotelo, a former employee of the Cano Company, "and look what happened. He walked out."

The reason was apparently because the U.S. Attorney's Office in Chicago did not get around to returning a bank fraud indictment against Nelson until about a week after his release.

Sotelo said he was concerned that if Nelson was let out of prison, "he was going to do it again."

He apparently was. On another Web site, Nelson has created a faith gathering prison ministry.

This time, Nelson is posing as Messianic Rabbi Micael Jacob Zipuren, and he is soliciting contributions from inmates in exchange for supposedly providing them with all kinds of assistance.

"He's going to take the money and run," Sotelo said.

If you see Nelson, the FBI wants you to call their local office.

"Right now we are attempting to apprehend him wherever he may be," Nelson said.

To contact the Chicago office of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, call (312) 431-1333.

A spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's office declined to comment about the delayed indictment in the case.

Feds Charge Two With Contract Killing (BEAVCT)

By Bill Vidonic, Times Staff

Beaver County (PA) Times, March 31, 2006

BEAVER - More than two years ago, Beaver County District Attorney Dale Fouse made a promise to the family of Frank J. Helisek Jr. that his office would find out why the New Brighton man was gunned down in the doorway of his home.

Fouse fulfilled a good portion of that promise Wednesday with the announcement that federal murder charges - a first in Beaver County - had been handed down against two men, accusing them of a contract killing scheme wrapped into a large-scale cocaine ring that operated from 1999 to November.

Jelani Solomon, 27, of 1917 Fourth Ave., Beaver Falls, is accused of paying Claron Hanner, 28, formerly of Pittsburgh, to shoot Helisek on Feb. 19, 2004. One of Helisek's sons, Shawn Helisek, was scheduled to testify against Solomon in a drug trial that was to begin Feb. 20, 2004. Solomon instead pleaded guilty to cocaine possession and was sentenced to between 2½ and five years in state prison.

Solomon and Hanner could face the death penalty, U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan said Wednesday, as they are accused of using a gun to cause a death while trafficking in drugs.

Buchanan must make a recommendation to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who has the final say on whether prosecutors seek the death penalty. Buchanan would not say Wednesday what her recommendation will be, though Fouse said he supports death penalty prosecutions in this case.

Hanner had been awaiting trial in Beaver County on a homicide charge in the Helisek shooting, with prosecutors seeking the death penalty. Fouse said the local charge will be withdrawn in deference to the federal charges. Solomon was not charged in Beaver County in Helisek's killing.

"Hopefully, this is a long-term effort to (curtail) drug activity in Beaver County," Fouse said. "This is an important step toward the commitment to the Helisek family and the people of Beaver County."

Also indicted by a federal grand jury was Solomon's mother, Wanda Solomon, 46, of 180 Crestview Village, Ambridge, who Buchanan said has helped keep her son's drug sales going even while he has been in prison. Buchanan said Jelani Solomon also kept directing drug sales from his prison cell.

Fouse and Buchanan revealed Wednesday that a network of local, state and federal agents have been working quietly in Beaver County over the last couple of years to investigate not only the Helisek killing but also a drug ring reportedly led by Jelani Solomon.

In an offensive dubbed "Operation Enough is Enough," Jim Harper, of the federal Drug Enforcement Agency, said 44 people have been indicted on various drug charges linked to the alleged drug ring. The operation, which included county detectives, local police, state police and federal agencies, also has seized 14 vehicles along with the cocaine, Harper said.

Buchanan said the indictments have been going on since 2003, and some defendants have already pleaded guilty to related charges, while others are awaiting trial.

Buchanan said the Solomons and Hanner, from 1999 to November 2005, conspired to distribute at least 5 kilograms of cocaine in the area.

Buchanan said the case is marked not only by the number of individuals reportedly involved, but also by "the ruthlessness of (Jelani Solomon and Hanner) in killing the father of a witness." She would not say how much Solomon is accused of paying Hanner to shoot Helisek.

Fouse said that in the initial days after Helisek's killing, it was apparent to the family and investigators that there was much more behind the killing.

In December 2004, local investigators met with the U.S. attorney's office, seeking additional help, and Fouse said that he had "never seen an investigation as comprehensive and as intensive as this investigation has been."

Harper said federal investigators are "not leaving," and will continue their work within the county.

Jelani Solomon and Hanner are now in federal custody, Buchanan said, and their arraignments are scheduled in the next few weeks. Wanda Solomon was arrested and in federal custody Wednesday.

While Jelani Solomon and Hanner could face the death penalty or life in prison, Wanda Solomon could face life in prison, but Buchanan said she was not directly involved in Helisek's shooting. All three also face millions of dollars in fines.

Attorneys At Law Firm In Pellicano Case May Leave (LAT)

By Chuck Philips, Kim Christensen And Henry Weinstein, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, March 31, 2006

Two top attorneys with a Century City law firm at the center of a federal racketeering investigation into alleged wrongdoing by Hollywood private eye Anthony Pellicano will soon leave to establish a new practice.

Dale F. Kinsella and Howard L. Weitzman are expected to take seven attorneys with them when they exit Greenberg, Glusker, Fields, Claman, Machtinger & Kinsella in mid-April, according to sources within the firm.

Greenberg Glusker declined to comment Thursday. Weitzman would say only that he, Kinsella and the others are considering the move.

"If we do, it is because we want to go back to practicing in a smaller environment," Weitzman said in a statement, adding that the decision has nothing to do with the federal probe. "As I've said publicly before, I do not believe any Greenberg Glusker lawyer has acted inappropriately, nor do I think anyone from the firm will be so charged."

Greenberg Glusker was thrust into the spotlight amid allegations that Pellicano and others committed wiretapping and other illegal acts while working on a number of cases, some of which involved the firm's clients.

A 110-count federal indictment last month accused Pellicano and six others of conspiring to blackmail and intimidate dozens of celebrities, business executives and others in what prosecutors have described as a conspiracy to gain tactical advantage in litigation.

So far, 13 people have been charged, including an entertainment lawyer, a record company executive, two former police officers and several telephone company employees. Four have admitted to charges stemming from hiring Pellicano or helping him conduct illegal investigations.

Federal agents have been particularly interested in Pellicano's association with prominent Greenberg attorney Bert Fields, who hired the private detective numerous times over the past two decades, including in a legal dispute involving comedian Garry Shandling and Paramount Pictures Chairman Brad Grey. Fields has publicly acknowledged that he is a subject of the investigation.

Last month, Fields' attorney agreed to extend the deadline for prosecutors to decide whether to file charges against the 76-year-old Fields, one of the most successful lawyers in Hollywood.

One purported victim in the Pellicano case was also linked to one of Kinsella's clients, the late financier Leonard Green, whom Kinsella represented in a bitter divorce. Pellicano's indictment alleges that Green's wife, Jude, was among those whose personal information was accessed illegally.

Brian Sun, the attorney representing Greenberg Glusker, has said that neither the firm nor any of its attorneys engaged in any illegal activity.

Kinsella joined Greenberg Glusker as a name partner when 12 lawyers moved to the firm in 2000 from Kinsella Boesch Fujikawa & Towle. At the time, Greenberg Glusker hailed the arrival of Kinsella and the others as a defining moment for the firm.

"We are now the entertainment juggernaut in California, if not the country," the firm said at the time.

A 1974 graduate of UCLA Law School, Kinsella has represented athletes, celebrities and movie studios.

His clients have included Rob Lowe, whom he represented in 1989 when the actor was videotaped in a hotel room with a teenage girl and a woman. A lawsuit filed by the girl's mother was settled out of court and no criminal charges were filed.

Kinsella's other high-profile clients have included boxer Mike Tyson; actors George Wendt and John Ratzenberger of "Cheers" and entertainment icon Dick Clark.

Actor James Woods sought Kinsella's counsel when he sued actress Sean Young for $2 million, accusing her of sending photos or other "graphic representations" of "deceased persons, dead animals, gore, mutilation and other images" to the actor and his then-fiancee. The lawsuit was settled in 1989.

In May 2005, Kinsella brought in Weitzman, a veteran Hollywood attorney who gained prominence in the 1980s with his successful defense of automaker John DeLorean against fraud and drug charges, the case credited with launching Pellicano's career in Los Angeles.

Weitzman's other high-profile clients have included Marlon Brando and Earvin "Magic" Johnson. In the early 1990s, Weitzman teamed for a time with Fields to defend pop star Michael Jackson against child molestation allegations.

Sniper Muhammad To Defend Himself (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, March 31, 2006

Maryland's public defender said this afternoon that he will abandon the case of convicted sniper mastermind John Allen Muhammad, leaving him to defend his own case in Montgomery County without legal advice.

Muhammad, 45, relegated Paul B. DeWolfe, a lawyer with the state's Office of the Public Defender, to standby status yesterday, after a judge rejected Mr. DeWolfe's argument that Muhammad is insane and not mentally competent to present his own case.

"We have a policy of not serving as standby counsel," Mr. DeWolfe said. "It's been a policy we will enforce in this case. We will not be standby counsel."

Muhammad, an Army veteran, asked Circuit Judge James L. Ryan earlier this week for permission to present his own defense because Mr. DeWolfe planned to enter a plea of not guilty by reason of insanity.

"It's an insult to everything I've ever done in my life," said an animated Muhammad. "If I'm incompetent now, I've been incompetent since the day I was born."

Muhammad maintains he is innocent and has portrayed himself as a victim of racism.

The trial is scheduled to begin May 1, with prosecutors seeking life in prison without parole in connection with the fatal shootings of six persons in Montgomery County over three weeks in October 2002.

A procedural hearing is set for tomorrow.

In 2003, a jury in southeastern Virginia found Muhammad guilty of shooting, with an accomplice, 13 random persons in the region during the fall of 2002, killing 10. He was sentenced to death.

The jury found Muhammad's accomplice, Lee Boyd Malvo, now 21, guilty of helping carry out the shootings, which authorities think included at least nine additional shootings across the country.

Muhammad is believed to have been hunting down his ex-wife, Mildred, who has custody of their three children.

MIAMI -- Trial of two Cuban-American academics accused of acting as agents of Fidel Castro's government will be delayed until early 2007, in part because of a legal fight over secret recorded conversations involving the married couple.

The trial of Carlos Alvarez, 61, and Elsa Alvarez, 55, had been set to begin in May. But U.S. District Judge K. Michael Moore said at a status hearing Thursday that he would postpone the trial until sometime in January 2007.

One key reason for the delay is that defense attorneys are challenging whether the FBI lawfully obtained warrants under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act to eavesdrop on the pair. Prosecutors said it will take months for federal officials to produce the information about those thousands of intercepts being sought by the Alvarez lawyers.

The defense lawyers are also appealing a previous decision to keep the couple in detention prior to trial. Moore said he was concerned that the lengthy trial delay could keep them jailed ``for longer than they would otherwise serve if they were ever convicted." No date has been set for Moore to hear that appeal.

The Alvarezes, both longtime employees at Florida International University, have pleaded not guilty to charges of failing to register as required as agents of a foreign government. Prosecutors have said they spied for Castro for years on Miami's Cuban-American exile community.

Court Rules Against Gabelli (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

Mario J. Gabelli's first investor won a crucial ruling yesterday in a long-running, bitter legal battle over whether Mr. Gabelli bilked him and another backer out of more than $100 million.

A judge in New York State Supreme Court in White Plains granted a summary judgment against Mr. Gabelli, the famed money manager. The judge, Linda S. Jamieson, determined that he unfairly prevented the two investors from selling their shares in his private company, Gabelli Group Capital Partners, the controlling shareholder of Gamco Investors, Mr. Gabelli's publicly traded mutual fund company.

Judge Jamieson also agreed to grant the two investors a trial to determine if Mr. Gabelli's company should be dissolved — refusing Mr. Gabelli's efforts to have the case thrown out — and said, "There are allegations made against Mr. Gabelli that trouble this court."

The decision, handed down late yesterday, comes as Mr. Gabelli is facing other, and potentially more serious, legal trouble. The Justice Department said this month that it would pursue civil fraud claims against Mr. Gabelli, contending that he orchestrated a scheme to deceive the Federal Communications Commission in its auctions of wireless spectrum licenses several years ago.

That case argues that he used friends and associates to create sham companies that bid for F.C.C. licenses at a discount under a program that favored minorities and small businesses.

In the lawsuit brought by the two investors, Frederick J. Mancheski and David M. Perlmutter, they argue that Mr. Gabelli and his firm's directors "are guilty of looting the assets of the company, breaching their fiduciary duties to its shareholders and oppressing its minority shareholders."

Yesterday's decision was a victory for the two investors because the judge ruled in their favor without requiring a trial. Mr. Mancheski, a longtime associate and friend of Mr. Gabelli, was his very first investor, in 1976.

The ruling will allow the two investors to sell their shares in the company on the open market. Their shares, bought for about $75,000 in the late 1970's, are now worth more than $30 million and possibly $100 million, depending on how the value is calculated. Mr. Gabelli had contended that the two men's stock was restricted and could be sold only to the company at book value, which the two men have suggested is an artificially depressed price.

Mr. Mancheski and Mr. Perlmutter also argued that Mr. Gabelli had deprived them of millions of dollars by siphoning money to himself and his family. (In 2002, Mr. Gabelli took $87 million in cash when Gamco's net income was $53.3 million.)

That contention will be heard at trial, but Judge Jamieson said in her ruling that "the transactions with Mr. Gabelli's children and ex-wife, while involving relatively paltry sums, raise great concern, particularly because they involved such relatively small sums of money."

"Unless some form of legitimate business explanation is provided, it would certainly support an argument that Mr. Gabelli was and is using this corporation as if it was his alone and without regard to true and proper governance," she wrote.

A spokesman for Mr. Gabelli, Montieth Illingworth, said: "While we disagree strongly with the claims made by the plaintiff in this matter, and will welcome a hearing on the outstanding issues, we support their desire to achieve liquidity and have offered our assistance, including working with an investment banker to help them seek a suitable buyer."

Mr. Gabelli may also have some reason to believe he will win the next round. At points in her decision, Judge Jamieson suggested some reasons she could side with him.

"Just because some action may benefit Mr. Gabelli and disadvantage Mr. Mancheski and Mr. Perlmutter, such action does not per se rise to the level of breach of fiduciary duty," she wrote. "Stripping the allegations to their essence, it appears that Mr. Mancheski and Mr. Perlmutter are arguing that because of their holdings in Mr. Gabelli's company, they also must benefit in any related activity in which he embarks."

The case should not affect the Gabelli company, Gamco Investors, formerly Gabelli Asset Management, which has huge stakes in some of the world's largest media companies, like Time Warner and Viacom. Gamco Investors was spun off from Gabelli Group Capital Partners in 1999.

Berkeley Woman Indicted In UW Horticulture Center Arson (SEATIMES)

By Sara Jean Green, Seattle Times staff reporter

The Seattle Times, March 31, 2006

A 30-year-old California woman has become the first person to face charges for the 2001 arson that destroyed the University of Washington Center for Urban Horticulture, the latest in a series of charges against suspected members of the Earth Liberation Front.

Briana Waters of Berkeley, Calif., was indicted by a federal grand jury and has been charged in U.S. District Court in Seattle with arson and using or carrying a destructive device during a crime of violence, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office in Seattle.

Waters could face a minimum 35-year sentence if convicted. Her arraignment was set for today.

Federal prosecutors in Eugene, Ore., have already charged 13 other people in connection with a series of arsons across the West. A 14th defendant, William C. Rodgers, 40, of Prescott, Ariz., committed suicide in an Arizona jail in December after he was indicted by a Seattle federal grand jury.

On May 21, 2001, fire ripped through the UW's Center for Urban Horticulture, a research center and resource for gardeners that cost $7 million to rebuild. The Earth Liberation Front (ELF), claimed the center was targeted for its reasearch into fast-growing poplar trees.

Members of ELF and the Animal Liberation Front (ALF) claimed responsibility for numerous arsons in Washington, Oregon and other states, including U.S. Forest Service buildings, a Bureau of Land Management horse corral, a meat company, a lumber company and a Vail, Colo., ski resort.

While the FBI has called ELF and the similar Animal Liberation Front (ALF) the nation's top domestic terror threat, the groups say they are careful not to hurt people.

By HECTOR CASTRO, P-I REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, March 31, 2006

Not guilty plea entered

A 30-year-old California woman pleaded not guilty at her arraignment today on charges of arson in connection with the May 2001 fire that destroyed the University of Washington Center for Horticulture building.

If convicted, Briana Waters faces a minimum sentence of 35 years. She was released after the brief hearing this afternoon, and will be electronically monitored.

She is the first person charged in Western Washington in connection with the UW fire. The investigation into the fire is continuing.

The Earth Liberation Front took credit for the blaze. The ELF had targeted the basement office in Merrill Hall of Toby Bradshaw, an associate professor of forest resources. Bradshaw's genetic research focused on showing how poplars grow. Businesses have used poplars to make paper.

The group claimed Bradshaw was "the driving force in G.E. (genetically engineered) tree research," and a person who "continues to unleash mutant genes into the environment that is certain to cause irreversible harm to forest ecosystems."

AP, March 31, 2006

SEATTLE – A federal grand jury has indicted a Berkeley, Calif., woman in an arson that destroyed a horticulture center at the University of Washington five years ago.

Briana Waters, 30, is the 14th person to be charged in Oregon and Washington with conspiracy to commit a series of ecoterrorist attacks in the West in recent years.

In a two-count indictment returned March 15, Waters was charged with arson and using or carrying a destructive device during a violent crime.

If convicted, she would face at least 35 years in prison.

“This is just one step as we attempt to bring to justice those responsible for the UW Urban Horticulture fire,” John McKay, U.S. attorney for the western district of Washington, said in a statement.

Waters was to appear for arraignment Thursday afternoon in U.S. District Court in Seattle.

The UW fire, one of the Northwest's most notorious acts of ecoterrorism, was set early on May 21, 2001. The same day, about 110 miles away in Clatskanie, Ore., fire ripped through buildings and vehicles at the Jefferson Poplar Farm, causing more than $1 million in damage.

The Earth Liberation Front, a shadowy collection of environmental activists, claimed responsibility for both fires, which caused no injuries.

The horticulture center, which was rebuilt at a cost of several million dollars, had done work on fast-growing hybrid poplars in hopes of limiting the amount of natural forests that timber companies log.

ELF said in a statement five days after the fire that the poplars pose “an ecological nightmare” for the diversity of native forests.

Joyanna L. Zacher, 28; Joseph Dibee, 38; Jonathan Mark Christopher Paul, 40; Rebecca Rubin, 32; Suzanne Savoie, 28; and Darren Todd Thurston, 34.

William C. Rodgers, 40, of Prescott, Ariz., was indicted in Seattle in connection with the case, but committed suicide Dec. 22 while being held in the Coconino County Jail in Prescott.

Computer Woes Plague Court (LAW)

By Bethany Broida, Legal Times

Legal Times, March 31, 2006

Glitches lead to false arrests, erroneous releases

Criminal defense lawyers say a new computer system in Washington, D.C., Superior Court is wreaking havoc with their cases and in some instances violating their clients' rights.

The attorneys say that since the criminal division of the court moved to a paperless computer system at the beginning of the year, bad information has led to their clients being arrested after warrants have been dismissed, and in some cases the opposite is occurring: Defendants with bail violations are walking because warrants haven't been entered into the system.

In other cases, motions and paperwork are getting lost. And some lawyers say they can no longer trust what the court record is telling them.

The problems have mainly centered on proceedings in arraignment court and in preliminary hearings -- courtrooms with a high volume of cases that are heard in quick succession. In addition, a lag time in scanning documents has meant that some information isn't being entered in a timely fashion or, in some cases, at all.

"The entire system is just abysmal," says defense lawyer Bernie Grimm. "I used to be able to trust the accuracy ... I have no confidence my clients' entries are correct."

In January, Allen says, her client failed to show up for a court hearing, and the judge issued a bench warrant. But for nearly two months the D.C. Metropolitan Police Department wasn't looking for the woman because, as far as the computer system was concerned, Allen's client didn't exist. Until last week, Allen says, she couldn't find a case number or a record of the warrant.

If she hadn't tried to get paid for her work on the case through the Criminal Justice Act, no one might ever have known that her client simply slipped through the cracks. "I know I'm not the only one who has had this happen," Allen says.

The new case management system was part of a multiyear, $20 million project to upgrade the court's entire computer framework. The new system integrates 18 databases with the aim of giving court personnel, attorneys and the public easy access to complete, real-time information about cases.

In January all new criminal cases in the court were being housed entirely in the new system, eliminating the need for paper case jackets and allowing multiple users to access the file from any computer in the courthouse. The system is now considered to be the official court docket and official court jacket.

Court officials downplay the trouble. Judge Brook Hedge, chair of the court's technology and automation committee and co-chair of the committee that oversaw the implementation of the new system, says the problems are small glitches common with a startup.

She says errors involving warrants and arraignment notices have largely been resolved and that to her knowledge the warrant mix-ups happened to fewer than 10 individuals.

"People think that with the computer system everything is going to be perfect and work perfectly, and sometimes it doesn't," Hedge says. Still, she says the court is considering returning paper records to case jackets.

G. Bradley Weinsheimer, the chief of the Superior Court division in the U.S. Attorney's Office in Washington, says his office worked with the court for 18 months preparing for the new system, and though there are some kinks, his office is dealing with them. "I don't think that it has caused any significant problems. It is more of a culture change than anything else."

Weinsheimer admits there were problems with logging bail violations, but he says those were limited to the first day the system became active and only a handful of defendants weren't charged for violating court orders. "The things we are dealing with now are the things that were not anticipated," he says, such as confusion over correct hearing dates.

A 'PERFECT STORM'

Hedge says the court had been looking to upgrade its case management system for years, but the problem had always been finding money to pay for it. With the passage of the Family Court Act in 2001, the money was finally available.

Implementation of the new system began in 2003 in the Family Court. The domestic violence unit followed a few months later. Paternity and child support cases, as well as probate and tax matters, went paperless in August 2004. Last year the system expanded to include small-claims court, landlord tenant court and civil actions.

One of the reasons the criminal division was last, Hedge says, was because of the complexities involved with coordinating a variety of government agencies. To prepare, court officials began meeting with the agencies in 2004, in order to give them enough time to get their own systems ready as well.

Despite intense planning, the rollout for the criminal division was anything but smooth. One week after the system went up, Hedge says "the perfect storm" hit. The server went down, and the mother board broke. In addition, a transformer blew in Judiciary Square, causing the court to lose power. For four days the division went back to using the manual system.

"There is always slowness in the beginning," says Hedge, adding that the problems were compounded by the events that followed the launch.

Regardless of the cause, arraignment notices were not sent out, bench warrants were not entered or cleared from the system and, in some cases, judges didn't know what a defendant was charged with.

"It was just leaving things up in the air," says Betty Ballester, president of the Superior Court Trial Lawyers Association. "No judge wants to put people in jail that should not be there, but they are looking at records that are not accurate. So what can they do?"

The court shut down its computer system over the three-day Martin Luther King Jr. holiday weekend in January in order to install the new system, but that meant there were immediately about 3,000 documents from over the weekend that had to be scanned into the computers plus more than 3,000 data entries to input in the first days of the new system.

In total, Hedge estimates that in the beginning about 4,000 to 5,000 documents needed to be scanned, but she says that backlog did not last long. The arraignment court was caught up the following week, she says, and though the case management division took a little longer, she insists everything is now scanned in and up-to-date.

Some attorneys, however, say the number was closer to 30,000 documents and insist the problems still remain.

"The court says they are working on it, but it has now been two months and things aren't getting better," Ballester says.

One CJA attorney, who asked not to be identified, says that in two separate cases his clients were arrested on bench warrants after their cases had been dismissed. In both cases the proper notations were never entered into the computer, he says, and police believed his clients were in violation.

Attorney Steven Polin had a similar situation with a client. In his case his client was picked up on a bench warrant that stemmed from a marijuana possession charge. After a court appearance in January, he was released and arrested again on the same warrant the following week. Polin says the police refused to let his client go because the warrant was still showing in their system. It took 15 phone calls, he says, to persuade a clerk in the court's warrant office to remove it from the court's system. But D.C. police still refused to release Polin's client. Finally, it was a phone call to the emergency judge, he says, that got his client freed.

Hedge, who happened to be the judge who helped Polin, initially said in an interview that the problem in Polin's case lay with the D.C. police department's computer system. Later in the week, court officials called back to say that it was inaccurate information in the court system that led to errors in the police department's system.

Hedge says that as far as she knows, only a handful of people were picked up on erroneous warrants. Nevertheless, she adds, "Even one is a big deal."

Defense attorneys say the problem is compounded by the fact that there is no paper trail to catch mistakes. "It creates a paperless system," Polin says. "If you need to look something up in the jacket, it is not there."

Hedge says that while it is true that papers are not filed in the jackets after they are scanned in, they don't simply disappear. Each division, she says, has a quality assurance team that double-checks the record, and then the documents are stored in the criminal division.

"The paper is not thrown away. It is still there," she says, "but they were trying to go to a paperless system, and they were trying to get people used to that."

Hedge says many of the problems faced since the new computer system was implemented could have occurred just as easily beforehand, pointing to issues with bench warrants as one example.

"You will always have errors," she says, "because humans are part of the process."

First Amendment Issues Raised About Espionage Act (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The federal judge overseeing prosecution of two former lobbyists charged with receiving and transmitting national defense information under the 1917 Espionage Act has given the government until today to respond to defense claims that the statute is unconstitutionally vague and overbroad and may violate the First Amendment.

U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis III ordered the government to provide the additional support for the charges filed last August against Steven J. Rosen and Keith Weissman, former lobbyists for the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC). The two were accused of receiving classified information during conversations with government officials, one of whom, then-Pentagon employee Lawrence A. Franklin, warned Weissman that the information he was giving was highly classified.

At a hearing last Friday on the defendants' motion to dismiss the indictments, Ellis directed a series of questions to Assistant U.S. Attorney Kevin DiGregory expressing concern that the government had not dealt with constitutional issues raised by the defense.

"I didn't find your response in writing to match up with the fairly extensive attack by the defendants . . . so I am going to have further briefing," Ellis said. Last January, at the hearing where he sentenced Franklin to 12 years for passing classified information to the two lobbyists, Ellis called attention to the imprecise nature of the almost 90-year-old statute that restricts disclosure of "national defense information" that could harm U.S. interests or help enemies.

Ellis also said he had thought there would be well-established precedent he could follow, since the statute had been around for so long. But it has turned out that Rosen and Weissman are the first nongovernment employees to be indicted under the act for receiving classified information orally and not through documents or other tangible items.

"I think we are a bit in new, uncharted waters and that's why I'm going to consider this matter extremely carefully," Ellis told DiGregory and attorneys Abbe Lowell and John Nassikas, who represent Rosen and Weissman.

The case is drawing the attention of First Amendment attorneys because both Ellis and prosecutors have noted that the two lobbyists -- in receiving and disseminating the information -- are doing what journalists, academics and experts at think tanks do every day.

Floyd Abrams, a New York attorney who has represented the New York Times in a variety of high-profile cases, said in an interview this week that the AIPAC case "is the single most dangerous case for free speech and free press." Steven Aftergood, director of the Federation of American Scientists' Project on Government Secrecy, wrote on his Web site this week: "Anything other than a dismissal of the charges would mark a dramatic shift in national security law and a significant reduction in First Amendment protections."

Attorneys for the AIPAC lobbyists argue that First Amendment protections bear on the case because their clients were exercising their free speech rights.

DiGregory argued that oral disclosure of defense information was not protected speech because someone could be telling the contents of a classified document.

To read the statute that narrowly "would do great damage to our ability to protect national security," DiGregory said.

Ellis said the government must respond to the defense argument that the statute, which does not define "national defense information," is so vague "that men of common intelligence necessarily must guess at its meaning and differ as to its application."

The judge also told prosecutors to deal with another defense argument: that the statute does not provide "fair warning," since this is the first time it has been applied to civilians. Due process "bars courts from applying a novel construction of a criminal statute to conduct that neither the statute nor any prior judicial decision has fairly disclosed to be within its scope," Ellis said.

DiGregory conceded that every case up to now cited by the government has involved either government employees or the passing of classified papers.

Ellis also raised the question of what would happen if people to whom Rosen passed the defense information relayed it to someone else. "Would it [the criminal liability] continue to apply ad infinitum?" he asked. DiGregory replied, "That's a difficult question to answer in the abstract."

ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, March 31, 2006

LAS VEGAS (AP) - A former county commissioner testified in federal court Thursday that she accepted money from a former striptease club owner and his lobbyist, and knew it was wrong.

Erin Kenny, called to the stand in the public corruption trial of former Clark County Commissioners Dario Herrera and Mary Kincaid-Chauncey, told jurors she avoided thinking about what it meant to take money from club owner Michael Galardi and a former commission colleague, Lance Malone.

"It's just not how I was raised," Kenny said. Not thinking about it "made it easier not to deal with it rather than confront it."

The former state assemblywoman who once ran for Nevada lieutenant governor has pleaded guilty to federal bribery charges. She testified for the prosecution as part of her plea agreement.

Kenny told jurors that it was "understood" that Herrera and Kincaid-Chauncey also were being paid off by Galardi. She said Malone and Galardi often referred to the two colleagues as "on board" or "being taken care of."

Herrera, 32, and Kincaid-Chauncey, 67, have pleaded not guilty in U.S. District Court in Las Vegas to federal charges of conspiracy, wire fraud and extortion under color of official right. Prosecutors say they took cash, comps and, in Herrera's case, oral sex, in return for votes favorable to Galardi's businesses.

Each could face 45 years in prison if convicted.

Kenny said a case of vertigo had affected her memory and she could only recall accepting a few bribes from Galardi and Malone, who is scheduled to stand trial on corruption charges in August. The first, she said, was a $5,000 cash payment received at her home in 1999 or 2000 while recovering from an illness. She said Malone told her "he wanted to help anyway he could."

Another $5,000 was deposited under a trash bin at her campaign office by Malone, who later called to tell Kenny "not to throw the trash out," she testified.

Kenny said Galardi once offered to pay her $100,000 to skip the bar exam and attend a commission meeting in which Galardi had business pending. Kenny refused, took the test and failed.

Kenny also testified she received $3,000 per month from Triple 5 development company following a controversial vote in which she supported building a Spring Valley casino.

She also said that she received $200,000 from Don Davidson through his son, Larry Davidson, in connection with the controversial rezoning of property to allow a CVS pharmacy to be built adjacent to a neighborhood.

In his cross examination, Herrera's defense attorney Jerry Bernstein tried to undermine Kenny's credibility. Bernstein said Kenny had changed her story from when she was first interviewed by FBI agents.

"The FBI didn't seem happy with the answers she was giving, (agents) took a break, came back and the story was different," he told KLAS-TV outside the courtroom.

Revamped Ryan Jury Recesses Without Verdict (CHIT)

The revamped jury in former Gov. George Ryan's trial recessed deliberations for the week Thursday without reaching a verdict.

The six-man, six-woman jury has deliberated for two days since U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer rejected a mistrial and decided to proceed with the trial after replacing two jurors with alternates.

The changes came after the Tribune last week uncovered that two jurors had apparently concealed their arrest records during jury selection in September.

The original jury had deliberated eight days amid signs of personal rancor before the judge suspended deliberations.

On Thursday, Pallmeyer called the lawyers in the case to her courtroom to craft a response to a jury note seeking clarification about the technicalities of count 18, a charge alleging that Ryan impeded the Internal Revenue Service.

Ryan and co-defendant Lawrence Warner, a lobbyist, are charged in a 22-count indictment with engaging in a corrupt conspiracy to use Ryan's elected offices to enrich themselves by steering state contracts and leases to Warner and other close friends.

Earlier, the jury had requested in writing four of the same five transcripts of witnesses' testimony that the original jury had sought.

The testimony concerned license-plate sticker and computer contracts that Ryan as secretary of state allegedly steered to Warner in return for gifts and favors.

Deliberations are scheduled to resume Monday morning. The jury isn't deliberating on Fridays.

Alvarado Not Target Of Criminal Investigation

HOUSTON -- The Federal Bureau of Investigation asked for the bank records of Houston City Councilwoman Carol Alvarado as it entered the investigation into improper bonuses at City Hall, KPRC Local 2 reported Thursday.

The FBI request is for all of Alvarado's bank accounts, open or closed. It went out Wednesday to major banks across the country through what's known as the loss avoidance alert system, which is an electronic network connecting banks with law enforcement.

The FBI would not comment on the investigation. But Harris County District Attorney Chuck Rosenthal confirmed for KPRC that the federal request was made.

The Office of Inspector General found Rosie Hernandez, Christopher Mays, Florence Watkins and Teresa Orta received unauthorized bonuses worth more than $140,000 in 2005.

Rosenthal said Alvarado is not the target of a criminal investigation.

Her attorney, Rusty Hardin, told KPRC that the FBI's involvement was expected because Alvarado is a public official.

Her spokesman, Joe Householder, said her account numbers have now been forwarded to the district attorney's office.

"So they can get a hold of it as quickly as they can," Householder said. "That actually happened this afternoon. We had reached out to them earlier and said, 'If you want this material, you can have it.' And, just as an extra step, we e-mailed those numbers to them."

Hardin said he contacted the FBI several weeks ago offering to make Alvarado's or any records available. He said he has not yet heard from the agency. Hardin said this is a natural progression in the investigation and not an indication that Alvarado has done anything wrong.

The Civil Service Commission will hold appeal hearings of the four fired employees on April 4.

Street's Image Blurs His Legacy, Insider Says (PHI)

By Marcia Gelbart

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 31, 2006

Or so says George Burrell, the mayor's closest adviser.

Burrell, who today toils out his last day at Street's side, offered a surprising assessment of the boss he has spent the last six years serving.

Burrell, a former private-sector lawyer, an ex-city councilman, and a failed 1991 mayoral candidate, said Street's true successes had not been obscured by the federal corruption probe. Rather, he said, the problem is Street's inability to shed his prickly image.

"The environment is so defined by John Street's personality and people's reaction to it that it has made it difficult," Burrell said. With fingerprints on most every major contract in the probe, Burrell, Street's secretary of external affairs, has made several grand jury visits but is leaving unscathed.

"So many people remember John Street when he was in City Council in the 1980s with his red suits on, and he was loud, and he was bombastic, and he fought" - a fistfight - "with [then-Councilman] Fran Rafferty," Burrell said.

"He did a lot of stuff that was colorful and caused a lot of people to remember him in a negative way."

The unconquered hurdle, he said, is that "some people have not allowed him to put that behind him."

Burrell, now 58, launched his political career as a deputy mayor in Bill Green's administration in 1980, the year Street began serving on Council.

"Nobody better than me has witnessed the maturation of John Street in government," said Burrell, a onetime adversary who was the only senior official with an office in the mayor's second-floor suite.

The mayor has transformed himself from "an outsider, a radical, and an agitator into an insider who can negotiate with the Bill Rouses of the world," he said, referring to Willard G. Rouse 3d, the prominent developer who died in 2003.

But Burrell knows that Street's affable and humorous side is overshadowed by actions assessed as harsh, vindictive, and often just strange.

For instance, "sometimes, communication became tedious because he needed four or five minutes of wardrobe discussion or dogs," Councilman Jim Kenney said two weeks ago. Kenney, a vocal Street critic, made his comments before lunching with the mayor at the Palm, an effort to repair their long-broken relationship.

"It's a disservice to himself and to people that they don't know the side of him that is warm and compassionate," said U.S. Rep. Bob Brady (D., Pa.), the city Democratic Party chairman, who has known him for more than 20 years. "What people see is not what you get."

"Since he basically believes he is smarter than any person he is in a conversation with, it makes it difficult to have a real relationship," Councilman Michael A. Nutter said. "At some point, many individuals just get tired of it." He is among them.

Burrell conceded that because of those difficulties, "maybe things take longer [to pass on Council] than they otherwise would." He mentioned the anti-blight neighborhood program that was one of Street's biggest initiatives and getting funding for the two new stadiums.

Burrell also pointed to the mayor's strained ties with business leaders in what has become an annual struggle over efforts to cut taxes, relations that he called "strident," and a belief that he has been unfairly covered by the media.

"People are unwilling to tout his successes the way they were willing to tout [Mayor Ed] Rendell's successes," Burrell said. "Now, it's how everything is happening, improving, in spite of the mayor."

Burrell accepts some blame. He ticked off what he sees as Street's major accomplishments - the anti-blight initiative, removal of 250,000 abandoned cars, a program to reduce homelessness copied by other cities, development of the Navy Yard and along the north Delaware River - and acknowledged that not all of it had stuck.

Early on, Burrell made a decision to stay out of the headlines to avoid speculation that he was trying to resurrect his political career. Looking back, he said, "I may have increased my own profile to be a voice of the administration."

It's difficult to say how such a move would have countered the personality issue - or the federal probe, first publicized Oct. 7, 2003, and still going on.

"It affected individuals more than it affected the overall mood of the administration," Burrell said of the probe. Amid a flurry of subpoenas and national news headlines, work continued, he said. The mayor did not lose focus or go into a tirade about it.

But life was uncomfortable. Investigators tapped phones and unearthed mounds of paperwork and e-mail. "When people start being under the impression, warranted or not, that somebody is looking at their behavior... to determine whether they crossed the line, it's pretty hard to go through that on a day-to-day basis without it intruding into your thought process," Burrell said.

For months there were rumors that Burrell himself would topple Street's administration, as the man who admittedly saw to it that the mayor's supporters were rewarded with city work.

But with no control over the investigation, "I got up every day and came to work... . The only difference now is I take medicine for my blood pressure and wear glasses. Is it the probe or just age? I don't know."

Burrell, whom Street said he intends to continue leaning on "as part of my network," will be succeeded by deputy managing director Loree Jones. He will decide over the next month what to do next.

Describing a long road trip south he is about to take, to visit with old college friends and then his son in Florida, he said, "Now I'm going to go figure out what God has in store for me for the rest of my life."

The Mayor Through His Aide's Eyes

"It is a tribute to John Street that he and I coexisted; two men with big egos and large ambitions have been able to figure out a way to coexist and communicate effectively with one another."

"I think most of the people in the cabinet were dealing with the [federal corruption] issue more from the perspective of integrity and reputation, and whether something was going to attach itself to this administration that they would have to carry for a very long time."

"The quality of life in the city of Philadelphia has improved over the last six years. Some of that is a direct result of the policies and programs that this administration has supported. Some of it is building upon the successes that Ed Rendell had in his eight years as mayor of the city... . In my view, in a historical sense people will look at the Rendell-Street era in much the same way they looked at the Clark-Dilworth era."

A Phone Call From Prison Roils Trial Of Ex-Detectives (NYT)

By ALAN FEUER

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

A disembodied voice from Colorado threw the trial of two retired detectives into temporary turmoil yesterday, as the jailed gangster who had once accused them of murder turned about and, their lawyers said, pronounced them innocent of some of the charges.

On the day prosecutors planned to rest their case and at the very moment when it seemed the trial could not get any more complex, there came, in a 1 p.m. conference call from a maximum security federal prison in Florence, Colo., the voice of Anthony Casso, former underboss of the Luchese crime family.

After 12 years in prison, nearly 8 of them in Florence, Mr. Casso was calling the defense to exonerate the two defendants, Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa, even though he was the one who first accused them, back in 1994, of killing for the mob. In the private call, defense lawyers said he referred them to a letter he wrote this month to Mark Feldman, chief of the organized crime section for the United States attorney's office in Brooklyn, a letter in which he claimed responsibility for two murders and a kidnapping that the defendants have been charged with in this case. The prosecution told the defense of the existence but not the specific contents of the letter earlier this week.

Nonetheless, it was a neatly timed and uncorroborated turnabout by Mr. Casso, who has been the trial's silent man, spoken of repeatedly, but never heard from until now.

His letter, dated March 4, 2006, begins this way: "I, Anthony Casso, hereby confess to have personally participated, as part of a three-man team, that shot and killed Eddie Lino in Brooklyn's Gravesend section. Detectives Eppolito and Caracappa are falsely being accused of this crime."

It goes on to say the former lawmen never supplied him with "confidential information," as the government has claimed, and never kidnapped a Staten Island man named James Hydell, as the indictment states. The letter, offering no evidence to bolster his account, also claims that the two detectives never murdered Israel Greenwald, a Long Island jeweler whose body was found in a shallow grave with a ShopRite grocery bag on his head.

In a move that indicates how confounding the federal trial has been, Mr. Casso attributed that last crime to Burton Kaplan, his former partner in crime, who has since become a government witness in the case. Mr. Casso concludes his letter by reminding Mr. Feldman of his three and a half years of "phenomenal, substantial assistance" before signing himself, "Respectfully yours, Mr. Anthony Casso Sr."

After Mr. Casso was arrested more than a decade ago, he started working with the government, and so agreeably at first that prosecutors tried to use his help in building a case against Mr. Eppolito and Mr. Caracappa.

The prosecutors' effort fell apart when Mr. Casso was caught in a plot to kill a judge and a federal prosecutor, destroying his usefulness as a government witness.

For the next 12 years or so, prosecutors chipped away at Mr. Kaplan to get him to cooperate, and last year they won his help. In the first week of the trial, acting as a substitute for Mr. Casso, Mr. Kaplan told the jury that he had served as "the safety spot," or liaison, between his former mob associate and the two retired detectives, who are accused of eight murders.

Confusing matters further, it was revealed yesterday that Mr. Casso had written two letters to the government, and that the first one, dated July 10, 2005, appealed to the authorities to reach "a truce" and "to unite." Months later, he asked the government to cap his prison term at 20 years, but was rejected. It was only then that he wrote the second letter, officials said.

All this sent the defense team scrambling about and muttering of mistrials as everyone tried to figure out what Mr. Casso might be up to. Did he really want "to unite" with the government again? Did he feel scorned and then strike back with the second letter? Did he just miss the limelight of a federal trial?

Today, at roughly 10 a.m., the defense will announce its plan: to call, or not to call, Mr. Casso to the stand.

'Mafia Cops' Defense To Ask For Mistrial (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Defense attorneys in the "Mafia Cops" case will ask for a mistrial after letters surfaced Thursday from a mob boss who claimed that the ex-NYPD detectives were being falsely accused of some murders.

The letters were from imprisoned former acting Luchese crime boss Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso, who prosecutors contend was the alleged paymaster of ex-cops Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa. The retired detectives are on trial in Brooklyn federal court, facing charges that they were involved in eight murders for the mob and leaked confidential information to Casso.

In a letter dated March 4 sent by Casso to the Brooklyn U.S. attorney's office, Casso claimed the defendants were being falsely accused of three of the homicides charged in the case: that of Edward Lino, James Hydell and Israel Greenwald.

"I, Anthony Casso, hereby confess to have personally participated, as part of a three-man team, that shot and killed Eddie Lino in Brooklyn's Gravesend section. Detective's Eppolito and Caracappa are falsely being accused of this crime," said Casso in the letter address to the organized crime section of the prosecution's office.

Defense attorneys are set to ask Judge Jack Weinstein for a mistrial or to have Casso produced as a witness.

Casso admitted in his letter that the Luchese family had for decades received confidential information from law enforcement officials, including the FBI. But he said that "Det's Eppolito and Caracappa have never supplied confidential information to the Lucheses."

In 1994 Casso turned government witness. But because of questions about his credibility, law enforcement officials decided never to use him in a criminal trial. Various published accounts stated prosecutors believed Casso was a liar who wouldn't be credible on the witness stand.

Thursday, defense attorneys Bettina Schein and Rae Koshetz held a telephone conference call to interview the imprisoned Casso. Prosecutors have asked Weinstein to keep a transcript of that interview sealed. Weinstein is expected to rule on that Friday.

Prosecutors also disclosed another letter dated July 10, 2005, from Casso to Brooklyn U.S. Attorney Roslynn Mauskopf stating that he had been forced by his FBI handlers to give misleading information over the years to prosecutors. He also stated in that letter that Eppolito and Caracappa weren't involved in the murder of Bruno Facciola, a Gambino crime family soldier suspected of being an informant.

It wasn't clear why prosecutors didn't disclose the letters before the trial, which began March 13. Prosecutor Robert Henoch couldn't be reached for comment Thursday.

'Mob Cops' Innocent - Casso (NYDN)

By John Marzulli, Daily News Staff Writer

Former Mob boss Anthony (Gaspipe) Casso, who ratted out the reputed Mafia cops in 1994, is now claiming they're innocent of murder charges - setting the stage for a possible mistrial.

In a phone call to defense lawyers from jail, Casso yesterday cleared ex-NYPD Detectives Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa of wrongdoing - and contends he had a federal agent on the Luchese crime family payroll.

"Mr. Casso gives a completely exculpatory account of what happened," lawyer Edward Hayes said in Brooklyn Federal Court, out of the presence of jurors, following the one-hour phone call.

Casso, 65, also told the lawyers that he had written letters to the Brooklyn U.S. Attorney's office in July 2005 and March 2006 on the eve of the trial that were never disclosed to the defense.

Federal Judge Jack Weinstein ordered prosecutors to hand over the letters and adjourned the trial yesterday before the government could rest its case.

The defense is expected to seek a mistrial today.

"Eppolito and Caracappa have never supplied confidential information to the Luchese's," Casso wrote in a March 4 letter addressed to Mark Feldman, chief of the U.S. Attorney's organized crime section.

He jotted "sworn statement" on top of the lined paper.

Casso insists he was part of a hit team that gunned down Gambino crime cap Edward Lino in 1990 - not the Mafia cops.

He also claims he could "honestly prove" Eppolito and Caracappa had nothing to do with the kidnapping of James Hydell in 1986.

Casso and the government's chief witness, Burton Kaplan, "cooked up a scheme to frame these cops," Hayes charged.

Casso's stint as a turncoat was a brief one before breaching his cooperation agreement. He is now serving a life term at Florence ADX in Colorado, the nation's toughest penitentiary, for his involvement in 36 murders.

Law enforcement sources dismissed Casso's latest claims, suggesting he is hellbent on undermining the trial because his bid last year for a "truce" with the feds was rejected. Casso was told to get lost after he offered to disclose the location of Hydell's missing corpse in exchange for a new sentence capped at 20 years, sources said.

If Casso's exoneration of the Mafia cops is a turnabout for him, the defense lawyers' embrace of his claims is a far cry from how they felt about him earlier.

"Casso's mother and the whole world got a bad deal when Casso was born, and it's been downhill ever since," Hayes told the Daily News last April.

That was after Casso told "60 Minutes" that Eppolito and Caracappa "wanted to kill for me."

Hayes and defense lawyer Bruce Cutler have repeatedly embraced a witness' description of Casso as a "homicidal maniac."

FBI Reopens Cold Case Of Stolen Rockwell Painting (AP)

By Jeff Douglas

AP, March 31, 2006

ST. LOUIS - A Norman Rockwell painting that was stolen more than 30 years ago was sold in 1988, and federal officials now are trying to find out who bought it.

FBI officials said Thursday the agency's Art Crime Team, created in 2004, has several leads in the theft of Rockwell's "Russian Schoolroom," stolen in June 1973 from a suburban St. Louis exhibit and believed to be worth as much as $200,000 today.

"What's weird is we didn't know it was stolen," said Linda Pero, curator of the Norman Rockwell Museum in Stockbridge, Mass. "I was really surprised when the FBI called me."

Pero's museum passed up a chance to bid on the painting in 1988 when it was sold for $70,400 at an auction in New Orleans.

It is believed the painting was advertised for sale in 1989 at a Rockwell exhibit in New York, but nobody made the connection until recently, officials said.

"The experts have said there are no other copies of this oil painting," FBI Assistant Special Agent Steven Gomez said.

Earlier this month, the Art Crime Team recovered a Marion Greenwood painting valued at $99,000 that was stolen in 1968. Frank Brostrom, with the Regional Art Crime Team in St. Louis, said the Rockwell case should be solved in a similar manner.

On Thursday, the FBI also returned a drawing by Susan Rothenberg to its rightful owner, the Webster University art department. Worth about $20,000, the piece was among more than 100 works of art stolen from a St. Louis art storage facility in 2002.

Two St. Louis-area men, Donald R. Rasch and Biron Valier, are in prison after pleading guilty last year to conspiring to steal and resell about $4 million in art from the storage facility.

Brostrom said most of the art stolen in that case has been recovered, but works by Salvador Dali and Pablo Picasso still were missing.

"It's very typical of one of his journalistic illustrations, much like the work he did on the Peace Corps," Pero said.

A St. Louis Globe-Democrat news article from June 26, 1973, said the thieves smashed a glass door of the museum and took only the oil painting. Priced at $20,000, it was easily the most valuable item in the Rockwell exhibit.

"That painting is known all over the country. There's no possible way that they can unload that painting," Marjorie Pond, the director for the art gallery, told the Globe-Democrat after the break-in.

But that assessment turned out to be wrong.

Pero said an insurance company could be to blame for not reporting the theft properly or investigating it. She also said there should be a record of who bought the painting in New Orleans.

Rockwell died in 1978, and that same year more of his paintings were stolen from the Elayne Gallery outside Minneapolis.

Those were recovered in 2001 at an art dealer's farmhouse in Brazil, according to FBI records. Three of the paintings, worth up to $1 million, were returned to the owner.

Bonnie Lindberg, who ran the Elayne Gallery with her mother, said no one was ever charged in the crime.

Now an art appraiser, Lindberg said she's never seen "Russian Schoolroom," but today it could be worth up to three times what it sold for in 1988, possibly $200,000.

"If it were a memorable image you would recognize it," Lindberg said. "Otherwise, these sales can go under the radar."

Favors Found In Air Force Contracts (WP)

By Charles R. Babcock

Former Air Force procurement official Darleen A. Druyun, convicted last year for showing favoritism to Boeing Co. while negotiating for a job, also manipulated Pentagon rules to benefit Lockheed Martin Corp. and another defense contractor, according to recent inspector general reports.

The audits, part of an IG review of eight contracts that the Air Force requested last year after Druyun pleaded guilty, found that she helped Lockheed Martin on two airplane contracts between 1998 and 2001 while serving as a top civilian contracting official.

In the case of a $561 million contract to modernize the giant C-5 cargo jet, Druyun in 1998 took authority to choose the contractor, then revised the selection ratings to favor Lockheed, one report said. In 2001, Druyun changed a contract involving F-16 flight simulators so that Lockheed could collect an extra $41.6 million in return for a benefits package from the company that was of minimal value, the IG found.

The inspector general focused its criticism on the Air Force, recommending that the service tighten its control of the contracting process.

As with Boeing, Druyun, after deciding to retire from the Air Force, negotiated a job offer with Lockheed in 2002. However, in the Boeing case, the job discussions came as she was still helping the company with a multibillion-dollar tanker contract. The instances of favoritism for Lockheed preceded the job discussions. In addition, Druyun had recused herself from reviewing any Lockheed contracts because of the job talks, according to court documents.

Lockheed spokesman Thomas Jurkowsky said the company "believes that its proposals for the two contracts offered the best value for the Air Force."

An official at the U.S. attorney's office in Alexandria said there have been no new criminal referrals from the Department of Defense involving Druyun.

A third report found that Druyun "influenced" $47.2 million in vehicle overhaul requirements on a cargo loader by selecting the manufacturer, Systems & Electronics Inc. of St. Louis, to be the sole source of repair.

Auditors recommended that the Air Force "sever" that portion of the contract and consider joining with the Marine Corps for a cheaper agreement.

The IG reports were posted on the agency's Web site over the past few weeks.

Four of the other contracts under review belonged to Boeing, the company at the center of the scandal that led to prison terms for Druyun and Boeing's former chief financial officer, Michael M. Sears. Druyun admitted to trying to help Boeing on the tanker contract while discussing a $250,000 job she later accepted. Boeing also hired her daughter and son-in-law.

One other contract report has been completed but not yet made public.

In the case of the C-5 plane contract, government auditors said they could not validate whether the award to Lockheed was justified because the Air Force did not adequately document the technical and cost data used. Druyun changed ratings in three areas without providing justification and cited a competitor's weakness in one area, though Lockheed shared the same weakness, the report said.

On the flight simulator, the report blamed the Air Force for accepting Lockheed's claims that it had spent $73.3 million to develop the simulators, noting that a review found $24.6 million of those costs could not be verified.

Douglas Karas, a spokesman for the Air Force, said the service's request for the IG review was an indication of its "commitment to an open and transparent acquisition process."

Retrial Has A Dramatic Conclusion (WP)

By Leef Smith

DOJ_NMG_0024512

As a federal jury yesterday found Jay E. Lentz guilty in the kidnapping and death of his ex-wife, the former naval intelligence officer screamed out, "No, no! Reconsider!" ending a tortuous, years-long melodrama that has involved tainted evidence, charges of prosecutorial misconduct and the defendant's owned taped remark that he was hiring a hit man to kill witnesses.

After listening to nearly 50 witnesses, a jury in U.S. District Court in Alexandria took four days to reach a verdict, finding Lentz guilty of interstate kidnapping resulting in the 1996 death of Doris Lentz, 32. Her body has not been found.

The charge carries a mandatory sentence of life in prison without parole. Lentz is scheduled to be sentenced June 23.

"Jay Lentz will spend the rest of his life where he belongs -- in prison, for the kidnapping and brutal murder of his ex-wife, Doris Lentz," U.S. Attorney Chuck Rosenberg said in a statement.

Defense attorney Frank Salvato said Lentz, 46, who has spent five years in jail, will appeal the verdict.

"Mr. Lentz intends to fight on, and we'll do everything we can to try to win an appeal and eventually gain his freedom," Salvato said.

Several times during the two-week trial, Lentz was silenced for brief outbursts, but they were nothing compared with yesterday's. According to courtroom observers, Lentz began to yell at the jurors as the verdict was read, pleading with them to reconsider.

U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis III warned Lentz that if he could not be quiet, he would be removed from the courtroom. Lentz pointed at the judge's bench and screamed: "What difference does it make? You're in on it, too!"

"It's a great relief," said Doris Lentz's mother, Bernice "Gene" Butt, who attended the beginning of Lentz's retrial but found it too painful to stay. "It's been almost 10 years. I just hope it's finally over."

There has been no shortage of plot twists and suspenseful moments in the case of U.S. v. Jay E. Lentz.

But that verdict was thrown out by U.S. District Judge Gerald Bruce Lee, who said prosecutors had failed to prove that a kidnapping, as defined by federal law, had taken place.

Then three jurors came forward and said they had viewed two of Doris Lentz's day planners, which had mysteriously and inappropriately shown up in the jury room. The planners contained material that included Doris Lentz's notes about threatening phone calls Jay Lentz allegedly had made to her.

The case then took an even more extraordinary turn: Lee accused the lead prosecutor at the time, Assistant U.S. Attorney Steven D. Mellin, of deliberately planting the day planners in the jury room. The battle reached the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit in Richmond, which in September 2004 threw out Lee's finding about Mellin, saying the judge made "a rather broad leap" without evidence.

Although the appeals court later reinstated the conviction, a new trial was ordered for Lentz because the jurors had seen the disputed materials. Lee was taken off the case by the appellate court. Mellin was not on the trial team for the retrial.

Among the most damning evidence presented against Lentz during the retrial was a taped jailhouse phone conversation between the defendant and Salvato, in which Lentz said a "hit guy" was on his way to the jail because he needed witnesses to disappear.

At the time Lentz made the comment, Salvato warned that such a statement would destroy him at his retrial.

The jury apparently agreed with the prosecution's assertion that Lentz lured his ex-wife from her Arlington County home in April 1996 to his house in Fort Washington under the pretense that she would be picking up their daughter, Julia, then 4.

Although her body has not been recovered, her car, the passenger seat spattered with blood, was found in the District. Prosecutors presented forensic evidence suggesting that a small drop of Lentz's blood was found on the upholstery.

Prosecutors repeatedly told the jury that Doris Lentz had feared for her safety, moving into a secure building to keep her ex-husband at bay. Several witnesses testified that Doris told them about threatening statements her ex-husband had made, such as "O.J. can happen again" and "I could kill you, and there would be no body."

"It was a premeditated crime," Assistant U.S. Attorney Erik Barnett told the jury in a closing statement last week: "It was a heinous crime. It was done by someone who was driven by hate and greed and a desire to keep Doris from getting money in their divorce litigation. He was striving for a goal."

On the last day of testimony, the daughter, Julia Lentz, now 14, took the stand briefly on her father's behalf, telling the jury that she remembers her father being emotionally distraught after her mother vanished and that she views him as "very nonviolent."

"It is very sad that a daughter is without her mother and now her father," Barnett told the jury, alluding to Julia during his closing statement. "But the decisions about Julia's future are not yours. They were made 10 years ago by someone else in this courtroom."

N.Y. High Court Revives Felony Counts Rooted In Judge's Misconduct (LAW)

New York Law Journal, March 31, 2006

The Court of Appeals in Albany, N.Y., Thursday reinstated six felony counts against former New York Supreme Court Justice Gerald P. Garson with a precedential ruling that judges can face criminal prosecution for acts that started with a violation of the Rules of Judicial Conduct.

Thursday's 6-1 opinion means the former judge accused of accepting bribes and kickbacks from a divorce lawyer is once again confronted with the full panoply of felony charges lodged against him following a sting operation initiated by Brooklyn District Attorney Charles J. Hynes' office.

Garson now faces trial on a total of seven felonies -- one count of receiving a bribe and six of receiving reward for official misconduct. All of the charges stem from an illicit attorney-judge relationship involving Garson and attorney Paul Siminovsky.

Garson's attorney, Diarmuid White of Manhattan, had argued -- successfully, in the lower courts -- that the Rules of Judicial Conduct could not be used to criminally prosecute a judge. The preamble to the rules makes plain that they are not designed or intended to support a criminal prosecution, and the Court of Appeals accepted that proposition in People v. La Carrubba, 46 NY2d 658 (1979). But Thursday the court clarified La Carrubba, holding that while a violation of the rules alone cannot sustain a criminal prosecution, judges are not immune from indictment when an ethics violation escalates into criminality.

In the Garson case, the court said, the judge not only violated the ethics code by partaking in ex parte communications and by improperly lending the prestige of his office but went a step further and took payment for his misconduct. That step, six of the seven judges agreed, transported Garson's case from the sole jurisdiction of a disciplinary agency to the criminal purview of Hynes' office.

"Had the judge as a public servant violated ethical duties alone -- without accepting a benefit for the violation -- and had the action not otherwise been prohibited by the Penal Law, the public servant would be subject to discipline in a proceeding brought by the Commission on Judicial Conduct," Judge Carmen Beauchamp Ciparick wrote for the majority.

The key legal holding Thursday -- that the prosecution may rely on the Rules of Judicial Conduct to establish an element of a crime -- was punctuated by a finding that La Carrubba is not controlling in People v. Garson, 28.

The Garson case is rooted in a three-year relationship between a judge assigned to a matrimonial part in Brooklyn and a matrimonial lawyer.

The prosecution alleges that Siminovsky gave Garson money and gifts in exchange for ex parte advice on pending cases, client referrals and favorable treatment. It also is alleged that the judge demanded a referral fee for his wife, now Civil Court Judge Robin Garson, who had apparently sent a client to Siminovsky. Siminovsky, according to proof before the grand jury, contributed to then-candidate Robin Garson's campaign and also gave her husband $1,000.

Many of the charges stem from a divorce case involving Avraham Levi, who allegedly was steered to Garson by Siminovsky. While the Levi case was pending before Garson, the Brooklyn district attorney began a video and audio surveillance of the judge's robing room.

Garson was heard telling Siminovsky that Levi would prevail, even though he did not deserve to, and instructing the lawyer on how to proceed.

Siminovsky was arrested shortly thereafter and agreed to assist the prosecution. The lawyer, wearing a recording device but unaware the video surveillance was continuing, brought Garson a box of expensive cigars on March 4, 2003, and the two men further discussed the Levi case, according to court records.

DOJ_NMG_0024514

On La Carrubba grounds, Justice Steven W. Fisher, now of the Appellate Division, 2nd Department, dismissed six felony counts of receiving reward for official conduct and two misdemeanor counts of official misconduct. That left only one felony of third-degree bribe receiving and misdemeanors of official misconduct and receiving unlawful gratuities. The 2nd Department affirmed, also on La Carrubba.

Thursday, the Court of Appeals, after Chief Judge Judith S. Kaye granted leave to the prosecution, reinstated the six felonies.

PERVERSE RESULT

At oral argument on Feb. 7, Brooklyn Assistant District Attorneys Leonard Joblove and Seth M. Lieberman stressed what they said was an illogical consequence that would result from an affirmance. They noted that, under Fisher's decision and the 2nd Department opinion, a judge who takes a bribe while properly attending to his duties -- for instance, while conducting a proper conference with all parties present -- would face criminal sanctions. But a judge who took a bribe while violating the Rules of Judicial Conduct -- for instance, while conducting an improper, ex parte conference -- would be immune. That argument seemingly struck a chord with the court.

"We see no justification for such a perverse result -- not in the plain language of the statute, not in the legislative history, and not in our precedents," Ciparick wrote. "Thus we conclude that the People may rely on the Rules Governing Judicial Conduct to prove the element of a judge's 'duty as a public servant' within the meaning" of the Penal Law.

Ciparick said that since the rules are designed to ensure "the integrity of the judiciary and the resultant confidence and impartiality," then "any other construction runs afoul of these goals."

She continued, "To hold otherwise, as urged by the dissent, would lead to the incongruous result of insulating judges from criminal liability ... because they have a formal body of rules governing their conduct while subjecting other public servants ... to criminal liability for similar conduct."

WAS DEFENDANT ON NOTICE?

In lone dissent, Judge George Bundy Smith argued that neither the New York Constitution nor the Rules of Judicial Conduct nor the Penal Law "authorize a prosecutor to charge a judge with crimes by alleging violations of the Rules of Judicial Conduct." Bundy Smith said he could find no cases and no statutes giving any authority to hold a judge criminally liable for failing to abide by the ethics rules.

"There is no question that the prosecutor has amassed a great deal of damning evidence against the defendant," he wrote. "However, what is at issue is whether or not Rules of Judicial Conduct can be used as a predicate for a criminal prosecution ... There is not a single case that supports the majority's assertion that defendant was on notice that the Rules of Judicial Conduct would serve as the basis for a criminal prosecution."

Bundy Smith suggested the majority decision raises more questions than it answers. For instance, he pondered whether a judge who advises a friend or relative to retain a particular lawyer or recommends a particular law school runs the risk of criminal sanction. But the majority said that fear is unfounded.

"We do not imply that a judge, acting in a purely private, unofficial capacity, may not refer a friend or acquaintance to a lawyer when the judge expects no benefit for doing so," Ciparick wrote in response to the dissent. "But the grand jury could have concluded that that is not what happened here."

CREDIBILITY STILL AT ISSUE

Hynes told a press conference Thursday that the ruling "makes it crystal clear that this kind of conduct is not going to be acceptable," according to his spokesman.

"The law binds everyone equally, the judges no less than those who are judged," Hynes said.

White, Garson's lawyer, said that while Thursday's decision adds a slew of felony charges for his client to defend, the factual assertions underlying those felonies would have been admissible anyway when the trial begins June 15.

"In the big picture, it doesn't change things much," White said. "The credibility of the witnesses will be the issue."

The defense attorney also questioned the wisdom of the court's ruling and the impact it may have on judicial-prosecutorial relations, particularly in the smaller communities.

"Judges could feel under some pressure that they are being scrutinized by the district attorney, and I don't think that is a good idea," White said. "That is why I think an independent judicial commission should be the body investigating judges, not the district attorneys."

Siminovsky, who was disbarred, has pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor of giving unlawful gratuities to a judge and awaits sentencing.

State Prisons Ordered To Pay Millions Owed To Doctors (LAT)

By Jenifer Warren

The Los Angeles Times, March 31, 2006

SACRAMENTO — Managers of California's beleaguered prison system received a double dose of bad news today as a federal judge ordered them to pay tens of millions of dollars owed to doctors who treat inmates, and the state launched an audit of their agency.

Some of the doctors have not been paid in four years. Some of their contracts have lapsed. And some who deliver cardiology, radiology and a wide range of other services to prisoners are no longer responding when called.

U.S. District Judge Thelton Henderson, who recently put the state prisons' healthcare system in the hands of a federal receiver, ordered that outstanding doctor bills --- which total more than $58 million --- be paid within two months.

Henderson also had harsh words for corrections leaders, saying they have stuck "their collective heads in the sand" instead of resolving the contracting mess.

"Predictably," he added, "this stunning example of the state's bureaucratic inaction … is now culminating in a crisis."

Lax healthcare in California prisons is blamed for an average of 64 preventable deaths a year. In naming a federal receiver to take over this year, Henderson determined that corrections officials were incapable of solving the problem alone.

Meanwhile, state Controller Steve Westly said his office will audit the department to determine why prison healthcare is so poor, despite a doubling of funding since 2000.

"The taxpayers have nothing to show for the billions spent on prison healthcare. Instead, we've seen the first federal takeover of a state agency in California history," said, Westly, who is also a candidate for governor.

Dr. John Henry, a general surgeon in San Luis Obispo County, hasn't been paid since September. Henry said treating inmates at Avenal State Prison makes up about 40% of his caseload.

Until recently, he was performing about 20 surgeries a month on prisoners. But then the anesthesiologists at the local hospital stopped providing service to inmates because of nonpayment by the state. Now, Henry performs only emergencies, such as appendectomies, and even those "reluctantly."

"I won't tell you how much I'm owed, but it's a lot," Henry said. "Nobody wants to stop providing care, but this is ridiculous. We can't keep working for free."

Errors Prompt States To Watch Over Crime Labs (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, March 31, 2006

State legislators, troubled by reports of botched DNA tests and other mistakes by forensic analysts, have begun to establish oversight commissions to improve local crime labs and coroner's offices.

Virginia and Texas, where a lab technician mistakenly implicated the wrong man in a rape case, passed laws last year that set up such commissions. Legislators in New Hampshire, Vermont and Minnesota are considering similar plans this spring.

In Illinois, legislators are considering a plan that would require state and private labs to be accredited by a professional crime lab group. Oklahoma has had such a measure in place for three years. In Massachusetts, Gov. Mitt Romney, a Republican, revived the state's dormant oversight panel after a pair of eyes critical to a murder investigation were reported missing from a lab in 2002.

Beginning today, the American Judicature Society, a non-partisan policy research group of judges, attorneys and academics, begins a three-day conference in Greensboro, N.C., to establish recommendations for crime lab practices. The conference's co-chairs include former U.S. attorney general Janet Reno and former federal judge and CIA and FBI director William Webster.

Forensic science "is justice's best friend, but it has to not only be used right but done right," says Texas state Sen. Juan "Chuy" Hinojosa, a Democrat who co-sponsored the bill that created Texas' commission. "There needs to be a way to hold the labs accountable."

In Houston, the DNA unit of the city's police lab was closed in 2002 after a local television station, KHOU, reported several problems.

The problems included missing files, contaminated and poorly stored evidence and DNA test results that had been misinterpreted to wrongly match a suspect to a rape he had not committed.

The man, Josiah Sutton, was convicted and served 4½ years in prison. He was released after independent DNA testing revealed the lab error.

The laws and proposed laws differ from state to state. Generally, they require a crime lab's testing procedures and accuracy rates to be approved by an outside body, and they create a system for punishing misconduct.

In New York state, which established the first forensic science commission in 1995, commissioners have moved beyond checking lab standards to setting policies for collecting DNA.

Last December, the panel voted to allow about 40,000 DNA profiles to be taken from criminal parolees and probationers or as a condition of plea bargains. The profiles were added to a state database of known offenders, which is linked to a national DNA database run by the FBI.

In a statement last year, the New York City-based Innocence Project said the Texas commission would improve both the "quality" of Texas' justice system and "Texans' faith in that system."

FBI: International Scam Targeting Islamic Mosques Broken (AP)

By GARRY MITCHELL, The Associated Press

AP, March 30, 2006

MOBILE, Ala. (AP) — An international wire fraud scheme targeting Islamic institutions with a phony stranded-traveler plea, netting only small sums but hitting multiple victims over many years, has been disrupted by the arrest of its mastermind, the FBI says.

Islamic advocates say Mohammed Mustafa Agbareia, who was arrested in Canada and pleaded guilty March 1 in Alabama to one count of conspiracy to commit wire fraud, may have scammed more than $1 million from mosques and Islamic groups over nearly two decades.

He will be sentenced July 10 by U.S. District Judge Charles Butler in Mobile, where he is in the custody of federal marshals.

Agbareia is accused of claiming to be with a Saudi development bank investing in local Islamic society projects. Eventually he would contact Islamic leaders asking for money, saying he was stranded at an airport in Canada or another distant location and needed money wired.

He would always ask for $1,000 to $1,500 — amounts small enough to "pass under the radar" of local authorities, said Ibrahim Hooper, a spokesman for the Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR) in Washington, D.C.

"This guy was really unique," Hooper said in an interview Wednesday.

Agbareia, whose guilty plea was first reported by the Mobile Register, faces a possible 5-year prison sentence, a $250,000 fine and 3 years of federal supervision after his prison release. But penalties could vary because a religious institution was a victim and the court's sentencing guidelines are only advisory in this case, according to the plea agreement.

The scheme dates to the 1990s and had at least 45 victims in the United States before being halted. It involved over 10,000 solicitations for money, according to the FBI.

Agbareia was indicted in Mobile and Vermont on the fraud charges about a year ago. A second man, Zouhair Youssei Hissy, also was indicted in Mobile for an alleged role in the scheme and awaits extradition to the United States from Canada.

Agbareia, 40, was arrested in Canada pending his unrelated deportation to Israel. Records show he's from Nazareth in Israel.

The FBI probe of Agbareia began in Vermont where two victims were defrauded, an FBI spokesman said in a March 22 statement about the case. Another complaint came in Alabama in 2004 from the Islamic Society of Mobile Mosque.

Collecting victims' phone numbers on the Internet, Islamic institutions or mosques were contacted by Agbareia and Hissy, who claimed to represent the Saudi Arabia-based Islamic Development Bank (IDB).

In Mobile, FBI spokesman Special Agent Craig Dahle said it's unknown how much money the scheme collected. He said there could be victims worldwide.

In the plea agreement, Agbareia, represented by the public defender's office, agreed to forfeit any proceeds of his criminal activity and cooperate with the government's investigation under threat of additional charges.

Faith, Family Tied To Disuading Gangs (WT)

By Amy Doolittle

Faith and family must figure large in solving the region's growing gang violence problem, which also will require mentors who understand street culture, a panel of forum speakers and audience members said yesterday.

"Regardless of the message, one of the things I've found is that the message must be modeled by the messenger," said former Washington Redskins cornerback Darrell Green, who now operates several youth organizations. "I believe the best defense is a great offense."

Other panelists included Robert Woodson, founder of the National Center for Neighborhood Enterprise; the Rev. Fred Shuttersworth, a civil rights leader; Luis Cardona, a former gang member who works with at-risk area youth; and Robert Goodwin, president of the Points of Light Foundation.

About 200 students and residents attended the forum, the fifth in a monthly series, said Brian Bauman, director of The Washington Times Corp.'s Citizens Forum Project.

"One of the things that we've got to understand and [bring] into realization is that a gang member is not going to come to the door and say, 'Hey guys, could you save my life?' " said Juan Pacheco, a former gang member who works with gangs to bring peace.

"The probability of that happening is zero-point-zero. So we as individuals have to reach out to them," said Mr. Pacheco, 28. "We're tired of violence. We're tired of our brothers and sisters dying, man, and we need you, and you need us."

The Times reported yesterday that D.C. officials say there are more than 270 girl gangs alone in the District.

In addition, the number of D.C. Superior Court cases involving female juveniles increased from 445 in 2003 to 571 in 2004. The number of girls brought before the court for violent offenses jumped from 225 in 2003 to 322 in 2004, a 43 percent increase.

T'Chaka Sapp, commissioner for Advisory Neighborhood Commission 8A, asked the all-male panel how the subject of female gangs should be addressed.

"The thing that I see today is a totally different dynamic," Mr. Sapp said. "It's the females now that are off the chain, and we need to come up with other methods. I see all men here. We need some females to deal with the female problems on the streets. It's the girl gangs that are tearing up D.C."

The panelists said good role models for girls and boys are critical in fighting gang violence.

"It all shows the need for us to work with our young woman so they don't feed off the attention they get when they act like gladiators protecting their honor," Mr. Cardona said.

Mr. Green agreed but emphasized the role of the traditional family.

"Somewhere you've got to teach a man how to love his wife and how to be a man, and someone's got to teach the woman how to be a woman," he said. "Even if you haven't got a family, someone's got to lead."

Mr. Pacheco, who said he is from Falls Church but declined to identify which gang he belonged to, said bringing gang members together to discuss why peace and community are important is also a critical step in ending the violence.

"You've got to hold high expectations of these gang members," he said. "We've got to remind them that we are family and that we are brothers and sisters. We are brothers and sisters, so why are we killing each other off?"

States Shelter Risky Borrowers (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

With Congress divided over federal legislation to combat predatory mortgage lending -- the practice of persuading borrowers into taking on fee-laden loans they often can't afford -- more than half the states have passed laws designed to protect riskier-than-average borrowers, and others are contemplating action to curb abuse.

At least 10 states -- including New York, West Virginia and New Mexico -- have adopted comprehensive laws in the past few years crafted to curtail tactics commonly used by unscrupulous lenders, including excessive penalties for paying off a loan early, inflated interest rates and frequent refinancing of a mortgage that does little to improve a buyer's finances but generates fees for lenders and brokers. Other states are taking it one issue at a time: Maryland has restricted prepayment penalties, for instance. And still others are considering proposals to subject lenders to greater liability if they are found to have duped home buyers.

The latest flashpoint is Ohio, which has the nation's highest mortgage-foreclosure rate. State legislators there are weighing measures that would allow the state attorney general to prosecute dubious lending practices and would establish a new legal duty for lenders and middlemen to look out for consumer's best interests, similar to the duty stock brokers have. The Ohio House of Representatives passed a bill this week, but the Senate, which passed its own version earlier this year, rejected it. The chambers must reconcile the measures before they become law. Mortgage-industry lobbyists are resisting.

In recent years, an expanding array of unconventional mortgages has made it possible for "subprime" borrowers -- those with spotty credit histories and lower credit scores -- to purchase or refinance homes. The Mortgage Bankers Association says more than 13% of outstanding mortgages are subprime, up from 2% seven years ago. Subprime borrowers pay higher interest rates on mortgages to compensate lenders for the added risk. Prime borrowers today typically face a 6.35% rate on a 30-year, fixed-rate mortgage. The Center for Responsible Lending, an advocacy group affiliated with a Durham, N.C., community-development lender called the Center for Community Self-Help, estimates a subprime borrower with a slightly worse-than-average credit score would pay more than 7%, and one with a sharply lower score would pay upward of 10%.

Industry officials say innovative mortgage products have helped millions of low-income Americans buy homes for the first time. They warn that an onerous mix of state rules is driving up costs and limiting mortgage availability, and they are pushing strongly for federal legislation that would pre-empt the rising number of state laws. "There's been this trend since 1999 for states and localities to implement their own laws," says Steve O'Connor, a lobbyist with the Mortgage Bankers Association. "It's effectively balkanized the national mortgage-finance system. It adds costs and risks to operations that are passed onto consumers."

Mr. O'Connor points to Montgomery County, Md., just outside Washington, where a local law aimed at holding brokers and lenders liable for racial discrimination prompted 50 lenders to leave the market, reducing availability and driving up costs. A judge recently issued a temporary injunction blocking the law, and Mr. O'Connor notes that some lenders since have returned to the market.

Consumer advocates counter that deceptive subprime lenders defraud homeowners out of billions of dollars each year by targeting potential buyers with little ability to understand -- let along repay -- complex loans. They cite a Center for Responsible Lending study that suggests credit availability and pricing haven't been adversely affected in areas where stringent restrictions have been enacted.

North Carolina sparked the current trend of state laws in 1999 with a statute that limits a variety of fees and financing methods common to subprime loans. "It's clear from studies that our predatory-lending law is protecting consumers, while at the same time loans are still widely available," said Roy Cooper, the state's attorney general.

In the U.S. House of Representatives, Rep. Spencer Bachus, an Alabama Republican who heads a financial-services subcommittee, is holding talks with a pair of North Carolina Democrats in an effort to model a federal standard based on their state law. In recent years, Congress has been in a stalemate over the question of whether to pre-empt state laws with a federal standard.

Speaking to a gathering of mortgage brokers in Washington this week, Rep. Barney Frank of Massachusetts, senior Democrat on the House Financial Services Committee, said he supports a uniform standard. "But," he added, "I don't want that to be a way of lowering consumer protection." Mr. Frank said he expects the bipartisan talks to reach agreement soon.

Meanwhile, state attorneys general have been feuding with federal regulators over whether they can enforce state lending laws against nationally chartered banks, which are regulated by the Treasury's Office of the Comptroller of the Currency. The Comptroller has said states can't use their laws against those banks, and last year won an injunction halting a probe by New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer into the lending practices of national banks in that state.

This week Mr. Spitzer appealed to the Second Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals in New York. Spitzer spokeswoman Christine Pritchard said the OCC's "anticonsumer agenda seeks to drastically alter the balance of federal-state powers and would leave New York powerless to protect its residents from unscrupulous practices." An OCC spokesman declined to comment.

Earlier this year, the attorneys general of 49 states reached a $325 million settlement with Ameriquest Mortgage Co. over a variety of abusive-lending charges. The states charged Ameriquest, the largest subprime lender at the time, with a litany of transgressions. Among them: influencing and accepting inflated appraisals, hiding fees and encouraging applicants to give inaccurate employment or income information to obtain loans. Ameriquest denied wrongdoing.

The Ameriquest payment was the second-largest consumer-protection settlement in history. The largest was a $484 million settlement in 2002 between states and Household International Inc. over alleged lending abuses. Household, like Ameriquest, denied wrongdoing, but agreed to change some of its lending practices. Household was acquired by HSBC Holdings PLC in 2003.

Cities That Lead The Way (NYT)

Crippled by soaring corrections costs, states and municipalities are re-examining policies that drive ex-offenders right back to prison by barring them from employment. Locked out of the mainstream, ex-felons become burdens to their families, their communities and the nation as a whole. Three cities — Boston, Chicago and San Francisco — have taken groundbreaking steps aimed at de-emphasizing criminal histories for qualified applicants for city jobs, except in law enforcement, education and other sensitive areas where people with convictions are specifically barred by statute.

The Boston plan, which becomes effective this summer, deserves to be widely emulated. It covers not just city employees but also the companies that do business with the city. Those companies, which employ hundreds of thousands of workers, will be required to make their employment policies consistent with those put forth by the city.

Under the new policy, the city will not conduct a criminal record review at all, except in special circumstances or when it is required by law. Even then, the search will come near the end of the process, after the applicant has proved to be qualified and is about to be hired. If the city then changes its mind about the job offer, the applicant is entitled to a full explanation and a chance to rebut the criminal records reports, which sometimes contain errors.

Taken together, the recent developments in Boston, Chicago and San Francisco symbolize a step forward in terms of fairness for law-abiding ex-offenders, who are often barred from entire occupations because of youthful mistakes and minor crimes committed in the distant past. It should be clear to all of us by now that confining those people to the ranks of the unemployed makes it more likely that they will commit new crimes, return to prison and become a permanent burden to society.

CIVIL LAW:

U.S. Demands Files From ISPs, Tech Firms (AP)

By MARYCLAIRE DALE

AP, March 31, 2006

PHILADELPHIA - The Justice Department is demanding internal files from dozens of Internet service providers and other technology firms as it seeks to defend a controversial Internet child protection law.

The subpoenas are similar to one given to Google Inc., which waged a partially successful battle over the government's request for millions of pieces of information about search engine requests and Web site domains.

InformationWeek magazine unearthed subpoenas that show the government also demanded information from at least 34 other companies, including Internet service providers such as Comcast Corp. and EarthLink Inc., security software firms and other technology companies.

The subpoenas, which the magazine obtained through Freedom of Information Act requests, show the Justice Department preparing for an October trial in Philadelphia over the 1996 Child Online Protection Act. It is not clear which companies are complying, and to what extent.

"That money could be spent so much more wisely on giving software away to parents that are having these problems," Dan Jude, president of Security Software Systems, said of the litigation costs.

The 12-person firm, which makes filtering software, spent more than 40 hours trying to comply with the subpoena, he said. The company refused to provide some information on proprietary grounds, fearing it could make its way into the court file.

"If that information gets out in the public, we've just lost our competitive edge," Jude said Thursday. The subpoena also sought information the company does not keep, such as customer satisfaction, he said.

Department of Justice spokesman Charles Miller did not immediately return a message Thursday afternoon.

The subpoenas also went to companies including AT&T Inc., Cox Communications Inc., Verizon Communications Inc. and Symantec Corp.

The U.S. Supreme Court has twice said the law _ which would criminalize Internet material deemed "harmful to children" as defined by "contemporary community standards" _ is likely to violate First Amendment protections and granted preliminary injunctions.

Critics say that definition is so broad it would stifle free speech, and also note that pornographers and others could simply base their operations offshore, beyond the reach of U.S. authorities.

Online publishers who are challenging the law argue that filters are a less restrictive way to protect children. The publishers, which include sexual health sites, a gay newspaper and the online magazine Salon.com, are represented by the American Civil Liberties Union.

"Our overarching concern over what the government is doing (with the subpoenas) stems from the 'why,' _ what is it they're actually trying to accomplish?" said David McGuire, a spokesman for the Center for Democracy and Technology in Washington. "It doesn't seem reasonable."

The Justice Department demanded information from at least 34 Internet service providers, search companies and security software companies as part of its probe related to the Child Online Protection Act (COPA), according to an article in InformationWeek on Thursday.

Some companies, including Cablevision Systems and Verizon, objected to the government demands, the article says. Other subpoena recipients included AT&T, Comcast Cable, Cox Communications, EarthLink, Symantec and United Online, according to InformationWeek, which filed a Freedom of Information Act request to get the information.

Google made headlines in January when it was disclosed that the search company had refused to hand over random search terms and Web address data that Yahoo, Microsoft and America Online had provided the government when asked. Google challenged the subpoena in court, arguing that it was overreaching. Earlier this month a judge ruled that Google didn't have to provide any search queries but did have to provide a much smaller number of Web sites in its index than the government had sought.

The government is seeking information on Web user behavior and filtering software and other tools in an effort to justify COPA, which faces a trial later this year. That law restricts the posting on commercial Web sites of sexually explicit material deemed "harmful to minors," unless it's made unavailable to the youngsters. The ACLU argues that Web sites cannot realistically comply with such requirements and that the law violates the right to freedom of speech mandated by the First Amendment.

More Subpoenas In Suit Over Obscenity Law (NYT)

By Saul Hansell

Both the Justice Department and the American Civil Liberties Union confirmed yesterday that they had requested and received information from Internet service providers and software makers in connection with an A.C.L.U. lawsuit challenging an anti-pornography law.

Earlier this year it was revealed that the Justice Department, which is defending the law, had subpoenaed information from four search engine companies about keyword requests by users. Google challenged its subpoena. This month a judge ordered the company to provide some information to the Justice Department but not information on individual searches, saying that had the potential to violate the privacy of users.

Last summer, the Justice Department also issued subpoenas to at least 34 Internet service providers and security software companies, according to information the department provided after a Freedom of Information Act request by InformationWeek magazine. The companies subpoenaed included America Online, Comcast, Verizon, EarthLink and Symantec.

The department is defending the Child Online Protection Act, which makes it a crime to post "material that is harmful to minors." Two years ago, the Supreme Court prevented enforcement of the law and ordered a lower court to consider whether filtering software designed to block inappropriate content was a better way to achieve the law's aims. The case goes to trial in October.

Charles Miller, a spokesman for the Justice Department, said the agency had issued the subpoenas "to see the effectiveness of Internet filters." He said he was not able to say which of the companies had responded to the subpoenas and to what extent they had complied.

The A.C.L.U. also subpoenaed many of the same companies, said Aden J. Fine, a lawyer for the organization. "We have asked for information that is relevant to the lawsuit, such as information to show that filters are effective," he said. Mr. Fine declined to say how many companies were subpoenaed and what questions they were asked.

While the A.C.L.U. had objected to subpoenas of individual search data as an invasion of users' privacy, Mr. Fine said it did not see similar concerns for requests for data from the Internet and software providers.

The Justice Department subpoenas did not, in fact, ask for information that could be attributed to any individual user. Rather, it asked for detailed quantitative and technical descriptions of the Internet filters that were offered to customers, how they worked and how many people used them. The department also asked for market research information on how many people wanted filters and how satisfied they were.

According to Mr. Fine, the Internet and software companies largely complied with both sets of subpoenas. According to a letter provided to InformationWeek, Verizon initially raised objections and requested clarifications on issues mainly related to Justice Department requests for contracts and other trade secrets.

David Fish, a spokesman for Verizon, said that the company provided the information after reaching an agreement with the Justice Department on who would have access to it.

G.O.P. Is Taking Aim At Advocacy Groups (NYT)

By Carl Hulse And Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 30 — To many Republicans, the liberal activist organization MoveOn.org is a political boogeyman that they hope to chase off with new restrictions on so-called 527 groups.

DOJ_NMG_0024522

But the pursuit may turn out to be fruitless. Like other major groups planning to inject themselves aggressively into the midterm elections through advertisements, voter drives and issue fights, MoveOn.org has already figured out what it thinks is a better, and less controversial, way to spend its millions. Its 527 — named for a section of the tax code — is being put on ice.

"Our 527 is dormant," said Eli Pariser, executive director of MoveOn.org. He said his group would predominantly operate as a conventional political action committee, allowing it to more freely mix explicit political support and issue advocacy in a way that Mr. Pariser described as "squeaky clean."

MoveOn.org might be moving on from its 527, but Congress is not. Two years after 527's burst onto the political scene, gaining notoriety by raising unlimited amounts from private donors, Congressional Republicans are moving to rein in the groups — just in time for the November midterm elections. Leading Democrats are threatening a fight.

In the House, the Republican leadership intends to bring a plan to impose new restrictions on 527 groups to the floor next week to spur action in the Senate, where Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, a champion of the campaign finance bill that bears his name, is offering similar legislation.

"I think this leaves a gaping loophole in the McCain-Feingold campaign finance bill," the House majority leader, Representative John A. Boehner, Republican of Ohio, told reporters on Thursday, referring to a bill co-sponsored by Senator Russell D. Feingold, Democrat of Wisconsin. "I think it needs to be fixed."

But Mr. Boehner's Democratic counterpart, Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, denounced the effort, saying that Republicans could draw unlimited money from wealthy corporations and trade associations that used their own nonprofit arms to wage issue campaigns.

Both Mr. McCain and the House leaders want to limit annual donations to 527 groups and force them to abide by the more stringent rules governing political committees if they are active in federal races.

A federal district judge in Washington this week also called for action, ruling that the Federal Election Commission had "failed to present a reasoned explanation" for not requiring 527 groups to register as political committees. The judge, Emmet G. Sullivan, ordered the commission either to articulate its reasoning for evaluating 527 complaints on a case-by-case basis, or to "promulgate a rule, if necessary."

But even if the campaign to stamp out 527 groups succeeds, it may not greatly impede third-party involvement in political campaigns, which is flourishing as advocacy groups adapt and discover ever more creative ways to pour their contributions into the political process.

Independent organizations are already working on behalf of candidates in both parties, rallying support behind issues, canvassing for voters and preparing for big-money efforts, with many steering clear of the 527 approach. And some of the deep-pocketed 527 groups that were active in 2004 are so far on the sidelines.

"Unless and until they actually manage to repeal the First Amendment itself, we are going to find a way to give voice to the tens of thousands of people who share our views and want to have a voice in the political process," said Pat Toomey, president of the Club for Growth, an antitax group that has been sued by the election commission over the conduct of its 527 in a 2004 Senate race.

The 527 groups drew intense scrutiny after Swift Boat Veterans for Truth ran its campaign attacking the war record of the Democratic presidential nominee, Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts. But while Swift Boats drew the spotlight, the liberal philanthropist George Soros nearly single-handedly redefined the scope of campaign finance by contributing millions to progressive groups like MoveOn.

So while candidates of both parties suffered at the hands of 527 committees, the drive to limit them is being pushed largely by Republicans who fear that Democratic advantages among the groups could swamp some of their candidates.

"It is the Loch Ness monster in 527 form, rising out of the mist to eat them," scoffed Robert Bauer, an election law specialist opposed to the proposed restrictions on 527 committees.

After 2004, the Federal Election Commission scrutinized some 527 groups and sued Club for Growth. The result, said Kenneth A. Gross, a campaign finance lawyer, was that "527's have been demonized to some extent," prompting many outside advocacy groups to rely on another provision of the tax code, 501c(4), which governs nonprofit groups.

Business and trade associations typically operate under a similar provision, 501c(6). As a bonus, the 501c groups are not required to disclose their donors, as 527 groups are.

Tony Massaro, executive vice president for political affairs at the League of Conservation Voters, said his group relied on its 501c(4) status because it could push directly for the election of specific candidates right up to Election Day, since the group takes no union or corporate money. Were it a 527, the advertisements would have to skirt that issue and strike a fuzzier theme of urging voters to contact candidates about their positions on divisive issues — a gimmick that Mr. Massaro said comported with the law but left the public cold.

"Voters get frustrated by that game," said Mr. Massaro, who said his organization would spend $3 million to $5 million and was already working on behalf of Democratic Senate candidates in Florida, Pennsylvania and Washington.

Brad Woodhouse, a spokesman for Americans United, a 501c(4) group, said that category allowed his organization to work closely with like-minded Democrats in shaping its advocacy program, including its current push for changes in Medicare's new prescription drug program. Such contact that would be prohibited for a 527.

Representative Mike Pence, an Indiana Republican who is an opponent of restraining 527 committees, likened the current atmosphere to whack-a-mole, the carnival game where the player hits a mole with a hammer, only to have another pop up. He is backing legislation that would raise limits on contributions to political parties — an idea that opponents say would gut previous reforms.

"We hit political parties and 527's pop up," Mr. Pence said. "We're going to whack them and 501c's are going to pop up."

Despite the current dip in 527 activity, some new ones are being established, including one opposing Senator Rick Santorum, a conservative Republican in a tough re-election race in Pennsylvania. Veteran Democratic operatives just established a new group called Fresh Start for America, which is expected to engage in Senate races this year.

As lawmakers prepare for a potential fight, Mr. Pariser of MoveOn.org said there could be one unexpected consequence. He suggested the effort to clamp down on 527 groups could enhance the influence of his organization because it would have the financial means to mount aggressive campaigns while potential competing groups would be handcuffed.

"We will be better positioned to do political ads," he said. "I presume that was not their intent."

House May Limit Nonprofit Campaign Funds (AP-Y2)

By Jim Abrams

AP2, March 30, 2006

The House next week will take up a bill to constrict the money-raising ability of nonprofit political groups that emerged as a substantial force in the 2004 presidential election.

The bill to require groups known as 527s to register as political committees and abide by contribution limits is likely to meet resistance from Democrats, who in 2004 relied on 527s as a key source of financing.

"I will strongly oppose it," House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi said Thursday.

The decision by GOP leaders to bring up the 527 bill separately could make it easier for the House and Senate to reach a compromise on lobbying and ethics legislation working its way through Congress.

The Senate on Wednesday led the response to recent lobbying scandals by passing legislation that would ban lobbyists from giving gifts and meals to lawmakers and require lobbyists to disclose more about their contacts with legislators. Lawmakers would have to get approval before taking privately funded trips and file reports when they travel on private corporate jets.

Senators from both parties warned against complicating the lobbying bill by combining it with controversial campaign finance issues, including that of 527s, but House GOP leaders have backed making that part of their package.

House Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier, R-Calif., said that could still happen. "We're still trying to determine how at the end of the day we will put this together."

On Wednesday a U.S. District judge ruled, in a case brought by President Bush's campaign and lawmakers, that the Federal Election Commission had failed to give a reasoned explanation for its decision not to issue rules requiring 527s — named after the section of the tax code that covers them — to register as federal political action committees. That would subject them to the same fundraising, spending and disclosure rules as PACs must follow.

The judge did not say that the FEC had abused its discretion, and he did not order it to develop rules for their fundraising and spending. However, he told the commission to "articulate its reasoning" or write a rule for the groups "if necessary."

The House bill is expected to be based on legislation offered by Reps. Christopher Shays, R-Conn., and Marty Meehan, D-Mass., partners in sponsoring the 2002 campaign finance act that banned national party committees and federal candidates from raising unlimited corporate and union donations.

Shays, who disagreed with most of his Republican colleagues in backing the 2002 act, criticized Pelosi and other Democrats who oppose his 527 bill. "There's no defense for saying you are for campaign finance reform and then not voting to close a loophole, except blatant partisan politics."

The Shays-Meehan bill would limit to $5,000 per year what an individual can give to a federal political committee to influence federal elections. The ceiling is $25,000 for nonfederal funds to pay for voter mobilization and public communication activities.

House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, at a news conference Thursday, said nonprofit group spending had become "a gaping loophole" in the law. "To have all of this unregulated campaign cash going to these organizations and allowing them to engage in campaign activities without any disclosure is wrong," he said.

The nonpartisan Political Money Line, a campaign finance tracking service, found that in the 2004 election groups supporting Sen. John Kerry or opposing President Bush raised $266 million, including multimillion-dollar donations from wealthy businessmen such as George Soros. Anti-Kerry, pro-Bush groups, most prominently the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth that questioned Kerry's Vietnam war record, raised $144 million.

Pelosi said it was "the height of hypocrisy" that the Republicans were trying to limit 527s but were not restricting trade associations and other business groups exempt from some rules applying to political committees.

"If they are going to do it, just do it across the board," she said.

Judge Says FEC Failed To Curb Soft Money (AP-Y2)

By Toni Locy

AP2, March 30, 2006

The Federal Election Commission failed to give a good reason for refusing to rein in nonprofit political groups that spent huge sums in the 2004 presidential elections, a judge has ruled in a case brought by President Bush's campaign and lawmakers.

In a 34-page opinion, U.S. District Judge Emmet G. Sullivan said the FEC failed to give "a reasoned explanation" for its decision not to issues rules to require so-called "527" groups to register as federal political action committees and face the same strict fundraising, spending and disclosure rules PACs do.

But Sullivan stopped short of saying the FEC had abused its discretion. Nor did he order it to develop rules to crack down on the groups' fundraising and spending.

Instead, the judge in his ruling Wednesday sent the issue back to the FEC and ordered the commission to "articulate its reasoning," or come up with a rule for the groups "if necessary."

The nonprofit groups — nicknamed 527s after the section of the U.S. Tax Code that covers them — emerged as key players in the 2004 presidential election after a new law banned national party committees and federal candidates from raising unlimited, corporate and union donations known as soft money. PACs were already banned from taking soft money.

The 527 groups stepped into the void. Democrats in particular, worried that their party would lag behind the GOP in fundraising, quickly moved to set up soft money groups.

Fueled by multimillion-dollar donations from wealthy businessmen such as George Soros, pro-Democratic groups collected almost twice as much money as their Republican rivals, keeping Democratic nominee John Kerry's viewpoints on the airwaves while he rebuilt his finances after the expensive Democratic primary race. They also helped build pro-Democratic get-out-the-vote efforts.

Groups supporting Kerry or opposing Bush raised $266 million in the 2003-04 election cycle, while those opposing Kerry or backing Bush collected $144 million, a review by the nonpartisan Political Money Line campaign finance tracking service found.

The Bush campaign and lawmakers who sponsored the new campaign finance law pressed the FEC to crack down on partisan 527s while the presidential race was under way, arguing the groups were violating a broad ban on the use of soft money in federal elections.

But a majority of FEC members declined to adopt new regulations, contending the commission lacked authority to do so and that it was up to Congress and Bush to approve legislation doing so if they felt there was a need.

The FEC decision prompted the Bush campaign and lawmakers to sue the commission to try to force it to restrict the groups and led Republican activists to start pouring millions into new pro-Bush groups. They included Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, which made headlines in summer 2004 by alleging Kerry exaggerated his decorated Vietnam War service record.

Sullivan said he was "troubled" because the FEC ignored testimony from 31 politicians and more than 100,000 comments from people involved in the political process. The judge said the FEC's handling of the matter "does not reflect reasoned decision-making."

"We are very pleased with Judge Sullivan's opinion," said Fred Wertheimer, president of the Democracy 21 campaign finance watchdog group and an attorney for the two lawmakers who sued, Reps. Christopher Shays, R-Conn., and Martin Meehan, D-Mass.

Sullivan criticized the FEC's decision to handle complaints about the groups on a case-by-case basis, saying the commission's track record "appears to have been a total failure."

The judge noted FEC cases can languish for years and that penalties, "if they come at all, come long after the money has been spent and the election decided."

FEC Ordered To Rethink '527' Rules (WP)

By Thomas B. Edsall

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

U.S. District Judge Emmet G. Sullivan has rejected requests by the Bush-Cheney campaign and by two advocates of campaign finance legislation to order the Federal Election Commission to impose tough regulations on "527" political committees that put more than $400 million into the 2004 elections.

Instead, in a ruling issued late Wednesday evening, the judge gave the FEC a choice: Either explain in detail why regulations are not needed or begin proceedings to develop such rules.

In the 2003-04 election cycle, 527 committees active in federal elections raised $424 million, according to the Campaign Finance Institute. Pro-Democratic groups spent $314.4 million and pro-Republican groups spent $84.1 million.

The judge warned that if the FEC continues to treat 527 committee complaints on a case-by-case basis instead of issuing encompassing rules, it will have to explain how the interests of complainants will be protected under time-consuming processes that often do not produce any action until the election is over.

"Cases arising from the 2004 campaign have languished on the Commission's enforcement docket for as long as 23 months, with no end in sight, even as the 2006 election campaign has begun," Sullivan wrote. "The FEC can take years to complete an administrative action, and penalties, if they come at all, come long after the money has been spent and the election decided."

Two of the plaintiffs, Reps. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.) and Martin T. Meehan (D-Mass.), the House sponsors of the 2002 McCain-Feingold campaign finance law, interpreted Sullivan's order as a victory.

"Judge Sullivan supported our belief that the FEC's failure to bring 527s under campaign finance law was a dereliction of its duty by rejecting the FEC's justification for refusing to issue regulations. This was a crucial step in bringing fairness to our campaign finance laws," Shays said.

Sullivan's decision means the FEC must once again tackle the tough issue of the independent political committees, which were used in 2003-04 to get around legislation banning the use of large donations from unions, corporations and rich people -- also known as "soft money."

In May 2004, the FEC rejected regulation of 527s by a 4 to 2 vote. Three members have since been replaced -- Scott Thomas, who voted for regulation, and Bradley Smith and Danny L. McDonald, who voted against it.

It is not clear how the new commissioners are likely to vote.

Commission Chairman Michael E. Toner, who supported regulation, said the commission will take up the issue soon.

AP, March 30, 2006

MONTGOMERY, Ala. (AP) — The Alabama Senate and House can't agree on how to make sure military serving overseas get to vote in the primary runoff election this summer.

But the U.S. Justice Department is pressuring both to find a solution. It is suing the state, claiming there is not enough time between the primary election June 6 and the runoff June 27 for military personnel overseas to get and return absentee ballots.

The Senate voted 20-5 Thursday for a bill that would delay primary runoff by three weeks from June 27 to July 18 to make sure the military have time to get and return absentee ballots for the runoff.

On March 16, the House voted 100-1 for a bill that would keep the runoff on June 27, but would allow soldiers overseas to use special ballots. The ballots, which would be delivered with the primary ballots, would allow soldiers to mark their runoff preferences in races with three or more candidates.

Now, either the Senate must agree with the House-passed bill, or the House must agree with the Senate-passed bill.

The sponsor of the House bill, Rep. Lesley Vance, D-Phenix City, said moving the runoff may be the easiest way to resolve the issue, and he would try to get the House to pass the Senate version.

"We've got to think about those people fighting for our freedom and make sure their votes are counted," said Vance, whose east Alabama district is just across the state line from Fort Benning, Ga.

The Senate's bill, sponsored by Sen. Wendell Mitchell, D-Luverne, is supported by Attorney General Troy King and Secretary of State Nancy Worley.

Letter to the Editor: FIELDS SHOOTING (MJS)

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, March 30, 2006

Federal decision was made jointly

A recent article and an editorial in your paper reported that the Civil Rights Division "overruled" a decision by the U.S. attorney's office to prosecute an officer in the tragic fatal shooting of Justin Fields.

Advertisement

That is not true. Prosecutors from both of our offices, with more than a half-century of combined experience, carefully investigated and reviewed this matter and ultimately concluded that federal prosecution simply was not viable.

Their consensus is plain from the letter that closed this case, which stated that "this (United States Attorney's) Office and the Criminal Section of the Civil Rights Division . . . have concluded that there is not a federally prosecutable criminal case here."

Your editorial also erroneously claims that civil rights prosecutions have declined by 40%. To the contrary, the Justice Department has brought more criminal civil rights cases - and convicted 40% more law enforcement officials for misconduct - in the past five years than the preceding five.

Recent years saw our offices bring several civil rights cases in the Eastern District of Wisconsin, and we will continue to work together to vigorously enforce the federal civil rights laws.

What happened to Justin Fields is indeed a tragedy and we express our deep sympathies to his family. They deserve to know that our decision not to prosecute was made after a thorough and searching analysis of our comprehensive investigation.

Neither the family nor the community are served by any suggestion that our decision was based on something other than the facts and the law.

JACKSON, Miss. - A federal court monitor says violations continue at Oakley and Columbia juvenile training schools.

In a report covering Aug. 1 to Dec. 15, 2005, the monitor says most of the conditions of the agreement that ended a Department of Justice lawsuit against the state over conditions at the two training schools were not met. A report that covered May and June last year, also was critical of the state's progress.

The schools serve 550 youths combined - boys ages 10 to 17 at Oakley in Hinds County and girls 10 to 18 at Columbia.

The current report cites, among other things, student complaints about staff cursing them and using inconsistent disciplinary practices and continued fights between students.

Court monitor Joyce Burrell said she was aware that the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina has impacted the Mississippi Department of Human Services.

"But the needs of this population and those rights that were determined to have been violated must be corrected as quickly as possible," Burrell wrote in the report filed in U.S. District Court in Jackson.

State officials entered a four-year consent decree with the Justice Department last May.

MDHS Executive Director Don Taylor said in a statement that Oakley and Columbia continue to be a high priority.

"We have made significant progress in all areas," Taylor said.

House Juvenile Justice Committee Chairman George Flaggs Jr., D-Vicksburg, said Wednesday that he's trying to be understanding and patient of the challenges the state faces with the two training schools.

"But it is hard for me to realize or conclude that it would not be in the best interest for the governor to step in and remove Oakley and Columbia from under the direction or supervision of the Department of Human Services.

"The department is too big, the problems are too many for one director to focus on at the same time and keep up the day-to-day operations," Flaggs said.

In addition to being sued over the conditions at the training schools, MDHS also is being sued over the foster care system.

Massachusetts Court Limits Gay Unions (NYT)

By Pam Belluck And Katie Zezima

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

BOSTON, March 30 — Massachusetts's highest court, which legalized same-sex marriage here two and a half years ago, ruled Thursday that gay couples who live in states where such marriages are prohibited cannot marry in Massachusetts.

But the ruling left open the possibility that gay couples from states like New York and Rhode Island that do not explicitly ban same-sex marriage might be able to marry in Massachusetts.

The justices sent the cases of three of eight plaintiff couples, one from New York and two from Rhode Island, back to Superior Court to decide "whether same-sex marriage is prohibited in those states."

But couples from the vast majority of states cannot marry here because those states have either laws or constitutional amendments that bar same-sex marriage. The National Gay and Lesbian Task Force said the only other jurisdictions that do not specifically prohibit same-sex marriage are New Jersey, New Mexico and the District of Columbia.

The ruling, supported by six of the court's seven justices, upheld a 1913 law that says that no out-of-state resident can marry in Massachusetts if the marriage would be void in the person's home state, unless the person intends to live in Massachusetts.

"The laws of this commonwealth have not endowed nonresidents with an unfettered right to marry," Justice Francis X. Spina wrote in one of two concurring opinions, adding, "Massachusetts can reasonably believe that nonresident same-sex couples primarily are coming to this commonwealth to marry because they want to evade the marriage laws of their home states" and "Massachusetts should not be encouraging such evasion."

Chief Justice Margaret H. Marshall, who wrote the Supreme Judicial Court's November 2003 decision making same-sex marriage legal, wrote in the other concurring opinion, "It is rational for the legislature to take steps to ensure that marriages performed here will hold up elsewhere, and that they will not be ignored by other states."

Only one justice, Roderick L. Ireland, dissented, writing that "the commonwealth's resurrection of a moribund statute to deny nonresident same-sex couples access to marriage is not only troubling" but "also is fundamentally unfair."

The lawsuit began after same-sex marriage became legal in Massachusetts in May 2004 and Gov. Mitt Romney, an opponent of it, invoked the 1913 statute, which had been originally adopted in part to block interracial marriages. Mr. Romney refused to record out-of-state marriages, saying, "Massachusetts should not become the Las Vegas of same-sex marriage."

The decision by Mr. Romney, a Republican, was backed by the state's attorney general, Thomas F. Reilly, a Democrat.

Eight couples from Connecticut, Maine, New Hampshire, New York, Rhode Island and Vermont sued, along with 12 Massachusetts cities and towns, claiming that the 1913 statute was discriminatory and had been invalidated by the legalization of same-sex marriage here.

On Thursday, the clerk of one of those towns, Margaret Drury of Cambridge, said, "We really feel like we are being forced to discriminate against out-of-state couples."

According to the State Department of Public Health, 7,341 same-sex couples married in Massachusetts from May 17, 2004, to Dec. 31, 2005, but the state does not keep track of how many were from out of state.

Mark Pearsall, 38, of Lebanon, Conn., who married his partner, Paul Trubey, 42, in Massachusetts in 2004 after Mr. Pearsall's mother, dying of cancer, gave them her engagement and wedding rings, said the ruling was "very disappointing for us."

"But ultimately we consider ourselves married," Mr. Pearsall said.

Although their marriage is invalid and they could have a civil union in Connecticut, Mr. Trubey said that would feel "like the back of the bus."

Amy Zimmerman, 33, who lives in New York City with Tanya Wexler, 35, and their four children, said she was "hopeful that the door seems to have been left open" for her marriage in May 2004 to be made official if the Superior Court decides that New York State does not bar same-sex marriage.

An appeals court in New York is scheduled to hear arguments in May in a lawsuit challenging state officials' interpretation that same-sex marriage is illegal in the state.

Governor Romney, in an interview Thursday, said, "This is an important victory for traditional marriage and for the right of each state to be sovereign as it defines marriage. It's very important to contain a bad initial decision on same-sex marriage by this court and not impose it on the other 49 states."

Peter Sprig, vice president for policy at the Family Research Council, called the ruling "gratifying" and said conservative groups would continue to push for a federal constitutional amendment against same-sex marriage and for similar amendments in states that do not already have them. Such an amendment will come before the Massachusetts legislature in May.

Advocates for same-sex marriage said they were disappointed by the Massachusetts ruling.

"I had very high hopes about this decision," said Matt Foreman, executive director of the National Gay and Lesbian Task Force.

Michele E. Granda, a lawyer for Gay and Lesbian Advocates and Defenders, which represented the plaintiffs, said that while her side had the option of asking the United States Supreme Court to hear an appeal, it was much more likely that her group would focus on the New York and Rhode Island cases, and would press the Massachusetts legislature to repeal the 1913 law.

A bill to repeal the law passed the State Senate overwhelmingly in 2004 but was not taken up in the House of Representatives, which at the time was led by a speaker who opposed same-sex marriage. It was recently reintroduced.

"This is a ridiculous, confusing and badly formed law," Ms. Granda said. "We live in a mobile society, and where someone lives today may have no meaning for them when they go on vacation next month or relocate a year from now."

Mass. Court Sets Limit On Same-Sex Marriage Law (WP)

By Michael Powell And Michelle García

Massachusetts's highest court ruled yesterday that most gay couples from other states cannot get married there, the first decision to affirm a legal limit on the landmark same-sex marriage law in the Bay State.

The Supreme Judicial Court knocked down a legal challenge to a 1913 state law that forbids a non-Massachusetts couple from getting married there if their marriage would not be recognized by their home state.

"The laws of this commonwealth have not endowed nonresidents with an unfettered right to marry," the court wrote. "The fact that this court concluded that there was no rational basis . . . for denying Massachusetts same-sex couples the right to enter into civil marriages does not now compel a conclusion that nonresident same-sex couples . . . have an identical right."

The court ruled in 2003 that it would be unconstitutional under state law to prevent gay couples who live in Massachusetts from marrying. More than 6,000 gay couples have since married there.

Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, who is considering a bid for the Republican presidential nomination and often mentions his opposition to same-sex marriage, called the decision a victory for "traditional marriage." He had ordered local officials to enforce the 1913 law after the state's highest court issued its same-sex marriage ruling.

"We don't want Massachusetts to become the Las Vegas of same-sex marriage," Romney told reporters. "It's important that other states have the right to make their own determination of marriage and not follow the wrong course that our Supreme Judicial Court put us on."

Gay rights activists expressed relief that the legal bedrock of the court's original decision remained intact -- namely, that Massachusetts gay couples have an unfettered right to marriage. And they pointed to national polls that report a growing number of Americans -- though not quite a majority -- support same-sex marriage. Those who say that they are strongly opposed have dropped from 42 percent to 28 percent in the past two years, according to the Pew Research Center.

The Washington state Supreme Court is expected to rule soon on the constitutionality of a state law prohibiting same-sex marriage. Two lower courts have struck down the law. Unlike Massachusetts, Washington has no law prohibiting nonresidents from getting married there if their own state prohibits it.

But activists acknowledged that yesterday's ruling in Massachusetts on the 1913 law casts a shadow. "It's unfortunate that the Massachusetts courts did not strike down this barrier that discriminates against gay marriage," said Evan Wolfson of Freedom to Marry.

The court ruling was a split one, and several justices offered passionate dissents. They stated that Romney is relying upon the "resurrection of a moribund statute" in a way that is "fundamentally unfair." Marriage, wrote one justice, "is a basic human right."

The ruling left behind several ambiguities, not least what happens to the marriages of those from states such as New York and Rhode Island. Both states have no explicit ban on same-sex marriage, and New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer has issued an opinion, now being challenged in state court, that New York should honor same-sex marriages performed elsewhere.

Nor is it entirely clear what becomes of the marriages of those who managed to slip under the legal deadline in those first days after the 2003 same-sex marriage ruling.

Christopher McCary and John Sullivan of Anniston, Ala., are among those whose marriage certificate is now in doubt. They hopped on a plane to Provincetown, Mass., on May 16, 2004. The couple wanted legal protections and the right to adopt a child.

They got married, said McCary, 45, "because society celebrates it and the expectations that go with marriage -- that you are expected to be faithful and be there for each other in old age."

But they knew that their license would be rendered meaningless the minute they returned home. Alabama law prohibits same-sex marriage.

The social benediction came anyway. Back home, friends and family congratulated them. McCary recalled that even "the redneck down at the gym said, 'Congratulations. Good for y'all.' "

Non-state Gays Cannot 'Marry' (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein

The Washington Times, March 31, 2006

The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court yesterday upheld a 1913 state law that blocks out-of-state homosexual couples from legally "marrying" there.

"[T]he laws of this Commonwealth have not endowed nonresidents with an unfettered right to marry," Justice Francis X. Spina wrote for the 6-1 majority.

The high court's ruling continues current policy, which says out-of-state couples cannot marry in Massachusetts unless their marriage is permissible in their home state.

Because Massachusetts is the only U.S. state to allow same-sex "marriage," the 1913 law effectively bans nonresident homosexual couples from "marrying" there.

However, the high court suggested that New York and Rhode Island might allow same-sex "marriage," and directed plaintiffs from those two states to seek lower court hearings to determine whether same-sex "marriage" is prohibited there.

Most of the eight out-of-state homosexual plaintiff couples live in states where same-sex"marriage" is clearly prohibited, the court noted in its ruling.

Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, a Republican, praised yesterday's ruling, saying: "We don't want Massachusetts to become the Las Vegas of same-sex marriage.

"It's important that other states have the right to make their own determination of marriage and not follow the wrong course that our Supreme Judicial Court put us on," Mr. Romney said.

Plaintiff Mark Pearsall of Connecticut called the ruling "illogical," and his lawyers at the Gay & Lesbian Advocates & Defenders said it was "disappointing."

The decision "is a speed bump on the long road to fairness," said Joe Solmonese, president of the Human Rights Campaign, which promotes homosexual rights.

Massachusetts became the first U.S. state to legalize same-sex "marriage" with the 2003 Goodridge decision. When the first homosexual ceremonies were held in May 2004, Massachusetts officials invoked the 1913 law to block applications of out-of-state homosexual couples.

In June 2004, eight out-of-state homosexual couples and a group of town clerks filed lawsuits to overturn the 1913 law.

But yesterday, the court ruled that the law, which was written to prevent out-of-state couples from evading local marriage laws, was constitutional.

It also agreed that application of the 1913 law "has inevitably fallen disproportionately on nonresident same-sex couples."

However, the Goodridge decision does not mean that "nonresident same-sex couples, who have no intention of living in Massachusetts, have an identical right to secure a marriage license that they could not otherwise obtain in their home states," the court said.

Massachusetts "has a significant interest in not meddling in matters in which another state, the one where a couple actually resides, has a paramount interest," it added.

Justice Roderick L. Ireland, the sole dissenter, said his colleagues failed to keep marriage gender-neutral. Yesterday's decision helps "reconstruct the edifice of discrimination we dismantled in Goodridge," he warned.

To date, 44 states have laws or amendments that uphold traditional marriage and ban same-sex "marriage," said the Massachusetts Family Institute, which supports traditional marriage.

This year, voters in at least seven states -- Alabama, Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Virginia and Wisconsin -- will have constitutional marriage amendments on their ballots.

Meanwhile, lawsuits seeking same-sex "marriage" rights are under way in California, Connecticut, Iowa, Maryland, New Jersey, New York and Washington.

The Washington Supreme Court decision is expected at any time. Washington does not have restrictive marriage laws, and if that court rules in favor of same-sex "marriage," homosexual couples from across the nation can readily marry there.

Bid For Rosa Parks Pardon (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

MONTGOMERY, Ala., March 30 — The Alabama House unanimously passed a bill on Thursday that would pardon Rosa Parks and hundreds of other people arrested for violating the state's segregation-era laws.

The original bill was amended to say that the arrest records would not be expunged or sealed from public view, but would be turned over to the State Department of Archives and History. That way, backers said, the records will provide a permanent record of civil disobedience that, in many cases, helped lead to desegregation.

Schiavo Family Marks Her Death Anniversary (WT)

By Brian Debose

Family members of the late Terri Schindler Schiavo commemorated the anniversary of her death, which is today, and announced the creation of a foundation in her name to combat euthanasia.

The foundation's mission will be to eliminate the persistent vegetative state, the condition that doctors said Mrs. Schiavo was in, as a diagnosis for patients, said her brother Bobby Schindler.

But the foundation, which also will have a separate lobbying organization, will seek to have feeding tubes classified as ordinary care for hospital patients and to make people aware of the need to have advance directives or living wills in case they cannot communicate their wishes late in life.

"We lost in our battle to save Terri, but we believe it is incumbent upon us to save the lives of others from this culture of euthanasia and choosing death instead of life," said her mother.

Mrs. Schiavo's parents, Robert and Mary, her brother and sister Suzanne Schindler-Vitadamo yesterday spoke of their work in the past year to build support for the foundation and the book they have authored on Mrs. Schiavo's life: "A Life that Matters: The Legacy of Terri Schiavo -- a Lesson for Us All," the proceeds from which will be donated to the foundation.

Mrs. Schiavo died of starvation and dehydration March 31, 2005, after living 15 years in what doctors call a persistent vegetative state, unable to feed herself or communicate with others. She slipped into a coma in 1990 and never recovered her higher mental functions.

Her husband, Michael Schiavo, who won a legal fight with her family to have her feeding tube removed, said his wife had told him that she would not have wanted to be kept alive in that way.

Members of Congress, the Catholic Church and President Bush all spoke on behalf of saving Mrs. Schiavo's life as the family battled the decision in court, and Congress returned from Easter recess to pass bills to stop the euthanasia.

Sen. Sam Brownback, Kansas Republican, was the only member of Congress to stand with the family yesterday, and he pledged to continue the fight to protect life.

"Terri's plight highlighted the core question about the protection of human life: Does the dignity with which we treat individuals depend on their physical and mental status as human beings," Mr. Brownback asked.

"Once we go down the path of valuing some lives more than others, of saying that people with disabilities don't have the same dignity and right to life as others, there are few means not justified by the sinister end of a disability-free society."

The National Pro-Life Action Center bought 600 copies of the family's book at a cost of $10,000 as a donation and plans to distribute them to every member of Congress, top White House officials and all Supreme Court justices. The foundation is based in St. Petersburg, Fla., and the family has been on a speaking tour to talk about the Schiavo case and euthanasia.

Ga. Solo Challenges Courtroom Pledge (LAW)

By Greg Land, Fulton County Daily Report

Fulton County (GA) Daily Report, March 31, 2006

Attorney Donald A. Weissman won't have to stand for the Pledge of Allegiance when he goes to court in Gwinnett, Ga., today, but he's still concerned that others will feel compelled to declare their loyalty to the U.S. government in order to get a fair hearing from Magistrate Judge Mark A. Lewis.

Lewis, hearing civil cases for a Gwinnett Superior Court judge tied up with a criminal trial, begins each day in court by turning to face the U.S. flag and reciting the pledge.

Lewis said he started the practice after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Weissman recently complained about the practice in a letter to Lewis and the court administrator.

According to Gwinnett County Court Administrator Philip M. Boudewyns, Lewis said that he would forego the pledge when Weissman is present, but will continue the practice on other days.

Thursday, the judge responded officially, entering an order chiding Weissman for passing the complaint letter -- which had been marked "confidential to be opened by recipient only" -- to the Daily Report.

Lewis also defended his actions by citing a 2003 Georgia Supreme Court decision that said a judge's request that jurors stand for the pledge "shows no bias, either for the State, or for one who is charged by the State with a crime."

In that case, Robles v. State, 277 Ga. 415, Justice P. Harris Hines, writing for the 5-2 majority, said there was nothing wrong with asking jurors to pledge to a flag that stands for "liberty and justice for all."

In his order, Lewis wrote that participation in the pledge by others in the courtroom "is not mandatory, requested, or required."

Because he stands with his back to the audience, wrote the judge, he has no way of knowing who joins in; those who particulate do so "spontaneously," he said. Claytor v. Kosteski, 05-A-08735-1, (Gwin. Sup. Ct., March 30, 2006).

"That doesn't change anything," said Weissman, a solo practitioner. The practice "still gives the improper appearance of partiality" by "creating an atmosphere that's inherently coercive and intimidating."

Weissman's concerns are rooted in a January appearance before Lewis. Weissman, who was representing a client in a civil contempt proceeding, said he was surprised when Lewis opened court by requesting that everyone remain standing for the Pledge of Allegiance.

"I found it professionally inconsistent with what I thought should go on within the courtroom," said Weissman. "I've been practicing law [for] 43 years in Georgia, and I've never seen a declaration of loyalty required in any court."

Weissman said nothing that day, but he sent a letter March 17 to Lewis requesting that he halt the practice.

"It is offensive to me as a citizen of the United States and it is objectionable to me as an attorney sworn to uphold the laws and constitutions of the United States and Georgia and as an officer of the Court," wrote Weissman, "that you apparently consider your Judicial forum to be an American Court, rather than a Court for all persons situated in America."

Noting Gwinnett's large population of immigrants and noncitizens, Weissman decried the pledge recital as pressure upon court attendees "to either declare their personal loyalty to this nation ... or suffer the risk that they may be treated differently."

He also wrote that such a practice may place Lewis in violation of Georgia's Canons of Judicial Conduct, particularly those barring actions that "appear to address matters which distinguish between litigants based on national origin or citizenship."

Clarke County Superior Court Judge Steven C. Jones, chairman of the Judicial Qualifications Commission, said he was unaware of any similar complaints in his nine years on the bench.

In his letter and in an interview, Weissman was careful to point out that he had no reason to think Lewis exercised any bias.

"But the requirement of a declaration of loyalty seems to divide the courtroom into two parts," he said. "They have to choose whether they will stand with the judge or not."

In his order, Lewis mentioned that a reporter for the Daily Report had called him several times for comment, and stated that he would not respond because he did not want to have ex parte communications with anyone about the case Weissman is arguing, a routine civil contempt proceeding.

Gwinnett County Superior Court Chief Judge K. Dawson Jackson said through an assistant that he would have no comment on the matter.

Boudewyns, the Gwinnett court administrator, said he was not aware of other Gwinnett judges who recite the pledge in their courtrooms.

Lewis' order said that, far from being negatively influenced by the Weissman's letter, he "applauds Mr. Weissman for challenging a practice that he finds questionable and personally offensive."

Weissman expressed puzzlement when questioned about the new order.

He said he made the letter public because he had received no response.

"There's nothing that precludes me from disclosing my own letter," he noted.

The ex parte claims, he said, are out of place because "the rules of ex parte communications are very specific. They refer to communications concerning the matter before the court. My letter had no bearing on the case before him. ... It related to how he conducts his court."

As to the Robles citation, "I don't think that applies," he said. "Robles was a defendant who was not an American" challenging a conviction, he said.

"The decision did not address a judge requesting the whole court to pledge to the flag. ... It seems to me that when a judge brings his personal view of patriotism into the courtroom, everyone may feel compelled to join in the exercise."

"He wants to commemorate Sept. 11? That's fine," said Weissman. "But what's that got to do with a declaration of loyalty? There was no attack on the courthouse in Gwinnett County. And it certainly does not follow, in my mind, that every person who appears there should be compelled to declare their loyalty."

Blacks Turn To Internet Highway, And Digital Divide Starts To Close (NYT)

By Michel Marriott

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

African-Americans are steadily gaining access to and ease with the Internet, signaling a remarkable closing of the "digital divide" that many experts had worried would be a crippling disadvantage in achieving success.

Civil rights leaders, educators and national policy makers warned for years that the Internet was bypassing blacks and some Hispanics as whites and Asian-Americans were rapidly increasing their use of it.

But the falling price of laptops, more computers in public schools and libraries and the newest generation of cellphones and hand-held devices that connect to the Internet have all contributed to closing the divide, Internet experts say.

Another powerful influence in attracting blacks and other minorities to the Internet has been the explosive evolution of the Internet itself, once mostly a tool used by researchers, which has become a cultural crossroad of work, play and social interaction.

Studies and mounting anecdotal evidence now suggest that blacks, even some of those at the lower end of the economic scale, are making significant gains. As a result, organizations that serve African-Americans, as well as companies seeking their business, are increasingly turning to the Internet to reach out to them.

"What digital divide?" Magic Johnson, the basketball legend, asked rhetorically in an interview about his new Internet campaign deal with the Ford Motor Company's Lincoln Mercury division to use the Internet to promote cars to black prospective buyers.

The sharpest growth in Internet access and use is among young people. But blacks and other members of minorities of various ages are also merging onto the digital information highway as never before.

According to a Pew national survey of people 18 and older, completed in February, 74 percent of whites go online, 61 percent of African-Americans do and 80 percent of English-speaking Hispanic-Americans report using the Internet. The survey did not look at non-English-speaking Hispanics, who some experts believe are not gaining access to the Internet in large numbers.

In a similar Pew survey in 1998, just 42 percent of white American adults said they used the Internet while only 23 percent of African-American adults did so. Forty percent of English-speaking Hispanic-Americans said they used the Internet.

Despite the dissolving gap, some groups like the Intel Computer Clubhouse Network, which introduces digital technologies to young people, say the digital divide is still vast in more subtle ways. Instant messaging and downloading music is one thing, said Marlon Orozco, program manager at the network's Boston clubhouse, but he would like to see black and Hispanic teenagers use the Internet in more challenging ways, like building virtual communities or promoting their businesses.

Vicky Rideout, vice president of the Henry J. Kaiser Family Foundation, which has studied Internet use by race, ethnicity and age, cautioned that a new dimension of the digital divide might be opening because groups that were newer to the Internet tended to use less-advanced hardware and had slower connection speeds.

"The type and meaningful quality of access is, in some ways, a more challenging divide that remains," Ms. Rideout said. "This has an impact on things like homework."

In addition, Internet access solely at institutions can put students at a disadvantage. Schools and other institutions seldom operate round the clock, seven days a week, which is especially an issue for students, said Andy Carvin, coordinator for the Digital Divide Network, an international group that seeks to close the gap.

But not everyone agrees that minorities tend toward less-advanced use of the Internet. Pippa Norris, a lecturer on comparative politics at Harvard who has written extensively about the digital divide, said members of minorities had been shown to use the Internet to search for jobs and to connect to a wide variety of educational opportunities.

"The simple assumption that the Internet is a luxury is being disputed by this group," Ms. Norris said.

The divide was considered so dire a decade ago that scholars, philanthropists and even President Bill Clinton in his 1996 State of the Union address fretted over just what the gap would mean in lost educational and employment opportunities for young people who were not wired.

In an effort to help erase the divide, the federal government has provided low-cost connections for schools, libraries, hospitals and health clinics, allocated money to expand in-home access to computers and the Internet for low-income families and given tax incentives to companies donating computer and technical training and for sponsoring community learning centers.

As a result of such efforts, "most kids, almost all kids, have a place in which they can go online and have gone online," said Ms. Rideout of the Kaiser foundation.

Jason Jordan of Boston is one of the young people closing the divide. Jason, 17, who is black, is getting a used computer from an older brother. He said he had wanted a computer for years, since "I heard about a lot that I was missing."

Jason said he had access to the Internet at school, where he is pursuing a general equivalency diploma, but looked forward to having his own computer and Web access at his home in the Dorchester section of Boston. "I can work in my own place and don't have to worry about the time I'm online," he said.

Like Jason, almost 9 out of 10 of the 21 million Americans ages 12 to 17 use the Internet, according to a report issued in July by the Pew Internet and American Life Project. Of them, 87 percent of white teenagers say they use the Internet, while 77 percent of black teenagers and 89 percent of Hispanic teenagers say they have access to it, the report said.

The gap in access among young Americans is less pronounced than among their parents' generation, said Susannah Fox, associate director of the Pew project. "Age continues to be a strong predictor for Internet use," Ms. Fox said.

While, overall Internet use among blacks still significantly trails use among whites, the shrinking divide is most vividly reflected in the online experience of people like Billy and Barbara Johnson. Less than two years ago, the Johnsons, who are black, plugged into the Internet in their upscale suburban home near Atlanta for the first time. Mrs. Johnson, a 52-year-old mother of four and homemaker, said she felt she had little choice because her school-age children needed to use the Internet for research.

And then there is e-mail. "No one really wants to take the time anymore to pick up the phone and keep in touch," lamented Mrs. Johnson, who said that so much of the communications with her children's school was done through e-mail correspondence. "I felt like I was pretty much forced into it."

Even so, Mrs. Johnson said her husband, an assistant coach for the Atlanta Falcons, still chided her when she neglected to check her e-mail at least every day.

Ms. Norris and other experts on Internet use see progress on the horizon. They note that the declining cost of laptop and other computers, and efforts, like those in Philadelphia, to provide low-cost wireless Internet access, are likely to increase online access for groups that have been slow to connect.

Philanthropic efforts have also helped to give more people Internet access. For example, the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation has awarded $250 million since 1997 for American public libraries to create Internet access for the public. Martha Choe, the foundation's director of global libraries, said some 47,000 computers had been bought for 11,000 libraries. Today, Ms. Choe said, most libraries in the United States have public Internet access.

Education levels remain a major indicator of who is among the 137 million Americans using the Internet and who is not, said Ms. Fox.

There is also a strong correlation, experts say, between household income and Internet access.

With so many more members of minorities online, some Web sites are trying to capitalize on their new access. For example, the New York/New Jersey region of the State of the African American Male, a national initiative to improve conditions for black men, is encouraging men to use digital equipment to "empower themselves" to better their lives. The site, which includes studies, public policy reports and other information about issues related to black men, promotes using digital cameras, mobile phones and iPods, but mainly computers, to organize through the Internet, said Walter Fields, vice president for government relations for the Community Service Society, an antipoverty organization, and a coordinator of the black-male initiative. Users are encouraged to submit articles, write blogs and upload pertinent photographs and video clips.

"What we're doing is playing against the popular notion of a digital divide," Mr. Fields said. "I always felt that it was a misnomer."

ANTITRUST:

Builder's Concrete Admits Role In Price-fixing Scheme (AP)

By Charles Wilson

INDIANAPOLIS - A second central Indiana company and its president have agreed to pay millions of dollars in fines after admitting they conspired to fix the price of ready-mix concrete paid by homeowners, building contractors and the government.

The U.S. Department of Justice announced the guilty plea by Builder's Concrete & Supply Co. Inc. of Fishers on Thursday. The company was charged in U.S. District Court in Indianapolis with violating the federal antitrust Sherman Act, which prohibits restraint of trade.

Government attorneys allege that Builder's President Gus B. "Butch" Nuckols III hosted at least two price-fixing meetings of central Indiana concrete executives at a horse barn next to his house in Fishers, a northern suburb of Indianapolis.

"Price fixing threatens our free market system and robs consumers of the benefit of competitive prices," Thomas O. Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the Justice Department's Antitrust Division, said in a statement. "We vigorously investigate and prosecute companies and individuals involved in these conspiracies."

The company issued a statement Thursday saying it "remains committed to its central Indiana employees, customers and local communities." Family owned Builder's Concrete has 136 employees, 77 trucks and five plants in central Indiana.

Four former executives of another company, Irving Materials Inc. of Greenfield, were sentenced to prison for their role in the scheme in December, and IMI was fined $29.2 million, the largest fine ever in a domestic antitrust investigation.

Shelbyville-based Shelby Gravel Inc. also has acknowledged its role in the scheme in court documents filed last month but is seeking leniency and could be spared criminal charges.

Builder's Concrete agreed to pay $1.5 million to $11.5 million in fines, the Justice Department said. Nuckols agreed to pay a $50,000 fine and serve time in jail. Government lawyers are recommending a 21-month sentence, which must be approved by a judge.

The agreement must be reviewed by a federal judge.

The investigation is continuing, the Justice Department said.

From July 2000 to May 2004, the companies involved conspired to set the prices charged homeowners, building contractors and the government for ready-mix concrete in the Indianapolis metropolitan area, according to court documents.

The government alleges that Nuckols and other conspirators agreed on prices and discounts for ready-mixed concrete and the timing of price increases. The government also alleges that Nuckols made phone calls and met with other individuals to assure their compliance in the scheme.

Ready-mixed concrete is made on demand and often delivered to work sites by mixer trucks. Purchasers include do-it-yourselfers, home and commercial builders, schools and the government. The material is used in projects including sidewalks, patios, driveways, bridges and roads.

Feds Look Into Purchase Of Knight Ridder Papers Local Consumer Watchdog Interviewed About Mercury News, CC Times (SFC)

By Carolyn Said, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, March 31, 2006

Federal antitrust regulators have begun looking at McClatchy Co.'s $4.5 billion purchase of Knight Ridder, an investigation that is legally required for any transaction of that size. Regulators may also be looking at what the pending sale of the San Jose Mercury News and Contra Costa Times would mean for competition in the Bay Area.

A U.S. Department of Justice spokeswoman confirmed that the department is looking at the deal, announced earlier this month, which would make McClatchy the nation's No. 2 newspaper company. "We will review it carefully," she said.

McClatchy acquired Knight Ridder's 32 newspapers and promptly said it will sell 12 of them. Those papers include the San Jose Mercury News, Contra Costa Times and Monterey County Herald, which have a combined daily circulation of 495,000.

One potential buyer is MediaNews Group of Denver, which already owns nine Bay Area dailies with a combined circulation of just over 300,000.

The director of a local media consumer watchdog group said he was interviewed by the Justice Department on Wednesday about the ramifications of MediaNews buying the Bay Area papers.

John McManus, director of GradetheNews.org, which is based at San Jose State University, said he had a 45-minute interview with a Justice Department attorney about his concerns if MediaNews bought the Mercury and Contra Costa Times.

McManus said he worries that MediaNews ownership would adversely affect the quality of local journalism. "My first concern is that there would be fewer and less skilled reporters covering the news in the Bay Area and Sacramento," he said. "ANG (Alameda Newspaper Group, a MediaNews arm that publishes the Oakland Tribune and five other local papers) tends to pay reporters poorly."

Additionally, he fears there would be less competition among newspapers on stories, lower ethical standards under MediaNews, and fewer Bay Area editorial voices taking positions on elections and other issues.

Jody Lodovic, president of MediaNews, declined to comment on whether the company is bidding for the Mercury and other Knight Ridder papers. Lodovic said he thinks McManus' comments show a lack of knowledge of the media marketplace.

"Competition is not defined by newspapers (alone) anymore," he said. "The world is different, there's plenty of competition in the marketplace. There are plenty of weeklies, other dailies, the Internet, other media all over the place."

The Justice Department spokeswoman said she doesn't know whether the department is investigating the pending sale of the 12 Knight Ridder newspapers.

Under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Act of 1976, any investor buying a stake valued at more than $15 million or 15 percent of a particular security must file notification with the federal government, beginning a 30-day review period.

Regarding Justice Department inquiries into a possible MediaNews purchase of Bay Area newspapers, Lodovic said, "I don't see why anybody's been reviewing the situation when there hasn't been any deal done."

By Mark Sherman

AP, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON - Antitrust regulators are reviewing the McClatchy Co.'s proposed $4.5 billion takeover of Knight Ridder Inc., including its plan to sell 12 newspapers it is acquiring.

While the decision to investigate the proposed deal's effect on competition and prices is fairly routine given its size, the government also apparently is interested in who might buy the Knight Ridder papers McClatchy plans to sell.

Among the 12, the St. Paul Pioneer Press is being sold to address potential antitrust concerns. It competes directly with McClatchy's Star Tribune in Minneapolis.

Meanwhile, a journalism lecturer at San Jose State University said he received a call this week from a Justice Department lawyer inquiring about the effect on advertisers if MediaNews Group Inc. were to buy the San Francisco Bay area's San Jose Mercury News and Contra Costa Times from McClatchy. MediaNews already owns several papers in the area and is widely believed to be interested in those two.

The Washington-based lawyer "asked about the impact of a MediaNews buyout on advertisers, rather than on consumer prices or news quality. But he was willing to listen to concerns about concentration of ownership on the news product," John McManus wrote on the GradetheNews Web site. McManus directs the group, which evaluates Bay area media outlets.

Justice Department spokeswoman Gina Talamona confirmed that antitrust lawyers are examining the proposed McClatchy-Knight Ridder deal, but she would not comment on specifics about the inquiry.

McClatchy hasn't set a timetable for completing the auction, but it wants to dispose of the 12 papers at the same time that it completes its acquisition of Knight Ridder, based in San Jose, in June or July.

Sacramento, Calif.-based McClatchy is retaining 20 other papers included in the Knight Ridder deal.

Dow Jones, March 31, 2006

BRUSSELS -(Dow Jones)- The U.S. government says it has "substantial concerns" about European regulators' antitrust case against Microsoft Corp. (MSFT) (MSFT), according to a person who has seen a letter sent to regulators.

Relations between Brussels and the software giant have "hit a new low," the letter said.

The U.S. letter could re-ignite transatlantic tensions that peaked in 2001 when the European Commission, the regulatory arm of the European Union, notoriously blocked General Electric Co.'s (GE) (GE) planned merger with Honeywell International Inc. (HON) (HON). Since then, Neelie Kroes has succeeded Mario Monti as the commission's top antitrust official.

The letter is particularly delicate, since Kroes is seen as a more "pro- American" commissioner than Monti, a U.S. diplomat said. The diplomat said " Washington ordered (its) E.U. mission to send the letter," noting that Microsoft (MSFT)has been pressuring U.S. officials and politicians to intervene on its behalf.

The commission's antitrust spokesman, Jonathan Todd, said the regulator received the letter via email Monday and also met with a U.S. diplomat to discuss its contents.

Microsoft (MSFT) and the commission currently are grappling in a closed door hearing in Brussels. The commission claims Microsoft (MSFT) hasn't complied with its March 2004 antitrust ruling. In that decision, the regulator fined Microsoft EUR497 million and ordered it to change some of its business practices.

Microsoft (MSFT) has accused the commission of collaborating with rival companies and withholding key evidence that could be used in its defense. Microsoft's (MSFT)allegations of a lack of "transparency and fairness ... if accurate, are of substantial concern to the U.S.," the letter said, according to the person who has seen it.

The U.S. mission to the E.U. is led by C. Boyden Gray, a former White House lawyer who lobbied for Microsoft (MSFT) during its U.S. antitrust battle.

The U.S. has questioned Brussels' treatment of Microsoft (MSFT) before. The March 2004 decision was described as "unfortunate" by R. Hewitt Pate, then the head of the U.S. Justice Department's antitrust division.

Microsoft's (MSFT) spokesman, Tom Brookes, also declined to comment.

Microsoft Gets U.S. Government Backing In EU Antitrust Dispute (BLOOM)

By Matthew Newman John Rega

March 30 (Bloomberg) -- Microsoft Corp., the world's largest software maker, is getting U.S. government support for its complaint that European Union antitrust regulators have denied access to evidence needed for the company's defense.

Microsoft's complaint raises ``substantial concerns," U.S. diplomats in Brussels said in a memo sent to the European Commission this week. The U.S.'s EU mission is led by C. Boyden Gray, a former White House counsel who lobbied on behalf of Microsoft during its battle with the U.S. Justice Department.

Relations between Microsoft and the EU have ``hit a new low," the memo said. The U.S. said it wanted to ensure that the commission treated the company fairly, according to a copy of the two-paragraph letter seen by Bloomberg News.

The EU ruled in March 2004 that Microsoft illegally abused the dominance of its software, which runs on more than 90 percent of the world's personal computers, and fined it a record 497 million euros ($601 million). The regulator is threatening an additional 2 million euros in daily fines unless the company provides ``complete and accurate" information to competitors on how the Windows operating system communicates on networks.

In February, Microsoft demanded ``full access" to the case file, accusing the commission of violating its rights of defense. The commission refused to release letters between the regulator and two experts it hired to help on the case, arguing that the correspondence is ``internal."

Tom Brookes, a spokesman for Redmond, Washington-based Microsoft, had no comment. Jonathan Todd, a commission spokesman, also declined to comment.

The company has accused the commission of collaborating with its competitors to influence an independent trustee that is monitoring Microsoft's compliance with the 2004 antitrust ruling. The software maker said the commission encouraged ``secret contact" between four competitors and trustee Neil Barrett.

The commission said Barrett is obliged to ``proactively make contact with third parties."

Microsoft in September asked companies to intervene in its antitrust case, arguing that a court ruling against it would lead to a loss of control of ``valuable trade secrets."

Microsoft Gets U.S. Help In EU Antitrust Fight (WSJ)

By Adam Cohen

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

BRUSSELS – As Microsoft Corp. and the European Commission squared off in a hearing over possible new antitrust fines on the software giant, the U.S. government weighed in on the company's behalf to say it has "substantial concern" about Europe's case.

U.S. intervention, in an email to EU regulators and European capitals, comes at a delicate time. The case could reignite trans-Atlantic tensions that peaked in 2001 when the European Union notoriously blocked U.S.-based General Electric Co.'s planned merger with Honeywell International Inc. More recently, the U.S. and EU have worked to harmonize how they deal with business regulation, but Microsoft and the EU have been escalating their public battle.

An email earlier this week from the U.S. mission to the EU, now headed by former White House counsel C. Boyden Gray, notes that relations between Brussels and the software giant have "hit a new low" and refers to Microsoft's complaints that EU proceedings aren't fair or transparent because regulators are withholding from the company key evidence that could be used in its challenge of their orders.

The allegations, "if accurate, are of substantial concern to the U.S.," the email said, according to a person who has seen it. EU officials met with a U.S. diplomat to discuss it this week, the person said, as Microsoft and the commission prepared for their showdown over EU contentions that the company is flouting its orders to help rivals make products that mesh with its ubiquitous Windows operating system.

Separately Wednesday, a U.S. district court in California quashed a Microsoft bid to move the fight into the U.S. legal system. The company asked the court to help it obtain documents related to its European antitrust case from U.S.-based rivals

Oracle Corp. and Sun Microsystems Inc., which participated in the case. Microsoft had complained that European regulators weren't giving it enough information to prepare its challenge.

A U.S. diplomat said the email was ordered in Washington, where Microsoft has been pressuring the government to intervene on its behalf. Its disclosure comes as Neelie Kroes, the chief EU antitrust regulator who has been working to realign EU enforcement with that of the U.S., is visiting Washington officials.

The U.S. has questioned Brussels's treatment of Microsoft before. The EU's original March 2004 decision, ordering Microsoft to make changes and fining it €497 million ($598 million), was described as "unfortunate" by R. Hewitt Pate, then head of the U.S. Justice Department's antitrust division.

The commission's antitrust spokesman, Jonathan Todd, declined to comment on the matter. Microsoft's spokesman Tom Brookes also declined to comment.

In the hearing Thursday, an independent computer expert -- who has labeled Microsoft's efforts to comply with European antitrust orders "useless" -- detailed his findings before a hearing room packed with the company's supporters and opponents. Then Microsoft tried to tear down his arguments and avoid €100 million or more in new fines.

Neither side expects the showdown, requested by Microsoft, to change European regulators' plans to proceed with the penalties. They would come on top of the fines ordered in 2004, when regulators found Microsoft was unfairly leveraging its dominant Windows system to crowd out competition in other areas.

Cecilio Madero, the commission official leading the Microsoft case, Thursday accused the company of using the hearing "purely for media." In recent weeks, the company has accused the computer expert, Neil Barrett, of colluding with Microsoft's rivals to harm the company, though the EU chose him to advise them from a list of experts Microsoft provided. Partly because of Mr. Barrett's conclusions, Microsoft faces the added fines, which can rise until the commission is satisfied that Microsoft has complied with its orders.

The two-day hearing, which concludes Friday with testimony from Microsoft rivals and supporters, is designed to give Microsoft a chance to fight off the fine and finding of noncompliance. A commission official leads the meeting, and the commission will take some weeks to decide whether to start the fines. Microsoft, decrying the commission's closed-door proceedings, asked the commission to open the hearing to the public but was turned down.

In the hearing, Mr. Barrett went through a detailed presentation of his efforts to use Microsoft's instructions for rivals on how to mesh with its programs, according to people attending. Microsoft also argued it has done more than enough to comply with EU orders and is willing to make further concessions.

U.S. Asks European Union To Be Fair In Microsoft Case (NYT)

By Paul Meller

BRUSSELS, March 30 — The United States government has intervened in Microsoft's antitrust dispute with the European Commission, urging it and the 25 national governments in the European Union to be fair to the company, American diplomats and European officials said on Thursday.

Microsoft has complained frequently in recent months that it has been denied the right to a fair defense in the continuing antitrust case with the European Commission. It has also accused the commission of collaborating with its rivals in the software industry and denying it access to what it contends are vital documents it needs to prepare its defense.

A memo written by unidentified government officials in Washington stated that Microsoft's complaints raise "substantial concerns" about the way Microsoft is being treated, according to a person close to the commission who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the memo. The memo was distributed this week through embassies in Europe and through the United States mission to the European Union in Brussels.

United States diplomats visited the offices of three European commissioners earlier this week. Jonathan Todd, the spokesman for the competition commissioner, Neelie Kroes, confirmed that her close aides met American diplomats this week and received the memo. He declined to comment on its content.

The diplomats also visited the offices of the internal market commissioner, Charlie McCreevy, and Gunter Verheugen, vice president of the commission, according to the person close to the commission.

A United States official denied that the American government was coming to Microsoft's aid in the antitrust dispute. "Our interest is less that than wanting to see that everything is done properly," said the official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the tenuous nature of the matter.

Microsoft's spokesman in Brussels, Tom Brookes, said on Thursday that he was unaware of the memo.

The United States government's action came as Microsoft's top lawyers arrived in Brussels to make a final attempt to persuade regulators not to impose daily fines of up to 2 million euros, or $2.4 million. The commission has accused Microsoft of failing to comply with an antitrust ruling in March 2004 that found the company abused its market dominance. In addition to fining the company 497 million euros, the commission ordered Microsoft to disclose technical documentation that rival makers of server software need to develop programs that work properly with the Windows operating system.

The regulator argued that by withholding this information, Microsoft was giving an unfair advantage to its own software programs, which function seamlessly with computers that run Windows. Microsoft contends it has satisfied the requirements of the order.

"We are in compliance," Brad Smith, Microsoft's top lawyer, told journalists at the end of the first of two days of closed hearings with the commission and with rival software manufacturers. "We are committed to doing everything in our power to find a solution to this impasse."

Microsoft made most of the presentations during the first day, according to a person in the room who spoke on the condition of anonymity because parties in the dispute are supposed to refrain from commenting. "Microsoft appeared to be urging the European regulators to come back to the negotiating table," this person said. "Their lawyers mentioned the success of the settlement with the Department of Justice at least 15 times during their presentations today."

They had predicted that the Justice Department wasn't going to decide the merits of a Whirlpool acquisition of Maytag Corp. (MYG) (MYG) on the basis of market share but rather on whether the bulked-up company, which already is the world's largest appliance maker, could change industry dynamics and raise prices, to the detriment of consumers.

Indeed, in giving its stamp of approval to the $1.7 billion acquisition Wednesday the government's antitrust watchdogs focused on pricing power.

"Market shares are not always likely to be the best predictor" of how his agency would rule, new antitrust unit chief Thomas Barnett said at a news conference Wednesday.

Last July Mark C. Schechter, a onetime Justice Department official who now specializes in antitrust issues at the Washington law firm of Howrey Simon Arnold & White LLP, and was among those advancing Whirlpool's case, had told Dow Jones Newswires that the merger would pass DOJ muster.

He said the regulators would consider whether the acquisition could give Whirlpool enough power to profitably raise prices at least 5%, an outcome Schechter considered "implausible."

That analysis ran counter to what became a mini-groundswell of misplaced opinion, on Wall Street and in the financial press, on how the government would rule in what some saw as a barometer of the Bush administration's views on business competition.

Some skeptics had asserted that the overwhelming market share a Whirlpool- Maytag combo would hold in the home-laundry business would almost surely bring a thumbs-down from Justice's antitrust staff, and would require some concessions to get eventual approval.

In an interview Thursday, Schechter speculated that such thinking may well have been encouraged by Whirlpool competitors, who had "made a significant effort to spin the deal as posing a problem" on the basis of market share.

Schechter said he believed the agency's antitrust staff viewed the matter of dominant share versus pricing power "as a close question." But after a "very comprehensive investigation" it agreed with the company that high market shares are not an accurate indicator of market impact.

In its ruling the department said that the "combination of strong rival suppliers with the ability to expand sales significantly...indicates that this transaction is not likely to harm consumer welfare."

Addressing that point at his news conference, Assistant Attorney General Barnett noted that South Korean manufacturers LG Electronics and Samsung Electronics, as well as other foreign competitors, could increase their imports into the U.S. should it become financially advantageous.

Whirlpool's and Maytag's (MYG) attorneys presented millions of pages of documents, including numerous depositions, and held what Schechter said were a "huge number of meetings" all the way up the line at the department's antitrust division, including two with Barnett and his staff.

Schechter said he didn't regard the decision either as a "great victory" or as an indicator of a shift in how the department would view future acquisitions for their competitive consequences.

The government has had mixed luck with recent merger litigation, losing challenges involving purchases by Oracle Corp. (ORCL) (ORCL) and Arch Coal Inc. (ACI) (ACI).

On whether Justice was worried about the risks of a Whirlpool trial, Barnett would only say that the agency carefully weighs how solid a case is before suing.

"We recognize that we bear the burden of proof when we go to trial," he said. Barnett wouldn't comment on whether antitrust division staffers had recommended such a challenge.

Shares of Whirlpool were trading recently at $93.08, down $2.87, or 3%, after gaining 7% on Wednesday. Those of Maytag (MYG) were trading at $21.51, down 30 cents, or 1.4% - but still above Whirlpool's $21 offering price. Maytag (MYG) shares gained 28% Wednesday.

Judge Sanctions Gateway For Destroying Evidence (WSJ)

By Christopher Lawton

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

A federal judge in Utah harshly reprimanded Gateway Inc. for destroying or losing evidence "in bad faith" in a patent-infringement case brought by an inventor against the computer maker.

The plaintiff, Phillip M. Adams, a former International Business Machines Corp. engineer, filed the suit in 2002 after talks fell through with Gateway in 2001 over licensing his patented technologies that address a defect in circuitry used to control floppy-disk drives. Mr. Adams asserts in the lawsuit that Gateway violated a nondisclosure agreement signed between the parties, and that the company infringed on his patents. He later added allegations that Gateway lost or destroyed documents needed to help prove his case, which is scheduled to go to trial Monday.

U.S. District Judge Ted Stewart sided with Mr. Adams, in a ruling that was issued March 6 and unsealed March 22. He chastised Gateway for failing to disclose information that a magistrate judge had found central to the case. Although he found no "direct" evidence about Gateway's intentions, he cited "ample circumstantial evidence" that Gateway acted in bad faith.

"Based upon the entire record, this court concludes that the explanation is that it was destroyed in bad faith by Gateway," the judge wrote in a memorandum. He added that "the court finds that it is clear that for years Gateway did everything it could to avoid producing complete copies of all the relevant emails."

Judge Stewart stopped short of granting Mr. Adams's request to decide the entire case in his favor because of Gateway's actions. But he sanctioned the company, ordering it to pay Mr. Adams's attorney fees incurred in connection with the litigation over the alleged document destruction.

Gateway, which leveled its own allegations that Mr. Adams destroyed documents, admitted to errors in handling the evidence, but insisted that it didn't intentionally conceal information. The company said that upon learning of the problems, it acted promptly to comply with orders for document discovery in the case.

"Gateway continues to dispute the characterization of this discovery battle, and we will continue to defend ourselves vigorously in this case. Plaintiffs have chosen to focus all of their energy on creating discovery disputes, and we're pleased to finally have the court consider the merits of this case," John Spelich, a spokesman for Gateway, said in a prepared statement.

A partner with Howard Phillips & Andersen, the Salt Lake City firm that filed the lawsuit on Mr. Adams's behalf, declined to comment. Mr. Adams said the case has "been a long torturous trip," adding, "I am so looking forward to my day in court."

Patent battles have been dogging many high-technology companies lately. Research In Motion Ltd. of Waterloo, Ontario, recently agreed to pay $612.5 million in a settlement with Virginia-based patent holding company NTP Inc. Barring a settlement, RIM was threatened with an injunction that could have shut down its BlackBerry email devices.

The stakes aren't quite as high in this case. Mr. Adams is seeking $150 million in damages, plus attorneys' costs from Gateway. He has said that he received about $30 million from Hewlett-Packard Co. and other companies that have licensed the patents at issue in the case.

Allegations of document destruction in patent cases have also become relatively common. Rambus Inc., a Silicon Valley maker of technology used in memory chips, has faced charges that it improperly shredded a large volume of documents associated with patent cases it has filed against companies that include Hynix Semiconductor Inc. A federal judge in San Jose, Calif., recently ruled that Rambus had done nothing improper.

Apple Computer Lawyer Defends ITunes Logo (WSJ)

By Aaron O. Patrick

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

LONDON -- To the classical strains of Antonio Vivaldi's "Gloria," a lawyer for Apple Computer Inc. yesterday argued in a high-profile United Kingdom court case that the company's iTunes service simply distributes music and isn't in the music-production business.

The classical soundtrack contrasted with the first day of the hearing Wednesday when a lawyer for Apple Corps, the Beatles record company, demonstrated his points with the 1970s disco hit "Le Freak."

COURT PAPERS

Read the trademark agreement1 signed in 1991 by Apple Computer and Apple Corps explaining how they would share the Apple logo and name. Also, see the related settlement2 in which Apple Computer agreed to pay $24.6 million. (Provided by FindLaw.com3.)

Behind the courtroom demonstrations in England's High Court, however, is a serious legal case: The Beatles' company claims Apple Computer is in breach of a 15-year-old agreement designed to end years of fighting between the companies over use of the Apple name and logo.

Apple Corps wants the Cupertino, Calif., computer company to stop using the Apple logo on the iTunes service and in advertisements for it. But Anthony Grabiner, the Apple Computer lawyer, said the company's iTunes music store was no more than a "data-transmission service" and that using the Apple logo on iTunes is to tell visitors that the iTunes software was created by Apple and has nothing to do with the music being sold.

The outcome of the case could affect Apple's thriving digital music business, which has helped transform the company into an electronics and entertainment powerhouse from a maker of personal computers. While selling music through iTunes isn't a huge money-maker for the company, it is an important companion business for Apple's iPod, the digital music player that accounted for $2.91 billion, or more than half of the company's $5.75 billion, in revenue in the holiday quarter.

Under the 1991 agreement, the Beatles' company has the exclusive right to use the Apple name and logo for creating music regardless of whether it is in "tangible or intangible" form. Apple Computer is specifically blocked from publishing music CDs under the Apple logo, for example, but is allowed to sell computers and software used to play or broadcast music. The agreement says Apple Computer can "deliver" music as long as it isn't in physical form.

The outcome of the case is likely to hinge on whether Apple Computer is found to be merely distributing music or is verging on acting as a music company in its own right.

Apple Computer's lawyer acknowledged that iTunes sells music and compilations from some artists, including U2 and Stevie Wonder, that can't be bought elsewhere. Lord Grabiner said the quantity -- 50 tracks out of a library of 3.6 million songs -- was so small that it was irrelevant.

After downloading part of "Gloria," sung by the choir of Cambridge University's King's College, he used iTunes to obtain information about the recording, including the copyright holder: EMI Group PLC. EMI also publishes the Beatles' songs.

"It is obvious that Apple Computer is not the source of the content," Lord Grabiner told the court. "A person could not conceivably imagine that the content was owned by Apple Computer or the Apple logo was an indication of the origin," he said.

Apple Corps wants the court to order Apple Computer to remove its Apple logo from the iTunes program. If successful, it could seek another hearing to assess damages. Apple Corps is owned by Paul McCartney, Ringo Starr, Yoko Ono, and the estate of George Harrison.

The case is scheduled to end next week.

FPL's Merger With Constellation Encounters Delay In Maryland (Palm Beach Post)

By Kristi E. Swartz

Palm Beach Post (FL), March 31, 2006

TALLAHASSEE — There's been a slow gas leak in the $11 billion merger between FPL Group Inc. and Constellation Energy Group of Baltimore.

On Thursday, the leak turned into an explosion in the Maryland Legislature.

That state's lawmakers voted to create a special counsel that would review utility mergers, thus delaying the deal between Juno Beach-based FPL Group and Constellation Energy.

The move by the Democratic-controlled General Assembly still has to be approved by Gov. Robert Ehrlich, a Republican who is up for reelection. Ehrlich hasn't said whether he'd veto the bill.

FPL and Constellation announced Dec. 20 they were merging to form a $28 billion energy powerhouse called Constellation Energy. The deal would put a Fortune 100 firm in Palm Beach County and create the nation's third-largest energy company.

The merger would mean little change at first for the 4.3 million residential and business customers of Florida Power Light Co., FPL's utility subsidiary. The point of the union is to create "the premier competitive energy business," FPL Group Chief Executive Lew Hay said at the time.

That can be done in the unregulated arena, where electricity is sold on the open market. But it's deregulation that's causing the headaches in Maryland.

Constellation's utility unit, Baltimore Gas Electric Co., recently told its 1 million customers to expect a 72 percent rate hike starting this summer. The increase is a result of the expiration of rate caps put in place by the General Assembly in 1999, when the state electricity market was deregulated.

Constellation's proposed merger with FPL has next to nothing to do with the rate hikes, but Maryland lawmakers hope that the threat of stalling the merger will encourage Constellation to sweeten an offer to phase in the higher rates.

FPL referred questions Thursday to Constellation.

"Obviously the pieces of legislation that are moving through the legislature are certainly troublesome from a business perspective," Constellation spokesman Rob Gould said.

Maryland lawmakers also are considering bills to throw out members of the utility-regulating Public Service Commission and force Constellation to hand over $528 million in rate relief.

The FPL-Constellation deal must be approved by shareholders of both companies as well as state and federal regulators, including the Federal Regulatory Energy Commission and the Nuclear Regulatory Commission.

The Florida Public Service Commission will vote Monday on whether to intervene in the FERC case. State law doesn't give Florida's Public Service Commission authority over utility mergers, unlike in Maryland.

Aztar Receives Rival $1.5 Billion Bid (WSJ)

By Peter Sanders

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

Colony Capital LLC offered about $1.5 billion for casino operator Aztar Corp. three weeks after Aztar entered an agreement to be acquired by rival casino operator Pinnacle Entertainment Inc. The move sets off a possible bidding war for the Phoenix company best known for its Tropicana properties in Las Vegas and Atlantic City.

Colony will offer $41 a share and would seek to refinance the $723 million in debt that Aztar carries, the company said. On March 14, Pinnacle of Las Vegas offered $38 a share for Aztar, or about $1.45 billion, not including the debt.

Colony, a closely held real-estate firm, owns the Las Vegas and Atlantic City Hilton hotel-casinos. The Los Angeles company declined to elaborate on the proposed offer, which was made in a letter to Aztar's board yesterday.

Shares of Aztar hit a 52-week high after reports of Colony's offer surfaced. In 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange, Aztar's stock was up $3.37, or 8.6%, to $42.42. Pinnacle added 23 cents to $29.23 on the NYSE.

A spokeswoman for Pinnacle said, "We have a signed merger agreement" with Aztar, but declined to comment further. A spokesman for Aztar declined to comment.

Colony's unsolicited offer may be the first salvo in what could be a heated bidding war for a small casino company that has underperformed. Aztar's $1.52 billion in market value is significantly lower than industry rivals like MGM Mirage and Harrah's Entertainment Inc.

Aztar reported net income of $55.9 million on $915.4 million in revenue last year.

More than half of Aztar's income last year came from its refurbished and expanded Tropicana property in Atlantic City. Aztar's crown jewel in Las Vegas isn't the faded hotel and casino sitting on the city's famed Strip, but the 34-acres of prime land it sits on.

For years, Aztar has discussed redeveloping the land, which is close to the Las Vegas airport and across the street from major MGM Mirage properties. The company never disclosed any firm plans and Pinnacle Chief Executive Dan Lee said earlier this month that his casino company would possibly develop a multibillion-dollar resort property at the site.

Although based in Las Vegas, Pinnacle has never operated a casino there. Pinnacle primarily owns casinos in smaller regional markets like Louisiana, Missouri and Reno, Nev. Pinnacle began in 1938 as the Hollywood Park Turf Club, a racetrack in Los Angeles. Pinnacle reported net income of $6.2 million on revenue of $725.9 million last year, down 33% from 2004.

The maneuvering indicates that despite its casino assets, some see Aztar as a real-estate play in a Las Vegas market that has seen land values soar. Some observers said Colony could be aiming for a breakup of Aztar's assets, which include casinos in Missouri and Indiana. Colony has gambling licenses in Nevada and New Jersey.

Colony, controlled by Thomas J. Barrack Jr., last year through an affiliate bought four casinos owned by Harrah's and Caesars Entertainment Inc. for about $1.24 billion.

Less than two weeks ago, Colony was part of a consortium that agreed to purchase hotel-and-casino operator Kerzner International Ltd. for a proposed $3 billion in cash and take the company private. In January Colony teamed with Kingdom Hotels International to acquire Canadian Fairmont Hotels & Resorts Inc. for about $3.3 billion.

Rival's Branches Whet Appetites At J.P. Morgan (WSJ)

By Robin Sidel And Clint Riley

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

Many of the nation's financial institutions favor one of two strategies when it comes to retail branches: build it or buy it.

J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. is aggressively pursuing both.

The nation's third-largest bank based on market value is in discussions to acquire about 300 branches from Bank of New York Co., according to people familiar with the matter. The deal would take the form of an asset swap in which J.P. Morgan would transfer a portion of its corporate-trust business to the bank that was founded by Alexander Hamilton in 1784.

Representatives of both banks declined to comment on any possible deal, which was reported yesterday by CNBC. It wasn't immediately clear if any cash would change hands as part of a transaction. Wall Street analysts, who have long speculated that Bank of New York would jettison the bulk of its retail business, have estimated the branch network's value at about $4 billion.

People familiar with the situation said a transaction wasn't imminent, noting that the deal's structure is complex. Bank of New York is seeking the asset swap over an outright sale, these people said, because the retail business represents a hefty 15% of its total profits -- an amount that can't be easily replaced on the bottom line. Such a structure also would help Bank of New York avoid paying the higher taxes that usually accompany a big cash or stock deal.

Wall Street's reaction to the potential deal was mixed. Shares of Bank of New York were up $1.50, or 4.4%, at $35.92, while J.P. Morgan was down 15 cents at $41.53 in New York Stock Exchange composite trading at 4 p.m.

J.P. Morgan is overhauling its retail-banking business after years of neglect. Financial institutions have realized that consumers still covet neighborhood branches even if they do some of their banking online. That was a major reason why J.P. Morgan bought Bank One Corp. -- which had a large Midwest retail presence -- for $58 billion in 2004.

Like J.P. Morgan's New York retail presence, the Bank of New York branches are viewed as needing substantial investment in technology and aesthetics. "If you're trying to fix up one branch network, fixing up two might not be that much bigger of a deal," says Jeff Harte, an analyst at Sandler O'Neill & Partners in Chicago. Mr. Harte has a "buy" recommendation on J.P. Morgan, but doesn't rate Bank of New York's shares. Sandler has business relationships with both banks.

The deal would be the first under the reign of James Dimon, who took over as chief executive of J.P. Morgan in January. Although investors have expressed concern that Mr. Dimon would seek another large acquisition before the Bank One deal was fully integrated, an asset-swap would likely be far more palatable for shareholders because it wouldn't dilute earnings and would fit in with the bank's existing footprint.

The potential acquisition would further solidify J.P. Morgan's already-dominant position in the New York area, one of the nation's most competitive and lucrative regions. J.P. Morgan had a leading 23.77% market share last year in the New York-New Jersey-Pennsylvania market, according to the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. The next largest presence in the region comes from Citigroup Inc., which has a market share of 16.47%. Bank of New York ranks fifth with a market share of 4.81%.

On a branch basis, J.P. Morgan has 470 branches in New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut, including 224 in New York City. Bank of New York, meanwhile, has 342 retail-bank branches in the tri-state region; 241 of those are in the state of New York.

Despite its leading position, J.P. Morgan is facing heated competition for regional deposits from big rivals such as Citigroup and Bank of America Corp. And other banks, including Wachovia Corp. and Commerce Bancorp, have been expanding aggressively in the area. Some banking-industry analysts consider the potential acquisition by J.P. Morgan as not only an aggressive expansion play, but as a defensive strategy to prevent the branches from falling into the hands of a rival.

Since it bought Bank One, J.P. Morgan has been aggressively overhauling its 2,600-branch network and breaking ground on new locations in key Northeast and Midwest markets. The bank opened 135 new branches in 2005 and intends to open another 150 this year.

The acquisition of Bank of New York's branches would accelerate that expansion significantly at a time when other large banks are opting to build branches because retail networks are too expensive to buy right now. Citigroup, for example, plans to open 100 branches this year in the U.S., and has indicated that it will likely pursue only small branch acquisitions in the near-term. Earlier this month, Capital One Financial Corp. announced plans to buy New York-based North Fork Bancorp as it seeks to expand beyond credit cards into banking.

Speculation about the future of Bank of New York's retail business intensified this month when the company for the first time broke out additional financial details about the business in a securities filing. Last year, the bank's retail operations generated pretax income of $355 million, an amount that has held relatively steady over the past two years. At the same time, the bank's securities-trading and processing business has steadily increased, providing a growing share of the company's profits before taxes. Last year, it represented 77%, or $1.8 billion, of the company's profits, up from 74% two years ago.

In November, Bank of New York removed a large cloud when it settled a long-running Russian money-laundering case and a separate fraud case in which a branch manager in Long Island falsified escrow accounts for a health-care supply company.

The bank avoided criminal prosecution by agreeing to pay $38 million in penalties and implement sweeping internal anti-money-laundering reforms.

As part of the pact, the bank agreed to hire an independent examiner for three years to monitor its compliance and report its findings to the Justice Department, Federal Reserve Bank of New York and state banking officials. The monitor hasn't been chosen yet.

Feds To Enter Landfill Negotiation (SUFFNH)

By Allison T. Williams

Suffolk (VA) News-Herald, March 29, 2006

The Southeastern Public Service Authority has asked the U.S. Justice Department to review a private landfill owner's proposal to put construction rubble and debris in SPSA's landfill.

On March 13, days after a Suffolk Circuit Court judge dismissed his $20-million lawsuit against the public regional waste authority, landfill owner John C. Holland proposed an arrangement between his business and SPSA.

Under the proposed contact, John C. Holland Enterprises Inc. would dispose of four to eight 20-ton trailers of construction debris every day at SPSA's landfill on U.S. 58. SPSA would be paid $630 n the same rate that the agency receives from Bay Transport, the other company that hauls for SPSA, based on Holland's proposal.

The authority's board of directors and legal counsel are concerned about potential state and federal anti-trust violations, said John S. Hadfield, SPSA's executive director.

On March 22, SPSA's board of directors indicated it would issue the Holland Enterprises a contract that would expire June 30, 2006, as soon as the proposed contract is approved by the U.S. Justice Department, according to a letter to Holland's lawyer Gary H. Baise. Receiving that approval is expected to take 30 to 60 days, said SPSA's lawyer Michael R. Katchmark.

Holland, in his initial letter to SPSA, indicated that he wanted to have a deal finalized by March 20, in time for an April 1 startup, and that he wanted a one-year contract.

Baise called SPSA's decision to involve the justice department unnecessary.

"This is no sweetheart deal," Baise said. "This is the price offered to the public. … and we are willing to accept that price. This is nothing but a ploy to delay working with Mr. Holland.

"(Mr. Holland and I) don't take nonsense lightly. We may see them in court again over this."

Holland agreed.

"The board … made it available to everybody and all of a sudden, I'm not one of everybody," he said.

Taking construction rubble and debris is a good business move for his company, Holland said. By putting the debris in SPSA's landfill, he conserves room in his own operation and saves on the amount of money he is required to put into an perpetual-reserve fund.

Baise said SPSA and Holland Enterprises will also be facing off on the $20-million lawsuit that was dismissed earlier this month in Suffolk Circuit Court, adding he recently filed a notice of appeal with the Virginia Supreme Court.

Fewer Marshes + More Man-made Ponds = Increased Wetlands (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 30 — In the bog of the federal regulatory code, a wetland is defined as a marshy area of saturated soils and plants whose roots spend part of their lives immersed in water. In the Interior Department's periodic national surveys, a wetland is defined, more or less, as wet.

Traditional tidal, coastal and upland marshes count, but so do golf course water hazards and other man-made ponds whose surface is less than 20 acres.

And so, even at a time of continued marsh depletion, pond inflation permitted Interior Secretary Gale A. Norton and Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns to announce proudly on Thursday the first net increase in wetlands since the Fish and Wildlife Service started measuring them in 1954. Wetlands acreage, measured largely by aerial surveys, totaled 107.7 million acres at the end of 2004, up by 191,800 acres from 1998.

The two cabinet secretaries hailed the apparent reversal in the long trend of wetland losses. "I'm pleased to complete my term as secretary of interior by announcing some good news, said Ms. Norton, who will step down from her job Friday.

A net total of 523,500 acres of swamps and tidal marshes had been lost, but the Fish and Wildlife Service measured gains of 715,300 acres of shallow-water wetlands, or ponds. According to the report's author, Tom Dahl, those can be 20 to 30 feet deep.

Almost two years ago, President Bush, under attack by environmental groups for loosening controls on development in wetlands, announced that one of his goals was to increase net wetland acreage.

For decades in the early and mid-20th century, draining and filling of wetlands by developers was widely accepted. But, as scientists and public officials recognized the importance of wetlands as nurseries for waterfowl, filters of pollution and barriers against storms, Congress passed protective laws.

One multimillion-dollar project redirected parts of the Kissimmee River in central Florida out of the narrow 30-foot-deep channel constructed by the Army Corps of Engineers and allowed it once again to dampen the surrounding landscape. Another successful wetlands-restoration project in southwestern Indiana is undoing the work farmers did decades ago to drain their land.

These projects helped hold down the net loss of marshland in Thursday's report. But the net gain noted in the report was fueled by an increase in pond acreage, which includes things like ornamental ponds in new developments and mine reclamation ponds.

For instance, the mining of sand and clay for the construction of two major highways in South Carolina, Routes 22 and 31, left the Myrtle Beach area dotted with large, deep ponds that qualify as wetlands in the Interior Department's survey but do not provide the wildlife habitat or perform the filtering functions of tidal marshes or cypress swamps.

"For Route 22, there was nine million cubic yards of fill material needed," said Boyd Holt, a regional hydrogeologist for the South Carolina Department of Health and Environmental Control. "There were probably 30 or 40 ponds as a result of that activity since 1998."

At Thursday's news conference, federal officials said that the report measures the quantity — not the quality — of wetlands. Julie Sibbing, the leading wetlands expert at the National Wildlife Federation, called the mining-site ponds "wet deserts."

"The most stunning thing about this report," she said, "is that we're losing diverse natural wetlands in this country and the administration tells us it's O.K. because we've increased the number of ponds."

The report, which covers 1998 to 2004, does not include the loss of 64,000 acres of coastal wetlands from Hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

Meth Lays Siege To Indian Country (USAT)

By Dennis Wagner, Usa Today

USA Today, March 31, 2006

SAN CARLOS APACHE INDIAN RESERVATION, Ariz. — Something haunts the Dudley house atop a ruddy clay mesa in Apache country.

It is the memory of a young man, David Justin Jackson Dudley, beaten to death at a January 2005 methamphetamine and booze party on the reservation.

The entryway is a photographic shrine to the 20-year-old, who wanted to be an X-ray technician.

"We just kind of made it David's wall," explains the young man's father, Dennis Dudley. "We light candles every time we come home."

Mary Jane Dudley sits in the living room, surrounded by half-finished Apache baskets. For months after David died, she could not weave. Now, she performs the ancient craft to lose herself in memories. "From the time I wake up to the time I go to bed is when I think about him," she says. "I haven't stopped crying."

"I didn't know where to put him, so we buried him out here," Dudley whispers. "We put this here to remind the community there has to be something done against drugs. If David had died in a car crash, maybe we could get over it. But with him dying this way, it's so hard."

Like an evil spirit, meth is sweeping through Indian country, tearing families apart and leaving a trail of violence and tears.

The highly addictive stimulant produces euphoria, increased alertness and increased physical activity when snorted, swallowed, injected or smoked. The drug can be manufactured using ingredients purchased in local stores. Over-the-counter cold medicines containing ephedrine or pseudoephedrine and other materials are "cooked" to make meth.

Native American leaders nationwide — but especially in the West — report a meth-induced surge of domestic violence, juvenile sex and meth-addicted babies, while federal authorities say foreign drug cartels are targeting tribal lands as distribution beachheads.

Just this month, a Native American-oriented website, Indianz.com, reported that meth was "the single biggest issue discussed among tribal leaders" during a February meeting of the National Congress of American Indians.

From the Lummi Nation in Washington to the Cherokee in North Carolina, "glass" has become public enemy No. 1 for many tribal leaders.

"Just about everything possible is being done to attack this problem," said Eric Pritchett, police chief on the Cherokee reservation, who recently put 30 officers through a drug interdiction training program.

'Indian country is under attack'

At a February hearing of the Senate Indian Affairs Committee, Kathy Kitcheyan, chairwoman of the San Carlos Apache community where David Dudley lived and died, put it this way: "Status quo is a life six years shorter than any other American group, being 318% more likely to die from diabetes and 670% more likely to die from alcoholism.

"It's 63 babies born in my tribe last year addicted to methamphetamine, and this is just one tribe. Nationally, Indian country is under attack from crystal meth."

The Indian Affairs Committee will return to the topic of meth April 5 when Chairman John McCain, R-Ariz., convenes a hearing on the issue.

The meth wildfire flared onto indigenous enclaves so fast and recently that little comprehensive data are available. But anecdotes abound:

• In North Carolina last year, the Cherokees launched a multipronged attack on meth by regulating sales of ephedrine drug products, starting a hotline for people to report drug dealers, developing a new treatment program and conducting anti-drug rallies.

• New Mexico's Ohkay Owingeh tribe, also known as San Juan Pueblo, is reviving the practice of banishment to remove meth dealers' tribal membership, as has Washington's Lummi Nation.

• Arizona's Apaches, like many other tribes, have launched public education blitzes and passed statutes to criminalize meth, which was not even listed as an illegal drug under arcane tribal codes.

• At Wyoming's Wind River Reservation, 25 tribal members were arrested by Bureau of Indian Affairs and Drug Enforcement Administration agents last May in connection with a drug ring that Jeffrey Sweetin, special agent in charge of the DEA's Denver office, said did 100 deals a day out of a single home.

Sweetin says Shoshone and Arapaho youth are prey on a reservation afflicted by isolation, ennui and limited enforcement.

"We had an organization headed by Mexican drug traffickers who specifically targeted the Wind River reservation," Sweetin says. "Young kids get free dope, and after a few times they'll grow into a user population. ... There's an entire generation of Native Americans vanishing."

Social Services director Terry Ross of the San Carlos Apache community says meth abuse is part of larger pathology: Unemployment is 82%, public assistance funds are dwindling and there is no residential treatment program.

Because of meth's low price and enduring high, some tribal leaders say it has surpassed alcohol as the drug of choice among teens. And that worries Ross. "I don't think we even know what we're dealing with," Ross says. "What will meth bring to us in 10 years?"

Judge Backs Lawyer In FBI-Okla. City Link (AP)

By Paul Foy

AP, March 31, 2006

SALT LAKE CITY - A federal judge on Thursday rewrote a sentence to clarify a ruling that had suggested Timothy McVeigh received help from paramilitary militias in the Oklahoma City bombing and that the government had an informant in the bombing conspiracy.

U.S. District Judge Dale Kimball had issued a decision that called those two claims "fact." Asked if he was endorsing the conspiracy theories, Kimball issued a new decision late Thursday to attribute both claims to a Salt Lake City lawyer.

The lawyer, Jesse Trentadue, is trying to expose FBI evidence he contends will show the bureau was tipped to McVeigh's plans but failed to stop the Oklahoma City bombing. FBI officials have repeatedly refused to address Trentadue's claims.

Trentadue is also trying to prove that his brother - a bank robber who died in federal custody after being picked up on a parole violation - was mistaken for an associate of McVeigh's in the frantic search for conspirators after the bombing, and was killed by federal agents during an interrogation gone awry.

The judge, who has inspected the unedited version of the memo, first wrote: "The plaintiff (Trentadue) points out the fact that this document indicates that there was an undercover operative in with Timothy McVeigh and members of the various militia groups who aided and supported McVeigh."

The judge rewrote the sentence to eliminate the word "fact" and substitute: "The plaintiff claims that this document indicates that there was an undercover operative in with Timothy McVeigh and members of the various militia groups who aided and supported McVeigh."

Kimball's decision orders the FBI to redouble a search for investigative files that could reveal what agents knew about McVeigh before the 1995 Oklahoma City bombing, but he said the bureau could black out some information about informants.

McVeigh was executed in 2001 for the bombing that gutted a federal office building and killed 168.

The judge said he found it "troubling" that the FBI's efforts to locate documents required by his earlier rulings have not turned up more memos, including ones the FBI's own files suggested existed at one time.

"While the FBI's failure to discover documents is not necessarily an indication of bad faith, it is puzzling that so many documents could be referenced but not produced," the judge wrote.

The FBI is supposed to turn over any new documents it finds to Trentadue by June 2.

Trentadue has obtained some FBI teletypes on his own and others under a Freedom of Information request, and he sued to force more disclosures.

Kimball ruled in Trentadue's favor early on and ordered the release of some heavily edited teletypes, but the FBI vigorously fought any additional releases. At a November hearing the Justice Department asked Kimball to reconsider his earlier rulings and stop the disclosures.

Kimball ruled the FBI did not have to produce teletypes that would reveal confidential informants among a white supremacist group in Oklahoma. But he ordered the FBI to renew a search for other documents.

"My assumption is the FBI will comply with the order," said Carlie Christensen, an assistant U.S. attorney who represented the FBI in court hearings here. "On balance, we're quite pleased with the ruling."

FBI officials declined comment.

Trentadue's battle for FBI records is primarily motivated by his brother's bloody death. The U.S. Bureau of Prisons has said Kenneth Trentadue, 44, was found hanging by a bedsheet after gouging his neck with the crimped edge of a plastic toothpaste tube.

Jesse Trentadue contends his brother was killed by federal agents during a vicious fight inside a one-man cell of a high-security wing at the Federal Transfer Center in Oklahoma City, only weeks after McVeigh's indictment.

In his decision, Kimball said Jesse Trentadue had "unearthed significant evidence of foul play" in his brother's death.

Cocaine Found In Virgin Mary Tombstones (AP)

By DEVLIN BARRETT

AP, March 30, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 30, 2006 — Federal agents on Thursday said they had broken up a ring of drug smugglers who used tombstones featuring the Virgin Mary to move hundreds of pounds of cocaine into New York from Mexico.

The Drug Enforcement Agency announced arrests of 12 people as part of the conspiracy.

Four of those arrests came Thursday, one in Houston and three after an early morning raid on a warehouse in New York's Brooklyn borough.

"Like grave robbers who have no respect for the dead, this drug organization used revered tombstones to smuggle millions of dollars worth of cocaine into New York City," said John Gilbride, the special agent in charge of the New York DEA office.

At the Brooklyn warehouse, agents found eight tombstones, five of which were packed with 20 to 25 kilograms each of cocaine. They also found remnants of smashed tombstones.

United Press International, March 30, 2006

NEW YORK, (UPI) -- The U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency says it has broken up a cocaine-trafficking operation that smuggled drugs into New York in religious statues.

The DEA said the investigation, called Operation Omni Presence, resulted in the arrests of 11 people and the seizure of more than 425 pounds of cocaine and $474,000 in cash.

The agency said an organization based in Mexico hid bricks of cocaine in statues of the Virgin Mary and used other "ingenious methods" to get drugs into the United States. The DEA said the investigation eliminated all levels of the operation from "wholesale distributors to retail dealers."

DEA Special Agent in Charge John P. Gilbride, in a release, said, "Like grave robbers who have no respect for the dead, this drug organization used revered tombstones to smuggle millions of dollars worth of cocaine into New York City. DEA identified this international organization with its cocaine distribution reach from Mexico to the streets of New York and put it out of business."

Gilbride said DEA worked with the Nassau County Police Department, the New York City Police Department and the New York U.S. attorney's office.

WABC-TV, March 30, 2006

(New York-WABC) - An Eyewitness News Exclusive: Federal agents are today giving the details of an unusual, international drug take down. And you won't believe what the suspects were using to smuggle in the goods. Eyewitness News reporter Jeff Pegues joins us now with the story.

Eyewitness News has obtained photographs that show the lengths some drug organizations will go through to smuggle cocaine into the country, and more specifically New York. Sources tell us at least 10 suspects have been arrested in New York as part of an international drug ring that used tombstones with the image of the Virgin Mary on them to smuggle drugs.

Sources say federal agents discovered the cocaine, hundreds of kilograms of it, packed away in those tombstones.

Eyewitness News has learned they were smuggled into the country by a cocaine trafficking organization based out of Monterey, Mexico. Sources say they used all sorts of methods to smuggle the cocaine across the U.S. border, through several states and all the way up the east coast.

Ten people in New York were arrested in the case and authorities seized 194 kilograms of cocaine and large amounts of cash.

We are told it is just the tip of the iceberg. Sources say there are many more arrests across the country.

There is a lot more to the two year police investigation. We'll have the latest on that coming up tonight on Eyewitness News at 5:00 p.m.

Tomb Raiders (NYDN)

By Alison Gendar, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, March 31, 2006

Shameless Mexican drug dealers smuggled tons of cocaine into the country stashed inside tombstones - and even inside a statue of the Virgin Mary, authorities said yesterday.

"Like graverobbers - who have no respect for the dead - this drug organization used revered tombstones to smuggle millions of dollars worth of cocaine into New York City," said John Gilbride, special agent in charge of the Drug Enforcement Administration's New York office.

The sacrilegious Mexican traffickers were nailed after an 18-month cross-country investigation, officials said.

The New York angle began to emerge last May when the NYPD, the DEA and Nassau County narcotics cops tailed a dealer running drugs between Houston, Washington Heights and Atlanta.

The tombstones had traveled from Mexico through Laredo, Tex., and up to New York - borne by unsuspecting FedEx deliverers.

Operation Omni Presence led to 11 indictments issued by the U.S. attorney's office in Manhattan, officials said yesterday.

The tombstones are just the latest way international drug traffickers sneak their wares into the country.

Colombian dope dealers were busted in February for the cruel scam of slicing open Labrador puppies to stash packets of liquid heroin inside their bodies, then stitching them back up.

Raids Broke Up 2 Cocaine Rings Of Wide Range, Authorities Say (NYT)

By Bruce Lambert

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

Two major drug-trafficking rings that smuggled huge amounts of cocaine from Mexico — some of it concealed in tombstones engraved with the image of the Virgin Mary — and shipped it to the East Coast were broken up yesterday in multiple raids by federal, state and local law enforcement agencies nationwide, the authorities said.

Police agencies said it was coincidental that two similar but unconnected investigations — both involving cocaine, Mexico and New York — culminated in simultaneous raids early yesterday morning. One case began with a tip on Long Island and led to Mexico; the other traced another network of traffickers based on Long Island, law enforcement officials said.

At least 15 people have been arrested, including a correction officer and a former teacher on Long Island, and millions of dollars in drugs and cash seized, as well as firearms, vehicles and residences.

Investigators said they found more than $4 million on Long Island, stashed in secret compartments in a football game table, a 55-gallon aquarium and the back of a sports car. They predicted that they would find more when they opened seven safe deposit boxes held in the names of the suspects.

The tombstones were tracked from Mexico to a warehouse in Brooklyn, where investigators found broken pieces of those that had already been opened. But some intact tombstones remained, and officers chipped away to find the cocaine bricks inside. That raid found 196 kilograms of cocaine with a retail value estimated at $8 million to $12 million, according to the federal Drug Enforcement Administration.

In the other case, the New York State Police commander on Long Island, Maj. Walter Heesch, said his officers found 210 kilograms of cocaine. He estimated its worth at $40 million.

Further arrests and seizures are expected in both cases, the authorities said.

In the tombstone case, officials described a large cocaine distribution system based in Monterrey, Mexico, that used ingenious methods to smuggle and transport thousands of kilos of cocaine across the United States. In a news release, the drug administration said it was able to "dismantle all levels of criminal activity, from the Mexican source of supply to the wholesale distributors and retail dealers in our local communities."

That investigation, which began about 18 months ago, originated with a tip from the Nassau County police on Long Island and later involved other law enforcement agencies as far flung as Florida, North Carolina and Texas. A dozen arrests have been made so far, 11 in New York and 1 in Houston. Some arrests and seizures were made earlier but not announced until the raids yesterday. The suspects have been indicted on charges including money laundering, drug possession and conspiracy.

The cocaine that ended up on Long Island also originated in Mexico, and was shipped to Los Angeles and east to Pennsylvania, New Jersey and New York, the authorities said.

WCBS-TV, March 30, 2006

(CBS) SUFFOLK COUNTY New York State Police announced a major bust of a multi-million dollar cocaine distribution network.

Their 3-month investigation into a high level narcotics trafficking network ended this morning with the arrests of Norman Goode, 38, of Holtsville, a Corrections Officer with the Suffolk County Sheriffs Dept.; Daniel Green, 39, of North Babylon, a school teacher and coach for the girls varsity basketball team in the North Babylon School District; and Billy Green, 43, of Wheatley Heights.

Police also want to speak with Roland Alburg, 36, of Holtsville in connection with this investigation.

Police executed eight search warrants throughout Suffolk County that resulted in the seizures of 210 kilograms of powder cocaine with an approximate street value of $40 million; approximately $5 million in cash; six handguns; three semi-automatic assault rifles; 3 ounces of crack cocaine; 1 lb. of marijuana; 10 vehicles and eight residences.

In December 2005, a New York State Police investigation in the Capital Region led State Police Narcotics Investigators on Long Island to an unknown individual who had only been identified as a Suffolk County resident believed to be a cocaine supplier.

Troop L Narcotics Enforcement Unit (NEU) members were requested to help identify the Long Island supplier who had just made a delivery of multiple kilograms of cocaine to several different targets in the Troy, NY, area, and was en route back to Long Island. At that time, the supplier was identified as Goode.

The DEA Long Island District Office, Suffolk County Police Department, the Suffolk County District Attorney's Office and the Nassau County Police assisted the New York State Police.

The investigation revealed that the subjects involved were attempting to negotiate the delivery of a significant quantity of cocaine from Mexico to the Philadelphia area, via Los Angeles, ultimately destined to the Suffolk County area.

COKE, CASH & BIG COLLAR (PHI)

By Kitty Caparella & David Gambacorta

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 31, 2006

AREPUTED DRUG kingpin who sells hip-hop clothing and music out of a South Street-area business has been arrested with seven others in four states in a major sting involving a 210-kilogram shipment of Mexican cocaine, $5 million in cash and 14 weapons.

The cocaine, headed for streets along the Eastern seaboard, was worth about $5 million wholesale and $40 million on the street, according to authorities.

The FBI, the DEA, the IRS, New York and Pennsylvania State Police, and Philadelphia police raided at least 15 locations in Pennsylvania, New York, New Jersey, Delaware and Maryland in the past two days in the ongoing federal drug investigation.

At roughly 7:30 p.m. Wednesday, armed agents in flak jackets hit the Teagle Co., on 3rd Street near South, owned by Omar Teagle, 33, a reputed Philadelphia drug kingpin, according to authorities.

Agents carried several boxes of documents and other materials from the company, which also houses Teagle and Turner Entertainment, Versatile Clothing and Versatile Music.

Teagle, a West Philadelphia native now living in Townsend, Del., is listed as president or an officer of each company, except for Versatile Music, according to corporate state records.

Teagle's attorney, David S. Nenner, said no drugs or guns had been found at Teagle's home or business.

Yesterday, Teagle and two other suspects, George Rodgers and Donnell Ball, appeared briefly for a federal hearing that was postponed until today while Assistant U.S. Attorney Curtis Douglas prepared their criminal complaints.

Teagle's mother and wife showed up for the hearing as did friends, including Jay Erving, son of 76ers legend Julius Erving. The younger Erving is an associate of Teagle's, according to sources close to the investigation.

Rodgers was arrested at his home, on Colorado Street near Carpenter, where sources said agents had seized 500 grams of crack cocaine, five guns and furniture that allegedly had secret compartments for stashing large amounts of cocaine.

Ball, 35, a fugitive since 2002, was arrested at his residence on Broad Street near Ridge Avenue. He is wanted by Camden County after jumping bail on a cocaine case and by the Pennsylvania Board of Probation and Parole for alleged violations in 2002.

Meanwhile in New Jersey, Ramon Alburg, an alleged member of the ring, was arrested at his home in Franklin Park, N.J., near New Brunswick. The Somerset, N.J., home of his brother Raoul, who allegedly transported the cocaine shipment, was raided by agents who said they had seized 155 kilograms of cocaine and $500,000. Raoul Alburg was later arrested in Crofton, Md.

New York authorities are looking for the Alburgs' brother, Roland, 36, of Holtsville, N.Y., who allegedly picked up 50 kilograms of cocaine in New Jersey and took it to New York.

New York State Police arrested Norman Cooke, 38, a Suffolk County corrections officer, after he allegedly delivered multiple kilos in the Troy, N.Y., area. Also arrested were Daniel Green, 39, of Babylon, N.Y., who teaches school and coaches girls basketball, and Billy Green, 43, of Wheatley Heights, N.Y.

New York authorities also seized six handguns and three semiautomatic rifles, three ounces of crack, a pound of marijuana, 10 vehicles and eight residences.

Federal hearings were scheduled for today in Philadelphia, Newark, N.J., and New York to charge the suspects formally with conspiracy to distribute cocaine.

According to an affidavit by FBI agent Brian C. Turner, Teagle was brokering shipments of cocaine and promised Ball some 75 kilograms from a shipment due after Christmas.

Ball told a confidential informant that he was unhappy with the way Teagle was "dictating" how much cocaine he would get, the affidavit stated.

In a meeting in New Jersey, Teagle asked Ramon Alburg for money, and Ramon told Teagle to go to his brother Raoul's house and get "eight," which meant $80,000, according to the affidavit.

Teagle told an informant that he wasn't worried about the price of the cocaine, he just wanted to get additional kilograms to the East Coast and was concerned about taking it back from California, the affidavit said.

When one transportation plan failed, Teagle and others came up with another to haul the cocaine back from California, according to the affidavit.

On March 22, the affidavit said, Raoul Alburg and two others, including an informant, began driving last Sunday to Los Angeles in a vehicle with a trailer attached. Inside the trailer was a black couch containing cocaine and two other pieces of furniture with hidden compartments.

The affidavit said Teagle had monitored the trio via phone calls - intercepted by authorities - as they traveled across the country.

On Tuesday, the trailer was dropped off at Ramon's home in Franklin Park, N.J., and Raoul Alburg called his brother to warn him that his Somerset, N.J., house was under surveillance, according to the affidavit.

Yesterday, Teagle's South Street neighbors described him as a disc jockey, clothing manufacturer and father who took his son and daughter, both under 10, shopping for clothes.

An employee at a nearby Reebok store said Teagle was known for DJing at clubs and promoting music.

"He comes in here at the start of every season and shops for his kids," said Raluca Anca, manager of Unica For Women & Kids, on South Street near 3rd.

Eddie Roman, manager of Dr. Denim, Inc., said last summer he purchased men's clothing from Teagle's company.

"His stuff sold well," Roman said. "The last time we spoke was probably the end of last summer. I think [the company] stopped production then."

Last night, the Teagle Co. headquarters was closed. Behind royal-blue double doors, on 3rd Street near South, was a lobby with a thick glass entrance that lists Versatile Clothing Co. on one door and Versatile Music on the other. Inside were tables and desks with scattered books and papers.

Broader Steroid Probe Possible (USAT)

By Hal Bodley

Barry Bonds begins his quest for home run immortality under a cloud Monday after Major League Baseball's decision to investigate the steroid lab linked to him and other prominent major leaguers.

Commissioner Bud Selig announced Thursday that former Senate majority leader George Mitchell will head an independent investigation into alleged steroid use by Bonds and other players associated with the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative (BALCO). Selig, however, emphasized that Mitchell has the authority to expand the scope of the probe if necessary.

“Nothing is more important to me than the integrity of the game of baseball,” said Selig, pressured to launch an investigation after the publication Game of Shadows, a book written by two San Francisco Chronicle reporters that details alleged steroid use by Bonds and others.

The book cites affidavits filed by government investigators, evidence seized from BALCO and memos detailing statements of BALCO founder Victor Conte and Bonds' trainer, Greg Anderson.

Bonds, who at 708 is six home runs shy of Babe Ruth for second on the all-time list, has denied knowingly using steroids. He refused to discuss the investigation before Thursday's exhibition game in San Francisco. “I said no, no, no,” when asked for comment by reporters. “I'm going to jump off the Empire State Building — flat on my face.”

Donald Fehr, executive director of the Major League Players Association, said he is waiting for more information.

“I don't know anything except for what was made publicly available,” Fehr said. “I don't know anything of how the details will process. We'll be getting information in due course and go from there. We have an obligation to our membership and will make sure there's due process all of the way through.”

The last time baseball undertook an investigation of this magnitude was in 1989, when John Dowd examined illegal gambling by Pete Rose, which led to the all-time hits leader being banned from the game.

Selig said the investigation will be limited to events since September 2002, when baseball and its union agreed to ban performance-enhancing drugs. He added all results of the probe will be made public.

"Should Sen. Mitchell uncover material suggesting that the scope of the investigation needs to be broader, he has my permission to expand it," Selig said.

The New York Yankees' Gary Sheffield and Jason Giambi are among the other players who have been linked to BALCO, whose founder, Conte, was released from prison Thursday after serving four months as a result of pleading guilty to steroid distribution.

"I'm not worried about it," said Giambi, who in December 2003 told a grand jury investigating BALCO he took steroids, according to the Chronicle. "I did the things that I needed to do. I just want to go forward."

Said Sheffield, who has denied knowingly using steroids, "I've said all I want to say about it."

Three Cocaine Smugglers To Learn Their Fate Today (VSU)

By Ian Mulgrew

Vancouver Sun, March 30, 2006

Four years ago, they were busted along with a score of others across B.C. and in Washington state.

Today three middle-aged men from the Fraser Valley and the Interior will rise before B.C. Supreme Court Judge Anne MacKenzie for sentencing as a result of their involvement in a large, international cocaine smuggling ring.

Their arrests in August 2001 were part of the culmination of an incredibly complex, law-enforcement initiative that spanned the continent and targeted organized crime.

The goal of a host of U.S. and Canadian law-enforcement agencies acting in concert was to disrupt a handful of independent, lucrative drug-trafficking organizations and the laundering of their substantial illicit profits.

At the time of the coordinated international raids, police confiscated large quantities of illicit substances, guns, money and property -- 250 kilograms of dried marijuana, 24,000 pot plants, 35 kilograms of cocaine, hashish, airplanes, vehicles, boats, furniture and recreational equipment.

The list is long.

Among the score of people charged on both sides of the border were David Oliynyk, then of Langley and 50 at the time; Joseph Lepage, 43, of Kelowna, and Lloyd Ferris, 54, of Abbotsford.

Their sentencing, set for today and tomorrow in New Westminster, is the penultimate chapter in the lengthy legal saga that followed those startling arrests and staggering seizures.

Their fate should be the final scene of what has proven to be a remarkable tale about, and a unique window on, the underground economy of illicit drugs.

Elaborate web spun

All of these individuals were caught in the elaborate web spun by the RCMP and its U.S. allies in a multi-faceted, joint, cross-border investigation called Operation Exacto-Two.

That case was really a thicket of investigations with a common root, Operation Exacto, set up to solve the contract killing in the summer of 1996 of a Lower Mainland marijuana grower and the disappearance of his live-in partner.

During the investigation of that murder, police focused on a man named Stephen Cox (who was later charged, tried and acquitted of the slaying) and his close associate Gerard Morin, a 43-year-old with convictions as a weapons dealer.

Both were considered by detectives to be active in a sprawling criminal organization police dubbed "the company" and both were friendly with a host of recognizable crooks and Hells Angels.

The Angels say they are being defamed and have no connection to any of this criminal activity.

Nevertheless, as police followed these two goombahs, they opened files on the people they met and learned of a tremendous amount of daily drug trafficking.

EAVESDROPPED ON DOZENS

The RCMP, the FBI, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, border security forces and other law-enforcement agencies would ultimately begin surveillance and wiretaps on dozens and dozens of individuals.

Soon, they would be chasing people involved in supplying most of the marijuana consumed in Atlantic Canada, other individuals involved in shipping hundreds of kilograms of pot at a time to the U.S. and, of course, another parcel of people involved in importing massive amounts of cocaine from Mexico through the U.S. and into Canada.

What was frustrating for investigators is, instead of finding one giant Mob-like criminal organization, the Mounties and the Americans discovered the illicit drug trade was so large it had spawned numerous independent groups, all thriving in their own niche markets.

There were independent growers selling to independent brokers in Canada who were dealing with independent brokers in the U.S. -- each of whom had his own little network.

Each was a separate business and the relationship between any two or more of the groups was happenstance, dependent upon need and personal relationships.

Occasionally there were people from each group that knew others in another group -- and the groups where that was the case appeared to often assist each other in times of need. Supply and demand ruled.

The degree of culpability and the involvement in the criminal underworld of each of those arrested four years ago has varied widely.

The sentences that will be handed down in this particular case are likely to be among the heaviest.

Oliynyk was no stranger to law enforcement on both sides of the border.

In December 1989, as treasurer of the White Rock chapter of the Hells Angels, he was arrested trying to buy more than 13.5 kilograms of cocaine from U.S. undercover agents.

The Angels say Oliynyk resigned from the club after he was released from prison.

But his long association with Morin -- dating back to the mid-1990s and the original murder of the pot grower -- set off bells for detectives.

The RCMP in their applications for warrants in these inter-connected cases placed considerable stress on this tie, according to the evidence, because Oliynyk had been previously identified as having a "hard-on" -- which apparently meant hatred -- for the dead man.

After fighting for four years and forcing the legal system to prepare for and go to the expense of setting up a bilingual trial, Oliynyk and his co-accused threw in the towel last November after losing a series of legal challenges that included motions to prevent a mountain of surveillance and wiretap evidence from being admitted at trial

They were pronounced guilty Nov. 9 by Justice MacKenzie and sentencing was put over until today.

By comparison, some of those netted in Operation Exacto-Two were neophytes and veritable innocents in the nether world of guns, gangs and big-profit, organized crime.

Some of the potheads rounded up in these raids, for example, seem quite out of place amid some of the others involved.

I have some empathy with their plea they are misportrayed as organized hoodlums when they were agriculturalists growing what some consider a harmless herb.

Some of their customers, however, proved to be very heavy -- people known to have an affinity for automatic weapons and handguns loaded with illegal ammunition capable of piercing police body armour.

Let's not forget, everyone involved knew or should have known that in this subterranean world, those who were ripped off or those who were unable to collect what they were owed, were precluded from going to the police and courts.

Everyone was well aware of the risks -- especially the three men who are up for sentencing today -- and the potential profits.

Taxpayers, though, need to consider the results and the reasons for this raft of prosecutions.

I think the crime involved in these expensive and resource-draining proceedings is a direct result of the current criminal drug laws.

DRUG LAWS SPAWN CROOKS

I believe none of these smuggling groups would have a reason to exist if marijuana and cocaine were regulated and controlled in a different manner, stripping them of their value as illicit substances.

That's one of the reasons I think it's time to change our laws -- to staunch the flow of huge profits into the pockets of organized crime and to put an end to this black market, with its attendant violence.

Putting in jail the individuals pinched in Operation Exacto-Two may disrupt or end their criminal careers, but it did little to reduce the flood of marijuana into the U.S. or cocaine into Canada.

The line-up of individuals ready to take their place in such a lucrative business is long, long, long.

Imprisoning Al Capone did nothing to stem the organized crime associated with bootlegging, the concomitant violence or the corrosive social fallout of alcohol Prohibition.

The distribution gangs and the smugglers in Canada that made millions off the U.S. appetite for booze were only eliminated by the end of prohibition.

The way we will get rid of the criminal organizations profiting from the American chemical thirst and the attendant violence, in my view, is by similarly ending the drug prohibition.

Former Malden Cop's Federal Trial Continues (MAO)

By Matthew Keough

Malden (MA) Observer, March 31, 2006

Jurors in Boston's U.S. District Court are working their way through a wealth of witnesses and audio evidence to determine whether former Malden drug detective David Jordan did his best to single-handedly prevent a drug deal, or if he participated in a staged raid and used the cover of his officer's uniform to steal cocaine.

Jordan, 45, is being charged with conspiring to sell cocaine, cocaine possession, using a gun in the commission of a drug offense, witness intimidation and giving false information to Drug Enforcement Administration agents.

Jordan, a third-generation Malden police officer, was the department's lead narcotics investigator on Dec. 24, 2003 when court documents say Jordan conspired alongside Anthony Bucci, 43, and Francis Muolo, 39, to steal 3 kilograms of cocaine valued at more than $80,000 from a scheduled drug deal.

Bucci is also on trial alongside Jordan.

For the past two weeks jurors have been heard witness testimony, and will soon be faced with two of Jordan's alleged cohorts, Carlos Ruiz and Jon Minotti, who have already pledged to testify against Jordan in exchange for reduced sentences.

It is alleged that Minotti, who was Jordan's police informant at the time, arranged for drug supplier Carlos Ruiz to bring 3 kilograms of cocaine to a meeting at a Malden Medical Center parking lot where Bucci was to purchase the drugs.

The government alleges that Jordan agreed, for a $30,000 kickback, to interrupt the drug deal that was scheduled to go down between Ruiz and Bucci. It is alleged that as the drug deal was about to take place Jordan stopped both men at gunpoint while Minotti escaped through the woods with the cocaine to Muolo's waiting car.

Records show that Jordan ran Ruiz's name through department records before he let the two men go due to a lack of evidence.

For much of last week, lawyers played excerpts from taped phone conversations between Jordan and Drug Enforcement Agent Jean Drouin, who had been trailing Minotti at the time of the drug deal. Drouin testified that he immediately became suspicious of Jordan's role and began taping conversations shortly after the incident.

In one of the tapes, Jordan, whom the government alleges was trying to corrupt a DEA investigation, can be heard saying to Drouin "I hope I didn't f--- up anything you guys were doing."

But Tom Dreschler, Jordan's attorney, maintains the officer was merely trying to take down a drug deal when he became the pawn in a set-up by his own informant.

If convicted, Jordan faces a mandatory minimum of 5 years' imprisonment and a maximum of 40 years' imprisonment on both the conspiracy to distribute 3 kilograms of cocaine count and the distribution of three kilograms of cocaine count. Jordan could also serve 5 years to life for carrying a firearm during and in relation to a drug trafficking crime as well as a maximum sentence of 10 years in prison on the witness tampering charge and 5 years in prison on each of the three false statement charges.

Muolo has pleaded guilty to charges of conspiracy to distribute three kilograms of cocaine.

Jordan, along with Bucci and Muolo, was arrested on May 20, 2004. Jordan has been free pending his trial since June 22 of that year. Jordan is related to Police Commissioner Anthony Spadafora by marriage.

Rearrested Suspect Held Without Bond (AP)

AP, March 30, 2006

NEW ORLEANS Brian Expose, who was arrested last week with a cache of drugs and weapons, then set free without bond by New Orleans judge, will remain in federal detention pending trial on drug-dealing charges.At a detention hearing, federal prosecutors urged Magistrate Judge Louis Moore Junior to lift any bond options for Expose, saying he is a flight risk and poses a danger to the community. Moore agreed, ordering Expose's immediate detention at the conclusion of the hearing.In making his ruling, U-S Attorney Jim Letten said Moore cited Expose's prior conviction for possession of cocaine, his arrest history and his failure to appear for prior state court proceedings.Expose was arrested March 21st by New Orleans police and Drug Enforcement Administration agents, after an investigation and surveillance of his home produced evidence he was selling drugs. The investigation yielded investigators 189-thousand dollars in cash, six ounces of cocaine and an assortment of high-powered assault rifles, ammunition and multiple handguns.Within hours of Expose's arrest, state Judge Charles Elloie released him on a controversial recognizance bond, igniting a week-long firestorm over the judge's decision.In an attempt to get Expose back behind bars, federal authorities stepped in and charged him with conspiracy to sell crack cocaine. He was arrested again Friday.

Five Sold Weapons, Indictment Charges (APP)

County residents tried to sell grenade, officials say

Five Monmouth County residents, including a former corrections officer, were indicted Tuesday on charges of selling a dozen guns and a bullet-proof vest — and trying to sell a live hand grenade — to a government witness, authorities said.

Facing federal weapons charges are John Velba, 47, William Schreiber, 28, and Cheryl Britton, 29, all of Marlboro; Harold Smith, 23, of Wall; and Kevin Benn, 48, of Howell, a former New Jersey corrections officer at East Jersey State Prison.

Each is charged with one count of conspiracy and one count of engaging in the business of dealing in firearms without a federal license to do so. Velba, the lead defendant, is also charged with being a convicted felon in possession of a weapon.

FBI agents arrested all five people on Nov. 1, U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie said in a prepared statement Tuesday.

"On that day, Britton and Schreiber were allegedly trying to complete the pre-arranged sale to the cooperating witness of six of the weapons at Shurguard Storage public storage lockers in Marlboro, where the co-conspirators allegedly kept some of the guns," Christie said.

Velba and Schreiber are being held without bail pending the outcome of their cases. Benn is free on a $250,000 bond by real estate. Smith and Britton are each free on $100,000 bonds, Christie said.

Velba allegedly initiated the sales of the weapons in late May 2005, when he asked the cooperating witness if he would be interested in purchasing weapons, according to two original criminal complaints.

Over the next several months, Velba and his co-conspirators sold 12 weapons, including assault-style weapons, shotguns and handguns, for about $10,000 to the cooperating witness, according to the indictment and complaints.

The final sale was to occur on Nov. 1, 2005, either at the storage place or the defendants' homes.

The hand grenade was planned to be part of the final sale but was not produced at that time, Christie said. The grenade was subsequently recovered and safely detonated by FBI agents.

On June 28, 2005, Smith allegedly sold the witness two Colt handguns, a Stevens 20-gauge shotgun and the bulletproof vest for $1,400, Christie said. On July 14, 2005, Velba and Smith allegedly sold the witness a Remington 12-gauge shotgun, a Marlin .22-caliber rifle and a bolt-action rifle for $1,200.

Gun Shows Caught In Heated Crossfire (KRT)

It's just another weekend at a Kansas City gun show, where there is so much firepower at your fingertips that even some gun enthusiasts shake their heads in wonder.

But the shows - which gained popularity in the 1990s and now number in the thousands nationwide - are coming under increasing fire as critics claim they are contributing to the incidence of violent crime.

"Gun shows are one of our main problems," said Kansas City Mayor Pro Tem Alvin Brooks. "These are the guns that end up on the streets of America."

Brooks recalled several teens who were shot last year in retaliation for robbing a drug dealer at gunpoint.

"One got killed, one lost a leg, and one was paralyzed," Brooks said. "This one fellow who I talked to (at the hospital) said they had bought those guns at gun shows. He said all you have to do is be 18 years old, and sometimes they don't ask you anything if you've got cash."

Critics contend that the biggest problem is a legal loophole that allows criminals and others who are prohibited from buying a firearm to obtain guns from unlicensed sellers at guns shows. In most states, including Missouri and Kansas, no background checks are required to buy long guns - including assault rifles - from sellers who do not have a federal firearms license.

Gun-rights advocates maintain, however, that there is no "gun show loophole."

"If anyone is involved in the trade of selling and buying firearms, they have to obtain a federal firearms license," said Andrew Arulanandam, director of public affairs for the National Rifle Association. "That is the law of the land today, so to say that there's a loophole is disingenuous."

While Arulanandam acknowledged that unlicensed sellers do not have to conduct background checks, he said they were in the "distinct minority."

"I think the average person would be in awe at what's all legal now," said Maj. Anthony Ell, commander of the Kansas City Police Department's violent crimes division. "Individuals who may not be able to get them legally through proper licensed dealers, that gun show loophole allows them to bypass all of that and get guns."

But Paul Marquardt, a spokesman for the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives in Kansas City, said the agency is more concerned about "the people who illegally sell firearms to criminals" such as felons, illegal aliens or drug traffickers.

"The ATF does not target gun shows, we target criminals who are trying to acquire firearms from any source whether it's in a back alley or anywhere else," Marquardt said.

Gun sellers interviewed by The Kansas City Star said that despite the presence of law enforcement authorities, illegal sales and gun thefts occur at area shows. A reporter observed one questionable firearm transaction at a recent show. And a vendor said someone had stolen handguns from him and another vendor.

What's more, the leader of a white supremacist gang of bank robbers told The Star that he and his partners found that gun shows in Missouri and Kansas were a quick way to buy and dump weapons used in their crimes.

"It was incredibly easy," said Peter Langan, who in the 1990s was the head of the Aryan Republican Army, a group that prosecutors say was responsible for 22 bank robberies in the Midwest. "Gun shows, just for the sheer volume and selection, you just couldn't beat 'em," Langan said in a telephone interview from prison, where he is serving a life sentence.

One of Langan's convicted associates, Kevin McCarthy, told the FBI after he was arrested that he had used one of those guns in a 1994 bank heist in Missouri. "McCarthy utilized a 9mm Ruger Pistol, Model PT-89," an FBI special agent wrote in an investigative summary obtained by The Star. "McCarthy had previously purchased this pistol at a gun show in Kansas City, Mo."

Brooks said the teen wounded in last year's shootout told him that his friends often would go to shows to buy and resell guns. They preferred lethal-looking weapons similar to the TEC-DC9 with a 30-round clip that police took off a young man at the St. Patrick's Day parade.

"The AR-15, the TEC-9 and the AK-47 are what they're getting," Brooks said.

When Congress passed the Brady Bill in 1993, it put in place what some consider a double standard for the purchase of guns. Licensed dealers have to conduct background checks on buyers while unlicensed sellers - private individuals and collectors - do not.

Critics say that means criminals and others who are prohibited from buying a firearm can skirt the law and get guns from unlicensed sellers at gun shows.

For years, gun-safety advocates have called for federal legislation to close what they contend is a gun show loophole. But the gun lobby has argued that would shut down gun shows, and the legislation has stalled.

Eighteen states, however, have passed laws that either require background checks before the purchase of any firearms at gun shows or require buyers to first obtain a permit. Missouri, for example, requires a permit for all handgun purchases, although long guns and assault rifles do not require one.

But the remaining states - including Kansas - still allow buyers to purchase firearms from unlicensed sellers at gun shows without obtaining a permit or undergoing a criminal background check.

Gun-rights advocates contend that most people who sell guns at gun shows are licensed dealers, not private sellers, so it is not that big a problem.

"There are only a few people who buy tables to dispose of private collections," said Kevin Jamison, a Gladstone lawyer and member of the Western Missouri Shooters Alliance. "That's been rare, and it's getting more and more unusual."

But the ATF estimates that up to one-fourth of the gun sellers at shows are unlicensed. And authorities argue that criminals and illegal gun traffickers are wise to that, although they're also getting firearms from licensed dealers.

Last month, an ATF official testified before a congressional subcommittee that more than 400 firearms purchased at gun shows in the Richmond, Va., area between 2002 and 2005 were later used in crimes. Checks of 302 people who had purchased guns from licensed dealers at those shows in a 15-month period revealed that 47 had provided false addresses.

An earlier report on illegal weapons by the ATF found that gun shows were the second-leading source of illegal firearms recovered in gun-trafficking investigations. In some cases, known or suspected terrorists bought guns at shows.

A known member of Hezbollah, for example, was convicted in 2001 in a federal court in Michigan for trying to smuggle guns into Lebanon. An undercover agent saw the man buy a weapon at a gun show without a background check.

Gun-rights advocates insist the shows are not a major source of weapons used in crimes. The NRA cites a 2001 Bureau of Justice Statistics report that said fewer than 1 percent of guns used in crimes came from gun shows.

"The biggest source of crime firearms is the black market," Arulanandam said. "Law enforcement always refers to criminals looking for a clean gun. What they're referring to is they want to find a firearm that's not traceable. And every time you go through a retail outlet or any FFL (federal firearms licensed dealer), you have a long paper trail."

Each year, more than 5,000 gun shows are held nationwide, according to the ATF. The National Association of Arms Shows says that an average of 2,500 to 3,000 people attend a typical show, purchasing between 100,000 and 300,000 guns annually.

"On any given weekend, there's a gun show going on someplace," Jamison said. "In the greater Kansas City area, there's probably one to two gun shows in any given month."

At a March 12 gun show at the 3 Trails Expo Center next to Bannister Mall, tables were teeming with handguns, assault rifles, knives and war memorabilia.

Several vendors were selling books and pamphlets such as "How to Make Disposable Silencers" and "Homemade Grenade Launchers." A few publications described how to convert semiautomatic weapons into machine guns - which is illegal under federal law.

But overall, the show appeared to be taking steps to assure the safe handling of weapons, and there was visible security.

Signs at the entrance warned, "No Loaded Guns Inside." Two off-duty Jackson County sheriff's deputies checked guns brought into the building. Other deputies strolled the aisles of the show, which organizer Waylon Pearson of R.K. Shows in Manchester, Iowa, said drew 4,000 people.

Lee Morlang's table included a Rock River AR-15 assault rifle for $850. Morlang said he was selling his private collection and therefore did not need a license. He estimated that 10 to 12 other vendors were unlicensed sellers who were not required to conduct background checks.

Morlang said he did not need any background check to tell him who should and should not be buying a gun. "I can read people like a book," he said. "If we get a bad person in here, we get rid of 'em."

Others at the show keep an eye out as well, he said. "There was a guard here yesterday, he saw two guys here that had been in prison. The minute they saw him, they hit the door."

But apparently that does not prevent all crime at the shows. Morlang said someone recently stole a .44-caliber handgun from him as he was loading weapons after a show. The same thing happened to another vendor, he said.

As he spoke, Morlang watched two men near his booth. One handed the other a wad of cash, who then gave the man a handgun - a possible violation of the law which requires handgun purchasers to first obtain a permit.

"See right there?" Morlang asked. "There's a transaction going on right in front of us of an unregistered gun." He shook his head, adding, "it's that kind of stuff that gives these shows a bad name."

Dean Parr, owner of Dean's Gun Shop in St. Joseph, Mo., said he and other licensed dealers have to abide by the same laws at gun shows as they do at their stores.

"If they buy a gun off an individual at a gun show, they don't have to do the paperwork," Parr conceded. "But they could do the same thing at a truck stop or somewhere else, too."

"If they are, it's a very small percentage," he said. "But if there was anything they could do to monitor these shows better, it would be to have someone out in the parking lot to keep people from buying and selling guns out there."

The Jan. 15 gun show at the KCI Expo Center, sponsored by the Missouri Valley Arms Collectors Association, also enjoyed a huge turnout and appeared to be well run. Although that show offered fewer handguns than the March show, there were plenty of assault weapons.

The ATF had two representatives available to answer questions and several off-duty Kansas City police officers walked the aisles. Nearby, one vendor was selling what was purported to be armor-piercing ammunition, also known as "cop killer" bullets.

"I don't see how that can be legal," one man remarked to a friend as he pointed toward a Bushmaster assault rifle - the kind of weapon used in the 2002 sniper spree that left 10 people dead in Washington, D.C., Maryland and Virginia.

Under current law, it is legal.

Eighteen months ago, Congress did not reauthorize the part of the Brady Law that banned the manufacture and sale of 19 kinds of military-style assault weapons. Now that the weapons are back on the market, authorities say they are trying to get tougher on weapons violations.

In fact, the U.S. attorney's office in Kansas City is among the top in the nation for the number of federal gun law prosecutions.

But gun-safety advocates point out those prosecutions, which they applaud, are mostly for felons possessing firearms or committing a felony with one - not for violators who buy and sell firearms illegally.

In 2003, only 532 of the more than 126,000 people nationwide who lied on a background check were prosecuted, according to a study by the Americans for Gun Safety Foundation. And just 234 cases were filed for possessing or selling stolen firearms, even though 40,000 stolen guns were recovered and returned to their owners.

Still, some gun-rights advocates complain that federal law enforcement agencies are too aggressive. Last month, they convinced a congressional subcommittee to hold hearings on the way the ATF investigated gun shows in Richmond, Va.

Gun show organizers charged that the ATF and local law enforcement scared off potential customers and racially profiled buyers. A top ATF official acknowledged that agents made some mistakes but denied any profiling and defended their tactics.

The ATF's Michael Bouchard told lawmakers that the agency polices only about 100 of the 5,000 gun shows annually. He said the agency focused on the Richmond-area shows after discovering that hundreds of firearms purchased at the shows in a three-year period were used in crimes.

During the investigation, Bouchard said agents witnessed a "straw purchase" - where a buyer allowed to own a gun turns around and sells it to someone who is not - that led them to a street gang whose leader was involved in a murder committed with an AK-47.

Authorities said that weapon also was acquired through a straw purchase at another gun show.

IMMIGRATION:

Bush, Harper Fox Discuss Trade Issues (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, March 30, 2006

President Bush and the leaders of Canada and Mexico worked to iron out disagreements over trade and border security Thursday and to keep a North American economic edge against competition from rising powers like China.

The three leaders, dressed casually in open-collared shirts, strolled together among the ancient Mayan ruins at Chichen Itza before sitting down for more intense one-on-one meetings at a beachfront resort hotel. Mexican President Vicente Fox planned a lavish dinner for his guests.

The trilateral meeting was expected to be Fox's last since he is set to leave office this year because of term limits. Bush lauded Fox for stabilizing the Mexican economy and improving the net worth of his people.

"That's important for the American economy as well," Bush said. "The more net worth there is in Mexico, the more likely it is the Mexican may be wanting to buy a U.S. product. And vice versa, by the way."

Bush and Fox suggested one item at the top of their agenda is now out of their hands. The U.S. Senate is debating changes to U.S. immigration laws that could affect an estimated 6 million Mexicans living illegally in the United States.

"I told the president there is a legislative process that's going forward," Bush told reporters at the end of their private meeting. "And it may look cumbersome to some, but that's how our democracy works."

Bush added, "I'm optimistic that we can get a bill done."

He is pushing for a guest worker program that would let foreigners stay temporarily in low-paying jobs, which Fox says is a good first step toward some form of legal status for all illegal Mexicans.

"The matter is in the Congress of the United States and that is where the decision will be made," Fox said. "It is no longer between President Bush and President Fox."

After spending the morning sightseeing, Bush had a few hours off before the formal meetings began and he used part of the time to work up a sweat in his hotel's gym.

There was tight security alongside the fun-loving atmosphere generated by college students who have flocked to Cancun for spring break. Gunboats patrolled the turquoise waters off Bush's spa resort, and fencing kept out all but hotel guests. "I'd like to make sure you work more than you play," Bush joked to reporters.

The immigration debate is receiving a lot of attention at the summit, where the official focus is a year-old pact designed to make borders more secure without hampering business and traffic. Signed a year ago near Bush's ranch in Texas, the Security and Prosperity Partnership aims to better protect the three countries from outside attack and ensure their global competitiveness with China and other trade powerhouses.

Bush told Canadian Television earlier this week that he worries people in all three countries could have a "protectionist tendency" that would make it more difficult for them to reap the benefits of mutual collaboration. "Frankly, it will make it a lot harder for future Americans and Canadians and Mexicans to compete with the Chinese, for example," he said.

Even though China has a rapidly growing economy, Canada and Mexico remain the top two trading partners of the United States. All three leaders are under pressure to resolve problems related to the enormous flow of goods and people between their countries. The economic concerns have replaced the diplomatic differences that defined the relationship in Bush's first term.

Both Canada and Mexico refused to support the war against Iraq, and that disagreement strained historically close ties.

This week's summit marked a new phase in Bush's ever-changing relationship with the nations. It was his first official visit with conservative Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper since Harper took office two months ago after promising to improve relations with the U.S. And it reflected the closing stages of his relationship with Fox, who will leave office this year after building a personal bond with the American president that extends back to Bush's time as governor of Texas. A more liberal candidate is leading in the campaign to replace Fox.

Topping Harper's agenda is a long stalemate over U.S. tariffs on Canadian softwood lumber imports. Bush said in a pre-trip interview that resolving the dispute will require "very quiet consultations."

Harper also wanted to address Washington's intention to require passports or other forms of secure identification to enter the United States by 2008. Business groups fear the proposal will severely impede tourism and commerce between the world's largest trading bloc, which conducts some $1.5 billion in business daily.

Bush Says 'guest Worker' Proposal Up To Congress (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, March 31, 2006

CANCUN, Mexico — President Bush told Mexican counterpart Vicente Fox on Thursday he supports a temporary "guest worker" program, but said the final decision belongs to Congress — where many of Bush's fellow Republicans oppose the idea.

"I told (Fox) there is a legislative process that's going forward," Bush said.

Conservatives in Washington criticized a guest-worker program as tantamount to amnesty for illegal immigrants.

"I don't think he's concerned about alienating voters — he's not running for re-election," Rep. Tom Tancredo, R-Colo., said of Bush. Tancredo said Republicans could lose Congress over the immigration issue. "I wish he'd think about the party, and of course, I also wish he'd think about the country."

Bush said he is seeking a "comprehensive" immigration package that includes border security. Fox, echoing Bush, said border security is a "shared" responsibility. He said Mexico would address issues such as its own economic development and the smuggling of immigrants into the USA.

The two presidents and Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper were at this resort on the Gulf of Mexico for a two-day summit.

Their meetings took place as a rift widened between Bush and many of his fellow conservative Republicans over the immigration issue. Referring to a Senate bill that tracks Bush's position on guest workers, Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif., said Americans should be able to "smell the foul odor that's coming out of the U.S. Senate." Asked whether the same odor was emanating from the president, he said, "I have no comment."

It's not the first time Bush has been at odds with much of his own party over immigration.

Going back to his days as Texas governor, Bush has resisted calls to seal the border. Bush argued that people will cross the Rio Grande from Mexico to provide for their families, and he has often praised immigrants' contributions.

"We are a nation of law, but that doesn't preclude us from being a welcoming nation," Bush said before his visit to Cancun.

The lines are hardening in Congress. A bill from the GOP-run House stresses tough enforcement of laws against illegal immigration, with no expansion of provisions allowing Mexicans and others to enter the USA as temporary guest workers, which Bush favors.

The Senate Judiciary Committee included guest-worker provisions and the possibility of citizenship for illegal immigrants in a bill it passed this week by a 12-6 vote — thanks to Democrats. The six opponents were all Republicans.

Those who have followed Bush's career attribute his immigration views to two factors: his Texas roots and the growth of the Hispanic voter population.

"He hasn't been at odds with a lot of Texans on immigration," says Rich Galen, a Republican political strategist who has worked in Texas.

Bruce Buchanan, a presidential expert at the University of Texas, says immigrants there "have a reputation as hard workers who are good for the economy." He says Bush and his close political adviser Karl Rove have cited the growing Hispanic vote as essential to the future of the Republican Party.

"It's hard to weigh the two" factors, Buchanan says, "but they've both played into the calculation."

Bush first ran for governor in 1994, the same year California conservatives helped pass Proposition 187 to deny social services to illegal immigrants. The courts blocked the proposition, but Hispanic voters shifted decidedly to Democrats. That did not go unnoticed in Texas.

Bush "saw what happened," Galen says.

Dan Stein, president of the Federation for American Immigration Reform (FAIR), accuses business leaders — and Bush — of favoring illegal immigration because it keeps wages low. He says the president is "oblivious" to the concerns of ordinary Americans. "He has by every standard encouraged massive illegal immigration," Stein says.

Republican pollster Ed Goeas, however, says his research shows that while Americans of all ideologies want to better protect the border, they are more sympathetic to immigrants willing to work for their families. Critics such as Stein "are very vocal," Goeas says, "but they are not very representative of the conservatives across the board."

Bush said in Washington this week that "a mother or a father who's worried about putting food on the table" is willing to take risks for their family. "I used to tell this to people down there in Texas," Bush said. "Family values don't stop at the Rio Grande River."

Bush Reassures Mexico Leader Of His Backing For Immigrants (NYT)

By Ginger Thompson And David E. Sanger

CANCÚN, Mexico, March 30 — President Bush, in an effort to reassure Mexicans and to defuse an intense debate in the United States, told President Vicente Fox of Mexico on Thursday that he supported proposals to legalize undocumented workers as long as they were not given any advantages over immigrants who entered the United States legally.

"I explained to the president my vision of the citizenship issue," Mr. Bush said, as Mr. Fox sat next to him during their summit meeting here. "If they want to become a citizen, they can get in line, but not the head of the line."

In another comment aimed at critics within his Republican Party, Mr. Bush also talked about his support for guest-worker programs as part of an effort to open safe, legal and orderly channels for migrant workers into the United States. Opponents of the plans say they amount to opening floodgates to hundreds of thousands of workers who will cross the border from Mexico each year.

Mr. Bush said he told had Mr. Fox that he was committed to signing a "comprehensive immigration bill."

"And by 'comprehensive,' I mean not only a bill that has border security in it," Mr. Bush said, "but a bill that has a worker permit program in it. That's an important part of having a border that works.

"We don't want people sneaking into our country that are going to do jobs Americans won't do. We want them coming in in an orderly way, which will take pressure off of both our borders."

Changes in immigration law have been more fiercely debated in Congress since Monday, when the Senate Judiciary Committee approved a bill that would provide legal status to an estimated 11 million illegal immigrants and allow 400,000 foreigners a year to enter the United States as guest workers. The proposals have bitterly divided the Republican Party between those who see immigrant labor as a pillar of the American economy, and those who view it as a burden, even a threat.

The issue has dominated talks between Mr. Bush and Mr. Fox for most of their presidencies. Though the content of Thursday's talks was no different, the ambitions of the two leaders — with Mr. Bush burdened by the lowest approval ratings of his presidency, and Mr. Fox deep into his final term — was sharply diminished.

Five years ago, a newly elected Mr. Fox, buoyed by his standing as the man who peacefully ended seven decades of authoritarian rule, stood on the White House lawn and challenged the United States to work with his government on proposals that would open the border to a freer flow of workers from Mexico.

On Thursday, speaking to reporters, Mr. Fox acknowledged that the fate of immigration law was out of his and President Bush's hands.

"It is not here, in these meetings, where a migration agreement is made," he said. "It is now an issue for the Congress of the United States, and there, they will make the decision. It is no longer between President Bush and President Fox."

Mr. Fox addressed American critics who have accused Mexico of encouraging its people to migrate illegally. Mexico's economy depends heavily on the estimated $16 billion that the migrants send home annually.

Mr. Fox said that if Congress reorganized immigration, "Mexico assumes its responsibilities to work with passion, with commitment, diligently, to develop opportunities for our people."

Earlier in the day, Mr. Bush visited the 1,500-year-old Mayan ruins at Chichén Itzá, a rare moment of tourism for a president who usually has little patience for sightseeing. White House officials added the stop as a show of respect for Mexico's heritage.

Back in Cancún, Mr. Bush's motorcade sped past the ruined carcasses of hotels wiped out last year in Hurricane Wilma. He stayed at a small, luxurious resort protected by Navy vessels that bobbed offshore.

Mr. Bush also met separately with Prime Minister Stephen Harper of Canada to discuss a long-running dispute over American imports of softwood lumber, which has grown more bitter as industries on both sides of the border have sought rulings in different international settings, starting in the Clinton administration.

Mr. Bush said of Mr. Harper, "I appreciate his steely resolve to get something done." But he gave no indication of any change in American policy.

Bush Pushes Congress To OK Immigrants (AP-Y2)

By Nedra Pickler

AP2, March 31, 2006

With Mexican President Vicente Fox at his side, President Bush gave Congress a long-distance push Thursday to open the United States to immigrant workers who have been sneaking across the borders to fill low-paying jobs.

"We don't want people sneaking into our country that are going to do jobs that Americans won't do," Bush said at the end of a private meeting with Fox, where the issue was on top of the agenda. "We want them coming in in an orderly way, which will take pressure off both our borders."

The meeting between the Mexican and U.S. leaders came on the first day of a two-day North American summit that also includes Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper. Harper, meeting with Bush for the first time since taking office two months ago with the promise of building stronger ties with Washington, said the two countries are moving past their "tension" over Iraq.

Still, he took a combative stance on their long-standing dispute over U.S. tariffs on Canadian softwood lumber, saying Canada would "pursue all its legal options" if he and Bush can't work out an agreement.

But it was the immigration debate, which has dominated the U.S. Senate this week, that took center stage in talks conducted in a beachfront resort surrounded by bikini-clad spring breakers. A new immigration law could affect as many as 6 million Mexicans living illegally in the United States — about half of all those who are estimated to have sneaked in from other countries seeking new opportunities they can't find at home.

Bush is pushing for a guest worker program that would let foreigners in low-paying jobs stay temporarily, which Fox says is a good first step toward some form of legal status for all Mexican illegal immigrants.

The issue has united the two leaders, whose friendship dates back to Bush's time as Texas governor but was strained over Fox's objections to the war in Iraq. But immigration has divided Bush's Republican party, with business interests who want cheap labor battling conservatives who want a get-tough policy against illegal immigrants.

"The matter is in the Congress of the United States and that is where the decision will be made," Fox said. "It is no longer between President Bush and President Fox."

But both leaders were clearly trying to sway the debate.

"I told the president there is a legislative process that's going forward," Bush said. "And that it may look cumbersome to some, but that's how our democracy works."

Bush added, "I'm optimistic that we can get a bill done."

The summit included plenty of time to be neighborly. The three leaders dressed casually in open-collared shirts and strolled together among the ancient Mayan ruins at Chichen Itza before sitting down for more intense one-on-one meetings. Fox laid on a lavish dinner for his guests.

After spending the morning sightseeing, Bush had a few hours off before the formal meetings began. He used part of the time to work up a sweat in his hotel's gym.

There was tight security despite the fun-loving atmosphere generated by college students who have flocked to Cancun for spring break. Gunboats patrolled the turquoise waters off Bush's spa resort, and fencing kept out all but hotel guests. "I'd like to make sure you work more than you play," Bush joked to reporters.

The trilateral meeting was expected to be Fox's last, since he is set to leave office this year because of term limits. Bush lauded Fox for stabilizing the Mexican economy and improving the net worth of his people.

"That's important for the American economy as well," Bush said. "The more net worth there is in Mexico, the more likely it is the Mexican may be wanting to buy a U.S. product. And vice versa, by the way."

In his meeting with Harper, Bush sought to make the newly elected leader look good at home, making it a point to stress how hard the Canadian leader had pressed him on the softwood lumber issue. Harper "made an emphatic case," Bush said.

"I appreciate his steely resolve to get something done," the president said. "I appreciate your pushing."

But Bush didn't give Harper much of substance, saying only that "my intent is to negotiate in good faith and a timely fashion to resolve this issue."

Fox Pledges More Border Control (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, March 31, 2006

CANCUN, Mexico -- Mexican President Vicente Fox yesterday promised President Bush that his country will do more to control the U.S.-Mexico border and will strengthen its own southern border to reduce the number of aliens crossing into Mexico to reach the United States.

"It is a shared, shared responsibility," Mr. Fox said at the end of a meeting with Mr. Bush at this Mexican resort town.

The two leaders, along with new Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper, have gathered to talk about security and economic cooperation, and Mr. Bush thanked Mr. Fox for "such a strong statement."

"The president understands and I understand we have an obligation to secure our borders," Mr. Bush said.

The emphasis on border security reflects the political climate in the United States on immigration, where the only point that nearly all voters agree on is that the borders leak and the U.S. government has failed to control them.

For his part, Mr. Bush assured Mr. Fox that he remains committed to pushing Congress to produce an immigration bill that includes a guest-worker program for current illegal aliens and future foreign workers.

"I'm optimistic we can get a bill done," he said.

Mr. Bush is trying to sell his guest-worker plan to skeptical Republicans, particularly in the House, who say the government must prove that it can enforce the borders before talking about a new foreign-worker program.

Mr. Bush also told Mr. Fox that he doesn't favor letting illegal aliens jump to the front of the line to get citizenship. He said if the current line is too long, Congress should increase the number of green cards issued each year.

An estimated 6 million Mexicans now live illegally in the United States, making up more than half the illegal-alien population, and are the biggest segment of new illegal entries every year, according to the Pew Hispanic Center.

Mr. Fox said he wants to create more opportunities in Mexico so that Mexicans stay in the country, echoing his foreign minister's comment Tuesday that officials want to make sure future foreign workers return to Mexico, rather than stay in the United States.

"Mexico should assume its responsibility and take concrete actions to develop a series of programs in health, employment and housing in Mexico in order to guarantee that temporary workers return to the country," Minister Luis Ernesto Derbez was reported as saying.

"Mexican politicians have an obligation to create conditions so that we no longer have to export labor," Mr. Derbez said.

But just this week Mr. Fox told a Canadian newspaper that he wants Canada to expand its guest-worker program to allow for more Mexican workers.

After spending all of 2004 and most last year mainly calling for a guest-worker program, Mr. Bush late last year coupled that with a call for better border security. But Mr. Bush has yet to offer a comprehensive proposal in the way that he offered a guest-worker plan in January 2004.

Mr. Bush said Mr. Fox shared with him Mexico's strategies for how to control the border, though neither man said what they were and it is too early to know what sort of changes Mexico will make or what kinds of resources it will bring to the border.

Mr. Fox, through an interpreter, did say that Mexican authorities have stopped more than 120 alien smugglers in their recent efforts to gain control of the border.

A week after asking that Mexico play a role in shaping the United States' immigration policy, Mr. Fox also said that issue is out of his hands.

"The matter is in the Congress of the United States, and that is where the decision will be made," Mr. Fox said hours before meeting Mr. Bush for bilateral talks in Cancun. "It is no longer between President Bush and President Fox."

That represents an about-face after the Mexican government paid for advertisements to run in major U.S. and Mexico City newspapers last week that said if there is a guest-worker program, Mexico "should participate in its design, management, supervision and evaluation."

Early in the day, the three leaders visited the archaeological site of Chichen Itza, a Mayan and Toltec city near Cancun, which some scholars say was the scene of human sacrifices.

All three men were dressed casually, with Mr. Bush even walking the site with his white short-sleeved shirt untucked.

The two days of meetings are being conducted under tight security, and even when the leaders got to the pyramid that stands roughly in the center of the complex, they looked up to see their security forces perched at the top with weapons and binoculars.

Though Mr. Bush already had met Mr. Harper, when he was opposition leader in the Canadian Parliament, yesterday was their first meeting since Mr. Harper became prime minister after January's elections. Mr. Harper rode in Mr. Bush's motorcade and flew with him on Marine One to Chichen Itza, and then they met for bilateral talks in the afternoon.

Bush Hopeful On Immigration Bill, But Senate Remains Torn (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette And James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush said Thursday that he was confident the Senate would approve an overhaul of immigration laws, but lawmakers plodded through a second day of debate with the significant distance between two opposing camps seemingly as wide as ever.

Bush's comments came after he held a long-scheduled meeting with Mexican President Vicente Fox in the Yucatan Peninsula resort of Cancun. At the end of a one-hour conference, Bush spoke optimistically about the legislation's prospects, assuring Fox that he was "committed to having a comprehensive immigration bill on my desk."

In Washington, senators worked behind the scenes to sway each other. At one point, they displayed rare unanimity on immigration law, voting 94 to 0 to approve a study on deaths of undocumented immigrants at the border.

The vote, on an amendment from Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), was the first of a series that would push the Senate in the next week to consider a guest-worker program and plans that would give permanent legal status to the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants now here.

In a heated demonstration of the GOP's rifts over immigration, conservative House members held a news conference to denounce any lawmaker who supported citizenship for undocumented immigrants. Legislation approved by the Senate Judiciary Committee would create a path for illegal immigrants to gain permanent legal status or citizenship. Critics say that would provide amnesty to those who had broken U.S. law.

"Anybody that votes for an amnesty bill deserves to be branded with a scarlet letter A," said Rep. Steve King (R-Iowa), referring to the Senate Judiciary Committee legislation, which also would toughen enforcement of immigration laws and create two programs allowing additional foreigners to enter the country as temporary workers.

That legislation is one of two major proposals before the Senate. The other is a bill offered by Frist that concentrates only on border security and enforcement of immigration laws.

The competing visions reflect attitudes among Americans, according to a poll by the nonpartisan Pew Hispanic Center. Like lawmakers, Americans are increasingly concerned about illegal immigration, with 52% seeing such immigrants as a burden to the country. And, like lawmakers, Americans are divided on how to deal with the issue.

Thirty-two percent believe illegal immigrants should be able to stay permanently, the poll found. Another 32% think they should be able to temporarily stay as guest workers before being required to return to their home countries. And 27% believe undocumented immigrants should be sent home.

In a display of bipartisanship, 10 senators held a news conference to affirm their support for the Judiciary Committee bill. The senators, declaring that momentum was on their side, painted the choice between their bill and Frist's enforcement-only legislation as a turning point for the country.

"This legislation is a defining moment in the history of the United States," said Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who asked whether the country would continue its tradition of welcoming newcomers or would shut its doors. "Of course [immigration] has to be legal, but, by God, we have to continue that tradition."

Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), chairman of the Judiciary Committee, complained that a campaign was afoot to smear his committee's bill by saying it offered amnesty. He vowed to "take the Senate leader head on" over Frist's use of the word.

Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) added: "This is a very, very important piece of legislation. I resent it when it's called amnesty."

While the Senate was debating, Bush was meeting in Mexico with Fox.

"We don't want people sneaking into our country that are going to do jobs Americans won't do," the president said, in support of his call for a guest-worker plan.

"We want them coming in, in an orderly way, which will take pressure off of both our borders."

At the same time, Bush told Fox that those in the U.S. illegally should not be given preference over people abroad who applied for citizenship.

For Fox, who is completing a six-year term and is not allowed to seek reelection, the meeting brought the immigration debate full circle: He took office seeking to improve relations with the United States, particularly over immigration. But that relationship was disrupted by the United States' attention to its campaign against terrorism after the Sept. 11 attacks, and then by differences between Fox and Bush over the Iraq war, which Fox opposed.

Fox, offering the sort of support Bush has sought on immigration, said Mexico understood that immigration "is a shared responsibility."

Bush Seeks To Ease Distrust In North American Talks (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

CANCUN, Mexico, March 30 -- President Bush began two days of meetings Thursday with Mexican President Vicente Fox and Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper in hopes of repairing fissures that have developed in the relationship among the North American neighbors.

Although the three nations entered into a formal security and prosperity partnership last year that was intended to strengthen their ties, the relationship between the United States and both its neighbors has been characterized in recent years by creeping distrust over issues such as illegal immigration and the implementation of U.S. trade policy.

Mexico has a huge stake in the ongoing debate in the United States over revamping immigration policy, being the home country of two-thirds of the estimated 11 million undocumented workers in the United States Tens of thousands more Mexicans attempt to cross the border each month.

After a meeting with Fox on Thursday, Bush told reporters he had reiterated his desire to sign a comprehensive immigration bill that strengthens border security and enforcement. Bush said that the United States has an "obligation" to secure its borders, and he thanked Fox for acknowledging Mexico's "shared responsibility" in that effort.

Bush also repeated his call for an increase in the number of green cards, which would allow more immigrants to be granted permanent residency in the United States. And he once again called for creation of a guest worker program that would create a legal channel for thousands of low-skilled workers to come into the United States.

"We don't want people sneaking into our country who are going to do jobs Americans don't want," Bush said. "We want them coming in an orderly way."

Analysts say many Mexicans have been put off by what they perceive as an increasingly hostile view in the United States toward illegal immigration, including a bill passed by the House of Representatives in December that would step up enforcement in part by building a wall along more than a third of the 2,000-mile U.S.-Mexican border.

The Senate is debating a more moderate immigration measure that includes a guest worker program like the one long advocated by Bush.

Canadian attitudes toward the United States, meanwhile, have been soured by the invasion of Iraq and a general perception that Bush has pursued an arrogant, go-it-alone foreign policy. For some, that has been symbolized by the long-running dispute over heavy U.S. tariffs on softwood lumber imports from Canada.

Former prime minister Paul Martin suspended talks last year on the $4.5 billion in duties the United States has placed on the lumber, saying the levy violated the spirit of the North American Free Trade Agreement.

Harper has said he is looking for ways to make progress on the issue. Bush added that he was "always optimistic" that the dispute could be resolved.

Canadians also have objected to a U.S. plan to require special identification cards for people who regularly cross the borders with Canada and Mexico, saying it would hinder tourist and commercial traffic. Harper said the proposal presents a "pretty significant challenge."

Bush, however, has said the cards would expedite the flow of commerce between the two nations and facilitate travel while helping to secure the U.S. borders.

"The idea is to make sure that tourists and trade move freely and terrorists don't," Bush said in an interview earlier this week with Canada's CTV.

The series of disputes has helped turn public opinion in Mexico and Canada decidedly against the United States.

A Pew Research Center poll found that two-thirds of Mexicans and three-quarters of Canadians surveyed held a favorable view of the United States in 2000. By 2005, just 36 percent of Mexicans and 43 percent of Canadians who responded had a favorable view of the United States, according to an Ekos poll.

There is a "general sense on the part of both of our neighbors that America's focus was exclusively terrorism and we were prepared to do everything else unilaterally," Robert Pastor, director of the Center for North American Studies at American University, said in a telephone interview.

Compounding that sense in Mexico has been the uneven impact NAFTA has had there, Pastor said.

Rather than resulting in a surfeit of good jobs that slowed the flow of illegal immigration, the enactment of NAFTA has coincided with a sharp increase in the number of undocumented workers living in the United States. And while many jobs have been created in Mexico, others have migrated to countries where low-skilled labor is even less expensive.

"NAFTA succeeded, but only for that part of Mexico that was connected to the United States," Pastor said. He said major investments were needed in roads and other infrastructure, particularly in southern Mexico, before the benefits of free trade were felt throughout the country.

Meanwhile, the income and wealth disparities between the United States and Mexico have widened, not closed. Experts say this gap lies at the root of the illegal immigration problem.

"Trade is not the only locomotive that pulls the train," said Andres Rozental, president of the Mexican Council on Foreign Relations.

Bush, Fox and Harper started their day with a tour of the Chichen Itza Mayan ruins, which are about 127 miles west of here. The three leaders, dressed casually, climbed a few of the narrow steps of El Castillo, a steep 75-foot-tall pyramid.

Bush Takes Time Out To Make Like A Tourist (KRT)

By William Douglas

CANCUN, Mexico - President Bush traded in his business suit Thursday for a white tropical short-sleeve shirt and khaki slacks as he played tourist, something he rarely does on foreign trips.

The president was all smiles and business casual as he spent about an hour walking through the impressive ruins of Chichen-Itza, a Mayan archeological site about 127 miles west of Cancun, where he's meeting with Mexican President Vicente Fox and Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper. The ruins date back to the sixth century.

"I want to thank you for letting us begin our important meetings at this very historical site," Bush said after his tour. "I want to thank those who have worked hard to make sure this important part of our history is accessible and is available for people to understand the past, so we can better understand the future."

Bush has earned a reputation for being an indifferent tourist at best on overseas trips, dashing through museums and exhibits or leaving social and cultural events early. He typically prefers to stick to business and not interrupt his routine.

White House officials say Bush's aversion to touring reflects security concerns and the tricky logistics of moving a presidential entourage around. Bush's critics say his reluctance to get out and about reflects a lack of intellectual curiosity and hurts America's image abroad.

The president seems to be emerging slowly from his touring shell. During last month's trip to India and Pakistan, he played cricket in Pakistan, but passed on a tour of India's Taj Mahal, which disappointed Indian officials.

On Thursday, Bush looked like a man having fun and in no hurry. He listened intently as Federica Sodi, the site's lead archeologist, explained the significance of the ruins. They strolled past El Castillo, a 75-foot pyramid with 91 steps on each of its four sides - and stopped to listen to a band perform Jarana, a local song and dance. Bush smiled and swayed slightly.

The leaders then proceeded to a site called the ball court, a 545-foot-long athletic field lined with a stone wall, where a soccer-like game called tlachtli was played in ancient times.

From there, the leaders went back to the pyramid and walked up two or three of the 91 steps. They finished the tour at the Temple of Big Tables, a structure that contains original murals painted by Mayans for their gods, a tour guide said.

Bush Plays Tourist On Mission To Mexico (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, March 31, 2006

When he visited St. Petersburg, Russia, in 2002, he completed his tour of the Hermitage museum in two hours, 16 minutes. That was enough time to have a look at the artwork and have lunch with Russian President Vladimir I. Putin. There are 3 million pieces in the collection. He didn't see them all.

As president, he has been to Rome. He skipped the Colosseum.

Berlin? He drove past the Brandenburg Gate without stopping.

He did the Great Wall of China in a half-hour flat, then turned to a reporter and said, "Let's go home." And four weeks ago, he caused a diplomatic row by refusing entreaties while in India to visit the Taj Mahal.

All of which make his activities Thursday morning that much more remarkable. He made a one-hour flight aboard Marine One from Cancun to Chichen Itza to visit the Mayan and Toltec ruin that is among the world's greatest archaeological sites.

The once-sacred city, a UNESCO World Heritage Site, was first populated about 1,500 years ago, abandoned, resettled, and again abandoned about 700 years ago.

Wearing a white tropical shirt, khakis and rough-soled hiking shoes, Bush walked along El Castillo, the pyramid that is the site's most prominent feature, accompanied by his host, Mexican President Vicente Fox, and Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper.

Sounding more the formal diplomat than the casual tourist, Bush said to Fox: "I want to thank you for letting us begin our very important meetings at this very significant historical site." The three leaders are meeting here in a North American summit, and Fox has used the visit to send out a message that this resort on the Yucatan Peninsula, battered by Hurricane Wilma last year, is open for business. Bringing the foreign leaders to the remains of an ancient civilization sent another message: Mexico offers more for a tourist than just beaches.

Perhaps it was because he is in his sixth year in office -- or, more likely, because he really had little choice but to yield to protocol and the wishes of his host -- but Bush cooperated with Fox's mission.

Together, the three climbed about five of the pyramid's steep steps.

After adhering during his first five years in office to a schedule that had him speeding through meetings and meals and then heading to his next stop, or home, the two hours at Chichen Itza put Bush somewhere in the ranks of presidential tourists.

To be sure, he has made some concessions to local culture over the years -- in Botswana, for example, he made a quick drive through an animal park in 2003. And presidents rarely spend much time at tourist attractions while on diplomatic travels. But they do manage some sightseeing, often at the encouragement of their hosts.

Ronald Reagan, in China in 1984, detoured hundreds of miles to the city of Xian to see its terra cotta warriors, an archaeological treasure. Four years later, he strolled Red Square in Moscow with Mikhail S. Gorbachev.

That has not been Bush's style.

Still, on Thursday, he squeezed in a favored pursuit.

Between the tour of Chichen Itza and the first of his diplomatic meetings, he worked up a sweat in the hotel gym.

Senate Tackles Immigration As Bill's Backers Seek Support (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Senate plunged into debate on landmark immigration legislation even as supporters worked to consolidate the 60 votes needed to cut off any filibuster and win passage next week.

The opening day showed more passion than progress with major amendments postponed until Monday. House conservatives lashed out at the proceedings, saying the White House was jeopardizing Republican lawmakers by moving forward on such a sensitive issue this election year. But after a meeting with Mexican President Vicente Fox, President Bush said he was "optimistic we can get a bill done."

"We have a prodigious path ahead of us," warned Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R., Pa.).

Sen. John McCain (R., Ariz.) said the debate was a "defining moment" in American history.

"Are we going to continue a rich tradition of welcoming new blood and new vitality, or are we going to adopt an isolationist, protectionist attitude and policies that are a betrayal of the very fundamentals of this great nation?" Mr. McCain said. "By God, we have to continue those traditions of freedom and democracy and hope."

As reported by the Senate Judiciary Committee on Monday, the measure would create new guest-worker programs and legalize the status of an estimated 11 million undocumented workers who are already in the U.S.

In deference to Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.), debate had been confined to a much-narrower border-security bill favored by conservatives and the House. But at noon yesterday, Mr. Specter was allowed to bring out the broader Judiciary measure that will be the focus going forward.

Democrats believe they can deliver 42 votes for the bill, and Mr. McCain's office appeared confident that 18 Republicans can be found to bridge the difference and invoke cloture to cut off a filibuster. But Mr. Frist said last night that "cloture doesn't have the votes to pass now even if they had all 45 Democrats."

The White House's worst fear regarding the legislation is that it will collapse in the Senate, denying Mr. Bush the chance of getting the House to consider a more comprehensive approach to immigration.

Senators are finding it hard to find middle ground on the question of whether undocumented workers, already in the U.S., should be allowed to both legalize their status and eventually apply for citizenship.

"I won't accept a repetition of the mistake of 1986," said Sen. John Cornyn (R., Texas), speaking of an amnesty offered then by the Reagan administration and Congress in similar circumstances.

Mr. Specter angrily dismissed the "smear of amnesty," and said any illegal who comes forward now would be subject to fines, back taxes and an 11-year waiting period before becoming a citizen.

"I, right now, would not support the bill if it stays exactly the way it is," Mr. Frist said. He warned against pushing too fast for a vote on cloture before Republicans had had a chance to express themselves.

"Everybody struggles with it. I struggle with it," he said, and in addressing the millions of workers in the U.S., he urged proponents to look for a compromise short of an outright path to citizenship.

"You could design a separate class, not a track which is what they have now, which allows people to continue to work," he said. "There's no way you can take 11 million people and send them back either right now or three to four years from now. But you could design a system that doesn't give you a leg up at all to citizenship."

"Immigrants don't come to America to change America," said Sen. Mel Martinez (R., Fla.), who fled Cuba as a child. "Immigrants come to be changed by America."

Tuning In To Anger On Immigration (WP)

By Shailagh Murray And T.r. Reid

The first time Rep. Tom Tancredo got really angry about immigration, the year was 1975, and he was a junior high school social studies teacher in Denver. The state had recently passed the nation's first bilingual education law, and Hispanic kids were taken from his class to study in Spanish.

That idea made zero sense to Tancredo, the grandson of Italian immigrants. He believed that newcomers should be assimilated into the country, as they had been for generations. The image of America as a beacon for people from all over the world uniting under one flag and one language was threatened, he contended, if the country started adapting to immigrants, instead of the other way around.

A year later, Tancredo launched a political career animated by his obsession to stem the tide of immigration from Mexico and Central America that he feared would change the character and security of the country. Today, the four-term Republican House member stands at the center of a national debate over how best to deal with the nearly 12 million illegal immigrants in the United States. Tancredo helped the House pass a bill in December that would impose criminal sanctions on illegal immigrants and those who employ them and that would erect a wall along 700 miles of the U.S.-Mexican border to keep others out.

That legislation has triggered massive protests throughout the country and prompted a Senate committee this week to pass an alternative measure with a guest-worker program that would help many illegal immigrants eventually win permanent residency or even U.S. citizenship.

Tancredo, 60, has so effectively tapped into the anger of millions of Americans who favor a crackdown on illegal immigrants and tougher measures at the border that the back-bench Republican is considering making a bid for president in two years. But in Washington, he is viewed warily by Democrats, the White House and even some of his Republican colleagues as a loose cannon or even a zealot.

After Tancredo suggested in 2002 that President Bush's views on immigration amounted to a national security threat, White House political adviser Karl Rove told him, "Don't ever darken the door of the White House" -- although Tancredo later was invited to the White House for a bill signing.

Democrats have criticized him for stoking anti-immigration sentiment, although some see his tactics as helping them by driving Hispanic American voters in Florida, California and other states away from the Republican Party. "I'm all for more and more nuts in their party speaking up," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), who chairs the House Democrats' congressional campaign committee. "I want more of those guys."

Tancredo shrugs off the criticism. "It's not a secret that I have burned a lot of bridges here," he said in an interview this week. "My ability to get anything done around here is based around my ability to make this into a national issue. My megaphone is pointed at the ear of America."

A ubiquitous presence on the airwaves, Tancredo has appeared more than 1,000 times on radio talk shows in recent years and has become a television news mainstay. He has traveled widely around the country, including the early presidential caucus and primary states of Iowa and New Hampshire. His office averaged 4,566 pieces of mail per month during the first quarter of this year. When Tancredo was scheduled as a guest on ABC's "This Week" last Sunday, he received 300 "good luck" e-mail messages before his appearance and 700 "good job" e-mails after the show.

The relentless media exposure, along with polls indicating that many Americans support a border crackdown and the deportation of illegal immigrants, has given Tancredo considerable influence over the immigration legislation now unfolding in Congress. "He's a force because he represents what a lot of people think," said Steven Camarota of the Center for Immigration Studies, which favors less immigration. "He's only a gadfly in Washington."

For many frustrated, scared and angry suburbanites and small-town residents, Tancredo is a hero, one of the very few Washington politicians who take their fears seriously. They believe undocumented, mostly Hispanic workers are taking jobs that ought to go to citizens, flooding schools and boosting the crime rate, and that the country's open borders pose a security threat.

"My parents were immigrants," says Mark Solinsky, an independent voter from the sprawling Denver suburb of Highlands Ranch, a part of Tancredo's suburban Colorado district. "Came from Poland. In the '20s. But I think now, this new wave of immigration poses a problem. We've got to have tougher laws. And, you know, that's what Tancredo always talks about. So I would say, yeah, he's right on that. We need some leadership on that."

Republican Ed Clousing, of Littleton, a suburb at the foot of the Rockies, said: "I am so mad at our government. And I know Tom Tancredo is mad, too. Because there's nobody up there trying to protect what's right about our country."

Tancredo's congressional district includes suburb after suburb, an expanse of new homes, schools, shopping malls and golf courses spreading across the high plains south and west of Denver. The district is about 88 percent white, and the residents are prosperous, with a median income ($74,000) almost twice the national average. The share of Hispanic residents, 6 percent, is the lowest of any Colorado district.

Tancredo, a self-described religious right Republican, grew up on the north side of Denver, taught in junior high school, and was elected to the state House in 1976 at the age of 30. He was part of a group called "the crazies," who advocated the elimination of the sales tax on food and utilities, and was a critic of public education.

But immigration has always been his chief preoccupation, and he made a name for himself after winning election to Congress. Tancredo strongly opposes any programs to accommodate illegal workers already living in the country and, after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, he supported the most stringent possible border enforcements.

Tancredo helped to shape a House bill, approved in December, that would impose stiff penalties on employers who hire illegal workers and would require businesses to eventually run the names of every employee through a national database to confirm their legality. The bill would end the "catch and release" policy for immigrants other than Mexicans who are caught sneaking into the country. Five double-layer border fences would be built in California and Arizona, stretching 698 miles at a total cost of more than $2.2 billion.

The House proposal has sparked huge protests in Phoenix, Detroit, Los Angeles and elsewhere. The Senate is now debating legislation that would take a more permissive and forgiving approach, by creating a guest-worker program and issuing more visas for professionals.

Tancredo is particularly riled at the business community, which he says has become "addicted to cheap labor." Employers are a driving force behind the guest-worker program and other Senate provisions that amount to "nearly universal amnesty" for the 12 million people currently living in the United States illegally, Tancredo says. He routinely chides Bush, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and other GOP colleagues for bowing to corporate pressure, despite the potential social problems and security threats.

Polls indicate that about 60 percent of Americans oppose guest-worker programs and three-quarters of Americans believe the government is doing too little to secure the nation's borders.

Democrats acknowledge concerns about the issue, but it is Republicans who are in the most difficult spot. One lawmaker trying to juggle law-and-order voters with business pressures is Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.), who is fighting for reelection in November. His state is the birthplace of the Minutemen, a citizens' border patrol founded after Sept. 11. It was also the site of one of the biggest rallies against the House bill, held last week in Phoenix.

To keep the heat on Kyl, Tancredo issued a news release titled "Tancredo to Kyl: Just Say No to Amnesty," urging the senator to vote against the guest-worker proposal in committee, which Kyl did. But the Arizona Republican refused to comment about Tancredo's influence over the immigration debate. "I don't want to talk about it," he grumbled while dashing for an elevator.

The Great Senate Immigr'A'tion Debate (WP)

By Dana Milbank

It was all fire and brimstone as House Republicans gathered yesterday in the Capitol basement to denounce their Senate counterparts for proposing to legalize illegal immigrants.

Rep. Steve King (R-Iowa), behind a pulpit adorned with a "Just Say No to Amnesty" sign, thundered: "Anybody that votes for an amnesty bill deserves to be branded with a scarlet letter, 'A' for amnesty, and they need to pay for it at the ballot box in November."

Stand down, Hester Prynne. Adultery is so 17th-century.

At the precise moment the House GOP was turning all puritanical, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), author of the Senate legislation, was in the television studio announcing that he would not wear the "A" for amnesty. "There is an effort far and wide to try to degrade the committee bill by the smear of amnesty, and it simply is not amnesty," he said -- repeating his denial four times in a minute.

The world's greatest deliberative body is at it again. The Senate has begun a momentous debate about securing the nation's borders, and what to do about the millions of illegal immigrants already here. So far, however, the lawmakers have not advanced much beyond a linguistic debate about the meaning of the A-word.

"I believe we have a bill which is not justifiably categorized as amnesty," Specter announced.

Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) countered that the Senate bill is "what most Americans will see as amnesty."

Sen. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.), the chamber's lone immigrant, said the "loudest voices" should not "make a definition of what amnesty is and what amnesty should be."

The loud-voiced Sen. Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.) was unmoved. "In every sense of what people mean by amnesty, it's amnesty," he said. "If it's not amnesty, it's the same thing as amnesty. That's just what it is." The Alabama lexicographer brandished the scarlet letter a half-dozen times more. "By any standard definition of the word 'amnesty,' this bill has it," Sessions maintained. "I know that's a loaded word, and I don't want to be playing around demagogically with the word 'amnesty.' "

One man's amnesty, of course, is another man's "earned citizenship," as Sen. Patty Murray (D-Wash.) put it yesterday. The legislation, for the record, would pardon immigrants' illegal entry if they pay a fine and back taxes, go through a background investigation and learn English.

But the use of the word "amnesty" -- more than 50 times on the Senate floor yesterday -- says much about the immigration debate. Proponents of the "guest-worker" path toward legalization appear to have gained the upper hand; Specter seems to have the votes in the Senate, and House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) is rethinking his chamber's hostility to a guest-worker plan. Opponents, therefore, need to escalate the rhetoric and invoke the A-word.

Democrats, who favor the guest-worker plan, called in a polling firm, Lake Research Partners, to provide talking points to counter the amnesty charge. "Lead with an enforcement message," the firm advised, and propose "reasonable solutions" that are also "tough and fair." Lake continued: "Immigrants have to pay taxes . . . and be learning English."

Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) hit all the points: "We need tough and smart enforcement at the border and throughout the country. We need realistic immigration laws that bring immigrants out of the shadows, paying taxes, learning English and contributing to our communities."

Other senators sampled their own buzzwords to counter the dreaded amnesty allegation: "We are a nation of immigrants" and "Bring people out of the shadows."

But these soft and gauzy slogans were no match for the anti-amnesty crowd of House Republicans, who stood in front of a banner with the word AMNESTY in 18-inch letters and a slash through it.

"It would be like a dinner bell" to immigrants, pronounced Bob Beauprez (R-Colo.). "If you are here illegally and want to fly the Mexican flag, go to Mexico," proposed Virgil H. Goode Jr. (R-Va.). "I say let the prisoners pick the fruits," said Dana Rohrabacher (R-Calif.), adding, "I would hope that the American people are smart enough to smell the foul odor that's coming out of the United States Senate." Asked if President Bush, who supports a guest-worker plan, has a similar stench, Rohrabacher replied: "No comment."

But King topped them all, asserting that a "ruling class" of Americans have "made enough money by hiring cheap illegal labor that they think they also have some kind of a right to cheap servants to manicure their nails and their lawn."

Over in the Senate, the linguistic dispute continued to rage. "Tantamount to an amnesty program," judged David Vitter (R-La.). "It is not amnesty," said Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.). "Some people might perceive that what is granted is an amnesty," posited John Cornyn (R-Tex.). "This does not sound like amnesty to me," chimed in Blanche Lincoln (D-Ark.).

Only Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) retained his composure. "I think that's a straw dog, to be very honest with you, this argument of amnesty," he observed. "The debate is misfocused in some ways when the word 'amnesty' becomes the hot button, nomenclature versus the more substantive question."

Another remark like that, and Gregg will be wearing the scarlet letter.

Political Parties Pressured On Immigration (AP-Y2)

By Ron Fournier

AP2, March 30, 2006

Arizona's leaders are in a tizzy over immigration, pressured by political crosswinds that reflect the growing national debate over how to control U.S. borders.

Republicans are bashing Republicans. The Democratic governor is in cahoots with a GOP senator. Both parties fear voter backlash.

Bordering Mexico, Arizona may be the perfect spot to show the state of policy and politics of U.S. immigration.

In a word, it's a mess.

"You'll find every view in Arizona," jokes Rep. Jeff Flake (news, bio, voting record), a conservative Republican from Mesa.

In the House, he has backed the approach of the state's most notable politician, GOP Sen. John McCain (news, bio, voting record), who wants to give illegal immigrants a clear path to citizenship through work.

McCain's position puts him on the side of President Bush and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce — and many prominent Democrats, including Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano and liberal icon Sen. Edward Kennedy (news, bio, voting record) of Massachusetts.

Arizona's junior senator, Republican Jon Kyl, also wants to help the estimated 11 million illegal immigrants remain in the United States legally, but his approach would make it harder for them. He wants illegal immigrants to return to their native countries before returning as so-called guest workers.

Then there is another conservative Arizona lawmaker, Rep. J.D. Hayworth (news, bio, voting record), who has written a book that proposes building a fence along the U.S.-Mexico border, using armed forces to help patrol the region and denying citizenship to the U.S.-born children of illegal immigrants.

There is unanimity on one point in Arizona: illegal immigration is a major problem.

The state is the largest gateway for illegal immigrants, accounting for 54 percent of the 1.1 million apprehensions nationwide during the 2004 fiscal year. It is home to an estimated 500,000 illegal immigrants out of the state's population of about 6 million, a costly drag on health care, education and law enforcement budgets.

"Arizona has been devastated by this issue," McCain said.

Long considered a federal problem, limited to a few "gateway states" such as California and Arizona, illegal immigration is now a front-burner issue across the country.

Illegal immigrants are moving to states like North Carolina, Iowa, Ohio and Georgia as they seek jobs and establish communities. North Carolina alone had 390,000 illegal immigrants in 2004, nearly 16 times its number in 1990, according to a Pew Hispanic Center analysis.

At a news conference this week, Napolitano praised McCain's bill while calling Kyl's approach "a fictional system." She chastised the GOP-led House for passing a bill that focuses solely on border reinforcement rather than also dealing with illegal immigrants already working in the U.S.

"The House bill is a terrible bill for Arizona," she said.

The backbiting didn't stop there.

Hayworth accused fellow Republicans of carrying water for business interests who want the cheap labor provided by guest-worker provisions.

"It's the ultimate corporate welfare scam," he said on the "Imus in the Morning" television and radio program.

Flake, a guest-worker supporter, objected when Hayworth's plan was called conservative. "I don't think it's conservative to ignore the problem," he told The Associated Press. "If you don't have a plan to deal with those here illegally now, that's a huge part of the problem."

The political stakes are huge. Hispanics are the fastest-growing group of voters, and President Bush has helped double the GOP's share of the Hispanic vote since 2000.

McCain said those gains are at risk. "This issue has galvanized the Hispanic population in Arizona," he said, pointing to protests this week in Arizona and several other states against the crackdown on illegal immigration.

"First, this is a warning to my party that we have to be sensitive about this issue," McCain told The AP. "Secondly, the Hispanic community risks a backlash if it become unruly or too many Hispanic flags — and not enough American flags — are at these protests."

Sensitive, indeed, for McCain and other candidates lining up for 2008 presidential bids. They include Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, who staked out a position to the right of McCain, and Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, who accused House Republicans of passing a bill that would criminalize "even Jesus himself."

Polls show the issue has the potential to divide Democrats as well as Republicans. Many working-class Democrats resent what they consider to be a constant flow of cheap labor. The hard-line House bill was backed by 36 Democrats, including those considered most in danger of losing their seats in November.

Still, the fear is most palpable among GOP leaders. Republican Party chairman Ken Mehlman said his party's challenge is to improve border security "and do it in a way that is pro-immigrant."

"Franklin Roosevelt built a durable Democratic coalition because large groups of American Catholics, Jews and ethnics" who otherwise shared Republicans values "were convinced that the Republican Party did not like them," Mehlman said. "So we have to be careful."

These being sensitive times, Mehlman was speaking on the telephone from Phoenix, where he was meeting with Hispanics.

Divided US Senate Debates Immigration Reform (AFP-Y2)

AFP, March 30, 2006

A fractured US Senate opened debate on reforms to immigration laws, which have sparked demonstrations across the country.

The debate, likely to carry on for days, will consider whether to create a foreign guest worker program, how best to seal the lengthy southern border with Mexico, and what to do with the estimated 11.5 million undocumented workers in the United States.

"The level of illegal immigration is unacceptable," said Democrat Ken Salazar from the western state of Colorado. "Our immigration laws are not working, we have broken borders and we must fix the problem."

Salazar emphasized that after the September 11, 2001 attacks it was "critical that we get control of our borders" as a "matter of national security" -- a view widely repeated by his colleagues in the past months.

Immigration reform plans has especially split President George W. Bush's majority Republican Party, which controls the House of Representatives and the Senate.

Bush presented a reform plan that increases the number of Border Patrol agents and allows some undocumented workers to register for legal status -- and ultimately, if they qualify, for US citizenship.

But hard-line Republicans in the House of Representatives in December approved a bill making unapproved US entry a crime, and included plans to build a wall along parts of the border.

The proposal touched off mass protests in US cities. More than 500,000 people demonstrated in Los Angeles last Saturday and there were new smaller protests there by school students on Thursday.

The Senate is seeking a possible compromise that would reinforce border security but also allow work visas and eventual residency for some migrants.

The House and the Senate must agree on any new immigration rules, and the measure then has to be signed by the president to become law.

Complicating factors include the November mid-terms elections, in which opposition Democrats hope to win back seats. And with several legislators hoping to run for president in 2008, there has been broad popular demands for increased border security.

The senators are trying to reach a decision before a two-week recess starts on April 7.

"It'll be a daunting task to finish this bill on that schedule," said Republican Senator Arlen Specter. "But we've undertaken daunting tasks before and succeeded -- but it can be done only if we have cooperation from the members."

Many analysts say the debate goes to the heart of what it means to be an American in a country that has long prided itself on being a nation of immigrants.

Salazar himself reminded his colleagues that "virtually every person in America has a story to tell about its immigrants roots."

Senate Calls For Study Into Immigrant Deaths (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Senate today approved an amendment to launch a study of how many illegal immigrants die trying to cross U.S. borders, which Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) described as "an immense humanitarian tragedy."

The 94-0 vote — the first of several votes the Senate is expected to take this afternoon as it continues debating immigration reform — provided little hint of the tumultuous votes to come.

In an emotional debate that pits the needs for post-9/11 border security against the economic and humanitarian concerns of the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants already in the country, senators often got personal.

"I know emotions are running high," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.). Dismissing calls to make criminals of illegal immigrants, Feinstein said, "How do you find 12 million people?"

Describing three illegal immigrants who have made contributions to the country, Feinstein added, "This is their home. They are a vital and necessary part of the American workforce."

In the hours and days to come, legislators were expected to debate a dual approach to immigration.

DOJ_NMG_0024578

One, offered by Frist, would crack down on illegal immigration by increasing the number of Border Patrol agents and updating their technological detection devises.

The bill would also require the detention of all illegal immigrants, and make it unlawful to hire one.

Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) on Wednesday called the Frist approach "un-American."

The competing legislation, a Senate Judiciary Committee bill offered by its chairman, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), would provide some Border Patrol protections — adding 12,000 agents in the next five years, to double the force, and make building a tunnel under the U.S. border a crime.

It would also allow most illegal immigrants now in the country to apply for a six-year guest worker card. Those not in the country could petition for a green card if sponsored by an employer. Guest workers would have to wait five years to apply for U.S. citizenship, and would become eligible after 11 years.

In addition, the bill would provide so-called blue cards for illegal immigrants who are agricultural workers, and remove penalties against humanitarian workers and clergymen who help illegal immigrants.

The Judiciary Committee bill won support of all eight committee Democrats and three Republicans: Mike DeWine of Ohio, Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and Sam Brownback of Kansas. Conservative columnists Robert Novak and David Brooks editorialized today about the importance of immigration to America's economy and history.

In the House, which passed a border enforcement bill in December, Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) said he remains open to compromise.

"Our first priority is to protect the border," he said. "And we also know there is a need in some sectors of the economy for a guest worker program."

Like many following the debate, Hastert said he is eager to "see what the Senate comes forward with."

Conservatives Stand Firm On Immigration (NYT)

By Carl Hulse And Rachel L. Swarns

WASHINGTON, March 30 — Conservative House Republicans bluntly warned their leaders Thursday against any immigration compromise that would allow temporary foreign workers and assailed a Senate proposal that would open the way for illegal immigrants to earn citizenship.

"My fear is that if we continue down this path that the Senate has established, that we will have created the biggest magnet ever," said Representative Bob Beauprez, a Colorado Republican. "It would be like a dinner bell, 'Come one, come all.' "

But the bipartisan authors of a Senate plan that would combine new border protections with a temporary worker program and a process for illegal immigrants to qualify for residency and eventually citizenship said they thought they were gaining support as the Senate moved deeper into its immigration fight.

Senator John McCain, the Arizona Republican who helped write the plan approved Monday by the Senate Judiciary Committee, called the debate a defining moment in the nation's history.

"Are we going to continue our rich tradition of hundreds of years of welcoming new blood and new vitality to our nation?" Mr. McCain asked. "Or are we going to adopt a protectionist, isolationist attitude and policies that are in betrayal of the very fundamentals of this great nation of ours, a beacon of hope and liberty and freedom throughout the world?"

Supporters of Mr. McCain's plan said that President Bush's comments in recent days have suggested he was moving toward their position. Under Mr. McCain's proposal, illegal immigrants would be granted permanent residency and the opportunity to apply for citizenship only after foreigners who have followed the rules by applying for residency from their countries have been processed.

In a speech on Thursday in Cancún, Mexico, where President Bush was meeting with President Vicente Fox, Mr. Bush said, "If they want to become a citizen, they can get in line, but not the head of the line."

The sharp divisions among Republicans illustrated the difficulty Congress would have in reaching agreement, particularly with midterm elections looming. Lawmakers and Senate officials said the climactic votes would come next week as senators considered amendments and a choice between the Judiciary Committee plan and a proposal by Senator Bill Frist, the majority leader, that focuses on tougher law enforcement.

As the debate rages in Washington, the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press and the Pew Hispanic Center released a national survey indicating that ordinary Americans are also deeply divided over how to handle the 11 million illegal immigrants thought to be living in the United States.

The poll, conducted between Feb. 8 and March 7, found that 53 percent of the 2,000 people surveyed believed that illegal immigrants should be required to return home, while 40 percent said they should be granted some legal status that allows them to stay in the United States.

Forty-nine percent said that increasing penalties for employers who hire illegal immigrants would be most effective in reducing illegal immigration. One-third preferred increasing the number of border patrol agents while 9 percent favored the construction of fences along the Mexican border.

And while 65 percent said that immigrants mostly take jobs that Americans do not want, the survey found that a growing number of people believe immigrants are a burden, taking jobs and housing and creating strains on health care.

House conservatives emphasized such concerns at a news conference on Thursday. Worried that their party's leadership was weakening in its opposition to plans that would allow illegal workers to remain in the United States, more than a dozen House members staged a "Say No to Amnesty" event after Speaker J. Dennis Hastert suggested on Wednesday that the House might consider a temporary worker program.

Representative Dana Rohrabacher, Republican of California, dismissed arguments made by President Bush and business leaders who say the United States needs a pool of foreign workers. He said businesses should be more creative in their efforts to find help and suggested that employers turn to the prison population to fill jobs in agriculture and elsewhere.

"Let the prisoners pick the fruits," Mr. Rohrabacher said. "We can do it without bringing in millions of foreigners."

With the Senate considering a worker and citizenship plan starkly at odds with the House approach, Representative Tom Tancredo, Republican of Colorado and a leading advocate of tough immigration laws, said House conservatives wanted to make clear their resistance to any worker program. "Push is coming to shove," Mr. Tancredo said.

Despite the outcry from the right, Representative John A. Boehner, the majority leader, said the House would await a bill from the Senate before making firm decisions. "To stand here today and guess at what it might look like and how we might deal with an issue is a lot of speculation that we don't need to engage in," Mr. Boehner said.

While backers of the bipartisan measure said they were making inroads, opponents of the citizenship proposal said they were not so sure. "The more people find out what is in it, I think there will be more unease," said Senator Jeff Sessions, Republican of Alabama. Like other critics of the legislation, Mr. Sessions said it could be characterized as amnesty for illegal immigrants.

Authors of the measure bristled at that label. Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania and chairman of the Judiciary Committee, described it as a smear intended to build resistance to the legislation.

"It is not amnesty because the undocumented aliens will have to pay a fine," he said. "They will have to pay back taxes. They will undergo a thorough background investigation. They will have to learn English. They will have to work for six years. And they will have to earn the status of staying in the country and the status of moving toward citizenship."

Hill Conservatives Warn Bush Of Amnesty Anger (WT)

By Charles Hurt

House conservatives yesterday issued a dire warning to President Bush and Republican leadership that they will pay a devastating political price if they proceed with a guest-worker program or anything resembling amnesty for illegal aliens before securing the borders and enforcing existing immigration laws.

"They will remember in November," Rep. J.D. Hayworth, Arizona Republican, said of voters nationwide. "And many of those who have stood with our Republican majority in the last decade are not only angry, many of them plan to be absent from the polls" this year when the entire House and one-third of the Senate is up for re-election.

Mr. Hayworth and more than a dozen other House Republicans pointed to polls that show overwhelming support for their strict-enforcement stance and advised Mr. Bush and GOP leaders in both chambers to "listen to the common sense of the American people."

One Republican, Rep. Dana Rohrabacher of California, fired a warning shot specifically at Sen. John McCain. The Arizona Republican widely expected to be a 2008 presidential hopeful at that moment was holding a press conference across the Capitol with, among others, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat.

"Those elected officials who are insisting on a guest-worker program and diluting the efforts of border security and internal enforcement are telling the American people exactly whose side they are on," Mr. Rohrabacher said. "The American people now have that opportunity to make that determination, and they will. Senator McCain and others will find out about that, when they find their own career is short term."

Those sentiments were only buttressed, the lawmakers said, by the images in recent days across the country of thousands marching in opposition to tough immigration reform.

"I say if you are here illegally and want to fly the Mexican flag, go to Mexico and wave the American flag," said Rep. Virgil H. Goode Jr., Virginia Republican.

Senate action yesterday was confined to a single unanimous vote to study fatalities among foreigners sneaking across the desert into the United States. But Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, officially introduced his committee's 471-page proposal that would fine illegal aliens but allow them to remain in the U.S. while applying for citizenship.

Although conservatives in both chambers excoriated the Specter plan as "amnesty," other Republicans said momentum was shifting toward what they called a "comprehensive" border security bill that includes a guest-worker program that provides illegal aliens with a path to citizenship.

"Among the Republican conference, I see a shift toward a comprehensive view to solve this problem," said Sen. Lindsey Graham, South Carolina Republican, who is among four Republicans who voted for Mr. Specter's proposal in committee. "From a Republican point of view, we need to be wise in the way we deal with this politically."

Mr. Graham attended yesterday's McCain-Kennedy press conference, along with Sen. Joe Lieberman, Connecticut Democrat.

"Our reforms need to reflect the realities," Mr. McCain said. "We need guest workers in this country. There are some jobs Americans are simply unwilling to do."

"When we get to the conference, we'll talk about it," said Majority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio.

On Wednesday, House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert told reporters that a guest-worker program is needed.

"Our first priority is to protect the borders," he said. "We also know there is a need in some sectors of this economy for a guest-worker program."

But Mr. Rohrabacher called the guest-worker proposal "the foul odor that's coming out of the United States Senate."

There is no need for such a program, he said.

"We do not need more people from foreign countries coming in taking the jobs of Americans and bidding down our wages. We can do those jobs, even in the fields," Mr. Rohrabacher said.

Anyone who supports such a proposal, said Rep. Steve King of Iowa, should be "branded with a scarlet letter A," for "amnesty."

As for who might be willing to take up the hard labor many illegal aliens now perform on U.S. farms, Mr. Rohrabacher had a suggestion.

"The millions of young men who are prisoners around our country can pick the fruits and vegetables," he said. "I say let the prisoners pick the fruits."

Mr. Rohrabacher offered a terse "no comment" when asked whether his "foul odor" comment also applied to Mr. Bush, who first proposed a guest-worker plan more than two years ago. Mr. Rohrabacher later added: "The American people can take a deep breath and determine for themselves what smells and what doesn't and where it's coming from."

According to a poll by the Pew Research Center and Pew Hispanic Center released yesterday, 52 percent of Americans view immigrants as a burden because they take jobs and housing -- up from 38 percent in 2000 -- compared with 41 percent, who believe they strengthen the country. The poll also found 53 percent of Americans support sending illegals home, while 40 percent said they should be put on some sort of path toward citizenship.

Rep. Tom Tancredo, the Colorado Republican who leads the House immigration reform caucus, offered a simple explanation for why Mr. Bush is pushing a guest-worker program that voters don't want.

"He's not running for re-election," Mr. Tancredo said yesterday. "I wish that he would recognize the dangerous position he would place himself in and the rest of his agenda if the Republicans lose the House and Senate, which they could easily do on this issue.

"Although he's not running for re-election, I wish he would think about the party. And, of course, I wish he'd think about the country."

House Conservatives Blast Immigration Bill (AP-Y2)

By David Espo

AP2, March 30, 2006

House conservatives criticized President Bush, accused the Senate of fouling the air, said prisoners rather than illegal farm workers should pick America's crops and denounced the use of Mexican flags by protesters Thursday in a vehement attack on legislation to liberalize U.S. immigration laws.

"I say let the prisoners pick the fruits," said Rep. Dana Rohrabacher (news, bio, voting record) of California, one of more than a dozen Republicans who took turns condemning a Senate bill that offers an estimated 11 million illegal immigrants an opportunity for citizenship.

"Anybody that votes for an amnesty bill deserves to be branded with a scarlet letter A," said Rep. Steve King (news, bio, voting record) of Iowa, referring to a guest worker provision in the Senate measure.

Their news conference took place across the Capitol from the Senate, where supporters and critics of the legislation seemed determined to heed admonitions from both Bush and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist to conduct a dignified, civilized debate.

The House has passed legislation to tighten border security, while the Senate approach also includes provisions to regulate the flow of temporary workers into the country and control the legal fate of millions of illegal immigrants already here. Bush has broadly endorsed the Senate approach, saying he wants a comprehensive bill.

It was the second day in a row that congressional Republicans aired their differences on an issue that directly affects the fastest growing segment of the electorate. Under Bush's leadership, the Republicans have made dramatic inroads among Hispanic voters, and party strategists fret that the immigration debate could jeopardize their gains.

On Wednesday, leading GOP senators disagreed whether the legislation amounted to amnesty.

There was no such debate at the news conference in the House, where not a word was spoken in defense of the Senate bill and even Bush was not spared criticism.

"I don't think he's concerned about alienating voters, he's not running for re-election," said Rep. Tom Tancredo of Colorado. He said Republicans could lose the House and Senate over the immigration issue, and he said of the president: "I wish he'd think about the party and of course I also wish he'd think about the country."

Referring to a wave of demonstrations in recent weeks, Rep. Virgil Goode (news, bio, voting record) of Virginia said, "I say if you are here illegally and want to fly the Mexican flag, go to Mexico and wave the American flag."

King analyzed the issue in class terms.

"The elite class in America is becoming a ruling class and they've made enough money by hiring cheap illegal labor that they think they also have some kind of a right to cheap servants to manicure their nails and their lawn, for example.

"So this ruling class, this new ruling class of America, is expanding a servant class in America at the expense of the middle class of America, the blue collar of America that used to be able to punch a time clock, buy a modest house and raise their families. ... Those young people are cut out of this process."

Rep. J.D. Hayworth (news, bio, voting record) of Arizona and others said Republicans would pay a price in the midterm elections if they vote for anything like the Senate legislation. "Many of those who have stood for the Republican Party for the last decade are not only angry. They will be absent in November," he said.

Rohrabacher said Americans should be able to "smell the foul odor that's coming out of the U.S. Senate."

Asked a few moments later whether the same odor was emanating from the president, he said, "I have no comment."

The only vote of the day came on a proposal by Frist for a study of the number and causes of deaths at the U.S.-Mexico border. It passed 94-0.

The more difficult choices lie ahead next week, when critics of the bill are expected to try to strip out the guest worker provision and roll back the provisions relating to 11 million illegal immigrants already here.

Sen. Arlen Specter (news, bio, voting record), R-Pa., the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, has said repeatedly he hopes to find a compromise that is more broadly acceptable than the legislation that cleared his committee over the objections of six Republicans.

"There's a movement afoot to find consensus," said Sen. Lindsey Graham (news, bio, voting record), R-S.C., who voted for the bill that cleared committee.

He said the president's statements "have been hugely helpful."

Immigration Divides Allies (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

New economic research that pits native-born workers against low-skilled immigrants in a struggle for jobs and wages has fueled a rift between some of Washington's most liberal lawmakers and their allies in economics and labor, who fear that the Democratic Party is pushing an immigration policy that forsakes the party's working-class mainstay.

The quarrel comes as the Senate debates a proposal to bring millions of immigrants into the legal workforce. A growing body of economic research contends that the recent surge of foreign workers has depressed wages for low-skilled workers, especially for high school dropouts, and has even begun displacing native-born workers. That benefits employers, higher-income consumers and the economy at large, but it may exacerbate the problems of the working class.

"What immigration really does is redistribute wealth away from workers toward employers," said George J. Borjas, an economist at Harvard University's John F. Kennedy School of Government.

As with so many economic quandaries, other researchers have come to virtually the opposite conclusion. Those economists maintain that an expanding economy, spurred in part by plentiful low-wage labor, has created more jobs on the bottom of the income chain, absorbing the new immigrants with little or no impact on wages.

But the work of Borjas and other economists is becoming a wedge in the Democratic Party. Citing Borjas's work, Sen. Byron L. Dorgan (D-N.D.) denounced the Senate immigration bill yesterday, saying: "This is clearly a corporate strategy to keep wages low. It clearly will replace the jobs of American workers."

At issue is a guest-worker provision that would allow hundreds of thousands of foreign workers legal access to the U.S. labor market each year and the impact those new low-wage workers would have on stagnant wages. An unusual coalition of business groups, immigration advocates and labor unions with large immigrant memberships have come together to support the guest-worker program proposed by Sens. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and John McCain (R-Ariz.).

Kennedy, the Senate's liberal lion and an unflagging ally of organized labor, says the legislation he co-wrote would help all low-wage workers by applying minimum-wage laws and other workplace protections to immigrants and undocumented workers, who are often exploited.

The AFL-CIO and many economists strongly disagree.

Guest-worker programs "cast workers into a perennial second-class status and unfairly put their fates into their employers' hands, creating a situation ripe for exploitation," AFL-CIO President John J. Sweeney said this week. "They encourage employers to turn good jobs into temporary jobs at reduced wages and diminished working conditions and contribute to the growing class of workers laboring in poverty."

Over the past decade, economists such as Borjas have examined the impact of a surge of illegal immigration on wages and the economy at large. Most agree that the influx has had a small but positive impact on the national economy, holding down consumer prices, improving the productivity of the workforce and increasing demand for goods and services.

Upper-middle-class consumers can dine at restaurants, stay at hotels, and have their cars hand-washed and their house windows cleaned for far less than they would without illegal immigration. An abundant supply of low-wage workers may have spurred more investment in labor-intensive businesses. Giovanni Peri, an economist at the University of California at Davis, estimates that immigration in the 1990s actually boosted the average wage of native workers by 1.1 percent.

"The fact is the economies of Texas, Illinois, California, New York, and half the country would collapse if tomorrow we could click our fingers and have every undocumented worker out of the country," said Steven M. Ladik, an immigration lawyer with Jenkens & Gilchrist in Dallas. "Construction, hospitality, the medical industry, manufacturing -- all these key segments of our economy are dependent upon these people."

But some of those macroeconomic gains have come at the expense of low-wage workers, especially the 10 percent of the labor force that dropped out of high school. In recent years, competition from low-skilled immigrant workers has reduced the wages of high school dropouts by as much as 8 percent, Borjas said. For a worker earning $20,000 a year, such a drop can be substantial.

Looking at annual earnings, the percentage losses are in the double digits, said Andrew Sum, director of Northeastern University's Center for Labor Market Studies, because jobs that once provided year-round employment are increasingly becoming temporary.

A Northeastern University study found that nearly 86 percent of all newly employed workers hired from 2000 to 2005 were immigrants. For men, the statistics were more stark. In that time, the labor market for men rose by 2.66 million while 2.77 million foreign-born men found work. In other words, Sum said, immigrants have begun replacing native-born male workers.

"Young guys are being displaced by immigrants," he said. "Some of my good liberal friends take issue, but if you're a young worker under 25, poorly educated, probably African American, the higher the share of new immigrants in your community, the worse your employment prospects are becoming."

Critics say competition for low-wage jobs would only increase under the legislation approved by the Senate Judiciary Committee this week, which would not only allow undocumented workers to find lawful jobs but would also offer 400,000 temporary work visas annually to foreign workers.

"What they're doing is increasing the pool of people eligible to compete for the very limited resources that are available for people at the bottom," said Carol M. Swain, a political scientist and law professor at Vanderbilt University. "The obligation of the nation should be for the people who have been here for decades."

Not all economists see it that way. David Card, an economist at the University of California at Berkeley, said the recent surge of low-wage immigration has had virtually no impact on wages. That may be because the presence of abundant, low-skilled workers has allowed companies to expand to absorb them. Higher profits at a restaurant allows an owner to open another one. Ethan G. Lewis, an economist at the Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia, suggested that companies are forsaking adoption of new technologies in favor of old-fashioned labor -- a trend that would help absorb low-skilled immigrants but could hurt innovation and high-wage work in the long run.

Most See Visa Program As Severely Flawed (WP)

By S. Mitra Kalita

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

Somewhere in the debate over immigration and the future of illegal workers, another, less-publicized fight is being waged over those who toil in air-conditioned offices, earn up to six-figure salaries and spend their days programming and punching code.

They are foreign workers who arrive on H-1B visas, mostly young men from India and China tapped for skilled jobs such as software engineers and systems analysts. Unlike seasonal guest workers who stay for about 10 months, H-1B workers stay as long as six years. By then, they must obtain a green card or go back home.

Yesterday, the House Judiciary Committee heard testimony for and against expanding the H-1B program. This week, the Senate Judiciary Committee approved legislation that would increase the H-1B cap to 115,000 from 65,000 and allow some foreign students to bypass the program altogether and immediately get sponsored for green cards, which allow immigrants to be permanent residents, free to live and work in the United States.

But underlying the arguments is a belief, even among the workers themselves, that the current H-1B program is severely flawed.

Opponents say the highly skilled foreign workers compete with and depress the wages of native-born Americans.

Supporters say foreign workers stimulate the economy, create more opportunities for their U.S. counterparts and prevent jobs from being outsourced overseas. The problem, they say, is the cumbersome process: Immigrants often spend six years as guest workers and then wait for green card sponsorship and approval.

At the House committee hearing yesterday, Stuart Anderson, executive director of the National Foundation for American Policy, a nonprofit research group, spoke in favor of raising the cap. Still, he said in an interview, the H-1B visa is far from ideal. "What you want to have is a system where people can get hired directly on green cards in 30 to 60 days," he said.

Economists seem divided on whether highly skilled immigrants depress wages for U.S. workers. In 2003, a study for the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta found no effect on salaries, with an average income for both H-1B and American computer programmers of $55,000.

Still, the study by Madeline Zavodny, now an economics professor at Agnes Scott College in Decatur, Ga., concluded "that unemployment was higher as a result of these H-1B workers."

In a working paper released this week, Harvard University economist George J. Borjas studied the wages of foreigners and native-born Americans with doctorates, concluding that the foreigners lowered the wages of competing workers by 3 to 4 percent. He said he suspected that his conclusion also measured the effects of H-1B visas.

"If there is a demand for engineers and no foreigners to take those jobs, salaries would shoot through the roof and make that very attractive for Americans," Borjas said.

The Institute of Electrical and Electronics Engineers-USA says H-1B salaries are lower. "Those who are here on H-1B visas are being worked as indentured servants. They are being paid $13,000 less in the engineering and science worlds," said Ralph W. Wyndrum Jr., president of the advocacy group for technical professionals, which favors green-card-based immigration, but only for exceptional candidates.

Wyndrum said the current system allows foreign skilled workers to "take jobs away from equally good American engineers and scientists." He based his statements about salary disparities on a December report by John Miano, a software engineer, who favors tighter immigration controls. Miano spoke at the House hearing and cited figures from the Occupational Employment Statistics program that show U.S. computer programmers earn an average $65,000 a year, compared with $52,000 for H-1B programmers.

"Is it really a guest-worker program since most people want to stay here? Miano said in an interview. "There is direct displacement of American workers."

Those who recruit and hire retort that a global economy mandates finding the best employees in the world, not just the United States. And because green-card caps are allocated equally among countries (India and China are backlogged, for example), the H-1B becomes the easiest way to hire foreigners.

It is not always easy. Last year, Razorsight Corp., a technology company with offices in Fairfax and Bangalore, India, tried to sponsor more H-1B visas -- but they already were exhausted for the year. Currently, the company has 12 H-1B workers on a U.S. staff of 100, earning $80,000 to $120,000 a year.

Charlie Thomas, Razorsight's chief executive, said the cap should be based on market demand. "It's absolutely essential for us to have access to a global talent," he said. "If your product isn't the best it can be with the best cost structure and development, then someone else will do it. And that someone else may not be a U.S.-based company."

Because H-1B holders can switch employers to sponsor their visas, some workers said they demand salary increases along the way. But once a company sponsors their green cards, workers say they don't expect to be promoted or given a raise.

Now some H-1B holders are watching to see how Congress treats the millions of immigrants who crossed the borders through stealthier means.

Sameer Chandra, 30, who lives in Fairfax and works as a systems analyst on an H-1B visa, said he is concerned that Congress might make it easier for immigrants who entered the U.S. illegally to get a green card than people like him. "What is the point of staying here legally?" he said.

His Houston-based company has sponsored his green card, and Chandra said he hopes it is processed quickly. If it is not, he said, he will return to India. "There's a lot of opportunities there in my country."

Houston Students Protest (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

HOUSTON, March 30 (AP) — Dozens of students were arrested or cited on Thursday and a principal was disciplined for flying a Mexican flag in front of the school as protests continued in Texas over immigration legislation in Congress.

A spokesman for the school district would not say how the principal, Robert Pambello, would be disciplined. Mr. Pambello is the principal at Reagan High School, where 88 percent of the students are Hispanic.

The students who were arrested were among thousands in Texas and elsewhere who left class this week to rally in support of immigrants.

They were arrested after 150 students left class and refused to get on buses to return, Lt. Robert Manzo of the Houston police said. The police arrested 26 students there, and 5 ran away and were later found in a parking lot. All were charged with violating the curfew ordinance, and one, a 19-year-old, was arrested for hindering traffic, Lieutenant Manzo said.

Student Protests Grow, Spread To Md. (WP)

By Tara Bahrampour And Jamie Stockwell

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

Demonstrations among high schoolers and middle schoolers spread yesterday as 1,500 students in Northern Virginia and a smaller group in Maryland poured into the streets to protest proposed federal legislation that would crack down on illegal immigrants.

Draped in flags of Latin American countries and ignoring threats from some school administrators, students from Arlington County, Fairfax County and Falls Church left school -- or skipped going altogether -- to converge at Ballston Metro and march to Courthouse Plaza in Arlington.

Although several District and Maryland schools have significant Latino populations, students in these areas have been slower to protest. Yesterday, however, about 300 students at Albert Einstein High School in Kensington staged a brief walkout.

It was the third time this week that large numbers of Northern Virginia students have joined nationwide protests against proposed legislation that would make being an illegal immigrant a felony and make it a crime to assist them.

Yesterday's walkouts elicited a variety of responses from school officials, from nods of support from principals and teachers to threats of suspension from district officials.

Many students said they worried their parents could be deported after years -- or decades -- of working and paying taxes in the United States.

"We're fighting for our parents and their rights 'cause they fight for us," said Jessica Montufar, 17, a junior at Washington-Lee High School in Arlington, "GUATEMALA" written on her arm in black marker.

Montufar, whose parents emigrated from Guatemala 20 years ago, said as a U.S. citizen it was her responsibility to speak out for them. "Our parents, if they would be out here protesting, they have a fear that they could be sent back," she said.

At Courthouse Plaza, students held placards that denounced House Resolution 4437 and shouted, "America was built by immigrants!" and "We are not criminals!"

Kellie Mylko, 15, a sophomore at Washington-Lee, said she helped organize the effort to show that students "have a voice."

"We are the next major bloc of voters," she said. "They need to know what we think."

Apparently worried that schools would bar students from leaving, one flier's author warned students not to enter school buildings. However, school officials in Arlington, Fairfax and Falls Church said students were not locked in or prevented from leaving. In fact, Bob Snee, principal of George Mason High School in Falls Church, said some parents had called to approve their children's departures, making their absences excused. Prince William and Fairfax counties have similar policies.

In Arlington, absences for protests are considered unexcused, regardless of parental permission. Arlington schools spokeswoman Linda Erdos said one unexcused absence on an otherwise good record would not hurt a student, but chronic absences would lower grades and could lead to in-school suspensions. Erdos said 600 to 700 Arlington students, including 60 middle schoolers, joined yesterday's march.

Some Fairfax students said they had heard students with unexcused absences could face suspension or, for organizers, expulsion. Fairfax schools spokesman Paul Regnier said it was too early to know what the punishments would be.

In Prince William County, school officials said that, effective Wednesday, students with unexcused absences due to protests would be suspended until a meeting could be arranged with their parents to decide on a punishment.

But Arlington students said many faculty members were supportive. "On Tuesday [when a similar march took place] one of our vice principals said that he was really proud of us," said Elizabeth Raftery, 18, a senior at Wakefield High School.

And at Montgomery County's Einstein, one student reported that many teachers left their classrooms and clapped to show support.

In a letter to parents yesterday, Arlington School Superintendent Robert G. Smith said that "demonstrations regarding civic issues represent a longstanding tradition in our democratic society," but encouraged students to protest outside school hours. Protests were planned today by students from other Northern Virginia schools.

In Arlington, more than 100 police officers from Arlington, the Pentagon, Fairfax County and the state watched over the march, said Arlington police spokesman Matt Martin, adding that the hour-long protest was peaceful. Afterward, students were ferried back to their schools in buses sent by their districts.

Linda Slape, 14, a freshman at Wakefield and an organizer, said she was not worried about missing class.

"This is more important, because this is now and school is for the next four years," she said. "We want to do something that makes a difference today."

Principal Raises Mexican Flag, Faces Discipline (WT)

By Valerie Richardson

HOUSTON -- A high-school principal who raised the Mexican flag on a campus flagpole as a show of support for Hispanic students was disciplined yesterday as the school district grappled with massive student walkouts.

Robert Pambello, principal of John H. Reagan High School in Houston, received "appropriate disciplinary action," said Terry Abbott, a spokesman for the Houston Independent School District, adding that no details would be released because it was a personnel matter.

Mr. Abbott said the principal was attempting to avert a walkout sparked by the debate over immigration reform in Congress by agreeing to raise the distinctive red, green and white flag Wednesday in exchange for students' staying in class.

"He was working with students at the school to try to avoid a walkout situation by raising the Mexican flag underneath the American and Texas flags," Mr. Abbott said. "They didn't walk out, but it was the wrong thing to do."

Mr. Abbott, who described the principal as "a good educator with a good record," said Mr. Pambello lowered the flag immediately after receiving word from the school district.

"As soon as word reached us, we called and told him to take it down, and he did," the spokesman said.

The flying of the Mexican flag came during a week of protests and walkouts nationwide among Hispanic students and other critics of legislation that would erect barriers at the U.S. border with Mexico to prevent illegal entry.

In Houston yesterday, Superintendent Abelardo Saavedra urged students to stay in school after 1,400 left classes over a three-day period, and suggested that they stage rallies before or after classes instead. Police arrested 26 student protesters yesterday for curfew violations.

Those who continue to walk out will be "severely disciplined," Mr. Abbott said. The district has 208,000 students, 58 percent of whom are Hispanic.

Flying the Mexican flag has become a flash point, particularly in border states, among those who feel overwhelmed by the number of foreigners illegally entering the United States. In Houston, the flag-flying episode fueled a backlash on local talk radio among callers who saw the move as an attack on U.S. sovereignty.

"I don't like having any foreign flag shoved in my face while someone tries to bully me into doing something," KTRH-AM talk-show host Chris Baker said.

Raul Ramos, a history professor at the University of Houston, called the furor "overblown," saying that displaying the Mexican flag alongside the U.S. flag historically has been regarded as a symbol of partnership.

"Flying the flag is a ceremonial practice. In this case, the Mexican flag has nothing to do with citizenship or politics; it has to do with ethnic pride," Mr. Ramos said.

Even so, he said he received a half-dozen critical e-mails after similar comments on the flag incident appeared recently in the Houston Chronicle.

"I've got one that says, 'You should be fired and sent back to Mexico,' " said Mr. Ramos, who was born in the United States.

Immigration And The GOP (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

As Congress battles over immigration, the consequences are likely to be far greater than the details of border walls or green cards. The most important political outcome may turn out to be the message that Republicans send about the kind of the party they are and hope to be.

To wit, do Republicans want to continue in the Reagan tradition of American optimism and faith in assimilation that sends a message of inclusiveness to all races? Or will they take another one of their historical detours into a cramped, exclusionary policy that tells millions of new immigrants, and especially Hispanics, that they belong somewhere else?

Admittedly that paints with a broad brush, but politics is often about broad symbolism, and this is roughly the Republican choice presented by President Bush's approach on the one hand, and that of Tom Tancredo and his platoon of talk-show hosts and Tory columnists on the other.

Let us quickly say that not every American concerned about immigration is part of the latter group. The breadth of new immigration, legal and illegal, in recent years has literally changed the face of America. Our own view is that this has been mostly for the better -- in revitalized inner cities, a younger workforce to fuel a dynamic economy, and in general helping America avoid the senescent future of other industrial nations.

But there have also been costs, and parts of America have borne more than have others. The border states in particular have experienced more crime and social disruption, as well as the cost to local taxpayers of "free" health care and education for illegal immigrants. To the extent they work and pay rent, illegals do pay for those government services. But we don't dismiss lightly the anxiety that many Americans feel at this rapid pace of demographic change. Well meaning politicians, such as Arizona Senator Jon Kyl, who feel obliged to respond to that anxiety in this election year are not part of the nativist brigades.

The issue is the form and message that response takes. For Republicans in the House especially, the approach has been to send the most punitive message possible to both illegals and anyone who assists or hires them, no matter how innocently. They're backed by a small but vocal band of "conservative" media who denounce any rational idea for legalizing the 11 million illegals already in the U.S. as "amnesty."

Never mind that even under the most liberal proposals now in Congress, current illegals would have to pay a fine, learn English, and wait upward of a decade to qualify for citizenship. And no matter that these pseudo-conservatives have no alternative policy, other than to arrest and deport millions in a way that would cause far more social and economic disruption than we have now.

Such a punitive policy would alienate business owners and religious conservatives among the GOP base. But because the policy is aimed largely at Hispanic immigrants, it will also rightly be seen as a specific ethnic rebuke. Millions of Hispanics -- both illegals and those who have been here for decades -- will get the message that the Republican Party doesn't want them. Those Republicans who shout "no amnesty" and want to make illegally crossing the Rio Grande a felony are well on their way to creating a generation or more of new Democratic voters.

This is a mistake Republicans have made too many times before. In the 1920s, their anti-immigration bills alienated Catholic newcomers from Europe, who weren't open to GOP appeals in any numbers until the Reagan years. In postwar Hawaii, Republicans made the same mistake with Asians and Pacific islanders, turning that state safely Democratic. And most recently, in 1994 in California, they rode Pete Wilson's Proposition 187 to a short-term re-election victory but at the cost of polarizing Hispanic voters and making themselves the minority party in our largest state.

First as Texas Governor and then in the White House, Mr. Bush has wisely tried to change this anti-immigration image of the GOP. Among Hispanics in particular, he has made enormous progress. Bob Dole won 21% of the Hispanic vote in 1996, Mr. Bush improved that to 35% in 2000 and again to 44% in 2004. Given that the Hispanic share of the electorate has climbed to 8% in 2004 from 2% 20 years ago, and is likely to climb to 12% by 2020, Republicans who ignore Hispanic voters are guaranteeing themselves future political defeats.

Yes, some pundits insist, often in their own immigrant accents, that every naturalized Hispanic is a future Democratic voter. But Hispanics have never been the political monolith that African-Americans are. Cubans have voted Republican since they started migrating in the Castro era, and millions of other Hispanics have shown they are as open to GOP appeals as any other ethnic group as they rise in income and homeownership. But conservative ideas on taxes, crime and foreign policy will never get a future hearing if Republicans now send a message that they are only a party of Anglos, or only of those Hispanics who've been here since the days of the Alamo. * * *

The immediate danger is that Republicans will ignore their longer-term interests by passing a punitive, and poll-driven, anti-immigration bill this election year. Any bill that merely harasses immigrants and employers, and stacks more cops on the border, may win cheers in the right-wing blogosphere. However, it will do nothing to address the economic incentives that will continue to exist for poor migrants to come to America to feed their families. And it will make permanent enemies of millions of Hispanics, without doing anything to draw illegals out of the shadows and help them assimilate into the mainstream of American culture and citizenship.

This is not Ronald Reagan's view of America as a "shining city on a hill." It is the chauvinist conservatism usually associated with the European right. How Republicans conduct and conclude their immigration debate will show the country which kind of "conservative" party they want to be.

CALIFORNIA'S TWO SENATORS HAVE not distinguished themselves in recent years on immigration issues, but this week it has been heartening to see them on the correct side of the momentous debate in the Senate. California is an iconic state of immigrants in this iconic nation of immigrants, and its representatives in Washington should be on the side of enlightened reform.

Within the last few weeks, Democrats Barbara Boxer and Dianne Feinstein have gone from skeptical to supportive on comprehensive reform. In late February, when the Senate began to confront in earnest the issue of a guest-worker program for current and future immigrants, Boxer and Feinstein weren't biting. Feinstein only would support an agricultural guest-worker program, despite having rejected a somewhat similar initiative in April 2005.

But this week, both senators came out swinging in favor of a broader guest-worker program. Feinstein has been especially inspiring. Two of her amendments won approval in the Judiciary Committee: the agricultural guest-worker program and a measure to criminalize building border tunnels.

And in an eloquent speech on the floor of the Senate on Thursday, she pointed out that the chamber's compromise bill (in contrast with the measure passed by the House) is a security-enhancing bill that also addresses "the very real needs of our economy." Feinstein drew on her experience studying the agricultural industry — she has met with farm owners and farmworkers. She talked about asking each of California's 58 county welfare departments to post job openings in agriculture in a push to attract U.S. workers, only to find that not one person responded to the advertisements.

Feinstein went on to praise the much-demonized undocumented workers at the center of the debate. Speaking of one family, the Plascencias, she said: "This family has worked hard to achieve the financial security their children now enjoy. This includes a home they purchased three years ago in San Bruno. They own their car. They have medical insurance. And they have paid their taxes. It is very clear to me, and I think to a majority of Americans, that this family has embraced the American dream, and their continued presence in our country would do much to enhance the values we hold dear."

Feinstein acknowledged the importance of the moment: "We have an opportunity to chart a new destiny for a lot of people." And she and Boxer have an opportunity to chart a new legacy for themselves — as senators who were on the right side of history.

Immigration Reform: Benefits Vs. Liabilities (USAT)

What people are saying about the immigrant issue:

Parsons (Kan.) Sun, in a signed editorial by Ann Charles: "There is more than enough discussion going on right now about illegal immigrants and congressional proposals to stop them, punish them and export them. Unfortunately, much of that discussion is based on gut feelings rather than rational thinking. ... While a U.S. House-passed bill would make the presence of these laborers a felony and require fencing 700 miles of the border along Mexico, the reality of that would cause an earthquake in the U.S. economy. This isn't to say that illegal workers should be ignored, but one only has to listen to the voices at booming construction sites to know that housing complexes are being built by them. They are also the ones who make hotel beds, change towels, provide landscaping and yard services and vacuum Corporate America. ... Knock out 8 million of those jobs with the passage of a poorly thought out piece of feel-good, American chest-beating legislation, and the immediate consequences to the economy would be devastating."

Middletown (Ohio) Journal, in an editorial: "The federal government's unwillingness to secure our borders and to stop the steady rush of people illegally coming into the United States threatens to overwhelm local communities' resources, services and employment opportunities. The numbers of illegal immigrants are so great that nearly every state in the Union has been affected. ... It's time for Congress and the White House to do their jobs."

Desert Dispatch, Barstow, Calif., in an editorial: "A realistic approach to immigration is necessary. On one hand, it's simply ludicrous to think there's any way we would be able to round up millions of illegal immigrants and remove them from the country in the first place, and parts of our economy would stop functioning even if we could. On the other hand, it's absolutely irrational to ignore the security problems the nation faces by having millions of people in the country essentially outside 'the system,' undocumented and unknown individuals. While some worry about crimes caused by illegal immigrants, it's also worth noting that their undocumented status also makes it harder for them to get help when they're the victims. A guest-worker program is probably the smartest, most rational way of splitting the difference. Those immigrants committed to contributing to our nation's economy will be rewarded. Those who are a drain on our nation will not."

Jay Bookman, deputy editorial page editor of The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, in a column: "The modern era of runaway, all-but-unregulated illegal immigration has a birthday — May 13, 1998. ... On that date, about 45 federal immigration officials launched a raid on the Vidalia onion fields of southeast Georgia, where thousands of workers — 70% to 90% of them illegal — had been brought to pick the crop. But instead of being lauded for enforcing the law, the Immigration and Naturalization Service came under blistering attack from Georgia's congressional delegation. ... INS officials were forced to halt the raid and take the extraordinary step of granting 'temporary amnesty' to the illegal workers it had arrested so they could go back to picking onions. ... From that point forward, the INS abandoned any serious effort to enforce federal law. ... The issue of workplace enforcement is all but ignored. In truth, U.S. officials have no real interest in trying to halt the influx of illegal immigrants to this country."

The Lufkin (Texas) Daily News, in an editorial: "It would be difficult to find even one American citizen who has not benefited in some way from the fruit of undocumented workers' labor. And with the exception of full-blooded Native Americans, every American is either descended from immigrants or is an immigrant himself. ... We don't want to do without cheap labor and low prices. We aren't willing to take low-paying, menial jobs. ... We've got to find a workable solution to this problem. 'Send them back' isn't it. Let's all just admit that, and move on."

Bastiat Knows What Frist Doesn't About Immigration (WSJ)

By Daniel Henninger

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

It was in 1924 that the men of the U.S. Congress for the first time in the nation's history explicitly inserted the word "Immigration" in the title of a national law. Until then immigration laws were more precise in their purpose -- as in the Chinese Exclusion Act of 1882. It may be considered progress of a sort that any immigration law likely to emerge from this Congress will not be titled the Mexican Exclusion Act of 2006.

Instead, the debate over the illegal presence of Mexicans and others with Hispanic surnames is said to be over "respect for the law." President Bush affirmed this in a recent radio address: "America is a nation of immigrants, and we're also a nation of laws."

"Respect for the law" is part of the American bedrock. As Alexis de Tocqueville rightly said, each voter indirectly contributes to the making of our laws, and "however irksome an enactment may be, the citizen of the United States complies with it . . . because it originates in his own authority." That is the high-road argument against the illegal Mexicans.

Another 19th-century Frenchman close to the hearts of American conservatives is Frederic Bastiat, who had a further thought: "The surest way to have the laws respected is to make them respectable." Is our immigration law "respectable"? Need you ask?

America is a nation of laws by now so numerous that it provides jobs for more lawyers per capita than any nation on earth. They serve as legal lifeguards, saving mostly honest citizens from the legal system's capricious undertow. Medical malpractice and asbestos are two areas of law for which "respect" is about zero. A law's existence requires compliance, but not respect.

Some of the anti-Mexican sentiment likely reflects an embarrassed awareness of our degraded laws, and so it has chosen to draw a line in the legal sand over immigration. That won't change the fact that U.S. immigration law is a disrespectable morass.

Swaths of American business openly ridicule the immigration law regulating so-called H-1B temporary visas for highly skilled non-citizen engineers and computer scientists. This controversial boom-and-bust employment morass exists because there is no rational system to give permanent, green-card status to these non-citizen workers and their families. Insisting on "respect" for a law that is doing damage to the nation's economy is cutting off one's nose to spite one's face. That is a bad habit.

The immigration law asking for respect is simply a system of legislated quotas, not much more than a numbers game. The people who play this game -- anyone seeking entry to the U.S. for a spouse, sibling, child or worker -- make monthly visits to the State Department's Web-based Visa Bulletin. Have a look; it actually resembles a bingo card.

Across the top of the grid are the major immigration source countries -- China, India, Mexico, the Philippines and a column for others. Down the left side are family-preference categories, such as 2A, spouses and children, who consist of "77% of the overall second preference limitation, of which 75% are exempt from the per-country limit." Each box, based on a numerical quota, lists the original application year of people nearing acceptance to enter. Filipino brothers and sisters who are now reaching the front of the line applied in 1983. The process has its own word for backlog: "retrogression." We should not be surprised or affronted that so many newcomers who've arrived via this bloodless, hostile bureaucracy then disappear into ethnic enclaves. * * *

What exactly is driving anti-immigration sentiment? Breaking the law? Securing our borders? Terrorism? Medicaid outlays? Assimilation? Distaste for Spanish-speaking Mesoamericans? Talk radio? Of all the forces that now shape politics in the U.S, only one has primacy: the polls. The Wall Street Journal/NBC poll and others have concluded that most people oppose a path to permanent legal status of illegal immigrants already here. But why?

If you're John McCain, Bill Frist and maybe even Arizona Rep. J.D. Hayworth, who is most closely associated with the notion of building a Great Wall of Mexico, you're going to try to guess what's on voters' minds. Plumbing the mind of a congressman is beyond my ken, but the ideas of presidential candidates matter. The Frist plan, released on St. Patrick's Day, reflects these polls and presumably the GOP base. It would hammer employers of illegal immigrants with high fines and even jail time, and it offers no guest-worker provision, The McCain plan, essentially that which emerged this week from the Senate Judiciary Committee, breeds 14,000 new Border Patrol chasers but also requires the federal government to get into the guest-worker business, as it did from 1942 to 1964 with the bracero program, which rationalized worker flows.

No matter what the polls say, I think Mr. Frist's reading of the public mind is wrong, and Mr. McCain has it about right. Those polls produce about as much understanding of beliefs about immigration as did the analysis of the "moral values" vote after the 2004 election. In fact, I think the two phenomena are related.

Most Americans understand their heritage and do not want now to be "anti-immigrant." They don't want to be party to an 11-million-person round-up and deportation. What they want is a politics that takes seriously their anxieties, anxieties that involve not just immigrants but general unease about the direction of a turbulent, constantly changing U.S. culture, as in that 2004 presidential vote. So amid all that, along comes a major social movement -- 11 million "undocumented" workers. Assimilation? Heck, people who've lived here all their lives don't feel assimilated into their own culture anymore.

It's not a coincidence that the first push-back Immigration Act emerged in the Roaring Twenties, another period of abrupt social disruption and anxiety with heavy immigrant inflows from southern Europe. It may be too much to hope, but the purpose of political leadership in such times is to find a path toward our best lights rather than our darkest impulses. At the moment, Senator Frist of Tennessee isn't measuring up.

A Meltdown We Can't Even Enjoy (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

It's frustrating. The three overlapping forces that have sent this country in so many wrong directions -- the conservative movement, the neoconservative movement and the Republican Party -- are warring among themselves, doing their best impression of crabs in a barrel, and sensible people can't even enjoy the spectacle. That's because it's hard to take pleasure in the havoc they've caused and the disarray they will someday leave behind.

Factions within the conservative movement have been engaged in escalating skirmishes over what, exactly, the label "conservative" should mean. This week the fight is over illegal immigration. The nativists and xenophobes want mass deportation and a Berlin Wall looming over the Rio Grande. The cultural determinists lose their studied, academic poise the moment they hear brown-skinned people speaking Spanish or see them waving a Mexican flag. Watch your blood pressure, people, because Cinco de Mayo is just a few weeks away.

The social conservatives seem to be hopelessly conflicted about immigration. They have a kind of immune-system reaction against this unchecked inflow of aliens who look suspiciously like carriers of alien values. But, as some conservative commentators have noted, the immigrants flooding across the border are more likely to have traditional, family-and-church values than many native-born Americans. Does . . . not . . . compute.

Meanwhile, the small-government, tight-money conservatives have finally reached the point of utter disgust about another issue -- the fact that George W. Bush and a conservative Congress have presided over a massive expansion of government and an explosion of debt. For this group, having to point to Bill Clinton as a model of fiscal probity redefines the word "galling."

The neoconservative civil war is simpler to map, because it's all about Iraq. After a long period of denial, even the most fervent and evangelical of the neocons are now forced to admit that this whole Iraq thing hasn't quite worked out the way they expected. Those who advocate staying the course can read the polls. They see that bringing out their dictionaries, pointing to the definition of "civil war" and splitting hairs isn't doing much to stanch the flow of public opinion.

When one of the neocon movement's stalwarts, Francis Fukuyama, declared himself a turncoat recently in a new book -- he questions not only the war but the whole premise of neoconservatism as a real-world philosophy -- his erstwhile compatriots reacted with the shrill bitterness of a rejected lover. It's the kind of intellectual food fight that's almost always fun to watch, except that it's about Iraq, and there's nothing funny about Iraq.

The conflict within the Republican Party is about two primal urges, fear and ambition. Suddenly there is the chance -- not the probability but the possibility -- that the Republicans will lose control of the House or the Senate this fall. At the same time, presidential hopefuls with an eye on 2008 are jockeying for position. That combination of circumstances is turning problems into crises, and crisis management is not the ideal way to run a country.

That's what is happening with immigration. Majority Leader Bill Frist has the Senate in a lather, as if all 12 million illegal immigrants in the country suddenly arrived last Thursday. I'm sure that has nothing to do with the fact that he'd like to run for president.

It would all be entertaining if the stakes weren't so high. Iraqis and Americans are dying; the treasury is bleeding; real people, not statistics, are at the center of the immigration debate. Iran is intent on joining the nuclear club. Hallowed American traditions of privacy, fairness and due process are being flouted, and thus diminished. As the powers-that-be self-destruct, the powers-that-would-be -- Democratic leaders and all Americans who've seen enough of this movie -- need to put together an alternative program that will begin to undo some of the damage the conservative-neocon-GOP nexus has wrought.

To this point, I think the Democratic Party has done just what it needed to do, which was basically to sit back and watch the other side wear itself down. When one party is in charge of the White House and both sides of Capitol Hill, there's not much the other party can do anyway. Refusing to draw up articles of impeachment or sign on to Russ Feingold's censure resolution may reflect cold political calculation, but it also acknowledges plain reality: Not gonna happen.

Democrats have behaved with remarkable discipline, which shows how much they believe they need to win this fall and in 2008. What they haven't yet done is communicate a compelling vision of where they will take the country when they are given the reins. Dry position papers, drafted by committee, aren't enough. Make us see a better future.

The Road To Dubai (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

For now, at least, the immigration issue is mainly hurting the Republican Party, which is divided between those who want to expel immigrants and those who want to exploit them. The only thing the two factions seem to have in common is mean-spiritedness.

But immigration remains a difficult issue for liberals. Let me say a bit more about the subject of my last column, the uncomfortable economics of immigration, then turn to what really worries me: the political implications of a large nonvoting work force.

About the economics: the crucial divide isn't between legal and illegal immigration; it's between high-skilled and low-skilled immigrants. High-skilled immigrants — say, software engineers from South Asia — are, by any criterion I can think of, good for America. But the effects of low-skilled immigration are mixed at best.

True, there are large benefits for the low-skilled migrants, who may find even a minimum-wage U.S. job a big step up. Immigration also raises the total income of native-born Americans, although reasonable estimates suggest that these gains amount to no more than a fraction of 1 percent.

But low-skilled immigration depresses the wages of less-skilled native-born Americans. And immigrants increase the demand for public services, including health care and education. Estimates indicate that low-skilled immigrants don't pay enough in taxes to cover the cost of providing these services.

All of these effects, except for the gains for the immigrants themselves, are fairly small. Some of my friends say that's the point I should stress: immigration is a wonderful thing for the immigrants, and claims that immigrants are undermining American workers and taxpayers are hugely overblown — end of story.

But it's important to be intellectually honest, even when it hurts. Moreover, what really worries me isn't the narrow economics — it's the political economy, the effects of having a disenfranchised labor force.

Imagine, for a moment, a future in which America becomes like Kuwait or Dubai, a country where a large fraction of the work force consists of illegal immigrants or foreigners on temporary visas — and neither group has the right to vote. Surely this would be a betrayal of our democratic ideals, of government of the people, by the people. Moreover, a political system in which many workers don't count is likely to ignore workers' interests: it's likely to have a weak social safety net and to spend too little on services like health care and education.

This isn't idle speculation. Countries with high immigration tend, other things equal, to have less generous welfare states than those with low immigration. U.S. cities with ethnically diverse populations — often the result of immigration — tend to have worse public services than those with more homogeneous populations.

Of course, America isn't Dubai. But we're moving in that direction. As of 2002, according to the Urban Institute, 14 percent of U.S. workers, and 20 percent of low-wage workers, were immigrants. Only a third of these immigrant workers were naturalized citizens. So we already have a large disenfranchised work force, and it's growing rapidly. The goal of immigration reform should be to reverse that trend.

So what do I think of the Senate Judiciary Committee's proposal, which is derived from a plan sponsored by John McCain and Ted Kennedy? I'm all in favor of one provision: offering those already here a possible route to permanent residency and citizenship. Since we aren't going to deport more than 10 million people, we need to integrate those people into our society.

But I'm puzzled by the plan to create a permanent guest-worker program, one that would admit 400,000 more workers a year (and you know that business interests would immediately start lobbying for an increase in that number). Isn't institutionalizing a disenfranchised work force a big step away from democracy?

For a hard-line economic conservative like Mr. McCain, the advantages to employers of a cheap work force may be more important than the violation of democratic principles. But why would someone like Mr. Kennedy go along? Is the point to help potential immigrants, or is it to buy support from business interests?

Either way, it's a dangerous route to go down. America's political system is already a lot less democratic in practice than it is on paper, and creating a permanent nonvoting working class would make things worse. The road to Dubai may be paved with good intentions.

Judge Questions Clarity Of Prosecution's Tax-Shelter Case (NYT)

By Lynnley Browning

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

A federal judge raised questions yesterday about the prosecution of 16 former KPMG employees over aggressive tax shelters, criticizing prosecutors for what he called murky definitions of fraud and evasion.

The judge, Lewis A. Kaplan of Federal District Court in Manhattan, said he was confused by what prosecutors said was a conspiracy by the defendants to make and sell aggressive shelters that allowed hundreds of wealthy investors to evade $2.5 billion in taxes from 1996 to 2002.

"Was the fraud and evasion in the execution or the design" of the shelters, Judge Kaplan asked during a hearing held to consider defense motions to drop or alter some charges.

Judge Kaplan made no ruling yesterday; he is expected to issue orders on the motions in coming weeks.

The case — with 16 former employees of the accounting firm KPMG, an outside lawyer and an investment adviser as defendants — is unusually large and dauntingly complex. The defendants are scheduled to stand trial in September. Their lawyers say their clients acted lawfully and appropriately.

Yesterday, Judge Kaplan asked prosecutors if they would consider dropping some of the 39 counts of tax evasion and limiting the evidence to be introduced during the trial, "in the interest of getting this thing tried in a single human life span."

Prosecutors say the defendants made, sold and in some cases used for themselves certain tax shelters that they knew would not pass muster with the Internal Revenue Service. They are also charged with cheating on their own and others' tax returns and with lying to government investigators. Not all defendants face the same charges.

One of the original defendants, David Rivkin, a former partner in KPMG's office in San Diego, pleaded guilty last week and agreed to cooperate with prosecutors against the remaining defendants.

Judge Kaplan also questioned aspects of an influential Justice Department memorandum that lays out guidelines on prosecutions of corporations. That document, known as the Thompson memorandum, drafted in 2003 by a deputy attorney general, Larry Thompson, advises prosecutors to grant more lenient treatment to firms facing indictment if they forgo paying the legal fees of potentially culpable employees.

"Frankly, I'm very bothered by it," the judge said, saying the document "puts the government's thumb on the scales" and raises questions about the Sixth Amendment constitutional right to legal representation.

KPMG narrowly avoided indictment and instead reached a $456 million deferred-prosecution agreement in August, in the process admitting criminal wrongdoing and agreeing to cooperate with investigators. But around the same time, KPMG, aware that some of its employees were about to be indicted, ended its longstanding practice of advancing legal fees of as much as $400,000 an employee.

"I find it shameful that the fees haven't been advanced," Judge Kaplan said. "The reality is that you are depriving people of counsel, or at least interfering or impairing."

Some lawyers for the defendants argued yesterday that their clients would go bankrupt financing their defense. One of the defendants, David Greenberg, a former senior tax partner at KPMG, has been unable to come up with the $25 million in bail needed to get out of jail, and appeared at the hearing in prison garb.

In court papers and oral arguments, prosecutors have repeatedly described the complex shelters as consisting of sham and fraudulent transactions, like phantom loans and investments, that generated artificial losses. Investors then cited these to claim tax losses against legitimate income. Lawyers for the defendants argue that they had thought the shelters were legitimate.

To Judge Kaplan's question of whether fraud and evasion occurred in the design or in the carrying out of the shelters, Justin Weddle, an assistant United States attorney, answered, "Both."

No court has ruled the shelters illegal, but the I.R.S. has never considered them valid for deductions.

Nonetheless, Steven Bauer, a lawyer who represents John Larson, a former KPMG partner who is one of the 18 defendants, said prosecutors had withheld important information detailing, among other things, debate inside the I.R.S. over whether the shelters were legitimate.

Lawyers Argue KPMG Motions (WSJ)

By Paul Davies And Judith Burns

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

Federal prosecutors and lawyers for 18 defendants facing criminal charges over the sale of questionable tax shelters by KPMG LLP packed a Manhattan courtroom yesterday to argue over motions expected to impact the shape and scope of the case -- and whether it will go forward.

The defendants want the charges dropped, arguing they believed the tax shelters were legal. Prosecutors contend the shelters were sham products designed, sold and implemented to improperly avoid paying taxes. The shelters were sold to about 600 wealthy individuals from 1996 to 2002 and generated about $2.5 billion in tax savings, prosecutors say.

Lawyers for the defendants argued that a separate settlement KPMG reached with prosecutors last year has hampered their clients' defense. The deferred-prosecution agreement required KPMG to admit to criminal wrongdoing and pay $456 million to avoid a criminal indictment that probably would have put the firm out of business. It makes it difficult to get current KPMG employees to testify freely about the case, say defense lawyers.

They also claim prosecutors pressured KPMG into not paying legal costs for those who were indicted. Assistant U.S. Attorney Justin Weddle said the government played no role in KPMG's decision.

But U.S. District Judge Lewis Kaplan said he was "bothered" by the government's influence on KPMG's decision. "I think it's shameful and may be worse than that," Judge Kaplan said.

Separately, three former KPMG auditors settled with the Securities and Exchange Commission over the 2002 audit of Tenet Healthcare Corp. No fines were imposed.

How H&R Block Took Advantage Of Clients (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

In your March 24 editorial "The Spitzer Savings Plan" you reported that I was upset at the H&R Block Co.

That much is true.

Compared with the array of frauds my office has uncovered -- including biased stock research, improper trading of mutual funds and bid-rigging in the insurance industry -- H&R Block's conduct was in certain ways particularly egregious.

That's because the company was preying on lower-income people, steering them into individual retirement accounts that were virtually guaranteed to lose money because of high fees and low interest rates. And H&R Block had the audacity to suggest that it was actually doing people a favor. Here are the facts to show why that claim is absurd:

H&R Block told its tax preparation customers that its Express IRA "paid great rates" and was a "better way to save." Some 500,000 people signed up. But instead of receiving "great rates," the Express IRA actually paid less than 1% interest at times.

Most importantly, and this is the core of our case, H&R Block failed to tell customers that the Express IRA had substantial fees: a $15 account opening fee; a tax computing fee of up to $20; a $10 account maintenance fee; a $15 re-contribution fee; and a $75 withdrawal fee (later reduced to $25). Customers had no idea that when added together, the fees would exceed the interest paid for 85% of people who opened accounts.

Internal documents show that H&R Block's own tax preparers were appalled by this product and refused to recommend it because "clients won't be happy seeing their investments decreasing."

And the company's own CEO is on record acknowledging that his employees objected to the product because it would just "nickel and dime" their customers, but management went on touting this product without disclosing all the fees.

No true champion of free enterprise, as the Journal purports to be, would defend the failure to properly disclose fees to customers. And no one truly interested in encouraging people to save would recommend H&R Block's Express IRA. After all, how does losing money encourage anyone to save?

Finally, contrary to your characterizations, this case could easily have been settled if the company had simply agreed to return the undisclosed fees.

And for the record, I always get upset when I see people being cheated.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Some Speculate On Snow's Treasury Future (AP-Y2)

By Jeannine Aversa

AP2, March 30, 2006

The changing of the guard involving President Bush's chief of staff is renewing speculation about the fate of Treasury Secretary John Snow, the administration's lead economic salesman for three years.

"The president appreciates the job his economic team is doing," White House press secretary Scott McClellan told reporters Thursday, when asked about a New York Times story which said that Joshua Bolten, Bush's incoming chief of staff, wanted to make changes to the economics team and wanted to replace Snow. The Times cited unidentified sources for its story.

McClellan didn't rule out changes at the helm of Treasury, saying Bolten has the authority to recommend personnel changes throughout the Bush administration. But, McClellan added: "Any speculation at this point is way premature."

Bush announced on Tuesday that Bolten, the White House's budget director, would succeed longtime chief of staff Andy Card in mid April.

Snow, 66, took the top Treasury job after the president fired his first Treasury secretary, Paul O'Neill, whose blunt-speaking ways came to irk the White House as well as some Republican and Democratic lawmakers in Congress.

Amid the fresh speculation Thursday that his job could be in jeopardy, Snow said only: "I don't think it's helpful to make a comment on rumors from nameless sources."

A holder of a Ph.D in economics as well as a law degree, Snow had been chief of railroad giant CSX Corp. before taking over Treasury.

He arrived when the U.S. economy was still struggling to get back to full throttle after the 2001 recession and the nation's job market remained in fragile condition. During his tenure, the economy grew stronger and eventually the job market did, too.

Snow has traveled around the country and participated in TV and radio interviews promoting the president's economic policies — including advocacy for a series of tax cuts and for Congress to make them permanent, tax simplification and overhauling Social Security — which stalled out in Congress as Republicans and Democrats balked.

The Treasury secretary also plays an important role in international financial matters. Treasury spokesman Tony Fratto noted that Snow is gearing up for the meeting of the world's richest nations in Washington in late April.

The Treasury secretary also has an extensive travel schedule planned, Fratto said.

Shakeup's Follow-up: Cheney To The NFL? (USAT)

By Al Neuharth

USA Today, March 31, 2006

The Oval Office shakeup that President Bush's critics — and some of his close friends — have been calling for started this week with the "resignation" of chief of staff Andy Card. But for Bush to bounce back from plunging ratings, he must make more drastic White House reorganization. Two moves that might do the trick:

• Then name Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice vice president.

Go ahead, laugh. It may seem funny. But stranger things have happened in politics.

Cheney is the real albatross for Bush. Not only has he pushed the president to most of his bad decisions, but he flaunts them.

The Veep has said repeatedly he will not run for president in 2008. But at 65, he's too young to just shoot quail or other hunters or live quietly in his home state of Wyoming.

Many in demanding but low-paying public service jobs have eyed high salaries and fun in sports. Bush has called Major League Baseball commissioner an ideal job. Rice repeatedly has said her "dream job" was NFL commissioner, although she made the talk show circuit last weekend to pointedly disavow any such ambitions now.

Cheney, who demonstrated as Halliburton's boss that he likes money, makes only $212,000 a year as Veep. Tagliabue earned $8 million annually at the NFL.

If Bush wants a say in picking his successor, and most presidents do, replacing Cheney is a necessary first step. Finding other work for him now makes more sense than faking more serious heart problems to dump him later.

Replacing Cheney with Rice would make her the front-runner for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination.

Frist Isn't Leaving Behind A Lot Of Fans (LAT)

By Mary Curtius

The Los Angeles Times, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON -- As he prepares to leave the Senate and position himself for a presidential bid, Bill Frist faces mounting criticism that he has proved an ineffectual majority leader whose legislative agenda increasingly is dictated by his White House ambitions.

Complaints about the patrician Tennessean by fellow Republicans intensified this week, sparked by his decision to force a Senate debate on illegal immigration. Some GOP lawmakers say his move spotlighted a public squabble within the party over a hot-button issue in an election year.

"We should have had a much more ambitious process of trying to build consensus and bringing people and different views together before we engaged in debate on the Senate floor," Sen. Olympia Snowe, R-Maine, told reporters.

But grumbling about Frist and decisions he has made as majority leader were evident before the flap over immigration.

"People have noticed that the (Senate) agenda is driven, at least in part, by issues that he wants to have on the floor, to have accomplishments on," one senior GOP Senate aide said.

He and several other aides interviewed for this story were willing to discuss Frist only on the condition of anonymity, because they and their bosses still must work with him. But their comments reflected the growing discontent with his performance.

"I don't think that he's made much of an impression outside Washington as a strong leader," said David Keene, chairman of the American Conservative Union, a leading advocacy group among Republicans.

Frist declined to respond to the criticisms, but his aides vigorously disputed them. They also argued that he had compiled an impressive list of legislative accomplishments that he would add to before November's elections.

Frist had pledged to serve only two terms when he first campaigned for his Senate seat in 1994. He stood by that promise even after his surprise ascension to the majority leader's job in December 2002.

In the months he has left in the post, Frist must pick his way through a political minefield of legislation in a fiercely partisan atmosphere that makes it hard to achieve results. A dispute over his motives in the immigration debate illustrates the difficulties confronting him.

His decision to introduce a bill restricted largely to cracking down on illegal immigration was widely seen on Capitol Hill as a bid to bolster his credentials with the GOP faction that stoutly opposes any steps toward legalizing the status of undocumented immigrants.

"I don't believe that Senator Frist really seriously wants us to consider immigration reform," said Democratic Whip Dick Durbin of Illinois. "He's more intent on checking a box off of issues that came to the Senate floor this year than action. You can't discount his presidential ambition -- it clearly is part of his political calculus at this point."

Frist said he acted because he was determined to make progress on the issue. "I've got to keep the system moving," he recently told reporters.

But he may have been outmaneuvered by Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Penn., and a bipartisan group of senators pushing a measure that, along with beefing up border security, would allow millions of illegal immigrants to apply for citizenship.

After the immigration debate, Frist is expected to turn to other measures that play well with the Republican base, such as proposed constitutional amendments to ban flag burning and define marriage as between a man and a woman. Both amendments have failed to win the two-thirds majority needed to clear the chamber in the past.

He has promised to push for a permanent repeal of the estate tax, which already has been reduced substantively during the Bush administration. Democrats may use a filibuster to block a permanent repeal.

More mundane bills -- such as the spending measures that keep the government running -- may receive relatively little debate.

"Nobody is under the illusion that we will have substantial floor time for appropriations bills this year," a different senior Republican Senate aide said. "Appropriations bills are not sexy; they do not get a lot of positive headlines for the majority leader."

Frist's focus on proposals that might not advance could lend credence to critics' assessment that he has failed to effectively use his power to enact legislative priorities for the GOP.

Lott refused to elaborate.

"I think the No. 1 trait of a successful leader is the ability to make the trains run on time," said Keith Ashdown of Taxpayers for Common Sense, a government watchdog group. "(Frist) has had a lot of legislative trains run into each other."

Some Republicans worry that Frist has not delivered the legislative fruits that could help energize GOP voters -- many of whom are demoralized by the Iraq war and the steep federal budget deficit.

"This is almost April ... and what has the Senate gotten done?" a third senior GOP Senate aide said.

The aide noted that the Senate, under Frist's direction, spent much of the last few months rewriting lobbying rules and trying -- and so far failing -- to create a compensation fund for victims of asbestos exposure. Neither effort translates into accomplishments lawmakers can easily boast about in their districts, the third aide said.

"The first quarter is over, and we ain't scored no points."

Many conservatives fault Frist for failing to do more to stem federal spending as the budget deficit has soared.

"I think it is very important that he reconnect the Republicans on Capitol Hill with frustrated economic conservatives all across the country," said Pat Toomey, a former GOP House member from Pennsylvania who heads the conservative Club for Growth.

Frist's staff members say such criticisms are unfair.

"You can only judge him by his accomplishments, not the arbitrary yardsticks thrown around here in the run-up to the presidential campaign," said Eric Ueland, Frist's chief of staff.

Ueland ticked off Frist's successes: the appointment of two conservative Supreme Court justices and a half-dozen other federal judges whom Democrats had threatened to filibuster; an overhaul of the intelligence community; passage of the Medicare prescription-drug bill; a revision of bankruptcy laws.

His allies point out that increasing political polarization already had altered the Senate by the time Frist became its leader.

They also agree that Frist differs in style from most congressional leaders.

"He is a different creature" than the Senate is used to, said Amy Call, Frist's communications director. "He pushes the system, tests the system, finds solutions and brings them forward."

Frist -- a heart- and lung-transplant doctor whose Web site identifies him as: "Majority Leader Bill Frist, M.D." -- had cultivated an "outsider" identify at the start of his Senate career. He had never been a committee chairman when the White House backed him to replace Lott.

At the time, Frist's medical credentials and his relative lack of legislative experience were billed as pluses; he was a "fresh face" who seemed above the usual political fray.

But many colleagues clearly chafed at what they saw as his failure to abide by the Senate's traditions and rituals.

Thomas Mann, a political scientist at the Brookings Institution think tank who specializes in Congress, said Frist was "probably unique" as majority leader "in his lack of interest in the institution itself and lack of identity with, commitment to and understanding of it."

A Rebuke Rarely Exercised (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

When the nation was still young and the Constitution only 11 years old, Congress tried for the first time to censure a president.

The British Royal Navy was alleging that a seaman in custody in South Carolina was a fugitive. Without an investigation, President John Adams instructed a judge to turn the man, who said he was an American, over to the British.

This infuriated some in the House. Adams's opponents there sought in the spring of 1800 to adopt a resolution declaring his action "a dangerous interference of the Executive with Judicial Decisions."

But Adams had powerful defenders, including Rep. John Marshall, who later set many of the nation's founding constitutional principles as chief justice of the United States. Rep. William Craik argued that the House had neither "the power to censure or to approbate the conduct of the Executive," according to the Annals of Congress, but only to impeach him. The debate lasted two weeks, and in the end a vote to censure failed by nearly 2 to 1.

The question of censure is once again before Congress. This morning, the Senate Judiciary Committee meets to discuss a resolution introduced by Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) that would rebuke President Bush for his secret surveillance program. Old newspaper clippings and historical writings show that censure has a mixed record as an effective means for Congress to express disapproval of presidents.

Thirty-four years after the Adams episode, in March of the second year of the second term of President Andrew Jackson, the Senate rebuked the president in what remains the most famous case of censure.

In the campaign of 1832, Jackson and his opponent, Whig Party leader Sen. Henry Clay, had debated vigorously the merits of the Second Bank of the United States -- whose recharter Jackson had vetoed. After the president was reelected, the Whigs, who held a Senate majority over Jackson's Democrats, demanded a document he had read to his Cabinet regarding the bank.

When the president refused, according to Senate historians, the Senate voted 26 to 20 to declare the president "in derogation" of the Constitution. Jackson responded with a lengthy protest.

That was not the end of the story.

Three years later, Democrats regained the Senate majority and sought to repeal the censure. They called for the 1834 Senate journal to be brought forward, and the "secretary took up his pen, drew black lines around the censure text, and wrote 'Expunged,' " Senate historians have noted. "The chamber erupted in Democratic jubilation. . . . Dressed in the deep black of a mourner, Henry Clay lamented: 'The Senate is no longer a place for any decent man.' "

One reason censure has not had much legitimacy as a tool for rebuke is that it is expressed by a congressional resolution without the force of law, and "you can express a resolution that apple pie and motherhood are good for American life," says professor William W. Van Alstyne of the College of William & Mary law school. Yet it has kept on coming up.

In the 1860s, the House adopted a resolution censuring President James Buchanan for letting politics influence government contracts. The Senate, after Buchanan left office, debated whether to censure him for not stopping the Southern states from seceding from the Union, according to a report by the Congressional Research Service.

In the spring of 1951, Republicans were enraged that President Harry S. Truman had fired Gen. Douglas MacArthur as commander of the United Nations forces in Korea. A senator with White House ambitions, Richard M. Nixon (R-Calif.), suggested censuring the president. The call failed to gain support.

Censure has been proposed in more recent history by the president's supporters as an alternative to impeachment. During the Watergate scandal, House Minority Leader John J. Rhodes (R-Ariz.) signed on to a petition to consider censuring President Nixon, and a resolution was introduced, but the debate moved to impeachment.

During the Monica S. Lewinsky scandal eight years ago, censure as an alternative to impeachment was floated seriously in Congress. President Bill Clinton's supporters hoped that a compromise would avert removal from office and pay off politically because polls showed most Americans preferred censure.

A phrase coined during the debate, "censure-plus," would have involved a rebuke and a financial penalty. But ultimately House Republicans approved two articles of impeachment.

In the Senate in late 1998 and early 1999, censure seemed to have more support from Republicans, but Democrats were beginning to sense that the Senate would not vote to impeach. "We are now navigating in previously uncharted waters," Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.) said at the time. Ultimately, the Senate voted not to convict Clinton -- and that was it.

For George Washington University constitutional law professor Jonathan Turley, the Clinton episode, as well as the pending Feingold proposal, are characteristic of what censure is -- and is not.

"The Constitution places an obligation upon Congress to impeach a president who has committed a high crime or misdemeanor," he said. "We're often left with these ambiguous actions. Even if a censure vote passed, the president would simply blame it on politics."

House Passes Education Bill On Party Lines (NYT)

By Diana Jean Schemo

DOJ_NMG_0024600

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 30 —The House voted largely along party lines on Thursday to approve the main measure governing colleges and universities, adding provisions to expand student grants based on need and pressing colleges to control tuition. But the House rejected a Democratic proposal to halve the interest rate on student loans.

The $70 billion proposal, which would renew the law until 2012, sets the terms for loans and grants along with the limits for maximum aid. It was last renewed in 1998.

The floor debate showcased partisan differences over how to approach an era when increases in tuition routinely outpace inflation and the ability of many Americans to pay for college. Republicans, who are particularly striving to control a soaring budget deficit by avoiding new spending, said the bill would make college more affordable.

Democrats wanted to cut interest rates on student loans and enlarge Pell Grants, which had been frozen for several years.

In its final form, approved 221 to 199, the measure would simplify the financial aid application and make Pell Grants, the major grant that helps low- and middle-income students, available for summer study. The bill would also raise the spending cap on Pell Grants to $6,000, up from $5,800. The increase would be largely symbolic, however, as the maximum grant Congress appropriates has been frozen for four years at $4,050.

The bill would require colleges and universities that raise tuition at more than twice the rate of inflation for three years in a row to explain the increases. But lawmakers abandoned a provision that would have set off audits by the Education Department in the event of increases.

The bill would set the interest rate for subsidized loans at 6.8 percent, regardless of whether commercial rates rise or fall. Republicans defeated an amendment introduced by Representative George Miller of California, the ranking Democrat on the Education and Workforce Committee, to halve the interest rate on student loans over the next year.

In the floor debate over the last two days, the bill lost some of its most controversial proposals, programs that would have created a strong federal role in monitoring tuition increases and in reviewing the role of race in admissions decisions.

House Endorses Fuller Disclosure On College Costs (WSJ)

By John Hechinger

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

The House of Representatives passed a bill that mandates increased disclosure of college-pricing data and drops an antifraud measure that had curbed the growth of for-profit colleges, which are challenging traditional schools.

The College Access and Opportunity Act sparked complaints from Democrats and higher-education groups, though Republicans changed some measures at the last minute to mollify universities. The bill passed the Republican-controlled House largely on party lines, 221-199. The bill reauthorizes the Higher Education Act, which governs billions of dollars of federal funding for colleges and universities. The Senate is expected to take up its own version of the reauthorization in coming months.

One provision of the act would require public disclosure of data -- and an explanation -- from colleges that increase tuition by more than twice the rate of inflation over a three-year period.

Howard McKeon, the California Republican who chairs the House education committee, said in a statement that the measure adds "more sunlight" to the discussion about higher-education costs.

In response to criticism from colleges, Republicans agreed to drop a measure requiring colleges with big tuition increases to submit to the Department of Education a plan to hold down costs. Colleges argued that the requirement amounted to price control.

Another provision in the bill would ease a requirement that schools receive no more than 90% of their revenue from federal financial aid. The provision gives schools that exceed the 90% limit more time to return to compliance while making it easier for schools to meet compliance rules.

The 90% limit aimed to prevent the kind of fraud that occurred in the 1980s and 1990s, when some trade schools signed up unqualified low-income students in order to collect federal aid.

For-profit schools are most likely to bump against the 90% limit because they lack other funding sources.

In response to complaints from traditional colleges, Republicans dropped a provision that would have put for-profit schools on more-equal academic standing with established schools.

Originally, the bill would have barred schools from turning down credits solely based on a school's source of accreditation -- a common reason why traditional colleges reject coursework from students who attended for-profits. Under the bill that passed, schools can turn down the credits but must make public their credit-transfer policies.

House Passes Bill To Raise Pell Grant For Poor Students (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The House yesterday passed a bill that Republicans say will benefit all college students while Democrats say it does not go far enough to help students and their families afford higher education.

Representatives approved the measure on a 221-199 vote almost entirely along party lines. There were 14 Democrats who sided with the chamber's majority to pass the measure, called the College Access and Opportunity Act. Eighteen Republicans and one independent voted with the Democrats in protest.

The bill increases the Pell Grant program for poor students from $5,800 to $6,000 and simplifies the process for seeking financial aid. It also requires schools to report their tuition costs to the Department of Education so the figures can be posted on a Web site for students and parents to review when choosing colleges.

The measure authorizes more funding for educational programs serving minorities and requires schools make public their policies regarding transfer of credits. It also puts pressure on schools to keep tuition increases to a reasonable level.

Republicans applauded the passage of the bill, which renewed the Higher Education Act governing schools that receive federal money. It was last updated in 1998.

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican who authored the bill, accused Democrats of "playing politics with the education of American children."

Rep. Howard P. "Buck" McKeon, who took over for Mr. Boehner as chairman of the House Education and the Workforce Committee earlier this year, agreed. He said Democrats were intimately involved in the bill's crafting over the last three years and were supportive of it until recently.

"Education should not be a partisan issue," said Mr. Mc-Keon, California Republican.

Democrats, led by California Rep. George Miller, the ranking minority party member on the education committee, fought unsuccessfully for an amendment that would cut the interest rate on student loans from 6.8 percent to 3.4 percent, among other changes. It was defeated 220-200.

Mr. Miller said the $200 increase in the main bill was "interesting rhetoric," but said the Republicans have not included funds in the budget for the increase.

"It doesn't have any money for these low-income students to help cover the cost of their education," he said.

Mr. Miller criticized the $12.5 billion cut to financial aid programs that House Republicans approved earlier this year, comments echoed by his colleagues.

"I want our children and grandchildren to be able to pay for college," said Rep. Raul M. Grijalva, Arizona Democrat.

Republicans balked at Democrats' claims, and reminded lawmakers that education received cuts when the minority party was in power.

"Don't believe the hype," said Rep. Ric Keller, Florida Republican. "Not one student will receive less financial aid."

Arkansas Democrat-Gazette, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON — Arkansas' Rep. John Boozman was one of a dozen Republican congressmen who participated Wednesday in what he described as an "informal" meeting with President Bush.

The group talked in the White House living quarters. Boozman has been on several Air Force One flights, but he said this was his first meeting with the president "in this kind of setting."

In addition to discussing Iraq and immigration, the president asked members of the group what was on their minds.

"He wanted to know what was going on in our districts," Boozman said.

Boozman said he used the opportunity to discuss high energy costs, which he said hit rural constituents especially hard. Bush, Boozman said, reiterated his pledge to end America's "addiction" to foreign oil, and pushed participants to craft incentives for biodiesel and ethanol production.

Over the past week, Bush has initiated intimate "off the record" meetings with news reporters.

"He's isolated somewhat," Boozman said. "The way he overcomes that is by reaching out to people."

Boozman would not identify the other congressmen at the meeting.

Bush told his guests that the U.S. was gaining ground in the war in Iraq, according to Boozman. "He told us we will leave, but we will not surrender in Iraq," Boozman said. "He reassured us."

Bush also assured them that he was against amnesty for illegal immigrants, Boozman said.

A White House spokesman declined to comment on the meeting.

New NASA Policy Backs Free Discussion By Scientists (NYT)

By Warren E. Leary

WASHINGTON, March 30 — Two months after NASA's top climate scientist complained that political operatives in the agency's press office were trying to censor his views on global warming, Administrator Michael D. Griffin issued a new communications policy on Thursday that he called a "commitment to openness."

The policy, which details the role of those who release information to the public directly or through the news media, ensures that NASA scientists and engineers are free to discuss their work in public and state their opinions, Dr. Griffin said. When stating a personal opinion, he continued, they should make clear that they are speaking for themselves and not for the agency.

In a presentation to employees, and later during a telephone news conference, Dr. Griffin and Shana Dale, the deputy administrator, said the policy replaced a code, last updated in 1991, that was "not clear enough or articulate enough."

The agency came under fire when James E. Hansen, director of the Goddard Institute for Space Studies, a NASA office, told The New York Times in late January that the Bush administration had tried to stop him from speaking out after he gave a lecture in December calling for prompt reductions in emissions of greenhouse gases linked to global warming.

Dr. Hansen and several other employees of the agency said administration appointees in the public affairs office had demanded to review his lectures and publications in advance. In addition, he said, senior agency officials sought the right to stand in for him in interviews with reporters.

Other scientists also expressed concern when political appointees altered news releases and Internet presentations against their wishes.

After a barrage of complaints from lawmakers and scientific organizations, Dr. Griffin appointed a 12-member group of senior NASA scientists and public affairs officials to draft a new public communications policy.

In an interview on Thursday, Dr. Hansen said that the revised policy was "definitely better" than before and that his latest dealings with NASA public affairs had been much improved.

"I'm very optimistic," he said. "Things have changed dramatically since this became a public issue. This has been a healthy exercise, and hopefully similar things will happen at other agencies that have had similar problems."

Dr. Griffin said political appointees would continue to work at NASA, as is customary under any administration, but would not unduly influence the new openness policy. Dean Acosta, a spokesman, said there were five political appointees among the agency's 300-member public affairs staff, and about 18 in all positions throughout NASA.

In the news conference, Dr. Griffin also addressed recent criticism suggesting that at a Rotary Club gala in Texas last week, he endorsed Representative Tom DeLay for re-election. Mr. DeLay, who gave up his post as House majority leader in September after being indicted in a campaign finance case, represents a district that includes the Johnson Space Center in Houston.

The NASA chief has said that although he is entitled to issue political endorsements under certain circumstances, he will not. On Thursday he said he had not endorsed Mr. DeLay at the gathering but rather, in response to a gracious introduction from the congressman, had praised his support for the space program. While confirming his words, quoted in The Houston Chronicle, Dr. Griffin added that they were not as precise as they should have been and had been "grossly misinterpreted."

"The space program," Dr. Griffin said at the gala, "has had no better friend in its entire existence than Tom DeLay. He's still with us, and we need to keep him there."

Dr. Griffin said Thursday that he had meant keeping Mr. DeLay's support for the space program.

"I regret the inartful choice of words," he said. "I'm not endorsing anybody. I don't intend to."

NASA Sets New Rules On Media (WP)

By Rick Weiss

NASA Administrator Michael D. Griffin unveiled new rules yesterday that govern the release of agency information to news media and the public, his most detailed response yet to embarrassing allegations that NASA's public affairs office had sought to suppress the release of scientific information not consistent with the views of the Bush administration.

The new eight-page policy, written by an internal team of scientists, lawyers, public affairs specialists and managers, states that NASA scientists are free to talk to members of the media about their scientific findings and even express personal interpretations of those findings -- the heart of the controversy that has engulfed the agency since January.

It also makes clear that scientists are not required to have a public affairs officer with them when they speak with members of the media, though Griffin emphasized yesterday in comments broadcast to NASA employees that he believes such behavior is unwise.

"If you're not a media professional, then to go into an interview without a media professional is courting trouble," he said. "But you can do as you like."

Griffin had promised the revamped policy in February, after NASA employees complained publicly that information had been manipulated in ways that suited the Bush administration.

In some instances, employees said, scientists who had generated data on global climate change that did not jibe with administration policies had been muzzled or closely monitored by public affairs officials. In another instance, a public affairs employee appointed by the White House sought to weaken agency references to the Big Bang, the scientific and distinctly non-biblical explanation for the birth of the universe.

That employee has since left the agency amid questions about the accuracy of his résumé.

House Science Committee Chairman Sherwood L. Boehlert (R-N.Y.) praised the new policy, which he said "puts a premium on open communication." NASA's approach, he said in a statement, "should become a model for the entire federal government."

The first of five principles in the new policy statement declares that NASA "is committed to a culture of openness" and assures the public that agency information "will be accurate and unfiltered."

The policy calls for appropriate editing of news releases and other public documents to ensure clarity. "However," the policy states, "such editing shall not change scientific or technical data, or the meaning of programmatic content."

It calls upon all NASA employees to coordinate with public affairs officials before releasing information "that has the potential to generate significant media, or public interest or inquiry." Employees are also encouraged "to the maximal extent practicable" to have a public affairs officer present at media interviews "to attest to the content of the interview, support the interviewee, and provide post-interview follow-up with the media as necessary."

But that advice, Griffin said during his 45-minute broadcast to all of NASA's far-flung facilities, "is not an absolute requirement." He also stressed that when speaking to the public, employees should clearly distinguish between agency findings and personal interpretations.

Griffin faced tough questions from employees after his presentation. One asked whether the remaining 20 or so political appointees on the NASA payroll were having their backgrounds and résumés checked.

Griffin said no such review was underway, adding that "I personally make no distinction" between political appointees and the agency's 17,000-plus career employees.

NASA has five political appointees among about 300 personnel in its public affairs offices, an agency official later said.

Another employee asked about comments Griffin made at a recent celebratory event, in which the administrator thanked former House majority leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) for his long-standing support of NASA. "He's still with us and we need to keep him there," Griffin said at the event -- a comment some interpreted as an inappropriate reelection endorsement.

Griffin explained yesterday that he meant "we need to keep him as a friend" and apologized for his "inartful choice of words."

In a conversation with reporters later, Griffin expressed optimism that the space shuttle will fly in July. If that flight goes well, he said, he plans to schedule a flight to repair the Hubble Space Telescope in late 2007 or early 2008.

He also confirmed rumors that a workshop scheduled for this summer to discuss exploration of the moon and beyond will include officials from the increasingly ambitious Chinese space program.

GOP, Dems Spar Over McKinney Incident (USAT/AP)

By Laurie Kellman, The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — House Republicans and Democrats engaged in their own scuffle — but just a rhetorical one — Thursday, a day after Rep. Cynthia McKinney had a dustup with a Capitol Police officer.

The incident occurred after an officer did not recognize the Georgia Democrat as she was entering a House office building and asked her to stop. According to one account, McKinney struck the officer.

Capitol Police could ask the U.S. Attorney's Office to file charges against McKinney, who represents Atlanta suburbs. No decision had been announced as of Thursday.

She said the police officer was not at fault.

“I would not make a big deal of this,” said Pelosi, D-Calif.

Ron Bonjean, spokesman for House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., responded, “How many officers would have to be punched before it becomes a big deal?”

McKinney's office said she was planning to hold a news conference this morning.

Late Wednesday night, she issued a statement saying she regretted the confrontation.

The Capitol Police face a difficult task: trying to protect 535 members of Congress and the vast Capitol complex in an atmosphere thick with politics and privilege.

The Reliable Source (WP)

By Amy Argetsinger and Roxanne Roberts

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

More Ado About the Do

After hours of silence, it was nearly midnight Wednesday before Rep. Cynthia McKinney put out a statement about her scuffle with a Capitol Police officer that day. The Georgia Democrat said she regretted the "unfortunate confrontation" that occurred when the officer did not recognize her at a checkpoint and she allegedly jabbed him with her cellphone.

But McKinney, who recently swapped her braids for a shorter do, also admitted that she was not wearing the pin that identifies her as a member of Congress entitled to bypass Hill security checks. Why not? John Judge , a McKinney staffer, said that "a number of the women [in Congress] don't wear the pin, and some men don't either. . . . They train [officers] to recognize the members. It's not just the pin."

A similar sentiment was expressed in what Atlanta station WSB-TV described as McKinney's "original" statement, which she decided against releasing. "It is . . . a shame that while I conduct the country's business, I have to stop and call the police to tell them that I've changed my hairstyle so that I'm not harassed at work."

McKinney also released a snippet from a documentary in which she is seen being greeted with a warm hug by a black officer -- then stopped by a white officer asking for ID. "That's just the typical kind of treatment that I receive," McKinney said on the video. "Some things never change -- that's what Tupac said."

Back during the heady days of the 2000 George W. Bush campaign, new White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten was known as a cool, efficient policy director, and the go-to man when actress-turned-Republican-gadfly Bo Derek -- the woman who inspired the numerical system of hotness ratings -- needed a campaign escort.

When Bolten turned 46 that August, Dubya refused to believe his staffer had received a "Happy Birthday" phone call from the star of "10" and many legendary Playboy features -- until he grabbed Bolten's cell phone and dialed the number from the last received call, according to a source who was there. When Derek answered, the future president said, "Bo, let me just say that you and Josh together are a perfect 15."

FAA Files Complaint After Union Talks Break Down (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Contract talks between the Federal Aviation Administration and its second-largest union fell apart yesterday amid a set of unusual maneuvers.

Shortly after noon, the leaders of the Professional Airways Systems Specialists announced they had agreed to the agency's contract terms and would send the agreement to union members -- but with full confidence that the rank and file would turn it down.

Within hours, the FAA said it planned to file an unfair labor practice complaint against the union -- a step usually taken by unions, not the government.

The breakdown in talks came after the FAA and the union held their second negotiating session out of six agreed to in ground rules for the talks. The rules called for the negotiations to end by July 21.

The union, known as PASS, represents more than 11,000 FAA and Defense Department employees who install, maintain and certify air traffic control equipment, inspect and oversee commercial and general aviation industries, and help develop flight procedures. The contract talks were focused on about 7,000 air traffic technical employees, the union said.

The FAA has taken a tough stance in contract talks over the last year, seeking changes in pay, leave and work rules. It is engaged in especially contentious bargaining with the National Air Traffic Controllers Union, and both sides recently agreed to mediation to extend those talks.

If the FAA and its unions fail to reach agreements on contract extensions, the agency may declare an impasse, which sends such disputes to the Republican-controlled Congress for a 60-day review. If Congress takes no action -- more likely than not -- then the FAA's last, best offer can be imposed on the unions.

The FAA also is one of only a few government agencies that can negotiate with unions over compensation, and it hopes to use contract talks to reduce labor costs and fold union employees into pay-for-performance systems.

Mike Derby , general counsel for PASS, said the FAA's initial proposal would have denied a pay increase to the union members for seven years. "How could that be characterized as fair and efficient?" he said.

In a statement yesterday, Tom Brantley , president of PASS, said the union had accepted the FAA contract proposal after concluding that the agency was not negotiating in good faith. "I am confident that PASS members will vote down the contract offer, which will send PASS and the FAA back to the bargaining table. Hopefully, the FAA will learn a lesson," Brantley said.

A union spokeswoman said a ratification vote would probably take about 90 days. A rejection would then lead to a new round of negotiations, she said.

Greg Martin , the FAA spokesman, said the agency will file a complaint with the Federal Labor Relations Authority that charges PASS with failing to bargain in good faith.

He said he could not discuss specifics of the contract talks but noted that at least 40 contract provisions had not been discussed at the bargaining table. "What we have here is a clear delay tactic," Martin said.

DOJ_NMG_0024606

He added, "Unfortunately, PASS has resorted to stunts. . . . By engaging in this stunt, they are creating a crisis where none exists."

Derby said the FAA's decision to file a complaint "sounds like a stunt to me."Retirements

Laura B. Antle , human resources officer at the Justice Department's Office of the Inspector General, will retire April 1 after 32 years of federal service.

Romana Danysh , a historian at the U.S. Army Center of Military History, will retire April 2 after more than 41 years of federal service, all of them at the Center of Military History.

Nancy Leonard , a public health adviser for the Food and Drug Administration, retires today after 41 years of federal service . She serves as the FDA breast implant specialist and public affairs liaison to field and district offices and is a steward and a vice president in the National Treasury Employees Union.Talk Shows

Randy E. Dobbs , chief executive of USIS, which conducts background investigations on federal employees, will be the guest on "Fedtalk" at 11 a.m. today on federalnewsradio.com and WFED radio (1050 AM).

Matthew Miszewski , chief information officer for the state of Wisconsin, will be the guest on "The IBM Business of Government Hour" at 9 a.m. Saturday on WJFK radio (106.7 FM).

Vietnam Vets Visitor Center A Step Closer (WP)

By Petula Dvorak

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

For most groups, it takes years and years of reports, presentations, studies, meetings and approvals before a slice of precious federal land is turned over for a memorial in the nation's capital.

But for Jan C. Scruggs, it may be a matter of months.

With a 404 to 4 vote in the House on Tuesday night, Scruggs, president and founder of the Vietnam Veteran's Memorial Fund, is on the way to getting Congress, rather than a long-standing group of commissions that has a rigorous selection process, to approve a sprawling, underground visitor center near the Vietnam Veterans Memorial and at the foot of the Lincoln Memorial. The legislation is now before the Senate.

"I felt compelled to take this unusual action in direct response to what I believe is the unreasonable bureaucracy choreographed by the National Capital Planning Commission," said Rep. Richard W. Pombo (R-Calif.), while arguing on behalf of the bill Tuesday.

Pombo, who sponsored the bill, said he met with the chairman of the planning commission before he was convinced that legislation was the only answer to get site approval for the center, which was authorized by Congress in November 2003.

But the planning commission has had the site proposal for only a few months -- since September -- and asked for Scruggs's group to submit a federally mandated environmental report for a preferred site and one other location. That submission would be used for another review of the proposal, said Marcel C. Acosta, deputy executive director of the planning commission.

Congress approved the creation of an underground center in 2003 as an addition to the Wall. The veterans group spent almost two years on its own analysis, which detailed several sites and recommended a triangle of land in Northwest Washington between Henry Bacon Drive, 23rd Street and Constitution Avenue NW.

The analysis was not presented to the planning commission until last fall, Acosta said.

Ordinarily, the commission has time to review the report, and the public has an opportunity to weigh in on the project's site. Just two years ago, a small group of neighbors on Capitol Hill used this process to prevent a memorial to victims of communism from being erected on a grassy, pocket park. The creators of a planned memorial to the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. said they appreciated the 18-month review process that whittled down 12 potential sites to the final selection in December of a spot along the Tidal Basin.

"The way this bill is written . . . it eliminates the federal review process and public input" and goes against the National Environmental Policy Act and the National Historic Preservation Act, Acosta said.

The bill also sets a precedent for future memorials and monuments," said Rep. Earl Blumenauer (D-Ore.), who spoke against the bill Tuesday night.

"It just broke my heart. I don't know how something like this gets jammed through," Blumenauer said.

"The message this sends is: 'Don't spend the time on good design when you have a project like this. Just hire a lobbyist. Spend the money on PR,' " he added.

The center's design calls for an 8,000-square-foot underground space, which may include a movie theater, a three-dimensional battle scene, mementos left at the memorial and a wall where pictures of slain soldiers will be projected on their birthdays.

The understated nature of the Wall has long troubled some veterans who believe it fails to give adequate context for the war and the rich detail of lives lost. The new center is designed to help educate a generation of visitors younger than the 24-year-old wall itself, Scruggs said.

But some members of the commission staff believe that the lessons don't have to take place at the foot of the Lincoln Memorial. Some opposed the site that the House approved this week and asked Scruggs to look at other locations, including a grassy rise north of the Wall in Constitution Gardens, another site near the National Park Service's stable on the other side of the Reflecting Pool and one between the Interior Department's south building and Constitution Avenue NW.

The legislation authorizing the visitor center said it will be "at or near the Wall." Scruggs, determined to make sure the center will be comfortably close to the Wall, hired an urban anthropologist from Howard University to generate an 11-page analysis of the phrase "at or near" to make his point.

HERE'S A SIMPLE way to judge the lobbying reform bill just approved by the Senate: The leading advocates of reform, including the parties' two designated point men on the issue, Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Barack Obama (D-Ill.), all voted against it. Their objection to the measure, which passed the Senate 90 to 8 on Wednesday, isn't about what's in it but what's missing.

The measure improves the existing system. It would stop lobbyists from paying -- at least directly -- for meals and gifts for lawmakers. It would make it easier to identify which lawmakers sought government funding for earmarked pet projects, and easier to knock those earmarks (along with other provisions inserted at the last minute) out of House-Senate conference reports. Lawmakers would have to provide more detailed disclosure of the privately financed trips they take; under a little-noticed amendment, lobbyists couldn't arrange trips or go on them. Lobbyists would have to include on their reports the campaign contributions they make to lawmakers, the fundraisers they host and the donations they steer to lawmakers' charities. The bill would double -- from one year to two -- the waiting period for lawmakers who become lobbyists to buttonhole their former colleagues. All this is good -- as far as it goes.

But the measure doesn't include any new enforcement mechanism: an important proposal for a new Office of Public Integrity, an independent, nonpartisan entity empowered to conduct investigations and make recommendations to the House and Senate ethics committees, failed on the Senate floor, as it had in committee. It doesn't clamp down on lawmakers' ability to accept cut-rate jet travel from companies with interests before them. In fact, it doesn't put any new restrictions on the kinds of privately underwritten trips that lawmakers can accept.

It doesn't prohibit lobbyists and those they represent from footing the bill for lavish parties, at political conventions or elsewhere, honoring lawmakers. We could go on, but you get the point: Much more could, and should, have been done.

If the Senate bill is disappointing, though, the House is poised to do even worse. A proposal unveiled last month by the Republican leadership would do nothing to restrict gifts from lobbyists. It would merely impose a temporary moratorium on privately funded travel while the ethics committee studies what to do -- or, more cynically, while members wait for the storm over Jack Abramoff to blow over. It suffers from the same shortcomings as the Senate measure in terms of enforcement and corporate jets.

As the proposal moves forward -- the House Rules Committee held a hearing on it yesterday -- a critical issue will be whether and how many amendments will be permitted on the House floor to try to make it tougher. It would be the height of irony if an effort to improve the functioning of the democratic process were to take place under undemocratic conditions.

Lobby Reform Lite (NYT)

With the ghost of Jack Abramoff, the recently sentenced rogue lobbyist, wafting above the debate, the Senate has voted for a halfhearted package of reforms that would come nowhere near curing the easy money, quid pro quo culture that now bedevils the Capitol.

Facing voters' flagging confidence, the Senate chose to emphasize greater disclosure by lobbyists while rejecting such vital reforms as the creation of an independent office to investigate ethics abuses. The instinct to protect privileged clubbiness carried the day, most glaringly when the Senate spiked any idea of ending lawmakers' shameless use of the executive jets so eagerly offered by corporate officials bent on insider access.

Constituents who are grateful to see even the slightest sign of reform will be happy that the senators have voted to extend to two years the mandatory waiting time before a former lawmaker can strike it rich as a lobbyist. The current wait is one year. The bill also takes the first steps toward uncovering the stealthy world of grass-roots lobbying investments in lawmakers' home districts.

The Senate bill would make it harder — but by no means impossible — for members to quietly "earmark" pork projects in the budget at the behest of lobbyists. But even such an obvious reform as banning meals and gifts from lobbyists came equipped with a gaping loophole so the corporate employers of lobbyists could still pick up those checks.

The unfinished ethics agenda begins with the most critical issue of all: an end to the pervasive role of lobbyists as campaign finance brokers and money bundlers for incumbent politicians. It's reached the point where the people's representatives blatantly designate lobbyists to head their fund-raising teams. This moneyed back-scratching is the seedbed for scandal, but neither house shows any appetite to confront it.

Also ignored was a ban on lawmakers' junketeering at the expense of special-interest check writers. The Senate chose instead to require prior approval of private trips by its spineless ethics committee, a step that would hardly mitigate the cheesiness. Taxpayers, not corporate sponsors, should pay for global fact-finding.

For all its shortcomings, the Senate is a light-year ahead of the House. There, reform proposals have been parceled out to committees for indefinite marination as Republican leaders face rebellious members who want no part of real reform. The chances seem slim for two-house action that truly dents the clout of the booming lobbying industry.

Fed Analysts Say Low Jobless Rate Doesn't Mask Labor Market Woes (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON -- U.S. unemployment really is low and the jobless rate hasn't been artificially depressed by a failure of many discouraged workers to be counted as unemployed, Federal Reserve researchers say.

Their findings, presented at a conference organized by the Brookings Institution, suggest the Fed could see strong job growth as an inflationary risk in the coming year. The study also argues that the economy's trend growth rate will slow noticeably in the coming decade as growth in the working-age population slows and a shrinking share of that population seeks work.

The study wades into a controversy over the failure of more people to seek work since the recession ended in 2001. The "participation rate" -- the proportion of working-age people working or looking for work -- peaked at 67.3% in 2000, fell to 65.8% in March 2005, and has since recovered to 66.1%, below where it stood for most of the 1990s.

Some economists argue the low participation rate means many people aren't seeking work because they believe no desirable work is available and aren't counted as unemployed. The economists believe the unemployment rate -- which at 4.8% in February was low enough to qualify as "full employment" in many conventional views -- may mask underlying labor-market weakness. A staff study by the Federal Reserve Bank of Boston a year ago argued the unemployment rate, then about 5.4%, might understate the actual degree of unemployment by one to three percentage points.

The latest Fed report disagrees.

"The low level of the participation rate is not artificially masking the extent of unemployment," said the study by Fed staff economists Stephanie Aaronson, Bruce Fallick, Andrew Figura, Jonathan Pingle and William Wascher. It doesn't necessarily represent the views of Fed policy makers. "The unemployment rate is providing a reasonably accurate picture of the state of the labor market."

It is common for the participation rate to rise during expansions as previously discouraged workers start looking for work in response to the increased availability of jobs and for it to decline during recessions as job openings dry up. That is the main reason the participation rate rose in the late 1990s then fell in 2001, the study says. Its continued fall in 2002 and 2003 was due to both economic weakness and emerging structural factors, while its failure to rise much since is mostly from structural factors, the study says.

Corporate Pretax Profits Jump 14.4% (WSJ)

By Mark Whitehouse

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

Corporate America's share of the nation's income rebounded from the havoc of Hurricane Katrina to a level not seen in four decades, and the hurricane did a bit less damage to the U.S. economy than previously thought.

The Commerce Department said yesterday that corporate pretax profits in the fourth quarter of 2005 grew 14.4% from the previous quarter, the strongest rate since 1992. Pretax profits in the third quarter fell 4% as hurricane-related insurance payouts slammed financial results.

Corporate profits accounted for 11.6% of gross domestic product in the fourth quarter -- the biggest share of the nation's income companies have taken since 1966. They have been able to do so, say economists, by sharing less with their workers.

"It highlights the increased power of corporate America versus labor," says Paul Kasriel, chief economist at Northern Trust Corp. in Chicago. "That is a reflection of the global competition that labor now faces in America."

Economists say profit growth is likely to ebb this year as U.S. unemployment falls and workers regain some bargaining power. In the meantime, companies might reinvest some of their gains, giving the economy added momentum.

"Corporations are sitting on a mountain of cash, so as long as the economy is growing they will start spending some of that cash," says Nariman Behravesh, chief economist at Global Insight, an economic consultancy in Waltham, Mass.

The Commerce Department also reported that real gross domestic product -- the value of the nation's output of goods and services, adjusted for inflation -- grew at a seasonally adjusted, annualized rate of 1.7% in the fourth quarter. The figure was revised up from an earlier estimate of 1.6% but remains the lowest rate recorded since early 2003. For the full year, GDP grew 3.5%.

The small, upward revision in fourth-quarter GDP reflects the fact that companies restocked inventories faster than expected in Katrina's wake. Now, many forecasters believe the economy is experiencing a posthurricane boost as strong demand for consumer and business products has elevated business activity, prompting companies to step up hiring.

"The first quarter is going to be very firm," says Jan Hatzius, chief U.S. economist at Goldman Sachs Group Inc. in New York, who estimates that GDP in the first quarter, which ends today, grew at a 4.5% annual rate.

The consensus estimate of economists polled by WSJ.com1 is that GDP grew at an annual rate of 4.6% in the first quarter, but the growth rate will slow to 3.3% in the second quarter and could be around 2.9% by the end of the year.

The factors that crimped growth in the fourth quarter were largely temporary. Katrina and an unusually cold December took a toll on hiring and consumer spending. Defense spending dropped because of the late signing of an appropriations bill, and special short-term auto discounts prompted people to buy cars earlier in the year.

Now, the picture for jobs and spending looks a lot better. The Labor Department yesterday reported a drop in the number of people filing for unemployment benefits to 302,000 in the week ended March 25, down 10,000 from the previous week.

Companies added an estimated 243,000 jobs in February, bringing the 12-month total to 2.1 million. And despite slow auto sales, total retail sales in February were up 6.7% from February 2005.

Economy Gets Good News And Bad News (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

WASHINGTON — U.S. corporate profits surged at the fastest pace in four years during the final months of 2005, but inflation also jumped as the nation grappled with the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, the government said Thursday.

Businesses enjoyed a 13.8% increase in after-tax profits in the fourth quarter of 2005, a sharp rebound from the 4.3% decline in the previous quarter, the Commerce Department said. The pace of growth was the fastest since an 18.1% rise in late 2001.

In addition, a special inflation measure based on actual spending patterns, closely watched by the Federal Reserve, rose faster than expected. Commerce's index of consumer inflation, excluding food and energy, was revised to a 2.4% annual rate in the fourth quarter of 2005, from an earlier 2.1% estimate. That was far higher than the 1.4% rate of the previous quarter.

Nariman Behravesh, chief economist at Global Insight, called the report a case of good news, bad news. On the plus side, corporations are flush with cash and likely to use some of that money for capital spending. On the downside, higher inflation could be a danger sign for the Federal Reserve as it debates whether to continue raising interest rates.

Most Fed officials prefer a core inflation range of about 1% to 2%. To keep inflation in line, the Fed has been gradually raising its target for short-term rates since mid-2004 when they stood at 1%. The Fed Tuesday pushed rates to 4.75%, saying more increases were possible.

"If inflation continues to creep up, the Fed may have to hike rates more," Behravesh said. "There is a growing risk that the (Fed) may have to push rates up to 5.25% or even 5.5%."

In its report, Commerce said overall economic growth was a bit higher than previously reported in the fourth quarter of 2005. Gross domestic product, the broadest measure of the nation's goods and services, grew at a 1.7% annual pace in the fourth quarter, up from a previous 1.6% forecast.

Growth was lackluster compared with the 4.1% pace in the third quarter. Economists say, however, that the economy recovered from Katrina and Hurricane Rita in strong fashion. Global Insight pegs first-quarter growth at a 4% to 4.5% rate; others say it could be higher. Economists generally expect the economy to cool later in the year as the housing market pulls back.

In a note to clients, Moody's Economy.com noted that after-tax profits as a share of GDP surged to a record high in the fourth quarter. That could help tamp down inflationary pressures, because businesses will have more latitude to absorb higher production costs. But the firm expects profits to decline ahead as wages accelerate due to a tighter labor market. It also expects economic growth to slow to a 3% pace later this year.

Markets Mixed On Inflation Outlook (USAT/BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

USA Today, March 31, 2006

Stocks fell Thursday as the inflation outlook worsened, renewing concern the Federal Reserve will keep raising interest rates.

The Dow Jones industrial average sank 65 points to 11,150.70, and the Standard & Poor's 500 lost 2.64 points to 1300.25. The Nasdaq, though, bucked the downdraft and gained 3.04 points to 2340.82.

Companies most sensitive to changes in borrowing costs, including banks and utilities, declined after the government said an inflation gauge watched by the Fed rose more than first reported. (Story, 6B.) The revision sent the yield on 10-year Treasury notes to the highest in 22 months. Oil prices reached a two-month high, also weighing on stocks.

"If people sense that there's inflation pressure, then they worry that the Fed isn't done," says Kevin Bannon, chief investment officer at Bank of New York Co. "The market cares because the Fed cares."

The losses were limited as an increase in a Nokia forecast for mobile-phone sales buoyed technology shares. The Nasdaq composite index set a five-year high for a second consecutive day.

Rising oil prices added to inflation concerns. Crude for May delivery jumped 70 cents to $67.15 a barrel in New York, the highest close since Jan. 31, amid declining U.S. gasoline inventories and as the United Nations Security Council asked Iran to curb its nuclear program. The yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note increased to 4.86% from 4.81% on Wednesday.

"We're struggling with a couple headwinds: interest rates, the Fed hiking and also oil prices," says Henry "Chip" Dickson, chief U.S. strategist at Lehman Bros. "We need oil prices to stabilize, and we need the Fed to stop."

General Motors, the world's largest automaker, fell $1.09 to $21.06 for the worst performance in the Dow. GM, raising cash after $10.6 billion in losses last year, said it's in talks to sell shares of Japan's Isuzu Motors.

•Nokia jumped $1.06 to $21.28. The company expects growth in the global handset market of 15% on demand in China and India, up from its previous estimate of at least 10%.

•ATI Technologies, the No. 2 maker of computer-graphics chips, rallied $1.32 to $17.05. The company said fiscal second-quarter profit, excluding some costs, was 17 cents a share on revenue of $672 million. Analysts, on average, expected 13 cents on sales of $643.8 million, Thomson Financial says.

Stocks Decline On Rate Worries (WSJ)

By Scott Patterson

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

Investors thinking they had heard the all-clear signal were ambushed Thursday by a sudden jump in interest rates.

Wednesday, stocks rallied as Wall Street shrugged off the Federal Reserve's latest rate increase. But a selloff on the bond market drove stocks lower as the yield on the 10-year Treasury note leapt past 4.8% to its highest level since June 2004.

Tony Crescenzi, chief bond-market strategist at Miller Tabak, said several factors were behind the bond selling. Chief among them: a revised increase in a key inflation measure closely watched by the Federal Reserve.

In its final reading on fourth-quarter gross domestic product1 growth in the U.S., which showed the economy grew by 1.7% in the final three months of 2005, the government's price index for personal consumption, excluding food and energy, rose 2.4 %, up from the previously estimated 2.1%. The Fed prefers the measure to remain at or below 2%, said Mr. Crescenzi in a note. "The data are raising concerns about the Fed," the analyst wrote.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average fell 65 points to 11150.70, weighed down by a 4.9% loss by General Motors. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 2.64 to 1300.25 and the Nasdaq Composite Index added 3.04 to 2340.82.

Crude-oil futures gained 70 cents to $67.15 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange. The April contract for Comex gold surged $13.40 to $586.70 a troy ounce, hitting its highest level since January 1981.

Investors are growing increasingly jittery about higher interest rates, concerned that they will result in a slowing economy. Higher rates make it tougher for businesses to expand and more difficult for consumers to spend on credit. They also make bonds more attractive. A risk-free yield of 4.75% could be tempting to investors growing increasingly wary of stocks, said Owen Fitzpatrick, managing director at Deutsche Bank Private Wealth Management.

"Money could start to float over into the bond market," he said. "Now it becomes more of a legitimate investment choice" to stocks, which will need to offer a higher rate of return to reward investors for the risk they take that stock prices could fall.

Not everyone is unnerved by the move higher by interest rates. James Paulsen, chief investment strategist at Wells Capital Management, points out that markets and interest rates world-wide have been rising in unison in 2006. And since yields remain relatively low on a historical basis, the economy should still be able to chug along in 2006, and earnings will continue to grow at a solid pace. "I'm not convinced [higher rates are] going to mean the run for stocks" is over, he said.

As the Fed move recedes into investors' rearview mirror, first-quarter earnings reports are increasingly coming into focus. Analysts surveyed by Thomson Financial expect companies in the S&P 500 to post earnings growth of 11.3% in the first quarter, which would be the 10th consecutive quarter of double-digit growth. Thomson expects earnings to grow 12.4% in 2006.

Investors also weighed a wave of news on the merger-and-acquisition front Thursday. Nasdaq Stock Market decided to pull7 its $4.2 billion offer for the London Stock Exchange. Bank of New York jumped more than 4% on reports that J.P. Morgan Chase is close to a deal to buy as many as 300 of its retail branches for up to $4 billion. Shares of Maytag, which surged 28 % in the final minutes of trading Wednesday on news that8 the Justice Department approved Whirlpool's $1.79 billion acquisition of the home-appliance maker, slid 1.9% Thursday.

Shares of Nokia jumped 5.2% after the world's biggest mobile phone maker said it expects industrywide growth of 15% or more in 2006, up from previous expectations for growth of 10%. Shares of rival Motorola rose nearly 1%.

In major market action:

Stocks were mixed9. On the New York Stock Exchange, where 1.6 billion shares traded, 1,421 stocks rose and 1,877 fell. On the Nasdaq Stock Market, where 2.2 billion shares traded, 1,518 rose and 1,514 declined.

Bonds declined10. The benchmark 10-year Treasury shed 12/32 point, or $3.75 per $1,000 invested, to yield 4.857%. The 30-year bond fell 27/32 to yield 4.895%. Yields move inversely to prices.

The dollar declined.11 It traded at 117.34 yen, down from 117.83 yen late Wednesday, while the euro rose to $1.2155 from $1.2024.

Church Sex Abuse Costs Rise Despite Drop In New Allegations (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The financial costs of the sex abuse scandal in the Roman Catholic Church rose dramatically in 2005, even as the number of new allegations fell, the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops said yesterday.

Releasing an annual report on their efforts to prevent abuse of minors by priests, the bishops said U.S. dioceses spent $399 million last year on legal settlements with sex abuse victims and $68 million on lawyers' fees, psychological counseling and related expenses -- about three times more than they paid in 2004.

The church's cumulative expenditures on sex abuse claims in the United States are approaching $1.5 billion. The tally of known victims has topped 12,500. The number of priests and deacons who have been credibly accused since 1950 is close to 5,000.

In releasing the blizzard of statistics, Catholic Church officials and their academic consultants put a generally positive gloss on the data, suggesting that the worst of the crisis is over.

Karen Terry, a researcher at the John Jay College of Criminal Justice in New York, said the vast majority of the abuse took place from the mid-1960s to the mid-1980s. There has been a sharp decline in the number of cases since the early 1990s, which an analysis indicates is not just a matter of a lag in reporting, she said.

"We know that sexual abuse is underreported and that more people will come forward," she said. "But the decrease in sexual abuse cases is real." She added that the decline mirrors the general societal decrease in crime, substance abuse and sex abuse in the 1990s.

Teresa M. Kettelkamp, a former Illinois state police officer who heads the bishops' Office of Child and Youth Protection, said "it is important to acknowledge how much has been done" to remove abusers from the priesthood, including 57 priests who were suspended in 2005.

She said U.S. dioceses have conducted background checks on 1.6 million adults who work with minors and have provided "safe environment" training to 5.7 million children, 95 percent of all those entrusted to the care of the church.

Bishop William S. Skylstad, president of the bishops' conference, said he has both "a sense of progress" and "a great sense of the continuing impact of the sexual abuse crisis" because his own diocese of Spokane, Wash., is in bankruptcy and he was recently accused of molesting a teenage girl in the 1960s. He has denied the allegation.

The bishops' conference said U.S. dioceses received 783 credible allegations of abuse against 532 clergy members in 2005. There were 1,092 allegations against 756 priests in 2004.

Of the new allegations, nine -- or less than 1 percent -- stemmed from incidents that took place in 2005 and were reported by people still younger than 18. Nearly 87 percent of the remaining 774 new allegations involved abuse that occurred before the 1990s. Of the 532 priests accused in 2005, nearly two-thirds had been identified in prior allegations, and 418 were deceased or out of ministry, church officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0024613

William Gavin, a former FBI official whose Boston-based consulting firm has been hired by the bishops to conduct annual sex abuse "audits" of U.S. dioceses, said 169 of the 191 Catholic dioceses examined in 2005 were "fully in compliance" with the sex abuse policy the bishops adopted in Dallas in 2002.

Those in compliance included the archdioceses of Washington and Baltimore, and the dioceses of Richmond and Arlington.

Barbara Blaine, president of the Survivors Network of those Abused by Priests, said the report "once again proves that bishops can't be trusted to monitor themselves."

She noted that the auditors found the Archdiocese of Chicago to be fully in compliance with the charter in 2004 and 2005. Yet in recent months, two previously accused priests were found working in active ministry in Chicago.

Patricia O. Ewers, chairman of the National Review Board, a panel of lay Catholics appointed by the bishops as a watchdog over the church's handling of sex abuse, also said that "recent events in Chicago make it clear that the church has not done enough."

Bishops Report Decline In Abuse Accusations (NYT)

By Neela Banerjee

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 30 — A total of 783 new accusations of priests' sexual abuse were received by the nation's Roman Catholic bishops last year, with about 13 percent of the cases dating from 1990 or later, the bishops reported Thursday.

In issuing its third annual audit intended to assess efforts to prevent such abuse, the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops emphasized that accusations had declined from the 1,092 reported in 2004.

The bishops also said that as a result of a provision they adopted in 2002 under a toughened policy, 94.5 percent of children in Catholic schools and Sunday school classes had been educated on keeping themselves safe from abuse, an increase from 51 percent the year before.

The survey said 87 percent of the new accusations involved abuse that occurred before 1990, some of it as early as 1950. Only nine accusations concerned abuse last year.

But victims' groups have argued that recent accounts of abuse and the church's resistance to extending the statute of limitations on it are renewing doubts about the bishops' commitment to solving the problem.

The president of the bishops' conference, William S. Skylstad of the Spokane Diocese, himself faces accusations of sexually abusing a girl in the early 1960's, which he denies. And earlier this year, after a priest in Chicago was arrested on charges of molesting boys, the archdiocese there came under fire when it was disclosed that the police had shared accusations of abuse with church officials as early as last August. The archdiocese did not remove the priest until January.

Patricia O. Ewers, chairwoman of the National Review Board, a lay group established by the bishops to monitor the church's response to the sexual abuse crisis, said Thursday that given the scandal in Chicago, it was "clear that the church has not done enough."

Speaking here at a news conference where the bishops' findings were announced, Dr. Ewers noted that the audit process, which is largely a matter of self-reporting by diocesan staff, did not examine the effectiveness of anti-abuse procedures adopted by the bishops, only if those procedures are in place.

In fact, the new audit found the Archdiocese of Chicago to be in compliance with the church's policy on abuse, noted Agustin Perez, one of the independent investigators hired by the archdiocese in the wake of the recent scandal.

While the bishops' report was debated, the office of the New Hampshire attorney general issued its own audit of the Manchester Diocese on Thursday. It cited a "general level of ineffectiveness in enforcing compliance" with an agreement between the diocese and the state to protect children from abuse.

The Rev. Edward J. Arsenault, a representative of Bishop John B. McCormack of the Manchester Diocese, which takes in all of New Hampshire, said in a statement that work remained to be done, but pointed out that no minors were harmed during the period audited by the state, 2002-5.

Nonetheless, the attorney general, Kelly A. Ayotte, told the bishop in a letter dated Monday that failure to address problems in sexual abuse procedures before the state's next audit "may result in court action for contempt and other legal remedies."

Catholic Sex-abuse Payouts Still Rising (WT)

By Julia Duin

The Washington Times, March 31, 2006

Sex-abuse accusations against the nation's priests were down last year, but the flood of millions of dollars in payouts more than tripled and shows no signs of stopping, the United States' Roman Catholic bishops said yesterday.

"It is disheartening to us bishops, as it must be to all Catholics, to find that there are still some allegations of abuse by clerics against today's children and young people," Bishop William S. Skylstad, president of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops (USCCB), said during the release of the conference's annual report on sex-abuse statistics.

The report, commissioned in 2002 by the USCCB's Charter for the Protection of Children and Young People, tracks what the country's 195 Catholic dioceses are doing to end a sex-abuse crisis that has involved 12,537 youths -- mostly boys and young men -- and 4,827 priests.

The bishop cited himself as a sign of the scandal's durability, adding that he is the target of a sex-abuse charge filed Dec. 27 by a woman who has accused him of abusing her in the early 1960s. He has denied the charge.

He said his own Diocese of Spokane, Wash., is bankrupt because of lawsuits. Bishop Skylstad insisted, though, that he is still happy with the USCCB's "progress."

But "I do so without being either naive or in denial about the power of this crisis to affect the ongoing life of the church and the lives of victims of abuse who suffer from its consequences for many years after its actual occurrence," he said.

Accusations against Catholic priests decreased 28 percent last year, but the cost in millions of dollars to the nation's Catholic dioceses shot up 219 percent last year, the USCCB said.

Specifically, $139,582,157 was paid out in sex-abuse cases in 2004 -- for settlements, attorneys' fees, victim therapy and other costs. Last year, that amount rose to $445,686,548, including the $100 million that California's Diocese of Orange agreed to pay to 90 claimants in January and $120 million the Covington, Ky., diocese agreed to pay to more than 100 victims in June.

According to the Catholic News Service, the U.S. church to date has paid $1.3 billion in settlements.

A USCCB report shows 783 credible accusations of child sex abuse reported last year, down from 1,092 in 2004. Of the 783 charges, nine occurred last year, the USCCB said, and the others occurred mostly in the 1960s and 1970s.

Despite the charter and all the safeguards it imposed, the USCCB said cases still fall through the cracks. On March 20, the Archdiocese of Chicago admitted that it had allowed the Rev. Daniel McCormack to remain in ministry for months after he had been accused of pedophilia. Three boys have accused the priest of molesting them from 2001 to 2005.

The problem, said Bill Gavin, head of the Boston-based Gavin Group, which conducts annual "audits" on Catholic dioceses, is that his investigators are not allowed to research personnel files.

"The people in the Archdiocese of Chicago didn't deliver to the cardinal the candor he needed," Mr. Gavin said. "I expect the auditors didn't get it, either."

Moreover, about 104 dioceses that have been found fully compliant two years in a row with the charter were allowed to fill out a questionnaire last year in lieu of an on-site visit by investigators.

The sex of the abuse victims reported last year was the same as was reported for the years 1950 through 2002 -- 19 percent were girls and 81 percent were boys. Almost half (49 percent) of the victims were between the ages of 10 and 14, 23 percent were ages 15 to 17 and 14 percent were younger than 10. The ages were not specified for 14 percent of the victims.

A supplemental report, issued by the John Jay College of Criminal Justice in New York, said there were no warning signs for the typical abuser, who is a priest in his late 30s who has been ordained 11 years. Diocesan priests tended to be abusers twice as much as priests from religious orders.

"The red flags aren't there," said Karen Terry, the report's principal investigator. Except for a small group of serial abusers who began abusing children around the time of their ordinations, "there are no identifiable psychological problems."

A Benefit For Insurers (NYT)

By Milt Freudenheim

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

Critics who say the private insurance industry got too big a role in the new Medicare prescription drug program may not know the half of it.

For patients, the program's rollout has had mixed reviews, with many happy customers but more than a few tales of woe. But for many big insurers, the new Medicare program is shaping up as a great opportunity. And prescription drugs may be only a starting point.

So far, about 18 million Americans are participating in the new drug program, known as Medicare Part D. If things play out the way some big insurers hope, the drug program could prove to be a feeder system into a much greater private presence in Medicare — a longstanding goal of the Bush administration.

Insurers like Humana, which says it has signed up 1.7 million Medicare drug plan members, know that the real money is not in providing drug insurance. The rewards are much richer in other types of Medicare policies, including complete managed care plans called Medicare Advantage, which are operated by the private insurers but subsidized by Medicare. Michael B. McCallister, Humana's chief executive, refers to the new Medicare Part D drug program as part of a broader "Medicare opportunity" for his company.

"There's going to be a lot of people that are going to have Part D cards that are going to become interested in a Medicare Advantage plan," said Mr. McCallister, who has been unusually candid about the springboard strategy.

In January and February, which were the first months of the Part D drug program, Humana was also able to add more than 140,000 new Medicare Advantage customers to its rolls.

"So far, Part D has worked O.K.," he said. "I felt like I needed something else to help me out with other things not covered by Medicare."

Unlike his Part D drug plan, which carried a monthly premium of $26, there is no premium for his full-coverage Medicare Advantage plan — although his drug co-payments are a bit higher, and there will be co-payments for some other medical services.

Other big insurers like Wellpoint and the UnitedHealth Group — the Part D leader so far, with 4.5 million enrollees — are also recruiting members for Medicare Advantage, as well as customers for Medigap, another type of Medicare-related policy. Medigap is a supplemental policy that helps with the remainder of medical expenses not fully covered by conventional Medicare.

While the stand-alone Part D drug plans are expected to give insurers a small profit, the margins are likely to be thin — 1 percent to 3 percent before taxes, Humana estimates. That is partly because Humana is offering low premiums and co-payments to attract customers. And the federal subsidy for each customer in a stand-alone Medicare drug plan is only about $75 a month.

But for providing a full Medicare Advantage health policy to a patient, the government pays the insurer $900 to $2,000 a month beyond whatever premium, if any, the patient pays. With that revenue, come bigger profit margins — 3 percent to 5 percent, according to James H. Bloem, Humana's chief financial officer.

For UnitedHealth, the Part D drug business by itself would not be particularly lucrative, adding only 5 to 7 cents to earnings a share, according to Jason Nogueira, an analyst who tracks health care companies for the investment firm T. Rowe Price. That would be no more than 2 cents on the sales dollar for UnitedHealth, which had $45 billion in 2005 revenue and expects profit of $2.90 a share this year.

So the real financial opportunities lie in upgrading Part D enrollees to other Medicare-linked policies. In essence, the high federal subsidies for Medicare Advantage policies are the government's reward to insurers for taking people out of traditional, federally supervised Medicare and into the commercial world of managed care. In fact, Medicare now pays private insurers 15 percent more, on average, to take a patient than it spends in a traditional government program for each patient.

Critics of Medicare's approach, including a number of senior Democrats in Congress, have asked the Congressional Budget Office to examine the issue. The budget office estimated that Medicare could save more than $40 billion over the next 10 years if subsidies to insurers were scaled back to the levels the program now pays directly to doctors and hospitals.

Representative Pete Stark of California, the senior Democrat on the Ways and Means Committee, said in an interview that insurance agents "are out trying to promote seniors into Medicare Advantage plans, and switch them out of plans they are in."

The Medicare law that created the Part D program, Mr. Stark said, "was written by insurance company lobbyists with the help of pharmaceutical company lobbyists."

In a telephone interview, Michael O. Leavitt, the secretary of health and human services, defended the administration's market-based approach to Medicare, saying that market forces were pushing prices lower and that any kinks in Part D would be worked out.

"The market will become simplified because consumers want that," Mr. Leavitt said.

As long as the incentive of federal subsidies stays at current levels, insurers have every reason to pursue them, especially as the industry struggles with slowing growth in its traditional core business of managing employer-sponsored health benefits.

Charles Boorady, a health care securities analyst at Citigroup, said that by expanding Medicare-subsidized offerings, the insurance industry had a potential revenue opportunity of more than $450 billion a year "or enough to almost double the revenue of the managed care industry."

Even before the new drug plan went into effect in January, some insurers had significant numbers of Medicare Advantage customers. Humana, for example, had 558,000. UnitedHealth had 1.1 million in Medicare Advantage; it also had an additional 2.5 million AARP customers with Medigap cards, and most of them have added the Part D coverage that UnitedHealth is offering through AARP.

By the end of February, Humana had already raised its total of Medicare Advantage members to 700,000 and had set a goal of 900,000 to 1.1 million by Dec. 31. The company expects to add more in 2007. New figures released by Medicare last week indicate that 6.3 million of the 18 million people enrolled in Plan D voluntarily signed up for the drug program; in all, 43 million people are eligible for it. An additional 5.7 million in the program are people who were subscribers to Medicare Advantage health plans that did not cover prescription drugs but they added the coverage.

The government's real gift to the insurers was 6.4 million low-income people on Medicaid or other public-assistance programs who were automatically assigned to Part D or Medicare Advantage plans. They were allocated among insurers ready to meet Part D rules, with most going to those that had Medicare Advantage plans throughout the United States.

Under this allocation, the government gave UnitedHealth 1.2 million Medicaid assignees; the next biggest were Humana and Wellpoint, which each got about 600,000.

Those insurers can be sure of collecting 100 percent of the premium from the government for the lowest-income enrollees, and they are paid on a sliding scale if the enrollees are eligible for other state assistance.

Not everyone, though, sees a huge opportunity in the industry using the Medicare drug program as a springboard into fuller lines of coverage.

Ed Kroll, an analyst at the investment research firm SG Cowen, notes that in the past, prescription drug coverage was a major reason people signed up for a Medicare Advantage managed care plan. Now, with Part D, people can have their drugs paid for without joining a broader plan, he said, and can simply let plain old Medicare benefits cover their other health needs.

Aetna, the third-largest insurer, after Wellpoint and United, has not made a big push into Part D. The company has only 375,000 Part D drug plan enrollees so far. Aetna — like Cigna, the No. 4 insurer — is more concerned with commercial customers and is "not strategically focused on Medicare or Medicaid," Mr. Boorady of Citigroup said.

Even for companies like Humana, which do have that focus, the big challenge will be overcoming the bad publicity the Part D program has tended to receive in the early going. And for those who do agree to trade up, insurers will not be able to take their loyalty for granted.

Florence Bryan 65, a retired grocery worker in Winchester, Va., met a Humana saleswoman in a Wal-Mart store late last year; she was promoting Part D and Medicare Advantage. "I went on her recommendations," said Ms. Bryan, who joined a Humana Medicare Advantage plan in January. Now, she has her "first glitch." Her Humana plan covers only half her monthly requirement of 60 Prevacid pills, which she for stomach problems. "The Humana representative said the doctor should call an 800 number to get an authorization," she said. "But the doctor's office said the insurance company needs to fill out a form and send it to the doctor." When contacted, a Humana spokesman said the company intended "to resolve this issue for Mrs. Bryan as soon as possible."

New To The Stable: Two Champion Clones (WP)

By Justin Gillis

A Texas company said yesterday that it had cloned two champion cutting horses for $150,000 apiece, had established multiple clone pregnancies and would create as many as 30 more cloned horses over the next year, signaling the arrival of a commercial horse-cloning industry in the United States.

The plans by ViaGen Inc. of Austin represent by far the most ambitious effort yet to turn horse cloning into a paying business. There's little doubt that ViaGen, with one of the world's top cloning scientists in its stable, can pull off the necessary laboratory work, and not a single government rule or regulation stands in the way.

But it remains to be seen how far the U.S. horse industry will go in embracing the technique that produced Dolly the sheep a decade ago and has since come to symbolize many people's fears about modern genetic science. While cloning is being welcomed by those who ride and breed cutting horses, a sport with blue-collar origins on the ranches of the American West, the people guarding the purity of elite horse racing in the United States have decided to prohibit clones.

"Would it be fun to watch Muhammad Ali box Muhammad Ali? Would it be fun to watch 10 Michael Jordans out on the basketball floor?" said Dan Rosenberg, president of Three Chimneys Farm, one of the leading farms in Kentucky breeding Thoroughbred racehorses. "What we do is part business and part fun, and it's part science and part art. If it becomes pure business and pure science, I don't want to play anymore."

It's clear that a lot of people in the horse industry agree with him. The American Quarter Horse Association, which safeguards that breed by issuing papers on the animals, has prohibited registration of any clone.

So has the Jockey Club, the association that registers the Thoroughbreds, such as Secretariat and Seattle Slew, that race for the Triple Crown and other premier events. In fact, the Jockey Club has prohibited not just cloning but any form of artificial reproduction. In the racing world, owners and breeders are clinging tenaciously to the idea that creation of a baby horse, a foal, ought to involve a stallion having sex with a mare.

But a different attitude seems to be taking hold in the most democratic of the equine disciplines, cutting, which grew out of the twice-yearly cattle roundups in the West that would bring together thousands of beef cows. To separate one rancher's animals from another's, cowboys needed compact, athletic horses with good instincts for pulling a cow out and blocking its attempt to rejoin the herd. The ranch hands would take any cutting horse, purebred or not, that could do the job.

It hadn't occurred to Lindy Burch, either, until recently. The Weatherford, Tex., woman is one of the nation's most accomplished riders and breeders of cutting horses, and owner of a valuable cutting champion called Bet Yer Blue Boons, a mare with health problems that have limited her ability to reproduce.

Burch was shocked when some fellows she knew called up and told her about a company with plans to clone horses. "I thought, 'Gosh, I have to try it,' " she said. "There's a lot of really nice horses, but the great ones are few and far between."

Now two mares are pregnant with Bet's clones. They're among 15 clones established in ViaGen's laboratories that are coming to term in surrogate mares on a farm in Oklahoma. Two clones already have been born. The first, born Feb. 19, is a clone of Royal Blue Boon, an aging champion whose offspring -- Bet Yer Blue Boons is one -- have earned millions in prize money on the cutting-horse circuit. That makes her, in the view of Quarter Horse News, "the greatest producing mare in the history of the sport."

They are not the first cloned horses born in the United States, nor even the first created for money. Since the world's first horse clone was born in Italy in 2003, a handful have been created by academic laboratories in this country.

But ViaGen, with financial backing from Arizona billionaire John Sperling and rights to the important patents in the field, is by far the best-financed company offering cloning services. Its laboratory is run by Irina Polejaeva, a leader of the scientific team that produced the world's first pig clones six years ago.

The company's main goal is to turn cloning into a routine tool of production agriculture, creating elite breeding stock for the cattle and hog industries. But a policy that would allow cloned animals or their offspring into the American food supply is stalled at the Food and Drug Administration, with consumer groups warning of a potential backlash.

So while the government figures out what to do about food, ViaGen has decided to go after a smaller market that needs no federal blessing -- horse cloning. At $150,000 for the first copy of a horse and $90,000 for the second copy, "it is a significant business opportunity," said Mark Walton, president of ViaGen.

Many of the associations that oversee various horse breeds are expected to follow the lead of the Jockey Club and the American Quarter Horse Association in prohibiting clones. That's likely to reduce the value of cloned animals, since neither they nor their offspring could ever be registered as purebred.

But Studbook Zangersheide, a small European association that controls a breed of jumping horses, has decided to register clones. And there's a lot of muttering in the horse world that anti-clone rules may be subject to legal attack as unfair restraints of trade. Nobody has sued yet.

The Humane Society of the United States yesterday condemned ViaGen's move, noting that several scientific panels have said cloning raises serious concerns about animal welfare. In some species, notably cattle, clones have died in the womb or just after birth with dire health problems, though not enough data are available yet to know if that will be true in horses.

"We applaud the Thoroughbred industry and other segments of the horse industry that are shunning this practice," said Wayne Pacelle, chief executive of the Humane Society, in Washington. "The cloning advocates and practitioners are thinking of horses as a commodity. Those on my side of the fence think of horses as individual creatures who deserve respect and humane treatment."

Caspar Willard Weinberger (WSJ)

By James Webb

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

ARLINGTON, Va. -- From the window of my office I can see the flag pole on the main hilltop of historic Fort Myer, where high-ranking officers, including the Army's Chief of Staff, have resided for more than a century. The flag is at half-mast, as it always is when great tragedies occur or when noteworthy Americans have died.

I have written from this office for many years, and the half-masted flag at Fort Myers has become a frequent sight. But this afternoon as I watch the flag flutter in a gentle wind, I am overcome with a sense of nostalgia and regret that surprises me.

"Cap" Weinberger would have liked that, I find myself thinking. But it also would have embarrassed him just a bit. If he had lived to see this tribute, Cap would surely have made some self-deprecating joke -- and then deflected the whole subject onto another deserving individual. Something like, "Well, if you outlive enough of your adversaries the remainder will forget the arguments and lower a flag for you." * * *

For nearly four years during the Reagan administration I had the privilege of working for, and with, Caspar Willard Weinberger, first as an assistant secretary of defense and then as secretary of the Navy. As part of his inner staff that met daily with him, I once calculated that I had walked more than a thousand miles of Pentagon office corridors between my office and his. And in the years after he left the Pentagon, I counted myself among the lucky former subordinates who were able to grab him for lunch every now and then, or correspond on this issue or that, or even, as it turned out, to give him advice on his ever-aspiring writing career.

In this town of inflated egos and ruthless ambition, I have never met a more gracious man. And in a lifetime that, beginning with my father's military service, spans every secretary of defense, I can think of no one who has ever held that office with more competence, intellect and understanding of our country's place in the world.

Memories surround me: of Cap holding court among his inner staff day after day, receiving the morning briefings from his key subordinates, questioning their reports, giving guidance across a broad spectrum of issues with humor and incisive intellect.

This was a man -- rare in government circles -- who was not afraid of strong personalities, who encouraged debate, who brought out the creative energies of people with a wide array of backgrounds and policy interests. Unlike so many government leaders who do not want to hear bad news, or who wish only to direct their subordinates from the top, Cap wanted to know, and the country was better off for it.

When Cap Weinberger took office as secretary of defense in 1981 our military was in a truly worrisome state. Its people were burnt out. Our ships, aircraft and weapons systems were depleted, on the verge of obsolescence. Our nation was demoralized by the aftermath of the Vietnam War and the humiliation of the failed attempt to rescue hostages in Iran, and worried sick about the Soviet takeover of Afghanistan. Nearly seven brutally demanding years later, he left behind a modernized, properly deployed military force filled with quality people. He had implemented a strategy that soon thereafter brought an end to the Soviet Union's expansionist regime. And he had put into place a doctrine regarding the use of force that, perhaps unfairly, became more associated in the public's eye with the views of his disciple Colin Powell than of his own.

It is painful for those who knew and respected Cap Weinberger to see his name, even in his obituaries, associated with the Iran-Contra affair, an endeavor that he himself had advised against. But his loyalties were astounding, even legendary among the Reagan inner circle. In the end they defined even his darker moments.

But Cap accepted that, just as he accepted the inevitability that others might shine brighter in the limelight that he himself made possible. One of his favorite quotes in those later years, when he would find the time to meet for lunch, was one he attributed to Ronald Reagan: "You can get a lot done in this town if you don't care who takes credit for it."

Mr. Webb, a former Marine, was secretary of the navy in the Reagan administration. He is now an author, and a Democratic candidate for the U.S. Senate from Virginia.

Maryland will become the fourth state to authorize the use of state funds to support embryonic stem cell research, now that the governor, a Republican, has pledged to sign a bill approved this week by the legislature, which is controlled by Democrats. Maryland will thus join California, New Jersey and Connecticut in recognizing that the federal government's abdication of support for embryonic stem cell research has effectively shifted the issue to the states.

President Bush has authorized federal funds for research on only a limited number of embryonic stem cell lines, and Congress has been too hamstrung by fights between research advocates and social conservatives to expand support beyond that. No federal money can be used for therapeutic cloning, the most promising area of research. Privately financed research is an option, but the government makes that difficult at sites where other scientists work with federally financed equipment.

Individual states have been chiming in with their own policies, which range from a farsighted determination to finance the restricted research with state money to truly awful decisions to treat scientists as criminals if they dare to do therapeutic cloning. South Dakota bans all research on embryonic stem cells, and a few other states ban therapeutic cloning. Several states, however, authorize state funds for both embryonic stem cell research and therapeutic cloning. California's $3 billion 10-year program, currently stalled by a court challenge, dwarfs New Jersey's and Connecticut's programs. Maryland's small program will use only embryos that would otherwise be discarded by fertility clinics, not embryos generated for therapeutic cloning.

At first many states seemed headed toward restrictive policies, but then the academic and business communities threw their weight behind research that they believe could ultimately lead to new therapies and possibly new companies to exploit the findings. In some places, the result is a mishmash of conflicting approaches. In Wisconsin, where scientists have been pioneers in the development of embryonic stem cell lines, Gov. Jim Doyle, a Democrat, vetoed a bill — passed late last year by the Legislature, which is dominated by Republicans — that would have made therapeutic cloning a criminal offense punishable by up to 10 years in jail. He has instead embarked on a drive to recruit stem cell companies for Wisconsin, with a goal of capturing 10 percent of the stem cell industry by 2015.

This piecemeal state-by-state approach is an absurd way to conduct research that may have extraordinary importance if it pans out. Few residents of states that ban therapeutic cloning will refuse lifesaving therapies developed in other states. So it seems unfair to rely on a handful of states to fill the gaps left by the federal abdication. There is growing sentiment in Congress that the range of stem cell research eligible for federal funds needs to be expanded. We agree, and urge that therapeutic cloning be included in that expansion.

Help The Homeless (WP)

THE MILD WINTER was a blessing for the Washington area's homeless population, which is estimated at more than 15,000. Nonetheless, the growing number of homeless people has strained the capacity of shelters and other social services. And while the problem of homelessness used to be mainly an urban one, concentrated in the District, now it is felt equally in the suburbs, where half of the region's homeless are thought to live.

This year Montgomery County had to open a third temporary trailer to handle the overflow from its permanent shelters; in addition, the county has lodged some 40 homeless families in motels because the shelters had no remaining beds. In Fairfax, a canvass by the county in January found nearly 2,100 homeless people, up 6.5 percent over a similar survey's count a year earlier. At various points in the winter, 60 to 90 homeless families in Fairfax were on the waiting list for beds in county shelters; some families waited up to four months for a spot. And in many instances, a spot in a shelter means only a place to sleep at night -- but neither refuge from the elements nor a hot meal during the day.

Together, Fairfax and Montgomery, neighboring jurisdictions separated by the Potomac, represent one of the largest concentrations of suburban prosperity in the nation. That they are home to 3,000 to 4,000 homeless people is a symptom of a societal failure; more particularly, it reflects the exorbitant price of housing in each county, where a one-bedroom rental apartment averages $1,000 or more a month. Some 2 million people live in Fairfax and Montgomery, but county officials are struggling to retain the relatively small stock of affordable housing in the face of powerful market pressures. As Bob Wyatt, director of the Lamb Center, which runs shelters for the homeless in Fairfax, told The Post's Bill Turque: "Where there is great wealth, there is also insidious, hidden poverty."

In Montgomery, County Council members Steven A. Silverman and George L. Leventhal, both Democrats, have proposed modest measures to increase the available public money for rent subsidies and medical care for homeless people in shelters. That's a positive gesture, but, as Mr. Silverman notes, it's just a first step. It may be impossible to eliminate homelessness altogether, but minimizing it should not be beyond the means of such rich localities. Perhaps a third of the suburban homeless here have jobs. They are making a go of it, and they deserve a greater helping hand from local governments.

Rice Floats The Idea Of U.N. Sanctions On Iran, But China And Russia Reject It (NYT)

By Joel Brinkley

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

BERLIN, March 30 — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, meeting here on Thursday with representatives of the other four permanent members of the United Nations Security Council, raised the idea of imposing unspecified sanctions on Iran, but she received a decidedly cool reaction from China and Russia.

Her proposal came a day after the Security Council approved a statement criticizing the Iranian nuclear program that was a result of heavy compromise. Previously, she had said that sanctions were a possibility but that it was premature to discuss them.

Her proposal was described to reporters in a briefing aboard her plane by a senior State Department official, and she did not comment directly on her proposal during a news conference after the three-and-a-half-hour meeting here on Thursday.

But Dai Bingguo, China's vice minister of foreign affairs, rejected the idea of sanctions and offered a thinly veiled criticism of the war in Iraq when he said: "The Chinese side feels there has already been enough turmoil in the Middle East. We don't need any more turmoil."

The Security Council approved the statement on Wednesday after three weeks of debate. Ms. Rice and her aides praised it on Thursday, even though it was far weaker than the one the United States had originally proposed. It calls on the International Atomic Energy Agency, the nuclear monitoring arm of the United Nations, to report within 30 days on Iran's progress toward curtailing its nuclear development work. The report then goes to the Security Council, giving it an opportunity to respond.

After months of diplomacy, the United States persuaded a majority of the agency's board to report Iran to the Security Council last month.

Ms. Rice noted on Thursday that Russia had wanted to remove the language from the Security Council statement calling for a referral to the Security Council, which would have effectively returned the case to the atomic energy agency. Russia backed down from its demand, under American pressure.

As it is, Russia and China bluntly declared on Thursday that they had no interest in imposing sanctions of any sort or in taking any further action against Iran, though both countries did express concern about the nuclear program. Russian and Chinese officials said they wanted to refer the issue back to the atomic energy agency.

"Russia believes that the sole solution for this problem will be based on the work of the I.A.E.A.," said the Russian foreign minister, Sergey V. Lavrov.

American officials say Iran is unlikely to budge from its confrontational position unless it is offered "in addition to carrots some sticks," the senior official traveling with Ms. Rice said Thursday evening. "Iran needs to know there will be consequences if it continues to hold out."

But the same opposition that forced the United States to accept a weaker Security Council statement than it had wanted seems likely to make it difficult to impose sanctions or other actions against Iran to persuade it to back down.

Iran's foreign minister, Manouchehr Mottaki, speaking at a disarmament conference in Geneva on Thursday, described the Security Council action as "political maneuvering by some Western countries" and "an abuse of international mechanisms."

On her way here Wednesday night, Ms. Rice said the meeting was being held to begin discussions of "the next steps" to be taken against Iran, now that the Security Council statement had been approved. Later, after Russia's and China's public rebukes of the idea of taking further action, the senior administration official, briefing reporters, offered a different goal for the meeting, saying it had been an effort to keep together the coalition of nations opposed to Iran's nuclear program.

The official, who briefed reporters traveling with Ms. Rice under the ground rule that he not be identified by name, said several nations, presumably European countries, had supported the notion of unspecified sanctions after Ms. Rice proposed the idea. He would not name the nations.

Ms. Rice alluded to the sort of sanctions the United States would be likely to propose when, speaking to reporters on her way here, she said the United States and its allies would look at "how a strong message can be sent to the Iranian regime that it's the regime that is isolated, not the Iranian people."

The senior official said Ms. Rice was referring to the idea of imposing travel bans on senior Iranian officials and freezing their foreign bank accounts, as the United States and Europe say they intend to do with regard to Belarus.

BERLIN -- U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Thursday warned that "the international community is united" in its dispute with Iran over its nuclear program, while German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier said the U.S., Russia, China and Europe remained intent on a diplomatic solution.

The remarks followed a meeting in Berlin among diplomats from the five veto-wielding members of the U.N. Security Council plus Germany over ways to press Iran to stop making enriched uranium, which can be used for weapons. Iran says its program is peaceful.

Ms. Rice said the meeting sends "a very strong signal to Iran that the international community is united." It follows an agreement Wednesday to give Iran 30 days to comply or see the matter taken up by the U.N. Security Council. (See related story.1)

But the comments hinted at the strains in the anti-Iran alliance, with the Chinese saying that "only peaceful means" must be used to push Iran, while the U.S. and Britain used tougher rhetoric.

"The onus is on Iran to show the international community that its program is entirely for civil purposes and for no other," said British Foreign Minister Jack Straw. "We have shown very great patience with Iran. They in turn have miscalculated.

"They thought the international community would be divided on this issue but in fact they have become more and more united," he said.

Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov stressed a peaceful solution and appeared to emphasize the role of the International Atomic Energy Agency ahead of the Security Council. "It is quite clear that all of us have very legitimate concerns in the international community with regard to Iran but we wish to reach a peaceful solution," he said.

"Russia believes the sole solution will be based on the work of the IAEA and we will also be demanding full cooperation of Iran with the IAEA. Only then will it be possible for Iran to make peaceful use of the technology."

On Wednesday, the five permanent Security Council members broke a three-week impasse on Iran and agreed on a statement demanding that Tehran suspend all uranium enrichment.

Diplomats hailed the step as an important breakthrough, but it is unclear what impact the statement will have in Tehran, where the Iranian government insists it will proceed with its nuclear-development plans as a matter of sovereign right.

Concerns over the U.N. standoff with Iran have helped keep oil prices above $60 a barrel in recent weeks. Iran is the second-largest producer in the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries after Saudi Arabia. The U.S.'s Energy Information Administration Tuesday reported that commercial stockpiles of gasoline declined by 5.4 million barrels last week to 216.2 million barrels.

The U.N. statement, which isn't legally binding and falls short of a resolution, expresses "serious concerns" that Iran has failed to comply with a series of steps laid out by the International Atomic Energy Agency to assure that Tehran isn't pursing nuclear weapons. Iran insists its nuclear program is for peaceful purposes, but the statement notes "that the IAEA is unable to conclude that there are no undeclared nuclear materials or activities in Iran."

The statement asks IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei to report to the Security Council in 30 days on Iran's compliance.

The U.N. agreement "demonstrates that the international community is united in its concern over Iran's nuclear program," said U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in a statement. "Iran is more isolated now than ever."

The five permanent members of the Security Council – the U.S., France, Britain, China and Russia – have been locked in negotiations since early this month to craft a joint position on Iran, even one that makes no mention of potential sanctions or other leverage. Each permanent member of the Security Council has powers of veto. Russia and China have staunchly resisted any diplomatic moves that might eventually pave the way to sanctions or military actions, as happened with Iraq. They have also pushed to assure that the IAEA be the main focus of diplomatic action instead of the Security Council.

In a clear nod to those concerns, the statement says that Iranian compliance with all IAEA requests, including the suspension of all nuclear-enrichment activities, "would contribute to a diplomatic, negotiated solution that guarantees Iran's nuclear program is of exclusively peaceful purposes."

Security Council Turns Up Pressure Against Iran (CSM)

By Howard LaFranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON - The United Nations Security Council has given Iran 30 days to offer proof of its commitment not to develop nuclear weapons. With that step under their belt, the United States and Europe in particular now want to avoid seeing Tehran use that month as a cover for advancing further down a road of no return to the bomb.

That desire drove what Western officials called a "strategy session" in Berlin Thursday, where foreign ministers including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice considered the question of how best to keep up international pressure on Iran.

The brief Berlin meeting resulted not so much in a "strategy" but in a reinforced show, after Wednesday's Security Council action, of international opposition to a nuclear-armed Iran.

The "EU 3" of the European Union - Britain, France, and Germany - plus the US, China, and Russia attended the session.

Europeans describe the month-long window before Iran is taken up again by the Security Council as an "opportunity" for Tehran to reverse course on uranium enrichment - a key step in the fuel cycle necessary for building a nuclear weapon - and return to international talks on its program.

But the US, dubious of Iran's intentions, plans to use the month to begin focusing international attention on Iran's role as what Washington considers the world's No. 1 state sponsor of international terrorism, diplomatic sources say.

The ministers would like to see Iran return to negotiations with the EU 3, which - before their collapse last August - were aimed at verifying that any Iranian nuclear program is for energy development only.

But the European powers in particular feel stung by Iran's pattern of using negotiations as cover for continuing clandestine nuclear development.

Iran is showing no signs of bending to the increased international pressure, rejecting the Security Council's call to freeze Iran's uranium enrichment program.

"It is impossible to go back to suspension," Tehran's representative to the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), Ali Asghar Saltanieh, told the Associated Press Thursday.

The Security Council on Wednesday ended three weeks of often deadlocked talks by approving a statement that asks the IAEA to report to the council within 30 days on Iran's compliance with demands that it suspend uranium enrichment.

The nonbinding statement is considerably weaker than the Europeans, backed by the US, had originally sought: It no longer calls Iran's program "a threat to international peace and security," wording that Russia and China feared would set the stage for eventual sanctions or other forceful action. In addition, the US had wanted to restrict Tehran's margin of maneuverability by demanding the IAEA report to the council within two weeks.

Still, US officials emphasize, the statement demonstrates unified international opposition to Iran's nuclear ambitions. "The international community is united," Secretary Rice said after the Berlin meeting.

The US also maintains that the action on a statement effectively keeps the Iran dossier open in the Security Council, where it wants it.

"We're prepared to be back here on the 31st day, given the Iranian record to date of consistently flouting the IAEA [and] attempting to obscure what they've done," said US Ambassador to the UN John Bolton after the statement's approval.

Speaking to reporters after the Berlin meeting, German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier characterized the month-long window before Iran returns to the Security Council as a time of decision for Tehran. Insisting that Germany and the five permanent members of the Security Council still want a "diplomatic solution" to the dispute, he said Iran has a month to "make a choice between isolation ... or [to] seize the offer to resume negotiations."

Still, the Bush administration, which has recently labeled Iran the biggest single threat to American security, appears intent on raising the Iranian regime's profile as a purveyor of international terrorism.

"They are stepping up their accusations of Tehran as a state sponsor of international terrorism, and they have given us notice that that is what they will be doing," says one Western diplomat in Washington, who spoke condition of anonymity after private meetings with American national security officials.

But as Russian and Chinese resistance to the US position demonstrates, the US is starting on Iran from a position clouded by its prewar accusations against Iraq.

"They have a credibility problem after Iraq and things like the claims of weapons of mass destruction," says the diplomat, "so they have that burden to overcome."

Iran Warned, But Russia, China Dissent On Action (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

BERLIN, March 30 -- Senior diplomats from the five veto-wielding members of the U.N. Security Council and Germany warned Iran on Thursday to halt sensitive nuclear activities and return to the negotiating table, but strains were apparent as Russia and China appeared to rule out sanctions or military action.

One day after the Security Council approved a watered-down statement that gave Iran 30 days to end its uranium enrichment program, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and her counterparts met here for 3 1/2 hours to consider ways to persuade Iran to restrain its nuclear ambitions. "This is a strong signal to Iran that negotiation, not confrontation, should be their course," Rice said.

In Vienna, Iran's chief representative to the International Atomic Energy Agency, Ali Asghar Soltanieh, told the Associated Press that it was "impossible to go back to suspension" and that "this enrichment matter is not reversible."

Rice told reporters traveling with her to Berlin that the meeting would be used to "look ahead to what next steps we might wish to take." She suggested the range of options could include "strong messages," such as travel bans, which would affect the Iranian leadership personally, or measures to thwart Iran's ability to acquire materials needed for a civilian nuclear program.

A senior U.S. official in Rice's entourage said after the meeting that participants had demonstrated "substantial support" for considering the option of "moving toward sanctions." But in public comments afterward, Russian and Chinese officials expressed opposition to sanctions, on grounds they could lead to escalation and confrontation.

"In principle, Russia doesn't believe that sanctions could achieve the purposes of settlement of various issues," Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov said.

"There has already been enough turmoil in the Middle East," said Dai Bingguo, China's vice foreign minister, in a reference to the U.S. invasion of Iraq. "We do not want to see new turmoil being introduced to the region."

The Bush administration has pushed hard to bring the dispute over Iran's nuclear programs to the Security Council. But the resistance by both Russia and China to tougher action underscores the limits of that approach. Officials from both countries said the issue should be handled by the IAEA, the Vienna-based U.N. nuclear watchdog.

Britain, France and Germany, leading an effort for the European Union, began negotiations with Iran three years ago to try to reach a solution, but the talks failed last year. Russia has also sought a compromise with Iran, but with little success.

It took three weeks of talks among Security Council members to reach agreement on the wording of Wednesday's statement. Russia successfully resisted language that would have called Iran's nuclear activities a threat to peace and security. Iran has said repeatedly that its nuclear program is for civilian energy only.

Lavrov noted that the IAEA has not ruled out a military dimension to Iran's program but neither has it concluded that Iran plans to build weapons with the nuclear fuel it hopes to produce.

"Before we call any situation a threat, we need facts, especially in a region like the Middle East, where so many things are happening," Lavrov said. ". . . So far, they have not been provided."

During the meeting, Rice and European officials sought to give the matter urgency by referring to reports that Iran has had unexpected success in assembling 164 centrifuges into a system known as a cascade, for uranium enrichment. That would be too small to produce enough fuel for a bomb, but Iran previously had worked with just 20 centrifuges. It appears to have completed the project about two months earlier than IAEA technical experts in Vienna had expected.

British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw said no country was trying to deny Iran the ability to produce electricity through nuclear power. "We have shown very great patience with Iran. They in turn have miscalculated" by misleading the IAEA about their program for 18 years, Straw said. "They thought the international community would be divided on this issue, but truthfully, it has become more and more united."

Before the meeting, Rice met with German Chancellor Angela Merkel for an hour. After the gathering, she departed for Paris for talks with French President Jacques Chirac.

Russia, China Oppose Iran Sanctions (KRT)

By Warren P. Strobel

Knight Ridder, March 30, 2006

BERLIN - Russia and China said Thursday that they oppose sanctions and other punitive measures against Iran, spoiling U.S. and European hopes for a display of international unity on efforts to stop Tehran's suspected nuclear weapons program.

Meeting here with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, top diplomats from Britain, China, France, Germany and Russia called on Iran to heed a U.N. Security Council statement issued Wednesday demanding that Iran abandon its efforts to enrich uranium that could be used in nuclear arms.

But if there was agreement on that general goal, there was no agreement apparent on tactics in the weeks ahead.

Both Rice and British Foreign Minister Jack Straw raised the possibility of sanctions during the three-and-a-half-hour meeting.

But Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov said afterwards that Russia saw little value in sanctions. "In principle, Russia doesn't believe that sanctions could achieve the purposes of settlement of various issues," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0024625

Lavrov also seemed to question the evidence that Iran is trying to develop nuclear weapons under cover of a civilian atomic energy program. "Before we call any situation a threat, we need facts, especially in a region like the Middle East, where so many things are happening," he said.

"The Chinese side feels that there has already been enough turmoil in the Middle East. We do not want to see new turmoil being introduced to the region," Dai said, using unusually blunt language for a Chinese diplomat.

The Russian and Chinese statements appeared to reflect suspicions, fueled by the U.S. invasion of Iraq, that the Bush administration is trying to lay the groundwork for military strikes against nuclear sites in Iran.

During three weeks of negotiations over this week's statement by the president of the Security Council, Russia successfully fought to remove language saying Iran's nuclear work is a threat to global security.

In Moscow's view, such language could serve as a trigger for sanctions, or even the use of force, under the U.N. Charter. Russia wants the issue dealt with by the International Atomic Energy Agency, not the Security Council.

At a press conference, Rice said the meeting "does send a very strong signal to Iran that the international community is united and expects Iran to adhere to (its) just demands."

The Security Council statement calls on Iran to cooperate with IAEA inspectors and cease activities related to uranium enrichment and reprocessing. The IAEA, which monitors compliance with the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, is to report on Iranian compliance in 30 days.

Iran so far has rejected the demands.

A senior State Department official who briefed reporters only under the condition of anonymity said that if Iran remains intransigent, the "next logical step" would be a U.N. Security Council resolution, which carries more weight than this week's presidential statement.

"The stick would be sanctions, some type of sanctions attached to that," the official said.

Such a resolution could be adopted in May, according to a memo by a senior British diplomat, John Sawers. But to win agreement from Russia and China, he wrote, Europe would have to offer rewards to Iran if it disavows nuclear weapons.

Russian Official Contradicts West On Tehran (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

BERLIN -- Russia's top diplomat embarrassed his Western partners yesterday, even as U.S. officials said they had deliberately toned down their remarks about Russia in recent weeks while seeking Moscow's support for U.N. Security Council action on Iran.

Moments after the Western powers insisted to reporters that they were on the same page with Russia and China regarding the Iranian nuclear threat, Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov contradicted them, saying he saw no evidence that Iran's program had a military component or that it posed a threat.

"Before we call any situation a threat, we need facts, especially in a region like the Middle East, where so many things are happening," Mr. Lavrov said after a meeting with his counterparts from the United States, Britain, France, Germany and China.

"We prefer very strongly to base our specific actions on specific facts, and in this particular case the facts could be provided by the [International Atomic Energy Agency]," he said. "So far, they have not been provided."

U.S. officials, who along with their European allies say Iran is pursuing nuclear weapons under the cover of a civilian program, chose not to react publicly to Mr. Lavrov's comments.

But privately, they expressed frustration and even surprise, saying the minister had been much more agreeable during their private talks.

It was the latest in a series of irritants between the United States and Russia, which complained loudly this week that Washington had thrown up new obstacles to Moscow's entry into the World Trade Organization. Late last week, a U.S. report revealed that Russian diplomats had provided sensitive military information to Saddam Hussein during the U.S. invasion of Iraq in 2003.

U.S. officials, who angered Russia earlier this year by questioning its fitness to serve as chairman of the Group of Eight summit this year, have refrained from strong criticism of the help to Saddam.

"It's more important now to have Russia and China" as part of a coalition on Iran than to antagonize them, a senior State Department official said.

"I've been trying not to talk about Russia lately," said another senior official who has been sharply critical of Moscow's energy policies and anti-democratic practices in the past several months.

The Western ministers were not much happier with what they heard at yesterday's press conference from China's vice foreign minister, Dai Bingguo, who attended the meeting instead of his boss.

"The Chinese side feels that there has already been enough turmoil in the Middle East," he said. "We do not want to see new turmoil being introduced to the region, because that would not serve the interests of any party and would only be very detrimental to the interests of the people in Middle East."

Even so, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and her European colleagues said the Security Council is united against Iran, citing a council statement issued in New York late Wednesday that demanded that Tehran stop uranium enrichment and return to negotiations within 30 days.

The statement's initial draft had much tougher language but was watered down at the insistence of Moscow and Beijing.

A senior U.S. official traveling with Miss Rice said sanctions against Iran were discussed formally for the first time in yesterday's meeting, which resulted in a split between the West and the Russia-China duo.

"Russia doesn't believe that sanctions could achieve the purposes of settlement of various issues," Mr. Lavrov said.

Even the IAEA director-general, Mohamed ElBaradei, said yesterday that sanctions are a bad idea.

"We need to lower the pitch," he said. "My message to Iran: The international community is getting impatient, and you need to respond by arming me with information."

Iran Envoy Rejects Security Council Demand (AP-Y2)

By George Jahn

AP2, March 30, 2006

A top Iranian envoy defiantly rejected a U.N. Security Council demand for a halt in uranium enrichment, saying Thursday that Tehran's activities are "not reversible," despite new calls to reconsider from the United States, its key European allies, Russia and China.

Ali Asghar Soltanieh, Tehran's chief representative to the International Atomic Energy Agency, the U.N. nuclear watchdog, said "it is impossible to go back to suspension.

"This enrichment matter is not reversible," he said in a telephone call from Vienna, Austria.

Iran's defiance cast a pall on a meeting of top officials of the five permanent Security Council members plus Germany meant to demonstrate consensus on confronting Tehran over its nuclear program. After two hours of talks that were twice as long as planned, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the six nations were "united."

But Russia and China suggested otherwise, expressing opposition to strong council action against Tehran after the meeting in comments that reflected the continuing fault-line dividing East and West on Iran.

While symbolizing unity after weeks of tenuous negotiations led to Wednesday's watered-down Security Council statement, a European official who was briefed on the closed talks told The Associated Press that the meeting did not bridge differences that left Russia and China at odds with the United States, France and Britain.

Russia and China remained opposed to the next step called for by Washington, Paris and London — a strong resolution that is legally binding and, at least in theory, is enforceable by military means, according to the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to talk about the closed meeting.

That stance left the Western powers at the Berlin talks unwilling to consider any specific suggestions on a "parallel track" favored by Russia to Security Council action — multilateral negotiations with Iran, including some or all permanent council members and Germany, the official said.

But a U.S. official told the AP that if talks with Iran on Iraq were fruitful, they could be expanded to touch on the nuclear issue.

The Bush administration and Iran have publicly emphasized those talks would focus on Iraq. But the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to talk to the media, said that "if some understanding emerges from those discussions, then the one side or the other might say, 'Let's have some follow-up.'"

The meeting of the foreign ministers, along with a senior Chinese official and Javier Solana, the top EU foreign policy official, came a day after the Security Council agreed on a statement calling on Iran to reimpose its enrichment freeze and cooperate with an IAEA inquiry.

It asked IAEA head Mohamed ElBaradei to report in 30 days on whether those requests were made. But the statement was stripped of tougher language backed by the West in deference to Russia and China.

Iran has used the weeks of wrangling within the council to make progress on its enrichment program — which can be used both to generate fuel or make the core of nuclear weapons. Diplomats familiar with the IAEA investigation say it is close to introducing uranium gas into 164 centrifuges — a test facility that nonetheless would give Iran valuable expertise as it works to develop a full-scale enrichment program.

Warning Iran that the international community is united, both Rice and British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw hinted at escalating Security Council action should Iran disregard the demand that it reimpose a freeze on its uranium enrichment program.

German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier held out hope that Tehran might reconsider, despite the Vienna envoy's statement. "We hope that the declaration by the Iranian ambassador is not the last word offered on this," he said.

Steinmeier said the 30-day time limit gives Iran time to "make a choice between isolation ... or a return to the negotiating table."

"We all very much hope that Iran will seize the offer to resume negotiations and we use this opportunity to once again call on Iran to suspend all enrichment activities and to open up once again the path leading to negotiations," he said.

In Geneva, Iranian Foreign Minister Manoucher Mottaki avoided specifics on the enrichment issue, but appeared to rule out any hope of a negotiated resolution.

"Three years of negotiations have just added to our mistrust," he told the 65-nation Conference on Disarmament, alluding to failed talks with France, Britain and Germany focusing on trying to persuade Tehran to give up enrichment out of fears it would be misused to make nuclear arms. He said there is "no prospect of final agreement."

Seizing on the unity theme touched on by Rice and others, Straw said the Iranians "have miscalculated" in hoping to divide the international community. Instead, he said, "they have become more and more united."

French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy said all present agreed the council could "use its political" power to enforce demands on Iran.

Still, comments by Lavrov, and Dai Bingguo, a deputy Chinese foreign minister, revealed that opposition by Moscow and Beijing persists to robust Security Council action, as sought by Washington, Paris and London.

"Russia on principle doesn't think sanctions can achieve a settlement" that would lead Iran to compromise on enrichment and other demands backed by the Security Council, Lavrov said.

"Before we call any situation a threat, we need facts ... (and) so far they have not been provided," he said, arguing that there is no evidence that Iran is hiding a nuclear weapons program — as asserted by Washington.

Lavrov's call for moderation was echoed by Dai, who called for a "peaceful solution" and added there was "too much turmoil" in the region.

"This issue is among the most difficult and complicated in today's world, it requires time, persistence and wisdom, and it can only be resolved through peaceful means," he said.

ElBaradei Asks For Restraint In Response To Iran (LAT)

By Jeffrey Fleishman and Alissa J. Rubin

The Los Angeles Times, March 31, 2006

BERLIN -- U.N. Atomic Energy chief Mohammed ElBaradei urged the international community Thursday to steer away from threats of sanctions against Iran to prevent the dispute over the country's nuclear intentions from spiraling out of control.

Meanwhile, ministers of major powers meeting here similarly struck a more conciliatory tone than in recent weeks following agreement on Wednesday by the U.N. Security Council to give Iran another 30 days to respond to requests from the U.N.'s atomic energy organization that it halt uranium enrichment research.

ElBaradei, speaking in Doha, emphasized that Iran is not "an imminent threat" and urged countries to "lower the pitch" in their effort to stop Iran's nuclear work.

In recent weeks the United States and members of the European Union have made increasingly confrontational statements about what they claim is Iran's intent to perfect technology to enrich uranium with the goal of eventually manufacturing a nuclear weapon.

"There is no military solution to this situation," said ElBaradei, Nobel Prize-winning director-general of the U.N.'s International Atomic Energy Agency. "It's inconceivable. The only durable solution is a negotiated solution."

Russia, China and several countries in the Middle East have voiced concern that the U.S. and EU are pursuing similar tactics with Iran as with Iraq a few years ago, creating a sense of crisis that makes it easier to make the case for military action.

On Thursday, comments by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and her counterparts from China, Russia, France, Germany and Britain made clear that despite the Security Council's unity, deep ideological differences remain among the major powers over what the next steps should be. ElBaradei's comments seemed timed to influence them during the crucial month-long period.

Britain, France and the U.S. have said they would be willing to level sanctions on Iran or ultimately use military force if Iran continues to move forward in its effort to perfect uranium enrichment. Russia and China oppose any punitive actions at this point, a position they reiterated at Thursday's meeting, because they fear it would make Iran more confrontational and could lead to further turmoil in the Middle East.

The statement approved by the Security Council essentially buys the United Nations 30 days to figure out what to do if Iran remains defiant. Once the monthlong period ends, ElBaradei is required to issue another report on whether Iran has complied with IAEA requests which include: halting uranium enrichment research, answering questions about its nuclear program and ratifying IAEA regulations allowing U.N. nuclear inspectors more access to Iranian nuclear facilities and to plants where parts are manufactured for its nuclear industry.

Iran insists its nuclear program is purely for peaceful purposes such as civilian energy generation. Uranium enriched to low levels can be used to generate electricity but enriched more intensively it can be used to make nuclear weapons.

On Thursday, Rice took a somewhat more moderate tone toward Iran than in other recent statements.

"This isn't the time to try and come to a conclusion about what the next step is," said Rice, speaking to reporters on the plane on her way to the meeting. "It's an opening discussion about those next steps. ... A lot is going to depend on the Iranian reaction and I would not at this point carve in stone anybody's decisions about what the next steps might be."

German foreign minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier also held out a hand to Iran. "We all very much hope that Iran will seize the opportunity offered to him to resume negotiations. . .If Iran were to enter upon the path of cooperation, then it can rely on us entering those negotiations in a constructive spirit," he said.

Iran's initial response to the Security Council statement was unbending. Iran's ambassador to the IAEA, Aliasghar Soltaniyeh, said Thursday: "We will not, definitely, suspend enrichment."

Iran, under the nuclear non-proliferation treaty, has the right to enrich uranium for peaceful purposes. However, Iran's intentions have come under international scrutiny because it hid its nuclear program for 18 years, in violation of the treaty of which it had long been a signatory. Although Iran is now largely in compliance with the treaty's requirements, the U.N. nuclear inspectors say there are still key questions that Iran needs to answer about its program.

DOJ_NMG_0024629

Iran compounded international distrust when it ended nearly two years of negotiations with the European Union over a deal to halt its nuclear work altogether. Then, in January, Iran resumed work on a pilot uranium enrichment facility that it had suspended during the talks with the EU. It has begun enriching tiny quantities of uranium to test its centrifuges.

The IAEA, in its most recent report on Iran, said it could not rule out that Iran had secret nuclear facilities or materials. The vague language underscores the chief problem for policymakers dealing with Iran: key aspects of its program remain opaque.

ElBaradei, in his comments Thursday, pushed the international community to act only on concrete information. He warned against a repeat of the 2003 experience with Iraq when IAEA inspectors did not find nuclear weapons, but were ignored by the United States, which proceeded to use unsubstantiated intelligence to make the case for war. Since then, the IAEA has been proved right that Saddam Hussein did not possess any nuclear capability.

Russia and China, the two permanent Security Council members who are more closely allied to Iran, want the IAEA, not the Security Council, to take the lead. That would diminish the likelihood of a rapid Security Council showdown with threats of sanctions and international humiliation.

Strong Earthquake In Iran Kills At Least 17 (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

TEHRAN, Iran (AP) -- A strong earthquake followed by an even stronger aftershock jolted western Iran early Friday, killing at least 17 and injuring hundreds, state media reported.

The quake had a preliminary magnitude of 5.0 and was centered near Boroujerd and Doroud, two industrial cities in western Iran, the official Islamic Republic News Agency reported.

Hours later, it was followed shortly before dawn by two weaker aftershocks and a third tremor with a magnitude of 6.0, IRNA reported.

Provincial official Ali Barani said the quake flattened several villages. Rescue teams have been sent to the region, 210 miles southwest of Tehran, Barani told IRNA

Seventeen bodies have been pulled out of destroyed houses in Silakhor, a region north of Doroud, state-run radio said, reporting 300 injured. The injured were taken to hospitals in Boroujerd and Doroud.

Doroud governor Nasrollah Rashno told IRNA that the quake has damaged buildings and toppled telephone lines.

People in Doroud ran into the streets in panic when the first quake hit shortly after midnight. Many spent the remainder of the night outside.

"We are afraid to get back home. I spent the night with my family and guests in open space last night," Doroud resident Mahmoud Chaharmiri told The Associated Press by telephone.

Chaharmiri said there were no scenes of destruction in Doroud such as those seen in the past in the wake of similar quakes around Iran.

In February 2005, a 6.4-magnitude quake in southern Iran killed 612 people and injured more than 1,400.

A magnitude 6.6 quake flattened the historic southeastern city of Bam in the same region in December 2003, killing 26,000 people.

Iran is located on seismic fault lines and is prone to earthquakes. On average, it experiences at least one slight earthquake every day.

Bomber Kills 3 Israelis As Hamas Takes Power (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

JERUSALEM, March 30 — A Palestinian suicide bomber, possibly disguised as an observant Jew, blew himself up at a gas station in the West Bank on Thursday evening, turning a car into a fireball and killing three Israelis inside the vehicle, Israeli news reports said.

Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades claimed responsibility for the blast, which came hours after the newly installed Palestinian cabinet, led by Hamas, took up its duties in the Palestinian Authority government offices.

The new Palestinian interior minister, Said Siam, who is in charge of the police, announced that Palestinian militants would no longer be arrested by the Palestinian security forces.

The bomber apparently used his disguise to approach an Israeli car and ask for a ride, Israeli Army radio reported. He then detonated his explosive next to or inside the vehicle, which was stopped at a gas station outside the entrance to the Jewish settlement of Kedumim, in the northern West Bank, according to the media reports.

Several hours after the blast, the Israeli military confirmed that at least three people had been killed, but said that their identities had not been established. The military said a number of details were sketchy and an investigation was still under way.

Thursday's attack was the first deadly bombing since Dec. 29, when an Islamic Jihad suicide bomber killed an Israeli soldier and two Palestinians at a military checkpoint in the West Bank.

Most Palestinian suicide bombings over the past five years have been inside Israeli cities. But in response to the bombings, Israel has imposed a web of travel restrictions that have made it much more difficult for Palestinian bombers to enter Israel and reach the cities.

Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades identified the bomber as Mahmoud Masharka, 24. The group has carried out many attacks against Israel in recent years. It is linked to the Fatah movement, which dominated Palestinian politics for decades until it was defeated by Hamas, the militant Islamic movement, in parliamentary elections in January.

There has been speculation by political analysts that Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades may try to step up its attacks to show that the group, and by extension Fatah, is still a force to be reckoned with.

Hamas has carried out the largest number of suicide bombings over the past five years, but has largely observed an informal truce for more than a year and has not carried out a suicide bombing or other major attack against Israel during this time.

However, Hamas says it will not lay down its weapons or force other Palestinian factions to do so. Hours before the bombing, Mr. Siam, the interior minister, said his officers would not arrest militants, as had occasionally happened in the past.

"We will not put our sons in prison for political membership or resisting occupation, because occupation is the reason for the problem," Mr. Siam said at his office in Gaza City.

He did, however, suggest that the government might try to persuade the armed factions not to attack. "We will reach an understanding" with the militants, he said. "Resistance is a legitimate right, but how should one resist?"

The Palestinian prime minister, Ismail Haniya, and the rest of his cabinet, which is dominated by Hamas, were sworn in Wednesday and began working at government ministries on Thursday.

In a related development, the so-called quartet of international peace mediators — the United States, the European Union, the United Nations and Russia — issued a statement saying that assistance to the Palestinian Authority is likely to suffer because Hamas has not been willing to recognize Israel, renounce violence and accept previous agreements.

Rice: Palestinian Aid Decision Coming Soon (AP-Y2)

By Anne Gearan

AP2, March 30, 2006

The United States should soon decide how it will give more aid to the Palestinians that would not be diverted to bankroll the Palestinian government led by the militant group Hamas, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said.

Rice, in Europe for talks on Iran's nuclear program, said Thursday that there is international resolve that Tehran must answer suspicions that it wants to build nuclear weapons.

"The international community is united and expects Iran to adhere to the just demands of the international community that its nuclear activities be demonstrably for civilian purposes," Rice said Thursday after meeting with counterparts from the other permanent, veto-holding members of the U.N. Security Council and Germany.

A day after the new Hamas-led Palestinian government was sworn into office, the United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations issued a statement warning Hamas that it must recognize Israel and seek peace talks if it wants to be guaranteed continued aid.

"The Quartet concurred that there inevitably will be an effect on direct assistance to that government and its ministries" if those conditions are not met, the four mediators for Middle East peace said.

"The principle is very clear," Rice told reporters Wednesday evening while flying to Europe. "We're not going to ... provide funding to a Hamas-led government, but we are going to look at what we can do to increase humanitarian assistance to the Palestinian people and what mechanisms we can use to do that, to make certain that the money is not indeed supporting the Hamas-led government."

Palestinian Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar, sworn in Wednesday, said the Palestinian Authority's new government would not cave to international pressure to change its ways and that it has no plans to negotiate with Israel.

"America is committing big crimes against the Arab and Islamic countries," Zahar told The Associated Press. The decision to cut off aid to a Hamas government "will intensify the gap between the American people, American interests and the Middle East in general."

Since Hamas' parliamentary election victory on Jan. 25, the West has been threatening to cut nearly $1 billion in annual aid to the Palestinian Authority, about half its annual budget.

The United States has nearly completed a wide review of its aid programs for the Palestinians, a review begun after the surprise Hamas victory.

"It is drawing to a close and I would expect to look at some decisions pretty soon," Rice said.

She said the level of future U.S. aid is one question mark, as is the problem of deciding what kinds of projects to fund through nongovernmental organizations or other means and "what kinds of aid might in fact get diverted and so you want to avoid that."

The United States and the European Union list Hamas as a terrorist organization. The United States has said it will have no dealings with Hamas and has already moved to cut off the relatively small amount of aid it had sent directly to the Palestinian government under the previous leadership of the secular Fatah Party.

On confronting Iran, envoys from its allies Russia and China were blunt in saying they want no harsh consequences for Tehran. The U.S. and some other allies want the option of pursuing economic sanctions or other punishments should Iran fail to comply with U.N. Security Council demands issued Wednesday.

"It can only be resolved through peaceful means. The Chinese side feels that there has already been enough turmoil in the Middle East," said Chinese Vice Foreign Minister Dai Bingguo. "We do not want to see new turmoil being introduced to the region."

Those statements amounted to indirect indictments of the tougher U.S. and European approach, and call into question whether the U.N. Security Council will be able to put muscle behind its rhetoric on Iran.

Meanwhile, Rice, who was spending the next few days in England, had been invited by her British counterpart, Jack Straw, to attend Friday prayers at Masjide Al Hidayah mosque in Blackburn. However, that was canceled after mosque officials said anti-war protesters presented a security threat.

US May Support Unilateral Israel Line (FT)

By Harvey Morris

Financial Times, March 31, 2006

US envoys met Israeli leaders yesterday for the first time since Tuesday's election after Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, indicated Washington did not rule out support for unilateral measures in the West Bank by the next government.

DOJ_NMG_0024632

The visit by Elliot Abrams, the White House's Middle East adviser, and David Welch, assistant secretary of state, was scheduled before Tuesday's vote that handed the largest number of parliamentary seats to Ehud Olmert's Kadima party.

They were scheduled to meet Mr Olmert after talks with Tzipi Livni, foreign minister, and Shaul Mofaz, defence minister, on the future of the international "road map" peace plan and the implications of a new Hamas-led government in the Palestinian Authority.

The US sponsored the road map, which envisaged bilateral negotiations leading to the creation of a Palestinian state. During his election campaign, however, Mr Olmert said Israel would unilaterally withdraw to borders of its own choosing if negotiations proved impossible.

Ms Rice, speaking to reporters on a flight to Germany, said: "I wouldn't on the face of it just say absolutely we don't think there's any value in what the Israelis are talking about."

She noted that the US had supported last year's unilateral decision by Israel to withdraw from the Gaza Strip, which was ultimately carried out in co-ordination with the PA.

However, she said the US would not yet lend its support to unilateral moves until it knew more about them.

Washington on Wednesday instructed its officials not to have any contacts with the members of the new Hamas-led government, whether or not they belonged to the Islamic party. Ms Rice nevertheless reinforced the message that the ban did not extend to Mahmoud Abbas, the PA's Fatah president.

The international quartet of which the US is a member, along with the European Union, United Nations and Russia, noted in a statement in Brussels yesterday that Hamas had failed to heed its demand that it recognise Israel, renounce violence and commit itself to past peace agreements.

"There inevitably will be an effect on direct assistance to that government and its ministries," the statement said.

With just 29 seats in the Knesset, Mr Olmert needs the support of at least 33 parliamentarians from other parties in order to form a majority coalition.

Likud Tries To Regroup After Election Losses (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, March 31, 2006

TEL AVIV -- Israel's right wing found itself searching for a leader and a program yesterday after the shock of Tuesday's elections, in which the long-dominant Likud Party was reduced to one of several minor parliamentary factions.

Calls are being heard for former Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to be replaced as leader of Likud amid charges that he has alienated moderate voters from the nation's most dominant party of the past 30 years.

Rising as a new champion of the right is Avigdor Lieberman, whose party of Russian immigrants, Yisrael Beiteinu, finished with 11 seats to Likud's 12 in the final results, which were announced yesterday.

The centrist Kadima party of Prime Minister Ehud Olmert finished with 29 seats, one more than previously reported.

Although Mr. Olmert will cast the elections as a mandate for his plan to settle Israel's final borders within four years, the larger story for many is the fragmentation of the right triggered by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's decision to unilaterally withdraw from the Gaza Strip and later to leave Likud.

"After Sharon's resignation, the Likud found itself as an extremist right-wing party on two levels -- on the diplomatic level and on the socioeconomic level," said Danny Naveh, one of the few returning Likud legislators, in an interview with Israel Radio.

For the first time in its history, Likud has lost its claim of being the natural home for the Israeli right, which is splintered among Likud, Yisrael Beiteinu and an alliance of smaller settler-dominated parties that took nine seats.

The relative parity has prompted some to call for the three nationalist parties to join forces in a bloc that would control 32 of the 120 seats in the Knesset.

"I hope they will be wise enough to unite, but I don't see it happening," said Shaul Goldstein, a member of the Jewish settler council in the West Bank.

Mr. Goldstein said he thought Mr. Lieberman should become the right's new leader, arguing that Likud represents the "soft right" while the settler alliance isn't connected with the broader Israeli public.

DOJ_NMG_0024633

"Each of the right-wing parties is an ideological world unto itself," said Yossi Klein Halevi, a senior fellow at the Shalem Center, a Jerusalem research institute. "It is an illusion today to talk about the Israeli right as one entity."

Mr. Halevi said that both Likud and Mr. Lieberman would support withdrawing from the West Bank under certain circumstances -- something that traditionally would have been unimaginable for a right-wing Israeli party.

"There's only one truly right-wing party left in Israel, and that's the National Union-National Religious Party coalition," he said. The setter party, he added, "electorally isn't worth very much."

Mr. Netanyahu worked during the campaign to win back moderately conservative voters from the Kadima party, opening himself to criticism from the settler alliance, which ran under the slogan "A new right is on the rise." The settlers charged that Likud and Mr. Netanyahu had not done enough to prevent the withdrawal last year from the Gaza Strip.

Israel's Surprise Issue (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

The world expected Israel to have an election on national security, but the voters decided that it was about the economy, stupid.

Tuesday's vote was supposed to be the "big bang" in which the Kadima party, led by Ehud Olmert, the acting prime minister, won a mandate for a new political center built around a unilateral evacuation from large parts of the West Bank.

Kadima -- the word means "forward" in Hebrew -- won a plurality, 29 seats in the 120-member parliament, and Olmert is expected to lead the new government. But the energy in the election was around social and economic issues, and the big winners were a group of parties that ran against Israel's rising social inequality.

The biggest surprise was the sudden emergence of a Pensioners Party that called for higher social benefits for the elderly. Led by Rafi Eitan, who helped in the capture of Nazi war criminal Adolf Eichmann in 1960, the Pensioners went from zero to seven seats.

The Labor Party, which had far more to say about economic justice than security, won 20 seats. And Shas, an ultra-orthodox religious grouping that ran on restoring some of Israel's old social benefits, won 12. Labor Party leader Amir Peretz sees these 39 seats as a "social bloc" determined to deal with rising poverty and inequality in Israel.

Stanley Greenberg, an American pollster who worked for the Labor Party, noted that outsiders might find it strange that economics trumped security as a voting issue even after Hamas, the party that has strong terrorist ties and rejects the existence of Israel, won the recent Palestinian elections.

"It would be like having al-Qaeda winning the election in Mexico and then having an American election on prescription drugs," Greenberg said in a phone interview from Tel Aviv yesterday.

The power of economics reflected the strength of the backlash against the privatization and deregulation policies pushed by Binyamin Netanyahu, the leader of the right-wing Likud Party who was finance minister earlier in the decade. A Likud loss was inevitable after Prime Minister Ariel Sharon split off from the party to form Kadima once Likud rejected his West Bank pullout plan. Olmert took over Kadima's leadership after Sharon was incapacitated by a stroke.

But Likud's collapse to 12 seats and a fourth-place tie with Shas, Greenberg said, was a sign that reaction against Netanyahu's free-market economic policies "was so strong that Netanyahu couldn't get an audience" on security issues. At one point in the campaign, the former finance minister apologized for the social pain his approach -- widely hailed by free-market economists outside Israel -- had inflicted.

Writing yesterday in Haaretz, journalist Ruth Sinai pointed to rising poverty rates to argue that the election was "above all a victory for the civic, social welfare agenda" and "a clear expression of public disgust for the economic policy championed by the Likud." Greenberg noted that for the first time, "poverty was a word that gained currency in the mainstream political debate."

Paradoxically, domestic social concerns rose to the top of voters' minds precisely because the security situation is frozen. Most Israelis do not see how negotiations are possible with Hamas. The death of grand dreams -- either of a "Greater Israel" that included the West Bank or of a permanent negotiated peace with the Palestinians -- allowed many Israelis to look homeward and seek greater social justice within their own society.

"All politics is local, and this was as much a local election about local concerns as it was a big election about national security concerns," said Douglas Schoen, an American pollster who conducted surveys in Israel. Schoen argues that Olmert, who ran behind expectations, could have won more seats if he had focused more on voters' economic concerns.

Underscoring the local nature of the election, the strong showing of Eitan's Pensioners Party can be attributed in part to the fact that Peretz is the first Sephardic (i.e., non-European) Jew to lead Labor. Eitan's party appears to have picked up votes from pro-Labor European Jews not quite ready to vote for a Sephardic leader. But Peretz's ability to cut into the lower-income segment of the Sephardic vote, once a stronghold for Likud, could mean that more class-oriented politics is in Israel's future.

Voters can cast aside their economic concerns for only so long, even in a nation facing an existential threat. In the one election in a long time in which Israeli voters had a chance to protest economic inequalities, they seized the opportunity.

EU And US In WTO Challenge To China (FT)

By Christopher Swann, Raphael Minder And James Mackintosh

Financial Times, March 31, 2006

The US and the European Union on Thursday joined forces for the first time to challenge China before the World Trade Organisation, sweeping aside diplomatic niceties weeks before a visit of the Chinese president to Washington.

The complaint, accusing China of maintaining illegal trade barriers against imported car parts, is provocatively timed ahead of Hu Jintao's visit.

Rob Portman, US trade representative, indicated that diplomacy would not be allowed to stand in the way of defending American industry. "The timing of these exercises ought not to be dictated by political concerns," he said. "We do not think this is something aggressive but appropriate...The issue has become ripe."

The US has negotiated with China over its curbs for more than a year. Mr Portman said it had given China every opportunity to agree a deal, including 11th hour talks with the Chinese ambassador on the eve of yesterday's announcement.

Both Brussels and Washington said they hoped a solution could still be reached before the WTO began formal settlement proceedings. Thursday's move opens the way for 60 days of consultations with China to see whether the dispute can be resolved. If not, the two plaintiffs will probably ask for the creation of a WTO panel to rule on the issue.

Peter Mandelson, the EU's trade commissioner, said: "It remains my strong preference and intention to seek an amicable solution to this issue."

China has only faced one previous WTO case - brought by the US - over semiconductors. The US administration has been under growing pressure from Congress to take a tougher line. Thursday's action was the latest signal that Washington intends to become more aggressive in using the WTO and other trade tools to open China's market for US exports. The US exported $645m worth of car parts to China last year in a market estimated at $19.1bn.

Max Baucus, a Democratic senator who has introduced legislation to crack down on alleged trade violations by China, welcomed the move Thursday but warned: "We are in a dangerous place in our relationship with China, partly because China does not always play by the rules."

The case aims at regulations intended to encourage Chinese carmakers to use domestic rather than imported car parts. The US and EU claim China is imposing unfair "local content'' rules through a complex tariff system that raises the import tariffs from 10 per cent to 25 per cent if foreign parts make up more than a certain proportion of a car.

The EU has also previously challenged "local content'' rules applied by India, Canada and Indonesia. China, however, has defended this system as a way of preventing carmakers from importing whole cars as spare parts to avoid the higher tariffs on fully constructed vehicles.

U.S., EU File Case At WTO Challenging China's Auto-Parts Tariffs (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration launched legal action aimed at opening China's rapidly growing market to foreign-made auto parts, raising trade friction with Beijing a few weeks before Chinese President Hu Jintao is due to visit the U.S.

Joined by the 25-nation European Union, the U.S. filed a case yesterday at the World Trade Organization in Geneva, lodging complaints over the high import tariffs that China levies on foreign-made car parts. The U.S. contends the tariffs are designed to discourage auto manufacturers in China from using imported parts and are at odds with market-access commitments made by China when the nation was accepted into the WTO in 2001.

In some cases, U.S. officials complain, China assesses tariffs as high as 28% on foreign-made auto parts, under a system that requires vehicle manufacturers in China to report the value and country of origin for component parts. For vehicles with low amounts of imported components, tariffs of only 10% to 14% are applied.

The filing of the case ends months of informal consultations between the U.S. and China on the dispute and marks a new turn in a sometimes rocky economic relationship. U.S. Trade Representative Rob Portman said the "United States has raised this issue repeatedly," but with no success. "As a mature trading partner, China should be held accountable for its actions and be required to live up to its responsibilities," said Mr. Portman.

Mr. Portman said he called China's ambassador to the U.S. on Wednesday and "expressed my disappointment" that the complaints "had not been resolved through dialogue."

A spokesman at the Chinese embassy in Washington had no comment. Chinese officials have long argued that their rules comply with WTO agreements and are designed only to prevent car makers from circumventing their laws by importing whole cars as spare parts to avoid the higher rate that applies to whole cars.

U.S. officials say American companies have only a small slice of China's estimated $19 billion market for auto parts. In 2005, U.S. exports of auto parts to China totaled only $539.82 million, according to the U.S. International Trade Commission. Worldwide, U.S. exports of auto parts totaled $43.38 billion in 2005, the bulk of that going to Canada and Mexico, where the auto industry has built close ties.

Under WTO rules, yesterday's action starts the clock on a 60-day period in which the parties are supposed to convene formal talks to resolve the dispute. If the consultations fail, the case would then move into a second phase in which the U.S. and EU would have the right to pursue action that could ultimately result in penalties -- special tariffs -- being imposed on China.

The filing of the case reflects the get-tough attitude now prevailing in the Bush administration and on Capitol Hill. The U.S. brought its first WTO case against China in 2004, a dispute over the tax treatment of semiconductors that was eventually resolved through negotiations. American readiness to pursue confrontation, rather than extended dialogue, has picked up significantly since then.

Late last year, the administration began using WTO rules to pressure China to better combat piracy of U.S. intellectual property. And earlier this year, the U.S. forced China to back away from special duties that had been imposed on U.S. boxmakers, amid threats of taking the issue to the WTO.

Outside of the WTO, the U.S. last year negotiated a three-year pact with China that sharply limited shipments of Chinese-made apparel into the country. Administration trade officials are considering bringing a case challenging China's export subsidies.

The administration's hardened trade posture reflects pressure brought by U.S. manufacturers and critics on Capitol Hill, who contend last year's $202 billion U.S. trade deficit with China shows that Beijing doesn't play fair in the global trading system.

Among other things, critics complain Beijing keeps the value of the country's currency artificially low, giving Chinese companies an edge over competitors in the world marketplace. The currency issue remains a major sticking point ahead of Mr. Hu's mid-April visit to Washington.

U.S. Takes Parts Fight With China To WTO (WP)

By Paul Blustein

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

The United States filed a complaint against China at the World Trade Organization yesterday in a dispute about auto parts, the latest sign of trade strains between Washington and Beijing.

The case is only the second brought against China since its entry into the WTO in 2001. The Bush administration filed the other complaint as well, in a spat involving a tax on computer chips. The European Union joined the United States in yesterday's complaint.

"As a mature trading partner, China should be held accountable for its actions and be required to live up to its responsibilities," Rob Portman, the U.S. trade representative, said in a statement.

The move comes amid pressure on the administration from members of Congress to take a tough stance on China's trade practices, especially as the trade deficit with China swelled to $201.6 billion last year, the biggest U.S. gap ever with any country. Beijing's alleged transgressions include allowing rampant piracy of movies and music and keeping the value of the Chinese yuan at an artificially low level, which critics say gives Chinese manufacturers an unfair competitive advantage.

These conflicts are sure to be a source of tension in coming weeks. China's president, Hu Jintao, is scheduled to visit Washington in mid-April, and that trip will be preceded by a meeting April 11 between top-level trade negotiators for both sides.

Portman and his aides have been complaining for some time about China's treatment of imported auto parts. The United States exported $645 million of auto parts to China last year, but the fast-growing Chinese auto parts market is worth about $19 billion, according to Commerce Department estimates. U.S. parts makers could gain considerably greater sales if Beijing did not discriminate against foreign-made parts in favor of Chinese-made parts, U.S. negotiators assert.

The U.S. grievance concerns regulations that are designed to boost the local content of vehicles produced in China -- something that China promised not to do when it entered the WTO, according to Portman. The regulations effectively impose a 28 percent tax on imported auto parts, a rate equal to the duty on imported vehicles, if the finished vehicle fails to meet local content requirements. In the U.S. and E.U. view, that violates another Chinese pledge, to lower its tariffs on auto parts well below tariffs on vehicles. China's standard tariff on auto parts is between 10 and 14 percent.

Portman said he hoped that bringing the case would lead to "speedy resolution of this issue," a sentiment echoed by his European counterpart, Peter Mandelson, who said, "It remains my strong preference and intention to seek an amicable solution."

The case involving computer chips was settled to Washington's satisfaction before it was submitted to a panel of WTO judges. In another case, U.S. officials threatened to bring a WTO case against anti-dumping duties that Beijing imposed on a U.S. paper product, and the Chinese repealed the duties before a complaint was filed.

Under WTO rules, the two sides in a case must try for 60 days to negotiate a solution before bringing the matter before a tribunal, where a resolution can take months. If a tribunal rules that China is violating its WTO commitments, it must either cease the offending conduct or face the prospect of penalties against its exports.

Congressional Democrats, who have regularly accused the administration of failing to enforce trade rules aggressively, gave grudging approval to yesterday's announcement. "I am pleased USTR has filed this case and I trust it will be the first of many in coming months," said Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin (D-Md.), ranking minority member on the House Ways and Means Committee subcommittee on trade.

U.S. And Europe Say Tariff By China Is Discriminatory (NYT)

By Eduardo Porter

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 30 — The heat on China is not letting up. In a rare coordinated move, the United States and the European Union filed a complaint on Thursday with the World Trade Organization, accusing China of imposing discriminatory tariffs on foreign suppliers of auto parts.

The action came 10 days before the beginning of a round of high-level trade talks between the United States and China, and less than three weeks before a visit to Washington by President Hu Jintao of China.

Coming amid heightened concern over China's large and growing trade surpluses, the complaint was seen as part of a broader attempt to address the growing criticism resonating in Washington and Brussels against China's trade policies.

"We're seeing a closer scrutiny of problems and more diligence in using unfair trade laws to counter perceived problems with trade with China," said Jeffrey J. Schott, a senior fellow at the Institute for International Economics here.

The complaint is only the second brought against China since it joined the trade organization in 2001; the United States filed a complaint in 2004 over China's tax treatment of domestic and imported semiconductors.

Now, according to a statement by the European Commission, China is requiring that when imported parts make up more than 60 percent of the final value of a locally assembled car, the parts will be charged the tariff that applies to whole vehicles, which is much higher. This would force carmakers in China to find local sources for more parts.

Over the last few years, American and European manufacturers have flocked to China, where the car market is already one of the biggest in the world and still growing while other markets have stagnated. Many big parts suppliers have followed the manufacturers there.

Still, American auto parts makers export relatively little to China. According to the office of the United States trade representative, Rob Portman, auto parts exports to China grew by about 6 percent last year, to $645 million — a small part of the overall market, which was $19 billion in 2004. They make up only a tiny slice of American manufactured exports to China, which grew more than 20 percent last year, to $32.5 billion.

While the American auto parts industry supported the complaint, it hardly seemed exultant. "It's important to have the rules right," said Brian Duggan, director of trade and commercial policy at the Motor and Equipment Manufacturers Association. "China is a hugely important current and future market. We want them to proceed with the case."

Indeed, the complaint seemed to have a much bigger symbolic impact beyond the world of auto parts. "This is a wonderful thing," said Franklin J. Vargo, vice president for international economic affairs at the National Association of Manufacturers. "It is the first thing the administration has done to show it really means it when it says we have a new trade policy with China."

The action played well on Capitol Hill, where some Democrats and Republicans have ratcheted up attacks against China and its policy of keeping its currency, the yuan, tightly linked to the dollar. That peg, they argue, gives Chinese products an unfair edge over American rivals and contributes to America's $202 billion bilateral trade deficit.

"I support this action by Ambassador Portman and commend his leadership on securing our rights under our trade agreements," Senator Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa, said in a statement. Two days ago, Mr. Grassley introduced a bill that would require the government to focus more attention on China's currency policies.

Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, who on Tuesday decided to pull back from submitting a bill that would impose steep tariffs on imports from China if the yuan was not allowed to rise, said: "The relationship, in an ironic way, is getting better. Instead of glossing over the problems each side is addressing them directly. In the past things were just swept under the rug."

Consultations are the first phase in a W.T.O. dispute. If no settlement is reached in 60 days, the issue can be referred to a dispute settlement panel.

This will not be the last time the United States complains against China at the W.T.O. It has other potentially bigger complaints. In February, Mr. Portman said that if the Chinese did not take additional steps to protect intellectual property rights, "We are prepared to pursue legal options."

The United States won the 2004 semiconductor case when China agreed to end the preferential tax treatment for domestic manufacturers. If the W.T.O. comes to be perceived as the adequate forum to deal with China's perceived unfair trade practices, disputes might become less heated and more routine.

"The fact that the United States trade representative is doing what the Congress has told him to do helps release some of the steam from the pressure cooker," said Mr. Schott, of the Institute of International Economics.

By Kathy Chen

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

BEIJING -- When Chinese President Hu Jintao visits the U.S. in mid-April, he is sure to field tough questions about Beijing's trade and economic policies amid a wave of rising protectionism. But he also is grappling with a similar backlash at home.

Amid one of the longest and fastest growth streaks of any modern economy, China is wrestling with concerns from a rising wealth gap to corruption to environmental damage. But the latest uproar has turned on foreigners, targeting the many outside investors that have piled into China and prospered -- even while fueling much of the country's growth.

"Since last year, foreign companies have been fiercely buying up Chinese companies, including some core companies," said Li Shuguang, a vice dean at the Chinese University of Politics and Law in Beijing. "Foreign capital is so strong, a lot of Chinese companies have just collapsed."

The debate parallels the resurgence of protectionist sentiment in the U.S., which has been driven in part by concerns over China's clout. Last year, China's state-owned Cnooc Corp. abandoned a bid for U.S.-based Unocal Corp. amid a political outcry. More recently, U.S. policy makers have complained that China is refusing to allow its currency, the yuan, to appreciate quickly enough, fueling a flood of cheap Chinese exports and aggravating a trade imbalance.

The U.S. reported a 2005 trade deficit with China of $201.62 billion, up more than 20% from 2004. China, which counts trade differently, says it was much narrower. Yesterday, the U.S. and European Union filed a trade case at the World Trade Organization to protest China's import tariffs on foreign-made car parts.

Meanwhile, the debate inside China is causing the government to rethink its approach. In banking, for instance, some economists and state officials argue that the government has sold foreign stakes in its major state-run commercial banks too cheaply. Some negotiations, including an effort led by Citigroup Inc. to take an 85% stake in Guangdong Development Bank, have dragged on for months as regulators fret over the potential fallout of further inroads by foreigners.

Also drawing scrutiny is a $375 million bid by Carlyle Group, a prominent U.S.-based private-equity firm, for an 85% stake in state-run Xugong Group Construction Machinery Co., a big player in China's construction-machinery sector. "People are asking more questions [about the transaction] to ensure there are sufficient measures to protect the interests of local players and protect national brands, which is understandable," said a person close to the deal.

In another case, Hangzhou Advance Gearbox Group Co., a maker of marine jet-propulsion systems that claims 80% of the Chinese and Southeast Asian markets, has said it halted talks with Germany's ZF Group late last year over worries about its motivations. ZF Group, a competitor of Hangzhou Advance, had been in talks for three years for a 70% stake in the Chinese state-owned company.

"We understand that what these foreign companies actually covet is the Chinese market we now occupy," said Xu Jiangang, head of Hangzhou Advance's general affairs office.

Recently, the controversy has spilled into public view. This month, representatives of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference, a national representative body with limited powers, seized on a rumored deal involving Caterpillar Inc. to complain about foreign domination in some sectors and the disappearance of Chinese brands.

Caterpillar refused to comment on that transaction, but a spokesman rejected China's broader concerns, adding that a move by either the U.S. or China to "turn inward...is not a good thing." Among a range of possible deals, Caterpillar has been in talks to strengthen ties to Shanghai Diesel Engine Co.

The concentration of industries in foreign hands has become a common theme. An oft-quoted 2004 report from the State Administration of Industry and Commerce, for instance, notes that Coca-Cola Co. dominates China's domestic soft-drink market and Eastman Kodak Co. holds a 50% share of the film sector.

Meeting with newspaper editors earlier this month, Ma Kai, head of the China's most powerful economic agency, the National Development and Reform Commission, pointedly noted that only 23 U.S. businesses were operating in China in 1980, with combined investment of $120 million. As of last year, he said, there were 49,000, with combined investment of $51 billion. "We should first make clear that the U.S. has benefited from this growth," he said.

Few expect a significant rollback of China's 27-year drive toward a market-driven system. The country has weathered fundamental questioning of the role of economic reforms before, in the 1980s and again in the early 1990s.

But China's latest reform crisis could weaken Mr. Hu's ability -- and his appetite -- to tackle issues of U.S. concern during his visit. He plans to meet with President Bush, and likely will bring some offerings, possibly including a government contract for Microsoft Corp. software. But he is unlikely to deliver much of what Washington wants, such as allowing the yuan to appreciate more sharply.

In some ways, the 63-year-old Mr. Hu faces a more complex situation than his predecessors, as China becomes more like the U.S., with greater tolerance of dissenting views and organized interest groups. Resistance to some market-oriented changes is mostly driven by special interests such as disenfranchised farmers, private businessmen and ministries trying to hold on to their powers. At the national legislature's March meeting, lobbying by interest groups picked up markedly.

Among more than 1,000 bills proposed by delegates were several aimed at restricting foreign access to domestic markets. Wang Tian, a delegate from the southern province of Hunan who heads his own chain store, submitted a "service-trade safeguard bill," which would protect Chinese companies in the retail, financial and services sectors.

"Almost all supermarkets over 10,000 square meters in coastal provinces are dominated by Carrefour, Wal-Mart and Metro, and many remaining [Chinese-owned] ones are in talks with foreign retailers," Mr. Wang said, referring to the French, U.S. and German retail chains, respectively.

Meanwhile, the State-Owned Assets Supervision and Administration Commission, which oversees the country's key state-run companies, and other agencies are working on guidelines to govern mergers and acquisitions of Chinese firms with well-known brands or significant market share. The National Development and Reform Commission says a target for regulation will be foreigners.

"Foreign investment has played an active role in tapping idle state assets, optimizing industrial structure and promoting technological progress, but it has also caused serious problems like over-concentrated market share in some sectors," the commission's spokesman said in a written response to questions.

During the country's last crisis over the economy, in the early 1990s, the leading critics of market changes were other high-ranking officials who believed capitalism was wrong for China. The late Deng Xiaoping, then the paramount leader, stamped out opposition in 1992 on a sweeping tour of southern China, where the free market was thriving.

Like Mr. Deng, Mr. Hu and Premier Wen Jiabao have asked China to support reforms. At a news conference after the legislature's March meeting, Mr. Wen made a rare televised appeal. "We must consistently and unwaveringly press ahead on the road of reform," he said. "To backpedal offers no way out."

At the same time, there are some signs of government indecision. Last year, when securities regulators proposed freezing foreign applications to set up joint-venture securities companies, the State Council, or cabinet, solicited the opinions of other agencies. But when the agencies disagreed, it failed to make a ruling, effectively allowing securities regulators to implement the freeze last December, according to one former official.

In some cases, lobbyists are using the media to win attention from China's government. Lu Yansun, a former deputy minister of the now-defunct Ministry of Machine-Building Industry, was enraged to read a short newspaper article on the fate of state-run Xibei Bearing Co.'s profitable train bearings business. Xibei used to have a 25% share of China's train bearings market and its own "NXZ" brand, but it effectively disappeared from the sector after that business was sold to German bearings manufacturer INA-Holding Schaeffler KG in 2003.

Mr. Lu suggested that China Industry News, a paper affiliated with the semi-official China Machinery Industry Federation, investigate. The result was a series charging that foreign investors -- including Caterpillar and the U.S. agriculture and forestry-equipment maker Deere & Co. -- have taken over key companies in the capital-goods sector, only to wipe out their brands and seize market share.

Mr. Lu and He Guangyuan, a former machinery industry minister, also wrote a letter to the State Council. Mr. Lu said several top leaders responded that a "set of administration rules...should be established."

In February, the council unveiled a number of policies to support the sector, including a rule that domestically made equipment should account for 60% of total equipment purchases for key projects funded by central and local governments. Vice Premier Zeng Peiyan this month said the cabinet will issue a set of preferential policies to rejuvenate the sector, reflecting "national will," according to the official Xinhua News Agency.

Benedict's Chinese Flock (WSJ)

It may not be Easter yet, but the Vatican is working hard on an earthly resurrection of its own: the restoration of ties with China. But there is a catch. Beijing insists that the Holy See drop its recognition of Taiwan in exchange for the right to minister to the mainland faithful.

Many a pontiff has dreamt of giving China's Roman Catholics greater contact with Rome. Pope Paul VI took the quietly-quietly approach, choosing not to denounce communism in his Vatican II encyclical. His was the last visit to "China" by a pontiff -- a three-hour Hong Kong stopover in 1970. Well-traveled Pope John Paul II never got that far, as Beijing denied him a visit.

China's violent repression of religion and its forced-abortion policies don't sit easily with the Roman Catholic faith. But this week, Pope Benedict XVI declared that he "will come" to China. The Vatican's foreign minister, Archbishop Giovanni Lajolo, added that "the time is ripe" for reconciliation. Hong Kong's newly crowned cardinal, Joseph Zen, suggested yesterday that the Vatican sever its official relationship with Taiwan. "There are a lot more people to be taken care of in China," he said.

China agrees, with the usual strings attached. Beijing insisted yesterday that the Holy See sever diplomatic ties with Taiwan and agree not to intervene in China's domestic matters, including the appointment of clergy.

This is an old game. Witness China's success in blocking Taipei's applications to the U.N. and World Health Organization. But it's particularly odious for China to play that card on spiritual matters. And it shows how frightened Beijing's Communists are of relinquishing their perceived control of the people's hearts and souls -- even if affections were lost long ago.

The Vatican is the only European government that still holds an official diplomatic relationship with Taiwan. It will be tempting for Pope Benedict to trade recognition for access to China's 12 million Catholics. The moral aspects of such a bargain are not as clear-cut as they might seem at first, particularly if a relationship with Beijing might enable the Vatican to swing more weight in defending religious and civil rights on the mainland.

Nonetheless, the Vatican would be well-advised to demand some serious concessions in return. China boasts an "official" Catholic Church of around five million, whose priests pledge fealty to the Communist Party as a condition of serving their congregations. The unofficial "underground" church that is repressed and recognizes the pope is likely much larger.

Both sides might do well to agree to a Vietnam-like compromise. In Vietnam the Holy See is recognized, but must consult with the Communist government before naming new clergy. While that offends Catholic purists, it's given Vietnam's Communist Party a better image; the Church, a new flock; and the people of Vietnam, a moral purpose the party can't provide.

It's important not to forget how brutal Beijing has been to people who dare to promote religious freedom. One recent victim is Hao Wu, a 34-year-old Chinese filmmaker making a movie about underground Christian congregations. He was arrested in February without explanation and hasn't been heard from since. Since we're on the subject of religion, he might take comfort from the Book of Matthew: "Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven."

US Military Ends Quake Aid (CSM)

By David Montero

The Christian Science Monitor, March 31, 2006

ISLAMABAD, PAKISTAN - The next chapter of Abdul Qaduz's earthquake recovery began rather silently, without fuss or fanfare. Within moments his family pulled down their tent, where five had huddled at night for months, and promptly put it in the back of a truck, along with chairs and mattresses, cooking pots, and electrical wires. The aging father says he will repitch his tent on a patch of ground when he returns home. Only its outline remained pressed in the dirt, surrounded by cans of vegetable oil marked "USA" in large letters.

Thousands of families like those of Mr. Qaduz are expected to return to their native villages by Friday, inaugurating the next phase of the earthquake rehabilitation. Also heading home are US military personnel involved in helping those families get back on their feet. Friday marks the official end of the US humanitarian operation that began within 48 hours of the earthquake.

In the last six months, some 1,200 US military personnel and a fleet of 24 helicopters have delivered over 15,000 tons of humanitarian aid, in what has been called the largest disaster relief operation in US military history.

The "angels of mercy," as US helicopters have been called, have delivered not only aid but much needed goodwill in Pakistan, softening an otherwise rocky relationship with the United States. Polling in recent months has shown a marked improvement for the US image among the Pakistani public as a result of the American helping hand.

Mr. Qaduz and other survivors say the generosity from the US soldiers and relief workers will never be forgotten. "They have helped us a lot. It should be written in history," he says, his brothers nodding their heads in agreement.

But some analysts caution that the US must sustain its commitment to reconstruction if larger criticisms against its foreign policies are to be minimized.

"While on the one side, the relations between the US and Pakistan should improve, on the other hand much more has to be done to continue the goodwill built through earthquake relief," says Lt. Gen. Kamal Matinuddin (ret.), a political analyst in Islamabad. "Otherwise it will wither away."

The government's March 31 deadline is timed partly to the passing of winter into spring. As warming temperatures clear snow from the highland communities devastated by the October quake, thousands of tents that once crowded the lower hills and open plains have been rolled up. Hundreds of families are making the trek back home, some happy to be returning, others worried that they will not find the medical and relief services they have come to rely on for so many bitter months.

The US military presence helped make those services possible. At an official farewell ceremony Thursday at an airport outside Islamabad, there were words of thanks and bittersweet goodbyes from both sides.

"It is very hard to say goodbye to our friends in Pakistan," said a visibly moved Rear Adm. Michael LeFever, commander of the US Disaster Assistance Center in Pakistan. "But we are excited about the reconstruction and rehabilitation under way by the USAID and the Pakistani government."

Admiral LeFever and US Ambassador to Pakistan Ryan Crocker underscored the enduring US commitment to helping rebuild. "The effort goes forward. This is a transitional period, not a culmination period," Ambassador Crocker said, backdropped by a Chinook helicopter. "We are deeply involved with the Pakistani government."

The extent of that involvement includes more than $500 million for reconstruction, in addition to $1.5 billion in assistance for education, health-care, governance, and economic growth.

The need for such assistance is especially clear in the remains of relief camps, where doubt hangs heavily over those returning home. Qaduz, from the village of Nuri, is one of those reluctant to leave Balakot, his makeshift home now for several months. "Our property is destroyed, but we are compelled by the government to return to our village," he says. "We're not happy because there is no system there. There are no road links, no schools, no health facilities."

Intermingled with the hints of frustration and doubt, there is also an abiding sense of gratitude for the US help. Such was the opinion of Mustak Aman, busy taking down his own tent in Balakot. "We feel a lot of care for the Americans because they helped us more than the other countries," he says.

It is a newfound sense of understanding shared on both sides. US Marine Malcolm Chaney, from Atlanta, wasn't sure what to expect in Pakistan, but he says he'll leave with a better appreciation for its people. "One day we sat down with some Pakistan officials and their imam," he says. "We had a discussion about our religions, and the imam basically said what I was thinking - that basically we're all the same."

Some analysts say the earthquake helps to underscore how much more work needs to be done to mend relations. "[The rescue operation] has had a positive outcome, not only among the governments, but among the people. But there are other negative fallouts that clouded the impact of this relationship," says Lt. Gen. Talat Masood (ret.), referring to such incidents as the CIA missile strike in Bajaur Agency that killed 13 civilians.

Others agree, saying the quake relief cannot completely mitigate the anger many Pakistanis feel toward the US because of its wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. "That is a separate issue and people will continue to criticize America," says General Matinuddin. But he says that a deep and long-term US role in reconstruction is still critical. "It will minimize the feeling against America. At least the government will have a handle to tell the public, 'Look, America is doing this, this, and this.' "

India's Training Of Iranian Military Could Dampen Nuclear Deal: US Lawmaker (AFP-Y2)

AFP, March 30, 2006

India's alleged training of Iranian troops could dampen vital US Congress support for a bilateral landmark civilian nuclear deal, a ranking Democrat warned Thursday.

Tom Lantos, the top Democrat on the House of Representatives' powerful international relations committee scrutinizing the nuclear deal, expressed concern to visiting Indian Foreign Secretary Shyam Saran during talks here over New Delhi's training of the Iranian navy, the lawmaker's spokeswoman Lynne Weil told AFP.

"Congressman Lantos pointed out that episodes of conflict in relations between US and India, such as India's early wavering in its commitment to refer Iran to the UN Security Council and more recent concerns raised about Iranian troops receiving training from India will only undermine Congressional support for the deal," she said.

Reacting to the concerns, the Indian government said two Iranian naval ships with about 200 personnel were on a six-day "informal" visit to the southern Indian naval base in Kochi in March while on an annual sea training sortie in the Arabian Sea.

The port call was essentially "diplomatic-goodwill" and not part of any training package, said Venu Rajamony, spokesman for the Indian embassy in Washington.

He said the Iranian ships "interacted" with the Indian Navy as part of the visit, adding that activities included courtesy calls on Indian naval officers, navigational simulation and recreational activities such as yachting.

Washington is trying to rein in Iran's uranium enrichment activities amid suspicion that Tehran could be pursuing covert development of nuclear weapons.

On Wednesday, the UN Security Council in New York unanimously voted to give Iran 30 days to fall into line with long-running calls to abandon uranium enrichment.

India is treading a tightrope as it tries to firm up a civilian nuclear deal with the United States and maintain its traditionally strong ties with neighbour Iran.

In February, India voted with 26 other nations to refer Iran to the UN Security Council amid charges by communists within the ruling Indian coalition that New Delhi's foreign policy was being dictated by Washington.

Lantos and Saran on Thursday discussed the US-Indian nuclear agreement in the larger context of bilateral relations "which they agreed are blossoming in many respects," Weil said.

But Lantos noted that "at a time when gestures from allies are significant -- not symbolic gestures alone but substantive gestures -- the Indian government should look for opportunities to make gestures that underscore the strength of the bilateral friendship," she said.

The India-US nuclear deal gives energy-starved India access to long-denied civilian nuclear technology in return for placing a majority of its nuclear reactors under international inspection.

For it to be effective, the US Congress has to amend the US Atomic Energy Act, which currently prohibits nuclear sales to countries that are not signatories of the Proliferation Treaty (NPT).

India has refused to sign the NPT and has developed nuclear weapons on its own.

Indian Official Defends Deal With U.S. (AP-Y2)

By Foster Klug

AP2, March 30, 2006

A landmark civilian nuclear cooperation deal with the United States would not boost India's nuclear weapons arsenal, India's foreign secretary said Thursday.

In often strong words, Foreign Secretary Shyam Saran attacked the criticism that has surrounded a pact critics say would weaken efforts to stop the spread of nuclear weapons. He told an audience at the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank, that India's record on nuclear issues has long been one of restraint and responsibility.

"India cannot be a partner and a target at the same time," Saran said.

"There is no reason," he said, "why it should be expected that merely because we have an agreement on civilian nuclear cooperation, that suddenly the floodgates will be opened by India for a larger and larger nuclear weapons arsenal."

Saran's trip comes as officials from both countries try to persuade a skeptical Congress to embrace an accord announced during President Bush's trip to India earlier this month.

Congress is considering a bill that would exempt India from U.S. laws that restrict trade with countries that have not submitted to full nuclear inspections. New Delhi has refused to sign the international Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and accept its inspection regime.

Bush is hoping to push the measure through a Republican-controlled Congress in an election year when lawmakers have rebelled against him on several issues, including the recently abandoned deal to have an Arab company based in Dubai run terminals at some U.S. ports.

Saran, who was also meeting with U.S. lawmakers, linked the nuclear pact with India's future as a powerful nation on the world stage. India is eager for sources of energy to fuel a booming economy.

If India is expected to play a greater role in fighting weapons proliferation and terrorism, Saran said, "then it is only reasonable that the energy requirements of a country with such strong credentials is recognized."

Supporters say the nuclear pact would bring India into the nonproliferation mainstream by increasing international inspections of some of its nuclear sites.

U.S.-Indian Nuclear Deal No Shoo-In (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration's proposed nuclear deal with India is meeting with a chilly reception from lawmakers, who are predicting that instead of swift approval, the initiative faces revisions and delays, if not outright rejection.

The White House had hoped to win congressional approval by the end of May for the deal, which would open the way for cooperation on India's civil nuclear program, and is also designed to begin a new strategic relationship between the United States and a populous, economically vibrant democracy.

But the initiative has found few high-profile champions on Capitol Hill or elsewhere, while becoming a target for criticism from the right and left that it could further undermine international efforts to stem the spread of nuclear weapons.

Since the deal was announced March 2, key lawmakers such as Sen. Richard G. Lugar (R-Ind.), chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and Rep. Henry J. Hyde (R-Ill.), chairman of the House International Relations Committee, have remained carefully neutral.

Meanwhile, Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-El Cajon), chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, said this month that the president "is trying to ride a nuclear tiger…. I'm skeptical."

Former Sen. Sam Nunn (D-Ga.), a respected voice on security issues, also has voiced concerns and urged lawmakers to remain skeptical.

"It may be going too far to say there's panic within the administration, but I think there's deep concern that it hasn't been received nearly as well as hoped," said a Republican House staff member, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the political sensitivity. "They're trying to create the impression of momentum. Frankly, I don't think it's there."

The legislation before Congress would lift rules barring the U.S. government from providing nuclear technology to countries such as India that have declined to sign the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty. In return for such help, India would agree to allow international inspections of its civilian reactors, though its military weapons program would remain unmonitored.

President Bush contends that by selling nuclear reactors to India, the program would ease competition for oil, help the environment and provide important new U.S. commercial ties. Administration officials also want to foster a better relationship with India because they believe it can be a strategic counterweight to China.

To provide India with nuclear knowledge, the United States must also win approval from a group of nations, known as the Nuclear Suppliers Group, that controls the international nuclear trade. But in a meeting last weekend, the India proposal drew questions from representatives of many of the countries, and the administration failed to win permission to put the deal on the agenda for the group's May meeting, as it had hoped to do.

Administration officials, who have been intensively lobbying Congress this month, have said that attempts to add conditions to the agreement could destroy a carefully crafted deal. R. Nicholas Burns, undersecretary of State for political affairs, said in an appearance this week before the Council on Foreign Relations that the administration could accept conditions that would improve the deal "as long as they don't require us to go back and break the agreement, reopen negotiations."

But legislators say they're likely to add conditions anyway. Indian Foreign Secretary Shyam Saran, in Washington this week to meet with lawmakers, seemed to accept that some changes were likely. In a speech to the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank, Saran said New Delhi could accept revisions as long as they did not upset the "delicate balance" of the proposal.

Although it is not yet clear what kind of amendments Congress might seek, it could demand assurances that India would vigorously enforce its export controls on nuclear technology, or press to require New Delhi to put any new fast-breeder reactors, which produce material for bombs, under international monitoring. Congress also might try to insist that India halt production of nuclear materials, as the United States and other leading atomic powers have done.

But India, which is building a nuclear arsenal in part as protection against China, has signaled that an attempt to impose such limits "would be a deal breaker," said the Republican staff member.

If Congress doesn't act before the summer recess, the administration could face a tougher challenge because of the difficulty of pushing through such a controversial agreement just before a midterm congressional election. Then the deal, which aides consider one of the most important accomplishments of the Bush presidency, could be put on hold until next year.

One State Department official, speaking on condition of anonymity in keeping with agency rules, insisted that the administration was finding support for the deal on Capitol Hill and from countries such as Britain, Russia, France and Australia.

"But we realize we have some questions to address," he said.

Indians Crack Down On Gender Abortions (CSM)

By Scott Baldauf

The Christian Science Monitor, March 31, 2006

NEW DELHI - In October 2001, when Dr. Anil Sabhani told a pregnant patient that she had a "female fetus and it would be taken care of," he wasn't talking about prenatal nutrition or health checks. He was talking about abortion.

With his conviction on Tuesday, Dr. Sabhani now faces two years in jail in the first-ever conviction under a 12-year old Indian law that forbids doctors from revealing the gender of a fetus to its parents. The law was aimed at preventing the all-too-common and growing practice of sex-determined abortions, which have left India with far more boys than girls.

Women's rights activists welcomed the convictions, but added that it will take more than a few high-profile trials to change India's centuries-old cultural preference for boys.

"This is 5,000 years of culture we're fighting against, but in the past decade, because of this [ultrasound] technique, and these unethical practices by medical professionals, the situation for girl children has gotten much worse," says Varsha Deshpande, an attorney for the Dalit Mahila Vikas Mandal, a Maharashtra-based advocacy group for underprivileged women. A question of culture

Ms. Deshpande's group has also conducted sting operations at ultrasound clinics in the prosperous farm belt of central Maharashtra, and has helped to file 16 criminal cases against doctors accused of sex-determination. "Culture is a difficult thing to change, it can take generations, but if we control this technique, these machines, then it will send a signal to these doctors that this will not be tolerated."

All told, there are dozens of cases pending in state courts around the country, but even activists agree that they are fighting an uphill battle. Economic pressures and cultural traditions encourage families to have boys, mostly to keep land and property in the family. Girls are often seen as a drain on family wealth, since the girl's family is required by centuries of tradition to provide a dowry to her husband's family when she marries.

Today, the illegal practice of sex-determination has brought girl-to-boy ratios to their lowest levels in recorded history, raising significant social problems for the future.

"If you find a government and a district medical officer and police officials who are all serious about the law, then you can make a difference," says Sabu George, a researcher for the Center for Women's Development Studies in New Delhi. "But that is very rare."

The conviction of Saghani follows a controversial study, published in early January in the British medical journal, The Lancet. The study claimed that up to 5 million girls were aborted since the practice of sex-determination was banned in 1994.

Ultrasound equipment is found in every district of the country, but in the areas where ultrasound clinics are in highest concentration, particularly wealthy farming districts in Punjab, Haryana, Gujarat, and in the capital city of New Delhi, the ratios of girls to boys are at their lowest. The ban notwithstanding, the number of girls per thousand boys aged 0 to 6 in the state of Punjab has dropped from 875 in 1991 down to 793 in 2001, according to 2001 Census figures. In Haryana, there were 879 girls for every thousand boys in 1991 and 820 in 2001. Pregnant women turned crimefighters

The conviction in Haryana sprung from a frustrated doctor called Rekha Mishra, who teamed up with activists to conduct a sting operation on doctors in nearby ultrasound clinics.

Pregnant women were sent into the clinics, with audio and sometimes video equipment, to record their conversations with clinic doctors. In 12 cases, doctors, including Dr. Sabhani, offered to abort female fetuses. In Haryana, 11 of those criminal cases are still pending.

"It was very difficult to get pregnant ladies persuaded to do this, and you are not conducting a case against just one person, you are getting psychological pressure, your own family is saying, 'Nobody else is doing this. Why are you doing it?'" says Dr. Mishra, a private doctor from Faridabad, south of New Delhi. "But if I get support from the authorities, and a letter authorizing me to do this, we can do this all over the country."

"We can't eliminate this practice," she adds. "But we can at least stop it to some extent."

Activists like Deshpande and George call the practice "genocide," and India's medical community has promised to do what it can to prevent the practice. But Vinay Agarwal, president of the Indian Medical Association, says that lasting change can only come through broad-based community education.

"The medical profession is doing all it can though we have to address this as a social evil," Dr. Agarwal, president of the Indian Medical Association, told the BBC. "People should be proud to have a girl child."

Sierra Leone Asks To Move Liberian's Trial (NYT)

By Lydia Polgreen And Marlise Simons

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

FREETOWN, Sierra Leone, March 30 — The government of Sierra Leone asked the International Criminal Court in the Netherlands to provide a venue for the trial of Charles G. Taylor, the former president of Liberia who was arrested Wednesday on longstanding war crimes charges, officials in the Netherlands said.

Mr. Taylor has many loyalists in the region, so his presence is a potential threat to the fragile peace that exists here and in Liberia. Secret talks between the Special Court for Sierra Leone and the Dutch government about transferring Mr. Taylor to The Hague began several weeks ago.

But on Wednesday, after Mr. Taylor's arrest, the Dutch government received a formal request from the special court for permission to hold the trial on Dutch soil, said Dirk-Jan Vermeij, a spokesman for the Dutch Foreign Ministry. He said the request involved the use of a courtroom at the newly created International Criminal Court and space in a Dutch jail. A Dutch diplomat said the United Nations Security Council would have to pass a resolution to create a trial chamber in The Hague that would serve as an extension of the Sierra Leone court and use that court's rules.

Other conditions are under discussion between the court and the Dutch government, including a guarantee that at the end of the trial Mr. Taylor will leave the Netherlands. "The court is asking only for physical facilities, the use of a courtroom and a cell," Mr. Vermeij said.

If the plan goes ahead, Mr. Taylor will probably be held at a Dutch high-security prison complex in The Hague where the International Criminal Court has leased 12 cells but is using only one.

The plan to move the trial of Mr. Taylor, one of Africa's most notorious warlords, to Europe underscored the deep ambivalence that many people here have toward the United Nations-backed court set up here to try defendants accused of atrocities in Sierra Leone's brutal civil war.

"The ordinary man sees this court as something from the outside that has little meaning to his life," said Charlie Hughes, director of the Forum for Democratic Initiatives, a nonprofit organization in Freetown. "Most people see the court as an expensive waste that won't really change the country in terms of poverty and other serious problems."

Indeed, Mr. Taylor may have been the most wanted fugitive in Africa, but for the moment no one on the continent seems keen on holding him. Ever since Liberia asked Nigeria to turn him over for prosecution by the special court this month, a fierce and sometimes desperate diplomatic battle has been waged over what precisely should be done with him. And with Thursday's announcement by Dutch officials, it appeared that Mr. Taylor's three-year odyssey had not yet ended.

It began in March 2003, when Mr. Taylor was still president of Liberia, with an indictment on charges that he backed and traded diamonds with Sierra Leone's ruthless rebel movement, whose signature tactic was the hacking off of civilians' arms and legs. But when he went into exile in Nigeria later that year, Nigeria promised not to turn him over to the court unless an elected Liberian government requested it.

When Liberia's new president, Ellen Johnson Sirleaf, asked for Mr. Taylor to be turned over this month, she made it clear that she did not want him on Liberian soil, declaring that there were no charges pending against him there. Nigerian officials repeatedly insisted that Mr. Taylor was not a prisoner in their country and that it was Liberia's responsibility to collect him. Sierra Leone, where Mr. Taylor was under indictment, quietly stood by and waited, hardly clamoring to get the man who caused so much misery here.

Solomon Berewa, Sierra Leone's vice president, said in an interview here that it would be better to hold the trial somewhere else to spare the nation a long revisiting of the horrors of the decade-long war, which killed 50,000 people, left thousands without arms or legs and displaced much of the population.

"We don't want to be reminded of those atrocities every day," Mr. Berewa said. "We want to put it behind us and move forward."

The International Criminal Court, which is independent from the United Nations, would have no mandate to try Mr. Taylor because its jurisdiction began on July 1, 2002, while Mr. Taylor's charges date from the 1990's. The court, which is building new headquarters, at present has one courtroom available. The trial of the first suspect in its custody, Thomas Lubanga, a former Congolese warlord, is not expected to begin until later this year.

Mr. Vermeij, the Dutch government spokesman, said that the court in Sierra Leone had asked for Mr. Taylor's transfer to The Hague, citing security concerns. "There is a fear that a trial in Sierra Leone could lead to instability and pose a threat to peace," he said.

Liberian President Backs Bid To Move Taylor Trial To Hague (WP)

By Craig Timberg

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

MONROVIA, Liberia, March 30 -- President Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf said Thursday that she supported a bid to move the war crimes trial of former Liberian president Charles Taylor from neighboring Sierra Leone to The Hague and that Taylor's dignity and rights must be guaranteed as the case advanced.

"In any proceedings, the United Nations must allow Mr. Taylor to maintain his dignity and a vigorous self-defense that is consistent with the principle that a person is innocent until proven guilty," Johnson-Sirleaf said in a televised address, her first to the country since Taylor was arrested Wednesday.

The U.N.-backed special court in Sierra Leone, where Taylor faces an 11-count indictment for his role in that country's civil war, requested that the trial be conducted on the premises of the International Criminal Court in the Netherlands. The Sierra Leone court would retain jurisdiction over the case.

The court's president, Justice A. Raja N. Fernando, cited concerns about stability in the region in the request.

The British government is preparing a U.N. Security Council draft resolution that would formally authorize the court in Sierra Leone to try Taylor in The Hague. Britain is waiting for a "green light" from the Dutch government before presenting the draft to the 15-nation council, according to a council diplomat.

The special court has the authority to conduct trials outside Sierra Leone, but the Dutch government has requested that the Security Council explicitly approve the transfer. It is also seeking to persuade another country to grant Taylor asylum should he ultimately be acquitted.

Taylor's first court appearance in Sierra Leone is expected next week. He is accused of mass murder, rape and mutilation, including support for a rebel movement in Sierra Leone that killed thousands and frequently amputated the limbs of its victims. Taylor, 58, is also accused of destabilizing Liberia and several neighboring countries while amassing a fortune from illicit trade in diamonds, guns and timber.

Taylor had dominated Liberian politics since 1989, when he launched a rebel movement. More than a decade of fighting left 200,000 people dead and the country in ruins. He was elected president in 1997, but resigned under international pressure in 2003 and began an exile in Nigeria.

Taylor disappeared Tuesday from a guarded government compound in southeastern Nigeria, days after President Olusegun Obasanjo announced that he would hand him over to the Liberian government. Taylor was captured Wednesday at a border post near Cameroon.

That day, Nigerian officials flew him to Monrovia, where he was arrested by U.N. forces. He was then transferred by helicopter to Freetown, the capital of Sierra Leone, and jailed.

Many Liberians expressed relief Thursday that Taylor had finally been arrested.

"I feel very good," said Wilson Doe, 34, a former soldier in Taylor's militia, who was working on a road project in Monrovia. "He's not a good man."

Liberians unable to afford the 35-cent newspaper could, for half the price, buy photocopied pictures of Taylor appearing dour in a bulletproof vest and handcuffs shortly after his arrest at Roberts International Airport in the capital.

Yet many Liberians said they were troubled by Taylor's arrest by international officials. Never before has a former African head of state been forced to face justice before an international tribunal. After decades of colonialism followed by decades more of Cold War proxy struggles, deep wariness persists in Africa about the intentions of outside powers.

In an interview in her office, Johnson-Sirleaf, who set Taylor's arrest in motion by requesting his extradition from Nigeria, said the case set "a sad precedent of arresting an African head of state."

But she added: "Liberian people feel much safer, and we can now move forward with what we need to do."

Era Of Impunity Wanes For African Leaders (CSM)

By Abraham Mclaughlin

The Christian Science Monitor, March 31, 2006

JOHANNESBURG, SOUTH AFRICA - It could be the beginning of the end for Africa's long era of impunity, during which awful deeds committed by presidents, dictators, and warlords have gone largely unpunished.

The highest-profile evidence: This week's arrest of notorious ex-Liberian-president Charles Taylor on war-crimes charges, which follows the recent booking of former Congolese warlord Thomas Lubanga at the International Criminal Court in The Hague.

Meanwhile, former Zambian President Frederick Chiluba is on trial for corruption, and upheaval in Kenya over graft allegations has led three cabinet ministers to resign.

In fact, the Zambian and Kenyan cases may be more important in the long run, experts say, because they're home-grown examples of holding leaders accountable for misdeeds. By contrast, the arrests of Messrs Taylor and Lubanga came in large part because of Western pressure. Ultimately, observers say, the extent to which the toppling of impunity is done by Africans - not because of American or other outside arm-twisting - may determine how thoroughly impunity falls.

Either way, however, "The arrest of Taylor is really good news for Africa. It sends an important signal that impunity might be a thing of the past," says Peter Kagwanja of the International Crisis Group here. Furthermore, it's evidence that even if "you're protected by [continental] heavyweights like Nigeria or South Africa" - as Taylor and Zimbabwe's President Robert Mugabe have been - "you may not be protected" any more.

Taylor was arrested in Nigeria this week and is expected to appear as early as Friday before the UN-backed Special Court for Sierra Leone in that country's capital, Freetown on charges of committing crimes against humanity. He's the first African head of state to be put on trial for such crimes. The trial, which will probably not start for several months, is expected to actually take place in The Hague. The venue change is apparently due to regional security concerns.

"One of the problems of trying Charles Taylor is that there has been insecurity in the region for quite some time, and he has been at the epicenter," says the court's chief prosecutor, Desmond de Silva. "There is a lot of anxiety in neighboring countries that his trial in Freetown might produce some sort of regional instability."

Taylor's arrival in Sierra Leone came a few days after the March 20 appearance of Mr. Lubanga at the ICC, where he's expected to be charged with war crimes. He's the first person to come before the ICC.

In Zambia, meanwhile, Mr. Chiluba is on trial for stealing about $500,000 during his 1991-2002 presidency. And, in Kenya, a series of graft scandals has left President Mwai Kibaki weakened, and may lead to an investigation of the vice president. The central bank governor has been asked to step down, pending a corruption probe.

Yet one Kenyan politician with possible links to corruption, former President Daniel arap Moi, isn't likely to be prosecuted, says Kagwanja, because, in the African view, "the war against impunity should not be war against stability." Taking down a powerful man like Mr. Moi could create instability.

Likewise, left to their own devices - and given Taylor's still-considerable influence throughout West Africa - African leaders probably would have asked newly elected Liberian President Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf "to cool her heels and stabilize herself before dealing with the question of Taylor," says Kagwanja. This would have given Nigerian President Olesegun Obasanjo time to "get his house in order" about possible plans to change the constitution so he can run for a third term - plans that may be affected by his actions on Taylor. It would have been at least a year, Kagwanja says, before African leaders dealt with Taylor.

Instead, amid strong US pressure, Mrs. Johnson-Sirleaf announced at the UN headquarters in New York on March 17 that she was requesting that Mr. Obasanjo send Taylor to Sierra Leone to face trial. When Obasanjo demurred, saying Africa's leaders needed to be consulted, even more US pressure was applied. When Taylor escaped from Nigerian custody on Tuesday, there were hints President Bush might cancel his Oval Office meeting with Obasanjo on Wednesday. Suddenly, Taylor was found, arrested - and promptly shipped to Sierra Leone.

While effective, such outside pressure can be risky, experts warn. First, it implicitly binds the US to helping keep the peace in Liberia, should the trial of the still-popular Taylor spark unrest there. Also, if Taylor's trial is seen as biased - or a product of US pressure - it "has the potential of turning Taylor into a hero or a martyr," says Kagwanja, "and that doesn't augur well for Liberia."

Taylor still has many backers in Liberia, including the country's third-most-powerful official, Speaker of Parliament Edwin Snowe, who is Taylor's ex-son-in-law.

Johnson-Sirleaf addressed this Thursday, saying anyone "who would try to use these circumstances as an excuse for insurrection to undermine the stability of the nation" would be "dealt with harshly, without mercy."

Still, another sign of declining impunity is the fact that African leaders didn't overtly criticize Obasanjo for handing over Taylor, says Ayesha Kajee of the South African Institute for International Affairs here. In an effort to boost Africa's image in the west - and respond to grass-roots rumblings - African leaders have been moving away from impunity, she says. "There's a recognition that this is an increasingly globalized issue - the issue of justice on the basis of human rights."

Rifts Plague Anti-Chávez Venezuelans (NYT)

By Juan Forero

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

QUÍBOR, Venezuela — Julio Borges is an unusual politician among Venezuela's fragmented opposition. He is running for office.

DOJ_NMG_0024649

While much of the rest of the opposition is intent on boycotting the presidential election this year, Mr. Borges was busy here on a recent twoday campaign swing, shaking hands, kissing cheeks and trying against long odds to win over supporters of President Hugo Chávez.

"We spent seven years trying to get Chávez out of Miraflores," Mr. Borges said, referring to the presidential palace. "What we have to do is get Chávez out of people's hearts."

He is the first to admit that it is a lonely task. Mr. Chávez remains hugely popular, with a 55 percent approval rating in opinion polls, for having funneled billions of dollars in oil revenue to the poor. Perhaps more important, he has put his stamp on nearly every aspect of life, and every institution of real power.

Mr. Borges argues that boycotting elections only adds to Mr. Chávez's power and has already made Venezuela in effect a one-party state. Proponents of a boycott say Mr. Chávez has undermined the institutions of democracy, so they seek to undercut his legitimacy by spoiling elections.

They charge that the president stacked the Supreme Court and the five-member National Electoral Council, has registered fraudulent voters and keeps tabs on how Venezuelans vote — all accusations that the government denies.

Many supporters of a boycott are in the segment of the opposition that failed to oust Mr. Chávez with a coup attempt and a two-month oil strike in 2002, and a recall referendum in 2004. Last December they organized a five-party boycott of the elections for the National Assembly, losing all representation in the government.

Some opposition leaders called that boycott a success because 75 percent of the voters abstained, showing their unhappiness with the electoral system Mr. Chávez had established.

"It's a diabolical system," said Antonio Ledezma, a leader in National Resistance, a group of opposition leaders that favors a boycott this year. "We win by resisting, to not be under the thumb of a government that wants to dominate us."

While international monitors have called past elections here fair, they have also noted deep public distrust of electoral officials and called for an overhaul of the Electoral Council, which oversees the elections.

A newspaper editor, Teodoro Petkoff, and the governor of the state of Zulia, Manuel Rosales, are considered possible presidential candidates, but Mr. Borges is the only one who has declared his candidacy so far. He says his biggest obstacle is uniting a disillusioned opposition, whose fractures have been among Mr. Chávez's biggest advantages.

"The most difficult challenge is to get past the noise of our own opposition," said Mr. Borges, 36, a lawyer from Caracas. "The opposition does not have the luxury to just give up on politics. Here, some people say: 'Let's not do anything. Let's hope for a miracle.' I don't believe in that."

As in the rest of Venezuela, people in this state, Lara, are solidly behind Mr. Chávez and at best indifferent to Mr. Borges's small First Justice Party, whose members are mostly young professionals from wealthy districts of Caracas. Potential voters were polite but distant.

When one unabashed supporter, Carmen Martínez, embraced Mr. Borges — whispering, "May God and First Justice be our hope" — it was a bright spot in an otherwise difficult campaign swing.

Mr. Borges does not sugarcoat the obvious: his campaign is far behind, underfinanced and spread thin. His one advantage may be that most Venezuelans — 84 percent, according to a recent survey by Greenberg Quinlan Rosner, a Washington polling firm — support taking part in the election, even if they question the impartiality of the electoral authorities.

His first big battle was with his own party, which went against him and voted to sit out last year's legislative elections. But he also faces an image problem. Many Venezuelans see his party as close to the Bush administration, elitist and out of touch with Mr. Chávez's base in the country's ramshackle barrios.

"They're seen as the yuppie party, and the challenge is how do you reach the poorest people," said a senior American diplomat in Caracas, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of embassy rules.

"It's not enough being the anti-Chávez," another American diplomat said. "You have to offer a plan and an alternative."

To do that, Mr. Borges and his aides say they are going to go after the president where he is vulnerable. While Mr. Chávez appears to be obsessed with the United States, Mr. Borges said surveys for his campaign showed that Venezuelans were much more concerned about unemployment and rampant crime.

DOJ_NMG_0024650

"Before voting for the Chavistas, I'll vote for Borges," Johanna Padilla, 29, said after meeting Mr. Borges as he went from house to house here. "All we have here is crime. There's no work. If you get a job, it's for three months and you're out."

On his campaign swing, wearing jeans and a blue pullover shirt, Mr. Borges handed out fliers titled "The President's Gifts," about Venezuelan aid to other countries.

"We want to show we're more nationalistic, more patriotic, more worried about Venezuela than Chávez," he said. "He's more involved in trying to become the president of Latin America. This is good for us."

For now the message is a hard sell. Mr. Chávez's largess to the poor, after all, has won him a solid following that is not about to switch to an unknown like Mr. Borges.

"I adore the man and thank God he's in power," Elizabeth Jiménez, 37, said of the president. "The opposition — each day they lose more standing. They criticize everything, everything that's for the people. But when they were in power they never did anything."

Preventable Disease Blinds Poor In Third World (NYT)

By Celia W. Dugger

ALEMBER, Ethiopia — Mare Alehegn lay back nervously on the metal operating table, her heart visibly pounding beneath her sackcloth dress, and clenched her fists as the paramedic sliced into her eyelid. Repeated infections had scarred the undersides of her eyelids, causing them to contract and forcing her lashes in on her eyes. For years, each blink felt like thorns raking her eyeballs. She had plucked the hairs with crude tweezers, but the stubble grew back sharper still.

The scratching, for Mrs. Alehegn, 42, and millions worldwide, gradually clouds the eyeball, dimming vision and, if left untreated, eventually leads to a life shrouded in darkness. This is late-stage trachoma, a neglected disease of neglected people, and a preventable one, but for a lack of the modest resources that could defeat it.

This operation, which promised to lift the lashes off Mrs. Alehegn's lacerated eyes, is a 15-minute procedure so simple that a health worker with a few weeks of training can do it. The materials cost about $10.

The operation, performed last year, would not only deliver Mrs. Alehegn from disabling pain and stop the damage to her corneas, but it also would hold out hope of a new life for her daughter, Enatnesh, who waited vigilantly outside the operating room door at the free surgery camp here.

Mrs. Alehegn's husband left her years ago when the disease rendered her unable to do a wife's work. At 6, Enatnesh was forced to choose between a father who could support her, or a lifetime of hard labor to help a mother who had no one else to turn to.

"I chose my mother," said the frail, pigtailed slip of a girl, so ill fed that she looked closer to 10 than her current age, 16. "If I hadn't gone with her, she would have died. No one was there to even give her a glass of water."

Their tale is common among trachoma sufferers. Trachoma's blinding damage builds over decades of repeated infections that begin in babies. The infections are spread from person to person, or by hungry flies that feed from seeping eyes.

In large part because women look after the children, and children are the most heavily infected, women are three times more likely to get the blinding, late stage of the disease.

For many women, the pain and eventual blindness ensure a life of deepening destitution and dependency. They become a burden on daughters and granddaughters, making trachoma a generational scourge among women and girls who are often already the most vulnerable of the poor.

Trachoma disappeared from the United States and Europe as living standards improved, but remains endemic in much of Africa and parts of Latin America and Asia, its last, stubborn redoubts. The World Health Organization estimates that 70 million people are infected with it. Five million suffer from its late stages. And two million are blind because of it.

A million people like Mrs. Alehegn need the eyelid surgery in Ethiopia alone. Yet last year only 60,000 got it, all paid for by nonprofit groups like the Carter Center, Orbis and Christian Blind Mission International.

As prevalent as trachoma remains, the W.H.O. has made the blinding late stage of the disease a target for eradication within a generation because, in theory at least, everything needed to vanquish it is available. Controlling trachoma depends on relatively simple advances in hygiene, antibiotics and the inexpensive operation that was performed on Mrs. Alehegn.

But the extent of the disease far exceeds the money and medical workers available. In poor countries like this one, faced with epidemics of AIDS, malaria and tuberculosis, a disease like trachoma, which disables and blinds, has difficulty competing with those big killers.

Dr. Abebe Eshetu, a health official here in Ethiopia's Amhara region, described the resources available for trachoma as "a cup of water in the ocean."

Nowhere is the need greater than across this harsh rural landscape.

As dawn broke one day last year, hundreds of people desperate for relief streamed into an eyelid surgery camp run by the government and paid for by the Carter Center. Some of the oldest had walked days on feet twisted by arthritis to get here.

The throng spread across the scrubby land around a small health clinic. They wrapped shawls around their heads to shield themselves from sun and dust, made all the more agonizing by their affliction. Their cheeks were etched with the salty tracks of tears.

'Hair in the Eye'

Typical of those was Mrs. Alehegn, led stumbling and barefoot through stony fields by Enatnesh, who worriedly shielded her mother under a faded black umbrella.

As they waited their turn, Mrs. Alehegn explained that her troubles began more than 15 years ago when she developed "hair in the eye," as trachoma is known here. The pain made it impossible for her to cook over smoky dung fires, hike to distant wells for water or work in dusty fields, the essential duties of a wife.

Gradually the affliction soured her relationship with her husband, Asmare Demissie, who divorced her a decade ago, so he could marry a healthy woman.

"When I stopped getting up in the morning to do the housecleaning, when I stopped helping with the farm work, we started fighting," Mrs. Alehegn said.

The operation she had come for is still exceedingly rare in Ethiopia. Only 76 ophthalmologists practice in this vast nation of 70 million people. Most work in the capital, Addis Ababa, not in the rural areas where trachoma reigns.

Because of the extreme doctor shortage, nonprofit groups have paid for the training of ordinary government health workers over two to four weeks to do the eyelid surgery. The Carter Center, which favors a month of training, estimates the cost at $600 per worker, plus $800 for two surgical instrument kits for each of them.

Those trained make an incision that runs the length of the eyelid's underside, through the cartilagelike plate, then lift the side of the lid fringed with the eyelashes outward. Then they stitch the two sides back together. The patient is given a local anesthetic.

The operation cannot undo the damage already done to corneas, which makes the abraded eyes vulnerable to infections. But it can stop further injury. And because the disease often takes decades to render its victims blind, the operation can save a woman's sight and halt disabling pain.

For Mrs. Alehegn, the surgery was her second. Her plight is typical, for trachoma is both a disease of poverty and a disease that causes poverty.

After separating from her husband, she, Enatnesh and another daughter, Adelogne, then just 4, moved to a small, poor piece of land belonging to Mrs. Alehegn's family. About a year later, Mrs. Alehegn scraped together enough money for her first eyelid surgery. But as she aged, the underside of her eyelids — scarred by past trachoma infections — continued to shrink, turning her lashes inward again.

In recent years, her poverty was so dire she could not afford to have the surgery again. Her only income was the dollar or so a week that Enatnesh collected when she went to market to sell the cotton fabric her mother wove. They were so poor they could not afford even 15 cents for soap.

"If I get my health back, it means everything," Mrs. Alehegn said. "I'll be able to work and support my family."

The others who journeyed to the camp told many such stories of hardship. In a land where early death is commonplace, some of those with the disease see their wounded eyes, ceaselessly leaking tears, as a kind of stigmata of sorrow.

Banchiayehu Gonete, an elderly widow, said three of her eight children had died young. The bitterest loss was of her eldest daughter, carried off by malaria at 40 with a baby still inside her. It was this daughter who had plucked her in-turned lashes, cooked for her and kept her company.

"God killed my children," said Mrs. Gonete, old and wrinkled, but unsure of her age. "I feel this pain as part of my mourning."

When her parents divorced, her mother gave Tsehainesh, then just a baby, to her paternal grandmother. As the old woman's sight failed, Tsehainesh became her servant. Since she was 7, she has fetched water, cooked, cleaned, collected dung and wood for the fire and swept the dirt floors, her grandmother said.

The girl sees her half brothers and sisters, the children of her father's second marriage, happily dashing to school, while she lives apart, her days filled with the grinding work of tending to a sickly, demanding old woman.

Her grandmother explained that the girl owes her. "I've supported her this far," Mrs. Mekonen said impassively, "so now it's her turn to support me."

Ending Disability and Dependency

To break this cycle of debilitation and dependency, the goal is not eradication of the eye infections themselves, which most agree is neither practical nor necessary, but rather to reduce their frequency and intensity, a more achievable goal. This would avoid development of the devastating late stage of trachoma, called trichiasis, that makes surgery the sufferers' only salvation.

Toward that end, the World Health Organization has approved a strategy known as SAFE, an acronym that stands for surgery, antibiotics, face washing and environmental change, notably improved access to latrines and water.

Already, some researchers say, the growing use of antibiotics around the world to treat infections, even those unrelated to trachoma, has probably contributed to trachoma's decline. That is true even in very poor countries where there is no organized effort to tackle the disease, like Nepal and Malawi, they say.

The use of Zithromax, an antibiotic manufactured by Pfizer, has proved a breakthrough. The most common alternative is a cheap, messy antibiotic ointment that has to be applied twice daily to the eyes for six weeks. Zithromax, in contrast, can be taken in a single dose — making compliance easier and distribution to millions simpler.

By 2008, Pfizer, the world's largest drug maker, will have donated 145 million doses for trachoma control. Its contribution is administered by the International Trachoma Initiative, a nonprofit group. The drug has been provided in 11 of the 55 countries where trachoma remains a problem.

But globally, the World Health Organization estimates that at least 350 million people need the antibiotics once a year for three years to bring infection rates under control.

That equals more than a billion doses of azithromycin, the generic name for Zithromax. Trachoma is so rampant here in Ethiopia that an estimated 60 million people, or 86 percent of the country's population, need the drug.

Pfizer has not officially announced any additional donations, but Dr. Joseph M. Feczko, a Pfizer vice president, says the company will provide whatever is needed. "There's no cap or limit on this," he said. "We're in it for the long haul."

But even free drugs cost money to distribute. No global estimates are available for carrying out the SAFE strategy for trachoma control, but the Ethiopian government, beset by competing social problems, would have to come up with $30 million to reach even half the people who need the antibiotic, and $20 million more for public education on basic hygiene.

For now, the aim here is a more modest effort at localized control, but even that will not be easy.

An Ancient Scourge

Chlamydia trachomatis, the microorganism that causes trachoma, has been a source of misery for millennia, thriving in poor, crowded and unsanitary conditions. In ancient Egypt, in-turned eyelashes were plucked, then treated with a mixture of frankincense, lizard dung and donkey blood. In Victorian England, infected children were isolated in separate schools.

DOJ_NMG_0024653

At the turn of the century, doctors at Ellis Island used a buttonhook to examine the undersides of immigrants' eyelids. Those with signs of trachoma were often shipped back to their home countries.

Swarming Musca sorbens flies play an ignominious role in spreading the disease. They crave eye discharge and pick up chlamydia as they burrow greedily, maddeningly into infected eyes.

"They cluster shoulder to shoulder around an infected eye," said Paul Emerson, the entomologist who did pioneering work on the role of the flies in spreading trachoma and who now runs the Carter Center's trachoma control program.

So inescapable, so persistent are they here in the Amhara region that children learn not to bother shooing them away. Even at the surgery camp, flies buzzed through the chicken wire that covered the windows of cramped operating rooms, harassing trachoma victims at the moment they sought relief.

Once the eggs of a female fly are ripe, she lays them in her preferred breeding medium, human feces, plentiful because most people here go to the bathroom outdoors.

But the flies cannot breed in simple, inexpensive pit latrines, Mr. Emerson said. He said he does not yet know why, but he thinks that a competing species that does thrive in latrines may eat the Musca sorbens maggots.

Ethiopia is now making a national effort to get people to build latrines, training thousands of village health workers to spread the word. It is also teaching children the importance of face washing in school.

But soap and water are scarce, too. Women often walk hours a day to wells to carry home precious pots of water balanced on their heads. And soap is a luxury for the poorest of the poor.

For those like Mrs. Alehegn, with late stage trachoma, surgery will continue to be necessary.

When her operation was complete, the health worker who performed it, Mola Dessie, pressed white cotton pads on Mrs. Alehegn's eyes to soak up the blood and applied antibiotic ointment to prevent infection. Then he covered her eyes with bandages.

Enatnesh wrapped her mother's head in a dingy cloth and slipped her stick-thin arm around her mother's waist to lead her away.

Mrs. Alehegn, who is illiterate, says she hopes that once she heals she will be able to weave more cloth, earn more money and do the domestic chores, leaving Enatnesh freer to pursue an education. "I don't want her to live my life," she said.

Despite her dependence on her daughter, Mrs. Alehegn has allowed the girl to go to school. Enatnesh, though having fallen behind, is a diligent fifth grader at age 16, who proudly said she is ranked 5th out of 74 students in her class. She dreams of being a doctor.

Two days after her mother's surgery, Enatnesh led the way to her father's sturdily built hut a couple of hours walk away. There, as his second wife swept the compound and Enatnesh's 9-year-old half-brother sat in the shade, Mr. Demissie, 58, offered a regretful explanation for his decision to divorce his first wife.

He, too, had developed "hair in the eye," he said. And like his wife, he, too, had been forced to stop working. If they had not separated, he reckoned, they would both have died. Finally, Mr. Demissie decided to save himself.

His sick wife would never find anyone else to marry, he realized. But for him, a new, hardworking wife would provide a second chance. And after his marriage, he got the surgery to prevent his own blindness.

"If we had not been sick," he said sadly, "we would have raised our children together."

As he spoke, Enatnesh listened sorrowfully, her hand cupped over her mouth, her head bent low.

French Law Is Affirmed As Protests Snarl Traffic (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

PARIS, March 30 — France's Constitutional Council upheld the constitutionality of a fiercely contested new labor law on Thursday, dealing a blow to opposition Socialists who had asked the council to strike it down but extending the crisis now facing the government.

Students kept up pressure, blocking roads and railways, tying up traffic and halting train service in several cities. The country's influential union syndicates have promised another day of nationwide strikes and protest marches on Tuesday.

The council's ruling throws the onus for resolving the crisis on President Jacques Chirac, who alone has the power to send the law back to Parliament. But he is widely expected to back his embattled prime minister, Dominique de Villepin, who insists that the law be put into effect. Élysée Palace said the president would address the nation late Friday.

The Constitutional Council's unqualified decision deprived Mr. Chirac of any face-saving cover under which he might send the law back to Parliament for further deliberations without looking as though he was bowing to the will of protesters.

Many members of Mr. Chirac's Union for a Popular Movement suggested Thursday that he would put the law into effect while fattening other social benefits in a bid to placate the students and unions.

The government used that strategy to extricate itself from the unrest that roiled France in May 1968.

The so-called Grenelle agreements of that year, named for the Paris street where the Ministry of Social Affairs is situated, raised the minimum wage by 35 percent, raised public sector salaries by 7 percent and cut the work week to an average of 40 hours from 43, among other things.

But some experts said the government, already trying to trim costly social benefits that it can ill afford, would have trouble coming up with offerings rich enough to satisfy the students and the unions.

"The difference between May 1968 and now is that the state doesn't have any money," said Sylvie Goulard, a professor of political science at the Institute of Political Studies here. Many members of Mr. Chirac's party have urged him to use special constitutional powers to delay imposing the law pending negotiations, to avoid inciting more anger among protesters. Both the students and unions have refused to engage in a dialogue until the law is withdrawn.

But Mr. Chirac has so far supported Mr. de Villepin, who has vowed to increase employment by making France's rigid labor laws more flexible. But his latest effort to introduce a new kind of labor contract — adding to the 18 already on the books — has backfired.

The new contract would give employers the right to fire new employees 25 and under without the cumbersome and costly procedures now required. The students and the unions regard that as an erosion of worker rights rather than as a useful incentive to employers.

Mr. de Villepin's approval rating has dropped seven percentage points this month alone to 29 percent, the lowest since he took office in May.

French students, meanwhile, are reveling in their newfound power. They blocked roads and railways in various parts of the country, angered by the Ministry of Education's order to reopen all high schools closed by the recent protests.

The ministry said 556 high schools out of France's 4,330 and 58 of its 84 universities had been disrupted.

Top French Tribunal Upholds Jobs Law (WP)

By Molly Moore

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

PARIS, March 30 -- France's constitutional court Thursday upheld a controversial jobs law that has provoked the largest street protests in decades, putting new pressure on President Jacques Chirac to resolve the crisis that threatens to destabilize his government.

The 10-member Constitutional Council ruled that high youth unemployment rates justified the law, which would give workers under age 26 fewer job protections than older employees. The council also said "different treatment" for young workers was justified because the law was enacted in the interest of improving job opportunities for them.

Chirac's office said the president would address the country on national television Friday night for the first time since students and labor unions launched demonstrations that often have ended in violence and confrontations with riot police in Paris and other cities across the country.

Members of Chirac's government declined to comment on Thursday's ruling, deferring to Chirac's address Friday. But union leaders and members of parliament plied the French evening news programs with demands that the government back down on the law and warnings of worsening protests and violence.

"You can be both legally right and politically wrong," Jean-Christophe Cambadelis, a Socialist Party member of parliament, said on the French television network, LCI. The Socialists had appealed the law to the constitutional court.

"It is the responsibility of the head of state to hear the growing exasperation of the country," said Bruno Julliard, head of the national student union, which has been at the forefront of the protests. "The president has the opportunity to put an end to a very damaging crisis. If he enacts the law rapidly, it will both be a sign of disdain and an irresponsible attitude."

The Constitutional Council's decision cannot be appealed.

Chirac now faces a difficult political decision that threatens the future of his prime minister, Dominique de Villepin, the author of the law and the man widely considered Chirac's preferred successor.

The law allowing employers to fire workers under age 26 at any time during their first two years of employment will become effective in nine days unless Chirac asks the parliament to reconsider it. Under the French constitution, Chirac cannot return the law to the legislative body without Villepin's permission. Villepin has said he will not abort the law but would consider negotiations over some provisions after it goes into effect. Unions have demanded that negotiations take place before the law is enacted.

In its opinion upholding the law, which was approved by parliament this month, the Constitutional Council noted that young employees who are fired after they've been on the job for four months have the right to appeal their dismissal to a labor court judge.

"Any employee getting sacked for what he thinks are no good reasons can dispute the decision," said Dominique Chagnollaud, a professor of constitutional law at the University of Paris II. "If this person is fired because of the color of his skin or because he's gay, the law against discrimination in the workplace still applies."

Unions have called another national strike and more protests for Tuesday, a week after an estimated 2.7 million people marched in the streets of Paris and other cities -- the largest French demonstration in decades -- demanding that the government retract the law. Striking workers also created major transportation delays, shut down schools and other government services and closed the Eiffel Tower.

In new protest tactics, small groups of students in cities throughout the country disrupted train services by blocking tracks and created miles of traffic jams by barricading main highways and city streets. In Marseilles, protesters set a coach car of a regional train ablaze, halting train service for two hours. About 50 demonstrators blocked Paris's ring road -- the equivalent of the Capital Beltway -- snarling traffic. Hundreds of students caused miles of traffic backups in the southern city of Aix-en-Provence, where they blocked intersections, and several hundred students played "cat and mouse" with police in the city of Lille, racing though the streets barricading intersections.

French Twist (NYT)

By Corinne Maier

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

Paris

IN Paris, the atmosphere has been morose for weeks: The winter's riots in the poor suburbs have been succeeded by a springtime student revolt. Now it's the middle class's turn to express its discontent — over a government plan to make it easier for businesses to fire young workers. This season, though, the protests aren't in far-off housing projects, but right under our eyes.

The Sorbonne, symbolic center of the intelligentsia, has been sealed off by the police. With the demonstrations and the strikes, it's been difficult to get around town; on Tuesday, when a million people marched, life seemed at a standstill — no newspapers, no trains — except for the violence that has flared up around the protests. In the cafes, people evoke, without much conviction, the famed student revolts of May 1968: the young then wanted to change society, while today they want simply to be part of it.

The student revolt began last month with three letters of anodyne appearance, C.P.E., an abbreviation for "contrat première embauche," or first job contract. Prime Minister Dominque de Villepin pushed a law through Parliament that establishes this contract, which covers those younger than 26 employed by businesses with more than 20 workers. It allows the firing of a young worker for any reason; French law otherwise severely limits businesses' ability to let a worker go. The C.P.E. is the little brother of the C.N.E., created last year, which covers smaller businesses.

The C.P.E., the C.N.E., their labor cousins R.M.I. and R.T.T. — the French love three-letter abbreviations. Perhaps it's because in France, traditionally a Catholic country, lots of things go in three, like the three colors of the flag and "liberté, égalité, fraternité."

The men in power are three too: the first being Jacques Chirac, president since 1995, a weakened man nobody expects anything of anymore. He is seconded by Mr. de Villepin and Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy, rivals who dream of taking Mr. Chirac's place in the 2007 presidential election. This year will be decisive for them, which is probably why Mr. de Villepin has chosen to showcase his firmness.

The point of the new labor law is to encourage businesses to hire young people without worrying they'll be stuck with them forever. Youth unemployment has been one of France's biggest problems for 30 years. A quarter of those under 25 are jobless; that figure surpasses 40 percent in the troubled suburbs. It's an enormous failure: young people have never been better prepared or educated than today, yet France offers them hardly any future apart from temporary jobs and unpaid internships.

Why do young people refuse this new program? First, they say, a law just for them implies unequal treatment, and the French, since 1789, have always dreamed of equality. Next, they complain, previous generations didn't have to suffer, so why should they? It's true that French society is hierarchical and rigid, and the disadvantages of employment "flexibility" (a word the French detest) have so far fallen mostly on the weakest: minority groups, women with few marketable skills and young people.

No one in France wants to be "flexible"; stable jobs are the best paid and the most prestigious. It's telling that the students at the elite grandes écoles have been slow in joining the protests: promised a better future than the graduates of the less illustrious universities, they figure that flexibility doesn't concern them.

What will happen next? The young demonstrators and the major unions demand the withdrawal of the C.P.E.; surveys show that two-thirds of the public are in sympathy with them. The students even won the unexpected support of the actress Sharon Stone, who was in Paris for the opening of "Basic Instinct 2." Ms. Stone declared herself against the law, saying that "people have the right to know why they've been hired or fired."

Meanwhile, the Constitutional Council yesterday rebuffed a request to throw out the law as unconstitutional. Still, Mr. de Villepin is getting little support in his own camp as he stands firm. And Paris waits to see what springtime will bring next.

A Cuban Doctor Pays A High Price For Truth (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'Grady

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

In the early morning hours of Nov. 29, uniformed Cuban police raided the Havana home of medical doctor Dariel "Darsi" Ferrer.

"In front of my sick wife and my four-year-old son, they confiscated a laptop, a printer, various bottles of medicine and all the papers they could find," Dr. Ferrer reported on the Web site Cartadecuba.com. Nearly four hours later the marauders marched off with the doctor's property, leaving him with a citation to appear at the police station the next day.

Dr. Ferrer had sinned against the Revolution: He is an Afro-Cuban medical professional who, noting the country's abysmal state of health care, established an independent health and human rights clinic. "We have dedicated ourselves to offering free medical attention to those in need and visiting extremely poor communities where scarcities strike marginalized Cubans daily, to offer health services, give medicine, clothing and toys and to share the suffering of those beings," Dr. Ferrer reported.

The 36-year-old doctor's selfless dedication to others would win praise from any government genuinely concerned about the welfare of citizens. But in Cuba, his work scandalizes the state. It has rewarded him by shutting him out of the official medical community and refusing to allow him any form of gainful employment. Along with his wife and son, he has been regularly harassed and terrorized by the government's infamous "repudiation squads," organized mob violence unleashed against non-conformers. The Nov. 29 visit was the first time the regime sent uniformed agents to his home to allege a crime.

Dr. Ferrer is a victim of what human rights observers say is the one of the most brutal crackdowns in the island's history, one that has received little notice in the U.S. "Why now?" one might ask. Perhaps it is in preparation for the day when, as Cubans like to say, a "biological solution" will end Castro's reign. Perhaps it is because Cubans have grown bolder in recent years, increasingly expressing dissent openly.

Certainly, there is more civil disobedience, ranging from silent, prayerful marches by women whose loved ones are political prisoners to public statements from medical professionals like Dr. Ferrer. Pilfering from the state has reportedly increased too.

French jurist Christine Chanet, the U.N. Human Rights Commission's "expert" on Cuba, acknowledged the wave of repression this month. Though Cuban officials have refused her access, she noted that her sources report that "in 2005 more people were arrested and given disproportionate sentences for expressing dissident political opinions." Since she is French and a UNHRC bureaucrat, however, Ms. Chanet blamed the brutality on the U.S. By supporting Cuban democrats, she explained, the U.S. "provide[s] the Cuban authorities with an opportunity to tighten repression against them."

That's the kind of international "help" that long-suffering Cubans have had to get used to, leaving them with the feeling that they are but pawns in the petty, jealous U.N. game of challenging U.S. hegemony. But while the French bureaucrat is busy scoring points in the salons of Geneva, Dr. Ferrer is struggling to stay alive. His is a particularly brave struggle.

Like hundreds of José Six-Packs who have joined Cuban resistance movements, Dr. Ferrer's lack of celebrity is a real disadvantage. International recognition can provide some protection to a dissident. But up to now he has been a faceless soul behind the Tropical Iron Curtain, with a family to care for and living on practically nothing. Fidel already knows he has nothing to fear from the likes of Ms. Chanet, so the cost of crushing Dr. Ferrer is very low.

Dr. Ferrer's race also works against him. Independent thinking is heresy for any Cuban but Afro-Cubans are taught to be especially grateful for -- and obedient to -- the Revolution. They are supposed to signal to the world that though they may appear poor, malnourished and oppressed, they are actually living contentedly on Master Fidel's plantation. Dr. Ferrer hasn't been playing the game.

Another reason to silence the doctor is his honest, professional assessment of Cuba's deteriorating medical system. What Dr. Ferrer and the doctors working with him at the clinic have observed and publicly denounced is the polar opposite of the health-care paradise that Fidel's illusionists have worked years to promote. The collapse of this last "justification" for totalitarian government -- something that shamefully even former Secretary of State Colin Powell once praised Castro for -- makes Fidel's 50 years of failure impossible to deny.

This makes Dr. Ferrer's work exceedingly dangerous but despite the persecution, he works tirelessly for the sick, the poor and the imprisoned. The clinic writes "respectful letters" to high-ranking government officials, raising concerns about public health issues and proposing solutions. In a July 2005 document called "Health Authorities and the Complicity of Silence," Dr. Ferrer complained of the deaths of dozens of children in recent months owing to increased cases of transmittable diseases. He expressed concern that meningitis, dengue fever, hepatitis and leprosy could become epidemics. Clinic workers pay special attention to HIV/AIDS patients, particularly shut-ins, and advocate for the medical needs of political prisoners and for victims of medical negligence.

With thousands of medical professionals on assignment overseas to advance Castro's do-gooder image with Ms. Chanet and her ilk, Cubans are hurting. But so what? As former Brigadier Gen. Rafael Del Pino, who defected in 1987, observed in his 1990 book "Proa a La Libertad," ("Toward Freedom"), Fidel has another agenda. He "was of the idea that any person whose health is returned or who receives education will at least never be his enemy, even if that does not turn them into an ally," the general wrote, referring to the rationale behind sending doctors and teachers to Nicaragua in the 1980s. This strategy continues today. Only now Dr. Ferrer has made it clear that Cubans themselves don't enjoy the same "good will." For that he is being intolerably abused by the regime.

An American Revolt In London (NYT)

It's not exactly a tea party yet, but the Americans are again revolting against the British over taxation. At issue is the American embassy's refusal since last July to pay a traffic congestion surcharge when its diplomats drive around downtown London, where the embassy is situated. The Americans say the fee is a tax, and add that the Vienna Convention protects diplomats from taxes abroad.

First, let us say that whatever the validity of the argument, it's reassuring anytime an American official working for the Bush administration invokes an international agreement. But we don't buy the idea that diplomats are immune to the surcharge.

London adopted congestion pricing to reduce gridlock on its busiest streets and encourage the use of public transit. By those measures, it's been a success, and something that similarly afflicted cities in the United States, starting with New York, should want to consider. The fee, about $14, is supposed to support mass transportation. The British make a good case that the charge is not a tax, but a toll for the use of selected streets. Their diplomats, they note, regularly pay tolls on American roads and bridges.

A couple of years back, Mayor Michael Bloomberg threatened to tow away the cars of United Nations diplomats who had stacks of unpaid parking tickets in New York. The London mayor, Ken Livingstone, needs to work on editing what comes out of his mouth (this week he called the American ambassador a "chiseling little crook" and he is currently appealing a suspension from his duties for comparing a Jewish journalist to a guard at a concentration camp). He poked further fun at the ambassador for his previous job, which — unfortunately, in light of the debate — was owning a large car dealership. Nonetheless, Mr. Livingstone is certainly within his rights to demand payment, which may now amount to hundreds of thousands of dollars, including fines. He also wants money from the German Embassy and other missions that are withholding payment.

This is one war the United States government doesn't need to take on. It has a real one going on. And the British — they're on our side.

TERRORISM NEWS:

At Sept. 11 Trial, Tale Of Missteps And Management (NYT)

By Scott Shane And Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 30 — Three weeks of testimony and dozens of documents released in the sentencing of Zacarias Moussaoui have offered an eerie parallel view of two organizations, Al Qaeda and the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and how they pursued their missions before the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Al Qaeda, according to a newly revealed account from the chief plotter, Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, took its time in choosing targets — attack the White House or perhaps a nuclear plant in Pennsylvania? Organizers sized up and selected operatives, teaching them how to apply for a visa and how to cut a throat, a skill they practiced on sheep and camels. Despite the mistakes of careless subordinates and an erratic boss, Osama bin Laden, Mr. Mohammed tried to keep the plot on course.

Mr. Mohammed, a Pakistani-born, American-trained engineer, "thought simplicity was the key to success," says the summary of his interrogation by the Central Intelligence Agency. It is all the more chilling for the banal managerial skills it ascribes to the man who devised the simultaneous air attacks.

If Mr. Mohammed's guiding principle was simplicity, the United States government relied on sprawling bureaucracies at feuding agencies to look for myriad potential threats. The C.I.A. had lots of information on two hijackers, Nawaf al-Hazmi and Khalid al-Midhar, but the F.B.I. did not know the men had settled in San Diego, where Mr. Mohammed had instructed them to "spend time visiting museums and amusement parks" so they could masquerade as tourists.

At the F.B.I., a few agents pursued clues that would later prove tantalizingly close to the mark, but they could not draw attention from top counterterrorism officials. A Minnesota F.B.I. agent, Harry M. Samit, warned in a memorandum that Mr. Moussaoui was a dangerous Islamic extremist whose study of how to fly a Boeing 747-400 seemed to be part of a sinister plot.

"As the details of this plan are not yet fully known, it cannot be determined if Moussaoui has sufficient knowledge of the 747-400 to attempt to execute the seizure of such an aircraft," Mr. Samit wrote on Aug. 31, 2001. He had already urged Washington to act quickly, because it was not clear "how far advanced Moussaoui's plan is or how many unidentified co-conspirators exist."

But to high-level officials, the oddball Moroccan-born Frenchman in Minneapolis was only one of scores of possible terrorists who might be worth checking out. An F.B.I. official in Washington edited crucial details out of Mr. Samit's memorandums seeking a search warrant for Mr. Moussaoui's possessions, and said that pressing for it could hurt an agent's career, Mr. Samit testified.

The picture of a large and lumbering bureaucracy trying to defend against a small and flexible enemy is striking, said Timothy J. Roemer, a member of the national Sept. 11 commission.

"It's like the elephant fighting the snake," said Mr. Roemer, a former Democratic congressman from Indiana. "One of the impressions of Al Qaeda and Khalid Sheikh Mohammed is their ability to change course and put new people into their plan and dynamically respond to the challenges day to day."

The United States government, he said, "is almost the opposite."

"We're slow to change," he said, "slow to adjust, and we're building a huge bureaucracy."

The court testimony, Mr. Roemer said, has reinforced his belief that "Moussaoui was an Al Qaeda mistake and a missed opportunity for the F.B.I."

DOJ_NMG_0024663

The jury at Mr. Moussaoui's sentencing trial in federal court in Alexandria, Va., began deliberating on Wednesday about whether he qualifies for the death penalty for not telling American officials of the approaching terrorist attacks. If jurors decide he does qualify, they will then have to make a second decision as to whether he should be executed.

The outlines of the events on both sides in the weeks leading to the Sept. 11 attacks are well known. But the voluminous evidence presented at the trial have added details and color to the public history of the plotters and how American counterterrorism officers failed to stop them.

There are snippets of highly classified National Security Agency cables and glimpses of the C.I.A. inspector general's report on the agency's performance before the attacks, which remains secret. There are numerous new F.B.I. e-mail messages and memorandums that fill in the details of agents' suspicions and why they were not heeded.

But the 58-page "Substitution for the Testimony of Khalid Sheikh Mohammed," a detailed account of what Mr. Mohammed has told investigators since his capture in Pakistan in 2003, and an attached two-page statement written by him, give the most direct view to date of the man who conceived and organized the attacks.

"I know that the materialistic Western mind cannot grasp the idea, and it is difficult for them to believe that the high officials in Al Qaeda do not know about operations carried out by its operatives, but this is how it works," Mr. Mohammed wrote in his statement to his interrogators. "We do not submit written reports to our higher ups. I conducted the September 11 operation by submitting only oral reports."

Mr. Mohammed comes across as a hands-on, midlevel manager who sometimes handled details, like perusing a San Diego telephone book he bought at a market in Karachi, Pakistan, for English-language schools and flight schools.

But he delegated what he could to others. He had Abu Turab al Jordani, a Qaeda veteran from Jordan, train the less sophisticated "muscle" hijackers, teaching them to use their knives on animals and how to storm a jetliner cabin. He allowed Mohammed Atta, appointed "emir" of the hijackers, to make final decisions on targets and on the date of the attack.

Mr. bin Laden repeatedly pressed Mr. Mohammed to move ahead with the hijacking plot, the document says. He pushed, for example, to strike on May 12, precisely seven months after the 2000 attack on the U.S.S. Cole. Ever the pragmatist, Mr. Mohammed put him off. In fact, Mr. Mohammed "noted that he disobeyed bin Laden on several occasions by taking operatives assigned to him by bin Laden and using them how he best saw fit."

One restriction on the plot was the small number of Qaeda devotees who had, or could get, visas to enter the United States. Mr. Mohammed used Mr. Midhar and Mr. Hazmi because they had visas — despite his doubts about their minimal English and lack of sophistication.

But he also considered Mr. Moussaoui less reliable because of time he had spent in the West. Mr. Mohammed "stated that Westerners have a different point of view because of their freedom," the summary says.

The sentencing trial made clear the frustration of the Minneapolis F.B.I. office in its repeated efforts to interest bureau headquarters in Mr. Moussaoui.

Gripping testimony came from Mr. Samit, who arrested Mr. Moussaoui on Aug. 16 and quickly became convinced that he was a terrorist who knew about an imminent hijacking plot. Mr. Samit said that he had sent about 70 warning messages about Mr. Moussaoui, but that they had produced no results.

The agent said he had been puzzled at the reluctance of Michael Maltbie, a supervisor with the Radical Fundamentalist Unit at bureau headquarters, to seek a search warrant for Mr. Moussaoui's belongings from a special intelligence court.

Mr. Samit seemed unable to satisfy Mr. Maltbie's demand that he provide a tangible link between Mr. Moussaoui and a foreign power, a requirement for a warrant from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court. He thought he had sufficient evidence from two French intelligence reports showing Mr. Moussaoui had recruited someone to fight in Chechnya for an Islamist group allied with Mr. bin Laden.

But on Aug. 24, 2001, a frustrated Mr. Samit sent an e-mail message to Charles Frahm, a friend and, at the time, an F.B.I. liaison to the C.I.A., asking for information to help make his case. "We're trying to close the wiggle room for F.B.I. headquarters to claim there is no connection to a foreign power," he wrote.

Mr. Moussaoui's lawyers asserted that Mr. Maltbie had undermined the effort to obtain a search warrant by deleting some details from Mr. Samit's requests. Mr. Samit said Mr. Maltbie had told him he was reluctant to press for a warrant because doing so would be risky for his career and "he was not about to let that happen to him."

At the time, the bureau had become wary of applying to the intelligence court because a well-regarded supervisor had angered the court's chief judge in a previous case.

Days later, with the attacks in New York and Washington, the scale of the destruction astonished even Mr. Mohammed. According to the summary, he said he "had no idea that the damage of the first attack would be as catastrophic as it was."

Moussaoui Jury Pauses For Query, Resumes (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0024664

By Jerry Markon And Timothy Dwyer
The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

Jurors in the death penalty trial of Zacarias Moussaoui completed their first full day of deliberations yesterday, with no indication of how they would resolve the question of whether the convicted Sept. 11, 2001, conspirator is eligible for execution.

The 12-member panel paused only to ask the judge a brief question concerning the definition of weapons of mass destruction. Moussaoui is charged with conspiracy to use weapons of mass destruction, one of three counts that could bring him a death sentence.

U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema told jurors at a brief court session that the term meant using an airplane as a missile or bomb. And with that, jurors disappeared again into their deliberation room on the seventh floor of the federal courthouse in Alexandria before quitting for the day at 4:30 p.m.

Moussaoui, 37, pleaded guilty last year to conspiring with al-Qaeda in the Sept. 11 airplane hijackings that killed nearly 3,000 people. He is the only person convicted in a U.S. courtroom on charges stemming from the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

The jury is considering whether Moussaoui is eligible for the death penalty under federal law. If jurors unanimously decide that he is, they will reconvene for a second phase of the trial that will determine whether Moussaoui will be executed; if they decide that he is not eligible, Moussaoui will be sentenced to life in prison.

According to a verdict form released yesterday by the court, jurors will answer three main questions when they vote on whether to send the case forward to a second phase. They will assess whether prosecutors proved that Moussaoui intentionally lied to federal agents when he was arrested in August 2001, whether he lied "contemplating that the life of a person would be taken" and whether at least one victim died Sept. 11 because of the falsehoods.

Although Moussaoui was sitting in jail during the attacks, prosecutors argue that he should die because he lied to the FBI when he was arrested after his behavior aroused suspicion at a Minnesota flight school. Had Moussaoui confessed his knowledge of the plot, the government contends, the Sept. 11 strikes could have been stopped.

Moussaoui admitted to much of that argument when he testified this week, saying that he had misled federal agents to allow the plot to go forward -- and that he had intended to crash a hijacked plane into the White House on Sept. 11. His attorneys contend that Moussaoui was aggrandizing his role in the plot during his testimony. And even if he had lied to agents in August 2001, the defense contends, federal officials knew far more than Moussaoui did about al-Qaeda's plans yet still failed to stop the attacks.

'Weapons Of Mass Destruction' Defined For Moussaoui Jury (LAT)

By Richard A. Serrano
The Los Angeles Times, March 31, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — Jurors deliberating Thursday in the Zacarias Moussaoui sentencing trial asked for legal guidance on a capital murder charge that alleged he conspired to use "weapons of mass destruction."

The jury of 12 asked U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema for a legal definition of that phrase, and she told them that in this case it meant turning airplanes into "missiles, bombs or similar devices."

The charge is a component of one of the key allegations against the admitted Al Qaeda terrorist. Moussaoui, 37, was arrested three weeks before the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the World Trade Center and Pentagon. He testified Monday that his intended role in the conspiracy was to crash a fifth airplane, into the White House, that day..

The jury is to decide whether Moussaoui, who has pleaded guilty, is eligible for the death penalty because he lied to FBI agents after his arrest.

Prosecutors maintain that had he cooperated with authorities about the Sept. 11 plot, the government could have obtained enough information to stop the 19 hijackers.

The defense contends that the federal law enforcement apparatus at that time was so disjointed that officials never would have unraveled the plot even with Moussaoui's help.

Thursday was the first full day of deliberations. Jurors did not reach a verdict and are to resume work today.

In another development, the court unsealed transcripts of a closed March 21 hearing between prosecutors and defense lawyers in which it was disclosed that the U.S. attorney's office in Philadelphia was investigating the conduct of government lawyer Carla J. Martin.

Martin, a senior attorney with the Transportation Security Administration, is accused of improperly tampering with Federal Aviation Administration witnesses whom prosecutors and defense lawyers had planned to call during the trial.

According to evidence and testimony against her, Martin sent the witnesses copies of court transcripts and coached them on their planned testimony, all in violation of a February order by Brinkema.

The judge was incensed, and severely restricted the amount of aviation testimony in the trial. As it turned out, prosecutors called just one federal aviation official.

"I'm advised by the U.S. attorney's office that there may very well be a prosecution of her; at least they're looking at the possibility," Brinkema said of Martin.

The judge had wanted Martin to take the stand and explain her conduct. But Brinkema said in the closed hearings that Martin's lawyer, Roscoe C. Howard Jr., was "not ready to recommend she testify yet."

Assistant U.S. Atty. Robert A. Spencer said the matter was referred to the Philadelphia office because of the conflict with the prosecutors trying Moussaoui.

Spencer's fellow prosecutor David J. Novak told the judge they had been "unhappy with Ms. Martin before this episode happened."

Martin has declined to comment.

Her lawyer initially said she was eager to tell her side of the story, but he has declined to discuss the matter since.

Deliberations Continue In Moussaoui Trial (AP)

By Michael J. Sniffen

AP, March 31, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va. - Jurors in the death-penalty trial of Zacarias Moussaoui headed into a third day of deliberations Friday to determine whether the confessed al-Qaida conspirator is eligible for the death penalty.

The jury has deliberated for more than seven hours since getting the case late Wednesday. On Thursday jurors asked about the definition of "weapon of mass destruction." One of the three convictions for which Moussaoui could be executed is conspiracy to use weapons of mass destruction.

The jurors were told that a plane used as a missile - the tactic employed on Sept. 11, 2001 - qualifies as a weapon of mass destruction.

Moussaoui is the only person in this country charged in connection with the Sept. 11 attacks. He pleaded guilty in April to conspiring with al-Qaida to hijack aircraft and other crimes. The sentencing trial will determine his punishment: death or life in prison.

The jury must find that Moussaoui was responsible for at least one death on Sept. 11 for him to be eligible for execution.

Moussaoui was in jail at the time of the attacks, but prosecutors argue federal agents would have been able to thwart or at least minimize the attacks if he had revealed his al-Qaida membership and his terror plans when he was arrested and interrogated by federal agents.

Also, court transcripts indicated federal prosecutors in Philadelphia have launched a criminal investigation of Transportation Security Administration lawyer Carla J. Martin. Moussaoui's death-penalty trial was nearly derailed after U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema found that Martin improperly coached multiple witnesses on their testimony and lied to defense lawyers.

Prosecutor Investigating TSA Lawyer (FINDLAW/AP)

By Matthew Barakat, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 31, 2006

(AP) - ALEXANDRIA, Va.-Federal prosecutors in Philadelphia are investigating the conduct of a government lawyer who nearly derailed the death-penalty trial of confessed al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui by coaching witnesses on their testimony.

The criminal investigation of Carla J. Martin, a lawyer with the federal Transportation Security Administration, was revealed in recently unsealed transcripts of a closed March 21 hearing in the Moussaoui case.

U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema said in the hearing that she had been "advised by the U.S. Attorney's Office that there may very well be a prosecution of her, at least they're looking at the possibility."

Rob Spencer, the lead prosecutor in the Moussaoui case, responded that "the matter has been referred to a prosecutor in the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, and I believe they are handling the matter."

Moussaoui's defense lawyers have said Martin should face criminal charges for witness tampering.

Martin's misconduct delayed the Moussaoui trial for a week and almost derailed it completely when it was revealed a week into the trial.

DOJ_NMG_0024666

Martin coached seven aviation witnesses on their testimony, urging them to read transcripts of the trial's first day and warning them to be prepared for certain topics on cross-examination. All of this violated a judge's order barring witnesses from exposure to trial proceedings, for fear that they would shape their testimony based on what they had heard.

Martin was apparently concerned that prosecutors overstated the Federal Aviation Administration's ability to prevent the 9/11 attacks and wanted witnesses to be prepared for tough questions on cross-examination.

After Brinkema learned the extent of Martin's misconduct in a special evidentiary hearing, she barred the government from presenting any evidence about aviation security to the jury. She reconsidered after prosecutors said that would gut their case, and she allowed the government to present an aviation witness who was not tainted by Martin's misconduct.

Martin has refused to testify about her actions. Her lawyer, Roscoe Howard, has said she will explain herself to Brinkema at the appropriate time.

During the March 21 hearing, prosecutors said Martin had a minimal role in helping prepare the government's case, and said they actively sought to keep Martin out of the process for a variety of factors.

"First of all, there were personality issues," said prosecutor David Novak. More importantly, though, he said prosecutors found her to be a poor conduit to the TSA on issues like preparing sensitive documents for use at trial.

"Our view is that she wasn't hearing what our point was and it wasn't being conveyed to people who are," Novak said.

Mr. Moussaoui's Confession (WP)

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

GIVE ZACARIAS Moussaoui credit: Years into his bizarre circus of a trial -- after all his deranged court filings and speeches, his pleas and retracted pleas, his attempts to act as his own lawyer and his denunciations of his long-suffering court-appointed lawyers -- he still knows how to grab a big moment and milk it. This week, he took the witness stand and confessed -- "boasted" might be a better word -- that he was, as the government alleged, a part of the Sept. 11 conspiracy and that he was meant to fly a fifth plane into the White House, along with convicted "shoe bomber" Richard Reid, as part of the coordinated attacks that took place that day.

Mr. Moussaoui's riveting testimony devastates his defense and acknowledges everything prosecutors need to prove and then some.

Not only did he lie to the FBI to protect the operation after his capture the month before the attacks -- the allegation to which he admitted last year. He also bought a radio to hear news of the operation's success. He knew that the World Trade Center was a target. He coldly described his delight at learning of the destruction and carnage. After such a display, what jury could fail to vote for the death penalty?

But there is reason to worry that Mr. Moussaoui's testimony is a bit more dramatic than the reality of his involvement. For one thing, it contradicts his own prior statements: He has claimed in the past not to have been involved in Sept. 11 but to have been preparing for a separate attack on the White House. It also contradicts the statements of al-Qaeda bigwigs in U.S. custody, which -- in a bizarre twist -- the defense put before the jury in an effort to discredit its own client. Khalid Sheik Mohammed, for example, claimed that Mr. Moussaoui was sent here as part of a second wave of strikes. It even exceeds what the government itself has alleged.

The government and Mr. Moussaoui, at this point, are both pushing for his execution -- as vividly illustrated by his bizarre offer to testify for the prosecution. Their motives differ. The government is prosecuting his crime, while Mr. Moussaoui appears to be attempting to martyr himself. The danger is that in such a confluence of interests the truth falls by the wayside.

That would be dangerous, in part because the government's theory under which Mr. Moussaoui is eligible for death is an expansive one that could open the door for executions of low-level conspirators in a range of criminal enterprises. Mr. Moussaoui without question acted as an al-Qaeda operative who arrived in this country intending to do it great harm. Less clear is what role, if any, he played specifically in the events of Sept. 11. That he now wishes to claim a big one may imply honest pride in his work or simply a desire to die for his organization's greatest success -- a desire no jury ought to oblige. The unenviable task of the jurors, who now have the case, will be to sort true confession from idle boasting.

9/11 Trial Raises Concern (USAT)

The most chilling testimony at the death penalty trial of Zacarias Moussaoui didn't come from the defendant, despite his surprise claim that he was to fly a fifth plane into the White House on 9/11.

It came from a government witness who attested in heart-rending detail to the stubborn resistance and monumental missteps that kept the FBI from capitalizing on Moussaoui's arrest four weeks before 9/11.

DOJ_NMG_0024667

Many of the facts were known, but FBI agent Harry Samit's testimony gave them new detail and poignancy — and raised questions about the nation's preparedness for the next terror attack.

Moussaoui was arrested Aug. 16, 2001, in Minnesota, after Samit was tipped that an inexperienced student had paid cash to a local flight school to learn to fly jumbo jets. Moussaoui had spoken openly of hating America and of wanting to wage jihad, or holy war.

In the next weeks, Samit wrote memos that referred 70 times to Moussaoui and literally begged for permission to seek a warrant to search his belongings. His bosses rejected every request. There are many explanations for this, none satisfactory: The FBI's priority before 9/11 was catching and convicting traditional criminals, not stopping attacks. An antiquated system of paper case files kept crime fighters from sharing leads via computer. A legal "wall" built between intelligence and criminal investigators to prevent misuse of information restricted coordination. Incompetence and lethargy among superiors.

Could this scenario happen again?

Some holes have been plugged. The legal wall has been torn down. Surveillance has increased. New laws make it easier to seek a warrant in a case like Moussaoui's. Agencies share more.

But old gaps remain, and new ones have opened — at the FBI and in other anti-terrorism efforts as well. To identify problems, look no further than recent headlines:

· After five years, the FBI is still hampered by some of the same computer problems. And two of the bosses who obstructed Samit — Michael Maltbie and David Frasca — remain employed in other jobs at the FBI; the bureau won't say whether they've been disciplined.

· On Tuesday, the Council on Foreign Relations, a non-partisan think tank, reported that the United States hasn't mounted the high-priority effort needed against the most devastating threat it faces — nuclear terrorism. Stealing a nuclear device is tough, the author found, but not impossible.

· The same day, government officials testified that undercover investigators slipped through security at the Canadian and Mexican borders with enough radioactive material to make two small "dirty bombs." Border agents were fooled by counterfeit documents, according to the Government Accountability Office.

· On Wednesday, USA TODAY reported a brain drain at the Homeland Security Department, which has lost top leaders for its most crucial missions, including cyber security, technology and disaster response.

The nation has determined foes — people like Moussaoui who are bent on killing Americans at any cost. Stopping them requires good intelligence, judgment and luck. Unless the government learns from the past and finds smarter ways to fight terrorism, it becomes its own enemy.

U.N. Expert Wants To See Purported Prisons (AP-Y2)

By Bradley S. Klapper

AP2, March 30, 2006

The United Nations' special investigator on torture said Thursday he was certain that there are secret U.S. prisons in Europe and he wants access to them.

Manfred Nowak said he had proof that secret U.S. prisons continue to operate in Europe.

"I am 100 percent sure. I have evidence," Nowak said in an interview with The Associated Press.

He cited a U.S. refusal to provide details or records of interrogations later used in terrorism trials in Germany. He did not explain how that was proof of the ongoing existence of U.S. prisons in Europe, and he did not offer other examples.

Allegations of clandestine U.S. detention centers in Europe have sparked separate investigations by the European Parliament and the Council of Europe, the continent's leading human rights watchdog.

"It is totally unacceptable, even in the fight against terrorism, that a highly democratic country such as the United States of America is keeping secret places of detention," said Nowak, an Austrian law professor who reports on torture allegations to U.N. rights bodies and the General Assembly.

U.S. officials in Geneva were not immediately available to comment.

The United States neither confirms nor denies the allegations of secret prisons, because it refuses to comment on intelligence matters. It has noted that the Council of Europe's report found no specific evidence to support claims of the existence of detention camps in Europe like the one in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

In a report released last month, Nowak and four other U.N. experts called on the U.S. government to close down Guantanamo Bay and "refrain from any practice amounting to torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment."

The United States slammed the U.N. report, noting that the U.N. experts had declined an invitation to visit the camp because they would not be given full access to the detainees.

DOJ_NMG_0024668

As with Guantanamo, Nowak said he would only visit the secret prisons if he was granted full access to prisoners. He noted that Beijing had allowed him to interview prisoners during a visit to China last year and that before that trip Washington pressured the Chinese to permit the interviews.

He said that he hoped Washington would reconsider its policy on terror suspects and allow him to investigate allegations of torture in detention centers outside the United States.

"How can I assess whether torture or ill-treatment is practiced in any prison in the world if the only people with whom I can talk are the prison guards and the doctors, but not the detainees?" he asked.

The United States is holding about 490 men at the military detention center; some have been there for more than four years. They are accused of links to Afghanistan's ousted Taliban regime or to al-Qaida, but only a handful have been charged.

Nowak also said that he would go to Chechnya this year because Russia had accepted his condition of direct access to prisoners. He declined to speculate on how widespread the use of torture by Russian security forces might be in the volatile southern province, and said he was still negotiating with Moscow on which detention centers to visit.

Intelligence Redo Is Harshly Judged (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

U.S. Court of Appeals Judge Richard A. Posner sharply criticized the restructuring of U.S. intelligence agencies last week, telling CIA lawyers that the overhaul has done nothing to rectify flaws exposed by al-Qaeda's Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and that the changes "in the end . . . will amount to rather little."

Posner, who has written extensively on intelligence matters, questioned "the wisdom and consequences" of the intelligence overhaul passed by Congress in December 2004, which he said was based on "a deep misunderstanding of the limitations of national security intelligence."

That misunderstanding, Posner said, came from a naive belief that intelligence agencies can somehow be made infallible. "Failure in a democratic society," he said, "demands a response that promises, however improbably, to prevent future failures. [And] the preferred response is a reorganization, because it is at once dramatic and relatively cheap."

Posner made his remarks last Friday at an off-site conference of the CIA's office of general counsel, and a revised text was made available to The Washington Post.

CIA spokesman Paul Gimigliano said yesterday that the judge was invited because he is a well-known writer on intelligence issues and that "the CIA believes its officers should hear a range of informed opinion on issues affecting their work." Posner has a book being published next week, "Uncertain Shield: The U.S. Intelligence System in the Throes of Reform." His book "Preventing Surprise Attacks: Intelligence Reform in the Wake of 9/11" was published last spring.

In Posner's analysis, the director of national intelligence (DNI), created by Congress to be the president's top intelligence adviser, was given too much to do. DNI John D. Negroponte oversees the CIA and 15 other intelligence agencies, including those at the Pentagon. Negroponte's staff, which has grown to about 1,000, "has become a new bureaucracy layered on top of the intelligence community," Posner said.

In the process, he said, the DNI's office has absorbed "many of the responsibilities of the CIA and demoted the agency to little more than a spy service." He points out that Negroponte runs the National Counterterrorism Center, which used to be part of the CIA. The agency also prepared the President's Daily Brief, the most sensitive intelligence delivered to President Bush and his top national security team each morning, but that now is prepared by the DNI.

At the same time, the DNI has floundered in its task of coordinating the agencies within the intelligence community, according to Posner, in part because of "three distinct and largely incompatible intelligence cultures that are poorly balanced: military intelligence, civilian intelligence and criminal investigation intelligence."

The military culture, with its "up-and-out promotions system . . . discipline and strong mission orientation," views the CIA with "a degree of hostility and disdain, which the agency reciprocates," Posner said. In addition, CIA and Pentagon intelligence officers compete in strategic intelligence work, a situation aggravated by the fact that the military operates the spy satellite agencies, whose capabilities it often does not wish to share.

Meanwhile, the FBI culture, focused in the past on catching criminals, is having problems with intelligence gathering because, as Posner put it, "the aim is to prevent the crime, not punish the criminals." Counterterrorist intelligence, he said, requires "casting a very wide net, following up on clues, assembling bits of information, and often failing because there is as yet no crime."

Complicating these differences, he noted, was the "profound political imbalance" extant among the three intelligence cultures. The military "is immensely popular, immensely powerful politically" and "ambitious to expand its intelligence activities under the forceful leadership of Secretary [Donald H.] Rumsfeld and Under Secretary for Intelligence [Stephen A.] Cambone." Posner added that for "all these reasons" Pentagon intelligence is "out of the practical control of the DNI."

He said the FBI "is also immensely popular . . . and politically powerful . . . and stubbornly resistant to change." The CIA was left, Posner said, "in a situation of considerable vulnerability, as an unpopular agency and therefore a natural scapegoat" for intelligence failures of Sept. 11 and prewar Iraq.

Posner said that the DNI should have been given only a coordinating role in U.S. intelligence, and that the CIA director, now Porter J. Goss, should have remained the president's senior intelligence adviser. That approach would have eliminated the requirement that the DNI's office build its own bureaucracy of analysts, he said.

Ex-spy Hunter Drops Intelligence Post Bid (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, March 31, 2006

Former CIA spy hunter Paul Redmond, who helped catch notorious Moscow mole Aldrich Ames, has withdrawn from consideration to become the Bush administration's top counterspy, U.S. intelligence officials say.

Mr. Redmond had been selected to be national counterintelligence executive, but backed out after the FBI held up his formal appointment by conducting a lengthy background investigation, said officials speaking on the condition of anonymity.

Carl Kropf, a spokesman for the Office of the Director of National Intelligence (DNI), declined to comment.

"The selection process for the national counterintelligence executive is under way," Mr. Kropf said. "Until a final selection is made, we decline to discuss the status of any individual currently under consideration for this important position."

Mr. Redmond could not be reached for comment. In addition to uncovering Ames in 1993, Mr. Redmond conducted the damage assessment into the case of FBI counterintelligence agent Robert Hanssen, who spied for Moscow for 16 years before his 2001 arrest.

The national counterintelligence post and the deputy position in what is called NCIX remain vacant following the resignations of Michelle Van Cleave in January and Ken deGraffenreid a month earlier.

The office was recently placed under DNI John D. Negroponte as part of intelligence reform efforts, setting off a dispute over the role of counterintelligence.

However, intelligence officials under Mr. Negroponte, including DNI Mission Manager for Collection Mary Margaret Graham, are opposing the new policy and instead favor making counterintelligence a passive support function for U.S. spying.

Counterspy posts at the CIA and FBI also remain vacant or held by acting officials at a time when foreign spying continues to plague the administration.

FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III told a congressional committee earlier this week that Chinese spying is a "major threat" to the United States.

A Pentagon report on the Iraq war made public March 24 highlighted Russian spying against the U.S. military and its military facility in Doha, Qatar. The report said documents obtained in Iraq showed that Russian intelligence passed U.S. war plans and other operational military data to Saddam Hussein's forces before the war.

The disclosure so far has not led to an investigation.

Asked about the Russian spying, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld told reporters Tuesday that he was not informed about it before its publication in the Iraq war report. "It certainly would be something that one would look into," he said.

A spokesman for the U.S. Central Command said yesterday that there were no immediate plans to conduct an investigation into the documents related to the compromise at Doha.

A Pentagon spokesman also had no immediate comment.

The muted response to the Russian spying report contrasts sharply with other statements by Mr. Rumsfeld and CIA Director Porter J. Goss. Both have denounced intelligence disclosures to the press as undermining U.S. national security.

Intelligence Office Has Swollen, House Panel Says (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON — The House Intelligence Committee voted Thursday to withhold funding from the nation's intelligence director over concerns that his office, which was created to streamline operations in the nation's spy community, is instead becoming bloated and bureaucratic.

DOJ_NMG_0024670

At the same time, Republicans on the House panel defeated a Democratic push to suspend hundreds of millions of dollars in spy agency funding until the Bush administration provided more information about a controversial domestic espionage program being conducted by the National Security Agency.

The measures were considered as part of the 2007 intelligence authorization bill, which sets the spending priorities for the nation's spy agencies.

The move to withhold funding still must be approved by the full House as well as the Senate. But it reflects rising frustration among House lawmakers with an office that was created less than two years ago to solve communication breakdowns and other problems that plagued the intelligence community leading up to the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks and the war in Iraq.

The bill would require the nation's intelligence director, John D. Negroponte, to present a detailed rationale for any additional increases to his staff or risk losing a portion of his budget. The measure was endorsed by Republicans and Democrats.

"We're concerned about some of the steps that are going on" at Negroponte's office, said Rep. Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.), chairman of the House Intelligence Committee. Hoekstra said Negroponte needed to demonstrate that any further expansion would improve coordination among intelligence agencies, and would not amount to "putting in more lawyers and slowing down the process."

Rep. Jane Harman (DVenice), the ranking Democrat on the committee, cited similar concerns.

"We don't want more billets, more bureaucracy, more buildings," Harman said. "We want more leadership."

The action by the committee represents one of the most pointed public rebukes of Negroponte and the course he has set in assembling a staff to oversee the activities of the nation's 16 intelligence agencies.

A spokesman for Negroponte, Carl Kropf, said that the intelligence director's office had not yet seen the House bill. Kropf declined to respond to criticism that Negroponte's office was becoming bloated, except to say that "we are within the limits of the law that established" the director of national intelligence.

Since Negroponte was sworn in less than a year ago, his staff has grown to about 700 employees, according to U.S. intelligence officials. The legislation that created the position provided for a few hundred initial slots, but allowed for the director to add as many as 500 employees through transfers from other agencies.

The intelligence office has named many high-level officials to oversee such intelligence activities as collection and analysis across multiple agencies.

Beyond his own staff, Negroponte is also directly responsible for new centers that coordinate the nation's espionage efforts against terrorism and weapons proliferation.

House Intelligence Committee officials declined to say how much money would be withheld from the intelligence director's office, or exactly what Negroponte would need to include in a report to the panel to get the money released.

Hoekstra described the report the committee was seeking from Negroponte as an "architecture study" of the intelligence office. Other congressional officials said the report would need to justify any additional hires and to explain the functions of existing offices.

In other action, Republicans on the committee defeated a Democratic amendment that sought to force the Bush administration to reveal the budget for the controversial NSA espionage program.

The Democratic measure would have withheld 20% of the NSA's budget unless the White House agreed to disclose how much was being spent on the domestic eavesdropping program.

Democrats have complained that the White House is refusing to provide information on the program to all members of the intelligence committee. Hoekstra noted that 11 of the 21 members of the House panel were getting briefed on the NSA operation, but he said the committee was still engaged in a "tug of war" with the administration for greater access.

Panel Rejects Effort To Withhold Funds To NSA (WP)

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

The House intelligence committee rejected yesterday a proposal to withhold money from the National Security Agency if the White House did not reveal information about the cost of the agency's warrantless surveillance program.

In a session closed to reporters, only Rep. Heather A. Wilson (R-N.M.), who heads a subcommittee that oversees the NSA, voted with the Democrats to support the measure to withhold one-fifth of the agency's budget.

The committee also rejected legislation that would force the Bush administration to carve out $3 million for a board created in late 2004 to protect Americans' civil liberties from government infringements. Democrats have complained for months about what they consider to be Republican foot-dragging in establishing the civil liberties panel, formally known as the Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board.

The measures would have been part of a bill that would set intelligence funding next year.

The White House has resisted fully briefing the House and Senate intelligence committees on the much-discussed NSA program that monitored -- without court warrants -- the international calls and e-mails of people in the United States when terrorism was suspected. In a continuing thaw between the White House and Congress, however, 11 of the House intelligence committee's 21 members were briefed this week on more details of the highly classified program.Higher Education Act Renewed by House

The House approved a bill yesterday aimed at making college decisions more clear and affordable for families. How much the measure would help remains in dispute.

Republicans renewed the Higher Education Act 221 to 199, in a near party-line vote. Most Democrats objected after failing with their version, which would have cut in half the interest rate on student loans this July.

The measure would order simplified steps for people seeking federal aid and would place pressure on colleges to refrain from steep tuition increases. It also would require schools to provide clear information about their costs to the Education Department, to be posted on its Web site as a tool for families.

But Democrats and Republicans could not agree on how the federal government should help people deal with rising tuition. Republican leaders said forcing colleges to be more accountable for costs will help families.TSA Errors, Unisys Bills Led to Cost Overruns

Mismanagement by the Transportation Security Administration and overcharging by its contractor, Unisys Corp., led to cost overruns on a $1 billion contract to build a computer network for the agency, a government report said.

In October, The Washington Post obtained copies of federal auditors' reports showing that, among other abuses, Unisys charged higher per-hour labor rates than were justified for lower-level employees.

Less than halfway through the seven-year contract, $834 million has been spent, according to the report from the Homeland Security Department inspector general's office, yet TSA facilities still lack the technology they need.

Prosecutors Say They Can't Substantiate Informant's Statements (AP)

By DON THOMPSON, The Associated Press

AP, March 30, 2006

SACRAMENTO (AP) — In a potential blow to their terrorism case against a father and son, federal prosecutors on Thursday said there is no evidence to support statements by their key witness that a top aide to Osama bin Laden attended a Lodi mosque in the late 1990s.

The surprise move was designed to dissuade the defense from calling witnesses who would challenge the story's credibility.

The witness, an FBI informant, told agents when they recruited him in 2001 that he had seen a high-ranking al-Qaida official and two other international terrorists when he lived in Lodi during the late 1990s.

Naseem Khan said he was "100 percent sure" he saw bin Laden's physician, Ayman al-Zawahiri, attending a local mosque three times a day.

In a statement read to jurors, prosecutors agreed they could not support the informant's claims, which have been criticized by defense attorneys and terrorism experts.

"The government has no information indicating that al-Zawahiri was in Lodi, Calif., in 1998 or 1999, aside from the information provided by Naseem Khan," prosecutors said in a joint statement with defense lawyers that was read to jurors by defense attorney Johnny Griffin III.

At the time, the three terror suspects were being sought in connection with the bombings of U.S. buildings in Africa and Saudi Arabia.

The admission by prosecutors raises more questions about the credibility of Khan, a 32-year-old convenience store clerk from Oregon who befriended the defendants and secretly recorded hundreds of hours of conversations with them.

Griffin told reporters outside court that the government's statement about Khan "shows that he is a liar."

Umer Hayat and his 23-year-old son, Hamid, have been in federal custody since June, when they were arrested shortly after the younger Hayat returned from a two-year visit to Pakistan. It was there that prosecutors say Hamid Hayat attended an al-Qaida training camp.

He is charged with three counts of making false statements and with providing material support to terrorists by attending the camp. He faces up to 39 years in prison if convicted on all counts.

Umer Hayat, 48, faces 16 years in prison if convicted of two counts of making false statements to FBI agents. Both have pleaded not guilty.

FBI agents testified earlier this week that they discounted Khan's reported sighting of al-Zawahiri and the two other wanted terrorists, Abdelkarim Hussein Mohamed al-Nasser and Ahmed Mohammed Hamed Ali.

DOJ_NMG_0024672

At the time Khan said he saw them in Lodi, Ali was suspected in the bombing of a U.S. embassy in Africa while al-Nasser was wanted in the bombing of a U.S. military housing complex in Saudi Arabia.

The FBI nevertheless hired Khan as an informant, giving him about $220,000 in pay and expenses since then. His mission was to infiltrate the Pakistani community in Lodi, an agricultural town about 35 miles south of Sacramento.

FBI agent Rachel Pifer testified that she believed Khan was merely mistaken when he told the story about the three terror suspects. In the months immediately after the 2001 terror attacks, many people came forward believing they had information about potential terrorists, she said.

"A lot of people had mistaken identity at that point in time," she said.

Other information Khan gathered turned out to be correct, Pifer said.

The statement read to jurors Thursday came on the second day of the presentation by the defense, which is attempting to undermine Khan's credibility.

One of the FBI agents the defense called to the stand worked undercover with Khan in Lodi. His testimony seemed to support an argument advanced by Hamid Hayat's attorney, Wazhma Mojaddidi.

She said her client was prone to fanciful storytelling and maintains that he never attended a terrorist training camp.

The agent, Terry Rankhorn, said he met Hamid Hayat three or four times in gatherings arranged by Khan, when both were posing as computer experts. Rankhorn said he thought Hayat was prone to exaggeration, such as the time Hayat said he was able to obtain an unusual brand of cigarettes because he had prominent relatives in Pakistan.

"His air appeared to me ... to be more boasting than actual substance," Rankhorn testified.

A computer expert, Rankhorn also said he found no incriminating files or documents on Hamid Hayat's computer.

Both Sides Agree No Evidence Of Al-Zawahri Sighting (SACBEE)

By Denny Walsh, Bee Staff Writer

The Sacramento Bee, March 31, 2006

The prosecution and defense agreed Thursday in a formal, written stipulation that there is no evidence to support the claims of an FBI informant that he saw one of the world's most wanted terrorists in Lodi in 1999.

Defense attorney Johnny Griffin III read the agreement to both juries sitting in the trials of Hamid Hayat and his father, Umer Hayat, on terrorism-related charges.

"The government has no information indicating that Ayman al-Zawahri was in Lodi, California, in 1998 or 1999, aside from the information supplied by Naseem Khan," the stipulation says.

Khan, 32, who has been the prosecution's star witness in the dual trials of the Hayats, startled the federal courtroom three weeks ago when he testified before the Hamid Hayat jury that he saw al-Zawahri coming and going at the Muslim mosque in Lodi in 1998 or 1999.

Through Khan's testimony, as well as the testimony of FBI agents, details of the informant's story have continued to emerge.

Al-Zawahri is Osama bin Laden's chief deputy and is under federal indictment in New York City in connection with the 1998 bombings of U.S. embassies in Tanzania and Kenya.

Sacramento FBI Special Agent Rachel Pifer, who was Khan's "handler" from November 2001 to September 2002, testified Thursday that, after hearing Khan's story about al-Zawahri, she initiated an inquiry with the bureau's New York City office.

She said that office replied "it would be remote but not impossible" that al-Zawahri was in the United States at that time.

Pifer said she concluded the information was "probably not true" before she "opened Khan up as an informant" on Nov. 14, 2001.

Under questioning by Hamid Hayat's attorney, Wazhma Mojaddidi, the agent said she believes Khan simply made an honest mistake, and she continues to deem him "a credible and reliable source of information."

Questioned by prosecutor David Deitch, Pifer said the FBI "received a lot of reports of mistaken identity" in the wake of the bureau's release of a list of its 22 most wanted terrorists.

Khan told his al-Zawahri story during his first meeting with FBI agents on Oct. 17, 2001, exactly a week after the bureau went public with its list.

Al-Zawahri "is an Egyptian exile who is reputed to be the No. 2 man in and a co-founder of al-Qaida," according to the list.

Also at Khan's first meeting with agents, at his Bend, Ore., apartment, he said another man on the list, Ahmed Mohammed Hamed Ali, was with al-Zawahri in Lodi in 1999 during Ramadan, a time of fasting, worship and contemplation for Muslims. That information has also been discounted by terrorism experts and the FBI.

Ali, also an Egyptian under indictment in New York, "is facing five counts of participating in the broader terrorist conspiracy, including training Somali tribes opposed to U.S. troop presence," according to the list.

At a subsequent meeting with agents on Oct. 26, 2001, Khan added Abdelkarim Hussein Mohamed al-Nasser to his list of top terrorists he said he spotted in Lodi while living there in the late 1990s.

Al-Nasser has been indicted in the Eastern District of Virginia for the 1996 bombing of the Khobar Towers military housing complex in Dhahran, Saudi Arabia. Nineteen Americans were killed in the attack and hundreds more were wounded.

Much of the government's cases against the Hayats rests on secretly recorded conversations the pair had with Khan in 2003. Khan wore a concealed recording device in his role as an FBI operative. The bureau has paid him more than $217,000 in salary and expenses since he signed on as an informant.

Hamid Hayat, 23, is charged with supporting terrorism by undergoing training in Pakistan and returning to Lodi in May to await orders to wage violent jihad against enemies of Islam in the United States. He is also charged with initially lying to the FBI to conceal his training and intentions.

Umer Hayat, 48, is charged with initially lying to the FBI to cover for his son and to hide his own firsthand knowledge of terrorist training in Pakistan.

More information emerged Thursday about Khan getting permission from the FBI to tell his live-in girlfriend in Oregon that he was an informant for the bureau - a subject that was touched on earlier in the trial.

Sacramento FBI Special Agent Leticia Lucero testified that she told Khan in August to tell his girlfriend, after the Hayats had been arrested and charged, after Khan's confidentiality agreement with the bureau had expired and after a wave of national publicity about the charges.

"I wanted her to know before she got calls trying to find him," Lucero said.

FBI Agent Recalls Hamid Hayat 'boasting' And Bragging (LODINS)

By Layla Bohm, News-Sentinel Staff Writer

Lodi News-Sentinel, March 31, 2006

Government further acknowledges no proof that al-Qaida member was in Lodi

SACRAMENTO — Hamid Hayat didn't know it at the time, but when a new Muslim convert helped him purchase and set up a computer, that man was actually an undercover FBI agent.

The agent, Terry Rankhorn, had even gone through a religious conversion ceremony as part of his undercover assignment. Until Hayat and his father, Umer Hayat, were arrested last June, the agent had mingled for several years in Lodi's Muslim community, often alongside a paid informant.

Rankhorn, an eight-year FBI special agent who called himself "Tariq" when working undercover, spoke to Hamid Hayat about four times and testified at the 23-year-old's trial Thursday that he was "very cordial" and also bragged about his relatives.

One time, Rankhorn told a federal jury, Hamid Hayat said his uncle was a highly placed politician in Pakistan who could get him rare cigars, among other things.

"It seemed to be more boasting than actual fact," the agent testified when Hamid Hayat's attorney, Wazhma Mojaddidi, asked Rankhorn if he believed the Lodi man.

Hamid Hayat is charged with lying to the FBI about allegedly attending terror training camps in Pakistan, and his attorney has insisted that her client regularly bragged and lied, and that he ultimately told FBI agents what they wanted to hear. The young man, who was born in Stockton and spent half his life in Lodi and half in Pakistan, is also charged with providing material support to terrorists.

His father, a 48-year-old ice cream truck driver, is charged with lying to the FBI about his knowledge of the camps and his son's alleged involvement with them. Both are on trial in Sacramento, where two juries are hearing the case.

Defense attorneys spent parts of Wednesday and Thursday rebutting the government's case by questioning the motives of their star witness, the paid informant who worked alongside Rankhorn.

Naseem Khan, 32, was ultimately paid a salary of nearly $150,000 over the past four years, his FBI handler, Leticia Lucero, testified Thursday. But Khan's work ultimately cost more than $230,000 because the FBI also paid for his cars, airfare, meals and other expenses.

He was working at a convenience store in Oregon when FBI agents knocked on his door to investigate a money laundering scheme.

The Sacramento FBI office had been investigating the case since before 9/11, and their investigation took them to a Lodi apartment, Pifer testified Thursday. Agents were told that the man they sought had moved to Oregon, but after talking to Khan, they realized they had the wrong person, she said.

That day about five weeks after 9/11, Khan told agents he had seen Ayman al-Zawahiri — Osama bin Laden's right-hand man who is second on the FBI's list of most wanted terrorists — countless times in Lodi in 1998 and 1999. That claim was instantly questioned by Lodi residents and experts alike, and Pifer said the FBI had also doubted it.

Defense attorneys had planned to cast further doubt on Khan's claim, but on Thursday government prosecutors offered an agreement, which was then read to the jury: "The government has no information indicating that al-Zawahiri was in Lodi, California, in 1998 or 1999, aside from the information provided by Naseem Khan."

Asked if the apparently false information made agents doubt Khan's credibility, Pifer said it did not.

"A lot of people had mistaken identity at that time, so it's not outrageous that he thought he saw some of those people. In addition, a lot of his other reporting we were able to verify," she said. "When he would go out into the community, we didn't tell him what we were looking for, and we would corroborate that information."

Johnny Griffin, Umer Hayat's attorney, said outside court that Khan did likely speak the truth about some things, but that he probably made up other things in order to keep the interest of the FBI, which was focusing on terrorism.

"It all speaks to his motivation to curry favor with the FBI so he can get paychecks," Griffin said.

For instance, Griffen said, Khan recorded conversations with the Hayats and used the word "training" when they talked about madrassahs, or religious schools, "so he could later elaborate that he meant 'terrorist training camps.'"

Threatening Letter Investigated (LODINS)

By News-Sentinel Staff

Lodi News-Sentinel, March 31, 2006

Lodi police and the FBI are looking into a letter sent to the News-Sentinel stating that it is among several targets of al-Qaida.

The single-page letter was delivered this morning and was turned over to the Lodi police, who forwarded it to the FBI.

"There is clearly a possibility this is a prank, but we have to take this seriously," Capt. David Main said.

A spokeswoman for the FBI, Special Agent Karen Ernst, said her agency is aware of the letter and is working with local police to track down its origin. She declined further comment.

Indicted State Department Official Still Holds His Job (AP)

AP, March 30, 2006

DETROIT (AP) — A U.S. State Department security agent who has been charged with lying on the witness stand during a major terrorism trial remains employed by the department, an official said Thursday.

Harry Raymond Smith III continues to work for the State Department, a department official said. The official could not say what Smith's assignment is.

Smith, 49, was indicted Wednesday along with former Assistant U.S. Attorney Richard G. Convertino, 45, on charges of conspiracy, obstruction of justice and making false declarations in connection with the botched prosecution of four North African immigrants. Convertino, who resigned from the Department of Justice in May, was the lead prosecutor in the case, and Smith helped in the investigation and testified for the government at the trial.

Convertino denied the charges Wednesday. A lawyer for Smith described him as a dedicated public servant and said a vigorous defense is planned.

Two of the four defendants in the terrorism trial, Karim Koubriti and Abdel-Ilah Elmardoudi, were convicted in 2003 of conspiring to provide material support and resources to terrorists. The Bush administration hailed their convictions as a victory in the war on terror.

However, a federal judge overturned the verdicts at the Justice Department's request after prosecutors discovered that some documents that could have aided the defense during the trial were not turned over by the government as required.

Former Federal Terrorism Prosecutor Faces Charges (USNEWS)

U.S. News and World Report, March 31, 2006

The lead prosecutor in a Detroit terrorism trial that the government once heralded as a signal victory in the war on terrorism has been indicted on obstruction of justice and other charges related to the case.

The federal indictment says that former prosecutor Richard Convertino and a State Department security officer, Harry Smith, conspired to mislead the jury about evidence during the 2003 trial of the case, United States v. Koubriti, in which three Middle Eastern men were accused of operating a "sleeper cell" and convicted on a variety of terrorism and fraud charges. Theirs were the first and only jury convictions stemming from the FBI's investigation into the 9/11 terrorist attacks. But the federal judge handling the trial, Gerald Rosen, threw out the convictions after the Justice Department issued a scathing report accusing Convertino of withholding evidence that could have been beneficial to the defense.

Convertino, 45, and Smith, 49, were charged with conspiracy, obstruction of justice, and making false declarations in the case. Smith was a security officer at the American Embassy in Amman, Jordan. He helped in the Koubriti investigation and also testified as one of Convertino's witnesses at the trial.

As part of his prosecution, Convertino had alleged that the layout of an Amman hospital closely matched a sketch found in the three defendants' apartment and that the men had "cased" the hospital for a possible terrorist strike. But defense attorneys disputed that assertion and challenged Smith about the supposed absence of photographs that would show discrepancies between the sketch and the site.

In the case against Convertino and Smith, the government says they failed to disclose photographs of the Queen Alia Hospital to the defendants and lied that they could not obtain photographs of the hospital, even though Smith had not only taken his own photos but, not satisfied with the quality, had asked colleagues to shoot some more pictures for Convertino. The indictment charges that Convertino concealed the additional photographs during the trial.

The grand jury also charged Convertino with obstruction of justice in a second criminal case in the Eastern District of Michigan, described only as United States v. John Doe. In that case, prosecutors said Convertino allegedly gave false information to a judge during a sentencing hearing to obtain a sharply reduced sentence for a defendant. Convertino has described the charges that have been leveled against him as a smear campaign by the government.

Convertino is suing his boss in Detroit as well as former Attorney General John Ashcroft and other Justice Department officials, accusing them of "gross mismanagement" of terrorism cases. His attorney, William Sullivan, said today that the indictment is "manifestly false" and another example of "government reprisal for his whistleblower lawsuit."

Sullivan said the Koubriti case was just another example of how Convertino had "dedicated himself to preserving the safety of his community." Matthew Leitman, Smith's attorney, said that his client is a "dedicated public servant" who has "risked his life to defend his country and its elected officials" and that he would be vindicated in court.

Throughout the Koubriti trial, defense attorneys complained that Convertino had engaged in prosecutorial misconduct. He denied it. But Rosen, angered by Convertino's failure to obey his strict orders on disclosure of evidence potentially beneficial to defendants, ordered Ashcroft to conduct a complete review of the case, which resulted in Rosen's throwing out the convictions of the three men.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bill Seeks To End Color-coded Terror Alert (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, March 31, 2006

A bipartisan push on Capitol Hill to strip the hue from the government's color-coded terrorist alert system is gaining momentum.

A package of legislation moving through the House eliminates the Department of Homeland Security's use of colors to change the threat level, and calls for more specific threat information to be shared with the private sector and local governments.

"The color code doesn't provide any information to people, what it does is foster a climate of anxiety without giving useful information to people," said Rep. Zoe Lofgren, California Democrat, who worked with Rep. Rob Simmons, Connecticut Republican, on the legislation.

"It's not a proper way to give a nationwide response to actual threats."

The current system, implemented by former Homeland Security chief Tom Ridge, has frustrated governors and local officials nationwide who say they are forced to spend millions responding to threat level rises without information as to whether it directly affects their region.

The House Homeland Security subcommittee on intelligence, information sharing and terrorism risk assessment, chaired by Mr. Simmons, yesterday approved the plan by voice vote. It now awaits action by the full committee.

"There are no plans to change the color-coded system at this time," said William Knocke, Homeland Security spokesman.

"The system itself has matured over time as the country's baseline of preparedness rises and our threat analyses improves."

The last time the alert level was raised was July 7-12 after the London subway bombings.

Mr. Ridge tweaked the system in 2004 when specific economic areas were thought to be terrorist targets in New York, New Jersey and in Washington, and limited the increase in security and spending to those specific cities.

The terrorist alert system was introduced in March 2002 in five color-coded stages; low (green) guarded (blue) elevated (yellow) high (orange) and severe alert (red).

The country has been on elevated level since the code was introduced and the terrorist threat has been raised five times to high nationwide.

The White House briefly went to severe alert when a private aircraft accidentally crossed over its restricted airspace in 2005. The country has never been on low or guarded alert.

The legislation also gives full authority to Homeland Security officials to issue an increase in threat levels. In the past, conflicting warnings were sometimes issued from the Justice Department then led by Attorney General John Ashcroft, which created confusion, the legislation notes.

Report: TSA Got Little For $1 Billion (AP-Y2)

By Leslie Miller

AP2, March 31, 2006

A company awarded a $1 billion contract for airport security equipment performed so poorly that the Homeland Security Department's inspector general recommended that the project be put out for bid again.

The inspector general, Richard Skinner, found in a report released Thursday that Unisys received most of the $1 billion without providing the Transportation Security Administration much of the equipment "critical to airport security and communications."

"The original funding is almost exhausted but many airports still do not have basic information technology and a telecommunications infrastructure," the report said.

The federal officials who head airport security at hundreds of airports complained that Unisys supplied antiquated equipment and that their radios didn't always communicate with each other inside the same concourse — a crucial function during an emergency.

"We are not pleased with the level of services provided as the services are not state of the art and in fact are archaic," wrote one federal security director.

Another complained that some cell phones — "a hodgepodge of $20 Radio Shack sale rack phones" — were so old they actually have a mechanical bell that rings.

The inspector general did note that TSA had an enormous task to take over airport security from private contractors. The agency had inadequate funding and staffing to oversee the contract, the report said.

The inspector general recommended that TSA put the contract out to bid again once the $1 billion is exhausted.

TSA agreed to do so and said it has strengthened its procurement oversight.

"TSA has implemented several changes since the DHS OIG (Department of Homeland Security Office of Inspector General) opened this audit and continues to make significant improvements within the Office of Acquisition," agency chief Kip Hawley wrote in a memorandum.

The inspector general noted that TSA knew the contract could exceed $5 billion, but set a ceiling at $1 billion. The report said that when the inspector general asked TSA to explain the low ceiling, agency officials said it was based on "specific requirements." However, the inspector general said the officials "could not document which specific requirements."

The TSA, which was created shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, needed information technology and telecommunications for what it anticipated would be 65,000 employees at headquarters, 429 airports, 21 field offices and a command center, the report said.

Unisys was to have provided dial-up connections, laptops, pagers and cell phones by Nov. 19, 2002. Six weeks later, the company was to have delivered high-speed connections, phones, encrypted radios and an electronic surveillance system. Eventually, Unisys was to provide command centers at airports, advanced wireless communications and interoperable radios.

The inspector general said that the company had only supplied the first phase by Sept. 30, 2004.

Blue Bell, Pa.-based Unisys did not immediately reply to a request for comment.

Port Security Measures Advance In Congress (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, March 31, 2006

Bills that aim to improve the security of the nation's ports and other key infrastructure advanced in both the House and Senate yesterday, weeks after public uproar scuttled a Dubai-owned company's bid to operate terminals at six U.S. ports.

DOJ_NMG_0024677

The Senate Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs Committee yesterday approved 20-0 a bill that would reform the interagency panel charged with approving such foreign deals -- forcing more thorough investigations and congressional involvement.

And a House Homeland Security subcommittee approved by voice vote legislation that would boost funding for the nation's ports and improve port-security programs.

Many lawmakers were caught off-guard by February press reports of the approval of the deal involving DP World, based in the United Arab Emirates. Lawmakers said the panel charged with approving such deals -- the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States (CFIUS) -- should have notified them of the situation and should have given far greater weight to homeland security and terrorism concerns when making its decision.

"Congress and the American people require greater confidence in the process," said banking committee Chairman Sen. Richard C. Shelby, Alabama Republican.

"CFIUS did not move with the times," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat, referring to enhanced security concerns in a post-September 11 world.

Part of the concern is that the CFIUS rarely conducts a 45-day investigation of such deals, opting instead for 30-day reviews, as it did with the Dubai deal.

Under Mr. Shelby's bipartisan bill, deals would go through the 30-day review to determine whether they merit a longer investigation, and any CFIUS member could request more time to decide. The 45-day investigation would be required if a deal involves a foreign-government-owned company and critical U.S. infrastructure, such as ports, that could affect national security.

The bill would place the defense secretary as co-chairman of CFIUS and would add the director of national intelligence as a panel member. It would require CFIUS to notify Congress of pending deals and to develop a system to rank each country according to its adherence to nuclear security standards and relationship with the United States.

Sen. Susan Collins, Maine Republican and chairman of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, has a competing bill that would scrap the CFIUS panel and reconstitute it under the Homeland Security Department.

Mr. Shelby said there isn't much support for that idea in the business community.

"Treasury's the proper place" for foreign business deal reviews, he said.

Meanwhile, a House Homeland Security subcommittee approved a bill -- sponsored by Rep. Dan Lungren, California Republican, and Rep. Jane Harman, California Democrat -- that would authorize a little more than $4 billion over five years to improve port security, install radiation portal monitors at U.S. seaports and develop a recovery plan in case of a transportation attack.

Panels Approve Bills About Ports Issues (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 30 (AP) — Two Congressional panels approved measures on Thursday in efforts to stem the furor over the attempted takeover of significant terminal operations at some large American ports by a company owned by the United Arab Emirates.

In the House, a Homeland Security subcommittee cleared legislation that aims to improve cargo inspections and strengthen security at ports. By voice vote, the subcommittee on economic security, infrastructure protection and cybersecurity sent the wide-ranging bill to the full committee, which is to vote on the measure in late April.

And the Senate Banking Committee voted 20 to 0 to approve a measure that would bring the federal panel that approved the DP World ports deal under tighter oversight by Congress.

The multiagency panel, called the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States, would be required to investigate any proposed transaction that involved a foreign government or "critical infrastructure" of the country.

Senators said the bill, which was sent to the full Senate, strikes a balance between national security concerns and economic interests, with foreign investment in this country exceeding $530 billion in 2003-5.

Senate Panel Backs Tougher Takeover Review (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, March 31, 2006

Foreign takeovers of sensitive US assets could face a national security review of up to 120 days under legislation unanimously passed by the Senate banking committee on Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0024678

The bill drawn up by Senator Richard Shelby, chairman of the banking committee, aims to make reviews conducted by the Treasury-led interagency panel that investigations foreign acquisitions, or Cfius, more onerous and will give Congress more oversight over the confidential vetting process.

Passage of the bill, which now faces a vote in the Senate and has yet to be taken up by the House of Representatives, follows weeks of intense negotiations between lawmakers and a coordinated lobbying campaign by the business community.

"As critical as foreign investment is...our national security is paramount. Once it is bargained away, it may never be recovered,'' Mr Shelby said.

Lobbyists expressed satisfaction that, despite the extended review period permitted in certain circumstances, the draft legislation was far weaker than proposals first put forward by Mr Shelby last week. That initial draft would have subjected nearly every foreign deal to an automatic 75-day investigation.

Nevertheless, David Marchick, an attorney with Covington & Burling who handles Cfius cases, said the measures were "very tough". "It definitely toughens the Cfius process," he said.

The debate over how to balance security with an economy open to international investment follows the congressional backlash last month against the acquisition by a Dubai company of five US port terminals, a case that aggrieved lawmakers who said the deal had not been adequately vetted by the Bush administration.

Other deals, including Toshiba's takeover of Westinghouse and the likely merger between Alcatel and Lucent, will face Cfius reviews in coming months.

The business-friendly compromises agreed on Thursday by Mr Shelby followed negotiations with Republican Chuck Hagel and Democrat Christopher Dodd.

"They took off some of the rough edges. Every member understood the importance of foreign investment and jobs," said Larry Burton, executive director of the Business Roundtable, a lobby group,

The Roundtable remained concerned about "unprecedented" notification requirements in the bill, which it said could increase transactions becoming political, and reporting requirements that "would create opportunity" for information to be sent to Congress to be used for commercial purposes instead of national security purposes.

"The legislation...protects our national security in a responsible way that does not jeopardise our competitive position in the world," Mr Hagel said.

Under current law, Cfius reviews transactions that could impact national security for 30 days and conducts an additional 45-day investigation for any deal that raises concerns before it makes a recommendation to the president. The president then has 15 days to respond to the recommendation. In the past, most deals have been approved following a 30-day review.

Mr Shelby's bill would allow a secretary, or deputy or undersecretary, of a single Cfius agency to extend the investigation of a deal by a further 30 days if there was "credible evidence" that the foreign entity may take action to threaten national security. It requires Cfius to alert key lawmakers of its investigations - a process that was previously classified - and designates the department of defence as a vice-chair of the review panel.

Mr Shelby's bill would also force the White House to create a ranking of countries according to their relationship with the US to be considered in Cfius reviews. Lawmakers said the provision should be further debated before it is voted on by the whole Senate.

"Once you've labeled a country...it becomes a liability," said Mr Dodd. The provision was a "precarious way to go".

Don Evans, the former commerce secretary who is chief executive of the Financial Services Forum, an association that lobbies on behalf of the biggest banks in the world, praised the passage of the revised bill and said he would continue to work with members of Congress "to ensure that changes to foreign investment rules are considered carefully and thoughtfully".

Senate Advances Foreign-Investment Legislation (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Senate moved forward on legislation to increase government oversight of foreign investments in the U.S. after heavy lobbying by Wall Street and business groups resulted in changes that softened some of the bill's tougher provisions.

In the wake of the Dubai ports uproar and with an election eight months away, Republicans and Democrats are competing to advance measures that would increase executive-branch and congressional scrutiny over foreign mergers and acquisitions in the U.S. But U.S. business interests, with some Senate support, have fought back, arguing that lawmakers risk scaring off crucial investors and making life harder on U.S. companies overseas.

The Senate Banking Committee unanimously approved a bill to extend the existing review process in a wide array of cases and to broaden the definition of investments, calling for scrutiny to include all types of "critical infrastructure." Working off a bill sponsored by committee Chairman Richard Shelby (R., Ala.), the measure also would require the Treasury Department to notify Congress of proposed deals under review, thus opening up a process normally kept in secret.

The bill, which must now go to a full Senate vote, would stand as the most significant tightening of U.S. foreign-investment rules in almost 20 years. It seeks to alter the workings of the Committee on Foreign Investment in the U.S., the interagency panel that provoked a public outcry after it approved Dubai Ports World's bid to manage five U.S. ports.

In a speech yesterday, Treasury Secretary John Snow warned that foreign investment in the U.S. is "being put in jeopardy now by legislation that is well-intended." He said the administration also worried that signals from the U.S. could lead other countries to shut themselves off to foreign investment.

Bowing to business concerns, the committee adopted an amendment by Sen. Chuck Hagel (R., Neb.) to limit the range of cases that would require a full 45-day investigation on top of a preliminary 30-day review. The one group of companies that will face an automatic full investigation are foreign state-owned firms, though other deals that pose a national-security risk also will face the same scrutiny.

"Investments for us are about speed," said George Nolen, the chief executive of Siemens USA, who expressed relief that the amended bill wouldn't create new layers of bureaucracy for companies like its German-based parent, Siemens AG. "Sen. Shelby has put together a pretty good platform," he said.

The legislation drew scrutiny from major U.S. multinational companies and investment firms, as well as most of the major business groups. The groups expressed satisfaction but still had reservations at what emerged from the committee.

Deep worries remain, however, over the fact that the bill will require that Congress be notified of all impending reviews, a provision that could open the process to political squabbles and even pressures from business competitors. Whenever a foreign company seeks to acquire any company involved in critical infrastructure, the bill also would require notification of state officials and congressional representatives in the district where the U.S. company is based, which critics say will only intensify the political leverage.

In another disputed section, the revised legislation tweaked an earlier requirement that the administration rank all countries according to their relations with the U.S. and their support for weapons-control deals. Instead, the bill calls for the government to create a system "assessing and classifying" countries according to the same criteria. The list, which would be kept secret, would then be used to assess the risks involved in approving foreign acquisitions.

Under the Senate bill, the administration will have to report to Congress why it approved or rejected any transaction, but the bill wouldn't give lawmakers the power to veto a deal, as many critics feared.

The House isn't expected to introduce its own legislation until next month. But some Bush administration officials hope that they can support more-moderate revisions in the House to take the place of the Shelby bill.

Foreign-Investment Bill Advances (WP)

By Paul Blustein

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

Seeking to apply lessons from the Dubai ports controversy, an influential Senate panel yesterday approved a bill that would tighten scrutiny of foreign takeovers while dropping several provisions that U.S. business leaders feared would dampen investment from abroad.

The bill, approved 20 to 0 by the Senate Banking Committee, would revamp the process by which an interagency panel reviews foreign purchases of U.S. companies for possible national security problems. Criticism of the panel, the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States, erupted last month following revelations that it had approved a takeover by Dubai Ports World, a United Arab Emirates-based company, of a firm that manages significant operations at six East Coast ports. The uproar in Congress forced Dubai Ports World to promise to sell the U.S. port operations.

Sen. Richard C. Shelby (R-Ala.), chairman of the Banking Committee, led a chorus of panel members who cited the ports case as evidence that CFIUS needs fixing. Noting that the heads of the agencies represented on the foreign investment committee, such as the secretaries of the Homeland Security, Defense and Treasury departments, didn't know about the deal until it made headlines, he said that "demonstrates that the system is woefully short of transparency and has no recognizable requirements for accountability."

The bill, which now goes to the full Senate, would make it easier for individual agencies on the committee to extend the time required to complete a review of a transaction.

It would also require special scrutiny of deals in which the acquiring company is owned by a foreign government, as Dubai Ports World is. In those cases, the deal would undergo a 45-day investigation followed by a presidential decision on whether to allow the purchase. That would apply to many if not all Chinese takeovers of U.S. companies, since the government in Beijing still has major stakes in big Chinese corporations.

Still, the Banking Committee's action came as a relief to business groups that worried the ports flap would prompt lawmakers to adopt much more dramatic measures that could make the U.S. investment climate less appealing to buyers from overseas. The House is planning to start work on its own bill in a few weeks.

"Great outcome," said Todd Malan, president of the Organization for International Investment, a group representing the U.S. subsidiaries of foreign multinational corporations. "There are still things that are going to be on our wish list" as the bill moves to the Senate floor, "but they just don't amount to things that are so significant that they would be barriers to foreign investment."

Gone from the bill, for example, is a provision that would have required a 45-day investigation for any foreign purchase of "critical infrastructure." Industry representatives complained that the term was too broad and would hamper too many deals.

Some lawmakers had argued that Congress should have veto power over CFIUS decisions, but that provision never got into the version of the bill presented yesterday by Shelby and Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes (D-Md.), the Banking Committee's ranking minority member. Giving Congress such a big say would politicize the process and make investors skittish, critics warned.

Instead, the bill requires the foreign investment committee to notify certain congressional leaders of deals it is reviewing before it approves them. Many experts in foreign investment think such a procedure might have averted the Dubai ports fiasco because top lawmakers would have had the chance to make sure their concerns were addressed in the review.

DOJ, DOD Stress Self-powered Communications (FCW)

By Michael Arnone

Federal Computer Week, March 31, 2006

If Hurricane Katrina taught first responders anything, it's that communications systems must survive a natural disaster before they can be used to coordinate response efforts.

That's what officials from the Defense and Justice departments told Congress today as they explained some of the steps they are taking to improve information sharing before the 2006 hurricane season starts June 1.

"The survivability of our systems is critical," Vance Hitch, DOJ's chief information officer, told the House Government Reform Committee.

The federal government must work with industry to create self-powered communications technology that can operate without traditional infrastructure, said Linton Wells, principal deputy assistant secretary of Defense for networks and information integration.

"The federal government must continue to expand its capability to rapidly deploy commercial off-the-shelf networks, making use of satellite links, wireless local-area networks, laptop computers and 'plug-and-play' equipment to bridge the gap created by a devastated civil infrastructure," Wells said in a statement.

Common operating standards and equipment are the long-term solution to interoperable communications in disaster response, Hitch said. The Justice, Homeland Security and Treasury departments are making progress toward implementing such standards through the Integrated Wireless Network (IWN), he said.

A communications system for 80,000 federal law enforcement officers nationwide, IWN will improve the departments' ability to communicate with one another by having them use common standards and equipment, Hitch said.

The participating agencies have almost finished procurement for IWN and expect to award a contract soon, he said. The agencies plan to roll the program out over five years.

IP, which bridges formerly incompatible systems, is an advance in communications interoperability that can be used more quickly, Wells said.

Better coordination at the federal, state and local levels is also necessary to improve information sharing, said Peter Verga, principal deputy assistant secretary of Defense for homeland defense.

To prepare for the 2006 hurricane season, DOD has assigned a strategic planner to DHS and is reviewing other employees assigned to DHS to ensure the right people are in place, Verga said.

DOD is working with the National Geospatial Intelligence Agency to develop a system to acquire reconnaissance data of initial damage conditions, Verga said.

The department is helping other agencies revise the National Search and Rescue Plan, and working to provide state National Guard forces with more information about military deployments during disaster response, Verga said.

A main area that needs improvement is social networks among different first responder groups, Wells said. All first responders should train and exercise together to create trusted relationships across disciplines and form bonds that facilitate communication in crisis situations, he said.

Ground Zero Still In Limbo As Talks Fail (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0024681

By Charles V. Bagli

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

Gov. George E. Pataki's last-ditch effort to strike a deal with the developer Larry A. Silverstein to speed up the rebuilding at ground zero crashed yesterday, when he was unable to convince New Jersey or City Hall officials that it made financial sense.

Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg and representatives of Gov. Jon S. Corzine of New Jersey vowed to work with Mr. Pataki to put together a new framework for rebuilding at the World Trade Center site, one that would be likely to diminish Mr. Silverstein's role.

The seemingly irreparable breakdown, coming after months of negotiations and with construction expected to start within days, is clearly a personal and political disappointment for the governor.

Over the last three years, Mr. Pataki tied his legacy, his reputation and perhaps his presidential ambitions to construction of the Freedom Tower and the restoration of the city's skyline after the devastating attack on Sept. 11.

After a furious series of meetings this week, the Pataki administration and Mr. Silverstein were inching back toward an agreement much like one that had been on the table when talks reached a dramatic late-night impasse on March 14.

But Mr. Pataki's solution was coming under increasing fire in public from Mayor Bloomberg and Governor Corzine. They said it would have enriched the developer at public expense, while putting the project itself in jeopardy.

Mr. Pataki had hoped to present his proposal yesterday to the board of the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, which owns the trade center site. His framework would have relieved Mr. Silverstein of financial responsibility for building the $2 billion Freedom Tower, the tallest, most symbolic and most troubled of the five towers planned for the 16-acre site. But the developer would have retained the right to build three towers on the most valuable parcels on Church Street.

At the end of a 90-minute meeting yesterday morning at the authority's Park Avenue office, it was clear to the Pataki administration that neither Mayor Bloomberg nor Governor Corzine, who shares control of the authority with Mr. Pataki, were willing to go along.

So, the New York governor's office was forced to notify authority commissioners that ground zero was off the agenda.

"Governor Pataki is insisting on moving forward," said Charles A. Gargano, the state's chief economic development official and vice chairman of the Port Authority. "Our goal is to come to a framework agreement, to work out the structure to address many of these issues."

In public, officials from New York, New Jersey and City Hall were careful to avoid criticizing one another yesterday. Indeed, Mayor Bloomberg even said that Mr. Pataki had done a good job under difficult circumstances.

But state officials who were granted anonymity so that they could speak with fewer political constraints defended the deal they had nearly signed with Mr. Silverstein. They said that it would have ensured the completion of all the buildings at ground zero at a quicker pace, while imposing strict deadlines on the developer.

Further, they said, they had forced Mr. Silverstein to make concessions on his rent, the allocation of insurance proceeds and his share of infrastructure costs.

Among the public officials, tension was clearly just below the surface yesterday. Mr. Gargano said that the framework the state had erected for a deal was still on the table. Yet city officials and Anthony R. Coscia, the authority's chairman and a New Jersey appointee, suggested that it was time to start over on an arrangement that all sides could embrace.

If the turn of events was a blow to Mr. Pataki, it also hurt Mr. Silverstein, who leased the World Trade Center six weeks before it was destroyed. The developer has repeatedly vowed to start work on the Freedom Tower next month. But he may not want to start spending tens of millions of dollars without fully knowing what his role will be in the future when it comes to rebuilding the entire complex.

Yesterday, Mr. Silverstein said that he had negotiated in good faith with Governor Pataki, making significant progress on all the critical issues, including rent and the allocation of $2.9 billion in insurance proceeds. Mr. Silverstein, who has been alternately applauded and vilified for his role, rejected any suggestion that he was at fault and blamed government ineptitude.

"We now find that the process has apparently gotten bogged down inside the Port Authority, which is as frustrating to me as I'm sure it is to New Yorkers," Mr. Silverstein said in a statement. "We hope that the different leaders and branches of government will quickly come together so we can move past the uncertainty and get on with what is our paramount obligation — rebuilding the World Trade Center."

But Mr. Coscia put the onus on Mr. Silverstein and brushed aside talk of a rift with Governor Pataki. He said the city and both states would now work together on a unified proposal to offer Mr. Silverstein.

"The issues we find with the Silverstein proposal are equally of concern to New York, New Jersey, Governor Pataki and Mayor Bloomberg," Mr. Coscia said. "My expectation is that there is a growing unanimity of opinion among two governors and the mayor, and that is likely to enhance the chance of having an agreement."

The collapse of the talks is not the only trouble at ground zero. Work has begun on the Sept. 11 memorial, but that project is already over budget and fund-raising has been sluggish. There was a nasty public battle over a planned cultural center and continuing doubts about the economic viability of the Freedom Tower, which is widely considered to be too big, in the wrong place and nearly impossible to lease to corporate tenants, who view it as an obvious terrorist target.

Some downtown executives and community leaders are also worried that the continuing uncertainty at ground zero will undermine the fragile recovery in Lower Manhattan. Although the office vacancy rate downtown is relatively high, they are hoping that rising rents and a tight Midtown market will once again make Lower Manhattan an attractive alternative.

"The business community is eager for a resolution at ground zero so Lower Manhattan can continue it's momentum toward a full recovery," said Eric Deutsch, president of the Alliance for Downtown New York.

The latest crisis was prompted, in part, by the scheduled April groundbreaking for the Freedom Tower. Although Mr. Silverstein continues to insist that he has the money and the desire to do the job, state and city officials and authority executives have grown increasingly concerned that he could run out of money, default on his lease and walk away with tens of millions in profit after completing only two towers.

To be fair, Governor Pataki championed the skyscraper as a symbol of New York's resilience and insisted that it be built first, over Mr. Silverstein's objections. The developer and government officials subsequently reached agreements in 2003 and 2004 on what would be built and when.

Last December, Mr. Coscia of the Port Authority suggested that Mr. Silverstein surrender a major part of the World Trade Center site as a way of addressing the financial problems.

Mayor Bloomberg, who had been largely focused on the redevelopment of the Far West Side in 2004 and 2005, became increasingly focused on Lower Manhattan, backing Mr. Coscia.

The developer refused, not wanting to relinquish what he said were the most valuable parcels.

The Pataki administration then began weeks of negotiations with Mr. Silverstein that left Mr. Coscia and Mayor Bloomberg without seats at the bargaining table. Even after the impasse on March 14, Silverstein executives complained that they were making concessions to Mr. Pataki's negotiators, while reading in the newspapers about new demands by City Hall or New Jersey.

Mr. Coscia said yesterday that two fundamentally different interests were in play.

"Silverstein Properties is pursuing their business interests to further the profitability of this effort," he said, "and we have a responsibility to protect the public's interest."

Trade Center Rebuilding Talks Again Hit Snag But Will Continue (WSJ)

By Alex Frangos

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

Talks to jump-start the long-delayed rebuilding of the World Trade Center became stymied again as the region's two governors and New York City's mayor failed to agree on a negotiating stance with the site's private developer, but talks are continuing nonetheless.

New York Gov. George E. Pataki and New Jersey Gov. Jon S. Corzine, who control Ground Zero's owner, the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, and New York Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg couldn't settle upon a position to take with real-estate developer Larry Silverstein, who owns the legal right to rebuild the office space there, several people involved in the negotiations say.

The three men held discussions in recent days hoping to craft a plan in time for the Port Authority's board of commissioners to approve at their monthly meeting yesterday afternoon. That didn't happen.

But participants said talks would continue. "The parties involved here are probably closer than they've ever been before," said Port Authority Chairman Anthony R. Coscia, from New Jersey.

The talks signal a shift of focus away from Mr. Silverstein to the complex web of government involved in rebuilding. Mr. Silverstein and Port Authority negotiators had agreed upon the broad outlines of a deal on Tuesday. But those terms needed to be approved by the bistate agency's commissioners, who are appointed in equal number by the governors of New York and New Jersey. Mr. Bloomberg is involved because he controls $1.67 billion in tax-free bonds for the project.

According to one of the negotiators, the lack of a deal makes the start of the site's signature skyscraper, the Freedom Tower, "unclear." A groundbreaking was planned for April.

The three government entities disagree on how much of a rent reduction to give to Mr. Silverstein. Mr. Silverstein's lawyers and Port Authority staff agreed Tuesday that the developer would forgo the rights to rebuild two of the five office towers, including the signature Freedom Tower, and around $1 billion in insurance money. The Port Authority would reduce the value of rent Mr.

Silverstein owes under his $3.2 billion, 99-year lease, by $300 million to $400 million in net-present-value terms, after accounting for the reduction in the amount of space Mr. Silverstein would develop.

A Port Authority official said one of the sticking points is assurances made by New York State that it could persuade the federal government to rent close to one million square feet of space in the Freedom Tower for $47.50 a square foot, a number that would reduce the Port Authority's risk in the $2.2 billion tower.

Levee Repair Costs Triple (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey, Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

The Bush administration said yesterday that the cost of rebuilding New Orleans's levees to federal standards has nearly tripled to $10 billion and that there may not be enough money to fully protect the entire region.

Donald E. Powell, the administration's rebuilding coordinator, said some areas may be left without the protection of levees strong enough to meet requirements of the national flood insurance program. Those areas probably would face enormous obstacles in attracting home buyers and investors willing to build there.

The news represents a shift for the administration; President Bush had pledged in the weeks after Hurricane Katrina to rebuild New Orleans "higher and better." Now, some areas may lose out as they compete for levee protection. Powell's announcement, in a conference call with reporters, prompted denunciations from state and local officials who said the federal government is reneging on promises to rebuild the entire region.

"This monumental miscalculation is an outrage," said Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco (D). "This means that, just two months before hurricane season, the Corps of Engineers informs us they cannot ensure even the minimum safety of southeastern Louisiana. This is totally unacceptable."

The change followed a surprise announcement from the Army Corps of Engineers that the levee reconstruction project, most recently estimated at $3.5 billion, would now cost $9.5 billion if insurance-certified levees were extended throughout the region.

Powell had said in December when the administration announced a $3.1 billion levee plan that Bush's commitment to rebuild the Gulf Coast "would be satisfied as it relates to the safety and security of the people." In February, after Congress approved $2 billion for the project, Bush said an additional $1.5 billion would be needed. The Senate will consider the request next week.

Yesterday, Powell acknowledged that now "we are faced with some new and tough policy decisions."

The news shattered the fragile relationship between Washington officials and Louisiana leaders, who have assumed that the rebuilding effort would cover the entire New Orleans area.

State and local leaders said the U.S. government had broken a trust and appeared to backing away from commitments to rebuild. Louisiana officials also questioned why federal engineers are just now announcing that the task would cost $6 billion more.

"Every time we turn around, there's a new obstacle," said Rep. Charlie Melancon (D-La.). "The estimates were done for rebuilding the levees, and a number was given to the administration and to the Congress. Now all of a sudden they say they made a $6 billion mistake?"

Melancon said he wondered whether the changes reflected the comments made by officials such as House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) after the storm questioning the wisdom of rebuilding the low-lying city.

"I have been concerned since November that people here in Washington didn't really want to help. . . . I think the people are starting to see where the problems are," Melancon said.

Sen. David Vitter (R-La.) said the announcement confirmed his warnings since November that Washington is "stonewalling" and seeking "way too little money" for levee repairs.

The new cost estimates, just as hurricane season is approaching, are "enormously frustrating," he said.

A spokesperson for New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin (D) said he had no comment.

In the conference call yesterday, Powell reiterated the promise that the levees will be at least as strong as they were designed to be before Hurricane Katrina hit on Aug. 29.

"If a hurricane such as Katrina hit the area, there would not be catastrophic flooding," he said. But, he said, there might be some "manageable" flooding.

Powell said that science, "not any bureaucracy, politics nor any member of the political branches," determined the cost revisions. Bush "is concerned with the well-being of the area's residents," he said, but "he wants to make sure we make the right rebuilding decisions, not just for the residents but for the American taxpayers."

Indicating that not all of the $6 billion will be forthcoming, Powell said he will be in discussions with state and local leaders about which portions of the region should be protected with insurance-certified levees, and also how much the state and local governments can pay.

"We're dialoguing with the state and local officials," he said, adding that if there is an agreement, maps clarifying where and how homeowners can rebuild could be released in 10 days. "We haven't decided what [amount] to ask for."

He played down the difference between the ordinary levees and those that meet the standards of the insurance program, saying the $6 billion in improvements is "an insurance issue, and not necessarily a safety issue."

Whether the levees meet the flood insurance standards is considered a key piece of the rebuilding puzzle, however.

In areas where the levees do not meet the standards, buildings may have to be constructed up to 20 to 35 feet above ground, a Powell aide acknowledged. Also, in a city where there is a desperate need for housing investors, areas with less-than-optimal levees could scare off flood-wary developers.

To help state and local officials choose which areas might be protected by insurance-certified levees, Powell broke the four-parish New Orleans region into 10 areas and listed the populations and cost of building such levees.

In the analysis, three Plaquemines Parish sections, southeast of the city, look ripe for cost-cutting. Less than 2 percent of the area's population lives there, but it would cost nearly $2.9 billion to build certified levees.

By contrast, protecting Algiers, where 13 percent of the region's population lives, would cost $129 million.

The reason the cost estimates have risen so dramatically is that the science of hurricanes and hurricane protection is evolving, Maj. Gen. Don T. Riley, director of civil works for the Army Corps of Engineers, said yesterday.

The loss of coastal wetlands protecting New Orleans from storms, as well as the lowering of the ground level in the area, have reduced the city's natural safeguards from flooding -- and altered assumptions.

Moreover, new storm data from the past 20 years suggest that powerful storms are more likely to hit New Orleans than previously believed. The previous levee design was meant for less powerful storms, but the recent surge of activity has changed ideas about what kinds of storms the city should be prepared for.

"As we learn, we will adjust our methodology and our estimates," Riley said. "To do it properly takes time."

Levee Plans Fall Short Of FEMA Standards (NYT)

By John Schwartz

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

New Orleans's levees do not meet the standards that the Federal Emergency Management Agency requires for its flood protection program, federal officials said yesterday — and they added that the problem would take as much as $6 billion to fix.

FEMA has long based its flood planning on whether an area is protected against a flood that might have a 1 percent chance of occurring in any year, also known as a 100-year flood. Without that certification, the agency's flood maps have to treat the entire levee system as if it were not there at all, which means that people hoping to build in the affected areas might have to rebuild their homes at elevations of 15 or even 30 feet above sea level in order to meet new federal building standards.

But since Hurricane Katrina devastated New Orleans, the agency has toughened its 100-year standard, based on new information about land subsidence and the increasing severity and frequency of hurricanes in the Gulf of Mexico. There is also new data about weak soils in the area and the failure of some of the city's floodwalls.

As a result, the levees that the Army Corps of Engineers is now building will not meet the new FEMA standard. Donald Powell, the federal coordinator for Gulf Coast rebuilding, said Thursday that the Corps now believes it cannot meet that standard without spending additional billions to upgrade the flood protection system still further.

Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco of Louisiana expressed outrage over what she called a monumental miscalculation and said it was shocking to learn that $6 billion more might be needed for the hurricane protection system.

"This means that, just two months before hurricane season, the Corps of Engineers informs us they cannot ensure even the minimum safety of Southeastern Louisiana," Ms. Blanco said in a statement. "This is totally unacceptable."

But Mr. Powell said in a news briefing yesterday that the $2 billion that the Army Corps of Engineers is currently spending and the $1.4 billion in additional funds it has requested will make the system stronger and better than it has ever been. Asked if he would feel comfortable living in the area despite the government's inability to certify the levees, he responded, "after the Corps completes its work, yes."

Mr. Powell called the difference "a regulatory issue, not necessarily a safety issue." When the current work on the levees is complete, he said, there might be flooding from a storm like Hurricane Katrina, but the levee system would not fail catastrophically again.

Although people can rebuild without the federal flood maps today, many homeowners may well decide that the risks of rebuilding are too great. The Louisiana Recovery Authority has said that its plan to provide grants to those who rebuild will favor those who meet FEMA requirements.

Mr. Powell said that to start the process of getting the new flood maps, the federal government only needs to state that it does intend to meet the certification standard — a process that it can undertake for the entire system at the full $6 billion, or pick and choose projects to cut costs.

The flood advisory documents, which will begin the process of creating final flood maps, could emerge within days, Mr. Powell said. It will take up to 18 months to complete the maps.

In the briefing, Mr. Powell said that rebuilding the city could take 25 years — a sentiment shared by many disaster recovery experts. He added, however, "It could be much shorter than that, depending on how they plan their future. I'm going to be doing everything I can to make this as short as possible."

Matt McBride, a member of the community group in Broadmoor, a New Orleans neighborhood that was inundated during Hurricane Katrina, said many city residents would be disappointed by the levee announcement. While many people in his neighborhood were committed to rebuilding, he said, "It's just one more headache on top of the hundreds that we're dealing with."

Officials Add $6 Billion To Price Tag Of Levees (LAT)

By Ralph Vartabedian

The Los Angeles Times, March 31, 2006

In what could be a significant setback to rebuilding New Orleans, federal officials said Thursday that it would cost an additional $6 billion to make the levee system strong enough that flood insurance could be issued in the area.

That amount would be in addition to the $3.5 billion already being spent to repair the levees damaged by Hurricane Katrina.

Without federally issued flood insurance, rebuilding could not proceed in many areas.

The new assessment was disclosed Thursday by Donald E. Powell, the federal coordinator for Gulf Coast rebuilding.

The problem evolved in recent weeks when disparate federal agencies began grappling with complex rules and regulations that affect federal flood insurance, the technology of predicting hurricanes and certifications of levee safety standards.

As a result, Powell found himself this week having to disclose to senior Bush administration officials and congressional leaders that what looked like a price tag of $3.5 billion to upgrade and repair levees in and around New Orleans had exploded almost threefold, to $9 billion.

"It is complicated, it is complex," Powell said in an interview.

The complication began as part of an effort by the Federal Emergency Management Agency to update 90,000 flood maps across the nation, which show where individuals and businesses can locate developments that would be unlikely to flood in 100 years and thereby qualify for the National Flood Insurance Program.

The flood maps that apply to New Orleans changed dramatically after Katrina, requiring a higher degree of protection from levees. Recent scientific research showed that the area had undergone a tremendous geologic subsidence, lowering the area's elevation. Climatic changes also might increase the risk of hurricanes.

As FEMA completed an early version of its flood maps, it went to the Army Corps of Engineers and asked it to certify that its levees would protect the city against the 100-year flood that FEMA had projected.

But in a surprise move, the corps said it could not certify that its levees would hold against a 100-year flood, and it refused to offer the certification.

If the corps cannot certify the levees under FEMA rules, then in terms of flood insurance it would be as if New Orleans had no levees at all, federal officials said. The corps estimated that it would cost as much as $6 billion to make upgrades that would allow for the certification.

Maj. Gen. Don T. Riley, the corps' chief for public works, said in an interview that certifications sought by FEMA would require "significantly higher" levees than the current 12- to 17-foot storm walls and earthen mounds that surround the city.

Even if the corps built such a system, it would not protect against another Katrina, which Riley estimated was a 150-year storm. Moreover, the demand by Louisiana officials for levees that could protect against a Category 5 hurricane, the worst possible storm, would require an even larger-scale system that is the subject of a $20 million study, Riley said.

One option would be to abandon certain sections of the region, such as Plaquemines and St. Bernard parishes or the Lower 9th Ward, which are driving a significant part of the costs. Central New Orleans would not require any significant additional spending, though the city's West Bank, its eastern flank and Jefferson Parish would require high spending to protect.

Under federal rules, local and state agencies must put up 35% of the cost of levee improvements. So far, the federal government has waived that requirement.

But as costs continue to mount, congressional leaders are becoming hesitant to do so.

Powell said in a news conference Thursday that he hoped rebuilding some sections of the city would take five years but that he could not rule out a reconstruction period of 25 years, noting Katrina was the greatest natural disaster in the nation's history.

New Orleans Recovery Could Take 25 Years (AP-Y2)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

AP2, March 30, 2006

A full recovery in New Orleans could take 25 years as homeowners, businesses and tourists are coaxed back to the city devastated by Hurricane Katrina, the Bush administration's Gulf Coast recovery coordinator said Thursday.

In an interview with The Associated Press, Don Powell said that much of the city's rebirth will hinge on factors he said were "out of our control," including restoring housing, ensuring safety and encouraging robust investment by the private sector.

"We kind of want it to happen overnight, or I do, but it's going to take some time," Powell said. "This could be five to 25 years for it all to fit into place."

Powell also said the Army Corps of Engineers now estimates it will cost an additional $5.9 billion to repair levees enough to fully protect and insure nearly 1.1 million residents of the greater New Orleans area.

That is in addition to the $3.5 billion the Bush administration has so far sought to bring the levees back to at least their pre-Katrina levels by June 1, the start of the 2006 hurricane season.

Powell said the Corps recently told him the administration must commit to spending as much as $5.9 billion more before it could fully certify the levees, as needed to issue flood maps that determine insurance rates and allow rebuilding to begin.

Powell said he does not know how many more federal dollars Washington will commit to the region, or whether some of the money will come from state and local governments. "We haven't decided what to ask for," Powell said.

But he said that decision and the release of new flood maps would likely happen in a "relatively short period of time — in a matter of days."

Over the next 60 days, Powell said, the Corps will be strengthening levees and building storm-proof pumping stations and flood gates to close certain parts of New Orleans' canals in the event of a major storm.

"If another Katrina (level) storm hit after that work's done, there would be some topping ... but the flooding would be all manageable," Powell said. "I think New Orleans is always subject to some kind of flooding, but it would not be catastrophic-type flooding."

In Baton Rouge, Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco called the nearly tripling of the estimated cost of levee repairs "an outrage." She demanded that Congress come up with the money. She said the $3.5 billion investment so far has focused primarily on rebuilding the flood protection on the east bank of New Orleans.

Without the additional cash, Blanco said, the Lower Ninth Ward and St. Bernard and Plaquemines parishes likely wouldn't receive the levee repairs needed to give them the protection they had before Katrina.

"Obviously all sections will not be secure," she said.

The White House so far has asked for $108 billion in Gulf Coast relief and recovery aid, all but $19 billion of which has been approved by Congress. The remainder is under consideration by lawmakers. The new levee costs are not included in that spending pot, Powell said.

In a conference call with reporters later, Army Corps of Engineers Maj. Gen. Don Riley said the new costs are the result of ongoing repairs and studies of the levees.

"As we learn, we will adjust our methodology and our estimate," Riley said. "To do it properly, it takes time. Our main interest is in getting this right for the people of New Orleans."

What the storm-ravaged region will look like in upcoming years is largely up to state and local officials, Powell said, though the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development will have authority to "tweak" some of the housing plans.

The four parishes that make up New Orleans and its immediate suburbs have been waiting for the Federal Emergency Management Agency to issue the flood maps for months.

The Christian Science Monitor, March 31, 2006

CAIRO AND BAGHDAD - Katie Carroll went from a deep sleep to instantly awake when she saw the Iraq country code on her caller ID.

She grabbed the phone. It was 5:45 a.m and the ringing heralded the news about her twin sister, Jill, who had been held hostage in Iraq for nearly three months. "Katie, it's me," said the voice on the other end of the line. "I'm free."

It was Jill herself, safe after 82 days.

"Then she burst into tears and I did, too," says Katie.

Journalist Jill Carroll was freed in Baghdad Thursday ending a period of captivity marked by an enormous global outpouring of support and calls for her release.

"I'm just really grateful. The overwhelming emotion is gratitude. I am glad this day has arrived and thank whatever forces, divine and otherwise, that helped bring about this day," says Jill.

On Jan. 7, Monitor freelancer Carroll traveled to interview Sunni Arab politician Adnan al-Dulaimi in Baghdad's western Adil neighborhood. He was not in his office, and, after waiting some 20 minutes, Carroll and her Iraqi driver and interpreter left.

After traveling about 300 yards, they were attacked by gunmen. Carroll was seized, and her interpreter, Allan Eniwya, was killed.

Thursday, Carroll's captors simply drove her to Amariyah, stopped the car, pointed her in the direction of the Iraqi Islamic Party (IPP) office at about 12:20 p.m. local time and then drove off.

Carroll, who was on assignment for the Monitor when she was kidnapped, gave a short interview to Baghdad TV, which is owned by the IIP, before being transported to the Green Zone by the US military. She was told the interview was for internal party uses only, and didn't realize it would be broadcast. In that interview Carrroll said that for most of her ordeal she was kept in a darkened room which she later described as a "cave."

"I really don't know where I was. The room had a window but the glass you know, you can't see," she said, making a motion with her hand as if the window was blocked, "and you couldn't hear any sound, and so I would sit in the room."

"If I had to take a shower I walked, you know, two feet, to the next door to take a shower or go to the bathroom and come back." From time to time, she says, she had contact with Iraqi women and children in the house which she found comforting.

She was only allowed to watch television and read a newspaper once and had little information about what was going on in the world at large.

"I was treated well, but I don't know why I was kidnapped," Carroll told the TV station about her kidnappers. In videotaped statements her captors had implied they would kill her if Iraqi prisoners held by coalition forces weren't released. But Carroll said, "They never hit me. They never even threatened to hit me."

Carroll says she asked an IIP official to call the Monitor's Baghdad hotel. He refused, and called the Washington Post's Baghdad office. Carroll is close personal friends with two of the Post's Iraqi staffers.

Her next call was to twin sister Katie. She then called her parents, Jim and Mary Beth.

The first thing she told me today was, 'I love you,'" says Mary Beth. "She said, 'Every single day I was in captivity, I cried over how worried you must be, and what a burden this must be for the family.' "

In fact, the day before release, Katie Carroll had appeared on the Arab TV station Al Arabiyah, where she had talked of the effect of the kidnapping on the family and pleaded for information that might lead to her sister's release.

"I was dreaming that this would be the way I'd find out - that she'd call me in the middle of the night like this," says Katie. "She sounded great. I just want to thank everyone who's prayed and given us support through this time, and we're obviously looking forward to some private time with Jill."

Monitor Editor Richard Bergenheim said Thursday: "This is an exciting day, we couldn't be happier. We are so pleased she'll be back with her family. The prayers of people all over the world have been answered."

President George Bush had said Carroll's release was a top priority for his administration, and her freedom was welcomed by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice at a press conference in Berlin. Ms. Rice spoke of the "great delight and great relief of the United States, the people of the United States and, I'm sure, the people of the world at the release today of Jill Carroll."

Carroll's release followed half a dozen false leads in the effort to free her - people who contacted the Monitor or the Carroll family. Some demanded exorbitant ransoms, but never managed to produce a "proof of life." One scam artist, calling himself a repentant member of the kidnapper group and seeking a payoff, turned out to be a young Nigerian and was arrested in Germany. Other would-be players said they had contacts and could free her, but never delivered.

Her support among Iraqis appeared to be quite strong. Several Iraqi newspapers and television stations took up her cause. They reported her story, editorialized for her freedom, and donated public-service announcements designed by the Monitor's Baghdad correspondents that pleaded for Carroll's release.

Even the mother of a young Iraqi woman detained for months by the government without charges and finally released in late January was willing to speak publicly on Carroll's behalf. Politicians across the Iraqi political spectrum, especially leaders from the Sunni sect also spoke out emotionally on Carroll's behalf.

Across the Muslim world, voices not normally heard on behalf of an American, called for Jill's release: Hamas in the Palestinian territories, the Muslim Brotherhood in Cairo, and many others.

Hope rose with the release of the remaining three Christian Peacekeepers hostages last week. But it had been nearly two months since Carroll's last video was dated, and many experts were privately beginning to express discouragement about her status. It had been quiet too long, and without a single confirmed attempt to negotiate.

For the Monitor's "Team Jill" - an informal group of editors and writers who worked on her case, each assigned separate tasks - it was a difficult time.

Monitor editor Bergenheim said no money had been exchanged for Carroll's release.

Following Carroll's arrival at the IIP office Thursday, the party's Secretary General Tariq al-Hashimi led a ceremony in which he handed the freed journalist gifts, and praised her release.

Mr. Hashimi is a rival for influence among Iraq's Sunni Arab minority of Adnan al-Dulaimi's, the politician Carroll had sought to interview on the morning of Jan. 7. Mr. Dulaimi has repeatedly denied involvement. Dulaimi has said that his political rivals - both Shiite and Sunni - were trying to hurt his political standing.

Leading IIP member Naser al-Ani said her appearance at their office, in a blue Islamic robe and wearing a light green headscarf identical to the one she wore in a Feb. 28 video issued by her captors, was completely unexpected. He said guards at the office "thought she was a party member - dressed Islamically like that, they thought she worked in [the Iraqi government's] Women's Affairs department."

Mr. Ani said she was dropped off near the office, in a Sunni stronghold in Western Baghdad. In a press conference, Hashimi said she bore a letter from her captors that she gave to the IIP guards.

A measure of the extent to which she was cut off from the outside world was that she didn't know if her driver had escaped on Jan. 7 during the abduction. News of his safety was a great relief to Carroll, her father Jim Carroll said.

"She knew about Alan, but did not know about [the driver]," Mr. Carroll says. "She started to break down when we were talking about it, so I didn't pursue that too much."

Shortly before her release, her kidnappers also warned Carroll about talking to the US or going to the Green Zone, alleging to her that it was "infiltrated by the Mujahideen" and that she might be killed if she cooperated with the Americans, her family says.

When the US military arrived at the IIP offices to escort her to the Green Zone, she was at first reluctant to go. But in a brief phone call the Monitor's staff writer Scott Peterson in Baghdad, he persuaded her that was the best and safest course of action.

Kidnappers in Iraq have tried to scare former hostages like this in the past. When Italian journalist Guiliana Sgrena was released by her captors in February last year, they told her there was a CIA threat to kill her, and that she should rush to the airport rather than go to the Green Zone. As her car sped down the airport road, at the time one of the most dangerous stretches of Iraq, the US military opened fire on the car, killing Nicola Calipari, the Italian intelligence agent who helped secure her release.

Italy's Corriere della Sera newspaper said the kidnappers had phoned the US military with an anonymous tip and the cars description, warning that it was a car-bomb.

Fully in character to all those who know her, Jill has repeatedly expressed concern for Allan and his family, and all the friends and family who've been worrying about her through her ordeal - particularly her parents and her sister.

'Like Falling Off A Cliff For 3 Months' (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

BAGHDAD, March 30 -- Jill Carroll wondered from day to day whether she would grow old or die a hostage.

"It was like falling off a cliff for three months, waiting to hit the ground," the 28-year-old American reporter said Thursday after being released by her kidnappers.

A shuffle from car to street to the branch office of a Sunni Arab political party and then to its headquarters brought Carroll to freedom on a beautiful spring day in Baghdad.

When she walked into the Iraqi Islamic Party's branch, she was still wearing one of the head scarves and enveloping embroidered dresses given to her by her captors. The black gloves of a conservative Muslim woman, also given to her by her captors, hid her hands.

Shortly after Carroll's arrival, the head of the party telephoned The Washington Post's Baghdad bureau. Carroll, a freelance journalist who wrote for the Christian Science Monitor, said she wanted to see familiar faces and had had many friends on The Post's staff since the early days of the war. Devoted to mastering Arabic and Middle Eastern culture and to covering Iraq, she was particularly close to the paper's young Iraqi interpreters and reporters.

In the party leader's chair-lined offices, with Sunni politicians looking on, Carroll and her friends were reunited. They embraced and cried through her first conversations in English in more than 80 days.

Then, with a cellphone borrowed from one of the politicians, Carroll woke up her twin sister, father and mother in the United States, punching in their numbers one after another.

Katie, Dad, Mom. It's Jill. I'm fine. I'm free.

She borrowed another cellphone when the first one lost power. She begged her family's forgiveness.

Three months without exercise had made her face round. Her captors had treated her well, she said, and she never dared turn down their offers of meals or candy for fear of giving offense. I'm fat, she said.

She asked for news of the world. She was shocked to hear of the prayers on her behalf, of the media coverage, of the vigils and balloon releases at the foot of the Eiffel Tower.

Kidnapped Jan. 7, three weeks after Iraq's national elections, she was shocked as well to hear that Iraq had still not formed a new government.

"You know that shelf?" she asked. She meant a mirror-backed knickknack cabinet in the entry of the Post house in Baghdad. For one reason or another, it had become a place to put photos of close friends killed over the nearly three years of war in Iraq.

The cabinet had three shelves. Two of the shelves already held a photo, both of them, coincidentally, of young women.

"I kept thinking about that shelf," Carroll said. "I didn't want to be that third shelf."

Post staffers had had the same thought. They removed the shelf and hid it the day after she was kidnapped.

One of Carroll's hardest days had been Wednesday, the day before her release, she said, when she broke down and cried hard, muffling the sound with her abaya in the room where she was being held. She prayed.

Coincidentally, her twin sister, Katie, appeared that same day on al-Arabiya television, saying it had been nearly two months since the last news or video of her sister. "I also hope that those with Jill have come to know her -- that they recognize what a wonderful person she is and realize that they can show the world that they are merciful to an innocent woman by returning her safely home to us," Katie Carroll said.

Hours later, Carroll's captors dropped her off in a Baghdad neighborhood, outside an office of the Iraqi Islamic Party. The politicians inside gave her juice, candy, water and tissues.

Composed, Carroll negotiated her way through the first of many politically laden conversations she would have Thursday, trying to stick to what she wanted and didn't want to say.

The party officials asked her to write out and sign a statement saying she had not been harmed in her brief time at their offices. They had her record a question-and-answer session on camera that they said was for their records. It showed up on television shortly afterward.

Party leader Tariq al-Hashimi presented her with an embossed Koran in a plush box. The Koran was for the true followers of Islam, Hashimi said, and he mentioned the Iraqi people. Accepting it, Carroll said her suffering was nothing compared with theirs.

'Good Day' In Iraq For Freed U.S. Journalist (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 31, 2006

BAGHDAD — The quaking woman in the abaya had tears in her eyes and spoke English — the first sign to a startled receptionist that this visitor was different from the usual grieving widow or mother so common in this violent country.

When she finally managed to explain, in broken Arabic, that she was Jill Carroll, it was not sympathy but a rare outburst of joy she sparked.

The idealistic American freelance correspondent for the Christian Science Monitor, kidnapped by gunmen nearly three months ago, had been released unharmed Thursday, a splash of good news during one of post-invasion Iraq's bleakest stretches.

DOJ_NMG_0024690

"I was treated very well," said Carroll, 28, smiling and seemingly in good health and spirits, in an interview broadcast on the television channel of the Iraqi Islamic Party, the country's main Sunni Arab political organization.

"They never hit me," she said, wearing a gray and beige head scarf and a light blue gown. "They never even threatened to hit me. I'm just happy to be free and want to be with my family."

Carroll's abduction and her disturbing videotaped messages, released by her abductors to Arabic-language satellite channels, had been emblematic of Iraq's continuing lawlessness and violence.

Carroll was held for 82 days by the little-known kidnappers, who demanded that Iraqi and U.S. officials free all female prisoners as a precondition for her release. In the last footage of her, aired Feb. 9 on a Kuwaiti station, Carroll urged negotiators to quickly meet the kidnappers' demands. The Monitor said Carroll's family and the paper pursued half a dozen false leads during the ordeal.

Kidnappings, sometimes for ransom and other times as acts of political terrorism, have become a daily hazard in Iraq. Thousands of Iraqis and hundreds of foreign civilians have been seized, their bodies occasionally showing up in sewage ditches days later.

The perpetrators are shadowy groups suspected of having ties to official security organs as well as the Sunni Arab-led insurgency. This month, Tom Fox, an American activist kidnapped in November, was found dead in Baghdad. His three British and Canadian colleagues who were also abducted were later rescued by British-led forces.

Carroll said she was treated well by her captors, who killed her interpreter, Allan Enwiyah, 32, during the Jan. 7 abduction, which occurred as she left the office of a Sunni politician in Baghdad.

In the interview on the Iraqi Islamic Party's Baghdad TV channel, Carroll said she was given good food, kept in a room with a shower and was allowed to read a newspaper and watch television once, and did not know where in Iraq she was being held.

Her freedom came as a surprise, she said.

"They just came to me and said, 'We're going,' " she said on television. "They didn't tell me what was going on."

The kidnappers apparently drove Carroll to western Baghdad shortly after noon and dropped her off, pointing her to a branch office of the Iraqi Islamic Party in Amiriya, a volatile district known as a haven for insurgents.

They warned her not to talk with Americans or go to the Green Zone because it was infiltrated by insurgents, adding she might be killed if she cooperated with Americans, according to an account on the Monitor's website.

Wearing an all-covering traditional robe, Carroll walked up to the receptionist and handed over a note explaining who she was, party officials said.

Weeping and trembling, the Michigan native asked for help in broken Arabic.

"She looked to me as if she was happy but afraid at the same time," said one party official in Amiriya, who asked that his name not be published. "All that I understood from her was that she wanted to go to her family."

Party officials summoned a convoy of guards and armored vehicles to take her to the party's central Baghdad headquarters, where she calmed down, contacted her family and friends abroad and in Baghdad.

Carroll then took part in the Baghdad TV interview before she was handed over to U.S. forces.

Reporters for the Washington Post, for whom Carroll freelanced early in the war, showed up at the party office, where they wept and hugged. Carroll borrowed a cellphone from a Sunni politician, waking up her twin sister, Katie, her father and her mother, one after the other, the Post reported. "It's Jill," she said. "I'm fine, and I'm free."

According to the Post's account, Carroll received only sporadic news from the outside world during her captivity. She was shocked by the heavy news coverage of her kidnapping and the publicity surrounding her case, including the display of a poster of her from Rome's city hall.

She said she was surprised that Iraqi politicians elected to office three weeks before her capture had yet to form a government.

Carroll was told that the Baghdad TV interview she did was for internal party uses only and didn't know it would be broadcast, the Monitor reported. Iraqi Islamic Party officials could be seen handing gifts to a smiling Carroll in the television footage.

Mindful of her kidnappers' warnings, she agreed to go to the U.S.-protected Green Zone only after another Monitor reporter convinced her that it was the best option, the newspaper said.

She began to cry when the subject of her slain interpreter was raised, the Monitor said.

By Thursday evening, Carroll was inside the Green Zone, Baghdad's administrative headquarters, getting unspecified medical attention as she waited to leave the country.

"This is a good day," U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, who met with Carroll after her release, told reporters. "She is safe, she is free and she appears in good health and great spirits."

DOJ_NMG_0024691

Carroll's abduction, by a group calling itself the Revenge Brigades, proved a lingering embarrassment for Sunni politicians negotiating with more powerful Shiite rivals for positions of power in the government talks.

In the U.S., family members and employers expressed relief at Carroll's release. Her father, Jim, told the Associated Press that he was "thrilled and relieved."

"Our hearts are full," said a statement by Carroll's family posted on the website of the Christian Science Monitor. "We are elated by Jill's safe release."

Asked about the news while at a conference in Cancun, Mexico, President Bush told reporters, "I'm really grateful she was released and thank those who worked hard for her release, and we're glad she's alive."

"This is something that people across the world have worked for and prayed for," she said during a visit to Berlin.

Meanwhile, Iraq's violence, often overlaid with sectarian tensions between the country's majority Shiite Muslims and minority Sunni Arabs, continued.

At a media briefing Thursday, U.S. Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch told reporters that the average number of Iraqi casualties in the weeks since Feb. 11 had risen to 75 dead and wounded a day, higher than at any point over the last two years.

The military reported the death of a U.S. soldier in Fallouja of injuries sustained in combat Tuesday.

Several midmorning explosions rattled the capital. A car bomb targeting the convoy of a police commando leader with the Shiite-led Interior Ministry injured five of his guards. Another car bomb in front of a restaurant in northeastern Baghdad left one person dead and nine injured.

Roadside bombs targeting Iraqi police convoys and U.S. forces killed at least one and injured nine. In Baghdad's Shiite Sadr City neighborhood, gunmen kidnapped four police officers from their car.

At least half a dozen mortar rounds struck different parts of the city, killing at least three civilians and injuring six.

Gunmen assassinated a well-known soccer player as he practiced. Manar Mudhafar Abdul Jabbar was a member of the Zawra club, among Iraq's most famous teams.

Salam Jabar, a member of the Islamic Dawa Party of Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari, was assassinated in the Jamiya neighborhood in northern Baghdad.

Jabar was also a prominent businessman, and his killing may be linked to a series of attacks on Iraqi merchants and businesses.

Police said gunmen targeted at least three bakeries in troubled sections of Baghdad, killing at least five bakers and injuring at least three. Most of the victims were Shiites, police said.

Gunmen opened fire on a group of Iraqis lining up for their monthly food rations in Dora, injuring four civilians. The district of southern Baghdad is a target of frequent sectarian attacks.

Qais Abdul Kareem, a high-level Ministry of Industry official kidnapped Wednesday evening, was found dead in the middle-class Zayona district.

The body of Abdul Qader Hussein, a shopkeeper in the mixed Sunni-Shiite Sadiya neighborhood, was found with signs of torture.

The bodies of two unidentified men, both handcuffed and bearing signs of torture, were found in western Baghdad.

A roadside bomb in the city of Kirkuk, claimed by Iraq's Kurds, Arabs and Turkmen minority, killed one police officer and injured four.

Times staff writers John Johnson Jr. and Raheem Salman and special correspondent Asmaa Waguih contributed to this report.

Reporter Freed In Iraq, 3 Months After Abduction (NYT)

By Kirk Semple And Dexter Filkins

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, March 30 — Jill Carroll, the American reporter kidnapped in Baghdad nearly three months ago, was freed Thursday, saying she had spent most of her time in a small room but had been well treated by her captors.

Ms. Carroll, 28, was dropped off in a Sunni neighborhood in western Baghdad at midday and walked into the nearby offices of the Iraqi Islamic Party, a Sunni political group, dressed in a light-green head scarf and gray dress. From there, she was taken to the Green Zone, the heavily fortified area in central Baghdad, where the American ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad, said she was in "good health and good spirits."

"I was treated very well; it's important people know that," Ms. Carroll said in an interview with an Iraqi, conducted in the Sunni party's offices and shown on television later in the day. "They never threatened me in any way."

"All I can say right now is I am very happy," said Ms. Carroll, who in an earlier video praised her captors and the insurgents fighting the Americans. "I am happy to be free and I want to be with my family."

Ms. Carroll, a freelance reporter, was kidnapped at gunpoint on Jan. 7 as she left the offices of a prominent Sunni politician. Her kidnappers had threatened to kill her. In videotapes released during her captivity, Ms. Carroll wept and pleaded for her freedom. In the interview shown Thursday, she said she was never told why she was being held. The kidnappers shot to death Ms. Carroll's Iraqi interpreter as the abduction unfolded. "They didn't tell me what was going on," she said.

The shadowy and little-known group that released Ms. Carroll said it had freed her because the American government had agreed to some of its conditions. The group, called the Revenge Brigade, had demanded that the United States release all Iraqi women from its prisons. In late January, the American command announced that it had freed five Iraqi female detainees, but said that the release had nothing to do with the kidnappers' demands.

In a news conference here, Mr. Khalilzad said no American officials in Iraq "entered into any arrangements with anyone" to secure Ms. Carroll's release. Four other Iraqi women were still being held in American detention centers, American officials said. Editors at The Christian Science Monitor, the newspaper that was employing Ms. Carroll at the time of her abduction, also said they had conducted no negotiations with her kidnappers.

Ms. Carroll, who grew up in Michigan and graduated from the University of Massachusetts, was part of a small corps of intrepid young freelance reporters in Baghdad. She had learned more Arabic than many and had cultivated a keen interest in Iraqi society.

In a videotape posted Thursday on the Internet, made before her release, Ms. Carroll denounced the American presence in Iraq and praised the insurgents fighting here. In the video, Ms. Carroll smiled, laughed once and gestured in a seemingly relaxed manner, saying she felt guilty about being released while so many Iraqis were still suffering.

Ms. Carroll, apparently knowing she would be released, denounced what she described as the "lies" told by the American government and predicted that the insurgents would defeat the Americans in Iraq. "I feel guilty. I also feel that it just shows that the mujahedeen are good people fighting an honorable fight, a good fight. While the Americans are here, the occupying forces, you know, treating the people in a very, very bad way. So I can't be happy totally for my freedom because there are people still suffering in prisons, in very difficult situations."

Ms. Carroll was seated in front of a white background, where she answered questions put to her in accented English by a man standing offscreen. The video was distributed by SITE, a Washington, D.C.-based group that tracks jihadist Web sites.

These kind words for her captors were a sharp contrast to her demeanor on the videotapes made shortly after her kidnapping, in which she appeared distraught, weeping and terrified. Ms. Carroll's seeming sympathy for her captors suggested either that she was pretending in hopes of gaining her release or that, after suffering weeks of extreme duress, she had fallen under the sway of her kidnappers.

The light-green head scarf that Ms. Carroll was wearing at the time of her release, and the head scarf she wore in most of the videos shown during her captivity, is the typical dress for Iraqi women. Ms. Carroll was wearing one at the time of her abduction, in large part to conceal her identity as an American reporter on Baghdad's chaotic streets.

Dr. Alan Manevitz, a psychiatrist and trauma expert at New York Presbyterian Hospital, said it would not be surprising if she suffered from a degree of Stockholm syndrome, a condition in which hostages become sympathetic to their captors. The name comes from a bank robbery in Sweden in 1973 in which hostages were held in a vault for six days.

"It's a form of brainwashing in a deprived state where victims emotionally bond with the captors in order to survive," Dr. Manevitz said. He stressed that he did not know Ms. Carroll and could speak about the syndrome only in general terms. "People can feel helpless and hopeless, and any small act of kindness — not killing her, giving her food, letting her have a shower — can lead to bonding with the captor." The captor, he said, becomes both tormentor and savior.

Ms. Carroll's whereabouts had been unknown since her abduction, carried out by armed men who cut off her car down the street from the offices of Adnan Dulaimi, the Sunni politician. Ms. Carroll, an accomplished swimmer, broke free of her kidnappers and was chased down the street, according to witnesses. Her interpreter, Allan Enwiyah, 32, was shot dead as he tried to make a call on his cellphone, while her driver managed to run away.

Dozens of people are kidnapped on Baghdad's streets every day — most of them for ransom — and they are often sold while in captivity from one group to another. Though she made no mention of being traded from one group to another, it was unclear on Thursday whether Ms. Carroll had been released by the same men who had captured her. The motives of the group were unknown as well; some officials speculated that the kidnappers had originally grabbed Ms. Carroll in the hope of securing a ransom and began to demand the release of the Iraqi women after it seemed less probable to them that they would get money.

In the weeks after her kidnapping, Ms. Carroll's captors released three videotapes, which showed her in increasing distress. The kidnappers' deadline passed, and there was no further word of her. On Feb. 28, Iraq's interior minister told ABC News that Ms. Carroll was still alive, that he knew who had kidnapped her and that he believed she would be released soon.

In the United States, Ms. Carroll's family reacted joyously to word of her release, as did the editors of The Christian Science Monitor. "My cousin, Mary Beth Carroll — Jill's mother — and all of our family are delighted, thrilled and ecstatic that Jill has been released," Peter Alonzi said in a statement he read outside her home in Evanston, Ill. "My wish is that this joyous occasion will offer hope to all the mothers of Iraq whose children have been kidnapped. May they all be returned safely and swiftly to their mothers' arms.' "

Tariq al-Hashemi, the general secretary of the Iraqi Islamic Party, said at a news conference that Ms. Carroll walked into the office and handed officials a paper written in Arabic asking that the party help her.

Alaa Makki, another leader in the party, said Ms. Carroll seemed wary about talking about her captors.

"We asked her, 'Why did you come to the I.I.P.? Why did you choose the I.I.P.?' " he recalled. "She said, 'I really don't know.' "

He went on: "She said, 'I promised the kidnappers not to speak.' She was a little bit frightened. She was very careful. She didn't give much information."

In the interview shown on television on Thursday, Ms. Carroll said she had been almost entirely cut off from the outside world. She did not know where she had been held, and said her room had a window but that it was obscured. She was well fed and was permitted to take showers and go to the bathroom whenever she wanted. She was able to watch television and see a newspaper only once.

"I didn't really know what was going on in the outside world," she said.

Her release, she said, was as mysterious as her capture. "I don't know what happened," she said. "They just came to me and said, 'O.K., we're letting you go now.' "

Ms. Carroll is the only American woman to have been kidnapped in Iraq and, according to her family, was motivated by a desire to publicize the hardships facing the Iraqi people. Her story of pluck and empathy seemed to capture the public's imagination.

In addition, her plight struck close to home for many of the journalists here in Baghdad who covered it and for whom kidnapping has become one of the foremost threats.

Ms. Carroll traveled to the Middle East in 2002 with a dream of covering a war. In the American Journalism Review last year, she wrote that she moved to Jordan six months before the start of the war "to learn as much about the region as possible before the fighting began." She worked for a newspaper in Amman and took Arabic lessons.

Once in Baghdad, she began working for a number of publications, including The Christian Science Monitor. As conditions worsened for American and other Western reporters working in Iraq — and major news organizations began investing heavily in armed guards and armored cars — Ms. Carroll continued mostly on a shoestring budget. At the time of her kidnapping, she was traveling in an ordinary car, unprotected by guards.

By the time of her abduction, Ms. Carroll was a well-known face at the Hamra Hotel, the home of many Western reporters. She had grown close to Marla Ruzicka, an American aid worker, and when Ms. Ruzicka was killed in a suicide bombing in 2005, Ms. Carroll organized a memorial service for her at the Hamra.

In lighter moments, Ms. Carroll often got water polo matches going in the hotel's pool, where she usually emerged as the fiercest competitor.

Journalist Jill Carroll Freed By Her Captors In Baghdad (WP)

By Jonathan Finer

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

BAGHDAD, March 30 -- American journalist Jill Carroll, abducted at gunpoint in January, was released Thursday after nearly three months of intensive efforts to free her and public pleas on her behalf from a worldwide chorus of relatives, politicians and religious leaders.

"I was treated very well. That's important people know that," Carroll said in an interview broadcast on the TV station run by the Iraqi Islamic Party, a Sunni Arab organization. "They never said they would hit me, never threatened me in any way. I was just happy to be free, and I want be with my family."

Carroll, 28, a freelance writer who had been working for the Christian Science Monitor, was delivered Thursday morning to a party office in the west Baghdad neighborhood of Amiriyah. She had been kidnapped in Baghdad on Jan. 7 when gunmen ambushed her car, killing her Iraqi interpreter, Allan Enwiyah, 32. Her driver escaped unharmed.

A statement from Carroll's family, posted on the Monitor's Web site Thursday, said: "Our hearts are full. We are elated by Jill's safe release." It also offered prayers for those still held hostage in Iraq.

President Bush, whose spokesman had called Carroll's safe return an administration priority, said in Cancun, Mexico, "I'm really grateful she was released and thank those who worked hard for her release, and we're glad she's alive."

Carroll's release came one week after three members of the Chicago-based advocacy group Christian Peacemaker Teams, taken hostage in November, were rescued by American and British soldiers. Another group member who had been abducted with them, Tom Fox of Clear Brook, Va., was found shot to death March 9.

More than 425 foreigners, and several times that many Iraqis, have been taken hostage since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, according to U.S. officials who track abductions. The number of Western journalists, contractors and aid workers kidnapped in Iraq has surged since late last year after a lull of several months.

Throughout Carroll's 82-day ordeal, her parents and twin sister, Katie, and supporters throughout the United States, Europe and the Middle East campaigned for her release by appearing on English- and Arabic-language television networks and placing advertisements in Iraqi and regional media.

The blitz, which included a large rally in the streets of Paris and a giant photo of her face hung on City Hall in Rome, stressed that Carroll, an Arabic speaker who had lived in the Middle East for more than three years, appreciated and admired Iraqi culture and had traveled to the war-torn country to report on the plight of its people.

In an article she wrote last year for the American Journalism Review, Carroll said she had moved to Jordan months before the U.S. invasion of Iraq "to learn as much about the region as possible before the fighting began."

In a late-morning interview with reporters in his yard in Chapel Hill, N.C., broadcast by CNN, Jim Carroll said he had spoken with his daughter at 6 a.m. and learned that she was in "good health" and "mentally strong."

"It was a fantastic conversation," he said. "It's been a long haul."

Just after noon Thursday, Tariq al-Hashimi, secretary general of the Iraqi Islamic Party, called The Washington Post's Baghdad bureau to say that Carroll had been released by "unknown people."

"I have sent armored cars to bring her to the [party] headquarters," he said. "She requested me to talk to you and inform you directly and will be here within half an hour. Will you come here? She is okay. She is safe. She is more or less scared. I told her to calm down and we would take care of her."

Upon her arrival at party headquarters about 1 p.m., party officials asked Carroll, clad in a gray-and-blue scarf and traditional robe, to sit for an interview that they said would be solely for their records.

The interview was broadcast about two hours later on Baghdad TV, the party's satellite station. Carroll said she did not know where she had been held captive nor why her kidnappers decided to release her.

"I don't know what happened," she said in the interview, which was rebroadcast around the world. "They just came to me and said, 'Okay, we're letting you go now.' "

She declined to describe her captivity in detail but said she had been fed well and had access to showers. She said that she rarely received news from the outside world and that the lack of freedom and the uncertainty were hard to bear.

"It was difficult, because I didn't -- I didn't know what would happen to me," she said.

After leaving the party office, Carroll met with U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, who in a news conference Thursday afternoon thanked the Iraqi Islamic Party and all Iraqi politicians who had lobbied for her release. The United States did not make any agreement with Carroll's captors or pay any ransom, he said.

In a statement on its Web site, the Monitor said neither the paper nor Carroll's family had negotiated her release or paid a ransom.

"Furthermore, we have no information that would lead us to believe that any other party negotiated Jill's release or paid a ransom," the statement said.

David Cook, the Washington bureau chief for the Monitor, said he learned of Carroll's release when Jim Carroll called his cellphone at 6:10 a.m.

"Frankly, when I saw it, I thought, 'Oh, some reporter must be bothering Jim.' Because I'm the one who's supposed to chase the reporters away," Cook said later. "And then he told me what was happening, and it was wonderful. It was just stunning."

The identity of Carroll's captors was never fully clear. She appeared in three videos delivered to satellite television networks in the region. In one that aired in January, a little-known group calling itself the Vengeance Brigades threatened to kill Carroll within 72 hours unless all female prisoners held by U.S. forces in Iraq were released. Later that month, five female detainees were freed, a move U.S. military officials said was the result of a standard review of their cases.

Carroll was last seen Feb. 9, telling supporters in footage first broadcast on a Kuwaiti television station that time to win her release was running out. Her captors imposed a Feb. 26 deadline for their demands to be met.

In a final video released Thursday, Carroll was shown speaking positively about her captivity and the mujaheddin, Arabic for holy warriors, who she said were holding her.

From Iraq, A Happy Ending (USAT)

USA Today, March 31, 2006

Jill Carroll, an American reporter snatched in a bloody kidnapping on a Baghdad street and held hostage for three months, was released unharmed Thursday — a rare bit of good news from Iraq.

At a time when Bush administration officials are blaming the news media for the erosion of public support for U.S. involvement in Iraq, Carroll's story is a reminder of the extraordinary dangers facing reporters trying to get the story there.

Carroll, 28, is a freelance journalist on assignment for The Christian Science Monitor magazine and who also wrote for other news outlets, including USA TODAY. She was on her way to an appointment with an important Iraqi political figure Jan. 7 when her car was ambushed, her driver attacked and her translator killed.

Carroll didn't parachute unprepared into this complex and troubling story. To better relate to Iraqis, she learned Arabic and in public wore the traditional veiled dress favored by Iraqi women. She is known to colleagues and friends for her sympathy for the Iraqi people and determination to present a balanced picture of life in that troubled land.

But Iraq has become a killing field for journalists. At least 86 journalists and support staff, many of them Iraqis, have been killed there in the past three years; 69 journalists died in all of World War II. ABC News anchor Bob Woodruff is still recovering from serious injuries in a bomb blast while he was reporting there in January.

The deadly threats include kidnapping, a thriving industry in the chaos of the post-Saddam era. Hundreds of foreigners have been taken hostage and at least 55 executed by their captors since 2003.

The targets include not only journalists but also peace advocates, relief workers and others trying to help rebuild Iraq — all victims of the country's irrational killers. Carroll's ordeal is a measure of the cost of such commitment.

“All I ever wanted to be was a foreign correspondent,” Jill Carroll wrote from Baghdad last year in a magazine article that described the risks of working there. Readers of this and other publications have been served well by her courage.

U.S. Reporter Carroll Set Free In Baghdad (WT/AP)

By Mariam Fam, Associated Press

The Washington Times, March 31, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Wearing a green Islamic head scarf, American reporter Jill Carroll walked into an Iraqi political party office yesterday, set free nearly three months after being kidnapped in a bloody ambush that killed her translator.

"I was treated well, but I don't know why I was kidnapped," Miss Carroll said on Baghdad television only weeks after she appeared weeping in a video put out by kidnappers who had threatened to kill her.

Her family thanked "the generous people around the world who worked officially or unofficially" to gain her freedom. Her father, Jim, said he was asleep in his North Carolina home when the phone rang about 6 a.m.

"Hi, Dad. This is Jill. I'm released," the voice on the other end said, he told CNN.

No details were given about the circumstances surrounding her release. The U.S. ambassador said there was no ransom paid by the American Embassy, but his remarks left open the question of whether "arrangements" were made by others.

In Washington, a Pentagon spokesman said the U.S. military was not involved in Miss Carroll's release.

President Bush said, "I'm just really grateful she's released, and I want to thank those who worked hard to release her and we're glad she's alive."

Miss Carroll, 28, was kidnapped Jan. 7 in Baghdad's western Adil neighborhood while going to interview Sunni Arab politician Adnan al-Dulaimi for the Christian Science Monitor. Her translator was killed in the attack about 300 yards from Mr. al-Dulaimi's office.

The previously unknown Revenge Brigades took responsibility. The group threatened twice in videotapes to kill Miss Carroll.

"They never hit me. They never even threatened to hit me," she said yesterday, wearing a gray Arabic robe.

"I'm just happy to be free. I want to be with my family."

Miss Carroll said she was kept in a furnished room with a window and a shower, but she did not know where she was.

"I felt I was not free. It was difficult because I didn't know what would happen to me," she said.

She said she was allowed to watch TV once and read a newspaper once.

Asked about the circumstances of her release, she said, "I don't know what happened. They just came to me early this morning and said, 'OK, we are letting you go now.' "

Police Lt. Col. Falah al-Mohammedawi said Miss Carroll was released near an office of the Iraqi Islamic Party, the main Sunni political organization, in western Baghdad. The party released a statement that Miss Carroll walked in at 12:15 p.m. carrying a letter written in Arabic asking the party to help her.

Miss Carroll then was transferred to party headquarters, given gifts that included a Koran and was met by fellow journalists and American officials before leaving about 2:30 p.m., according to the statement.

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad met with Miss Carroll and said she was in good spirits and anxious to go home. The Italian news agency ANSA said Miss Carroll underwent a medical checkup at the American hospital in the Green Zone.

Mr. Khalilzad also said no kidnappers were "yet" in custody, and no one in the U.S. mission was involved in paying a ransom.

However, German authorities have arrested a man, the FBI said yesterday, who is accused of trying to extort $2 million from the Monitor newspaper by promising to win Miss Carroll's release.

"No U.S. person entered into any arrangements with anyone. By 'U.S. person' I mean the United States mission," Mr. Khalilzad said.

The Christian Science Monitor said it was not aware of any negotiations involving money for Miss Carroll's release.

"We're not shading. We're not hiding. We're just saying what we know. And to our knowledge, no one was paid by anyone," said David Cook, the Monitor's Washington bureau chief.

Miss Carroll's family said it would focus on helping her recover. Jim Carroll told the AP at his house in Chapel Hill, N.C., he was waiting to learn more about his daughter's plans before making travel arrangements.

In a statement issued by the Monitor, the family said, "Our hearts are full. ... We would like to thank all of the generous people around the world who worked officially or unofficially -- especially those who took personal risk -- to gain Jill's release."

During Miss Carroll's months in captivity, she had appeared in three videos broadcast on Arab television, pleading for her life.

Her captors had demanded the release of all female detainees in Iraq by Feb. 26 and said Miss Carroll would be killed if that did not happen. The date came and went with no word about her fate.

American Journalist Jill Carroll Freed After Nearly 3 Months (KRT)

By Nancy A. Youssef And Shatha Al Awsy

Knight Ridder, March 30, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - Jill Carroll's nearly three months of captivity ended around 12:20 p.m. Thursday when she walked into an Iraqi Islamic Party office in western Baghdad and handed the front-desk clerk a note asking for help.

The kidnapped American journalist, a freelancer for the Christian Science Monitor, had been snatched just a few miles away on Jan. 7 while leaving a Sunni politician's office. Her whereabouts had been unknown until a car dropped her off in front of the party's office, guards at the building said. She appeared healthy.

In an interview broadcast on Baghdad television, Carroll said she was treated well during her 82 days of captivity. Still wearing a hijab, which covered her hair, Carroll said she was fed well and allowed to go to the bathroom by herself. She emphasized that she was never threatened. She said she occasionally heard news, but she didn't know what led to her release, including whether a ransom had been paid.

"You would have to ask the mujahadeen (religious fighters) that," she said. "They came to me and said, `OK, we are letting you go now.'"

On the Christian Science Monitor Web site, Editor Richard Bergenheim said no ransom had been paid. In three tapes released to Iraqi media during her captivity, a group called the Vengeance Brigade said it was holding Carroll.

In the last tape, the kidnappers threatened to kill Carroll unless all female prisoners in Iraq were released by Feb. 26. U.S. officials freed five of the nine prisoners around that time, but they said that their release was unrelated to the demand. The deadline passed with no word of Carroll, but Minister of Interior Bayan Jabr said two days later that he believed she was alive.

Carroll's arrival at the Iraqi Islamic Party on Thursday initially caused confusion. The note, written in Arabic, said that she was a hostage and asked officials there to deliver her to her country, said employees at the Iraqi Islamic Party office.

However, the employees said Carroll looked like an Iraqi, perhaps an employee of the party's women's section. She was wearing an Islamic gown, and her hair was veiled. She also wore a khamar, a piece of cloth that covered most of her face. Only her red spectacles were visible.

The front-desk clerk went to the office manager and said a woman wanted to talk to him. "I'm too busy," the office manager, who wanted to be referred to only by the nickname Abu Hassan, replied. He got up only at the clerk's insistence.

After he read the note, Abu Hassan said, Carroll took off the khamar, revealing her face.

Workers at the office said they didn't know what to do next. No one spoke English, so Carroll tried to communicate in broken Arabic, telling the staff that she was a hostage. But Hassan said he was nervous, given the security situation, and feared that she could be untrustworthy. He called the party's general secretary, Tariq al-Hashimi, who spoke English, and asked him to talk to Carroll. Hashimi said he assured Carroll that she was safe and sent a convoy of cars and guards to pick her up and take her to party headquarters.

"She was very nervous. And she was very scared of everybody around her. She just wanted to go home," Hassan said.

On average, about 35 Iraqis are kidnapped every day. More than 400 foreigners have been snatched since April 2003. Carroll's kidnapping captured international attention as her newspaper colleagues, friends and family frequently appealed to her captors, telling them about her reverence for Iraqis and her commitment to telling their stories.

While at Hashimi's office, Carroll called her father. Jim Carroll, in an interview outside his North Carolina home, said he received the call around 6 a.m. (or 2 p.m. Baghdad time).

She said: "Hi, Dad. This is Jill. I'm released."

Courage In Coverage (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

Yesterday's release of American journalist Jill Carroll makes this a good moment to celebrate the work that reporters are doing every day in Iraq. They are taking huge personal risks to bring back the news -- not "good news," as some supporters of the administration often seem to want, but the news.

Anyone taking potshots at the "mainstream media" should read the description of what it's like to cover Baghdad that appears in the April/May issue of the American Journalism Review. The story opens with a description of NPR's Deborah Amos, dressed in Arab clothes, anxiously scanning the street for bombers and kidnappers as she heads for an interview in the protected Green Zone. And that's an easy assignment.

Like most resident correspondents, National Public Radio reporters such as Amos live and work in the "Red Zone" -- meaning the real Iraq. These reporters are in daily contact, through their Iraqi staffs, with the nightmare the Iraqi people are experiencing. When their reporting contrasts with the more upbeat accounts coming out of the Green Zone, the reporters in the Red Zone generally have been right, for a simple reason: They are closer to the story.

Jeffrey Gettleman of the New York Times showed what you learn out in the Red Zone in stories Sunday about the spread of gruesome revenge killings: "By conservative counts, nearly 200 civilian men have been executed in the past two weeks and dumped on Baghdad's streets. Many have been hogtied. Some have had acid splashed on their faces. Others have been found without toes, fingers, eyes." Gettleman, who had been away from Iraq for more than a year, wrote that something fundamental had changed: The violence had "turned inward" into sectarian warfare.

A strong warning about the rise in sectarian violence came from my Post colleague Ellen Knickmeyer. She reported in February, after a revered Shiite mosque in Samarra was destroyed, that Shiite militiamen were brutally killing Sunnis. Her sources said Iraqi and international officials tallied more than a thousand bodies. Her reports were criticized by U.S. officials in the Green Zone, who said the number was far smaller. The dispute obscured the deeper truth that Knickmeyer was reporting: the sharp increase in brutal killings by Shiite death squads. Fortunately that point wasn't lost on U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, who has warned in recent days that America will not support an Iraqi government that doesn't crack down on the Shiite militias.

Western journalists in Baghdad depend increasingly on our Iraqi colleagues, who are some of the bravest reporters in the world. Several of the best Iraqi journalists have created their own blogs. In one, 24 Steps to Liberty, an Iraqi reporter described the living hell of Baghdad's al-Rabie Street on Sunday: "Driving in this street after six p.m. makes every thought of killing, kidnapping, insurgents, and everything bad . . . become present in your mind. That is what the Iraqis see every night."

Another brave Iraqi reporter, whose blog is Treasure of Baghdad, recounted this week a terrifying experience at his home when people opened fire nearby. "I first thought these were the 'men in black' breaking into the houses of my Sunni neighbors trying to kill them, then I thought these might be Sunni insurgent[s] trying to break into the houses of the few Shiite families that live in the same street." His father cocked his rifle to defend the family, but the gunmen went away.

American journalists report the successes of U.S. policy, and there have been some lately, at a level above the mean streets of Baghdad. Iraqi political leaders have been meeting to try to form a national unity government, and the Iraqi army is showing signs of becoming a better fighting force. But there are also some horrific stories: Time magazine published a disturbing account in its March 27 issue about how U.S. Marines are believed to have killed 15 Iraqi civilians in their homes in Haditha last November after a roadside bomb attack. This may prove a shocking tale when more details emerge about what happened, but it's a story that journalists must report.

Supporters of the Bush administration sometimes argue that journalists should report more good news. Certainly we need to tell the stories of the thousands of brave and decent Americans and Iraqis who are trying every day to make the country better. And if an Iraqi unity government can take hold and restore stability, there will be a stampede of reporters to cover this success. But a reporter's job is to tell the truth, even when it hurts. Americans should be grateful that reporters such as Jill Carroll are risking their lives to chronicle this agonizing story -- and tell Americans not what they want to hear, but what they need to know.

Parents Maintain Vigil For Lone Soldier Missing In Iraq (USAT)

By Emily Bazar

USA Today, March 31, 2006

BATAVIA, Ohio — Carolyn Maupin speaks to her son only in her prayers. She implores him to stay strong. She begs him to keep faith.

And four times during the past two years, she says, she has heard him answer.

"He'll say, 'I'm OK, Mom. I'm OK,' " Maupin says of her son, Sgt. Keith "Matt" Maupin, who disappeared almost two years ago when his convoy was attacked in Iraq. "One time he said, 'I'll be home, Mom. I'll be home.' "

Maupin, 22, holds a unique and tragic place in the war in Iraq. He is the only American soldier who remains missing since the war began three years ago.

On April 9, Carolyn Maupin and Keith Maupin, Matt's father, will mark the second anniversary of his disappearance.

On the day he vanished — April 9, 2004 — Maupin escorted a convoy of fuel trucks headed for Baghdad's airport. Along the way, insurgents attacked. They lobbed grenades at the trucks, some of which burst into flames. Mortar shells exploded nearby. And Maupin disappeared.

A week later, the news station Al-Jazeera broadcast a video showing Maupin, looking healthy but dazed, seated in front of masked gunmen. Then in June 2004, a dark and grainy video surfaced. It showed a blindfolded man being shot in the head. An off-camera voice identified the victim as Matt Maupin.

No body was recovered, however, and military officials who analyzed the video said they could not verify that the man who had seemingly been executed was Maupin.

"There was no conclusive evidence to show it was Matt," says Shari Lawrence of the U.S. Army Human Resources Command.

As a result, the search for Maupin continues. "We've been following up on any potential leads," says Paul Boyce, a U.S. Army spokesman.

Boyce says soldiers are on standing orders to look for Maupin as part of their regular duties. Neither the military nor Maupin's family know where he is or who took him. But the Maupins believe, without question, that their son is alive and waiting to be rescued.

With the release Thursday of journalist Jill Carroll, Carolyn Maupin hopes her son might follow soon. "It gives me more hope that Matt's out there," she says.

For two years, Carolyn and Keith Maupin have dedicated their lives to Matt. Their primary mission: to make sure their son comes home, no matter how long it takes.

"We will not let Matt be forgotten," Carolyn says after replacing the wilting yellow ribbons in her front yard with crisp new ones. "I don't want him left behind. I don't want him left there."

Maupin, a fitness fanatic who was studying nutritional science at a local college, joined the Army Reserve for the tuition aid, his mom says. She protested, telling him the family would manage. "He said, 'Mom, I want to do more than just manage,' " she recalls.

Shortly after Maupin disappeared, his parents founded the Yellow Ribbon Support Center. Keith Maupin says he even left his job to spend more time there.

The non-profit, which operates out of a strip mall, is a bustling hub of patriotism. In the past two years, the center has shipped more than 4,500 packages to troops in Afghanistan and Iraq.

In each box, next to the Girl Scout cookies, beef jerky and packets of microwave popcorn, volunteers include a packet of pictures of Maupin. A sticker on the back of each picture asks for prayers.

Every Friday, a Pentagon official calls with an update. Though the calls buoy the Maupins, who are divorced, the mystery haunts them.

"I wonder if he hears the bombs of the soldiers and their rifles," says Carolyn Maupin, 58. She envisions her son in a room somewhere, his captors milling around him.

Keith Maupin's vision is similar. He sees his son in a shed with a cot.

For Keith, 55, falling asleep is sometimes difficult. He fondly recalls his bass fishing excursions with Matt. "He's my hero," he says of his son.

Carolyn is prone to worry, and her eyes betray fatigue. She misses the silly moments she shared with her son, like laughing uproariously during reruns of The Golden Girls.

She carries his letters from Iraq in her purse. They are curling at the edges and flimsy from her touch.

"I wouldn't come here on a bet. This place sucks," he wrote in an e-mail from Kuwait on March 3, 2004, about a month before he disappeared. He inquired about his nephew, the dog and the cat, and asked his mom if she had washed his fire-engine red 1998 Mustang.

"I just wrote to let you know I'm still alive and that I can't wait to come back to America," the e-mail reads.

Carolyn's small ranch house is full of altars to her son, reminders of his service to the country and his disappearance. Plastic storage totes contain more than 10,000 letters from well-wishers.

Inside Matt's room, his Christmas presents from 2004 remain wrapped and waiting. At the foot of his bed sits a cardboard box his mother can't bring herself to open.

The Army sent the box after his disappearance. Carolyn knows it contains his glasses and other items that search dogs sniffed out in the days after the attack.

Carolyn has thought about going to Iraq and searching for her son herself. She says she may consider it more seriously if he remains missing when the rest of the troops come home.

If she goes, she says, she plans to climb to the top of the highest hill and scold her son in her strictest, most maternal tone.

"I want to yell 'Matthew Maupin, get yourself up here right now!' " she says with a smile. "He'll know my voice."

A Mix Of Motives In Kidnappings (USAT)

By Mark Memmott And Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, March 31, 2006

In Iraq, kidnapping can be a powerful propaganda tool or a way to make money.

Sometimes, it's both.

"The great majority are commercial transactions," says Neil Livingstone, CEO of security consulting firm GlobalOptions and author of nine books on terrorism. That's the case in Iraq, he says, where most kidnappings are "Iraqi on Iraqi — some of them sectarian, some of them personal score-settling, most of them monetary."

In recent years, Livingstone notes, "we've seen the rise of Islamic zealots in the current Middle East conflict who kill to show their power and to intimidate."

They hope, Livingstone says, to say, "You're vulnerable, and you can't stop us." He cites as an example the al-Qaeda operatives who kidnapped and killed Wall Street Journal reporter Daniel Pearl in Pakistan in 2002.

Videos of hostages are powerful tools used to spread the kidnappers' messages and instill fear. They get replayed on news networks in both the Middle East and the West. They're among the reasons Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and others in the Bush administration say the United States is at risk of losing the "propaganda war."

Jill Carroll, the American freelance journalist released Thursday, was shown in three videos made by her captors.

"(Osama) bin Laden and (his al-Qaeda aides) have media committees, and they sit down and they plan how they're going to manipulate the press," Rumsfeld said this week in a radio interview.

The Times of London last week called kidnapping "today's weapon of war" and urged the news media to report on kidnappings with more restraint.

Increasingly in Iraq, the two motives — kidnappings for profit and kidnappings for propaganda — are merging.

In Baghdad, four or five organized criminal gangs control the streets, prowling for anybody who looks non-Iraqi, says Steven Casteel, a senior vice president at the security firm Vance International. Kidnappers want somebody who works for a company or government willing to pay for his or her release, he says.

U.S. Embassy spokeswoman Elizabeth Colton told the Associated Press in Baghdad on Thursday that 10 to 20 Iraqis are taken hostage every day. Ransoms average $20,000 to $30,000, she said.

But if gangs can't get a ransom quickly, they sometimes "sell" foreign hostages to terrorist groups. About 430 foreigners have been kidnapped in Iraq since April 2003, Colton said.

Carroll was held by a group that, in the videos, called itself the Revenge Brigades and made political demands. Even so, it's unclear whether she was released by the same group that abducted her — or was passed from one group to another for profit.

In its story today, The Christian Science Monitor says there were at least "a dozen false leads in the effort to free" Carroll, mainly efforts by scam artists who claimed to be holding her and demanded money for her release. One, the Monitor reports, "turned out to be a young Nigerian (who) was arrested in Germany."

In Iraq, the biggest problem in negotiating a hostage release, Livingstone says, is "the charlatans."

DOJ_NMG_0024700

He says he grew hopeful about Carroll after a deadline set by her captors passed without her body being found. “That telegraphed they were not serious about wanting to kill her,” he says.

Shiite Ayatollah Ignores Letter From Bush (AP)

By Qassim Abdul-zahra

AP, March 30, 2006

A letter from President Bush to Iraq's supreme Shiite spiritual leader, Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, was hand-delivered earlier this week but sits unread and untranslated in the top religious figure's office, a key al-Sistani aide told The Associated Press on Thursday.

The aide — who has never allowed use of his name in news reports, citing al-Sistani's refusal to make any public statements himself — said the ayatollah had laid the letter aside and did not ask for a translation because of increasing "unhappiness" over what senior Shiite leaders see as American meddling in Iraqi attempts to form their first, permanent post-invasion government.

The aide said the person who delivered the Bush letter — he would not identify the messenger by name or nationality — said it carried Bush's thanks to al-Sistani for calling for calm among his followers in preventing the outbreak of civil war after a Shiite shrine was bombed late last month.

The messenger also was said to have explained that the letter reinforced the American position that Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari should not be given a second term. Al-Sistani has not publicly taken sides in the dispute, but rather has called for Shiite unity.

The United States was known to object to al-Jaafari's second term but has never said so outright and in public.

But on Saturday, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad carried a similar letter from Bush to a meeting with Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, leader of the largest Shiite political organization, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq.

The al-Sistani aide said Shiite displeasure with U.S. involvement was so deep that dignitaries in the holy city of Najaf refused to meet Khalilzad on Wednesday during ceremonies commemorating the death of the Prophet Muhammad. The Afghan-born Khalilzad is a Sunni Muslim.

Elizabeth Colton, the U.S. Embassy spokeswoman, said Khalilzad had not sought any meetings and simply flew over Najaf and the nearby holy city of Karbala to witness the big processions of Shiite faithful marking the day.

"The ambassador did a fly over to see people on the streets of Karabala and Najaf. The ambassador did not ask to see anyone and did not go into either city," Colton told AP.

The United States is believed to oppose al-Jaafari because of his close ties and strong backing from radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who has a thousands-strong heavily armed militia that was responsible for much of the violence that hit the country after the Feb. 22 bombing of an important Shiite shrine in Samarra, north of Baghdad.

At a news conference Thursday, al-Jaafari said he had met with Khalilzad a day earlier and that the U.S. ambassador denied remarks attributed to him about the prime minister's candidacy for a new term.

"I don't care much about these matters. I look at the Iraqi people and the democratic mechanisms," al-Jaafari said.

Al-Sadr, who is staunchly anti-American, met with al-Sistani in Najaf on Thursday but emerged without making a statement.

The stalemate over forming a new government for Iraq, in its sixth week after the certification of the vote in parliamentary elections Dec. 15, is focused on al-Jaafari's candidacy, opposed by minority Sunni and Kurdish politicians as well as many moderate Shiites.

He was nominated for a second and permanent four-year term by one vote and with al-Sadr's backing. The Iraqi constitution dictates that the largest parliamentary bloc is entitled to select the prime minister. The Shiite United Iraqi Alliance holds 135 seats in the 275-member legislature.

At least 27 more people died in violence, meanwhile, including a 4-year-old girl who was killed when a car bomb exploded near the Shiite Ali Basha mosque in Baghdad's eastern Kryaat neighborhood. Police Lt. Thaer Mahmoud said at least 10 other bystanders were injured.

Gunmen in two cars arrived at the al-Amin bakery in Baghdad's dangerous southern neighborhood of Dora and killed three workers, police Lt. Maitham Abdul-Razzaq said.

The U.S. military reported two deaths. A soldier assigned to the 9th Naval Construction Regiment died Tuesday from wounds sustained in fighting in Anbar province. An airman assigned to the 447th Air Expeditionary Group was killed Thursday near Baghdad. A fellow airman was injured when a roadside bomb exploded as they worked to disarm it, the Central Command reported.

Iraq At The 11th Hour (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

The fate of the entire U.S. enterprise in Iraq now hangs in the balance, as the war has entered a dangerous new phase. It is the phase of barbaric identity-card violence between Sunnis and Shiites. In the late 1970's, I covered a similar moment in Lebanon, and the one thing I learned was this: Once this kind of venom gets unleashed — with members of each community literally beheading each other on the basis of their religious identities — it poisons everything. You enter a realm that is beyond politics, a realm where fear and revenge dominate everyone's thinking — and that is where Iraq is heading.

Jeffrey Gettleman reported last Sunday in this paper about Mohannad al-Azawi, a quiet Sunni pet shop owner in Baghdad who was abducted from his store and found murdered the next morning. His skin was covered with purple welts, and his face and legs had drill holes in them. His brother Hassan, the story noted, "carries the autopsy photos with him, along with a pistol. 'I cannot live without vengeance,' he said."

Once embedded, this cycle of fear and revenge is almost impossible to break. People conclude that the only thing that can protect them is a militia from their own sect, not the police or the army. Then these militias, which come to life to protect the neighborhood, take on a life of their own. They develop protection rackets, feel the thrill of power and, as that happens, start to do all they can to prevent the government from restoring its authority. Finally, as the BBC noted in a recent report from Baghdad, some Iraqi politicians are now concluding that "they can gain more power and influence from building on sectarian loyalties than from appeals for national unity." When politicians decide they can get ahead by appealing more to fear than to hope, national reconciliation goes up in smoke.

A Baghdad blogger, the Mesopotamian, quoted by AndrewSullivan.com, gave a vivid description of his neighborhood: "The confusion and conflict between the Americans, the army and the Ministry of Interior is producing a situation where the citizens don't know anymore whether the security personnel in the street are friends, enemies, terrorists or simply criminals and thieves. Everybody is wearing the same uniforms. Whole sections of the city have virtually fallen to gangs and terrorists, and this is especially true for the 'Sunni'-dominated neighborhoods. People and businesses are being robbed and the employees kidnapped en masse in broad daylight and with complete ease as though security forces are nonexistent, although we see them everywhere.

"I don't know anymore what can be done to rescue the situation. At least, those who are supposed to be in positions of responsibility should stop lying and painting a false picture. ... I regret sounding so pessimistic, but the alarm must be sounded. ... What is happening is Baghdad is something really awful."

Donald Rumsfeld's criminally negligent decision not to deploy enough troops in Iraq to begin with created this security vacuum. But the insecurity was compounded by the unique enemy that emerged to take advantage of that vacuum — Sunni Islamo-nihilists. These are a disparate collection of groups with one common agenda: America and its Iraqi allies must fail; they must not be allowed to build Iraq into a Western-style, democratizing society. When you are up against an enemy whose only goal is that you must fail, and which does not care about how much death and destruction it inflicts on its own people, let alone on others, it is extremely difficult to establish order.

The Iraqi Shiite community showed remarkable restraint in the face of the murderous provocations by these Islamo-nihilist gangs during the past three years. But that restraint is over. It's now clear that some Shiite militias are ready to match the Sunni nihilists, killing for killing. So the slide into a medieval barbarism has begun.

Do not believe any of the Bush team's happy talk. It doesn't matter if Iraq is quiet in the south and quiet in the north. If Baghdad, the heart of the country, is being ripped apart, then there is no Iraq — because there is no center.

There is only one hope for halting this slide and that is the formation — immediately — of a national unity government in Iraq, with Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds sharing power, and the deployment on the streets — immediately — of massive numbers of troops and police, both Iraqi and American, to prevent more of these tribal killings. If a national unity government is not formed soon, and if these identity-card murderers gain more momentum, any hope for building a decent Iraq will vanish.

It is five minutes to midnight.

Republicans Eye Modest Tax-Cut Victory (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

REPUBLICANS GROW confident of salvaging modest tax-cut victory.

DOJ_NMG_0024702

Though hitting initial April tax-day target is unlikely, strategists at the White House and on Capitol Hill predict passage of temporary extension of the 15% rate on dividends and capital gains. Shorter extension makes it possible to include alternative-minimum tax relief in five-year, $70 billion package.

Other tax proposals seek election-year political points. Senate leader Frist plans May vote on abolishing estate tax, though Republicans lack the 60 votes needed to defeat potential Democratic filibuster. Former Treasury Secretary O'Neill's remarks defending the tax strengthen Democratic argument.

MCCAIN GAINS from improving odds for immigrant guest-worker program.

House Speaker Hastert's openness to guest-worker compromise enhances Arizona senator's reputation for driving Hill action. Championing White House priorities, on immigration as well as Iraq, fuels his hopes for wooing Bush loyalists.

Tough border-security talk by Frist, McCain's 2008 rival, could produce inroads among conservative Christians; by 64%-29%, evangelical Protestants call immigrants a burden rather than a benefit in new Pew Hispanic Center poll. But damage to party efforts to increase Hispanic support, warns former Rep. Vin Weber, could be "so great as to be fatal to any chance of a Republican majority."

Republicans' 1994 landslide was fueled by 31 open seats that Democrats had held. So far, just 18 Republican-held seats have become open as summer candidate-filing deadlines approach.

Battleground-state polling by Zogby Interactive2 shows slight improvement in Democratic Senate prospects since January, with the share of undecided voters rising. A Republican campaign strategist notes that "We haven't fought back yet" with TV ads; House and Senate campaign committees tap Republican Chairman Mehlman for get-out-the-vote programs to emulate Bush's 2004 success in exurbs.

OOPS: The IRS faults its own incorrect statistics for a watchdog group's report that audits are performed on less than one-tenth of one percent of taxpayers earning at least $1-million. In fact, says the tax-collection agency, around 5% of those 225,000 taxpayers' returns were audited in 2005.

JUMP-START? Drug makers and employers, frustrated by attacks on private-sector health proposals, form a new advocacy group including former Bush health secretary Thompson. They hope Health Care America will offset liberal Families USA. Administration insiders say Bush's proposed expansion of health-savings accounts can still pass if attached to another popular measure.

WAR VETS ORGANIZE to back Bush on Iraq. VetsforFreedom.org3, a nonprofit group of recently returned soldiers, cites a "disconnect" between what soldiers and veterans think about the war and what's portrayed in the media. "We've got good men dying and the politicians are using it for political grandstanding," says Wade Zirkle, a co-founder who served two deployments to Iraq.

CAMPAIGN TIME: French immunologist Michel Kazatchkine launches bid to head the multibillion-dollar Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria. The French government AIDS coordinator plans a lobbying effort to reassure Bush administration that he intends to work hand-in-hand with U.S. AIDS programs. "There's no room for competition," he says.

"This administration has no economic spokesman," grouses a top Republican strategist, who notes that voters complain about the economy despite its 3.5% growth clip. Yet Republicans acknowledge that Secretary Snow has been loyally on-message and doubt a replacement would get policy clout.

Dubai ports controversy hurts Deputy Secretary Kimmitt's chance of moving up if Snow departs. To replace Bolten at budget office, current deputy Joel Kaplan is seen as more politically savvy but less connected than colleague Clay Johnson, Bush's one-time classmate.

MINOR MEMOS: After Democratic leader plays down Rep. McKinney's "unfortunate incident" with Capitol cop, Speaker Hastert's spokesman asks, "How many officers would have to be punched before it becomes a big deal?" ... Errant marksman Cheney ranks second, behind Michael Jackson, on New York publicist Jeff Barge's "Most Foolish American" survey.

Wis. Communities Will Vote On Whether To Get Out Of Iraq (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, March 31, 2006

EVANSVILLE, Wis. — Cheryl Hurst doesn't hesitate when asked whether U.S. troops should be withdrawn from Iraq. “Bring them home,” the 47-year-old restaurant manager says. “They've been there long enough.”

DOJ_NMG_0024703

Matthew Persons, 30, is just as emphatic. “Leave them there until the job is done,” says the Air Force veteran, who works for an aviation company. “Pulling out won't solve anything and will let the terrorists know that what they do works.”

On Tuesday, they can express their disparate opinions in a voting booth. People in 32 communities across Wisconsin, including Evansville, will vote on referendums calling for the “orderly and rapid” withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq. This town of 4,000 is the only place where residents also will vote on a separate referendum stating that U.S. forces should remain until “unquestioned victory is clearly won.”

The outcome won't carry any legal weight here or in Washington. But if all the anti-war measures pass, politicians might not be able to ignore the results, says Kenneth Mayer, a political scientist at the University of Wisconsin-Madison.

“If enough people are willing to say ‘enough,' and elected officials start thinking they need to be responsive, it will embolden opponents of the war, and … the administration will have to take that into account,” he says.

Anti-war resolutions have been adopted by more than 50 local governments across the USA and at more than 40 town meetings in Vermont. Wisconsin's capital, Madison, is the largest city that will vote Tuesday on the measure. Milwaukee will vote on it in November.

Here in Evansville, the competing measures pit neighbors against each other and have stirred passionate debate. No one from here has died in Iraq, but many residents have relatives who served there.

The withdraw-now referendum originated with the state's Green Party and the Wisconsin Network for Peace and Justice. Fred Juergens, 67, a retired chemistry professor and chairman of the liberal group Citizens United of Union/Evansville, organized a drive to gather enough signatures to add it to local races on Tuesday's ballot.

“The people have to lead the leaders out of this war,” says Juergens, a city alderman. “If we didn't think it would make a difference, we wouldn't bother doing it. We're not protesting just for the sake of whining.”

When the City Council voted to put the anti-war referendum on the ballot, neighbors Tony Ryerson and Ron Gay wrote their own referendum saying troops should stay in Iraq and collected enough signatures to put it on the ballot, too. “We all complain a lot, but I thought it was about time I got involved,” says Ryerson, 45, a public works employee.

Gay, 51, is pastor of Grace Independent Baptist Church and has served in the Marines. Some of his parishioners wish he would keep out of politics, he says, “but American citizenship is a responsibility, and sometimes you have to face burdens for the better good.”

National polls show that many Americans have soured on the war. A March 10-12 USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll found that 54% say U.S. troops should be withdrawn now or within a year, and 60% say the war wasn't worth it.

In Evansville, which voted for Democrat John Kerry in the 2004 presidential election, some people say they're torn. Joanne Dean, 60, isn't happy about the war and says President Bush “doesn't listen to the people.” But she adds, “I don't support another Vietnam walk-away” that would leave the Iraqi people fending for themselves.

At a forum on both referendums Wednesday night, Gay and Ryerson made their case for keeping troops in Iraq, and two members of Veterans for Peace argued against the war. Withdrawal is “logical, practical and absolutely necessary” and should be followed with humanitarian aid, said David Giffey, a Vietnam War veteran from nearby Arena. “If we leave, (Iraq) belongs to the insurgency,” Gay said. “Part of the cost of freedom is sometimes people have to risk their lives.”

Special education teacher Robin Van Rooy, 41, listened attentively. “I'd like to see the troops come back now, but I guess I worry about the consequences,” she says. She's dismayed by the growing number of U.S. dead in Iraq. However, she worries that withdrawal would leave Iraq “a big mess.”

Heather Heinzer, 28, a mom who works from home selling custom photo albums, shares Van Rooy's concerns. “It's not a cut-and-dried issue,” she said at the forum. “I could sit here and cry at the thought of all the things the people serving in Iraq are missing. But if we leave, where does that leave the Iraqi people?”

Nurse Barbara Buttchen, 56, isn't sure how she'll vote but says giving people a chance to have their say is important: “The president is supposed to listen to all of us.”

Philip Stephens: Democracy Requires Patience (FT)

By Philip Stephens

Financial Times, March 31, 2006

There is an interesting and, for outsiders, rather amusing spat raging in Washington between neo-conservatives past and present. Francis Fukuyama, once a celebrated cheerleader for the muscular interventionism that led the US into war with Iraq, has recanted. The invasion was a mistake. The US cannot remake the tyrannies of the world in its own democratic image.

Such apostasy has greatly irritated those who believe that the mission to spread freedom and democracy around the world is George W. Bush’s last chance for an enduring legacy. Power never flows faster than away from a second-term president. Mr

Bush has exhausted his political capital earlier than most. This week the president looked on helplessly as Republicans in Congress fought themselves to a standstill about immigration.

Mr Fukuyama's rediscovery of himself as something called a Wilsonian realist has drawn a sharp response from erstwhile allies. Charles Krauthammer, a high priest of the neo-conservative faith, used his column in The Washington Post the other day to launch a scathing counter-attack. It was the latest of many.

Yet the neo-cons have been in broad retreat for some time. Many, particularly those once clustered around Dick Cheney, the vice-president, and Donald Rumsfeld, the defence secretary, have left the administration. Mr Rumsfeld himself is blamed by just about everybody in Washington for the incompetence that has led to the chaos in Iraq.

So we might simply smile at this latest falling out among erstwhile friends and move on. Mr Fukuyama hardly has a hotline to the president. Nor is he well known for consistency. In the acerbic observation of a fellow academic, he has made an excellent living from changing his mind.

I thought that a little unkind. Mr Fukuyama's conversion to the efficacy of soft power as an instrument of foreign policy is to be applauded. "Wilsonian realism" sounds uncannily like the "liberal internationalism" that some in the European Union have been advocating for the past several decades.

What makes the schism among neo-cons interesting is that it parallels a serious political debate, inside and outside the administration, about whether the US can align a foreign policy constructed around values with the more pressing daily concerns of geopolitics. As the presidency stumbles, the so-called Bush doctrine is under increasing fire.

The president has not changed his mind. He is as firm as ever in his conviction that America must use its power for a moral purpose. The administration's latest National Security Strategy sets as the first pillar of US foreign policy "promoting freedom, justice and human dignity". In a conscious echo of the president's second inaugural address of January 2005, the new strategy sets out in some detail why the spread of democracy is the answer to terrorism. In deference to the growing unpopularity of the Iraq war, the paper does tone down military dimensions of the policy, embracing in its place "transformational diplomacy". But the objective remains.

If the debacle in Iraq has demonstrated the limits of US military power, Mr Bush's democracy agenda still attests to the power of ideas in politics. Democrats will concede that one of the reasons American foreign policy drifted during Bill Clinton's presidency is because the administration eschewed any binding philosophy. If nothing else, the neo-conservatives set the terms of a new debate.

In other circumstances, one would expect the party of Woodrow Wilson to support Mr Bush's ambitions, if not his means. One Clinton-era foreign policy adviser told me this week there was little in Mr Bush's second inaugural address with which he could disagree. But the Democrats have not forgiven themselves for supporting the Iraq war. Proselytising for democracy sounds too much these days like military adventurism.

In any event, the Democrats' loathing of the president transcends policy considerations. Recent political battles, not least over the proposed takeover of some US container terminals by Dubai Ports World, have seen the minority party retreat, quite shamelessly, into a foreign policy based on fortress America.

There are plenty of Republicans who are similarly inclined. The party's traditional realists in Congress have been joined by those who see self-interested nationalism as the best way to defend their seats in the coming mid-term elections.

Within the administration, meanwhile, officials are struggling to give policy substance to Mr Bush's foreign policy idealism. In the words of one senior figure the challenge is to "operationalise" the new security strategy. The signs are that they have not gone very far. Word has it that attempts by Mr Bush's National Security Council to set out what it implies for each of America's myriad global relationships have run into the sands of inter-agency dispute. Values are too often colliding with short-term interests.

The jolt to the strategy delivered by the victory of Hamas in the Palestinian elections is still evident. Mr Bush is said to be unrepentant about his insistence the elections should go ahead. Yet there is precious little evidence that the administration knows how to deal with the new political realities in the region.

The relationship with Russia poses a different set of problems. No one pretends that Vladimir Putin has done anything other than reverse Russia's always uncertain march towards democracy. But equally, Mr Bush needs Mr Putin's help to keep up the pressure on Iran over its nuclear programme. As for the drive to democratise the greater Middle East, where does the balance lie between freedom and oil?

Quiz the administration officials charged with striking these balances and they will tell you that there are never easy trade-offs. Promoting democracy, in the words of one senior official, was always going to be "messy". It is a generational project. If some had made the mistake of overestimating how much could be done in the short term, it would be equally foolish to underestimate what could be achieved over the long term. Maybe. But the frequent talk in this administration about legacy raises the suspicion that it has become a substitute for hard policy choices now. Wilsonian realism, liberal internationalism, call it what you will, requires consistency and patience. These are hard to find in a weakened presidency.

Unrestricted warfare

Two of China's most notorious military strategists are coming to the United States, not as guests of the Pentagon, but under a State Department program.

Col. Qiao Liang and Col. Wang Xiangsui are authors of the 1999 book "Unrestricted Warfare," which advocates China's use all forms of warfare, including state-supported terrorism, to win future conflicts.

"From a military standpoint, then, the traditional terror war is characterized by the use of limited resources to fight an unlimited war," they wrote.

The colonels' visit, expected in the next few weeks, comes amid questions about the Pentagon's military exchange program with China led by Adm. William J. Fallon, head of the U.S. Pacific Command.

Pentagon officials tell us China's military for nearly a decade has failed to cooperate with the United States in its selection of military officers for exchanges.

Policy-oriented military leaders have been blocked from the exchange program and their identity within an officer corps, estimated to be as many as 300,000 officers, remains a secret.

Instead, the Chinese military only sends officers who either seek information on U.S. warfighting weaknesses, or older generals who soon retire and thus cannot influence the future of China's military.

In one case several years ago, a Chinese officer asked a U.S. Navy officer during a visit to identify the key weakness of a U.S. aircraft carrier, a major Chinese target in any U.S.-Chinese conflict over Taiwan.

The officer was naively told that the weakest point is under the hull, and that it also happens to be closest to where its ammunition is stored.

Within two years of the disclosure, U.S. intelligence agencies detected Chinese military purchases of Russian wake-homing torpedoes that target ships from the rear and explode underneath the hull.

"The whole exchange program has been a nightmare," said one official.

The challenge for Adm. Fallon is to prevent China from spying on U.S. military secrets and to persuade Beijing to send influential younger officers to learn the full extent of U.S. military power with the goal of avoiding any future miscalculation.

The new Chinese general in charge of the exchanges is Maj. Gen. Zhang Qinsheng, who recently replaced Lt. Gen. Xiong Guangkai, the Chinese military intelligence chief who in the past chose all the Chinese military exchange visitors.

If Gen. Zhang is also named to replace Gen. Xiong as military intelligence chief, Pentagon officials tell us they expect more of the same from the exchanges.

Lion tale

It was one of those accusations against American soldiers that was readily believed by the press. Two Iraqis said in November they were thrown to the lions when being detained in 2003.

But there did not appear to be any corroboration for such a bizarre tale. Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld singled out the press' acceptance of the story as an example of the American media wanting to believe the worst in the U.S. military.

"We've arrived at a strange time in this country where the worst about America and our military seems to so quickly be taken as truth by the press and reported and spread around the world, often with little context and little scrutiny, let alone correction or accountability after the fact," Mr. Rumsfeld said in a speech last December.

"Recently there were claims by two Iraqis on a speaking tour that U.S. soldiers attacked them with lions. It was widely reported around the United States. It is still without substantiation. And yet that story was spread across the globe."

"Army [criminal investigative division] reviewed the allegations concerning the lions and determined there was insufficient information upon which to initiate an investigation," Col. Curtin said.

The late Uday Hussein, one of Saddam's sadistic sons, owned lions as pets. They were moved to a reopened Baghdad zoo in 2003.

Poppy season

DOJ_NMG_0024706

"You have a confluence in Helmand of criminals and Taliban and poor farmers, and the poor farmers raise poppy because the Helmand River gives them a water source, the soil is good, and the climate is very good for growing poppy. And so they can produce a rather large amount of poppy with a very small investment of time and labor in their fields.

"That poppy then is produced by primarily narco-trafficking organizations that move it out of Helmand and into other parts of the country and then out of the country. And with the funding that they get, they then can provide money to primarily Taliban, not so much al Qaeda, in Helmand. They can provide funds to the Taliban to recruit fighters, to train fighters, to buy weapons and arms. And in many cases, some of the farmers are threatened by the Taliban to either continue to grow the poppy to generate the funds or face death."

Terror training

The more documents that emerge from Saddam Hussein's reign of terror, the more evidence stacks up that his regime was in lockstep with international terrorists.

Newly released papers seized after the March 2003 U.S.-led invasion reveal contacts made between Saddam's top aides and Osama bin Laden, particularly during the al Qaeda leader's stay in Sudan.

The huge collection also gave a history of the regime put out last week by U.S. Forces Command.

The command told of meticulously kept files by the Gestapolike Fedayeen Saddam, which the dictator put in place to prevent military coups and to enforce his rule through threats and killings.

The documents show the fanatical Fedayeen operated bustling terror training camps for recruits from all over the Middle East.

The book, titled, "The Iraqi Perspective Project," states:

"Beginning in 1994, the Fedayeen Saddam opened its own paramilitary training camps for volunteers, graduating more than 7,200 'good men racing full with courage and enthusiasm' in the first year. Beginning in 1998, these camps began hosting 'Arab volunteers from Egypt, Palestine, Jordan, the Gulf and Syria.' It is not clear from available evidence where all of these non-Iraqi volunteers who were 'sacrificing for the cause' went to ply their newfound skills.

"Before the summer of 2002, most volunteers went home upon the completion of training. But these training camps were humming with frenzied activity in the months immediately prior to the war. As late as January 2003, the volunteers participated in a special event called the 'Heroes Attack.'

"This training event was designed in part to prepare regional Fedayeen Saddam commands to 'obstruct the enemy from achieving his goal and to support keeping peace and stability in the province.' "

Overseen by Saddam's son, Uday, the Fedayeen trained foreign "heroes" and Iraqis in commando tactics, surveillance and explosives. The Iraqi Intelligence Service supplied the Fedayeen with silencers, training in explosives and booby-trapping cars, and timers.

"The only apparent use for all of this ... equipment was to conduct commando or terrorist operations," the Joint Forces history said.

Afghan Convert Thanks Pope For Intervening (AP-Y2)

By Maria Sanminiatelli

AP2, March 30, 2006

An Afghan who faced the death penalty in his homeland for converting from Islam to Christianity said Thursday he was certain he would have been killed had he stayed there, and he thanked Pope Benedict XVI for intervening on his behalf.

"In Kabul, they would have killed me, I'm sure of it," said Abdul Rahman, who was spirited out of Afghanistan to a secret location in Italy. "If you are not a Muslim in an Islamic country like mine, they kill you. There are no doubts."

He said his case was to serve as an example "to others who dared rebel."

Rahman's comments, in a short interview to Italian journalists, came hours after Italy formally granted him asylum, citing religious persecution, the ministry said.

Video on Italian television evening news showed a few people gathered around a small table. It never showed Rahman's face and the Interior Ministry has said that Rahman was "under protection."

Premier Silvio Berlusconi said Rahman arrived in Italy before dawn Wednesday, hours before the conservative leader announced that the government would take him in.

His case has attracted wide attention in the West and led to calls by the U.S. and other governments for the Afghan government to protect the convert.

The pope had appealed to Afghan President Hamid Karzai, and the United Nations sought a country to take him in after Muslim clerics in Afghanistan threatened his life, saying his conversion was a "betrayal to Islam."

Benedict wrote to Karzai on March 22 that dropping the case "would bestow great honor upon the Afghan people and would raise a chorus of admiration in the international community."

Since his arrival in Italy, the Vatican has made no comment. There was no indication of any plan to arrange a meeting between Rahman and the pope.

"Thanks to the (Italian) government. And thanks to Pope Benedict XVI. The pontiff took an interest in my case, and thanks to him, the U.N. intervened," Rahman told reporters.

He was released from prison Monday after a court dismissed charges of apostasy against him for of a lack of evidence and suspicions he might be mentally ill.

Conversion is a crime under Afghanistan's Islamic law. Rahman, 41, was arrested last month after police discovered him with a Bible. He was brought to trial last week for converting 16 years ago while working as a medical aid worker for an international Christian group helping Afghan refugees in Pakistan.

Rahman also said he was worried for his family, still in Afghanistan.

"On the streets, you still have Taliban and they kill those who are not Muslims," Rahman said. "I'm a father. My children are still there."

Italy has close ties with Afghanistan, whose former king, Mohammed Zaher Shah, was allowed to live with his family in exile in Rome for 30 years. The former royals returned to Kabul after the fall of the Taliban regime.

Italian troops were sent into Afghanistan after the U.S.-led invasion of the country in 2001 to help with reconstruction and Italy still has 1,775 troops there.

Rahman's ordeal began as a custody battle for his two daughters, now 13 and 14. The girls lived with their grandparents, but Rahman sought custody when he returned to Afghanistan in 2002 after living in Germany for nine years. The matter was later taken to police, and during questioning, it emerged that Rahman was a Christian and was carrying a Bible. He was immediately arrested and charged.

Pentagon To Test A Huge Conventional Bomb (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

A huge mushroom cloud of dust is expected to rise over Nevada's desert in June when the Pentagon plans to detonate a gigantic 700-ton explosive -- the biggest open-air chemical blast ever at the Nevada Test Site -- as part of the research into developing weapons that can destroy deeply buried military targets, officials said yesterday.

The test, code-named "Divine Strake," will occur on June 2 about 90 miles northwest of Las Vegas in a high desert valley bounded by mountains, according to Pentagon and Energy Department officials.

"This is the largest single explosive we could imagine doing," said James A. Tegnelia, director of the Pentagon's Defense Threat Reduction Agency, which is conducting the test.

The test is aimed at determining how well a massive conventional bomb would perform against fortified underground targets -- such as military headquarters, biological or chemical weapons stockpiles, and long-range missiles -- that the Pentagon says are proliferating among potential adversaries around the world.

Tegnelia said there is a range of technical hurdles to overcome. He suggested that big conventional bombs are unlikely to solve the overall problem of buried threats. "It's a lot easier to dig your tunnel 50 feet deeper" than to develop weapons that can destroy it, he told a meeting of defense reporters.

Such a bomb would be a conventional alternative to a nuclear weapon proposed by the Bush administration, which has run into opposition on Capitol Hill. The Pentagon for several years has sought funding for research into the Robust Nuclear Earth Penetrator (RNEP) -- also known as the "bunker buster" -- after the administration's 2001 Nuclear Posture Review stated that no weapon in the U.S. arsenal could threaten a growing number of buried targets. Congress, however, has repeatedly refused to grant funding for a study on a nuclear bunker buster, instead directing money toward conventional alternatives.

The June test will detonate 700 tons of heavy ammonium nitrate-fuel oil emulsion -- creating a blast equivalent to 593 tons of TNT -- in a 36-foot-deep hole near a tunnel in the center of the Nevada Test Site, according to official reports. It aims to allow scientists to model the type of ground shock that will be created, and to weigh the effectiveness of such a weapon against its collateral impact.

"To my knowledge, this will be the largest open-air chemical explosion that we've conducted," said Darwin Morgan, spokesman for the Energy Department's test site. Larger blasts have been carried out at the White Sands Missile Range in New Mexico, including the nation's biggest open-air detonation, in 1985, a Pentagon spokeswoman said.

The blast is not likely to be felt or heard outside the 1,375-square-mile test site, and the cloud of dust is expected to dissipate quickly from view, Morgan said. "They don't think people will see it in the base camp on the south end of the test site," he said.

Officials took pains to differentiate between the June conventional experiment and past nuclear testing. "The U.S. has no plans to conduct a nuclear test. President Bush supports a continued moratorium on nuclear testing," said Irene Smith, a spokeswoman for the Defense Threat Reduction Agency (DTRA). The Pentagon agency is charged with countering threats to the United States from chemical, biological, radiological and nuclear weapons.

On a related topic, Tegnelia said the State Department and the Pentagon are developing a proposal for a $100 million effort to help Libya get rid of tons of mustard gas and some precursor chemicals being stored in the Libyan desert. "The Libyans requested some support" from the U.S. government, and a DTRA team has visited Libya to consider various options for eliminating the weapons, he said.

SAN JOSE, Calif. (AP) - U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales brought a simple message to middle school students on Thursday: Don't steal.

``I'm the top cop in the U.S. and I want you to know that if you illegally download a game or music or a video it's stealing, just as if you went into a store and stole blue jeans," Gonzales told 7th and 8th graders at Windmill Springs School in the heart of California's Silicon Valley.

The lesson culminated an unusual four-day lesson on intellectual property and copyright infringement during which the nation's top law enforcement official became a classroom teacher.

Most children these days are exposed to Internet safety messages, both in television and in the classroom, but curriculum has only recently been developed about software piracy, copyright laws and intellectual property.

Entertainment software corporate leaders have repeatedly said the public simply doesn't understand that there are rules when it comes to usage of the Internet and computers.

But Windmill Springs students said Thursday that they got the message.

``Most kids know it's wrong to download some movies or songs or copy games and CDs but they figure that if they can do it on a computer then they will," said Andrew Lopez, 13. ``But not me. You can get a fine. You can go to jail."

Gonzales said the consequences of intellectual property theft are just starting to be understood.

``I'm not kidding myself that we have a lot of work to do, but that doesn't mean we shouldn't try," he said.

The Justice Department's Intellectual Property task force was established just two years ago. Since then the number of people prosecuted for intellectual property offenses has almost doubled as investigators have targeted hackers and counterfeiters.

With help from Ric Hirsch, a senior vice president for intellectual property for the Entertainment Software Association, students tackled some of the trickier questions surrounding these issues:

Is it legal to copy games just for your friends?

``No, it's not," said Hirsch.

Can someone get in trouble for buying a pirated game?

``You shouldn't do it, but you probably won't get in trouble," said Hirsch.

Why do computers even have CD burners on them?

``People think one song, one game, what difference does it make," said Hirsch. ``Unfortunately the nature of this industry is that you can bleed to death from thousands of papercuts."

Jon Dudas, director of the U.S. Patents and Trade Office, joined Gonzales at the school, telling students that while everyone understands why they shouldn't steal cars, understanding the law can be a bit more complicated when it comes to games, movies and music.

``If you steal your friend's car, they don't have a car anymore, but if you take a copy of a friend's video game they still have a copy," he said. ``You're not stealing the game, you're stealing ideas."

The school event was video taped by Court TV for an upcoming public affairs program on intellectual property theft.

U.S. Attorney General Assures Portlanders He's Up On Security (OREG)

The Oregonian

The Oregonian, March 31, 2006

Visit - Alberto Gonzales outlines administration priorities at a business alliance breakfast Attorney General Alberto Gonzales gave the Portland Business Alliance a quick review Thursday of the Bush administration's priorities, saying, "Every day, I ask m

Making his first trip to Portland, Gonzales spoke to the city business group at a breakfast meeting, then he said he planned to "review the troops" in the U.S. attorney's office in Portland.

On Wednesday, he visited the Yakama Indian reservation in Washington; he was scheduled to go on to Texas and California later.

At a brief news conference after the business breakfast, Gonzales said he would not comment on an Oregon lawsuit by an Islamic charity in Ashland that says it was a target of secret federal wiretapping and searches.

Public access to documents in the case has been prohibited, and Gonzales said that in cases such as the lawsuit, records "can be and should be withheld." Of Oregon's assisted-suicide law, which the Justice Department has fought and lost before the U.S. Supreme Court, Gonzales said: "That matter has been decided by the courts, and the courts have indicated what the law prevents." -- Anne Saker

Attorney General Asserts Internet Privacy 'Balance' (STREET)

By Troy Wolverton, TheStreet.com Senior Writer

TheStreet.com, March 31, 2006

SAN JOSE, Calif. -- In town to talk with kids about respecting intellectual property, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez found himself addressing questions about the government's respect for online privacy.

In the middle of a legal dispute with Google (GOOG:Nasdaq - news - research - Cramer's Take) over access to search records, the government has come under criticism from consumer privacy advocates. Gonzalez sought to assure critics that the government was trying to strike a "good faith" balance between privacy interests and protecting the public.

Even though a federal judge recently restricted the amount of data the government will potentially have access to in the Google case, Gonzalez appeared unabashed by the government's request. Indeed, in determining the balance between privacy protection and how much information the government will request from private information keepers, the Department of Justice, instead of setting its own limits, will take its lead from Congress and the courts, he said.

"Sometimes the courts will agree, and sometimes they will disagree," he said.

The issue of how much information private companies should hand over to the federal government has come up repeatedly in recent years. Following the 9/11 terrorist attacks, numerous airlines handed over passenger data to federal transportation officials seeking to determine patterns that might lead to finding potential hijackers.

More recently, the Department of Justice has sought data from Internet search engines last year in an effort to determine the prevalence of pornography on the Web. The effort was part of the government's move to defend the Child Online Protection Act, which bans access to material that could be "harmful to children."

While Google has resisted the justice department's request, other Internet search engines, such as those operated by Yahoo! (YHOO:Nasdaq - news - research - Cramer's Take), Microsoft (MSFT:Nasdaq - news - research - Cramer's Take) and Time Warner's (TWX:NYSE - news - research - Cramer's Take) America Online, complied with it.

And they're not alone: the DOJ has subpoenaed 34 other companies for related data, according to published reports.

US AG Gonzales Says Google Case Points To Govt's Limits (DOW)

Dow Jones, March 31, 2006

SAN JOSE -(Dow Jones)- U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said he was pleased with a federal judge's decision in the Google Inc. (GOOG) (GOOG) case two weeks ago, but that it showed there are limits to the kind of information the government can get from Internet companies.

During an appearance here at the Windmill Springs Middle School, Gonzales reiterated that the government had not sought personal information on people using Google's (GOOG) Internet search engine when it subpoenaed the company in August.

"We're not interested in any kind of user information," he said.

In the case, the Bush administration asked for 1 million Web addresses and a week's worth of search queries from the Silicon Valley company. Federal District Judge James Ware reduced that number to 50,000 addresses in his decision on March 17 but said the company would not be compelled to hand over a sample of users' search queries.

Gonzales said the judge's decision recognized that the information the government sought was relevant to its defense of the embattled Child Online Protection Act.

"We're happy with the judge's decision," Gonzales said, but "there are limits to what kind of information the government can get."

Separately, Gonzales said he pressed Chinese officials on intellectual property protection when he was in that country several months ago.

Chinese readers at the highest level of government recognize the need for greater protection, said Jon Dudas, undersecretary of Commerce for intellectual property. But "the results are not carried through yet," Dudas said.

In 2005, 70% of counterfeit goods seized at U.S. borders came from mainland China, Dudas said. That was up from 63% in 2004.

Gonzales Says Files In Islamic Case To Remain Sealed (AP)

By JOSEPH B. FRAZIER, The Associated Press

AP, March 30, 2006

PORTLAND, Ore. (AP) — Evidence in a dismissed case against an Ashland branch of an Islamic charity will remain confidential, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Thursday.

Gonzales was in Portland to meet with the U.S. attorney's office in Oregon and to address a breakfast meeting of the Portland Business Alliance.

He said "certain kinds of information can be and should be withheld."

He declined further comment on the case, saying it is in litigation.

A federal lawsuit seeks to shut down electronic surveillance by the National Security Agency, claiming the government illegally wiretapped conversations between the director of the Islamic charity Al-Haramain and two of the charity's attorneys.

The charity had been indicted on tax charges related to money laundering in 2004, but the charges were dismissed.

Lawyers for the charity opposed the dismissal, saying they wanted to know what evidence the government had.

One secret document in the lawsuit has been ordered held in a secure facility in Seattle at least for now.

U.S. District Judge Garr King decided that the document couldn't be held securely in a federal courthouse in Portland, and shouldn't be held at the local office of the FBI, which is a defendant in the case.

Gonzales did not elaborate on the broader NSA wiretapping controversy beyond repeating President Bush's position that it is legal.

"I can only talk about what the president has disclosed to the American public in December of last year," he said.

"We have been very, very forthcoming about his authorities," he said. He said members of Congress continue to get briefings.

On immigration reform, Gonzales said Congress should "keep in mind the president's broad principles."

He said Bush favors a guest worker program but opposes amnesty.

What constitutes amnesty, he said, is under discussion in Congress.

"The president says he will not support a program that provides amnesty to those who have broken the law," Gonzales said.

"We need to find a way to reach a solution here that takes into account the reality that we have 11 (million)-12 million people in this country who are providing service," he said.

But he said the policy also must stress that laws need to be followed.

U.S. Attorney General Speaks At Portland Breakfast (KOIN-TV)

By Lynn Huston, KOIN News 6

KOIN-TV, CBS 6, Portland, March 31, 2006

PORTLAND -- It could be winter before Congress passes an immigration bill. That's because there is a growing split among Republicans over what to do about it.

One of President Bush's point men on the issue was in Portland Thursday morning.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales certainly has been one of the president's must trusted advisors on the issue, but he stuck with what has been the White House script.

Speaking to a morning breakfast for the Portland Business Alliance, Gonzales praised the local U.S. Attorney's Office for a recent meth bust which was the largest in state history. He also pledged to continue to pursue sexual predators who use the Internet, corruption in government and gang violence.

After his speech, Gonzales restated his support for immigration reform, including a guest worker program. But he offered no opinion on the legal definition of amnesty for illegal immigrants.

"The president says he will not support a program that provides amnesty to those who have broken the law and come into our country unlawfully. But as to how you define it, that's part of the ongoing debate within the Congress," Gonzales said.

Leaders of both parties seem to agree that it will probably be sometime after the November election before any final decision is made on immigration reform.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Judges Order Release On Bail For Ex-Broker In Enron Case (NYT)

By Julie Creswell And Landon Thomas Jr.

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

In a surprise move, the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit in Houston late yesterday ordered that a former Merrill Lynch executive, William Fuhs, be immediately released on bail awaiting final decision on his appeal.

Mr. Fuhs was one of four former Merrill employees convicted in 2004 on fraud and conspiracy charges involving a 1999 sale by Enron of power generators mounted on barges in Nigeria. Prosecutors argued during the trial that the Merrill executives were guilty of conspiring to defraud investors in an effort to win future banking business from Enron.

The appellate court said the conditions of Mr. Fuhs's release will be established today in a hearing before a federal magistrate judge.

Last May, Judge Ewing Werlein Jr. of the United States District Court in Houston sentenced Mr. Fuhs to three years and one month in prison. In most white-collar criminal cases, the defendants are generally allowed to remain free on bail while their appeals are heard. But Mr. Fuhs and the other former Merrill executives who were convicted were ordered to prison immediately.

Mr. Fuhs was sent to a federal transfer facility in Oklahoma City, where maximum security prisoners are housed for temporary periods. The facility is nearly 700 miles away from Denver, where his wife and two small children live.

Mr. Fuhs's lawyers had argued that the distance violated federal prison policies and was harsher than what was received by the other defendants, all of whom were sent to prisons closer to their families. His lawyers had also argued that the Oklahoma facility had a much higher security level than was required for someone with the "custody classification level" of Mr. Fuhs.

Lawyers for Mr. Fuhs and the other Merrill defendants recently presented oral arguments on their appeals. Lawyers for Mr. Fuhs subsequently filed a motion to have their client released on bail. Calls to Mr. Fuhs's lawyers were not returned last night.

The decision to release Mr. Fuhs on bail, awaiting the outcome of his appeal, could be a recognition of the specific factors that related to Mr. Fuhs's incarceration, said Lawrence Robbins, the lawyer for Daniel H. Bayly, Merrill's former investment banking chief and one of the four convicted in the case.

But Tom Kirkendall, a Houston lawyer who has closely followed the Enron case and has represented clients in other Enron-related cases, interpreted the move as a sign that the appeals court may have been persuaded by the arguments presented to them.

"This is a strong signal that he has a winner on appeal," Mr. Kirkendall said.

Prosecutors contend that Mr. Fuhs and the other Merrill executives conspired with Enron in December 1999 in the purchase of three Nigerian power barges. The government alleged that there was an unspoken deal cut between Mr. Bayly and Andrew S. Fastow, Enron's former chief financial officer, that Enron would buy back the barges from Merrill after six months.

That made the deal, according to prosecutors, a scheme to bolster earnings and hide debt for Enron, rather than a legal transaction.

"We are hopeful that the decision to grant bail for Mr. Fuhs reflects the court's judgment that the claim we made for Mr. Bayly has merit," Mr. Robbins said. Mr. Bayly is serving 30 months at a prison in Virginia.

Possible Snag In An Enron Case (WSJ)

By John R. Emshwiller

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

In the middle of its capstone criminal trial of former Enron Corp. top executives, the federal government has been dealt a possible setback in a related case involving the 2004 conviction of four former executives of Merrill Lynch & Co.

A federal appeals court yesterday ordered that bail be given to former Merrill executive William Fuhs, pending its ruling on the appeal of his conviction in the "Nigerian Barge" case. David Spears, one of Mr. Fuhs's attorneys, said he took the ruling as a hopeful sign that the court, which recently heard oral arguments in the case, will overturn the conviction.

In the 2004 criminal trial, involving the four former Merrill officials and two former Enron officials, the government alleged that Enron had falsely reported income from a bogus sale to Merrill of some electricity-producing barges off the coast of Nigeria. Prosecutors argued that Enron had secretly promised Merrill that it would be quickly taken out of the deal at a profit, which meant a "true sale" never took place because the brokerage giant assumed no risk. The jury also convicted one Enron official and acquitted the other.

The four Merrill officials appealed their convictions and unsuccessfully sought to stay out of prison pending those appeals. All four are currently incarcerated. Only Mr. Fuhs recently reapplied for bail pending the appeal. Attorneys for the other three Merrill officials declined to comment or couldn't be reached.

A Justice Department spokeswoman declined to comment.

People familiar with the barge case say that even if Mr. Fuhs's conviction were overturned, it wouldn't necessarily mean the others would be, too.

The government's biggest Enron case is currently unfolding in a Houston federal court, where the company's former chairman, Kenneth Lay, and former president, Jeffrey Skilling, face conspiracy and fraud charges. Prosecutors rested their case earlier this week, and the trial is scheduled to resume Monday with the defense beginning its presentation.

Skilling Lawyer Could Be Key For Lay, Too (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

HOUSTON, March 30 -- Daniel M. Petrocelli is no stranger to the national stage. But he's more at home representing entertainers such as Lisa Marie Presley and John Travolta than defending former corporate executives trying to stay out of prison.

The California attorney is acting as a criminal defense lawyer for the first time, on behalf of former Enron Corp. chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling, accused of leading one of the most complicated white-collar conspiracies in history.

And as the defense prepares to begin its case Monday, Petrocelli has emerged as perhaps the most potent factor on behalf of both his client and former chairman Kenneth L. Lay. Both men face multiple fraud charges that could send them to prison for decades.

There are two teams of defense lawyers, but during the prosecution's case, Petrocelli dominated the cross-examination of the government's witnesses, in part because Lay's top lawyer had health problems.

Defense lawyers are engaging in careful choreography in a trial where their clients' interests sometimes converge and sometimes conflict. In the course of the nine-week-old trial, the defendants have displayed a few subtle disruptions in their alliance. But to the surprise of some legal experts, Skilling and Lay have stuck together for the most part, despite acute differences in their personal styles and in the evidence against them.

The critical question is whether they will point fingers at each other when they each take the witness stand in coming weeks. Of the approximately two dozen witnesses the defense expects to call, the defendants are far and away the most important. In a real sense, their lives are in their own hands.

The 52-year-old Skilling, who led day-to-day operations at Enron for years, will testify as soon as the week of April 10. Lay, 63, will take the stand shortly thereafter, defense lawyers said. In between, their defense teams will call lesser-known Enron employees to support their arguments that Enron was not a "house of cards" but rather a "shining star," as Petrocelli argued in opening statements.

"We're looking forward to getting on the stand and getting our case out there, get the positive case out," Lay told reporters earlier this week. His lawyer, Michael W. Ramsey, predicted Thursday that Lay will be his own star witness in a performance that "will win the case for us."

Skilling has remained silent, on the advice of his lawyers. They said they would do nothing to alter the demeanor of their client, who is known for his bluntness, in advance of his turn on the witness stand.

On cross-examination, prosecutors are likely to press both men about their knowledge of Enron's financial troubles in August 2001, as Skilling departed and handed the reins to Lay. Skilling probably also will face questions about inconsistencies in more than 2,000 pages of sworn testimony he gave to the Securities and Exchange Commission and to Congress, including the reasons he sold a half-million shares of Enron stock that September.

The defendants say they are operating at a disadvantage because important potential witnesses, including former retail unit leader Lou Pai, former treasurer Jeffrey McMahon, onetime vice chairman Lawrence "Greg" Whalley and former trading chief John Lavorato, have signaled they will invoke their Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination rather than testify.

That leaves defense lawyers relying on documents and on such figures as Joannie Williamson, a former subordinate in the investor relations unit who went on to work for Lay. Williamson, who is scheduled to be the defense's first witness Monday, is likely to tell jurors that she heard her friend Mark E. Koenig say he did nothing wrong at the company but pleaded guilty anyway under government pressure.

That appears to contradict testimony by former investor relations head Koenig and supports a key defense argument: that company insiders did not believe they were breaking the law at the time, only coming to view their activity in that light under pressure from federal investigations. The conspiracy counts against Lay and Skilling are based on the notion that they were in league with 16 other Enron executives who have acknowledged that what they did was wrong. So defense lawyers are attacking the credibility of those pleas.

Each defendant will be allowed to call up to five character witnesses, a limit U.S. District Judge Simeon T. Lake III said is designed to avoid jurors listening to the "whole panoply of Houston society." Lay had hoped to call the owner of the Houston Astros baseball team, a pioneering heart surgeon, a former Commerce Department secretary and several religious leaders. Expert witnesses also will testify on the defendants' behalf. In part because he is backed by a vast team of partners, associates, paralegals and researchers from his 1,000-lawyer firm, O'Melveny & Myers LLP, and more than $23 million in fees from his client, Petrocelli and his team have taken the lead for the defense.

Ramsey, the lead lawyer for Lay, has somewhat fewer resources at his disposal, relying on a team composed of Dallas securities lawyer Bruce W. Collins, prominent Houston appeals court specialist George "Mac" Secrest and former local prosecutor Chip B. Lewis. In his four-decade career, Ramsey, a folksy litigator who bonds with local juries, has pulled out a series of victories, including a 2003 acquittal of real estate heir Robert Durst. Durst was accused of killing his neighbor, dismembering the body and throwing it into the Gulf of Mexico.

On Lay's behalf, Ramsey has pursued a bold, all-or-nothing strategy, arguing that Lay should not be held criminally responsible for the failure of his business nor the optimistic statements he made in an effort to save it. In essence, the defense suggests that focusing on the positive to calm employees and the markets is common practice, even a duty, of corporate leaders. "Do you want a Chicken Little at the helm of a company like Enron, every time it rains a little bit, saying, 'Oh, my God. The sky is falling?' " Ramsey asked in opening statements. "You want somebody with a steady hand on the helm, with guts enough to stay steady in the midst of a storm."

Ramsey revealed Tuesday that he had had heart problems since at least the third week of the trial and that he had a stent put in one of his arteries last week. He had questioned fewer than a half-dozen of the 22 government witnesses before the surgery.

As a result, the bonds between the Skilling and Lay defense teams grew stronger, as Petrocelli handled the heavy lifting, including most of last week's cross-examination of former treasurer Ben F. Glisan Jr., even though Glisan provided more testimony about Lay than Skilling.

Petrocelli acknowledged the point, noting that he was asking about a key internal meeting more than two weeks after Skilling resigned and Lay took over. The defense lawyer said he hoped he was not encroaching on his co-counsel's turf. But the Lay team didn't object. "That's okay," Lay mouthed to his daughter, Elizabeth Vittor, a lawyer who is part of his defense team and who typically sits between Lay and Skilling at the defense table.

Perhaps most important, Petrocelli has won the confidence of Lake, who told the defense lawyer last month that "you're making a pretty good showing for yourself" in his first attempt at criminal defense.

Until the eight-woman, four-man jury renders its verdict, it is difficult to know how jurors are evaluating the lawyers. Petrocelli's personal style is more Century City than Old West, despite the black alligator cowboy boots he has taken to wearing. In an episode known as "cologne-gate" among trial participants, a female juror took the unusual step of sending a note to the judge last month saying she was overwhelmed by the lawyer's cologne. During a court break, Petrocelli washed off the cologne and has not worn it since.

Outside the courthouse Tuesday, after prosecutors rested their case, Petrocelli jokingly hinted at his desire to return to his roots. "Five or six weeks from now, hopefully we can get through with this, Mr. Skilling can get on with the rest of his life, and I can take off these cowboy boots," he said.

Shocks Seen In New Math For Pensions (NYT)

By Mary Williams Walsh

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

The board that writes accounting rules for American business is proposing a new method of reporting pension obligations that is likely to show that many companies have a lot more debt than was obvious before.

In some cases, particularly at old industrial companies like automakers, the newly disclosed obligations are likely to be so large that they will wipe out the net worth of the company.

DOJ_NMG_0024714

The panel, the Financial Accounting Standards Board, said the new method, which it plans to issue today for public comment, would address a widespread complaint about the current pension accounting method: that it exposes shareholders and employees to billions of dollars in risks that they cannot easily see or evaluate. The new accounting rule would also apply to retirees' health plans and other benefits.

A member of the accounting board, George Batavick, said, "We took on this project because the current accounting standards just don't provide complete information about these obligations."

The board is moving ahead with the proposed pension changes even as Congress remains bogged down on much broader revisions of the law that governs company pension plans. In fact, Representative John A. Boehner, Republican of Ohio and the new House majority leader, who has been a driving force behind pension changes in Congress, said yesterday that he saw little chance of a finished bill before a deadline for corporate pension contributions in mid-April.

Congress is trying to tighten the rules that govern how much money companies are to set aside in advance to pay for benefits. The accounting board is working with a different set of rules that govern what companies tell investors about their retirement plans.

The new method proposed by the accounting board would require companies to take certain pension values they now report deep in the footnotes of their financial statements and move the information onto their balance sheets — where all their assets and liabilities are reflected. The pension values that now appear on corporate balance sheets are almost universally derided as of little use in understanding the status of a company's retirement plan.

Mr. Batavick of the accounting board said the new rule would also require companies to measure their pension funds' values on the same date they measure all their other corporate obligations. Companies now have delays as long as three months between the time they calculate their pension values and when they measure everything else. That can yield misleading results as market fluctuations change the values.

"Old industrial, old economy companies with heavily unionized work forces" would be affected most sharply by the new rule, said Janet Pegg, an accounting analyst with Bear, Stearns. A recent report by Ms. Pegg and other Bear, Stearns analysts found that the companies with the biggest balance-sheet changes were likely to include General Motors, Ford, Verizon, BellSouth and General Electric.

Using information in the footnotes of Ford's 2005 financial statements, Ms. Pegg said that if the new rule were already in effect, Ford's balance sheet would reflect about $20 billion more in obligations than it now does. The full recognition of health care promised to Ford's retirees accounts for most of the difference. Ford now reports a net worth of $14 billion. That would be wiped out under the new rule. Ford officials said they had not evaluated the effect of the new accounting rule and therefore could not comment.

Applying the same method to General Motors' balance sheet suggests that if the accounting rule had been in effect at the end of 2005, there would be a swing of about $37 billion. At the end of 2005, the company reported a net worth of $14.6 billion. A G.M. spokesman declined to comment, noting that the new accounting rule had not yet been issued.

Many complaints about the way obligations are now reported revolve around the practice of spreading pension figures over many years. Calculating pensions involves making many assumptions about the future, and at the end of every year there are differences between the assumptions and what actually happened. Actuaries keep track of these differences in a running balance, and incorporate them into pension calculations slowly.

That practice means that many companies' pension disclosures do not yet show the full impact of the bear market of 2000-3, because they are easing the losses onto their books a little at a time. The new accounting rule will force them to bring the pension values up to date immediately, and use the adjusted numbers on their balance sheets.

Not all companies would be adversely affected by the new rule. A small number might even see improvement in their balance sheets. One appears to be Berkshire Hathaway. Even though its pension fund has a shortfall of $501 million, adjusting the numbers on its balance sheet means reducing an even larger shortfall of $528 million that the company recognized at the end of 2005.

Berkshire Hathaway's pension plan differs from that of many other companies because it is invested in assets that tend to be less volatile. Its assumptions about investment returns are also lower, and it will not have to make a big adjustment for earlier-year losses when the accounting rule takes effect. Berkshire also looks less indebted than other companies because it does not have retiree medical plans.

Mr. Batavick said he did not know what kind of public comments to expect, but hoped to have a final standard completed by the third quarter of the year. Companies would then be expected to use it for their 2006 annual reports. The rule will also apply to nonprofit institutions like universities and museums, as well as privately held companies.

The rule would not have any effect on corporate profits, only on the balance sheets. The accounting board plans to make additional pension accounting changes after this one takes effect. Those are expected to affect the bottom line and could easily be more contentious.

Pity The Boss, Treated Worse Than Terrorists (NYT)

By Floyd Norris
The New York Times, March 31, 2006

PITY the oppressed boss.

Suddenly there is a wave of sympathy for overregulated corporate executives. Not only are some going to jail, but the Securities and Exchange Commission is making them pay large fines.

The S.E.C. also wants to force more disclosure of executive compensation. The commission denies that the purpose is to hold down pay, but few bosses believe that.

To hear some people tell it, corporate officials are being victimized in ways that can only inspire sympathy.

The United States Chamber of Commerce is calling on the S.E.C. to stop penalizing companies for refusing to cooperate in investigations and to give companies a break if they can show that some lawyer or accountant blessed the activity the S.E.C. deems illegal.

A new book by John Hasnas, a Georgetown professor who teaches ethics to business students, is called "Trapped: When Acting Ethically Is Against the Law," and concludes we would be better off if there were no criminal enforcement of laws requiring businesses to be honest.

The book, published by the Cato Institute, features the following endorsement by Mark R. Levin, a radio talk show host: "Did you know that in many ways the terrorists detained at Guantánamo Bay have more rights than corporate C.E.O.'s and their employees?"

The book is not as ridiculous as the blurb. Mr. Hasnas does a good job of explaining the current state of criminal law for corporations, which have no Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination, as well as Justice Department policies that offer leniency only to companies that cooperate by turning in employees.

KPMG, the accounting firm, escaped prosecution only by admitting wrongdoing and cutting off defense funds for its former partners accused of wrongdoing. "We pressure the company to be part of the prosecution team," said Mr. Hasnas, thus violating the company's ethical responsibilities to employees who may be innocent.

He conceded that his remedy — halting criminal prosecutions — might go too far. But he said he wanted to be provocative.

As for that blurb by Mr. Levin, Mr. Hasnas said it was solicited by Cato, and was not his business. Does he agree? "It is not just an exaggeration," he said. "It is clearly wrong."

Just four years ago, as WorldCom was collapsing, President Bush endorsed "corporate responsibility" and signed the Sarbanes-Oxley act with vigor. One poll then found that about two-thirds of both Democrats and Republicans thought business leaders had low standards of honesty and ethics. Politicians and even journalists received better marks.

But now many people hope to push aside the Sarbanes-Oxley reforms.

An S.E.C. advisory committee thinks bosses of companies traded on the over-the-counter bulletin board should not be asked to say whether their internal controls are adequate.

LAWYERS including Kenneth W. Starr — of Whitewater fame — are pushing a suit to declare unconstitutional the law's way of regulating accountants.

And some hope the S.E.C. itself, under Christopher Cox, will rein in the enforcement division. They were encouraged when Mr. Cox publicly chastised the enforcement director, Linda C. Thomsen, for subpoenaing journalists without commission approval. It is not that they like journalists, it is just that they would love to see the commissioners voting on every subpoena, offering opportunities to delay and derail investigations.

Next year, when both named authors of the Sarbanes-Oxley act will be out of Congress, there is likely to be a legislative push. It will be called an effort to reduce the cost of compliance with Sarbanes-Oxley, but don't be surprised if the real goal is to make life easier for those who would bend or break the rules.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Ex-FBI Agent Indicted In Mob Killings (AP)

By TOM HAYS
AP, March 30, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0024716

NEW YORK (AP) — A retired FBI agent was indicted on murder charges Thursday for allegedly taking bribes from a mobster to supply him with inside information that led to four underworld slayings in Brooklyn.

R. Lindley DeVecchio, 65, was arrested in a case of "confidential leaks, payoffs and death" dating back two decades, District Attorney Charles Hynes said.

DeVecchio pleaded not guilty and was released on $1 million bail. He did not speak at his arraignment. One of the two alleged mob hitmen behind the slayings was jailed without bail. The other was in Florida, awaiting extradition.

Colleagues of the FBI veteran were quick to defend him against the charges.

"We all know Lin, and we all know he's not capable of doing these kinds of things," James Kossler, a former supervisor with the FBI's New York office, said Wednesday. "It's so sad it could happen to a guy like this."

Hynes said the charges stemmed from the unusually close relationship between DeVecchio — then head of the FBI's Colombo crime family squad — and Gregory Scarpa Sr., a government informant and Colombo captain nicknamed "The Grim Reaper."

The pair met each week during the 1980s and '90s and discussed a bloody civil war within the Colombo family. In exchange for bribes, DeVecchio "counseled Scarpa to protect himself by eliminating imminent threats," Hynes said.

In 1984, DeVecchio allegedly warned Scarpa that the girlfriend of a high-ranking Colombo figure was cooperating with federal authorities. As a result, authorities say, she was shot and killed in a Brooklyn social club — a pattern prosecutors said was repeated in three slayings of Scarpa rivals, the last one in 1992.

Scarpa gave DeVecchio weekly payments and also enhanced the agent's reputation within the FBI by helping him solve important cases, Hynes said.

DeVecchio surrendered Wednesday night at the Brooklyn district attorney's office. He had no comment as he entered.

Kossler, former FBI Assistant Director James Kallstrom, ex-agent Joe Pistone, known for infiltrating the mob as Donnie Brasco, and other supporters in law enforcement have begun raising money for DeVecchio's defense on a Web site.

The site notes that the agent was cleared in previous investigations, and it attributes the renewed allegations to convicted mobsters eager to lie in exchange for leniency.

DeVecchio retired in 1996. Scarpa died in prison in 1994.

Retired F.B.I. Agent Is Accused Of Role In Killings (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

When R. Lindley DeVecchio, a 65-year-old retired F.B.I. supervisor, stood up in a courtroom in Brooklyn yesterday to face charges that he had helped his prized Mafia informant commit four murders, the tension was clear.

On one side of the gallery, filling roughly two-thirds of the blond wood benches, were nearly four dozen mostly gray-haired men in dark-colored suits. Retired F.B.I. agents who had once been Mr. DeVecchio's colleagues, they were now his supporters. Most sat stiffly upright and spoke little.

In front of them, at the prosecution table in the well of the courtroom, sat two somber senior prosecutors from the office of the Brooklyn district attorney, Charles J. Hynes. Mr. Hynes, after a 13-month investigation, had hours earlier announced the indictment of Mr. DeVecchio on charges that he had helped his informant commit four mob murders in the 1980's and early 1990's, accepting weekly payoffs totaling more than $66,000.

Also in the gallery were several more prosecutors and investigators who had worked on the case.

After Mr. DeVecchio's lawyer entered a plea of not guilty on his behalf, one of the prosecutors, Michael F. Vecchione, who is the chief of the district attorney's investigations division, outlined the charges in the case. Mr. Hynes had said the investigation had "uncovered a troubling path of confidential leaks, payoffs and death," and he called the case "the most stunning example of official corruption that I have ever seen."

Mr. Vecchione, in arguing against bail for Mr. DeVecchio, went through each of the murders, detailing for State Supreme Court Justice Gustin L. Reichbach what he said was Mr. DeVecchio's direct role and his reasons for "instructing" his informant, Gregory Scarpa Sr., to commit the killings.

In most of the cases, including the slaying of another mobster's former girlfriend, Mary Bari, the prosecutor said, it was because the victims had begun talking to the authorities and posed a threat to Mr. Scarpa or his relatives. Mr. Scarpa, who contracted AIDS from a transfusion and died in prison in 1994, was a captain in the Colombo crime family.

But it was Mr. Vecchione's argument that former F.B.I. agents had sought to intimidate witnesses on Mr. DeVecchio's behalf, and his contention that a network of former agents who had once worked overseas made him a flight risk, that transformed the hard-fought argument into a pitched battle with the defense.

The contention that the former agents would help Mr. DeVecchio flee prompted groans, angry grumbling and some laughter from retired agents in the gallery.

And Mr. DeVecchio's lawyer, Douglas E. Grover, belittled Mr. Vecchione, contending that his office was unaccustomed to making organized crime cases, a charge Mr. Vecchione sharply disputed.

Mr. DeVecchio is charged with four counts of second-degree murder for acting in concert in the killings and could face a sentence of up to 25 years to life.

Wearing a gray checked button-down shirt with the collar open and dark slacks, Mr. DeVecchio did not speak during the hourlong hearing and sat impassively. Mr. Grover called him an honest lawman who had played a key role in the bureau's battle against organized crime.

Ultimately, Justice Reichbach released Mr. DeVecchio on $1 million bail, co-signed by 5 of the 45 former agents who Mr. Grover said were willing to step forward. The judge ordered that Mr. DeVecchio surrender his passport and that his movements in and out of his home in Sarasota, Fla., be monitored with an electronic bracelet.

One of two other defendants, John Sinagra, 38, an accused mob figure charged in one of the killings, pleaded not guilty and was held without bail pending a hearing on Monday. Another defendant, Craig Sobel, 39, was being held in Florida pending extradition.

After the bitter argument over Mr. DeVecchio's bail, the spectacular charges against him still resonated in the courtroom, though some of the accusations first surfaced more than a decade ago, when fellow agents told their superiors of their suspicions that he was funneling secret information to Mr. Scarpa.

Internal investigations into those allegations by the F.B.I.'s Office of Professional Responsibility and prosecutors with the Department of Justice — inquiries that several former federal officials have criticized as deficient — failed to uncover enough evidence to charge Mr. DeVecchio with a crime or even to discipline him.

Mr. Hynes said his investigation began in February 2005 after a member of the House Judiciary Committee, William Delahunt, Democrat of Massachusetts, brought allegations involving Mr. DeVecchio to his attention. Mr. Delahunt was investigating allegations against F.B.I. agents involved in organized crime cases.

In the new case, one law enforcement official said the key witness was Linda Schiro, Mr. Scarpa's companion of many years. She knew details about the relationship between the gangster and the lawman because Mr. Scarpa had confided in her, and she was present for telephone calls and meetings between the men in which they discussed their crimes, the official said.

Mr. Grover cited her at the arraignment and dismissed her testimony, saying that during the earlier inquiries she had said she knew nothing about the murders. He quoted her as saying then, "I stay out of the kitchen," a reference to the room in Mr. Scarpa's Brooklyn home where Mr. DeVecchio and his informant had their weekly meetings.

But another law enforcement official said that Ms. Schiro has reported that during the earlier investigation she felt intimidated by other F.B.I. agents who were associated with Mr. DeVecchio. Both law enforcement officials were given anonymity because the investigation is continuing. Mr. Grover also said at the arraignment that transcripts of testimony by several Colombo family turncoats in trials during the 1990's contradicted the theories about Mr. DeVecchio's role in the murders.

The killings detailed by Mr. Vecchione began in 1984, with the slaying of Ms. Bari, 31, the former girlfriend of a fugitive mob figure. She was shot to death by Mr. Scarpa and others in his Brooklyn social club after Mr. DeVecchio warned him that she was talking to the authorities and might reveal the whereabouts of her former boyfriend, Mr. Vecchione said.

In 1987, prosecutors said, Mr. DeVecchio provided information that led to the killing of a Colombo soldier, Joseph DeDomenico. The agent told Mr. Scarpa that Mr. DeDomenico was using drugs, committing crimes without sharing the proceeds with Mr. Scarpa and flirting with born-again Christianity, all of them lapses that Mr. DeVecchio said made him a threat, the prosecutor said.

Two years later, a group of teenagers — including Mr. Scarpa's son Joseph — were joyriding on Halloween when one of them shot and killed 17-year-old Dominick Masseria after a fight that started over thrown eggs, according to the indictment.

Mr. Masseria had no ties to organized crime, and prosecutors concede that Mr. DeVecchio had no role in his death. But when Patrick Porco, 18, one of the youngsters in the car, was interviewed by the police about the killing in 1990, Mr. DeVecchio warned Mr. Scarpa that Mr. Porco posed a threat to Joseph, the prosecutor said. So Mr. Porco, too, was killed. Mr. Sinagra was charged yesterday with that crime.

The last killing, on May 22, 1992, was part of the bloody Colombo war of that era. Mr. Vecchione said Mr. DeVecchio, using information he gleaned from his agents' surveillance of a Scarpa rival, Lorenzo Lampasi, told Mr. Scarpa that Mr. Lampasi would get out of his car before dawn each morning to lock a gate when he left his home, leaving him vulnerable to attack.

Before the hearing yesterday, Chris Mattiace, 58, who worked with Mr. DeVecchio for 25 years and was one of the retired agents who later crowded into the courtroom, said: "We don't believe it. We believe in him. We believe that the charges are frivolous."

But members of Mr. Masseria's family, who attended the district attorney's news conference, took a different view. Even though Mr. DeVecchio was not charged in the young man's killing, they suggested that suspicions that the retired supervisor had a role in the Porco killing had kept the truth from coming to light. "If we can't trust the F.B.I., who can we trust," said Dorothy Garuccio, a sister of Mr. Masseria.

Ex-FBI Agent Suspected Of NY Mob Ties Indicted On Murder Charges (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, March 31, 2006

NEW YORK -- Ex-FBI agent Roy Lindley DeVecchio, once a major force in the agency's fight against the mob, was indicted by a Brooklyn grand jury Thursday on charges he engineered four gangland killings involving the Colombo crime family.

After spending a night in custody, DeVecchio, 65, was freed late Thursday afternoon on $1 million bail by Brooklyn Supreme Court Justice Gustin Reichbach after he entered a plea of not guilty to second degree murder charges.

Calling the case the most "stunning example of official corruption I have ever seen," Brooklyn District Attorney Charles Hynes outlined at a news conference how DeVecchio allegedly provided Colombo crime family member Greg Scarpa with information about rivals and informants who were murdered between September 1984 and May 1992.

"Each of the informants and rivals exposed by DeVecchio posed an imminent threat to Scarpa, Scarpa's family and Scarpa's crew," said Hynes.

Among the four people killed were Mary Bari, 31, girlfriend of Colombo crime family consiglieri Alphonse Persico, the brother of then-crime family boss Carmine Persico, said Hynes. Bari was killed after DeVecchio told Scarpa that "the beautiful woman" was speaking to federal officials about the location of Alphonse, who was on the lam, said Hynes.

According to Hynes, DeVecchio told Scarpa that Bari should "be taken care of." She was shot and killed on Sept. 25, 1984.

Another slaying, that of Dominick Masseria, 17, who was gunned down by Scarpa's teenage son Joseph and two others because of a Halloween night egg-throwing incident, sparked another killing that the indictment tied to DeVecchio, said Hynes.

One of the suspected slayers of Masseria, Dominick Porco, was fingered by DeVecchio as talking to police about the Masseria slaying. Investigators say Porco was shot dead in May 1990 by mob associate John Sinagra, who was also charged and has pleaded not guilty.

Earlier, defense attorney Douglas Grover said the prosecution was resurrecting stale allegations that had been discredited in earlier federal probes.

"The district attorney of Kings County doesn't know what they are getting into when they get into these organized crime cases," said Grover.

As DeVecchio was arraigned Thursday, more than 40 retired FBI agents filled the courtroom as a show of support for their old colleague. When executive assistant district attorney Michael Vecchione suggested the network of former agents could help DeVecchio flee, a loud collective groan went up in the courtroom.

Reichbach was concerned about the possibility that DeVecchio, who lives in Florida, might flee but was convinced by Grover to grant the ex-agent $1 million bail, secured by $100,000 cash from DeVecchio's brother. Five former FBI agents also signed on the bond, as did DeVecchio, who embraced his old colleagues after he made bail.

G-man Denies Errands For Mob (NYDN)

By Nancie L. Katz, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, March 31, 2006

An ex-FBI agent pleaded not guilty yesterday to charges he helped a Mafia informer carry out four murders - even as sources said he could soon be linked to more mob slayings.

Brooklyn District Attorney Charles Hynes called the case of retired G-man Lindley DeVecchio "the most stunning example of official corruption I have ever seen."

"Four people were murdered with the help of a federal law enforcement agent who was charged with keeping them safe," Hynes said after the indictment against DeVecchio was unsealed in Brooklyn Supreme Court. "The allegations are pretty shocking."

DeVecchio, 65, pleaded not guilty at his arraignment, where prosecutor Michael Vecchione argued he should be jailed without bail.

But a judge released him on $1 million bond after DeVecchio agreed to submit to electronic monitoring.

If a jury finds him guilty, DeVecchio, who spent 33 years with FBI, could easily spend the rest of his days behind bars.

Hynes said his investigation was ongoing, including allegations that the DeVecchio took "weekly payoffs" from Scarpa - the agent's prize Mafia informant from 1980 to 1992, when he led an elite FBI-NYPD squad that specialized in the mob.

In exchange, Hynes said, DeVecchio provided Scarpa with "detailed confidential information about law enforcement ... and [about] criminal rivals."

The murder victims were identified as Mafia moll Mary Bari, 31, shot dead in 1984; Colombo family cohort Joseph DeDomenico, killed in 1987; 18-year-old Patrick Porco, an suspected informant killed in 1990, and businessman Lorenzo (Larry) Lampesi, 66, a mob associate gunned down in May 1992.

"Each rival presented a threat to Scarpa, to Scarpa's family and Scarpa's crew," Hynes said.

Sources told The Daily News yesterday that DeVecchio could face charges in as many as three other gangland murders, two of them on Long Island.

The slayings are believed to be tied to a intra-clan conflict that decimated the Colombo family in the early 1990s, the source said.

"This is only one little piece in Brooklyn," a source said. "There are murders involved in Nassau County. There were murders in other areas."

In one case, a convicted felon has confessed to two slayings for which three other men may have been wrongly convicted, the source said.

The indictment announced yesterday caps years of investigations, including a 1996 Justice Department probe that found "insufficient evidence" to charge DeVecchio.

Hynes also announced the arrests of two Colombo family associates in the slayings of Porco and Dominick Masseria, who was gunned down in 1989. John Sinagra, 38, was charged with killing Masseria, and Porco's killer was identified as Craig Sobel, 41.

In a courtroom packed with former FBI agents who gathered to support DeVecchio, defense lawyer Douglas Grover called the charges "nonsense." He said his client was an honest investigator who played a key role in the war on organized crime.

DeVecchio "was and always will be a man of the law," he added.

Retired FBI agent Chris Mattiace, who worked with DeVecchio for 25 years, said: "We believe in him. We believe the charges are frivolous."

In an exclusive interview with The News as he flew from his Florida home to New York Wednesday, DeVecchio said the charges were a mystery to him.

"Maybe you can tell me what it's all about," he told a reporter.

Dead guys & a gal

MARY BARI, 31

Drop-dead gorgeous lover of a top Colombo crime family mobster was shot and killed by Greg Scarpa and pals at a Brooklyn social club on Sept. 25, 1984, after FBI agent Lindley DeVecchio allegedly told Scarpa she was a paid FBI informant.

JOSEPH (JOE BREWSTER) DeDOMENICO, 45

Colombo wiseguy was shot dead on Sept. 17, 1987, by Scarpa-led hit team after DeVecchio convinced Scarpa he was a threat because he had been using drugs, committing secret burglaries and not sharing the booty - and dating a born-again Christian.

PATRICK PORCO, 18

Pal of Scarpa's son Joseph was shot dead by John Sinagra in May 1990 after DeVecchio allegedly told the elder Scarpa the teen was telling cops about his son's involvement in the 1989 murder of Dominick Masseria, 17.

LORENZO (Larry) LAMPESI, 66

Associate of rival Colombo family faction whom Scarpa wanted dead. He was shot nine times on May 22, 1992, on the driveway of his Brooklyn home after DeVecchio provided Scarpa with his whereabouts based on FBI surveillance information.

PROBERS BARE 'MOB MOLE' MOTIVE

HE DIDN'T just do it for the money. FBI hotshot Lindley DeVecchio was indicted yesterday on charges he traded secrets with a murderous Mafia chieftain for more than a decade - a relationship he built primarily so he could burnish his own rising star within the Justice Department, investigators revealed.

That was the portrait Brooklyn prosecutors painted when un veiling sensational charges that DeVecchio, 65, was a double agent for the mob.

He is accused of participat ing in four gangland murders and selling inside information to protect their brutal empire. Sources say that every week, DeVecchio visited the Brook lyn home of Gregory Scarpa Sr., the Colombo family's ruth less acting boss who was also a celebrated FBI informant.

DeVecchio allegedly was given an envelope stuffed with cash - sometimes with his own agents sitting in the house in another room.

He is suspected of receiving hundreds of thousands of dollars - and keeping another $66,598 in FBI informant funds that was earmarked to pay Scarpa.

"He received a weekly stipend," Michael Vecchione, the head of Brooklyn District Attorney Joe Hynes' investigations bureau, said at DeVecchio's arraignment yesterday in Brooklyn Supreme Court.

"But there was also his desire to feather his own nest within the FBI to rise to greater prominence."

DeVecchio "was dealing with one of the premier informants in the history of the FBI," one source said, referring to Scarpa's incredible role working with the bureau to solve two 1960s civil-rights murder mysteries, including the 1964 murder of three civil-rights activists in Mississippi.

Hynes, at a press conference claiming that DeVecchio would receive a treasure trove of mob secrets if Scarpa filled the Colombos' No. 2 spot, said, "There was the expectation on the part of DeVecchio that maybe, someday, Scarpa might become [the permanent] underboss." And along the way, DeVecchio became so enamored of the mob that he went from a mild-mannered "country bumpkin" to a flashy, double-breasted-suit-wearing G-man who adopted the swagger and patter of the hoods he was supposed to police, Hynes said.

DeVecchio, who retired in 1996 and lives in Sarasota, Fla., appeared tanned but tired as he stood before Judge Gustin Reichbach, in the same black slacks and light buttoned shirt and black shoes he wore the night before when he flew to the Big Apple and surrendered to authorities.

The courtroom seats were packed with DeVecchio's supporters and former FBI colleagues, who could be heard voicing their annoyance as prosecutors laid out the allegations that he succumbed to the venal temptations of hoodlums such as Scarpa.

DeVecchio's lawyer, Douglas Grover, blasted the DA's "new evidence as old evidence - and it is false evidence."

He was referring to a previous FBI internal probe a decade ago, when corruption allegations first surfaced against DeVecchio.

He entered a "not guilty" plea to the charges, which Reichbach described as "shocking."

The judge denied the prosecutors' request that DeVecchio be remanded to prison, and instead granted an extraordinary bail package of $100,000.

The bail will be guaranteed by five former FBI colleagues of DeVecchio's, who will ultimately be responsible for $1 million if he flees.

The judge also ordered DeVecchio to wear a monitoring device before releasing him.

DeVecchio was then trailed by reporters who chased him into a nearby parking garage seeking comment, which he did not provide.

Hynes said DeVecchio was directly involved in four killings:

* The brutal 1984 slaying of Mary Bari - ex-girlfriend of Colombo power Alphonse "Allie Boy" Persico - who they feared was ratting them out.

* The 1990 execution of Patrick Porco, 18, who was suspected of carrying out another homicide along with Scarpa's stepson.

* The 1987 slaying of Joseph DeDomenico, who DeVecchio said was keeping money from Scarpa.

Sources said that one Friday night, DeDomenico, who was also known as Joe Brewster, led a gang of robbers who specialized in breaking into banks. The robbers were able to remain inside for the weekend.

They positioned one member as a lookout and used another merely to run out for food to sustain the rest of the mob.

The gang wielded sophisticated tools and blowtorches to free from their wall moorings an entire unit of safe-deposit boxes.

Once the bank of boxes toppled on the floor, effectively exposing the rear of every receptacle, they easily scooped out the riches of cash, jewels and other valuables from inside.

They found the World Series ring belonging to Yankees Hall of Fame pitcher Whitey Ford - and Scarpa had it returned to legendary hurler, the sources said.

The DA's seven-month probe produced 30 witnesses on both sides of the law, including FBI agents suspicious of DeVecchio who testified before the grand jury.

"The probe uncovered a troubling past of confidential leaks payoff and death, and has also led to the solving of several cold-case homicides," Hynes said.

The DA questioned how DeVecchio was able to get FBI funds to pay Scarpa without going through traditional channels that required the signatures of federal higher-ups.

He said his probe was continuing.

In addition to the charges leveled against DeVecchio, authorities believe he tipped off Scarpa back in 1987 that his mobster son, Gregory Jr., was about to be indicted by the feds on narcotics charges.

The inside info enabled the younger Scarpa to flee before the case was unsealed.

Scarpa Jr. remained on the lam for more than a year - apparently thanks to constant tips from DeVecchio - before finally being grabbed with his wife and child in a New Jersey motel by agents from the Drug Enforcement Administration, and not the FBI.

During the elder Scarpa's reign, he always appeared to be protected from law enforcement, serving only 30 days in jail for 10 arrests, including playing a key role in the theft of $4 million in stocks and bonds.

He was finally convicted of racketeering in 1994 - two years before he died of AIDS he contracted during emergency surgery for a bleeding ulcer.

United Press International, March 31, 2006

NEW YORK, March 30 (UPI) -- A retired FBI agent was charged Thursday in New York with feeding information to an organized crime boss that was used to kill four people.

R. Lindley DeVecchio was expected to be released on $1 million bail after his arraignment, The New York Times reported, combining $100,000 in cash with guarantees from five retired agents. About 45 of DeVecchio's former colleagues packed a courtroom in Brooklyn to support him.

Brooklyn District Attorney Charles Hynes said DeVecchio developed a close relationship with Gregory Scarpa Sr., a captain in the Colombo crime family. Scarpa died in 1994 in prison.

"This is the most stunning example of official corruption I have ever seen," Hynes said.

Hynes said his investigation began with information from a Massachusetts congressman who has been investigating FBI involvement with organized crime.

DeVecchio's supporters say he has already been exonerated by a Justice Department investigation.

2 Hit Man Suspects Reeled In (NYDN)

By WILLIAM SHERMAN, DAILY NEWS STAFF WRITER

New York Daily News, March 31, 2006

The other is a 41-year-old Florida charter fishing-boat captain with a Web site called reelfishy.com - a site that ultimately led to his capture.

"His first job is to love me, his second job is to kill people and any time you wanna die, just call me," a friend once screamed out in a bar, referring to fishing-boat captain Craig Sobel, according to a police report.

More than 16 years ago, Sobel and John Sinagra were young men involved with Brooklyn Mafia capo Greg Scarpa and his sons in the drugs and murder business, prosecutors say.

The two alleged hit men are embroiled in the case charging retired FBI agent Lindley DeVecchio with helping Scarpa murder mob rivals and informants.

Now Sobel and Sinagra are joined again in two seemingly senseless but inextricably related murder cases.

At 11:30 p.m. Halloween night 1989, Sobel allegedly killed Dominick Masseria, 18, with a shotgun in a driveby shooting, according to an indictment unsealed yesterday.

The gunshot - fired from a white limousine - was in retaliation for a minor fight two hours earlier between two groups of teenage boys throwing eggs at each other on a Bensonhurst street, prosecutors said.

Limo passenger Patrick Porco, 18, was picked up by detectives.

"I told him if he didn't talk, he'd be killed," Detective Al Lombardo recalled yesterday at the Brooklyn District Attorney's office.

"Porco started to cry, but he didn't talk," said Lombardo. "I told him again, 'You'll be killed,' but he never did [talk]."

Lombardo was right.

A few weeks later, Porco was shot five times in the head - allegedly by Sinagra, according to his indictment, also unsealed yesterday.

Sinagra was allegedly acting on orders from Greg Scarpa, who was told by DeVecchio that Porco was talking to the cops and would turn in Scarpa's son Joey, who was along for the limo ride, prosecutors say.

Sinagra, short and pudgy, was silent at his arraignment yesterday.

"He [Sinagra] was the ultimate wanna-be [Mafioso] who never could be," said Noel Downey, chief of the Brooklyn district attorney's Rackets Division, who is running the DeVecchio case. "The only way he [Sinagra] could be associated with Greg Scarpa was to kill for him."

Sinagra is half-Greek and could never become a made member of the Mafia.

But he did his best - he even married Scarpa's niece, according to investigators. The marriage broke up, he moved to Las Vegas and got a job with a limousine company.

"He's on Zoloft [antidepressant] and takes medication for high cholesterol," said his lawyer Joseph Giaramita, as his client was denied bail yesterday in Brooklyn Criminal Court.

Sobel was not in the courtroom. He was in a Hudson, Fla., jail cell, fighting extradition to New York.

He might never have been caught if not for his Web site. "I had his name, that's all, and Googled him and came up with the site," said Downey.

In the courtroom yesterday, there were eight people more anxious than anyone else to get a look at Sobel.

They were Dominick Masseria's family: his mother, three sisters, two nieces and two brothers-in-law.

"You know, they shot him right in front of Our Lady of Guadalupe Church [in Bensonhurst], that's where he went to grammar school," his ailing mother, Rose Marie Masseria, said yesterday.

"Dominick was never in any trouble, never in any drug gangs," said Joan Pistola, Dominick's sister. "He was working in a lumberyard on the corner where we lived."

He had just taken the NYPD test.

"After he died, we got a notice that he was accepted. He would have been a police officer, that's what he wanted," said Janet Tamborra, another sister of Dominick's.

"There won't be real closure until Sobel is sentenced - sentenced to the maximum," said Dorothy Garuccio, the third of Dominick's sisters.

Danton Serving Time in New Jersey Following Foiled Plan to Have Agent Killed

EAST ST. LOUIS, Ill. (March 30) - The U.S. government rejected the request by former NHL player Mike Danton to be transferred to his native Canada to serve a prison sentence for his foiled attempt to have his agent killed.

The move "would not serve the ends of justice," said the Justice Department.

The decision was made last week by the Justice Department's prisoner-transfer unit and revealed on Wednesday in federal court filings. It assures that Danton will for now remain inmate No. 10096-111 at a prison in Fort Dix, New Jersey.

When Danton was sentenced in 2004 to 7 1/2 years after pleading guilty to murder conspiracy charges, prosecutors agreed not to oppose Danton's deportation to Canada, where he said he wanted to get behind-bars surgical treatment for a shoulder injury and therapy for what his sentencing request called his "grave mental disorders."

Danton sued the U.S. government last November, contending that he unfairly has not been transferred to Canada. He asked to be resentenced.

The Justice Department countered that Danton waived his right to appeal by pleading guilty in July 2004 to orchestrating a conspiracy to commit an interstate killing targeting his agent, David Frost. The government also has insisted no regulations require action on international transfers within a specified time, and that Danton's deal did not require a transfer, only that he be considered for one.

In a letter dated March 24 to the Correctional Service of Canada, Paula Wolff - chief of the Justice Department's international prisoner-transfer unit - said the transfer bid was scuttled because it "would not serve the ends of justice and because of the seriousness of the offense."

Wolff wrote that Danton could reapply for transfer in two years, with that application "more likely to be approved in the future if the prisoner has maintained the best possible prison record and has attempted to address those reasons for denial over which the prisoner has some control." Wolff did not elaborate.

In September 2004, a federal jury acquitted American Katie Wolfmeyer, 19, of charges she took part in the plot.

F.B.I. To Investigate Red Cross Over Accusations Of Wrongdoing (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, March 30 — The F.B.I. office here will look into possible improprieties in the distribution of millions of dollars' worth of Red Cross relief supplies, the bureau's New Orleans chief said Thursday.

The Red Cross has already dismissed three volunteers in connection with the accusations, which center on charges that supplies were improperly diverted, felons were hired in the relief effort, and the organization's rules were not followed.

"We are going to launch a probe to surface the facts," said Jim Bernazzani, the special agent in charge in New Orleans for the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Mr. Bernazzani said the case would be investigated by the Katrina Fraud Task Force, a consolidated group of local, state and federal law enforcement agencies charged with looking into abuses in the continuing relief effort.

Accusations of wrongdoing were made by other Red Cross volunteers disturbed by what appeared to be misuse of agency supplies. Mr. McGuire, in his statement, urged any volunteers "who may have information" to come forward. He said that about $2 million in emergency financial assistance that was fraudulently obtained or mistakenly distributed had already been returned to the Red Cross.

Several Red Cross workers who first raised the issue of possible wrongdoing in the New Orleans operation said they were not only initially ignored, but also barred from further relief work. One accusation is that many more meals were ordered for a particular New Orleans neighborhood, Bywater, than were actually needed.

The American Red Cross, plagued by continuing controversy over its Hurricane Katrina relief effort, said yesterday that it is turning over to federal law enforcement officials results of its investigation into possible wrongdoing at a food and warehouse operation in New Orleans.

It also thanked volunteers who brought the matter to their attention.

"We've conducted a broad investigation, and we have seen enough to be able to turn it over to the FBI," said Jack McGuire, interim chief executive for the charity, which last week ousted three New Orleans volunteers after allegations surfaced that food and supplies for storm victims had been diverted.

But two Red Cross volunteers, who wrote a detailed report in December accusing New Orleans relief workers of operating a "rogue" operation using donated goods and equipment, said yesterday that they have already reported their findings to the FBI. And they expressed bitterness that the charity has not contacted them.

"I have not heard one word from the Red Cross -- not one word," said Jerome Nickerson, a Baltimore lawyer who, with partner Michael Wolters, looked into the operation at the request of the Red Cross last year before, they say, the charity forced them to stop. "This is nonsense."

McGuire declined to comment on Nickerson's and Wolters's claims but said that weeks ago the charity began a probe, whose results the FBI will get.

McGuire declined to say what that probe uncovered, but Nickerson said he and Wolters had found "rogue warehouses" in New Orleans filled with Red Cross supplies that they believed were being sold and that a Red Cross kitchen in New Orleans was ordering meals that clearly were not needed.

"I don't want to bash the Red Cross, because they do good for the people, but they need to change their practices and policies," said Wolters, a Wisconsin security guard. When he and Nickerson tried to investigate the New Orleans operation, he said, "the resistance from management and other workers there was just unbelievable."

The embattled charity has spent much of the last six months defending how it used $2.1 billion in donations it received for victims of hurricanes Katrina, Rita and Wilma.

Hurricane evacuees have complained that the charity's response was slow and chaotic. Minority groups are angry at the charity over its perceived poor treatment of blacks and Hispanics in shelters. Its management is in turmoil after the sudden departure of its chief executive in December. The Senate Finance Committee and the Louisiana attorney general are investigating. And Congress is considering overhauling the Red Cross's 105-year-old charter.

March 30 (Bloomberg) -- The American Red Cross said today the FBI will look into allegations of fraud stemming from the charity's work in the New Orleans area following Hurricane Katrina.

The Red Cross, the largest U.S. disaster-relief group, is investigating allegations that millions of dollars in supplies were diverted improperly during Hurricane Katrina relief efforts. The Federal Bureau of Investigation in New Orleans has agreed to take charge of all allegations of fraud and wrongdoing, the charity said.

``The Red Cross takes these allegations very seriously and is committed to being the best stewards of the donated dollar,'' Jack McGuire, interim Red Cross president and chief executive officer, said in a statement distributed by PR Newswire.

The American Red Cross was part of the Justice Department's Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force after the storm struck the U.S. Gulf Coast at the end of August. The charity said it is working with law enforcement groups to seek out and prosecute fraud, waste and abuse.

American Red Cross spokeswomen Devorah Goldburg and Carrie Martin didn't immediately return calls seeking comment.

Appeals Court Judges Mull Federal Death Penalty Request (AP)

By Daniel Yee
AP, March 31, 2006

ATLANTA - Lawyers for a man accused of killing a Florida deputy asked the 11th Circuit Court of Appeals Thursday to throw out the government's request for the death penalty, saying they were not given sufficient notice.

Jeffrey Lamken, an attorney for Kenneth Wilk, asked a three-judge panel to throw out the request because the government informed Wilk and his defense team it would seek the death penalty less than two months before Wilk's scheduled trial date last April.

"An indictment was released six months before the trial date, yet the Justice Department did not sign off on the death penalty," Lamken said.

Wilk, 43, is charged with killing Broward County sheriff's Deputy Todd Fatta, 33, by using a high-powered hunting rifle with a bullet that pierced the officer's protective vest when deputies raided Wilk's home in August 2004. A second deputy, Angelo Cedeno, was shot in the hand and lost a finger.

Federal law requires the government to inform defendants of its intent to seek the death penalty "a reasonable time before trial." In previous cases, the government has provided notice about 11 months before trial, Lamken said.

Assistant U.S. Attorney E.J. Yera told the panel the 58-day notice was sufficient. The government filed the request on Feb. 18, 2005. The trial had been set to open April 18, 2005. The trial is expected to be held after the panel issues its opinion.

Federal death penalty cases are not common. There are 43 federal inmates now on death row, but more than 3,300 nonfederal inmates were on death row in the 50 states as of January, according to the Washington-based Death Penalty Information Center.

Currently the government has 65 death penalty cases pending or in trial, said Kevin McNally of the Federal Death Penalty Resource Council in Frankfort, Ky.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales had to sign off on federal prosecutors' request for the death penalty in the Wilk case. Prosecutors previously listed 11 factors warranting Wilk's execution, including premeditation and his risk for causing future danger. The government has filed for the death penalty 10 times in Florida cases, has not won a death verdict from a jury.

A unanimous jury is required for a federal death verdict; a majority vote is sufficient in Florida's state death penalty cases. Wilk could face a murder charge in state court regardless of what happens in the federal case.

The anti-pornography task force of federal and local officers who raided Wilk's home didn't know of a Fort Lauderdale police computer notice warning officers "to use extreme caution" when approaching the house because of previous threats to officers and a ready-made SWAT raid plan.

Wilk once listed "hunting cops" as a hobby on an Internet profile, and city police had noted seeing rifles and handguns in the house. His partner, Kelly Ray Jones, already was jailed on pornography charges.

The government currently is seeking the death penalty against confessed al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui. A jury in Alexandria, Va., resumed deliberations Thursday in his case and must decide if Moussaoui is a terrorist responsible for the deaths of Americans on Sept. 11, 2001.

End Of The Affair Behind Unraveling Of DeLay's Team, A Jilted Fiancée (WSJ)

By Brody Mullins
The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0024725

WASHINGTON -- The engagement of Emily Miller and Michael Scanlon was supposed to mark the coming out of a new Washington power couple.

The two had met on Capitol Hill, where they worked as press secretaries to Rep. Tom DeLay, the feared Texas Republican. They got engaged in September 2001 on the beach in Santa Monica, Calif., and planned an August 2002 wedding. As the date approached, Mr. Scanlon bought a $4.7 million oceanside mansion and guest house, formerly part of the DuPont estate, in Rehoboth Beach, Del. He furnished it down to the monogrammed towels and presented it to his bride-to-be.

Then, with the wedding a few months away, he called off the engagement and started dating a 24-year-old waitress.

Mr. Scanlon and Ms. Miller, now both 35 years old, were among a tight-knit group of aides who helped Mr. DeLay rise to the pinnacle of Capitol Hill in the 1990s and cement his power as House majority leader. Some of those aides provided a link between their boss and Jack Abramoff, a Republican lobbyist.

The end of the engagement was part of that group's unraveling -- which has had significant consequences for official Washington. The aides have since turned on one another, feeding the ethics scandal surrounding Mr. Abramoff that now roils the capital. Mr. Abramoff has admitted he directed Native American clients to pay huge sums to Mr. Scanlon's public-relations firm. Mr. Scanlon secretly gave Mr. Abramoff half of his profits.

Prosecutors came to Ms. Miller to help them build a case that drove her ex-fiancé to plead guilty, according to a person familiar with the situation. Mr. Scanlon's testimony in turn helped force Mr. Abramoff into a guilty plea. Another former DeLay aide, Tony Rudy, has been cited by prosecutors in the investigation. Now Washington is wondering whether prosecutors will use testimony from Messrs. Scanlon and Rudy to go after Mr. DeLay, who has resigned as majority leader.

While Mr. Abramoff has become well-known as a symbol of the excesses of Washington influence-peddling, the story of the DeLay aides and their role in the scandal is less-known. People who have spoken to Ms. Miller say that after her breakup she began questioning how Mr. Scanlon could afford a lavish lifestyle while working summers as a beach lifeguard and doing seemingly little work at his public-relations firm. She talked about the beach house he had presented to her, the private jet he flew around in and the $17,000-a-month apartment he rented at the Ritz-Carlton in Washington. Prosecutors would later ask the same questions, and discover Mr. Abramoff's deals with the Indian tribes.

Ms. Miller, who hasn't been accused of wrongdoing, declined to comment through her attorney, Dan French, who said the "details of Ms. Miller's past personal life are not relevant to the criminal actions of Mr. Scanlon and Mr. Abramoff." Mr. Abramoff was sentenced this week in Florida to five years and 10 months in prison over fraud in a casino deal, but his ultimate prison term won't be known until he is sentenced in the corruption scandal in Washington.

The story of the star-crossed Capitol Hill romance -- and its repercussions in national politics -- begins in 1997, when Mr. Scanlon arrived in Rep. DeLay's office as press secretary. There he worked closely with Mr. Rudy. Both press aides were veterans of Republican politics and eager sportsmen. Mr. Scanlon, a native of suburban Washington, could run five miles in under 30 minutes, while Mr. Rudy, of Brooklyn, N.Y., played in an amateur ice-hockey league.

The two shared a pit-bull political style and pushed Mr. DeLay to lead the charge in 1998 for the impeachment of President Clinton. "This whole thing about not kicking someone when they are down is B.S.," Mr. Scanlon once wrote to Mr. Rudy in an email published in "The Breach," a book by Peter Baker about the impeachment. "Not only do you kick him -- you kick him until he passes out -- then beat him over the head with a baseball bat -- then roll him up in an old rug -- and throw him off a cliff into the pound surf below!!!!!"

The two staffers often lent a hand to Mr. Abramoff, according to court documents and former colleagues. The lobbyist helped Mr. DeLay raise millions of dollars. Mr. Abramoff frequently treated Mr. DeLay to dinner at his sushi restaurant on Capitol Hill and took the congressman on trips overseas. Mr. Abramoff spoiled Mr. DeLay's aides, too, taking them on trips to casinos and golf courses owned by his clients, according to travel disclosure forms.

The aides returned the favor. In the fall of 1998, Mr. Abramoff wanted to help a Republican, Joe Ada, get elected as governor in Guam, even though he was trailing incumbent Gov. Carl Gutierrez badly in the polls.

Just after lunch on Oct. 26, 1998, Mr. Abramoff emailed Mr. Rudy: "We want to know if there is anyway to get Tom to call for an investigation of the misuse of federal funds on Guam by this governor," he wrote in a message reviewed by The Wall Street Journal. Mr. Abramoff said he would draft a statement for Mr. DeLay and suggested that if Mr. Rudy could "issue a press release and letter requesting an Inspector General (I guess from Interior?) to investigate these matters, it should have a major impact on the election next week."

Within a few hours, Messrs. Rudy and Scanlon released a statement from Mr. DeLay and a letter to the Department of the Interior's inspector general calling for a federal investigation into the Democratic governor. "The allegations and materials I reviewed point to serious corruption" by the governor, Mr. DeLay said in the letter.

Despite their efforts, Mr. Ada lost the race, and the department didn't conduct an investigation. After leaving office, Mr. Gutierrez was tried on corruption charges but acquitted on all counts. Mr. DeLay's spokeswoman said he declined to comment. Mr. Rudy's lawyer didn't return phone calls.

In late 1998, Mr. Rudy was promoted to deputy chief of staff and Mr. Scanlon was elevated to communications director, reporting to Mr. Rudy. To fill the void in the press office, Mr. Scanlon soon hired Ms. Miller, a Georgetown University graduate who had worked as an ABC News associate producer and as a press secretary for Rep. Rick Lazio, a New York Republican.

Ms. Miller shared the pugnacious style of her new colleagues. She was once quoted in a Washington Post profile of Mr. DeLay yelling at a reporter: "You lied!... You betrayed him! You twisted his words!... We don't know you. You don't exist... You are dead to us."

Ms. Miller and Mr. Scanlon soon became close friends. Mr. Scanlon, married at the time, would sometimes bring his newborn son into the office, and Ms. Miller enjoyed watching over him, according to DeLay staffers.

By the end of 1999, Mr. Scanlon's marriage was falling apart, and he moved out of the one-story bungalow he shared with his wife. He left the DeLay office for a private-sector job in public relations. In March 2000, Mr. Abramoff hired Mr. Scanlon to work with him in the Washington, D.C., lobbying office of Seattle-based law firm Preston Gates Ellis LLP.

Mr. Abramoff frequently sought Mr. Rudy's help to influence legislation on behalf of his clients. In exchange, Mr. Abramoff offered the DeLay aide meals, expensive trips and cash, according to Mr. Abramoff and prosecutors. In June 2000, Mr. Abramoff took Mr. Rudy to watch Tiger Woods win the U.S. Open golf championship at Pebble Beach.

Shortly afterward, Mr. Rudy helped arrange for Mr. DeLay to send a U.S. flag that had flown above the Capitol to the owner of the SunCruz Casinos gambling fleet, which Mr. Abramoff wanted to buy. When the SunCruz owners agreed to sell to Mr. Abramoff for $147.5 million, the lobbyist listed Mr. Rudy as a reference on his $60 million loan application. Mr. Abramoff later pleaded guilty to faking a wire transfer to get financing for the deal, which led to his sentencing in Florida this week.

In March 2001, Mr. Abramoff and Mr. Scanlon joined Greenberg Traurig, a Miami-based law firm looking to build a lobbying practice in Washington. One of Mr. Abramoff's first hires there was Mr. Rudy. The two former DeLay press secretaries, once allies, became fierce rivals.

Mr. Rudy bad-mouthed Mr. Scanlon among colleagues, according to other Greenberg Traurig lobbyists. Mr. Scanlon fought back by leaking unfavorable tidbits about Mr. Rudy to the press. Mr. Scanlon was now dating Ms. Miller, who had been promoted to Mr. DeLay's communications director.

Using Ms. Miller as his eyes and ears in the DeLay office, Mr. Scanlon, according to DeLay staffers and journalists, told reporters that Mr. Rudy often visited Mr. DeLay's office in 2001, a possible violation of lobbying rules. Former congressional aides must wait a year before lobbying their former colleagues. Mr. Scanlon also told reporters that when Mr. Rudy worked as a House aide, Mr. Rudy urged House Republicans to steer political work to his wife's firm.

When Mr. DeLay heard about the squabbling among his former aides, he was "livid" and threatened to get Mr. Scanlon booted from his lobbying job, according to a March 29, 2001, email from Mr. Rudy to Mr. Abramoff. Mr. Abramoff got Mr. Scanlon to stop the leaks, and no stories came out at the time about Mr. Scanlon's allegations.

Around this time, Mr. Abramoff's bet that SunCruz revenue would allow him to pay back the $60 million loan wasn't panning out. In June 2001, SunCruz filed for bankruptcy, and Mr. Abramoff's lender demanded payment. To resolve the matter, Mr. Abramoff needed to come up with millions of dollars. He hatched a plan to bilk his clients.

Most of Mr. Abramoff's Native American clients operated gambling casinos and wanted to block rival tribes from invading their turf. The tribes also worried that the federal government would tax their casino revenues. Mr. Abramoff told his tribal clients to hire Mr. Scanlon, who had set up his own public-relations firm and would soon leave the lobbying practice. Mr. Scanlon then secretly routed half of his net profits back to Mr. Abramoff. While Mr. Scanlon's actions didn't violate any laws, Mr. Abramoff admitted that he defrauded his clients by receiving kickbacks and not telling them.

As the friendship between Messrs. Abramoff and Scanlon deepened, they teased each other about their regular racquetball matches. "You better start pulling some real opponents or I am going to beat your ass to a pulp next time we get out there!" Mr. Scanlon told Mr. Abramoff in one trash-talking email. Mr. Scanlon was "afraid of a real man!" Mr. Abramoff answered in an email sprinkled with obscenities.

Mr. Scanlon reveled in his newfound wealth. In September 2001, he bought two houses in Washington for a total of $1.2 million, according to court papers. In November 2001, he bought a $1.6 million beach house in Rehoboth Beach and completely renovated it. A few months later, in March, he paid $4.7 million in cash for a place for him and Ms. Miller to live. The beachfront mansion had a weight room, sauna and a three-bedroom guest house. Mr. Scanlon mounted lights on the deck so he could hold parties on the beach at night, according to his surfing friends. He also bought vacation homes on the Caribbean island of St. Barts, including one villa he rented out for $50,000 a week.

The celebration never came. Mr. Scanlon broke off the engagement that spring and began dating a 24-year-old waitress at a Rehoboth Beach seafood restaurant.

Ms. Miller was devastated, according to friends. She spent hours at the gym. Two weeks after her planned wedding date, she started a blog with beauty and diet tips for women.

Three weeks after Mr. Scanlon got married, Ms. Miller was a bridesmaid at the Houston wedding of another former DeLay aide. Ms. Miller confessed to friends at the reception that she had helped Mr. Scanlon spread negative stories about Mr. Rudy, according to people who attended. When she saw Mr. DeLay and his wife, Ms. Miller tearfully apologized and said she had been used as a pawn in Mr. Scanlon's fight with Mr. Rudy, to whom she also expressed remorse.

Mr. DeLay accepted Ms. Miller's apology, according to wedding guests, and embraced her, saying: "We are all a part of the DeLay family." A DeLay spokeswoman, Shannon Flaherty, said Mr. DeLay couldn't recall his exact words.

After flying back to Washington, Ms. Miller called Mr. Scanlon's ex-wife, Carrie Anne Liipfert. People familiar with Ms. Miller's thinking say she missed spending time with Mr. Scanlon's son. She also sought the comfort of another woman hurt by Mr. Scanlon. Over the next few months, the two spoke frequently and became friends.

Ms. Miller told Ms. Liipfert about the millions of dollars Mr. Scanlon was making and about the properties he had purchased, according to people who know both women.

When Mr. Scanlon and Ms. Liipfert, who declined to comment, separated three years earlier, Mr. Scanlon was making $155,000 as Mr. DeLay's communications director and had $39,000 in debt, including $19,400 on his credit cards, according to court records. His child-support payment was set at $1,680 a month.

Now he had millions of dollars in beach houses and flew around in a private jet. In February 2003, Mr. Scanlon's ex-wife filed a motion in a suburban Washington court to increase the child-support payments. Mr. Scanlon's "financial circumstances...have improved dramatically," Ms. Liipfert told the court, according to records. "It is believed he earns millions of dollars per year now."

Mr. Scanlon fought his ex-wife's request and refused to tell the court how much he made. He said his ex-wife "has been in direct contact with third parties concerning his finances and business enterprises, apparently seeking to embarrass" him, according to court records.

In April, Ms. Liipfert asked the court to subpoena former yoga instructor Brian Mann, a move that suggested she had knowledge about her ex-husband's work with Mr. Abramoff. Federal investigators later discovered Mr. Mann was the director of a fake think tank that Messrs. Abramoff and Scanlon used to collect fees from clients.

At the end of the summer of 2003, Mr. Scanlon reached an out-of-court settlement with his ex-wife. Under the settlement, the two aren't permitted to discuss the terms.

Just as Mr. Scanlon was being pressed by his ex-wife for more money, Mr. Abramoff was starting to show the stress of being pinched by his lenders.

"Mike!!! I need the money TODAY! I AM BOUNCING CHECKS!!!" he emailed Mr. Scanlon on Feb. 19, 2003, as the latter vacationed in St. Barts, according to an email released by Senate investigators. After Mr. Scanlon promised to send a kickback check, Mr. Abramoff wrote: "Sorry I got nuts, but it's a little crazy for me right now. I am not kidding that I was literally on the verge of collapse. I hate all the s--t I'm into."

On Feb. 22, 2004, the Washington Post in a front-page article reported that Messrs. Abramoff and Scanlon charged four Indian tribes $45 million for lobbying and public-relations work over three years. The sum rivaled the lobbying fees of the biggest U.S. corporations.

Mr. Abramoff's world quickly caved in. The next week, he was fired from his lobbying job. On Capitol Hill, Sen. John McCain opened a Senate probe into his business.

The Justice Department, already investigating Mr. Abramoff's SunCruz deal in Florida, expanded its investigation to include his work in Washington with Mr. Scanlon and the Indian tribes. Federal prosecutors soon found out that Mr. Abramoff and Mr. Scanlon received more than $80 million from the tribes.

Mr. Scanlon at first seemed unfazed. In the months after the story broke, he bought a pair of $2 million beach houses and returned to his lifeguard job. In July 2005, he sold the beach house he bought for Ms. Miller for a $1 million profit, according to court records.

But pressure was mounting on him. Justice Department prosecutors secretly approached Ms. Miller to help build a case against her ex-fiancé, says a person familiar with the case. Last November, Mr. Scanlon pleaded guilty to bribery charges. He agreed to go to jail for as long as five years and pay back nearly $20 million to the tribes. Mr. Scanlon also implicated Mr. Abramoff.

Six weeks later, Mr. Abramoff pleaded guilty to corruption and bribery charges and agreed to pay the tribes $26 million. Depending on his sentence in Washington, he may spend a decade behind bars. In his plea agreement, Mr. Abramoff said he sought to bribe Mr. Rudy "to perform a series of official acts" by offering him golf trips, meals and a $50,000 payment to his wife.

Days later, Mr. DeLay announced he wouldn't seek another term in the Republican leadership in the House. He faces a re-election fight this fall. Mr. Rudy quit his lobbying job.

Until the summer of 2005, Ms. Miller worked as a spokeswoman at the State Department. In May 2004, she earned a bit of fame when she cut off a live interview on NBC's "Meet the Press" with then-Secretary of State Colin Powell. Ms. Miller hasn't held a steady job since leaving the State Department. She blames talk about her involvement with the investigation.

Friends say Ms. Miller still has Mr. Scanlon's four-carat engagement ring.

These are the men
That fleeced the tribes
That paid the money
That made the bribes
That purchased the Congress that
Jack built.
This is the Duke
That sailed the yacht
That raised the eyebrows
And got him caught,
Who helped Mitch Wade,
Who bought Duke's land
And kicked in 700 grand;
Which raised Duke's taxes,
And gave Duke pain;
So Wade paid the tab
On Duke's capital gain.
Bigger than Abscam:
Randy "Duke" Cunningham!
Top gun in the Congress that
Jack built.
This is Bob Ney,
Who knew the fine print
That could pass a casino
And rev up its mint,
Who spawned the e-mail
Where Jack foretold:
"Just met with Ney.
"We're [expletive] gold!"
And Ney in 2000,
A moment quite checkered
Ripped magnate Gus Boulis
In the Congress'nal Record.
His tirade was meant
To frighten the fellow,
Who cops say was shot

By Big Tony Moscatiello,
Who got a small fortune
From Jack's pal in D.C.,
A guy Ney said was known
For his "honesty."
Their pal was indicted
And then copped a plea
Guilty of fraud
And conspiracy.

With 800 members
And fund-stream support
From the famous Coushatta Casino Resort!
Which paid several million
For Jack to abort
A rival tribe's parlor
In nearby Shreveport,
Which prompted the letter
That outlined their claims
That went to Gale Norton,
Co-signed by these names:
Tom DeLay, Eric Cantor,
Roy Blunt, the chief whip,
Speaker Dennis Hastert.

For Jack's A Jolly Good Fellow! (WP)

By Al Kamen
The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

The extraordinary outpouring of letters on behalf of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff must have played a part in persuading U.S. District Judge Paul C. Huck to give Abramoff the minimum possible sentence Wednesday for fraud and conspiracy in buying casino boats in Florida.

The sheer volume -- 262 letters were ginned up by Abramoff's lawyers -- was impressive. So was the range -- from family members to old friends to religious folks to a member of Congress (Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif.).

All asked for leniency for a great guy who lost his way. They focused on Abramoff's good deeds -- local physician Gene Colice 's letter talked about neighbor Abramoff "trying to find a lost hamster on a Friday night" -- to his contributions to Jewish charities and religious institutions.

Some of the letters at first glance seem risky, raising the possibility of backfire. For example, there were two from the Northern Mariana Islands, Abramoff clients who were battling congressional efforts to impose federal control.

Northern Mariana Gov. Benigno R. Fitial wrote that Abramoff lobbied for the U.S. territory "during one of the darkest periods in our short history as a largely self-governing" commonwealth, a time when unions and other misguided do-gooders were demanding federal control of immigration -- which fuels the territory's growing sex trade -- and application of minimum-wage and other worker protections to the clothing factories there. Critics say the factories, which produce "Made in USA" goods, are little more than sweatshops.

Another letter came from Willie Tan , who introduced himself as someone "engaged in various international business enterprises," including "apparel manufacturing."

A letter from well-known Washington attorney Nathan Lewin risked reminding Huck that Abramoff opened a kosher deli in downtown D.C. "at great personal sacrifice." Would have been less "sacrifice" if the failed operation had served better food. The real danger was that Huck might have dined there and had one of those potato knishes apparently microwaved so much that the potato filling was liquefied. If so, Huck would have been thinking summary execution, not leniency.

And there was a warm letter from Rabbi Daniel Lapin , urging leniency and noting Abramoff was not your "average criminal." Problem is, Lapin's letter might have reminded Huck that Abramoff contributed money to Lapin's group, Toward Tradition, to pay the salary of the wife of a top aide to then-House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.).

Even worse, Lapin's letter might have reminded Huck of the hilarious September 2000 e-mail exchange, funnier than anything even the morally and ethically bankrupt protagonists in "The Producers" might have concocted:

"I hate to ask you for your help with something so silly," Abramoff wrote, "but I've been nominated for membership in the Cosmos Club, which is a very distinguished club in Washington, DC, comprised of Nobel Prize winners, etc. Problem for me is that most prospective members have received awards and I have received none.

"I was wondering," Abramoff continued, " if you thought it possible that I could put that I have received an award from Toward Tradition with a sufficiently academic title, perhaps something like Scholar of Talmudic Studies?

"Indeed, it would be even better if it were possible that I received these in years past, if you know what I mean," Abramoff wrote. Ah, yes, a backdated, phony award.

No problem. "I just need to know what needs to be produced," Lapin responded. "Letters? Plaques?" Lapin now says he was joking, but one news report said Abramoff did get awards from Toward Tradition.

Well, the risks must have paid off. Huck went as low as legally possible on the sentence, five years and 10 months.

There is some chatter that Reps. Martin O. Sabo (D-Minn.) and Michael G. Oxley (R-Ohio), who are retiring next year, have resigned from the House gym. Talk was these moves might have been in protest of new House rules that prohibit former members-turned-lobbyists from going there.

Our colleague Jeffrey Birnbaum placed three phone calls to each office, calls that produced no confirmation or denial from either member's staff. That non-response is a violation of the venerable Loop Three-Call Rule, thus permitting us to write about this unconfirmed, undenied rumor. (No doubt we'll be writing about this for Monday's column.)And One More . . .

Monday's column should have included Navy pilot Michael Scott Speicher , who was shot down over Iraq on the first day of the 1991 Persian Gulf War, as still listed as "missing-captured." A U.S. intelligence team in Iraq last year found no clues to his fate.

AP2, March 30, 2006

A U.S. District Court has issued grand jury subpoenas to six aides to Rep. William Jefferson (news, bio, voting record), a Louisiana Democrat who has been implicated in a bribery case.

In statements read on the House floor Thursday, the aides notified House Speaker Dennis Hastert that they had been served with grand jury subpoenas for testimony issued by the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia.

The court, located in Alexandria, Va., is set to hand down a sentence to a former aide to Jefferson, Brett Pfeffer, who last January pleaded guilty to aiding and abetting bribery of a public official and conspiracy.

Pfeffer, 37, who faces up to 20 years in prison, said a congressman demanded bribes in exchange for his assistance in brokering two African telecommunications deals. Court documents make clear that Jefferson is the accused congressman without specifically naming him.

Jefferson, who has not been charged with a crime, has denied the allegation, saying he has never demanded or accepted anything to perform a service for which he was elected.

Jefferson represents parts of New Orleans that were hardest hit by Hurricane Katrina.

The six staff members — a district manager, a legislative assistant and four congressional aides — said in their statements that they had consulted with the Office of General Counsel and determined that compliance with the subpoena "is consistent with the precedents and privileges of the House."

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

A U.S. District Court has issued grand jury subpoenas to six aides to Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.) who has been implicated in a bribery case.

In statements read on the House floor yesterday, the aides notified House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) that they had been served with subpoenas for testimony issued by the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia.

The court, located in Alexandria, Va., is set to hand down a sentence to Brett Pfeffer, a former aide to Jefferson. Pfeffer pleaded guilty in January to aiding and abetting bribery of a public official and conspiracy. He faces as much as 20 years in prison.

Pfeffer, 37, said a congressman demanded bribes in exchange for his assistance in brokering two African telecommunications deals. Court documents make clear that Jefferson is the accused congressman without naming him.

Jefferson has not been charged with a crime and has denied the allegation, saying he has never demanded or accepted anything to perform a service for which he was elected.

CBS 2 Chicago, March 31, 2006

(STNG) CHICAGO A North Side man was on the lam after a communication glitch caused him to be accidentally released from the downtown federal jail, authorities said Wednesday.

U.S. marshals were searching for Amar Abu Siessi, 36, a Jordanian national, after they inadvertently let him out of the Metropolitan Correctional Center Monday.

U.S. District Judge Matthew F. Kennelly issued a warrant for the Siessi's arrest Wednesday when he did not show up to court.

The U.S. Marshals Service mistakenly believed the court had released Siessi on bond. They released him without his bond discharge papers, a violation of protocol, according to Deputy U.S. Marshal Michael Prout.

"At the time we had transmitted incorrect information that he was to be released on bond, when in fact he was to appear in court today for a bond hearing," Prout said.

Siessi, a grocery store owner, had been held since March 7 when he was arrested by the U.S. Department of Agriculture on fraud charges, the second fraud case brought against him since December. He is accused of defrauding the Link card program, which provides taxpayer money to the poor so they can buy food.

Siessi's lawyer, Joe DiNatale, said his client went home to his wife after the Monday night release. She said she last saw him at 1 p.m. Tuesday.

CBS 2 Chicago, March 31, 2006

(CBS) CHICAGO A conman who pulled off elaborate scams while he was supposed to be monitored by federal agencies has done it again.

Michael Anthony Nelson's Chicago swindle was exposed last year by the CBS 2 Investigators, and it has now resulted in a new fraud indictment.

But as CBS 2's Pam Zekman reports, the feds missed a chance to keep him in jail, and now he is running a new scam.

Nelson is now pictured on an FBI "wanted" poster. It includes mug shots of how he looked for his past scams, posing as a banker, lawyer, and business consultant, to pull off one con after another.

It is a history that amazes even Chicago FBI Special Agent-In-Charge Robert Grant.

"He's a conman," Grant said. "He is a professional conman. He is very smooth. He is very articulate. He can con the socks off of you."

As we disclosed last year, Nelson opened a business consulting company called the Cano Company in the River North neighborhood, while on probation for a Florida swindle.

He called himself Dr. Anthony Zamora. He faked degrees, City Hall clout, and corporate connections to cheat his employees, a bank, small business operators, and church parishioners out of hundreds of thousands of dollars.

"You know to be hoodwinked or taken advantage of like this," said Pastor George Henderson of the Greater Garfield Park Church. "It's just almost, you know, devastating."

After our report, Nelson was returned to prison in Atlanta to finish the 13 months remaining on his sentence in a Florida swindle.

Federal officials promised the Chicago victims and CBS 2 that after he finished his time, Nelson would be brought back to Chicago to face new charges.

"I was told he would never walkout of jail," said Rene Sotelo, a former employee of the Cano Company, "and look what happened. He walked out."

Nelson was released from an Atlanta prison on Dec. 23 of last year.

The reason was apparently because the U.S. Attorney's Office in Chicago did not get around to returning a bank fraud indictment against Nelson until about a week after his release.

Sotelo said he was concerned that if Nelson was let out of prison, "he was going to do it again."

He apparently was. On another Web site, Nelson has created a faith gathering prison ministry.

This time, Nelson is posing as Messianic Rabbi Micael Jacob Zipuren, and he is soliciting contributions from inmates in exchange for supposedly providing them with all kinds of assistance.

"He's going to take the money and run," Sotelo said.

If you see Nelson, the FBI wants you to call their local office.

"Right now we are attempting to apprehend him wherever he may be," Nelson said.

To contact the Chicago office of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, call (312) 431-1333.

A spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's office declined to comment about the delayed indictment in the case.

Feds Charge Two With Contract Killing (BEAVCT)

By Bill Vidonic, Times Staff

Beaver County (PA) Times, March 31, 2006

BEAVER - More than two years ago, Beaver County District Attorney Dale Fouse made a promise to the family of Frank J. Helisek Jr. that his office would find out why the New Brighton man was gunned down in the doorway of his home.

Fouse fulfilled a good portion of that promise Wednesday with the announcement that federal murder charges - a first in Beaver County - had been handed down against two men, accusing them of a contract killing scheme wrapped into a large-scale cocaine ring that operated from 1999 to November.

Jelani Solomon, 27, of 1917 Fourth Ave., Beaver Falls, is accused of paying Claron Hanner, 28, formerly of Pittsburgh, to shoot Helisek on Feb. 19, 2004. One of Helisek's sons, Shawn Helisek, was scheduled to testify against Solomon in a drug trial that was to begin Feb. 20, 2004. Solomon instead pleaded guilty to cocaine possession and was sentenced to between 2½ and five years in state prison.

Solomon and Hanner could face the death penalty, U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan said Wednesday, as they are accused of using a gun to cause a death while trafficking in drugs.

Buchanan must make a recommendation to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who has the final say on whether prosecutors seek the death penalty. Buchanan would not say Wednesday what her recommendation will be, though Fouse said he supports death penalty prosecutions in this case.

Hanner had been awaiting trial in Beaver County on a homicide charge in the Helisek shooting, with prosecutors seeking the death penalty. Fouse said the local charge will be withdrawn in deference to the federal charges. Solomon was not charged in Beaver County in Helisek's killing.

"Hopefully, this is a long-term effort to (curtail) drug activity in Beaver County," Fouse said. "This is an important step toward the commitment to the Helisek family and the people of Beaver County."

Also indicted by a federal grand jury was Solomon's mother, Wanda Solomon, 46, of 180 Crestview Village, Ambridge, who Buchanan said has helped keep her son's drug sales going even while he has been in prison. Buchanan said Jelani Solomon also kept directing drug sales from his prison cell.

Fouse and Buchanan revealed Wednesday that a network of local, state and federal agents have been working quietly in Beaver County over the last couple of years to investigate not only the Helisek killing but also a drug ring reportedly led by Jelani Solomon.

In an offensive dubbed "Operation Enough is Enough," Jim Harper, of the federal Drug Enforcement Agency, said 44 people have been indicted on various drug charges linked to the alleged drug ring. The operation, which included county detectives, local police, state police and federal agencies, also has seized 14 vehicles along with the cocaine, Harper said.

Buchanan said the indictments have been going on since 2003, and some defendants have already pleaded guilty to related charges, while others are awaiting trial.

Buchanan said the Solomons and Hanner, from 1999 to November 2005, conspired to distribute at least 5 kilograms of cocaine in the area.

Buchanan said the case is marked not only by the number of individuals reportedly involved, but also by "the ruthlessness of (Jelani Solomon and Hanner) in killing the father of a witness." She would not say how much Solomon is accused of paying Hanner to shoot Helisek.

Fouse said that in the initial days after Helisek's killing, it was apparent to the family and investigators that there was much more behind the killing.

In December 2004, local investigators met with the U.S. attorney's office, seeking additional help, and Fouse said that he had "never seen an investigation as comprehensive and as intensive as this investigation has been."

Harper said federal investigators are "not leaving," and will continue their work within the county.

Jelani Solomon and Hanner are now in federal custody, Buchanan said, and their arraignments are scheduled in the next few weeks. Wanda Solomon was arrested and in federal custody Wednesday.

While Jelani Solomon and Hanner could face the death penalty or life in prison, Wanda Solomon could face life in prison, but Buchanan said she was not directly involved in Helisek's shooting. All three also face millions of dollars in fines.

Attorneys At Law Firm In Pellicano Case May Leave (LAT)

By Chuck Philips, Kim Christensen And Henry Weinstein, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, March 31, 2006

Two top attorneys with a Century City law firm at the center of a federal racketeering investigation into alleged wrongdoing by Hollywood private eye Anthony Pellicano will soon leave to establish a new practice.

Dale F. Kinsella and Howard L. Weitzman are expected to take seven attorneys with them when they exit Greenberg, Glusker, Fields, Claman, Machtinger & Kinsella in mid-April, according to sources within the firm.

Greenberg Glusker declined to comment Thursday. Weitzman would say only that he, Kinsella and the others are considering the move.

"If we do, it is because we want to go back to practicing in a smaller environment," Weitzman said in a statement, adding that the decision has nothing to do with the federal probe. "As I've said publicly before, I do not believe any Greenberg Glusker lawyer has acted inappropriately, nor do I think anyone from the firm will be so charged."

Greenberg Glusker was thrust into the spotlight amid allegations that Pellicano and others committed wiretapping and other illegal acts while working on a number of cases, some of which involved the firm's clients.

A 110-count federal indictment last month accused Pellicano and six others of conspiring to blackmail and intimidate dozens of celebrities, business executives and others in what prosecutors have described as a conspiracy to gain tactical advantage in litigation.

So far, 13 people have been charged, including an entertainment lawyer, a record company executive, two former police officers and several telephone company employees. Four have admitted to charges stemming from hiring Pellicano or helping him conduct illegal investigations.

Federal agents have been particularly interested in Pellicano's association with prominent Greenberg attorney Bert Fields, who hired the private detective numerous times over the past two decades, including in a legal dispute involving comedian Garry Shandling and Paramount Pictures Chairman Brad Grey. Fields has publicly acknowledged that he is a subject of the investigation.

Last month, Fields' attorney agreed to extend the deadline for prosecutors to decide whether to file charges against the 76-year-old Fields, one of the most successful lawyers in Hollywood.

One purported victim in the Pellicano case was also linked to one of Kinsella's clients, the late financier Leonard Green, whom Kinsella represented in a bitter divorce. Pellicano's indictment alleges that Green's wife, Jude, was among those whose personal information was accessed illegally.

Brian Sun, the attorney representing Greenberg Glusker, has said that neither the firm nor any of its attorneys engaged in any illegal activity.

Kinsella joined Greenberg Glusker as a name partner when 12 lawyers moved to the firm in 2000 from Kinsella Boesch Fujikawa & Towle. At the time, Greenberg Glusker hailed the arrival of Kinsella and the others as a defining moment for the firm.

"We are now the entertainment juggernaut in California, if not the country," the firm said at the time.

A 1974 graduate of UCLA Law School, Kinsella has represented athletes, celebrities and movie studios.

His clients have included Rob Lowe, whom he represented in 1989 when the actor was videotaped in a hotel room with a teenage girl and a woman. A lawsuit filed by the girl's mother was settled out of court and no criminal charges were filed.

Kinsella's other high-profile clients have included boxer Mike Tyson; actors George Wendt and John Ratzenberger of "Cheers" and entertainment icon Dick Clark.

Actor James Woods sought Kinsella's counsel when he sued actress Sean Young for $2 million, accusing her of sending photos or other "graphic representations" of "deceased persons, dead animals, gore, mutilation and other images" to the actor and his then-fiancee. The lawsuit was settled in 1989.

In May 2005, Kinsella brought in Weitzman, a veteran Hollywood attorney who gained prominence in the 1980s with his successful defense of automaker John DeLorean against fraud and drug charges, the case credited with launching Pellicano's career in Los Angeles.

Weitzman's other high-profile clients have included Marlon Brando and Earvin "Magic" Johnson. In the early 1990s, Weitzman teamed for a time with Fields to defend pop star Michael Jackson against child molestation allegations.

Sniper Muhammad To Defend Himself (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, March 31, 2006

Maryland's public defender said this afternoon that he will abandon the case of convicted sniper mastermind John Allen Muhammad, leaving him to defend his own case in Montgomery County without legal advice.

Muhammad, 45, relegated Paul B. DeWolfe, a lawyer with the state's Office of the Public Defender, to standby status yesterday, after a judge rejected Mr. DeWolfe's argument that Muhammad is insane and not mentally competent to present his own case.

"We have a policy of not serving as standby counsel," Mr. DeWolfe said. "It's been a policy we will enforce in this case. We will not be standby counsel."

Muhammad, an Army veteran, asked Circuit Judge James L. Ryan earlier this week for permission to present his own defense because Mr. DeWolfe planned to enter a plea of not guilty by reason of insanity.

"It's an insult to everything I've ever done in my life," said an animated Muhammad. "If I'm incompetent now, I've been incompetent since the day I was born."

Muhammad maintains he is innocent and has portrayed himself as a victim of racism.

The trial is scheduled to begin May 1, with prosecutors seeking life in prison without parole in connection with the fatal shootings of six persons in Montgomery County over three weeks in October 2002.

A procedural hearing is set for tomorrow.

In 2003, a jury in southeastern Virginia found Muhammad guilty of shooting, with an accomplice, 13 random persons in the region during the fall of 2002, killing 10. He was sentenced to death.

The jury found Muhammad's accomplice, Lee Boyd Malvo, now 21, guilty of helping carry out the shootings, which authorities think included at least nine additional shootings across the country.

Muhammad is believed to have been hunting down his ex-wife, Mildred, who has custody of their three children.

AP, March 31, 2006

MIAMI -- Trial of two Cuban-American academics accused of acting as agents of Fidel Castro's government will be delayed until early 2007, in part because of a legal fight over secret recorded conversations involving the married couple.

The trial of Carlos Alvarez, 61, and Elsa Alvarez, 55, had been set to begin in May. But U.S. District Judge K. Michael Moore said at a status hearing Thursday that he would postpone the trial until sometime in January 2007.

One key reason for the delay is that defense attorneys are challenging whether the FBI lawfully obtained warrants under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act to eavesdrop on the pair. Prosecutors said it will take months for federal officials to produce the information about those thousands of intercepts being sought by the Alvarez lawyers.

The defense lawyers are also appealing a previous decision to keep the couple in detention prior to trial. Moore said he was concerned that the lengthy trial delay could keep them jailed ``for longer than they would otherwise serve if they were ever convicted.'' No date has been set for Moore to hear that appeal.

The Alvarezes, both longtime employees at Florida International University, have pleaded not guilty to charges of failing to register as required as agents of a foreign government. Prosecutors have said they spied for Castro for years on Miami's Cuban-American exile community.

Court Rules Against Gabelli (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

Mario J. Gabelli's first investor won a crucial ruling yesterday in a long-running, bitter legal battle over whether Mr. Gabelli bilked him and another backer out of more than $100 million.

A judge in New York State Supreme Court in White Plains granted a summary judgment against Mr. Gabelli, the famed money manager. The judge, Linda S. Jamieson, determined that he unfairly prevented the two investors from selling their shares in his private company, Gabelli Group Capital Partners, the controlling shareholder of Gamco Investors, Mr. Gabelli's publicly traded mutual fund company.

Judge Jamieson also agreed to grant the two investors a trial to determine if Mr. Gabelli's company should be dissolved — refusing Mr. Gabelli's efforts to have the case thrown out — and said, "There are allegations made against Mr. Gabelli that trouble this court."

The decision, handed down late yesterday, comes as Mr. Gabelli is facing other, and potentially more serious, legal trouble. The Justice Department said this month that it would pursue civil fraud claims against Mr. Gabelli, contending that he orchestrated a scheme to deceive the Federal Communications Commission in its auctions of wireless spectrum licenses several years ago.

That case argues that he used friends and associates to create sham companies that bid for F.C.C. licenses at a discount under a program that favored minorities and small businesses.

In the lawsuit brought by the two investors, Frederick J. Mancheski and David M. Perlmutter, they argue that Mr. Gabelli and his firm's directors "are guilty of looting the assets of the company, breaching their fiduciary duties to its shareholders and oppressing its minority shareholders."

Yesterday's decision was a victory for the two investors because the judge ruled in their favor without requiring a trial. Mr. Mancheski, a longtime associate and friend of Mr. Gabelli, was his very first investor, in 1976.

The ruling will allow the two investors to sell their shares in the company on the open market. Their shares, bought for about $75,000 in the late 1970's, are now worth more than $30 million and possibly $100 million, depending on how the value is calculated. Mr. Gabelli had contended that the two men's stock was restricted and could be sold only to the company at book value, which the two men have suggested is an artificially depressed price.

Mr. Mancheski and Mr. Perlmutter also argued that Mr. Gabelli had deprived them of millions of dollars by siphoning money to himself and his family. (In 2002, Mr. Gabelli took $87 million in cash when Gamco's net income was $53.3 million.)

That contention will be heard at trial, but Judge Jamieson said in her ruling that "the transactions with Mr. Gabelli's children and ex-wife, while involving relatively paltry sums, raise great concern, particularly because they involved such relatively small sums of money."

"Unless some form of legitimate business explanation is provided, it would certainly support an argument that Mr. Gabelli was and is using this corporation as if it was his alone and without regard to true and proper governance," she wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0024736

A spokesman for Mr. Gabelli, Montieth Illingworth, said: "While we disagree strongly with the claims made by the plaintiff in this matter, and will welcome a hearing on the outstanding issues, we support their desire to achieve liquidity and have offered our assistance, including working with an investment banker to help them seek a suitable buyer."

Mr. Gabelli may also have some reason to believe he will win the next round. At points in her decision, Judge Jamieson suggested some reasons she could side with him.

"Just because some action may benefit Mr. Gabelli and disadvantage Mr. Mancheski and Mr. Perlmutter, such action does not per se rise to the level of breach of fiduciary duty," she wrote. "Stripping the allegations to their essence, it appears that Mr. Mancheski and Mr. Perlmutter are arguing that because of their holdings in Mr. Gabelli's company, they also must benefit in any related activity in which he embarks."

The case should not affect the Gabelli company, Gamco Investors, formerly Gabelli Asset Management, which has huge stakes in some of the world's largest media companies, like Time Warner and Viacom. Gamco Investors was spun off from Gabelli Group Capital Partners in 1999.

Berkeley Woman Indicted In UW Horticulture Center Arson (SEATIMES)

By Sara Jean Green, Seattle Times staff reporter

The Seattle Times, March 31, 2006

A 30-year-old California woman has become the first person to face charges for the 2001 arson that destroyed the University of Washington Center for Urban Horticulture, the latest in a series of charges against suspected members of the Earth Liberation Front.

Briana Waters of Berkeley, Calif., was indicted by a federal grand jury and has been charged in U.S. District Court in Seattle with arson and using or carrying a destructive device during a crime of violence, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office in Seattle.

Waters could face a minimum 35-year sentence if convicted. Her arraignment was set for today.

Federal prosecutors in Eugene, Ore., have already charged 13 other people in connection with a series of arsons across the West. A 14th defendant, William C. Rodgers, 40, of Prescott, Ariz., committed suicide in an Arizona jail in December after he was indicted by a Seattle federal grand jury.

On May 21, 2001, fire ripped through the UW's Center for Urban Horticulture, a research center and resource for gardeners that cost $7 million to rebuild. The Earth Liberation Front (ELF), claimed the center was targeted for its reasearch into fast-growing poplar trees.

Members of ELF and the Animal Liberation Front (ALF) claimed responsibility for numerous arsons in Washington, Oregon and other states, including U.S. Forest Service buildings, a Bureau of Land Management horse corral, a meat company, a lumber company and a Vail, Colo., ski resort.

While the FBI has called ELF and the similar Animal Liberation Front (ALF) the nation's top domestic terror threat, the groups say they are careful not to hurt people.

By HECTOR CASTRO, P-I REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, March 31, 2006

Not guilty plea entered

A 30-year-old California woman pleaded not guilty at her arraignment today on charges of arson in connection with the May 2001 fire that destroyed the University of Washington Center for Horticulture building.

If convicted, Briana Waters faces a minimum sentence of 35 years. She was released after the brief hearing this afternoon, and will be electronically monitored.

She is the first person charged in Western Washington in connection with the UW fire. The investigation into the fire is continuing.

The Earth Liberation Front took credit for the blaze. The ELF had targeted the basement office in Merrill Hall of Toby Bradshaw, an associate professor of forest resources. Bradshaw's genetic research focused on showing how poplars grow. Businesses have used poplars to make paper.

The group claimed Bradshaw was "the driving force in G.E. (genetically engineered) tree research," and a person who "continues to unleash mutant genes into the environment that is certain to cause irreversible harm to forest ecosystems."

DOJ_NMG_0024737

AP, March 31, 2006

SEATTLE – A federal grand jury has indicted a Berkeley, Calif., woman in an arson that destroyed a horticulture center at the University of Washington five years ago.

Briana Waters, 30, is the 14th person to be charged in Oregon and Washington with conspiracy to commit a series of ecoterrorist attacks in the West in recent years.

In a two-count indictment returned March 15, Waters was charged with arson and using or carrying a destructive device during a violent crime.

If convicted, she would face at least 35 years in prison.

"This is just one step as we attempt to bring to justice those responsible for the UW Urban Horticulture fire," John McKay, U.S. attorney for the western district of Washington, said in a statement.

Waters was to appear for arraignment Thursday afternoon in U.S. District Court in Seattle.

The UW fire, one of the Northwest's most notorious acts of ecoterrorism, was set early on May 21, 2001. The same day, about 110 miles away in Clatskanie, Ore., fire ripped through buildings and vehicles at the Jefferson Poplar Farm, causing more than $1 million in damage.

The Earth Liberation Front, a shadowy collection of environmental activists, claimed responsibility for both fires, which caused no injuries.

The horticulture center, which was rebuilt at a cost of several million dollars, had done work on fast-growing hybrid poplars in hopes of limiting the amount of natural forests that timber companies log.

ELF said in a statement five days after the fire that the poplars pose "an ecological nightmare" for the diversity of native forests.

A federal grand jury in Eugene, Ore., has charged 13 other people in arson attacks: Stanislas Gregory Meyerhoff, 28; Daniel Gerard McGowan, 31; Kevin M. Tubbs, 37; Sarah Kendall Harvey, 29; Chelsea Dawn Gerlach, 28; Nathan Fraser Block, 25; Joyanna L. Zacher, 28; Joseph Dibee, 38; Jonathan Mark Christopher Paul, 40; Rebecca Rubin, 32; Suzanne Savoie, 28; and Darren Todd Thurston, 34.

William C. Rodgers, 40, of Prescott, Ariz., was indicted in Seattle in connection with the case, but committed suicide Dec. 22 while being held in the Coconino County Jail in Prescott.

Computer Woes Plague Court (LAW)

By Bethany Broida, Legal Times

Legal Times, March 31, 2006

Glitches lead to false arrests, erroneous releases

Criminal defense lawyers say a new computer system in Washington, D.C., Superior Court is wreaking havoc with their cases and in some instances violating their clients' rights.

The attorneys say that since the criminal division of the court moved to a paperless computer system at the beginning of the year, bad information has led to their clients being arrested after warrants have been dismissed, and in some cases the opposite is occurring: Defendants with bail violations are walking because warrants haven't been entered into the system.

In other cases, motions and paperwork are getting lost. And some lawyers say they can no longer trust what the court record is telling them.

The problems have mainly centered on proceedings in arraignment court and in preliminary hearings -- courtrooms with a high volume of cases that are heard in quick succession. In addition, a lag time in scanning documents has meant that some information isn't being entered in a timely fashion or, in some cases, at all.

"The entire system is just abysmal," says defense lawyer Bernie Grimm. "I used to be able to trust the accuracy ... I have no confidence my clients' entries are correct."

In January, Allen says, her client failed to show up for a court hearing, and the judge issued a bench warrant. But for nearly two months the D.C. Metropolitan Police Department wasn't looking for the woman because, as far as the computer system was concerned, Allen's client didn't exist. Until last week, Allen says, she couldn't find a case number or a record of the warrant.

If she hadn't tried to get paid for her work on the case through the Criminal Justice Act, no one might ever have known that her client simply slipped through the cracks. "I know I'm not the only one who has had this happen," Allen says.

The new case management system was part of a multiyear, $20 million project to upgrade the court's entire computer framework. The new system integrates 18 databases with the aim of giving court personnel, attorneys and the public easy access to complete, real-time information about cases.

In January all new criminal cases in the court were being housed entirely in the new system, eliminating the need for paper case jackets and allowing multiple users to access the file from any computer in the courthouse. The system is now considered to be the official court docket and official court jacket.

Court officials downplay the trouble. Judge Brook Hedge, chair of the court's technology and automation committee and co-chair of the committee that oversaw the implementation of the new system, says the problems are small glitches common with a startup.

She says errors involving warrants and arraignment notices have largely been resolved and that to her knowledge the warrant mix-ups happened to fewer than 10 individuals.

"People think that with the computer system everything is going to be perfect and work perfectly, and sometimes it doesn't," Hedge says. Still, she says the court is considering returning paper records to case jackets.

G. Bradley Weinsheimer, the chief of the Superior Court division in the U.S. Attorney's Office in Washington, says his office worked with the court for 18 months preparing for the new system, and though there are some kinks, his office is dealing with them. "I don't think that it has caused any significant problems. It is more of a culture change than anything else."

Weinsheimer admits there were problems with logging bail violations, but he says those were limited to the first day the system became active and only a handful of defendants weren't charged for violating court orders. "The things we are dealing with now are the things that were not anticipated," he says, such as confusion over correct hearing dates.

A 'PERFECT STORM'

Hedge says the court had been looking to upgrade its case management system for years, but the problem had always been finding money to pay for it. With the passage of the Family Court Act in 2001, the money was finally available.

Implementation of the new system began in 2003 in the Family Court. The domestic violence unit followed a few months later. Paternity and child support cases, as well as probate and tax matters, went paperless in August 2004. Last year the system expanded to include small-claims court, landlord tenant court and civil actions.

One of the reasons the criminal division was last, Hedge says, was because of the complexities involved with coordinating a variety of government agencies. To prepare, court officials began meeting with the agencies in 2004, in order to give them enough time to get their own systems ready as well.

Despite intense planning, the rollout for the criminal division was anything but smooth. One week after the system went up, Hedge says "the perfect storm" hit. The server went down, and the mother board broke. In addition, a transformer blew in Judiciary Square, causing the court to lose power. For four days the division went back to using the manual system.

"There is always slowness in the beginning," says Hedge, adding that the problems were compounded by the events that followed the launch.

Regardless of the cause, arraignment notices were not sent out, bench warrants were not entered or cleared from the system and, in some cases, judges didn't know what a defendant was charged with.

"It was just leaving things up in the air," says Betty Ballester, president of the Superior Court Trial Lawyers Association. "No judge wants to put people in jail that should not be there, but they are looking at records that are not accurate. So what can they do?"

The court shut down its computer system over the three-day Martin Luther King Jr. holiday weekend in January in order to install the new system, but that meant there were immediately about 3,000 documents from over the weekend that had to be scanned into the computers plus more than 3,000 data entries to input in the first days of the new system.

In total, Hedge estimates that in the beginning about 4,000 to 5,000 documents needed to be scanned, but she says that backlog did not last long. The arraignment court was caught up the following week, she says, and though the case management division took a little longer, she insists everything is now scanned in and up-to-date.

Some attorneys, however, say the number was closer to 30,000 documents and insist the problems still remain.

"The court says they are working on it, but it has now been two months and things aren't getting better," Ballester says.

One CJA attorney, who asked not to be identified, says that in two separate cases his clients were arrested on bench warrants after their cases had been dismissed. In both cases the proper notations were never entered into the computer, he says, and police believed his clients were in violation.

Attorney Steven Polin had a similar situation with a client. In his case his client was picked up on a bench warrant that stemmed from a marijuana possession charge. After a court appearance in January, he was released and arrested again on the same warrant the following week. Polin says the police refused to let his client go because the warrant was still showing in their system. It took 15 phone calls, he says, to persuade a clerk in the court's warrant office to remove it from the court's system. But D.C. police still refused to release Polin's client. Finally, it was a phone call to the emergency judge, he says, that got his client freed.

DOJ_NMG_0024739

Hedge, who happened to be the judge who helped Polin, initially said in an interview that the problem in Polin's case lay with the D.C. police department's computer system. Later in the week, court officials called back to say that it was inaccurate information in the court system that led to errors in the police department's system.

Hedge says that as far as she knows, only a handful of people were picked up on erroneous warrants. Nevertheless, she adds, "Even one is a big deal."

Defense attorneys say the problem is compounded by the fact that there is no paper trail to catch mistakes. "It creates a paperless system," Polin says. "If you need to look something up in the jacket, it is not there."

Hedge says that while it is true that papers are not filed in the jackets after they are scanned in, they don't simply disappear. Each division, she says, has a quality assurance team that double-checks the record, and then the documents are stored in the criminal division.

"The paper is not thrown away. It is still there," she says, "but they were trying to go to a paperless system, and they were trying to get people used to that."

Hedge says many of the problems faced since the new computer system was implemented could have occurred just as easily beforehand, pointing to issues with bench warrants as one example.

"You will always have errors," she says, "because humans are part of the process."

First Amendment Issues Raised About Espionage Act (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

The federal judge overseeing prosecution of two former lobbyists charged with receiving and transmitting national defense information under the 1917 Espionage Act has given the government until today to respond to defense claims that the statute is unconstitutionally vague and overbroad and may violate the First Amendment.

U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis III ordered the government to provide the additional support for the charges filed last August against Steven J. Rosen and Keith Weissman, former lobbyists for the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC). The two were accused of receiving classified information during conversations with government officials, one of whom, then-Pentagon employee Lawrence A. Franklin, warned Weissman that the information he was giving was highly classified.

At a hearing last Friday on the defendants' motion to dismiss the indictments, Ellis directed a series of questions to Assistant U.S. Attorney Kevin DiGregory expressing concern that the government had not dealt with constitutional issues raised by the defense.

"I didn't find your response in writing to match up with the fairly extensive attack by the defendants . . . so I am going to have further briefing," Ellis said. Last January, at the hearing where he sentenced Franklin to 12 years for passing classified information to the two lobbyists, Ellis called attention to the imprecise nature of the almost 90-year-old statute that restricts disclosure of "national defense information" that could harm U.S. interests or help enemies.

Ellis also said he had thought there would be well-established precedent he could follow, since the statute had been around for so long. But it has turned out that Rosen and Weissman are the first nongovernment employees to be indicted under the act for receiving classified information orally and not through documents or other tangible items.

"I think we are a bit in new, uncharted waters and that's why I'm going to consider this matter extremely carefully," Ellis told DiGregory and attorneys Abbe Lowell and John Nassikas, who represent Rosen and Weissman.

The case is drawing the attention of First Amendment attorneys because both Ellis and prosecutors have noted that the two lobbyists -- in receiving and disseminating the information -- are doing what journalists, academics and experts at think tanks do every day.

Floyd Abrams, a New York attorney who has represented the New York Times in a variety of high-profile cases, said in an interview this week that the AIPAC case "is the single most dangerous case for free speech and free press." Steven Aftergood, director of the Federation of American Scientists' Project on Government Secrecy, wrote on his Web site this week: "Anything other than a dismissal of the charges would mark a dramatic shift in national security law and a significant reduction in First Amendment protections."

Attorneys for the AIPAC lobbyists argue that First Amendment protections bear on the case because their clients were exercising their free speech rights.

DiGregory argued that oral disclosure of defense information was not protected speech because someone could be telling the contents of a classified document.

To read the statute that narrowly "would do great damage to our ability to protect national security," DiGregory said.

Ellis said the government must respond to the defense argument that the statute, which does not define "national defense information," is so vague "that men of common intelligence necessarily must guess at its meaning and differ as to its application."

The judge also told prosecutors to deal with another defense argument: that the statute does not provide "fair warning," since this is the first time it has been applied to civilians. Due process "bars courts from applying a novel construction of a criminal statute to conduct that neither the statute nor any prior judicial decision has fairly disclosed to be within its scope," Ellis said.

DiGregory conceded that every case up to now cited by the government has involved either government employees or the passing of classified papers.

Ellis also raised the question of what would happen if people to whom Rosen passed the defense information relayed it to someone else. "Would it [the criminal liability] continue to apply ad infinitum?" he asked. DiGregory replied, "That's a difficult question to answer in the abstract."

Former Clark County Commissioner Testifies To Taking Bribes (AP)

ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, March 31, 2006

LAS VEGAS (AP) - A former county commissioner testified in federal court Thursday that she accepted money from a former striptease club owner and his lobbyist, and knew it was wrong.

Erin Kenny, called to the stand in the public corruption trial of former Clark County Commissioners Dario Herrera and Mary Kincaid-Chauncey, told jurors she avoided thinking about what it meant to take money from club owner Michael Galardi and a former commission colleague, Lance Malone.

"It's just not how I was raised," Kenny said. Not thinking about it "made it easier not to deal with it rather than confront it."

The former state assemblywoman who once ran for Nevada lieutenant governor has pleaded guilty to federal bribery charges. She testified for the prosecution as part of her plea agreement.

Kenny told jurors that it was "understood" that Herrera and Kincaid-Chauncey also were being paid off by Galardi. She said Malone and Galardi often referred to the two colleagues as "on board" or "being taken care of."

Herrera, 32, and Kincaid-Chauncey, 67, have pleaded not guilty in U.S. District Court in Las Vegas to federal charges of conspiracy, wire fraud and extortion under color of official right. Prosecutors say they took cash, comps and, in Herrera's case, oral sex, in return for votes favorable to Galardi's businesses.

Each could face 45 years in prison if convicted.

Kenny said a case of vertigo had affected her memory and she could only recall accepting a few bribes from Galardi and Malone, who is scheduled to stand trial on corruption charges in August. The first, she said, was a $5,000 cash payment received at her home in 1999 or 2000 while recovering from an illness. She said Malone told her "he wanted to help anyway he could."

Another $5,000 was deposited under a trash bin at her campaign office by Malone, who later called to tell Kenny "not to throw the trash out," she testified.

Kenny said Galardi once offered to pay her $100,000 to skip the bar exam and attend a commission meeting in which Galardi had business pending. Kenny refused, took the test and failed.

Kenny also testified she received $3,000 per month from Triple 5 development company following a controversial vote in which she supported building a Spring Valley casino.

She also said that she received $200,000 from Don Davidson through his son, Larry Davidson, in connection with the controversial rezoning of property to allow a CVS pharmacy to be built adjacent to a neighborhood.

In his cross examination, Herrera's defense attorney Jerry Bernstein tried to undermine Kenny's credibility. Bernstein said Kenny had changed her story from when she was first interviewed by FBI agents.

"The FBI didn't seem happy with the answers she was giving, (agents) took a break, came back and the story was different," he told KLAS-TV outside the courtroom.

Revamped Ryan Jury Recesses Without Verdict (CHIT)

By Matt O'connor And Rudolph Bush, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, March 31, 2006

The revamped jury in former Gov. George Ryan's trial recessed deliberations for the week Thursday without reaching a verdict.

The six-man, six-woman jury has deliberated for two days since U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer rejected a mistrial and decided to proceed with the trial after replacing two jurors with alternates.

The changes came after the Tribune last week uncovered that two jurors had apparently concealed their arrest records during jury selection in September.

DOJ_NMG_0024741

The original jury had deliberated eight days amid signs of personal rancor before the judge suspended deliberations.

The new jury was instructed to restart deliberations from scratch, and Pallmeyer ordered the jury room "cleansed" of notes and charts left over from the initial deliberations.

On Thursday, Pallmeyer called the lawyers in the case to her courtroom to craft a response to a jury note seeking clarification about the technicalities of count 18, a charge alleging that Ryan impeded the Internal Revenue Service.

Ryan and co-defendant Lawrence Warner, a lobbyist, are charged in a 22-count indictment with engaging in a corrupt conspiracy to use Ryan's elected offices to enrich themselves by steering state contracts and leases to Warner and other close friends.

Earlier, the jury had requested in writing four of the same five transcripts of witnesses' testimony that the original jury had sought.

The testimony concerned license-plate sticker and computer contracts that Ryan as secretary of state allegedly steered to Warner in return for gifts and favors.

Deliberations are scheduled to resume Monday morning. The jury isn't deliberating on Fridays.

FBI Requests Alvarado's Bank Records (KPRC-TV)

KPRC-TV, March 31, 2006

Alvarado Not Target Of Criminal Investigation

HOUSTON -- The Federal Bureau of Investigation asked for the bank records of Houston City Councilwoman Carol Alvarado as it entered the investigation into improper bonuses at City Hall, KPRC Local 2 reported Thursday.

It's the first indication that the federal government is involved in the probe.

The FBI request is for all of Alvarado's bank accounts, open or closed. It went out Wednesday to major banks across the country through what's known as the loss avoidance alert system, which is an electronic network connecting banks with law enforcement.

The FBI would not comment on the investigation. But Harris County District Attorney Chuck Rosenthal confirmed for KPRC that the federal request was made.

Alvarado oversaw the mayor pro tem's office where four employees were recently fired.

The Office of Inspector General found Rosie Hernandez, Christopher Mays, Florence Watkins and Teresa Orta received unauthorized bonuses worth more than $140,000 in 2005.

Rosenthal said Alvarado is not the target of a criminal investigation.

Her attorney, Rusty Hardin, told KPRC that the FBI's involvement was expected because Alvarado is a public official.

Her spokesman, Joe Householder, said her account numbers have now been forwarded to the district attorney's office.

"So they can get a hold of it as quickly as they can," Householder said. "That actually happened this afternoon. We had reached out to them earlier and said, 'If you want this material, you can have it.' And, just as an extra step, we e-mailed those numbers to them."

Hardin said he contacted the FBI several weeks ago offering to make Alvarado's or any records available. He said he has not yet heard from the agency. Hardin said this is a natural progression in the investigation and not an indication that Alvarado has done anything wrong.

The Civil Service Commission will hold appeal hearings of the four fired employees on April 4.

Street's Image Blurs His Legacy, Insider Says (PHI)

By Marcia Gelbart

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 31, 2006

Or so says George Burrell, the mayor's closest adviser.

Burrell, who today toils out his last day at Street's side, offered a surprising assessment of the boss he has spent the last six years serving.

Burrell, a former private-sector lawyer, an ex-city councilman, and a failed 1991 mayoral candidate, said Street's true successes had not been obscured by the federal corruption probe. Rather, he said, the problem is Street's inability to shed his prickly image.

DOJ_NMG_0024742

"The environment is so defined by John Street's personality and people's reaction to it that it has made it difficult," Burrell said. With fingerprints on most every major contract in the probe, Burrell, Street's secretary of external affairs, has made several grand jury visits but is leaving unscathed.

"So many people remember John Street when he was in City Council in the 1980s with his red suits on, and he was loud, and he was bombastic, and he fought" - a fistfight - "with [then-Councilman] Fran Rafferty," Burrell said.

"He did a lot of stuff that was colorful and caused a lot of people to remember him in a negative way."

The unconquered hurdle, he said, is that "some people have not allowed him to put that behind him."

Burrell, now 58, launched his political career as a deputy mayor in Bill Green's administration in 1980, the year Street began serving on Council.

"Nobody better than me has witnessed the maturation of John Street in government," said Burrell, a onetime adversary who was the only senior official with an office in the mayor's second-floor suite.

The mayor has transformed himself from "an outsider, a radical, and an agitator into an insider who can negotiate with the Bill Rouses of the world," he said, referring to Willard G. Rouse 3d, the prominent developer who died in 2003.

But Burrell knows that Street's affable and humorous side is overshadowed by actions assessed as harsh, vindictive, and often just strange.

For instance, "sometimes, communication became tedious because he needed four or five minutes of wardrobe discussion or dogs," Councilman Jim Kenney said two weeks ago. Kenney, a vocal Street critic, made his comments before lunching with the mayor at the Palm, an effort to repair their long-broken relationship.

"It's a disservice to himself and to people that they don't know the side of him that is warm and compassionate," said U.S. Rep. Bob Brady (D., Pa.), the city Democratic Party chairman, who has known him for more than 20 years. "What people see is not what you get."

The result is personality more often driving debate than pure public policy.

"Since he basically believes he is smarter than any person he is in a conversation with, it makes it difficult to have a real relationship," Councilman Michael A. Nutter said. "At some point, many individuals just get tired of it." He is among them.

Burrell conceded that because of those difficulties, "maybe things take longer [to pass on Council] than they otherwise would." He mentioned the anti-blight neighborhood program that was one of Street's biggest initiatives and getting funding for the two new stadiums.

Burrell also pointed to the mayor's strained ties with business leaders in what has become an annual struggle over efforts to cut taxes, relations that he called "strident," and a belief that he has been unfairly covered by the media.

"People are unwilling to tout his successes the way they were willing to tout [Mayor Ed] Rendell's successes," Burrell said. "Now, it's how everything is happening, improving, in spite of the mayor."

Burrell accepts some blame. He ticked off what he sees as Street's major accomplishments - the anti-blight initiative, removal of 250,000 abandoned cars, a program to reduce homelessness copied by other cities, development of the Navy Yard and along the north Delaware River - and acknowledged that not all of it had stuck.

Early on, Burrell made a decision to stay out of the headlines to avoid speculation that he was trying to resurrect his political career. Looking back, he said, "I may have increased my own profile to be a voice of the administration."

It's difficult to say how such a move would have countered the personality issue - or the federal probe, first publicized Oct. 7, 2003, and still going on.

"It affected individuals more than it affected the overall mood of the administration," Burrell said of the probe. Amid a flurry of subpoenas and national news headlines, work continued, he said. The mayor did not lose focus or go into a tirade about it.

But life was uncomfortable. Investigators tapped phones and unearthed mounds of paperwork and e-mail. "When people start being under the impression, warranted or not, that somebody is looking at their behavior... to determine whether they crossed the line, it's pretty hard to go through that on a day-to-day basis without it intruding into your thought process," Burrell said.

For months there were rumors that Burrell himself would topple Street's administration, as the man who admittedly saw to it that the mayor's supporters were rewarded with city work.

But with no control over the investigation, "I got up every day and came to work... . The only difference now is I take medicine for my blood pressure and wear glasses. Is it the probe or just age? I don't know."

Burrell, whom Street said he intends to continue leaning on "as part of my network," will be succeeded by deputy managing director Loree Jones. He will decide over the next month what to do next.

Describing a long road trip south he is about to take, to visit with old college friends and then his son in Florida, he said, "Now I'm going to go figure out what God has in store for me for the rest of my life."

The Mayor Through His Aide's Eyes

DOJ_NMG_0024743

Outgoing senior aide George Burrell on Mayor Street and his administration:

"It is a tribute to John Street that he and I coexisted; two men with big egos and large ambitions have been able to figure out a way to coexist and communicate effectively with one another."

"I think most of the people in the cabinet were dealing with the [federal corruption] issue more from the perspective of integrity and reputation, and whether something was going to attach itself to this administration that they would have to carry for a very long time."

"The quality of life in the city of Philadelphia has improved over the last six years. Some of that is a direct result of the policies and programs that this administration has supported. Some of it is building upon the successes that Ed Rendell had in his eight years as mayor of the city... . In my view, in a historical sense people will look at the Rendell-Street era in much the same way they looked at the Clark-Dilworth era."

A Phone Call From Prison Roils Trial Of Ex-Detectives (NYT)

By ALAN FEUER

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

A disembodied voice from Colorado threw the trial of two retired detectives into temporary turmoil yesterday, as the jailed gangster who had once accused them of murder turned about and, their lawyers said, pronounced them innocent of some of the charges.

On the day prosecutors planned to rest their case and at the very moment when it seemed the trial could not get any more complex, there came, in a 1 p.m. conference call from a maximum security federal prison in Florence, Colo., the voice of Anthony Casso, former underboss of the Luchese crime family.

After 12 years in prison, nearly 8 of them in Florence, Mr. Casso was calling the defense to exonerate the two defendants, Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa, even though he was the one who first accused them, back in 1994, of killing for the mob. In the private call, defense lawyers said he referred them to a letter he wrote this month to Mark Feldman, chief of the organized crime section for the United States attorney's office in Brooklyn, a letter in which he claimed responsibility for two murders and a kidnapping that the defendants have been charged with in this case. The prosecution told the defense of the existence but not the specific contents of the letter earlier this week.

Nonetheless, it was a neatly timed and uncorroborated turnabout by Mr. Casso, who has been the trial's silent man, spoken of repeatedly, but never heard from until now.

His letter, dated March 4, 2006, begins this way: "I, Anthony Casso, hereby confess to have personally participated, as part of a three-man team, that shot and killed Eddie Lino in Brooklyn's Gravesend section. Detectives Eppolito and Caracappa are falsely being accused of this crime."

It goes on to say the former lawmen never supplied him with "confidential information," as the government has claimed, and never kidnapped a Staten Island man named James Hydell, as the indictment states. The letter, offering no evidence to bolster his account, also claims that the two detectives never murdered Israel Greenwald, a Long Island jeweler whose body was found in a shallow grave with a ShopRite grocery bag on his head.

In a move that indicates how confounding the federal trial has been, Mr. Casso attributed that last crime to Burton Kaplan, his former partner in crime, who has since become a government witness in the case. Mr. Casso concludes his letter by reminding Mr. Feldman of his three and a half years of "phenomenal, substantial assistance" before signing himself, "Respectfully yours, Mr. Anthony Casso Sr."

After Mr. Casso was arrested more than a decade ago, he started working with the government, and so agreeably at first that prosecutors tried to use his help in building a case against Mr. Eppolito and Mr. Caracappa.

The prosecutors' effort fell apart when Mr. Casso was caught in a plot to kill a judge and a federal prosecutor, destroying his usefulness as a government witness.

For the next 12 years or so, prosecutors chipped away at Mr. Kaplan to get him to cooperate, and last year they won his help. In the first week of the trial, acting as a substitute for Mr. Casso, Mr. Kaplan told the jury that he had served as "the safety spot," or liaison, between his former mob associate and the two retired detectives, who are accused of eight murders.

Confusing matters further, it was revealed yesterday that Mr. Casso had written two letters to the government, and that the first one, dated July 10, 2005, appealed to the authorities to reach "a truce" and "to unite." Months later, he asked the government to cap his prison term at 20 years, but was rejected. It was only then that he wrote the second letter, officials said.

All this sent the defense team scrambling about and muttering of mistrials as everyone tried to figure out what Mr. Casso might be up to. Did he really want "to unite" with the government again? Did he feel scorned and then strike back with the second letter? Did he just miss the limelight of a federal trial?

Today, at roughly 10 a.m., the defense will announce its plan: to call, or not to call, Mr. Casso to the stand.

'Mafia Cops' Defense To Ask For Mistrial (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, March 31, 2006

Defense attorneys in the "Mafia Cops" case will ask for a mistrial after letters surfaced Thursday from a mob boss who claimed that the ex-NYPD detectives were being falsely accused of some murders.

The letters were from imprisoned former acting Luchese crime boss Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso, who prosecutors contend was the alleged paymaster of ex-cops Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa. The retired detectives are on trial in Brooklyn federal court, facing charges that they were involved in eight murders for the mob and leaked confidential information to Casso.

In a letter dated March 4 sent by Casso to the Brooklyn U.S. attorney's office, Casso claimed the defendants were being falsely accused of three of the homicides charged in the case: that of Edward Lino, James Hydell and Israel Greenwald.

"I, Anthony Casso, hereby confess to have personally participated, as part of a three-man team, that shot and killed Eddie Lino in Brooklyn's Gravesend section. Detective's Eppolito and Caracappa are falsely being accused of this crime," said Casso in the letter address to the organized crime section of the prosecution's office.

Defense attorneys are set to ask Judge Jack Weinstein for a mistrial or to have Casso produced as a witness.

Casso admitted in his letter that the Luchese family had for decades received confidential information from law enforcement officials, including the FBI. But he said that "Det's Eppolito and Caracappa have never supplied confidential information to the Lucheses."

In 1994 Casso turned government witness. But because of questions about his credibility, law enforcement officials decided never to use him in a criminal trial. Various published accounts stated prosecutors believed Casso was a liar who wouldn't be credible on the witness stand.

Thursday, defense attorneys Bettina Schein and Rae Koshetz held a telephone conference call to interview the imprisoned Casso. Prosecutors have asked Weinstein to keep a transcript of that interview sealed. Weinstein is expected to rule on that Friday.

Prosecutors also disclosed another letter dated July 10, 2005, from Casso to Brooklyn U.S. Attorney Roslynn Mauskopf stating that he had been forced by his FBI handlers to give misleading information over the years to prosecutors. He also stated in that letter that Eppolito and Caracappa weren't involved in the murder of Bruno Facciola, a Gambino crime family soldier suspected of being an informant.

It wasn't clear why prosecutors didn't disclose the letters before the trial, which began March 13. Prosecutor Robert Henoch couldn't be reached for comment Thursday.

'Mob Cops' Innocent - Casso (NYDN)

By John Marzulli, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, March 31, 2006

Former Mob boss Anthony (Gaspipe) Casso, who ratted out the reputed Mafia cops in 1994, is now claiming they're innocent of murder charges - setting the stage for a possible mistrial.

In a phone call to defense lawyers from jail, Casso yesterday cleared ex-NYPD Detectives Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa of wrongdoing - and contends he had a federal agent on the Luchese crime family payroll.

"Mr. Casso gives a completely exculpatory account of what happened," lawyer Edward Hayes said in Brooklyn Federal Court, out of the presence of jurors, following the one-hour phone call.

Casso, 65, also told the lawyers that he had written letters to the Brooklyn U.S. Attorney's office in July 2005 and March 2006 on the eve of the trial that were never disclosed to the defense.

Federal Judge Jack Weinstein ordered prosecutors to hand over the letters and adjourned the trial yesterday before the government could rest its case.

The defense is expected to seek a mistrial today.

"Eppolito and Caracappa have never supplied confidential information to the Luchese's," Casso wrote in a March 4 letter addressed to Mark Feldman, chief of the U.S. Attorney's organized crime section.

He jotted "sworn statement" on top of the lined paper.

Casso insists he was part of a hit team that gunned down Gambino crime cap Edward Lino in 1990 - not the Mafia cops.

He also claims he could "honestly prove" Eppolito and Caracappa had nothing to do with the kidnapping of James Hydell in 1986.

Casso and the government's chief witness, Burton Kaplan, "cooked up a scheme to frame these cops," Hayes charged.

Casso's stint as a turncoat was a brief one before breaching his cooperation agreement. He is now serving a life term at Florence ADX in Colorado, the nation's toughest penitentiary, for his involvement in 36 murders.

Law enforcement sources dismissed Casso's latest claims, suggesting he is hellbent on undermining the trial because his bid last year for a "truce" with the feds was rejected. Casso was told to get lost after he offered to disclose the location of Hydell's missing corpse in exchange for a new sentence capped at 20 years, sources said.

If Casso's exoneration of the Mafia cops is a turnabout for him, the defense lawyers' embrace of his claims is a far cry from how they felt about him earlier.

"Casso's mother and the whole world got a bad deal when Casso was born, and it's been downhill ever since," Hayes told the Daily News last April.

That was after Casso told "60 Minutes" that Eppolito and Caracappa "wanted to kill for me."

Hayes and defense lawyer Bruce Cutler have repeatedly embraced a witness' description of Casso as a "homicidal maniac."

FBI Reopens Cold Case Of Stolen Rockwell Painting (AP)

By Jeff Douglas

AP, March 31, 2006

ST. LOUIS - A Norman Rockwell painting that was stolen more than 30 years ago was sold in 1988, and federal officials now are trying to find out who bought it.

FBI officials said Thursday the agency's Art Crime Team, created in 2004, has several leads in the theft of Rockwell's "Russian Schoolroom," stolen in June 1973 from a suburban St. Louis exhibit and believed to be worth as much as $200,000 today.

"What's weird is we didn't know it was stolen," said Linda Pero, curator of the Norman Rockwell Museum in Stockbridge, Mass. "I was really surprised when the FBI called me."

Pero's museum passed up a chance to bid on the painting in 1988 when it was sold for $70,400 at an auction in New Orleans.

It is believed the painting was advertised for sale in 1989 at a Rockwell exhibit in New York, but nobody made the connection until recently, officials said.

"The experts have said there are no other copies of this oil painting," FBI Assistant Special Agent Steven Gomez said.

Earlier this month, the Art Crime Team recovered a Marion Greenwood painting valued at $99,000 that was stolen in 1968. Frank Brostrom, with the Regional Art Crime Team in St. Louis, said the Rockwell case should be solved in a similar manner.

On Thursday, the FBI also returned a drawing by Susan Rothenberg to its rightful owner, the Webster University art department. Worth about $20,000, the piece was among more than 100 works of art stolen from a St. Louis art storage facility in 2002.

Two St. Louis-area men, Donald R. Rasch and Biron Valier, are in prison after pleading guilty last year to conspiring to steal and resell about $4 million in art from the storage facility.

Brostrom said most of the art stolen in that case has been recovered, but works by Salvador Dali and Pablo Picasso still were missing.

"Russian Schoolroom," commissioned by Look magazine in 1967, depicts Russian schoolchildren at their desks looking at a statue of Vladimir Lenin. The communist leader appears to be the teacher at the front of the class.

"It's very typical of one of his journalistic illustrations, much like the work he did on the Peace Corps," Pero said.

A St. Louis Globe-Democrat news article from June 26, 1973, said the thieves smashed a glass door of the museum and took only the oil painting. Priced at $20,000, it was easily the most valuable item in the Rockwell exhibit.

"That painting is known all over the country. There's no possible way that they can unload that painting," Marjorie Pond, the director for the art gallery, told the Globe-Democrat after the break-in.

But that assessment turned out to be wrong.

Pero said an insurance company could be to blame for not reporting the theft properly or investigating it. She also said there should be a record of who bought the painting in New Orleans.

Rockwell died in 1978, and that same year more of his paintings were stolen from the Elayne Gallery outside Minneapolis.

Those were recovered in 2001 at an art dealer's farmhouse in Brazil, according to FBI records. Three of the paintings, worth up to $1 million, were returned to the owner.

DOJ_NMG_0024746

Bonnie Lindberg, who ran the Elayne Gallery with her mother, said no one was ever charged in the crime.

Now an art appraiser, Lindberg said she's never seen "Russian Schoolroom," but today it could be worth up to three times what it sold for in 1988, possibly $200,000.

"If it were a memorable image you would recognize it," Lindberg said. "Otherwise, these sales can go under the radar."

Much of Rockwell's fame resulted from his magazine cover illustrations for the Saturday Evening Post.

Favors Found In Air Force Contracts (WP)

By Charles R. Babcock

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

Former Air Force procurement official Darleen A. Druyun, convicted last year for showing favoritism to Boeing Co. while negotiating for a job, also manipulated Pentagon rules to benefit Lockheed Martin Corp. and another defense contractor, according to recent inspector general reports.

The audits, part of an IG review of eight contracts that the Air Force requested last year after Druyun pleaded guilty, found that she helped Lockheed Martin on two airplane contracts between 1998 and 2001 while serving as a top civilian contracting official.

In the case of a $561 million contract to modernize the giant C-5 cargo jet, Druyun in 1998 took authority to choose the contractor, then revised the selection ratings to favor Lockheed, one report said. In 2001, Druyun changed a contract involving F-16 flight simulators so that Lockheed could collect an extra $41.6 million in return for a benefits package from the company that was of minimal value, the IG found.

The inspector general focused its criticism on the Air Force, recommending that the service tighten its control of the contracting process.

As with Boeing, Druyun, after deciding to retire from the Air Force, negotiated a job offer with Lockheed in 2002. However, in the Boeing case, the job discussions came as she was still helping the company with a multibillion-dollar tanker contract. The instances of favoritism for Lockheed preceded the job discussions. In addition, Druyun had recused herself from reviewing any Lockheed contracts because of the job talks, according to court documents.

Lockheed spokesman Thomas Jurkowsky said the company "believes that its proposals for the two contracts offered the best value for the Air Force."

An official at the U.S. attorney's office in Alexandria said there have been no new criminal referrals from the Department of Defense involving Druyun.

A third report found that Druyun "influenced" $47.2 million in vehicle overhaul requirements on a cargo loader by selecting the manufacturer, Systems & Electronics Inc. of St. Louis, to be the sole source of repair.

A spokesman for the company did not respond to a request for comment.

Auditors recommended that the Air Force "sever" that portion of the contract and consider joining with the Marine Corps for a cheaper agreement.

The IG reports were posted on the agency's Web site over the past few weeks.

Four of the other contracts under review belonged to Boeing, the company at the center of the scandal that led to prison terms for Druyun and Boeing's former chief financial officer, Michael M. Sears. Druyun admitted to trying to help Boeing on the tanker contract while discussing a $250,000 job she later accepted. Boeing also hired her daughter and son-in-law.

One other contract report has been completed but not yet made public.

In the case of the C-5 plane contract, government auditors said they could not validate whether the award to Lockheed was justified because the Air Force did not adequately document the technical and cost data used. Druyun changed ratings in three areas without providing justification and cited a competitor's weakness in one area, though Lockheed shared the same weakness, the report said.

On the flight simulator, the report blamed the Air Force for accepting Lockheed's claims that it had spent $73.3 million to develop the simulators, noting that a review found $24.6 million of those costs could not be verified.

Douglas Karas, a spokesman for the Air Force, said the service's request for the IG review was an indication of its "commitment to an open and transparent acquisition process."

Retrial Has A Dramatic Conclusion (WP)

By Leef Smith

DOJ_NMG_0024747

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

As a federal jury yesterday found Jay E. Lentz guilty in the kidnapping and death of his ex-wife, the former naval intelligence officer screamed out, "No, no! Reconsider!" ending a tortuous, years-long melodrama that has involved tainted evidence, charges of prosecutorial misconduct and the defendant's owned taped remark that he was hiring a hit man to kill witnesses.

After listening to nearly 50 witnesses, a jury in U.S. District Court in Alexandria took four days to reach a verdict, finding Lentz guilty of interstate kidnapping resulting in the 1996 death of Doris Lentz, 32. Her body has not been found.

The charge carries a mandatory sentence of life in prison without parole. Lentz is scheduled to be sentenced June 23.

"Jay Lentz will spend the rest of his life where he belongs -- in prison, for the kidnapping and brutal murder of his ex-wife, Doris Lentz," U.S. Attorney Chuck Rosenberg said in a statement.

Defense attorney Frank Salvato said Lentz, 46, who has spent five years in jail, will appeal the verdict.

"Mr. Lentz intends to fight on, and we'll do everything we can to try to win an appeal and eventually gain his freedom," Salvato said.

Several times during the two-week trial, Lentz was silenced for brief outbursts, but they were nothing compared with yesterday's. According to courtroom observers, Lentz began to yell at the jurors as the verdict was read, pleading with them to reconsider.

U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis III warned Lentz that if he could not be quiet, he would be removed from the courtroom. Lentz pointed at the judge's bench and screamed: "What difference does it make? You're in on it, too!"

"It's a great relief," said Doris Lentz's mother, Bernice "Gene" Butt, who attended the beginning of Lentz's retrial but found it too painful to stay. "It's been almost 10 years. I just hope it's finally over."

There has been no shortage of plot twists and suspenseful moments in the case of U.S. v. Jay E. Lentz .

Yesterday's conviction was actually his second. In July 2003, a federal jury found Lentz guilty of the same crime.

But that verdict was thrown out by U.S. District Judge Gerald Bruce Lee, who said prosecutors had failed to prove that a kidnapping, as defined by federal law, had taken place.

Then three jurors came forward and said they had viewed two of Doris Lentz's day planners, which had mysteriously and inappropriately shown up in the jury room. The planners contained material that included Doris Lentz's notes about threatening phone calls Jay Lentz allegedly had made to her.

The case then took an even more extraordinary turn: Lee accused the lead prosecutor at the time, Assistant U.S. Attorney Steven D. Mellin, of deliberately planting the day planners in the jury room. The battle reached the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit in Richmond, which in September 2004 threw out Lee's finding about Mellin, saying the judge made "a rather broad leap" without evidence.

Although the appeals court later reinstated the conviction, a new trial was ordered for Lentz because the jurors had seen the disputed materials. Lee was taken off the case by the appellate court. Mellin was not on the trial team for the retrial.

Among the most damning evidence presented against Lentz during the retrial was a taped jailhouse phone conversation between the defendant and Salvato, in which Lentz said a "hit guy" was on his way to the jail because he needed witnesses to disappear.

At the time Lentz made the comment, Salvato warned that such a statement would destroy him at his retrial.

The jury apparently agreed with the prosecution's assertion that Lentz lured his ex-wife from her Arlington County home in April 1996 to his house in Fort Washington under the pretense that she would be picking up their daughter, Julia, then 4.

Although her body has not been recovered, her car, the passenger seat spattered with blood, was found in the District. Prosecutors presented forensic evidence suggesting that a small drop of Lentz's blood was found on the upholstery.

Prosecutors repeatedly told the jury that Doris Lentz had feared for her safety, moving into a secure building to keep her ex-husband at bay. Several witnesses testified that Doris told them about threatening statements her ex-husband had made, such as "O.J. can happen again" and "I could kill you, and there would be no body."

"It was a premeditated crime," Assistant U.S. Attorney Erik Barnett told the jury in a closing statement last week: "It was a heinous crime. It was done by someone who was driven by hate and greed and a desire to keep Doris from getting money in their divorce litigation. He was striving for a goal."

On the last day of testimony, the daughter, Julia Lentz, now 14, took the stand briefly on her father's behalf, telling the jury that she remembers her father being emotionally distraught after her mother vanished and that she views him as "very nonviolent."

"It is very sad that a daughter is without her mother and now her father," Barnett told the jury, alluding to Julia during his closing statement. "But the decisions about Julia's future are not yours. They were made 10 years ago by someone else in this courtroom."

N.Y. High Court Revives Felony Counts Rooted In Judge's Misconduct (LAW)

By John Caher, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, March 31, 2006

The Court of Appeals in Albany, N.Y., Thursday reinstated six felony counts against former New York Supreme Court Justice Gerald P. Garson with a precedential ruling that judges can face criminal prosecution for acts that started with a violation of the Rules of Judicial Conduct.

Thursday's 6-1 opinion means the former judge accused of accepting bribes and kickbacks from a divorce lawyer is once again confronted with the full panoply of felony charges lodged against him following a sting operation initiated by Brooklyn District Attorney Charles J. Hynes' office.

Garson now faces trial on a total of seven felonies -- one count of receiving a bribe and six of receiving reward for official misconduct. All of the charges stem from an illicit attorney-judge relationship involving Garson and attorney Paul Siminovsky.

Garson's attorney, Diarmuid White of Manhattan, had argued -- successfully, in the lower courts -- that the Rules of Judicial Conduct could not be used to criminally prosecute a judge. The preamble to the rules makes plain that they are not designed or intended to support a criminal prosecution, and the Court of Appeals accepted that proposition in People v. La Carrubba, 46 NY2d 658 (1979). But Thursday the court clarified La Carrubba, holding that while a violation of the rules alone cannot sustain a criminal prosecution, judges are not immune from indictment when an ethics violation escalates into criminality.

In the Garson case, the court said, the judge not only violated the ethics code by partaking in ex parte communications and by improperly lending the prestige of his office but went a step further and took payment for his misconduct. That step, six of the seven judges agreed, transported Garson's case from the sole jurisdiction of a disciplinary agency to the criminal purview of Hynes' office.

"Had the judge as a public servant violated ethical duties alone -- without accepting a benefit for the violation -- and had the action not otherwise been prohibited by the Penal Law, the public servant would be subject to discipline in a proceeding brought by the Commission on Judicial Conduct," Judge Carmen Beauchamp Ciparick wrote for the majority.

The key legal holding Thursday -- that the prosecution may rely on the Rules of Judicial Conduct to establish an element of a crime -- was punctuated by a finding that La Carrubba is not controlling in People v. Garson, 28.

The Garson case is rooted in a three-year relationship between a judge assigned to a matrimonial part in Brooklyn and a matrimonial lawyer.

The prosecution alleges that Siminovsky gave Garson money and gifts in exchange for ex parte advice on pending cases, client referrals and favorable treatment. It also is alleged that the judge demanded a referral fee for his wife, now Civil Court Judge Robin Garson, who had apparently sent a client to Siminovsky. Siminovsky, according to proof before the grand jury, contributed to then-candidate Robin Garson's campaign and also gave her husband $1,000.

Many of the charges stem from a divorce case involving Avraham Levi, who allegedly was steered to Garson by Siminovsky. While the Levi case was pending before Garson, the Brooklyn district attorney began a video and audio surveillance of the judge's robing room.

Garson was heard telling Siminovsky that Levi would prevail, even though he did not deserve to, and instructing the lawyer on how to proceed.

Siminovsky was arrested shortly thereafter and agreed to assist the prosecution. The lawyer, wearing a recording device but unaware the video surveillance was continuing, brought Garson a box of expensive cigars on March 4, 2003, and the two men further discussed the Levi case, according to court records.

On La Carrubba grounds, Justice Steven W. Fisher, now of the Appellate Division, 2nd Department, dismissed six felony counts of receiving reward for official conduct and two misdemeanor counts of official misconduct. That left only one felony of third-degree bribe receiving and misdemeanors of official misconduct and receiving unlawful gratuities. The 2nd Department affirmed, also on La Carrubba.

Thursday, the Court of Appeals, after Chief Judge Judith S. Kaye granted leave to the prosecution, reinstated the six felonies.

PERVERSE RESULT

At oral argument on Feb. 7, Brooklyn Assistant District Attorneys Leonard Joblove and Seth M. Lieberman stressed what they said was an illogical consequence that would result from an affirmance. They noted that, under Fisher's decision and the 2nd Department opinion, a judge who takes a bribe while properly attending to his duties -- for instance, while conducting a proper conference with all parties present -- would face criminal sanctions. But a judge who took a bribe while violating the Rules of Judicial Conduct -- for instance, while conducting an improper, ex parte conference -- would be immune. That argument seemingly struck a chord with the court.

DOJ_NMG_0024749

"We see no justification for such a perverse result -- not in the plain language of the statute, not in the legislative history, and not in our precedents," Ciparick wrote. "Thus we conclude that the People may rely on the Rules Governing Judicial Conduct to prove the element of a judge's 'duty as a public servant' within the meaning" of the Penal Law.

Ciparick said that since the rules are designed to ensure "the integrity of the judiciary and the resultant confidence and impartiality," then "any other construction runs afoul of these goals."

She continued, "To hold otherwise, as urged by the dissent, would lead to the incongruous result of insulating judges from criminal liability ... because they have a formal body of rules governing their conduct while subjecting other public servants ... to criminal liability for similar conduct."

WAS DEFENDANT ON NOTICE?

In lone dissent, Judge George Bundy Smith argued that neither the New York Constitution nor the Rules of Judicial Conduct nor the Penal Law "authorize a prosecutor to charge a judge with crimes by alleging violations of the Rules of Judicial Conduct." Bundy Smith said he could find no cases and no statutes giving any authority to hold a judge criminally liable for failing to abide by the ethics rules.

"There is no question that the prosecutor has amassed a great deal of damning evidence against the defendant," he wrote. "However, what is at issue is whether or not Rules of Judicial Conduct can be used as a predicate for a criminal prosecution ... There is not a single case that supports the majority's assertion that defendant was on notice that the Rules of Judicial Conduct would serve as the basis for a criminal prosecution."

Bundy Smith suggested the majority decision raises more questions than it answers. For instance, he pondered whether a judge who advises a friend or relative to retain a particular lawyer or recommends a particular law school runs the risk of criminal sanction. But the majority said that fear is unfounded.

"We do not imply that a judge, acting in a purely private, unofficial capacity, may not refer a friend or acquaintance to a lawyer when the judge expects no benefit for doing so," Ciparick wrote in response to the dissent. "But the grand jury could have concluded that that is not what happened here."

CREDIBILITY STILL AT ISSUE

Hynes told a press conference Thursday that the ruling "makes it crystal clear that this kind of conduct is not going to be acceptable," according to his spokesman.

"The law binds everyone equally, the judges no less than those who are judged," Hynes said.

White, Garson's lawyer, said that while Thursday's decision adds a slew of felony charges for his client to defend, the factual assertions underlying those felonies would have been admissible anyway when the trial begins June 15.

"In the big picture, it doesn't change things much," White said. "The credibility of the witnesses will be the issue."

The defense attorney also questioned the wisdom of the court's ruling and the impact it may have on judicial-prosecutorial relations, particularly in the smaller communities.

"Judges could feel under some pressure that they are being scrutinized by the district attorney, and I don't think that is a good idea," White said. "That is why I think an independent judicial commission should be the body investigating judges, not the district attorneys."

Siminovsky, who was disbarred, has pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor of giving unlawful gratuities to a judge and awaits sentencing.

State Prisons Ordered To Pay Millions Owed To Doctors (LAT)

By Jenifer Warren

The Los Angeles Times, March 31, 2006

SACRAMENTO — Managers of California's beleaguered prison system received a double dose of bad news today as a federal judge ordered them to pay tens of millions of dollars owed to doctors who treat inmates, and the state launched an audit of their agency.

Some of the doctors have not been paid in four years. Some of their contracts have lapsed. And some who deliver cardiology, radiology and a wide range of other services to prisoners are no longer responding when called.

U.S. District Judge Thelton Henderson, who recently put the state prisons' healthcare system in the hands of a federal receiver, ordered that outstanding doctor bills --- which total more than $58 million --- be paid within two months.

Henderson also had harsh words for corrections leaders, saying they have stuck "their collective heads in the sand" instead of resolving the contracting mess.

"Predictably," he added, "this stunning example of the state's bureaucratic inaction … is now culminating in a crisis."

Lax healthcare in California prisons is blamed for an average of 64 preventable deaths a year. In naming a federal receiver to take over this year, Henderson determined that corrections officials were incapable of solving the problem alone.

DOJ_NMG_0024750

Meanwhile, state Controller Steve Westly said his office will audit the department to determine why prison healthcare is so poor, despite a doubling of funding since 2000.

"The taxpayers have nothing to show for the billions spent on prison healthcare. Instead, we've seen the first federal takeover of a state agency in California history," said, Westly, who is also a candidate for governor.

Dr. John Henry, a general surgeon in San Luis Obispo County, hasn't been paid since September. Henry said treating inmates at Avenal State Prison makes up about 40% of his caseload.

Until recently, he was performing about 20 surgeries a month on prisoners. But then the anesthesiologists at the local hospital stopped providing service to inmates because of nonpayment by the state. Now, Henry performs only emergencies, such as appendectomies, and even those "reluctantly."

"I won't tell you how much I'm owed, but it's a lot," Henry said. "Nobody wants to stop providing care, but this is ridiculous. We can't keep working for free."

Errors Prompt States To Watch Over Crime Labs (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, March 31, 2006

State legislators, troubled by reports of botched DNA tests and other mistakes by forensic analysts, have begun to establish oversight commissions to improve local crime labs and coroner's offices.

Virginia and Texas, where a lab technician mistakenly implicated the wrong man in a rape case, passed laws last year that set up such commissions. Legislators in New Hampshire, Vermont and Minnesota are considering similar plans this spring.

In Illinois, legislators are considering a plan that would require state and private labs to be accredited by a professional crime lab group. Oklahoma has had such a measure in place for three years. In Massachusetts, Gov. Mitt Romney, a Republican, revived the state's dormant oversight panel after a pair of eyes critical to a murder investigation were reported missing from a lab in 2002.

Beginning today, the American Judicature Society, a non-partisan policy research group of judges, attorneys and academics, begins a three-day conference in Greensboro, N.C., to establish recommendations for crime lab practices. The conference's co-chairs include former U.S. attorney general Janet Reno and former federal judge and CIA and FBI director William Webster.

Forensic science “is justice's best friend, but it has to not only be used right but done right,” says Texas state Sen. Juan “Chuy” Hinojosa, a Democrat who co-sponsored the bill that created Texas' commission. “There needs to be a way to hold the labs accountable.”

In Houston, the DNA unit of the city's police lab was closed in 2002 after a local television station, KHOU, reported several problems.

The problems included missing files, contaminated and poorly stored evidence and DNA test results that had been misinterpreted to wrongly match a suspect to a rape he had not committed.

The man, Josiah Sutton, was convicted and served 4½ years in prison. He was released after independent DNA testing revealed the lab error.

The laws and proposed laws differ from state to state. Generally, they require a crime lab's testing procedures and accuracy rates to be approved by an outside body, and they create a system for punishing misconduct.

In New York state, which established the first forensic science commission in 1995, commissioners have moved beyond checking lab standards to setting policies for collecting DNA.

Last December, the panel voted to allow about 40,000 DNA profiles to be taken from criminal parolees and probationers or as a condition of plea bargains. The profiles were added to a state database of known offenders, which is linked to a national DNA database run by the FBI.

Defense lawyers generally have favored setting up forensic science commissions.

In a statement last year, the New York City-based Innocence Project said the Texas commission would improve both the “quality” of Texas' justice system and “Texans' faith in that system.”

FBI: International Scam Targeting Islamic Mosques Broken (AP)

By GARRY MITCHELL, The Associated Press

AP, March 30, 2006

MOBILE, Ala. (AP) — An international wire fraud scheme targeting Islamic institutions with a phony stranded-traveler plea, netting only small sums but hitting multiple victims over many years, has been disrupted by the arrest of its mastermind, the FBI says.

DOJ_NMG_0024751

Islamic advocates say Mohammed Mustafa Agbareia, who was arrested in Canada and pleaded guilty March 1 in Alabama to one count of conspiracy to commit wire fraud, may have scammed more than $1 million from mosques and Islamic groups over nearly two decades.

He will be sentenced July 10 by U.S. District Judge Charles Butler in Mobile, where he is in the custody of federal marshals.

Agbareia is accused of claiming to be with a Saudi development bank investing in local Islamic society projects. Eventually he would contact Islamic leaders asking for money, saying he was stranded at an airport in Canada or another distant location and needed money wired.

Agbareia manipulated the Islamic tenet of lending aid to a stranded traveler, the FBI says.

He would always ask for $1,000 to $1,500 — amounts small enough to "pass under the radar" of local authorities, said Ibrahim Hooper, a spokesman for the Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR) in Washington, D.C.

"This guy was really unique," Hooper said in an interview Wednesday.

Agbareia, whose guilty plea was first reported by the Mobile Register, faces a possible 5-year prison sentence, a $250,000 fine and 3 years of federal supervision after his prison release. But penalties could vary because a religious institution was a victim and the court's sentencing guidelines are only advisory in this case, according to the plea agreement.

The scheme dates to the 1990s and had at least 45 victims in the United States before being halted. It involved over 10,000 solicitations for money, according to the FBI.

Agbareia was indicted in Mobile and Vermont on the fraud charges about a year ago. A second man, Zouhair Youssei Hissy, also was indicted in Mobile for an alleged role in the scheme and awaits extradition to the United States from Canada.

Agbareia, 40, was arrested in Canada pending his unrelated deportation to Israel. Records show he's from Nazareth in Israel.

The FBI probe of Agbareia began in Vermont where two victims were defrauded, an FBI spokesman said in a March 22 statement about the case. Another complaint came in Alabama in 2004 from the Islamic Society of Mobile Mosque.

Collecting victims' phone numbers on the Internet, Islamic institutions or mosques were contacted by Agbareia and Hissy, who claimed to represent the Saudi Arabia-based Islamic Development Bank (IDB).

Agbareia usually kept 60-80 percent of the money, with Hissy getting the remainder, the FBI said.

In Mobile, FBI spokesman Special Agent Craig Dahle said it's unknown how much money the scheme collected. He said there could be victims worldwide.

In the plea agreement, Agbareia, represented by the public defender's office, agreed to forfeit any proceeds of his criminal activity and cooperate with the government's investigation under threat of additional charges.

Faith, Family Tied To Disuading Gangs (WT)

By Amy Doolittle

The Washington Times, March 31, 2006

Faith and family must figure large in solving the region's growing gang violence problem, which also will require mentors who understand street culture, a panel of forum speakers and audience members said yesterday.

"Regardless of the message, one of the things I've found is that the message must be modeled by the messenger," said former Washington Redskins cornerback Darrell Green, who now operates several youth organizations. "I believe the best defense is a great offense."

Mr. Green was one of several panelists who participated in the Citizens Forum Project on Gang Violence, held at the Arbor Ballroom in The Washington Times building in Northeast.

Other panelists included Robert Woodson, founder of the National Center for Neighborhood Enterprise; the Rev. Fred Shuttersworth, a civil rights leader; Luis Cardona, a former gang member who works with at-risk area youth; and Robert Goodwin, president of the Points of Light Foundation.

About 200 students and residents attended the forum, the fifth in a monthly series, said Brian Bauman, director of The Washington Times Corp.'s Citizens Forum Project.

"One of the things that we've got to understand and [bring] into realization is that a gang member is not going to come to the door and say, 'Hey guys, could you save my life?' " said Juan Pacheco, a former gang member who works with gangs to bring peace.

"The probability of that happening is zero-point-zero. So we as individuals have to reach out to them," said Mr. Pacheco, 28. "We're tired of violence. We're tired of our brothers and sisters dying, man, and we need you, and you need us."

The Times reported yesterday that D.C. officials say there are more than 270 girl gangs alone in the District.

DOJ_NMG_0024752

In addition, the number of D.C. Superior Court cases involving female juveniles increased from 445 in 2003 to 571 in 2004. The number of girls brought before the court for violent offenses jumped from 225 in 2003 to 322 in 2004, a 43 percent increase.

T'Chaka Sapp, commissioner for Advisory Neighborhood Commission 8A, asked the all-male panel how the subject of female gangs should be addressed.

"The thing that I see today is a totally different dynamic," Mr. Sapp said. "It's the females now that are off the chain, and we need to come up with other methods. I see all men here. We need some females to deal with the female problems on the streets. It's the girl gangs that are tearing up D.C."

The panelists said good role models for girls and boys are critical in fighting gang violence.

"It all shows the need for us to work with our young woman so they don't feed off the attention they get when they act like gladiators protecting their honor," Mr. Cardona said.

Mr. Green agreed but emphasized the role of the traditional family.

"Somewhere you've got to teach a man how to love his wife and how to be a man, and someone's got to teach the woman how to be a woman," he said. "Even if you haven't got a family, someone's got to lead."

Mr. Pacheco, who said he is from Falls Church but declined to identify which gang he belonged to, said bringing gang members together to discuss why peace and community are important is also a critical step in ending the violence.

"You've got to hold high expectations of these gang members," he said. "We've got to remind them that we are family and that we are brothers and sisters. We are brothers and sisters, so why are we killing each other off?"

States Shelter Risky Borrowers (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

With Congress divided over federal legislation to combat predatory mortgage lending -- the practice of persuading borrowers into taking on fee-laden loans they often can't afford -- more than half the states have passed laws designed to protect riskier-than-average borrowers, and others are contemplating action to curb abuse.

At least 10 states -- including New York, West Virginia and New Mexico -- have adopted comprehensive laws in the past few years crafted to curtail tactics commonly used by unscrupulous lenders, including excessive penalties for paying off a loan early, inflated interest rates and frequent refinancing of a mortgage that does little to improve a buyer's finances but generates fees for lenders and brokers. Other states are taking it one issue at a time: Maryland has restricted prepayment penalties, for instance. And still others are considering proposals to subject lenders to greater liability if they are found to have duped home buyers.

The latest flashpoint is Ohio, which has the nation's highest mortgage-foreclosure rate. State legislators there are weighing measures that would allow the state attorney general to prosecute dubious lending practices and would establish a new legal duty for lenders and middlemen to look out for consumer's best interests, similar to the duty stock brokers have. The Ohio House of Representatives passed a bill this week, but the Senate, which passed its own version earlier this year, rejected it. The chambers must reconcile the measures before they become law. Mortgage-industry lobbyists are resisting.

In recent years, an expanding array of unconventional mortgages has made it possible for "subprime" borrowers -- those with spotty credit histories and lower credit scores -- to purchase or refinance homes. The Mortgage Bankers Association says more than 13% of outstanding mortgages are subprime, up from 2% seven years ago. Subprime borrowers pay higher interest rates on mortgages to compensate lenders for the added risk. Prime borrowers today typically face a 6.35% rate on a 30-year, fixed-rate mortgage. The Center for Responsible Lending, an advocacy group affiliated with a Durham, N.C., community-development lender called the Center for Community Self-Help, estimates a subprime borrower with a slightly worse-than-average credit score would pay more than 7%, and one with a sharply lower score would pay upward of 10%.

Industry officials say innovative mortgage products have helped millions of low-income Americans buy homes for the first time. They warn that an onerous mix of state rules is driving up costs and limiting mortgage availability, and they are pushing strongly for federal legislation that would pre-empt the rising number of state laws. "There's been this trend since 1999 for states and localities to implement their own laws," says Steve O'Connor, a lobbyist with the Mortgage Bankers Association. "It's effectively balkanized the national mortgage-finance system. It adds costs and risks to operations that are passed onto consumers."

Mr. O'Connor points to Montgomery County, Md., just outside Washington, where a local law aimed at holding brokers and lenders liable for racial discrimination prompted 50 lenders to leave the market, reducing availability and driving up costs. A judge recently issued a temporary injunction blocking the law, and Mr. O'Connor notes that some lenders since have returned to the market.

Consumer advocates counter that deceptive subprime lenders defraud homeowners out of billions of dollars each year by targeting potential buyers with little ability to understand -- let along repay -- complex loans. They cite a Center for Responsible Lending study that suggests credit availability and pricing haven't been adversely affected in areas where stringent restrictions have been enacted.

North Carolina sparked the current trend of state laws in 1999 with a statute that limits a variety of fees and financing methods common to subprime loans. "It's clear from studies that our predatory-lending law is protecting consumers, while at the same time loans are still widely available," said Roy Cooper, the state's attorney general.

In the U.S. House of Representatives, Rep. Spencer Bachus, an Alabama Republican who heads a financial-services subcommittee, is holding talks with a pair of North Carolina Democrats in an effort to model a federal standard based on their state law. In recent years, Congress has been in a stalemate over the question of whether to pre-empt state laws with a federal standard.

Speaking to a gathering of mortgage brokers in Washington this week, Rep. Barney Frank of Massachusetts, senior Democrat on the House Financial Services Committee, said he supports a uniform standard. "But," he added, "I don't want that to be a way of lowering consumer protection." Mr. Frank said he expects the bipartisan talks to reach agreement soon.

Meanwhile, state attorneys general have been feuding with federal regulators over whether they can enforce state lending laws against nationally chartered banks, which are regulated by the Treasury's Office of the Comptroller of the Currency. The Comptroller has said states can't use their laws against those banks, and last year won an injunction halting a probe by New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer into the lending practices of national banks in that state.

This week Mr. Spitzer appealed to the Second Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals in New York. Spitzer spokeswoman Christine Pritchard said the OCC's "anticonsumer agenda seeks to drastically alter the balance of federal-state powers and would leave New York powerless to protect its residents from unscrupulous practices." An OCC spokesman declined to comment.

Earlier this year, the attorneys general of 49 states reached a $325 million settlement with Ameriquest Mortgage Co. over a variety of abusive-lending charges. The states charged Ameriquest, the largest subprime lender at the time, with a litany of transgressions. Among them: influencing and accepting inflated appraisals, hiding fees and encouraging applicants to give inaccurate employment or income information to obtain loans. Ameriquest denied wrongdoing.

The Ameriquest payment was the second-largest consumer-protection settlement in history. The largest was a $484 million settlement in 2002 between states and Household International Inc. over alleged lending abuses. Household, like Ameriquest, denied wrongdoing, but agreed to change some of its lending practices. Household was acquired by HSBC Holdings PLC in 2003.

Cities That Lead The Way (NYT)

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

Crippled by soaring corrections costs, states and municipalities are re-examining policies that drive ex-offenders right back to prison by barring them from employment. Locked out of the mainstream, ex-felons become burdens to their families, their communities and the nation as a whole. Three cities — Boston, Chicago and San Francisco — have taken groundbreaking steps aimed at de-emphasizing criminal histories for qualified applicants for city jobs, except in law enforcement, education and other sensitive areas where people with convictions are specifically barred by statute.

The Boston plan, which becomes effective this summer, deserves to be widely emulated. It covers not just city employees but also the companies that do business with the city. Those companies, which employ hundreds of thousands of workers, will be required to make their employment policies consistent with those put forth by the city.

Under the new policy, the city will not conduct a criminal record review at all, except in special circumstances or when it is required by law. Even then, the search will come near the end of the process, after the applicant has proved to be qualified and is about to be hired. If the city then changes its mind about the job offer, the applicant is entitled to a full explanation and a chance to rebut the criminal records reports, which sometimes contain errors.

Taken together, the recent developments in Boston, Chicago and San Francisco symbolize a step forward in terms of fairness for law-abiding ex-offenders, who are often barred from entire occupations because of youthful mistakes and minor crimes committed in the distant past. It should be clear to all of us by now that confining those people to the ranks of the unemployed makes it more likely that they will commit new crimes, return to prison and become a permanent burden to society.

CIVIL LAW:

U.S. Demands Files From ISPs, Tech Firms (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0024754

By MARYCLAIRE DALE
AP, March 31, 2006

PHILADELPHIA - The Justice Department is demanding internal files from dozens of Internet service providers and other technology firms as it seeks to defend a controversial Internet child protection law.

The subpoenas are similar to one given to Google Inc., which waged a partially successful battle over the government's request for millions of pieces of information about search engine requests and Web site domains.

InformationWeek magazine unearthed subpoenas that show the government also demanded information from at least 34 other companies, including Internet service providers such as Comcast Corp. and EarthLink Inc., security software firms and other technology companies.

The subpoenas, which the magazine obtained through Freedom of Information Act requests, show the Justice Department preparing for an October trial in Philadelphia over the 1996 Child Online Protection Act. It is not clear which companies are complying, and to what extent.

"That money could be spent so much more wisely on giving software away to parents that are having these problems," Dan Jude, president of Security Software Systems, said of the litigation costs.

The 12-person firm, which makes filtering software, spent more than 40 hours trying to comply with the subpoena, he said. The company refused to provide some information on proprietary grounds, fearing it could make its way into the court file.

"If that information gets out in the public, we've just lost our competitive edge," Jude said Thursday. The subpoena also sought information the company does not keep, such as customer satisfaction, he said.

Department of Justice spokesman Charles Miller did not immediately return a message Thursday afternoon.

The subpoenas also went to companies including AT&T Inc., Cox Communications Inc., Verizon Communications Inc. and Symantec Corp.

The U.S. Supreme Court has twice said the law _ which would criminalize Internet material deemed "harmful to children" as defined by "contemporary community standards" _ is likely to violate First Amendment protections and granted preliminary injunctions.

Critics say that definition is so broad it would stifle free speech, and also note that pornographers and others could simply base their operations offshore, beyond the reach of U.S. authorities.

Online publishers who are challenging the law argue that filters are a less restrictive way to protect children. The publishers, which include sexual health sites, a gay newspaper and the online magazine Salon.com, are represented by the American Civil Liberties Union.

"Our overarching concern over what the government is doing (with the subpoenas) stems from the 'why,' _ what is it they're actually trying to accomplish?" said David McGuire, a spokesman for the Center for Democracy and Technology in Washington. "It doesn't seem reasonable."

CNET News, March 31, 2006

The Justice Department demanded information from at least 34 Internet service providers, search companies and security software companies as part of its probe related to the Child Online Protection Act (COPA), according to an article in InformationWeek on Thursday.

Some companies, including Cablevision Systems and Verizon, objected to the government demands, the article says. Other subpoena recipients included AT&T, Comcast Cable, Cox Communications, EarthLink, Symantec and United Online, according to InformationWeek, which filed a Freedom of Information Act request to get the information.

Google made headlines in January when it was disclosed that the search company had refused to hand over random search terms and Web address data that Yahoo, Microsoft and America Online had provided the government when asked. Google challenged the subpoena in court, arguing that it was overreaching. Earlier this month a judge ruled that Google didn't have to provide any search queries but did have to provide a much smaller number of Web sites in its index than the government had sought.

The government is seeking information on Web user behavior and filtering software and other tools in an effort to justify COPA, which faces a trial later this year. That law restricts the posting on commercial Web sites of sexually explicit material deemed "harmful to minors," unless it's made unavailable to the youngsters. The ACLU argues that Web sites cannot realistically comply with such requirements and that the law violates the right to freedom of speech mandated by the First Amendment.

More Subpoenas In Suit Over Obscenity Law (NYT)

By Saul Hansell

DOJ_NMG_0024755

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

Both the Justice Department and the American Civil Liberties Union confirmed yesterday that they had requested and received information from Internet service providers and software makers in connection with an A.C.L.U. lawsuit challenging an anti-pornography law.

Earlier this year it was revealed that the Justice Department, which is defending the law, had subpoenaed information from four search engine companies about keyword requests by users. Google challenged its subpoena. This month a judge ordered the company to provide some information to the Justice Department but not information on individual searches, saying that had the potential to violate the privacy of users.

Last summer, the Justice Department also issued subpoenas to at least 34 Internet service providers and security software companies, according to information the department provided after a Freedom of Information Act request by InformationWeek magazine. The companies subpoenaed included America Online, Comcast, Verizon, EarthLink and Symantec.

The department is defending the Child Online Protection Act, which makes it a crime to post "material that is harmful to minors." Two years ago, the Supreme Court prevented enforcement of the law and ordered a lower court to consider whether filtering software designed to block inappropriate content was a better way to achieve the law's aims. The case goes to trial in October.

Charles Miller, a spokesman for the Justice Department, said the agency had issued the subpoenas "to see the effectiveness of Internet filters." He said he was not able to say which of the companies had responded to the subpoenas and to what extent they had complied.

The A.C.L.U. also subpoenaed many of the same companies, said Aden J. Fine, a lawyer for the organization. "We have asked for information that is relevant to the lawsuit, such as information to show that filters are effective," he said. Mr. Fine declined to say how many companies were subpoenaed and what questions they were asked.

While the A.C.L.U. had objected to subpoenas of individual search data as an invasion of users' privacy, Mr. Fine said it did not see similar concerns for requests for data from the Internet and software providers.

The Justice Department subpoenas did not, in fact, ask for information that could be attributed to any individual user. Rather, it asked for detailed quantitative and technical descriptions of the Internet filters that were offered to customers, how they worked and how many people used them. The department also asked for market research information on how many people wanted filters and how satisfied they were.

According to Mr. Fine, the Internet and software companies largely complied with both sets of subpoenas. According to a letter provided to InformationWeek, Verizon initially raised objections and requested clarifications on issues mainly related to Justice Department requests for contracts and other trade secrets.

David Fish, a spokesman for Verizon, said that the company provided the information after reaching an agreement with the Justice Department on who would have access to it.

G.O.P. Is Taking Aim At Advocacy Groups (NYT)

By Carl Hulse And Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 30 — To many Republicans, the liberal activist organization MoveOn.org is a political boogeyman that they hope to chase off with new restrictions on so-called 527 groups.

But the pursuit may turn out to be fruitless. Like other major groups planning to inject themselves aggressively into the midterm elections through advertisements, voter drives and issue fights, MoveOn.org has already figured out what it thinks is a better, and less controversial, way to spend its millions. Its 527 — named for a section of the tax code — is being put on ice.

"Our 527 is dormant," said Eli Pariser, executive director of MoveOn.org. He said his group would predominantly operate as a conventional political action committee, allowing it to more freely mix explicit political support and issue advocacy in a way that Mr. Pariser described as "squeaky clean."

MoveOn.org might be moving on from its 527, but Congress is not. Two years after 527's burst onto the political scene, gaining notoriety by raising unlimited amounts from private donors, Congressional Republicans are moving to rein in the groups — just in time for the November midterm elections. Leading Democrats are threatening a fight.

In the House, the Republican leadership intends to bring a plan to impose new restrictions on 527 groups to the floor next week to spur action in the Senate, where Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, a champion of the campaign finance bill that bears his name, is offering similar legislation.

"I think this leaves a gaping loophole in the McCain-Feingold campaign finance bill," the House majority leader, Representative John A. Boehner, Republican of Ohio, told reporters on Thursday, referring to a bill co-sponsored by Senator Russell D. Feingold, Democrat of Wisconsin. "I think it needs to be fixed."

DOJ_NMG_0024756

But Mr. Boehner's Democratic counterpart, Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, denounced the effort, saying that Republicans could draw unlimited money from wealthy corporations and trade associations that used their own nonprofit arms to wage issue campaigns.

Both Mr. McCain and the House leaders want to limit annual donations to 527 groups and force them to abide by the more stringent rules governing political committees if they are active in federal races.

A federal district judge in Washington this week also called for action, ruling that the Federal Election Commission had "failed to present a reasoned explanation" for not requiring 527 groups to register as political committees. The judge, Emmet G. Sullivan, ordered the commission either to articulate its reasoning for evaluating 527 complaints on a case-by-case basis, or to "promulgate a rule, if necessary."

But even if the campaign to stamp out 527 groups succeeds, it may not greatly impede third-party involvement in political campaigns, which is flourishing as advocacy groups adapt and discover ever more creative ways to pour their contributions into the political process.

Independent organizations are already working on behalf of candidates in both parties, rallying support behind issues, canvassing for voters and preparing for big-money efforts, with many steering clear of the 527 approach. And some of the deep-pocketed 527 groups that were active in 2004 are so far on the sidelines.

"Unless and until they actually manage to repeal the First Amendment itself, we are going to find a way to give voice to the tens of thousands of people who share our views and want to have a voice in the political process," said Pat Toomey, president of the Club for Growth, an antitax group that has been sued by the election commission over the conduct of its 527 in a 2004 Senate race.

The 527 groups drew intense scrutiny after Swift Boat Veterans for Truth ran its campaign attacking the war record of the Democratic presidential nominee, Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts. But while Swift Boats drew the spotlight, the liberal philanthropist George Soros nearly single-handedly redefined the scope of campaign finance by contributing millions to progressive groups like MoveOn.

So while candidates of both parties suffered at the hands of 527 committees, the drive to limit them is being pushed largely by Republicans who fear that Democratic advantages among the groups could swamp some of their candidates.

"It is the Loch Ness monster in 527 form, rising out of the mist to eat them," scoffed Robert Bauer, an election law specialist opposed to the proposed restrictions on 527 committees.

After 2004, the Federal Election Commission scrutinized some 527 groups and sued Club for Growth. The result, said Kenneth A. Gross, a campaign finance lawyer, was that "527's have been demonized to some extent," prompting many outside advocacy groups to rely on another provision of the tax code, 501c(4), which governs nonprofit groups.

Business and trade associations typically operate under a similar provision, 501c(6). As a bonus, the 501c groups are not required to disclose their donors, as 527 groups are.

Tony Massaro, executive vice president for political affairs at the League of Conservation Voters, said his group relied on its 501c(4) status because it could push directly for the election of specific candidates right up to Election Day, since the group takes no union or corporate money. Were it a 527, the advertisements would have to skirt that issue and strike a fuzzier theme of urging voters to contact candidates about their positions on divisive issues — a gimmick that Mr. Massaro said comported with the law but left the public cold.

"Voters get frustrated by that game," said Mr. Massaro, who said his organization would spend $3 million to $5 million and was already working on behalf of Democratic Senate candidates in Florida, Pennsylvania and Washington.

Brad Woodhouse, a spokesman for Americans United, a 501c(4) group, said that category allowed his organization to work closely with like-minded Democrats in shaping its advocacy program, including its current push for changes in Medicare's new prescription drug program. Such contact that would be prohibited for a 527.

Representative Mike Pence, an Indiana Republican who is an opponent of restraining 527 committees, likened the current atmosphere to whack-a-mole, the carnival game where the player hits a mole with a hammer, only to have another pop up. He is backing legislation that would raise limits on contributions to political parties — an idea that opponents say would gut previous reforms.

"We hit political parties and 527's pop up," Mr. Pence said. "We're going to whack them and 501c's are going to pop up."

Despite the current dip in 527 activity, some new ones are being established, including one opposing Senator Rick Santorum, a conservative Republican in a tough re-election race in Pennsylvania. Veteran Democratic operatives just established a new group called Fresh Start for America, which is expected to engage in Senate races this year.

As lawmakers prepare for a potential fight, Mr. Pariser of MoveOn.org said there could be one unexpected consequence. He suggested the effort to clamp down on 527 groups could enhance the influence of his organization because it would have the financial means to mount aggressive campaigns while potential competing groups would be handcuffed.

"We will be better positioned to do political ads," he said. "I presume that was not their intent."

House May Limit Nonprofit Campaign Funds (AP-Y2)

By Jim Abrams

AP2, March 30, 2006

The House next week will take up a bill to constrict the money-raising ability of nonprofit political groups that emerged as a substantial force in the 2004 presidential election.

The bill to require groups known as 527s to register as political committees and abide by contribution limits is likely to meet resistance from Democrats, who in 2004 relied on 527s as a key source of financing.

"I will strongly oppose it," House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi said Thursday.

The decision by GOP leaders to bring up the 527 bill separately could make it easier for the House and Senate to reach a compromise on lobbying and ethics legislation working its way through Congress.

The Senate on Wednesday led the response to recent lobbying scandals by passing legislation that would ban lobbyists from giving gifts and meals to lawmakers and require lobbyists to disclose more about their contacts with legislators. Lawmakers would have to get approval before taking privately funded trips and file reports when they travel on private corporate jets.

Senators from both parties warned against complicating the lobbying bill by combining it with controversial campaign finance issues, including that of 527s, but House GOP leaders have backed making that part of their package.

House Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier, R-Calif., said that could still happen. "We're still trying to determine how at the end of the day we will put this together."

On Wednesday a U.S. District judge ruled, in a case brought by President Bush's campaign and lawmakers, that the Federal Election Commission had failed to give a reasoned explanation for its decision not to issue rules requiring 527s — named after the section of the tax code that covers them — to register as federal political action committees. That would subject them to the same fundraising, spending and disclosure rules as PACs must follow.

The judge did not say that the FEC had abused its discretion, and he did not order it to develop rules for their fundraising and spending. However, he told the commission to "articulate its reasoning" or write a rule for the groups "if necessary."

The House bill is expected to be based on legislation offered by Reps. Christopher Shays, R-Conn., and Marty Meehan, D-Mass., partners in sponsoring the 2002 campaign finance act that banned national party committees and federal candidates from raising unlimited corporate and union donations.

Shays, who disagreed with most of his Republican colleagues in backing the 2002 act, criticized Pelosi and other Democrats who oppose his 527 bill. "There's no defense for saying you are for campaign finance reform and then not voting to close a loophole, except blatant partisan politics."

The Shays-Meehan bill would limit to $5,000 per year what an individual can give to a federal political committee to influence federal elections. The ceiling is $25,000 for nonfederal funds to pay for voter mobilization and public communication activities.

House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, at a news conference Thursday, said nonprofit group spending had become "a gaping loophole" in the law. "To have all of this unregulated campaign cash going to these organizations and allowing them to engage in campaign activities without any disclosure is wrong," he said.

The nonpartisan Political Money Line, a campaign finance tracking service, found that in the 2004 election groups supporting Sen. John Kerry or opposing President Bush raised $266 million, including multimillion-dollar donations from wealthy businessmen such as George Soros. Anti-Kerry, pro-Bush groups, most prominently the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth that questioned Kerry's Vietnam war record, raised $144 million.

Pelosi said it was "the height of hypocrisy" that the Republicans were trying to limit 527s but were not restricting trade associations and other business groups exempt from some rules applying to political committees.

"If they are going to do it, just do it across the board," she said.

Judge Says FEC Failed To Curb Soft Money (AP-Y2)

By Toni Locy

AP2, March 30, 2006

The Federal Election Commission failed to give a good reason for refusing to rein in nonprofit political groups that spent huge sums in the 2004 presidential elections, a judge has ruled in a case brought by President Bush's campaign and lawmakers.

In a 34-page opinion, U.S. District Judge Emmet G. Sullivan said the FEC failed to give "a reasoned explanation" for its decision not to issues rules to require so-called "527" groups to register as federal political action committees and face the same strict fundraising, spending and disclosure rules PACs do.

But Sullivan stopped short of saying the FEC had abused its discretion. Nor did he order it to develop rules to crack down on the groups' fundraising and spending.

Instead, the judge in his ruling Wednesday sent the issue back to the FEC and ordered the commission to "articulate its reasoning," or come up with a rule for the groups "if necessary."

The nonprofit groups — nicknamed 527s after the section of the U.S. Tax Code that covers them — emerged as key players in the 2004 presidential election after a new law banned national party committees and federal candidates from raising unlimited, corporate and union donations known as soft money. PACs were already banned from taking soft money.

The 527 groups stepped into the void. Democrats in particular, worried that their party would lag behind the GOP in fundraising, quickly moved to set up soft money groups.

Fueled by multimillion-dollar donations from wealthy businessmen such as George Soros, pro-Democratic groups collected almost twice as much money as their Republican rivals, keeping Democratic nominee John Kerry's viewpoints on the airwaves while he rebuilt his finances after the expensive Democratic primary race. They also helped build pro-Democratic get-out-the-vote efforts.

Groups supporting Kerry or opposing Bush raised $266 million in the 2003-04 election cycle, while those opposing Kerry or backing Bush collected $144 million, a review by the nonpartisan Political Money Line campaign finance tracking service found.

The Bush campaign and lawmakers who sponsored the new campaign finance law pressed the FEC to crack down on partisan 527s while the presidential race was under way, arguing the groups were violating a broad ban on the use of soft money in federal elections.

But a majority of FEC members declined to adopt new regulations, contending the commission lacked authority to do so and that it was up to Congress and Bush to approve legislation doing so if they felt there was a need.

The FEC decision prompted the Bush campaign and lawmakers to sue the commission to try to force it to restrict the groups and led Republican activists to start pouring millions into new pro-Bush groups. They included Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, which made headlines in summer 2004 by alleging Kerry exaggerated his decorated Vietnam War service record.

Sullivan said he was "troubled" because the FEC ignored testimony from 31 politicians and more than 100,000 comments from people involved in the political process. The judge said the FEC's handling of the matter "does not reflect reasoned decision-making."

"We are very pleased with Judge Sullivan's opinion," said Fred Wertheimer, president of the Democracy 21 campaign finance watchdog group and an attorney for the two lawmakers who sued, Reps. Christopher Shays, R-Conn., and Martin Meehan, D-Mass.

Sullivan criticized the FEC's decision to handle complaints about the groups on a case-by-case basis, saying the commission's track record "appears to have been a total failure."

The judge noted FEC cases can languish for years and that penalties, "if they come at all, come long after the money has been spent and the election decided."

FEC Ordered To Rethink '527' Rules (WP)

By Thomas B. Edsall

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

U.S. District Judge Emmet G. Sullivan has rejected requests by the Bush-Cheney campaign and by two advocates of campaign finance legislation to order the Federal Election Commission to impose tough regulations on "527" political committees that put more than $400 million into the 2004 elections.

Instead, in a ruling issued late Wednesday evening, the judge gave the FEC a choice: Either explain in detail why regulations are not needed or begin proceedings to develop such rules.

In the 2003-04 election cycle, 527 committees active in federal elections raised $424 million, according to the Campaign Finance Institute. Pro-Democratic groups spent $314.4 million and pro-Republican groups spent $84.1 million.

The judge warned that if the FEC continues to treat 527 committee complaints on a case-by-case basis instead of issuing encompassing rules, it will have to explain how the interests of complainants will be protected under time-consuming processes that often do not produce any action until the election is over.

"Cases arising from the 2004 campaign have languished on the Commission's enforcement docket for as long as 23 months, with no end in sight, even as the 2006 election campaign has begun," Sullivan wrote. "The FEC can take years to complete an administrative action, and penalties, if they come at all, come long after the money has been spent and the election decided."

Two of the plaintiffs, Reps. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.) and Martin T. Meehan (D-Mass.), the House sponsors of the 2002 McCain-Feingold campaign finance law, interpreted Sullivan's order as a victory.

"Judge Sullivan supported our belief that the FEC's failure to bring 527s under campaign finance law was a dereliction of its duty by rejecting the FEC's justification for refusing to issue regulations. This was a crucial step in bringing fairness to our campaign finance laws," Shays said.

Sullivan's decision means the FEC must once again tackle the tough issue of the independent political committees, which were used in 2003-04 to get around legislation banning the use of large donations from unions, corporations and rich people -- also known as "soft money."

In May 2004, the FEC rejected regulation of 527s by a 4 to 2 vote. Three members have since been replaced -- Scott Thomas, who voted for regulation, and Bradley Smith and Danny L. McDonald, who voted against it.

It is not clear how the new commissioners are likely to vote.

Commission Chairman Michael E. Toner, who supported regulation, said the commission will take up the issue soon.

Alabama House, Senate Can't Agree On Military Voting (AP)

AP, March 30, 2006

MONTGOMERY, Ala. (AP) — The Alabama Senate and House can't agree on how to make sure military serving overseas get to vote in the primary runoff election this summer.

But the U.S. Justice Department is pressuring both to find a solution. It is suing the state, claiming there is not enough time between the primary election June 6 and the runoff June 27 for military personnel overseas to get and return absentee ballots.

The Senate voted 20-5 Thursday for a bill that would delay primary runoff by three weeks from June 27 to July 18 to make sure the military have time to get and return absentee ballots for the runoff.

On March 16, the House voted 100-1 for a bill that would keep the runoff on June 27, but would allow soldiers overseas to use special ballots. The ballots, which would be delivered with the primary ballots, would allow soldiers to mark their runoff preferences in races with three or more candidates.

Now, either the Senate must agree with the House-passed bill, or the House must agree with the Senate-passed bill.

The sponsor of the House bill, Rep. Lesley Vance, D-Phenix City, said moving the runoff may be the easiest way to resolve the issue, and he would try to get the House to pass the Senate version.

"We've got to think about those people fighting for our freedom and make sure their votes are counted," said Vance, whose east Alabama district is just across the state line from Fort Benning, Ga.

The Senate's bill, sponsored by Sen. Wendell Mitchell, D-Luverne, is supported by Attorney General Troy King and Secretary of State Nancy Worley.

Letter to the Editor: FIELDS SHOOTING (MJS)

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, March 30, 2006

Federal decision was made jointly

A recent article and an editorial in your paper reported that the Civil Rights Division "overruled" a decision by the U.S. attorney's office to prosecute an officer in the tragic fatal shooting of Justin Fields.

Advertisement

That is not true. Prosecutors from both of our offices, with more than a half-century of combined experience, carefully investigated and reviewed this matter and ultimately concluded that federal prosecution simply was not viable.

Their consensus is plain from the letter that closed this case, which stated that "this (United States Attorney's) Office and the Criminal Section of the Civil Rights Division . . . have concluded that there is not a federally prosecutable criminal case here."

Your editorial also erroneously claims that civil rights prosecutions have declined by 40%. To the contrary, the Justice Department has brought more criminal civil rights cases - and convicted 40% more law enforcement officials for misconduct - in the past five years than the preceding five.

Recent years saw our offices bring several civil rights cases in the Eastern District of Wisconsin, and we will continue to work together to vigorously enforce the federal civil rights laws.

What happened to Justin Fields is indeed a tragedy and we express our deep sympathies to his family. They deserve to know that our decision not to prosecute was made after a thorough and searching analysis of our comprehensive investigation.

Neither the family nor the community are served by any suggestion that our decision was based on something other than the facts and the law.

Violations Persist At Miss. Training Schools, Court Monitor Says (AP)

AP, March 31, 2006

JACKSON, Miss. - A federal court monitor says violations continue at Oakley and Columbia juvenile training schools.

In a report covering Aug. 1 to Dec. 15, 2005, the monitor says most of the conditions of the agreement that ended a Department of Justice lawsuit against the state over conditions at the two training schools were not met. A report that covered May and June last year, also was critical of the state's progress.

The schools serve 550 youths combined - boys ages 10 to 17 at Oakley in Hinds County and girls 10 to 18 at Columbia.

The current report cites, among other things, student complaints about staff cursing them and using inconsistent disciplinary practices and continued fights between students.

Court monitor Joyce Burrell said she was aware that the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina has impacted the Mississippi Department of Human Services.

"But the needs of this population and those rights that were determined to have been violated must be corrected as quickly as possible," Burrell wrote in the report filed in U.S. District Court in Jackson.

State officials entered a four-year consent decree with the Justice Department last May.

MDHS Executive Director Don Taylor said in a statement that Oakley and Columbia continue to be a high priority.

"We have made significant progress in all areas," Taylor said.

House Juvenile Justice Committee Chairman George Flaggs Jr., D-Vicksburg, said Wednesday that he's trying to be understanding and patient of the challenges the state faces with the two training schools.

"But it is hard for me to realize or conclude that it would not be in the best interest for the governor to step in and remove Oakley and Columbia from under the direction or supervision of the Department of Human Services.

"The department is too big, the problems are too many for one director to focus on at the same time and keep up the day-to-day operations," Flaggs said.

In addition to being sued over the conditions at the training schools, MDHS also is being sued over the foster care system.

The federal class-action lawsuit filed by the New York-based Children's Rights is scheduled for trial Aug. 7.

Massachusetts Court Limits Gay Unions (NYT)

By Pam Belluck And Katie Zezima

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

BOSTON, March 30 — Massachusetts's highest court, which legalized same-sex marriage here two and a half years ago, ruled Thursday that gay couples who live in states where such marriages are prohibited cannot marry in Massachusetts.

But the ruling left open the possibility that gay couples from states like New York and Rhode Island that do not explicitly ban same-sex marriage might be able to marry in Massachusetts.

The justices sent the cases of three of eight plaintiff couples, one from New York and two from Rhode Island, back to Superior Court to decide "whether same-sex marriage is prohibited in those states."

But couples from the vast majority of states cannot marry here because those states have either laws or constitutional amendments that bar same-sex marriage. The National Gay and Lesbian Task Force said the only other jurisdictions that do not specifically prohibit same-sex marriage are New Jersey, New Mexico and the District of Columbia.

The ruling, supported by six of the court's seven justices, upheld a 1913 law that says that no out-of-state resident can marry in Massachusetts if the marriage would be void in the person's home state, unless the person intends to live in Massachusetts.

"The laws of this commonwealth have not endowed nonresidents with an unfettered right to marry," Justice Francis X. Spina wrote in one of two concurring opinions, adding, "Massachusetts can reasonably believe that nonresident same-sex couples primarily are coming to this commonwealth to marry because they want to evade the marriage laws of their home states" and "Massachusetts should not be encouraging such evasion."

Chief Justice Margaret H. Marshall, who wrote the Supreme Judicial Court's November 2003 decision making same-sex marriage legal, wrote in the other concurring opinion, "It is rational for the legislature to take steps to ensure that marriages performed here will hold up elsewhere, and that they will not be ignored by other states."

Only one justice, Roderick L. Ireland, dissented, writing that "the commonwealth's resurrection of a moribund statute to deny nonresident same-sex couples access to marriage is not only troubling" but "also is fundamentally unfair."

The lawsuit began after same-sex marriage became legal in Massachusetts in May 2004 and Gov. Mitt Romney, an opponent of it, invoked the 1913 statute, which had been originally adopted in part to block interracial marriages. Mr. Romney refused to record out-of-state marriages, saying, "Massachusetts should not become the Las Vegas of same-sex marriage."

The decision by Mr. Romney, a Republican, was backed by the state's attorney general, Thomas F. Reilly, a Democrat.

Eight couples from Connecticut, Maine, New Hampshire, New York, Rhode Island and Vermont sued, along with 12 Massachusetts cities and towns, claiming that the 1913 statute was discriminatory and had been invalidated by the legalization of same-sex marriage here.

On Thursday, the clerk of one of those towns, Margaret Drury of Cambridge, said, "We really feel like we are being forced to discriminate against out-of-state couples."

According to the State Department of Public Health, 7,341 same-sex couples married in Massachusetts from May 17, 2004, to Dec. 31, 2005, but the state does not keep track of how many were from out of state.

Mark Pearsall, 38, of Lebanon, Conn., who married his partner, Paul Trubey, 42, in Massachusetts in 2004 after Mr. Pearsall's mother, dying of cancer, gave them her engagement and wedding rings, said the ruling was "very disappointing for us."

"But ultimately we consider ourselves married," Mr. Pearsall said.

Although their marriage is invalid and they could have a civil union in Connecticut, Mr. Trubey said that would feel "like the back of the bus."

Amy Zimmerman, 33, who lives in New York City with Tanya Wexler, 35, and their four children, said she was "hopeful that the door seems to have been left open" for her marriage in May 2004 to be made official if the Superior Court decides that New York State does not bar same-sex marriage.

An appeals court in New York is scheduled to hear arguments in May in a lawsuit challenging state officials' interpretation that same-sex marriage is illegal in the state.

Governor Romney, in an interview Thursday, said, "This is an important victory for traditional marriage and for the right of each state to be sovereign as it defines marriage. It's very important to contain a bad initial decision on same-sex marriage by this court and not impose it on the other 49 states."

Peter Sprig, vice president for policy at the Family Research Council, called the ruling "gratifying" and said conservative groups would continue to push for a federal constitutional amendment against same-sex marriage and for similar amendments in states that do not already have them. Such an amendment will come before the Massachusetts legislature in May.

Advocates for same-sex marriage said they were disappointed by the Massachusetts ruling.

"I had very high hopes about this decision," said Matt Foreman, executive director of the National Gay and Lesbian Task Force.

Michele E. Granda, a lawyer for Gay and Lesbian Advocates and Defenders, which represented the plaintiffs, said that while her side had the option of asking the United States Supreme Court to hear an appeal, it was much more likely that her group would focus on the New York and Rhode Island cases, and would press the Massachusetts legislature to repeal the 1913 law.

A bill to repeal the law passed the State Senate overwhelmingly in 2004 but was not taken up in the House of Representatives, which at the time was led by a speaker who opposed same-sex marriage. It was recently reintroduced.

"This is a ridiculous, confusing and badly formed law," Ms. Granda said. "We live in a mobile society, and where someone lives today may have no meaning for them when they go on vacation next month or relocate a year from now."

Mass. Court Sets Limit On Same-Sex Marriage Law (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0024762

By Michael Powell And Michelle García
The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

Massachusetts's highest court ruled yesterday that most gay couples from other states cannot get married there, the first decision to affirm a legal limit on the landmark same-sex marriage law in the Bay State.

The Supreme Judicial Court knocked down a legal challenge to a 1913 state law that forbids a non-Massachusetts couple from getting married there if their marriage would not be recognized by their home state.

"The laws of this commonwealth have not endowed nonresidents with an unfettered right to marry," the court wrote. "The fact that this court concluded that there was no rational basis . . . for denying Massachusetts same-sex couples the right to enter into civil marriages does not now compel a conclusion that nonresident same-sex couples . . . have an identical right."

The court ruled in 2003 that it would be unconstitutional under state law to prevent gay couples who live in Massachusetts from marrying. More than 6,000 gay couples have since married there.

Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, who is considering a bid for the Republican presidential nomination and often mentions his opposition to same-sex marriage, called the decision a victory for "traditional marriage." He had ordered local officials to enforce the 1913 law after the state's highest court issued its same-sex marriage ruling.

"We don't want Massachusetts to become the Las Vegas of same-sex marriage," Romney told reporters. "It's important that other states have the right to make their own determination of marriage and not follow the wrong course that our Supreme Judicial Court put us on."

Gay rights activists expressed relief that the legal bedrock of the court's original decision remained intact -- namely, that Massachusetts gay couples have an unfettered right to marriage. And they pointed to national polls that report a growing number of Americans -- though not quite a majority -- support same-sex marriage. Those who say that they are strongly opposed have dropped from 42 percent to 28 percent in the past two years, according to the Pew Research Center.

The Washington state Supreme Court is expected to rule soon on the constitutionality of a state law prohibiting same-sex marriage. Two lower courts have struck down the law. Unlike Massachusetts, Washington has no law prohibiting nonresidents from getting married there if their own state prohibits it.

But activists acknowledged that yesterday's ruling in Massachusetts on the 1913 law casts a shadow. "It's unfortunate that the Massachusetts courts did not strike down this barrier that discriminates against gay marriage," said Evan Wolfson of Freedom to Marry.

The court ruling was a split one, and several justices offered passionate dissents. They stated that Romney is relying upon the "resurrection of a moribund statute" in a way that is "fundamentally unfair." Marriage, wrote one justice, "is a basic human right."

The ruling left behind several ambiguities, not least what happens to the marriages of those from states such as New York and Rhode Island. Both states have no explicit ban on same-sex marriage, and New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer has issued an opinion, now being challenged in state court, that New York should honor same-sex marriages performed elsewhere.

Nor is it entirely clear what becomes of the marriages of those who managed to slip under the legal deadline in those first days after the 2003 same-sex marriage ruling.

Christopher McCary and John Sullivan of Anniston, Ala., are among those whose marriage certificate is now in doubt. They hopped on a plane to Provincetown, Mass., on May 16, 2004. The couple wanted legal protections and the right to adopt a child. They got married, said McCary, 45, "because society celebrates it and the expectations that go with marriage -- that you are expected to be faithful and be there for each other in old age."

But they knew that their license would be rendered meaningless the minute they returned home. Alabama law prohibits same-sex marriage.

The social benediction came anyway. Back home, friends and family congratulated them. McCary recalled that even "the redneck down at the gym said, 'Congratulations. Good for y'all.' "

Non-state Gays Cannot 'Marry' (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein
The Washington Times, March 31, 2006

The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court yesterday upheld a 1913 state law that blocks out-of-state homosexual couples from legally "marrying" there.

"[T]he laws of this Commonwealth have not endowed nonresidents with an unfettered right to marry," Justice Francis X. Spina wrote for the 6-1 majority.

The high court's ruling continues current policy, which says out-of-state couples cannot marry in Massachusetts unless their marriage is permissible in their home state.

DOJ_NMG_0024763

Because Massachusetts is the only U.S. state to allow same-sex "marriage," the 1913 law effectively bans nonresident homosexual couples from "marrying" there.

However, the high court suggested that New York and Rhode Island might allow same-sex "marriage," and directed plaintiffs from those two states to seek lower court hearings to determine whether same-sex "marriage" is prohibited there.

Most of the eight out-of-state homosexual plaintiff couples live in states where same-sex"marriage" is clearly prohibited, the court noted in its ruling.

Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, a Republican, praised yesterday's ruling, saying: "We don't want Massachusetts to become the Las Vegas of same-sex marriage.

"It's important that other states have the right to make their own determination of marriage and not follow the wrong course that our Supreme Judicial Court put us on," Mr. Romney said.

Plaintiff Mark Pearsall of Connecticut called the ruling "illogical," and his lawyers at the Gay & Lesbian Advocates & Defenders said it was "disappointing."

The decision "is a speed bump on the long road to fairness," said Joe Solmonese, president of the Human Rights Campaign, which promotes homosexual rights.

Massachusetts became the first U.S. state to legalize same-sex "marriage" with the 2003 Goodridge decision. When the first homosexual ceremonies were held in May 2004, Massachusetts officials invoked the 1913 law to block applications of out-of-state homosexual couples.

In June 2004, eight out-of-state homosexual couples and a group of town clerks filed lawsuits to overturn the 1913 law.

But yesterday, the court ruled that the law, which was written to prevent out-of-state couples from evading local marriage laws, was constitutional.

It also agreed that application of the 1913 law "has inevitably fallen disproportionately on nonresident same-sex couples."

However, the Goodridge decision does not mean that "nonresident same-sex couples, who have no intention of living in Massachusetts, have an identical right to secure a marriage license that they could not otherwise obtain in their home states," the court said.

Massachusetts "has a significant interest in not meddling in matters in which another state, the one where a couple actually resides, has a paramount interest," it added.

Justice Roderick L. Ireland, the sole dissenter, said his colleagues failed to keep marriage gender-neutral. Yesterday's decision helps "reconstruct the edifice of discrimination we dismantled in Goodridge," he warned.

To date, 44 states have laws or amendments that uphold traditional marriage and ban same-sex "marriage," said the Massachusetts Family Institute, which supports traditional marriage.

This year, voters in at least seven states -- Alabama, Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Virginia and Wisconsin -- will have constitutional marriage amendments on their ballots.

Meanwhile, lawsuits seeking same-sex "marriage" rights are under way in California, Connecticut, Iowa, Maryland, New Jersey, New York and Washington.

The Washington Supreme Court decision is expected at any time. Washington does not have restrictive marriage laws, and if that court rules in favor of same-sex "marriage," homosexual couples from across the nation can readily marry there.

Bid For Rosa Parks Pardon (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

MONTGOMERY, Ala., March 30 — The Alabama House unanimously passed a bill on Thursday that would pardon Rosa Parks and hundreds of other people arrested for violating the state's segregation-era laws.

The original bill was amended to say that the arrest records would not be expunged or sealed from public view, but would be turned over to the State Department of Archives and History. That way, backers said, the records will provide a permanent record of civil disobedience that, in many cases, helped lead to desegregation.

Some critics of the original legislation had argued that pardons might cause history to forget courageous acts like Mrs. Parks's refusal to give up her seat on a Montgomery city bus to a white man.

Schiavo Family Marks Her Death Anniversary (WT)

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, March 31, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0024764

Family members of the late Terri Schindler Schiavo commemorated the anniversary of her death, which is today, and announced the creation of a foundation in her name to combat euthanasia.

The foundation's mission will be to eliminate the persistent vegetative state, the condition that doctors said Mrs. Schiavo was in, as a diagnosis for patients, said her brother Bobby Schindler.

But the foundation, which also will have a separate lobbying organization, will seek to have feeding tubes classified as ordinary care for hospital patients and to make people aware of the need to have advance directives or living wills in case they cannot communicate their wishes late in life.

"We lost in our battle to save Terri, but we believe it is incumbent upon us to save the lives of others from this culture of euthanasia and choosing death instead of life," said her mother.

Mrs. Schiavo's parents, Robert and Mary, her brother and sister Suzanne Schindler-Vitadamo yesterday spoke of their work in the past year to build support for the foundation and the book they have authored on Mrs. Schiavo's life: "A Life that Matters: The Legacy of Terri Schiavo -- a Lesson for Us All," the proceeds from which will be donated to the foundation.

Mrs. Schiavo died of starvation and dehydration March 31, 2005, after living 15 years in what doctors call a persistent vegetative state, unable to feed herself or communicate with others. She slipped into a coma in 1990 and never recovered her higher mental functions.

Her husband, Michael Schiavo, who won a legal fight with her family to have her feeding tube removed, said his wife had told him that she would not have wanted to be kept alive in that way.

Members of Congress, the Catholic Church and President Bush all spoke on behalf of saving Mrs. Schiavo's life as the family battled the decision in court, and Congress returned from Easter recess to pass bills to stop the euthanasia.

Sen. Sam Brownback, Kansas Republican, was the only member of Congress to stand with the family yesterday, and he pledged to continue the fight to protect life.

"Terri's plight highlighted the core question about the protection of human life: Does the dignity with which we treat individuals depend on their physical and mental status as human beings," Mr. Brownback asked.

"Once we go down the path of valuing some lives more than others, of saying that people with disabilities don't have the same dignity and right to life as others, there are few means not justified by the sinister end of a disability-free society."

The National Pro-Life Action Center bought 600 copies of the family's book at a cost of $10,000 as a donation and plans to distribute them to every member of Congress, top White House officials and all Supreme Court justices. The foundation is based in St. Petersburg, Fla., and the family has been on a speaking tour to talk about the Schiavo case and euthanasia.

Ga. Solo Challenges Courtroom Pledge (LAW)

By Greg Land, Fulton County Daily Report

Fulton County (GA) Daily Report, March 31, 2006

Attorney Donald A. Weissman won't have to stand for the Pledge of Allegiance when he goes to court in Gwinnett, Ga., today, but he's still concerned that others will feel compelled to declare their loyalty to the U.S. government in order to get a fair hearing from Magistrate Judge Mark A. Lewis.

Lewis, hearing civil cases for a Gwinnett Superior Court judge tied up with a criminal trial, begins each day in court by turning to face the U.S. flag and reciting the pledge.

Lewis said he started the practice after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Weissman recently complained about the practice in a letter to Lewis and the court administrator.

According to Gwinnett County Court Administrator Philip M. Boudewyns, Lewis said that he would forego the pledge when Weissman is present, but will continue the practice on other days.

Thursday, the judge responded officially, entering an order chiding Weissman for passing the complaint letter -- which had been marked "confidential to be opened by recipient only" -- to the Daily Report.

Lewis also defended his actions by citing a 2003 Georgia Supreme Court decision that said a judge's request that jurors stand for the pledge "shows no bias, either for the State, or for one who is charged by the State with a crime."

In that case, Robles v. State, 277 Ga. 415, Justice P. Harris Hines, writing for the 5-2 majority, said there was nothing wrong with asking jurors to pledge to a flag that stands for "liberty and justice for all."

In his order, Lewis wrote that participation in the pledge by others in the courtroom "is not mandatory, requested, or required."

Because he stands with his back to the audience, wrote the judge, he has no way of knowing who joins in; those who particulate do so "spontaneously," he said. Claytor v. Kosteski, 05-A-08735-1, (Gwin. Sup. Ct., March 30, 2006).

"That doesn't change anything," said Weissman, a solo practitioner. The practice "still gives the improper appearance of partiality" by "creating an atmosphere that's inherently coercive and intimidating."

Weissman's concerns are rooted in a January appearance before Lewis. Weissman, who was representing a client in a civil contempt proceeding, said he was surprised when Lewis opened court by requesting that everyone remain standing for the Pledge of Allegiance.

"I found it professionally inconsistent with what I thought should go on within the courtroom," said Weissman. "I've been practicing law [for] 43 years in Georgia, and I've never seen a declaration of loyalty required in any court."

Weissman said nothing that day, but he sent a letter March 17 to Lewis requesting that he halt the practice.

"It is offensive to me as a citizen of the United States and it is objectionable to me as an attorney sworn to uphold the laws and constitutions of the United States and Georgia and as an officer of the Court," wrote Weissman, "that you apparently consider your Judicial forum to be an American Court, rather than a Court for all persons situated in America."

Noting Gwinnett's large population of immigrants and noncitizens, Weissman decried the pledge recital as pressure upon court attendees "to either declare their personal loyalty to this nation ... or suffer the risk that they may be treated differently."

He also wrote that such a practice may place Lewis in violation of Georgia's Canons of Judicial Conduct, particularly those barring actions that "appear to address matters which distinguish between litigants based on national origin or citizenship."

Clarke County Superior Court Judge Steven C. Jones, chairman of the Judicial Qualifications Commission, said he was unaware of any similar complaints in his nine years on the bench.

In his letter and in an interview, Weissman was careful to point out that he had no reason to think Lewis exercised any bias.

"But the requirement of a declaration of loyalty seems to divide the courtroom into two parts," he said. "They have to choose whether they will stand with the judge or not."

In his order, Lewis mentioned that a reporter for the Daily Report had called him several times for comment, and stated that he would not respond because he did not want to have ex parte communications with anyone about the case Weissman is arguing, a routine civil contempt proceeding.

Gwinnett County Superior Court Chief Judge K. Dawson Jackson said through an assistant that he would have no comment on the matter.

Boudewyns, the Gwinnett court administrator, said he was not aware of other Gwinnett judges who recite the pledge in their courtrooms.

Lewis' order said that, far from being negatively influenced by the Weissman's letter, he "applauds Mr. Weissman for challenging a practice that he finds questionable and personally offensive."

Weissman expressed puzzlement when questioned about the new order.

He said he made the letter public because he had received no response.

"There's nothing that precludes me from disclosing my own letter," he noted.

The ex parte claims, he said, are out of place because "the rules of ex parte communications are very specific. They refer to communications concerning the matter before the court. My letter had no bearing on the case before him. ... It related to how he conducts his court."

As to the Robles citation, "I don't think that applies," he said. "Robles was a defendant who was not an American" challenging a conviction, he said.

"The decision did not address a judge requesting the whole court to pledge to the flag. ... It seems to me that when a judge brings his personal view of patriotism into the courtroom, everyone may feel compelled to join in the exercise."

"He wants to commemorate Sept. 11? That's fine," said Weissman. "But what's that got to do with a declaration of loyalty? There was no attack on the courthouse in Gwinnett County. And it certainly does not follow, in my mind, that every person who appears there should be compelled to declare their loyalty."

Blacks Turn To Internet Highway, And Digital Divide Starts To Close (NYT)

By Michel Marriott

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

African-Americans are steadily gaining access to and ease with the Internet, signaling a remarkable closing of the "digital divide" that many experts had worried would be a crippling disadvantage in achieving success.

Civil rights leaders, educators and national policy makers warned for years that the Internet was bypassing blacks and some Hispanics as whites and Asian-Americans were rapidly increasing their use of it.

But the falling price of laptops, more computers in public schools and libraries and the newest generation of cellphones and hand-held devices that connect to the Internet have all contributed to closing the divide, Internet experts say.

Another powerful influence in attracting blacks and other minorities to the Internet has been the explosive evolution of the Internet itself, once mostly a tool used by researchers, which has become a cultural crossroad of work, play and social interaction.

Studies and mounting anecdotal evidence now suggest that blacks, even some of those at the lower end of the economic scale, are making significant gains. As a result, organizations that serve African-Americans, as well as companies seeking their business, are increasingly turning to the Internet to reach out to them.

"What digital divide?" Magic Johnson, the basketball legend, asked rhetorically in an interview about his new Internet campaign deal with the Ford Motor Company's Lincoln Mercury division to use the Internet to promote cars to black prospective buyers.

The sharpest growth in Internet access and use is among young people. But blacks and other members of minorities of various ages are also merging onto the digital information highway as never before.

According to a Pew national survey of people 18 and older, completed in February, 74 percent of whites go online, 61 percent of African-Americans do and 80 percent of English-speaking Hispanic-Americans report using the Internet. The survey did not look at non-English-speaking Hispanics, who some experts believe are not gaining access to the Internet in large numbers.

In a similar Pew survey in 1998, just 42 percent of white American adults said they used the Internet while only 23 percent of African-American adults did so. Forty percent of English-speaking Hispanic-Americans said they used the Internet.

Despite the dissolving gap, some groups like the Intel Computer Clubhouse Network, which introduces digital technologies to young people, say the digital divide is still vast in more subtle ways. Instant messaging and downloading music is one thing, said Marlon Orozco, program manager at the network's Boston clubhouse, but he would like to see black and Hispanic teenagers use the Internet in more challenging ways, like building virtual communities or promoting their businesses.

Vicky Rideout, vice president of the Henry J. Kaiser Family Foundation, which has studied Internet use by race, ethnicity and age, cautioned that a new dimension of the digital divide might be opening because groups that were newer to the Internet tended to use less-advanced hardware and had slower connection speeds.

"The type and meaningful quality of access is, in some ways, a more challenging divide that remains," Ms. Rideout said. "This has an impact on things like homework."

In addition, Internet access solely at institutions can put students at a disadvantage. Schools and other institutions seldom operate round the clock, seven days a week, which is especially an issue for students, said Andy Carvin, coordinator for the Digital Divide Network, an international group that seeks to close the gap.

But not everyone agrees that minorities tend toward less-advanced use of the Internet. Pippa Norris, a lecturer on comparative politics at Harvard who has written extensively about the digital divide, said members of minorities had been shown to use the Internet to search for jobs and to connect to a wide variety of educational opportunities.

"The simple assumption that the Internet is a luxury is being disputed by this group," Ms. Norris said.

The divide was considered so dire a decade ago that scholars, philanthropists and even President Bill Clinton in his 1996 State of the Union address fretted over just what the gap would mean in lost educational and employment opportunities for young people who were not wired.

In an effort to help erase the divide, the federal government has provided low-cost connections for schools, libraries, hospitals and health clinics, allocated money to expand in-home access to computers and the Internet for low-income families and given tax incentives to companies donating computer and technical training and for sponsoring community learning centers.

As a result of such efforts, "most kids, almost all kids, have a place in which they can go online and have gone online," said Ms. Rideout of the Kaiser foundation.

Jason Jordan of Boston is one of the young people closing the divide. Jason, 17, who is black, is getting a used computer from an older brother. He said he had wanted a computer for years, since "I heard about a lot that I was missing."

Jason said he had access to the Internet at school, where he is pursuing a general equivalency diploma, but looked forward to having his own computer and Web access at his home in the Dorchester section of Boston. "I can work in my own place and don't have to worry about the time I'm online," he said.

Like Jason, almost 9 out of 10 of the 21 million Americans ages 12 to 17 use the Internet, according to a report issued in July by the Pew Internet and American Life Project. Of them, 87 percent of white teenagers say they use the Internet, while 77 percent of black teenagers and 89 percent of Hispanic teenagers say they have access to it, the report said.

The gap in access among young Americans is less pronounced than among their parents' generation, said Susannah Fox, associate director of the Pew project. "Age continues to be a strong predictor for Internet use," Ms. Fox said.

While, overall Internet use among blacks still significantly trails use among whites, the shrinking divide is most vividly reflected in the online experience of people like Billy and Barbara Johnson. Less than two years ago, the Johnsons, who are black, plugged into the Internet in their upscale suburban home near Atlanta for the first time. Mrs. Johnson, a 52-year-old mother of four and homemaker, said she felt she had little choice because her school-age children needed to use the Internet for research.

And then there is e-mail. "No one really wants to take the time anymore to pick up the phone and keep in touch," lamented Mrs. Johnson, who said that so much of the communications with her children's school was done through e-mail correspondence. "I felt like I was pretty much forced into it."

Even so, Mrs. Johnson said her husband, an assistant coach for the Atlanta Falcons, still chided her when she neglected to check her e-mail at least every day.

Ms. Norris and other experts on Internet use see progress on the horizon. They note that the declining cost of laptop and other computers, and efforts, like those in Philadelphia, to provide low-cost wireless Internet access, are likely to increase online access for groups that have been slow to connect.

Philanthropic efforts have also helped to give more people Internet access. For example, the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation has awarded $250 million since 1997 for American public libraries to create Internet access for the public. Martha Choe, the foundation's director of global libraries, said some 47,000 computers had been bought for 11,000 libraries. Today, Ms. Choe said, most libraries in the United States have public Internet access.

Education levels remain a major indicator of who is among the 137 million Americans using the Internet and who is not, said Ms. Fox.

There is also a strong correlation, experts say, between household income and Internet access.

With so many more members of minorities online, some Web sites are trying to capitalize on their new access. For example, the New York/New Jersey region of the State of the African American Male, a national initiative to improve conditions for black men, is encouraging men to use digital equipment to "empower themselves" to better their lives. The site, which includes studies, public policy reports and other information about issues related to black men, promotes using digital cameras, mobile phones and iPods, but mainly computers, to organize through the Internet, said Walter Fields, vice president for government relations for the Community Service Society, an antipoverty organization, and a coordinator of the black-male initiative. Users are encouraged to submit articles, write blogs and upload pertinent photographs and video clips.

"What we're doing is playing against the popular notion of a digital divide," Mr. Fields said. "I always felt that it was a misnomer."

ANTITRUST:

Builder's Concrete Admits Role In Price-fixing Scheme (AP)

By Charles Wilson

AP, March 31, 2006

INDIANAPOLIS - A second central Indiana company and its president have agreed to pay millions of dollars in fines after admitting they conspired to fix the price of ready-mix concrete paid by homeowners, building contractors and the government.

The U.S. Department of Justice announced the guilty plea by Builder's Concrete & Supply Co. Inc. of Fishers on Thursday. The company was charged in U.S. District Court in Indianapolis with violating the federal antitrust Sherman Act, which prohibits restraint of trade.

Government attorneys allege that Builder's President Gus B. "Butch" Nuckols III hosted at least two price-fixing meetings of central Indiana concrete executives at a horse barn next to his house in Fishers, a northern suburb of Indianapolis.

"Price fixing threatens our free market system and robs consumers of the benefit of competitive prices," Thomas O. Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the Justice Department's Antitrust Division, said in a statement. "We vigorously investigate and prosecute companies and individuals involved in these conspiracies."

The company issued a statement Thursday saying it "remains committed to its central Indiana employees, customers and local communities." Family owned Builder's Concrete has 136 employees, 77 trucks and five plants in central Indiana.

Four former executives of another company, Irving Materials Inc. of Greenfield, were sentenced to prison for their role in the scheme in December, and IMI was fined $29.2 million, the largest fine ever in a domestic antitrust investigation.

Shelbyville-based Shelby Gravel Inc. also has acknowledged its role in the scheme in court documents filed last month but is seeking leniency and could be spared criminal charges.

Builder's Concrete agreed to pay $1.5 million to $11.5 million in fines, the Justice Department said. Nuckols agreed to pay a $50,000 fine and serve time in jail. Government lawyers are recommending a 21-month sentence, which must be approved by a judge.

The agreement must be reviewed by a federal judge.

The investigation is continuing, the Justice Department said.

DOJ_NMG_0024768

From July 2000 to May 2004, the companies involved conspired to set the prices charged homeowners, building contractors and the government for ready-mix concrete in the Indianapolis metropolitan area, according to court documents.

The government alleges that Nuckols and other conspirators agreed on prices and discounts for ready-mixed concrete and the timing of price increases. The government also alleges that Nuckols made phone calls and met with other individuals to assure their compliance in the scheme.

Ready-mixed concrete is made on demand and often delivered to work sites by mixer trucks. Purchasers include do-it-yourselfers, home and commercial builders, schools and the government. The material is used in projects including sidewalks, patios, driveways, bridges and roads.

Feds Look Into Purchase Of Knight Ridder Papers Local Consumer Watchdog Interviewed About Mercury News, CC Times (SFC)

By Carolyn Said, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, March 31, 2006

Federal antitrust regulators have begun looking at McClatchy Co.'s $4.5 billion purchase of Knight Ridder, an investigation that is legally required for any transaction of that size. Regulators may also be looking at what the pending sale of the San Jose Mercury News and Contra Costa Times would mean for competition in the Bay Area.

A U.S. Department of Justice spokeswoman confirmed that the department is looking at the deal, announced earlier this month, which would make McClatchy the nation's No. 2 newspaper company. "We will review it carefully," she said.

McClatchy acquired Knight Ridder's 32 newspapers and promptly said it will sell 12 of them. Those papers include the San Jose Mercury News, Contra Costa Times and Monterey County Herald, which have a combined daily circulation of 495,000.

One potential buyer is MediaNews Group of Denver, which already owns nine Bay Area dailies with a combined circulation of just over 300,000.

The director of a local media consumer watchdog group said he was interviewed by the Justice Department on Wednesday about the ramifications of MediaNews buying the Bay Area papers.

John McManus, director of GradetheNews.org, which is based at San Jose State University, said he had a 45-minute interview with a Justice Department attorney about his concerns if MediaNews bought the Mercury and Contra Costa Times.

McManus said he worries that MediaNews ownership would adversely affect the quality of local journalism. "My first concern is that there would be fewer and less skilled reporters covering the news in the Bay Area and Sacramento," he said. "ANG (Alameda Newspaper Group, a MediaNews arm that publishes the Oakland Tribune and five other local papers) tends to pay reporters poorly."

Additionally, he fears there would be less competition among newspapers on stories, lower ethical standards under MediaNews, and fewer Bay Area editorial voices taking positions on elections and other issues.

Jody Lodovic, president of MediaNews, declined to comment on whether the company is bidding for the Mercury and other Knight Ridder papers. Lodovic said he thinks McManus' comments show a lack of knowledge of the media marketplace.

"Competition is not defined by newspapers (alone) anymore," he said. "The world is different, there's plenty of competition in the marketplace. There are plenty of weeklies, other dailies, the Internet, other media all over the place."

The Justice Department spokeswoman said she doesn't know whether the department is investigating the pending sale of the 12 Knight Ridder newspapers.

Under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Act of 1976, any investor buying a stake valued at more than $15 million or 15 percent of a particular security must file notification with the federal government, beginning a 30-day review period.

Regarding Justice Department inquiries into a possible MediaNews purchase of Bay Area newspapers, Lodovic said, "I don't see why anybody's been reviewing the situation when there hasn't been any deal done."

Antitrust Regulators Examining Proposed Purchase Of Knight Ridder (AP)

By Mark Sherman

AP, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON - Antitrust regulators are reviewing the McClatchy Co.'s proposed $4.5 billion takeover of Knight Ridder Inc., including its plan to sell 12 newspapers it is acquiring.

While the decision to investigate the proposed deal's effect on competition and prices is fairly routine given its size, the government also apparently is interested in who might buy the Knight Ridder papers McClatchy plans to sell.

Among the 12, the St. Paul Pioneer Press is being sold to address potential antitrust concerns. It competes directly with McClatchy's Star Tribune in Minneapolis.

Meanwhile, a journalism lecturer at San Jose State University said he received a call this week from a Justice Department lawyer inquiring about the effect on advertisers if MediaNews Group Inc. were to buy the San Francisco Bay area's San Jose Mercury News and Contra Costa Times from McClatchy. MediaNews already owns several papers in the area and is widely believed to be interested in those two.

The Washington-based lawyer "asked about the impact of a MediaNews buyout on advertisers, rather than on consumer prices or news quality. But he was willing to listen to concerns about concentration of ownership on the news product," John McManus wrote on the GradetheNews Web site. McManus directs the group, which evaluates Bay area media outlets.

Justice Department spokeswoman Gina Talamona confirmed that antitrust lawyers are examining the proposed McClatchy-Knight Ridder deal, but she would not comment on specifics about the inquiry.

McClatchy hasn't set a timetable for completing the auction, but it wants to dispose of the 12 papers at the same time that it completes its acquisition of Knight Ridder, based in San Jose, in June or July.

Sacramento, Calif.-based McClatchy is retaining 20 other papers included in the Knight Ridder deal.

2nd UPDATE: US Government Questions EU Case Against Microsoft (DOW)

Dow Jones, March 31, 2006

BRUSSELS -(Dow Jones)- The U.S. government says it has "substantial concerns" about European regulators' antitrust case against Microsoft Corp. (MSFT) (MSFT), according to a person who has seen a letter sent to regulators.

Relations between Brussels and the software giant have "hit a new low," the letter said.

The U.S. letter could re-ignite transatlantic tensions that peaked in 2001 when the European Commission, the regulatory arm of the European Union, notoriously blocked General Electric Co.'s (GE) (GE) planned merger with Honeywell International Inc. (HON) (HON). Since then, Neelie Kroes has succeeded Mario Monti as the commission's top antitrust official.

The letter is particularly delicate, since Kroes is seen as a more "pro- American" commissioner than Monti, a U.S. diplomat said. The diplomat said " Washington ordered (its) E.U. mission to send the letter," noting that Microsoft (MSFT)has been pressuring U.S. officials and politicians to intervene on its behalf.

The commission's antitrust spokesman, Jonathan Todd, said the regulator received the letter via email Monday and also met with a U.S. diplomat to discuss its contents.

Microsoft (MSFT) and the commission currently are grappling in a closed door hearing in Brussels. The commission claims Microsoft (MSFT) hasn't complied with its March 2004 antitrust ruling. In that decision, the regulator fined Microsoft EUR497 million and ordered it to change some of its business practices.

Microsoft (MSFT) has accused the commission of collaborating with rival companies and withholding key evidence that could be used in its defense. Microsoft's (MSFT)allegations of a lack of "transparency and fairness ... if accurate, are of substantial concern to the U.S.," the letter said, according to the person who has seen it.

The U.S. mission to the E.U. is led by C. Boyden Gray, a former White House lawyer who lobbied for Microsoft (MSFT) during its U.S. antitrust battle.

The U.S. has questioned Brussels' treatment of Microsoft (MSFT) before. The March 2004 decision was described as "unfortunate" by R. Hewitt Pate, then the head of the U.S. Justice Department's antitrust division.

Microsoft's (MSFT) spokesman, Tom Brookes, also declined to comment.

Microsoft Gets U.S. Government Backing In EU Antitrust Dispute (BLOOM)

By Matthew Newman John Rega

Bloomberg, March 31, 2006

March 30 (Bloomberg) -- Microsoft Corp., the world's largest software maker, is getting U.S. government support for its complaint that European Union antitrust regulators have denied access to evidence needed for the company's defense.

Microsoft's complaint raises ``substantial concerns," U.S. diplomats in Brussels said in a memo sent to the European Commission this week. The U.S.'s EU mission is led by C. Boyden Gray, a former White House counsel who lobbied on behalf of Microsoft during its battle with the U.S. Justice Department.

Relations between Microsoft and the EU have ``hit a new low," the memo said. The U.S. said it wanted to ensure that the commission treated the company fairly, according to a copy of the two-paragraph letter seen by Bloomberg News.

The EU ruled in March 2004 that Microsoft illegally abused the dominance of its software, which runs on more than 90 percent of the world's personal computers, and fined it a record 497 million euros ($601 million). The regulator is threatening an additional 2 million euros in daily fines unless the company provides ``complete and accurate" information to competitors on how the Windows operating system communicates on networks.

In February, Microsoft demanded ``full access'' to the case file, accusing the commission of violating its rights of defense. The commission refused to release letters between the regulator and two experts it hired to help on the case, arguing that the correspondence is ``internal.''

Tom Brookes, a spokesman for Redmond, Washington-based Microsoft, had no comment. Jonathan Todd, a commission spokesman, also declined to comment.

The company has accused the commission of collaborating with its competitors to influence an independent trustee that is monitoring Microsoft's compliance with the 2004 antitrust ruling. The software maker said the commission encouraged ``secret contact'' between four competitors and trustee Neil Barrett.

The commission said Barrett is obliged to ``proactively make contact with third parties.''

Microsoft in September asked companies to intervene in its antitrust case, arguing that a court ruling against it would lead to a loss of control of ``valuable trade secrets.''

Microsoft Gets U.S. Help In EU Antitrust Fight (WSJ)

By Adam Cohen

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

BRUSSELS – As Microsoft Corp. and the European Commission squared off in a hearing over possible new antitrust fines on the software giant, the U.S. government weighed in on the company's behalf to say it has "substantial concern" about Europe's case.

U.S. intervention, in an email to EU regulators and European capitals, comes at a delicate time. The case could reignite trans-Atlantic tensions that peaked in 2001 when the European Union notoriously blocked U.S.-based General Electric Co.'s planned merger with Honeywell International Inc. More recently, the U.S. and EU have worked to harmonize how they deal with business regulation, but Microsoft and the EU have been escalating their public battle.

An email earlier this week from the U.S. mission to the EU, now headed by former White House counsel C. Boyden Gray, notes that relations between Brussels and the software giant have "hit a new low" and refers to Microsoft's complaints that EU proceedings aren't fair or transparent because regulators are withholding from the company key evidence that could be used in its challenge of their orders.

The allegations, "if accurate, are of substantial concern to the U.S.," the email said, according to a person who has seen it. EU officials met with a U.S. diplomat to discuss it this week, the person said, as Microsoft and the commission prepared for their showdown over EU contentions that the company is flouting its orders to help rivals make products that mesh with its ubiquitous Windows operating system.

Separately Wednesday, a U.S. district court in California quashed a Microsoft bid to move the fight into the U.S. legal system. The company asked the court to help it obtain documents related to its European antitrust case from U.S.-based rivals Oracle Corp. and Sun Microsystems Inc., which participated in the case. Microsoft had complained that European regulators weren't giving it enough information to prepare its challenge.

A U.S. diplomat said the email was ordered in Washington, where Microsoft has been pressuring the government to intervene on its behalf. Its disclosure comes as Neelie Kroes, the chief EU antitrust regulator who has been working to realign EU enforcement with that of the U.S., is visiting Washington officials.

The U.S. has questioned Brussels's treatment of Microsoft before. The EU's original March 2004 decision, ordering Microsoft to make changes and fining it €497 million ($598 million), was described as "unfortunate" by R. Hewitt Pate, then head of the U.S. Justice Department's antitrust division.

The commission's antitrust spokesman, Jonathan Todd, declined to comment on the matter. Microsoft's spokesman Tom Brookes also declined to comment.

In the hearing Thursday, an independent computer expert -- who has labeled Microsoft's efforts to comply with European antitrust orders "useless" -- detailed his findings before a hearing room packed with the company's supporters and opponents. Then Microsoft tried to tear down his arguments and avoid €100 million or more in new fines.

Neither side expects the showdown, requested by Microsoft, to change European regulators' plans to proceed with the penalties. They would come on top of the fines ordered in 2004, when regulators found Microsoft was unfairly leveraging its dominant Windows system to crowd out competition in other areas.

Cecilio Madero, the commission official leading the Microsoft case, Thursday accused the company of using the hearing "purely for media." In recent weeks, the company has accused the computer expert, Neil Barrett, of colluding with Microsoft's rivals to harm the company, though the EU chose him to advise them from a list of experts Microsoft provided. Partly because of Mr. Barrett's conclusions, Microsoft faces the added fines, which can rise until the commission is satisfied that Microsoft has complied with its orders.

The two-day hearing, which concludes Friday with testimony from Microsoft rivals and supporters, is designed to give Microsoft a chance to fight off the fine and finding of noncompliance. A commission official leads the meeting, and the commission will take some weeks to decide whether to start the fines. Microsoft, decrying the commission's closed-door proceedings, asked the commission to open the hearing to the public but was turned down.

In the hearing, Mr. Barrett went through a detailed presentation of his efforts to use Microsoft's instructions for rivals on how to mesh with its programs, according to people attending. Microsoft also argued it has done more than enough to comply with EU orders and is willing to make further concessions.

U.S. Asks European Union To Be Fair In Microsoft Case (NYT)

By Paul Meller

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

BRUSSELS, March 30 — The United States government has intervened in Microsoft's antitrust dispute with the European Commission, urging it and the 25 national governments in the European Union to be fair to the company, American diplomats and European officials said on Thursday.

Microsoft has complained frequently in recent months that it has been denied the right to a fair defense in the continuing antitrust case with the European Commission. It has also accused the commission of collaborating with its rivals in the software industry and denying it access to what it contends are vital documents it needs to prepare its defense.

A memo written by unidentified government officials in Washington stated that Microsoft's complaints raise "substantial concerns" about the way Microsoft is being treated, according to a person close to the commission who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the memo. The memo was distributed this week through embassies in Europe and through the United States mission to the European Union in Brussels.

United States diplomats visited the offices of three European commissioners earlier this week. Jonathan Todd, the spokesman for the competition commissioner, Neelie Kroes, confirmed that her close aides met American diplomats this week and received the memo. He declined to comment on its content.

The diplomats also visited the offices of the internal market commissioner, Charlie McCreevy, and Gunter Verheugen, vice president of the commission, according to the person close to the commission.

A United States official denied that the American government was coming to Microsoft's aid in the antitrust dispute. "Our interest is less that than wanting to see that everything is done properly," said the official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the tenuous nature of the matter.

Microsoft's spokesman in Brussels, Tom Brookes, said on Thursday that he was unaware of the memo.

The United States government's action came as Microsoft's top lawyers arrived in Brussels to make a final attempt to persuade regulators not to impose daily fines of up to 2 million euros, or $2.4 million. The commission has accused Microsoft of failing to comply with an antitrust ruling in March 2004 that found the company abused its market dominance. In addition to fining the company 497 million euros, the commission ordered Microsoft to disclose technical documentation that rival makers of server software need to develop programs that work properly with the Windows operating system.

The regulator argued that by withholding this information, Microsoft was giving an unfair advantage to its own software programs, which function seamlessly with computers that run Windows. Microsoft contends it has satisfied the requirements of the order.

"We are in compliance," Brad Smith, Microsoft's top lawyer, told journalists at the end of the first of two days of closed hearings with the commission and with rival software manufacturers. "We are committed to doing everything in our power to find a solution to this impasse."

Microsoft made most of the presentations during the first day, according to a person in the room who spoke on the condition of anonymity because parties in the dispute are supposed to refrain from commenting. "Microsoft appeared to be urging the European regulators to come back to the negotiating table," this person said. "Their lawyers mentioned the success of the settlement with the Department of Justice at least 15 times during their presentations today."

Dow Jones, March 31, 2006

DES MOINES, Iowa -(Dow Jones)- Whirlpool Corp.'s (WHR) (WHR) antitrust attorneys had it pegged right all along.

They had predicted that the Justice Department wasn't going to decide the merits of a Whirlpool acquisition of Maytag Corp. (MYG) (MYG) on the basis of market share but rather on whether the bulked-up company, which already is the world's largest appliance maker, could change industry dynamics and raise prices, to the detriment of consumers.

DOJ_NMG_0024772

Indeed, in giving its stamp of approval to the $1.7 billion acquisition Wednesday the government's antitrust watchdogs focused on pricing power.

"Market shares are not always likely to be the best predictor" of how his agency would rule, new antitrust unit chief Thomas Barnett said at a news conference Wednesday.

Last July Mark C. Schechter, a onetime Justice Department official who now specializes in antitrust issues at the Washington law firm of Howrey Simon Arnold & White LLP, and was among those advancing Whirlpool's case, had told Dow Jones Newswires that the merger would pass DOJ muster.

He said the regulators would consider whether the acquisition could give Whirlpool enough power to profitably raise prices at least 5%, an outcome Schechter considered "implausible."

That analysis ran counter to what became a mini-groundswell of misplaced opinion, on Wall Street and in the financial press, on how the government would rule in what some saw as a barometer of the Bush administration's views on business competition.

Some skeptics had asserted that the overwhelming market share a Whirlpool- Maytag combo would hold in the home-laundry business would almost surely bring a thumbs-down from Justice's antitrust staff, and would require some concessions to get eventual approval.

In an interview Thursday, Schechter speculated that such thinking may well have been encouraged by Whirlpool competitors, who had "made a significant effort to spin the deal as posing a problem" on the basis of market share.

Schechter said he believed the agency's antitrust staff viewed the matter of dominant share versus pricing power "as a close question." But after a "very comprehensive investigation" it agreed with the company that high market shares are not an accurate indicator of market impact.

In its ruling the department said that the "combination of strong rival suppliers with the ability to expand sales significantly...indicates that this transaction is not likely to harm consumer welfare."

Addressing that point at his news conference, Assistant Attorney General Barnett noted that South Korean manufacturers LG Electronics and Samsung Electronics, as well as other foreign competitors, could increase their imports into the U.S. should it become financially advantageous.

Whirlpool's and Maytag's (MYG) attorneys presented millions of pages of documents, including numerous depositions, and held what Schechter said were a "huge number of meetings" all the way up the line at the department's antitrust division, including two with Barnett and his staff.

Schechter said he didn't regard the decision either as a "great victory" or as an indicator of a shift in how the department would view future acquisitions for their competitive consequences.

The government has had mixed luck with recent merger litigation, losing challenges involving purchases by Oracle Corp. (ORCL) (ORCL) and Arch Coal Inc. (ACI) (ACI).

On whether Justice was worried about the risks of a Whirlpool trial, Barnett would only say that the agency carefully weighs how solid a case is before suing.

"We recognize that we bear the burden of proof when we go to trial," he said. Barnett wouldn't comment on whether antitrust division staffers had recommended such a challenge.

Shares of Whirlpool were trading recently at $93.08, down $2.87, or 3%, after gaining 7% on Wednesday. Those of Maytag (MYG) were trading at $21.51, down 30 cents, or 1.4% - but still above Whirlpool's $21 offering price. Maytag (MYG) shares gained 28% Wednesday.

Judge Sanctions Gateway For Destroying Evidence (WSJ)

By Christopher Lawton

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

A federal judge in Utah harshly reprimanded Gateway Inc. for destroying or losing evidence "in bad faith" in a patent-infringement case brought by an inventor against the computer maker.

The plaintiff, Phillip M. Adams, a former International Business Machines Corp. engineer, filed the suit in 2002 after talks fell through with Gateway in 2001 over licensing his patented technologies that address a defect in circuitry used to control floppy-disk drives. Mr. Adams asserts in the lawsuit that Gateway violated a nondisclosure agreement signed between the parties, and that the company infringed on his patents. He later added allegations that Gateway lost or destroyed documents needed to help prove his case, which is scheduled to go to trial Monday.

U.S. District Judge Ted Stewart sided with Mr. Adams, in a ruling that was issued March 6 and unsealed March 22. He chastised Gateway for failing to disclose information that a magistrate judge had found central to the case. Although he found no "direct" evidence about Gateway's intentions, he cited "ample circumstantial evidence" that Gateway acted in bad faith.

The ruling cites a missing email from a supplier to a Gateway employee that contained Mr. Adams's software for detecting the defect.

"Based upon the entire record, this court concludes that the explanation is that it was destroyed in bad faith by Gateway," the judge wrote in a memorandum. He added that "the court finds that it is clear that for years Gateway did everything it could to avoid producing complete copies of all the relevant emails."

Judge Stewart stopped short of granting Mr. Adams's request to decide the entire case in his favor because of Gateway's actions. But he sanctioned the company, ordering it to pay Mr. Adams's attorney fees incurred in connection with the litigation over the alleged document destruction.

Gateway, which leveled its own allegations that Mr. Adams destroyed documents, admitted to errors in handling the evidence, but insisted that it didn't intentionally conceal information. The company said that upon learning of the problems, it acted promptly to comply with orders for document discovery in the case.

"Gateway continues to dispute the characterization of this discovery battle, and we will continue to defend ourselves vigorously in this case. Plaintiffs have chosen to focus all of their energy on creating discovery disputes, and we're pleased to finally have the court consider the merits of this case," John Spelich, a spokesman for Gateway, said in a prepared statement.

A partner with Howard Phillips & Andersen, the Salt Lake City firm that filed the lawsuit on Mr. Adams's behalf, declined to comment. Mr. Adams said the case has "been a long torturous trip," adding, "I am so looking forward to my day in court."

Patent battles have been dogging many high-technology companies lately. Research In Motion Ltd. of Waterloo, Ontario, recently agreed to pay $612.5 million in a settlement with Virginia-based patent holding company NTP Inc. Barring a settlement, RIM was threatened with an injunction that could have shut down its BlackBerry email devices.

The stakes aren't quite as high in this case. Mr. Adams is seeking $150 million in damages, plus attorneys' costs from Gateway. He has said that he received about $30 million from Hewlett-Packard Co. and other companies that have licensed the patents at issue in the case.

Allegations of document destruction in patent cases have also become relatively common. Rambus Inc., a Silicon Valley maker of technology used in memory chips, has faced charges that it improperly shredded a large volume of documents associated with patent cases it has filed against companies that include Hynix Semiconductor Inc. A federal judge in San Jose, Calif., recently ruled that Rambus had done nothing improper.

Apple Computer Lawyer Defends ITunes Logo (WSJ)

By Aaron O. Patrick

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

LONDON -- To the classical strains of Antonio Vivaldi's "Gloria," a lawyer for Apple Computer Inc. yesterday argued in a high-profile United Kingdom court case that the company's iTunes service simply distributes music and isn't in the music-production business.

The classical soundtrack contrasted with the first day of the hearing Wednesday when a lawyer for Apple Corps, the Beatles record company, demonstrated his points with the 1970s disco hit "Le Freak."

COURT PAPERS

Read the trademark agreement1 signed in 1991 by Apple Computer and Apple Corps explaining how they would share the Apple logo and name. Also, see the related settlement2 in which Apple Computer agreed to pay $24.6 million. (Provided by FindLaw.com3.)

Behind the courtroom demonstrations in England's High Court, however, is a serious legal case: The Beatles' company claims Apple Computer is in breach of a 15-year-old agreement designed to end years of fighting between the companies over use of the Apple name and logo.

Apple Corps wants the Cupertino, Calif., computer company to stop using the Apple logo on the iTunes service and in advertisements for it. But Anthony Grabiner, the Apple Computer lawyer, said the company's iTunes music store was no more than a "data-transmission service" and that using the Apple logo on iTunes is to tell visitors that the iTunes software was created by Apple and has nothing to do with the music being sold.

The outcome of the case could affect Apple's thriving digital music business, which has helped transform the company into an electronics and entertainment powerhouse from a maker of personal computers. While selling music through iTunes isn't a huge money-maker for the company, it is an important companion business for Apple's iPod, the digital music player that accounted for $2.91 billion, or more than half of the company's $5.75 billion, in revenue in the holiday quarter.

Under the 1991 agreement, the Beatles' company has the exclusive right to use the Apple name and logo for creating music regardless of whether it is in "tangible or intangible" form. Apple Computer is specifically blocked from publishing music CDs under the Apple logo, for example, but is allowed to sell computers and software used to play or broadcast music. The agreement says Apple Computer can "deliver" music as long as it isn't in physical form.

The outcome of the case is likely to hinge on whether Apple Computer is found to be merely distributing music or is verging on acting as a music company in its own right.

Apple Computer's lawyer acknowledged that iTunes sells music and compilations from some artists, including U2 and Stevie Wonder, that can't be bought elsewhere. Lord Grabiner said the quantity -- 50 tracks out of a library of 3.6 million songs -- was so small that it was irrelevant.

After downloading part of "Gloria," sung by the choir of Cambridge University's King's College, he used iTunes to obtain information about the recording, including the copyright holder: EMI Group PLC. EMI also publishes the Beatles' songs.

"It is obvious that Apple Computer is not the source of the content," Lord Grabiner told the court. "A person could not conceivably imagine that the content was owned by Apple Computer or the Apple logo was an indication of the origin," he said.

Apple Corps wants the court to order Apple Computer to remove its Apple logo from the iTunes program. If successful, it could seek another hearing to assess damages. Apple Corps is owned by Paul McCartney, Ringo Starr, Yoko Ono, and the estate of George Harrison.

The case is scheduled to end next week.

FPL's Merger With Constellation Encounters Delay In Maryland (Palm Beach Post)

By Kristi E. Swartz

Palm Beach Post (FL), March 31, 2006

TALLAHASSEE — There's been a slow gas leak in the $11 billion merger between FPL Group Inc. and Constellation Energy Group of Baltimore.

On Thursday, the leak turned into an explosion in the Maryland Legislature.

That state's lawmakers voted to create a special counsel that would review utility mergers, thus delaying the deal between Juno Beach-based FPL Group and Constellation Energy.

The move by the Democratic-controlled General Assembly still has to be approved by Gov. Robert Ehrlich, a Republican who is up for reelection. Ehrlich hasn't said whether he'd veto the bill.

FPL and Constellation announced Dec. 20 they were merging to form a $28 billion energy powerhouse called Constellation Energy. The deal would put a Fortune 100 firm in Palm Beach County and create the nation's third-largest energy company.

The merger would mean little change at first for the 4.3 million residential and business customers of Florida Power Light Co., FPL's utility subsidiary. The point of the union is to create "the premier competitive energy business," FPL Group Chief Executive Lew Hay said at the time.

That can be done in the unregulated arena, where electricity is sold on the open market. But it's deregulation that's causing the headaches in Maryland.

Constellation's utility unit, Baltimore Gas Electric Co., recently told its 1 million customers to expect a 72 percent rate hike starting this summer. The increase is a result of the expiration of rate caps put in place by the General Assembly in 1999, when the state electricity market was deregulated.

Constellation's proposed merger with FPL has next to nothing to do with the rate hikes, but Maryland lawmakers hope that the threat of stalling the merger will encourage Constellation to sweeten an offer to phase in the higher rates.

FPL referred questions Thursday to Constellation.

"Obviously the pieces of legislation that are moving through the legislature are certainly troublesome from a business perspective," Constellation spokesman Rob Gould said.

Maryland lawmakers also are considering bills to throw out members of the utility-regulating Public Service Commission and force Constellation to hand over $528 million in rate relief.

The FPL-Constellation deal must be approved by shareholders of both companies as well as state and federal regulators, including the Federal Regulatory Energy Commission and the Nuclear Regulatory Commission.

The Florida Public Service Commission will vote Monday on whether to intervene in the FERC case. State law doesn't give Florida's Public Service Commission authority over utility mergers, unlike in Maryland.

Aztar Receives Rival $1.5 Billion Bid (WSJ)

By Peter Sanders

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0024775

Colony Capital LLC offered about $1.5 billion for casino operator Aztar Corp. three weeks after Aztar entered an agreement to be acquired by rival casino operator Pinnacle Entertainment Inc. The move sets off a possible bidding war for the Phoenix company best known for its Tropicana properties in Las Vegas and Atlantic City.

Colony will offer $41 a share and would seek to refinance the $723 million in debt that Aztar carries, the company said. On March 14, Pinnacle of Las Vegas offered $38 a share for Aztar, or about $1.45 billion, not including the debt.

Colony, a closely held real-estate firm, owns the Las Vegas and Atlantic City Hilton hotel-casinos. The Los Angeles company declined to elaborate on the proposed offer, which was made in a letter to Aztar's board yesterday.

Shares of Aztar hit a 52-week high after reports of Colony's offer surfaced. In 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange, Aztar's stock was up $3.37, or 8.6%, to $42.42. Pinnacle added 23 cents to $29.23 on the NYSE.

A spokeswoman for Pinnacle said, "We have a signed merger agreement" with Aztar, but declined to comment further. A spokesman for Aztar declined to comment.

Colony's unsolicited offer may be the first salvo in what could be a heated bidding war for a small casino company that has underperformed. Aztar's $1.52 billion in market value is significantly lower than industry rivals like MGM Mirage and Harrah's Entertainment Inc.

Aztar reported net income of $55.9 million on $915.4 million in revenue last year.

More than half of Aztar's income last year came from its refurbished and expanded Tropicana property in Atlantic City. Aztar's crown jewel in Las Vegas isn't the faded hotel and casino sitting on the city's famed Strip, but the 34-acres of prime land it sits on.

For years, Aztar has discussed redeveloping the land, which is close to the Las Vegas airport and across the street from major MGM Mirage properties. The company never disclosed any firm plans and Pinnacle Chief Executive Dan Lee said earlier this month that his casino company would possibly develop a multibillion-dollar resort property at the site.

Although based in Las Vegas, Pinnacle has never operated a casino there. Pinnacle primarily owns casinos in smaller regional markets like Louisiana, Missouri and Reno, Nev. Pinnacle began in 1938 as the Hollywood Park Turf Club, a racetrack in Los Angeles. Pinnacle reported net income of $6.2 million on revenue of $725.9 million last year, down 33% from 2004.

The maneuvering indicates that despite its casino assets, some see Aztar as a real-estate play in a Las Vegas market that has seen land values soar. Some observers said Colony could be aiming for a breakup of Aztar's assets, which include casinos in Missouri and Indiana. Colony has gambling licenses in Nevada and New Jersey.

Colony, controlled by Thomas J. Barrack Jr., last year through an affiliate bought four casinos owned by Harrah's and Caesars Entertainment Inc. for about $1.24 billion.

Less than two weeks ago, Colony was part of a consortium that agreed to purchase hotel-and-casino operator Kerzner International Ltd. for a proposed $3 billion in cash and take the company private. In January Colony teamed with Kingdom Hotels International to acquire Canadian Fairmont Hotels & Resorts Inc. for about $3.3 billion.

Rival's Branches Whet Appetites At J.P. Morgan (WSJ)

By Robin Sidel And Clint Riley

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

Many of the nation's financial institutions favor one of two strategies when it comes to retail branches: build it or buy it.

J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. is aggressively pursuing both.

The nation's third-largest bank based on market value is in discussions to acquire about 300 branches from Bank of New York Co., according to people familiar with the matter. The deal would take the form of an asset swap in which J.P. Morgan would transfer a portion of its corporate-trust business to the bank that was founded by Alexander Hamilton in 1784.

Representatives of both banks declined to comment on any possible deal, which was reported yesterday by CNBC. It wasn't immediately clear if any cash would change hands as part of a transaction. Wall Street analysts, who have long speculated that Bank of New York would jettison the bulk of its retail business, have estimated the branch network's value at about $4 billion.

People familiar with the situation said a transaction wasn't imminent, noting that the deal's structure is complex. Bank of New York is seeking the asset swap over an outright sale, these people said, because the retail business represents a hefty 15% of its total profits -- an amount that can't be easily replaced on the bottom line. Such a structure also would help Bank of New York avoid paying the higher taxes that usually accompany a big cash or stock deal.

Wall Street's reaction to the potential deal was mixed. Shares of Bank of New York were up $1.50, or 4.4%, at $35.92, while J.P. Morgan was down 15 cents at $41.53 in New York Stock Exchange composite trading at 4 p.m.

J.P. Morgan is overhauling its retail-banking business after years of neglect. Financial institutions have realized that consumers still covet neighborhood branches even if they do some of their banking online. That was a major reason why J.P. Morgan bought Bank One Corp. -- which had a large Midwest retail presence -- for $58 billion in 2004.

Like J.P. Morgan's New York retail presence, the Bank of New York branches are viewed as needing substantial investment in technology and aesthetics. "If you're trying to fix up one branch network, fixing up two might not be that much bigger of a deal," says Jeff Harte, an analyst at Sandler O'Neill & Partners in Chicago. Mr. Harte has a "buy" recommendation on J.P. Morgan, but doesn't rate Bank of New York's shares. Sandler has business relationships with both banks.

The deal would be the first under the reign of James Dimon, who took over as chief executive of J.P. Morgan in January. Although investors have expressed concern that Mr. Dimon would seek another large acquisition before the Bank One deal was fully integrated, an asset-swap would likely be far more palatable for shareholders because it wouldn't dilute earnings and would fit in with the bank's existing footprint.

The potential acquisition would further solidify J.P. Morgan's already-dominant position in the New York area, one of the nation's most competitive and lucrative regions. J.P. Morgan had a leading 23.77% market share last year in the New York-New Jersey-Pennsylvania market, according to the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. The next largest presence in the region comes from Citigroup Inc., which has a market share of 16.47%. Bank of New York ranks fifth with a market share of 4.81%.

On a branch basis, J.P. Morgan has 470 branches in New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut, including 224 in New York City. Bank of New York, meanwhile, has 342 retail-bank branches in the tri-state region; 241 of those are in the state of New York.

Despite its leading position, J.P. Morgan is facing heated competition for regional deposits from big rivals such as Citigroup and Bank of America Corp. And other banks, including Wachovia Corp. and Commerce Bancorp, have been expanding aggressively in the area. Some banking-industry analysts consider the potential acquisition by J.P. Morgan as not only an aggressive expansion play, but as a defensive strategy to prevent the branches from falling into the hands of a rival.

Since it bought Bank One, J.P. Morgan has been aggressively overhauling its 2,600-branch network and breaking ground on new locations in key Northeast and Midwest markets. The bank opened 135 new branches in 2005 and intends to open another 150 this year.

The acquisition of Bank of New York's branches would accelerate that expansion significantly at a time when other large banks are opting to build branches because retail networks are too expensive to buy right now. Citigroup, for example, plans to open 100 branches this year in the U.S., and has indicated that it will likely pursue only small branch acquisitions in the near-term. Earlier this month, Capital One Financial Corp. announced plans to buy New York-based North Fork Bancorp as it seeks to expand beyond credit cards into banking.

Speculation about the future of Bank of New York's retail business intensified this month when the company for the first time broke out additional financial details about the business in a securities filing. Last year, the bank's retail operations generated pretax income of $355 million, an amount that has held relatively steady over the past two years. At the same time, the bank's securities-trading and processing business has steadily increased, providing a growing share of the company's profits before taxes. Last year, it represented 77%, or $1.8 billion, of the company's profits, up from 74% two years ago.

In November, Bank of New York removed a large cloud when it settled a long-running Russian money-laundering case and a separate fraud case in which a branch manager in Long Island falsified escrow accounts for a health-care supply company. The bank avoided criminal prosecution by agreeing to pay $38 million in penalties and implement sweeping internal anti-money-laundering reforms.

As part of the pact, the bank agreed to hire an independent examiner for three years to monitor its compliance and report its findings to the Justice Department, Federal Reserve Bank of New York and state banking officials. The monitor hasn't been chosen yet.

Feds To Enter Landfill Negotiation (SUFFNH)

By Allison T. Williams

Suffolk (VA) News-Herald, March 29, 2006

The Southeastern Public Service Authority has asked the U.S. Justice Department to review a private landfill owner's proposal to put construction rubble and debris in SPSA's landfill.

On March 13, days after a Suffolk Circuit Court judge dismissed his $20-million lawsuit against the public regional waste authority, landfill owner John C. Holland proposed an arrangement between his business and SPSA.

DOJ_NMG_0024777

Under the proposed contact, John C. Holland Enterprises Inc. would dispose of four to eight 20-ton trailers of construction debris every day at SPSA's landfill on U.S. 58. SPSA would be paid $630 n the same rate that the agency receives from Bay Transport, the other company that hauls for SPSA, based on Holland's proposal.

The authority's board of directors and legal counsel are concerned about potential state and federal anti-trust violations, said John S. Hadfield, SPSA's executive director.

On March 22, SPSA's board of directors indicated it would issue the Holland Enterprises a contract that would expire June 30, 2006, as soon as the proposed contract is approved by the U.S. Justice Department, according to a letter to Holland's lawyer Gary H. Baise. Receiving that approval is expected to take 30 to 60 days, said SPSA's lawyer Michael R. Katchmark.

Holland, in his initial letter to SPSA, indicated that he wanted to have a deal finalized by March 20, in time for an April 1 startup, and that he wanted a one-year contract.

Baise called SPSA's decision to involve the justice department unnecessary.

"This is no sweetheart deal," Baise said. "This is the price offered to the public. … and we are willing to accept that price. This is nothing but a ploy to delay working with Mr. Holland.

"(Mr. Holland and I) don't take nonsense lightly. We may see them in court again over this."

Holland agreed.

"The board … made it available to everybody and all of a sudden, I'm not one of everybody," he said.

Taking construction rubble and debris is a good business move for his company, Holland said. By putting the debris in SPSA's landfill, he conserves room in his own operation and saves on the amount of money he is required to put into an perpetual-reserve fund.

Baise said SPSA and Holland Enterprises will also be facing off on the $20-million lawsuit that was dismissed earlier this month in Suffolk Circuit Court, adding he recently filed a notice of appeal with the Virginia Supreme Court.

Fewer Marshes + More Man-made Ponds = Increased Wetlands (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 30 — In the bog of the federal regulatory code, a wetland is defined as a marshy area of saturated soils and plants whose roots spend part of their lives immersed in water. In the Interior Department's periodic national surveys, a wetland is defined, more or less, as wet.

Traditional tidal, coastal and upland marshes count, but so do golf course water hazards and other man-made ponds whose surface is less than 20 acres.

And so, even at a time of continued marsh depletion, pond inflation permitted Interior Secretary Gale A. Norton and Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns to announce proudly on Thursday the first net increase in wetlands since the Fish and Wildlife Service started measuring them in 1954. Wetlands acreage, measured largely by aerial surveys, totaled 107.7 million acres at the end of 2004, up by 191,800 acres from 1998.

The two cabinet secretaries hailed the apparent reversal in the long trend of wetland losses. "I'm pleased to complete my term as secretary of interior by announcing some good news, said Ms. Norton, who will step down from her job Friday.

A net total of 523,500 acres of swamps and tidal marshes had been lost, but the Fish and Wildlife Service measured gains of 715,300 acres of shallow-water wetlands, or ponds. According to the report's author, Tom Dahl, those can be 20 to 30 feet deep.

Almost two years ago, President Bush, under attack by environmental groups for loosening controls on development in wetlands, announced that one of his goals was to increase net wetland acreage.

For decades in the early and mid-20th century, draining and filling of wetlands by developers was widely accepted. But, as scientists and public officials recognized the importance of wetlands as nurseries for waterfowl, filters of pollution and barriers against storms, Congress passed protective laws.

One multimillion-dollar project redirected parts of the Kissimmee River in central Florida out of the narrow 30-foot-deep channel constructed by the Army Corps of Engineers and allowed it once again to dampen the surrounding landscape. Another successful wetlands-restoration project in southwestern Indiana is undoing the work farmers did decades ago to drain their land.

These projects helped hold down the net loss of marshland in Thursday's report. But the net gain noted in the report was fueled by an increase in pond acreage, which includes things like ornamental ponds in new developments and mine reclamation ponds.

For instance, the mining of sand and clay for the construction of two major highways in South Carolina, Routes 22 and 31, left the Myrtle Beach area dotted with large, deep ponds that qualify as wetlands in the Interior Department's survey but do not provide the wildlife habitat or perform the filtering functions of tidal marshes or cypress swamps.

"For Route 22, there was nine million cubic yards of fill material needed," said Boyd Holt, a regional hydrogeologist for the South Carolina Department of Health and Environmental Control. "There were probably 30 or 40 ponds as a result of that activity since 1998."

At Thursday's news conference, federal officials said that the report measures the quantity — not the quality — of wetlands. Julie Sibbing, the leading wetlands expert at the National Wildlife Federation, called the mining-site ponds "wet deserts."

"The most stunning thing about this report," she said, "is that we're losing diverse natural wetlands in this country and the administration tells us it's O.K. because we've increased the number of ponds."

The report, which covers 1998 to 2004, does not include the loss of 64,000 acres of coastal wetlands from Hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

Meth Lays Siege To Indian Country (USAT)

By Dennis Wagner, Usa Today

USA Today, March 31, 2006

SAN CARLOS APACHE INDIAN RESERVATION, Ariz. — Something haunts the Dudley house atop a ruddy clay mesa in Apache country.

It is the memory of a young man, David Justin Jackson Dudley, beaten to death at a January 2005 methamphetamine and booze party on the reservation.

The entryway is a photographic shrine to the 20-year-old, who wanted to be an X-ray technician.

"We just kind of made it David's wall," explains the young man's father, Dennis Dudley. "We light candles every time we come home."

Mary Jane Dudley sits in the living room, surrounded by half-finished Apache baskets. For months after David died, she could not weave. Now, she performs the ancient craft to lose herself in memories. "From the time I wake up to the time I go to bed is when I think about him," she says. "I haven't stopped crying."

Police reports and court records say David Dudley was punched, kicked and bashed with a bottle. His killers dragged him into a wash and left him naked to die.

Dennis Dudley blames meth. He walks outside to a front-yard ramada. Beneath the roof, a large mound of dirt is covered with silk flowers.

"I didn't know where to put him, so we buried him out here," Dudley whispers. "We put this here to remind the community there has to be something done against drugs. If David had died in a car crash, maybe we could get over it. But with him dying this way, it's so hard."

Like an evil spirit, meth is sweeping through Indian country, tearing families apart and leaving a trail of violence and tears.

The highly addictive stimulant produces euphoria, increased alertness and increased physical activity when snorted, swallowed, injected or smoked. The drug can be manufactured using ingredients purchased in local stores. Over-the-counter cold medicines containing ephedrine or pseudoephedrine and other materials are "cooked" to make meth.

Native American leaders nationwide — but especially in the West — report a meth-induced surge of domestic violence, juvenile sex and meth-addicted babies, while federal authorities say foreign drug cartels are targeting tribal lands as distribution beachheads.

Just this month, a Native American-oriented website, Indianz.com, reported that meth was "the single biggest issue discussed among tribal leaders" during a February meeting of the National Congress of American Indians.

From the Lummi Nation in Washington to the Cherokee in North Carolina, "glass" has become public enemy No. 1 for many tribal leaders.

"Just about everything possible is being done to attack this problem," said Eric Pritchett, police chief on the Cherokee reservation, who recently put 30 officers through a drug interdiction training program.

'Indian country is under attack'

At a February hearing of the Senate Indian Affairs Committee, Kathy Kitcheyan, chairwoman of the San Carlos Apache community where David Dudley lived and died, put it this way: "Status quo is a life six years shorter than any other American group, being 318% more likely to die from diabetes and 670% more likely to die from alcoholism.

"It's 63 babies born in my tribe last year addicted to methamphetamine, and this is just one tribe. Nationally, Indian country is under attack from crystal meth."

The Indian Affairs Committee will return to the topic of meth April 5 when Chairman John McCain, R-Ariz., convenes a hearing on the issue.

DOJ_NMG_0024779

The meth wildfire flared onto indigenous enclaves so fast and recently that little comprehensive data are available. But anecdotes abound:

· In North Carolina last year, the Cherokees launched a multipronged attack on meth by regulating sales of ephedrine drug products, starting a hotline for people to report drug dealers, developing a new treatment program and conducting anti-drug rallies.

· New Mexico's Ohkay Owingeh tribe, also known as San Juan Pueblo, is reviving the practice of banishment to remove meth dealers' tribal membership, as has Washington's Lummi Nation.

· Arizona's Apaches, like many other tribes, have launched public education blitzes and passed statutes to criminalize meth, which was not even listed as an illegal drug under arcane tribal codes.

· At Wyoming's Wind River Reservation, 25 tribal members were arrested by Bureau of Indian Affairs and Drug Enforcement Administration agents last May in connection with a drug ring that Jeffrey Sweetin, special agent in charge of the DEA's Denver office, said did 100 deals a day out of a single home.

Sweetin says Shoshone and Arapaho youth are prey on a reservation afflicted by isolation, ennui and limited enforcement.

A generation 'vanishing'

"We had an organization headed by Mexican drug traffickers who specifically targeted the Wind River reservation," Sweetin says. "Young kids get free dope, and after a few times they'll grow into a user population. ... There's an entire generation of Native Americans vanishing."

Social Services director Terry Ross of the San Carlos Apache community says meth abuse is part of larger pathology: Unemployment is 82%, public assistance funds are dwindling and there is no residential treatment program.

Because of meth's low price and enduring high, some tribal leaders say it has surpassed alcohol as the drug of choice among teens. And that worries Ross. "I don't think we even know what we're dealing with," Ross says. "What will meth bring to us in 10 years?"

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Judge Backs Lawyer In FBI-Okla. City Link (AP)

By Paul Foy

AP, March 31, 2006

SALT LAKE CITY - A federal judge on Thursday rewrote a sentence to clarify a ruling that had suggested Timothy McVeigh received help from paramilitary militias in the Oklahoma City bombing and that the government had an informant in the bombing conspiracy.

U.S. District Judge Dale Kimball had issued a decision that called those two claims "fact." Asked if he was endorsing the conspiracy theories, Kimball issued a new decision late Thursday to attribute both claims to a Salt Lake City lawyer.

The lawyer, Jesse Trentadue, is trying to expose FBI evidence he contends will show the bureau was tipped to McVeigh's plans but failed to stop the Oklahoma City bombing. FBI officials have repeatedly refused to address Trentadue's claims.

Trentadue is also trying to prove that his brother - a bank robber who died in federal custody after being picked up on a parole violation - was mistaken for an associate of McVeigh's in the frantic search for conspirators after the bombing, and was killed by federal agents during an interrogation gone awry.

In his original 23-page decision, released late Wednesday, Kimball singled out one FBI teletype already released to Trentadue, but in heavily edited form.

The judge, who has inspected the unedited version of the memo, first wrote: "The plaintiff (Trentadue) points out the fact that this document indicates that there was an undercover operative in with Timothy McVeigh and members of the various militia groups who aided and supported McVeigh."

The judge rewrote the sentence to eliminate the word "fact" and substitute: "The plaintiff claims that this document indicates that there was an undercover operative in with Timothy McVeigh and members of the various militia groups who aided and supported McVeigh."

Kimball's decision orders the FBI to redouble a search for investigative files that could reveal what agents knew about McVeigh before the 1995 Oklahoma City bombing, but he said the bureau could black out some information about informants.

McVeigh was executed in 2001 for the bombing that gutted a federal office building and killed 168.

The judge said he found it "troubling" that the FBI's efforts to locate documents required by his earlier rulings have not turned up more memos, including ones the FBI's own files suggested existed at one time.

"While the FBI's failure to discover documents is not necessarily an indication of bad faith, it is puzzling that so many documents could be referenced but not produced," the judge wrote.

The FBI is supposed to turn over any new documents it finds to Trentadue by June 2.

Trentadue has obtained some FBI teletypes on his own and others under a Freedom of Information request, and he sued to force more disclosures.

Kimball ruled in Trentadue's favor early on and ordered the release of some heavily edited teletypes, but the FBI vigorously fought any additional releases. At a November hearing the Justice Department asked Kimball to reconsider his earlier rulings and stop the disclosures.

Kimball ruled the FBI did not have to produce teletypes that would reveal confidential informants among a white supremacist group in Oklahoma. But he ordered the FBI to renew a search for other documents.

"My assumption is the FBI will comply with the order," said Carlie Christensen, an assistant U.S. attorney who represented the FBI in court hearings here. "On balance, we're quite pleased with the ruling."

FBI officials declined comment.

Trentadue's battle for FBI records is primarily motivated by his brother's bloody death. The U.S. Bureau of Prisons has said Kenneth Trentadue, 44, was found hanging by a bedsheet after gouging his neck with the crimped edge of a plastic toothpaste tube.

Jesse Trentadue contends his brother was killed by federal agents during a vicious fight inside a one-man cell of a high-security wing at the Federal Transfer Center in Oklahoma City, only weeks after McVeigh's indictment.

In his decision, Kimball said Jesse Trentadue had "unearthed significant evidence of foul play" in his brother's death.

Cocaine Found In Virgin Mary Tombstones (AP)

By DEVLIN BARRETT

AP, March 30, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 30, 2006 — Federal agents on Thursday said they had broken up a ring of drug smugglers who used tombstones featuring the Virgin Mary to move hundreds of pounds of cocaine into New York from Mexico.

The Drug Enforcement Agency announced arrests of 12 people as part of the conspiracy.

Four of those arrests came Thursday, one in Houston and three after an early morning raid on a warehouse in New York's Brooklyn borough.

At the warehouse, agents found bricks of cocaine packed inside tombstones, some decorated with figures of the Virgin Mary, the DEA said.

"Like grave robbers who have no respect for the dead, this drug organization used revered tombstones to smuggle millions of dollars worth of cocaine into New York City," said John Gilbride, the special agent in charge of the New York DEA office.

At the Brooklyn warehouse, agents found eight tombstones, five of which were packed with 20 to 25 kilograms each of cocaine. They also found remnants of smashed tombstones.

DEA: Virgin Mary Statues Used By Smugglers (UPI)

United Press International, March 30, 2006

NEW YORK, (UPI) -- The U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency says it has broken up a cocaine-trafficking operation that smuggled drugs into New York in religious statues.

The DEA said the investigation, called Operation Omni Presence, resulted in the arrests of 11 people and the seizure of more than 425 pounds of cocaine and $474,000 in cash.

The agency said an organization based in Mexico hid bricks of cocaine in statues of the Virgin Mary and used other "ingenious methods" to get drugs into the United States. The DEA said the investigation eliminated all levels of the operation from "wholesale distributors to retail dealers."

DEA Special Agent in Charge John P. Gilbride, in a release, said, "Like grave robbers who have no respect for the dead, this drug organization used revered tombstones to smuggle millions of dollars worth of cocaine into New York City. DEA identified this international organization with its cocaine distribution reach from Mexico to the streets of New York and put it out of business."

Gilbride said DEA worked with the Nassau County Police Department, the New York City Police Department and the New York U.S. attorney's office.

WABC-TV, March 30, 2006

(New York-WABC) - An Eyewitness News Exclusive: Federal agents are today giving the details of an unusual, international drug take down. And you won't believe what the suspects were using to smuggle in the goods. Eyewitness News reporter Jeff Pegues joins us now with the story.

Eyewitness News has obtained photographs that show the lengths some drug organizations will go through to smuggle cocaine into the country, and more specifically New York. Sources tell us at least 10 suspects have been arrested in New York as part of an international drug ring that used tombstones with the image of the Virgin Mary on them to smuggle drugs.

Sources say federal agents discovered the cocaine, hundreds of kilograms of it, packed away in those tombstones.

Eyewitness News has learned they were smuggled into the country by a cocaine trafficking organization based out of Monterey, Mexico. Sources say they used all sorts of methods to smuggle the cocaine across the U.S. border, through several states and all the way up the east coast.

Ten people in New York were arrested in the case and authorities seized 194 kilograms of cocaine and large amounts of cash.

We are told it is just the tip of the iceberg. Sources say there are many more arrests across the country.

There is a lot more to the two year police investigation. We'll have the latest on that coming up tonight on Eyewitness News at 5:00 p.m.

Tomb Raiders (NYDN)

By Alison Gendar, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, March 31, 2006

Shameless Mexican drug dealers smuggled tons of cocaine into the country stashed inside tombstones - and even inside a statue of the Virgin Mary, authorities said yesterday.

"Like graverobbers - who have no respect for the dead - this drug organization used revered tombstones to smuggle millions of dollars worth of cocaine into New York City," said John Gilbride, special agent in charge of the Drug Enforcement Administration's New York office.

The sacrilegious Mexican traffickers were nailed after an 18-month cross-country investigation, officials said.

The New York angle began to emerge last May when the NYPD, the DEA and Nassau County narcotics cops tailed a dealer running drugs between Houston, Washington Heights and Atlanta.

That lead eventually brought cops and feds to a Brooklyn warehouse stacked with drug-filled tombstones.

The tombstones had traveled from Mexico through Laredo, Tex., and up to New York - borne by unsuspecting FedEx deliverers.

Operation Omni Presence led to 11 indictments issued by the U.S. attorney's office in Manhattan, officials said yesterday.

The tombstones are just the latest way international drug traffickers sneak their wares into the country.

Colombian dope dealers were busted in February for the cruel scam of slicing open Labrador puppies to stash packets of liquid heroin inside their bodies, then stitching them back up.

Raids Broke Up 2 Cocaine Rings Of Wide Range, Authorities Say (NYT)

By Bruce Lambert

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

Two major drug-trafficking rings that smuggled huge amounts of cocaine from Mexico — some of it concealed in tombstones engraved with the image of the Virgin Mary — and shipped it to the East Coast were broken up yesterday in multiple raids by federal, state and local law enforcement agencies nationwide, the authorities said.

Police agencies said it was coincidental that two similar but unconnected investigations — both involving cocaine, Mexico and New York — culminated in simultaneous raids early yesterday morning. One case began with a tip on Long Island and led to Mexico; the other traced another network of traffickers based on Long Island, law enforcement officials said.

At least 15 people have been arrested, including a correction officer and a former teacher on Long Island, and millions of dollars in drugs and cash seized, as well as firearms, vehicles and residences.

Investigators said they found more than $4 million on Long Island, stashed in secret compartments in a football game table, a 55-gallon aquarium and the back of a sports car. They predicted that they would find more when they opened seven safe deposit boxes held in the names of the suspects.

The tombstones were tracked from Mexico to a warehouse in Brooklyn, where investigators found broken pieces of those that had already been opened. But some intact tombstones remained, and officers chipped away to find the cocaine bricks inside. That raid found 196 kilograms of cocaine with a retail value estimated at $8 million to $12 million, according to the federal Drug Enforcement Administration.

In the other case, the New York State Police commander on Long Island, Maj. Walter Heesch, said his officers found 210 kilograms of cocaine. He estimated its worth at $40 million.

Further arrests and seizures are expected in both cases, the authorities said.

In the tombstone case, officials described a large cocaine distribution system based in Monterrey, Mexico, that used ingenious methods to smuggle and transport thousands of kilos of cocaine across the United States. In a news release, the drug administration said it was able to "dismantle all levels of criminal activity, from the Mexican source of supply to the wholesale distributors and retail dealers in our local communities."

That investigation, which began about 18 months ago, originated with a tip from the Nassau County police on Long Island and later involved other law enforcement agencies as far flung as Florida, North Carolina and Texas. A dozen arrests have been made so far, 11 in New York and 1 in Houston. Some arrests and seizures were made earlier but not announced until the raids yesterday. The suspects have been indicted on charges including money laundering, drug possession and conspiracy.

The cocaine that ended up on Long Island also originated in Mexico, and was shipped to Los Angeles and east to Pennsylvania, New Jersey and New York, the authorities said.

Suffolk Bust Nets $45M In Cocaine, Cash & Guns (WCBS)

WCBS-TV, March 30, 2006

(CBS) SUFFOLK COUNTY New York State Police announced a major bust of a multi-million dollar cocaine distribution network.

Their 3-month investigation into a high level narcotics trafficking network ended this morning with the arrests of Norman Goode, 38, of Holtsville, a Corrections Officer with the Suffolk County Sheriffs Dept.; Daniel Green, 39, of North Babylon, a school teacher and coach for the girls varsity basketball team in the North Babylon School District; and Billy Green, 43, of Wheatley Heights.

Police also want to speak with Roland Alburg, 36, of Holtsville in connection with this investigation.

Police executed eight search warrants throughout Suffolk County that resulted in the seizures of 210 kilograms of powder cocaine with an approximate street value of $40 million; approximately $5 million in cash; six handguns; three semi-automatic assault rifles; 3 ounces of crack cocaine; 1 lb. of marijuana; 10 vehicles and eight residences.

In December 2005, a New York State Police investigation in the Capital Region led State Police Narcotics Investigators on Long Island to an unknown individual who had only been identified as a Suffolk County resident believed to be a cocaine supplier.

Troop L Narcotics Enforcement Unit (NEU) members were requested to help identify the Long Island supplier who had just made a delivery of multiple kilograms of cocaine to several different targets in the Troy, NY, area, and was en route back to Long Island. At that time, the supplier was identified as Goode.

The DEA Long Island District Office, Suffolk County Police Department, the Suffolk County District Attorney's Office and the Nassau County Police assisted the New York State Police.

The investigation revealed that the subjects involved were attempting to negotiate the delivery of a significant quantity of cocaine from Mexico to the Philadelphia area, via Los Angeles, ultimately destined to the Suffolk County area.

COKE, CASH & BIG COLLAR (PHI)

By Kitty Caparella & David Gambacorta

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 31, 2006

AREPUTED DRUG kingpin who sells hip-hop clothing and music out of a South Street-area business has been arrested with seven others in four states in a major sting involving a 210-kilogram shipment of Mexican cocaine, $5 million in cash and 14 weapons.

The cocaine, headed for streets along the Eastern seaboard, was worth about $5 million wholesale and $40 million on the street, according to authorities.

DOJ_NMG_0024783

The FBI, the DEA, the IRS, New York and Pennsylvania State Police, and Philadelphia police raided at least 15 locations in Pennsylvania, New York, New Jersey, Delaware and Maryland in the past two days in the ongoing federal drug investigation.

At roughly 7:30 p.m. Wednesday, armed agents in flak jackets hit the Teagle Co., on 3rd Street near South, owned by Omar Teagle, 33, a reputed Philadelphia drug kingpin, according to authorities.

Agents carried several boxes of documents and other materials from the company, which also houses Teagle and Turner Entertainment, Versatile Clothing and Versatile Music.

Teagle, a West Philadelphia native now living in Townsend, Del., is listed as president or an officer of each company, except for Versatile Music, according to corporate state records.

Teagle's attorney, David S. Nenner, said no drugs or guns had been found at Teagle's home or business.

Yesterday, Teagle and two other suspects, George Rodgers and Donnell Ball, appeared briefly for a federal hearing that was postponed until today while Assistant U.S. Attorney Curtis Douglas prepared their criminal complaints.

Teagle's mother and wife showed up for the hearing as did friends, including Jay Erving, son of 76ers legend Julius Erving. The younger Erving is an associate of Teagle's, according to sources close to the investigation.

"I have nothing to say," said Jay Erving, in a blue sweat suit, while talking on a cell phone.

Rodgers was arrested at his home, on Colorado Street near Carpenter, where sources said agents had seized 500 grams of crack cocaine, five guns and furniture that allegedly had secret compartments for stashing large amounts of cocaine.

Ball, 35, a fugitive since 2002, was arrested at his residence on Broad Street near Ridge Avenue. He is wanted by Camden County after jumping bail on a cocaine case and by the Pennsylvania Board of Probation and Parole for alleged violations in 2002.

Meanwhile in New Jersey, Ramon Alburg, an alleged member of the ring, was arrested at his home in Franklin Park, N.J., near New Brunswick. The Somerset, N.J., home of his brother Raoul, who allegedly transported the cocaine shipment, was raided by agents who said they had seized 155 kilograms of cocaine and $500,000. Raoul Alburg was later arrested in Crofton, Md.

New York authorities are looking for the Alburgs' brother, Roland, 36, of Holtsville, N.Y., who allegedly picked up 50 kilograms of cocaine in New Jersey and took it to New York.

New York State Police arrested Norman Cooke, 38, a Suffolk County corrections officer, after he allegedly delivered multiple kilos in the Troy, N.Y., area. Also arrested were Daniel Green, 39, of Babylon, N.Y., who teaches school and coaches girls basketball, and Billy Green, 43, of Wheatley Heights, N.Y.

New York authorities also seized six handguns and three semiautomatic rifles, three ounces of crack, a pound of marijuana, 10 vehicles and eight residences.

Federal hearings were scheduled for today in Philadelphia, Newark, N.J., and New York to charge the suspects formally with conspiracy to distribute cocaine.

According to an affidavit by FBI agent Brian C. Turner, Teagle was brokering shipments of cocaine and promised Ball some 75 kilograms from a shipment due after Christmas.

Ball told a confidential informant that he was unhappy with the way Teagle was "dictating" how much cocaine he would get, the affidavit stated.

In a meeting in New Jersey, Teagle asked Ramon Alburg for money, and Ramon told Teagle to go to his brother Raoul's house and get "eight," which meant $80,000, according to the affidavit.

Teagle told an informant that he wasn't worried about the price of the cocaine, he just wanted to get additional kilograms to the East Coast and was concerned about taking it back from California, the affidavit said.

When one transportation plan failed, Teagle and others came up with another to haul the cocaine back from California, according to the affidavit.

On March 22, the affidavit said, Raoul Alburg and two others, including an informant, began driving last Sunday to Los Angeles in a vehicle with a trailer attached. Inside the trailer was a black couch containing cocaine and two other pieces of furniture with hidden compartments.

The affidavit said Teagle had monitored the trio via phone calls - intercepted by authorities - as they traveled across the country.

On Tuesday, the trailer was dropped off at Ramon's home in Franklin Park, N.J., and Raoul Alburg called his brother to warn him that his Somerset, N.J., house was under surveillance, according to the affidavit.

Yesterday, Teagle's South Street neighbors described him as a disc jockey, clothing manufacturer and father who took his son and daughter, both under 10, shopping for clothes.

An employee at a nearby Reebok store said Teagle was known for DJing at clubs and promoting music.

DOJ_NMG_0024784

"He comes in here at the start of every season and shops for his kids," said Raluca Anca, manager of Unica For Women & Kids, on South Street near 3rd.

Eddie Roman, manager of Dr. Denim, Inc., said last summer he purchased men's clothing from Teagle's company.

"His stuff sold well," Roman said. "The last time we spoke was probably the end of last summer. I think [the company] stopped production then."

Last night, the Teagle Co. headquarters was closed. Behind royal-blue double doors, on 3rd Street near South, was a lobby with a thick glass entrance that lists Versatile Clothing Co. on one door and Versatile Music on the other. Inside were tables and desks with scattered books and papers.

Broader Steroid Probe Possible (USAT)

By Hal Bodley

USA Today, March 31, 2006

Barry Bonds begins his quest for home run immortality under a cloud Monday after Major League Baseball's decision to investigate the steroid lab linked to him and other prominent major leaguers.

Commissioner Bud Selig announced Thursday that former Senate majority leader George Mitchell will head an independent investigation into alleged steroid use by Bonds and other players associated with the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative (BALCO). Selig, however, emphasized that Mitchell has the authority to expand the scope of the probe if necessary.

“Nothing is more important to me than the integrity of the game of baseball,” said Selig, pressured to launch an investigation after the publication Game of Shadows, a book written by two San Francisco Chronicle reporters that details alleged steroid use by Bonds and others.

The book cites affidavits filed by government investigators, evidence seized from BALCO and memos detailing statements of BALCO founder Victor Conte and Bonds' trainer, Greg Anderson.

Bonds, who at 708 is six home runs shy of Babe Ruth for second on the all-time list, has denied knowingly using steroids. He refused to discuss the investigation before Thursday's exhibition game in San Francisco. “I said no, no, no,” when asked for comment by reporters. “I'm going to jump off the Empire State Building — flat on my face.”

Donald Fehr, executive director of the Major League Players Association, said he is waiting for more information.

“I don't know anything except for what was made publicly available,” Fehr said. “I don't know anything of how the details will process. We'll be getting information in due course and go from there. We have an obligation to our membership and will make sure there's due process all of the way through.”

The last time baseball undertook an investigation of this magnitude was in 1989, when John Dowd examined illegal gambling by Pete Rose, which led to the all-time hits leader being banned from the game.

“They can say what they want, but there's no way they would launch an investigation unless Barry Bonds was not about to break Babe Ruth's record,” Minnesota Twins outfielder Torii Hunter said.

Selig said the investigation will be limited to events since September 2002, when baseball and its union agreed to ban performance-enhancing drugs. He added all results of the probe will be made public.

“Should Sen. Mitchell uncover material suggesting that the scope of the investigation needs to be broader, he has my permission to expand it,” Selig said.

The New York Yankees' Gary Sheffield and Jason Giambi are among the other players who have been linked to BALCO, whose founder, Conte, was released from prison Thursday after serving four months as a result of pleading guilty to steroid distribution.

“I'm not worried about it,” said Giambi, who in December 2003 told a grand jury investigating BALCO he took steroids, according to the Chronicle. “I did the things that I needed to do. I just want to go forward.”

Said Sheffield, who has denied knowingly using steroids, “I've said all I want to say about it.”

Three Cocaine Smugglers To Learn Their Fate Today (VSU)

By Ian Mulgrew

Vancouver Sun, March 30, 2006

Four years ago, they were busted along with a score of others across B.C. and in Washington state.

Today three middle-aged men from the Fraser Valley and the Interior will rise before B.C. Supreme Court Judge Anne MacKenzie for sentencing as a result of their involvement in a large, international cocaine smuggling ring.

Their arrests in August 2001 were part of the culmination of an incredibly complex, law-enforcement initiative that spanned the continent and targeted organized crime.

DOJ_NMG_0024785

The goal of a host of U.S. and Canadian law-enforcement agencies acting in concert was to disrupt a handful of independent, lucrative drug-trafficking organizations and the laundering of their substantial illicit profits.

At the time of the coordinated international raids, police confiscated large quantities of illicit substances, guns, money and property -- 250 kilograms of dried marijuana, 24,000 pot plants, 35 kilograms of cocaine, hashish, airplanes, vehicles, boats, furniture and recreational equipment.

The list is long.

Among the score of people charged on both sides of the border were David Oliynyk, then of Langley and 50 at the time; Joseph Lepage, 43, of Kelowna, and Lloyd Ferris, 54, of Abbotsford.

Their sentencing, set for today and tomorrow in New Westminster, is the penultimate chapter in the lengthy legal saga that followed those startling arrests and staggering seizures.

Concurrently in New Westminster, B.C. Supreme Court Justice Selwyn Romilly is hearing the trial of six men charged with conspiracy to export marijuana.

Their fate should be the final scene of what has proven to be a remarkable tale about, and a unique window on, the underground economy of illicit drugs.

Elaborate web spun

All of these individuals were caught in the elaborate web spun by the RCMP and its U.S. allies in a multi-faceted, joint, cross-border investigation called Operation Exacto-Two.

That case was really a thicket of investigations with a common root, Operation Exacto, set up to solve the contract killing in the summer of 1996 of a Lower Mainland marijuana grower and the disappearance of his live-in partner.

During the investigation of that murder, police focused on a man named Stephen Cox (who was later charged, tried and acquitted of the slaying) and his close associate Gerard Morin, a 43-year-old with convictions as a weapons dealer.

Both were considered by detectives to be active in a sprawling criminal organization police dubbed "the company" and both were friendly with a host of recognizable crooks and Hells Angels.

The Angels say they are being defamed and have no connection to any of this criminal activity.

Nevertheless, as police followed these two goombahs, they opened files on the people they met and learned of a tremendous amount of daily drug trafficking.

EAVESDROPPED ON DOZENS

The RCMP, the FBI, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, border security forces and other law-enforcement agencies would ultimately begin surveillance and wiretaps on dozens and dozens of individuals.

Soon, they would be chasing people involved in supplying most of the marijuana consumed in Atlantic Canada, other individuals involved in shipping hundreds of kilograms of pot at a time to the U.S. and, of course, another parcel of people involved in importing massive amounts of cocaine from Mexico through the U.S. and into Canada.

What was frustrating for investigators is, instead of finding one giant Mob-like criminal organization, the Mounties and the Americans discovered the illicit drug trade was so large it had spawned numerous independent groups, all thriving in their own niche markets.

There were independent growers selling to independent brokers in Canada who were dealing with independent brokers in the U.S. -- each of whom had his own little network.

Each was a separate business and the relationship between any two or more of the groups was happenstance, dependent upon need and personal relationships.

Occasionally there were people from each group that knew others in another group -- and the groups where that was the case appeared to often assist each other in times of need. Supply and demand ruled.

The degree of culpability and the involvement in the criminal underworld of each of those arrested four years ago has varied widely.

The sentences that will be handed down in this particular case are likely to be among the heaviest.

Oliynyk was no stranger to law enforcement on both sides of the border.

In December 1989, as treasurer of the White Rock chapter of the Hells Angels, he was arrested trying to buy more than 13.5 kilograms of cocaine from U.S. undercover agents.

The Angels say Oliynyk resigned from the club after he was released from prison.

But his long association with Morin -- dating back to the mid-1990s and the original murder of the pot grower -- set off bells for detectives.

The RCMP in their applications for warrants in these inter-connected cases placed considerable stress on this tie, according to the evidence, because Oliynyk had been previously identified as having a "hard-on" -- which apparently meant hatred -- for the dead man.

DOJ_NMG_0024786

After fighting for four years and forcing the legal system to prepare for and go to the expense of setting up a bilingual trial, Oliynyk and his co-accused threw in the towel last November after losing a series of legal challenges that included motions to prevent a mountain of surveillance and wiretap evidence from being admitted at trial

They were pronounced guilty Nov. 9 by Justice MacKenzie and sentencing was put over until today.

By comparison, some of those netted in Operation Exacto-Two were neophytes and veritable innocents in the nether world of guns, gangs and big-profit, organized crime.

Some of the potheads rounded up in these raids, for example, seem quite out of place amid some of the others involved.

I have some empathy with their plea they are misportrayed as organized hoodlums when they were agriculturalists growing what some consider a harmless herb.

Some of their customers, however, proved to be very heavy -- people known to have an affinity for automatic weapons and handguns loaded with illegal ammunition capable of piercing police body armour.

Let's not forget, everyone involved knew or should have known that in this subterranean world, those who were ripped off or those who were unable to collect what they were owed, were precluded from going to the police and courts.

Instead, as the investigation revealed, they turned to people who arrived with shotguns and left with a debtor's head.

Everyone was well aware of the risks -- especially the three men who are up for sentencing today -- and the potential profits.

Taxpayers, though, need to consider the results and the reasons for this raft of prosecutions.

I think the crime involved in these expensive and resource-draining proceedings is a direct result of the current criminal drug laws.

DRUG LAWS SPAWN CROOKS

I believe none of these smuggling groups would have a reason to exist if marijuana and cocaine were regulated and controlled in a different manner, stripping them of their value as illicit substances.

That's one of the reasons I think it's time to change our laws -- to staunch the flow of huge profits into the pockets of organized crime and to put an end to this black market, with its attendant violence.

Putting in jail the individuals pinched in Operation Exacto-Two may disrupt or end their criminal careers, but it did little to reduce the flood of marijuana into the U.S. or cocaine into Canada.

The line-up of individuals ready to take their place in such a lucrative business is long, long, long.

Imprisoning Al Capone did nothing to stem the organized crime associated with bootlegging, the concomitant violence or the corrosive social fallout of alcohol Prohibition.

The distribution gangs and the smugglers in Canada that made millions off the U.S. appetite for booze were only eliminated by the end of prohibition.

The way we will get rid of the criminal organizations profiting from the American chemical thirst and the attendant violence, in my view, is by similarly ending the drug prohibition.

Former Malden Cop's Federal Trial Continues (MAO)

By Matthew Keough

Malden (MA) Observer, March 31, 2006

Jurors in Boston's U.S. District Court are working their way through a wealth of witnesses and audio evidence to determine whether former Malden drug detective David Jordan did his best to single-handedly prevent a drug deal, or if he participated in a staged raid and used the cover of his officer's uniform to steal cocaine.

Jordan, 45, is being charged with conspiring to sell cocaine, cocaine possession, using a gun in the commission of a drug offense, witness intimidation and giving false information to Drug Enforcement Administration agents.

Jordan, a third-generation Malden police officer, was the department's lead narcotics investigator on Dec. 24, 2003 when court documents say Jordan conspired alongside Anthony Bucci, 43, and Francis Muolo, 39, to steal 3 kilograms of cocaine valued at more than $80,000 from a scheduled drug deal.

Bucci is also on trial alongside Jordan.

For the past two weeks jurors have been heard witness testimony, and will soon be faced with two of Jordan's alleged cohorts, Carlos Ruiz and Jon Minotti, who have already pledged to testify against Jordan in exchange for reduced sentences.

It is alleged that Minotti, who was Jordan's police informant at the time, arranged for drug supplier Carlos Ruiz to bring 3 kilograms of cocaine to a meeting at a Malden Medical Center parking lot where Bucci was to purchase the drugs.

The government alleges that Jordan agreed, for a $30,000 kickback, to interrupt the drug deal that was scheduled to go down between Ruiz and Bucci. It is alleged that as the drug deal was about to take place Jordan stopped both men at gunpoint while Minotti escaped through the woods with the cocaine to Muolo's waiting car.

Records show that Jordan ran Ruiz's name through department records before he let the two men go due to a lack of evidence.

For much of last week, lawyers played excerpts from taped phone conversations between Jordan and Drug Enforcement Agent Jean Drouin, who had been trailing Minotti at the time of the drug deal. Drouin testified that he immediately became suspicious of Jordan's role and began taping conversations shortly after the incident.

In one of the tapes, Jordan, whom the government alleges was trying to corrupt a DEA investigation, can be heard saying to Drouin "I hope I didn't f--- up anything you guys were doing."

But Tom Dreschler, Jordan's attorney, maintains the officer was merely trying to take down a drug deal when he became the pawn in a set-up by his own informant.

If convicted, Jordan faces a mandatory minimum of 5 years' imprisonment and a maximum of 40 years' imprisonment on both the conspiracy to distribute 3 kilograms of cocaine count and the distribution of three kilograms of cocaine count. Jordan could also serve 5 years to life for carrying a firearm during and in relation to a drug trafficking crime as well as a maximum sentence of 10 years in prison on the witness tampering charge and 5 years in prison on each of the three false statement charges.

Muolo has pleaded guilty to charges of conspiracy to distribute three kilograms of cocaine.

Jordan, along with Bucci and Muolo, was arrested on May 20, 2004. Jordan has been free pending his trial since June 22 of that year. Jordan is related to Police Commissioner Anthony Spadafora by marriage.

Rearrested Suspect Held Without Bond (AP)

AP, March 30, 2006

NEW ORLEANS Brian Expose, who was arrested last week with a cache of drugs and weapons, then set free without bond by New Orleans judge, will remain in federal detention pending trial on drug-dealing charges.At a detention hearing, federal prosecutors urged Magistrate Judge Louis Moore Junior to lift any bond options for Expose, saying he is a flight risk and poses a danger to the community. Moore agreed, ordering Expose's immediate detention at the conclusion of the hearing.In making his ruling, U-S Attorney Jim Letten said Moore cited Expose's prior conviction for possession of cocaine, his arrest history and his failure to appear for prior state court proceedings.Expose was arrested March 21st by New Orleans police and Drug Enforcement Administration agents, after an investigation and surveillance of his home produced evidence he was selling drugs. The investigation yielded investigators 189-thousand dollars in cash, six ounces of cocaine and an assortment of high-powered assault rifles, ammunition and multiple handguns.Within hours of Expose's arrest, state Judge Charles Elloie released him on a controversial recognizance bond, igniting a week-long firestorm over the judge's decision.In an attempt to get Expose back behind bars, federal authorities stepped in and charged him with conspiracy to sell crack cocaine. He was arrested again Friday.

Five Sold Weapons, Indictment Charges (APP)

County residents tried to sell grenade, officials say

Five Monmouth County residents, including a former corrections officer, were indicted Tuesday on charges of selling a dozen guns and a bullet-proof vest — and trying to sell a live hand grenade — to a government witness, authorities said.

Facing federal weapons charges are John Velba, 47, William Schreiber, 28, and Cheryl Britton, 29, all of Marlboro; Harold Smith, 23, of Wall; and Kevin Benn, 48, of Howell, a former New Jersey corrections officer at East Jersey State Prison.

Each is charged with one count of conspiracy and one count of engaging in the business of dealing in firearms without a federal license to do so. Velba, the lead defendant, is also charged with being a convicted felon in possession of a weapon.

FBI agents arrested all five people on Nov. 1, U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie said in a prepared statement Tuesday.

"On that day, Britton and Schreiber were allegedly trying to complete the pre-arranged sale to the cooperating witness of six of the weapons at Shurguard Storage public storage lockers in Marlboro, where the co-conspirators allegedly kept some of the guns," Christie said.

Velba and Schreiber are being held without bail pending the outcome of their cases. Benn is free on a $250,000 bond by real estate. Smith and Britton are each free on $100,000 bonds, Christie said.

Velba allegedly initiated the sales of the weapons in late May 2005, when he asked the cooperating witness if he would be interested in purchasing weapons, according to two original criminal complaints.

Over the next several months, Velba and his co-conspirators sold 12 weapons, including assault-style weapons, shotguns and handguns, for about $10,000 to the cooperating witness, according to the indictment and complaints.

The final sale was to occur on Nov. 1, 2005, either at the storage place or the defendants' homes.

DOJ_NMG_0024788

The hand grenade was planned to be part of the final sale but was not produced at that time, Christie said. The grenade was subsequently recovered and safely detonated by FBI agents.

On June 28, 2005, Smith allegedly sold the witness two Colt handguns, a Stevens 20-gauge shotgun and the bulletproof vest for $1,400, Christie said. On July 14, 2005, Velba and Smith allegedly sold the witness a Remington 12-gauge shotgun, a Marlin .22-caliber rifle and a bolt-action rifle for $1,200.

Gun Shows Caught In Heated Crossfire (KRT)

By Judy L. Thomas

Knight Ridder, March 31, 2006

KANSAS CITY, Mo. - AK-47s. SKS sniper rifles. Armor-piercing bullets. Machine gun displays.

It's just another weekend at a Kansas City gun show, where there is so much firepower at your fingertips that even some gun enthusiasts shake their heads in wonder.

But the shows - which gained popularity in the 1990s and now number in the thousands nationwide - are coming under increasing fire as critics claim they are contributing to the incidence of violent crime.

"Gun shows are one of our main problems," said Kansas City Mayor Pro Tem Alvin Brooks. "These are the guns that end up on the streets of America."

Brooks recalled several teens who were shot last year in retaliation for robbing a drug dealer at gunpoint.

"One got killed, one lost a leg, and one was paralyzed," Brooks said. "This one fellow who I talked to (at the hospital) said they had bought those guns at gun shows. He said all you have to do is be 18 years old, and sometimes they don't ask you anything if you've got cash."

Critics contend that the biggest problem is a legal loophole that allows criminals and others who are prohibited from buying a firearm to obtain guns from unlicensed sellers at guns shows. In most states, including Missouri and Kansas, no background checks are required to buy long guns - including assault rifles - from sellers who do not have a federal firearms license.

Gun-rights advocates maintain, however, that there is no "gun show loophole."

"If anyone is involved in the trade of selling and buying firearms, they have to obtain a federal firearms license," said Andrew Arulanandam, director of public affairs for the National Rifle Association. "That is the law of the land today, so to say that there's a loophole is disingenuous."

While Arulanandam acknowledged that unlicensed sellers do not have to conduct background checks, he said they were in the "distinct minority."

Local law enforcement authorities insist gun shows remain a major concern.

"I think the average person would be in awe at what's all legal now," said Maj. Anthony Ell, commander of the Kansas City Police Department's violent crimes division. "Individuals who may not be able to get them legally through proper licensed dealers, that gun show loophole allows them to bypass all of that and get guns."

But Paul Marquardt, a spokesman for the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives in Kansas City, said the agency is more concerned about "the people who illegally sell firearms to criminals" such as felons, illegal aliens or drug traffickers.

"The ATF does not target gun shows, we target criminals who are trying to acquire firearms from any source whether it's in a back alley or anywhere else," Marquardt said.

Gun sellers interviewed by The Kansas City Star said that despite the presence of law enforcement authorities, illegal sales and gun thefts occur at area shows. A reporter observed one questionable firearm transaction at a recent show. And a vendor said someone had stolen handguns from him and another vendor.

What's more, the leader of a white supremacist gang of bank robbers told The Star that he and his partners found that gun shows in Missouri and Kansas were a quick way to buy and dump weapons used in their crimes.

"It was incredibly easy," said Peter Langan, who in the 1990s was the head of the Aryan Republican Army, a group that prosecutors say was responsible for 22 bank robberies in the Midwest. "Gun shows, just for the sheer volume and selection, you just couldn't beat 'em," Langan said in a telephone interview from prison, where he is serving a life sentence.

One of Langan's convicted associates, Kevin McCarthy, told the FBI after he was arrested that he had used one of those guns in a 1994 bank heist in Missouri. "McCarthy utilized a 9mm Ruger Pistol, Model PT-89," an FBI special agent wrote in an investigative summary obtained by The Star. "McCarthy had previously purchased this pistol at a gun show in Kansas City, Mo."

Brooks said the teen wounded in last year's shootout told him that his friends often would go to shows to buy and resell guns. They preferred lethal-looking weapons similar to the TEC-DC9 with a 30-round clip that police took off a young man at the St. Patrick's Day parade.

"The AR-15, the TEC-9 and the AK-47 are what they're getting," Brooks said.

DOJ_NMG_0024789

When Congress passed the Brady Bill in 1993, it put in place what some consider a double standard for the purchase of guns. Licensed dealers have to conduct background checks on buyers while unlicensed sellers - private individuals and collectors - do not.

Critics say that means criminals and others who are prohibited from buying a firearm can skirt the law and get guns from unlicensed sellers at gun shows.

For years, gun-safety advocates have called for federal legislation to close what they contend is a gun show loophole. But the gun lobby has argued that would shut down gun shows, and the legislation has stalled.

Eighteen states, however, have passed laws that either require background checks before the purchase of any firearms at gun shows or require buyers to first obtain a permit. Missouri, for example, requires a permit for all handgun purchases, although long guns and assault rifles do not require one.

But the remaining states - including Kansas - still allow buyers to purchase firearms from unlicensed sellers at gun shows without obtaining a permit or undergoing a criminal background check.

Gun-rights advocates contend that most people who sell guns at gun shows are licensed dealers, not private sellers, so it is not that big a problem.

"There are only a few people who buy tables to dispose of private collections," said Kevin Jamison, a Gladstone lawyer and member of the Western Missouri Shooters Alliance. "That's been rare, and it's getting more and more unusual."

But the ATF estimates that up to one-fourth of the gun sellers at shows are unlicensed. And authorities argue that criminals and illegal gun traffickers are wise to that, although they're also getting firearms from licensed dealers.

Last month, an ATF official testified before a congressional subcommittee that more than 400 firearms purchased at gun shows in the Richmond, Va., area between 2002 and 2005 were later used in crimes. Checks of 302 people who had purchased guns from licensed dealers at those shows in a 15-month period revealed that 47 had provided false addresses.

An earlier report on illegal weapons by the ATF found that gun shows were the second-leading source of illegal firearms recovered in gun-trafficking investigations. In some cases, known or suspected terrorists bought guns at shows.

A known member of Hezbollah, for example, was convicted in 2001 in a federal court in Michigan for trying to smuggle guns into Lebanon. An undercover agent saw the man buy a weapon at a gun show without a background check.

Gun-rights advocates insist the shows are not a major source of weapons used in crimes. The NRA cites a 2001 Bureau of Justice Statistics report that said fewer than 1 percent of guns used in crimes came from gun shows.

"The biggest source of crime firearms is the black market," Arulanandam said. "Law enforcement always refers to criminals looking for a clean gun. What they're referring to is they want to find a firearm that's not traceable. And every time you go through a retail outlet or any FFL (federal firearms licensed dealer), you have a long paper trail."

Each year, more than 5,000 gun shows are held nationwide, according to the ATF. The National Association of Arms Shows says that an average of 2,500 to 3,000 people attend a typical show, purchasing between 100,000 and 300,000 guns annually.

"On any given weekend, there's a gun show going on someplace," Jamison said. "In the greater Kansas City area, there's probably one to two gun shows in any given month."

At a March 12 gun show at the 3 Trails Expo Center next to Bannister Mall, tables were teeming with handguns, assault rifles, knives and war memorabilia.

Several vendors were selling books and pamphlets such as "How to Make Disposable Silencers" and "Homemade Grenade Launchers." A few publications described how to convert semiautomatic weapons into machine guns - which is illegal under federal law.

But overall, the show appeared to be taking steps to assure the safe handling of weapons, and there was visible security.

Signs at the entrance warned, "No Loaded Guns Inside." Two off-duty Jackson County sheriff's deputies checked guns brought into the building. Other deputies strolled the aisles of the show, which organizer Waylon Pearson of R.K. Shows in Manchester, Iowa, said drew 4,000 people.

Lee Morlang's table included a Rock River AR-15 assault rifle for $850. Morlang said he was selling his private collection and therefore did not need a license. He estimated that 10 to 12 other vendors were unlicensed sellers who were not required to conduct background checks.

Morlang said he did not need any background check to tell him who should and should not be buying a gun. "I can read people like a book," he said. "If we get a bad person in here, we get rid of 'em."

Others at the show keep an eye out as well, he said. "There was a guard here yesterday, he saw two guys here that had been in prison. The minute they saw him, they hit the door."

But apparently that does not prevent all crime at the shows. Morlang said someone recently stole a .44-caliber handgun from him as he was loading weapons after a show. The same thing happened to another vendor, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0024790

As he spoke, Morlang watched two men near his booth. One handed the other a wad of cash, who then gave the man a handgun - a possible violation of the law which requires handgun purchasers to first obtain a permit.

"See right there?" Morlang asked. "There's a transaction going on right in front of us of an unregistered gun." He shook his head, adding, "it's that kind of stuff that gives these shows a bad name."

Dean Parr, owner of Dean's Gun Shop in St. Joseph, Mo., said he and other licensed dealers have to abide by the same laws at gun shows as they do at their stores.

"If they buy a gun off an individual at a gun show, they don't have to do the paperwork," Parr conceded. "But they could do the same thing at a truck stop or somewhere else, too."

Parr, however, doubted that many criminals were getting guns at the shows.

"If they are, it's a very small percentage," he said. "But if there was anything they could do to monitor these shows better, it would be to have someone out in the parking lot to keep people from buying and selling guns out there."

The Jan. 15 gun show at the KCI Expo Center, sponsored by the Missouri Valley Arms Collectors Association, also enjoyed a huge turnout and appeared to be well run. Although that show offered fewer handguns than the March show, there were plenty of assault weapons.

The ATF had two representatives available to answer questions and several off-duty Kansas City police officers walked the aisles. Nearby, one vendor was selling what was purported to be armor-piercing ammunition, also known as "cop killer" bullets.

"I don't see how that can be legal," one man remarked to a friend as he pointed toward a Bushmaster assault rifle - the kind of weapon used in the 2002 sniper spree that left 10 people dead in Washington, D.C., Maryland and Virginia.

Under current law, it is legal.

Eighteen months ago, Congress did not reauthorize the part of the Brady Law that banned the manufacture and sale of 19 kinds of military-style assault weapons. Now that the weapons are back on the market, authorities say they are trying to get tougher on weapons violations.

In fact, the U.S. attorney's office in Kansas City is among the top in the nation for the number of federal gun law prosecutions.

But gun-safety advocates point out those prosecutions, which they applaud, are mostly for felons possessing firearms or committing a felony with one - not for violators who buy and sell firearms illegally.

In 2003, only 532 of the more than 126,000 people nationwide who lied on a background check were prosecuted, according to a study by the Americans for Gun Safety Foundation. And just 234 cases were filed for possessing or selling stolen firearms, even though 40,000 stolen guns were recovered and returned to their owners.

Still, some gun-rights advocates complain that federal law enforcement agencies are too aggressive. Last month, they convinced a congressional subcommittee to hold hearings on the way the ATF investigated gun shows in Richmond, Va.

Gun show organizers charged that the ATF and local law enforcement scared off potential customers and racially profiled buyers. A top ATF official acknowledged that agents made some mistakes but denied any profiling and defended their tactics.

The ATF's Michael Bouchard told lawmakers that the agency polices only about 100 of the 5,000 gun shows annually. He said the agency focused on the Richmond-area shows after discovering that hundreds of firearms purchased at the shows in a three-year period were used in crimes.

During the investigation, Bouchard said agents witnessed a "straw purchase" - where a buyer allowed to own a gun turns around and sells it to someone who is not - that led them to a street gang whose leader was involved in a murder committed with an AK-47.

Authorities said that weapon also was acquired through a straw purchase at another gun show.

IMMIGRATION:

Bush, Harper Fox Discuss Trade Issues (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, March 30, 2006

President Bush and the leaders of Canada and Mexico worked to iron out disagreements over trade and border security Thursday and to keep a North American economic edge against competition from rising powers like China.

The three leaders, dressed casually in open-collared shirts, strolled together among the ancient Mayan ruins at Chichen Itza before sitting down for more intense one-on-one meetings at a beachfront resort hotel. Mexican President Vicente Fox planned a lavish dinner for his guests.

DOJ_NMG_0024791

The trilateral meeting was expected to be Fox's last since he is set to leave office this year because of term limits. Bush lauded Fox for stabilizing the Mexican economy and improving the net worth of his people.

"That's important for the American economy as well," Bush said. "The more net worth there is in Mexico, the more likely it is the Mexican may be wanting to buy a U.S. product. And vice versa, by the way."

Bush and Fox suggested one item at the top of their agenda is now out of their hands. The U.S. Senate is debating changes to U.S. immigration laws that could affect an estimated 6 million Mexicans living illegally in the United States.

"I told the president there is a legislative process that's going forward," Bush told reporters at the end of their private meeting. "And it may look cumbersome to some, but that's how our democracy works."

Bush added, "I'm optimistic that we can get a bill done."

He is pushing for a guest worker program that would let foreigners stay temporarily in low-paying jobs, which Fox says is a good first step toward some form of legal status for all illegal Mexicans.

"The matter is in the Congress of the United States and that is where the decision will be made," Fox said. "It is no longer between President Bush and President Fox."

After spending the morning sightseeing, Bush had a few hours off before the formal meetings began and he used part of the time to work up a sweat in his hotel's gym.

There was tight security alongside the fun-loving atmosphere generated by college students who have flocked to Cancun for spring break. Gunboats patrolled the turquoise waters off Bush's spa resort, and fencing kept out all but hotel guests. "I'd like to make sure you work more than you play," Bush joked to reporters.

The immigration debate is receiving a lot of attention at the summit, where the official focus is a year-old pact designed to make borders more secure without hampering business and traffic. Signed a year ago near Bush's ranch in Texas, the Security and Prosperity Partnership aims to better protect the three countries from outside attack and ensure their global competitiveness with China and other trade powerhouses.

Bush told Canadian Television earlier this week that he worries people in all three countries could have a "protectionist tendency" that would make it more difficult for them to reap the benefits of mutual collaboration. "Frankly, it will make it a lot harder for future Americans and Canadians and Mexicans to compete with the Chinese, for example," he said.

Even though China has a rapidly growing economy, Canada and Mexico remain the top two trading partners of the United States. All three leaders are under pressure to resolve problems related to the enormous flow of goods and people between their countries. The economic concerns have replaced the diplomatic differences that defined the relationship in Bush's first term.

Both Canada and Mexico refused to support the war against Iraq, and that disagreement strained historically close ties.

This week's summit marked a new phase in Bush's ever-changing relationship with the nations. It was his first official visit with conservative Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper since Harper took office two months ago after promising to improve relations with the U.S. And it reflected the closing stages of his relationship with Fox, who will leave office this year after building a personal bond with the American president that extends back to Bush's time as governor of Texas. A more liberal candidate is leading in the campaign to replace Fox.

Topping Harper's agenda is a long stalemate over U.S. tariffs on Canadian softwood lumber imports. Bush said in a pre-trip interview that resolving the dispute will require "very quiet consultations."

Harper also wanted to address Washington's intention to require passports or other forms of secure identification to enter the United States by 2008. Business groups fear the proposal will severely impede tourism and commerce between the world's largest trading bloc, which conducts some $1.5 billion in business daily.

Bush Says 'guest Worker' Proposal Up To Congress (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, March 31, 2006

CANCUN, Mexico — President Bush told Mexican counterpart Vicente Fox on Thursday he supports a temporary "guest worker" program, but said the final decision belongs to Congress — where many of Bush's fellow Republicans oppose the idea.

"I told (Fox) there is a legislative process that's going forward," Bush said.

Conservatives in Washington criticized a guest-worker program as tantamount to amnesty for illegal immigrants.

"I don't think he's concerned about alienating voters — he's not running for re-election," Rep. Tom Tancredo, R-Colo., said of Bush. Tancredo said Republicans could lose Congress over the immigration issue. "I wish he'd think about the party, and of course, I also wish he'd think about the country."

Bush said he is seeking a "comprehensive" immigration package that includes border security. Fox, echoing Bush, said border security is a "shared" responsibility. He said Mexico would address issues such as its own economic development and the smuggling of immigrants into the USA.

The two presidents and Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper were at this resort on the Gulf of Mexico for a two-day summit.

Their meetings took place as a rift widened between Bush and many of his fellow conservative Republicans over the immigration issue. Referring to a Senate bill that tracks Bush's position on guest workers, Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif., said Americans should be able to "smell the foul odor that's coming out of the U.S. Senate." Asked whether the same odor was emanating from the president, he said, "I have no comment."

It's not the first time Bush has been at odds with much of his own party over immigration.

Going back to his days as Texas governor, Bush has resisted calls to seal the border. Bush argued that people will cross the Rio Grande from Mexico to provide for their families, and he has often praised immigrants' contributions.

"We are a nation of law, but that doesn't preclude us from being a welcoming nation," Bush said before his visit to Cancun.

The lines are hardening in Congress. A bill from the GOP-run House stresses tough enforcement of laws against illegal immigration, with no expansion of provisions allowing Mexicans and others to enter the USA as temporary guest workers, which Bush favors.

The Senate Judiciary Committee included guest-worker provisions and the possibility of citizenship for illegal immigrants in a bill it passed this week by a 12-6 vote — thanks to Democrats. The six opponents were all Republicans.

Those who have followed Bush's career attribute his immigration views to two factors: his Texas roots and the growth of the Hispanic voter population.

"He hasn't been at odds with a lot of Texans on immigration," says Rich Galen, a Republican political strategist who has worked in Texas.

Bruce Buchanan, a presidential expert at the University of Texas, says immigrants there "have a reputation as hard workers who are good for the economy." He says Bush and his close political adviser Karl Rove have cited the growing Hispanic vote as essential to the future of the Republican Party.

"It's hard to weigh the two" factors, Buchanan says, "but they've both played into the calculation."

Bush first ran for governor in 1994, the same year California conservatives helped pass Proposition 187 to deny social services to illegal immigrants. The courts blocked the proposition, but Hispanic voters shifted decidedly to Democrats. That did not go unnoticed in Texas.

Bush "saw what happened," Galen says.

Dan Stein, president of the Federation for American Immigration Reform (FAIR), accuses business leaders — and Bush — of favoring illegal immigration because it keeps wages low. He says the president is "oblivious" to the concerns of ordinary Americans. "He has by every standard encouraged massive illegal immigration," Stein says.

Republican pollster Ed Goeas, however, says his research shows that while Americans of all ideologies want to better protect the border, they are more sympathetic to immigrants willing to work for their families. Critics such as Stein "are very vocal," Goeas says, "but they are not very representative of the conservatives across the board."

Bush said in Washington this week that "a mother or a father who's worried about putting food on the table" is willing to take risks for their family. "I used to tell this to people down there in Texas," Bush said. "Family values don't stop at the Rio Grande River."

Bush Reassures Mexico Leader Of His Backing For Immigrants (NYT)

By Ginger Thompson And David E. Sanger

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

CANCÚN, Mexico, March 30 — President Bush, in an effort to reassure Mexicans and to defuse an intense debate in the United States, told President Vicente Fox of Mexico on Thursday that he supported proposals to legalize undocumented workers as long as they were not given any advantages over immigrants who entered the United States legally.

"I explained to the president my vision of the citizenship issue," Mr. Bush said, as Mr. Fox sat next to him during their summit meeting here. "If they want to become a citizen, they can get in line, but not the head of the line."

In another comment aimed at critics within his Republican Party, Mr. Bush also talked about his support for guest-worker programs as part of an effort to open safe, legal and orderly channels for migrant workers into the United States. Opponents of the plans say they amount to opening floodgates to hundreds of thousands of workers who will cross the border from Mexico each year.

Mr. Bush said he told had Mr. Fox that he was committed to signing a "comprehensive immigration bill."

"And by 'comprehensive,' I mean not only a bill that has border security in it," Mr. Bush said, "but a bill that has a worker permit program in it. That's an important part of having a border that works.

DOJ_NMG_0024793

"We don't want people sneaking into our country that are going to do jobs Americans won't do. We want them coming in in an orderly way, which will take pressure off of both our borders."

Changes in immigration law have been more fiercely debated in Congress since Monday, when the Senate Judiciary Committee approved a bill that would provide legal status to an estimated 11 million illegal immigrants and allow 400,000 foreigners a year to enter the United States as guest workers. The proposals have bitterly divided the Republican Party between those who see immigrant labor as a pillar of the American economy, and those who view it as a burden, even a threat.

The issue has dominated talks between Mr. Bush and Mr. Fox for most of their presidencies. Though the content of Thursday's talks was no different, the ambitions of the two leaders — with Mr. Bush burdened by the lowest approval ratings of his presidency, and Mr. Fox deep into his final term— was sharply diminished.

Five years ago, a newly elected Mr. Fox, buoyed by his standing as the man who peacefully ended seven decades of authoritarian rule, stood on the White House lawn and challenged the United States to work with his government on proposals that would open the border to a freer flow of workers from Mexico.

On Thursday, speaking to reporters, Mr. Fox acknowledged that the fate of immigration law was out of his and President Bush's hands.

"It is not here, in these meetings, where a migration agreement is made," he said. "It is now an issue for the Congress of the United States, and there, they will make the decision. It is no longer between President Bush and President Fox."

Mr. Fox addressed American critics who have accused Mexico of encouraging its people to migrate illegally. Mexico's economy depends heavily on the estimated $16 billion that the migrants send home annually.

Mr. Fox said that if Congress reorganized immigration, "Mexico assumes its responsibilities to work with passion, with commitment, diligently, to develop opportunities for our people."

Earlier in the day, Mr. Bush visited the 1,500-year-old Mayan ruins at Chichén Itzá, a rare moment of tourism for a president who usually has little patience for sightseeing. White House officials added the stop as a show of respect for Mexico's heritage.

Back in Cancún, Mr. Bush's motorcade sped past the ruined carcasses of hotels wiped out last year in Hurricane Wilma. He stayed at a small, luxurious resort protected by Navy vessels that bobbed offshore.

Mr. Bush also met separately with Prime Minister Stephen Harper of Canada to discuss a long-running dispute over American imports of softwood lumber, which has grown more bitter as industries on both sides of the border have sought rulings in different international settings, starting in the Clinton administration.

Mr. Bush said of Mr. Harper, "I appreciate his steely resolve to get something done." But he gave no indication of any change in American policy.

Bush Pushes Congress To OK Immigrants (AP-Y2)

By Nedra Pickler

AP2, March 31, 2006

With Mexican President Vicente Fox at his side, President Bush gave Congress a long-distance push Thursday to open the United States to immigrant workers who have been sneaking across the borders to fill low-paying jobs.

"We don't want people sneaking into our country that are going to do jobs that Americans won't do," Bush said at the end of a private meeting with Fox, where the issue was on top of the agenda. "We want them coming in in an orderly way, which will take pressure off both our borders."

The meeting between the Mexican and U.S. leaders came on the first day of a two-day North American summit that also includes Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper. Harper, meeting with Bush for the first time since taking office two months ago with the promise of building stronger ties with Washington, said the two countries are moving past their "tension" over Iraq.

Still, he took a combative stance on their long-standing dispute over U.S. tariffs on Canadian softwood lumber, saying Canada would "pursue all its legal options" if he and Bush can't work out an agreement.

But it was the immigration debate, which has dominated the U.S. Senate this week, that took center stage in talks conducted in a beachfront resort surrounded by bikini-clad spring breakers. A new immigration law could affect as many as 6 million Mexicans living illegally in the United States — about half of all those who are estimated to have sneaked in from other countries seeking new opportunities they can't find at home.

Bush is pushing for a guest worker program that would let foreigners in low-paying jobs stay temporarily, which Fox says is a good first step toward some form of legal status for all Mexican illegal immigrants.

The issue has united the two leaders, whose friendship dates back to Bush's time as Texas governor but was strained over Fox's objections to the war in Iraq. But immigration has divided Bush's Republican party, with business interests who want cheap labor battling conservatives who want a get-tough policy against illegal immigrants.

DOJ_NMG_0024794

Fox suggested the issue is largely out of their hands now.

"The matter is in the Congress of the United States and that is where the decision will be made," Fox said. "It is no longer between President Bush and President Fox."

But both leaders were clearly trying to sway the debate.

"I told the president there is a legislative process that's going forward," Bush said. "And that it may look cumbersome to some, but that's how our democracy works."

Bush added, "I'm optimistic that we can get a bill done."

The summit included plenty of time to be neighborly. The three leaders dressed casually in open-collared shirts and strolled together among the ancient Mayan ruins at Chichen Itza before sitting down for more intense one-on-one meetings. Fox laid on a lavish dinner for his guests.

After spending the morning sightseeing, Bush had a few hours off before the formal meetings began. He used part of the time to work up a sweat in his hotel's gym.

There was tight security despite the fun-loving atmosphere generated by college students who have flocked to Cancun for spring break. Gunboats patrolled the turquoise waters off Bush's spa resort, and fencing kept out all but hotel guests. "I'd like to make sure you work more than you play," Bush joked to reporters.

The trilateral meeting was expected to be Fox's last, since he is set to leave office this year because of term limits. Bush lauded Fox for stabilizing the Mexican economy and improving the net worth of his people.

"That's important for the American economy as well," Bush said. "The more net worth there is in Mexico, the more likely it is the Mexican may be wanting to buy a U.S. product. And vice versa, by the way."

In his meeting with Harper, Bush sought to make the newly elected leader look good at home, making it a point to stress how hard the Canadian leader had pressed him on the softwood lumber issue. Harper "made an emphatic case," Bush said.

"I appreciate his steely resolve to get something done," the president said. "I appreciate your pushing."

But Bush didn't give Harper much of substance, saying only that "my intent is to negotiate in good faith and a timely fashion to resolve this issue."

Fox Pledges More Border Control (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, March 31, 2006

CANCUN, Mexico -- Mexican President Vicente Fox yesterday promised President Bush that his country will do more to control the U.S.-Mexico border and will strengthen its own southern border to reduce the number of aliens crossing into Mexico to reach the United States.

"It is a shared, shared responsibility," Mr. Fox said at the end of a meeting with Mr. Bush at this Mexican resort town.

The two leaders, along with new Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper, have gathered to talk about security and economic cooperation, and Mr. Bush thanked Mr. Fox for "such a strong statement."

"The president understands and I understand we have an obligation to secure our borders," Mr. Bush said.

The emphasis on border security reflects the political climate in the United States on immigration, where the only point that nearly all voters agree on is that the borders leak and the U.S. government has failed to control them.

For his part, Mr. Bush assured Mr. Fox that he remains committed to pushing Congress to produce an immigration bill that includes a guest-worker program for current illegal aliens and future foreign workers.

"I'm optimistic we can get a bill done," he said.

Mr. Bush is trying to sell his guest-worker plan to skeptical Republicans, particularly in the House, who say the government must prove that it can enforce the borders before talking about a new foreign-worker program.

Mr. Bush also told Mr. Fox that he doesn't favor letting illegal aliens jump to the front of the line to get citizenship. He said if the current line is too long, Congress should increase the number of green cards issued each year.

An estimated 6 million Mexicans now live illegally in the United States, making up more than half the illegal-alien population, and are the biggest segment of new illegal entries every year, according to the Pew Hispanic Center.

Mr. Fox said he wants to create more opportunities in Mexico so that Mexicans stay in the country, echoing his foreign minister's comment Tuesday that officials want to make sure future foreign workers return to Mexico, rather than stay in the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0024795

"Mexico should assume its responsibility and take concrete actions to develop a series of programs in health, employment and housing in Mexico in order to guarantee that temporary workers return to the country," Minister Luis Ernesto Derbez was reported as saying.

"Mexican politicians have an obligation to create conditions so that we no longer have to export labor," Mr. Derbez said.

But just this week Mr. Fox told a Canadian newspaper that he wants Canada to expand its guest-worker program to allow for more Mexican workers.

After spending all of 2004 and most last year mainly calling for a guest-worker program, Mr. Bush late last year coupled that with a call for better border security. But Mr. Bush has yet to offer a comprehensive proposal in the way that he offered a guest-worker plan in January 2004.

Mr. Bush said Mr. Fox shared with him Mexico's strategies for how to control the border, though neither man said what they were and it is too early to know what sort of changes Mexico will make or what kinds of resources it will bring to the border.

Mr. Fox, through an interpreter, did say that Mexican authorities have stopped more than 120 alien smugglers in their recent efforts to gain control of the border.

A week after asking that Mexico play a role in shaping the United States' immigration policy, Mr. Fox also said that issue is out of his hands.

"The matter is in the Congress of the United States, and that is where the decision will be made," Mr. Fox said hours before meeting Mr. Bush for bilateral talks in Cancun. "It is no longer between President Bush and President Fox."

That represents an about-face after the Mexican government paid for advertisements to run in major U.S. and Mexico City newspapers last week that said if there is a guest-worker program, Mexico "should participate in its design, management, supervision and evaluation."

Early in the day, the three leaders visited the archaeological site of Chichen Itza, a Mayan and Toltec city near Cancun, which some scholars say was the scene of human sacrifices.

All three men were dressed casually, with Mr. Bush even walking the site with his white short-sleeved shirt untucked.

The two days of meetings are being conducted under tight security, and even when the leaders got to the pyramid that stands roughly in the center of the complex, they looked up to see their security forces perched at the top with weapons and binoculars.

Though Mr. Bush already had met Mr. Harper, when he was opposition leader in the Canadian Parliament, yesterday was their first meeting since Mr. Harper became prime minister after January's elections. Mr. Harper rode in Mr. Bush's motorcade and flew with him on Marine One to Chichen Itza, and then they met for bilateral talks in the afternoon.

Bush Hopeful On Immigration Bill, But Senate Remains Torn (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette And James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush said Thursday that he was confident the Senate would approve an overhaul of immigration laws, but lawmakers plodded through a second day of debate with the significant distance between two opposing camps seemingly as wide as ever.

Bush's comments came after he held a long-scheduled meeting with Mexican President Vicente Fox in the Yucatan Peninsula resort of Cancun. At the end of a one-hour conference, Bush spoke optimistically about the legislation's prospects, assuring Fox that he was "committed to having a comprehensive immigration bill on my desk."

In Washington, senators worked behind the scenes to sway each other. At one point, they displayed rare unanimity on immigration law, voting 94 to 0 to approve a study on deaths of undocumented immigrants at the border.

The vote, on an amendment from Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), was the first of a series that would push the Senate in the next week to consider a guest-worker program and plans that would give permanent legal status to the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants now here.

In a heated demonstration of the GOP's rifts over immigration, conservative House members held a news conference to denounce any lawmaker who supported citizenship for undocumented immigrants. Legislation approved by the Senate Judiciary Committee would create a path for illegal immigrants to gain permanent legal status or citizenship. Critics say that would provide amnesty to those who had broken U.S. law.

"Anybody that votes for an amnesty bill deserves to be branded with a scarlet letter A," said Rep. Steve King (R-Iowa), referring to the Senate Judiciary Committee legislation, which also would toughen enforcement of immigration laws and create two programs allowing additional foreigners to enter the country as temporary workers.

That legislation is one of two major proposals before the Senate. The other is a bill offered by Frist that concentrates only on border security and enforcement of immigration laws.

DOJ_NMG_0024796

The competing visions reflect attitudes among Americans, according to a poll by the nonpartisan Pew Hispanic Center. Like lawmakers, Americans are increasingly concerned about illegal immigration, with 52% seeing such immigrants as a burden to the country. And, like lawmakers, Americans are divided on how to deal with the issue.

Thirty-two percent believe illegal immigrants should be able to stay permanently, the poll found. Another 32% think they should be able to temporarily stay as guest workers before being required to return to their home countries. And 27% believe undocumented immigrants should be sent home.

In a display of bipartisanship, 10 senators held a news conference to affirm their support for the Judiciary Committee bill. The senators, declaring that momentum was on their side, painted the choice between their bill and Frist's enforcement-only legislation as a turning point for the country.

"This legislation is a defining moment in the history of the United States," said Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who asked whether the country would continue its tradition of welcoming newcomers or would shut its doors. "Of course [immigration] has to be legal, but, by God, we have to continue that tradition."

Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), chairman of the Judiciary Committee, complained that a campaign was afoot to smear his committee's bill by saying it offered amnesty. He vowed to "take the Senate leader head on" over Frist's use of the word.

Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) added: "This is a very, very important piece of legislation. I resent it when it's called amnesty."

While the Senate was debating, Bush was meeting in Mexico with Fox.

"We don't want people sneaking into our country that are going to do jobs Americans won't do," the president said, in support of his call for a guest-worker plan.

"We want them coming in, in an orderly way, which will take pressure off of both our borders."

At the same time, Bush told Fox that those in the U.S. illegally should not be given preference over people abroad who applied for citizenship.

For Fox, who is completing a six-year term and is not allowed to seek reelection, the meeting brought the immigration debate full circle: He took office seeking to improve relations with the United States, particularly over immigration. But that relationship was disrupted by the United States' attention to its campaign against terrorism after the Sept. 11 attacks, and then by differences between Fox and Bush over the Iraq war, which Fox opposed.

Fox, offering the sort of support Bush has sought on immigration, said Mexico understood that immigration "is a shared responsibility."

Bush Seeks To Ease Distrust In North American Talks (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

CANCUN, Mexico, March 30 -- President Bush began two days of meetings Thursday with Mexican President Vicente Fox and Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper in hopes of repairing fissures that have developed in the relationship among the North American neighbors.

Although the three nations entered into a formal security and prosperity partnership last year that was intended to strengthen their ties, the relationship between the United States and both its neighbors has been characterized in recent years by creeping distrust over issues such as illegal immigration and the implementation of U.S. trade policy.

Mexico has a huge stake in the ongoing debate in the United States over revamping immigration policy, being the home country of two-thirds of the estimated 11 million undocumented workers in the United States Tens of thousands more Mexicans attempt to cross the border each month.

After a meeting with Fox on Thursday, Bush told reporters he had reiterated his desire to sign a comprehensive immigration bill that strengthens border security and enforcement. Bush said that the United States has an "obligation" to secure its borders, and he thanked Fox for acknowledging Mexico's "shared responsibility" in that effort.

Bush also repeated his call for an increase in the number of green cards, which would allow more immigrants to be granted permanent residency in the United States. And he once again called for creation of a guest worker program that would create a legal channel for thousands of low-skilled workers to come into the United States.

"We don't want people sneaking into our country who are going to do jobs Americans don't want," Bush said. "We want them coming in an orderly way."

Analysts say many Mexicans have been put off by what they perceive as an increasingly hostile view in the United States toward illegal immigration, including a bill passed by the House of Representatives in December that would step up enforcement in part by building a wall along more than a third of the 2,000-mile U.S.-Mexican border.

The Senate is debating a more moderate immigration measure that includes a guest worker program like the one long advocated by Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0024797

Canadian attitudes toward the United States, meanwhile, have been soured by the invasion of Iraq and a general perception that Bush has pursued an arrogant, go-it-alone foreign policy. For some, that has been symbolized by the long-running dispute over heavy U.S. tariffs on softwood lumber imports from Canada.

Former prime minister Paul Martin suspended talks last year on the $4.5 billion in duties the United States has placed on the lumber, saying the levy violated the spirit of the North American Free Trade Agreement.

Harper has said he is looking for ways to make progress on the issue. Bush added that he was "always optimistic" that the dispute could be resolved.

Canadians also have objected to a U.S. plan to require special identification cards for people who regularly cross the borders with Canada and Mexico, saying it would hinder tourist and commercial traffic. Harper said the proposal presents a "pretty significant challenge."

Bush, however, has said the cards would expedite the flow of commerce between the two nations and facilitate travel while helping to secure the U.S. borders.

"The idea is to make sure that tourists and trade move freely and terrorists don't," Bush said in an interview earlier this week with Canada's CTV.

The series of disputes has helped turn public opinion in Mexico and Canada decidedly against the United States.

A Pew Research Center poll found that two-thirds of Mexicans and three-quarters of Canadians surveyed held a favorable view of the United States in 2000. By 2005, just 36 percent of Mexicans and 43 percent of Canadians who responded had a favorable view of the United States, according to an Ekos poll.

There is a "general sense on the part of both of our neighbors that America's focus was exclusively terrorism and we were prepared to do everything else unilaterally," Robert Pastor, director of the Center for North American Studies at American University, said in a telephone interview.

Compounding that sense in Mexico has been the uneven impact NAFTA has had there, Pastor said.

Rather than resulting in a surfeit of good jobs that slowed the flow of illegal immigration, the enactment of NAFTA has coincided with a sharp increase in the number of undocumented workers living in the United States. And while many jobs have been created in Mexico, others have migrated to countries where low-skilled labor is even less expensive.

"NAFTA succeeded, but only for that part of Mexico that was connected to the United States," Pastor said. He said major investments were needed in roads and other infrastructure, particularly in southern Mexico, before the benefits of free trade were felt throughout the country.

Meanwhile, the income and wealth disparities between the United States and Mexico have widened, not closed. Experts say this gap lies at the root of the illegal immigration problem.

"Trade is not the only locomotive that pulls the train," said Andres Rozental, president of the Mexican Council on Foreign Relations.

Bush, Fox and Harper started their day with a tour of the Chichen Itza Mayan ruins, which are about 127 miles west of here. The three leaders, dressed casually, climbed a few of the narrow steps of El Castillo, a steep 75-foot-tall pyramid.

Bush Takes Time Out To Make Like A Tourist (KRT)

By William Douglas

Knight Ridder, March 30, 2006

CANCUN, Mexico - President Bush traded in his business suit Thursday for a white tropical short-sleeve shirt and khaki slacks as he played tourist, something he rarely does on foreign trips.

The president was all smiles and business casual as he spent about an hour walking through the impressive ruins of Chichen-Itza, a Mayan archeological site about 127 miles west of Cancun, where he's meeting with Mexican President Vicente Fox and Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper. The ruins date back to the sixth century.

"I want to thank you for letting us begin our important meetings at this very historical site," Bush said after his tour. "I want to thank those who have worked hard to make sure this important part of our history is accessible and is available for people to understand the past, so we can better understand the future."

Bush has earned a reputation for being an indifferent tourist at best on overseas trips, dashing through museums and exhibits or leaving social and cultural events early. He typically prefers to stick to business and not interrupt his routine.

White House officials say Bush's aversion to touring reflects security concerns and the tricky logistics of moving a presidential entourage around. Bush's critics say his reluctance to get out and about reflects a lack of intellectual curiosity and hurts America's image abroad.

The president seems to be emerging slowly from his touring shell. During last month's trip to India and Pakistan, he played cricket in Pakistan, but passed on a tour of India's Taj Mahal, which disappointed Indian officials.

DOJ_NMG_0024798

On Thursday, Bush looked like a man having fun and in no hurry. He listened intently as Federica Sodi, the site's lead archeologist, explained the significance of the ruins. They strolled past El Castillo, a 75-foot pyramid with 91 steps on each of its four sides - and stopped to listen to a band perform Jarana, a local song and dance. Bush smiled and swayed slightly.

The leaders then proceeded to a site called the ball court, a 545-foot-long athletic field lined with a stone wall, where a soccer-like game called tlachtli was played in ancient times.

From there, the leaders went back to the pyramid and walked up two or three of the 91 steps. They finished the tour at the Temple of Big Tables, a structure that contains original murals painted by Mayans for their gods, a tour guide said.

Bush Plays Tourist On Mission To Mexico (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, March 31, 2006

When he visited St. Petersburg, Russia, in 2002, he completed his tour of the Hermitage museum in two hours, 16 minutes. That was enough time to have a look at the artwork and have lunch with Russian President Vladimir I. Putin. There are 3 million pieces in the collection. He didn't see them all.

As president, he has been to Rome. He skipped the Colosseum.

Berlin? He drove past the Brandenburg Gate without stopping.

He did the Great Wall of China in a half-hour flat, then turned to a reporter and said, "Let's go home." And four weeks ago, he caused a diplomatic row by refusing entreaties while in India to visit the Taj Mahal.

All of which make his activities Thursday morning that much more remarkable. He made a one-hour flight aboard Marine One from Cancun to Chichen Itza to visit the Mayan and Toltec ruin that is among the world's greatest archaeological sites.

The once-sacred city, a UNESCO World Heritage Site, was first populated about 1,500 years ago, abandoned, resettled, and again abandoned about 700 years ago.

Wearing a white tropical shirt, khakis and rough-soled hiking shoes, Bush walked along El Castillo, the pyramid that is the site's most prominent feature, accompanied by his host, Mexican President Vicente Fox, and Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper.

Sounding more the formal diplomat than the casual tourist, Bush said to Fox: "I want to thank you for letting us begin our very important meetings at this very significant historical site." The three leaders are meeting here in a North American summit, and Fox has used the visit to send out a message that this resort on the Yucatan Peninsula, battered by Hurricane Wilma last year, is open for business. Bringing the foreign leaders to the remains of an ancient civilization sent another message: Mexico offers more for a tourist than just beaches.

Perhaps it was because he is in his sixth year in office -- or, more likely, because he really had little choice but to yield to protocol and the wishes of his host -- but Bush cooperated with Fox's mission.

Together, the three climbed about five of the pyramid's steep steps.

After adhering during his first five years in office to a schedule that had him speeding through meetings and meals and then heading to his next stop, or home, the two hours at Chichen Itza put Bush somewhere in the ranks of presidential tourists.

To be sure, he has made some concessions to local culture over the years -- in Botswana, for example, he made a quick drive through an animal park in 2003. And presidents rarely spend much time at tourist attractions while on diplomatic travels. But they do manage some sightseeing, often at the encouragement of their hosts.

Ronald Reagan, in China in 1984, detoured hundreds of miles to the city of Xian to see its terra cotta warriors, an archaeological treasure. Four years later, he strolled Red Square in Moscow with Mikhail S. Gorbachev.

That has not been Bush's style.

Still, on Thursday, he squeezed in a favored pursuit.

Between the tour of Chichen Itza and the first of his diplomatic meetings, he worked up a sweat in the hotel gym.

Senate Tackles Immigration As Bill's Backers Seek Support (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Senate plunged into debate on landmark immigration legislation even as supporters worked to consolidate the 60 votes needed to cut off any filibuster and win passage next week.

DOJ_NMG_0024799

The opening day showed more passion than progress with major amendments postponed until Monday. House conservatives lashed out at the proceedings, saying the White House was jeopardizing Republican lawmakers by moving forward on such a sensitive issue this election year. But after a meeting with Mexican President Vicente Fox, President Bush said he was "optimistic we can get a bill done."

"We have a prodigious path ahead of us," warned Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R., Pa.).

Sen. John McCain (R., Ariz.) said the debate was a "defining moment" in American history.

"Are we going to continue a rich tradition of welcoming new blood and new vitality, or are we going to adopt an isolationist, protectionist attitude and policies that are a betrayal of the very fundamentals of this great nation?" Mr. McCain said. "By God, we have to continue those traditions of freedom and democracy and hope."

As reported by the Senate Judiciary Committee on Monday, the measure would create new guest-worker programs and legalize the status of an estimated 11 million undocumented workers who are already in the U.S.

In deference to Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.), debate had been confined to a much-narrower border-security bill favored by conservatives and the House. But at noon yesterday, Mr. Specter was allowed to bring out the broader Judiciary measure that will be the focus going forward.

Democrats believe they can deliver 42 votes for the bill, and Mr. McCain's office appeared confident that 18 Republicans can be found to bridge the difference and invoke cloture to cut off a filibuster. But Mr. Frist said last night that "cloture doesn't have the votes to pass now even if they had all 45 Democrats."

The White House's worst fear regarding the legislation is that it will collapse in the Senate, denying Mr. Bush the chance of getting the House to consider a more comprehensive approach to immigration.

Senators are finding it hard to find middle ground on the question of whether undocumented workers, already in the U.S., should be allowed to both legalize their status and eventually apply for citizenship.

"I won't accept a repetition of the mistake of 1986," said Sen. John Cornyn (R., Texas), speaking of an amnesty offered then by the Reagan administration and Congress in similar circumstances.

Mr. Specter angrily dismissed the "smear of amnesty," and said any illegal who comes forward now would be subject to fines, back taxes and an 11-year waiting period before becoming a citizen.

"I, right now, would not support the bill if it stays exactly the way it is," Mr. Frist said. He warned against pushing too fast for a vote on cloture before Republicans had had a chance to express themselves.

"Everybody struggles with it. I struggle with it," he said, and in addressing the millions of workers in the U.S., he urged proponents to look for a compromise short of an outright path to citizenship.

"You could design a separate class, not a track which is what they have now, which allows people to continue to work," he said. "There's no way you can take 11 million people and send them back either right now or three to four years from now. But you could design a system that doesn't give you a leg up at all to citizenship."

"Immigrants don't come to America to change America," said Sen. Mel Martinez (R., Fla.), who fled Cuba as a child. "Immigrants come to be changed by America."

Tuning In To Anger On Immigration (WP)

By Shailagh Murray And T.r. Reid

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

The first time Rep. Tom Tancredo got really angry about immigration, the year was 1975, and he was a junior high school social studies teacher in Denver. The state had recently passed the nation's first bilingual education law, and Hispanic kids were taken from his class to study in Spanish.

That idea made zero sense to Tancredo, the grandson of Italian immigrants. He believed that newcomers should be assimilated into the country, as they had been for generations. The image of America as a beacon for people from all over the world uniting under one flag and one language was threatened, he contended, if the country started adapting to immigrants, instead of the other way around.

A year later, Tancredo launched a political career animated by his obsession to stem the tide of immigration from Mexico and Central America that he feared would change the character and security of the country. Today, the four-term Republican House member stands at the center of a national debate over how best to deal with the nearly 12 million illegal immigrants in the United States. Tancredo helped the House pass a bill in December that would impose criminal sanctions on illegal immigrants and those who employ them and that would erect a wall along 700 miles of the U.S.-Mexican border to keep others out.

That legislation has triggered massive protests throughout the country and prompted a Senate committee this week to pass an alternative measure with a guest-worker program that would help many illegal immigrants eventually win permanent residency or even U.S. citizenship.

Tancredo, 60, has so effectively tapped into the anger of millions of Americans who favor a crackdown on illegal immigrants and tougher measures at the border that the back-bench Republican is considering making a bid for president in two years. But in Washington, he is viewed warily by Democrats, the White House and even some of his Republican colleagues as a loose cannon or even a zealot.

After Tancredo suggested in 2002 that President Bush's views on immigration amounted to a national security threat, White House political adviser Karl Rove told him, "Don't ever darken the door of the White House" -- although Tancredo later was invited to the White House for a bill signing.

Democrats have criticized him for stoking anti-immigration sentiment, although some see his tactics as helping them by driving Hispanic American voters in Florida, California and other states away from the Republican Party. "I'm all for more and more nuts in their party speaking up," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), who chairs the House Democrats' congressional campaign committee. "I want more of those guys."

Tancredo shrugs off the criticism. "It's not a secret that I have burned a lot of bridges here," he said in an interview this week. "My ability to get anything done around here is based around my ability to make this into a national issue. My megaphone is pointed at the ear of America."

A ubiquitous presence on the airwaves, Tancredo has appeared more than 1,000 times on radio talk shows in recent years and has become a television news mainstay. He has traveled widely around the country, including the early presidential caucus and primary states of Iowa and New Hampshire. His office averaged 4,566 pieces of mail per month during the first quarter of this year. When Tancredo was scheduled as a guest on ABC's "This Week" last Sunday, he received 300 "good luck" e-mail messages before his appearance and 700 "good job" e-mails after the show.

The relentless media exposure, along with polls indicating that many Americans support a border crackdown and the deportation of illegal immigrants, has given Tancredo considerable influence over the immigration legislation now unfolding in Congress. "He's a force because he represents what a lot of people think," said Steven Camarota of the Center for Immigration Studies, which favors less immigration. "He's only a gadfly in Washington."

For many frustrated, scared and angry suburbanites and small-town residents, Tancredo is a hero, one of the very few Washington politicians who take their fears seriously. They believe undocumented, mostly Hispanic workers are taking jobs that ought to go to citizens, flooding schools and boosting the crime rate, and that the country's open borders pose a security threat.

"My parents were immigrants," says Mark Solinsky, an independent voter from the sprawling Denver suburb of Highlands Ranch, a part of Tancredo's suburban Colorado district. "Came from Poland. In the '20s. But I think now, this new wave of immigration poses a problem. We've got to have tougher laws. And, you know, that's what Tancredo always talks about. So I would say, yeah, he's right on that. We need some leadership on that."

Republican Ed Clousing, of Littleton, a suburb at the foot of the Rockies, said: "I am so mad at our government. And I know Tom Tancredo is mad, too. Because there's nobody up there trying to protect what's right about our country."

Tancredo's congressional district includes suburb after suburb, an expanse of new homes, schools, shopping malls and golf courses spreading across the high plains south and west of Denver. The district is about 88 percent white, and the residents are prosperous, with a median income ($74,000) almost twice the national average. The share of Hispanic residents, 6 percent, is the lowest of any Colorado district.

Tancredo, a self-described religious right Republican, grew up on the north side of Denver, taught in junior high school, and was elected to the state House in 1976 at the age of 30. He was part of a group called "the crazies," who advocated the elimination of the sales tax on food and utilities, and was a critic of public education.

But immigration has always been his chief preoccupation, and he made a name for himself after winning election to Congress. Tancredo strongly opposes any programs to accommodate illegal workers already living in the country and, after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, he supported the most stringent possible border enforcements.

Tancredo helped to shape a House bill, approved in December, that would impose stiff penalties on employers who hire illegal workers and would require businesses to eventually run the names of every employee through a national database to confirm their legality. The bill would end the "catch and release" policy for immigrants other than Mexicans who are caught sneaking into the country. Five double-layer border fences would be built in California and Arizona, stretching 698 miles at a total cost of more than $2.2 billion.

The House proposal has sparked huge protests in Phoenix, Detroit, Los Angeles and elsewhere. The Senate is now debating legislation that would take a more permissive and forgiving approach, by creating a guest-worker program and issuing more visas for professionals.

Tancredo is particularly riled at the business community, which he says has become "addicted to cheap labor." Employers are a driving force behind the guest-worker program and other Senate provisions that amount to "nearly universal amnesty" for the 12 million people currently living in the United States illegally, Tancredo says. He routinely chides Bush, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and other GOP colleagues for bowing to corporate pressure, despite the potential social problems and security threats.

Polls indicate that about 60 percent of Americans oppose guest-worker programs and three-quarters of Americans believe the government is doing too little to secure the nation's borders.

Democrats acknowledge concerns about the issue, but it is Republicans who are in the most difficult spot. One lawmaker trying to juggle law-and-order voters with business pressures is Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.), who is fighting for reelection in November. His state is the birthplace of the Minutemen, a citizens' border patrol founded after Sept. 11. It was also the site of one of the biggest rallies against the House bill, held last week in Phoenix.

To keep the heat on Kyl, Tancredo issued a news release titled "Tancredo to Kyl: Just Say No to Amnesty," urging the senator to vote against the guest-worker proposal in committee, which Kyl did. But the Arizona Republican refused to comment about Tancredo's influence over the immigration debate. "I don't want to talk about it," he grumbled while dashing for an elevator.

The Great Senate Immigr'A'tion Debate (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

It was all fire and brimstone as House Republicans gathered yesterday in the Capitol basement to denounce their Senate counterparts for proposing to legalize illegal immigrants.

Rep. Steve King (R-Iowa), behind a pulpit adorned with a "Just Say No to Amnesty" sign, thundered: "Anybody that votes for an amnesty bill deserves to be branded with a scarlet letter, 'A' for amnesty, and they need to pay for it at the ballot box in November."

Stand down, Hester Prynne. Adultery is so 17th-century.

At the precise moment the House GOP was turning all puritanical, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), author of the Senate legislation, was in the television studio announcing that he would not wear the "A" for amnesty. "There is an effort far and wide to try to degrade the committee bill by the smear of amnesty, and it simply is not amnesty," he said -- repeating his denial four times in a minute.

The world's greatest deliberative body is at it again. The Senate has begun a momentous debate about securing the nation's borders, and what to do about the millions of illegal immigrants already here. So far, however, the lawmakers have not advanced much beyond a linguistic debate about the meaning of the A-word.

"I believe we have a bill which is not justifiably categorized as amnesty," Specter announced.

Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) countered that the Senate bill is "what most Americans will see as amnesty."

"It is not amnesty," Specter rebutted. "This word 'amnesty' is a code word. It is a code word to try to smear good-faith legislation."

Sen. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.), the chamber's lone immigrant, said the "loudest voices" should not "make a definition of what amnesty is and what amnesty should be."

The loud-voiced Sen. Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.) was unmoved. "In every sense of what people mean by amnesty, it's amnesty," he said. "If it's not amnesty, it's the same thing as amnesty. That's just what it is." The Alabama lexicographer brandished the scarlet letter a half-dozen times more. "By any standard definition of the word 'amnesty,' this bill has it," Sessions maintained. "I know that's a loaded word, and I don't want to be playing around demagogically with the word 'amnesty.' "

One man's amnesty, of course, is another man's "earned citizenship," as Sen. Patty Murray (D-Wash.) put it yesterday. The legislation, for the record, would pardon immigrants' illegal entry if they pay a fine and back taxes, go through a background investigation and learn English.

But the use of the word "amnesty" -- more than 50 times on the Senate floor yesterday -- says much about the immigration debate. Proponents of the "guest-worker" path toward legalization appear to have gained the upper hand; Specter seems to have the votes in the Senate, and House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) is rethinking his chamber's hostility to a guest-worker plan. Opponents, therefore, need to escalate the rhetoric and invoke the A-word.

Democrats, who favor the guest-worker plan, called in a polling firm, Lake Research Partners, to provide talking points to counter the amnesty charge. "Lead with an enforcement message," the firm advised, and propose "reasonable solutions" that are also "tough and fair." Lake continued: "Immigrants have to pay taxes . . . and be learning English."

Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) hit all the points: "We need tough and smart enforcement at the border and throughout the country. We need realistic immigration laws that bring immigrants out of the shadows, paying taxes, learning English and contributing to our communities."

Other senators sampled their own buzzwords to counter the dreaded amnesty allegation: "We are a nation of immigrants" and "Bring people out of the shadows."

But these soft and gauzy slogans were no match for the anti-amnesty crowd of House Republicans, who stood in front of a banner with the word AMNESTY in 18-inch letters and a slash through it.

"It would be like a dinner bell" to immigrants, pronounced Bob Beauprez (R-Colo.). "If you are here illegally and want to fly the Mexican flag, go to Mexico," proposed Virgil H. Goode Jr. (R-Va.). "I say let the prisoners pick the fruits," said Dana Rohrabacher (R-Calif.), adding, "I would hope that the American people are smart enough to smell the foul odor that's coming out of the United States Senate." Asked if President Bush, who supports a guest-worker plan, has a similar stench, Rohrabacher replied: "No comment."

But King topped them all, asserting that a "ruling class" of Americans have "made enough money by hiring cheap illegal labor that they think they also have some kind of a right to cheap servants to manicure their nails and their lawn."

Over in the Senate, the linguistic dispute continued to rage. "Tantamount to an amnesty program," judged David Vitter (R-La.). "It is not amnesty," said Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.). "Some people might perceive that what is granted is an amnesty," posited John Cornyn (R-Tex.). "This does not sound like amnesty to me," chimed in Blanche Lincoln (D-Ark.).

Only Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) retained his composure. "I think that's a straw dog, to be very honest with you, this argument of amnesty," he observed. "The debate is misfocused in some ways when the word 'amnesty' becomes the hot button, nomenclature versus the more substantive question."

Another remark like that, and Gregg will be wearing the scarlet letter.

Political Parties Pressured On Immigration (AP-Y2)

By Ron Fournier

AP2, March 30, 2006

Arizona's leaders are in a tizzy over immigration, pressured by political crosswinds that reflect the growing national debate over how to control U.S. borders.

Republicans are bashing Republicans. The Democratic governor is in cahoots with a GOP senator. Both parties fear voter backlash.

Bordering Mexico, Arizona may be the perfect spot to show the state of policy and politics of U.S. immigration.

In a word, it's a mess.

"You'll find every view in Arizona," jokes Rep. Jeff Flake (news, bio, voting record), a conservative Republican from Mesa.

In the House, he has backed the approach of the state's most notable politician, GOP Sen. John McCain (news, bio, voting record), who wants to give illegal immigrants a clear path to citizenship through work.

McCain's position puts him on the side of President Bush and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce — and many prominent Democrats, including Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano and liberal icon Sen. Edward Kennedy (news, bio, voting record) of Massachusetts.

Arizona's junior senator, Republican Jon Kyl, also wants to help the estimated 11 million illegal immigrants remain in the United States legally, but his approach would make it harder for them. He wants illegal immigrants to return to their native countries before returning as so-called guest workers.

Then there is another conservative Arizona lawmaker, Rep. J.D. Hayworth (news, bio, voting record), who has written a book that proposes building a fence along the U.S.-Mexico border, using armed forces to help patrol the region and denying citizenship to the U.S.-born children of illegal immigrants.

There is unanimity on one point in Arizona: illegal immigration is a major problem.

The state is the largest gateway for illegal immigrants, accounting for 54 percent of the 1.1 million apprehensions nationwide during the 2004 fiscal year. It is home to an estimated 500,000 illegal immigrants out of the state's population of about 6 million, a costly drag on health care, education and law enforcement budgets.

"Arizona has been devastated by this issue," McCain said.

Long considered a federal problem, limited to a few "gateway states" such as California and Arizona, illegal immigration is now a front-burner issue across the country.

Illegal immigrants are moving to states like North Carolina, Iowa, Ohio and Georgia as they seek jobs and establish communities. North Carolina alone had 390,000 illegal immigrants in 2004, nearly 16 times its number in 1990, according to a Pew Hispanic Center analysis.

Last year, Napolitano and Democratic Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico declared immigration emergencies in their border counties. Napolitano recently signed an order to expand the National Guard's presence at Arizona's porous border.

At a news conference this week, Napolitano praised McCain's bill while calling Kyl's approach "a fictional system." She chastised the GOP-led House for passing a bill that focuses solely on border reinforcement rather than also dealing with illegal immigrants already working in the U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0024803

"The House bill is a terrible bill for Arizona," she said.

The backbiting didn't stop there.

Hayworth accused fellow Republicans of carrying water for business interests who want the cheap labor provided by guest-worker provisions.

"It's the ultimate corporate welfare scam," he said on the "Imus in the Morning" television and radio program.

Flake, a guest-worker supporter, objected when Hayworth's plan was called conservative. "I don't think it's conservative to ignore the problem," he told The Associated Press. "If you don't have a plan to deal with those here illegally now, that's a huge part of the problem."

The political stakes are huge. Hispanics are the fastest-growing group of voters, and President Bush has helped double the GOP's share of the Hispanic vote since 2000.

McCain said those gains are at risk. "This issue has galvanized the Hispanic population in Arizona," he said, pointing to protests this week in Arizona and several other states against the crackdown on illegal immigration.

"First, this is a warning to my party that we have to be sensitive about this issue," McCain told The AP. "Secondly, the Hispanic community risks a backlash if it become unruly or too many Hispanic flags — and not enough American flags — are at these protests."

"These are sensitive times."

Sensitive, indeed, for McCain and other candidates lining up for 2008 presidential bids. They include Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, who staked out a position to the right of McCain, and Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, who accused House Republicans of passing a bill that would criminalize "even Jesus himself."

Polls show the issue has the potential to divide Democrats as well as Republicans. Many working-class Democrats resent what they consider to be a constant flow of cheap labor. The hard-line House bill was backed by 36 Democrats, including those considered most in danger of losing their seats in November.

Still, the fear is most palpable among GOP leaders. Republican Party chairman Ken Mehlman said his party's challenge is to improve border security "and do it in a way that is pro-immigrant."

"Franklin Roosevelt built a durable Democratic coalition because large groups of American Catholics, Jews and ethnics" who otherwise shared Republicans values "were convinced that the Republican Party did not like them," Mehlman said. "So we have to be careful."

These being sensitive times, Mehlman was speaking on the telephone from Phoenix, where he was meeting with Hispanics.

Divided US Senate Debates Immigration Reform (AFP-Y2)

AFP, March 30, 2006

A fractured US Senate opened debate on reforms to immigration laws, which have sparked demonstrations across the country.

The debate, likely to carry on for days, will consider whether to create a foreign guest worker program, how best to seal the lengthy southern border with Mexico, and what to do with the estimated 11.5 million undocumented workers in the United States.

"The level of illegal immigration is unacceptable," said Democrat Ken Salazar from the western state of Colorado. "Our immigration laws are not working, we have broken borders and we must fix the problem."

Salazar emphasized that after the September 11, 2001 attacks it was "critical that we get control of our borders" as a "matter of national security" -- a view widely repeated by his colleagues in the past months.

Immigration reform plans has especially split President George W. Bush's majority Republican Party, which controls the House of Representatives and the Senate.

Bush presented a reform plan that increases the number of Border Patrol agents and allows some undocumented workers to register for legal status -- and ultimately, if they qualify, for US citizenship.

But hard-line Republicans in the House of Representatives in December approved a bill making unapproved US entry a crime, and included plans to build a wall along parts of the border.

The proposal touched off mass protests in US cities. More than 500,000 people demonstrated in Los Angeles last Saturday and there were new smaller protests there by school students on Thursday.

The Senate is seeking a possible compromise that would reinforce border security but also allow work visas and eventual residency for some migrants.

The House and the Senate must agree on any new immigration rules, and the measure then has to be signed by the president to become law.

DOJ_NMG_0024804

Complicating factors include the November mid-terms elections, in which opposition Democrats hope to win back seats. And with several legislators hoping to run for president in 2008, there has been broad popular demands for increased border security.

The senators are trying to reach a decision before a two-week recess starts on April 7.

"It'll be a daunting task to finish this bill on that schedule," said Republican Senator Arlen Specter. "But we've undertaken daunting tasks before and succeeded -- but it can be done only if we have cooperation from the members."

Many analysts say the debate goes to the heart of what it means to be an American in a country that has long prided itself on being a nation of immigrants.

Salazar himself reminded his colleagues that "virtually every person in America has a story to tell about its immigrants roots."

Senate Calls For Study Into Immigrant Deaths (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Senate today approved an amendment to launch a study of how many illegal immigrants die trying to cross U.S. borders, which Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) described as "an immense humanitarian tragedy."

The 94-0 vote — the first of several votes the Senate is expected to take this afternoon as it continues debating immigration reform — provided little hint of the tumultuous votes to come.

In an emotional debate that pits the needs for post-9/11 border security against the economic and humanitarian concerns of the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants already in the country, senators often got personal.

"I know emotions are running high," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.). Dismissing calls to make criminals of illegal immigrants, Feinstein said, "How do you find 12 million people?"

Describing three illegal immigrants who have made contributions to the country, Feinstein added, "This is their home. They are a vital and necessary part of the American workforce."

In the hours and days to come, legislators were expected to debate a dual approach to immigration.

One, offered by Frist, would crack down on illegal immigration by increasing the number of Border Patrol agents and updating their technological detection devises.

The bill would also require the detention of all illegal immigrants, and make it unlawful to hire one.

Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) on Wednesday called the Frist approach "un-American."

The competing legislation, a Senate Judiciary Committee bill offered by its chairman, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), would provide some Border Patrol protections — adding 12,000 agents in the next five years, to double the force, and make building a tunnel under the U.S. border a crime.

It would also allow most illegal immigrants now in the country to apply for a six-year guest worker card. Those not in the country could petition for a green card if sponsored by an employer. Guest workers would have to wait five years to apply for U.S. citizenship, and would become eligible after 11 years.

In addition, the bill would provide so-called blue cards for illegal immigrants who are agricultural workers, and remove penalties against humanitarian workers and clergymen who help illegal immigrants.

The Judiciary Committee bill won support of all eight committee Democrats and three Republicans: Mike DeWine of Ohio, Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and Sam Brownback of Kansas. Conservative columnists Robert Novak and David Brooks editorialized today about the importance of immigration to America's economy and history.

In the House, which passed a border enforcement bill in December, Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) said he remains open to compromise.

"Our first priority is to protect the border," he said. "And we also know there is a need in some sectors of the economy for a guest worker program."

Like many following the debate, Hastert said he is eager to "see what the Senate comes forward with."

Conservatives Stand Firm On Immigration (NYT)

By Carl Hulse And Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 30 — Conservative House Republicans bluntly warned their leaders Thursday against any immigration compromise that would allow temporary foreign workers and assailed a Senate proposal that would open the way for illegal immigrants to earn citizenship.

DOJ_NMG_0024805

"My fear is that if we continue down this path that the Senate has established, that we will have created the biggest magnet ever," said Representative Bob Beauprez, a Colorado Republican. "It would be like a dinner bell, 'Come one, come all.' "

But the bipartisan authors of a Senate plan that would combine new border protections with a temporary worker program and a process for illegal immigrants to qualify for residency and eventually citizenship said they thought they were gaining support as the Senate moved deeper into its immigration fight.

Senator John McCain, the Arizona Republican who helped write the plan approved Monday by the Senate Judiciary Committee, called the debate a defining moment in the nation's history.

"Are we going to continue our rich tradition of hundreds of years of welcoming new blood and new vitality to our nation?" Mr. McCain asked. "Or are we going to adopt a protectionist, isolationist attitude and policies that are in betrayal of the very fundamentals of this great nation of ours, a beacon of hope and liberty and freedom throughout the world?"

Supporters of Mr. McCain's plan said that President Bush's comments in recent days have suggested he was moving toward their position. Under Mr. McCain's proposal, illegal immigrants would be granted permanent residency and the opportunity to apply for citizenship only after foreigners who have followed the rules by applying for residency from their countries have been processed.

In a speech on Thursday in Cancún, Mexico, where President Bush was meeting with President Vicente Fox, Mr. Bush said, "If they want to become a citizen, they can get in line, but not the head of the line."

The sharp divisions among Republicans illustrated the difficulty Congress would have in reaching agreement, particularly with midterm elections looming. Lawmakers and Senate officials said the climactic votes would come next week as senators considered amendments and a choice between the Judiciary Committee plan and a proposal by Senator Bill Frist, the majority leader, that focuses on tougher law enforcement.

As the debate rages in Washington, the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press and the Pew Hispanic Center released a national survey indicating that ordinary Americans are also deeply divided over how to handle the 11 million illegal immigrants thought to be living in the United States.

The poll, conducted between Feb. 8 and March 7, found that 53 percent of the 2,000 people surveyed believed that illegal immigrants should be required to return home, while 40 percent said they should be granted some legal status that allows them to stay in the United States.

Forty-nine percent said that increasing penalties for employers who hire illegal immigrants would be most effective in reducing illegal immigration. One-third preferred increasing the number of border patrol agents while 9 percent favored the construction of fences along the Mexican border.

And while 65 percent said that immigrants mostly take jobs that Americans do not want, the survey found that a growing number of people believe immigrants are a burden, taking jobs and housing and creating strains on health care.

House conservatives emphasized such concerns at a news conference on Thursday. Worried that their party's leadership was weakening in its opposition to plans that would allow illegal workers to remain in the United States, more than a dozen House members staged a "Say No to Amnesty" event after Speaker J. Dennis Hastert suggested on Wednesday that the House might consider a temporary worker program.

Representative Dana Rohrabacher, Republican of California, dismissed arguments made by President Bush and business leaders who say the United States needs a pool of foreign workers. He said businesses should be more creative in their efforts to find help and suggested that employers turn to the prison population to fill jobs in agriculture and elsewhere.

"Let the prisoners pick the fruits," Mr. Rohrabacher said. "We can do it without bringing in millions of foreigners."

With the Senate considering a worker and citizenship plan starkly at odds with the House approach, Representative Tom Tancredo, Republican of Colorado and a leading advocate of tough immigration laws, said House conservatives wanted to make clear their resistance to any worker program. "Push is coming to shove," Mr. Tancredo said.

Despite the outcry from the right, Representative John A. Boehner, the majority leader, said the House would await a bill from the Senate before making firm decisions. "To stand here today and guess at what it might look like and how we might deal with an issue is a lot of speculation that we don't need to engage in," Mr. Boehner said.

While backers of the bipartisan measure said they were making inroads, opponents of the citizenship proposal said they were not so sure. "The more people find out what is in it, I think there will be more unease," said Senator Jeff Sessions, Republican of Alabama. Like other critics of the legislation, Mr. Sessions said it could be characterized as amnesty for illegal immigrants.

Authors of the measure bristled at that label. Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania and chairman of the Judiciary Committee, described it as a smear intended to build resistance to the legislation.

"It is not amnesty because the undocumented aliens will have to pay a fine," he said. "They will have to pay back taxes. They will undergo a thorough background investigation. They will have to learn English. They will have to work for six years. And they will have to earn the status of staying in the country and the status of moving toward citizenship."

Hill Conservatives Warn Bush Of Amnesty Anger (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, March 31, 2006

House conservatives yesterday issued a dire warning to President Bush and Republican leadership that they will pay a devastating political price if they proceed with a guest-worker program or anything resembling amnesty for illegal aliens before securing the borders and enforcing existing immigration laws.

"They will remember in November," Rep. J.D. Hayworth, Arizona Republican, said of voters nationwide. "And many of those who have stood with our Republican majority in the last decade are not only angry, many of them plan to be absent from the polls" this year when the entire House and one-third of the Senate is up for re-election.

Mr. Hayworth and more than a dozen other House Republicans pointed to polls that show overwhelming support for their strict-enforcement stance and advised Mr. Bush and GOP leaders in both chambers to "listen to the common sense of the American people."

One Republican, Rep. Dana Rohrabacher of California, fired a warning shot specifically at Sen. John McCain. The Arizona Republican widely expected to be a 2008 presidential hopeful at that moment was holding a press conference across the Capitol with, among others, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat.

"Those elected officials who are insisting on a guest-worker program and diluting the efforts of border security and internal enforcement are telling the American people exactly whose side they are on," Mr. Rohrabacher said. "The American people now have that opportunity to make that determination, and they will. Senator McCain and others will find out about that, when they find their own career is short term."

Those sentiments were only buttressed, the lawmakers said, by the images in recent days across the country of thousands marching in opposition to tough immigration reform.

"I say if you are here illegally and want to fly the Mexican flag, go to Mexico and wave the American flag," said Rep. Virgil H. Goode Jr., Virginia Republican.

Senate action yesterday was confined to a single unanimous vote to study fatalities among foreigners sneaking across the desert into the United States. But Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, officially introduced his committee's 471-page proposal that would fine illegal aliens but allow them to remain in the U.S. while applying for citizenship.

Although conservatives in both chambers excoriated the Specter plan as "amnesty," other Republicans said momentum was shifting toward what they called a "comprehensive" border security bill that includes a guest-worker program that provides illegal aliens with a path to citizenship.

"Among the Republican conference, I see a shift toward a comprehensive view to solve this problem," said Sen. Lindsey Graham, South Carolina Republican, who is among four Republicans who voted for Mr. Specter's proposal in committee. "From a Republican point of view, we need to be wise in the way we deal with this politically."

Mr. Graham attended yesterday's McCain-Kennedy press conference, along with Sen. Joe Lieberman, Connecticut Democrat.

"Our reforms need to reflect the realities," Mr. McCain said. "We need guest workers in this country. There are some jobs Americans are simply unwilling to do."

And House leaders again appeared willing to discuss the broader plan.

"When we get to the conference, we'll talk about it," said Majority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio.

On Wednesday, House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert told reporters that a guest-worker program is needed.

"Our first priority is to protect the borders," he said. "We also know there is a need in some sectors of this economy for a guest-worker program."

But Mr. Rohrabacher called the guest-worker proposal "the foul odor that's coming out of the United States Senate."

There is no need for such a program, he said.

"We do not need more people from foreign countries coming in taking the jobs of Americans and bidding down our wages. We can do those jobs, even in the fields," Mr. Rohrabacher said.

Anyone who supports such a proposal, said Rep. Steve King of Iowa, should be "branded with a scarlet letter A," for "amnesty."

DOJ_NMG_0024807

As for who might be willing to take up the hard labor many illegal aliens now perform on U.S. farms, Mr. Rohrabacher had a suggestion.

"The millions of young men who are prisoners around our country can pick the fruits and vegetables," he said. "I say let the prisoners pick the fruits."

Mr. Rohrabacher offered a terse "no comment" when asked whether his "foul odor" comment also applied to Mr. Bush, who first proposed a guest-worker plan more than two years ago. Mr. Rohrabacher later added: "The American people can take a deep breath and determine for themselves what smells and what doesn't and where it's coming from."

According to a poll by the Pew Research Center and Pew Hispanic Center released yesterday, 52 percent of Americans view immigrants as a burden because they take jobs and housing -- up from 38 percent in 2000 -- compared with 41 percent, who believe they strengthen the country. The poll also found 53 percent of Americans support sending illegals home, while 40 percent said they should be put on some sort of path toward citizenship.

Rep. Tom Tancredo, the Colorado Republican who leads the House immigration reform caucus, offered a simple explanation for why Mr. Bush is pushing a guest-worker program that voters don't want.

"He's not running for re-election," Mr. Tancredo said yesterday. "I wish that he would recognize the dangerous position he would place himself in and the rest of his agenda if the Republicans lose the House and Senate, which they could easily do on this issue.

"Although he's not running for re-election, I wish he would think about the party. And, of course, I wish he'd think about the country."

House Conservatives Blast Immigration Bill (AP-Y2)

By David Espo

AP2, March 30, 2006

House conservatives criticized President Bush, accused the Senate of fouling the air, said prisoners rather than illegal farm workers should pick America's crops and denounced the use of Mexican flags by protesters Thursday in a vehement attack on legislation to liberalize U.S. immigration laws.

"I say let the prisoners pick the fruits," said Rep. Dana Rohrabacher (news, bio, voting record) of California, one of more than a dozen Republicans who took turns condemning a Senate bill that offers an estimated 11 million illegal immigrants an opportunity for citizenship.

"Anybody that votes for an amnesty bill deserves to be branded with a scarlet letter A," said Rep. Steve King (news, bio, voting record) of Iowa, referring to a guest worker provision in the Senate measure.

Their news conference took place across the Capitol from the Senate, where supporters and critics of the legislation seemed determined to heed admonitions from both Bush and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist to conduct a dignified, civilized debate.

The House has passed legislation to tighten border security, while the Senate approach also includes provisions to regulate the flow of temporary workers into the country and control the legal fate of millions of illegal immigrants already here. Bush has broadly endorsed the Senate approach, saying he wants a comprehensive bill.

It was the second day in a row that congressional Republicans aired their differences on an issue that directly affects the fastest growing segment of the electorate. Under Bush's leadership, the Republicans have made dramatic inroads among Hispanic voters, and party strategists fret that the immigration debate could jeopardize their gains.

On Wednesday, leading GOP senators disagreed whether the legislation amounted to amnesty.

There was no such debate at the news conference in the House, where not a word was spoken in defense of the Senate bill and even Bush was not spared criticism.

"I don't think he's concerned about alienating voters, he's not running for re-election," said Rep. Tom Tancredo of Colorado. He said Republicans could lose the House and Senate over the immigration issue, and he said of the president: "I wish he'd think about the party and of course I also wish he'd think about the country."

Referring to a wave of demonstrations in recent weeks, Rep. Virgil Goode (news, bio, voting record) of Virginia said, "I say if you are here illegally and want to fly the Mexican flag, go to Mexico and wave the American flag."

King analyzed the issue in class terms.

"The elite class in America is becoming a ruling class and they've made enough money by hiring cheap illegal labor that they think they also have some kind of a right to cheap servants to manicure their nails and their lawn, for example.

"So this ruling class, this new ruling class of America, is expanding a servant class in America at the expense of the middle class of America, the blue collar of America that used to be able to punch a time clock, buy a modest house and raise their families. ... Those young people are cut out of this process."

DOJ_NMG_0024808

Rep. J.D. Hayworth (news, bio, voting record) of Arizona and others said Republicans would pay a price in the midterm elections if they vote for anything like the Senate legislation. "Many of those who have stood for the Republican Party for the last decade are not only angry. They will be absent in November," he said.

Rohrabacher said Americans should be able to "smell the foul odor that's coming out of the U.S. Senate."

Asked a few moments later whether the same odor was emanating from the president, he said, "I have no comment."

The only vote of the day came on a proposal by Frist for a study of the number and causes of deaths at the U.S.-Mexico border. It passed 94-0.

The more difficult choices lie ahead next week, when critics of the bill are expected to try to strip out the guest worker provision and roll back the provisions relating to 11 million illegal immigrants already here.

Sen. Arlen Specter (news, bio, voting record), R-Pa., the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, has said repeatedly he hopes to find a compromise that is more broadly acceptable than the legislation that cleared his committee over the objections of six Republicans.

"There's a movement afoot to find consensus," said Sen. Lindsey Graham (news, bio, voting record), R-S.C., who voted for the bill that cleared committee.

He said the president's statements "have been hugely helpful."

Immigration Divides Allies (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

New economic research that pits native-born workers against low-skilled immigrants in a struggle for jobs and wages has fueled a rift between some of Washington's most liberal lawmakers and their allies in economics and labor, who fear that the Democratic Party is pushing an immigration policy that forsakes the party's working-class mainstay.

The quarrel comes as the Senate debates a proposal to bring millions of immigrants into the legal workforce. A growing body of economic research contends that the recent surge of foreign workers has depressed wages for low-skilled workers, especially for high school dropouts, and has even begun displacing native-born workers. That benefits employers, higher-income consumers and the economy at large, but it may exacerbate the problems of the working class.

"What immigration really does is redistribute wealth away from workers toward employers," said George J. Borjas, an economist at Harvard University's John F. Kennedy School of Government.

As with so many economic quandaries, other researchers have come to virtually the opposite conclusion. Those economists maintain that an expanding economy, spurred in part by plentiful low-wage labor, has created more jobs on the bottom of the income chain, absorbing the new immigrants with little or no impact on wages.

But the work of Borjas and other economists is becoming a wedge in the Democratic Party. Citing Borjas's work, Sen. Byron L. Dorgan (D-N.D.) denounced the Senate immigration bill yesterday, saying: "This is clearly a corporate strategy to keep wages low. It clearly will replace the jobs of American workers."

At issue is a guest-worker provision that would allow hundreds of thousands of foreign workers legal access to the U.S. labor market each year and the impact those new low-wage workers would have on stagnant wages. An unusual coalition of business groups, immigration advocates and labor unions with large immigrant memberships have come together to support the guest-worker program proposed by Sens. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and John McCain (R-Ariz.).

Kennedy, the Senate's liberal lion and an unflagging ally of organized labor, says the legislation he co-wrote would help all low-wage workers by applying minimum-wage laws and other workplace protections to immigrants and undocumented workers, who are often exploited.

The AFL-CIO and many economists strongly disagree.

Guest-worker programs "cast workers into a perennial second-class status and unfairly put their fates into their employers' hands, creating a situation ripe for exploitation," AFL-CIO President John J. Sweeney said this week. "They encourage employers to turn good jobs into temporary jobs at reduced wages and diminished working conditions and contribute to the growing class of workers laboring in poverty."

Over the past decade, economists such as Borjas have examined the impact of a surge of illegal immigration on wages and the economy at large. Most agree that the influx has had a small but positive impact on the national economy, holding down consumer prices, improving the productivity of the workforce and increasing demand for goods and services.

Upper-middle-class consumers can dine at restaurants, stay at hotels, and have their cars hand-washed and their house windows cleaned for far less than they would without illegal immigration. An abundant supply of low-wage workers may have spurred more investment in labor-intensive businesses. Giovanni Peri, an economist at the University of California at Davis, estimates that immigration in the 1990s actually boosted the average wage of native workers by 1.1 percent.

"The fact is the economies of Texas, Illinois, California, New York, and half the country would collapse if tomorrow we could click our fingers and have every undocumented worker out of the country," said Steven M. Ladik, an immigration lawyer with Jenkens & Gilchrist in Dallas. "Construction, hospitality, the medical industry, manufacturing -- all these key segments of our economy are dependent upon these people."

But some of those macroeconomic gains have come at the expense of low-wage workers, especially the 10 percent of the labor force that dropped out of high school. In recent years, competition from low-skilled immigrant workers has reduced the wages of high school dropouts by as much as 8 percent, Borjas said. For a worker earning $20,000 a year, such a drop can be substantial.

Looking at annual earnings, the percentage losses are in the double digits, said Andrew Sum, director of Northeastern University's Center for Labor Market Studies, because jobs that once provided year-round employment are increasingly becoming temporary.

A Northeastern University study found that nearly 86 percent of all newly employed workers hired from 2000 to 2005 were immigrants. For men, the statistics were more stark. In that time, the labor market for men rose by 2.66 million while 2.77 million foreign-born men found work. In other words, Sum said, immigrants have begun replacing native-born male workers.

"Young guys are being displaced by immigrants," he said. "Some of my good liberal friends take issue, but if you're a young worker under 25, poorly educated, probably African American, the higher the share of new immigrants in your community, the worse your employment prospects are becoming."

Critics say competition for low-wage jobs would only increase under the legislation approved by the Senate Judiciary Committee this week, which would not only allow undocumented workers to find lawful jobs but would also offer 400,000 temporary work visas annually to foreign workers.

"What they're doing is increasing the pool of people eligible to compete for the very limited resources that are available for people at the bottom," said Carol M. Swain, a political scientist and law professor at Vanderbilt University. "The obligation of the nation should be for the people who have been here for decades."

Not all economists see it that way. David Card, an economist at the University of California at Berkeley, said the recent surge of low-wage immigration has had virtually no impact on wages. That may be because the presence of abundant, low-skilled workers has allowed companies to expand to absorb them. Higher profits at a restaurant allows an owner to open another one. Ethan G. Lewis, an economist at the Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia, suggested that companies are forsaking adoption of new technologies in favor of old-fashioned labor -- a trend that would help absorb low-skilled immigrants but could hurt innovation and high-wage work in the long run.

Most See Visa Program As Severely Flawed (WP)

By S. Mitra Kalita

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

Somewhere in the debate over immigration and the future of illegal workers, another, less-publicized fight is being waged over those who toil in air-conditioned offices, earn up to six-figure salaries and spend their days programming and punching code.

They are foreign workers who arrive on H-1B visas, mostly young men from India and China tapped for skilled jobs such as software engineers and systems analysts. Unlike seasonal guest workers who stay for about 10 months, H-1B workers stay as long as six years. By then, they must obtain a green card or go back home.

Yesterday, the House Judiciary Committee heard testimony for and against expanding the H-1B program. This week, the Senate Judiciary Committee approved legislation that would increase the H-1B cap to 115,000 from 65,000 and allow some foreign students to bypass the program altogether and immediately get sponsored for green cards, which allow immigrants to be permanent residents, free to live and work in the United States.

But underlying the arguments is a belief, even among the workers themselves, that the current H-1B program is severely flawed.

Opponents say the highly skilled foreign workers compete with and depress the wages of native-born Americans.

Supporters say foreign workers stimulate the economy, create more opportunities for their U.S. counterparts and prevent jobs from being outsourced overseas. The problem, they say, is the cumbersome process: Immigrants often spend six years as guest workers and then wait for green card sponsorship and approval.

DOJ_NMG_0024810

At the House committee hearing yesterday, Stuart Anderson, executive director of the National Foundation for American Policy, a nonprofit research group, spoke in favor of raising the cap. Still, he said in an interview, the H-1B visa is far from ideal. "What you want to have is a system where people can get hired directly on green cards in 30 to 60 days," he said.

Economists seem divided on whether highly skilled immigrants depress wages for U.S. workers. In 2003, a study for the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta found no effect on salaries, with an average income for both H-1B and American computer programmers of $55,000.

Still, the study by Madeline Zavodny, now an economics professor at Agnes Scott College in Decatur, Ga., concluded "that unemployment was higher as a result of these H-1B workers."

In a working paper released this week, Harvard University economist George J. Borjas studied the wages of foreigners and native-born Americans with doctorates, concluding that the foreigners lowered the wages of competing workers by 3 to 4 percent. He said he suspected that his conclusion also measured the effects of H-1B visas.

"If there is a demand for engineers and no foreigners to take those jobs, salaries would shoot through the roof and make that very attractive for Americans," Borjas said.

The Institute of Electrical and Electronics Engineers-USA says H-1B salaries are lower. "Those who are here on H-1B visas are being worked as indentured servants. They are being paid $13,000 less in the engineering and science worlds," said Ralph W. Wyndrum Jr., president of the advocacy group for technical professionals, which favors green-card-based immigration, but only for exceptional candidates.

Wyndrum said the current system allows foreign skilled workers to "take jobs away from equally good American engineers and scientists." He based his statements about salary disparities on a December report by John Miano, a software engineer, who favors tighter immigration controls. Miano spoke at the House hearing and cited figures from the Occupational Employment Statistics program that show U.S. computer programmers earn an average $65,000 a year, compared with $52,000 for H-1B programmers.

"Is it really a guest-worker program since most people want to stay here? Miano said in an interview. "There is direct displacement of American workers."

Those who recruit and hire retort that a global economy mandates finding the best employees in the world, not just the United States. And because green-card caps are allocated equally among countries (India and China are backlogged, for example), the H-1B becomes the easiest way to hire foreigners.

It is not always easy. Last year, Razorsight Corp., a technology company with offices in Fairfax and Bangalore, India, tried to sponsor more H-1B visas -- but they already were exhausted for the year. Currently, the company has 12 H-1B workers on a U.S. staff of 100, earning $80,000 to $120,000 a year.

Charlie Thomas, Razorsight's chief executive, said the cap should be based on market demand. "It's absolutely essential for us to have access to a global talent," he said. "If your product isn't the best it can be with the best cost structure and development, then someone else will do it. And that someone else may not be a U.S.-based company."

Because H-1B holders can switch employers to sponsor their visas, some workers said they demand salary increases along the way. But once a company sponsors their green cards, workers say they don't expect to be promoted or given a raise.

Now some H-1B holders are watching to see how Congress treats the millions of immigrants who crossed the borders through stealthier means.

Sameer Chandra, 30, who lives in Fairfax and works as a systems analyst on an H-1B visa, said he is concerned that Congress might make it easier for immigrants who entered the U.S. illegally to get a green card than people like him. "What is the point of staying here legally?" he said.

His Houston-based company has sponsored his green card, and Chandra said he hopes it is processed quickly. If it is not, he said, he will return to India. "There's a lot of opportunities there in my country."

Houston Students Protest (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

HOUSTON, March 30 (AP) — Dozens of students were arrested or cited on Thursday and a principal was disciplined for flying a Mexican flag in front of the school as protests continued in Texas over immigration legislation in Congress.

A spokesman for the school district would not say how the principal, Robert Pambello, would be disciplined. Mr. Pambello is the principal at Reagan High School, where 88 percent of the students are Hispanic.

The students who were arrested were among thousands in Texas and elsewhere who left class this week to rally in support of immigrants.

DOJ_NMG_0024811

They were arrested after 150 students left class and refused to get on buses to return, Lt. Robert Manzo of the Houston police said. The police arrested 26 students there, and 5 ran away and were later found in a parking lot. All were charged with violating the curfew ordinance, and one, a 19-year-old, was arrested for hindering traffic, Lieutenant Manzo said.

The Houston school district police issued curfew violation citations to 67 other students.

Student Protests Grow, Spread To Md. (WP)

By Tara Bahrampour And Jamie Stockwell

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

Demonstrations among high schoolers and middle schoolers spread yesterday as 1,500 students in Northern Virginia and a smaller group in Maryland poured into the streets to protest proposed federal legislation that would crack down on illegal immigrants.

Draped in flags of Latin American countries and ignoring threats from some school administrators, students from Arlington County, Fairfax County and Falls Church left school -- or skipped going altogether -- to converge at Ballston Metro and march to Courthouse Plaza in Arlington.

Although several District and Maryland schools have significant Latino populations, students in these areas have been slower to protest. Yesterday, however, about 300 students at Albert Einstein High School in Kensington staged a brief walkout.

It was the third time this week that large numbers of Northern Virginia students have joined nationwide protests against proposed legislation that would make being an illegal immigrant a felony and make it a crime to assist them.

Yesterday's walkouts elicited a variety of responses from school officials, from nods of support from principals and teachers to threats of suspension from district officials.

Many students said they worried their parents could be deported after years -- or decades -- of working and paying taxes in the United States.

"We're fighting for our parents and their rights 'cause they fight for us," said Jessica Montufar, 17, a junior at Washington-Lee High School in Arlington, "GUATEMALA" written on her arm in black marker.

Montufar, whose parents emigrated from Guatemala 20 years ago, said as a U.S. citizen it was her responsibility to speak out for them. "Our parents, if they would be out here protesting, they have a fear that they could be sent back," she said.

At Courthouse Plaza, students held placards that denounced House Resolution 4437 and shouted, "America was built by immigrants!" and "We are not criminals!"

Kellie Mylko, 15, a sophomore at Washington-Lee, said she helped organize the effort to show that students "have a voice."

"We are the next major bloc of voters," she said. "They need to know what we think."

Apparently worried that schools would bar students from leaving, one flier's author warned students not to enter school buildings. However, school officials in Arlington, Fairfax and Falls Church said students were not locked in or prevented from leaving. In fact, Bob Snee, principal of George Mason High School in Falls Church, said some parents had called to approve their children's departures, making their absences excused. Prince William and Fairfax counties have similar policies.

In Arlington, absences for protests are considered unexcused, regardless of parental permission. Arlington schools spokeswoman Linda Erdos said one unexcused absence on an otherwise good record would not hurt a student, but chronic absences would lower grades and could lead to in-school suspensions. Erdos said 600 to 700 Arlington students, including 60 middle schoolers, joined yesterday's march.

Some Fairfax students said they had heard students with unexcused absences could face suspension or, for organizers, expulsion. Fairfax schools spokesman Paul Regnier said it was too early to know what the punishments would be.

In Prince William County, school officials said that, effective Wednesday, students with unexcused absences due to protests would be suspended until a meeting could be arranged with their parents to decide on a punishment.

But Arlington students said many faculty members were supportive. "On Tuesday [when a similar march took place] one of our vice principals said that he was really proud of us," said Elizabeth Raftery, 18, a senior at Wakefield High School.

And at Montgomery County's Einstein, one student reported that many teachers left their classrooms and clapped to show support.

In a letter to parents yesterday, Arlington School Superintendent Robert G. Smith said that "demonstrations regarding civic issues represent a longstanding tradition in our democratic society," but encouraged students to protest outside school hours. Protests were planned today by students from other Northern Virginia schools.

DOJ_NMG_0024812

In Arlington, more than 100 police officers from Arlington, the Pentagon, Fairfax County and the state watched over the march, said Arlington police spokesman Matt Martin, adding that the hour-long protest was peaceful. Afterward, students were ferried back to their schools in buses sent by their districts.

Linda Slape, 14, a freshman at Wakefield and an organizer, said she was not worried about missing class.

"This is more important, because this is now and school is for the next four years," she said. "We want to do something that makes a difference today."

Principal Raises Mexican Flag, Faces Discipline (WT)

By Valerie Richardson

The Washington Times, March 31, 2006

HOUSTON -- A high-school principal who raised the Mexican flag on a campus flagpole as a show of support for Hispanic students was disciplined yesterday as the school district grappled with massive student walkouts.

Robert Pambello, principal of John H. Reagan High School in Houston, received "appropriate disciplinary action," said Terry Abbott, a spokesman for the Houston Independent School District, adding that no details would be released because it was a personnel matter.

Mr. Abbott said the principal was attempting to avert a walkout sparked by the debate over immigration reform in Congress by agreeing to raise the distinctive red, green and white flag Wednesday in exchange for students' staying in class.

"He was working with students at the school to try to avoid a walkout situation by raising the Mexican flag underneath the American and Texas flags," Mr. Abbott said. "They didn't walk out, but it was the wrong thing to do."

Mr. Abbott, who described the principal as "a good educator with a good record," said Mr. Pambello lowered the flag immediately after receiving word from the school district.

"As soon as word reached us, we called and told him to take it down, and he did," the spokesman said.

The flying of the Mexican flag came during a week of protests and walkouts nationwide among Hispanic students and other critics of legislation that would erect barriers at the U.S. border with Mexico to prevent illegal entry.

In Houston yesterday, Superintendent Abelardo Saavedra urged students to stay in school after 1,400 left classes over a three-day period, and suggested that they stage rallies before or after classes instead. Police arrested 26 student protesters yesterday for curfew violations.

Those who continue to walk out will be "severely disciplined," Mr. Abbott said. The district has 208,000 students, 58 percent of whom are Hispanic.

Flying the Mexican flag has become a flash point, particularly in border states, among those who feel overwhelmed by the number of foreigners illegally entering the United States. In Houston, the flag-flying episode fueled a backlash on local talk radio among callers who saw the move as an attack on U.S. sovereignty.

"I don't like having any foreign flag shoved in my face while someone tries to bully me into doing something," KTRH-AM talk-show host Chris Baker said.

Raul Ramos, a history professor at the University of Houston, called the furor "overblown," saying that displaying the Mexican flag alongside the U.S. flag historically has been regarded as a symbol of partnership.

"Flying the flag is a ceremonial practice. In this case, the Mexican flag has nothing to do with citizenship or politics; it has to do with ethnic pride," Mr. Ramos said.

Even so, he said he received a half-dozen critical e-mails after similar comments on the flag incident appeared recently in the Houston Chronicle.

"I've got one that says, 'You should be fired and sent back to Mexico,' " said Mr. Ramos, who was born in the United States.

Immigration And The GOP (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

As Congress battles over immigration, the consequences are likely to be far greater than the details of border walls or green cards. The most important political outcome may turn out to be the message that Republicans send about the kind of the party they are and hope to be.

To wit, do Republicans want to continue in the Reagan tradition of American optimism and faith in assimilation that sends a message of inclusiveness to all races? Or will they take another one of their historical detours into a cramped, exclusionary policy that tells millions of new immigrants, and especially Hispanics, that they belong somewhere else?

Admittedly that paints with a broad brush, but politics is often about broad symbolism, and this is roughly the Republican choice presented by President Bush's approach on the one hand, and that of Tom Tancredo and his platoon of talk-show hosts and Tory columnists on the other.

Let us quickly say that not every American concerned about immigration is part of the latter group. The breadth of new immigration, legal and illegal, in recent years has literally changed the face of America. Our own view is that this has been mostly for the better -- in revitalized inner cities, a younger workforce to fuel a dynamic economy, and in general helping America avoid the senescent future of other industrial nations.

But there have also been costs, and parts of America have borne more than have others. The border states in particular have experienced more crime and social disruption, as well as the cost to local taxpayers of "free" health care and education for illegal immigrants. To the extent they work and pay rent, illegals do pay for those government services. But we don't dismiss lightly the anxiety that many Americans feel at this rapid pace of demographic change. Well meaning politicians, such as Arizona Senator Jon Kyl, who feel obliged to respond to that anxiety in this election year are not part of the nativist brigades.

The issue is the form and message that response takes. For Republicans in the House especially, the approach has been to send the most punitive message possible to both illegals and anyone who assists or hires them, no matter how innocently. They're backed by a small but vocal band of "conservative" media who denounce any rational idea for legalizing the 11 million illegals already in the U.S. as "amnesty."

Never mind that even under the most liberal proposals now in Congress, current illegals would have to pay a fine, learn English, and wait upward of a decade to qualify for citizenship. And no matter that these pseudo-conservatives have no alternative policy, other than to arrest and deport millions in a way that would cause far more social and economic disruption than we have now.

Such a punitive policy would alienate business owners and religious conservatives among the GOP base. But because the policy is aimed largely at Hispanic immigrants, it will also rightly be seen as a specific ethnic rebuke. Millions of Hispanics -- both illegals and those who have been here for decades -- will get the message that the Republican Party doesn't want them. Those Republicans who shout "no amnesty" and want to make illegally crossing the Rio Grande a felony are well on their way to creating a generation or more of new Democratic voters.

This is a mistake Republicans have made too many times before. In the 1920s, their anti-immigration bills alienated Catholic newcomers from Europe, who weren't open to GOP appeals in any numbers until the Reagan years. In postwar Hawaii, Republicans made the same mistake with Asians and Pacific islanders, turning that state safely Democratic. And most recently, in 1994 in California, they rode Pete Wilson's Proposition 187 to a short-term re-election victory but at the cost of polarizing Hispanic voters and making themselves the minority party in our largest state.

First as Texas Governor and then in the White House, Mr. Bush has wisely tried to change this anti-immigration image of the GOP. Among Hispanics in particular, he has made enormous progress. Bob Dole won 21% of the Hispanic vote in 1996, Mr. Bush improved that to 35% in 2000 and again to 44% in 2004. Given that the Hispanic share of the electorate has climbed to 8% in 2004 from 2% 20 years ago, and is likely to climb to 12% by 2020, Republicans who ignore Hispanic voters are guaranteeing themselves future political defeats.

Yes, some pundits insist, often in their own immigrant accents, that every naturalized Hispanic is a future Democratic voter. But Hispanics have never been the political monolith that African-Americans are. Cubans have voted Republican since they started migrating in the Castro era, and millions of other Hispanics have shown they are as open to GOP appeals as any other ethnic group as they rise in income and homeownership. But conservative ideas on taxes, crime and foreign policy will never get a future hearing if Republicans now send a message that they are only a party of Anglos, or only of those Hispanics who've been here since the days of the Alamo. * * *

The immediate danger is that Republicans will ignore their longer-term interests by passing a punitive, and poll-driven, anti-immigration bill this election year. Any bill that merely harasses immigrants and employers, and stacks more cops on the border, may win cheers in the right-wing blogosphere. However, it will do nothing to address the economic incentives that will continue to exist for poor migrants to come to America to feed their families. And it will make permanent enemies of millions of Hispanics, without doing anything to draw illegals out of the shadows and help them assimilate into the mainstream of American culture and citizenship.

This is not Ronald Reagan's view of America as a "shining city on a hill." It is the chauvinist conservatism usually associated with the European right. How Republicans conduct and conclude their immigration debate will show the country which kind of "conservative" party they want to be.

California's Enlightened Duo (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, March 31, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0024814

CALIFORNIA'S TWO SENATORS HAVE not distinguished themselves in recent years on immigration issues, but this week it has been heartening to see them on the correct side of the momentous debate in the Senate. California is an iconic state of immigrants in this iconic nation of immigrants, and its representatives in Washington should be on the side of enlightened reform.

Within the last few weeks, Democrats Barbara Boxer and Dianne Feinstein have gone from skeptical to supportive on comprehensive reform. In late February, when the Senate began to confront in earnest the issue of a guest-worker program for current and future immigrants, Boxer and Feinstein weren't biting. Feinstein only would support an agricultural guest-worker program, despite having rejected a somewhat similar initiative in April 2005.

But this week, both senators came out swinging in favor of a broader guest-worker program. Feinstein has been especially inspiring. Two of her amendments won approval in the Judiciary Committee: the agricultural guest-worker program and a measure to criminalize building border tunnels.

And in an eloquent speech on the floor of the Senate on Thursday, she pointed out that the chamber's compromise bill (in contrast with the measure passed by the House) is a security-enhancing bill that also addresses "the very real needs of our economy." Feinstein drew on her experience studying the agricultural industry — she has met with farm owners and farmworkers. She talked about asking each of California's 58 county welfare departments to post job openings in agriculture in a push to attract U.S. workers, only to find that not one person responded to the advertisements.

Feinstein went on to praise the much-demonized undocumented workers at the center of the debate. Speaking of one family, the Plascencias, she said: "This family has worked hard to achieve the financial security their children now enjoy. This includes a home they purchased three years ago in San Bruno. They own their car. They have medical insurance. And they have paid their taxes. It is very clear to me, and I think to a majority of Americans, that this family has embraced the American dream, and their continued presence in our country would do much to enhance the values we hold dear."

Feinstein acknowledged the importance of the moment: "We have an opportunity to chart a new destiny for a lot of people." And she and Boxer have an opportunity to chart a new legacy for themselves — as senators who were on the right side of history.

Immigration Reform: Benefits Vs. Liabilities (USAT)

USA Today, March 31, 2006

What people are saying about the immigrant issue:

Parsons (Kan.) Sun, in a signed editorial by Ann Charles: "There is more than enough discussion going on right now about illegal immigrants and congressional proposals to stop them, punish them and export them. Unfortunately, much of that discussion is based on gut feelings rather than rational thinking. ... While a U.S. House-passed bill would make the presence of these laborers a felony and require fencing 700 miles of the border along Mexico, the reality of that would cause an earthquake in the U.S. economy. This isn't to say that illegal workers should be ignored, but one only has to listen to the voices at booming construction sites to know that housing complexes are being built by them. They are also the ones who make hotel beds, change towels, provide landscaping and yard services and vacuum Corporate America. ... Knock out 8 million of those jobs with the passage of a poorly thought out piece of feel-good, American chest-beating legislation, and the immediate consequences to the economy would be devastating."

Middletown (Ohio) Journal, in an editorial: "The federal government's unwillingness to secure our borders and to stop the steady rush of people illegally coming into the United States threatens to overwhelm local communities' resources, services and employment opportunities. The numbers of illegal immigrants are so great that nearly every state in the Union has been affected. ... It's time for Congress and the White House to do their jobs."

Desert Dispatch, Barstow, Calif., in an editorial: "A realistic approach to immigration is necessary. On one hand, it's simply ludicrous to think there's any way we would be able to round up millions of illegal immigrants and remove them from the country in the first place, and parts of our economy would stop functioning even if we could. On the other hand, it's absolutely irrational to ignore the security problems the nation faces by having millions of people in the country essentially outside 'the system,' undocumented and unknown individuals. While some worry about crimes caused by illegal immigrants, it's also worth noting that their undocumented status also makes it harder for them to get help when they're the victims. A guest-worker program is probably the smartest, most rational way of splitting the difference. Those immigrants committed to contributing to our nation's economy will be rewarded. Those who are a drain on our nation will not."

Jay Bookman, deputy editorial page editor of The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, in a column: "The modern era of runaway, all-but-unregulated illegal immigration has a birthday — May 13, 1998. ... On that date, about 45 federal immigration officials launched a raid on the Vidalia onion fields of southeast Georgia, where thousands of workers — 70% to 90% of them illegal — had been brought to pick the crop. But instead of being lauded for enforcing the law, the Immigration and Naturalization Service came under blistering attack from Georgia's congressional delegation. ... INS officials were forced to halt the raid and take the extraordinary step of granting 'temporary amnesty' to the illegal workers it had arrested so they could go back to picking onions. ... From that point forward, the INS abandoned any serious effort to enforce federal law. ... The issue of workplace enforcement is all but ignored. In truth, U.S. officials have no real interest in trying to halt the influx of illegal immigrants to this country."

The Lufkin (Texas) Daily News, in an editorial: "It would be difficult to find even one American citizen who has not benefited in some way from the fruit of undocumented workers' labor. And with the exception of full-blooded Native Americans, every American is either descended from immigrants or is an immigrant himself. ... We don't want to do without cheap labor and low prices. We aren't willing to take low-paying, menial jobs. ... We've got to find a workable solution to this problem. 'Send them back' isn't it. Let's all just admit that, and move on."

Bastiat Knows What Frist Doesn't About Immigration (WSJ)

By Daniel Henninger

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

It was in 1924 that the men of the U.S. Congress for the first time in the nation's history explicitly inserted the word "Immigration" in the title of a national law. Until then immigration laws were more precise in their purpose -- as in the Chinese Exclusion Act of 1882. It may be considered progress of a sort that any immigration law likely to emerge from this Congress will not be titled the Mexican Exclusion Act of 2006.

Instead, the debate over the illegal presence of Mexicans and others with Hispanic surnames is said to be over "respect for the law." President Bush affirmed this in a recent radio address: "America is a nation of immigrants, and we're also a nation of laws."

"Respect for the law" is part of the American bedrock. As Alexis de Tocqueville rightly said, each voter indirectly contributes to the making of our laws, and "however irksome an enactment may be, the citizen of the United States complies with it . . . because it originates in his own authority." That is the high-road argument against the illegal Mexicans.

Another 19th-century Frenchman close to the hearts of American conservatives is Frederic Bastiat, who had a further thought: "The surest way to have the laws respected is to make them respectable." Is our immigration law "respectable"? Need you ask?

America is a nation of laws by now so numerous that it provides jobs for more lawyers per capita than any nation on earth. They serve as legal lifeguards, saving mostly honest citizens from the legal system's capricious undertow. Medical malpractice and asbestos are two areas of law for which "respect" is about zero. A law's existence requires compliance, but not respect.

Some of the anti-Mexican sentiment likely reflects an embarrassed awareness of our degraded laws, and so it has chosen to draw a line in the legal sand over immigration. That won't change the fact that U.S. immigration law is a disrespectable morass.

Swaths of American business openly ridicule the immigration law regulating so-called H-1B temporary visas for highly skilled non-citizen engineers and computer scientists. This controversial boom-and-bust employment morass exists because there is no rational system to give permanent, green-card status to these non-citizen workers and their families. Insisting on "respect" for a law that is doing damage to the nation's economy is cutting off one's nose to spite one's face. That is a bad habit.

The immigration law asking for respect is simply a system of legislated quotas, not much more than a numbers game. The people who play this game -- anyone seeking entry to the U.S. for a spouse, sibling, child or worker -- make monthly visits to the State Department's Web-based Visa Bulletin. Have a look; it actually resembles a bingo card.

Across the top of the grid are the major immigration source countries -- China, India, Mexico, the Philippines and a column for others. Down the left side are family-preference categories, such as 2A, spouses and children, who consist of "77% of the overall second preference limitation, of which 75% are exempt from the per-country limit." Each box, based on a numerical quota, lists the original application year of people nearing acceptance to enter. Filipino brothers and sisters who are now reaching the front of the line applied in 1983. The process has its own word for backlog: "retrogression." We should not be surprised or affronted that so many newcomers who've arrived via this bloodless, hostile bureaucracy then disappear into ethnic enclaves. * * *

What exactly is driving anti-immigration sentiment? Breaking the law? Securing our borders? Terrorism? Medicaid outlays? Assimilation? Distaste for Spanish-speaking Mesoamericans? Talk radio? Of all the forces that now shape politics in the U.S, only one has primacy: the polls. The Wall Street Journal/NBC poll and others have concluded that most people oppose a path to permanent legal status of illegal immigrants already here. But why?

If you're John McCain, Bill Frist and maybe even Arizona Rep. J.D. Hayworth, who is most closely associated with the notion of building a Great Wall of Mexico, you're going to try to guess what's on voters' minds. Plumbing the mind of a congressman is beyond my ken, but the ideas of presidential candidates matter. The Frist plan, released on St. Patrick's Day, reflects these polls and presumably the GOP base. It would hammer employers of illegal immigrants with high fines and even jail time, and it offers no guest-worker provision, The McCain plan, essentially that which emerged this week from the Senate Judiciary Committee, breeds 14,000 new Border Patrol chasers but also requires the federal government to get into the guest-worker business, as it did from 1942 to 1964 with the bracero program, which rationalized worker flows.

No matter what the polls say, I think Mr. Frist's reading of the public mind is wrong, and Mr. McCain has it about right. Those polls produce about as much understanding of beliefs about immigration as did the analysis of the "moral values" vote after the 2004 election. In fact, I think the two phenomena are related.

Most Americans understand their heritage and do not want now to be "anti-immigrant." They don't want to be party to an 11-million-person round-up and deportation. What they want is a politics that takes seriously their anxieties, anxieties that involve not just immigrants but general unease about the direction of a turbulent, constantly changing U.S. culture, as in that 2004 presidential vote. So amid all that, along comes a major social movement -- 11 million "undocumented" workers. Assimilation? Heck, people who've lived here all their lives don't feel assimilated into their own culture anymore.

It's not a coincidence that the first push-back Immigration Act emerged in the Roaring Twenties, another period of abrupt social disruption and anxiety with heavy immigrant inflows from southern Europe. It may be too much to hope, but the purpose of political leadership in such times is to find a path toward our best lights rather than our darkest impulses. At the moment, Senator Frist of Tennessee isn't measuring up.

A Meltdown We Can't Even Enjoy (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

It's frustrating. The three overlapping forces that have sent this country in so many wrong directions -- the conservative movement, the neoconservative movement and the Republican Party -- are warring among themselves, doing their best impression of crabs in a barrel, and sensible people can't even enjoy the spectacle. That's because it's hard to take pleasure in the havoc they've caused and the disarray they will someday leave behind.

Factions within the conservative movement have been engaged in escalating skirmishes over what, exactly, the label "conservative" should mean. This week the fight is over illegal immigration. The nativists and xenophobes want mass deportation and a Berlin Wall looming over the Rio Grande. The cultural determinists lose their studied, academic poise the moment they hear brown-skinned people speaking Spanish or see them waving a Mexican flag. Watch your blood pressure, people, because Cinco de Mayo is just a few weeks away.

The social conservatives seem to be hopelessly conflicted about immigration. They have a kind of immune-system reaction against this unchecked inflow of aliens who look suspiciously like carriers of alien values. But, as some conservative commentators have noted, the immigrants flooding across the border are more likely to have traditional, family-and-church values than many native-born Americans. Does . . . not . . . compute.

Meanwhile, the small-government, tight-money conservatives have finally reached the point of utter disgust about another issue -- the fact that George W. Bush and a conservative Congress have presided over a massive expansion of government and an explosion of debt. For this group, having to point to Bill Clinton as a model of fiscal probity redefines the word "galling."

The neoconservative civil war is simpler to map, because it's all about Iraq. After a long period of denial, even the most fervent and evangelical of the neocons are now forced to admit that this whole Iraq thing hasn't quite worked out the way they expected. Those who advocate staying the course can read the polls. They see that bringing out their dictionaries, pointing to the definition of "civil war" and splitting hairs isn't doing much to stanch the flow of public opinion.

When one of the neocon movement's stalwarts, Francis Fukuyama, declared himself a turncoat recently in a new book -- he questions not only the war but the whole premise of neoconservatism as a real-world philosophy -- his erstwhile compatriots reacted with the shrill bitterness of a rejected lover. It's the kind of intellectual food fight that's almost always fun to watch, except that it's about Iraq, and there's nothing funny about Iraq.

The conflict within the Republican Party is about two primal urges, fear and ambition. Suddenly there is the chance -- not the probability but the possibility -- that the Republicans will lose control of the House or the Senate this fall. At the same time, presidential hopefuls with an eye on 2008 are jockeying for position. That combination of circumstances is turning problems into crises, and crisis management is not the ideal way to run a country.

That's what is happening with immigration. Majority Leader Bill Frist has the Senate in a lather, as if all 12 million illegal immigrants in the country suddenly arrived last Thursday. I'm sure that has nothing to do with the fact that he'd like to run for president.

It would all be entertaining if the stakes weren't so high. Iraqis and Americans are dying; the treasury is bleeding; real people, not statistics, are at the center of the immigration debate. Iran is intent on joining the nuclear club. Hallowed American traditions of privacy, fairness and due process are being flouted, and thus diminished. As the powers-that-be self-destruct, the powers-that-would-be -- Democratic leaders and all Americans who've seen enough of this movie -- need to put together an alternative program that will begin to undo some of the damage the conservative-neocon-GOP nexus has wrought.

To this point, I think the Democratic Party has done just what it needed to do, which was basically to sit back and watch the other side wear itself down. When one party is in charge of the White House and both sides of Capitol Hill, there's not much the other party can do anyway. Refusing to draw up articles of impeachment or sign on to Russ Feingold's censure resolution may reflect cold political calculation, but it also acknowledges plain reality: Not gonna happen.

Democrats have behaved with remarkable discipline, which shows how much they believe they need to win this fall and in 2008. What they haven't yet done is communicate a compelling vision of where they will take the country when they are given the reins. Dry position papers, drafted by committee, aren't enough. Make us see a better future.

The Road To Dubai (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

For now, at least, the immigration issue is mainly hurting the Republican Party, which is divided between those who want to expel immigrants and those who want to exploit them. The only thing the two factions seem to have in common is mean-spiritedness.

But immigration remains a difficult issue for liberals. Let me say a bit more about the subject of my last column, the uncomfortable economics of immigration, then turn to what really worries me: the political implications of a large nonvoting work force.

About the economics: the crucial divide isn't between legal and illegal immigration; it's between high-skilled and low-skilled immigrants. High-skilled immigrants — say, software engineers from South Asia — are, by any criterion I can think of, good for America. But the effects of low-skilled immigration are mixed at best.

True, there are large benefits for the low-skilled migrants, who may find even a minimum-wage U.S. job a big step up. Immigration also raises the total income of native-born Americans, although reasonable estimates suggest that these gains amount to no more than a fraction of 1 percent.

But low-skilled immigration depresses the wages of less-skilled native-born Americans. And immigrants increase the demand for public services, including health care and education. Estimates indicate that low-skilled immigrants don't pay enough in taxes to cover the cost of providing these services.

All of these effects, except for the gains for the immigrants themselves, are fairly small. Some of my friends say that's the point I should stress: immigration is a wonderful thing for the immigrants, and claims that immigrants are undermining American workers and taxpayers are hugely overblown — end of story.

But it's important to be intellectually honest, even when it hurts. Moreover, what really worries me isn't the narrow economics — it's the political economy, the effects of having a disenfranchised labor force.

Imagine, for a moment, a future in which America becomes like Kuwait or Dubai, a country where a large fraction of the work force consists of illegal immigrants or foreigners on temporary visas — and neither group has the right to vote. Surely this would be a betrayal of our democratic ideals, of government of the people, by the people. Moreover, a political system in which many workers don't count is likely to ignore workers' interests: it's likely to have a weak social safety net and to spend too little on services like health care and education.

This isn't idle speculation. Countries with high immigration tend, other things equal, to have less generous welfare states than those with low immigration. U.S. cities with ethnically diverse populations — often the result of immigration — tend to have worse public services than those with more homogeneous populations.

Of course, America isn't Dubai. But we're moving in that direction. As of 2002, according to the Urban Institute, 14 percent of U.S. workers, and 20 percent of low-wage workers, were immigrants. Only a third of these immigrant workers were naturalized citizens. So we already have a large disenfranchised work force, and it's growing rapidly. The goal of immigration reform should be to reverse that trend.

So what do I think of the Senate Judiciary Committee's proposal, which is derived from a plan sponsored by John McCain and Ted Kennedy? I'm all in favor of one provision: offering those already here a possible route to permanent residency and citizenship. Since we aren't going to deport more than 10 million people, we need to integrate those people into our society.

But I'm puzzled by the plan to create a permanent guest-worker program, one that would admit 400,000 more workers a year (and you know that business interests would immediately start lobbying for an increase in that number). Isn't institutionalizing a disenfranchised work force a big step away from democracy?

For a hard-line economic conservative like Mr. McCain, the advantages to employers of a cheap work force may be more important than the violation of democratic principles. But why would someone like Mr. Kennedy go along? Is the point to help potential immigrants, or is it to buy support from business interests?

Either way, it's a dangerous route to go down. America's political system is already a lot less democratic in practice than it is on paper, and creating a permanent nonvoting working class would make things worse. The road to Dubai may be paved with good intentions.

Judge Questions Clarity Of Prosecution's Tax-Shelter Case (NYT)

By Lynnley Browning

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

A federal judge raised questions yesterday about the prosecution of 16 former KPMG employees over aggressive tax shelters, criticizing prosecutors for what he called murky definitions of fraud and evasion.

The judge, Lewis A. Kaplan of Federal District Court in Manhattan, said he was confused by what prosecutors said was a conspiracy by the defendants to make and sell aggressive shelters that allowed hundreds of wealthy investors to evade $2.5 billion in taxes from 1996 to 2002.

"Was the fraud and evasion in the execution or the design" of the shelters, Judge Kaplan asked during a hearing held to consider defense motions to drop or alter some charges.

Judge Kaplan made no ruling yesterday; he is expected to issue orders on the motions in coming weeks.

The case — with 16 former employees of the accounting firm KPMG, an outside lawyer and an investment adviser as defendants — is unusually large and dauntingly complex. The defendants are scheduled to stand trial in September. Their lawyers say their clients acted lawfully and appropriately.

Yesterday, Judge Kaplan asked prosecutors if they would consider dropping some of the 39 counts of tax evasion and limiting the evidence to be introduced during the trial, "in the interest of getting this thing tried in a single human life span."

Prosecutors say the defendants made, sold and in some cases used for themselves certain tax shelters that they knew would not pass muster with the Internal Revenue Service. They are also charged with cheating on their own and others' tax returns and with lying to government investigators. Not all defendants face the same charges.

One of the original defendants, David Rivkin, a former partner in KPMG's office in San Diego, pleaded guilty last week and agreed to cooperate with prosecutors against the remaining defendants.

Judge Kaplan also questioned aspects of an influential Justice Department memorandum that lays out guidelines on prosecutions of corporations. That document, known as the Thompson memorandum, drafted in 2003 by a deputy attorney general, Larry Thompson, advises prosecutors to grant more lenient treatment to firms facing indictment if they forgo paying the legal fees of potentially culpable employees.

"Frankly, I'm very bothered by it," the judge said, saying the document "puts the government's thumb on the scales" and raises questions about the Sixth Amendment constitutional right to legal representation.

KPMG narrowly avoided indictment and instead reached a $456 million deferred-prosecution agreement in August, in the process admitting criminal wrongdoing and agreeing to cooperate with investigators. But around the same time, KPMG, aware that some of its employees were about to be indicted, ended its longstanding practice of advancing legal fees of as much as $400,000 an employee.

"I find it shameful that the fees haven't been advanced," Judge Kaplan said. "The reality is that you are depriving people of counsel, or at least interfering or impairing."

Some lawyers for the defendants argued yesterday that their clients would go bankrupt financing their defense. One of the defendants, David Greenberg, a former senior tax partner at KPMG, has been unable to come up with the $25 million in bail needed to get out of jail, and appeared at the hearing in prison garb.

In court papers and oral arguments, prosecutors have repeatedly described the complex shelters as consisting of sham and fraudulent transactions, like phantom loans and investments, that generated artificial losses. Investors then cited these to claim tax losses against legitimate income. Lawyers for the defendants argue that they had thought the shelters were legitimate.

To Judge Kaplan's question of whether fraud and evasion occurred in the design or in the carrying out of the shelters, Justin Weddle, an assistant United States attorney, answered, "Both."

No court has ruled the shelters illegal, but the I.R.S. has never considered them valid for deductions.

DOJ_NMG_0024819

Nonetheless, Steven Bauer, a lawyer who represents John Larson, a former KPMG partner who is one of the 18 defendants, said prosecutors had withheld important information detailing, among other things, debate inside the I.R.S. over whether the shelters were legitimate.

Judge Kaplan ordered the prosecution to turn over any withheld information.

Lawyers Argue KPMG Motions (WSJ)

By Paul Davies And Judith Burns

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

Federal prosecutors and lawyers for 18 defendants facing criminal charges over the sale of questionable tax shelters by KPMG LLP packed a Manhattan courtroom yesterday to argue over motions expected to impact the shape and scope of the case -- and whether it will go forward.

The defendants want the charges dropped, arguing they believed the tax shelters were legal. Prosecutors contend the shelters were sham products designed, sold and implemented to improperly avoid paying taxes. The shelters were sold to about 600 wealthy individuals from 1996 to 2002 and generated about $2.5 billion in tax savings, prosecutors say.

Lawyers for the defendants argued that a separate settlement KPMG reached with prosecutors last year has hampered their clients' defense. The deferred-prosecution agreement required KPMG to admit to criminal wrongdoing and pay $456 million to avoid a criminal indictment that probably would have put the firm out of business. It makes it difficult to get current KPMG employees to testify freely about the case, say defense lawyers.

They also claim prosecutors pressured KPMG into not paying legal costs for those who were indicted. Assistant U.S. Attorney Justin Weddle said the government played no role in KPMG's decision.

But U.S. District Judge Lewis Kaplan said he was "bothered" by the government's influence on KPMG's decision. "I think it's shameful and may be worse than that," Judge Kaplan said.

Separately, three former KPMG auditors settled with the Securities and Exchange Commission over the 2002 audit of Tenet Healthcare Corp. No fines were imposed.

How H&R Block Took Advantage Of Clients (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

In your March 24 editorial "The Spitzer Savings Plan" you reported that I was upset at the H&R Block Co.

That much is true.

Compared with the array of frauds my office has uncovered -- including biased stock research, improper trading of mutual funds and bid-rigging in the insurance industry -- H&R Block's conduct was in certain ways particularly egregious.

That's because the company was preying on lower-income people, steering them into individual retirement accounts that were virtually guaranteed to lose money because of high fees and low interest rates. And H&R Block had the audacity to suggest that it was actually doing people a favor. Here are the facts to show why that claim is absurd:

H&R Block told its tax preparation customers that its Express IRA "paid great rates" and was a "better way to save." Some 500,000 people signed up. But instead of receiving "great rates," the Express IRA actually paid less than 1% interest at times.

Most importantly, and this is the core of our case, H&R Block failed to tell customers that the Express IRA had substantial fees: a $15 account opening fee; a tax computing fee of up to $20; a $10 account maintenance fee; a $15 re-contribution fee; and a $75 withdrawal fee (later reduced to $25). Customers had no idea that when added together, the fees would exceed the interest paid for 85% of people who opened accounts.

Internal documents show that H&R Block's own tax preparers were appalled by this product and refused to recommend it because "clients won't be happy seeing their investments decreasing."

And the company's own CEO is on record acknowledging that his employees objected to the product because it would just "nickel and dime" their customers, but management went on touting this product without disclosing all the fees.

No true champion of free enterprise, as the Journal purports to be, would defend the failure to properly disclose fees to customers. And no one truly interested in encouraging people to save would recommend H&R Block's Express IRA. After all, how does losing money encourage anyone to save?

Finally, contrary to your characterizations, this case could easily have been settled if the company had simply agreed to return the undisclosed fees.

And for the record, I always get upset when I see people being cheated.

Some Speculate On Snow's Treasury Future (AP-Y2)

By Jeannine Aversa

AP2, March 30, 2006

The changing of the guard involving President Bush's chief of staff is renewing speculation about the fate of Treasury Secretary John Snow, the administration's lead economic salesman for three years.

"The president appreciates the job his economic team is doing," White House press secretary Scott McClellan told reporters Thursday, when asked about a New York Times story which said that Joshua Bolten, Bush's incoming chief of staff, wanted to make changes to the economics team and wanted to replace Snow. The Times cited unidentified sources for its story.

McClellan didn't rule out changes at the helm of Treasury, saying Bolten has the authority to recommend personnel changes throughout the Bush administration. But, McClellan added: "Any speculation at this point is way premature."

Bush announced on Tuesday that Bolten, the White House's budget director, would succeed longtime chief of staff Andy Card in mid April.

Snow, 66, took the top Treasury job after the president fired his first Treasury secretary, Paul O'Neill, whose blunt-speaking ways came to irk the White House as well as some Republican and Democratic lawmakers in Congress.

Amid the fresh speculation Thursday that his job could be in jeopardy, Snow said only: "I don't think it's helpful to make a comment on rumors from nameless sources."

A holder of a Ph.D in economics as well as a law degree, Snow had been chief of railroad giant CSX Corp. before taking over Treasury.

He arrived when the U.S. economy was still struggling to get back to full throttle after the 2001 recession and the nation's job market remained in fragile condition. During his tenure, the economy grew stronger and eventually the job market did, too.

Snow has traveled around the country and participated in TV and radio interviews promoting the president's economic policies — including advocacy for a series of tax cuts and for Congress to make them permanent, tax simplification and overhauling Social Security — which stalled out in Congress as Republicans and Democrats balked.

The Treasury secretary also plays an important role in international financial matters. Treasury spokesman Tony Fratto noted that Snow is gearing up for the meeting of the world's richest nations in Washington in late April.

The Treasury secretary also has an extensive travel schedule planned, Fratto said.

Shakeup's Follow-up: Cheney To The NFL? (USAT)

By Al Neuharth

USA Today, March 31, 2006

The Oval Office shakeup that President Bush's critics — and some of his close friends — have been calling for started this week with the "resignation" of chief of staff Andy Card. But for Bush to bounce back from plunging ratings, he must make more drastic White House reorganization. Two moves that might do the trick:

· Then name Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice vice president.

Go ahead, laugh. It may seem funny. But stranger things have happened in politics.

Cheney is the real albatross for Bush. Not only has he pushed the president to most of his bad decisions, but he flaunts them.

The Veep has said repeatedly he will not run for president in 2008. But at 65, he's too young to just shoot quail or other hunters or live quietly in his home state of Wyoming.

Many in demanding but low-paying public service jobs have eyed high salaries and fun in sports. Bush has called Major League Baseball commissioner an ideal job. Rice repeatedly has said her "dream job" was NFL commissioner, although she made the talk show circuit last weekend to pointedly disavow any such ambitions now.

Cheney, who demonstrated as Halliburton's boss that he likes money, makes only $212,000 a year as Veep. Tagliabue earned $8 million annually at the NFL.

If Bush wants a say in picking his successor, and most presidents do, replacing Cheney is a necessary first step. Finding other work for him now makes more sense than faking more serious heart problems to dump him later.

Replacing Cheney with Rice would make her the front-runner for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination.

Frist Isn't Leaving Behind A Lot Of Fans (LAT)

By Mary Curtius

The Los Angeles Times, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON -- As he prepares to leave the Senate and position himself for a presidential bid, Bill Frist faces mounting criticism that he has proved an ineffectual majority leader whose legislative agenda increasingly is dictated by his White House ambitions.

Complaints about the patrician Tennessean by fellow Republicans intensified this week, sparked by his decision to force a Senate debate on illegal immigration. Some GOP lawmakers say his move spotlighted a public squabble within the party over a hot-button issue in an election year.

"We should have had a much more ambitious process of trying to build consensus and bringing people and different views together before we engaged in debate on the Senate floor," Sen. Olympia Snowe, R-Maine, told reporters.

But grumbling about Frist and decisions he has made as majority leader were evident before the flap over immigration.

"People have noticed that the (Senate) agenda is driven, at least in part, by issues that he wants to have on the floor, to have accomplishments on," one senior GOP Senate aide said.

He and several other aides interviewed for this story were willing to discuss Frist only on the condition of anonymity, because they and their bosses still must work with him. But their comments reflected the growing discontent with his performance.

"I don't think that he's made much of an impression outside Washington as a strong leader," said David Keene, chairman of the American Conservative Union, a leading advocacy group among Republicans.

Frist declined to respond to the criticisms, but his aides vigorously disputed them. They also argued that he had compiled an impressive list of legislative accomplishments that he would add to before November's elections.

Frist had pledged to serve only two terms when he first campaigned for his Senate seat in 1994. He stood by that promise even after his surprise ascension to the majority leader's job in December 2002.

In the months he has left in the post, Frist must pick his way through a political minefield of legislation in a fiercely partisan atmosphere that makes it hard to achieve results. A dispute over his motives in the immigration debate illustrates the difficulties confronting him.

His decision to introduce a bill restricted largely to cracking down on illegal immigration was widely seen on Capitol Hill as a bid to bolster his credentials with the GOP faction that stoutly opposes any steps toward legalizing the status of undocumented immigrants.

"I don't believe that Senator Frist really seriously wants us to consider immigration reform," said Democratic Whip Dick Durbin of Illinois. "He's more intent on checking a box off of issues that came to the Senate floor this year than action. You can't discount his presidential ambition -- it clearly is part of his political calculus at this point."

Frist said he acted because he was determined to make progress on the issue. "I've got to keep the system moving," he recently told reporters.

But he may have been outmaneuvered by Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Penn., and a bipartisan group of senators pushing a measure that, along with beefing up border security, would allow millions of illegal immigrants to apply for citizenship.

After the immigration debate, Frist is expected to turn to other measures that play well with the Republican base, such as proposed constitutional amendments to ban flag burning and define marriage as between a man and a woman. Both amendments have failed to win the two-thirds majority needed to clear the chamber in the past.

He has promised to push for a permanent repeal of the estate tax, which already has been reduced substantively during the Bush administration. Democrats may use a filibuster to block a permanent repeal.

More mundane bills -- such as the spending measures that keep the government running -- may receive relatively little debate.

"Nobody is under the illusion that we will have substantial floor time for appropriations bills this year," a different senior Republican Senate aide said. "Appropriations bills are not sexy; they do not get a lot of positive headlines for the majority leader."

Frist's focus on proposals that might not advance could lend credence to critics' assessment that he has failed to effectively use his power to enact legislative priorities for the GOP.

Lott refused to elaborate.

DOJ_NMG_0024822

"I think the No. 1 trait of a successful leader is the ability to make the trains run on time," said Keith Ashdown of Taxpayers for Common Sense, a government watchdog group. "(Frist) has had a lot of legislative trains run into each other."

Some Republicans worry that Frist has not delivered the legislative fruits that could help energize GOP voters -- many of whom are demoralized by the Iraq war and the steep federal budget deficit.

"This is almost April ... and what has the Senate gotten done?" a third senior GOP Senate aide said.

The aide noted that the Senate, under Frist's direction, spent much of the last few months rewriting lobbying rules and trying -- and so far failing -- to create a compensation fund for victims of asbestos exposure. Neither effort translates into accomplishments lawmakers can easily boast about in their districts, the third aide said.

"The first quarter is over, and we ain't scored no points."

Many conservatives fault Frist for failing to do more to stem federal spending as the budget deficit has soared.

"I think it is very important that he reconnect the Republicans on Capitol Hill with frustrated economic conservatives all across the country," said Pat Toomey, a former GOP House member from Pennsylvania who heads the conservative Club for Growth.

Frist's staff members say such criticisms are unfair.

"You can only judge him by his accomplishments, not the arbitrary yardsticks thrown around here in the run-up to the presidential campaign," said Eric Ueland, Frist's chief of staff.

Ueland ticked off Frist's successes: the appointment of two conservative Supreme Court justices and a half-dozen other federal judges whom Democrats had threatened to filibuster; an overhaul of the intelligence community; passage of the Medicare prescription-drug bill; a revision of bankruptcy laws.

His allies point out that increasing political polarization already had altered the Senate by the time Frist became its leader.

They also agree that Frist differs in style from most congressional leaders.

"He is a different creature" than the Senate is used to, said Amy Call, Frist's communications director. "He pushes the system, tests the system, finds solutions and brings them forward."

Whether those traits have served him well as majority leader is part of the disagreement over his record.

Frist -- a heart- and lung-transplant doctor whose Web site identifies him as: "Majority Leader Bill Frist, M.D." -- had cultivated an "outsider" identify at the start of his Senate career. He had never been a committee chairman when the White House backed him to replace Lott.

At the time, Frist's medical credentials and his relative lack of legislative experience were billed as pluses; he was a "fresh face" who seemed above the usual political fray.

But many colleagues clearly chafed at what they saw as his failure to abide by the Senate's traditions and rituals.

Thomas Mann, a political scientist at the Brookings Institution think tank who specializes in Congress, said Frist was "probably unique" as majority leader "in his lack of interest in the institution itself and lack of identity with, commitment to and understanding of it."

A Rebuke Rarely Exercised (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

When the nation was still young and the Constitution only 11 years old, Congress tried for the first time to censure a president.

The British Royal Navy was alleging that a seaman in custody in South Carolina was a fugitive. Without an investigation, President John Adams instructed a judge to turn the man, who said he was an American, over to the British.

This infuriated some in the House. Adams's opponents there sought in the spring of 1800 to adopt a resolution declaring his action "a dangerous interference of the Executive with Judicial Decisions."

But Adams had powerful defenders, including Rep. John Marshall, who later set many of the nation's founding constitutional principles as chief justice of the United States. Rep. William Craik argued that the House had neither "the power to censure or to approbate the conduct of the Executive," according to the Annals of Congress, but only to impeach him. The debate lasted two weeks, and in the end a vote to censure failed by nearly 2 to 1.

The question of censure is once again before Congress. This morning, the Senate Judiciary Committee meets to discuss a resolution introduced by Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) that would rebuke President Bush for his secret surveillance program. Old newspaper clippings and historical writings show that censure has a mixed record as an effective means for Congress to express disapproval of presidents.

Thirty-four years after the Adams episode, in March of the second year of the second term of President Andrew Jackson, the Senate rebuked the president in what remains the most famous case of censure.

DOJ_NMG_0024823

In the campaign of 1832, Jackson and his opponent, Whig Party leader Sen. Henry Clay, had debated vigorously the merits of the Second Bank of the United States -- whose recharter Jackson had vetoed. After the president was reelected, the Whigs, who held a Senate majority over Jackson's Democrats, demanded a document he had read to his Cabinet regarding the bank.

When the president refused, according to Senate historians, the Senate voted 26 to 20 to declare the president "in derogation" of the Constitution. Jackson responded with a lengthy protest.

That was not the end of the story.

Three years later, Democrats regained the Senate majority and sought to repeal the censure. They called for the 1834 Senate journal to be brought forward, and the "secretary took up his pen, drew black lines around the censure text, and wrote 'Expunged,' " Senate historians have noted. "The chamber erupted in Democratic jubilation. . . . Dressed in the deep black of a mourner, Henry Clay lamented: 'The Senate is no longer a place for any decent man.' "

One reason censure has not had much legitimacy as a tool for rebuke is that it is expressed by a congressional resolution without the force of law, and "you can express a resolution that apple pie and motherhood are good for American life," says professor William W. Van Alstyne of the College of William & Mary law school. Yet it has kept on coming up.

In the 1860s, the House adopted a resolution censuring President James Buchanan for letting politics influence government contracts. The Senate, after Buchanan left office, debated whether to censure him for not stopping the Southern states from seceding from the Union, according to a report by the Congressional Research Service.

In the spring of 1951, Republicans were enraged that President Harry S. Truman had fired Gen. Douglas MacArthur as commander of the United Nations forces in Korea. A senator with White House ambitions, Richard M. Nixon (R-Calif.), suggested censuring the president. The call failed to gain support.

Censure has been proposed in more recent history by the president's supporters as an alternative to impeachment. During the Watergate scandal, House Minority Leader John J. Rhodes (R-Ariz.) signed on to a petition to consider censuring President Nixon, and a resolution was introduced, but the debate moved to impeachment.

During the Monica S. Lewinsky scandal eight years ago, censure as an alternative to impeachment was floated seriously in Congress. President Bill Clinton's supporters hoped that a compromise would avert removal from office and pay off politically because polls showed most Americans preferred censure.

A phrase coined during the debate, "censure-plus," would have involved a rebuke and a financial penalty. But ultimately House Republicans approved two articles of impeachment.

In the Senate in late 1998 and early 1999, censure seemed to have more support from Republicans, but Democrats were beginning to sense that the Senate would not vote to impeach. "We are now navigating in previously uncharted waters," Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.) said at the time. Ultimately, the Senate voted not to convict Clinton -- and that was it.

For George Washington University constitutional law professor Jonathan Turley, the Clinton episode, as well as the pending Feingold proposal, are characteristic of what censure is -- and is not.

"The Constitution places an obligation upon Congress to impeach a president who has committed a high crime or misdemeanor," he said. "We're often left with these ambiguous actions. Even if a censure vote passed, the president would simply blame it on politics."

House Passes Education Bill On Party Lines (NYT)

By Diana Jean Schemo

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 30 —The House voted largely along party lines on Thursday to approve the main measure governing colleges and universities, adding provisions to expand student grants based on need and pressing colleges to control tuition. But the House rejected a Democratic proposal to halve the interest rate on student loans.

The $70 billion proposal, which would renew the law until 2012, sets the terms for loans and grants along with the limits for maximum aid. It was last renewed in 1998.

The floor debate showcased partisan differences over how to approach an era when increases in tuition routinely outpace inflation and the ability of many Americans to pay for college. Republicans, who are particularly striving to control a soaring budget deficit by avoiding new spending, said the bill would make college more affordable.

Democrats wanted to cut interest rates on student loans and enlarge Pell Grants, which had been frozen for several years.

The average undergraduate now leaves college carrying nearly $18,000 in debt.

In its final form, approved 221 to 199, the measure would simplify the financial aid application and make Pell Grants, the major grant that helps low- and middle-income students, available for summer study. The bill would also raise the spending cap on Pell Grants to $6,000, up from $5,800. The increase would be largely symbolic, however, as the maximum grant Congress appropriates has been frozen for four years at $4,050.

The bill would require colleges and universities that raise tuition at more than twice the rate of inflation for three years in a row to explain the increases. But lawmakers abandoned a provision that would have set off audits by the Education Department in the event of increases.

The bill would set the interest rate for subsidized loans at 6.8 percent, regardless of whether commercial rates rise or fall. Republicans defeated an amendment introduced by Representative George Miller of California, the ranking Democrat on the Education and Workforce Committee, to halve the interest rate on student loans over the next year.

In the floor debate over the last two days, the bill lost some of its most controversial proposals, programs that would have created a strong federal role in monitoring tuition increases and in reviewing the role of race in admissions decisions.

House Endorses Fuller Disclosure On College Costs (WSJ)

By John Hechinger

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

The House of Representatives passed a bill that mandates increased disclosure of college-pricing data and drops an antifraud measure that had curbed the growth of for-profit colleges, which are challenging traditional schools.

The College Access and Opportunity Act sparked complaints from Democrats and higher-education groups, though Republicans changed some measures at the last minute to mollify universities. The bill passed the Republican-controlled House largely on party lines, 221-199. The bill reauthorizes the Higher Education Act, which governs billions of dollars of federal funding for colleges and universities. The Senate is expected to take up its own version of the reauthorization in coming months.

One provision of the act would require public disclosure of data -- and an explanation -- from colleges that increase tuition by more than twice the rate of inflation over a three-year period.

Howard McKeon, the California Republican who chairs the House education committee, said in a statement that the measure adds "more sunlight" to the discussion about higher-education costs.

In response to criticism from colleges, Republicans agreed to drop a measure requiring colleges with big tuition increases to submit to the Department of Education a plan to hold down costs. Colleges argued that the requirement amounted to price control.

Another provision in the bill would ease a requirement that schools receive no more than 90% of their revenue from federal financial aid. The provision gives schools that exceed the 90% limit more time to return to compliance while making it easier for schools to meet compliance rules.

The 90% limit aimed to prevent the kind of fraud that occurred in the 1980s and 1990s, when some trade schools signed up unqualified low-income students in order to collect federal aid.

For-profit schools are most likely to bump against the 90% limit because they lack other funding sources.

In response to complaints from traditional colleges, Republicans dropped a provision that would have put for-profit schools on more-equal academic standing with established schools.

Originally, the bill would have barred schools from turning down credits solely based on a school's source of accreditation -- a common reason why traditional colleges reject coursework from students who attended for-profits. Under the bill that passed, schools can turn down the credits but must make public their credit-transfer policies.

House Passes Bill To Raise Pell Grant For Poor Students (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, March 31, 2006

The House yesterday passed a bill that Republicans say will benefit all college students while Democrats say it does not go far enough to help students and their families afford higher education.

Representatives approved the measure on a 221-199 vote almost entirely along party lines. There were 14 Democrats who sided with the chamber's majority to pass the measure, called the College Access and Opportunity Act. Eighteen Republicans and one independent voted with the Democrats in protest.

The bill increases the Pell Grant program for poor students from $5,800 to $6,000 and simplifies the process for seeking financial aid. It also requires schools to report their tuition costs to the Department of Education so the figures can be posted on a Web site for students and parents to review when choosing colleges.

The measure authorizes more funding for educational programs serving minorities and requires schools make public their policies regarding transfer of credits. It also puts pressure on schools to keep tuition increases to a reasonable level.

DOJ_NMG_0024825

Republicans applauded the passage of the bill, which renewed the Higher Education Act governing schools that receive federal money. It was last updated in 1998.

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican who authored the bill, accused Democrats of "playing politics with the education of American children."

Rep. Howard P. "Buck" McKeon, who took over for Mr. Boehner as chairman of the House Education and the Workforce Committee earlier this year, agreed. He said Democrats were intimately involved in the bill's crafting over the last three years and were supportive of it until recently.

"Education should not be a partisan issue," said Mr. Mc-Keon, California Republican.

Democrats, led by California Rep. George Miller, the ranking minority party member on the education committee, fought unsuccessfully for an amendment that would cut the interest rate on student loans from 6.8 percent to 3.4 percent, among other changes. It was defeated 220-200.

Mr. Miller said the $200 increase in the main bill was "interesting rhetoric," but said the Republicans have not included funds in the budget for the increase.

"It doesn't have any money for these low-income students to help cover the cost of their education," he said.

Mr. Miller criticized the $12.5 billion cut to financial aid programs that House Republicans approved earlier this year, comments echoed by his colleagues.

"I want our children and grandchildren to be able to pay for college," said Rep. Raul M. Grijalva, Arizona Democrat.

Republicans balked at Democrats' claims, and reminded lawmakers that education received cuts when the minority party was in power.

"Don't believe the hype," said Rep. Ric Keller, Florida Republican. "Not one student will receive less financial aid."

Boozman Joins In Chat With Bush (ADG)

Arkansas Democrat-Gazette, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON — Arkansas' Rep. John Boozman was one of a dozen Republican congressmen who participated Wednesday in what he described as an "informal" meeting with President Bush.

The group talked in the White House living quarters. Boozman has been on several Air Force One flights, but he said this was his first meeting with the president "in this kind of setting."

In addition to discussing Iraq and immigration, the president asked members of the group what was on their minds.

"He wanted to know what was going on in our districts," Boozman said.

Boozman said he used the opportunity to discuss high energy costs, which he said hit rural constituents especially hard. Bush, Boozman said, reiterated his pledge to end America's "addiction" to foreign oil, and pushed participants to craft incentives for biodiesel and ethanol production.

Over the past week, Bush has initiated intimate "off the record" meetings with news reporters.

"He's isolated somewhat," Boozman said. "The way he overcomes that is by reaching out to people."

Boozman would not identify the other congressmen at the meeting.

Bush told his guests that the U.S. was gaining ground in the war in Iraq, according to Boozman. "He told us we will leave, but we will not surrender in Iraq," Boozman said. "He reassured us."

Bush also assured them that he was against amnesty for illegal immigrants, Boozman said.

A White House spokesman declined to comment on the meeting.

New NASA Policy Backs Free Discussion By Scientists (NYT)

By Warren E. Leary

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 30 — Two months after NASA's top climate scientist complained that political operatives in the agency's press office were trying to censor his views on global warming, Administrator Michael D. Griffin issued a new communications policy on Thursday that he called a "commitment to openness."

The policy, which details the role of those who release information to the public directly or through the news media, ensures that NASA scientists and engineers are free to discuss their work in public and state their opinions, Dr. Griffin said. When stating a personal opinion, he continued, they should make clear that they are speaking for themselves and not for the agency.

In a presentation to employees, and later during a telephone news conference, Dr. Griffin and Shana Dale, the deputy administrator, said the policy replaced a code, last updated in 1991, that was "not clear enough or articulate enough."

DOJ_NMG_0024826

The agency came under fire when James E. Hansen, director of the Goddard Institute for Space Studies, a NASA office, told The New York Times in late January that the Bush administration had tried to stop him from speaking out after he gave a lecture in December calling for prompt reductions in emissions of greenhouse gases linked to global warming.

Dr. Hansen and several other employees of the agency said administration appointees in the public affairs office had demanded to review his lectures and publications in advance. In addition, he said, senior agency officials sought the right to stand in for him in interviews with reporters.

Other scientists also expressed concern when political appointees altered news releases and Internet presentations against their wishes.

After a barrage of complaints from lawmakers and scientific organizations, Dr. Griffin appointed a 12-member group of senior NASA scientists and public affairs officials to draft a new public communications policy.

In an interview on Thursday, Dr. Hansen said that the revised policy was "definitely better" than before and that his latest dealings with NASA public affairs had been much improved.

"I'm very optimistic," he said. "Things have changed dramatically since this became a public issue. This has been a healthy exercise, and hopefully similar things will happen at other agencies that have had similar problems."

Dr. Griffin said political appointees would continue to work at NASA, as is customary under any administration, but would not unduly influence the new openness policy. Dean Acosta, a spokesman, said there were five political appointees among the agency's 300-member public affairs staff, and about 18 in all positions throughout NASA.

In the news conference, Dr. Griffin also addressed recent criticism suggesting that at a Rotary Club gala in Texas last week, he endorsed Representative Tom DeLay for re-election. Mr. DeLay, who gave up his post as House majority leader in September after being indicted in a campaign finance case, represents a district that includes the Johnson Space Center in Houston.

The NASA chief has said that although he is entitled to issue political endorsements under certain circumstances, he will not. On Thursday he said he had not endorsed Mr. DeLay at the gathering but rather, in response to a gracious introduction from the congressman, had praised his support for the space program. While confirming his words, quoted in The Houston Chronicle, Dr. Griffin added that they were not as precise as they should have been and had been "grossly misinterpreted."

"The space program," Dr. Griffin said at the gala, "has had no better friend in its entire existence than Tom DeLay. He's still with us, and we need to keep him there."

Dr. Griffin said Thursday that he had meant keeping Mr. DeLay's support for the space program.

"I regret the inartful choice of words," he said. "I'm not endorsing anybody. I don't intend to."

NASA Sets New Rules On Media (WP)

By Rick Weiss

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

NASA Administrator Michael D. Griffin unveiled new rules yesterday that govern the release of agency information to news media and the public, his most detailed response yet to embarrassing allegations that NASA's public affairs office had sought to suppress the release of scientific information not consistent with the views of the Bush administration.

The new eight-page policy, written by an internal team of scientists, lawyers, public affairs specialists and managers, states that NASA scientists are free to talk to members of the media about their scientific findings and even express personal interpretations of those findings -- the heart of the controversy that has engulfed the agency since January.

It also makes clear that scientists are not required to have a public affairs officer with them when they speak with members of the media, though Griffin emphasized yesterday in comments broadcast to NASA employees that he believes such behavior is unwise.

"If you're not a media professional, then to go into an interview without a media professional is courting trouble," he said. "But you can do as you like."

Griffin had promised the revamped policy in February, after NASA employees complained publicly that information had been manipulated in ways that suited the Bush administration.

In some instances, employees said, scientists who had generated data on global climate change that did not jibe with administration policies had been muzzled or closely monitored by public affairs officials. In another instance, a public affairs employee appointed by the White House sought to weaken agency references to the Big Bang, the scientific and distinctly non-biblical explanation for the birth of the universe.

That employee has since left the agency amid questions about the accuracy of his résumé.

DOJ_NMG_0024827

House Science Committee Chairman Sherwood L. Boehlert (R-N.Y.) praised the new policy, which he said "puts a premium on open communication." NASA's approach, he said in a statement, "should become a model for the entire federal government."

The first of five principles in the new policy statement declares that NASA "is committed to a culture of openness" and assures the public that agency information "will be accurate and unfiltered."

The policy calls for appropriate editing of news releases and other public documents to ensure clarity. "However," the policy states, "such editing shall not change scientific or technical data, or the meaning of programmatic content."

It calls upon all NASA employees to coordinate with public affairs officials before releasing information "that has the potential to generate significant media, or public interest or inquiry." Employees are also encouraged "to the maximal extent practicable" to have a public affairs officer present at media interviews "to attest to the content of the interview, support the interviewee, and provide post-interview follow-up with the media as necessary."

But that advice, Griffin said during his 45-minute broadcast to all of NASA's far-flung facilities, "is not an absolute requirement." He also stressed that when speaking to the public, employees should clearly distinguish between agency findings and personal interpretations.

Griffin faced tough questions from employees after his presentation. One asked whether the remaining 20 or so political appointees on the NASA payroll were having their backgrounds and résumés checked.

Griffin said no such review was underway, adding that "I personally make no distinction" between political appointees and the agency's 17,000-plus career employees.

NASA has five political appointees among about 300 personnel in its public affairs offices, an agency official later said.

Another employee asked about comments Griffin made at a recent celebratory event, in which the administrator thanked former House majority leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) for his long-standing support of NASA. "He's still with us and we need to keep him there," Griffin said at the event -- a comment some interpreted as an inappropriate reelection endorsement.

Griffin explained yesterday that he meant "we need to keep him as a friend" and apologized for his "inartful choice of words."

In a conversation with reporters later, Griffin expressed optimism that the space shuttle will fly in July. If that flight goes well, he said, he plans to schedule a flight to repair the Hubble Space Telescope in late 2007 or early 2008.

He also confirmed rumors that a workshop scheduled for this summer to discuss exploration of the moon and beyond will include officials from the increasingly ambitious Chinese space program.

GOP, Dems Spar Over McKinney Incident (USAT/AP)

By Laurie Kellman, The Associated Press

USA Today, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON — House Republicans and Democrats engaged in their own scuffle — but just a rhetorical one — Thursday, a day after Rep. Cynthia McKinney had a dustup with a Capitol Police officer.

The incident occurred after an officer did not recognize the Georgia Democrat as she was entering a House office building and asked her to stop. According to one account, McKinney struck the officer.

Capitol Police could ask the U.S. Attorney's Office to file charges against McKinney, who represents Atlanta suburbs. No decision had been announced as of Thursday.

She said the police officer was not at fault.

“I would not make a big deal of this,” said Pelosi, D-Calif.

Ron Bonjean, spokesman for House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., responded, “How many officers would have to be punched before it becomes a big deal?”

McKinney's office said she was planning to hold a news conference this morning.

Late Wednesday night, she issued a statement saying she regretted the confrontation.

The Capitol Police face a difficult task: trying to protect 535 members of Congress and the vast Capitol complex in an atmosphere thick with politics and privilege.

More Ado About the Do

After hours of silence, it was nearly midnight Wednesday before Rep. Cynthia McKinney put out a statement about her scuffle with a Capitol Police officer that day. The Georgia Democrat said she regretted the "unfortunate confrontation" that occurred when the officer did not recognize her at a checkpoint and she allegedly jabbed him with her cellphone.

But McKinney, who recently swapped her braids for a shorter do, also admitted that she was not wearing the pin that identifies her as a member of Congress entitled to bypass Hill security checks. Why not? John Judge , a McKinney staffer, said that "a number of the women [in Congress] don't wear the pin, and some men don't either. . . . They train [officers] to recognize the members. It's not just the pin."

A similar sentiment was expressed in what Atlanta station WSB-TV described as McKinney's "original" statement, which she decided against releasing. "It is . . . a shame that while I conduct the country's business, I have to stop and call the police to tell them that I've changed my hairstyle so that I'm not harassed at work."

McKinney also released a snippet from a documentary in which she is seen being greeted with a warm hug by a black officer -- then stopped by a white officer asking for ID. "That's just the typical kind of treatment that I receive," McKinney said on the video. "Some things never change -- that's what Tupac said."

Josh Bolten, the Man With the Numbers -- Like 10

Back during the heady days of the 2000 George W. Bush campaign, new White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten was known as a cool, efficient policy director, and the go-to man when actress-turned-Republican-gadfly Bo Derek -- the woman who inspired the numerical system of hotness ratings -- needed a campaign escort.

When Bolten turned 46 that August, Dubya refused to believe his staffer had received a "Happy Birthday" phone call from the star of "10" and many legendary Playboy features -- until he grabbed Bolten's cell phone and dialed the number from the last received call, according to a source who was there. When Derek answered, the future president said, "Bo, let me just say that you and Josh together are a perfect 15."

FAA Files Complaint After Union Talks Break Down (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

Contract talks between the Federal Aviation Administration and its second-largest union fell apart yesterday amid a set of unusual maneuvers.

Shortly after noon, the leaders of the Professional Airways Systems Specialists announced they had agreed to the agency's contract terms and would send the agreement to union members -- but with full confidence that the rank and file would turn it down.

Within hours, the FAA said it planned to file an unfair labor practice complaint against the union -- a step usually taken by unions, not the government.

The breakdown in talks came after the FAA and the union held their second negotiating session out of six agreed to in ground rules for the talks. The rules called for the negotiations to end by July 21.

The union, known as PASS, represents more than 11,000 FAA and Defense Department employees who install, maintain and certify air traffic control equipment, inspect and oversee commercial and general aviation industries, and help develop flight procedures. The contract talks were focused on about 7,000 air traffic technical employees, the union said.

The FAA has taken a tough stance in contract talks over the last year, seeking changes in pay, leave and work rules. It is engaged in especially contentious bargaining with the National Air Traffic Controllers Union, and both sides recently agreed to mediation to extend those talks.

If the FAA and its unions fail to reach agreements on contract extensions, the agency may declare an impasse, which sends such disputes to the Republican-controlled Congress for a 60-day review. If Congress takes no action -- more likely than not -- then the FAA's last, best offer can be imposed on the unions.

The FAA also is one of only a few government agencies that can negotiate with unions over compensation, and it hopes to use contract talks to reduce labor costs and fold union employees into pay-for-performance systems.

Mike Derby , general counsel for PASS, said the FAA's initial proposal would have denied a pay increase to the union members for seven years. "How could that be characterized as fair and efficient?" he said.

In a statement yesterday, Tom Brantley , president of PASS, said the union had accepted the FAA contract proposal after concluding that the agency was not negotiating in good faith. "I am confident that PASS members will vote down the contract offer, which will send PASS and the FAA back to the bargaining table. Hopefully, the FAA will learn a lesson," Brantley said.

DOJ_NMG_0024829

A union spokeswoman said a ratification vote would probably take about 90 days. A rejection would then lead to a new round of negotiations, she said.

Greg Martin , the FAA spokesman, said the agency will file a complaint with the Federal Labor Relations Authority that charges PASS with failing to bargain in good faith.

He said he could not discuss specifics of the contract talks but noted that at least 40 contract provisions had not been discussed at the bargaining table. "What we have here is a clear delay tactic," Martin said.

He added, "Unfortunately, PASS has resorted to stunts. . . . By engaging in this stunt, they are creating a crisis where none exists."

Derby said the FAA's decision to file a complaint "sounds like a stunt to me."Retirements

Laura B. Antle , human resources officer at the Justice Department's Office of the Inspector General, will retire April 1 after 32 years of federal service.

Romana Danysh , a historian at the U.S. Army Center of Military History, will retire April 2 after more than 41 years of federal service, all of them at the Center of Military History.

Nancy Leonard , a public health adviser for the Food and Drug Administration, retires today after 41 years of federal service. She serves as the FDA breast implant specialist and public affairs liaison to field and district offices and is a steward and a vice president in the National Treasury Employees Union.Talk Shows

Randy E. Dobbs , chief executive of USIS, which conducts background investigations on federal employees, will be the guest on "Fedtalk" at 11 a.m. today on federalnewsradio.com and WFED radio (1050 AM).

Matthew Miszewski , chief information officer for the state of Wisconsin, will be the guest on "The IBM Business of Government Hour" at 9 a.m. Saturday on WJFK radio (106.7 FM).

Vietnam Vets Visitor Center A Step Closer (WP)

By Petula Dvorak

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

For most groups, it takes years and years of reports, presentations, studies, meetings and approvals before a slice of precious federal land is turned over for a memorial in the nation's capital.

But for Jan C. Scruggs, it may be a matter of months.

With a 404 to 4 vote in the House on Tuesday night, Scruggs, president and founder of the Vietnam Veteran's Memorial Fund, is on the way to getting Congress, rather than a long-standing group of commissions that has a rigorous selection process, to approve a sprawling, underground visitor center near the Vietnam Veterans Memorial and at the foot of the Lincoln Memorial. The legislation is now before the Senate.

"I felt compelled to take this unusual action in direct response to what I believe is the unreasonable bureaucracy choreographed by the National Capital Planning Commission," said Rep. Richard W. Pombo (R-Calif.), while arguing on behalf of the bill Tuesday.

Pombo, who sponsored the bill, said he met with the chairman of the planning commission before he was convinced that legislation was the only answer to get site approval for the center, which was authorized by Congress in November 2003.

But the planning commission has had the site proposal for only a few months -- since September -- and asked for Scruggs's group to submit a federally mandated environmental report for a preferred site and one other location. That submission would be used for another review of the proposal, said Marcel C. Acosta, deputy executive director of the planning commission.

Congress approved the creation of an underground center in 2003 as an addition to the Wall. The veterans group spent almost two years on its own analysis, which detailed several sites and recommended a triangle of land in Northwest Washington between Henry Bacon Drive, 23rd Street and Constitution Avenue NW.

The analysis was not presented to the planning commission until last fall, Acosta said.

Ordinarily, the commission has time to review the report, and the public has an opportunity to weigh in on the project's site. Just two years ago, a small group of neighbors on Capitol Hill used this process to prevent a memorial to victims of communism from being erected on a grassy, pocket park. The creators of a planned memorial to the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. said they appreciated the 18-month review process that whittled down 12 potential sites to the final selection in December of a spot along the Tidal Basin.

"The way this bill is written . . . it eliminates the federal review process and public input" and goes against the National Environmental Policy Act and the National Historic Preservation Act, Acosta said.

The bill also sets a precedent for future memorials and monuments," said Rep. Earl Blumenauer (D-Ore.), who spoke against the bill Tuesday night.

"It just broke my heart. I don't know how something like this gets jammed through," Blumenauer said.

DOJ_NMG_0024830

"The message this sends is: 'Don't spend the time on good design when you have a project like this. Just hire a lobbyist. Spend the money on PR,' " he added.

The center's design calls for an 8,000-square-foot underground space, which may include a movie theater, a three-dimensional battle scene, mementos left at the memorial and a wall where pictures of slain soldiers will be projected on their birthdays.

The understated nature of the Wall has long troubled some veterans who believe it fails to give adequate context for the war and the rich detail of lives lost. The new center is designed to help educate a generation of visitors younger than the 24-year-old wall itself, Scruggs said.

But some members of the commission staff believe that the lessons don't have to take place at the foot of the Lincoln Memorial. Some opposed the site that the House approved this week and asked Scruggs to look at other locations, including a grassy rise north of the Wall in Constitution Gardens, another site near the National Park Service's stable on the other side of the Reflecting Pool and one between the Interior Department's south building and Constitution Avenue NW.

The legislation authorizing the visitor center said it will be "at or near the Wall." Scruggs, determined to make sure the center will be comfortably close to the Wall, hired an urban anthropologist from Howard University to generate an 11-page analysis of the phrase "at or near" to make his point.

Flubbing Lobbying Reform (WP)

HERE'S A SIMPLE way to judge the lobbying reform bill just approved by the Senate: The leading advocates of reform, including the parties' two designated point men on the issue, Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Barack Obama (D-Ill.), all voted against it. Their objection to the measure, which passed the Senate 90 to 8 on Wednesday, isn't about what's in it but what's missing.

The measure improves the existing system. It would stop lobbyists from paying -- at least directly -- for meals and gifts for lawmakers. It would make it easier to identify which lawmakers sought government funding for earmarked pet projects, and easier to knock those earmarks (along with other provisions inserted at the last minute) out of House-Senate conference reports. Lawmakers would have to provide more detailed disclosure of the privately financed trips they take; under a little-noticed amendment, lobbyists couldn't arrange trips or go on them. Lobbyists would have to include on their reports the campaign contributions they make to lawmakers, the fundraisers they host and the donations they steer to lawmakers' charities. The bill would double -- from one year to two -- the waiting period for lawmakers who become lobbyists to buttonhole their former colleagues. All this is good -- as far as it goes.

But the measure doesn't include any new enforcement mechanism: an important proposal for a new Office of Public Integrity, an independent, nonpartisan entity empowered to conduct investigations and make recommendations to the House and Senate ethics committees, failed on the Senate floor, as it had in committee. It doesn't clamp down on lawmakers' ability to accept cut-rate jet travel from companies with interests before them. In fact, it doesn't put any new restrictions on the kinds of privately underwritten trips that lawmakers can accept.

It doesn't prohibit lobbyists and those they represent from footing the bill for lavish parties, at political conventions or elsewhere, honoring lawmakers. We could go on, but you get the point: Much more could, and should, have been done.

If the Senate bill is disappointing, though, the House is poised to do even worse. A proposal unveiled last month by the Republican leadership would do nothing to restrict gifts from lobbyists. It would merely impose a temporary moratorium on privately funded travel while the ethics committee studies what to do -- or, more cynically, while members wait for the storm over Jack Abramoff to blow over. It suffers from the same shortcomings as the Senate measure in terms of enforcement and corporate jets.

As the proposal moves forward -- the House Rules Committee held a hearing on it yesterday -- a critical issue will be whether and how many amendments will be permitted on the House floor to try to make it tougher. It would be the height of irony if an effort to improve the functioning of the democratic process were to take place under undemocratic conditions.

Lobby Reform Lite (NYT)

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

With the ghost of Jack Abramoff, the recently sentenced rogue lobbyist, wafting above the debate, the Senate has voted for a halfhearted package of reforms that would come nowhere near curing the easy money, quid pro quo culture that now bedevils the Capitol.

DOJ_NMG_0024831

Facing voters' flagging confidence, the Senate chose to emphasize greater disclosure by lobbyists while rejecting such vital reforms as the creation of an independent office to investigate ethics abuses. The instinct to protect privileged clubbiness carried the day, most glaringly when the Senate spiked any idea of ending lawmakers' shameless use of the executive jets so eagerly offered by corporate officials bent on insider access.

Constituents who are grateful to see even the slightest sign of reform will be happy that the senators have voted to extend to two years the mandatory waiting time before a former lawmaker can strike it rich as a lobbyist. The current wait is one year. The bill also takes the first steps toward uncovering the stealthy world of grass-roots lobbying investments in lawmakers' home districts.

The Senate bill would make it harder — but by no means impossible — for members to quietly "earmark" pork projects in the budget at the behest of lobbyists. But even such an obvious reform as banning meals and gifts from lobbyists came equipped with a gaping loophole so the corporate employers of lobbyists could still pick up those checks.

The unfinished ethics agenda begins with the most critical issue of all: an end to the pervasive role of lobbyists as campaign finance brokers and money bundlers for incumbent politicians. It's reached the point where the people's representatives blatantly designate lobbyists to head their fund-raising teams. This moneyed back-scratching is the seedbed for scandal, but neither house shows any appetite to confront it.

Also ignored was a ban on lawmakers' junketeering at the expense of special-interest check writers. The Senate chose instead to require prior approval of private trips by its spineless ethics committee, a step that would hardly mitigate the cheesiness. Taxpayers, not corporate sponsors, should pay for global fact-finding.

For all its shortcomings, the Senate is a light-year ahead of the House. There, reform proposals have been parceled out to committees for indefinite marination as Republican leaders face rebellious members who want no part of real reform. The chances seem slim for two-house action that truly dents the clout of the booming lobbying industry.

Fed Analysts Say Low Jobless Rate Doesn't Mask Labor Market Woes (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON -- U.S. unemployment really is low and the jobless rate hasn't been artificially depressed by a failure of many discouraged workers to be counted as unemployed, Federal Reserve researchers say.

Their findings, presented at a conference organized by the Brookings Institution, suggest the Fed could see strong job growth as an inflationary risk in the coming year. The study also argues that the economy's trend growth rate will slow noticeably in the coming decade as growth in the working-age population slows and a shrinking share of that population seeks work.

The study wades into a controversy over the failure of more people to seek work since the recession ended in 2001. The "participation rate" -- the proportion of working-age people working or looking for work -- peaked at 67.3% in 2000, fell to 65.8% in March 2005, and has since recovered to 66.1%, below where it stood for most of the 1990s.

Some economists argue the low participation rate means many people aren't seeking work because they believe no desirable work is available and aren't counted as unemployed. The economists believe the unemployment rate -- which at 4.8% in February was low enough to qualify as "full employment" in many conventional views -- may mask underlying labor-market weakness. A staff study by the Federal Reserve Bank of Boston a year ago argued the unemployment rate, then about 5.4%, might understate the actual degree of unemployment by one to three percentage points.

The latest Fed report disagrees.

"The low level of the participation rate is not artificially masking the extent of unemployment," said the study by Fed staff economists Stephanie Aaronson, Bruce Fallick, Andrew Figura, Jonathan Pingle and William Wascher. It doesn't necessarily represent the views of Fed policy makers. "The unemployment rate is providing a reasonably accurate picture of the state of the labor market."

It is common for the participation rate to rise during expansions as previously discouraged workers start looking for work in response to the increased availability of jobs and for it to decline during recessions as job openings dry up. That is the main reason the participation rate rose in the late 1990s then fell in 2001, the study says. Its continued fall in 2002 and 2003 was due to both economic weakness and emerging structural factors, while its failure to rise much since is mostly from structural factors, the study says.

Corporate Pretax Profits Jump 14.4% (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0024832

By Mark Whitehouse

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

Corporate America's share of the nation's income rebounded from the havoc of Hurricane Katrina to a level not seen in four decades, and the hurricane did a bit less damage to the U.S. economy than previously thought.

The Commerce Department said yesterday that corporate pretax profits in the fourth quarter of 2005 grew 14.4% from the previous quarter, the strongest rate since 1992. Pretax profits in the third quarter fell 4% as hurricane-related insurance payouts slammed financial results.

Corporate profits accounted for 11.6% of gross domestic product in the fourth quarter -- the biggest share of the nation's income companies have taken since 1966. They have been able to do so, say economists, by sharing less with their workers.

"It highlights the increased power of corporate America versus labor," says Paul Kasriel, chief economist at Northern Trust Corp. in Chicago. "That is a reflection of the global competition that labor now faces in America."

Economists say profit growth is likely to ebb this year as U.S. unemployment falls and workers regain some bargaining power. In the meantime, companies might reinvest some of their gains, giving the economy added momentum.

"Corporations are sitting on a mountain of cash, so as long as the economy is growing they will start spending some of that cash," says Nariman Behravesh, chief economist at Global Insight, an economic consultancy in Waltham, Mass.

The Commerce Department also reported that real gross domestic product -- the value of the nation's output of goods and services, adjusted for inflation -- grew at a seasonally adjusted, annualized rate of 1.7% in the fourth quarter. The figure was revised up from an earlier estimate of 1.6% but remains the lowest rate recorded since early 2003. For the full year, GDP grew 3.5%.

The small, upward revision in fourth-quarter GDP reflects the fact that companies restocked inventories faster than expected in Katrina's wake. Now, many forecasters believe the economy is experiencing a posthurricane boost as strong demand for consumer and business products has elevated business activity, prompting companies to step up hiring.

"The first quarter is going to be very firm," says Jan Hatzius, chief U.S. economist at Goldman Sachs Group Inc. in New York, who estimates that GDP in the first quarter, which ends today, grew at a 4.5% annual rate.

The consensus estimate of economists polled by WSJ.com1 is that GDP grew at an annual rate of 4.6% in the first quarter, but the growth rate will slow to 3.3% in the second quarter and could be around 2.9% by the end of the year.

The factors that crimped growth in the fourth quarter were largely temporary. Katrina and an unusually cold December took a toll on hiring and consumer spending. Defense spending dropped because of the late signing of an appropriations bill, and special short-term auto discounts prompted people to buy cars earlier in the year.

Now, the picture for jobs and spending looks a lot better. The Labor Department yesterday reported a drop in the number of people filing for unemployment benefits to 302,000 in the week ended March 25, down 10,000 from the previous week. Companies added an estimated 243,000 jobs in February, bringing the 12-month total to 2.1 million. And despite slow auto sales, total retail sales in February were up 6.7% from February 2005.

Economy Gets Good News And Bad News (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON — U.S. corporate profits surged at the fastest pace in four years during the final months of 2005, but inflation also jumped as the nation grappled with the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, the government said Thursday.

Businesses enjoyed a 13.8% increase in after-tax profits in the fourth quarter of 2005, a sharp rebound from the 4.3% decline in the previous quarter, the Commerce Department said. The pace of growth was the fastest since an 18.1% rise in late 2001.

In addition, a special inflation measure based on actual spending patterns, closely watched by the Federal Reserve, rose faster than expected. Commerce's index of consumer inflation, excluding food and energy, was revised to a 2.4% annual rate in the fourth quarter of 2005, from an earlier 2.1% estimate. That was far higher than the 1.4% rate of the previous quarter.

Nariman Behravesh, chief economist at Global Insight, called the report a case of good news, bad news. On the plus side, corporations are flush with cash and likely to use some of that money for capital spending. On the downside, higher inflation could be a danger sign for the Federal Reserve as it debates whether to continue raising interest rates.

Most Fed officials prefer a core inflation range of about 1% to 2%. To keep inflation in line, the Fed has been gradually raising its target for short-term rates since mid-2004 when they stood at 1%. The Fed Tuesday pushed rates to 4.75%, saying more increases were possible.

“If inflation continues to creep up, the Fed may have to hike rates more,” Behravesh said. “There is a growing risk that the (Fed) may have to push rates up to 5.25% or even 5.5%.”

In its report, Commerce said overall economic growth was a bit higher than previously reported in the fourth quarter of 2005. Gross domestic product, the broadest measure of the nation's goods and services, grew at a 1.7% annual pace in the fourth quarter, up from a previous 1.6% forecast.

Growth was lackluster compared with the 4.1% pace in the third quarter. Economists say, however, that the economy recovered from Katrina and Hurricane Rita in strong fashion. Global Insight pegs first-quarter growth at a 4% to 4.5% rate; others say it could be higher. Economists generally expect the economy to cool later in the year as the housing market pulls back.

In a note to clients, Moody's Economy.com noted that after-tax profits as a share of GDP surged to a record high in the fourth quarter. That could help tamp down inflationary pressures, because businesses will have more latitude to absorb higher production costs. But the firm expects profits to decline ahead as wages accelerate due to a tighter labor market. It also expects economic growth to slow to a 3% pace later this year.

Markets Mixed On Inflation Outlook (USAT/BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

USA Today, March 31, 2006

Stocks fell Thursday as the inflation outlook worsened, renewing concern the Federal Reserve will keep raising interest rates.

The Dow Jones industrial average sank 65 points to 11,150.70, and the Standard & Poor's 500 lost 2.64 points to 1300.25. The Nasdaq, though, bucked the downdraft and gained 3.04 points to 2340.82.

Companies most sensitive to changes in borrowing costs, including banks and utilities, declined after the government said an inflation gauge watched by the Fed rose more than first reported. (Story, 6B.) The revision sent the yield on 10-year Treasury notes to the highest in 22 months. Oil prices reached a two-month high, also weighing on stocks.

“If people sense that there's inflation pressure, then they worry that the Fed isn't done,” says Kevin Bannon, chief investment officer at Bank of New York Co. “The market cares because the Fed cares.”

The losses were limited as an increase in a Nokia forecast for mobile-phone sales buoyed technology shares. The Nasdaq composite index set a five-year high for a second consecutive day.

Rising oil prices added to inflation concerns. Crude for May delivery jumped 70 cents to $67.15 a barrel in New York, the highest close since Jan. 31, amid declining U.S. gasoline inventories and as the United Nations Security Council asked Iran to curb its nuclear program. The yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note increased to 4.86% from 4.81% on Wednesday.

“We're struggling with a couple headwinds: interest rates, the Fed hiking and also oil prices,” says Henry “Chip” Dickson, chief U.S. strategist at Lehman Bros. “We need oil prices to stabilize, and we need the Fed to stop.”

General Motors, the world's largest automaker, fell $1.09 to $21.06 for the worst performance in the Dow. GM, raising cash after $10.6 billion in losses last year, said it's in talks to sell shares of Japan's Isuzu Motors.

·Nokia jumped $1.06 to $21.28. The company expects growth in the global handset market of 15% on demand in China and India, up from its previous estimate of at least 10%.

·ATI Technologies, the No. 2 maker of computer-graphics chips, rallied $1.32 to $17.05. The company said fiscal second-quarter profit, excluding some costs, was 17 cents a share on revenue of $672 million. Analysts, on average, expected 13 cents on sales of $643.8 million, Thomson Financial says.

Stocks Decline On Rate Worries (WSJ)

By Scott Patterson

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

Investors thinking they had heard the all-clear signal were ambushed Thursday by a sudden jump in interest rates.

Wednesday, stocks rallied as Wall Street shrugged off the Federal Reserve's latest rate increase. But a selloff on the bond market drove stocks lower as the yield on the 10-year Treasury note leapt past 4.8% to its highest level since June 2004.

Tony Crescenzi, chief bond-market strategist at Miller Tabak, said several factors were behind the bond selling. Chief among them: a revised increase in a key inflation measure closely watched by the Federal Reserve.

In its final reading on fourth-quarter gross domestic product1 growth in the U.S., which showed the economy grew by 1.7% in the final three months of 2005, the government's price index for personal consumption, excluding food and energy, rose 2.4%, up from the previously estimated 2.1%. The Fed prefers the measure to remain at or below 2%, said Mr. Crescenzi in a note. "The data are raising concerns about the Fed," the analyst wrote.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average fell 65 points to 11150.70, weighed down by a 4.9% loss by General Motors. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 2.64 to 1300.25 and the Nasdaq Composite Index added 3.04 to 2340.82.

Crude-oil futures gained 70 cents to $67.15 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange. The April contract for Comex gold surged $13.40 to $586.70 a troy ounce, hitting its highest level since January 1981.

Investors are growing increasingly jittery about higher interest rates, concerned that they will result in a slowing economy. Higher rates make it tougher for businesses to expand and more difficult for consumers to spend on credit. They also make bonds more attractive. A risk-free yield of 4.75% could be tempting to investors growing increasingly wary of stocks, said Owen Fitzpatrick, managing director at Deutsche Bank Private Wealth Management.

"Money could start to float over into the bond market," he said. "Now it becomes more of a legitimate investment choice" to stocks, which will need to offer a higher rate of return to reward investors for the risk they take that stock prices could fall.

Not everyone is unnerved by the move higher by interest rates. James Paulsen, chief investment strategist at Wells Capital Management, points out that markets and interest rates world-wide have been rising in unison in 2006. And since yields remain relatively low on a historical basis, the economy should still be able to chug along in 2006, and earnings will continue to grow at a solid pace. "I'm not convinced [higher rates are] going to mean the run for stocks" is over, he said.

As the Fed move recedes into investors' rearview mirror, first-quarter earnings reports are increasingly coming into focus. Analysts surveyed by Thomson Financial expect companies in the S&P 500 to post earnings growth of 11.3% in the first quarter, which would be the 10th consecutive quarter of double-digit growth. Thomson expects earnings to grow 12.4% in 2006.

Investors also weighed a wave of news on the merger-and-acquisition front Thursday. Nasdaq Stock Market decided to pull7 its $4.2 billion offer for the London Stock Exchange. Bank of New York jumped more than 4% on reports that J.P. Morgan Chase is close to a deal to buy as many as 300 of its retail branches for up to $4 billion. Shares of Maytag, which surged 28% in the final minutes of trading Wednesday on news that8 the Justice Department approved Whirlpool's $1.79 billion acquisition of the home-appliance maker, slid 1.9% Thursday.

Shares of Nokia jumped 5.2% after the world's biggest mobile phone maker said it expects industrywide growth of 15% or more in 2006, up from previous expectations for growth of 10%. Shares of rival Motorola rose nearly 1%.

In major market action:

Stocks were mixed9. On the New York Stock Exchange, where 1.6 billion shares traded, 1,421 stocks rose and 1,877 fell. On the Nasdaq Stock Market, where 2.2 billion shares traded, 1,518 rose and 1,514 declined.

Bonds declined10. The benchmark 10-year Treasury shed 12/32 point, or $3.75 per $1,000 invested, to yield 4.857%. The 30-year bond fell 27/32 to yield 4.895%. Yields move inversely to prices.

The dollar declined.11 It traded at 117.34 yen, down from 117.83 yen late Wednesday, while the euro rose to $1.2155 from $1.2024.

Church Sex Abuse Costs Rise Despite Drop In New Allegations (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

The financial costs of the sex abuse scandal in the Roman Catholic Church rose dramatically in 2005, even as the number of new allegations fell, the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops said yesterday.

Releasing an annual report on their efforts to prevent abuse of minors by priests, the bishops said U.S. dioceses spent $399 million last year on legal settlements with sex abuse victims and $68 million on lawyers' fees, psychological counseling and related expenses -- about three times more than they paid in 2004.

The church's cumulative expenditures on sex abuse claims in the United States are approaching $1.5 billion. The tally of known victims has topped 12,500. The number of priests and deacons who have been credibly accused since 1950 is close to 5,000.

In releasing the blizzard of statistics, Catholic Church officials and their academic consultants put a generally positive gloss on the data, suggesting that the worst of the crisis is over.

Karen Terry, a researcher at the John Jay College of Criminal Justice in New York, said the vast majority of the abuse took place from the mid-1960s to the mid-1980s. There has been a sharp decline in the number of cases since the early 1990s, which an analysis indicates is not just a matter of a lag in reporting, she said.

"We know that sexual abuse is underreported and that more people will come forward," she said. "But the decrease in sexual abuse cases is real." She added that the decline mirrors the general societal decrease in crime, substance abuse and sex abuse in the 1990s.

Teresa M. Kettelkamp, a former Illinois state police officer who heads the bishops' Office of Child and Youth Protection, said "it is important to acknowledge how much has been done" to remove abusers from the priesthood, including 57 priests who were suspended in 2005.

She said U.S. dioceses have conducted background checks on 1.6 million adults who work with minors and have provided "safe environment" training to 5.7 million children, 95 percent of all those entrusted to the care of the church.

Bishop William S. Skylstad, president of the bishops' conference, said he has both "a sense of progress" and "a great sense of the continuing impact of the sexual abuse crisis" because his own diocese of Spokane, Wash., is in bankruptcy and he was recently accused of molesting a teenage girl in the 1960s. He has denied the allegation.

The bishops' conference said U.S. dioceses received 783 credible allegations of abuse against 532 clergy members in 2005. There were 1,092 allegations against 756 priests in 2004.

Of the new allegations, nine -- or less than 1 percent -- stemmed from incidents that took place in 2005 and were reported by people still younger than 18. Nearly 87 percent of the remaining 774 new allegations involved abuse that occurred before the 1990s. Of the 532 priests accused in 2005, nearly two-thirds had been identified in prior allegations, and 418 were deceased or out of ministry, church officials said.

William Gavin, a former FBI official whose Boston-based consulting firm has been hired by the bishops to conduct annual sex abuse "audits" of U.S. dioceses, said 169 of the 191 Catholic dioceses examined in 2005 were "fully in compliance" with the sex abuse policy the bishops adopted in Dallas in 2002.

Those in compliance included the archdioceses of Washington and Baltimore, and the dioceses of Richmond and Arlington.

Barbara Blaine, president of the Survivors Network of those Abused by Priests, said the report "once again proves that bishops can't be trusted to monitor themselves."

She noted that the auditors found the Archdiocese of Chicago to be fully in compliance with the charter in 2004 and 2005. Yet in recent months, two previously accused priests were found working in active ministry in Chicago.

Patricia O. Ewers, chairman of the National Review Board, a panel of lay Catholics appointed by the bishops as a watchdog over the church's handling of sex abuse, also said that "recent events in Chicago make it clear that the church has not done enough."

Bishops Report Decline In Abuse Accusations (NYT)

By Neela Banerjee

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 30 — A total of 783 new accusations of priests' sexual abuse were received by the nation's Roman Catholic bishops last year, with about 13 percent of the cases dating from 1990 or later, the bishops reported Thursday.

In issuing its third annual audit intended to assess efforts to prevent such abuse, the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops emphasized that accusations had declined from the 1,092 reported in 2004.

The bishops also said that as a result of a provision they adopted in 2002 under a toughened policy, 94.5 percent of children in Catholic schools and Sunday school classes had been educated on keeping themselves safe from abuse, an increase from 51 percent the year before.

The survey said 87 percent of the new accusations involved abuse that occurred before 1990, some of it as early as 1950. Only nine accusations concerned abuse last year.

But victims' groups have argued that recent accounts of abuse and the church's resistance to extending the statute of limitations on it are renewing doubts about the bishops' commitment to solving the problem.

The president of the bishops' conference, William S. Skylstad of the Spokane Diocese, himself faces accusations of sexually abusing a girl in the early 1960's, which he denies. And earlier this year, after a priest in Chicago was arrested on charges of molesting boys, the archdiocese there came under fire when it was disclosed that the police had shared accusations of abuse with church officials as early as last August. The archdiocese did not remove the priest until January.

Patricia O. Ewers, chairwoman of the National Review Board, a lay group established by the bishops to monitor the church's response to the sexual abuse crisis, said Thursday that given the scandal in Chicago, it was "clear that the church has not done enough."

Speaking here at a news conference where the bishops' findings were announced, Dr. Ewers noted that the audit process, which is largely a matter of self-reporting by diocesan staff, did not examine the effectiveness of anti-abuse procedures adopted by the bishops, only if those procedures are in place.

In fact, the new audit found the Archdiocese of Chicago to be in compliance with the church's policy on abuse, noted Agustin Perez, one of the independent investigators hired by the archdiocese in the wake of the recent scandal.

While the bishops' report was debated, the office of the New Hampshire attorney general issued its own audit of the Manchester Diocese on Thursday. It cited a "general level of ineffectiveness in enforcing compliance" with an agreement between the diocese and the state to protect children from abuse.

The Rev. Edward J. Arsenault, a representative of Bishop John B. McCormack of the Manchester Diocese, which takes in all of New Hampshire, said in a statement that work remained to be done, but pointed out that no minors were harmed during the period audited by the state, 2002-5.

Nonetheless, the attorney general, Kelly A. Ayotte, told the bishop in a letter dated Monday that failure to address problems in sexual abuse procedures before the state's next audit "may result in court action for contempt and other legal remedies."

Catholic Sex-abuse Payouts Still Rising (WT)

By Julia Duin

The Washington Times, March 31, 2006

Sex-abuse accusations against the nation's priests were down last year, but the flood of millions of dollars in payouts more than tripled and shows no signs of stopping, the United States' Roman Catholic bishops said yesterday.

"It is disheartening to us bishops, as it must be to all Catholics, to find that there are still some allegations of abuse by clerics against today's children and young people," Bishop William S. Skylstad, president of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops (USCCB), said during the release of the conference's annual report on sex-abuse statistics.

The report, commissioned in 2002 by the USCCB's Charter for the Protection of Children and Young People, tracks what the country's 195 Catholic dioceses are doing to end a sex-abuse crisis that has involved 12,537 youths -- mostly boys and young men -- and 4,827 priests.

The bishop cited himself as a sign of the scandal's durability, adding that he is the target of a sex-abuse charge filed Dec. 27 by a woman who has accused him of abusing her in the early 1960s. He has denied the charge.

He said his own Diocese of Spokane, Wash., is bankrupt because of lawsuits. Bishop Skylstad insisted, though, that he is still happy with the USCCB's "progress."

But "I do so without being either naive or in denial about the power of this crisis to affect the ongoing life of the church and the lives of victims of abuse who suffer from its consequences for many years after its actual occurrence," he said.

Accusations against Catholic priests decreased 28 percent last year, but the cost in millions of dollars to the nation's Catholic dioceses shot up 219 percent last year, the USCCB said.

Specifically, $139,582,157 was paid out in sex-abuse cases in 2004 -- for settlements, attorneys' fees, victim therapy and other costs. Last year, that amount rose to $445,686,548, including the $100 million that California's Diocese of Orange agreed to pay to 90 claimants in January and $120 million the Covington, Ky., diocese agreed to pay to more than 100 victims in June.

According to the Catholic News Service, the U.S. church to date has paid $1.3 billion in settlements.

A USCCB report shows 783 credible accusations of child sex abuse reported last year, down from 1,092 in 2004. Of the 783 charges, nine occurred last year, the USCCB said, and the others occurred mostly in the 1960s and 1970s.

Despite the charter and all the safeguards it imposed, the USCCB said cases still fall through the cracks. On March 20, the Archdiocese of Chicago admitted that it had allowed the Rev. Daniel McCormack to remain in ministry for months after he had been accused of pedophilia. Three boys have accused the priest of molesting them from 2001 to 2005.

The problem, said Bill Gavin, head of the Boston-based Gavin Group, which conducts annual "audits" on Catholic dioceses, is that his investigators are not allowed to research personnel files.

"The people in the Archdiocese of Chicago didn't deliver to the cardinal the candor he needed," Mr. Gavin said. "I expect the auditors didn't get it, either."

Moreover, about 104 dioceses that have been found fully compliant two years in a row with the charter were allowed to fill out a questionnaire last year in lieu of an on-site visit by investigators.

The sex of the abuse victims reported last year was the same as was reported for the years 1950 through 2002 -- 19 percent were girls and 81 percent were boys. Almost half (49 percent) of the victims were between the ages of 10 and 14, 23 percent were ages 15 to 17 and 14 percent were younger than 10. The ages were not specified for 14 percent of the victims.

A supplemental report, issued by the John Jay College of Criminal Justice in New York, said there were no warning signs for the typical abuser, who is a priest in his late 30s who has been ordained 11 years. Diocesan priests tended to be abusers twice as much as priests from religious orders.

"The red flags aren't there," said Karen Terry, the report's principal investigator. Except for a small group of serial abusers who began abusing children around the time of their ordinations, "there are no identifiable psychological problems."

A Benefit For Insurers (NYT)

By Milt Freudenheim

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0024837

Critics who say the private insurance industry got too big a role in the new Medicare prescription drug program may not know the half of it.

For patients, the program's rollout has had mixed reviews, with many happy customers but more than a few tales of woe. But for many big insurers, the new Medicare program is shaping up as a great opportunity. And prescription drugs may be only a starting point.

So far, about 18 million Americans are participating in the new drug program, known as Medicare Part D. If things play out the way some big insurers hope, the drug program could prove to be a feeder system into a much greater private presence in Medicare — a longstanding goal of the Bush administration.

Insurers like Humana, which says it has signed up 1.7 million Medicare drug plan members, know that the real money is not in providing drug insurance. The rewards are much richer in other types of Medicare policies, including complete managed care plans called Medicare Advantage, which are operated by the private insurers but subsidized by Medicare. Michael B. McCallister, Humana's chief executive, refers to the new Medicare Part D drug program as part of a broader "Medicare opportunity" for his company.

"There's going to be a lot of people that are going to have Part D cards that are going to become interested in a Medicare Advantage plan," said Mr. McCallister, who has been unusually candid about the springboard strategy.

In January and February, which were the first months of the Part D drug program, Humana was also able to add more than 140,000 new Medicare Advantage customers to its rolls.

One of them was Frank Stallings, 78, a retired college professor in Highland Heights, Ky., who recently switched from a Part D plan to a Humana Medicare Advantage plan.

"So far, Part D has worked O.K.," he said. "I felt like I needed something else to help me out with other things not covered by Medicare."

Unlike his Part D drug plan, which carried a monthly premium of $26, there is no premium for his full-coverage Medicare Advantage plan — although his drug co-payments are a bit higher, and there will be co-payments for some other medical services.

Other big insurers like Wellpoint and the UnitedHealth Group — the Part D leader so far, with 4.5 million enrollees — are also recruiting members for Medicare Advantage, as well as customers for Medigap, another type of Medicare-related policy. Medigap is a supplemental policy that helps with the remainder of medical expenses not fully covered by conventional Medicare.

While the stand-alone Part D drug plans are expected to give insurers a small profit, the margins are likely to be thin — 1 percent to 3 percent before taxes, Humana estimates. That is partly because Humana is offering low premiums and co-payments to attract customers. And the federal subsidy for each customer in a stand-alone Medicare drug plan is only about $75 a month.

But for providing a full Medicare Advantage health policy to a patient, the government pays the insurer $900 to $2,000 a month beyond whatever premium, if any, the patient pays. With that revenue, come bigger profit margins — 3 percent to 5 percent, according to James H. Bloem, Humana's chief financial officer.

For UnitedHealth, the Part D drug business by itself would not be particularly lucrative, adding only 5 to 7 cents to earnings a share, according to Jason Nogueira, an analyst who tracks health care companies for the investment firm T. Rowe Price. That would be no more than 2 cents on the sales dollar for UnitedHealth, which had $45 billion in 2005 revenue and expects profit of $2.90 a share this year.

So the real financial opportunities lie in upgrading Part D enrollees to other Medicare-linked policies. In essence, the high federal subsidies for Medicare Advantage policies are the government's reward to insurers for taking people out of traditional, federally supervised Medicare and into the commercial world of managed care. In fact, Medicare now pays private insurers 15 percent more, on average, to take a patient than it spends in a traditional government program for each patient.

Critics of Medicare's approach, including a number of senior Democrats in Congress, have asked the Congressional Budget Office to examine the issue. The budget office estimated that Medicare could save more than $40 billion over the next 10 years if subsidies to insurers were scaled back to the levels the program now pays directly to doctors and hospitals.

Representative Pete Stark of California, the senior Democrat on the Ways and Means Committee, said in an interview that insurance agents "are out trying to promote seniors into Medicare Advantage plans, and switch them out of plans they are in."

The Medicare law that created the Part D program, Mr. Stark said, "was written by insurance company lobbyists with the help of pharmaceutical company lobbyists."

In a telephone interview, Michael O. Leavitt, the secretary of health and human services, defended the administration's market-based approach to Medicare, saying that market forces were pushing prices lower and that any kinks in Part D would be worked out.

"The market will become simplified because consumers want that," Mr. Leavitt said.

DOJ_NMG_0024838

As long as the incentive of federal subsidies stays at current levels, insurers have every reason to pursue them, especially as the industry struggles with slowing growth in its traditional core business of managing employer-sponsored health benefits.

Charles Boorady, a health care securities analyst at Citigroup, said that by expanding Medicare-subsidized offerings, the insurance industry had a potential revenue opportunity of more than $450 billion a year "or enough to almost double the revenue of the managed care industry."

Even before the new drug plan went into effect in January, some insurers had significant numbers of Medicare Advantage customers. Humana, for example, had 558,000. UnitedHealth had 1.1 million in Medicare Advantage; it also had an additional 2.5 million AARP customers with Medigap cards, and most of them have added the Part D coverage that UnitedHealth is offering through AARP.

By the end of February, Humana had already raised its total of Medicare Advantage members to 700,000 and had set a goal of 900,000 to 1.1 million by Dec. 31. The company expects to add more in 2007. New figures released by Medicare last week indicate that 6.3 million of the 18 million people enrolled in Plan D voluntarily signed up for the drug program; in all, 43 million people are eligible for it. An additional 5.7 million in the program are people who were subscribers to Medicare Advantage health plans that did not cover prescription drugs but they added the coverage.

The government's real gift to the insurers was 6.4 million low-income people on Medicaid or other public-assistance programs who were automatically assigned to Part D or Medicare Advantage plans. They were allocated among insurers ready to meet Part D rules, with most going to those that had Medicare Advantage plans throughout the United States.

Under this allocation, the government gave UnitedHealth 1.2 million Medicaid assignees; the next biggest were Humana and Wellpoint, which each got about 600,000.

Those insurers can be sure of collecting 100 percent of the premium from the government for the lowest-income enrollees, and they are paid on a sliding scale if the enrollees are eligible for other state assistance.

Not everyone, though, sees a huge opportunity in the industry using the Medicare drug program as a springboard into fuller lines of coverage.

Ed Kroll, an analyst at the investment research firm SG Cowen, notes that in the past, prescription drug coverage was a major reason people signed up for a Medicare Advantage managed care plan. Now, with Part D, people can have their drugs paid for without joining a broader plan, he said, and can simply let plain old Medicare benefits cover their other health needs.

Aetna, the third-largest insurer, after Wellpoint and United, has not made a big push into Part D. The company has only 375,000 Part D drug plan enrollees so far. Aetna — like Cigna, the No. 4 insurer — is more concerned with commercial customers and is "not strategically focused on Medicare or Medicaid," Mr. Boorady of Citigroup said.

Even for companies like Humana, which do have that focus, the big challenge will be overcoming the bad publicity the Part D program has tended to receive in the early going. And for those who do agree to trade up, insurers will not be able to take their loyalty for granted.

Florence Bryan 65, a retired grocery worker in Winchester, Va., met a Humana saleswoman in a Wal-Mart store late last year; she was promoting Part D and Medicare Advantage. "I went on her recommendations," said Ms. Bryan, who joined a Humana Medicare Advantage plan in January. Now, she has her "first glitch." Her Humana plan covers only half her monthly requirement of 60 Prevacid pills, which she for stomach problems. "The Humana representative said the doctor should call an 800 number to get an authorization," she said. "But the doctor's office said the insurance company needs to fill out a form and send it to the doctor." When contacted, a Humana spokesman said the company intended "to resolve this issue for Mrs. Bryan as soon as possible."

New To The Stable: Two Champion Clones (WP)

By Justin Gillis

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

A Texas company said yesterday that it had cloned two champion cutting horses for $150,000 apiece, had established multiple clone pregnancies and would create as many as 30 more cloned horses over the next year, signaling the arrival of a commercial horse-cloning industry in the United States.

The plans by ViaGen Inc. of Austin represent by far the most ambitious effort yet to turn horse cloning into a paying business. There's little doubt that ViaGen, with one of the world's top cloning scientists in its stable, can pull off the necessary laboratory work, and not a single government rule or regulation stands in the way.

But it remains to be seen how far the U.S. horse industry will go in embracing the technique that produced Dolly the sheep a decade ago and has since come to symbolize many people's fears about modern genetic science. While cloning is being welcomed by those who ride and breed cutting horses, a sport with blue-collar origins on the ranches of the American West, the people guarding the purity of elite horse racing in the United States have decided to prohibit clones.

"Would it be fun to watch Muhammad Ali box Muhammad Ali? Would it be fun to watch 10 Michael Jordans out on the basketball floor?" said Dan Rosenberg, president of Three Chimneys Farm, one of the leading farms in Kentucky breeding Thoroughbred racehorses. "What we do is part business and part fun, and it's part science and part art. If it becomes pure business and pure science, I don't want to play anymore."

It's clear that a lot of people in the horse industry agree with him. The American Quarter Horse Association, which safeguards that breed by issuing papers on the animals, has prohibited registration of any clone.

So has the Jockey Club, the association that registers the Thoroughbreds, such as Secretariat and Seattle Slew, that race for the Triple Crown and other premier events. In fact, the Jockey Club has prohibited not just cloning but any form of artificial reproduction. In the racing world, owners and breeders are clinging tenaciously to the idea that creation of a baby horse, a foal, ought to involve a stallion having sex with a mare.

But a different attitude seems to be taking hold in the most democratic of the equine disciplines, cutting, which grew out of the twice-yearly cattle roundups in the West that would bring together thousands of beef cows. To separate one rancher's animals from another's, cowboys needed compact, athletic horses with good instincts for pulling a cow out and blocking its attempt to rejoin the herd. The ranch hands would take any cutting horse, purebred or not, that could do the job.

It hadn't occurred to Lindy Burch, either, until recently. The Weatherford, Tex., woman is one of the nation's most accomplished riders and breeders of cutting horses, and owner of a valuable cutting champion called Bet Yer Blue Boons, a mare with health problems that have limited her ability to reproduce.

Burch was shocked when some fellows she knew called up and told her about a company with plans to clone horses. "I thought, 'Gosh, I have to try it,' " she said. "There's a lot of really nice horses, but the great ones are few and far between."

Now two mares are pregnant with Bet's clones. They're among 15 clones established in ViaGen's laboratories that are coming to term in surrogate mares on a farm in Oklahoma. Two clones already have been born. The first, born Feb. 19, is a clone of Royal Blue Boon, an aging champion whose offspring -- Bet Yer Blue Boons is one -- have earned millions in prize money on the cutting-horse circuit. That makes her, in the view of Quarter Horse News, "the greatest producing mare in the history of the sport."

They are not the first cloned horses born in the United States, nor even the first created for money. Since the world's first horse clone was born in Italy in 2003, a handful have been created by academic laboratories in this country.

But ViaGen, with financial backing from Arizona billionaire John Sperling and rights to the important patents in the field, is by far the best-financed company offering cloning services. Its laboratory is run by Irina Polejaeva, a leader of the scientific team that produced the world's first pig clones six years ago.

The company's main goal is to turn cloning into a routine tool of production agriculture, creating elite breeding stock for the cattle and hog industries. But a policy that would allow cloned animals or their offspring into the American food supply is stalled at the Food and Drug Administration, with consumer groups warning of a potential backlash.

So while the government figures out what to do about food, ViaGen has decided to go after a smaller market that needs no federal blessing -- horse cloning. At $150,000 for the first copy of a horse and $90,000 for the second copy, "it is a significant business opportunity," said Mark Walton, president of ViaGen.

Many of the associations that oversee various horse breeds are expected to follow the lead of the Jockey Club and the American Quarter Horse Association in prohibiting clones. That's likely to reduce the value of cloned animals, since neither they nor their offspring could ever be registered as purebred.

But Studbook Zangersheide, a small European association that controls a breed of jumping horses, has decided to register clones. And there's a lot of muttering in the horse world that anti-clone rules may be subject to legal attack as unfair restraints of trade. Nobody has sued yet.

The Humane Society of the United States yesterday condemned ViaGen's move, noting that several scientific panels have said cloning raises serious concerns about animal welfare. In some species, notably cattle, clones have died in the womb or just after birth with dire health problems, though not enough data are available yet to know if that will be true in horses.

"We applaud the Thoroughbred industry and other segments of the horse industry that are shunning this practice," said Wayne Pacelle, chief executive of the Humane Society, in Washington. "The cloning advocates and practitioners are thinking of horses as a commodity. Those on my side of the fence think of horses as individual creatures who deserve respect and humane treatment."

Caspar Willard Weinberger (WSJ)

By James Webb

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0024840

ARLINGTON, Va. -- From the window of my office I can see the flag pole on the main hilltop of historic Fort Myer, where high-ranking officers, including the Army's Chief of Staff, have resided for more than a century. The flag is at half-mast, as it always is when great tragedies occur or when noteworthy Americans have died.

I have written from this office for many years, and the half-masted flag at Fort Myers has become a frequent sight. But this afternoon as I watch the flag flutter in a gentle wind, I am overcome with a sense of nostalgia and regret that surprises me.

"Cap" Weinberger would have liked that, I find myself thinking. But it also would have embarrassed him just a bit. If he had lived to see this tribute, Cap would surely have made some self-deprecating joke -- and then deflected the whole subject onto another deserving individual. Something like, "Well, if you outlive enough of your adversaries the remainder will forget the arguments and lower a flag for you." * * *

For nearly four years during the Reagan administration I had the privilege of working for, and with, Caspar Willard Weinberger, first as an assistant secretary of defense and then as secretary of the Navy. As part of his inner staff that met daily with him, I once calculated that I had walked more than a thousand miles of Pentagon office corridors between my office and his. And in the years after he left the Pentagon, I counted myself among the lucky former subordinates who were able to grab him for lunch every now and then, or correspond on this issue or that, or even, as it turned out, to give him advice on his ever-aspiring writing career.

In this town of inflated egos and ruthless ambition, I have never met a more gracious man. And in a lifetime that, beginning with my father's military service, spans every secretary of defense, I can think of no one who has ever held that office with more competence, intellect and understanding of our country's place in the world.

Memories surround me: of Cap holding court among his inner staff day after day, receiving the morning briefings from his key subordinates, questioning their reports, giving guidance across a broad spectrum of issues with humor and incisive intellect. This was a man -- rare in government circles -- who was not afraid of strong personalities, who encouraged debate, who brought out the creative energies of people with a wide array of backgrounds and policy interests. Unlike so many government leaders who do not want to hear bad news, or who wish only to direct their subordinates from the top, Cap wanted to know, and the country was better off for it.

When Cap Weinberger took office as secretary of defense in 1981 our military was in a truly worrisome state. Its people were burnt out. Our ships, aircraft and weapons systems were depleted, on the verge of obsolescence. Our nation was demoralized by the aftermath of the Vietnam War and the humiliation of the failed attempt to rescue hostages in Iran, and worried sick about the Soviet takeover of Afghanistan. Nearly seven brutally demanding years later, he left behind a modernized, properly deployed military force filled with quality people. He had implemented a strategy that soon thereafter brought an end to the Soviet Union's expansionist regime. And he had put into place a doctrine regarding the use of force that, perhaps unfairly, became more associated in the public's eye with the views of his disciple Colin Powell than of his own.

It is painful for those who knew and respected Cap Weinberger to see his name, even in his obituaries, associated with the Iran-Contra affair, an endeavor that he himself had advised against. But his loyalties were astounding, even legendary among the Reagan inner circle. In the end they defined even his darker moments.

But Cap accepted that, just as he accepted the inevitability that others might shine brighter in the limelight that he himself made possible. One of his favorite quotes in those later years, when he would find the time to meet for lunch, was one he attributed to Ronald Reagan: "You can get a lot done in this town if you don't care who takes credit for it."

Mr. Webb, a former Marine, was secretary of the navy in the Reagan administration. He is now an author, and a Democratic candidate for the U.S. Senate from Virginia.

The States Confront Stem Cells (NYT)

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

Maryland will become the fourth state to authorize the use of state funds to support embryonic stem cell research, now that the governor, a Republican, has pledged to sign a bill approved this week by the legislature, which is controlled by Democrats. Maryland will thus join California, New Jersey and Connecticut in recognizing that the federal government's abdication of support for embryonic stem cell research has effectively shifted the issue to the states.

President Bush has authorized federal funds for research on only a limited number of embryonic stem cell lines, and Congress has been too hamstrung by fights between research advocates and social conservatives to expand support beyond that. No federal money can be used for therapeutic cloning, the most promising area of research. Privately financed research is an option, but the government makes that difficult at sites where other scientists work with federally financed equipment.

Individual states have been chiming in with their own policies, which range from a farsighted determination to finance the restricted research with state money to truly awful decisions to treat scientists as criminals if they dare to do therapeutic cloning. South Dakota bans all research on embryonic stem cells, and a few other states ban therapeutic cloning. Several states, however, authorize state funds for both embryonic stem cell research and therapeutic cloning. California's $3 billion 10-year program, currently stalled by a court challenge, dwarfs New Jersey's and Connecticut's programs. Maryland's small program will use only embryos that would otherwise be discarded by fertility clinics, not embryos generated for therapeutic cloning.

At first many states seemed headed toward restrictive policies, but then the academic and business communities threw their weight behind research that they believe could ultimately lead to new therapies and possibly new companies to exploit the findings. In some places, the result is a mishmash of conflicting approaches. In Wisconsin, where scientists have been pioneers in the development of embryonic stem cell lines, Gov. Jim Doyle, a Democrat, vetoed a bill — passed late last year by the Legislature, which is dominated by Republicans — that would have made therapeutic cloning a criminal offense punishable by up to 10 years in jail. He has instead embarked on a drive to recruit stem cell companies for Wisconsin, with a goal of capturing 10 percent of the stem cell industry by 2015.

This piecemeal state-by-state approach is an absurd way to conduct research that may have extraordinary importance if it pans out. Few residents of states that ban therapeutic cloning will refuse lifesaving therapies developed in other states. So it seems unfair to rely on a handful of states to fill the gaps left by the federal abdication. There is growing sentiment in Congress that the range of stem cell research eligible for federal funds needs to be expanded. We agree, and urge that therapeutic cloning be included in that expansion.

Help The Homeless (WP)

THE MILD WINTER was a blessing for the Washington area's homeless population, which is estimated at more than 15,000. Nonetheless, the growing number of homeless people has strained the capacity of shelters and other social services. And while the problem of homelessness used to be mainly an urban one, concentrated in the District, now it is felt equally in the suburbs, where half of the region's homeless are thought to live.

This year Montgomery County had to open a third temporary trailer to handle the overflow from its permanent shelters; in addition, the county has lodged some 40 homeless families in motels because the shelters had no remaining beds. In Fairfax, a canvass by the county in January found nearly 2,100 homeless people, up 6.5 percent over a similar survey's count a year earlier. At various points in the winter, 60 to 90 homeless families in Fairfax were on the waiting list for beds in county shelters; some families waited up to four months for a spot. And in many instances, a spot in a shelter means only a place to sleep at night -- but neither refuge from the elements nor a hot meal during the day.

Together, Fairfax and Montgomery, neighboring jurisdictions separated by the Potomac, represent one of the largest concentrations of suburban prosperity in the nation. That they are home to 3,000 to 4,000 homeless people is a symptom of a societal failure; more particularly, it reflects the exorbitant price of housing in each county, where a one-bedroom rental apartment averages $1,000 or more a month. Some 2 million people live in Fairfax and Montgomery, but county officials are struggling to retain the relatively small stock of affordable housing in the face of powerful market pressures. As Bob Wyatt, director of the Lamb Center, which runs shelters for the homeless in Fairfax, told The Post's Bill Turque: "Where there is great wealth, there is also insidious, hidden poverty."

In Montgomery, County Council members Steven A. Silverman and George L. Leventhal, both Democrats, have proposed modest measures to increase the available public money for rent subsidies and medical care for homeless people in shelters. That's a positive gesture, but, as Mr. Silverman notes, it's just a first step. It may be impossible to eliminate homelessness altogether, but minimizing it should not be beyond the means of such rich localities. Perhaps a third of the suburban homeless here have jobs. They are making a go of it, and they deserve a greater helping hand from local governments.

Rice Floats The Idea Of U.N. Sanctions On Iran, But China And Russia Reject It (NYT)

By Joel Brinkley

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

BERLIN, March 30 — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, meeting here on Thursday with representatives of the other four permanent members of the United Nations Security Council, raised the idea of imposing unspecified sanctions on Iran, but she received a decidedly cool reaction from China and Russia.

Her proposal came a day after the Security Council approved a statement criticizing the Iranian nuclear program that was a result of heavy compromise. Previously, she had said that sanctions were a possibility but that it was premature to discuss them.

Her proposal was described to reporters in a briefing aboard her plane by a senior State Department official, and she did not comment directly on her proposal during a news conference after the three-and-a-half-hour meeting here on Thursday.

But Dai Bingguo, China's vice minister of foreign affairs, rejected the idea of sanctions and offered a thinly veiled criticism of the war in Iraq when he said: "The Chinese side feels there has already been enough turmoil in the Middle East. We don't need any more turmoil."

The Security Council approved the statement on Wednesday after three weeks of debate. Ms. Rice and her aides praised it on Thursday, even though it was far weaker than the one the United States had originally proposed. It calls on the International Atomic Energy Agency, the nuclear monitoring arm of the United Nations, to report within 30 days on Iran's progress toward curtailing its nuclear development work. The report then goes to the Security Council, giving it an opportunity to respond.

After months of diplomacy, the United States persuaded a majority of the agency's board to report Iran to the Security Council last month.

Ms. Rice noted on Thursday that Russia had wanted to remove the language from the Security Council statement calling for a referral to the Security Council, which would have effectively returned the case to the atomic energy agency. Russia backed down from its demand, under American pressure.

As it is, Russia and China bluntly declared on Thursday that they had no interest in imposing sanctions of any sort or in taking any further action against Iran, though both countries did express concern about the nuclear program. Russian and Chinese officials said they wanted to refer the issue back to the atomic energy agency.

"Russia believes that the sole solution for this problem will be based on the work of the I.A.E.A.," said the Russian foreign minister, Sergey V. Lavrov.

American officials say Iran is unlikely to budge from its confrontational position unless it is offered "in addition to carrots some sticks," the senior official traveling with Ms. Rice said Thursday evening. "Iran needs to know there will be consequences if it continues to hold out."

But the same opposition that forced the United States to accept a weaker Security Council statement than it had wanted seems likely to make it difficult to impose sanctions or other actions against Iran to persuade it to back down.

Iran's foreign minister, Manouchehr Mottaki, speaking at a disarmament conference in Geneva on Thursday, described the Security Council action as "political maneuvering by some Western countries" and "an abuse of international mechanisms."

On her way here Wednesday night, Ms. Rice said the meeting was being held to begin discussions of "the next steps" to be taken against Iran, now that the Security Council statement had been approved. Later, after Russia's and China's public rebukes of the idea of taking further action, the senior administration official, briefing reporters, offered a different goal for the meeting, saying it had been an effort to keep together the coalition of nations opposed to Iran's nuclear program.

The official, who briefed reporters traveling with Ms. Rice under the ground rule that he not be identified by name, said several nations, presumably European countries, had supported the notion of unspecified sanctions after Ms. Rice proposed the idea. He would not name the nations.

Ms. Rice alluded to the sort of sanctions the United States would be likely to propose when, speaking to reporters on her way here, she said the United States and its allies would look at "how a strong message can be sent to the Iranian regime that it's the regime that is isolated, not the Iranian people."

The senior official said Ms. Rice was referring to the idea of imposing travel bans on senior Iranian officials and freezing their foreign bank accounts, as the United States and Europe say they intend to do with regard to Belarus.

Foreign Ministers Push For United Stance On Iran (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

BERLIN -- U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Thursday warned that "the international community is united" in its dispute with Iran over its nuclear program, while German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier said the U.S., Russia, China and Europe remained intent on a diplomatic solution.

The remarks followed a meeting in Berlin among diplomats from the five veto-wielding members of the U.N. Security Council plus Germany over ways to press Iran to stop making enriched uranium, which can be used for weapons. Iran says its program is peaceful.

Ms. Rice said the meeting sends "a very strong signal to Iran that the international community is united." It follows an agreement Wednesday to give Iran 30 days to comply or see the matter taken up by the U.N. Security Council. (See related story.1)

But the comments hinted at the strains in the anti-Iran alliance, with the Chinese saying that "only peaceful means" must be used to push Iran, while the U.S. and Britain used tougher rhetoric.

"The onus is on Iran to show the international community that its program is entirely for civil purposes and for no other," said British Foreign Minister Jack Straw. "We have shown very great patience with Iran. They in turn have miscalculated.

"They thought the international community would be divided on this issue but in fact they have become more and more united," he said.

Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov stressed a peaceful solution and appeared to emphasize the role of the International Atomic Energy Agency ahead of the Security Council. "It is quite clear that all of us have very legitimate concerns in the international community with regard to Iran but we wish to reach a peaceful solution," he said.

"Russia believes the sole solution will be based on the work of the IAEA and we will also be demanding full cooperation of Iran with the IAEA. Only then will it be possible for Iran to make peaceful use of the technology."

On Wednesday, the five permanent Security Council members broke a three-week impasse on Iran and agreed on a statement demanding that Tehran suspend all uranium enrichment.

Diplomats hailed the step as an important breakthrough, but it is unclear what impact the statement will have in Tehran, where the Iranian government insists it will proceed with its nuclear-development plans as a matter of sovereign right.

Concerns over the U.N. standoff with Iran have helped keep oil prices above $60 a barrel in recent weeks. Iran is the second-largest producer in the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries after Saudi Arabia. The U.S.'s Energy Information Administration Tuesday reported that commercial stockpiles of gasoline declined by 5.4 million barrels last week to 216.2 million barrels.

The U.N. statement, which isn't legally binding and falls short of a resolution, expresses "serious concerns" that Iran has failed to comply with a series of steps laid out by the International Atomic Energy Agency to assure that Tehran isn't pursing nuclear weapons. Iran insists its nuclear program is for peaceful purposes, but the statement notes "that the IAEA is unable to conclude that there are no undeclared nuclear materials or activities in Iran."

The statement asks IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei to report to the Security Council in 30 days on Iran's compliance.

The U.N. agreement "demonstrates that the international community is united in its concern over Iran's nuclear program," said U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in a statement. "Iran is more isolated now than ever."

The five permanent members of the Security Council – the U.S., France, Britain, China and Russia – have been locked in negotiations since early this month to craft a joint position on Iran, even one that makes no mention of potential sanctions or other leverage. Each permanent member of the Security Council has powers of veto. Russia and China have staunchly resisted any diplomatic moves that might eventually pave the way to sanctions or military actions, as happened with Iraq. They have also pushed to assure that the IAEA be the main focus of diplomatic action instead of the Security Council.

In a clear nod to those concerns, the statement says that Iranian compliance with all IAEA requests, including the suspension of all nuclear-enrichment activities, "would contribute to a diplomatic, negotiated solution that guarantees Iran's nuclear program is of exclusively peaceful purposes."

Security Council Turns Up Pressure Against Iran (CSM)

By Howard LaFranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON - The United Nations Security Council has given Iran 30 days to offer proof of its commitment not to develop nuclear weapons. With that step under their belt, the United States and Europe in particular now want to avoid seeing Tehran use that month as a cover for advancing further down a road of no return to the bomb.

That desire drove what Western officials called a "strategy session" in Berlin Thursday, where foreign ministers including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice considered the question of how best to keep up international pressure on Iran.

The brief Berlin meeting resulted not so much in a "strategy" but in a reinforced show, after Wednesday's Security Council action, of international opposition to a nuclear-armed Iran.

The "EU 3" of the European Union - Britain, France, and Germany - plus the US, China, and Russia attended the session.

Europeans describe the month-long window before Iran is taken up again by the Security Council as an "opportunity" for Tehran to reverse course on uranium enrichment - a key step in the fuel cycle necessary for building a nuclear weapon - and return to international talks on its program.

But the US, dubious of Iran's intentions, plans to use the month to begin focusing international attention on Iran's role as what Washington considers the world's No. 1 state sponsor of international terrorism, diplomatic sources say.

The ministers would like to see Iran return to negotiations with the EU 3, which - before their collapse last August - were aimed at verifying that any Iranian nuclear program is for energy development only.

But the European powers in particular feel stung by Iran's pattern of using negotiations as cover for continuing clandestine nuclear development.

Iran is showing no signs of bending to the increased international pressure, rejecting the Security Council's call to freeze Iran's uranium enrichment program.

DOJ_NMG_0024844

"It is impossible to go back to suspension," Tehran's representative to the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), Ali Asghar Saltanieh, told the Associated Press Thursday.

The Security Council on Wednesday ended three weeks of often deadlocked talks by approving a statement that asks the IAEA to report to the council within 30 days on Iran's compliance with demands that it suspend uranium enrichment.

The nonbinding statement is considerably weaker than the Europeans, backed by the US, had originally sought: It no longer calls Iran's program "a threat to international peace and security," wording that Russia and China feared would set the stage for eventual sanctions or other forceful action. In addition, the US had wanted to restrict Tehran's margin of maneuverability by demanding the IAEA report to the council within two weeks.

Still, US officials emphasize, the statement demonstrates unified international opposition to Iran's nuclear ambitions. "The international community is united," Secretary Rice said after the Berlin meeting.

The US also maintains that the action on a statement effectively keeps the Iran dossier open in the Security Council, where it wants it.

"We're prepared to be back here on the 31st day, given the Iranian record to date of consistently flouting the IAEA [and] attempting to obscure what they've done," said US Ambassador to the UN John Bolton after the statement's approval.

Speaking to reporters after the Berlin meeting, German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier characterized the month-long window before Iran returns to the Security Council as a time of decision for Tehran. Insisting that Germany and the five permanent members of the Security Council still want a "diplomatic solution" to the dispute, he said Iran has a month to "make a choice between isolation ... or [to] seize the offer to resume negotiations."

Still, the Bush administration, which has recently labeled Iran the biggest single threat to American security, appears intent on raising the Iranian regime's profile as a purveyor of international terrorism.

"They are stepping up their accusations of Tehran as a state sponsor of international terrorism, and they have given us notice that that is what they will be doing," says one Western diplomat in Washington, who spoke condition of anonymity after private meetings with American national security officials.

But as Russian and Chinese resistance to the US position demonstrates, the US is starting on Iran from a position clouded by its prewar accusations against Iraq.

"They have a credibility problem after Iraq and things like the claims of weapons of mass destruction," says the diplomat, "so they have that burden to overcome."

Iran Warned, But Russia, China Dissent On Action (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

BERLIN, March 30 -- Senior diplomats from the five veto-wielding members of the U.N. Security Council and Germany warned Iran on Thursday to halt sensitive nuclear activities and return to the negotiating table, but strains were apparent as Russia and China appeared to rule out sanctions or military action.

One day after the Security Council approved a watered-down statement that gave Iran 30 days to end its uranium enrichment program, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and her counterparts met here for 3 1/2 hours to consider ways to persuade Iran to restrain its nuclear ambitions. "This is a strong signal to Iran that negotiation, not confrontation, should be their course," Rice said.

In Vienna, Iran's chief representative to the International Atomic Energy Agency, Ali Asghar Soltanieh, told the Associated Press that it was "impossible to go back to suspension" and that "this enrichment matter is not reversible."

Rice told reporters traveling with her to Berlin that the meeting would be used to "look ahead to what next steps we might wish to take." She suggested the range of options could include "strong messages," such as travel bans, which would affect the Iranian leadership personally, or measures to thwart Iran's ability to acquire materials needed for a civilian nuclear program.

A senior U.S. official in Rice's entourage said after the meeting that participants had demonstrated "substantial support" for considering the option of "moving toward sanctions." But in public comments afterward, Russian and Chinese officials expressed opposition to sanctions, on grounds they could lead to escalation and confrontation.

"In principle, Russia doesn't believe that sanctions could achieve the purposes of settlement of various issues," Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov said.

"There has already been enough turmoil in the Middle East," said Dai Bingguo, China's vice foreign minister, in a reference to the U.S. invasion of Iraq. "We do not want to see new turmoil being introduced to the region."

The Bush administration has pushed hard to bring the dispute over Iran's nuclear programs to the Security Council. But the resistance by both Russia and China to tougher action underscores the limits of that approach. Officials from both countries said the issue should be handled by the IAEA, the Vienna-based U.N. nuclear watchdog.

DOJ_NMG_0024845

Britain, France and Germany, leading an effort for the European Union, began negotiations with Iran three years ago to try to reach a solution, but the talks failed last year. Russia has also sought a compromise with Iran, but with little success.

It took three weeks of talks among Security Council members to reach agreement on the wording of Wednesday's statement. Russia successfully resisted language that would have called Iran's nuclear activities a threat to peace and security. Iran has said repeatedly that its nuclear program is for civilian energy only.

Lavrov noted that the IAEA has not ruled out a military dimension to Iran's program but neither has it concluded that Iran plans to build weapons with the nuclear fuel it hopes to produce.

"Before we call any situation a threat, we need facts, especially in a region like the Middle East, where so many things are happening," Lavrov said. ". . . So far, they have not been provided."

During the meeting, Rice and European officials sought to give the matter urgency by referring to reports that Iran has had unexpected success in assembling 164 centrifuges into a system known as a cascade, for uranium enrichment. That would be too small to produce enough fuel for a bomb, but Iran previously had worked with just 20 centrifuges. It appears to have completed the project about two months earlier than IAEA technical experts in Vienna had expected.

British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw said no country was trying to deny Iran the ability to produce electricity through nuclear power. "We have shown very great patience with Iran. They in turn have miscalculated" by misleading the IAEA about their program for 18 years, Straw said. "They thought the international community would be divided on this issue, but truthfully, it has become more and more united."

Before the meeting, Rice met with German Chancellor Angela Merkel for an hour. After the gathering, she departed for Paris for talks with French President Jacques Chirac.

Russia, China Oppose Iran Sanctions (KRT)

By Warren P. Strobel

Knight Ridder, March 30, 2006

BERLIN - Russia and China said Thursday that they oppose sanctions and other punitive measures against Iran, spoiling U.S. and European hopes for a display of international unity on efforts to stop Tehran's suspected nuclear weapons program.

Meeting here with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, top diplomats from Britain, China, France, Germany and Russia called on Iran to heed a U.N. Security Council statement issued Wednesday demanding that Iran abandon its efforts to enrich uranium that could be used in nuclear arms.

But if there was agreement on that general goal, there was no agreement apparent on tactics in the weeks ahead.

Both Rice and British Foreign Minister Jack Straw raised the possibility of sanctions during the three-and-a-half-hour meeting.

But Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov said afterwards that Russia saw little value in sanctions. "In principle, Russia doesn't believe that sanctions could achieve the purposes of settlement of various issues," he said.

Lavrov also seemed to question the evidence that Iran is trying to develop nuclear weapons under cover of a civilian atomic energy program. "Before we call any situation a threat, we need facts, especially in a region like the Middle East, where so many things are happening," he said.

"The Chinese side feels that there has already been enough turmoil in the Middle East. We do not want to see new turmoil being introduced to the region," Dai said, using unusually blunt language for a Chinese diplomat.

The Russian and Chinese statements appeared to reflect suspicions, fueled by the U.S. invasion of Iraq, that the Bush administration is trying to lay the groundwork for military strikes against nuclear sites in Iran.

During three weeks of negotiations over this week's statement by the president of the Security Council, Russia successfully fought to remove language saying Iran's nuclear work is a threat to global security.

In Moscow's view, such language could serve as a trigger for sanctions, or even the use of force, under the U.N. Charter. Russia wants the issue dealt with by the International Atomic Energy Agency, not the Security Council.

Rice, briefing reporters on her flight to Berlin, denied this was Washington's intent.

At a press conference, Rice said the meeting "does send a very strong signal to Iran that the international community is united and expects Iran to adhere to (its) just demands."

The Security Council statement calls on Iran to cooperate with IAEA inspectors and cease activities related to uranium enrichment and reprocessing. The IAEA, which monitors compliance with the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, is to report on Iranian compliance in 30 days.

Iran so far has rejected the demands.

DOJ_NMG_0024846

A senior State Department official who briefed reporters only under the condition of anonymity said that if Iran remains intransigent, the "next logical step" would be a U.N. Security Council resolution, which carries more weight than this week's presidential statement.

"The stick would be sanctions, some type of sanctions attached to that," the official said.

Such a resolution could be adopted in May, according to a memo by a senior British diplomat, John Sawers. But to win agreement from Russia and China, he wrote, Europe would have to offer rewards to Iran if it disavows nuclear weapons.

Russian Official Contradicts West On Tehran (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, March 31, 2006

BERLIN -- Russia's top diplomat embarrassed his Western partners yesterday, even as U.S. officials said they had deliberately toned down their remarks about Russia in recent weeks while seeking Moscow's support for U.N. Security Council action on Iran.

Moments after the Western powers insisted to reporters that they were on the same page with Russia and China regarding the Iranian nuclear threat, Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov contradicted them, saying he saw no evidence that Iran's program had a military component or that it posed a threat.

"Before we call any situation a threat, we need facts, especially in a region like the Middle East, where so many things are happening," Mr. Lavrov said after a meeting with his counterparts from the United States, Britain, France, Germany and China.

"We prefer very strongly to base our specific actions on specific facts, and in this particular case the facts could be provided by the [International Atomic Energy Agency]," he said. "So far, they have not been provided."

U.S. officials, who along with their European allies say Iran is pursuing nuclear weapons under the cover of a civilian program, chose not to react publicly to Mr. Lavrov's comments.

But privately, they expressed frustration and even surprise, saying the minister had been much more agreeable during their private talks.

It was the latest in a series of irritants between the United States and Russia, which complained loudly this week that Washington had thrown up new obstacles to Moscow's entry into the World Trade Organization. Late last week, a U.S. report revealed that Russian diplomats had provided sensitive military information to Saddam Hussein during the U.S. invasion of Iraq in 2003.

U.S. officials, who angered Russia earlier this year by questioning its fitness to serve as chairman of the Group of Eight summit this year, have refrained from strong criticism of the help to Saddam.

"It's more important now to have Russia and China" as part of a coalition on Iran than to antagonize them, a senior State Department official said.

"I've been trying not to talk about Russia lately," said another senior official who has been sharply critical of Moscow's energy policies and anti-democratic practices in the past several months.

The Western ministers were not much happier with what they heard at yesterday's press conference from China's vice foreign minister, Dai Bingguo, who attended the meeting instead of his boss.

"The Chinese side feels that there has already been enough turmoil in the Middle East," he said. "We do not want to see new turmoil being introduced to the region, because that would not serve the interests of any party and would only be very detrimental to the interests of the people in Middle East."

Even so, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and her European colleagues said the Security Council is united against Iran, citing a council statement issued in New York late Wednesday that demanded that Tehran stop uranium enrichment and return to negotiations within 30 days.

The statement's initial draft had much tougher language but was watered down at the insistence of Moscow and Beijing.

A senior U.S. official traveling with Miss Rice said sanctions against Iran were discussed formally for the first time in yesterday's meeting, which resulted in a split between the West and the Russia-China duo.

"Russia doesn't believe that sanctions could achieve the purposes of settlement of various issues," Mr. Lavrov said.

Even the IAEA director-general, Mohamed ElBaradei, said yesterday that sanctions are a bad idea.

"We need to lower the pitch," he said. "My message to Iran: The international community is getting impatient, and you need to respond by arming me with information."

Iran Envoy Rejects Security Council Demand (AP-Y2)

By George Jahn

AP2, March 30, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0024847

A top Iranian envoy defiantly rejected a U.N. Security Council demand for a halt in uranium enrichment, saying Thursday that Tehran's activities are "not reversible," despite new calls to reconsider from the United States, its key European allies, Russia and China.

Ali Asghar Soltanieh, Tehran's chief representative to the International Atomic Energy Agency, the U.N. nuclear watchdog, said "it is impossible to go back to suspension.

"This enrichment matter is not reversible," he said in a telephone call from Vienna, Austria.

Iran's defiance cast a pall on a meeting of top officials of the five permanent Security Council members plus Germany meant to demonstrate consensus on confronting Tehran over its nuclear program. After two hours of talks that were twice as long as planned, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the six nations were "united."

But Russia and China suggested otherwise, expressing opposition to strong council action against Tehran after the meeting in comments that reflected the continuing fault-line dividing East and West on Iran.

Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov specifically challenged U.S. assertions that Iran was trying to make nuclear arms, saying no proof existed of such claims.

While symbolizing unity after weeks of tenuous negotiations led to Wednesday's watered-down Security Council statement, a European official who was briefed on the closed talks told The Associated Press that the meeting did not bridge differences that left Russia and China at odds with the United States, France and Britain.

Russia and China remained opposed to the next step called for by Washington, Paris and London — a strong resolution that is legally binding and, at least in theory, is enforceable by military means, according to the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to talk about the closed meeting.

That stance left the Western powers at the Berlin talks unwilling to consider any specific suggestions on a "parallel track" favored by Russia to Security Council action — multilateral negotiations with Iran, including some or all permanent council members and Germany, the official said.

But a U.S. official told the AP that if talks with Iran on Iraq were fruitful, they could be expanded to touch on the nuclear issue.

The Bush administration and Iran have publicly emphasized those talks would focus on Iraq. But the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to talk to the media, said that "if some understanding emerges from those discussions, then the one side or the other might say, 'Let's have some follow-up.'"

The meeting of the foreign ministers, along with a senior Chinese official and Javier Solana, the top EU foreign policy official, came a day after the Security Council agreed on a statement calling on Iran to reimpose its enrichment freeze and cooperate with an IAEA inquiry.

It asked IAEA head Mohamed ElBaradei to report in 30 days on whether those requests were made. But the statement was stripped of tougher language backed by the West in deference to Russia and China.

Iran has used the weeks of wrangling within the council to make progress on its enrichment program — which can be used both to generate fuel or make the core of nuclear weapons. Diplomats familiar with the IAEA investigation say it is close to introducing uranium gas into 164 centrifuges — a test facility that nonetheless would give Iran valuable expertise as it works to develop a full-scale enrichment program.

Warning Iran that the international community is united, both Rice and British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw hinted at escalating Security Council action should Iran disregard the demand that it reimpose a freeze on its uranium enrichment program.

German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier held out hope that Tehran might reconsider, despite the Vienna envoy's statement. "We hope that the declaration by the Iranian ambassador is not the last word offered on this," he said.

Steinmeier said the 30-day time limit gives Iran time to "make a choice between isolation ... or a return to the negotiating table."

"We all very much hope that Iran will seize the offer to resume negotiations and we use this opportunity to once again call on Iran to suspend all enrichment activities and to open up once again the path leading to negotiations," he said.

In Geneva, Iranian Foreign Minister Manoucher Mottaki avoided specifics on the enrichment issue, but appeared to rule out any hope of a negotiated resolution.

"Three years of negotiations have just added to our mistrust," he told the 65-nation Conference on Disarmament, alluding to failed talks with France, Britain and Germany focusing on trying to persuade Tehran to give up enrichment out of fears it would be misused to make nuclear arms. He said there is "no prospect of final agreement."

Seizing on the unity theme touched on by Rice and others, Straw said the Iranians "have miscalculated" in hoping to divide the international community. Instead, he said, "they have become more and more united."

DOJ_NMG_0024848

French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy said all present agreed the council could "use its political" power to enforce demands on Iran.

Still, comments by Lavrov, and Dai Bingguo, a deputy Chinese foreign minister, revealed that opposition by Moscow and Beijing persists to robust Security Council action, as sought by Washington, Paris and London.

"Russia on principle doesn't think sanctions can achieve a settlement" that would lead Iran to compromise on enrichment and other demands backed by the Security Council, Lavrov said.

"Before we call any situation a threat, we need facts ... (and) so far they have not been provided," he said, arguing that there is no evidence that Iran is hiding a nuclear weapons program — as asserted by Washington.

Lavrov's call for moderation was echoed by Dai, who called for a "peaceful solution" and added there was "too much turmoil" in the region.

"This issue is among the most difficult and complicated in today's world, it requires time, persistence and wisdom, and it can only be resolved through peaceful means," he said.

ElBaradei Asks For Restraint In Response To Iran (LAT)

By Jeffrey Fleishman and Alissa J. Rubin

The Los Angeles Times, March 31, 2006

BERLIN -- U.N. Atomic Energy chief Mohammed ElBaradei urged the international community Thursday to steer away from threats of sanctions against Iran to prevent the dispute over the country's nuclear intentions from spiraling out of control.

Meanwhile, ministers of major powers meeting here similarly struck a more conciliatory tone than in recent weeks following agreement on Wednesday by the U.N. Security Council to give Iran another 30 days to respond to requests from the U.N.'s atomic energy organization that it halt uranium enrichment research.

ElBaradei, speaking in Doha, emphasized that Iran is not "an imminent threat" and urged countries to "lower the pitch" in their effort to stop Iran's nuclear work.

In recent weeks the United States and members of the European Union have made increasingly confrontational statements about what they claim is Iran's intent to perfect technology to enrich uranium with the goal of eventually manufacturing a nuclear weapon.

"There is no military solution to this situation," said ElBaradei, Nobel Prize-winning director-general of the U.N.'s International Atomic Energy Agency. "It's inconceivable. The only durable solution is a negotiated solution."

Russia, China and several countries in the Middle East have voiced concern that the U.S. and EU are pursuing similar tactics with Iran as with Iraq a few years ago, creating a sense of crisis that makes it easier to make the case for military action.

On Thursday, comments by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and her counterparts from China, Russia, France, Germany and Britain made clear that despite the Security Council's unity, deep ideological differences remain among the major powers over what the next steps should be. ElBaradei's comments seemed timed to influence them during the crucial month-long period.

Britain, France and the U.S. have said they would be willing to level sanctions on Iran or ultimately use military force if Iran continues to move forward in its effort to perfect uranium enrichment. Russia and China oppose any punitive actions at this point, a position they reiterated at Thursday's meeting, because they fear it would make Iran more confrontational and could lead to further turmoil in the Middle East.

The statement approved by the Security Council essentially buys the United Nations 30 days to figure out what to do if Iran remains defiant. Once the monthlong period ends, ElBaradei is required to issue another report on whether Iran has complied with IAEA requests which include: halting uranium enrichment research, answering questions about its nuclear program and ratifying IAEA regulations allowing U.N. nuclear inspectors more access to Iranian nuclear facilities and to plants where parts are manufactured for its nuclear industry.

Iran insists its nuclear program is purely for peaceful purposes such as civilian energy generation. Uranium enriched to low levels can be used to generate electricity but enriched more intensively it can be used to make nuclear weapons.

On Thursday, Rice took a somewhat more moderate tone toward Iran than in other recent statements.

"This isn't the time to try and come to a conclusion about what the next step is," said Rice, speaking to reporters on the plane on her way to the meeting. "It's an opening discussion about those next steps. ... A lot is going to depend on the Iranian reaction and I would not at this point carve in stone anybody's decisions about what the next steps might be."

German foreign minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier also held out a hand to Iran. "We all very much hope that Iran will seize the opportunity offered to him to resume negotiations. . .If Iran were to enter upon the path of cooperation, then it can rely on us entering those negotiations in a constructive spirit," he said.

Iran's initial response to the Security Council statement was unbending. Iran's ambassador to the IAEA, Aliasghar Soltaniyeh, said Thursday: "We will not, definitely, suspend enrichment."

Iran, under the nuclear non-proliferation treaty, has the right to enrich uranium for peaceful purposes. However, Iran's intentions have come under international scrutiny because it hid its nuclear program for 18 years, in violation of the treaty of which it had long been a signatory. Although Iran is now largely in compliance with the treaty's requirements, the U.N. nuclear inspectors say there are still key questions that Iran needs to answer about its program.

Iran compounded international distrust when it ended nearly two years of negotiations with the European Union over a deal to halt its nuclear work altogether. Then, in January, Iran resumed work on a pilot uranium enrichment facility that it had suspended during the talks with the EU. It has begun enriching tiny quantities of uranium to test its centrifuges.

The IAEA, in its most recent report on Iran, said it could not rule out that Iran had secret nuclear facilities or materials. The vague language underscores the chief problem for policymakers dealing with Iran: key aspects of its program remain opaque.

ElBaradei, in his comments Thursday, pushed the international community to act only on concrete information. He warned against a repeat of the 2003 experience with Iraq when IAEA inspectors did not find nuclear weapons, but were ignored by the United States, which proceeded to use unsubstantiated intelligence to make the case for war. Since then, the IAEA has been proved right that Saddam Hussein did not possess any nuclear capability.

Russia and China, the two permanent Security Council members who are more closely allied to Iran, want the IAEA, not the Security Council, to take the lead. That would diminish the likelihood of a rapid Security Council showdown with threats of sanctions and international humiliation.

Strong Earthquake In Iran Kills At Least 17 (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

TEHRAN, Iran (AP) -- A strong earthquake followed by an even stronger aftershock jolted western Iran early Friday, killing at least 17 and injuring hundreds, state media reported.

The quake had a preliminary magnitude of 5.0 and was centered near Boroujerd and Doroud, two industrial cities in western Iran, the official Islamic Republic News Agency reported.

Hours later, it was followed shortly before dawn by two weaker aftershocks and a third tremor with a magnitude of 6.0, IRNA reported.

Provincial official Ali Barani said the quake flattened several villages. Rescue teams have been sent to the region, 210 miles southwest of Tehran, Barani told IRNA

Seventeen bodies have been pulled out of destroyed houses in Silakhor, a region north of Doroud, state-run radio said, reporting 300 injured. The injured were taken to hospitals in Boroujerd and Doroud.

Doroud governor Nasrollah Rashno told IRNA that the quake has damaged buildings and toppled telephone lines.

People in Doroud ran into the streets in panic when the first quake hit shortly after midnight. Many spent the remainder of the night outside.

"We are afraid to get back home. I spent the night with my family and guests in open space last night," Doroud resident Mahmoud Chaharmiri told The Associated Press by telephone.

Chaharmiri said there were no scenes of destruction in Doroud such as those seen in the past in the wake of similar quakes around Iran.

In February 2005, a 6.4-magnitude quake in southern Iran killed 612 people and injured more than 1,400.

A magnitude 6.6 quake flattened the historic southeastern city of Bam in the same region in December 2003, killing 26,000 people.

Iran is located on seismic fault lines and is prone to earthquakes. On average, it experiences at least one slight earthquake every day.

Bomber Kills 3 Israelis As Hamas Takes Power (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

JERUSALEM, March 30 — A Palestinian suicide bomber, possibly disguised as an observant Jew, blew himself up at a gas station in the West Bank on Thursday evening, turning a car into a fireball and killing three Israelis inside the vehicle, Israeli news reports said.

Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades claimed responsibility for the blast, which came hours after the newly installed Palestinian cabinet, led by Hamas, took up its duties in the Palestinian Authority government offices.

DOJ_NMG_0024850

The new Palestinian interior minister, Said Siam, who is in charge of the police, announced that Palestinian militants would no longer be arrested by the Palestinian security forces.

The bomber apparently used his disguise to approach an Israeli car and ask for a ride, Israeli Army radio reported. He then detonated his explosive next to or inside the vehicle, which was stopped at a gas station outside the entrance to the Jewish settlement of Kedumim, in the northern West Bank, according to the media reports.

Several hours after the blast, the Israeli military confirmed that at least three people had been killed, but said that their identities had not been established. The military said a number of details were sketchy and an investigation was still under way.

Thursday's attack was the first deadly bombing since Dec. 29, when an Islamic Jihad suicide bomber killed an Israeli soldier and two Palestinians at a military checkpoint in the West Bank.

Most Palestinian suicide bombings over the past five years have been inside Israeli cities. But in response to the bombings, Israel has imposed a web of travel restrictions that have made it much more difficult for Palestinian bombers to enter Israel and reach the cities.

Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades identified the bomber as Mahmoud Masharka, 24. The group has carried out many attacks against Israel in recent years. It is linked to the Fatah movement, which dominated Palestinian politics for decades until it was defeated by Hamas, the militant Islamic movement, in parliamentary elections in January.

There has been speculation by political analysts that Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades may try to step up its attacks to show that the group, and by extension Fatah, is still a force to be reckoned with.

Hamas has carried out the largest number of suicide bombings over the past five years, but has largely observed an informal truce for more than a year and has not carried out a suicide bombing or other major attack against Israel during this time.

However, Hamas says it will not lay down its weapons or force other Palestinian factions to do so. Hours before the bombing, Mr. Siam, the interior minister, said his officers would not arrest militants, as had occasionally happened in the past.

"We will not put our sons in prison for political membership or resisting occupation, because occupation is the reason for the problem," Mr. Siam said at his office in Gaza City.

He did, however, suggest that the government might try to persuade the armed factions not to attack. "We will reach an understanding" with the militants, he said. "Resistance is a legitimate right, but how should one resist?"

The Palestinian prime minister, Ismail Haniya, and the rest of his cabinet, which is dominated by Hamas, were sworn in Wednesday and began working at government ministries on Thursday.

In a related development, the so-called quartet of international peace mediators — the United States, the European Union, the United Nations and Russia — issued a statement saying that assistance to the Palestinian Authority is likely to suffer because Hamas has not been willing to recognize Israel, renounce violence and accept previous agreements.

Rice: Palestinian Aid Decision Coming Soon (AP-Y2)

By Anne Gearan

AP2, March 30, 2006

The United States should soon decide how it will give more aid to the Palestinians that would not be diverted to bankroll the Palestinian government led by the militant group Hamas, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said.

The top U.S. diplomat spoke as her newly installed Hamas counterpart accused Washington of crimes against the Muslim world.

Rice, in Europe for talks on Iran's nuclear program, said Thursday that there is international resolve that Tehran must answer suspicions that it wants to build nuclear weapons.

"The international community is united and expects Iran to adhere to the just demands of the international community that its nuclear activities be demonstrably for civilian purposes," Rice said Thursday after meeting with counterparts from the other permanent, veto-holding members of the U.N. Security Council and Germany.

A day after the new Hamas-led Palestinian government was sworn into office, the United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations issued a statement warning Hamas that it must recognize Israel and seek peace talks if it wants to be guaranteed continued aid.

"The Quartet concurred that there inevitably will be an effect on direct assistance to that government and its ministries" if those conditions are not met, the four mediators for Middle East peace said.

"The principle is very clear," Rice told reporters Wednesday evening while flying to Europe. "We're not going to ... provide funding to a Hamas-led government, but we are going to look at what we can do to increase humanitarian assistance to the Palestinian people and what mechanisms we can use to do that, to make certain that the money is not indeed supporting the Hamas-led government."

DOJ_NMG_0024851

Palestinian Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar, sworn in Wednesday, said the Palestinian Authority's new government would not cave to international pressure to change its ways and that it has no plans to negotiate with Israel.

"America is committing big crimes against the Arab and Islamic countries," Zahar told The Associated Press. The decision to cut off aid to a Hamas government "will intensify the gap between the American people, American interests and the Middle East in general."

Since Hamas' parliamentary election victory on Jan. 25, the West has been threatening to cut nearly $1 billion in annual aid to the Palestinian Authority, about half its annual budget.

The United States has nearly completed a wide review of its aid programs for the Palestinians, a review begun after the surprise Hamas victory.

"It is drawing to a close and I would expect to look at some decisions pretty soon," Rice said.

She said the level of future U.S. aid is one question mark, as is the problem of deciding what kinds of projects to fund through nongovernmental organizations or other means and "what kinds of aid might in fact get diverted and so you want to avoid that."

The United States and the European Union list Hamas as a terrorist organization. The United States has said it will have no dealings with Hamas and has already moved to cut off the relatively small amount of aid it had sent directly to the Palestinian government under the previous leadership of the secular Fatah Party.

On confronting Iran, envoys from its allies Russia and China were blunt in saying they want no harsh consequences for Tehran. The U.S. and some other allies want the option of pursuing economic sanctions or other punishments should Iran fail to comply with U.N. Security Council demands issued Wednesday.

"It can only be resolved through peaceful means. The Chinese side feels that there has already been enough turmoil in the Middle East," said Chinese Vice Foreign Minister Dai Bingguo. "We do not want to see new turmoil being introduced to the region."

Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said flatly that Russia opposes sanctions on principle.

Those statements amounted to indirect indictments of the tougher U.S. and European approach, and call into question whether the U.N. Security Council will be able to put muscle behind its rhetoric on Iran.

Meanwhile, Rice, who was spending the next few days in England, had been invited by her British counterpart, Jack Straw, to attend Friday prayers at Masjide Al Hidayah mosque in Blackburn. However, that was canceled after mosque officials said anti-war protesters presented a security threat.

US May Support Unilateral Israel Line (FT)

By Harvey Morris

Financial Times, March 31, 2006

US envoys met Israeli leaders yesterday for the first time since Tuesday's election after Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, indicated Washington did not rule out support for unilateral measures in the West Bank by the next government.

The visit by Elliot Abrams, the White House's Middle East adviser, and David Welch, assistant secretary of state, was scheduled before Tuesday's vote that handed the largest number of parliamentary seats to Ehud Olmert's Kadima party.

They were scheduled to meet Mr Olmert after talks with Tzipi Livni, foreign minister, and Shaul Mofaz, defence minister, on the future of the international "road map" peace plan and the implications of a new Hamas-led government in the Palestinian Authority.

The US sponsored the road map, which envisaged bilateral negotiations leading to the creation of a Palestinian state. During his election campaign, however, Mr Olmert said Israel would unilaterally withdraw to borders of its own choosing if negotiations proved impossible.

Ms Rice, speaking to reporters on a flight to Germany, said: "I wouldn't on the face of it just say absolutely we don't think there's any value in what the Israelis are talking about."

She noted that the US had supported last year's unilateral decision by Israel to withdraw from the Gaza Strip, which was ultimately carried out in co-ordination with the PA.

However, she said the US would not yet lend its support to unilateral moves until it knew more about them.

Washington on Wednesday instructed its officials not to have any contacts with the members of the new Hamas-led government, whether or not they belonged to the Islamic party. Ms Rice nevertheless reinforced the message that the ban did not extend to Mahmoud Abbas, the PA's Fatah president.

DOJ_NMG_0024852

The international quartet of which the US is a member, along with the European Union, United Nations and Russia, noted in a statement in Brussels yesterday that Hamas had failed to heed its demand that it recognise Israel, renounce violence and commit itself to past peace agreements.

"There inevitably will be an effect on direct assistance to that government and its ministries," the statement said.

With just 29 seats in the Knesset, Mr Olmert needs the support of at least 33 parliamentarians from other parties in order to form a majority coalition.

Likud Tries To Regroup After Election Losses (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, March 31, 2006

TEL AVIV -- Israel's right wing found itself searching for a leader and a program yesterday after the shock of Tuesday's elections, in which the long-dominant Likud Party was reduced to one of several minor parliamentary factions.

Calls are being heard for former Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to be replaced as leader of Likud amid charges that he has alienated moderate voters from the nation's most dominant party of the past 30 years.

Rising as a new champion of the right is Avigdor Lieberman, whose party of Russian immigrants, Yisrael Beiteinu, finished with 11 seats to Likud's 12 in the final results, which were announced yesterday.

The centrist Kadima party of Prime Minister Ehud Olmert finished with 29 seats, one more than previously reported.

Although Mr. Olmert will cast the elections as a mandate for his plan to settle Israel's final borders within four years, the larger story for many is the fragmentation of the right triggered by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's decision to unilaterally withdraw from the Gaza Strip and later to leave Likud.

"After Sharon's resignation, the Likud found itself as an extremist right-wing party on two levels -- on the diplomatic level and on the socioeconomic level," said Danny Naveh, one of the few returning Likud legislators, in an interview with Israel Radio.

For the first time in its history, Likud has lost its claim of being the natural home for the Israeli right, which is splintered among Likud, Yisrael Beiteinu and an alliance of smaller settler-dominated parties that took nine seats.

The relative parity has prompted some to call for the three nationalist parties to join forces in a bloc that would control 32 of the 120 seats in the Knesset.

"I hope they will be wise enough to unite, but I don't see it happening," said Shaul Goldstein, a member of the Jewish settler council in the West Bank.

Mr. Goldstein said he thought Mr. Lieberman should become the right's new leader, arguing that Likud represents the "soft right" while the settler alliance isn't connected with the broader Israeli public.

"Each of the right-wing parties is an ideological world unto itself," said Yossi Klein Halevi, a senior fellow at the Shalem Center, a Jerusalem research institute. "It is an illusion today to talk about the Israeli right as one entity."

Mr. Halevi said that both Likud and Mr. Lieberman would support withdrawing from the West Bank under certain circumstances -- something that traditionally would have been unimaginable for a right-wing Israeli party.

"There's only one truly right-wing party left in Israel, and that's the National Union-National Religious Party coalition," he said. The setter party, he added, "electorally isn't worth very much."

Mr. Netanyahu worked during the campaign to win back moderately conservative voters from the Kadima party, opening himself to criticism from the settler alliance, which ran under the slogan "A new right is on the rise." The settlers charged that Likud and Mr. Netanyahu had not done enough to prevent the withdrawal last year from the Gaza Strip.

Israel's Surprise Issue (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

The world expected Israel to have an election on national security, but the voters decided that it was about the economy, stupid.

Tuesday's vote was supposed to be the "big bang" in which the Kadima party, led by Ehud Olmert, the acting prime minister, won a mandate for a new political center built around a unilateral evacuation from large parts of the West Bank.

Kadima -- the word means "forward" in Hebrew -- won a plurality, 29 seats in the 120-member parliament, and Olmert is expected to lead the new government. But the energy in the election was around social and economic issues, and the big winners were a group of parties that ran against Israel's rising social inequality.

The biggest surprise was the sudden emergence of a Pensioners Party that called for higher social benefits for the elderly. Led by Rafi Eitan, who helped in the capture of Nazi war criminal Adolf Eichmann in 1960, the Pensioners went from zero to seven seats.

DOJ_NMG_0024853

The Labor Party, which had far more to say about economic justice than security, won 20 seats. And Shas, an ultra-orthodox religious grouping that ran on restoring some of Israel's old social benefits, won 12. Labor Party leader Amir Peretz sees these 39 seats as a "social bloc" determined to deal with rising poverty and inequality in Israel.

Stanley Greenberg, an American pollster who worked for the Labor Party, noted that outsiders might find it strange that economics trumped security as a voting issue even after Hamas, the party that has strong terrorist ties and rejects the existence of Israel, won the recent Palestinian elections.

"It would be like having al-Qaeda winning the election in Mexico and then having an American election on prescription drugs," Greenberg said in a phone interview from Tel Aviv yesterday.

The power of economics reflected the strength of the backlash against the privatization and deregulation policies pushed by Binyamin Netanyahu, the leader of the right-wing Likud Party who was finance minister earlier in the decade. A Likud loss was inevitable after Prime Minister Ariel Sharon split off from the party to form Kadima once Likud rejected his West Bank pullout plan. Olmert took over Kadima's leadership after Sharon was incapacitated by a stroke.

But Likud's collapse to 12 seats and a fourth-place tie with Shas, Greenberg said, was a sign that reaction against Netanyahu's free-market economic policies "was so strong that Netanyahu couldn't get an audience" on security issues. At one point in the campaign, the former finance minister apologized for the social pain his approach -- widely hailed by free-market economists outside Israel -- had inflicted.

Writing yesterday in Haaretz, journalist Ruth Sinai pointed to rising poverty rates to argue that the election was "above all a victory for the civic, social welfare agenda" and "a clear expression of public disgust for the economic policy championed by the Likud." Greenberg noted that for the first time, "poverty was a word that gained currency in the mainstream political debate."

Paradoxically, domestic social concerns rose to the top of voters' minds precisely because the security situation is frozen. Most Israelis do not see how negotiations are possible with Hamas. The death of grand dreams -- either of a "Greater Israel" that included the West Bank or of a permanent negotiated peace with the Palestinians -- allowed many Israelis to look homeward and seek greater social justice within their own society.

"All politics is local, and this was as much a local election about local concerns as it was a big election about national security concerns," said Douglas Schoen, an American pollster who conducted surveys in Israel. Schoen argues that Olmert, who ran behind expectations, could have won more seats if he had focused more on voters' economic concerns.

Underscoring the local nature of the election, the strong showing of Eitan's Pensioners Party can be attributed in part to the fact that Peretz is the first Sephardic (i.e., non-European) Jew to lead Labor. Eitan's party appears to have picked up votes from pro-Labor European Jews not quite ready to vote for a Sephardic leader. But Peretz's ability to cut into the lower-income segment of the Sephardic vote, once a stronghold for Likud, could mean that more class-oriented politics is in Israel's future.

Voters can cast aside their economic concerns for only so long, even in a nation facing an existential threat. In the one election in a long time in which Israeli voters had a chance to protest economic inequalities, they seized the opportunity.

EU And US In WTO Challenge To China (FT)

By Christopher Swann, Raphael Minder And James Mackintosh

Financial Times, March 31, 2006

The US and the European Union on Thursday joined forces for the first time to challenge China before the World Trade Organisation, sweeping aside diplomatic niceties weeks before a visit of the Chinese president to Washington.

The complaint, accusing China of maintaining illegal trade barriers against imported car parts, is provocatively timed ahead of Hu Jintao's visit.

Rob Portman, US trade representative, indicated that diplomacy would not be allowed to stand in the way of defending American industry. "The timing of these exercises ought not to be dictated by political concerns," he said. "We do not think this is something aggressive but appropriate...The issue has become ripe."

The US has negotiated with China over its curbs for more than a year. Mr Portman said it had given China every opportunity to agree a deal, including 11th hour talks with the Chinese ambassador on the eve of yesterday's announcement.

Both Brussels and Washington said they hoped a solution could still be reached before the WTO began formal settlement proceedings. Thursday's move opens the way for 60 days of consultations with China to see whether the dispute can be resolved. If not, the two plaintiffs will probably ask for the creation of a WTO panel to rule on the issue.

Peter Mandelson, the EU's trade commissioner, said: "It remains my strong preference and intention to seek an amicable solution to this issue."

China has only faced one previous WTO case - brought by the US - over semiconductors. The US administration has been under growing pressure from Congress to take a tougher line. Thursday's action was the latest signal that Washington intends to become more aggressive in using the WTO and other trade tools to open China's market for US exports. The US exported $645m worth of car parts to China last year in a market estimated at $19.1bn.

Max Baucus, a Democratic senator who has introduced legislation to crack down on alleged trade violations by China, welcomed the move Thursday but warned: "We are in a dangerous place in our relationship with China, partly because China does not always play by the rules."

The case aims at regulations intended to encourage Chinese carmakers to use domestic rather than imported car parts. The US and EU claim China is imposing unfair "local content'' rules through a complex tariff system that raises the import tariffs from 10 per cent to 25 per cent if foreign parts make up more than a certain proportion of a car.

The EU has also previously challenged "local content'' rules applied by India, Canada and Indonesia. China, however, has defended this system as a way of preventing carmakers from importing whole cars as spare parts to avoid the higher tariffs on fully constructed vehicles.

U.S., EU File Case At WTO Challenging China's Auto-Parts Tariffs (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration launched legal action aimed at opening China's rapidly growing market to foreign-made auto parts, raising trade friction with Beijing a few weeks before Chinese President Hu Jintao is due to visit the U.S.

Joined by the 25-nation European Union, the U.S. filed a case yesterday at the World Trade Organization in Geneva, lodging complaints over the high import tariffs that China levies on foreign-made car parts. The U.S. contends the tariffs are designed to discourage auto manufacturers in China from using imported parts and are at odds with market-access commitments made by China when the nation was accepted into the WTO in 2001.

In some cases, U.S. officials complain, China assesses tariffs as high as 28% on foreign-made auto parts, under a system that requires vehicle manufacturers in China to report the value and country of origin for component parts. For vehicles with low amounts of imported components, tariffs of only 10% to 14% are applied.

The filing of the case ends months of informal consultations between the U.S. and China on the dispute and marks a new turn in a sometimes rocky economic relationship. U.S. Trade Representative Rob Portman said the "United States has raised this issue repeatedly," but with no success. "As a mature trading partner, China should be held accountable for its actions and be required to live up to its responsibilities," said Mr. Portman.

Mr. Portman said he called China's ambassador to the U.S. on Wednesday and "expressed my disappointment" that the complaints "had not been resolved through dialogue."

A spokesman at the Chinese embassy in Washington had no comment. Chinese officials have long argued that their rules comply with WTO agreements and are designed only to prevent car makers from circumventing their laws by importing whole cars as spare parts to avoid the higher rate that applies to whole cars.

U.S. officials say American companies have only a small slice of China's estimated $19 billion market for auto parts. In 2005, U.S. exports of auto parts to China totaled only $539.82 million, according to the U.S. International Trade Commission. Worldwide, U.S. exports of auto parts totaled $43.38 billion in 2005, the bulk of that going to Canada and Mexico, where the auto industry has built close ties.

Under WTO rules, yesterday's action starts the clock on a 60-day period in which the parties are supposed to convene formal talks to resolve the dispute. If the consultations fail, the case would then move into a second phase in which the U.S. and EU would have the right to pursue action that could ultimately result in penalties -- special tariffs -- being imposed on China.

The filing of the case reflects the get-tough attitude now prevailing in the Bush administration and on Capitol Hill. The U.S. brought its first WTO case against China in 2004, a dispute over the tax treatment of semiconductors that was eventually resolved through negotiations. American readiness to pursue confrontation, rather than extended dialogue, has picked up significantly since then.

Late last year, the administration began using WTO rules to pressure China to better combat piracy of U.S. intellectual property. And earlier this year, the U.S. forced China to back away from special duties that had been imposed on U.S. boxmakers, amid threats of taking the issue to the WTO.

Outside of the WTO, the U.S. last year negotiated a three-year pact with China that sharply limited shipments of Chinese-made apparel into the country. Administration trade officials are considering bringing a case challenging China's export subsidies.

The administration's hardened trade posture reflects pressure brought by U.S. manufacturers and critics on Capitol Hill, who contend last year's $202 billion U.S. trade deficit with China shows that Beijing doesn't play fair in the global trading system.

DOJ_NMG_0024855

Among other things, critics complain Beijing keeps the value of the country's currency artificially low, giving Chinese companies an edge over competitors in the world marketplace. The currency issue remains a major sticking point ahead of Mr. Hu's mid-April visit to Washington.

U.S. Takes Parts Fight With China To WTO (WP)

By Paul Blustein

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

The United States filed a complaint against China at the World Trade Organization yesterday in a dispute about auto parts, the latest sign of trade strains between Washington and Beijing.

The case is only the second brought against China since its entry into the WTO in 2001. The Bush administration filed the other complaint as well, in a spat involving a tax on computer chips. The European Union joined the United States in yesterday's complaint.

"As a mature trading partner, China should be held accountable for its actions and be required to live up to its responsibilities," Rob Portman, the U.S. trade representative, said in a statement.

The move comes amid pressure on the administration from members of Congress to take a tough stance on China's trade practices, especially as the trade deficit with China swelled to $201.6 billion last year, the biggest U.S. gap ever with any country. Beijing's alleged transgressions include allowing rampant piracy of movies and music and keeping the value of the Chinese yuan at an artificially low level, which critics say gives Chinese manufacturers an unfair competitive advantage.

These conflicts are sure to be a source of tension in coming weeks. China's president, Hu Jintao, is scheduled to visit Washington in mid-April, and that trip will be preceded by a meeting April 11 between top-level trade negotiators for both sides.

Portman and his aides have been complaining for some time about China's treatment of imported auto parts. The United States exported $645 million of auto parts to China last year, but the fast-growing Chinese auto parts market is worth about $19 billion, according to Commerce Department estimates. U.S. parts makers could gain considerably greater sales if Beijing did not discriminate against foreign-made parts in favor of Chinese-made parts, U.S. negotiators assert.

The U.S. grievance concerns regulations that are designed to boost the local content of vehicles produced in China -- something that China promised not to do when it entered the WTO, according to Portman. The regulations effectively impose a 28 percent tax on imported auto parts, a rate equal to the duty on imported vehicles, if the finished vehicle fails to meet local content requirements. In the U.S. and E.U. view, that violates another Chinese pledge, to lower its tariffs on auto parts well below tariffs on vehicles. China's standard tariff on auto parts is between 10 and 14 percent.

Portman said he hoped that bringing the case would lead to "speedy resolution of this issue," a sentiment echoed by his European counterpart, Peter Mandelson, who said, "It remains my strong preference and intention to seek an amicable solution."

The case involving computer chips was settled to Washington's satisfaction before it was submitted to a panel of WTO judges. In another case, U.S. officials threatened to bring a WTO case against anti-dumping duties that Beijing imposed on a U.S. paper product, and the Chinese repealed the duties before a complaint was filed.

Under WTO rules, the two sides in a case must try for 60 days to negotiate a solution before bringing the matter before a tribunal, where a resolution can take months. If a tribunal rules that China is violating its WTO commitments, it must either cease the offending conduct or face the prospect of penalties against its exports.

Congressional Democrats, who have regularly accused the administration of failing to enforce trade rules aggressively, gave grudging approval to yesterday's announcement. "I am pleased USTR has filed this case and I trust it will be the first of many in coming months," said Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin (D-Md.), ranking minority member on the House Ways and Means Committee subcommittee on trade.

U.S. And Europe Say Tariff By China Is Discriminatory (NYT)

By Eduardo Porter

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 30 — The heat on China is not letting up. In a rare coordinated move, the United States and the European Union filed a complaint on Thursday with the World Trade Organization, accusing China of imposing discriminatory tariffs on foreign suppliers of auto parts.

The action came 10 days before the beginning of a round of high-level trade talks between the United States and China, and less than three weeks before a visit to Washington by President Hu Jintao of China.

Coming amid heightened concern over China's large and growing trade surpluses, the complaint was seen as part of a broader attempt to address the growing criticism resonating in Washington and Brussels against China's trade policies.

DOJ_NMG_0024856

"We're seeing a closer scrutiny of problems and more diligence in using unfair trade laws to counter perceived problems with trade with China," said Jeffrey J. Schott, a senior fellow at the Institute for International Economics here.

The complaint is only the second brought against China since it joined the trade organization in 2001; the United States filed a complaint in 2004 over China's tax treatment of domestic and imported semiconductors.

Now, according to a statement by the European Commission, China is requiring that when imported parts make up more than 60 percent of the final value of a locally assembled car, the parts will be charged the tariff that applies to whole vehicles, which is much higher. This would force carmakers in China to find local sources for more parts.

Over the last few years, American and European manufacturers have flocked to China, where the car market is already one of the biggest in the world and still growing while other markets have stagnated. Many big parts suppliers have followed the manufacturers there.

Still, American auto parts makers export relatively little to China. According to the office of the United States trade representative, Rob Portman, auto parts exports to China grew by about 6 percent last year, to $645 million — a small part of the overall market, which was $19 billion in 2004. They make up only a tiny slice of American manufactured exports to China, which grew more than 20 percent last year, to $32.5 billion.

While the American auto parts industry supported the complaint, it hardly seemed exultant. "It's important to have the rules right," said Brian Duggan, director of trade and commercial policy at the Motor and Equipment Manufacturers Association. "China is a hugely important current and future market. We want them to proceed with the case."

Indeed, the complaint seemed to have a much bigger symbolic impact beyond the world of auto parts. "This is a wonderful thing," said Franklin J. Vargo, vice president for international economic affairs at the National Association of Manufacturers. "It is the first thing the administration has done to show it really means it when it says we have a new trade policy with China."

The action played well on Capitol Hill, where some Democrats and Republicans have ratcheted up attacks against China and its policy of keeping its currency, the yuan, tightly linked to the dollar. That peg, they argue, gives Chinese products an unfair edge over American rivals and contributes to America's $202 billion bilateral trade deficit.

"I support this action by Ambassador Portman and commend his leadership on securing our rights under our trade agreements," Senator Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa, said in a statement. Two days ago, Mr. Grassley introduced a bill that would require the government to focus more attention on China's currency policies.

Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, who on Tuesday decided to pull back from submitting a bill that would impose steep tariffs on imports from China if the yuan was not allowed to rise, said: "The relationship, in an ironic way, is getting better. Instead of glossing over the problems each side is addressing them directly. In the past things were just swept under the rug."

Consultations are the first phase in a W.T.O. dispute. If no settlement is reached in 60 days, the issue can be referred to a dispute settlement panel.

This will not be the last time the United States complains against China at the W.T.O. It has other potentially bigger complaints. In February, Mr. Portman said that if the Chinese did not take additional steps to protect intellectual property rights, "We are prepared to pursue legal options."

The United States won the 2004 semiconductor case when China agreed to end the preferential tax treatment for domestic manufacturers. If the W.T.O. comes to be perceived as the adequate forum to deal with China's perceived unfair trade practices, disputes might become less heated and more routine.

"The fact that the United States trade representative is doing what the Congress has told him to do helps release some of the steam from the pressure cooker," said Mr. Schott, of the Institute of International Economics.

Amid Tension With U.S., China Faces Protectionist Surge At Home (WSJ)

By Kathy Chen

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

BEIJING -- When Chinese President Hu Jintao visits the U.S. in mid-April, he is sure to field tough questions about Beijing's trade and economic policies amid a wave of rising protectionism. But he also is grappling with a similar backlash at home.

Amid one of the longest and fastest growth streaks of any modern economy, China is wrestling with concerns from a rising wealth gap to corruption to environmental damage. But the latest uproar has turned on foreigners, targeting the many outside investors that have piled into China and prospered -- even while fueling much of the country's growth.

"Since last year, foreign companies have been fiercely buying up Chinese companies, including some core companies," said Li Shuguang, a vice dean at the Chinese University of Politics and Law in Beijing. "Foreign capital is so strong, a lot of Chinese companies have just collapsed."

DOJ_NMG_0024857

The debate parallels the resurgence of protectionist sentiment in the U.S., which has been driven in part by concerns over China's clout. Last year, China's state-owned Cnooc Corp. abandoned a bid for U.S.-based Unocal Corp. amid a political outcry. More recently, U.S. policy makers have complained that China is refusing to allow its currency, the yuan, to appreciate quickly enough, fueling a flood of cheap Chinese exports and aggravating a trade imbalance.

The U.S. reported a 2005 trade deficit with China of $201.62 billion, up more than 20% from 2004. China, which counts trade differently, says it was much narrower. Yesterday, the U.S. and European Union filed a trade case at the World Trade Organization to protest China's import tariffs on foreign-made car parts.

Meanwhile, the debate inside China is causing the government to rethink its approach. In banking, for instance, some economists and state officials argue that the government has sold foreign stakes in its major state-run commercial banks too cheaply. Some negotiations, including an effort led by Citigroup Inc. to take an 85% stake in Guangdong Development Bank, have dragged on for months as regulators fret over the potential fallout of further inroads by foreigners.

Also drawing scrutiny is a $375 million bid by Carlyle Group, a prominent U.S.-based private-equity firm, for an 85% stake in state-run Xugong Group Construction Machinery Co., a big player in China's construction-machinery sector. "People are asking more questions [about the transaction] to ensure there are sufficient measures to protect the interests of local players and protect national brands, which is understandable," said a person close to the deal.

In another case, Hangzhou Advance Gearbox Group Co., a maker of marine jet-propulsion systems that claims 80% of the Chinese and Southeast Asian markets, has said it halted talks with Germany's ZF Group late last year over worries about its motivations. ZF Group, a competitor of Hangzhou Advance, had been in talks for three years for a 70% stake in the Chinese state-owned company.

"We understand that what these foreign companies actually covet is the Chinese market we now occupy," said Xu Jiangang, head of Hangzhou Advance's general affairs office.

Recently, the controversy has spilled into public view. This month, representatives of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference, a national representative body with limited powers, seized on a rumored deal involving Caterpillar Inc. to complain about foreign domination in some sectors and the disappearance of Chinese brands.

Caterpillar refused to comment on that transaction, but a spokesman rejected China's broader concerns, adding that a move by either the U.S. or China to "turn inward...is not a good thing." Among a range of possible deals, Caterpillar has been in talks to strengthen ties to Shanghai Diesel Engine Co.

The concentration of industries in foreign hands has become a common theme. An oft-quoted 2004 report from the State Administration of Industry and Commerce, for instance, notes that Coca-Cola Co. dominates China's domestic soft-drink market and Eastman Kodak Co. holds a 50% share of the film sector.

Meeting with newspaper editors earlier this month, Ma Kai, head of the China's most powerful economic agency, the National Development and Reform Commission, pointedly noted that only 23 U.S. businesses were operating in China in 1980, with combined investment of $120 million. As of last year, he said, there were 49,000, with combined investment of $51 billion. "We should first make clear that the U.S. has benefited from this growth," he said.

Few expect a significant rollback of China's 27-year drive toward a market-driven system. The country has weathered fundamental questioning of the role of economic reforms before, in the 1980s and again in the early 1990s.

But China's latest reform crisis could weaken Mr. Hu's ability -- and his appetite -- to tackle issues of U.S. concern during his visit. He plans to meet with President Bush, and likely will bring some offerings, possibly including a government contract for Microsoft Corp. software. But he is unlikely to deliver much of what Washington wants, such as allowing the yuan to appreciate more sharply.

In some ways, the 63-year-old Mr. Hu faces a more complex situation than his predecessors, as China becomes more like the U.S., with greater tolerance of dissenting views and organized interest groups. Resistance to some market-oriented changes is mostly driven by special interests such as disenfranchised farmers, private businessmen and ministries trying to hold on to their powers. At the national legislature's March meeting, lobbying by interest groups picked up markedly.

Among more than 1,000 bills proposed by delegates were several aimed at restricting foreign access to domestic markets. Wang Tian, a delegate from the southern province of Hunan who heads his own chain store, submitted a "service-trade safeguard bill," which would protect Chinese companies in the retail, financial and services sectors.

"Almost all supermarkets over 10,000 square meters in coastal provinces are dominated by Carrefour, Wal-Mart and Metro, and many remaining [Chinese-owned] ones are in talks with foreign retailers," Mr. Wang said, referring to the French, U.S. and German retail chains, respectively.

Meanwhile, the State-Owned Assets Supervision and Administration Commission, which oversees the country's key state-run companies, and other agencies are working on guidelines to govern mergers and acquisitions of Chinese firms with well-known brands or significant market share. The National Development and Reform Commission says a target for regulation will be foreigners.

"Foreign investment has played an active role in tapping idle state assets, optimizing industrial structure and promoting technological progress, but it has also caused serious problems like over-concentrated market share in some sectors," the commission's spokesman said in a written response to questions.

During the country's last crisis over the economy, in the early 1990s, the leading critics of market changes were other high-ranking officials who believed capitalism was wrong for China. The late Deng Xiaoping, then the paramount leader, stamped out opposition in 1992 on a sweeping tour of southern China, where the free market was thriving.

Like Mr. Deng, Mr. Hu and Premier Wen Jiabao have asked China to support reforms. At a news conference after the legislature's March meeting, Mr. Wen made a rare televised appeal. "We must consistently and unwaveringly press ahead on the road of reform," he said. "To backpedal offers no way out."

At the same time, there are some signs of government indecision. Last year, when securities regulators proposed freezing foreign applications to set up joint-venture securities companies, the State Council, or cabinet, solicited the opinions of other agencies. But when the agencies disagreed, it failed to make a ruling, effectively allowing securities regulators to implement the freeze last December, according to one former official.

In some cases, lobbyists are using the media to win attention from China's government. Lu Yansun, a former deputy minister of the now-defunct Ministry of Machine-Building Industry, was enraged to read a short newspaper article on the fate of state-run Xibei Bearing Co.'s profitable train bearings business. Xibei used to have a 25% share of China's train bearings market and its own "NXZ" brand, but it effectively disappeared from the sector after that business was sold to German bearings manufacturer INA-Holding Schaeffler KG in 2003.

Mr. Lu suggested that China Industry News, a paper affiliated with the semi-official China Machinery Industry Federation, investigate. The result was a series charging that foreign investors -- including Caterpillar and the U.S. agriculture and forestry-equipment maker Deere & Co. -- have taken over key companies in the capital-goods sector, only to wipe out their brands and seize market share.

Mr. Lu and He Guangyuan, a former machinery industry minister, also wrote a letter to the State Council. Mr. Lu said several top leaders responded that a "set of administration rules...should be established."

In February, the council unveiled a number of policies to support the sector, including a rule that domestically made equipment should account for 60% of total equipment purchases for key projects funded by central and local governments. Vice Premier Zeng Peiyan this month said the cabinet will issue a set of preferential policies to rejuvenate the sector, reflecting "national will," according to the official Xinhua News Agency.

Benedict's Chinese Flock (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

It may not be Easter yet, but the Vatican is working hard on an earthly resurrection of its own: the restoration of ties with China. But there is a catch. Beijing insists that the Holy See drop its recognition of Taiwan in exchange for the right to minister to the mainland faithful.

Many a pontiff has dreamt of giving China's Roman Catholics greater contact with Rome. Pope Paul VI took the quietly-quietly approach, choosing not to denounce communism in his Vatican II encyclical. His was the last visit to "China" by a pontiff -- a three-hour Hong Kong stopover in 1970. Well-traveled Pope John Paul II never got that far, as Beijing denied him a visit.

China's violent repression of religion and its forced-abortion policies don't sit easily with the Roman Catholic faith. But this week, Pope Benedict XVI declared that he "will come" to China. The Vatican's foreign minister, Archbishop Giovanni Lajolo, added that "the time is ripe" for reconciliation. Hong Kong's newly crowned cardinal, Joseph Zen, suggested yesterday that the Vatican sever its official relationship with Taiwan. "There are a lot more people to be taken care of in China," he said.

China agrees, with the usual strings attached. Beijing insisted yesterday that the Holy See sever diplomatic ties with Taiwan and agree not to intervene in China's domestic matters, including the appointment of clergy.

This is an old game. Witness China's success in blocking Taipei's applications to the U.N. and World Health Organization. But it's particularly odious for China to play that card on spiritual matters. And it shows how frightened Beijing's Communists are of relinquishing their perceived control of the people's hearts and souls -- even if affections were lost long ago.

The Vatican is the only European government that still holds an official diplomatic relationship with Taiwan. It will be tempting for Pope Benedict to trade recognition for access to China's 12 million Catholics. The moral aspects of such a bargain are not as clear-cut as they might seem at first, particularly if a relationship with Beijing might enable the Vatican to swing more weight in defending religious and civil rights on the mainland.

Nonetheless, the Vatican would be well-advised to demand some serious concessions in return. China boasts an "official" Catholic Church of around five million, whose priests pledge fealty to the Communist Party as a condition of serving their congregations. The unofficial "underground" church that is repressed and recognizes the pope is likely much larger.

Both sides might do well to agree to a Vietnam-like compromise. In Vietnam the Holy See is recognized, but must consult with the Communist government before naming new clergy. While that offends Catholic purists, it's given Vietnam's Communist Party a better image; the Church, a new flock; and the people of Vietnam, a moral purpose the party can't provide.

It's important not to forget how brutal Beijing has been to people who dare to promote religious freedom. One recent victim is Hao Wu, a 34-year-old Chinese filmmaker making a movie about underground Christian congregations. He was arrested in February without explanation and hasn't been heard from since. Since we're on the subject of religion, he might take comfort from the Book of Matthew: "Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven."

US Military Ends Quake Aid (CSM)

By David Montero

The Christian Science Monitor, March 31, 2006

ISLAMABAD, PAKISTAN - The next chapter of Abdul Qaduz's earthquake recovery began rather silently, without fuss or fanfare. Within moments his family pulled down their tent, where five had huddled at night for months, and promptly put it in the back of a truck, along with chairs and mattresses, cooking pots, and electrical wires. The aging father says he will repitch his tent on a patch of ground when he returns home. Only its outline remained pressed in the dirt, surrounded by cans of vegetable oil marked "USA" in large letters.

Thousands of families like those of Mr. Qaduz are expected to return to their native villages by Friday, inaugurating the next phase of the earthquake rehabilitation. Also heading home are US military personnel involved in helping those families get back on their feet. Friday marks the official end of the US humanitarian operation that began within 48 hours of the earthquake.

In the last six months, some 1,200 US military personnel and a fleet of 24 helicopters have delivered over 15,000 tons of humanitarian aid, in what has been called the largest disaster relief operation in US military history.

The "angels of mercy," as US helicopters have been called, have delivered not only aid but much needed goodwill in Pakistan, softening an otherwise rocky relationship with the United States. Polling in recent months has shown a marked improvement for the US image among the Pakistani public as a result of the American helping hand.

Mr. Qaduz and other survivors say the generosity from the US soldiers and relief workers will never be forgotten. "They have helped us a lot. It should be written in history," he says, his brothers nodding their heads in agreement.

But some analysts caution that the US must sustain its commitment to reconstruction if larger criticisms against its foreign policies are to be minimized.

"While on the one side, the relations between the US and Pakistan should improve, on the other hand much more has to be done to continue the goodwill built through earthquake relief," says Lt. Gen. Kamal Matinuddin (ret.), a political analyst in Islamabad. "Otherwise it will wither away."

The government's March 31 deadline is timed partly to the passing of winter into spring. As warming temperatures clear snow from the highland communities devastated by the October quake, thousands of tents that once crowded the lower hills and open plains have been rolled up. Hundreds of families are making the trek back home, some happy to be returning, others worried that they will not find the medical and relief services they have come to rely on for so many bitter months.

The US military presence helped make those services possible. At an official farewell ceremony Thursday at an airport outside Islamabad, there were words of thanks and bittersweet goodbyes from both sides.

"It is very hard to say goodbye to our friends in Pakistan," said a visibly moved Rear Adm. Michael LeFever, commander of the US Disaster Assistance Center in Pakistan. "But we are excited about the reconstruction and rehabilitation under way by the USAID and the Pakistani government."

Admiral LeFever and US Ambassador to Pakistan Ryan Crocker underscored the enduring US commitment to helping rebuild. "The effort goes forward. This is a transitional period, not a culmination period," Ambassador Crocker said, backdropped by a Chinook helicopter. "We are deeply involved with the Pakistani government."

The extent of that involvement includes more than $500 million for reconstruction, in addition to $1.5 billion in assistance for education, health-care, governance, and economic growth.

The need for such assistance is especially clear in the remains of relief camps, where doubt hangs heavily over those returning home. Qaduz, from the village of Nuri, is one of those reluctant to leave Balakot, his makeshift home now for several months. "Our property is destroyed, but we are compelled by the government to return to our village," he says. "We're not happy because there is no system there. There are no road links, no schools, no health facilities."

DOJ_NMG_0024860

Intermingled with the hints of frustration and doubt, there is also an abiding sense of gratitude for the US help. Such was the opinion of Mustak Aman, busy taking down his own tent in Balakot. "We feel a lot of care for the Americans because they helped us more than the other countries," he says.

It is a newfound sense of understanding shared on both sides. US Marine Malcolm Chaney, from Atlanta, wasn't sure what to expect in Pakistan, but he says he'll leave with a better appreciation for its people. "One day we sat down with some Pakistan officials and their imam," he says. "We had a discussion about our religions, and the imam basically said what I was thinking - that basically we're all the same."

Some analysts say the earthquake helps to underscore how much more work needs to be done to mend relations. "[The rescue operation] has had a positive outcome, not only among the governments, but among the people. But there are other negative fallouts that clouded the impact of this relationship," says Lt. Gen. Talat Masood (ret.), referring to such incidents as the CIA missile strike in Bajaur Agency that killed 13 civilians.

Others agree, saying the quake relief cannot completely mitigate the anger many Pakistanis feel toward the US because of its wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. "That is a separate issue and people will continue to criticize America," says General Matinuddin. But he says that a deep and long-term US role in reconstruction is still critical. "It will minimize the feeling against America. At least the government will have a handle to tell the public, 'Look, America is doing this, this, and this.' "

India's Training Of Iranian Military Could Dampen Nuclear Deal: US Lawmaker (AFP-Y2)

AFP, March 30, 2006

India's alleged training of Iranian troops could dampen vital US Congress support for a bilateral landmark civilian nuclear deal, a ranking Democrat warned Thursday.

Tom Lantos, the top Democrat on the House of Representatives' powerful international relations committee scrutinizing the nuclear deal, expressed concern to visiting Indian Foreign Secretary Shyam Saran during talks here over New Delhi's training of the Iranian navy, the lawmaker's spokeswoman Lynne Weil told AFP.

"Congressman Lantos pointed out that episodes of conflict in relations between US and India, such as India's early wavering in its commitment to refer Iran to the UN Security Council and more recent concerns raised about Iranian troops receiving training from India will only undermine Congressional support for the deal," she said.

Reacting to the concerns, the Indian government said two Iranian naval ships with about 200 personnel were on a six-day "informal" visit to the southern Indian naval base in Kochi in March while on an annual sea training sortie in the Arabian Sea.

The port call was essentially "diplomatic-goodwill" and not part of any training package, said Venu Rajamony, spokesman for the Indian embassy in Washington.

He said the Iranian ships "interacted" with the Indian Navy as part of the visit, adding that activities included courtesy calls on Indian naval officers, navigational simulation and recreational activities such as yachting.

Washington is trying to rein in Iran's uranium enrichment activities amid suspicion that Tehran could be pursuing covert development of nuclear weapons.

On Wednesday, the UN Security Council in New York unanimously voted to give Iran 30 days to fall into line with long-running calls to abandon uranium enrichment.

India is treading a tightrope as it tries to firm up a civilian nuclear deal with the United States and maintain its traditionally strong ties with neighbour Iran.

In February, India voted with 26 other nations to refer Iran to the UN Security Council amid charges by communists within the ruling Indian coalition that New Delhi's foreign policy was being dictated by Washington.

Lantos and Saran on Thursday discussed the US-Indian nuclear agreement in the larger context of bilateral relations "which they agreed are blossoming in many respects," Weil said.

But Lantos noted that "at a time when gestures from allies are significant -- not symbolic gestures alone but substantive gestures -- the Indian government should look for opportunities to make gestures that underscore the strength of the bilateral friendship," she said.

The India-US nuclear deal gives energy-starved India access to long-denied civilian nuclear technology in return for placing a majority of its nuclear reactors under international inspection.

For it to be effective, the US Congress has to amend the US Atomic Energy Act, which currently prohibits nuclear sales to countries that are not signatories of the Proliferation Treaty (NPT).

India has refused to sign the NPT and has developed nuclear weapons on its own.

Indian Official Defends Deal With U.S. (AP-Y2)

By Foster Klug

DOJ_NMG_0024861

AP2, March 30, 2006

A landmark civilian nuclear cooperation deal with the United States would not boost India's nuclear weapons arsenal, India's foreign secretary said Thursday.

In often strong words, Foreign Secretary Shyam Saran attacked the criticism that has surrounded a pact critics say would weaken efforts to stop the spread of nuclear weapons. He told an audience at the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank, that India's record on nuclear issues has long been one of restraint and responsibility.

"India cannot be a partner and a target at the same time," Saran said.

"There is no reason," he said, "why it should be expected that merely because we have an agreement on civilian nuclear cooperation, that suddenly the floodgates will be opened by India for a larger and larger nuclear weapons arsenal."

Saran's trip comes as officials from both countries try to persuade a skeptical Congress to embrace an accord announced during President Bush's trip to India earlier this month.

Congress is considering a bill that would exempt India from U.S. laws that restrict trade with countries that have not submitted to full nuclear inspections. New Delhi has refused to sign the international Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and accept its inspection regime.

Bush is hoping to push the measure through a Republican-controlled Congress in an election year when lawmakers have rebelled against him on several issues, including the recently abandoned deal to have an Arab company based in Dubai run terminals at some U.S. ports.

Saran, who was also meeting with U.S. lawmakers, linked the nuclear pact with India's future as a powerful nation on the world stage. India is eager for sources of energy to fuel a booming economy.

If India is expected to play a greater role in fighting weapons proliferation and terrorism, Saran said, "then it is only reasonable that the energy requirements of a country with such strong credentials is recognized."

Supporters say the nuclear pact would bring India into the nonproliferation mainstream by increasing international inspections of some of its nuclear sites.

U.S.-Indian Nuclear Deal No Shoo-In (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration's proposed nuclear deal with India is meeting with a chilly reception from lawmakers, who are predicting that instead of swift approval, the initiative faces revisions and delays, if not outright rejection.

The White House had hoped to win congressional approval by the end of May for the deal, which would open the way for cooperation on India's civil nuclear program, and is also designed to begin a new strategic relationship between the United States and a populous, economically vibrant democracy.

But the initiative has found few high-profile champions on Capitol Hill or elsewhere, while becoming a target for criticism from the right and left that it could further undermine international efforts to stem the spread of nuclear weapons.

Since the deal was announced March 2, key lawmakers such as Sen. Richard G. Lugar (R-Ind.), chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and Rep. Henry J. Hyde (R-Ill.), chairman of the House International Relations Committee, have remained carefully neutral.

Meanwhile, Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-El Cajon), chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, said this month that the president "is trying to ride a nuclear tiger…. I'm skeptical."

Former Sen. Sam Nunn (D-Ga.), a respected voice on security issues, also has voiced concerns and urged lawmakers to remain skeptical.

"It may be going too far to say there's panic within the administration, but I think there's deep concern that it hasn't been received nearly as well as hoped," said a Republican House staff member, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the political sensitivity. "They're trying to create the impression of momentum. Frankly, I don't think it's there."

The legislation before Congress would lift rules barring the U.S. government from providing nuclear technology to countries such as India that have declined to sign the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty. In return for such help, India would agree to allow international inspections of its civilian reactors, though its military weapons program would remain unmonitored.

President Bush contends that by selling nuclear reactors to India, the program would ease competition for oil, help the environment and provide important new U.S. commercial ties. Administration officials also want to foster a better relationship with India because they believe it can be a strategic counterweight to China.

To provide India with nuclear knowledge, the United States must also win approval from a group of nations, known as the Nuclear Suppliers Group, that controls the international nuclear trade. But in a meeting last weekend, the India proposal drew questions from representatives of many of the countries, and the administration failed to win permission to put the deal on the agenda for the group's May meeting, as it had hoped to do.

Administration officials, who have been intensively lobbying Congress this month, have said that attempts to add conditions to the agreement could destroy a carefully crafted deal. R. Nicholas Burns, undersecretary of State for political affairs, said in an appearance this week before the Council on Foreign Relations that the administration could accept conditions that would improve the deal "as long as they don't require us to go back and break the agreement, reopen negotiations."

But legislators say they're likely to add conditions anyway. Indian Foreign Secretary Shyam Saran, in Washington this week to meet with lawmakers, seemed to accept that some changes were likely. In a speech to the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank, Saran said New Delhi could accept revisions as long as they did not upset the "delicate balance" of the proposal.

Although it is not yet clear what kind of amendments Congress might seek, it could demand assurances that India would vigorously enforce its export controls on nuclear technology, or press to require New Delhi to put any new fast-breeder reactors, which produce material for bombs, under international monitoring. Congress also might try to insist that India halt production of nuclear materials, as the United States and other leading atomic powers have done.

But India, which is building a nuclear arsenal in part as protection against China, has signaled that an attempt to impose such limits "would be a deal breaker," said the Republican staff member.

If Congress doesn't act before the summer recess, the administration could face a tougher challenge because of the difficulty of pushing through such a controversial agreement just before a midterm congressional election. Then the deal, which aides consider one of the most important accomplishments of the Bush presidency, could be put on hold until next year.

One State Department official, speaking on condition of anonymity in keeping with agency rules, insisted that the administration was finding support for the deal on Capitol Hill and from countries such as Britain, Russia, France and Australia.

"But we realize we have some questions to address," he said.

Indians Crack Down On Gender Abortions (CSM)

By Scott Baldauf

The Christian Science Monitor, March 31, 2006

NEW DELHI - In October 2001, when Dr. Anil Sabhani told a pregnant patient that she had a "female fetus and it would be taken care of," he wasn't talking about prenatal nutrition or health checks. He was talking about abortion.

With his conviction on Tuesday, Dr. Sabhani now faces two years in jail in the first-ever conviction under a 12-year old Indian law that forbids doctors from revealing the gender of a fetus to its parents. The law was aimed at preventing the all-too-common and growing practice of sex-determined abortions, which have left India with far more boys than girls.

Women's rights activists welcomed the convictions, but added that it will take more than a few high- profile trials to change India's centuries-old cultural preference for boys.

"This is 5,000 years of culture we're fighting against, but in the past decade, because of this [ultrasound] technique, and these unethical practices by medical professionals, the situation for girl children has gotten much worse," says Varsha Deshpande, an attorney for the Dalit Mahila Vikas Mandal, a Maharashtra-based advocacy group for underprivileged women. A question of culture

Ms. Deshpande's group has also conducted sting operations at ultrasound clinics in the prosperous farm belt of central Maharashtra, and has helped to file 16 criminal cases against doctors accused of sex-determination. "Culture is a difficult thing to change, it can take generations, but if we control this technique, these machines, then it will send a signal to these doctors that this will not be tolerated."

All told, there are dozens of cases pending in state courts around the country, but even activists agree that they are fighting an uphill battle. Economic pressures and cultural traditions encourage families to have boys, mostly to keep land and property in the family. Girls are often seen as a drain on family wealth, since the girl's family is required by centuries of tradition to provide a dowry to her husband's family when she marries.

Today, the illegal practice of sex-determination has brought girl-to-boy ratios to their lowest levels in recorded history, raising significant social problems for the future.

"If you find a government and a district medical officer and police officials who are all serious about the law, then you can make a difference," says Sabu George, a researcher for the Center for Women's Development Studies in New Delhi. "But that is very rare."

The conviction of Saghani follows a controversial study, published in early January in the British medical journal, The Lancet. The study claimed that up to 5 million girls were aborted since the practice of sex-determination was banned in 1994.

Ultrasound equipment is found in every district of the country, but in the areas where ultrasound clinics are in highest concentration, particularly wealthy farming districts in Punjab, Haryana, Gujarat, and in the capital city of New Delhi, the ratios of girls to boys are at their lowest. The ban notwithstanding, the number of girls per thousand boys aged 0 to 6 in the state of Punjab has dropped from 875 in 1991 down to 793 in 2001, according to 2001 Census figures. In Haryana, there were 879 girls for every thousand boys in 1991 and 820 in 2001. Pregnant women turned crimefighters

The conviction in Haryana sprung from a frustrated doctor called Rekha Mishra, who teamed up with activists to conduct a sting operation on doctors in nearby ultrasound clinics.

Pregnant women were sent into the clinics, with audio and sometimes video equipment, to record their conversations with clinic doctors. In 12 cases, doctors, including Dr. Sabhani, offered to abort female fetuses. In Haryana, 11 of those criminal cases are still pending.

"It was very difficult to get pregnant ladies persuaded to do this, and you are not conducting a case against just one person, you are getting psychological pressure, your own family is saying, 'Nobody else is doing this. Why are you doing it?'" says Dr. Mishra, a private doctor from Faridabad, south of New Delhi. "But if I get support from the authorities, and a letter authorizing me to do this, we can do this all over the country."

"We can't eliminate this practice," she adds. "But we can at least stop it to some extent."

Activists like Deshpande and George call the practice "genocide," and India's medical community has promised to do what it can to prevent the practice. But Vinay Agarwal, president of the Indian Medical Association, says that lasting change can only come through broad-based community education.

"The medical profession is doing all it can though we have to address this as a social evil," Dr. Agarwal, president of the Indian Medical Association, told the BBC. "People should be proud to have a girl child."

Sierra Leone Asks To Move Liberian's Trial (NYT)

By Lydia Polgreen And Marlise Simons

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

FREETOWN, Sierra Leone, March 30 — The government of Sierra Leone asked the International Criminal Court in the Netherlands to provide a venue for the trial of Charles G. Taylor, the former president of Liberia who was arrested Wednesday on longstanding war crimes charges, officials in the Netherlands said.

Mr. Taylor has many loyalists in the region, so his presence is a potential threat to the fragile peace that exists here and in Liberia. Secret talks between the Special Court for Sierra Leone and the Dutch government about transferring Mr. Taylor to The Hague began several weeks ago.

But on Wednesday, after Mr. Taylor's arrest, the Dutch government received a formal request from the special court for permission to hold the trial on Dutch soil, said Dirk-Jan Vermeij, a spokesman for the Dutch Foreign Ministry. He said the request involved the use of a courtroom at the newly created International Criminal Court and space in a Dutch jail. A Dutch diplomat said the United Nations Security Council would have to pass a resolution to create a trial chamber in The Hague that would serve as an extension of the Sierra Leone court and use that court's rules.

Other conditions are under discussion between the court and the Dutch government, including a guarantee that at the end of the trial Mr. Taylor will leave the Netherlands. "The court is asking only for physical facilities, the use of a courtroom and a cell," Mr. Vermeij said.

If the plan goes ahead, Mr. Taylor will probably be held at a Dutch high-security prison complex in The Hague where the International Criminal Court has leased 12 cells but is using only one.

The plan to move the trial of Mr. Taylor, one of Africa's most notorious warlords, to Europe underscored the deep ambivalence that many people here have toward the United Nations-backed court set up here to try defendants accused of atrocities in Sierra Leone's brutal civil war.

"The ordinary man sees this court as something from the outside that has little meaning to his life," said Charlie Hughes, director of the Forum for Democratic Initiatives, a nonprofit organization in Freetown. "Most people see the court as an expensive waste that won't really change the country in terms of poverty and other serious problems."

Indeed, Mr. Taylor may have been the most wanted fugitive in Africa, but for the moment no one on the continent seems keen on holding him. Ever since Liberia asked Nigeria to turn him over for prosecution by the special court this month, a fierce and sometimes desperate diplomatic battle has been waged over what precisely should be done with him. And with Thursday's announcement by Dutch officials, it appeared that Mr. Taylor's three-year odyssey had not yet ended.

It began in March 2003, when Mr. Taylor was still president of Liberia, with an indictment on charges that he backed and traded diamonds with Sierra Leone's ruthless rebel movement, whose signature tactic was the hacking off of civilians' arms and legs. But when he went into exile in Nigeria later that year, Nigeria promised not to turn him over to the court unless an elected Liberian government requested it.

When Liberia's new president, Ellen Johnson Sirleaf, asked for Mr. Taylor to be turned over this month, she made it clear that she did not want him on Liberian soil, declaring that there were no charges pending against him there. Nigerian officials repeatedly insisted that Mr. Taylor was not a prisoner in their country and that it was Liberia's responsibility to collect him. Sierra Leone, where Mr. Taylor was under indictment, quietly stood by and waited, hardly clamoring to get the man who caused so much misery here.

Solomon Berewa, Sierra Leone's vice president, said in an interview here that it would be better to hold the trial somewhere else to spare the nation a long revisiting of the horrors of the decade-long war, which killed 50,000 people, left thousands without arms or legs and displaced much of the population.

"We don't want to be reminded of those atrocities every day," Mr. Berewa said. "We want to put it behind us and move forward."

The International Criminal Court, which is independent from the United Nations, would have no mandate to try Mr. Taylor because its jurisdiction began on July 1, 2002, while Mr. Taylor's charges date from the 1990's. The court, which is building new headquarters, at present has one courtroom available. The trial of the first suspect in its custody, Thomas Lubanga, a former Congolese warlord, is not expected to begin until later this year.

Mr. Vermeij, the Dutch government spokesman, said that the court in Sierra Leone had asked for Mr. Taylor's transfer to The Hague, citing security concerns. "There is a fear that a trial in Sierra Leone could lead to instability and pose a threat to peace," he said.

Liberian President Backs Bid To Move Taylor Trial To Hague (WP)

By Craig Timberg

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

MONROVIA, Liberia, March 30 -- President Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf said Thursday that she supported a bid to move the war crimes trial of former Liberian president Charles Taylor from neighboring Sierra Leone to The Hague and that Taylor's dignity and rights must be guaranteed as the case advanced.

"In any proceedings, the United Nations must allow Mr. Taylor to maintain his dignity and a vigorous self-defense that is consistent with the principle that a person is innocent until proven guilty," Johnson-Sirleaf said in a televised address, her first to the country since Taylor was arrested Wednesday.

The U.N.-backed special court in Sierra Leone, where Taylor faces an 11-count indictment for his role in that country's civil war, requested that the trial be conducted on the premises of the International Criminal Court in the Netherlands. The Sierra Leone court would retain jurisdiction over the case.

The court's president, Justice A. Raja N. Fernando, cited concerns about stability in the region in the request.

The British government is preparing a U.N. Security Council draft resolution that would formally authorize the court in Sierra Leone to try Taylor in The Hague. Britain is waiting for a "green light" from the Dutch government before presenting the draft to the 15-nation council, according to a council diplomat.

The special court has the authority to conduct trials outside Sierra Leone, but the Dutch government has requested that the Security Council explicitly approve the transfer. It is also seeking to persuade another country to grant Taylor asylum should he ultimately be acquitted.

Taylor's first court appearance in Sierra Leone is expected next week. He is accused of mass murder, rape and mutilation, including support for a rebel movement in Sierra Leone that killed thousands and frequently amputated the limbs of its victims. Taylor, 58, is also accused of destabilizing Liberia and several neighboring countries while amassing a fortune from illicit trade in diamonds, guns and timber.

Taylor had dominated Liberian politics since 1989, when he launched a rebel movement. More than a decade of fighting left 200,000 people dead and the country in ruins. He was elected president in 1997, but resigned under international pressure in 2003 and began an exile in Nigeria.

Taylor disappeared Tuesday from a guarded government compound in southeastern Nigeria, days after President Olusegun Obasanjo announced that he would hand him over to the Liberian government. Taylor was captured Wednesday at a border post near Cameroon.

That day, Nigerian officials flew him to Monrovia, where he was arrested by U.N. forces. He was then transferred by helicopter to Freetown, the capital of Sierra Leone, and jailed.

Many Liberians expressed relief Thursday that Taylor had finally been arrested.

DOJ_NMG_0024865

"I feel very good," said Wilson Doe, 34, a former soldier in Taylor's militia, who was working on a road project in Monrovia. "He's not a good man."

The sentiment was evident in the newspaper coverage here. The Informer ran a grainy image of Taylor on its front page and declared: "Taylor Falls Finally."

Liberians unable to afford the 35-cent newspaper could, for half the price, buy photocopied pictures of Taylor appearing dour in a bulletproof vest and handcuffs shortly after his arrest at Roberts International Airport in the capital.

Yet many Liberians said they were troubled by Taylor's arrest by international officials. Never before has a former African head of state been forced to face justice before an international tribunal. After decades of colonialism followed by decades more of Cold War proxy struggles, deep wariness persists in Africa about the intentions of outside powers.

In an interview in her office, Johnson-Sirleaf, who set Taylor's arrest in motion by requesting his extradition from Nigeria, said the case set "a sad precedent of arresting an African head of state."

But she added: "Liberian people feel much safer, and we can now move forward with what we need to do."

Era Of Impunity Wanes For African Leaders (CSM)

By Abraham Mclaughlin

The Christian Science Monitor, March 31, 2006

JOHANNESBURG, SOUTH AFRICA - It could be the beginning of the end for Africa's long era of impunity, during which awful deeds committed by presidents, dictators, and warlords have gone largely unpunished.

The highest-profile evidence: This week's arrest of notorious ex-Liberian-president Charles Taylor on war-crimes charges, which follows the recent booking of former Congolese warlord Thomas Lubanga at the International Criminal Court in The Hague.

Meanwhile, former Zambian President Frederick Chiluba is on trial for corruption, and upheaval in Kenya over graft allegations has led three cabinet ministers to resign.

In fact, the Zambian and Kenyan cases may be more important in the long run, experts say, because they're home-grown examples of holding leaders accountable for misdeeds. By contrast, the arrests of Messrs Taylor and Lubanga came in large part because of Western pressure. Ultimately, observers say, the extent to which the toppling of impunity is done by Africans - not because of American or other outside arm-twisting - may determine how thoroughly impunity falls.

Either way, however, "The arrest of Taylor is really good news for Africa. It sends an important signal that impunity might be a thing of the past," says Peter Kagwanja of the International Crisis Group here. Furthermore, it's evidence that even if "you're protected by [continental] heavyweights like Nigeria or South Africa" - as Taylor and Zimbabwe's President Robert Mugabe have been - "you may not be protected" any more.

Taylor was arrested in Nigeria this week and is expected to appear as early as Friday before the UN-backed Special Court for Sierra Leone in that country's capital, Freetown on charges of committing crimes against humanity. He's the first African head of state to be put on trial for such crimes. The trial, which will probably not start for several months, is expected to actually take place in The Hague. The venue change is apparently due to regional security concerns.

"One of the problems of trying Charles Taylor is that there has been insecurity in the region for quite some time, and he has been at the epicenter," says the court's chief prosecutor, Desmond de Silva. "There is a lot of anxiety in neighboring countries that his trial in Freetown might produce some sort of regional instability."

Taylor's arrival in Sierra Leone came a few days after the March 20 appearance of Mr. Lubanga at the ICC, where he's expected to be charged with war crimes. He's the first person to come before the ICC.

In Zambia, meanwhile, Mr. Chiluba is on trial for stealing about $500,000 during his 1991-2002 presidency. And, in Kenya, a series of graft scandals has left President Mwai Kibaki weakened, and may lead to an investigation of the vice president. The central bank governor has been asked to step down, pending a corruption probe.

Yet one Kenyan politician with possible links to corruption, former President Daniel arap Moi, isn't likely to be prosecuted, says Kagwanja, because, in the African view, "the war against impunity should not be war against stability." Taking down a powerful man like Mr. Moi could create instability.

Likewise, left to their own devices - and given Taylor's still-considerable influence throughout West Africa - African leaders probably would have asked newly elected Liberian President Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf "to cool her heels and stabilize herself before dealing with the question of Taylor," says Kagwanja. This would have given Nigerian President Olesegun Obasanjo time to "get his house in order" about possible plans to change the constitution so he can run for a third term - plans that may be affected by his actions on Taylor. It would have been at least a year, Kagwanja says, before African leaders dealt with Taylor.

Instead, amid strong US pressure, Mrs. Johnson-Sirleaf announced at the UN headquarters in New York on March 17 that she was requesting that Mr. Obasanjo send Taylor to Sierra Leone to face trial. When Obasanjo demurred, saying Africa's leaders needed to be consulted, even more US pressure was applied. When Taylor escaped from Nigerian custody on Tuesday, there were hints President Bush might cancel his Oval Office meeting with Obasanjo on Wednesday. Suddenly, Taylor was found, arrested - and promptly shipped to Sierra Leone.

While effective, such outside pressure can be risky, experts warn. First, it implicitly binds the US to helping keep the peace in Liberia, should the trial of the still-popular Taylor spark unrest there. Also, if Taylor's trial is seen as biased - or a product of US pressure - it "has the potential of turning Taylor into a hero or a martyr," says Kagwanja, "and that doesn't augur well for Liberia."

Taylor still has many backers in Liberia, including the country's third-most-powerful official, Speaker of Parliament Edwin Snowe, who is Taylor's ex-son-in-law.

Johnson-Sirleaf addressed this Thursday, saying anyone "who would try to use these circumstances as an excuse for insurrection to undermine the stability of the nation" would be "dealt with harshly, without mercy."

Still, another sign of declining impunity is the fact that African leaders didn't overtly criticize Obasanjo for handing over Taylor, says Ayesha Kajee of the South African Institute for International Affairs here. In an effort to boost Africa's image in the west - and respond to grass-roots rumblings - African leaders have been moving away from impunity, she says. "There's a recognition that this is an increasingly globalized issue - the issue of justice on the basis of human rights."

Rifts Plague Anti-Chávez Venezuelans (NYT)

By Juan Forero

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

QUÍBOR, Venezuela — Julio Borges is an unusual politician among Venezuela's fragmented opposition. He is running for office.

While much of the rest of the opposition is intent on boycotting the presidential election this year, Mr. Borges was busy here on a recent twoday campaign swing, shaking hands, kissing cheeks and trying against long odds to win over supporters of President Hugo Chávez.

"We spent seven years trying to get Chávez out of Miraflores," Mr. Borges said, referring to the presidential palace. "What we have to do is get Chávez out of people's hearts."

He is the first to admit that it is a lonely task. Mr. Chávez remains hugely popular, with a 55 percent approval rating in opinion polls, for having funneled billions of dollars in oil revenue to the poor. Perhaps more important, he has put his stamp on nearly every aspect of life, and every institution of real power.

Mr. Borges argues that boycotting elections only adds to Mr. Chávez's power and has already made Venezuela in effect a one-party state. Proponents of a boycott say Mr. Chávez has undermined the institutions of democracy, so they seek to undercut his legitimacy by spoiling elections.

They charge that the president stacked the Supreme Court and the five-member National Electoral Council, has registered fraudulent voters and keeps tabs on how Venezuelans vote — all accusations that the government denies.

Many supporters of a boycott are in the segment of the opposition that failed to oust Mr. Chávez with a coup attempt and a two-month oil strike in 2002, and a recall referendum in 2004. Last December they organized a five-party boycott of the elections for the National Assembly, losing all representation in the government.

Some opposition leaders called that boycott a success because 75 percent of the voters abstained, showing their unhappiness with the electoral system Mr. Chávez had established.

"It's a diabolical system," said Antonio Ledezma, a leader in National Resistance, a group of opposition leaders that favors a boycott this year. "We win by resisting, to not be under the thumb of a government that wants to dominate us."

While international monitors have called past elections here fair, they have also noted deep public distrust of electoral officials and called for an overhaul of the Electoral Council, which oversees the elections.

A newspaper editor, Teodoro Petkoff, and the governor of the state of Zulia, Manuel Rosales, are considered possible presidential candidates, but Mr. Borges is the only one who has declared his candidacy so far. He says his biggest obstacle is uniting a disillusioned opposition, whose fractures have been among Mr. Chávez's biggest advantages.

"The most difficult challenge is to get past the noise of our own opposition," said Mr. Borges, 36, a lawyer from Caracas. "The opposition does not have the luxury to just give up on politics. Here, some people say: 'Let's not do anything. Let's hope for a miracle.' I don't believe in that."

As in the rest of Venezuela, people in this state, Lara, are solidly behind Mr. Chávez and at best indifferent to Mr. Borges's small First Justice Party, whose members are mostly young professionals from wealthy districts of Caracas. Potential voters were polite but distant.

When one unabashed supporter, Carmen Martínez, embraced Mr. Borges — whispering, "May God and First Justice be our hope" — it was a bright spot in an otherwise difficult campaign swing.

Mr. Borges does not sugarcoat the obvious: his campaign is far behind, underfinanced and spread thin. His one advantage may be that most Venezuelans — 84 percent, according to a recent survey by Greenberg Quinlan Rosner, a Washington polling firm — support taking part in the election, even if they question the impartiality of the electoral authorities.

His first big battle was with his own party, which went against him and voted to sit out last year's legislative elections. But he also faces an image problem. Many Venezuelans see his party as close to the Bush administration, elitist and out of touch with Mr. Chávez's base in the country's ramshackle barrios.

"They're seen as the yuppie party, and the challenge is how do you reach the poorest people," said a senior American diplomat in Caracas, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of embassy rules.

"It's not enough being the anti-Chávez," another American diplomat said. "You have to offer a plan and an alternative."

To do that, Mr. Borges and his aides say they are going to go after the president where he is vulnerable. While Mr. Chávez appears to be obsessed with the United States, Mr. Borges said surveys for his campaign showed that Venezuelans were much more concerned about unemployment and rampant crime.

"Before voting for the Chavistas, I'll vote for Borges," Johanna Padilla, 29, said after meeting Mr. Borges as he went from house to house here. "All we have here is crime. There's no work. If you get a job, it's for three months and you're out."

On his campaign swing, wearing jeans and a blue pullover shirt, Mr. Borges handed out fliers titled "The President's Gifts," about Venezuelan aid to other countries.

"We want to show we're more nationalistic, more patriotic, more worried about Venezuela than Chávez," he said. "He's more involved in trying to become the president of Latin America. This is good for us."

For now the message is a hard sell. Mr. Chávez's largess to the poor, after all, has won him a solid following that is not about to switch to an unknown like Mr. Borges.

"I adore the man and thank God he's in power," Elizabeth Jiménez, 37, said of the president. "The opposition — each day they lose more standing. They criticize everything, everything that's for the people. But when they were in power they never did anything."

Preventable Disease Blinds Poor In Third World (NYT)

By Celia W. Dugger

ALEMBER, Ethiopia — Mare Alehegn lay back nervously on the metal operating table, her heart visibly pounding beneath her sackcloth dress, and clenched her fists as the paramedic sliced into her eyelid. Repeated infections had scarred the undersides of her eyelids, causing them to contract and forcing her lashes in on her eyes. For years, each blink felt like thorns raking her eyeballs. She had plucked the hairs with crude tweezers, but the stubble grew back sharper still.

The scratching, for Mrs. Alehegn, 42, and millions worldwide, gradually clouds the eyeball, dimming vision and, if left untreated, eventually leads to a life shrouded in darkness. This is late-stage trachoma, a neglected disease of neglected people, and a preventable one, but for a lack of the modest resources that could defeat it.

This operation, which promised to lift the lashes off Mrs. Alehegn's lacerated eyes, is a 15-minute procedure so simple that a health worker with a few weeks of training can do it. The materials cost about $10.

The operation, performed last year, would not only deliver Mrs. Alehegn from disabling pain and stop the damage to her corneas, but it also would hold out hope of a new life for her daughter, Enatnesh, who waited vigilantly outside the operating room door at the free surgery camp here.

Mrs. Alehegn's husband left her years ago when the disease rendered her unable to do a wife's work. At 6, Enatnesh was forced to choose between a father who could support her, or a lifetime of hard labor to help a mother who had no one else to turn to.

"I chose my mother," said the frail, pigtailed slip of a girl, so ill fed that she looked closer to 10 than her current age, 16. "If I hadn't gone with her, she would have died. No one was there to even give her a glass of water."

Their tale is common among trachoma sufferers. Trachoma's blinding damage builds over decades of repeated infections that begin in babies. The infections are spread from person to person, or by hungry flies that feed from seeping eyes.

In large part because women look after the children, and children are the most heavily infected, women are three times more likely to get the blinding, late stage of the disease.

For many women, the pain and eventual blindness ensure a life of deepening destitution and dependency. They become a burden on daughters and granddaughters, making trachoma a generational scourge among women and girls who are often already the most vulnerable of the poor.

DOJ_NMG_0024868

Trachoma disappeared from the United States and Europe as living standards improved, but remains endemic in much of Africa and parts of Latin America and Asia, its last, stubborn redoubts. The World Health Organization estimates that 70 million people are infected with it. Five million suffer from its late stages. And two million are blind because of it.

A million people like Mrs. Alehegn need the eyelid surgery in Ethiopia alone. Yet last year only 60,000 got it, all paid for by nonprofit groups like the Carter Center, Orbis and Christian Blind Mission International.

As prevalent as trachoma remains, the W.H.O. has made the blinding late stage of the disease a target for eradication within a generation because, in theory at least, everything needed to vanquish it is available. Controlling trachoma depends on relatively simple advances in hygiene, antibiotics and the inexpensive operation that was performed on Mrs. Alehegn.

But the extent of the disease far exceeds the money and medical workers available. In poor countries like this one, faced with epidemics of AIDS, malaria and tuberculosis, a disease like trachoma, which disables and blinds, has difficulty competing with those big killers.

Dr. Abebe Eshetu, a health official here in Ethiopia's Amhara region, described the resources available for trachoma as "a cup of water in the ocean."

Nowhere is the need greater than across this harsh rural landscape.

As dawn broke one day last year, hundreds of people desperate for relief streamed into an eyelid surgery camp run by the government and paid for by the Carter Center. Some of the oldest had walked days on feet twisted by arthritis to get here.

The throng spread across the scrubby land around a small health clinic. They wrapped shawls around their heads to shield themselves from sun and dust, made all the more agonizing by their affliction. Their cheeks were etched with the salty tracks of tears.

'Hair in the Eye'

Typical of those was Mrs. Alehegn, led stumbling and barefoot through stony fields by Enatnesh, who worriedly shielded her mother under a faded black umbrella.

As they waited their turn, Mrs. Alehegn explained that her troubles began more than 15 years ago when she developed "hair in the eye," as trachoma is known here. The pain made it impossible for her to cook over smoky dung fires, hike to distant wells for water or work in dusty fields, the essential duties of a wife.

Gradually the affliction soured her relationship with her husband, Asmare Demissie, who divorced her a decade ago, so he could marry a healthy woman.

"When I stopped getting up in the morning to do the housecleaning, when I stopped helping with the farm work, we started fighting," Mrs. Alehegn said.

The operation she had come for is still exceedingly rare in Ethiopia. Only 76 ophthalmologists practice in this vast nation of 70 million people. Most work in the capital, Addis Ababa, not in the rural areas where trachoma reigns.

Because of the extreme doctor shortage, nonprofit groups have paid for the training of ordinary government health workers over two to four weeks to do the eyelid surgery. The Carter Center, which favors a month of training, estimates the cost at $600 per worker, plus $800 for two surgical instrument kits for each of them.

Those trained make an incision that runs the length of the eyelid's underside, through the cartilagelike plate, then lift the side of the lid fringed with the eyelashes outward. Then they stitch the two sides back together. The patient is given a local anesthetic.

The operation cannot undo the damage already done to corneas, which makes the abraded eyes vulnerable to infections. But it can stop further injury. And because the disease often takes decades to render its victims blind, the operation can save a woman's sight and halt disabling pain.

For Mrs. Alehegn, the surgery was her second. Her plight is typical, for trachoma is both a disease of poverty and a disease that causes poverty.

After separating from her husband, she, Enatnesh and another daughter, Adelogne, then just 4, moved to a small, poor piece of land belonging to Mrs. Alehegn's family. About a year later, Mrs. Alehegn scraped together enough money for her first eyelid surgery. But as she aged, the underside of her eyelids — scarred by past trachoma infections — continued to shrink, turning her lashes inward again.

In recent years, her poverty was so dire she could not afford to have the surgery again. Her only income was the dollar or so a week that Enatnesh collected when she went to market to sell the cotton fabric her mother wove. They were so poor they could not afford even 15 cents for soap.

"If I get my health back, it means everything," Mrs. Alehegn said. "I'll be able to work and support my family."

The others who journeyed to the camp told many such stories of hardship. In a land where early death is commonplace, some of those with the disease see their wounded eyes, ceaselessly leaking tears, as a kind of stigmata of sorrow.

Banchiayehu Gonete, an elderly widow, said three of her eight children had died young. The bitterest loss was of her eldest daughter, carried off by malaria at 40 with a baby still inside her. It was this daughter who had plucked her in-turned lashes, cooked for her and kept her company.

"God killed my children," said Mrs. Gonete, old and wrinkled, but unsure of her age. "I feel this pain as part of my mourning."

When her parents divorced, her mother gave Tsehainesh, then just a baby, to her paternal grandmother. As the old woman's sight failed, Tsehainesh became her servant. Since she was 7, she has fetched water, cooked, cleaned, collected dung and wood for the fire and swept the dirt floors, her grandmother said.

The girl sees her half brothers and sisters, the children of her father's second marriage, happily dashing to school, while she lives apart, her days filled with the grinding work of tending to a sickly, demanding old woman.

Her grandmother explained that the girl owes her. "I've supported her this far," Mrs. Mekonen said impassively, "so now it's her turn to support me."

Ending Disability and Dependency

To break this cycle of debilitation and dependency, the goal is not eradication of the eye infections themselves, which most agree is neither practical nor necessary, but rather to reduce their frequency and intensity, a more achievable goal. This would avoid development of the devastating late stage of trachoma, called trichiasis, that makes surgery the sufferers' only salvation.

Toward that end, the World Health Organization has approved a strategy known as SAFE, an acronym that stands for surgery, antibiotics, face washing and environmental change, notably improved access to latrines and water.

Already, some researchers say, the growing use of antibiotics around the world to treat infections, even those unrelated to trachoma, has probably contributed to trachoma's decline. That is true even in very poor countries where there is no organized effort to tackle the disease, like Nepal and Malawi, they say.

The use of Zithromax, an antibiotic manufactured by Pfizer, has proved a breakthrough. The most common alternative is a cheap, messy antibiotic ointment that has to be applied twice daily to the eyes for six weeks. Zithromax, in contrast, can be taken in a single dose — making compliance easier and distribution to millions simpler.

By 2008, Pfizer, the world's largest drug maker, will have donated 145 million doses for trachoma control. Its contribution is administered by the International Trachoma Initiative, a nonprofit group. The drug has been provided in 11 of the 55 countries where trachoma remains a problem.

But globally, the World Health Organization estimates that at least 350 million people need the antibiotics once a year for three years to bring infection rates under control.

That equals more than a billion doses of azithromycin, the generic name for Zithromax. Trachoma is so rampant here in Ethiopia that an estimated 60 million people, or 86 percent of the country's population, need the drug.

Pfizer has not officially announced any additional donations, but Dr. Joseph M. Feczko, a Pfizer vice president, says the company will provide whatever is needed. "There's no cap or limit on this," he said. "We're in it for the long haul."

But even free drugs cost money to distribute. No global estimates are available for carrying out the SAFE strategy for trachoma control, but the Ethiopian government, beset by competing social problems, would have to come up with $30 million to reach even half the people who need the antibiotic, and $20 million more for public education on basic hygiene.

For now, the aim here is a more modest effort at localized control, but even that will not be easy.

An Ancient Scourge

Chlamydia trachomatis, the microorganism that causes trachoma, has been a source of misery for millennia, thriving in poor, crowded and unsanitary conditions. In ancient Egypt, in-turned eyelashes were plucked, then treated with a mixture of frankincense, lizard dung and donkey blood. In Victorian England, infected children were isolated in separate schools.

At the turn of the century, doctors at Ellis Island used a buttonhook to examine the undersides of immigrants' eyelids. Those with signs of trachoma were often shipped back to their home countries.

Swarming Musca sorbens flies play an ignominious role in spreading the disease. They crave eye discharge and pick up chlamydia as they burrow greedily, maddeningly into infected eyes.

"They cluster shoulder to shoulder around an infected eye," said Paul Emerson, the entomologist who did pioneering work on the role of the flies in spreading trachoma and who now runs the Carter Center's trachoma control program.

So inescapable, so persistent are they here in the Amhara region that children learn not to bother shooing them away. Even at the surgery camp, flies buzzed through the chicken wire that covered the windows of cramped operating rooms, harassing trachoma victims at the moment they sought relief.

Once the eggs of a female fly are ripe, she lays them in her preferred breeding medium, human feces, plentiful because most people here go to the bathroom outdoors.

But the flies cannot breed in simple, inexpensive pit latrines, Mr. Emerson said. He said he does not yet know why, but he thinks that a competing species that does thrive in latrines may eat the Musca sorbens maggots.

Ethiopia is now making a national effort to get people to build latrines, training thousands of village health workers to spread the word. It is also teaching children the importance of face washing in school.

But soap and water are scarce, too. Women often walk hours a day to wells to carry home precious pots of water balanced on their heads. And soap is a luxury for the poorest of the poor.

For those like Mrs. Alehegn, with late stage trachoma, surgery will continue to be necessary.

When her operation was complete, the health worker who performed it, Mola Dessie, pressed white cotton pads on Mrs. Alehegn's eyes to soak up the blood and applied antibiotic ointment to prevent infection. Then he covered her eyes with bandages.

Enatnesh wrapped her mother's head in a dingy cloth and slipped her stick-thin arm around her mother's waist to lead her away.

Mrs. Alehegn, who is illiterate, says she hopes that once she heals she will be able to weave more cloth, earn more money and do the domestic chores, leaving Enatnesh freer to pursue an education. "I don't want her to live my life," she said.

Despite her dependence on her daughter, Mrs. Alehegn has allowed the girl to go to school. Enatnesh, though having fallen behind, is a diligent fifth grader at age 16, who proudly said she is ranked 5th out of 74 students in her class. She dreams of being a doctor.

Two days after her mother's surgery, Enatnesh led the way to her father's sturdily built hut a couple of hours walk away. There, as his second wife swept the compound and Enatnesh's 9-year-old half-brother sat in the shade, Mr. Demissie, 58, offered a regretful explanation for his decision to divorce his first wife.

He, too, had developed "hair in the eye," he said. And like his wife, he, too, had been forced to stop working. If they had not separated, he reckoned, they would both have died. Finally, Mr. Demissie decided to save himself.

His sick wife would never find anyone else to marry, he realized. But for him, a new, hardworking wife would provide a second chance. And after his marriage, he got the surgery to prevent his own blindness.

"If we had not been sick," he said sadly, "we would have raised our children together."

As he spoke, Enatnesh listened sorrowfully, her hand cupped over her mouth, her head bent low.

French Law Is Affirmed As Protests Snarl Traffic (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

PARIS, March 30 — France's Constitutional Council upheld the constitutionality of a fiercely contested new labor law on Thursday, dealing a blow to opposition Socialists who had asked the council to strike it down but extending the crisis now facing the government.

Students kept up pressure, blocking roads and railways, tying up traffic and halting train service in several cities. The country's influential union syndicates have promised another day of nationwide strikes and protest marches on Tuesday.

The council's ruling throws the onus for resolving the crisis on President Jacques Chirac, who alone has the power to send the law back to Parliament. But he is widely expected to back his embattled prime minister, Dominique de Villepin, who insists that the law be put into effect. Élysée Palace said the president would address the nation late Friday.

The Constitutional Council's unqualified decision deprived Mr. Chirac of any face-saving cover under which he might send the law back to Parliament for further deliberations without looking as though he was bowing to the will of protesters.

Many members of Mr. Chirac's Union for a Popular Movement suggested Thursday that he would put the law into effect while fattening other social benefits in a bid to placate the students and unions.

The government used that strategy to extricate itself from the unrest that roiled France in May 1968.

The so-called Grenelle agreements of that year, named for the Paris street where the Ministry of Social Affairs is situated, raised the minimum wage by 35 percent, raised public sector salaries by 7 percent and cut the work week to an average of 40 hours from 43, among other things.

But some experts said the government, already trying to trim costly social benefits that it can ill afford, would have trouble coming up with offerings rich enough to satisfy the students and the unions.

"The difference between May 1968 and now is that the state doesn't have any money," said Sylvie Goulard, a professor of political science at the Institute of Political Studies here. Many members of Mr. Chirac's party have urged him to use special constitutional powers to delay imposing the law pending negotiations, to avoid inciting more anger among protesters. Both the students and unions have refused to engage in a dialogue until the law is withdrawn.

But Mr. Chirac has so far supported Mr. de Villepin, who has vowed to increase employment by making France's rigid labor laws more flexible. But his latest effort to introduce a new kind of labor contract — adding to the 18 already on the books — has backfired.

The new contract would give employers the right to fire new employees 25 and under without the cumbersome and costly procedures now required. The students and the unions regard that as an erosion of worker rights rather than as a useful incentive to employers.

Mr. de Villepin's approval rating has dropped seven percentage points this month alone to 29 percent, the lowest since he took office in May.

French students, meanwhile, are reveling in their newfound power. They blocked roads and railways in various parts of the country, angered by the Ministry of Education's order to reopen all high schools closed by the recent protests.

The ministry said 556 high schools out of France's 4,330 and 58 of its 84 universities had been disrupted.

Top French Tribunal Upholds Jobs Law (WP)

By Molly Moore

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

PARIS, March 30 -- France's constitutional court Thursday upheld a controversial jobs law that has provoked the largest street protests in decades, putting new pressure on President Jacques Chirac to resolve the crisis that threatens to destabilize his government.

The 10-member Constitutional Council ruled that high youth unemployment rates justified the law, which would give workers under age 26 fewer job protections than older employees. The council also said "different treatment" for young workers was justified because the law was enacted in the interest of improving job opportunities for them.

Chirac's office said the president would address the country on national television Friday night for the first time since students and labor unions launched demonstrations that often have ended in violence and confrontations with riot police in Paris and other cities across the country.

Members of Chirac's government declined to comment on Thursday's ruling, deferring to Chirac's address Friday. But union leaders and members of parliament plied the French evening news programs with demands that the government back down on the law and warnings of worsening protests and violence.

"You can be both legally right and politically wrong," Jean-Christophe Cambadelis, a Socialist Party member of parliament, said on the French television network, LCI. The Socialists had appealed the law to the constitutional court.

"It is the responsibility of the head of state to hear the growing exasperation of the country," said Bruno Julliard, head of the national student union, which has been at the forefront of the protests. "The president has the opportunity to put an end to a very damaging crisis. If he enacts the law rapidly, it will both be a sign of disdain and an irresponsible attitude."

The Constitutional Council's decision cannot be appealed.

Chirac now faces a difficult political decision that threatens the future of his prime minister, Dominique de Villepin, the author of the law and the man widely considered Chirac's preferred successor.

The law allowing employers to fire workers under age 26 at any time during their first two years of employment will become effective in nine days unless Chirac asks the parliament to reconsider it. Under the French constitution, Chirac cannot return the law to the legislative body without Villepin's permission. Villepin has said he will not abort the law but would consider negotiations over some provisions after it goes into effect. Unions have demanded that negotiations take place before the law is enacted.

In its opinion upholding the law, which was approved by parliament this month, the Constitutional Council noted that young employees who are fired after they've been on the job for four months have the right to appeal their dismissal to a labor court judge.

"Any employee getting sacked for what he thinks are no good reasons can dispute the decision," said Dominique Chagnollaud, a professor of constitutional law at the University of Paris II. "If this person is fired because of the color of his skin or because he's gay, the law against discrimination in the workplace still applies."

Unions have called another national strike and more protests for Tuesday, a week after an estimated 2.7 million people marched in the streets of Paris and other cities -- the largest French demonstration in decades -- demanding that the government retract the law. Striking workers also created major transportation delays, shut down schools and other government services and closed the Eiffel Tower.

In new protest tactics, small groups of students in cities throughout the country disrupted train services by blocking tracks and created miles of traffic jams by barricading main highways and city streets. In Marseilles, protesters set a coach car of a regional train ablaze, halting train service for two hours. About 50 demonstrators blocked Paris's ring road -- the equivalent of the Capital Beltway -- snarling traffic. Hundreds of students caused miles of traffic backups in the southern city of Aix-en-Provence, where they blocked intersections, and several hundred students played "cat and mouse" with police in the city of Lille, racing though the streets barricading intersections.

French Twist (NYT)

By Corinne Maier

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

Paris

IN Paris, the atmosphere has been morose for weeks: The winter's riots in the poor suburbs have been succeeded by a springtime student revolt. Now it's the middle class's turn to express its discontent — over a government plan to make it easier for businesses to fire young workers. This season, though, the protests aren't in far-off housing projects, but right under our eyes.

The Sorbonne, symbolic center of the intelligentsia, has been sealed off by the police. With the demonstrations and the strikes, it's been difficult to get around town; on Tuesday, when a million people marched, life seemed at a standstill — no newspapers, no trains — except for the violence that has flared up around the protests. In the cafes, people evoke, without much conviction, the famed student revolts of May 1968: the young then wanted to change society, while today they want simply to be part of it.

The student revolt began last month with three letters of anodyne appearance, C.P.E., an abbreviation for "contrat première embauche," or first job contract. Prime Minister Dominque de Villepin pushed a law through Parliament that establishes this contract, which covers those younger than 26 employed by businesses with more than 20 workers. It allows the firing of a young worker for any reason; French law otherwise severely limits businesses' ability to let a worker go. The C.P.E. is the little brother of the C.N.E., created last year, which covers smaller businesses.

The C.P.E., the C.N.E., their labor cousins R.M.I. and R.T.T. — the French love three-letter abbreviations. Perhaps it's because in France, traditionally a Catholic country, lots of things go in three, like the three colors of the flag and "liberté, égalité, fraternité."

The men in power are three too: the first being Jacques Chirac, president since 1995, a weakened man nobody expects anything of anymore. He is seconded by Mr. de Villepin and Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy, rivals who dream of taking Mr. Chirac's place in the 2007 presidential election. This year will be decisive for them, which is probably why Mr. de Villepin has chosen to showcase his firmness.

The point of the new labor law is to encourage businesses to hire young people without worrying they'll be stuck with them forever. Youth unemployment has been one of France's biggest problems for 30 years. A quarter of those under 25 are jobless; that figure surpasses 40 percent in the troubled suburbs. It's an enormous failure: young people have never been better prepared or educated than today, yet France offers them hardly any future apart from temporary jobs and unpaid internships.

Why do young people refuse this new program? First, they say, a law just for them implies unequal treatment, and the French, since 1789, have always dreamed of equality. Next, they complain, previous generations didn't have to suffer, so why should they? It's true that French society is hierarchical and rigid, and the disadvantages of employment "flexibility" (a word the French detest) have so far fallen mostly on the weakest: minority groups, women with few marketable skills and young people.

No one in France wants to be "flexible"; stable jobs are the best paid and the most prestigious. It's telling that the students at the elite grandes écoles have been slow in joining the protests: promised a better future than the graduates of the less illustrious universities, they figure that flexibility doesn't concern them.

What will happen next? The young demonstrators and the major unions demand the withdrawal of the C.P.E.; surveys show that two-thirds of the public are in sympathy with them. The students even won the unexpected support of the actress Sharon Stone, who was in Paris for the opening of "Basic Instinct 2." Ms. Stone declared herself against the law, saying that "people have the right to know why they've been hired or fired."

Meanwhile, the Constitutional Council yesterday rebuffed a request to throw out the law as unconstitutional. Still, Mr. de Villepin is getting little support in his own camp as he stands firm. And Paris waits to see what springtime will bring next.

A Cuban Doctor Pays A High Price For Truth (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'Grady

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0024873

In the early morning hours of Nov. 29, uniformed Cuban police raided the Havana home of medical doctor Dariel "Darsi" Ferrer.

"In front of my sick wife and my four-year-old son, they confiscated a laptop, a printer, various bottles of medicine and all the papers they could find," Dr. Ferrer reported on the Web site Cartadecuba.com. Nearly four hours later the marauders marched off with the doctor's property, leaving him with a citation to appear at the police station the next day.

Dr. Ferrer had sinned against the Revolution: He is an Afro-Cuban medical professional who, noting the country's abysmal state of health care, established an independent health and human rights clinic. "We have dedicated ourselves to offering free medical attention to those in need and visiting extremely poor communities where scarcities strike marginalized Cubans daily, to offer health services, give medicine, clothing and toys and to share the suffering of those beings," Dr. Ferrer reported.

The 36-year-old doctor's selfless dedication to others would win praise from any government genuinely concerned about the welfare of citizens. But in Cuba, his work scandalizes the state. It has rewarded him by shutting him out of the official medical community and refusing to allow him any form of gainful employment. Along with his wife and son, he has been regularly harassed and terrorized by the government's infamous "repudiation squads," organized mob violence unleashed against non-conformers. The Nov. 29 visit was the first time the regime sent uniformed agents to his home to allege a crime.

Dr. Ferrer is a victim of what human rights observers say is the one of the most brutal crackdowns in the island's history, one that has received little notice in the U.S. "Why now?" one might ask. Perhaps it is in preparation for the day when, as Cubans like to say, a "biological solution" will end Castro's reign. Perhaps it is because Cubans have grown bolder in recent years, increasingly expressing dissent openly.

Certainly, there is more civil disobedience, ranging from silent, prayerful marches by women whose loved ones are political prisoners to public statements from medical professionals like Dr. Ferrer. Pilfering from the state has reportedly increased too.

French jurist Christine Chanet, the U.N. Human Rights Commission's "expert" on Cuba, acknowledged the wave of repression this month. Though Cuban officials have refused her access, she noted that her sources report that "in 2005 more people were arrested and given disproportionate sentences for expressing dissident political opinions." Since she is French and a UNHRC bureaucrat, however, Ms. Chanet blamed the brutality on the U.S. By supporting Cuban democrats, she explained, the U.S. "provide[s] the Cuban authorities with an opportunity to tighten repression against them."

That's the kind of international "help" that long-suffering Cubans have had to get used to, leaving them with the feeling that they are but pawns in the petty, jealous U.N. game of challenging U.S. hegemony. But while the French bureaucrat is busy scoring points in the salons of Geneva, Dr. Ferrer is struggling to stay alive. His is a particularly brave struggle.

Like hundreds of José Six-Packs who have joined Cuban resistance movements, Dr. Ferrer's lack of celebrity is a real disadvantage. International recognition can provide some protection to a dissident. But up to now he has been a faceless soul behind the Tropical Iron Curtain, with a family to care for and living on practically nothing. Fidel already knows he has nothing to fear from the likes of Ms. Chanet, so the cost of crushing Dr. Ferrer is very low.

Dr. Ferrer's race also works against him. Independent thinking is heresy for any Cuban but Afro-Cubans are taught to be especially grateful for -- and obedient to -- the Revolution. They are supposed to signal to the world that though they may appear poor, malnourished and oppressed, they are actually living contentedly on Master Fidel's plantation. Dr. Ferrer hasn't been playing the game.

Another reason to silence the doctor is his honest, professional assessment of Cuba's deteriorating medical system. What Dr. Ferrer and the doctors working with him at the clinic have observed and publicly denounced is the polar opposite of the health-care paradise that Fidel's illusionists have worked years to promote. The collapse of this last "justification" for totalitarian government -- something that shamefully even former Secretary of State Colin Powell once praised Castro for -- makes Fidel's 50 years of failure impossible to deny.

This makes Dr. Ferrer's work exceedingly dangerous but despite the persecution, he works tirelessly for the sick, the poor and the imprisoned. The clinic writes "respectful letters" to high-ranking government officials, raising concerns about public health issues and proposing solutions. In a July 2005 document called "Health Authorities and the Complicity of Silence," Dr. Ferrer complained of the deaths of dozens of children in recent months owing to increased cases of transmittable diseases. He expressed concern that meningitis, dengue fever, hepatitis and leprosy could become epidemics. Clinic workers pay special attention to HIV/AIDS patients, particularly shut-ins, and advocate for the medical needs of political prisoners and for victims of medical negligence.

With thousands of medical professionals on assignment overseas to advance Castro's do-gooder image with Ms. Chanet and her ilk, Cubans are hurting. But so what? As former Brigadier Gen. Rafael Del Pino, who defected in 1987, observed in his 1990 book "Proa a La Libertad," ("Toward Freedom"), Fidel has another agenda. He "was of the idea that any person whose health is returned or who receives education will at least never be his enemy, even if that does not turn them into an ally," the general wrote, referring to the rationale behind sending doctors and teachers to Nicaragua in the 1980s. This strategy continues today. Only now Dr. Ferrer has made it clear that Cubans themselves don't enjoy the same "good will." For that he is being intolerably abused by the regime.

An American Revolt In London (NYT)

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

It's not exactly a tea party yet, but the Americans are again revolting against the British over taxation. At issue is the American embassy's refusal since last July to pay a traffic congestion surcharge when its diplomats drive around downtown London, where the embassy is situated. The Americans say the fee is a tax, and add that the Vienna Convention protects diplomats from taxes abroad.

First, let us say that whatever the validity of the argument, it's reassuring anytime an American official working for the Bush administration invokes an international agreement. But we don't buy the idea that diplomats are immune to the surcharge.

London adopted congestion pricing to reduce gridlock on its busiest streets and encourage the use of public transit. By those measures, it's been a success, and something that similarly afflicted cities in the United States, starting with New York, should want to consider. The fee, about $14, is supposed to support mass transportation. The British make a good case that the charge is not a tax, but a toll for the use of selected streets. Their diplomats, they note, regularly pay tolls on American roads and bridges.

A couple of years back, Mayor Michael Bloomberg threatened to tow away the cars of United Nations diplomats who had stacks of unpaid parking tickets in New York. The London mayor, Ken Livingstone, needs to work on editing what comes out of his mouth (this week he called the American ambassador a "chiseling little crook" and he is currently appealing a suspension from his duties for comparing a Jewish journalist to a guard at a concentration camp). He poked further fun at the ambassador for his previous job, which — unfortunately, in light of the debate — was owning a large car dealership. Nonetheless, Mr. Livingstone is certainly within his rights to demand payment, which may now amount to hundreds of thousands of dollars, including fines. He also wants money from the German Embassy and other missions that are withholding payment.

This is one war the United States government doesn't need to take on. It has a real one going on. And the British — they're on our side.

Back From Iraq, Sen. John McCain (R-AZ) Highlights The Progress Being Made. SEN. MCCAIN: "I think things are getting better. I think they are progressing. I think that the Iraqi military is improving. I think the Iraqi police training is improving, but much more slowly. I think that when the Golden Mosque was blown up that they walked to the edge of the abyss and decided to step back. I think it's long and hard and tough, and one of the messages that we had to the Iraqi leaders was, 'You've got to form this unity government.' Our ambassador is doing a great job urging that. And the president is personally involved. ... This is a tough slot. We must win. We will win. And the consequences of failure, as I said, are catastrophic." (CNN's "The Situation Room," 3/30/06)

Justice subpoenas ISPs, filter makers in online protection case

MARYCLAIRE DALE
Associated Press

PHILADELPHIA - The Justice Department is demanding internal files from dozens of Internet service providers and other technology firms as it seeks to defend a controversial Internet child protection law.

The subpoenas are similar to one given to Google Inc., which waged a partly successful battle over the government's request for millions of pieces of information about search engine requests and Web site domains.

InformationWeek magazine unearthed subpoenas that show the government also demanded information from at least 34 other companies, including Internet service providers such as Comcast Corp. and Earthlink, security software firms and other technology companies.

The subpoenas, which the magazine obtained through Freedom of Information Act requests, show the Justice Department preparing for an October trial in Philadelphia over the 1996 Child Online Protection Act. It is not clear which companies are complying, and to what extent.

"That money could be spent so much more wisely on giving software away to parents that are having these problems," Dan Jude, president of Security Software Systems, said of the litigation costs.

The 12-person firm, which makes filtering software, spent more than 40 hours trying to comply with the subpoena, he said. The company refused to provide some information on proprietary grounds, fearing it could make its way into the court file.

"If that information gets out in the public, we've just lost our competitive edge," Jude said Thursday. The subpoena also sought information the company does not keep, such as customer satisfaction, he said.

Department of Justice spokesman Charles Miller did not immediately return a message Thursday afternoon.

The subpoenas also went out to companies including AT&T, Cox Communications, Verizon and Symantec.

The U.S. Supreme Court has twice said the law - which would criminalize Internet material deemed "harmful to children" as defined by "contemporary community standards" - is likely to violate First Amendment protections and granted preliminary injunctions.

Critics say that definition is so broad it would stifle free speech, and also note that pornographers and others could simply base their operations offshore, beyond the reach of U.S. authorities.

Online publishers who are challenging the law argue that filters are a less restrictive way to protect children. The publishers, which include sexual health sites, a gay newspaper and the online magazine Salon.com, are represented by the American Civil Liberties Union.

"Our overarching concern over what the government is doing (with the subpoenas) stems from the 'why,' - what is it they're actually trying to accomplish?" said David McGuire, a spokesman for the Center for Democracy and Technology in Washington. "It doesn't seem reasonable."

Meatpacker sues government over testing for mad cow A Kansas meatpacker sued the government last week for refusing to let the company test for mad cow ...

A Kansas meatpacker sued the government last week for refusing to let the company test for mad cow disease in every animal it slaughters.

Creekstone Farms Premium Beef says it has Japanese customers who want comprehensive testing. The Agriculture Department threatened criminal prosecution if Creekstone did the tests, according to the company's lawsuit filed in U.S. District Court in Washington.

"We're not in any way saying that U.S. beef isn't safe; we believe it's the safest beef supply in the world, but that's not the issue," chief executive John Stewart said at a news conference.

"We're talking about consumers, and consumers want the product tested," Stewart said.

Testing for mad cow disease in the United States is controlled by the department, which tests about 1 percent of the 35 million cattle, or about 350,000, that are slaughtered each year. The department is planning to reduce that level of testing.

Stewart said he was surprised at the plan to scale back testing. "Given the concerns internationally, I'm not so sure that's the right thing to do."

Private companies certified by the department make screening tests used to detect mad cow disease. The department says it has sole authority over the sale and use of the tests.

Department officials say they oppose 100 percent testing because it does not ensure food safety. The disease is difficult to detect in younger animals, which are the source of most beef.

Larger meatpackers worry that insistence from Japanese buyers would force them to do testing and that a suspect result might scare consumers away from eating beef.

It would cost about $20 per animal to do the tests, adding about 10 cents per pound to the cost of meat, according to Stewart.

Japan tests nearly all its cattle for mad cow disease. While individual companies there may want more testing in the U.S., Japan's government is not asking the U.S. to do the same.

For now, Japan has halted American beef shipments because inspectors in January found cuts of U.S. veal containing backbone, which is banned in Japan even though it's eaten in the U.S.

Japan had only recently lifted a ban on American beef imposed after the first U.S. case of mad cow disease in 2003. Until then, Japan was the top foreign buyer of American beef, accounting for around $1.4 billion in sales in 2003.

Creekstone cut production and laid off about 150 employees at its Arkansas City, Kan., plant because of the ban.

Stewart said Creekstone's customers understand the limitations of the tests. He added that he expects Japan to reopen its market regardless of whether Creekstone is allowed to test its cattle.

The medical name for mad cow disease, a brain-wasting ailment, is bovine spongiform encephalopathy, or BSE. In Humans, eating meat products contaminated with BSE is linked to more than 150 deaths worldwide, mostly in Britain, from a deadly human nerve disorder, variant Creutzfeldt-Jakob Disease.

There have been three cases of mad cow disease in the U.S. The first, in December 2003 in Washington state, was in a cow that had been imported from Canada. The second, last June, was in a Texas-born cow. The third was confirmed last week in an Alabama cow.

Japan has had two dozen cases of BSE.

Armor Holdings Says U.S. Considers Civil Claims Over Zylon

By Michael Nol

(Bloomberg) -- Armor Holdings Inc., the sole provider of armor for Humvees used by the U.S. Army in Iraq, said the U.S. Justice Department is considering civil claims against the company over Zylon, a material used in body armor vests.

Armor said in a regulatory filing today that it reached an agreement with the Justice Department to stop the statute of limitations on the issue for 194 days ``with regard to possible civil claims the United States could assert'' against the company.

The agreement is similar to one reached earlier this month by Hexcel Corp., which makes fabric from Zylon. A Justice Department agency found in August that Zylon degrades with exposure to moisture and light. Armor in August said it would stop making vests with Zylon, and in October, the Jacksonville, Florida-based company said it recorded an expense of 33 cents a share for the cost of replacing deficient protective vests.

Armor said in a Securities and Exchange Commission filing in October that it received a subpoena from the U.S. General Services Administration for information about Zylon.

U.S. Army Reinstates EGL

JOHN D. BOYD

The U.S. government restored forwarder EGL Eagle Global Logistics to its list of approved contractors, ending a suspension that briefly dropped EGL from consideration for new contracts and threatened a long-established part of its business.

The suspension by the U.S. Army Feb. 27 - followed shortly by other government agencies through mid-March - stemmed from 2003-05 overcharges on Iraq-bound military shipments and a Feb. 16 guilty plea for fraud in the case by a former EGL manager. But EGL and the Army signed a compliance agreement March 24 that for the first time sets a time frame for EGL to pay the government $4 million in overcharge refunds and penalties, plus requiring other actions by the company.

On that same day, U.S. officials quickly removed EGL's name from several government Web sites that had listed its suspension. Then on March 27 - a month after the Army first suspended EGL's eligibility - the Army's Surface Deployment and Distribution Command officially notified shipping offices that "Eagle Global Logistics has been removed from the excluded parties list and placed back on SDDC's approved carrier list." EGL also reported the news to investors through a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission. It was not clear if or to what extent the brief suspension affected EGL's business.

After the Army's initial suspension notice, other government agencies picked it up over the next two weeks with varying effective dates. By March 20, company and Army officials were discussing an agreement to settle the issues. Meanwhile, earlier contracts involving EGL were still moving forward. And EGL General Counsel Dana Carabin said in the days before the compliance agreement was signed, Army officials even contacted some EGL customers to let them know the suspension could soon be lifted.

The events began when EGL in 2003 was handling military cargo shipments for the U.S. war in Iraq as a subcontractor to Halliburton subsidiary Kellogg Brown & Root. EGL had offices in nearby Dubai. From there, it was arranging air shipments into Baghdad by a Middle Eastern air charter firm. According to the compliance agreement, EGL's regional activities were headed by Christopher Cahill, who was in Dubai as its vice president for the Middle East and India from Oct. 1, 2002 until April 8, 2005.

Based on what was later uncovered by the Defense Department's inspector general, financial audits and a criminal investigation, the agreement said from about Nov. 22, 2003, through April 4 of last year, "Cahill devised a scheme to defraud the United States." After his guilty plea, Cahill faces a maximum penalty of 10 years in prison or a $5 million fine, or both. The document EGL signed with the Army said he began tacking onto EGL's billings to KBR a war risk surcharge that the air carrier was not charging, of 50 cents per kilogram. "This surcharge was instituted exclusively by Mr. Cahill," it said. Flights using that carrier - not named in the document - continued until July 2004, the agreement said, and generated billings of nearly $13.3 million. Of that, the war risk fees reached $1.14 million.

KBR in turn passed along the billings and was repaid by the government. Citing information Cahill agreed to in his guilty plea, the compliance document also said around July 2004 he took steps to document that the charges came from the air carrier, and the charter company supplied a letter saying it would no longer assess the war risk surcharge. In March 2005, the narrative continued, "Cahill directed an EGL employee to create fraudulent invoices purporting to document the war risk surcharges billed to EGL," and he transmitted those to EGL's billing office at its Houston headquarters.

EGL said it fired two employees over the matter after an audit. In the March 24 document, the Army said "it understands that EGL fully intends to settle the civil matters relating to the war risk surcharges" with the Justice\l "l" Department\l "l". EGL earlier said it had a tentative agreement with the U.S\l "l". attorney's\l "l" office under which EGL would pay the fees, and the government's attorney would not seek either contract suspension or criminal charges for EGL. Carabin said EGL had been in discussions with government officials on how to make the payments.

So when the Army published its suspension notice after Cahill's guilty plea, the news caught the company by surprise. Carabin said she did not learn of it until March 7. The new accord gives EGL 60 days to settle the repayments, and puts EGL under an extensive "contractor responsibility program" that includes employee training plus requiring EGL to set up a hotline its workers can use to report suspected improper conduct.

Finally, to cover the Army's administrative costs, the agreement calls for EGL to pay it $10,000 within 10 days.

Judge orders FBI to redouble search for documents in Oklahoma bombing

By PAUL FOY

Associated Press Writer

SALT LAKE CITY_A federal judge on Thursday rewrote a sentence to clarify a ruling that had suggested Timothy McVeigh received help from paramilitary militias in the Oklahoma City bombing and that the government had an informant in the bombing conspiracy.

U.S. District Judge Dale Kimball had issued a decision that called those two claims a "fact." Asked he if was endorsing the conspiracy theories, Kimball issued a new decision late Thursday to clearly attribute both claims to a lawyer who is trying to prove his brother was mistaken for an associate of McVeigh's in the frantic search for conspirators after the bombing.

In his original 23-page decision, released late Wednesday, Kimball singled out one FBI teletype already released to Salt Lake City insurance lawyer Jesse Trentadue, but in heavily edited form.

The judge, who has inspected the unedited version of the memo, first wrote: "The plaintiff (Trentadue) points out the fact that this document indicates that there was an undercover operative in with Timothy McVeigh and members of the various militia groups who aided and supported McVeigh."

The judge rewrote the sentence to eliminate the word "fact" and substitute: "The plaintiff claims that this document indicates that there was an undercover operative in with Timothy McVeigh and members of the various militia groups who aided and supported McVeigh."

Kimball's decision orders the FBI to redouble a search for investigative files that could reveal what agents knew about McVeigh before the 1995 Oklahoma City bombing, but he said the bureau could black out some information about informants.

McVeigh was executed in 2001 for the bombing that gutted a federal office building and killed 168.

The judge said he found it "troubling" that the FBI's efforts to locate documents required by his earlier rulings have not turned up more memos, including ones the FBI's own files suggested existed at one time.

"While the FBI's failure to discover documents is not necessarily an indication of bad faith, it is puzzling that so many documents could be referenced but not produced," the judge wrote.

The FBI is supposed to turn over any new documents it finds to Trentadue by June 2.

Trentadue has obtained some FBI teletypes on his own and others under a Freedom of Information request, and he sued to force more disclosures.

Trentadue is trying to prove his brother _ a bank robber who died in federal custody after being picked up on a parole violation _ was killed by federal agents during an interrogation gone awry.

Kimball ruled in Trentadue's favor early on and ordered the release of some heavily edited teletypes, but the FBI vigorously fought release of more and clean versions of documents. At a November hearing the Justice\l "I" Department\l "I" asked Kimball to reconsider his earlier rulings and stop the disclosures.

Kimball ruled the FBI did not have to produce clean versions of teletypes that would reveal confidential informants among a white supremacist group in Oklahoma. But he ordered the FBI to renew a search for other documents.

"My assumption is the FBI will comply with the order," said Carlie Christensen, an assistant U.S\l "l". attorney\l "l" who represented the FBI in court hearings here. "On balance, we're quite pleased with the ruling."

FBI officials declined comment.

"I'm sorry," Joel Miller, an assistant general counsel for the bureau, said Thursday. "We're still in litigation until the final order." Miller said Kimball's decision is subject to appeal.

The ruling was in part a setback for Trentadue, who is trying to expose FBI evidence he contends will show the bureau was tipped to McVeigh's plans but failed to stop the Oklahoma City bombing. But Trentadue claimed victory in another part of the judge's ruling ordering the FBI to keep searching for other documents.

Kimball ordered the bureau to look for more memos detailing surveillance by the Southern Poverty Law Center of a white supremacist compound where _ it later turned out _ McVeigh sought help before the bombing.

"They're going to be as nervous as a cat in a round room," said Trentadue, whose antipathy for federal agents was underscored by an epithet-laced e-mail he fired off Thursday to "Soon to be former" FBI Director Robert S. Mueller.

"You may think the FBI dodged a bullet with Judge Kimball's ruling," Trentadue wrote. "But in my opinion the bureau received a mortal wound." Trentadue accused the FBI of knowing about McVeigh's plans but bungling an investigation, then mistaking his brother for an Aryan Republican Army bank robber.

In his ruling, Kimball ordered the Federal Bureau of Investigation to use the search term "Morris Dees" to cull documents from its computer system. Dees is founder of the Southern Poverty Law Center, and the FBI has yet to produce any investigative files attributing information to him.

Kimball also ordered the FBI to produce any documents containing the initials of the Southern Poverty Law Center. The FBI previously searched for documents containing the word "poverty" but not "SPLC."

Trentadue's battle for FBI records is primarily motivated by his brother's bloody death. The U.S. Bureau of Prisons has said Kenneth Trentadue, 44, was found hanging by a bedsheet after gouging his neck with the crimped edge of a plastic toothpaste tube.

Jesse Trentadue contends his brother was killed by federal agents during a vicious fight inside a one-man cell of a high-security wing at the Federal Transfer Center in Oklahoma City, only weeks after McVeigh's indictment.

In his decision, Kimball said Jesse Trentadue had "unearthed significant evidence of foul play" in his brother's death.

The FBI teletype at issue in Kimball's decision suggested the Southern Poverty Law Center had an informant at an eastern Oklahoma white supremacist compound just before McVeigh's bombing.

But Richard Cohen, president and chief executive of the Southern Poverty Law Center, has told the AP that the FBI got that wrong.

"They made a mistake putting our source at the compound," said Cohen, who said the center had supplied the FBI with secondhand information about Elohim City dealings after the Oklahoma City bombing.

Trentadue said he hopes his efforts will force a congressional hearing into the FBI's investigation of the bombing and his brother's death "because they're linked."

Five people arrested in $20 million Medicare fraud scheme

LOS ANGELES - Five people were arrested Tuesday on charges they bilked more than $20 million in Medicare payments for tests that were unnecessary or never performed.

Federal prosecutors said Konstantin Grigoryan, 56, of Altadena oversaw the fraud scheme from 1997 to 2005. He and four others are accused of recruiting Medicare beneficiaries and taking them to a dozen doctor's offices and medical laboratories in Los Angeles, prosecutors said.

The offices then submitted bogus claims for diagnostic tests, ultrasound exams and other services, according to a criminal complaint unsealed Tuesday. The Medicare beneficiaries were paid for the use of their Medicare numbers, and the fraud ring fabricated test results to fool Medicare auditors.

The complaint also alleged that most of the money that Medicare paid out for the fraudulent claims between 2000 and 2005 was deposited into bank accounts for fake management and consulting companies.

Grigoryan, his wife Mayya and their son-in-law Eduard Gershelis were charged with conspiracy, health care fraud, Medicare kickbacks, money laundering and making false statements.
Mayya Grigoryan's brother-in-law Aleksandr Treynker and a fifth defendant, Haroutyun Gulderyan, also face similar charges.

All five made their initial court appearances Tuesday afternoon. The Grigoryans and Gershelis were ordered held without bond. Treynker was ordered released on $150,000 bond. Gulderyan's bond hearing was postponed to Thursday.

Attorneys for Konstantin Grigoryan and Gulderyan had no immediate comment on the charges. Lawyers for their co-defendants could not be reached.

A call to assistant U.S. attorney Bruce Searby, who is prosecuting the case, was not immediately returned.

Nations come together to change trust reform act

FORT YATES, N.D. - Tribes from different regions came together in a historic meeting to find common ground in order to provide input on the proposed Indian Trust Reform Act.

Tribal leaders from the Northwest, South, East and the Plains gathered to collectively make changes in the proposed act, Senate Bill 1439, as introduced by Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz.

The portion of the act that deals with the settlement of the 10-year-old Cobell v. Norton case was not under discussion by the group, as many of the tribes do not have a stake in the Individual Indian Money accounts. Most all tribes, however, have been impacted by the litigation.

"In the East, we don't have a lot of IIM accountholders. Our problem is that for the last 10 years, while this litigation is going on, tribes in the East have suffered because resources and all attention is focused on this litigation," said Keller George, president of the United South and Eastern Tribes.

"It seems like every tribe is affected: $3 million has been taken out of accounts of programs [to pay plaintiffs' attorney fees] that affect us. We think it could be done differently. If you ever tried to communicate with the [BIA and heard responses such as] 'Can't do by Internet,' 'Have priorities,' 'Not gotten to by the right people' - these are issues for us," George said.

Because of the litigation, federal District Court Judge Royce Lamberth ordered the BIA computers shut down due to lack of security.

"I don't know what the final figure is; it's not my place. Ideally, it should be negotiated between the claimants and the federal government. The feds and claimants have not come together. Nobody in Indian country is benefiting at this time," George said.

The Affiliated Tribes of Northwest Indians and USET brought changes the two groups have made in the trust reform act. The Plains-area tribal leaders were asked to add their input. The three groups represent some 83 tribes.

"Cobell has to be put on table and dealt with and be over with. We are being held hostage," said Ernie Stensgar, chairman of the ATNI.

"I take my hat off to Eloise [Cobell, lead plaintiff in Cobell v. Norton] for doing the lawsuit, but using Cobell to take program dollars to pay attorneys is wrong.

The reform act is a working document, or "work in progress," and the tribes have the ability and right to add their input.

"The big thing here is that the BIA gets restructured and the BIA head becomes a deputy secretary, and we have something to say about it," said Lyle Marshall, chairman of the Hoopa Valley Tribe of northern California.

"The office of special trustee has no statutory authority, yet gets hundreds of millions [of dollars] to do whatever it wants ... that's why this is an important piece of legislation," he said.

The reform act, as written by McCain, did not include any oversight of trust reform, but an entire section dealing with oversight by an inspector general has been added by the tribal leaders.

Randy Scott, adviser to the Northwest tribes, said language on establishing standards was in the original bill, then removed at McCain's request. "We need to continue to push it."

With oversight, a definition or standard must be established to determine what is, in fact, a violation of trust responsibility.

"When they [the BIA] are reviewing our programs, we will be hit with a higher standard than they will apply to themselves. At some point, since they are our trustee, there has to be a standard. My thought [is] that we try to make [them] apply it to themselves," said Steven Emery, attorney for the Standing Rock Sioux Tribe.

The reform act would set up a commission, comprised of seven members and a task force that would serve as an adviser to the department on trust reform issues. Many tribal officials said that this task force is more important than the commission. The commission will review trust asset management laws that will be in effect at the time the commission is formed.

"This is not a new discussion; we had it in the task force," George said, referring to a task force that was set up two years ago and abandoned before it completed the mission, according to tribal leaders.

"The department was unwilling to come up with standards. The standards were set at that time to approve at the last session. The department wanted an undersecretary, but without any oversight. We need the language in that section."

The commission will terminate two years after its first meeting, and tribal leaders request that a report be issued after 18 months of work. At the time the commission is terminated, the task force will begin with 60 days, according to changes tribal officials want to see in the act.

Tribal officials added language to the act concerning the makeup of the task force. It shall consist of 12 members representing federally recognized tribes on a regional basis and will be selected by the secretary of the Interior Department.

The legislation is important to all tribes because it reforms the BIA and will make the assistant secretary a deputy secretary. But to get the bill to honestly reflect the needs and desires of Indian country, tribes must come together, Marshall said.

The Plains tribes, or larger land-based tribes with the bulk of IIM accounts, see Title I, or the Cobell settlement portion of the bill, as the most important part. What the USET and ATNI groups heard was another strong position on the act. The two coastal groups were concerned mostly with the remainder of the bill.

"The bill is bigger than just the settlement. Titles II through VI deal with all aspects of trust management, individual and tribal. We didn't look at that from the perspective of the individual," said Danny Jordon, Hoopa Valley.

Hoopa Valley is a small reservation with some fractionated land. The tribe is buying back some of the land and is consolidating the land. According to the regulations and the act, a tribal member will have to pay for any land on the reservation at fair market value.

"Why would we want to do that? Why would we want to pass the cost on to them?" Marshall said. He added that Hoopa Valley allows tribal members to purchase land at lower rates, which "probably is not in compliance with the law."

Interior has commented only on the Cobell settlement portion of the bill, but in general the mood is that it supports the bill in principle. On March 28, at a hearing before the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs, the department made comments.

"I look at this as the beginning. One of the things that will drive this legislation is settlement of Cobell," Frazier said.

GUANTANAMO / DETAINEE TREATMENT ACT

Issue: How does Section 1005 of the Detainee Treatment Act affect the litigation arising out of the detention of enemy combatants at Guantanamo Bay? What is the status of the habeas cases?

Talking Points:

- The United States is currently detaining approximately 500 enemy combatants at Guantanamo Bay. These detainees have been determined to be enemy combatants through multiple levels of military review.

- The Guantanamo detainees are not protected by the Geneva Conventions due to their affiliation with either al Qaeda or the Taliban. Even so, the President has directed that the detainees be treated "humanely and, to the extent appropriate and consistent with military necessity, in a manner consistent with the principles of Geneva."

- Each detainee is given an opportunity to challenge his designation as an enemy combatant before a Combatant Status Review Tribunal (CSRT). The United States also conducts annual reviews to assess the current threat posed by each detainee and to determine whether each detainee should remain in custody, be transferred to another country, or be released. As a result of these procedures, the United States has transferred or released more than 265 detainees.

Background

- Under the U.S. Constitution, the congressional Authorization for Use of Military Force, the customary law of war, and the Supreme Court's ruling in Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, the United States may detain enemy combatants for the duration of hostilities.

- The Guantanamo detainees are not protected by the Constitution, which does not protect aliens outside the United States. See, e.g., United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S. 259 (1990); Johnson v. Eisentrager, 339 U.S. 763 (1950). Even so, the Combatant Status Review Tribunals (CSRTs) afford detainees procedural protections. In Hamdi, the Supreme Court indicated that those procedures would adequately protect the constitutional rights of United States citizens detained as enemy combatants.

- On December 30, 2005, the President signed into law the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005. The Act amends the habeas corpus statute to state that "no court, justice, or judge shall have jurisdiction to hear or consider" any habeas claim filed by an alien detainee held by the Department of Defense at Guantanamo. This portion of the Act is effective immediately. The Act therefore requires dismissal of all habeas corpus actions filed by detainees at Guantanamo.

- The Act also grants the D.C. Circuit "exclusive" jurisdiction to review the validity of any final determination of a CSRT and any final decision of a military commission. Congress expressly made this provision applicable to pending cases. The D.C. Circuit may review whether the combatant's status determination comports with the CSRT proceedings, and whether such standards and procedures comport with U.S. law and the Constitution, to the extent it is applicable.

- Based on this new Act, the United States has asked the D.C. Circuit to order dismissal of the habeas corpus actions that are currently on appeal. The United States has also asked that the court exercise its "exclusive" jurisdiction over these matters to the extent they may be converted into petitions for review under the Act. The court will hold oral argument to address these issues on March 22, 2006.

- The report of the United Nations Special Rapporteurs calling for the closure of Guantanamo is flawed and unbalanced. It rests on erroneous legal analysis that ignores the ongoing armed conflict involving the United States and al Qaeda and its supporters. It also contains factual errors based upon unfounded allegations by former detainees and detainees' lawyers. The report's authors did not visit Guantanamo or observe the operations directly, despite an invitation to visit.

- Habeas corpus litigation regarding the Guantanamo detainees is ongoing. In Rasul v. Bush (2004), the Supreme Court held that the federal courts have jurisdiction to consider habeas corpus petitions filed by the Guantanamo detainees.

- Currently over 200 habeas corpus petitions have been filed, purportedly on behalf of every detainee at Guantanamo Bay.

- There is no question that the Detainee Treatment Act, including the McCain Amendment's prohibition against cruel, inhuman, and degrading treatment, applies fully to detainees held at Guantanamo. Anyone found to have violated the McCain Amendment can and will be held accountable for such conduct. The full range of penalties under the Uniform code of Military Justice and other sources of law apply.

- Through the Detainee Treatment Act, Congress withdrew district court jurisdiction over lawsuits brought by Guantanamo detainees challenging aspects of their detention.

- Consistent with the DTA, however, detainees at Guantanamo may receive hearings to determine whether they are properly detained as enemy combatants (CSRT), as well as annual administrative review board (ARB) hearings to determine whether they should be released even though they are enemy combatants (akin to a parole hearing). Any detainee charged with serious war crimes receives a trial by Military Commission, akin to those used by the allies in World War II.

- The DTA also expressly affords enemy combatant detainees at Guantanamo with the opportunity to challenge in the civilian U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit: (1) the decision of the CSRT that the detainee is an enemy combatant, and (2) any conviction of the detainee of a war crime by a Military Commission. Detainees may also seek to challenge the D.C. Circuit disposition of their appeals in the U.S. Supreme Court.

- We are aware of no nation in any prior conflict that has afforded procedural protections as extensive as these.

- Over 267 detainees have already been transferred out of Guantanamo Bay; only approximately 500 remain. Despite assurances from those released, the Department of Defense reports that at least 12 have returned to the fight and been either recaptured or killed on the battlefield.

- In Khalid v. Bush and Boumediene v. Bush, 355 F.Supp.2d 311 (D.D.C. 2005), Judge Leon dismissed two petitions filed on behalf of seven detainees on the grounds that the detainees lack constitutional rights and have no viable statutory or treaty-based claims. This decision is currently on appeal.

- In In re Guantanamo Detainee Cases, 355 F.Supp.2d 443 (D.D.C. 2005), Judge Green refused to dismiss eleven cases filed on behalf of fifty-four detainees on the grounds that the detainees have constitutional rights that are not adequately protected by the CSRTs and that the Geneva Conventions are self executing and may protect at least some of the detainees. The United States is appealing this decision, which conflicts with Judge Leon's decision in Khalid v. Bush and Boumediene v. Bush and with the later-issued D.C. Circuit decision in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld.

- Oral argument in the above cases, which are being considered together under the lead caption Al-Odah v. United States, was held on September 8, 2005. Supplemental briefing on the effect of the Detainee Treatment Act on these cases is ongoing, with argument on the issue scheduled for March 22, 2006. Based on the Act, the United States is asking the D.C. Circuit to dismiss the current appeals and convert them into petitions for review under the Act.

- In a related case, Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, 344 F.Supp.2d 152 (D.D.C. 2004), Judge Robertson issued an order barring a Guantanamo detainee's trial by military commission for violations of the law of war. The D.C. Circuit reversed this ruling (415 F.3d 33 (2005), holding that the military commissions are authorized by law and that the Geneva Convention did not create enforceable rights or apply to Hamdan. The Supreme Court granted certiorari to review this case and the United States moved to dismiss the matter for lack of jurisdiction upon enactment of the Guantanamo Detainee Treatment Act. The Court will consider the dismissal motion at oral argument, which is to be held on March 28, 2006.

- Qassim v. Bush is a habeas case brought by two Guantanamo detainees who have been determined by a CSRT to no longer be enemy combatants. They sought their immediate release, but Judge Robertson held that he could not issue this relief. The United States could not simply re-patriate the petitioners (ethnic Uighurs) because they would more likely than not be tortured in their home country (China). The court reasoned that the United States had not yet found a country willing to accept the petitioners and the court could not grant them entry into the United States. That case is currently on appeal in the D.C. Circuit. We have advised the D.C. Circuit that this case falls within the provisions of the Detainee Treatment Act that preclude jurisdiction over habeas petitions. The petitioners have sought certiorari review prior to judgment in the Supreme Court.

Hello Neil,
On Wednesday, April 5 the Attorney General will testify before the Senate Appropriations Subcommittee that oversees the Department and on Thursday, April 6 he will testify before the House Judiciary Committee at an oversight hearing. Accordingly, we have scheduled briefings for next week to prepare the AG for these hearings (you should have already received your invitation). You will be responsible for briefing the AG on the following subjects:

Monday April 3, 9:30am - 11:30am
- Graham Amendments and Related Lawsuits (GITMO)

Please find attached the latest versions (that we have) of the briefing papers. Thank you.

GUANTANAMO / DETAINEE TREATMENT ACT

Issue: How does Section 1005 of the Detainee Treatment Act affect the litigation arising out of the detention of enemy combatants at Guantanamo Bay? What is the status of the habeas cases?

Talking Points:

- The United States is currently detaining approximately 500 enemy combatants at Guantanamo Bay. These detainees have been determined to be enemy combatants through multiple levels of military review.

- The Guantanamo detainees are not protected by the Geneva Conventions due to their affiliation with either al Qaeda or the Taliban. Even so, the President has directed that the detainees be treated "humanely and, to the extent appropriate and consistent with military necessity, in a manner consistent with the principles of Geneva."

- Each detainee is given an opportunity to challenge his designation as an enemy combatant before a Combatant Status Review Tribunal (CSRT). The United States also conducts annual reviews to assess the current threat posed by each detainee and to determine whether each detainee should remain in custody, be transferred to another country, or be released. As a result of these procedures, the United States has transferred or released more than 265 detainees.

Background

- Under the U.S. Constitution, the congressional Authorization for Use of Military Force, the customary law of war, and the Supreme Court's ruling in Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, the United States may detain enemy combatants for the duration of hostilities.

- The Guantanamo detainees are not protected by the Constitution, which does not protect aliens outside the United States. See, e.g., United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S. 259 (1990); Johnson v. Eisentrager, 339 U.S. 763 (1950). Even so, the Combatant Status Review Tribunals (CSRTs) afford detainees procedural protections. In Hamdi, the Supreme Court indicated that those procedures would adequately protect the constitutional rights of United States citizens detained as enemy combatants.

- On December 30, 2005, the President signed into law the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005. The Act amends the habeas corpus statute to state that "no court, justice, or judge shall have jurisdiction to hear or consider" any habeas claim filed by an alien detainee held by the Department of Defense at Guantanamo. This portion of the Act is effective immediately. The Act therefore requires dismissal of all habeas corpus actions filed by detainees at Guantanamo.

- The Act also grants the D.C. Circuit "exclusive" jurisdiction to review the validity of any final determination of a CSRT and any final decision of a military commission. Congress expressly made this provision applicable to pending cases. The D.C. Circuit may review whether the combatant's status determination comports with the CSRT proceedings, and whether such standards and procedures comport with U.S. law and the Constitution, to the extent it is applicable.

- Based on this new Act, the United States has asked the D.C. Circuit to order dismissal of the habeas corpus actions that are currently on appeal. The United States has also asked that the court exercise its "exclusive" jurisdiction over these matters to the extent they may be converted into petitions for review under the Act. The court will hold oral argument to address these issues on March 22, 2006.

- The report of the United Nations Special Rapporteurs calling for the closure of Guantanamo is flawed and unbalanced. It rests on erroneous legal analysis that ignores the ongoing armed conflict involving the United States and al Qaeda and its supporters. It also contains factual errors based upon unfounded allegations by former detainees and detainees' lawyers. The report's authors did not visit Guantanamo or observe the operations directly, despite an invitation to visit.

- Habeas corpus litigation regarding the Guantanamo detainees is ongoing. In Rasul v. Bush (2004), the Supreme Court held that the federal courts have jurisdiction to consider habeas corpus petitions filed by the Guantanamo detainees.

Subject: Annual White House Spring Garden Tours

A few of you have asked questions today about garden tours, so I thought I would forward you all the details of the WH garden tours going on this weekend that are open to the public. DOJ doesn't have tickets to distribute, but here is the info on how to get them. I hear it is unlikely that they would run out:

The Annual White House Spring Garden Tours will be held on Saturday, April 1 from 10 a.m. - 4 p.m. and Sunday, April 2 from 12 p.m. - 4 p.m.

The event is open to the public; however, a ticket is required for all attendees, including small children. The National Park Service will distribute free, timed tickets at the Ellipse Visitor Pavilion located at 15th and E Streets on both tour days beginning at 8:00 a.m. Tickets will be distributed -- one ticket per person -- on a first-come basis.

Please note the following are prohibited on the White House Grounds:

Food and beverages of any kind

Duffel bags/Suitcases/Backpacks

Animals (except guide dogs)

Aerosols of any kind

Knives of any size

Mace

Smoking

Real or simulated weapons/Ammunition

Fireworks/Firecrackers

The U.S. Secret Service reserves the right to prohibit any other personal items. Strollers, wheelchairs and cameras are permitted.

In case of inclement weather, the Garden Tours will be cancelled. Please call the 24-hour information line (202) 456-7041 for event status.

NBC – MEET THE PRESS

RUSSERT: But first, he has just returned from his third visit to Iraq. With us, Senator John McCain. Welcome back.

MCCAIN: Thanks, Tim.

RUSSERT: Senator, also in Iraq this morning, the Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. There she is meeting with the Iraqi prime minister. Do you believe that Mr. Jaafari is the man to lead Iraq?

MCCAIN: I don't know if he is or not. I think that's a decision that should be made by the Iraqis themselves. Do I think that ALLEN: was better from my personal view and perhaps others? Yeah. But the urgency here, Tim, is the formation of a government.

And I and my colleagues who visited both with me and before me tried to impress that on the Iraqi officials that it's been three months since they've had an election, more than three months. They need to form this government. The Iraqi people deserve it. And I think we're making progress in a lot of areas which I think we could discuss. But the fact that they haven't formed a government is a great impediment to real progress in Iraq. There's no doubt about it.

RUSSERT: Are we in danger of losing?

MCCAIN: I think that if -- first of all, I believe that they'll form this government. I think they saw the abyss when the Golden Mosque was blown up and sectarian violence began. I think they will form it up. But obviously if they don't, if there's not a government in Iraq, we're in serious difficulty. But I think they've been impressed, including by Condi's visit, that we need a government and we need it soon.

RUSSERT: Are the Shiite and Sunni militias more organized, stronger than the Iraqi national army?

MCCAIN: I don't believe so. I think one of the major areas where we've got problems with them is more in the police than in the army. And there is more control over the police in some areas by Sunni than Shia. And it's complex. But I believe that the Iraqi army is showing significant progress. They are able to take over responsibilities in parts of Iraq that are now relatively calm.

Have we got a long way to go? Yes. Is it hard? Yes. Tough? Difficult? Yes. But we are seeing results in that there is a reduction of American casualties. That's the good news. The bad news is the Iraqi casualties are going up. But in order to maintain American support, you're going to have to see continued decline in American casualties.

RUSSERT: Senator, there has been so much discussion about misjudgments made. I want to go back to September of 2002, when you voted to authorize the president to go to war. The comment you made, quote, I am certain that this military engagement in Iraq will not be very difficult. You were wrong.

MCCAIN: Well, it wasn't initially, as we all know. And I went over there shortly after the main part of the initial victory was over and talked to many people, and came back and said vociferously and often that we needed more troops there. And that was the view of literally everyone I talked to. And serious mistakes were made right after the initial military victory, including raising the expectations of the American people.

Those mistakes were made. I complained about them vociferously. Others have joined me in that assessment. But we're there now, Tim, and I'll be glad to admit any mistake you want to. And I'll be glad to talk about WMD. I'll be glad to talk about intelligence failure. We are there. We cannot fail. If we fail, the consequences in the Middle East and to us eventually are profound. The benefits of success are significant.

RUSSERT: Would it be helpful if the president said to the American people, I was wrong about weapons of mass destruction, and yes, we have not been greeted as liberators as we thought, and yes, the insurgency was more organized and more robust, and yes, we were wrong about the secular violence between Shiites and Sunnis, but we're all in this together? Would that be helpful?

MCCAIN: I think the president has been doing that. He's acknowledged many of the mistakes in the last several months, a series of speeches that he's given. He has acknowledged several mistakes that have been made. Maybe he could do a little more, but I think he has been laying out fairly eloquently the challenge that we face in Iraq and the consequences of it. But again...

RUSSERT: Secretary Rice said there were strategic mistakes. There were some fundamental misjudgments.

MCCAIN: Yes. In not the initial phase, but certainly as to what would be required to make sure that we kept any insurgency under control and allowed them to make a transition to a democratic form of government, which they have never known before. But could I just -- I'm not excusing any of those mistakes. Mistakes are made in every war. General MacArthur assured President Truman that the Chinese would not invade across the Yalu in the beginning of World War II.

The key is to fix those mistakes. We're beginning to fix a number of those mistakes that were made. And it's long, and it's hard, and it's tough.

RUSSERT: Tom Friedman said it was criminally negligent by the secretary of defense not to have more troops. Do you agree?

MCCAIN: I wouldn't use that language, but I do believe that it was a very, very serious strategic mistake when we didn't have enough troops over there to maintain control of a large country. I would remind you that the first couple of three, four months after the initial military victory, things were relatively quiet. We didn't protect the oil pipeline -- refineries and lines enough.

But Iraqis now view themselves as Iraqis first, Shia, Sunni and Kurd second. There is a desire on part of the Iraqi people to have a democratic government. That's why they had such a good voter turnout. There are signs of progress. There is economic improvement. But I do want to repeat, American people should realize what's at stake here. And I think overall the American people, and my friends on the other side of the aisle, recognize that we have to succeed.

RUSSERT: It could tip into total chaos.

MCCAIN: Well, I think it could, but I don't think it will. I don't think it will. I think we are muddling through, as Mr. Churchill used to say.

RUSSERT: But the fact is, if the United States Senate knew today what the facts are, no WMD, the costs of the war, the burdens of the war, the Senate wouldn't vote for the war.

MCCAIN: I don't know if they would or not, but I know that Saddam Hussein had acquired and used weapons of mass destruction, that every indication of his desires, his ambitions and his efforts were to acquire weapons of mass destruction and use them again. We had an oil for food scandal in the billions of dollars. The sanctions were not working. They were breaking down. So...

RUSSERT: But he was not an imminent threat.

MCCAIN: I wouldn't say that he was, because we know now or we're pretty sure that he had no weapons of mass destruction, but did he pose a threat? Absolutely, in my view.

RUSSERT: In what way?

MCCAIN: He had attempted to and used weapons of mass destruction in the past. He had invaded Kuwait and occupied Kuwait. He had killed thousands of people with weapons of mass destruction, and there's no doubt in anybody's mind that he was trying to acquire and would eventually use them again.

RUSSERT: But not nearly as far along in his programs as had been suggested?

MCCAIN: That's right. It was a colossal intelligence failure. But I want to point out, that intelligence failure was shared by the British, the French, the Germans, the Israelis. Every intelligence agency in the world believed he had weapons of mass destruction.

RUSSERT: In November of 2005, you talked about support for the war from the American people. And you said, quote, If we can't retain the support of the American people, we will have lost the war as soundly as if our forces were defeated on the battlefield.

Here's our latest NBC-Wall Street Journal poll. Is the war in Iraq worth it? Thirty-nine percent say yes. Fifty-one percent, a majority, say not worth it. Have the American people now turned against the war?

MCCAIN: I think the American people are very nervous. They're disappointed in our lack of progress, and that's why we've got to show progress. I think that when you ask the American people whether we should pull out immediately, most of them say no. Most of them say no because they realize the consequences of failure. So it's the job of people like me and others, who may be respected in this area, to point out the benefits of success and the consequences of failure. So when you hear of 2,300 and some young Americans who have given their lives, of course Americans say that, quote, it wasn't worth it.

You talk to those young men and women who are doing the fighting over there, and they'll tell you, they think they're fighting in a noble cause, and I believe they are.

RUSSERT: The Christian Science Monitor reporter Jill Carroll has been released. Here's pictures of her arriving in Germany carrying the orange and blue bag. She made some tapes, which have now been released where she's critical of the United States, critical of the war. She's saying that she was in captivity and did those under duress.

You were someone who was imprisoned in Vietnam. What should the American people be thinking when they're watching those tapes?

MCCAIN: I think they should be thinking that this was a young woman who found herself in a terrible, terrible position, and we are glad she's home. We understand when you're held captive in that kind of situation that you do things under duress, and god bless her and we're glad she's home.

RUSSERT: And not listen or take those seriously?

MCCAIN: I would not take them seriously. I would not, any more than we took seriously other tapes and things that were done in other prison situations, including the Vietnam war.

RUSSERT: We now have information that the Russians took our battle plans for Iraq and gave them to Saddam Hussein. In light of that, should the president of the United States go to the G-8 economic summit in Russia in July?

MCCAIN: I have felt that we should not include Russia in the G- 8, but the president -- I shouldn't dictate that to the president or...

RUSSERT: But you would boycott?

MCCAIN: I would probably do that, yes. Because -- not just because of the plans to Iraq, the repression of his own people, the recent elections in Belarus that he has been supporting the most Stalinist dictator in Europe, interference in Ukraine, the repression of a free press and the autocracy -- the restoration of the Russian empire and very seriously the failure so far to really cooperate with us in addressing the threat of Iranian acquisition of nuclear weapons, development of nuclear weapons.
So I have been very disappointed in President Putin. I think that we've got to respond in some way and the glimmerings of democracy are very faint in Russia today, and so, I would be very harsh.

RUSSERT: The president said he looked into his soul and found him to be very honest and very straightforward. Is the president wrong?

MCCAIN: I think that the president is realizing more and more that Putin is...

RUSSERT: Not honest and not straightforward?

MCCAIN: If not -- if not honest, certainly an autocrat who is seeking the consolidation of power with his old buddies from the KGB.

I think the president's very concerned and has expressed those concerns about behavior on the part of the Russian government. Look, we all say things that are stupid. I'm going to probably see several more this morning, so...

RUSSERT: So that wasn't your word, stupid, of the president to say...

MCCAIN: No, I don't mean it's stupid. I mean we say things...

RUSSERT: But he called Putin honest and straightforward.

MCCAIN: Look, the president wanted to develop a good working relationship with Russia and with Putin. And I'm sure that the president has re-evaluated his position in light of Putin's recent actions.

At the time, I think he was -- remember, it was early in his presidency. The president was trying to develop a good relationship with Putin.

And again, I don't mean stupid. I'll say it's stupid as far as I'm concerned, but all of us make statements that sometimes are not correct in hindsight...

RUSSERT: How about a misjudgment?

MCCAIN: At the time it probably was not a good predictor of what Putin would do.

RUSSERT: Let me turn to Iran. You said this to The Financial Times, Everyone knows we're not going to have two wars at once. I do not think using force against suspected Iranian nuclear facilities would be successful. There's no guarantee we would get all those facilities. If you have a strike and leave them with nuclear capability, you have got a hell of a challenge on your hands.

MCCAIN: I also said that there's only one thing worse than using the option of military action, and that is the Iranians acquiring nuclear weapons. And we must, as the president has very correctly stated, not remove the military option from the table. We cannot remove that option.

Now, we are going and using every possible avenue short of that. Going to -- the president is handling this exactly right.

We're going to the United Nations Security Council with our European allies. We are seeking sanctions. The action of China and Russia in relation to this issue, I believe, is a critical aspect of our relations with both countries. We must have sanctions against Iran.

Would it be a difficult military option? Sure, it would be a difficult military option. But you cannot remove it from the table.

RUSSERT: But The Washington Post said it would unleash Iranian agents already here in the United States and bring on terrorist attacks here and worldwide.

MCCAIN: The president of Iran went to the United Nations and announced his dedication to the extinction of the state of Israel.

They are in clear violation of the NPT of which they were signatories to. This is one of the most dangerous challenges we've faced since the end of the cold war.

And put yourself in the position of the government of the state of Israel, a near neighbor who has announced their desire to put you into extinction, and they have the capability to do so.

This is a very serious challenge. And for us to say under no circumstances will we use the military option would be the height of foolishness, in my view.

And again, I want to applaud the president's handling of this issue: keeping our European allies with us.

RUSSERT: So we could have two wars at once?

MCCAIN: I think we could have Armageddon, but I think that if we handle this right and our European allies stand with us and the Russians and the Chinese stand with us, sanctions might do the job.

And I am confident that this administration will exhaust every effort before contemplating seriously a military option.

RUSSERT: Let me turn homeward, immigration, a subject that you're deeply involved in. You've co-sponsored a bill with Senator Kennedy that would toughen the borders and also would allow the 11 million illegal immigrants who are here to be on a path to citizenship by paying back taxes, learning English, paying a fine.

Senator George Allen, someone who may run for president as well, said this, The immigration bill that's coming out of the Judiciary Committee rewards illegal behavior. And I think it you reward illegal behavior, you'll get more illegal behavior.

MCCAIN: Well, the proposal that we have is clearly a very, very tough road to earn citizenship.

And most Americans, when you explain to them it requires learn English, back taxes, pay a $2,000 fine, six years working before eligibility before obtaining a green card and then as much as five years before obtaining citizenship, they favor that, particularly when you ask -- when you say what do you do?

How can you send 11 million people back to the country they came from? You've got three options: the status quo, which everybody agrees is unacceptable, let them earn citizenship, and I mean earn it, or third of all, round them up and send them back. So those are your, really your three options.

And I think that it's very important that we handle this issue with sensitivity and humanity. Those thousands of young people, half a million young people you saw demonstrating in Los Angeles, were as passionate as they are because they don't want their parents sent back.

Some people have been here 50 and 60 and 70 years, Tim. And 97 percent of them are working.

But our first priority is to fix our borders. Is to fix our borders...

RUSSERT: There's going to be -- there's going to be a big vote in the Senate. You need at least 18 Republican senators joined with you. Straight talk, has the president shown the necessary leadership on this issue for you to win your battle?

MCCAIN: First of all, I don't know if we have the vote. Second of all, I've been very pleased with the president's comments in Mexico and about this issue.

He has said earn citizenship. He has come out in favor of a guest worker program. He has highlighted the urgency of this issue to America.

Eleven million people living in the shadows in this nation?

Would I like to see him lead more? Sure, but I applaud his leadership, and I applaud the work that he's done, and nobody knows more about this issue in Washington than President Bush, having been governor of the state of Texas.

RUSSERT: It's been interesting for political observers to watch the relationship between you and George W. Bush.

In 2000, you said the campaign that he ran against you was not honorable. In 2004, this was the scene stop after stop on the campaign trail, hugs and yes, kisses all around: McCain and Bush, buddy-buddy. Which led Jim Pinkerton, a columnist who worked for former President Bush to observe this, Blunt truth never lasts long. John McCain, for example, has become a born-again Bushophile, and that was the end of him as an honest, independent voice.

And that has been a whole series of commentary this last couple weeks. E.J. Dionne in The Washington Post has this, A Maverick No More. The Washington Times, conservative paper, Senator John McCain, who has consistently opposed President Bush's tax cuts, recently voted to extend some of them, a move conservatives say is a political flip-flop intended to further his White House ambitions.

When Mr. Bush's $1.35 trillion tax-cut...came up for a final vote in May 2001, McCain was one of two Republicans to say no. 'I cannot in good conscience support a tax cut in which so many of the benefits go to the most fortunate among us at the expense of middle- class Americans who need tax relief,' he said at the time.

Now, record deficits and John McCain says, I'm for the Bush tax cut.

MCCAIN: Well, first of all, I've got to go back to your initial statement. I didn't say that President Bush ran a dishonorable campaign. I said that things were done that were wrong. I don't believe they were done by President Bush.

I met with then-Governor Bush three months after I dropped out of the race. And we met and I supported and campaigned for him in the year 2000, not 2004, 2000.

And I supported him in his foreign and other policy matters as president of the United States and I'm proud to do so. I disagreed with him on several issues. I still do.

But in 2004, I believe that the transcendent issue of that campaign was who was best equipped to fight the war on terror. And that's why I was glad...

RUSSERT: In March of 2000...

MCCAIN: So I did not change my position in support of President Bush.

(CROSSTALK)

RUSSERT: ... I asked you if you believed that George Bush ran an honorable campaign and you said, I cannot say that.

MCCAIN: Quote, ran an honorable campaign? I put those things behind me. I don't look back in anger. I don't think the American people expect me to look back in anger.

Things are said and done in political campaigns which are pretty tough. And campaigns are tough in America. And they should be. But my support for him was announced three months after the primary was over in the year 2000.

RUSSERT: But you're now voting for the tax cut that you had not voted for.

You came out and said we should teach intelligent design in classes as well as evolution.

Jerry Falwell -- Jerry Falwell -- you're now giving the commencement address at Liberty University in May. This is what you said about Jerry Falwell in February of 2000. Let's watch.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

MCCAIN: Neither party should be defined by pandering to the outer reaches of American politics and the agents of intolerance, whether they with Louis Farrakhan or Al Sharpton on the left or Pat Robertson or Jerry Falwell on the right.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

RUSSERT: Agents of intolerance. And you were asked about that speech and you said this, I must not and will not retract anything that I said in that speech at Virginia Beach. It was carefully crafted. It was carefully thought out.

Based on that, do you believe that Jerry Falwell is still an agent of intolerance?

MCCAIN: I would like to first respond to several comments that you made as a predicate.

First of all, on the tax cuts. I do not believe in tax increases. Now, it was a gimmick that was -- that the tax cuts were temporary and then had to be made permanent.

The tax cuts are now there and voting to revoke them, not to extend them, would have meant a tax increase. I've never voted for a tax increase in my life.

RUSSERT: Well, that's important. But...

MCCAIN: May I finish saying what I'm saying?

RUSSERT: But let me just, for the record, it would have gone back to tax rates that you had supported.

MCCAIN: Yes, but the economy had adjusted. The tax cuts were there. And that's the way it was designed. It would have been tantamount to a tax increase. And that's -- and I've never voted for a tax increase in my life, with the exception of...

RUSSERT: So there's no politics?

MCCAIN: I do things because I think they're right. And obviously, people are free to judge however they want to.

As regards to Reverend Falwell, which is the major thrust of your comments, I met with Reverend Falwell. He came to see me in Washington. We agreed to disagree on certain issues and we agreed to move forward.

I believe that speaking at Liberty University is no different from speaking at the New College or Ohio State University, all of which I am speaking.

I speak at a lot of colleges and universities. I'm pleased to have the opportunity to do so, to talk to young Americans and talk to them about the obligations and the privileges of freedom.

RUSSERT: But, Senator, when you were on here in 2000, I asked you about Jerry Falwell, and this is what you said.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

MCCAIN: Governor Bush swung far to the Right and sought out the base support of Pat Robertson and Jerry Falwell. Those aren't the ideas that I think are good for the Republican party.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

RUSSERT: Do you think that Jerry Falwell's ideas are now good for the Republican party?

MCCAIN: I believe that the, quote, Christian Right has a major role to play in the Republican party. One reason is because they're so active and their followers are. And I believe they have a right to be a part of our party.

I don't have to agree with everything they stand for, nor do I have to agree with everything that's on the liberal side of the Republican party. If we have to agree on every issue, we're not a Republican party.

I believe in open and honest debate. Was I unhappy in the year 2000 that I lost the primary and there were some attacks on me that I thought was unfair? Of course. Should I get over it? Can I serve the people of Arizona best by looking back in anger or moving forward?

RUSSERT: But do you believe that Jerry Falwell is still an agent of intolerance?

MCCAIN: No, I don't. I think that Jerry Falwell can explain to you his views on this program when you have him on.

RUSSERT: After September 22, let me show you what Reverend Falwell had to say: What we saw 1/8on September 11 3/8, as terrible as it is, could be minuscule if, in fact, God continues to lift the curtain and allow the enemies of America to give us probably what we deserve...I really believe that the pagans, and the abortionists and the feminists, and the gays and the lesbians who are actively trying to make that an alternative lifestyle...I point the finger in their face and say, 'You helped this happen.'

Are you embracing that?

MCCAIN: I am speaking at the graduation of his university. I'm not embracing all of the tenets that are expressed at the New College in New York City nor other liberal universities and institutions that I have spoken at.

For example, I don't agree with the Ivy League colleges barring military recruiters from their campuses, but I still speak there.

RUSSERT: Are you concerned that people are going to say, I see, John McCain tried straight talk express, maverick. It didn't work in 2000.

So now in 2008, he's going to become a conventional, typical politician, reaching out to people that he called agents of intolerance, voting for tax cuts he opposed to make himself more appealing to the hard-core Republican base?

MCCAIN; I think most people will judge my record exactly for what is it, where I take positions that I stand for and I believe in, whether it be climate change, whether it be torture or whether it be a number of other issues with which I am -- immigration -- I don't think that my position on immigration is exactly pleasing to the far Right base.

I will continue to take positions that I believe in and I stand for. And I recognize that a lot of my credibility is based on that. And I think most Americans will judge me by my entire record.

RUSSERT: When do you make a decision whether or not to run for president?

MCCAIN: Next year.

RUSSERT: '07?

MCCAIN: '07.

RUSSERT: Early?

MCCAIN: I haven't exactly ascertained that. My focus and efforts are the 2006 elections, which are going to be very tough for Republicans. And we all know that.

And I spent yesterday and I'm spending a lot of time going around and campaigning for Republicans. And that's the focus of my efforts between now and this November.

RUSSERT: Reverend Falwell said that you had expressed a willingness to support a federal marriage amendment which would define a union between a man and a woman. Is that true?

MCCAIN: Reverend Falwell was asked again about that and he clarified it.

My position has always been that I will vote against a constitutional amendment which will come before the Senate on this issue because I think the states should decide. That's the essence of federalism. In my state of Arizona, we have a ballot initiative on this issue, which I am supporting. But if the courts, if through the court process, they say that that's not constitutional, then I would support a constitutional amendment.

RUSSERT: Before you go, last week you talked about people raising your temper as an issue. I read an interview you gave to Fortune Magazine: You lose battles in politics. I do get good and angry. Really angry! By God, I'm not going to let them beat me again. I don't like to lose.

MCCAIN: I was laughing when I said that. And I was joking. I spend every day saying to myself, stay calm. Stay cool. Be passionate. But neither get angry nor personal.

And those are two important lessons that I've learned over the years. I spent a lot of time burning bridges early in my political life. Now I work to try to build bridges.

RUSSERT: And we'll be watching. Senator John McCain, thanks for joining us and sharing your views.

MCCAIN: I haven't had so much fun since my last interrogation.

(LAUGHTER)

RUSSERT: Former Centcom commander, retired General Tony Zinni and his new book, Battle for Peace, after this station break.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

RUSSERT: And we are back. General Zinni, welcome to Meet the Press.

ZINNI: Thank you, Tim.

RUSSERT: And we're going to talk about your book, The Battle for Peace.

Let me bring you back to 1998, and this is what General Tony Zinni had to say, I think a weakened, fragmented, chaotic Iraq, which could happen if this isn't done carefully, is more dangerous in the long run than a contained Saddam is now. I don't think these questions have been thought through or answered.

Is that what we have now?

ZINNI: I think so. I think we are paying the price for the lack of credible planning or the lack of a plan for throwing away 10 years' worth of planning, in effect.

If we're underestimating the situation we're going to get into, for not adhering to the advice that was being given to us by others, and I think getting distracted from Afghanistan and the war on terrorism that we were committed to when we took on this adventure.

RUSSERT: If you were the president of the United States right now, what would you do about Iraq?

ZINNI: Well, unfortunately, Iraq is -- we can't let it fall apart. It is part of a whole myriad of issues that we have regarding stability in the Middle East. We're committed to it now. We have to see this through.

I think we have to get this government to form some sort of unity representative government. We keep pressuring them to do this. They keep avoiding the pressure, which I don't understand.

We have to obviously make a decision on the militias. They seem to be part of the problem that we're not addressing.

We're trying to develop a military and a police force that can handle this problem, and I think one of the elements that's missing in this is building up the intelligence capability. You know, the number of insurgents, so-called insurgents, although it's a mixed bag of problems that we face, could be dealt with if the people turned against them. If, like, General Casey said a week or so ago, 99.9 percent of the people are opposed to the violence and the perpetrators of this violence.

Well, all those people have to do is call up on the phone and tell you where the insurgents are, tell you in the two to four provinces that everybody said this is concentrated in, where the issues are, where the problems are, where the people that are doing this are.

And you wouldn't need much more than you have right now in the security forces of the Iraqis to be able to handle it. We're not fighting the Waffen SS here. We're fighting a bunch of rag tag people with AK-47's and IED's and RPG's. They can be policed up if the people turn against them.

We haven't won the hearts and minds yet.

RUSSERT: So they're being enabled by the population?

ZINNI: They need amongst the population -- this is classic insurgency. They need either fear, apathy or support, sympathy. If they get a combination of those three, and right now they have a combination. If there's a viable government, there's an opportunity for jobs, if there's a program that shows hope for the future for their children, they're going to turn against these people. We haven't given them that in three years.

RUSSERT: Is Iraq more dangerous now than it was with Saddam?

ZINNI: Well, it can be. I mean, this is like comparing heart disease with cancer. You may cure one. Neither one is good.

Probably the good news in all this is the potential for Iraq to come out of this better off is there, where there was no hope under Saddam.

But the problem is that we've wasted three years here. They may go in the worst case through a period that looks something like Lebanon did in the 1980's, and it may take them a while, five, 10 years of this kind of violence and destructive behavior, sectarian violence that they perpetrate on each other for them to get out of this.
