But the order also followed criticism of the tone of Al-Sharqiya's coverage of Saturday's execution, which struck some as sympathetic to the ousted dictator.

In contrast to state-run television reports that described Saddam as a "tyrant" and "criminal," a newscaster on Al-Sharqiya — which means "The Eastern One" — referred to him Sunday as "president."

Iraq's government is dominated by the country's Shiite Muslim majority. Al-Sharqiya is sometimes mocked by critics as "Al-Baathiya" for its alleged sympathies for Saddam's outlawed Baath Party, which had helped Iraq's Sunni minority rule the country.

Shiite and Sunni are now locked in a sectarian war that has claimed thousands of lives.

It's not clear how the closure might effect Al-Sharqiya, which broadcasts to Iraq from Dubai by satellite.

Al-Sharqiya reported Monday night that its offices in Baghdad were raided and sealed by Iraqi authorities. But the station said those offices were vacated three months ago in response to attacks on staff.

Al-Sharqiya remained on the air Monday, broadcasting video of a protest against Saddam's execution that was staged by the Professional Associations — an umbrella group of unions representing doctors, engineers and lawyers — at the group's offices in Amman, Jordan.

Saddam's eldest daughter, Raghad, briefly attended the demonstration in her first public appearance since his execution.

State-run Al-Iraqiya may have referred to the controversy over Al-Sharqiya's coverage, when it criticized reporting on Saddam's death by rival Iraqi and regional Arab television stations.

"The execution of Saddam unveiled the many masks of those who don't like to see a strong, civilized and developed Iraq," an Al-Iraqiya newscaster said Monday. "The male and female news readers of some Arab and Iraqi satellite channels rushed to their cupboards to wear their black clothes, announcing their sorrow about the joy of Iraqis."

Newscasters on the influential Al-Jazeera satellite channel also wore black in the aftermath of Saddam's hanging.

The government did not specifically cite the controversy over Al-Sharqiya's coverage of Saddam's execution in explaining the closure.

"We had sent many warnings to the channel previously, but it insisted on circulating false news that provoked violence and hatred," said Khalaf, the interior ministry spokesman.

On Nov. 30, the Interior Ministry said it had formed a special unit to monitor news coverage and vowed to take legal action against journalists who failed to correct stories the ministry deemed to be incorrect. The ministry runs the Iraqi national police and a separate paramilitary force.

The purpose of the monitoring unit, Khalaf said at the time, was to find "fabricated and false news that hurts and gives the Iraqis a wrong picture that the security situation is very bad, when the facts are totally different."

Al-Sharqiya's programming includes a number of Iraqi soap operas. Its owner, Saad al-Bazzaz, fled Iraq years before Saddam's fall and returned after the regime collapsed.

Prominent employees of Al-Sharqiya have fallen victim to Iraq's violence. Those slain include correspondent Ahmed al-Rasheed, and Walid Hassan, a famous comedian who was shot while driving in western Baghdad.

Hassan had performed in a comedy series called "Caricature," which mocked coalition forces and Iraqi governments since the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq.

6 Killed In U.S. Raid Targeting Insurgents (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

DOJ_NMG_0110840

BAGHDAD, Jan. 1 -- U.S. forces killed six people during a raid on a suspected safe house of the insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq in the capital Monday morning, the military said.

A prominent Sunni member of parliament condemned the operation, saying that two of his buildings were destroyed and two of his bodyguards were killed in the attack. He said his bodyguards were not insurgents and questioned the point of the raid.

"Where is al-Qaeda, and where is the insurgency here?" Saleh al-Mutlak, head of the Sunni-led Iraqi National Dialogue Front, said in a telephone interview.

As troops approached the suspected safe house, people in nearby buildings, including one owned by Mutlak, attacked them with automatic weapons and hand grenades, the military said.

According to a military statement, the troops fired back, killing two suspects. Several armed men then fled into a nearby building and fired at them from the roof.

Under fire from several directions, the troops killed four more suspects and detained one, the military said. Two buildings erupted in flames during the battle, it said.

Mutlak said the destroyed buildings housed the offices of his Iraqi National Dialogue Front, a coalition of political parties that has called for an end to the presence of foreign troops. Although it is led by a Sunni, it also includes Kurds, Assyrians and politicians from other ethnic groups. Its members hold 11 of the 275 seats in parliament.

"They came to the office of the Iraqi Front, which is part of the government, part of the political process," Mutlak said. "We don't believe in violence. Why would they do that?"

Mutlak said the troops had no reason to shoot at his building and that his bodyguards fired back only to protect themselves, thinking they were being attacked by militiamen.

He also said the four other people killed were civilians, not insurgents.

In an e-mail response to written questions, the military disputed Mutlak's account, saying no civilians were killed or injured and that "the terrorists killed were armed males firing at Coalition Forces."

Mutlak, who was not at the building during the raid, said he received frantic calls from his guards early in the morning. He said he called the U.S. Embassy and left several messages but did not receive a response.

"I'm a member of parliament, and they don't even call me," he said.

Lou Fintor, a spokesman for the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad, said, "We're aware of the reports, and we're looking into them."

In Auja, the home village of ousted president Saddam Hussein, mourners continued to pay respects. Hussein was buried there Sunday, a day after his execution by hanging in Baghdad.

Following the execution, the Interior Ministry ordered the closure of the Baghdad office of al-Sharqiya television, accusing the independent channel of fomenting violence, according to two other Iraqi television stations. The channel's office in Dubai remained open, allowing it to continue broadcasting. Many Iraqis say Sharqiya's coverage reflects the views of Sunnis.

Also Monday, a day after the number of American service members killed since the start of the war reached 3,000, the military announced the deaths of two more soldiers.

The two Task Force Lightning soldiers, assigned to 3rd Brigade Combat Team, 1st Cavalry Division, were killed Sunday after an explosion in Diyala province, northeast of Baghdad. Two other soldiers were wounded in the attack.

The latest deaths, occurring on the final day of 2006, brought to 113 the number of U.S. troops killed in December, according to iCasualties.org, an independent Web site that counts war fatalities. The death toll for December was the highest of the year and the highest since November 2004.

Iraqi Politician's Office Is Hit In U.S. Raid (LAT)

Sunni Arab leader says six civilians died, but Army cites gun attack.

BAGHDAD — U.S. forces attacked the office of a Sunni Arab lawmaker in the Iraqi capital Monday morning while conducting a raid on a suspected Al Qaeda safe house next door. Six people were killed.

Saleh Mutlak, a member of the Iraqi National Dialogue Council, a Sunni slate that includes former members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party, was not in his office in the Jadriya neighborhood at the time. But he spoke with witnesses and said that the troops killed six civilians: two of his bodyguards, a couple next door and their two children.

Troops came under such heavy fire from guns and grenades as they approached the two buildings that they called in warplanes to attack the target with machine guns, according to a U.S. military statement. Two suspected militants were killed as Americans approached and four more during the raid, the statement said, adding that one person was detained.

U.S. Army spokesman Lt. Col. Christopher Garver said Mutlak's office was not targeted, and that troops returned fire only after people in the building started shooting at them.

"They jumped in on a fight that was not targeted at them initially," he said of Mutlak's staff.

Garver could not provide the ages of those killed because troops did not enter the buildings or recover the bodies.

"Everyone who was shot was engaged in trying to shoot us," Garver said.

Television footage of the site showed stone buildings with walls blasted off, twisted metal gates and entrances blocked by rubble.

Mutlak, who was in Dubai, United Arab Emirates, said his staff had called him from the office at 3 a.m. to say militia members were firing on them. Moments later, they called again to say their attackers were U.S. troops. The lawmaker immediately called the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad, but got voicemail. He left a message, but said he still had not heard back by Monday night.

The U.S. Embassy was investigating the incident, spokesman Lou Fintor said late in the day.

"This has got to stop," Mutlak said. "We cannot stand it anymore. How can they bomb my office? I am in complete dialogue with them.

"They didn't even call to apologize," he said.

Mutlak said Al Qaeda fighters were responsible for the death of his brother, Taha, who was kidnapped and shot last spring, and that his party opposed sectarian militias. His office has been searched by the Iraqi Defense Ministry and attacked by Shiite militias.

"This is a disaster," Mutlak said of the raid. "If my guards are considered Al Qaeda, we are in trouble."

The Sunni politician charged that American forces and the Iraqi government were giving Shiite Muslim militias carte blanche while cracking down on Sunnis. He was still seething after watching videotape of Hussein's execution Saturday, at which guards taunted the deposed president with Shiite militia chants.

Mutlak said he planned to meet with fellow Sunnis and members of various parliamentary blocs this week to discuss withdrawing from the government, which is led by Prime Minister Nouri Maliki, a Shiite.

"Participating in the parliament with all that's happening now would be a shame on me, to be part of this history," he said.

The Muslim Scholars Assn., a hard-line Sunni group, released a statement Monday condemning Hussein's execution as "vulgar" and orchestrated by American "invaders and some of their allies."

"The whole thing is political and not taking into consideration the interests of the Iraqi masses," the statement said. "We are looking forward to the day when our people and not the invader execute and bring about justice for those who kill our people, rob our resources, violate our rights and sell our sovereignty."

More moderate Sunni politicians also said they were upset by the way the country's leaders handled the execution.

Ala Maki, a member of the Iraqi Islamic Party slate whom Hussein jailed and almost executed, said the former president's hanging was rushed and poorly timed and that Maliki should compensate by cracking down on Shiite militias.

Some Shiite politicians acknowledged that the crowd at Hussein's execution had been larger than expected and had gotten out of hand.

Only seven people were supposed to attend the hanging at the former military intelligence headquarters in Baghdad, but more police and guards showed up, swelling the crowd, according to Abbas Bayati, a Shiite politician with close ties to Maliki. He said some in the crowd had "spontaneously released" sectarian chants, to the dismay of organizers, but that overall the execution had gone smoothly.

"We can't say it was 100% the way it was planned," he said. "By the end, the law was implemented, and that's what's important. The state cannot control the small details 100%."

Bayati said the guards would be held accountable for their conduct.

Hussein's exiled daughter, Raghad, on Monday joined supporters of the former president at a protest in Amman, Jordan, Iraqi television networks reported. She was unable to travel to Iraq, where she is wanted by authorities.

Similar protests were held Monday in Baghdad's mostly Sunni Adhamiya neighborhood and Hussein's hometown of Tikrit, drawing several hundred people.

Meanwhile, 40 unidentified bodies were recovered in Baghdad during a 24-hour period that ended late Monday.

Near the northern city of Mosul, a visitor to the prison in Badush incited a riot during which police killed an inmate, said Lt. Col. Ali Mahmood, the warden.

Ibrahim Abdullah, 44, coach of the Iraqi wheelchair basketball team and a father of three, was killed in a drive-by shooting in west Baghdad, said Saif Maliki, a member of the Sports Journalists Guild.

Relentless Toll To US Troops Of Roadside Bombs (CSM)

By Brad Knickerbocker

The Christian Science Monitor, January 2, 2007

Almost every day, Sgt. First Class Joel Jacobs comes to the Third Infantry Division's "Warriors' Walk" at Fort Stewart, Ga. Among the eastern redbud trees - each commemorating one of the more than 300 division soldiers killed in Iraq - it's a chance for him to honor his fallen comrades.

Over New Year's, with the number of US service men and women who've died in Iraq at the 3,000 mark, the rest of the nation had occasion to pause and reflect on the war's toll.

Like many, Sergeant Jacobs greets the news of American casualties with sorrow and resolve. He retired from the Army a few months ago, and you might think the prosthetic leg would slow him down. But asked how he's doing, this 21-year veteran who faced danger in Haiti, Bosnia, Afghanistan, and Iraq says , "I'm absolutely fine, sir."

"When you come home, you remember the ultimate sacrifices some of your fellow soldiers have made," he says of his regular walk.

Of the 3,000 American GIs lost in Iraq as of midday Sunday, more have been killed by roadside bombs - improvised explosive devices (IEDs) - than any other cause. More than by rifle fire, mortar attack, or car bomb.

It's a danger that has bedeviled Pentagon war planners for months, one to which they've responded with a high-level task force headed by a retired four-star general, $6.7 billion in research and development, new high-tech equipment and vehicles, and - perhaps most important - intelligence efforts to get inside the decisionmaking of an insurgency that is sophisticated, if largely low-tech.

If anything, the danger is increasing despite efforts to counter it.

IEDs are "the enemy's most effective weapon," Army Gen. John Abizaid, commander of all US forces in the Middle East, told the Senate Armed Services committee last March. "They are the perfect asymmetric weapon - cheap, effective, and anonymous."

Improvised bomb attacks on US troops now top 1,000 a month, four times the rate in 2004. Insurgents have become more sophisticated in their bombmaking, placement, and means of detonation. The British military has determined that there are enough stocks of illegal explosives to continue the same level of attack for years without resupply, reports DefenseNews.com.

Since the beginning of the war in March 2003, IEDs have accounted for about 45 percent of all US fatalities from hostile causes. And that percentage is increasing. Of 100 recent hostile fatalities, IEDs caused 67. December saw the highest number of Americans killed overall in Iraq in two years.

"Buried explosives are easy to plant and hard to find," says military analyst Loren Thompson of the Lexington Institute think tank. "They can be built and detonated using a range of readily available items, making them an attractive tool."

The IED problem extends beyond Iraq. IED attacks in Afghanistan doubled from 2005 to 2006. They are, as Army Vice Chief of Staff Gen. Richard Cody called them, "the poor man's cruise missile."

IEDs are not a new phenomenon in war. Sergeant Jacobs encountered one in Somalia in 1993. But the scale of their use in Iraq is unique.

"Perversely, the IED problem is a result of the difficulty the enemy has in attacking American troops by other means," says John Pike, head of the a military news and policy website GlobalSecurity.org.

The US military is in the midst of a big push to counter and defend against the roadside bombs, spending more than $3 billion this year on the effort. This includes new ways to jam remote-control devices used to detonate IEDs and robots to disarm or blow them up without hurting anybody. But radio frequency jamming is difficult, because it can interfere with coalition communications systems such as those used to operate aerial drones. And soldiers have to find roadside bombs before they can disable or destroy them.

From the infantryman's point of view, the most important things coming to the troops are fire-resistant uniform materials, heavier body armor, and especially tougher vehicles to replace the relatively venerable - and vulnerable - Humvees.

Many soldiers, and their parents, have written ardent fan letters about the new "Cougar" and "Buffalo" vehicles - "Humvees on steroids," they've been called.

"I have seen these things take a hit from an IED and keep driving without a problem," Air Force Staff Sgt. J. Adam Burke, an explosive ordnance disposal technician, wrote to Force Protection, Inc. the South Carolina company that produces the vehicles.

But so far only about 300 are in the combat zone, and troops on the ground could use thousands more.

Those tasked with countering roadside bombs also have been drawing on the experience of wounded veterans who've survived the blast of an IED. Twenty-two soldiers at Walter Reed Army Medical Center have joined the "Operation Warfighter" program to work with military and civilian officials trying to reduce the threat of IEDs.

Besides the 3,000 US military fatalities in Iraq (perhaps more than that if those who died sometime after being evacuated from the war zone are included), the number of troops wounded due to hostile action now approaches 23,000 - about half of those from IEDs. In addition, some 24,000 have had to be evacuated due to accidents and illness. Sergeant Jacobs lost his right leg when it was crushed by a concrete barrier in what he calls a "freak accident" involving his truck convoy.

The percentage of those wounded who die has dropped to about 10 percent in Iraq, an all-time low in the history of warfare. By contrast, the figure was 30 percent in World War II and 24 percent in Vietnam.

Without improvements in soldiers' protective gear, battlefield treatment, and quick transportation to field hospitals, the number of US troops killed in Iraq might well have been more than twice what it is today.

That accounts for what could be seen as the relatively low figure for combat fatalities due to hostile action, distressing as it is. It also means, as the Government Accountability Office reported this year, that "many of them are returning home with severe disabilities, including traumatic brain injuries and missing limbs."

Those in harm's way in Iraq got a break the other day.

Iraqi children playing outside the gate of Forward Operating Base Marez reported a suspicious device to soldiers from the Second Battalion, Seventh Cavalry Regiment. It turned out to be an IED, which an explosive ordnance disposal team destroyed.

Civil affairs soldiers rewarded the children with toys, candy, and soccer balls. In the end, it may be that this kind of intelligence information from Iraqis themselves will be the most important weapon in countering deadly roadside bombs.

These days the Army's Third Infantry Division is preparing to deploy to Iraq for the third time. In about two weeks they'll be going to Anbar Province, one of the most dangerous parts of Iraq.

At night, lights shine on each of the Eastern Redbud trees at the division's "Warriors' Walk" at Fort Stewart, where it's hoped that no more trees will have to be planted. Like the Vietnam Memorial in Washington, personal mementos have been placed on the ground by family members, friends, and fellow soldiers.

"It's a good way to remember," says Jacobs. "But it's also a harsh reminder sometimes too."

Roadside Bomb Changed Lives Of The Survivors, Some Still In Iraq (USAT)

By Gregg Zoroya

USA Today, January 2, 2007

The long shrapnel scar on the face of 1st Lt. Charles Bies marks the day last March when his life changed forever.

Shortly before midnight March 6, the Humvee he was riding in snapped a tripwire and detonated a roadside bomb outside Tal Afar, Iraq. The improvised explosive device, or IED, was planted by insurgents.

The blast killed Pfc. Ricky Salas Jr., the man next to Bies. Like hundreds of other IED attacks in Iraq that end in death, it changed countless other lives as well. For every soldier or Marine killed by a roadside bomb in Iraq and Afghanistan, 10 are hurt. The weapons have killed more than a thousand troops and wounded 11,200 in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The blast that killed Salas left four other soldiers with wounds, physical or emotional, that may never heal.

It severed the left leg of Army Spc. Jose "Jay" Morales, 24, whose dream since childhood was to be a soldier and whose pregnant wife had known him for less than a year before he went to war.

Army Spc. Nicholas "Nick" Helfferich, 22, was manning a machine gun in the Humvee's turret when the blast threw him into the air. It smashed his pelvis and ribs, damaged a lung and his liver, and permanently crippled his spine. "My whole body was just like ringing," he recalls.

The vehicle flipped over, trapping Bies inside the wreckage. He says his life today is neatly divided into two emotional chapters: one before the bomb, and one after.

Sgt. Martin Duculan found himself pinned under Morales and Salas. Though the blast left no visible wounds, it is seared in his memory. "I know how to control my emotions," he said in a recent e-mail from Iraq, where he remains in combat in Ramadi. "But I cannot control a few tears that roll down my cheek when I tell this story."

The list of the 3,000 troops who have died in Iraq since the war began doesn't account for the other casualties, those who barely escaped death and must live with the physical and emotional scars of war. This is the story of the soldiers who survived the IED that killed Ricky Salas.

In the moments after the explosion, Staff Sgt. Jason Snell, 31, of Bethlehem, Pa., directed rescue efforts as soldiers from two tanks rushed to give aid. Salas was dead in the Humvee. Morales lay bleeding atop Duculan. Pinned inside the wreckage, Bies could barely move. Helfferich writhed in pain on the ground nearby.

Soldiers tended to Helfferich and pulled Morales and Duculan and the body of Salas from the Humvee. Snell ordered that chains be attached to a tank to right the vehicle and free Bies.

"The whole time this was going on, I wanted to scream, throw up and run away. But I was the person in charge. I couldn't let my soldiers see me falter," Snell says. "I still smell the blood to this day."

Duculan walked away, uninjured but shaken. A medical evacuation helicopter arrived in minutes to carry Morales, Helfferich and Bies — and Salas' body — to the nearest hospital.

Within hours, Morales was placed on a medical evacuation flight leaving Iraq. Bies was flown out a day later and Helfferich within several days.

Before heading to a hospital in Germany, Morales gently pulled an attending nurse's hand to his lips and kissed it gratefully. His voice dry and hoarse, he motioned for a piece of paper and scrawled a note: "I don't want to leave my platoon."

Morales of Port Washington, N.Y., suffered the worst injuries of those who survived. After nine months of convalescence, rehabilitation and physical therapy at Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington, D.C., he still struggles to walk with his prosthesis. "It's very hard because my stump and my leg are very short," he says.

A greater worry, he says, is the financial future facing him, his wife, Jennifer, and their 8-month-old son, Jayden. Although some amputees remain in the Army, Morales is increasingly fearful he will be forced into medical retirement at age 25. "I'm running out of ideas," he says with urgency. "I'm running out of ways to try and figure out about how I'm going to support my family."

He has received $50,000 in a military insurance payout for the loss of his leg. His Army income is less than $20,000 a year.

If her husband is medically retired, Jennifer Morales says she is uncertain what the Department of Veterans Affairs or military retirement could provide. She says it could be as little as $15,000 to $20,000 per year. Jose Morales knows the VA offers vocational training. But he says he has no plans yet because his focus has always been the Army.

His mother, Lucila Lopez-Torrez, brought him to the USA from his native El Salvador at age 13. She cleaned houses on Long Island to support her only child. Morales joined the U.S. Army in 2000. He hopes to be granted citizenship soon, a process that could be expedited because of his service.

"I'll tell you I'm more American than the people down in the street," he said from his hospital bed at Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington last spring.

Lopez-Torrez, 44, says the stress of seeing her son maimed by war has led to insomnia, high blood pressure, depression and, finally, hospitalization several weeks ago for what she feared was a heart attack. She had collapsed while cleaning someone's house. When it happened, she says, the owner called an ambulance. Doctors told her it wasn't a heart attack but severe anxiety. "My son has changed," she says. "He's not the boy who laughed like he used to. He's hurting a lot."

In November, Jennifer Morales, 22, suffered several days of facial paralysis from Bells palsy brought on by stress, doctors told her. "I looked into the mirror and my face was like hanging down," she recalls.

Life is so different now, she says. They married on Dec. 16, 2005, and her husband left for war three weeks later. They had never lived together. Today, they share a suite of apartments for wounded soldiers, and their families at the Walter Reed medical center and are scheduled to move to a military rehabilitation center in Texas this month.

Jennifer Morales says when they go to a shopping mall, she notices how people stare and children turn to their parents to ask what happened to that man in the wheelchair.

"Even in this (residence) house, the women who have husbands with arms and legs ask me how it is, 'Isn't it weird for you to have sexual contact with your husband?' Stuff like that," Jennifer says. "That hurts. Those are stupid questions."

Scott Helfferich, 51, a park police officer from Westmoreland County outside Pittsburgh, saw his oldest boy, Nicholas, learn to walk again several weeks after the blast.

"I just remember his throwing the crutches down and saying, 'I don't need these damn things.' And then it became very emotional for our family," the father says. "He looked at me and he smiled. And it was the first time in a while that I had actually seen him smile."

Helfferich, who is still in the Army, has not healed. He suffers chronic back pain and discomfort in his pelvis and fears it may never go away. He awaits word of a medical retirement from the military. Helfferich dreams of opening a bar and grill in his native Latrobe, Pa., though he is not sure how he will pay for it. He may go to college.

Once a proud body builder whose idol was Arnold Schwarzenegger, Helfferich now lives a more sedentary life and misses the body that defined him before the blast.

"I used to be really ripped. You don't know what you have until it's gone," he says. "(The blast) changed my life, because I realized that people were trying to kill me and they didn't. But they hurt me for the rest of life. They got the best of me. I'm going to be suffering the rest of my life. But I'm not going to let that bring me down."

Duculan and Bies remain in combat in Iraq. "The memories of that event will be with me the rest of my life," Duculan says.

Their year of duty in Iraq was to end this month, But it was extended because of the Army's need for additional combat troops. Last year, their unit was shifted from Tal Afar to Ramadi, where the fighting is more intense. The platoon may come home in February or March.

Bies, who survived a second roadside bomb blast Oct. 7, relived that night outside Tal Afar in nightmares for months. In waking moments, he second-guessed himself.

"You start playing 'what if' with yourself: 'What if we'd left an hour earlier or if we'd left an hour later?' " Bies says in a phone interview from Iraq. " 'What if we'd done something different that night?' … You could call it survivor's guilt."

In his second IED experience, Bies and five other soldiers fled a burning armored vehicle and raced to safety under gunfire. That is a good war story, Bies says.

By contrast, the first blast, the one that killed Ricky Salas, was profound. "I measure my life in two parts, and it was before this and after it," Bies says. "All of the sudden, you grow up and you're not invincible any more. You're 24. You're in Iraq. And something like that happens. It makes you realize, 'Hey, I may not live to see 25 or 26.'"

Blast That Killed Pfc. Salas Still Echoes Months Later (USAT)

By Gregg Zoroya

The roadside bomb that killed Pfc. Ricky Salas Jr. last year lay buried along a deserted stretch of highway outside Tal Afar, Iraq.

The Pentagon announced the death in a three-paragraph news release, blaming it on an "improvised explosive device" or IED, the acronym for the weapon that has claimed the lives of more U.S. troops than any other used by Iraqi insurgents.

The Associated Press reported Sunday that the number of Americans killed since the war in Iraq began — U.S. troops and seven Pentagon civilian workers — reached 3,000. At least 35% of them died as Ricky Salas did: in IED explosions. In December, the deadliest month of 2006, at least 48 of 69 Army combat deaths were caused by roadside bombs.

In all, 111 U.S. troops were killed last month.

IEDs can be made from a variety of explosives. In Iraq, insurgents sometimes use ammunition that was looted from Iraqi military facilities in the months after the U.S. invasion. Detonators can be wired to the bomb, activated by pressure from a vehicle that rolls over it or triggered remotely by an electronic signal.

A military task force established in 2003 continues to look for ways to combat the devices, and the Pentagon has spent billions of dollars on devices that jam electronic signals. It has also added armor to vehicles to defend against explosions and trains troops from the early weeks of enlistment on how to spot IEDs.

Brig. Gen. Dan Allyn, a deputy director for the task force, says one in five bomb attacks causes casualties. When that happens, he says, several people can be killed or wounded at once.

Like the death announcements for the hundreds who died before and after him, the Pentagon news release about Salas, 22, only hinted at the human cost of the March 6 explosion.

No mention was made of the three other soldiers in the Humvee who were wounded in the blast. Also left unsaid were the stories of those the death toll fails to acknowledge: Salas' 22-year-old widow, the two small children she is left to raise alone, a mother emotionally adrift and a father who drowns his despair in alcohol.

Salas hoped that by enlisting, he could support his young family in Roswell, N.M. His death — because of the benefits his wife, April Baca-Salas, subsequently received — made that possible.

"The plan Ricky had for us to live our lives, to have a new house, to be able to support our kids — he's made that. But it's not the way I wanted it," says Baca-Salas. "I wish I didn't have a penny to my name and had my husband."

The explosion of that IED extended beyond the borders of Iraq and touched other lives. The stories of those closest to Salas speak to the other casualties of war — the mothers and fathers, the children and the spouses of the 3,000 killed since fighting began.

The mission that killed Salas was routine. The five soldiers in the Humvee were part of the Army's 1st Armored Division and Charlie Company platoon, commanded by 1st Lt. Charles Bies, 24, of Palm Coast, Fla., who rode in the front passenger seat next to Salas. Salas didn't need to go. He volunteered for the patrol.

After a long day of trying to clear highways of roadside bombs on March 6, the soldiers followed an Abrams tank back to their fortified outpost in a village outside Tal Afar, Bies recalls. It was almost midnight.

Bies says they drove about 10 mph and swapped stories about being chewed out by superior officers, all the while searching the darkness with flashlights for booby traps.

They missed one.

The bomb blew off the entire left side of the Humvee. Bies says he could hear Salas scream. Soldiers on the scene say Salas died quickly. He was pronounced dead at a military hospital March 7.

Hours after his death, a police officer stopped Baca-Salas, 22, outside a Home Depot in Roswell.

DOJ_NMG_0110847

Two members of the New Mexico Army National Guard had stopped at her parents' home earlier that day to give Baca-Salas the news. When she wasn't there, they asked local police to assist in gently directing her to go back home.

Instead, Baca-Salas demanded answers. "I just started screaming at him and yelling," she recalls.

"Oh my God! Is it my husband?" she recalls asking the officer. "He's in Iraq," she told them. "Is he OK?

"Ms. Salas, I don't know," the officer told her. "Please go home. I'll follow you."

Arriving home minutes later, she saw the Army casualty officers and fainted on the driveway. Police officers rushed to distract the two children still in the car: Jordan, who will turn 4 on Jan. 11, and Jarrod, now 22 months old.

Baca-Salas had hated her husband's decision in 2005 to join the Army. Even so, she supported him. She says he wanted a chance for his children to see the world, something Ricky Salas Jr. had never experience growing up in West Texas.

He also wanted financial security.

"All he was doing was trying to better himself," Baca-Salas says.

He succeeded for his family. A rush by Congress in 2005 to increase death benefits for those killed in combat resulted in families receiving $500,000 in benefits.

In addition, the state of New Mexico waives state college tuition for the children of those killed in war.

Baca-Salas is buying a home and setting up investment accounts for Jordan and Jarrod. She's also financing her education to become a massage therapist.

The money is a salve, she says, but it is not a cure.

She is reminded of her husband everywhere: at the Home Depot, where police found her the day he died; in the telephone that never carries his voice; on the computer that never displays his e-mail; in the features of his son and the personality of his daughter, who has the same mischievous streak.

Jordan, who has many memories of her father, tells people he is an angel now. "He has big wings," she says.

Baca-Salas, however, remains hurt and angry at everyone and everything, including the husband she lost.

"I'm very mad at Ricky," she says. "I have these two kids that aren't going to know him.

"And no matter what I tell them, it's not the same.

"It's ugly to hear my daughter say her daddy's got big wings. It's hard to take my kids to the cemetery on his birthday."

The Army required a closed coffin for Salas' rosary and funeral Mass. His mother, Brenda Robertson, of Lubbock, Texas, understood that the blast damage was catastrophic. But without a viewing, it seemed as though her son had simply vanished, she said.

"There's no closure because we can't see him," says Robertson, 43. "We don't know."

That's why she requested his autopsy report.

When it arrived by Federal Express six weeks after his death, it carried a warning that was hard to miss: "It is STRONGLY RECOMMENDED that you read this in the presence of people that can provide you with emotional support."

She was alone but read it anyway.

The report listed 55 wounds to her son's body: smashed and broken bones, torn body parts, pulverized organs. When she saw mention of a tattoo on his left arm she put the report down. She knew her son had a tattoo there that read "Salas" in Chinese characters.

"Rick always said he was going to keep me under his wing," Robertson says listlessly.

With the death of her son, who was posthumously promoted to the rank of specialist, Brenda Robertson's life went into a tailspin.

Ricky Salas Jr. was the second of five children and the oldest of four sons of Robertson and her ex-husband, Ricky Salas Sr.

As "Little Ricky" grew to manhood, married and had a family, his mother relied on him as a steady presence in what she concedes was an unsettled life of moving from one job or residence to another.

For years, Ricky pushed her to enroll in college and study bilingual education.

"He said I'd have a better life and a better future," she recalls. Robertson says she studied at Clovis Community College in Clovis, N.M., for two semesters, working steadily in a campus clerical job. But when her son died, she mourned for weeks and let the education and job slip away.

Now unemployed, she lives with her daughter in Lubbock, recently moving from a three-bedroom trailer that belongs to her ex-husband. A few times, she has found solace in spending time with Jordan and Jarrod, her grandchildren. "I just couldn't deal with it," she says of her son's death. "It's been real hard for me to get back on track."

Her ex-husband, 44, is a former construction worker disabled by a car accident in 2002. He lives on Social Security. His oldest son would always call, even from Iraq, to talk about conditions there. When Ricky Jr., died, the father says he turned increasingly to alcohol.

"Drinking my problems away," he says, "but they don't go away."

These days, there are no calls from Iraq, and Salas often sits in his trailer in Lubbock, staring at the pictures of his son.

"I'm proud. But I've lost the words about how I feel for him doing that," he says of his son's decision to volunteer for the patrol that killed him. "It's a big loss. I don't wish this even on my worst enemy."

Few Iraqis Are Gaining U.S. Sanctuary (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise And Robert F. Worth

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 1 — With thousands of Iraqis desperately fleeing this country every day, advocates for refugees, and even some American officials, say there is an urgent need to allow more Iraqi refugees into the United States.

Until recently the Bush administration had planned to resettle just 500 Iraqis this year, a mere fraction of the tens of thousands of Iraqis who are now believed to be fleeing their country each month. State Department officials say they are open to admitting larger numbers, but are limited by a cumbersome and poorly financed United Nations referral system.

“We’re not even meeting our basic obligation to the Iraqis who’ve been imperiled because they worked for the U.S. government,” said Kirk W. Johnson, who worked for the United States Agency for International Development in Falluja in 2005. “We could not have functioned without their hard work, and it’s shameful that we’ve nothing to offer them in their bleakest hour.”

Senator Edward M. Kennedy, a Massachusetts Democrat who is taking over the immigration, border security and refugee subcommittee, plans hearings this month on America’s responsibility to help vulnerable Iraqis. An estimated 1.8 million Iraqis are living outside Iraq. The pace of the exodus has quickened significantly in the past nine months.

Some critics say the Bush administration has been reluctant to create a significant refugee program because to do so would be tantamount to conceding failure in Iraq. They say a major change in policy could happen only as part of a broader White House shift on Iraq.

“I don’t know of anyone inside the administration who sees this as a priority area,” said Lavinia Limón, president of the United States Committee for Refugees and Immigrants, a nongovernmental refugee resettlement agency based in Washington. “If you think you’re winning, you think they’re going to go back soon.”

For Iraqis, a tie to the United States is a life-threatening liability, particularly in harder-line Sunni neighborhoods. In 2003, Laith, an Army interpreter who would allow only his first name to be used, got a note threatening his family if he did not quit his job. His neighborhood, Adhamiya, was full of Baath Party loyalists. A month later, his father opened the door to a stranger, who shot him dead.

Laith’s mother begged him to stop working, but his salary, $700 a month at the time, supported the entire family. Then someone threw a sound grenade at the house. Graffiti appeared on a wall in ugly black paint accusing Laith of selling information about insurgents to the military. Laith and his family moved out of the house. Soon after, it was broken into and photographs of him with American soldiers were found in a family photo album.

“They know me,” he said, sitting in one of Baghdad’s hotels, because his family would not allow a Western reporter inside the house. “They know when I come and go.”

Many Iraqis who worked for Americans have already fled the capital or the country, and many plead for help or asylum on a daily basis. Of some 40 nationalities seeking asylum in European countries in the first half of 2006, Iraqis ranked first with more than 8,100 applications, according to the United Nations.

Remarkably few apply for refugee status in the United States, mainly because most Iraqis, even those who have worked for the United States government here, simply assume that getting American status is all but impossible. Iraqis cannot apply directly for refugee status in the American Embassy in Baghdad.

Another interpreter, Amar, who did not want his full name used, went to at least 10 embassies during a trip to Jordan last fall, but found only blank faces. He counts his sacrifice for America in bones and skin. He is missing a finger, an eye and part of his skull, after a large bomb exploded next to his Humvee last year. He has received two threats to his life. Two bodyguards accompany him everywhere. He stays in three different houses to confuse potential attackers.

"They said they have nothing for Iraqis," said Amar, sitting in a small house in western Baghdad. "We feel just like stupid trash."

Until recently, the administration did not appear to understand the gravity of the problem. State Department officials say they are now open to increasing the number of refugee slots the administration formally requested for Iraqis in September. That request already allows for as many as 20,000 more refugees from unspecified countries.

But advocates for refugees say that such an increase is unlikely if no special measures are taken, namely designating Iraqis as a group in peril and formalizing a system for receiving them.

Ellen R. Sauerbrey, the assistant secretary of state for population, refugees and migration, said the United States was hoping to identify the most vulnerable Iraqi refugees but was also dependent on the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees to do that.

Officials at the United Nations refugee branch acknowledge that they have moved slowly in identifying refugees, largely because of procedural obstacles and lack of money. The agency's budget for Syria last year was $700,000, less than one dollar for each Iraqi refugee in that country. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees said in October that its Iraq program was $9 million short and that some employees were going without salaries.

The State Department spent $35 million on Iraqi refugees in Iraq and the region in 2006. The United States spends approximately $8 billion a month on the war.

But there is no legal requirement for the United States to rely on the United Nations. It has run its own programs in the past, notably in Southeast Asia. Hundreds of thousands of Vietnamese were ultimately resettled in the United States after the American withdrawal from Vietnam in 1975. In that instance, a number of aid groups in neighboring countries divided the work of interviewing and assessing refugees, a system Ms. Limón and many other advocates for refugees are pushing for Iraqis today.

The United States has even run similar programs in Iraq, helping to resettle about 40,000 Iraqi refugees in the United States and other countries after a failed uprising against Saddam Hussein in 1991. In 1996, about 6,500 Iraqis who had links to an American-sponsored coup attempt against Mr. Hussein were granted asylum.

The Bush administration suspended resettlement of Iraqi refugees after the Sept. 11 attacks, and it did not resume until April 2005, after the process had begun for other Arab countries. A total of 198 Iraqis were resettled in the United States as refugees in the fiscal year of 2005, and 202 in 2006, but most were in the pipeline before the 2003 invasion, and few of the cases address the increasingly dire situation for Iraqis today.

Iraqis who work with the military often have to live separately from their families, to avoid putting them in danger. One 25-year-old interpreter left home when his parents in Mosul, in northern Iraq, learned of his work. Now in Baghdad, he has been back home rarely.

Laith lives with an aunt, away from his wife, in an area where no one knows him. After a visit to his parents several months ago, a stranger asked about his 8-year-old brother at a boys' school. The family fears that it was the early stages of a kidnapping.

"I bring a lot of troubles when I go to visit my family," he said, smoking a cigarette.

Congress approved one program last year to help get special immigrant status for Iraqi interpreters who have worked for the United States military. Laith has tried to apply. The law, which also applies to Afghan interpreters, is capped at 50 a year. Laith was told he needed a senior officer to vouch for him, but he has not worked with one recently, and the one he had worked with is now back in the United States.

Getting such letters, Laith said, has become increasing difficult, because the interpreters for the most senior American officers now tend to be Arabic speakers hired from the United States, not from Iraq.

The State Department has made it clear that it is deeply concerned about the fate of Iraq's religious minorities, including Christians. Officials at the department say that any refugee program must also be geared to those vulnerable groups.

As many as 100,000 exiled Iraqi Christians have relatives in the United States and would want to resettle there if given the chance, said Joseph T. Kassab, the executive director of the Chaldean Federation of America, a Michigan-based umbrella group that represents Iraqi Christians. Mr. Kassab said his group's estimates were based on questionnaires devised by University of Michigan professors and filled out by several thousand Iraqi Christian refugees in Syria, Jordan and Lebanon in recent months.

State Department officials and some advocates for refugees agree that the United States is not likely to begin resettling large numbers of Iraqis anytime soon. New counterterrorism laws after Sept. 11 have slowed immigration, particularly from countries in the Middle East, and Iraqi applications would be bogged down by those security issues.

A State Department refugee official said that any American resettlement effort would deal with only a small part of the overall refugee problem in the region.

Ms. Limón agreed, saying, "We'll have trouble with the few thousand who work in the Green Zone."

A quicker way to help would be to increase financing to countries that are accepting Iraqis — Jordan, Syria and Lebanon — and press those governments to improve their treatment of Iraqis by allowing them to work and travel, officials and advocates said.

That would be a real service for Iraqis in Jordan, who speak of rude and sometimes abusive treatment. Jordanians often do not allow Iraqis to bring in suitcases, travelers said, and have been known to turn away young men, forcing families to continue on without them.

"Put yourself in my shoes," said an Iraqi working in an American Army base who spent eight hours in the January cold last year with his wife and infant at the Jordanian border. "You take your family to another country and they interview you like you are a terrorist."

A residency permit is required, and Iraqis must deposit 50,000 Jordanian dinars — about $70,000 — in a bank without drawing on it for a year to obtain one. The worker, who wanted to be identified only as Abu Hussein, eventually moved his family back to Iraq, to the south, because he could not afford to stay in Jordan.

"The Americans are in control of this country," he said, talking about Jordan. "Why don't they become angry at how they are treating us?"

Abu Hussein is lucky: He lives on the Army base where he works. Laith does not have that luxury. He pays $400 to two guards and a driver to bring him to Baghdad from an American base near Beiji. Insurgents pay taxi drivers near the base to call them when they see a single man with a large overnight bag, he said. Once a cab driver recognized his face.

"I worked for three years, I lost a lot of things," he said, his voice urgent. "It's supposed to be some respect for me."

With Iraq War Come Layers Of Loss (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson And Josh White

"Grenade!"

Manning a .50-caliber machine gun in the turret of a Humvee, Pfc. Ross McGinnis could see the insurgent on a rooftop fling a hand grenade at his vehicle. He shouted and tried to deflect it, but it fell inside. Four of his buddies were down there.

What followed was a stunning act of self-sacrifice. McGinnis, a 19-year-old from rural Pennsylvania and the youngest soldier in his unit, threw himself backward onto the grenade, absorbing the blast with his body. He was killed instantly. The others escaped serious injury.

With the death toll for U.S. service members in Iraq past the 3,000 mark, McGinnis's heroism, on Dec. 4, stands as one extreme in the vast spectrum of how Americans are experiencing the Iraq war.

Like an emotional manifestation of the laws of physics, the casualties have rippled across the American psyche -- those close to the events have been profoundly moved, while those at some distance, the majority of Americans, have been largely unaffected. Concentric circles of loss spread outward, starting with grieving parents, spouses and children -- many so young they will not remember the father or mother who was killed in war. Families of the severely wounded face a future they never planned for and financial hardships they never imagined. In small towns, which supply much of the nation's fighting force, one death can send an entire community into mourning. Tens of thousands of U.S. troops continue to brave the war zone, while their friends, families and sweethearts worry at home.

At a Pentagon service to mark the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks, Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said that more than 1.3 million troops had been deployed to support the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. That is almost one in every 230 Americans.

In a USA Today-Gallup poll in October, 11 percent of respondents said they had a close friend, family member or co-worker who was wounded or killed in the Iraq war; an additional 43 percent had a friend, relative or colleague who had served in it.

For much of the rest of the country, the reverberations of the conflict are limited to headlines and television images of explosions or discussions about Iraq policy. The nation's war dead are returned to the United States privately, their flag-draped coffins shielded from cameras.

"The fatal flaw was when right after September 11 the president asked everyone to go on with their lives. That set the stage for no one sacrificing," said a Special Forces team sergeant who recently served in Iraq. "That's why they aren't behind it, because they don't have a stake in this war. They aren't losing or gaining anything. If you don't see it, smell it, feel it, how are you connected?"'We Will Meet Again'

In the Humvee in Baghdad's Adhamiyah district that afternoon, Sgt. 1st Class Cedric Thomas, the platoon sergeant, heard Ross McGinnis's warning and shouted back: "Where?"

"The grenade is in the truck," McGinnis yelled. Then he ducked down and backward, pinning the device between his body and the radio mount just before it went off.

"He had time to jump out of the truck. He chose not to," Thomas said, according to official military accounts of the incident. McGinnis's action saved Thomas and three other soldiers from "certain serious injury or death."

That evening, two Army officers in dress uniforms rang the doorbell at the McGinnis home in Knox, Pa.

"At that moment, I felt as if I had slipped off the edge of a cliff and there was nothing to grab onto," wrote McGinnis's father, Tom, in a statement provided to The Washington Post. "If only my life could have ended just a moment before this."

The following morning, news of the death of the lanky 6-foot-tall amateur mechanic rippled through the small community of 1,200, where his high school graduating class had 86 students. McGinnis, who was promoted posthumously to specialist and recommended for the Medal of Honor, was the first soldier from the town to die in Iraq.

"It was such a shock," said Vicky Walters, the high school assistant principal, who had known McGinnis since he was a baby. "We're grief-stricken. We were some of the ones who were insulated." About 7 percent of high school graduates in Knox, in western Pennsylvania, join the military.

McGinnis joined the Army at 17, before graduating in spring 2005. That fall, he came back to school in his uniform. It was the last time Walters would see him. "He just beamed," she said, choking up.

McGinnis's father, reflecting on his family's loss, wrote that his son went to war not to die but "to fight and win and come home to us and marry and grow old and have children and grandchildren."

"But die he did, and his mother, dad and sisters must face that fact and go on without him, believing that someday we will meet again." (Tom McGinnis's full statement can be read at http://www.washingtonpost.com.)'Home to a Different Life'

Christopher and Brandon Adams can't grasp what has happened. "They don't understand why Daddy talks that way, why Daddy can't play, why Daddy can't throw a football for them," Summer Adams said from her living room in Miramar, Fla.

Her husband, John, a Florida National Guardsman, was severely disabled in August 2003 by a roadside bomb in Ramadi, the capital of Iraq's Sunni insurgent stronghold of Anbar province. He is one of more than 22,000 service members who have been wounded in Iraq.

After the phone call telling her he had been injured, she waited three frantic days to find out where he was, she said, a complaint heard from families of others wounded early in the war. When she arrived at the intensive-care unit at Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington, she still had no idea about the extent of his injuries. "I guess we are supposed to receive the shock when we reach the hospital," she said.

John, who experienced severe trauma from a quarter-size piece of shrapnel lodged in his brain, lay heavily bandaged "with tubes everywhere," she said. After briefly acknowledging his wife, he fell into a long coma.

Months later, the couple were able to return to Florida, but their challenges had only begun. "We came home to a different life. Nothing was the same anymore," said Summer. John's speech was barely understandable, and though he eventually was able to walk again, he would pass out from vertigo if he looked up.

On Christmas Eve a year ago, the couple arrived at Summer's mother's house for dinner as some neighbors were setting off firecrackers. John wouldn't get out of the van. "He couldn't take the noise," Summer said.

With children who are 5 and 7, she has been unable to return to work as a claims supervisor for an insurance company and had to ask for help from the Red Cross to pay the mortgage and water bill. Army administrative problems left the family without pay and health insurance for the children for months at a time.

"I looked for whoever could help me, or I got on the phone and started yelling," Summer said. "As hard as it gets and frustrating -- and I scream -- you just have to keep going."

John, 40, said he feels frustrated, too, but recognizes that many other wounded troops are even worse off. "There are so many people like me," he said, his words slurred. "People need to know.""Working Our Way Out of It'

With a long scar on his face, metal holding his jaw together and more reconstructive surgery ahead, 23-year-old Sgt. Doug Szczepanski Jr. often finds people staring at him on the street. "Sometimes I'll make up stories and tell them it was a shark attack, or a skateboarding incident," he said. "Then when I tell them the truth, they'll look at me all weird and say, 'What? You got blown up in Iraq?' They don't know what to say."

Szczepanski was wounded in September 2005 when a suicide bomber exploded an Opel sedan packed with artillery rounds next to his convoy north of Baghdad.

"I was scanning to the left and it came up to us really quick," Szczepanski said. The blast blew his face open down to the collarbone, blinding him in the left eye and nearly severing his right ear. Shrapnel pierced his head and his upper body was covered with second- and third-degree burns.

His parents saw him six days later, when he was transferred to the hospital at Fort Sam Houston in Texas. "He was unrecognizable, he was so swelled up and burned," his father, Doug Sr., said in a phone interview from their home in Bay City, Mich. "You first see your child like that and you're so confused. You don't know if you should cry, sit down, throw up. We just wanted to get on the airplane and go back home and pretend none of this happened."

But relying heavily on their faith, the family persevered.

Szczepanski's mother, Amy, closed her business as a home child-care provider to care for her son, losing about $1,300 a month in income. "We probably would have lost our home without help," she said. "We're still working our way out of it." A survey this year by the nonprofit Coalition to Salute America's Heroes, which has helped the Szczepanskis and the Adamses, showed that more than half of families of the seriously wounded experience a drop in their standard of living.

Szczepanski has given up his goal of becoming a police officer like his father, but because he was spared brain injury -- "a miracle," his mother says -- he plans to obtain a degree in criminal justice and pursue a job in that field.'I'm Willing to Give My Life'

Sgt. Matthew Boone, 26, of Anderson, Ind., is serving his second tour in Iraq now; he thinks he will probably be back for a third. He also has served in Afghanistan and the Horn of Africa since 2001, when he joined one of the most deployed units in the Army, the 2nd Brigade, 10th Mountain Division.

"It has put into perspective what is really important, and that's my family," Boone said in October at a base outside Baghdad. "But I'm willing to give my life for this."

Still, "it's rough," he said. "You miss your kids' first this, first that." His youngest son, Marcus, is 3. More than half of U.S. troops deployed overseas are married, according to Pentagon statistics.

DOJ_NMG_0110853

The members of the 2-10 Mountain take pride in their many deployments. 1st Sgt. David Schumacher, 37, of Watertown, N.Y., has been to Iraq three times and has deployed a total of eight times, going back to his tour in Somalia.

"I love what I do," Schumacher said in a recent interview in Yusufiyah, Iraq. "This is what I signed up for. But I'd like to let my family enjoy me for more than a few months at a time."

Maj. Mitchell Watkins, 40, of Vonore, Tenn., has had seven operational deployments in his career and is on his third tour in Iraq, now as the executive officer of the 3rd Squadron, 4th Cavalry Regiment, based in Tall Afar. Watkins said that each combat death is intensely tragic -- he lost one of his closest friends during his last tour -- but that what the troops have given for their country should never be forgotten.

"I willfully continue to serve here because I believe that our sacrifice is still appreciated by many Iraqis who desire to truly be free, and by the people at home who are supporting us," Watkins said in November. "Having lost two close personal friends here in this war and almost 3,000 comrades, I understand the sacrifice this presents to my family, but I have no regrets."Hitting Home

After paying tribute to President Gerald R. Ford as he lay in state over the weekend, Katy Dotson, a high school teacher from West Milford, N.J., said she struggles with the number of American lives that have been lost in the Iraq war. Dotson, 24, said she recently sat in on a colleague's current-events class and was struck to see how little the students knew about the conflict and its victims.

"Most Americans don't understand that people are numbers and numbers are people," she said. They grasp the gravity of the situation only when tragedy strikes close to home. "We had one young man die from our town," she said. "It was a very big deal. The post office was renamed after him."

Statement From Parents Of SPC Ross A. McGinnis, December 23, 2006 (WP)

Statement from parents of SPC Ross A. McGinnis, December 23, 2006

When the doorbell rang Monday evening December 4th, about 9:30, I wondered who would be visiting at this hour of the evening. But when I walked up to the door and saw two US Army officers standing on the patio at the bottom of the steps, I knew instantly what was happening. This is the only way the Army tells the next of kin that a soldier has died.

At that moment, I felt as if I had slipped off the edge of a cliff and there was nothing to grab onto; just a second beyond safety, falling into hell. If only my life could have ended just a moment before this so that I would not have to hear the words they were about to say. If only I could blink myself awake from this horrible dream. But it wasn't a dream.

As the officers made their way into our living room, I rushed back into our bedroom and told my wife Romayne to get up; we had company. And they were going to tell us that Ross is dead. I knew of no other way to say it.

We rushed back out to meet the officers, and then the appointed spokesperson recited the standard message that Private First Class Ross A. McGinnis had been killed in action in Baghdad, Iraq, that day. They could tell us nothing more except that Army regulations required that the family be notified within 4 hours of the event. They offered their sympathy and support, and the Chaplain prayed for our strength in the days to come, and then they left us alone in shock, grief and disbelief.

In the days that followed, we were informed of the details of his death. The entire world probably knows those details now, since there was so much excitement about his heroic deed. Hundreds of family, friends and acquaintances offered us their words of prayer and comfort. But only time will take the edge off the knives that have wedged into our hearts.

Ross did not become OUR hero by dying to save his fellow soldiers from a grenade. He was a hero to us long before he died, because he was willing to risk his life to protect the ideals of freedom and justice that America represents. He has been recommended for the Medal of Honor, and many think that he deserves to get it without the typical 2 years that Congress has required of late. We, his parents, are in no hurry to have our son bestowed with this medal. That is not why he gave his life. The lives of four men who were his Army brothers outweighed the value of his one life. It was just a matter of simple kindergarten arithmetic. Four means more than one.

It didn't matter to Ross that he could have escaped the situation without a scratch. Nobody would have questioned such a reflex reaction. What mattered to him were the four men placed in his care on a moment's notice. One moment he was responsible for defending the rear of the convoy from enemy fire; the next moment he held the lives of four of his friends in his hands.

The choice for Ross was simple, but simple does not mean easy. His straightforward answer to a simple but difficult choice should stand as a shining example for the rest of us. We all face simple choices, but how often do we choose to make a sacrifice to get the right answer? The right choice sometimes requires honor.

Our Bible tells us that God gave up his only son to die for us so that we may live. But Romayne and I are not gods. We can't see the future, and we didn't give our son to die, knowing that he will live again. We gave him to fight and win and come home to us and marry and grow old and have children and grandchildren. But die he did, and his mother, dad and sisters must face that fact and go on without him, believing that someday we will meet again. Heaven is beyond our imagination and so we must wait to see what it's like.

God bless everybody that has comforted us in our time of grief. But we must not forget the men and women who are still putting their lives on the line; we must keep them in our prayers and keep reminding them with gifts and letters that they are loved and that we want them to return safely to their families.

Pop Music And The War: The Sound Of Resignation (NYT)

By Jon Pareles

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

"I was a lover, before this war." Those are the first words sung on TV on the Radio's "Return to Cookie Mountain," one of the most widely praised albums of 2006. Whatever the line means within the band's cryptic lyrics, it could also apply to the past year's popular music. Thoughts of romance, vice and comfort still dominated the charts and the airwaves. But amid the entertainment, songwriters — including some aiming for the Top 10 — were also grappling with a war that wouldn't go away.

Pop's political consciousness rises in every election year, and much as it became clear in November that voters are tired of war, music in 2006 also reflected battle fatigue. Beyond typical wartime attitudes of belligerence, protest and yearning for peace, in 2006 pop moved toward something different: a mood somewhere between resignation and a siege mentality.

Songs that touched on the war in 2006 were suffused with the mournful and resentful knowledge that — as Neil Young titled the album he made and rush-released in the spring — we are "Living With War," and will be for some time. Awareness of the war throbs like a chronic headache behind more pleasant distractions.

The cultural response to war in Iraq and the war on terrorism — one protracted, the other possibly endless — doesn't have an exact historical parallel. Unlike World War II, the current situation has brought little national unity; unlike the Vietnam era, ours has no appreciable domestic support for America's opponents. Iraq may be turning into a quagmire and civil war like Vietnam, but the current war has not inspired talk of generationwide rebellion (perhaps because there's no draft to pit young against old) or any colorful, psychedelically defiant counterculture. The war songs of the 21st century have been sober and earnest, pragmatic rather than fanciful.

Immediate responses to 9/11 and to the invasion of Iraq arrived along familiar lines. There was anger and saber-rattling at first, particularly in country music; the Dixie Chicks' career was upended in 2003 when Natalie Maines disparaged the president on the eve of the Iraq invasion. There were folky protest songs about weapons and oil profiteering, like "The Price of Oil" by Billy Bragg; in a 21st-century touch, there were denunciations of news media complicity from songwriters as varied as Merle Haggard, Nellie McKay and the punk-rock band Anti-Flag.

Rappers, who were already slinging war metaphors for everything from rhyme battles to tales of drug-dealing crime soldiers, soon exploited the multitude of rhymes for Iraq, while some, like Eminem and OutKast, also bluntly attacked the president and the war.

In 2006 songwriters who usually stick to love songs found themselves paying attention to the war as well. "A new year, a new enemy/Another soldier gone to war," John Legend sings in "Coming Home," the song that ends his 2006 album, "Once Again." It's a soldier's letter home, wondering if his girlfriend still cares. "It seems the wars will never end, but we'll make it home again," Mr. Legend croons, more wishful than confident.

John Mayer starts his 2006 album, "Continuum," with "Waiting on the World to Change," a pop-soul ballad defining his generation as one that feels passive because it's helpless: "If we had the power to bring our neighbors home from war," he sings, "They would never have missed a Christmas/No more ribbons on the door." The best he and they can do, he muses, doubtless to the disgust of more activist types, is to wait until "our generation is gonna rule the population."

There is more rage in the guitar onslaught of albums like Pearl Jam's politically charged, self-titled 2006 album. Contemplating the death of a soldier in "World Wide Suicide," the song lashes out at a president "writing checks that others pay," but ends up wondering, "What does it mean when a war has taken over?" And in "Army Reserve," a wife and child wait: "She tells herself and everybody else/Father is risking his life for our freedoms." The righteousness of old protest songs has been replaced by sorrow and malaise.

After three years of war, bluster has toned down, even in country music. Merle Haggard, a populist who has always been skeptical of the war in Iraq, tersely insists, "Let's get out of Iraq, get back on the track, and let's rebuild America first," on his most recent solo album, "Chicago Wind." In another song on the album, Toby Keith, whose "Courtesy of the Red, White and Blue (The Angry American)" was one of country's most bellicose war songs in 2002, joins Mr. Haggard for a duet, suggesting a reconsideration.

Like the electorate, all pop can agree on across political lines is sympathy for the troops. Bruce Springsteen's "We Shall Overcome: The Seeger Sessions" included an old song, "Mrs. McGrath," about a soldier crippled in battle; the album's expanded edition added an updated version of a blunt Pete Seeger song from 1966, "Bring 'Em Home."

On the hawkish side, the country singer Darryl Worley had a 2003 hit, "Have You Forgotten?," that justified the Iraq invasion as a reaction to 9/11. Now, he has a current Top 20 country hit that reiterates his support for the war but concentrates on its human cost, describing a returned soldier's post-traumatic stress in "I Just Came Back From a War."

In a song called "Bullet," the rapper Rhymefest portrays a soldier who enlisted as a way to get scholarship money for college and dies "with a face full of hollowtips." Even as cozy a singer as Norah Jones starts her next album, due this month, with "Thinking About You," a song about a lover killed in combat.

There were plenty of other songs directly about the war in 2006. But beyond topicality, the war also seeped into popular music more obliquely. The year's best-selling country album, "Me and My Gang," by Rascal Flatts, includes "Ellsworth," a song about "Grandma" and her dead husband, a veteran who left behind "his medals/A cigar box of letters." Gnarls Barkley's ubiquitous hit single, "Crazy," is about self-destructive insanity: "You really think you're in control? Well, I think you're crazy."

Thoughts of mortality fill albums like "The Black Parade," by My Chemical Romance, and "Decemberunderground," by A.F.I. War isn't the only factor behind all the foreboding in current popular music, but it's certainly one.

The 2000s are not the late 1960s, culturally or ideologically, but the musical repercussions of the Vietnam War may hint at what comes next. As that war dragged on, the delirious late 1960s gave way to not only the sodden early 1970s of technique-obsessed rock and self-absorbed singer-songwriters, but also to a flowering of socially conscious, musically innovative soul, the music that John Legend and John Mayer now deliberately invoke. It's as if this wartime era has simply skipped the giddy phase — which didn't, in the end, turn bombers into butterflies — and gone directly to the brooding. The end of the Vietnam War in 1975 was quickly followed by the rejuvenating energy of punk and hip-hop; there's no telling what disengagement from Iraq might spark.

Music and the other arts, unlike journalism, don't echo the news. They can be counterweights and compensations, the fantasies that work out, rather than the facts that don't. In the weeks before Christmas, I started noticing that nearly every time I wandered into a store or heard holiday music from a radio, John Lennon's "Happy Xmas (War Is Over)" — that chiming, purposefully optimistic song with the somber undercurrent — was on the playlist. When even Muzak programmers are facing up to life during wartime, pop is no escape.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Apple Probe Spotlights Two (WSJ)

By Nick Wingfield

The Wall Street Journal, January 2, 2007

Now that Apple Computer Inc. has disclosed further details of its internal probe into backdated stock options at the company, the spotlight is falling on two former executives implicated in the investigation, Fred Anderson and Nancy Heinen.

While the Cupertino, Calif., company still hasn't publicly named the two former executives its investigation has blamed for improper options-granting practices, people familiar with the matter confirm the pair are Mr. Anderson, Apple's former chief financial officer, and Ms. Heinen, former general counsel and board secretary.

Apple -- which cleared current management, including Chief Executive Steve Jobs, of wrongdoing on Friday -- has turned the results of its investigation over to the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission. Apple said in a filing Friday with the SEC that thousands of options grants between 1997 and 2002 were improperly dated.

Federal prosecutors are in the early stages of their examination of Apple's backdating practices, in a process that could take months.

An Apple spokesman had no comment. Attorneys for Mr. Anderson and Ms. Heinen say their clients did nothing wrong.

"As CFO, Fred did not play any day-to-day role in the granting, reporting and accounting of stock options and he was not involved in any knowing manipulation of the process," said Jerome Roth, Mr. Anderson's attorney.

"We absolutely deny that she did anything that could be called intentional misconduct," said Cristina Arguedas, Ms. Heinen's attorney.

Within the clubby circles of Silicon Valley, Apple's allegations have caused a stir among people who know the former Apple executives. A person familiar with the matter says Apple may argue that, as financial chief, Mr. Anderson should have been responsible for proper accounting of backdated options. In Ms. Heinen's case, Apple believes it has evidence that Ms. Heinen, as board secretary, was aware of improper documentation that said a board meeting occurred in October 2001 to approve a big option grant to Mr. Jobs, when no such meeting occurred.

Until more specifics are known, associates of both executives say they are standing by them. Mr. Anderson also sits on the board of Internet auctioneer eBay Inc. and is chairman of its audit committee. Meg Whitman, eBay's CEO, said Mr. Anderson will remain in both positions despite the allegations in the Apple investigation. "He is smart, with the highest degree of integrity and ethics," Ms. Whitman said in an interview.

Mr. Anderson, 62 years old, joined Apple in 1996 at a time when the company was in financial distress. He was one of the few senior executives at the company to survive a purge of old management when Mr. Jobs returned to Apple in the late 1990s. Mr. Anderson is credited with helping to improve the company's financial standing. Mr. Jobs asked Mr. Anderson to join Apple's board after he left the financial chief job in 2004.

After Apple found preliminary evidence of irregularities in past option grants last year, Mr. Anderson spent considerable time at the company's headquarters helping an independent investigative team comb through company records to more closely examine past options grants, people familiar with the matter say. It shocked him when Apple's lawyers later indicated to him that he might become a target of the investigation, these people say. As a result, Mr. Anderson resigned from Apple's board in October.

Ms. Heinen was one of Mr. Jobs's longest-serving lieutenants, working for him in the 1990s as general counsel at NeXT Software Inc., the company Mr. Jobs sold to Apple in 1996. Ms. Heinen joined Apple as a senior vice president and general counsel in 1997 and helped oversee a law department at Apple of about 100 people, including roughly 40 attorneys.

Rich Gray, a friend of Ms. Heinen's who worked with her at a small Silicon Valley law firm two decades ago, said he found it hard to believe she did anything wrong at Apple. "She's very smart and she has tremendous personal integrity," said Mr. Gray, a senior vice president and general counsel at Internet marketing company Claria Corp. "I just don't see it happening."

Ms. Heinen left Apple before the company's disclosure of stock-option irregularities. People familiar with the matter say her departure was unrelated to options backdating, though they declined to discuss the reasons in greater detail.

According to Thomson Financial Insider Analysis, Ms. Heinen sold Apple shares valued at $85 million throughout her tenure at the company, while Mr. Anderson sold shares valued at $76 million.

Editorial: Holding The Line (NYT)

The old year was certainly a boom one for American business, with record profits for companies and record bonuses on Wall Street. But in the background a major accounting scandal has quietly spread, now encompassing more than 120 companies. Fudging the grant date for stock options doesn't quite have the spotlight-grabbing immediacy of Enron's collapse, but it is still gaming the system at the expense of shareholders.

A study sponsored by Harvard Law School suggests that a large number of board members, instead of watching out for self-enriching tricks, were sharing in the lucre. As Eric Dash reported in The Times recently, the study found that board members at roughly 460 companies, around 1,400 outside directors, likely received stock options that were manipulated, unnaturally boosting their value. In other words, many directors saw their stock holdings goosed along with executives'. So much for independent oversight.

What is particularly disturbing is that the news of this malfeasance, far from leading to full-throated calls for investigation and punishment, has coincided with a broad-based effort from business advocates to roll back the stiffer regime of enforcement devised in the wake of Enron and WorldCom.

There is no legislative push to loosen laws and reverse rule changes precisely because there is little support for it among voters at a time when executive pay is skyrocketing and traders are bemoaning the fact that the Ferrari dealer is fresh out of quarter-million-dollar cars.

Some logical tweaks were needed. The Justice Department's prosecution tactics in corporate cases had become a little too aggressive, and small companies deserved a break on requirements under the Sarbanes-Oxley law — a reform inspired by the malfeasance of large, complicated companies. But the relaxation of a few miscalibrated, onerous provisions is where this effort should end.

Banks' Leases To Hedge Funds Are Questioned (NYT)

By Jenny Anderson

Inside a Philip Johnson-designed office tower in Boston's financial district, UBS, the giant Swiss bank, is running a "hedge fund hotel."

Like a few other big investment banks, UBS leases space to ambitious young hedge fund traders as a temporary home, complete with receptionists, espresso machines and consultants to help manage their information systems.

In return, the banks hope the hedge fund hotel guests may become big clients.

Some regulators, however, are growing concerned about the relationship between the banks and their hedge fund hotel guests, looking at whether the banks might be using the real estate relationship as a way to entice hedge funds to do business with them, possibly at the expense of their investors.

William F. Galvin, the Massachusetts secretary of state, has subpoenaed UBS and is examining other banks with hedge fund hotels in Boston to determine how they are charging for their services. He is looking at whether hedge funds are paying higher than normal trading fees to banks to compensate them for the office space and failing to disclose this expense to investors.

"It's a conflict of interest issue," Mr. Galvin said.

UBS, which declined to comment, is the leader in this business, with 400,000 square feet of hedge fund hotels in a number of cities. Bear Stearns is also active, with space for rent in New York, Boston, San Francisco and Los Angeles.

While the state investigation is in a preliminary stage and may not lead to any specific charges, at its heart is a thorny issue that has dogged regulators for decades. Money managers, including mutual funds and hedge funds, often pay Wall Street with "soft dollars" — inflated commissions that include the cost of trading (typically 1 to 2 cents a share) plus an additional few cents a share that can be directed to pay for research and other services.

Soft dollars are controversial because clients pay for the higher commissions, while the services often benefit the manager the most. Higher commissions result in greater expenses for the fund and potentially lower returns for investors.

In the late 1990s, the Securities and Exchange Commission cracked down on the use of soft dollars by mutual funds, concerned that investors were being duped into paying for services enjoyed by the manager.

Massachusetts is now investigating whether hedge funds are improperly using soft dollars to pay for space in these hotels and failing to disclose to investors that they are covering a major expense.

"It's the same soft dollar question," Mr. Galvin said in an interview. "What kind of quid pro quo might be in the placement of an order? What's the relationship between the entities?"

As hedge funds have exploded, so, too, have the fortunes of Wall Street, which earns billions of dollars a year in fees executing trades and lending money to hedge fund clients. Hedge funds typically trade more than other Wall Street clients and they trade exotic, high-margin products, like complex derivatives.

Because hedge funds have become such important customers, there are concerns that they may be receiving tips about pending mergers, for example, or other yet-to-be-disclosed news that could affect a stock price. Trading ahead of public disclosure would give a fund an advantage; while it generally would be illegal, it is often hard for regulators to detect or prove.

Trading and the soft dollars used to pay for it are only one part of the business Wall Street does with hedge funds. The main business of servicing hedge funds is called prime brokerage. It includes financing trades; finding and lending stock to allow hedge funds to short stocks (betting that their price will fall); structuring derivatives; and executing swaps. It can also include hedge fund hotels — securing real estate, receptionists and information technology and even managing, say, the risk of trading currencies in Asia.

The global prime brokerage business generates $8 billion to $10 billion a year, according to an estimate by the Vodia Group, a consulting firm for the financial services industry. The business is highly profitable, with a return on equity — a measure of how efficiently the bank reinvests its capital — of a healthy 15 to 20 percent. In 2006, Goldman Sachs made $2 billion directly servicing hedge funds, 22 percent more than the previous year.

Prime brokerage is only the tip of the iceberg when it comes to the fees that hedge funds generate for Wall Street firms: billions of additional dollars come from trading for these funds. Credit Suisse estimates that investment banks made $25 billion in revenue from hedge funds in 2004, $19 billion of which came from sales and trading and the rest from prime brokerage.

Hedge funds now control half the volume traded on the New York and London Stock Exchanges, according to Credit Suisse.

In markets like convertible arbitrage, hedge funds control 70 percent of the trading. (In convertible arbitrage, an investor buys a bond that can be converted into stock and then sells that stock short, betting that its price will fall because of the sale of convertible bonds.)

"Hedge funds generate about 30 to 35 percent of the equity commission volume of the major Wall Street firms," said Brad Hintz, a securities analyst with Sanford C. Bernstein & Company, a respected Wall Street research firm that manages money for wealthy individuals and institutions. But that is only part of the equation.

"Because a hedge fund has broad investment guidelines — it is not constrained like a mutual fund to invest in certain stocks or certain sectors — it allows the hedge fund to really go after some of the more financially attractive products the Street offers," Mr. Hintz said.

In the United States, Goldman Sachs, Morgan Stanley and Bear Stearns lead the pack in prime brokerage, collectively controlling about 75 percent of the market, according to Sanford C. Bernstein, a unit of AllianceBernstein.

But neither Goldman nor Morgan Stanley run significant hedge fund hotel operations. (Goldman inherited a small business from Spear, Leeds & Kellogg, which it bought in 2000.)

Bear Stearns' hedge fund hotel clients tend to be small. Bear is unusual because it accepts only "hard dollar" arrangements, rather then venturing into the murky area of soft dollars.

Bank of America exited the hedge fund hotel business 18 months ago because of a lack of demand.

Lehman Brothers and Credit Suisse have been building their prime brokerage businesses. Lehman has space that it leases to a select group of clients, but it is not a major player in hotel space. Credit Suisse prefers to cater to a small number of institutional-quality hedge funds that are expanding into high-margin products like structured derivatives and reinsurance.

Jefferies, a bank that caters to midmarket clients, recruited a significant part of Bank of America's prime brokerage team to build its business. Glen Dailey, head of prime brokerage, said the hedge fund hotel business was too expensive to build at Bank of America.

"It took a lot of resources, especially tech support," Mr. Dailey said. "Clients would call because there wasn't coffee or hot water. In the end, we felt like the client service group was spending 80 percent of its time on the real estate."

The 'Corporate Democracy' Oxymoron (WSJ)

By Henry G. Manne

The Wall Street Journal, January 2, 2007

They're back! Every 20 or 30 years shareholder democracy ideas come back in vogue, and their time seems to have arrived again -- with a vengeance.

The SEC is huddling on whether to facilitate direct shareholder nomination of directors through a new interpretation of its shareholder proposal rule. A prominent professor at Harvard Law School, Lucian Bebchuk, proposes, among other democratizing moves, amending state corporation laws to encourage contested elections for board members. There is ongoing controversy about whether mutual funds are making sufficient disclosure to investors of how they vote on various portfolio corporate matters. And European corporate governance circles are in a dither because the EU failed in a recent directive to qualify the usual one-share-one-vote rule with something approaching one-shareholder-one-vote. The list could be expanded considerably.

There is absolutely nothing new in any of this discussion. The real world has not changed in any significant way, and our knowledge of corporate governance has not been revolutionized by some intellectual breakthrough. Furthermore, the provenance of the "corporate democracy" oxymoron has long been understood. The idea results from the inappropriate conflation of political ideals with market institutions. Its persistence can only be attributed to the intelligentsia's far greater comfort and familiarity with political models and events than with knowledge and appreciation of how markets function.

But, as has been demonstrated time and again, the modern corporation is a market creation, not a political one. Hardly any aspect of "capitalism's greatest invention" cannot be explained by reference to the market forces that caused it to evolve as it has. Indeed, there is probably no aspect of modern state corporation laws, including limited liability, "personhood" and perpetual existence, that could not have evolved (albeit a bit more expensively) in a purely contractual, common law milieu. So it is with the selection of managers.

Multi-owner businesses with no single controlling shareholder have always had to select managers (here including the board of directors) to avoid the prohibitive costs and inconveniences of personal consultation and group decision making by large numbers of equity owners. Some sort of voting mechanism to select the central management was the most obvious and the cheapest solution, though other devices were feasible. Consideration of how a non-voting device might operate helps to reveal the practical essence of corporate voting and its radical difference from political voting.

Suppose, hypothetically, that all shares or interests in a new corporate venture were, in current parlance, non-voting. A provision in the charter or bylaws would then have to provide for some external mechanism -- perhaps a court, an independent trustee or a private commission of some sort -- to canvas all shareholders and determine who had sufficient shares to allow them to control the company and thus eventually to name the managers.

There would not be a vote. Rather the requisite number of share owners would simply "prove" to the outside agency their right to control the business. That shareholder or group of shareholders could then use any system they wanted to make the personal selection of managers after their control was certified. Of course, in practice it would be more efficient for the shareowners to designate their candidates in advance and use an election model to determine the outcome. But that is not crucial to this illustration. The critical determination is not the identification of the managers but rather of the holders of the controlling number of shares. From time to time, depending on the period or conditions established by the incorporators or applicable laws, this certification process would be conducted anew.

This little mental exercise illustrates that the selection of managers in corporations is ultimately a function of majority shareholding, not of any political-type shareholder election process. It should also demonstrate the fatuousness of any ideal of shareholder democracy. It was probably most nearly approximated by the pre-New Deal era of "banker control" of corporations, which, by all accounts, worked fairly well. And it is the de facto system in any corporation which has a control block of shares held by a single shareholder or cohesive group.

Public voting in corporations, which has so confused the public on the issue, is merely a cheap way of determining who holds the requisite number of shares and only incidentally who shall be the managers. If we had never used the word "voting" in corporation law, there is a good chance that many critics would never have thought up the idea of shareholder democracy on their own, since the principal overt evidence of an overlap with the political process would then be missing.

Corporate voting is not about reallocating resources, as is inevitably involved in political elections, nor is it about making actual managerial decisions, as in New England town meetings. There is no room in this scenario for contested elections or nominations to be made willy-nilly by the shareholders. Both of these ideas are part and parcel of the political version of elections. It is hard not to agree with Professor Stephen Bainbridge of UCLA Law School that, if either of these ideas had any real merit, we would have seen them tried and adopted in the real corporate world. We do not.

Also it now becomes clear why an unfettered market in corporate control (with whatever private provisions for managing changes of control are prescribed in the articles or bylaws) is so desirable in a large corporate system. This is actually a market for votes, since votes are the indicia used for control, and the votes and control move into the hands of those who, because they are best able to profit from them, are willing to pay the most for them. That is how efficient markets function. Thus the system of buying and selling votes, including the payment of premium prices for voting shares needed for control, works very well to settle the election issue.

It ill behooves corporate democrats like Professor Bebchuk to deride this system as not satisfactorily monitoring managers when he knows full well that regulatory interferences are mainly responsible for poor performance in the market for corporate control and, for that matter, for much of the steep escalation in executive compensation in recent years. That they would then propose intricate regulatory provisions for more shareholder democracy is evidence of the mindset that causes the problems. (No matter though; the hedge funds -- if we can just leave them alone -- have found ways around those market restraints, even to the point of creating a separate market for votes.)

Corporate voting, as an integral part of the control designation process, is premised on the not-illogical view that shareholders are interested exclusively in maximizing their return on investment and not in social causes, political movements or the reallocation of wealth. Some shareholders may put these interests above profit maximization -- but the laws of corporate governance should not countenance interference by those activists with the contractually established expectations of the vast number of investors.

Why do they always concern themselves with successful businesses instead of founding their own? Perhaps many of the advocates of shareholder democracy actually have a hidden agenda, most usually either a greater degree of government control over private enterprises, or more power to unions via their control of pension funds. Neither has proved beneficial to the investing public or is consistent with a vigorous and innovative public economy.

The hidden agenda of many corporate democrats is even more apparent when they argue that large corporations are indeed like small republics and should, therefore, like all governments, be democratized or constitutionalized. This is usually no more than an assertion that the large size of an otherwise private enterprise is sufficient to convert what would otherwise be a private ordering into something suffused with a public interest -- in other words, an argument for more socialism. The very success of a private concern becomes the reason for destroying its privateness -- a neat rhetorical trick if it was not so patently absurd. * * *

Sometimes this argument is made a bit more logical by saying that large size necessarily means that external costs will be visited on the rest of society. This is the basis for the currently popular claim that so-called "stakeholders" should have a real voice in how the corporation conducts its affairs. But even if there are occasional costly externalities associated with corporate activities, rearranging corporate governance, which is obviously functioning adequately for investors now, is an irresponsible and costly way to solve that real political problem.

We need corporate activists today more than ever, but we need them to lobby and argue for repeal of our many costly and ill-serving bits of corporate regulation. They might start with Sarbanes-Oxley, then go back in time to cover the Williams Act and state anti-takeover provisions, the Investment Company Act of 1940, the Securities and Exchange Act of 1934 and the Securities Act of 1933. I know this is pie-in-the-sky idealism, but it does not change the fact that, on balance, the world would be a far better place without these laws or anything like them.

CRIMINAL LAW:

In CIA Leak Case, Reporters Will Be Key Witnesses (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press

AP, January 2, 2007

WASHINGTON – Some journalists who made careers out of questioning government officials and bearing witness to history may soon find themselves answering questions from prosecutors as key witnesses in the CIA leak case.

Ten or more reporters from some of the most prominent news organizations could be called to testify in the perjury and obstruction case of former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby. It's rare enough for reporters to become witnesses. But the Libby case is even more unusual because journalists will be dueling witnesses – some called by the defense team, some by prosecutors.

"It will be unprecedented and, as far as I'm concerned, horrifying," Lucy Dalglish, executive director of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, said of the case, for which jury selection begins in two weeks.

Prosecutors want to show that Libby lied to investigators about his conversations with journalists regarding outed CIA officer Valerie Plame, and they are expected to rely on former New York Times reporter Judith Miller, Time magazine reporter Matthew Cooper and NBC Washington bureau chief Tim Russert to make their case.

Libby, the former top aide to Vice President Dick Cheney, has said he had no reason to lie and simply didn't remember those conversations. His attorneys have said they will call as many as seven unidentified journalists to testify about their conversations with Libby to bolster his case.

The Libby case has rankled news agencies for nearly three years, since Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald began subpoenaing journalists to testify before a grand jury. Fitzgerald said it was the only way he could thoroughly investigate whether any laws were broken.

After a lengthy court fight that included an 85-day jail term for Miller, Fitzgerald won cooperation from journalists. When Libby was indicted, it was clear reporters would be key witnesses.

That puts them in the awkward position of aiding a criminal investigation, something journalism groups say erodes the wall between the government and an independent press.

Plame's identity was first revealed by syndicated columnist Robert Novak. She believes she was outed as retribution for her husband's criticism of the Bush administration's prewar intelligence on Iraq.

Jurors likely won't hear much about the leak itself because the original source, former Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage, has already confirmed his role and Libby is not charged with the leak. But the trial is certain to renew questions about whether the administration used reporters to drum up support for the war.

Roy Peter Clark, a scholar at the Poynter Institute, a school and resource center for working journalists, said he worries about the fallout from the trial. If it's perceived that reporters grant anonymity to officials engaged in political gamesmanship, prosecutors might be more likely to subpoena them in cases where anonymity was granted in serious issues of public importance.

"This case, it's magnified by the fact that it's in Washington and the status of the players," Clark said. "It's a bizarre and I'd say dangerous case."

Justice Department policies require prosecutors to exhaust other remedies before sending subpoenas to reporters, and each decision is reviewed by the attorney general, although U.S. investigators and prosecutors occasionally have violated these rules. In the past 15 years, only 13 media subpoenas have been granted involving confidential sources, Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty told Congress in September.

"This record reflects restraint," he said. "We have recognized the media's right and obligation to report broadly on issues of public controversy and, absent extraordinary circumstances, have committed to shielding the media from all forms of compulsory process."

Libby's attorneys have not publicly named the reporters they expect to be defense witnesses. Two reporters have said they will fight subpoenas, but defense attorney William Jeffress said he expects that will be resolved before trial. Because Libby is calling them to testify about his own conversations with reporters, Jeffress said there should be no confidentiality concerns.

President Bush did not include Libby on his list of pre-Christmas pardons, and the Justice Department said he does not have a pending pardon application on file.

Feds Push For Internet Records (MINNST)

By John Reinan, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, January 2, 2007

The Justice Department says it wants to use Web-surfing data to fight child pornography. Critics say it's an invasion of privacy.

The federal government wants your Internet provider to keep track of every website you visit.

For more than a year, the U.S. Justice Department has been in discussions with Internet companies and privacy rights advocates, trying to come up with a plan that would make it easier for investigators to check records of Web traffic.

The idea is to help law enforcement track down child pornographers. But some see it as another step toward total surveillance of citizens, joining warrantless wiretapping, secret scrutiny of library records and unfettered access to e-mail as another power that could be abused.

"I don't think it's realistic to think that we would create this enormous honeypot of information and then say to the FBI, 'You can only use it for this narrow purpose,' " said Leslie Harris, executive director of the Center for Democracy & Technology, a Washington, D.C.-based group that promotes free speech and privacy in communication.

"We have an environment in which we're collecting more and more information on the personal lives of Americans, and our laws are completely inadequate to protect us."

So far, no concrete proposal has emerged, but U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has made it clear that he'd like to see quick action.

In September testimony before a Senate committee, Gonzales painted a graphic and disturbing picture of child pornography on the Web, which he called an urgent threat to children. The production and consumption of child pornography has exploded as the Internet makes it easier to exchange images, Gonzales said.

But federal agents and prosecutors are hampered in their investigations because Internet companies don't routinely keep records of their traffic, he told the committee.

Gonzales also pushed for Internet records tracking in an April speech at the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children.

DOJ_NMG_0110863

"Privacy rights must always be accommodated and protected as we conduct our investigations," he said. "[But] the investigation and prosecution of child predators depends critically on the availability of evidence that is often in the hands of Internet service providers.

"This evidence will be available for us to use only if the providers retain the records for a reasonable amount of time," he said. "Unfortunately, the failure of some Internet service providers to keep records has hampered our ability to conduct investigations in this area."

The Wild West of the Web

Internet service providers typically keep records of Web traffic only for short periods, usually 30 to 90 days, as a way to trace technical glitches. Many ISPs, along with privacy advocates, say that it's already easy for government agents to get the information they need to investigate crimes.

The FBI, without a court order, can send a letter to any Internet provider ordering it to maintain records for an investigation, said Kevin Bankston, an attorney for the Electronic Frontier Foundation, a San Francisco-based group that promotes free speech and privacy on the Web.

"There's been no showing that mass surveillance of all Internet users, mandated by the government, is necessary for law enforcement," Bankston said. "If this passes, there would be a chilling effect on free speech if everyone knew that everything they did on the Internet could be tracked back to them."

The government has offered differing rationales for its data-retention plan, said Harris, the privacy advocate.

"I've been in discussions at the Department of Justice where someone would say, 'We want this for child protection. And someone else would say 'National security,' and someone else would say, 'Computer crimes,' " Harris said. "We're operating in the wild, wild West here."

There are questions about what records would be kept, said David McClure, president of the U.S. Internet Industry Association, a Virginia-based group that represents about 800 small and medium-sized ISPs.

Is it a log of every website a user visits? Is it the actual content of e-mails and other Internet communications? Nobody in the government has offered specifics, McClure said.

"When we go to them for specifics, they start shuffling and hemming and hawing, and the issue goes away until the attorney general gives another speech," he said.

'This is all being driven by a political need, not a law enforcement need."

Congress could act soon

Kathleen Blomquist, a Department of Justice spokeswoman, would not comment on specific proposals for Internet records tracking.

"Because Attorney General Gonzales considers the protection of America's children to be a top priority of the Department of Justice, we are continuing to closely study the issue," she said.

Comcast Cable Communications, the Twin Cities' leading Internet service provider, said it does not retain information on the Web-surfing habits of individual customers unless ordered to by a court, a company official testified to Congress in June.

Mary Beth Schubert, a Comcast spokeswoman in St. Paul, said the company wouldn't comment further until a bill is introduced in Congress. That could happen in the upcoming session, where several lawmakers have promised to introduce legislation on data retention.

Crime: Losing The Street War (NSWK)

Newsweek, January 2, 2007

A recent surge in violent crime is creating anxiety at the Justice Department and posing potential political problems for the Bush administration. The 3.7 percent rise for the first six months of 2006, cited in a new FBI report, was greater than expected and included a 9.7 percent spike in robberies. (Minneapolis and Oakland, Calif., saw jumps of more than 30 percent.) Police groups say the surge comes at the same time the White House has drastically cut aid for state and local law enforcement programs. "We don't have the support from Washington," says Los Angeles Police Chief Bill Bratton.

DOJ_NMG_0110864

Government figures show the FBI has shifted agents off standard criminal cases to work counterterrorism; the bureau has 994 fewer criminal case agents than it did on September 11, 2001—an 18 percent drop. (A Justice Department rep says it's "highly unlikely" the crime increase is tied to federal funding, but they've dispatched teams to investigate.) The numbers have caught the attention of top Democrats on Capitol Hill. "If you look at the figures, they're pretty striking," says one Democratic aide, who is not authorized to speak publicly about policy. In a recent letter to FBI Director Robert Mueller, Judiciary Committee member Sen. Dianne Feinstein called the crime increases "alarming."

Homicides Up In New York; Other Crimes Keep Falling (NYT)

By Cara Buckley

The New York Times, January 1, 2007

In New York City, rapes, robberies and assaults, among other crimes, continued to decline last year, prompting the Police Department's top official to herald 2006 as a very good year. Homicides, however, climbed 10 percent in the city, reversing a much-hailed decrease.

"We'd like to see no homicides. The reality is we're going to have them," said Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly. "I think this is a very good year."

He called the increase in killings in 2006 all but negligible compared with 1990, a year with one of the highest homicide rates in recent history. That year, crack-fueled violence soared, and 2,262 people were killed.

Last year there were 579 killings citywide as of Dec. 24, an increase of 52 homicides over the same period in 2005. Yet overall crime last year was down 5 percent. The number of reported rapes declined by 7.4 percent to 1,486, subway crime plunged 13 percent and auto theft fell 11.4 percent.

The police said the year's jump in homicides was rooted largely in an unusually high number of "reclassified" deaths, deaths linked to injuries incurred in months or years past. There were 38 reclassified homicides in New York last year, compared with 21 in 2005.

New York's overall fall in crime also contrasts with an increase nationwide. According to a report by the F.B.I., violent crime across the country rose 3.7 percent during the first half of the year. Dallas remained the country's most violent city, with 3,985 crimes per 100,000 people, according to the midyear report, while New York ranked 10th with 1,1,87 per 100,000.

Myriad factors account for New York's continuing decline in crime overall, the police and criminologists say. They cited more effective policing, shifting drug patterns and the lowest unemployment rate in 30 years.

Yet what is puzzling, one expert said, is that overall crime is dropping even as New York becomes an increasingly polarized city, with haves and have-nots often living side by side in luxury condominiums and public housing.

"Within a few blocks, people are living worlds apart," said Andrew Karmen, a sociology professor at John Jay College of Criminal Justice and the author of "New York Murder Mystery: The True Story Behind the Crime Crash of the 1990s."

"In theory, that should make the poor more dissatisfied and drive people to commit crimes," he said. "But that doesn't seem to be happening in New York."

One possible explanation, Dr. Karmen said, is that the city is largely populated by immigrants, many of whom are driven by a determination to succeed.

"I think they still maintain a positive outlook and faith in the American dream," he said. "But if it doesn't deliver, attitudes could change."

It has proven difficult to root out violent crime in the city's toughest corners.

One of the city's most perilous neighborhoods is in the 75th Precinct in Brooklyn, which includes East New York. There the number of slayings last year was virtually unchanged from 2005 at 28, and 3,239 crimes were reported.

Public housing projects have a disproportionate number of crimes. While 5 percent of New York's eight million residents live in public housing, Commissioner Kelly said, 16 percent of the city's homicides take place there.

The Police Department plans to tackle that seemingly intractable problem by redeploying personnel from other areas and opening police substations in the most troubled housing complexes, Commissioner Kelly said.

Both homicide victims and suspects tend to have links to crime already, he said.

Of those arrested last year in homicides, 95 percent had criminal histories; 75 percent of the people killed did.

Such figures point to the department's need to continue expanding its homicide, shooting and crime databases, Mr. Kelly said.

"The more information we have, the greater the potential we have to prevent crimes," he said.

New York's rebirth as a safer-than-average large city since the 1990s has coincided with an increase in tourism here.

According to city officials, about 44 million people visited last year on business or pleasure.

"One overarching reason why people are coming here, in a city that was attacked five years ago, it's because they have a sense of comfort as far as security is concerned," Mr. Kelly said.

The department is continuing to pour more resources into community policing, forging bonds between its officials and local leaders, especially those from new immigrant communities.

Yet in neighborhoods where homicide rates climbed, residents seem divided about whether this recent and heightened focus was improving their lives.

Allah B, the director of the Allah in Mecca Youth Center in Harlem, commended officers in its precinct, the 28th, for holding local forums and listening to community concerns.

Even though slayings in the precinct more than doubled, to 11, last year, he said the increased connection between residents and the police fostered a greater sense of ease.

Yet a longtime resident of the St. Nicholas Homes in Harlem said police efforts to rout out criminals were having a divisive effect in her neighborhood.

"They caused a lot of trouble trying to play one person against the other," said the woman, who would give only her first name, Keisha. She said people in the neighborhood also felt harassed and persecuted by the police, and that such impressions heightened the tension and stress in the community.

Still, despite a slight increase in the number of homicides in her neighborhood, she said the streets felt far less violent than in previous years.

The sense that New Yorkers are increasingly inhabiting two different realities seems particularly strong in places like Fort Greene, Brooklyn, home to a thriving cafe scene and crime-plagued public housing complexes.

Eleven homicides were recorded in the neighborhood last year, compared with none in 2005.

Strolling along a stretch of DeKalb Avenue by Fort Greene Park late last week, Cheryl Pickett, 36, said she had no idea that murders had risen so sharply in the area.

Ms. Pickett, who has lived in Fort Greene for five years, said her perception of the neighborhood had not changed. She still thinks of it as a safe, child-friendly place with charming shops and bars.

"When things happen, it's really surprising," Ms. Pickett said. "This year seems no different than last."

Mayor: Evacuees Increased Murders (AP)

HOUSTON -- The number of murders last year in Houston hit a 12-year high and increased by 13.5 percent over 2005, figures the mayor attributes in part to the arrival of evacuees from Hurricane Katrina.

Houston had 379 homicides in 2006. That was the most since 1994, when 419 murders were reported, police said. In 2005, the city had 334 homicides.

Mayor Bill White pointed to Hurricane Katrina evacuees from New Orleans as one reason for the increase.

"We did have a surge in population from a city where the homicide rate is eight times the national average," White said.

Houston's population increased by 148,000 people in 2006, many of them Katrina evacuees, according to the city's planning department.

The swelling population helped keep Houston's homicide rate relatively steady, rising from 16.33 victims per 100,000 residents in 2005 to 17.24 victims in 2006. Nationally, the murder rate increased by 1.4 percent last year, according to FBI figures.

Some experts disagreed with White's characterization, pointing to national trends indicating rising rates of violent crime.

"It's not as if Houston's unique," said Jim Lynch, a criminology professor at the John Jay College of Criminal Justice in New York. "There are other cities experiencing this."

Other types of violent crime dropped in Houston in 2006, police said. Robberies, rapes, aggravated assaults, burglaries, thefts and stolen cars dropped between 2 percent and 9 percent when compared with 2005 statistics.

Lower Homicide Rate In 2006 Still Means 102 Died (COLDISP)

By Theodore Decker

Columbus (OH) Dispatch, January 2, 2007

Homicides in Ohio's other big cities jumped last year, but slayings in Columbus ebbed slightly.

Columbus police say 2006 ended with 102 killings, two fewer than in 2005. There were 88 in 2004.

Lt. James S. Schrader, a homicide squad supervisor, said the unit had feared that 2006 would surpass the previous year's surge, but the slayings slowed as the year ended.

"In the last two months, they've leveled off considerably," he said.

Meanwhile, killings in Cleveland and Cincinnati soared.

Homicides in Cincinnati topped its 2005 total of 79 by early December. By yesterday, the number had risen to 85, the most victims since police started keeping reliable records in 1950. Cleveland homicides have risen from 78 in 2004 to 109 in 2005 to, as of Saturday, 119 in 2006, the deadliest year in a decade, according to FBI and local statistics.

Nationally, slayings climbed in other cities after a decade of relative peace following the crack-cocaine-driven slaughter of the late 1980s and early 1990s.

"In 2006, American law enforcement finds itself once again facing a tipping point in violence on its streets, and it is spreading from city to city," a national organization of police officials said in an October study.

"While the nation has understandably focused on homeland security, it must recognize that there is a gathering storm of violent crime that threatens to erode the considerable crime reductions of the past," the Police Executive Research Forum study said.

Columbus' 2006 death toll began on Jan. 4, when two men were slain during a Franklinton robbery.

Among the victims who followed were a high-school sports star killed as he tried to defuse an argument, a mother slain along with her three children, and a 14-year-old shot to death after his friends hurled eggs at a passing SUV.

Not included are six people fatally shot by police and a shooting by a robbery victim that was deemed self-defense.

Fifty-two of last year's victims were black men; 23 were white men. Eightyone homicides involved guns.

"A large percentage are drug-related in one way or another, paybacks or ripoffs," Schrader said.

Police consider 59 percent of the killings solved, the same as in 2005. It would be higher if detectives weren't saddled with unwilling witnesses who clam up for a host of reasons, Schrader said.

"It's fear, it's lack of cooperation, it's implicating themselves in illegal activity."

Alfred Blumstein, director of the National Consortium on Violence Research in Pittsburgh, said those are common problems.

"In many of these settings, police don't have any information or credibility in the communities," he said.

Criminologists warn not to read too much into one year's statistics, and Blumstein said he saw little in Columbus that suggested a marked turn for the worse.

"Eighty-eight isn't that dramatically different from a hundred," he said. "That may well be the condition that Columbus could see for the next few years.

"If it were a real spurt, say you had gone to 130, then I'd look to see what kind of connectedness there is," he said, such as gang wars, a growing drug trade or an influx of prison parolees reclaiming turf.

Columbus' surge from 2004 to 2005 led the Justice Department to include it in a pending study of violent-crime trends, spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said.

The department has surveyed local officials in the 18 selected cities and now is combing through the information for better crime-fighting strategies, he said. The findings likely won't be released for several months.

DOJ_NMG_0110867

Homicides also climbed in Toledo and Dayton in 2006.

Through yesterday, Toledo had 34 slayings, compared with 28 reported to the FBI in 2005. Also through Saturday, Dayton police had logged 42 homicides, up from 34 in 2005.

"Murders are probably the least suppressible type of crime," said Toledo Police Capt. Ray Carroll.

Although some of Toledo's victims were truly blameless, most were involved in dangerous or illegal behavior that contributed to their deaths, Carroll said. And as in Columbus, his detectives are frustrated by a lack of cooperation.

Too often, he said, "You're dealing with other dirt nuggets who might be witnesses or involved."

Homicides On Rise In Seattle (SEAPI)

By Hector Castro And Scott Gutierrez, P-I REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, January 2, 2007

Shootings account for many deaths

Death came to Joaquin Tavares on a January evening in 2006.

· A violent year leaves a lasting wound among family, friends

Like so many other killings in Seattle last year, his was random, it was brutal, and it came at the point of a gun. A tenant angry over his eviction from an apartment blasted Tavares with a shotgun, even though Tavares had nothing to do with it.

"It was so horrible," said his sister, Alma Tavares. "I couldn't do anything after Joaquin died."

Tavares was one of 29 homicides reported in Seattle in 2006, and one of 21 killed by a firearm. Two of those shootings were ruled as justifiable and in self-defense.

Last year marked the city's highest number of homicides in three years and reflected an upward trend in violent crime nationwide that police chiefs and criminologists are trying to interpret.

Karen Ducey / P-I

Brenda Lee holds a picture of her son Jared Dahl-Lee at her South Seattle home. Dahl-Lee, 26, was driving on Rainier Avenue South on Sept. 21 when he was shot dead after a confrontation with another motorist.

The increasing number of homicides has ended a steady decline in violent crime that so many large American cities, including Seattle, enjoyed during the past decade. Nationally, the number of murders increased 1.4 percent over the same period in 2005, FBI statistics show.

Seattle, still one of the nation's safest cities, has not been immune to recent crime trends. Although 2006's final statistics weren't yet available, they were expected to show that Seattle's violent crime rate rose, perhaps 1 percent over 2005. In 2005, violent crimes jumped 8 percent over the previous year.

Assaults involving firearms in Seattle, something Seattle police began tracking in 2004, have climbed 37 percent since then through the end of November.

Driving up this year's homicide rate was Kyle Huff's mass shooting at a Capitol Hill home in March that shocked the community. Four months later, another gunman forced his way into the Jewish Federation of Greater Seattle downtown office and shot six people, killing one.

Those slain in Seattle this past year included a man stabbed to death by his sister's estranged husband, and a cabdriver caught in the cross fire when a woman in a brawl began shooting.

The oldest was 60. The youngest was 14. Three were beaten to death. Four were stabbed.

One man was shot by police, and another was killed in self-defense by a man he'd accosted near Westlake Center.

"There's not a pattern," Seattle police Chief Gil Kerlikowske said of Seattle's crime rate. "It's a little bit of everything."

Tavares, 43, was Seattle's first homicide victim in 2006. An artist and musician, Tavares was shot five times with a shotgun, allegedly by a man evicted from the building where Tavares had spent the night.

"I don't think he was crazy," Alma Tavares said of her brother's killer. "He was just mad at everybody. There was no reason to kill."

While some of the increased violence came from a surge in gang activity and some was tied to a more active city nightlife, there was no consistent pattern, Kerlikowske said.

"It wasn't like we could go out and find the one particular group of people that are kind of responsible for this," Kerlikowske said. "It's just this general swing toward increased violence."

Gary Boulden, a Seattle police victim advocate, said the crimes that involved multiple victims were particularly difficult.

"After Capitol Hill, after the Jewish Federation shooting, I'm ready for this year to end," he said.

It was just two years ago that Seattle saw only 24 homicides -- its lowest homicide rate in 40 years.

It didn't last.

"Everybody had decided this problem was solved. A lot of cities feel to their regret that they took their eye off the ball," said David Kennedy, director of the Center for Crime Prevention and Control at John Jay College of Criminal Justice in New York.

He assigns part of the responsibility for the recent increase in violent crime falls on city and federal officials, who fell into a sense of complacency after crime rates dropped during the 1990s.

Mike Urban / P-I

Paramedics aid a victim after a gunman went on a rampage at the Jewish Federation of Greater Seattle on July 28. Pamela Jean Waechter, 58, was killed, and five others were wounded.

Then came 9/11, and the federal government shifted resources from domestic crime fighting, which it had bolstered during crime waves in the 1980s and 1990s, to thwarting terrorism. In addition, local law enforcement budgets shrank and funding dried up for social programs aimed at improving disadvantaged neighborhoods, he said.

What troubles police officials in cities across the country is that the numbers are climbing at all.

"The general trend is the wrong way," Kerlikowske said. "And we're not hearing much of a response from the Justice Department."

But spikes in crime rates, whether up or down, are mostly attributable to groups of young men who are repeat offenders. They often live in the nation's poorest or most dangerous neighborhoods and are a small part of the overall population.

"These guys in these neighborhoods watch each other very carefully. When the streets pick up, these guys and these groups react to that," Kennedy said. "They'll be on edge and they carry weapons more often and they will use them more often. Often they will be acutely more conscious about whether they are respected.

"What that means is there is more violence, and when there is more violence, everybody gets a little more pumped up."

These groups aren't necessarily part of larger, organized street gangs, nor are they necessarily conscious of territory, leadership, or discipline, he said.

"They feed on themselves and when they get going, they can run for a long time unless something acts to interrupt that cycle."

In Seattle, Kerlikowske said the Police Department has spent time and money to combat the problem, including paying $3 million in overtime pay, the equivalent of placing another 30 officers on the streets.

Shifting assignments and recent hires also boosted the number of patrol officers. "I think we had more boots on the ground," Kerlikowske said.

This allowed commanders of the city's five precincts to focus on hot spots for trouble in their communities.

Even so, the cry for more police officers was never louder than in 2006. The result was a decision by the City Council to hire an additional 31 officers, something Kerlikowske is pleased to see.

"Now, we just have to put them on the street," he said.

The department has 1,277 sworn officers, of whom fewer than 100 are on patrol at any given time.

In 2006, Kerlikowske, like other big-city chiefs, kept up a steady effort to combat gun crime.

In October, the chief joined with several police chiefs nationwide to advocate against a proposed law in Congress that, had it passed, would have prevented the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives from disclosing crime gun data to local police departments, which use the information to trace weapons to previous owners, sellers and dealers.

"You can't be just satisfied with arresting the perpetrator of a violent crime and not looking at the instrument," Kerlikowske said.

Just last month, the ATF's Seattle field division opened a data center to track where guns used in local crimes are coming from. Seattle police also hired an analyst to look for patterns in the histories of the firearms used.

"If more guns are showing up in the hands of police that are recovered from a crime, that are sold from one particular location, you want to probe more deeply into that place," Kerlikowske said.

"This was a tough year on this community," he said, adding later, "I don't have a crystal ball for this next year."

But even if the murder rate remains the same, or even drops, one murder is still too many, said Boulden, the victim advocate.

"Every homicide just tears families apart," he said.

GUN DEATHS: THE 21 WHO DIED

In 2006, 29 people died in violent crimes in Seattle. Also, one man was shot to death by police; another man was killed in self-defense. These 21 were killed by gunfire:

Joaquin Tavares, 43, was shot five times with a shotgun Jan. 12 in a building at 3706 Airport Way S. The man accused of killing him was reportedly angry over his eviction from the building, but did not know Tavares. He is awaiting trial for second-degree murder.

Chayta Saechow, 26, died Feb. 2 at 3934 S. Eddy St. Neighbors reported gunfire at the home just after 10 p.m. and officers found Saechow dead inside. The case remains open.

Jeremy Robert Martin, 26; Suzanne Michelle Thorne, 15; Jason Travers, 32; Justin Grant Schwartz, 22; Melissa Lynn Moore, 14, and Christopher M. Williamson, 21, all died March 25, shot to death that morning at a Capitol Hill home where they had gathered after a rave. Gunman Kyle Huff, 25, then shot himself to death.

Francisco R. Green, 23, was shot just after 3 a.m. April 22 on Yesler Way near Occidental Avenue South in what police said was a gang-related shooting. A suspect is awaiting trial on charges of second-degree murder and assault.

Rhys Joseph Poc, 18, was shot and killed by Seattle police shortly after 8 p.m. April 25, after pointing a revolver at officers confronting him on a side street just off Broadway. His death was ruled justified.

Michael S. Phillips, 47, died May 30 after being shot multiple times as he sat in his SUV in the 900 block of 22nd Avenue South near Judkins Park in the Central District. The suspect is being held in Youth Detention Services awaiting trial for second-degree murder. He reportedly had intended to buy drugs from Phillips.

Brandon Jeremy Clement, 24, was shot once in the chest June 3 and found dead on Eighth Avenue South in the International District. No arrests.

Hugo Rabanales-Aguilar, 21, was shot June 16 in the 1700 block of 14th Avenue South. No arrests.

Juan Hernandez Alba, 40, was found just before midnight June 26, shot to death at 14th Avenue South and South Donovan Street. The case remains open.

Berhane F. Haile, 39, a taxi driver, was shot in the neck and killed about 2:30 a.m. July 12 in the 400 block of 12th Avenue. A woman involved in a nearby melee had pulled out a gun and began shooting, striking Haile and one other man, who was wounded. The case remains open.

Pamela Jean Waechter, 58, was shot and killed July 28 when Naveed Haq allegedly forced his way into the Jewish Federation of Greater Seattle building on Third Avenue and began shooting, wounding five other women. He is awaiting trial for murder, attempted murder, burglary, kidnapping and malicious harassment.

Edward Michael Costello Jr., 60, died Aug. 16 when he was shot multiple times in a parked car on Port of Seattle property under the West Seattle bridge. No arrests.

Justice DeShaun White, 25, died Aug. 31 after being shot multiple times as he sat in a parked car about 2 a.m. in the 300 block of East Harrison Street. No arrests.

Jared Leroy Dahl-Lee, 26, was driving along Rainier Avenue South on Sept. 21 when he was shot after a confrontation with another motorist. No arrests.

Daniel Allen Cullotti, 25, was shot to death Oct. 7 by a 52-year-old man he attacked near Fourth Avenue and Pine Street. Investigators found the gunman had acted in self-defense.

Robert N. Samson, 53, was found shot in front of his West Seattle home Dec. 11. Police later arrested a 24-year-old Skyway man they believe stole marijuana from Samson, then shot him. The suspect is awaiting trial for first-degree murder.

Washington Region's Homicides Fall Sharply (WP)

By Allison Klein, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 1, 2007

Local Decline Defies National Upswing

Homicides dropped sharply in the Washington region in 2006, with the District reaching a 21-year low and Prince George's County showing a significant decrease after an alarming year of bloodshed.

The District recorded 167 killings -- a 15 percent drop from the 196 slayings in 2005. Prince George's had 134 killings last year, compared with a record 169 in 2005.

Overall, 417 homicides occurred in the Washington area last year, down by about 10 percent from 2005, when there were 462 killings. About half of the cases have been solved.

The decline comes as violence rises nationwide. Reports of homicides, assaults and other violent offenses rose by nearly 4 percent in the first six months of 2006, compared with the same period in 2005, according to a recent FBI report.

Crime analysts said the Washington area's drop most likely is tied to a variety of factors, including economic gentrification, population shifts, more effective policing strategies and the jailing of violent predators. They also warned that crime is still quite high in some parts of the region.

The national rate of killings for mid-size cities the size of Washington is about 14 per 100,000 people, according to FBI statistics. The rates of the region's urban areas are higher: 29 per 100,000 in the District and 15 per 100,000 in Prince George's.

"It's always good news when it's down," said Brian Forst, a professor of criminal justice at American University. "But down from very high does not mean low."

A Washington Post count combines preliminary statistics from municipal, state and county police departments within the boundaries of a county. The totals showed 202 homicides in eight Maryland counties, down from 217 the previous year, and 48 in five Virginia jurisdictions, down from 49 in 2005. The District had 196 homicides in 2005.

Last year marked the third consecutive year that the District has recorded fewer than 200 homicides -- a far cry from the bloodshed of the late 1980s and early 1990s, during the crack cocaine epidemic; in 1991, the city had 489 killings. The number of homicides last year is the second lowest since 1966.

"For a change, we're going against the trend in a positive way," said Charles H. Ramsey, who stepped down last week after nearly nine years as D.C. police chief.

Ramsey attributed some of the drop to better officer deployment, the meticulous tracking of crime and the department's efforts to keep closer tabs on ex-offenders.

Eric H. Holder Jr., a former U.S. attorney who became second in command at the Justice Department, said some of the community-based programs that were launched in the District in the 1990s are paying dividends.

"It's the notion that you get men involved in the lives of their kids, that you have after-school activities, that you work on the kinds of things that tend to breed crime -- poor educational systems, a lack of jobs," said Holder, now a lawyer in private practice. "You've got to be smart when you fight crime, not only tough."

Others pointed out that demographics are working in favor of cutting crime in the District and Prince George's. In the District, the number of men 18 to 24 -- the cohort responsible for a large proportion of crime -- dropped by 51 percent between 2000 and 2005, according to census data. In Prince George's, the number dropped by 3 percent in the same period, the data show.

Chuck Wexler, executive director of the Police Executive Research Forum, said Ramsey's declaration of a "crime emergency" in the summer also had a significant effect. The move gave Ramsey the authority to shift officers' schedules when homicides and robberies were surging. Soon after that, the numbers went down.

The city got more than $10 million for overtime patrols, put up neighborhood surveillance cameras and installed in some areas technology that senses gunfire and sends a signal to police.

"They put a substantial amount of resources into that and turned it around," Wexler said.

He also suggested that a drop in killings in Prince George's was inevitable because the county had a record high the previous year. The 2006 numbers are closer to what the county recorded in 2003, when 128 people were slain.

"It wouldn't be fair to say that's not progress, but it was so high in 2005, it had to come down the next year," Wexler said.

Prince George's Police Chief Melvin C. High had a much different take: "We're seeing the fruits of groundwork we laid more than a year ago with a series of crime-fighting initiatives. With our decrease in crime, county residents know we're a safer community and that crime is trending counter to a nationwide surge reported by the FBI."

Those efforts included targeting high-crime areas, deploying specialized teams and making key arrests, High said.

Other categories of crime also dropped in the District and Prince George's. Robberies dropped by 5 percent, assaults were down slightly and car thefts fell by 9 percent in the District. In Prince George's, carjackings were down by about 40 percent.

More than two-thirds of the region's homicides last year took place in the District and Prince George's, reflecting longstanding patterns. Police in other jurisdictions typically spend much of their time dealing with less serious violent crimes and property offenses.

The District's totals were the lowest since 1985, when 147 homicides were recorded. About 23 of the 167 killings were drug-related, and the same number stemmed from robberies, police said. Arguments led to at least 42 homicides, and the others were tied to retaliation, domestic disputes, gang rivalries and other motivations.

The District's victims included 17-year-old Cynthia Gray, gunned down in August after sheltering her baby godson from bullets on a Southeast Washington street; Alan Senitt, 27, an aspiring politician who was fatally stabbed in July during a robbery in Georgetown; and Chris Crowder, 44, a community activist who used a wheelchair and was shot in July in a park near the Washington Convention Center.

Many of the homicides in Prince George's involved young men who were shot in communities inside the Capital Beltway. Several killings of young Latino men also occurred in the Langley Park and Hyattsville areas, and some of those are believed to have been committed by members of the Mara Salvatrucha gang, known as MS-13, police said.

In Montgomery County, 20 homicides occurred in 2006, up from 19 the previous year. Nearly half of those killings were domestic incidents, police said. Authorities there also said they are dealing with gang crime and noted that at least three of the year's slayings involved gang members.

The biggest jump in homicides in Maryland was in Anne Arundel County, with 26 killings, compared with 16 in 2005. The victims there included talent agent Richard Preston Shaw, 56, shot inside his Hanover business in July; dentist Albert Woonho Ro, 51, who died of blunt force trauma in his Glen Burnie office in September; and Jay Steven Fayne, 52, owner of a loan business, fatally shot at his Severna Park home in October. The three cases remain unsolved.

In Virginia, Prince William County reported 15 killings, up from 13 in 2005. Police there have noted an increase in street robberies against Hispanics. In September, two day laborers -- one black, one Hispanic -- were killed nine days apart. One was Gordon Harris, 49, who had been a day laborer for two decades; the other was Serafin Alvarez Negrete, 32, who had come from Mexico a year earlier.

Loudoun and Arlington counties remained about steady with four homicides each, and Alexandria had five. Alexandria's cases included the February shooting of Aaron Brown, 18, by an off-duty city police officer outside a pancake house. Prosecutors determined that the officer acted in self-defense when he fired six shots at a moving Jeep, one of which struck Brown, a first-year student at Northern Virginia Community College.

Slayings in Fairfax County dipped from 23 to 20. But Fairfax had one of the region's most shocking crimes: In May, two police officers were shot to death in the line of duty, a first for the county. Detective Vicky O. Armel and Officer Michael E. Garbarino were slain outside the Sully District station by Michael W. Kennedy. Kennedy, 18, was then killed by other officers.

Still, with a population of more than 1 million, Fairfax maintained one of the lowest homicide rates in the country among large jurisdictions -- two per 100,000 residents.

Where's The Outrage Over Black-on-black Killings? (USAT)

By Dewayne Wickham

USA Today, January 2, 2007

BALTIMORE — A couple of days before Christmas, I phoned Patricia West, an old friend I hadn't spoken to in years. It was a call I didn't want to make — the kind of call no one should ever have to place.

It was a brief conversation, a few minutes of aimless chatter that quickly went from awkward laughter to muffled crying. I called her to say how devastated I was to hear that her son had been killed. His death was reported in the final paragraph of a short crime story in The (Baltimore) Sun that gave the bare facts of his demise.

"The other homicide victim, Kevin West, 39, of the 9000 block of Meadow Heights Road in Randallstown, was found fatally shot shortly after 8 a.m. Saturday by officers investigating reported gunfire in the 2800 block of Virginia Ave., police said."

Kevin West's murder was the 260th homicide this year in Baltimore — a city in which virtually all of the murder victims and those arrested for murder are black. On the same day that he was gunned down, tens of thousands of demonstrators marched down Fifth Avenue in New York to protest the Nov. 25 killing of another black man. Sean Bell was felled by a hail of police gunfire moments after he and two friends left his bachelor party early on the morning of the day he was to have been married.

Just why the cops fired on the unarmed men is unclear. Bell's death drew the scorn of civil rights leaders and black activists, many of whom took part in the march. West's killing has generated no such attention.

And that makes me made as hell.

As troubling as it is that Bell's life might have been cut short by the unlawful actions of some rogue cops, it bothers me more that most of this nation's black murder victims are killed by other blacks. And despite this chilling fact, nowhere have tens of thousands of people taken to the streets recently to protest this carnage. Not in New York, or Baltimore, or Atlanta, or Detroit, or Chicago. Nowhere.

Of the country's 14,860 homicide victims in 2005, 7,125 were black, according to the FBI's Uniform Crime Report. And of the 3,289 cases that year in which a single black was killed by a single assailant, the FBI says, 91% of the killers were black.

Let me put this another way: The number of blacks killed in 2005 in this one homicide category alone approaches the total of all the blacks lynched in this country from 1882 to 1968, according to records maintained by Tuskegee University.

So why aren't black leaders taking up this fight? Why do so many turn out to decry the death of one black man at the hands of some cops, but no mass rallies take on the deaths of thousands of blacks who are slaughtered by other blacks?

"I think it's because we know it's our fault, and we're constantly looking for someone else to blame," says Baltimore City Police Commissioner Leonard Hamm, who, like me, grew up in Cherry Hill, a poor black neighborhood on the city's south side.

Hamm says most black leaders are afraid to address this issue, afraid to confront the apathy, fear and indifference that allow many poor black neighborhoods to become killing fields.

He could be right.

But whatever the reason, it's time for black leaders — activists, preachers, educators, politicians, business and community leaders — to say enough is enough.

It's time for them to be as aggressive, and as demanding, in combating the black murder rate as they are in fighting for an increase in minimum wage or an expansion in health care.

The ripple effects of black-on-black killings have turned many inner city neighborhoods into urban wastelands, chased businesses from those communities, fueled a growth in other crimes and sapped the resources of local governments.

As mad as black folks have a right to be over the killing of Sean Bell, we ought to be angry over the failure of black leaders to be equally outraged over the murder of Kevin West — and the thousands of blacks who are killed each year by other blacks.

The Private Arm Of The Law (WP)

By Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, January 2, 2007

RALEIGH, N.C. -- Kevin Watt crouched down to search the rusted Cadillac he had stopped for cruising the parking lot of a Raleigh apartment complex with a broken light. He pulled out two open Bud Light cans, an empty Corona bottle, rolling papers, a knife, a hammer, a stereo speaker, and a car radio with wires sprouting out.

"Who's this belong to, man?" Watt asked the six young Latino men he had frisked and lined up behind the car. Five were too young to drink. None had a driver's license. One had under his hooded sweat shirt the tattoo of a Hispanic gang across his back.

A gang initiation, Watt thought.

With the sleeve patch on his black shirt, the 9mm gun on his hip and the blue light on his patrol car, he looked like an ordinary police officer as he stopped the car on a Friday night last month. Watt works, though, for a business called Capitol Special Police. It is one of dozens of private security companies given police powers by the state of North Carolina -- and part of a pattern across the United States in which public safety is shifting into private hands.

Private firms with outright police powers have been proliferating in some places -- and trying to expand their terrain. The "company police agencies," as businesses such as Capitol Special Police are called here, are lobbying the state legislature to broaden their jurisdiction, currently limited to the private property of those who hire them, to adjacent streets. Elsewhere -- including wealthy gated communities in South Florida and the Tri-Rail commuter trains between Miami and West Palm Beach -- private security patrols without police authority carry weapons, sometimes dress like SWAT teams and make citizen's arrests.

Private security guards have outnumbered police officers since the 1980s, predating the heightened concern about security brought on by the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. What is new is that police forces, including the Durham Police Department here in North Carolina's Research Triangle, are increasingly turning to private companies for help. Moreover, private-sector security is expanding into spheres -- complex criminal investigations and patrols of downtown districts and residential neighborhoods -- that used to be the province of law enforcement agencies alone.

The more than 1 million contract security officers, and an equal number of guards estimated to work directly for U.S. corporations, dwarf the nearly 700,000 sworn law enforcement officers in the United States. The enormous Wackenhut Corp. guards the Liberty Bell in Philadelphia and screens visitors to the Statue of Liberty.

"You can see the public police becoming like the public health system," said Thomas M. Seamon, a former deputy police commissioner for Philadelphia who is president of Hallcrest Systems Inc., a leading security consultant. "It's basically, the government provides a certain base level. If you want more than that, you pay for it yourself."

The trend is triggering debate over whether the privatization of public safety is wise. Some police and many security officials say communities benefit from the extra eyes and ears. Yet civil libertarians, academics, tenants rights organizations and even a trade group that represents the nation's large security firms say some private security officers are not adequately trained or regulated. Ten states in the South and West do not regulate them at all.

Some warn, too, that the constitutional safeguards that cover police questioning and searches do not apply in the private sector. In Boston, tenants groups have complained that "special police," hired by property managers to keep low-income apartment complexes orderly, were overstepping their bounds, arresting young men who lived there for trespassing.

In 2005, three of the private officers were charged with assault after they approached a man talking on a cellphone outside his front door. They asked for identification and, when he refused, followed him inside and beat him in front of his wife and three children.

Lisa Thurau-Gray, director of the Juvenile Justice Center at Suffolk University Law School in Boston, said private police "are focusing on the priority of their employer, rather than the priority of public safety and individual rights." But Boston police Sgt. Raymond Mosher, who oversees licensing of special police, says such instances are rare.

Private police officers "do some tremendously good things," Mosher said, recalling one who chased down a teenager running with a loaded gun.

In Durham, after shootings on city buses, the transit authority hired Wackenhut Corp. police to work in the main terminal in tandem with city police officers stationed on buses.

"There is a limit to the amount of law enforcement you can expect taxpayers to support," said Ron Hodge, Durham's deputy police chief, who said some of his requests for additional officers have been turned down in recent years. Although, as in most cities, some Durham police work privately while they are off-duty, Hodge said the demand for off-duty police outstrips the supply.

In one of the country's most ambitious collaborations, the Minneapolis Police Department three years ago started a project called "SafeZone" with private security officers downtown, estimated to outnumber the police there 13 to 1. Target Corp. and other local companies paid for a wireless video camera system in downtown office buildings that is shared with the police. The police department created a shared radio frequency. So far, the department has trained 600 security officers on elements of an arrest, how to write incident reports and how to testify in court.

When a bank was robbed in the fall, a police dispatcher broadcast the suspect's description over the radio. Within five minutes, a security officer spotted the man, bag of cash in hand, and helped arrest him.

Private police officers work across the Washington area, although their numbers have not been growing sharply. According to the D.C. police department, any private security employee who is armed must be licensed as a "special police" officer with arrest powers; the city has more than 4,000 of them, including at universities and some hospitals. Maryland and Virginia, which have different criteria, each have several hundred private police, according to law enforcement and regulatory officials.

In Virginia, the Wintergreen Resort has a private police department with 11 sworn officers. They include an investigator who last year helped solve a string of break-ins along the Appalachian Trail, identifying the burglar with images from the department's video camera when he drove out of the resort with a stolen car.

The Virginia Department of Criminal Justice Services is also trying to foster closer ties between security companies without police powers and the police and sheriff's departments. The agency has begun training and certifying "Private Crime Prevention Practitioners" and soon plans to send security companies e-mails with unclassified homeland security threats and crime alerts.

Maryland has no similar collaboration, according to the Maryland State Police, which licenses security officers. The District is strengthening its supervision of security and private police, with new requirements for training and background checks having been adopted by the D.C. Council.

Some of the most sophisticated private security operations have expanded in part because of shrinking local and federal resources. The nation's largest bank, Bank of America, hired Chris Swecker as its corporate security executive last year when he retired as assistant director of the FBI. Even as identity theft and other fraud schemes have been booming, Swecker said, fewer federal investigators are devoted to solving such crimes, and many U.S. attorney's offices will not prosecute them unless their value reaches $100,000.

As a result, he said, federal officials now ask the bank's own investigators to do the work, including a three-year probe that helped police and the FBI piece together an identity-theft ring that defrauded 800 bank customers of $11 million.

In North Carolina, the state Department of Justice requires company police to go through the same basic training as public officers. They have full police powers on the property they are hired to protect.

Capitol Special Police's owner, Roy G. Taylor, was chief of three small nearby police departments and held state law enforcement jobs before starting the company in 2002. As Hispanic gangs were increasing, he said, "I saw a niche." The company has eight officers, some of whom are part time while working for area police departments.

They have used batons and pepper spray but have not fired a service weapon, Taylor said. Once, in an apartment complex where they worked in nearby Carrboro, Capt. Nicole Howard, Taylor's wife, dressed in plain clothes to attract a convicted rapist who had been peering in windows and stalking women. Then she arrested him for trespassing.

Today, charging $35 per hour, the firm has contracts with four apartment complexes, a bowling alley, two shopping centers and a pair of private nightclubs. A few weeks ago, two of the Taylors' employees, Capt. Kenny Mangum and Officer Matt Saylors, walked over to a car at the nightclub Black Tie to warn the men inside not to loiter in the parking lot. Catching a whiff of marijuana, they found seven rocks of crack cocaine in the ashtray and two handguns under the seat of the driver, who was a convicted felon. They called the Raleigh police to handle the arrest.

Because they are part of a private company, Taylor and his officers are mindful that customers are billed for the time they spend testifying in court.

"I try to make arrests only when absolutely necessary," said Watt, the officer who stopped the six men with the open beer cans. The company's marked patrol cars, he said, do not have radios to call for backup help or computers to check immediately for outstanding warrants or criminal records.

After satisfying himself that the six young men, lined up nervously and shivering in the cold night air, had no drugs, Watt let them go.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

High Cost Of Housing Suit (BSUN)

By Eric Siegel, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, January 2, 2007

City, HUD agree to pay $300,000 in legal fees in civil rights case

The city and the federal government have agreed to pay nearly $300,000 to lawyers representing black Baltimore public housing residents - the latest installment of legal fees in a long-running civil rights case.

The payments - $236,744 from the city and $53,427 from the federal government - are being made to the American Civil Liberties Union of Maryland and the private firm of Brown, Goldstein & Levy for monitoring a partial consent decree in the case during a two-year period from July 1, 2002, through June 30, 2004, according to court documents.

City officials say this bill brings the total they have paid out in the case to the ACLU, Brown, Goldstein & Levy and another private firm no longer involved in the case to $1.5 million.

In addition, officials say they have paid $5.1 million since 1998 to the local firm of Whiteford, Taylor & Preston to defend the city against allegations of discrimination.

A spokesman for the Justice Department could not say how much the federal government has paid to plaintiffs' lawyers in the case, but court records indicate it is about $500,000. The Justice Department has used lawyers from its civil division to represent the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development.

"It's almost unfathomable that you could spend that much money and not produce one housing unit," city Housing Commissioner Paul T. Graziano said of the money the city has paid to lawyers in the case. "It's also disturbing that it will continue indefinitely."

Graziano said the city could have created 40 new affordable housing units or renovated and made disabled-accessible 100 apartments for the money it has spent in legal fees in the case.

But Andrew D. Freeman, an attorney for Brown, Goldstein & Levy, said the fees paid to lawyers for public housing residents was necessitated by the city's lethargy in complying with the terms of the partial consent decree that was negotiated in 1996.

Under the terms of the decree that allowed the old family public housing high-rises to be redeveloped as mixed-income communities, the city and the federal government agreed to provide some 2,200 units for public housing residents in mostly white middle-class areas of the city and the suburbs by the end of 2002.

By that time, however, just 68 units had been provided, Freeman said. As of this past summer, about 800 units had been provided through a combination of special housing vouchers and renovated construction - "still a long way short," Freeman said.

"If the city had spent that much money to comply with the partial consent decree, there wouldn't be the need for all the lawyers," Freeman said.

Federal law allows plaintiffs who prevail in civil rights cases against government entities to recover legal fees and expenses. Plaintiffs are generally considered to have prevailed in cases in which consent decrees are negotiated, even if there are no admissions of wrongdoing by the government.

The legal fees stem from a lawsuit filed in January 1995 by the ACLU on behalf of black city public housing residents against the city, its public housing agency and HUD.

The lawsuit charged that the city and the federal government had unlawfully perpetuated the segregated system of public housing they had set up in the 1930s and 1940s. The suit alleged that their failure had consigned public housing residents to live in the city's most distressed neighborhoods.

DOJ_NMG_0110876

In January 2005, U.S. District Court Judge Marvin J. Garbis ruled that HUD had violated fair housing laws by not taking a regional approach to provide opportunities for black public housing residents to live outside poor, segregated neighborhoods.

Garbis absolved the city and its housing authority of wrongdoing.

In March, Garbis heard two weeks of testimony in the second phase of the trial designed to craft a remedy for HUD's violation.

Lawyers for public housing residents asked Garbis to order the federal housing agency to provide 6,750 special housing vouchers and new and rehabilitated units over 10 years, mostly in well-off suburbs of the city. Lawyers for HUD countered that Garbis did not have the authority to order the creation of new housing and said the plaintiffs' proposal was "plagued with problems."

Garbis, who heard both phases of the trial without a jury, has yet to issue a remedy ruling.

Freeman said he expects HUD to appeal any remedy ruling by Garbis - as well as his finding of liability - to the U.S. 4th Circuit Court of Appeals.

If Garbis' decisions are upheld, the ACLU and Freeman's firm could ask the court to order the federal government to pay legal fees for the trial phases of the case as well as the monitoring of the consent decree.

Asked how much those fees might be, Freeman said: "A lot."

"Everything about this case has been strenuously contested by the United States and required a lot of legal work to overcome," Freeman said.

In addition to the nearly $300,000 that is being paid in the latest installment of fees, lawyers for public housing residents are seeking $170,688 from the city and federal government related to the enforcement of the partial consent decree, according to documents filed last month.

The documents also say that payments to lawyers for public housing residents for monitoring the partial consent decree will be at rates of at least $337.50 an hour for lawyers and $110 an hour for paralegals.

In a 2001 decision granting initial payment of legal fees to lawyers for public housing residents, U.S. Magistrate Judge Paul W. Grimm acknowledged that the "requirement to pay a substantial attorney's fee award means that the funds must come from other agencies and programs."

But he added that "without the ability to award attorney's fees to parties that successfully have brought civil rights litigation against government agencies, these lawsuits simply will not be filed, and illegal discrimination will not be exposed and stopped."

Chino Prison Remains Locked Down (LAT)

By Joe Mozingo, Times Staff Writer.

The Los Angeles Times, January 2, 2007

Officials assess security after a brawl involving 200 inmates leaves seven hospitalized. The racial riot doesn't appear to be gang related.

The weekend riot at Chino state prison erupted after two inmates — a Latino and an African American — began fighting in a recreation yard, and others, watching from surrounding dormitories, followed suit, clashing along racial lines that have racked the state prison system for decades, prison officials said Sunday.

About 200 inmates took part in the 90-minute riot Saturday morning, out of the more than 1,000 inmates housed in the dorms where the fighting occurred, said prison spokesman Lt. Mark Hargrove.

"We believe it was just a spontaneous thing that occurred after the fight on the yard," he said. The prison, on 2,500 acres of land abutting the Chino Hills in Riverside County, remained on lockdown Sunday as officials assessed security.

Investigators have no information that the Mexican Mafia prison gang was behind the attack, or that it was meant to precipitate a race war in the prison system, Hargrove said. Wardens across the state were told to monitor activities closely, but only Chino was locked down.

Of the 27 inmates taken to hospitals Saturday, 20 were released back to Chino. The prisoner thought to be the most seriously injured suffered a stab wound, a broken jaw and a laceration to the head, and was recovering in the prison hospital.

Corrections officials said they had cleaned up much of the mess by Sunday. A majority of the windows in the five dorms were shattered, Hargrove said.

"They were throwing shards of glass," he said.

Guards also discovered that inmates had fashioned six weapons from the glass — pointed pieces partially wrapped in cloth for a handle.

Experts have warned that the severe overcrowding in the state's prison system heightens the racial tensions. Built in 1941 for 3,160 inmates, the California Institute for Men in Chino now holds more than twice that.

The medium-security facility where the riot occurred — Reception Center West — has 1,381 prisoners in five dormitories.

Hargrove said prisoners are not normally separated by race in that facility — except after a riot like Saturday's. The facility is 27% black, 31% white, 39% Latino.

Of the 27 injured, 24 were African American, including all seven of those still hospitalized.

Officials said the riot did not have the markings of prison gang activity, particularly since it occurred during visiting hours. "That's how they get their contraband," Hargrove said. "They don't disrupt visiting hours."

Racial violence has beset the California prison system since the 1970s, when gangs like the Mexican Mafia, the Black Guerrilla Family and the Aryan Brotherhood fought for power. Last month in Chino, officers put down a fight between 60 black and Latino inmates in an eating area.

In September 2005, a clash between 270 black and Latino prisoners there left one critically injured. That January, a guard was stabbed to death.

In recent years, racial fighting has also erupted in the Los Angeles County jail system. In February, more than 2,000 inmates at the Pitchess Detention Center in Castaic went on a rampage that left one dead and 50 injured. A black inmate was killed in Men's Central Jail downtown in a racially motivated fight the next week.

And at Pitchess in July, 16 inmates received minor injuries in two brief fights between 1,600 black and Latino inmates.

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has proposed spending $10.9 billion to add 78,000 beds to state prisons and county jails.

Second Thoughts On Gays In The Military (NYT)

By JOHN M. SHALIKASHVILI

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

TWO weeks ago, President Bush called for a long-term plan to increase the size of the armed forces. As our leaders consider various options for carrying out Mr. Bush's vision, one issue likely to generate fierce debate is "don't ask, don't tell," the policy that bars openly gay service members from the military. Indeed, leaders in the new Congress are planning to re-introduce a bill to repeal the policy next year.

As was the case in 1993 — the last time the American people thoroughly debated the question of whether openly gay men and lesbians should serve in the military — the issue will give rise to passionate feelings on both sides. The debate must be conducted with sensitivity, but it must also consider the evidence that has emerged over the last 14 years.

When I was chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, I supported the current policy because I believed that implementing a change in the rules at that time would have been too burdensome for our troops and commanders. I still believe that to have been true. The concern among many in the military was that given the longstanding view that homosexuality was incompatible with service, letting people who were openly gay serve would lower morale, harm recruitment and undermine unit cohesion.

In the early 1990s, large numbers of military personnel were opposed to letting openly gay men and lesbians serve. President Bill Clinton, who promised to lift the ban during his campaign, was overwhelmed by the strength of the opposition, which threatened to overturn any executive action he might take. The compromise that came to be known as "don't ask, don't tell" was thus a useful speed bump that allowed temperatures to cool for a period of time while the culture continued to evolve.

The question before us now is whether enough time has gone by to give this policy serious reconsideration. Much evidence suggests that it has.

Last year I held a number of meetings with gay soldiers and marines, including some with combat experience in Iraq, and an openly gay senior sailor who was serving effectively as a member of a nuclear submarine crew. These conversations showed me just how much the military has changed, and that gays and lesbians can be accepted by their peers.

This perception is supported by a new Zogby poll of more than 500 service members returning from Afghanistan and Iraq, three quarters of whom said they were comfortable interacting with gay people. And 24 foreign nations, including Israel, Britain and other allies in the fight against terrorism, let gays serve openly, with none reporting morale or recruitment problems.

I now believe that if gay men and lesbians served openly in the United States military, they would not undermine the efficacy of the armed forces. Our military has been stretched thin by our deployments in the Middle East, and we must welcome the service of any American who is willing and able to do the job.

But if America is ready for a military policy of nondiscrimination based on sexual orientation, the timing of the change should be carefully considered. As the 110th Congress opens for business, some of its most urgent priorities, like developing a more effective strategy in Iraq, share widespread support that spans political affiliations. Addressing such issues could help heal the divisions that cleave our country. Fighting early in this Congress to lift the ban on openly gay service members is not likely to add to that healing, and it risks alienating people whose support is needed to get this country on the right track.

By taking a measured, prudent approach to change, political and military leaders can focus on solving the nation's most pressing problems while remaining genuinely open to the eventual and inevitable lifting of the ban. When that day comes, gay men and lesbians will no longer have to conceal who they are, and the military will no longer need to sacrifice those whose service it cannot afford to lose.

Finding The Source (WP)

IT SEEMS AS though the midterm elections were held longer ago than November. So it's understandable -- particularly with the start of a new year -- that there is a tendency to want to move on. But it would be wrong to let such impatience decide the case of the disputed election for Florida's 13th Congressional District seat.

A mere 369 votes decided the race in favor of Republican Vern Buchanan, but there was an unusually high number of undervotes, or instances in which no vote was recorded. Reviews thus far suggest a poorly designed ballot as one possible culprit, but there also were troubling voter reports of machine malfunctions. While post-election tests revealed no equipment problems, there has been no definitive finding, and suspicions have arisen about this hotly contested race. It's also fast become part of the national debate on whether electronic voting can be trusted.

Christine Jennings, the losing Democratic candidate, and a group of Florida voters went to court with a simple request that could have cleared up the mystery. They sought access to the voting machines' "source code" so that an outside expert could conduct an independent review under strict conditions set by a court monitor. Unfortunately, a Florida judge denied the request last week, partly because the information is proprietary.

More than a winning commercial formula is at stake here. Hopefully the appeals court will see that the public good would be well served by getting to the bottom of this case. If not, the dispute is headed for what probably will be a very ugly -- and ultimately unsatisfying -- outcome in the House of Representatives.

ANTITRUST:

AT& T-BellSouth Deal Called 'Breakthrough' For Consumers (USAT)

By Leslie Cauley

The Federal Communications Commission's handling of the $85 billion AT&T-BellSouth merger sets a "new baseline" for protecting the interests of consumers, FCC Commissioner Jonathan Adelstein said in an interview over the weekend.

The FCC's approval of the merger on Friday allowed the deal to close immediately. To secure the FCC's blessing, AT&T agreed to a list of consumer-friendly concessions. Among them: For the next 30 months, AT&T agreed to sell "naked" DSL — meaning consumers don't have to buy any other service from AT&T to get the DSL service — for just $19.95 a month. That's less than half the $44.95 that AT&T now charges.

AT&T also agreed to a "net neutrality" provision that will require the company to treat all broadband services, its own as well as rivals', equally for the next two years. That means AT&T can't favor its own traffic, in terms of transmission speed and quality.

In addition, AT&T agreed to sell some unused wireless spectrum. That could enable a new rival to enter the market, creating more options for consumers.

Adelstein called the settlement a "breakthrough" for consumers in that it establishes a new standard of behavior for the USA's communications giants. Big companies such as AT&T and Comcast "have told the FCC that they can't live with a net neutrality provision in place," Adelstein said. "They can."

The fact that AT&T agreed to such an aggressive net neutrality clause proves that, he said.

Though the settlement applies only to AT&T, other companies will be hard-pressed to ignore it, says Gene Kimmelman, public policy director of Consumers Union. "There will be enormous scrutiny of any company that does not live by these standards."

The concession on naked DSL is significant, Kimmelman says, because it will permit consumers to buy DSL and phone services from different companies without being financially penalized. Right now, he notes, AT&T charges as much for naked DSL as it does for DSL and phone combined.

The terms of the settlement were opposed by FCC Chairman Kevin Martin. A Republican, Martin had favored approving the deal with no conditions. He was joined by the FCC's other Republican, setting up a 2-2 deadlock with Adelstein and the other Democratic commissioner, Michael Copps.

The lesson? "If you hang tough and stand up for consumers, you can win," Adelstein says.

Martin had initially hoped to break the FCC's 2-2 deadlock by securing the vote of Robert McDowell, the FCC's third Republican. McDowell had essentially recused himself from voting because a trade group he used to work for had opposed the merger. But that plan ran aground last month when McDowell, freed up to vote by the FCC's general counsel, refused to vote, citing the same ethics conflict.

Adelstein, who was criticized by AT&T for holding up the transaction, says he would have been willing to give AT&T "the exact same deal" a month earlier, if AT&T had offered it. Instead, AT&T declared an impasse and pinned its hopes on a McDowell vote.

The final terms of the $85 billion transaction, the largest telecommunications deal in U.S. history, underscored the key role of the FCC. The agency is charged by Congress with looking out for the interests of consumers, Adelstein noted.

He says companies that approach the FCC in the future looking for merger approvals should keep in mind that "our job is to look out for the public interest, not the interests of the companies we oversee."

Net Discrimination (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 2, 2007

The two Democrats on the Federal Communications Commission finally let the AT&T-BellSouth merger proceed last week, though not without some major political rent-seeking. AT&T CEO Edward Whitacre had to agree to follow "Net neutrality" mandates for two years -- after having once said that such a policy would be "nuts."

He was right the first time. But that's a matter between him and his shareholders, and perhaps Mr. Whitacre anticipates that after two years he will be able to return to charging market prices for the use of his broadband pipeline. He'd better hope that the policy precedent set by his merger concession doesn't become a battering ram for Congress to make Net neutrality permanent. In the meantime, he gets full control of Cingular Wireless, which is where much of the telecom action now is.

The more important question in this episode is political: Have we been watching a return of the Old Democratic habit of using rhetoric about "equity" and "justice" as a front for carrying water for certain business interests over others?

Net neutrality travels under the euphemism of "nondiscrimination," which sounds very nice. But what it really means in practice is that the government dictates what AT&T and other Internet access companies can charge users of their pipelines. So there's "discrimination," all right -- against the companies that have invested billions to lay that pipe.

The beneficiaries of this discrimination are Google, Microsoft, Yahoo and other very rich Web businesses, which have loaded up on Beltway lobbyists to have these mandates imposed. Democrats are taking the PAC money and running interference. The Democratic Commissioners -- Jonathan Adelstein and Michael Copps -- were able to extort this concession from AT&T because one of the three GOP Commissioners recused himself from voting on the merger under pressure from Democrats on Capitol Hill. It was a nasty game of bad cop-worse cop, and it is probably a portent of things to come.

The one thing no one should be deceived about is that this ambush has anything to do with "consumers." Internet users will benefit most from the rapid rollout of broadband, which requires letting companies get a return on their investment. Net neutrality is all about imposing price controls that shake down one corporate player for the benefit of another.

And speaking of the FCC (see above), we think it deserves full marks for its ruling last month that will make it easier for phone companies to enter the cable television business. The usual suspects are crying foul, but this is a decision that really will help millions of consumers who are currently paying cable rates dictated by anticompetitive video franchise agreements.

For decades the incumbent cable TV providers enjoyed a virtual monopoly in most markets. Of late, the Bells have been attempting to crash this party with their own video offerings, but they're facing all kinds of barriers to entry. At the behest of the cable industry, county commissions, city governments and other so-called local franchising authorities have slow-rolled approval or made unrelated demands -- such as the construction of a public swimming pool, parking garage or in-kind cash payments -- a condition for allowing phone companies to offer cable.

With some 30,000 local communities out there for the Bells to win over, all this nickel-and-diming adds up. So do all the delays. Verizon reports that, of its franchise negotiations currently pending, more than half have been ongoing for at least 18 months and more than 80% have lasted at least a year.

The FCC's action is an attempt to streamline this process and eliminate the shake-downs that municipalities have been using to circumvent the 5% franchise fee cap. Under the new rules, states and local authorities must complete negotiations within 90 days. They also won't be allowed to impose "unreasonable" build-out requirements, such as demanding that phone companies offer their services everywhere that cable firms do within months of being granted a franchise agreement. We'd just as soon see such requirements scrapped altogether -- after all, the Bells are entering a competitive market with no guarantee of success -- but this is a step in the right direction.

In places where traditional cable providers do face competition from phone companies, rates are falling. According to FCC Chairman Kevin Martin, studies by his agency as well as the Government Accounting Office have "concluded that the average monthly cable rate is significantly lower only in areas with another wire-based competitor."

In the wake of the FCC's party-line 3-2 ruling, in which the agency's two Democrats dissented, the cable lobby is complaining that phone companies are receiving preferential treatment. Democratic Commissioner Jonathan Adelstein told reporters that the decision "undermines" local authority, by which he means poaching by thousands of local politicians.

In fact, it's the local franchising authorities who have been undermining competition by protecting incumbents. And the cable industry's complaints are unpersuasive at best. Cable companies have marched right into the telephony market, making it more competitive, without facing the regulatory hurdles they want kept in place to prevent video competition from the Bells. Far from playing favorites, the new FCC rules aim to make the telecom playing field more level. They were long overdue.

Lawsuit Filed Over Hard Rock Auction (FT)

By James Politi

Financial Times, January 2, 2007

The Seminole tribe's acquisition of the Hard Rock Cafe was plunged into controversy when Cordish, a US real estate developer, filed a lawsuit claiming it was shut out of the auction for the restaurant chain.

Cordish submitted documents to a Florida court late on Friday alleging that Hard Rock and Hamish Dodds, its chief executive, colluded with the Native American tribe to reduce competition in exchange for assurances that Mr Dodds would continue to run the company after the deal.

Baltimore-based Cordish said it had repeatedly expressed an interest in bidding but was denied access to Hard Rock's books for due diligence. The developer has already filed a suit against Merrill Lynch, the investment bank that ran the auction on behalf of Rank, the British gaming group that owns Hard Rock.

The move by Cordish comes as Rank shareholders prepare to meet next week to vote on the sale of Hard Rock for $965m.

The outcome is far from clear, after some analysts expressed disappointment with the price obtained in the deal.

Rank shares have fallen nearly 15 per cent since the transaction was announced in early December.

A spokesman for both Hard Rock and Mr Dodds declined to comment on the litigation. A spokesman for the Seminole tribe also declined to comment.

At the time the deal was announced, Ian Burke, Rank chief executive, said: "We have maximised the value of Hard Rock through this disposal following a thorough strategic review and competitive auction."

According to people familiar with the matter, the Seminole bid won the auction ahead of Permira, Apollo and TDR Capital, three private equity groups also involved in the process.

Although it is common for shareholders to file suits against companies claiming that they might not have maximised value, it is far less common for a rival bidder to claim it was unfairly excluded from an auction.

Arlington Takes On Global Warming (WP)

By Annie Gowen

The Washington Post, January 2, 2007

Arlington County will buy more wind-generated electricity, give tax breaks for hybrid cars, require new public buildings to be green-certified and hand out energy-efficient light bulbs to residents as part of a major push toward reducing greenhouse gas emissions, county officials said yesterday.

The county has reduced carbon dioxide and other emissions -- making its buildings more energy-efficient and adding hybrid vehicles to its fleets -- by a total of 2.6 percent since 2000, but must now sharply increase its efforts in order to reach its goal of a 10 percent reduction in the next five years, Arlington County Board Chairman Paul Ferguson (D) said yesterday.

Ferguson, who has served on the board since 1996, was elected chairman yesterday during the county's traditional New Year's Day meeting, which tends to be a largely ceremonial event and holiday gathering for local politicos.

Board member Walter Tejada (D) was elected the board's vice chairman.

The county's move won quick praise from local environmentalists.

Mike Tidwell, director of the Chesapeake Climate Action Network, said that such a comprehensive push to reduce emissions was unusual for the region and a first in Northern Virginia. Tidwell noted, however, that other jurisdictions are also making strides; Montgomery County already buys far more wind power than Arlington.

"It's a fantastic initiative that leads through example," said Tidwell, whose nonprofit organization tracks such efforts across the region. "It's a good start and a positive start. They're doing a lot of the right things."

Ferguson, who previously served as chairman in 1999 and 2003, said he was inspired to launch the environmental initiative after seeing Al Gore's recent documentary, "An Inconvenient Truth."

"Our climate is changing, and that change is causing harm," Ferguson said. "The question is, what can each of us do to slow the trend and eventually reverse it?"

The board's plan calls for the county to increase the amount of wind power it buys from 3 percent to 5 percent and to give residents who buy hybrid cars a break on their personal property taxes, an unusual perk for a Virginia locality.

The county will refit one or two county buildings with solar technology and require all new major public buildings to be green-certified. Officials said the county will plant 1,200 trees this year and hand out 2,000 fluorescent light bulbs at local fairs and other events. They'll pay for 20 Arlingtonians to get energy-efficiency audits of their houses.

What this will cost is unknown. Ferguson has launched his plan in a year when Arlington will be stretched financially. Like other jurisdictions in Northern Virginia, the county is expecting a budget shortfall next fiscal year because of a decline in revenue growth caused by the downturn in housing values.

Arlington's revenue gap is about $20 million.

"We are going to face a difficult budget," Ferguson said of the coming year. "We have had a flattening in the real estate market . . . we will not be able to do everything."

But he said the environmental initiative will not be costly. He estimated it would entail about $5 million in upgrades to municipal buildings, which he said will be recouped in lower utility costs. Other costs -- such as for the energy audits and light bulbs -- will be less than $100,000, he predicted.

The county of about 200,000 has long considered itself eco-friendly, from the macro perspective (a "smart growth" strategy that clusters development around Metro stations, encouraging use of public transit) to the micro (an obsession with the county's "tree canopy").

As newly elected board vice chairman, Tejada, one of the few elected Latino officials in the state, said that in the coming year he would spearhead new efforts to reach out to immigrant communities. Those include more voter registration drives and a series of citizenship workshops aimed at legal permanent residents who might want to become citizens but who feel intimidated by the process, Tejada said.

Saving Salton Sea (LAT)

THE SALTON SEA is an accident of man and an insult to nature, an artificial lake so rank that its rotten-eggs odor often overwhelms its sparkle, an unnatural blunder with too much salt and too many dead fish. It must be saved.

If only it were that easy. The lake, created in 1905 when a badly built canal diverted Colorado River water to a depression in the desert straddling Riverside and Imperial counties, is drying up and in danger of extinction. Yet if the Salton Sea were to dry up entirely, the ensuing dust storms would pollute the Coachella Valley air with toxins now underwater. The sea also is a habitat for an endangered species of fish and a vital stopping ground for 400 species of birds.

California soon must decide what to do about the accidental lake. In 10 years, it will lose half its inflow when more Colorado River water is shifted from agricultural to urban areas. The state is required to come up with options to save the Salton Sea, and it offers 10 possible solutions in a recent report, ranging from very expensive to ludicrously expensive. Even the "no action" option costs close to $1 billion because the state is required by law to protect air quality and provide a way for the endangered desert pupfish to get from one river to another. Other options cost almost $6 billion.

The higher-priced choices are the dreams of some local boosters, who long for a deep-water lake to boost property values and support a once-thriving tourism industry. This would require building a dam or huge berm, which would cost a fortune and carry a steep environmental price, including quarrying a nearby mountain. California taxpayers don't have spare billions to lavish on a man-made water park in the desert, and the state has a responsibility not to create new environmental messes in the process of fixing old ones.

Both environmentalists and Imperial Valley farmers have more reasonable, less costly proposals. They include simple dirt berms and shallow wetlands that keep most dust at bay, take care of the pupfish and provide the birds with a habitat.

The state should stick to the least expensive plan that will take care of environmental needs. (The public can comment until Jan. 16 by sending an e-mail to saltonseacomments@water.ca.gov.) If local interests want a recreational lake, they can design an environmentally sound berm — and support a local bond to pay for it.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

War On Meth, No. 2 Story Of '06 (GJS)

Grand Junction Sentinel, December 31, 2006

Local law enforcement agencies and the Drug Enforcement Administration made a decisive blow against the methamphetamine epidemic when they arrested 31 local methamphetamine dealers and runners between January and March.

The arrests effectively crushed western Colorado's largest meth distribution network to date, which by some estimates provided more than 70 percent of Mesa County's methamphetamine.

The toppling of the ring was voted the No. 2 local news story of 2006 by Daily Sentinel staffers.

The ring, described by DEA Agent Tom Gorman and other members of the Western Colorado Joint Drug Task Force as a "sophisticated" operation, trafficked methamphetamine from around the region.

The ring's methamphetamine operation was credited with fueling, in part, the surging number of drug and property crimes that have plagued Grand Junction and its surrounding communities in recent years.

At the meth ring leader's sentencing hearing, Chief District Judge David Bottger told 45-year-old Stephen Parsons he was amazed by the evidence of how expansive the Grand Junction man's criminal network was.

"It seems clear to me that Mr. Parsons was the head of the largest and most extensive methamphetamine sales and distribution business I've ever seen in Mesa County," Bottger said.

Parsons was sentenced to 24 years in a Colorado prison in October.

And on the heels of Parsons, a number of other meth ring members have received similarly long sentences, including:

Ashley King, who was involved in a shootout with sheriff's deputies last winter, was sentenced in November to 17 years in prison for her role as a meth ring dealer.

Eric "Sky" Redman, 30, an alleged drug enforcer who shot himself in the hand while he was being wiretapped by the drug task force, received 15 years in prison in November.

Tammy Bauer, 34, who trucked pounds of methamphetamine to Grand Junction from Arizona, received a 12-year prison sentence in October for her role in enabling the meth ring.

Crystal Plumlee, 21, who worked as a dealer for Parsons in addition to her own clients, was sentenced to 12 years in prison in October after pleading guilty to conspiracy to distribute a controlled substance.

But just as the meth ring bust proved a highpoint for local law enforcement, it proved a burden on the local court system.

Methamphetamine, according to Mesa County prosecutors and judges, has placed extreme pressure on the court system. From 1990 to 2005, when methamphetamine transitioned from a niche drug to the most widespread, dangerous drug on the Western Slope, the number of felony cases in the court system quadrupled while the number of judges remained the same.

Fueled by the county's meth epidemic, the number of Mesa County felony cases exploded from 506 cases in 1990 to 2,223 cases last year.

The surging, meth-fueled caseload has outpaced the county's population growth by a factor of 10, according an analysis of figures obtained from the Mesa County District Attorney's Office and the U.S. Census Bureau.

In other words, while the county's population grew by 32 percent from 1990 to 2005, the number of felony cases has risen 339 percent.

Bottger said this fall that the meth-fueled, rising caseload has made court time an elusive reality, forcing civil cases and other non-criminal cases off the docket.

The result, he said, has been that civil plaintiffs and even some criminal defendants have opted to strike a deal with each other or prosecutors instead of awaiting their day in court.

"I like to think that we've maintained a high standard of justice by adding some new judicial officers and by working hard," Bottger said, "but I don't know to what extent litigants' ability to get court time has forced them to compromise on cases they might not otherwise want to compromise on."

In that sense, Bottger said, "justice delayed is justice diminished."

But as a burden upon the legal system, Mesa County's top prosecutor said the widespread coverage of the meth ring in the media — from the bust through the end of the year — has proven the biggest coup against the methamphetamine epidemic.

Mesa County District Attorney Pete Hautzinger said the toppling of the ring was far and away the most significant strike local law enforcement made against methamphetamine trafficking.

But beyond cutting off the local supply of the drug for the subsequent three months, Hautzinger said the bust's media coverage provided the county with a powerful tool in prevent other meth casualties.

"When we make a bust like that, (local media) throwing 31 mug shots on the front page of the newspaper helps with the prevention and intervention prongs" of our efforts, Hautzinger said.

In addition to the day-one coverage, Hautzinger said he hoped the continued coverage of the suspects from the case and their stories has helped discourage others from embarking down the path to methamphetamine addiction.

That, Hautzinger said, will be lasting impact of local law enforcement's efforts. Even as other dealers rush in to fill the methamphetamine supply "vacuum," perhaps a few people will think twice before mainlining the drug.

AP, December 30, 2006

TACOMA, Wash. - As 2006 draws to a close, drug-enforcement officials in Washington say they have destroyed more than 130,000 marijuana plants this year as part of a joint state and federal eradication effort.

AP photo

Marijuana plants growing in an illegal operation.

The federal Drug Enforcement Administration says that's nearly the same as last year, when a record 135,000 plants were destroyed.

This year's seizures have led to more than 340 arrests and 190 weapons seizures.

Officials attribute the number of destroyed plants both to outdoor growers who frequently use public lands, and to drug traffickers moving their indoor growing operations from Canada to Washington as they try to avoid tightened border security.

Agents say growers have dammed streams, clear-cut forest lands, used large quantities of insecticide and killed wildlife to aid outdoor drug-growing operations.

Hard Year For Smokers, Dog Lovers (WT)

Wyoming Tribune, December 31, 2006

2006 was a great year for fans of clean air, a sad year for dog lovers and a year that marked some significant events in the Cheyenne area.

Among them was the breakup of a methamphetamine ring and the discovery that a trash-to-energy proposal for the city of Cheyenne was perhaps not what it had seemed to be.

The Wyoming Tribune-Eagle newsroom staff reviewed the year in news, and this is the list that resulted.

Voting took place in mid-December, so the back-to-back snowstorms that dumped more than 20 inches of snow, snarled pre-holiday activities and broke a December snowfall record that had stood since 1913 was not on the list to consider.

1: Smoking ban clears

the air in Cheyenne

Months after the Cheyenne City Council put a citywide smoking ban in place, the city's population is still split on the matter.

Cheyenne Mayor Jack Spiker said recently that he's convinced in a year the health of Cheyenne residents will be improved thanks to the ban.

"We'll be able to measure the benefit in fewer heart attacks," Spiker said, "but I am sure some people would disagree."

When city officials launched the smoking ban proposal, they weren't the first body in the region to do so. Laramie had already instituted a ban, and a statewide ban was being discussed in Colorado. A statewide smoking ban had been considered briefly by Wyoming lawmakers in 1999, but the idea was dismissed.

That didn't save city officials from a firestorm of criticism from smokers and those who serve them; they claimed a smoking ban would harm their business or cause them to close completely.

Even so, city elected officials approved the ban in June but delayed the effective date until mid-August to allow opponents time to gather signatures to put the ban to a citywide vote.

Rich Gibbs, of the political action committee Cheyenne Coalition for Citizens Rights, said he supported the ballot initiative because it would give city residents a chance to decide on what kind of laws they wanted to live by.

"This isn't about smoking. It isn't about economics," he said.

At least 2,767 signatures were required to be submitted by the end of June to the Cheyenne City Clerk's Office. That number is 10 percent of the city residents who are registered to vote. In all, 3,403 signatures were collected, but only 1,876 belonged to verified city voters.

Business owners were convinced their business would fall off after the ban. The results of a study to be released in late 2007 that may confirm their beliefs, but a study done by the Wyoming Survey and Analysis Center at the University of Wyoming and commissioned by the Substance Abuse Division of the state Department of Health completed after Laramie officials banned smoking in public places showed no economic impact.

The ban caused at least one business to change direction. The owners of the Outlaw Saloon and Rockin' Rodeo decided to consolidate operations to the Rockin' Rodeo location on South Greeley Highway, which is outside city limits, and rename that establishment the Outlaw Saloon.

"Business has been good," co-owner Suzy Hein said at the end of the year. "I was nervous about closing the Outlaw on East Lincolnway because we'd been there so long."

Hein said she still doesn't like the ban because people should be able to choose what they want, especially in a nightclub.

"You have to be 21 to get into a nightclub. You are an adult, and you have the right to choose whether you will smoke. Some places had already gone smoke-free," Hein said. "Now we don't have that choice in Cheyenne."

2: Illness at Cheyenne Animal Shelter ends the lives of 42 dogs

At first the reports in early May were of an unspecified respiratory illness at the Cheyenne Animal Shelter.

Then the verdict came in: the highly contagious canine influenza was racing through the county pound and nearly all the dogs showed signs of infection. Shelter officials debated, and the decision was made to euthanize 42 stray dogs staying at the shelter.

That released a firestorm of debate and second-guessing that rocked Cheyenne and drew comments from surrounding states.

"If people want to blame me for the decision, that's fine," shelter director Allen Cohen said at the time. He had started his job only days before.

"I did the best I could with the information I had at the time and the support of the veterinary community that came to our meeting," Cohen said.

Canine influenza is a highly contagious disease with two forms - mild and severe. The mild form comes with a cough that can last 10 to 30 days. The severe form can result in high fevers and a pneumonia infection. The mortality rate of the disease, according to the American Veterinary Medical Association, is low, between 5 percent and 8 percent.

The early concerns were containing the influenza at the shelter and stopping infection of dogs in the community.

The decision to put the dogs down prompted the Concerned Citizens for the Humane Treatment of Animals to offer up a slate of suggestions to the publicly funded animal shelter, among them bringing back a membership system that would allow those who had paid their dues to elect shelter board members and developing a plan to deal with disease outbreaks in the shelter.

Russ Mead, a representative from Utah's Best Friends Animal Society, a large no-kill shelter with members nationwide, said his group was using Cheyenne's decision to urge other shelters to develop procedures to deal with dog flu that doesn't involve putting animals down.

"We don't want killing an entire shelter population to be known as the Cheyenne solution," Mead said.

3: Trash-to-energy plan runs out of fuel

When Michael Spitzauer proposed demonstrating his trash-to-energy technology in Cheyenne, city officials were elated. Turning trash to something usable would mean that something valuable could come from refuse, and it could mean that Cheyenne could delay building a landfill with a price tag that is big and expected to only get bigger.

Spitzauer and his company, Green Power, brought a mobile trash conversion unit on a flatbed truck in June to Cheyenne, and city officials watched as trash was dumped in one end and diesel came out the other a mere three minutes later.

But questions about Spitzauer's past called a halt to the city's plan to sign a contract with the native Austrian. Under the deal, the city would have provided land and trash for the venture that Spitzauer said could transform the energy landscape.

An investigation by the Wyoming Tribune-Eagle showed that Spitzauer had a criminal past in his home country and was embroiled in a bankruptcy dispute with a separate company.

Court papers dating back more than five years show that Spitzauer had lied on his immigration form. The lie: that he had never been convicted of a crime. Spitzauer had served three years of a six-year fraud sentence in Austria. And after he was here, court papers also showed that prosecutors in Austria were trying to extradite him to answer questions in other fraud allegations. That attempt was eventually dropped.

Spitzauer denied serving the prison sentence in Austria, attributing the idea to a bad translation of court documents, but his own attorney admitted in court that Spitzauer had served the time.

While he said he had financing, the investment bank that had been backing him withdrew its support even before Spitzauer held his Cheyenne demonstration.

City officials put the decision to sign the contract on hold in late June, and Spitzauer withdrew his proposal from consideration.

4: Car chase breaks meth ring

A high-speed chase through west Cheyenne neighborhoods was unusual enough, but the one that started around 11 a.m. Jan. 20 would turn into so much more.

The people in the car had been under surveillance for drug activity. A traffic stop at West Lincolnway and Snyder Avenue for a minor traffic infraction, however, sparked the chase. It ranged north to Richardson Court, then reversed itself toward south Cheyenne. Along the way, gunshots were exchanged between people in the fleeing vehicle and a Laramie County sheriff's deputy.

The car chase turned to a foot chase and that turned into a four-hour standoff at a Hynds Avenue home in south Cheyenne before a teargas canister flushed a suspect, who was wounded in the leg and was armed with a .38-caliber handgun and an ounce of methamphetamine.

In all, four people were arrested that day. Among them was James Sali, who was arrested on suspicion of attempted first-degree murder.

The two men and one woman who had been with Sali had not been arrested, and Sali was being held on $500,000 bail.

By the end of March, the story had taken a turn. Sali was among those arrested for their roles in a drug ring that regularly ferried meth, guns and cash between Cheyenne and Denver.

"You're looking at a well-organized group that was prepared to defend themselves as Sali did," U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration public information officer Suzanne Halonen said.

Law enforcement officials arrested nine people in March in connection with the drug ring and were looking for three more people.

The suspects, Sali among them, had apparently been running the drug ring since the previous June. They traveled to the Denver area to pick up methamphetamine and sold it from homes and hotel rooms in Cheyenne. Some of the drug was sold within 1,000 feet of Alta Vista Elementary.

By May, the number of indictments issued in the case reached 18; by October, 21. At that point, Sali had seven counts pending against him, and he faces two counts of attempted first-degree murder of two Laramie County sheriff's deputies during the Jan. 20 chase.

Fifteen suspects had pleaded guilty in May, July, August and September. Five more were awaiting jury trials.

5: Lawmakers approve Hathaway Scholarship, roll out program

Wyoming voters enshrined a revolutionary education initiative in the Wyoming Constitution when they approved Amendment C by a nearly 3 to 1 margin.

By doing that, voters decided that the endowment that funds the Hathaway Scholarship Program shall not be spent for other purposes.

That was the latest victory for advocates of higher education in Wyoming. Under the program, eligible high-school graduates across the state are able to tap a state-funded scholarship fund to help them pay for their educations at the University of Wyoming or the state's network of community colleges.

State lawmakers created the program in 2005, along with a trust fund whose income would pay for the scholarships. Originally envisioned to kick off in several years, the program got a jumpstart when Gov. Dave Freudenthal and state legislators decided to ramp-up filling the trust fund. The program's start date also was moved up to 2006.

"This is a beneficial, wonderful thing for the state," Patty Johnson said. She's among the state residents who were tracking the progress of the program. "It gives students something to strive for, and hopefully, it's a way to keep people in the state. It's one of the finest things I have heard of that we can use our money for."

For the past several years, Wyoming state government coffers have been filled with revenue from the energy industry, and lawmakers and state elected officials have been trying to figure out how to share that wealth with the state's residents.

That prompted a slew of questions of who would qualify for the program and how they would do it. The Education Merit Scholarship Committee pitched a list of specific requirements that students would have to meet to qualify for the Hathaway money. On the list are math, language arts, science, social studies and foreign language. Students entering the ninth grade in 2007 would have to meet these standards.

The scholarship committee also wants qualification tied to performance on Wyoming's statewide assessment test to be included. Both of these provisions are part of a draft bill that lawmakers will consider when the Legislature convenes Jan. 9.

6: A thousand votes return Barbara Cubin to U.S. House for a seventh term

When Rep. Barbara Cubin, R-Wyo., announced her bid for a seventh term representing Wyoming in the U.S. House of Representatives in June, she came out swinging against Democratic challenger Gary Trauner, accusing him of supporting "Hillarycare"-style health care and labeling him with liberal epithets.

By that time, Trauner, a Wilson businessman, had been knocking on doors across the state, introducing himself and asking for votes.

While Cubin had a primary challenger in retired Navy officer Bill Winney of Cheyenne, she seemed to reserve her money for the post-primary face-off with Trauner. Indeed, Cubin did win the Republican primary, but she lost in Laramie County and a couple of others.

Cubin's media campaign - as well as ads run on her behalf by the National Republican Congressional Committee - painted Trauner as an outsider whose ideas were wrong for Wyoming; several also touched on the fact that he was not a native Wyomingite. The ads, with their negative tone, focused on Trauner and did not address what Cubin had done for the state, nor what she promised to do.

For his part, Trauner did not engage in negative campaigning.

After polls closed on Election Day, Trauner carried a narrow lead over Cubin as votes were counted. He took most of the large-population counties in the state; he won Laramie County by a 70-30 margin.

But Cubin's conservative base stepped up for her; support for the incumbent representative was high in the more rural counties of the state, and that was enough to carry her to her narrowest victory in years.

The outcome of the race wasn't immediately apparent on Election Day. Some delays in reporting votes from part of Carbon County raised some doubt about the outcome. And the narrow margin raised questions about whether a recount would take place. Under Wyoming law, a recount is triggered when the difference in the number of votes between contenders is less that 1 percent of the total votes earned by the top vote-getter.

When the results were canvassed, the margin was wider than 1 percent, and Trauner declined to seek a recount.

7: Pipeline rupture kills one

The race to build natural-gas pipelines to export Wyoming and Colorado gas to power-hungry markets in the East turned deadly in November when a crew member working on the Rockies Express Pipeline on the Duck Creek Ranch south and west of Cheyenne apparently struck an existing pipeline operated by El Paso Corp. subsidiary Wyoming Interstate Co. with his bulldozer.

Around 9:30 a.m. Nov. 12, a Saturday, a fireball so large it could be seen more than 50 miles away in Colorado erupted from the break.

"It was wa-a-a-y above the power lines," Tyson Twitchell, son of ranch manager Frank Twitchell, said. "I've never seen a flame like that before. It was at least 300 feet high. At least."

The bulldozer driver, Bobby Ray Owens Jr., who worked for Associated Pipeline Contractors, was killed in the explosion. He had been grading a roadway at the explosion site.

The Rockies Express Pipeline, being built by Kinder Morgan, is one of several gas transmission pipelines that crosses southeast Wyoming. The Wyoming Interstate pipeline that was breached had been in place for about two decades.

While the fireball was knocked down in about an hour, public safety officials were on the site all day, waiting for the temperature of the ground around the explosion site to drop to safe levels. Initial reports said the crew working on site with Owens was missing, but the seven crew members were accounted for later in the day.

El Paso Corp. rerouted natural gas around the site of the rupture. Natural-gas service to the Cheyenne area was not interrupted.

The explosion is under investigation by the U.S. Department of Transportation's Office of Pipeline Safety.

8: Murder and attempted suicide shine light on troubled marriage

Most people in Laramie County would never have known about the lives and troubled marriage of Willard and Lynaya Brown. That changed in the early hours of Aug. 15 when Cheyenne police say Willard Brown, 34, killed his 27-year-old wife, Lynaya, and tried to kill himself.

Lynaya Brown had called 911 at 1:12 a.m. to report a disturbance at the couple's east Cheyenne home. She said he had tackled her and was headed to the garage, where he kept his guns.

The dispatcher heard a scream and a loud noise. The call ended abruptly. When police arrived three minutes later, they found Lynaya Brown shot in the chest and Willard Brown lying in the garage, his face bleeding.

Lynaya was declared dead at the scene, and Willard was taken to the local hospital, where he was treated. He later was arrested and taken to a locked-down medical facility in Colorado.

Records show the couple had filed for divorce, citing irreconcilable differences, only about three weeks earlier.

An investigator's statement said Willard Brown had said he was sorry for killing his wife on the night of the shooting.

Brown pleaded not guilty in September. At Brown's preliminary hearing, his attorney said Brown's action was not premeditated; rather it was an act of passion driven by his belief that his wife was having affairs.

Brown's premeditated murder trial was scheduled for Dec. 21, but it has been postponed.

9: City Councilman Pete Laybourn relies on private investigator to protect his image

The strained relationship between Cheyenne City Councilman Pete Laybourn and his fellow elected city officials took a turn for the strange in May when Laybourn hired a private investigator to disprove allegations against Laybourn that the councilman termed false and malicious.

Two memos seem to have sparked Laybourn's ire: one in March 2005 from city attorney Mike Basom to Laybourn, which cites the councilman's "propensity to verbally attack staff" following an incident at a social event where Laybourn encountered assistant city attorney Claudia Angelos. Angelos later recounted a conversation during which she said Laybourn said he wanted to "utterly destroy" the city attorney's office.

In March, Mayor Jack Spiker sent a memo to City Council members that warned that Laybourn might be undermining city employees' ability to do their jobs. "Particularly troubling is the fact that (Laybourn) has made it his practice to bully and attack staff with increasing frequency," Spiker wrote.

In a column printed in the Wyoming Tribune-Eagle in early June, Laybourn recounted the findings of his investigator, former Fort Collins, Colo., police officer Frank Russell. Among them was the fact that no one interviewed could provide specifics about the date, time or location. And no official complaints about Laybourn's behavior were on file.

"Although not the darling of his peers, the evidence presented would not meet any legal standard of probable cause, let alone proof beyond a reasonable doubt," Laybourn wrote of Russell's report.

But the City Council was not content to let the matter rest there. In the middle of June, a divided City Council voted to censure Laybourn for his behavior, which included hiring the investigator. Also cited were Laybourn's use of city stationery for personal benefit, and using the city emblem without its trademark symbol in an advertisement he ran without permission.

A censure is a disciplinary action without much weight.

Laybourn voted against the censure, as did his fellow Ward 1 representatives, Councilwoman Judy Case and Councilman Jimmy Valdez, and Councilman Don Pierson. Pierson said he didn't condone Laybourn's actions, but the discipline should have been handled differently.

10: Food gets sales tax holiday for two years

What will Laramie County residents do with a little extra change in their pockets? They have two years to figure that out.

Early in 2006, lawmakers agreed to lift the sales tax on food bought at grocery stores in Wyoming for two years. The holiday took effect on July 1.

The vote by state lawmakers came after repeated attempts, led by Rep. Ann Robinson, D-Casper, over a decade to lift the tax. Wyoming is one of only a few states that was charging sales tax on food. Many consider it an extremely regressive tax because it affects people with low incomes more.

"I would say this is the highlight of my legislative career," Robinson said at the time of the vote.

Not all food that's bought in grocery stores is subject to the holiday. Anything that's intended for immediate consumption is still taxed. But grocery items bought for later consumption are now tax-free.

Lifting the tax poses a more complicated problem - plugging the revenue shortfall to cities, towns and counties that depend on sales tax revenue to help pay their bills. The fourth penny of the statewide sales tax is distributed to municipalities. Fifth- and sixth-penny sales taxes are voted on at the county level and generate revenue to pay for local infrastructure and specific projects such as water treatment plants or county jails.

State lawmakers set aside $46.6 million to help make up for the losses to local governments. But state Revenue Department projections show that that amount may only cover a year.

Agent: Heroin Arrest May Point Increased Use In Region (AP)

AP, December 30, 2006

LOUISVILLE, Ky. - Heroin is re-emerging in the Louisville area, the result of Mexican drug-traffickers marketing to a new generation, federal authorities said.

Since July, a drug task force of federal and local police has confiscated more than two pounds of heroin with a street value of about $200,000, including two pounds recently in nearby Charlestown, Ind.

Such amounts were unheard of in recent years, Tony King, resident agent in charge of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration office in Louisville, told The Courier-Journal.

While Louisville police and health officials haven't seen a noticeable surge in the drug's use, King said the recent confiscations could foreshadow problems.

An annual National Drug Threat Assessment report released in October said Mexican heroin circulating in western states was spreading east of the Mississippi. It said abusers of opiates prescribed as painkillers, such as OxyContin, might be switching to heroin, as efforts to curb prescription-drug abuse take hold.

"Heroin took a back stage for a while," King said, "but now it's being marketed again to a new generation."

Before this year, heroin in the Louisville area "had all but disappeared," King said. The local drug task force didn't handle a single heroin trafficking case in 2005, he said. But this fall, three illegal Mexican immigrants were indicted on federal charges of participating in a heroin distribution conspiracy that carry a possible life sentence and deportation.

Seized in those arrests was "black tar heroin," so named because it looks like hot asphalt, said King, adding that it can be injected or smoked.

Janice Cunningham, a substance abuse supervisor for the Louisville Health Department, said its methadone clinic, where heroin addicts are treated, has not seen an increase in clients. But she noted an increase in younger heroin users - those 21 to 28 years old. The median age of the 186 addicts being treated at the clinic is 41, two years younger than in 2004, she said.

Across Kentucky, 274 people received treatment for heroin use in a state center in the year that ended Sept. 30, compared with 218 the previous year.

Heroin Is Returning To Area, Officials Say (LCJ)

By Kay Stewart, The Courier-Journal

Louisville Courier-Journal, January 2, 2007

Task force seized 3 pounds since July

Heroin is re-emerging in the Louisville area, the result of Mexican drug-traffickers marketing to a new generation, federal law-enforcement officials say.

Since July, a drug task force of federal and local police has confiscated more than 3 pounds of heroin with a street value of about $200,000, including 2 pounds recently in nearby Charlestown, Ind.

Such amounts were unheard of in recent years, said Tony King, resident agent in charge of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration office in Louisville.

While Louisville police and health officials haven't seen a noticeable surge in the drug's use, King said the recent confiscations could foreshadow problems.

An annual National Drug Threat Assessment report released in October said Mexican heroin circulating in western states was spreading east of the Mississippi. It said abusers of opiates prescribed as painkillers, such as OxyContin, might be switching to heroin, as efforts to curb prescription-drug abuse take hold.

"Heroin took a backstage for a while," King said, "but now it's being marketed again to a new generation."

Before this year, heroin in the Louisville area "had all but disappeared," King said. The local drug task force didn't handle a single heroin trafficking case in 2005, he said.

But this fall, three illegal Mexican immigrants, Omar Robles-Munguia, 28; Francisco Rodriguez-Lopez, 32; and Rogelio Garcia-Mendez, 34; all of Louisville, were indicted on federal charges of participating in a heroin distribution conspiracy that carry a possible life sentence and deportation.

Seized in those arrests was "black tar heroin," so named because it looks like hot asphalt, said King, adding that it can be injected or smoked.

An undercover officer arranged to purchase more than a pound of heroin for about $54,000 from Robles-Munguia in six transactions from July through October, according to affidavits.

Affidavits said undercover officers also observed the sale of small amounts to customers throughout the city.

In one undercover buy, two suspects stored heroin in small balloons they spit out of their mouths, an affidavit said. Each dose was selling for $20, King said. In other buys, larger quantities, wrapped in balls of black tape, were handed to officers.

The three were arrested Oct. 13 at The Summit shopping center in eastern Jefferson County during an undercover buy, according to the affidavits, after one of them complained about a van -- the DEA surveillance vehicle -- parked nearby.

In another Louisville case, Alejandro Robels-Gomez, 31, an illegal immigrant from Mexico who lived in Indianapolis, pleaded guilty Nov. 28 in U.S. District Court to heroin trafficking.

He faces five to 40 years in prison and deportation. Chief U.S. District Judge John Heyburn III has scheduled sentencing for March 6.

Robels-Gomez admitted possessing with the intent to distribute more than 50 grams of heroin with a street value of about $5,000 Aug. 12.

Lab results determined the heroin was 69 percent pure, Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Kilmartin said. Regional problem

Officials say heroin cases are increasing in Southern Indiana and Northern and Central Kentucky.

In Indianapolis, 12 defendants await trial in U.S. District Court on charges of participating in a major heroin distribution ring.

John Dowd, chief of the drug prosecution unit for the U.S. attorney's office in Southern Indiana, said it has prosecuted several heroin cases in the past three or four years.

"We probably hadn't done two or three heroin cases in the six or eight years before these most recent ones," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0110891

On Nov. 21, 10 people from Clarksville, Ind., and two from Louisville were among 13 people facing federal charges of being involved in a drug ring stretching from Chicago to Atlanta. Officers found 2 pounds of heroin in a car trunk in Charlestown.

Most of the heroin seized in Charlestown was white powder labeled "China White," a type usually injected or snorted and imported from South America, the Middle East and eastern Asia, King said.

Dowd said the suspects, about half of whom are illegal immigrants from Mexico, already had been indicted under seal at the time of their arrests on drug-trafficking charges relating to cocaine and methamphetamine.

Jim Liles, director of the Northern Kentucky Drug Strike Force, composed of local law enforcement officers who police four counties, said they've seized more than 9 ounces of heroin this year, "more than in the last five years total."

Sgt. Ken Holstein of the Covington Police Department said arrested street prostitutes have had needle marks and had been using "not only crack but heroin. It is definitely back. There is no doubt." No synthetic reported

Capt. Don Burbrink of Louisville Metro Police narcotics, said its officers have seized amounts totaling less than a pound in the past year, mostly from individuals who had it for personal use.

There has been no report in the Louisville area of heroin containing fentanyl, a powerful synthetic opiate blamed for more than 100 deaths last year and earlier this year in several cities, including Chicago and Detroit, King said.

Janice Cunningham, a substance abuse supervisor for the Louisville Health Department, said its methadone clinic, where heroin addicts are treated, has not seen an increase in clients.

But she noted an increase in younger heroin users -- those 21 to 28 years old. The median age of the 186 addicts being treated at the clinic is 41, two years younger than in 2004, she said.

Across Kentucky, 274 people received treatment for heroin use in a state center in the year that ended Sept. 30, compared with 218 the previous year.

The Desert Sun, December 31, 2006

We'll remember a president's visit in April and the sorrowful passing of another in December. We celebrated La Quinta's miraculous football comeback and mourned the tragic death of a Col. Mitchell Paige Middle School student. We cheered Tony Bennett, Madonna, Arnold Schwarzenegger, Nordstrom, Miss Teen USA the first day of schoo and James Cain, who managed to swim swam 11 miles across the Salton Sea. On the last day of the year, we reflect on 26 memories from 2006 that will be hard to forget.

We say goodbye to a national leader, local friend Residents across the valley and the globe bid farewell to 93-year-old former President Gerald R. Ford, who died on Dec. 26 at his home in Rancho Mirage.

Many valley residents said they'll remember Ford's sincerity and integrity, his desire to help with valley fundraising efforts, as well as his achievement to demonstrate to a nation rocked by the Watergate scandal and Vietnam War that the office of the presidency was still worthy of respect.

"He was a down-to-earth gentleman. He carried himself that way on and off the (golf) course," said John Foster, board member and president of the 2007 Bob Hope Chrysler Classic.

Madonna rocks Coachella stage Madonna was queen of the Coachella Valley Music and Arts Festival, helping to set a two-day attendance record in May.

The "Queen of Pop" emerged out of a disco ball with an ensemble of spacemen-like dancers in a black outfit and shades. She opened with her dance hit "Hung Up," which she sang to open the Grammy Awards in 2006.

'Amazing' evening with Tony Bennett Tony Bennett's singing magic was enough to sell out the 1,127-seat McCallum Theatre a month in advance of the Dec. 3 performance at ticket prices of $450 and $500 for the black-tie dinner/show package.

"Amazing," said Eve Fromberg of Rancho Mirage. "The people around me are a little older than me, but Tony Bennett is a star for my generation, and that's why they want to do duets with him.

"For him to come to our theater shows the growth of this theater and the growth of our valley. He's a once in a lifetime performer, like Sinatra."

Students join in national protest About 20,000 students skipped school in the valley as they supported a national day of immigrant protest over several days.

On May 2 at Thomas Jefferson Middle School in Indio, nearly 490 students stayed home, and roughly 260 attended. Instead of about 30 students finishing up a physical education class on the athletic field, about a dozen did.

Similar scenarios occurred across the valley.

School officials attributed the absences to the national "Day Without an Immigrant" boycott designed to illustrate how much the United States depends on immigrants.

"Across our district, we saw a significant impact on student attendance," said Jon Gaffney, assistant superintendent for personnel services at Desert Sands Unified School District.

Church asked to dim lights on cross The brightly lit cross on the hill at St. Margaret's Episcopal Church in Palm Desert garnered the spotlight when some residents began complaining.

It's an almost universal symbol of hope and spirituality, but the cross lit with 39 13-watt compact fluorescent bulbs on Highway 74 also has raised concerns about light pollution.

Some people who have complained to city officials contend it's too bright - especially in Palm Desert, where hillside lighting is a touchy and at times intensely debated subject.

"It's right smack dab in the middle of my view. ... It looks like a beer sign," said Stephen Thewlis, who lives near Cahuilla Hills Park. "A lot of people find solace in it, but for me it's a huge eyesore."

"It isn't too bright. ... It's a feature," said Brenda Osborne, who sees the cross as a beloved community landmark.. "We know we're home when we come back from anywhere."

The Lodge holds a garage sale Everything had to go during a liquidation sale at The Lodge at Rancho Mirage to make way for the new Ritz-Carlton Rancho Mirage.

Bedding, televisions and even bathroom sinks were among items sold to make way for a $330 million expansion project that is taking place on nearly 40 acres in the lower foothills of the Santa Rosa Mountains.

Not even the chandeliers went untouched. Travis Erwin of Indian Wells bought two for her daughter, who had her wedding reception at the hilltop hotel about 14 years ago.

"It's a lot of nostalgia. She was excited when I told her I was buying them," Erwin said.

Swimmer takes Salton Sea plunge James Cain did it - swam 11 miles across the Salton Sea and into the arms of his wife, Sally, on Aug. 13.

"God, I wonder what I was thinking," Cain said. "That was a long way."

About a dozen people - mostly curious tourists - applauded the 47-year-old Phoenix man after he emerged from the murky, smelly sea at Johnson's Landing.

Medical marijuana debate heats up at home Medicine or menace? The debate over legalized medicinal marijuana came to the valley's three dispensaries. Federal agents, armed with a warrant, searched a safe deposit box belonging to a Palm Desert medical marijuana dispensary in June, prompting accusations of harassment from the dispensary's owner.

"I don't have anything to hide," said Stacy Hochanadel, owner and operator of CannaHelp in Palm Desert. "I understand the nature of investigating, but rather than doing this behind my back, why don't they just ask me what they want to know?" he said.

A spokeswoman for the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's Los Angeles office declined to comment, citing an ongoing investigation.

Teen's suicide note raises Internet concerns Safety on the Internet at social networking sites such as MySpace.com and at sites like YouTube was of increasing concern to many valley parents.

At Col. Mitchell Paige Middle School in December, for example, parents gathered to discuss concerns that were heightened after Joshua Austin, a 15-year-old Palm Springs High School Student, committed suicide in November after posting a note to his friends on MySpace.

"All of a sudden, the parents here were just getting really alarmed," said Mitchell Paige Principal Derrick Lawson.

FBI Special Agent Mark Hunter of Palm Springs, who tracks online predators of prepubescent children, told parents at the meeting: "You've got to take control. An excuse is not 'I don't know anything about computers.' You've got to learn or you've got to get it out of the house."

Miss Teen USA contest comes to the desert Are you Miss Tennessee? Fifty-one young, attractive women fanned out across Palm Springs in August to introduce themselves and the city to the nation.

Out of all contestants in the Miss Teen USA 2006 competition from around the United States and the District of Columbia, Katie Blair, 18, of Billings, Mont., came away with the diamond and pearl Mikomoto crown.

When Blair walked off the stage and saw her reflection, she said, "It makes me feel like a beauty queen."

The televised event returned to the valley after a one-year stint in Baton Rouge, La.

Winning season for La Quinta During an amazing final six seconds, the La Quinta High School Blackhawks sandwiched an onside kick with two touchdowns for a 31-30 victory over Bloomington in the second round of the CIF-Southern Section football playoffs on Dec. 2.

The victory a gave La Quinta a measure of confidence to beat Silverado High School 23-21.

"If we can score twice in six seconds, we can score any time," said quarterback Ryan Woods, who threw the game-winning pass last week.

But when La Quinta High's football team stepped on to the field as the underdog against J.W. North High School in the CIF-Southern Section Eastern Division championship game, they lost 26-10.

KC Chiefs pick a local Jeff Webb, a 2001 graduate of La Quinta High School, broke down in tears on April 30 when the Kansas City Chiefs selected him in the sixth round of the NFL Draft.

"For real?" Webb said upon learning the news. "I made it?"

Webb became the third player from the valley, along with Ed White and George Thomas, to be drafted by an NFL team.

Webb then called his father, Jeffrey Smith, from the parking lot and let him in on the good news.

"I made the 53-man roster," Webb said. "Can you believe that?"

The Who rock Tennis Garden Pete Townshend and Roger Daltrey proved at the Indian Wells Tennis Garden on Nov. 12 that the legendary British rock band The Who is still a vital force in pop culture.

In the second major concert of the season at the Tennis Garden, the new, augmented Who mixed pieces and fragments of their latest concept album with classic Who hits such as "Who Are You" and "Behind Blue Eyes."

Governor’s got love for valley During a whirlwind trip to Palm Springs on July 29, a confident Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger touted his record and exclaimed, "I love Palm Springs."

The governor shook hands with voters and stopped by Peabody's Cafe, The Desert Sun and Mizell Senior Center, one of many stops that would help ensure his victory over Democratic challenger State Treasurer Phil Angelides.

Nordstrom coming our way Local shoppers' longtime dreams for highly touted doting customer service, great shoes and high-end fashions will likely come true when the fast-growing Coachella Valley gets its first Nordstrom department store in spring 2009.

The Seattle based-retailer, which started as a shoe store in 1901 and grew into one of the industry's premier luxury brands with a reputation for personalized customer service, announced plans in February for a two-story, 149,000-square-foot store. It will be built on the north end of Westfield Palm Desert, replacing one of the buildings that now houses Macy's.

"What I love about Nordstrom is customer service. I never thought Nordstrom would come here," said Liz Burnach of Palm Desert. "If they come here, I pity the other stores. I'm happy they're coming. I think it would be nice if they upscale the mall."

Even the president visits President George Bush arrived on April 23 and raised nearly $2 million at a Republican Party fundraiser, when he announced, "Our message to the American people is, don't fear the future, because we intend to shape the future."

The visit was the first time since 1995 - when Bill Clinton played a round of golf at the Bob Hope Chrysler Classic - that a sitting president has visited the desert. Bush visited with former President Gerald R. Ford and first lady Betty Ford at their Rancho Mirage home.

Twentynine Palms Marine dies saving others For bravery under fire, and for saving two comrades from the 3rd Battalion, 7th Marine Regiment, Twentynine Palms, Marine Cpl. Jason Dunham was awarded the prestigious Medal of Honor on Nov. 11.

During an April 2004 battle in Iraq, near the Syrian border, an insurgent threw a hand grenade, and Dunham took one look and immediately threw his helmet on top, a book about the Marine later revealed.

The injuries Dunham sustained cost him his own life.

Tribe's gaming deal held up by Legislature A bid by the Agua Caliente Band of Cahuilla Indians of Palm Springs to more than double the number of slot machines in the tribe's casinos to 5,000 cleared the state senate but was rejected at the last minute by the state Legislature.

The tribe negotiated the revised gambling agreement with Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, who said the deal, at its maturity, would funnel $81.9 million a year from the gaming interest to California's General Fund.

Garcia in trouble over comments State Assemblywoman Bonnie Garcia, R-Cathedral City, came under fire when, on Sept. 10, she was asked about Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger by students in a La Quinta High School class. Here remark, "I wouldn't kick him out of my bed," garnered plenty of attention, particularly from her election opponent, Palm Desert Democrat Steve Clute.

Clute launched a multimedia ad blitz highlighting Garcia's alleged Oct. 10 comment.

"With sex scandals rocking the country, people (are) sick and tired of this behavior ..." says a narrator on the 30-second TV spot, as newspaper articles on former Florida Rep. Mark Foley are displayed.

Garcia responded, "When you can't talk about the issues, you do exactly what Mr. Clute is doing, which is running a dirty campaign and using his friends in organized labor to fund it," she said.

Home sellers, builders offer free bonuses In August, Coachella Valley home sellers and builders began offering everything from European-made Hippo golf clubs to a Kia Rio car and free spas as incentives to catch the attention of potential buyers.

It was a far cry from a year earlier, when buyers often were on waiting lists to tap a relatively tight supply of homes. By mid-December 2006, however, there were more than 8,000 homes and condos on the market in the valley.

Deadly fire rages through Pioneertown In July, the deadly Sawtooth Complex fire charred 70,000 acres of hillsides and desert terrain, destroying some 60 homes and structures in the Pioneertown area. Stories of loss, survival and nightmares and dreams realized have played out in recent months.

Only days before Christmas, for instance, three generations of the Wilson family gathered back at the scene of their tragedy, where they're rebuilding and recovering.

"We're starting all over from absolutely nothing," Nicole Wilson said. "Everything from since my parents were married is gone - pictures, sentimental memory stuff."

Esperanza blaze leaves 5 firefighters dead The Esperanza wildfire in October killed a five-member U.S. Forest Service crew.

The Idyllwild-based fire-fighting team was working on a ridge above two steep gullies, protecting an octagonal home and an unattached garage, according to a "Green Sheet" report released in November.

Winds topping 40 mph, almost perfectly aligned with the direction and slope of the gullies, contributed to the fast-running fire front that "overwhelmed" the crew, the report states.

Battle with anorexia draws compassion To passers-by in Palm Springs and Cathedral City, Darlene Rockey is the skinny lady in the running shorts, the one seen walking endlessly with a stiff-legged limp.

So a July 2 article about Rockey, a 5-foot-2-inch tall Palm Springs woman who weighs about 62 pounds and suffers from anorexia nervosa, caught the attention of Desert Sun readers.

Rockey walks at least 17 miles a day as part of a grueling exercise regime and was featured on the Dr. Phil television show.

College of the Desert campus growing Those in the east valley must have felt they were coming into their own on Aug. 19 when officials unveiled a plan to turn about 100 acres of barren land into the long-awaited East Valley Center campus for College of the Desert, where students could earn associate degrees and learn high-tech and green building skills.

The donated land is east of Buchanan Street between Avenues 62 and 60 in an unincorporated area near Coachella. The school will grow from its current outpost at the Riverside County Workforce Development Center in Indio, which offers about 68 courses, to a fully accredited part of COD. Long-range plans include a balanced mix of academic and vocational courses, comprehensive student services and community facilities such as meeting spaces and soccer fields.

High temps break records By Sept. 13, Palm Springs had recorded 117 days with temperatures above 100 degrees. Palm Springs temperatures broke four record highs in July.

On July 20, for instance, the mercury eked up to 120, eclipsing the 118-degree record set in 1978. The hotter-than-normal summer sent electric bills soaring for many valley residents.

Palm Springs resident Barbara Stebbins paid nearly $1,300 in electricity bills over two months - $93 in May, then $593 in June.

"What are you going to do? Say, 'I'm sorry I'm not going to pay the bill?' "

Students return to school excited, uncertain Some 44,000 students arrived for the first day of classes on Sept. 5, and Eric Reed Jr. was one who came with a mix of excitement and uncertainty.

"We told him second grade was going to be a little more advanced, a little harder this year, with more math and writing," said Karen Reed, his mother.

Eric's parents, Eric Sr. and Karen Reed, made the transition a little easier by escorting him to school and hanging out awhile to ensure he got off to a good start in teacher Nancy Howell's second-grade classroom at John Adams Elementary School in La Quinta.

Parents, students, teachers and administrators quickly got into the rhythm of another academic year as Coachella Valley and Desert Sands unified school districts opened their doors for the 2006-07 school year.

DEA Targets Larger Marijuana Providers (LAT)

By Rone Tempest, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 1, 2007

The federal agency sees big profits for medical dispensaries as a sign of illegal high-stakes drug dealing. Advocates say the raids are unfair.

HAYWARD, CALIF. — Until federal drug agents arrested him last month, Shon Squier was one of Hayward's most successful and generous young businessmen.

Customers lined up outside his downtown storefront, particularly on Mondays, when he offered free samples to the first 50 visitors. Business was so good that Squier, a former construction worker, was able to donate more than $100,000 to local charities.

But Squier's success as a dynamic medical marijuana entrepreneur was also his downfall. Federal drug agents raided his home and business, arresting Squier and his store manager, freezing bank accounts containing $1.5 million and confiscating several expensive cars, motorcycles and $200,000 in cash.

Medical marijuana advocates claim the raid constitutes unfair, selective enforcement by the Drug Enforcement Administration of the estimated 170 medical marijuana dispensaries in the state, including 85 in the San Francisco Bay Area.

Just down the street, another medical marijuana dispensary, not as big or as flashy as Squier's, was left untouched by the DEA agents in the Dec. 11 raid.

The federal drug agency, which does not recognize California laws legalizing the sale of marijuana to patients with doctor's prescriptions, contends the amount of money involved proves that the medical marijuana trade is nothing more than high-stakes drug dealing, complete with the same high-rolling lifestyles.

"These people will tell you they are just interested in the terminally ill," said Gordon Taylor, DEA special agent in charge of the California eastern federal district, "but what they are really interested in is lining their pockets with illegal drug money. When you pull the mask off, you see that they are nothing more than common dope dealers."

California's two medical marijuana laws, Proposition 215, approved by voters in 1996, and Senate Bill 420, passed in 2003, are not clear about how much money proprietors can take out of their businesses. One section of SB 420 states that medical marijuana caregivers should be allowed "reasonable compensation" for their services. Another section states that distribution should be done on a nonprofit basis.

"The legislation is about as clear as mud the way that they wrote it," said Joe Elford, lawyer for Americans for Safe Access, a pro-medical marijuana group. "The dispensaries are legal under state law because they are cooperatives and collectives. It is my best guess in terms of what the Legislature intended is that they shouldn't be operating to make a profit."

With the proliferation of medical marijuana dispensaries of all sizes across the state, the DEA and Internal Revenue Service have recently concentrated their investigations on young, high-profile operators like Squier, 34, and Luke Scarmazzo, 26, co-owner of a Modesto dispensary.

Scarmazzo got the attention of the DEA earlier in the year, when he produced a rap video that showed him counting stacks of hundred dollar bills, blowing billows of smoke at the camera and flipping off federal agents.

The Scarmazzo video, featuring the background sound of a pump shotgun racking a round, includes actors posing as members of the Modesto City Council. Online at http://www.krazmusic.com , it includes the refrain:

I'm in business, man.

I mean business, man.

Let me handle my business, damn.

Federal prosecutors showed it at Scarmazzo's bond hearing to demonstrate his criminal intent in order to deny him bail.

But Fresno lawyer Anthony P. Capozzi, who represents Scarmazzo, said the effort backfired.

"Let me tell you, the whole courtroom was swaying to the music," Capozzi said. Scarmazzo was released on a $400,000 bond and his 2007 Mercedes-Benz, confiscated by federal agents, was returned to him.

Taylor, the DEA agent, said that between January and June of this year, Scarmazzo, who has a previous felony conviction, and his associates recorded $3.4 million in sales of marijuana products with brand names that included "911," "AK47" and "Train Wreck." Scarmazzo and his California Healthcare Collective co-owner, Ricardo Ruiz Montes, also 26, are charged in federal court with money laundering and "operating a continuing criminal enterprise." The last charge, one of the most severe under federal drug laws, carries a sentence of 20 years to life in prison.

Here in Hayward, Squier and his business manager, Valerie Lynn Herschel, 23, are charged with the illegal manufacture and distribution of marijuana, a federal "controlled substance." Federal agents confiscated hundreds of plants, brownies, cookies and other products containing marijuana from Squier's business, Local Patients Cooperative.

"I only gave the people what they wanted — easy, safe access to medical marijuana," said the slightly built Squier, cuddling his pet Chihuahua in his former office, which was stripped bare by federal agents.

He described his business as a responsible enterprise that paid federal and state payroll taxes for 60 employees, contributed to the Hayward High School football team and gave discounts to Hayward residents, veterans and customers in wheelchairs.

Squier said that he served about 75 customers a day and had 70,000 individual patients in his books. The success of his business allowed him to buy a $1.5-million home in the Hayward Hills overlooking San Francisco Bay, a Hummer and a late-model Mercedes.

Half a block down Foothill Boulevard, Tom Lemos, 45, continues to operate his much lower-volume Hayward Patients Resource Center.

Whereas Squier and Scarmazzo flaunted their wealth, Lemos, who claims to have 3,000 to 4,000 regular customers, emphasizes his modest lifestyle.

"I live in a rental apartment and I drive an '86 Isuzu with 245,000 miles on it," Lemos said.

Appearing before the Hayward City Council on Dec. 19 to ask for a renewal of his agreement to operate in the city, Lemos opened his remarks by stating: "I don't live in a large house."

Compared to his "small, homey" medical cannabis operation, Lemos said, Squier's high-volume Local Patients Cooperative down the street was a "Wal-Pot."

After hearing Lemos' presentation and testimony from several of his patients, the City Council agreed to extend his agreement for 90 days, suggesting that he would be granted a longer-term permit if he moved from the downtown area to a more remote location, away from schools and the general public.

Even before the federal bust, the city had informed Squier that its agreement with him would be terminated.

Similarly, after Scarmazzo began operating in Modesto, the City Council passed an ordinance banning additional cannabis cooperatives, and the city had on several occasions attempted to halt Scarmazzo's operation.

The raids on both the Hayward and Modesto operations support what medical marijuana advocates contend is an unwritten practice by the DEA of being more likely to crack down on an operation that has lost local government support.

After the U.S. Supreme Court ruled last year that federal laws banning marijuana sales take precedence over those in California and other states permitting the sales, the DEA was empowered to arrest patients and operators at any one of the dispensaries that started up after passage of Proposition 215.

Instead of going after everyone, however, the federal agency appears to concentrate on the larger and higher-profile operations.

Medical marijuana advocates contend it is unfair of the DEA to cite examples like Squier and Scarmazzo to represent the typical dispensary operators.

"Most operators are not wealthy individuals," said Elford, the Americans for Safe Access lawyer. "As far as we can tell, the majority of dispensary operators are simply people who are interested in providing safe, affordable and reliable medicine to the people who need it and are not in it for the profit."

The "big fish" strategy enrages Oakland lawyer James Anthony, who represents Scarmazzo in civil matters.

"Why does the DEA suddenly concern themselves with how successful a medical cannabis collective is?" he asked. "Are they saying that if these guys had led monkish lives, then they would have left them alone? Are they judging Donald Trump on his lifestyle?"

Medical Marijuana Groups Claim DEA Unfair (WT)

The Washington Times/UPI, January 1, 2007

Larger California dispensaries of medical marijuana claim they are being unfairly targeted by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency.

Among them is Shon Squier, 34, of Hayward, Calif., whose major storefront operation was shut down last month by the DEA, which also froze bank accounts containing $1.5 million and confiscated several expensive cars, motorcycles and $200,000 in cash, the Los Angeles Times reported Monday.

Further down the street, a much smaller operation wasn't touched, leading Squier to allege he is being unfairly targeted for being successful, the Times said.

California's two medical marijuana laws, Proposition 215, approved by voters in 1996, and Senate Bill 420, passed in 2003, are not clear about how much money proprietors of the estimated 170 medical marijuana outlets in the state can make.

The DEA does not recognize California laws legalizing the sale of marijuana to patients with doctor's prescriptions, and special agent Gordon Taylor said the businesses have nothing to do with compassion for the terminally ill.

"When you pull the mask off, you see that they are nothing more than common dope dealers," Taylor told the Times.

Racketeer Loses His Swagger (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 29, 2006

HAI Waknine shambled into the Beverly Hills Lamborghini showroom.

The owner, Victor Keuylian, sensed trouble. Keuylian and his son were late on paying off a $950,000 loan that Waknine had brokered with an Israeli businessman.

"What do you want, Hai?" he asked, according to a later telephone conversation recounting the incident that was caught on a federal wiretap.

Waknine pointed to a $175,000 Ferrari in the luxury European car dealership.

"I want this one over here. I want to take this car and use it for half a day."

"Hai, the cars over here are for sale," Keuylian said. "Nobody's supposed to drive them."

"No, I want this car. Get the car out."

Reluctantly, Keuylian let him take it, and got it back later with 100 more miles on the odometer. Waknine was unappeased.

DOJ_NMG_0110898

Two days later he left a message on the home answering machine of Keuylian's son, Viken: "Vic, if you don't have the money tonight, it's going to double tomorrow…. Tomorrow we are coming to your shop, and we are going to take $2 million."

Keuylian called the police. As it turned out, the police were already listening on wiretaps.

Los Angeles police had been pursuing Waknine for 14 years, since he was a student at Grant High School in the San Fernando Valley. At various times, they charged him with threatening witnesses, kidnapping for ransom, assault with a firearm and grand theft auto.

All the investigations collapsed when witnesses refused to testify or left the country, and Waknine grew wealthier every year. He owned a 3,154-square-foot town house on the sand in Marina del Rey, a brand-new home in the Hollywood Hills, a vacation house on Acapulco Bay and investment properties around Southern California, Las Vegas and Miami.

But in 2003, at the time of Keuylian's call, organized crime detectives thought they had a good case building. Working with federal drug agents and foreign police who were investigating Israeli organized crime and Ecstasy trafficking, they had wiretaps on phones in Los Angeles, Las Vegas, Miami, Mexico, Spain, Belgium and Israel.

From the wires and informants they began amassing fresh evidence of Waknine's connections to an Israeli crime syndicate called the Jerusalem Group and his alleged involvement in drug trafficking, money laundering and extortion, according to court documents. And this time, none of it depended on skittish witnesses.

"Yesterday, I got all kinds of threats at my office in California: 'I will kill your wife, I will kill your son, I will kill you,' " Keuylian complained about Waknine to another Israeli involved in the deal over a wiretap in April 2003.

In another wiretap, he described Waknine's foray into the showroom.

"If he wants to be a jerk with me," he said. "I'm more than ready to be a jerk with him…. This lowlife immoral person, Hai, came over and threatened me and all of my family."

Waknine first came to the attention of authorities as a student at Grant High in March 1989. A popular teacher named Hal Arthur was shot to death outside his Sherman Oaks home, and at least 10 students suspected Waknine; he had a bellicose reputation and, they thought, a beef with the teacher.

He was 16 at the time, a pudgy upper-middle-class Van Nuys kid, born in Israel, who wore jewelry and fancy clothes and drove a BMW. One of the students told police that Waknine took karate lessons from an instructor who taught him "how to shoot guns and kill people."

Detectives questioned Waknine for six hours but let him go after he passed a polygraph test. "There is no evidence to connect the kid to this case," Det. Mel Arnold told the news media.

The killing remains unsolved. But organized crime detectives who have followed Waknine for years say the incident gave him an ominous reputation he would later play to his advantage.

Waknine dropped out of high school and became a full-time "wheeler-dealer," in the words of his younger brother, Assaf Waknine, interviewed by telephone. "He'd buy five cars here, sell five cars there."

In the mid-1990s, Waknine brokered a business arrangement between a wealthy uncle and a real estate investor named Judah Hertz, whose holdings included the International Jewelry Center on South Hill Street, across from Pershing Square. Waknine rented several offices in the building and opened a postal business called Global Parcel Service on the bottom floor.

Around this time, according to police, several of his friends were becoming the country's biggest importers of the club drug Ecstasy. They flaunted their Italian cars and Versace suits in the hippest clubs of Beverly Hills and Hollywood.

One of his friends, Jacob "Cookie" Orgad, an Israeli who was also in business with Hertz, had taken over a Las Vegas-based network that transported cocaine from California to the East Coast for Pablo Escobar's Colombian cartel, according to a report by Nevada gaming investigators.

As Ecstasy became popular, Orgad began smuggling the aspirin-size pills, which cost pennies to make and sold for upward of $25, into Los Angeles from Europe, according to police.

Confidential informants told the Drug Enforcement Administration that Ecstasy traffickers used Waknine's postal business to launder millions of dollars. In a single transaction, he allegedly received $11 million to launder, an affidavit by DEA Special Agent Deanne L. Reuter said.

According to Reuter, an informant said Waknine also boasted of using his mother's company, Silhouette Paris in Studio City, "to import MDMA [Ecstasy] in the shoulder pads of women's apparel."

Waknine was living the high life, according to both his brother and two Los Angeles Police Department detectives, who requested anonymity because they are still investigating Israeli organized crime in Los Angeles.

He would play $10,000 hands in Vegas without pause, drop $5,000 on Cristal Champagne and designer vodka at clubs such as Les Deux, Café Maurice and Bar One, and party with celebrities and rappers, strippers and Russian blonds.

His hangdog face, nervous tic and rolls of flab did not diminish his violent reputation.

"There was an instance where someone flipped Hai off at a club," said one of the organized crime detectives, who was undercover at the time. "A Japanese guy driving a Ferrari, he wasn't the coolest guy in the world.

"Hai assessed him a $25,000 fine." The guy paid, fearing the consequences of refusing, the detective said.

In the Jewelry District and in Israeli pockets of the San Fernando Valley, Waknine became known as a go-to guy to collect on a loan, resolve a dispute or fix a problem.

In 2000, insurance broker Jimmy Altman learned that firsthand when Waknine called his office in Encino. Altman, it turned out, was somebody's problem.

He was dating a divorcee, and her former husband wasn't happy about it, according to court documents. Waknine asked Altman to meet him at Tempo Restaurant, a hip Israeli hangout on Ventura Boulevard where Waknine regularly held court.

"If I were you, I'd stay away from Tammy," Waknine warned Altman, according to a description of their encounter in the court papers.

Altman dropped the relationship, but days later two bullets spider-cracked the front windows of his home, the court papers said. Waknine called again and demanded $75,000. "If you don't pay me, I'll hurt you."

Altman filed a police report, but stopped cooperating with detectives when Waknine took out a $1-million policy with him.

Yet police were closing in on Waknine's circle.

Assaf, Waknine's brother, had been sent to prison in New York after pleading guilty in 1997 to participating in an elaborate scheme to rack up $125,000 per day on bogus American Express cards.

In 2001, Waknine's friends in the Ecstasy trade went down. Alex Maimon and Louis Ziskin were convicted of smuggling 700 pounds of Ecstasy into Southern California via FedEx. Orgad pleaded guilty to drug charges for hiring strippers and models to carry millions of Ecstasy tablets from Paris to Los Angeles. Tamer Ibrahim was on the run for shipping 1,100 pounds of Ecstasy — worth more than $40 million — through LAX hidden in a shipment of colored pencils and notebooks.

Waknine was still untouched.

That same year, Gabriel Benharosh, another alleged member of the Jerusalem Group, fled to the United States. He brought with him cash that an Israeli bank official had embezzled to pay off her brother's gambling debt to the Israeli mob. The embezzlement crashed the bank and caused a scandal in Israel, and Benharosh needed to hide the money.

Waknine introduced him to Keuylian, the Beverly Hills Lamborghini dealer, and Eli Hadad, a Miami real estate developer, to launder the money.

Benharosh lent $520,000 to Hadad in May 2002, and $950,000 to Keuylian in May 2003.

When both borrowers could not pay Benharosh back in time, Waknine went to work.

In August 2003, a wiretap caught Waknine on the phone to Benharosh, talking about Hadad: "On Tuesday I'm taking the house from him, my bro," Waknine said.

"Finally you do what I tell you," Benharosh replied. "I want to hear that he and his wife and kids are on the street, sleeping in the street."

Both men managed to pay Benharosh back. The Keuylians sold some Ferraris; one went to singer Rod Stewart. Hadad took out a third mortgage on his home.

They thought they were done with Waknine. Instead they were subpoenaed to testify before a grand jury.

In April 2004, Waknine, Benharosh and three others were indicted on 16 counts, including conspiracy to commit extortion and conspiracy to commit money laundering, based largely on the extensive wiretaps. A State Department narcotics report described Waknine and Benharosh as a "money laundering cell" and "principal targets" in a crime organization run by an Israeli mobster named Itzhak Abergil, whom the department listed as one of the 40 biggest importers of illegal drugs into the United States.

In December, the grand jury added the more serious offense of racketeering.

Benharosh ultimately cut a deal to testify against Waknine. Assistant U.S. Atty. Thomas P. Sleisenger said the more serious U.S. crimes were committed by Waknine.

"Our interest here in Los Angeles has always been Waknine," he said. "This guy has been the thorn in the side of law enforcement for years."

Waknine's trial began this June in the courtroom of U.S. District Judge Manuel Real. Some days the gallery took on the cast of a Hollywood club, filled with blond, shiny-haired women and men in tight black designer T-shirts.

After four days of testimony, Waknine pleaded guilty to a single count of racketeering, catching prosecutors by surprise.

He went home to await sentencing, which made detectives and agents who had worked for years to put him in prison nervous. Would he really give up his lavish lifestyle when he probably had money stashed in accounts all over the world?

In August, U.S. marshals hauled Waknine into court in manacles after an informant said he planned to flee to meet his brother Assaf, who had been released from prison, in Mexico. Waknine, who had been free on bond, told officials he was afraid someone was after him.

Real was unmoved. "He should be protected in custody and be here for sentencing. He'll live until that time at least."

On Sept. 11, Waknine shuffled into the courtroom shackled to other inmates. At the dais, he twitched and tugged at his jail pants to keep them up, before meekly mumbling a plea for leniency.

Without looking up from his paperwork, Real sentenced him to 10 years in federal prison, a year more than prosecutors were asking. Waknine was taken to the Metropolitan Detention Center to begin his sentence. His lawyers filed a notice of intent to appeal the extra year of the sentence.

On Dec. 11, Waknine jangled into court again for a restitution hearing. Prosecutors recommended he pay a total of $406,000 to his victims. Waknine's attorney told the judge he agreed with the government.

"The government is not the one to make the order. I am," Real snapped.

The judge made some calculations and ordered Waknine to pay $646,000.

1,373 Miles Into The Heart Of Afghanistan (LAT)

By Paul Watson, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 31, 2006

The Ring Road is meant to link the nation and connect its major cities. But traveling the route is no Sunday drive.

Shahr-i-Safa, Afghanistan — AS a hair-thin line on a map, Afghanistan's national Ring Road looks easy enough to conquer.

But tell war-hardened Afghans that you're going to travel its entire 1,373-mile length unarmed, facing winter and a raging insurgency, and they look at you like you're completely mad.

Five years after the fall of the Taliban, it shouldn't be such a challenge.

Rebuilding the two-lane highway that connects Afghanistan's major cities has been a centerpiece of the U.S.-led effort to transform the nation. It is so important that Afghanistan's president, Hamid Karzai, said that President Bush once demanded daily updates on the roadwork from Kabul south to Kandahar, the seat of power under Taliban rule.

U.S. grants have paid for rebuilding a third of the road, according to Afghan government figures. Japan, Saudi Arabia and Iran are responsible for repairing other sections, a rare case in which Washington and Tehran are working toward the same goal. Officially, the $1.05-billion project is almost finished.

But as with many things in Afghanistan, there is a chasm between the rhetoric and reality.

Some of the best stretches of the road are among the Taliban's favorite killing grounds. This fall, Canadian troops led the biggest ground battle in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization's 57-year history, in part to regain control of a stretch of highway west of Kandahar. The NATO offensive cleared the insurgents, but guerrillas and highway robbers still prey on travelers in many other places.

About 40% of the road isn't finished. Some sections are nothing more than muddy tracks through the country's lawless Wild West, where you can drive for hours without seeing another vehicle fishtailing and backsliding through the muck along with you.

The only way to understand the condition of the road and grasp what it says about Afghanistan is to drive it.

The trip took my interpreter, driver and me seven days, inching along slippery edges of steep cliffs, wandering in the wilderness without road signs, suffering two flat tires, a ruptured radiator and a spinout on mountain ice.

On the way, we managed to avoid a Taliban ambush, a potential kidnapper or highway robber, a suicide bomber and a gunman who fired close enough to take off one of our heads.

Getting ready

I KNEW some of the Ring Road all too well. I traveled it for weeks in the early Taliban era a decade ago, when years of war and neglect already had reduced the highway to patches of broken asphalt connected by dirt, rocks and ruts. A trip that would take a few hours on a proper road was days of torture, the speedometer straining to break 10 mph as the vehicle crawled over shell craters and pond-sized potholes.

This time, I would be leaving from Kabul with interpreter Wesal Zaman and driver Zyarat Gul. A quiet and calm man, Gul had gotten us home safely from other terrible places.

Before starting out, we visited three experts at the Economics Ministry to find out what we were in for.

Sayed Arif Nazif, the ministry's director of design, told us that the building of the road began in the mid-1970s. The United States helped, but most of the money came from the Soviet Union and Arab countries.

Farmers used the road to get their produce to market. Afghanistan became the world's largest exporter of dried grapes, apples and other fruit. It also sent an assortment of nuts.

"In those days, in terms of our roads, we were much more advanced than neighboring countries," Nazif said. "But because of the wars and other problems, all our roads were destroyed."

Soviet troops and tanks poured down the Ring Road to invade Afghanistan in the dead of night on Dec. 25, 1979, setting off a decades-long tailspin from which Afghans are still trying to recover.

The rebuilding of the road is supposed to help revive the economy and break down ethnic differences by allowing Afghans to travel more freely. Although dried fruit exports are 20% of what they were before the wars, reconstruction is showing benefits, Nazif said. This year, the repaved road allowed farmers to get fresh pomegranates, grapes and apples to Kabul's airport, and the first few flights delivered the produce to wealthy Persian Gulf states.

I had a more pressing question: "How long do you think it would take to drive the whole Ring Road?"

Nazif shifted in his seat. "Take the length of 1,373 miles, and divide by an average speed of 50 miles an hour," he said.

"That sounds like we could do it in maybe four days," I replied, trying to do some quick mental math. Nazif smiled and nodded, but we both knew Afghanistan was a lot more complicated than that.

Before we started, we took some precautions that are prudent for any trip into the countryside: We loaded the car with two spare tires, a shovel, bottled water and snacks. And we made one rule: If Gul, an ethnic Pashtun like most of the Taliban, saw anything on the horizon or felt anything he didn't like, he should turn around without pausing to ask us.

A small victory

AS the Ring Road begins a steady climb out of Kabul on a 27-mile section rebuilt by the Taliban, the horizon is bright white with towering snow-covered mountains. The road is as smooth as any in the United States. But the government can't afford to keep it plowed, so it was covered with packed snow and ice that brought long lines of heavy transports to a halt on the highlands near Ghazni.

We were less than six hours into the journey near Shahr-i-Safa when we saw the first signs of Taliban activity.

Four insurgents armed with AK-47s and rocket-propelled grenades had ridden two motorcycles to a hill overlooking a stretch of the highway near Qalat. About 3 p.m., they opened fire on a civilian truck taking supplies to an Afghan military base, a common guerrilla tactic.

Normally, insurgents carry out swift attacks and make a getaway into the desert. But this time a pickup carrying half a dozen Afghan national army troops happened by. They pinned the guerrillas down from behind and called in a second unit to attack from the front.

We reached the scene about half an hour after the battle ended. Jubilant Afghan troops were smiling and joking next to three Taliban corpses, like scavengers enjoying quality roadkill. One of the dead men lay on his back with his knees bent, as if he might jump up at any moment. But the bullet hole in his neck left no doubt his war was over.

The fourth fighter escaped, so the victory wasn't complete, said Afghan army Maj. Atullah Maiwandwal.

It was a battle too small to make the news, let alone change the course of a war. But the major and his men had achieved something significant: Without U.S. military advisors or foreign backup, they defended a piece of highway rebuilt with a $237-million U.S. grant, the sort of gradual progress that often gets lost amid the noise of suicide bombings and other insurgent attacks.

"Where are your bodyguards?" one soldier asked, stunned that we were traveling the highway without weapons.

We explained that we preferred to travel unencumbered by armed escorts. So as night fell, we rushed off to Kandahar, which has been staggering under a wave of suicide bombings. The governor gave us beds in his guest house.

Early the next morning, we headed west into Helmand province, the scene of fierce fighting this year between NATO forces and the Taliban.

A large billboard on the edge of Kandahar declared that the highway was being rebuilt as a gift of the Japanese people.

Actually, the 70 miles of road that Japan pledged $76 million to fix is the same bumpy, cracked surface that it has been for years. The area is too dangerous for road crews.

It is the hashish harvest season, and marijuana plants as big as Christmas trees are stacked by the thousands against mud-brick homes, curing in the sun. Villagers scrape the gooey resin, which is pressed into blocks and exported along the same routes that move the opium used to produce heroin, a big source of the insurgents' income.

Hundreds of gunmen prowl the Ring Road in Helmand. They are members of private militias who take orders from local warlords and drug barons and operate illegal checkpoints, mostly to squeeze money from truck drivers.

As one longtime resident of Lashkar Gah, the provincial capital, told us, "They are loyal to the government until 4 o'clock in the afternoon, and then until the next morning they're enemies."

As we neared the Lashkar Gah turnoff, in an area where we were told that kidnappers had abducted two German journalists, our driver broke our one rule.

The broken rule

GUL slowed for a speed bump, and instead of accelerating when a militiaman jumped up with an AK-47, he stopped. Gul opened the driver's window, apparently weighing the comparative risks of getting shot and getting kidnapped. The gunman stuck his head in, saw me in the back seat and smiled like a dog sniffing fresh meat.

"Get us out of here!" I shouted at Gul, and he hesitated. "Get moving!"

Gul hit the gas. The barrel of the gunman's rifle clunked off the rear side of the car. Not daring to look back, I tensed for the shot that didn't come.

In Lashkar Gah, we stopped at a construction agency funded by the United States Agency for International Development, or USAID, where we previously had met cook Khudai Nazar. At 64, he is old enough to remember what is possible with peace, and young enough to believe he might live to see it again.

We asked what he remembered of the Ring Road of his childhood. He sent his son for an opaque plastic sandwich bag stuffed with browning reference letters and old photographs.

They tell of a more innocent age, from the late 1940s to the 1970s, when American workers and their families lived in Helmand. They were building a dam, a power plant, irrigation canals and other development projects in the Afghan desert.

In one black-and-white photograph, Nazar is 12 years old and standing on a lush lawn surrounded by a white picket fence with his new bicycle, a gift from Rose and Don Wonderly of Portland, Ore.

"The first time I met with her, I didn't understand English," recalled Nazar, who speaks with an American accent. "American people always like children, and they didn't have any. She said come every day to my house and I'm gonna teach you English."

Within a few days, Rose was giving the boy new clothes and encouraging other American families to leave him some of their hand-me-downs. The Wonderlys left in 1960.

By the time the Soviets invaded in 1979, Nazar had worked for a string of other Americans: George Belissary promoted the servant to a warehouse job; JoAnn and Ronald Thompson of Sacramento praised his bread-baking skills; Jack and Maxine Smith wrote of their fondness for his pastries and good humor.

The Smiths had to flee the Soviet occupation after 17 months in Afghanistan, and in her last words to him, Nazar said, Maxine urged him to take his wife and their 10 children to Pakistan.

"She said, 'Just send me a message and I'll have a house waiting for you — everything,' " Nazar said wistfully. It was clear in his breaking voice that he wished he could have left. But he never found enough money, or will, to turn his back on the land of his birth.

Nazar bid us farewell with the hope that some of his long-lost American friends might try to reach him, maybe even risk a visit.

Three hours after we left Lashkar Gah, a suicide bomber walked into the well-guarded compound of the provincial governor, a few blocks from where we'd visited Nazar, and blew himself up in the parking lot, killing eight people.

The Wild West

HEADING north toward Herat, we drove for several hours past mountains weathered so smooth they seemed molded from clay. We reached Herat that night, putting us more than halfway along the Ring Road at the end of our second day.

Swift progress made us overconfident. We talked about being back in Kabul in a day or so. We marveled at the traffic lights operating at all the main intersections in Herat, the only major city to escape the destruction of Afghanistan's wars.

The pleasure was short-lived. The next morning, 35 miles northeast of Herat, the highway abruptly ended. We didn't see asphalt again for three days.

Iran was supposed to complete 70 miles of paved road from Herat into Badghis province, but its contractors suddenly stopped work, said Gov. Mohammed Naseem Tokhi. Some say the money ran out; others cite unspecified problems between Iran and the rest of the international community, Tokhi said. He has received no official explanation.

The Afghan national government hasn't even been able to find a country willing to fund construction of the road through the rest of the province.

Entering Badghis was like driving back into biblical times. Ours was the only internal-combustion engine running for miles. Most people were walking or riding donkeys. The gray smoke of cooking fires seeped through the black fabric of nomads' low-slung tents.

The province's people, many of whom are Pashtuns, have long felt cut off from the rest of the country. Now they are largely missing out on billions of dollars in international aid, and that makes Badghis an ideal recruiting ground for insurgents. Grinding poverty and poor health have left even moderates angry with Karzai's government and its foreign backers.

Prolonged drought followed by devastating floods last month left three-quarters of the province's people without enough food, Tokhi said. The only roads into the province are so bad that relief agencies are having a tough time reaching people. Many could die during the winter, he said.

In the frontier town of Bala Murghab, a Ring Road bridge is a dangerously unstable span covered with metal sheets laid by people who salvaged them from a derelict factory. The 200,000 residents of the surrounding area have no electricity, and their water is so bad that diarrhea is a main killer.

Smoldering rage exploded this fall when gunmen stormed the district commissioner's new headquarters, a three-story yellow brick building built by USAID. They blasted a rocket-propelled grenade through the guardhouse and fired assault rifles at offices and police cars, shattering most of the main building's windows. The district commissioner fled for his life. Three foreign workers at a U.S.-based agency's compound escaped by hiding in their garden as rampaging mobs looted the buildings.

When the aid agency shut its office, townspeople persuaded its Afghan supervisor, Ghalam Seddiq, to become mayor. Slipping another prayer bead along a string as he talked to us, Seddiq said the attackers wanted to stop the aid agency's education programs and prevent children from learning, a Taliban priority.

The center of town is a ramshackle bazaar, where merchants glared as we drove along muddy streets. A large padlock sealed the front doors of the only hotel. The elderly caretaker said it was too dangerous to stay there, but the new district commissioner ordered the hotel to open for us.

In this Afghan version of a Wild West town, Abdul Jalil Sekandari is the deputy sheriff.

Guarded by a young man with an AK-47 slung over his shoulder, Sekandari dropped by our hotel room that night. By the glow of an oil lamp, he griped about the government and foreign aid, personally guaranteed our safety and invited us to spend the night with him in the police station. We thought our odds were better in the hotel.

Good riddance

WE rode out of town at first light. We weren't far into the countryside when a man in a Taliban-style black turban lurking near a disabled Soviet tank leveled his Kalashnikov rifle and took a potshot at us. We heard the loud hiss-snap of a bullet passing close by, but he didn't fire again. It must have been a good-riddance round.

Soon even the dirt road disappeared into a labyrinth of mud tracks that crisscrossed broad valleys. We fishtailed and churned our way through dense fog, along tire ruts at least 2 feet deep. The four-wheel-drive car jerked and bucked like a rodeo bull.

There were no road signs, and no other vehicles. So the only thing to do was ask directions from a shepherd or a farmer working the sodden earth with a wooden plow pulled by his donkey.

"Does this road go to Maimana?" we asked an old man at one crossroads.

"Yes. But others prefer that way," he replied, nodding toward a dirt road heading in the opposite direction.

When we pulled in for a rest in Maimana, a pool of green fluid spilled out of a hole in the radiator, which a mechanic pounded shut the next morning.

We finally returned to paved highway at Andkhoi, a dust-blown place near the border with Turkmenistan, where for centuries tribal weavers have produced some of Afghanistan's best carpets.

Mohammed Ikram, a dealer representing more than 400 female weavers, was at the roadside, squatting in the dirt to measure a carpet in a floral design of red, blue and yellow. It would go to Pakistan, where a trader would pay about $210 a yard, attach a "Made in Pakistan" label and export it to the United States or Europe for hundreds of dollars in profit, Ikram said.

If Afghanistan could have peace and security, traders would follow the Ring Road straight to Andkhoi, he imagined. "And if tourists come here, then we will all be rich," Ikram said, smiling.

Paved highway awaited us on the other side of town, so we pressed on south to Mazar-i-Sharif, chattering about how good it would feel to have hot water and lights.

Come back later

MAZAR-I-SHARIF means Tomb of the Exalted. It is home to one of the holiest sites in Islam. Some Shiites believe it is the final burial place of Hazrat Ali, the prophet Muhammad's cousin and son-in-law, who was assassinated and first buried near Baghdad in the 7th century. Blood is still being spilled over the schism that followed, but not in Afghanistan.

Robbers are the biggest threat on the roads around Mazar. Andkhoi's carpet traders say they are regularly fleeced by gunmen demanding illegal road taxes.

After a night of comfort in Mazar, it was an easy drive to the Salang Tunnel, a 1.7-mile passage at 11,034 feet built by the Soviets through the Hindu Kush mountains on the route south to Kabul.

In winter, howling blizzards pummel the Salang's peaks. Avalanches, asphyxiation and plunges off cliffs have killed dozens of travelers.

As we headed up the pass, we recalled another trip a few weeks earlier when Gul skidded on black ice in the tunnel. The wheels hit the edge of a concrete walkway so hard that the front axle broke. He was elected to walk through a blizzard to a public works outpost a mile down the mountain. It was the middle of the night and deathly cold. A few workers huddled around a small wood stove.

"Is anyone hurt?" one asked when Gul asked for help.

"No."

"Are there any women?"

"No."

"Are you stuck in the middle of the road?"

"No."

DOJ_NMG_0110905

"Then go back to your car and come back in the morning."

This time, we made it through the tunnel and most of the Salang Pass without problems. The sky was ice blue, the road mostly clear. It seemed too easy for the end to such a hard journey.

Just then, Gul put the car into a 360-degree spin. A snow bank kept us from going over the edge.

We sat silently for a few seconds, staring up at the meandering Ring Road to see whether that was the worst that would happen — or whether fate was about to catch up with us in the form of a sliding truck.

Our luck held. There wasn't anyone close enough to harm us.

The car, with every bolt, spring and cable caked in mud, creaked and shimmied its way down the Shomali plains, and in a few hours we were overlooking Kabul, sprawled out across a plateau and shrouded in brown smog. The capital hadn't had a suicide bombing for days. The only thing left to worry about was traffic.

Treacherous journey

Despite more than $1 billion in construction aid, the primary roadway connecting Afghanistan's main cities is incomplete and beset with problems. Here is a look at what happened during a seven-day drive over its entire 1,373-mile length:

1. Taliban fighters attack a civilian truck. Afghan army troops engage guerrillas, killing three.

2. A suicide bomber blows himself up at compound of the provincial governor in the capital of Helmand province.

3. The highway abruptly ends, and the journey must continue on dirt roads and mud tracks. In neighboring countryside, a man takes a potshot at passing reporters. The radiator springs a leak.

4. Asphalt roadway begins again, but soon the journey reaches the treacherous Salang Tunnel, a 1.7-mile passage through the Hindu Kush mountains at 11,034 feet.

FBI Investigating Pipe Bomb Attempt (BRADV)

Baton Rouge Advocate, January 1, 2007

PORT ALLEN — FBI crime scene investigators returned today to Erwinville Baptist Church to collect evidence from the pipe bomb that was safely detonated by officials outside the church Sunday night.

FBI investigators collected debris and combed the area for evidence, West Baton Rouge Parish Sheriff Mike Cazes said. The debris will be sent to the FBI's crime lab in Quantico, Va.

The pipe bomb was found by deputies outside the church, along La. 413, south of U.S. 190, at 5:19 p.m. Sunday, authorities have said. The pipe bomb was safely detonated by the Louisiana State Police's Hazardous Material Unit around 9 p.m. Sunday

The FBI is handling the investigation, Cazes said.

No one answered the church's phone tonight.

NRA Sounds Alarm Of Not-So-Imminent Threat (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, January 2, 2007

In lobbying, a threat is good for business, whether it's genuine or not.

This might help to explain the dire warnings being issued by the National Rifle Association as the Democrats prepare to take control of Congress this week.

"The new leadership could be one of the most unfriendly to the National Rifle Association," declared Andrew Arulanandam, spokesman for the NRA. "If there's an effort to pursue gun control, we will mount an active defense."

DOJ_NMG_0110906

The famously combative lobby, with 4 million members, is displeased with the voting histories of House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) and other top Democrats in the House and is putting them on notice that it won't tolerate passage of anti-gun measures.

The only problem: No one expects gun legislation this year.

True, a few Democrats would love to take a potshot at the NRA. But its $20 million in political firepower has long discouraged any such effort. It helped to snuff out the presidential hopes of Democrat Al Gore in 2000 and to elect dozens, mostly Republicans, to Congress.

Besides, one of the NRA's biggest backers is a Democrat, Rep. John D. Dingell (Mich.), who was instrumental in blocking the last major attempt at gun control in 1999 and will reclaim the chairmanship of the House Energy and Commerce Committee this week.

No matter. The NRA is on high alert, and its latest weapon is a pamphlet designed to send its members into fits of paranoid rage and to inspire them to open their wallets.

A draft of the 27-page document, which was provided to The Washington Post by a source outside the NRA, lashes out at such icons of the left as investor George Soros, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and Pelosi. They are depicted as part of "a marching axis of adversaries far darker and more dangerous than gun owners have ever known."

Few places are less likely to be burgled than the Fairfax County headquarters of the NRA. But Arulanandam claimed that someone recently stole a "working draft" of the pamphlet, called "Freedom in Peril."

The document is filled with sinister-looking caricatures of supposedly anti-gun figures such as filmmaker Michael Moore, comedian Rosie O'Donnell, New York City Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg (R) and CBS News anchor Katie Couric. One chapter attacks Democratic lawmakers such as Sens. John F. Kerry and Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts and derides them as a "Gang of Opportunists." Other NRA enemies are "One-World Extremists," "Animal Rights Terrorists" (such as People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals) and "Illegal Alien Gangs."

"America, by its free and independent nature, is a breeding ground and safe haven for violent, illegal criminal gangs," the "Gang" chapter states. "And as always, it is the lawful who will take the fall."

Clinton, the Democratic front-runner for president in 2008, and Soros, a major backer of Democratic-leaning political organizations, are singled out for extra opprobrium. "Clinton views America as the great experiment, not for freedom, but for her own political ambitions," the pamphlet states.

Soros is described as "the Hungarian-born billionaire bankroller of a globalist jihad against firearm freedom" who has been "trying to revoke the Bill of Rights through his checkbook."

Veteran NRA-watchers have seen such rhetoric before. "This is vintage NRA fear tactics from an organization that knows how to use them to energize a base of supporters who have an unhealthy terror that the forces of government will take their guns away," said Peter Hamm, spokesman for the Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence. "It's both ugly and untrue."

Hamm also said he does not believe Congress will take up and pass major gun legislation anytime in the near future. Still, the pamphlet asserts that "towering waves of this coming storm are already crashing on our doorsteps."

The opening essay, titled "The Coming Confrontation," is signed by (and is situated next to gallant drawings of) two of the NRA's staffers, Wayne LaPierre and Chris W. Cox.

"It's inevitable that terrorists will infest America for generations to come. It's also inevitable that an anti-gun president will occupy the White House, and anti-gun forces will control the U.S. House and Senate," they write. "Unless we are well-financed to face that moment, the final disarmament of law-abiding Americans will occur beneath the shroud of anti-terrorism legislation."

So beware -- and make your checks payable to the NRA!Stop That Spin

House Democrats boast that their proposed ethics legislation will ban travel provided by lobbying organizations to lawmakers. Don't believe it.

Maneuvering by the American Israel Public Affairs Committee and others has opened a gaping loophole in the bill. Lobbies such as AIPAC and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce have their own nonprofit foundations, which will still be allowed to underwrite congressional junkets under the new rules.

Watch for more lobbying groups to set up their own "non-lobbying" foundation affiliates as a result.

TAX:

States With High Taxes Try To Tackle Burden (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 2, 2007

Americans are paying more property taxes today than ever before, and several states, including New Jersey and New York, will attempt to lessen the growing burden on homeowners in upcoming legislative sessions.

"In the past five years, the increase in property-tax collections has been nearly double the growth in personal income," wrote economist Gerald Prante, who conducted a recent study of real-estate taxes nationwide.

"What the future has in store for property taxes will largely be a function of housing prices, but local governments can stem the rising tax bills in the process by lowering the rates and not merely spending the windfall revenue."

The rate collected through property taxes rose just 2 percent from 1994 to 2000, according to the study. Since 2000, that amount has shot up 27 percent.

The rocketing rates, fueled by the rapid increase in residential home prices, are being closely watched by anti-tax advocacy groups such as Americans for Tax Reform.

"Too often, tax-and-spenders try to lower property tax taxes by tossing more money to the bloating local governments," said the group's president, Grover Norquist. "However, instead of leaving the taxpayers alone, big spenders blow through the state money and come knocking on residents' doors for even more."

Mr. Norquist says he will be watching closely and has never been afraid to campaign against politicians who don't act aggressively enough to curb taxes and spending.

He pointed to the "property tax revolution" of the 1980s when the states of Massachusetts and New Jersey attempted to rein in out-of-control property taxes that had tested the patience of property owners.

In Massachusetts, lawmakers set about capping local spending increases. In New Jersey, lawmakers tried shifting the tax burden from property owners to state workers with an income tax.

Today, according to figures provided by ATR, the burden on Massachusetts property owners has fallen by 7.5 percent. New Jersey property taxes, meanwhile, have increased 36 percent above the rate of inflation.

"As experience in Massachusetts demonstrates, property-taxes reform must address the root problem -- out-of-control spending," Mr. Norquist said. "Rather than shuffling taxpayers' dollars around and leaving the back door open for big spenders to sneak in more tax hikes, lawmakers should make sure that any reform includes taxpayer protections."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats To Stick With Popular Basics In Congress Agenda (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, January 2, 2007

WASHINGTON — When Democrats take power on Capitol Hill this week, House leaders will kick off their legislative campaign with a lightning-fast 100-hour agenda.

But there won't be a revolution.

In marked contrast to the Republicans who swept into the majority in 1994, incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and her legislative allies are not planning to amend the Constitution or eradicate federal agencies.

Instead, their initial legislative foray will focus on modest, politically popular issues, including initiatives to expand stem cell research, lower prescription drug prices and tighten congressional ethics rules.

Pelosi's program is expected to receive a warm reception on Capitol Hill, even from some Republicans. Less clear is whether Democrats can follow up with solutions to the deeper problems that are troubling a restive public.

Polls show that most Americans are looking to Congress, rather than the president, for leadership, particularly on resolving the war in Iraq.

Yet Pelosi and the Democrats plan no dramatic steps to influence the course of the war. Nor has the new majority detailed strategies to tackle other challenges that have confounded lawmakers for years, including rising healthcare costs and the financially imperiled Social Security system.

For now, the relatively safe 100-hour agenda may simply allow the Democrats to show they can accomplish something after a dozen years in the political wilderness.

"One of the things the public is definitely looking for is results," said veteran strategist Peter Fenn, who helped several Democratic candidates unseat Republicans in part by campaigning against the "do-nothing" record of the previous GOP-led Congress.

But finding a majority on Capitol Hill to agree on even small measures can be challenging.

Democrats will hold just a one-vote advantage in the Senate, where rules allow the minority party to stall, slow and amend legislation.

At the same time, ideological divisions between the parties are wider than they were a generation ago, when moderates in both caucuses wielded greater influence.

It also remains unclear how the president and the new Congress will work together. Though Bush and Democratic congressional leaders have pronounced themselves committed to compromise, they are coming off six years of fiercely partisan government.

And taking on a president, even a weakened one, is never easy for Congress. When Republicans challenged President Clinton over the budget after taking power in 1995, they were blamed after the federal government was forced to shut down during the faceoff.

"It's not going to be a cakewalk," said incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev. "Just because you say you want to be bipartisan doesn't mean they're going to fall all over themselves to work with you."

But the rapid-fire agenda that Pelosi has crafted to kick off Democratic rule carefully hits issues with broad popular appeal that may be hard for many Republicans to oppose.

Pelosi's proposed House ethics package -- which would ban many gifts from lobbyists and identify members who insert earmarks into bills for spending on their pet projects -- comes after scandals that voters blamed on Republicans. The GOP never passed comprehensive ethics legislation, to the chagrin of many of the party's own members.

House Democrats are also talking about reinstating rules that would require any new tax cuts or spending increases to be offset by other cuts, a measure designed to reduce future budget deficits -- another issue that opinion polls show Americans are concerned about.

At the close of the last legislative session, some Republican lawmakers decried the spending excesses of their own party, which has presided over record budget deficits despite its platform of fiscal restraint.

Democrats plan to liberalize federal funding for stem cell research, a popular initiative that was approved by bipartisan majorities in both chambers of Congress before the president vetoed it in July.

And they are pledging to repeal a law passed in 2003 that prohibited the federal government from using its purchasing power to negotiate lower drug prices for Medicare recipients, a top concern of senior citizens.

That proposal, too, earlier won bipartisan support when the Senate voted in March to support the idea in concept.

Some of the 100-hour issues are so popular that opposition appears to have melted away.

Representatives of the business community for a decade had been engaged in a struggle with organized labor to blunt any raise in the minimum wage. Yet now they say they see little chance of stopping the Democratic push to increase it from $5.15 an hour to $7.25 an hour.

It is uncertain whether Republican insistence on some tax relief for small businesses could hang up the measure. But few expect major battles.

"There's not much desire to start a fight on it. It's not winnable," said one business lobbyist. "The White House doesn't appear to have a lot of fight in them ... (and) I don't think weakened Republican minorities are going to want to fight."

Even some oil executives have said they don't need all of the tax breaks that the federal government has granted the industry in recent years. House Democrats have promised to repeal a number of them.

Twelve years ago, the House Republican caucus that Newt Gingrich led into the majority set a very different tone, filling its agenda with a number of highly contentious issues that touched off bruising battles with the minority party.

In its "Contract With America," the GOP pledged to place term limits on lawmakers, slash taxes, cut welfare benefits and curtail the rights of death row inmates to appeal their sentences.

Gingrich also made no secret of his plans to roll over Clinton.

"Republicans did something that was very foolish by essentially claiming that the president was irrelevant," said Rutgers University congressional scholar Ross K. Baker. Baker noted that Clinton deftly outmaneuvered them, and Republicans lost seats in the next election.

"However the Democratic leaders feel about President Bush," Baker said, "no one in any position of authority has proclaimed that President Bush is irrelevant."

Once Democrats move beyond the popular items in their first 100 hours, however, their challenges will mount.

Americans overwhelmingly want Congress and the White House to address the war in Iraq first. In a recent Gallup poll, 69 percent said the war should be the top priority, compared with 16 percent who pointed to the economy, which was second.

By contrast, the items on the 100-hour agenda ranked far down on the list.

House and Senate Democrats have planned a series of oversight hearings in January to focus attention on the war. And several senior Democrats have pledged to fight any proposal to send more troops to Iraq.

But the new majority has indicated it will shy away from asserting its real power to shape the war: using its budgetary authority to restrict spending.

"We will have oversight," Pelosi said recently. "We will not cut off funding."

Equally uncertain is the fate of healthcare reform, another legislative quandary that has increased in urgency as the number of uninsured Americans nears 47 million.

Last month, Sen. Ron Wyden, D-Ore., unveiled an ambitious proposal for universal health insurance, but neither Pelosi nor Reid has promised to revisit the controversial issue. And without Bush's support, the prospects for such a far-reaching plan are slim.

Democratic leaders have reached out to the White House to discuss Social Security, the long-term solvency of which is a major challenge confronting the federal government.

Incoming House Ways and Means Chairman Charles B. Rangel, D-N.Y., recently had lunch with Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., who is taking the lead for the administration on economic issues.

In a recent interview, Rangel said both sides had reason to compromise. "We have two years to prove that the voters were right, and the president has two years to prove that he's not a lame duck," he said.

Democrats To Start Without GOP Input (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton And Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, January 2, 2007

As they prepare to take control of Congress this week and face up to campaign pledges to restore bipartisanship and openness, Democrats are planning to largely sideline Republicans from the first burst of lawmaking.

House Democrats intend to pass a raft of popular measures as part of their well-publicized plan for the first 100 hours. They include tightening ethics rules for lawmakers, raising the minimum wage, allowing more research on stem cells and cutting interest rates on student loans.

But instead of allowing Republicans to fully participate in deliberations, as promised after the Democratic victory in the Nov. 7 midterm elections, Democrats now say they will use House rules to prevent the opposition from offering alternative measures, assuring speedy passage of the bills and allowing their party to trumpet early victories.

Nancy Pelosi, the Californian who will become House speaker, and Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, who will become majority leader, finalized the strategy over the holiday recess in a flurry of conference calls and meetings with other party leaders. A few

Democrats, worried that the party would be criticized for reneging on an important pledge, argued unsuccessfully that they should grant the Republicans greater latitude when the Congress convenes on Thursday.

The episode illustrates the dilemma facing the new party in power. The Democrats must demonstrate that they can break legislative gridlock and govern after 12 years in the minority, while honoring their pledge to make the 110th Congress a civil era in which Democrats and Republicans work together to solve the nation's problems. Yet in attempting to pass laws key to their prospects for winning reelection and expanding their majority, the Democrats may have to resort to some of the same tough tactics Republicans used the past several years.

Democratic leaders say they are torn between giving Republicans a say in legislation and shutting them out to prevent them from derailing Democratic bills.

"There is a going to be a tension there," said Rep. Chris Van Hollen (Md.), the new chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. "My sense is there's going to be a testing period to gauge to what extent the Republicans want to join us in a constructive effort or whether they intend to be disruptive. It's going to be a work in progress."

House Republicans have begun to complain that Democrats are backing away from their promise to work cooperatively. They are working on their own strategy for the first 100 hours, and part of it is built on the idea that they might be able to break the Democrats' slender majority by wooing away some conservative Democrats.

Democrats intend to introduce their first bills within hours of taking the oath of office on Thursday. The first legislation will focus on the behavior of lawmakers, banning travel on corporate jets and gifts from lobbyists and requiring lawmakers to attach their names to special spending directives and to certify that such earmarks would not financially benefit the lawmaker or the lawmaker's spouse. That bill is aimed at bringing legislative transparency that Democrats said was lacking under Republican rule.

Democratic leaders said they are not going to allow Republican input into the ethics package and other early legislation, because several of the bills have already been debated and dissected, including the proposal to raise the minimum wage, which passed the House Appropriations Committee in the 109th Congress, said Brendan Daly, a spokesman for Pelosi.

"We've talked about these things for more than a year," he said. "The members and the public know what we're voting on. So in the first 100 hours, we're going to pass these bills."

But because the details of the Democratic proposals have not been released, some language could be new. Daly said Democrats are still committed to sharing power with the minority down the line. "The test is not the first 100 hours," he said. "The test is the first six months or the first year. We will do what we promised to do."

For clues about how the Democrats will operate, the spotlight is on the House, where the new 16-seat majority will hold absolute power over the way the chamber operates. Most of the early legislative action is expected to stem from the House.

"It's in the nature of the House of Representatives for the majority party to be dominant and control the agenda and limit as much as possible the influence of the minority," said Ross K. Baker, a political scientist at Rutgers University. "It's almost counter to the essence of the place for the majority and minority to share responsibility for legislation."

In the Senate, by contrast, the Democrats will have less control over business because of their razor-thin 51-to-49-seat margin and because individual senators wield substantial power. Senate Democrats will allow Republicans to make amendments to all their initiatives, starting with the first measure -- ethics and lobbying reform, said Jim Manley, spokesman for the incoming majority leader, Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.).

Those same Democrats, who campaigned on a pledge of more openness in government, will kick off the new Congress with a closed meeting of all senators in the Capitol. Manley said the point of the meeting is to figure out ways both parties can work together.

In the House, Louise M. Slaughter (D-N.Y.), who will chair the Rules Committee, said she intends to bring openness to a committee that used to meet in the middle of the night. In the new Congress, the panel -- which sets the terms of debate on the House floor -- will convene at 10 a.m. before a roomful of reporters.

"It's going to be open," Slaughter said of the process. "Everybody will have an opportunity to participate."

At the same time, she added, the majority would grant Republicans every possible chance to alter legislation once it reaches the floor. "We intend to allow some of their amendments, not all of them," Slaughter said.

DOJ_NMG_0110911

For several reasons, House Democrats are assiduously trying to avoid some of the heavy-handed tactics they resented under GOP rule. They say they want to prove to voters they are setting a new tone on Capitol Hill. But they are also convinced that Republicans lost the midterms in part because they were perceived as arrogant and divisive.

"We're going to make an impression one way or the other," said one Democratic leadership aide. "If it's not positive, we'll be out in two years."

House Republicans say their strategy will be to offer alternative bills that would be attractive to the conservative "Blue Dog" Democrats, with an eye toward fracturing the Democratic coalition. They hope to force some tough votes for Democrats from conservative districts who will soon begin campaigning for 2008 reelection and will have to defend their records.

"We'll capitalize on every opportunity we have," said one GOP leadership aide, adding that Republicans were preparing alternatives to the Democrats' plans to raise the minimum wage, reduce the interest on student loans, and reduce the profits of big oil and energy companies.

Several Blue Dog Democrats said they do not think Republicans can pick up much support from their group.

"If they've got ideas that will make our legislation better, we ought to consider that," said Rep. Allen Boyd Jr. (D-Fla.), leader of the Blue Dogs. "But if their idea is to try to split a group off to gain power, that's what they've been doing for the past six years, and it's all wrong."

To keep her sometimes-fractious coalition together, Pelosi has been distributing the spoils of victory across the ideological spectrum, trying to make sure that no group within the Democratic Party feels alienated.

Blue Dogs picked up some plum committee assignments, with Jim Matheson (Utah) landing a spot on Energy and Commerce and A.B. "Ben" Chandler (Ky.) getting an Appropriations seat. At the same time, members of Black and Hispanic caucuses obtained spots on these panels, as Ciro Rodriguez (Tex.) was given a seat on Appropriations and Artur Davis (Ala.) took the place of Democrat William J. Jefferson (La.) on Ways and Means.

Democrats acknowledge that if they appear too extreme in blocking the opposing party, their party is sure to come under fire from the Republicans, who are already charging they are being left out of the legislative process.

"If you're talking about 100 hours, you're talking about no obstruction whatsoever, no amendments offered other than those approved by the majority," said Rutgers's Baker. "I would like to think after 100 hours are over, the Democrats will adhere to their promise to make the system a little more equitable. But experience tells me it's really going to be casting against type."

"The temptations to rule the roost with an iron hand are very, very strong," he added. "It would take a majority party of uncommon sensitivity and a firm sense of its own agenda to open up the process in any significant degree to minority. But hope springs eternal."

Rules Changes Set As Democrats Retake Reins (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, January 2, 2007

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Democrats savoring a return from the political wilderness are ready to move quickly this week to take the levers of power in a Congress that has been run by Republicans the last 12 years.

On Thursday, Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California will take the gavel as the first female speaker in the history of the House, and immediately undertake a 100 legislative-hour march to quickly put the Democratic stamp on the new Congress.

Before President Bush arrives on Capitol Hill on Jan. 23 for his State of the Union address, House Democrats intend to update ethics rules, raise the minimum wage, implement 9/11 commission recommendations, cut subsidies to the oil industry, promote stem-cell research and make college educations and prescription drugs more affordable.

"Democrats are prepared to govern and ready to lead," Mrs. Pelosi said.

On the first day back, Democrats plan to change House rules on what members can accept from lobbyists. On the second day, they'll vote on other rules changes requiring that new spending or tax cuts be paid for and that pet projects tucked into larger bills be publicly disclosed.

The new Democratic Senate, under Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada, will take a parallel if somewhat more leisurely track.

The first week or 10 days of business will be devoted to ethics and lobbying reform that stalled in the last Congress, including a proposal to ban lawmakers from accepting gifts and travel from lobbyists and one making it more difficult for former members who become lobbyists to solicit their former colleagues.

All of this is reminiscent of January 1995, when Republicans kept the House in past midnight on their first day in power after 40 years of Democratic rule. "This will be the busiest day on opening day in congressional history," new Speaker Newt Gingrich, Georgia Republican, boasted at the time.

Like the 100 hours of the Democratic agenda, Mr. Gingrich gave the House 100 days to vote on the far-broader Contract with America. In the end, Republicans did achieve some of the goals of that political treatise, such as cutting taxes, reforming welfare and fighting crime. Others, such as product-liability bills and constitutional amendments to limit the terms of lawmakers and balance the budget, ultimately failed.

Mrs. Pelosi, like her Republican colleagues a dozen years ago, is also promising a more benevolent majority, saying the new House rules will state plainly that the minority will get a chance to offer amendments, read legislation before it gets voted on and participate in House-Senate negotiations. She is working with new Minority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, on the idea of setting up an independent panel to investigate ethics issues.

In the Senate, where Democrats hold a fragile 51-49 majority, Mr. Reid and Republican leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky have agreed to open the session with a joint caucus, a gesture aimed at establishing "a new tone" and an attempt to "produce real results," Mr. Reid said.

It's not clear how long this bipartisan spirit will last. Mr. Boehner has already complained that Democrats, in hustling through their 100-hour agenda, are backtracking on their promise of a more open Congress.

And while Mr. Bush has given qualified support to the Democratic push for an increase in the minimum wage and applauded their efforts to curtail pet projects or earmarks, a vote to boost federal support of embryonic stem-cell research could provoke an early showdown with the White House. Similar legislation passed by the Republican-led Congress led to the only veto thus far of the Bush presidency.

Democrats are also certain to hit hard on a new Iraq policy, expected to be announced by Mr. Bush in January, that may increase U.S. forces in Iraq.

The House and Senate Armed Services committees, under Rep. Ike Skelton, Missouri Democrat, and Sen. Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat, are gearing up for hearings at which new Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and others will likely face tough questions on the conduct of the war.

Dems Eager To Put Stamp On New Congress (AP)

Before President Bush arrives on Capitol Hill on Jan. 23 for his State of the Union address, House Democrats intend to update ethics rules, raise the minimum wage, implement 9/11 Commission recommendations, cut subsidies to the oil industry, promote stem cell research and make college educations and prescription drugs more affordable.

"Democrats are prepared to govern and ready to lead," said Pelosi, a Californian.

On the first day back, Democrats plan to change House rules on what members can accept from lobbyists. On the second day they'll vote on other rules changes requiring that new spending or tax cuts be paid for and that pet projects tucked into larger bills be publicly disclosed.

The new Democratic Senate, under Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada, will take a parallel if somewhat more leisurely track.

The first week or week-and-a-half of business will be devoted to ethics and lobbying reform that stalled in the last Congress, including a proposal to ban lawmakers from accepting gifts and travel from lobbyists and one making it more difficult for former members who become lobbyists to solicit their former colleagues.

All of this is reminiscent of January 1995, when Republicans kept the House in past midnight on their first day in power after 40 years of Democratic rule. "This will be the busiest day on opening day in congressional history," new Speaker Newt Gingrich, R-Ga., boasted at the time.

Like the 100 hours of the Democratic agenda, Gingrich gave the House 100 days to vote on the far-broader Contract with America. In the end, Republicans did achieve some of the goals of that political treatise, such as cutting taxes, reforming welfare and fighting crime. Others, such as product liability bills and constitutional amendments to limit the terms of lawmakers and balance the budget ultimately failed.

Democrats may have more success because they have taken a less ambitious approach, said Sarah Binder, a political scientist at George Washington University and analyst for the liberal-oriented Brookings Institution think tank. They realize that their newfound majority is not so much a demand for liberal policy as a referendum on the Bush administration, she said. "I'm really struck by how pragmatic the new Democratic majority appears to be with such a limited agenda," Binder said.

Linda Fowler, professor of government at Dartmouth College, said that while some of the Democratic proposals could face a tough sell in the Senate, "what the Democrats have done is quite reasonably recognize that they need some centrist positions that have fairly broad appeal."

Pelosi, like her GOP colleagues a dozen years ago, is also promising a more benevolent majority, saying the new House rules will state plainly that the minority will get a chance to offer amendments, read legislation before it gets voted on and participate in House-Senate negotiations. She is working with new minority leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, on the idea of setting up an independent panel to investigate ethics issues.

In the Senate, where Democrats hold a fragile 51-49 majority, Reid and Republican leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky have agreed to open the session with a joint caucus, a gesture aimed at establishing "a new tone" and an attempt to "produce real results next year," said Reid.

It's not clear how long this bipartisan spirit will last. Boehner has already complained that Democrats, in hustling through their 100-hour agenda, are backtracking on their promise of a more open Congress.

And while Bush has given qualified support to the Democratic push for an increase in the minimum wage and applauded their efforts to curtail pet projects or earmarks, a vote to boost federal support of stem cell research could provoke an early showdown with the White House. Similar legislation passed by the GOP-led Congress led to the only veto of the Bush presidency.

Democrats are also certain to hit hard on a new Iraq policy, expected to be announced by Bush in January, that may increase U.S. forces in Iraq.

The House and Senate Armed Services committees, under Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., and Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., respectively, are gearing up for hearings at which new Defense Secretary Robert Gates and others will likely face tough questions on the conduct of the war, contracting practices and a soon-to-be-announced request for $100 billion in new money to fight the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

As New Congress Nears, House Democrats Could Be Headed For Own Divide (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 1 — Representative John D. Dingell, a Michigan Democrat who with more than 50 years' tenure is the senior member of the House, is not so sure about the idea of creating an independent group to enforce ethics rules.

George Miller, a House veteran entering his 17th term, is a close ally of Nancy Pelosi, the incoming speaker.

But Gabrielle Giffords, a brand-new House Democrat from Arizona, considers it a no-brainer. Of the longstanding approach in which lawmakers are seated on the ethics committee to police their peers, Representative-elect Giffords said, "It is like having the fox guard the henhouse."

Those divergent outlooks over how best to fulfill the Democratic promise to clean up the House are just one illustration of a friction that could develop in the new Congress as the party takes control after 12 years in exile. While most attention will be focused on the divide between Republicans and Democrats, members of the new majority have their own differing perspectives, corresponding largely to length of service, that could ultimately prove more crucial to their success or failure.

Of 233 Democrats who will be sworn in on Thursday, 147 — 63 percent — have been elected since Republicans won control of the House in 1994, and have never served in the majority. Those whose service predates the 1994 revolution, on the other hand, number only 86, or 37 percent. But it is this core of senior Democrats, Mr. Dingell among them, who will lead 20 of the 21 major committees and so exercise concentrated legislative power.

The differences in tenure tend to manifest themselves geographically as well. The makeup of the senior membership has a more urban flavor, while those more recently elected tend to come from the suburbs and exurbs. These newer members have faced tougher electoral opposition than their older counterparts, who in many cases represent overwhelmingly safe Democratic districts; a majority of new chairmen have traditional liberal roots.

Lawmakers, senior aides and analysts say the institutional gulf is not necessarily problematic and could even prove beneficial if Democratic leaders are able to harness the experience and skill of the chairmen to the enthusiasm and drive for reform exhibited by the newcomers.

But they worry that it could become a distraction if the "old bulls," as they are sometimes called, believe that less seasoned lawmakers are demanding too much too fast or if the newer members see the veterans as representative of Congressional inertia.

"The guys who have been there for a while and built up seniority saw an abuse of the system, so they know firsthand why it has to change," said Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, who will be chairman of the Democratic caucus. "The new members ran on an agenda of why it has to be changed.

"If managed correctly, you have the experience and energy to make changes. If not managed correctly, it has the potential to be a fault line."

Leading House Democrats say the long-tenured members and those sent to Congress in recent elections broadly agree on a desire to move ahead on social programs, ethics, energy, national security and fiscal responsibility. The differences, they say, are subtler. Do issues studied in the previous Congress, for instance, need a full further examination in committee, in deference to the new chairmen? Is there need for a separate commission to scrutinize war contracting, or should this too be the province of the committees?

In any event, it is clear that the lower classmen, particularly the large and celebrated group of 30 freshmen, want to move quickly.

"The new class coming in and some of the other newer members are absolutely committed to delivering on the agenda we talked about during the election," said Representative Chris Van Hollen of Maryland, who will lead the House Democratic campaign effort for 2008. "Now that we are in power, we want to make sure that we are changing direction in Washington, and that means following through not just on the big print but the fine print, a break with business as usual."

Representative-elect Ed Perlmutter, Democrat of Colorado, agreed.

"I don't think the chairs are not looking to be aggressive," Mr. Perlmutter said, "but I do see in this freshman class a real desire to make changes and move things along quickly, because I think that was the direction we were given by our voters."

Senior Democrats say that as the lawmakers who endured minority status for so long, they are the ones most painfully aware of a need for new direction. Their stake in holding on to a majority, they say, means protecting and advancing the careers of new lawmakers, who in many cases were elected with fund-raising and other help from senior Democrats.

"It is not like we are just now meeting for the first time," said Representative Barney Frank, Democrat of Massachusetts, who will be chairman of the House Financial Services Committee and can tick off the names of junior committee members he has worked with, as well as several freshmen he personally supported. "We all campaigned for these guys."

Kate Phillips and The Times's politics staff report on the latest political news from around the nation.

More Politics NewsMr. Dingell said an urge to remake the House was hardly anything new.

"This is a normal phenomenon which occurs in this place every two years," he said, "and I have seen no class come in that could be described as different. We all come here just dying to do something. But the smart ones of us know how to get it done by working within the system. I have no fears they are out to burn the place down."

But Norman Ornstein, a longtime Congressional observer at the American Enterprise Institute, said he saw competing drives among members of the new majority.

"You have a significant number of Democrats who think the major change is that the whip is now in their hands and it is the Republicans taking the lash," Mr. Ornstein said. "A number of others want to keep the spigots running, but just into their own pockets. Those who genuinely want to change the House — the way it operates, the culture of Washington — have their work cut out for them."

The Democrats' leader, Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the incoming speaker, has been in the House since 1987 but has never been chairwoman of a committee, and so in some respects her role may be that of an outsider free to pursue transformation. In one of her first tests, however, some seven weeks ago, many of those headed for chairmanships opposed her push to install Representative John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania as majority leader. Instead, they backed Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, at least partly because they saw him as a check on Mrs. Pelosi's power. Mr. Hoyer went on to win.

Mrs. Pelosi has told allies that while she respects the authority of the new chairmen, she will not allow them to dominate the party agenda or stall legislative initiatives that have broad support. And she has already indicated that she does not intend to send the party's early legislative initiatives back through the committee process, but will instead bring a minimum-wage increase and energy and health bills, among others, straight to the floor.

Democrats senior and junior say they are watching to see whether their ideals merge or collide. But they view party differences as just another factor they will have to take into account as they assume control.

"I think people understand it is a little bit of a bump and we have to deal with it," Mr. Frank said.

Michael Arcuri, a moderate Democrat from upstate New York who won a Republican-held seat in November, said the combination of exuberance and experience should prove an advantage for the party.

"If we strike the balance between the two," Mr. Arcuri said, "we are going to accomplish some pretty incredible things."

The New Crowd's First Test (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, January 2, 2007

This time it's going to be different.

Whenever a new crowd displaces an old guard, the promise is always the same. The fresh managers swear they understand what the tired bunch they're replacing did wrong and vow to make all things new.

The Democrats who take power in Congress on Thursday have been given an opportunity that has not come their party's way for a half-century: They can remake their own image -- and Congress's -- and they can begin to restore public confidence in government.

While control of the Senate has flip-flopped between the parties since 1980, the House has stayed in one party's hands for long periods. Democrats controlled the House for 40 years after 1954, Republicans for the past 12. The 2006 election marked the first time since that 1954 contest that both houses switched from the Republicans to the Democrats.

This allows the new Democratic majority, in principle at least, to come in with no commitments to doing business as it was done in the immediate past.

If Democrats don't seize this rare opportunity, their party will pay for a long time. Not only will they disillusion their own supporters, but, more important, the angry centrists of the Ross Perot stripe who voted the Republicans out last year will either go back to the GOP or seek other options.

The first opportunity in the House will come on the very first day, when a package of reforms comes up for a vote. The Senate will take its own steps soon after. At stake initially are new ethics and lobbying rules. Over time House and Senate leaders will have to prove their commitment to bringing more democracy to the way Congress is run. A country that claims a mission to democracy and transparent government in the rest of the world needs to get its own institutions in order.

The new congressional leadership seems to recognize how important it is to get ethics and lobbying reform right. In the House, incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Majority Leader Steny Hoyer have sent members strongly worded proposals that would, among other things, ban gifts from lobbyists, lobbyist-paid travel and the use of company planes.

Congress will also consider a series of important lobbying reforms, many of them designed to strengthen inadequate disclosure requirements so the public knows who is doing what. One of my favorite ideas, from the veteran reformer Fred Wertheimer, would call upon lobbyists and lobbying organizations to disclose the earmarks they have lobbied for and the sponsors of those earmarks in the reports they are required to file with Congress.

The new Congress is already talking about requiring members to disclose their sponsorship of earmarks, those special little (or not so little) spending projects and tax breaks inserted into various bills with almost no public attention. But such disclosure does not tell citizens all they need to know, such as which lobbyists and which interest groups are pushing which special programs.

Fiscal conservatives who claim they can't stand those earmarks should rally to this idea. The best way to stop unjustified earmarks is to shed as much light as possible on their purpose and provenance.

What the Democrats are talking about sounds good. What will matter is that the provisions they pass not contain loopholes that render them much less far-reaching than they seem.

Members of Congress can legitimately ask for reasonable rules so they are not caught up unintentionally or unfairly in violations. But much will depend on the definition of "reasonable." Passing rules that don't rein in the corruption that became so obvious in the last Congress will be worse than passing nothing, because the hypocrisy will be obvious.

And any Democrats who think this anti-corruption talk is just a fad should consult a memo written two weeks after November's elections by Rep. Rahm Emanuel, the incoming chairman of the Democratic caucus and the House's shrewdest electoral tactician.

Emanuel counted eight districts the Democrats won largely because of corruption issues. The Democrats, he said, need to be the reformers they said they'd be. "Failing to deliver on this promise," he added, "would be devastating to our standing with the public, and certainly jeopardize some of our marginal seats."

President Bush briefly claimed back in 2000 to be "a reformer with results." This time, the voters who mattered in 2006 expect reform to be one of the results of the ballots they cast for Democrats.

Power Shift In Congress Revives Health Debate (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 1 — Within days of convening, the new Congress will return to some of the biggest battles of the last decade as House Democrats try to rush through legislation requiring the government to negotiate lower drug prices for Medicare beneficiaries and overturning President Bush's restrictions on embryonic stem cell research.

The Medicare proposal highlights the profound differences between Democrats and Republicans over the future of the nation's health care system, the proper role of government and the role of private markets in securing the best value for the huge sums spent on health care.

State officials say they wish Congress would focus on a more immediate problem: money for the Children's Health Insurance Program, which provides coverage for four million low-income children, is running out in more than a dozen states.

Dr. Rhonda M. Medows, commissioner of the Georgia Department of Community Health, said, "Our program will run out of federal money in March, and all 260,000 children in the program will lose their health care coverage if Congress fails to act."

In debating the future of the children's health program, which has broad bipartisan support, Congress will take up proposals to cover some of the 46 million people who have no health insurance.

Dr. Mark B. McClellan, former administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said, "Congress should consider expanding the Children's Health Insurance Program to low-income adults." Many Democrats agree. But even modest proposals may collide with Democratic efforts to restore fiscal discipline and to reduce the federal budget deficit.

Congress convenes on Thursday. Representative Nancy Pelosi, the California Democrat who is in line to be speaker, has said the House will, in its first 100 hours, vote on bills to authorize drug price negotiations under Medicare and to expand federal financing of stem cell research.

Representative Tom Allen, Democrat of Maine, said he was "giddy" at the prospect of being able to legislate on health care after toiling for 10 years in the minority. "People in Maine find it incomprehensible that the Medicare law has a provision that forbids negotiation of lower prices," said Mr. Allen, who introduced a bill to give beneficiaries access to drug discounts negotiated by the government in 1998.

By adding a drug benefit to Medicare in 2003, Congress authorized the biggest expansion of the program since its creation in 1965. The drug benefit, unlike most Medicare benefits, is delivered entirely by private insurers subsidized by the government. The insurers negotiate with drug manufacturers to obtain discounts, often in return for promoting the use of particular drugs. The 2003 law prohibits the government from interfering in those negotiations and stipulates that Medicare cannot establish a list of preferred drugs.

Most Democrats want to repeal the ban on price negotiations. Wendell E. Primus, an aide to Ms. Pelosi, said the Democratic proposal would require the secretary of health and human services to negotiate, but would not specify how.

"It will be very simple language," Mr. Primus said. "We do not think that Congress needs to hammer out all the details. There are a lot of smart people in the administration, including the secretary, who can look at how we're buying drugs — the Medicaid program, the Department of Defense, vaccines, et cetera — and figure out the best way of negotiating better prices with drug companies."

Republicans said they welcomed the opportunity to debate the issue. The House Republican leader, Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, said the Democrats' proposal would "take a wrecking ball to a popular program that has cut drug costs for consumers through competition." Such competition, he said, "has kept prices lower than anyone expected."

Administration officials suggested that Mr. Bush would veto a bill calling for price negotiations. Democrats could then exploit the issue in the 2008 campaign, as they did in the midterm elections.

Under a bill introduced in 2005 by several House Democrats, Medicare would offer a government-run drug plan, in addition to all the plans offered by private insurance companies, and federal officials would negotiate with drug manufacturers on the prices of drugs covered by the government plan.

But aides to Ms. Pelosi said House Democratic leaders now wanted to go further. Under their proposal, the government would negotiate on behalf of all people in Medicare drug plans, more than 22.5 million people.

Skip to next paragraph House Democrats assume that if the government negotiates lower drug prices, the savings will automatically be passed on to beneficiaries in the form of lower premiums. But they could not immediately say how they would guarantee that result. In the absence of detailed instructions from Congress, lower drug prices could mean lower costs and higher profits for the insurers that operate Medicare drug plans.

Michael O. Leavitt, the secretary of health and human services, said he did not want the power to negotiate. "I don't believe I can do a better job than an efficient market," Mr. Leavitt said in an interview.

Leslie V. Norwalk, acting administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said that under the Democrats' proposal her agency would have to "hire hundreds of people to negotiate prices for 4,500 different drugs." And Ms. Norwalk said the agency would be besieged by lobbyists seeking higher Medicare payments for specific drugs. That, she said, is "how Washington really works."

Senator Max Baucus, the Montana Democrat who is in line to become chairman of the Finance Committee, helped shape the 2003 law. In March, he voted against a proposal to authorize drug price negotiations. But Mr. Baucus, who is up for re-election in 2008, said he had an open mind and would hold hearings on the idea.

Kate Leone, an aide to the Senate Democratic leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, said Senate Democrats had the same legislative priorities as House Democrats, but were not committed to the 100-hour schedule.

Mr. Primus said the new Congress would also "give the president another chance to veto a stem cell bill," like the one he vetoed in July.

DOJ_NMG_0110918

In campaign commercials in 2006, Democrats and some Republicans boasted of their support for embryonic stem cell research as a way to find treatments for a wide range of diseases. Advocates of such research say that, despite gains in the elections, they still do not have the votes to override a veto. They are working with Senate allies on a plan to attach the stem cell bill to unrelated legislation that Mr. Bush would feel obliged to sign.

Lawmakers are also likely to wrestle with these issues:

¶Many Democrats will try to reduce Medicare payments to managed care plans. They contend such plans are overpaid by about 10 percent. Insurers intend to fight back, with support from the Bush administration, Republican lawmakers and beneficiaries who see the plans as a way to obtain extra benefits at an affordable cost.

¶Congress faces a huge challenge in devising a new formula to pay doctors for treating Medicare patients. Under the current formula, doctors' fees would be cut more than 4 percent a year for the next decade. Lawmakers are determined to avert such cuts, but see no easy way to pay the cost.

¶Democrats have drafted legislation to speed the approval of safe, low-cost versions of expensive biotechnology drugs, which account for a growing share of spending on pharmaceuticals.

People who pay for health care, including state officials, employers and insurers, support such legislation as a way to slow spending on biotech drugs, which can cost more than $10,000 a year. Biotech companies argue that their products, made from living organisms, are so complex that they cannot be exactly duplicated by generic drug manufacturers. As a result, they say, a "copy" would rarely be interchangeable with the original.

The Food and Drug Administration has approved thousands of generic drugs deemed equivalent to traditional brand-name medicines. But the agency is unsure of its legal authority to approve such versions of biotech drugs.

Millions Save Money On Medicare Program (NYT)

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) -- At first, Ruth Goundry wasn't sure about participating in the new Medicare drug benefit. It was too confusing, she said. But in the end, she gave it a try. She's glad she did.

As the program's first year draws to a close, Goundry estimates that she saved about $150 a month on her five medicines, compared with what she was spending before Medicare Part D began.

"I would say I'm very impressed with the whole thing. I have no complaints," said Goundry, a resident of Chesapeake Beach, Md. "It's meant a tremendous savings. I know other people who are saved by it. I mean that. They don't hardly pay anything.''

Goundry is like millions of seniors who say they are happy with the benefit, which cost the federal government about $30 billion in 2006.

But the program affects seniors and the disabled differently, depending upon their income and health. There are many people who believe the program could be improved.

Just down the street, at the Chesapeake Care Pharmacy, Wesley Copeland is not so impressed.

In August, he began picking up all the cost of his medicine -- about $300 a month. Plus, he had to continue paying his monthly premium of $38. That gap in coverage is called the doughnut hole.

"We've got a lot of people in my neighborhood who are seniors like me on retirement. We have to stretch pennies, so when it gets to that doughnut hole, we have to scramble like hell to keep going," Copeland said.

Goundry and Copeland represent the millions of stories surrounding the addition of a drug benefit to Medicare this past year. The drug coverage has often been described as the biggest change in Medicare in the program' 40 years.

Under the program, seniors and the disabled enroll in a private plan. They pay a monthly premium to the plan. The government also pays the plan.

The Bush administration estimates that the coverage saves the average beneficiary about $1,200. But many in Washington, particularly Democratic lawmakers, say the savings could be greater if the government were allowed to negotiate with drug manufacturers concerning the cost of medicine rather than leaving that chore to the plans.

Overall, about 22.5 million people enrolled in private plans during the programs first year. Nearly 7 million more people get their medicine through their employer, and those employers get a tax credit for providing that coverage.

That total of nearly 30 million getting coverage through Part D is much less than was originally projected. However, analysts also didn't realize that so many seniors had insurance coverage for their medicine through other programs.

The Bush administration acknowledges the program got off to a rough start as hundreds of thousands of people showed up in pharmacy computers as not being enrolled in a plan.

Beverly Dillon, a pharmacy technician in Chesapeake Beach, said that in the program's early weeks, her store advanced about 75 to 100 patients medicine to help them get by.

"We would not let patients go without their medication," she said.

The state of Maryland also stepped in to pick up the cost of medicine for poor beneficiaries, she noted. Most other states did as well.

"January and February were absolutely crazy," she said. "I would say that around March, or late February, things started to calm down."

She said many seniors are still confused about the program. To prove her point, a customer came into the store to get a refill. Dillon noted that she was in a Part D plan, but the customer was insistent that she was not and that she had coverage through another program. Dillon relented, not wanting to upset her.

Dillon said most customers who did not have insurance coverage prior to the past year are saving money. She has noticed that the checks they write to the pharmacy now are much smaller.

"There's definitely a significant savings," she said. "(But) the program just got off to such a bad start in the beginning, it just has not been smooth."

Dillon is bracing for some rough spots in the coming weeks too. That's because some seniors are switching plans. Others have been automatically enrolled in new plans.

Herb Kuhn, deputy administrator at the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said that he believes the federal government learned many lessons from the past year that will make this year's startup run more smoothly.

"We have a much more sophisticated and built up infrastructure from a year ago," Kuhn said.

Kuhn said his biggest concern going into the new year are those beneficiaries who waited until the final days of the open-enrollment period to change drug plans. He said seniors should bring to the pharmacy any kind of identification or acknowledgment letter from their plan that would show proof of membership.

Overall, Kuhn said that 2006 was a good year for beneficiaries.

"We believe it's been a very positive year for Part D," he said. "As a result of the new program, beneficiaries are living better. They're saving money."

A Clean Fiscal Slate (WP)

THEY DIDN'T quite trash the place on their way out, but congressional Republicans -- specifically, the Senate leadership under outgoing Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) -- engaged in the legislative equivalent of vandalism when it came to getting spending bills passed: They didn't. Of the measures needed to fund the government during fiscal 2007, now three months gone, the 109th Congress managed to approve only bills to pay for defense and homeland security spending. The rest of the government -- $463 billion in discretionary spending -- was left to run on autopilot.

Confronted with this abdication of responsibility, the incoming Democratic management faced an unpleasant choice. It could take the time to clean up this fiscal year's mess, a time-consuming process that would inevitably have led to fights over earmarks and spending levels, along with filibuster threats from Senate Republicans and possible vetoes from President Bush. Or it could essentially write off the 2007 budget process and move on with a clean slate to 2008 -- a process that will begin in February, when Mr. Bush is to present his budget along with a whopper of an emergency spending bill to pay for operations in Iraq.

Democrats chose the latter course, and under the circumstances, it's hard to fault them. The new appropriations committee chairmen, Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.) and Rep. David R. Obey (D-Wis.), announced that they would move to fund the remainder of the fiscal year under a continuing resolution, limiting domestic appropriations to 2006 levels. "While the results will be far from ideal, this path provides the best way to dispose of the unfinished business quickly, and allow governors, state and local officials, and families to finally plan for the coming year with some knowledge of what the federal government is funding," they said in a joint statement.

The boldest part of the Democrats' plan is to strip earmarks out of the spending measures -- although, as their statement noted, such projects will be eligible for reconsideration in 2008 and those earmarks that were included in previous spending bills and are slated for renewal this year won't be affected. Still, this earmark shock therapy could prove valuable, like quitting smoking by going cold turkey; the 2008 process, the chairmen promised, will be conducted under "new standards for transparency and accountability."

The Democrats have given themselves the clean slate they deserved. Their real test will come as they work to craft a 2008 budget that is both frugal and fair, not to mention finished on time.

New Leaders' Decisions Could Significantly Affect The Government Workforce (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, January 2, 2007

Making decisions on government spending will be a big and early order of business for the new Congress, which returns this week.

Most federal agencies are operating on an interim spending bill that expires Feb. 15. Key lawmakers have said they plan to put the government on a post-holiday diet that will stretch through September, and that could cause some headaches for federal employees.

Because most agencies will not get budget increases to fully offset pay raises, higher rents and other overhead costs, some agencies will have little choice but to curtail training, travel, hiring and the purchase of new equipment. It's possible that cash-strapped agencies might have to send workers home without pay for a few days, but the White House budget office hopes to be able to shift funding around to avoid furloughs and layoffs.

The funding crunch will not affect President Bush's executive order, issued in late December, providing an average 2.2 percent pay raise for federal employees. Government retirees also will see their monthly pension checks increase this month, by 2.3 percent or 3.3 percent, depending on their retirement system.

Although congressional aides were reluctant to make any predictions for the new year, it seems likely that the federal budget, the Iraq conflict, lobbying reform and completion of the 9/11 Commission recommendations will push many federal-employee issues to the sidelines in the opening months of the new Congress.

Key lawmakers have signaled that they are taking a wait-and-see attitude on the administration's efforts to install pay-for-performance systems at the Defense and Homeland Security departments.

Federal unions have challenged proposals to curb collective bargaining at the Defense Department, and a federal appeals panel will probably issue a ruling by spring. Unions prevailed in court on proposed workplace changes at the Homeland Security Department, which will report to a federal judge no later than July 17 on next steps for the personnel system.

The Bush administration, though, may propose a few changes to laws that affect federal employees.

Officials said the administration will again ask Congress to rewrite laws so federal employees can switch to part-time work late in their careers without taking a pension reduction and to allow agencies to bring back federal retirees without salary offsets so the rehired annuitants can collect a full paycheck and a full pension. Those efforts began last year but did not get any traction on Capitol Hill.

Linda M. Springer, director of the Office of Personnel Management, is also interested in exploring whether a program could be created to offer short-term disability insurance to federal employees. Such a program could help the government recruit employees and might be a way to provide maternity benefits, easing complaints from younger federal employees who would like the government to offer paid parental leave to care for newborns and adoptions.

Congress will also be reorganizing committees and realigning members who serve on those panels.

Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), the new chairman of the House Government Reform Committee, has announced plans for five subcommittees, two fewer than in the last Congress. Waxman plans to create a federal workforce, post office and District of Columbia subcommittee and a government management, organization and procurement subcommittee.

Aides have been working on areas of jurisdiction, but one said the federal workforce subcommittee would likely oversee the implementation of pay-for-performance systems at the Defense and Homeland Security departments, while the government management subcommittee would track the president's policy initiatives, such as outsourcing, e-gov and other parts of the presidential management agenda.

House Democratic leaders have made some committee assignments.

Rep. C.A. Dutch Ruppersberger (D-Md.) will take the seat on the House Appropriations Committee being vacated by Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.), the new House majority leader. Hoyer has played the leading role in efforts to raise federal salaries, and an aide to Ruppersberger said his boss will also seek to improve federal pay and benefits.

Ruppersberger's district expects to pick up 60,000 new jobs as part of the military's Base Realignment and Closure process, primarily at Fort Meade and the Aberdeen Proving Ground. He also represents employees who work at the National Security Agency and at the Coast Guard Yard at Curtis Bay.

Rep. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.), an advocate for federal employees, is joining the Ways and Means Committee, which has jurisdiction over tax policy, Social Security, Medicare and trade issues.

The National Active and Retired Federal Employees Association hopes that the Ways and Means Committee, which will be chaired by Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), will show more interest in modifying laws that frustrate many federal retirees, such as the offset and windfall elimination provisions in Social Security law. Federal retirees also are campaigning for statutory changes that would permit them to pay their health insurance premiums with pre-tax annuities, similar to the tax break provided federal employees.

Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.) will be chairman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, which oversees federal employee issues. An agenda has not been set, but some aides expect the committee will pay close attention to contracting problems, including instances of waste and fraud at the Defense and Homeland Security departments.

Lieberman will be joined by senators with a strong interest in federal employee issues, including Daniel K. Akaka (D-Hawaii), Thomas R. Carper (D-Del.), Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), Susan Collins (R-Maine), George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio) and John W. Warner (R-Va.). Akaka plans to review the federal employees health insurance program and how it sets premiums, an aide said.

A Party, With Pelosi Front And Center (NYT)

By ANNE E. KORNBLUT

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 1 — During her first 100 hours as House speaker, Nancy Pelosi has vowed, she will sweep an aggressive legislative agenda through the newly Democratic-controlled House.

Kate Phillips and The Times's politics staff report on the latest political news from around the nation.

More Politics NewsBut first comes Pelosi-palooza.

In a three-day stretch of whirlwind events beginning on Wednesday, Mrs. Pelosi will celebrate her heritage (at the Italian Embassy), her faith (in a Roman Catholic Mass), her education (at Trinity College), her childhood (in Baltimore) and her current home (in a tribute by the singer Tony Bennett, of "I Left My Heart in San Francisco" fame).

She will embrace her status as the first female House speaker with a tea for women. She will highlight her pull among Democrats with a $1,000-per-person fund-raising concert. And she will welcome visitors to the halls of Congress in an open-house tour.

In the midst of it all, when the new Congress opens on Thursday, Mrs. Pelosi will be sworn in to her new post and plans to get to work on the House floor right away.

The extended, carefully staged festivities are expected to dominate the occasion of Mrs. Pelosi's ascendance as the Democrats take control of Congress. Although Senate Democrats are also ushering in a new majority this week, their leaders have arranged much more low-key events intended to celebrate their incoming freshmen rather than Harry Reid, the Nevada senator who will be the new majority leader.

Supporters of Mrs. Pelosi said she had every right — an obligation, even — to underscore her new role, given the historic nature of her rise to power. Thus the week is planned to project much more than an ordinary handoff of power in Congress. It is intended to leave a firm imprint of the new House leader's style and substance on the national consciousness, reminding voters that Mrs. Pelosi is both the first woman to take the job as well as a Catholic mother of five with Italian, blue-collar roots.

"It is an introduction of her to the country — and certainly who she is, as an outgrowth of her family, her growing up in Baltimore, where she went to school, and the values and the roots she had in that community," said Representative George Miller, Democrat of California and a close Pelosi ally.

In other words, she is not the liberal extremist her detractors have tried to depict (one Republican advertisement during the midterm election cycle warned that "liberal Democrat Nancy Pelosi" would embrace illegal immigrants and reward them with welfare, ominously asking, "How do we stop her?").

Yet a number of Mrs. Pelosi's supporters said the aim was not simply to define the new House speaker in mainstream political terms. They said she valued style and flourish — previously embodied in her fashionable clothes and her habit of taking Ghirardelli chocolates to meetings — and recognized that an inauguration with flair could help capture the national imagination.

At the same time, part of her power is derived from her vast network of wealthy donors, including California celebrities, who appreciate a lavish thank-you.

Representative Anna G. Eshoo, a California Democrat who has been a friend of Mrs. Pelosi for decades, said, "It will be done elegantly, because she's so tasteful."

"It will have some feminine touches to it, obviously," Ms. Eshoo said. "But more than anything else, it is just highly celebratory, because there are so many firsts that are interwoven into her ascendancy."

Some Republicans have privately complained that Mrs. Pelosi is drawing too much attention to herself and failing to recognize that the week is not about her. Yet past House speakers have often been defined by their strong personalities and individual styles, and Democrats, by and large, said they were glad to see Mrs. Pelosi unabashedly seizing the spotlight.

"I think what she's doing is perfectly appropriate, because she is making history," said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, who led the Democratic victory in the Senate.

Many of the week's gatherings are ostensibly devoted to others, as well. The first event, a Mass at Trinity University, where Mrs. Pelosi graduated in 1962, is "in remembrance of the children of Darfur and Katrina," according to a schedule released by her office. A tea that afternoon at the Mellon Auditorium will include a tribute to Ann W. Richards, the late governor of Texas (whose young granddaughter will speak, as will Mrs. Pelosi's). A prayer service at St. Peter's Catholic Church on Thursday is in "honor of U.S. men and women in uniform."

On Thursday, after her swearing in, Mrs. Pelosi will sponsor a concert at the National Building Museum (the performers Carole King and Wyclef Jean are expected to attend, along with Mr. Bennett). The next day, she plans to open up Congress for a "people's House reception" for the public. That afternoon, the departing mayor of Baltimore and governor-elect of Maryland, Martin O'Malley, will dedicate a city street to Mrs. Pelosi.

The Baltimore ceremony had been originally scheduled as the kickoff event on Tuesday, but it was moved in honor of the national day of mourning for former President Gerald R. Ford.

Bushes Pay Respects To Ford In Capitol (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, January 2, 2007

President Bush on Monday bowed his head in silence before the flag-draped casket of Gerald R. Ford — a man the president said used a calm, steady hand to guide the nation after the tumultuous Watergate years.

On a rainy, gloomy afternoon, Bush and first lady Laura Bush joined thousands of other mourners in paying their respects to the 38th president lying in state at the Capitol.

Silence fell under the Capitol dome when the president walked toward the casket, illuminated by spotlights and guarded at each corner by members of the military honor guard. He and Mrs. Bush lowered their heads for a few moments, as if in prayer, then turned and walked away across the Rotunda's polished stone floor, which reflected the flag's red and white stripes.

Bush, who said nothing during his one-minute stop in the Rotunda, is to eulogize Ford on Tuesday at his funeral at the National Cathedral. After he died last Tuesday, Bush called him a "true gentleman" and recounted how Ford stepped into the Oval Office after President Nixon resigned in disgrace after the Watergate scandal.

"President Ford was a great American who gave many years of dedicated service to our country," Bush said in a statement released after his death. "On Aug. 9, 1974, after a long career in the House of Representatives and service as vice president, he assumed the presidency in an hour of national turmoil and division.

"With his quiet integrity, common sense and kind instincts, President Ford helped heal our land and restore public confidence in the presidency."

Bush visited the casket, his first public event of the new year, after returning from a weeklong stay at his Texas ranch. Afterward, the Bushes drove to Blair House, across the street from the White House, to visit for a half-hour with Ford's widow, former first lady Betty Ford. The Bushes then walked down Pennsylvania Avenue back to the Executive Mansion.

Bush visited the Capitol, where a changing military guard kept a watchful vigil throughout the night, on the third day of mourning there for Ford, who died at 93.

Shortly before the three-day public viewing ended, Mrs. Ford returned to the Capitol and sat in the Rotunda for about 20 minutes with her three sons and daughter and their spouses. She clutched the hand of her son Michael. Her son Steven helped her up when she walked over to the casket, touching it one last time.

Among the other dignitaries to pay their respects Monday were Bush's father, former President George H.W. Bush, and his wife, Barbara; former President Bill Clinton and former first lady, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y.; Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., who this week becomes the first woman speaker of the House; Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass.; former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld; and Vice President Dan Quayle.

Members of Ford's family greeted mourners who came to the Capitol on New Year's Day wearing parkas, packing umbrellas and clutching snack sacks.

Karen Olson, 53, of Herndon, Va., said the rain couldn't dampen her determination to see Ford. Her mother, who's now deceased, was on his staff, she said.

"I wanted to come pay my respects. He was a big part of my life," said Olson, who was among the people lined up before 9 a.m. EST to enter the Capitol building. "I have a lot of ties to his family."

"The few times that I met him, he was just really nice," she said.

Both of Olson's parents have passed away.

"I kind of felt like I wanted to be there for them," she said. "There's just an emotional connection there."

Kirk Scofield, 44, and his wife, Mary Scofield, 50, of Sterling, Va., lined up early too. Mary, who said she had "six hours of food" in her backpack, expected a long wait, though they had been in line less than an hour. "She looks like she's ready to go camping," Kirk joked.

Inside the Rotunda, Ford's daughter and son handed remembrance cards to some of the visitors.

The blue cards had the presidential, vice presidential and House of Representatives seals and a biography of Ford on one side. On the other was a photograph of the former president in the Oval Office, his head bowed.

The message on the card: "The family of Gerald R. Ford deeply appreciates your prayers and many kindnesses as together we celebrate and honor the life of a devoted husband, father, grandfather and great-grandfather and the 38th president of the United States."

Michael Gerald Ford, the former president's son, shook 8-year-old Christopher Witkowski's hand and gave him a blue remembrance card. "My father would have wanted you to have this," he told Christopher, from Alexandria, Va. Ford's sister, Susan Ford Bales, stood nearby, greeting others who had come to pay their respects.

Two of the former president's grandchildren, Heather Vance and Tyne Vance Berlanga, embraced after they were overcome with emotion at the casket.

Ford was appointed vice president by Nixon to replace Spiro Agnew, who resigned in a bribery scandal stemming from his days as Maryland governor. After Nixon resigned in disgrace, Ford assumed the presidency for 2 - 1/2 years. A month after taking office, Ford pardoned Nixon for any Watergate crimes he might have committed — a move that political analysts say was perhaps the main reason he lost the 1976 election to Jimmy Carter.

"At a time that the nation was under a lot of pressure, a lot of fire, he stood up for the things that he thought were right at the time," Edna Reeves, 61, of Oxon Hill, Md., said as she walked to the Capitol in the rain. "Much blessings to him for knowing compassion enough to pardon President Nixon. I think that was beautiful. You see he didn't think of himself, he thought about the nation."

Solemn Moments At Capitol (LAT)

By Jim Puzzanghera

WASHINGTON — President Bush, joining thousands of average Americans who started the New Year by saying goodbye to an old president, stopped Monday at the U.S. Capitol after returning from his Texas ranch to pay his respects to Gerald R. Ford.

Wearing a dark suit and gray tie, Bush was joined by First Lady Laura Bush and a small contingent of White House aides that included Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten and Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove. Shortly after 3 p.m., Bush and his wife walked into the Rotunda, where Ford's body lay in state. They paused for about 10 seconds at the flag-draped casket, hands clasped and heads bowed, before walking out.

Most mourners — a mix of young and old, in their Sunday best or simply sweatshirts and blue jeans — spent a minute or two slowly circling the casket and its military honor guard.

Monday was the second and final day of public viewing for Ford, 93, who died last week at his home in Rancho Mirage, Calif. He had lived longer than any former president and was the 32nd person to lay in honor under the Capitol dome. Ford's casket rested on the same wooden bier used for Abraham Lincoln in 1865.

Bush declared today a national day of mourning as a funeral service will be held for Ford at Washington National Cathedral. Most federal offices, including the courts and post offices, will be closed.

Ford's body will be flown to his hometown of Grand Rapids, Mich., for a final service and public viewing before burial at the Gerald R. Ford Presidential Library and Museum on Wednesday.

Bush will deliver the eulogy at today's service. After paying his brief respects at the Capitol on Monday, Bush visited with former First Lady Betty Ford and her family for about 30 minutes at Blair House, across from the White House. Bush's father, former President George H.W. Bush, his wife, Barbara, and former Secretary of State James A. Baker III also joined them.

Betty Ford returned to the Capitol Rotunda about 5:30 p.m., shortly before the scheduled end of public viewing, along with her four children and their spouses. They sat in chairs in front of the casket for about eight minutes, with Betty Ford holding hands with sons Michael and Steven.

Then she walked to the casket, placed her hand on the American flag that covered the coffin, and bowed her head for about two minutes as her family gathered around her. She whispered a couple of words, then returned to her seat before being escorted out.

Michael and his sister, Susan Ford Bales, greeted mourners in the Rotunda on Monday morning. Five of his granddaughters performed the same service briefly later in the afternoon.

Bush was one of several dignitaries to pay respects to Ford on Monday as many officials returned to the nation's capital following the holidays.

Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco), accompanied by her husband, Paul, crossed herself in front of the casket earlier Monday afternoon. Former President Bush, accompanied by his wife, Baker and former Sen. Alan K. Simpson (R-Wyo.), visited shortly after the president. And former President Clinton and his wife, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), arrived in the late afternoon.

DOJ_NMG_0110925

At the Rose Bowl in Pasadena, flags flew at half-staff in honor of Ford and the crowd paused for a moment of silence before the game. Ford played on two national championship football teams in 1932 and 1933 at the University of Michigan, which faced USC on Monday.

Michigan players also honored Ford. They wore stickers on their helmets with Ford's number, 48, which the university retired in 1994, and the word "Bo" for their legendary former coach, Bo Schembechler, who died in November.

Outside the Capitol in Washington, the crowd started small as New Year's Day dawned cold and rainy. But more people — from babies in strollers to senior citizens in wheelchairs — showed up throughout the day as the rain stopped.

One mourner, Glynn A. Crooks, vice chairman of the Shakopee Mdewakanton Sioux Community of Minnesota, came in full headdress and Native American attire "to pay respects to President Ford."

John Ciccone, 58, of Bethesda, Md., waited about 90 minutes with his wife, Christiane, and their 11-year-old twins, Alexander and Max, to honor a president who helped put the trauma of Watergate behind America.

"I remember the rancor and the bitterness that occurred at that time and when Gerald Ford came in there was a different tone," said Ciccone. "He really was a profoundly decent man, and we needed a man like that at that time."

Bush Pays Respects To A Predecessor (WT)

By Gary Emerling And Matthew Cella

The Washington Times, January 2, 2007

President Bush and first lady Laura Bush paid their respects to Gerald R. Ford yesterday, the final day the former president's body lay in state in the U.S. Capitol Rotunda.

Mr. and Mrs. Bush stood before Mr. Ford's closed flag-draped casket with their heads bowed in a brief but solemn tribute yesterday afternoon after returning to Washington from their ranch in Texas.

Afterward, the Bush motorcade took the president to Blair House, across the street from the White House, where the Bushes visited former first lady Betty Ford for a half hour and then walked back to the Executive Mansion.

Mr. and Mrs. Bush joined thousands of mourners who braved steady rainfall and frigid temperatures yesterday to say a final goodbye to the 38th president of the United States.

"I wanted my children to see and be part of history," said Trisha Mellott, who drove six hours from Canfield, Ohio, with her 11-year-old son and 10-year-old daughter to see Mr. Ford's casket. "We are proud to be Americans, so I wanted them to experience this."

Mr. Ford's body had been lying in state since Saturday, four days after he died at his home in Rancho Mirage, Calif., at 93.

State funeral services for Mr. Ford, the country's only unelected president, who took office in 1974 in the aftermath of Richard M. Nixon's Watergate scandal, will be held today at the Washington National Cathedral.

Mr. Bush will deliver the funeral eulogy. Mr. Ford will be buried tomorrow near his presidential museum in Grand Rapids, Mich.

As light rain fell throughout yesterday morning, thousands lined up outside the Capitol clad in rainwear and toting umbrellas to pay respects to a president that many remembered as a kind and genuine person.

"It's an experience of a lifetime," said Lynn Yowaiski, 59, of Lexington Park, Md., who came with her husband and best friend to the public viewing. "Plus, I liked him. I always felt like he was telling the truth."

Carol Hooker, a teacher from Landover Hills, said she felt a personal connection with the former president after sending him a tongue-in-cheek letter years ago and finding out from a White House staffer that Mr. Ford and his Cabinet got a much-needed laugh from the correspondence.

Mrs. Hooker, 54, said she admired Mr. Ford so much that her family bought a Ford Fairmont station wagon and named it Gerald "Our" Ford.

"He was somebody that was genuinely kind," said Mrs. Hooker, standing in line without an umbrella and with rain clouding her glasses.

Inside the Rotunda, Mr. Ford's daughter, Susan Ford Bales, and son Michael Gerald Ford stood near the casket greeting mourners and handing remembrance cards to some of the visitors.

DOJ_NMG_0110926

The blue cards had the presidential, vice presidential and House of Representatives seals and Mr. Ford's biography on one side.

On the other was a photograph of the former president in the Oval Office, his head bowed.

The message on the card read "The family of Gerald R. Ford deeply appreciates your prayers and many kindnesses as together we celebrate and honor the life of a devoted husband, father, grandfather and great-grandfather and the 38th president of the United States."

Michael Ford shook 8-year-old Christopher Witkowski's hand and gave him one of the cards.

"My father would have wanted you to have this," he told Christopher, of Alexandria.

Mr. Bush declared today a National Day of Mourning to honor Mr. Ford.

Federal and D.C. government offices will be closed today.

The funeral procession is scheduled to begin at 9:15 a.m. at the Capitol and end at 10 a.m. at the Washington National Cathedral.

Mr. Ford's remains then will be taken to Andrews Air Force Base in a procession scheduled to begin at 11:30 a.m. Street closures for the processions will begin at 7 a.m., and some parking restrictions will be in effect, too.

D.C. officials said they are ready for the added stress the service and closures could place on the city.

Barbara Childs-Pair, the head of the District's Emergency Management Agency, said she has "great working relationships" with federal agencies such as the U.S. Capitol Police and the U.S. Secret Service, which will coordinate with local officials today.

"We have been actually planning for a state funeral for the last six months," she said. "We've done a template, so all of the planning efforts, all of the players have been involved over several months."

Today also will mark the first day on the job for the new D.C. police chief and the new D.C. fire chief.

Incoming Police Chief Cathy L. Lanier ran the Metropolitan Police Department's Homeland Security Division and before that spent four years directing its Special Operations Division.

"Remember, the agency heads are changing, but the folks who really do the planning work, the logistical work, are still there," Mrs. Childs-Pair said. "So it's like clockwork at this point. We have a template from [the 2004 funeral of President] Reagan, lessons learned."

Interim Fire Chief Brian K. Lee also is familiar with large-scale events. He was named to the department's top job last week after spending six months as a battalion chief in the fire department's Special Operations Division.

"We're no strangers to state funerals. We're no strangers to national protests. We're no strangers to big events. We do that very well," Chief Lee said. "Between the fire/EMS coordinated with the police and all the federal agencies, we will, as always, be 100 percent prepared."

Thousands Say Farewell To Ford (USAT)

WASHINGTON — The flag-draped casket of Gerald Rudolph Ford, the low-key Michigan congressman who unexpectedly became the nation's 38th president, stood in a pool of light in the center of the Capitol Rotunda on Monday as the nation's highest officials and thousands of ordinary Americans dropped by to pay their respects.

President Bush, who will eulogize Ford at a memorial service this morning, came to the Capitol after returning to Washington from a week at his Texas ranch. He stood for a moment in silence with his wife, Laura, their heads bowed, as the clatter of camera shutters reverberated through the domed space.

On a rainy New Year's Day, former president George H.W. Bush also visited, accompanied by former secretary of State James Baker. Former president Bill Clinton and New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton came by, as did the incoming House speaker, Nancy Pelosi.

So did Joyce Rigsby, 40, of suburban Glen Burnie, Md. She drove in with Ginny Hemsley of Atlanta, a friend who was visiting for the holidays. The two walked slowly around the Rotunda where the casket had been placed on the bier used for presidents from Abraham Lincoln to Ronald Reagan. A military honor guard stood vigil.

"What a tough job to be thrown into," Rigsby said of Ford's accession to the presidency after Richard Nixon resigned amid the Watergate scandal. "He did the best he could with a situation he didn't ask for."

Hemsley, 38, called Ford's presidency and his election bid in 1976 her "first real political memory."

Looking back, she said, "it seems really important to me that we had someone to take over who was a real decent person with a lot of integrity and respect for the office."

A memorial service at the National Cathedral is set for this morning. Then Ford's body will be flown to his childhood home of Grand Rapids, Mich., for services Wednesday at Grace Episcopal Church, which he attended as a boy and where he was married as a young man. He is to be buried on a hillside at the Gerald R. Ford Presidential Museum.

Ford died at home in California last week at age 93.

He was born Leslie King Jr., but his parents separated soon after his birth, and he took his stepfather's name. He was a star football player at the University of Michigan, and the Rose Bowl began Monday with a moment of silence in his memory before the Wolverines faced the University of Southern California Trojans.

After graduating from Yale Law School and serving aboard an aircraft carrier during World War II, Ford was elected to Congress and re-elected a dozen times. His hopes of becoming House speaker never realized, Ford was planning to retire when Nixon chose him to replace the disgraced vice president, Spiro Agnew.

Less than a year later, Nixon stepped down. Ford became the only person in U.S. history to serve as president without having been elected president or vice president. He lost the election in 1976 to Jimmy Carter.

The services for Ford lacked some of the ceremonial trappings and the enormous crowds seen during former president Ronald Reagan's state funeral in 2004.

After going to the Rotunda, President Bush and Laura Bush met with Ford's widow, Betty, at Blair House, a government guest house for VIPs. The elder President Bush, who served in Ford's administration as CIA director, and his wife, Barbara, joined them.

Ford's son, Michael, and daughter, Susan Ford Bales, stood near the casket early Monday to shake hands with those who visited.

They gave out "remembrance cards" featuring a photo of their father and the presidential, vice presidential and House of Representatives seals. The card called Ford "a devoted husband, father, grandfather and great-grandfather and the 38th president of the United States."

Later, four of Ford's grandchildren stood to the side and thanked those who visited. Betty Ford, 88 and frail, and her children returned to say a final goodbye at 5:30 p.m.

"He bailed us out at a bad time for the country," said retired Navy commander Douglas Wallace, 50, who drove an hour from Annapolis, Md., to pay his respects.

"He was underappreciated during his life," his wife, retired Navy captain Sharon Wallace, 50, said of Ford. "So it's nice that he's being appreciated in his death."

Current, Former Presidents Pay Their Respects To Ford (WP)

By Peter Baker And Hamil R. Harris

The Washington Post, January 2, 2007

President Bush opened the new year on a somber note yesterday, returning from his Texas holiday break to pay tribute to former president Gerald R. Ford and to contemplate what has gone wrong in a war that has claimed more American lives than the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

With his wife, Laura, clutching his arm, Bush silently marched into the Rotunda of the Capitol and up to the flag-covered casket holding the remains of the 38th president. The Bushes held hands and bowed their heads for about a minute, then turned and left without a word, heading in their motorcade to Blair House to offer condolences to former first lady Betty Ford.

The grim start to 2007 reflected grim times as the U.S. military death toll in Iraq passed 3,000 and the videotaped execution of Saddam Hussein continued to roil a country already riven by sectarian strife. This week alone, Bush will deliver a eulogy for a fellow Republican president today, endure the installation of an opposition Congress on Thursday, and try to draft a new strategy for a war he once had thought would be winding down in success by now.

In a written holiday message, Bush expressed hope that the new year will turn things around. "In the New Year, we will remain on the offensive against the enemies of freedom, advance the security of our country, and work toward a free and unified Iraq," he said. "Defeating terrorists and extremists is the challenge of our time and we will answer history's call with confidence and fight for liberty without wavering."

For the day, though, Ford remained the focus as Washington wrapped up its second full day of mourning the man lying in state in the Rotunda. Former presidents Bill Clinton and George H.W. Bush joined a succession of other dignitaries as well as thousands of residents, tourists and others who made their way to the Capitol on a drizzly, dreary day. Two of Ford's children greeted some mourners and gave out commemorative cards, while several grandchildren touched his coffin to say their goodbyes.

The rest of the Ford family made an emotional final trip to the Rotunda yesterday evening to pay respects again. Betty Ford approached the casket and knelt before it, clasping her hands on top of it and bowing her head for several long minutes as her sons rubbed her back in support. Her face was etched with the pain of the moment, yet she remained stoic as she finally stood and walked back to a row of seats set aside for relatives.

The memorials to Ford extended to the other coast: Players on the football team of his alma mater, the University of Michigan, wore stickers on their helmets honoring him during yesterday's Rose Bowl in Pasadena, Calif. The stickers said "Bo 48" -- the first a reference to Bo Schembechler, the legendary Michigan football coach who died in November, and the second representing Ford's number when he was a star player in the 1930s.

The ceremonies will continue today with a service at Washington National Cathedral, where much of the country's past and present political elite will remember the unlikely president who took over the White House after the scandal of Watergate and put an end to the U.S. involvement in Vietnam.

The casket will be taken first to the closed Senate doors in a nod to his time as vice president -- who serves as president of the upper chamber -- and then loaded into a motorcade. The cathedral's Bourdon Bell will ring out 38 times as the cortege carrying the 38th president travels from the Capitol. It is scheduled to arrive at 10 a.m.

The Right Rev. John Bryson Chane, the Episcopal bishop of Washington, will lead the officiating clergy through a service that will include readings by two of the former president's children, Jack Ford and Susan Ford Bales, and eulogies by the president and his father, former secretary of state Henry A. Kissinger, and former NBC News anchor Tom Brokaw. Opera singer Denyce Graves, the U.S. Marine Orchestra, the Armed Forces Chorus, and the Cathedral Choirs of Men, Boys and Girls will perform.

It will be the third presidential state funeral at the 114-year-old cathedral, following Ronald Reagan's in 2004 and Dwight D. Eisenhower's in 1969. The cathedral also hosted the burial of Woodrow Wilson, the only president buried in Washington. Ford was on hand in 1976 when the cathedral's nave and west rose window were dedicated.

After today's service, Ford is to be flown to his childhood home town of Grand Rapids, Mich. There he will be interred in a hillside tomb at his presidential museum as a 21-aircraft flyover in missing-man formation jets up the Grand River.

Bush's trip to the Capitol yesterday was his first participation in the six-day Ford funeral events. The president made comments to cameras the day after Ford's death at 93 last week but did not cut short a stay at his Crawford, Tex., ranch.

The White House has maintained a studied silence about Ford's posthumously disclosed criticism of Bush's decision to invade Iraq in 2003. In an interview with The Washington Post's Bob Woodward embargoed until after his death, Ford said Bush and his team -- including two former Ford chiefs of staff, Vice President Cheney and then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld -- made a mistake in how they justified the war and said he would not have ordered the attack. Cheney made no mention of the matter in a tribute speech at the Capitol on Saturday night.

Bush went to the Capitol shortly after landing back at Andrews Air Force Base yesterday, along with aides Joshua B. Bolten, Karl Rove and Joel D. Kaplan. The Bushes walked briskly to the coffin at 3:06 p.m. and paused beside the honor guard. As he did at Reagan's casket in 2004, Bush looked up after a few moments. He blinked and turned to the first lady and appeared to say "Okay." The couple turned and left.

Ten minutes later, George H.W. Bush appeared with Barbara Bush, as well as former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former senator Alan K. Simpson (R-Wyo.) and their wives. The Bushes and Bakers then went to Blair House to visit Betty Ford.

Clinton and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) went to the Rotunda later in the afternoon, and House Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) went earlier along with her husband, Paul, and Rep. Anna G. Eshoo (D-Calif.). Pelosi crossed herself in front of the coffin. Other elder statesmen who paid respects included Sen. Pete V. Domenici (R-N.M.). and former senator Lowell P. Weicker Jr. (R-Conn.).

Members of the public, sometimes decked out in slickers and boots, waited in the rain for nearly an hour to get in, and some were allowed to witness the presidential visits. "I didn't expect him to walk in," said Melissa Koenig, 28, who saw former president Bush. The Michigan native once met Ford in Grand Rapids and said she wanted to pay respects.

Kathy Fredickson of Bethesda said she felt fortunate to be present. "I came for all of my family members who could not come."

Susan Ford Bales and brother Michael Gerald Ford greeted some mourners and gave them cream-colored cards with the seals of the president, vice president and House of Representatives. The cards were embossed: "In final tribute from a grateful nation. The lying in state of President Gerald R. Ford."

One of the most poignant moments of the day came around 3:30 p.m. when some of Ford's grandchildren were escorted into the Rotunda. Becca Ford Cook, Sarah Ford Goodfellow, Hannah Ford, Heather Vance and Tyne Vance Berlanga slipped inside the velvet rope and placed their hands on the coffin.

"He was a president by accident, but he did a lot of wonderful things," said Barbara Feiner, 57, of St. Louis, who came with her husband, Tom. Feiner said Ford's legacy extended beyond healing the country and pardoning Richard M. Nixon: "He was the right guy for that time. He handled Watergate, I thought, even though I didn't agree with his decision at the time."

At Ford Funeral, Echo Of Reunions Past (NYT)

By RACHEL L. SWARNS

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 1 — On the morning of President Gerald R. Ford's funeral, his former cabinet secretaries and administration staff members will come together here once more, taking their seats in the black cars accompanying the funeral motorcade and in the pews of Washington National Cathedral.

Former President Bill Clinton and Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton were among those at the Capitol Monday to pay respects to Mr. Ford. More Photos >

For more than two decades, they had gathered at Mr. Ford's annual White House reunions, most of which were held in the nation's capital, where they chuckled over half-forgotten policy disputes and shook their heads sadly as their numbers dwindled and their host grew increasingly frail.

Even as their career paths and personal lives diverged, they kept in touch with Mr. Ford and with one another, reminiscing at dinner parties and lunches, and in long-distance phone calls. In mourning their president on Tuesday, the alumni of his administration will also be celebrating his life and the intimate circle he created.

"We've stayed together," said Brent Scowcroft, who served as national security adviser to Mr. Ford. "There is a sense of community."

In many ways, Tuesday's funeral will highlight those ties. Henry A. Kissinger, Mr. Ford's secretary of state, cut short his vacation to the Dominican Republic to attend the Washington solemnities, which began Saturday. Robert E. Barrett, Mr. Ford's military attaché, flew in from his home in Florida. Carla A. Hills, his housing secretary, and William T. Coleman Jr., his transportation secretary, who both still work in Washington, will join them as honorary pallbearers.

The funeral will also reunite several officials who gained prominence in Washington after Mr. Ford left office, including Vice President Dick Cheney, who served as Mr. Ford's chief of staff; Alan Greenspan, who was chairman of Mr. Ford's council of economic advisers years before he became chairman of the Federal Reserve; and Mr. Scowcroft, who also served as national security adviser to President George Bush. They, too, will be pallbearers.

Ron Nessen, who was Mr. Ford's press secretary and who will attend the ceremony at the cathedral, said Mr. Ford's White House team had bonded so deeply because members had served during "an extraordinary time in American history."

It was the mid-1970s, and Mr. Ford, unexpectedly thrust into the presidency, had scrambled to assemble a team that would guide a nation reeling from Watergate, from President Richard M. Nixon's resignation and pardon, from the winding down of the Vietnam War, and from gas lines and soaring inflation.

"It was a shared experience, an amazing shared experience," Mr. Nessen said, "and that's what keeps people in touch with each other."

"People are going to share a lot of their memories," Mr. Nessen said of the Tuesday reunion. "And we'll be thinking of the more personal moments, the more personal conversations, the thoughtful things he did as a man, not just as president."

Mr. Nessen and others said they particularly enjoyed swapping memories of how Mr. Ford had treated people, regardless of their station in life, with dignity and respect, and how he had never taken on airs.

He described the day when Mr. Ford's dog, Liberty, made a mess on the carpet in the Oval Office and a Navy steward had scrambled to clean it. The president stopped him.

" 'I'll do that,' " Mr. Nessen recalled Mr. Ford saying. " 'No man should have to clean up after another man's dog.' "

Mr. Ford's energy secretary, Frank G. Zarb, remembered the time when Mr. Ford had been ready to make an announcement to the White House press corps but then realized he did not have any cufflinks handy.

"He got two paperclips," Mr. Zarb recalled. "And he said, 'Let's go. We have more important things to do.' "

Mr. Coleman, the former transportation secretary, who said he had seen Mr. Ford four or five times a year, said he had relished the former president's warmth and humor, and his love of family and sports. The last time they spoke, about three months ago, they had talked football, he said.

"Michigan had just defeated Michigan State," Mr. Coleman said. "We had a good time." (As a young man, Mr. Ford played football for the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor.)

Of course, some of Mr. Ford's officials also clashed, and memories of those battles sometimes rankled. But for the most part, those rivalries faded over time, said Robert Orben, a speechwriter for Mr. Ford.

"We're old now, and life has mellowed us," Mr. Orben said. "Some old tensions get put away. There's a sense of camaraderie that continues."

Many officials held fast to that sense of closeness, particularly as Mr. Ford began to age and weaken.

At one recent reunion, Mr. Ford and his wife, Betty, sat on stools because they no longer had the energy to stand and shake hands with the scores of well-wishers. And at last year's gathering, Mr. Ford did not show up at all. Instead, he sent his regards via videotape. It was the first time he had missed a reunion.

Mr. Ford had been in and out of the hospital since January 2006, most recently in October for tests at the Eisenhower Medical Center in Rancho Mirage, Calif. Mr. Scowcroft, who said he had spoken to Mr. Ford several times a year, said he could hear the difference in Mr. Ford's voice when they chatted last summer.

"He sounded tired," Mr. Scowcroft said. "There wasn't the same kind of vibrancy in his voice."

Mr. Ford was 93 when he died last week. It is unclear whether the annual reunions will continue without him. But his administration officials said he would continue to inspire them.

"There will be sadness, but there will also be gladness that will relate to his legacy, to his service to the country," said John O. Marsh Jr., an honorary pallbearer who served as a Virginia congressman before becoming a top aide to Mr. Ford.

"Hopefully," Mr. Marsh said, "it will renew our own spirit of commitment to public service."

Kissinger's Appearance Revives Memories Of Vietnam Era (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

WASHINGTON, Jan. 1 — Of all the aging Washington power brokers who have re-emerged in the shadow of the death of former President Gerald R. Ford, there is one, Henry A. Kissinger, for whom the return to the spotlight may be as much curse as blessing.

At Funeral, a Gathering to Echo Reunions Past (January 2, 2007) At 83, Mr. Kissinger, former secretary of state to Presidents Ford and Richard M. Nixon and sometime adviser to the current occupant of the White House, remains a towering figure in international relations. He is expected to be among a select few, including President Bush, to eulogize Mr. Ford on Tuesday at services at the Washington National Cathedral.

But at a time when the American public has soured on the war in Iraq — indeed, at the precise moment the United States is recording the milestone of 3,000 American deaths there — Mr. Kissinger's reappearance is stirring memories and rekindling debates about his role in managing another unpopular conflict, the Vietnam War.

"Henry is certainly one of the most complex characters in recent American history, and he is someone who has, I think, justifiably been in the spotlight both for extraordinary brilliance and competence and at the same time clear defects," said David Rothkopf, a former managing director of Mr. Kissinger's consulting firm and the author of "Running the World," about the National Security Council. "One of the interesting dimensions of Gerald Ford's demise is the pictures it has brought back into the paper of Ford with Rumsfeld, Ford with Cheney, Ford with Henry.

"It's forgotten that all of these people came together first 30 years ago dealing with Vietnam, dealing with a divided nation."

Yet of all those former Ford advisers, only Mr. Kissinger continues to evoke the passions about Vietnam that Donald H. Rumsfeld, the former defense secretary, evokes today about Iraq. This year, the White House press secretary, Tony Snow, confirmed that Mr. Kissinger had been quietly advising President Bush about Iraq in private meetings in the Oval Office. Mr. Kissinger, Mr. Snow said, "supports the overall thrust and direction of the administration policy" in Iraq.

Given Mr. Kissinger's firsthand experience in the anguishing decisions about withdrawal from Vietnam, the disclosure sparked the inevitable Iraq-Vietnam comparisons that Mr. Bush has assiduously sought to avoid. Now, Mr. Ford's funeral is raising those comparisons anew.

Aaron David Miller, a scholar at the Woodrow Wilson International Center who recently interviewed Mr. Kissinger for a book about American policy in the Middle East, describes Mr. Kissinger as "the bête noire of the Vietnam antiwar crowd," an image that he says cannot be avoided as the Ford and Nixon presidencies are revisited this week.

"Here's Kissinger back in the limelight," Mr. Miller said, "with a lot of his luggage coming along with him."

Some of that luggage includes bags from Watergate. In 1969, as national security adviser to Mr. Nixon, Mr. Kissinger played a role in wiretapping the telephone of an aide, Morton H. Halperin, who was suspected of leaking classified information to reporters. Mr. Halperin sued. In 1992, Mr. Kissinger issued a formal apology.

"That was the price for my ending the lawsuit," said Mr. Halperin, who became a civil liberties advocate and today is a leading opponent of the Bush administration's domestic wiretapping. "Every time there was an event in the lawsuit, it would remind people of his role in wiretapping. He prefers to be remembered for other things."

Mr. Kissinger is, of course, remembered not only for Vietnam, but also as being an architect of détente with the Soviet Union and the winner of the Nobel Peace Prize. But slipped into the flattering tributes to Mr. Ford over the last week have been some unflattering depictions of Mr. Kissinger, including some from Mr. Ford himself.

There was some tension in the relationship. Mr. Kissinger was named secretary of state in 1973 by Mr. Nixon, all the while keeping his post as national security adviser. It was an unusual arrangement, one that allowed Mr. Kissinger to centralize his power over foreign policy while Mr. Nixon was preoccupied with Watergate. In 1975, Mr. Ford ended it, stripping Mr. Kissinger of the national security adviser title.

Mr. Kissinger balked. " 'Mr. President, the press will misunderstand this,' " Mr. Ford said, recounting Mr. Kissinger's reaction to Bob Woodward of The Washington Post in interviews published last week.

The interviews painted Mr. Kissinger as a bit of a management challenge for Mr. Ford, high impact, but high maintenance as well.

Mr. Ford called Mr. Kissinger a "super secretary of state" but cast him as overly confident — "Henry in his mind never made a mistake" — and overly sensitive to press criticism, so much that he routinely threatened to resign over it.

"Henry publicly was a gruff, hard-nosed German-born diplomat," Mr. Ford was quoted as saying, "but he had the thinnest skin of any public figure I ever knew."

In a retrospective in Newsweek online, Mr. Kissinger had kind words for Mr. Ford, saying he "moved with calm and sure-footedness" to reassure the nation during what could have been a constitutional crisis.

But he also described how the former president relied on him, saying, "After Nixon told Ford of the decision to resign, Ford's first call was to me."

Mr. Rothkopf, who worked with Mr. Kissinger and interviewed Mr. Ford for his book, said Mr. Kissinger often said that "Ford was underestimated, that he was much more intelligent and much more capable than people gave him credit for." Mr. Ford, he added, believed diminishing Mr. Kissinger's role was his "most important contribution" to the foreign policy bureaucracy.

"What he was trying to do was restore Henry to the role of an adviser, not 'the' adviser," Mr. Rothkopf said. "I think he had a sense that the national security system called for giving the president a range of views, and what had happened was that Nixon sank into the depths and Henry assumed greater power, that there was far too much judgment and power in the hands of one person who wasn't the president."

In Grand Rapids, Fixer-Upper Leads To Unusual Bond (WSJ)

By Janet Adamy

The Wall Street Journal, January 2, 2007

GRAND RAPIDS, Mich. -- Growing up here some 85 years ago, Gerald R. Ford lived in six different homes. Tim England and Rob Kent bought one of them in 1991 for $63,500.

The couple didn't really care that the 38th president had once lived there. They could only afford a fixer-upper and picked this one for its winding stairway. But as they renovated and saved a historic home that Grand Rapids wasn't willing to preserve, they forged an unusual bond with President Ford that lasted more than a decade. 1

"It started out as buying our own home," says Mr. England, 46 years old, who is a chef. Then, "our families merged."

President Ford will be buried at the Gerald R. Ford Presidential Museum tomorrow, in the city where he spent most of his childhood and launched his political career. As a little boy, he lived in several homes, including at least one in affluent East Grand Rapids. Grand Rapids was a furniture-manufacturing hub and President Ford's father was a successful salesman for a wood-finishing company.

But in 1921, the Ford family suffered a financial setback, and a bank foreclosed on their home. They rented the three-story house at 649 Union Ave., in what was then a working-class neighborhood on Grand Rapids' southeast side.

Mr. Ford, then 8 years old, rose at 6 each morning to remove ashes from the furnace and shovel in the day's supply of coal, he recalled in his 1979 autobiography, "A Time to Heal." At South High School, he played center on the football team and lost an election for senior-class president. When he was 17, his parents scraped together enough money to move back to East Grand Rapids. Mr. Ford eventually left to attend the University of Michigan, but later returned to represent the area in Congress for almost 25 years.

After he became president in 1974, upon the resignation of Richard M. Nixon, Grand Rapids named buildings and the airport to honor him. His museum became a major attraction of the city's downtown.

But civic leaders made little effort to preserve any of his childhood homes, even though other former presidents have had theirs turned into museums or named historical landmarks. Over the years, some of President Ford's former homes were razed.

In the late 1980s, the house at 649 Union was barely standing. Racial tensions during the late 1960s drove longtime residents out of the neighborhood, which became infested with crime. Police officers routinely busted drug dealers "no more than two houses, 80 feet, from the Ford home," says George Heartwell, now the mayor of Grand Rapids. The nearby corner was "one of the worst in Grand Rapids," he says. Civic leaders talked about restoring the vacant, boarded-up home but never followed through.

Even the former president, who settled in Rancho Mirage, Calif., after losing the 1976 presidential election, didn't push for its preservation. He didn't want public money spent on the project, says Elaine Didier, director of the Gerald R. Ford Presidential Library and Museum. In 1991, the city auctioned off the house for $3,000.

The buyers, acquaintances of Messrs. England and Kent, offered to sell it to them after doing some repairs. Inspecting the house with a flashlight, the two men, who have been together for almost 20 years, saw that there was no ceiling in the dining room and the top floor was filled with birds. "It was pretty rank," recalls Mr. Kent, 46, who does sales for a specialty food store.

After moving in, Messrs. Kent and England painted walls and did a lot of patching. They replaced all 36 windows and the three outside doors. They scoured yard sales for antique clocks, lamps, chairs and bookcases to give the house a vintage feel. Mr. England bought an old chandelier and restored each of its 500 crystals by hand. The two men planted a garden in the barren backyard. The restoration, and others like it, helped improve the neighborhood.

Then in 1992, a letter arrived from President Ford out of the blue. "Mrs. Ford and I are very pleased and honored that you have done such a wonderful restoration of my family home," he wrote. Excited that the former president had taken an interest, the two men tried to have the house designated as a historical landmark and sought public funds to help with the restoration.

But they weren't eligible for most public funding because the house was privately owned, Mr. England says. The Ford museum, the clearinghouse for most of President Ford's affairs in the city, wasn't interested in helping. Ms. Didier, the museum and library director, says her organization or Mr. Ford's foundation "wouldn't give money to a private home." Messrs. England and Kent continued restoring the house with their own money.

In the fall of 1994, a Secret Service official left a message on their answering machine. Mr. Ford was planning to visit Grand Rapids and wanted to see his old home. A few days later, former first lady Betty Ford walked up the steps and extended her hand to Mr. England. "You will never know what this means to my Jerry," Mr. England recalls her saying.

As Mr. Ford entered the house, "he turned into a child," Mr. England recalls. He pointed to a spot in the foyer where the Ford family piano once sat. Mr. England pulled out pocket doors tucked into a foyer wall to show President Ford they were still there. Walking through the kitchen, the president remembered how his family had eaten at a small table, Mr. England says.

The former president climbed the stairs to his second-floor bedroom, then to the third floor, where he and his three half-brothers would retreat when his parents had company. Then he darted into the backyard to see the carriage house where he and his pals used to play penny-ante poker. Inside, Mr. Ford had his foot on the ladder to climb to the second floor when a Secret Service agent advised him against it.

Later in 1994, the house was declared a national and state historic site. At a dedication ceremony the following year, the former president stood on the front porch and, before a crowd of local dignitaries, thanked Messrs. England and Kent. "I have such wonderful memories," he said, recalling how the police used to close the sloped street in the winter so children could sled.

After that, the Fords began sending Christmas cards to the two men, sometimes including photographs of family weddings. Messrs. England and Kent filled their foyer with campaign memorabilia and a framed letter from the Fords. Each July 14, Mr. Ford's birthday, the men hang an enormous American flag across the front porch.

In 2005, the men called Mr. Ford's office on his birthday to ask his assistant to pass on their good wishes. To their surprise, Mr. Ford jumped on the line and struck up a conversation. He thanked them for recently repainting the outside of the house, Mr. England recalls.

Just past midnight on Wednesday morning, after Messrs. England and Kent went to bed, a friend called and told them to turn on their television. Watching the report of Mr. Ford's death, Mr. England says he felt sick to his stomach. A few minutes later, a local news crew pulled up in front of the home in the darkness. Mr. England went outside and pleaded with them to wait before they started shooting. He brought out the big American flag and draped it over the front porch. Then he told them they could start their cameras.

Gerald R. Ford 1913-2006 (USNEWS)

By Angie Cannon

U.S. News and World Report, January 2, 2007

He was called the accidental president, a straight arrow from Michigan who served for only 29 months. Gerald R. Ford wasn't a politician consumed by ambition. In fact, he never campaigned for the presidency or vice presidency and once said that all he ever wanted to be was speaker of the House.

He accomplished a little more than that. When he died last week in Rancho Mirage, Calif., Ford was remembered with almost universal respect and admiration as the man who did much to calm the nation after Watergate and the Vietnam War and to restore honesty and stability to the White House. He set in motion some important changes in dealing with the Soviet Union and in reforming a troubled economy–decisions that three decades later were applauded. Even his most controversial call–a pre-emptive pardon of Richard Nixon–was viewed in hindsight as the right thing to do.

On Oct. 12, 1973, Richard Nixon picked him as vice president, a confirmable choice, when Spiro Agnew had to step down because of a corruption investigation. At his swearing-in, Ford tried to keep expectations low when he famously joked: "I am a Ford, not a Lincoln."

Ford was center stage for some of the most dramatic moments in American history. On Aug. 8, 1974, Ford met with Nixon at 11 a.m., and the president told him: "I have made the decision to resign. It's in the best interest of the country." He said quietly, "Jerry, I know you'll do a good job." Nixon later wrote that "Ford's eyes filled with tears–and mine did as well–as we lingered for a moment at the door."

Straight talk. The rushed inauguration was to be in the East Room, and Ford sent an Air Force jet to bring Chief Justice Warren Burger home from a conference in the Netherlands. On the morning of August 9, Nixon emotionally said farewell to his staff. Ford and his wife, Betty, stayed one floor below, waiting to walk the Nixons to the waiting helicopter. "The moment was terribly painful for all of us," Ford wrote in his autobiography, A Time to Heal. "We were trying to put up the bravest, strongest front. Standing by the helicopter's door, we wished the Nixons happiness and good health. The president grabbed my elbow and held it for a split second longer than necessary, as if to say, 'Good luck.' The moment had come. Then, he uttered the words. 'Goodbye, Mr. President,' he said, and put out his hand." After he was sworn in, Ford gave what he called "not an inaugural address, not a fireside chat, not a campaign speech, just a little straight talk among friends."

He noted that he did not gain the office by any "secret promises." He said: "I am indebted to no man and only to one woman." He also said: "I believe that truth is the glue that holds government together, not only our government but civilization itself. That bond, though strained, is unbroken at home and abroad." He is most famously remembered for saying, "My fellow Americans, our long national nightmare is over. Our Constitution works. Our great republic is a government of laws and not of men. Here, the people rule."

The 38th President: More Than Met The Eye (NSWK)

Jan. 8, 2007 issue - On the morning of Sunday, Sept. 8, 1974, after he had been president for about a month, Gerald Ford took communion at St. John's Episcopal Church on Lafayette Square, across from the White House. He prayed alone in the presidential pew. On the way out the church door, he sloughed off reporters who were badgering him about his plans for the day—"You'll find out soon enough," he said. Back in the Oval Office, he telephoned Sen. Barry Goldwater, the fabled conservative, to tell him he was pardoning Richard Nixon for whatever crimes the disgraced president might have committed in office. Goldwater, whose voice had been critical in forcing Nixon's resignation, was dumbfounded. "It doesn't make any sense," he protested. Ford answered, "The public has the right to know that, in the eyes of the president, Nixon is clear." Goldwater responded: "He may be clear in your eyes, but he's not clear in mine."

Next, Ford called his old congressional adversary, the then House Majority Leader Thomas P. (Tip) O'Neill, and told him that he intended to pardon Nixon. "I'm telling you right now," O'Neill said, "this will cost you the election. I hope it's not part of any deal."

"No," Ford replied calmly, "there's no deal."

"Then why the hell are you doing it?" O'Neill asked.

Ford answered that Nixon was a "sick man" and that his daughter Julie "keeps calling me because her father is so depressed." O'Neill was unpersuaded, but Ford seemed determined. A few minutes later that Sunday morning, the president went on national television to announce his decision. Ford's own aides had been dubious about the pardon and had tried to argue with him. But Ford moved—quickly, at first secretly, then decisively—to cut off any criminal prosecution of his predecessor. Ford had experienced no trouble sleeping the night before—"Once I determine to move, I seldom, if ever, fret," he recalled in his memoirs. After announcing the pardon, Ford recorded, he felt "an unbelievable lifting of a burden from my shoulders." He went off to play golf.

O'Neill's warning was not wrong. The public hammering Ford took for pardoning Nixon probably did cost him the election in 1976. "Jail Ford!" screamed angry crowds, who widely assumed (not altogether without reason) that Nixon had wrangled a deal. Most news-papers in the righteous post-Watergate era gravely editorialized against Ford's action. His own press secretary, Jerry terHorst, quit in disgust.

Yet, more than three decades later, Ford's decision has been largely vindicated. The conventional wisdom has shifted: pardoning Nixon was the farsighted thing to do. It spared the nation an ordeal of recrimination and allowed the healing to begin.

In the first hours and days after his death last week at 93, Gerald R. Ford Jr. was eulogized as a model of common-sense leadership, a plain-spoken Everyman who followed his own conscience. He was seen as a real-life Jimmy Stewart figure, a regular guy whose heartland decency shamed the Washington pols. His reputed willingness to reach across the aisle was held up, explicitly and implicitly, as a reproach to the current chief executive.

As president, Ford was mocked, especially on "Saturday Night Live," for tripping over his own feet and getting tangled up in his own words. In contrast to the darkly complex "Tricky Dick," the image of Ford as a genial, trusting, slightly naive stumblebum was somehow comforting. But it was largely a fiction. Ford was probably the best athlete ever to occupy the Oval Office; he was a graceful dancer and a smoothly expert skier. More important, he was hardly "Mr. Smith Goes to Washington." In reality, he was a quintessential pol who spent more time cutting deals than shaping lofty visions.

Ford was a politician in the best sense: he understood how to use power to serve the public interest. He was also a decent man. But he was a complex one, whose motivations have remained well hidden, obscured to this day by his skillful legacy-polishing in retirement. Ford's morality and character had been forged not just by the Main Street virtues of Depression-era Middle America, but by the bitter, carefully concealed personal experiences that often shape and drive (and sometimes twist) great leaders. Ford was far from the oaf Chevy Chase made him out to be, and his presidency, though it lasted less than 900 days, was no mere stop-gap. Ford had a way of showing up and doing surprising things at critical moments in history, with repercussions—some intended, some accidental—that echo today.

Gerald R. Ford Jr. was born Leslie Lynch King Jr. His real father was a handsome, wealthy, blond-haired wife-beater who first struck his bride on the first night of their honeymoon for smiling at a stranger in the elevator. Later, Leslie King Sr. held a knife over his wife as she lay in bed with her newborn baby; she then fled to Grand Rapids, Mich., and married a paint salesman named Gerald Ford, who gave her baby boy his name. At 16, young Jerry, by then a high-school football hero, was tending a lunch counter when Leslie King Sr. sauntered in. "I'm your father," he announced. "I'd like to take you to lunch." King was passing through town on his way to pick up an expensive new car, a Lincoln. King asked Ford if he would like to move back to live with his true father in Wyoming.

"It was a hell of a shock," Ford later recalled. He went to lunch, but was shaking with resentment. "Nothing could erase the image I gained of my real father that day—a carefree, well-to-do man who really didn't give a damn about the hopes and dreams of his son." In bed that night, Ford wept "tears of anger." He tried to remember verses from Proverbs his mother had taught him: Trust in the Lord with all thine heart, and lean not unto thine own understanding. In all thy ways acknowledge Him, and He shall direct thy paths.

These words were to become a sacred talisman for Ford. He said them to himself right after he had nearly been swept off the deck of a carrier as a naval officer during a Pacific typhoon in World War II, and he said them to himself the night before he was sworn in as president of the United States. The passage suggests a comforting submission to God's will, and no doubt Ford found solace in it. But the real message he took from the shock of seeing his delinquent father was not at all passive: it was to keep moving along those "paths," to not look back, to not brood, but to act—without remorse or regret.

As a young man Ford became adept at productively channeling his anger. As a center and linebacker at the University of Michigan, he was a ferocious blocker and tackler. He was tough enough to be offered contracts by the Green Bay Packers and Detroit Lions, but pro-football money was small in those days; he decided his ambition was better served by attending Yale Law School.

Ford finished in the top third of an accomplished class that included future Supreme Court justices and a secretary of State. But he found his calling working for Republican Wendell Willkie in the 1940 presidential race. Ford discovered, he later recalled, that "I liked politics, everything about it." He meant not just glad-handing on the stump but wheeling and dealing in the back room.

Blond, big-shouldered—a hale fellow—Ford struck some sophisticates, including his prewar girlfriend, Phyllis Brown, a New York model from a fancy prep school, as a little slow-witted. "Jerry had an innate awareness that was deceptive," Brown later told former Ford aide James Cannon, author of "Time and Chance," a 1994 account of Ford's ascension to the presidency (written with access to Ford's papers). "Actually, it was a cunning side. People would be talking and thinking, 'Dumb Jerry the football coach is not getting it.' But that was part of the cunning. He was listening, mulling it over and thinking it through, and then he would come up with the right answer. He was smart—not clever, not quick, but smart."

Ford learned how to keep secrets. After the war, running for Congress, he proposed marriage to a beautiful divorcée and former professional dancer named Betty Warren. He told her they had to keep their engagement a secret, and that he couldn't say why. The reason: his political advisers had convinced him that marrying a divorcée would cost him votes among conservatives. The couple was married after the Republican primary.

Ford entered congress in 1949, just two years after a wave of young World War II veterans, including John F. Kennedy and Richard Nixon, who understood that America would have to stay on the world stage to contain communism and spread freedom. But Ford was happy to take a less lofty assignment on the Public Works Committee. He understood that Public Works was the place to learn to make pork-barrel deals. When a seat on the Appropriations Committee came open, Ford went for it. "Appropriations was where the power was," he later wrote. "I said to myself, 'That's going to be my specialty—how the government spends money'."

Ford was intensely ambitious: his goal was to become Speaker of the House. To curry favor and votes, he was a relentless fund-raiser for the party coffers, traveling some 200 nights a year. He rarely saw his young family. "I was resentful of Jerry's being gone so much," Betty later said. "I was feeling terribly neglected ... The loneliness, the being left to yourself at night, is what makes marriages crack, makes liquor more attractive." Their marriage did not crack—Ford always counted on his smart and outspoken wife for political advice—but Betty did begin to drink more and more (and ultimately became dependent on painkillers for a stiff neck). "I'd have my five o'clock drink at a neighbor's house," she recalled. "Or even by myself, while talking on the phone with a neighbor. I'd have another while I was fixing dinner, and then, when the kids were in bed, I'd build myself a nightcap."

Though he may not have played the sort of mean-spirited hardball that characterized the GOP-controlled House under Majority Leader Tom DeLay in recent years, Ford was a down-the-line party man. As minority leader in the 1960s, he tangled with President Lyndon Johnson, attacking the president for not doing more to win in Vietnam and for wasting taxpayer money on social-welfare programs. Johnson called Ford "dumb" and cracked, "Jerry played football too many times without a helmet."

Ford was a close ally and admirer of Nixon's from their days together in the House Chowder and Marching Society, a band of hard-charging GOP congressmen who voted, logrolled and played together. As the GOP House leader after Nixon's election in 1968, Ford faithfully did the bidding of Nixon's attorney general, John Mitchell, by leading a clumsy attempt to impeach Supreme Court Justice William O. Douglas. Ford attacked Douglas as "senile" and for allowing his writings to be published in a "pornographic magazine" called Avant Garde. The impeachment effort collapsed after a couple of weeks; Ford later admitted the whole thing had been a "mistake."

When the first flames of Watergate began to singe the White House, Ford remained loyal. At Nixon's urging, Ford was instrumental in making sure that the House Banking and Currency Committee did not investigate the source of freshly printed $100 bills that turned up on the Watergate burglars. He was rewarded when Vice President Spiro Agnew pleaded no contest to accepting payoffs and was forced to resign in October 1973. Recognizing that Ford was the safest bet for congressional confirmation, Nixon chose him to replace Agnew.

As the Watergate scandal deepened, Ford had to walk a fine line between supporting the president and not going down with him. He was careful never to ask Nixon if he was guilty of covering up the Watergate break-in. But the vice president's suspicions were growing. His way of dealing with them in the spring of 1974 was to get out of town. "He deliberately fled Washington, very deliberately," recalls Ford's former House speechwriter and close aide Bob Hartmann. "He just told me to accept every invitation he possibly could. His travel itinerary was nearly continuous. He was not being devious. On the other hand, he was nobody's fool." In his public appearances, Ford began to "zig-zag—to be intentionally inconsistent in his comments," writes former Ford adviser James Cannon. "One day the tilt would be favorable: Nixon is innocent of an impeachable offense, he would say. The next day he would tilt against him."

Ford's deft balancing act during Nixon's fall drew little attention as investigators and reporters stalked bigger game. Sympathetic White House aides protected Ford by distancing him from the scandals, deleting his remarks from the edited transcripts of meetings or marking them "unintelligible." But Ford and Nixon were heading toward a high-stakes drama that is one of the most intriguing—and still somewhat murky—acts in the whole Shakespearean tragedy.

Without ever explicitly acknowledging what they were doing, Ford and Nixon began a private dance concerning the delicate question of whether Ford might pardon Nixon if the president stepped down and Ford took his place. Neither man could be seen participating in such a crude transaction. That does not mean, however, that there weren't some clever machinations and manipulations—on both sides.

The go-between in this shadow play was former Army general Alexander Haig, Nixon's chief of staff. Haig had been acting as a kind of regent, running the government while Nixon withdrew to the White House residence to brood while listening to "Victory at Sea" before roaring fires. At once scheming, dutiful and imperious, Haig was trying to protect the president—but, at the same time, get Nixon out of office before the president could be impeached in the House and convicted by the Senate. And if Nixon could be persuaded to resign, Haig wanted to insulate him from being prosecuted in the courts. Hence the call Ford received shortly after 8 on the morning of Aug. 1, 1974.

Haig wanted to know if he could come to Ford's office at the Old Executive Office Building. "It's urgent," said Haig. "I want to alert you that things are deteriorating. The whole ball game may be over. You'd better start thinking about a change in your life." That was not all Haig wanted to tell Ford. But according to Ford's memoirs, "A Time to Heal," Haig seemed reluctant to talk in front of Bob Hartmann, who was also in the room.

Haig decided to come back in the afternoon. This time he caught Ford alone in his office. Haig explained that the White House was turning over a tape recording—later known as the "smoking gun" tape—to the courts. On the tape, Nixon could be heard obstructing justice by trying to get the CIA to head off an FBI investigation of the Watergate break-in. Haig began to lay out various options before he got to the ones that mattered. He had brought two pieces of paper with him. Nixon's chief of staff explained to Ford that the president could resign and be pardoned by his successor. One piece of paper summarized a president's authority to grant such a pardon; the other was an actual pardon form.

"Al," Ford said, "I need some time to think about this." As Haig left, Ford sat back, he later recalled, and thought to himself, "I am about to become president. It's going to happen."

Hartmann came into the veep's office, and Ford told him that Nixon would resign if Ford would pardon him. Hartmann burst out, "Jesus! What did you tell him?" "I didn't tell him anything," Ford responded. "I told him I needed time to think about it." "You what?" Hartmann asked. "That's almost the worst answer Haig could take back to the White House. You told Haig you are willing to entertain the idea of a pardon if he resigns—that's probably all Haig and Nixon want to know."

Ford told Hartmann that he was overreacting. That night, as he lay in bed with Betty, Ford pondered what to do. In his memoirs, he wrote that Haig called him at 1 a.m. to tell him that "nothing had changed" and that the situation "remained fluid." Ford recalled that he told Haig, "I've talked with Betty, and we're prepared, but we can't get involved in the White House decision making process." But according to Barry Werth's "31 Days," the most authoritative retelling of Ford's roller-coaster first month in office, Ford told a different story to his aides the next morning. According to Hartmann, Ford told him: "Betty and I talked it over last night ... We felt we were ready. This just has to stop; it's tearing the country to pieces. I decided to go ahead and get it over with, so I called Al Haig and told them they should do whatever they decided to do, it was all right with me." Aghast that Haig and Nixon might interpret Ford's words as a signal that a pardon would follow a resignation, his aides—including Hartmann, John Marsh and Bryce Harlow—implored the vice president to call Haig right away. Ford should tell the president's chief of staff, unambiguously, that nothing they had discussed should be construed as a deal. Ford agreed and made the call, reading from notecards.

In later years, Haig would deny that he had offered Ford any kind of deal, denials he publicly repeated last week. Ford, for his part, professed a kind of wounded innocence. In 1997 he told Washington Post reporter Bob Woodward: "Well, I guess I was naive. I was naive that anybody would offer a deal because all my political life people never came to me, 'I'm going to give you a political donation. I expect something in return.' People never came to me that way, because they knew damn well I wouldn't be part of it." In any case, "it never became a deal because I never accepted," said Ford. The fact that he did agree to pardon Nixon 31 days after assuming the presidency, Ford always insisted, was unrelated to his discussions with Haig before Nixon resigned.

It may well be that in his political life Ford had never been approached with such a naked blandishment. But his personal history contains, at the very least, a foreshadowing of his decision to end what he called "the long national nightmare" of Watergate with a presidential pardon. In 1937, when Ford was at Yale, his delinquent father turned up again—this time with a quid pro quo. For years, Leslie King had been embroiled with Ford's mother regarding unpaid alimony and child-support payments. Now King was offering Ford a deal: if he would get his mother to back off her legal claims, King would make sure his son was not forgotten in his will. Ford was cool to his father's approach, but ultimately worked out a settlement that won his mother $4,000. She sent her son a check for more than $2,000, which he promptly returned to her. "I was simply acting as a peacemaker," Ford testified in a 1939 court proceeding.

Duke history professor Peter Wood has speculated that when Ford pardoned Nixon, he was re-enacting the drama of trying to bring peace between his mother and father. This interpretation may be stretching the bounds of psychohistory. Still, Ford's language, when he announced the pardon that September Sunday in 1974, does suggest that he was obeying what Wood calls "a submerged but controlling personal logic." Ford told the nation: "My conscience tells me clearly and certainly that I cannot continue to prolong the bad dreams that continue to reopen a chapter that is closed ... My conscience tells me it is my duty to not merely proclaim domestic tranquillity but to use every means that I have to ensure it."

The Nixon pardon did go a long way to ensure "domestic tranquillity" in the American family. But Ford quickly found himself ensnared in a web of problems, from an energy crisis to high inflation to the final collapse of South Vietnam. Ford has sometimes been portrayed as a feckless leader. His whip inflation now buttons made him seem like a small-town booster trying to use bromides to beat back the worst recession since the Depression.

But Ford was not afraid to make tough decisions. He vetoed 66 bills sent him by the Democratic-controlled Congress, and he ruthlessly unloaded anyone who did not meet his needs—starting with Haig. Secretary of State Henry Kissinger gave up his title as national-security adviser, opening the way for Brent Scowcroft. Ford fired Defense Secretary James Schlesinger. He dumped his vice president, Nelson Rockefeller, from the GOP ticket in 1976. (And though it pained him to be portrayed as the first American president to lose a war, he did not try to intervene when Saigon finally fell in May 1975.)

Battered by bad news and public discontent over the Nixon pardon, Ford began the 1976 campaign 25 points behind the Democratic nominee, Jimmy Carter. But partly by getting rid of his campaign manager, Rogers Morton, and replacing him with James A. Baker, an emerging force in national politics, Ford almost caught Carter in the last days of the campaign.

Ford was not done with politics. Though he burned with anger at Ronald Reagan for mounting a costly and diverting primary challenge for the Republican nomination in 1976, he nearly agreed to be Reagan's running mate in 1980. Reagan balked only when Ford insisted on being given enough power to be a virtual "co-president."

In retirement, Ford's principal cause was his pocketbook and his place in history. He had always liked to be around prosperous men since he was a scholarship boy invited to join the DKE house at Michigan. Going on as many as eight corporate boards and charging many thousands of dollars for speeches and corporate receptions (the latter now common practice among former presidents), he maintained houses on a golf course in Rancho Mirage, Calif., and at the foot of the ski slopes in Colorado. Over the years, he entertained a parade of visiting journalists and historians to make sure his story was properly told. Knowing that history is largely written by moderates and centrists, he made himself one, too, deploring the rightward swing of the Republican Party. In a July 2004 conversation with Bob Woodward, published last week, Ford said, "I don't think I would have gone to war" in Iraq. He criticized both Vice President Dick Cheney and former Defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld for "making a big mistake in justifying going into the war in Iraq."

One of the more peculiar legacies of the Ford era is the attempt by both Rumsfeld and Cheney to restore the power of the presidency. They were ambitious young men who served as Ford's chiefs of staff at a time when Ford was trying to dismantle what historian Arthur M. Schlesinger Jr. has called "the imperial presidency." Ford was trying to create an atmosphere of openness and cooperation with Congress and the courts after Nixon's grandiose show of presidential power—from opéra bouffe uniforms for the White House guards to the shadowy Plumbers Unit. But Rumsfeld and Cheney felt that the Watergate reforms had gone overboard, and as members of the Bush war cabinet they have pushed hard to strengthen the executive.

Ford may or may not have been wise enough to resist falling into the trap of hubris that seems to have overcome the Bush White House. His suggestion that he would have been against invading Iraq must be considered in light of his strongly held position as a congressman attacking the Johnson administration during the Vietnam War: that the United States military should press harder against the communists, not back off. At the same time, Ford's record as president suggests that he would have been far more willing than Bush to change his mind and reverse course if he saw the war turning into a quagmire. He was always moving forward and not looking back. He knew when to cut his losses, and he was not afraid of taking chances to bring peace—whether to his family or to his country.

Washington may not have a soul, but it does have a memory. For all the talk of what a cold, transient place it can be, there are rituals that remind us that this vast government rests on a sense of permanence and continuity. In a place like Washington, the past matters. A lot.

The funeral and eulogies for Gerald R. Ford at the National Cathedral this week have as much to do with 1975 as 2006. Ford will be mourned by a roomful of people whose views of the world were shaped by those crucial years in the wake of Watergate and the collapse of South Vietnam.

In particular, Ford and a couple of eager young aides named Donald Rumsfeld and Dick Cheney set about to rebuild a staggered White House. Congress, the press, and the Washington establishment had pilloried Richard Nixon–for reasons good and bad–and now were leaning on Ford. "The feeling I had then, and I think it's been borne out by history," Cheney told U.S. News last year, "is that the balance shifted, if you will–that, in fact, the presidency was weakened."

They all felt that the office of the president needed to be much stronger–as it was intended to be. Ford tried to push back. On domestic issues, he brought out the veto pen and killed a record 66 bills that mostly raised spending and taxes.

But on Vietnam and other national security issues–such as intelligence gathering, committing U.S. forces, and confronting the Soviet Union–he mostly gave in. Cheney and Rumsfeld never forgot.

'Confidence in His Bearing'

He was an unassuming man, our 38th president, and few have ever risen so high with so little guile or calculation. Even in the three decades since he left office, he was not the sort to ponder his legacy, to brood over his place in history. Jerry Ford was always a striver—never working an angle, just working. He was a believer in the saying that in life you make your own luck. The achievements added up all his life, yet he was known to boast about only one. I heard it once or twice myself—he said he was never luckier than when he stepped out of Grace Episcopal Church in Grand Rapids, Mich., with a beautiful girl named Betty as his bride.

He was modest and manful; there was confidence and courage in his bearing. In judgment, he was sober and serious, unafraid of decisions, calm and steady by nature, always the still point in the turning wheel. He assumed power without assuming airs; he knew how to treat people. He answered courtesy with courtesy; he answered discourtesy with courtesy.

This president's hardest decision was also among his first. And in September of 1974, Gerald Ford was almost alone in understanding that there can be no healing without pardon. The consensus holds that this decision cost him an election. That is very likely so. The criticism was fierce. But President Ford had larger concerns at heart. And it is far from the worst fate that a man should be remembered for his capacity to forgive.

He was not just a cheerful and pleasant man—although these virtues are rare enough at the commanding heights. He was not just a nice guy, the next-door neighbor whose luck landed him in the White House. It was this man, Gerald R. Ford, who led our republic safely through a crisis that could have turned to catastrophe. We will never know what further unravelings, what greater malevolence, might have come in that time of furies turned loose and hearts turned cold. But we do know this: America was spared the worst. And this was the doing of an American president. For all the grief that never came, for all the wounds that were never inflicted, the people of the United States will forever stand in debt to the good man and faithful servant we mourn.

'He Gave Us A New Day'

I got to know Jerry Ford when I was running for the Senate down here in Texas in 1964. I lost that one, and then he campaigned actively for me in my House race in '66, which I won. When I got to Washington, he helped me get a seat on Ways and Means, which was a very great assignment for a freshman, and we became friends. He was well respected by people of different opinions, was perceived as a guy who was a conservative fellow but who could get along with people.

In 1974, he had to pick a vice president, and I was considered one of the two names he might go with. One day—I'll never forget it—Barbara and I were sitting on the front steps in Maine with the TV on in the background, and they said, "Well, he's coming in now, he's coming in now to announce his choice." The telephone rang, and it was Jerry Ford, very courteous and thoughtful, and he said, "George, it was a very close decision I had to make, but I am going with Nelson Rockefeller"—which was kind of expected. I will never forget the kindness and the courtesy.

Watergate was just the worst. Bob Strauss used to call me when I was head of the Republican National Committee every time another shoe would drop, every time there was a new revelation. He said, "George, your job reminds me of making love to a gorilla." And I said, "Why, Bob?" And he said, "Because you can't stop until the gorilla wants to." And that's exactly the way it was, and of course Bob was loving it because he was the Democratic chairman.

Like Ford, I was going around talking about Nixon, saying, "Give the guy a chance, don't go on rumors," and then suddenly, in the summer of '74, this last shoe [a June 1972 tape revealing that Nixon ordered the cover-up] dropped, and it was very clear that Nixon could not survive. We had a final cabinet meeting in early August, and there was a kind of unreality to it, because he said, "OK, today we're going to talk about the economy," and everybody was quietly looking at each other and saying, "What the hell is going on here?" But when Ford became president, all of that changed instantly—he gave us a new day, and we all felt that, all over the country.

As president, Ford asked me to become director of the CIA, and my friends all advised me that the CIA was a political dead end: do not do this, do not take the CIA job. There were stories that Don Rumsfeld [then Ford's chief of staff] was kind of the Machiavellian behind the scenes pulling strings. There was a lot of speculation as to whether Rummy had masterminded this so he could have a better shot at maybe being president someday. But Ford personally denied that to me, incidentally, and he said that's just not fair, that's not true. He told me that in the Oval Office.

I was surprised and disappointed that Reagan challenged Ford in '76. I thought Ford was doing a good job and was entitled to the nomination. So I was surprised, and I was surprised at how well Reagan did—I was underestimating him at the time.

In Detroit in 1980, it looked for a time like Reagan and Ford were going to run together. I was out of it, but then Reagan called me. Apparently they had been very serious about a Reagan-Ford ticket, but I honestly think—and not because I was the beneficiary of this—that it would have been a disaster to have what would have appeared to have been a co-presidency.

Jerry Ford was decent, honorable, trustworthy, down-to-earth. That was his whole personality. I hope it will be his legacy.

'I was grateful for his counsel'

Thirty-two years ago, when President Ford took the oath of office, I was running for Congress in Arkansas. When he pardoned President Nixon on Sept. 8, just two months before the November election, it was an unpopular decision that many did not agree with, including me. It was also a stroke of luck for my campaign. I hit the pardon hard, the campaign took off and I almost won an election that shouldn't have been close.

Twenty-five years later, in 1999, President Ford was awarded both the Presidential Medal of Freedom and the Congressional Gold Medal. At the Medal of Freedom ceremony, I thanked him for his lifelong opposition to racial discrimination, from his time on the Michigan football team to his support for affirmative action during my presidency; for helping to heal our nation as president, ending both the long nightmares of Watergate and Vietnam, and for signing the Helsinki Treaty on Human Rights, which sent a signal of hope to oppressed people the world over and hastened the demise of communism.

At the Congressional Gold Medal ceremony, I was able to say something publicly about Ford that needed to be said by a Democratic president: "When you made your healing decisions ... it was easy for us to criticize you, because we were caught up in the moment. You didn't get caught up in the moment, and you were right."

After Gerald Ford left the White House, I was grateful for his counsel, for his occasional support on important national issues, for the respectful way in which he articulated his honest disagreements with my policies, for a few unforgettable golf games and for the partnership he forged with President Carter, which I have tried to emulate in my work with former president Bush.

All presidents serve in particular moments of history with unique challenges, but all are bound to advance America's eternal mission to form a more perfect union. With dignity, candor and strength, Gerald Ford met his test, lifting burdens from our shoulders, getting the country moving forward again. He deserved the long, good life God gave him, and will always deserve the gratitude of all his fellow citizens. America is better for his service.

Nancy Reagan

Former First Lady

'Always the gentleman'

I will forever recall the most exciting convention of them all, in 1976. The nomination process went right down to the wire. Ronnie's supporters were very enthusiastic, but in the end Jerry was finally nominated. Jerry was very gracious and asked Ronnie to come down to the stage, adding, "Bring Nancy, too!"

At first Ronnie refused, but Jerry wouldn't take no for an answer, and insisted. All the way down to the stage Ronnie kept asking, "What will I say?" and I kept thinking, I sure hope he thinks of something! And of course he did.

That was so typical of Jerry—always the gentleman. While Ronnie and Jerry may have run against each other for office, that was just politics. On a personal level, we all had great respect for one another and enjoyed a very good friendship.

Brent Scowcroft

National-Security Adviser

'He had no hang-ups'

Ford liked to get all his advisers around and liked to sit there and listen to them arguing with each other. He had no hang-ups. He had no preconceived notions that he had to fit the facts into.

I remember the last days of Vietnam. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee came down en masse and met with the president. Unanimously, they asked him to withdraw the troops now. He refused. He kept the troops in until the last possible minute so we could pull out as many Vietnamese in jeopardy as possible. It was one of the most courageous moves I'd ever seen.

One of our end-of-the-day meetings stands out in my memory. It was sometime in 1976. I was sitting across from Jerry in the Oval Office. It started out normally enough—talking about campaign items. But he quickly changed the topic. He was in a mood, it seems, where all he wanted to talk about was his kids. The only problem was that Henry Kissinger was waiting outside with some important international issues. But Jerry just kept going, and I thought, Well, I guess this is what is most important to him. He finished up, eventually, so I left and Kissinger went in. Looking back, that moment showed me what Gerald Ford's priorities were. His family was first. That impressed me.

James Cannon

Aide, Biographer

'His greatest regret ... '

I once asked him what was his greatest regret in life. He thought for a moment and said, "Well, I wanted to play more football as a sophomore and junior, but one year ahead of me, Michigan also had an All-American center, Chuck Bernard. I was the better offensive center, but Chuck was 25 pounds heavier and better on defense. And in those days a coach played one guy. So that was my great regret." "But, Mr. President," I said, "what about losing the election in '76?" He laughed and said, "Oh, well, that too."

'He Moved With Calm'

I first met President Ford in the mid-1960s, when I was a professor at Harvard. I was conducting a defense-policy seminar. It was customary to invite people from Washington, and I invited President Ford, then a congressman, to come and talk about the appropriations process. We stayed in loose touch afterward. When I came to Washington in 1969, I had contact with him in the normal course of White House consultations, and we always had a friendly but not close relationship. Then, when he became vice president, we had a warm relationship, and I would brief him. (Nixon always wanted to be sure that he knew when briefings took place with both Agnew and Ford.)

After Nixon told Ford of the decision to resign, Ford's first call was to me. He invited me to continue in office and asked what I thought needed to be done immediately. I told him that from the foreign-policy point of view, it was important that he establish himself immediately to be in charge, and he therefore needed to see all the ambassadors accredited to Washington in the first three or four days (some of them in groups), and letters had to go to the major countries. This was necessary so that the world's governments could have a first-hand report of a president fully in command. It was a formidable assignment, and he did not blink an eye.

The overall task he faced in the White House in the early days was infinitely harder than that of a normal president. He took over at perhaps the most perilous moment of domestic crisis since the Civil War, and he had neither the months of transition a new president normally has, nor the honeymoon a new president normally has. But he moved with calm and surefootedness into what could have been an overpowering experience. He took over in the middle of a Greek-Turkish crisis over Cyprus, a group of Arab foreign ministers were literally on their way to Washington for previously scheduled meetings, and we were amidst continuing negotiations over nuclear weapons with the Soviet Union. He never showed stress, he never lost his temper, he never showed anxiety. He was a man of extraordinary good sense. He did not pretend to be a great student of foreign policy, but he had great experience in the negotiations that are conducted in the Congress, and he knew a lot about defense planning. His attitude was that he was blessed to be of service to his country.

His presidency was about restoring a degree of hope and civility to American politics. His 29 months in office also resulted in major achievements. The European security conference laid the basis from which the East European satellites were finally overthrown, and there was the first political agreement between Israel and Egypt, one that was achieved through the very active engagement of President Ford. The establishment of majority rule in southern Africa was also achieved by American leadership in the Ford years.

The great contribution of President Ford was that he managed to strike a balance between the American temptation toward perfectionism and the absolute, and the temptation to abandon everything because one cannot have the perfect and the absolute. He brought about an approach that I believe is essential to the conduct of a continuing foreign policy that works toward the maximum one can achieve but does not go beyond what the American people can sustain or what the international community can comprehend. Another essential factor was the warm personal relations between President Ford and the European allies, relations that lasted all their lives. Confidence in America is an important element for international order, and President Ford supplied that to a wonderful degree.

A Good President (USNEWS)

By David Gergen

U.S. News and World Report, January 2, 2007

The historian Arthur Schlesinger Jr. pointed out some years ago that presidential reputations move in cycles, rising and falling as we look back with fresh eyes. Thomas Jefferson has toppled from his pedestal, thanks to modern DNA tests, while John Adams has risen, thanks to David McCullough. John F. Kennedy maintains his popularity among the public but has slipped among historians, while Ronald Reagan continues to climb among both.

But if there is any reputation that has been wholly transformed, surely it is that of Gerald Ford. His pardon of Richard Nixon a month after taking office not only ignited a firestorm but turned him into a target of criticism and merciless ridicule. On its cover, for example, New York magazine ran a fake photo of Bozo the Clown sitting in the Oval Office with a headline, "Ladies and Gentlemen, the President of the United States." Inside, journalist Richard Reeves wrote: "It is not a question of saying the emperor has no clothes–there is a question of whether there is an emperor." A year later, echoing the sentiment of the times, Reeves wrote a book arguing that "Ford is slow. He is also unimaginative and not very articulate." On Saturday Night Live, Chevy Chase made a name for himself by depicting Ford as a hopeless buffoon.

Yet, even before he died and the nation began its mourning, Ford began a long-overdue renaissance. The Kennedy Library, in a decision cherished by Ford, gave him its Profile in Courage Award for the pardon. Richard Reeves manfully recanted, writing a piece in American Heritage entitled "I'm Sorry, Mr. President." Historian Edmund Morris concluded: "Gerald Ford was our most underrated president."

Why does Ford look so much better in the rearview mirror? Mostly, I suspect, because the personal qualities that he brought to public life seem so scarce these days. The simplicity of his burial reminds us again that Ford was, first and foremost, a humble man of the Midwest. When Richard Nixon was president, every chair around the cabinet table was the same height save one–Nixon's, which had a back 3 inches higher. The day after Ford's inauguration, I slipped into the Cabinet Room and saw that every single chair, including the president's, was the same height. Not for him the arrogance of power we see so much of these days.

Ford also searched for the best people to help him and insisted they give him their unvarnished views. Over time, he built one of the best cabinets in contemporary history, and as they debated in front of him, Ford engaged in what Warren Bennis calls "deep listening" before he made the call. While conservative by inclination, Ford was guided less by ideology than by a pragmatic judgment of what was best for the nation. He vetoed big spending bills, but he also granted amnesty for draft dodgers and pursued détente with Moscow. It's revealing but no real surprise to learn now that he opposed the war in Iraq. This was a man who was healthy in both body and spirit.

A man to trust. But most of all, Ford brought a forthright honesty to politics. In his two dozen years in Congress, he built up trust on both sides of the aisle, so that when Nixon wanted John Connally to replace Spiro Agnew in the vice presidency, Democratic leaders Mike Mansfield and Carl Albert persuaded him instead to choose Ford–the man they trusted. As he testified to the Congress before taking office, Ford believed, "Truth is the glue that holds government together, not only government but civilization itself."

Bob Hartmann, who had served Ford well for years on Capitol Hill, remembers accompanying him into the Cabinet Room hours after his inauguration for an important ritual: selecting portraits of three former presidents to display on the walls. Nixon had chosen Teddy Roosevelt, Woodrow Wilson, and Dwight Eisenhower–men who had inspired his own dreams. Pondering for a moment, Ford decided to keep Ike and to replace TR with Lincoln.

"The other might be a Democrat," Hartmann suggested. "How about Andy Jackson?" "No. Harry Truman," Ford answered, remembering how Truman, too, had been drawn to the White House by fate and how he had fared. Searching for words, Hartmann told his friend, "You are going to be a great president." "Thanks, Bob," Ford responded. "I don't know about that. But I want to be a good president."

And so he was–good in the best sense of the word.

Jerry Ford In History (USNEWS)

By Michael Barone

Gerald Ford, who died last week at age 93, lived longer than any other president and survived after leaving office longer than any other president but Herbert Hoover. So we've had time to reflect on where he and his presidency stand in history. As commentators have been reminding us, Ford healed the wounds of Watergate and provided steady leadership in difficult times. But there is more to be said.

Ford came to office when the postwar consensus on foreign and economic policy was in ruins. The nation seemed on a downward trajectory at home and abroad. By dint of hard work and with the help of top-flight appointees, he helped to steer us toward a different course. This despite the fact that he was very much part of the postwar consensus himself. He was elected to Congress in 1948, defeating an isolationist Republican incumbent: This was a victory for the bipartisan Cold War policies of President Harry Truman and of Republican Sen. Arthur Vandenberg, who, like Ford, was from Grand Rapids.

In the House, Ford served on the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee and specialized in defense and foreign policy, mostly supporting the Truman, Eisenhower, Kennedy, and Johnson administrations at a time when politics tended to stop at the water's edge. On domestic policy, Ford took a standard Republican line, favoring less spending than Democrats but declining to challenge New Deal programs. He supported some limits on labor unions but basically accepted the postwar consensus that big decisions should be hammered out by big government, big business, and big labor.

Loyalist. In 1973, Ford was thinking about retiring from Congress: He might have gone on to play golf in Rancho Mirage, Calif., and ski in Vail, Colo., entirely out of the public eye. History had other ideas. When Vice President Spiro Agnew was pushed to resign, Richard Nixon needed to appoint a loyalist who could be confirmed by a Democratic Congress: Ford filled the bill. When Nixon was forced to resign, Ford was suddenly president. The postwar consensus was gone. Since 1968, there had been fierce debate about Vietnam; most Democrats wanted to slash defense spending, while conservatives grumbled about Nixon's détente with the Soviet Union and opening to China. Nixon's Keynesian economic policies and the oil shock of 1973 produced a sharp recession and high inflation-stagflation. Experts told Americans that the days of low-inflation growth were over and that America was in retreat in the world. The trajectory would be ever downward.

Ford did not succeed in turning that around instantly. But he put into place policies that in time directed those trajectories upward. His negotiations with the Soviet Union and our European allies produced the Helsinki Accords, which ratified the status quo in Eastern Europe but also contained human-rights provisions that in the 1980s helped to delegitimize the Soviet empire. Ford was forced to accept the Communist victory in Vietnam (because Congress would not fund aid promised to our allies) but was able to respond vigorously to the attack on the Mayagüez. At home, he moved toward policies to tamp down inflation and to start the deregulation of transportation and communications, which vastly increased the productivity and resilience of the American economy.

Politically, Ford was written off as a failure. He nearly lost the 1976 Republican nomination to Ronald Reagan, and he lost the general election to Jimmy Carter. The Reagan challenge-and Ford's own dumping of Vice President Nelson Rockefeller-showed that the Republican Party was shifting to the right, away from the postwar consensus. But Ford's rally in the general election, from 25 points behind in the polls to only a 50 to 48 percent defeat, showed that the Republican Party had greater residual strength in the wake of the collapse of the postwar consensus than most people thought.

Ford was ridiculed as a bumbler though he was a gifted athlete and was dismissed as a lightweight though he entered the White House with a considerable command of foreign and domestic policy. He healed the nation and, more important, proved that it was possible to get America off its downward trajectory and heading upward again, as it did in the 1980s. Something to remember in these pessimistic times.

Ford's Long Shadow (NSWK)

By Michael Beschloss

Newsweek, January 2, 2007

Jan. 8, 2007 issue - He was a larger figure than you might have thought. Many familiar personalities—politicians, movie stars, newscasters—are smaller in fact than they are on television or in photographs. In his 1970s-modern desert house in Rancho Mirage, Calif., or his mountainside ski retreat in Beaver Creek, Colo., however, Gerald Ford was striking: lean, muscular and imposing into his 90s.

Before he died last week at 93, Ford had also become an imposing figure in American history. The 38th president, who will be mourned at services this week in Washington and Michigan, helped shape America in two different centuries. He was a product of the Depression, a World War II Navy hero, a cold-war leader in the House and vice president and president at a time when America was struggling to get past an unpopular war in Vietnam and the Watergate scandal of Richard Nixon.

For a reminder of what a difference it made that Jerry Ford became president in August 1974, think of this: if Congress had let Nixon nominate his first choice for vice president after Spiro Agnew's resignation in disgrace, ex-Texas governor John Connally would have been the 38th president. That same month, Connally was indicted for perjury and obstruction of justice in a separate scandal. (He was later acquitted.) Would faith in our system have survived after we watched a president and vice president quit, only to see a new president indicted as he was sworn in?

The student of history can detect Gerald Ford's influence on America from Watergate to Iraq, from the presidencies of Richard Nixon to George W. Bush. President for just 29 months, Ford changed the way we live, rescuing the White House from scandal, restoring a measure of confidence in politics and articulating a philosophy of robust executive power that influences President Bush even now. Ford's last two chiefs of staff, Vice President Dick Cheney and ex-Defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld—men whose understanding of executive power was shaped by their experience in Ford's White House—have been crucial figures in the Bush years.

Ford's most controversial decision, of course, was to pardon Nixon for any crimes he might have committed in his White House years. In that dark September 1974, there were charges of secret deals, and complaints that Ford had foreclosed the possibility that justice would be done. Yet as the years passed, more Americans came to see the pardon as an act of unusual statesmanship. "I was hurt by the lack of understanding of what I did," Ford told NEWSWEEK's Jon Meacham in 2004. "In retrospect, I look back and I understand it, but boy, at the time, as you know, I caught unshirted hell. That so many people came to see my reasoning, and agree with it, makes me feel pretty good."

Ford had reason to glow: in the space of 30 years, he completed the journey from historical footnote and mid-1970s punch line to statesman. As he grew older, he also increasingly moved to the center. He was privately critical of Bush's Iraq war and was also surprised by Cheney's growing hawkishness. He has been quoted criticizing President Bush's Iraq war, and marveled to friends that Cheney had grown so much more hawkish.

In September 1995, at the suggestion of NEWSWEEK's then editor, the late Maynard Parker, I called on President Ford one afternoon in Beaver Creek for a conversation about his life and career. Our ground rules were that I would divulge nothing about our talk until after his death, which would allow him to speak more freely than normal. Reminded of these, Ford replied in lawyerly fashion: "I accept."

In hindsight, what stands out most from our talk was Ford's frustration that the Republican Party had lurched so far to the right. "If I'd been elected in '76," he told me flatly, "the party wouldn't be as far right as it is at the present time … I sure hope it comes back to the center." Ford went on to complain about the 1992 GOP convention in Houston, where Pat Buchanan—who had challenged President George H.W. Bush for that year's party nomination—demanded that conservatives "take back our culture."

Ford told me, "My wife and I are moderate Republicans. We felt uncomfortable at the last [1992] convention. And … unless things change, we'll feel uncomfortable in the next one—if we go." (They went.) Ford lamented that George H.W. Bush had not reversed their party's rightward movement: "I was disappointed that George didn't fight a little harder against the hard right." Asked to reply to the remark last week, the senior Bush said: "He never told me that, but that's not surprising. He was a much more moderate guy in his later years."

In Beaver Creek, Ford reminded me that he and Betty were "pro-choice." He criticized Bush Senior's public avowal that he had come to oppose abortion rights. "I know damn well that he and Barbara are pro-choice," Ford told me. "Why didn't they get up and say it? That really disappointed me more than anything." Ford's comment, Bush says, was off the mark. "That's wrong," he says of Ford's suggestion that Bush was secretly pro-choice. (Barbara Bush wrote about her own pro-choice views in her 1994 memoir.)

Bush 41 was not the only Republican successor Ford criticized in our talk. He complained that Ronald Reagan had cost him the 1976 election by challenging his nomination. Ford told me that in the spring of 1976, "we thought we would have a tough time [winning] anyhow, and then to get diverted for six months or more in a very rigorous [primary] campaign—it made it difficult to be president and campaign simultaneously."

Ford said that during his fall campaign against Jimmy Carter, "the only time [Reagan] appeared with me … was when … we had a nice, vigorous rally [at a fund-raising dinner] in Los Angeles … He made no other campaign appearances on my behalf … I never understood that. If he had made an appearance in Ohio … Louisiana and Mississippi, we would have won, I'm sure." Ford added: "I never asked him about it. There was no point … I can't imagine him wanting Jimmy Carter to be president. What went through his mind, I don't know." (In fairness to Reagan, the ex-California governor did make TV spots for the Ford-Dole ticket that fall.)

Despite what he considered to be Reagan's damage to his candidacy, Ford campaigned enthusiastically when Reagan was nominated against Jimmy Carter in 1980. "I felt that Carter had been so mediocre on domestic policy that we had to have a change," Ford told me. Foreign policy, too: Ford speculated that he and Secretary of State Henry Kissinger "could have gotten the shah to handle his problems differently" to prevent Iran's turn to Islamic fundamentalism.

After Reagan's election, Ford was disappointed that, despite his contribution to the victory, the 40th president didn't consult him "as much as I would have expected he would." In our talk, Ford inveighed against Reagan's budget deficits: "With all his pronouncements about needing to balance the federal budget, his eight years were about as bad as any in the history of the country." Still, he conceded that as president, Reagan "did a much better job than I expected."

Ford knew the best-known act of his own presidency would be Nixon's pardon. He insisted to me he had no second thoughts: "I felt so strongly that I had to get this damn thing off my desk." He admitted that "sure, I would have appreciated it" if, in return, Nixon had made a stronger statement confessing guilt for Watergate offenses, which would have helped shield Ford from the firestorm the pardon created.

In our conversation, Ford said he suspected that the reason Nixon had refused to sign such a confession was that Alexander Haig, the chief of staff he had inherited from Nixon, had tipped off his exiled old boss that Ford was going to pardon him. (Haig strongly denies this.) Ford said he was "shocked and saddened" when he discovered years later (from James Cannon's 1994 book "Time and Chance") "what the role of Al Haig turned out to be. At the time, I had no idea. I assumed he was totally loyal to me … I'm sure what Haig apparently transmitted to Nixon convinced Nixon that he didn't have to make an outright admission of guilt."

Historians will treat Ford kindly. A tough-minded politician, he was a decent man who came to symbolize an American longing for bipartisanship and courage. We may marvel that Ford could remain so good-hearted amid such a toxic political environment. In our talk, Ford recalled that when he was vice president during Watergate, his "old friend" Nixon kept offering him his private "personal assurance" that there was nothing to worry about. "'Of course, Jerry, I had nothing to do with it! I was so preoccupied with foreign-policy decisions—the Soviets, China'."

The 38th president looked directly at me and asked, "Wouldn't you believe him?"

Ford Without Tears (WSJ)

By Peggy Noonan

The Wall Street Journal, January 2, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0110948

One of the greatest things about Gerald Ford as a former president was that he didn't say much. He had no need for the spotlight. He was modest in the old-fashioned way of stepping aside and not getting in the way of the new guy.

He kept a lot to himself. This was in part because he had a self to leave it to.

It must have taken some effort. The man who replaced him, Jimmy Carter, was a kind of non-Ford, offering personal goodness as his main calling card. He carried his own garment bag. He was not imperial. He was awfully proud of his humility. The man who followed him, Ronald Reagan, differed from Ford not so much characterologically as politically, and his success might have grated on his old foe. But it doesn't seem to have. Ford seemed happy when things turned out well for America. That was apparently his primary interest.

He seemed lacking in vanity. There is no evidence that he was obsessed with his legacy. He didn't worry and fret about whether history would fully capture and proclaim his excellence, and because of this he didn't always have to run around proving he was right. He just did his best and kept walking. What a grown-up thing to do. Former, current and future presidents would do well to ponder this approach. History would treat them more kindly. The legacy of a man who spends his time worrying about his legacy is always: He worried about his legacy.

Now we know Ford was not silent but discreet. He granted an interview with Bob Woodward in July 2004, to be released posthumously, in which he shared his views. Mr. Woodward reports Ford told him he would not have gone to war in Iraq based on the public information available at the time. "I don't think I would have ordered the Iraq war. I would have maximized our effort through sanctions, through restrictions, whatever, to find another answer."

This is the authentic voice of the American foreign-policy establishment, and it reminds me, among other things, that establishments are not all bad. They rise for a reason. One is an ability to apprehend reality.

By speaking posthumously, Ford gave his words greater weight. He did not insert himself into the current debate, and because he wasn't in the fight he had nothing to gain or lose, no position to defend or attack. And so he could tell the truth as he saw it.

It is not clear who will speak at his funeral, but it is now unfortunately common practice for politicians to see every eulogy as an opportunity. Invited to reflect on biography, they tend to smuggle in as much autobiography as they can, and advance their personal agendas. If Bill Clinton speaks, one suspects he will laud Ford's personal tolerance. The text: This was a man who did not judge others. The subtext: He wouldn't have voted to impeach me! If George W. Bush speaks he will likely laud Ford as an exemplar of the old bipartisanship. In this way he will attempt to confer the bipartisan mantle on himself. And so on. I don't suppose this is terribly harmful, but it often gives short shrift to the departed. Still, Gerald Ford, a practical man who enjoyed the hit and tackle of politics, would have understood. Would have chuckled, in fact.

There are three points about Ford that I'm not sure can ever be sufficiently appreciated.

The first is that when he pardoned Richard Nixon, he threw himself on a grenade to protect the country from shame, from going too far. It was an act of deep political courage, and it was shocking. Almost everyone in the country hated it, including me. But Ford was right. Richard Nixon had been ruined, forced to resign, run out of town on a rail. There was nothing to be gained -- nothing -- by his being broken on the dock. What was then the new left would never forgive Ford. They should thank him on their knees that he deprived history of proof that what they called their idealism was not untinged by sadism.

Second, Ford's personal dignity -- his plain Midwestern rectitude, his old-style, pipe-smoking American normality, and his characterological absence of bile, spite and malice -- helped the nation over and through the great tearing of the fabric that was Watergate. This is often referred to, and yet it is hard to communicate what a relief it was. Whether right or wrong, hopeless or wise, a normal man was in charge. This was a balm, a real gift to the country.

Third, he did not understand, and so was undone by, the rise of the modern conservative movement. He did not understand the prairie fire signaled by the California tax revolt, and did not see it roaring east. He did not fully understand how offended the American public was by endless government spending and expanding federal power. He did not see the growing estrangement between Republicans on the ground and a leadership they saw as tax collectors for the welfare state. He did not fully appreciate the public desire for a fresher, more candid attitude toward the Soviet Union, and communism in general. He was not at all alive to what would prove to be deep national qualms about abortion. He was not aware of its ability to alarm, to waken the sleepy Evangelicals of the South and the urban ethnics of the North, who'd previously been content to go with the Democratic flow. Ford was oblivious to this. He thought in his own stolid way that abortion was pretty much an extension of the new feminist movement, which he supported. How could a gallant fella not?

In all this he proved that it is not enough in politics to be good. You have to have vision. You have to be able to see. If you can't, they can tell, and they'll retire you.

Which Republicans almost did in the great Ford-Reagan primary of 1976, and the electorate did later that fall.

And yet. This must be said and should be said. He was a good man, and that's not nothing -- it's something. Gerald Ford fought for his country. He didn't indulge his angers and appetites. He seems to have thought, in the end, that such indulgence was for sissies -- it wasn't manly. He was sober-minded, solid, respecting and deserving of respect. And at that terrible time, after Watergate, he picked up the pieces and then threw himself on the grenade.

We were lucky to have him. We were really lucky to have him. Rest in peace.

The Quality Of His Mercy (WP)

By Jon Meacham

In history's light, the defining hour of Gerald Ford's presidency came at 11 o'clock on the morning of Sunday, Sept. 8, 1974, when he announced his pardon of Richard Nixon. The country has already heard much about Ford's role in healing the nation after Watergate and will undoubtedly hear more such reflections this morning when his life is commemorated at the Washington National Cathedral. It is fitting that these words will echo through the great nave, for Ford was, in a quiet, unnoticed way, an important figure in America's public religion.

During his most critical moments in the White House -- his assumption of power and the pardoning of Nixon -- Ford drew deeply on theological imagery. Everyone knows that Ford said "My fellow Americans, our long national nightmare is over" on Aug. 9, 1974. Much less quoted, but perhaps more revealing given the pardon, is a sentence he spoke a moment later: "[T]here is a higher Power, by whatever name we honor Him, who ordains not only righteousness but love, not only justice but mercy."

There were many reasons for the pardon that came a month later, but Ford also framed the decision in religious terms, terms that go far beyond routine political rhetoric. "I have promised to uphold the Constitution, to do what is right as God gives me to see the right, and to do the very best that I can for America," Ford said that September Sunday. As God gives me to see the right: The phrase echoes Lincoln's Second Inaugural, itself a piece of American scripture.

Then Ford explicitly spoke of the "higher power" he had mentioned when he was sworn in. "The Constitution is the supreme law of our land, and it governs our actions as citizens. Only the laws of God, which govern our consciences, are superior to it." In a New Testament allusion ("Then Peter opened his mouth, and said, Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons: But in every nation he that feareth Him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with Him"), Ford said: "I deeply believe in equal justice for all Americans, whatever their station or former station. The law, whether human or divine, is no respecter of persons; but the law is a respecter of reality." The reality, Ford thought, was that a trial of the former president would most likely be unfair, drawn out and destructive. And finally: "I do believe, with all my heart and mind and spirit, that I, not as president but as a humble servant of God, will receive justice without mercy if I fail to show mercy."

This is an extraordinary thing to say: Ford was linking his own fate beyond time to his actions within time. The idea that God punishes or rewards us, individually or collectively, for what we do on Earth, either in our own lives or in the life of the nation, is rooted in the American story. Abigail Adams believed a dysentery epidemic in Boston might be divine punishment for slavery; even Thomas Jefferson, whose religious ideas were, to say the least, unorthodox (he once took a razor to the Gospels, excising miraculous details he found implausible), believed there was a connection between the nation's conduct and the supernatural. Reflecting on slavery, he once said: "I tremble for my country when I reflect that God is just, that his justice cannot sleep forever."

Such an understanding, naturally, has hardly been unanimous, and many Americans are reasonably uncomfortable with the idea that our leaders think they are either communing with the divine or carrying out God's mission. "Religion and government are certainly very different things, instituted for different ends," said the Founding-era politician John Dickinson, "the design of one being to promote our temporal happiness; the design of the other to procure the favor of God, and thereby the salvation of our souls. While these are kept distinct and apart, the peace and welfare of society is preserved, and the ends of both are answered.

By mixing them together, feuds, animosities and persecutions have been raised, which have deluged the world in blood, and disgraced human nature."

Time and again in the American experience, however, the culture has been more in line with Lincoln's -- and Ford's -- views on the question of religious expression and thought in the public sphere than it has been to that of strict separationists. Guarding against excessive religious influence in our public affairs is an unending task, and the virtues of justice and merc y are universal (or should be).

"I am charged with being a preacher," Theodore Roosevelt once said. "Well, I suppose I am. I have such a bully pulpit." In his quiet way, Gerald Ford used that pulpit more than most, and his essential message -- of forgiveness and grace -- is one worth remembering today, and in years to come.

Chief Justice Calls For Judges' Pay Hike (AP)

By Pete Yost

AP, January 2, 2007

Pay for federal judges is so inadequate that it threatens to undermine the judiciary's independence, Chief Justice John Roberts says in a year-end report critical of Congress.

Issuing an eight-page message devoted exclusively to salaries, Roberts says the 678 full-time U.S. District Court judges, the backbone of the federal judiciary, are paid about half that of deans and senior law professors at top schools.

In the 1950s, 65 percent of U.S. District Court judges came from the practicing bar and 35 percent came from the public sector. Today the situation is reversed, Roberts said, with 60 percent from the public sector and less than 40 percent from private practice.

Federal district court judges are paid $165,200 annually; appeals court judges make $175,100; associate justices of the Supreme Court earn $203,000; the chief justice gets $212,100.

Thirty-eight judges have left the federal bench in the past six years and 17 in the past two years.

The issue of pay, says Roberts, "has now reached the level of a constitutional crisis."

"Inadequate compensation directly threatens the viability of life tenure, and if tenure in office is made uncertain, the strength and independence judges need to uphold the rule of law — even when it is unpopular to do so — will be seriously eroded," Roberts wrote.

Legislation languished in Congress in 2006 that would have provided a 16 percent increase in federal judges' salaries. The bill was introduced by Democratic Sens. Dianne Feinstein of California, Patrick Leahy of Vermont and John Kerry of Massachusetts.

Leahy, incoming chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said Roberts "is right that the issue of judicial compensation relations to the issue of the independence of the judiciary." Leahy said the chief justice "has tackled a touchy but timely topic that has been a chronic sticking point between the judicial and legislative branches."

Over the past 16 years, Congress has provided the judiciary occasional cost-of-living adjustments, but Roberts said the absence of salary increases is "grievously unfair."

Leahy pledged "to do what I can to convince Congress to fairly evaluate this issue and the chief's arguments so that we can see what solutions may be possible."

It is the first time in the two-decade history of year-end reports by Roberts and his predecessor, the late William Rehnquist, that the chief justice's message has focused entirely on a single subject.

Roberts said the judiciary will not properly serve its constitutional role if it is restricted to people so wealthy that they can afford to be indifferent to the level of judicial compensation, or to people for whom the ju dicial salary represents a pay increase.

There are "very good judges" in both of those categories, said Roberts, but a judiciary drawn more and more from only those categories "would not be the sort of judiciary on which we have historically depended to protect the rule of law in this country."

"It changes the nature of the federal judiciary when judges are no longer drawn primarily from among the best lawyers in the practicing bar," Roberts wrote.

The number of cases filed in the Supreme Court increased for the court's 2005 term, according to an appendix to the report. Supreme Court case filings rose by more than 1,000 to 8,521 from the previous term. Appeals court filings dropped by 3 percent to 66,618 in 2006 compared with 2005.

In federal district courts, the number of criminal cases filed in 2006 declined by 4 percent to 66,860 cases and 88,216 defendants, due to changing priorities directing more resources to combating terrorism.

The civil caseload rose 2 percent to 259,541.

Excluding a jump in asbestos-related cases which totaled 18,179, the civil caseload fell by 4 percent.

Pilot Errs Over Bush Ranch (NYT)

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 1 (AP) — A small plane twice strayed into restricted airspace over President Bush's ranch in Crawford, Tex., on Sunday night, the authorities said Monday. The violation was inadvertent, a spokeswoman for the Federal Aviation Administration said.

The propeller plane wandered into restricted airspace around 11:30 p.m. local time Sunday, causing the scrambling of F-16 fighter jets, an Air Force spokeswoman said.

The jets used flares to get the attention of the pilot, who landed and was interviewed before being sent on his way, according to the North American Aerospace Defense Command and the Secret Service.

The Deep Blue Highway (NYT)

By JOHN CURTIS PERRY, SCOTT BORGERSON And ROCKFORD WEITZ

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

Medford, Mass.

IN October President Bush signed the Safe Port Act, authorizing an investment of $6.7 billion to tighten security at American ports. This is a vitally important and overdue step. But it ignores another major problem in maritime commerce: the phenomenal decline of American shipping.

While it's true that the United States Navy still dominates the world ocean — its total tonnage equals the combined tonnage of the next 17 smaller navies — American commercial shipping is but a puny remnant of its former self.

In 1948, more than a third of the world's merchant fleet flew the stars and stripes; today that figure is down to 2 percent. Half a century ago, America built more ships than any other nation, and New York City could boast that it was the world's busiest seaport. Sliding from the top since the 1980s, New York now barely ranks among the top 20.

The only American port now on the top-10 list is Los Angeles-Long Beach, an indication of how much maritime trade has shifted from the North Atlantic to the North Pacific.

A major factor in the decline of American shipping has been an antiquated law that prevents American coastal shippers from buying ships made in other countries. By amending this law and, at the same time, encouraging the development of domestic coastal shipping, Congress could help restore America's status as a great and proud maritime nation.

The slump in American shipping is especially surprising when you consider that it was American entrepreneurs who, in the mid-20th century, revolutionized oceanic transport by creating both the standard-size steel shipping container and the supership capable of transporting 50 times as much cargo as a World War II-era merchant ship could.

Shipping has always been the most economically efficient way to carry goods from place to place; it requires no investment in highways or rails, and thanks to the relatively frictionless ease with which ships move across water, fuel costs per ton are low. The arrival of containerized shipping pushed transport costs even lower, swelling world trade and expanding global wealth.

The export-driven economies of Pacific Asia built much of their enormous success upon the new maritime technologies. The United States did not. The Merchant Marine Acts of the 1920s and '30s are one reason why.

Intended to protect the domestic shipbuilding industry, the acts decreed that the only ships allowed to call on two or more consecutive American ports would be those built in the United States, owned by American companies, flying the American flag and operated by American crews.

At the time, the United States still had a large merchant marine. But the acts' restrictions handicapped coastal shipping within American waters, opening the way for the growth of the trucking and freight-rail industries.

To revive the maritime trade, Congress should give shipping companies as much choice in buying ships as their land-based rivals have when buying trucks and train cars.

Freed from the restraints of the Merchant Marine Acts, commercial shippers could not only begin to resume their position in global trade but also handle much more of the freight that moves within our borders. Before railroads and highways were developed, a network of water transportation routes connected America's port cities and towns. Today coastal shipping handles only 2 percent of domestic freight, even though coastal counties hold more than half of the nation's population.

The trucks that carry nearly a third of our cargo clog the highways. That is one reason why Americans now lose at least 3.7 billion hours and 2.3 billion gallons of fuel each year sitting in traffic. Ships could take on a larger share of this freight — and even some of the passengers now traveling by highway and rail — and carry it at lower cost.

Congress could further encourage domestic shipping by improving port facilities, just as it maintains interstate highways. And it could invest in developing ship propulsion technologies — to increase still further maritime savings in fuel costs and to reduce greenhouse gas emissions.

Americans are rightfully concerned about security, but part of protecting the nation is generating a strong economy. Revitalized coastal shipping could shorten our morning commutes as it begins to rejuvenate America's wider maritime economy.

The 'Blue Dog' Factor (USNEWS)

By Danielle Knight

U.S. News and World Report, January 2, 2007

Washington is buzzing with speculation about how incoming moderate freshman Democrats like Heath Shuler of North Carolina will change congressional dynamics. The ex-NFL quarterback will be a member of the "blue dogs," a group of budget-cutting Democrats, mostly from southern states, whose ranks will swell from about 37 to 44 in the new Congress. Shuler defeated eight-term Republican incumbent Rep. Charles Taylor in part because Shuler vowed to fight against special interests. He is also a proud Christian who opposes abortion and loves to hunt. But the 35-year-old strongly favors increasing the minimum wage and protecting the environment, and he opposes privatizing Social Security. Shuler spoke with U.S. News about his role in the 110th Congress.

Why did you join the blue dogs?

We are $9 trillion in debt. It is really unacceptable the way this administration and this past Congress have run our government. We have to find a much better way to balance our budget and use tax dollars much more wisely.

Why is the number of moderate Democrats, like the blue dogs, increasing?

In my conservative district, the people in the middle started to speak out. We've had extremes to the right and extremes to the left doing a lot of talking for the rest of the country, and I think most of the people are in the middle. With this election, you started to see working Americans and working families, the middle class, speak out. A lot more people voted on the issues, and fewer people really voted a straight ticket.

Do you think House Speaker Nancy Pelosi will work well with the blue dogs and other moderates?

I think she will. She realizes the importance of having that voice in the middle, that moderate Democrat. She has been very easy to work with so far, and I think she certainly realizes and understands how it works politically and realizes what happened this election cycle.

In your campaign, you criticized your opponent's use of earmarks. Will you push for limits on so-called pork-barrel spending?

We certainly need to have checks and balances on our spending. There has to be oversight on earmarks to make sure that it is beneficial for a great number of people in the district. And if we don't have the money, then we don't need to spend the money.

DOJ_NMG_0110953

Blue dogs aside, what will you prioritize?

We are striving to bring better jobs to the district, keep our families together here in western North Carolina, and stop outsourcing our jobs. We've lost 78 percent of the textile industries in North Carolina. It's certainly going to be a priority of mine to bring high-quality jobs to the United States and make sure trade agreements are fair to families.

Jobs leaving North Carolina was one thing that led you to politics, right?

There was a factory in Haywood County that had closed down, and I watched a single mom, who had just lost her job because of the effect of the North American Free Trade Agreement, ask how she would raise her two children. I wanted to do what I could to help through my foundation. But as I spoke more about it and asked what I could do to help, people said, 'Heath, you must run for office.'

Economics Is Not For Actuaries (WSJ)

By George Gilder

The Wall Street Journal, January 2, 2007

Would conservatives please forget the Social Security "problem"? As Peter Drucker once wrote in these pages, "Don't solve problems, pursue opportunities." When Republicans solve "problems," they feed their failures, starve their strengths, and fritter away their remaining power in political imbroglios and special interest pork-fests.

Nothing good is going to come from political haggling over some hypothetical Social Security crisis decades in the future, when our economy will be vastly different and hugely more productive. From the completion of a worldwide fiber-optic broadband Internet to cornucopian energy and medical advances, the global economy is engaged in a siege of accelerating innovation that will unify it and enrich it increasingly as time passes. But no legislative reshuffling of taxes and spending today will enhance the economy's ability to support medical care, housing and transport for the aged in the future. That will depend not on actuarial trumpery but on the realities of productivity, technology, immigration and global trade and investment.

The key is keeping the economy open to outside investors as our population ages and as the productive center of the global economy shifts toward Asia. As Michael Milken points out, the younger workers around the globe will use their increasing savings to buy the assets of American seniors as they grow older, thus offering liquidity to our retirees, sustaining U.S. asset prices, and expanding U.S. opportunities.

Social Security can become a crisis only if we try to stop this process by insulating our aging middle class baby-boomers from the world economy -- if we raise tax rates and regulations, bash China, debauch the dollar and cripple the GOP and our defenses with delusionary spending cuts. Yet that sums up the likely grand compact, doesn't it? Higher tax rates in some covert form or other, some jerrybuilt pension scheme full of government regulations on our financial markets, new subsidies and protections for the "middle class" so-called victims of trade, and gimcrack spending cuts that end up focusing on defense.

Instead we should take the offensive. Lower tax rates will yield the additional revenues and borrowing power we need to sustain social programs for the aged for decades to come. As a pay-as-you-go transfer scheme, Social Security is currently working fine. But we have to stop driving aged workers out of employment through implicit Social Security taxes on their incomes. As a key first step, we need to reduce the payroll tax by at least a third -- at least to the degree we are pretending to build up "reserves" for the future. Lower payroll taxes will mean more jobs and income for Americans of all ages, and build up the real capabilities as opposed to the mere accounting balances of the U.S. economy. Ideally, as part of a flat tax program, we should eliminate the payroll tax altogether. Make the Democrats explain why they oppose that, not continue to posture on spending cuts, which always turn out to focus on defense. In a dangerous world, we will need more defense and spending will likely have to rise.

Bad economic policies like Europe's subsidized sloth on welfare would obviously erode our ability to supply goods and services to coming generations. Under such conditions we will have to inflate away the liabilities by debauching the currency in one way or another. Such an outcome may be unappetizing, but no conceivable compact with the Democrats today can save us from the inexorable costs of socialism tomorrow. Indeed, a compact with the Democrats will tend to cripple the necessary Republican resistance.

If we lower our tax rates on payrolls and incomes, however, we will discover that this economy in future decades can easily sustain scores of trillions of dollars of additional debt as necessary -- the entire $45 trillion of alleged social and healthcare liabilities. Investor king Ken Fisher's new book, "The Only Three Questions That Count," shows that the U.S. already commands a steadily growing, world-leading resource of some $110 trillion of assets, generating $13 trillion in GDP -- a 12% yield compared to long-term interest rates near 6%. Following the Bush tax-rate reductions on capital gains and dividends, we are already running an all-governmental surplus. Our corporations are laden with cash. Our current debt-asset ratio is suboptimally conservative.

Now we need to extend tax cuts to incomes and payrolls. The only thing that matters is pursuing the opportunities of global economic growth. Focus on that. Let Democrat accountant-economists grouse about the problem of debt and push for increases in taxes on middle-class workers.

Save Judeo-Christian Values (USAT)

By Virgil Goode

USA Today, January 2, 2007

A letter I sent in early December was written in response to hundreds of e-mails from constituents upset about Rep.-elect Keith Ellison's decision to use the Quran in connection with his congressional swearing-in. Their communications followed media reports that Ellison, a Minnesota Democrat, had said that he would swear on the Quran. He repeated that at a gathering of Muslims in Detroit on Dec. 26.

My letter did not call for a religious test for prospective members of Congress, as some have charged. Americans have the right to elect any person of their choosing to represent them. I indicated to my constituents that I did not subscribe to the Quran in any way, and I intended to use the Bible in connection with my swearing-in. I also stated that the Ten Commandments and "In God We Trust" are on the wall of my office, and I have no intention of displaying the Quran in my office. That is my choice, and I stand by my position and do not apologize for it.

My letter also stated, "If American citizens don't wake up and adopt the Virgil Goode position on immigration there will likely be many more Muslims elected to office and demanding the use of the Quran."

Immigration is arguably the most important issue facing the country today. At least 12 million immigrants are here illegally. And diversity visas, a program initiated in 1990 to grant visas to people from countries that had low U.S. immigration at that time, are bringing in 50,000 a year from various parts of the world, including the Middle East.

Let us remember that we were not attacked by a nation on 9/11; we were attacked by extremists who acted in the name of the Islamic religion. I believe that if we do not stop illegal immigration totally, reduce legal immigration and end diversity visas, we are leaving ourselves vulnerable to infiltration by those who want to mold the United States into the image of their religion, rather than working within the Judeo-Christian principles that have made us a beacon for freedom-loving persons around the world.

Ugly Voices Tarnish Debut Of Congress' First Muslim (USAT)

Keith Ellison's election to the House, as the chamber's first Muslim, provides the United States with a grand opportunity to showcase its credentials as a nation of opportunity, equality and diversity.

What a great story to tell the Muslim world. Five years after 9/11, voters in America's heartland elected Ellison, an African-American who grew up in Detroit and converted to Islam in college, to one of the nation's highest offices. The 43-year-old Democrat took 56% of the vote in his Minneapolis-area district.

Ellison upped the chance to polish America's image for religious tolerance, as well, when he said he'd use Islam's holy book, the Quran, at his ceremonial swearing-in this week.

That's when the chance to shine was tarnished by a few ugly voices. The loudest belongs to Rep. Virgil Goode, R-Va., who used the occasion to take a crude swipe not only at Ellison and the Quran, but at all Muslims.

In a letter to a constituent that later leaked out publicly and reeks with bigotry, Goode railed that "if American citizens don't wake up and adopt the Virgil Goode position on immigration there will likely be many more Muslims elected to office and demanding the use of the" Quran. Goode expressed "fear" that in the next century "we will have many more Muslims" in the USA.

Goode's pinched prescription? Essentially to shut the nation's doors: Stop illegal immigration, reduce legal immigration and end a program designed to draw people from countries with otherwise low U.S. immigration rates.

Other critics of Ellison's desire to carry the Quran, a holy book meaningful to him, ranted that the Bible and only the Bible is the basis of America's values.

They couldn't be more wrong about the essence of the nation's values. Nor could Goode about what the nation has to fear.

They're even wrong on their facts.

As Goode, who is starting his sixth term, surely knows, House members are officially sworn in without any religious book. They simply raise their hands in a mass ceremony in the chamber. In unofficial ceremonies later, they re-enact the oath, often with a Bible, for commemorative photos.

Some Jewish members and others have chosen holy books other than the Bible. Even presidents have strayed from using the Bible when taking the oath of office.

In 1825, John Quincy Adams reportedly used a law volume. News accounts say Theodore Roosevelt used no Bible in taking his first oath of office, in 1901. It's Ellison's constitutional right to choose a book that's meaningful to him.

Tolerance and religious freedom are at America's heart. So is the nation's embrace of people from all countries and cultures.

Several million Muslims live in the USA. It is to the nation's credit that one of them will join Congress this week. And if Goode is worried about Muslim immigrants, he's about 260 years too late in Ellison's case. Ellison traces his ancestors to Louisiana in 1742.

Goode and other critics could learn something from the man whose actions they've vilified. Asked about the controversy on CNN last month, Ellison refused to be drawn into a battle over different holy texts.

"Let's focus on the text that binds us together," Ellison said. "That's the Constitution. That's a great document."

Amen.

Letting Go Of Holds (LAT)

SEN. SAM BROWNBACK (R-Kan.), one of Congress' conservative culture warriors, opposes one of President Bush's judicial nominees because she dared to attend a same-sex commitment ceremony in 2002. Whether they want to enable the senator's bigotry is a question for Kansans and, eventually perhaps, the rest of us (Brownback is a possible 2008 presidential candidate). But the Senate can and should take action to prevent a single senator from imposing his prejudices on the entire body.

A senator can frustrate the will of the Senate by using a "hold," which allows any senator to block a vote on a nominee or piece of legislation. The practice is indefensible even when asserted on behalf of a worthy cause, and even when a senator is open, as Brownback was, about his obstructionism. Rooted in tradition and Senate rules that often require unanimous consent for business to proceed, the hold undermines the principle of majority rule even more than its procedural kissing cousin, the filibuster.

Brownback's hold on Michigan Appeals Court Judge Janet Neff, who was nominated for a federal district judgeship, was an especially obnoxious use of the procedure. Brownback is fixated on the fact that Neff attended and spoke at a ceremony in 2002 at which the daughter of the judge's next-door neighbor exchanged (legally nonbinding) vows with another woman.

Even after saying that he will drop the hold that has stalled action on Neff's confirmation, Brownback still wants to question Neff, absurdly enough, about the ceremony to test his concern that she wouldn't be impartial in cases involving the legality of same-sex marriage. He has, however, dropped his much-ridiculed suggestion that Neff promise to recuse herself from such cases as a condition of being confirmed.

But if Brownback's use of the hold is wrong, so is its use by other senators. Reformers, led by Sens. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa) and Ron Wyden (D-Ore.), are proposing to do away with secret holds, which were supposed to end under an agreement between Democratic and Republican leaders in 1999. The theory behind requiring senators to admit they were placing holds was that they would be embarrassed into giving them up. But, far from being shamed, senators have trumpeted their holds in press releases, as Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and Patty Murray (D-Wash.) did last year when they placed a hold that delayed the confirmation of the chairman of the Food and Drug Administration. That hold was designed to pressure the FDA into approving the over-the-counter sale of the Plan B emergency contraceptive.

Senate rules should be amended to abolish all holds, secret and open, so that no senator can usurp the right of the entire body to judge a nominee or a piece of legislation. The hold is defended as a form of "senatorial courtesy," but it's insulting to the people senators represent.

Economy Poised For '07 Rebound, Forecasters Say (WSJ)

By Mark Whitehouse

The Wall Street Journal, January 2, 2007

The U.S. economy is poised to shake off the housing slump and regain momentum by the end of this year, and the credit goes to techies, bankers, chefs and shoppers, according to a Wall Street Journal survey of economists.

The panel of 60 economists who participated in the Journal's latest semiannual economic forecasting survey offered an optimistic outlook for 2007: The service sector should keep humming along as the recent weakness in housing and manufacturing abates and the Federal Reserve begins to reduce interest rates. That would allow the economy to expand at a rate fast enough to keep investors happy, but slow enough to keep inflation at bay.

Even so, economists haven't stopped worrying about what could happen if the current slowdowns in housing and manufacturing spread further -- a pattern that has characterized previous recessions. In another potentially ominous sign, they increasingly differ about the economy's trajectory.

On average, the economists predict that inflation-adjusted gross domestic product, a broad measure of economic activity, will grow at an annualized rate of 2.3% in the first half of 2007 and 2.8% in the second half. That's up from a sluggish 2% in the third quarter of 2006, but still far below the robust annual growth rates of 3.2% for 2005 and 4.1% for early 2006.

"As long as you don't think the labor market is going to collapse or financial conditions are going to change, then you're starting to have the conditions for better growth down the road," says Bruce Kasman, head of economic research at J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. in New York.

The rapid expansion of technology companies such as Google Inc. and the huge bonuses lavished on New York investment bankers are just a couple of signs of the service sector's strength. Across the country, restaurants, hospitals, software makers and consulting firms are growing and hiring. All told, service businesses, which make up about 80% of the nation's economy, added 1.1 million jobs from May through November.

"We've been extremely busy," says Anthony Kolton, president and chief executive of Logical Information Machines, a Chicago company that provides research software to hedge funds, trading firms and investment banks. "There's a lot of money out there, and people have to put it to work."

The upbeat attitude in services contrasts sharply with the recent pain in the housing and manufacturing sectors. Builders have been slashing prices and production as they attempt to get rid of a large backlog of unsold homes. Despite a rise in November, new-home construction was down 30% from its January peak.

Housing-related industries shed 145,000 jobs from May though November, according to Zoltan Pozsar, an economist at Moody's Economy.com. Falling home values have also left people with less power to extract cash from their homes through home-equity loans and refinancings, a factor that many economists expect to take a bite out of consumer spending.

Along with slumping auto sales, the drop in housing activity has affected all kinds of manufacturers, from drywall factories to furniture makers. The Institute for Supply Management, a purchasing managers' trade group, said that its index of manufacturing activity for November fell to 49.5, the lowest point since April 2003. (Any number below 50 indicates contraction.) By contrast, the ISM's index of service-sector activity for the same month rose.

"It's really two very different economies, depending on whether you're looking at the goods or service industries," says J.P. Morgan's Mr. Kasman.

The bottom line is that the strength in services will help to keep the job market relatively healthy. In the consensus scenario, nonfarm businesses will add about 100,000 jobs a month in 2007. That should be strong enough to slowly lift wages, but not to keep the unemployment rate from creeping up to 4.9% from 4.5% in November.

The economists surveyed expect year-to-year inflation to decline to 1.7% in May from 2.0% in November. As a result, they expect the Fed to shift its focus from fighting inflation to helping the economy grow, lowering short-term interest rates to 4.75% by the end of 2007 from the current 5.25%.

That's a big change from six months ago, when forecasters saw the Fed's battle with inflation as the greatest challenge facing the economy. "The Fed was hoping to slow the economy down enough to take the wind out of inflation without triggering a recession," says Nariman Behravesh, chief economist at consulting firm Global Insight in Waltham, Mass. "So far it looks like it has succeeded."

Most forecasters expect 2007 to be a good -- not great -- year for the economy. While six in 10 said they think the worst of the housing downturn's impact on the broader economy had passed, they still see a deeper housing slump as the biggest risk looming over the economy. That concern was reflected in the odds they placed on a recession in the next 12 months, which rose to 27% from 20% in June.

More so than in recent surveys, forecasters differ on the economic outlook. One measure of their disagreement -- the standard deviation of their forecasts for inflation-adjusted GDP for the coming half year -- widened to about 0.7 percentage point in December, up from a 20-year low of 0.5 percentage point in June. Each of the past two recessions have been preceded by sharp increases in the deviation measure -- to levels greater than one.

Ian Shepherdson, chief U.S. economist at consulting firm High Frequency Economics and one of the survey's most pessimistic forecasters, places the odds of a recession at one in two. He believes that home construction still has a long way to fall before it levels off with demand, and that the Fed's rate increases, which helped push corporate borrowing costs upward by about a full percentage point between fall 2005 and spring 2006, have yet to take their full toll on business activity. Mr. Shepherdson expects real GDP to grow at an annual rate of 0.5% in the first half of 2007 and 2.25% in the second half.

"It's going to be worse than the consensus expects," he says. "My guess is that we'll probably avoid a recession, but by the skin of our teeth."

Most other forecasters believe the economy will prove more resilient. For one, stronger growth abroad should help boost U.S. exports: More than three out of four forecasters pointed to Asia as the biggest contributor to global growth in 2007.

Beyond that, money remains easy to borrow despite the Fed's efforts to raise interest rates. Global investors' appetite for U.S. bonds has helped fuel a boom in mergers and acquisitions, and low long-term interest rates have kept mortgages accessible for potential home buyers. Even people with shaky credit, whose tendency to default has proved greater than many investors expected, still have access to money.

"We've had a remarkably benign credit environment," says Richard Berner, chief U.S. economist at Morgan Stanley in New York. "That's partly a tribute to our flexible and resilient capital markets, but I think it's also just plain good luck."

To some extent, the hit U.S. manufacturing has taken in recent years has made the sector's outlook less consequential today because there just aren't as many American manufacturing jobs left to lose, says Ed Leamer, head of the forecasting center at the University of California's Anderson School of Management. Manufacturing has been shedding jobs since the recession of 2001.

"There's no fat to trim," says Mr. Leamer. "And without the trimming of fat in manufacturing, you just can't get the job loss that can add up to a recession."

Economists Cautiously Optimistic About 2007 (NYT)

By MICHAEL J. De La MERCED

By the end of 2006, Wall Street had every reason to celebrate. A second-half rally propelled the stock market to its best year since 2003. Companies reported strong profits, and some, like oil producers and investment banks, had record-shattering earnings.

Yet the year had a more precarious beginning. Worries were rampant that a slowdown in housing would hurt the overall economy and that the Federal Reserve would raise interest rates and stall growth. But the economy proved resilient, withstanding a housing slump. The Fed halted its campaign for higher interest rates. Profits accelerated, and there was a huge wave of mergers and acquisitions.

Nonetheless, Wall Street economists are looking at 2007 with some caution. They expect at least some slowdown in economic growth. And many worry that housing's slump will spread to other corners of the economy.

The analysts surveyed predicted that the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index, which closed 2006 at 1,418.30, would end 2007 at 1,440 to 1,570.

Richard Bernstein

Chief Investment Strategist

Merrill Lynch

Though concerns mount that the world is suffering from global warming, Richard Bernstein is content to call himself a "bipolar bear." While he foresees returns rising 12 percent over the coming year — and the S.& P. hitting 1,570 by the end of the year — Mr. Bernstein expects increased volatility. That is in large part because the Fed will not ease, or lower rates, in January, he says.

"As the uncertainty about the Fed easing has gone up, you've found that the market has become choppier," he said.

Mr. Bernstein cautioned that he expected growth in gross domestic product to be a full percentage point below other estimates, citing in part a "money illusion" over the growth in the Dow and even in energy prices.

Investors should watch earnings carefully, he said. "There's sort of an embedded assumption that earnings will be going great forever."

Mr. Bernstein recommends a mix of 50 percent stocks, 30 percent bonds and 20 percent cash for investors' portfolios. Among sectors to watch, Mr. Bernstein rated telecommunications as a growth sector, aided by increasing attractiveness in European and Asian companies. "It's one of our turnaround sectors," he said.

He is bearish on energy and commodities, citing their cyclical nature.

Abby Joseph Cohen

Chief Investment Strategist

Goldman Sachs

The coming year looks to be reasonable, if a little slow, said Abby Joseph Cohen, long one of Wall Street's optimists.

"We are assuming profit growth is in the process of deceleration," she said. "Especially in the case of energy companies, we expect that they will show gains for 2007, but they will not show as much of a boost as in previous years."

Still, Ms. Cohen said, her team's research indicates that the S.& P. is underpriced, pointing to a 12-month target of 1,550. Buoyed by the Fed's halt in raising interest rates, merger activity should keep rolling, but with more of a focus on international expansion.

With the slowdown in housing, the economy will rotate toward discretionary consumer services, like travel, restaurants and entertainment, she said. Large-capitalization industrials and information technology may also see favorable growth. Over all, Ms. Cohen said, the economy should run well, with no real bumps in the way.

David Bianco

Chief U.S. Equity Strategist

UBS Investment Research

David Bianco remembers a scary moment from last summer, as he and others feared that the Fed might tighten interest rates. Since then, the stock market has recovered and that forward momentum should carry over into 2007, he said.

"We'll continue to see P/E expansion," Mr. Bianco said of price-to-earnings ratios, "mostly driven by everybody's fears of a weakening economy not taking place."

DOJ_NMG_0110959

Like Ms. Cohen, Mr. Bianco said that he sees the S.& P. as relatively undervalued. Despite the flurry of merger activity in 2006, he believes that the S.& P. has been using less than half of its debt capacity, something he expects to be corrected.

Housing will continue to slow and prices will fall further, taking consumer-related spending and industries like autos along with it, he said.

Abhijit Chakrabortti

Chief U.S. and Global Equity Strategist

J. P. Morgan Chase

Last year can be summed up in one phrase, according to Abhijit Chakrabortti: Value killed growth.

"If you had that the S.& P. would be up for the year, you would have said that tech, industrials and health care would kill value stocks," he said. "But telecoms and utilities were the big winners."

Coming off a surprisingly good 2006, however, Mr. Chakrabortti is distinctly bearish. He sees slower growth in the United States compared with Asia and Europe. Volatility will pick up as earnings slow down, he added, and the dollar will weaken.

The Fed will hold steady, Mr. Chakrabortti said, but other central banks will tighten.

He predicts the S.& P. will rise to 1,440 — the low end of targets among the analysts surveyed.

"I very much suspect that there will be a time when a 1,440 valuation looks good," he said. "The market will be disappointed with the Fed, and we'll see a significant correction sometime in the first half."

Ethan S. Harris

Chief U.S. Economist

Lehman Brothers

Ethan S. Harris said he was less surprised than most by the resilience of the stock market last year. He expects 2007 to be a growth year, albeit one without the boom that marked the last half of 2006.

"There's still room for the market to rally," he said. To that end, he staked an S.& P. price target of 1,570, thanks in large part to the economy shrugging off the housing slump.

But he also said he did not expect a completely rosy economic picture. Alone among economists surveyed, Mr. Harris talked about the possibility of "a very mild version of stagflation." Moreover, he gave recession a 20 percent chance to appear in 2007.

Mr. Bianco said that he expects the Fed to cut interest rates in March, setting a fairly steady metronome for slowing but solid growth and a target S.& P. of 1,500 by year-end.

Profits Likely To Slow In '07 (WSJ)

By Constance Mitchell Ford And Rafael Gerena-morales

The Wall Street Journal, January 2, 2007

NEW YORK -- For the past five years, U.S. corporate profits have grown much faster than the overall economy, one of several reasons why U.S. stock prices keep setting records. But many economists believe that the days of outsize profit growth are nearing an end.

Corporate profits, as measured by the Commerce Department, have risen more than 12% a year since 2002, hitting a high of 19% in 2004. In the third quarter of 2006, profit growth was running at an annualized rate of 16%. But the consensus forecast of economists polled by The Wall Street Journal calls for those gains to slow to the single digits this year and next, with pretax profits rising about 6%.

IN SUMMARY

• The News: Corporate profits are expected to rise about 6%, slowing from the double-digit growth of the past five years.

• What's at Stake: Slower U.S. growth is expected to damp sales across the economy.

• The Bottom Line: Some economists believe single-digit profit growth still leaves room for stocks to rise.

That estimate is for profits across the entire economy, from multinational conglomerates to mom-and-pop businesses. By contrast, profit figures tracked by Wall Street tend to focus mainly on large public companies.

But the trends are similar. Thomson Financial, for example, expects growth in earnings per share for companies in the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index to slip below 10% in 2007. If that forecast is on the mark, it would be the first year of single-digit growth for the S&P 500 since 2002.

"Some of the hot air is coming out of corporate profits," says Maria Fiorini Ramirez, president of MFR Inc. in New York, which is forecasting economywide profit growth of 4% in 2007. "The better years are behind us, and the leaner years are ahead of us."

Among S&P 500 companies, the energy sector's profit is estimated to have grown 21% in 2006 but profits are expected to rise only 1% in 2007, according to Thomson, which surveys Wall Street analysts.

And the profit-growth forecast for the materials sector, which includes metals and chemicals companies and whose profit growth for 2006 is estimated at 28%, has tumbled to 3% for 2007.

There are several reasons why economists expect profits to be leaner in the years ahead. First and foremost, they are expecting growth to slow in response to weakness in the manufacturing sector and in housing, which will damp sales across the entire economy. Most economists are forecasting that the economy, as measured by gross domestic product, before adjustment for inflation, will expand between 4% and 5% this year after growing 6.9% in 2004 and 6.3% in 2005. Nominal growth in GDP for 2006 is expected to be about 6%.

But even if GDP weren't expected to slow, economists would still be looking for profit growth to ease for the same reason that "trees don't grow to the sky," says Jan Hatzius, an economist at Goldman Sachs Group Inc. Put another way, profits can't continue to outpace the overall economy by such large measures for a sustained period. Historically, annual growth rates for GDP and corporate profits have been about the same, between 6% and 7%. Eventually, say economists, the relationship between GDP and profits should return to its historical norm.

"If corporate profits grew persistently faster than nominal GDP, all of the income in the economy would eventually accrue to shareholders, and none to workers. However, there are economic forces that ensure that this doesn't happen," says Mr. Hatzius, who forecasts corporate profit growth of 1.6% in 2007, one of the lowest forecasts among the 60 economists who participated in The Wall Street Journal's economic forecasting survey.

Those forces include rising wage growth. Average hourly earnings, after barely moving for years, have rebounded in recent months and were up 4.1% in November from a year earlier. Average weekly earnings were up 4.4%. Benefits costs are also on the rise.

At the same time, companies are finding it more difficult to raise prices to recoup their higher compensation costs. In fact, some companies are starting to reduce prices to keep consumers spending. "Price discounts are seen all across the retail space -- cars, furniture, electronics, clothing -- and now have spillover to housing as well," says Joseph Carson, chief economist at AllianceBernstein. Such trends, he says, mean that "margin expansion is over." Mr. Carson is forecasting profit growth of 3% for 2007.

There are other pressures on profit margins as well: Energy prices and prices for goods such as chemicals, plastics and metals, are likely to remain elevated amid healthy global demand, taking a bigger bite out of proceeds from sales. And slowing productivity gains in the U.S. could limit the ability of American companies to curb costs. That all translates into less for the bottom line.

So far, the stock market's performance doesn't hint of any slowing of profits. The Dow Jones Industrial Average gained 16% last year, its best performance since 2003.

Of course, 6% growth in profits -- the consensus estimate for 2007 -- isn't so bad when compared with historical growth rates. And in fact, some economists believe that single-digit profit growth still leaves room for stock prices to move higher.

Gail Fosler, chief economist at the Conference Board, a nonprofit business research group, expects profit growth of just 4% in 2007. Nevertheless, she expects stocks to continue to perform well. In recent years, foreign stock markets, including those in Europe and Japan, have recorded big gains that have outpaced the U.S. market's performance. As a result, she says, U.S. stocks have become "a good value" relative to stocks of companies in other nations.

Why Consumers May Show More Discipline In 2007 (CSM)

DOJ_NMG_0110961

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, January 2, 2007

After the usual binge of holiday spending, Americans may want to make a resolution of fiscal prudence for the new year: "I will repair my household finances."

This isn't just advice from financial gurus during an era of record household debt. For many families, fiscal discipline is being imposed by the slowdown in the US housing market. Indeed, the number of homes in foreclosure is rising, as many owners fail to meet their mortgage payments.

But there is good news: For most households, this is a relatively benign climate for financial make-overs.

Many borrowers have the opportunity to refinance their debt at low interest rates. Moreover, forecasters generally don't foresee a recession in 2007. A healthy economy could allow consumers to keep spending even as they borrow less and save more.

"I do think that the savings rate will turn firmly positive by [the end of 2007]," says Mark Zandi of Moody's Economy.com, a forecasting firm in West Chester, Pa. But "there is a significant amount of financial stress in 2007."

Some economists, in fact, believe a recession is likely as faltering home prices put a squeeze on family wealth. But the more common forecast is that the housing slump won't cause an outright downturn in the economy.

Members of the National Association for Business Economics, surveyed in November, generally believe the housing market will hit bottom sometime in 2007.

"It looks like the housing decline is in its last phase," says Peter Kretzmer, an economist at Bank of America in New York.

In any scenario, how homeowners grapple with their debts will be a central feature of the 2007 economy.

Consumer spending accounts for about two-thirds of US economic activity. The more people have to scramble to cover their debt payments, the more they may have to curb other spending.

The challenges are greatest, some analysts say, for young households - people who bought homes near the peak of the real estate boom - and for those with lower incomes who stretched to get credit.

For years, amid a nationwide housing boom, people took out bigger and bigger mortgages, and their property values rose just as fast. Rising home values made people feel wealthier, and Mr. Zandi reckons that this "wealth effect" made people spend more than they otherwise would. The nation's personal-saving rate, the difference between Americans' disposable income and their spending, has been negative since the summer of 2005 - the first time since the Great Depression.

Since then, Americans have essentially been dipping into their savings, or sometimes using credit cards, to spend more than they earn.

There's no guarantee that the saving rate will get back into positive territory in 2007. But some economists see signs that households are adjusting their behavior.

In the late summer of 2005, households borrowed an amount equal to 14.6 percent of their disposable income - the highest level in any quarter since World War II, according to Paul Kasriel, an economist at the Northern Trust Corp. in Chicago.

A year later, American borrowing totaled just 8.8 percent of disposable income in the third quarter, lower than any three-month period since the recession of 2001.

People aren't as eager to take out big mortgages when houses have stopped rising in value every month.

Still, households remain highly leveraged. US mortgage debts now total about 46 percent of all US home values. That percentage has more than doubled since the 1950s. "Homeownership is now much more precarious," says Tamara Draut of Demos, an advocacy group in New York worried by America's high consumer debt levels.

Some 45 percent of first-time buyers in 2005 took home loans with no down payment, Ms. Draut says. That means that, should they need to sell the home, they have very little cushion to repay their loan.

In general, home prices rise over time. But for now, prices have been heading down in dozens of cities.

Meanwhile, many homeowners will see their mortgage payments jump sharply in the next year or so, as adjustable-rate mortgages ratchet upward from low introductory rates.

That explains why foreclosures are on the rise: Many owners can't afford the higher mortgage payments, and they can't sell the home for what they paid.

The number of foreclosures was up 43 percent in the third quarter of 2006, compared with the same period the year before, according to Demos.

What can homeowners and other borrowers do to keep their balance sheets in order? Experts say some of the best steps are tried and true: Develop a budget, set aside some savings each month, and don't buy a home costlier than you can really afford.

"There is no substitute for having an emergency savings cushion," says Greg McBride, senior financial analyst at Bankrate.com in North Palm Beach, Fla.

Also, people with adjustable-rate loans, which are often resetting at rates of 7 percent or higher, might want to refinance at lower fixed rates. In addition, Mr. McBride says, "have a plan of attack" to repay high-cost debt such as credit-card bills.

Again, now may be an opportune time. People who get paid every two weeks may have gotten a third paycheck in December, McBride says. They might use that - or a year-end bonus - to pay down debts.

Financial advisers also offer this reminder: Debt can be a good thing if used wisely - such as a path to owning a home.

"Democratization" of credit, with new types of loans available to more people, has generally been a positive force in recent years, Zandi says. "This probably has allowed ... for a more stable economy," he says. But it also leaves many people vulnerable if interest rates rise substantially, or if housing prices falter.

Jeb Bush Ponders Future, Not Knowing What It Holds (NYT)

By Abby Goodnough

MIAMI, Jan. 1 — When the same old irksome question popped up recently at one of his final public events here, Gov. Jeb Bush, addressing Spanish-speaking reporters, gave an atypically dramatic Governor Bush with his father, former President George Bush, last week in Boca Grande, Fla.

His words set off round-the-world buzz, with The Daily Telegraph of London going so far as to call them “a recognition by the Bush family that their dynastic reign in American politics is drawing to a close.”

But in fact, the question lives on. Mr. Bush’s spokeswoman said last week that he made the comment jokingly, and when asked about it later in an e-mail message, Mr. Bush himself replied, “I was misunderstood by a reporter.”

He did not elaborate, leaving the world to know only this much: Half his life after he arrived in Miami as a 27-year-old real estate salesman, Governor Bush returns here this week without the title before his name and, he insists, without knowing what his future holds.

Florida, too, has some readjusting to do. After eight years in office, Mr. Bush, 53, is leaving as one of the most popular and prominent governors in state history, not least because of his relationship to President Bush (brother) and former President George Bush (son). Succeeding him is Attorney General Charlie Crist, who is Republican like Mr. Bush but otherwise starkly different.

Despite the wishful prodding of admirers, Mr. Bush has adamantly ruled out a presidential campaign of his own next year, saying that he wants only to return to Miami with his wife, Columba, and their cat, Sugar. Yet rumors about his future have burst forth as regularly as exotic species in the Everglades — among them that he would be the next commissioner of the National Football League, run for Senate or become Senator John McCain’s running mate if Mr. McCain won the Republican nomination for president in 2008.

“The presidency is out of the question at this point because of Bush fatigue,” said Peter Schweizer, a fellow at the Hoover Institution at Stanford who wrote “The Bushes: A Dynasty” with his wife, Rochelle. “But the vice presidential slot is something that’s very much in play. He’s a successful governor of an important state, he helps shore up relations with the social conservatives and he has the Bush money machine.”

One of Mr. Bush's former chiefs of staff has gone to work for Mr. McCain's exploratory committee, but several other former aides have signed up with Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, another probable Republican contender.

"Jeb is a policy-driven guy," Mr. Schweizer said. "If he can be a vice president that plays some kind of a policy role as Cheney has, as Gore did in the Clinton administration, then Jeb Bush will be interested."

Many assume that for now — at least partly at the urging of his wife, described as shy and eager to be out of the public eye — Mr. Bush will return to the private sector. He reported a net worth of $1.4 million in 2005, down from $2.4 million in 1998.

He was a partner in a major real estate development firm here until his first, unsuccessful run for governor in 1994, but Mr. Schweizer predicted that Mr. Bush might now seek out work involving the bioscience industry or the Latin American economy, both of which "he seems particularly animated by."

All indications notwithstanding, ardent admirers like Grover Norquist, the president of Americans for Tax Reform, are not giving up on the prospect of Mr. Bush jumping into the presidential race next year, especially if Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York becomes the Democratic candidate.

"He could step in later than anybody else," Mr. Norquist said. "You can run for president with the last name of Bush, even though there is and will be Bush fatigue, in a year that you're likely to be running against someone whose last name is Clinton."

For the time being, Mr. Bush bought a car, a Chrysler 300C, and rented a $5,500-per-month, 3,949-square-foot condominium in Segovia Tower, a luxury building overlooking a golf course in lush Coral Gables.

"I have no idea what I will be doing next," he wrote by e-mail from Boca Chica, Fla., where he was vacationing with his parents. "My priorities are to hang out with my beloved wife (until she can't take it anymore! :)), work out every day and figure out what I will do next with my life."

As for the continued speculation, he wrote: "I am flattered that all sorts of people are interested in what I am going to do and many have offered advice as well. That will all subside soon."

Small signs suggest, however, that he will have a hard time giving up executive powers. He told reporters that while buying furniture recently, he had to stifle the urge to tell the store owner a better way of doing business — a trait his adversaries say they will not miss.

"Bush was the type that if you did not agree with him, he really didn't have time for you," said State Senator Frederica Wilson, Democrat of Miami. "He wanted you to rubber stamp every idea he had, and he wouldn't listen to reason."

Kate Phillips and The Times's politics staff report on the latest political news from around the nation.

More Politics NewsWhile Mr. Bush is internationally famous, Mr. Crist, who will be sworn in as governor on Tuesday, is a stranger to all outside Florida and, but for his native Tampa Bay region, not particularly well known within the state either. While Mr. Bush was ideologically driven, often making enemies in pursuit of "big, hairy, audacious goals" and divisive social policies, Mr. Crist seems above all a pleaser, avoiding firm opinions and promising to be "the people's governor."

Yet despite Mr. Bush's abrasiveness and the plunging popularity of his brother the president, he has remained well liked — or at least respected — to the end, a feat in a state as ethnically and politically divided as Florida. A poll last month by Quinnipiac University found that 57 percent of Floridians feel he did a "good" or "great" job as governor, compared with only 10 percent who said he had done a "bad" job.

Howard Simon, executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union of Florida, said the poll results reflected approval of Mr. Bush's persona more than of his policies. Mr. Simon pointed out that two major education initiatives during the governor's tenure — a costly effort to lower class size and another to provide universal prekindergarten classes — were passed by public referendum, over the governor's objections.

"It needs to be said that the personal appeal and likeability of Jeb Bush has led the press and the public to overlook the extremism of many of his policies," he said.

Several of Mr. Bush's pet initiatives in fact failed, including a school voucher program that the Florida Supreme Court found unconstitutional.

But Mr. Bush pushed through $19.3 billion in tax cuts, put an unprecedented emphasis on standardized testing in public schools, privatized thousands of government jobs and ended affirmative action in public university admissions. He also persuaded the Scripps Research Institute and other bioscience research groups to open laboratories in Florida, which he says will make the state economy less dependent on tourism and create more high-paying jobs.

And he has appointed more than a third of the state's judges, assuring that his socially and fiscally conservative beliefs will continue to hold some sway.

While others have emoted about Mr. Bush's departure — including his father, who wept as he described his second son's "decency" and "honor" in a speech in Tallahassee last month — he has characteristically avoided introspection. Asked last month what he would miss most about the Governor's Mansion, he cited its beauty, its staff — and its towels.

"Fresh towels — all you want," he said. "Here, although I've been trained to do otherwise, it's just any time I want I can have many towels."

Bush The Younger Reticent On Future As Florida Term Ends (FT)

By Andrew Ward

Financial Times, January 2, 2007

When Jeb Bush was asked recently how he planned to spend his first day after stepping down as governor of Florida, he reeled off a checklist of things he wanted to do: "I hope to wake up. Work out. Maybe read the local paper. Sports page probably. Hang out with my wife."

About his longer-term plans, Mr Bush was more reticent. "I'm going to try to take some time off to reflect on what I should be doing and not rush into the next thing," he said.

However, Mr Bush's efforts to duck questions about his future seem unlikely to quash feverish speculation about what that "next thing" might be.

The 53-year-old brother of President George W. Bush finishes his second and final term as governor of the Sunshine State today when Charlie Crist, his Republican successor, is inaugurated in Tallahassee.

While his brother limps towards the end of his troubled presidency, the younger Mr Bush is leaving office on a high. A recent poll showed his approval rating at 63 per cent.

Praised for his hands-on leadership style, steady economic stewardship and deft handling of several hurricanes, Mr Bush is described by David Colburn, professor of history at the University of Florida, as "perhaps the most influential governor in state history".

Mr Bush has already rejected opportunities to jump straight into another big job, including Republican pressure for him to run for the Senate and an offer to become commissioner of the National Football League.

Friends say his priority is to make money, having seen his personal wealth shrink from $2.4m (£1.22m) to $1.4m during his eight years on the Florida governor's $130,000-a-year salary, according to public disclosures.

Few people, however, believe Mr Bush has permanently finished with politics. Although he has ruled out running for president in 2008, some analysts believe he could yet be persuaded to join the Republican ticket as nominee for vice-president.

Peter Schweizer, co-author of The Bushes: Portrait of a Dynasty, says Mr Bush has three main attractions as a vice-presidential candidate.

First, he would improve the Republicans' chances of winning Florida, likely once again to be a crucial battleground state.

Second, he would bring the formidable fundraising power and political machinery of the Bush family.

Third, his solid record of social and fiscal conservatism would reassure grass roots Republicans if a more moderate candidate, such as John McCain, heads the ticket.

Mr Bush has cut taxes, vetoed spending bills and led the ill-fated fight to save Terri Schiavo, the brain-damaged woman whose case became a cause célèbre for the Christian right before her death in 2005.

"If you asked most Americans, they would have the opposite impression but Jeb is more conservative than his brother," says Mr Schweizer.

But great as his appeal may be to many Republicans, most analysts believe 2008 is too soon to ask the broader US electorate to vote for another Bush, even as vice-president.

"America has had its fill of Bushes," says Larry Sabato, professor of politics at the University of Virginia. "I don't think [the vice-presidential nomination] will be offered to Jeb and, if it were, I don't think he would accept. Unlike Hillary [Clinton], he's smart enough to understand that American voters don't like dynasties."

Polls show that the rest of the country does not share Florida's enthusiasm for Mr Bush, with only 28 per cent of US voters expressing a favourable opinion of him and 45 per cent voicing an unfavourable opinion in a recent survey.

Mr Bush started his working life with Texas Commerce Bank, now part of JPMorgan Chase, for whom he spent two years setting up its operation in Venezuela. His family eventually settled in Florida, where Mr Bush became a partner in a real estate development company and dabbled in entrepreneurial ventures, ranging from part ownership of a football team to exporting water pumps to Nigeria, with mixed success.

History could have turned out differently had Mr Bush not lost his first run for the Florida governorship in 1994, the same year his brother was elected governor of Texas.

"The overwhelming consensus was that Jeb was going to win and George W. was going to lose," recalls Mr Schweizer. "Had that happened, it's safe to assume Jeb would have ended up running for president rather than his brother."

Asked by Spanish-language reporters last month about his political future, Mr Bush replied: "No tengo futuro. (I have no future.)" But in an earlier interview he indicated his ambitions were not yet fulfilled.

"I hope there's more to remember than the first 53 years of my life," he said. "There's stuff to do. I don't know what it'll be but Ihope to be remembered by a larger body of experiences than what I've had sofar."

Senate Panels To Supply Soapbox (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, January 2, 2007

Senate Democrats interested in White House bids will get tons of free publicity starting in January with new and prominent posts on key panels.

Senators hoping to pontificate on Iraq, global warming or health care policy will enjoy multiple hearings -- some televised live -- and the amplified political microphone that comes with being in the majority party.

Among the five Democratic senators who are widely expected to seek their party's presidential nomination, three will hold chairmanships when the 110th Congress opens Thursday.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware will assume the most prominent post of the bunch as incoming chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee. Already, the presidential aspirant has promised three weeks of hearings on the Iraq war, complete with testimony from Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and new Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates.

Mr. Biden last month announced he will fight President Bush if he proposes sending a surge of troops to Iraq, calling such a move "escalation."

Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts will be chairman of the Small Business and Entrepreneurship Committee, and Sen. Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut will lead the Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs Committee.

Mr. Kerry said a lack of health insurance for small-business workers is one of the country's greatest challenges and said his committee will look at the tax code for small firms as well as loans for minority, female and veteran entrepreneurs.

"Small businesses are the heart of the American economy and the place where American dreams rise and fall every day," said Mr. Kerry, the 2004 Democratic presidential nominee, who is considering a second try for the White House.

Mr. Dodd's panel is tasked with oversight of the country's largest financial-services companies and government agencies such as the Federal Reserve Board and Department of Housing and Urban Development.

The committee also will examine foreign investment in the United States in the aftermath of the Dubai ports debacle and will look at strengthening the country's rails, ports and roads systems against terrorism, Mr. Dodd said.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, who have not yet said officially whether they intend to run for president, do not have enough seniority to lead a Senate panel. But chances are they will have plenty to say, as each will hold posts on major committees.

Mrs. Clinton, the former first lady just elected to a second Senate term, sits on the Armed Services Committee, which also examines war policy. Mrs. Clinton's Web site includes video links to her grilling Mr. Gates before his confirmation and her questioning of the Iraq Study Group.

Mrs. Clinton has the opportunity to square off with fellow Armed Services member Sen. John McCain of Arizona, the presumed Republican front-runner for his party's presidential nomination.

The two disagree on Iraq policy, with Mr. McCain calling for more troops and Mrs. Clinton saying she cannot support such a plan unless it helps end the sectarian violence in Iraq.

Mrs. Clinton also is a member of the Environment and Public Works Committee, giving her an opportunity to showcase her environmental platform during what are expected to be in-depth hearings on global warming.

On that panel, Mrs. Clinton will be chairman of the Superfund and waste management subcommittee.

Mrs. Clinton, Mr. Obama and Mr. Dodd all will sit at the dais of the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions (HELP) Committee.

Mr. Obama, a former state senator first elected to the Senate in 2004, assumes a fourth committee post in the coming session. He dropped his spot on the environment panel and added the HELP panel and the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, which deals with terrorism matters and governmental oversight.

"I hope to address the growing health care crisis in our country and focus on legislation that will help working families adjust to the ever-changing global economy," Mr. Obama said when announcing the post.

He is already a member of Mr. Biden's Foreign Relations panel and of the Veterans' Affairs Committee.

Mr. Biden will have his hands full. Counting himself, there are four Democratic presidential hopefuls on his committee, in addition to Republican Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, who is reported to be considering running for president.

Foreign Relations Committee members Mr. Dodd, Mr. Kerry and Mr. Obama will get the opportunity to pepper administration officials with questions on Iraq and influence war policy during hearings that are likely to receive extensive television coverage.

Dodd Well-positioned For White House Bid (AP)

By Andrew Miga

AP, January 2, 2007

WASHINGTON — The White House isn't the only prestigious address on Sen. Christopher Dodd's mind as he nears a decision on whether he'll plunge into a crowded field of Democratic presidential contenders.

Wall Street also looms large. The Connecticut senator will become chairman of the Senate Banking Committee in Congress, giving him oversight of the nation's banking, financial services and insurance industries. The post will create new fundraising opportunities — a potential boost for a longshot prospect like Dodd who must prove he can raise the tens of million of dollars needed to stay competitive in the 2008 campaign.

"Any time you are chairman of a committee that oversees, arguably, the wealthiest sector of society, that's a significant opportunity to raise some real dough," said Chris Lehane, a Democratic strategist from several presidential campaigns. "But it's potentially a double-edged sword."

The senator has accepted millions of dollars in contributions from Wall Street interests during his 25 years in the Senate, but his new chairmanship, plus his White House ambitions, have upped the ante.

"It's a tightrope walk when you're the chairman of a committee that regulates the industry that gives the most money to politics, in general," said Massie Ritsch, communications director of the Center for Responsive Politics, a nonpartisan watchdog group. "It has to be tempting to take a lot of money from this industry, because they want to give it so much."

A surge of Wall Street money could initially boost Dodd's prospects. But it could also undercut his efforts to cast himself as a champion of average working Americans.

"One of the first places people look is where your campaign cash comes from, and if it came from an industry that you regulate, you're going to have to answer questions about potential conflicts of interest and being too cozy with Big Business," said Ritsch.

A campaign spokeswoman for Dodd, whose state is home to big insurance companies, said he would be the same independent voice on the banking panel he's always been. The senator will follow the letter of the law on fundraising, and conduct himself as "a thoughtful and independent chairman who listens to all sides of an issue and enacts public policy that is in the best interest of the American people," spokeswoman Beneva Schulte said.

Dodd, 62, is prepping for a White House bid that even he acknowledges is a longshot.

Amid the Democratic pack of potential candidates dominated by heavyweights like New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, raising enough money to compete will be one of Dodd's most pressing challenges.

Dodd refused to divulge his current fundraising totals. But at the end of September, he had about $1.8 million in his Senate campaign account. His political action committee's cash balance was $167,526 in November.

Dodd's numbers are eclipsed by potential rivals Clinton and Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry, the 2004 Democratic presidential nominee, who each have about $14 million in campaign funds.

Candidates will need to raise $50 million by the end of the primary season, said Steve Grossman, a veteran party fundraiser and former Democratic National Committee chairman.

"There's not a whole lot of oxygen left in the room when you get beyond the two presumptive front-runners," Grossman said of Clinton and Obama.

If Dodd jumps into the race, he needs to show fundraising muscle soon, said Grossman.

"How quickly Dodd can get to $10 million is important," said Grossman. "March matters. March is about momentum ... The process unfolds so quickly. Chris Dodd has to be able to see a clear path to $10 million by June."

Beyond Wall Street, Dodd, a former national party chairman, has a national network of supporters, including many in the Jewish community, that he can build on, said Grossman.

Veteran Democratic strategist Bill Carrick predicted Dodd would have enough cash. "But you gotta catch on, that's really the trick for Dodd," Carrick said.

Dodd is a familiar figure in the financial world, having served on the banking panel for 25 years. He also has been a strong consumer advocate on lending issues, said Travis Plunkett, legislative director of the Consumer Federation of America, a nonprofit advocacy group. The federation, however, has disagreed with Dodd on some securities and insurance issues.

Securities and investment industry interests have given $2.18 million to Dodd since 1989, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. It was the most money Dodd got from any industry. Insurance industry sources gave $1.08 million, the center's statistics showed, while commercial bank interests gave $553,719.

McCain Likely To Run From Atop Defense Panel (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, January 2, 2007

Sen. John McCain is set this week to assume the senior Republican spot on the Armed Services Committee as he sets the stage for a presidential run while serving as his party's top Senate spokesman on defense issues.

Republicans lost control of the budget- and policy-making committee in the November elections. Chairman John W. Warner, Virginia Republican, hands the gavel to Sen. Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat. Because of term limits, he then relinquishes the ranking Republican position to Mr. McCain of Arizona.

Mr. McCain is widely expected to formally announce this year that he is seeking the Republican presidential nomination. His staff and outside advisers have been working in recent weeks to piece together a minority committee staff that can operate while he is on the campaign trial.

Former Senate staffers say one of the finalists for the key post of minority staff director is Michael V. Kostiw, who was an aide to former Rep. Porter J. Goss on the House Intelligence Committee. Mr. Kostiw has worked as an Army Reserve intelligence officer, a CIA clandestine officer and an oil company executive. He worked for Mr. Goss when the former congressman headed the CIA.

"If they ask me, I'll do it," Mr. Kostiw said in an interview. "I've known [Mr. McCain] for a long time. I think he is a great American."

Mr. Kostiw still works for the CIA on a contract basis.

Charles Abell, Mr. Warner's staff director, is moving on, as is the normal shift when a new senator assumes control of a committee staff.

Former staffers say Mr. McCain's search team has used the word "adult" to describe the kind of staff director they were seeking -- someone who could be trusted to carry out assignments while Mr. McCain addressed presidential politics outside Washington.

Republicans meet Thursday to pick ranking committee members. Mr. McCain's spokeswoman did not return a phone message last week.

Mr. McCain, a former Navy fighter pilot held captive in North Vietnam, relies on an inner circle of aides and friends to advise him on national security issues.

One is James F. McGovern, who, like Mr. McCain, is a former Navy fighter pilot and Annapolis graduate. The two worked together when Mr. McGovern was staff director of the Senate Armed Services Committee in the 1980s. He later became undersecretary of the Air Force.

Mr. McGovern played a role in finding candidates for the staff director's job. Former Senate aides say the list was long. Some were eliminated; at least one was said to take himself out of consideration.

Another McCain adviser is retired Navy Adm. Charles Larson, a classmate of Mr. McCain's at the Naval Academy.

But his closest confidant is his chief of staff, Mark Salter, with whom he has written four books, including the 1999 best-seller, "Faith of My Fathers: A Family Memoir."

There is a precedent for a senator holding a leadership post and running for president: Former Sen. Bob Dole, then the majority leader, captured the Republican nomination in 1996. He resigned from the Senate before the fall campaign.

Clinton-Obama Differences Clear In Senate Votes (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, January 2, 2007

The attack ads practically write themselves: Hillary Clinton voted against ethanol! Barack Obama wants to increase taxes!

Such are the perils of running for president as a senator. The two front-runners for the 2008 Democratic nomination are newcomers to the chamber. But in the two years that Clinton and Obama have overlapped, they have taken opposite sides at least 40 times. That's a lot of material to mine, and even misrepresent.

Of the eight senators pondering presidential runs, Clinton (N.Y.), who is completing her first Senate term, and Obama (Ill.), sworn in two years ago, have the briefest voting histories. The Senate has held 645 roll-call votes during their shared tenure, and more than 90 percent of the time the two senators stood with other Democrats. They opposed John G. Roberts Jr.'s nomination as chief justice, supported increased funding for embryonic stem cell research and backed the same nonbinding measure that urged President Bush to plan for a gradual troop withdrawal from Iraq.

But other votes reveal important differences between the Democratic rivals that distinguish them as they prepare to launch their anticipated candidacies. The areas of dispute include energy policy, congressional ethics and budget priorities, relations with Cuba, gun ownership, and whether a senator can hold a second job.

In corn-growing Iowa, the first stop in the presidential nominating process, Clinton will have to explain the ethanol vote she cast on June 15, 2005. The senator recently softened her stance, but she is on record opposing a large federal boost for the grain-based fuel.

And Obama voted to increase taxes when he opposed a package of business breaks that included the extension of middle-class provisions. Clinton voted for the tax bill -- before she voted against it, as did Obama, in the legislation's final form.

As Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) and former senator Robert J. Dole (R-Kan.) discovered in previous campaigns, the Congressional Record is a minefield for White House contenders, a catalogue of provincial concerns, convoluted logic and compromised principles.

"A senator is called upon to vote on almost everything," said former senator Thomas A. Daschle (D-S.D.), who recently decided against a 2008 bid. Legislative records become "an inviting target for any political opponent," he said, because so few votes speak for themselves, much less reflect a lawmaker's true ideals. The Senate's unofficial motto: Don't let the perfect be the enemy of the good. That's hard to explain in a debate, Daschle noted.

One of the sharpest substantive divides is over ethanol, an issue of particular potency in Iowa. The vote in question was an effort to block a proposed amendment to the 2005 energy bill that would have established an ethanol mandate for refineries. "If there were ever an onerous, anti-competitive, anti-free-market provision, this is it," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), who led the effort and who warned that non-farming states could face spikes in gasoline prices because of supply limitations. Clinton at the time was campaigning for reelection and was one of 28 senators to support her colleague's failed bid.

At the time, New York had no ethanol industry. Iowa has more ethanol plants than any other state. "If someone voted or has a position against ethanol, it will be used by their opponents and it will be another issue they need to overcome" with voters in the Iowa caucuses, said Steffen Schmidt, a professor of political science at Iowa State University.

Over the past year, Clinton has warmed to ethanol. Buffalo has decided to build a big ethanol plant, making the issue a home-state concern. In May, Clinton said current ethanol production is "a long way from helping us deal with our gas problems" and added: "We need to be moving on a much faster track."

Obama voted for the ethanol mandate. "As a senator from a corn-growing state, Obama will have no problem on the ethanol issue and can tout his credentials on this score with a clear conscience," said Peverill Squire, who teaches politics at the University of Iowa.

The two Democrats differed on other energy-related issues. In August, Clinton supported a bill to expand oil and gas production in the Gulf of Mexico, while Obama voted against it. During the 2005 energy debate, Obama backed an increase in vehicle fuel-efficiency standards, which Clinton opposed. Clinton voted against the energy bill itself because it was stuffed with oil industry incentives. But Obama supported the legislation because it included language that would double ethanol demand by 2012.

Another fault line is spending. Obama sided with fiscal conservatives on several high-profile measures to strip funding for pet projects, including a widely criticized Pentagon travel system and the relocation of a railroad line along the Mississippi Gulf Coast that was part of a Hurricane Katrina redevelopment project. Clinton voted in favor of the projects.

One budget-related vote with broader political implications would have stripped funding for TV Marti, which beams television programming to Cuba, though the Cuban government jams the signal. Critics in Congress complain that the United States has spent almost $200 million on the failed effort and have targeted the program year after year.

Obama twice voted to cut off TV Marti funding, while Clinton supported maintaining it. Those votes will have resonance in Florida, which is a key primary state and may reschedule its 2008 primary date from March to February.

Obama spokesman Robert Gibbs said the senator's opposition to TV Marti was primarily about cost. But within Florida's large Cuban exile population, one of the most powerful voting blocs in the state, Clinton's and Obama's stances ally them with distinct groups: the older hard-liners and a younger, more progressive group of second-generation Cuban Americans and more recent immigrants whose numbers are growing. Clinton "is going with the status quo," said Sergio Bendixen, a Miami-based pollster who specializes in Hispanic voters. Obama, he said, "is with the position of change."

The senators differed on a July 13 vote that would prohibit the confiscation of legally held guns during natural disasters -- a response to seizures by law enforcement officials in the New Orleans area after Hurricane Katrina. Obama voted to ban confiscations; Clinton was one of 16 senators opposing the restrictions.

In late 2005, Obama allied with Republicans to support creating an exception to Senate rules to allow Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) to continue practicing medicine on a not-for-profit basis. Clinton opposed the change, an aide explained, because she believes that senators should not have a second source of income. Gibbs said that Obama, as an author of two best-selling books, was sympathetic to Coburn's request.

In several instances, Clinton and Obama voted against measures that they supported in principle, because the bills were not strong enough. Clinton opposed a restructuring plan for the Federal Emergency Management Agency that Obama and 86 other senators backed, because it did not restore the Cabinet-level status that FEMA had attained under President Bill Clinton, her husband. One of Obama's chief interests in the Senate has been ethics reform, but he was one of eight senators to oppose a bill aimed at tightening lobbyist rules because it was not strong enough. Clinton supported the initiative.

"You're voting for so many things that can be misconstrued," said Steve Elmendorf, a Democratic lobbyist and former campaign adviser to presidential candidates Richard A. Gephardt (D-Mo.), a House member for nearly 30 years, and Kerry, a four-term senator. "It's great if you're the opposition."

Talkin' 'Bout My New Generation (USNEWS)

By Kenneth T. Walsh

Barack Obama has spent the past two weeks in splendid seclusion, far away from the campaign trail, in Hawaii. The Illinois senator caught up on family news with his grandmother and sister, who live on Oahu, played golf with pals, and, if the past is any guide, engaged in some fierce Scrabble. This is the way Obama has spent Christmas for many years.

But this time, there's been a big difference. Topic A was a momentous one–deciding, after talking with his wife, Michelle, relatives, friends, and advisers, whether to run for president in 2008. He is expected to enter the race, and he plans to announce his decision in the next few weeks.

But regardless of whether he runs, the intensity of Obama-mania suggests that the political and societal forces he represents–particularly a desire for new ideas, new faces, and a less rancorous brand of discourse–will shape the next election. Other Democratic presidential wannabes are testing the same themes, including former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, who announced last week, and Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack. But so far, it is Obama who has ridden the desire for change the furthest and the fastest. The 45-year-old freshman senator has come within striking distance of Hillary Rodham Clinton in the national polls for the Democratic nomination, is running even with her in New Hampshire, site of the first primary, and has quickly developed a reputation as one of the most charismatic politicians in years.

"I think there is a great hunger for change in the country–and not just policy change," Obama told U.S. News. "What I also think they are looking for is change in tone and a return to some notion of the common good and some sense of cooperation, of pragmatism over ideology. I'm a stand-in for that right now."

Comparisons. In his new book, The Audacity of Hope, Obama makes a rather audacious comparison–indirectly raising the prospect that he has a generational appeal reminiscent of John F. Kennedy's in 1960 and signaling that he is ready to capitalize on baby boomer fatigue. "The politics of today suffers from a case of arrested development," Obama writes. "In the back-and-forth between [President Bill] Clinton and [former House Speaker Newt] Gingrich, and in the elections of 2000 and 2004, I sometimes felt as if I were watching the psychodrama of the baby boom generation–a tale rooted in old grudges and revenge plots hatched on a handful of college campuses long ago–played out on the national stage. The victories that the Sixties generation brought about–the admission of minorities and women into full citizenship, the strengthening of individual liberties, and the healthy willingness to question authority–have made America a far better place for all its citizens. But what has been lost in the process, and has yet to be replaced, are those shared assumptions–that quality of trust and fellow feeling–that bring us together as Americans."

One of his objectives, it seems, is to set himself apart from Hillary Clinton. "Hillary Clinton is very much a creature of the 1960s and the 1970s, when she came of age," says Boston University historian Julian Zelizer. Obama seems to be trying to pigeonhole her as a politician stuck in the past.

'A Great Hunger For Change' (USNEWS)

By Kenneth T. Walsh

U.S. News and World Report, January 2, 2007

Amid his deliberations on whether to run for president, Illinois Sen. Barack Obama talked by phone with U.S. News Chief White House Correspondent Kenneth T. Walsh. He discussed politics, policy, and what he might bring to the presidential race, and he said the excitement he's generating is linked to a pervasive desire for a new politics of hope, reconciliation, and fresh ideas. Excerpts:

What are you learning about the mood of Americans during your travels around the country? I think there is a great hunger for change in the country–and not just policy change. ... What I also think they are looking for is change in tone and a return to some notion of the common good and some sense of cooperation, of pragmatism over ideology. I'm a stand-in for that right now. I'm not the only one. There's Deval Patrick in Massachusetts, Brian Schweitzer in Montana, Eliot Spitzer in New York [all Democratic governors]. ... There is something new that is out there, but it hasn't fully expressed itself.

How much of the current ferment is due to "baby boomer fatigue"? There is a weariness with the ideological battles and cultural wars of the past. Too much of our policy is framed in terms of the debates of the Sixties.

What's gone wrong with the Bush presidency? This has been the most ideological administration in my lifetime, even more so than the Reagan administration. The Reagan administration, despite the rhetoric, could be pragmatic.

You have strongly opposed the war in Iraq. Why? It's a classic example of ideology trumping reality. The country has now rejected that approach to governance.

How do you explain Bush's failure so far to win congressional approval for overhauling Social Security? The Bush administration insisted on privatization as the only approach to reform and put it forward as the only [alternative], and as a result we have nothing.

If you run for president, you will be subject to attacks on your background and views, even though you are calling for a more positive brand of politics. How do you react to that prospect? I have confidence in the American people, and if I have the opportunity to speak to them, they will look beyond the negative. ... When I came to Chicago 20 years ago, I didn't know a single person. I didn't come from a political family. Now I'm in the U.S. Senate. Chicago is considered a tough political town, and I succeeded.

The biggest question among politicians and pundits is, will you run for president? What's your timing? If I want to run a competitive race, I would get in in January.

Romney To Submit Paperwork For 2008 Bid (AP)

By Glen Johnson

AP, January 2, 2007

Gov. Mitt Romney this week will submit the necessary paperwork to form a presidential exploratory committee, but not until funeral services for former President Gerald R. Ford have concluded, according to a top aide familiar with his plans.

Romney will file by Wednesday with the Federal Election Commission, the aide said, a registration that will allow the Massachusetts governor to raise and spend money in pursuit of the 2008 GOP nomination.

Romney, like Ford, is from Michigan. Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., and former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani, have already taken the same step.

Romney ended a 10-day vacation at his home in Utah on Monday, and he had intended to file his paperwork on Tuesday, the first business day of the new year. But Ford's death on Dec. 26 triggered a mourning period that will close federal offices and the U.S. Postal Service on Tuesday, and the former president will be buried Wednesday in Grand Rapids, Mich.

"We want to be very, very respectful of that," said the Romney aide, who spoke on the condition of anonymity pending the creation of the presidential committee.

Ford's death overshadowed last week's presidential announcement by former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, who declared he would seek the Democratic nomination.

While the committee filing will be labeled "exploratory," it will declare Romney as an official presidential candidate and commit him to the same fundraising and reporting rules he will have to follow when, as is expected, he transitions to a formal presidential campaign committee.

A formal announcement is expected sometime later this year, although Romney is planning a major fundraising event in Boston on Jan. 8 to propel his candidacy.

Romney aides believe the governor, the son of George Romney, a 1968 presidential candidate and the former governor of Michigan, can find a following as a youthful alternative to McCain and a more conservative candidate than Giuliani.

If successful, Romney would become the first Mormon elected president.

The 59-year-old is a former venture capitalist who made hundreds of millions of dollars at Bain Capital helping start such companies as Staples, the office-supply giant. He took over the 2002 Olympic Winter Games in Salt Lake City following a bid-rigging scandal that was an embarrassment to Utah, the United States and the International Olympic Committee.

In 2002, he returned to Massachusetts and won a four-year term as governor, his first and only stint in elective office. He unsuccessfully challenged Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., for the U.S. Senate in 1994.

At 5 p.m. Wednesday, Romney will take the "lone walk" down the 31 steps of the Massachusetts Statehouse, a ceremonial departure reserved for presidents, heads of state and departing governors. On Thursday, Democrat Deval Patrick will be sworn in, the first black governor in the state's history and only the second elected in the nation since Reconstruction.

Romney will not attend the ceremony, instead settling into his new campaign headquarters in the city's North End. Aides began moving into the building on Monday, another sign of the impending campaign.

The governor plans to base his campaign out of Massachusetts primarily for logistical reasons, rather than Michigan, his birth state and host to a key early presidential primary, or Utah, a power base in the politically important Mountain West.

Aides say the governor relishes returning to his wife, Ann, and his Belmont home after a stretch of campaign travel. Basing the campaign in Boston also allows him easy access to political consultants in Washington and financial backers in New York.

In addition, it will allow him easier access to New Hampshire, which holds the first presidential primary, and will allow him to stay either in Massachusetts or a second vacation home in the Granite State.

Spitzer Is Sworn And Begins Push On Ethics Rules (NYT)

By Danny Hakim

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

ALBANY, Jan. 1 — Eliot Spitzer ended 12 years of Republican rule here on Monday with a blunt critique of the past and a call to “end the politics of cynicism and division in our state.”

With his predecessor, George E. Pataki, gamely looking on, Governor Spitzer said in his 20-minute inaugural address that New York, “like Rip Van Winkle,” had “slept through much of the past decade.” He pledged to undertake reforms “substantial in size and historic in scope” and hinted at some of the contentious battles to come, including his plans to reshape state Medicaid and ethics policies.

The speech was the beginning salvo in what many see as a gargantuan challenge Mr. Spitzer has set out for himself — to overhaul a state government paralyzed by gridlock and consumed by recurring scandals.

Yet Mr. Spitzer’s work began hours before the speech: He signed five executive orders before 9 a.m., including directives establishing new ethical guidelines for state workers, among them a ban on accepting almost any gifts, as well as new restrictions on lobbying and the use of state resources. He also barred elected officials or candidates from appearing in advertisements paid for by state entities, a frequent practice of Mr. Pataki.

In his speech, Mr. Spitzer, 47, laid out what he said were “two overarching objectives”: making the government “ethical and wise,” and rebuilding the economy. He has said that addressing the struggling upstate economy would be a particular priority, but acknowledged the difficulty in reviving regions like the Buffalo area that have seen an exodus of manufacturing jobs.

The speech capped a whirlwind day in which the new governor took the official oath of office at midnight and, after sleeping about three hours, arose for a two-mile run through a chilly Albany rain. The rain stopped before the inauguration, though temperatures stayed in the 40s. After his 1 p.m. address, he revived an Albany tradition by opening the Executive Mansion to the public, and he and his wife, Silda Wall Spitzer, received 1,200 well-wishers. The inaugural speech was itself a break with tradition in that it was held outdoors, with Mr. Spitzer clad in a suit but no overcoat for the hourlong ceremony.

The change of leadership seemed to electrify a capital that has had Mr. Pataki as its governor for the last 12 years. Democrats were elated at the prospect of being at the seat of power for the first time since Mario M. Cuomo was voted out of office in 1994, while Republicans feared that Mr. Spitzer’s ascension could weaken their already tenuous hold on the State

Senate, their only redoubt of power. Lobbyists, gathering for the legislative session that begins this week, worried about how the new power structure would affect their work.

Hovering over the inauguration was the fallout from the ethical scandals that have enveloped Albany. Only three of the four statewide officials elected in November took their oaths, because the comptroller, Alan G. Hevesi, resigned late last month and pleaded guilty to a felony after admitting to using state workers to chauffeur and act as companions for his ailing wife.

One of Mr. Spitzer's executive orders, prohibiting the use of state property, including vehicles, computers and telephones, for nonofficial business, seemed aimed at curbing such behavior. The order said that individuals authorized by their agency to use a vehicle for personal purposes "shall keep records of such use, and the value of such personal use shall be calculated and reported as personal income."

In his address, Mr. Spitzer said, "Over the last decade, we have seen what can happen when our government stands still in the face of great challenge."

"Today is the day when all of that changes," he added.

His pointed attacks on Albany's problems ruffled some Republican feathers.

Asked about the Rip Van Winkle line specifically, the Senate majority leader, Joseph L. Bruno, now the state's top Republican, said, "I don't agree with that."

"I think history will judge the last 12 years, with this governor that's exiting, to have been one of the most productive 12 years for the people of New York State," he said. "And history will judge that — not rhetoric."

Mr. Bruno and Assembly Speaker Sheldon Silver, a Democrat, have essentially been running the state with Mr. Pataki for the last decade. Mr. Silver, for his part, said he took no offense, adding, "I think it was very clear that his references were to the prior administration."

The new governor began the new year at the Executive Mansion, where he was sworn in at midnight by Judge Robert W. Sweet of Federal District Court in Manhattan. Mr. Spitzer was once a clerk for Judge Sweet, who also swore him in later at the public inauguration.

Most of the major political figures in the state were present at the afternoon ceremony, including Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg and much of the state's Congressional delegation. Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton was in Washington attending memorial services for former President Gerald R. Ford. After Mr. Spitzer's speech, Judy Collins sang "This Little Light of Mine," a song that had been used in one of Mr. Spitzer's political ads during the campaign.

Further symbolizing the return of Democratic rule was the swearing-in of Andrew M. Cuomo as attorney general to replace Mr. Spitzer. His father, the former governor, was by his side. David A. Paterson was sworn in as lieutenant governor, the first African-American to hold the post.

The new attorney general signaled that he, too, would begin moving to confront the ethical challenges in the capital, as Mr. Cuomo planned meetings Tuesday with the Albany Country district attorney, P. David Soares, who prosecuted Mr. Hevesi, and David Grandeau, the head of the state's Lobbying Commission.

All in all, it was a day characterized by a rush of activity in a capital where Mr. Pataki had been increasingly invisible.

In signing his executive orders, Mr. Spitzer said he was fulfilling a promise "that one of the first acts I would take as governor, officially, was to put in place a series of ethics guidelines and strictures that would begin the process of restoring government to what it should be, which is responsive, open, transparent, available to the public.

"I am hoping that others in other branches will join me in this," he added.

Mr. Spitzer prohibited nepotism in hiring and contracting, and barred former state workers from lobbying the agency or authority where they worked for two years after their departure. State employment officials were also barred from asking job candidates about their party affiliation.

Mr. Spitzer also prohibited state workers from making contributions to the campaigns of the governor or lieutenant governor, or affiliated political action committees.

He signed the orders on a desk once used by Theodore Roosevelt, in a room of the mansion known as the History Room, which also displays a wheelchair used by Franklin D. Roosevelt.

After Mr. Spitzer finished and had answered some questions, he strode out of the room, but he and his wife quickly came back after his dogs Jesse, a bichon frisé, and James, a wheaten terrier, bolted in and began barking at reporters, one of several appearances the dogs made throughout the day.

In his inaugural address, attempting to outline his political philosophy, Mr. Spitzer called for New York to "embrace a progressive vision of government once more, one that upholds the values of individuality and community; of entrepreneurship and opportunity; of responsibility and fairness."

"No one any longer believes in government as a heavy hand that can cure all our ills," he said, "but rather we see it as a lean and responsive force that can make possible the pursuit of prosperity and opportunity for all, by softening life's blows, leveling its playing field and making possible the pursuit of happiness that is our God-given right."

Inaugural Options: To Go Populist Or Plush? (WSJ)

By Christopher Cooper

Chevron Corp. maxed out on its permissible yearly political contributions to California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's re-election campaign with a single donation of $22,300 early in 2006.

But that didn't stop the big oil company from chipping in $50,000 to be a "Gold Sponsor" of the governor's inaugural celebration. The contribution, one of the five largest that the inaugural committee received, gives Chevron officials access to the Republican governor at two events for sponsors and an invitation-only black-tie ball.

IN SUMMARY

• The Situation: Some governors fund inaugural festivities with money raised outside campaign-finance restrictions.

• What It Means: Events are often bankrolled by the same people and groups that finance political campaigns.

• What's at Stake: Unregulated donations may increase special interests' access to and influence on elected officials.

Thirty-six states elected governors in 2006 -- victories that will be celebrated this month with parties ranging from modest to star-studded. Several will cost $1 million or more. Many inaugural events will be exclusive affairs, paid for by nonprofit committees that aren't subject to state campaign-donation limits or reporting requirements designed to contain influence on elected officials. In essence, they are parties bankrolled by private groups that often solicit donations from the same people and entities that fund the campaigns.

In California, Chevron's sponsorship comes as the Schwarzenegger administration is promulgating rules to regulate greenhouse gases and weighing an ambitious alternative-energy package -- two issues with big implications for Chevron's bottom line. But the San Ramon, Calif., company doesn't consider the inaugural gift a political contribution, a spokesman says. Indeed, such a large contribution would be illegal under California's campaign-finance laws.

In a few cases, such unregulated fund-raising has caused headaches for new governors, many of whom were elected on reform or populist platforms. In Florida, governor-elect Charlie Crist, a Republican, canceled plans for a donors' ball when he was cited in the media for his no-limits donations drive. "A glitzy black-tie gig didn't sound right to me," Mr. Crist says. With state residents facing an insurance crisis and spiraling property-tax increases, he says, scaling back "is the right thing to do."

Mr. Crist, who initially received several large donations for his inaugural, including $100,000 from a longtime friend, returned much of that money and imposed a $10,000 limit on contributions -- still a hefty sum beyond the means of most private citizens. But even that didn't stop one Florida corporation from skirting at least the intent of Mr. Crist's directive. Closely held U.S. Sugar Corp., which had $40,000 of its $50,000 donation returned, re-topped the inaugural kitty by contributing $20,000 more through a pair of wholly owned subsidiaries. A spokeswoman for Mr. Crist says the extra donations were permitted because such contributions would be allowed under Florida's campaign-finance law.

Mr. Crist says donors shouldn't expect anything special from him. "A thank-you note and good government," he says. "They'll be disappointed if they're expecting anything else."

In Arkansas, governor-elect Mike Beebe, a Democrat, is walking a fine line between populism and exclusivity. Corporate sponsorships for inauguration festivities range between $2,000 and $25,000 -- and Mr. Beebe promises to list every sponsor in the event program. In addition, he plans a series of public events held under the banner of the state's Democratic Party, with ticket prices ranging from $25 to $100. Money left over after costs are covered will be turned over to the party.

But in Massachusetts, incoming Democratic Gov. Deval Patrick has drawn criticism for planning a sprawling inaugural celebration that includes seven statewide events culminating in a outdoor swearing-in ceremony in downtown Boston on Thursday. Financing for the event is being handled by the Patrick/Murray Inauguration Committee, which allows donations of as much as $50,000. Local newspapers and good-government organizations have faulted the governor-elect for allowing such large donations, declining to disclose contributors, and choosing fund-raisers with ties to state contracting.

Mr. Patrick has said he won't accept donations from gun makers, tobacco interests, casino operators and contractors connected to the troubled "Big Dig" tunnel project in Boston. But as the Boston Globe recently reported, much of the fund-raising for the events is being conducted by lobbyists whose clients include Big Dig contractors and others who do business with the state.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Patrick, Cindi Roy, says the governor-elect makes a distinction between those who are raising money and donors who may have business before the state, and is striving to raise at least half the money from ordinary citizens. She says Mr. Patrick intends to disclose the donors, though probably not until after the inaugural. "He has pledged to run this government in an open and transparent way, and that means the inauguration, too," Ms. Roy says.

In some states, leftover campaign funds help to pay for inauguration parties. Mr. Patrick considered but rejected that method. Campaign contributors "shouldn't be asked to fund a celebration that they should have the right to participate in," Ms. Roy says.

New York's incoming Democratic governor, Eliot Spitzer, decided that using leftover campaign money for his Jan. 1 inaugural in Albany would avoid controversy. The multievent celebration, estimated to cost about $1.5 million, included an oath-taking in Albany and an open-house at the governor's mansion but no private events.

Mr. Spitzer decided early on that raising money outside New York's campaign-finance laws was a bad idea, his spokeswoman says. "By avoiding inaugural fund-raising, we remove any perception that donations were made to curry favor with the incoming administration," spokeswoman Christine Anderson said via email. By using campaign money, "it will all be reported on our next [campaign disclosure], meaning the public/press can see every dollar spent."

During his campaign, Mr. Spitzer -- New York's former attorney general -- returned checks from 93 contributors who offered a total of $250,368. Many came from companies and individuals who have tangled with his office in the past, are under criminal investigation or are presumed to be connected to a continuing probe, state records showed.

In California, only one of Mr. Schwarzenegger's six inaugural events will be free and open to the public. While the governor isn't required to disclose inaugural sponsors, his office did so voluntarily. "Gold" and "silver" tiers include 31 individuals and companies that contributed at least $15,000 each. The administration has no plans to provide a full breakout of donations, but says it has raised at least $640,000 so far.

Spokesman Adam Mendelsohn says no sponsor should expect special consideration. "The governor makes decisions based on what's in the best interest of the people," he says.

States Swift To Warn Mortgage Lenders (WP)

By Kirstin Downey

The Washington Post, January 2, 2007

Nineteen states and the District of Columbia have moved quickly to warn state-regulated lenders about the hazards to consumers from nontraditional mortgages.

Tens of thousands of state-licensed lenders and mortgage brokers are affected by the advisories, also known as a "guidance." Such loans include interest-only mortgages and other arrangements where the borrower cuts monthly costs by paying back less than full interest and principal.

The states are following closely behind federal banking regulators, who issued a sternly worded advisory in late September to the lenders they supervise, telling them they should not make these loans to borrowers who may be unable to repay them.

Within 24 hours of the federal guidance's release, six states had issued similar warnings to their own lenders, a notable flurry of activity in a field known for its slow-moving bureaucracies.

"They were ready for this; they wanted it," said Mike Stevens, senior vice president for regulatory affairs at the Conference of State Bank Supervisors, who said it was the fastest state-by-state regulatory rollout he had ever seen. "We had a national need to do this."

In the District, the guidance covers about 1,200 licensed mortgage brokers and lenders. It was adopted Dec. 5.

"We see a need to protect consumers who were not too savvy," said Lily Qi, a spokeswoman for the D.C. Department of Insurance, Securities and Banking. "They didn't understand what they signed when they signed on the bottom line. Some companies can be very aggressive in their marketing, and it can be misleading."

Officials in Maryland and Virginia are considering introducing the new lending guidelines.

Edward Joseph Face, Virginia's commissioner of financial institutions, said he was hopeful the state corporation commission would decide on some version of it within the next month. In Virginia, such a guidance would affect about 2,800 mortgage lenders and brokers.

"I don't think we've ever seen this many adjustable interest-only loans on the books in all of history," Face said. "I am concerned. . . . There are so many out there, and when the rates start adjusting, it's not clear that borrowers will have prepared themselves."

Nontraditional loans, also known as exotic mortgages and which were once marketed to the wealthy as a cash-management tool, have expanded to the mass market because they allow borrowers to pay only the interest on a loan, or a partial monthly payment, without paying down the principal. In 2003, just 10.6 percent of new loans tracked by First American LoanPerformance, a San Francisco-based real estate information service, were nontraditional mortgages, but during the first nine months of 2006, about 34.1 percent of all borrowers used these loans to buy or refinance homes. In the Washington area, where housing prices have skyrocketed in the past five years, about 47.7 percent of loans originated in 2006 were nontraditional, compared with 10.7 percent in 2003.

These loans became popular because they let borrowers stretch to afford homes. The concern is that some borrowers may not fully understand they face payment "resets," or upward adjustments after a set period, often three to five years.

Regulators have noted that many consumers are unaware that their payments could double or even triple when they reset. At a recent Consumer Bankers Association conference, some lenders marketing fixed-rate loans to borrowers with nontraditional mortgages said that 30 to 50 percent of the borrowers seemed unaware of the resets looming.

Many economists now say the surge in these loans contributed to the real estate boom of the last few years. Regions that had the highest rates of nontraditional lending were also those areas where housing prices rose most quickly.

Regulators and consumer activists also say these loans increase the risk of foreclosure, particularly if monthly payments jump at a time when home prices are stagnant, making it more difficult to sell homes or refinance into other loans.

The Conference of State Bank Supervisors put out a model set of guidelines based on the federal guidance. It spells out that lenders must take into account whether borrowers will be able to afford to pay when the loans reset and must explain the loans more explicitly.

The warnings vary by state, as does the universe of mortgage lenders covered by each state. Some state regulators have proposed the guidance but are awaiting final approval. The federal guidance covers institutions that have federal deposit insurance; these state warnings will encompass lenders who do not also accept deposits. In Kentucky, the guidance covers about 525 enterprises, including mortgage brokers and lenders; in Indiana, it covers 350 licensed second-mortgage brokers; in Connecticut, it covers more than 3,800 licensed mortgage companies; in Iowa, it covers 342 state-chartered banks, 110 loan companies and 737 mortgage brokers or lenders.

Many federally supervised lenders opposed the federal government's decision to issue a guidance on nontraditional lending, saying that they thought it was overly prescriptive and that restrictions might block consumers from receiving loans. They also expressed concerns that they would be subject to federal restrictions while state-regulated lenders would be unaffected.

"The idea is to get as much consistency as possible out there for all the players," said Mark Tarpey, division supervisor for consumer credit for the Indiana Department of Financial Institutions.

Charity Pledges Smash All US Records (FT)

By Rebecca Knight In Boston

Warren Buffett's historic $31bn (€23.5bn) donation to the Gates Foundation made 2006 a banner year for US charitable giving, smashing previous records by a huge margin.

According to figures from the Chronicle of Philanthropy, the top 15 charitable gifts and pledges in the US weighed in at $35bn. By contrast, the largest 15 gifts of 2005 and 2004 totalled $2bn and $4.4bn respectively, according to the Chronicle, which has compiled an annual list of the largest announced gifts and pledges by individuals since 1997.

Mr Buffett accounted for the overwhelming bulk of that sum with his $31bn pledge to the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation. Mr Buffett's gift – which will help the foundation pursue its goal of curing the world's 20 leading fatal diseases – is the biggest charitable donation in history.

But even without Mr Buffett's largesse, it was an exceptional year for philanthropy with a record number of gifts of more than $100m. This year there were 14 gifts of $100m or more. In 1998 – the year that came closest to that number – there were 12, and last year, 10 donations of that size were made. "It's not just the Bill Gates and the Warren Buffetts of the world who are giving; it's a lot of different people," said Stacy Palmer, Chronicle editor.

People who made money in real estate and financial services dominate this year's list. The second and third largest gifts were by donors who profited from the sale of Golden West Financial Corporation to the Wachovia Corporation.

Herbert and Marion Sandler, co-chief executive officers of Golden West Financial Corporation, gave $1.3bn to their family foundation, which supports basic science research at the University of San Francisco. Bernard Osher, co-founder of Golden West Financial Corporation, gave $723.2m to his eponymous foundation that awards scholarships and grants to students in California's San Francisco and Alameda Counties and the State of Maine.

Fourth on the list was Jim Joseph, a California real estate developer, who left a $500m bequest to his foundation that provides educational programmes for Jewish youth; and fifth was David Rockefeller, retired chairman of Chase Manhattan Bank, who gave $225m to the foundation he and his brothers formed.

Nine of the biggest gifts this year went to foundations.

Four of the largest went to universities. Philip Knight, chairman of Nike, pledged $105m to his alma mater, Stanford University Graduate School of Business, for a new management centre campus and Ronald Stanton, chairman of Transammonia, pledged $100m to Yeshiva University in New York.

Something To Tide You Over (NYT)

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

As a Jewish woman, Alexandra Ovsyannikova faced daily hurdles and prejudice in her native Uzbekistan. In 1999, she was granted refugee status and came to America to join her daughter. After the minimum five-year waiting period, Ms. Ovsyannikova applied to become a citizen. She passed her test and was told she would be mailed an invitation to take the oath of citizenship. Months passed, but no letter came.

Ms. Ovsyannikova wrote to several New York City and state representatives. "I am such a small person," she said through a translator, pulling out a chubby stack of envelopes, "but they wrote letters [back] to me!" She also filed a lawsuit to speed up the process.

Ms. Ovsyannikova is an older woman with numerous health problems. She depends on Social Security to get by. While she waited for months, her benefits expired and she fell behind on her bills and rent. The UJA-Federation of New York, a beneficiary of The New York Times Neediest Cases Fund, worked with the Marks Jewish Community House of Bensonhurst to help Ms. Ovsyannikova with clothing and food.

Finally, after a year of waiting, her invitation came. She is now an American citizen.

Study: New Drug May Help Reduce HIV (LAT)

By James Ricci

The Los Angeles Times, January 2, 2007

2006 was destined to be the year Warren Ratcliffe lost his desperate race to survive AIDS, and the year Mark McClelland appeared, finally, poised to win his.

The two Bay Area men were among an estimated 40,000 Americans whose illness could not be controlled by modern HIV drugs because they'd developed a bedeviling resistance to them. Known as "salvage therapy" patients, they had only one hope: that a complicated and ever-changing witch's brew of existing medications, aimed at stalling the famously mutational virus, would keep them alive long enough for entirely new drugs to arrive via the pharmaceutical research pipeline.

In 2006 just such a drug — one that some researchers are calling "truly phenomenal" — did come along, in time, doctors hope, to save the 45-year-old McClelland but too late for Ratcliffe, who was overtaken by AIDS-related cancer and died April 27 at age 58.

The new drug, called an integrase inhibitor, was a highlight of the summer's annual international AIDS conference in Toronto. Newly published clinical studies showed that it, in combination with two existing drugs, reduced the virus to undetectable levels in nearly 100% of HIV patients taking a regimen for the first time.

It had a similar effect on the virus in up to 72% of salvage therapy patients.

"They tested it on some people who were in deep, deep salvage therapy, and even those people did remarkably well," said Dr. Steven Deeks, a UC-San Francisco salvage therapy authority who treated Ratcliffe and still treats McClelland. "It seems to be a truly phenomenal drug that everyone is sort of a little bit in awe of right now and is changing the whole way we think about the management of these patients."

The drug essentially prevents the virus from integrating its DNA with that of a host's cells, thus short-circuiting its ability to replicate itself.

Mark McClelland had several friends in salvage therapy who were part of the integrase inhibitor studies. "They all did extremely well," he said.

The knowledge of how they fared was immensely encouraging to him. And his own recent negative experience propelled him in the same direction. In October, he came down with a fungal infection that took advantage of his lowered immune defenses. "It was semi-serious but treatable," he said. "Getting sick hit me emotionally, however. I was just coasting along, and it was an opportunistic infection, and I hadn't had one of those in 11 years, and that was tough and gave me some renewed determination."

What was more, McClelland's count of infection fighting T-cells, a principal indicator of immune system compromise, hit zero. "It wasn't too different from four, which I've hit before, but there's something about hitting zero that was a little upsetting."

Warren Ratcliffe could not be included in the clinical studies of the integrase inhibitor. Kaposi's sarcoma, the early AIDS epidemic's portentous and deadly calling card was overwhelming him. "Warren really couldn't qualify for the drug because his Kaposi's was progressing, and because he had pretty significant side effects from the chemotherapy," Deeks said. "Mark is doing well, however, and I'm trying to get him on the integrase inhibitor right now. We're trying to get as many people in our research cohort as possible on this."

The new drug is on track for FDA approval by mid-2007, but its manufacturer, Merck & Co., is making it available sooner to patients in desperate straits.

Ratcliffe and McClelland were featured last January in a Times article about their unlucky subgroup and the obscure corner of AIDS treatment it occupies.

Like most others in their category, they had the misfortune of being diagnosed with HIV when single-drug treatment, called monotherapy, was the only help available. With monotherapy, the virus had to mutate past only one drug, which made a patient resistant to that medication and all others of its type.

Multi-drug therapy, which became available a decade ago, usually presents HIV with too many obstacles for it to mutate past. It became the gold standard of treatment, suppressing the virus and allowing patients to live normal lives.

The multi-drug "cocktail" failed to work for monotherapy veterans like Ratcliffe and McClelland because in them, the virus had already become resistant to one of its components and was more likely to resist other drugs in the mix, as well.

Ratcliffe's deterioration and death having come just as a potentially saving drug was becoming available has inflicted an added measure of pain on Alex Kazan, his domestic partner of 10 years and friend of 25. "Watching him go was pretty difficult, because he was such a wonderful, caring person," Kazan said. "You wonder why he couldn't have been spared. I thought I'd grow old with him, but he just didn't hit the right part of the wave, I guess."

Suffering from effects of the disease and the toxicity of the pharmacist's catalog of medications he took over the years was a constant theme in Ratcliffe's life. It, too, had a special poignancy for the 55-year-old Kazan, himself a veteran of monotherapy, albeit one whom multi-drug therapy has kept in good heath.

"I guess there was always a little bit of guilt that I was doing better than he was," he said. "But he was always excited about me doing better. He probably wouldn't have gone through all the heroics, in terms of all the therapies, if it wasn't for me. He took care of me. He fought so hard and rarely complained."

In late March, his once-fit body reduced to boniness by chemotherapy, Ratcliff admitted himself to a hospital because of a persistent, intense headache. Over the next month, infections appeared in his brain and, knowing the end was near, he decided to die at home.

"They thought he'd make it another eight or nine weeks, but he made it only five days," Kazan recalled.

At a memorial service held July 15, the day before Ratcliffe would have turned 59, the 150 people in attendance heard the Mississippi native and Navy veteran of the Vietnam War memorialized as a homebody, a perfectionist, an expert cook and gardener, a man who looked after elderly friends, remained close to his four siblings and was especially kind to children.

"Before he died, he sat down his goddaughter, and other kids he knew, and told them that after he was gone, they had to go on living," Kazan said. "And he sat me down, too, and said that I had to go on. I'm not sure I have. Not yet."

It is in the hope of preventing further such loss that Deeks and other researchers have such profound interest in the new AIDS drug, especially in combination with other new drugs they hope to have available by the end of this year.

His recent infection convinced McClelland that he has to begin taking the new integrase inhibitor — probably in combination with two other new drugs — sooner rather than later, probably beginning in February. He's had promising medicine regimes before, and all of them ended up disappointments, "but this seems to be so much better than anything that's come before," he said.

"It could be the Holy Grail or just give me the next five years, which would be fine with me."

For surviving salvage therapy patients like McClelland, Deeks said, "2007 may change everything. We're shooting for lifelong undetectable viral loads, and once we achieve that, the immune system rebuilds itself. That's what we're shooting for with Mark, and everyone like him."

Fairness For Lewinsky (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, January 2, 2007

In the various books I've read about the Bill Clinton impeachment scandal -- a scandal because of what was done and a scandal because the president was impeached for it -- the same story is told over and over again. When the prosecutors or lawyers or whoever finally got to meet the storied Monica Lewinsky, they were floored by her. She was smart, personable and -- as the record makes clear -- dignified. This is more than can be said about some of the people who write about her.

I will not name names. But in recent days, Lewinsky has been back in the news. In December she graduated with a master's degree in social psychology from the London School of Economics. Her thesis was titled "In Search of the Impartial

Juror: An Exploration of the Third Person Effect and Pre-Trial Publicity." Her thesis might well have been called "In Search of the Impartial Journalist," because she was immediately the subject of more poke-in-the-ribs stories about you know what. The Post, a better paper than it was that day, called her "dumb-but-smart." It was more than could be said for that piece.

It does not take a Freudian to appreciate why Lewinsky chose the topic she did. She is a victim of publicity, and her life has been a trial -- enough to floor almost anyone. But in Lewinsky's case, she took a bad situation and made something good of it. That hardly makes her "dumb-but-smart," but rather once young -- and now older and incomparably wiser. An approximation of this befalls us all, but before we got to become wise and prudent in all things we were probably irresponsible, outrageous and wild -- in other words, young.

Fortunately for me -- and probably this applies to you as well -- my outrageous deeds are known to only a few, and some of those people, after a lifetime of bad marriages and poor investments, have probably forgotten them. In Lewinsky's case, her youthful indiscretion has been forgotten by no one. On the contrary, it's recorded for the ages, in House and Senate proceedings, in the files of the creepy special prosecutor, in the databases of newspapers, in presidential histories and the musty joke files of second-rate comics.

She is a branded woman, not an adulterer but something even worse -- a girl toy, a trivial thing, a punch line. Yet she did what so many women at that age would do. She seduced (or so she thought) an older man. She fantasized that he would leave his wife for her. Here was her crime: She was a girl besotted. It happens even to Republicans.

But she is now a woman with a master's degree from a prestigious school and is going to be 34 come July. Her clock ticks, her life ebbs. Where is the man for her? Where is the guy brave enough, strong enough, admirable enough to take her as his wife, to suffer the slings and arrows of her outrageous fortune -- to say to the world (for it would be the entire world) that he loves this woman who will always be an asterisk in American history. I hope there is such a guy out there. It would be nice. It would be fair.

It would be nice, too, and fair, also, if Lewinsky were treated by the media as it would treat a man. What's astounding is the level of sexism applied to her, as if the wave of the women's movement broke over a new generation of journalists and not a drop fell on any of them. Where, pray tell, is the man who is remembered just for sex? Where is the guy who is the constant joke for something he did in his sexually wanton youth? Maybe here and there some preacher, but in those cases the real subject matter is not sex but hypocrisy. Other than those, no names come to mind.

This is the year 2007, brand new and full of promise. It would be nice if my colleagues in the media would resolve to treat Monica Lewinsky as a lady, to think of her as they would themselves, to remember their own youth and the things they did and to understand that from this day forward anyone who takes a cheap shot at Lewinsky has a moral and professional obligation to look in the mirror. To proceed otherwise is to miss the joke entirely. No longer is it Monica Lewinsky. It is now the people who write about her.

Ready For Its Checkup (LAT)

GOV. ARNOLD Schwarzenegger has set the bar so high in promising healthcare reform that it's tempting to suspect that he broke his leg on purpose, just for the photo-op in his hospital bed to drive home the high costs of healthcare. Upon reelection eight weeks ago, the governor vowed to cut the number of California's uninsured in half. Since then, he has refused to retrench, hinting instead at plans to cover pretty much everyone in the state.

Schwarzenegger is right in noting that the current system needs improvement. Six million Californians are uninsured. Many of them want coverage but can't get it — because they can't afford it, don't know where to find it or are ineligible for it. Everyone ends up paying for them because they seek treatment in emergency rooms, adding to the state's budget burden or to an estimated 10% "hidden tax" added to the insurance premiums of those who do have coverage.

Meanwhile, the health problems of the uninsured become everyone's in the form of communicable diseases and lost productivity. Some of the uninsured are healthy and simply choose not to spend their money on insurance. But everyone pays for their care when they get injured or fall ill.

In working through the options, Schwarzenegger would be wise to steer clear of new mandates on employers to provide health insurance for workers and their families. Voluntary employer-provided insurance is the most successful current way to distribute healthcare. But employer mandates would fail to reach many of the targeted uninsured, who are at best only marginally and transiently employed.

Other options are more intriguing. If every Californian were required to carry health insurance, either through work, the open market or (for those who need assistance) a government-subsidized program, patients would have an incentive to seek less costly preventive care. But insurance alone is not healthcare, and individual mandates can't by themselves stem costs.

Other solutions appear too utopian. A plan that provides healthcare to everyone in the state would be spectacularly costly. But so is having 6 million people without health insurance. And although it may cost more in the long run to leave illegal immigrants uninsured, insuring them would be an ambitious undertaking.

No health plan will be perfect because no health plan can simultaneously control costs, harness the power of the market and guarantee top-level treatment for everyone in the state. In the end, the cure for California's health problems probably should be found in Washington. But for the moment, the states are producing the most interesting and sweeping healthcare plans, and California can lead the way. Schwarzenegger deserves credit for taking on the issue. We hope he won't take it the wrong way when we offer this hope for the unveiling of his proposal next week in his State of the State address:

Break a leg.

Welcome, Mr. Mayor (WP)

ADRIAN M. FENTY will be sworn in today as the District's fifth mayor on a wave of hope and optimism so high even his closest advisers wonder how long it can last. Much depends on whether Mr. Fenty (D) is as adept at governing as he was at campaigning. The brash young politician who won the city's unquestionable support now must make good on his promises of progress.

It is encouraging that Mr. Fenty has demonstrated sound judgment in the months since his victory in the September primary all but guaranteed his election. Foremost has been his selection of able, experienced people to the top jobs in his administration. It's to his credit that he didn't wait for his victory in the general election to announce that he would reappoint Natwar M. Gandhi as the District's chief financial officer, thus reassuring a jittery business community that a change in the city's political leadership won't mean a relapse into fiscal irresponsibility. Likewise, Mr. Fenty's artful recruitment of the very able Dan Tangherlini to serve as city administrator underscores his seriousness about improving the day-to-day performance of city agencies.

It is too soon to judge Mr. Fenty's other appointees, many of whom are interim holdovers from the administration of outgoing Mayor Anthony A. Williams (D). Mr. Fenty made a campaign promise to bring in fresh blood, but his cautious approach makes sense given the complexity of D.C. government and the big learning curve he faces. Nonetheless, Mr. Fenty would do well to make a priority of putting a permanent team in place.

After all, many bedeviling issues require action. Some projects started in the Williams administration -- from the construction of the baseball stadium to fixing the libraries to building new housing communities -- need to be completed. Costly problems such as the city's shortfall in Medicaid reimbursements have persisted too long without remedy. And far too many people who live on the margins -- from the mentally retarded to the homeless -- have been given short shrift and shouldn't have to wait any longer for government help.

Yet Mr. Fenty's biggest challenge -- the one that carries the most political peril for him and the greatest consequence for the city -- is tackling the abysmal state of the public schools. Despite some of the highest per-pupil school spending in the country, too many D.C students lack the basic skills critical for success, and too many school buildings are in awful shape. The result is a system that is being abandoned by parents who have the wherewithal to get their children into charter or private schools. Mr. Fenty is correct in his belief that the city will never truly prosper if its schools remain broken, and his resolve to do something about them should be applauded. But it's vital that he proceed carefully, mindful that even if he succeeds where his predecessor failed in a mayoral takeover of schools, reformed governance is no panacea for the educational ills of a dysfunctional system.

Mr. Fenty commissioned an outside consultant to assess what has been successful in other public school systems, and that could be a useful guide as he works with the D.C. Council on reform. Incoming council Chairman Vincent C. Gray (D) is reorganizing the committee system so education becomes the responsibility for all council members meeting as a committee of the whole. It's a welcome move that highlights education as a priority.

The best chance of winning approval for any school improvement plan is likely to come in the honeymoon days of Mr. Fenty's administration, but he must not seek a political victory at the expense of developing a plan that actually has a chance of working. Mr. Fenty, in running for office, appealed to voters' impatience for change. Now, as mayor, he'll need patience to achieve it.

West Tries A New Tack To Block Iran's Nuclear Agenda (NYT)

By Helene Cooper And Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 1 — The United States and its allies in Europe, in a tacit acknowledgment that sanctions imposed by the United Nations Security Council in late December are too weak to force Iran to abandon its nuclear ambitions, have embarked on a new strategy to increase the financial and psychological pressure.

The plan is to use the language of the resolution to help persuade foreign governments and financial institutions to cut ties with Iranian businesses, individuals in its nuclear and missile programs and, by extension, the Iranian Revolutionary Guard Corps, said Stuart Levey, under secretary of the treasury for terrorism and financial intelligence.

The Guard and its military wing are identified as a power base for President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

Under his administration, American officials said, the Guard has moved increasingly into commercial operations, earning profits and extending its influence in Iran in areas involving big government contracts — including building airports and other infrastructure, oil production and the providing of cellphones.

Bush administration officials, who asked not to be identified because they were discussing diplomatic plans, said envoys would soon head abroad to press officials of foreign governments and banks to interpret the Security Council resolution equally aggressively.

The new strategy builds on the Treasury Department's efforts over the past few months to get Western banks to scale back business with Iran or risk running afoul of American laws. In 2006, the European banks Credit Suisse First Boston and UBS said they would not do any new business with Iran.

It is hard to assess how deeply the financial actions may cut, since the most willing parties to the effort — the United States and Europe — have few business dealings with Iran. The United States does have laws that give it considerable leeway to impose financial restrictions on banks and companies doing business in Iran, while European law does not.

That said, Britain is also backing the new push, as is France, although to a lesser extent. Germany, with far more business interests in Iran, is not quite as eager. Japan is not a member of the Security Council, and the country is heavily dependent on the Persian Gulf for oil. But Japanese government officials have recently indicated their willingness to limit some of their business dealings with Iran.

Last month, the Japan Bank for International Cooperation announced that it would not issue any new loans for Iranian projects until Iran resolved the nuclear impasse with the West. In addition, Japan has reduced its stake in an initial $2 billion deal to develop Iran's largest onshore oil field at Azadegan to 10 percent from the originally agreed 75 percent, citing concern about Iran's nuclear program.

While United States officials have discussed what they are trying to do with their Russian and Chinese counterparts, the belief is that they have gone about as far as they are willing to go with the Security Council resolution that passed Dec. 23. Russia fought to keep certain entities off the list and to keep the list as narrow as possible.

Mr. Levey noted that the resolution cited three people as off limits to outside commercial transactions, and, in another section, prohibited transactions with agencies "owned or controlled" by them. The three, he said, are Maj. Gen. Yahya Rahim Safavi, commander of the Iranian Revolutionary Guard Corps; Gen. Hosein Salimi, who is in charge of the air force branch of the corps; and Ahmad Vahid Dastjerdi, who runs the Aerospace Industries Organization.

Thus, an effort to bar future foreign commercial or government involvement, including bank transactions, affecting missile programs and the Iranian Revolutionary Guard is authorized by the resolution, Mr. Levey said.

"This resolution will be a big step forward in getting governments and financial institutions to pay more attention to Iran's use of deceptive financial practices to facilitate its dangerous conduct and to stop doing business with the I.R.G.C.," Mr. Levey said, referring to the Revolutionary Guard.

The resolution says that "all states" will "take the necessary measures" to bar "financial assistance" and "financial resources or services" related to nuclear and ballistic missile programs. The resolution's appendix cites several government and private groups and 12 people as involved in those programs; interrupting foreign involvement with those groups and individuals is also part of the new campaign.

But American officials have no figures on the value of international business done with those cited in the resolution.

The United States and European officials said they had also begun trying maneuvers aimed at undermining the self-assurance of Iranian officials, especially those who travel abroad.

The recent arrests of four Iranian diplomats by American troops in Iraq, the officials said, played into that strategy. Pentagon officials said the Iranians were suspected of transferring improvised explosive devices from Iran to Iraq. Iran complained loudly that the men were diplomats and that their arrest violated accepted diplomatic rules. The diplomats, two of whom American officials said were probably members of the Revolutionary Guard, were eventually released.

But their arrests are "precisely the type of thing that will chip away at their confidence," one European official said. Most of the Western officials spoke on the condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to speak publicly about the issue.

Even before the new effort began, the slowdown in international business was already emerging as a problem for Iran, which has vast oil fields but relatively little refining capacity. It imports 43 percent of its gasoline, according to the Institute for the Analysis of Global Security, a Washington-based nonprofit group that follows energy issues.

In a rare acknowledgment of difficulty, the Iranian oil minister, Kazem Vaziri-Hamaneh, told the ministry's news agency, Shana, recently that Iran was encountering obstacles in financing oil projects. "Currently, overseas banks and financiers have decreased their cooperation," Mr. Vaziri-Hamaneh told the agency.

Iran is already seeking to secure gasoline imports from its allies, including Venezuela, and shifting some dependency from gasoline to natural gas.

"Definitely, the Iranian economy is suffering a great deal as a result of the economic punishment," said Gal Luft, the executive director of the Institute for the Analysis of Global Security. But he added that Mr. Ahmadinejad "is not just sitting on his hands and waiting."

The new strategy comes in part because few believe that the sanctions resolution that passed Dec. 23 has the muscle to sway Iran to abandon its nuclear ambitions, which it insists are focused on energy production, not weapons. The road to sanctions was a tortuous one, filled with wrangling between the United States, which pushed for tough measures, and Russia, which advocated weaker measures.

United States and European officials said they might still try to include tougher sanctions through the United Nations in the months ahead. But they say the West will need to use other measures as well.

Specifically, the United States will press France, Germany, Italy and other European countries to halt credits that encourage doing business in Iran. The German Ministry of Economics, in a credit program called Hermes, says on a Web site that Iran is among "risky markets, which are also growth markets," identified for such credits.

Iran Lays Down A Challenge To Arab Leaders (FT)

By Roula Khalaf, Middle East Editor

Financial Times, January 2, 2007

On a recent trip to Bahrain, a self-assured Manouchehr Mottaki, Iran's foreign minister, professed to have the answer to the Gulf's troubles.

Speaking to a largely Arab and western audience, he suggested Gulf stability was best achieved by removing American forces, well entrenched across the region, and setting up, with Tehran, a regional security alliance.

The call for more self-reliance in the Gulf has some appeal among ordinary Arabs, resentful of the US and frustrated by their own governments' over-dependence on American security.

DOJ_NMG_0110984

But official circles, in both the Gulf and the US, see his suggestions as a reflection of Iran's suspected ambition for regional superpower status.

"It's amusing," says one American official. "Iran is saying, 'Get rid of foreign forces and take us as the regional power.'"

The events of the past year have underlined Iran's growing influence in the Middle East and its determination to become a nuclear power. But they have also reinforced the perception of Shia Iran as the biggest strategic threat to Washington's Sunni allies in the Gulf, home to two-thirds of the world's oil reserves.

Tehran's regional strategy has been to back militant groups that confront Israel, positioning itself as a stronger defender of Arab and Palestinian rights than its Arab neighbours.

This approach worked remarkably well in the summer, when the Iranian-backed Hizbollah group in Lebanon stood its ground against a month-long Israeli offensive. Arab leaders who had criticised Hizbollah's kidnapping of two Israeli soldiers, the act that sparked the war, emerged from the conflict weakened while Iran was emboldened.

What now alarms the Sunni Arab regimes most, however, is that an American failure to rescue Iraq from sectarian conflict could shift the balance of power in the region even more in favour of Iran.

Arab leaders largely back the minority Sunni in Iraq. Iranian officials say they support the central Iraqi government, dominated by the Shia majority. But according to senior Iraqi officials, Tehran's strategy is more complex, and involves support for individual Shia groups, with the apparent aim of building separate links to Tehran.

Arab officials say Iran's resurgence should not be exaggerated: its pursuit of a nuclear programme will bring greater international isolation, and this carries economic costs that will gradually become more apparent. But the Arab Gulf states have yet to formulate a coherent or common approach to address the perceived Iranian challenge.

Reluctant to throw their lot even more decisively behind a weakened and seemingly confused America, most are also worried about a potential dialogue between Washington and Tehran, fearing it could affect their own interests.

Saudi Arabia has been holding its own bilateral talks with senior Iranian officials but people close to its government say little progress has been made on easing regional tensions.

In an unusually bold move the Arab Gulf states announced this month they would study the possible development of nuclear technology, insisting – as Iran does – that the purpose would be energy production, not atomic weapons. Seen as a message to Tehran, the announcement also raised concerns about proliferation in the region.

The US, for its part, has been seeking to underline that its commitment to the Gulf is unwavering, whatever happens in Iraq.

Washington has launched a security initiative designed to strengthen security and defence ties with the Arab Gulf states, while the US has increased its naval presence in the region.

But Washington's ultimate ambition to create a multi-lateral security system has received a cool response. Wary of each other, the Arab countries prefer to focus on deepening their bilateral defence ties with the US.

"The Gulf knows it needs to beef up its defences. But for the set-up that the US wants, which is to deal with the region as one institution, Gulf countries need to have a different relationship between each other," says one senior Arab official.

US officials acknowledge that some of the smaller Gulf states are also weighing their military relationship with the US against the risk of alienating Tehran.

The Bush administration has been particularly concerned about gas-rich Qatar, where the US maintains its largest military base in the region.

One US official says Washington has been seeking explanations from the Qatari government about recent decisions at the UN and the Arab League that have appeared more supportive of Iran's regional interests rather than those of the pro-western Arab states.

Arab regimes, meanwhile, have been pleading with Washington to press for progress on the Palestinian-Israeli conflict, hoping moves towards the creation of a viable Palestinian state will help tip the strategic balance in the region back in their favour.

Some Iraqi officials argue that the Arab states' best strategy to check Iran's influence is to build bridges with Iraq's Shia majority.

DOJ_NMG_0110985

"The Shia in Iraq are Arabs [not Persians] and they feel the Arabs have rejected them," says an Iraqi official. "What the Arabs should do is embrace the Shia government of Iraq and try to make it a counterbalance to Iran."

Officials in Baghdad say this message, regularly relayed to Arab rulers, is only now starting to sink in.

US Unit Works Quietly To Counter Iran's Sway (BOS)

By Farah Stockman, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, January 2, 2007

Backs dissidents, nearby nations

WASHINGTON -- For nearly a year, a select group of US officials has been quietly coordinating actions to counter the looming threat of a nuclear-armed Iran, including increasing the military capabilities of Arab allies such as Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates, and Bahrain.

The group, known as the Iran Syria Policy and Operations Group, or ISOG, is also coordinating a host of other actions, which include covert assistance to Iranian dissidents and building international outrage toward Iran by publicizing its alleged role in a 1994 terrorist attack in Argentina, according to interviews with half a dozen White House, Pentagon, and State Department officials who are involved in the group's work.

Pentagon officials involved with the group intend to ask Congress as early as February to increase funding for transfers of military hardware to allies in the Persian Gulf and to accelerate plans for joint military activities. The request, which is still being formulated, is expected to include but not be limited to more advanced-missile defense systems and early-warning radar to detect and prevent Iranian missile strikes.

"There is the perception in the Gulf that Iran is really on the rise," said Emile El-Hokayem, research fellow at the Stimpson Center, a Washington-based think tank. "Washington wants to prepare for a potential show down."

The existence of ISOG reflects an intensification of the Bush administration's planning on Iran. Syria, which has linked itself to Iran through military pacts, is a lesser focus for the group. Its workings have been so secretive that several officials in the State Department's Near Eastern Affairs bureau said they were unaware it existed.

The United States has repeatedly said its policy is not to overthrow the Iranian regime, but one former US official who attended a meeting during ISOG's initial phase eight months ago said in an interview that he got the impression that regime change was a key goal of many of the meetings' participants.

He said that some of the intelligence reports ordered by members of the group were so highly classified that they were accessible to less than a dozen people in the US government, suggesting that some of the group's activities were far from routine.

But interviews with half a dozen current White House, Pentagon, and State Department officials indicated that ISOG's aims are more modest. Several said that as much as they would like to see the regimes in Tehran and Damascus go, ongoing military activities in Iraq and Afghanistan have limited their range of options. The main goal now, they said, is Cold War style "containment" of Iran in the hopes that Iranians one day will opt to change their own government.

The officials, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to speak about the topic to the press, described ISOG as an inter agency clearinghouse for ideas and strategies to roll back the influence of Iran. Senior officials of the State Department, White House, CIA, Treasury Department, and other agencies meet weekly to report their day-to-day operations.

"It's really more operational, to provide a forum for ongoing interagency group discussions on Iran and Syria, share ideas, and follow things up week after week," said Kate Starr , a National Security Council spokeswoman.

ISOG's work, which focuses on isolating and containing Iran, is consistent with the administration's refusal to reach out diplomatically to Iran and Syria, as the Iraq Study Group has recommended.

"Iran is the key to everything at the strategic level -- the biggest problem we have faced in a long time," said a senior State Department official involved in ISOG, citing Iran's negative impact on Lebanon, Israel, Iraq, Afghanistan, Israel, and the Palestinian territories. "These are all things they are doing because they sense weakness [on the part of the United States]. The best thing for us to project is strength, not 'please talk to us.' "

ISOG was modeled after the Iraq Policy and Operations Group, set up in 2004 to shepherd information and coordinate US action in Iraq. ISOG has raised eyebrows within the State Department for hiring BearingPoint -- the same Washington-based private contracting firm used by the Iraq group -- to handle its administrative work, rather than State Department employees.

Some lower level State Department officials saw the decision to outsource responsibility for scheduling meetings, record keeping, and distributing reports as an effort to circumvent the normal diplomatic machinery and provide extra secrecy for the group.

But State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said BearingPoint was hired for its experience and good work on Iraq. He said that about a dozen BearingPoint contractors work out of the Iraq Policy and Operations Group office on the sixth floor of the State Department, and that a few of them have begun working on the Iran and Syria group.

ISOG is led by a steering committee with two leading hawks on Middle East policy as chairmen: James F. Jeffrey, prinicipal deputy assistant secretary of state for Near Eastern Affairs, who once headed Iraq policy, and Elliott Abrams, deputy national security adviser for "Global Democracy Strategy." Michael Doran, a Middle East specialist at the White House, steps in when Abrams is away. Elizabeth Cheney, the vice president's daughter, who was the former deputy assistant secretary of state for Near Eastern Affairs, served as cochairwoman before she took a maternity leave earlier this year.

ISOG is made of five main "pillars," or working groups. The military group explores ways to bolster Arab defenses and create more military cooperation between the Persian Gulf states. The initiative was set into motion in May , when John Hillen, assistant secretary of state for political and military affairs, traveled to the region on his first of a series of trips to the Gulf.

In October, Hillen and Assistant Secretary of Defense Peter W. Rodman, along with National Security Council staff and others, traveled to Oman, the United Arab Emirates, and Bahrain to discuss ways to beef up the military capabilities of those countries.

US officials also conducted the first naval training exercises in the Persian Gulf designed to intercept weapons shipments to and from Iran, with participation from Bahrain, Qatar, and the United Arab Emirates.

A second working group deals with "democracy outreach," focusing on the State Department's effort to provide secret financial assistance to dissidents and reformist organizations inside Iran and Syria. It also seeks ways to use scientific exchanges and human rights conferences to learn more about what is happening inside Iran, officials said.

US financing of pro democracy activities in Iran is expected to double in 2008, according to the senior State Department official. In 2006, $85 million was allocated for such programs.

A third working group focuses on finances and the Treasury Department's efforts to beef up bilateral restrictions on money transfers to and from Iranian banks. A fourth group focuses on Iran's "special relationships" with Iraq, Lebanon, Afghanistan, and terrorist organizations. That group has closely followed Iran's alleged role in a 1994 bombing of a Jewish center in Argentina.

A fifth working group coordinates media outreach to the people of Iran, Syria, and the region.

Iran: A Brewing Battle Of Heavyweights In Tehran (NSWK)

By Maziar Bahari

Jan. 8, 2006 issue - Iranians are deserting the president they elected by a landslide in June 2005. Not only did university students heckle Mahmoud Ahmadinejad with chants of "Death to the dictator!" during a speech last month in Tehran, state-run TV had the temerity to report it. Some of his own supporters criticized his recent international gathering of Holocaust revisionists as harmful to Iran's national interests. And thanks to his economic flubs, Iranians are grumbling about inflation instead of reveling in an oil-boom windfall. Iranian TV reported that news, too, and when Ahmadinejad complained about the story, the network's director (a former ally) replied: "We just tell the truth." The legislature has stopped rubber-stamping the 50-year-old president's decisions, and the latest local elections cost him all but two of his allies on Tehran's 15-seat city council. The big winner: his pothole-filling, street-cleaning successor as mayor of Tehran, Mohammad Bagher Ghalibaf, 45.

Iran's next presidential vote isn't due until 2009, but Ghalibaf is already casting a shadow on Ahmadinejad's future. The main difference between the two rivals is not so much substance as style. Both men are religious conservatives with almost identical political agendas and economic programs—and both of them voice a deep mistrust of America. But where

Ahmadinejad is confrontational and "showboaty," Ghalibaf is a pragmatist with a reputation for getting things done. The president spent much of his previous career as a junior bureaucrat, while the mayor's résumé lists one overachievement after another. The son of a truck driver, Ghalibaf became a Revolutionary Guards commander at 22. He earned a Ph.D. in geopolitics while training as a pilot after the Iran-Iraq War. He led the Revolutionary Guards Air Force and then the country's security forces.

As top cop he won yet more fans. In 2003 he did something virtually unheard of: he quelled a student protest without bloodshed by holding talks with student leaders and ordering his men not to use batons or guns in dispersing the crowds. He showed a rare sense of compassion in other ways, as well, OK'ing a needle-exchange program for addicts and setting up a meeting for prostitutes to discuss alternatives to their profession. He was the conservative front runner in 2005 until he reached out to moderates and lost his base. "It was interesting to see Mr. Ghalibaf become more reformist than the reformists themselves," recalls sociologist Hamidreza Jalaeipour. "In the meantime, Ahmadinejad found who were the real hard-liners and gave them a voice." For now, Ghalibaf is making sure Tehran's trash gets picked up—and doing a fine job, too—while he waits for 2009. He's not a man who makes the same mistake twice.

Palestinians Clash; Photographer Seized (WP/AP)

Associated Press

The Washington Post, January 2, 2007

GAZA CITY, Jan. 1 -- Violence erupted in the Gaza Strip on Monday, with warring Palestinian factions firing at each other and kidnapping rivals, and gunmen abducting a foreign news photographer.

The clashes in the Jabalya refugee camp near Gaza City broke a week-long pause in the violent confrontation between the radical Islamic group Hamas, which controls the government ministries, and the Fatah movement of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. In the past few weeks, 17 people have been killed, leading to fears of civil war.

At least two people were wounded in the gunfire Monday, security officials said, and between three and 11 Fatah and Hamas activists were reported kidnapped.

Before sundown Monday, gunmen in Gaza City abducted a photographer with the news service Agence France-Presse, which identified him as Jaime Razuri, 50, of Peru. An AFP reporter said the photographer was returning from an assignment in Gaza and was abducted at gunpoint as he got out of his car with his driver.

Palestinian security officials said Razuri was standing at an intersection when about five masked men approached him, pushed him into a car and sped away.

Israel Begins Promised Easing Of West Bank Controls (AFP)

AFP, January 2, 2007

Israel has begun easing restrictions at checkpoints in the occupied West Bank as promised by Prime Minister Ehud Olmert at a summit with Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas last month.

An Israeli military spokesman said roadblocks were not being lifted altogether for the time being.

"These measures mainly concern an easing of severe checks at various crossing points and not, at this stage, the removal of military barriers," the spokesman said Monday.

Palestinian chief negotiator Saeb Erakat told AFP that Olmert promised Israel would begin lifting restrictions on some checkpoints Monday in a telephone call to Abbas the previous day.

But Erakat said that it was not possible to say if anything had changed yet.

"We observe what Israel does and we will judge what we will see with our eyes, not what we hear from them," he told AFP.

AFP correspondents in the West Bank said there was little movement through checkpoints due to the Islamic Eid al-Adha feast.

However, security officials and witnesses in Nablus said that it was easier to pass through controls on Monday than beforehand.

The Israeli prime minister vowed to take "immediate and concrete steps" to improve humanitarian conditions for the Palestinians after his December 23 talks with Abbas -- the two men's first meeting in six months.

DOJ_NMG_0110988

Defence Minister Amir Peretz later told parliament's foreign affairs and defence committee that Israel would dismantle 59 of the 400 or so roadblocks in the West Bank in two phases -- 24 at first, and the rest later.

Palestinians travelling across the West Bank are forced daily to run the gauntlet of dozens of checkpoints erected by the Israeli army to control the movement of militants.

Looking Down The Road To Damascus (USNEWS)

By Larry Derfner

U.S. News and World Report, January 2, 2007

JERUSALEM–Could it be that Syria now offers a rare glimmer of hope amid the barren prospects for progress in the Middle East? That question, easily dismissed as wishful thinking, suddenly is a red-hot topic from Jerusalem to Washington.

The doubters have plenty of evidence on their side. A hard-line nationalist police state that prides itself on defiance of the United States and Israel, Syria helps America's enemies in Iraq, as well as Israel's enemies in Lebanon, the West Bank, and Gaza–and allies itself with the West's nemesis, Iran, its neighbor to the east. Yet in recent weeks, Syrian President Bashar Assad has been peppering the international media with expressions of eagerness to talk peace with Israel. "Make an attempt. Call our bluff," he challenged Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert in a recent interview with the Italian daily La Repubblica.

Does he mean it? A succession of American politicians–Democratic Sens. John Kerry, Christopher Dodd, and Bill Nelson, as well as Republican Arlen Specter–have come away from recent meetings with Assad at least intrigued. Besides that, the bipartisan Iraq Study Group urged the Bush administration to try diplomatic means to persuade Syria to stop supporting Sunni insurgents in Iraq. None of this, however, appeals to President Bush, who considers Syria an auxiliary member of the "axis of evil." Or to Olmert, who insists that Assad validate any change of heart by first cutting off Iran and the terrorist groups like Hezbollah and Hamas.

Linchpin. The general assumption in Israel is that Olmert may be simply taking his cue from Bush. But that may not wash with many Israelis. Just as political pressure is building in Washington to force Bush to make an opening to Syria, political and military players in Israel are trying to do the same thing to Olmert. While the American sentiment grows out of Iraq-war frustration, Israeli sentiment is driven by the general bleakness of peace prospects in the region. The push for talks with Assad is coming from Olmert's main coalition partner, the Labor Party; the dovish Meretz party; the media; and, most critically, influential members of the military-intelligence establishment.

The idea is to flip Syria from being the linchpin that connects the Iran-terrorist axis to being a wedge that divides and isolates its component parts. The hope is that peace with Israel will bring Syria to break ties with Iran, stop being the middleman for Iranian arms transfers to Hezbollah guerrillas in Lebanon, and expel the leaders of Hamas and Islamic Jihad from Damascus.

History. If this all sounds too good to be true, it may well be. Assad's father, Hafez, negotiated via U.S. mediators throughout the 1990s with five consecutive Israeli prime ministers, and nothing came of it. While Bashar Assad would like some distance from Iran and wouldn't mind being delinked from the axis of evil, he's not about to enlist in the war on terrorism, says Tel Aviv University Prof. Eyal Zisser, a leading Israeli expert on Syria. "If Assad signs a peace treaty with Israel, that doesn't mean he's going to send the Iranian ambassador home the same day," says Zisser. Likewise, Assad might downgrade his relations with terrorist organizations but wouldn't end them, he says, noting: "I think these issues can be discussed in peace negotiations, but I really doubt whether anything dramatic can be achieved."

Somali Islamic Fighters Flee Toward Kenya (WP)

By Stephanie McCrummen

NAIROBI, Jan. 1 -- Ethiopian forces backing Somalia's weak transitional government have taken over Kismaayo, the last stronghold of the country's Islamic movement, and on Monday were chasing the remnants of the Islamic militia along the Indian Ocean coast toward the Kenyan border about 100 miles to the south.

In the final stage of a dramatic power shift in the fragile Horn of Africa nation, the Islamic fighters abandoned their heaviest weapons early Monday morning and took off for villages in the forest, with Ethiopian and government troops in hot pursuit of key leaders, including three suspects in the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania.

"Our forces have captured Kismaayo," Somali Prime Minister Ali Mohamed Gedi told reporters in Mogadishu, where Ethiopian forces installed his secular, internationally recognized government just days ago. "The warlord era in Somalia is now over."

Gedi has given fighters loyal to the Islamic movement, which was organized under an umbrella group called the Council of Islamic Courts, three days to disarm, and promised amnesty for those who do. Government officials said that in Kismaayo, hundreds of fighters had turned over their weapons Monday and were returning to their clans.

With the most hard-core militiamen headed their way, Kenyan authorities on Monday tightened security along their border with Somalia, which extends for more than 420 miles. Many of the large number of Somali refugees in Kenya may be sympathetic to the Islamic leaders, and analysts say it would be easy for the fighters to melt into the local population.

Kenyan and Somali government officials have said that if they capture the three embassy bombing suspects, they will hand them over to the U.S. government. Meanwhile, some analysts speculated that the Kenyan government, which has pushed the Somali transitional government to include the more moderate leaders of the Islamic Courts movement, might allow those leaders to take refuge in Kenya.

On Monday, Gedi called for the quick deployment to Somalia of a peacekeeping force from the 53-country African Union. That force would in theory replace the Ethiopian troops who are guarding the vulnerable new government but are also causing tensions among Somalis who consider them invaders.

Abdikarin Farah, the Somali ambassador to Ethiopia, said that a long-standing request for U.S. military assistance was also on the table.

"We are pursuing that request, and I won't be surprised if that comes to light," said Farah, speaking from Addis Ababa, the Ethiopian capital. "We have very close coordination and are in touch with the Americans, and obviously we will continue that kind of contact."

Though Ethiopian troops have been stoned by protesters in Mogadishu in recent days, Farah said that longtime animosities between Ethiopia and Somalia are "history" now.

Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi has said that he will not withdraw troops until he has ferreted out certain Islamic leaders. Farah said that the government would not ask the Ethiopians to leave until the security situation in the country improves.

"The next step is the difficult one and the long one," he said. "To build the country, and to go forward."

Gedi, the prime minister, continued to meet with clan and religious leaders in the battle-scarred capital of Mogadishu on Monday, as he attempts to establish a viable government in a country of warring clans and sub-clans that has been without any central authority for more than 15 years.

The transitional government was cobbled together more than two years ago in a series of negotiations in Kenya. Regional diplomats contend that even more than the government's leaders, its institutions and structure, designed to include Somalia's complex clan interests, represent the best hope for establishing a viable central government in the country.

The Council of Islamic Courts, which began as a group of local clerics, had come to power in June even as the transitional government was taking hold, and a power struggle ensued.

Ordinary Somalis, who tend to be moderate in their religious views, generally embraced the Islamic movement, following years of thuggish rule by warlords who set up roadblocks, extorted bribes and generally terrorized the population.

But Meles, the Ethiopian prime minister, was uncomfortable with the prospect of an unfriendly government on his border and backed the transitional government. According to the United Nations, Ethiopia had thousands of troops inside Somalia for months before the recent offensive, protecting the nascent government. The government has denied the claim.

In a resolution authorizing military action, the Ethiopian government accused the Islamic movement of supporting ethnic Somali secessionist groups inside Ethiopia, a charge the movement denied.

Both Ethiopia and the United States accused the Islamic leaders of close collaboration with al-Qaeda, a claim that many regional analysts said was exaggerated. For their part, the Islamic leaders had declared holy war on Ethiopian troops.

During the exchange of rhetoric, the Islamic movement managed to get the capital's main airport and port running after years of closure by clan fighting, and established efficient systems of administration that must now be replaced by the transitional government.

In Kismaayo on Monday, the vast challenges were immediately evident, as the port city drifted into the sort of chaos that has long defined Somalia. Local clan militias snatched up weapons left behind by the Islamic fighters and went on a looting spree.

Meanwhile, Somalia's ports and airports remained closed on Monday, and the price of food and other necessities of daily life began to skyrocket. In Mogadishu, some businessmen were growing impatient.

"There are no commercial flights, no commercial vessels can come in," said one Somali businessman who did not want to be identified because of the precarious political situation. "People are asking why don't they open the ports. The food prices are going high."

After 15 Years, Someone's In Charge In Somalia, If Barely (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia, Jan. 1 — After Somalia's Islamist forces abandoned their final outpost on Monday, the transitional government moved aggressively to assert control, setting a three-day deadline for all weapons to be turned in and calling for international peacekeeping troops to be sent immediately.

Somalia was already a place where military-grade weaponry was casually flaunted on its streets, but the Islamists' swift collapse has created such a surplus of guns that the average price of a Kalashnikov assault rifle, one of the world's most popular killing machines, has dropped to $15.

Ali Mohammed Gedi, the former veterinarian who is the transitional prime minister, said at his daily news conference that he would not tolerate the situation and gave instructions for turning in the weapons.

"Individuals or groups of people who have trucks mounted with antiaircraft guns, known as 'technicals,' should bring those battlewagons to Mogadishu's old port," he said.

Clan leaders were skeptical about whether he would succeed, and many Somalis seemed dead set against it. "They're trying to neuter us," said Muhammad Duudo, an unemployed car mechanic. "And it's not going to happen. Just wait until the full moon passes and the darkness comes."

Whatever lies ahead, encouraging or ominous, most Somalis seemed to agree that after a week of fast-moving events, the rough outlines of a new reality were emerging. For the first time since the former dictator, Mohamed Siad Barre, fled the country in 1991, casting Somalia into 15 years of anarchy, there is a credible government based in Mogadishu, the capital, with serious outside support and no organized military threat from within.

True, countless gunmen still roam the streets, heavily armed warlords still command authority and the seeds of a possible guerrilla movement may be taking root.

But so far no major force has emerged to challenge the authority of the transitional government. The only rival, the Islamists, lost their last conventional military battle on Monday. The Islamists had steadily lost ground since Dec. 24, when Ethiopia unleashed a punishing series of airstrikes and pushed ground troops deep into Somali territory.

Ethiopian officials justified their intervention in Somalia's messy, violent internal politics by saying the Islamist movement was a regional threat with terrorist connections and ambitions to invade their country. Ethiopia commands one of the most powerful militaries in Africa, and within days of its entrance into the war, Burhakaba, a pivotal inland town, fell from Islamist control — then Jowhar, another key town, and then Mogadishu, the Islamists' former stronghold.

By Sunday, the last remnants of the Islamist forces, which just a few weeks ago controlled a large swath of Somalia, were cornered in Kismayo, a port city on the south Somali coast. Thousands of Ethiopian and transitional government troops were closing in on them, and on Sunday night, the Ethiopians began pounding away with heavy artillery.

At the same time, Kismayo clan elders were pleading with the Islamists to leave. The elders said the Islamists did not stand a chance, and they were worried that their city was about to be flattened. Clan elders in Mogadishu similarly decided last week that the Islamists were a losing cause and pulled their troops and weapons out of the movement.

As in Mogadishu, the Islamists in Kismayo, after many fiery speeches about fighting to the death, simply fled. By Monday morning, many of the Islamists' fighters in Kismayo had shed their uniforms and melted back into the population while others headed south toward a thickly forested area along the Kenyan border.

"I can't tell you how happy people were that they disappeared," said Adam Ragay, a businessman in Kismayo.

As soon as the Islamists left, looters rushed into the streets and smashed up stores and ran away with televisions and cellphones. But by midafternoon, the brief burst of anarchy was over and transitional government troops had arrived on the outskirts of town.

Residents of Kismayo said the remaining Islamists were heading toward Ras Kamboni, a small town in an isolated area on the Kenyan border that the Islamists had used before as a hide-out. Ethiopian intelligence officials say operatives of Al Qaeda, invited by the Islamists, planned the 1998 attacks on American Embassies in Kenya and Tanzania from Ras Kamboni.

Kenyan officials say they have increased border security to keep the Islamists from escaping. "Anyone who ventures to enter Kenya will have to go through a very serious vetting process," Alfred N. Mutua, a Kenyan spokesman, said in a statement on Monday.

Mr. Gedi has acknowledged that he needs a lot of outside help. Security in Mogadishu is still uncertain, with just a light presence of soldiers.

Mogadishu's ports and airport remain closed, strangling the flow of goods and sending prices for rice, sugar, oil and gasoline through the roof. The schools remain closed.

One of the Islamists' first steps after beginning their ill-fated attack on the transitional government was to close all schools to funnel more teenagers to the front. Their move backfired both militarily and politically after countless teenage soldiers were summarily mowed down by better-trained Ethiopian troops.

Abdi Sallah, a pharmacist in Mogadishu, said he thought that the new government was heading in the right direction but that it needed to step gingerly. "So, we ask all the militia to turn in their weapons and then what happens?" he said. "Do they become part of a national army or do they become unemployed? Have these guys thought all this through?"

Last Islamist Stronghold Falls In Somalia (FT)

By Andrew England

Financial Times, January 2, 2007

Somali government forces backed by Ethiopian troops entered the southern port of Kismayo on Monday and began taking control of the last major stronghold of the Islamist movement that has controlled much of southern Somalia since the summer.

The Islamists, who have fled all their frontline positions in the face of a rapid Ethiopia-led offensive, were reportedly moving south towards Somalia's border with Kenya. Despite their retreat during the last week, Islamist leaders have vowed to continue their fight, leading to concerns they may launch a guerrilla campaign that could attract foreign militants.

The Islamist movement was created out of an alliance of Islamic courts and included conservatives and militant hardliners.

Both Addis Ababa – which is believed to have received tacit US support for its offensive - and Washington accused the alliance of harbouring and including al-Qaeda terrorists, including suspects wanted in connection with the 1998 US embassy bombings in Nairobi and Dar es Salaam, as well as the 2002 attack on an Israeli-owned hotel in Kenya.

The courts denied the allegations and were welcomed by many for bringing a semblance of order to areas under its control. However, they also created resentment for their harsh interpretation of the Koran and a hardline military wing within the alliance, which was known as the Shabaab, was thought to include extremists.

It was unclear what had happened to the Shabaab militia.

A US official said Washington was encouraging the government to enter into dialogue with "all Somali parties of goodwill," including moderates within the Islamist alliance, and was pushing for the deployment of an African-led peacekeeping force.

A Ugandan military spokesman said it would be ready to deploy 1,000 peacekeeping troops within days under the aegis of the Inter-Governmental Authority on Development, an east African development organisation. But it is unclear who would finance or who else would contribute troops to any peacekeeping mission, and IGAD has formulated no firm plans for such a force.

The last such international mission to Somalia ended in humiliation. Led by the US and UN, the force finally withdrew from the country in March 1995 following bloody fighting with Somali militias.

The US, which describes Somalia as a potential haven for terrorists, has around 1,500 troops and personnel deployed in neighbouring Djibouti as part of its war on terror. The US official said the force had not had a military role on the ground in Somalia, but added that Washington regarded it as its right to pursue al-Qaida suspects wherever they were. He said the task force would continue to monitor the region for the movement of terror suspects.

"We continue to go after those responsible for the 1998 bombings," the US official said. "If we have indications that al-Qaida suspects are leaving Somalia we will pursue them."

The courts alliance came to prominence after seizing Mogadishu from a group of US-backed warlords in June. They then increased their area of influence to much of southern Somalia, while the transitional government, weak and divided, was restricted to the central town of Baidoa.

But with vital support from Ethiopia, which deployed thousands of troops, backed by tanks and fighter jets, government forces were able to enter Mogadishu last week as the Islamist fled south.

The administration, which was unpopular among many Somalis and had been ineffective since its establishment two years ago, still faces immense challenges if it is to bring stability to a country torn apart by 15 years of rule by warlords, clan divisions and violence. The impoverished Muslim nation is awash with weapons, has a crumbling infrastructure and more than a dozen attempts to form an effective central government have failed.

If the transitional administration is to succeed, it will have to be willing to negotiate and broaden its base of support, particularly from among the Hawiye clan that has dominated Mogadishu since 1991 and provided a significant support to the courts alliance, analysts say.

Ali Mohamed Gedi, the prime minister, repeated calls for the deployment of an African Union peacekeeping force to be deployed and has said that while the Islamists leaders and foreign jihadists will be pursued, the movement's rank and file fighters would be granted amnesty if they gave themselves up.

Mr Gedi has also said warlords and clan militias should hand over their weapons, but that poses huge challenges as guns have provided clans and faction leaders with power, control and the means to run extortion rackets.

Bulgaria, Romania Join European Union (AP)

By Nevyana Hadjiyska

AP, January 2, 2007

Bulgaria and Romania — two former communist nations from one of the poorest corners of Europe — joined the European Union on Monday to bring the bloc's membership to 27 nations.

The two, which bring 30 million new members to the union, officially joined the EU at midnight to joyous fireworks celebrations that drew tens of thousands of New Year's Eve revelers to the two capitals of Sofia and Bucharest.

"This is a day of historical justice, because Bulgarians have always been Europeans in spirit and identity," Bulgarian President Georgi Parvanov told about 2,000 people who attended an elaborate membership ceremony Monday in front of the St. Sophia church.

In Bucharest, Romanian President Traian Basescu hailed the end of the difficult journey to membership that began in 1995.

"It was hard, but we arrived at the end of the road. It is the road of our future. It is the road of our joy," Basescu said.

Bulgarian officials removed customs barriers at 15 border crossing with Greece and Romania within hours of EU membership. But controls at Bulgaria's borders with Turkey, Serbia and Macedonia were strengthened in a sign of the pressure on the new members to pursue reforms needed to meet bloc standards.

In Sofia, many wore ribbons in support of five Bulgarian nurses sentenced to death in Libya on charges they intentionally infected more than 400 Libyan children with HIV, despite evidence the children were infected before the medical workers began working at the hospital.

EU Enlargement Commissioner Olli Rehn and EU parliament president Josep Borrell voiced solidarity with the nurses.

"You are not alone. The EU is with you," Rehn said in Sofia.

Bulgaria and Romania threw off communism in 1989, applied for EU membership in 1995 and began accession talks in 2000. Negotiations ended two years ago, and the European Commission declared in September that both could join.

But the two impoverished countries are still struggling to establish Western-style legal and political institutions. Under restrictions adopted by the EU, both must report every six months to show progress in reforms — or risk losing part of their economic aid.

Bulgaria mothballed two Russian-made reactors at its only nuclear plant in the waning hours Sunday, ceding to an EU request over safety.

Despite lingering problems with corruption and judicial reforms, both countries recently have had strong economic growth. Still, salaries remain low by western European standards. In Bulgaria, the average monthly wage is $235, while the average Romanian earns about $400 monthly.

BRUSSELS, Jan. 1 — Romania and Bulgaria joined the European Union on Monday, helping to end geographic divisions left over from the cold war and extending the borders of the now 27-member bloc eastward to the Black Sea.

In Bucharest, Romania, President Traian Basescu said Sunday night that the entry into the European Union signaled the end of a painful 17-year process. “We arrived in Europe, welcome to Europe,” he said to rapturous applause from a crowd in University Square. “This is an enormous chance for new generations.”

In Sofia, the Bulgarian capital, revelers gathered in Battenberg Square. Fireworks filled the sky over the building where the Communist Party once had its headquarters. “We are home!” said a headline in the Bulgarian newspaper Trud.

Romania and Bulgaria, now the European Union’s poorest members, hope that membership will help them raise their per capita wealth, which is one-third of the Union average. Their accession, the second wave of enlargement into formerly Communist Eastern Europe, will also give the Union a stable political and economic anchor in an unstable region.

Romania, with a population of about 22 million, becomes the European Union’s seventh largest member. Bulgaria has a population of 7.7 million.

For Romania, which suffered one of Eastern Europe’s most brutal Communist dictatorships under Nicolae Ceausescu before he was overthrown in 1989, being moored to the European Union is an important symbolic final break with a difficult past. For Bulgaria, whose history is marked by conflicts with the Ottoman Empire and Soviet occupation, European membership is also viewed as a source of economic and democratic stability.

The European Union has been experiencing expansion fatigue, though, after the bloc’s enlargement in May 2004 to 25 countries from 15. With the latest additions, the Union has a population of nearly 489 million.

Some members, like France, are concerned that the addition of member nations with much lower per capita incomes, the European Union will become economically overburdened, institutionally unwieldy and ultimately unmanageable. They fear that expansion will diminish their power while paralyzing the European Union’s decision-making process.

Wariness about the future shape of the Union was reflected in French and Dutch rejections of a proposed European constitution in referendums in 2005. Since then, there have been calls across the bloc for a slowing of the pace of enlargement.

Such ambivalence, stoked by fears of immigration and Europe’s lackluster economic performance, has been most prominently expressed in opposition to admitting Turkey, which is Muslim. It has also cast a shadow over the admission of Romania and Bulgaria, which have been criticized for corruption that has lingered since Communist times.

Some countries, though, led by Britain, with the enthusiastic backing of the United States, have supported further expansion because the promise of membership has helped accelerate economic and political change in Europe, ranging from the arrest of war criminals in Croatia to the liberalization of Turkey’s banking industry.

The cautious approach to further expansion was reflected in the tough conditions imposed on Romania and Bulgaria for entry.

Even now that they are in the Union, the two countries will be subject to unprecedented safeguards devised to keep them from backtracking. They include the power by the European Commission, the union's executive, to suspend some of the rights that come with membership, like generous economic aid.

The commission has also threatened to suspend recognition of arrest warrants and decisions made by Bulgarian courts if the country does not improve its judicial system.

Romania expects to receive as much as $ 2.2 billion in the first year after entry, while Bulgaria would be entitled to $873 million.

The European Union has been grappling with fears that westward migration from its poorer members in the east risks undermining the bloc's social standards.

At the time of the last enlargement, in May 2004, the European Commission estimated that the number of migrants throughout the bloc would total 70,000 to 150,000 a year. But Britain alone is estimated to have received up to 600,000 in the past three years.

Britain, Sweden and Ireland, which opened their doors to European Union newcomers in 2004, have already signaled that they are less inclined to do so now. Romanians and Bulgarians may also face obstacles in labor markets in Hungary, Slovakia and the Czech Republic, which are themselves confronting restrictions by countries further west.

At a recent meeting in Brussels, European leaders toughened their tone on enlargement but stopped short of setting new hurdles to expansion. They reaffirmed backing for the eventual membership of Turkey, Albania, Bosnia, Croatia, Macedonia, Montenegro and Serbia.

Eta Crackdown Urged On Zapatero (FT)

By Mark Mulligan And Victoria Burnett

Financial Times, January 2, 2007

José Luis Rodriguez Zapatero, Spanish prime minister, was under intense pressure on Monday to crack down heavily on Eta following a car bomb attack that ended a nine-month ceasefire and wrecked his government's controversial efforts to broker peace with the Basque separatist group group.

Mariano Rajoy, head of the opposition Popular Party, called on Mr Zapatero to act with "prudence and a sense of realism".

"The response to the attack cannot be simply to suspend a process that never should have begun in the first place," he said.

The Association of Victims of Terrorism said the prime minister should "apologise to the Spanish people" for allegedly allowing Eta the opportunity to regroup.

The calls came as Spanish police on Monday scoured the rubble left by Saturday's car bomb attack on Madrid's Barajas airport. Two Ecuadorian men were missing, believed dead, after an estimated 500kg of dynamite destroyed a multi-storey car park. The deaths, if confirmed, would mark the first fatalities caused by Eta in three and a half years.

Mr Zapatero's critics seized on the government's complete surprise at the bombing as evidence of his naivety in dealing with Eta. Less than 24 hours before the bombing, the prime minister voiced optimism about the peace process he launched in June.

The government held secret talks in December with Eta leaders and came away confident that the ceasefire would hold.

"Eta knew how to play with what can only be described as an unfathomably stupid government," Carlos Martinez Gorriaran, head of a terrorist victims' support group, wrote.

Analysts predicted that the government, which suspended the peace process on Saturday, would begin a sweep against Eta operatives and sympathisers. French authorities might also step up activity against the group, which claims France's Basque-speaking regions as part of a separate homeland.

"I would expect significant arrests in the next few weeks, in an attempt to restore people's confidence in the government's willingness and ability to apply the law," said Charles Powell, history professor at the San Pablo CEU university in Madrid.

Mr Zapatero also needs to mend fences with France, where security officials have insisted Eta remained active despite the ceasefire. Eta members stole the van used in Saturday's bombing in southern France and in October carried off a heist of 350 firearms there.

Analysts believe Mr Zapatero is unlikely to declare the peace process over as this would represent a victory for his right-wing opponents. Instead the prime minister may now invoke the ups and downs of the Northern Ireland peace process as a precedent for keeping negotiations alive.

But analysts said it was unlikely Eta and its outlawed political wing, Batasuna, could offer the kind of guarantees needed to justify resuming talks.

Belarus Caves In To Assure Gas Supply (FT)

By Arkady Ostrovsky

Financial Times, January 2, 2007

Gazprom, the Russian gas company, struck a five-year deal to supply gas to Belarus just minutes before a New Year deadline, narrowly avoiding a gas price war that threatened to disrupt supplies to Europe.

The agreement, signed at two minutes to midnight on New Year's eve, just as Vladimir Putin, Russia's president, made his New Year address, averted a shut-down of gas supplies to Belarus scheduled for 10am on January 1.

The new contract doubles the price of gas for Belarus this year and gives Gazprom a 50 per cent stake in the country's pipeline network.

Under the terms of the deal, gas prices will rise steadily over the next five years bringing them in line with European countries by 2011.

The deal will phase out a multi-billion dollar gas subsidy to Belarus, which had allowed Alexander Lukashenko, the country's authoritarian president, to subsidise living standards. Gazprom has been trying to bring gas prices to all former Soviet republics more into line with European levels.

The price increase and exemption from export duties gives Belarus more favourable terms than those offered to other former Soviet republics.

Belarus agreed to pay $100 per thousand cubic metres of gas this year compared with $46 last year, while Gazprom agreed to pay $2.5bn in cash for a 50 per cent stake in Beltrangaz, the distribution and pipeline network.

Gazprom had wanted Belarus to pay $105 for gas of which $30 would be in Beltrangaz shares. Sergei Kupiyanov of Gazprom, said the company was satisfied with the deal.

By comparison, Georgia, which has been in a state of cold-war with Russia, will this year pay $235 per 1,000 cu m of gas.

"The terms which have been fixed [with Belarus] in this agreement are the best which exist on the territory of the former Soviet Union," Alexei Miller, the chief executive of Gazprom, said.

Sergei Sidorski, Belarus's prime minister, said the doubling of the price was "very difficult, almost unbearable" for the Belarus' economy.

"The Belarussian side, in a difficult atmosphere on the eve of the new year, signed an agreement on unfortunate terms," Mr Sidorsky was quoted as saying.

Mr Lukashenko, last week said: "Belarus won't bow to Gazprom's blackmail. If they keep putting pressure on us, we will go down into the bunkers, but we will not surrender." Mr Lukashenko had pledged not to give up -control over the country's pipelines.

Gazprom had threatened to turn off supplies to Belarus on January 1, if it did not agree on a new price. The threat echoed Russia's stand-off with Ukraine which resulted in the shutting down of gas supplies to Ukraine and disruption to other European countries.

While only 20 per cent of Russian gas is exported through Belarus, several European Union member states, including Poland, Lithuania and Germany would have felt the repercussions as Belarus warned it would halt transit if Russia acted on its threat.

Under a new deal, Belarus will double the tariffs for Russia's gas transits. The agreement marks a new phase in Russia's relationship with Belarus.

The two countries have been close allies, but the Kremlin became increasingly annoyed with Mr Lukashenko's failure to deliver on promises of closer integration.

Belarus Deal Signals Russia's Growing Clout (WP)

By Steven Mufson

Belarus looked headed for a cold New Year's Day until the former Soviet republic's prime minister walked into the offices of Russia's natural gas monopoly, Gazprom, just before a midnight deadline and agreed to most of Gazprom's terms for continued supplies.

"There was a tense atmosphere among the Belarusan delegation since we have agreed to and signed a contract whose conditions for the delivery of gas are not at all favorable," Belarusan Prime Minister Sergei Sidorsky said at a news conference at Gazprom's headquarters late Sunday night.

Under the agreement, Belarus will pay more than twice its current price for natural gas for its 10 million people and -- to keep from paying an even higher price -- will sell Gazprom a 50 percent interest in its gas pipeline network. The terms are similar to what Gazprom has been extracting from other neighboring former Soviet republics, such as Ukraine and Georgia. The Russian energy giant wants higher prices for its natural gas, and it is using its leverage as sole or principal supplier to get a share of other countries' domestic pipeline networks and transit lines to the West.

"[Russian President Vladimir] Putin's mission has been to regain the energy assets and export infrastructure that [former Russian President Boris] Yeltsin lost when the Soviet Union broke apart," said Michael Lelyveld, a senior analyst on Russia at PFC Energy, a Washington consulting group.

The new deal is the latest instance of Gazprom playing hardball with its neighbors. Exactly a year ago, it cut off supplies to Ukraine, which had a newly elected West-leaning government, in what was widely seen as politically inspired move. That crisis ended when Ukraine agreed to a sharp price increase, to $95 per thousand cubic meters, while the price to Belarus remained at $47. Recently, Ukraine agreed to another hefty price increase to $130, but it kept the price well below Western European levels of $230 by giving Gazprom a stake in its pipeline system.

Now that Gazprom has treated the authoritarian, pro-Moscow government of Belarus in a similar way, it lends some credibility to Gazprom's claim to have not political but commercial motives, namely the end of heavily subsidized gas prices that date to when its neighbors were all Soviet states. Belarus will now pay $100 per thousand cubic meters, with prices rising to market levels by 2011. A portion of that price will be paid in shares of the national pipeline company.

"There have been absolutely no political demands from the Kremlin, only financial ones," said Jonathan Stern, director of gas research at the Oxford Institute for Energy Studies. Stern said that though this year's gas price in Belarus will be half that paid by Georgia, the differential may be more a reflection of the bargaining power Belarus had over the transit line to the rest of Europe than a political distinction between the pro-Moscow Belarus and the pro-West Georgia. Gazprom originally sought a price of $230 per thousand cubic meters from Belarus, then demanded $105; the implied price, $2.5 billion, it will pay for the Belarusan pipeline system is also more than it originally offered.

Still, in Western Europe, Gazprom's brinkmanship has raised alarms about its power and expansionism. Western Europe is heavily dependent on Russian natural gas supplies, which account for a quarter of Europe's needs and 40 percent of its imports. That share is expected to rise over the next 15 years, according to an analysis by Deutsche Bank Securities.

About 80 percent of the Russian gas crosses Ukraine, and the rest crosses Belarus. Both price disputes threatened to cut off or curtail those supplies; Belarus threatened to siphon the gas it needs from supplies destined for other countries, and a year ago, Gazprom's two-day cutoff to Ukraine crimped supplies elsewhere. That has spurred talk about Europe's energy security and its need for supply diversification.

"All of a sudden, Russian supplies, which seemed so reliable during the Cold War, seem unreliable," said Stephen O'Sullivan, emerging-markets oil and gas analyst for Deutsche Bank. He said that is driving Europe to look at nuclear power and liquefied natural gas imports from other countries. Even though the Belarus dispute was settled before supplies were disrupted,

O'Sullivan says: "It gives more momentum to a search for alternatives to Russia . . . You never know what might happen down the line."

In addition, Gazprom has been trying to use its leverage as the biggest supplier of natural gas to Europe and its control over access to oil and gas exploration prospects in Russia to acquire stakes in pipeline networks in countries such as Italy, France and Germany. But those countries have been reluctant to put their private firms under the control of a state-owned company, especially because Russia strictly limits foreign acquisitions within its borders.

"Putin has told the Europeans that Russia's strategy is only aimed at enhancing their mutual energy security, but it's really all about expanding Russian power," Lelyveld said. "The assertive tactics may frighten the Europeans, but in the near term, there's very little they can do to reduce reliance on Russia."

The new agreement with Belarus, which is set to last four years, will alleviate some of Europe's concerns about supply interruptions. "The brinkmanship aspect is significant for Europe, but now that everything seems settled -- at least for the moment -- people will relax again," Stern said. "This four-year deal means that we should not be going through this again next year."

But as long as the state-owned Gazprom controls Russia's natural gas supplies and most of the exploration prospects in Russia, and with high energy prices pumping cash into its coffers, the company will remain powerful. It controls about a quarter of global gas output and reserves.

Last month, Gazprom used that power to pry its way into Royal Dutch Shell Group's oil and gas exploration and production project on Sakhalin Island, off Russia's east coast. Threatened with delays for environmental reasons, the project got the go-ahead the day Shell and its Japanese partners agreed to halve their share in the project, delay cost recovery and sell Gazprom a controlling interest.

One area in which Gazprom has been barred from using its muscle is domestic Russian gas prices. Those prices are rising but remain far below market levels. Domestic sales account for 70 percent of Gazprom's gas volume but only 30 percent of its revenue, according to a Deutsche Bank analysis. Raising Russian prices to global levels and domestic efficiency measures could cut Russia's consumption by an amount equal to a fifth of Europe's imports, enabling Gazprom to expand its exports or decrease its reliance on Central Asian nations, such as Turkmenistan, for a portion of its supplies. But the Russian government recently said that domestic gas prices would remain subsidized for at least the next five years.

Belarus Yields To Russia (WSJ)

By Alan Cullison

The Wall Street Journal, January 2, 2007

MOSCOW -- The last-minute deal that sharply raises the price of Russian natural gas to Belarus highlights the success of a Kremlin energy policy that the West has denounced as bordering on blackmail. By showing that it is willing to cut off countries that won't accept rate increases, Russia has ended an era of cheap energy supplies to former Soviet republics.

Russia's natural-gas monopoly and its largest company, OAO Gazprom, announced the agreement early yesterday, hours before the company said it would shut down supplies to Belarus. The agreement more than doubles the price of gas to Belarus, to $100 per 1,300 cubic yards from $47. Moscow also said it would acquire a 50% stake in the Belarus gas-transit monopoly, Beltransgaz, an asset Minsk for years has refused to surrender.

The agreement, announced as the Russian capital celebrated the New Year, also will gradually step up the price of gas for Belarus toward levels that Europe pays, near $300, in coming years. It follows months of negotiations in which officials from Moscow threatened to cut off gas to Belarus in midwinter and officials from Minsk threatened to disrupt Russian gas supplies to Europe.

Ultimately, the Belarus side flinched and agreed to pay a touch less than the $105 per 1,300 cubic yards the Russians were demanding. "The Belarussian side, in a difficult atmosphere on the eve of the new year, signed an agreement on unfortunate terms," Agence France-Presse quoted Belarus Prime Minister Sergei Sidorsky as saying.

The agreement caps a year of rate increases for states of the former Soviet Union that its neighbors and the West have called politically motivated.

Russia cut off gas to Ukraine last Jan. 1 when negotiations with Kiev failed, a move that was denounced by European countries, which saw their supplies flowing through Ukraine disrupted. Afterward, Vice President Dick Cheney accused Russia of using energy as an instrument of intimidation and blackmail. Europe started stockpiling gas as a hedge against future disruptions and exploring alternative suppliers.

Gazprom said it is just trying to put its relations with neighbors on a market-oriented footing and end subsidized energy supplies to the countries of the former Soviet Union. Though Russia was hurt by criticism of the Ukrainian cutoff, its eventual agreement with Kiev nearly doubled prices for gas last year and raised them to $130 for 2007. Moscow also has sharply raised prices for Azerbaijan, Georgia and Moldova.

"The Russians put up with a lot of damage to their reputation after Ukraine, but now they have their customers in line," said Jonathan Stern, head of gas research at the Oxford Institute for Energy Studies. "Every [customer] knows Russia will not let them off the hook easily."

Until recently, Belarus had been an exception. Led by its autocratic president, Alexander Lukashenko, Belarus for years had benefited from the comparatively inexpensive supply of natural gas, a support to its state-managed economy. It is Russia's second-largest consumer of natural gas among former Soviet states, and last year, Minsk paid $47 per 1,300 cubic yards -- roughly the price of gas for users inside Russia.

But relations between Moscow and Minsk lately have been strained: Though putative allies, each blames the other for failing to follow through on plans to unite the two countries. Moscow is ending duty-free oil shipments to Belarus, a move that is expected to cost more than $1 billion in profits to the country's refining industry. Last week, Russian officials warned that Belarus would face a shut-off of natural-gas deliveries at 10 a.m. yesterday if it didn't agree to higher natural-gas prices. Belarus, in turn, threatened to disrupt pipelines on its territory that carry more than 20% of Gazprom's exports to Europe.

Belarus had hoped European countries would panic at the prospect of another gas cutoff and put pressure on Russia to make a quick deal with Minsk, said Chris Weafer, chief strategist at Alfa Bank in Moscow. But none wanted to do any favors for Mr. Lukashenko, widely regarded as Europe's last dictator, he said. Many had stockpiled gas supplies to last for several weeks in case of a cutoff.

Belarus "played a game of chicken with Moscow, and they saw that Moscow would not blink," said Mr. Weafer.

Mr. Weafer said Belarus has managed to soften the blow of the rate increase by agreeing to sell off a portion of Beltransgaz, thus giving Belarus nominally lower gas prices than its neighbors. But he expects Gazprom to push for total control of the transportation company in coming years.

"Russia will have control of that company by the end of the decade, that's for sure," he said. "Belarus doesn't have much choice. What are they going to do? Go without gas?"

Thailand's Leader Blames Local Politics For Bombings (WSJ)

By James Hookway

The Wall Street Journal, January 2, 2007

BANGKOK, Thailand -- With Thailand's tourism industry bracing for the impact of deadly bombings in Bangkok on New Year's Eve, the country's military-installed prime minister suggested that domestic politics rather than a Muslim insurgency was behind the blasts, which killed three people and triggered panic in parts of the capital.

Prime Minister Surayud Chulanont told reporters yesterday that the synchronized blasts might have been connected to the September ouster of his predecessor, telecommunications tycoon Thaksin Shinawatra, in a bloodless coup.

"From the evidence we have gathered, there is a slim chance that it is related to the southern insurgency," Gen. Surayud told a news conference. "It is likely related to people who lost their political benefits."

The nine bombs exploded Sunday as revelers prepared to ring in the new year. Bangkok's city leaders canceled the celebrations after the first wave of bombings in the early evening. In total, police say the explosions wounded 38 people, including nine foreign tourists. Nobody has claimed responsibility.

The blasts cap a volatile 2006 in Thailand. It saw a military coup and a deepening insurgency in the Muslim-dominated south of the country, in which more than 1,900 people have been killed in the past 2½ years. If investigators conclude that

Thaksin supporters planted the bombs, it could suggest continuing instability and complicate the military's promised goal of restoring democratic civilian rule. If authorities conclude that Muslim insurgents orchestrated the blasts, it would be the first time they have struck Bangkok -- marking a significant escalation.

Stock analysts, meanwhile, worried that Thai share prices, already hammered by foreign selling following the introduction of capital controls last month, would continue falling when trading resumes tomorrow. Today is a holiday in Thailand.

Mr. Thaksin's lawyer, Noppadol Patama, said Mr. Thaksin was in China and had no involvement in the bombings. "Thaksin was elected by the people, and even during the time of conflict, he has refrained from using violence," the Associated Press quoted the lawyer as saying. "It is very unlikely that a politician who was elected by the people will resort to violence."

Thai investigators said they are still trying to piece together evidence to lead them to those behind the bomb plot. The devices were relatively small, made from ammonium nitrate and used digital watches as detonators, police officials said.

The size of the bombs, as well as the coordinated manner in which they exploded, resembled recent bombings in Thailand's deep south, say security analysts -- though Muslim insurgents tend to use cellular phones to detonate bombs rather than timers, as were used in Sunday's blasts. The insurgents are trying to drive Buddhist Thais from the three mostly Muslim southern provinces, where the bloody conflict has largely played out.

The culprits in Sunday's bombings picked a vulnerable target: tourism. New Year's celebrations in downtown Bangkok are a mainstay of Thailand's tourism industry, which generates more than $12 billion a year. Normally, tens of thousands of people cram the streets to listen to bands and watch fireworks.

Gen. Surayud said Sunday's bombs were designed to create the impression that Thailand is politically unstable and that the military-installed government isn't fully in control.

Thailand's armed forces have accused Mr. Thaksin of corruption and of insulting Thailand's revered King Bhumibol Adulyadej. The coup followed months of demonstrations against Mr. Thaksin in Bangkok.

Yet Mr. Thaksin, twice elected in a landslide, remains popular in rural Thailand, where he is lauded for policies such as offering farmers low-cost loans. Over the past few months, several schools in the northeast have been torched, apparently to protest Mr. Thaksin's ouster.

In recent years, Thailand's tourism industry has been hit by the spread in Asia of severe acute respiratory syndrome and by the devastating December 2004 Indian Ocean tsunami, which wiped out or damaged many resorts.

Many travel agents said it was too soon to tell whether there would be a rash of cancellations because of the bombings. But it appears foreign tourists spending New Year in the Thai capital were largely undaunted. Yesterday, large crowds descended on some of Bangkok's main attractions, such as the Grand Palace and the Temple of Dawn.

Zapatistas Celebrate 13th Anniversary Of Uprising (NYT/AP)

Associated Press

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

OVENTIC, Mexico, Jan. 1 (AP) — Thousands of Zapatista rebels celebrated the 13th anniversary of their brief uprising against the Mexican government on Monday, dancing, singing and holding discussions on improving the status of poor Indians in the southern state of Chiapas.

The ceremonies, which attracted hundreds of foreigners from many countries, began Sunday night under the stewardship of the group's leader, Subcommander Marcos. Participants saluted the Mexican and Zapatista flags, and held a large dance in the Zapatista community of Oventic, 460 miles southeast of Mexico City.

The Zapatistas seized the main city of San Cristóbal de las Casas and other Chiapas communities in the name of socialism and Indian rights on Jan. 1, 1994. A cease-fire ended fighting between rebel and government forces after a few days, and the two sides have since maintained an uneasy truce.

Marcos, a professor-turned-guerrilla, has continued to champion a quieter social revolution from the jungles of Chiapas, issuing missives harshly critical of Mexico's politicians and government policies.

Speaking in Tzotzil, a Mayan language spoken in Chiapas, he recalled on Sunday night how the movement was founded to end the isolation and misery of the Indians. It was the first time in many years that Marcos had attended anniversary celebrations. He was escorted by several other ski-masked members of the movement.

On last year's anniversary, Marcos began a nationwide tour in an attempt to forge a national leftist movement. But his talks and tour appearances did not draw large crowds, and he was criticized for straying from his principal cause of fighting for Indian rights after expressing support for violent antigovernment protests by unrelated groups.

Island Of Injustice (WP)

By David Vine

The Washington Post, January 2, 2007

Forty years ago, on Dec. 30, 1966, at the U.S. Embassy in London, representatives of the U.S. and British governments met, as one participant later put it, "under the cover of darkness" to sign an "exchange of notes" giving the United States the right to create what was to become a major military base on Diego Garcia, an obscure British island in the middle of the Indian Ocean. In doing so they made provision for "those administrative measures" necessary to forcibly deport the entire native population of the island and the surrounding Chagos Archipelago.

While Diego Garcia has gained some attention as a key launch pad for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, few know about the expulsion of nearly 2,000 people, called Chagossians, that was eventually carried out between 1968 and 1973 to create the base.

Despite the anonymity, the facts are not in doubt: Beginning in 1960, U.S. officials initiated secret conversations with the British government and eventually secured British agreement to provide "exclusive control" of the island "without local inhabitants." The governments finalized the deal with their Dec. 30 exchange of notes, in effect creating a treaty but circumventing congressional and parliamentary oversight. A separate secret agreement provided for $14 million in undisclosed U.S. payments to deport the Chagossians and turn Diego Garcia into a military colony.

With the financial and diplomatic details ensured, beginning in 1968, islanders leaving Chagos for vacations or medical treatment on the island of Mauritius were barred by the British from returning and thus marooned 1,200 miles from their homes. The British soon began restricting supplies for the islands, and by the turn of the decade, more Chagossians were leaving as food and medicines dwindled.

In 1971 the U.S. Navy began construction on Diego Garcia and ordered the British to complete the removals. First British agents and U.S. soldiers on Diego Garcia herded the Chagossians' pet dogs into sealed sheds and gassed and burned them in front of their traumatized owners awaiting deportation. Then, between 1971 and 1973, British agents forced the islanders to board overcrowded cargo ships and left them on the docks in Mauritius and the Seychelles.

Upon arrival, Chagossians received virtually no resettlement assistance and found themselves homeless, jobless and with little money. In 1975 The Post broke the story of the expulsion, finding the people living in "abject poverty" as a result of what The Post's editorial page called an "act of mass kidnapping."

When a single day of congressional hearings followed, the U.S. government denied all responsibility for the islanders.

After years of protests and strikes, the British government, in 1978 and 1982, paid Chagossians some compensation. It totaled less than $6,000 per recipient. Many used the money to pay off large debts accrued since the expulsion, and for most, conditions improved only marginally. After living with the islanders over four periods between 2001 and 2004, I found that as a group, Chagossians -- now numbering more than 5,000 -- have been severely and chronically impoverished by the expulsion.

I came to document the expulsion's effects after being asked to serve as an expert witness in lawsuits brought against the U.S. and British governments. The suits are demanding the right of return, proper financial compensation and the right to work on the base.

In Britain, the High Court in London has twice -- in 2000 and 2006 -- ruled the islanders' expulsion illegal under U.K. law. In February the group will return to the court to contest the British government's appeal of the latest ruling; another victory could finally open the way for a return to Chagos.

By contrast, a federal district court and an appeals court have dismissed the U.S. lawsuit, with judges unwilling to overrule the executive on what one judge called the "improper misplacement of the plaintiffs," an act held to be a matter of foreign and military policy. During the 1975 House hearings, Lee Hamilton, then a member of Congress and now co-chairman of the Iraq Study Group, asked a State Department representative if the government had any legal or moral responsibility for the people. The representative replied, "We have no legal responsibility. Moral responsibility is a term, sir, that I find difficult to assess."

Forty years almost to the day after the signing of the initial Diego Garcia agreement, there should be no difficulty in assessing the responsibility of the United States: The U.S. government developed the idea for a base on Diego Garcia, demanded the removal of the islanders, paid the British for the deportations and gave the orders to complete the removals.

While almost no attention has been paid to the Chagossians since The Post's 1975 report, the time has come for the story of the Chagossians and Diego Garcia to see the light of day, and for Congress and the Bush administration finally to accept and act on the responsibility of the United States for a people's ongoing plight.

Mr. Wolfowitz And The Bank (NYT)

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

When Paul Wolfowitz speaks publicly these days, he is usually making good sense. The head of the World Bank (formerly No. 2 at the Pentagon) has criticized Chinese banks for ignoring environmental and human rights standards when they lend to Africa, told the White House it needs to do more to alleviate African poverty, and has vowed that corrupt officials won't be allowed to siphon off money from projects that are supposed to benefit the poor.

So why do so many people at the bank mistrust him — including many of the leading shareholders? At last fall's annual meeting, European ministers insisted that the bank's board would oversee Mr. Wolfowitz's anticorruption program, to ensure that no country was punished arbitrarily.

That is not a vote of confidence and not a healthy state of affairs. Mr. Wolfowitz needs to figure out how to earn more than just the Bush administration's trust.

Some of his critics will never forgive him for championing the disastrous Iraq war. But he has compounded their suspicions, surrounding himself with a tight group of former Bush administration officials who — true to their roots — have little patience for explaining themselves and even less for criticism.

Mr. Wolfowitz and his aides did an especially poor job explaining their decisions to suspend or delay hundreds of millions of dollars in loans because of alleged corruption, feeding fears that they were settling scores. When Hilary Benn, Britain's top aid official, publicly questioned bank policies, an unidentified senior bank official dismissed Mr. Benn to The Financial Times as "an ambitious political climber." That's no way to win friends or donors. Mr. Wolfowitz wrote to the paper to say that was not his view and has since visited London to patch things up, but relations remain cool.

Mr. Wolfowitz has yet to outline a broader vision for the bank, which might inspire his staff and rally international support. There are certainly a host of issues that need his leadership. The bank needs to give more of a voice to less wealthy and poor countries. It needs to find new ways to mobilize private sector financing. And it needs to get more deeply — and more systematically — involved in addressing global challenges like epidemics, sustainable energy and post-conflict reconstruction.

Mr. Wolfowitz deserves praise for championing debt relief for the world's poorest countries. And he is right that the bank needs to do a lot more to fight corruption, which can cripple any development effort. To be heard on these subjects, Mr. Wolfowitz will have to work harder to earn the trust of his staff, his shareholders and everyone who cares about development. He needs a more inclusive management style and a more diplomatic inner circle, and to articulate broader goals beyond stopping corruption. That way he would have the credibility to fight the good fight.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Five Years And Counting In Cuba (USNEWS)

By Will Sullivan

Fawzi al-Odah was 25 and full of youthful confidence when he sent the first letter to his parents after being detained in Guantánamo Bay. "I will be established as innocent soon, and then I will return back to you," he insisted. But that was 2002, and this month al-Odah will celebrate his 30th birthday in Cuba.

On January 11, the U.S. naval base at Guantánamo Bay will mark five years since it opened its doors to some of the earliest government-designated "enemy combatants" in the war against terrorism. Since then, the facility has evolved from open-air cages into a complex rivaling any maximum-security prison. But despite two trips to the Supreme Court, questions about the rights and status of about 400 men held there are not much closer to being answered than they were when the first detainees arrived. And so the coming months will see renewed challenges to the facility in both the courts and the new Democratic Congress.

History. Many of Guantánamo Bay's legal ambiguities were supposed to have been resolved in September, when the White House and Congress haggled over legislation to address a Supreme Court ruling–a ruling that effectively tossed out the administration's previous plan to try some detainees in special military commissions. The result of that haggling was the Military Commissions Act, which specified the rules for the commissions, denied detainees the habeas corpus right to challenge their detentions in court, and defined acceptable interrogation methods.

President Bush signed the bill in October, and the administration hopes the legislation provides a constitutional framework for holding war crimes trials for the worst detainees–including 14 "high value" detainees whom Bush transferred to Guantánamo Bay from previously secret CIA prisons. If convicted, those detainees could be held even after the war on terrorism was thought to have ended. The Pentagon is seeking congressional funds for a courtroom compound at Guantánamo, where the trials would take place.

But the government acknowledges that only about a fifth of the detainees at Guantánamo will face a military commission. Some will be released–hundreds already have been–as the government accelerates efforts to pare down the population to the most serious threats. But those decisions are made by the military, and the administration contends that anyone deemed an enemy combatant can be held until hostilities end, with no access to the courts to challenge their detention.

Critics say the framework is rife with problems. A central irony: Because the most dangerous detainees will go before military commissions, they will have more access to the legal system than those whose detentions are more dubious.

Things could change with a new Democratic Congress, especially through an effort in the Senate by incoming Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy to restore habeas corpus rights to detainees. When GOP Sen. Arlen Specter offered a similar amendment to the Military Commissions Act last year, it fell just three votes short of adoption. A batch of new Democrats would seemingly give the bill strong odds of passing, but Congress might have a hard time mustering the votes to overcome a possible presidential veto.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Skill, Luck Credited For Terror-free Year (WT/AP)

By Paul Haven
The Washington Times, January 2, 2007

MADRID -- Bombs left on commuter trains in a busy station in Germany, a plot to blow up tunnels and flood New York City's financial district, another to bring down packed commuter airliners flying out of London.

DOJ_NMG_0111005

Islamic militants had no shortage of murderous ideas in 2006, but for the first time since the September 11, 2001, attacks, the year closed without a major attack in the West.

In a wide-ranging analysis, security and intelligence leaders around the world told the Associated Press that their success was a result of more than just luck.

Far greater human and technological resources, tougher counterterrorism laws, a deeper understanding of the homegrown nature of the threat and the hard lessons learned from past failures -- all these have all helped avert catastrophe, they said.

But they also cautioned against complacency, saying another attack is inevitable. A senior Spanish intelligence official who recently stepped down as head of a national counterterrorism unit warned that the absence of deadly attacks in 2006 does not mean the world should expect similar results in 2007.

Reinforcing the reality that high-casualty terrorism is still a threat, not only in the West, a bomb attack on trains in Bombay in July killed more than 200 people. India suspects Islamic organizations both at home and in neighboring Pakistan of being behind the bombings.

Muslim militants were not blamed for a Saturday car bombing at Madrid International Airport, which left 26 persons injured and two missing. The attack was thought to be the work of the Basque terrorist group ETA.

Anger among many Muslims is still high over the war in Iraq, the publication of cartoons of the prophet Muhammad, Israel's war against Hezbollah militants in Lebanon and remarks by Pope Benedict XVI that many Muslims considered insulting despite his explanation to the contrary.

"The fact that these threats have not materialized [in 2006] is not for a lack of trying by terror organizations," the Spanish official said. "It is because the counterterrorism fight in Europe and North America has been effective in detecting these aspiring terror groups early," before they could strike.

In Britain, an official familiar with the country's anti-terror policies said the July 7, 2005, bombings of London subways and a bus were a wake-up call, and that intelligence and security protections put in place since those attacks had helped thwart several new plots, including a foiled August scheme to target U.S.-bound jetliners with liquid explosives.

While authorities have said little about how they stopped the carnage, they have acknowledged that some of the suspects were under surveillance for months, both in Britain and Pakistan.

"The extra resources we've devoted since the 7/7 attacks have helped us stop plans that had been in the works for years," said the government official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity owing to the sensitive nature of his work. "Our database is growing. We have more people on the ground. We are a lot more aware now."

MI5, the British domestic spy agency, has added hundreds of staff members in recent years, and Government Communications Headquarters, once home to World War II code breakers, has doubled its corps of analysts to 5,000 -- becoming Britain's largest intelligence agency.

Dame Eliza Manningham-Buller, the head of MI5, has said her agency had foiled five major plots since the 2005 bombings, and that her agents were tracking almost 30 terrorist plots involving 1,600 suspects.

Magnus Ranstorp, a terrorism expert at the Swedish National Defense College, said the absence of attacks on European soil in 2006 reflects a better understanding of how the terror networks operate -- and a little bit of luck.

"Authorities have started to organize much, much better now, and that is starting to show results," Mr. Ranstorp said. "We have much better insight into the networks now, because we have focused our resources on the right problems. I think the security agencies have this under better control than you might think, and know the lay of the land rather well."

Analysts and intelligence officials say the nature of the threat has changed dramatically since September 11, 2001, with concern largely focused on homegrown groups driven by local grievances, rather than professional terrorists trained by al Qaeda and with direct links to Osama bin Laden.

While these groups have the advantage of being small, they are often less sophisticated and easier to catch. Thousands of suspected radicals are under surveillance across Europe, making it harder for plots to emerge.

The closest call in 2006 may have come in Cologne, Germany, when two crude bombs on trains failed to detonate. The biggest threat was the London airliner plot. Lesser defined schemes against the Jewish Quarter in Prague, a church in Bologna, Italy, and the Milan, Italy, subway also failed.

In the United States and Canada, authorities uncovered plots -- some seemingly little more than fantasies -- to blow up the Sears Tower in Chicago, flood Lower Manhattan by blowing up tunnels under the Hudson River, and attack public buildings in Ontario.

Authorities in Morocco arrested at least 56 persons, among them soldiers, police and the wives of Royal Air Maroc pilots, over a purported plot to blow up foreign targets. Indonesia, one of the countries most frequently hit by Islamic radicals, enjoyed its first attack-free year since 1999.

Homeland Security: A Tighter Border Plan? (NSWK)

By Mark Hosenball

For more than 15 years, British and most other Western European visitors have been allowed to stay in the United States for up to three months without needing to apply for visas. But Homeland Security officials are now accelerating efforts to tighten entry controls on people from these and other friendly countries, including Australia and Japan, NEWSWEEK has learned. The move follows revelations that European-born Muslims—particularly disgruntled young Brits—have been visiting Pakistan to attend terrorist training camps. One proposal under consideration: requiring visitors who don't now need advanced visas to submit electronic visa applications to U.S. authorities via the Internet at the time they purchase their tickets.

Today, airlines flying to America from overseas must send copies of passenger lists to U.S. authorities as flights depart; officials in Washington then check passenger names against data banks prior to landing. But if foreign fliers have to fill out an Internet questionnaire when they book tickets, American agencies would have more time and raw information about U.S.-bound travelers. A Homeland Security spokesman said visa application data could also be entered into U.S. government data banks, though he said it was "too early" to discuss how long the information would be stored or who'd have access to it. The spokesman, Jarrod Agen, said that Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff has discussed proposed rule changes with congressional leaders but that no formal plan has been sent to Capitol Hill yet.

Travel To Canada, Mexico Is About To Change With New Passport Rules (USAT)

By Roger Yu

USA Today, January 2, 2007

Five years after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, the U.S. government is on the verge of implementing security-inspired changes to passports that will affect millions of international travelers.

On Jan. 23, air travelers to and from Canada, Mexico and the Caribbean will for the first time need a passport to cross the U.S. border. Starting in the spring, all U.S citizens applying for a passport will get an electronic version that's embedded with a "smart" chip designed to thwart forgery.

The new regulations represent the most significant changes in border control in years, as federal officials try to bring the process of checking identification into the digital age.

Many people heading to Canada, Mexico and the Caribbean now travel with just a driver's license for identification. Under the new rule, U.S. citizens traveling by air need a passport. Though a driver's license will no longer suffice, the government does leave some wiggle room. The Nexus Air card, issued under a USA-Canada cooperative program to prescreened travelers, is acceptable. The passport rule will apply to land and sea travelers no later than June 1, 2009.

For Americans who don't want to pay $97 for a passport, the State Department also plans by the end of 2007 to introduce a "passport card" that would work like a passport. The card, which costs $20 for adults, is good only for those traveling by land or sea to Canada, Mexico and the Caribbean.

The State Department issued 16 million passports in 2006, vs. 12 million in 2005, with the increase largely the result of the new rule. It's now issuing the "e-passport" in some areas of the country. Conversion from the old passport will be complete this spring.

The new passport looks like the traditional type, but its smart chip stores the traveler's photo and personal information. If the chip is broken or malfunctions, the holder can continue to use the document as a non-electronic passport or buy a new one. Traditional passports will remain valid until they expire.

Critics say that transmitting information wirelessly can compromise security, and important data could fall into the wrong hands. With proper equipment, someone could remotely intercept personal data, a practice called "skimming."

Ann Barrett, a top passport official at the State Department, says the department has responded by adding metallic anti-skimming material to the passport's cover. Other protections include encrypting the information.

Marc Rotenberg of the Electronic Privacy Information Center says the State Department should be given credit for responding to privacy concerns. But he says it still needs to add safeguards to the passport card.

Caleb Tiller, a spokesman for the National Business Travel Association, says the organization is satisfied with the changes. "The thing we were concerned about was balancing security and allowing free commerce and business travel," Tiller says. "As far as we can tell, they're striking that balance."

People applying for passports at the federal agencies in Denver, Boston, Washington and Miami now get the new e-passport. Those applying at 13 other agencies may still receive the traditional passport until this spring, when agencies will start issuing only the e-passport.

TSA Nears Decision On Contract For Government ID Cards (WP)

By Griff Witte

The Washington Post, January 2, 2007

Competition is heating up among contractors to supply the government with identity technology as one agency prepares to award a major contract and another readies a request for bids.

The field of competitors to provide a new identification card for transportation workers has been narrowing, and the Transportation Security Administration indicated last week that an award would be made early this year. The winner would be responsible for screening the backgrounds of about 750,000 workers at airports, seaports and other critical transportation facilities, and issuing them ID cards equipped with microchips.

"We are in the final stages of review of the contract, and we will be issuing an award in the coming weeks," said Darrin Kayser, a spokesman for the TSA.

The program, one among several that are designed to update the government's identification standards in a bid to enhance security, has met with repeated delays. President Bush signed legislation mandating the new cards in 2002, and the Homeland Security Department initially said it would begin issuing them by the end of 2003.

Among the companies involved in competing for the work as either prime contractors or subcontractors are BearingPoint of McLean, Lockheed Martin of Bethesda and Maximus of Reston.

The General Services Administration, meanwhile, plans by Jan. 12 to issue a call for bids on work supplying identification cards to federal employees and contractors.

The new contract replaces a $104 million deal the GSA had with BearingPoint but pulled out of in November. At the time, GSA officials said that the decision, just two months into the contract, was unrelated to BearingPoint's performance but that the agency wanted to reopen the bidding to give the government more options and better prices.

Government agencies are up against a 2008 deadline to distribute new, standardized identification cards to about 8 million employees and contractors. Agencies can either choose the GSA's contractors or use their own program. BearingPoint had been developing cards for 38 agencies.

Bidding on the GSA contract is open to companies on a list of approved firms, known as a schedule. As of last week, the schedule included the names of 18 contractors. Washington area firms dominate the list.

Computer Sciences of El Segundo, Calif., is not on the GSA's list yet. Tim Ruggles, director of the firm's border and immigration center, said the company is hoping to join soon with a system it has developed using off-the-shelf technology that verifies identity using both biometric information, such as fingerprints and iris scans, and biographic information, such as addresses and age.

Computer Sciences is among the firms competing to produce the transportation worker credential, and it plans to vie for the GSA's business as well.

"It's a big opportunity," Ruggles said.

Closing The Door At The Ports (USNEWS)

By Angie C. Marek

U.S. News and World Report, January 8, 2007

ELIZABETH, N.J.–It didn't take too long after September 11 for Chief Kevin McCabe, the official overseeing screening in the sprawling Port of New York/New Jersey complex here, to realize that his job was about to become a lot more stressful. Within months, he was handed an intelligence tip that a container on the way to the port held a so-called dirty bomb made with radioactive material. On the day it arrived, McCabe's team isolated it from 8,000 other container boxes, fed it through a radiation detection machine and an X-ray imager, and then punched holes in its roof to sample the air inside. "It was full of colorful Arabian carpets," McCabe says today, "and that was it." Still, he says officials were "only minutes away" from shutting down the massive port complex.

McCabe's job isn't getting any easier. Nothing's happened yet, but many security analysts believe the smuggling of a nuclear weapon into the United States through a seaport is a very real possibility. The country's 361 commercial ports, meanwhile, have gotten so little funding in the past five years that experts routinely call them the "soft underbelly" of America. In recent months, a flare-up of public indignation over foreign ownership of U.S. port terminals has sparked some major improvements, but further progress is by no means assured, and a host of vulnerabilities remain. With 95 percent of America's imports arriving by sea, there's a lot at stake. "Bomb a seaport," says Joe Curto, an executive vice president of the Maher Terminals here, "and you'll feel it in Iowa supermarkets two days later."

Searching. By any measure, the security challenge is daunting. About 11 million containers arrive by sea each year; U.S. Customs and Border Protection officials closely inspect fewer than 10 percent of them. There have been improvements, though. Prior to 9/11, McCabe says, "every single port was on its own" trying to decide which containers to scrutinize most thoroughly. Customs has since created an automated targeting program that checks the manifests of shipments headed to the United States for anomalies that tag them as "high risk." The Department of Homeland Security has also scooped up 305 radiation monitors once used to detect contaminated scrap metal; today they scan about 83 percent of cargo after it arrives. On a recent morning in Elizabeth, trucks loaded with fresh containers waited in line to exit Maher Terminals. "The only way to drive out," Curto says, "is through those [machines]."

But "we're still pretty far from where we need to be," says Stephen Flynn, a port security expert with the Council on Foreign Relations. One reason: Major security initiatives are still in their infancy. A trusted-shipper program–in which companies boost security in exchange for less customs scrutiny–runs basically on the honor system. Overworked customs inspectors haven't visited about a third of the companies enjoying benefits, and Flynn says many inspectors "aren't exactly experts" in securing the dense network of factories, distribution centers, and couriers that can handle shipments. Staffing crunches have also undermined a separate program that places U.S. Customs officials in 48 foreign ports like Shanghai. A 2005 government study found that 28 percent of containers deemed risky enough for foreign inspections weren't even touched.

But there's been a surge of activity on the port security front since February, when public anxiety was stoked by a proposed $6.8 billion business deal that would have given a firm run by the government of the United Arab Emirates leases to operate terminals in six U.S. ports. The company later agreed to sell the U.S. assets, and American International Group said recently that it had reached a deal to buy them. But the controversy "breathed new life into port security ideas that had seemed dead as a doornail" for months, says a Capitol Hill staffer.

Reform. In September, Congress passed the SAFE Ports Act, which mandates that DHS provide the 22 largest U.S. seaports with enough radiation detectors to scan all containers by 2008. The bill also eases the customs staffing crunch by using contractors to review trusted shippers. "We're also finally giving the ports the money they so desperately need," says Sen. Susan Collins of Maine, a lead SAFE Ports author. The bill requires DHS to hand out $400 million in port grants in each of the next five fiscal years. Seaports have gotten about $800 million total since 9/11 despite U.S. Coast Guard estimates that $5.4 billion is needed just for basics like security cameras and protective fencing.

Most experts cite SAFE Ports as the most substantial piece of maritime legislation in years. But a new Congress will have its own ideas. Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi has boasted that she has "even tougher proposals" than the 9/11 commission on port security and plans to push a measure early next year to "screen 100 percent of [maritime] containers long before they reach U.S. shores." Critics say such plans could cost billions. And since current scanning protocols, requiring both radiation and X-ray screening, can take up to 20 minutes per container, pursuing the initiative now could "create massive backlogs," Collins says. The SAFE Ports Act takes a different approach: It requires DHS to try 100 percent inspection in at least three foreign ports next year to learn more. DHS Chief Michael Chertoff said last month that he would launch trial runs in six countries, including Pakistan and Oman. The earliest tests begin in February.

Another issue that could resurface in the new Congress: what to do about America's 750,000 workers who require access to secured areas of U.S. ports. South Carolina Sen. Jim DeMint pushed this fall to have SAFE Ports ban a wide array of felons-including those guilty of rape, kidnapping, and robbery-from working in U.S. ports for seven years after their convictions. The final bill bars only those convicted of treason, espionage, sedition, or acts of terrorism. DeMint says that leaves open the possibility of bribery and smuggling "in a place with a lot of money flowing around, like seaports." A DHS study of New York and New Jersey suggested nearly half of the 9,000 truckers with access to the ports may have criminal records. So implementation of DeMint's proposed standard, almost identical to requirements for aviation screeners, "could be chaos for us," says Curto.

DHS is also running into major snags on an effort to install $1.15 billion worth of more modern, reliable radiation monitors at U.S. ports by 2011. Chertoff said this summer that DHS had "begun to order the first 80" machines and looked forward to "starting to deploy" equipment this autumn. U.S. News has learned, however, that while the machines are out in the field, they've yet to be turned on.

Many say DHS has been slowed by critical reports from the Government Accountability Office. Auditors blasted DHS in October for not including the results of some 7,000 tests on the new monitors in a cost-benefit analysis sent to Congress justifying their purchase. Several tests, according to GAO, found that the most reliable model of the machines now being deployed could detect disguised, highly enriched uranium only 53 percent of the time.

Still, Vayl Oxford, DHS nuclear detection czar, stands by his work. "We tested [monitors] against some scenarios where we didn't expect them to find anything," he says. The department has obligated only $50 million of the $1.15 billion contract so far, and what Oxford calls "more definitive testing"-in concert with tweaking the machines-will be performed in the next few months. "We're on track," he says. "And I think this country will be a lot better off."

They certainly hope so in the Port Newark portion of the complex. On a recent afternoon there, it was clear why new machines, which are supposed to be able to distinguish between harmful and innocuous radiation, are so desperately needed. In a single hour, a row of 10 current-generation monitors was tripped by two shipments of granite from Italy, another one from India, and traces of radiation left over in one trucker's bloodstream from a heart stress test he took two weeks before. The newer machines are expected to save U.S. Customs 2.2 million work-hours each year by eliminating secondary inspections that must be done with unreliable hand-held nuclear detectors. Still, "I'm confident if a radiological device got in this place," McCabe says, "we'd find it." That's a lot of confidence for a man on the hot seat.

WAR NEWS:

Calibrating A Troop 'Surge' (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen And Greg Jaffe

The Wall Street Journal, January 2, 2007

WASHINGTON -- For the Bush administration, deploying tens of thousands of additional troops to Iraq may not be as tough a call as deciding when to bring them home.

White House officials say a troop "surge" almost certainly will be the centerpiece of Mr. Bush's new strategy for Iraq to be unveiled mid-month. But while administration officials have gone to great lengths to emphasize that the extra troops will be in Iraq only temporarily, there is no clear definition of how long that might be.

Several Democratic and Republican lawmakers who endorsed the increase say they want the extra troops in Iraq for just three to six months. Senior military commanders believe the extra forces can be sustained in Iraq for only six to 12 months before logistical and manpower strains become untenable. Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army's chief of staff, has told associates that 12 months is needed to ensure a substantive effect.

Echoing Gen. Schoomaker's concerns that Iraq's militias would simply wait out a three- or six-month surge and then resume their violence, a report by military historian Frederick Kagan argues that the troops should be in Iraq for at least 18 months. The U.S. has about 140,000 troops in Iraq, and the additional forces could total as many as 20,000.

The debate over how long the new forces should remain in Iraq stems from tension between the political and military aspects of the emerging proposal. Mr. Bush has staked his presidency on Iraq, and several White House aides say they believe he would be inclined to leave the extra troops there until improvement is evident. Senior commanders, by contrast, have expressed concern that leaving extra troops too long risks lasting damage to the U.S. armed forces.

Inside the White House, officials are weighing an array of questions about the increase, with a particular focus on how to integrate Iraqi security forces into any expanded U.S. operations in troubled areas such as Baghdad.

"There might be a need for an Iraqi surge alongside an American one," National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley says in an interview, cautioning that the administration hasn't yet decided to send new U.S. troops to Iraq. "We're still working on the mix of options."

The administration's high-level deliberations about the size and duration of any potential surge have taken on added significance because both opponents and supporters of the war agree that U.S. influence in Iraq is rapidly diminishing. As Iraq confronts a civil war and a faltering political process, adding more U.S. forces could well be the administration's final real opportunity to stabilize the country.

"If we surge and it doesn't work, it's hard to imagine what we do after that," Mr. Kagan says. "But we're already in a very bad spot, and if we don't do anything defeat is imminent."

Still, the military's concerns run deep.

The long wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have already forced the Army to play a shell game with troops and equipment. To ensure that units in Iraq are fully staffed and equipped, the service has had to pull leadership and weaponry from returning units and rush them to units preparing to deploy. While that has put units heading to Iraq generally in good shape, it has left large Army brigades back home in disarray.

The shortages of leaders and equipment mean that the more troops the Army sends to Iraq now, the fewer that will be available late this year or early in 2008 when the extra troops have to start returning home.

"The Army says it can surge for somewhere on the order of a year," says Daniel Goure, a defense analyst at the Lexington Institute who has been briefed by senior Army officials on the service's strains. "But if that happens a year from now it won't be able to sustain even the current troop levels of 140,000."

If violence worsens over the next year, military commanders could face the task of stabilizing a chaotic country with far fewer troops than they have had during the past 3½ years of the conflict. To mitigate this risk, Gen. Schoomaker has insisted that with a surge the Army must be given more latitude to call up reservists for duty in Iraq.

Under current Pentagon rules, reservists can be called up only for 24 months of cumulative service in Iraq and Afghanistan. Since 2001 the Pentagon has burned through the vast majority of those part-time soldiers. Gen. Schoomaker wants to be able to call up reservists for a second 12-month tour.

Even with wider access to the reserves, Army officials have said there will be a drop in the number of troops available for Iraq duty in late 2007 and 2008. Many reserve units, which typically leave their equipment in Iraq for those who are arriving, are in an even worse state than the active forces. Some National Guard units have only about 40% of their equipment, senior Army officials say. They estimate it could take as much as $35 billion in additional spending over the next three years just to get those units back up to speed.

Army officials also worry that if conditions in Iraq don't improve, they will face political pressure to keep the additional troops in the country longer than a standard one-year deployment. That could damage morale and make it far tougher to retain and recruit troops. Already, the service missed its recruiting goals in 2005 and hit its numbers in 2006 only by lowering standards. To meet its retention goals, it shelled out more than $500 million in additional bonuses.

Army officials have warned that an exodus of experienced sergeants and officers, already weary from multiple deployments, could break the force. Gen. Richard Cody, the Army's vice chief of staff, has said the prospect of such an exodus is what "keeps him up at night."

Rising Opposition To US Troop Increase (FT)

By Edward Luce

Financial Times, January 2, 2007

George W. Bush is facing mounting opposition to plans to reinforce America's military presence in Iraq, as he prepares to unveil his administration's new strategy for dealing with a conflict that has now claimed the lives of 3,000 US soldiers.

The US president is expected to announce a "new way forward in Iraq" sometime before his annual State of the Union address to Congress in late January.

According to a spate of leaks to the US media, Mr Bush is looking at a proposal to increase the number of US troops by between 20,000 and 30,000 as a short-term boost to the existing 140,000 level, with the aim of stabilising the violence in Baghdad and surrounding provinces.

But criticism of the planned "surge" in US forces is growing from within his own party as the death toll of US troops in Iraq rises. The figure last month passed the toll from the September 11 attacks and at the weekend independent groups confirmed the death of the 3,000th US soldier in the country.

In the past two days, a number of prominent Republican senators, including Arlen Specter and Richard Lugar, the outgoing chairmen of the Senate judiciary and foreign relations committees, have voiced strong scepticism about an increase in troops.

Although Mr Bush could expect the support of John McCain, the 2008 presidential hopeful, and Lindsey Graham, another Republican senator, the Republican tide appears to be moving against boosting troop levels. A number of Republicans have pointed out that Nuri al-Maliki, the Iraqi prime minister, is also opposed to a beefed-up US military presence.

Mr Bush is also likely to face implacable opposition to any increase in US troop levels from the Democratic party, which controls both houses of the new US Congress that commences on Thursday.

Meanwhile, the Bush administration faces the likelihood of tough senate hearings throughout January that Joseph Biden, the new Democratic chairman of the foreign relations committee, plans to hold from next week.

Democratic leaders have also hinted that they could use their control over the budget process to make life difficult for the Bush administration if it chooses to step up the US military presence in Iraq. This would require higher funding than the estimated $110bn (€83bn, £56bn) the war will have cost in the fiscal year ending in April.

Mr Bush is also expected to push for more funding to expand the overstretched US army, which senior generals have warned is close to breaking point. However, any permanent increase in size would take years to come on stream.

Lugar: Bush, Congress Should Discuss War (AP)

By John Dunbar, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 1, 2007

Two prominent Senate Republicans bucked the White House on Sunday, expressing skepticism about more U.S. troops in Iraq and support for greater dialogue with Iran, Syria and others in the region.

DOJ_NMG_0111011

Sen. Richard Lugar, the outgoing chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, urged the president to consult with lawmakers before announcing a new strategy on Iraq that could call for additional troops in Iraq.

If Bush were to act with without involving the new Democratic-controlled Congress, he can anticipate "a lot of hearings, a lot of study, a lot of criticism," Lugar said.

Bush is expected to deliver his Iraq policy speech — laying out his plan to improve security, assist the Iraqis in reaching a political reconciliation between warring sects and help with reconstruction — before his State of the Union address on Jan. 23.

Sen. Arlen Specter, just back from a trip to the region, also questioned the wisdom of sending in more troops, saying he has not seen an administration plan that would justify it. "If there is a road map to victory, then I would be prepared to listen to what the president has to say about more troops," he said.

The Pennsylvania Republican described the situation in the Mideast as the most serious he has seen in his 26 years in the Senate.

Specter expressed support for the Iraq Study Group's recommendations that the U.S. engage Syria, Iran and others in negotiations on Iraq's future.

Lugar suggested his committee, which Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del., will lead beginning in January, hold a "retreat" to discuss Iraq, even before Bush's expected upcoming address to the nation.

Lugar said the U.S. should not rule out conversations with Iran and Syria, as well as Jordan, Saudi Arabia and Turkey, regarding the instability in the region.

The Indiana senator appeared frustrated that the president has not done more to consult Congress on Iraq policy.

"In the past, the administration has been inclined not to disregard Congress, but to not take Congress very seriously," he said.

When asked whether he would support Bush's plan for a "surge" of more troops into the country, Lugar said "I don't know whether I do or not."

He said the U.S. should have a clear policy on what those troops are required to do. "The administration needs to identify precisely where the battle lines are - who is it we combat. I haven't seen such lines," Lugar said.

Lugar also questioned whether a move to train Iraqis might "lead to Iraqis who are better prepared for civil war against each other."

He said if Bush reaches out to Congress about his plans, hearings before the committee could become "well-informed, sophisticated situations" rather than a "lynching party."

In a partisan flip, Connecticut Sen. Joe Lieberman, the Democrat turned independent, said he supports an expected recommendation by the White House for more troops in Iraq and argued against dialogue with Syria.

When asked if he could support sending another "20,000 to 30,000" troops, Lieberman said, "I can and I hope it's exactly what President Bush does."

Specter recently visited Syria and spoke with President Bashar Assad, despite admonitions from the White House against the trip.

Specter said Assad told him that he was "prepared to work with the United States on tightening the border to impede insurgents" and also that Syria would be willing to host an "international conference" in an attempt to bring peace to the region.

"I respect what the administration is doing, but there are others of us who have been in the region who have studied it intently and have some useful suggestions to make," Specter said.

Lieberman accused Syria of allowing al-Qaida to cross its borders and kill American troops and of having a hand in recent assassinations in Lebanon.

Meantime, two Democratic presidential hopefuls affirmed their opposition to additional U.S. troops in Iraq.

Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack said the U.S. should not make a "big mistake even bigger by suggesting a surge of troops in some way, shape or form is going to make Iraq safer or better."

Former North Carolina senator John Edwards, described the troop-increase idea as the "McCain doctrine" — after a chief advocate, Sen. John McCain — and said he believes the Arizona Republican is "dead wrong."

Lugar and Vilsack were on "Fox News Sunday," Edwards appeared on ABC's "This Week" while Lieberman and Specter spoke on "Late Edition" on CNN.

A 'Surge' Faces Trouble In The Senate (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

DOJ_NMG_0111012

Sen. John McCain, leading a blue-ribbon congressional delegation to Baghdad before Christmas, collected evidence that a "surge" of more U.S. troops is needed in Iraq. But not all his colleagues who accompanied him were convinced. What's more, he will find himself among a dwindling minority inside the Senate Republican caucus when Congress reconvenes this week.

President Bush and McCain, the front-runner for the party's 2008 presidential nomination, will have trouble finding support from more than 12 of the 49 Republican senators when pressing for a surge of 30,000 troops. "It's Alice in Wonderland," Sen. Chuck Hagel, second-ranking Republican on the Foreign Relations Committee, told me in describing the proposal. "I'm absolutely opposed to sending any more troops to Iraq. It is folly."

What to do about Iraq poses not only a national policy crisis but profound political problems for the Republican Party. Disenchantment with George W. Bush within the GOP runs deep. Republican leaders around the country, anticipating that the 2006 election disaster would prompt an orderly disengagement from Iraq, are shocked that the president now appears ready to add troops.

The recent McCain congressional delegation was composed of sophisticated lawmakers who have made many previous visits to Iraq. They do not minimize the severity of sectarian civil war. They left their meeting with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki doubting any "sense of urgency" after advising him that he must disarm the militias. They recognize that the national police, corrupt and riddled with radicals, constitutes an unmitigated disaster.

McCain has long called for more troops in Iraq. He was supported within the delegation by his ally Sen. Lindsey Graham (S.C.) and by Sen. Joseph Lieberman, the only Democrat on the delegation (though he now calls himself an "Independent Democrat" after losing the Democratic nomination in Connecticut and being elected with Republican votes). But Sen. John Thune (S.D.) calls his support for the surge "conditional." Sen. Susan Collins (Maine) returned from Baghdad opposing more troops. Rep. Mark Kirk of Illinois, the only House member on the trip, is described as skeptical.

How big and how long should a surge be? The 7,000 or 8,000 troops that were first mentioned now have grown to at least 30,000. Congressional advocates talk privately about an infusion of manpower ending about halfway through this year. But retired general Jack Keane, who has become a leading advocate of additional troops, wrote in The Post last week: "Increasing troop levels in Baghdad for three to six months would virtually ensure defeat."

I checked with prominent Republicans around the country and found them confused and disturbed about the surge. They incorrectly assumed that the presence of Republican stalwart James Baker as co-chairman of the Iraq Study Group meant it was Bush-inspired (when it really was a bipartisan creation of Congress). Why, they ask, is the president casting aside the commission's recommendations and calling for more troops?

Even in Mississippi, the reddest of red states, where Bush's approval rating has just inched above 50 percent, Republicans see no public support for more troops. What is happening inside the president's party is reflected by defection from support for his war policy after November's election by two Republican senators who face an uphill race for reelection in 2008: Gordon Smith of Oregon and Norm Coleman of Minnesota. Coleman announced his opposition to the idea after returning from a trip to Iraq that preceded McCain's.

Among Democrats, Lieberman stands alone. Delaware Sen. Joseph Biden, as Foreign Relations Committee chairman, will lead the rest of the Democrats not only to oppose a surge but to block it. Bush enters a new world of a Democratic majority where he must share the stage.

Just as the president is ready to address the nation on Iraq, Biden next week begins three weeks of hearings on the war. On the committee, Biden and Democrats Christopher Dodd (Conn.), John Kerry (Mass.), Russell Feingold (Wis.) and Barack Obama (Ill.) will compete for intensity in criticizing a troop surge. But on the Republican side of the committee, no less probing scrutiny of Bush's proposals will come from Chuck Hagel.

Chaos Overran Iraq Plan In ’06, Bush Team Says (NYT)

By David E. Sanger, Michael R. Gordon And John F. Burns

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

This article is by David E. Sanger, Michael R. Gordon and John F. Burns.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 31 — President Bush began 2006 assuring the country that he had a “strategy for victory in Iraq.” He ended the year closeted with his war cabinet on his ranch trying to devise a new strategy, because the existing one had collapsed.

The original plan, championed by Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top commander in Baghdad, and backed by Donald H. Rumsfeld, then the defense secretary, called for turning over responsibility for security to the Iraqis, shrinking the number of American bases and beginning the gradual withdrawal of American troops. But the plan collided with Iraq’s ferocious unraveling, which took most of Mr. Bush’s war council by surprise.

In interviews in Washington and Baghdad, senior officials said the White House, the Pentagon and the State Department had also failed to take seriously warnings, including some from its own ambassador in Baghdad, that sectarian violence could rip the country apart and turn Mr. Bush's promise to "clear, hold and build" Iraqi neighborhoods and towns into an empty slogan.

This left the president and his advisers constantly lagging a step or two behind events on the ground.

"We could not clear and hold," Stephen J. Hadley, the president's national security adviser, acknowledged in a recent interview, in a frank admission of how American strategy had crumbled. "Iraqi forces were not able to hold neighborhoods, and the effort to build did not show up. The sectarian violence continued to mount, so we did not make the progress on security we had hoped. We did not bring the moderate Sunnis off the fence, as we had hoped. The Shia lost patience, and began to see the militias as their protectors."

Over the past 12 months, as optimism collided with reality, Mr. Bush increasingly found himself uneasy with General Casey's strategy. And now, as the image of Saddam Hussein at the gallows recedes, Mr. Bush seems all but certain not only to reverse the strategy that General Casey championed, but also to accelerate the general's departure from Iraq, according to senior military officials.

General Casey repeatedly argued that his plan offered the best prospect for reducing the perception that the United States remained an occupier — and it was a path he thought matched Mr. Bush's wishes. Earlier in the year, it had.

But as Baghdad spun further out of control, some of the president's advisers now say, Mr. Bush grew concerned that General Casey, among others, had become more fixated on withdrawal than victory.

Now, having ousted Mr. Rumsfeld, Mr. Bush sees a chance to bring in a new commander as he announces a new strategy, senior military officials say. General Casey was scheduled to shift out of Iraq in the summer. But now it appears that it may happen in February or March.

By mid-September, Mr. Bush was disappointed with the results in Iraq and signed off on a complete review of Iraq strategy — a review centered in Washington, not in Baghdad. Whatever form the new strategy takes, it seems almost certain to include a "surge" in forces, something that General Casey insisted earlier this year he did not need and which might even be counterproductive.

In a telephone interview on Friday, General Casey continued to caution against a lengthy expansion in the American military role. "The longer we in the U.S. forces continue to bear the main burden of Iraq's security, it lengthens the time that the government of Iraq has to take the hard decisions about reconciliation and dealing with the militias," he said. "And the other thing is that they can continue to blame us for all of Iraq's problems, which are at base their problems."

Yet if Mr. Bush does send in more American forces, historians may well ask why it took him so long. Some Bush officials argue that the administration erred by refusing to send in a bigger force in 2003, or by sufficiently bolstering it when the insurgency began to take hold.

This year, decisions on a new strategy were clearly slowed by political calculations. Many of Mr. Bush's advisers say their timetable for completing an Iraq review had been based in part on a judgment that for Mr. Bush to have voiced doubts about his strategy before the midterm elections in November would have been politically catastrophic.

Mr. Bush came to worry that it was not just his critics and Democrats in Congress who were looking for what he dismissed last month as a strategy of "graceful exit." Visiting the Pentagon a few weeks ago for a classified briefing on Iraq with his generals, Mr. Bush made it clear that he was not interested in any ideas that would simply allow American forces to stabilize the violence. Gen. James T. Conway, the Marine commandant, later told marines about the president's message.

"What I want to hear from you is how we're going to win," he quoted the president as warning his commanders, "not how we're going to leave."

Sectarian Killings Escalate

When 2006 began, the United States military did not have a systematic means of tabulating sectarian attacks in Iraq. The Sunni-led insurgency was the focus of Mr. Bush's statements, and its destruction the focus of American military strategy.

The Bush administration was jolted on Feb. 22 when Al Qaeda blew up the Askariya Mosque in Samarra, a carefully plotted effort to fan sectarian passions, prompt Shiite retaliation and make Iraq ungovernable.

The day of the explosion, Shiites in Sadr City poured into the streets carrying banners and flags. Men, some dressed in black, the traditional dress for the Shiite militia in the area, piled into open back trucks, carrying weapons and shouting slogans of loyalty to Shiite saints. In Baghdad, Zalmay Khalilzad, the American ambassador to Iraq, went to Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari to insist that the Iraqi government impose a 24-hour nationwide curfew. Mr. Jaafari, a member of the Shiite Dawa Party, was not persuaded.

"You've been here six months, and all of a sudden you know my country better than I do," Mr. Jaafari replied, according to an official who witnessed the exchange. But even some Iraqi leaders, including the current national security adviser, Mowaffak al-Rubaie, echoed Mr. Khalilzad's advice. "I remember saying to him: 'this is going to be the trigger of an all-out civil war,' " Mr. Rubaie said.

Mr. Jaafari insisted that he had a plan, which involved closing the Sunni television stations in the country, though as the violence grew he belatedly imposed a curfew that evening. It was the beginning of a debilitating pattern. The Shiite-dominated government did too little to protect Sunni citizens. Shiite militias took matters into their own hands. And the American military struggled to hold the city together with overstretched units.

It was clear that the retaliation was highly organized. Sunnis in the eastern portion of Baghdad, in an area called Rusafa, reported that Shiites in SUV's were pulling up, knocking on doors, and seeking specific people. Bodies surfaced in sewers and garbage heaps days later.

When the killing abated, President Bush and his top aides declared that the worst had passed. Both Sunnis and Shiites had "looked into the abyss and did not like what they saw," the president said.

Renegade militias were a concern but "not a major long-term problem as long as the Iraqi armed forces and the Iraqi police continue to be loyal to the central government, as they have been," Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said in a March 5 appearance on the NBC News program "Meet the Press."

Sectarian-inspired executions, however, rose from almost 200 in January to more than 700 in March, and continued upward, according to the Pentagon.

Even as the violence grew, General Casey, the top American commander in Iraq, appeared confident. He had served as a senior aide for the Joint Chiefs of Staff at the Pentagon, where he gained the confidence of Mr. Rumsfeld before being sent to Baghdad in 2004. At 58, the four-star general reported directly to the defense secretary.

Mr. Rumsfeld had mused publicly that history showed that it could take a decade or so to defeat an insurgency. He was eager to turn over responsibility for the war to the Iraqis and to reduce the American footprint in Iraq as quickly as possible.

General Casey and Gen. John P. Abizaid, head of the United States Central Command, appeared to be like-minded. During the summer of 2005, General Casey had forecast "fairly significant reductions" in American troops by the summer of 2006, an assessment that the commander said reflected "feelers" from Sunni insurgents that they might be willing to negotiate and lay down their arms.

Some of General Casey's aides have said that in developing troop withdrawal plans they were cognizant that the Bush administration had not taken any steps to expand the American military presence despite a persistent insurgency, and seemed to have little appetite for substantially expanding the war effort.

No Wish to Stay Indefinitely

For his part, General Casey said that his plan was aimed at showing Iraqis that the United States did not want to perpetuate its role as an occupier indefinitely, and stressed that he was following a strategy to match the "convoluted" political and military situation in Iraq, and not seeking to advance his career with plans that suited the Bush administration's political agenda.

"I have worked very hard to ask for what I need, for what I thought I needed to accomplish the mission," he said Friday. "It's always been my view that a heavy and sustained American military presence was not going to solve the problems in Iraq over the long term."

By late 2005, the White House accepted the main tenets of the hand-over strategy. "Casey and Abizaid had what seemed like a plausible plan at the time," Mr. Hadley recalled. "It was well thought out, and after the elections in January looked like the direction we were headed in."

President Bush promoted the strategy in a speech to cheering midshipmen at the United States Naval Academy in Annapolis, Md., on Nov. 30, 2005: "We will continue to shift from providing security and conducting operations against the enemy nationwide to conducting more specialized operations targeted at the most dangerous terrorists. We will increasingly move out of Iraqi cities, reduce the number of bases from which we operate, and conduct fewer patrols and convoys."

Yet not everybody at the Pentagon shared General's Casey's confidence. The Defense Intelligence Agency had briefed the White House in early 2006 that the insurgency was winning in Iraq, according to a former military officer. The briefing, which chronicled the steady rise in the number of attacks, prompted a counter-briefing from General Casey's intelligence chief, who prepared an analysis tracing the positive trends in Iraq.

Data gathered by General Casey's own command, which showed a steady increase in weekly attacks and civilian casualties, lent support to the Defense Intelligence Agency assessment.

At the State Department, skepticism about General Casey's strategy ran deep. Philip D. Zelikow, the counselor to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice until he resigned in December, went to Iraq in late 2005, and returned with a recommendation that the first part of 2006 be devoted to a big push — military, economic and political — to boost the soon-to-be-formed Iraqi government. His approach contradicted the commitment to reductions.

DOJ_NMG_0111015

Still, the general was reluctant to abandon his basic strategy. According to a senior administration official, General Casey told the White House in April, May and June of 2006 that the American military was having success against Al Qaeda of Mesopotamia and the Sunni-based insurgency, and that sectarian violence could be managed.

Calls for a Review of Strategy

By May 2006, uneasy officials at the State Department and the National Security Council argued for a review of Iraq strategy. A meeting was convened at Camp David to consider those approaches, according to participants in the session, but Mr. Bush left early for a secret visit to Baghdad, where he reviewed the war plans with General Casey and Mr. Maliki, and met with the American pilot whose plane's missiles killed Iraq's Al Qaeda leader, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi. He returned to Washington in a buoyant mood.

The visit meant that the reconsideration of strategy was not as thorough as some officials hoped.

Later in June, General Casey flew to Washington to give briefings on the latest version of his troop reduction plan at the Pentagon and White House. The number of American combat brigades, which then totaled 14, would be reduced by two in September and might shrink to 10 by December, if conditions allowed. If the Iraqis continued to assume more responsibility for their security, there would be only five or six combat brigades in Iraq by December 2007.

Yet already President Bush was signaling to top aides that he wanted to re-evaluate how to keep stability before proceeding with troop withdrawals. His caution matched a growing unease among American field commanders in Iraq, and officers on the streets of Baghdad, who said they were surprised by General Casey's continued advocacy of withdrawals and consolidating bases. They said that American forces should be focusing on a greater counterinsurgency effort, which would require that a substantial number of troops be dispersed to protect that population against insurgent and militia attacks.

Events overtook the White House. In early August, the United States was forced to reverse course and add troops in Baghdad. On reflection, Mr. Hadley said, "Finally the patience of the Shia had worn thin," and, "By the time the unity government took over the cycle of sectarian violence had begun. And they and we have not been able to get ahead of it ."

The administration's summer strategy seemed simple: American and Iraqi forces would clear selected neighborhoods of insurgents and militia leaders, hold them with the Iraqi police, and win over the population with job-creating reconstruction programs.

But carrying out the strategy proved maddeningly difficult. The American troop commitment was modest at best. With the addition of roughly 7,000 troops the American military force assigned to carry out the operation in Baghdad was brought to some 15,000. (During one discussion of the operation in August, President Bush asked General Casey whether he had sufficient troops to secure Baghdad; the general assured him that he did.)

The Iraqis never delivered four of the six Iraqi Army battalions that they had committed to the effort. Some of the Iraqi police units proved to be so infiltrated by Shiite militias that they had to be pulled off duty for retraining.

Weaknesses in the Iraqi Forces

In the Sunni stronghold of Dora, in southwestern Baghdad, American troops were forced to clear thousands of homes twice: the Iraqi security forces who moved in behind them were too few, and too little dedicated to the task, to keep the insurgents from returning.

In neighborhoods like Baya, the Shiite-dominated Iraqi National Police set up menacing checkpoints on the routes Sunnis used to seek medical attention or buy fuel.

"They were trying to dominate the Sunni population and terrorize them to the point that they would leave Baghdad or leave the neighborhood," recalled Lt. Col. James Danna, who had led the Second Battalion, Sixth Infantry Regiment, which oversaw those areas. He said that like the first Baghdad security operation, the second also failed. As the American elections approached, White House officials say, they believed it would amount to political suicide to announce a broad reassessment of Iraq strategy. But they recognized that unless they began such a review, they would be forced to accept the conclusions of the final report of the Iraq Study Group — headed by James A. Baker III, the former Republican secretary of state, and Lee H. Hamilton, the former Democratic congressman.

The effort started in September, around the time Mr. Bush decided to oust Mr. Rumsfeld. In the days before the election, Mr. Bush suggested during an interview that Mr. Rumsfeld could stay until the end of his term — a deliberately misleading statement that Mr. Bush said later was necessitated by the political season. Similarly, it was days after the election that the White House revealed that a major Iraq review was under way.

In public, Mr. Bush continues to insist that he and Mr. Maliki share the same vision. In private, one of his former aides said, "he questions whether Maliki has the will or the power" to make good on any commitments.

American military officers have also wondered if the Shiite-dominated Iraqi government and the Americans share the same vision. Were the Iraqis not pulling their weight because they did not have the capability to provide security and proceed with reconstruction? Or did the Iraqi authorities have a sectarian agenda?

As security efforts in Baghdad faltered, a confidential briefing on possible “end states” in Iraq was prepared by officials under the command of Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarielli, who until a few weeks ago led the day-to-day operations in Iraq. It suggested the dark vision of a divided nation that haunts the administration.

Unless the United States persuaded the Iraqi government to change course, those who prepared the briefing foresaw an Iraq run by a relatively weak central government, which would include a largely autonomous nine-province Shiite region in the south and a Shiite-dominated Baghdad. The Kurds would retain their autonomy in the north. The Sunnis would essentially be relegated to the western Anbar Province and other enclaves.

The briefing posed a question: was this an outcome the United States could live with? If so, what could the United States do to minimize the bloodshed? If not, what should be done to alter this course?

Mr. Bush still insists on talking about victory, even if his own advisers differ about how to define it. “It’s a word the American people understand,” he told members of the Iraq Study Group who came to see him at the White House in November, according to two commission members who attended. “And if I start to change it, it will look like I’m beginning to change my policy.”

Bush Mulls Plan As U.S. Toll Hits 3,000 (AP)

By Pauline Jelinek, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 1, 2007

American deaths in the Iraq war reached the sobering milestone of 3,000 on Sunday even as the Bush administration sought to overhaul its strategy for an unpopular conflict that shows little sign of abating.

The latest death came during one of the most violent periods during which the Pentagon says hate and revenge killings between Iraq's sects are now a bigger security problem than ever.

The death of a Texas soldier, announced Sunday by the Pentagon, raised the number of U.S. military deaths in Iraq to at least 3,000, according to an Associated Press count, since the war began in March 2003.

President Bush is struggling to salvage a military campaign that, more than three-and-a-half years after U.S. forces overran the country, has scant support from the American public. In large part because of that discontent, voters gave Democrats control of the new Congress that convenes this week. Democrats have pledged to focus on the war and Bush's conduct of it.

Three thousand deaths are tiny compared with casualties in other protracted wars America has fought in the last century. There were 58,000 Americans killed in the Vietnam War, 36,000 in the Korean conflict, 405,000 in World War II and 116,000 in World War I, according to Defense Department figures.

Even so, the steadily mounting toll underscores the relentless violence that the massive U.S. investment in lives and money — surpassing $350 billion — has yet to tame, and may in fact still be getting worse.

A Pentagon report on Iraq said in December that the conflict now is more a struggle between Sunni and Shiite armed groups "fighting for religious, political and economic influence," with the insurgency and foreign terrorist campaigns "a backdrop."

From mid-August to mid-November, the weekly average number of attacks in the country increased 22 percent from the previous three months. The worst violence was in Baghdad and in the western province of Anbar, long the focus of activity by Sunni insurgents, said a December report.

Though U.S.-led coalition forces remained the target of the majority of attacks, the overwhelming majority of casualties were suffered by Iraqis, the report said.

The American death toll was at 1,000 in September of 2004 and 2,000 by October 2005.

Bush told an end-of-the-year press conference that the deaths distress him.

"The most painful aspect of the presidency is the fact that I know my decisions have caused young men and women to lose their lives," Bush said.

Asked about the 3,000 figure, deputy White House press secretary Scott Stanzel said Sunday that the president "will ensure their sacrifice was not made in vain."

"We will be fighting violent jihadists for peace and security of the civilized world for years to come. The brave men and women of the U.S. military are fighting extremists in order to stop them from attacking on our soil again," Stanzel said.

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., called the figure a "tragic milestone" and said the government owes its troops "a new policy that is worthy of their heroism and brings them safely home."

In a statement Bush released Sunday to wish the troops and all Americans a happy new year, the president said the nation depends on the men and women in the armed services and are mindful of their dedication and sacrifice.

"Last year, America continued its mission to fight and win the war on terror and promote liberty as an alternative to tyranny and despair," Bush said in the statement released from his ranch in Crawford, Texas, where he and first lady Laura Bush are spending New Year's Eve with friends.

"In the New Year, we will remain on the offensive against the enemies of freedom, advance the security of our country, and work toward a free and unified Iraq," he said. "Defeating terrorists and extremists is the challenge of our time, and we will answer history's call with confidence and fight for liberty without wavering."

In an interview on Dec. 21 with The Associated Press, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the war was "worth the investment" in American lives and dollars.

In his strategy reassessment, Bush has consulted Iraqis, his uniformed and civilian advisers, an outside bipartisan panel that studied the failing war, and other defense and foreign policy experts. New Defense Secretary Robert Gates journeyed to Iraq in his first week on the job in December to confer with American commanders and Iraqi leaders.

Among the president's options was a proposal to quickly add thousands of U.S. troops to the 140,000 already in Iraq to try to control escalating violence in Baghdad and elsewhere.

Others believe too much blood and money already have been sacrificed. Democrats have wanted Bush to move toward a phased drawdown of forces, while the bipartisan Iraq Study Group recommended removing most U.S. combat forces by early 2008 while shifting the U.S. role to advising and supporting Iraqi units.

Having launched the war against the advice of a number of nations, the Bush administration never got a huge international contribution of troops, meaning foreign forces helping the Iraqis are overwhelmingly American.

The death toll shows it. As of late December, the British military has reported 127 deaths in the war so far; Italy, 33; Ukraine, 18; Poland, 18; Bulgaria, 13; Spain, 11; and Denmark, six. Several other countries have had five or less.

U.S. Toll In Iraq Reaches 3,000 (WP)

By Nancy Trejos, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 1, 2007

Deaths in December Most in Two Years

BAGHDAD, Dec. 31 -- The number of U.S. service members killed in Iraq since the war began in 2003 reached 3,000 on Sunday, a symbolic milestone at a time when the Bush administration is rethinking its strategy for the increasingly violent conflict.

As the year drew to a close, the U.S. military announced that a soldier was killed Saturday by a roadside bomb while on patrol in a southeastern neighborhood of Baghdad. Two soldiers were injured in the attack. Their names were not released.

The Defense Department also announced that Spec. Dustin R. Donica, 22, of Spring, Tex., was killed by small-arms fire Thursday in Baghdad.

According to the Associated Press and the independent Web site iCasualties.org, both of which keep counts of war fatalities, the deaths raised the American toll to at least 3,000.

Reaching that threshold has significance at a time when President Bush is considering a change in strategy that could include sending in more troops. The 140,000 U.S. troops currently in Iraq have not been able to reduce the daily violence caused by an aggressive insurgency in the western province of Anbar and an increasingly bitter sectarian conflict in Baghdad.

"What you see is the U.S. deeply involved in this fight against an insurrection and increasingly trying to bring order to a low-level civil war," Anthony H. Cordesman, an analyst for the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said by telephone in Washington. "There's no way you can do that with 140,000 troops in a country of 27 million without having casualties."

He added: "This pace of casualties is likely to go on until we can change or find a new approach."

The bipartisan Iraq Study Group recommended that the focus of U.S. troops in Iraq be shifted from combat to training Iraqi soldiers and police officers, and that most combat brigades be withdrawn by early 2008.

The most recent deaths happened during a particularly costly month of the war. With 111 fatalities, according to iCasualties.org, December was not only the deadliest month of 2006 for U.S. troops, but the deadliest in two years.

Most of December's deaths occurred in Anbar province, and most were the result of improvised explosive devices, or IEDs, according to a Washington Post analysis of the data. But insurgents have found other ways to attack troops, among them sniper fire.

The number of service members who have been wounded has continued to climb as well. More than 22,000 troops have been injured so far, according to the latest Defense Department data.

A Pentagon report in December gave a grim assessment of the war, acknowledging that violence soared to its highest level this fall, with anti-U.S. fighters achieving "strategic success" by unleashing a spiral of sectarian killings by Sunni Arab and Shiite Muslim death squads. According to the report, the violence had reached record highs, with 959 attacks per week.

DOJ_NMG_0111018

In the United States, public discontent over the war has grown, evidenced by the fact that voters gave Democrats control of the new Congress. Many media outlets and pundits have pointed out that the military death toll in Iraq now exceeds the number of people killed in the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, which Bush has often cited as justification for the war.

White House spokesman Scott Stanzel said Bush "believes that every life is precious and grieves for each one that is lost."

"He will ensure their sacrifice was not made in vain," Stanzel said. "The war on terror will be a long struggle. We will be fighting violent jihadists for peace and security of the civilized world for years to come."

Military leaders played down the significance of reaching 3,000 deaths.

"We don't count that way, because each one is important to us," said Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, a U.S. military spokesman in Baghdad. "Number 2,999 means the same to us as number 3,000. It's an arbitrary number that doesn't mean anything to us."

The Defense Department count of Americans killed in Iraq stood at 2,986 as of Sunday, said a Pentagon spokesman, Lt. Col. Mark Ballesteros. The Pentagon's official count often lags because it does not include a fatality in its official tally until 24 hours after notifying next of kin. The U.S. military in Iraq issues news releases with names withheld before deaths are officially counted.

"Let's set aside discussion of numbers," Ballesteros said. "Every loss is regretted, each loss has a value, significance and importance unto itself, regardless of what number anyone would assign."

Each death, he said, "is felt individually by that person's family and friends. It's particularly difficult during the holidays."

U.S. Announces Death Of 3,000th American Soldier (MCT)

By Nancy A. Youssef

McClatchy Newspapers, January 1, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Saddam Hussein, the deposed dictator hanged Saturday for the murder of 148 fellow citizens, was buried at sunrise in his hometown Sunday, not far from the graves of his two sons. Hours later, on the final day of 2006, the U.S. military announced the death of the 3,000th American soldier to die in Iraq.

The death of Spc. Dustin Donica, 22, of Spring, Texas, by small arms fire Thursday in Baghdad, brought the December toll to 111, the deadliest month of the year for U.S. troops. Donica was assigned to a parachute infantry regiment at Fort Richardson, Alaska.

The milestone was reached at a time when President Bush is considering an overhaul of American policy in Iraq - a review that could result in tens of thousands more U.S. troops serving in this strife-torn country.

Bush spokesman Scott Stanzel said that the United States "will be fighting violent jihadists for peace and security of the civilized world for years to come." He said Bush would see to it that the sacrifice of U.S. troops "was not made in vain."

Saddam's burial in his hometown of al Awja, near the northern city of Tikrit, drew about 100 people for a dawn service. The flag draped over his body was that from his regime. The flag's inscribed words, "God is Great," were written in his own hand, not in formal script as it now appears on the official Iraqi flag.

Officials at the province, who took control of Saddam's body from the Iraqi government, said they were grateful the body was treated in an Islamic way. And, on a national television station, they thanked American officials for providing a helicopter to take the body to the burial site.

Meanwhile, on a quiet day marked by the observance of the religious festival of Eid, Iraqis were transfixed by a video that showed Saddam's final moments. Some said the video showed a composed Saddam killed by a Shiite government settling personal scores, not an example of justice; others said it was a fair end for a man who tortured and brutalized innocent Iraqis for more than two decades.

The latest video disputed some initial accounts of what happened in the seconds before execution. Captured on a cell phone camera, it appeared on several Web sites, and picked up where the government-released video released Saturday had cut off - after the tightening of the noose. Not every word spoken was audible.

Five executioners wearing black ski masks surrounded Saddam, who wore a long black coat. As they put the rope around his neck, Saddam called out, "O God."

After tightening the noose, men - both the executioners and witnesses - chanted part of a common Shiite Muslim saying, followed by Muqtada al-Sadr's name, the firebrand cleric who leads one of the most powerful militias in Iraq, the Mahdi Army.

"God's prayer upon the (Prophet) and his family ... May God bring closer his release (referring to the 12th Imam, who Shiites believe will appear again) and curse his enemy. Muqtada, Muqtada Muqtada!" the men chanted in unison, their voices more powerful with each passing word.

It appears more dialogue occurred here, but the words are not clear. Saddam is next heard saying: "Thank God. Is this manhood?"

Someone in the room snapped at Saddam: "Go to hell."

"The hell that is Iraq?" Saddam said.

Another voice then shouted the name Mohammed Bakir Sadr, a relative of Muqtada and the intellectual brains behind the Dawa Party, one of the fiercest Saddam opposition parties. Prime Minister Nouri al Maliki is a member of the party, and thousands of people were either exiled or killed for being suspected members.

Another man appealed for calm: "I beg you no. This man is being executed."

But the crowd became more emboldened. Saddam then began reciting one of the most important Islamic sayings, the Shadada, which Muslims say to prove their faith: "I testify there is no god but God and (Prophet) Muhammad is the messenger of God." As he repeated it, and reached the word "Muhammad," the shaft opened from under him. The picture goes dark, breaking only for flashes from cameras photographing Saddam dead, his eyes open, his body dangling.

The witnesses erupted.

"The tyrant has fallen," one man said as others debated how long Saddam should be kept on the rope.

The Iraqi Special Tribunal convicted Saddam and two co-defendants on Nov. 5, charging that they ordered the execution of 148 people after an unsuccessful assassination attempt against the dictator in Dujail in 1982. Last week an appeals court upheld the conviction; under Iraqi law, Saddam had to be executed within 30 days.

On Saleh al Din channel, based in Saddam's hometown province, music designated for mourning and recitations of the Koran played all day.

16,273 Deaths Reported In Iraq In 2006 (AP)

By Lauren Frayer

AP, January 2, 2007

As enraged crowds protested the hanging of Saddam Hussein across Iraq's Sunni heartland Monday, government officials reported that 16,273 Iraqi civilians, soldiers and police died violent deaths in 2006, a figure larger than an independent Associated Press count for the year by more than 2,500.

The tabulation by the Iraqi ministries of Health, Defense and Interior, showed that 14,298 civilians, 1,348 police and 627 soldiers were killed in the violence that raged in the country last year.

The Associated Press accounting, gleaned from daily news reports from Baghdad, arrived at a total of 13,738 deaths. The United Nations has said as many as 100 Iraqis die violently each day, which translates into 36,500 deaths annually.

In Samarra, a mob broke the locks off a bomb-damaged Shiite shrine and marched through carrying a mock coffin and photo of the dictator.

The demonstration in the Golden Dome, shattered in a bombing by Sunni extremists 10 months ago, suggests that many Sunni Arabs may now more actively support the small number of Sunni militants fighting the country's Shiite-dominated government. The Feb. 22 bombing of the shrine triggered the current cycle of retaliatory attacks between Sunnis and Shiia, in the form of daily bombings, kidnappings and murders.

Monday's protest came on a day that saw the U.S. military kill six Iraqis during a raid on the offices of a prominent Sunni political figure, who was suspected of giving al-Qaida in Iraq fighters sanctuary.

Until Saddam's execution Saturday, most Sunnis sympathized with militants but avoided taking a direct role in the sectarian conflict — despite attacks by Shiite militia that have killed thousands of Sunnis or driven them from their homes. The current Sunni protests, which appear to be building, could signal a spreading militancy.

Sunnis were not only outraged by Saddam's hurried execution, just four days after an appeals court upheld his conviction and sentence. Many were also incensed by the unruly scene in the execution chamber, captured on video, in which Saddam was taunted with chants of "Muqtada, Muqtada, Muqtada."

The chants referred to Muqtada al-Sadr, a firebrand Shiite cleric who runs one of Iraq's most violent religious militias. He is a major power behind the government of Shiite Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

Many Sunnis are also upset that Saddam was put to death the day that Sunni celebrations began for Eid al-Adha, a major Muslim festival. The judge who first presided over the case that resulted in Saddam's death sentence said the former dictator's execution at the start of Eid was illegal according to Iraqi law, and contradicted Islamic custom.

The law states that "no verdict should implemented during the official holidays or religious festivals," said Judge Rizgar Mohammed Amin, a Kurd.

Rizgar presided over Saddam's trial on charges he killed 148 Shiite men and boys in Dujail, north of Baghdad, in a botched assassination attempt in 1982. The judge was removed from the case after Shiite complaints that he was too lenient.

DOJ_NMG_0111020

In a Sunni neighborhood in northern Baghdad, hundreds of demonstrators mourned the executed leader. Some praised the Baath Party, the outlawed nationalist group that under Saddam cemented Sunni Arab dominance of Iraq.

"The Baath party and Baathists still exist in Iraq, and nobody can marginalize it," said Samir al-Obaidi, 48, who attended a Saddam memorial in the Azamiyah neighborhood.

In Dor, 77 miles north of Baghdad, hundreds more took to the streets to attend the dedication of a giant mosaic of Saddam. Children carried toy guns and men fired real weapons into the air.

Mourners at a mosque in Saddam's hometown of Tikrit slaughtered sheep as a sacrifice. The mosque's walls were lined with condolence cards from tribes in southern Iraq and Jordan who were unable to travel to the memorial.

Saddam's eldest daughter briefly attended a protest Monday in Jordan — her first public appearance since her father was hanged.

"God bless you, and I thank you for honoring Saddam, the martyr," said Raghad Saddam Hussein, according to two witnesses. She addressed members of the Professional Associations — an umbrella group of unions representing doctors, engineers and lawyers — in the group's office parking lot in west Amman.

Six Iraqis were killed in a U.S.-led raid on the Baghdad offices of a top Sunni politician, Saleh al-Mutlaq. The U.S. military and Iraqi police said they suspected the offices were being used as an al-Qaida safe house.

Al-Mutlaq is a senior member of the National Dialogue Front, which holds 11 of the 275 seats in Iraq's parliament.

U.S. forces said they took on heavy fire from automatic weapons and rocket-propelled grenades as they sought to enter the building. Ground troops were backed by helicopters that "engaged the enemy with precision point target machine gun fire," the military said.

It was unclear whether the deaths resulted from the ground assault or fire from U.S. helicopters.

Associated Press Television News footage showed masses of rubble in the area and what appeared to be a long smear of blood where a body had been dragged across the floor of one of the buildings.

Walls were pitted with what appeared to be bullet and shrapnel holes.

The U.S. death toll, meanwhile, climbed to at least 3,002 by the final day of 2006 as the American military reported the deaths of two more soldiers in an explosion Sunday in Diyala Province, northeast of the capital. With the announcement, the Associated Press count of fatalities showed that at least 113 U.S. service members died in December. That makes it bloodiest month of 2006.

Iraqi authorities Monday reported that 16,273 Iraqis — including 14,298 civilians, 1,348 police and 627 soldiers — died violent deaths in 2006. The total exceeds the Associated Press count by more than 2,500.

On the first day of the New Year, Iraqi Police reported finding the 40 handcuffed, blindfolded and bullet-riddled bodies in Baghdad. A police official, who refused to be named out of security fears, said 15 of the bodies were discovered in the mainly industrial Sheik Omar district of northern Baghdad.

An Iraqi worker for the Algerian Embassy in Baghdad was shot to death, police said.

Also Monday, the Iraqi government raided and sealed the offices of a privately owned television station, charging it had incited violence and hatred in its programming. In its coverage of the execution of Saddam over the weekend, a newscaster had worn black mourning clothes.

The satellite television channel Al-Sharqiya, which broadcasts from Dubai, remained on the air late Monday. The station is owned by Saad al-Bazzaz, a one-time chief of radio and television for Saddam.

Under Fire (USNEWS)

By Anna Mulrine

U.S. News and World Report, January 2, 2007

December drew to a close as the deadliest month in two years for American soldiers in Iraq. At his ranch in Crawford, Texas, President Bush gathered his national security team–including new Defense Secretary Bob Gates–to draw up what may well be a last-chance strategy to turn back the tide of chaos. It couldn't have lightened the mood any that morning to glance at the Washington Post's front page: "Ford Disagreed With Bush About Invading Iraq." Former President Gerald Ford, who died last week at age 93, criticized Bush's rationale for the war in a posthumously published July 2004 interview with the Post's Bob Woodward. Said Ford, "I don't think I would have gone to war."

For a current president who famously doesn't like to look back, Ford's delayed critique may mean little, but it raises the stakes a bit higher for Bush's effort to sell the American people on whatever he decides to do next in Iraq. With concern growing almost daily about U.S. soldiers and marines facing hostile fire and increasingly powerful roadside bombs, caught in the middle of what looks to many like an Iraqi civil war, Bush faces the most daunting challenge of his presidency. In urban Baghdad–not just in the insurgent badlands of Al Anbar province–some streets are so regularly booby-trapped with roadside bombs that they are treated as no-go zones for U.S. patrols.

After making it clear that he has his own no-go zones (namely, opening a dialogue with Iran and Syria and considering a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops), Bush is expected to release his new plan for Iraq within days. It will very likely include an economic package that will fund microloans for small businesses and jobs in neighborhoods that have been targeted by military strikes–elements of classic counterinsurgency strategy that weave economic and political incentives together with armed measures. But much of the chatter–and the real political stakes–surround a so-called surge of U.S. troops, enough to make the total force in Baghdad larger than at any time since the war began. That would, the thinking goes, improve security in the city of some 6 million and give the Iraqi government more time to take charge if it can. But it would be hard to pull off. "The big question," says one U.S. commander at Baghdad headquarters, "is what do they want us to do with these troops, exactly, that we're not doing already?"

Wordplay. In Washington, the word surge is increasingly accompanied by something akin to virtual quotation marks. It's more politically palatable than "escalation," with its echoes of Vietnam, and carries the implication of limited duration, or an ebb. But new troops will be on the ground for a while. In a widely circulated PowerPoint presentation, Frederick Kagan, a neoconservative military historian at the American Enterprise Institute, touts the benefits of a surge in a "plan for success," adding that a minimum of 30,000 troops should be sent to the country for "18 months or so." "That's not a surge," says one military official. "It's a troop increase, plain and simple."

'Surge' Strategy (NSWK)

By Michael Hastings, Michael Hirsh And Richard Wolffe

Newsweek, January 2, 2007

Jan. 8, 2007 - He was caught just like a rat." Those were the simple, happy words of Ray Odierno three years ago, after units of his Fourth Infantry Division cornered Saddam Hussein in Tikrit. The hulking general went on to declare that the capture was a "major operational and psychological defeat" for the insurgents, who had been "brought to their knees." It was a heady moment, but as it turned out that's all it was—a moment. On Dec. 14, 2006, three years and a day after Saddam was hauled out of his hole, Lt. Gen. Odierno returned to take day-to-day command of Coalition forces in Iraq. His mood since then has been far more sober. "You now have different groups ... trying to vie for power within Iraq," Odierno told NEWSWEEK in an interview last week from his headquarters at Camp Victory near Baghdad. "That's what makes this extremely more complex than this has been in the past. It's not simply Sunni insurgents or Al Qaeda that we're fighting anymore—fighting is the wrong term—we're trying to influence [Iraqis] to operate within the confines of the government."

The words sound odd coming from a traditional Army warrior known for his kick-in-the-door tactics. But Odierno's transition from certainty to complexity—and from fighting to "influencing"—mirrors the journey made by the U.S. military as a whole. After weeks of intensive discussions, President George W. Bush is expected to announce his new Iraq strategy as early as next week. Most of the debate has centered on whether to "surge" 20,000 or more U.S. troops into the Baghdad area in an effort to succeed, at long last, in securing the Iraqi capital. The question is whether those forces are the right tool for the job at hand—can any number of U.S. troops stop what has become a Sunni-Shiite civil war?—not to mention whether they're even available.

Odierno knows very well that success requires more-subtle tactics than the ones he was once criticized for. An internal Army report in December 2003 concluded that Odierno's Fourth I.D. had indiscriminately rounded up so many military-age Iraqis that prisons like Abu Ghraib overflowed. Odierno rejects the accusation of overaggressiveness, calling it "anecdotal" and adding: "We executed more [reconstruction] projects than anyone else. All that has been forgotten." But he concedes that "a lot has changed since the last time I left" and that he's learned much about fighting an insurgency.

The White House insists it knows that simply adding more troops isn't the answer. The plan being considered is far more nuanced than what has been reported in the media, a senior aide to Bush, who would only discuss the talks in Crawford anonymously, told NEWSWEEK. He said it includes money for new jobs programs and reconstruction aid for Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki, as well as efforts to further shore up his political base. "We know the counterinsurgency plan is clear, hold and build," says the source. "We have to talk about surging troops and surging resources as being equally important."

Even so, the debate over tactics has intensified inside the Pentagon. Bush is now trying to sort through wildly conflicting advice. His Joint Chiefs of Staff supports the conclusions of the Iraq Study Group that, rather than sending in a new influx of U.S. troops, American advisory teams embedded with Iraqi forces should be quadrupled so Iraqis can take control more quickly. Some hawks, led by two outside advisers, former Army vice chief of staff Gen. Jack Keane and military historian Frederick Kagan, are instead urging Bush to "win the battle of Baghdad" himself. They say he can't wait for the Iraqi government, Army or police to secure the country.

U.S. Army officials fret they don't have the forces or equipment for the kind of long deployment (perhaps 18 months or more) that would be required. According to a former senior Army official who would describe the internal discussions only if he was not identified, "Keane told the president: 'Don't you dare let Army and Marine Corps tell you they can't do it.' Soon afterward, Gen. Richard Cody, the vice chief of staff of the Army, called Keane in and gave him the actual figures on readiness, telling him: 'Look, here's the status of these brigades today. It's not doable'." Keane did not respond to several calls asking for comment, but the senior White House aide denies that the Pentagon is resisting any surge plan. "The military leadership is committed to doing what is required to be successful," he says.

Kagan worries Bush will end up splitting the difference and decide on a smaller, short-term offensive. That, Kagan says, would be disastrous, repeating the failure of Operation Forward Together in Baghdad last summer and fall, which he blames on too few U.S. troops (about 8,000). By putting the onus for stabilizing Baghdad on U.S. forces again, a troop surge would also reverse the policy of the soon-to-depart overall commander in Iraq, Gen. George Casey, who is Odierno's boss. "This is the antithesis of the strategy Casey's been pursuing for two years, which is more and more Iraqi control," says Kagan. Maybe the only certainty any longer is that Odierno's new mission is sure to be a lot harder than finding Saddam Hussein.

White House Week (USNEWS)

Bush's Big Act: If He Bombs, Does the Fat Lady Sing?

Some senior Republicans are looking at the next four weeks as "make it or break it" time for the White House. In early January, the Democrats will take over Congress and signal how aggressively they will confront the administration on Iraq and a wide range of domestic issues. By mid-January, President Bush will have delivered his high-stakes speech setting forth "the way forward" in Iraq. Bush will then give his State of the Union address on January 23. "Anything the president wants to do in the last two years of his term will be contingent on the reaction to his new course in Iraq," says a senior GOP adviser. "If he bombs when he gives the Iraq speech, the fat lady sings." White House officials, however, argue that Democrats won't be able to escape responsibility for improving the situation in Iraq. "The Democrats are going to own this policy, too," a senior White House official says.

Like Bill Clinton, a Person of the People

Nancy Pelosi plans to celebrate becoming the first-ever female speaker of the House with an elaborate parade of events linking her heritage in blue-collar Baltimore and Italian-Catholic roots to her new and history-making post. As aides describe the run-up to her January 4 swearing-in, it will be similar to the weeklong trip former President Bill Clinton took to Washington. Pelosi's week will culminate with a concert and a "people's house" celebration, where plain folks can meet her and the rest of the new Democratic leadership in the Cannon House Office Building.

And So, Let the Investigations Begin

As a sign that the new Democratic majority plans to get tough, key congressional committees have begun hiring lawyer-investigators to probe the administration and its policies. The House Appropriations Committee, where Iraq war critic Rep. John Murtha will be influential, is hiring investigators to look into the administration's war policies and spending in Iraq and Afghanistan. Rep. Henry Waxman, the incoming chairman of the House Government Reform Committee, who's been dogging the vice president's energy task force, is also hiring lawyers. In the Senate, officials said similar hirings were underway in a speeded-up effort to have people in place for the start of the new Congress, especially the planned early-January hearings into the war and military spending that are set to begin January 8.

Better Be Ready to Take the Big Hit

Concerned about potential vulnerabilities to terrorist attacks, the incoming chairman of the House Science Committee, Rep. Bart Gordon of Tennessee, is pressing the Nuclear Regulatory Commission to require more stringent designs in any new nuclear reactors. The NRC, he notes in a letter, has not licensed a new plant since 1978, but it has approved a design for two new plants, while many other reactors are in planning stages. The NRC, responding, says its staff is developing new rules requiring companies "to assess specific security features that could be incorporated into the facility design ... to enhance security effectiveness." But one NRC commissioner, Gregory Jaczko, says that's not enough: The commission, he says, should require that "any new plants be designed and built to successfully withstand commercial aircraft crashes and large fires and explosions."

Angry Protests In Iraq Suggest Sunni Arab Shift To Militants (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0111023

BAGHDAD, Jan. 1 (AP) — Enraged crowds protested the hanging of Saddam Hussein across Iraq's Sunni heartland on Monday, as a mob in Samarra broke the locks off a bomb-damaged Shiite shrine and marched through carrying a mock coffin and a photo of the executed dictator.

The Reach of War

Go to Complete Coverage » The demonstration at the Golden Dome shrine, shattered in a bombing by Sunni extremists 10 months ago, suggests that many Sunni Arabs may now more actively support the small number of Sunni militants fighting the country's Shiite-dominated government. The Feb. 22 bombing of the shrine set off the current cycle of retaliatory attacks between Sunnis and Shiites.

The Sunni protests, which appeared to be building, could signal a spreading militancy. Sunnis were outraged by Mr. Hussein's hurried hanging on Saturday, just four days after an appeals court upheld his conviction and sentence, and many were incensed by the unruly scene in the execution chamber, captured on a cellphone, in which Mr. Hussein was taunted with chants of "Moktada! Moktada! Moktada!" — the name of the Shiite cleric who runs one of Iraq's most violent militias.

Many Sunnis are also upset that Mr. Hussein was put to death during the Id al-Adha holiday.

In a Sunni neighborhood in northern Baghdad, hundreds of demonstrators mourned Mr. Hussein. Some praised the ousted Baath Party, which Mr. Hussein rode to power.

In Ad Dwar, about 80 miles north of Baghdad, hundreds more took to the streets to attend the dedication of a giant mosaic of Mr. Hussein. Children carried toy guns, and men fired weapons into the air.

Mourners at a mosque in Mr. Hussein's hometown, Tikrit, slaughtered sheep as a sacrifice for their former leader. The mosque's walls were lined with condolence cards from tribes in southern Iraq and Jordan who could not travel to the memorial.

Mr. Hussein's eldest daughter, Raghad, briefly attended a protest on Monday in Jordan, where she sought refuge after the American invasion in 2003. It was her first public appearance since her father was hanged.

"God bless you, and I thank you for honoring Saddam, the martyr," she said, according to two witnesses. She addressed members of the Professional Associations, an umbrella group of unions representing doctors, engineers and lawyers, in the group's office parking lot.

In the midst of the protests, American forces continued operations in Iraq. Six Iraqis were killed in an American-led raid on the Baghdad offices of a top Sunni politician, Saleh Mutlaq, a former member of the Baath Party. The United States military and Iraqi police said they suspected that the offices were being used as a safe house by Al Qaeda. Mr. Mutlaq is a senior member of the National Dialogue Front, which holds 11 of the 275 seats in Parliament.

American forces said they took heavy fire from automatic weapons and rocket-propelled grenades as they tried to enter the building. Ground troops were backed by helicopters that "engaged the enemy with precision-point target machine gun fire," the military said.

It was unclear whether the deaths resulted from the ground assault or fire from American helicopters.

Meanwhile, the American military reported the deaths of two more soldiers in an explosion on Sunday in Diyala Province, northeast of the capital, bringing the list of American military fatalities in Iraq to 3,002. With the announcement, The Associated Press count of fatalities showed that at least 113 American service members died in December, making it the bloodiest month of 2006.

Iraqi authorities reported that 16,273 Iraqis —among them 14,298 civilians, 1,348 policemen and 627 soldiers — died violent deaths in 2006. The total exceeds The A. P. count by more than 2,500.

The police reported finding the bodies of 40 handcuffed, blindfolded and bullet-riddled bodies in Baghdad on Monday. A police official said 15 of the bodies were discovered in the mainly industrial Sheik Omar District of northern Baghdad.

An Iraqi worker for the Algerian Embassy in Baghdad was shot to death, the police said.

Also on Monday, the government raided and sealed the offices of a privately owned television station, charging that it had incited violence and hatred in its programming. In its coverage of the execution of Mr. Hussein over the weekend, a newscaster wore black mourning clothes.

Sunni Areas Erupt In Rage Over Saddam (WT/AP)

By Lauren Frayer, Associated Press

The Washington Times, January 2, 2007

BAGHDAD -- Rage over the hanging of Saddam Hussein spilled into the streets in many parts of the Sunni Muslim heartland yesterday, especially in Samarra, where a mob of protesters broke the locks of the badly damaged Shi'ite Golden Mosque and marched through carrying a mock coffin and photo of the executed former Iraqi dictator.

DOJ_NMG_0111024

Sunni extremists had blown apart the glistening dome on the Shi'ite holy place 10 months earlier, setting in motion the sectarian slaughter that now grips the troubled land.

The U.S. death toll climbed to at least 3,002 by the final day of 2006 as the American military reported the deaths of two soldiers in an explosion Sunday in Diyala province, northeast of the capital.

The Samarra protest was particularly significant because it signaled a widening expression of defiance among Sunnis, the minority Muslim sect in Iraq that had enjoyed special status and power under Saddam and had oppressed the now-ascendant Shi'ite majority for centuries.

Until Saddam was executed, excluding a few days of protests after his death sentence was handed down Nov. 5, the broader Sunni population had sought a low profile in the sectarian conflict that had seen thousands of them killed or driven from their homes by Shi'ite militia forces since the Samarra bombing Feb. 22.

The Sunnis were angered not only by Saddam's hurried execution, just four days after an appeals court upheld his conviction and sentence, but also by the unruly and undignified manner in which the hanging was carried out.

A clandestine video of the hanging showed Saddam was taunted by some present at the execution with chants of "Muqtada, Muqtada, Muqtada" in the last moments of his life.

The chants were a reference to anti-American Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who runs one of the deadliest religious militias in Iraq and is a major power behind the government of Shi'ite Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who had pushed for Saddam to be hanged before the year was out.

Iraq's government said yesterday that it would investigate the video and the taunts at the execution.

Saddam was put to death on the eve of the Shi'ite celebration of the Eid al-Adha, the major Muslim festival marking the end of the hajj pilgrimage to Mecca and a remembrance of Abraham's willingness to sacrifice his son, now symbolized by the slaughtering of sheep.

The first judge in the so-called Dujail trial, Rizgar Mohammed Amin, said Saddam's execution during Eid was illegal according to Iraqi law. Sunni Muslim festivities marking the holiday began on the day that Saddam was hanged.

Judge Amin, a Kurd, was removed as chief judge in the case after Shi'ite complaints that he was too lenient. He was replaced last January by Judge Raouf Rasheed Abdel-Rahman.

Judge Amin said: "The implementation of Saddam's execution during Eid al-Adha is illegal according to Chapter 9 of the tribunal law. Article 27 states that nobody, even the president (Jalal Talabani), may change rulings by the tribunal and the implementation of the sentence should not happen until 30 days after publication that the appeals court has upheld the tribunal verdict.

"The hanging during the Eid al-Adha period [also] contradicts Iraqi and Islamic custom.

"Article 290 of the criminal code of 1971 states that no verdict should be implemented during the official holidays or religious festivals," he said.

Iraq's 1971 legal code was largely used in the Saddam trial.

"The Ba'ath Party and Ba'athists still exist in Iraq, and nobody can marginalize it," said Samir al-Obaidi, 48, who attended a Saddam memorial in the Azamiyah neighborhood.

In Dor, 77 miles north of Baghdad, hundreds more took to the streets to inaugurate a giant mosaic of Saddam. Children carried toy guns, and men fired into the air.

Mourners at a mosque in Tikrit, near Saddam's hometown, slaughtered sheep as a sacrifice for their former leader. The mosque's walls were lined with condolence cards from tribes in southern Iraq and Jordan who were unable to travel to the memorial.

Saddam's eldest daughter briefly attended a protest yesterday in Amman, Jordan -- her first public appearance since her father was hanged.

Raghad Saddam Hussein stopped in at the demonstration staged by the Professional Associations, a body that groups unions for doctors, engineers and lawyers, in its office parking lot in west Amman.

"God bless you, and I thank you for honoring Saddam, the martyr," two witnesses recalled Mrs. Hussein as telling the protesters, who included a junior Cabinet minister, on her arrival. She left a minute later.

Also, U.S. forces killed six persons in a raid on the Baghdad offices of a top Sunni politician, Saleh al-Mutlaq, on suspicion it was being used as an al Qaeda safe house, the military and Iraqi police said.

The U.S. military took on heavy fire from automatic weapons and rocket-propelled grenades as they sought to enter the building. Mr. al-Mutlaq is a senior member of the National Dialogue Front, which holds 11 of the 275 seats in Iraq's parliament.

Police reported finding 40 handcuffed, blindfolded and bullet-riddled bodies in Baghdad on the first day of the new year.

Iraq To Probe Filming Of Saddam Hanging (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, January 2, 2007

The Iraqi government launched an inquiry on Monday into how guards filmed and taunted Saddam Hussein on the gallows, turning his execution into a televised spectacle that has inflamed sectarian anger.

Many in Iraq were transfixed by the footage, apparently shot on a videophone.

With Saddam executed, Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki now faces the job of trying to impose state authority upon a shattered society that is on the verge of sectarian civil war. The run-up to Mr Saddam's death illustrates how difficult that task will be.

As the noose was tightened around the deposed president's neck, several in the chamber began to chant a slogan affiliated with the radical Shia Sadrist movement, whose founder, the Ayatollah Mohammed Sadeq al-Sadr, was assassinated by presumed agents of Saddam in 1999.

Despite pleas from one unidentified voice in the room to allow Saddam a dignified end, the chanting of the name of the ayatollah's son and the movement's new leader built up to a crescendo – "Moqtada! Moqtada! Moqtada!"

The moment captured the extent to which the Shia radicals associated with the Sadrs have imposed their agenda on the Iraqi state and its institutions, and the magnitude of the task facing Nuri al-Maliki, the Iraqi prime minister, as he tries to impose his authority on a deeply fractured and radicalised country.

Further emphasising the splits within Iraqi society was the pilgrimage of hundreds of mourners to Saddam's tomb in the town of Awja, where he was born in 1937. Mr Maliki's government appears to have rejected initial plans to bury the former leader in an unmarked grave, and Saddam's body was flown to the town in a US helicopter.

Much of the confusion that reportedly surrounded Saddam's last hours is probably down to the uneasy relationship between Mr Maliki and the Sadrists, who are one of the key parties in his ruling coalition but whose militias are also blamed for a large share of the sectarian killing.

Saddam's swift execution has been a central demand of the Sadrist movement ever since his capture in December 2003. Rushing the former president to the gallows may have afforded the prime minister a rare opportunity to look decisive in front of his core constituency.

The Sadrists control 30 seats in the 275-member parliament, which makes them one of the three largest forces in Mr Maliki's Shia-led coalition but belies their true strength as what is almost certainly Iraq's largest mass movement.

Although Mr Maliki, a member of the Shia Islamist al-Dawa party, has received Sadrist support in the past, recently their relationship has been strained, with the radicals accusing Mr Maliki of bowing to US pressure to reach out to the Sunni. The Sadrists, who control three main ministries, announced last month they were boycotting Iraq's government in protest at Mr Maliki's decision to meet US President George W. Bush in Jordan.

The execution may allow Mr Maliki a window of political opportunity. For the Sadrists, as for many other Shia, Saddam's hanging represents a point of no return for the old Sunni-dominated political order, and evidence that his former ruling Ba'ath party, which has a strong role in the insurgency, can no longer dictate events.

Iraq will now see what Mr Maliki does with this opportunity. Mr Maliki has suggested he would attempt early in the new year to disarm Shia militias, of whom the Sadrists' Mahdi Army is by far the largest. The government has also said it would consider allowing members of the former ruling Ba'ath party, purged from public life in 2003, to be rehabilitated.

But Shia leaders have been under pressure from the US and others to reach out to the Sunni for well over a year, but have consistently put off key decisions. It is not yet clear whether the swift execution of Saddam has given Mr Maliki the political capital he needs to take steps that will almost certainly be criticised by the Sadrists, if he even wants to do so at all.

Era Ends As Saddam Hussein Is Put To Death (CSM)

By Dan Murphy

The Christian Science Monitor, January 2, 2007

Saddam Hussein, the former Iraqi dictator who got his start in politics as an assassin and who never lost that brutal approach as he led Iraq for more than 30 years, was led to the gallows by a group of burly men in balaclavas and executed early Saturday morning.

Hussein was executed for the only crime for which he's been convicted: the 1982 murder of more than 200 people from the village of Dujail. Many Iraqis, though, particularly the Shiites and Kurds who lost hundreds of thousands to his bloody regime, saw his death as justice for the broader crimes of his rule.

Yet peace is unlikely to follow, analysts say. Hussein still has the power to arouse fierce passions among Iraqis. His death was cheered by millions of Iraqis, setting off wild celebrations in the Shiite quarters of Baghdad and other cities. Many Sunnis, however, saw it as a national humiliation - a proud Arab leader put to death at the hands of a government the United States helped to install - and were angered by the fact that the execution took place on Eid al-Adha, Islam's most important holiday.

Still, the demise of the man who led bloody wars against Iran and the United States, and whose police state was famously called the "republic of fear" by one dissident, may now be oddly irrelevant to Iraq's future, as the country's broad sectarian violence has moved far beyond camps of Hussein supporters and opponents.

While the US once believed Hussein's fall would help stabilize Iraq - his capture in a dim spider hole three years ago set off celebrations in US military command centers "akin to VE day," one US military intelligence officer recalls - that is no longer the case. What was once described as an insurgency largely made up of Baathist holdouts and some Sunni Islamist fighters, is now seen as a battle for power among Iraq's major sects.

President Bush reflected that view when he cautioned against too much optimism on Saturday.

"Bringing Saddam Hussein to justice will not end the violence in Iraq," Mr. Bush said in a statement. "But it is an important milestone on Iraq's course to becoming a democracy."

Since Hussein's capture and trial, tens of thousands of Iraqis have been killed in the deepening civil conflict, and sectarian militias have mushroomed throughout the country. Shiite death squads allied to some of Iraq's major political parties have been particularly active in Baghdad and Basra, the country's second largest city, and have used torture techniques to rival those of Hussein's feared secret police.

Last Monday, for instance, British forces raided and then destroyed the serious crimes unit in Basra, which they said was a base of operations for a Shiite militia. They found more than 100 prisoners there, many of whom had been tortured with electric shocks, burned with cigarettes, or shot in the knees.

Before Hussein's execution, US and Iraqi forces braced for a possible surge in violence. About 70 people were killed around Iraq following his death, most by two suicide car bombs, one in the Shiite town of Kufa, the other in Baghdad, a level of violence that has been fairly common in recent months.

The move to execute Hussein was swift. He was on trial facing charges of genocide against Iraq's Kurds, and at least four other trials were expected to follow. While US advisers to the court had said that they expected that the execution would be delayed to allow the justice process to go forward for his other crimes, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite Islamist whose popularity has flagged as Iraq's violence has deepened and unemployment has surged, grew determined to see Hussein killed without further delay.

Ahead of the execution, Mr. Maliki said the swift carrying out of the sentence underscored his government's commitment to protecting "human rights."

Michael Scharf, a legal scholar at Case Western University in Cleveland, Ohio, and expert in war-crimes tribunals who has provided legal advice to the judges who tried Hussein, former Yugoslav leader Slobodan Milosevic, and other dictators, says that he is "saddened" that Hussein won't face further charges.

But, he says, he understands why the Iraqi government made the decision. "In a way, it cheapens his crimes. It's like treating Saddam as if he were Al Capone. Crimes against humanity are a very serious charge, but there is a hierarchy of evil, and at the top of that pyramid is genocide."

Hussein's execution was held in a former torture facility of Hussein's in the Shiite neighborhood of Khadimiya, another piece of symbolism designed to appeal to Iraq's Shiite majority. State television showed the noose being put around Hussein's neck, and later displayed footage of his body. Celebratory gunfire - Iraqis call it "happy fire" - broke out, particularly in Sadr City, the stronghold of militant cleric and Shiite militia leader Moqtada al-Sadr, who US officers now say is among the greatest threats to peace and stability.

In a statement, Maliki said that the carrying out of Hussein's sentence provided a "lesson" to dictators around the world. He said it was wrong to view him as a Sunni Arab, or to blame Sunni Iraqis in general for Hussein's crimes.

"The tyrant represented nothing but his own evil soul," the statement reads.

Many observers note that Hussein's foreign wars, and the international sanctions that followed his 1991 attempt to annex Kuwait, drove the economy into the ground. But he is also remembered by many Iraqi Sunni Arabs and some Shiites as presiding over an unprecedented era of prosperity. He came to power amid the region's oil boom, and his Arab Socialist Republic, as he called it, poured much of that wealth into health and literacy programs that left the country with the best university system in the region and its largest middle class.

Hussein was also a popular figure in the broader Middle East, where state-controlled media almost never reported his crimes. Instead, he was seen as a rare Arab leader willing to stand up to the US, and who took a strong stand in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, giving thousands of dollars to the families of Palestinians killed in attacks on Israel.

Most Arab regimes, close to the US but mindful of the popularity of the ousted dictator among their people, have avoided comment on the execution so far, though Libyan dictator Muammar Qaddafi declared three days of national mourning. In contrast, Iran, which lost hundreds of thousands of its citizens in the war with Iraq in the 1980s, hailed the execution as an act of justice.

Few doubt that Hussein was responsible for mass murder and the routine torture of political opponents and even one-time friends - he ordered the executions of a number of the men who helped him seize power in 1968, his two sons-in-law, and was alleged to have personally murdered opponents in the Baath Party during his rise to power.

But the fairness of his trial was criticized by international human rights organization. Human Rights Watch charged in a report last month that his trial was "deeply flawed" and damaged the rule of law in Iraq. Among the group's concerns was the violence against the court - three defense lawyers were assassinated in the course of the trial -as well as what it alleged was government interference in the workings of the court, and "demonstrated bias" of the presiding judge, an ethnic Kurd who lost family members when Hussein's government attacked the Kurdish village of Halabja with sarin nerve gas.

Mr. Scharf disputed the criticisms of Human Rights Watch and others. He says that he would give the tribunal a "low passing grade" and agrees with Maliki that it does send a message to dictators.

"We are really entering this new period where dictators can't count on a comfortable retirement," he says. "With [Chilean dictator Augusto] Pinochet dying under house arrest, Milosevic dying in custody, and now this. I tell the critics they should read the 298-page judgment against Saddam - the largest war-crimes judgment since Nuremberg - before going any further."

Scharf says that the government decided the cost of allowing Hussein to live to face further charges was greater than ending his life now. "Early on, there was a feeling that people would want him around to face justice in these other cases," he says, "but [their view is that] he's been not only a continuing disruptive influence in court but actually inciting violence outside of it."

Saddam's Execution Unlikely To Hurt Reconciliation (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, January 2, 2007

BAGHDAD — The hasty execution of Saddam Hussein, which some Iraqis criticized for its sectarian overtones, will not hurt ongoing efforts to bridge ethnic rivalries and win backing for Iraq's fledgling government, political leaders said Monday.

Videos of the execution angered some Iraqis because guards were heard shouting Shiite slogans as Saddam was about to be hanged. Saddam was a Sunni Muslim.

"This government is on its way out," said Falah Hussein al-Ubeidi, 32, a Shiite government worker. "They have lost a lot among their voters. I now regret ever voting for those monsters."

Iraqi political leaders say the handling of Saturday's execution will not hurt reconciliation efforts aimed at getting Iraq's factions together to help curb violence and steer some militant groups into the political process.

The execution was widely viewed in the form of a government-released video and another clip taken by someone in the chamber with a cellphone.

During the execution, some of the guards chanted the name of Muqtada al-Sadr, an anti-American Shiite cleric whose militia is engaged in violence against Sunnis, the cellphone video showed. The guards also cursed Saddam just before he was hanged.

There were a number of Sunni protests around Iraq on Monday.

Sunni and Shiite leaders have been trying to keep the country from collapsing further into factional violence. Some say the reaction to Saddam's execution shouldn't hurt those efforts.

"Everybody — Sunni and Shiite — was against Saddam," said Ayad al-Samarrai, deputy chairman of the Iraqi Islamic Party, a Sunni group. "I don't think it will have an effect on the reconciliation process at all."

Saddam was sentenced to death Nov. 5 for his role in the killing of 148 Shiites in Dujail in 1982.

Mahmoud Othman, a leading Kurdish lawmaker and member of the national reconciliation committee, said the timing of the execution was poorly planned. It was held on the first day Sunni Arabs observe the Eid al-Adha holiday and just four days after the appeals section of the Iraqi High Tribunal confirmed Saddam's death sentence.

The execution also sidestepped an Iraqi law requiring the signatures of the president and two vice-presidents and another law prohibiting executions on holidays.

Othman said the outcome — Saddam put to death by hanging — was expected and won't stall reconciliation efforts.

"If this happened two years ago, even one year ago, it would be different," Othman said. "But now, with so much happening, it's just not that important."

Saddam, 69, was hanged just after 6 a.m. Saturday at the site of the deposed government's military intelligence headquarters in northwest Baghdad. His body was later flown to his home village of Ouja, north of Baghdad, in a U.S. military helicopter and buried by local tribesmen and relatives.

DOJ_NMG_0111028

Al-Maliki pressed to quickly carry out the execution out of fear that pressure from the Sunni community, Arab countries and international groups would delay the execution or even force officials to commute the sentence, said lawmaker al-Askari, who witnessed the execution.

"They thought: 'The faster we could do it, the better,' " he said of the prime minister's office.

Reconciliation efforts have been slow, but progress has been made. Al-Maliki, a Shiite, recently promised to review the program that bars ranking members of Saddam's former ruling Baath Party from government positions.

A Dictator's Mideast Legacy (CSM)

By Nicholas Blanford

The Christian Science Monitor, January 2, 2007

BEIRUT, LEBANON

The execution of Saddam Hussein was a subdued finale for a man whose merciless rule shaped the course of Middle East history for a quarter century.

Mr. Hussein may be gone, but his legacy lives on in the ethnic and religious conflict undermining a nation that he held together through fear. His attacks on nearby countries - Iran, Kuwait, and Israel - won widespread condemnation and, ultimately, little reward.

While the architects of the Iraq war hoped his ouster would help spread Western-style democracy in the region, violence in Iraq has grown so bad that recent polls say most Iraqis believe life was better under Hussein.

It remains to be seen whether the lesson of his life will be the end of brutal dictatorships in the region or whether current unrest in Iraq will bolster Middle Eastern autocrats and increase resistance to democratic reforms.

"The downfall of Saddam and its aftershocks only empowered the regimes of the Middle East," says Sami Moubayed, a Syrian political analyst. "Leaders can now say 'Look to Iraq. This is what the Americans will bring.' By failing in Iraq, the Americans actually did democracy a great disservice."

While democracy may have yet to flower in the Arab world, the seeds have been sown, other analysts say, with the Hussein experience in Iraq serving as a stark warning of the consequences should the long-term reform effort falter or fail.

"I do believe that the Middle East is coming to a conclusion and learning from the Saddam lesson," says Shafeeq Ghabra, a Kuwaiti professor of politics and president of Jusoor Arabiya Leadership and Consultancy Company.

"Yet the learning is not as quick and fast as one would like. It will take time for the region to understand that era and go beyond it to an era of pluralism and development where people can express themselves without fear," he says.

Hussein's ambition and sense of self-destiny combined with impulsive and vengeful acts propelled Iraq into a series of disasters that has left an indelible mark on the region.

"He was a catalyst, he made things happen and usually they were not positive and constructive, but he constantly kept the Middle East in a state of turmoil," says Gary Sick, executive director of the GULF 2000 project and professor of international affairs at Columbia University in New York.

Hussein's rise to absolute power began in 1968 when he participated in a bloodless coup that saw his cousin Ahmad al-Hassan al-Bakr become president. In the 1970s, Hussein, who gradually came to overshadow the president, led an economic modernization program, funded by the proceeds of the 1973 oil boom.

He also helped forge a sense of national unity rooted in Baath Party ideology, overcoming Iraq's diverse ethnic and sectarian composition. "He was able to bring to Iraq a sense of development for a period.... Then it was all destroyed year after year with adventurous decisions," says Professor Ghabra.

Hussein pushed aside the ailing Bakr and became president in 1979, the same year that Shah Mohammad Reza Pahlavi was toppled in neighboring Iran by the Islamic revolution that brought Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini to power.

The rise of a militant Shiite theocracy in Iran alarmed the Sunni Arab states. Hussein, fearing Khomeini's influence over Iraq's restless Shiites and tacitly backed by his Sunni Gulf neighbors, invaded Iran in 1980, setting in motion a devastating eight-year war that cost hundreds of thousands of lives.

Hussein intended to smash the disorganized fledgling Islamic regime in Iran, an act that would confirm his leadership of the Arab world and earn the gratitude of his neighbors. But the war was to have the unintended consequence of strengthening Mr. Khomeini's rule.

"It forced the Islamic revolution to get out of its zealous craziness and begin to organize itself and pull itself together," says Professor Sick, an Iran specialist. "In a way, Saddam stabilized the Iranian revolution and kept the mullahs in power."

The conflict also triggered an alliance between Iran and Iraq's archenemy, Syria, which was ruled by a rival branch of the Baath Party. The Iranian-Syrian relationship has proved enduring, and in the past year has further strengthened to become one of the region's most significant geo-strategic alignments.

When the Gulf War ended in 1988, the Iraqi economy was in ruins with some $75 billion owed to Iraq's Arab nation backers. Relations between Iraq and Kuwait steadily deteriorated over the next two years with the latter's refusal to forgive the war debt and cut oil production to raise revenues for Iraq.

A bitter Hussein sent his war-weary army into Kuwait in 1990, triggering a fresh convulsion in the Middle East. The US assembled a coalition of Arab and European allies to remove Iraqi forces from Kuwait. This Gulf war also marked the beginning of a prolonged US military deployment in Saudi Arabia, which would later be used by Osama bin Laden to partly justify his anti-American actions, culminating in 9/11.

The UN sanctions against Iraq during the 1990s, the most severe ever against any country, devastated an already weakened economy, but failed to bring down Hussein's regime.

Although the 2003 invasion of Iraq finally ended Hussein's tyrannical rule, its aftermath has turned Iraq into a byword of sectarian violence.

Although Hussein is dismissed by most Arabs as a tyrant who ran a regime of unmitigated brutality and greed, some regard him as a champion of Arab steadfastness against American "imperialism" and Israeli aggression.

The mock funerals in the West Bank Sunday testified to Hussein's lingering support among Palestinians. Hussein adopted the Palestinian cause as a cornerstone of his foreign policy, dispensing millions of dollars to armed Palestinian groups. Analysts say Hussein manipulated the plight of the Palestinians to curry popularity and burnish his Arabist credentials. "You can't judge the Palestinians by their reaction [to Hussein's death]," says Sateh Noureddine, columnist with Lebanon's As-Safir newspaper. "They are a desperate people looking for any sign of support from anyone. Saddam was a tyrant, and there was nothing positive from his era."

Saddam's Sensitive Side (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, January 2, 2007

ST. LOUIS (AP) -- A military nurse who cared for Saddam Hussein in jail said the deposed dictator saved bread crusts to feed birds and seldom complained to his captors, except when he had legitimate gripes.

Master Sgt. Robert Ellis cared for the former Iraqi dictator from January 2004 to August 2005 at Camp Cropper, the compound near Baghdad where "high-value detainees" were held.

Sgt. Ellis, 56, an operating room nurse in the St. Louis suburb of St. Charles, said he was ordered to do whatever was needed to keep Saddam alive.

"That was my job: to keep him alive and healthy, so they could kill him at a later date," he told the St. Louis Post-Dispatch. Saddam was hanged Saturday.

Sgt. Ellis checked on Saddam twice a day and wrote a daily report on his physical and emotional condition.

Saddam told Sgt. Ellis that cigars and coffee kept his blood pressure down, and it seemed to work. Saddam would insist that Sgt. Ellis smoke with him.

Sgt. Ellis said Saddam did not complain much, and, when he did, his complaint was usually legitimate. "He had very good coping skills," Sgt. Ellis said.

Saddam shared with Sgt. Ellis memories of happier times when his children were young. Sgt. Ellis said the former dictator recalled telling the youngsters bedtime stories and giving his daughter half a Tums tablet when she had a stomachache.

When he was allowed short visits outside, Saddam would feed the birds bread crusts saved from his meals. He also watered a dusty plot of weeds.

"He said he was a farmer when he was young, and he never forgot where he came from," Sgt. Ellis said.

When Sgt. Ellis told Saddam that he had to leave for America because his brother was dying, Saddam hugged him and said he would be Sgt. Ellis' brother.

"I was there to help him, and he respected that," Sgt. Ellis said.

Saddam reportedly never discussed dying and expressed no regrets about his rule.

"He said everything he did was for Iraq," Sgt. Ellis said. "One day when I went to see him, he asked why we invaded. Well, he made gestures like shooting a machine gun, and asked why soldiers came and shot up the place. He said the laws in Iraq were fair and the weapons inspectors didn't find anything.

"I said, 'That's politics. We soldiers don't get caught up in that sort of thing.' "

Jan. 8, 2007 issue - The saga of Saddam's end—his capture, trial and execution—is a sad metaphor for America's occupation of Iraq. What might have gone right went so wrong. It is worth remembering that Saddam Hussein was not your run-of-the-mill dictator. He created one of the most brutal, corrupt and violent regimes in modern history, something akin to Stalin's Soviet Union, Mao's China or Kim Jong Il's North Korea. Whatever the strategic wisdom for the United States, deposing him began as something unquestionably good for Iraq.

But soon the Bush administration dismissed the idea of trying Saddam under international law, or in a court with any broader legitimacy. This is the administration, after all, that could see little advantage to a United Nations mandate for its own invasion and occupation. It put Saddam's fate in the hands of the new Iraqi government, dominated by Shiite and Kurdish politicians who had been victims of his reign. As a result, Saddam's trial, which should have been the judgment of civilized society against a tyrant, is now seen by Iraq's Sunnis and much of the Arab world as a farce, reflecting only the victors' vengeance.

This was not inevitable. Most Iraqis were happy to see Saddam out of power. In the months after the American invasion, support for the Coalition Provisional Authority topped 70 percent. This was so even among Iraq's Sunni Arabs. In the first months of the insurgency, only 14 percent of them approved of attacks on U.S. troops. (That number today is 70 percent.) The rebellious area in those early months was not (Sunni) Fallujah but (Shiite) Najaf.

But during those crucial first months, Washington disbanded the Iraqi Army, fired 50,000 bureaucrats and shut down the government-owned enterprises that employed most Iraqis. In effect, the United States dismantled the Iraqi state, leaving a deep security vacuum, administrative chaos and soaring unemployment. That state was dominated by Iraq's Sunni elites, who read this not as just a regime change but a revolution in which they had become the new underclass. For them, the new Iraq looked like a new dictatorship.

Why Washington made such profound moves with such little forethought remains one of the many puzzles of the Bush administration's foreign policy. Some of the decision making was motivated by ideology: Baathism equaled fascism, so every school teacher who joined the Baath Party to get a job was seen as a closet Nazi; state-owned enterprises were bad, the new Iraq needed a flat tax, etc. Some of it was influenced by Shiite exiles who wanted to take total control of the new Iraq. Some of it simply reflected the bizarre combination of ignorance and naivete that has marked the policies of Bush's "tough guys."

The administration has never fully understood the sectarian nature of its policies, which were less "nation building" than they were "nation busting" in their effects. It kept insisting that it was building a national army and police force when it was blatantly obvious (even to columnists) that the forces were overwhelmingly Shiite and Kurdish, mostly drawn from militias with stronger loyalties to political parties than to the state. The answer to these fundamentally political objections was technocratic: more training. But a stronger Shiite Army made—makes—the Sunni populace more insecure and willing to support the insurgency.

Iraq's Sunnis are not the good guys in this story. They have mostly behaved like self-defeating thugs. The minority of Sunnis who support Al Qaeda have been truly barbarous. The point, however, is not their vices but our stupidity. We summarily deposed not just Saddam Hussein but a centuries-old ruling elite and then were stunned that they reacted poorly. In contrast, on coming into power in South Africa, Nelson Mandela did not fire a single white bureaucrat or soldier—and not because he thought that they had been kind to his people. He correctly saw the strategy as the way to prevent an Afrikaner rebellion.

It has now become fashionable among Washington neoconservatives to blame the Iraqis for everything that has happened to their country. "We have given the Iraqis a republic and they do not appear able to keep it," laments Charles Krauthammer. Others invoke anthropologists to explain the terrible dysfunctions of Iraqi culture. There may be some truth to all these claims—Iraq is a tough place—but the Bush administration is not quite so blameless. It thoughtlessly engineered a political and social revolution as intense as the French or Iranian one and then seemed surprised that Iraq could not digest it happily, peaceably and quickly. We did not give them a republic. We gave them a civil war.

Death Of A Tyrant (NSWK)

By Christopher Dickey

Newsweek, January 2, 2007

Jan. 8, 2007 issue - President George W. Bush was sleeping at 9 p.m. at his ranch in Crawford, Texas, when Saddam Hussein's body plunged through the trapdoor of a gallows in Kadhimiya Prison on the outskirts of Baghdad. It was dawn in the Iraqi capital, and the 69-year-old Butcher of Baghdad wore no blindfold. He had carried a Qur'an for the last few steps before his death, looking uncertain, even afraid, according to one of the witnesses close to him, but mouthing words of defiance. He sneered at Shiite guards—the warlord Moqtada al-Sadr's men, by one account. He praised God and, as he neared the gallows, proclaimed, "Iraq without me is nothing."

DOJ_NMG_0111031

Like the war that overthrew him in 2003, the hanging of Saddam Hussein did not turn out as planned. Instead of a study in modern justice, the tyrant's end looked more like the result of a sectarian show trial. From Crawford, the only comment was a muted, written statement: no proclamation of "mission accomplished," just of "an important milestone" after "a difficult year for the Iraqi people and for our troops." The best that could be said was that the trial was fairer than those Saddam gave his many enemies.

Saddam Hussein's savage totalitarian rule lasted more than three decades. Torture and murder were his métiers, both practiced without evident remorse or the slightest regret. (Telling a joke about Saddam was a capital crime in his Iraq.) His arrogance led him to disastrous misjudgments. He launched a war against Iran that lasted eight years, and one against Kuwait that ended with his humiliating defeat in Desert Storm. He dreamed of imposing himself on the region with weapons of mass destruction, and acted as though he had them even when he didn't. He kept his distance from Al Qaeda, but aided and abetted many other terrorist groups. And he annihilated would-be rebels—along with their extended families—killing tens of thousands of Shiites and Kurds with guns, bombs, chemical weapons: whatever worked. If the evil that men do lives after them, then Saddam Hussein will long endure.

But the much more complicated question for now and for the future concerns the "good" he achieved, which may well have been interred with his regime. At a terrible cost, but with ruthless efficacy, he kept Iraq unified and provided a critical balance of power against Iran. If the Middle East is to be stabilized, and American long-term interests protected, those goals are still critically important.

So as Bush searches for ways to extricate the United States from the increasingly unpopular war in Iraq, which has now cost almost 3,000 American lives and drains more than $2 billion a week from U.S. coffers, little is gained from Saddam's demise. The challenge was not how to eliminate him: he ceased to be a factor when he was dragged out of a "spider hole" three years ago. The problem remains how to replace him.

Bush and his national-security team no longer talk about transforming the Middle East, merely about strengthening the current Iraqi government so it can sustain itself without the backing of 140,000 U.S. troops. According to a senior Bush aide who declined to be named while discussing internal deliberations, the administration's new strategy for doing so, likely to be announced next week, will involve three pillars: a temporary surge of more troops, more money for jobs and reconstruction, and an attempt to broaden political support for plodding Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki.

But the confusion that surrounded Saddam's execution suggests just how complicated the task will be, and how little care Maliki takes to disguise the sectarian leanings of his Shiite-dominated government. After Saddam's last appeal was rejected, Maliki reportedly told the families of some of his victims that any hesitation about hanging him would be insulting. "Our respect for human rights requires us to execute him," Maliki said, "and there will be no review or delay in carrying out the sentence." As one of Maliki's top aides told NEWSWEEK privately, the prime minister's "vision for reconciliation doesn't include those who would support Saddam Hussein in any way."

Instead of working for the broad sense of healing other societies emerging from repression and war have sought, the Maliki government took a proprietary view of the suffering Saddam inflicted—as if only its supporters had felt his cruelty. During a deeply flawed trial, judges deemed too lenient were fired or pressured to resign, and three of Saddam's defense lawyers were murdered. He was finally hanged for ordering the killing of 148 Shiite men and boys in the town of Dujail in 1982 after members of Maliki's Dawa Party, which was then a clandestine terrorist organization, tried to assassinate him. The Kurds still want their day in court: Saddam massacred tens of thousands of them in a genocidal campaign that included an infamous poison-gas attack on the town of Halabjah in 1988. His fellow Sunnis and Baath Party rivals, slaughtered on his orders and even by his own hand, are not even the subject of a court case.

Washington has never had a very deep understanding of Iraq's leaders. The Bush administration was so focused on the threat that Saddam's weapons of mass destruction might pose that it brushed aside the idea he might be bluffing. (Saddam's motivation? The threat of poison gas and biological agents could deter rebels and keep Iran at bay.) The Americans vastly overestimated the support exiled politicians would receive after returning to Iraq. They also underestimated the influence of religious leaders like Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, and failed to understand how sectarian Iraq's politics would become once elections were held.

After Saddam's brutally effective tyranny, any democracy might look feckless. But there has been such chaos since the dictator's fall that it's now common to hear Iraqis yearn for the order imposed by his strong-arm rule. Even some Americans share that sentiment. "I feel like we should let Saddam out of jail and say, 'Sorry, we didn't realize you were so brutal because you had to be'," a member of a U.S. Special Operations unit told NEWSWEEK after a hard day's fighting in Fallujah in 2004. (The soldier said he was under orders not to give his name.) "It's going to take someone either exceptionally cruel or exceptionally intelligent to rule this country."

That's a little too facile. While the U.S.-led invasion was the catalyst, the core problems in Iraq are ones Saddam helped to create. He violently despised and suppressed all authority but his own; it's little wonder that the leaders who followed could not approach his stature. Born to an impoverished mother in a rural village near the town of Tikrit in 1937, he never knew his father and was raised by an uncle who served in the Iraqi Army. He was rejected by the military academy, and slipped into the violent and conspiratorial politics of the Arab-nationalist Baath Party. At the age of 22, he took part in a failed attempt to murder the then President Abdel Karim Kassem in the streets of Baghdad. By the time the Baath Party seized power in 1968, Saddam was its rising star, effectively ruling the country from his position as vice president.

In 1979, at the age of 42, he took the top job for himself and quickly moved to eliminate all opposition. At a Baath Party congress, he charged dozens of rivals with treason. One by one they were forced to leave the hall and face immediate execution. They screamed and shouted, pleaded and cried. Slightly bored, he sat behind a desk on the stage sipping a glass of water and smoking Cuban cigars. Then he had a video of the meeting distributed throughout the Arab world to show what happened to anyone who might even think about challenging his rule.

The 1979 Iranian revolution led by Ayatollah Khomeini gave Saddam an opening to the West. Few U.S. officials had illusions about his murderous regime, but Washington was fixated on the threat posed by Tehran. U.S. diplomats were being held hostage. Khomeini was preaching jihad, and "Shiite fundamentalism" seemed to threaten the whole region. So, few objections were raised when Saddam set about murdering Shiite leaders inside Iraq who might, or might not, sympathize with the mullahs in Iran. Then his decision to invade the Islamic Republic looked like a good way to weaken Tehran.

In 1983, President Ronald Reagan sent Donald Rumsfeld as a special envoy to Baghdad to forge a working alliance with Saddam. By the mid-1980s, U.S. satellite intelligence was helping the Iraqis focus chemical-weapon attacks on Iranian troops. So strong was Washington's "tilt" toward Saddam that in 1987, when one of his jet fighters launched a missile strike on a U.S. frigate in the Persian Gulf, killing 37 sailors, the United States accepted his excuses and responded by stepping up pressure on his enemies in Iran.

Though the Iran-Iraq War ended in stalemate in 1988, the West's support emboldened Saddam. He asserted his power and influence all over the region, convinced that the United States would back his play. He hunted down enemies in neighboring states. He stepped up support for Palestinian leader Yasir Arafat, who was often resident in Baghdad. As Saddam pressed his secret program to develop atomic weapons, he publicly threatened to incinerate Israel. Still, by 1990, high-level U.S. delegations coveting lucrative commercial agreements were regular visitors to Baghdad.

His mistake was to invade the oil-rich emirate of Kuwait, which he claimed should have been part of Iraq all along. His envoys said he'd gotten the nod from Washington. But his new conquest put Saddam in a position to threaten Saudi Arabia and dominate the world oil market. When he refused to pull back, the administration of President George H.W. Bush forged an international coalition of Western powers and Arab countries to demolish his forces in 1991's Desert Storm.

Inside Iraq, however, neither the hundreds of thousands killed fighting Iran nor the crushing defeat in Kuwait fazed Saddam. When the Kurds rose up against him in the late 1980s, he used chemical weapons against them. When they tried to revolt again in 1991, just the threat that such horrors would be unleashed sent them fleeing from their homes by the hundreds of thousands. In southern Iraq, Shiites encouraged by the Bush 41 administration and helped by Iran attacked the remnants of Saddam's armed forces after Desert Storm. Saddam's response: mass murder. The U.S.-led coalition stood back. Saddam hung on.

But the foundations of the modern nation he had tried to build began to crumble under the pressure of sanctions and international isolation. By the time the United States invaded in 2003, Iraq's economy and institutions, including its armed forces, were fragile shells of what they'd been 15 years before. Shia and Kurdish leaders, many of them already in exile, started cultivating policymakers in Washington, even as they lost touch with Iraqis on the ground. In Baghdad, Saddam adopted a new religiosity, playing to Sunni fundamentalists. The already poor Shia grew poorer and more disenfranchised; the political culture grew more corrupt.

When George W. Bush decided to eliminate Saddam once and for all in 2003, Bush personalized the war, and for understandable reasons. Saddam was a useful symbol—a seeming madman. Hadn't he tried to kill Bush's retired father on a visit to Kuwait in 1993? And Saddam so dominated Iraq that it was much easier to sell the threat when you could put his sinister face on it. But that also led to the misconception that removing him would solve all problems—the notion that all Iraqis wanted was "freedom," even though for generations under totalitarian rule they had no clear idea what that meant. Because so many Iraqis hated Saddam, Washington wrongly figured they would welcome invading Americans. Instead, the U.S.-led occupation opened the way for multiple insurgencies.

The moment when Saddam Hussein's capture could be hailed as a turning point in the conflict is long past. Having focused the world's attention on the evil of this one man, the Bush administration treated him as a kind of totem, declaring new victories when his statue was pulled down by U.S. Marines in Baghdad, when he was dragged out of the hole where he was hiding several months later, when he was put on trial and when he was convicted. But the execution? A "milestone" on a long and dangerous road.

Here, then, is the tragedy of America's involvement in Iraq, now and in the future: what Saddam achieved for his country came at a terrible cost, and of the countless problems he created and perpetuated, his death solves none.

The Bushes' Saddam Drama (NSWK)

By Howard Fineman

Newsweek, January 2, 2007

Jan. 8, 2007 issue - Evil was on the loose in the world, President George W. Bush had told the country, and on his first Thanksgiving in office—November 2001—he was on his way to Fort Campbell in Kentucky to dine with newly trained troops heading out to fight the (evil) Taliban in Afghanistan. In the conference room aboard Air Force One, we talked about evil. "Is Saddam evil?" I asked. Glancing across the table at his aides, he demurred. I asked again; again, a demurral. We went on to other topics. Several exchanges later, Bush interrupted an answer to blurt out a declaration: "By the way, Saddam is evil!"

When the history is written, the saga of the Bushes and the Butcher of Baghdad will be a central thread of the family's story—and of America's at the millennium. It is not personal in the literal sense; neither President Bush ever met Saddam. True, intelligence sources (not all of them necessarily reliable) said Saddam tried to have Bush 41 killed in 1993. And in 2002, drumming up support for the approaching second gulf war, Bush Two called Saddam the "guy who tried to kill my dad." Still, there is no evidence that the Bushes loathed Saddam, and I am told that Dad remains skeptical about the purported assassination plot. "It's not like 'the Hatfields and McCoys'," says a family friend who doesn't want to risk his relationship being quoted by name.

But it is "the Realists and the Neocons." For both Bushes, dealing with Saddam became a way to measure presidential manhood—and to express profoundly different views about the world.

For Bush One, manhood meant a hard-boiled (critics said cynical) restraint. He always made it his business to know all things geopolitical, long before—and certainly after—he took over as head of the CIA. As Ronald Reagan's vice president, he hewed to the CIA view of Saddam, which was that, as sadistic as he was, he had his uses as a counterweight to fundamentalist Iran. When Saddam turned bellicose in 1989, Saudi friends advised the new president to ignore him. Only when Saddam invaded Kuwait did Bush crank up the rhetoric—branding him "another Hitler"—but that was not really Bush One's style. When advisers told him to tone down the apocalyptic language, he did, even as he shrewdly led the Coalition forces that ousted Saddam from Kuwait.

The Hitler reference stuck, however, and it had consequences. Scholars say that it diminished Bush One, and hurt his popularity among conservatives. If Saddam indeed was another Hitler, should Bush not have gone to Baghdad to take him out? That was an argument the Neocons made throughout the '90s, and made to Bush Two as he went through his precampaign tutorials in Austin in 1999. That, together with the younger Bush's evangelical Christian faith, made Saddam an inviting target. Bush Two had little understanding of the nuances of the Middle East, which his father had spent a lifetime learning, and Bush Two had a lack of interest bordering on contempt for diplomatic nuance. He viewed it as a lack of will, of confidence, of power.

That was his father's game. He would play another.

Those close to the family say there is little evidence that father and son have ever had a detailed discussion about the Iraq war—either before it began or since. When Bush Two visited his father in Kennebunkport, Maine, at the start of the 2000 campaign, he said that if he did not win, he would have a lot more time to go fishing with his dad. Father and son may yet get their chance for fishing trips. They will both be relieved that Saddam is gone, but I bet that the subject won't come up.

So, Saddam Is Dead . . . (WSJ)

By Mark Bowden

The Wall Street Journal, January 2, 2007

Now that they have hanged Saddam Hussein, perhaps we can begin to appreciate the irony and the lessons of his demise.

Any nation is, at heart, an idea. Once people started organizing themselves in groups larger than their own blood lines, they had to invent reasons for considering themselves part of something bigger -- tribes, city states, feudal kingdoms, nations, empires. Language, customs, religion, ideology and geographic proximity have all served. The idea of a state that accepts as equal citizens people from all corners of the globe, a nation founded on abstract principles, is a relative newcomer. We have been trying to get the people inhabiting a large swath of land between and on both sides of the Tigris and Euphrates to embrace the concept. It is an ongoing struggle with less-than-encouraging results.

One of our better allies in promoting this idea was none other than Saddam, who may have died the last true believer in a multiethnic, nonsectarian Iraq. He made his idea of Iraq real by ruthlessly suppressing dissent, particularly with the Shiite majority, by enforcing obedience from Sunnis and the Kurds, and by resisting (or co-opting) the vision of Islamist radicals. American leaders wrestling with Moqtada al-Sadr and his ilk have doubtlessly found themselves admiring the dictator's success, if not his methods.

The old tyrant had long been out of touch with his country, locked behind the high walls of his palaces, protected by body doubles and flattering liars, moving from secret bed to secret bed. The hand-written letter he purportedly released from prison last week, when it became apparent he was to be executed, showed once more how disconnected he was. He addressed the Iraqi people as one, and encouraged them to rise up against the American occupiers. "Do not trust those who speak of Shias and Sunnis," he wrote. Except for the part about attacking Americans, it might have been written by one of the Pentagon's propaganda contractors.

In fact, no one who cares about the idea of Iraq is rooting for the U.S. to depart any time soon. Saddam could be excused, perhaps, because he had lived in a fantasy world for years. Those who advocate it here are transparently heedless of its consequences in Iraq, the operative notion being to avoid shedding more American blood for a cause deemed hopeless or unworthy or both. Unless something dramatic happens soon to alter the sorry trends, it will eventually be the policy of our country.

Saddam had long since ceased to be the beloved figure he believed himself to be. In this stubborn insurgency there has been little evidence of him as a rallying point. His death did not provoke violent recriminations or even much angry rhetoric. Once he was toppled, once deprived of his vicious state apparatus, he ceased to be relevant. Just as the resistance never stopped or even slowed after his capture, the deaths of his sons or the arrests or killings of the other leading Baathist figures on the notorious U.S. military deck of cards, it will not be affected by his death. Saddam was bigger than the bloody divisions that now preoccupy his people. None of the various murderous factions are fighting for his vision of a greater Iraq. The Sunnis are fighting to resist Shiite domination, the Shiites to rid themselves of Sunni oppression, and the Islamists just to frustrate the democratic vision of the U.S.

We Americans consistently underestimate the deep hatreds that divide people. Our political system is designed to wrestle peacefully with the divisions of race, class, ethnicity, religion and competing ideological or geographical interests, and has generally worked as intended -- the Civil War being the one glaring exception. Generations have struggled to live up to ideals of tolerance and diversity. When we look out at the world, we tend to see millions longing to get past the blood feuds, to be, in short, more like us. George Bush and the neocon intellectuals who led us into Iraq are just the latest in a long line of evangelical Americanists. No matter how many times history slaps us in the face, the dream persists.

Nine years ago, in the epilogue to "Black Hawk Down," I quoted an unnamed State Department official (he was Michael Sheehan, ambassador for counter-terrorism) as follows: "The idea used to be that terrible countries were terrible because good, decent, innocent people were being oppressed by evil, thuggish leaders. Somalia changed that. Here you have a country where just about everybody is caught up in the fighting. You stop an old lady on the street and ask her if she wants peace, and she will say, 'Yes, of course, I pray for it daily.' All the things you would expect her to say. Then ask her if she would be willing for her clan to share power with another to have that peace, and she'll say, 'With those murderers and thieves? I'd die first.' People in these countries . . . don't want peace. They want victory. They want power. Men, women, old, and young. Somalia was the experience that taught us that people in these places bear much of the responsibility for things being the way they are. The hatred and killing continues because they want it to. Or because they don't want peace enough to stop it."

The statement is too harsh, as Mr. Sheehan himself agrees (he was at that point a veteran of Somalia, Rwanda and Bosnia). Any effort to characterize millions with the expression "these people" is unfair and wrong. But there is a principle here struggling to emerge: Before a state can exist where there are deep-rooted, competing interests, there must be some broadly accepted concept of a nation strong enough to at least compete with parochial interests. There must be some generally accepted idea of a nation.

Mr. Sheehan was wrong about one thing. Somalia didn't change anything. Substitute Iraq for Somalia in the quote, and the observation is as accurate today as then. Maybe we need to better appreciate that our nation remains an exception. I believe that in the long run people on this planet will embrace democracy and diversity, but we are not there yet. I still nurse hope that Iraqis will abandon blood feuds for compromise and a democratic future, but it appears to be a longer shot today than three years ago, and it was a bad bet then. Mr. Bush has staked his legacy on it.

So, the tyrant is dead. We may have facilitated his bad end, but, sadly, violence, oppression and fear remain the time-tested ways of forging a nation state out of disparate parts. Until Mr. Sheehan's doctrine is no longer true, the way of the world will remain Saddam's.

Mr. Bowden is the author, inter alia, of "Black Hawk Down" (Atlantic, 1999).

Justice For A Tyrant (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 2, 2007

The debate over Iraq has become so poisonous that even the weekend death sentence for Saddam Hussein seems to have become morally controversial. So it's worth recalling that what happened early Saturday morning in Baghdad is that rare event -- justice for a tyrant after a fair and open trial.

Most of the world's dictator-killers escape such a reckoning. Stalin and Mao died in their own beds. Hitler escaped the hangman by committing suicide, while Nicolae Ceausescu was shot by a vengeful mob after a perfunctory trial. Idi Amin and Pol Pot were ousted from power but lived into old age without punishment. Slobodan Milosevic made it to trial but died before a verdict could be rendered. Others -- Castro, Kim Jong Il -- live on in power, terrorizing their countrymen to this day.

Saddam may not have been history's worst murderer, but he was an accomplished one. He began as a Baath Party assassin, rose after a 1968 coup to become Iraq's feared vice president and intelligence chief, and consolidated his power in 1979 with a videotaped purge of his enemies, nearly 500 of whom were soon dead.

There followed the invasion of Iran, the gassing of the Kurds, the looting of Kuwait, more slaughter of Kurds and Shiites, an attempt on the life of a former U.S. President, and support for international terrorism. The precise number of Saddam's victims is impossible to know. But add the Iraqi estimate of 400,000 bodies found in mass graves to the casualties during his wars with Iran, Kuwait and the U.S.-led coalition, and his death total may equal two million.

There would surely have been more. Never mind that no stockpiles of chemical weapons were found in Iraq after 2003. Saddam was the only living national leader to have ordered the use of chemical weapons -- twice. Were he still in power today, does anyone doubt he would be racing with Iran to obtain a nuclear bomb?

Saddam's trial had its critics, just as Nuremberg did in its time. But the dictator received far more due process than his own victims ever did. He was able to play to the cameras of al Jazeera, giving the illusion to his former allies in the insurgency that he might return. He could denounce his Iraqi judges as American stooges, though the U.S. studiously left his fate to Iraqis and even protected Saddam in captivity from vengeful ill-treatment. What the dictator could not do is gainsay the evidence of his guilt, which ran to thousands of exhibits and pages of testimony and would have included hundreds of witnesses had the other cases against him gone forward.

His hanging will not end the violence in Iraq, but it is important for that country's future nonetheless. It will reassure majority Shiites that Saddam's day is finally past, making it easier for the moderates among them to compromise with Sunnis on the shape of their government. The anti-Saddam taunts of a few of his executioners were tasteless, but they also show the catharsis his death represents.

Perhaps the more important effect will be on the psychology of Iraq's Sunnis. Many of them actually did believe that Saddam might return to power, just as Saddam told them he would in his televised trial proceedings. And they continued to believe that Saddam could punish "traitors," like a mafia don, from his jail cell. As Shiite leader Ayad Jamal al-Deen remarked, "The death of this man will help to release many Baathists from Saddam's mafia."

The world will have to endure future tyrants, but Saddam's hanging will have done some larger good if it gives even one of them pause to think he might suffer the same justice. Too often, faced with murderous dictators, the world's moralists demand that America "do something" (Darfur, Bosnia) only to shrink from the reality of what that requires. In Iraq, President Bush did something. The 3,000 Americans who have given their lives in that noble mission have done so in a just cause that rid the world of a man who might have killed hundreds of thousands more.

Iraqi Leader's Past Of Shiite Activism Undermines Pledge To Heal Rifts (WSJ)

By Philip Shishkin

The Wall Street Journal, January 2, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- His only son was getting married on Friday, but the Iraqi prime minister couldn't stay long at the wedding. Nouri al-Maliki greeted the guests and then quickly left to make sure that when the sun rose over Baghdad again, his arch-nemesis Saddam Hussein would be dead.

Mr. Maliki wanted to leave nothing to chance. His mind raced through several scenarios, however improbable, that might have derailed the execution, says a close adviser who spoke with him. What if the Americans struck a secret deal sparing Mr. Hussein's life in exchange for a halt to attacks against U.S. troops? What if the former dictator's lawyers succeeded in blocking his hanging through U.S. courts? And finally, what if insurgents abducted a group of schoolchildren and threatened to kill them unless the hanging was canceled?

Mr. Maliki hurriedly gathered final signatures for the execution to proceed, dismissing U.S. suggestions that he delay it for 15 days. By the time Mr. Maliki awoke for dawn prayers on Saturday, Mr. Hussein was dead, his disfigured corpse displayed on television with rope marks on the neck.

For the 56-year-old Mr. Maliki, it was a crowning moment in a career defined by uncompromising hatred of everything Mr. Hussein had stood for. Now Mr. Maliki is supposed to rise above the sectarian chasm that has pitted Iraq's Sunni minority against his own Shiite branch of Islam. But as Iraq moves closer to full-scale civil war, a look at Mr. Maliki's history of Shiite activism suggests he is ill-prepared to be a true unifying figure. On his watch, Iraq has become further polarized along sectarian lines, significantly complicating the U.S. efforts to reduce the violence. (See related article.1)

Things here started spinning out of control long before Mr. Maliki took office, and fissures have been hardening among political factions with narrow sectarian interests, sharply limiting Mr. Maliki's room to maneuver. "He's got the world's most difficult job," says Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq.

In a Dec. 24 interview, Mr. Maliki admitted he's exhausted, and would much rather serve his country without holding high office. "I wish I could be done with it," he says.

As the violence rages on, Mr. Maliki feels frustrated by his failings and by the gulf of mistrust that has opened between him and ordinary Iraqis, say his associates and colleagues. When his heavily armed convoy moves through Baghdad disrupting traffic, Mr. Maliki gets annoyed because it reminds him of Mr. Hussein's old motorcades.

Born near Babylon, Mr. Maliki studied religion and Arabic poetry. In the 1960s he joined the Dawa party, a moderate Shiite Islamist group whose members were targeted for torture and executions by Mr. Hussein's regime. Like many of his party colleagues, Mr. Maliki changed his first name -- from Nouri to Jawad, in his case -- to make it harder for authorities to identify him and his family.

Mr. Maliki briefly lived in the marshes of southern Iraq, hiding in crude shacks made of reeds and organizing resistance, says Hassan al-Sunaid, a longtime friend of the prime minister. Once, a Dawa camp came under attack by government forces. One member was killed and four were wounded. When Mr. Maliki arrived on the scene and was briefed on the casualties, he told supporters not to be depressed because all five could have perished. "We just gained four people," Mr. Sunaid recalls Mr. Maliki as saying. In 1979, Mr. Maliki moved to Syria, where he coordinated Iraqi opposition meetings and published a Dawa newspaper.

In 1982, Dawa helped organize a botched assassination attempt against Mr. Hussein, who responded by executing some 150 Shiite civilians. That massacre earned the former dictator his death penalty.

Following the 2003 U.S.-led invasion, Mr. Maliki returned to Baghdad and became one of the most enthusiastic enforcers of Washington's sweeping program to purge Iraq's institutions of Baath party members. Many, though not all, were Sunnis. That decision is now widely viewed as a mistake because it antagonized many Sunnis, particularly in the military, and pushed them into the insurgency.

Mr. Maliki's zeal for the program surprised even those who shared his distaste for the Baath party. Mithal al-Alusi, a former Sunni exile who worked under Mr. Maliki on the de-Baathification commission, says he once wanted to clear the names of some 400 low-level Baathists, who were forced to join the party under Saddam to keep their jobs. Facing objections from Mr. Maliki and some others, Mr. Alusi says he leaked the list to an Iraqi newspaper, after which the commission's hand was forced and the names were cleared. "Maliki was very upset about it," recalls Mr. Alusi. "He's allergic to Baathists." Mr. Maliki was concerned that these Baathists hadn't submitted proper applications for clearance, says Sami al-Askari, his friend and adviser.

Mr. Maliki and his close associates believe the Shiites finally assumed the rightful positions of leadership in Iraq, after decades under repressive Sunni rule. "The problem is that our Sunni brothers ruled Iraq for centuries because there was no democracy, no elections," Mr. Maliki said in the interview. "Therefore, they feel that a right has been taken away from them."

The Sunni-Shia split dates to the battles at the dawn of Islam over who should succeed the Prophet Muhammed as the leader of the Muslim world. Eventually, the Sunnis gained the upper hand throughout most of the Middle East, with the notable exception of Iraq's neighbor Iran.

Preserving the new Iraq as a Shia-controlled state is an indispensable ideological consideration for the latest crop of Shiite leaders, who still recall a missed opportunity back in 1920. After an armed uprising against the British colonial rule back then, Shiite sheiks withdrew from politics and paved the way for the ascendancy of the Sunni minority that lasted until 2003.

"The current leaders learned that lesson very well," says Sadiq al-Rikabi, the prime minister's political adviser. Mr. Maliki has a personal connection to the events of 1920: His grandfather was a cleric who took part in the uprising, wrote national-liberation poetry and was detained by the British several times. Mr. Maliki went on to write his master's thesis on his forebear, whose verses he can recite from memory.

After 2003, the Sunnis themselves withdrew from politics and allowed the Shiites and Kurds to form a government without them. Security forces took on a Shiite tint, and Sunnis began to complain of sectarian death squads allegedly operating with the complicity of the interior ministry.

From his seat in parliament, Mr. Maliki was lobbying for more Shiite influence in the relatively nonsectarian Iraqi army.

In 2005, he approached the Sunni minister of defense with a request to hire more senior Shiite officers -- a move that many Sunnis now cast as sectarian meddling. In the end, the defense minister ignored the request, according to people familiar with the episode.

The Sunnis ended their boycott of politics in December 2005 and won seats in the new parliament, though the Shiites still maintained a majority. Banding together with ethnic Kurds, the Sunnis engineered the ouster of the Shiite prime minister, Ibrahim al-Jaafari, whom they viewed as inefficient. As a senior Dawa official, Mr. Maliki emerged as the Shiite coalition's second choice for prime minister, though most Iraqis didn't know anything about him. Mr. Maliki never coveted the post and decided to take it only after his Shiite colleagues spent days persuading him to step in, he and others involved in the selection say. "That decision for me was heavier than a mountain," Mr. Maliki recalls, stooping his shoulders under its imaginary weight.

Upon taking office, Mr. Maliki surrounded himself with trusted Shiite advisers, most of whom hail from the same exile underground that shaped him. Then he pledged to reach out to the Sunni insurgent groups and former Baathists, the very people he worked hard to isolate before becoming prime minister. "Yes, he was very tough against Baathists, but now he's ready for dialogue with some of them," says Mr. al-Askari. "Some people were surprised by this."

Even Ansar al-Sunna, one of the toughest insurgent groups in the country, has been approached and has sent in a list of "requirements for negotiation," says Mowaffak al-Rubaie, the prime minister's national security adviser. Yet, there are no signs that reconciliation is working. In early December, Ansar al-Sunna plastered several Baghdad universities with leaflets attacking Mr. Maliki's government and blaming it for killing Sunnis.

"This reconciliation came very late, three years late or at least two," says Mahmoud Othman, a veteran Kurdish politician. The Kurds, most of whom live in their peaceful northern region, have largely sat out the conflict between Iraq's Sunni and Shiite Arabs.

The prime minister says reconciliation is still possible. "It is not only about slogans; it is a matter of will," he says, adding that he's working on establishing a retirement plan for some former Baathists and senior officers of the old army.

Another huge challenge facing Mr. Maliki is the rising power of Moqtada al-Sadr, a Shiite strongman whose parliamentary votes were critical for his nomination as prime minister. Mr. Sadr's militia, the Mehdi army, is accused of conducting sectarian attacks against Sunnis and driving them out of mixed neighborhoods in Baghdad. (Mr. Sadr's advisers deny this.) In February, three months before Mr. Maliki ascended to Iraq's top post, Sunni insurgents destroyed a landmark Shiite shrine in Samarra, and the Mehdi army quickly emerged as a vigilante Shiite self-defense force and one of the most intractable players in the escalating violence. Mr. Maliki promised to tackle militias, but instead he has chosen to seek a political accommodation with Mr. Sadr, fearful that direct military action would alienate him.

In October, Mr. Maliki told the U.S. military to remove roadblocks surrounding Sadr City, a massive Shiite district of Baghdad that serves as a base of operations for the Mehdi army. The checkpoints had gone up just a week earlier to facilitate the search for a kidnapped American soldier of Iraqi descent who was reportedly held somewhere in the sprawling slum of some two million residents.

Shiites "thought it was a big victory," says Lt. Col. Steve Miska, a U.S. Army officer stationed in Baghdad. "The prime minister forced the coalition to stand down." The Sunnis were baffled by the decision, interpreting it as Mr. Maliki's coddling of the Mehdi army. "The roadblocks were put in to destroy the gangsters," says Saleem Abdullah of the Iraqi Islamic Party, one of the biggest Sunni political organizations. "When they were lifted, that plan was ruined."

Mr. Maliki thought the roadblocks were simply ineffective, snarling traffic and disrupting daily lives of the mostly poor Sadr City residents. "He felt that people are suffocating there," says Mr. Rubaie, his national-security adviser. "And these are the same measures Saddam used against the Shia in that slum."

Mr. Maliki has also blocked some American efforts to arrest Mehdi army operatives. Once, he was given a list of 10 people whom the U.S. military wanted to detain in Sadr City. The prime minister vetoed arresting one person because that would be politically sensitive, Mr. Rubaie recalls. Mr. Maliki, he adds, is committed to wiping out the rogue Mehdi army forces who are involved in sectarian attacks, but he wants to engage moderate elements in dialogue.

Mr. Maliki says the rise of the Shiite militias was a natural defensive reaction to the Samarra shrine bombing, but they have since become a danger to the integrity of the state. "We will continue confronting them with force and we'll work on winning over some militiamen to our side," he says.

Many Sunni leaders, though, suspect a conspiracy: "Maliki knows that the Mehdi army can destroy Sunnis, that's why he doesn't disarm them," says Adnan al-Dulaimi, a hard-line Sunni member of parliament. Last year, a guard on Mr. Dulaimi's private-security detail was detained by the Americans on suspicion of plotting bombing attacks. Though Mr. Dulaimi himself wasn't implicated, the Shiites pounced on the arrest as a sign of some Sunni politicians' complicity in terrorism.

That underlies a broader Shiite perception that the decision to share power with the Sunnis after 2005 elections may have been a mistake because the Sunni insurgency has only grown stronger. In late November, several car bombs killed more than 200 Shiites inside Sadr City, the bloodiest attack since the U.S.-led invasion. When Mr. Maliki recently went for a visit there, his convoy was pelted with rocks.

His allies and some opponents describe him as a man with a common touch and none of the haughtiness that often comes with high office. His days begin at the crack of dawn when he wakes up to pray, and they often last past midnight. To unwind, he reads Arabic poetry and can recite many verses from memory, including his own grandfather's work. He writes his own poems, but these days, he says, "only very little because I don't have time." He's been known to personally grab and wipe a dusty chair for a visitor, and he's vetoed government appointments at the slightest hint of corruption in a candidate.

In the recent interview, Mr. Maliki sat under a huge Iraqi flag and reminisced about his life, shaped by the fight against Mr. Hussein. "I'm still fighting Baathists," he said, quickly adding: "But not all Baathists, only those who have the attitude of Saddam."

For Iraq's Shiites, A Dream Deferred Breeds Mistrust Of U.S. (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, January 2, 2007

BAGHDAD -- As a dull winter sun nibbled away at the chilly morning, Hussein Lefta stood beside the Rahman Mosque. Before him, Shiite Muslim worshipers passed through an emerald green gate and shuffled across a stone-covered field. Behind him the giant gray shrine rose above Mansour, a mainly Sunni Arab neighborhood that was once home to the elite of the late Iraqi president Saddam Hussein.

Built to proclaim Hussein's glory, the mosque is one of the most visible symbols of his fall. Thousands of oppressed Shiites took control of the unfinished building following the U.S.-led invasion. On that day in April 2003, Shiites say, their history was reshaped, their politics reborn and their faith reinvigorated .

Lefta, 42, was among the many Shiites who thanked the Americans for their freedom. He dreamed that his community, Iraq's majority, would exert the political influence the Sunnis had long denied it.

Today, the mosque is still incomplete, as are Lefta's dreams.

"The Americans are afraid the Shia will take over Iraq," he explained.

Iraq's Shiites are at a crossroads in their rise from oppression to power and in their relationship with the United States. In a nation riven by violence and competing visions, they feel as if they have been handed the keys to their house but never allowed to settle down. Bitter personality rifts have undermined their ability to govern. And they have yet to bridge the growing divide separating them from the Sunnis and further deepened by Hussein's execution on Saturday.

As President Bush seeks a new strategy for Iraq, many Shiites express deep mistrust of the United States and its intentions. In U.S. efforts to engage Iraq's disaffected Sunnis, they perceive betrayal. And in U.S. pressure to dismantle Shiite militias, they see an attempt to weaken their bulwark against Sunni insurgents.

Against this backdrop, Shiite leaders have begun to push harder for more independence from their American backers. Most recently, the government ignored U.S. objections to hanging Hussein too hastily. He was executed four days after an appeals court upheld his death sentence.

Casting a shadow over discussions with Shiites such as Lefta is a despairing sense, inspired by centuries of oppression and suspicion of outsiders, that their community is handcuffed, effectively prevented from shaping its future.

Lefta's friend Wisam al-Taieb, 27, a gaunt Oil Ministry worker with dark, intense eyes, stood next to him at the mosque.

"What future?" Taieb demanded. "Now the Shia are suffering from a campaign of genocide. The Americans are in total control of our security forces. Our elected government does not have the power to move a single military unit. How do you expect me not to be pessimistic?"Shifting Attitudes

Under Hussein's government, Lefta, a tall man with a soft gaze, was among the millions of Shiites who were marginalized. He studied French in college, hoping to work for the government. But the jobs he sought always went to the Sunni elite, the favored class since the Ottoman Empire colonized Iraq. Today, Lefta doesn't speak a word of French.

Following the U.S. invasion, he was among the first Shiites to take over what was then known as the Grand Saddam Mosque, a majestic shrine with the appearance of a spaceship. They renamed it the Rahman -- or Merciful -- Mosque.

Around them, the Americans demolished the old order of Sunni domination. The occupation administration of L. Paul Bremer purged Sunnis from the army and outlawed Hussein's Baath Party while trying to restore the rights of Shiites and Kurds, the groups most oppressed under Hussein.

Still, educated men such as Lefta felt uneasy as they watched their fellow Shiites embrace the United States. He recalled the U.S. failure to support Shiites in their 1991 rebellion against Hussein. After the Americans toppled Hussein, Lefta said, "We were watching carefully what the new days would bring and what the future was hiding."

Ali Adeeb, a silver-haired, gray-suited Shiite lawmaker, has seen the shift in his community's attitude toward the United States. He pointed to the February 2006 bombing of a revered Shiite shrine in Samarra. "Before Samarra, when the Shiites used to be slaughtered they kept silent," Adeeb said. "Afterward, they exploded."

Shiite militias attacked Sunni mosques. Sunni leaders have accused Shiite death squads of hundreds of killings. "The Sunnis started to ask for rescue from the Americans, especially now that they have joined the political process and have become close to the Americans," Adeeb said. "This is when the doubts about the Americans began."

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad declared the Shiite militias the most significant threat to Iraq's stability, replacing the Sunni insurgency and al-Qaeda. Frustrated by the Shiite government's inability to govern and bring security, U.S. officials began pressuring Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to dismantle the militias. They zeroed in on the Mahdi Army of radical cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, upon whom Maliki depends for power.

"They are attacking people at mosques, at stadiums," Lefta said, referring to the Sunni insurgents. "But the Americans overlook that. They concentrate on the militias. The militias are merely a reaction to the violence."'A Wrong Reading'

Where Bremer alienated the Sunnis, an action now seen as having fueled the insurgency, Khalilzad sought to integrate them into Iraq's political process, a strategy that many U.S. officials hoped could lead to a way out of Iraq.

The ambassador has met with Sunni leaders from Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Jordan and other states to enlist their support in isolating the Sunni insurgents. In November 2005, after U.S. soldiers found Sunnis being tortured in a secret prison run by the Shiite-controlled Interior Ministry, Khalilzad rebuked the Iraqi government.

Shiite politicians and analysts say Khalilzad is backing the Sunnis to limit the power of Shiites in the government. They say the United States and its allies, concerned about the growing influence of neighboring Iran's Shiite theocracy, will never allow an independent Shiite government, much less a religious one, to fully blossom in Iraq.

"We know the U.S. is under great pressure from Arabic and Islamic countries, who are Sunni," said Ridha Jawad Taqi, a member of parliament with the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, a Shiite party with strong ties to Tehran. "They fear the growing power of the Shia inside Iraq."

"The Americans have a wrong reading of Iraq," said Hasan Suneid, a member of the Shiite Dawa party and a close aide to Maliki. "And who is responsible for this reading? It is the diplomatic channel, that is, Khalilzad."

Suneid, an owlish civil engineer and poet who favors dark, crumpled Western suits, is among the many Shiite former exiles who owe their current positions to the U.S. toppling of Hussein. He now sees Khalilzad trying to engage Sunni insurgents and former Baathists. "I don't mind if the Americans are talking with our enemies," Suneid said. "But they should not change their strategy."

"Who are the secularists?" demanded Adeeb, the Shiite lawmaker, his eyes tightening. "The secularists are the Baath Party."

"It means the base of their thinking is not stable," he continued, referring to the Americans. "They are going to lose the Shiites. And they won't win the Sunnis back, because they attacked them at the beginning. So now both sides will lose confidence in the United States."

Michael McClellan, chief spokesman at the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad, said Khalilzad was aware of the Shiites' concerns but said it had not affected his ability to work with Maliki and other Shiite leaders.

"These issues often require compromises by the parties involved, and sometimes they do not like that," McClellan said in an e-mail. "This is true of both Sunnis and Shiites, but we do not favor one group over another."Another Turning Point

From his wallet, Baghdad shop owner Abdul Amir Ali pulled out two yellowing black-and-white passport photos of his brothers. In the 1980s, Hussein ordered their executions, along with more than 100 other men from the northern town of Dujail, in retribution for an attempt on his life. One brother was 20, the other 23.

When Hussein was sentenced in November to death by hanging, Ali felt his loyalty to the Maliki government deepen. Like many Shiites, he had rejoiced when U.S.-led forces invaded Iraq -- "I behaved like a crazy man," he recalled. And he knows that without the fall of Hussein, he would have never seen justice for his brothers.

Seated in his shop, in the affluent, mostly Shiite neighborhood of Karrada, Ali and his brother Usama expressed concern that U.S. officials were pushing the government to allow thousands of purged Baathists who did not commit atrocities to resume their old jobs.

"This is a big mistake," said Usama Ali, 30, a stocky, bald man with a scratchy voice. "Saddam's people should not be allowed to participate in the political process."

The U.S. pressures and growing mistrust have emboldened Shiite leaders. They are demanding more autonomy and control over Iraq's mostly Shiite security forces, as well as urging U.S. forces to fight Sunni insurgents instead of Shiite militias, which are forging Shiite enclaves across Baghdad.

That worries Sunni leaders. "The U.S. needs to send a clear message: We will act toward Iraqis in a fair and equal way," said Ayad al-Sammarae, a prominent Sunni politician. "We can't punish one criminal and forgive another."

In October, in the government's strongest assertion of sovereignty yet, Maliki ordered U.S. forces to lift a blockade of Sadr City, the huge Shiite slum in Baghdad. For everyday Shiites, it was another turning point in their relationship with their liberators. "This is the first time he has stood up to the occupiers," Abdul Amir Ali said with pride. "It was like a victory for us when the Americans obeyed Maliki."

Still, Lefta feels "a second betrayal" coming. "The Shiite people dream of democracy, real democracy," he said, as men filed toward the Rahman Mosque's prayer hall. "But what is taking place is exactly the opposite. The Americans want to guarantee the minority at the expense of the majority."

Along the tall wall encircling the mosque compound, posters of Shiite politicians from the most recent U.S.-backed election predominate, save for one lone patch. There, squeezed between the Shiites, are images of two Sunni politicians, their faces obscured, their posters torn.

Iraq Orders Closure Of TV Station Office (AP)

By Christopher Torchia

AP, January 2, 2007

The Iraqi government Monday ordered the closure of the Baghdad office of a Dubai-based television station whose newscaster wore black mourning clothes while reporting on the hanging of Hussein.

A spokesman for the Interior Ministry said the Al-Sharqiya station, owned by a former chief of radio and television for Saddam, had incited violence and hatred in its coverage and had ignored warnings to stop.

Brigadier Abdul-Karim Khalaf, the spokesman, said the order was issued after an allegedly false report by the news channel about the abduction of three Sunni Arab female students from a university.

But the order also followed criticism of the tone of Al-Sharqiya's coverage of Saturday's execution, which struck some as sympathetic to the ousted dictator.

In contrast to state-run television reports that described Saddam as a "tyrant" and "criminal," a newscaster on Al-Sharqiya — which means "The Eastern One" — referred to him Sunday as "president."

Iraq's government is dominated by the country's Shiite Muslim majority. Al-Sharqiya is sometimes mocked by critics as "Al-Baathiya" for its alleged sympathies for Saddam's outlawed Baath Party, which had helped Iraq's Sunni minority rule the country.

Shiite and Sunni are now locked in a sectarian war that has claimed thousands of lives.

It's not clear how the closure might effect Al-Sharqiya, which broadcasts to Iraq from Dubai by satellite.

Al-Sharqiya reported Monday night that its offices in Baghdad were raided and sealed by Iraqi authorities. But the station said those offices were vacated three months ago in response to attacks on staff.

Al-Sharqiya remained on the air Monday, broadcasting video of a protest against Saddam's execution that was staged by the Professional Associations — an umbrella group of unions representing doctors, engineers and lawyers — at the group's offices in Amman, Jordan.

Saddam's eldest daughter, Raghad, briefly attended the demonstration in her first public appearance since his execution.

State-run Al-Iraqiya may have referred to the controversy over Al-Sharqiya's coverage, when it criticized reporting on Saddam's death by rival Iraqi and regional Arab television stations.

"The execution of Saddam unveiled the many masks of those who don't like to see a strong, civilized and developed Iraq," an Al-Iraqiya newscaster said Monday. "The male and female news readers of some Arab and Iraqi satellite channels rushed to their cupboards to wear their black clothes, announcing their sorrow about the joy of Iraqis."

Newscasters on the influential Al-Jazeera satellite channel also wore black in the aftermath of Saddam's hanging.

The government did not specifically cite the controversy over Al-Sharqiya's coverage of Saddam's execution in explaining the closure.

"We had sent many warnings to the channel previously, but it insisted on circulating false news that provoked violence and hatred," said Khalaf, the interior ministry spokesman.

On Nov. 30, the Interior Ministry said it had formed a special unit to monitor news coverage and vowed to take legal action against journalists who failed to correct stories the ministry deemed to be incorrect. The ministry runs the Iraqi national police and a separate paramilitary force.

DOJ_NMG_0111041

The purpose of the monitoring unit, Khalaf said at the time, was to find "fabricated and false news that hurts and gives the Iraqis a wrong picture that the security situation is very bad, when the facts are totally different."

Al-Sharqiya's programming includes a number of Iraqi soap operas. Its owner, Saad al-Bazzaz, fled Iraq years before Saddam's fall and returned after the regime collapsed.

Prominent employees of Al-Sharqiya have fallen victim to Iraq's violence. Those slain include correspondent Ahmed al-Rasheed, and Walid Hassan, a famous comedian who was shot while driving in western Baghdad.

Hassan had performed in a comedy series called "Caricature," which mocked coalition forces and Iraqi governments since the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq.

6 Killed In U.S. Raid Targeting Insurgents (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, January 2, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 1 -- U.S. forces killed six people during a raid on a suspected safe house of the insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq in the capital Monday morning, the military said.

A prominent Sunni member of parliament condemned the operation, saying that two of his buildings were destroyed and two of his bodyguards were killed in the attack. He said his bodyguards were not insurgents and questioned the point of the raid.

"Where is al-Qaeda, and where is the insurgency here?" Saleh al-Mutlak, head of the Sunni-led Iraqi National Dialogue Front, said in a telephone interview.

As troops approached the suspected safe house, people in nearby buildings, including one owned by Mutlak, attacked them with automatic weapons and hand grenades, the military said.

According to a military statement, the troops fired back, killing two suspects. Several armed men then fled into a nearby building and fired at them from the roof.

Under fire from several directions, the troops killed four more suspects and detained one, the military said. Two buildings erupted in flames during the battle, it said.

Mutlak said the destroyed buildings housed the offices of his Iraqi National Dialogue Front, a coalition of political parties that has called for an end to the presence of foreign troops. Although it is led by a Sunni, it also includes Kurds, Assyrians and politicians from other ethnic groups. Its members hold 11 of the 275 seats in parliament.

"They came to the office of the Iraqi Front, which is part of the government, part of the political process," Mutlak said. "We don't believe in violence. Why would they do that?"

Mutlak said the troops had no reason to shoot at his building and that his bodyguards fired back only to protect themselves, thinking they were being attacked by militiamen.

He also said the four other people killed were civilians, not insurgents.

In an e-mail response to written questions, the military disputed Mutlak's account, saying no civilians were killed or injured and that "the terrorists killed were armed males firing at Coalition Forces."

Mutlak, who was not at the building during the raid, said he received frantic calls from his guards early in the morning. He said he called the U.S. Embassy and left several messages but did not receive a response.

"I'm a member of parliament, and they don't even call me," he said.

Lou Fintor, a spokesman for the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad, said, "We're aware of the reports, and we're looking into them."

In Auja, the home village of ousted president Saddam Hussein, mourners continued to pay respects. Hussein was buried there Sunday, a day after his execution by hanging in Baghdad.

Following the execution, the Interior Ministry ordered the closure of the Baghdad office of al-Sharqiya television, accusing the independent channel of fomenting violence, according to two other Iraqi television stations. The channel's office in Dubai remained open, allowing it to continue broadcasting. Many Iraqis say Sharqiya's coverage reflects the views of Sunnis.

Also Monday, a day after the number of American service members killed since the start of the war reached 3,000, the military announced the deaths of two more soldiers.

The two Task Force Lightning soldiers, assigned to 3rd Brigade Combat Team, 1st Cavalry Division, were killed Sunday after an explosion in Diyala province, northeast of Baghdad. Two other soldiers were wounded in the attack.

The latest deaths, occurring on the final day of 2006, brought to 113 the number of U.S. troops killed in December, according to iCasualties.org, an independent Web site that counts war fatalities. The death toll for December was the highest of the year and the highest since November 2004.

Iraqi Politician's Office Is Hit In U.S. Raid (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-fiske, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 2, 2007

Sunni Arab leader says six civilians died, but Army cites gun attack.

BAGHDAD — U.S. forces attacked the office of a Sunni Arab lawmaker in the Iraqi capital Monday morning while conducting a raid on a suspected Al Qaeda safe house next door. Six people were killed.

Saleh Mutlak, a member of the Iraqi National Dialogue Council, a Sunni slate that includes former members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party, was not in his office in the Jadriya neighborhood at the time. But he spoke with witnesses and said that the troops killed six civilians: two of his bodyguards, a couple next door and their two children.

Troops came under such heavy fire from guns and grenades as they approached the two buildings that they called in warplanes to attack the target with machine guns, according to a U.S. military statement. Two suspected militants were killed as Americans approached and four more during the raid, the statement said, adding that one person was detained.

U.S. Army spokesman Lt. Col. Christopher Garver said Mutlak's office was not targeted, and that troops returned fire only after people in the building started shooting at them.

"They jumped in on a fight that was not targeted at them initially," he said of Mutlak's staff.

Garver could not provide the ages of those killed because troops did not enter the buildings or recover the bodies.

"Everyone who was shot was engaged in trying to shoot us," Garver said.

Television footage of the site showed stone buildings with walls blasted off, twisted metal gates and entrances blocked by rubble.

Mutlak, who was in Dubai, United Arab Emirates, said his staff had called him from the office at 3 a.m. to say militia members were firing on them. Moments later, they called again to say their attackers were U.S. troops. The lawmaker immediately called the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad, but got voicemail. He left a message, but said he still had not heard back by Monday night.

The U.S. Embassy was investigating the incident, spokesman Lou Fintor said late in the day.

"This has got to stop," Mutlak said. "We cannot stand it anymore. How can they bomb my office? I am in complete dialogue with them.

"They didn't even call to apologize," he said.

Mutlak said Al Qaeda fighters were responsible for the death of his brother, Taha, who was kidnapped and shot last spring, and that his party opposed sectarian militias. His office has been searched by the Iraqi Defense Ministry and attacked by Shiite militias.

"This is a disaster," Mutlak said of the raid. "If my guards are considered Al Qaeda, we are in trouble."

The Sunni politician charged that American forces and the Iraqi government were giving Shiite Muslim militias carte blanche while cracking down on Sunnis. He was still seething after watching videotape of Hussein's execution Saturday, at which guards taunted the deposed president with Shiite militia chants.

Mutlak said he planned to meet with fellow Sunnis and members of various parliamentary blocs this week to discuss withdrawing from the government, which is led by Prime Minister Nouri Maliki, a Shiite.

"Participating in the parliament with all that's happening now would be a shame on me, to be part of this history," he said.

The Muslim Scholars Assn., a hard-line Sunni group, released a statement Monday condemning Hussein's execution as "vulgar" and orchestrated by American "invaders and some of their allies."

"The whole thing is political and not taking into consideration the interests of the Iraqi masses," the statement said. "We are looking forward to the day when our people and not the invader execute and bring about justice for those who kill our people, rob our resources, violate our rights and sell our sovereignty."

More moderate Sunni politicians also said they were upset by the way the country's leaders handled the execution.

Ala Maki, a member of the Iraqi Islamic Party slate whom Hussein jailed and almost executed, said the former president's hanging was rushed and poorly timed and that Maliki should compensate by cracking down on Shiite militias.

Some Shiite politicians acknowledged that the crowd at Hussein's execution had been larger than expected and had gotten out of hand.

Only seven people were supposed to attend the hanging at the former military intelligence headquarters in Baghdad, but more police and guards showed up, swelling the crowd, according to Abbas Bayati, a Shiite politician with close ties to Maliki. He said some in the crowd had "spontaneously released" sectarian chants, to the dismay of organizers, but that overall the execution had gone smoothly.

"We can't say it was 100% the way it was planned," he said. "By the end, the law was implemented, and that's what's important. The state cannot control the small details 100%."

Bayati said the guards would be held accountable for their conduct.

Hussein's exiled daughter, Raghad, on Monday joined supporters of the former president at a protest in Amman, Jordan, Iraqi television networks reported. She was unable to travel to Iraq, where she is wanted by authorities.

Similar protests were held Monday in Baghdad's mostly Sunni Adhamiya neighborhood and Hussein's hometown of Tikrit, drawing several hundred people.

Meanwhile, 40 unidentified bodies were recovered in Baghdad during a 24-hour period that ended late Monday.

Near the northern city of Mosul, a visitor to the prison in Badush incited a riot during which police killed an inmate, said Lt. Col. Ali Mahmood, the warden.

Ibrahim Abdullah, 44, coach of the Iraqi wheelchair basketball team and a father of three, was killed in a drive-by shooting in west Baghdad, said Saif Maliki, a member of the Sports Journalists Guild.

Relentless Toll To US Troops Of Roadside Bombs (CSM)

By Brad Knickerbocker

The Christian Science Monitor, January 2, 2007

Almost every day, Sgt. First Class Joel Jacobs comes to the Third Infantry Division's "Warriors' Walk" at Fort Stewart, Ga. Among the eastern redbud trees - each commemorating one of the more than 300 division soldiers killed in Iraq - it's a chance for him to honor his fallen comrades.

Over New Year's, with the number of US service men and women who've died in Iraq at the 3,000 mark, the rest of the nation had occasion to pause and reflect on the war's toll.

Like many, Sergeant Jacobs greets the news of American casualties with sorrow and resolve. He retired from the Army a few months ago, and you might think the prosthetic leg would slow him down. But asked how he's doing, this 21-year veteran who faced danger in Haiti, Bosnia, Afghanistan, and Iraq says , "I'm absolutely fine, sir."

"When you come home, you remember the ultimate sacrifices some of your fellow soldiers have made," he says of his regular walk.

Of the 3,000 American GIs lost in Iraq as of midday Sunday, more have been killed by roadside bombs - improvised explosive devices (IEDs) - than any other cause. More than by rifle fire, mortar attack, or car bomb.

It's a danger that has bedeviled Pentagon war planners for months, one to which they've responded with a high-level task force headed by a retired four-star general, $6.7 billion in research and development, new high-tech equipment and vehicles, and - perhaps most important - intelligence efforts to get inside the decisionmaking of an insurgency that is sophisticated, if largely low-tech.

If anything, the danger is increasing despite efforts to counter it.

IEDs are "the enemy's most effective weapon," Army Gen. John Abizaid, commander of all US forces in the Middle East, told the Senate Armed Services committee last March. "They are the perfect asymmetric weapon - cheap, effective, and anonymous."

Improvised bomb attacks on US troops now top 1,000 a month, four times the rate in 2004. Insurgents have become more sophisticated in their bombmaking, placement, and means of detonation. The British military has determined that there are enough stocks of illegal explosives to continue the same level of attack for years without resupply, reports DefenseNews.com.

Since the beginning of the war in March 2003, IEDs have accounted for about 45 percent of all US fatalities from hostile causes. And that percentage is increasing. Of 100 recent hostile fatalities, IEDs caused 67. December saw the highest number of Americans killed overall in Iraq in two years.

"Buried explosives are easy to plant and hard to find," says military analyst Loren Thompson of the Lexington Institute think tank. "They can be built and detonated using a range of readily available items, making them an attractive tool."

The IED problem extends beyond Iraq. IED attacks in Afghanistan doubled from 2005 to 2006. They are, as Army Vice Chief of Staff Gen. Richard Cody called them, "the poor man's cruise missile."

IEDs are not a new phenomenon in war. Sergeant Jacobs encountered one in Somalia in 1993. But the scale of their use in Iraq is unique.

"Perversely, the IED problem is a result of the difficulty the enemy has in attacking American troops by other means," says John Pike, head of the a military news and policy website GlobalSecurity.org.

The US military is in the midst of a big push to counter and defend against the roadside bombs, spending more than $3 billion this year on the effort. This includes new ways to jam remote-control devices used to detonate IEDs and robots to disarm or blow them up without hurting anybody. But radio frequency jamming is difficult, because it can interfere with coalition communications systems such as those used to operate aerial drones. And soldiers have to find roadside bombs before they can disable or destroy them.

From the infantryman's point of view, the most important things coming to the troops are fire-resistant uniform materials, heavier body armor, and especially tougher vehicles to replace the relatively venerable - and vulnerable - Humvees.

Many soldiers, and their parents, have written ardent fan letters about the new "Cougar" and "Buffalo" vehicles - "Humvees on steroids," they've been called.

"I have seen these things take a hit from an IED and keep driving without a problem," Air Force Staff Sgt. J. Adam Burke, an explosive ordnance disposal technician, wrote to Force Protection, Inc. the South Carolina company that produces the vehicles.

But so far only about 300 are in the combat zone, and troops on the ground could use thousands more.

Those tasked with countering roadside bombs also have been drawing on the experience of wounded veterans who've survived the blast of an IED. Twenty-two soldiers at Walter Reed Army Medical Center have joined the "Operation Warfighter" program to work with military and civilian officials trying to reduce the threat of IEDs.

Besides the 3,000 US military fatalities in Iraq (perhaps more than that if those who died sometime after being evacuated from the war zone are included), the number of troops wounded due to hostile action now approaches 23,000 - about half of those from IEDs. In addition, some 24,000 have had to be evacuated due to accidents and illness. Sergeant Jacobs lost his right leg when it was crushed by a concrete barrier in what he calls a "freak accident" involving his truck convoy.

The percentage of those wounded who die has dropped to about 10 percent in Iraq, an all-time low in the history of warfare. By contrast, the figure was 30 percent in World War II and 24 percent in Vietnam.

Without improvements in soldiers' protective gear, battlefield treatment, and quick transportation to field hospitals, the number of US troops killed in Iraq might well have been more than twice what it is today.

That accounts for what could be seen as the relatively low figure for combat fatalities due to hostile action, distressing as it is. It also means, as the Government Accountability Office reported this year, that "many of them are returning home with severe disabilities, including traumatic brain injuries and missing limbs."

Those in harm's way in Iraq got a break the other day.

Iraqi children playing outside the gate of Forward Operating Base Marez reported a suspicious device to soldiers from the Second Battalion, Seventh Cavalry Regiment. It turned out to be an IED, which an explosive ordnance disposal team destroyed.

Civil affairs soldiers rewarded the children with toys, candy, and soccer balls. In the end, it may be that this kind of intelligence information from Iraqis themselves will be the most important weapon in countering deadly roadside bombs.

These days the Army's Third Infantry Division is preparing to deploy to Iraq for the third time. In about two weeks they'll be going to Anbar Province, one of the most dangerous parts of Iraq.

At night, lights shine on each of the Eastern Redbud trees at the division's "Warriors' Walk" at Fort Stewart, where it's hoped that no more trees will have to be planted. Like the Vietnam Memorial in Washington, personal mementos have been placed on the ground by family members, friends, and fellow soldiers.

"It's a good way to remember," says Jacobs. "But it's also a harsh reminder sometimes too."

Roadside Bomb Changed Lives Of The Survivors, Some Still In Iraq (USAT)

By Gregg Zoroya

USA Today, January 2, 2007

The long shrapnel scar on the face of 1st Lt. Charles Bies marks the day last March when his life changed forever.

Shortly before midnight March 6, the Humvee he was riding in snapped a tripwire and detonated a roadside bomb outside Tal Afar, Iraq. The improvised explosive device, or IED, was planted by insurgents.

The blast killed Pfc. Ricky Salas Jr., the man next to Bies. Like hundreds of other IED attacks in Iraq that end in death, it changed countless other lives as well. For every soldier or Marine killed by a roadside bomb in Iraq and Afghanistan, 10 are hurt. The weapons have killed more than a thousand troops and wounded 11,200 in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The blast that killed Salas left four other soldiers with wounds, physical or emotional, that may never heal.

It severed the left leg of Army Spc. Jose "Jay" Morales, 24, whose dream since childhood was to be a soldier and whose pregnant wife had known him for less than a year before he went to war.

Army Spc. Nicholas "Nick" Helfferich, 22, was manning a machine gun in the Humvee's turret when the blast threw him into the air. It smashed his pelvis and ribs, damaged a lung and his liver, and permanently crippled his spine. "My whole body was just like ringing," he recalls.

The vehicle flipped over, trapping Bies inside the wreckage. He says his life today is neatly divided into two emotional chapters: one before the bomb, and one after.

Sgt. Martin Duculan found himself pinned under Morales and Salas. Though the blast left no visible wounds, it is seared in his memory. "I know how to control my emotions," he said in a recent e-mail from Iraq, where he remains in combat in Ramadi. "But I cannot control a few tears that roll down my cheek when I tell this story."

The list of the 3,000 troops who have died in Iraq since the war began doesn't account for the other casualties, those who barely escaped death and must live with the physical and emotional scars of war. This is the story of the soldiers who survived the IED that killed Ricky Salas.

In the moments after the explosion, Staff Sgt. Jason Snell, 31, of Bethlehem, Pa., directed rescue efforts as soldiers from two tanks rushed to give aid. Salas was dead in the Humvee. Morales lay bleeding atop Duculan. Pinned inside the wreckage, Bies could barely move. Helfferich writhed in pain on the ground nearby.

Soldiers tended to Helfferich and pulled Morales and Duculan and the body of Salas from the Humvee. Snell ordered that chains be attached to a tank to right the vehicle and free Bies.

"The whole time this was going on, I wanted to scream, throw up and run away. But I was the person in charge. I couldn't let my soldiers see me falter," Snell says. "I still smell the blood to this day."

Duculan walked away, uninjured but shaken. A medical evacuation helicopter arrived in minutes to carry Morales, Helfferich and Bies — and Salas' body — to the nearest hospital.

Within hours, Morales was placed on a medical evacuation flight leaving Iraq. Bies was flown out a day later and Helfferich within several days.

Before heading to a hospital in Germany, Morales gently pulled an attending nurse's hand to his lips and kissed it gratefully. His voice dry and hoarse, he motioned for a piece of paper and scrawled a note: "I don't want to leave my platoon."

Morales of Port Washington, N.Y., suffered the worst injuries of those who survived. After nine months of convalescence, rehabilitation and physical therapy at Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington, D.C., he still struggles to walk with his prosthesis. "It's very hard because my stump and my leg are very short," he says.

A greater worry, he says, is the financial future facing him, his wife, Jennifer, and their 8-month-old son, Jayden. Although some amputees remain in the Army, Morales is increasingly fearful he will be forced into medical retirement at age 25. "I'm running out of ideas," he says with urgency. "I'm running out of ways to try and figure out about how I'm going to support my family."

He has received $50,000 in a military insurance payout for the loss of his leg. His Army income is less than $20,000 a year.

If her husband is medically retired, Jennifer Morales says she is uncertain what the Department of Veterans Affairs or military retirement could provide. She says it could be as little as $15,000 to $20,000 per year. Jose Morales knows the VA offers vocational training. But he says he has no plans yet because his focus has always been the Army.

His mother, Lucila Lopez-Torrez, brought him to the USA from his native El Salvador at age 13. She cleaned houses on Long Island to support her only child. Morales joined the U.S. Army in 2000. He hopes to be granted citizenship soon, a process that could be expedited because of his service.

"I'll tell you I'm more American than the people down in the street," he said from his hospital bed at Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington last spring.

Lopez-Torrez, 44, says the stress of seeing her son maimed by war has led to insomnia, high blood pressure, depression and, finally, hospitalization several weeks ago for what she feared was a heart attack. She had collapsed while cleaning someone's house. When it happened, she says, the owner called an ambulance. Doctors told her it wasn't a heart attack but severe anxiety. "My son has changed," she says. "He's not the boy who laughed like he used to. He's hurting a lot."

In November, Jennifer Morales, 22, suffered several days of facial paralysis from Bells palsy brought on by stress, doctors told her. "I looked into the mirror and my face was like hanging down," she recalls.

Life is so different now, she says. They married on Dec. 16, 2005, and her husband left for war three weeks later. They had never lived together. Today, they share a suite of apartments for wounded soldiers, and their families at the Walter Reed medical center and are scheduled to move to a military rehabilitation center in Texas this month.

Jennifer Morales says when they go to a shopping mall, she notices how people stare and children turn to their parents to ask what happened to that man in the wheelchair.

"Even in this (residence) house, the women who have husbands with arms and legs ask me how it is, 'Isn't it weird for you to have sexual contact with your husband?' Stuff like that," Jennifer says. "That hurts. Those are stupid questions."

Scott Helfferich, 51, a park police officer from Westmoreland County outside Pittsburgh, saw his oldest boy, Nicholas, learn to walk again several weeks after the blast.

"I just remember his throwing the crutches down and saying, 'I don't need these damn things.' And then it became very emotional for our family," the father says. "He looked at me and he smiled. And it was the first time in a while that I had actually seen him smile."

DOJ_NMG_0111046

Helfferich, who is still in the Army, has not healed. He suffers chronic back pain and discomfort in his pelvis and fears it may never go away. He awaits word of a medical retirement from the military. Helfferich dreams of opening a bar and grill in his native Latrobe, Pa., though he is not sure how he will pay for it. He may go to college.

Once a proud body builder whose idol was Arnold Schwarzenegger, Helfferich now lives a more sedentary life and misses the body that defined him before the blast.

"I used to be really ripped. You don't know what you have until it's gone," he says. "(The blast) changed my life, because I realized that people were trying to kill me and they didn't. But they hurt me for the rest of life. They got the best of me. I'm going to be suffering the rest of my life. But I'm not going to let that bring me down."

Duculan and Bies remain in combat in Iraq. "The memories of that event will be with me the rest of my life," Duculan says.

Their year of duty in Iraq was to end this month, But it was extended because of the Army's need for additional combat troops. Last year, their unit was shifted from Tal Afar to Ramadi, where the fighting is more intense. The platoon may come home in February or March.

Bies, who survived a second roadside bomb blast Oct. 7, relived that night outside Tal Afar in nightmares for months. In waking moments, he second-guessed himself.

"You start playing 'what if' with yourself: 'What if we'd left an hour earlier or if we'd left an hour later?' " Bies says in a phone interview from Iraq. " 'What if we'd done something different that night?' … You could call it survivor's guilt."

In his second IED experience, Bies and five other soldiers fled a burning armored vehicle and raced to safety under gunfire. That is a good war story, Bies says.

By contrast, the first blast, the one that killed Ricky Salas, was profound. "I measure my life in two parts, and it was before this and after it," Bies says. "All of the sudden, you grow up and you're not invincible any more. You're 24. You're in Iraq. And something like that happens. It makes you realize, 'Hey, I may not live to see 25 or 26.'"

Blast That Killed Pfc. Salas Still Echoes Months Later (USAT)

By Gregg Zoroya

USA Today, January 2, 2007

The roadside bomb that killed Pfc. Ricky Salas Jr. last year lay buried along a deserted stretch of highway outside Tal Afar, Iraq.

The Pentagon announced the death in a three-paragraph news release, blaming it on an "improvised explosive device" or IED, the acronym for the weapon that has claimed the lives of more U.S. troops than any other used by Iraqi insurgents.

The Associated Press reported Sunday that the number of Americans killed since the war in Iraq began — U.S. troops and seven Pentagon civilian workers — reached 3,000. At least 35% of them died as Ricky Salas did: in IED explosions. In December, the deadliest month of 2006, at least 48 of 69 Army combat deaths were caused by roadside bombs.

In all, 111 U.S. troops were killed last month.

IEDs can be made from a variety of explosives. In Iraq, insurgents sometimes use ammunition that was looted from Iraqi military facilities in the months after the U.S. invasion. Detonators can be wired to the bomb, activated by pressure from a vehicle that rolls over it or triggered remotely by an electronic signal.

A military task force established in 2003 continues to look for ways to combat the devices, and the Pentagon has spent billions of dollars on devices that jam electronic signals. It has also added armor to vehicles to defend against explosions and trains troops from the early weeks of enlistment on how to spot IEDs.

Brig. Gen. Dan Allyn, a deputy director for the task force, says one in five bomb attacks causes casualties. When that happens, he says, several people can be killed or wounded at once.

Like the death announcements for the hundreds who died before and after him, the Pentagon news release about Salas, 22, only hinted at the human cost of the March 6 explosion.

No mention was made of the three other soldiers in the Humvee who were wounded in the blast. Also left unsaid were the stories of those the death toll fails to acknowledge: Salas' 22-year-old widow, the two small children she is left to raise alone, a mother emotionally adrift and a father who drowns his despair in alcohol.

Salas hoped that by enlisting, he could support his young family in Roswell, N.M. His death — because of the benefits his wife, April Baca-Salas, subsequently received — made that possible.

"The plan Ricky had for us to live our lives, to have a new house, to be able to support our kids — he's made that. But it's not the way I wanted it," says Baca-Salas. "I wish I didn't have a penny to my name and had my husband."

The explosion of that IED extended beyond the borders of Iraq and touched other lives. The stories of those closest to Salas speak to the other casualties of war — the mothers and fathers, the children and the spouses of the 3,000 killed since fighting began.

The mission that killed Salas was routine. The five soldiers in the Humvee were part of the Army's 1st Armored Division and Charlie Company platoon, commanded by 1st Lt. Charles Bies, 24, of Palm Coast, Fla., who rode in the front passenger seat next to Salas. Salas didn't need to go. He volunteered for the patrol.

After a long day of trying to clear highways of roadside bombs on March 6, the soldiers followed an Abrams tank back to their fortified outpost in a village outside Tal Afar, Bies recalls. It was almost midnight.

Bies says they drove about 10 mph and swapped stories about being chewed out by superior officers, all the while searching the darkness with flashlights for booby traps.

They missed one.

The bomb blew off the entire left side of the Humvee. Bies says he could hear Salas scream. Soldiers on the scene say Salas died quickly. He was pronounced dead at a military hospital March 7.

Hours after his death, a police officer stopped Baca-Salas, 22, outside a Home Depot in Roswell.

Two members of the New Mexico Army National Guard had stopped at her parents' home earlier that day to give Baca-Salas the news. When she wasn't there, they asked local police to assist in gently directing her to go back home.

Instead, Baca-Salas demanded answers. "I just started screaming at him and yelling," she recalls.

"Oh my God! Is it my husband?" she recalls asking the officer. "He's in Iraq," she told them. "Is he OK?

"Ms. Salas, I don't know," the officer told her. "Please go home. I'll follow you."

Arriving home minutes later, she saw the Army casualty officers and fainted on the driveway. Police officers rushed to distract the two children still in the car: Jordan, who will turn 4 on Jan. 11, and Jarrod, now 22 months old.

Baca-Salas had hated her husband's decision in 2005 to join the Army. Even so, she supported him. She says he wanted a chance for his children to see the world, something Ricky Salas Jr. had never experience growing up in West Texas.

He also wanted financial security.

"All he was doing was trying to better himself," Baca-Salas says.

He succeeded for his family. A rush by Congress in 2005 to increase death benefits for those killed in combat resulted in families receiving $500,000 in benefits.

In addition, the state of New Mexico waives state college tuition for the children of those killed in war.

Baca-Salas is buying a home and setting up investment accounts for Jordan and Jarrod. She's also financing her education to become a massage therapist.

The money is a salve, she says, but it is not a cure.

She is reminded of her husband everywhere: at the Home Depot, where police found her the day he died; in the telephone that never carries his voice; on the computer that never displays his e-mail; in the features of his son and the personality of his daughter, who has the same mischievous streak.

Jordan, who has many memories of her father, tells people he is an angel now. "He has big wings," she says.

Baca-Salas, however, remains hurt and angry at everyone and everything, including the husband she lost.

"I'm very mad at Ricky," she says. "I have these two kids that aren't going to know him.

"And no matter what I tell them, it's not the same.

"It's ugly to hear my daughter say her daddy's got big wings. It's hard to take my kids to the cemetery on his birthday."

The Army required a closed coffin for Salas' rosary and funeral Mass. His mother, Brenda Robertson, of Lubbock, Texas, understood that the blast damage was catastrophic. But without a viewing, it seemed as though her son had simply vanished, she said.

"There's no closure because we can't see him," says Robertson, 43. "We don't know."

That's why she requested his autopsy report.

When it arrived by Federal Express six weeks after his death, it carried a warning that was hard to miss: "It is STRONGLY RECOMMENDED that you read this in the presence of people that can provide you with emotional support."

She was alone but read it anyway.

The report listed 55 wounds to her son's body: smashed and broken bones, torn body parts, pulverized organs. When she saw mention of a tattoo on his left arm she put the report down. She knew her son had a tattoo there that read "Salas" in Chinese characters.

"Rick always said he was going to keep me under his wing," Robertson says listlessly.

With the death of her son, who was posthumously promoted to the rank of specialist, Brenda Robertson's life went into a tailspin.

Ricky Salas Jr. was the second of five children and the oldest of four sons of Robertson and her ex-husband, Ricky Salas Sr.

DOJ_NMG_0111048

As "Little Ricky" grew to manhood, married and had a family, his mother relied on him as a steady presence in what she concedes was an unsettled life of moving from one job or residence to another.

For years, Ricky pushed her to enroll in college and study bilingual education.

"He said I'd have a better life and a better future," she recalls. Robertson says she studied at Clovis Community College in Clovis, N.M., for two semesters, working steadily in a campus clerical job. But when her son died, she mourned for weeks and let the education and job slip away.

Now unemployed, she lives with her daughter in Lubbock, recently moving from a three-bedroom trailer that belongs to her ex-husband. A few times, she has found solace in spending time with Jordan and Jarrod, her grandchildren. "I just couldn't deal with it," she says of her son's death. "It's been real hard for me to get back on track."

Her ex-husband, 44, is a former construction worker disabled by a car accident in 2002. He lives on Social Security. His oldest son would always call, even from Iraq, to talk about conditions there. When Ricky Jr., died, the father says he turned increasingly to alcohol.

"Drinking my problems away," he says, "but they don't go away."

These days, there are no calls from Iraq, and Salas often sits in his trailer in Lubbock, staring at the pictures of his son.

"I'm proud. But I've lost the words about how I feel for him doing that," he says of his son's decision to volunteer for the patrol that killed him. "It's a big loss. I don't wish this even on my worst enemy."

Few Iraqis Are Gaining U.S. Sanctuary (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise And Robert F. Worth

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 1 — With thousands of Iraqis desperately fleeing this country every day, advocates for refugees, and even some American officials, say there is an urgent need to allow more Iraqi refugees into the United States.

Until recently the Bush administration had planned to resettle just 500 Iraqis this year, a mere fraction of the tens of thousands of Iraqis who are now believed to be fleeing their country each month. State Department officials say they are open to admitting larger numbers, but are limited by a cumbersome and poorly financed United Nations referral system.

“We’re not even meeting our basic obligation to the Iraqis who’ve been imperiled because they worked for the U.S. government,” said Kirk W. Johnson, who worked for the United States Agency for International Development in Falluja in 2005. “We could not have functioned without their hard work, and it’s shameful that we’ve nothing to offer them in their bleakest hour.”

Senator Edward M. Kennedy, a Massachusetts Democrat who is taking over the immigration, border security and refugee subcommittee, plans hearings this month on America’s responsibility to help vulnerable Iraqis. An estimated 1.8 million Iraqis are living outside Iraq. The pace of the exodus has quickened significantly in the past nine months.

Some critics say the Bush administration has been reluctant to create a significant refugee program because to do so would be tantamount to conceding failure in Iraq. They say a major change in policy could happen only as part of a broader White House shift on Iraq.

“I don’t know of anyone inside the administration who sees this as a priority area,” said Lavinia Limón, president of the United States Committee for Refugees and Immigrants, a nongovernmental refugee resettlement agency based in Washington. “If you think you’re winning, you think they’re going to go back soon.”

For Iraqis, a tie to the United States is a life-threatening liability, particularly in harder-line Sunni neighborhoods. In 2003, Laith, an Army interpreter who would allow only his first name to be used, got a note threatening his family if he did not quit his job. His neighborhood, Adhamiya, was full of Baath Party loyalists. A month later, his father opened the door to a stranger, who shot him dead.

Laith’s mother begged him to stop working, but his salary, $700 a month at the time, supported the entire family. Then someone threw a sound grenade at the house. Graffiti appeared on a wall in ugly black paint accusing Laith of selling information about insurgents to the military. Laith and his family moved out of the house. Soon after, it was broken into and photographs of him with American soldiers were found in a family photo album.

“They know me,” he said, sitting in one of Baghdad’s hotels, because his family would not allow a Western reporter inside the house. “They know when I come and go.”

Many Iraqis who worked for Americans have already fled the capital or the country, and many plead for help or asylum on a daily basis. Of some 40 nationalities seeking asylum in European countries in the first half of 2006, Iraqis ranked first with more than 8,100 applications, according to the United Nations.

Remarkably few apply for refugee status in the United States, mainly because most Iraqis, even those who have worked for the United States government here, simply assume that getting American status is all but impossible. Iraqis cannot apply directly for refugee status in the American Embassy in Baghdad.

Another interpreter, Amar, who did not want his full name used, went to at least 10 embassies during a trip to Jordan last fall, but found only blank faces. He counts his sacrifice for America in bones and skin. He is missing a finger, an eye and part of his skull, after a large bomb exploded next to his Humvee last year. He has received two threats to his life. Two bodyguards accompany him everywhere. He stays in three different houses to confuse potential attackers.

"They said they have nothing for Iraqis," said Amar, sitting in a small house in western Baghdad. "We feel just like stupid trash."

Until recently, the administration did not appear to understand the gravity of the problem. State Department officials say they are now open to increasing the number of refugee slots the administration formally requested for Iraqis in September. That request already allows for as many as 20,000 more refugees from unspecified countries.

But advocates for refugees say that such an increase is unlikely if no special measures are taken, namely designating Iraqis as a group in peril and formalizing a system for receiving them.

Ellen R. Sauerbrey, the assistant secretary of state for population, refugees and migration, said the United States was hoping to identify the most vulnerable Iraqi refugees but was also dependent on the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees to do that.

Officials at the United Nations refugee branch acknowledge that they have moved slowly in identifying refugees, largely because of procedural obstacles and lack of money. The agency's budget for Syria last year was $700,000, less than one dollar for each Iraqi refugee in that country. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees said in October that its Iraq program was $9 million short and that some employees were going without salaries.

The State Department spent $35 million on Iraqi refugees in Iraq and the region in 2006. The United States spends approximately $8 billion a month on the war.

But there is no legal requirement for the United States to rely on the United Nations. It has run its own programs in the past, notably in Southeast Asia. Hundreds of thousands of Vietnamese were ultimately resettled in the United States after the American withdrawal from Vietnam in 1975. In that instance, a number of aid groups in neighboring countries divided the work of interviewing and assessing refugees, a system Ms. Limón and many other advocates for refugees are pushing for Iraqis today.

The United States has even run similar programs in Iraq, helping to resettle about 40,000 Iraqi refugees in the United States and other countries after a failed uprising against Saddam Hussein in 1991. In 1996, about 6,500 Iraqis who had links to an American-sponsored coup attempt against Mr. Hussein were granted asylum.

The Bush administration suspended resettlement of Iraqi refugees after the Sept. 11 attacks, and it did not resume until April 2005, after the process had begun for other Arab countries. A total of 198 Iraqis were resettled in the United States as refugees in the fiscal year of 2005, and 202 in 2006, but most were in the pipeline before the 2003 invasion, and few of the cases address the increasingly dire situation for Iraqis today.

Iraqis who work with the military often have to live separately from their families, to avoid putting them in danger. One 25-year-old interpreter left home when his parents in Mosul, in northern Iraq, learned of his work. Now in Baghdad, he has been back home rarely.

Laith lives with an aunt, away from his wife, in an area where no one knows him. After a visit to his parents several months ago, a stranger asked about his 8-year-old brother at a boys' school. The family fears that it was the early stages of a kidnapping.

"I bring a lot of troubles when I go to visit my family," he said, smoking a cigarette.

Congress approved one program last year to help get special immigrant status for Iraqi interpreters who have worked for the United States military. Laith has tried to apply. The law, which also applies to Afghan interpreters, is capped at 50 a year. Laith was told he needed a senior officer to vouch for him, but he has not worked with one recently, and the one he had worked with is now back in the United States.

Getting such letters, Laith said, has become increasing difficult, because the interpreters for the most senior American officers now tend to be Arabic speakers hired from the United States, not from Iraq.

The State Department has made it clear that it is deeply concerned about the fate of Iraq's religious minorities, including Christians. Officials at the department say that any refugee program must also be geared to those vulnerable groups.

As many as 100,000 exiled Iraqi Christians have relatives in the United States and would want to resettle there if given the chance, said Joseph T. Kassab, the executive director of the Chaldean Federation of America, a Michigan-based umbrella group that represents Iraqi Christians. Mr. Kassab said his group's estimates were based on questionnaires devised by University of Michigan professors and filled out by several thousand Iraqi Christian refugees in Syria, Jordan and Lebanon in recent months.

State Department officials and some advocates for refugees agree that the United States is not likely to begin resettling large numbers of Iraqis anytime soon. New counterterrorism laws after Sept. 11 have slowed immigration, particularly from countries in the Middle East, and Iraqi applications would be bogged down by those security issues.

DOJ_NMG_0111050

A State Department refugee official said that any American resettlement effort would deal with only a small part of the overall refugee problem in the region.

Ms. Limón agreed, saying, “We’ll have trouble with the few thousand who work in the Green Zone.”

A quicker way to help would be to increase financing to countries that are accepting Iraqis — Jordan, Syria and Lebanon — and press those governments to improve their treatment of Iraqis by allowing them to work and travel, officials and advocates said.

That would be a real service for Iraqis in Jordan, who speak of rude and sometimes abusive treatment. Jordanians often do not allow Iraqis to bring in suitcases, travelers said, and have been known to turn away young men, forcing families to continue on without them.

“Put yourself in my shoes,” said an Iraqi working in an American Army base who spent eight hours in the January cold last year with his wife and infant at the Jordanian border. “You take your family to another country and they interview you like you are a terrorist.”

A residency permit is required, and Iraqis must deposit 50,000 Jordanian dinars — about $70,000 — in a bank without drawing on it for a year to obtain one. The worker, who wanted to be identified only as Abu Hussein, eventually moved his family back to Iraq, to the south, because he could not afford to stay in Jordan.

“The Americans are in control of this country,” he said, talking about Jordan. “Why don’t they become angry at how they are treating us?”

Abu Hussein is lucky: He lives on the Army base where he works. Laith does not have that luxury. He pays $400 to two guards and a driver to bring him to Baghdad from an American base near Beiji. Insurgents pay taxi drivers near the base to call them when they see a single man with a large overnight bag, he said. Once a cab driver recognized his face.

“I worked for three years, I lost a lot of things,” he said, his voice urgent. “It’s supposed to be some respect for me.”

With Iraq War Come Layers Of Loss (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson And Josh White

The Washington Post, January 2, 2007

"Grenade!"

Manning a .50-caliber machine gun in the turret of a Humvee, Pfc. Ross McGinnis could see the insurgent on a rooftop fling a hand grenade at his vehicle. He shouted and tried to deflect it, but it fell inside. Four of his buddies were down there.

What followed was a stunning act of self-sacrifice. McGinnis, a 19-year-old from rural Pennsylvania and the youngest soldier in his unit, threw himself backward onto the grenade, absorbing the blast with his body. He was killed instantly. The others escaped serious injury.

With the death toll for U.S. service members in Iraq past the 3,000 mark, McGinnis's heroism, on Dec. 4, stands as one extreme in the vast spectrum of how Americans are experiencing the Iraq war.

Like an emotional manifestation of the laws of physics, the casualties have rippled across the American psyche -- those close to the events have been profoundly moved, while those at some distance, the majority of Americans, have been largely unaffected. Concentric circles of loss spread outward, starting with grieving parents, spouses and children -- many so young they will not remember the father or mother who was killed in war. Families of the severely wounded face a future they never planned for and financial hardships they never imagined. In small towns, which supply much of the nation's fighting force, one death can send an entire community into mourning. Tens of thousands of U.S. troops continue to brave the war zone, while their friends, families and sweethearts worry at home.

At a Pentagon service to mark the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks, Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said that more than 1.3 million troops had been deployed to support the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. That is almost one in every 230 Americans.

In a USA Today-Gallup poll in October, 11 percent of respondents said they had a close friend, family member or co-worker who was wounded or killed in the Iraq war; an additional 43 percent had a friend, relative or colleague who had served in it.

For much of the rest of the country, the reverberations of the conflict are limited to headlines and television images of explosions or discussions about Iraq policy. The nation's war dead are returned to the United States privately, their flag-draped coffins shielded from cameras.

"The fatal flaw was when right after September 11 the president asked everyone to go on with their lives. That set the stage for no one sacrificing," said a Special Forces team sergeant who recently served in Iraq. "That's why they aren't behind it, because they don't have a stake in this war. They aren't losing or gaining anything. If you don't see it, smell it, feel it, how are you connected?""We Will Meet Again'

In the Humvee in Baghdad's Adhamiyah district that afternoon, Sgt. 1st Class Cedric Thomas, the platoon sergeant, heard Ross McGinnis's warning and shouted back: "Where?"

"The grenade is in the truck," McGinnis yelled. Then he ducked down and backward, pinning the device between his body and the radio mount just before it went off.

"He had time to jump out of the truck. He chose not to," Thomas said, according to official military accounts of the incident. McGinnis's action saved Thomas and three other soldiers from "certain serious injury or death."

That evening, two Army officers in dress uniforms rang the doorbell at the McGinnis home in Knox, Pa.

"At that moment, I felt as if I had slipped off the edge of a cliff and there was nothing to grab onto," wrote McGinnis's father, Tom, in a statement provided to The Washington Post. "If only my life could have ended just a moment before this."

The following morning, news of the death of the lanky 6-foot-tall amateur mechanic rippled through the small community of 1,200, where his high school graduating class had 86 students. McGinnis, who was promoted posthumously to specialist and recommended for the Medal of Honor, was the first soldier from the town to die in Iraq.

"It was such a shock," said Vicky Walters, the high school assistant principal, who had known McGinnis since he was a baby. "We're grief-stricken. We were some of the ones who were insulated." About 7 percent of high school graduates in Knox, in western Pennsylvania, join the military.

McGinnis joined the Army at 17, before graduating in spring 2005. That fall, he came back to school in his uniform. It was the last time Walters would see him. "He just beamed," she said, choking up.

McGinnis's father, reflecting on his family's loss, wrote that his son went to war not to die but "to fight and win and come home to us and marry and grow old and have children and grandchildren."

"But die he did, and his mother, dad and sisters must face that fact and go on without him, believing that someday we will meet again." (Tom McGinnis's full statement can be read at http://www.washingtonpost.com.)'Home to a Different Life'

Christopher and Brandon Adams can't grasp what has happened. "They don't understand why Daddy talks that way, why Daddy can't play, why Daddy can't throw a football for them," Summer Adams said from her living room in Miramar, Fla.

Her husband, John, a Florida National Guardsman, was severely disabled in August 2003 by a roadside bomb in Ramadi, the capital of Iraq's Sunni insurgent stronghold of Anbar province. He is one of more than 22,000 service members who have been wounded in Iraq.

After the phone call telling her he had been injured, she waited three frantic days to find out where he was, she said, a complaint heard from families of others wounded early in the war. When she arrived at the intensive-care unit at Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington, she still had no idea about the extent of his injuries. "I guess we are supposed to receive the shock when we reach the hospital," she said.

John, who experienced severe trauma from a quarter-size piece of shrapnel lodged in his brain, lay heavily bandaged "with tubes everywhere," she said. After briefly acknowledging his wife, he fell into a long coma.

Months later, the couple were able to return to Florida, but their challenges had only begun. "We came home to a different life. Nothing was the same anymore," said Summer. John's speech was barely understandable, and though he eventually was able to walk again, he would pass out from vertigo if he looked up.

On Christmas Eve a year ago, the couple arrived at Summer's mother's house for dinner as some neighbors were setting off firecrackers. John wouldn't get out of the van. "He couldn't take the noise," Summer said.

With children who are 5 and 7, she has been unable to return to work as a claims supervisor for an insurance company and had to ask for help from the Red Cross to pay the mortgage and water bill. Army administrative problems left the family without pay and health insurance for the children for months at a time.

"I looked for whoever could help me, or I got on the phone and started yelling," Summer said. "As hard as it gets and frustrating -- and I scream -- you just have to keep going."

John, 40, said he feels frustrated, too, but recognizes that many other wounded troops are even worse off. "There are so many people like me," he said, his words slurred. "People need to know."'Working Our Way Out of It'

With a long scar on his face, metal holding his jaw together and more reconstructive surgery ahead, 23-year-old Sgt. Doug Szczepanski Jr. often finds people staring at him on the street. "Sometimes I'll make up stories and tell them it was a shark attack, or a skateboarding incident," he said. "Then when I tell them the truth, they'll look at me all weird and say, 'What? You got blown up in Iraq?' They don't know what to say."

Szczepanski was wounded in September 2005 when a suicide bomber exploded an Opel sedan packed with artillery rounds next to his convoy north of Baghdad.

"I was scanning to the left and it came up to us really quick," Szczepanski said. The blast blew his face open down to the collarbone, blinding him in the left eye and nearly severing his right ear. Shrapnel pierced his head and his upper body was covered with second- and third-degree burns.

DOJ_NMG_0111052

His parents saw him six days later, when he was transferred to the hospital at Fort Sam Houston in Texas. "He was unrecognizable, he was so swelled up and burned," his father, Doug Sr., said in a phone interview from their home in Bay City, Mich. "You first see your child like that and you're so confused. You don't know if you should cry, sit down, throw up. We just wanted to get on the airplane and go back home and pretend none of this happened."

But relying heavily on their faith, the family persevered.

Szczepanski's mother, Amy, closed her business as a home child-care provider to care for her son, losing about $1,300 a month in income. "We probably would have lost our home without help," she said. "We're still working our way out of it." A survey this year by the nonprofit Coalition to Salute America's Heroes, which has helped the Szczepanskis and the Adamses, showed that more than half of families of the seriously wounded experience a drop in their standard of living.

Szczepanski has given up his goal of becoming a police officer like his father, but because he was spared brain injury -- "a miracle," his mother says -- he plans to obtain a degree in criminal justice and pursue a job in that field.'I'm Willing to Give My Life'

Sgt. Matthew Boone, 26, of Anderson, Ind., is serving his second tour in Iraq now; he thinks he will probably be back for a third. He also has served in Afghanistan and the Horn of Africa since 2001, when he joined one of the most deployed units in the Army, the 2nd Brigade, 10th Mountain Division.

"It has put into perspective what is really important, and that's my family," Boone said in October at a base outside Baghdad. "But I'm willing to give my life for this."

Still, "it's rough," he said. "You miss your kids' first this, first that." His youngest son, Marcus, is 3. More than half of U.S. troops deployed overseas are married, according to Pentagon statistics.

The members of the 2-10 Mountain take pride in their many deployments. 1st Sgt. David Schumacher, 37, of Watertown, N.Y., has been to Iraq three times and has deployed a total of eight times, going back to his tour in Somalia.

"I love what I do," Schumacher said in a recent interview in Yusufiyah, Iraq. "This is what I signed up for. But I'd like to let my family enjoy me for more than a few months at a time."

Maj. Mitchell Watkins, 40, of Vonore, Tenn., has had seven operational deployments in his career and is on his third tour in Iraq, now as the executive officer of the 3rd Squadron, 4th Cavalry Regiment, based in Tall Afar. Watkins said that each combat death is intensely tragic -- he lost one of his closest friends during his last tour -- but that what the troops have given for their country should never be forgotten.

"I willfully continue to serve here because I believe that our sacrifice is still appreciated by many Iraqis who desire to truly be free, and by the people at home who are supporting us," Watkins said in November. "Having lost two close personal friends here in this war and almost 3,000 comrades, I understand the sacrifice this presents to my family, but I have no regrets."Hitting Home

After paying tribute to President Gerald R. Ford as he lay in state over the weekend, Katy Dotson, a high school teacher from West Milford, N.J., said she struggles with the number of American lives that have been lost in the Iraq war. Dotson, 24, said she recently sat in on a colleague's current-events class and was struck to see how little the students knew about the conflict and its victims.

"Most Americans don't understand that people are numbers and numbers are people," she said. They grasp the gravity of the situation only when tragedy strikes close to home. "We had one young man die from our town," she said. "It was a very big deal. The post office was renamed after him."

Statement From Parents Of SPC Ross A. McGinnis, December 23, 2006 (WP)

Statement from parents of SPC Ross A. McGinnis, December 23, 2006

When the doorbell rang Monday evening December 4th, about 9:30, I wondered who would be visiting at this hour of the evening. But when I walked up to the door and saw two US Army officers standing on the patio at the bottom of the steps, I knew instantly what was happening. This is the only way the Army tells the next of kin that a soldier has died.

At that moment, I felt as if I had slipped off the edge of a cliff and there was nothing to grab onto; just a second beyond safety, falling into hell. If only my life could have ended just a moment before this so that I would not have to hear the words they were about to say. If only I could blink myself awake from this horrible dream. But it wasn't a dream.

As the officers made their way into our living room, I rushed back into our bedroom and told my wife Romayne to get up; we had company. And they were going to tell us that Ross is dead. I knew of no other way to say it.

We rushed back out to meet the officers, and then the appointed spokesperson recited the standard message that Private First Class Ross A. McGinnis had been killed in action in Baghdad, Iraq, that day. They could tell us nothing more except that

Army regulations required that the family be notified within 4 hours of the event. They offered their sympathy and support, and the Chaplain prayed for our strength in the days to come, and then they left us alone in shock, grief and disbelief.

In the days that followed, we were informed of the details of his death. The entire world probably knows those details now, since there was so much excitement about his heroic deed. Hundreds of family, friends and acquaintances offered us their words of prayer and comfort. But only time will take the edge off the knives that have wedged into our hearts.

Ross did not become OUR hero by dying to save his fellow soldiers from a grenade. He was a hero to us long before he died, because he was willing to risk his life to protect the ideals of freedom and justice that America represents. He has been recommended for the Medal of Honor, and many think that he deserves to get it without the typical 2 years that Congress has required of late. We, his parents, are in no hurry to have our son bestowed with this medal. That is not why he gave his life. The lives of four men who were his Army brothers outweighed the value of his one life. It was just a matter of simple kindergarten arithmetic. Four means more than one.

It didn't matter to Ross that he could have escaped the situation without a scratch. Nobody would have questioned such a reflex reaction. What mattered to him were the four men placed in his care on a moment's notice. One moment he was responsible for defending the rear of the convoy from enemy fire; the next moment he held the lives of four of his friends in his hands.

The choice for Ross was simple, but simple does not mean easy. His straightforward answer to a simple but difficult choice should stand as a shining example for the rest of us. We all face simple choices, but how often do we choose to make a sacrifice to get the right answer? The right choice sometimes requires honor.

Our Bible tells us that God gave up his only son to die for us so that we may live. But Romayne and I are not gods. We can't see the future, and we didn't give our son to die, knowing that he will live again. We gave him to fight and win and come home to us and marry and grow old and have children and grandchildren. But die he did, and his mother, dad and sisters must face that fact and go on without him, believing that someday we will meet again. Heaven is beyond our imagination and so we must wait to see what it's like.

God bless everybody that has comforted us in our time of grief. But we must not forget the men and women who are still putting their lives on the line; we must keep them in our prayers and keep reminding them with gifts and letters that they are loved and that we want them to return safely to their families.

Pop Music And The War: The Sound Of Resignation (NYT)

By Jon Pareles

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

"I was a lover, before this war." Those are the first words sung on TV on the Radio's "Return to Cookie Mountain," one of the most widely praised albums of 2006. Whatever the line means within the band's cryptic lyrics, it could also apply to the past year's popular music. Thoughts of romance, vice and comfort still dominated the charts and the airwaves. But amid the entertainment, songwriters — including some aiming for the Top 10 — were also grappling with a war that wouldn't go away.

Pop's political consciousness rises in every election year, and much as it became clear in November that voters are tired of war, music in 2006 also reflected battle fatigue. Beyond typical wartime attitudes of belligerence, protest and yearning for peace, in 2006 pop moved toward something different: a mood somewhere between resignation and a siege mentality.

Songs that touched on the war in 2006 were suffused with the mournful and resentful knowledge that — as Neil Young titled the album he made and rush-released in the spring — we are "Living With War," and will be for some time. Awareness of the war throbs like a chronic headache behind more pleasant distractions.

The cultural response to war in Iraq and the war on terrorism — one protracted, the other possibly endless — doesn't have an exact historical parallel. Unlike World War II, the current situation has brought little national unity; unlike the Vietnam era, ours has no appreciable domestic support for America's opponents. Iraq may be turning into a quagmire and civil war like Vietnam, but the current war has not inspired talk of generationwide rebellion (perhaps because there's no draft to pit young against old) or any colorful, psychedelically defiant counterculture. The war songs of the 21st century have been sober and earnest, pragmatic rather than fanciful.

Immediate responses to 9/11 and to the invasion of Iraq arrived along familiar lines. There was anger and saber-rattling at first, particularly in country music; the Dixie Chicks' career was upended in 2003 when Natalie Maines disparaged the president on the eve of the Iraq invasion. There were folky protest songs about weapons and oil profiteering, like "The Price of Oil" by Billy Bragg; in a 21st-century touch, there were denunciations of news media complicity from songwriters as varied as Merle Haggard, Nellie McKay and the punk-rock band Anti-Flag.

Rappers, who were already slinging war metaphors for everything from rhyme battles to tales of drug-dealing crime soldiers, soon exploited the multitude of rhymes for Iraq, while some, like Eminem and OutKast, also bluntly attacked the president and the war.

In 2006 songwriters who usually stick to love songs found themselves paying attention to the war as well. "A new year, a new enemy/Another soldier gone to war," John Legend sings in "Coming Home," the song that ends his 2006 album, "Once Again." It's a soldier's letter home, wondering if his girlfriend still cares. "It seems the wars will never end, but we'll make it home again," Mr. Legend croons, more wishful than confident.

John Mayer starts his 2006 album, "Continuum," with "Waiting on the World to Change," a pop-soul ballad defining his generation as one that feels passive because it's helpless: "If we had the power to bring our neighbors home from war," he sings, "They would never have missed a Christmas/No more ribbons on the door." The best he and they can do, he muses, doubtless to the disgust of more activist types, is to wait until "our generation is gonna rule the population."

There is more rage in the guitar onslaught of albums like Pearl Jam's politically charged, self-titled 2006 album. Contemplating the death of a soldier in "World Wide Suicide," the song lashes out at a president "writing checks that others pay," but ends up wondering, "What does it mean when a war has taken over?" And in "Army Reserve," a wife and child wait: "She tells herself and everybody else/Father is risking his life for our freedoms." The righteousness of old protest songs has been replaced by sorrow and malaise.

After three years of war, bluster has toned down, even in country music. Merle Haggard, a populist who has always been skeptical of the war in Iraq, tersely insists, "Let's get out of Iraq, get back on the track, and let's rebuild America first," on his most recent solo album, "Chicago Wind." In another song on the album, Toby Keith, whose "Courtesy of the Red, White and Blue (The Angry American)" was one of country's most bellicose war songs in 2002, joins Mr. Haggard for a duet, suggesting a reconsideration.

Like the electorate, all pop can agree on across political lines is sympathy for the troops. Bruce Springsteen's "We Shall Overcome: The Seeger Sessions" included an old song, "Mrs. McGrath," about a soldier crippled in battle; the album's expanded edition added an updated version of a blunt Pete Seeger song from 1966, "Bring 'Em Home."

On the hawkish side, the country singer Darryl Worley had a 2003 hit, "Have You Forgotten?," that justified the Iraq invasion as a reaction to 9/11. Now, he has a current Top 20 country hit that reiterates his support for the war but concentrates on its human cost, describing a returned soldier's post-traumatic stress in "I Just Came Back From a War."

In a song called "Bullet," the rapper Rhymefest portrays a soldier who enlisted as a way to get scholarship money for college and dies "with a face full of hollowtips." Even as cozy a singer as Norah Jones starts her next album, due this month, with "Thinking About You," a song about a lover killed in combat.

There were plenty of other songs directly about the war in 2006. But beyond topicality, the war also seeped into popular music more obliquely. The year's best-selling country album, "Me and My Gang," by Rascal Flatts, includes "Ellsworth," a song about "Grandma" and her dead husband, a veteran who left behind "his medals/A cigar box of letters." Gnarls Barkley's ubiquitous hit single, "Crazy," is about self-destructive insanity: "You really think you're in control? Well, I think you're crazy."

Thoughts of mortality fill albums like "The Black Parade," by My Chemical Romance, and "Decemberunderground," by A.F.I. War isn't the only factor behind all the foreboding in current popular music, but it's certainly one.

The 2000s are not the late 1960s, culturally or ideologically, but the musical repercussions of the Vietnam War may hint at what comes next. As that war dragged on, the delirious late 1960s gave way to not only the sodden early 1970s of technique-obsessed rock and self-absorbed singer-songwriters, but also to a flowering of socially conscious, musically innovative soul, the music that John Legend and John Mayer now deliberately invoke. It's as if this wartime era has simply skipped the giddy phase — which didn't, in the end, turn bombers into butterflies — and gone directly to the brooding. The end of the Vietnam War in 1975 was quickly followed by the rejuvenating energy of punk and hip-hop; there's no telling what disengagement from Iraq might spark.

Music and the other arts, unlike journalism, don't echo the news. They can be counterweights and compensations, the fantasies that work out, rather than the facts that don't. In the weeks before Christmas, I started noticing that nearly every time I wandered into a store or heard holiday music from a radio, John Lennon's "Happy Xmas (War Is Over)" — that chiming, purposefully optimistic song with the somber undercurrent — was on the playlist. When even Muzak programmers are facing up to life during wartime, pop is no escape.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Apple Probe Spotlights Two (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0111055

By Nick Wingfield

The Wall Street Journal, January 2, 2007

Now that Apple Computer Inc. has disclosed further details of its internal probe into backdated stock options at the company, the spotlight is falling on two former executives implicated in the investigation, Fred Anderson and Nancy Heinen.

While the Cupertino, Calif., company still hasn't publicly named the two former executives its investigation has blamed for improper options-granting practices, people familiar with the matter confirm the pair are Mr. Anderson, Apple's former chief financial officer, and Ms. Heinen, former general counsel and board secretary.

Apple -- which cleared current management, including Chief Executive Steve Jobs, of wrongdoing on Friday -- has turned the results of its investigation over to the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission. Apple said in a filing Friday with the SEC that thousands of options grants between 1997 and 2002 were improperly dated.

Federal prosecutors are in the early stages of their examination of Apple's backdating practices, in a process that could take months.

An Apple spokesman had no comment. Attorneys for Mr. Anderson and Ms. Heinen say their clients did nothing wrong.

"As CFO, Fred did not play any day-to-day role in the granting, reporting and accounting of stock options and he was not involved in any knowing manipulation of the process," said Jerome Roth, Mr. Anderson's attorney.

"We absolutely deny that she did anything that could be called intentional misconduct," said Cristina Arguedas, Ms. Heinen's attorney.

Within the clubby circles of Silicon Valley, Apple's allegations have caused a stir among people who know the former Apple executives. A person familiar with the matter says Apple may argue that, as financial chief, Mr. Anderson should have been responsible for proper accounting of backdated options. In Ms. Heinen's case, Apple believes it has evidence that Ms. Heinen, as board secretary, was aware of improper documentation that said a board meeting occurred in October 2001 to approve a big option grant to Mr. Jobs, when no such meeting occurred.

Until more specifics are known, associates of both executives say they are standing by them. Mr. Anderson also sits on the board of Internet auctioneer eBay Inc. and is chairman of its audit committee. Meg Whitman, eBay's CEO, said Mr. Anderson will remain in both positions despite the allegations in the Apple investigation. "He is smart, with the highest degree of integrity and ethics," Ms. Whitman said in an interview.

Mr. Anderson, 62 years old, joined Apple in 1996 at a time when the company was in financial distress. He was one of the few senior executives at the company to survive a purge of old management when Mr. Jobs returned to Apple in the late 1990s. Mr. Anderson is credited with helping to improve the company's financial standing. Mr. Jobs asked Mr. Anderson to join Apple's board after he left the financial chief job in 2004.

After Apple found preliminary evidence of irregularities in past option grants last year, Mr. Anderson spent considerable time at the company's headquarters helping an independent investigative team comb through company records to more closely examine past options grants, people familiar with the matter say. It shocked him when Apple's lawyers later indicated to him that he might become a target of the investigation, these people say. As a result, Mr. Anderson resigned from Apple's board in October.

Ms. Heinen was one of Mr. Jobs's longest-serving lieutenants, working for him in the 1990s as general counsel at NeXT Software Inc., the company Mr. Jobs sold to Apple in 1996. Ms. Heinen joined Apple as a senior vice president and general counsel in 1997 and helped oversee a law department at Apple of about 100 people, including roughly 40 attorneys.

Rich Gray, a friend of Ms. Heinen's who worked with her at a small Silicon Valley law firm two decades ago, said he found it hard to believe she did anything wrong at Apple. "She's very smart and she has tremendous personal integrity," said Mr. Gray, a senior vice president and general counsel at Internet marketing company Claria Corp. "I just don't see it happening."

Ms. Heinen left Apple before the company's disclosure of stock-option irregularities. People familiar with the matter say her departure was unrelated to options backdating, though they declined to discuss the reasons in greater detail.

According to Thomson Financial Insider Analysis, Ms. Heinen sold Apple shares valued at $85 million throughout her tenure at the company, while Mr. Anderson sold shares valued at $76 million.

Editorial: Holding The Line (NYT)

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

The old year was certainly a boom one for American business, with record profits for companies and record bonuses on Wall Street. But in the background a major accounting scandal has quietly spread, now encompassing more than 120 companies. Fudging the grant date for stock options doesn't quite have the spotlight-grabbing immediacy of Enron's collapse, but it is still gaming the system at the expense of shareholders.

A study sponsored by Harvard Law School suggests that a large number of board members, instead of watching out for self-enriching tricks, were sharing in the lucre. As Eric Dash reported in The Times recently, the study found that board members at roughly 460 companies, around 1,400 outside directors, likely received stock options that were manipulated, unnaturally boosting their value. In other words, many directors saw their stock holdings goosed along with executives'. So much for independent oversight.

What is particularly disturbing is that the news of this malfeasance, far from leading to full-throated calls for investigation and punishment, has coincided with a broad-based effort from business advocates to roll back the stiffer regime of enforcement devised in the wake of Enron and WorldCom.

There is no legislative push to loosen laws and reverse rule changes precisely because there is little support for it among voters at a time when executive pay is skyrocketing and traders are bemoaning the fact that the Ferrari dealer is fresh out of quarter-million-dollar cars.

Some logical tweaks were needed. The Justice Department's prosecution tactics in corporate cases had become a little too aggressive, and small companies deserved a break on requirements under the Sarbanes-Oxley law — a reform inspired by the malfeasance of large, complicated companies. But the relaxation of a few miscalibrated, onerous provisions is where this effort should end.

Banks' Leases To Hedge Funds Are Questioned (NYT)

By Jenny Anderson

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

Inside a Philip Johnson-designed office tower in Boston's financial district, UBS, the giant Swiss bank, is running a "hedge fund hotel."

Like a few other big investment banks, UBS leases space to ambitious young hedge fund traders as a temporary home, complete with receptionists, espresso machines and consultants to help manage their information systems.

In return, the banks hope the hedge fund hotel guests may become big clients.

Some regulators, however, are growing concerned about the relationship between the banks and their hedge fund hotel guests, looking at whether the banks might be using the real estate relationship as a way to entice hedge funds to do business with them, possibly at the expense of their investors.

William F. Galvin, the Massachusetts secretary of state, has subpoenaed UBS and is examining other banks with hedge fund hotels in Boston to determine how they are charging for their services. He is looking at whether hedge funds are paying higher than normal trading fees to banks to compensate them for the office space and failing to disclose this expense to investors.

"It's a conflict of interest issue," Mr. Galvin said.

UBS, which declined to comment, is the leader in this business, with 400,000 square feet of hedge fund hotels in a number of cities. Bear Stearns is also active, with space for rent in New York, Boston, San Francisco and Los Angeles.

While the state investigation is in a preliminary stage and may not lead to any specific charges, at its heart is a thorny issue that has dogged regulators for decades. Money managers, including mutual funds and hedge funds, often pay Wall Street with "soft dollars" — inflated commissions that include the cost of trading (typically 1 to 2 cents a share) plus an additional few cents a share that can be directed to pay for research and other services.

Soft dollars are controversial because clients pay for the higher commissions, while the services often benefit the manager the most. Higher commissions result in greater expenses for the fund and potentially lower returns for investors.

In the late 1990s, the Securities and Exchange Commission cracked down on the use of soft dollars by mutual funds, concerned that investors were being duped into paying for services enjoyed by the manager.

Massachusetts is now investigating whether hedge funds are improperly using soft dollars to pay for space in these hotels and failing to disclose to investors that they are covering a major expense.

"It's the same soft dollar question," Mr. Galvin said in an interview. "What kind of quid pro quo might be in the placement of an order? What's the relationship between the entities?"

DOJ_NMG_0111057

As hedge funds have exploded, so, too, have the fortunes of Wall Street, which earns billions of dollars a year in fees executing trades and lending money to hedge fund clients. Hedge funds typically trade more than other Wall Street clients and they trade exotic, high-margin products, like complex derivatives.

Because hedge funds have become such important customers, there are concerns that they may be receiving tips about pending mergers, for example, or other yet-to-be-disclosed news that could affect a stock price. Trading ahead of public disclosure would give a fund an advantage; while it generally would be illegal, it is often hard for regulators to detect or prove.

Trading and the soft dollars used to pay for it are only one part of the business Wall Street does with hedge funds. The main business of servicing hedge funds is called prime brokerage. It includes financing trades; finding and lending stock to allow hedge funds to short stocks (betting that their price will fall); structuring derivatives; and executing swaps. It can also include hedge fund hotels — securing real estate, receptionists and information technology and even managing, say, the risk of trading currencies in Asia.

The global prime brokerage business generates $8 billion to $10 billion a year, according to an estimate by the Vodia Group, a consulting firm for the financial services industry. The business is highly profitable, with a return on equity — a measure of how efficiently the bank reinvests its capital — of a healthy 15 to 20 percent. In 2006, Goldman Sachs made $2 billion directly servicing hedge funds, 22 percent more than the previous year.

Prime brokerage is only the tip of the iceberg when it comes to the fees that hedge funds generate for Wall Street firms: billions of additional dollars come from trading for these funds. Credit Suisse estimates that investment banks made $25 billion in revenue from hedge funds in 2004, $19 billion of which came from sales and trading and the rest from prime brokerage.

Hedge funds now control half the volume traded on the New York and London Stock Exchanges, according to Credit Suisse.

In markets like convertible arbitrage, hedge funds control 70 percent of the trading. (In convertible arbitrage, an investor buys a bond that can be converted into stock and then sells that stock short, betting that its price will fall because of the sale of convertible bonds.)

"Hedge funds generate about 30 to 35 percent of the equity commission volume of the major Wall Street firms," said Brad Hintz, a securities analyst with Sanford C. Bernstein & Company, a respected Wall Street research firm that manages money for wealthy individuals and institutions. But that is only part of the equation.

"Because a hedge fund has broad investment guidelines — it is not constrained like a mutual fund to invest in certain stocks or certain sectors — it allows the hedge fund to really go after some of the more financially attractive products the Street offers," Mr. Hintz said.

In the United States, Goldman Sachs, Morgan Stanley and Bear Stearns lead the pack in prime brokerage, collectively controlling about 75 percent of the market, according to Sanford C. Bernstein, a unit of AllianceBernstein.

But neither Goldman nor Morgan Stanley run significant hedge fund hotel operations. (Goldman inherited a small business from Spear, Leeds & Kellogg, which it bought in 2000.)

Bear Stearns' hedge fund hotel clients tend to be small. Bear is unusual because it accepts only "hard dollar" arrangements, rather then venturing into the murky area of soft dollars.

Bank of America exited the hedge fund hotel business 18 months ago because of a lack of demand.

Lehman Brothers and Credit Suisse have been building their prime brokerage businesses. Lehman has space that it leases to a select group of clients, but it is not a major player in hotel space. Credit Suisse prefers to cater to a small number of institutional-quality hedge funds that are expanding into high-margin products like structured derivatives and reinsurance.

Jefferies, a bank that caters to midmarket clients, recruited a significant part of Bank of America's prime brokerage team to build its business. Glen Dailey, head of prime brokerage, said the hedge fund hotel business was too expensive to build at Bank of America.

"It took a lot of resources, especially tech support," Mr. Dailey said. "Clients would call because there wasn't coffee or hot water. In the end, we felt like the client service group was spending 80 percent of its time on the real estate."

The 'Corporate Democracy' Oxymoron (WSJ)

By Henry G. Manne

The Wall Street Journal, January 2, 2007

They're back! Every 20 or 30 years shareholder democracy ideas come back in vogue, and their time seems to have arrived again -- with a vengeance.

The SEC is huddling on whether to facilitate direct shareholder nomination of directors through a new interpretation of its shareholder proposal rule. A prominent professor at Harvard Law School, Lucian Bebchuk, proposes, among other democratizing moves, amending state corporation laws to encourage contested elections for board members. There is ongoing controversy about whether mutual funds are making sufficient disclosure to investors of how they vote on various portfolio corporate matters. And European corporate governance circles are in a dither because the EU failed in a recent directive to qualify the usual one-share-one-vote rule with something approaching one-shareholder-one-vote. The list could be expanded considerably.

There is absolutely nothing new in any of this discussion. The real world has not changed in any significant way, and our knowledge of corporate governance has not been revolutionized by some intellectual breakthrough. Furthermore, the provenance of the "corporate democracy" oxymoron has long been understood. The idea results from the inappropriate conflation of political ideals with market institutions. Its persistence can only be attributed to the intelligentsia's far greater comfort and familiarity with political models and events than with knowledge and appreciation of how markets function.

But, as has been demonstrated time and again, the modern corporation is a market creation, not a political one. Hardly any aspect of "capitalism's greatest invention" cannot be explained by reference to the market forces that caused it to evolve as it has. Indeed, there is probably no aspect of modern state corporation laws, including limited liability, "personhood" and perpetual existence, that could not have evolved (albeit a bit more expensively) in a purely contractual, common law milieu. So it is with the selection of managers.

Multi-owner businesses with no single controlling shareholder have always had to select managers (here including the board of directors) to avoid the prohibitive costs and inconveniences of personal consultation and group decision making by large numbers of equity owners. Some sort of voting mechanism to select the central management was the most obvious and the cheapest solution, though other devices were feasible. Consideration of how a non-voting device might operate helps to reveal the practical essence of corporate voting and its radical difference from political voting.

Suppose, hypothetically, that all shares or interests in a new corporate venture were, in current parlance, non-voting. A provision in the charter or bylaws would then have to provide for some external mechanism -- perhaps a court, an independent trustee or a private commission of some sort -- to canvas all shareholders and determine who had sufficient shares to allow them to control the company and thus eventually to name the managers.

There would not be a vote. Rather the requisite number of share owners would simply "prove" to the outside agency their right to control the business. That shareholder or group of shareholders could then use any system they wanted to make the personal selection of managers after their control was certified. Of course, in practice it would be more efficient for the shareowners to designate their candidates in advance and use an election model to determine the outcome. But that is not crucial to this illustration. The critical determination is not the identification of the managers but rather of the holders of the controlling number of shares. From time to time, depending on the period or conditions established by the incorporators or applicable laws, this certification process would be conducted anew.

This little mental exercise illustrates that the selection of managers in corporations is ultimately a function of majority shareholding, not of any political-type shareholder election process. It should also demonstrate the fatuousness of any ideal of shareholder democracy. It was probably most nearly approximated by the pre-New Deal era of "banker control" of corporations, which, by all accounts, worked fairly well. And it is the de facto system in any corporation which has a control block of shares held by a single shareholder or cohesive group.

Public voting in corporations, which has so confused the public on the issue, is merely a cheap way of determining who holds the requisite number of shares and only incidentally who shall be the managers. If we had never used the word "voting" in corporation law, there is a good chance that many critics would never have thought up the idea of shareholder democracy on their own, since the principal overt evidence of an overlap with the political process would then be missing.

Corporate voting is not about reallocating resources, as is inevitably involved in political elections, nor is it about making actual managerial decisions, as in New England town meetings. There is no room in this scenario for contested elections or nominations to be made willy-nilly by the shareholders. Both of these ideas are part and parcel of the political version of elections. It is hard not to agree with Professor Stephen Bainbridge of UCLA Law School that, if either of these ideas had any real merit, we would have seen them tried and adopted in the real corporate world. We do not.

Also it now becomes clear why an unfettered market in corporate control (with whatever private provisions for managing changes of control are prescribed in the articles or bylaws) is so desirable in a large corporate system. This is actually a market for votes, since votes are the indicia used for control, and the votes and control move into the hands of those who, because they are best able to profit from them, are willing to pay the most for them. That is how efficient markets function. Thus the system of buying and selling votes, including the payment of premium prices for voting shares needed for control, works very well to settle the election issue.

It ill behooves corporate democrats like Professor Bebchuk to deride this system as not satisfactorily monitoring managers when he knows full well that regulatory interferences are mainly responsible for poor performance in the market for corporate control and, for that matter, for much of the steep escalation in executive compensation in recent years. That they would then propose intricate regulatory provisions for more shareholder democracy is evidence of the mindset that causes the problems. (No matter though; the hedge funds -- if we can just leave them alone -- have found ways around those market restraints, even to the point of creating a separate market for votes.)

Corporate voting, as an integral part of the control designation process, is premised on the not-illogical view that shareholders are interested exclusively in maximizing their return on investment and not in social causes, political movements or the reallocation of wealth. Some shareholders may put these interests above profit maximization -- but the laws of corporate governance should not countenance interference by those activists with the contractually established expectations of the vast number of investors.

Why do they always concern themselves with successful businesses instead of founding their own? Perhaps many of the advocates of shareholder democracy actually have a hidden agenda, most usually either a greater degree of government control over private enterprises, or more power to unions via their control of pension funds. Neither has proved beneficial to the investing public or is consistent with a vigorous and innovative public economy.

The hidden agenda of many corporate democrats is even more apparent when they argue that large corporations are indeed like small republics and should, therefore, like all governments, be democratized or constitutionalized. This is usually no more than an assertion that the large size of an otherwise private enterprise is sufficient to convert what would otherwise be a private ordering into something suffused with a public interest -- in other words, an argument for more socialism. The very success of a private concern becomes the reason for destroying its privateness -- a neat rhetorical trick if it was not so patently absurd. * * *

Sometimes this argument is made a bit more logical by saying that large size necessarily means that external costs will be visited on the rest of society. This is the basis for the currently popular claim that so-called "stakeholders" should have a real voice in how the corporation conducts its affairs. But even if there are occasional costly externalities associated with corporate activities, rearranging corporate governance, which is obviously functioning adequately for investors now, is an irresponsible and costly way to solve that real political problem.

We need corporate activists today more than ever, but we need them to lobby and argue for repeal of our many costly and ill-serving bits of corporate regulation. They might start with Sarbanes-Oxley, then go back in time to cover the Williams Act and state anti-takeover provisions, the Investment Company Act of 1940, the Securities and Exchange Act of 1934 and the Securities Act of 1933. I know this is pie-in-the-sky idealism, but it does not change the fact that, on balance, the world would be a far better place without these laws or anything like them.

CRIMINAL LAW:

In CIA Leak Case, Reporters Will Be Key Witnesses (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press

AP, January 2, 2007

WASHINGTON – Some journalists who made careers out of questioning government officials and bearing witness to history may soon find themselves answering questions from prosecutors as key witnesses in the CIA leak case.

Ten or more reporters from some of the most prominent news organizations could be called to testify in the perjury and obstruction case of former White House aide I. Lewis “Scooter” Libby. It's rare enough for reporters to become witnesses. But the Libby case is even more unusual because journalists will be dueling witnesses – some called by the defense team, some by prosecutors.

“It will be unprecedented and, as far as I'm concerned, horrifying,” Lucy Dalglish, executive director of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, said of the case, for which jury selection begins in two weeks.

Prosecutors want to show that Libby lied to investigators about his conversations with journalists regarding outed CIA officer Valerie Plame, and they are expected to rely on former New York Times reporter Judith Miller, Time magazine reporter Matthew Cooper and NBC Washington bureau chief Tim Russert to make their case.

Libby, the former top aide to Vice President Dick Cheney, has said he had no reason to lie and simply didn't remember those conversations. His attorneys have said they will call as many as seven unidentified journalists to testify about their conversations with Libby to bolster his case.

The Libby case has rankled news agencies for nearly three years, since Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald began subpoenaing journalists to testify before a grand jury. Fitzgerald said it was the only way he could thoroughly investigate whether any laws were broken.

After a lengthy court fight that included an 85-day jail term for Miller, Fitzgerald won cooperation from journalists. When Libby was indicted, it was clear reporters would be key witnesses.

That puts them in the awkward position of aiding a criminal investigation, something journalism groups say erodes the wall between the government and an independent press.

Plame's identity was first revealed by syndicated columnist Robert Novak. She believes she was outed as retribution for her husband's criticism of the Bush administration's prewar intelligence on Iraq.

Jurors likely won't hear much about the leak itself because the original source, former Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage, has already confirmed his role and Libby is not charged with the leak. But the trial is certain to renew questions about whether the administration used reporters to drum up support for the war.

Roy Peter Clark, a scholar at the Poynter Institute, a school and resource center for working journalists, said he worries about the fallout from the trial. If it's perceived that reporters grant anonymity to officials engaged in political gamesmanship, prosecutors might be more likely to subpoena them in cases where anonymity was granted in serious issues of public importance.

“This case, it's magnified by the fact that it's in Washington and the status of the players,” Clark said. “It's a bizarre and I'd say dangerous case.”

Justice Department policies require prosecutors to exhaust other remedies before sending subpoenas to reporters, and each decision is reviewed by the attorney general, although U.S. investigators and prosecutors occasionally have violated these rules. In the past 15 years, only 13 media subpoenas have been granted involving confidential sources, Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty told Congress in September.

“This record reflects restraint,” he said. “We have recognized the media's right and obligation to report broadly on issues of public controversy and, absent extraordinary circumstances, have committed to shielding the media from all forms of compulsory process.”

Libby's attorneys have not publicly named the reporters they expect to be defense witnesses. Two reporters have said they will fight subpoenas, but defense attorney William Jeffress said he expects that will be resolved before trial. Because Libby is calling them to testify about his own conversations with reporters, Jeffress said there should be no confidentiality concerns.

President Bush did not include Libby on his list of pre-Christmas pardons, and the Justice Department said he does not have a pending pardon application on file.

Feds Push For Internet Records (MINNST)

By John Reinan, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, January 2, 2007

The Justice Department says it wants to use Web-surfing data to fight child pornography. Critics say it's an invasion of privacy.

The federal government wants your Internet provider to keep track of every website you visit.

For more than a year, the U.S. Justice Department has been in discussions with Internet companies and privacy rights advocates, trying to come up with a plan that would make it easier for investigators to check records of Web traffic.

The idea is to help law enforcement track down child pornographers. But some see it as another step toward total surveillance of citizens, joining warrantless wiretapping, secret scrutiny of library records and unfettered access to e-mail as another power that could be abused.

"I don't think it's realistic to think that we would create this enormous honeypot of information and then say to the FBI, 'You can only use it for this narrow purpose,' " said Leslie Harris, executive director of the Center for Democracy & Technology, a Washington, D.C.-based group that promotes free speech and privacy in communication.

"We have an environment in which we're collecting more and more information on the personal lives of Americans, and our laws are completely inadequate to protect us."

So far, no concrete proposal has emerged, but U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has made it clear that he'd like to see quick action.

In September testimony before a Senate committee, Gonzales painted a graphic and disturbing picture of child pornography on the Web, which he called an urgent threat to children. The production and consumption of child pornography has exploded as the Internet makes it easier to exchange images, Gonzales said.

DOJ_NMG_0111061

But federal agents and prosecutors are hampered in their investigations because Internet companies don't routinely keep records of their traffic, he told the committee.

Gonzales also pushed for Internet records tracking in an April speech at the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children.

"Privacy rights must always be accommodated and protected as we conduct our investigations," he said. "[But] the investigation and prosecution of child predators depends critically on the availability of evidence that is often in the hands of Internet service providers.

"This evidence will be available for us to use only if the providers retain the records for a reasonable amount of time," he said. "Unfortunately, the failure of some Internet service providers to keep records has hampered our ability to conduct investigations in this area."

The Wild West of the Web

Internet service providers typically keep records of Web traffic only for short periods, usually 30 to 90 days, as a way to trace technical glitches. Many ISPs, along with privacy advocates, say that it's already easy for government agents to get the information they need to investigate crimes.

The FBI, without a court order, can send a letter to any Internet provider ordering it to maintain records for an investigation, said Kevin Bankston, an attorney for the Electronic Frontier Foundation, a San Francisco-based group that promotes free speech and privacy on the Web.

"There's been no showing that mass surveillance of all Internet users, mandated by the government, is necessary for law enforcement," Bankston said. "If this passes, there would be a chilling effect on free speech if everyone knew that everything they did on the Internet could be tracked back to them."

The government has offered differing rationales for its data-retention plan, said Harris, the privacy advocate.

"I've been in discussions at the Department of Justice where someone would say, 'We want this for child protection. And someone else would say 'National security,' and someone else would say, 'Computer crimes,' " Harris said. "We're operating in the wild, wild West here."

There are questions about what records would be kept, said David McClure, president of the U.S. Internet Industry Association, a Virginia-based group that represents about 800 small and medium-sized ISPs.

Is it a log of every website a user visits? Is it the actual content of e-mails and other Internet communications? Nobody in the government has offered specifics, McClure said.

"When we go to them for specifics, they start shuffling and hemming and hawing, and the issue goes away until the attorney general gives another speech," he said.

'This is all being driven by a political need, not a law enforcement need."

Congress could act soon

Kathleen Blomquist, a Department of Justice spokeswoman, would not comment on specific proposals for Internet records tracking.

"Because Attorney General Gonzales considers the protection of America's children to be a top priority of the Department of Justice, we are continuing to closely study the issue," she said.

Comcast Cable Communications, the Twin Cities' leading Internet service provider, said it does not retain information on the Web-surfing habits of individual customers unless ordered to by a court, a company official testified to Congress in June.

Mary Beth Schubert, a Comcast spokeswoman in St. Paul, said the company wouldn't comment further until a bill is introduced in Congress. That could happen in the upcoming session, where several lawmakers have promised to introduce legislation on data retention.

Newsweek, January 2, 2007

A recent surge in violent crime is creating anxiety at the Justice Department and posing potential political problems for the Bush administration. The 3.7 percent rise for the first six months of 2006, cited in a new FBI report, was greater than expected and included a 9.7 percent spike in robberies. (Minneapolis and Oakland, Calif., saw jumps of more than 30 percent.) Police groups say the surge comes at the same time the White House has drastically cut aid for state and local law enforcement programs. "We don't have the support from Washington," says Los Angeles Police Chief Bill Bratton.

Government figures show the FBI has shifted agents off standard criminal cases to work counterterrorism; the bureau has 994 fewer criminal case agents than it did on September 11, 2001—an 18 percent drop. (A Justice Department rep says it's "highly unlikely" the crime increase is tied to federal funding, but they've dispatched teams to investigate.) The numbers have caught the attention of top Democrats on Capitol Hill. "If you look at the figures, they're pretty striking," says one Democratic aide, who is not authorized to speak publicly about policy. In a recent letter to FBI Director Robert Mueller, Judiciary Committee member Sen. Dianne Feinstein called the crime increases "alarming."

Homicides Up In New York; Other Crimes Keep Falling (NYT)

By Cara Buckley

The New York Times, January 1, 2007

In New York City, rapes, robberies and assaults, among other crimes, continued to decline last year, prompting the Police Department's top official to herald 2006 as a very good year. Homicides, however, climbed 10 percent in the city, reversing a much-hailed decrease.

"We'd like to see no homicides. The reality is we're going to have them," said Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly. "I think this is a very good year."

He called the increase in killings in 2006 all but negligible compared with 1990, a year with one of the highest homicide rates in recent history. That year, crack-fueled violence soared, and 2,262 people were killed.

Last year there were 579 killings citywide as of Dec. 24, an increase of 52 homicides over the same period in 2005. Yet overall crime last year was down 5 percent. The number of reported rapes declined by 7.4 percent to 1,486, subway crime plunged 13 percent and auto theft fell 11.4 percent.

The police said the year's jump in homicides was rooted largely in an unusually high number of "reclassified" deaths, deaths linked to injuries incurred in months or years past. There were 38 reclassified homicides in New York last year, compared with 21 in 2005.

New York's overall fall in crime also contrasts with an increase nationwide. According to a report by the F.B.I., violent crime across the country rose 3.7 percent during the first half of the year. Dallas remained the country's most violent city, with 3,985 crimes per 100,000 people, according to the midyear report, while New York ranked 10th with 1,1,87 per 100,000.

Myriad factors account for New York's continuing decline in crime overall, the police and criminologists say. They cited more effective policing, shifting drug patterns and the lowest unemployment rate in 30 years.

Yet what is puzzling, one expert said, is that overall crime is dropping even as New York becomes an increasingly polarized city, with haves and have-nots often living side by side in luxury condominiums and public housing.

"Within a few blocks, people are living worlds apart," said Andrew Karmen, a sociology professor at John Jay College of Criminal Justice and the author of "New York Murder Mystery: The True Story Behind the Crime Crash of the 1990s."

"In theory, that should make the poor more dissatisfied and drive people to commit crimes," he said. "But that doesn't seem to be happening in New York."

One possible explanation, Dr. Karmen said, is that the city is largely populated by immigrants, many of whom are driven by a determination to succeed.

"I think they still maintain a positive outlook and faith in the American dream," he said. "But if it doesn't deliver, attitudes could change."

It has proven difficult to root out violent crime in the city's toughest corners.

One of the city's most perilous neighborhoods is in the 75th Precinct in Brooklyn, which includes East New York. There the number of slayings last year was virtually unchanged from 2005 at 28, and 3,239 crimes were reported.

Public housing projects have a disproportionate number of crimes. While 5 percent of New York's eight million residents live in public housing, Commissioner Kelly said, 16 percent of the city's homicides take place there.

The Police Department plans to tackle that seemingly intractable problem by redeploying personnel from other areas and opening police substations in the most troubled housing complexes, Commissioner Kelly said.

Both homicide victims and suspects tend to have links to crime already, he said.

Of those arrested last year in homicides, 95 percent had criminal histories; 75 percent of the people killed did.

Such figures point to the department's need to continue expanding its homicide, shooting and crime databases, Mr. Kelly said.

"The more information we have, the greater the potential we have to prevent crimes," he said.

New York's rebirth as a safer-than-average large city since the 1990s has coincided with an increase in tourism here.

According to city officials, about 44 million people visited last year on business or pleasure.

"One overarching reason why people are coming here, in a city that was attacked five years ago, it's because they have a sense of comfort as far as security is concerned," Mr. Kelly said.

The department is continuing to pour more resources into community policing, forging bonds between its officials and local leaders, especially those from new immigrant communities.

DOJ_NMG_0111063

Yet in neighborhoods where homicide rates climbed, residents seem divided about whether this recent and heightened focus was improving their lives.

Allah B, the director of the Allah in Mecca Youth Center in Harlem, commended officers in its precinct, the 28th, for holding local forums and listening to community concerns.

Even though slayings in the precinct more than doubled, to 11, last year, he said the increased connection between residents and the police fostered a greater sense of ease.

Yet a longtime resident of the St. Nicholas Homes in Harlem said police efforts to rout out criminals were having a divisive effect in her neighborhood.

“They caused a lot of trouble trying to play one person against the other,” said the woman, who would give only her first name, Keisha. She said people in the neighborhood also felt harassed and persecuted by the police, and that such impressions heightened the tension and stress in the community.

Still, despite a slight increase in the number of homicides in her neighborhood, she said the streets felt far less violent than in previous years.

The sense that New Yorkers are increasingly inhabiting two different realities seems particularly strong in places like Fort Greene, Brooklyn, home to a thriving cafe scene and crime-plagued public housing complexes.

Eleven homicides were recorded in the neighborhood last year, compared with none in 2005.

Strolling along a stretch of DeKalb Avenue by Fort Greene Park late last week, Cheryl Pickett, 36, said she had no idea that murders had risen so sharply in the area.

Ms. Pickett, who has lived in Fort Greene for five years, said her perception of the neighborhood had not changed. She still thinks of it as a safe, child-friendly place with charming shops and bars.

“When things happen, it’s really surprising,” Ms. Pickett said. “This year seems no different than last.”

Mayor: Evacuees Increased Murders (AP)

AP, January 1, 2007

HOUSTON -- The number of murders last year in Houston hit a 12-year high and increased by 13.5 percent over 2005, figures the mayor attributes in part to the arrival of evacuees from Hurricane Katrina.

Houston had 379 homicides in 2006. That was the most since 1994, when 419 murders were reported, police said. In 2005, the city had 334 homicides.

Mayor Bill White pointed to Hurricane Katrina evacuees from New Orleans as one reason for the increase.

"We did have a surge in population from a city where the homicide rate is eight times the national average," White said.

Houston's population increased by 148,000 people in 2006, many of them Katrina evacuees, according to the city's planning department.

The swelling population helped keep Houston's homicide rate relatively steady, rising from 16.33 victims per 100,000 residents in 2005 to 17.24 victims in 2006. Nationally, the murder rate increased by 1.4 percent last year, according to FBI figures.

Some experts disagreed with White's characterization, pointing to national trends indicating rising rates of violent crime.

"It's not as if Houston's unique," said Jim Lynch, a criminology professor at the John Jay College of Criminal Justice in New York. "There are other cities experiencing this."

Other types of violent crime dropped in Houston in 2006, police said. Robberies, rapes, aggravated assaults, burglaries, thefts and stolen cars dropped between 2 percent and 9 percent when compared with 2005 statistics.

Lower Homicide Rate In 2006 Still Means 102 Died (COLDISP)

By Theodore Decker

Columbus (OH) Dispatch, January 2, 2007

Homicides in Ohio’s other big cities jumped last year, but slayings in Columbus ebbed slightly.

Columbus police say 2006 ended with 102 killings, two fewer than in 2005. There were 88 in 2004.

Lt. James S. Schrader, a homicide squad supervisor, said the unit had feared that 2006 would surpass the previous year’s surge, but the slayings slowed as the year ended.

"In the last two months, they’ve leveled off considerably," he said.

Meanwhile, killings in Cleveland and Cincinnati soared.

Homicides in Cincinnati topped its 2005 total of 79 by early December. By yesterday, the number had risen to 85, the most victims since police started keeping reliable records in 1950. Cleveland homicides have risen from 78 in 2004 to 109 in 2005 to, as of Saturday, 119 in 2006, the deadliest year in a decade, according to FBI and local statistics.

Nationally, slayings climbed in other cities after a decade of relative peace following the crack-cocaine-driven slaughter of the late 1980s and early 1990s.

"In 2006, American law enforcement finds itself once again facing a tipping point in violence on its streets, and it is spreading from city to city," a national organization of police officials said in an October study.

"While the nation has understandably focused on homeland security, it must recognize that there is a gathering storm of violent crime that threatens to erode the considerable crime reductions of the past," the Police Executive Research Forum study said.

Columbus' 2006 death toll began on Jan. 4, when two men were slain during a Franklinton robbery.

Among the victims who followed were a high-school sports star killed as he tried to defuse an argument, a mother slain along with her three children, and a 14-year-old shot to death after his friends hurled eggs at a passing SUV.

Not included are six people fatally shot by police and a shooting by a robbery victim that was deemed self-defense.

Fifty-two of last year's victims were black men; 23 were white men. Eightyone homicides involved guns.

"A large percentage are drug-related in one way or another, paybacks or ripoffs," Schrader said.

Police consider 59 percent of the killings solved, the same as in 2005. It would be higher if detectives weren't saddled with unwilling witnesses who clam up for a host of reasons, Schrader said.

"It's fear, it's lack of cooperation, it's implicating themselves in illegal activity."

Alfred Blumstein, director of the National Consortium on Violence Research in Pittsburgh, said those are common problems.

"In many of these settings, police don't have any information or credibility in the communities," he said.

Criminologists warn not to read too much into one year's statistics, and Blumstein said he saw little in Columbus that suggested a marked turn for the worse.

"Eighty-eight isn't that dramatically different from a hundred," he said. "That may well be the condition that Columbus could see for the next few years.

"If it were a real spurt, say you had gone to 130, then I'd look to see what kind of connectedness there is," he said, such as gang wars, a growing drug trade or an influx of prison parolees reclaiming turf.

Columbus' surge from 2004 to 2005 led the Justice Department to include it in a pending study of violent-crime trends, spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said.

The department has surveyed local officials in the 18 selected cities and now is combing through the information for better crime-fighting strategies, he said. The findings likely won't be released for several months.

Homicides also climbed in Toledo and Dayton in 2006.

Through yesterday, Toledo had 34 slayings, compared with 28 reported to the FBI in 2005. Also through Saturday, Dayton police had logged 42 homicides, up from 34 in 2005.

"Murders are probably the least suppressible type of crime," said Toledo Police Capt. Ray Carroll.

Although some of Toledo's victims were truly blameless, most were involved in dangerous or illegal behavior that contributed to their deaths, Carroll said. And as in Columbus, his detectives are frustrated by a lack of cooperation.

Too often, he said, "You're dealing with other dirt nuggets who might be witnesses or involved."

Homicides On Rise In Seattle (SEAPI)

By Hector Castro And Scott Gutierrez, P-I REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, January 2, 2007

Shootings account for many deaths

Death came to Joaquin Tavares on a January evening in 2006.

· A violent year leaves a lasting wound among family, friends

Like so many other killings in Seattle last year, his was random, it was brutal, and it came at the point of a gun. A tenant angry over his eviction from an apartment blasted Tavares with a shotgun, even though Tavares had nothing to do with it.

"It was so horrible," said his sister, Alma Tavares. "I couldn't do anything after Joaquin died."

Tavares was one of 29 homicides reported in Seattle in 2006, and one of 21 killed by a firearm. Two of those shootings were ruled as justifiable and in self-defense.

Last year marked the city's highest number of homicides in three years and reflected an upward trend in violent crime nationwide that police chiefs and criminologists are trying to interpret.

Brenda Lee holds a picture of her son Jared Dahl-Lee at her South Seattle home. Dahl-Lee, 26, was driving on Rainier Avenue South on Sept. 21 when he was shot dead after a confrontation with another motorist.

The increasing number of homicides has ended a steady decline in violent crime that so many large American cities, including Seattle, enjoyed during the past decade. Nationally, the number of murders increased 1.4 percent over the same period in 2005, FBI statistics show.

Seattle, still one of the nation's safest cities, has not been immune to recent crime trends. Although 2006's final statistics weren't yet available, they were expected to show that Seattle's violent crime rate rose, perhaps 1 percent over 2005. In 2005, violent crimes jumped 8 percent over the previous year.

Assaults involving firearms in Seattle, something Seattle police began tracking in 2004, have climbed 37 percent since then through the end of November.

Driving up this year's homicide rate was Kyle Huff's mass shooting at a Capitol Hill home in March that shocked the community. Four months later, another gunman forced his way into the Jewish Federation of Greater Seattle downtown office and shot six people, killing one.

Those slain in Seattle this past year included a man stabbed to death by his sister's estranged husband, and a cabdriver caught in the cross fire when a woman in a brawl began shooting.

The oldest was 60. The youngest was 14. Three were beaten to death. Four were stabbed.

One man was shot by police, and another was killed in self-defense by a man he'd accosted near Westlake Center.

"There's not a pattern," Seattle police Chief Gil Kerlikowske said of Seattle's crime rate. "It's a little bit of everything."

Tavares, 43, was Seattle's first homicide victim in 2006. An artist and musician, Tavares was shot five times with a shotgun, allegedly by a man evicted from the building where Tavares had spent the night.

"I don't think he was crazy," Alma Tavares said of her brother's killer. "He was just mad at everybody. There was no reason to kill."

While some of the increased violence came from a surge in gang activity and some was tied to a more active city nightlife, there was no consistent pattern, Kerlikowske said.

"It wasn't like we could go out and find the one particular group of people that are kind of responsible for this," Kerlikowske said. "It's just this general swing toward increased violence."

Gary Boulden, a Seattle police victim advocate, said the crimes that involved multiple victims were particularly difficult.

"After Capitol Hill, after the Jewish Federation shooting, I'm ready for this year to end," he said.

It was just two years ago that Seattle saw only 24 homicides -- its lowest homicide rate in 40 years.

It didn't last.

"Everybody had decided this problem was solved. A lot of cities feel to their regret that they took their eye off the ball," said David Kennedy, director of the Center for Crime Prevention and Control at John Jay College of Criminal Justice in New York.

He assigns part of the responsibility for the recent increase in violent crime falls on city and federal officials, who fell into a sense of complacency after crime rates dropped during the 1990s.

Mike Urban / P-I

Paramedics aid a victim after a gunman went on a rampage at the Jewish Federation of Greater Seattle on July 28. Pamela Jean Waechter, 58, was killed, and five others were wounded.

Then came 9/11, and the federal government shifted resources from domestic crime fighting, which it had bolstered during crime waves in the 1980s and 1990s, to thwarting terrorism. In addition, local law enforcement budgets shrank and funding dried up for social programs aimed at improving disadvantaged neighborhoods, he said.

What troubles police officials in cities across the country is that the numbers are climbing at all.

"The general trend is the wrong way," Kerlikowske said. "And we're not hearing much of a response from the Justice Department."

But spikes in crime rates, whether up or down, are mostly attributable to groups of young men who are repeat offenders. They often live in the nation's poorest or most dangerous neighborhoods and are a small part of the overall population.

"These guys in these neighborhoods watch each other very carefully. When the streets pick up, these guys and these groups react to that," Kennedy said. "They'll be on edge and they carry weapons more often and they will use them more often. Often they will be acutely more conscious about whether they are respected.

"What that means is there is more violence, and when there is more violence, everybody gets a little more pumped up."

These groups aren't necessarily part of larger, organized street gangs, nor are they necessarily conscious of territory, leadership, or discipline, he said.

"They feed on themselves and when they get going, they can run for a long time unless something acts to interrupt that cycle."

DOJ_NMG_0111066

In Seattle, Kerlikowske said the Police Department has spent time and money to combat the problem, including paying $3 million in overtime pay, the equivalent of placing another 30 officers on the streets.

Shifting assignments and recent hires also boosted the number of patrol officers. "I think we had more boots on the ground," Kerlikowske said.

This allowed commanders of the city's five precincts to focus on hot spots for trouble in their communities.

Even so, the cry for more police officers was never louder than in 2006. The result was a decision by the City Council to hire an additional 31 officers, something Kerlikowske is pleased to see.

"Now, we just have to put them on the street," he said.

The department has 1,277 sworn officers, of whom fewer than 100 are on patrol at any given time.

In 2006, Kerlikowske, like other big-city chiefs, kept up a steady effort to combat gun crime.

In October, the chief joined with several police chiefs nationwide to advocate against a proposed law in Congress that, had it passed, would have prevented the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives from disclosing crime gun data to local police departments, which use the information to trace weapons to previous owners, sellers and dealers.

"You can't be just satisfied with arresting the perpetrator of a violent crime and not looking at the instrument," Kerlikowske said.

Just last month, the ATF's Seattle field division opened a data center to track where guns used in local crimes are coming from. Seattle police also hired an analyst to look for patterns in the histories of the firearms used.

"If more guns are showing up in the hands of police that are recovered from a crime, that are sold from one particular location, you want to probe more deeply into that place," Kerlikowske said.

"This was a tough year on this community," he said, adding later, "I don't have a crystal ball for this next year."

But even if the murder rate remains the same, or even drops, one murder is still too many, said Boulden, the victim advocate.

"Every homicide just tears families apart," he said.

GUN DEATHS: THE 21 WHO DIED

In 2006, 29 people died in violent crimes in Seattle. Also, one man was shot to death by police; another man was killed in self-defense. These 21 were killed by gunfire:

Joaquin Tavares, 43, was shot five times with a shotgun Jan. 12 in a building at 3706 Airport Way S. The man accused of killing him was reportedly angry over his eviction from the building, but did not know Tavares. He is awaiting trial for second-degree murder.

Chayta Saechow, 26, died Feb. 2 at 3934 S. Eddy St. Neighbors reported gunfire at the home just after 10 p.m. and officers found Saechow dead inside. The case remains open.

Jeremy Robert Martin, 26; Suzanne Michelle Thorne, 15; Jason Travers, 32; Justin Grant Schwartz, 22; Melissa Lynn Moore, 14, and Christopher M. Williamson, 21, all died March 25, shot to death that morning at a Capitol Hill home where they had gathered after a rave. Gunman Kyle Huff, 25, then shot himself to death.

Francisco R. Green, 23, was shot just after 3 a.m. April 22 on Yesler Way near Occidental Avenue South in what police said was a gang-related shooting. A suspect is awaiting trial on charges of second-degree murder and assault.

Rhys Joseph Poc, 18, was shot and killed by Seattle police shortly after 8 p.m. April 25, after pointing a revolver at officers confronting him on a side street just off Broadway. His death was ruled justified.

Michael S. Phillips, 47, died May 30 after being shot multiple times as he sat in his SUV in the 900 block of 22nd Avenue South near Judkins Park in the Central District. The suspect is being held in Youth Detention Services awaiting trial for second-degree murder. He reportedly had intended to buy drugs from Phillips.

Brandon Jeremy Clement, 24, was shot once in the chest June 3 and found dead on Eighth Avenue South in the International District. No arrests.

Hugo Rabanales-Aguilar, 21, was shot June 16 in the 1700 block of 14th Avenue South. No arrests.

Juan Hernandez Alba, 40, was found just before midnight June 26, shot to death at 14th Avenue South and South Donovan Street. The case remains open.

Berhane F. Haile, 39, a taxi driver, was shot in the neck and killed about 2:30 a.m. July 12 in the 400 block of 12th Avenue. A woman involved in a nearby melee had pulled out a gun and began shooting, striking Haile and one other man, who was wounded. The case remains open.

Pamela Jean Waechter, 58, was shot and killed July 28 when Naveed Haq allegedly forced his way into the Jewish Federation of Greater Seattle building on Third Avenue and began shooting, wounding five other women. He is awaiting trial for murder, attempted murder, burglary, kidnapping and malicious harassment.

DOJ_NMG_0111067

Edward Michael Costello Jr., 60, died Aug. 16 when he was shot multiple times in a parked car on Port of Seattle property under the West Seattle bridge. No arrests.

Justice DeShaun White, 25, died Aug. 31 after being shot multiple times as he sat in a parked car about 2 a.m. in the 300 block of East Harrison Street. No arrests.

Jared Leroy Dahl-Lee, 26, was driving along Rainier Avenue South on Sept. 21 when he was shot after a confrontation with another motorist. No arrests.

Daniel Allen Cullotti, 25, was shot to death Oct. 7 by a 52-year-old man he attacked near Fourth Avenue and Pine Street. Investigators found the gunman had acted in self-defense.

Robert N. Samson, 53, was found shot in front of his West Seattle home Dec. 11. Police later arrested a 24-year-old Skyway man they believe stole marijuana from Samson, then shot him. The suspect is awaiting trial for first-degree murder.

Washington Region's Homicides Fall Sharply (WP)

By Allison Klein, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 1, 2007

Local Decline Defies National Upswing

Homicides dropped sharply in the Washington region in 2006, with the District reaching a 21-year low and Prince George's County showing a significant decrease after an alarming year of bloodshed.

The District recorded 167 killings -- a 15 percent drop from the 196 slayings in 2005. Prince George's had 134 killings last year, compared with a record 169 in 2005.

Overall, 417 homicides occurred in the Washington area last year, down by about 10 percent from 2005, when there were 462 killings. About half of the cases have been solved.

The decline comes as violence rises nationwide. Reports of homicides, assaults and other violent offenses rose by nearly 4 percent in the first six months of 2006, compared with the same period in 2005, according to a recent FBI report.

Crime analysts said the Washington area's drop most likely is tied to a variety of factors, including economic gentrification, population shifts, more effective policing strategies and the jailing of violent predators. They also warned that crime is still quite high in some parts of the region.

The national rate of killings for mid-size cities the size of Washington is about 14 per 100,000 people, according to FBI statistics. The rates of the region's urban areas are higher: 29 per 100,000 in the District and 15 per 100,000 in Prince George's.

"It's always good news when it's down," said Brian Forst, a professor of criminal justice at American University. "But down from very high does not mean low."

A Washington Post count combines preliminary statistics from municipal, state and county police departments within the boundaries of a county. The totals showed 202 homicides in eight Maryland counties, down from 217 the previous year, and 48 in five Virginia jurisdictions, down from 49 in 2005. The District had 196 homicides in 2005.

Last year marked the third consecutive year that the District has recorded fewer than 200 homicides -- a far cry from the bloodshed of the late 1980s and early 1990s, during the crack cocaine epidemic; in 1991, the city had 489 killings. The number of homicides last year is the second lowest since 1966.

"For a change, we're going against the trend in a positive way," said Charles H. Ramsey, who stepped down last week after nearly nine years as D.C. police chief.

Ramsey attributed some of the drop to better officer deployment, the meticulous tracking of crime and the department's efforts to keep closer tabs on ex-offenders.

Eric H. Holder Jr., a former U.S. attorney who became second in command at the Justice Department, said some of the community-based programs that were launched in the District in the 1990s are paying dividends.

"It's the notion that you get men involved in the lives of their kids, that you have after-school activities, that you work on the kinds of things that tend to breed crime -- poor educational systems, a lack of jobs," said Holder, now a lawyer in private practice. "You've got to be smart when you fight crime, not only tough."

Others pointed out that demographics are working in favor of cutting crime in the District and Prince George's. In the District, the number of men 18 to 24 -- the cohort responsible for a large proportion of crime -- dropped by 51 percent between 2000 and 2005, according to census data. In Prince George's, the number dropped by 3 percent in the same period, the data show.

Chuck Wexler, executive director of the Police Executive Research Forum, said Ramsey's declaration of a "crime emergency" in the summer also had a significant effect. The move gave Ramsey the authority to shift officers' schedules when homicides and robberies were surging. Soon after that, the numbers went down.

The city got more than $10 million for overtime patrols, put up neighborhood surveillance cameras and installed in some areas technology that senses gunfire and sends a signal to police.

"They put a substantial amount of resources into that and turned it around," Wexler said.

He also suggested that a drop in killings in Prince George's was inevitable because the county had a record high the previous year. The 2006 numbers are closer to what the county recorded in 2003, when 128 people were slain.

"It wouldn't be fair to say that's not progress, but it was so high in 2005, it had to come down the next year," Wexler said.

Prince George's Police Chief Melvin C. High had a much different take: "We're seeing the fruits of groundwork we laid more than a year ago with a series of crime-fighting initiatives. With our decrease in crime, county residents know we're a safer community and that crime is trending counter to a nationwide surge reported by the FBI."

Those efforts included targeting high-crime areas, deploying specialized teams and making key arrests, High said.

Other categories of crime also dropped in the District and Prince George's. Robberies dropped by 5 percent, assaults were down slightly and car thefts fell by 9 percent in the District. In Prince George's, carjackings were down by about 40 percent.

More than two-thirds of the region's homicides last year took place in the District and Prince George's, reflecting longstanding patterns. Police in other jurisdictions typically spend much of their time dealing with less serious violent crimes and property offenses.

The District's totals were the lowest since 1985, when 147 homicides were recorded. About 23 of the 167 killings were drug-related, and the same number stemmed from robberies, police said. Arguments led to at least 42 homicides, and the others were tied to retaliation, domestic disputes, gang rivalries and other motivations.

The District's victims included 17-year-old Cynthia Gray, gunned down in August after sheltering her baby godson from bullets on a Southeast Washington street; Alan Senitt, 27, an aspiring politician who was fatally stabbed in July during a robbery in Georgetown; and Chris Crowder, 44, a community activist who used a wheelchair and was shot in July in a park near the Washington Convention Center.

Many of the homicides in Prince George's involved young men who were shot in communities inside the Capital Beltway. Several killings of young Latino men also occurred in the Langley Park and Hyattsville areas, and some of those are believed to have been committed by members of the Mara Salvatrucha gang, known as MS-13, police said.

In Montgomery County, 20 homicides occurred in 2006, up from 19 the previous year. Nearly half of those killings were domestic incidents, police said. Authorities there also said they are dealing with gang crime and noted that at least three of the year's slayings involved gang members.

The biggest jump in homicides in Maryland was in Anne Arundel County, with 26 killings, compared with 16 in 2005. The victims there included talent agent Richard Preston Shaw, 56, shot inside his Hanover business in July; dentist Albert Woonho Ro, 51, who died of blunt force trauma in his Glen Burnie office in September; and Jay Steven Fayne, 52, owner of a loan business, fatally shot at his Severna Park home in October. The three cases remain unsolved.

In Virginia, Prince William County reported 15 killings, up from 13 in 2005. Police there have noted an increase in street robberies against Hispanics. In September, two day laborers -- one black, one Hispanic -- were killed nine days apart. One was Gordon Harris, 49, who had been a day laborer for two decades; the other was Serafin Alvarez Negrete, 32, who had come from Mexico a year earlier.

Loudoun and Arlington counties remained about steady with four homicides each, and Alexandria had five. Alexandria's cases included the February shooting of Aaron Brown, 18, by an off-duty city police officer outside a pancake house. Prosecutors determined that the officer acted in self-defense when he fired six shots at a moving Jeep, one of which struck Brown, a first-year student at Northern Virginia Community College.

Slayings in Fairfax County dipped from 23 to 20. But Fairfax had one of the region's most shocking crimes: In May, two police officers were shot to death in the line of duty, a first for the county. Detective Vicky O. Armel and Officer Michael E. Garbarino were slain outside the Sully District station by Michael W. Kennedy. Kennedy, 18, was then killed by other officers.

Still, with a population of more than 1 million, Fairfax maintained one of the lowest homicide rates in the country among large jurisdictions -- two per 100,000 residents.

Where's The Outrage Over Black-on-black Killings? (USAT)

By Dewayne Wickham

USA Today, January 2, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0111069

BALTIMORE — A couple of days before Christmas, I phoned Patricia West, an old friend I hadn't spoken to in years. It was a call I didn't want to make — the kind of call no one should ever have to place.

It was a brief conversation, a few minutes of aimless chatter that quickly went from awkward laughter to muffled crying. I called her to say how devastated I was to hear that her son had been killed. His death was reported in the final paragraph of a short crime story in The (Baltimore) Sun that gave the bare facts of his demise.

"The other homicide victim, Kevin West, 39, of the 9000 block of Meadow Heights Road in Randallstown, was found fatally shot shortly after 8 a.m. Saturday by officers investigating reported gunfire in the 2800 block of Virginia Ave., police said."

Kevin West's murder was the 260th homicide this year in Baltimore — a city in which virtually all of the murder victims and those arrested for murder are black. On the same day that he was gunned down, tens of thousands of demonstrators marched down Fifth Avenue in New York to protest the Nov. 25 killing of another black man. Sean Bell was felled by a hail of police gunfire moments after he and two friends left his bachelor party early on the morning of the day he was to have been married.

Just why the cops fired on the unarmed men is unclear. Bell's death drew the scorn of civil rights leaders and black activists, many of whom took part in the march. West's killing has generated no such attention.

And that makes me made as hell.

As troubling as it is that Bell's life might have been cut short by the unlawful actions of some rogue cops, it bothers me more that most of this nation's black murder victims are killed by other blacks. And despite this chilling fact, nowhere have tens of thousands of people taken to the streets recently to protest this carnage. Not in New York, or Baltimore, or Atlanta, or Detroit, or Chicago. Nowhere.

Of the country's 14,860 homicide victims in 2005, 7,125 were black, according to the FBI's Uniform Crime Report. And of the 3,289 cases that year in which a single black was killed by a single assailant, the FBI says, 91% of the killers were black.

Let me put this another way: The number of blacks killed in 2005 in this one homicide category alone approaches the total of all the blacks lynched in this country from 1882 to 1968, according to records maintained by Tuskegee University.

So why aren't black leaders taking up this fight? Why do so many turn out to decry the death of one black man at the hands of some cops, but no mass rallies take on the deaths of thousands of blacks who are slaughtered by other blacks?

"I think it's because we know it's our fault, and we're constantly looking for someone else to blame," says Baltimore City Police Commissioner Leonard Hamm, who, like me, grew up in Cherry Hill, a poor black neighborhood on the city's south side.

Hamm says most black leaders are afraid to address this issue, afraid to confront the apathy, fear and indifference that allow many poor black neighborhoods to become killing fields.

He could be right.

But whatever the reason, it's time for black leaders — activists, preachers, educators, politicians, business and community leaders — to say enough is enough.

It's time for them to be as aggressive, and as demanding, in combating the black murder rate as they are in fighting for an increase in minimum wage or an expansion in health care.

The ripple effects of black-on-black killings have turned many inner city neighborhoods into urban wastelands, chased businesses from those communities, fueled a growth in other crimes and sapped the resources of local governments.

As mad as black folks have a right to be over the killing of Sean Bell, we ought to be angry over the failure of black leaders to be equally outraged over the murder of Kevin West — and the thousands of blacks who are killed each year by other blacks.

The Private Arm Of The Law (WP)

The Washington Post, January 2, 2007

RALEIGH, N.C. -- Kevin Watt crouched down to search the rusted Cadillac he had stopped for cruising the parking lot of a Raleigh apartment complex with a broken light. He pulled out two open Bud Light cans, an empty Corona bottle, rolling papers, a knife, a hammer, a stereo speaker, and a car radio with wires sprouting out.

"Who's this belong to, man?" Watt asked the six young Latino men he had frisked and lined up behind the car. Five were too young to drink. None had a driver's license. One had under his hooded sweat shirt the tattoo of a Hispanic gang across his back.

A gang initiation, Watt thought.

With the sleeve patch on his black shirt, the 9mm gun on his hip and the blue light on his patrol car, he looked like an ordinary police officer as he stopped the car on a Friday night last month. Watt works, though, for a business called Capitol Special Police. It is one of dozens of private security companies given police powers by the state of North Carolina -- and part of a pattern across the United States in which public safety is shifting into private hands.

Private firms with outright police powers have been proliferating in some places -- and trying to expand their terrain. The "company police agencies," as businesses such as Capitol Special Police are called here, are lobbying the state legislature to broaden their jurisdiction, currently limited to the private property of those who hire them, to adjacent streets. Elsewhere -- including wealthy gated communities in South Florida and the Tri-Rail commuter trains between Miami and West Palm Beach -- private security patrols without police authority carry weapons, sometimes dress like SWAT teams and make citizen's arrests.

Private security guards have outnumbered police officers since the 1980s, predating the heightened concern about security brought on by the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. What is new is that police forces, including the Durham Police Department here in North Carolina's Research Triangle, are increasingly turning to private companies for help. Moreover, private-sector security is expanding into spheres -- complex criminal investigations and patrols of downtown districts and residential neighborhoods -- that used to be the province of law enforcement agencies alone.

The more than 1 million contract security officers, and an equal number of guards estimated to work directly for U.S. corporations, dwarf the nearly 700,000 sworn law enforcement officers in the United States. The enormous Wackenhut Corp. guards the Liberty Bell in Philadelphia and screens visitors to the Statue of Liberty.

"You can see the public police becoming like the public health system," said Thomas M. Seamon, a former deputy police commissioner for Philadelphia who is president of Hallcrest Systems Inc., a leading security consultant. "It's basically, the government provides a certain base level. If you want more than that, you pay for it yourself."

The trend is triggering debate over whether the privatization of public safety is wise. Some police and many security officials say communities benefit from the extra eyes and ears. Yet civil libertarians, academics, tenants rights organizations and even a trade group that represents the nation's large security firms say some private security officers are not adequately trained or regulated. Ten states in the South and West do not regulate them at all.

Some warn, too, that the constitutional safeguards that cover police questioning and searches do not apply in the private sector. In Boston, tenants groups have complained that "special police," hired by property managers to keep low-income apartment complexes orderly, were overstepping their bounds, arresting young men who lived there for trespassing.

In 2005, three of the private officers were charged with assault after they approached a man talking on a cellphone outside his front door. They asked for identification and, when he refused, followed him inside and beat him in front of his wife and three children.

Lisa Thurau-Gray, director of the Juvenile Justice Center at Suffolk University Law School in Boston, said private police "are focusing on the priority of their employer, rather than the priority of public safety and individual rights." But Boston police Sgt. Raymond Mosher, who oversees licensing of special police, says such instances are rare.

Private police officers "do some tremendously good things," Mosher said, recalling one who chased down a teenager running with a loaded gun.

In Durham, after shootings on city buses, the transit authority hired Wackenhut Corp. police to work in the main terminal in tandem with city police officers stationed on buses.

"There is a limit to the amount of law enforcement you can expect taxpayers to support," said Ron Hodge, Durham's deputy police chief, who said some of his requests for additional officers have been turned down in recent years. Although, as in most cities, some Durham police work privately while they are off-duty, Hodge said the demand for off-duty police outstrips the supply.

In one of the country's most ambitious collaborations, the Minneapolis Police Department three years ago started a project called "SafeZone" with private security officers downtown, estimated to outnumber the police there 13 to 1. Target Corp. and other local companies paid for a wireless video camera system in downtown office buildings that is shared with the police. The police department created a shared radio frequency. So far, the department has trained 600 security officers on elements of an arrest, how to write incident reports and how to testify in court.

When a bank was robbed in the fall, a police dispatcher broadcast the suspect's description over the radio. Within five minutes, a security officer spotted the man, bag of cash in hand, and helped arrest him.

Private police officers work across the Washington area, although their numbers have not been growing sharply. According to the D.C. police department, any private security employee who is armed must be licensed as a "special police" officer with arrest powers; the city has more than 4,000 of them, including at universities and some hospitals. Maryland and Virginia, which have different criteria, each have several hundred private police, according to law enforcement and regulatory officials.

In Virginia, the Wintergreen Resort has a private police department with 11 sworn officers. They include an investigator who last year helped solve a string of break-ins along the Appalachian Trail, identifying the burglar with images from the department's video camera when he drove out of the resort with a stolen car.

DOJ_NMG_0111071

The Virginia Department of Criminal Justice Services is also trying to foster closer ties between security companies without police powers and the police and sheriff's departments. The agency has begun training and certifying "Private Crime Prevention Practitioners" and soon plans to send security companies e-mails with unclassified homeland security threats and crime alerts.

Maryland has no similar collaboration, according to the Maryland State Police, which licenses security officers. The District is strengthening its supervision of security and private police, with new requirements for training and background checks having been adopted by the D.C. Council.

Some of the most sophisticated private security operations have expanded in part because of shrinking local and federal resources. The nation's largest bank, Bank of America, hired Chris Swecker as its corporate security executive last year when he retired as assistant director of the FBI. Even as identity theft and other fraud schemes have been booming, Swecker said, fewer federal investigators are devoted to solving such crimes, and many U.S. attorney's offices will not prosecute them unless their value reaches $100,000.

As a result, he said, federal officials now ask the bank's own investigators to do the work, including a three-year probe that helped police and the FBI piece together an identity-theft ring that defrauded 800 bank customers of $11 million.

In North Carolina, the state Department of Justice requires company police to go through the same basic training as public officers. They have full police powers on the property they are hired to protect.

Capitol Special Police's owner, Roy G. Taylor, was chief of three small nearby police departments and held state law enforcement jobs before starting the company in 2002. As Hispanic gangs were increasing, he said, "I saw a niche." The company has eight officers, some of whom are part time while working for area police departments.

They have used batons and pepper spray but have not fired a service weapon, Taylor said. Once, in an apartment complex where they worked in nearby Carrboro, Capt. Nicole Howard, Taylor's wife, dressed in plain clothes to attract a convicted rapist who had been peering in windows and stalking women. Then she arrested him for trespassing.

Today, charging $35 per hour, the firm has contracts with four apartment complexes, a bowling alley, two shopping centers and a pair of private nightclubs. A few weeks ago, two of the Taylors' employees, Capt. Kenny Mangum and Officer Matt Saylors, walked over to a car at the nightclub Black Tie to warn the men inside not to loiter in the parking lot. Catching a whiff of marijuana, they found seven rocks of crack cocaine in the ashtray and two handguns under the seat of the driver, who was a convicted felon. They called the Raleigh police to handle the arrest.

Because they are part of a private company, Taylor and his officers are mindful that customers are billed for the time they spend testifying in court.

"I try to make arrests only when absolutely necessary," said Watt, the officer who stopped the six men with the open beer cans. The company's marked patrol cars, he said, do not have radios to call for backup help or computers to check immediately for outstanding warrants or criminal records.

After satisfying himself that the six young men, lined up nervously and shivering in the cold night air, had no drugs, Watt let them go.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

High Cost Of Housing Suit (BSUN)

By Eric Siegel, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, January 2, 2007

City, HUD agree to pay $300,000 in legal fees in civil rights case

The city and the federal government have agreed to pay nearly $300,000 to lawyers representing black Baltimore public housing residents - the latest installment of legal fees in a long-running civil rights case.

The payments - $236,744 from the city and $53,427 from the federal government - are being made to the American Civil Liberties Union of Maryland and the private firm of Brown, Goldstein & Levy for monitoring a partial consent decree in the case during a two-year period from July 1, 2002, through June 30, 2004, according to court documents.

City officials say this bill brings the total they have paid out in the case to the ACLU, Brown, Goldstein & Levy and another private firm no longer involved in the case to $1.5 million.

In addition, officials say they have paid $5.1 million since 1998 to the local firm of Whiteford, Taylor & Preston to defend the city against allegations of discrimination.

A spokesman for the Justice Department could not say how much the federal government has paid to plaintiffs' lawyers in the case, but court records indicate it is about $500,000. The Justice Department has used lawyers from its civil division to represent the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development.

DOJ_NMG_0111072

"It's almost unfathomable that you could spend that much money and not produce one housing unit," city Housing Commissioner Paul T. Graziano said of the money the city has paid to lawyers in the case. "It's also disturbing that it will continue indefinitely."

Graziano said the city could have created 40 new affordable housing units or renovated and made disabled-accessible 100 apartments for the money it has spent in legal fees in the case.

But Andrew D. Freeman, an attorney for Brown, Goldstein & Levy, said the fees paid to lawyers for public housing residents was necessitated by the city's lethargy in complying with the terms of the partial consent decree that was negotiated in 1996.

Under the terms of the decree that allowed the old family public housing high-rises to be redeveloped as mixed-income communities, the city and the federal government agreed to provide some 2,200 units for public housing residents in mostly white middle-class areas of the city and the suburbs by the end of 2002.

By that time, however, just 68 units had been provided, Freeman said. As of this past summer, about 800 units had been provided through a combination of special housing vouchers and renovated construction - "still a long way short," Freeman said.

"If the city had spent that much money to comply with the partial consent decree, there wouldn't be the need for all the lawyers," Freeman said.

Federal law allows plaintiffs who prevail in civil rights cases against government entities to recover legal fees and expenses. Plaintiffs are generally considered to have prevailed in cases in which consent decrees are negotiated, even if there are no admissions of wrongdoing by the government.

The legal fees stem from a lawsuit filed in January 1995 by the ACLU on behalf of black city public housing residents against the city, its public housing agency and HUD.

The lawsuit charged that the city and the federal government had unlawfully perpetuated the segregated system of public housing they had set up in the 1930s and 1940s. The suit alleged that their failure had consigned public housing residents to live in the city's most distressed neighborhoods.

In January 2005, U.S. District Court Judge Marvin J. Garbis ruled that HUD had violated fair housing laws by not taking a regional approach to provide opportunities for black public housing residents to live outside poor, segregated neighborhoods.

Garbis absolved the city and its housing authority of wrongdoing.

In March, Garbis heard two weeks of testimony in the second phase of the trial designed to craft a remedy for HUD's violation.

Lawyers for public housing residents asked Garbis to order the federal housing agency to provide 6,750 special housing vouchers and new and rehabilitated units over 10 years, mostly in well-off suburbs of the city. Lawyers for HUD countered that Garbis did not have the authority to order the creation of new housing and said the plaintiffs' proposal was "plagued with problems."

Garbis, who heard both phases of the trial without a jury, has yet to issue a remedy ruling.

Freeman said he expects HUD to appeal any remedy ruling by Garbis - as well as his finding of liability - to the U.S. 4th Circuit Court of Appeals.

If Garbis' decisions are upheld, the ACLU and Freeman's firm could ask the court to order the federal government to pay legal fees for the trial phases of the case as well as the monitoring of the consent decree.

Asked how much those fees might be, Freeman said: "A lot."

"Everything about this case has been strenuously contested by the United States and required a lot of legal work to overcome," Freeman said.

In addition to the nearly $300,000 that is being paid in the latest installment of fees, lawyers for public housing residents are seeking $170,688 from the city and federal government related to the enforcement of the partial consent decree, according to documents filed last month.

The documents also say that payments to lawyers for public housing residents for monitoring the partial consent decree will be at rates of at least $337.50 an hour for lawyers and $110 an hour for paralegals.

In a 2001 decision granting initial payment of legal fees to lawyers for public housing residents, U.S. Magistrate Judge Paul W. Grimm acknowledged that the "requirement to pay a substantial attorney's fee award means that the funds must come from other agencies and programs."

But he added that "without the ability to award attorney's fees to parties that successfully have brought civil rights litigation against government agencies, these lawsuits simply will not be filed, and illegal discrimination will not be exposed and stopped."

Chino Prison Remains Locked Down (LAT)

By Joe Mozingo, Times Staff Writer.

The Los Angeles Times, January 2, 2007

Officials assess security after a brawl involving 200 inmates leaves seven hospitalized. The racial riot doesn't appear to be gang related.

The weekend riot at Chino state prison erupted after two inmates — a Latino and an African American — began fighting in a recreation yard, and others, watching from surrounding dormitories, followed suit, clashing along racial lines that have racked the state prison system for decades, prison officials said Sunday.

About 200 inmates took part in the 90-minute riot Saturday morning, out of the more than 1,000 inmates housed in the dorms where the fighting occurred, said prison spokesman Lt. Mark Hargrove.

"We believe it was just a spontaneous thing that occurred after the fight on the yard," he said. The prison, on 2,500 acres of land abutting the Chino Hills in Riverside County, remained on lockdown Sunday as officials assessed security.

Investigators have no information that the Mexican Mafia prison gang was behind the attack, or that it was meant to precipitate a race war in the prison system, Hargrove said. Wardens across the state were told to monitor activities closely, but only Chino was locked down.

Of the 27 inmates taken to hospitals Saturday, 20 were released back to Chino. The prisoner thought to be the most seriously injured suffered a stab wound, a broken jaw and a laceration to the head, and was recovering in the prison hospital.

Corrections officials said they had cleaned up much of the mess by Sunday. A majority of the windows in the five dorms were shattered, Hargrove said.

"They were throwing shards of glass," he said.

Guards also discovered that inmates had fashioned six weapons from the glass — pointed pieces partially wrapped in cloth for a handle.

Experts have warned that the severe overcrowding in the state's prison system heightens the racial tensions. Built in 1941 for 3,160 inmates, the California Institute for Men in Chino now holds more than twice that.

The medium-security facility where the riot occurred — Reception Center West — has 1,381 prisoners in five dormitories.

Hargrove said prisoners are not normally separated by race in that facility — except after a riot like Saturday's. The facility is 27% black, 31% white, 39% Latino.

Of the 27 injured, 24 were African American, including all seven of those still hospitalized.

Officials said the riot did not have the markings of prison gang activity, particularly since it occurred during visiting hours. "That's how they get their contraband," Hargrove said. "They don't disrupt visiting hours."

Racial violence has beset the California prison system since the 1970s, when gangs like the Mexican Mafia, the Black Guerrilla Family and the Aryan Brotherhood fought for power. Last month in Chino, officers put down a fight between 60 black and Latino inmates in an eating area.

In September 2005, a clash between 270 black and Latino prisoners there left one critically injured. That January, a guard was stabbed to death.

In recent years, racial fighting has also erupted in the Los Angeles County jail system. In February, more than 2,000 inmates at the Pitchess Detention Center in Castaic went on a rampage that left one dead and 50 injured. A black inmate was killed in Men's Central Jail downtown in a racially motivated fight the next week.

And at Pitchess in July, 16 inmates received minor injuries in two brief fights between 1,600 black and Latino inmates.

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has proposed spending $10.9 billion to add 78,000 beds to state prisons and county jails.

Second Thoughts On Gays In The Military (NYT)

By JOHN M. SHALIKASHVILI

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

TWO weeks ago, President Bush called for a long-term plan to increase the size of the armed forces. As our leaders consider various options for carrying out Mr. Bush's vision, one issue likely to generate fierce debate is "don't ask, don't tell," the policy that bars openly gay service members from the military. Indeed, leaders in the new Congress are planning to re-introduce a bill to repeal the policy next year.

As was the case in 1993 — the last time the American people thoroughly debated the question of whether openly gay men and lesbians should serve in the military — the issue will give rise to passionate feelings on both sides. The debate must be conducted with sensitivity, but it must also consider the evidence that has emerged over the last 14 years.

When I was chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, I supported the current policy because I believed that implementing a change in the rules at that time would have been too burdensome for our troops and commanders. I still believe that to have been true. The concern among many in the military was that given the longstanding view that homosexuality was incompatible with service, letting people who were openly gay serve would lower morale, harm recruitment and undermine unit cohesion.

In the early 1990s, large numbers of military personnel were opposed to letting openly gay men and lesbians serve. President Bill Clinton, who promised to lift the ban during his campaign, was overwhelmed by the strength of the opposition, which threatened to overturn any executive action he might take. The compromise that came to be known as "don't ask, don't tell" was thus a useful speed bump that allowed temperatures to cool for a period of time while the culture continued to evolve.

The question before us now is whether enough time has gone by to give this policy serious reconsideration. Much evidence suggests that it has.

Last year I held a number of meetings with gay soldiers and marines, including some with combat experience in Iraq, and an openly gay senior sailor who was serving effectively as a member of a nuclear submarine crew. These conversations showed me just how much the military has changed, and that gays and lesbians can be accepted by their peers.

This perception is supported by a new Zogby poll of more than 500 service members returning from Afghanistan and Iraq, three quarters of whom said they were comfortable interacting with gay people. And 24 foreign nations, including Israel, Britain and other allies in the fight against terrorism, let gays serve openly, with none reporting morale or recruitment problems.

I now believe that if gay men and lesbians served openly in the United States military, they would not undermine the efficacy of the armed forces. Our military has been stretched thin by our deployments in the Middle East, and we must welcome the service of any American who is willing and able to do the job.

But if America is ready for a military policy of nondiscrimination based on sexual orientation, the timing of the change should be carefully considered. As the 110th Congress opens for business, some of its most urgent priorities, like developing a more effective strategy in Iraq, share widespread support that spans political affiliations. Addressing such issues could help heal the divisions that cleave our country. Fighting early in this Congress to lift the ban on openly gay service members is not likely to add to that healing, and it risks alienating people whose support is needed to get this country on the right track.

By taking a measured, prudent approach to change, political and military leaders can focus on solving the nation's most pressing problems while remaining genuinely open to the eventual and inevitable lifting of the ban. When that day comes, gay men and lesbians will no longer have to conceal who they are, and the military will no longer need to sacrifice those whose service it cannot afford to lose.

Finding The Source (WP)

The Washington Post, January 2, 2007

IT SEEMS AS though the midterm elections were held longer ago than November. So it's understandable -- particularly with the start of a new year -- that there is a tendency to want to move on. But it would be wrong to let such impatience decide the case of the disputed election for Florida's 13th Congressional District seat.

A mere 369 votes decided the race in favor of Republican Vern Buchanan, but there was an unusually high number of undervotes, or instances in which no vote was recorded. Reviews thus far suggest a poorly designed ballot as one possible culprit, but there also were troubling voter reports of machine malfunctions. While post-election tests revealed no equipment problems, there has been no definitive finding, and suspicions have arisen about this hotly contested race. It's also fast become part of the national debate on whether electronic voting can be trusted.

Christine Jennings, the losing Democratic candidate, and a group of Florida voters went to court with a simple request that could have cleared up the mystery. They sought access to the voting machines' "source code" so that an outside expert could conduct an independent review under strict conditions set by a court monitor. Unfortunately, a Florida judge denied the request last week, partly because the information is proprietary.

More than a winning commercial formula is at stake here. Hopefully the appeals court will see that the public good would be well served by getting to the bottom of this case. If not, the dispute is headed for what probably will be a very ugly -- and ultimately unsatisfying -- outcome in the House of Representatives.

ANTITRUST:

AT& T-BellSouth Deal Called 'Breakthrough' For Consumers (USAT)

By Leslie Cauley

USA Today, January 2, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0111075

The Federal Communications Commission's handling of the $85 billion AT&T-BellSouth merger sets a "new baseline" for protecting the interests of consumers, FCC Commissioner Jonathan Adelstein said in an interview over the weekend.

The FCC's approval of the merger on Friday allowed the deal to close immediately. To secure the FCC's blessing, AT&T agreed to a list of consumer-friendly concessions. Among them: For the next 30 months, AT&T agreed to sell "naked" DSL — meaning consumers don't have to buy any other service from AT&T to get the DSL service — for just $19.95 a month. That's less than half the $44.95 that AT&T now charges.

AT&T also agreed to a "net neutrality" provision that will require the company to treat all broadband services, its own as well as rivals', equally for the next two years. That means AT&T can't favor its own traffic, in terms of transmission speed and quality.

In addition, AT&T agreed to sell some unused wireless spectrum. That could enable a new rival to enter the market, creating more options for consumers.

Adelstein called the settlement a "breakthrough" for consumers in that it establishes a new standard of behavior for the USA's communications giants. Big companies such as AT&T and Comcast "have told the FCC that they can't live with a net neutrality provision in place," Adelstein said. "They can."

The fact that AT&T agreed to such an aggressive net neutrality clause proves that, he said.

Though the settlement applies only to AT&T, other companies will be hard-pressed to ignore it, says Gene Kimmelman, public policy director of Consumers Union. "There will be enormous scrutiny of any company that does not live by these standards."

The concession on naked DSL is significant, Kimmelman says, because it will permit consumers to buy DSL and phone services from different companies without being financially penalized. Right now, he notes, AT&T charges as much for naked DSL as it does for DSL and phone combined.

The terms of the settlement were opposed by FCC Chairman Kevin Martin. A Republican, Martin had favored approving the deal with no conditions. He was joined by the FCC's other Republican, setting up a 2-2 deadlock with Adelstein and the other Democratic commissioner, Michael Copps.

The lesson? "If you hang tough and stand up for consumers, you can win," Adelstein says.

Martin had initially hoped to break the FCC's 2-2 deadlock by securing the vote of Robert McDowell, the FCC's third Republican. McDowell had essentially recused himself from voting because a trade group he used to work for had opposed the merger. But that plan ran aground last month when McDowell, freed up to vote by the FCC's general counsel, refused to vote, citing the same ethics conflict.

Adelstein, who was criticized by AT&T for holding up the transaction, says he would have been willing to give AT&T "the exact same deal" a month earlier, if AT&T had offered it. Instead, AT&T declared an impasse and pinned its hopes on a McDowell vote.

The final terms of the $85 billion transaction, the largest telecommunications deal in U.S. history, underscored the key role of the FCC. The agency is charged by Congress with looking out for the interests of consumers, Adelstein noted.

He says companies that approach the FCC in the future looking for merger approvals should keep in mind that "our job is to look out for the public interest, not the interests of the companies we oversee."

Net Discrimination (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 2, 2007

The two Democrats on the Federal Communications Commission finally let the AT&T-BellSouth merger proceed last week, though not without some major political rent-seeking. AT&T CEO Edward Whitacre had to agree to follow "Net neutrality" mandates for two years -- after having once said that such a policy would be "nuts."

He was right the first time. But that's a matter between him and his shareholders, and perhaps Mr. Whitacre anticipates that after two years he will be able to return to charging market prices for the use of his broadband pipeline. He'd better hope that the policy precedent set by his merger concession doesn't become a battering ram for Congress to make Net neutrality permanent. In the meantime, he gets full control of Cingular Wireless, which is where much of the telecom action now is.

The more important question in this episode is political: Have we been watching a return of the Old Democratic habit of using rhetoric about "equity" and "justice" as a front for carrying water for certain business interests over others?

Net neutrality travels under the euphemism of "nondiscrimination," which sounds very nice. But what it really means in practice is that the government dictates what AT&T and other Internet access companies can charge users of their pipelines. So there's "discrimination," all right -- against the companies that have invested billions to lay that pipe.

The beneficiaries of this discrimination are Google, Microsoft, Yahoo and other very rich Web businesses, which have loaded up on Beltway lobbyists to have these mandates imposed. Democrats are taking the PAC money and running interference. The Democratic Commissioners -- Jonathan Adelstein and Michael Copps -- were able to extort this concession from AT&T because one of the three GOP Commissioners recused himself from voting on the merger under pressure from Democrats on Capitol Hill. It was a nasty game of bad cop-worse cop, and it is probably a portent of things to come.

The one thing no one should be deceived about is that this ambush has anything to do with "consumers." Internet users will benefit most from the rapid rollout of broadband, which requires letting companies get a return on their investment. Net neutrality is all about imposing price controls that shake down one corporate player for the benefit of another.

Franchise Freedom (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 2, 2007

And speaking of the FCC (see above), we think it deserves full marks for its ruling last month that will make it easier for phone companies to enter the cable television business. The usual suspects are crying foul, but this is a decision that really will help millions of consumers who are currently paying cable rates dictated by anticompetitive video franchise agreements.

For decades the incumbent cable TV providers enjoyed a virtual monopoly in most markets. Of late, the Bells have been attempting to crash this party with their own video offerings, but they're facing all kinds of barriers to entry. At the behest of the cable industry, county commissions, city governments and other so-called local franchising authorities have slow-rolled approval or made unrelated demands -- such as the construction of a public swimming pool, parking garage or in-kind cash payments -- a condition for allowing phone companies to offer cable.

With some 30,000 local communities out there for the Bells to win over, all this nickel-and-diming adds up. So do all the delays. Verizon reports that, of its franchise negotiations currently pending, more than half have been ongoing for at least 18 months and more than 80% have lasted at least a year.

The FCC's action is an attempt to streamline this process and eliminate the shake-downs that municipalities have been using to circumvent the 5% franchise fee cap. Under the new rules, states and local authorities must complete negotiations within 90 days. They also won't be allowed to impose "unreasonable" build-out requirements, such as demanding that phone companies offer their services everywhere that cable firms do within months of being granted a franchise agreement. We'd just as soon see such requirements scrapped altogether -- after all, the Bells are entering a competitive market with no guarantee of success -- but this is a step in the right direction.

In places where traditional cable providers do face competition from phone companies, rates are falling. According to FCC Chairman Kevin Martin, studies by his agency as well as the Government Accounting Office have "concluded that the average monthly cable rate is significantly lower only in areas with another wire-based competitor."

In the wake of the FCC's party-line 3-2 ruling, in which the agency's two Democrats dissented, the cable lobby is complaining that phone companies are receiving preferential treatment. Democratic Commissioner Jonathan Adelstein told reporters that the decision "undermines" local authority, by which he means poaching by thousands of local politicians.

In fact, it's the local franchising authorities who have been undermining competition by protecting incumbents. And the cable industry's complaints are unpersuasive at best. Cable companies have marched right into the telephony market, making it more competitive, without facing the regulatory hurdles they want kept in place to prevent video competition from the Bells. Far from playing favorites, the new FCC rules aim to make the telecom playing field more level. They were long overdue.

Lawsuit Filed Over Hard Rock Auction (FT)

By James Politi

Financial Times, January 2, 2007

The Seminole tribe's acquisition of the Hard Rock Cafe was plunged into controversy when Cordish, a US real estate developer, filed a lawsuit claiming it was shut out of the auction for the restaurant chain.

Cordish submitted documents to a Florida court late on Friday alleging that Hard Rock and Hamish Dodds, its chief executive, colluded with the Native American tribe to reduce competition in exchange for assurances that Mr Dodds would continue to run the company after the deal.

Baltimore-based Cordish said it had repeatedly expressed an interest in bidding but was denied access to Hard Rock's books for due diligence. The developer has already filed a suit against Merrill Lynch, the investment bank that ran the auction on behalf of Rank, the British gaming group that owns Hard Rock.

The move by Cordish comes as Rank shareholders prepare to meet next week to vote on the sale of Hard Rock for $965m.

The outcome is far from clear, after some analysts expressed disappointment with the price obtained in the deal.

Rank shares have fallen nearly 15 per cent since the transaction was announced in early December.

DOJ_NMG_0111077

A spokesman for both Hard Rock and Mr Dodds declined to comment on the litigation. A spokesman for the Seminole tribe also declined to comment.

At the time the deal was announced, Ian Burke, Rank chief executive, said: "We have maximised the value of Hard Rock through this disposal following a thorough strategic review and competitive auction."

According to people familiar with the matter, the Seminole bid won the auction ahead of Permira, Apollo and TDR Capital, three private equity groups also involved in the process.

Although it is common for shareholders to file suits against companies claiming that they might not have maximised value, it is far less common for a rival bidder to claim it was unfairly excluded from an auction.

ENVIRONMENT:

Arlington Takes On Global Warming (WP)

By Annie Gowen

The Washington Post, January 2, 2007

Arlington County will buy more wind-generated electricity, give tax breaks for hybrid cars, require new public buildings to be green-certified and hand out energy-efficient light bulbs to residents as part of a major push toward reducing greenhouse gas emissions, county officials said yesterday.

The county has reduced carbon dioxide and other emissions -- making its buildings more energy-efficient and adding hybrid vehicles to its fleets -- by a total of 2.6 percent since 2000, but must now sharply increase its efforts in order to reach its goal of a 10 percent reduction in the next five years, Arlington County Board Chairman Paul Ferguson (D) said yesterday.

Ferguson, who has served on the board since 1996, was elected chairman yesterday during the county's traditional New Year's Day meeting, which tends to be a largely ceremonial event and holiday gathering for local politicos.

Board member Walter Tejada (D) was elected the board's vice chairman.

The county's move won quick praise from local environmentalists.

Mike Tidwell, director of the Chesapeake Climate Action Network, said that such a comprehensive push to reduce emissions was unusual for the region and a first in Northern Virginia. Tidwell noted, however, that other jurisdictions are also making strides; Montgomery County already buys far more wind power than Arlington.

"It's a fantastic initiative that leads through example," said Tidwell, whose nonprofit organization tracks such efforts across the region. "It's a good start and a positive start. They're doing a lot of the right things."

Ferguson, who previously served as chairman in 1999 and 2003, said he was inspired to launch the environmental initiative after seeing Al Gore's recent documentary, "An Inconvenient Truth."

"Our climate is changing, and that change is causing harm," Ferguson said. "The question is, what can each of us do to slow the trend and eventually reverse it?"

The board's plan calls for the county to increase the amount of wind power it buys from 3 percent to 5 percent and to give residents who buy hybrid cars a break on their personal property taxes, an unusual perk for a Virginia locality.

The county will refit one or two county buildings with solar technology and require all new major public buildings to be green-certified. Officials said the county will plant 1,200 trees this year and hand out 2,000 fluorescent light bulbs at local fairs and other events. They'll pay for 20 Arlingtonians to get energy-efficiency audits of their houses.

What this will cost is unknown. Ferguson has launched his plan in a year when Arlington will be stretched financially. Like other jurisdictions in Northern Virginia, the county is expecting a budget shortfall next fiscal year because of a decline in revenue growth caused by the downturn in housing values.

Arlington's revenue gap is about $20 million.

"We are going to face a difficult budget," Ferguson said of the coming year. "We have had a flattening in the real estate market . . . we will not be able to do everything."

But he said the environmental initiative will not be costly. He estimated it would entail about $5 million in upgrades to municipal buildings, which he said will be recouped in lower utility costs. Other costs -- such as for the energy audits and light bulbs -- will be less than $100,000, he predicted.

The county of about 200,000 has long considered itself eco-friendly, from the macro perspective (a "smart growth" strategy that clusters development around Metro stations, encouraging use of public transit) to the micro (an obsession with the county's "tree canopy").

As newly elected board vice chairman, Tejada, one of the few elected Latino officials in the state, said that in the coming year he would spearhead new efforts to reach out to immigrant communities. Those include more voter registration drives and a series of citizenship workshops aimed at legal permanent residents who might want to become citizens but who feel intimidated by the process, Tejada said.

Saving Salton Sea (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 2, 2007

THE SALTON SEA is an accident of man and an insult to nature, an artificial lake so rank that its rotten-eggs odor often overwhelms its sparkle, an unnatural blunder with too much salt and too many dead fish. It must be saved.

If only it were that easy. The lake, created in 1905 when a badly built canal diverted Colorado River water to a depression in the desert straddling Riverside and Imperial counties, is drying up and in danger of extinction. Yet if the Salton Sea were to dry up entirely, the ensuing dust storms would pollute the Coachella Valley air with toxins now underwater. The sea also is a habitat for an endangered species of fish and a vital stopping ground for 400 species of birds.

California soon must decide what to do about the accidental lake. In 10 years, it will lose half its inflow when more Colorado River water is shifted from agricultural to urban areas. The state is required to come up with options to save the Salton Sea, and it offers 10 possible solutions in a recent report, ranging from very expensive to ludicrously expensive. Even the "no action" option costs close to $1 billion because the state is required by law to protect air quality and provide a way for the endangered desert pupfish to get from one river to another. Other options cost almost $6 billion.

The higher-priced choices are the dreams of some local boosters, who long for a deep-water lake to boost property values and support a once-thriving tourism industry. This would require building a dam or huge berm, which would cost a fortune and carry a steep environmental price, including quarrying a nearby mountain. California taxpayers don't have spare billions to lavish on a man-made water park in the desert, and the state has a responsibility not to create new environmental messes in the process of fixing old ones.

Both environmentalists and Imperial Valley farmers have more reasonable, less costly proposals. They include simple dirt berms and shallow wetlands that keep most dust at bay, take care of the pupfish and provide the birds with a habitat.

The state should stick to the least expensive plan that will take care of environmental needs. (The public can comment until Jan. 16 by sending an e-mail to saltonseacomments@water.ca.gov.) If local interests want a recreational lake, they can design an environmentally sound berm — and support a local bond to pay for it.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

War On Meth, No. 2 Story Of '06 (GJS)

Grand Junction Sentinel, December 31, 2006

Local law enforcement agencies and the Drug Enforcement Administration made a decisive blow against the methamphetamine epidemic when they arrested 31 local methamphetamine dealers and runners between January and March.

The arrests effectively crushed western Colorado's largest meth distribution network to date, which by some estimates provided more than 70 percent of Mesa County's methamphetamine.

The toppling of the ring was voted the No. 2 local news story of 2006 by Daily Sentinel staffers.

The ring, described by DEA Agent Tom Gorman and other members of the Western Colorado Joint Drug Task Force as a "sophisticated" operation, trafficked methamphetamine from around the region.

The ring's methamphetamine operation was credited with fueling, in part, the surging number of drug and property crimes that have plagued Grand Junction and its surrounding communities in recent years.

At the meth ring leader's sentencing hearing, Chief District Judge David Bottger told 45-year-old Stephen Parsons he was amazed by the evidence of how expansive the Grand Junction man's criminal network was.

"It seems clear to me that Mr. Parsons was the head of the largest and most extensive methamphetamine sales and distribution business I've ever seen in Mesa County," Bottger said.

Parsons was sentenced to 24 years in a Colorado prison in October.

And on the heels of Parsons, a number of other meth ring members have received similarly long sentences, including:

Ashley King, who was involved in a shootout with sheriff's deputies last winter, was sentenced in November to 17 years in prison for her role as a meth ring dealer.

Eric "Sky" Redman, 30, an alleged drug enforcer who shot himself in the hand while he was being wiretapped by the drug task force, received 15 years in prison in November.

Tammy Bauer, 34, who trucked pounds of methamphetamine to Grand Junction from Arizona, received a 12-year prison sentence in October for her role in enabling the meth ring.

Crystal Plumlee, 21, who worked as a dealer for Parsons in addition to her own clients, was sentenced to 12 years in prison in October after pleading guilty to conspiracy to distribute a controlled substance.

But just as the meth ring bust proved a highpoint for local law enforcement, it proved a burden on the local court system.

Methamphetamine, according to Mesa County prosecutors and judges, has placed extreme pressure on the court system. From 1990 to 2005, when methamphetamine transitioned from a niche drug to the most widespread, dangerous drug on the Western Slope, the number of felony cases in the court system quadrupled while the number of judges remained the same.

Fueled by the county's meth epidemic, the number of Mesa County felony cases exploded from 506 cases in 1990 to 2,223 cases last year.

The surging, meth-fueled caseload has outpaced the county's population growth by a factor of 10, according an analysis of figures obtained from the Mesa County District Attorney's Office and the U.S. Census Bureau.

In other words, while the county's population grew by 32 percent from 1990 to 2005, the number of felony cases has risen 339 percent.

Bottger said this fall that the meth-fueled, rising caseload has made court time an elusive reality, forcing civil cases and other non-criminal cases off the docket.

The result, he said, has been that civil plaintiffs and even some criminal defendants have opted to strike a deal with each other or prosecutors instead of awaiting their day in court.

"I like to think that we've maintained a high standard of justice by adding some new judicial officers and by working hard," Bottger said, "but I don't know to what extent litigants' ability to get court time has forced them to compromise on cases they might not otherwise want to compromise on."

In that sense, Bottger said, "justice delayed is justice diminished."

But as a burden upon the legal system, Mesa County's top prosecutor said the widespread coverage of the meth ring in the media — from the bust through the end of the year — has proven the biggest coup against the methamphetamine epidemic.

Mesa County District Attorney Pete Hautzinger said the toppling of the ring was far and away the most significant strike local law enforcement made against methamphetamine trafficking.

But beyond cutting off the local supply of the drug for the subsequent three months, Hautzinger said the bust's media coverage provided the county with a powerful tool in prevent other meth casualties.

"When we make a bust like that, (local media) throwing 31 mug shots on the front page of the newspaper helps with the prevention and intervention prongs" of our efforts, Hautzinger said.

In addition to the day-one coverage, Hautzinger said he hoped the continued coverage of the suspects from the case and their stories has helped discourage others from embarking down the path to methamphetamine addiction.

That, Hautzinger said, will be lasting impact of local law enforcement's efforts. Even as other dealers rush in to fill the methamphetamine supply "vacuum," perhaps a few people will think twice before mainlining the drug.

More Than 130,000 Pot Plants Destroyed In Washington This Year (AP)

AP, December 30, 2006

TACOMA, Wash. - As 2006 draws to a close, drug-enforcement officials in Washington say they have destroyed more than 130,000 marijuana plants this year as part of a joint state and federal eradication effort.

AP photo

Marijuana plants growing in an illegal operation.

The federal Drug Enforcement Administration says that's nearly the same as last year, when a record 135,000 plants were destroyed.

This year's seizures have led to more than 340 arrests and 190 weapons seizures.

Officials attribute the number of destroyed plants both to outdoor growers who frequently use public lands, and to drug traffickers moving their indoor growing operations from Canada to Washington as they try to avoid tightened border security.

Agents say growers have dammed streams, clear-cut forest lands, used large quantities of insecticide and killed wildlife to aid outdoor drug-growing operations.

Hard Year For Smokers, Dog Lovers (WT)

Wyoming Tribune, December 31, 2006

2006 was a great year for fans of clean air, a sad year for dog lovers and a year that marked some significant events in the Cheyenne area.

Among them was the breakup of a methamphetamine ring and the discovery that a trash-to-energy proposal for the city of Cheyenne was perhaps not what it had seemed to be.

The Wyoming Tribune-Eagle newsroom staff reviewed the year in news, and this is the list that resulted.

Voting took place in mid-December, so the back-to-back snowstorms that dumped more than 20 inches of snow, snarled pre-holiday activities and broke a December snowfall record that had stood since 1913 was not on the list to consider.

1: Smoking ban clears

the air in Cheyenne

Months after the Cheyenne City Council put a citywide smoking ban in place, the city's population is still split on the matter.

Cheyenne Mayor Jack Spiker said recently that he's convinced in a year the health of Cheyenne residents will be improved thanks to the ban.

"We'll be able to measure the benefit in fewer heart attacks," Spiker said, "but I am sure some people would disagree."

When city officials launched the smoking ban proposal, they weren't the first body in the region to do so. Laramie had already instituted a ban, and a statewide ban was being discussed in Colorado. A statewide smoking ban had been considered briefly by Wyoming lawmakers in 1999, but the idea was dismissed.

That didn't save city officials from a firestorm of criticism from smokers and those who serve them; they claimed a smoking ban would harm their business or cause them to close completely.

Even so, city elected officials approved the ban in June but delayed the effective date until mid-August to allow opponents time to gather signatures to put the ban to a citywide vote.

Rich Gibbs, of the political action committee Cheyenne Coalition for Citizens Rights, said he supported the ballot initiative because it would give city residents a chance to decide on what kind of laws they wanted to live by.

"This isn't about smoking. It isn't about economics," he said.

At least 2,767 signatures were required to be submitted by the end of June to the Cheyenne City Clerk's Office. That number is 10 percent of the city residents who are registered to vote. In all, 3,403 signatures were collected, but only 1,876 belonged to verified city voters.

Business owners were convinced their business would fall off after the ban. The results of a study to be released in late 2007 that may confirm their beliefs, but a study done by the Wyoming Survey and Analysis Center at the University of Wyoming and commissioned by the Substance Abuse Division of the state Department of Health completed after Laramie officials banned smoking in public places showed no economic impact.

The ban caused at least one business to change direction. The owners of the Outlaw Saloon and Rockin' Rodeo decided to consolidate operations to the Rockin' Rodeo location on South Greeley Highway, which is outside city limits, and rename that establishment the Outlaw Saloon.

"Business has been good," co-owner Suzy Hein said at the end of the year. "I was nervous about closing the Outlaw on East Lincolnway because we'd been there so long."

Hein said she still doesn't like the ban because people should be able to choose what they want, especially in a nightclub.

"You have to be 21 to get into a nightclub. You are an adult, and you have the right to choose whether you will smoke. Some places had already gone smoke-free," Hein said. "Now we don't have that choice in Cheyenne."

2: Illness at Cheyenne Animal Shelter ends the lives of 42 dogs

At first the reports in early May were of an unspecified respiratory illness at the Cheyenne Animal Shelter.

Then the verdict came in: the highly contagious canine influenza was racing through the county pound and nearly all the dogs showed signs of infection. Shelter officials debated, and the decision was made to euthanize 42 stray dogs staying at the shelter.

That released a firestorm of debate and second-guessing that rocked Cheyenne and drew comments from surrounding states.

"If people want to blame me for the decision, that's fine," shelter director Allen Cohen said at the time. He had started his job only days before.

"I did the best I could with the information I had at the time and the support of the veterinary community that came to our meeting," Cohen said.

Canine influenza is a highly contagious disease with two forms - mild and severe. The mild form comes with a cough that can last 10 to 30 days. The severe form can result in high fevers and a pneumonia infection. The mortality rate of the disease, according to the American Veterinary Medical Association, is low, between 5 percent and 8 percent.

The early concerns were containing the influenza at the shelter and stopping infection of dogs in the community.

The decision to put the dogs down prompted the Concerned Citizens for the Humane Treatment of Animals to offer up a slate of suggestions to the publicly funded animal shelter, among them bringing back a membership system that would allow those who had paid their dues to elect shelter board members and developing a plan to deal with disease outbreaks in the shelter.

DOJ_NMG_0111081

Russ Mead, a representative from Utah's Best Friends Animal Society, a large no-kill shelter with members nationwide, said his group was using Cheyenne's decision to urge other shelters to develop procedures to deal with dog flu that doesn't involve putting animals down.

"We don't want killing an entire shelter population to be known as the Cheyenne solution," Mead said.

3: Trash-to-energy plan runs out of fuel

When Michael Spitzauer proposed demonstrating his trash-to-energy technology in Cheyenne, city officials were elated. Turning trash to something usable would mean that something valuable could come from refuse, and it could mean that Cheyenne could delay building a landfill with a price tag that is big and expected to only get bigger.

Spitzauer and his company, Green Power, brought a mobile trash conversion unit on a flatbed truck in June to Cheyenne, and city officials watched as trash was dumped in one end and diesel came out the other a mere three minutes later.

But questions about Spitzauer's past called a halt to the city's plan to sign a contract with the native Austrian. Under the deal, the city would have provided land and trash for the venture that Spitzauer said could transform the energy landscape.

An investigation by the Wyoming Tribune-Eagle showed that Spitzauer had a criminal past in his home country and was embroiled in a bankruptcy dispute with a separate company.

Court papers dating back more than five years show that Spitzauer had lied on his immigration form. The lie: that he had never been convicted of a crime. Spitzauer had served three years of a six-year fraud sentence in Austria. And after he was here, court papers also showed that prosecutors in Austria were trying to extradite him to answer questions in other fraud allegations. That attempt was eventually dropped.

Spitzauer denied serving the prison sentence in Austria, attributing the idea to a bad translation of court documents, but his own attorney admitted in court that Spitzauer had served the time.

While he said he had financing, the investment bank that had been backing him withdrew its support even before Spitzauer held his Cheyenne demonstration.

City officials put the decision to sign the contract on hold in late June, and Spitzauer withdrew his proposal from consideration.

4: Car chase breaks meth ring

A high-speed chase through west Cheyenne neighborhoods was unusual enough, but the one that started around 11 a.m. Jan. 20 would turn into so much more.

The people in the car had been under surveillance for drug activity. A traffic stop at West Lincolnway and Snyder Avenue for a minor traffic infraction, however, sparked the chase. It ranged north to Richardson Court, then reversed itself toward south Cheyenne. Along the way, gunshots were exchanged between people in the fleeing vehicle and a Laramie County sheriff's deputy.

The car chase turned to a foot chase and that turned into a four-hour standoff at a Hynds Avenue home in south Cheyenne before a teargas canister flushed a suspect, who was wounded in the leg and was armed with a .38-caliber handgun and an ounce of methamphetamine.

In all, four people were arrested that day. Among them was James Sali, who was arrested on suspicion of attempted first-degree murder.

The two men and one woman who had been with Sali had not been arrested, and Sali was being held on $500,000 bail.

By the end of March, the story had taken a turn. Sali was among those arrested for their roles in a drug ring that regularly ferried meth, guns and cash between Cheyenne and Denver.

"You're looking at a well-organized group that was prepared to defend themselves as Sali did," U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration public information officer Suzanne Halonen said.

Law enforcement officials arrested nine people in March in connection with the drug ring and were looking for three more people.

The suspects, Sali among them, had apparently been running the drug ring since the previous June. They traveled to the Denver area to pick up methamphetamine and sold it from homes and hotel rooms in Cheyenne. Some of the drug was sold within 1,000 feet of Alta Vista Elementary.

By May, the number of indictments issued in the case reached 18; by October, 21. At that point, Sali had seven counts pending against him, and he faces two counts of attempted first-degree murder of two Laramie County sheriff's deputies during the Jan. 20 chase.

Fifteen suspects had pleaded guilty in May, July, August and September. Five more were awaiting jury trials.

5: Lawmakers approve Hathaway Scholarship, roll out program

Wyoming voters enshrined a revolutionary education initiative in the Wyoming Constitution when they approved Amendment C by a nearly 3 to 1 margin.

DOJ_NMG_0111082

By doing that, voters decided that the endowment that funds the Hathaway Scholarship Program shall not be spent for other purposes.

That was the latest victory for advocates of higher education in Wyoming. Under the program, eligible high-school graduates across the state are able to tap a state-funded scholarship fund to help them pay for their educations at the University of Wyoming or the state's network of community colleges.

State lawmakers created the program in 2005, along with a trust fund whose income would pay for the scholarships. Originally envisioned to kick off in several years, the program got a jumpstart when Gov. Dave Freudenthal and state legislators decided to ramp-up filling the trust fund. The program's start date also was moved up to 2006.

"This is a beneficial, wonderful thing for the state," Patty Johnson said. She's among the state residents who were tracking the progress of the program. "It gives students something to strive for, and hopefully, it's a way to keep people in the state. It's one of the finest things I have heard of that we can use our money for."

For the past several years, Wyoming state government coffers have been filled with revenue from the energy industry, and lawmakers and state elected officials have been trying to figure out how to share that wealth with the state's residents.

That prompted a slew of questions of who would qualify for the program and how they would do it. The Education Merit Scholarship Committee pitched a list of specific requirements that students would have to meet to qualify for the Hathaway money. On the list are math, language arts, science, social studies and foreign language. Students entering the ninth grade in 2007 would have to meet these standards.

The scholarship committee also wants qualification tied to performance on Wyoming's statewide assessment test to be included. Both of these provisions are part of a draft bill that lawmakers will consider when the Legislature convenes Jan. 9.

6: A thousand votes return Barbara Cubin to U.S. House for a seventh term

When Rep. Barbara Cubin, R-Wyo., announced her bid for a seventh term representing Wyoming in the U.S. House of Representatives in June, she came out swinging against Democratic challenger Gary Trauner, accusing him of supporting "Hillarycare"-style health care and labeling him with liberal epithets.

By that time, Trauner, a Wilson businessman, had been knocking on doors across the state, introducing himself and asking for votes.

While Cubin had a primary challenger in retired Navy officer Bill Winney of Cheyenne, she seemed to reserve her money for the post-primary face-off with Trauner. Indeed, Cubin did win the Republican primary, but she lost in Laramie County and a couple of others.

Cubin's media campaign - as well as ads run on her behalf by the National Republican Congressional Committee - painted Trauner as an outsider whose ideas were wrong for Wyoming; several also touched on the fact that he was not a native Wyomingite. The ads, with their negative tone, focused on Trauner and did not address what Cubin had done for the state, nor what she promised to do.

For his part, Trauner did not engage in negative campaigning.

After polls closed on Election Day, Trauner carried a narrow lead over Cubin as votes were counted. He took most of the large-population counties in the state; he won Laramie County by a 70-30 margin.

But Cubin's conservative base stepped up for her; support for the incumbent representative was high in the more rural counties of the state, and that was enough to carry her to her narrowest victory in years.

The outcome of the race wasn't immediately apparent on Election Day. Some delays in reporting votes from part of Carbon County raised some doubt about the outcome. And the narrow margin raised questions about whether a recount would take place. Under Wyoming law, a recount is triggered when the difference in the number of votes between contenders is less that 1 percent of the total votes earned by the top vote-getter.

When the results were canvassed, the margin was wider than 1 percent, and Trauner declined to seek a recount.

7: Pipeline rupture kills one

The race to build natural-gas pipelines to export Wyoming and Colorado gas to power-hungry markets in the East turned deadly in November when a crew member working on the Rockies Express Pipeline on the Duck Creek Ranch south and west of Cheyenne apparently struck an existing pipeline operated by El Paso Corp. subsidiary Wyoming Interstate Co. with his bulldozer.

Around 9:30 a.m. Nov. 12, a Saturday, a fireball so large it could be seen more than 50 miles away in Colorado erupted from the break.

"It was wa-a-a-y above the power lines," Tyson Twitchell, son of ranch manager Frank Twitchell, said. "I've never seen a flame like that before. It was at least 300 feet high. At least."

The bulldozer driver, Bobby Ray Owens Jr., who worked for Associated Pipeline Contractors, was killed in the explosion. He had been grading a roadway at the explosion site.

DOJ_NMG_0111083

The Rockies Express Pipeline, being built by Kinder Morgan, is one of several gas transmission pipelines that crosses southeast Wyoming. The Wyoming Interstate pipeline that was breached had been in place for about two decades.

While the fireball was knocked down in about an hour, public safety officials were on the site all day, waiting for the temperature of the ground around the explosion site to drop to safe levels. Initial reports said the crew working on site with Owens was missing, but the seven crew members were accounted for later in the day.

El Paso Corp. rerouted natural gas around the site of the rupture. Natural-gas service to the Cheyenne area was not interrupted.

The explosion is under investigation by the U.S. Department of Transportation's Office of Pipeline Safety.

8: Murder and attempted suicide shine light on troubled marriage

Most people in Laramie County would never have known about the lives and troubled marriage of Willard and Lynaya Brown. That changed in the early hours of Aug. 15 when Cheyenne police say Willard Brown, 34, killed his 27-year-old wife, Lynaya, and tried to kill himself.

Lynaya Brown had called 911 at 1:12 a.m. to report a disturbance at the couple's east Cheyenne home. She said he had tackled her and was headed to the garage, where he kept his guns.

The dispatcher heard a scream and a loud noise. The call ended abruptly. When police arrived three minutes later, they found Lynaya Brown shot in the chest and Willard Brown lying in the garage, his face bleeding.

Lynaya was declared dead at the scene, and Willard was taken to the local hospital, where he was treated. He later was arrested and taken to a locked-down medical facility in Colorado.

Records show the couple had filed for divorce, citing irreconcilable differences, only about three weeks earlier.

An investigator's statement said Willard Brown had said he was sorry for killing his wife on the night of the shooting.

Brown pleaded not guilty in September. At Brown's preliminary hearing, his attorney said Brown's action was not premeditated; rather it was an act of passion driven by his belief that his wife was having affairs.

Brown's premeditated murder trial was scheduled for Dec. 21, but it has been postponed.

9: City Councilman Pete Laybourn relies on private investigator to protect his image

The strained relationship between Cheyenne City Councilman Pete Laybourn and his fellow elected city officials took a turn for the strange in May when Laybourn hired a private investigator to disprove allegations against Laybourn that the councilman termed false and malicious.

Two memos seem to have sparked Laybourn's ire: one in March 2005 from city attorney Mike Basom to Laybourn, which cites the councilman's "propensity to verbally attack staff" following an incident at a social event where Laybourn encountered assistant city attorney Claudia Angelos. Angelos later recounted a conversation during which she said Laybourn said he wanted to "utterly destroy" the city attorney's office.

In March, Mayor Jack Spiker sent a memo to City Council members that warned that Laybourn might be undermining city employees' ability to do their jobs. "Particularly troubling is the fact that (Laybourn) has made it his practice to bully and attack staff with increasing frequency," Spiker wrote.

In a column printed in the Wyoming Tribune-Eagle in early June, Laybourn recounted the findings of his investigator, former Fort Collins, Colo., police officer Frank Russell. Among them was the fact that no one interviewed could provide specifics about the date, time or location. And no official complaints about Laybourn's behavior were on file.

"Although not the darling of his peers, the evidence presented would not meet any legal standard of probable cause, let alone proof beyond a reasonable doubt," Laybourn wrote of Russell's report.

But the City Council was not content to let the matter rest there. In the middle of June, a divided City Council voted to censure Laybourn for his behavior, which included hiring the investigator. Also cited were Laybourn's use of city stationery for personal benefit, and using the city emblem without its trademark symbol in an advertisement he ran without permission.

A censure is a disciplinary action without much weight.

Laybourn voted against the censure, as did his fellow Ward 1 representatives, Councilwoman Judy Case and Councilman Jimmy Valdez, and Councilman Don Pierson. Pierson said he didn't condone Laybourn's actions, but the discipline should have been handled differently.

10: Food gets sales tax holiday for two years

What will Laramie County residents do with a little extra change in their pockets? They have two years to figure that out.

Early in 2006, lawmakers agreed to lift the sales tax on food bought at grocery stores in Wyoming for two years. The holiday took effect on July 1.

The vote by state lawmakers came after repeated attempts, led by Rep. Ann Robinson, D-Casper, over a decade to lift the tax. Wyoming is one of only a few states that was charging sales tax on food. Many consider it an extremely regressive tax because it affects people with low incomes more.

DOJ_NMG_0111084

"I would say this is the highlight of my legislative career," Robinson said at the time of the vote.

Not all food that's bought in grocery stores is subject to the holiday. Anything that's intended for immediate consumption is still taxed. But grocery items bought for later consumption are now tax-free.

Lifting the tax poses a more complicated problem - plugging the revenue shortfall to cities, towns and counties that depend on sales tax revenue to help pay their bills. The fourth penny of the statewide sales tax is distributed to municipalities. Fifth- and sixth-penny sales taxes are voted on at the county level and generate revenue to pay for local infrastructure and specific projects such as water treatment plants or county jails.

State lawmakers set aside $46.6 million to help make up for the losses to local governments. But state Revenue Department projections show that that amount may only cover a year.

Agent: Heroin Arrest May Point Increased Use In Region (AP)

AP, December 30, 2006

LOUISVILLE, Ky. - Heroin is re-emerging in the Louisville area, the result of Mexican drug-traffickers marketing to a new generation, federal authorities said.

Since July, a drug task force of federal and local police has confiscated more than two pounds of heroin with a street value of about $200,000, including two pounds recently in nearby Charlestown, Ind.

Such amounts were unheard of in recent years, Tony King, resident agent in charge of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration office in Louisville, told The Courier-Journal.

While Louisville police and health officials haven't seen a noticeable surge in the drug's use, King said the recent confiscations could foreshadow problems.

An annual National Drug Threat Assessment report released in October said Mexican heroin circulating in western states was spreading east of the Mississippi. It said abusers of opiates prescribed as painkillers, such as OxyContin, might be switching to heroin, as efforts to curb prescription-drug abuse take hold.

"Heroin took a back stage for a while," King said, "but now it's being marketed again to a new generation."

Before this year, heroin in the Louisville area "had all but disappeared," King said. The local drug task force didn't handle a single heroin trafficking case in 2005, he said. But this fall, three illegal Mexican immigrants were indicted on federal charges of participating in a heroin distribution conspiracy that carry a possible life sentence and deportation.

Seized in those arrests was "black tar heroin," so named because it looks like hot asphalt, said King, adding that it can be injected or smoked.

Janice Cunningham, a substance abuse supervisor for the Louisville Health Department, said its methadone clinic, where heroin addicts are treated, has not seen an increase in clients. But she noted an increase in younger heroin users - those 21 to 28 years old. The median age of the 186 addicts being treated at the clinic is 41, two years younger than in 2004, she said.

Across Kentucky, 274 people received treatment for heroin use in a state center in the year that ended Sept. 30, compared with 218 the previous year.

Heroin Is Returning To Area, Officials Say (LCJ)

By Kay Stewart, The Courier-Journal

Task force seized 3 pounds since July

Heroin is re-emerging in the Louisville area, the result of Mexican drug-traffickers marketing to a new generation, federal law-enforcement officials say.

"Heroin took a backstage for a while," King said, "but now it's being marketed again to a new generation."

Before this year, heroin in the Louisville area "had all but disappeared," King said. The local drug task force didn't handle a single heroin trafficking case in 2005, he said.

But this fall, three illegal Mexican immigrants, Omar Robles-Munguia, 28; Francisco Rodriguez-Lopez, 32; and Rogelio Garcia-Mendez, 34; all of Louisville, were indicted on federal charges of participating in a heroin distribution conspiracy that carry a possible life sentence and deportation.

Seized in those arrests was "black tar heroin," so named because it looks like hot asphalt, said King, adding that it can be injected or smoked.

An undercover officer arranged to purchase more than a pound of heroin for about $54,000 from Robles-Munguia in six transactions from July through October, according to affidavits.

Affidavits said undercover officers also observed the sale of small amounts to customers throughout the city.

In one undercover buy, two suspects stored heroin in small balloons they spit out of their mouths, an affidavit said. Each dose was selling for $20, King said. In other buys, larger quantities, wrapped in balls of black tape, were handed to officers.

The three were arrested Oct. 13 at The Summit shopping center in eastern Jefferson County during an undercover buy, according to the affidavits, after one of them complained about a van -- the DEA surveillance vehicle -- parked nearby.

In another Louisville case, Alejandro Robels-Gomez, 31, an illegal immigrant from Mexico who lived in Indianapolis, pleaded guilty Nov. 28 in U.S. District Court to heroin trafficking.

He faces five to 40 years in prison and deportation. Chief U.S. District Judge John Heyburn III has scheduled sentencing for March 6.

Robels-Gomez admitted possessing with the intent to distribute more than 50 grams of heroin with a street value of about $5,000 Aug. 12.

Lab results determined the heroin was 69 percent pure, Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Kilmartin said. Regional problem

Officials say heroin cases are increasing in Southern Indiana and Northern and Central Kentucky.

In Indianapolis, 12 defendants await trial in U.S. District Court on charges of participating in a major heroin distribution ring.

John Dowd, chief of the drug prosecution unit for the U.S. attorney's office in Southern Indiana, said it has prosecuted several heroin cases in the past three or four years.

"We probably hadn't done two or three heroin cases in the six or eight years before these most recent ones," he said.

On Nov. 21, 10 people from Clarksville, Ind., and two from Louisville were among 13 people facing federal charges of being involved in a drug ring stretching from Chicago to Atlanta. Officers found 2 pounds of heroin in a car trunk in Charlestown.

Most of the heroin seized in Charlestown was white powder labeled "China White," a type usually injected or snorted and imported from South America, the Middle East and eastern Asia, King said.

Dowd said the suspects, about half of whom are illegal immigrants from Mexico, already had been indicted under seal at the time of their arrests on drug-trafficking charges relating to cocaine and methamphetamine.

Jim Liles, director of the Northern Kentucky Drug Strike Force, composed of local law enforcement officers who police four counties, said they've seized more than 9 ounces of heroin this year, "more than in the last five years total."

Sgt. Ken Holstein of the Covington Police Department said arrested street prostitutes have had needle marks and had been using "not only crack but heroin. It is definitely back. There is no doubt." No synthetic reported

Capt. Don Burbrink of Louisville Metro Police narcotics, said its officers have seized amounts totaling less than a pound in the past year, mostly from individuals who had it for personal use.

There has been no report in the Louisville area of heroin containing fentanyl, a powerful synthetic opiate blamed for more than 100 deaths last year and earlier this year in several cities, including Chicago and Detroit, King said.

Janice Cunningham, a substance abuse supervisor for the Louisville Health Department, said its methadone clinic, where heroin addicts are treated, has not seen an increase in clients.

But she noted an increase in younger heroin users -- those 21 to 28 years old. The median age of the 186 addicts being treated at the clinic is 41, two years younger than in 2004, she said.

Across Kentucky, 274 people received treatment for heroin use in a state center in the year that ended Sept. 30, compared with 218 the previous year.

26 Memories Of 2006 (DS)

The Desert Sun, December 31, 2006

We'll remember a president's visit in April and the sorrowful passing of another in December. We celebrated La Quinta's miraculous football comeback and mourned the tragic death of a Col. Mitchell Paige Middle School student. We cheered Tony

Bennett, Madonna, Arnold Schwarzenegger, Nordstrom, Miss Teen USA the first day of schoo and James Cain, who managed to swim swam 11 miles across the Salton Sea. On the last day of the year, we reflect on 26 memories from 2006 that will be hard to forget.

We say goodbye to a national leader, local friend Residents across the valley and the globe bid farewell to 93-year-old former President Gerald R. Ford, who died on Dec. 26 at his home in Rancho Mirage.

Many valley residents said they'll remember Ford's sincerity and integrity, his desire to help with valley fundraising efforts, as well as his achievement to demonstrate to a nation rocked by the Watergate scandal and Vietnam War that the office of the presidency was still worthy of respect.

"He was a down-to-earth gentleman. He carried himself that way on and off the (golf) course," said John Foster, board member and president of the 2007 Bob Hope Chrysler Classic.

Madonna rocks Coachella stage Madonna was queen of the Coachella Valley Music and Arts Festival, helping to set a two-day attendance record in May.

The "Queen of Pop" emerged out of a disco ball with an ensemble of spacemen-like dancers in a black outfit and shades. She opened with her dance hit "Hung Up," which she sang to open the Grammy Awards in 2006.

'Amazing' evening with Tony Bennett Tony Bennett's singing magic was enough to sell out the 1,127-seat McCallum Theatre a month in advance of the Dec. 3 performance at ticket prices of $450 and $500 for the black-tie dinner/show package.

"Amazing," said Eve Fromberg of Rancho Mirage. "The people around me are a little older than me, but Tony Bennett is a star for my generation, and that's why they want to do duets with him.

"For him to come to our theater shows the growth of this theater and the growth of our valley. He's a once in a lifetime performer, like Sinatra."

Students join in national protest About 20,000 students skipped school in the valley as they supported a national day of immigrant protest over several days.

On May 2 at Thomas Jefferson Middle School in Indio, nearly 490 students stayed home, and roughly 260 attended. Instead of about 30 students finishing up a physical education class on the athletic field, about a dozen did.

Similar scenarios occurred across the valley.

School officials attributed the absences to the national "Day Without an Immigrant" boycott designed to illustrate how much the United States depends on immigrants.

"Across our district, we saw a significant impact on student attendance," said Jon Gaffney, assistant superintendent for personnel services at Desert Sands Unified School District.

Church asked to dim lights on cross The brightly lit cross on the hill at St. Margaret's Episcopal Church in Palm Desert garnered the spotlight when some residents began complaining.

It's an almost universal symbol of hope and spirituality, but the cross lit with 39 13-watt compact fluorescent bulbs on Highway 74 also has raised concerns about light pollution.

Some people who have complained to city officials contend it's too bright - especially in Palm Desert, where hillside lighting is a touchy and at times intensely debated subject.

"It's right smack dab in the middle of my view. ... It looks like a beer sign," said Stephen Thewlis, who lives near Cahuilla Hills Park. "A lot of people find solace in it, but for me it's a huge eyesore."

"It isn't too bright. ... It's a feature," said Brenda Osborne, who sees the cross as a beloved community landmark.. "We know we're home when we come back from anywhere."

The Lodge holds a garage sale Everything had to go during a liquidation sale at The Lodge at Rancho Mirage to make way for the new Ritz-Carlton Rancho Mirage.

Bedding, televisions and even bathroom sinks were among items sold to make way for a $330 million expansion project that is taking place on nearly 40 acres in the lower foothills of the Santa Rosa Mountains.

Not even the chandeliers went untouched. Travis Erwin of Indian Wells bought two for her daughter, who had her wedding reception at the hilltop hotel about 14 years ago.

"It's a lot of nostalgia. She was excited when I told her I was buying them," Erwin said.

Swimmer takes Salton Sea plunge James Cain did it - swam 11 miles across the Salton Sea and into the arms of his wife, Sally, on Aug. 13.

"God, I wonder what I was thinking," Cain said. "That was a long way."

About a dozen people - mostly curious tourists - applauded the 47-year-old Phoenix man after he emerged from the murky, smelly sea at Johnson's Landing.

Medical marijuana debate heats up at home Medicine or menace? The debate over legalized medicinal marijuana came to the valley's three dispensaries. Federal agents, armed with a warrant, searched a safe deposit box belonging to a Palm Desert medical marijuana dispensary in June, prompting accusations of harassment from the dispensary's owner.

"I don't have anything to hide," said Stacy Hochanadel, owner and operator of CannaHelp in Palm Desert. "I understand the nature of investigating, but rather than doing this behind my back, why don't they just ask me what they want to know?" he said.

A spokeswoman for the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's Los Angeles office declined to comment, citing an ongoing investigation.

Teen's suicide note raises Internet concerns Safety on the Internet at social networking sites such as MySpace.com and at sites like YouTube was of increasing concern to many valley parents.

At Col. Mitchell Paige Middle School in December, for example, parents gathered to discuss concerns that were heightened after Joshua Austin, a 15-year-old Palm Springs High School Student, committed suicide in November after posting a note to his friends on MySpace.

"All of a sudden, the parents here were just getting really alarmed," said Mitchell Paige Principal Derrick Lawson.

FBI Special Agent Mark Hunter of Palm Springs, who tracks online predators of prepubescent children, told parents at the meeting: "You've got to take control. An excuse is not 'I don't know anything about computers.' You've got to learn or you've got to get it out of the house."

Miss Teen USA contest comes to the desert Are you Miss Tennessee? Fifty-one young, attractive women fanned out across Palm Springs in August to introduce themselves and the city to the nation.

Out of all contestants in the Miss Teen USA 2006 competition from around the United States and the District of Columbia, Katie Blair, 18, of Billings, Mont., came away with the diamond and pearl Mikomoto crown.

When Blair walked off the stage and saw her reflection, she said, "It makes me feel like a beauty queen."

The televised event returned to the valley after a one-year stint in Baton Rouge, La.

Winning season for La Quinta During an amazing final six seconds, the La Quinta High School Blackhawks sandwiched an onside kick with two touchdowns for a 31-30 victory over Bloomington in the second round of the CIF-Southern Section football playoffs on Dec. 2.

The victory a gave La Quinta a measure of confidence to beat Silverado High School 23-21.

"If we can score twice in six seconds, we can score any time," said quarterback Ryan Woods, who threw the game-winning pass last week.

But when La Quinta High's football team stepped on to the field as the underdog against J.W. North High School in the CIF-Southern Section Eastern Division championship game, they lost 26-10.

KC Chiefs pick a local Jeff Webb, a 2001 graduate of La Quinta High School, broke down in tears on April 30 when the Kansas City Chiefs selected him in the sixth round of the NFL Draft.

"For real?" Webb said upon learning the news. "I made it?"

Webb became the third player from the valley, along with Ed White and George Thomas, to be drafted by an NFL team.

Webb then called his father, Jeffrey Smith, from the parking lot and let him in on the good news.

"I made the 53-man roster," Webb said. "Can you believe that?"

The Who rock Tennis Garden Pete Townshend and Roger Daltrey proved at the Indian Wells Tennis Garden on Nov. 12 that the legendary British rock band The Who is still a vital force in pop culture.

In the second major concert of the season at the Tennis Garden, the new, augmented Who mixed pieces and fragments of their latest concept album with classic Who hits such as "Who Are You" and "Behind Blue Eyes."

Governor's got love for valley During a whirlwind trip to Palm Springs on July 29, a confident Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger touted his record and exclaimed, "I love Palm Springs."

The governor shook hands with voters and stopped by Peabody's Cafe, The Desert Sun and Mizell Senior Center, one of many stops that would help ensure his victory over Democratic challenger State Treasurer Phil Angelides.

Nordstrom coming our way Local shoppers' longtime dreams for highly touted doting customer service, great shoes and high-end fashions will likely come true when the fast-growing Coachella Valley gets its first Nordstrom department store in spring 2009.

The Seattle based-retailer, which started as a shoe store in 1901 and grew into one of the industry's premier luxury brands with a reputation for personalized customer service, announced plans in February for a two-story, 149,000-square-foot store. It will be built on the north end of Westfield Palm Desert, replacing one of the buildings that now houses Macy's.

"What I love about Nordstrom is customer service. I never thought Nordstrom would come here," said Liz Burnach of Palm Desert. "If they come here, I pity the other stores. I'm happy they're coming. I think it would be nice if they upscale the mall."

Even the president visits President George Bush arrived on April 23 and raised nearly $2 million at a Republican Party fundraiser, when he announced, "Our message to the American people is, don't fear the future, because we intend to shape the future."

The visit was the first time since 1995 - when Bill Clinton played a round of golf at the Bob Hope Chrysler Classic - that a sitting president has visited the desert. Bush visited with former President Gerald R. Ford and first lady Betty Ford at their Rancho Mirage home.

Twentynine Palms Marine dies saving others For bravery under fire, and for saving two comrades from the 3rd Battalion, 7th Marine Regiment, Twentynine Palms, Marine Cpl. Jason Dunham was awarded the prestigious Medal of Honor on Nov. 11.

During an April 2004 battle in Iraq, near the Syrian border, an insurgent threw a hand grenade, and Dunham took one look and immediately threw his helmet on top, a book about the Marine later revealed.

The injuries Dunham sustained cost him his own life.

Tribe's gaming deal held up by Legislature A bid by the Agua Caliente Band of Cahuilla Indians of Palm Springs to more than double the number of slot machines in the tribe's casinos to 5,000 cleared the state senate but was rejected at the last minute by the state Legislature.

The tribe negotiated the revised gambling agreement with Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, who said the deal, at its maturity, would funnel $81.9 million a year from the gaming interest to California's General Fund.

Garcia in trouble over comments State Assemblywoman Bonnie Garcia, R-Cathedral City, came under fire when, on Sept. 10, she was asked about Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger by students in a La Quinta High School class. Here remark, "I wouldn't kick him out of my bed," garnered plenty of attention, particularly from her election opponent, Palm Desert Democrat Steve Clute.

Clute launched a multimedia ad blitz highlighting Garcia's alleged Oct. 10 comment.

"With sex scandals rocking the country, people (are) sick and tired of this behavior ..." says a narrator on the 30-second TV spot, as newspaper articles on former Florida Rep. Mark Foley are displayed.

Garcia responded, "When you can't talk about the issues, you do exactly what Mr. Clute is doing, which is running a dirty campaign and using his friends in organized labor to fund it," she said.

Home sellers, builders offer free bonuses In August, Coachella Valley home sellers and builders began offering everything from European-made Hippo golf clubs to a Kia Rio car and free spas as incentives to catch the attention of potential buyers.

It was a far cry from a year earlier, when buyers often were on waiting lists to tap a relatively tight supply of homes. By mid-December 2006, however, there were more than 8,000 homes and condos on the market in the valley.

Deadly fire rages through Pioneertown In July, the deadly Sawtooth Complex fire charred 70,000 acres of hillsides and desert terrain, destroying some 60 homes and structures in the Pioneertown area. Stories of loss, survival and nightmares and dreams realized have played out in recent months.

Only days before Christmas, for instance, three generations of the Wilson family gathered back at the scene of their tragedy, where they're rebuilding and recovering.

"We're starting all over from absolutely nothing," Nicole Wilson said. "Everything from since my parents were married is gone - pictures, sentimental memory stuff."

Esperanza blaze leaves 5 firefighters dead The Esperanza wildfire in October killed a five-member U.S. Forest Service crew.

The Idyllwild-based fire-fighting team was working on a ridge above two steep gullies, protecting an octagonal home and an unattached garage, according to a "Green Sheet" report released in November.

Winds topping 40 mph, almost perfectly aligned with the direction and slope of the gullies, contributed to the fast-running fire front that "overwhelmed" the crew, the report states.

Battle with anorexia draws compassion To passers-by in Palm Springs and Cathedral City, Darlene Rockey is the skinny lady in the running shorts, the one seen walking endlessly with a stiff-legged limp.

So a July 2 article about Rockey, a 5-foot-2-inch tall Palm Springs woman who weighs about 62 pounds and suffers from anorexia nervosa, caught the attention of Desert Sun readers.

Rockey walks at least 17 miles a day as part of a grueling exercise regime and was featured on the Dr. Phil television show.

College of the Desert campus growing Those in the east valley must have felt they were coming into their own on Aug. 19 when officials unveiled a plan to turn about 100 acres of barren land into the long-awaited East Valley Center campus for College of the Desert, where students could earn associate degrees and learn high-tech and green building skills.

The donated land is east of Buchanan Street between Avenues 62 and 60 in an unincorporated area near Coachella. The school will grow from its current outpost at the Riverside County Workforce Development Center in Indio, which offers about 68 courses, to a fully accredited part of COD. Long-range plans include a balanced mix of academic and vocational courses, comprehensive student services and community facilities such as meeting spaces and soccer fields.

High temps break records By Sept. 13, Palm Springs had recorded 117 days with temperatures above 100 degrees. Palm Springs temperatures broke four record highs in July.

On July 20, for instance, the mercury eked up to 120, eclipsing the 118-degree record set in 1978. The hotter-than-normal summer sent electric bills soaring for many valley residents.

Palm Springs resident Barbara Stebbins paid nearly $1,300 in electricity bills over two months - $93 in May, then $593 in June.

"What are you going to do? Say, 'I'm sorry I'm not going to pay the bill?' "

Students return to school excited, uncertain Some 44,000 students arrived for the first day of classes on Sept. 5, and Eric Reed Jr. was one who came with a mix of excitement and uncertainty.

"We told him second grade was going to be a little more advanced, a little harder this year, with more math and writing," said Karen Reed, his mother.

Eric's parents, Eric Sr. and Karen Reed, made the transition a little easier by escorting him to school and hanging out awhile to ensure he got off to a good start in teacher Nancy Howell's second-grade classroom at John Adams Elementary School in La Quinta.

Parents, students, teachers and administrators quickly got into the rhythm of another academic year as Coachella Valley and Desert Sands unified school districts opened their doors for the 2006-07 school year.

DEA Targets Larger Marijuana Providers (LAT)

By Rone Tempest, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 1, 2007

The federal agency sees big profits for medical dispensaries as a sign of illegal high-stakes drug dealing. Advocates say the raids are unfair.

HAYWARD, CALIF. — Until federal drug agents arrested him last month, Shon Squier was one of Hayward's most successful and generous young businessmen.

Customers lined up outside his downtown storefront, particularly on Mondays, when he offered free samples to the first 50 visitors. Business was so good that Squier, a former construction worker, was able to donate more than $100,000 to local charities.

But Squier's success as a dynamic medical marijuana entrepreneur was also his downfall. Federal drug agents raided his home and business, arresting Squier and his store manager, freezing bank accounts containing $1.5 million and confiscating several expensive cars, motorcycles and $200,000 in cash.

Medical marijuana advocates claim the raid constitutes unfair, selective enforcement by the Drug Enforcement Administration of the estimated 170 medical marijuana dispensaries in the state, including 85 in the San Francisco Bay Area.

Just down the street, another medical marijuana dispensary, not as big or as flashy as Squier's, was left untouched by the DEA agents in the Dec. 11 raid.

The federal drug agency, which does not recognize California laws legalizing the sale of marijuana to patients with doctor's prescriptions, contends the amount of money involved proves that the medical marijuana trade is nothing more than high-stakes drug dealing, complete with the same high-rolling lifestyles.

"These people will tell you they are just interested in the terminally ill," said Gordon Taylor, DEA special agent in charge of the California eastern federal district, "but what they are really interested in is lining their pockets with illegal drug money. When you pull the mask off, you see that they are nothing more than common dope dealers."

California's two medical marijuana laws, Proposition 215, approved by voters in 1996, and Senate Bill 420, passed in 2003, are not clear about how much money proprietors can take out of their businesses. One section of SB 420 states that medical marijuana caregivers should be allowed "reasonable compensation" for their services. Another section states that distribution should be done on a nonprofit basis.

"The legislation is about as clear as mud the way that they wrote it," said Joe Elford, lawyer for Americans for Safe Access, a pro-medical marijuana group. "The dispensaries are legal under state law because they are cooperatives and collectives. It is my best guess in terms of what the Legislature intended is that they shouldn't be operating to make a profit."

With the proliferation of medical marijuana dispensaries of all sizes across the state, the DEA and Internal Revenue Service have recently concentrated their investigations on young, high-profile operators like Squier, 34, and Luke Scarmazzo, 26, co-owner of a Modesto dispensary.

Scarmazzo got the attention of the DEA earlier in the year, when he produced a rap video that showed him counting stacks of hundred dollar bills, blowing billows of smoke at the camera and flipping off federal agents.

The Scarmazzo video, featuring the background sound of a pump shotgun racking a round, includes actors posing as members of the Modesto City Council. Online at http://www.krazmusic.com , it includes the refrain:

I'm in business, man.

I mean business, man.

Let me handle my business, damn.

Federal prosecutors showed it at Scarmazzo's bond hearing to demonstrate his criminal intent in order to deny him bail.

But Fresno lawyer Anthony P. Capozzi, who represents Scarmazzo, said the effort backfired.

"Let me tell you, the whole courtroom was swaying to the music," Capozzi said. Scarmazzo was released on a $400,000 bond and his 2007 Mercedes-Benz, confiscated by federal agents, was returned to him.

Taylor, the DEA agent, said that between January and June of this year, Scarmazzo, who has a previous felony conviction, and his associates recorded $3.4 million in sales of marijuana products with brand names that included "911," "AK47" and "Train Wreck." Scarmazzo and his California Healthcare Collective co-owner, Ricardo Ruiz Montes, also 26, are charged in federal court with money laundering and "operating a continuing criminal enterprise." The last charge, one of the most severe under federal drug laws, carries a sentence of 20 years to life in prison.

Here in Hayward, Squier and his business manager, Valerie Lynn Herschel, 23, are charged with the illegal manufacture and distribution of marijuana, a federal "controlled substance." Federal agents confiscated hundreds of plants, brownies, cookies and other products containing marijuana from Squier's business, Local Patients Cooperative.

"I only gave the people what they wanted — easy, safe access to medical marijuana," said the slightly built Squier, cuddling his pet Chihuahua in his former office, which was stripped bare by federal agents.

He described his business as a responsible enterprise that paid federal and state payroll taxes for 60 employees, contributed to the Hayward High School football team and gave discounts to Hayward residents, veterans and customers in wheelchairs.

Squier said that he served about 75 customers a day and had 70,000 individual patients in his books. The success of his business allowed him to buy a $1.5-million home in the Hayward Hills overlooking San Francisco Bay, a Hummer and a late-model Mercedes.

Half a block down Foothill Boulevard, Tom Lemos, 45, continues to operate his much lower-volume Hayward Patients Resource Center.

Whereas Squier and Scarmazzo flaunted their wealth, Lemos, who claims to have 3,000 to 4,000 regular customers, emphasizes his modest lifestyle.

"I live in a rental apartment and I drive an '86 Isuzu with 245,000 miles on it," Lemos said.

Appearing before the Hayward City Council on Dec. 19 to ask for a renewal of his agreement to operate in the city, Lemos opened his remarks by stating: "I don't live in a large house."

Compared to his "small, homey" medical cannabis operation, Lemos said, Squier's high-volume Local Patients Cooperative down the street was a "Wal-Pot."

After hearing Lemos' presentation and testimony from several of his patients, the City Council agreed to extend his agreement for 90 days, suggesting that he would be granted a longer-term permit if he moved from the downtown area to a more remote location, away from schools and the general public.

Even before the federal bust, the city had informed Squier that its agreement with him would be terminated.

Similarly, after Scarmazzo began operating in Modesto, the City Council passed an ordinance banning additional cannabis cooperatives, and the city had on several occasions attempted to halt Scarmazzo's operation.

The raids on both the Hayward and Modesto operations support what medical marijuana advocates contend is an unwritten practice by the DEA of being more likely to crack down on an operation that has lost local government support.

After the U.S. Supreme Court ruled last year that federal laws banning marijuana sales take precedence over those in California and other states permitting the sales, the DEA was empowered to arrest patients and operators at any one of the dispensaries that started up after passage of Proposition 215.

Instead of going after everyone, however, the federal agency appears to concentrate on the larger and higher-profile operations.

Medical marijuana advocates contend it is unfair of the DEA to cite examples like Squier and Scarmazzo to represent the typical dispensary operators.

DOJ_NMG_0111091

"Most operators are not wealthy individuals," said Elford, the Americans for Safe Access lawyer. "As far as we can tell, the majority of dispensary operators are simply people who are interested in providing safe, affordable and reliable medicine to the people who need it and are not in it for the profit."

The "big fish" strategy enrages Oakland lawyer James Anthony, who represents Scarmazzo in civil matters.

"Why does the DEA suddenly concern themselves with how successful a medical cannabis collective is?" he asked. "Are they saying that if these guys had led monkish lives, then they would have left them alone? Are they judging Donald Trump on his lifestyle?"

Medical Marijuana Groups Claim DEA Unfair (WT)

The Washington Times/UPI, January 1, 2007

Larger California dispensaries of medical marijuana claim they are being unfairly targeted by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency.

Among them is Shon Squier, 34, of Hayward, Calif., whose major storefront operation was shut down last month by the DEA, which also froze bank accounts containing $1.5 million and confiscated several expensive cars, motorcycles and $200,000 in cash, the Los Angeles Times reported Monday.

Further down the street, a much smaller operation wasn't touched, leading Squier to allege he is being unfairly targeted for being successful, the Times said.

California's two medical marijuana laws, Proposition 215, approved by voters in 1996, and Senate Bill 420, passed in 2003, are not clear about how much money proprietors of the estimated 170 medical marijuana outlets in the state can make.

The DEA does not recognize California laws legalizing the sale of marijuana to patients with doctor's prescriptions, and special agent Gordon Taylor said the businesses have nothing to do with compassion for the terminally ill.

"When you pull the mask off, you see that they are nothing more than common dope dealers," Taylor told the Times.

Racketeer Loses His Swagger (LAT)

By Joe Mozingo, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 29, 2006

HAI Waknine shambled into the Beverly Hills Lamborghini showroom.

The owner, Victor Keuylian, sensed trouble. Keuylian and his son were late on paying off a $950,000 loan that Waknine had brokered with an Israeli businessman.

"What do you want, Hai?" he asked, according to a later telephone conversation recounting the incident that was caught on a federal wiretap.

Waknine pointed to a $175,000 Ferrari in the luxury European car dealership.

"I want this one over here. I want to take this car and use it for half a day."

"Hai, the cars over here are for sale," Keuylian said. "Nobody's supposed to drive them."

"No, I want this car. Get the car out."

Reluctantly, Keuylian let him take it, and got it back later with 100 more miles on the odometer. Waknine was unappeased.

Two days later he left a message on the home answering machine of Keuylian's son, Viken: "Vic, if you don't have the money tonight, it's going to double tomorrow…. Tomorrow we are coming to your shop, and we are going to take $2 million."

Keuylian called the police. As it turned out, the police were already listening on wiretaps.

Los Angeles police had been pursuing Waknine for 14 years, since he was a student at Grant High School in the San Fernando Valley. At various times, they charged him with threatening witnesses, kidnapping for ransom, assault with a firearm and grand theft auto.

All the investigations collapsed when witnesses refused to testify or left the country, and Waknine grew wealthier every year. He owned a 3,154-square-foot town house on the sand in Marina del Rey, a brand-new home in the Hollywood Hills, a vacation house on Acapulco Bay and investment properties around Southern California, Las Vegas and Miami.

But in 2003, at the time of Keuylian's call, organized crime detectives thought they had a good case building. Working with federal drug agents and foreign police who were investigating Israeli organized crime and Ecstasy trafficking, they had wiretaps on phones in Los Angeles, Las Vegas, Miami, Mexico, Spain, Belgium and Israel.

From the wires and informants they began amassing fresh evidence of Waknine's connections to an Israeli crime syndicate called the Jerusalem Group and his alleged involvement in drug trafficking, money laundering and extortion, according to court documents. And this time, none of it depended on skittish witnesses.

"Yesterday, I got all kinds of threats at my office in California: 'I will kill your wife, I will kill your son, I will kill you,' " Keuylian complained about Waknine to another Israeli involved in the deal over a wiretap in April 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0111092

In another wiretap, he described Waknine's foray into the showroom.

"If he wants to be a jerk with me," he said. "I'm more than ready to be a jerk with him…. This lowlife immoral person, Hai, came over and threatened me and all of my family."

Waknine first came to the attention of authorities as a student at Grant High in March 1989. A popular teacher named Hal Arthur was shot to death outside his Sherman Oaks home, and at least 10 students suspected Waknine; he had a bellicose reputation and, they thought, a beef with the teacher.

He was 16 at the time, a pudgy upper-middle-class Van Nuys kid, born in Israel, who wore jewelry and fancy clothes and drove a BMW. One of the students told police that Waknine took karate lessons from an instructor who taught him "how to shoot guns and kill people."

Detectives questioned Waknine for six hours but let him go after he passed a polygraph test. "There is no evidence to connect the kid to this case," Det. Mel Arnold told the news media.

The killing remains unsolved. But organized crime detectives who have followed Waknine for years say the incident gave him an ominous reputation he would later play to his advantage.

Waknine dropped out of high school and became a full-time "wheeler-dealer," in the words of his younger brother, Assaf Waknine, interviewed by telephone. "He'd buy five cars here, sell five cars there."

In the mid-1990s, Waknine brokered a business arrangement between a wealthy uncle and a real estate investor named Judah Hertz, whose holdings included the International Jewelry Center on South Hill Street, across from Pershing Square. Waknine rented several offices in the building and opened a postal business called Global Parcel Service on the bottom floor.

Around this time, according to police, several of his friends were becoming the country's biggest importers of the club drug Ecstasy. They flaunted their Italian cars and Versace suits in the hippest clubs of Beverly Hills and Hollywood.

One of his friends, Jacob "Cookie" Orgad, an Israeli who was also in business with Hertz, had taken over a Las Vegas-based network that transported cocaine from California to the East Coast for Pablo Escobar's Colombian cartel, according to a report by Nevada gaming investigators.

As Ecstasy became popular, Orgad began smuggling the aspirin-size pills, which cost pennies to make and sold for upward of $25, into Los Angeles from Europe, according to police.

Confidential informants told the Drug Enforcement Administration that Ecstasy traffickers used Waknine's postal business to launder millions of dollars. In a single transaction, he allegedly received $11 million to launder, an affidavit by DEA Special Agent Deanne L. Reuter said.

According to Reuter, an informant said Waknine also boasted of using his mother's company, Silhouette Paris in Studio City, "to import MDMA [Ecstasy] in the shoulder pads of women's apparel."

Waknine was living the high life, according to both his brother and two Los Angeles Police Department detectives, who requested anonymity because they are still investigating Israeli organized crime in Los Angeles.

He would play $10,000 hands in Vegas without pause, drop $5,000 on Cristal Champagne and designer vodka at clubs such as Les Deux, Café Maurice and Bar One, and party with celebrities and rappers, strippers and Russian blonds.

His hangdog face, nervous tic and rolls of flab did not diminish his violent reputation.

"There was an instance where someone flipped Hai off at a club," said one of the organized crime detectives, who was undercover at the time. "A Japanese guy driving a Ferrari, he wasn't the coolest guy in the world.

"Hai assessed him a $25,000 fine." The guy paid, fearing the consequences of refusing, the detective said.

In the Jewelry District and in Israeli pockets of the San Fernando Valley, Waknine became known as a go-to guy to collect on a loan, resolve a dispute or fix a problem.

In 2000, insurance broker Jimmy Altman learned that firsthand when Waknine called his office in Encino. Altman, it turned out, was somebody's problem.

He was dating a divorcee, and her former husband wasn't happy about it, according to court documents. Waknine asked Altman to meet him at Tempo Restaurant, a hip Israeli hangout on Ventura Boulevard where Waknine regularly held court.

"If I were you, I'd stay away from Tammy," Waknine warned Altman, according to a description of their encounter in the court papers.

Altman dropped the relationship, but days later two bullets spider-cracked the front windows of his home, the court papers said. Waknine called again and demanded $75,000. "If you don't pay me, I'll hurt you."

Altman filed a police report, but stopped cooperating with detectives when Waknine took out a $1-million policy with him.

Yet police were closing in on Waknine's circle.

Assaf, Waknine's brother, had been sent to prison in New York after pleading guilty in 1997 to participating in an elaborate scheme to rack up $125,000 per day on bogus American Express cards.

DOJ_NMG_0111093

In 2001, Waknine's friends in the Ecstasy trade went down. Alex Maimon and Louis Ziskin were convicted of smuggling 700 pounds of Ecstasy into Southern California via FedEx. Orgad pleaded guilty to drug charges for hiring strippers and models to carry millions of Ecstasy tablets from Paris to Los Angeles. Tamer Ibrahim was on the run for shipping 1,100 pounds of Ecstasy — worth more than $40 million — through LAX hidden in a shipment of colored pencils and notebooks.

Waknine was still untouched.

That same year, Gabriel Benharosh, another alleged member of the Jerusalem Group, fled to the United States. He brought with him cash that an Israeli bank official had embezzled to pay off her brother's gambling debt to the Israeli mob. The embezzlement crashed the bank and caused a scandal in Israel, and Benharosh needed to hide the money.

Waknine introduced him to Keuylian, the Beverly Hills Lamborghini dealer, and Eli Hadad, a Miami real estate developer, to launder the money.

Benharosh lent $520,000 to Hadad in May 2002, and $950,000 to Keuylian in May 2003.

When both borrowers could not pay Benharosh back in time, Waknine went to work.

In August 2003, a wiretap caught Waknine on the phone to Benharosh, talking about Hadad: "On Tuesday I'm taking the house from him, my bro," Waknine said.

"Finally you do what I tell you," Benharosh replied. "I want to hear that he and his wife and kids are on the street, sleeping in the street."

Both men managed to pay Benharosh back. The Keuylians sold some Ferraris; one went to singer Rod Stewart. Hadad took out a third mortgage on his home.

They thought they were done with Waknine. Instead they were subpoenaed to testify before a grand jury.

In April 2004, Waknine, Benharosh and three others were indicted on 16 counts, including conspiracy to commit extortion and conspiracy to commit money laundering, based largely on the extensive wiretaps. A State Department narcotics report described Waknine and Benharosh as a "money laundering cell" and "principal targets" in a crime organization run by an Israeli mobster named Itzhak Abergil, whom the department listed as one of the 40 biggest importers of illegal drugs into the United States.

In December, the grand jury added the more serious offense of racketeering.

Benharosh ultimately cut a deal to testify against Waknine. Assistant U.S. Atty. Thomas P. Sleisenger said the more serious U.S. crimes were committed by Waknine.

"Our interest here in Los Angeles has always been Waknine," he said. "This guy has been the thorn in the side of law enforcement for years."

Waknine's trial began this June in the courtroom of U.S. District Judge Manuel Real. Some days the gallery took on the cast of a Hollywood club, filled with blond, shiny-haired women and men in tight black designer T-shirts.

After four days of testimony, Waknine pleaded guilty to a single count of racketeering, catching prosecutors by surprise.

He went home to await sentencing, which made detectives and agents who had worked for years to put him in prison nervous. Would he really give up his lavish lifestyle when he probably had money stashed in accounts all over the world?

In August, U.S. marshals hauled Waknine into court in manacles after an informant said he planned to flee to meet his brother Assaf, who had been released from prison, in Mexico. Waknine, who had been free on bond, told officials he was afraid someone was after him.

Real was unmoved. "He should be protected in custody and be here for sentencing. He'll live until that time at least."

His family and friends left the courtroom in tears.

On Sept. 11, Waknine shuffled into the courtroom shackled to other inmates. At the dais, he twitched and tugged at his jail pants to keep them up, before meekly mumbling a plea for leniency.

Without looking up from his paperwork, Real sentenced him to 10 years in federal prison, a year more than prosecutors were asking. Waknine was taken to the Metropolitan Detention Center to begin his sentence. His lawyers filed a notice of intent to appeal the extra year of the sentence.

On Dec. 11, Waknine jangled into court again for a restitution hearing. Prosecutors recommended he pay a total of $406,000 to his victims. Waknine's attorney told the judge he agreed with the government.

"The government is not the one to make the order. I am," Real snapped.

The judge made some calculations and ordered Waknine to pay $646,000.

1,373 Miles Into The Heart Of Afghanistan (LAT)

By Paul Watson, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 31, 2006

The Ring Road is meant to link the nation and connect its major cities. But traveling the route is no Sunday drive.

Shahr-i-Safa, Afghanistan — AS a hair-thin line on a map, Afghanistan's national Ring Road looks easy enough to conquer.

But tell war-hardened Afghans that you're going to travel its entire 1,373-mile length unarmed, facing winter and a raging insurgency, and they look at you like you're completely mad.

Five years after the fall of the Taliban, it shouldn't be such a challenge.

Rebuilding the two-lane highway that connects Afghanistan's major cities has been a centerpiece of the U.S.-led effort to transform the nation. It is so important that Afghanistan's president, Hamid Karzai, said that President Bush once demanded daily updates on the roadwork from Kabul south to Kandahar, the seat of power under Taliban rule.

U.S. grants have paid for rebuilding a third of the road, according to Afghan government figures. Japan, Saudi Arabia and Iran are responsible for repairing other sections, a rare case in which Washington and Tehran are working toward the same goal. Officially, the $1.05-billion project is almost finished.

But as with many things in Afghanistan, there is a chasm between the rhetoric and reality.

Some of the best stretches of the road are among the Taliban's favorite killing grounds. This fall, Canadian troops led the biggest ground battle in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization's 57-year history, in part to regain control of a stretch of highway west of Kandahar. The NATO offensive cleared the insurgents, but guerrillas and highway robbers still prey on travelers in many other places.

About 40% of the road isn't finished. Some sections are nothing more than muddy tracks through the country's lawless Wild West, where you can drive for hours without seeing another vehicle fishtailing and backsliding through the muck along with you.

The only way to understand the condition of the road and grasp what it says about Afghanistan is to drive it.

The trip took my interpreter, driver and me seven days, inching along slippery edges of steep cliffs, wandering in the wilderness without road signs, suffering two flat tires, a ruptured radiator and a spinout on mountain ice.

On the way, we managed to avoid a Taliban ambush, a potential kidnapper or highway robber, a suicide bomber and a gunman who fired close enough to take off one of our heads.

Getting ready

I KNEW some of the Ring Road all too well. I traveled it for weeks in the early Taliban era a decade ago, when years of war and neglect already had reduced the highway to patches of broken asphalt connected by dirt, rocks and ruts. A trip that would take a few hours on a proper road was days of torture, the speedometer straining to break 10 mph as the vehicle crawled over shell craters and pond-sized potholes.

This time, I would be leaving from Kabul with interpreter Wesal Zaman and driver Zyarat Gul. A quiet and calm man, Gul had gotten us home safely from other terrible places.

Before starting out, we visited three experts at the Economics Ministry to find out what we were in for.

Sayed Arif Nazif, the ministry's director of design, told us that the building of the road began in the mid-1970s. The United States helped, but most of the money came from the Soviet Union and Arab countries.

Farmers used the road to get their produce to market. Afghanistan became the world's largest exporter of dried grapes, apples and other fruit. It also sent an assortment of nuts.

"In those days, in terms of our roads, we were much more advanced than neighboring countries," Nazif said. "But because of the wars and other problems, all our roads were destroyed."

Soviet troops and tanks poured down the Ring Road to invade Afghanistan in the dead of night on Dec. 25, 1979, setting off a decades-long tailspin from which Afghans are still trying to recover.

The rebuilding of the road is supposed to help revive the economy and break down ethnic differences by allowing Afghans to travel more freely. Although dried fruit exports are 20% of what they were before the wars, reconstruction is showing benefits, Nazif said. This year, the repaved road allowed farmers to get fresh pomegranates, grapes and apples to Kabul's airport, and the first few flights delivered the produce to wealthy Persian Gulf states.

I had a more pressing question: "How long do you think it would take to drive the whole Ring Road?"

Nazif shifted in his seat. "Take the length of 1,373 miles, and divide by an average speed of 50 miles an hour," he said.

"That sounds like we could do it in maybe four days," I replied, trying to do some quick mental math. Nazif smiled and nodded, but we both knew Afghanistan was a lot more complicated than that.

Before we started, we took some precautions that are prudent for any trip into the countryside: We loaded the car with two spare tires, a shovel, bottled water and snacks. And we made one rule: If Gul, an ethnic Pashtun like most of the Taliban, saw anything on the horizon or felt anything he didn't like, he should turn around without pausing to ask us.

A small victory

AS the Ring Road begins a steady climb out of Kabul on a 27-mile section rebuilt by the Taliban, the horizon is bright white with towering snow-covered mountains. The road is as smooth as any in the United States. But the government can't afford to keep it plowed, so it was covered with packed snow and ice that brought long lines of heavy transports to a halt on the highlands near Ghazni.

We were less than six hours into the journey near Shahr-i-Safa when we saw the first signs of Taliban activity.

Four insurgents armed with AK-47s and rocket-propelled grenades had ridden two motorcycles to a hill overlooking a stretch of the highway near Qalat. About 3 p.m., they opened fire on a civilian truck taking supplies to an Afghan military base, a common guerrilla tactic.

Normally, insurgents carry out swift attacks and make a getaway into the desert. But this time a pickup carrying half a dozen Afghan national army troops happened by. They pinned the guerrillas down from behind and called in a second unit to attack from the front.

We reached the scene about half an hour after the battle ended. Jubilant Afghan troops were smiling and joking next to three Taliban corpses, like scavengers enjoying quality roadkill. One of the dead men lay on his back with his knees bent, as if he might jump up at any moment. But the bullet hole in his neck left no doubt his war was over.

The fourth fighter escaped, so the victory wasn't complete, said Afghan army Maj. Atullah Maiwandwal.

It was a battle too small to make the news, let alone change the course of a war. But the major and his men had achieved something significant: Without U.S. military advisors or foreign backup, they defended a piece of highway rebuilt with a $237-million U.S. grant, the sort of gradual progress that often gets lost amid the noise of suicide bombings and other insurgent attacks.

"Where are your bodyguards?" one soldier asked, stunned that we were traveling the highway without weapons.

We explained that we preferred to travel unencumbered by armed escorts. So as night fell, we rushed off to Kandahar, which has been staggering under a wave of suicide bombings. The governor gave us beds in his guest house.

Early the next morning, we headed west into Helmand province, the scene of fierce fighting this year between NATO forces and the Taliban.

A large billboard on the edge of Kandahar declared that the highway was being rebuilt as a gift of the Japanese people.

Actually, the 70 miles of road that Japan pledged $76 million to fix is the same bumpy, cracked surface that it has been for years. The area is too dangerous for road crews.

It is the hashish harvest season, and marijuana plants as big as Christmas trees are stacked by the thousands against mud-brick homes, curing in the sun. Villagers scrape the gooey resin, which is pressed into blocks and exported along the same routes that move the opium used to produce heroin, a big source of the insurgents' income.

Hundreds of gunmen prowl the Ring Road in Helmand. They are members of private militias who take orders from local warlords and drug barons and operate illegal checkpoints, mostly to squeeze money from truck drivers.

As one longtime resident of Lashkar Gah, the provincial capital, told us, "They are loyal to the government until 4 o'clock in the afternoon, and then until the next morning they're enemies."

As we neared the Lashkar Gah turnoff, in an area where we were told that kidnappers had abducted two German journalists, our driver broke our one rule.

The broken rule

GUL slowed for a speed bump, and instead of accelerating when a militiaman jumped up with an AK-47, he stopped. Gul opened the driver's window, apparently weighing the comparative risks of getting shot and getting kidnapped. The gunman stuck his head in, saw me in the back seat and smiled like a dog sniffing fresh meat.

"Get us out of here!" I shouted at Gul, and he hesitated. "Get moving!"

Gul hit the gas. The barrel of the gunman's rifle clunked off the rear side of the car. Not daring to look back, I tensed for the shot that didn't come.

In Lashkar Gah, we stopped at a construction agency funded by the United States Agency for International Development, or USAID, where we previously had met cook Khudai Nazar. At 64, he is old enough to remember what is possible with peace, and young enough to believe he might live to see it again.

We asked what he remembered of the Ring Road of his childhood. He sent his son for an opaque plastic sandwich bag stuffed with browning reference letters and old photographs.

They tell of a more innocent age, from the late 1940s to the 1970s, when American workers and their families lived in Helmand. They were building a dam, a power plant, irrigation canals and other development projects in the Afghan desert.

In one black-and-white photograph, Nazar is 12 years old and standing on a lush lawn surrounded by a white picket fence with his new bicycle, a gift from Rose and Don Wonderly of Portland, Ore.

"The first time I met with her, I didn't understand English," recalled Nazar, who speaks with an American accent. "American people always like children, and they didn't have any. She said come every day to my house and I'm gonna teach you English."

DOJ_NMG_0111096

Within a few days, Rose was giving the boy new clothes and encouraging other American families to leave him some of their hand-me-downs. The Wonderlys left in 1960.

By the time the Soviets invaded in 1979, Nazar had worked for a string of other Americans: George Belissary promoted the servant to a warehouse job; JoAnn and Ronald Thompson of Sacramento praised his bread-baking skills; Jack and Maxine Smith wrote of their fondness for his pastries and good humor.

The Smiths had to flee the Soviet occupation after 17 months in Afghanistan, and in her last words to him, Nazar said, Maxine urged him to take his wife and their 10 children to Pakistan.

"She said, 'Just send me a message and I'll have a house waiting for you — everything,' " Nazar said wistfully. It was clear in his breaking voice that he wished he could have left. But he never found enough money, or will, to turn his back on the land of his birth.

Nazar bid us farewell with the hope that some of his long-lost American friends might try to reach him, maybe even risk a visit.

Three hours after we left Lashkar Gah, a suicide bomber walked into the well-guarded compound of the provincial governor, a few blocks from where we'd visited Nazar, and blew himself up in the parking lot, killing eight people.

The Wild West

HEADING north toward Herat, we drove for several hours past mountains weathered so smooth they seemed molded from clay. We reached Herat that night, putting us more than halfway along the Ring Road at the end of our second day.

Swift progress made us overconfident. We talked about being back in Kabul in a day or so. We marveled at the traffic lights operating at all the main intersections in Herat, the only major city to escape the destruction of Afghanistan's wars.

The pleasure was short-lived. The next morning, 35 miles northeast of Herat, the highway abruptly ended. We didn't see asphalt again for three days.

Iran was supposed to complete 70 miles of paved road from Herat into Badghis province, but its contractors suddenly stopped work, said Gov. Mohammed Naseem Tokhi. Some say the money ran out; others cite unspecified problems between Iran and the rest of the international community, Tokhi said. He has received no official explanation.

The Afghan national government hasn't even been able to find a country willing to fund construction of the road through the rest of the province.

Entering Badghis was like driving back into biblical times. Ours was the only internal-combustion engine running for miles. Most people were walking or riding donkeys. The gray smoke of cooking fires seeped through the black fabric of nomads' low-slung tents.

The province's people, many of whom are Pashtuns, have long felt cut off from the rest of the country. Now they are largely missing out on billions of dollars in international aid, and that makes Badghis an ideal recruiting ground for insurgents. Grinding poverty and poor health have left even moderates angry with Karzai's government and its foreign backers.

Prolonged drought followed by devastating floods last month left three-quarters of the province's people without enough food, Tokhi said. The only roads into the province are so bad that relief agencies are having a tough time reaching people. Many could die during the winter, he said.

In the frontier town of Bala Murghab, a Ring Road bridge is a dangerously unstable span covered with metal sheets laid by people who salvaged them from a derelict factory. The 200,000 residents of the surrounding area have no electricity, and their water is so bad that diarrhea is a main killer.

Smoldering rage exploded this fall when gunmen stormed the district commissioner's new headquarters, a three-story yellow brick building built by USAID. They blasted a rocket-propelled grenade through the guardhouse and fired assault rifles at offices and police cars, shattering most of the main building's windows. The district commissioner fled for his life. Three foreign workers at a U.S.-based agency's compound escaped by hiding in their garden as rampaging mobs looted the buildings.

When the aid agency shut its office, townspeople persuaded its Afghan supervisor, Ghalam Seddiq, to become mayor. Slipping another prayer bead along a string as he talked to us, Seddiq said the attackers wanted to stop the aid agency's education programs and prevent children from learning, a Taliban priority.

The center of town is a ramshackle bazaar, where merchants glared as we drove along muddy streets. A large padlock sealed the front doors of the only hotel. The elderly caretaker said it was too dangerous to stay there, but the new district commissioner ordered the hotel to open for us.

In this Afghan version of a Wild West town, Abdul Jalil Sekandari is the deputy sheriff.

Guarded by a young man with an AK-47 slung over his shoulder, Sekandari dropped by our hotel room that night. By the glow of an oil lamp, he griped about the government and foreign aid, personally guaranteed our safety and invited us to spend the night with him in the police station. We thought our odds were better in the hotel.

Good riddance

DOJ_NMG_0111097

WE rode out of town at first light. We weren't far into the countryside when a man in a Taliban-style black turban lurking near a disabled Soviet tank leveled his Kalashnikov rifle and took a potshot at us. We heard the loud hiss-snap of a bullet passing close by, but he didn't fire again. It must have been a good-riddance round.

Soon even the dirt road disappeared into a labyrinth of mud tracks that crisscrossed broad valleys. We fishtailed and churned our way through dense fog, along tire ruts at least 2 feet deep. The four-wheel-drive car jerked and bucked like a rodeo bull.

There were no road signs, and no other vehicles. So the only thing to do was ask directions from a shepherd or a farmer working the sodden earth with a wooden plow pulled by his donkey.

"Does this road go to Maimana?" we asked an old man at one crossroads.

"Yes. But others prefer that way," he replied, nodding toward a dirt road heading in the opposite direction.

When we pulled in for a rest in Maimana, a pool of green fluid spilled out of a hole in the radiator, which a mechanic pounded shut the next morning.

We finally returned to paved highway at Andkhoi, a dust-blown place near the border with Turkmenistan, where for centuries tribal weavers have produced some of Afghanistan's best carpets.

Mohammed Ikram, a dealer representing more than 400 female weavers, was at the roadside, squatting in the dirt to measure a carpet in a floral design of red, blue and yellow. It would go to Pakistan, where a trader would pay about $210 a yard, attach a "Made in Pakistan" label and export it to the United States or Europe for hundreds of dollars in profit, Ikram said.

If Afghanistan could have peace and security, traders would follow the Ring Road straight to Andkhoi, he imagined. "And if tourists come here, then we will all be rich," Ikram said, smiling.

Paved highway awaited us on the other side of town, so we pressed on south to Mazar-i-Sharif, chattering about how good it would feel to have hot water and lights.

Come back later

MAZAR-I-SHARIF means Tomb of the Exalted. It is home to one of the holiest sites in Islam. Some Shiites believe it is the final burial place of Hazrat Ali, the prophet Muhammad's cousin and son-in-law, who was assassinated and first buried near Baghdad in the 7th century. Blood is still being spilled over the schism that followed, but not in Afghanistan.

Robbers are the biggest threat on the roads around Mazar. Andkhoi's carpet traders say they are regularly fleeced by gunmen demanding illegal road taxes.

After a night of comfort in Mazar, it was an easy drive to the Salang Tunnel, a 1.7-mile passage at 11,034 feet built by the Soviets through the Hindu Kush mountains on the route south to Kabul.

In winter, howling blizzards pummel the Salang's peaks. Avalanches, asphyxiation and plunges off cliffs have killed dozens of travelers.

As we headed up the pass, we recalled another trip a few weeks earlier when Gul skidded on black ice in the tunnel. The wheels hit the edge of a concrete walkway so hard that the front axle broke. He was elected to walk through a blizzard to a public works outpost a mile down the mountain. It was the middle of the night and deathly cold. A few workers huddled around a small wood stove.

"Is anyone hurt?" one asked when Gul asked for help.

"No."

"Are there any women?"

"No."

"Are you stuck in the middle of the road?"

"No."

"Then go back to your car and come back in the morning."

This time, we made it through the tunnel and most of the Salang Pass without problems. The sky was ice blue, the road mostly clear. It seemed too easy for the end to such a hard journey.

Just then, Gul put the car into a 360-degree spin. A snow bank kept us from going over the edge.

We sat silently for a few seconds, staring up at the meandering Ring Road to see whether that was the worst that would happen — or whether fate was about to catch up with us in the form of a sliding truck.

Our luck held. There wasn't anyone close enough to harm us.

The car, with every bolt, spring and cable caked in mud, creaked and shimmied its way down the Shomali plains, and in a few hours we were overlooking Kabul, sprawled out across a plateau and shrouded in brown smog. The capital hadn't had a suicide bombing for days. The only thing left to worry about was traffic.

Treacherous journey

Despite more than $1 billion in construction aid, the primary roadway connecting Afghanistan's main cities is incomplete and beset with problems. Here is a look at what happened during a seven-day drive over its entire 1,373-mile length:

1. Taliban fighters attack a civilian truck. Afghan army troops engage guerrillas, killing three.

2. A suicide bomber blows himself up at compound of the provincial governor in the capital of Helmand province.

3. The highway abruptly ends, and the journey must continue on dirt roads and mud tracks. In neighboring countryside, a man takes a potshot at passing reporters. The radiator springs a leak.

4. Asphalt roadway begins again, but soon the journey reaches the treacherous Salang Tunnel, a 1.7-mile passage through the Hindu Kush mountains at 11,034 feet.

FBI Investigating Pipe Bomb Attempt (BRADV)

Baton Rouge Advocate, January 1, 2007

PORT ALLEN — FBI crime scene investigators returned today to Erwinville Baptist Church to collect evidence from the pipe bomb that was safely detonated by officials outside the church Sunday night.

FBI investigators collected debris and combed the area for evidence, West Baton Rouge Parish Sheriff Mike Cazes said. The debris will be sent to the FBI's crime lab in Quantico, Va.

The pipe bomb was found by deputies outside the church, along La. 413, south of U.S. 190, at 5:19 p.m. Sunday, authorities have said. The pipe bomb was safely detonated by the Louisiana State Police's Hazardous Material Unit around 9 p.m. Sunday

The FBI is handling the investigation, Cazes said.

No one answered the church's phone tonight.

NRA Sounds Alarm Of Not-So-Imminent Threat (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, January 2, 2007

In lobbying, a threat is good for business, whether it's genuine or not.

This might help to explain the dire warnings being issued by the National Rifle Association as the Democrats prepare to take control of Congress this week.

"The new leadership could be one of the most unfriendly to the National Rifle Association," declared Andrew Arulanandam, spokesman for the NRA. "If there's an effort to pursue gun control, we will mount an active defense."

The famously combative lobby, with 4 million members, is displeased with the voting histories of House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) and other top Democrats in the House and is putting them on notice that it won't tolerate passage of anti-gun measures.

The only problem: No one expects gun legislation this year.

True, a few Democrats would love to take a potshot at the NRA. But its $20 million in political firepower has long discouraged any such effort. It helped to snuff out the presidential hopes of Democrat Al Gore in 2000 and to elect dozens, mostly Republicans, to Congress.

Besides, one of the NRA's biggest backers is a Democrat, Rep. John D. Dingell (Mich.), who was instrumental in blocking the last major attempt at gun control in 1999 and will reclaim the chairmanship of the House Energy and Commerce Committee this week.

No matter. The NRA is on high alert, and its latest weapon is a pamphlet designed to send its members into fits of paranoid rage and to inspire them to open their wallets.

A draft of the 27-page document, which was provided to The Washington Post by a source outside the NRA, lashes out at such icons of the left as investor George Soros, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and Pelosi. They are depicted as part of "a marching axis of adversaries far darker and more dangerous than gun owners have ever known."

Few places are less likely to be burgled than the Fairfax County headquarters of the NRA. But Arulanandam claimed that someone recently stole a "working draft" of the pamphlet, called "Freedom in Peril."

The document is filled with sinister-looking caricatures of supposedly anti-gun figures such as filmmaker Michael Moore, comedian Rosie O'Donnell, New York City Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg (R) and CBS News anchor Katie Couric. One chapter attacks Democratic lawmakers such as Sens. John F. Kerry and Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts and derides them as a "Gang of Opportunists." Other NRA enemies are "One-World Extremists," "Animal Rights Terrorists" (such as People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals) and "Illegal Alien Gangs."

"America, by its free and independent nature, is a breeding ground and safe haven for violent, illegal criminal gangs," the "Gang" chapter states. "And as always, it is the lawful who will take the fall."

Clinton, the Democratic front-runner for president in 2008, and Soros, a major backer of Democratic-leaning political organizations, are singled out for extra opprobrium. "Clinton views America as the great experiment, not for freedom, but for her own political ambitions," the pamphlet states.

Soros is described as "the Hungarian-born billionaire bankroller of a globalist jihad against firearm freedom" who has been "trying to revoke the Bill of Rights through his checkbook."

Veteran NRA-watchers have seen such rhetoric before. "This is vintage NRA fear tactics from an organization that knows how to use them to energize a base of supporters who have an unhealthy terror that the forces of government will take their guns away," said Peter Hamm, spokesman for the Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence. "It's both ugly and untrue."

Hamm also said he does not believe Congress will take up and pass major gun legislation anytime in the near future. Still, the pamphlet asserts that "towering waves of this coming storm are already crashing on our doorsteps."

The opening essay, titled "The Coming Confrontation," is signed by (and is situated next to gallant drawings of) two of the NRA's staffers, Wayne LaPierre and Chris W. Cox.

"It's inevitable that terrorists will infest America for generations to come. It's also inevitable that an anti-gun president will occupy the White House, and anti-gun forces will control the U.S. House and Senate," they write. "Unless we are well-financed to face that moment, the final disarmament of law-abiding Americans will occur beneath the shroud of anti-terrorism legislation."

So beware -- and make your checks payable to the NRA!Stop That Spin

House Democrats boast that their proposed ethics legislation will ban travel provided by lobbying organizations to lawmakers. Don't believe it.

Maneuvering by the American Israel Public Affairs Committee and others has opened a gaping loophole in the bill. Lobbies such as AIPAC and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce have their own nonprofit foundations, which will still be allowed to underwrite congressional junkets under the new rules.

Watch for more lobbying groups to set up their own "non-lobbying" foundation affiliates as a result.

TAX:

States With High Taxes Try To Tackle Burden (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 2, 2007

Americans are paying more property taxes today than ever before, and several states, including New Jersey and New York, will attempt to lessen the growing burden on homeowners in upcoming legislative sessions.

"In the past five years, the increase in property-tax collections has been nearly double the growth in personal income," wrote economist Gerald Prante, who conducted a recent study of real-estate taxes nationwide.

"What the future has in store for property taxes will largely be a function of housing prices, but local governments can stem the rising tax bills in the process by lowering the rates and not merely spending the windfall revenue."

The rate collected through property taxes rose just 2 percent from 1994 to 2000, according to the study. Since 2000, that amount has shot up 27 percent.

The rocketing rates, fueled by the rapid increase in residential home prices, are being closely watched by anti-tax advocacy groups such as Americans for Tax Reform.

"Too often, tax-and-spenders try to lower property tax taxes by tossing more money to the bloating local governments," said the group's president, Grover Norquist. "However, instead of leaving the taxpayers alone, big spenders blow through the state money and come knocking on residents' doors for even more."

Mr. Norquist says he will be watching closely and has never been afraid to campaign against politicians who don't act aggressively enough to curb taxes and spending.

He pointed to the "property tax revolution" of the 1980s when the states of Massachusetts and New Jersey attempted to rein in out-of-control property taxes that had tested the patience of property owners.

In Massachusetts, lawmakers set about capping local spending increases. In New Jersey, lawmakers tried shifting the tax burden from property owners to state workers with an income tax.

DOJ_NMG_0111100

Today, according to figures provided by ATR, the burden on Massachusetts property owners has fallen by 7.5 percent. New Jersey property taxes, meanwhile, have increased 36 percent above the rate of inflation.

"As experience in Massachusetts demonstrates, property-taxes reform must address the root problem -- out-of-control spending," Mr. Norquist said. "Rather than shuffling taxpayers' dollars around and leaving the back door open for big spenders to sneak in more tax hikes, lawmakers should make sure that any reform includes taxpayer protections."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats To Stick With Popular Basics In Congress Agenda (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, January 2, 2007

WASHINGTON — When Democrats take power on Capitol Hill this week, House leaders will kick off their legislative campaign with a lightning-fast 100-hour agenda.

But there won't be a revolution.

In marked contrast to the Republicans who swept into the majority in 1994, incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and her legislative allies are not planning to amend the Constitution or eradicate federal agencies.

Instead, their initial legislative foray will focus on modest, politically popular issues, including initiatives to expand stem cell research, lower prescription drug prices and tighten congressional ethics rules.

Pelosi's program is expected to receive a warm reception on Capitol Hill, even from some Republicans. Less clear is whether Democrats can follow up with solutions to the deeper problems that are troubling a restive public.

Polls show that most Americans are looking to Congress, rather than the president, for leadership, particularly on resolving the war in Iraq.

Yet Pelosi and the Democrats plan no dramatic steps to influence the course of the war. Nor has the new majority detailed strategies to tackle other challenges that have confounded lawmakers for years, including rising healthcare costs and the financially imperiled Social Security system.

For now, the relatively safe 100-hour agenda may simply allow the Democrats to show they can accomplish something after a dozen years in the political wilderness.

"One of the things the public is definitely looking for is results," said veteran strategist Peter Fenn, who helped several Democratic candidates unseat Republicans in part by campaigning against the "do-nothing" record of the previous GOP-led Congress.

But finding a majority on Capitol Hill to agree on even small measures can be challenging.

Democrats will hold just a one-vote advantage in the Senate, where rules allow the minority party to stall, slow and amend legislation.

At the same time, ideological divisions between the parties are wider than they were a generation ago, when moderates in both caucuses wielded greater influence.

It also remains unclear how the president and the new Congress will work together. Though Bush and Democratic congressional leaders have pronounced themselves committed to compromise, they are coming off six years of fiercely partisan government.

And taking on a president, even a weakened one, is never easy for Congress. When Republicans challenged President Clinton over the budget after taking power in 1995, they were blamed after the federal government was forced to shut down during the faceoff.

"It's not going to be a cakewalk," said incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev. "Just because you say you want to be bipartisan doesn't mean they're going to fall all over themselves to work with you."

But the rapid-fire agenda that Pelosi has crafted to kick off Democratic rule carefully hits issues with broad popular appeal that may be hard for many Republicans to oppose.

Pelosi's proposed House ethics package -- which would ban many gifts from lobbyists and identify members who insert earmarks into bills for spending on their pet projects -- comes after scandals that voters blamed on Republicans. The GOP never passed comprehensive ethics legislation, to the chagrin of many of the party's own members.

House Democrats are also talking about reinstating rules that would require any new tax cuts or spending increases to be offset by other cuts, a measure designed to reduce future budget deficits -- another issue that opinion polls show Americans are concerned about.

At the close of the last legislative session, some Republican lawmakers decried the spending excesses of their own party, which has presided over record budget deficits despite its platform of fiscal restraint.

Democrats plan to liberalize federal funding for stem cell research, a popular initiative that was approved by bipartisan majorities in both chambers of Congress before the president vetoed it in July.

And they are pledging to repeal a law passed in 2003 that prohibited the federal government from using its purchasing power to negotiate lower drug prices for Medicare recipients, a top concern of senior citizens.

That proposal, too, earlier won bipartisan support when the Senate voted in March to support the idea in concept.

Some of the 100-hour issues are so popular that opposition appears to have melted away.

Representatives of the business community for a decade had been engaged in a struggle with organized labor to blunt any raise in the minimum wage. Yet now they say they see little chance of stopping the Democratic push to increase it from $5.15 an hour to $7.25 an hour.

It is uncertain whether Republican insistence on some tax relief for small businesses could hang up the measure. But few expect major battles.

"There's not much desire to start a fight on it. It's not winnable," said one business lobbyist. "The White House doesn't appear to have a lot of fight in them ... (and) I don't think weakened Republican minorities are going to want to fight."

Even some oil executives have said they don't need all of the tax breaks that the federal government has granted the industry in recent years. House Democrats have promised to repeal a number of them.

Twelve years ago, the House Republican caucus that Newt Gingrich led into the majority set a very different tone, filling its agenda with a number of highly contentious issues that touched off bruising battles with the minority party.

In its "Contract With America," the GOP pledged to place term limits on lawmakers, slash taxes, cut welfare benefits and curtail the rights of death row inmates to appeal their sentences.

Gingrich also made no secret of his plans to roll over Clinton.

"Republicans did something that was very foolish by essentially claiming that the president was irrelevant," said Rutgers University congressional scholar Ross K. Baker. Baker noted that Clinton deftly outmaneuvered them, and Republicans lost seats in the next election.

"However the Democratic leaders feel about President Bush," Baker said, "no one in any position of authority has proclaimed that President Bush is irrelevant."

Once Democrats move beyond the popular items in their first 100 hours, however, their challenges will mount.

Americans overwhelmingly want Congress and the White House to address the war in Iraq first. In a recent Gallup poll, 69 percent said the war should be the top priority, compared with 16 percent who pointed to the economy, which was second.

By contrast, the items on the 100-hour agenda ranked far down on the list.

House and Senate Democrats have planned a series of oversight hearings in January to focus attention on the war. And several senior Democrats have pledged to fight any proposal to send more troops to Iraq.

But the new majority has indicated it will shy away from asserting its real power to shape the war: using its budgetary authority to restrict spending.

"We will have oversight," Pelosi said recently. "We will not cut off funding."

Equally uncertain is the fate of healthcare reform, another legislative quandary that has increased in urgency as the number of uninsured Americans nears 47 million.

Last month, Sen. Ron Wyden, D-Ore., unveiled an ambitious proposal for universal health insurance, but neither Pelosi nor Reid has promised to revisit the controversial issue. And without Bush's support, the prospects for such a far-reaching plan are slim.

Democratic leaders have reached out to the White House to discuss Social Security, the long-term solvency of which is a major challenge confronting the federal government.

Incoming House Ways and Means Chairman Charles B. Rangel, D-N.Y., recently had lunch with Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., who is taking the lead for the administration on economic issues.

In a recent interview, Rangel said both sides had reason to compromise. "We have two years to prove that the voters were right, and the president has two years to prove that he's not a lame duck," he said.

Democrats To Start Without GOP Input (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton And Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, January 2, 2007

As they prepare to take control of Congress this week and face up to campaign pledges to restore bipartisanship and openness, Democrats are planning to largely sideline Republicans from the first burst of lawmaking.

DOJ_NMG_0111102

House Democrats intend to pass a raft of popular measures as part of their well-publicized plan for the first 100 hours. They include tightening ethics rules for lawmakers, raising the minimum wage, allowing more research on stem cells and cutting interest rates on student loans.

But instead of allowing Republicans to fully participate in deliberations, as promised after the Democratic victory in the Nov. 7 midterm elections, Democrats now say they will use House rules to prevent the opposition from offering alternative measures, assuring speedy passage of the bills and allowing their party to trumpet early victories.

Nancy Pelosi, the Californian who will become House speaker, and Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, who will become majority leader, finalized the strategy over the holiday recess in a flurry of conference calls and meetings with other party leaders. A few Democrats, worried that the party would be criticized for reneging on an important pledge, argued unsuccessfully that they should grant the Republicans greater latitude when the Congress convenes on Thursday.

The episode illustrates the dilemma facing the new party in power. The Democrats must demonstrate that they can break legislative gridlock and govern after 12 years in the minority, while honoring their pledge to make the 110th Congress a civil era in which Democrats and Republicans work together to solve the nation's problems. Yet in attempting to pass laws key to their prospects for winning reelection and expanding their majority, the Democrats may have to resort to some of the same tough tactics Republicans used the past several years.

Democratic leaders say they are torn between giving Republicans a say in legislation and shutting them out to prevent them from derailing Democratic bills.

"There is a going to be a tension there," said Rep. Chris Van Hollen (Md.), the new chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. "My sense is there's going to be a testing period to gauge to what extent the Republicans want to join us in a constructive effort or whether they intend to be disruptive. It's going to be a work in progress."

House Republicans have begun to complain that Democrats are backing away from their promise to work cooperatively. They are working on their own strategy for the first 100 hours, and part of it is built on the idea that they might be able to break the Democrats' slender majority by wooing away some conservative Democrats.

Democrats intend to introduce their first bills within hours of taking the oath of office on Thursday. The first legislation will focus on the behavior of lawmakers, banning travel on corporate jets and gifts from lobbyists and requiring lawmakers to attach their names to special spending directives and to certify that such earmarks would not financially benefit the lawmaker or the lawmaker's spouse. That bill is aimed at bringing legislative transparency that Democrats said was lacking under Republican rule.

Democratic leaders said they are not going to allow Republican input into the ethics package and other early legislation, because several of the bills have already been debated and dissected, including the proposal to raise the minimum wage, which passed the House Appropriations Committee in the 109th Congress, said Brendan Daly, a spokesman for Pelosi.

"We've talked about these things for more than a year," he said. "The members and the public know what we're voting on. So in the first 100 hours, we're going to pass these bills."

But because the details of the Democratic proposals have not been released, some language could be new. Daly said Democrats are still committed to sharing power with the minority down the line. "The test is not the first 100 hours," he said. "The test is the first six months or the first year. We will do what we promised to do."

For clues about how the Democrats will operate, the spotlight is on the House, where the new 16-seat majority will hold absolute power over the way the chamber operates. Most of the early legislative action is expected to stem from the House.

"It's in the nature of the House of Representatives for the majority party to be dominant and control the agenda and limit as much as possible the influence of the minority," said Ross K. Baker, a political scientist at Rutgers University. "It's almost counter to the essence of the place for the majority and minority to share responsibility for legislation."

In the Senate, by contrast, the Democrats will have less control over business because of their razor-thin 51-to-49-seat margin and because individual senators wield substantial power. Senate Democrats will allow Republicans to make amendments to all their initiatives, starting with the first measure -- ethics and lobbying reform, said Jim Manley, spokesman for the incoming majority leader, Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.).

Those same Democrats, who campaigned on a pledge of more openness in government, will kick off the new Congress with a closed meeting of all senators in the Capitol. Manley said the point of the meeting is to figure out ways both parties can work together.

In the House, Louise M. Slaughter (D-N.Y.), who will chair the Rules Committee, said she intends to bring openness to a committee that used to meet in the middle of the night. In the new Congress, the panel -- which sets the terms of debate on the House floor -- will convene at 10 a.m. before a roomful of reporters.

"It's going to be open," Slaughter said of the process. "Everybody will have an opportunity to participate."

DOJ_NMG_0111103

At the same time, she added, the majority would grant Republicans every possible chance to alter legislation once it reaches the floor. "We intend to allow some of their amendments, not all of them," Slaughter said.

For several reasons, House Democrats are assiduously trying to avoid some of the heavy-handed tactics they resented under GOP rule. They say they want to prove to voters they are setting a new tone on Capitol Hill. But they are also convinced that Republicans lost the midterms in part because they were perceived as arrogant and divisive.

"We're going to make an impression one way or the other," said one Democratic leadership aide. "If it's not positive, we'll be out in two years."

House Republicans say their strategy will be to offer alternative bills that would be attractive to the conservative "Blue Dog" Democrats, with an eye toward fracturing the Democratic coalition. They hope to force some tough votes for Democrats from conservative districts who will soon begin campaigning for 2008 reelection and will have to defend their records.

"We'll capitalize on every opportunity we have," said one GOP leadership aide, adding that Republicans were preparing alternatives to the Democrats' plans to raise the minimum wage, reduce the interest on student loans, and reduce the profits of big oil and energy companies.

Several Blue Dog Democrats said they do not think Republicans can pick up much support from their group.

"If they've got ideas that will make our legislation better, we ought to consider that," said Rep. Allen Boyd Jr. (D-Fla.), leader of the Blue Dogs. "But if their idea is to try to split a group off to gain power, that's what they've been doing for the past six years, and it's all wrong."

To keep her sometimes-fractious coalition together, Pelosi has been distributing the spoils of victory across the ideological spectrum, trying to make sure that no group within the Democratic Party feels alienated.

Blue Dogs picked up some plum committee assignments, with Jim Matheson (Utah) landing a spot on Energy and Commerce and A.B. "Ben" Chandler (Ky.) getting an Appropriations seat. At the same time, members of Black and Hispanic caucuses obtained spots on these panels, as Ciro Rodriguez (Tex.) was given a seat on Appropriations and Artur Davis (Ala.) took the place of Democrat William J. Jefferson (La.) on Ways and Means.

Democrats acknowledge that if they appear too extreme in blocking the opposing party, their party is sure to come under fire from the Republicans, who are already charging they are being left out of the legislative process.

"If you're talking about 100 hours, you're talking about no obstruction whatsoever, no amendments offered other than those approved by the majority," said Rutgers's Baker. "I would like to think after 100 hours are over, the Democrats will adhere to their promise to make the system a little more equitable. But experience tells me it's really going to be casting against type."

"The temptations to rule the roost with an iron hand are very, very strong," he added. "It would take a majority party of uncommon sensitivity and a firm sense of its own agenda to open up the process in any significant degree to minority. But hope springs eternal."

Rules Changes Set As Democrats Retake Reins (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, January 2, 2007

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Democrats savoring a return from the political wilderness are ready to move quickly this week to take the levers of power in a Congress that has been run by Republicans the last 12 years.

On Thursday, Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California will take the gavel as the first female speaker in the history of the House, and immediately undertake a 100 legislative-hour march to quickly put the Democratic stamp on the new Congress.

Before President Bush arrives on Capitol Hill on Jan. 23 for his State of the Union address, House Democrats intend to update ethics rules, raise the minimum wage, implement 9/11 commission recommendations, cut subsidies to the oil industry, promote stem-cell research and make college educations and prescription drugs more affordable.

"Democrats are prepared to govern and ready to lead," Mrs. Pelosi said.

On the first day back, Democrats plan to change House rules on what members can accept from lobbyists. On the second day, they'll vote on other rules changes requiring that new spending or tax cuts be paid for and that pet projects tucked into larger bills be publicly disclosed.

The new Democratic Senate, under Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada, will take a parallel if somewhat more leisurely track.

The first week or 10 days of business will be devoted to ethics and lobbying reform that stalled in the last Congress, including a proposal to ban lawmakers from accepting gifts and travel from lobbyists and one making it more difficult for former members who become lobbyists to solicit their former colleagues.

DOJ_NMG_0111104

All of this is reminiscent of January 1995, when Republicans kept the House in past midnight on their first day in power after 40 years of Democratic rule. "This will be the busiest day on opening day in congressional history," new Speaker Newt Gingrich, Georgia Republican, boasted at the time.

Like the 100 hours of the Democratic agenda, Mr. Gingrich gave the House 100 days to vote on the far-broader Contract with America. In the end, Republicans did achieve some of the goals of that political treatise, such as cutting taxes, reforming welfare and fighting crime. Others, such as product-liability bills and constitutional amendments to limit the terms of lawmakers and balance the budget, ultimately failed.

Mrs. Pelosi, like her Republican colleagues a dozen years ago, is also promising a more benevolent majority, saying the new House rules will state plainly that the minority will get a chance to offer amendments, read legislation before it gets voted on and participate in House-Senate negotiations. She is working with new Minority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, on the idea of setting up an independent panel to investigate ethics issues.

In the Senate, where Democrats hold a fragile 51-49 majority, Mr. Reid and Republican leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky have agreed to open the session with a joint caucus, a gesture aimed at establishing "a new tone" and an attempt to "produce real results," Mr. Reid said.

It's not clear how long this bipartisan spirit will last. Mr. Boehner has already complained that Democrats, in hustling through their 100-hour agenda, are backtracking on their promise of a more open Congress.

And while Mr. Bush has given qualified support to the Democratic push for an increase in the minimum wage and applauded their efforts to curtail pet projects or earmarks, a vote to boost federal support of embryonic stem-cell research could provoke an early showdown with the White House. Similar legislation passed by the Republican-led Congress led to the only veto thus far of the Bush presidency.

Democrats are also certain to hit hard on a new Iraq policy, expected to be announced by Mr. Bush in January, that may increase U.S. forces in Iraq.

The House and Senate Armed Services committees, under Rep. Ike Skelton, Missouri Democrat, and Sen. Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat, are gearing up for hearings at which new Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and others will likely face tough questions on the conduct of the war.

Dems Eager To Put Stamp On New Congress (AP)

Democrats savoring a return from political wilderness are ready to move quickly this week to take the levers of power in a Congress that has been run by Republicans the last 12 years.

On Thursday, Nancy Pelosi will take the gavel as the first woman speaker in the history of the House, and immediately launch a 100 legislative-hour march to quickly put the Democratic stamp on the new Congress.

Democrats may have more success because they have taken a less ambitious approach, said Sarah Binder, a political scientist at George Washington University and analyst for the liberal-oriented Brookings Institution think tank. They realize that their newfound majority is not so much a demand for liberal policy as a referendum on the Bush administration, she said. "I'm really struck by how pragmatic the new Democratic majority appears to be with such a limited agenda," Binder said.

Linda Fowler, professor of government at Dartmouth College, said that while some of the Democratic proposals could face a tough sell in the Senate, "what the Democrats have done is quite reasonably recognize that they need some centrist positions that have fairly broad appeal."

Pelosi, like her GOP colleagues a dozen years ago, is also promising a more benevolent majority, saying the new House rules will state plainly that the minority will get a chance to offer amendments, read legislation before it gets voted on and participate in House-Senate negotiations. She is working with new minority leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, on the idea of setting up an independent panel to investigate ethics issues.

In the Senate, where Democrats hold a fragile 51-49 majority, Reid and Republican leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky have agreed to open the session with a joint caucus, a gesture aimed at establishing "a new tone" and an attempt to "produce real results next year," said Reid.

The House and Senate Armed Services committees, under Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., and Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., respectively, are gearing up for hearings at which new Defense Secretary Robert Gates and others will likely face tough questions on the conduct of the war, contracting practices and a soon-to-be-announced request for $100 billion in new money to fight the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

As New Congress Nears, House Democrats Could Be Headed For Own Divide (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 1 — Representative John D. Dingell, a Michigan Democrat who with more than 50 years' tenure is the senior member of the House, is not so sure about the idea of creating an independent group to enforce ethics rules.

George Miller, a House veteran entering his 17th term, is a close ally of Nancy Pelosi, the incoming speaker.

But Gabrielle Giffords, a brand-new House Democrat from Arizona, considers it a no-brainer. Of the longstanding approach in which lawmakers are seated on the ethics committee to police their peers, Representative-elect Giffords said, "It is like having the fox guard the henhouse."

Those divergent outlooks over how best to fulfill the Democratic promise to clean up the House are just one illustration of a friction that could develop in the new Congress as the party takes control after 12 years in exile. While most attention will be focused on the divide between Republicans and Democrats, members of the new majority have their own differing perspectives, corresponding largely to length of service, that could ultimately prove more crucial to their success or failure.

Of 233 Democrats who will be sworn in on Thursday, 147 — 63 percent — have been elected since Republicans won control of the House in 1994, and have never served in the majority. Those whose service predates the 1994 revolution, on the other hand, number only 86, or 37 percent. But it is this core of senior Democrats, Mr. Dingell among them, who will lead 20 of the 21 major committees and so exercise concentrated legislative power.

The differences in tenure tend to manifest themselves geographically as well. The makeup of the senior membership has a more urban flavor, while those more recently elected tend to come from the suburbs and exurbs. These newer members have faced tougher electoral opposition than their older counterparts, who in many cases represent overwhelmingly safe Democratic districts; a majority of new chairmen have traditional liberal roots.

Lawmakers, senior aides and analysts say the institutional gulf is not necessarily problematic and could even prove beneficial if Democratic leaders are able to harness the experience and skill of the chairmen to the enthusiasm and drive for reform exhibited by the newcomers.

But they worry that it could become a distraction if the “old bulls,” as they are sometimes called, believe that less seasoned lawmakers are demanding too much too fast or if the newer members see the veterans as representative of Congressional inertia.

“The guys who have been there for a while and built up seniority saw an abuse of the system, so they know firsthand why it has to change,” said Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, who will be chairman of the Democratic caucus. “The new members ran on an agenda of why it has to be changed.

“If managed correctly, you have the experience and energy to make changes. If not managed correctly, it has the potential to be a fault line.”

Leading House Democrats say the long-tenured members and those sent to Congress in recent elections broadly agree on a desire to move ahead on social programs, ethics, energy, national security and fiscal responsibility. The differences, they say, are subtler. Do issues studied in the previous Congress, for instance, need a full further examination in committee, in deference to the new chairmen? Is there need for a separate commission to scrutinize war contracting, or should this too be the province of the committees?

In any event, it is clear that the lower classmen, particularly the large and celebrated group of 30 freshmen, want to move quickly.

“The new class coming in and some of the other newer members are absolutely committed to delivering on the agenda we talked about during the election,” said Representative Chris Van Hollen of Maryland, who will lead the House Democratic campaign effort for 2008. “Now that we are in power, we want to make sure that we are changing direction in Washington, and that means following through not just on the big print but the fine print, a break with business as usual.”

Representative-elect Ed Perlmutter, Democrat of Colorado, agreed.

“I don’t think the chairs are not looking to be aggressive,” Mr. Perlmutter said, “but I do see in this freshman class a real desire to make changes and move things along quickly, because I think that was the direction we were given by our voters.”

Senior Democrats say that as the lawmakers who endured minority status for so long, they are the ones most painfully aware of a need for new direction. Their stake in holding on to a majority, they say, means protecting and advancing the careers of new lawmakers, who in many cases were elected with fund-raising and other help from senior Democrats.

“It is not like we are just now meeting for the first time,” said Representative Barney Frank, Democrat of Massachusetts, who will be chairman of the House Financial Services Committee and can tick off the names of junior committee members he has worked with, as well as several freshmen he personally supported. “We all campaigned for these guys.”

Kate Phillips and The Times's politics staff report on the latest political news from around the nation.

More Politics NewsMr. Dingell said an urge to remake the House was hardly anything new.

“This is a normal phenomenon which occurs in this place every two years,” he said, “and I have seen no class come in that could be described as different. We all come here just dying to do something. But the smart ones of us know how to get it done by working within the system. I have no fears they are out to burn the place down.”

But Norman Ornstein, a longtime Congressional observer at the American Enterprise Institute, said he saw competing drives among members of the new majority.

“You have a significant number of Democrats who think the major change is that the whip is now in their hands and it is the Republicans taking the lash,” Mr. Ornstein said. “A number of others want to keep the spigots running, but just into their own pockets. Those who genuinely want to change the House — the way it operates, the culture of Washington — have their work cut out for them.”

The Democrats’ leader, Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the incoming speaker, has been in the House since 1987 but has never been chairwoman of a committee, and so in some respects her role may be that of an outsider free to pursue transformation. In one of her first tests, however, some seven weeks ago, many of those headed for chairmanships opposed her push to install Representative John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania as majority leader. Instead, they backed Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, at least partly because they saw him as a check on Mrs. Pelosi’s power. Mr. Hoyer went on to win.

Mrs. Pelosi has told allies that while she respects the authority of the new chairmen, she will not allow them to dominate the party agenda or stall legislative initiatives that have broad support. And she has already indicated that she does not intend to send the party’s early legislative initiatives back through the committee process, but will instead bring a minimum-wage increase and energy and health bills, among others, straight to the floor.

Democrats senior and junior say they are watching to see whether their ideals merge or collide. But they view party differences as just another factor they will have to take into account as they assume control.

“I think people understand it is a little bit of a bump and we have to deal with it,” Mr. Frank said.

Michael Arcuri, a moderate Democrat from upstate New York who won a Republican-held seat in November, said the combination of exuberance and experience should prove an advantage for the party.

"If we strike the balance between the two," Mr. Arcuri said, "we are going to accomplish some pretty incredible things."

The New Crowd's First Test (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, January 2, 2007

This time it's going to be different.

Whenever a new crowd displaces an old guard, the promise is always the same. The fresh managers swear they understand what the tired bunch they're replacing did wrong and vow to make all things new.

The Democrats who take power in Congress on Thursday have been given an opportunity that has not come their party's way for a half-century: They can remake their own image -- and Congress's -- and they can begin to restore public confidence in government.

While control of the Senate has flip-flopped between the parties since 1980, the House has stayed in one party's hands for long periods. Democrats controlled the House for 40 years after 1954, Republicans for the past 12. The 2006 election marked the first time since that 1954 contest that both houses switched from the Republicans to the Democrats.

This allows the new Democratic majority, in principle at least, to come in with no commitments to doing business as it was done in the immediate past.

If Democrats don't seize this rare opportunity, their party will pay for a long time. Not only will they disillusion their own supporters, but, more important, the angry centrists of the Ross Perot stripe who voted the Republicans out last year will either go back to the GOP or seek other options.

The first opportunity in the House will come on the very first day, when a package of reforms comes up for a vote. The Senate will take its own steps soon after. At stake initially are new ethics and lobbying rules. Over time House and Senate leaders will have to prove their commitment to bringing more democracy to the way Congress is run. A country that claims a mission to democracy and transparent government in the rest of the world needs to get its own institutions in order.

The new congressional leadership seems to recognize how important it is to get ethics and lobbying reform right. In the House, incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Majority Leader Steny Hoyer have sent members strongly worded proposals that would, among other things, ban gifts from lobbyists, lobbyist-paid travel and the use of company planes.

Congress will also consider a series of important lobbying reforms, many of them designed to strengthen inadequate disclosure requirements so the public knows who is doing what. One of my favorite ideas, from the veteran reformer Fred Wertheimer, would call upon lobbyists and lobbying organizations to disclose the earmarks they have lobbied for and the sponsors of those earmarks in the reports they are required to file with Congress.

The new Congress is already talking about requiring members to disclose their sponsorship of earmarks, those special little (or not so little) spending projects and tax breaks inserted into various bills with almost no public attention. But such disclosure does not tell citizens all they need to know, such as which lobbyists and which interest groups are pushing which special programs.

Fiscal conservatives who claim they can't stand those earmarks should rally to this idea. The best way to stop unjustified earmarks is to shed as much light as possible on their purpose and provenance.

What the Democrats are talking about sounds good. What will matter is that the provisions they pass not contain loopholes that render them much less far-reaching than they seem.

Members of Congress can legitimately ask for reasonable rules so they are not caught up unintentionally or unfairly in violations. But much will depend on the definition of "reasonable." Passing rules that don't rein in the corruption that became so obvious in the last Congress will be worse than passing nothing, because the hypocrisy will be obvious.

And any Democrats who think this anti-corruption talk is just a fad should consult a memo written two weeks after November's elections by Rep. Rahm Emanuel, the incoming chairman of the Democratic caucus and the House's shrewdest electoral tactician.

Emanuel counted eight districts the Democrats won largely because of corruption issues. The Democrats, he said, need to be the reformers they said they'd be. "Failing to deliver on this promise," he added, "would be devastating to our standing with the public, and certainly jeopardize some of our marginal seats."

President Bush briefly claimed back in 2000 to be "a reformer with results." This time, the voters who mattered in 2006 expect reform to be one of the results of the ballots they cast for Democrats.

Power Shift In Congress Revives Health Debate (NYT)

By Robert Pear

DOJ_NMG_0111108

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 1 — Within days of convening, the new Congress will return to some of the biggest battles of the last decade as House Democrats try to rush through legislation requiring the government to negotiate lower drug prices for Medicare beneficiaries and overturning President Bush's restrictions on embryonic stem cell research.

The Medicare proposal highlights the profound differences between Democrats and Republicans over the future of the nation's health care system, the proper role of government and the role of private markets in securing the best value for the huge sums spent on health care.

State officials say they wish Congress would focus on a more immediate problem: money for the Children's Health Insurance Program, which provides coverage for four million low-income children, is running out in more than a dozen states.

Dr. Rhonda M. Medows, commissioner of the Georgia Department of Community Health, said, "Our program will run out of federal money in March, and all 260,000 children in the program will lose their health care coverage if Congress fails to act."

In debating the future of the children's health program, which has broad bipartisan support, Congress will take up proposals to cover some of the 46 million people who have no health insurance.

Dr. Mark B. McClellan, former administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said, "Congress should consider expanding the Children's Health Insurance Program to low-income adults." Many Democrats agree. But even modest proposals may collide with Democratic efforts to restore fiscal discipline and to reduce the federal budget deficit.

Congress convenes on Thursday. Representative Nancy Pelosi, the California Democrat who is in line to be speaker, has said the House will, in its first 100 hours, vote on bills to authorize drug price negotiations under Medicare and to expand federal financing of stem cell research.

Representative Tom Allen, Democrat of Maine, said he was "giddy" at the prospect of being able to legislate on health care after toiling for 10 years in the minority. "People in Maine find it incomprehensible that the Medicare law has a provision that forbids negotiation of lower prices," said Mr. Allen, who introduced a bill to give beneficiaries access to drug discounts negotiated by the government in 1998.

By adding a drug benefit to Medicare in 2003, Congress authorized the biggest expansion of the program since its creation in 1965. The drug benefit, unlike most Medicare benefits, is delivered entirely by private insurers subsidized by the government. The insurers negotiate with drug manufacturers to obtain discounts, often in return for promoting the use of particular drugs. The 2003 law prohibits the government from interfering in those negotiations and stipulates that Medicare cannot establish a list of preferred drugs.

Most Democrats want to repeal the ban on price negotiations. Wendell E. Primus, an aide to Ms. Pelosi, said the Democratic proposal would require the secretary of health and human services to negotiate, but would not specify how.

"It will be very simple language," Mr. Primus said. "We do not think that Congress needs to hammer out all the details. There are a lot of smart people in the administration, including the secretary, who can look at how we're buying drugs — the Medicaid program, the Department of Defense, vaccines, et cetera — and figure out the best way of negotiating better prices with drug companies."

Republicans said they welcomed the opportunity to debate the issue. The House Republican leader, Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, said the Democrats' proposal would "take a wrecking ball to a popular program that has cut drug costs for consumers through competition." Such competition, he said, "has kept prices lower than anyone expected."

Administration officials suggested that Mr. Bush would veto a bill calling for price negotiations. Democrats could then exploit the issue in the 2008 campaign, as they did in the midterm elections.

Under a bill introduced in 2005 by several House Democrats, Medicare would offer a government-run drug plan, in addition to all the plans offered by private insurance companies, and federal officials would negotiate with drug manufacturers on the prices of drugs covered by the government plan.

But aides to Ms. Pelosi said House Democratic leaders now wanted to go further. Under their proposal, the government would negotiate on behalf of all people in Medicare drug plans, more than 22.5 million people.

Skip to next paragraph House Democrats assume that if the government negotiates lower drug prices, the savings will automatically be passed on to beneficiaries in the form of lower premiums. But they could not immediately say how they would guarantee that result. In the absence of detailed instructions from Congress, lower drug prices could mean lower costs and higher profits for the insurers that operate Medicare drug plans.

Michael O. Leavitt, the secretary of health and human services, said he did not want the power to negotiate. "I don't believe I can do a better job than an efficient market," Mr. Leavitt said in an interview.

Leslie V. Norwalk, acting administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said that under the Democrats' proposal her agency would have to "hire hundreds of people to negotiate prices for 4,500 different drugs." And Ms. Norwalk said the agency would be besieged by lobbyists seeking higher Medicare payments for specific drugs. That, she said, is "how Washington really works."

Senator Max Baucus, the Montana Democrat who is in line to become chairman of the Finance Committee, helped shape the 2003 law. In March, he voted against a proposal to authorize drug price negotiations. But Mr. Baucus, who is up for re-election in 2008, said he had an open mind and would hold hearings on the idea.

Kate Leone, an aide to the Senate Democratic leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, said Senate Democrats had the same legislative priorities as House Democrats, but were not committed to the 100-hour schedule.

Mr. Primus said the new Congress would also "give the president another chance to veto a stem cell bill," like the one he vetoed in July.

In campaign commercials in 2006, Democrats and some Republicans boasted of their support for embryonic stem cell research as a way to find treatments for a wide range of diseases. Advocates of such research say that, despite gains in the elections, they still do not have the votes to override a veto. They are working with Senate allies on a plan to attach the stem cell bill to unrelated legislation that Mr. Bush would feel obliged to sign.

Lawmakers are also likely to wrestle with these issues:

¶Many Democrats will try to reduce Medicare payments to managed care plans. They contend such plans are overpaid by about 10 percent. Insurers intend to fight back, with support from the Bush administration, Republican lawmakers and beneficiaries who see the plans as a way to obtain extra benefits at an affordable cost.

¶Congress faces a huge challenge in devising a new formula to pay doctors for treating Medicare patients. Under the current formula, doctors' fees would be cut more than 4 percent a year for the next decade. Lawmakers are determined to avert such cuts, but see no easy way to pay the cost.

¶Democrats have drafted legislation to speed the approval of safe, low-cost versions of expensive biotechnology drugs, which account for a growing share of spending on pharmaceuticals.

People who pay for health care, including state officials, employers and insurers, support such legislation as a way to slow spending on biotech drugs, which can cost more than $10,000 a year. Biotech companies argue that their products, made from living organisms, are so complex that they cannot be exactly duplicated by generic drug manufacturers. As a result, they say, a "copy" would rarely be interchangeable with the original.

The Food and Drug Administration has approved thousands of generic drugs deemed equivalent to traditional brand-name medicines. But the agency is unsure of its legal authority to approve such versions of biotech drugs.

Millions Save Money On Medicare Program (NYT)

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) -- At first, Ruth Goundry wasn't sure about participating in the new Medicare drug benefit. It was too confusing, she said. But in the end, she gave it a try. She's glad she did.

As the program's first year draws to a close, Goundry estimates that she saved about $150 a month on her five medicines, compared with what she was spending before Medicare Part D began.

"I would say I'm very impressed with the whole thing. I have no complaints," said Goundry, a resident of Chesapeake Beach, Md. "It's meant a tremendous savings. I know other people who are saved by it. I mean that. They don't hardly pay anything."

Goundry is like millions of seniors who say they are happy with the benefit, which cost the federal government about $30 billion in 2006.

But the program affects seniors and the disabled differently, depending upon their income and health. There are many people who believe the program could be improved.

Just down the street, at the Chesapeake Care Pharmacy, Wesley Copeland is not so impressed.

In August, he began picking up all the cost of his medicine -- about $300 a month. Plus, he had to continue paying his monthly premium of $38. That gap in coverage is called the doughnut hole.

"We've got a lot of people in my neighborhood who are seniors like me on retirement. We have to stretch pennies, so when it gets to that doughnut hole, we have to scramble like hell to keep going," Copeland said.

Goundry and Copeland represent the millions of stories surrounding the addition of a drug benefit to Medicare this past year. The drug coverage has often been described as the biggest change in Medicare in the program' 40 years.

Under the program, seniors and the disabled enroll in a private plan. They pay a monthly premium to the plan. The government also pays the plan.

DOJ_NMG_0111110

The Bush administration estimates that the coverage saves the average beneficiary about $1,200. But many in Washington, particularly Democratic lawmakers, say the savings could be greater if the government were allowed to negotiate with drug manufacturers concerning the cost of medicine rather than leaving that chore to the plans.

Overall, about 22.5 million people enrolled in private plans during the programs first year. Nearly 7 million more people get their medicine through their employer, and those employers get a tax credit for providing that coverage.

That total of nearly 30 million getting coverage through Part D is much less than was originally projected. However, analysts also didn't realize that so many seniors had insurance coverage for their medicine through other programs.

The Bush administration acknowledges the program got off to a rough start as hundreds of thousands of people showed up in pharmacy computers as not being enrolled in a plan.

Beverly Dillon, a pharmacy technician in Chesapeake Beach, said that in the program's early weeks, her store advanced about 75 to 100 patients medicine to help them get by.

"We would not let patients go without their medication," she said.

The state of Maryland also stepped in to pick up the cost of medicine for poor beneficiaries, she noted. Most other states did as well.

"January and February were absolutely crazy," she said. "I would say that around March, or late February, things started to calm down."

She said many seniors are still confused about the program. To prove her point, a customer came into the store to get a refill. Dillon noted that she was in a Part D plan, but the customer was insistent that she was not and that she had coverage through another program. Dillon relented, not wanting to upset her.

Dillon said most customers who did not have insurance coverage prior to the past year are saving money. She has noticed that the checks they write to the pharmacy now are much smaller.

"There's definitely a significant savings," she said. "(But) the program just got off to such a bad start in the beginning, it just has not been smooth."

Dillon is bracing for some rough spots in the coming weeks too. That's because some seniors are switching plans. Others have been automatically enrolled in new plans.

Herb Kuhn, deputy administrator at the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said that he believes the federal government learned many lessons from the past year that will make this year's startup run more smoothly.

"We have a much more sophisticated and built up infrastructure from a year ago," Kuhn said.

Kuhn said his biggest concern going into the new year are those beneficiaries who waited until the final days of the open-enrollment period to change drug plans. He said seniors should bring to the pharmacy any kind of identification or acknowledgment letter from their plan that would show proof of membership.

Overall, Kuhn said that 2006 was a good year for beneficiaries.

"We believe it's been a very positive year for Part D," he said. "As a result of the new program, beneficiaries are living better. They're saving money."

A Clean Fiscal Slate (WP)

The Washington Post, January 2, 2007

THEY DIDN'T quite trash the place on their way out, but congressional Republicans -- specifically, the Senate leadership under outgoing Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) -- engaged in the legislative equivalent of vandalism when it came to getting spending bills passed: They didn't. Of the measures needed to fund the government during fiscal 2007, now three months gone, the 109th Congress managed to approve only bills to pay for defense and homeland security spending. The rest of the government -- $463 billion in discretionary spending -- was left to run on autopilot.

Confronted with this abdication of responsibility, the incoming Democratic management faced an unpleasant choice. It could take the time to clean up this fiscal year's mess, a time-consuming process that would inevitably have led to fights over earmarks and spending levels, along with filibuster threats from Senate Republicans and possible vetoes from President Bush. Or it could essentially write off the 2007 budget process and move on with a clean slate to 2008 -- a process that will begin in February, when Mr. Bush is to present his budget along with a whopper of an emergency spending bill to pay for operations in Iraq.

Democrats chose the latter course, and under the circumstances, it's hard to fault them. The new appropriations committee chairmen, Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.) and Rep. David R. Obey (D-Wis.), announced that they would move to fund the remainder of the fiscal year under a continuing resolution, limiting domestic appropriations to 2006 levels. "While the results will be far from ideal, this path provides the best way to dispose of the unfinished business quickly, and allow governors, state and local officials, and families to finally plan for the coming year with some knowledge of what the federal government is funding," they said in a joint statement.

The boldest part of the Democrats' plan is to strip earmarks out of the spending measures -- although, as their statement noted, such projects will be eligible for reconsideration in 2008 and those earmarks that were included in previous spending bills and are slated for renewal this year won't be affected. Still, this earmark shock therapy could prove valuable, like quitting smoking by going cold turkey; the 2008 process, the chairmen promised, will be conducted under "new standards for transparency and accountability."

The Democrats have given themselves the clean slate they deserved. Their real test will come as they work to craft a 2008 budget that is both frugal and fair, not to mention finished on time.

New Leaders' Decisions Could Significantly Affect The Government Workforce (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, January 2, 2007

Making decisions on government spending will be a big and early order of business for the new Congress, which returns this week.

Most federal agencies are operating on an interim spending bill that expires Feb. 15. Key lawmakers have said they plan to put the government on a post-holiday diet that will stretch through September, and that could cause some headaches for federal employees.

Because most agencies will not get budget increases to fully offset pay raises, higher rents and other overhead costs, some agencies will have little choice but to curtail training, travel, hiring and the purchase of new equipment. It's possible that cash-strapped agencies might have to send workers home without pay for a few days, but the White House budget office hopes to be able to shift funding around to avoid furloughs and layoffs.

The funding crunch will not affect President Bush's executive order, issued in late December, providing an average 2.2 percent pay raise for federal employees. Government retirees also will see their monthly pension checks increase this month, by 2.3 percent or 3.3 percent, depending on their retirement system.

Although congressional aides were reluctant to make any predictions for the new year, it seems likely that the federal budget, the Iraq conflict, lobbying reform and completion of the 9/11 Commission recommendations will push many federal-employee issues to the sidelines in the opening months of the new Congress.

Key lawmakers have signaled that they are taking a wait-and-see attitude on the administration's efforts to install pay-for-performance systems at the Defense and Homeland Security departments.

Federal unions have challenged proposals to curb collective bargaining at the Defense Department, and a federal appeals panel will probably issue a ruling by spring. Unions prevailed in court on proposed workplace changes at the Homeland Security Department, which will report to a federal judge no later than July 17 on next steps for the personnel system.

The Bush administration, though, may propose a few changes to laws that affect federal employees.

Officials said the administration will again ask Congress to rewrite laws so federal employees can switch to part-time work late in their careers without taking a pension reduction and to allow agencies to bring back federal retirees without salary offsets so the rehired annuitants can collect a full paycheck and a full pension. Those efforts began last year but did not get any traction on Capitol Hill.

Linda M. Springer, director of the Office of Personnel Management, is also interested in exploring whether a program could be created to offer short-term disability insurance to federal employees. Such a program could help the government recruit employees and might be a way to provide maternity benefits, easing complaints from younger federal employees who would like the government to offer paid parental leave to care for newborns and adoptions.

Congress will also be reorganizing committees and realigning members who serve on those panels.

Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), the new chairman of the House Government Reform Committee, has announced plans for five subcommittees, two fewer than in the last Congress. Waxman plans to create a federal workforce, post office and District of Columbia subcommittee and a government management, organization and procurement subcommittee.

Aides have been working on areas of jurisdiction, but one said the federal workforce subcommittee would likely oversee the implementation of pay-for-performance systems at the Defense and Homeland Security departments, while the government management subcommittee would track the president's policy initiatives, such as outsourcing, e-gov and other parts of the presidential management agenda.

House Democratic leaders have made some committee assignments.

DOJ_NMG_0111112

Rep. C.A. Dutch Ruppersberger (D-Md.) will take the seat on the House Appropriations Committee being vacated by Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.), the new House majority leader. Hoyer has played the leading role in efforts to raise federal salaries, and an aide to Ruppersberger said his boss will also seek to improve federal pay and benefits.

Ruppersberger's district expects to pick up 60,000 new jobs as part of the military's Base Realignment and Closure process, primarily at Fort Meade and the Aberdeen Proving Ground. He also represents employees who work at the National Security Agency and at the Coast Guard Yard at Curtis Bay.

Rep. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.), an advocate for federal employees, is joining the Ways and Means Committee, which has jurisdiction over tax policy, Social Security, Medicare and trade issues.

The National Active and Retired Federal Employees Association hopes that the Ways and Means Committee, which will be chaired by Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), will show more interest in modifying laws that frustrate many federal retirees, such as the offset and windfall elimination provisions in Social Security law. Federal retirees also are campaigning for statutory changes that would permit them to pay their health insurance premiums with pre-tax annuities, similar to the tax break provided federal employees.

Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.) will be chairman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, which oversees federal employee issues. An agenda has not been set, but some aides expect the committee will pay close attention to contracting problems, including instances of waste and fraud at the Defense and Homeland Security departments.

Lieberman will be joined by senators with a strong interest in federal employee issues, including Daniel K. Akaka (D-Hawaii), Thomas R. Carper (D-Del.), Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), Susan Collins (R-Maine), George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio) and John W. Warner (R-Va.). Akaka plans to review the federal employees health insurance program and how it sets premiums, an aide said.

A Party, With Pelosi Front And Center (NYT)

By ANNE E. KORNBLUT

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 1 — During her first 100 hours as House speaker, Nancy Pelosi has vowed, she will sweep an aggressive legislative agenda through the newly Democratic-controlled House.

Kate Phillips and The Times's politics staff report on the latest political news from around the nation.

More Politics NewsBut first comes Pelosi-palooza.

In a three-day stretch of whirlwind events beginning on Wednesday, Mrs. Pelosi will celebrate her heritage (at the Italian Embassy), her faith (in a Roman Catholic Mass), her education (at Trinity College), her childhood (in Baltimore) and her current home (in a tribute by the singer Tony Bennett, of “I Left My Heart in San Francisco” fame).

She will embrace her status as the first female House speaker with a tea for women. She will highlight her pull among Democrats with a $1,000-per-person fund-raising concert. And she will welcome visitors to the halls of Congress in an open-house tour.

In the midst of it all, when the new Congress opens on Thursday, Mrs. Pelosi will be sworn in to her new post and plans to get to work on the House floor right away.

The extended, carefully staged festivities are expected to dominate the occasion of Mrs. Pelosi’s ascendance as the Democrats take control of Congress. Although Senate Democrats are also ushering in a new majority this week, their leaders have arranged much more low-key events intended to celebrate their incoming freshmen rather than Harry Reid, the Nevada senator who will be the new majority leader.

Supporters of Mrs. Pelosi said she had every right — an obligation, even — to underscore her new role, given the historic nature of her rise to power. Thus the week is planned to project much more than an ordinary handoff of power in Congress. It is intended to leave a firm imprint of the new House leader’s style and substance on the national consciousness, reminding voters that Mrs. Pelosi is both the first woman to take the job as well as a Catholic mother of five with Italian, blue-collar roots.

“It is an introduction of her to the country — and certainly who she is, as an outgrowth of her family, her growing up in Baltimore, where she went to school, and the values and the roots she had in that community,” said Representative George Miller, Democrat of California and a close Pelosi ally.

In other words, she is not the liberal extremist her detractors have tried to depict (one Republican advertisement during the midterm election cycle warned that “liberal Democrat Nancy Pelosi” would embrace illegal immigrants and reward them with welfare, ominously asking, “How do we stop her?”).

DOJ_NMG_0111113

Yet a number of Mrs. Pelosi's supporters said the aim was not simply to define the new House speaker in mainstream political terms. They said she valued style and flourish — previously embodied in her fashionable clothes and her habit of taking Ghirardelli chocolates to meetings — and recognized that an inauguration with flair could help capture the national imagination.

At the same time, part of her power is derived from her vast network of wealthy donors, including California celebrities, who appreciate a lavish thank-you.

Representative Anna G. Eshoo, a California Democrat who has been a friend of Mrs. Pelosi for decades, said, "It will be done elegantly, because she's so tasteful."

"It will have some feminine touches to it, obviously," Ms. Eshoo said. "But more than anything else, it is just highly celebratory, because there are so many firsts that are interwoven into her ascendancy."

Some Republicans have privately complained that Mrs. Pelosi is drawing too much attention to herself and failing to recognize that the week is not about her. Yet past House speakers have often been defined by their strong personalities and individual styles, and Democrats, by and large, said they were glad to see Mrs. Pelosi unabashedly seizing the spotlight.

"I think what she's doing is perfectly appropriate, because she is making history," said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, who led the Democratic victory in the Senate.

Many of the week's gatherings are ostensibly devoted to others, as well. The first event, a Mass at Trinity University, where Mrs. Pelosi graduated in 1962, is "in remembrance of the children of Darfur and Katrina," according to a schedule released by her office. A tea that afternoon at the Mellon Auditorium will include a tribute to Ann W. Richards, the late governor of Texas (whose young granddaughter will speak, as will Mrs. Pelosi's). A prayer service at St. Peter's Catholic Church on Thursday is in "honor of U.S. men and women in uniform."

On Thursday, after her swearing in, Mrs. Pelosi will sponsor a concert at the National Building Museum (the performers Carole King and Wyclef Jean are expected to attend, along with Mr. Bennett). The next day, she plans to open up Congress for a "people's House reception" for the public. That afternoon, the departing mayor of Baltimore and governor-elect of Maryland, Martin O'Malley, will dedicate a city street to Mrs. Pelosi.

The Baltimore ceremony had been originally scheduled as the kickoff event on Tuesday, but it was moved in honor of the national day of mourning for former President Gerald R. Ford.

Bushes Pay Respects To Ford In Capitol (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, January 2, 2007

President Bush on Monday bowed his head in silence before the flag-draped casket of Gerald R. Ford — a man the president said used a calm, steady hand to guide the nation after the tumultuous Watergate years.

On a rainy, gloomy afternoon, Bush and first lady Laura Bush joined thousands of other mourners in paying their respects to the 38th president lying in state at the Capitol.

Silence fell under the Capitol dome when the president walked toward the casket, illuminated by spotlights and guarded at each corner by members of the military honor guard. He and Mrs. Bush lowered their heads for a few moments, as if in prayer, then turned and walked away across the Rotunda's polished stone floor, which reflected the flag's red and white stripes.

Bush, who said nothing during his one-minute stop in the Rotunda, is to eulogize Ford on Tuesday at his funeral at the National Cathedral. After he died last Tuesday, Bush called him a "true gentleman" and recounted how Ford stepped into the Oval Office after President Nixon resigned in disgrace after the Watergate scandal.

"President Ford was a great American who gave many years of dedicated service to our country," Bush said in a statement released after his death. "On Aug. 9, 1974, after a long career in the House of Representatives and service as vice president, he assumed the presidency in an hour of national turmoil and division.

"With his quiet integrity, common sense and kind instincts, President Ford helped heal our land and restore public confidence in the presidency."

Bush visited the casket, his first public event of the new year, after returning from a weeklong stay at his Texas ranch. Afterward, the Bushes drove to Blair House, across the street from the White House, to visit for a half-hour with Ford's widow, former first lady Betty Ford. The Bushes then walked down Pennsylvania Avenue back to the Executive Mansion.

Bush visited the Capitol, where a changing military guard kept a watchful vigil throughout the night, on the third day of mourning there for Ford, who died at 93.

Shortly before the three-day public viewing ended, Mrs. Ford returned to the Capitol and sat in the Rotunda for about 20 minutes with her three sons and daughter and their spouses. She clutched the hand of her son Michael. Her son Steven helped her up when she walked over to the casket, touching it one last time.

Among the other dignitaries to pay their respects Monday were Bush's father, former President George H.W. Bush, and his wife, Barbara; former President Bill Clinton and former first lady, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y.; Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., who this week becomes the first woman speaker of the House; Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass.; former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld; and Vice President Dan Quayle.

Members of Ford's family greeted mourners who came to the Capitol on New Year's Day wearing parkas, packing umbrellas and clutching snack sacks.

Karen Olson, 53, of Herndon, Va., said the rain couldn't dampen her determination to see Ford. Her mother, who's now deceased, was on his staff, she said.

"I wanted to come pay my respects. He was a big part of my life," said Olson, who was among the people lined up before 9 a.m. EST to enter the Capitol building. "I have a lot of ties to his family."

"The few times that I met him, he was just really nice," she said.

Both of Olson's parents have passed away.

"I kind of felt like I wanted to be there for them," she said. "There's just an emotional connection there."

Kirk Scofield, 44, and his wife, Mary Scofield, 50, of Sterling, Va., lined up early too. Mary, who said she had "six hours of food" in her backpack, expected a long wait, though they had been in line less than an hour. "She looks like she's ready to go camping," Kirk joked.

Inside the Rotunda, Ford's daughter and son handed remembrance cards to some of the visitors.

The blue cards had the presidential, vice presidential and House of Representatives seals and a biography of Ford on one side. On the other was a photograph of the former president in the Oval Office, his head bowed.

The message on the card: "The family of Gerald R. Ford deeply appreciates your prayers and many kindnesses as together we celebrate and honor the life of a devoted husband, father, grandfather and great-grandfather and the 38th president of the United States."

Michael Gerald Ford, the former president's son, shook 8-year-old Christopher Witkowski's hand and gave him a blue remembrance card. "My father would have wanted you to have this," he told Christopher, from Alexandria, Va. Ford's sister, Susan Ford Bales, stood nearby, greeting others who had come to pay their respects.

Two of the former president's grandchildren, Heather Vance and Tyne Vance Berlanga, embraced after they were overcome with emotion at the casket.

Ford was appointed vice president by Nixon to replace Spiro Agnew, who resigned in a bribery scandal stemming from his days as Maryland governor. After Nixon resigned in disgrace, Ford assumed the presidency for 2- 1/2 years. A month after taking office, Ford pardoned Nixon for any Watergate crimes he might have committed — a move that political analysts say was perhaps the main reason he lost the 1976 election to Jimmy Carter.

"At a time that the nation was under a lot of pressure, a lot of fire, he stood up for the things that he thought were right at the time," Edna Reeves, 61, of Oxon Hill, Md., said as she walked to the Capitol in the rain. "Much blessings to him for knowing compassion enough to pardon President Nixon. I think that was beautiful. You see he didn't think of himself, he thought about the nation."

Solemn Moments At Capitol (LAT)

By Jim Puzzanghera

The Los Angeles Times, January 2, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush, joining thousands of average Americans who started the New Year by saying goodbye to an old president, stopped Monday at the U.S. Capitol after returning from his Texas ranch to pay his respects to Gerald R. Ford.

Wearing a dark suit and gray tie, Bush was joined by First Lady Laura Bush and a small contingent of White House aides that included Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten and Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove. Shortly after 3 p.m., Bush and his wife walked into the Rotunda, where Ford's body lay in state. They paused for about 10 seconds at the flag-draped casket, hands clasped and heads bowed, before walking out.

Most mourners — a mix of young and old, in their Sunday best or simply sweatshirts and blue jeans — spent a minute or two slowly circling the casket and its military honor guard.

Monday was the second and final day of public viewing for Ford, 93, who died last week at his home in Rancho Mirage, Calif. He had lived longer than any former president and was the 32nd person to lay in honor under the Capitol dome. Ford's casket rested on the same wooden bier used for Abraham Lincoln in 1865.

Bush declared today a national day of mourning as a funeral service will be held for Ford at Washington National Cathedral. Most federal offices, including the courts and post offices, will be closed.

Ford's body will be flown to his hometown of Grand Rapids, Mich., for a final service and public viewing before burial at the Gerald R. Ford Presidential Library and Museum on Wednesday.

Bush will deliver the eulogy at today's service. After paying his brief respects at the Capitol on Monday, Bush visited with former First Lady Betty Ford and her family for about 30 minutes at Blair House, across from the White House. Bush's father, former President George H.W. Bush, his wife, Barbara, and former Secretary of State James A. Baker III also joined them.

Betty Ford returned to the Capitol Rotunda about 5:30 p.m., shortly before the scheduled end of public viewing, along with her four children and their spouses. They sat in chairs in front of the casket for about eight minutes, with Betty Ford holding hands with sons Michael and Steven.

Then she walked to the casket, placed her hand on the American flag that covered the coffin, and bowed her head for about two minutes as her family gathered around her. She whispered a couple of words, then returned to her seat before being escorted out.

Michael and his sister, Susan Ford Bales, greeted mourners in the Rotunda on Monday morning. Five of his granddaughters performed the same service briefly later in the afternoon.

Bush was one of several dignitaries to pay respects to Ford on Monday as many officials returned to the nation's capital following the holidays.

Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco), accompanied by her husband, Paul, crossed herself in front of the casket earlier Monday afternoon. Former President Bush, accompanied by his wife, Baker and former Sen. Alan K. Simpson (R-Wyo.), visited shortly after the president. And former President Clinton and his wife, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), arrived in the late afternoon.

At the Rose Bowl in Pasadena, flags flew at half-staff in honor of Ford and the crowd paused for a moment of silence before the game. Ford played on two national championship football teams in 1932 and 1933 at the University of Michigan, which faced USC on Monday.

Michigan players also honored Ford. They wore stickers on their helmets with Ford's number, 48, which the university retired in 1994, and the word "Bo" for their legendary former coach, Bo Schembechler, who died in November.

Outside the Capitol in Washington, the crowd started small as New Year's Day dawned cold and rainy. But more people — from babies in strollers to senior citizens in wheelchairs — showed up throughout the day as the rain stopped.

One mourner, Glynn A. Crooks, vice chairman of the Shakopee Mdewakanton Sioux Community of Minnesota, came in full headdress and Native American attire "to pay respects to President Ford."

John Ciccone, 58, of Bethesda, Md., waited about 90 minutes with his wife, Christiane, and their 11-year-old twins, Alexander and Max, to honor a president who helped put the trauma of Watergate behind America.

"I remember the rancor and the bitterness that occurred at that time and when Gerald Ford came in there was a different tone," said Ciccone. "He really was a profoundly decent man, and we needed a man like that at that time."

Bush Pays Respects To A Predecessor (WT)

By Gary Emerling And Matthew Cella

The Washington Times, January 2, 2007

President Bush and first lady Laura Bush paid their respects to Gerald R. Ford yesterday, the final day the former president's body lay in state in the U.S. Capitol Rotunda.

Mr. and Mrs. Bush stood before Mr. Ford's closed flag-draped casket with their heads bowed in a brief but solemn tribute yesterday afternoon after returning to Washington from their ranch in Texas.

Afterward, the Bush motorcade took the president to Blair House, across the street from the White House, where the Bushes visited former first lady Betty Ford for a half hour and then walked back to the Executive Mansion.

Mr. and Mrs. Bush joined thousands of mourners who braved steady rainfall and frigid temperatures yesterday to say a final goodbye to the 38th president of the United States.

"I wanted my children to see and be part of history," said Trisha Mellott, who drove six hours from Canfield, Ohio, with her 11-year-old son and 10-year-old daughter to see Mr. Ford's casket. "We are proud to be Americans, so I wanted them to experience this."

Mr. Ford's body had been lying in state since Saturday, four days after he died at his home in Rancho Mirage, Calif., at 93.

State funeral services for Mr. Ford, the country's only unelected president, who took office in 1974 in the aftermath of Richard M. Nixon's Watergate scandal, will be held today at the Washington National Cathedral.

Mr. Bush will deliver the funeral eulogy. Mr. Ford will be buried tomorrow near his presidential museum in Grand Rapids, Mich.

As light rain fell throughout yesterday morning, thousands lined up outside the Capitol clad in rainwear and toting umbrellas to pay respects to a president that many remembered as a kind and genuine person.

"It's an experience of a lifetime," said Lynn Yowaiski, 59, of Lexington Park, Md., who came with her husband and best friend to the public viewing. "Plus, I liked him. I always felt like he was telling the truth."

Carol Hooker, a teacher from Landover Hills, said she felt a personal connection with the former president after sending him a tongue-in-cheek letter years ago and finding out from a White House staffer that Mr. Ford and his Cabinet got a much-needed laugh from the correspondence.

Mrs. Hooker, 54, said she admired Mr. Ford so much that her family bought a Ford Fairmont station wagon and named it Gerald "Our" Ford.

"He was somebody that was genuinely kind," said Mrs. Hooker, standing in line without an umbrella and with rain clouding her glasses.

Inside the Rotunda, Mr. Ford's daughter, Susan Ford Bales, and son Michael Gerald Ford stood near the casket greeting mourners and handing remembrance cards to some of the visitors.

The blue cards had the presidential, vice presidential and House of Representatives seals and Mr. Ford's biography on one side.

On the other was a photograph of the former president in the Oval Office, his head bowed.

The message on the card read "The family of Gerald R. Ford deeply appreciates your prayers and many kindnesses as together we celebrate and honor the life of a devoted husband, father, grandfather and great-grandfather and the 38th president of the United States."

Michael Ford shook 8-year-old Christopher Witkowski's hand and gave him one of the cards.

"My father would have wanted you to have this," he told Christopher, of Alexandria.

Mr. Bush declared today a National Day of Mourning to honor Mr. Ford.

Federal and D.C. government offices will be closed today.

The funeral procession is scheduled to begin at 9:15 a.m. at the Capitol and end at 10 a.m. at the Washington National Cathedral.

Mr. Ford's remains then will be taken to Andrews Air Force Base in a procession scheduled to begin at 11:30 a.m. Street closures for the processions will begin at 7 a.m., and some parking restrictions will be in effect, too.

D.C. officials said they are ready for the added stress the service and closures could place on the city.

Barbara Childs-Pair, the head of the District's Emergency Management Agency, said she has "great working relationships" with federal agencies such as the U.S. Capitol Police and the U.S. Secret Service, which will coordinate with local officials today.

"We have been actually planning for a state funeral for the last six months," she said. "We've done a template, so all of the planning efforts, all of the players have been involved over several months."

Today also will mark the first day on the job for the new D.C. police chief and the new D.C. fire chief.

Incoming Police Chief Cathy L. Lanier ran the Metropolitan Police Department's Homeland Security Division and before that spent four years directing its Special Operations Division.

"Remember, the agency heads are changing, but the folks who really do the planning work, the logistical work, are still there," Mrs. Childs-Pair said. "So it's like clockwork at this point. We have a template from [the 2004 funeral of President] Reagan, lessons learned."

Interim Fire Chief Brian K. Lee also is familiar with large-scale events. He was named to the department's top job last week after spending six months as a battalion chief in the fire department's Special Operations Division.

"We're no strangers to state funerals. We're no strangers to national protests. We're no strangers to big events. We do that very well," Chief Lee said. "Between the fire/EMS coordinated with the police and all the federal agencies, we will, as always, be 100 percent prepared."

Thousands Say Farewell To Ford (USAT)

By Susan Page And David Jackson

USA Today, January 2, 2007

WASHINGTON — The flag-draped casket of Gerald Rudolph Ford, the low-key Michigan congressman who unexpectedly became the nation's 38th president, stood in a pool of light in the center of the Capitol Rotunda on Monday as the nation's highest officials and thousands of ordinary Americans dropped by to pay their respects.

President Bush, who will eulogize Ford at a memorial service this morning, came to the Capitol after returning to Washington from a week at his Texas ranch. He stood for a moment in silence with his wife, Laura, their heads bowed, as the clatter of camera shutters reverberated through the domed space.

On a rainy New Year's Day, former president George H.W. Bush also visited, accompanied by former secretary of State James Baker. Former president Bill Clinton and New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton came by, as did the incoming House speaker, Nancy Pelosi.

So did Joyce Rigsby, 40, of suburban Glen Burnie, Md. She drove in with Ginny Hemsley of Atlanta, a friend who was visiting for the holidays. The two walked slowly around the Rotunda where the casket had been placed on the bier used for presidents from Abraham Lincoln to Ronald Reagan. A military honor guard stood vigil.

"What a tough job to be thrown into," Rigsby said of Ford's accession to the presidency after Richard Nixon resigned amid the Watergate scandal. "He did the best he could with a situation he didn't ask for."

Hemsley, 38, called Ford's presidency and his election bid in 1976 her "first real political memory."

Looking back, she said, "it seems really important to me that we had someone to take over who was a real decent person with a lot of integrity and respect for the office."

A memorial service at the National Cathedral is set for this morning. Then Ford's body will be flown to his childhood home of Grand Rapids, Mich., for services Wednesday at Grace Episcopal Church, which he attended as a boy and where he was married as a young man. He is to be buried on a hillside at the Gerald R. Ford Presidential Museum.

Ford died at home in California last week at age 93.

He was born Leslie King Jr., but his parents separated soon after his birth, and he took his stepfather's name. He was a star football player at the University of Michigan, and the Rose Bowl began Monday with a moment of silence in his memory before the Wolverines faced the University of Southern California Trojans.

After graduating from Yale Law School and serving aboard an aircraft carrier during World War II, Ford was elected to Congress and re-elected a dozen times. His hopes of becoming House speaker never realized, Ford was planning to retire when Nixon chose him to replace the disgraced vice president, Spiro Agnew.

Less than a year later, Nixon stepped down. Ford became the only person in U.S. history to serve as president without having been elected president or vice president. He lost the election in 1976 to Jimmy Carter.

The services for Ford lacked some of the ceremonial trappings and the enormous crowds seen during former president Ronald Reagan's state funeral in 2004.

After going to the Rotunda, President Bush and Laura Bush met with Ford's widow, Betty, at Blair House, a government guest house for VIPs. The elder President Bush, who served in Ford's administration as CIA director, and his wife, Barbara, joined them.

Ford's son, Michael, and daughter, Susan Ford Bales, stood near the casket early Monday to shake hands with those who visited.

They gave out "remembrance cards" featuring a photo of their father and the presidential, vice presidential and House of Representatives seals. The card called Ford "a devoted husband, father, grandfather and great-grandfather and the 38th president of the United States."

Later, four of Ford's grandchildren stood to the side and thanked those who visited. Betty Ford, 88 and frail, and her children returned to say a final goodbye at 5:30 p.m.

"He bailed us out at a bad time for the country," said retired Navy commander Douglas Wallace, 50, who drove an hour from Annapolis, Md., to pay his respects.

"He was underappreciated during his life," his wife, retired Navy captain Sharon Wallace, 50, said of Ford. "So it's nice that he's being appreciated in his death."

Current, Former Presidents Pay Their Respects To Ford (WP)

By Peter Baker And Hamil R. Harris

The Washington Post, January 2, 2007

President Bush opened the new year on a somber note yesterday, returning from his Texas holiday break to pay tribute to former president Gerald R. Ford and to contemplate what has gone wrong in a war that has claimed more American lives than the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

With his wife, Laura, clutching his arm, Bush silently marched into the Rotunda of the Capitol and up to the flag-covered casket holding the remains of the 38th president. The Bushes held hands and bowed their heads for about a minute, then turned and left without a word, heading in their motorcade to Blair House to offer condolences to former first lady Betty Ford.

The grim start to 2007 reflected grim times as the U.S. military death toll in Iraq passed 3,000 and the videotaped execution of Saddam Hussein continued to roil a country already riven by sectarian strife. This week alone, Bush will deliver a eulogy for a fellow Republican president today, endure the installation of an opposition Congress on Thursday, and try to draft a new strategy for a war he once had thought would be winding down in success by now.

DOJ_NMG_0111118

In a written holiday message, Bush expressed hope that the new year will turn things around. "In the New Year, we will remain on the offensive against the enemies of freedom, advance the security of our country, and work toward a free and unified Iraq," he said. "Defeating terrorists and extremists is the challenge of our time and we will answer history's call with confidence and fight for liberty without wavering."

For the day, though, Ford remained the focus as Washington wrapped up its second full day of mourning the man lying in state in the Rotunda. Former presidents Bill Clinton and George H.W. Bush joined a succession of other dignitaries as well as thousands of residents, tourists and others who made their way to the Capitol on a drizzly, dreary day. Two of Ford's children greeted some mourners and gave out commemorative cards, while several grandchildren touched his coffin to say their goodbyes.

The rest of the Ford family made an emotional final trip to the Rotunda yesterday evening to pay respects again. Betty Ford approached the casket and knelt before it, clasping her hands on top of it and bowing her head for several long minutes as her sons rubbed her back in support. Her face was etched with the pain of the moment, yet she remained stoic as she finally stood and walked back to a row of seats set aside for relatives.

The memorials to Ford extended to the other coast: Players on the football team of his alma mater, the University of Michigan, wore stickers on their helmets honoring him during yesterday's Rose Bowl in Pasadena, Calif. The stickers said "Bo 48" -- the first a reference to Bo Schembechler, the legendary Michigan football coach who died in November, and the second representing Ford's number when he was a star player in the 1930s.

The ceremonies will continue today with a service at Washington National Cathedral, where much of the country's past and present political elite will remember the unlikely president who took over the White House after the scandal of Watergate and put an end to the U.S. involvement in Vietnam.

The casket will be taken first to the closed Senate doors in a nod to his time as vice president -- who serves as president of the upper chamber -- and then loaded into a motorcade. The cathedral's Bourdon Bell will ring out 38 times as the cortege carrying the 38th president travels from the Capitol. It is scheduled to arrive at 10 a.m.

The Right Rev. John Bryson Chane, the Episcopal bishop of Washington, will lead the officiating clergy through a service that will include readings by two of the former president's children, Jack Ford and Susan Ford Bales, and eulogies by the president and his father, former secretary of state Henry A. Kissinger, and former NBC News anchor Tom Brokaw. Opera singer Denyce Graves, the U.S. Marine Orchestra, the Armed Forces Chorus, and the Cathedral Choirs of Men, Boys and Girls will perform.

It will be the third presidential state funeral at the 114-year-old cathedral, following Ronald Reagan's in 2004 and Dwight D. Eisenhower's in 1969. The cathedral also hosted the burial of Woodrow Wilson, the only president buried in Washington. Ford was on hand in 1976 when the cathedral's nave and west rose window were dedicated.

After today's service, Ford is to be flown to his childhood home town of Grand Rapids, Mich. There he will be interred in a hillside tomb at his presidential museum as a 21-aircraft flyover in missing-man formation jets up the Grand River.

Bush's trip to the Capitol yesterday was his first participation in the six-day Ford funeral events. The president made comments to cameras the day after Ford's death at 93 last week but did not cut short a stay at his Crawford, Tex., ranch.

The White House has maintained a studied silence about Ford's posthumously disclosed criticism of Bush's decision to invade Iraq in 2003. In an interview with The Washington Post's Bob Woodward embargoed until after his death, Ford said Bush and his team -- including two former Ford chiefs of staff, Vice President Cheney and then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld -- made a mistake in how they justified the war and said he would not have ordered the attack. Cheney made no mention of the matter in a tribute speech at the Capitol on Saturday night.

Bush went to the Capitol shortly after landing back at Andrews Air Force Base yesterday, along with aides Joshua B. Bolten, Karl Rove and Joel D. Kaplan. The Bushes walked briskly to the coffin at 3:06 p.m. and paused beside the honor guard. As he did at Reagan's casket in 2004, Bush looked up after a few moments. He blinked and turned to the first lady and appeared to say "Okay." The couple turned and left.

Ten minutes later, George H.W. Bush appeared with Barbara Bush, as well as former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former senator Alan K. Simpson (R-Wyo.) and their wives. The Bushes and Bakers then went to Blair House to visit Betty Ford.

Clinton and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) went to the Rotunda later in the afternoon, and House Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) went earlier along with her husband, Paul, and Rep. Anna G. Eshoo (D-Calif.). Pelosi crossed herself in front of the coffin. Other elder statesmen who paid respects included Sen. Pete V. Domenici (R-N.M.). and former senator Lowell P. Weicker Jr. (R-Conn.).

DOJ_NMG_0111119

Members of the public, sometimes decked out in slickers and boots, waited in the rain for nearly an hour to get in, and some were allowed to witness the presidential visits. "I didn't expect him to walk in," said Melissa Koenig, 28, who saw former president Bush. The Michigan native once met Ford in Grand Rapids and said she wanted to pay respects.

Kathy Fredickson of Bethesda said she felt fortunate to be present. "I came for all of my family members who could not come."

Susan Ford Bales and brother Michael Gerald Ford greeted some mourners and gave them cream-colored cards with the seals of the president, vice president and House of Representatives. The cards were embossed: "In final tribute from a grateful nation. The lying in state of President Gerald R. Ford."

One of the most poignant moments of the day came around 3:30 p.m. when some of Ford's grandchildren were escorted into the Rotunda. Becca Ford Cook, Sarah Ford Goodfellow, Hannah Ford, Heather Vance and Tyne Vance Berlanga slipped inside the velvet rope and placed their hands on the coffin.

"He was a president by accident, but he did a lot of wonderful things," said Barbara Feiner, 57, of St. Louis, who came with her husband, Tom. Feiner said Ford's legacy extended beyond healing the country and pardoning Richard M. Nixon: "He was the right guy for that time. He handled Watergate, I thought, even though I didn't agree with his decision at the time."

At Ford Funeral, Echo Of Reunions Past (NYT)

By RACHEL L. SWARNS

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 1 — On the morning of President Gerald R. Ford's funeral, his former cabinet secretaries and administration staff members will come together here once more, taking their seats in the black cars accompanying the funeral motorcade and in the pews of Washington National Cathedral.

Former President Bill Clinton and Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton were among those at the Capitol Monday to pay respects to Mr. Ford. More Photos >

For more than two decades, they had gathered at Mr. Ford's annual White House reunions, most of which were held in the nation's capital, where they chuckled over half-forgotten policy disputes and shook their heads sadly as their numbers dwindled and their host grew increasingly frail.

Even as their career paths and personal lives diverged, they kept in touch with Mr. Ford and with one another, reminiscing at dinner parties and lunches, and in long-distance phone calls. In mourning their president on Tuesday, the alumni of his administration will also be celebrating his life and the intimate circle he created.

"We've stayed together," said Brent Scowcroft, who served as national security adviser to Mr. Ford. "There is a sense of community."

In many ways, Tuesday's funeral will highlight those ties. Henry A. Kissinger, Mr. Ford's secretary of state, cut short his vacation to the Dominican Republic to attend the Washington solemnities, which began Saturday. Robert E. Barrett, Mr. Ford's military attaché, flew in from his home in Florida. Carla A. Hills, his housing secretary, and William T. Coleman Jr., his transportation secretary, who both still work in Washington, will join them as honorary pallbearers.

The funeral will also reunite several officials who gained prominence in Washington after Mr. Ford left office, including Vice President Dick Cheney, who served as Mr. Ford's chief of staff; Alan Greenspan, who was chairman of Mr. Ford's council of economic advisers years before he became chairman of the Federal Reserve; and Mr. Scowcroft, who also served as national security adviser to President George Bush. They, too, will be pallbearers.

Ron Nessen, who was Mr. Ford's press secretary and who will attend the ceremony at the cathedral, said Mr. Ford's White House team had bonded so deeply because members had served during "an extraordinary time in American history."

It was the mid-1970s, and Mr. Ford, unexpectedly thrust into the presidency, had scrambled to assemble a team that would guide a nation reeling from Watergate, from President Richard M. Nixon's resignation and pardon, from the winding down of the Vietnam War, and from gas lines and soaring inflation.

"It was a shared experience, an amazing shared experience," Mr. Nessen said, "and that's what keeps people in touch with each other."

"People are going to share a lot of their memories," Mr. Nessen said of the Tuesday reunion. "And we'll be thinking of the more personal moments, the more personal conversations, the thoughtful things he did as a man, not just as president."

Mr. Nessen and others said they particularly enjoyed swapping memories of how Mr. Ford had treated people, regardless of their station in life, with dignity and respect, and how he had never taken on airs.

He described the day when Mr. Ford's dog, Liberty, made a mess on the carpet in the Oval Office and a Navy steward had scrambled to clean it. The president stopped him.

DOJ_NMG_0111120

" 'I'll do that,' " Mr. Nessen recalled Mr. Ford saying. " 'No man should have to clean up after another man's dog.' "

Mr. Ford's energy secretary, Frank G. Zarb, remembered the time when Mr. Ford had been ready to make an announcement to the White House press corps but then realized he did not have any cufflinks handy.

"He got two paperclips," Mr. Zarb recalled. "And he said, 'Let's go. We have more important things to do.' "

Mr. Coleman, the former transportation secretary, who said he had seen Mr. Ford four or five times a year, said he had relished the former president's warmth and humor, and his love of family and sports. The last time they spoke, about three months ago, they had talked football, he said.

"Michigan had just defeated Michigan State," Mr. Coleman said. "We had a good time." (As a young man, Mr. Ford played football for the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor.)

Of course, some of Mr. Ford's officials also clashed, and memories of those battles sometimes rankled. But for the most part, those rivalries faded over time, said Robert Orben, a speechwriter for Mr. Ford.

"We're old now, and life has mellowed us," Mr. Orben said. "Some old tensions get put away. There's a sense of camaraderie that continues."

Many officials held fast to that sense of closeness, particularly as Mr. Ford began to age and weaken.

At one recent reunion, Mr. Ford and his wife, Betty, sat on stools because they no longer had the energy to stand and shake hands with the scores of well-wishers. And at last year's gathering, Mr. Ford did not show up at all. Instead, he sent his regards via videotape. It was the first time he had missed a reunion.

Mr. Ford had been in and out of the hospital since January 2006, most recently in October for tests at the Eisenhower Medical Center in Rancho Mirage, Calif. Mr. Scowcroft, who said he had spoken to Mr. Ford several times a year, said he could hear the difference in Mr. Ford's voice when they chatted last summer.

"He sounded tired," Mr. Scowcroft said. "There wasn't the same kind of vibrancy in his voice."

Mr. Ford was 93 when he died last week. It is unclear whether the annual reunions will continue without him. But his administration officials said he would continue to inspire them.

"There will be sadness, but there will also be gladness that will relate to his legacy, to his service to the country," said John O. Marsh Jr., an honorary pallbearer who served as a Virginia congressman before becoming a top aide to Mr. Ford.

"Hopefully," Mr. Marsh said, "it will renew our own spirit of commitment to public service."

Kissinger's Appearance Revives Memories Of Vietnam Era (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 1 — Of all the aging Washington power brokers who have re-emerged in the shadow of the death of former President Gerald R. Ford, there is one, Henry A. Kissinger, for whom the return to the spotlight may be as much curse as blessing.

At Funeral, a Gathering to Echo Reunions Past (January 2, 2007) At 83, Mr. Kissinger, former secretary of state to Presidents Ford and Richard M. Nixon and sometime adviser to the current occupant of the White House, remains a towering figure in international relations. He is expected to be among a select few, including President Bush, to eulogize Mr. Ford on Tuesday at services at the Washington National Cathedral.

But at a time when the American public has soured on the war in Iraq — indeed, at the precise moment the United States is recording the milestone of 3,000 American deaths there — Mr. Kissinger's reappearance is stirring memories and rekindling debates about his role in managing another unpopular conflict, the Vietnam War.

"Henry is certainly one of the most complex characters in recent American history, and he is someone who has, I think, justifiably been in the spotlight both for extraordinary brilliance and competence and at the same time clear defects," said David Rothkopf, a former managing director of Mr. Kissinger's consulting firm and the author of "Running the World," about the National Security Council. "One of the interesting dimensions of Gerald Ford's demise is the pictures it has brought back into the paper of Ford with Rumsfeld, Ford with Cheney, Ford with Henry.

"It's forgotten that all of these people came together first 30 years ago dealing with Vietnam, dealing with a divided nation."

Yet of all those former Ford advisers, only Mr. Kissinger continues to evoke the passions about Vietnam that Donald H. Rumsfeld, the former defense secretary, evokes today about Iraq. This year, the White House press secretary, Tony Snow, confirmed that Mr. Kissinger had been quietly advising President Bush about Iraq in private meetings in the Oval Office. Mr. Kissinger, Mr. Snow said, "supports the overall thrust and direction of the administration policy" in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0111121

Given Mr. Kissinger's firsthand experience in the anguishing decisions about withdrawal from Vietnam, the disclosure sparked the inevitable Iraq-Vietnam comparisons that Mr. Bush has assiduously sought to avoid. Now, Mr. Ford's funeral is raising those comparisons anew.

Aaron David Miller, a scholar at the Woodrow Wilson International Center who recently interviewed Mr. Kissinger for a book about American policy in the Middle East, describes Mr. Kissinger as "the bête noire of the Vietnam antiwar crowd," an image that he says cannot be avoided as the Ford and Nixon presidencies are revisited this week.

"Here's Kissinger back in the limelight," Mr. Miller said, "with a lot of his luggage coming along with him."

Some of that luggage includes bags from Watergate. In 1969, as national security adviser to Mr. Nixon, Mr. Kissinger played a role in wiretapping the telephone of an aide, Morton H. Halperin, who was suspected of leaking classified information to reporters. Mr. Halperin sued. In 1992, Mr. Kissinger issued a formal apology.

"That was the price for my ending the lawsuit," said Mr. Halperin, who became a civil liberties advocate and today is a leading opponent of the Bush administration's domestic wiretapping. "Every time there was an event in the lawsuit, it would remind people of his role in wiretapping. He prefers to be remembered for other things."

Mr. Kissinger is, of course, remembered not only for Vietnam, but also as being an architect of détente with the Soviet Union and the winner of the Nobel Peace Prize. But slipped into the flattering tributes to Mr. Ford over the last week have been some unflattering depictions of Mr. Kissinger, including some from Mr. Ford himself.

There was some tension in the relationship. Mr. Kissinger was named secretary of state in 1973 by Mr. Nixon, all the while keeping his post as national security adviser. It was an unusual arrangement, one that allowed Mr. Kissinger to centralize his power over foreign policy while Mr. Nixon was preoccupied with Watergate. In 1975, Mr. Ford ended it, stripping Mr. Kissinger of the national security adviser title.

Mr. Kissinger balked. " 'Mr. President, the press will misunderstand this,' " Mr. Ford said, recounting Mr. Kissinger's reaction to Bob Woodward of The Washington Post in interviews published last week.

The interviews painted Mr. Kissinger as a bit of a management challenge for Mr. Ford, high impact, but high maintenance as well.

Mr. Ford called Mr. Kissinger a "super secretary of state" but cast him as overly confident — "Henry in his mind never made a mistake" — and overly sensitive to press criticism, so much that he routinely threatened to resign over it.

"Henry publicly was a gruff, hard-nosed German-born diplomat," Mr. Ford was quoted as saying, "but he had the thinnest skin of any public figure I ever knew."

In a retrospective in Newsweek online, Mr. Kissinger had kind words for Mr. Ford, saying he "moved with calm and sure-footedness" to reassure the nation during what could have been a constitutional crisis.

But he also described how the former president relied on him, saying, "After Nixon told Ford of the decision to resign, Ford's first call was to me."

Mr. Rothkopf, who worked with Mr. Kissinger and interviewed Mr. Ford for his book, said Mr. Kissinger often said that "Ford was underestimated, that he was much more intelligent and much more capable than people gave him credit for." Mr. Ford, he added, believed diminishing Mr. Kissinger's role was his "most important contribution" to the foreign policy bureaucracy.

"What he was trying to do was restore Henry to the role of an adviser, not 'the' adviser," Mr. Rothkopf said. "I think he had a sense that the national security system called for giving the president a range of views, and what had happened was that Nixon sank into the depths and Henry assumed greater power, that there was far too much judgment and power in the hands of one person who wasn't the president."

In Grand Rapids, Fixer-Upper Leads To Unusual Bond (WSJ)

By Janet Adamy

The Wall Street Journal, January 2, 2007

GRAND RAPIDS, Mich. -- Growing up here some 85 years ago, Gerald R. Ford lived in six different homes. Tim England and Rob Kent bought one of them in 1991 for $63,500.

The couple didn't really care that the 38th president had once lived there. They could only afford a fixer-upper and picked this one for its winding stairway. But as they renovated and saved a historic home that Grand Rapids wasn't willing to preserve, they forged an unusual bond with President Ford that lasted more than a decade. 1

"It started out as buying our own home," says Mr. England, 46 years old, who is a chef. Then, "our families merged."

President Ford will be buried at the Gerald R. Ford Presidential Museum tomorrow, in the city where he spent most of his childhood and launched his political career. As a little boy, he lived in several homes, including at least one in affluent East Grand Rapids. Grand Rapids was a furniture-manufacturing hub and President Ford's father was a successful salesman for a wood-finishing company.

But in 1921, the Ford family suffered a financial setback, and a bank foreclosed on their home. They rented the three-story house at 649 Union Ave., in what was then a working-class neighborhood on Grand Rapids' southeast side.

Mr. Ford, then 8 years old, rose at 6 each morning to remove ashes from the furnace and shovel in the day's supply of coal, he recalled in his 1979 autobiography, "A Time to Heal." At South High School, he played center on the football team and lost an election for senior-class president. When he was 17, his parents scraped together enough money to move back to East Grand Rapids. Mr. Ford eventually left to attend the University of Michigan, but later returned to represent the area in Congress for almost 25 years.

After he became president in 1974, upon the resignation of Richard M. Nixon, Grand Rapids named buildings and the airport to honor him. His museum became a major attraction of the city's downtown.

But civic leaders made little effort to preserve any of his childhood homes, even though other former presidents have had theirs turned into museums or named historical landmarks. Over the years, some of President Ford's former homes were razed.

In the late 1980s, the house at 649 Union was barely standing. Racial tensions during the late 1960s drove longtime residents out of the neighborhood, which became infested with crime. Police officers routinely busted drug dealers "no more than two houses, 80 feet, from the Ford home," says George Heartwell, now the mayor of Grand Rapids. The nearby corner was "one of the worst in Grand Rapids," he says. Civic leaders talked about restoring the vacant, boarded-up home but never followed through.

Even the former president, who settled in Rancho Mirage, Calif., after losing the 1976 presidential election, didn't push for its preservation. He didn't want public money spent on the project, says Elaine Didier, director of the Gerald R. Ford Presidential Library and Museum. In 1991, the city auctioned off the house for $3,000.

The buyers, acquaintances of Messrs. England and Kent, offered to sell it to them after doing some repairs. Inspecting the house with a flashlight, the two men, who have been together for almost 20 years, saw that there was no ceiling in the dining room and the top floor was filled with birds. "It was pretty rank," recalls Mr. Kent, 46, who does sales for a specialty food store.

After moving in, Messrs. Kent and England painted walls and did a lot of patching. They replaced all 36 windows and the three outside doors. They scoured yard sales for antique clocks, lamps, chairs and bookcases to give the house a vintage feel. Mr. England bought an old chandelier and restored each of its 500 crystals by hand. The two men planted a garden in the barren backyard. The restoration, and others like it, helped improve the neighborhood.

Then in 1992, a letter arrived from President Ford out of the blue. "Mrs. Ford and I are very pleased and honored that you have done such a wonderful restoration of my family home," he wrote. Excited that the former president had taken an interest, the two men tried to have the house designated as a historical landmark and sought public funds to help with the restoration.

But they weren't eligible for most public funding because the house was privately owned, Mr. England says. The Ford museum, the clearinghouse for most of President Ford's affairs in the city, wasn't interested in helping. Ms. Didier, the museum and library director, says her organization or Mr. Ford's foundation "wouldn't give money to a private home." Messrs. England and Kent continued restoring the house with their own money.

In the fall of 1994, a Secret Service official left a message on their answering machine. Mr. Ford was planning to visit Grand Rapids and wanted to see his old home. A few days later, former first lady Betty Ford walked up the steps and extended her hand to Mr. England. "You will never know what this means to my Jerry," Mr. England recalls her saying.

As Mr. Ford entered the house, "he turned into a child," Mr. England recalls. He pointed to a spot in the foyer where the Ford family piano once sat. Mr. England pulled out pocket doors tucked into a foyer wall to show President Ford they were still there. Walking through the kitchen, the president remembered how his family had eaten at a small table, Mr. England says.

The former president climbed the stairs to his second-floor bedroom, then to the third floor, where he and his three half-brothers would retreat when his parents had company. Then he darted into the backyard to see the carriage house where he and his pals used to play penny-ante poker. Inside, Mr. Ford had his foot on the ladder to climb to the second floor when a Secret Service agent advised him against it.

Later in 1994, the house was declared a national and state historic site. At a dedication ceremony the following year, the former president stood on the front porch and, before a crowd of local dignitaries, thanked Messrs. England and Kent. "I have such wonderful memories," he said, recalling how the police used to close the sloped street in the winter so children could sled.

After that, the Fords began sending Christmas cards to the two men, sometimes including photographs of family weddings. Messrs. England and Kent filled their foyer with campaign memorabilia and a framed letter from the Fords. Each July 14, Mr. Ford's birthday, the men hang an enormous American flag across the front porch.

In 2005, the men called Mr. Ford's office on his birthday to ask his assistant to pass on their good wishes. To their surprise, Mr. Ford jumped on the line and struck up a conversation. He thanked them for recently repainting the outside of the house, Mr. England recalls.

Just past midnight on Wednesday morning, after Messrs. England and Kent went to bed, a friend called and told them to turn on their television. Watching the report of Mr. Ford's death, Mr. England says he felt sick to his stomach. A few minutes later, a local news crew pulled up in front of the home in the darkness. Mr. England went outside and pleaded with them to wait before they started shooting. He brought out the big American flag and draped it over the front porch. Then he told them they could start their cameras.

Gerald R. Ford 1913-2006 (USNEWS)

By Angie Cannon

U.S. News and World Report, January 2, 2007

He was called the accidental president, a straight arrow from Michigan who served for only 29 months. Gerald R. Ford wasn't a politician consumed by ambition. In fact, he never campaigned for the presidency or vice presidency and once said that all he ever wanted to be was speaker of the House.

He accomplished a little more than that. When he died last week in Rancho Mirage, Calif., Ford was remembered with almost universal respect and admiration as the man who did much to calm the nation after Watergate and the Vietnam War and to restore honesty and stability to the White House. He set in motion some important changes in dealing with the Soviet Union and in reforming a troubled economy–decisions that three decades later were applauded. Even his most controversial call–a pre-emptive pardon of Richard Nixon–was viewed in hindsight as the right thing to do.

On Oct. 12, 1973, Richard Nixon picked him as vice president, a confirmable choice, when Spiro Agnew had to step down because of a corruption investigation. At his swearing-in, Ford tried to keep expectations low when he famously joked: "I am a Ford, not a Lincoln."

Ford was center stage for some of the most dramatic moments in American history. On Aug. 8, 1974, Ford met with Nixon at 11 a.m., and the president told him: "I have made the decision to resign. It's in the best interest of the country." He said quietly, "Jerry, I know you'll do a good job." Nixon later wrote that "Ford's eyes filled with tears–and mine did as well–as we lingered for a moment at the door."

Straight talk. The rushed inauguration was to be in the East Room, and Ford sent an Air Force jet to bring Chief Justice Warren Burger home from a conference in the Netherlands. On the morning of August 9, Nixon emotionally said farewell to his staff. Ford and his wife, Betty, stayed one floor below, waiting to walk the Nixons to the waiting helicopter. "The moment was terribly painful for all of us," Ford wrote in his autobiography, A Time to Heal. "We were trying to put up the bravest, strongest front. Standing by the helicopter's door, we wished the Nixons happiness and good health. The president grabbed my elbow and held it for a split second longer than necessary, as if to say, 'Good luck.' The moment had come. Then, he uttered the words. 'Goodbye, Mr. President,' he said, and put out his hand." After he was sworn in, Ford gave what he called "not an inaugural address, not a fireside chat, not a campaign speech, just a little straight talk among friends."

He noted that he did not gain the office by any "secret promises." He said: "I am indebted to no man and only to one woman." He also said: "I believe that truth is the glue that holds government together, not only our government but civilization itself. That bond, though strained, is unbroken at home and abroad." He is most famously remembered for saying, "My fellow Americans, our long national nightmare is over. Our Constitution works. Our great republic is a government of laws and not of men. Here, the people rule."

The 38th President: More Than Met The Eye (NSWK)

By Evan Thomas

Newsweek, January 2, 2007

Jan. 8, 2007 issue - On the morning of Sunday, Sept. 8, 1974, after he had been president for about a month, Gerald Ford took communion at St. John's Episcopal Church on Lafayette Square, across from the White House. He prayed alone in the presidential pew. On the way out the church door, he sloughed off reporters who were badgering him about his plans for the day—"You'll find out soon enough," he said. Back in the Oval Office, he telephoned Sen. Barry Goldwater, the fabled conservative, to tell him he was pardoning Richard Nixon for whatever crimes the disgraced president might have committed in office. Goldwater, whose voice had been critical in forcing Nixon's resignation, was dumbfounded. "It doesn't make any sense," he protested. Ford answered, "The public has the right to know that, in the eyes of the president, Nixon is clear." Goldwater responded: "He may be clear in your eyes, but he's not clear in mine."

DOJ_NMG_0111124

Next, Ford called his old congressional adversary, the then House Majority Leader Thomas P. (Tip) O'Neill, and told him that he intended to pardon Nixon. "I'm telling you right now," O'Neill said, "this will cost you the election. I hope it's not part of any deal."

"No," Ford replied calmly, "there's no deal."

"Then why the hell are you doing it?" O'Neill asked.

Ford answered that Nixon was a "sick man" and that his daughter Julie "keeps calling me because her father is so depressed." O'Neill was unpersuaded, but Ford seemed determined. A few minutes later that Sunday morning, the president went on national television to announce his decision. Ford's own aides had been dubious about the pardon and had tried to argue with him. But Ford moved—quickly, at first secretly, then decisively—to cut off any criminal prosecution of his predecessor. Ford had experienced no trouble sleeping the night before—"Once I determine to move, I seldom, if ever, fret," he recalled in his memoirs. After announcing the pardon, Ford recorded, he felt "an unbelievable lifting of a burden from my shoulders." He went off to play golf.

O'Neill's warning was not wrong. The public hammering Ford took for pardoning Nixon probably did cost him the election in 1976. "Jail Ford!" screamed angry crowds, who widely assumed (not altogether without reason) that Nixon had wrangled a deal. Most news-papers in the righteous post-Watergate era gravely editorialized against Ford's action. His own press secretary, Jerry terHorst, quit in disgust.

Yet, more than three decades later, Ford's decision has been largely vindicated. The conventional wisdom has shifted: pardoning Nixon was the farsighted thing to do. It spared the nation an ordeal of recrimination and allowed the healing to begin.

In the first hours and days after his death last week at 93, Gerald R. Ford Jr. was eulogized as a model of common-sense leadership, a plain-spoken Everyman who followed his own conscience. He was seen as a real-life Jimmy Stewart figure, a regular guy whose heartland decency shamed the Washington pols. His reputed willingness to reach across the aisle was held up, explicitly and implicitly, as a reproach to the current chief executive.

As president, Ford was mocked, especially on "Saturday Night Live," for tripping over his own feet and getting tangled up in his own words. In contrast to the darkly complex "Tricky Dick," the image of Ford as a genial, trusting, slightly naive stumblebum was somehow comforting. But it was largely a fiction. Ford was probably the best athlete ever to occupy the Oval Office; he was a graceful dancer and a smoothly expert skier. More important, he was hardly "Mr. Smith Goes to Washington." In reality, he was a quintessential pol who spent more time cutting deals than shaping lofty visions.

Ford was a politician in the best sense: he understood how to use power to serve the public interest. He was also a decent man. But he was a complex one, whose motivations have remained well hidden, obscured to this day by his skillful legacy-polishing in retirement. Ford's morality and character had been forged not just by the Main Street virtues of Depression-era Middle America, but by the bitter, carefully concealed personal experiences that often shape and drive (and sometimes twist) great leaders. Ford was far from the oaf Chevy Chase made him out to be, and his presidency, though it lasted less than 900 days, was no mere stop-gap. Ford had a way of showing up and doing surprising things at critical moments in history, with repercussions—some intended, some accidental—that echo today.

Gerald R. Ford Jr. was born Leslie Lynch King Jr. His real father was a handsome, wealthy, blond-haired wife-beater who first struck his bride on the first night of their honeymoon for smiling at a stranger in the elevator. Later, Leslie King Sr. held a knife over his wife as she lay in bed with her newborn baby; she then fled to Grand Rapids, Mich., and married a paint salesman named Gerald Ford, who gave her baby boy his name. At 16, young Jerry, by then a high-school football hero, was tending a lunch counter when Leslie King Sr. sauntered in. "I'm your father," he announced. "I'd like to take you to lunch." King was passing through town on his way to pick up an expensive new car, a Lincoln. King asked Ford if he would like to move back to live with his true father in Wyoming.

"It was a hell of a shock," Ford later recalled. He went to lunch, but was shaking with resentment. "Nothing could erase the image I gained of my real father that day—a carefree, well-to-do man who really didn't give a damn about the hopes and dreams of his son." In bed that night, Ford wept "tears of anger." He tried to remember verses from Proverbs his mother had taught him: Trust in the Lord with all thine heart, and lean not unto thine own understanding. In all thy ways acknowledge Him, and He shall direct thy paths.

These words were to become a sacred talisman for Ford. He said them to himself right after he had nearly been swept off the deck of a carrier as a naval officer during a Pacific typhoon in World War II, and he said them to himself the night before he was sworn in as president of the United States. The passage suggests a comforting submission to God's will, and no doubt Ford found solace in it. But the real message he took from the shock of seeing his delinquent father was not at all passive: it was to keep moving along those "paths," to not look back, to not brood, but to act—without remorse or regret.

As a young man Ford became adept at productively channeling his anger. As a center and linebacker at the University of Michigan, he was a ferocious blocker and tackler. He was tough enough to be offered contracts by the Green Bay Packers and

Detroit Lions, but pro-football money was small in those days; he decided his ambition was better served by attending Yale Law School.

Ford finished in the top third of an accomplished class that included future Supreme Court justices and a secretary of State. But he found his calling working for Republican Wendell Willkie in the 1940 presidential race. Ford discovered, he later recalled, that "I liked politics, everything about it." He meant not just glad-handing on the stump but wheeling and dealing in the back room.

Blond, big-shouldered—a hale fellow—Ford struck some sophisticates, including his prewar girlfriend, Phyllis Brown, a New York model from a fancy prep school, as a little slow-witted. "Jerry had an innate awareness that was deceptive," Brown later told former Ford aide James Cannon, author of "Time and Chance," a 1994 account of Ford's ascension to the presidency (written with access to Ford's papers). "Actually, it was a cunning side. People would be talking and thinking, 'Dumb Jerry the football coach is not getting it.' But that was part of the cunning. He was listening, mulling it over and thinking it through, and then he would come up with the right answer. He was smart—not clever, not quick, but smart."

Ford learned how to keep secrets. After the war, running for Congress, he proposed marriage to a beautiful divorcée and former professional dancer named Betty Warren. He told her they had to keep their engagement a secret, and that he couldn't say why. The reason: his political advisers had convinced him that marrying a divorcée would cost him votes among conservatives. The couple was married after the Republican primary.

Ford entered congress in 1949, just two years after a wave of young World War II veterans, including John F. Kennedy and Richard Nixon, who understood that America would have to stay on the world stage to contain communism and spread freedom. But Ford was happy to take a less lofty assignment on the Public Works Committee. He understood that Public Works was the place to learn to make pork-barrel deals. When a seat on the Appropriations Committee came open, Ford went for it. "Appropriations was where the power was," he later wrote. "I said to myself, 'That's going to be my specialty—how the government spends money'."

Ford was intensely ambitious: his goal was to become Speaker of the House. To curry favor and votes, he was a relentless fund-raiser for the party coffers, traveling some 200 nights a year. He rarely saw his young family. "I was resentful of Jerry's being gone so much," Betty later said. "I was feeling terribly neglected ... The loneliness, the being left to yourself at night, is what makes marriages crack, makes liquor more attractive." Their marriage did not crack—Ford always counted on his smart and outspoken wife for political advice—but Betty did begin to drink more and more (and ultimately became dependent on painkillers for a stiff neck). "I'd have my five o'clock drink at a neighbor's house," she recalled. "Or even by myself, while talking on the phone with a neighbor. I'd have another while I was fixing dinner, and then, when the kids were in bed, I'd build myself a nightcap."

Though he may not have played the sort of mean-spirited hardball that characterized the GOP-controlled House under Majority Leader Tom DeLay in recent years, Ford was a down-the-line party man. As minority leader in the 1960s, he tangled with President Lyndon Johnson, attacking the president for not doing more to win in Vietnam and for wasting taxpayer money on social-welfare programs. Johnson called Ford "dumb" and cracked, "Jerry played football too many times without a helmet."

Ford was a close ally and admirer of Nixon's from their days together in the House Chowder and Marching Society, a band of hard-charging GOP congressmen who voted, logrolled and played together. As the GOP House leader after Nixon's election in 1968, Ford faithfully did the bidding of Nixon's attorney general, John Mitchell, by leading a clumsy attempt to impeach Supreme Court Justice William O. Douglas. Ford attacked Douglas as "senile" and for allowing his writings to be published in a "pornographic magazine" called Avant Garde. The impeachment effort collapsed after a couple of weeks; Ford later admitted the whole thing had been a "mistake."

When the first flames of Watergate began to singe the White House, Ford remained loyal. At Nixon's urging, Ford was instrumental in making sure that the House Banking and Currency Committee did not investigate the source of freshly printed $100 bills that turned up on the Watergate burglars. He was rewarded when Vice President Spiro Agnew pleaded no contest to accepting payoffs and was forced to resign in October 1973. Recognizing that Ford was the safest bet for congressional confirmation, Nixon chose him to replace Agnew.

As the Watergate scandal deepened, Ford had to walk a fine line between supporting the president and not going down with him. He was careful never to ask Nixon if he was guilty of covering up the Watergate break-in. But the vice president's suspicions were growing. His way of dealing with them in the spring of 1974 was to get out of town. "He deliberately fled Washington, very deliberately," recalls Ford's former House speechwriter and close aide Bob Hartmann. "He just told me to accept every invitation he possibly could. His travel itinerary was nearly continuous. He was not being devious. On the other hand, he was nobody's fool." In his public appearances, Ford began to "zig-zag—to be intentionally inconsistent in his comments," writes former Ford adviser James Cannon. "One day the tilt would be favorable: Nixon is innocent of an impeachable offense, he would say. The next day he would tilt against him."

DOJ_NMG_0111126

Ford's deft balancing act during Nixon's fall drew little attention as investigators and reporters stalked bigger game. Sympathetic White House aides protected Ford by distancing him from the scandals, deleting his remarks from the edited transcripts of meetings or marking them "unintelligible." But Ford and Nixon were heading toward a high-stakes drama that is one of the most intriguing—and still somewhat murky—acts in the whole Shakespearean tragedy.

Without ever explicitly acknowledging what they were doing, Ford and Nixon began a private dance concerning the delicate question of whether Ford might pardon Nixon if the president stepped down and Ford took his place. Neither man could be seen participating in such a crude transaction. That does not mean, however, that there weren't some clever machinations and manipulations—on both sides.

The go-between in this shadow play was former Army general Alexander Haig, Nixon's chief of staff. Haig had been acting as a kind of regent, running the government while Nixon withdrew to the White House residence to brood while listening to "Victory at Sea" before roaring fires. At once scheming, dutiful and imperious, Haig was trying to protect the president—but, at the same time, get Nixon out of office before the president could be impeached in the House and convicted by the Senate. And if Nixon could be persuaded to resign, Haig wanted to insulate him from being prosecuted in the courts. Hence the call Ford received shortly after 8 on the morning of Aug. 1, 1974.

Haig wanted to know if he could come to Ford's office at the Old Executive Office Building. "It's urgent," said Haig. "I want to alert you that things are deteriorating. The whole ball game may be over. You'd better start thinking about a change in your life." That was not all Haig wanted to tell Ford. But according to Ford's memoirs, "A Time to Heal," Haig seemed reluctant to talk in front of Bob Hartmann, who was also in the room.

Haig decided to come back in the afternoon. This time he caught Ford alone in his office. Haig explained that the White House was turning over a tape recording—later known as the "smoking gun" tape—to the courts. On the tape, Nixon could be heard obstructing justice by trying to get the CIA to head off an FBI investigation of the Watergate break-in. Haig began to lay out various options before he got to the ones that mattered. He had brought two pieces of paper with him. Nixon's chief of staff explained to Ford that the president could resign and be pardoned by his successor. One piece of paper summarized a president's authority to grant such a pardon; the other was an actual pardon form.

"Al," Ford said, "I need some time to think about this." As Haig left, Ford sat back, he later recalled, and thought to himself, "I am about to become president. It's going to happen."

Hartmann came into the veep's office, and Ford told him that Nixon would resign if Ford would pardon him. Hartmann burst out, "Jesus! What did you tell him?" "I didn't tell him anything," Ford responded. "I told him I needed time to think about it." "You what?" Hartmann asked. "That's almost the worst answer Haig could take back to the White House. You told Haig you are willing to entertain the idea of a pardon if he resigns—that's probably all Haig and Nixon want to know."

Ford told Hartmann that he was overreacting. That night, as he lay in bed with Betty, Ford pondered what to do. In his memoirs, he wrote that Haig called him at 1 a.m. to tell him that "nothing had changed" and that the situation "remained fluid." Ford recalled that he told Haig, "I've talked with Betty, and we're prepared, but we can't get involved in the White House decision making process." But according to Barry Werth's "31 Days," the most authoritative retelling of Ford's roller-coaster first month in office, Ford told a different story to his aides the next morning. According to Hartmann, Ford told him: "Betty and I talked it over last night ... We felt we were ready. This just has to stop; it's tearing the country to pieces. I decided to go ahead and get it over with, so I called Al Haig and told them they should do whatever they decided to do, it was all right with me." Aghast that Haig and Nixon might interpret Ford's words as a signal that a pardon would follow a resignation, his aides—including Hartmann, John Marsh and Bryce Harlow—implored the vice president to call Haig right away. Ford should tell the president's chief of staff, unambiguously, that nothing they had discussed should be construed as a deal. Ford agreed and made the call, reading from notecards.

In later years, Haig would deny that he had offered Ford any kind of deal, denials he publicly repeated last week. Ford, for his part, professed a kind of wounded innocence. In 1997 he told Washington Post reporter Bob Woodward: "Well, I guess I was naive. I was naive that anybody would offer a deal because all my political life people never came to me, 'I'm going to give you a political donation. I expect something in return.' People never came to me that way, because they knew damn well I wouldn't be part of it." In any case, "it never became a deal because I never accepted," said Ford. The fact that he did agree to pardon Nixon 31 days after assuming the presidency, Ford always insisted, was unrelated to his discussions with Haig before Nixon resigned.

It may well be that in his political life Ford had never been approached with such a naked blandishment. But his personal history contains, at the very least, a foreshadowing of his decision to end what he called "the long national nightmare" of Watergate with a presidential pardon. In 1937, when Ford was at Yale, his delinquent father turned up again—this time with a quid pro quo. For years, Leslie King had been embroiled with Ford's mother regarding unpaid alimony and child-support payments. Now King was offering Ford a deal: if he would get his mother to back off her legal claims, King would make sure his son was not forgotten in his will. Ford was cool to his father's approach, but ultimately worked out a settlement that won his mother $4,000. She sent her son a check for more than $2,000, which he promptly returned to her. "I was simply acting as a peacemaker," Ford testified in a 1939 court proceeding.

Duke history professor Peter Wood has speculated that when Ford pardoned Nixon, he was re-enacting the drama of trying to bring peace between his mother and father. This interpretation may be stretching the bounds of psychohistory. Still, Ford's language, when he announced the pardon that September Sunday in 1974, does suggest that he was obeying what Wood calls "a submerged but controlling personal logic." Ford told the nation: "My conscience tells me clearly and certainly that I cannot continue to prolong the bad dreams that continue to reopen a chapter that is closed ... My conscience tells me it is my duty to not merely proclaim domestic tranquillity but to use every means that I have to ensure it."

The Nixon pardon did go a long way to ensure "domestic tranquillity" in the American family. But Ford quickly found himself ensnared in a web of problems, from an energy crisis to high inflation to the final collapse of South Vietnam. Ford has sometimes been portrayed as a feckless leader. His whip inflation now buttons made him seem like a small-town booster trying to use bromides to beat back the worst recession since the Depression.

But Ford was not afraid to make tough decisions. He vetoed 66 bills sent him by the Democratic-controlled Congress, and he ruthlessly unloaded anyone who did not meet his needs—starting with Haig. Secretary of State Henry Kissinger gave up his title as national-security adviser, opening the way for Brent Scowcroft. Ford fired Defense Secretary James Schlesinger. He dumped his vice president, Nelson Rockefeller, from the GOP ticket in 1976. (And though it pained him to be portrayed as the first American president to lose a war, he did not try to intervene when Saigon finally fell in May 1975.)

Battered by bad news and public discontent over the Nixon pardon, Ford began the 1976 campaign 25 points behind the Democratic nominee, Jimmy Carter. But partly by getting rid of his campaign manager, Rogers Morton, and replacing him with James A. Baker, an emerging force in national politics, Ford almost caught Carter in the last days of the campaign.

Ford was not done with politics. Though he burned with anger at Ronald Reagan for mounting a costly and diverting primary challenge for the Republican nomination in 1976, he nearly agreed to be Reagan's running mate in 1980. Reagan balked only when Ford insisted on being given enough power to be a virtual "co-president."

In retirement, Ford's principal cause was his pocketbook and his place in history. He had always liked to be around prosperous men since he was a scholarship boy invited to join the DKE house at Michigan. Going on as many as eight corporate boards and charging many thousands of dollars for speeches and corporate receptions (the latter now common practice among former presidents), he maintained houses on a golf course in Rancho Mirage, Calif., and at the foot of the ski slopes in Colorado. Over the years, he entertained a parade of visiting journalists and historians to make sure his story was properly told. Knowing that history is largely written by moderates and centrists, he made himself one, too, deploring the rightward swing of the Republican Party. In a July 2004 conversation with Bob Woodward, published last week, Ford said, "I don't think I would have gone to war" in Iraq. He criticized both Vice President Dick Cheney and former Defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld for "making a big mistake in justifying going into the war in Iraq."

One of the more peculiar legacies of the Ford era is the attempt by both Rumsfeld and Cheney to restore the power of the presidency. They were ambitious young men who served as Ford's chiefs of staff at a time when Ford was trying to dismantle what historian Arthur M. Schlesinger Jr. has called "the imperial presidency." Ford was trying to create an atmosphere of openness and cooperation with Congress and the courts after Nixon's grandiose show of presidential power—from opéra bouffe uniforms for the White House guards to the shadowy Plumbers Unit. But Rumsfeld and Cheney felt that the Watergate reforms had gone overboard, and as members of the Bush war cabinet they have pushed hard to strengthen the executive.

Ford may or may not have been wise enough to resist falling into the trap of hubris that seems to have overcome the Bush White House. His suggestion that he would have been against invading Iraq must be considered in light of his strongly held position as a congressman attacking the Johnson administration during the Vietnam War: that the United States military should press harder against the communists, not back off. At the same time, Ford's record as president suggests that he would have been far more willing than Bush to change his mind and reverse course if he saw the war turning into a quagmire. He was always moving forward and not looking back. He knew when to cut his losses, and he was not afraid of taking chances to bring peace—whether to his family or to his country.

Presidents And Protégés (USNEWS)

U.S. News and World Report, January 2, 2007

Washington may not have a soul, but it does have a memory. For all the talk of what a cold, transient place it can be, there are rituals that remind us that this vast government rests on a sense of permanence and continuity. In a place like Washington, the past matters. A lot.

DOJ_NMG_0111128

The funeral and eulogies for Gerald R. Ford at the National Cathedral this week have as much to do with 1975 as 2006. Ford will be mourned by a roomful of people whose views of the world were shaped by those crucial years in the wake of Watergate and the collapse of South Vietnam.

In particular, Ford and a couple of eager young aides named Donald Rumsfeld and Dick Cheney set about to rebuild a staggered White House. Congress, the press, and the Washington establishment had pilloried Richard Nixon–for reasons good and bad–and now were leaning on Ford. "The feeling I had then, and I think it's been borne out by history," Cheney told U.S. News last year, "is that the balance shifted, if you will–that, in fact, the presidency was weakened."

They all felt that the office of the president needed to be much stronger–as it was intended to be. Ford tried to push back. On domestic issues, he brought out the veto pen and killed a record 66 bills that mostly raised spending and taxes.

But on Vietnam and other national security issues–such as intelligence gathering, committing U.S. forces, and confronting the Soviet Union–he mostly gave in. Cheney and Rumsfeld never forgot.

'Confidence in His Bearing'

He was an unassuming man, our 38th president, and few have ever risen so high with so little guile or calculation. Even in the three decades since he left office, he was not the sort to ponder his legacy, to brood over his place in history. Jerry Ford was always a striver—never working an angle, just working. He was a believer in the saying that in life you make your own luck. The achievements added up all his life, yet he was known to boast about only one. I heard it once or twice myself—he said he was never luckier than when he stepped out of Grace Episcopal Church in Grand Rapids, Mich., with a beautiful girl named Betty as his bride.

He was modest and manful; there was confidence and courage in his bearing. In judgment, he was sober and serious, unafraid of decisions, calm and steady by nature, always the still point in the turning wheel. He assumed power without assuming airs; he knew how to treat people. He answered courtesy with courtesy; he answered discourtesy with courtesy.

This president's hardest decision was also among his first. And in September of 1974, Gerald Ford was almost alone in understanding that there can be no healing without pardon. The consensus holds that this decision cost him an election. That is very likely so. The criticism was fierce. But President Ford had larger concerns at heart. And it is far from the worst fate that a man should be remembered for his capacity to forgive.

He was not just a cheerful and pleasant man—although these virtues are rare enough at the commanding heights. He was not just a nice guy, the next-door neighbor whose luck landed him in the White House. It was this man, Gerald R. Ford, who led our republic safely through a crisis that could have turned to catastrophe. We will never know what further unravelings, what greater malevolence, might have come in that time of furies turned loose and hearts turned cold. But we do know this: America was spared the worst. And this was the doing of an American president. For all the grief that never came, for all the wounds that were never inflicted, the people of the United States will forever stand in debt to the good man and faithful servant we mourn.

'He Gave Us A New Day'

I got to know Jerry Ford when I was running for the Senate down here in Texas in 1964. I lost that one, and then he campaigned actively for me in my House race in '66, which I won. When I got to Washington, he helped me get a seat on Ways and Means, which was a very great assignment for a freshman, and we became friends. He was well respected by people of different opinions, was perceived as a guy who was a conservative fellow but who could get along with people.

In 1974, he had to pick a vice president, and I was considered one of the two names he might go with. One day—I'll never forget it—Barbara and I were sitting on the front steps in Maine with the TV on in the background, and they said, "Well, he's coming in now, he's coming in now to announce his choice." The telephone rang, and it was Jerry Ford, very courteous and thoughtful, and he said, "George, it was a very close decision I had to make, but I am going with Nelson Rockefeller"—which was kind of expected. I will never forget the kindness and the courtesy.

Watergate was just the worst. Bob Strauss used to call me when I was head of the Republican National Committee every time another shoe would drop, every time there was a new revelation. He said, "George, your job reminds me of making love to a gorilla." And I said, "Why, Bob?" And he said, "Because you can't stop until the gorilla wants to." And that's exactly the way it was, and of course Bob was loving it because he was the Democratic chairman.

Like Ford, I was going around talking about Nixon, saying, "Give the guy a chance, don't go on rumors," and then suddenly, in the summer of '74, this last shoe [a June 1972 tape revealing that Nixon ordered the cover-up] dropped, and it was very clear that Nixon could not survive. We had a final cabinet meeting in early August, and there was a kind of unreality to it, because he said, "OK, today we're going to talk about the economy," and everybody was quietly looking at each other and saying, "What the hell is going on here?" But when Ford became president, all of that changed instantly—he gave us a new day, and we all felt that, all over the country.

As president, Ford asked me to become director of the CIA, and my friends all advised me that the CIA was a political dead end: do not do this, do not take the CIA job. There were stories that Don Rumsfeld [then Ford's chief of staff] was kind of the Machiavellian behind the scenes pulling strings. There was a lot of speculation as to whether Rummy had masterminded this so he could have a better shot at maybe being president someday. But Ford personally denied that to me, incidentally, and he said that's just not fair, that's not true. He told me that in the Oval Office.

I was surprised and disappointed that Reagan challenged Ford in '76. I thought Ford was doing a good job and was entitled to the nomination. So I was surprised, and I was surprised at how well Reagan did—I was underestimating him at the time.

In Detroit in 1980, it looked for a time like Reagan and Ford were going to run together. I was out of it, but then Reagan called me. Apparently they had been very serious about a Reagan-Ford ticket, but I honestly think—and not because I was the beneficiary of this—that it would have been a disaster to have what would have appeared to have been a co-presidency.

Jerry Ford was decent, honorable, trustworthy, down-to-earth. That was his whole personality. I hope it will be his legacy.

'I was grateful for his counsel'

Thirty-two years ago, when President Ford took the oath of office, I was running for Congress in Arkansas. When he pardoned President Nixon on Sept. 8, just two months before the November election, it was an unpopular decision that many did not agree with, including me. It was also a stroke of luck for my campaign. I hit the pardon hard, the campaign took off and I almost won an election that shouldn't have been close.

Twenty-five years later, in 1999, President Ford was awarded both the Presidential Medal of Freedom and the Congressional Gold Medal. At the Medal of Freedom ceremony, I thanked him for his lifelong opposition to racial discrimination, from his time on the Michigan football team to his support for affirmative action during my presidency; for helping to heal our nation as president, ending both the long nightmares of Watergate and Vietnam, and for signing the Helsinki Treaty on Human Rights, which sent a signal of hope to oppressed people the world over and hastened the demise of communism.

At the Congressional Gold Medal ceremony, I was able to say something publicly about Ford that needed to be said by a Democratic president: "When you made your healing decisions ... it was easy for us to criticize you, because we were caught up in the moment. You didn't get caught up in the moment, and you were right."

After Gerald Ford left the White House, I was grateful for his counsel, for his occasional support on important national issues, for the respectful way in which he articulated his honest disagreements with my policies, for a few unforgettable golf games and for the partnership he forged with President Carter, which I have tried to emulate in my work with former president Bush.

All presidents serve in particular moments of history with unique challenges, but all are bound to advance America's eternal mission to form a more perfect union. With dignity, candor and strength, Gerald Ford met his test, lifting burdens from our shoulders, getting the country moving forward again. He deserved the long, good life God gave him, and will always deserve the gratitude of all his fellow citizens. America is better for his service.

Nancy Reagan

Former First Lady

'Always the gentleman'

I will forever recall the most exciting convention of them all, in 1976. The nomination process went right down to the wire. Ronnie's supporters were very enthusiastic, but in the end Jerry was finally nominated. Jerry was very gracious and asked Ronnie to come down to the stage, adding, "Bring Nancy, too!"

At first Ronnie refused, but Jerry wouldn't take no for an answer, and insisted. All the way down to the stage Ronnie kept asking, "What will I say?" and I kept thinking, I sure hope he thinks of something! And of course he did.

That was so typical of Jerry—always the gentleman. While Ronnie and Jerry may have run against each other for office, that was just politics. On a personal level, we all had great respect for one another and enjoyed a very good friendship.

Brent Scowcroft
National-Security Adviser
'He had no hang-ups'

Ford liked to get all his advisers around and liked to sit there and listen to them arguing with each other. He had no hang-ups. He had no preconceived notions that he had to fit the facts into.

I remember the last days of Vietnam. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee came down en masse and met with the president. Unanimously, they asked him to withdraw the troops now. He refused. He kept the troops in until the last possible minute so we could pull out as many Vietnamese in jeopardy as possible. It was one of the most courageous moves I'd ever seen.

Stuart Spencer
Campaign Adviser
'Ford's family was first'

One of our end-of-the-day meetings stands out in my memory. It was sometime in 1976. I was sitting across from Jerry in the Oval Office. It started out normally enough—talking about campaign items. But he quickly changed the topic. He was in a mood, it seems, where all he wanted to talk about was his kids. The only problem was that Henry Kissinger was waiting outside with some important international issues. But Jerry just kept going, and I thought, Well, I guess this is what is most important to him. He finished up, eventually, so I left and Kissinger went in. Looking back, that moment showed me what Gerald Ford's priorities were. His family was first. That impressed me.

James Cannon
Aide, Biographer
'His greatest regret ... '

I once asked him what was his greatest regret in life. He thought for a moment and said, "Well, I wanted to play more football as a sophomore and junior, but one year ahead of me, Michigan also had an All-American center, Chuck Bernard. I was the better offensive center, but Chuck was 25 pounds heavier and better on defense. And in those days a coach played one guy. So that was my great regret." "But, Mr. President," I said, "what about losing the election in '76?" He laughed and said, "Oh, well, that too."

'He Moved With Calm'

I first met President Ford in the mid-1960s, when I was a professor at Harvard. I was conducting a defense-policy seminar. It was customary to invite people from Washington, and I invited President Ford, then a congressman, to come and talk about the appropriations process. We stayed in loose touch afterward. When I came to Washington in 1969, I had contact with him in the normal course of White House consultations, and we always had a friendly but not close relationship. Then, when he became vice president, we had a warm relationship, and I would brief him. (Nixon always wanted to be sure that he knew when briefings took place with both Agnew and Ford.)

After Nixon told Ford of the decision to resign, Ford's first call was to me. He invited me to continue in office and asked what I thought needed to be done immediately. I told him that from the foreign-policy point of view, it was important that he establish himself immediately to be in charge, and he therefore needed to see all the ambassadors accredited to Washington in the first three or four days (some of them in groups), and letters had to go to the major countries. This was necessary so that the world's governments could have a first-hand report of a president fully in command. It was a formidable assignment, and he did not blink an eye.

The overall task he faced in the White House in the early days was infinitely harder than that of a normal president. He took over at perhaps the most perilous moment of domestic crisis since the Civil War, and he had neither the months of transition a new president normally has, nor the honeymoon a new president normally has. But he moved with calm and surefootedness into what could have been an overpowering experience. He took over in the middle of a Greek-Turkish crisis over Cyprus, a group of Arab foreign ministers were literally on their way to Washington for previously scheduled meetings, and we were amidst continuing negotiations over nuclear weapons with the Soviet Union. He never showed stress, he never lost his temper, he never showed anxiety. He was a man of extraordinary good sense. He did not pretend to be a great student of foreign policy, but he had great experience in the negotiations that are conducted in the Congress, and he knew a lot about defense planning. His attitude was that he was blessed to be of service to his country.

His presidency was about restoring a degree of hope and civility to American politics. His 29 months in office also resulted in major achievements. The European security conference laid the basis from which the East European satellites were finally overthrown, and there was the first political agreement between Israel and Egypt, one that was achieved through the very active engagement of President Ford. The establishment of majority rule in southern Africa was also achieved by American leadership in the Ford years.

The great contribution of President Ford was that he managed to strike a balance between the American temptation toward perfectionism and the absolute, and the temptation to abandon everything because one cannot have the perfect and the absolute. He brought about an approach that I believe is essential to the conduct of a continuing foreign policy that works toward the maximum one can achieve but does not go beyond what the American people can sustain or what the international community can comprehend. Another essential factor was the warm personal relations between President Ford and the European allies, relations that lasted all their lives. Confidence in America is an important element for international order, and President Ford supplied that to a wonderful degree.

A Good President (USNEWS)

By David Gergen

U.S. News and World Report, January 2, 2007

The historian Arthur Schlesinger Jr. pointed out some years ago that presidential reputations move in cycles, rising and falling as we look back with fresh eyes. Thomas Jefferson has toppled from his pedestal, thanks to modern DNA tests, while John Adams has risen, thanks to David McCullough. John F. Kennedy maintains his popularity among the public but has slipped among historians, while Ronald Reagan continues to climb among both.

But if there is any reputation that has been wholly transformed, surely it is that of Gerald Ford. His pardon of Richard Nixon a month after taking office not only ignited a firestorm but turned him into a target of criticism and merciless ridicule. On its cover, for example, New York magazine ran a fake photo of Bozo the Clown sitting in the Oval Office with a headline, "Ladies and Gentlemen, the President of the United States." Inside, journalist Richard Reeves wrote: "It is not a question of saying the emperor has no clothes–there is a question of whether there is an emperor." A year later, echoing the sentiment of the times, Reeves wrote a book arguing that "Ford is slow. He is also unimaginative and not very articulate." On Saturday Night Live, Chevy Chase made a name for himself by depicting Ford as a hopeless buffoon.

Yet, even before he died and the nation began its mourning, Ford began a long-overdue renaissance. The Kennedy Library, in a decision cherished by Ford, gave him its Profile in Courage Award for the pardon. Richard Reeves manfully recanted, writing a piece in American Heritage entitled "I'm Sorry, Mr. President." Historian Edmund Morris concluded: "Gerald Ford was our most underrated president."

Why does Ford look so much better in the rearview mirror? Mostly, I suspect, because the personal qualities that he brought to public life seem so scarce these days. The simplicity of his burial reminds us again that Ford was, first and foremost, a humble man of the Midwest. When Richard Nixon was president, every chair around the cabinet table was the same height save one–Nixon's, which had a back 3 inches higher. The day after Ford's inauguration, I slipped into the Cabinet Room and saw that every single chair, including the president's, was the same height. Not for him the arrogance of power we see so much of these days.

Ford also searched for the best people to help him and insisted they give him their unvarnished views. Over time, he built one of the best cabinets in contemporary history, and as they debated in front of him, Ford engaged in what Warren Bennis calls "deep listening" before he made the call. While conservative by inclination, Ford was guided less by ideology than by a pragmatic judgment of what was best for the nation. He vetoed big spending bills, but he also granted amnesty for draft dodgers and pursued détente with Moscow. It's revealing but no real surprise to learn now that he opposed the war in Iraq. This was a man who was healthy in both body and spirit.

A man to trust. But most of all, Ford brought a forthright honesty to politics. In his two dozen years in Congress, he built up trust on both sides of the aisle, so that when Nixon wanted John Connally to replace Spiro Agnew in the vice presidency, Democratic leaders Mike Mansfield and Carl Albert persuaded him instead to choose Ford–the man they trusted. As he testified to the Congress before taking office, Ford believed, "Truth is the glue that holds government together, not only government but civilization itself."

Bob Hartmann, who had served Ford well for years on Capitol Hill, remembers accompanying him into the Cabinet Room hours after his inauguration for an important ritual: selecting portraits of three former presidents to display on the walls. Nixon had chosen Teddy Roosevelt, Woodrow Wilson, and Dwight Eisenhower–men who had inspired his own dreams. Pondering for a moment, Ford decided to keep Ike and to replace TR with Lincoln.

DOJ_NMG_0111132

"The other might be a Democrat," Hartmann suggested. "How about Andy Jackson?" "No. Harry Truman," Ford answered, remembering how Truman, too, had been drawn to the White House by fate and how he had fared. Searching for words, Hartmann told his friend, "You are going to be a great president." "Thanks, Bob," Ford responded. "I don't know about that. But I want to be a good president."

And so he was–good in the best sense of the word.

Jerry Ford In History (USNEWS)

By Michael Barone

U.S. News and World Report, January 2, 2007

Gerald Ford, who died last week at age 93, lived longer than any other president and survived after leaving office longer than any other president but Herbert Hoover. So we've had time to reflect on where he and his presidency stand in history. As commentators have been reminding us, Ford healed the wounds of Watergate and provided steady leadership in difficult times. But there is more to be said.

Ford came to office when the postwar consensus on foreign and economic policy was in ruins. The nation seemed on a downward trajectory at home and abroad. By dint of hard work and with the help of top-flight appointees, he helped to steer us toward a different course. This despite the fact that he was very much part of the postwar consensus himself. He was elected to Congress in 1948, defeating an isolationist Republican incumbent: This was a victory for the bipartisan Cold War policies of President Harry Truman and of Republican Sen. Arthur Vandenberg, who, like Ford, was from Grand Rapids.

In the House, Ford served on the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee and specialized in defense and foreign policy, mostly supporting the Truman, Eisenhower, Kennedy, and Johnson administrations at a time when politics tended to stop at the water's edge. On domestic policy, Ford took a standard Republican line, favoring less spending than Democrats but declining to challenge New Deal programs. He supported some limits on labor unions but basically accepted the postwar consensus that big decisions should be hammered out by big government, big business, and big labor.

Loyalist. In 1973, Ford was thinking about retiring from Congress: He might have gone on to play golf in Rancho Mirage, Calif., and ski in Vail, Colo., entirely out of the public eye. History had other ideas. When Vice President Spiro Agnew was pushed to resign, Richard Nixon needed to appoint a loyalist who could be confirmed by a Democratic Congress: Ford filled the bill. When Nixon was forced to resign, Ford was suddenly president. The postwar consensus was gone. Since 1968, there had been fierce debate about Vietnam; most Democrats wanted to slash defense spending, while conservatives grumbled about Nixon's détente with the Soviet Union and opening to China. Nixon's Keynesian economic policies and the oil shock of 1973 produced a sharp recession and high inflation-stagflation. Experts told Americans that the days of low-inflation growth were over and that America was in retreat in the world. The trajectory would be ever downward.

Ford did not succeed in turning that around instantly. But he put into place policies that in time directed those trajectories upward. His negotiations with the Soviet Union and our European allies produced the Helsinki Accords, which ratified the status quo in Eastern Europe but also contained human-rights provisions that in the 1980s helped to delegitimize the Soviet empire. Ford was forced to accept the Communist victory in Vietnam (because Congress would not fund aid promised to our allies) but was able to respond vigorously to the attack on the Mayagüez. At home, he moved toward policies to tamp down inflation and to start the deregulation of transportation and communications, which vastly increased the productivity and resilience of the American economy.

Politically, Ford was written off as a failure. He nearly lost the 1976 Republican nomination to Ronald Reagan, and he lost the general election to Jimmy Carter. The Reagan challenge-and Ford's own dumping of Vice President Nelson Rockefeller-showed that the Republican Party was shifting to the right, away from the postwar consensus. But Ford's rally in the general election, from 25 points behind in the polls to only a 50 to 48 percent defeat, showed that the Republican Party had greater residual strength in the wake of the collapse of the postwar consensus than most people thought.

Ford was ridiculed as a bumbler though he was a gifted athlete and was dismissed as a lightweight though he entered the White House with a considerable command of foreign and domestic policy. He healed the nation and, more important, proved that it was possible to get America off its downward trajectory and heading upward again, as it did in the 1980s. Something to remember in these pessimistic times.

Ford's Long Shadow (NSWK)

By Michael Beschloss

Newsweek, January 2, 2007

Jan. 8, 2007 issue - He was a larger figure than you might have thought. Many familiar personalities—politicians, movie stars, newscasters—are smaller in fact than they are on television or in photographs. In his 1970s-modern desert house in Rancho Mirage, Calif., or his mountainside ski retreat in Beaver Creek, Colo., however, Gerald Ford was striking: lean, muscular and imposing into his 90s.

Before he died last week at 93, Ford had also become an imposing figure in American history. The 38th president, who will be mourned at services this week in Washington and Michigan, helped shape America in two different centuries. He was a product of the Depression, a World War II Navy hero, a cold-war leader in the House and vice president and president at a time when America was struggling to get past an unpopular war in Vietnam and the Watergate scandal of Richard Nixon.

For a reminder of what a difference it made that Jerry Ford became president in August 1974, think of this: if Congress had let Nixon nominate his first choice for vice president after Spiro Agnew's resignation in disgrace, ex-Texas governor John Connally would have been the 38th president. That same month, Connally was indicted for perjury and obstruction of justice in a separate scandal. (He was later acquitted.) Would faith in our system have survived after we watched a president and vice president quit, only to see a new president indicted as he was sworn in?

The student of history can detect Gerald Ford's influence on America from Watergate to Iraq, from the presidencies of Richard Nixon to George W. Bush. President for just 29 months, Ford changed the way we live, rescuing the White House from scandal, restoring a measure of confidence in politics and articulating a philosophy of robust executive power that influences President Bush even now. Ford's last two chiefs of staff, Vice President Dick Cheney and ex-Defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld—men whose understanding of executive power was shaped by their experience in Ford's White House—have been crucial figures in the Bush years.

Ford's most controversial decision, of course, was to pardon Nixon for any crimes he might have committed in his White House years. In that dark September 1974, there were charges of secret deals, and complaints that Ford had foreclosed the possibility that justice would be done. Yet as the years passed, more Americans came to see the pardon as an act of unusual statesmanship. "I was hurt by the lack of understanding of what I did," Ford told NEWSWEEK's Jon Meacham in 2004. "In retrospect, I look back and I understand it, but boy, at the time, as you know, I caught unshirted hell. That so many people came to see my reasoning, and agree with it, makes me feel pretty good."

Ford had reason to glow: in the space of 30 years, he completed the journey from historical footnote and mid-1970s punch line to statesman. As he grew older, he also increasingly moved to the center. He was privately critical of Bush's Iraq war and was also surprised by Cheney's growing hawkishness. He has been quoted criticizing President Bush's Iraq war, and marveled to friends that Cheney had grown so much more hawkish.

In September 1995, at the suggestion of NEWSWEEK's then editor, the late Maynard Parker, I called on President Ford one afternoon in Beaver Creek for a conversation about his life and career. Our ground rules were that I would divulge nothing about our talk until after his death, which would allow him to speak more freely than normal. Reminded of these, Ford replied in lawyerly fashion: "I accept."

In hindsight, what stands out most from our talk was Ford's frustration that the Republican Party had lurched so far to the right. "If I'd been elected in '76," he told me flatly, "the party wouldn't be as far right as it is at the present time … I sure hope it comes back to the center." Ford went on to complain about the 1992 GOP convention in Houston, where Pat Buchanan—who had challenged President George H.W. Bush for that year's party nomination—demanded that conservatives "take back our culture."

Ford told me, "My wife and I are moderate Republicans. We felt uncomfortable at the last [1992] convention. And … unless things change, we'll feel uncomfortable in the next one—if we go." (They went.) Ford lamented that George H.W. Bush had not reversed their party's rightward movement: "I was disappointed that George didn't fight a little harder against the hard right." Asked to reply to the remark last week, the senior Bush said: "He never told me that, but that's not surprising. He was a much more moderate guy in his later years."

In Beaver Creek, Ford reminded me that he and Betty were "pro-choice." He criticized Bush Senior's public avowal that he had come to oppose abortion rights. "I know damn well that he and Barbara are pro-choice," Ford told me. "Why didn't they get up and say it? That really disappointed me more than anything." Ford's comment, Bush says, was off the mark. "That's wrong," he says of Ford's suggestion that Bush was secretly pro-choice. (Barbara Bush wrote about her own pro-choice views in her 1994 memoir.)

Bush 41 was not the only Republican successor Ford criticized in our talk. He complained that Ronald Reagan had cost him the 1976 election by challenging his nomination. Ford told me that in the spring of 1976, "we thought we would have a tough time [winning] anyhow, and then to get diverted for six months or more in a very rigorous [primary] campaign—it made it difficult to be president and campaign simultaneously."

Ford said that during his fall campaign against Jimmy Carter, "the only time [Reagan] appeared with me … was when … we had a nice, vigorous rally [at a fund-raising dinner] in Los Angeles … He made no other campaign appearances on my behalf … I never understood that. If he had made an appearance in Ohio … Louisiana and Mississippi, we would have won, I'm sure." Ford added: "I never asked him about it. There was no point … I can't imagine him wanting Jimmy Carter to be president. What went through his mind, I don't know." (In fairness to Reagan, the ex-California governor did make TV spots for the Ford-Dole ticket that fall.)

Despite what he considered to be Reagan's damage to his candidacy, Ford campaigned enthusiastically when Reagan was nominated against Jimmy Carter in 1980. "I felt that Carter had been so mediocre on domestic policy that we had to have a change," Ford told me. Foreign policy, too: Ford speculated that he and Secretary of State Henry Kissinger "could have gotten the shah to handle his problems differently" to prevent Iran's turn to Islamic fundamentalism.

After Reagan's election, Ford was disappointed that, despite his contribution to the victory, the 40th president didn't consult him "as much as I would have expected he would." In our talk, Ford inveighed against Reagan's budget deficits: "With all his pronouncements about needing to balance the federal budget, his eight years were about as bad as any in the history of the country." Still, he conceded that as president, Reagan "did a much better job than I expected."

Ford knew the best-known act of his own presidency would be Nixon's pardon. He insisted to me he had no second thoughts: "I felt so strongly that I had to get this damn thing off my desk." He admitted that "sure, I would have appreciated it" if, in return, Nixon had made a stronger statement confessing guilt for Watergate offenses, which would have helped shield Ford from the firestorm the pardon created.

In our conversation, Ford said he suspected that the reason Nixon had refused to sign such a confession was that Alexander Haig, the chief of staff he had inherited from Nixon, had tipped off his exiled old boss that Ford was going to pardon him. (Haig strongly denies this.) Ford said he was "shocked and saddened" when he discovered years later (from James Cannon's 1994 book "Time and Chance") "what the role of Al Haig turned out to be. At the time, I had no idea. I assumed he was totally loyal to me … I'm sure what Haig apparently transmitted to Nixon convinced Nixon that he didn't have to make an outright admission of guilt."

Historians will treat Ford kindly. A tough-minded politician, he was a decent man who came to symbolize an American longing for bipartisanship and courage. We may marvel that Ford could remain so good-hearted amid such a toxic political environment. In our talk, Ford recalled that when he was vice president during Watergate, his "old friend" Nixon kept offering him his private "personal assurance" that there was nothing to worry about. "'Of course, Jerry, I had nothing to do with it! I was so preoccupied with foreign-policy decisions—the Soviets, China'."

The 38th president looked directly at me and asked, "Wouldn't you believe him?"

Ford Without Tears (WSJ)

By Peggy Noonan

The Wall Street Journal, January 2, 2007

One of the greatest things about Gerald Ford as a former president was that he didn't say much. He had no need for the spotlight. He was modest in the old-fashioned way of stepping aside and not getting in the way of the new guy.

He kept a lot to himself. This was in part because he had a self to leave it to.

It must have taken some effort. The man who replaced him, Jimmy Carter, was a kind of non-Ford, offering personal goodness as his main calling card. He carried his own garment bag. He was not imperial. He was awfully proud of his humility. The man who followed him, Ronald Reagan, differed from Ford not so much characterologically as politically, and his success might have grated on his old foe. But it doesn't seem to have. Ford seemed happy when things turned out well for America. That was apparently his primary interest.

He seemed lacking in vanity. There is no evidence that he was obsessed with his legacy. He didn't worry and fret about whether history would fully capture and proclaim his excellence, and because of this he didn't always have to run around proving he was right. He just did his best and kept walking. What a grown-up thing to do. Former, current and future presidents would do well to ponder this approach. History would treat them more kindly. The legacy of a man who spends his time worrying about his legacy is always: He worried about his legacy.

Now we know Ford was not silent but discreet. He granted an interview with Bob Woodward in July 2004, to be released posthumously, in which he shared his views. Mr. Woodward reports Ford told him he would not have gone to war in Iraq based on the public information available at the time. "I don't think I would have ordered the Iraq war. I would have maximized our effort through sanctions, through restrictions, whatever, to find another answer."

This is the authentic voice of the American foreign-policy establishment, and it reminds me, among other things, that establishments are not all bad. They rise for a reason. One is an ability to apprehend reality.

By speaking posthumously, Ford gave his words greater weight. He did not insert himself into the current debate, and because he wasn't in the fight he had nothing to gain or lose, no position to defend or attack. And so he could tell the truth as he saw it.

It is not clear who will speak at his funeral, but it is now unfortunately common practice for politicians to see every eulogy as an opportunity. Invited to reflect on biography, they tend to smuggle in as much autobiography as they can, and advance their personal agendas. If Bill Clinton speaks, one suspects he will laud Ford's personal tolerance. The text: This was a man who did not judge others. The subtext: He wouldn't have voted to impeach me! If George W. Bush speaks he will likely laud Ford as an exemplar of the old bipartisanship. In this way he will attempt to confer the bipartisan mantle on himself. And so on. I don't suppose this is terribly harmful, but it often gives short shrift to the departed. Still, Gerald Ford, a practical man who enjoyed the hit and tackle of politics, would have understood. Would have chuckled, in fact.

There are three points about Ford that I'm not sure can ever be sufficiently appreciated.

The first is that when he pardoned Richard Nixon, he threw himself on a grenade to protect the country from shame, from going too far. It was an act of deep political courage, and it was shocking. Almost everyone in the country hated it, including me. But Ford was right. Richard Nixon had been ruined, forced to resign, run out of town on a rail. There was nothing to be gained -- nothing -- by his being broken on the dock. What was then the new left would never forgive Ford. They should thank him on their knees that he deprived history of proof that what they called their idealism was not untinged by sadism.

Second, Ford's personal dignity -- his plain Midwestern rectitude, his old-style, pipe-smoking American normality, and his characterological absence of bile, spite and malice -- helped the nation over and through the great tearing of the fabric that was Watergate. This is often referred to, and yet it is hard to communicate what a relief it was. Whether right or wrong, hopeless or wise, a normal man was in charge. This was a balm, a real gift to the country.

Third, he did not understand, and so was undone by, the rise of the modern conservative movement. He did not understand the prairie fire signaled by the California tax revolt, and did not see it roaring east. He did not fully understand how offended the American public was by endless government spending and expanding federal power. He did not see the growing estrangement between Republicans on the ground and a leadership they saw as tax collectors for the welfare state. He did not fully appreciate the public desire for a fresher, more candid attitude toward the Soviet Union, and communism in general. He was not at all alive to what would prove to be deep national qualms about abortion. He was not aware of its ability to alarm, to waken the sleepy Evangelicals of the South and the urban ethnics of the North, who'd previously been content to go with the Democratic flow. Ford was oblivious to this. He thought in his own stolid way that abortion was pretty much an extension of the new feminist movement, which he supported. How could a gallant fella not?

In all this he proved that it is not enough in politics to be good. You have to have vision. You have to be able to see. If you can't, they can tell, and they'll retire you.

Which Republicans almost did in the great Ford-Reagan primary of 1976, and the electorate did later that fall.

And yet. This must be said and should be said. He was a good man, and that's not nothing -- it's something. Gerald Ford fought for his country. He didn't indulge his angers and appetites. He seems to have thought, in the end, that such indulgence was for sissies -- it wasn't manly. He was sober-minded, solid, respecting and deserving of respect. And at that terrible time, after Watergate, he picked up the pieces and then threw himself on the grenade.

We were lucky to have him. We were really lucky to have him. Rest in peace.

The Quality Of His Mercy (WP)

By Jon Meacham

The Washington Post, January 2, 2007

In history's light, the defining hour of Gerald Ford's presidency came at 11 o'clock on the morning of Sunday, Sept. 8, 1974, when he announced his pardon of Richard Nixon. The country has already heard much about Ford's role in healing the nation after Watergate and will undoubtedly hear more such reflections this morning when his life is commemorated at the Washington National Cathedral. It is fitting that these words will echo through the great nave, for Ford was, in a quiet, unnoticed way, an important figure in America's public religion.

During his most critical moments in the White House -- his assumption of power and the pardoning of Nixon -- Ford drew deeply on theological imagery. Everyone knows that Ford said "My fellow Americans, our long national nightmare is over" on Aug. 9, 1974. Much less quoted, but perhaps more revealing given the pardon, is a sentence he spoke a moment later: "[T]here is a higher Power, by whatever name we honor Him, who ordains not only righteousness but love, not only justice but mercy."

There were many reasons for the pardon that came a month later, but Ford also framed the decision in religious terms, terms that go far beyond routine political rhetoric. "I have promised to uphold the Constitution, to do what is right as God gives me to see the right, and to do the very best that I can for America," Ford said that September Sunday. As God gives me to see the right: The phrase echoes Lincoln's Second Inaugural, itself a piece of American scripture.

Then Ford explicitly spoke of the "higher power" he had mentioned when he was sworn in. "The Constitution is the supreme law of our land, and it governs our actions as citizens. Only the laws of God, which govern our consciences, are superior to it." In a New Testament allusion ("Then Peter opened his mouth, and said, Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons: But in every nation he that feareth Him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with Him"), Ford said: "I deeply believe in equal justice for all Americans, whatever their station or former station. The law, whether human or divine, is no respecter of persons; but the law is a respecter of reality." The reality, Ford thought, was that a trial of the former president would most likely be unfair, drawn out and destructive. And finally: "I do believe, with all my heart and mind and spirit, that I, not as president but as a humble servant of God, will receive justice without mercy if I fail to show mercy."

This is an extraordinary thing to say: Ford was linking his own fate beyond time to his actions within time. The idea that God punishes or rewards us, individually or collectively, for what we do on Earth, either in our own lives or in the life of the nation, is rooted in the American story. Abigail Adams believed a dysentery epidemic in Boston might be divine punishment for slavery; even Thomas Jefferson, whose religious ideas were, to say the least, unorthodox (he once took a razor to the Gospels, excising miraculous details he found implausible), believed there was a connection between the nation's conduct and the supernatural. Reflecting on slavery, he once said: "I tremble for my country when I reflect that God is just, that his justice cannot sleep forever."

Such an understanding, naturally, has hardly been unanimous, and many Americans are reasonably uncomfortable with the idea that our leaders think they are either communing with the divine or carrying out God's mission. "Religion and government are certainly very different things, instituted for different ends," said the Founding-era politician John Dickinson, "the design of one being to promote our temporal happiness; the design of the other to procure the favor of God, and thereby the salvation of our souls. While these are kept distinct and apart, the peace and welfare of society is preserved, and the ends of both are answered. By mixing them together, feuds, animosities and persecutions have been raised, which have deluged the world in blood, and disgraced human nature."

Time and again in the American experience, however, the culture has been more in line with Lincoln's -- and Ford's -- views on the question of religious expression and thought in the public sphere than it has been to that of strict separationists. Guarding against excessive religious influence in our public affairs is an unending task, and the virtues of justice and mercy are universal (or should be).

"I am charged with being a preacher," Theodore Roosevelt once said. "Well, I suppose I am. I have such a bully pulpit." In his quiet way, Gerald Ford used that pulpit more than most, and his essential message -- of forgiveness and grace -- is one worth remembering today, and in years to come.

Chief Justice Calls For Judges' Pay Hike (AP)

By Pete Yost

AP, January 2, 2007

Pay for federal judges is so inadequate that it threatens to undermine the judiciary's independence, Chief Justice John Roberts says in a year-end report critical of Congress.

Issuing an eight-page message devoted exclusively to salaries, Roberts says the 678 full-time U.S. District Court judges, the backbone of the federal judiciary, are paid about half that of deans and senior law professors at top schools.

In the 1950s, 65 percent of U.S. District Court judges came from the practicing bar and 35 percent came from the public sector. Today the situation is reversed, Roberts said, with 60 percent from the public sector and less than 40 percent from private practice.

Federal district court judges are paid $165,200 annually; appeals court judges make $175,100; associate justices of the Supreme Court earn $203,000; the chief justice gets $212,100.

Thirty-eight judges have left the federal bench in the past six years and 17 in the past two years.

The issue of pay, says Roberts, "has now reached the level of a constitutional crisis."

"Inadequate compensation directly threatens the viability of life tenure, and if tenure in office is made uncertain, the strength and independence judges need to uphold the rule of law — even when it is unpopular to do so — will be seriously eroded," Roberts wrote.

Legislation languished in Congress in 2006 that would have provided a 16 percent increase in federal judges' salaries. The bill was introduced by Democratic Sens. Dianne Feinstein of California, Patrick Leahy of Vermont and John Kerry of Massachusetts.

Leahy, incoming chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said Roberts "is right that the issue of judicial compensation relations to the issue of the independence of the judiciary." Leahy said the chief justice "has tackled a touchy but timely topic that has been a chronic sticking point between the judicial and legislative branches."

Over the past 16 years, Congress has provided the judiciary occasional cost-of-living adjustments, but Roberts said the absence of salary increases is "grievously unfair."

Leahy pledged "to do what I can to convince Congress to fairly evaluate this issue and the chief's arguments so that we can see what solutions may be possible."

It is the first time in the two-decade history of year-end reports by Roberts and his predecessor, the late William Rehnquist, that the chief justice's message has focused entirely on a single subject.

DOJ_NMG_0111138

Roberts said the judiciary will not properly serve its constitutional role if it is restricted to people so wealthy that they can afford to be indifferent to the level of judicial compensation, or to people for whom the judicial salary represents a pay increase.

There are "very good judges" in both of those categories, said Roberts, but a judiciary drawn more and more from only those categories "would not be the sort of judiciary on which we have historically depended to protect the rule of law in this country."

"It changes the nature of the federal judiciary when judges are no longer drawn primarily from among the best lawyers in the practicing bar," Roberts wrote.

The number of cases filed in the Supreme Court increased for the court's 2005 term, according to an appendix to the report. Supreme Court case filings rose by more than 1,000 to 8,521 from the previous term. Appeals court filings dropped by 3 percent to 66,618 in 2006 compared with 2005.

In federal district courts, the number of criminal cases filed in 2006 declined by 4 percent to 66,860 cases and 88,216 defendants, due to changing priorities directing more resources to combating terrorism.

The civil caseload rose 2 percent to 259,541.

Excluding a jump in asbestos-related cases which totaled 18,179, the civil caseload fell by 4 percent.

Pilot Errs Over Bush Ranch (NYT)

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 1 (AP) — A small plane twice strayed into restricted airspace over President Bush's ranch in Crawford, Tex., on Sunday night, the authorities said Monday. The violation was inadvertent, a spokeswoman for the Federal Aviation Administration said.

The propeller plane wandered into restricted airspace around 11:30 p.m. local time Sunday, causing the scrambling of F-16 fighter jets, an Air Force spokeswoman said.

The jets used flares to get the attention of the pilot, who landed and was interviewed before being sent on his way, according to the North American Aerospace Defense Command and the Secret Service.

The Deep Blue Highway (NYT)

By JOHN CURTIS PERRY, SCOTT BORGERSON And ROCKFORD WEITZ

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

Medford, Mass.

IN October President Bush signed the Safe Port Act, authorizing an investment of $6.7 billion to tighten security at American ports. This is a vitally important and overdue step. But it ignores another major problem in maritime commerce: the phenomenal decline of American shipping.

While it's true that the United States Navy still dominates the world ocean — its total tonnage equals the combined tonnage of the next 17 smaller navies — American commercial shipping is but a puny remnant of its former self.

In 1948, more than a third of the world's merchant fleet flew the stars and stripes; today that figure is down to 2 percent. Half a century ago, America built more ships than any other nation, and New York City could boast that it was the world's busiest seaport. Sliding from the top since the 1980s, New York now barely ranks among the top 20.

The only American port now on the top-10 list is Los Angeles-Long Beach, an indication of how much maritime trade has shifted from the North Atlantic to the North Pacific.

A major factor in the decline of American shipping has been an antiquated law that prevents American coastal shippers from buying ships made in other countries. By amending this law and, at the same time, encouraging the development of domestic coastal shipping, Congress could help restore America's status as a great and proud maritime nation.

The slump in American shipping is especially surprising when you consider that it was American entrepreneurs who, in the mid-20th century, revolutionized oceanic transport by creating both the standard-size steel shipping container and the supership capable of transporting 50 times as much cargo as a World War II-era merchant ship could.

Shipping has always been the most economically efficient way to carry goods from place to place; it requires no investment in highways or rails, and thanks to the relatively frictionless ease with which ships move across water, fuel costs per ton are low. The arrival of containerized shipping pushed transport costs even lower, swelling world trade and expanding global wealth.

The export-driven economies of Pacific Asia built much of their enormous success upon the new maritime technologies. The United States did not. The Merchant Marine Acts of the 1920s and '30s are one reason why.

Intended to protect the domestic shipbuilding industry, the acts decreed that the only ships allowed to call on two or more consecutive American ports would be those built in the United States, owned by American companies, flying the American flag and operated by American crews.

At the time, the United States still had a large merchant marine. But the acts' restrictions handicapped coastal shipping within American waters, opening the way for the growth of the trucking and freight-rail industries.

To revive the maritime trade, Congress should give shipping companies as much choice in buying ships as their land-based rivals have when buying trucks and train cars.

Freed from the restraints of the Merchant Marine Acts, commercial shippers could not only begin to resume their position in global trade but also handle much more of the freight that moves within our borders. Before railroads and highways were developed, a network of water transportation routes connected America's port cities and towns. Today coastal shipping handles only 2 percent of domestic freight, even though coastal counties hold more than half of the nation's population.

The trucks that carry nearly a third of our cargo clog the highways. That is one reason why Americans now lose at least 3.7 billion hours and 2.3 billion gallons of fuel each year sitting in traffic. Ships could take on a larger share of this freight — and even some of the passengers now traveling by highway and rail — and carry it at lower cost.

Congress could further encourage domestic shipping by improving port facilities, just as it maintains interstate highways. And it could invest in developing ship propulsion technologies — to increase still further maritime savings in fuel costs and to reduce greenhouse gas emissions.

Americans are rightfully concerned about security, but part of protecting the nation is generating a strong economy. Revitalized coastal shipping could shorten our morning commutes as it begins to rejuvenate America's wider maritime economy.

The 'Blue Dog' Factor (USNEWS)

By Danielle Knight

U.S. News and World Report, January 2, 2007

Washington is buzzing with speculation about how incoming moderate freshman Democrats like Heath Shuler of North Carolina will change congressional dynamics. The ex-NFL quarterback will be a member of the "blue dogs," a group of budget-cutting Democrats, mostly from southern states, whose ranks will swell from about 37 to 44 in the new Congress. Shuler defeated eight-term Republican incumbent Rep. Charles Taylor in part because Shuler vowed to fight against special interests. He is also a proud Christian who opposes abortion and loves to hunt. But the 35-year-old strongly favors increasing the minimum wage and protecting the environment, and he opposes privatizing Social Security. Shuler spoke with U.S. News about his role in the 110th Congress.

Why did you join the blue dogs?

We are $9 trillion in debt. It is really unacceptable the way this administration and this past Congress have run our government. We have to find a much better way to balance our budget and use tax dollars much more wisely.

Why is the number of moderate Democrats, like the blue dogs, increasing?

In my conservative district, the people in the middle started to speak out. We've had extremes to the right and extremes to the left doing a lot of talking for the rest of the country, and I think most of the people are in the middle. With this election, you started to see working Americans and working families, the middle class, speak out. A lot more people voted on the issues, and fewer people really voted a straight ticket.

Do you think House Speaker Nancy Pelosi will work well with the blue dogs and other moderates?

I think she will. She realizes the importance of having that voice in the middle, that moderate Democrat. She has been very easy to work with so far, and I think she certainly realizes and understands how it works politically and realizes what happened this election cycle.

In your campaign, you criticized your opponent's use of earmarks. Will you push for limits on so-called pork-barrel spending?

We certainly need to have checks and balances on our spending. There has to be oversight on earmarks to make sure that it is beneficial for a great number of people in the district. And if we don't have the money, then we don't need to spend the money.

Blue dogs aside, what will you prioritize?

We are striving to bring better jobs to the district, keep our families together here in western North Carolina, and stop outsourcing our jobs. We've lost 78 percent of the textile industries in North Carolina. It's certainly going to be a priority of mine to bring high-quality jobs to the United States and make sure trade agreements are fair to families.

Jobs leaving North Carolina was one thing that led you to politics, right?

There was a factory in Haywood County that had closed down, and I watched a single mom, who had just lost her job because of the effect of the North American Free Trade Agreement, ask how she would raise her two children. I wanted to do what I could to help through my foundation. But as I spoke more about it and asked what I could do to help, people said, 'Heath, you must run for office.'

Economics Is Not For Actuaries (WSJ)

By George Gilder

The Wall Street Journal, January 2, 2007

Would conservatives please forget the Social Security "problem"? As Peter Drucker once wrote in these pages, "Don't solve problems, pursue opportunities." When Republicans solve "problems," they feed their failures, starve their strengths, and fritter away their remaining power in political imbroglios and special interest pork-fests.

Nothing good is going to come from political haggling over some hypothetical Social Security crisis decades in the future, when our economy will be vastly different and hugely more productive. From the completion of a worldwide fiber-optic broadband Internet to cornucopian energy and medical advances, the global economy is engaged in a siege of accelerating innovation that will unify it and enrich it increasingly as time passes. But no legislative reshuffling of taxes and spending today will enhance the economy's ability to support medical care, housing and transport for the aged in the future. That will depend not on actuarial trumpery but on the realities of productivity, technology, immigration and global trade and investment.

The key is keeping the economy open to outside investors as our population ages and as the productive center of the global economy shifts toward Asia. As Michael Milken points out, the younger workers around the globe will use their increasing savings to buy the assets of American seniors as they grow older, thus offering liquidity to our retirees, sustaining U.S. asset prices, and expanding U.S. opportunities.

Social Security can become a crisis only if we try to stop this process by insulating our aging middle class baby-boomers from the world economy -- if we raise tax rates and regulations, bash China, debauch the dollar and cripple the GOP and our defenses with delusionary spending cuts. Yet that sums up the likely grand compact, doesn't it? Higher tax rates in some covert form or other, some jerrybuilt pension scheme full of government regulations on our financial markets, new subsidies and protections for the "middle class" so-called victims of trade, and gimcrack spending cuts that end up focusing on defense.

Instead we should take the offensive. Lower tax rates will yield the additional revenues and borrowing power we need to sustain social programs for the aged for decades to come. As a pay-as-you-go transfer scheme, Social Security is currently working fine. But we have to stop driving aged workers out of employment through implicit Social Security taxes on their incomes. As a key first step, we need to reduce the payroll tax by at least a third -- at least to the degree we are pretending to build up "reserves" for the future. Lower payroll taxes will mean more jobs and income for Americans of all ages, and build up the real capabilities as opposed to the mere accounting balances of the U.S. economy. Ideally, as part of a flat tax program, we should eliminate the payroll tax altogether. Make the Democrats explain why they oppose that, not continue to posture on spending cuts, which always turn out to focus on defense. In a dangerous world, we will need more defense and spending will likely have to rise.

Bad economic policies like Europe's subsidized sloth on welfare would obviously erode our ability to supply goods and services to coming generations. Under such conditions we will have to inflate away the liabilities by debauching the currency in one way or another. Such an outcome may be unappetizing, but no conceivable compact with the Democrats today can save us from the inexorable costs of socialism tomorrow. Indeed, a compact with the Democrats will tend to cripple the necessary Republican resistance.

If we lower our tax rates on payrolls and incomes, however, we will discover that this economy in future decades can easily sustain scores of trillions of dollars of additional debt as necessary -- the entire $45 trillion of alleged social and healthcare liabilities. Investor king Ken Fisher's new book, "The Only Three Questions That Count," shows that the U.S. already commands a steadily growing, world-leading resource of some $110 trillion of assets, generating $13 trillion in GDP -- a 12% yield compared to long-term interest rates near 6%. Following the Bush tax-rate reductions on capital gains and dividends, we are already running an all-governmental surplus. Our corporations are laden with cash. Our current debt-asset ratio is suboptimally conservative.

Now we need to extend tax cuts to incomes and payrolls. The only thing that matters is pursuing the opportunities of global economic growth. Focus on that. Let Democrat accountant-economists grouse about the problem of debt and push for increases in taxes on middle-class workers.

Save Judeo-Christian Values (USAT)

By Virgil Goode

USA Today, January 2, 2007

A letter I sent in early December was written in response to hundreds of e-mails from constituents upset about Rep.-elect Keith Ellison's decision to use the Quran in connection with his congressional swearing-in. Their communications followed media reports that Ellison, a Minnesota Democrat, had said that he would swear on the Quran. He repeated that at a gathering of Muslims in Detroit on Dec. 26.

My letter did not call for a religious test for prospective members of Congress, as some have charged. Americans have the right to elect any person of their choosing to represent them. I indicated to my constituents that I did not subscribe to the Quran in any way, and I intended to use the Bible in connection with my swearing-in. I also stated that the Ten Commandments and "In God We Trust" are on the wall of my office, and I have no intention of displaying the Quran in my office. That is my choice, and I stand by my position and do not apologize for it.

My letter also stated, "If American citizens don't wake up and adopt the Virgil Goode position on immigration there will likely be many more Muslims elected to office and demanding the use of the Quran."

Immigration is arguably the most important issue facing the country today. At least 12 million immigrants are here illegally. And diversity visas, a program initiated in 1990 to grant visas to people from countries that had low U.S. immigration at that time, are bringing in 50,000 a year from various parts of the world, including the Middle East.

Let us remember that we were not attacked by a nation on 9/11; we were attacked by extremists who acted in the name of the Islamic religion. I believe that if we do not stop illegal immigration totally, reduce legal immigration and end diversity visas, we are leaving ourselves vulnerable to infiltration by those who want to mold the United States into the image of their religion, rather than working within the Judeo-Christian principles that have made us a beacon for freedom-loving persons around the world.

Rep. Virgil Goode is a Republican from Virginia's 5th congressional district.

Ugly Voices Tarnish Debut Of Congress' First Muslim (USAT)

USA Today, January 2, 2007

Keith Ellison's election to the House, as the chamber's first Muslim, provides the United States with a grand opportunity to showcase its credentials as a nation of opportunity, equality and diversity.

What a great story to tell the Muslim world. Five years after 9/11, voters in America's heartland elected Ellison, an African-American who grew up in Detroit and converted to Islam in college, to one of the nation's highest offices. The 43-year-old Democrat took 56% of the vote in his Minneapolis-area district.

Ellison upped the chance to polish America's image for religious tolerance, as well, when he said he'd use Islam's holy book, the Quran, at his ceremonial swearing-in this week.

That's when the chance to shine was tarnished by a few ugly voices. The loudest belongs to Rep. Virgil Goode, R-Va., who used the occasion to take a crude swipe not only at Ellison and the Quran, but at all Muslims.

In a letter to a constituent that later leaked out publicly and reeks with bigotry, Goode railed that "if American citizens don't wake up and adopt the Virgil Goode position on immigration there will likely be many more Muslims elected to office and demanding the use of the" Quran. Goode expressed "fear" that in the next century "we will have many more Muslims" in the USA.

Goode's pinched prescription? Essentially to shut the nation's doors: Stop illegal immigration, reduce legal immigration and end a program designed to draw people from countries with otherwise low U.S. immigration rates.

Other critics of Ellison's desire to carry the Quran, a holy book meaningful to him, ranted that the Bible and only the Bible is the basis of America's values.

They couldn't be more wrong about the essence of the nation's values. Nor could Goode about what the nation has to fear.

They're even wrong on their facts.

As Goode, who is starting his sixth term, surely knows, House members are officially sworn in without any religious book. They simply raise their hands in a mass ceremony in the chamber. In unofficial ceremonies later, they re-enact the oath, often with a Bible, for commemorative photos.

Some Jewish members and others have chosen holy books other than the Bible. Even presidents have strayed from using the Bible when taking the oath of office.

In 1825, John Quincy Adams reportedly used a law volume. News accounts say Theodore Roosevelt used no Bible in taking his first oath of office, in 1901. It's Ellison's constitutional right to choose a book that's meaningful to him.

Tolerance and religious freedom are at America's heart. So is the nation's embrace of people from all countries and cultures.

Several million Muslims live in the USA. It is to the nation's credit that one of them will join Congress this week. And if Goode is worried about Muslim immigrants, he's about 260 years too late in Ellison's case. Ellison traces his ancestors to Louisiana in 1742.

Goode and other critics could learn something from the man whose actions they've vilified. Asked about the controversy on CNN last month, Ellison refused to be drawn into a battle over different holy texts.

"Let's focus on the text that binds us together," Ellison said. "That's the Constitution. That's a great document."

Amen.

Letting Go Of Holds (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 2, 2007

SEN. SAM BROWNBACK (R-Kan.), one of Congress' conservative culture warriors, opposes one of President Bush's judicial nominees because she dared to attend a same-sex commitment ceremony in 2002. Whether they want to enable the senator's bigotry is a question for Kansans and, eventually perhaps, the rest of us (Brownback is a possible 2008 presidential candidate). But the Senate can and should take action to prevent a single senator from imposing his prejudices on the entire body.

A senator can frustrate the will of the Senate by using a "hold," which allows any senator to block a vote on a nominee or piece of legislation. The practice is indefensible even when asserted on behalf of a worthy cause, and even when a senator is open, as Brownback was, about his obstructionism. Rooted in tradition and Senate rules that often require unanimous consent for business to proceed, the hold undermines the principle of majority rule even more than its procedural kissing cousin, the filibuster.

Brownback's hold on Michigan Appeals Court Judge Janet Neff, who was nominated for a federal district judgeship, was an especially obnoxious use of the procedure. Brownback is fixated on the fact that Neff attended and spoke at a ceremony in 2002 at which the daughter of the judge's next-door neighbor exchanged (legally nonbinding) vows with another woman.

Even after saying that he will drop the hold that has stalled action on Neff's confirmation, Brownback still wants to question Neff, absurdly enough, about the ceremony to test his concern that she wouldn't be impartial in cases involving the legality of same-sex marriage. He has, however, dropped his much-ridiculed suggestion that Neff promise to recuse herself from such cases as a condition of being confirmed.

But if Brownback's use of the hold is wrong, so is its use by other senators. Reformers, led by Sens. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa) and Ron Wyden (D-Ore.), are proposing to do away with secret holds, which were supposed to end under an agreement between Democratic and Republican leaders in 1999. The theory behind requiring senators to admit they were placing holds was that they would be embarrassed into giving them up. But, far from being shamed, senators have trumpeted their holds in press releases, as Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and Patty Murray (D-Wash.) did last year when they placed a hold that delayed the confirmation of the chairman of the Food and Drug Administration. That hold was designed to pressure the FDA into approving the over-the-counter sale of the Plan B emergency contraceptive.

Senate rules should be amended to abolish all holds, secret and open, so that no senator can usurp the right of the entire body to judge a nominee or a piece of legislation. The hold is defended as a form of "senatorial courtesy," but it's insulting to the people senators represent.

Economy Poised For '07 Rebound, Forecasters Say (WSJ)

By Mark Whitehouse

The Wall Street Journal, January 2, 2007

The U.S. economy is poised to shake off the housing slump and regain momentum by the end of this year, and the credit goes to techies, bankers, chefs and shoppers, according to a Wall Street Journal survey of economists.

The panel of 60 economists who participated in the Journal's latest semiannual economic forecasting survey offered an optimistic outlook for 2007: The service sector should keep humming along as the recent weakness in housing and manufacturing abates and the Federal Reserve begins to reduce interest rates. That would allow the economy to expand at a rate fast enough to keep investors happy, but slow enough to keep inflation at bay.

Even so, economists haven't stopped worrying about what could happen if the current slowdowns in housing and manufacturing spread further -- a pattern that has characterized previous recessions. In another potentially ominous sign, they increasingly differ about the economy's trajectory.

On average, the economists predict that inflation-adjusted gross domestic product, a broad measure of economic activity, will grow at an annualized rate of 2.3% in the first half of 2007 and 2.8% in the second half. That's up from a sluggish 2% in the third quarter of 2006, but still far below the robust annual growth rates of 3.2% for 2005 and 4.1% for early 2006.

"As long as you don't think the labor market is going to collapse or financial conditions are going to change, then you're starting to have the conditions for better growth down the road," says Bruce Kasman, head of economic research at J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. in New York.

The rapid expansion of technology companies such as Google Inc. and the huge bonuses lavished on New York investment bankers are just a couple of signs of the service sector's strength. Across the country, restaurants, hospitals, software makers and consulting firms are growing and hiring. All told, service businesses, which make up about 80% of the nation's economy, added 1.1 million jobs from May through November.

"We've been extremely busy," says Anthony Kolton, president and chief executive of Logical Information Machines, a Chicago company that provides research software to hedge funds, trading firms and investment banks. "There's a lot of money out there, and people have to put it to work."

The upbeat attitude in services contrasts sharply with the recent pain in the housing and manufacturing sectors. Builders have been slashing prices and production as they attempt to get rid of a large backlog of unsold homes. Despite a rise in November, new-home construction was down 30% from its January peak.

Housing-related industries shed 145,000 jobs from May though November, according to Zoltan Pozsar, an economist at Moody's Economy.com. Falling home values have also left people with less power to extract cash from their homes through home-equity loans and refinancings, a factor that many economists expect to take a bite out of consumer spending.

Along with slumping auto sales, the drop in housing activity has affected all kinds of manufacturers, from drywall factories to furniture makers. The Institute for Supply Management, a purchasing managers' trade group, said that its index of manufacturing activity for November fell to 49.5, the lowest point since April 2003. (Any number below 50 indicates contraction.) By contrast, the ISM's index of service-sector activity for the same month rose.

"It's really two very different economies, depending on whether you're looking at the goods or service industries," says J.P. Morgan's Mr. Kasman.

The bottom line is that the strength in services will help to keep the job market relatively healthy. In the consensus scenario, nonfarm businesses will add about 100,000 jobs a month in 2007. That should be strong enough to slowly lift wages, but not to keep the unemployment rate from creeping up to 4.9% from 4.5% in November.

The economists surveyed expect year-to-year inflation to decline to 1.7% in May from 2.0% in November. As a result, they expect the Fed to shift its focus from fighting inflation to helping the economy grow, lowering short-term interest rates to 4.75% by the end of 2007 from the current 5.25%.

That's a big change from six months ago, when forecasters saw the Fed's battle with inflation as the greatest challenge facing the economy. "The Fed was hoping to slow the economy down enough to take the wind out of inflation without triggering a recession," says Nariman Behravesh, chief economist at consulting firm Global Insight in Waltham, Mass. "So far it looks like it has succeeded."

Most forecasters expect 2007 to be a good -- not great -- year for the economy. While six in 10 said they think the worst of the housing downturn's impact on the broader economy had passed, they still see a deeper housing slump as the biggest risk looming over the economy. That concern was reflected in the odds they placed on a recession in the next 12 months, which rose to 27% from 20% in June.

More so than in recent surveys, forecasters differ on the economic outlook. One measure of their disagreement -- the standard deviation of their forecasts for inflation-adjusted GDP for the coming half year -- widened to about 0.7 percentage point in December, up from a 20-year low of 0.5 percentage point in June. Each of the past two recessions have been preceded by sharp increases in the deviation measure -- to levels greater than one.

Ian Shepherdson, chief U.S. economist at consulting firm High Frequency Economics and one of the survey's most pessimistic forecasters, places the odds of a recession at one in two. He believes that home construction still has a long way to fall before it levels off with demand, and that the Fed's rate increases, which helped push corporate borrowing costs upward by about a full percentage point between fall 2005 and spring 2006, have yet to take their full toll on business activity. Mr. Shepherdson expects real GDP to grow at an annual rate of 0.5% in the first half of 2007 and 2.25% in the second half.

"It's going to be worse than the consensus expects," he says. "My guess is that we'll probably avoid a recession, but by the skin of our teeth."

Most other forecasters believe the economy will prove more resilient. For one, stronger growth abroad should help boost U.S. exports: More than three out of four forecasters pointed to Asia as the biggest contributor to global growth in 2007.

Beyond that, money remains easy to borrow despite the Fed's efforts to raise interest rates. Global investors' appetite for U.S. bonds has helped fuel a boom in mergers and acquisitions, and low long-term interest rates have kept mortgages accessible for potential home buyers. Even people with shaky credit, whose tendency to default has proved greater than many investors expected, still have access to money.

"We've had a remarkably benign credit environment," says Richard Berner, chief U.S. economist at Morgan Stanley in New York. "That's partly a tribute to our flexible and resilient capital markets, but I think it's also just plain good luck."

To some extent, the hit U.S. manufacturing has taken in recent years has made the sector's outlook less consequential today because there just aren't as many American manufacturing jobs left to lose, says Ed Leamer, head of the forecasting center at the University of California's Anderson School of Management. Manufacturing has been shedding jobs since the recession of 2001.

"There's no fat to trim," says Mr. Leamer. "And without the trimming of fat in manufacturing, you just can't get the job loss that can add up to a recession."

Economists Cautiously Optimistic About 2007 (NYT)

By MICHAEL J. De La MERCED

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

By the end of 2006, Wall Street had every reason to celebrate. A second-half rally propelled the stock market to its best year since 2003. Companies reported strong profits, and some, like oil producers and investment banks, had record-shattering earnings.

Yet the year had a more precarious beginning. Worries were rampant that a slowdown in housing would hurt the overall economy and that the Federal Reserve would raise interest rates and stall growth. But the economy proved resilient, withstanding a housing slump. The Fed halted its campaign for higher interest rates. Profits accelerated, and there was a huge wave of mergers and acquisitions.

Nonetheless, Wall Street economists are looking at 2007 with some caution. They expect at least some slowdown in economic growth. And many worry that housing's slump will spread to other corners of the economy.

The analysts surveyed predicted that the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index, which closed 2006 at 1,418.30, would end 2007 at 1,440 to 1,570.

Richard Bernstein

Chief Investment Strategist

Merrill Lynch

Though concerns mount that the world is suffering from global warming, Richard Bernstein is content to call himself a "bipolar bear." While he foresees returns rising 12 percent over the coming year — and the S.& P. hitting 1,570 by the end of the year — Mr. Bernstein expects increased volatility. That is in large part because the Fed will not ease, or lower rates, in January, he says.

"As the uncertainty about the Fed easing has gone up, you've found that the market has become choppier," he said.

Mr. Bernstein cautioned that he expected growth in gross domestic product to be a full percentage point below other estimates, citing in part a "money illusion" over the growth in the Dow and even in energy prices.

Investors should watch earnings carefully, he said. "There's sort of an embedded assumption that earnings will be going great forever."

Mr. Bernstein recommends a mix of 50 percent stocks, 30 percent bonds and 20 percent cash for investors' portfolios. Among sectors to watch, Mr. Bernstein rated telecommunications as a growth sector, aided by increasing attractiveness in European and Asian companies. "It's one of our turnaround sectors," he said.

He is bearish on energy and commodities, citing their cyclical nature.

Abby Joseph Cohen

Chief Investment Strategist

Goldman Sachs

The coming year looks to be reasonable, if a little slow, said Abby Joseph Cohen, long one of Wall Street's optimists.

"We are assuming profit growth is in the process of deceleration," she said. "Especially in the case of energy companies, we expect that they will show gains for 2007, but they will not show as much of a boost as in previous years."

Still, Ms. Cohen said, her team's research indicates that the S.& P. is underpriced, pointing to a 12-month target of 1,550. Buoyed by the Fed's halt in raising interest rates, merger activity should keep rolling, but with more of a focus on international expansion.

With the slowdown in housing, the economy will rotate toward discretionary consumer services, like travel, restaurants and entertainment, she said. Large-capitalization industrials and information technology may also see favorable growth. Over all, Ms. Cohen said, the economy should run well, with no real bumps in the way.

David Bianco

Chief U.S. Equity Strategist
UBS Investment Research

David Bianco remembers a scary moment from last summer, as he and others feared that the Fed might tighten interest rates. Since then, the stock market has recovered and that forward momentum should carry over into 2007, he said.

"We'll continue to see P/E expansion," Mr. Bianco said of price-to-earnings ratios, "mostly driven by everybody's fears of a weakening economy not taking place."

Like Ms. Cohen, Mr. Bianco said that he sees the S.& P. as relatively undervalued. Despite the flurry of merger activity in 2006, he believes that the S.& P. has been using less than half of its debt capacity, something he expects to be corrected.

Housing will continue to slow and prices will fall further, taking consumer-related spending and industries like autos along with it, he said.

Abhijit Chakrabortti
Chief U.S. and Global Equity Strategist
J. P. Morgan Chase

Last year can be summed up in one phrase, according to Abhijit Chakrabortti: Value killed growth.

"If you had that the S.& P. would be up for the year, you would have said that tech, industrials and health care would kill value stocks," he said. "But telecoms and utilities were the big winners."

Coming off a surprisingly good 2006, however, Mr. Chakrabortti is distinctly bearish. He sees slower growth in the United States compared with Asia and Europe. Volatility will pick up as earnings slow down, he added, and the dollar will weaken.

The Fed will hold steady, Mr. Chakrabortti said, but other central banks will tighten.

He predicts the S.& P. will rise to 1,440 — the low end of targets among the analysts surveyed.

"I very much suspect that there will be a time when a 1,440 valuation looks good," he said. "The market will be disappointed with the Fed, and we'll see a significant correction sometime in the first half."

Ethan S. Harris
Chief U.S. Economist
Lehman Brothers

Ethan S. Harris said he was less surprised than most by the resilience of the stock market last year. He expects 2007 to be a growth year, albeit one without the boom that marked the last half of 2006.

"There's still room for the market to rally," he said. To that end, he staked an S.& P. price target of 1,570, thanks in large part to the economy shrugging off the housing slump.

But he also said he did not expect a completely rosy economic picture. Alone among economists surveyed, Mr. Harris talked about the possibility of "a very mild version of stagflation." Moreover, he gave recession a 20 percent chance to appear in 2007.

Mr. Bianco said that he expects the Fed to cut interest rates in March, setting a fairly steady metronome for slowing but solid growth and a target S.& P. of 1,500 by year-end.

Profits Likely To Slow In '07 (WSJ)

By Constance Mitchell Ford And Rafael Gerena-morales
The Wall Street Journal, January 2, 2007

NEW YORK -- For the past five years, U.S. corporate profits have grown much faster than the overall economy, one of several reasons why U.S. stock prices keep setting records. But many economists believe that the days of outsize profit growth are nearing an end.

Corporate profits, as measured by the Commerce Department, have risen more than 12% a year since 2002, hitting a high of 19% in 2004. In the third quarter of 2006, profit growth was running at an annualized rate of 16%. But the consensus forecast of economists polled by The Wall Street Journal calls for those gains to slow to the single digits this year and next, with pretax profits rising about 6%.

IN SUMMARY

· The News: Corporate profits are expected to rise about 6%, slowing from the double-digit growth of the past five years.
· What's at Stake: Slower U.S. growth is expected to damp sales across the economy.
· The Bottom Line: Some economists believe single-digit profit growth still leaves room for stocks to rise.

That estimate is for profits across the entire economy, from multinational conglomerates to mom-and-pop businesses. By contrast, profit figures tracked by Wall Street tend to focus mainly on large public companies.

DOJ_NMG_0111146

But the trends are similar. Thomson Financial, for example, expects growth in earnings per share for companies in the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index to slip below 10% in 2007. If that forecast is on the mark, it would be the first year of single-digit growth for the S&P 500 since 2002.

"Some of the hot air is coming out of corporate profits," says Maria Fiorini Ramirez, president of MFR Inc. in New York, which is forecasting economywide profit growth of 4% in 2007. "The better years are behind us, and the leaner years are ahead of us."

Among S&P 500 companies, the energy sector's profit is estimated to have grown 21% in 2006 but profits are expected to rise only 1% in 2007, according to Thomson, which surveys Wall Street analysts.

And the profit-growth forecast for the materials sector, which includes metals and chemicals companies and whose profit growth for 2006 is estimated at 28%, has tumbled to 3% for 2007.

There are several reasons why economists expect profits to be leaner in the years ahead. First and foremost, they are expecting growth to slow in response to weakness in the manufacturing sector and in housing, which will damp sales across the entire economy. Most economists are forecasting that the economy, as measured by gross domestic product, before adjustment for inflation, will expand between 4% and 5% this year after growing 6.9% in 2004 and 6.3% in 2005. Nominal growth in GDP for 2006 is expected to be about 6%.

But even if GDP weren't expected to slow, economists would still be looking for profit growth to ease for the same reason that "trees don't grow to the sky," says Jan Hatzius, an economist at Goldman Sachs Group Inc. Put another way, profits can't continue to outpace the overall economy by such large measures for a sustained period. Historically, annual growth rates for GDP and corporate profits have been about the same, between 6% and 7%. Eventually, say economists, the relationship between GDP and profits should return to its historical norm.

"If corporate profits grew persistently faster than nominal GDP, all of the income in the economy would eventually accrue to shareholders, and none to workers. However, there are economic forces that ensure that this doesn't happen," says Mr. Hatzius, who forecasts corporate profit growth of 1.6% in 2007, one of the lowest forecasts among the 60 economists who participated in The Wall Street Journal's economic forecasting survey.

Those forces include rising wage growth. Average hourly earnings, after barely moving for years, have rebounded in recent months and were up 4.1% in November from a year earlier. Average weekly earnings were up 4.4%. Benefits costs are also on the rise.

At the same time, companies are finding it more difficult to raise prices to recoup their higher compensation costs. In fact, some companies are starting to reduce prices to keep consumers spending. "Price discounts are seen all across the retail space -- cars, furniture, electronics, clothing -- and now have spillover to housing as well," says Joseph Carson, chief economist at AllianceBernstein. Such trends, he says, mean that "margin expansion is over." Mr. Carson is forecasting profit growth of 3% for 2007.

There are other pressures on profit margins as well: Energy prices and prices for goods such as chemicals, plastics and metals, are likely to remain elevated amid healthy global demand, taking a bigger bite out of proceeds from sales. And slowing productivity gains in the U.S. could limit the ability of American companies to curb costs. That all translates into less for the bottom line.

So far, the stock market's performance doesn't hint of any slowing of profits. The Dow Jones Industrial Average gained 16% last year, its best performance since 2003.

Of course, 6% growth in profits -- the consensus estimate for 2007 -- isn't so bad when compared with historical growth rates. And in fact, some economists believe that single-digit profit growth still leaves room for stock prices to move higher.

Gail Fosler, chief economist at the Conference Board, a nonprofit business research group, expects profit growth of just 4% in 2007. Nevertheless, she expects stocks to continue to perform well. In recent years, foreign stock markets, including those in Europe and Japan, have recorded big gains that have outpaced the U.S. market's performance. As a result, she says, U.S. stocks have become "a good value" relative to stocks of companies in other nations.

Why Consumers May Show More Discipline In 2007 (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, January 2, 2007

After the usual binge of holiday spending, Americans may want to make a resolution of fiscal prudence for the new year: "I will repair my household finances."

This isn't just advice from financial gurus during an era of record household debt. For many families, fiscal discipline is being imposed by the slowdown in the US housing market. Indeed, the number of homes in foreclosure is rising, as many owners fail to meet their mortgage payments.

DOJ_NMG_0111147

But there is good news: For most households, this is a relatively benign climate for financial make-overs.

Many borrowers have the opportunity to refinance their debt at low interest rates. Moreover, forecasters generally don't foresee a recession in 2007. A healthy economy could allow consumers to keep spending even as they borrow less and save more.

"I do think that the savings rate will turn firmly positive by [the end of 2007]," says Mark Zandi of Moody's Economy.com, a forecasting firm in West Chester, Pa. But "there is a significant amount of financial stress in 2007."

Some economists, in fact, believe a recession is likely as faltering home prices put a squeeze on family wealth. But the more common forecast is that the housing slump won't cause an outright downturn in the economy.

Members of the National Association for Business Economics, surveyed in November, generally believe the housing market will hit bottom sometime in 2007.

"It looks like the housing decline is in its last phase," says Peter Kretzmer, an economist at Bank of America in New York.

In any scenario, how homeowners grapple with their debts will be a central feature of the 2007 economy.

Consumer spending accounts for about two-thirds of US economic activity. The more people have to scramble to cover their debt payments, the more they may have to curb other spending.

The challenges are greatest, some analysts say, for young households - people who bought homes near the peak of the real estate boom - and for those with lower incomes who stretched to get credit.

For years, amid a nationwide housing boom, people took out bigger and bigger mortgages, and their property values rose just as fast. Rising home values made people feel wealthier, and Mr. Zandi reckons that this "wealth effect" made people spend more than they otherwise would. The nation's personal-saving rate, the difference between Americans' disposable income and their spending, has been negative since the summer of 2005 - the first time since the Great Depression.

Since then, Americans have essentially been dipping into their savings, or sometimes using credit cards, to spend more than they earn.

There's no guarantee that the saving rate will get back into positive territory in 2007. But some economists see signs that households are adjusting their behavior.

In the late summer of 2005, households borrowed an amount equal to 14.6 percent of their disposable income - the highest level in any quarter since World War II, according to Paul Kasriel, an economist at the Northern Trust Corp. in Chicago.

A year later, American borrowing totaled just 8.8 percent of disposable income in the third quarter, lower than any three-month period since the recession of 2001.

People aren't as eager to take out big mortgages when houses have stopped rising in value every month.

Still, households remain highly leveraged. US mortgage debts now total about 46 percent of all US home values. That percentage has more than doubled since the 1950s. "Homeownership is now much more precarious," says Tamara Draut of Demos, an advocacy group in New York worried by America's high consumer debt levels.

Some 45 percent of first-time buyers in 2005 took home loans with no down payment, Ms. Draut says. That means that, should they need to sell the home, they have very little cushion to repay their loan.

In general, home prices rise over time. But for now, prices have been heading down in dozens of cities.

Meanwhile, many homeowners will see their mortgage payments jump sharply in the next year or so, as adjustable-rate mortgages ratchet upward from low introductory rates.

That explains why foreclosures are on the rise: Many owners can't afford the higher mortgage payments, and they can't sell the home for what they paid.

The number of foreclosures was up 43 percent in the third quarter of 2006, compared with the same period the year before, according to Demos.

What can homeowners and other borrowers do to keep their balance sheets in order? Experts say some of the best steps are tried and true: Develop a budget, set aside some savings each month, and don't buy a home costlier than you can really afford.

"There is no substitute for having an emergency savings cushion," says Greg McBride, senior financial analyst at Bankrate.com in North Palm Beach, Fla.

Also, people with adjustable-rate loans, which are often resetting at rates of 7 percent or higher, might want to refinance at lower fixed rates. In addition, Mr. McBride says, "have a plan of attack" to repay high-cost debt such as credit-card bills.

Again, now may be an opportune time. People who get paid every two weeks may have gotten a third paycheck in December, McBride says. They might use that - or a year-end bonus - to pay down debts.

Financial advisers also offer this reminder: Debt can be a good thing if used wisely - such as a path to owning a home.

DOJ_NMG_0111148

"Democratization" of credit, with new types of loans available to more people, has generally been a positive force in recent years, Zandi says. "This probably has allowed ... for a more stable economy," he says. But it also leaves many people vulnerable if interest rates rise substantially, or if housing prices falter.

Jeb Bush Ponders Future, Not Knowing What It Holds (NYT)

By Abby Goodnough

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

MIAMI, Jan. 1 — When the same old irksome question popped up recently at one of his final public events here, Gov. Jeb Bush, addressing Spanish-speaking reporters, gave an atypically dramatic Governor Bush with his father, former President George Bush, last week in Boca Grande, Fla.

His words set off round-the-world buzz, with The Daily Telegraph of London going so far as to call them "a recognition by the Bush family that their dynastic reign in American politics is drawing to a close."

But in fact, the question lives on. Mr. Bush's spokeswoman said last week that he made the comment jokingly, and when asked about it later in an e-mail message, Mr. Bush himself replied, "I was misunderstood by a reporter."

He did not elaborate, leaving the world to know only this much: Half his life after he arrived in Miami as a 27-year-old real estate salesman, Governor Bush returns here this week without the title before his name and, he insists, without knowing what his future holds.

"We're in the preface of the new book in my life and I just don't know yet," he told reporters last month in Tallahassee, a day after his official portrait, with a Bible and a BlackBerry in the background, was unveiled at the Governor's Mansion. "I'm going to take some time off, hopefully do a little fishing, golfing, resting, reading, exercising. And I've got to make a living, so I'll figure it out probably in January."

Florida, too, has some readjusting to do. After eight years in office, Mr. Bush, 53, is leaving as one of the most popular and prominent governors in state history, not least because of his relationship to President Bush (brother) and former President George Bush (son). Succeeding him is Attorney General Charlie Crist, who is Republican like Mr. Bush but otherwise starkly different.

Despite the wishful prodding of admirers, Mr. Bush has adamantly ruled out a presidential campaign of his own next year, saying that he wants only to return to Miami with his wife, Columba, and their cat, Sugar. Yet rumors about his future have burst forth as regularly as exotic species in the Everglades — among them that he would be the next commissioner of the National Football League, run for Senate or become Senator John McCain's running mate if Mr. McCain won the Republican nomination for president in 2008.

"The presidency is out of the question at this point because of Bush fatigue," said Peter Schweizer, a fellow at the Hoover Institution at Stanford who wrote "The Bushes: A Dynasty" with his wife, Rochelle. "But the vice presidential slot is something that's very much in play. He's a successful governor of an important state, he helps shore up relations with the social conservatives and he has the Bush money machine."

One of Mr. Bush's former chiefs of staff has gone to work for Mr. McCain's exploratory committee, but several other former aides have signed up with Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, another probable Republican contender.

"Jeb is a policy-driven guy," Mr. Schweizer said. "If he can be a vice president that plays some kind of a policy role as Cheney has, as Gore did in the Clinton administration, then Jeb Bush will be interested."

Many assume that for now — at least partly at the urging of his wife, described as shy and eager to be out of the public eye — Mr. Bush will return to the private sector. He reported a net worth of $1.4 million in 2005, down from $2.4 million in 1998.

He was a partner in a major real estate development firm here until his first, unsuccessful run for governor in 1994, but Mr. Schweizer predicted that Mr. Bush might now seek out work involving the bioscience industry or the Latin American economy, both of which "he seems particularly animated by."

All indications notwithstanding, ardent admirers like Grover Norquist, the president of Americans for Tax Reform, are not giving up on the prospect of Mr. Bush jumping into the presidential race next year, especially if Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York becomes the Democratic candidate.

"He could step in later than anybody else," Mr. Norquist said. "You can run for president with the last name of Bush, even though there is and will be Bush fatigue, in a year that you're likely to be running against someone whose last name is Clinton."

For the time being, Mr. Bush bought a car, a Chrysler 300C, and rented a $5,500-per-month, 3,949-square-foot condominium in Segovia Tower, a luxury building overlooking a golf course in lush Coral Gables.

"I have no idea what I will be doing next," he wrote by e-mail from Boca Chica, Fla., where he was vacationing with his parents. "My priorities are to hang out with my beloved wife (until she can't take it anymore! :)), work out every day and figure out what I will do next with my life."

DOJ_NMG_0111149

As for the continued speculation, he wrote: “I am flattered that all sorts of people are interested in what I am going to do and many have offered advice as well. That will all subside soon.”

Small signs suggest, however, that he will have a hard time giving up executive powers. He told reporters that while buying furniture recently, he had to stifle the urge to tell the store owner a better way of doing business — a trait his adversaries say they will not miss.

“Bush was the type that if you did not agree with him, he really didn’t have time for you,” said State Senator Frederica Wilson, Democrat of Miami. “He wanted you to rubber stamp every idea he had, and he wouldn’t listen to reason.”

More Politics NewsWhile Mr. Bush is internationally famous, Mr. Crist, who will be sworn in as governor on Tuesday, is a stranger to all outside Florida and, but for his native Tampa Bay region, not particularly well known within the state either. While Mr. Bush was ideologically driven, often making enemies in pursuit of “big, hairy, audacious goals” and divisive social policies, Mr. Crist seems above all a pleaser, avoiding firm opinions and promising to be “the people’s governor.”

Yet despite Mr. Bush’s abrasiveness and the plunging popularity of his brother the president, he has remained well liked — or at least respected — to the end, a feat in a state as ethnically and politically divided as Florida. A poll last month by Quinnipiac University found that 57 percent of Floridians feel he did a “good” or “great” job as governor, compared with only 10 percent who said he had done a “bad” job.

Howard Simon, executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union of Florida, said the poll results reflected approval of Mr. Bush’s persona more than of his policies. Mr. Simon pointed out that two major education initiatives during the governor’s tenure — a costly effort to lower class size and another to provide universal prekindergarten classes — were passed by public referendum, over the governor’s objections.

“It needs to be said that the personal appeal and likeability of Jeb Bush has led the press and the public to overlook the extremism of many of his policies,” he said.

Several of Mr. Bush’s pet initiatives in fact failed, including a school voucher program that the Florida Supreme Court found unconstitutional.

But Mr. Bush pushed through $19.3 billion in tax cuts, put an unprecedented emphasis on standardized testing in public schools, privatized thousands of government jobs and ended affirmative action in public university admissions. He also persuaded the Scripps Research Institute and other bioscience research groups to open laboratories in Florida, which he says will make the state economy less dependent on tourism and create more high-paying jobs.

And he has appointed more than a third of the state’s judges, assuring that his socially and fiscally conservative beliefs will continue to hold some sway.

While others have emoted about Mr. Bush’s departure — including his father, who wept as he described his second son’s “decency” and “honor” in a speech in Tallahassee last month — he has characteristically avoided introspection. Asked last month what he would miss most about the Governor’s Mansion, he cited its beauty, its staff — and its towels.

“Fresh towels — all you want,” he said. “Here, although I’ve been trained to do otherwise, it’s just any time I want I can have many towels.”

Bush The Younger Reticent On Future As Florida Term Ends (FT)

By Andrew Ward

Financial Times, January 2, 2007

When Jeb Bush was asked recently how he planned to spend his first day after stepping down as governor of Florida, he reeled off a checklist of things he wanted to do: "I hope to wake up. Work out. Maybe read the local paper. Sports page probably. Hang out with my wife."

About his longer-term plans, Mr Bush was more reticent. "I'm going to try to take some time off to reflect on what I should be doing and not rush into the next thing," he said.

However, Mr Bush's efforts to duck questions about his future seem unlikely to quash feverish speculation about what that "next thing" might be.

The 53-year-old brother of President George W. Bush finishes his second and final term as governor of the Sunshine State today when Charlie Crist, his Republican successor, is inaugurated in Tallahassee.

While his brother limps towards the end of his troubled presidency, the younger Mr Bush is leaving office on a high. A recent poll showed his approval rating at 63 per cent.

Praised for his hands-on leadership style, steady economic stewardship and deft handling of several hurricanes, Mr Bush is described by David Colburn, professor of history at the University of Florida, as "perhaps the most influential governor in state history".

Mr Bush has already rejected opportunities to jump straight into another big job, including Republican pressure for him to run for the Senate and an offer to become commissioner of the National Football League.

Friends say his priority is to make money, having seen his personal wealth shrink from $2.4m (£1.22m) to $1.4m during his eight years on the Florida governor's $130,000-a-year salary, according to public disclosures.

Few people, however, believe Mr Bush has permanently finished with politics. Although he has ruled out running for president in 2008, some analysts believe he could yet be persuaded to join the Republican ticket as nominee for vice-president.

Peter Schweizer, co-author of The Bushes: Portrait of a Dynasty, says Mr Bush has three main attractions as a vice-presidential candidate.

First, he would improve the Republicans' chances of winning Florida, likely once again to be a crucial battleground state.

Second, he would bring the formidable fundraising power and political machinery of the Bush family.

Third, his solid record of social and fiscal conservatism would reassure grass roots Republicans if a more moderate candidate, such as John McCain, heads the ticket.

Mr Bush has cut taxes, vetoed spending bills and led the ill-fated fight to save Terri Schiavo, the brain-damaged woman whose case became a cause célèbre for the Christian right before her death in 2005.

"If you asked most Americans, they would have the opposite impression but Jeb is more conservative than his brother," says Mr Schweizer.

But great as his appeal may be to many Republicans, most analysts believe 2008 is too soon to ask the broader US electorate to vote for another Bush, even as vice-president.

"America has had its fill of Bushes," says Larry Sabato, professor of politics at the University of Virginia. "I don't think [the vice-presidential nomination] will be offered to Jeb and, if it were, I don't think he would accept. Unlike Hillary [Clinton], he's smart enough to understand that American voters don't like dynasties."

Polls show that the rest of the country does not share Florida's enthusiasm for Mr Bush, with only 28 per cent of US voters expressing a favourable opinion of him and 45 per cent voicing an unfavourable opinion in a recent survey.

Mr Bush started his working life with Texas Commerce Bank, now part of JPMorgan Chase, for whom he spent two years setting up its operation in Venezuela. His family eventually settled in Florida, where Mr Bush became a partner in a real estate development company and dabbled in entrepreneurial ventures, ranging from part ownership of a football team to exporting water pumps to Nigeria, with mixed success.

History could have turned out differently had Mr Bush not lost his first run for the Florida governorship in 1994, the same year his brother was elected governor of Texas.

"The overwhelming consensus was that Jeb was going to win and George W. was going to lose," recalls Mr Schweizer. "Had that happened, it's safe to assume Jeb would have ended up running for president rather than his brother."

Asked by Spanish-language reporters last month about his political future, Mr Bush replied: "No tengo futuro. (I have no future.)" But in an earlier interview he indicated his ambitions were not yet fulfilled.

"I hope there's more to remember than the first 53 years of my life," he said. "There's stuff to do. I don't know what it'll be but Ihope to be remembered by a larger body of experiences than what I've had sofar."

Senate Panels To Supply Soapbox (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, January 2, 2007

Senate Democrats interested in White House bids will get tons of free publicity starting in January with new and prominent posts on key panels.

Senators hoping to pontificate on Iraq, global warming or health care policy will enjoy multiple hearings -- some televised live -- and the amplified political microphone that comes with being in the majority party.

Among the five Democratic senators who are widely expected to seek their party's presidential nomination, three will hold chairmanships when the 110th Congress opens Thursday.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware will assume the most prominent post of the bunch as incoming chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee. Already, the presidential aspirant has promised three weeks of hearings on the Iraq war, complete with testimony from Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and new Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates.

Mr. Biden last month announced he will fight President Bush if he proposes sending a surge of troops to Iraq, calling such a move "escalation."

DOJ_NMG_0111151

Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts will be chairman of the Small Business and Entrepreneurship Committee, and Sen. Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut will lead the Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs Committee.

Mr. Kerry said a lack of health insurance for small-business workers is one of the country's greatest challenges and said his committee will look at the tax code for small firms as well as loans for minority, female and veteran entrepreneurs.

"Small businesses are the heart of the American economy and the place where American dreams rise and fall every day," said Mr. Kerry, the 2004 Democratic presidential nominee, who is considering a second try for the White House.

Mr. Dodd's panel is tasked with oversight of the country's largest financial-services companies and government agencies such as the Federal Reserve Board and Department of Housing and Urban Development.

The committee also will examine foreign investment in the United States in the aftermath of the Dubai ports debacle and will look at strengthening the country's rails, ports and roads systems against terrorism, Mr. Dodd said.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, who have not yet said officially whether they intend to run for president, do not have enough seniority to lead a Senate panel. But chances are they will have plenty to say, as each will hold posts on major committees.

Mrs. Clinton, the former first lady just elected to a second Senate term, sits on the Armed Services Committee, which also examines war policy. Mrs. Clinton's Web site includes video links to her grilling Mr. Gates before his confirmation and her questioning of the Iraq Study Group.

Mrs. Clinton has the opportunity to square off with fellow Armed Services member Sen. John McCain of Arizona, the presumed Republican front-runner for his party's presidential nomination.

The two disagree on Iraq policy, with Mr. McCain calling for more troops and Mrs. Clinton saying she cannot support such a plan unless it helps end the sectarian violence in Iraq.

Mrs. Clinton also is a member of the Environment and Public Works Committee, giving her an opportunity to showcase her environmental platform during what are expected to be in-depth hearings on global warming.

On that panel, Mrs. Clinton will be chairman of the Superfund and waste management subcommittee.

Mrs. Clinton, Mr. Obama and Mr. Dodd all will sit at the dais of the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions (HELP) Committee.

Mr. Obama, a former state senator first elected to the Senate in 2004, assumes a fourth committee post in the coming session. He dropped his spot on the environment panel and added the HELP panel and the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, which deals with terrorism matters and governmental oversight.

"I hope to address the growing health care crisis in our country and focus on legislation that will help working families adjust to the ever-changing global economy," Mr. Obama said when announcing the post.

He is already a member of Mr. Biden's Foreign Relations panel and of the Veterans' Affairs Committee.

Mr. Biden will have his hands full. Counting himself, there are four Democratic presidential hopefuls on his committee, in addition to Republican Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, who is reported to be considering running for president.

Foreign Relations Committee members Mr. Dodd, Mr. Kerry and Mr. Obama will get the opportunity to pepper administration officials with questions on Iraq and influence war policy during hearings that are likely to receive extensive television coverage.

Dodd Well-positioned For White House Bid (AP)

By Andrew Miga

AP, January 2, 2007

WASHINGTON — The White House isn't the only prestigious address on Sen. Christopher Dodd's mind as he nears a decision on whether he'll plunge into a crowded field of Democratic presidential contenders.

Wall Street also looms large. The Connecticut senator will become chairman of the Senate Banking Committee in Congress, giving him oversight of the nation's banking, financial services and insurance industries. The post will create new fundraising opportunities — a potential boost for a longshot prospect like Dodd who must prove he can raise the tens of million of dollars needed to stay competitive in the 2008 campaign.

"Any time you are chairman of a committee that oversees, arguably, the wealthiest sector of society, that's a significant opportunity to raise some real dough," said Chris Lehane, a Democratic strategist from several presidential campaigns. "But it's potentially a double-edged sword."

The senator has accepted millions of dollars in contributions from Wall Street interests during his 25 years in the Senate, but his new chairmanship, plus his White House ambitions, have upped the ante.

DOJ_NMG_0111152

"It's a tightrope walk when you're the chairman of a committee that regulates the industry that gives the most money to politics, in general," said Massie Ritsch, communications director of the Center for Responsive Politics, a nonpartisan watchdog group. "It has to be tempting to take a lot of money from this industry, because they want to give it so much."

A surge of Wall Street money could initially boost Dodd's prospects. But it could also undercut his efforts to cast himself as a champion of average working Americans.

"One of the first places people look is where your campaign cash comes from, and if it came from an industry that you regulate, you're going to have to answer questions about potential conflicts of interest and being too cozy with Big Business," said Ritsch.

A campaign spokeswoman for Dodd, whose state is home to big insurance companies, said he would be the same independent voice on the banking panel he's always been. The senator will follow the letter of the law on fundraising, and conduct himself as "a thoughtful and independent chairman who listens to all sides of an issue and enacts public policy that is in the best interest of the American people," spokeswoman Beneva Schulte said.

Dodd, 62, is prepping for a White House bid that even he acknowledges is a longshot.

Amid the Democratic pack of potential candidates dominated by heavyweights like New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, raising enough money to compete will be one of Dodd's most pressing challenges.

Dodd refused to divulge his current fundraising totals. But at the end of September, he had about $1.8 million in his Senate campaign account. His political action committee's cash balance was $167,526 in November.

Dodd's numbers are eclipsed by potential rivals Clinton and Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry, the 2004 Democratic presidential nominee, who each have about $14 million in campaign funds.

Candidates will need to raise $50 million by the end of the primary season, said Steve Grossman, a veteran party fundraiser and former Democratic National Committee chairman.

"There's not a whole lot of oxygen left in the room when you get beyond the two presumptive front-runners," Grossman said of Clinton and Obama.

If Dodd jumps into the race, he needs to show fundraising muscle soon, said Grossman.

"How quickly Dodd can get to $10 million is important," said Grossman. "March matters. March is about momentum ... The process unfolds so quickly. Chris Dodd has to be able to see a clear path to $10 million by June."

Beyond Wall Street, Dodd, a former national party chairman, has a national network of supporters, including many in the Jewish community, that he can build on, said Grossman.

Veteran Democratic strategist Bill Carrick predicted Dodd would have enough cash. "But you gotta catch on, that's really the trick for Dodd," Carrick said.

Dodd is a familiar figure in the financial world, having served on the banking panel for 25 years. He also has been a strong consumer advocate on lending issues, said Travis Plunkett, legislative director of the Consumer Federation of America, a nonprofit advocacy group. The federation, however, has disagreed with Dodd on some securities and insurance issues.

Securities and investment industry interests have given $2.18 million to Dodd since 1989, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. It was the most money Dodd got from any industry. Insurance industry sources gave $1.08 million, the center's statistics showed, while commercial bank interests gave $553,719.

McCain Likely To Run From Atop Defense Panel (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, January 2, 2007

Sen. John McCain is set this week to assume the senior Republican spot on the Armed Services Committee as he sets the stage for a presidential run while serving as his party's top Senate spokesman on defense issues.

Republicans lost control of the budget- and policy-making committee in the November elections. Chairman John W. Warner, Virginia Republican, hands the gavel to Sen. Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat. Because of term limits, he then relinquishes the ranking Republican position to Mr. McCain of Arizona.

Mr. McCain is widely expected to formally announce this year that he is seeking the Republican presidential nomination. His staff and outside advisers have been working in recent weeks to piece together a minority committee staff that can operate while he is on the campaign trial.

Former Senate staffers say one of the finalists for the key post of minority staff director is Michael V. Kostiw, who was an aide to former Rep. Porter J. Goss on the House Intelligence Committee. Mr. Kostiw has worked as an Army Reserve intelligence officer, a CIA clandestine officer and an oil company executive. He worked for Mr. Goss when the former congressman headed the CIA.

DOJ_NMG_0111153

"If they ask me, I'll do it," Mr. Kostiw said in an interview. "I've known [Mr. McCain] for a long time. I think he is a great American."

Mr. Kostiw still works for the CIA on a contract basis.

Charles Abell, Mr. Warner's staff director, is moving on, as is the normal shift when a new senator assumes control of a committee staff.

Former staffers say Mr. McCain's search team has used the word "adult" to describe the kind of staff director they were seeking -- someone who could be trusted to carry out assignments while Mr. McCain addressed presidential politics outside Washington.

Republicans meet Thursday to pick ranking committee members. Mr. McCain's spokeswoman did not return a phone message last week.

Mr. McCain, a former Navy fighter pilot held captive in North Vietnam, relies on an inner circle of aides and friends to advise him on national security issues.

One is James F. McGovern, who, like Mr. McCain, is a former Navy fighter pilot and Annapolis graduate. The two worked together when Mr. McGovern was staff director of the Senate Armed Services Committee in the 1980s. He later became undersecretary of the Air Force.

Mr. McGovern played a role in finding candidates for the staff director's job. Former Senate aides say the list was long. Some were eliminated; at least one was said to take himself out of consideration.

Another McCain adviser is retired Navy Adm. Charles Larson, a classmate of Mr. McCain's at the Naval Academy.

But his closest confidant is his chief of staff, Mark Salter, with whom he has written four books, including the 1999 best-seller, "Faith of My Fathers: A Family Memoir."

There is a precedent for a senator holding a leadership post and running for president: Former Sen. Bob Dole, then the majority leader, captured the Republican nomination in 1996. He resigned from the Senate before the fall campaign.

Clinton-Obama Differences Clear In Senate Votes (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, January 2, 2007

The attack ads practically write themselves: Hillary Clinton voted against ethanol! Barack Obama wants to increase taxes!

Such are the perils of running for president as a senator. The two front-runners for the 2008 Democratic nomination are newcomers to the chamber. But in the two years that Clinton and Obama have overlapped, they have taken opposite sides at least 40 times. That's a lot of material to mine, and even misrepresent.

Of the eight senators pondering presidential runs, Clinton (N.Y.), who is completing her first Senate term, and Obama (Ill.), sworn in two years ago, have the briefest voting histories. The Senate has held 645 roll-call votes during their shared tenure, and more than 90 percent of the time the two senators stood with other Democrats. They opposed John G. Roberts Jr.'s nomination as chief justice, supported increased funding for embryonic stem cell research and backed the same nonbinding measure that urged President Bush to plan for a gradual troop withdrawal from Iraq.

But other votes reveal important differences between the Democratic rivals that distinguish them as they prepare to launch their anticipated candidacies. The areas of dispute include energy policy, congressional ethics and budget priorities, relations with Cuba, gun ownership, and whether a senator can hold a second job.

In corn-growing Iowa, the first stop in the presidential nominating process, Clinton will have to explain the ethanol vote she cast on June 15, 2005. The senator recently softened her stance, but she is on record opposing a large federal boost for the grain-based fuel.

And Obama voted to increase taxes when he opposed a package of business breaks that included the extension of middle-class provisions. Clinton voted for the tax bill -- before she voted against it, as did Obama, in the legislation's final form.

As Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) and former senator Robert J. Dole (R-Kan.) discovered in previous campaigns, the Congressional Record is a minefield for White House contenders, a catalogue of provincial concerns, convoluted logic and compromised principles.

"A senator is called upon to vote on almost everything," said former senator Thomas A. Daschle (D-S.D.), who recently decided against a 2008 bid. Legislative records become "an inviting target for any political opponent," he said, because so few votes speak for themselves, much less reflect a lawmaker's true ideals. The Senate's unofficial motto: Don't let the perfect be the enemy of the good. That's hard to explain in a debate, Daschle noted.

One of the sharpest substantive divides is over ethanol, an issue of particular potency in Iowa. The vote in question was an effort to block a proposed amendment to the 2005 energy bill that would have established an ethanol mandate for refineries. "If there were ever an onerous, anti-competitive, anti-free-market provision, this is it," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), who led the effort and who warned that non-farming states could face spikes in gasoline prices because of supply limitations. Clinton at the time was campaigning for reelection and was one of 28 senators to support her colleague's failed bid.

At the time, New York had no ethanol industry. Iowa has more ethanol plants than any other state. "If someone voted or has a position against ethanol, it will be used by their opponents and it will be another issue they need to overcome" with voters in the Iowa caucuses, said Steffen Schmidt, a professor of political science at Iowa State University.

Over the past year, Clinton has warmed to ethanol. Buffalo has decided to build a big ethanol plant, making the issue a home-state concern. In May, Clinton said current ethanol production is "a long way from helping us deal with our gas problems" and added: "We need to be moving on a much faster track."

Obama voted for the ethanol mandate. "As a senator from a corn-growing state, Obama will have no problem on the ethanol issue and can tout his credentials on this score with a clear conscience," said Peverill Squire, who teaches politics at the University of Iowa.

The two Democrats differed on other energy-related issues. In August, Clinton supported a bill to expand oil and gas production in the Gulf of Mexico, while Obama voted against it. During the 2005 energy debate, Obama backed an increase in vehicle fuel-efficiency standards, which Clinton opposed. Clinton voted against the energy bill itself because it was stuffed with oil industry incentives. But Obama supported the legislation because it included language that would double ethanol demand by 2012.

Another fault line is spending. Obama sided with fiscal conservatives on several high-profile measures to strip funding for pet projects, including a widely criticized Pentagon travel system and the relocation of a railroad line along the Mississippi Gulf Coast that was part of a Hurricane Katrina redevelopment project. Clinton voted in favor of the projects.

One budget-related vote with broader political implications would have stripped funding for TV Marti, which beams television programming to Cuba, though the Cuban government jams the signal. Critics in Congress complain that the United States has spent almost $200 million on the failed effort and have targeted the program year after year.

Obama twice voted to cut off TV Marti funding, while Clinton supported maintaining it. Those votes will have resonance in Florida, which is a key primary state and may reschedule its 2008 primary date from March to February.

Obama spokesman Robert Gibbs said the senator's opposition to TV Marti was primarily about cost. But within Florida's large Cuban exile population, one of the most powerful voting blocs in the state, Clinton's and Obama's stances ally them with distinct groups: the older hard-liners and a younger, more progressive group of second-generation Cuban Americans and more recent immigrants whose numbers are growing. Clinton "is going with the status quo," said Sergio Bendixen, a Miami-based pollster who specializes in Hispanic voters. Obama, he said, "is with the position of change."

The senators differed on a July 13 vote that would prohibit the confiscation of legally held guns during natural disasters -- a response to seizures by law enforcement officials in the New Orleans area after Hurricane Katrina. Obama voted to ban confiscations; Clinton was one of 16 senators opposing the restrictions.

In late 2005, Obama allied with Republicans to support creating an exception to Senate rules to allow Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) to continue practicing medicine on a not-for-profit basis. Clinton opposed the change, an aide explained, because she believes that senators should not have a second source of income. Gibbs said that Obama, as an author of two best-selling books, was sympathetic to Coburn's request.

In several instances, Clinton and Obama voted against measures that they supported in principle, because the bills were not strong enough. Clinton opposed a restructuring plan for the Federal Emergency Management Agency that Obama and 86 other senators backed, because it did not restore the Cabinet-level status that FEMA had attained under President Bill Clinton, her husband. One of Obama's chief interests in the Senate has been ethics reform, but he was one of eight senators to oppose a bill aimed at tightening lobbyist rules because it was not strong enough. Clinton supported the initiative.

"You're voting for so many things that can be misconstrued," said Steve Elmendorf, a Democratic lobbyist and former campaign adviser to presidential candidates Richard A. Gephardt (D-Mo.), a House member for nearly 30 years, and Kerry, a four-term senator. "It's great if you're the opposition."

Talkin' 'Bout My New Generation (USNEWS)

By Kenneth T. Walsh

U.S. News and World Report, January 2, 2007

Barack Obama has spent the past two weeks in splendid seclusion, far away from the campaign trail, in Hawaii. The Illinois senator caught up on family news with his grandmother and sister, who live on Oahu, played golf with pals, and, if the past is any guide, engaged in some fierce Scrabble. This is the way Obama has spent Christmas for many years.

DOJ_NMG_0111155

But this time, there's been a big difference. Topic A was a momentous one–deciding, after talking with his wife, Michelle, relatives, friends, and advisers, whether to run for president in 2008. He is expected to enter the race, and he plans to announce his decision in the next few weeks.

But regardless of whether he runs, the intensity of Obama-mania suggests that the political and societal forces he represents–particularly a desire for new ideas, new faces, and a less rancorous brand of discourse–will shape the next election. Other Democratic presidential wannabes are testing the same themes, including former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, who announced last week, and Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack. But so far, it is Obama who has ridden the desire for change the furthest and the fastest. The 45-year-old freshman senator has come within striking distance of Hillary Rodham Clinton in the national polls for the Democratic nomination, is running even with her in New Hampshire, site of the first primary, and has quickly developed a reputation as one of the most charismatic politicians in years.

"I think there is a great hunger for change in the country–and not just policy change," Obama told U.S. News. "What I also think they are looking for is change in tone and a return to some notion of the common good and some sense of cooperation, of pragmatism over ideology. I'm a stand-in for that right now."

Comparisons. In his new book, The Audacity of Hope, Obama makes a rather audacious comparison–indirectly raising the prospect that he has a generational appeal reminiscent of John F. Kennedy's in 1960 and signaling that he is ready to capitalize on baby boomer fatigue. "The politics of today suffers from a case of arrested development," Obama writes. "In the back-and-forth between [President Bill] Clinton and [former House Speaker Newt] Gingrich, and in the elections of 2000 and 2004, I sometimes felt as if I were watching the psychodrama of the baby boom generation–a tale rooted in old grudges and revenge plots hatched on a handful of college campuses long ago–played out on the national stage. The victories that the Sixties generation brought about–the admission of minorities and women into full citizenship, the strengthening of individual liberties, and the healthy willingness to question authority–have made America a far better place for all its citizens. But what has been lost in the process, and has yet to be replaced, are those shared assumptions–that quality of trust and fellow feeling–that bring us together as Americans."

One of his objectives, it seems, is to set himself apart from Hillary Clinton. "Hillary Clinton is very much a creature of the 1960s and the 1970s, when she came of age," says Boston University historian Julian Zelizer. Obama seems to be trying to pigeonhole her as a politician stuck in the past.

'A Great Hunger For Change' (USNEWS)

By Kenneth T. Walsh

U.S. News and World Report, January 2, 2007

Amid his deliberations on whether to run for president, Illinois Sen. Barack Obama talked by phone with U.S. News Chief White House Correspondent Kenneth T. Walsh. He discussed politics, policy, and what he might bring to the presidential race, and he said the excitement he's generating is linked to a pervasive desire for a new politics of hope, reconciliation, and fresh ideas. Excerpts:

What are you learning about the mood of Americans during your travels around the country? I think there is a great hunger for change in the country–and not just policy change. ... What I also think they are looking for is change in tone and a return to some notion of the common good and some sense of cooperation, of pragmatism over ideology. I'm a stand-in for that right now. I'm not the only one. There's Deval Patrick in Massachusetts, Brian Schweitzer in Montana, Eliot Spitzer in New York [all Democratic governors]. ... There is something new that is out there, but it hasn't fully expressed itself.

How much of the current ferment is due to "baby boomer fatigue"? There is a weariness with the ideological battles and cultural wars of the past. Too much of our policy is framed in terms of the debates of the Sixties.

What's gone wrong with the Bush presidency? This has been the most ideological administration in my lifetime, even more so than the Reagan administration. The Reagan administration, despite the rhetoric, could be pragmatic.

You have strongly opposed the war in Iraq. Why? It's a classic example of ideology trumping reality. The country has now rejected that approach to governance.

How do you explain Bush's failure so far to win congressional approval for overhauling Social Security? The Bush administration insisted on privatization as the only approach to reform and put it forward as the only [alternative], and as a result we have nothing.

If you run for president, you will be subject to attacks on your background and views, even though you are calling for a more positive brand of politics. How do you react to that prospect? I have confidence in the American people, and if I have the opportunity to speak to them, they will look beyond the negative. ... When I came to Chicago 20 years ago, I didn't know a single person. I didn't come from a political family. Now I'm in the U.S. Senate. Chicago is considered a tough political town, and I succeeded.

The biggest question among politicians and pundits is, will you run for president? What's your timing? If I want to run a competitive race, I would get in in January.

Romney To Submit Paperwork For 2008 Bid (AP)

By Glen Johnson

AP, January 2, 2007

Gov. Mitt Romney this week will submit the necessary paperwork to form a presidential exploratory committee, but not until funeral services for former President Gerald R. Ford have concluded, according to a top aide familiar with his plans.

Romney will file by Wednesday with the Federal Election Commission, the aide said, a registration that will allow the Massachusetts governor to raise and spend money in pursuit of the 2008 GOP nomination.

Romney, like Ford, is from Michigan. Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., and former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani, have already taken the same step.

Romney ended a 10-day vacation at his home in Utah on Monday, and he had intended to file his paperwork on Tuesday, the first business day of the new year. But Ford's death on Dec. 26 triggered a mourning period that will close federal offices and the U.S. Postal Service on Tuesday, and the former president will be buried Wednesday in Grand Rapids, Mich.

"We want to be very, very respectful of that," said the Romney aide, who spoke on the condition of anonymity pending the creation of the presidential committee.

Ford's death overshadowed last week's presidential announcement by former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, who declared he would seek the Democratic nomination.

While the committee filing will be labeled "exploratory," it will declare Romney as an official presidential candidate and commit him to the same fundraising and reporting rules he will have to follow when, as is expected, he transitions to a formal presidential campaign committee.

A formal announcement is expected sometime later this year, although Romney is planning a major fundraising event in Boston on Jan. 8 to propel his candidacy.

Romney aides believe the governor, the son of George Romney, a 1968 presidential candidate and the former governor of Michigan, can find a following as a youthful alternative to McCain and a more conservative candidate than Giuliani.

If successful, Romney would become the first Mormon elected president.

The 59-year-old is a former venture capitalist who made hundreds of millions of dollars at Bain Capital helping start such companies as Staples, the office-supply giant. He took over the 2002 Olympic Winter Games in Salt Lake City following a bid-rigging scandal that was an embarrassment to Utah, the United States and the International Olympic Committee.

In 2002, he returned to Massachusetts and won a four-year term as governor, his first and only stint in elective office. He unsuccessfully challenged Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., for the U.S. Senate in 1994.

At 5 p.m. Wednesday, Romney will take the "lone walk" down the 31 steps of the Massachusetts Statehouse, a ceremonial departure reserved for presidents, heads of state and departing governors. On Thursday, Democrat Deval Patrick will be sworn in, the first black governor in the state's history and only the second elected in the nation since Reconstruction.

Romney will not attend the ceremony, instead settling into his new campaign headquarters in the city's North End. Aides began moving into the building on Monday, another sign of the impending campaign.

The governor plans to base his campaign out of Massachusetts primarily for logistical reasons, rather than Michigan, his birth state and host to a key early presidential primary, or Utah, a power base in the politically important Mountain West.

Aides say the governor relishes returning to his wife, Ann, and his Belmont home after a stretch of campaign travel. Basing the campaign in Boston also allows him easy access to political consultants in Washington and financial backers in New York.

In addition, it will allow him easier access to New Hampshire, which holds the first presidential primary, and will allow him to stay either in Massachusetts or a second vacation home in the Granite State.

Spitzer Is Sworn And Begins Push On Ethics Rules (NYT)

By Danny Hakim

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

ALBANY, Jan. 1 — Eliot Spitzer ended 12 years of Republican rule here on Monday with a blunt critique of the past and a call to “end the politics of cynicism and division in our state.”

With his predecessor, George E. Pataki, gamely looking on, Governor Spitzer said in his 20-minute inaugural address that New York, “like Rip Van Winkle,” had “slept through much of the past decade.” He pledged to undertake reforms “substantial in size and historic in scope” and hinted at some of the contentious battles to come, including his plans to reshape state Medicaid and ethics policies.

DOJ_NMG_0111157

The speech was the beginning salvo in what many see as a gargantuan challenge Mr. Spitzer has set out for himself — to overhaul a state government paralyzed by gridlock and consumed by recurring scandals.

Yet Mr. Spitzer's work began hours before the speech: He signed five executive orders before 9 a.m., including directives establishing new ethical guidelines for state workers, among them a ban on accepting almost any gifts, as well as new restrictions on lobbying and the use of state resources. He also barred elected officials or candidates from appearing in advertisements paid for by state entities, a frequent practice of Mr. Pataki.

In his speech, Mr. Spitzer, 47, laid out what he said were "two overarching objectives": making the government "ethical and wise," and rebuilding the economy. He has said that addressing the struggling upstate economy would be a particular priority, but acknowledged the difficulty in reviving regions like the Buffalo area that have seen an exodus of manufacturing jobs.

The speech capped a whirlwind day in which the new governor took the official oath of office at midnight and, after sleeping about three hours, arose for a two-mile run through a chilly Albany rain. The rain stopped before the inauguration, though temperatures stayed in the 40s. After his 1 p.m. address, he revived an Albany tradition by opening the Executive Mansion to the public, and he and his wife, Silda Wall Spitzer, received 1,200 well-wishers. The inaugural speech was itself a break with tradition in that it was held outdoors, with Mr. Spitzer clad in a suit but no overcoat for the hourlong ceremony.

The change of leadership seemed to electrify a capital that has had Mr. Pataki as its governor for the last 12 years. Democrats were elated at the prospect of being at the seat of power for the first time since Mario M. Cuomo was voted out of office in 1994, while Republicans feared that Mr. Spitzer's ascension could weaken their already tenuous hold on the State Senate, their only redoubt of power. Lobbyists, gathering for the legislative session that begins this week, worried about how the new power structure would affect their work.

Hovering over the inauguration was the fallout from the ethical scandals that have enveloped Albany. Only three of the four statewide officials elected in November took their oaths, because the comptroller, Alan G. Hevesi, resigned late last month and pleaded guilty to a felony after admitting to using state workers to chauffeur and act as companions for his ailing wife.

One of Mr. Spitzer's executive orders, prohibiting the use of state property, including vehicles, computers and telephones, for nonofficial business, seemed aimed at curbing such behavior. The order said that individuals authorized by their agency to use a vehicle for personal purposes "shall keep records of such use, and the value of such personal use shall be calculated and reported as personal income."

In his address, Mr. Spitzer said, "Over the last decade, we have seen what can happen when our government stands still in the face of great challenge."

"Today is the day when all of that changes," he added.

His pointed attacks on Albany's problems ruffled some Republican feathers.

Asked about the Rip Van Winkle line specifically, the Senate majority leader, Joseph L. Bruno, now the state's top Republican, said, "I don't agree with that."

"I think history will judge the last 12 years, with this governor that's exiting, to have been one of the most productive 12 years for the people of New York State," he said. "And history will judge that — not rhetoric."

Mr. Bruno and Assembly Speaker Sheldon Silver, a Democrat, have essentially been running the state with Mr. Pataki for the last decade. Mr. Silver, for his part, said he took no offense, adding, "I think it was very clear that his references were to the prior administration."

The new governor began the new year at the Executive Mansion, where he was sworn in at midnight by Judge Robert W. Sweet of Federal District Court in Manhattan. Mr. Spitzer was once a clerk for Judge Sweet, who also swore him in later at the public inauguration.

Most of the major political figures in the state were present at the afternoon ceremony, including Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg and much of the state's Congressional delegation. Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton was in Washington attending memorial services for former President Gerald R. Ford. After Mr. Spitzer's speech, Judy Collins sang "This Little Light of Mine," a song that had been used in one of Mr. Spitzer's political ads during the campaign.

Further symbolizing the return of Democratic rule was the swearing-in of Andrew M. Cuomo as attorney general to replace Mr. Spitzer. His father, the former governor, was by his side. David A. Paterson was sworn in as lieutenant governor, the first African-American to hold the post.

The new attorney general signaled that he, too, would begin moving to confront the ethical challenges in the capital, as Mr. Cuomo planned meetings Tuesday with the Albany Country district attorney, P. David Soares, who prosecuted Mr. Hevesi, and David Grandeau, the head of the state's Lobbying Commission.

All in all, it was a day characterized by a rush of activity in a capital where Mr. Pataki had been increasingly invisible.

DOJ_NMG_0111158

In signing his executive orders, Mr. Spitzer said he was fulfilling a promise "that one of the first acts I would take as governor, officially, was to put in place a series of ethics guidelines and strictures that would begin the process of restoring government to what it should be, which is responsive, open, transparent, available to the public.

"I am hoping that others in other branches will join me in this," he added.

Mr. Spitzer prohibited nepotism in hiring and contracting, and barred former state workers from lobbying the agency or authority where they worked for two years after their departure. State employment officials were also barred from asking job candidates about their party affiliation.

Mr. Spitzer also prohibited state workers from making contributions to the campaigns of the governor or lieutenant governor, or affiliated political action committees.

He signed the orders on a desk once used by Theodore Roosevelt, in a room of the mansion known as the History Room, which also displays a wheelchair used by Franklin D. Roosevelt.

After Mr. Spitzer finished and had answered some questions, he strode out of the room, but he and his wife quickly came back after his dogs Jesse, a bichon frisé, and James, a wheaten terrier, bolted in and began barking at reporters, one of several appearances the dogs made throughout the day.

In his inaugural address, attempting to outline his political philosophy, Mr. Spitzer called for New York to "embrace a progressive vision of government once more, one that upholds the values of individuality and community; of entrepreneurship and opportunity; of responsibility and fairness."

"No one any longer believes in government as a heavy hand that can cure all our ills," he said, "but rather we see it as a lean and responsive force that can make possible the pursuit of prosperity and opportunity for all, by softening life's blows, leveling its playing field and making possible the pursuit of happiness that is our God-given right."

Inaugural Options: To Go Populist Or Plush? (WSJ)

By Christopher Cooper

The Wall Street Journal, January 2, 2007

Chevron Corp. maxed out on its permissible yearly political contributions to California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's re-election campaign with a single donation of $22,300 early in 2006.

But that didn't stop the big oil company from chipping in $50,000 to be a "Gold Sponsor" of the governor's inaugural celebration. The contribution, one of the five largest that the inaugural committee received, gives Chevron officials access to the Republican governor at two events for sponsors and an invitation-only black-tie ball.

IN SUMMARY

· The Situation: Some governors fund inaugural festivities with money raised outside campaign-finance restrictions.

· What It Means: Events are often bankrolled by the same people and groups that finance political campaigns.

· What's at Stake: Unregulated donations may increase special interests' access to and influence on elected officials.

Thirty-six states elected governors in 2006 -- victories that will be celebrated this month with parties ranging from modest to star-studded. Several will cost $1 million or more. Many inaugural events will be exclusive affairs, paid for by nonprofit committees that aren't subject to state campaign-donation limits or reporting requirements designed to contain influence on elected officials. In essence, they are parties bankrolled by private groups that often solicit donations from the same people and entities that fund the campaigns.

In California, Chevron's sponsorship comes as the Schwarzenegger administration is promulgating rules to regulate greenhouse gases and weighing an ambitious alternative-energy package -- two issues with big implications for Chevron's bottom line. But the San Ramon, Calif., company doesn't consider the inaugural gift a political contribution, a spokesman says. Indeed, such a large contribution would be illegal under California's campaign-finance laws.

In a few cases, such unregulated fund-raising has caused headaches for new governors, many of whom were elected on reform or populist platforms. In Florida, governor-elect Charlie Crist, a Republican, canceled plans for a donors' ball when he was cited in the media for his no-limits donations drive. "A glitzy black-tie gig didn't sound right to me," Mr. Crist says. With state residents facing an insurance crisis and spiraling property-tax increases, he says, scaling back "is the right thing to do."

Mr. Crist, who initially received several large donations for his inaugural, including $100,000 from a longtime friend, returned much of that money and imposed a $10,000 limit on contributions -- still a hefty sum beyond the means of most private citizens. But even that didn't stop one Florida corporation from skirting at least the intent of Mr. Crist's directive. Closely held U.S. Sugar Corp., which had $40,000 of its $50,000 donation returned, re-topped the inaugural kitty by contributing $20,000 more through a pair of wholly owned subsidiaries. A spokeswoman for Mr. Crist says the extra donations were permitted because such contributions would be allowed under Florida's campaign-finance law.

Mr. Crist says donors shouldn't expect anything special from him. "A thank-you note and good government," he says. "They'll be disappointed if they're expecting anything else."

In Arkansas, governor-elect Mike Beebe, a Democrat, is walking a fine line between populism and exclusivity. Corporate sponsorships for inauguration festivities range between $2,000 and $25,000 -- and Mr. Beebe promises to list every sponsor in the event program. In addition, he plans a series of public events held under the banner of the state's Democratic Party, with ticket prices ranging from $25 to $100. Money left over after costs are covered will be turned over to the party.

But in Massachusetts, incoming Democratic Gov. Deval Patrick has drawn criticism for planning a sprawling inaugural celebration that includes seven statewide events culminating in a outdoor swearing-in ceremony in downtown Boston on Thursday. Financing for the event is being handled by the Patrick/Murray Inauguration Committee, which allows donations of as much as $50,000. Local newspapers and good-government organizations have faulted the governor-elect for allowing such large donations, declining to disclose contributors, and choosing fund-raisers with ties to state contracting.

Mr. Patrick has said he won't accept donations from gun makers, tobacco interests, casino operators and contractors connected to the troubled "Big Dig" tunnel project in Boston. But as the Boston Globe recently reported, much of the fund-raising for the events is being conducted by lobbyists whose clients include Big Dig contractors and others who do business with the state.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Patrick, Cindi Roy, says the governor-elect makes a distinction between those who are raising money and donors who may have business before the state, and is striving to raise at least half the money from ordinary citizens. She says Mr. Patrick intends to disclose the donors, though probably not until after the inaugural. "He has pledged to run this government in an open and transparent way, and that means the inauguration, too," Ms. Roy says.

In some states, leftover campaign funds help to pay for inauguration parties. Mr. Patrick considered but rejected that method. Campaign contributors "shouldn't be asked to fund a celebration that they should have the right to participate in," Ms. Roy says.

New York's incoming Democratic governor, Eliot Spitzer, decided that using leftover campaign money for his Jan. 1 inaugural in Albany would avoid controversy. The multievent celebration, estimated to cost about $1.5 million, included an oath-taking in Albany and an open-house at the governor's mansion but no private events.

Mr. Spitzer decided early on that raising money outside New York's campaign-finance laws was a bad idea, his spokeswoman says. "By avoiding inaugural fund-raising, we remove any perception that donations were made to curry favor with the incoming administration," spokeswoman Christine Anderson said via email. By using campaign money, "it will all be reported on our next [campaign disclosure], meaning the public/press can see every dollar spent."

During his campaign, Mr. Spitzer -- New York's former attorney general -- returned checks from 93 contributors who offered a total of $250,368. Many came from companies and individuals who have tangled with his office in the past, are under criminal investigation or are presumed to be connected to a continuing probe, state records showed.

In California, only one of Mr. Schwarzenegger's six inaugural events will be free and open to the public. While the governor isn't required to disclose inaugural sponsors, his office did so voluntarily. "Gold" and "silver" tiers include 31 individuals and companies that contributed at least $15,000 each. The administration has no plans to provide a full breakout of donations, but says it has raised at least $640,000 so far.

Spokesman Adam Mendelsohn says no sponsor should expect special consideration. "The governor makes decisions based on what's in the best interest of the people," he says.

States Swift To Warn Mortgage Lenders (WP)

By Kirstin Downey

The Washington Post, January 2, 2007

Nineteen states and the District of Columbia have moved quickly to warn state-regulated lenders about the hazards to consumers from nontraditional mortgages.

Tens of thousands of state-licensed lenders and mortgage brokers are affected by the advisories, also known as a "guidance." Such loans include interest-only mortgages and other arrangements where the borrower cuts monthly costs by paying back less than full interest and principal.

The states are following closely behind federal banking regulators, who issued a sternly worded advisory in late September to the lenders they supervise, telling them they should not make these loans to borrowers who may be unable to repay them. Within 24 hours of the federal guidance's release, six states had issued similar warnings to their own lenders, a notable flurry of activity in a field known for its slow-moving bureaucracies.

DOJ_NMG_0111160

"They were ready for this; they wanted it," said Mike Stevens, senior vice president for regulatory affairs at the Conference of State Bank Supervisors, who said it was the fastest state-by-state regulatory rollout he had ever seen. "We had a national need to do this."

In the District, the guidance covers about 1,200 licensed mortgage brokers and lenders. It was adopted Dec. 5.

"We see a need to protect consumers who were not too savvy," said Lily Qi, a spokeswoman for the D.C. Department of Insurance, Securities and Banking. "They didn't understand what they signed when they signed on the bottom line. Some companies can be very aggressive in their marketing, and it can be misleading."

Officials in Maryland and Virginia are considering introducing the new lending guidelines.

Edward Joseph Face, Virginia's commissioner of financial institutions, said he was hopeful the state corporation commission would decide on some version of it within the next month. In Virginia, such a guidance would affect about 2,800 mortgage lenders and brokers.

"I don't think we've ever seen this many adjustable interest-only loans on the books in all of history," Face said. "I am concerned. . . . There are so many out there, and when the rates start adjusting, it's not clear that borrowers will have prepared themselves."

Nontraditional loans, also known as exotic mortgages and which were once marketed to the wealthy as a cash-management tool, have expanded to the mass market because they allow borrowers to pay only the interest on a loan, or a partial monthly payment, without paying down the principal. In 2003, just 10.6 percent of new loans tracked by First American LoanPerformance, a San Francisco-based real estate information service, were nontraditional mortgages, but during the first nine months of 2006, about 34.1 percent of all borrowers used these loans to buy or refinance homes. In the Washington area, where housing prices have skyrocketed in the past five years, about 47.7 percent of loans originated in 2006 were nontraditional, compared with 10.7 percent in 2003.

These loans became popular because they let borrowers stretch to afford homes. The concern is that some borrowers may not fully understand they face payment "resets," or upward adjustments after a set period, often three to five years.

Regulators have noted that many consumers are unaware that their payments could double or even triple when they reset. At a recent Consumer Bankers Association conference, some lenders marketing fixed-rate loans to borrowers with nontraditional mortgages said that 30 to 50 percent of the borrowers seemed unaware of the resets looming.

Many economists now say the surge in these loans contributed to the real estate boom of the last few years. Regions that had the highest rates of nontraditional lending were also those areas where housing prices rose most quickly.

Regulators and consumer activists also say these loans increase the risk of foreclosure, particularly if monthly payments jump at a time when home prices are stagnant, making it more difficult to sell homes or refinance into other loans.

The Conference of State Bank Supervisors put out a model set of guidelines based on the federal guidance. It spells out that lenders must take into account whether borrowers will be able to afford to pay when the loans reset and must explain the loans more explicitly.

The warnings vary by state, as does the universe of mortgage lenders covered by each state. Some state regulators have proposed the guidance but are awaiting final approval. The federal guidance covers institutions that have federal deposit insurance; these state warnings will encompass lenders who do not also accept deposits. In Kentucky, the guidance covers about 525 enterprises, including mortgage brokers and lenders; in Indiana, it covers 350 licensed second-mortgage brokers; in Connecticut, it covers more than 3,800 licensed mortgage companies; in Iowa, it covers 342 state-chartered banks, 110 loan companies and 737 mortgage brokers or lenders.

Many federally supervised lenders opposed the federal government's decision to issue a guidance on nontraditional lending, saying that they thought it was overly prescriptive and that restrictions might block consumers from receiving loans. They also expressed concerns that they would be subject to federal restrictions while state-regulated lenders would be unaffected.

"The idea is to get as much consistency as possible out there for all the players," said Mark Tarpey, division supervisor for consumer credit for the Indiana Department of Financial Institutions.

Charity Pledges Smash All US Records (FT)

By Rebecca Knight In Boston

Financial Times, January 2, 2007

Warren Buffett's historic $31bn (€23.5bn) donation to the Gates Foundation made 2006 a banner year for US charitable giving, smashing previous records by a huge margin.

According to figures from the Chronicle of Philanthropy, the top 15 charitable gifts and pledges in the US weighed in at $35bn. By contrast, the largest 15 gifts of 2005 and 2004 totalled $2bn and $4.4bn respectively, according to the Chronicle, which has compiled an annual list of the largest announced gifts and pledges by individuals since 1997.

DOJ_NMG_0111161

Mr Buffett accounted for the overwhelming bulk of that sum with his $31bn pledge to the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation. Mr Buffett's gift – which will help the foundation pursue its goal of curing the world's 20 leading fatal diseases – is the biggest charitable donation in history.

But even without Mr Buffett's largesse, it was an exceptional year for philanthropy with a record number of gifts of more than $100m. This year there were 14 gifts of $100m or more. In 1998 – the year that came closest to that number – there were 12, and last year, 10 donations of that size were made. "It's not just the Bill Gates and the Warren Buffetts of the world who are giving; it's a lot of different people," said Stacy Palmer, Chronicle editor.

People who made money in real estate and financial services dominate this year's list. The second and third largest gifts were by donors who profited from the sale of Golden West Financial Corporation to the Wachovia Corporation.

Herbert and Marion Sandler, co-chief executive officers of Golden West Financial Corporation, gave $1.3bn to their family foundation, which supports basic science research at the University of San Francisco. Bernard Osher, co-founder of Golden West Financial Corporation, gave $723.2m to his eponymous foundation that awards scholarships and grants to students in California's San Francisco and Alameda Counties and the State of Maine.

Fourth on the list was Jim Joseph, a California real estate developer, who left a $500m bequest to his foundation that provides educational programmes for Jewish youth; and fifth was David Rockefeller, retired chairman of Chase Manhattan Bank, who gave $225m to the foundation he and his brothers formed.

Nine of the biggest gifts this year went to foundations.

Four of the largest went to universities. Philip Knight, chairman of Nike, pledged $105m to his alma mater, Stanford University Graduate School of Business, for a new management centre campus and Ronald Stanton, chairman of Transammonia, pledged $100m to Yeshiva University in New York.

As a Jewish woman, Alexandra Ovsyannikova faced daily hurdles and prejudice in her native Uzbekistan. In 1999, she was granted refugee status and came to America to join her daughter. After the minimum five-year waiting period, Ms. Ovsyannikova applied to become a citizen. She passed her test and was told she would be mailed an invitation to take the oath of citizenship. Months passed, but no letter came.

Ms. Ovsyannikova wrote to several New York City and state representatives. "I am such a small person," she said through a translator, pulling out a chubby stack of envelopes, "but they wrote letters [back] to me!" She also filed a lawsuit to speed up the process.

Ms. Ovsyannikova is an older woman with numerous health problems. She depends on Social Security to get by. While she waited for months, her benefits expired and she fell behind on her bills and rent. Study: New Drug May Help Reduce HIV (LAT)

By James Ricci

The Los Angeles Times, January 2, 2007

2006 was destined to be the year Warren Ratcliffe lost his desperate race to survive AIDS, and the year Mark McClelland appeared, finally, poised to win his.

The two Bay Area men were among an estimated 40,000 Americans whose illness could not be controlled by modern HIV drugs because they'd developed a bedeviling resistance to them. Known as "salvage therapy" patients, they had only one hope: that a complicated and ever-changing witch's brew of existing medications, aimed at stalling the famously mutational virus, would keep them alive long enough for entirely new drugs to arrive via the pharmaceutical research pipeline.

DOJ_NMG_0111162

In 2006 just such a drug — one that some researchers are calling "truly phenomenal" — did come along, in time, doctors hope, to save the 45-year-old McClelland but too late for Ratcliffe, who was overtaken by AIDS-related cancer and died April 27 at age 58.

The new drug, called an integrase inhibitor, was a highlight of the summer's annual international AIDS conference in Toronto. Newly published clinical studies showed that it, in combination with two existing drugs, reduced the virus to undetectable levels in nearly 100% of HIV patients taking a regimen for the first time.

It had a similar effect on the virus in up to 72% of salvage therapy patients.

"They tested it on some people who were in deep, deep salvage therapy, and even those people did remarkably well," said Dr. Steven Deeks, a UC-San Francisco salvage therapy authority who treated Ratcliffe and still treats McClelland. "It seems to be a truly phenomenal drug that everyone is sort of a little bit in awe of right now and is changing the whole way we think about the management of these patients."

The drug essentially prevents the virus from integrating its DNA with that of a host's cells, thus short-circuiting its ability to replicate itself.

Mark McClelland had several friends in salvage therapy who were part of the integrase inhibitor studies. "They all did extremely well," he said.

The knowledge of how they fared was immensely encouraging to him. And his own recent negative experience propelled him in the same direction. In October, he came down with a fungal infection that took advantage of his lowered immune defenses. "It was semi-serious but treatable," he said. "Getting sick hit me emotionally, however. I was just coasting along, and it was an opportunistic infection, and I hadn't had one of those in 11 years, and that was tough and gave me some renewed determination."

What was more, McClelland's count of infection fighting T-cells, a principal indicator of immune system compromise, hit zero. "It wasn't too different from four, which I've hit before, but there's something about hitting zero that was a little upsetting."

Warren Ratcliffe could not be included in the clinical studies of the integrase inhibitor. Kaposi's sarcoma, the early AIDS epidemic's portentous and deadly calling card was overwhelming him. "Warren really couldn't qualify for the drug because his Kaposi's was progressing, and because he had pretty significant side effects from the chemotherapy," Deeks said. "Mark is doing well, however, and I'm trying to get him on the integrase inhibitor right now. We're trying to get as many people in our research cohort as possible on this."

The new drug is on track for FDA approval by mid-2007, but its manufacturer, Merck & Co., is making it available sooner to patients in desperate straits.

Ratcliffe and McClelland were featured last January in a Times article about their unlucky subgroup and the obscure corner of AIDS treatment it occupies.

Like most others in their category, they had the misfortune of being diagnosed with HIV when single-drug treatment, called monotherapy, was the only help available. With monotherapy, the virus had to mutate past only one drug, which made a patient resistant to that medication and all others of its type.

Multi-drug therapy, which became available a decade ago, usually presents HIV with too many obstacles for it to mutate past. It became the gold standard of treatment, suppressing the virus and allowing patients to live normal lives.

The multi-drug "cocktail" failed to work for monotherapy veterans like Ratcliffe and McClelland because in them, the virus had already become resistant to one of its components and was more likely to resist other drugs in the mix, as well.

Ratcliffe's deterioration and death having come just as a potentially saving drug was becoming available has inflicted an added measure of pain on Alex Kazan, his domestic partner of 10 years and friend of 25. "Watching him go was pretty difficult, because he was such a wonderful, caring person," Kazan said. "You wonder why he couldn't have been spared. I thought I'd grow old with him, but he just didn't hit the right part of the wave, I guess."

Suffering from effects of the disease and the toxicity of the pharmacist's catalog of medications he took over the years was a constant theme in Ratcliffe's life. It, too, had a special poignancy for the 55-year-old Kazan, himself a veteran of monotherapy, albeit one whom multi-drug therapy has kept in good heath.

"I guess there was always a little bit of guilt that I was doing better than he was," he said. "But he was always excited about me doing better. He probably wouldn't have gone through all the heroics, in terms of all the therapies, if it wasn't for me. He took care of me. He fought so hard and rarely complained."

In late March, his once-fit body reduced to boniness by chemotherapy, Ratcliff admitted himself to a hospital because of a persistent, intense headache. Over the next month, infections appeared in his brain and, knowing the end was near, he decided to die at home.

"They thought he'd make it another eight or nine weeks, but he made it only five days," Kazan recalled.

DOJ_NMG_0111163

At a memorial service held July 15, the day before Ratcliffe would have turned 59, the 150 people in attendance heard the Mississippi native and Navy veteran of the Vietnam War memorialized as a homebody, a perfectionist, an expert cook and gardener, a man who looked after elderly friends, remained close to his four siblings and was especially kind to children.

"Before he died, he sat down his goddaughter, and other kids he knew, and told them that after he was gone, they had to go on living," Kazan said. "And he sat me down, too, and said that I had to go on. I'm not sure I have. Not yet."

It is in the hope of preventing further such loss that Deeks and other researchers have such profound interest in the new AIDS drug, especially in combination with other new drugs they hope to have available by the end of this year.

His recent infection convinced McClelland that he has to begin taking the new integrase inhibitor — probably in combination with two other new drugs — sooner rather than later, probably beginning in February. He's had promising medicine regimes before, and all of them ended up disappointments, "but this seems to be so much better than anything that's come before," he said.

"It could be the Holy Grail or just give me the next five years, which would be fine with me."

For surviving salvage therapy patients like McClelland, Deeks said, "2007 may change everything. We're shooting for lifelong undetectable viral loads, and once we achieve that, the immune system rebuilds itself. That's what we're shooting for with Mark, and everyone like him."

Fairness For Lewinsky (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, January 2, 2007

In the various books I've read about the Bill Clinton impeachment scandal -- a scandal because of what was done and a scandal because the president was impeached for it -- the same story is told over and over again. When the prosecutors or lawyers or whoever finally got to meet the storied Monica Lewinsky, they were floored by her. She was smart, personable and -- as the record makes clear -- dignified. This is more than can be said about some of the people who write about her.

I will not name names. But in recent days, Lewinsky has been back in the news. In December she graduated with a master's degree in social psychology from the London School of Economics. Her thesis was titled "In Search of the Impartial Juror: An Exploration of the Third Person Effect and Pre-Trial Publicity." Her thesis might well have been called "In Search of the Impartial Journalist," because she was immediately the subject of more poke-in-the-ribs stories about you know what. The Post, a better paper than it was that day, called her "dumb-but-smart." It was more than could be said for that piece.

It does not take a Freudian to appreciate why Lewinsky chose the topic she did. She is a victim of publicity, and her life has been a trial -- enough to floor almost anyone. But in Lewinsky's case, she took a bad situation and made something good of it. That hardly makes her "dumb-but-smart," but rather once young -- and now older and incomparably wiser. An approximation of this befalls us all, but before we got to become wise and prudent in all things we were probably irresponsible, outrageous and wild -- in other words, young.

Fortunately for me -- and probably this applies to you as well -- my outrageous deeds are known to only a few, and some of those people, after a lifetime of bad marriages and poor investments, have probably forgotten them. In Lewinsky's case, her youthful indiscretion has been forgotten by no one. On the contrary, it's recorded for the ages, in House and Senate proceedings, in the files of the creepy special prosecutor, in the databases of newspapers, in presidential histories and the musty joke files of second-rate comics.

She is a branded woman, not an adulterer but something even worse -- a girl toy, a trivial thing, a punch line. Yet she did what so many women at that age would do. She seduced (or so she thought) an older man. She fantasized that he would leave his wife for her. Here was her crime: She was a girl besotted. It happens even to Republicans.

But she is now a woman with a master's degree from a prestigious school and is going to be 34 come July. Her clock ticks, her life ebbs. Where is the man for her? Where is the guy brave enough, strong enough, admirable enough to take her as his wife, to suffer the slings and arrows of her outrageous fortune -- to say to the world (for it would be the entire world) that he loves this woman who will always be an asterisk in American history. I hope there is such a guy out there. It would be nice. It would be fair.

It would be nice, too, and fair, also, if Lewinsky were treated by the media as it would treat a man. What's astounding is the level of sexism applied to her, as if the wave of the women's movement broke over a new generation of journalists and not a drop fell on any of them. Where, pray tell, is the man who is remembered just for sex? Where is the guy who is the constant joke for something he did in his sexually wanton youth? Maybe here and there some preacher, but in those cases the real subject matter is not sex but hypocrisy. Other than those, no names come to mind.

This is the year 2007, brand new and full of promise. It would be nice if my colleagues in the media would resolve to treat Monica Lewinsky as a lady, to think of her as they would themselves, to remember their own youth and the things they did and to understand that from this day forward anyone who takes a cheap shot at Lewinsky has a moral and professional obligation to look in the mirror. To proceed otherwise is to miss the joke entirely. No longer is it Monica Lewinsky. It is now the people who write about her.

Ready For Its Checkup (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 2, 2007

GOV. ARNOLD Schwarzenegger has set the bar so high in promising healthcare reform that it's tempting to suspect that he broke his leg on purpose, just for the photo-op in his hospital bed to drive home the high costs of healthcare. Upon reelection eight weeks ago, the governor vowed to cut the number of California's uninsured in half. Since then, he has refused to retrench, hinting instead at plans to cover pretty much everyone in the state.

Schwarzenegger is right in noting that the current system needs improvement. Six million Californians are uninsured. Many of them want coverage but can't get it — because they can't afford it, don't know where to find it or are ineligible for it. Everyone ends up paying for them because they seek treatment in emergency rooms, adding to the state's budget burden or to an estimated 10% "hidden tax" added to the insurance premiums of those who do have coverage.

Meanwhile, the health problems of the uninsured become everyone's in the form of communicable diseases and lost productivity. Some of the uninsured are healthy and simply choose not to spend their money on insurance. But everyone pays for their care when they get injured or fall ill.

In working through the options, Schwarzenegger would be wise to steer clear of new mandates on employers to provide health insurance for workers and their families. Voluntary employer-provided insurance is the most successful current way to distribute healthcare. But employer mandates would fail to reach many of the targeted uninsured, who are at best only marginally and transiently employed.

Other options are more intriguing. If every Californian were required to carry health insurance, either through work, the open market or (for those who need assistance) a government-subsidized program, patients would have an incentive to seek less costly preventive care. But insurance alone is not healthcare, and individual mandates can't by themselves stem costs.

Other solutions appear too utopian. A plan that provides healthcare to everyone in the state would be spectacularly costly. But so is having 6 million people without health insurance. And although it may cost more in the long run to leave illegal immigrants uninsured, insuring them would be an ambitious undertaking.

No health plan will be perfect because no health plan can simultaneously control costs, harness the power of the market and guarantee top-level treatment for everyone in the state. In the end, the cure for California's health problems probably should be found in Washington. But for the moment, the states are producing the most interesting and sweeping healthcare plans, and California can lead the way. Schwarzenegger deserves credit for taking on the issue. We hope he won't take it the wrong way when we offer this hope for the unveiling of his proposal next week in his State of the State address:

Break a leg.

Welcome, Mr. Mayor (WP)

The Washington Post, January 2, 2007

ADRIAN M. FENTY will be sworn in today as the District's fifth mayor on a wave of hope and optimism so high even his closest advisers wonder how long it can last. Much depends on whether Mr. Fenty (D) is as adept at governing as he was at campaigning. The brash young politician who won the city's unquestionable support now must make good on his promises of progress.

It is encouraging that Mr. Fenty has demonstrated sound judgment in the months since his victory in the September primary all but guaranteed his election. Foremost has been his selection of able, experienced people to the top jobs in his administration. It's to his credit that he didn't wait for his victory in the general election to announce that he would reappoint Natwar M. Gandhi as the District's chief financial officer, thus reassuring a jittery business community that a change in the city's political leadership won't mean a relapse into fiscal irresponsibility. Likewise, Mr. Fenty's artful recruitment of the very able Dan Tangherlini to serve as city administrator underscores his seriousness about improving the day-to-day performance of city agencies.

It is too soon to judge Mr. Fenty's other appointees, many of whom are interim holdovers from the administration of outgoing Mayor Anthony A. Williams (D). Mr. Fenty made a campaign promise to bring in fresh blood, but his cautious approach makes sense given the complexity of D.C. government and the big learning curve he faces. Nonetheless, Mr. Fenty would do well to make a priority of putting a permanent team in place.

After all, many bedeviling issues require action. Some projects started in the Williams administration -- from the construction of the baseball stadium to fixing the libraries to building new housing communities -- need to be completed. Costly problems such as the city's shortfall in Medicaid reimbursements have persisted too long without remedy. And far too many people who live on the margins -- from the mentally retarded to the homeless -- have been given short shrift and shouldn't have to wait any longer for government help.

Yet Mr. Fenty's biggest challenge -- the one that carries the most political peril for him and the greatest consequence for the city -- is tackling the abysmal state of the public schools. Despite some of the highest per-pupil school spending in the country, too many D.C students lack the basic skills critical for success, and too many school buildings are in awful shape. The result is a system that is being abandoned by parents who have the wherewithal to get their children into charter or private schools. Mr. Fenty is correct in his belief that the city will never truly prosper if its schools remain broken, and his resolve to do something about them should be applauded. But it's vital that he proceed carefully, mindful that even if he succeeds where his predecessor failed in a mayoral takeover of schools, reformed governance is no panacea for the educational ills of a dysfunctional system.

Mr. Fenty commissioned an outside consultant to assess what has been successful in other public school systems, and that could be a useful guide as he works with the D.C. Council on reform. Incoming council Chairman Vincent C. Gray (D) is reorganizing the committee system so education becomes the responsibility for all council members meeting as a committee of the whole. It's a welcome move that highlights education as a priority.

The best chance of winning approval for any school improvement plan is likely to come in the honeymoon days of Mr. Fenty's administration, but he must not seek a political victory at the expense of developing a plan that actually has a chance of working. Mr. Fenty, in running for office, appealed to voters' impatience for change. Now, as mayor, he'll need patience to achieve it.

West Tries A New Tack To Block Iran's Nuclear Agenda (NYT)

By Helene Cooper And Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 1 — The United States and its allies in Europe, in a tacit acknowledgment that sanctions imposed by the United Nations Security Council in late December are too weak to force Iran to abandon its nuclear ambitions, have embarked on a new strategy to increase the financial and psychological pressure.

The plan is to use the language of the resolution to help persuade foreign governments and financial institutions to cut ties with Iranian businesses, individuals in its nuclear and missile programs and, by extension, the Iranian Revolutionary Guard Corps, said Stuart Levey, under secretary of the treasury for terrorism and financial intelligence.

The Guard and its military wing are identified as a power base for President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

Under his administration, American officials said, the Guard has moved increasingly into commercial operations, earning profits and extending its influence in Iran in areas involving big government contracts — including building airports and other infrastructure, oil production and the providing of cellphones.

Bush administration officials, who asked not to be identified because they were discussing diplomatic plans, said envoys would soon head abroad to press officials of foreign governments and banks to interpret the Security Council resolution equally aggressively.

The new strategy builds on the Treasury Department's efforts over the past few months to get Western banks to scale back business with Iran or risk running afoul of American laws. In 2006, the European banks Credit Suisse First Boston and UBS said they would not do any new business with Iran.

It is hard to assess how deeply the financial actions may cut, since the most willing parties to the effort — the United States and Europe — have few business dealings with Iran. The United States does have laws that give it considerable leeway to impose financial restrictions on banks and companies doing business in Iran, while European law does not.

That said, Britain is also backing the new push, as is France, although to a lesser extent. Germany, with far more business interests in Iran, is not quite as eager. Japan is not a member of the Security Council, and the country is heavily dependent on the Persian Gulf for oil. But Japanese government officials have recently indicated their willingness to limit some of their business dealings with Iran.

Last month, the Japan Bank for International Cooperation announced that it would not issue any new loans for Iranian projects until Iran resolved the nuclear impasse with the West. In addition, Japan has reduced its stake in an initial $2 billion deal to develop Iran's largest onshore oil field at Azadegan to 10 percent from the originally agreed 75 percent, citing concern about Iran's nuclear program.

While United States officials have discussed what they are trying to do with their Russian and Chinese counterparts, the belief is that they have gone about as far as they are willing to go with the Security Council resolution that passed Dec. 23. Russia fought to keep certain entities off the list and to keep the list as narrow as possible.

Mr. Levey noted that the resolution cited three people as off limits to outside commercial transactions, and, in another section, prohibited transactions with agencies "owned or controlled" by them. The three, he said, are Maj. Gen. Yahya Rahim Safavi, commander of the Iranian Revolutionary Guard Corps; Gen. Hosein Salimi, who is in charge of the air force branch of the corps; and Ahmad Vahid Dastjerdi, who runs the Aerospace Industries Organization.

Thus, an effort to bar future foreign commercial or government involvement, including bank transactions, affecting missile programs and the Iranian Revolutionary Guard is authorized by the resolution, Mr. Levey said.

"This resolution will be a big step forward in getting governments and financial institutions to pay more attention to Iran's use of deceptive financial practices to facilitate its dangerous conduct and to stop doing business with the I.R.G.C.," Mr. Levey said, referring to the Revolutionary Guard.

The resolution says that "all states" will "take the necessary measures" to bar "financial assistance" and "financial resources or services" related to nuclear and ballistic missile programs. The resolution's appendix cites several government and private groups and 12 people as involved in those programs; interrupting foreign involvement with those groups and individuals is also part of the new campaign.

But American officials have no figures on the value of international business done with those cited in the resolution.

The United States and European officials said they had also begun trying maneuvers aimed at undermining the self-assurance of Iranian officials, especially those who travel abroad.

The recent arrests of four Iranian diplomats by American troops in Iraq, the officials said, played into that strategy. Pentagon officials said the Iranians were suspected of transferring improvised explosive devices from Iran to Iraq. Iran complained loudly that the men were diplomats and that their arrest violated accepted diplomatic rules. The diplomats, two of whom American officials said were probably members of the Revolutionary Guard, were eventually released.

But their arrests are "precisely the type of thing that will chip away at their confidence," one European official said. Most of the Western officials spoke on the condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to speak publicly about the issue.

Even before the new effort began, the slowdown in international business was already emerging as a problem for Iran, which has vast oil fields but relatively little refining capacity. It imports 43 percent of its gasoline, according to the Institute for the Analysis of Global Security, a Washington-based nonprofit group that follows energy issues.

In a rare acknowledgment of difficulty, the Iranian oil minister, Kazem Vaziri-Hamaneh, told the ministry's news agency, Shana, recently that Iran was encountering obstacles in financing oil projects. "Currently, overseas banks and financiers have decreased their cooperation," Mr. Vaziri-Hamaneh told the agency.

Iran is already seeking to secure gasoline imports from its allies, including Venezuela, and shifting some dependency from gasoline to natural gas.

"Definitely, the Iranian economy is suffering a great deal as a result of the economic punishment," said Gal Luft, the executive director of the Institute for the Analysis of Global Security. But he added that Mr. Ahmadinejad "is not just sitting on his hands and waiting."

The new strategy comes in part because few believe that the sanctions resolution that passed Dec. 23 has the muscle to sway Iran to abandon its nuclear ambitions, which it insists are focused on energy production, not weapons. The road to sanctions was a tortuous one, filled with wrangling between the United States, which pushed for tough measures, and Russia, which advocated weaker measures.

United States and European officials said they might still try to include tougher sanctions through the United Nations in the months ahead. But they say the West will need to use other measures as well.

Specifically, the United States will press France, Germany, Italy and other European countries to halt credits that encourage doing business in Iran. The German Ministry of Economics, in a credit program called Hermes, says on a Web site that Iran is among "risky markets, which are also growth markets," identified for such credits.

Iran Lays Down A Challenge To Arab Leaders (FT)

By Roula Khalaf, Middle East Editor

Financial Times, January 2, 2007

On a recent trip to Bahrain, a self-assured Manouchehr Mottaki, Iran's foreign minister, professed to have the answer to the Gulf's troubles.

Speaking to a largely Arab and western audience, he suggested Gulf stability was best achieved by removing American forces, well entrenched across the region, and setting up, with Tehran, a regional security alliance.

The call for more self-reliance in the Gulf has some appeal among ordinary Arabs, resentful of the US and frustrated by their own governments' over-dependence on American security.

DOJ_NMG_0111167

But official circles, in both the Gulf and the US, see his suggestions as a reflection of Iran's suspected ambition for regional superpower status.

"It's amusing," says one American official. "Iran is saying, 'Get rid of foreign forces and take us as the regional power.'"

The events of the past year have underlined Iran's growing influence in the Middle East and its determination to become a nuclear power. But they have also reinforced the perception of Shia Iran as the biggest strategic threat to Washington's Sunni allies in the Gulf, home to two-thirds of the world's oil reserves.

Tehran's regional strategy has been to back militant groups that confront Israel, positioning itself as a stronger defender of Arab and Palestinian rights than its Arab neighbours.

This approach worked remarkably well in the summer, when the Iranian-backed Hizbollah group in Lebanon stood its ground against a month-long Israeli offensive. Arab leaders who had criticised Hizbollah's kidnapping of two Israeli soldiers, the act that sparked the war, emerged from the conflict weakened while Iran was emboldened.

What now alarms the Sunni Arab regimes most, however, is that an American failure to rescue Iraq from sectarian conflict could shift the balance of power in the region even more in favour of Iran.

Arab leaders largely back the minority Sunni in Iraq. Iranian officials say they support the central Iraqi government, dominated by the Shia majority. But according to senior Iraqi officials, Tehran's strategy is more complex, and involves support for individual Shia groups, with the apparent aim of building separate links to Tehran.

Arab officials say Iran's resurgence should not be exaggerated: its pursuit of a nuclear programme will bring greater international isolation, and this carries economic costs that will gradually become more apparent. But the Arab Gulf states have yet to formulate a coherent or common approach to address the perceived Iranian challenge.

Reluctant to throw their lot even more decisively behind a weakened and seemingly confused America, most are also worried about a potential dialogue between Washington and Tehran, fearing it could affect their own interests.

Saudi Arabia has been holding its own bilateral talks with senior Iranian officials but people close to its government say little progress has been made on easing regional tensions.

In an unusually bold move the Arab Gulf states announced this month they would study the possible development of nuclear technology, insisting – as Iran does – that the purpose would be energy production, not atomic weapons. Seen as a message to Tehran, the announcement also raised concerns about proliferation in the region.

The US, for its part, has been seeking to underline that its commitment to the Gulf is unwavering, whatever happens in Iraq.

Washington has launched a security initiative designed to strengthen security and defence ties with the Arab Gulf states, while the US has increased its naval presence in the region.

But Washington's ultimate ambition to create a multi-lateral security system has received a cool response. Wary of each other, the Arab countries prefer to focus on deepening their bilateral defence ties with the US.

"The Gulf knows it needs to beef up its defences. But for the set-up that the US wants, which is to deal with the region as one institution, Gulf countries need to have a different relationship between each other," says one senior Arab official.

US officials acknowledge that some of the smaller Gulf states are also weighing their military relationship with the US against the risk of alienating Tehran.

The Bush administration has been particularly concerned about gas-rich Qatar, where the US maintains its largest military base in the region.

One US official says Washington has been seeking explanations from the Qatari government about recent decisions at the UN and the Arab League that have appeared more supportive of Iran's regional interests rather than those of the pro-western Arab states.

Arab regimes, meanwhile, have been pleading with Washington to press for progress on the Palestinian-Israeli conflict, hoping moves towards the creation of a viable Palestinian state will help tip the strategic balance in the region back in their favour.

Some Iraqi officials argue that the Arab states' best strategy to check Iran's influence is to build bridges with Iraq's Shia majority.

"The Shia in Iraq are Arabs [not Persians] and they feel the Arabs have rejected them," says an Iraqi official. "What the Arabs should do is embrace the Shia government of Iraq and try to make it a counterbalance to Iran."

Officials in Baghdad say this message, regularly relayed to Arab rulers, is only now starting to sink in.

US Unit Works Quietly To Counter Iran's Sway (BOS)

Backs dissidents, nearby nations

WASHINGTON -- For nearly a year, a select group of US officials has been quietly coordinating actions to counter the looming threat of a nuclear-armed Iran, including increasing the military capabilities of Arab allies such as Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates, and Bahrain.

The group, known as the Iran Syria Policy and Operations Group, or ISOG, is also coordinating a host of other actions, which include covert assistance to Iranian dissidents and building international outrage toward Iran by publicizing its alleged role in a 1994 terrorist attack in Argentina, according to interviews with half a dozen White House, Pentagon, and State Department officials who are involved in the group's work.

Pentagon officials involved with the group intend to ask Congress as early as February to increase funding for transfers of military hardware to allies in the Persian Gulf and to accelerate plans for joint military activities. The request, which is still being formulated, is expected to include but not be limited to more advanced-missile defense systems and early-warning radar to detect and prevent Iranian missile strikes.

"There is the perception in the Gulf that Iran is really on the rise," said Emile El-Hokayem, research fellow at the Stimpson Center, a Washington-based think tank. "Washington wants to prepare for a potential show down."

The existence of ISOG reflects an intensification of the Bush administration's planning on Iran. Syria, which has linked itself to Iran through military pacts, is a lesser focus for the group. Its workings have been so secretive that several officials in the State Department's Near Eastern Affairs bureau said they were unaware it existed.

The United States has repeatedly said its policy is not to overthrow the Iranian regime, but one former US official who attended a meeting during ISOG's initial phase eight months ago said in an interview that he got the impression that regime change was a key goal of many of the meetings' participants.

He said that some of the intelligence reports ordered by members of the group were so highly classified that they were accessible to less than a dozen people in the US government, suggesting that some of the group's activities were far from routine.

But interviews with half a dozen current White House, Pentagon, and State Department officials indicated that ISOG's aims are more modest. Several said that as much as they would like to see the regimes in Tehran and Damascus go, ongoing military activities in Iraq and Afghanistan have limited their range of options. The main goal now, they said, is Cold War style "containment" of Iran in the hopes that Iranians one day will opt to change their own government.

The officials, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to speak about the topic to the press, described ISOG as an inter agency clearinghouse for ideas and strategies to roll back the influence of Iran. Senior officials of the State Department, White House, CIA, Treasury Department, and other agencies meet weekly to report their day-to-day operations.

"It's really more operational, to provide a forum for ongoing interagency group discussions on Iran and Syria, share ideas, and follow things up week after week," said Kate Starr , a National Security Council spokeswoman.

ISOG's work, which focuses on isolating and containing Iran, is consistent with the administration's refusal to reach out diplomatically to Iran and Syria, as the Iraq Study Group has recommended.

"Iran is the key to everything at the strategic level -- the biggest problem we have faced in a long time," said a senior State Department official involved in ISOG, citing Iran's negative impact on Lebanon, Israel, Iraq, Afghanistan, Israel, and the Palestinian territories. "These are all things they are doing because they sense weakness [on the part of the United States]. The best thing for us to project is strength, not 'please talk to us.' "

ISOG was modeled after the Iraq Policy and Operations Group, set up in 2004 to shepherd information and coordinate US action in Iraq. ISOG has raised eyebrows within the State Department for hiring BearingPoint -- the same Washington-based private contracting firm used by the Iraq group -- to handle its administrative work, rather than State Department employees.

Some lower level State Department officials saw the decision to outsource responsibility for scheduling meetings, record keeping, and distributing reports as an effort to circumvent the normal diplomatic machinery and provide extra secrecy for the group.

But State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said BearingPoint was hired for its experience and good work on Iraq. He said that about a dozen BearingPoint contractors work out of the Iraq Policy and Operations Group office on the sixth floor of the State Department, and that a few of them have begun working on the Iran and Syria group.

ISOG is led by a steering committee with two leading hawks on Middle East policy as chairmen: James F. Jeffrey, prinicipal deputy assistant secretary of state for Near Eastern Affairs, who once headed Iraq policy, and Elliott Abrams, deputy national security adviser for "Global Democracy Strategy." Michael Doran, a Middle East specialist at the White House, steps in when Abrams is away. Elizabeth Cheney, the vice president's daughter, who was the former deputy assistant secretary of state for Near Eastern Affairs, served as cochairwoman before she took a maternity leave earlier this year.

ISOG is made of five main "pillars," or working groups. The military group explores ways to bolster Arab defenses and create more military cooperation between the Persian Gulf states. The initiative was set into motion in May , when John Hillen, assistant secretary of state for political and military affairs, traveled to the region on his first of a series of trips to the Gulf.

In October, Hillen and Assistant Secretary of Defense Peter W. Rodman, along with National Security Council staff and others, traveled to Oman, the United Arab Emirates, and Bahrain to discuss ways to beef up the military capabilities of those countries.

US officials also conducted the first naval training exercises in the Persian Gulf designed to intercept weapons shipments to and from Iran, with participation from Bahrain, Qatar, and the United Arab Emirates.

A second working group deals with "democracy outreach," focusing on the State Department's effort to provide secret financial assistance to dissidents and reformist organizations inside Iran and Syria. It also seeks ways to use scientific exchanges and human rights conferences to learn more about what is happening inside Iran, officials said.

US financing of pro democracy activities in Iran is expected to double in 2008, according to the senior State Department official. In 2006, $85 million was allocated for such programs.

A third working group focuses on finances and the Treasury Department's efforts to beef up bilateral restrictions on money transfers to and from Iranian banks. A fourth group focuses on Iran's "special relationships" with Iraq, Lebanon, Afghanistan, and terrorist organizations. That group has closely followed Iran's alleged role in a 1994 bombing of a Jewish center in Argentina.

A fifth working group coordinates media outreach to the people of Iran, Syria, and the region.

Iran: A Brewing Battle Of Heavyweights In Tehran (NSWK)

By Maziar Bahari

Newsweek, January 2, 2007

Jan. 8, 2006 issue - Iranians are deserting the president they elected by a landslide in June 2005. Not only did university students heckle Mahmoud Ahmadinejad with chants of "Death to the dictator!" during a speech last month in Tehran, state-run TV had the temerity to report it. Some of his own supporters criticized his recent international gathering of Holocaust revisionists as harmful to Iran's national interests. And thanks to his economic flubs, Iranians are grumbling about inflation instead of reveling in an oil-boom windfall. Iranian TV reported that news, too, and when Ahmadinejad complained about the story, the network's director (a former ally) replied: "We just tell the truth." The legislature has stopped rubber-stamping the 50-year-old president's decisions, and the latest local elections cost him all but two of his allies on Tehran's 15-seat city council. The big winner: his pothole-filling, street-cleaning successor as mayor of Tehran, Mohammad Bagher Ghalibaf, 45.

Iran's next presidential vote isn't due until 2009, but Ghalibaf is already casting a shadow on Ahmadinejad's future. The main difference between the two rivals is not so much substance as style. Both men are religious conservatives with almost identical political agendas and economic programs—and both of them voice a deep mistrust of America. But where Ahmadinejad is confrontational and "showboaty," Ghalibaf is a pragmatist with a reputation for getting things done. The president spent much of his previous career as a junior bureaucrat, while the mayor's résumé lists one overachievement after another. The son of a truck driver, Ghalibaf became a Revolutionary Guards commander at 22. He earned a Ph.D. in geopolitics while training as a pilot after the Iran-Iraq War. He led the Revolutionary Guards Air Force and then the country's security forces.

As top cop he won yet more fans. In 2003 he did something virtually unheard of: he quelled a student protest without bloodshed by holding talks with student leaders and ordering his men not to use batons or guns in dispersing the crowds. He showed a rare sense of compassion in other ways, as well, OK'ing a needle-exchange program for addicts and setting up a meeting for prostitutes to discuss alternatives to their profession. He was the conservative front runner in 2005 until he reached out to moderates and lost his base. "It was interesting to see Mr. Ghalibaf become more reformist than the reformists themselves," recalls sociologist Hamidreza Jalaeipour. "In the meantime, Ahmadinejad found who were the real hard-liners and gave them a voice." For now, Ghalibaf is making sure Tehran's trash gets picked up—and doing a fine job, too—while he waits for 2009. He's not a man who makes the same mistake twice.

Palestinians Clash; Photographer Seized (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, January 2, 2007

GAZA CITY, Jan. 1 -- Violence erupted in the Gaza Strip on Monday, with warring Palestinian factions firing at each other and kidnapping rivals, and gunmen abducting a foreign news photographer.

The clashes in the Jabalya refugee camp near Gaza City broke a week-long pause in the violent confrontation between the radical Islamic group Hamas, which controls the government ministries, and the Fatah movement of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. In the past few weeks, 17 people have been killed, leading to fears of civil war.

DOJ_NMG_0111170

At least two people were wounded in the gunfire Monday, security officials said, and between three and 11 Fatah and Hamas activists were reported kidnapped.

Before sundown Monday, gunmen in Gaza City abducted a photographer with the news service Agence France-Presse, which identified him as Jaime Razuri, 50, of Peru. An AFP reporter said the photographer was returning from an assignment in Gaza and was abducted at gunpoint as he got out of his car with his driver.

Palestinian security officials said Razuri was standing at an intersection when about five masked men approached him, pushed him into a car and sped away.

Israel Begins Promised Easing Of West Bank Controls (AFP)

AFP, January 2, 2007

Israel has begun easing restrictions at checkpoints in the occupied West Bank as promised by Prime Minister Ehud Olmert at a summit with Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas last month.

An Israeli military spokesman said roadblocks were not being lifted altogether for the time being.

"These measures mainly concern an easing of severe checks at various crossing points and not, at this stage, the removal of military barriers," the spokesman said Monday.

Palestinian chief negotiator Saeb Erakat told AFP that Olmert promised Israel would begin lifting restrictions on some checkpoints Monday in a telephone call to Abbas the previous day.

But Erakat said that it was not possible to say if anything had changed yet.

"We observe what Israel does and we will judge what we will see with our eyes, not what we hear from them," he told AFP.

AFP correspondents in the West Bank said there was little movement through checkpoints due to the Islamic Eid al-Adha feast.

However, security officials and witnesses in Nablus said that it was easier to pass through controls on Monday than beforehand.

The Israeli prime minister vowed to take "immediate and concrete steps" to improve humanitarian conditions for the Palestinians after his December 23 talks with Abbas -- the two men's first meeting in six months.

Defence Minister Amir Peretz later told parliament's foreign affairs and defence committee that Israel would dismantle 59 of the 400 or so roadblocks in the West Bank in two phases -- 24 at first, and the rest later.

Palestinians travelling across the West Bank are forced daily to run the gauntlet of dozens of checkpoints erected by the Israeli army to control the movement of militants.

Looking Down The Road To Damascus (USNEWS)

By Larry Derfner

U.S. News and World Report, January 2, 2007

JERUSALEM–Could it be that Syria now offers a rare glimmer of hope amid the barren prospects for progress in the Middle East? That question, easily dismissed as wishful thinking, suddenly is a red-hot topic from Jerusalem to Washington.

The doubters have plenty of evidence on their side. A hard-line nationalist police state that prides itself on defiance of the United States and Israel, Syria helps America's enemies in Iraq, as well as Israel's enemies in Lebanon, the West Bank, and Gaza–and allies itself with the West's nemesis, Iran, its neighbor to the east. Yet in recent weeks, Syrian President Bashar Assad has been peppering the international media with expressions of eagerness to talk peace with Israel. "Make an attempt. Call our bluff," he challenged Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert in a recent interview with the Italian daily La Repubblica.

Does he mean it? A succession of American politicians–Democratic Sens. John Kerry, Christopher Dodd, and Bill Nelson, as well as Republican Arlen Specter–have come away from recent meetings with Assad at least intrigued. Besides that, the bipartisan Iraq Study Group urged the Bush administration to try diplomatic means to persuade Syria to stop supporting Sunni insurgents in Iraq. None of this, however, appeals to President Bush, who considers Syria an auxiliary member of the "axis of evil." Or to Olmert, who insists that Assad validate any change of heart by first cutting off Iran and the terrorist groups like Hezbollah and Hamas.

Linchpin. The general assumption in Israel is that Olmert may be simply taking his cue from Bush. But that may not wash with many Israelis. Just as political pressure is building in Washington to force Bush to make an opening to Syria, political and military players in Israel are trying to do the same thing to Olmert. While the American sentiment grows out of Iraq-war frustration, Israeli sentiment is driven by the general bleakness of peace prospects in the region. The push for talks with Assad is coming from Olmert's main coalition partner, the Labor Party; the dovish Meretz party; the media; and, most critically, influential members of the military-intelligence establishment.

The idea is to flip Syria from being the linchpin that connects the Iran-terrorist axis to being a wedge that divides and isolates its component parts. The hope is that peace with Israel will bring Syria to break ties with Iran, stop being the middleman for Iranian arms transfers to Hezbollah guerrillas in Lebanon, and expel the leaders of Hamas and Islamic Jihad from Damascus.

History. If this all sounds too good to be true, it may well be. Assad's father, Hafez, negotiated via U.S. mediators throughout the 1990s with five consecutive Israeli prime ministers, and nothing came of it. While Bashar Assad would like some distance from Iran and wouldn't mind being delinked from the axis of evil, he's not about to enlist in the war on terrorism, says Tel Aviv University Prof. Eyal Zisser, a leading Israeli expert on Syria. "If Assad signs a peace treaty with Israel, that doesn't mean he's going to send the Iranian ambassador home the same day," says Zisser. Likewise, Assad might downgrade his relations with terrorist organizations but wouldn't end them, he says, noting: "I think these issues can be discussed in peace negotiations, but I really doubt whether anything dramatic can be achieved."

Somali Islamic Fighters Flee Toward Kenya (WP)

By Stephanie McCrummen

The Washington Post, January 2, 2007

NAIROBI, Jan. 1 -- Ethiopian forces backing Somalia's weak transitional government have taken over Kismaayo, the last stronghold of the country's Islamic movement, and on Monday were chasing the remnants of the Islamic militia along the Indian Ocean coast toward the Kenyan border about 100 miles to the south.

In the final stage of a dramatic power shift in the fragile Horn of Africa nation, the Islamic fighters abandoned their heaviest weapons early Monday morning and took off for villages in the forest, with Ethiopian and government troops in hot pursuit of key leaders, including three suspects in the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania.

"Our forces have captured Kismaayo," Somali Prime Minister Ali Mohamed Gedi told reporters in Mogadishu, where Ethiopian forces installed his secular, internationally recognized government just days ago. "The warlord era in Somalia is now over."

Gedi has given fighters loyal to the Islamic movement, which was organized under an umbrella group called the Council of Islamic Courts, three days to disarm, and promised amnesty for those who do. Government officials said that in Kismaayo, hundreds of fighters had turned over their weapons Monday and were returning to their clans.

With the most hard-core militiamen headed their way, Kenyan authorities on Monday tightened security along their border with Somalia, which extends for more than 420 miles. Many of the large number of Somali refugees in Kenya may be sympathetic to the Islamic leaders, and analysts say it would be easy for the fighters to melt into the local population.

Kenyan and Somali government officials have said that if they capture the three embassy bombing suspects, they will hand them over to the U.S. government. Meanwhile, some analysts speculated that the Kenyan government, which has pushed the Somali transitional government to include the more moderate leaders of the Islamic Courts movement, might allow those leaders to take refuge in Kenya.

On Monday, Gedi called for the quick deployment to Somalia of a peacekeeping force from the 53-country African Union. That force would in theory replace the Ethiopian troops who are guarding the vulnerable new government but are also causing tensions among Somalis who consider them invaders.

Abdikarin Farah, the Somali ambassador to Ethiopia, said that a long-standing request for U.S. military assistance was also on the table.

"We are pursuing that request, and I won't be surprised if that comes to light," said Farah, speaking from Addis Ababa, the Ethiopian capital. "We have very close coordination and are in touch with the Americans, and obviously we will continue that kind of contact."

Though Ethiopian troops have been stoned by protesters in Mogadishu in recent days, Farah said that longtime animosities between Ethiopia and Somalia are "history" now.

Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi has said that he will not withdraw troops until he has ferreted out certain Islamic leaders. Farah said that the government would not ask the Ethiopians to leave until the security situation in the country improves.

"The next step is the difficult one and the long one," he said. "To build the country, and to go forward."

Gedi, the prime minister, continued to meet with clan and religious leaders in the battle-scarred capital of Mogadishu on Monday, as he attempts to establish a viable government in a country of warring clans and sub-clans that has been without any central authority for more than 15 years.

The transitional government was cobbled together more than two years ago in a series of negotiations in Kenya. Regional diplomats contend that even more than the government's leaders, its institutions and structure, designed to include Somalia's complex clan interests, represent the best hope for establishing a viable central government in the country.

DOJ_NMG_0111172

The Council of Islamic Courts, which began as a group of local clerics, had come to power in June even as the transitional government was taking hold, and a power struggle ensued.

Ordinary Somalis, who tend to be moderate in their religious views, generally embraced the Islamic movement, following years of thuggish rule by warlords who set up roadblocks, extorted bribes and generally terrorized the population.

But Meles, the Ethiopian prime minister, was uncomfortable with the prospect of an unfriendly government on his border and backed the transitional government. According to the United Nations, Ethiopia had thousands of troops inside Somalia for months before the recent offensive, protecting the nascent government. The government has denied the claim.

In a resolution authorizing military action, the Ethiopian government accused the Islamic movement of supporting ethnic Somali secessionist groups inside Ethiopia, a charge the movement denied.

Both Ethiopia and the United States accused the Islamic leaders of close collaboration with al-Qaeda, a claim that many regional analysts said was exaggerated. For their part, the Islamic leaders had declared holy war on Ethiopian troops.

During the exchange of rhetoric, the Islamic movement managed to get the capital's main airport and port running after years of closure by clan fighting, and established efficient systems of administration that must now be replaced by the transitional government.

In Kismaayo on Monday, the vast challenges were immediately evident, as the port city drifted into the sort of chaos that has long defined Somalia. Local clan militias snatched up weapons left behind by the Islamic fighters and went on a looting spree.

Meanwhile, Somalia's ports and airports remained closed on Monday, and the price of food and other necessities of daily life began to skyrocket. In Mogadishu, some businessmen were growing impatient.

"There are no commercial flights, no commercial vessels can come in," said one Somali businessman who did not want to be identified because of the precarious political situation. "People are asking why don't they open the ports. The food prices are going high."

After 15 Years, Someone's In Charge In Somalia, If Barely (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia, Jan. 1 — After Somalia's Islamist forces abandoned their final outpost on Monday, the transitional government moved aggressively to assert control, setting a three-day deadline for all weapons to be turned in and calling for international peacekeeping troops to be sent immediately.

Somalia was already a place where military-grade weaponry was casually flaunted on its streets, but the Islamists' swift collapse has created such a surplus of guns that the average price of a Kalashnikov assault rifle, one of the world's most popular killing machines, has dropped to $15.

Ali Mohammed Gedi, the former veterinarian who is the transitional prime minister, said at his daily news conference that he would not tolerate the situation and gave instructions for turning in the weapons.

"Individuals or groups of people who have trucks mounted with antiaircraft guns, known as 'technicals,' should bring those battlewagons to Mogadishu's old port," he said.

Clan leaders were skeptical about whether he would succeed, and many Somalis seemed dead set against it. "They're trying to neuter us," said Muhammad Duudo, an unemployed car mechanic. "And it's not going to happen. Just wait until the full moon passes and the darkness comes."

Whatever lies ahead, encouraging or ominous, most Somalis seemed to agree that after a week of fast-moving events, the rough outlines of a new reality were emerging. For the first time since the former dictator, Mohamed Siad Barre, fled the country in 1991, casting Somalia into 15 years of anarchy, there is a credible government based in Mogadishu, the capital, with serious outside support and no organized military threat from within.

True, countless gunmen still roam the streets, heavily armed warlords still command authority and the seeds of a possible guerrilla movement may be taking root.

But so far no major force has emerged to challenge the authority of the transitional government. The only rival, the Islamists, lost their last conventional military battle on Monday. The Islamists had steadily lost ground since Dec. 24, when Ethiopia unleashed a punishing series of airstrikes and pushed ground troops deep into Somali territory.

Ethiopian officials justified their intervention in Somalia's messy, violent internal politics by saying the Islamist movement was a regional threat with terrorist connections and ambitions to invade their country. Ethiopia commands one of the most powerful militaries in Africa, and within days of its entrance into the war, Burhakaba, a pivotal inland town, fell from Islamist control — then Jowhar, another key town, and then Mogadishu, the Islamists' former stronghold.

By Sunday, the last remnants of the Islamist forces, which just a few weeks ago controlled a large swath of Somalia, were cornered in Kismayo, a port city on the south Somali coast. Thousands of Ethiopian and transitional government troops were closing in on them, and on Sunday night, the Ethiopians began pounding away with heavy artillery.

At the same time, Kismayo clan elders were pleading with the Islamists to leave. The elders said the Islamists did not stand a chance, and they were worried that their city was about to be flattened. Clan elders in Mogadishu similarly decided last week that the Islamists were a losing cause and pulled their troops and weapons out of the movement.

As in Mogadishu, the Islamists in Kismayo, after many fiery speeches about fighting to the death, simply fled. By Monday morning, many of the Islamists' fighters in Kismayo had shed their uniforms and melted back into the population while others headed south toward a thickly forested area along the Kenyan border.

"I can't tell you how happy people were that they disappeared," said Adam Ragay, a businessman in Kismayo.

As soon as the Islamists left, looters rushed into the streets and smashed up stores and ran away with televisions and cellphones. But by midafternoon, the brief burst of anarchy was over and transitional government troops had arrived on the outskirts of town.

Residents of Kismayo said the remaining Islamists were heading toward Ras Kamboni, a small town in an isolated area on the Kenyan border that the Islamists had used before as a hide-out. Ethiopian intelligence officials say operatives of Al Qaeda, invited by the Islamists, planned the 1998 attacks on American Embassies in Kenya and Tanzania from Ras Kamboni.

Kenyan officials say they have increased border security to keep the Islamists from escaping. "Anyone who ventures to enter Kenya will have to go through a very serious vetting process," Alfred N. Mutua, a Kenyan spokesman, said in a statement on Monday.

Mr. Gedi has acknowledged that he needs a lot of outside help. Security in Mogadishu is still uncertain, with just a light presence of soldiers.

Mogadishu's ports and airport remain closed, strangling the flow of goods and sending prices for rice, sugar, oil and gasoline through the roof. The schools remain closed.

One of the Islamists' first steps after beginning their ill-fated attack on the transitional government was to close all schools to funnel more teenagers to the front. Their move backfired both militarily and politically after countless teenage soldiers were summarily mowed down by better-trained Ethiopian troops.

Abdi Sallah, a pharmacist in Mogadishu, said he thought that the new government was heading in the right direction but that it needed to step gingerly. "So, we ask all the militia to turn in their weapons and then what happens?" he said. "Do they become part of a national army or do they become unemployed? Have these guys thought all this through?"

Last Islamist Stronghold Falls In Somalia (FT)

By Andrew England

Financial Times, January 2, 2007

Somali government forces backed by Ethiopian troops entered the southern port of Kismayo on Monday and began taking control of the last major stronghold of the Islamist movement that has controlled much of southern Somalia since the summer.

The Islamists, who have fled all their frontline positions in the face of a rapid Ethiopia-led offensive, were reportedly moving south towards Somalia's border with Kenya. Despite their retreat during the last week, Islamist leaders have vowed to continue their fight, leading to concerns they may launch a guerrilla campaign that could attract foreign militants.

The Islamist movement was created out of an alliance of Islamic courts and included conservatives and militant hardliners.

Both Addis Ababa – which is believed to have received tacit US support for its offensive - and Washington accused the alliance of harbouring and including al-Qaeda terrorists, including suspects wanted in connection with the 1998 US embassy bombings in Nairobi and Dar es Salaam, as well as the 2002 attack on an Israeli-owned hotel in Kenya.

The courts denied the allegations and were welcomed by many for bringing a semblance of order to areas under its control. However, they also created resentment for their harsh interpretation of the Koran and a hardline military wing within the alliance, which was known as the Shabaab, was thought to include extremists.

It was unclear what had happened to the Shabaab militia.

A US official said Washington was encouraging the government to enter into dialogue with "all Somali parties of goodwill," including moderates within the Islamist alliance, and was pushing for the deployment of an African-led peacekeeping force.

A Ugandan military spokesman said it would be ready to deploy 1,000 peacekeeping troops within days under the aegis of the Inter-Governmental Authority on Development, an east African development organisation. But it is unclear who would finance or who else would contribute troops to any peacekeeping mission, and IGAD has formulated no firm plans for such a force.

The last such international mission to Somalia ended in humiliation. Led by the US and UN, the force finally withdrew from the country in March 1995 following bloody fighting with Somali militias.

DOJ_NMG_0111174

The US, which describes Somalia as a potential haven for terrorists, has around 1,500 troops and personnel deployed in neighbouring Djibouti as part of its war on terror. The US official said the force had not had a military role on the ground in Somalia, but added that Washington regarded it as its right to pursue al-Qaida suspects wherever they were. He said the task force would continue to monitor the region for the movement of terror suspects.

"We continue to go after those responsible for the 1998 bombings," the US official said. "If we have indications that al-Qaida suspects are leaving Somalia we will pursue them."

The courts alliance came to prominence after seizing Mogadishu from a group of US-backed warlords in June. They then increased their area of influence to much of southern Somalia, while the transitional government, weak and divided, was restricted to the central town of Baidoa.

But with vital support from Ethiopia, which deployed thousands of troops, backed by tanks and fighter jets, government forces were able to enter Mogadishu last week as the Islamist fled south.

The administration, which was unpopular among many Somalis and had been ineffective since its establishment two years ago, still faces immense challenges if it is to bring stability to a country torn apart by 15 years of rule by warlords, clan divisions and violence. The impoverished Muslim nation is awash with weapons, has a crumbling infrastructure and more than a dozen attempts to form an effective central government have failed.

If the transitional administration is to succeed, it will have to be willing to negotiate and broaden its base of support, particularly from among the Hawiye clan that has dominated Mogadishu since 1991 and provided a significant support to the courts alliance, analysts say.

Ali Mohamed Gedi, the prime minister, repeated calls for the deployment of an African Union peacekeeping force to be deployed and has said that while the Islamists leaders and foreign jihadists will be pursued, the movement's rank and file fighters would be granted amnesty if they gave themselves up.

Mr Gedi has also said warlords and clan militias should hand over their weapons, but that poses huge challenges as guns have provided clans and faction leaders with power, control and the means to run extortion rackets.

Bulgaria, Romania Join European Union (AP)

By Nevyana Hadjiyska

AP, January 2, 2007

Bulgaria and Romania — two former communist nations from one of the poorest corners of Europe — joined the European Union on Monday to bring the bloc's membership to 27 nations.

The two, which bring 30 million new members to the union, officially joined the EU at midnight to joyous fireworks celebrations that drew tens of thousands of New Year's Eve revelers to the two capitals of Sofia and Bucharest.

"This is a day of historical justice, because Bulgarians have always been Europeans in spirit and identity," Bulgarian President Georgi Parvanov told about 2,000 people who attended an elaborate membership ceremony Monday in front of the St. Sophia church.

In Bucharest, Romanian President Traian Basescu hailed the end of the difficult journey to membership that began in 1995.

"It was hard, but we arrived at the end of the road. It is the road of our future. It is the road of our joy," Basescu said.

Bulgarian officials removed customs barriers at 15 border crossing with Greece and Romania within hours of EU membership. But controls at Bulgaria's borders with Turkey, Serbia and Macedonia were strengthened in a sign of the pressure on the new members to pursue reforms needed to meet bloc standards.

In Sofia, many wore ribbons in support of five Bulgarian nurses sentenced to death in Libya on charges they intentionally infected more than 400 Libyan children with HIV, despite evidence the children were infected before the medical workers began working at the hospital.

EU Enlargement Commissioner Olli Rehn and EU parliament president Josep Borrell voiced solidarity with the nurses.

"You are not alone. The EU is with you," Rehn said in Sofia.

Bulgaria and Romania threw off communism in 1989, applied for EU membership in 1995 and began accession talks in 2000. Negotiations ended two years ago, and the European Commission declared in September that both could join.

But the two impoverished countries are still struggling to establish Western-style legal and political institutions. Under restrictions adopted by the EU, both must report every six months to show progress in reforms — or risk losing part of their economic aid.

Bulgaria mothballed two Russian-made reactors at its only nuclear plant in the waning hours Sunday, ceding to an EU request over safety.

DOJ_NMG_0111175

Despite lingering problems with corruption and judicial reforms, both countries recently have had strong economic growth. Still, salaries remain low by western European standards. In Bulgaria, the average monthly wage is $235, while the average Romanian earns about $400 monthly.

Romania And Bulgaria Celebrate Entry Into European Union (NYT)

By Dan Bilefsky

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

BRUSSELS, Jan. 1 — Romania and Bulgaria joined the European Union on Monday, helping to end geographic divisions left over from the cold war and extending the borders of the now 27-member bloc eastward to the Black Sea.

In Bucharest, Romania, President Traian Basescu said Sunday night that the entry into the European Union signaled the end of a painful 17-year process. "We arrived in Europe, welcome to Europe," he said to rapturous applause from a crowd in University Square. "This is an enormous chance for new generations."

In Sofia, the Bulgarian capital, revelers gathered in Battenberg Square. Fireworks filled the sky over the building where the Communist Party once had its headquarters. "We are home!" said a headline in the Bulgarian newspaper Trud.

Romania and Bulgaria, now the European Union's poorest members, hope that membership will help them raise their per capita wealth, which is one-third of the Union average. Their accession, the second wave of enlargement into formerly Communist Eastern Europe, will also give the Union a stable political and economic anchor in an unstable region.

Romania, with a population of about 22 million, becomes the European Union's seventh largest member. Bulgaria has a population of 7.7 million.

For Romania, which suffered one of Eastern Europe's most brutal Communist dictatorships under Nicolae Ceausescu before he was overthrown in 1989, being moored to the European Union is an important symbolic final break with a difficult past. For Bulgaria, whose history is marked by conflicts with the Ottoman Empire and Soviet occupation, European membership is also viewed as a source of economic and democratic stability.

The European Union has been experiencing expansion fatigue, though, after the bloc's enlargement in May 2004 to 25 countries from 15. With the latest additions, the Union has a population of nearly 489 million.

Some members, like France, are concerned that the addition of member nations with much lower per capita incomes, the European Union will become economically overburdened, institutionally unwieldy and ultimately unmanageable. They fear that expansion will diminish their power while paralyzing the European Union's decision-making process.

Wariness about the future shape of the Union was reflected in French and Dutch rejections of a proposed European constitution in referendums in 2005. Since then, there have been calls across the bloc for a slowing of the pace of enlargement.

Such ambivalence, stoked by fears of immigration and Europe's lackluster economic performance, has been most prominently expressed in opposition to admitting Turkey, which is Muslim. It has also cast a shadow over the admission of Romania and Bulgaria, which have been criticized for corruption that has lingered since Communist times.

Some countries, though, led by Britain, with the enthusiastic backing of the United States, have supported further expansion because the promise of membership has helped accelerate economic and political change in Europe, ranging from the arrest of war criminals in Croatia to the liberalization of Turkey's banking industry.

The cautious approach to further expansion was reflected in the tough conditions imposed on Romania and Bulgaria for entry.

Even now that they are in the Union, the two countries will be subject to unprecedented safeguards devised to keep them from backtracking. They include the power by the European Commission, the union's executive, to suspend some of the rights that come with membership, like generous economic aid.

The commission has also threatened to suspend recognition of arrest warrants and decisions made by Bulgarian courts if the country does not improve its judicial system.

Romania expects to receive as much as $ 2.2 billion in the first year after entry, while Bulgaria would be entitled to $873 million.

The European Union has been grappling with fears that westward migration from its poorer members in the east risks undermining the bloc's social standards.

At the time of the last enlargement, in May 2004, the European Commission estimated that the number of migrants throughout the bloc would total 70,000 to 150,000 a year. But Britain alone is estimated to have received up to 600,000 in the past three years.

DOJ_NMG_0111176

Britain, Sweden and Ireland, which opened their doors to European Union newcomers in 2004, have already signaled that they are less inclined to do so now. Romanians and Bulgarians may also face obstacles in labor markets in Hungary, Slovakia and the Czech Republic, which are themselves confronting restrictions by countries further west.

At a recent meeting in Brussels, European leaders toughened their tone on enlargement but stopped short of setting new hurdles to expansion. They reaffirmed backing for the eventual membership of Turkey, Albania, Bosnia, Croatia, Macedonia, Montenegro and Serbia.

Eta Crackdown Urged On Zapatero (FT)

By Mark Mulligan And Victoria Burnett

Financial Times, January 2, 2007

José Luis Rodriguez Zapatero, Spanish prime minister, was under intense pressure on Monday to crack down heavily on Eta following a car bomb attack that ended a nine-month ceasefire and wrecked his government's controversial efforts to broker peace with the Basque separatist group group.

Mariano Rajoy, head of the opposition Popular Party, called on Mr Zapatero to act with "prudence and a sense of realism".

"The response to the attack cannot be simply to suspend a process that never should have begun in the first place," he said.

The Association of Victims of Terrorism said the prime minister should "apologise to the Spanish people" for allegedly allowing Eta the opportunity to regroup.

The calls came as Spanish police on Monday scoured the rubble left by Saturday's car bomb attack on Madrid's Barajas airport. Two Ecuadorian men were missing, believed dead, after an estimated 500kg of dynamite destroyed a multi-storey car park. The deaths, if confirmed, would mark the first fatalities caused by Eta in three and a half years.

Mr Zapatero's critics seized on the government's complete surprise at the bombing as evidence of his naivety in dealing with Eta. Less than 24 hours before the bombing, the prime minister voiced optimism about the peace process he launched in June.

The government held secret talks in December with Eta leaders and came away confident that the ceasefire would hold.

"Eta knew how to play with what can only be described as an unfathomably stupid government," Carlos Martinez Gorriaran, head of a terrorist victims' support group, wrote.

Analysts predicted that the government, which suspended the peace process on Saturday, would begin a sweep against Eta operatives and sympathisers. French authorities might also step up activity against the group, which claims France's Basque-speaking regions as part of a separate homeland.

"I would expect significant arrests in the next few weeks, in an attempt to restore people's confidence in the government's willingness and ability to apply the law," said Charles Powell, history professor at the San Pablo CEU university in Madrid.

Mr Zapatero also needs to mend fences with France, where security officials have insisted Eta remained active despite the ceasefire. Eta members stole the van used in Saturday's bombing in southern France and in October carried off a heist of 350 firearms there.

Analysts believe Mr Zapatero is unlikely to declare the peace process over as this would represent a victory for his right-wing opponents. Instead the prime minister may now invoke the ups and downs of the Northern Ireland peace process as a precedent for keeping negotiations alive.

But analysts said it was unlikely Eta and its outlawed political wing, Batasuna, could offer the kind of guarantees needed to justify resuming talks.

Belarus Caves In To Assure Gas Supply (FT)

By Arkady Ostrovsky

Financial Times, January 2, 2007

Gazprom, the Russian gas company, struck a five-year deal to supply gas to Belarus just minutes before a New Year deadline, narrowly avoiding a gas price war that threatened to disrupt supplies to Europe.

The agreement, signed at two minutes to midnight on New Year's eve, just as Vladimir Putin, Russia's president, made his New Year address, averted a shut-down of gas supplies to Belarus scheduled for 10am on January 1.

The new contract doubles the price of gas for Belarus this year and gives Gazprom a 50 per cent stake in the country's pipeline network.

Under the terms of the deal, gas prices will rise steadily over the next five years bringing them in line with European countries by 2011.

DOJ_NMG_0111177

The deal will phase out a multi-billion dollar gas subsidy to Belarus, which had allowed Alexander Lukashenko, the country's authoritarian president, to subsidise living standards. Gazprom has been trying to bring gas prices to all former Soviet republics more into line with European levels.

The price increase and exemption from export duties gives Belarus more favourable terms than those offered to other former Soviet republics.

Belarus agreed to pay $100 per thousand cubic metres of gas this year compared with $46 last year, while Gazprom agreed to pay $2.5bn in cash for a 50 per cent stake in Beltrangaz, the distribution and pipeline network.

Gazprom had wanted Belarus to pay $105 for gas of which $30 would be in Beltrangaz shares. Sergei Kupiyanov of Gazprom, said the company was satisfied with the deal.

By comparison, Georgia, which has been in a state of cold-war with Russia, will this year pay $235 per 1,000 cu m of gas.

"The terms which have been fixed [with Belarus] in this agreement are the best which exist on the territory of the former Soviet Union," Alexei Miller, the chief executive of Gazprom, said.

Sergei Sidorski, Belarus's prime minister, said the doubling of the price was "very difficult, almost unbearable" for the Belarus' economy.

"The Belarussian side, in a difficult atmosphere on the eve of the new year, signed an agreement on unfortunate terms," Mr Sidorsky was quoted as saying.

Mr Lukashenko, last week said: "Belarus won't bow to Gazprom's blackmail. If they keep putting pressure on us, we will go down into the bunkers, but we will not surrender." Mr Lukashenko had pledged not to give up -control over the country's pipelines.

Gazprom had threatened to turn off supplies to Belarus on January 1, if it did not agree on a new price. The threat echoed Russia's stand-off with Ukraine which resulted in the shutting down of gas supplies to Ukraine and disruption to other European countries.

While only 20 per cent of Russian gas is exported through Belarus, several European Union member states, including Poland, Lithuania and Germany would have felt the repercussions as Belarus warned it would halt transit if Russia acted on its threat.

Under a new deal, Belarus will double the tariffs for Russia's gas transits. The agreement marks a new phase in Russia's relationship with Belarus.

The two countries have been close allies, but the Kremlin became increasingly annoyed with Mr Lukashenko's failure to deliver on promises of closer integration.

Belarus Deal Signals Russia's Growing Clout (WP)

By Steven Mufson

The Washington Post, January 2, 2007

Belarus looked headed for a cold New Year's Day until the former Soviet republic's prime minister walked into the offices of Russia's natural gas monopoly, Gazprom, just before a midnight deadline and agreed to most of Gazprom's terms for continued supplies.

"There was a tense atmosphere among the Belarusan delegation since we have agreed to and signed a contract whose conditions for the delivery of gas are not at all favorable," Belarusan Prime Minister Sergei Sidorsky said at a news conference at Gazprom's headquarters late Sunday night.

Under the agreement, Belarus will pay more than twice its current price for natural gas for its 10 million people and -- to keep from paying an even higher price -- will sell Gazprom a 50 percent interest in its gas pipeline network. The terms are similar to what Gazprom has been extracting from other neighboring former Soviet republics, such as Ukraine and Georgia. The Russian energy giant wants higher prices for its natural gas, and it is using its leverage as sole or principal supplier to get a share of other countries' domestic pipeline networks and transit lines to the West.

"[Russian President Vladimir] Putin's mission has been to regain the energy assets and export infrastructure that [former Russian President Boris] Yeltsin lost when the Soviet Union broke apart," said Michael Lelyveld, a senior analyst on Russia at PFC Energy, a Washington consulting group.

The new deal is the latest instance of Gazprom playing hardball with its neighbors. Exactly a year ago, it cut off supplies to Ukraine, which had a newly elected West-leaning government, in what was widely seen as politically inspired move. That crisis ended when Ukraine agreed to a sharp price increase, to $95 per thousand cubic meters, while the price to Belarus remained at $47. Recently, Ukraine agreed to another hefty price increase to $130, but it kept the price well below Western European levels of $230 by giving Gazprom a stake in its pipeline system.

Now that Gazprom has treated the authoritarian, pro-Moscow government of Belarus in a similar way, it lends some credibility to Gazprom's claim to have not political but commercial motives, namely the end of heavily subsidized gas prices that date to when its neighbors were all Soviet states. Belarus will now pay $100 per thousand cubic meters, with prices rising to market levels by 2011. A portion of that price will be paid in shares of the national pipeline company.

"There have been absolutely no political demands from the Kremlin, only financial ones," said Jonathan Stern, director of gas research at the Oxford Institute for Energy Studies. Stern said that though this year's gas price in Belarus will be half that paid by Georgia, the differential may be more a reflection of the bargaining power Belarus had over the transit line to the rest of Europe than a political distinction between the pro-Moscow Belarus and the pro-West Georgia. Gazprom originally sought a price of $230 per thousand cubic meters from Belarus, then demanded $105; the implied price, $2.5 billion, it will pay for the Belarusan pipeline system is also more than it originally offered.

Still, in Western Europe, Gazprom's brinkmanship has raised alarms about its power and expansionism. Western Europe is heavily dependent on Russian natural gas supplies, which account for a quarter of Europe's needs and 40 percent of its imports. That share is expected to rise over the next 15 years, according to an analysis by Deutsche Bank Securities.

About 80 percent of the Russian gas crosses Ukraine, and the rest crosses Belarus. Both price disputes threatened to cut off or curtail those supplies; Belarus threatened to siphon the gas it needs from supplies destined for other countries, and a year ago, Gazprom's two-day cutoff to Ukraine crimped supplies elsewhere. That has spurred talk about Europe's energy security and its need for supply diversification.

"All of a sudden, Russian supplies, which seemed so reliable during the Cold War, seem unreliable," said Stephen O'Sullivan, emerging-markets oil and gas analyst for Deutsche Bank. He said that is driving Europe to look at nuclear power and liquefied natural gas imports from other countries. Even though the Belarus dispute was settled before supplies were disrupted, O'Sullivan says: "It gives more momentum to a search for alternatives to Russia . . . You never know what might happen down the line."

In addition, Gazprom has been trying to use its leverage as the biggest supplier of natural gas to Europe and its control over access to oil and gas exploration prospects in Russia to acquire stakes in pipeline networks in countries such as Italy, France and Germany. But those countries have been reluctant to put their private firms under the control of a state-owned company, especially because Russia strictly limits foreign acquisitions within its borders.

"Putin has told the Europeans that Russia's strategy is only aimed at enhancing their mutual energy security, but it's really all about expanding Russian power," Lelyveld said. "The assertive tactics may frighten the Europeans, but in the near term, there's very little they can do to reduce reliance on Russia."

The new agreement with Belarus, which is set to last four years, will alleviate some of Europe's concerns about supply interruptions. "The brinkmanship aspect is significant for Europe, but now that everything seems settled -- at least for the moment -- people will relax again," Stern said. "This four-year deal means that we should not be going through this again next year."

But as long as the state-owned Gazprom controls Russia's natural gas supplies and most of the exploration prospects in Russia, and with high energy prices pumping cash into its coffers, the company will remain powerful. It controls about a quarter of global gas output and reserves.

Last month, Gazprom used that power to pry its way into Royal Dutch Shell Group's oil and gas exploration and production project on Sakhalin Island, off Russia's east coast. Threatened with delays for environmental reasons, the project got the go-ahead the day Shell and its Japanese partners agreed to halve their share in the project, delay cost recovery and sell Gazprom a controlling interest.

One area in which Gazprom has been barred from using its muscle is domestic Russian gas prices. Those prices are rising but remain far below market levels. Domestic sales account for 70 percent of Gazprom's gas volume but only 30 percent of its revenue, according to a Deutsche Bank analysis. Raising Russian prices to global levels and domestic efficiency measures could cut Russia's consumption by an amount equal to a fifth of Europe's imports, enabling Gazprom to expand its exports or decrease its reliance on Central Asian nations, such as Turkmenistan, for a portion of its supplies. But the Russian government recently said that domestic gas prices would remain subsidized for at least the next five years.

Belarus Yields To Russia (WSJ)

By Alan Cullison

The Wall Street Journal, January 2, 2007

MOSCOW -- The last-minute deal that sharply raises the price of Russian natural gas to Belarus highlights the success of a Kremlin energy policy that the West has denounced as bordering on blackmail. By showing that it is willing to cut off countries that won't accept rate increases, Russia has ended an era of cheap energy supplies to former Soviet republics.

DOJ_NMG_0111179

Russia's natural-gas monopoly and its largest company, OAO Gazprom, announced the agreement early yesterday, hours before the company said it would shut down supplies to Belarus. The agreement more than doubles the price of gas to Belarus, to $100 per 1,300 cubic yards from $47. Moscow also said it would acquire a 50% stake in the Belarus gas-transit monopoly, Beltransgaz, an asset Minsk for years has refused to surrender.

The agreement, announced as the Russian capital celebrated the New Year, also will gradually step up the price of gas for Belarus toward levels that Europe pays, near $300, in coming years. It follows months of negotiations in which officials from Moscow threatened to cut off gas to Belarus in midwinter and officials from Minsk threatened to disrupt Russian gas supplies to Europe.

Ultimately, the Belarus side flinched and agreed to pay a touch less than the $105 per 1,300 cubic yards the Russians were demanding. "The Belarussian side, in a difficult atmosphere on the eve of the new year, signed an agreement on unfortunate terms," Agence France-Presse quoted Belarus Prime Minister Sergei Sidorsky as saying.

The agreement caps a year of rate increases for states of the former Soviet Union that its neighbors and the West have called politically motivated.

Russia cut off gas to Ukraine last Jan. 1 when negotiations with Kiev failed, a move that was denounced by European countries, which saw their supplies flowing through Ukraine disrupted. Afterward, Vice President Dick Cheney accused Russia of using energy as an instrument of intimidation and blackmail. Europe started stockpiling gas as a hedge against future disruptions and exploring alternative suppliers.

Gazprom said it is just trying to put its relations with neighbors on a market-oriented footing and end subsidized energy supplies to the countries of the former Soviet Union. Though Russia was hurt by criticism of the Ukrainian cutoff, its eventual agreement with Kiev nearly doubled prices for gas last year and raised them to $130 for 2007. Moscow also has sharply raised prices for Azerbaijan, Georgia and Moldova.

"The Russians put up with a lot of damage to their reputation after Ukraine, but now they have their customers in line," said Jonathan Stern, head of gas research at the Oxford Institute for Energy Studies. "Every [customer] knows Russia will not let them off the hook easily."

Until recently, Belarus had been an exception. Led by its autocratic president, Alexander Lukashenko, Belarus for years had benefited from the comparatively inexpensive supply of natural gas, a support to its state-managed economy. It is Russia's second-largest consumer of natural gas among former Soviet states, and last year, Minsk paid $47 per 1,300 cubic yards -- roughly the price of gas for users inside Russia.

But relations between Moscow and Minsk lately have been strained: Though putative allies, each blames the other for failing to follow through on plans to unite the two countries. Moscow is ending duty-free oil shipments to Belarus, a move that is expected to cost more than $1 billion in profits to the country's refining industry. Last week, Russian officials warned that Belarus would face a shut-off of natural-gas deliveries at 10 a.m. yesterday if it didn't agree to higher natural-gas prices. Belarus, in turn, threatened to disrupt pipelines on its territory that carry more than 20% of Gazprom's exports to Europe.

Belarus had hoped European countries would panic at the prospect of another gas cutoff and put pressure on Russia to make a quick deal with Minsk, said Chris Weafer, chief strategist at Alfa Bank in Moscow. But none wanted to do any favors for Mr. Lukashenko, widely regarded as Europe's last dictator, he said. Many had stockpiled gas supplies to last for several weeks in case of a cutoff.

Belarus "played a game of chicken with Moscow, and they saw that Moscow would not blink," said Mr. Weafer.

Mr. Weafer said Belarus has managed to soften the blow of the rate increase by agreeing to sell off a portion of Beltransgaz, thus giving Belarus nominally lower gas prices than its neighbors. But he expects Gazprom to push for total control of the transportation company in coming years.

"Russia will have control of that company by the end of the decade, that's for sure," he said. "Belarus doesn't have much choice. What are they going to do? Go without gas?"

Thailand's Leader Blames Local Politics For Bombings (WSJ)

By James Hookway

The Wall Street Journal, January 2, 2007

BANGKOK, Thailand -- With Thailand's tourism industry bracing for the impact of deadly bombings in Bangkok on New Year's Eve, the country's military-installed prime minister suggested that domestic politics rather than a Muslim insurgency was behind the blasts, which killed three people and triggered panic in parts of the capital.

Prime Minister Surayud Chulanont told reporters yesterday that the synchronized blasts might have been connected to the September ouster of his predecessor, telecommunications tycoon Thaksin Shinawatra, in a bloodless coup.

"From the evidence we have gathered, there is a slim chance that it is related to the southern insurgency," Gen. Surayud told a news conference. "It is likely related to people who lost their political benefits."

The nine bombs exploded Sunday as revelers prepared to ring in the new year. Bangkok's city leaders canceled the celebrations after the first wave of bombings in the early evening. In total, police say the explosions wounded 38 people, including nine foreign tourists. Nobody has claimed responsibility.

The blasts cap a volatile 2006 in Thailand. It saw a military coup and a deepening insurgency in the Muslim-dominated south of the country, in which more than 1,900 people have been killed in the past 2½ years. If investigators conclude that Thaksin supporters planted the bombs, it could suggest continuing instability and complicate the military's promised goal of restoring democratic civilian rule. If authorities conclude that Muslim insurgents orchestrated the blasts, it would be the first time they have struck Bangkok -- marking a significant escalation.

Stock analysts, meanwhile, worried that Thai share prices, already hammered by foreign selling following the introduction of capital controls last month, would continue falling when trading resumes tomorrow. Today is a holiday in Thailand.

Mr. Thaksin's lawyer, Noppadol Patama, said Mr. Thaksin was in China and had no involvement in the bombings. "Thaksin was elected by the people, and even during the time of conflict, he has refrained from using violence," the Associated Press quoted the lawyer as saying. "It is very unlikely that a politician who was elected by the people will resort to violence."

Thai investigators said they are still trying to piece together evidence to lead them to those behind the bomb plot. The devices were relatively small, made from ammonium nitrate and used digital watches as detonators, police officials said.

The size of the bombs, as well as the coordinated manner in which they exploded, resembled recent bombings in Thailand's deep south, say security analysts -- though Muslim insurgents tend to use cellular phones to detonate bombs rather than timers, as were used in Sunday's blasts. The insurgents are trying to drive Buddhist Thais from the three mostly Muslim southern provinces, where the bloody conflict has largely played out.

The culprits in Sunday's bombings picked a vulnerable target: tourism. New Year's celebrations in downtown Bangkok are a mainstay of Thailand's tourism industry, which generates more than $12 billion a year. Normally, tens of thousands of people cram the streets to listen to bands and watch fireworks.

Gen. Surayud said Sunday's bombs were designed to create the impression that Thailand is politically unstable and that the military-installed government isn't fully in control.

Thailand's armed forces have accused Mr. Thaksin of corruption and of insulting Thailand's revered King Bhumibol Adulyadej. The coup followed months of demonstrations against Mr. Thaksin in Bangkok.

Yet Mr. Thaksin, twice elected in a landslide, remains popular in rural Thailand, where he is lauded for policies such as offering farmers low-cost loans. Over the past few months, several schools in the northeast have been torched, apparently to protest Mr. Thaksin's ouster.

In recent years, Thailand's tourism industry has been hit by the spread in Asia of severe acute respiratory syndrome and by the devastating December 2004 Indian Ocean tsunami, which wiped out or damaged many resorts.

Many travel agents said it was too soon to tell whether there would be a rash of cancellations because of the bombings. But it appears foreign tourists spending New Year in the Thai capital were largely undaunted. Yesterday, large crowds descended on some of Bangkok's main attractions, such as the Grand Palace and the Temple of Dawn.

Zapatistas Celebrate 13th Anniversary Of Uprising (NYT/AP)

Associated Press

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

OVENTIC, Mexico, Jan. 1 (AP) — Thousands of Zapatista rebels celebrated the 13th anniversary of their brief uprising against the Mexican government on Monday, dancing, singing and holding discussions on improving the status of poor Indians in the southern state of Chiapas.

The ceremonies, which attracted hundreds of foreigners from many countries, began Sunday night under the stewardship of the group's leader, Subcommander Marcos. Participants saluted the Mexican and Zapatista flags, and held a large dance in the Zapatista community of Oventic, 460 miles southeast of Mexico City.

The Zapatistas seized the main city of San Cristóbal de las Casas and other Chiapas communities in the name of socialism and Indian rights on Jan. 1, 1994. A cease-fire ended fighting between rebel and government forces after a few days, and the two sides have since maintained an uneasy truce.

Marcos, a professor-turned-guerrilla, has continued to champion a quieter social revolution from the jungles of Chiapas, issuing missives harshly critical of Mexico's politicians and government policies.

DOJ_NMG_0111181

Speaking in Tzotzil, a Mayan language spoken in Chiapas, he recalled on Sunday night how the movement was founded to end the isolation and misery of the Indians. It was the first time in many years that Marcos had attended anniversary celebrations. He was escorted by several other ski-masked members of the movement.

On last year's anniversary, Marcos began a nationwide tour in an attempt to forge a national leftist movement. But his talks and tour appearances did not draw large crowds, and he was criticized for straying from his principal cause of fighting for Indian rights after expressing support for violent antigovernment protests by unrelated groups.

Island Of Injustice (WP)

By David Vine

The Washington Post, January 2, 2007

Forty years ago, on Dec. 30, 1966, at the U.S. Embassy in London, representatives of the U.S. and British governments met, as one participant later put it, "under the cover of darkness" to sign an "exchange of notes" giving the United States the right to create what was to become a major military base on Diego Garcia, an obscure British island in the middle of the Indian Ocean. In doing so they made provision for "those administrative measures" necessary to forcibly deport the entire native population of the island and the surrounding Chagos Archipelago.

While Diego Garcia has gained some attention as a key launch pad for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, few know about the expulsion of nearly 2,000 people, called Chagossians, that was eventually carried out between 1968 and 1973 to create the base.

Despite the anonymity, the facts are not in doubt: Beginning in 1960, U.S. officials initiated secret conversations with the British government and eventually secured British agreement to provide "exclusive control" of the island "without local inhabitants." The governments finalized the deal with their Dec. 30 exchange of notes, in effect creating a treaty but circumventing congressional and parliamentary oversight. A separate secret agreement provided for $14 million in undisclosed U.S. payments to deport the Chagossians and turn Diego Garcia into a military colony.

With the financial and diplomatic details ensured, beginning in 1968, islanders leaving Chagos for vacations or medical treatment on the island of Mauritius were barred by the British from returning and thus marooned 1,200 miles from their homes. The British soon began restricting supplies for the islands, and by the turn of the decade, more Chagossians were leaving as food and medicines dwindled.

In 1971 the U.S. Navy began construction on Diego Garcia and ordered the British to complete the removals. First British agents and U.S. soldiers on Diego Garcia herded the Chagossians' pet dogs into sealed sheds and gassed and burned them in front of their traumatized owners awaiting deportation. Then, between 1971 and 1973, British agents forced the islanders to board overcrowded cargo ships and left them on the docks in Mauritius and the Seychelles.

Upon arrival, Chagossians received virtually no resettlement assistance and found themselves homeless, jobless and with little money. In 1975 The Post broke the story of the expulsion, finding the people living in "abject poverty" as a result of what The Post's editorial page called an "act of mass kidnapping."

When a single day of congressional hearings followed, the U.S. government denied all responsibility for the islanders.

After years of protests and strikes, the British government, in 1978 and 1982, paid Chagossians some compensation. It totaled less than $6,000 per recipient. Many used the money to pay off large debts accrued since the expulsion, and for most, conditions improved only marginally. After living with the islanders over four periods between 2001 and 2004, I found that as a group, Chagossians -- now numbering more than 5,000 -- have been severely and chronically impoverished by the expulsion.

I came to document the expulsion's effects after being asked to serve as an expert witness in lawsuits brought against the U.S. and British governments. The suits are demanding the right of return, proper financial compensation and the right to work on the base.

In Britain, the High Court in London has twice -- in 2000 and 2006 -- ruled the islanders' expulsion illegal under U.K. law. In February the group will return to the court to contest the British government's appeal of the latest ruling; another victory could finally open the way for a return to Chagos.

By contrast, a federal district court and an appeals court have dismissed the U.S. lawsuit, with judges unwilling to overrule the executive on what one judge called the "improper misplacement of the plaintiffs," an act held to be a matter of foreign and military policy. During the 1975 House hearings, Lee Hamilton, then a member of Congress and now co-chairman of the Iraq Study Group, asked a State Department representative if the government had any legal or moral responsibility for the people. The representative replied, "We have no legal responsibility. Moral responsibility is a term, sir, that I find difficult to assess."

Forty years almost to the day after the signing of the initial Diego Garcia agreement, there should be no difficulty in assessing the responsibility of the United States: The U.S. government developed the idea for a base on Diego Garcia, demanded the removal of the islanders, paid the British for the deportations and gave the orders to complete the removals.

While almost no attention has been paid to the Chagossians since The Post's 1975 report, the time has come for the story of the Chagossians and Diego Garcia to see the light of day, and for Congress and the Bush administration finally to accept and act on the responsibility of the United States for a people's ongoing plight.

Mr. Wolfowitz And The Bank (NYT)

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

When Paul Wolfowitz speaks publicly these days, he is usually making good sense. The head of the World Bank (formerly No. 2 at the Pentagon) has criticized Chinese banks for ignoring environmental and human rights standards when they lend to Africa, told the White House it needs to do more to alleviate African poverty, and has vowed that corrupt officials won't be allowed to siphon off money from projects that are supposed to benefit the poor.

So why do so many people at the bank mistrust him — including many of the leading shareholders? At last fall's annual meeting, European ministers insisted that the bank's board would oversee Mr. Wolfowitz's anticorruption program, to ensure that no country was punished arbitrarily.

That is not a vote of confidence and not a healthy state of affairs. Mr. Wolfowitz needs to figure out how to earn more than just the Bush administration's trust.

Some of his critics will never forgive him for championing the disastrous Iraq war. But he has compounded their suspicions, surrounding himself with a tight group of former Bush administration officials who — true to their roots — have little patience for explaining themselves and even less for criticism.

Mr. Wolfowitz and his aides did an especially poor job explaining their decisions to suspend or delay hundreds of millions of dollars in loans because of alleged corruption, feeding fears that they were settling scores. When Hilary Benn, Britain's top aid official, publicly questioned bank policies, an unidentified senior bank official dismissed Mr. Benn to The Financial Times as "an ambitious political climber." That's no way to win friends or donors. Mr. Wolfowitz wrote to the paper to say that was not his view and has since visited London to patch things up, but relations remain cool.

Mr. Wolfowitz has yet to outline a broader vision for the bank, which might inspire his staff and rally international support. There are certainly a host of issues that need his leadership. The bank needs to give more of a voice to less wealthy and poor countries. It needs to find new ways to mobilize private sector financing. And it needs to get more deeply — and more systematically — involved in addressing global challenges like epidemics, sustainable energy and post-conflict reconstruction.

Mr. Wolfowitz deserves praise for championing debt relief for the world's poorest countries. And he is right that the bank needs to do a lot more to fight corruption, which can cripple any development effort. To be heard on these subjects, Mr. Wolfowitz will have to work harder to earn the trust of his staff, his shareholders and everyone who cares about development. He needs a more inclusive management style and a more diplomatic inner circle, and to articulate broader goals beyond stopping corruption. That way he would have the credibility to fight the good fight.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Al-Zawahri Encourages Islamic Militants To Continue Fighting Worldwide. The AP (12/30) reported that on Saturday a 15-minute audiotaped message by the deputy leader of al-Qaeda was released on a Islamic insurgent website and "accused moderate Arab leaders of being traitors for cooperating with the United States." During the tape, Ayman al-Zawahri "wished the Palestinian people a happy Eid al-Adha but lashed out at Palestinian president Mahmoud Abbas and his Fatah movement" and "urged Muslims in Somalia, Chechnya, Indonesia, the Philippines and Algeria to keep on fighting the "infidels and crusaders." The AP added that al-Zawahri stated that "those who had sold Palestine, the secular traitors, can not be your brothers. Do not recognize their legitimacy" and "do not sign with them the documents that will make you lose Palestine." The AP pointed out that Al-Zawahri "did not mention Saddam Hussein's execution in the tape, suggesting it was made before the ousted leader's hanging on Saturday."

Critics Have Due Process Concerns About Guantanamo Review Boards. The New York Times (12/31, A1, Golden, 1.16M) reports that amid emerging questions and concerns about the legal authority to detain and hold Guantanamo detainees, "a law passed by Congress and signed by President Bush in October" that "prohibits them from challenging their detention or treatment by writs of habeas corpus in the federal courts. Instead, they may only petition a single federal appeals court to examine whether the review boards followed the military's own procedures in reviewing their status as 'enemy combatants.'" Yet "an examination of the Guantánamo review boards by The New York Times suggests that they have often fallen short, not only as a source of due process…but also as a forum to resolve questions about what the detainees have done and the threats they may pose." The Times points out that limitations include "a continuing shortage of information about many detainees," yet "military officials emphasize that the boards are an administrative forum and were never intended to replicate judicial standards of fairness" and "offer prisoners a viable opportunity to rebut the government's evidence."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

State Intelligence Centers Opening Up Nationwide To Collect Terror Data. The Washington Post (12/31, A3, Sheridan, Hsu, 690K) reports that "frustrated by poor federal cooperation, U.S. states and cities are building their own network of intelligence centers led by police to help detect and disrupt terrorist plots. The new 'fusion centers' are now operating in 37 states, including Virginia and Maryland, and another covers the Washington area, according to the Department of Homeland Security. The centers, which have received $380 million in federal support since the 2001 terrorist attacks, pool and analyze information from local, state and federal law enforcement officials. The emerging 'network of networks' marks a new era of opportunity for law enforcement" since "police are hungry for federal intelligence in an age of homegrown terrorism and more sophisticated crime" while "federal law enforcement officials could benefit from a potential army of tipsters." The Post points out that the model of "intelligence-led policing" has fueled some "fears of overzealousness such as that associated with police 'red squads' that spied on civil rights and peace activists decades ago" while "the centers also face practical obstacles…including a shortage of money, skilled analysts, and proven relationships with the FBI and Homeland Security."

Columnist Counts Down "Top 10 Civil Liberties Nightmares Of 2006." In her Washington Post (12/31, B2, 690K) column, Dahlia Lithwick counts down her "top 10 civil liberties nightmares of 2006." They include the "Attempt to Get Death Penalty for Zacarias Moussaoui," the detentions at Guantanamo Bay, "Government Snooping," "Extraordinary Rendition," "Abuse of Jose Padilla," and "The Military Commissions Act of 2006."

Army Corps Of Engineers' New Orleans Levees Study Critiqued. The Los Angeles Times (12/31, Vartabedian, 850K) reports, "When the Army Corps of Engineers admitted in June that design flaws in the New Orleans levee system had caused most of the flooding during Hurricane Katrina, it seemingly left little to argue about. But the fight wasn't over. The Corps is now engaged in an effort to predict how New Orleans would fare in the next big hurricane, and is once again being second-guessed by some of the nation's top civil engineers. The National Research Council complains that the Corps' official investigation into the levee failures reaches premature conclusions, glosses over problems, and fails in its most important task: giving the public the information it needs to make informed decisions about living in New Orleans. The Corps' analysis will play a major role in determining the city's future — including whether more than 200,000 former residents could rebuild abandoned neighborhoods and whether insurers can provide coverage at an affordable rate."

WAR NEWS:

Details, Video Of Saddam Execution Emerge As Ex-Dictator Buried In Town Of Birth. All three broadcast network newscasts were preempted Saturday evening as coverage of the funeral services for President Gerald R. Ford continued. This morning's newspapers are dominated by Ford coverage as well as coverage of the aftermath of the Saturday execution of Saddam Hussein. The Hussein stories generally focus on the latest details of the actual event, as well as world reaction and Hussein's Sunday morning burial in a family plot in Ouja, the town where he was born.

The New York Times (12/31, Burns, 1.16M) reports on its front page that "after nearly three decades of living with the brutal repression of Saddam Hussein and the violent aftermath of his overthrow by American troops, Iraq responded with a mixture of rejoicing, violence and muted reflection on Saturday to the news that their former dictator had been hanged in one of the grimmest of his own execution chambers." Iraqis "spent much of the day crowding around television sets to watch mesmerizing replays of a videotape that showed the 69-year-old Mr. Hussein being led to the gallows at dawn by five masked executioners, and having a noose fashioned from a thick rope of yellow hemp lowered around his neck." While "he seemed almost unnaturally calm and cooperative," the videotape "offered only a partial sense of how Mr. Hussein went to his death, according to accounts given later by some of the 25 people who attended the execution." Those witnesses say Hussein "spent much of his last half-hour…in querulous and at times irascible exchanges with the Shiite guards and executioners assigned to hang him and with some of the Shiite witnesses." The New York Times (12/31, Santora, 1.16M) says in a second front-page story that Hussein "never bowed his head, until his neck snapped. His last words were equally defiant. 'Down with the traitors, the Americans, the spies and the Persians.'"

The Los Angeles Times (12/31, Gold, 850K) says "a video of the hanging, which was apparently shot on a cellphone," surfaced online quickly, "underscoring how quickly controversial images rocket through cyberspace, whether or not there have been attempts to control them. The jerky images show the noose being placed around Hussein's neck and angry shouts exchanged between him and those in attendance. Hussein can be seen falling through the trapdoor as it opens, but the actual hanging is not visible. Moments later, the camera pans in and shows his face." The Washington Post (12/31, D1, Kennicott, 690K) writes about the "viral video" dissemination of the footage, calling it "the first great Shakespearean death scene of the YouTube generation."

In a New York Times (12/31, WK1, Burns, 1.16M) "Week in Review" piece, John F. Burns writes, "Saddam's death was to be a miserable and lonely one, as stark and undignified as Iraq's new rulers can devise." The Washington Post (12/31, Raghavan, 690K) reports on its front page that just before he died, "Hussein said, 'Ya Allah,' preparing himself for the platform he stood on to open up. Suddenly, witnesses recalled, the room erupted in Shiite religious chants as the Shiite Muslims in the audience seized the moment they had long sought. One man yelled, 'Moqtada, Moqtada, Moqtada,' unveiling his loyalty to radical anti-American cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. Hussein smiled, the witnesses said, and asked sarcastically, 'Moqtada?'"

The Washington Times (12/31, Frayer, 88K) reports on its front page that in Sadr City, "victims of Saddam's three decades of autocratic rule took to the streets celebrating, dancing, beating drums and hanging Saddam in effigy. Celebratory gunfire erupted in other Shi'ite neighborhoods across the country. Outside the Sunni insurgent stronghold of Ramadi, west of the capital, loyalists marched with Saddam pictures and waved Iraqi flags." Another New York Times (12/31, Tavernise, 1.16M) front-page report says "for Shiites, long oppressed, it was a moment of intense release," but Sunnis "were skeptical. After three years of grinding violence and abuses by the Shiite government security forces, trust has all but fallen away, and few feel genuinely represented by the government. Most, in fact, are afraid of it."

The Washington Post (12/31, A21, Trejos, 690K) reports that for some Iraqis, "he might as well have died three years ago." Most "once feared Hussein," but "three years later, Iraqis are still a terrorized people. Now, instead of Hussein, they fear the car bombs that maim and kill every day, the kidnappers who snatch people off the streets in broad daylight, the mortar shells that fall on residential neighborhoods . And they fear each other, as Shiite Muslims fight Sunni Arabs in what is spiraling into a civil war."

The New York Times (12/31, A11, Simons, 1.16M) says Hussein "was the first former leader to be tried by a domestic court for crimes against humanity -- a crime enshrined in international law -- and put to death for it." His execution "stands out because the new international legal institutions, like the International Criminal Court and the temporary tribunals that are trying war crimes cases in the former Yugoslavia, Rwanda and Sierra Leone, do not impose the death penalty."

Hussein Buried In Family Plot. The AP (12/31) reports, "Saddam was buried shortly before dawn Sunday in a family plot in the cemetery in Ouja, the town of his birth. Few were present for the internment near Tikrit, 130 kilometers (80 miles) north of Baghdad." He "was buried near the graves of his sons Uday and Qusay in the main town cemetery. The sons and a grandson were killed in a gunbattle with the American forces in Mosul in July 2003." BBC.com (12/31) says the ceremony was "sparsely attended."

"Chief Nemesis Of The Bush Family" Now Gone. Examining Hussein's impact on the presidencies of both the elder and the younger George Bush, the Washington Post (12/31, A21, Baker, 690K) writes that "the day after he ordered a cease-fire and brought the Persian Gulf War to a close, President George H.W. Bush ruminated about the status quo he had left behind in Iraq. 'Still no feeling of euphoria,' he dictated to his diary Feb. 28, 1991. Saddam Hussein, he recognized, remained a threat. 'He's got to go,' Bush concluded. It took nearly 16 years, but he's finally gone. And with Hussein's execution in Baghdad, so is the chief nemesis of the Bush family, a man who bedeviled father-and-son presidents and in different ways dominated both of their administrations. The long, tortured arc of the Bush-Hussein relationship that shaped recent U.S. history finally came to a close with the snap of a noose."

BBC.com (12/30, Frei) writes that "when Saddam Hussein looked in disbelief at the over-sized noose that was fitted by masked volunteers around his neck, the man who helped to put it there by invading Iraq and toppling the dictator was soundly asleep at his ranch in Texas. It was only nine o'clock in the evening in Crawford but George Bush was already embedded in the land of nod, with orders not to be woken until the morning. The blithe indifference of deep slumber was the final snub to the dead man who once described himself as 'Salahadin II', 'the Redeemer of all the Arabs' and 'the Lion of Baghdad.'"

World Leaders Offer Cautious Reactions. The New York Times (12/31, A12, Cowell, 1.16M) reports, "Western politicians sought a cautious balance on Saturday between revulsion at his record, support for his executioners and concern at the use of a capital penalty they largely shun in their own countries," as "religious leaders -- Christian and Muslim -- used stronger and more critical language in response to the news of Mr. Hussein's execution."

The Los Angeles Times (12/31, Wilkinson, Murphy, 850K) reports that while "the death penalty is anathema across Europe, and opposition to the execution of Saddam Hussein was nearly unanimous among its leaders Saturday," many "were torn between those strongly held beliefs and revulsion for the former Iraqi dictator's record of atrocities." A spokesman for Pope Benedict XVI said "the execution 'is tragic news…that risks feeding the spirit of revenge and sowing new violence,'" and "several European leaders, spanning the political spectrum, questioned whether justice was served by Hussein's execution and said it could bring further bloodshed."

Mixed Reactions Among Iraqi Americans. The Washington Post (12/31, A21, Hernandez, 690K) reports that among Iraqi Americans, "the emotions that accompanied Hussein's execution were complex, ranging from jubilant to relieved to disappointed," with most pleased he is gone, but some fearing the quick carrying out of the death sentence will, as one said, "give the impression that this was vengeance" and not justice. The Houston Chronicle (12/31, Viren, Carroll, 530K) reports on similar mixed reactions among Iraqis living in the Houston area. One man said, "Some were happy. Some were not."

Some Arabs Displeased By Execution. The New York Times (12/31, A13, Fattah, 1.16M) reports that even Arabs "who celebrated America's embrace of the rule of law" in Iraq felt the quick execution "left a bitter taste of stolen justice. Even Mr. Hussein's staunchest enemies expressed a sense of bitterness at the end." BBC.com (12/30, Pannell) says news of Hussein's death "has been greeted with a mixture of surprise and anger in some quarters -- and notable silence in others." The Los Angeles Times (12/31, Zavis, 850K) writes that many Kurds are conflicted as well, pleased by Hussein's death but upset that he will not be brought to justice for atrocities against their people.

Newsday (12/31, Bazzi) says the "timing and drama" surrounding the execution "makes it likely that he will become a martyr for Sunni nationalists fighting U.S. forces and the new Iraqi government." But as the Minneapolis Star Tribune (12/31, 395K) reports, Iraqi government leaders "sought to tell a different story, saying Saddam's trip to the gallows should become a turning point in Iraq's strife. Referring to leaders of the Sunni insurgency, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said in a statement, 'Saddam's execution puts an end to all their pathetic gambles on a return to dictatorship.'"

Division That Captured Hussein Surprised By Quick Execution. The New York Times (12/31, A14, Blumenthal, 1.16M) reports on the Fourth Infantry Division, which captured Hussein in 2003. Now back in Killeen, Texas, "the soldiers of Fort Hood had better things to do than to count down a dictator's final minutes. … As word spread, soldiers in sweatshirts and turned-around ball caps seemed surprised that the sentence would be carried out so quickly, wondering aloud whether it would be shown on television."

US Television News Kept "Overnight Death Watch." The New York Times (12/31, A14, Stanley, 1.16M) writes, "Of course American television was going to show Saddam Hussein's execution. In a medium that feeds on immediacy, it was just a question of not having to wait too long to see it. And the coverage of the Iraqi dictator's last moments turned out to be an enervating, overnight death watch."

More Commentary. In his Washington Post (12/31, B7, 690K) column, Jim Hoagland writes, "Dictators die harder than most of us. Having wielded unlimited power in life, they seem to be sustained by a stubborn belief in their ability to stare down death, too. In his final moments yesterday, Saddam Hussein refused the offer of a hood to cover his eyes. Such defiance lends a particularly morbid quality to the last days of dictators such as Hussein and the now-infirm Fidel Castro. They follow in the reluctant footsteps of Spain's Francisco Franco and of many other tyrants-in-extremis before el rais Saddam and el jefe Fidel were confronted, respectively, with a hangman's rope and the withering ravages of disease. … I suspect that Hussein preferred to go out in a grim finale that will be portrayed by his disciples as victor's justice than to waste away, in solitude and yet under the public's watchful gaze, as Castro is doing in Havana."

In a Los Angeles Times (12/31, 850K) op-ed, journalist Christopher Hitchens writes, "Almost every transfer of power in Baghdad for the last half a century has been accompanied by the killing of the previous incumbents. British-backed Prime Minister Nuri Said was dragged through the streets and torn to shreds in 1958; his remains were then dug up and run over by cars. I remember as a boy seeing one of his replacements, the pro-communist Abdul Karim Qassim, on television, his head lolling after the attentions of a Baathist firing squad. The most lurid of all these moments, in this most bitter and harsh society, came with the sadistic video that Hussein himself made of the purge of his party after his seizure of power. Nobody who has seen that footage -- of terrified men dragged by goons from the room, while the survivors weep with fear and relief and Hussein indulges in a luxurious cigar -- is likely to forget it. And this atrocity was only the curtain raiser to further orgies of mass murder and torture of which we have unimpeachable evidence from the regime's own archives."

At Least 68 Die In Iraq Bombings; Six US Service Members Killed. The AP (12/30) reports, "Bombings killed at least 68 people in Iraq on Saturday, including one planted on a minibus that exploded in a fish market in a mostly Shiite town south of Baghdad. ... Despite concerns about a spike in unrest, Saturday's violence was not unusually high and there was no indication it was related to the execution. The U.S. military also announced the deaths of three Marines and three soldiers, making December the year's deadliest month for U.S. troops in Iraq, with 109 service members killed.

CNN.com (12/30) reports "at least 75 dead," stating that the UK "announced its 127th death in the war," caused by a roadside bombing in Basra. One bomb in Kufa killed at least 30; CNN.com adds, "Kufa is part of the key southern province of Najaf. U.S. troops handed security control of the area to Iraqi troops and police last week. The transfer is considered the most significant so far because of Najaf's religious importance."

Shiite Hostages' Kin Fear Reprisal Killings After Saddam Execution. The Washington Times/London Sunday Telegraph (12/31, Hussein) reports, "The families of hundreds of Shi'ite men snatched off the streets by Sunni extremists are waiting to hear their fate after kidnappers threatened to kill them if the execution of Saddam Hussein went ahead. As many as 450 men are thought to have been seized by Sunni militants during the past two months as hostages against the execution. ... The seizures went on for two months before Iraqi army units moved into the area and shut down the checkpoints."

Soldiers Doubt Any Impact Of Execution On Deployment Length. The AP (12/30, Hurst), in an article primarily about Saddam Hussein's last words, reports on the pessimism of some US soldiers in Iraq. Quoted are "members of the Army's 2nd Battalion, 17th Field Artillery Regiment, on patrol in an overwhelmingly Shiite neighborhood in eastern Baghdad," who "said the execution wouldn't get them home any faster — and therefore didn't make much difference."

US Appears Accustomed To Servicewomen's Deaths. The Washington Post (12/31, A18, George, 690K) reports on a memorial wall at Fort Lee, Virginia, that lists "soldiers who have died in the combat zones of Iraq and Afghanistan: PFC Lori Piestewa, CPT Kimberly Hampton, SPC Lizbeth Robles, SGT Jessica Housby… All 59 are women. They are casualties in a conflict that has seen women serving in larger numbers than before, in a wider array of jobs, amid violence that heeds no front line. ... In all, 62 service women from all branches have died in Iraq, about two-thirds of them in hostile fire. By comparison, in World War II, historians say, 16 women were killed in action. In Vietnam, one woman's life was claimed by enemy fire; in the Persian Gulf War, five. Most previous female casualties were nurses. Now the female dead include military police, truck drivers, intelligence analysts, helicopter pilots, medics, mechanics, media escorts and kitchen managers. At least 13 left behind children." However, rather than causing a "public outcry" predicted by experts, the deaths "appear to have melded into the nation's experience of war."

LAPD Officers Return From Military Duty In Iraq. The Los Angeles Times (12/31, McGreevy, 850K) reports on Los Angeles police officers who served in Iraq, saying "dozens of LAPD officers who have returned to the sometimes dangerous streets of Los Angeles after being deployed as military reservists to the meaner streets of Iraq. ... Experts estimate that more than 500 peace officers in California have been called to active military duty since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks."

Eikenberry Predicts More Fighting In Afghanistan. The AP (12/30, Straziuso) reports, "The outgoing U.S. commander in Afghanistan predicted more fighting this spring and summer and said Taliban militants would try to overrun towns to 'unhinge the Afghan people's morale.' Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry also said the recent killing of a high-level Taliban commander shows that fugitives such as Osama bin Laden and Mullah Omar will one day slip up, and that the U.S. will strike." However, he "said none of the Taliban's efforts would provide "a significant military challenge" for U.S., NATO and Afghan forces, which he said have improved greatly in the last year."

Ring Road Shows Challenges Of Afghanistan. In a story exceeding 3,400 words, the Los Angeles Times (12/31, Watson, 850K) reports on Afghanistan's Ring Road: "tell war-hardened Afghans that you're going to travel its entire 1,373-mile length unarmed, facing winter and a raging insurgency, and they look at you like you're completely mad. Five years after the fall of the Taliban, it shouldn't be such a challenge. Rebuilding the two-lane highway that connects Afghanistan's major cities has been a centerpiece of the U.S.-led effort to transform the nation. ... But as with many things in Afghanistan, there is a chasm between the rhetoric and reality. Some of the best stretches of the road are among the Taliban's favorite killing grounds. ... About 40% of the road isn't finished." The Times describes a journey along the road: "On the way, we managed to avoid a Taliban ambush, a potential kidnapper or highway robber, a suicide bomber and a gunman who fired close enough to take off one of our heads."

Scholars Oppose Growth Of Army. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (12/31, B7, 690K), Woodrow Wilson International Center scholars Gordon Adams and John Diamond write about proposals to permanently increase the Army, "This proposal is a bad idea. It is irrelevant to the stresses the Army is experiencing in Iraq. It would build enormous long-term costs into the defense budget, and it presumes a role in the world for the U.S. military that the voters emphatically opposed in November." Instead, Adams and Diamond suggest, "A program of troop reductions and phased redeployment from Iraq would in effect increase the size of the Army by relieving the force of a burdensome, costly and unproductive mission. There will be opportunities to retrain and reequip to redress the shortcomings in armor and tactics so neglected by the Rumsfeld Pentagon."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Texas Program Aimed At Catching Internet Predators Seen As Model. The Houston Chronicle (12/31, Pape) reports, "Sugar Land's Internet safety program is being hailed as a 'best practice' by the U.S. Conference of Mayors, as well as being featured as a model during a recent U.S. Department of Justice summit in Washington, D.C." The Chronicle continues, "Mayor David Wallace was invited to present his city's 'Keep Kids E-Safe' initiative to more than 1,000 mayors from across the nation, as well as to justice department personnel looking for ways to combat the increasing problem of cyberpredators. … The program has received national attention as an innovative cross-sector collaboration involving all levels of government, nonprofit organizations and the business community, city officials said. Keep Kids E-Safe utilizes education, enforcement and prevention to help parents, families and communities protect children from online predators." The Chronicle adds, "Wallace said that he first realized how serious the problem was after seeing an undercover investigation conducted by NBC's Dateline news magazine more than a year ago. … Wallace talked to members of the Mayor's Youth Advisory Council to see if they would be interested in taking on a possible project. The 125-member council is a city-sponsored teen group that provides government leaders insight into the development of programs and services impacting young people."

WPost Describes Death Penalty As "A Creature Of…The South, And Texas." The Washington Post (12/31, B6, 690K) editorializes, "2006 saw the fewest executions in the United States in a decade, 53. The use of capital punishment has been dropping since 1999, when 98 people were executed. The number of new death sentences is also falling precipitously, according to data from the Death Penalty Information Center, and the number of people on death row is dropping off as well. At least for now, capital punishment remains in retreat. Perhaps the most striking indicator of this retreat is the degree to which executions are becoming a local phenomenon. While the preponderance of states have a death penalty, very few use it as a routine feature of their criminal justice systems. This year, 14 states carried out executions, but only six of them -- Texas, Ohio, North Carolina, Florida, Oklahoma and Virginia -- carried out more than one. Together, these states accounted for 85 percent of executions this year. All by itself, Texas, which executed 24 people, accumulated 45 percent. Over the previous three years, the leading six states for executions accounted for between 70 and 83 percent of executions annually. The less the death penalty gets used, the more it becomes a creature of its heartland: the South, and Texas especially."

Broder Revisits Column On Rove And Plame. The Washington Post's David Broder (12/31, B7) writes a "column that drew great protest was one in which I took my colleagues in the media to task for their treatment of Karl Rove in the Valerie Plame leak investigation. When the special prosecutor announced that he was not charging Rove with anything, I reviewed some of the many articles that had accused the White House aide of masterminding the 'outing' of Plame and said that an apology was in order. The e-mail and letter writers argued that the simple fact that Rove had escaped prosecution did not mean that he was innocent of using his position to harass and frustrate critics of the administration. … But I still believe that there is an important cautionary tale for the media in the Rove-Plame story. Too many of us got way ahead of the facts and let our suspicions grow into assumptions and assertions for which we had no evidence."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Finds Problems At Delaware Prisons. The Wilmington (DE) News Journal (12/31, Williams, Parra) reports, "Delaware Correctional Center near Smyrna is among the Delaware prisons looking at major changes in inmate health care after an investigation by the U.S. Department of Justice found the prison system guilty of civil rights violations." The Journal continues, "It's been more than a year since a coalition of concerned citizens, lawmakers and clergy marched on the governor's mansion and knelt in prayer asking for better health care for inmates in Delaware's prisons. They were galvanized by horrific conditions outlined in a series of stories in The News Journal, the first of which appeared in late September 2005 -- a series Correction Commissioner Stan Taylor charged was 'sloppy reporting' in a five-page response the newspaper published." The Journal adds, "On Friday, following a nine-month investigation, the U.S. Department of Justice announced that federal investigators found "substantial civil rights violations" inside four Delaware prisons. For example, the report noted, flesh-eating bacteria inside Gander Hill prison went undiagnosed and untreated, placing "inmates and staff at risk of acquiring the infection and passing it to others in the community." … Taylor and Attorney General Carl Danberg signed an 87-point agreement with the federal government that calls for sweeping changes in Delaware's penal institutions. The state promised to correct the deficiencies and 'meet generally accepted professional standards.' However, the state did not admit to violating any inmate's civil rights or breaking any other federal law. … Federal prison regulators identified a host of problems inside prisons, including inadequate screening and health assessments, inadequate treatment of inmates with infectious diseases, inadequate treatment of inmates with serious mental illness, and deficiencies in the state's suicide-prevention measures. … They found substantial civil rights violations at Baylor Women's Correctional Institution, Young Correctional Institution, the Delaware Correctional Center and the Sussex Correctional Institution."

Increased Scrutiny Of DOJ Is On Rights Groups' Agenda. The Detroit Free Press/Gannett (12/31, Berry) reports, "With Democrats taking control of Congress on Monday, civil rights groups will be pressing for an aggressive agenda that includes a ban on racial profiling, an overhaul in some election practices and stepped up oversight of the Justice Department." Gannett continues, "Because of last month's vote in Michigan, civil rights advocates also may urge Congress to take a stand on affirmative action, depending on the outcome of several cases before the U.S. Supreme Court. … Advocates are concerned about the potential national implications of Michigan's Proposal 2 initiative approved in November that bans racial preferences in state hiring and university admissions. … 'We will be looking to see if there is any role for Congress to play,' said John Britton, chief counsel for the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law." Gannett adds, "Advocates say civil rights issues are more likely to have a platform and encounter less resistance than in the Republican-controlled Congress, especially with members of the Congressional Black Caucus heading powerful committees, including Rep. John Conyers of Detroit on the Judiciary Committee. … But experts caution that civil rights issues must compete with other Democratic priorities, such as high college costs, minimum wage increases and accessible health care. … 'Congress is going to have a lot on its plate. ... It's going to be a bit of a climb uphill' for some civil rights issues, said Hugh Price, a senior fellow with the Brookings Institution and former president of the National Urban League."

Kennedy's Opinion Expected To Determine Outcome Of SCOTUS Abortion Cases. The New York Times (12/31, WK2, Greenhouse, 1.16M) reports, "The coming months will be a testing time for the young Roberts court, including decisions due by early summer on abortion, school integration and environmental policy, with an unusually large emphasis on cases of significance to the business community. Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. has spoken often of the virtues of a court that speaks modestly and unanimously. Those goals may well prove elusive. The court's conservative bloc reached out to hear challenges to voluntary integration plans put in place by the public school systems of Louisville, Ky., and Seattle, which had been upheld by lower courts. … The Nov. 8 arguments in two cases on the constitutionality of the federal Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003 did not provide such a clear basis for prediction. Instead, they served to showcase Justice Anthony M. Kennedy's position at the center of a court that is closely divided in cases that Justice Antonin Scalia has described as battles in the culture war." Justice Kennedy "did not tip his hand during the abortion arguments. But enough other justices tipped theirs to make clear that the first federal statute ever to make an abortion procedure a crime will stand or fall depending on Justice Kennedy's opinion."

Will Predicts SCOTUS Will Hear McCain-Feingold Challenge. In his column for the Washington Post (12/31, B7, 690K) George Will writes, "A three-judge federal court recently tugged a thread that may begin the unraveling of the fabric of murky laws and regulations that traduce the First Amendment by suppressing political speech. Divided 2 to 1, the court held -- unremarkably, you might think -- that issue advocacy ads can run during an election campaign, when they matter most. This decision will strike zealous (there is no other kind) advocates of ever-tighter regulation of political speech (campaign finance 'reformers') as ominous. Why? Because it partially emancipates millions of Americans who incorporate thousands of groups to advocate their causes, groups such as the American Civil Liberties Union and the National Rifle Association. And Wisconsin Right to Life. … The Wisconsin Right to Life case is probably heading for the Supreme Court. There, Justice Samuel Alito occupies the chair that Sandra Day O'Connor occupied when she voted with the majority in the 5 to 4 ruling that upheld McCain-Feingold."

ANTITRUST:

States Take Closer Look At Airline Takeover. The Salt Lake Tribune (12/31) reports, "Utah Attorney General Mark Shurtleff isn't opposed to US Airways' hostile bid for Delta Air Lines - yet. … But that could change in the coming weeks. The top law enforcement officer in Utah, who waged an antitrust fight against Microsoft Corp. a few years back, has teamed up with attorneys general in a dozen other states to investigate the impact of a Delta buyout on airline competition and ticket prices. … 'It looks like and smells like a classic redundant merger, which often is anti-competitive and sometimes does violate antitrust laws. If we conclude that it is, then we can possibly bring an action to stop it,' Shurtleff said last week." The Tribune continues, "In most cases, states have authority to challenge corporate mergers. The airline industry, however, is the one area where states are powerless to approve or reject mergers out of hand. That power is the sole right of the U.S. Department of Justice, said Jim Dick, an attorney who worked in the antitrust division of the Justice Department and whose private practice involves antitrust work in the airline industry. … 'The states don't have a role. What they can do, though, is have an investigation and present their findings to the Justice Department, which is very likely to give them serious consideration,' said Dick, who works in Washington, D.C., for the Cleveland-based law firm of Squires Sanders and Dempsey." The Tribune adds, "The investigation, already two weeks old, is a race against time. Delta, which has spurned the offer, is plowing forward with its plan to exit bankruptcy as a free-standing airline before next summer. The No. 3 U.S. carrier has set a meeting Feb. 7 with a federal judge to show why the plan contains enough information for creditors to vote on it. … At the same time, US Airways continues to assert that its $8.4 billion offer provides more value to creditors than Delta's stand-alone plan. US Airways contends that the merger could be completed in the first half of 2007 and should be done while Delta is in bankruptcy. And spokesman Philip Gee says his Tempe, Ariz.-based airline believes its offer to buy Atlanta-based Delta will pass antitrust review. … 'That is based on a thorough city-pair-by-city pair analysis, the type the Department of Justice will perform,' Gee said."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Bruno Defends Himself As FBI Investigates His Business Dealings. The New York Times (12/31, Cooper) reports New York's State Senate President Joseph L. Bruno "finds himself on the defensive as never before. The F.B.I. is investigating his business ties, newspapers are exploring his financial relationships with people seeking help from the state, some Republicans are grumbling that he is tarnishing their troubled party, and for the first time, a member of his conference, Senator John J. Bonacic, a Hudson Valley Republican, is calling on Mr. Bruno to step down." Bruno "bristled at news reports that the federal government was investigating his decision to award a $500,000 member item grant — the type that goes to individual lawmakers' pet projects — to Evident Technologies, a company with a former director, Jared Abbruzzese, who had business dealings with Mr. Bruno. Mr. Bruno said that the state gave aid to Evident before he did, and that the money was intended to keep the company from moving out of state. ;It gets me a little bit excited, because they all want to moan and groan and point to Evident,' he said in his office. 'Evident is one of the most worthwhile projects to be funded that I have funded. Now the fact that a friend of mine, it turns out, that I had a financial relationship with — too damn bad. What am I, a second-class citizen? Is he a second-class citizen? We vetted that through the whole process, O.K.?'

FBI Accused Of Failing To Follow Additional Leads Related To Oklahoma City Bombing. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette's Jack Kelly (12/31) wrote, "The House International Relations committee issued a report last week criticizing the FBI's investigation of the 1995 bombing of the federal building in Oklahoma City. The FBI failed to pursue credible information that Timothy McVeigh and Terry Nichols had help, the committee said. The FBI shouldn't have abandoned its search for John Doe No. 2, the committee said. Jayna Davis, then a reporter for a television station in Oklahoma City, said she found at least 20 witnesses who identified Hussain al-Hussaini, a former Iraqi soldier, as the man they saw with Timothy McVeigh. And the FBI should have investigated more thoroughly contacts between Mr. McVeigh and Andreas Strassmeir, a German national who was a paramilitary instructor at Elohim City, a neo-Nazi compound near the Arkansas border, the committee said. The FBI says its investigation was exhaustive, but the discovery just two years ago of a large cache of explosives in a house in which Mr. Nichols lived (and which the FBI had searched) casts some doubt on that claim. Investigative reporter Peter Lance has just completed his third book describing FBI blunders (or worse) in the war on terror. … If what Mr. Lance says is true -- if only a small fraction of what Mr. Lance says is true -- the best that can be said of the FBI is that it has been grossly negligent. A story in the New York Sun Wednesday also does not inspire confidence in the bureau. According to an FBI court filing, the files in 22 of 94 investigations into leaks of classified information are missing. 'Knowing what I know, I can confidently say that until the investigative responsibilities for terrorism are removed from the FBI, I won't feel safe,' said former FBI agent Robert Wright in June 2001. Reading Mr. Lance's book won't make him feel any safer." This column also appeared in the Toledo Blade (OH) (12/31).

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House Ethics Committee Warns Conyers On Use Of Staff. RollCall.com (12/30, Davis) reports, "The House ethics committee concluded its three-year inquiry into incoming Judiciary Chairman John Conyers on Friday, voting to take no punitive action against the Michigan Democrat but warning him not to use Congressional staff for any campaign or personal purposes in the future. The inquiry was self-initiated by the ethics panel following news reports in December 2003 that Conyers had on multiple occasions demanded his Congressional staff do both political work outside of their official duties as well as personal errands and favors for the lawmaker and his wife, such as babysitting and tutoring his children."

The Hill (12/30, Kaplan, Kucinich) reports on its web site, "The top Republican and Democratic members on the ethics panel, Reps. Doc Hastings (R-Wash.) and Howard Berman (D-Calif.), said in a statement that Conyers acknowledged a 'lack of clarity' in communicating what was expected of his official staff and that he accepted responsibility for his actions. '[Conyers] agreed to take a number of additional, significant steps to ensure that his office complies with all rules and standards regarding campaign and personal work by congressional staff,' they stated. 'We have concluded that this matter should be resolved through the issuance of this public statement.' The finding by the ethics panel could spark debate, and perhaps eclipse, the first week of the incoming-Democratic majority's plans to change the House ethics rules, as well as raise questions about Conyers' standing to chair the Judiciary Committee."

LATimes Rates Bush's 2006 Performance. The Los Angeles Times (12/31, 850K) editorializes, "It's that time of year, when the drones of corporate America gather their No. 2 pencils and call over to human resources for all the personnel files. … Wat if our elected officials had to fit their year's accomplishments on the same kind of form with which millions of the rest of us are familiar? For President Bush, the results would not be encouraging." The Times is almost exclusively critical of the president, but rates his "Financial management" as "Exceeds expectations," noting, "Federal budget deficit is smaller than expected, though employee's insistence that this is a result of his tax cuts is unpersuasive. Also, after the election, indicated that he was open to fresh talks with Democrats about Social Security."

Kristof Offers Suggestions For Enhancing Bush's Legacy. The New York Times' Nicholas Kristof (12/31, WK9) offers "Ten Suggestions For Rescuing The Bush Legacy," writing, "Particularly after all the tributes to Gerald Ford in the last few days, President Bush may be pondering his own legacy and obituary. Sorry, Mr. Bush, but it doesn't look good right now, with your obit perhaps beginning something like this: 'George W. Bush, who achieved tremendous acclaim for his handling of the 9/11 terror attacks but left office vilified and disgraced, mired in the Iraq war and stalemated at home, his hard-line partisan tactics souring the electorate and crippling his beloved Republican Party for a generation, died. ...'But Mr. Bush, your plight isn't hopeless. In the holiday spirit, let me offer you 10 suggestions for what you can do in 2007 to try to rescue your legacy." The first suggestion is "seriously engage Iraq's nastier neighbors, including Iran and Syria, and renounce permanent military bases in Iraq."

NYTimes Suggests Areas Of Expansion For NCLB. The New York Times (12/31, WK7, 1.16M), in an editorial, writes, "The No Child Left Behind Act broke new ground when it required the states to educate impoverished children up to the same standards as their affluent counterparts, in exchange for federal aid. … The achievement gains have fallen far short of what Congress hoped for when it passed the landmark federal law — and also far short of what the country needs to keep pace with its economic rivals . In addition, student performance has flattened in recent years. … With the easy achievement gains already behind us, the next level of progress will require rigorous systemic change. The states, for example, will need to adopt rigorous examinations that track the federal test, the National Assessment of Educational Progress, more closely. They will have to crack down on state teachers colleges that turn out poor graduates, and devise ways — including differential pay — to persuade highly qualified teachers to work in failing schools that they have historically avoided. To move forward, the country must also find new ways to support and transform failing schools, beyond labeling them failures and presuming that the stigma will inspire better performance."

WPost Criticizes Pelosi's Decision On C-SPAN Access. The Washington Post (12/31, B6, 690K), in an editorial, writes, "Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) pledged to run the 'most open' Congress in history. Unfortunately, that promise doesn't seem to extend to letting the American people see what's really happening on the House floor. In a letter released the Friday before Christmas, Ms. Pelosi delivered a lump of coal to C-SPAN, which had asked to be freed from the restrictive rules that -- since House proceedings first were televised in 1979 -- have kept the cameras under control of the House and limited footage to tight shots of the podium or the lawmaker who's speaking. Senate rules are similarly constraining. As C-SPAN's president, Brian Lamb, explained in his letter to Ms. Pelosi asking that the cable network's cameras be permitted in the chamber, 'This compromise was crafted long ago to convince wary members to allow congressional sessions to be televised, and in the ensuing years it has become an anachronism that does a disservice to the institution and to the public."

NYTimes Says Social Security Fix Must Include Benefit Cuts, Tax Increases. A New York Times (12/31, WK7, 1.16M) editorial today disputes the use of the Chilean retirement model as a template for changes to the US Social Security system. "The overarching problem for Chile — and the real lesson for the United States — is that private savings are not a substitute for a guaranteed core tier of old-age support." Calling the primary measure of success "whether the system as a whole provides basic dignity for all," the Times says "Chile's privatized system has failed and Social Security has succeeded." Social Security should combine "modest benefit cuts" with "modest tax increases." Achieving that goal "would require sacrifices from both political parties," because "tax increases must be a part of any plausible Social Security reform mix." If a tax increase is not considered, "severe benefit cuts become unavoidable." The Times concludes, "As the debate unfolds anew in 2007, another vital lesson to remember from the Chilean experience is that institutions, once dismantled, are not easily restored."

OTHER NEWS:

Cheney Among Those Honoring Ford At Capitol. The Washington Post (12/31, A1, Ruane, 690K) reports, "Washington welcomed the body of former president Gerald R. Ford last evening. … It was attended by modest but somber crowds that lined the avenues of Alexandria, where the former president once lived. People also gathered in silence as his hearse, and the limousine bearing his wife, Betty, 88, paused beside the flickering fountains of the World War II Memorial. The cortege of about 40 vehicles then moved slowly along the broad and empty expanse of Constitution Avenue toward the gleaming dome of the Capitol, bright against the night sky." The Post notes, "President Bush did not attend last night's ceremonies. He and first lady Laura Bush plan to pay respects tomorrow, when they return to Washington from Texas. Bush also plans to speak at Ford's funeral Tuesday at Washington National Cathedral." The Washington Times (12/31, A1, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports, "It was noted repeatedly that Mr. Ford never aspired to be president, but served honorably after the Watergate scandal forced Richard M. Nixon to resign. 'President Ford proved as worthy of that office as any who had ever come before,' said Vice President Dick Cheney, who served as Mr. Ford's chief of staff. 'He assumed power without assuming airs; he knew how to treat people. He answered courtesy with courtesy; he answered discourtesy with courtesy.' Mr. Cheney also addressed the 38th president's decision to pardon Mr. Nixon, which was so divisive at the time that it probably cost him the 1976 election. 'It was this man, Gerald R. Ford, who led our republic safely though a crisis that could have turned to catastrophe,' he said. 'Gerald Ford was almost alone in understanding that there can be no healing without pardon.'" The AP (12/30, Woodward, Wilson) reports, "Ford's decision to pardon Nixon, so divisive at the time that it probably cost him the 1976 election, was dealt with squarely in his funeral services by his old chief of staff", Cheney. The New York Times (12/31, A19, Kornblut, 1.16M) reports, "Representative J. Dennis Hastert, the departing House speaker, recalled that 'in the summer of 1974, America didn't need a philosopher-king or a warrior-prince, an aloof aristocrat or a populist firebrand.' 'We needed a healer; we needed a rock,' Mr. Hastert said. 'We needed honesty, candor and courage. We needed Gerald Ford.'"

The AP (12/30) reports, "Hundreds of ordinary Americans lined up for a chance to view the closed, flag-draped casket of the 38th president late into the night and through the weekend. … The Washington portion of Ford's state funeral opened with a procession that took his casket from Maryland to Virginia and then over the Memorial Bridge -- dressed in flags and funeral bunting -- to the World War II memorial, past the White House without pausing and on to the U.S. Capitol for the first service and a lying in state that continues until Tuesday morning." The Washington Times (12/31, A1, Weber, 88K) reports, "hundreds…began standing in line long before the public viewing began after 8 p.m., and among the thousands who came to the region to mourn the death of the 38th president." The Los Angeles Times (12/31, Peterson, Schmitt, 850K) reports Ford "will be transported to Washington National Cathedral on Tuesday morning for a memorial service that will be attended by President Bush. The six days of funeral rites are scheduled to end Wednesday, when Ford will be buried in his boyhood home of Grand Rapids, Mich." The Detroit News (12/31, Trowbridge), Newsday (12/31, Abrams, Muskal), Bloomberg (12/30, Miller, Salant), and RollCall.com (12/30, Brotherton) were among other media outlets reporting on the ceremony at the Capitol.

Absence Of Bush And Other Top Officials Noted. The Washington Post (12/31, A1, Milbank, 690K) reports, "Everything was in place for Gerald R. Ford's state funeral last night -- everything, that is, but the statesmen. President Bush sent his regrets; he was cutting cedar and riding his bike on his ranch in Texas. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid and his deputy, Richard Durbin, couldn't make it, either; they were on a trip to visit Incan ruins. Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi took a pass, too -- as did nearly 500 of the 535 members of Congress. A 6-to-3 majority of the Supreme Court, including Ford's appointee, John Paul Stevens, ruled against attending. All the nation's governors were invited; few, if any, came. Apparently only two Cabinet members -- Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez -- accepted the invite. Congressional staffers and Ford family representatives scrambled to find sufficient greeters and honorary pallbearers to join Vice President Cheney and a score of former lawmakers and Ford administration officials."

Excerpts Of Ford Interview On Vietnam Published. The Washington Post (12/31, B1, Woodward, Parthemore, 690K) publishes excerpts from an interview Ford gave The Washington Post's Bob Woodward and Christine Parthemore in 2004 and 2005 in which "the former president revealed the depths of his disillusionment and frustration during the final years and months of the Vietnam War."

Ford Considered Choosing George H. W. Bush As His VP. The New York Times (12/31, A24, Roberts, 1.16M) reports Nelson Rockefeller "coveted the vice presidency in 1973, when Spiro T. Agnew resigned. Instead, President Nixon named Mr. Ford. … Among the prospective vice presidents Mr. Ford rejected was George H. W. Bush. Remembering the telephone call from Mr. Ford that August morning, Mr. Bush said modestly last week: 'I went on, and thanks to him, had wonderful assignments in life.'"

Ford Seen As Likely To Be Remembered For Nixon Pardon. The New York Times' David Kirkpatrick (12/31, WK1) writes, "Lyndon Johnson in 1973. Richard Nixon in 1994. Ronald Reagan in 2004. The last three former presidents to die dominated the world stage. They bent history to their will, for better or worse, and became the subjects of a crowded shelf of biographies. For the writers of memorials and obituaries, they were easy. Not so Gerald R. Ford, who served only 29 months, never won a national election, and was constricted by an overwhelmingly hostile Congress. He is remembered mainly for the pardon of his predecessor, an act that ultimately doomed his bid for re-election." The Los Angeles Times' Jonathan Chait (12/31) writes, "Ford's defeat in the 1976 presidential race may have been one of the worst things that ever happened to American liberalism. Liberals, of course, detested Ford for his pardon of Richard Nixon, and indeed the pardon was a pretty rotten act. In the light of history, however, Ford comes through as a far more innocuous figure. By the standard of his day, he was a conservative. But by the standard of our times, he's a raging moderate."

Betty Ford's Term As First Lady Remembered. The New York Times (12/31, A1, Steinhauer, 1.16M) reports, "It has been a while since America drew its face close to Betty Ford. But what the nation saw this week here in Southern California — an impossibly tiny face, lips pinched in grief and eyes blinking in the harsh midday sun — served as a poignant reminder of the woman whose reign as first lady, while brief and wholly unexpected, was among the most remarkable in modern history. … Thrown into the role of first lady during a period of deep distrust in government, she fulfilled the role of honest arbiter of American family life and of the modern woman, speaking candidly on just about any subject she was asked about, both shocking and delighting the country."

GOP Presidential Candidates Seen As Needing To Distance Themselves From Bush. The New York Times' Adam Nagourney (12/31, WK2, Nagourney) reports, "For Republican candidates, the problem is President Bush. … The trick for Republican candidates is to distance themselves from Mr. Bush without offending Republican loyalists on guard for anyone showing disrespect to the president, or offending Mr. Bush's own considerable corps of advisers and contributors, any one of whom could prove useful in 2008. Talking about spending is one way to create that distance. Senator John McCain of Arizona, for one, has made a point of criticizing the deficits during Republican rule in Washington. But will any of them aggressively distance themselves from Mr. Bush's Iraq policy? Could there be a spot in this cycle for an antiwar Republican? And could any echo the chord Barack Obama has struck on the Democratic side by promising an end to the brutal partisanship that has marked the Bush era, and campaign against Mr. Bush, however discreetly, on this ground?"

Clinton's Campaign Team Said To Be More Professional Than Husband's. The Los Angeles Times (12/31, Braun, 850K) reports Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton "has spent much of the last month behind closed doors, putting the final touches on a presidential campaign-in-waiting. … Awaiting only her go-ahead — with a decision expected in January — the machine that Hillary built has the heft and advance billing of an election-year juggernaut. It is a high-stakes fusion of her political world and her husband's, two camps with markedly different styles and, at times, competing agendas and egos. The test, should she decide to run, will be getting the two cultures to work together. … Bill Clinton ran a loose and leaky ship during his two White House terms, and many in his old brain trust who are expected to return to the fold for a Hillary Clinton presidential campaign now have careers to tend and outside interests to promote. By contrast, 'Hillaryland' is a disciplined structure of her own design, a tight-knit realm populated by discreet, fiercely devoted aides who have been with the former first lady since her East Wing days, along with newer additions who serve on her Senate staff. Some wonder if her circle is too buffered." Patti Solis Doyle, "a Hillaryland stalwart who was Hillary Clinton's first hire as scheduler in 1992, is expected to be tapped as campaign manager. Doyle, 41, had key roles in both Senate campaigns, and most recently headed up

Hillpac, the well-oiled fundraising arm that drummed up more than $50 million in donations for 2006.

Schwarzenegger Plans To Take His Campaign For Bipartisanship National. The San Francisco Chronicle (12/31, A1, Marinucci, 384K) reports Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "is intent on taking his message of bipartisan cooperation to the rest of the country as part of an ambitious effort aimed at shaping politics on both sides of the aisle. Schwarzenegger wants to press Republicans and Democrats for more 'action, action, action' -- with particular attention to appealing to the growing ranks of decline-to-state and independent voters increasingly turned off by partisan politics. For the California governor, the issues open to bipartisan solutions are as diverse as redistricting, health care and prison reform. But Schwarzenegger doesn't intend to stay within state boundaries as he addresses such matters, planning to make his case in states that will play center stage in presidential politics -- New Hampshire, Ohio and Iowa among them. … Political insiders on both sides of the aisle have speculated that the governor's 'big picture' approach means that he will have more influence as the 2008 presidential race begins in earnest; that means he could act either as an endorser or an active campaigner who could help swing delegate-rich California."

LATimes Notes Schwarzenegger's Successes In 2006. The Los Angeles Times (12/31, 850K) says in an editorial that Schwarzenegger's "year began with an apology and ended with a victory. In other words, it got better as it went along."

Pawlenty Moves Towards The Middle To Start Second Term. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (12/31, Lopez, 395K) reports, "After a brush with political death, a reinvigorated Gov. Tim Pawlenty begins his second term this week facing huge DFL majorities in the Legislature and acknowledging that compromise is no longer optional. Promising a change in agenda and tactics for the legislative session, which will convene Wednesday, Pawlenty has already advocated universal health coverage for Minnesotans, proposed free college tuition for the state's top students, and thrown his weight behind expansions of mass transit and greater reliance on renewable fuels."

Poll Finds Most Americans Maintain Optimistic Outlook. The Washington Times (12/31, A1, Benac, 88K) reports, "An Associated Press-AOL News poll finds that while most Americans said 2006 was a bad year for the country, three-fourths thought it had been a good one for them and their families. … Seventy-two percent of Americans feel good about what 2007 will bring for the country, and an even larger 89 percent are optimistic about the new year for themselves and their families, according to the poll. That fits with a long-term trend suggesting that Americans are generally an optimistic lot. Polling over recent decades is replete with optimism, and with a tendency for people to feel more positively about their own situations than that of the country overall."

December Employment Report Expected To Show Slight Improvement. The New York Times (12/31, BU6, DeAenlle, 1.16M) reports, "The December employment report arrives Friday. A Bloomberg News poll of economists estimates that 115,000 net new jobs were created, a subdued showing after the 132,000 in November."

WPost Notes Virginia GOP's Transportation Deal Talks. The Washington Post (12/31, B6, 690K) editorializes, "Finally, the grown-ups have seen fit to mediate in the spitting match that passes for fraternal relations within Virginia's Republican Party. Northern Virginia's two Republican congressmen, Reps. Thomas M. Davis III and Frank R. Wolf, along with the new state party chairman, Ed Gillespie, and Robert F. McDonnell, the attorney general, are trying to broker an intraparty deal on state funding for transportation. No doubt they have been moved to action by well-founded fear -- fear that voters have grown tired and testy at the ongoing spectacle of the GOP's civil war and fear that the party as a whole will be punished at the ballot box next fall for its contemptible failure to address the state's transportation mess."

Humorist Barry Reviews 2006. Humorist Dave Barry's annual review of the closing year appears in today's Washington Post Magazine (12/30, W18). The piece runs just over 5,000 words.

Bush Directs "Surprising" Tripling Of Aid To Africa. Under the headline, "Bush Has Quietly Tripled Aid To Africa," the Washington Post (12/31, A4, Fletcher, 690K) notes President Bush's "legacy is sure to be defined by his wielding of U.S. military power in Afghanistan and Iraq, but there is another, much softer and less-noticed effort by his administration in foreign affairs: a dramatic increase in U.S. aid to Africa." Bush "has tripled direct humanitarian and development aid to the world's most impoverished continent since taking office and recently vowed to double that increased amount by 2010 -- to nearly $9 billion." Currently, Sudan, Ethiopia, Egypt and Uganda "rank among the world's top 10 recipients in aid from the United States." Those increases "have surprised -- and pleased -- longtime supporters of assistance for Africa, who note that because Bush has received little support from African American voters, he has little obvious political incentive for his interest." The Post adds, "Although some activists criticize Bush for not doing more to end the ongoing genocide in the Darfur region of Sudan, others credit him for playing a role in ending deadly conflicts in Liberia, the Congo and other parts of Sudan. Meanwhile, Bush has overseen a steady rise in U.S. trade with Africa, which has doubled since 2001."

Somali, Ethiopian Troops Close In On Kismayo. In continued reporting on the Somali Interim Government's consolidation of power, the New York Times (12/31, Gettleman, 1.16M) notes, "A phalanx of Ethiopian tanks and armored personnel carriers chugged toward Kismayo, the last city occupied by Somalia's diminished Islamist movement, witnesses said Saturday, while the Islamists inside the city dug in and vowed never to surrender." While the Somali-Ethiopian force was "preparing to seize Kismayo," a key Islamic Courts leader "told his followers that the Islamist leadership was not finished." The Times adds, however, that international diplomats "said that they were talking to moderate representatives of the Islamic movement on Saturday, trying to persuade them to back down."

The Washington Post (12/31, A18, McCrummen, 690K) calls Kismayo "the last stronghold of the Islamic Courts movement," adding, "a major battle between the two sides seemed imminent." The Post reports, "Somalis are growing impatient with the presence of thousands of Ethiopian troops in their country, but Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, who has backed the interim Somali government now in power, has said his military will not pull out until it has captured the most 'extremist' leaders and 'international jihadists' within the Courts movement."

The Washington Times/AFP (12/31) adds the Somali-Ethiopian troops "marched on the last stronghold of the country's powerful Islamist movement yesterday, even as Prime Minister Ali Mohammed Gedi called for dialogue with Islamist leaders." Yesterday, Gedi "warned of serious reprisals if the Islamists followed through on threats to wage a guerrilla campaign." Deputy Prime Minister Mohamed Hussein Aidid "warned that the security situation in the capital, which has long been awash with arms, remained potentially volatile, with 'around 2,000' Islamists thought to have remained behind when the city was taken."

The Los Angeles Times (12/31, Sanders, 850K) notes, "Though most Islamist fighters fled Thursday when troops from Ethiopia and Somalia's transitional government advanced, so far the government is moving cautiously in finishing the pacification and occupation of the capital. Most government soldiers remain on the city outskirts. Only one government agency, the Interior Ministry, has moved back in." That "security vacuum has led to sporadic looting and rioting."

UN Peacekeepers Push Back On UN Request For Darfur Border Force. AFP (12/31) notes international peacekeeping officials within the UN "have rebuffed a call from the Security Council for a force to protect refugees in Chad." The report to the UNSC is quoted saying, "Conditions for an effective UN peacekeeping operation do not seem to be in place at this time. Unless all the parties were to agree to a ceasefire and engage in a dialogue...a UN force would be operating in the midst of continuing hostilities and have no clear exit strategy." AFP cites Financial Times reporting purporting that "the report reflects peacekeepers' concern that they are being asked to do too much around the world."

Castro Tells Cuba His Recovery Is Not "A Lost Battle." The AP (12/31, Snow) reports, "A statement attributed to Fidel Castro on the eve of the revolution's 48th anniversary assured Cubans Saturday that the ailing leader could still recover from his prolonged illness." The media-run message is quoted saying, "I am grateful to you for your affection and support. Regarding my recovery, I have always warned that it could be a prolonged process, but it is far from being a lost battle." The AP says this and similar recent efforts "seemed aimed at ensuring the world that he is recovering, five months after he underwent emergency intestinal surgery." BBC.com (12/31) says Castro told Cubans that "he is recovering slowly from his surgery." He "also thanked the Cuban people for their courage during his recuperation."

A 2,400-word piece on the front page of today's Washington Times (12/31, A1, Hirsch, 88K) keys on US businesses' uncertain future in a post-Castro Cuba. President Bush's hard-line attitude toward Cuba has prompted businesses to pull back from exploring opportunities in the communist nation." Additional "factors hindering the potential of doing business there include the island's small population and poor investment climate, but Mr. Bush's strong stance is the overarching issue, according to government officials, businesses and longtime observers and analysts."

Madrid Ends ETA Talks After Fatal Airport Car Bombing. The AP (12/31, Roman) notes Madrid's decision to end "plans for peace talks" with ETA following yesterday morning's car bombing at the Madrid airport. That "blast left two people missing and 26 injured, most with damage to their ears from the shock wave." Prime Minister Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero "said the government would halt talks with ETA over the bombing. The group had agreed to stop attacks in its cease-fire declaration earlier this year that was seen as the greatest hope in a decade of a peaceful end to the conflict." ETA, which has not claimed responsibility for the attack, has "been warning for months that the peace process was faltering." The Washington Post/AP (12/31, A20)'s version of the AP story is headlined, "Madrid Blast Leaves 2 Missing, 26 Injured." Bloomberg (12/31, Smyth, Ben Sills) reports Madrid announced the shutdown of talks "after concluding [ETA] planted a truck bomb in Madrid's Barajas airport that destroyed a four-story parking structure and left two people presumed dead."

Bulgaria, Romania Will Join EU Tonight. AFP (12/31) reports Sofia and Bucharest "have braced for a double New Year's celebration, with both countries set to become the newest members of the European Union at the stroke of midnight. But with enlargement fatigue gripping large parts of the bloc, the EU's latest and poorest members are likely to be greeted more with a shrug than open arms." AFP adds polling "shows that at the eve of accession 63 percent of all Bulgarians and 69 percent of all Romanians think their eastern European states will largely benefit from EU membership." The "two newcomers will" join Greece as "the only Balkan nations in Europe's rich club, and will play a key role as representatives of a region ravaged by the wars in the former Yugoslavia." They "will be Europe's poorest members with gross domestic product per capita barely reaching one third of the European average," and "will contribute only one percent to the EU's" total GDP.

Russian Politics To Be Dominated By 2007 And 2008 Elections. In its "Week In Review," the New York Times (12/31, WK2, Myers, 1.16M) previews the Russian parliamentary elections scheduled for December. "Elections, even in a 'democracy' as managed as Russia's, have a way of surprising." President Vladimir Putin "is popular enough to ensure that whoever he supports will fare well, but corruption remains deeply rooted, as do poverty and crime and violence, any of which could be a catalyst for an electoral nyet." His "Kremlin is taking no chances," and has sponsored several key election law changes. "New laws against extremism have already been used to raid a political group led by the chess champion Garry Kasparov." Putin "critics said the restrictions would stifle what opposition remains, including what's left of the Communist Party and the old liberal democrats." For his part, Kasparov "says the Kremlin has obscured the seeds of discontent. And they are growing, he says, especially beyond the glow of Moscow's riches." The Times also notes the "maneuvering" ahead of the 2008 vote to replace Putin.

Kazakh Government Balances Pro-Russian Policies With Gulag Legacy. A piece in the New York Times (12/31, A6, Greenberg, 1.16M) explores changing Kazakh attitudes about the gulag system there. "The gulags once spread over the Kazakhstan steppe like a thick wreath. Eleven sprawling camps" were "built shortly after the creation of the Soviet Union" and "were partly emptied to provide soldiers and workers during World War II" before being closed after Stalin's death in 1953. Today, "a large percentage of people have parents or grandparents whose life trajectories were savagely rewired by deportation and imprisonment in the camps. But memories of the gulags are dying," and "for many" young Kazakhs, "the oppression the gulags stand for does not register." The Times adds, "Some of the reasons for a quick and collective forgetting are obvious." In addition to "growing affluence," the Times says "there are political aspects to a sidestepping of Kazakhstan's recent history, too, often born out of the government's determination to stay friendly with Russia." The Times continues, "With Kazakh nationalism having become mostly the purview of the anti-Russia opposition here, the government has had to use other avenues to promote a coherent national identity."

China's Hu Seeks To Bolster Navy, His Political Position. The Los Angeles Times (12/31, Magnier, Landsberg, 850K) notes Chinese President Hu Jintao's Wednesday speech calling for a "strong" navy. "In China, where symbolism often is as important as substance, the address was seen by analysts as serving two functions: to help build a policy consensus and signal [Hu's] near-complete grip on the political field before a key party congress next fall." Calling the Chinese navy "the country's weakest link," the Times says Beijing "is keen to bolster its weak third arm." Hu's "aim is to prevent Taiwan from declaring independence and to safeguard the seaborne trade, oil and other resources needed to power China's booming economy." Beijing's "growing military profile has raised eyebrows at the Pentagon, which fears an erosion of its military dominance in the Pacific and beyond." The Times adds, "Of significance in China's one-party state with its emphasis on political theater, analysts said, was Hu's choice of venues" and his "timing." The "notably careful leader's confident military tone Wednesday and his appearance in military green immediately after a purge of a key [ally of former President Jiang Zemin] in Shanghai suggests he faces no significant opposition across the Chinese political spectrum."

Japan's Abe Criticized For Not Addressing Key "Challenges." Under the headline, "The Buzz On Japan's New Premier: Too Old-school," the Los Angeles Times (12/31, Wallace, 850K) says Japanese Prime Minster Shinzo Abe is "already being mocked." The "developing perception" in Tokyo is "that Japan's youngest postwar prime minister may be an out-of-touch young fogey, more nostalgic for an old Japan than eager to usher in a new one." Some Japanese "contend that his government's focus on nationalist obsessions … is a distraction from the core economic and social issues that present far graver challenges to Japan. They also argue that Abe's government lacks discipline and coherence." The Times adds, "Suspicions that Abe lacks toughness — and control over his party — are contributing to his sudden slip in polls." Despite "a positive start" to his premiership, Abe "has stumbled on the domestic front."

Expanding Israeli Economy Said To Weather Crises. Noting Israel's "typically tumultuous year," the New York Times (12/31, A3, Myre, 1.16M) reports, "Despite the political turmoil and spasms of violence, Israel, it seems, has figured out how to keep its economy charging forward." This year marked "the country's third straight year of strong growth, with the economy expanding nearly 5 percent. The stock market has been hitting record highs; unemployment is at a 10-year low. Israel's central bank is lowering interest rates," and the shekel "is trading at 4.2 to the dollar, its strongest level in five years." However, "the economic tide is not lifting every Israeli boat," and almost 20 percent of Israelis now live below the poverty line. "Critics say this is because Israelis who are struggling economically have seen their benefits fall sharply, while they remain unemployed. The unemployment rate is at its lowest level in a decade, but still relatively high at 8.4 percent." The Times notes that "while the Israeli economy has been thriving, the Palestinian economy has moved in the opposite direction, contracting by an estimated 10 to 15 percent this year, according to the Palestine Monetary Authority." Continued conflict has "devastated" the economy of Palestine, as "Israeli security forces greatly increased the web of restrictions … to prevent attacks," creating "great hardships on Palestinian economic life."

On Eve Of Handover, Annan's Tenure Reviewed. An AP (12/30) analysis piece reviews UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan's decade in office. He is "leaving behind a global organization far more aggressively engaged in peacekeeping and fighting poverty — but struggling to restore its tarnished reputation." Three weeks ago, "Annan said he considered his top achievements the promotion of human rights, fighting to close the gap between extreme poverty and immense wealth, and the U.N.'s campaign to fight AIDS and other infectious diseases." The AP says his "first five-year term culminated in 2001 with the Nobel Peace Prize — shared with the United Nations ," but his "second five-year term was not without shadows," notably the Oil-for-Food scandal.

Under the headline, "Annan Focused On Human Element," the Los Angeles Times (12/31, Farley, 850K) adds Annan "has already begun reflecting on his achievements, frustrations and failures as a leader who embodies the world's ideals, and as a man who often could not escape his limitations to make those ideals a reality." Annan "was mostly an idealist. He would like to be remembered, he said this month, as the leader who pushed the world to agree to intervene to stop genocides, and to try to cut poverty in half.

He sought to make the U.N. about people, not just geopolitics." He was elected in 1996 because "he did not have a political agenda or an overweening ego that could put him in conflict with the U.S. By the end of Annan's decade, however, he grew to be a quiet but compelling challenger to Washington."

WPost Says China, South Korea Hold Key To Containing North Korea. A Washington Post (12/31, B6, 690K) editorial says North Korean leader Kim Jong-il was "justified" in "calculating that" his regime "would not suffer severe consequences for its" nuclear test. His government's "ability to sustain its defiant posture is remarkable because, in contrast to the cases of India or Pakistan, the outside world has the ability to cripple the regime if it chooses." China and South Korea "could remove the lifelines they provide" to Kim if they decided "that stopping North Korea from producing more nuclear weapons was more important than preserving its dictatorship." Washington's "leverage" remains "limited," and Administration critics wrongly "presume that it's possible to change North Korean behavior without the collaboration of its prime benefactors." The Post says the Administration's "best option" is "to work with such allies as Japan to raise the economic pressure on North Korea as much as is possible. Diplomacy is best focused not on Pyongyang, but on Beijing… The aim need not be to bring down [Kim's] regime, only to convince it that its existence will be imperiled rather than secured by nuclear weapons."

Clarke Outlines National Security Issues Beyond Iraq. In a Washington Post (12/31, B1, 690K) op-ed, Richard Clarke criticizes continuing vacancies in "critical slots" in the Administration's national security team, including Deputy Secretary of State and Deputy Director of National Intelligence. "In the end, there are only 12 seats at the conference table in the White House Situation Room, and the key players' schedules mean that they can seldom meet there together in person or on secure video conference for more than about 10 hours each week. When issues don't receive first-tier consideration, they can slip by for months." Clarke identifies "seven key 'fires in the in-box' national security issues:" global warming, Russian "revanchism," Latin America's "leftist lurch," continued warfare in Africa, the US' "freeze" of arms control efforts, the rise in transnational crime, and the continued weakness of the Pakistani-Afghan border. While President Bush "contemplates sending even more U.S. forces into the Iraqi sinkhole," he "must also weigh the opportunity cost of taking his national security barons off all the other critical problems they should be addressing -- problems whose windows of opportunity are slamming shut, unheard over the wail of Baghdad sirens."

Lebanese Said To Be On Verge Of Repeating War's "Mistakes." In a Washington Post (12/31, B2, 690K) op-ed, reporter Lynn Maalouf notes, "Today, as the Lebanese people once again find themselves divided along political and sectarian lines, the question reverberates around the country: Are we about to be drawn into another civil war?" The "lessons" of the 1975-90 civil war "were never learned." In the eventual peace, "there was no victor, no vanquished. No reconciliation process was initiated. An amnesty law passed by the very people who had been fighting one another only weeks earlier exonerated them of war crimes." In 1990, "Lebanon slipped into a state of amnesia. Today, having turned the page on its civil war without achieving closure, it is a country in danger of repeating the past." With an "absence of documented history, Lebanese cling to conflicting narratives of the war and to their selective memories, passing them on to the younger generation."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Al-Zawahri Encourages Islamic Militants To Continue Fighting Worldwide. The AP (12/30) reported that on Saturday a 15-minute audiotaped message by the deputy leader of al-Qaeda was released on a Islamic insurgent website and "accused moderate Arab leaders of being traitors for cooperating with the United States." During the tape, Ayman al-Zawahri "wished the Palestinian people a happy Eid al-Adha but lashed out at Palestinian president Mahmoud Abbas and his Fatah movement" and "urged Muslims in Somalia, Chechnya, Indonesia, the Philippines and Algeria to keep on fighting the "infidels and crusaders." The AP added that al-Zawahri stated that "those who had sold Palestine, the secular traitors, can not be your brothers. Do not recognize their legitimacy" and "do not sign with them the documents that will make you lose Palestine." The AP pointed out that Al-Zawahri "did not mention Saddam Hussein's execution in the tape, suggesting it was made before the ousted leader's hanging on Saturday."

Critics Have Due Process Concerns About Guantanamo Review Boards. The New York Times (12/31, A1, Golden, 1.16M) reports that amid emerging questions and concerns about the legal authority to detain and hold Guantanamo detainees, "a law passed by Congress and signed by President Bush in October" that "prohibits them from challenging their detention or treatment by writs of habeas corpus in the federal courts. Instead, they may only petition a single federal appeals court to examine whether the review boards followed the military's own procedures in reviewing their status as 'enemy combatants.'" Yet "an examination of the Guantánamo review boards by The New York Times suggests that they have often fallen short, not only as a source of due process…but also as a forum to resolve questions about what the detainees have done and the threats they may pose." The Times points out that limitations include "a continuing shortage of information about many detainees," yet "military officials emphasize that the boards are an administrative forum and were never intended to replicate judicial standards of fairness" and "offer prisoners a viable opportunity to rebut the government's evidence."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

State Intelligence Centers Opening Up Nationwide To Collect Terror Data. The Washington Post (12/31, A3, Sheridan, Hsu, 690K) reports that "frustrated by poor federal cooperation, U.S. states and cities are building their own network of intelligence centers led by police to help detect and disrupt terrorist plots. The new 'fusion centers' are now operating in 37 states, including Virginia and Maryland, and another covers the Washington area, according to the Department of Homeland Security. The centers, which have received $380 million in federal support since the 2001 terrorist attacks, pool and analyze information from local, state and federal law enforcement officials. The emerging 'network of networks' marks a new era of opportunity for law enforcement" since "police are hungry for federal intelligence in an age of homegrown terrorism and more sophisticated crime" while "federal law enforcement officials could benefit from a potential army of tipsters." The Post points out that the model of "intelligence-led policing" has fueled some "fears of overzealousness such as that associated with police 'red squads' that spied on civil rights and peace activists decades ago" while "the centers also face practical obstacles…including a shortage of money, skilled analysts, and proven relationships with the FBI and Homeland Security."

Columnist Counts Down "Top 10 Civil Liberties Nightmares Of 2006." In her Washington Post (12/31, B2, 690K) column, Dahlia Lithwick counts down her "top 10 civil liberties nightmares of 2006." They include the "Attempt to Get Death Penalty for Zacarias Moussaoui," the detentions at Guantanamo Bay, "Government Snooping," "Extraordinary Rendition," "Abuse of Jose Padilla," and "The Military Commissions Act of 2006."

Army Corps Of Engineers' New Orleans Levees Study Critiqued. The Los Angeles Times (12/31, Vartabedian, 850K) reports, "When the Army Corps of Engineers admitted in June that design flaws in the New Orleans levee system had caused most of the flooding during Hurricane Katrina, it seemingly left little to argue about. But the fight wasn't over. The Corps is now engaged in an effort to predict how New Orleans would fare in the next big hurricane, and is once again being second-guessed by some of the nation's top civil engineers. The National Research Council complains that the Corps' official investigation into the levee failures reaches premature conclusions, glosses over problems, and fails in its most important task: giving the public the information it needs to make informed decisions about living in New Orleans. The Corps' analysis will play a major role in determining the city's future — including whether more than 200,000 former residents could rebuild abandoned neighborhoods and whether insurers can provide coverage at an affordable rate."

WAR NEWS:

Details, Video Of Saddam Execution Emerge As Ex-Dictator Buried In Town Of Birth. All three broadcast network newscasts were preempted Saturday evening as coverage of the funeral services for President Gerald R. Ford continued. This morning's newspapers are dominated by Ford coverage as well as coverage of the aftermath of the Saturday execution of Saddam Hussein. The Hussein stories generally focus on the latest details of the actual event, as well as world reaction and Hussein's Sunday morning burial in a family plot in Ouja, the town where he was born.

The New York Times (12/31, Burns, 1.16M) reports on its front page that "after nearly three decades of living with the brutal repression of Saddam Hussein and the violent aftermath of his overthrow by American troops, Iraq responded with a mixture of rejoicing, violence and muted reflection on Saturday to the news that their former dictator had been hanged in one of the grimmest of his own execution chambers." Iraqis "spent much of the day crowding around television sets to watch mesmerizing replays of a videotape that showed the 69-year-old Mr. Hussein being led to the gallows at dawn by five masked executioners, and having a noose fashioned from a thick rope of yellow hemp lowered around his neck." While "he seemed almost unnaturally calm and cooperative," the videotape "offered only a partial sense of how Mr. Hussein went to his death, according to accounts given later by some of the 25 people who attended the execution." Those witnesses say Hussein "spent much of his last half-hour…in querulous and at times irascible exchanges with the Shiite guards and executioners assigned to hang him and with some of the Shiite witnesses." The New York Times (12/31, Santora, 1.16M) says in a second front-page story that Hussein "never bowed his head, until his neck snapped. His last words were equally defiant. 'Down with the traitors, the Americans, the spies and the Persians.'"

The Los Angeles Times (12/31, Gold, 850K) says "a video of the hanging, which was apparently shot on a cellphone," surfaced online quickly, "underscoring how quickly controversial images rocket through cyberspace, whether or not there have been attempts to control them. The jerky images show the noose being placed around Hussein's neck and angry shouts exchanged between him and those in attendance. Hussein can be seen falling through the trapdoor as it opens, but the actual hanging is not visible. Moments later, the camera pans in and shows his face." The Washington Post (12/31, D1, Kennicott, 690K) writes about the "viral video" dissemination of the footage, calling it "the first great Shakespearean death scene of the YouTube generation."

In a New York Times (12/31, WK1, Burns, 1.16M) "Week in Review" piece, John F. Burns writes, "Saddam's death was to be a miserable and lonely one, as stark and undignified as Iraq's new rulers can devise." The Washington Post (12/31, Raghavan, 690K) reports on its front page that just before he died, "Hussein said, 'Ya Allah,' preparing himself for the platform he stood on to open up. Suddenly, witnesses recalled, the room erupted in Shiite religious chants as the Shiite Muslims in the audience seized the moment they had long sought. One man yelled, 'Moqtada, Moqtada, Moqtada,' unveiling his loyalty to radical anti-American cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. Hussein smiled, the witnesses said, and asked sarcastically, 'Moqtada?'"

The Washington Times (12/31, Frayer, 88K) reports on its front page that in Sadr City, "victims of Saddam's three decades of autocratic rule took to the streets celebrating, dancing, beating drums and hanging Saddam in effigy. Celebratory gunfire erupted in other Shi'ite neighborhoods across the country. Outside the Sunni insurgent stronghold of Ramadi, west of the capital, loyalists marched with Saddam pictures and waved Iraqi flags." Another New York Times (12/31, Tavernise, 1.16M) front-page report says "for Shiites, long oppressed, it was a moment of intense release," but Sunnis "were skeptical. After three years of grinding violence and abuses by the Shiite government security forces, trust has all but fallen away, and few feel genuinely represented by the government. Most, in fact, are afraid of it."

The Washington Post (12/31, A21, Trejos, 690K) reports that for some Iraqis, "he might as well have died three years ago." Most "once feared Hussein," but "three years later, Iraqis are still a terrorized people. Now, instead of Hussein, they fear the car bombs that maim and kill every day, the kidnappers who snatch people off the streets in broad daylight, the mortar shells that fall on residential neighborhoods . And they fear each other, as Shiite Muslims fight Sunni Arabs in what is spiraling into a civil war."

The New York Times (12/31, A11, Simons, 1.16M) says Hussein "was the first former leader to be tried by a domestic court for crimes against humanity -- a crime enshrined in international law -- and put to death for it." His execution

"stands out because the new international legal institutions, like the International Criminal Court and the temporary tribunals that are trying war crimes cases in the former Yugoslavia, Rwanda and Sierra Leone, do not impose the death penalty."

Hussein Buried In Family Plot. The AP (12/31) reports, "Saddam was buried shortly before dawn Sunday in a family plot in the cemetery in Ouja, the town of his birth. Few were present for the internment near Tikrit, 130 kilometers (80 miles) north of Baghdad." He "was buried near the graves of his sons Uday and Qusay in the main town cemetery. The sons and a grandson were killed in a gunbattle with the American forces in Mosul in July 2003." BBC.com (12/31) says the ceremony was "sparsely attended."

"Chief Nemesis Of The Bush Family" Now Gone. Examining Hussein's impact on the presidencies of both the elder and the younger George Bush, the Washington Post (12/31, A21, Baker, 690K) writes that "the day after he ordered a cease-fire and brought the Persian Gulf War to a close, President George H.W. Bush ruminated about the status quo he had left behind in Iraq. 'Still no feeling of euphoria,' he dictated to his diary Feb. 28, 1991. Saddam Hussein, he recognized, remained a threat. 'He's got to go,' Bush concluded. It took nearly 16 years, but he's finally gone. And with Hussein's execution in Baghdad, so is the chief nemesis of the Bush family, a man who bedeviled father-and-son presidents and in different ways dominated both of their administrations. The long, tortured arc of the Bush-Hussein relationship that shaped recent U.S. history finally came to a close with the snap of a noose."

BBC.com (12/30, Frei) writes that "when Saddam Hussein looked in disbelief at the over-sized noose that was fitted by masked volunteers around his neck, the man who helped to put it there by invading Iraq and toppling the dictator was soundly asleep at his ranch in Texas. It was only nine o'clock in the evening in Crawford but George Bush was already embedded in the land of nod, with orders not to be woken until the morning. The blithe indifference of deep slumber was the final snub to the dead man who once described himself as 'Salahadin II', 'the Redeemer of all the Arabs' and 'the Lion of Baghdad.'"

World Leaders Offer Cautious Reactions. The New York Times (12/31, A12, Cowell, 1.16M) reports, "Western politicians sought a cautious balance on Saturday between revulsion at his record, support for his executioners and concern at the use of a capital penalty they largely shun in their own countries," as "religious leaders -- Christian and Muslim -- used stronger and more critical language in response to the news of Mr. Hussein's execution."

The Los Angeles Times (12/31, Wilkinson, Murphy, 850K) reports that while "the death penalty is anathema across Europe, and opposition to the execution of Saddam Hussein was nearly unanimous among its leaders Saturday," many "were torn between those strongly held beliefs and revulsion for the former Iraqi dictator's record of atrocities." A spokesman for Pope Benedict XVI said "the execution 'is tragic news…that risks feeding the spirit of revenge and sowing new violence,'" and "several European leaders, spanning the political spectrum, questioned whether justice was served by Hussein's execution and said it could bring further bloodshed."

Mixed Reactions Among Iraqi Americans. The Washington Post (12/31, A21, Hernandez, 690K) reports that among Iraqi Americans, "the emotions that accompanied Hussein's execution were complex, ranging from jubilant to relieved to disappointed," with most pleased he is gone, but some fearing the quick carrying out of the death sentence will, as one said, "give the impression that this was vengeance" and not justice. The Houston Chronicle (12/31, Viren, Carroll, 530K) reports on similar mixed reactions among Iraqis living in the Houston area. One man said, "Some were happy. Some were not."

Some Arabs Displeased By Execution. The New York Times (12/31, A13, Fattah, 1.16M) reports that even Arabs "who celebrated America's embrace of the rule of law" in Iraq felt the quick execution "left a bitter taste of stolen justice. Even Mr. Hussein's staunchest enemies expressed a sense of bitterness at the end." BBC.com (12/30, Pannell) says news of Hussein's death "has been greeted with a mixture of surprise and anger in some quarters -- and notable silence in others." The Los Angeles Times (12/31, Zavis, 850K) writes that many Kurds are conflicted as well, pleased by Hussein's death but upset that he will not be brought to justice for atrocities against their people.

Newsday (12/31, Bazzi) says the "timing and drama" surrounding the execution "makes it likely that he will become a martyr for Sunni nationalists fighting U.S. forces and the new Iraqi government." But as the Minneapolis Star Tribune (12/31, 395K) reports, Iraqi government leaders "sought to tell a different story, saying Saddam's trip to the gallows should become a turning point in Iraq's strife. Referring to leaders of the Sunni insurgency, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said in a statement, 'Saddam's execution puts an end to all their pathetic gambles on a return to dictatorship.'"

Division That Captured Hussein Surprised By Quick Execution. The New York Times (12/31, A14, Blumenthal, 1.16M) reports on the Fourth Infantry Division, which captured Hussein in 2003. Now back in Killeen, Texas, "the soldiers of Fort Hood had better things to do than to count down a dictator's final minutes. … As word spread, soldiers in sweatshirts and turned-around ball caps seemed surprised that the sentence would be carried out so quickly, wondering aloud whether it would be shown on television."

US Television News Kept "Overnight Death Watch." The New York Times (12/31, A14, Stanley, 1.16M) writes, "Of course American television was going to show Saddam Hussein's execution. In a medium that feeds on immediacy, it was just a question of not having to wait too long to see it. And the coverage of the Iraqi dictator's last moments turned out to be an enervating, overnight death watch."

More Commentary. In his Washington Post (12/31, B7, 690K) column, Jim Hoagland writes, "Dictators die harder than most of us. Having wielded unlimited power in life, they seem to be sustained by a stubborn belief in their ability to stare down death, too. In his final moments yesterday, Saddam Hussein refused the offer of a hood to cover his eyes. Such defiance lends a particularly morbid quality to the last days of dictators such as Hussein and the now-infirm Fidel Castro. They follow in the reluctant footsteps of Spain's Francisco Franco and of many other tyrants-in-extremis before el rais Saddam and el jefe Fidel were confronted, respectively, with a hangman's rope and the withering ravages of disease. … I suspect that Hussein preferred to go out in a grim finale that will be portrayed by his disciples as victor's justice than to waste away, in solitude and yet under the public's watchful gaze, as Castro is doing in Havana."

In a Los Angeles Times (12/31, 850K) op-ed, journalist Christopher Hitchens writes, "Almost every transfer of power in Baghdad for the last half a century has been accompanied by the killing of the previous incumbents. British-backed Prime Minister Nuri Said was dragged through the streets and torn to shreds in 1958; his remains were then dug up and run over by cars. I remember as a boy seeing one of his replacements, the pro-communist Abdul Karim Qassim, on television, his head lolling after the attentions of a Baathist firing squad. The most lurid of all these moments, in this most bitter and harsh society, came with the sadistic video that Hussein himself made of the purge of his party after his seizure of power. Nobody who has seen that footage -- of terrified men dragged by goons from the room, while the survivors weep with fear and relief and Hussein indulges in a luxurious cigar -- is likely to forget it. And this atrocity was only the curtain raiser to further orgies of mass murder and torture of which we have unimpeachable evidence from the regime's own archives."

At Least 68 Die In Iraq Bombings; Six US Service Members Killed. The AP (12/30) reports, "Bombings killed at least 68 people in Iraq on Saturday, including one planted on a minibus that exploded in a fish market in a mostly Shiite town south of Baghdad. ... Despite concerns about a spike in unrest, Saturday's violence was not unusually high and there was no indication it was related to the execution. The U.S. military also announced the deaths of three Marines and three soldiers, making December the year's deadliest month for U.S. troops in Iraq, with 109 service members killed.

CNN.com (12/30) reports "at least 75 dead," stating that the UK "announced its 127th death in the war," caused by a roadside bombing in Basra. One bomb in Kufa killed at least 30; CNN.com adds, "Kufa is part of the key southern province of Najaf. U.S. troops handed security control of the area to Iraqi troops and police last week. The transfer is considered the most significant so far because of Najaf's religious importance."

Shiite Hostages' Kin Fear Reprisal Killings After Saddam Execution. The Washington Times/London Sunday Telegraph (12/31, Hussein) reports, "The families of hundreds of Shi'ite men snatched off the streets by Sunni extremists are waiting to hear their fate after kidnappers threatened to kill them if the execution of Saddam Hussein went ahead. As many as 450 men are thought to have been seized by Sunni militants during the past two months as hostages against the execution. ... The seizures went on for two months before Iraqi army units moved into the area and shut down the checkpoints."

Soldiers Doubt Any Impact Of Execution On Deployment Length. The AP (12/30, Hurst), in an article primarily about Saddam Hussein's last words, reports on the pessimism of some US soldiers in Iraq. Quoted are "members of the Army's 2nd Battalion, 17th Field Artillery Regiment, on patrol in an overwhelmingly Shiite neighborhood in eastern Baghdad," who "said the execution wouldn't get them home any faster — and therefore didn't make much difference."

US Appears Accustomed To Servicewomen's Deaths. The Washington Post (12/31, A18, George, 690K) reports on a memorial wall at Fort Lee, Virginia, that lists "soldiers who have died in the combat zones of Iraq and Afghanistan: PFC Lori Piestewa, CPT Kimberly Hampton, SPC Lizbeth Robles, SGT Jessica Housby… All 59 are women. They are casualties in a conflict that has seen women serving in larger numbers than before, in a wider array of jobs, amid violence that heeds no front line. ... In all, 62 service women from all branches have died in Iraq, about two-thirds of them in hostile fire. By comparison, in World War II, historians say, 16 women were killed in action. In Vietnam, one woman's life was claimed by enemy fire; in the Persian Gulf War, five. Most previous female casualties were nurses. Now the female dead include military police, truck drivers, intelligence analysts, helicopter pilots, medics, mechanics, media escorts and kitchen managers. At least 13 left behind children." However, rather than causing a "public outcry" predicted by experts, the deaths "appear to have melded into the nation's experience of war."

LAPD Officers Return From Military Duty In Iraq. The Los Angeles Times (12/31, McGreevy, 850K)

reports on Los Angeles police officers who served in Iraq, saying "dozens of LAPD officers who have returned to the sometimes dangerous streets of Los Angeles after being deployed as military reservists to the meaner streets of Iraq. ... Experts estimate that more than 500 peace officers in California have been called to active military duty since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks."

Eikenberry Predicts More Fighting In Afghanistan. The AP (12/30, Straziuso) reports, "The outgoing U.S. commander in Afghanistan predicted more fighting this spring and summer and said Taliban militants would try to overrun towns to 'unhinge the Afghan people's morale.' Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry also said the recent killing of a high-level Taliban commander shows that fugitives such as Osama bin Laden and Mullah Omar will one day slip up, and that the U.S. will strike." However, he "said none of the Taliban's efforts would provide "a significant military challenge" for U.S., NATO and Afghan forces, which he said have improved greatly in the last year."

Ring Road Shows Challenges Of Afghanistan. In a story exceeding 3,400 words, the Los Angeles Times (12/31, Watson, 850K) reports on Afghanistan's Ring Road: "tell war-hardened Afghans that you're going to travel its entire 1,373-mile length unarmed, facing winter and a raging insurgency, and they look at you like you're completely mad. Five years after the fall of the Taliban, it shouldn't be such a challenge. Rebuilding the two-lane highway that connects Afghanistan's major cities has been a centerpiece of the U.S.-led effort to transform the nation. ... But as with many things in Afghanistan, there is a chasm between the rhetoric and reality. Some of the best stretches of the road are among the Taliban's favorite killing grounds. ... About 40% of the road isn't finished." The Times describes a journey along the road: "On the way, we managed to avoid a Taliban ambush, a potential kidnapper or highway robber, a suicide bomber and a gunman who fired close enough to take off one of our heads."

Scholars Oppose Growth Of Army. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (12/31, B7, 690K), Woodrow Wilson International Center scholars Gordon Adams and John Diamond write about proposals to permanently increase the Army, "This proposal is a bad idea. It is irrelevant to the stresses the Army is experiencing in Iraq. It would build enormous long-term costs into the defense budget, and it presumes a role in the world for the U.S. military that the voters emphatically opposed in November." Instead, Adams and Diamond suggest, "A program of troop reductions and phased redeployment from Iraq would in effect increase the size of the Army by relieving the force of a burdensome, costly and unproductive mission. There will be opportunities to retrain and reequip to redress the shortcomings in armor and tactics so neglected by the Rumsfeld Pentagon."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Texas Program Aimed At Catching Internet Predators Seen As Model. The Houston Chronicle (12/31, Pape) reports, "Sugar Land's Internet safety program is being hailed as a 'best practice' by the U.S. Conference of Mayors, as well as being featured as a model during a recent U.S. Department of Justice summit in Washington, D.C." The Chronicle continues, "Mayor David Wallace was invited to present his city's 'Keep Kids E-Safe' initiative to more than 1,000 mayors from across the nation, as well as to justice department personnel looking for ways to combat the increasing problem of cyberpredators. … The program has received national attention as an innovative cross-sector collaboration involving all levels of government, nonprofit organizations and the business community, city officials said. Keep Kids E-Safe utilizes education, enforcement and prevention to help parents, families and communities protect children from online predators." The Chronicle adds, "Wallace said that he first realized how serious the problem was after seeing an undercover investigation conducted by NBC's Dateline news magazine more than a year ago. … Wallace talked to members of the Mayor's Youth Advisory Council to see if they would be interested in taking on a possible project. The 125-member council is a city-sponsored teen group that provides government leaders insight into the development of programs and services impacting young people."

WPost Describes Death Penalty As "A Creature Of…The South, And Texas." The Washington Post (12/31, B6, 690K) editorializes, "2006 saw the fewest executions in the United States in a decade, 53. The use of capital punishment has been dropping since 1999, when 98 people were executed. The number of new death sentences is also falling precipitously, according to data from the Death Penalty Information Center, and the number of people on death row is dropping off as well. At least for now, capital punishment remains in retreat. Perhaps the most striking indicator of this retreat is the degree to which executions are becoming a local phenomenon. While the preponderance of states have a death penalty, very few use it as a routine feature of their criminal justice systems. This year, 14 states carried out executions, but only six of them -- Texas, Ohio, North Carolina, Florida, Oklahoma and Virginia -- carried out more than one. Together, these states accounted for 85 percent of executions this year. All by itself, Texas, which executed 24 people, accumulated 45 percent. Over the previous three years, the leading six states for executions accounted for between 70 and 83 percent of executions annually. The less the death penalty gets used, the more it becomes a creature of its heartland: the South, and Texas especially."

Broder Revisits Column On Rove And Plame. The Washington Post's David Broder (12/31, B7) writes a "column that drew great protest was one in which I took my colleagues in the media to task for their treatment of Karl Rove in the Valerie Plame leak investigation. When the special prosecutor announced that he was not charging Rove with anything, I reviewed some of the many articles that had accused the White House aide of masterminding the 'outing' of Plame and said that an apology was in order. The e-mail and letter writers argued that the simple fact that Rove had escaped prosecution did not mean that he was innocent of using his position to harass and frustrate critics of the administration. … But I still believe that there is an important cautionary tale for the media in the Rove-Plame story. Too many of us got way ahead of the facts and let our suspicions grow into assumptions and assertions for which we had no evidence."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Finds Problems At Delaware Prisons. The Wilmington (DE) News Journal (12/31, Williams, Parra) reports, "Delaware Correctional Center near Smyrna is among the Delaware prisons looking at major changes in inmate health care after an investigation by the U.S. Department of Justice found the prison system guilty of civil rights violations." The Journal continues, "It's been more than a year since a coalition of concerned citizens, lawmakers and clergy marched on the governor's mansion and knelt in prayer asking for better health care for inmates in Delaware's prisons. They were galvanized by horrific conditions outlined in a series of stories in The News Journal, the first of which appeared in late September 2005 -- a series Correction Commissioner Stan Taylor charged was 'sloppy reporting' in a five-page response the newspaper published." The Journal adds, "On Friday, following a nine-month investigation, the U.S. Department of Justice announced that federal investigators found "substantial civil rights violations" inside four Delaware prisons. For example, the report noted, flesh-eating bacteria inside Gander Hill prison went undiagnosed and untreated, placing "inmates and staff at risk of acquiring the infection and passing it to others in the community." … Taylor and Attorney General Carl Danberg signed an 87-point agreement with the federal government that calls for sweeping changes in Delaware's penal institutions. The state promised to correct the deficiencies and 'meet generally accepted professional standards.' However, the state did not admit to violating any inmate's civil rights or breaking any other federal law. … Federal prison regulators identified a host of problems inside prisons, including inadequate screening and health assessments, inadequate treatment of inmates with infectious diseases, inadequate treatment of inmates with serious mental illness, and deficiencies in the state's suicide-prevention measures. … They found substantial civil rights violations at Baylor Women's Correctional Institution, Young Correctional Institution, the Delaware Correctional Center and the Sussex Correctional Institution."

Increased Scrutiny Of DOJ Is On Rights Groups' Agenda. The Detroit Free Press/Gannett (12/31, Berry) reports, "With Democrats taking control of Congress on Monday, civil rights groups will be pressing for an aggressive agenda that includes a ban on racial profiling, an overhaul in some election practices and stepped up oversight of the Justice Department." Gannett continues, "Because of last month's vote in Michigan, civil rights advocates also may urge Congress to take a stand on affirmative action, depending on the outcome of several cases before the U.S. Supreme Court. … Advocates are concerned about the potential national implications of Michigan's Proposal 2 initiative approved in November that bans racial preferences in state hiring and university admissions. … 'We will be looking to see if there is any role for Congress to play,' said John Britton, chief counsel for the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law." Gannett adds, "Advocates say civil rights issues are more likely to have a platform and encounter less resistance than in the Republican-controlled Congress, especially with members of the Congressional Black Caucus heading powerful committees, including Rep. John Conyers of Detroit on the Judiciary Committee. … But experts caution that civil rights issues must compete with other Democratic priorities, such as high college costs, minimum wage increases and accessible health care. … 'Congress is going to have a lot on its plate. ... It's going to be a bit of a climb uphill' for some civil rights issues, said Hugh Price, a senior fellow with the Brookings Institution and former president of the National Urban League."

Kennedy's Opinion Expected To Determine Outcome Of SCOTUS Abortion Cases. The New York Times (12/31, WK2, Greenhouse, 1.16M) reports, "The coming months will be a testing time for the young Roberts court, including decisions due by early summer on abortion, school integration and environmental policy, with an unusually large emphasis on cases of significance to the business community. Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. has spoken often of the virtues of a court that speaks modestly and unanimously. Those goals may well prove elusive. The court's conservative bloc reached out to hear challenges to voluntary integration plans put in place by the public school systems of Louisville, Ky., and Seattle, which had been upheld by lower courts. … The Nov. 8 arguments in two cases on the constitutionality of the federal Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003 did not provide such a clear basis for prediction. Instead, they served to showcase Justice Anthony M. Kennedy's position at the center of a court that is closely divided in cases that Justice Antonin Scalia has described as battles in the culture war." Justice Kennedy "did not tip his hand during the abortion arguments. But enough other justices tipped theirs to make clear that the first federal statute ever to make an abortion procedure a crime will stand or fall depending on Justice Kennedy's opinion."

Will Predicts SCOTUS Will Hear McCain-Feingold Challenge. In his column for the Washington Post (12/31, B7, 690K) George Will writes, "A three-judge federal court recently tugged a thread that may begin the unraveling of the fabric of murky laws and regulations that traduce the First Amendment by suppressing political speech. Divided 2 to 1, the court held -- unremarkably, you might think -- that issue advocacy ads can run during an election campaign, when they matter most. This decision will strike zealous (there is no other kind) advocates of ever-tighter regulation of political speech (campaign finance 'reformers') as ominous. Why? Because it partially emancipates millions of Americans who incorporate thousands of groups to advocate their causes, groups such as the American Civil Liberties Union and the National Rifle Association. And Wisconsin Right to Life. … The Wisconsin Right to Life case is probably heading for the Supreme Court. There, Justice Samuel Alito occupies the chair that Sandra Day O'Connor occupied when she voted with the majority in the 5 to 4 ruling that upheld McCain-Feingold."

ANTITRUST:

States Take Closer Look At Airline Takeover. The Salt Lake Tribune (12/31) reports, "Utah Attorney General Mark Shurtleff isn't opposed to US Airways' hostile bid for Delta Air Lines - yet. … But that could change in the coming weeks. The top law enforcement officer in Utah, who waged an antitrust fight against Microsoft Corp. a few years back, has teamed up with attorneys general in a dozen other states to investigate the impact of a Delta buyout on airline competition and ticket prices. … 'It looks like and smells like a classic redundant merger, which often is anti-competitive and sometimes does violate antitrust laws. If we conclude that it is, then we can possibly bring an action to stop it,' Shurtleff said last week." The Tribune continues, "In most cases, states have authority to challenge corporate mergers. The airline industry, however, is the one area where states are powerless to approve or reject mergers out of hand. That power is the sole right of the U.S. Department of Justice, said Jim Dick, an attorney who worked in the antitrust division of the Justice Department and whose private practice involves antitrust work in the airline industry. … 'The states don't have a role. What they can do, though, is have an investigation and present their findings to the Justice Department, which is very likely to give them serious consideration,' said Dick, who works in Washington, D.C., for the Cleveland-based law firm of Squires Sanders and Dempsey." The Tribune adds, "The investigation, already two weeks old, is a race against time. Delta, which has spurned the offer, is plowing forward with its plan to exit bankruptcy as a free-standing airline before next summer. The No. 3 U.S. carrier has set a meeting Feb. 7 with a federal judge to show why the plan contains enough information for creditors to vote on it. … At the same time, US Airways continues to assert that its $8.4 billion offer provides more value to creditors than Delta's stand-alone plan. US Airways contends that the merger could be completed in the first half of 2007 and should be done while Delta is in bankruptcy. And spokesman Philip Gee says his Tempe, Ariz.-based airline believes its offer to buy Atlanta-based Delta will pass antitrust review. … 'That is based on a thorough city-pair-by-city pair analysis, the type the Department of Justice will perform,' Gee said."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Bruno Defends Himself As FBI Investigates His Business Dealings. The New York Times (12/31, Cooper) reports New York's State Senate President Joseph L. Bruno "finds himself on the defensive as never before. The F.B.I. is investigating his business ties, newspapers are exploring his financial relationships with people seeking help from the state, some Republicans are grumbling that he is tarnishing their troubled party, and for the first time, a member of his conference, Senator John J. Bonacic, a Hudson Valley Republican, is calling on Mr. Bruno to step down." Bruno "bristled at news reports that the federal government was investigating his decision to award a $500,000 member item grant — the type that goes to individual lawmakers' pet projects — to Evident Technologies, a company with a former director, Jared Abbruzzese, who had business dealings with Mr. Bruno. Mr. Bruno said that the state gave aid to Evident before he did, and that the money was intended to keep the company from moving out of state. ;It gets me a little bit excited, because they all want to moan and groan and point to Evident,' he said in his office. 'Evident is one of the most worthwhile projects to be funded that I have funded. Now the fact that a friend of mine, it turns out, that I had a financial relationship with — too damn bad. What am I, a second-class citizen? Is he a second-class citizen? We vetted that through the whole process, O.K.?'

FBI Accused Of Failing To Follow Additional Leads Related To Oklahoma City Bombing. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette's Jack Kelly (12/31) wrote, "The House International Relations committee issued a report last week criticizing the FBI's investigation of the 1995 bombing of the federal building in Oklahoma City. The FBI failed to pursue credible information that Timothy McVeigh and Terry Nichols had help, the committee said. The FBI shouldn't have abandoned its search for John Doe No. 2, the committee said. Jayna Davis, then a reporter for a television station in Oklahoma City, said she found at least 20 witnesses who identified Hussain al-Hussaini, a former Iraqi soldier, as the man they saw with Timothy McVeigh. And the FBI should have investigated more thoroughly contacts between Mr. McVeigh and Andreas Strassmeir, a German national who was a paramilitary instructor at Elohim City, a neo-Nazi compound near the Arkansas border, the committee said. The FBI says its investigation was exhaustive, but the discovery just two years ago of a large cache of explosives in a house in which Mr. Nichols lived (and which the FBI had searched) casts some doubt on that claim. Investigative reporter Peter Lance has just completed his third book describing FBI blunders (or worse) in the war on terror. … If what Mr. Lance says is true -- if only a small fraction of what Mr. Lance says is true -- the best that can be said of the FBI is that it has been grossly negligent. A story in the New York Sun Wednesday also does not inspire confidence in the bureau. According to an FBI court filing, the files in 22 of 94 investigations into leaks of classified information are missing. 'Knowing what I know, I can confidently say that until the investigative responsibilities for terrorism are removed from the FBI, I won't feel safe,' said former FBI agent Robert Wright in June 2001. Reading Mr. Lance's book won't make him feel any safer." This column also appeared in the Toledo Blade (OH) (12/31).

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House Ethics Committee Warns Conyers On Use Of Staff. RollCall.com (12/30, Davis) reports, "The House ethics committee concluded its three-year inquiry into incoming Judiciary Chairman John Conyers on Friday, voting to take no punitive action against the Michigan Democrat but warning him not to use Congressional staff for any campaign or personal purposes in the future. The inquiry was self-initiated by the ethics panel following news reports in December 2003 that Conyers had on multiple occasions demanded his Congressional staff do both political work outside of their official duties as well as personal errands and favors for the lawmaker and his wife, such as babysitting and tutoring his children."

The Hill (12/30, Kaplan, Kucinich) reports on its web site, "The top Republican and Democratic members on the ethics panel, Reps. Doc Hastings (R-Wash.) and Howard Berman (D-Calif.), said in a statement that Conyers acknowledged a 'lack of clarity' in communicating what was expected of his official staff and that he accepted responsibility for his actions. '[Conyers] agreed to take a number of additional, significant steps to ensure that his office complies with all rules and standards regarding campaign and personal work by congressional staff,' they stated. 'We have concluded that this matter should be resolved through the issuance of this public statement.' The finding by the ethics panel could spark debate, and perhaps eclipse, the first week of the incoming-Democratic majority's plans to change the House ethics rules, as well as raise questions about Conyers' standing to chair the Judiciary Committee."

LATimes Rates Bush's 2006 Performance. The Los Angeles Times (12/31, 850K) editorializes, "It's that time of year, when the drones of corporate America gather their No. 2 pencils and call over to human resources for all the personnel files. … Wat if our elected officials had to fit their year's accomplishments on the same kind of form with which millions of the rest of us are familiar? For President Bush, the results would not be encouraging." The Times is almost exclusively critical of the president, but rates his "Financial management" as "Exceeds expectations," noting, "Federal budget deficit is smaller than expected, though employee's insistence that this is a result of his tax cuts is unpersuasive. Also, after the election, indicated that he was open to fresh talks with Democrats about Social Security."

Kristof Offers Suggestions For Enhancing Bush's Legacy. The New York Times' Nicholas Kristof (12/31, WK9) offers "Ten Suggestions For Rescuing The Bush Legacy," writing, "Particularly after all the tributes to Gerald Ford in the last few days, President Bush may be pondering his own legacy and obituary. Sorry, Mr. Bush, but it doesn't look good right now, with your obit perhaps beginning something like this: 'George W. Bush, who achieved tremendous acclaim for his handling of the 9/11 terror attacks but left office vilified and disgraced, mired in the Iraq war and stalemated at home, his hard-line partisan tactics souring the electorate and crippling his beloved Republican Party for a generation, died. ...'But Mr. Bush, your plight isn't hopeless. In the holiday spirit, let me offer you 10 suggestions for what you can do in 2007 to try to rescue your legacy." The first suggestion is "seriously engage Iraq's nastier neighbors, including Iran and Syria, and renounce permanent military bases in Iraq."

NYTimes Suggests Areas Of Expansion For NCLB. The New York Times (12/31, WK7, 1.16M), in an editorial, writes, "The No Child Left Behind Act broke new ground when it required the states to educate impoverished children up to the same standards as their affluent counterparts, in exchange for federal aid. … The achievement gains have fallen far short of what Congress hoped for when it passed the landmark federal law — and also far short of what the country needs to keep pace with its economic rivals . In addition, student performance has flattened in recent years. … With the easy achievement gains already behind us, the next level of progress will require rigorous systemic change. The states, for example, will need to adopt rigorous examinations that track the federal test, the National Assessment of Educational Progress, more closely. They will have to crack down on state teachers colleges that turn out poor graduates, and devise ways — including differential pay — to persuade highly qualified teachers to work in failing schools that they have historically avoided. To move forward, the country must also find new ways to support and transform failing schools, beyond labeling them failures and presuming that the stigma will inspire better performance."

WPost Criticizes Pelosi's Decision On C-SPAN Access. The Washington Post (12/31, B6, 690K), in an editorial, writes, "Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) pledged to run the 'most open' Congress in history. Unfortunately, that promise doesn't seem to extend to letting the American people see what's really happening on the House floor. In a letter released the Friday before Christmas, Ms. Pelosi delivered a lump of coal to C-SPAN, which had asked to be freed from the restrictive rules that -- since House proceedings first were televised in 1979 -- have kept the cameras under control of the House and limited footage to tight shots of the podium or the lawmaker who's speaking. Senate rules are similarly constraining. As C-SPAN's president, Brian Lamb, explained in his letter to Ms. Pelosi asking that the cable network's cameras be permitted in the chamber, 'This compromise was crafted long ago to convince wary members to allow congressional sessions to be televised, and in the ensuing years it has become an anachronism that does a disservice to the institution and to the public."

NYTimes Says Social Security Fix Must Include Benefit Cuts, Tax Increases. A New York Times (12/31, WK7, 1.16M) editorial today disputes the use of the Chilean retirement model as a template for changes to the US Social Security system. "The overarching problem for Chile — and the real lesson for the United States — is that private savings are not a substitute for a guaranteed core tier of old-age support." Calling the primary measure of success "whether the system as a whole provides basic dignity for all," the Times says "Chile's privatized system has failed and Social Security has succeeded." Social Security should combine "modest benefit cuts" with "modest tax increases." Achieving that goal "would require sacrifices from both political parties," because "tax increases must be a part of any plausible Social Security reform mix." If a tax increase is not considered, "severe benefit cuts become unavoidable." The Times concludes, "As the debate unfolds anew in 2007, another vital lesson to remember from the Chilean experience is that institutions, once dismantled, are not easily restored."

OTHER NEWS:

Cheney Among Those Honoring Ford At Capitol. The Washington Post (12/31, A1, Ruane, 690K) reports, "Washington welcomed the body of former president Gerald R. Ford last evening. … It was attended by modest but somber crowds that lined the avenues of Alexandria, where the former president once lived. People also gathered in silence as his hearse, and the limousine bearing his wife, Betty, 88, paused beside the flickering fountains of the World War II Memorial. The cortege of about 40 vehicles then moved slowly along the broad and empty expanse of Constitution Avenue toward the gleaming dome of the Capitol, bright against the night sky." The Post notes, "President Bush did not attend last night's ceremonies. He and first lady Laura Bush plan to pay respects tomorrow, when they return to Washington from Texas. Bush also plans to speak at Ford's funeral Tuesday at Washington National Cathedral." The Washington Times (12/31, A1, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports, "It was noted repeatedly that Mr. Ford never aspired to be president, but served honorably after the Watergate scandal forced Richard M. Nixon to resign. 'President Ford proved as worthy of that office as any who had ever come before,' said Vice President Dick Cheney, who served as Mr. Ford's chief of staff. 'He assumed power without assuming airs; he knew how to treat people. He answered courtesy with courtesy; he answered discourtesy with courtesy.' Mr. Cheney also addressed the 38th president's decision to pardon Mr. Nixon, which was so divisive at the time that it probably cost him the 1976 election. 'It was this man, Gerald R. Ford, who led our republic safely though a crisis that could have turned to catastrophe,' he said. 'Gerald Ford was almost alone in understanding that there can be no healing without pardon.'" The AP (12/30, Woodward, Wilson) reports, "Ford's decision to pardon Nixon, so divisive at the time that it probably cost him the 1976 election, was dealt with squarely in his funeral services by his old chief of staff", Cheney. The New York Times (12/31, A19, Kornblut, 1.16M) reports, "Representative J. Dennis Hastert, the departing House speaker, recalled that 'in the summer of 1974, America didn't need a philosopher-king or a warrior-prince, an aloof aristocrat or a populist firebrand.' 'We needed a healer; we needed a rock,' Mr. Hastert said. 'We needed honesty, candor and courage. We needed Gerald Ford.'"

The AP (12/30) reports, "Hundreds of ordinary Americans lined up for a chance to view the closed, flag-draped casket of the 38th president late into the night and through the weekend. … The Washington portion of Ford's state funeral opened with a procession that took his casket from Maryland to Virginia and then over the Memorial Bridge -- dressed in flags and funeral bunting -- to the World War II memorial, past the White House without pausing and on to the U.S. Capitol for the first service and a lying in state that continues until Tuesday morning." The Washington Times (12/31, A1, Weber, 88K) reports, "hundreds…began standing in line long before the public viewing began after 8 p.m., and among the thousands who came to the region to mourn the death of the 38th president." The Los Angeles Times (12/31, Peterson, Schmitt, 850K) reports Ford "will be transported to Washington National Cathedral on Tuesday morning for a memorial service that will be attended by President Bush. The six days of funeral rites are scheduled to end Wednesday, when Ford will be buried in his boyhood home of Grand Rapids, Mich." The Detroit News (12/31, Trowbridge), Newsday (12/31, Abrams, Muskal), Bloomberg (12/30, Miller, Salant), and RollCall.com (12/30, Brotherton) were among other media outlets reporting on the ceremony at the Capitol.

Absence Of Bush And Other Top Officials Noted. The Washington Post (12/31, A1, Milbank, 690K) reports, "Everything was in place for Gerald R. Ford's state funeral last night -- everything, that is, but the statesmen. President Bush sent his regrets; he was cutting cedar and riding his bike on his ranch in Texas. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid and his deputy, Richard Durbin, couldn't make it, either; they were on a trip to visit Incan ruins. Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi took a pass, too -- as did nearly 500 of the 535 members of Congress. A 6-to-3 majority of the Supreme Court, including Ford's appointee, John Paul Stevens, ruled against attending. All the nation's governors were invited; few, if any, came. Apparently only two Cabinet members -- Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez -- accepted the invite. Congressional staffers and Ford family representatives scrambled to find sufficient greeters and honorary pallbearers to join Vice President Cheney and a score of former lawmakers and Ford administration officials."

Excerpts Of Ford Interview On Vietnam Published. The Washington Post (12/31, B1, Woodward, Parthemore, 690K) publishes excerpts from an interview Ford gave The Washington Post's Bob Woodward and Christine Parthemore in 2004 and 2005 in which "the former president revealed the depths of his disillusionment and frustration during the final years and months of the Vietnam War."

Ford Considered Choosing George H. W. Bush As His VP. The New York Times (12/31, A24, Roberts, 1.16M) reports Nelson Rockefeller "coveted the vice presidency in 1973, when Spiro T. Agnew resigned. Instead, President Nixon named Mr. Ford. … Among the prospective vice presidents Mr. Ford rejected was George H. W. Bush. Remembering the telephone call from Mr. Ford that August morning, Mr. Bush said modestly last week: 'I went on, and thanks to him, had wonderful assignments in life.'"

Ford Seen As Likely To Be Remembered For Nixon Pardon. The New York Times' David Kirkpatrick (12/31, WK1) writes, "Lyndon Johnson in 1973. Richard Nixon in 1994. Ronald Reagan in 2004. The last three former presidents to die dominated the world stage. They bent history to their will, for better or worse, and became the subjects of a crowded shelf of biographies. For the writers of memorials and obituaries, they were easy. Not so Gerald R. Ford, who served only 29 months, never won a national election, and was constricted by an overwhelmingly hostile Congress. He is remembered mainly for the pardon of his predecessor, an act that ultimately doomed his bid for re-election." The Los Angeles Times' Jonathan Chait (12/31) writes, "Ford's defeat in the 1976 presidential race may have been one of the worst things that ever happened to American liberalism. Liberals, of course, detested Ford for his pardon of Richard Nixon, and indeed the pardon was a pretty rotten act. In the light of history, however, Ford comes through as a far more innocuous figure. By the standard of his day, he was a conservative. But by the standard of our times, he's a raging moderate."

Betty Ford's Term As First Lady Remembered. The New York Times (12/31, A1, Steinhauer, 1.16M) reports, "It has been a while since America drew its face close to Betty Ford. But what the nation saw this week here in Southern California — an impossibly tiny face, lips pinched in grief and eyes blinking in the harsh midday sun — served as a poignant reminder of the woman whose reign as first lady, while brief and wholly unexpected, was among the most remarkable in modern history. … Thrown into the role of first lady during a period of deep distrust in government, she fulfilled the role of honest arbiter of American family life and of the modern woman, speaking candidly on just about any subject she was asked about, both shocking and delighting the country."

GOP Presidential Candidates Seen As Needing To Distance Themselves From Bush. The New York Times' Adam Nagourney (12/31, WK2, Nagourney) reports, "For Republican candidates, the problem is President Bush. … The trick for Republican candidates is to distance themselves from Mr. Bush without offending Republican loyalists on guard for anyone showing disrespect to the president, or offending Mr. Bush's own considerable corps of advisers and contributors, any one of whom could prove useful in 2008. Talking about spending is one way to create that distance. Senator John McCain of Arizona, for one, has made a point of criticizing the deficits during Republican rule in Washington. But will any of them aggressively distance themselves from Mr. Bush's Iraq policy? Could there be a spot in this cycle for an antiwar Republican? And could any echo the chord Barack Obama has struck on the Democratic side by promising an end to the brutal partisanship that has marked the Bush era, and campaign against Mr. Bush, however discreetly, on this ground?"

Clinton's Campaign Team Said To Be More Professional Than Husband's. The Los Angeles Times (12/31, Braun, 850K) reports Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton "has spent much of the last month behind closed doors, putting the final touches on a presidential campaign-in-waiting. … Awaiting only her go-ahead — with a decision expected in January — the machine that Hillary built has the heft and advance billing of an election-year juggernaut. It is a high-stakes fusion of her political world and her husband's, two camps with markedly different styles and, at times, competing agendas and egos. The test, should she decide to run, will be getting the two cultures to work together. … Bill Clinton ran a loose and leaky ship during his two White House terms, and many in his old brain trust who are expected to return to the fold for a Hillary Clinton presidential campaign now have careers to tend and outside interests to promote. By contrast, 'Hillaryland' is a disciplined structure of her own design, a tight-knit realm populated by discreet, fiercely devoted aides who have been with the former first lady since her East Wing days, along with newer additions who serve on her Senate staff. Some wonder if her circle is too buffered." Patti Solis Doyle, "a Hillaryland stalwart who was Hillary Clinton's first hire as scheduler in 1992, is expected to be tapped as campaign manager. Doyle, 41, had key roles in both Senate campaigns, and most recently headed up Hillpac, the well-oiled fundraising arm that drummed up more than $50 million in donations for 2006.

Schwarzenegger Plans To Take His Campaign For Bipartisanship National. The San Francisco Chronicle (12/31, A1, Marinucci, 384K) reports Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "is intent on taking his message of bipartisan cooperation to the rest of the country as part of an ambitious effort aimed at shaping politics on both sides of the aisle. Schwarzenegger wants to press Republicans and Democrats for more 'action, action, action' -- with particular attention to appealing to the growing ranks of decline-to-state and independent voters increasingly turned off by partisan politics. For the California governor, the issues open to bipartisan solutions are as diverse as redistricting, health care and prison reform. But Schwarzenegger doesn't intend to stay within state boundaries as he addresses such matters, planning to make his case in states that will play center stage in presidential politics -- New Hampshire, Ohio and Iowa among them. … Political insiders on both sides of the aisle have speculated that the governor's 'big picture' approach means that he will have more influence as the 2008 presidential race begins in earnest; that means he could act either as an endorser or an active campaigner who could help swing delegate-rich California."

LATimes Notes Schwarzenegger's Successes In 2006. The Los Angeles Times (12/31, 850K) says in an editorial that Schwarzenegger's "year began with an apology and ended with a victory. In other words, it got better as it went along."

Pawlenty Moves Towards The Middle To Start Second Term. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (12/31, Lopez, 395K) reports, "After a brush with political death, a reinvigorated Gov. Tim Pawlenty begins his second term this week facing huge DFL majorities in the Legislature and acknowledging that compromise is no longer optional. Promising a change in agenda and tactics for the legislative session, which will convene Wednesday, Pawlenty has already advocated universal health coverage for Minnesotans, proposed free college tuition for the state's top students, and thrown his weight behind expansions of mass transit and greater reliance on renewable fuels."

Poll Finds Most Americans Maintain Optimistic Outlook. The Washington Times (12/31, A1, Benac, 88K) reports, "An Associated Press-AOL News poll finds that while most Americans said 2006 was a bad year for the country, three-fourths thought it had been a good one for them and their families. … Seventy-two percent of Americans feel good about what 2007 will bring for the country, and an even larger 89 percent are optimistic about the new year for themselves and their families, according to the poll. That fits with a long-term trend suggesting that Americans are generally an optimistic lot. Polling over recent decades is replete with optimism, and with a tendency for people to feel more positively about their own situations than that of the country overall."

December Employment Report Expected To Show Slight Improvement. The New York Times (12/31, BU6, DeAenlle, 1.16M) reports, "The December employment report arrives Friday. A Bloomberg News poll of economists estimates that 115,000 net new jobs were created, a subdued showing after the 132,000 in November."

WPost Notes Virginia GOP's Transportation Deal Talks. The Washington Post (12/31, B6, 690K) editorializes, "Finally, the grown-ups have seen fit to mediate in the spitting match that passes for fraternal relations within Virginia's Republican Party. Northern Virginia's two Republican congressmen, Reps. Thomas M. Davis III and Frank R. Wolf, along with the new state party chairman, Ed Gillespie, and Robert F. McDonnell, the attorney general, are trying to broker an intraparty deal on state funding for transportation. No doubt they have been moved to action by well-founded fear -- fear that voters have grown tired and testy at the ongoing spectacle of the GOP's civil war and fear that the party as a whole will be punished at the ballot box next fall for its contemptible failure to address the state's transportation mess."

Humorist Barry Reviews 2006. Humorist Dave Barry's annual review of the closing year appears in today's Washington Post Magazine (12/30, W18). The piece runs just over 5,000 words.

Bush Directs "Surprising" Tripling Of Aid To Africa. Under the headline, "Bush Has Quietly Tripled Aid To Africa," the Washington Post (12/31, A4, Fletcher, 690K) notes President Bush's "legacy is sure to be defined by his wielding of U.S. military power in Afghanistan and Iraq, but there is another, much softer and less-noticed effort by his administration in foreign affairs: a dramatic increase in U.S. aid to Africa." Bush "has tripled direct humanitarian and development aid to the world's most impoverished continent since taking office and recently vowed to double that increased amount by 2010 -- to nearly $9 billion." Currently, Sudan, Ethiopia, Egypt and Uganda "rank among the world's top 10 recipients in aid from the United States." Those increases "have surprised -- and pleased -- longtime supporters of assistance for Africa, who note that because Bush has received little support from African American voters, he has little obvious political incentive for his interest." The Post adds, "Although some activists criticize Bush for not doing more to end the ongoing genocide in the Darfur region of Sudan, others credit him for playing a role in ending deadly conflicts in Liberia, the Congo and other parts of Sudan. Meanwhile, Bush has overseen a steady rise in U.S. trade with Africa, which has doubled since 2001."

Somali, Ethiopian Troops Close In On Kismayo. In continued reporting on the Somali Interim Government's consolidation of power, the New York Times (12/31, Gettleman, 1.16M) notes, "A phalanx of Ethiopian tanks and armored personnel carriers chugged toward Kismayo, the last city occupied by Somalia's diminished Islamist movement, witnesses said Saturday, while the Islamists inside the city dug in and vowed never to surrender." While the Somali-Ethiopian force was "preparing to seize Kismayo," a key Islamic Courts leader "told his followers that the Islamist leadership was not finished." The Times adds, however, that international diplomats "said that they were talking to moderate representatives of the Islamic movement on Saturday, trying to persuade them to back down."

The Washington Post (12/31, A18, McCrummen, 690K) calls Kismayo "the last stronghold of the Islamic Courts movement," adding, "a major battle between the two sides seemed imminent." The Post reports, "Somalis are growing impatient with the presence of thousands of Ethiopian troops in their country, but Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, who has backed the interim Somali government now in power, has said his military will not pull out until it has captured the most 'extremist' leaders and 'international jihadists' within the Courts movement."

The Washington Times/AFP (12/31) adds the Somali-Ethiopian troops "marched on the last stronghold of the country's powerful Islamist movement yesterday, even as Prime Minister Ali Mohammed Gedi called for dialogue with Islamist leaders." Yesterday, Gedi "warned of serious reprisals if the Islamists followed through on threats to wage a guerrilla campaign." Deputy Prime Minister Mohamed Hussein Aidid "warned that the security situation in the capital, which has long been awash with arms, remained potentially volatile, with 'around 2,000' Islamists thought to have remained behind when the city was taken."

The Los Angeles Times (12/31, Sanders, 850K) notes, "Though most Islamist fighters fled Thursday when troops from Ethiopia and Somalia's transitional government advanced, so far the government is moving cautiously in finishing the pacification and occupation of the capital. Most government soldiers remain on the city outskirts. Only one government agency, the Interior Ministry, has moved back in." That "security vacuum has led to sporadic looting and rioting."

UN Peacekeepers Push Back On UN Request For Darfur Border Force. AFP (12/31) notes international peacekeeping officials within the UN "have rebuffed a call from the Security Council for a force to protect refugees in Chad." The report to the UNSC is quoted saying, "Conditions for an effective UN peacekeeping operation do not seem to be in place at this time. Unless all the parties were to agree to a ceasefire and engage in a dialogue...a UN force would be operating in the midst of continuing hostilities and have no clear exit strategy." AFP cites Financial Times reporting purporting that "the report reflects peacekeepers' concern that they are being asked to do too much around the world."

Castro Tells Cuba His Recovery Is Not "A Lost Battle." The AP (12/31, Snow) reports, "A statement attributed to Fidel Castro on the eve of the revolution's 48th anniversary assured Cubans Saturday that the ailing leader could still recover from his prolonged illness." The media-run message is quoted saying, "I am grateful to you for your affection and support. Regarding my recovery, I have always warned that it could be a prolonged process, but it is far from being a lost battle." The AP says this and similar recent efforts "seemed aimed at ensuring the world that he is recovering, five months after he underwent emergency intestinal surgery." BBC.com (12/31) says Castro told Cubans that "he is recovering slowly from his surgery." He "also thanked the Cuban people for their courage during his recuperation."

A 2,400-word piece on the front page of today's Washington Times (12/31, A1, Hirsch, 88K) keys on US businesses' uncertain future in a post-Castro Cuba. President Bush's hard-line attitude toward Cuba has prompted businesses to pull back from exploring opportunities in the communist nation." Additional "factors hindering the potential of doing business there include the island's small population and poor investment climate, but Mr. Bush's strong stance is the overarching issue, according to government officials, businesses and longtime observers and analysts."

Madrid Ends ETA Talks After Fatal Airport Car Bombing. The AP (12/31, Roman) notes Madrid's decision to end "plans for peace talks" with ETA following yesterday morning's car bombing at the Madrid airport. That "blast left two people missing and 26 injured, most with damage to their ears from the shock wave." Prime Minister Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero "said the government would halt talks with ETA over the bombing. The group had agreed to stop attacks in its cease-fire declaration earlier this year that was seen as the greatest hope in a decade of a peaceful end to the conflict." ETA, which has not claimed responsibility for the attack, has "been warning for months that the peace process was faltering." The Washington Post/AP (12/31, A20)'s version of the AP story is headlined, "Madrid Blast Leaves 2 Missing, 26 Injured." Bloomberg (12/31, Smyth, Ben Sills) reports Madrid announced the shutdown of talks "after concluding [ETA] planted a truck bomb in Madrid's Barajas airport that destroyed a four-story parking structure and left two people presumed dead."

Bulgaria, Romania Will Join EU Tonight. AFP (12/31) reports Sofia and Bucharest "have braced for a double New Year's celebration, with both countries set to become the newest members of the European Union at the stroke of midnight. But with enlargement fatigue gripping large parts of the bloc, the EU's latest and poorest members are likely to be greeted more with a shrug than open arms." AFP adds polling "shows that at the eve of accession 63 percent of all Bulgarians and 69 percent of all Romanians think their eastern European states will largely benefit from EU membership." The "two newcomers will" join Greece as "the only Balkan nations in Europe's rich club, and will play a key role as representatives of a region ravaged by the wars in the former Yugoslavia." They "will be Europe's poorest members with gross domestic product per capita barely reaching one third of the European average," and "will contribute only one percent to the EU's" total GDP.

Russian Politics To Be Dominated By 2007 And 2008 Elections. In its "Week In Review," the New York Times (12/31, WK2, Myers, 1.16M) previews the Russian parliamentary elections scheduled for December. "Elections, even in a 'democracy' as managed as Russia's, have a way of surprising." President Vladimir Putin "is popular enough to ensure that whoever he supports will fare well, but corruption remains deeply rooted, as do poverty and crime and violence, any of which could be a catalyst for an electoral nyet." His "Kremlin is taking no chances," and has sponsored several key election law changes. "New laws against extremism have already been used to raid a political group led by the chess champion Garry Kasparov." Putin "critics said the restrictions would stifle what opposition remains, including what's left of the Communist Party and the old liberal democrats." For his part, Kasparov "says the Kremlin has obscured the seeds of discontent. And they are growing, he says, especially beyond the glow of Moscow's riches." The Times also notes the "maneuvering" ahead of the 2008 vote to replace Putin.

Kazakh Government Balances Pro-Russian Policies With Gulag Legacy. A piece in the New York Times (12/31, A6, Greenberg, 1.16M) explores changing Kazakh attitudes about the gulag system there. "The gulags once spread over the Kazakhstan steppe like a thick wreath. Eleven sprawling camps" were "built shortly after the creation of the Soviet Union" and "were partly emptied to provide soldiers and workers during World War II" before being closed after Stalin's death in 1953. Today, "a large percentage of people have parents or grandparents whose life trajectories were savagely rewired by deportation and imprisonment in the camps. But memories of the gulags are dying," and "for many" young Kazakhs, "the oppression the gulags stand for does not register." The Times adds, "Some of the reasons for a quick and collective forgetting are obvious." In addition to "growing affluence," the Times says "there are political aspects to a sidestepping of Kazakhstan's recent history, too, often born out of the government's determination to stay friendly with Russia." The Times continues, "With Kazakh nationalism having become mostly the purview of the anti-Russia opposition here, the government has had to use other avenues to promote a coherent national identity."

China's Hu Seeks To Bolster Navy, His Political Position. The Los Angeles Times (12/31, Magnier, Landsberg, 850K) notes Chinese President Hu Jintao's Wednesday speech calling for a "strong" navy. "In China, where symbolism often is as important as substance, the address was seen by analysts as serving two functions: to help build a policy consensus and signal [Hu's] near-complete grip on the political field before a key party congress next fall." Calling the Chinese navy "the country's weakest link," the Times says Beijing "is keen to bolster its weak third arm." Hu's "aim is to prevent Taiwan from declaring independence and to safeguard the seaborne trade, oil and other resources needed to power China's booming economy." Beijing's "growing military profile has raised eyebrows at the Pentagon, which fears an erosion of its military dominance in the Pacific and beyond." The Times adds, "Of significance in China's one-party state with its emphasis on political theater, analysts said, was Hu's choice of venues" and his "timing." The "notably careful leader's confident military tone Wednesday and his appearance in military green immediately after a purge of a key [ally of former President Jiang Zemin] in Shanghai suggests he faces no significant opposition across the Chinese political spectrum."

Japan's Abe Criticized For Not Addressing Key "Challenges." Under the headline, "The Buzz On Japan's New Premier: Too Old-school," the Los Angeles Times (12/31, Wallace, 850K) says Japanese Prime Minster Shinzo Abe is "already being mocked." The "developing perception" in Tokyo is "that Japan's youngest postwar prime minister may be an out-of-touch young fogey, more nostalgic for an old Japan than eager to usher in a new one." Some Japanese "contend that his government's focus on nationalist obsessions … is a distraction from the core economic and social issues that present far graver challenges to Japan. They also argue that Abe's government lacks discipline and coherence." The Times adds, "Suspicions that Abe lacks toughness — and control over his party — are contributing to his sudden slip in polls." Despite "a positive start" to his premiership, Abe "has stumbled on the domestic front."

Expanding Israeli Economy Said To Weather Crises. Noting Israel's "typically tumultuous year," the New York Times (12/31, A3, Myre, 1.16M) reports, "Despite the political turmoil and spasms of violence, Israel, it seems, has figured out how to keep its economy charging forward." This year marked "the country's third straight year of strong growth, with the economy expanding nearly 5 percent. The stock market has been hitting record highs; unemployment is at a 10-year low. Israel's central bank is lowering interest rates," and the shekel "is trading at 4.2 to the dollar, its strongest level in five years." However, "the economic tide is not lifting every Israeli boat," and almost 20 percent of Israelis now live below the poverty line. "Critics say this is because Israelis who are struggling economically have seen their benefits fall sharply, while they remain unemployed. The unemployment rate is at its lowest level in a decade, but still relatively high at 8.4 percent." The Times notes that "while the Israeli economy has been thriving, the Palestinian economy has moved in the opposite direction, contracting by an estimated 10 to 15 percent this year, according to the Palestine Monetary Authority." Continued conflict has "devastated" the economy of Palestine, as "Israeli security forces greatly increased the web of restrictions … to prevent attacks," creating "great hardships on Palestinian economic life."

On Eve Of Handover, Annan's Tenure Reviewed. An AP (12/30) analysis piece reviews UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan's decade in office. He is "leaving behind a global organization far more aggressively engaged in peacekeeping and fighting poverty — but struggling to restore its tarnished reputation." Three weeks ago, "Annan said he considered his top achievements the promotion of human rights, fighting to close the gap between extreme poverty and immense wealth, and the U.N.'s campaign to fight AIDS and other infectious diseases." The AP says his "first five-year term culminated in 2001 with the Nobel Peace Prize — shared with the United Nations ," but his "second five-year term was not without shadows," notably the Oil-for-Food scandal.

Under the headline, "Annan Focused On Human Element," the Los Angeles Times (12/31, Farley, 850K) adds Annan "has already begun reflecting on his achievements, frustrations and failures as a leader who embodies the world's ideals, and as a man who often could not escape his limitations to make those ideals a reality." Annan "was mostly an idealist. He would like to be remembered, he said this month, as the leader who pushed the world to agree to intervene to stop genocides, and to try to cut poverty in half. He sought to make the U.N. about people, not just geopolitics." He was elected in 1996 because "he did not have a political agenda or an overweening ego that could put him in conflict with the U.S. By the end of Annan's decade, however, he grew to be a quiet but compelling challenger to Washington."

WPost Says China, South Korea Hold Key To Containing North Korea. A Washington Post (12/31, B6, 690K) editorial says North Korean leader Kim Jong-il was "justified" in "calculating that" his regime "would not suffer severe consequences for its" nuclear test. His government's "ability to sustain its defiant posture is remarkable because, in contrast to the cases of India or Pakistan, the outside world has the ability to cripple the regime if it chooses." China and South Korea "could remove the lifelines they provide" to Kim if they decided "that stopping North Korea from producing more nuclear weapons was more important than preserving its dictatorship." Washington's "leverage" remains "limited," and Administration critics wrongly "presume that it's possible to change North Korean behavior without the collaboration of its prime benefactors." The Post says the Administration's "best option" is "to work with such allies as Japan to raise the economic pressure on North Korea as much as is possible. Diplomacy is best focused not on Pyongyang, but on Beijing… The aim need not be to bring down [Kim's] regime, only to convince it that its existence will be imperiled rather than secured by nuclear weapons."

Clarke Outlines National Security Issues Beyond Iraq. In a Washington Post (12/31, B1, 690K) op-ed, Richard Clarke criticizes continuing vacancies in "critical slots" in the Administration's national security team, including Deputy Secretary of State and Deputy Director of National Intelligence. "In the end, there are only 12 seats at the conference table in the White House Situation Room, and the key players' schedules mean that they can seldom meet there together in person or on secure video conference for more than about 10 hours each week. When issues don't receive first-tier consideration, they can slip by for months." Clarke identifies "seven key 'fires in the in-box' national security issues:" global warming, Russian "revanchism," Latin America's "leftist lurch," continued warfare in Africa, the US' "freeze" of arms control efforts, the rise in transnational crime, and the continued weakness of the Pakistani-Afghan border. While President Bush "contemplates sending even more U.S. forces into the Iraqi sinkhole," he "must also weigh the opportunity cost of taking his national security barons off all the other critical problems they should be addressing -- problems whose windows of opportunity are slamming shut, unheard over the wail of Baghdad sirens."

Lebanese Said To Be On Verge Of Repeating War's "Mistakes." In a Washington Post (12/31, B2, 690K) op-ed, reporter Lynn Maalouf notes, "Today, as the Lebanese people once again find themselves divided along political and sectarian lines, the question reverberates around the country: Are we about to be drawn into another civil war?" The "lessons" of the 1975-90 civil war "were never learned." In the eventual peace, "there was no victor, no vanquished. No reconciliation process was initiated. An amnesty law passed by the very people who had been fighting one another only weeks earlier exonerated them of war crimes." In 1990, "Lebanon slipped into a state of amnesia. Today, having turned the page on its civil war without achieving closure, it is a country in danger of repeating the past." With an "absence of documented history, Lebanese cling to conflicting narratives of the war and to their selective memories, passing them on to the younger generation."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Deputy Leader Of Al-Qaeda Delivers Angry Holiday Greeting (AP)

AP, December 30, 2006

CAIRO (AP) — The deputy leader of al-Qaeda on Saturday accused moderate Arab leaders of being traitors for cooperating with the United States in an audiotaped greeting marking the most important Islamic holiday.

Ayman al-Zawahri's wished the Palestinian people a happy Eid al-Adha but lashed out at Palestinian president Mahmoud Abbas and his Fatah movement.

"Those who had sold Palestine, the secular traitors, can not be your brothers. Do not recognize their legitimacy. ... And don't sit with them ... and do not sign with them the documents that will make you lose Palestine," said al-Zawahri in the 15-minute audiotape posted on a website commonly used by Islamic insurgents.

Al-Zawahri did not mention Saddam Hussein's execution in the tape, suggesting it was made before the ousted leader's hanging on Saturday.

The tape could not immediately be verified, but a banner posted on the website said it came from al-Qaeda's media production house, al-Sahab.

The No. 2 al-Qaeda leader denounced U.S. ally Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak in an apparent reference to recent arrests and detentions of several members of the outlawed Muslim Brotherhood.

"I greet my brothers inside the prisons of Mubarak, the traitor," he said.

Al-Zawahri also extended his Eid greeting to Iraq, praising the leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq, Abu Omar al-Baghdadi, and urged Muslims in Somalia, Chechnya, Indonesia, the Philippines and Algeria to keep on fighting the "infidels and crusaders."

For Guantánamo Review Boards, Limits Abound (NYT)

By Tim Golden

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

GUANTÁNAMO BAY, Cuba — At one end of a converted trailer in the American military detention center here, a graying Pakistani businessman sat shackled before a review board of uniformed officers, pleading for his freedom.

The prisoner had seen just a brief summary of what officials said was a thick dossier of intelligence linking him to Al Qaeda. He had not seen his own legal papers since they were taken away in an unrelated investigation. He has lawyers working on his behalf in Washington, London and Pakistan, but here his only assistance came from an Army lieutenant colonel, who stumbled as he read the prisoner's handwritten statement.

As the hearing concluded, the detainee, who cannot be identified publicly under military rules, had a question. He is a citizen of Pakistan, he noted. He was arrested on a business trip to Thailand. On what authority or charges was he even being held?

"That question," a Marine colonel presiding over the panel answered, "is outside the limits of what this board is permitted to consider."

Under a law passed by Congress and signed by President Bush in October, this double-wide trailer may be as close to a courtroom as most Guantánamo prisoners ever get. The law prohibits them from challenging their detention or treatment by writs of habeas corpus in the federal courts. Instead, they may only petition a single federal appeals court to examine whether the review boards followed the military's own procedures in reviewing their status as "enemy combatants."

But an examination of the Guantánamo review boards by The New York Times suggests that they have often fallen short, not only as a source of due process for the hundreds of men held here, but also as a forum to resolve questions about what the detainees have done and the threats they may pose.

Some limitations have long been evident. The prisoners have no right to a lawyer, or to see classified evidence, or even to know the identity of their accusers. What has been less visible, however, is what many officials describe as a continuing shortage of information about many detainees, including some who have been held on sketchy or disputed intelligence.

Behind the hearings that journalists are allowed to observe is a system that has at times been as long on government infighting and diplomatic maneuvering as it has been short on hard evidence. The result, current and former officials acknowledged, is that some detainees have been held for years on less compelling information, while a growing number of others for whom there was thought to be stronger evidence of militant activities have been released under secret arrangements between Washington and their home governments.

Military officials emphasize that the boards are an administrative forum and were never intended to replicate judicial standards of fairness. But they say the hearings offer prisoners a viable opportunity to rebut the government's evidence.

"At the end of the day, it's about giving the detainee the flexibility and freedom to present his case," said Capt. Philip L. Waddingham, a former Navy pilot who oversees the operations of the panels at Guantánamo.

Administration officials also emphasize that the reviews are more rigorous than the battlefield tribunals that have traditionally been used to determine the status of wartime prisoners under the 1949 Geneva Conventions.

But the Geneva tribunals were established to answer questions about the identities of soldiers and spies from regular armies. Sorting through the identities and past actions of suspected participants in a shadowy global terrorist network, military officials said, has proved far more complex.

To date, 377 Guantánamo detainees, nearly half of the 773 who have been held there, have been released or transferred to other governments. Of those, about 150 have been repatriated through the review process since mid-2004, officials said.

The administration's push to reduce the Guantánamo population is more evident in another statistic. The final arbiter of prisoner releases, Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon R. England, has overruled the panels' recommendations in more than 15 percent of the 237 cases he has decided so far this year, officials said. In virtually all of those, the boards had recommended continued detention.

Still, a recent study of the review process found that detainees arguing their innocence were routinely denied witnesses they tried to call, even when the witnesses were other prisoners at Guantánamo. Lawyers for the detainees complain that the government has made almost no effort to have the panels consider information they have gathered and has often blocked their attempts to learn the accusations against their clients.

"We have tried again and again to have a say in the process," said Barbara Olshansky, a lawyer who has coordinated much of the work of the detainees' lawyers for the Center for Constitutional Rights. "But we learned pretty early on that these were kangaroo courts."

Many of the detainees appear to have given up on the reviews as a way to win their freedom. In the latest round of annual hearings, which were completed this month, only 18 percent of the prisoners chose to attend.

Evolution of the Hearings

The review system at Guantánamo began operating in July 2004, more than two years after most detainees were imprisoned there. Officials said it was intended in part to deflect criticism that the prison had become a legal black hole. They also hoped it would resolve what had become a contentious struggle among national security agencies over which prisoners to hold and which to free.

Even before Mr. Bush decided in February 2002 that the United States would not observe the Geneva Conventions in fighting terrorism, Donald H. Rumsfeld, then the defense secretary, dismissed the idea of Geneva-style hearings for the detainees, maintaining that they would never be entitled to the prisoner-of-war status that such tribunals could grant them in other conflicts.

"There is no ambiguity in this case," Mr. Rumsfeld said.

Yet intelligence officers at Guantánamo found ambiguity everywhere. Many of the detainees had been captured by Afghan militias, Pakistani border guards and other surrogates, and some had been turned in for bounties, intelligence officials said. Information about their identities and actions was often vague and secondhand. Physical evidence, if any existed, was sometimes lost before reaching Cuba.

DOJ_NMG_0111225

Still, the detainees who were held on the weakest information tended not to be a priority for either intelligence officers or the military's criminal investigators.

"It wasn't the job of the intelligence community to verify their guilt or innocence," said Col. Brittain P. Mallow, a retired Army investigator who led a task force that gathered evidence for war crimes tribunals that are expected to prosecute about 50 to 70 of the remaining 396 detainees.

Faced with growing international criticism, the Bush administration moved in May 2004 to set up a kind of annual parole system, called Administrative Review Boards, to weigh each detainee's continuing threat and intelligence value. But before those hearings began, the Supreme Court called that June for a one-time review of all Guantánamo detainees using the sort of panels called for by Army regulations — and by the Geneva Conventions.

Those first panels, called Combatant Status Review Tribunals, or C.S.R.T.'s in military parlance, required three military officers to decide cases by majority vote, based on a "preponderance of the evidence." The boards were allowed to consider a wide range of intelligence, including statements obtained by coercion.

Midlevel officers were assigned to help the detainees prepare for their hearings. Military lawyers were not permitted to serve in that role, however, because of concern that limitations on that assistance might open the lawyers to charges of violating professional ethics rules.

Lawyers at the Defense and Justice Departments had another worry: that detainees found to be "not enemy combatants" might sue the government for wrongful imprisonment. Partly for that reason, officials said, the review office was instructed to use the phrase "no longer enemy combatants."

By the time the C.S.R.T. reviews got under way, intelligence agencies had confirmed that half a dozen detainees released from Guantánamo were fighting for the Taliban in Afghanistan. Such risks were raised frequently in government debates.

"It was sort of a mantra in the system: 'You have got to make sure that you don't release any of the wrong people,' " recalled Charles W. Moore Jr., a now-retired vice admiral who set up the review apparatus under Mr. England.

Reviewing Decisions

The early results of the hearings, in which officials said a surprising number of detainees were found not to be enemy combatants, only heightened the unease.

Internal critics, including the Defense Intelligence Agency, the Central Intelligence Agency and the Special Operations branch of the Pentagon, complained heatedly that the boards did not properly understand the intelligence they were assessing, said current and former officials who participated in the debates.

The critics were later allowed to provide further training to the panels. In the first round of annual reviews after the C.S.R.T.'s, officers with military intelligence backgrounds also took over the role, previously assigned to lawyers, of vetting evidence and presenting the government's case.

While some officials perceived an undue influence over the panels from intelligence agencies and their allies, others said those critics were mostly beaten back.

"The intelligence community wanted to derail the C.S.R.T. process and dictate the decisions, and that didn't happen," said one former senior official, who, like several others, would discuss the policy deliberations only on the condition of anonymity.

According to documents and interviews, the Pentagon office in charge of the reviews ordered the repetition of some C.S.R.T. boards that recommended the release of detainees. Defense Department officials would not discuss those cases in detail.

The largest number of repeated hearings appears to have involved some of the 22 Muslim detainees from western China who were part of the Uighur (pronounced WEE-gur) ethnic minority.

The Uighurs' sworn enemy was not the United States but the Communist government of China, which had long oppressed their people. The military accused the detainees of belonging to a separatist group that the Chinese authorities had persuaded Washington to list as a terrorist organization, but some experts on the region disputed that characterization of the group and the detainees denied any link to it.

The State Department, fearful that the men would be tortured if they were sent back to China, had already begun trying to place the Uighurs as refugees in Europe when their cases came for review at Guantánamo, officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0111226

"We were shocked that they even sent those guys before the C.S.R.T.'s," said one former national security official who worked on the matter. "They had already been identified for release."

Because the Uighurs told very similar stories, Pentagon officials were confounded when at least five of them were determined not to be enemy combatants and the rest properly held, officials said.

At least several of the Uighurs, including some found not to be enemy combatants, had their cases reviewed again, officials said. They described the impetus for doing so as "quality control." But available documents show that at least one of the detainees, whose case was reviewed again, was finally found to be an enemy combatant.

Five Uighur detainees were finally sent to Albania as refugees in May.

Some Aren't Revisited

Yet other cases in which questions arose were not revisited. One of those involved a Sudanese man, Adel Hassan Hamad, who was seized in Pakistan in 2002.

According to the unclassified summary of allegations in his first hearing, Mr. Hamad, who is now about 48, had worked for two nongovernmental organizations, or N.G.O.'s, with ties to Al Qaeda and had come into contact "with persons who had positions of responsibility in Al Qaeda." But the military presented no unclassified information that Mr. Hamad was anything but a hospital administrator and former teacher, or that he knew of his employers' purported ties.

As with all such cases, it is not possible to judge independently the evidence against Mr. Hamad because part of it is secret. But while two panel members found him to be rightfully detained, a third officer, an Army lawyer whose name was blacked out in the declassified document, objected strongly.

Even if the unclassified allegations were true — and Mr. Hamad said he knew nothing about Qaeda links — "a mere association with Al Qaeda does not qualify as a basis for enemy combatant status," the lawyer wrote in a formal dissent. The officer, who also studied the secret evidence, said the military was declaring Mr. Hamad an enemy combatant because some parts of the organization he worked for had allegedly supported "terrorist ideals and causes."

"To reach such a conclusion would provide for unconscionable results," he wrote. It might mean, he added, that "all physicians, nurses and aid workers employed by the alleged terrorist-connected N.G.O.'s would also be declared enemy combatants."

The panel's 2-to-1 decision was reviewed by two other military lawyers, each of whom tersely upheld its "legal sufficiency." One of them, Cmdr. James R. Crisfield Jr. of the Navy, described the Army officer's dissent as "articulate and thoughtful," but emphasized the review panels' modest standard of proof.

"Given the low evidentiary hurdle posed by a preponderance-of-evidence standard and the rebuttable presumption of genuineness and accuracy that attaches to government evidence, I believe that the test is satisfied in this case," Commander Crisfield wrote.

Despite the limited evidence against Mr. Hamad, documents from his first annual review show little further substance to the military's accusations. They noted that a brother of the Sept. 11 plotter Khalid Shaikh Mohammed was once a manager at one of the charities where Mr. Hamad worked. But the military was now asserting only that the group "may be affiliated with Osama bin Laden and Al Qaeda operations."

Two federal public defenders in Portland, Ore., who took Mr. Hamad's case last year said they had located about a dozen witnesses who corroborated parts of his account. Although much of that information has been filed as part of a habeas case in federal court, there is no sign yet that it has made any difference for Mr. Hamad.

"I don't think there was any substantive attempt by the military to find witnesses who could get to the bottom of this," said one of the lawyers, Patrick J. Ehlers. "There were hundreds of other people out there who worked for these groups. None of those people were arrested, and none of them were questioned."

Constraints on the System

Several officials who helped establish the review panels said they tried to create mechanisms that would let detainees present witnesses and evidence and allow the panels to gather new information.

DOJ_NMG_0111227

But some officials said those ambitions, however sincere, had often been undone by the speed of most reviews — often conducted in just hours — and the low priority assigned to the collection of information on the detainees by intelligence agencies and foreign governments. This year, three panels at Guantánamo handled as many as 13 or 14 cases a week, they said.

"There are real time constraints and real resource constraints," one retired military officer said. "They usually ended up without anything new, so the boards were just dusting off old files and trying to have a fair and impartial body look at that old information."

Captain Waddingham, the chief of the review office at Guantánamo, said the boards followed the recommendations of military intelligence officials 95 percent of the time. But both he and the overall head of the review program, Frank Sweigart, insisted that the panels were able to get new information when they needed it.

"We are always looking for supporting facts, and if we can't find them, we ask for them," Mr. Sweigart, a retired Navy captain, said in an interview. "There really is a lot of information out there for a number of them — especially for the detainees who are there today."

But other current and former officials described a system that was frequently inefficient in collecting information that might determine a prisoner's fate.

Some officials said military and civilian intelligence agencies gave little priority to requests for information from the panels, particularly when they involved time-consuming inquiries overseas. And though officials including Mr. England, the deputy defense secretary, have urged foreign governments to develop and pass on their own information about detainees from their countries, few of them did.

Officials said some governments, including those of Kuwait and Bahrain, had provided extensive files on their detainees. Partly out of diplomatic considerations, they said, the State Department pressed Mr. England to move up review hearings for at least several detainees from those two countries and, ultimately, to overrule review panel decisions and repatriate them.

On Nov. 3 last year, the Pentagon sent two Kuwaitis and three Bahrainis home from Guantánamo on Mr. England's approval, despite what two officials said had been negative rulings by the review panels in at least some of those cases.

But other releases are harder to explain. In one such case, lawyers for Nazar Chaman Gul, an Afghan prisoner, said they were mystified to learn of the repatriation on Dec. 16 of another Afghan, Mohammad Akhtiar, after his annual review.

Mr. Akhtiar had been accused of launching a rocket attack on an American military base in Afghanistan in early 2003. Declassified transcripts of Mr. Gul's hearings suggest that a major piece of incriminating evidence against him was that he was captured with Mr. Akhtiar at his home. (Another problem seemed to be that he was confused with another Afghan with the same name, who is also being held at Guantánamo.)

"Gul's greatest sin seemed to be his association with Mohammad Akhtiar," said a lawyer for Mr. Gul, Amy Baggio. "Unfathomably, Akhtiar is now home with his family while Nazar Gul is going on his fourth year in custody."

Lawyers say that detainees who have tried to use the review system to challenge the accusations against them have often been frustrated. According to a recent study of 102 unclassified C.S.R.T. files by the Seton Hall University law school, the military denied all requests by the detainees for witnesses who were not also being held at Guantánamo and denied requests for detainee witnesses 74 percent of the time.

Although a growing number of lawyers have begun to conduct their own investigations into accusations against their clients, a former military intelligence officer who has presided over dozens of review boards was dismissive of those contributions.

"As far as what the habeas lawyers have to say, for the most part it wouldn't factor in because they have made themselves not credible," said the officer, a Marine colonel who suggested that the lawyers took detainees' claims of innocence at face value.

The lawyers respond that the obstacles to their input in the process raise questions about the military's desire to learn everything it can about the detainees. More than a week after the hearing for the Pakistani businessman accused of ties to Al Qaeda, a Washington lawyer who had been trying to help him told a reporter that he had not even known the session had taken place.

DOJ_NMG_0111228

"There is no hint of any kind of due process in this," said the lawyer, Gaillard T. Hunt. "He's got no right to an investigation. But substantively, it really doesn't matter, because they can always just say they have this classified information that he can't see."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Localities Operate Intelligence Centers To Pool Terror Data (WP)

By Mary Beth Sheridan, Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

Frustrated by poor federal cooperation, U.S. states and cities are building their own network of intelligence centers led by police to help detect and disrupt terrorist plots.

The new "fusion centers" are now operating in 37 states, including Virginia and Maryland, and another covers the Washington area, according to the Department of Homeland Security. The centers, which have received $380 million in federal support since the 2001 terrorist attacks, pool and analyze information from local, state and federal law enforcement officials.

The emerging "network of networks" marks a new era of opportunity for law enforcement, according to U.S. officials and homeland security experts. Police are hungry for federal intelligence in an age of homegrown terrorism and more sophisticated crime. For their part, federal law enforcement officials could benefit from a potential army of tipsters -- the 700,000 local and state police officers across the country, as well as private security guards and others being courted by the centers.

But the emerging model of "intelligence-led policing" faces risks on all sides. The centers are popping up with little federal leadership and training, raising fears of overzealousness such as that associated with police "red squads" that spied on civil rights and peace activists decades ago. The centers also face practical obstacles that could limit their effectiveness, including a shortage of money, skilled analysts, and proven relationships with the FBI and Homeland Security.

Still, the centers are emerging as a key element in a sometimes chaotic new domestic intelligence infrastructure, which also includes homeland security units in local police forces and 103 FBI-led terrorism task forces, triple the number that existed before the Sept. 11 attacks.

Fusion centers are becoming "part of the landscape for local government," said the incoming D.C. police chief, Cathy Lanier. But she warned that police are navigating a new patchwork of state and federal privacy laws that govern the sharing, collection and storage of information. "We're in a very precarious position right now," she said. "If we lose community support, that is going to be a big deal for local law enforcement."

Traditionally, police had little to do with counterterrorism. But after the 2001 attacks, it became obvious that al-Qaeda members had been preparing not only in far-off Afghan training camps but also in places such as a Gold's Gym in Greenbelt and flight schools in Florida. An unwitting Maryland state trooper stopped one of the future hijackers for speeding on Interstate 95.

"Police officers, deputies and troopers . . . they're going to be the ones that encounter a lot of these [suspicious] things on the road," said Virginia State Police Sgt. Lee Miller, who oversees the state's year-old fusion center in Richmond. "What we're trying to do is provide them the information they need to identify these different things."

The fusion centers range from small conference facilities to high-tech nerve centers with expensive communications networks. Some do investigations, while others focus on information-sharing -- passing tips to the FBI and scanning federal intelligence for developments of interest to local departments. Some have explored the use of controversial data-mining software in keeping with their respective state laws.

Maryland's three-year-old fusion center outside Baltimore offers a glimpse of the new intelligence world. Hidden behind a bolted door with no nameplate in a quiet office park, the Maryland Coordination and Analysis Center houses members of 23 local, state and federal agencies.

Harvey Eisenberg, an assistant U.S. attorney who helps oversee the center, said police and other government employees are being trained to phone its 24-hour "watch section" when they spot suspicious activity. Calls to the terrorism hotline advertised on the Capital Beltway (800-492-TIPS) are also answered by officers in the watch section.

"You need to educate cops, firefighters, health officials, transportation officials, sanitation workers, to understand the nature of the threat," Eisenberg said. "And not to become super-spies. . . . Constitutionally, they see something, they can report it."

DOJ_NMG_0111229

Officials say an incident on the Chesapeake Bay Bridge in 2004 shows the center's effectiveness. State transportation police stopped an SUV after a veiled passenger was seen videotaping the bridge in a suspicious manner. The officers called the fusion center, which discovered that the driver was an unindicted co-conspirator in a Chicago case involving Hamas, a U.S.-designated terrorist group.

Eisenberg contacted a prosecutor in Chicago, who quickly obtained an arrest warrant for the driver as a material witness in the Hamas case.

"The 9/11 commission's major criticism was that people didn't talk to each other," said Dennis R. Schrader, Maryland's director of homeland security. "Well, this is an example of how you had state, local and federal all working together. . . . It's really pretty unbelievable."

To some, though, the incident raised questions about what constitutes dangerous behavior.

The driver, Ismail Elbarasse, a U.S. citizen of Palestinian origin living in Annandale, was quickly released on bond, and the material-witness warrant eventually expired. He was not charged with a crime. His family said the veiled woman, Elbarasse's wife, was simply taping the bay while returning from the beach.

"It was regarded in the community as just a case of overreaction to seeing somebody in a head scarf videotaping," said Ibrahim Hooper of the Council on American-Islamic Relations.

Civil liberties advocates worry that the fledgling fusion centers could stray into monitoring people engaged in lawful activities, as some members of new police homeland security units have done. A Georgia homeland security officer, for example, was discovered photographing a protest by vegans at a HoneyBaked Ham store in 2003. Privacy advocates are also concerned about the vast amount of information some fusion centers collect -- and the sometimes vague limits on its use and storage.

"In Phoenix, we're talking about something like 250,000 police reports a year: names, addresses, contact information, business cards, tickets, all the kinds of information that is gathered and that can be of tremendous value at a national analytical level," said John L. Buchanan, Phoenix assistant police chief. He added, however, that "we've really got to be cognizant of the risk" of abuse.

"Fusion center" is a military coinage embraced by civilian homeland security authorities after Sept. 11, 2001. But turf fights involving the FBI, the Department of Homeland Security and national intelligence agencies, as well as local jurisdictions, have delayed the centers' development two years after Congress passed laws to change intelligence.

To streamline the unwieldy domestic intelligence structure, White House homeland security adviser Frances Fragos Townsend laid out a new U.S. road map for intelligence collection on Nov. 27. It urges that fusion centers be incorporated in a national Information Sharing Environment (ISE).

To support the centers' growing role, and to address complaints from states that they cannot pay for them alone, the White House is debating whether to increase funding for them in 2008 and to lift a ban on paying for personnel.

Federal officials emphasize that the centers will be led from the grass roots. Charles E. Allen, chief intelligence officer for the Homeland Security Department, said the centers will be "all hazards, all crime, all threats," targeted not just at terrorism but also at transnational gangs, immigrant smuggling and other threats.

Thomas E. McNamara, ISE manager under the director of national intelligence, said the centers will be state-driven and "primarily analytical."

Amid such assurances, it remains unclear just how much fusing of information is going on day to day.

Existing efforts are insufficient and to blame for "mixed and at times competing messages" from U.S. officials and limited contributions from state and local leaders, Townsend wrote.

For example, New York City leaders warned of "a specific threat" to the city's transit systems in October 2005, which federal officials simultaneously deemed "noncredible." Meanwhile, U.S. officials say information flowing from local and state agencies is often of limited use.

An April report by the National Governors Association found that dissatisfaction with federal information-sharing was growing among state homeland security directors, with 60 percent unhappy about the specificity of intelligence. In congressional hearings, state officials have complained about a lack of federal security clearances and about overlapping, outdated intelligence databases.

DOJ_NMG_0111230

In response, U.S. officials are vowing to speed background checks and to send Homeland Security intelligence officers to work at 18 state and local fusion centers in 2007 and 35 by 2008.

Rep. Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.), incoming chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, would go further. He proposed a new law enforcement assistance program to make intelligence-led policing the 21st-century version of community-oriented policing, into which the federal government has poured $11.3 billion since 1994 to pay for 120,000 local officers.

"The federal government is not reaching out well enough to the intelligence needs of the cop on the beat," Thompson said. "We shouldn't need more blood spilled before we take action necessary to make Americans safer."

The 2006 Bill Of Wrongs (WP)

By Dahlia Lithwick

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

I must confess that I love all those year-end lists of greatest movies and albums and lip glosses and tractors of the past 12 months -- it's reassuring that all human information can be wrestled into bundles of 10. In that spirit, herewith are my top 10 civil liberties nightmares of 2006.

10) Attempt to Get Death Penalty for Zacarias Moussaoui: Long after it was clear that the hapless Frenchman was neither the "20th hijacker" nor a key plotter in the attacks of 9/11, the government pressed to execute him as a "conspirator" in those attacks. Moussaoui's alleged participation? By failing to confess to what he may have known about the plot, which could have led the government to disrupt it, Moussaoui directly caused the deaths of thousands of people. This massive over-reading of the federal conspiracy laws would be laughable were the stakes not so high. Fortunately, a jury rejected the notion that Moussaoui could be executed for the crime of merely wishing there had been a real connection between himself and 9/11.

9) Guantanamo Bay: After the Supreme Court struck down the military tribunals planned to try hundreds of detainees on the U.S. base in Cuba, and after President Bush agreed that it may be a good idea to close down the prison, the worst public relations fiasco since the Japanese internment camps lives on. Prisoners once deemed "among the most dangerous, best-trained, vicious killers on the face of the Earth" are either quietly released or still awaiting trial. The lucky 75 to be tried there will be cheered to hear that the Pentagon has just announced plans to build a $125 million legal complex for the hearings. The government has now officially put more thought into the design of Guantanamo's court bathrooms than the charges against its prisoners.

8) Bashing the Media: Whether the Bush administration is reclassifying previously declassified documents, sidestepping the Freedom of Information Act, threatening journalists for leaks on dubious legal grounds or, most recently, using its subpoena power to try to wring secret documents from the American Civil Liberties Union, the administration has continued its "secrets at any price" campaign. Is this a constitutional crisis? Probably not. Infuriating? Definitely.

7) Slagging the Courts: It starts with the president's complaints about "activist judges" and evolves to congressional threats to appoint an inspector general to oversee federal judges. As public distrust of the bench is fueled, the stripping of courts' authority to hear whole classes of cases -- most recently any habeas corpus claims from Guantanamo detainees -- almost seems reasonable. Each tiny incursion into the independence of the judiciary seems justified. Until you realize that the courts are often the only places that will defend our shrinking civil liberties. This leads to . . .

6) The State Secrets Doctrine: The Bush administration's argument in court is that judges should dismiss entire lawsuits over many of the outrages detailed on this very list. Why? Because the outrageously illegal things are themselves matters of top-secret national security. The administration has raised this claim in relation to secret wiretapping and extraordinary renditions. A government privilege once used to sidestep civil claims has mushroomed into broad immunity for the administration's sometimes criminal behavior.

5) Government Snooping: Take your pick. There's the continued defense of the National Security Agency's warrantless eavesdropping program wherein the president breezily authorized spying on the phone calls of innocent citizens, in violation of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. The FBI's Talon database shows that the government has been spying on non-terrorist groups including Quakers, People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals, and Veterans for Peace. And that's just the stuff we know about.

4) Extraordinary Rendition: So when does it start to become "ordinary" rendition? This government program has us shipping unindicted terrorism suspects abroad for interrogation/torture. Khalid El-Masri, a German citizen, was sent off to Afghanistan for such treatment and then released without charges, based on some government confusion about the small matter of his name. Canadian citizen Maher Arar claims he was tortured in Syria for a year, then released without charges. Although Arar was cleared by a Canadian commission, the government denies wrongdoing.

3) Abuse of Jose Padilla: First, he was "exploring a plan to build and explode a radiological dispersion device, or 'dirty bomb,' in the United States," according to then-Attorney General John D. Ashcroft. Then, he was planning to blow up apartments and, later, was part of a vague terrorism conspiracy to commit jihad in Bosnia and Chechnya. Always, he was a U.S. citizen. After 3 1/2 years in which he was denied the most basic legal rights, it has emerged that Padilla was either outright tortured or near-tortured and, according to experts, is too mentally damaged now to stand trial. The Bush administration supported his motion for a mental competency assessment, in hopes that such a motion would help prevent his torture claims from going to trial. As Yale Law School's Jack Balkin put it: "You can't believe Padilla when he says we tortured him because he's crazy from all the things we did to him."

2) The Military Commissions Act of 2006: This was the "compromise" legislation that gave Bush even more power than he initially had to detain and try so-called enemy combatants. He was effectively handed the authority to define for himself the parameters of interrogation and torture.

1) Hubris : Whenever the courts push back against the administration's unsupportable constitutional ideas -- ideas about "inherent powers" and a "unitary executive" or the "quaint" Geneva Conventions or the limitless presidential powers during wartime -- the Bush response is to repeat the same chorus louder: Every detainee is the worst of the worst, every action taken is legal, necessary and secret. No mistakes, no nuance, no regrets.

Did I miss anything? Let me know. In the meantime, here's wishing you a happy and freer New Year.

New Orleans Levee-risk Study Faulted (LAT)

By Ralph Vartabedian

The Los Angeles Times, December 31, 2006

When the Army Corps of Engineers admitted in June that design flaws in the New Orleans levee system had caused most of the flooding during Hurricane Katrina, it seemingly left little to argue about.

But the fight wasn't over. The Corps is now engaged in an effort to predict how New Orleans would fare in the next big hurricane, and is once again being second-guessed by some of the nation's top civil engineers.

The National Research Council complains that the Corps' official investigation into the levee failures reaches premature conclusions, glosses over problems, and fails in its most important task: giving the public the information it needs to make informed decisions about living in New Orleans.

The Corps' analysis will play a major role in determining the city's future — including whether more than 200,000 former residents could rebuild abandoned neighborhoods and whether insurers can provide coverage at an affordable rate.

The stakes are high, not only for the integrity of the levees around New Orleans but for similar levees that protect millions of Americans who live along vulnerable coastlines and rivers across the nation. Many were built on the same mucky foundations and with the same flawed engineering assumptions as the notorious failed 17th Street levee in New Orleans.

The suspect levees stretch from Florida's Lake Okeechobee to the rivers of California's Central Valley and the Sacramento-San Joaquin Delta, which has 2,300 miles of levees that protect cities and farmland.

The Corps' investigation is essential to understanding California's situation, said Les Harter, the levee chief at the California Department of Water Resources.

"The floodwalls in New Orleans were 15 years old, and they failed," Harter said. "Our levees are 100 years old. We estimate we have one-half the level of protection that New Orleans had."

The Corps is about six months behind schedule in issuing an all-important "risk analysis," a massive body of work that is intended to tell the public how likely New Orleans is to flood again from a big hurricane.

DOJ_NMG_0111232

The analysis is supposed to explain in precise detail how well specific sections of the city are protected against hurricanes, using evidence that hurricanes have intensified in recent years. The analysis would produce detailed maps.

Though the risk analysis has not been completed, the Corps did lay out the methodology it planned to use. Since then, the Corps' work has been scrutinized by two key groups, the National Research Council and the American Society of Civil Engineers.

Its methodology has prompted much of the criticism, along with the Corps' failure to say how confident it is in its assessment or to put the future risk in a historical context that New Orleans residents can understand, according to Richard Luettich, a member of the NRC review team and a professor at the University of North Carolina.

The research council, a quasi-federal organization that brings together the nation's top experts on various public policy issues, urged the Corps in an October report to incorporate the views of other federal agencies with expertise in hurricane assessment and flood protection, something it had failed to do.

The Corps says it has since done so.

Some of the criticism is "misleading," said Ed Link, a University of Maryland professor who is leading the Corps' investigation.

Link, who spent much of his career in the Corps, acknowledged that the risk analysis is well behind schedule and said his team had underestimated the difficulty. But he said the Corps always intended to give the public the information that the NRC says is missing.

Originally, the Corps planned to run 2,000 hurricane scenarios through supercomputers, using a simplified mathematical model to predict how those storms would affect New Orleans. The NRC told the Corps it should use a more sophisticated model that had been developed to analyze Hurricane Katrina.

The sophisticated model, applied to 2,000 possible hurricanes, would have taken too long. So the Corps has reduced the number of hurricane scenarios to 150 and hopes to complete that work by February.

"I think we are going to get better results," Link said.

Wayne Clough, chairman of the NRC review panel and president of the Georgia Institute of Technology, said he is waiting to see if the Corps will satisfy his panel's concerns.

"It is challenging for them," Clough said. "They have good people, and they are taking suggestions."

Perhaps the sharpest criticism has come from academicians led by two UC Berkeley engineering professors, Raymond Seed and Robert Bea. Since the early days after Katrina, Seed and Bea have dogged the Corps with their own technical investigation, financed with grants from the National Science Foundation.

Bea, a pioneer in engineering risk analysis for the petroleum industry and a member of the National Academy of Engineering, thinks the Corps is failing to account for the biggest risk of all: the potential for human error in the design, construction and maintenance of levees.

The Center for Catastrophic Risk Management, which Bea formed at Berkeley, has been developing ways to quantify the risk of human error in engineered systems. Bea says every major disaster involves human error, so it cannot be ignored.

"There are no natural disasters," he said. "There are only natural hazards and human hubris. When you combine hazard with hubris, then you get a disaster."

Link rejects Bea's approach: "We have characterized past human error. How we guess at future behavior, I don't know. There is not a body of knowledge and science in that area that would allow us to do that."

Seed, meanwhile, has sharply criticized the Corps' investigation for failing to put enough blame on water seepage under the foundation walls. Levee foundations across the nation, particularly in California, are more vulnerable to seepage than the Corps realizes, and its flawed New Orleans investigation will result in a dangerous complacency, Seed contends.

Link said, however, that analysis of the nearby soils does not support Seed's contention. The soil is not porous enough to make seepage a serious problem, he added.

While the Corps has struggled with its risk analysis, a private company recently published its own New Orleans risk assessment, with some potentially troubling findings for the city's future. The analysis was done by Risk Management Solutions of Newark, Calif., which provides catastrophic risk analysis for the insurance industry.

DOJ_NMG_0111233

The report found evidence that growing hurricane intensities, the tendency of land along the Gulf Coast to sink, and rising sea levels have raised the long-term threat to New Orleans.

In an examination of some neighborhoods, it found that the highest-risk areas could require insurance premiums of $14,000 per year, said Patricia Grossi, one of the report's authors.

The massive risks to the insurance industry were underscored in a court ruling late last month, in which federal Judge Stanwood R. Duval Jr. ruled that insurers might have to pay for much of Katrina's damage to homes. The insurers had thought they specifically excluded flood damage from coverage. But Duval said the policies excluded only natural floods, not those attributed to human error because the levees failed.

"An insured may reasonably expect overtopping of a levee, but on the other hand an insured may not reasonably expect that levees designed and certified by the United States Corps of Engineers would fail as a result of negligent design and construction as has been alleged," Duval wrote.

The ruling came as part of a massive consolidated civil case that names the Army Corps and insurers as defendants.

The ruling could provide coverage for about $20 billion of damage to homes caused by Katrina, said Joseph Bruno, an attorney for the plaintiffs.

Even now, the Corps is attempting to improve the levee system so that by 2010 it might fail on average only once every 100 years, a standard that seems weak to many experts.

"Is it acceptable to have the worst natural disaster in U.S. history occur over and over again?" asked David Daniel, president of the University of Texas at Dallas and the leader of the American Society of Civil Engineers team that is reviewing the Corps' Katrina investigation. "I don't think it is."

"Until the banking and insurance industries believe the risks are tolerable, you are not going to see much building going on in New Orleans," Daniel said. "They understand risk as well as anybody."

WAR NEWS:

Hussein Video Grips Iraq; Attacks Go On (NYT)

By John F. Burns

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 30 — After nearly three decades of living with the brutal repression of Saddam Hussein and the violent aftermath of his overthrow by American troops, Iraq responded with a mixture of rejoicing, violence and muted reflection on Saturday to the news that their former dictator had been hanged in one of the grimmest of his own execution chambers.

This nation of 27 million people spent much of the day crowding around television sets to watch mesmerizing replays of a videotape that showed the 69-year-old Mr. Hussein being led to the gallows at dawn by five masked executioners, and having a noose fashioned from a thick rope of yellow hemp lowered around his neck. In the final moments shown on the videotape, he seemed almost unnaturally calm and cooperative.

The message seemed to be that he had lived his final moments with unflinching dignity and courage, reinforcing the legend of himself as the Arab world's strongman that he cultivated while in power. But the videotape, released by the government, offered only a partial sense of how Mr. Hussein went to his death, according to accounts given later by some of the 25 people who attended the execution, including senior officials of the new Shiite-led government.

In their telling, the ousted ruler, a Sunni, spent much of his last half-hour, after arriving at the execution block at the Khadimiyah prison in northern Baghdad, in querulous and at times irascible exchanges with the Shiite guards and executioners assigned to hang him and with some of the Shiite witnesses.

His bitter defiance, in the last moments of his life, was focused on his old enemies: the United States, Iran and their "spies," a word commonly used at the height of his tyranny to justify the merciless persecution of his domestic opponents.

The death sentence was to be carried out within 30 days of the rejection of his appeal, but the hanging was completed by the end of the fifth day, which took some officials in Washington by surprise and left some American legal officials, who have worked with the Iraqi court, uncomfortable.

Within hours of the execution, at least 75 people were killed in nine bombing attacks of the kind that Sunni insurgents commonly carry out against Shiites. In the mainly Shiite districts of Hurriyah and Sayidah in Baghdad, separate sequences in which car bombs detonated in close succession caused at least 39 deaths. Two other car bombings hit Baghdad before nightfall, one outside a children's hospital in the Iskan neighborhood, and another that killed two people outside a mosque in the mainly Sunni district of Adhamiya, the Interior Ministry said.

Another vehicle bomb detonated in a popular fish market in the Shiite holy town of Kufa, 100 miles south of Baghdad, killing 34 people and wounding 38 others, the ministry said. In the Kufa attack, an angry mob set on the suspected bomber and beat him to death, the police said. Five more victims died in a suicide bombing in the northern city of Tal Afar, another center of violence between Sunnis and Shiites.

The United States military command announced six more combat deaths, bringing the number of American troops killed in December to 109, the deadliest month for American deaths since November 2004, according to [a news agency].

With bombing attacks a long-established feature of the struggle for power across Iraq, it was impossible to say whether the Saturday bombings were connected to the execution.

But statements by remnants of the ousted Baath Party, the political vehicle Mr. Hussein rode to power, had promised retaliation, in the form of a new wave of bombings, if the death sentence passed by an Iraqi court eight weeks ago was carried out.

American military commanders took the threat seriously enough to put troops in volatile areas on high alert. On Saturday, a statement on the party's Web site urged Iraqis to strike at the United States and Iran to avenge Mr. Hussein, but cautioned that they must avoid full civil war, Agence France-Presse reported.

From accounts given by witnesses, the hanging had strong sectarian overtones. Within minutes of arriving at the execution block from the American detention center near the airport, where he spent more than 1,000 days in solitary confinement, Mr. Hussein, who may have been the only Sunni present, argued with the guards and executioners.

The men who guided him to the gallows were drawn from the country's Shiite south, identifiable by their darker skins and accents. The Shiites of southern Iraq harbor a strong hatred for Mr. Hussein for his repression of uprisings there, a repression that killed tens of thousands of Shiites.

The execution block scenes offered a grim echo of the sectarian struggle now convulsing Iraq, as Sunni insurgents and Shiite death squads engage in a implacable cycle of revenge that has killed as many as 3,700 civilians a month this year, and prompted many Iraqis to say that the killings ushered in by the overthrow of Mr. Hussein are becoming as brutal, and numerous, as anything he inflicted.

Even the decision to hasten Mr. Hussein to the gallows took on a sectarian edge, as Iraq's new Shiite leaders presented the hanging as a message to Sunnis that their days as Iraq's rulers are gone forever.

The message was clear in a statement issued by Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, whose "national unity" government of Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds has splintered into ethnic factions, with the Shiite religious groups that swept last December's elections increasingly assertive of their majority rights.

The statement, which he signed before a battery of Iraqi television cameras, amounted to a warning to the Sunnis that their hopes of ever regaining power are lost. "Saddam's execution puts an end to all their pathetic gambles on a return to dictatorship," he said, referring to the former Baathists at the core of the Sunni insurgency. "I urge followers of the ousted regime to reconsider their stance, because the door is still open to anyone who has no innocent blood on his hands to help in rebuilding Iraq."

At his death, Mr. Hussein had ceased to be much of a major rallying point, even among diehard Sunnis, whose battles in the past three years have been less about restoring Mr. Hussein to power — a chimerical goal, considering that the former leader was America's most closely-guarded prisoner in Iraq — than about reversing the political transition from Sunni to Shiite rule.

Mr. Maliki short-circuited a bitter internal debate within the government over how quickly to send Mr. Hussein to the gallows by signing an order for the execution on Friday night, voiding a procedure that would have required the three-man presidency council — composed of a Kurd, a Sunni and Shiite — to all vote for the hanging.

DOJ_NMG_0111235

Mr. Hussein and two of his associates were sentenced to death on Nov. 5 for their roles in the persecution of the Shiite town of Dujail, where an alleged assassination attempt against Mr. Hussein in 1982 was followed by the execution of 148 Shiite men and teenage boys. After the three men's convictions, Mr. Maliki led the push for a hanging before the end of the year.

After the sentencing, American officials were confident that appeals might delay the hanging until the spring. But Mr. Maliki pressed for a speeded appeal process, and secured a confirmation of the death sentences within three weeks.

A senior Bush administration official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Saturday that the Kurds had called for a delay, so the former Iraqi dictator could be prosecuted for crimes against them. But the official said there was no desire from the United States to seek a delay in the execution.

Administration officials said President Bush had gone to sleep before Mr. Hussein's hanging, but had been told it was imminent. He awoke Saturday at 4:40 a.m. Central Time, said a White House spokesman, David Almacy, and at 5:55 a.m. received a 10-minute telephone briefing about the execution from his national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley. The president and Mr. Hadley discussed the execution and the worldwide reaction to it.

"The president remarked that he was pleased with the culmination of the Iraqi judicial process, and justice was done," Mr. Almacy said.

During the 1980s, the United States had supported Iraq under Mr. Hussein in its war with Iran.

Among Shiites elsewhere in Iraq, there were sporadic eruptions of joy at the hanging, marked by dancing in the streets and the firing of automatic weapons into the air, as the early morning radio and television bulletins carried word that Mr. Hussein was dead. But the more general mood, even among Shiites, was one of subdued reflection, as if millions of Iraqis had exhausted their emotional and psychological reserves during the long years of violence.

Apart from the bombings, the most palpable Sunni reaction to the hanging took the form of scattered protests, some of them violent, that swept through Tikrit, Mr. Hussein's hometown, and across Anbar Province, west of Baghdad, the principal heartland of the Sunni insurgency.

In one major insurgent stronghold, Ramadi, American troops were reported to have fired in the air to scatter demonstrators, who were marching through the streets hoisting portraits of Mr. Hussein and firing automatic weapons into the air. In Falluja, 30 miles west of Baghdad, witnesses said crowds of angry men took to the streets within 90 minutes of the hanging, attacking a police station and a courthouse and setting them ablaze.

Among those Iraqis who watched and re-watched the government's video of the hanging, there seemed to be a widespread view that Mr. Hussein accepted his fate, at the end, with a composure and courage at odds with the psychotic figure he cut during his 24 years in power. In that time, he ordered the killings of thousands of his fellow citizens, many of whom ended up in mass graves scattered across Iraq's oil-rich deserts.

Throughout Saturday, Iraqi government officials put out conflicting signals as to what they planned to do with Mr. Hussein's body. An official in the governor's office in Salahaddin, Mr. Hussein's home province, said in a telephone interview that a delegation led by the governor, Hamad Shegata, and including and the head of Mr. Hussein's Albu-Nasir tribe, Sheikh Ali Al-Nida, had traveled to Baghdad during the day to arrange the handover of the body for burial in Awja, near Tikrit, his hometown.

Late on Saturday, a [news agency] report quoting one of Mr. Hussein's defense lawyers in Amman, Jordan, and a Muslim cleric in Tikrit, said Sheikh Nida had taken possession of the body and returned north with it to Awja. Muslim tradition requires that burials be completed before dusk on the day of death.

But a political adviser to Prime Minister Maliki, Bassam al-Husseini, said there were no plans to hand over the body until the risk of violence over Mr. Hussein's hanging subsided, a period that he said could run for weeks or months.

In the meantime, he said, the body would be kept in "a secret place," where it would be secure against desecration by his enemies. "If we bury him in Tikrit, people will dig him up and tear the body apart," he said.

On The Gallows, Curses For U.S. And "Traitors" (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 30 — Saddam Hussein never bowed his head, until his neck snapped.

DOJ_NMG_0111236

His last words were equally defiant.

"Down with the traitors, the Americans, the spies and the Persians."

The final hour of Iraq's former ruler began about 5 a.m., when American troops escorted him from Camp Cropper, near the Baghdad airport, to Camp Justice, another American base at the heart of the city.

There, he was handed over to a newly trained unit of the Iraqi National Police, with whom he would later exchange curses. Iraq took full custody of Mr. Hussein at 5:30 a.m.

Two American helicopters flew 14 witnesses from the Green Zone to the execution site — a former headquarters of the Istikhbarat, the deposed government's much feared military intelligence outfit, now inside the American base.

Mr. Hussein was escorted into the room where the gallows, with its red railing, stood, greeted at the door by three masked executioners known as ashmawi. Several of the witnesses present — including Munkith al-Faroun, the deputy prosecutor for the court; Munir Haddad, the deputy chief judge for the Iraqi High Tribunal; and Sami al-Askari, a member of Parliament — described in detail how the execution unfolded and independently recounted what was said.

To protect himself from the bitter cold before dawn during the short trip, Mr. Hussein wore a 1940s-style wool cap, a scarf and a long black coat over a white collared shirt.

His executioners wore black ski masks, but Mr. Hussein could still see their deep brown skin and hear their dialects, distinct to the Shiite southern part of the country, where he had so brutally repressed two separate uprisings.

The small room had a foul odor. It was cold, had bad lighting and a sad, melancholic atmosphere. With the witnesses and 11 other people — including guards and the video crew — it was cramped.

Mr. Hussein's eyes darted about, trying to take in just who was going to put an end to him.

The executioners took his hat and his scarf.

Mr. Hussein, whose hands were bound in front of him, was taken to the judge's room next door. He followed each order he was given.

He sat down and the verdict, finding him guilty of crimes against humanity, was read aloud.

"Long live the nation!" Mr. Hussein shouted. "Long live the people! Long live the Palestinians!"

He continued shouting until the verdict was read in full, and then he composed himself again.

When he rose to be led back to the execution room at 6 a.m., he looked strong, confident and calm. Whatever apprehension he may have had only minutes earlier had faded.

The general prosecutor asked Mr. Hussein to whom he wanted to give his Koran. He said Bandar, the son of Awad al-Bandar, the former chief justice of the Revolutionary Court who was also to be executed soon.

The room was quiet as everyone began to pray, including Mr. Hussein. "Peace be upon Mohammed and his holy family."

Two guards added, "Supporting his son Moktada, Moktada, Moktada."

Mr. Hussein seemed a bit stunned, swinging his head in their direction.

They were talking about Moktada al-Sadr, the firebrand cleric whose militia is now committing some of the worst violence in the sectarian fighting; he is the son of a revered Shiite cleric, Muhammad Sadiq al-Sadr, whom many believe Mr. Hussein ordered murdered.

"Moktada?" he spat out, mixing sarcasm and disbelief.

Mowaffak al-Rubaie, Iraq's national security adviser, asked Mr. Hussein if he had any remorse or fear.

"No," he said bluntly. "I am a militant and I have no fear for myself. I have spent my life in jihad and fighting aggression. Anyone who takes this route should not be afraid."

Mr. Rubaie, standing shoulder to shoulder with Mr. Hussein, asked him about the killing of the elder Mr. Sadr.

They were standing so close to each other that others could not hear the exchange.

One of the guards, though, became angry. "You have destroyed us," the masked man yelled. "You have killed us. You have made us live in destitution."

Mr. Hussein was scornful: "I have saved you from destitution and misery and destroyed your enemies, the Persians and Americans."

The guard cursed him. "God damn you."

DOJ_NMG_0111237

Mr. Hussein replied, “God damn you.”

Two witnesses, apparently uninvolved in selecting the guards, exchanged a quiet joke, saying they gathered that the goal of disbanding the militias had yet to be accomplished.

The deputy prosecutor, Mr. Faroun, berated the guards, saying, “I will not accept any offense directed at him.”

Mr. Hussein was led up to the gallows without a struggle. His hands were unbound, put behind his back, then fastened again. He showed no remorse. He held his head high.

The executioners offered him a hood. He refused. They explained that the thick rope could cut through his neck and offered to use the scarf he had worn earlier to keep that from happening. Mr. Hussein accepted.

He stood on the high platform, with a deep hole beneath it.

He said a last prayer. Then, with his eyes wide open, no stutter or choke in his throat, he said his final words cursing the Americans and the Persians.

At 6:10 a.m., the trapdoor swung open. He seemed to fall a good distance, but he died swiftly. After just a minute, his body was still. His eyes still were open but he was dead. Despite the scarf, the rope cut a gash into his neck.

His body stayed hanging for another nine minutes as those in attendance broke out in prayer, praising the Prophet, at the death of a dictator.

TV Faced Dilemma On Hanging Coverage (LAT)

By Matea Gold

The Los Angeles Times, December 31, 2006

NEW YORK — American television channels and networks were initially spared the thorny decision of whether to air graphic footage of Saddam Hussein's execution after the Iraqi government declined to release video of the moments of his actual hanging early Saturday in Baghdad.

But hours later, a video of the hanging, which was apparently shot on a cellphone, surfaced on Arabic television channels and websites such as Google, underscoring how quickly controversial images rocket through cyberspace, whether or not there have been attempts to control them.

The jerky images show the noose being placed around Hussein's neck and angry shouts exchanged between him and those in attendance. Hussein can be seen falling through the trapdoor as it opens, but the actual hanging is not visible. Moments later, the camera pans in and shows his face.

For most of Saturday, American TV relied on a tape made available earlier that showed only the moments leading up to the hanging.

CNN and Fox News also aired a grainy video of his body, his head twisted at a sharp angle as his shrouded corpse lay on a stretcher.

ABC, CBS and NBC decided to show a still photo from that footage, apparently made with a cellphone camera.

Both videos were originally shown by Iraqi television stations, which aired them several hours after the execution.

As of Saturday evening here, no American broadcast network or cable channel had aired the more explicit parts of the newer video, although Fox News ran a truncated version it said had been taken from Al Jazeera, ending after the noose is placed around Hussein's neck. CBS News and CNN decided to air portions of the video before the trapdoor was released. ABC News said it would not use any of the newer video.

The origins of the newer video were not immediately clear, but its existence, and ready availability on the Internet, spotlighted the challenge that faces news organizations as Internet sites continue to supplant the traditional media as a source of information.

The possibility that video of the actual execution would be available had triggered intense discussions for the last two days among top executives at all the networks.

"It's a very delicate issue because it could be gruesome material, but at the same time, he was a gruesome leader," said David Rhodes, Fox News' vice president of news, before the cellphone video of the hanging surfaced.

DOJ_NMG_0111238

A cameraman from the Iraqi prime minister's office apparently filmed the entire execution, but the government did not release the footage of the actual hanging. TV executives said they continued to receive conflicting reports about whether the Iraqi government would eventually release video of the actual execution, but added that the additional element was not necessary to convey the significance of the event.

"I think that looking at his face prior to him being executed, it sends a pretty powerful message," said Bob Murphy, senior vice president at ABC News. "And then showing the conclusion of him afterward — that's a pretty complete story."

For Saddam's Page In History, A Final Link On YouTube (WP)

By Philip Kennicott

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

When ABC broke into its Friday newsmagazine, "20/20," to announce that Saddam Hussein was finally dead, at the end of a rope, in the pre-dawn darkness of Baghdad, it interrupted a report on "viral video."

Viral video is the dizzying Web phenomenon in which news clips, homemade videos, naughty celebrities caught on cellphone cameras, and the best snippets culled from our endless, 500-channel, 24-hour Television Burlesque, are posted, downloaded and e-mailed from Manhattan to Bangalore and back again in the blink of an eye. ABC gathered a few lightweight social commentators to give gravitas to what was really just a shameless excuse to replay footage of horrendous car accidents, Jerry Springer-like brawls and people getting gunned down in Iraq.

And now we bring you news of Saddam Hussein's execution, video to follow. We hope. And it did follow. Americans woke up on the next to last day of a dismal year of chaos, civil war and general mayhem to find, with a few easy clicks of a mouse, what they were assured was "the final chapter" of the Iraqi dictator's sorry life. ABC got lucky to have it all go down while "20/20" was telling us about viral video, because here it was: The first great Shakespearean death scene of the YouTube generation.

Except that when the video arrived, no matter how many times you watched it, the images seemed to be neutral, gray, bizarre. Hussein offered nothing to his enemies, no meltdown or tears or panic. He looked ashen, dazed and exhausted, and he submitted to the placing of the noose with the affectless detachment of someone who has determined to get through an ordeal by checking out emotionally from the whole scene. Although video of his actual death wasn't immediately circulated, it seems Hussein approached his end bravely, so long as one understands that bravery is not a virtue in itself (like loyalty, bravery is only good if it is bravery in service of something good). But it was an awkward scene and everyone involved, including Hussein, seemed to want it over quickly.

It was odd to see him being touched and manipulated, especially as the news networks began showing footage of him from his days in power, in which there always seemed to be a space around him. Hussein's generals and other toadies kept their distance, reinforcing his prestige, and also his volatility. He was a big man, whose eyes were always moving, warily, which made him bristle with aggression even when laughing. But here he was in a small, cramped space, with too many people working to get him into position for the hanging.

His personal space had already been once and forever triumphantly violated with the dissemination of images of a wild-haired and filthy Hussein submitting to medical inspection after his capture. But it was odd to see that space violated again, one last time, especially as the news of the execution flowed seamlessly into the career retrospective and the endless commentary.

People who are important enough to live their lives in the constant glare of the camera don't really have "final chapters," because when it's all over, their images are endlessly reprocessed and remixed into a kind of permanent simultaneity, like the jumble of birth, death, miracles and martyrdom one finds on a complex altarpiece. The idea that Hussein had lived his "final chapter" was an excuse to play the whole drama over again, from beginning to end. And yet no matter how many times one watched it, from the black-and-white footage of a young thug on the rise, to the swaggering, khaki-green era we remember from the first Gulf War, to his years as a prisoner, disheveled at first, then somber in his black suits, no matter how many times the life was reenacted, a sense of finality never emerged.

For the obvious reason: Hussein's legacy is being lived out every day in Iraq and will continue to haunt his people for an indefinite bloody future. For as long as he was alive, Hussein was useful for an important American argument about the war. He was a bad guy; we captured him; he would face justice. This miniature narrative, contained within the broader one of a war gone terribly wrong, is losing its force. And with Hussein dead it will likely become almost entirely inert. Another video clip, easily found on the Web, showed Hussein dead, wrapped in a white cloth, with his face clearly visible. The camera lingered over the image for a strangely long time, as if to say, yes, he's still dead.

Saddam Hussein Is Still Dead is not a rallying cry. But the images of his execution and his body seem to point to a new era in the way images are used politically, what might be called a post-propaganda era. So many images that were supposed to have such profound impact on public perception -- the now infamous "Mission Accomplished" photo op or Abu Musab al-Zarqawi's bloody head tastefully framed for the cameras -- have failed to connect with the reality of either public opinion, or the facts on the ground. This image means progress, we're told, but there isn't any progress. This image is a final chapter, but the blood still flows. For a public media campaign to work, at least some of the politically calculated captions placed on images must, in the end, turn out to be true.

The current administration has attempted to construct a classic media argument in support of the war at a time when "the media" are dissolving and re-forming into something new, something in which the images we wish to see are more important than the images we are forced to see. Even before the execution video arrived, television people were publicly clucking about what they would or wouldn't show. It will be tasteful, they assured us. But their efforts at gatekeeping are now almost entirely irrelevant. The public will find exactly as much of the death of Hussein as it wants, and people will watch for as long as it holds any novelty or fascination. Taste is a collective worry, but in this new world of viral videos, you can construct your own war, personally tailored to your personal bloodlust. Saddam Hussein is dead, the video is out there. Enjoy.

Feared And Pitiless; Fearful And Pitiable (NYT)

By John F. Burns

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

NOBODY who experienced Iraq under the tyranny of Saddam Hussein could imagine, at the height of the terror he imposed on his countrymen, ever pitying him. Pitiless himself, he sent hundreds of thousands of his countrymen to miserable deaths, in the wars he started against Iran and Kuwait, in the torture chambers of his secret police, or on the gallows that became an industry at Abu Ghraib and other charnel houses across Iraq. Iraqis who were caught in his spider's web of evil, and survived, tell of countless tortures, of the psychopathic pleasure the former dictator appeared to take from inflicting suffering and death.

Yet there was a moment when I pitied him, and it came back to me after the nine Iraqi appeal judges upheld the death sentence against Saddam last week, setting off the countdown to his execution. As I write this, flying hurriedly back to Baghdad from an interrupted Christmas break, Saddam makes his own trip to the gallows with an indecent haste, without the mercy of family farewells and other spare acts of compassion that lend at least a pretense of civility to executions under law in kinder jurisdictions. From all we know of the preparations, Saddam's death was to be a miserable and lonely one, as stark and undignified as Iraq's new rulers can devise.

Many Iraqis, perhaps most, will spare no sympathies for him. However much he may have suffered in the end, they will say, it could never be enough to atone for a long dark night he imposed on his people. Still, there was that moment, on July 1, 2004, when Saddam became, for me, if only briefly, an object of compassion.

He had been brought to a makeshift courtroom in the grounds of a former presidential palace in Baghdad that became, as Camp Victory, the American military headquarters in Iraq. It was the first time he had appeared in public since his capture six months earlier in a coffin-like subterranean bolt-hole near his hometown of Tikrit when he emerged unkempt yet proclaiming himself to American soldiers who hauled him from his hiding place to be "Saddam Hussein, president of Iraq," and ready to negotiate with his captors.

We know, from accounts given by his Iraqi and American interrogators, that the old Saddam quickly reasserted himself, heaping contempt on the new generation of Iraqi leaders who were taken out to a detention center near Baghdad International Airport the next day to verify for themselves, and for the world, that the man the Americans had seized was indeed their former tormentor.

So when the day arrived for his first court appearance, starting the process that led over the next 30 months to his two trials for crimes against humanity, there seemed little doubt to me which Saddam would show up to face the charges — Saddam the indignant, Saddam the self-proclaimed champion of Iraqi and Pan-Arab nationalism, Saddam the self-anointed figurehead of the insurgency that was already, then, beginning to look like a nightmare for the invaders.

His American captors had flown Saddam and 11 of his top henchmen to Camp Victory by helicopter, and led them hooded and shackled at the waist and ankles to the threshold of the mosque annex that served as a courtroom. Only at the door to the court were the hoods and shackles removed, clattering to the floor a moment or two before the door opened to show Defendant No. 1, Saddam Hussein al-Majid, standing clasped at the elbow between two Iraqi guards.

From 20 feet away on an observer's bench, seated beside the late Peter Jennings of ABC News and Christiane Amanpour of CNN, I caught my first glimpse of the man who had become in my years of visiting Iraq under his rule, a figure of mythic brutality, a man so feared that the mention of his name would set the hard, unsmiling men assigned to visiting reporters as "minders" to shaking with fear, and on one occasion, in my experience, to abject weeping.

But this was not that Saddam. The man who stepped into the court had the demeanor of a condemned man, his eyes swiveling left, then right, his gait unsteady, his curious, lisping voice raised to a tenor that resonated fear. Quickly, he fixed his gaze on the handful of foreigners in the court, and I had my own moment of anxiety when it came to my mind that he was intent on remembering the faces of the non-Iraqis that were there to witness his humiliation, perhaps to get word through to his lawyers, and then on to the insurgents, that we were to be punished for our intrusion. It was only later, after I learned what he had been told before being taken from his cell to the court, that I understood that our presence meant something else to him entirely, that with foreigners present, he was not going to be summarily hanged or shot.

THE Americans who were his jailers in the first days after his capture — aboard an American aircraft carrier and then at a converted detention center known as Camp Cropper at the edge of Baghdad's airport — had chosen, on that summer day, to give Saddam a taste of the fear that he exhilarated in imposing on others. All he was told was that he was being taken "to face Iraqi justice." Small wonder, as the architect of a quarter-century of repression, that he should fear that he was about to suffer the torture and grisly death that he had inflicted on so many others.

At that instant, I felt sorry for him, as a man in distress and perhaps, too, as a once almighty figure reduced to ignominy. But the expression of that pity to the Iraqis present marked the distance between those, like me, who had taken the measure of Saddam's terror as a visitor, shielded from the worst of it by the minders and the claustrophobic world of closely guarded hotels and supervised Information Ministry trips, and Iraqis who lived through it with no shield.

That I could feel pity for him struck the Iraqis with whom I talked as evidence of a profound moral corruption. I came to understand how a Westerner used to the civilities of democracy and due process — even a reporter who thought he grasped the depths of Saddam's depravity — fell short of the Iraqis' sense, forged by years of brutality, of the power of his unmitigated evil.

After that initial encounter with Saddam, I saw him many times walking within 10 feet of my feet in the glass-walled press gallery in the courtroom at the former Baath Party headquarters, chosen as a venue for his trials by the Regime Crimes Liaison Office, the unit created by the United States Justice Department, to help Iraqi judges and lawyers create what became the Iraqi High Tribunal, the special court designated to try high-ranking members of the old regime. But the Saddam who dominated that courtroom was another figure — haughty, defiant, often beside himself with anger, but, above all, remorseless. If the death penalty held any fear for him, when it was handed down in November, for the killing of 148 men and teenage boys during a systematic persecution of the Shiite town of Dujail in 1982, he never showed it.

Almost the only chink in his prideful armor showed when he demanded at the Dujail trial that he be shot by firing squad, the privilege as he told it, due to him as the — still legitimate, as he claimed — commander in chief of Iraq's armed forces. That plea was quickly denied by the chief judge. It was a point never again raised by Saddam, who took, at the end, to proclaiming his eagerness to die as a "martyr" for Iraq, and his belief that this would earn his passage to paradise. But the plea to be spared hanging suggested that fear — of humiliation, if not of death — was a close companion during the 1,000-odd days he spent in solitary confinement in Camp Cropper.

Of other strains of humanity there was little sign. During the Dujail trial, and just as much during the Anfal trial that followed, at which Saddam and six other defendants were accused of murdering as many as 180,000 Kurds in the late 1980's, he showed no hint of remorse as survivors of the torture chambers and the desert internment camps and, in the case of the Anfal campaign, the chemical weapons attacks and the mass graves, told their pitiful stories. Head to one side, hand pressed to his head, fingers splayed, writing detailed notes on yellow legal pads, Saddam listened impassively to the accounts of women hung upside down to be beaten, of sons holding wet cloths to their faces and finding the twisted bodies of mothers and fathers and sisters and brothers heaped in an agony of death from mustard-gas attacks, and of young men who scrambled back to life from beneath the bloodied bodies of fellow villagers in remote pits scraped from the desert wadis of Iraq.

LIKE some ghastly accountant with an obsession for detail but no morsel of pity, Saddam limited his questions to peripheral issues: What were the precise geographic coordinates of the mass graves? How could a boy no more than 10 at the time recall so precisely the details of a chemical attack? Why should anyone credit the testimony of a man — brother to seven others who were executed after the alleged attack at Dujail — who admitted he belonged to Dawa, an Iran-backed religious party?

Not once did he avail himself of what seemed like the expedient response of a man who had pleaded not guilty to involvement in any of these crimes: an expression of sorrow for the victims, albeit coupled with renewed denials of his responsibility.

Like many another dictator before him, Saddam so sealed himself off from his own people, in his scores of palaces, and on his carefully staged, video-recorded walkabouts among crowds of ululating citizens, that he seemed never to grasp, even in the extremities of his last weeks, how hated he was by his people. In the courtroom, he insisted, repeatedly, that he remained Iraq's lawful president and thus immune to prosecution, even as the judges responded by calling him "ex-president" and ordering him to sit down. He was sustained in this make-believe world by his former acolytes, who would stand in the dark as he entered, greeting him with expressions of undying fealty.

Among the most insistent of these courtiers were two men who were scheduled to die with him on the gallows after their appeals in the Dujail case were denied, his half-brother, Barzan Ibrahim al-Tikriti and Awad al-Bandar, chief judge of the revolutionary court who passed the death sentences on the men and boys from Dujail, in a court hearing that lasted only hours with the dock too crowded for many of the condemned even to enter the court, and with no legal representation. This miserable precedent appeared to make no impact on Saddam and his fellow defendants, who protested at every opportunity during their own trials at the denial of what they claimed were their proper rights and comforts. The quality of the prison food — including American military rations known as meals-ready-to-eat — was one such issue; the quality of the cigarettes given to them another.

Saddam, prideful to the last, left much of the caviling over prison conditions to his erstwhile minions. And shortly before he was sentenced to death, he demonstrated, inadvertently, that in the shrunken world of his captivity he remained the leader who dare not be defied. An American official who worked closely with the Iraqi court told of watching on a closed-circuit relay as Saddam and other defendants in the Dujail trial waited one day in a holding room off the courtroom floor. At the time, Saddam had declared a hunger strike on his own and his associates' behalf in protest of the Dujail case continuing after the walkout of the defense lawyers, who had been replaced by counsel appointed by the court.

At one end of the room, visible on the surveillance cameras, was a table laid with food, including cellophane-wrapped oatmeal biscuits of the kind available in every American military canteen in Iraq. Thinking his fellow defendants were distracted, one of the accused, Taha Yassin Ramadan, a former vice president renowned even among Saddam's henchman for his brutality, slipped two pockets of biscuits into his pocket, only for Saddam to march on him demanding to know who gave him permission to eat. Mr. Ramadan, the American official said, denied he had taken anything from the table. "Empty your pockets, you betrayer!" Saddam demanded. Whereupon Mr. Ramadan lamely admitted his guilt and, with the sheepish deference born of two decades in Saddam's inner circle, returned the biscuits to his basket.

In Hussein's Last Minutes, Jeers And A Cry For Calm (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 30 -- In the predawn hours Saturday, ousted president of Iraq Saddam Hussein stood calmly at the gallows, a thick yellow noose around his neck, ready to die with an orderliness that now eludes Iraq. Three executioners, men in black ski masks and leather jackets, stood behind him. Hussein said, "Ya Allah," preparing himself for the platform he stood on to open up.

DOJ_NMG_0111242

Suddenly, witnesses recalled, the room erupted in Shiite religious chants as the Shiite Muslims in the audience seized the moment they had long sought. One man yelled, "Moqtada, Moqtada, Moqtada," unveiling his loyalty to radical anti-American cleric Moqtada al-Sadr.

Hussein smiled, the witnesses said, and asked sarcastically, "Moqtada?"

In his final moments, shortly after the dawn call to prayer, Hussein, a Sunni Arab, came face to face with today's Iraq, which he had never met, having spent the past three years in U.S. custody. Since his capture, the Shiites his government violently repressed have come to power. They were the last people Hussein saw before his death.

"Go to hell," a voice yelled in response to Hussein's remark, according to a grainy videotape taken by a cellphone that was flashed on television networks Saturday night.

"Long live Muhammad Bakr Sadr," yelled another voice. Bakr Sadr was the uncle of Moqtada al-Sadr and founder of the Dawa party, of which Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki is a senior leader.

Then, Munqith al-Faroun, who prosecuted Hussein, yelled: "The man is facing execution. Please don't."

The room quieted.

According to accounts from five witnesses, as well as Iraqi and U.S. officials, Hussein, as he neared death, wore ironed black pants, an ivory white shirt and a black, luxurious topcoat. His shoes were polished to a shine. He dyed his hair black and trimmed his silver beard. He waited with dignity.

Hussein began to recite an Islamic prayer.'Come . . . at 3:30'

On Friday night, Maliki's office informed 14 men that they might get a phone call, officials said. Since Tuesday, when Iraq's highest court had upheld Hussein's death sentence, it was clear that his execution would arrive soon. The Maliki government had wanted to execute Hussein early Friday, U.S. and Iraqi officials said in interviews. But legal issues, security concerns and Iraq's political divide postponed the plan.

Shiite leaders, and some moderate Sunni Arabs, wanted to hang Hussein swiftly, fearing that any delay could inflame violence and deepen the nation's sectarian rifts. The Kurds wanted to execute Hussein at the end of the ongoing genocide trial, in which Hussein was charged with orchestrating the killings of tens of thousands of northern Kurds, many with chemical weapons. Other politicians worried about turning Hussein into a martyr if they executed him during the Islamic holiday of Eid al-Adha.

"Up to the last moment, the matter was being debated," said Mariam Rayis, a Maliki adviser.

But by late Friday, Hussein's execution papers were signed. Munir Haddad, a judge on Iraq's appeals court, received the call at 1:30 a.m. Saturday. A voice said, "Come to the prime minister's office at 3:30 in order to carry out the execution," Haddad recalled.

He arrived, along with Faroun, and joined the rest of the group of 14. They included the acting minister of justice, national security officials, members of parliament and several top Maliki advisers. About 5 a.m., they stepped into two U.S. military helicopters, seven in each. They flew 15 minutes to an Iraqi army base overlooking the Tigris River in Baghdad's Khadimiya neighborhood, Haddad said. It once housed Hussein's military intelligence service, where his opponents were executed.

About the same time, U.S. military officials took Hussein from his prison cell at Camp Cropper, near the Baghdad airport, and flew him to the Green Zone, the fortified enclave that houses the U.S. Embassy and senior Iraqi officials. There, they handed Hussein over to the Iraqis, U.S. officials said. The Iraqis then drove Hussein in an armored convoy to Khadimiya.The Hangmen Assemble

When the helicopters landed, Haddad, Faroun and the acting justice minister were rushed into a small, spare room with a desk, several chairs and a refrigerator. Ten minutes later, Hussein walked in. He wore a wool hat and sat down on a chair before Haddad, who was behind the desk. Hussein's hands were locked in front of him with plastic handcuffs.

"He seemed normal, not confused nor afraid," Haddad recalled.

Haddad, following Iraqi law, started to read to Hussein the verdict and the ruling by the appeals court. But as he read, Hussein shouted: "We are in Heaven, and our enemies are in Hell" and "Long live the people, long live jihad, and long live the nation."

Then he directed his anger at two enemies he went to war with during three decades of rule.

DOJ_NMG_0111243

"Down with the Persians and the Americans," Hussein said.

But Haddad kept going.

"He tried to raise his voice, but my voice was higher than his," Haddad said.

At the end of the reading, Hussein's hangmen arrived. Hussein met privately with a Sunni cleric for a few minutes.A Defense of His Reign

They took Hussein to a large room with no windows and a staircase leading to a tall, red gallows with a large pit at the bottom.

"It was very cold," Haddad said. "It had the stench of death."

Haddad and Faroun walked with Hussein and his hangmen to the steps of the gallows. Then one of the masked men, Haddad recalled, turned to Hussein and said:

"You have destroyed Iraq, impoverished its people and made us all like beggars while Iraq is one of the richest countries in the world."

Hussein replied: "I did not destroy Iraq. I made Iraq into a rich, powerful country."

Faroun stepped in and ordered the hangman to back away.

Hussein carried a dark green Koran in his clasped hands, witnesses said. At the steps to the gallows, he turned to Faroun and asked him to give the book to the son of his co-defendant Awad Haman Bander. Bander, like Hussein, was sentenced to death for the killings of 148 Shiite men and boys from the northern town of Dujail.

"What if I don't see him?" Faroun asked.

"Keep it until you meet with any of my family members," Faroun recalled Hussein saying.

Hussein took his hat off. The hangmen uncuffed his hands, then placed them behind his back and recuffed them. They also tied his legs together, witnesses said.

One Iraqi official asked him whether he was afraid, Haddad recalled.

"I am not afraid. I have chosen this path," Hussein replied.

Then the hangmen slowly helped him up the stairs.'He Is Finished'

The chief hangman offered Hussein a black hood and asked him to place it over his head, but he refused. The man explained that his death would be more painful. Hussein again refused, witness said. So the hangman folded the hood and wrapped it around Hussein's neck, like a neck warmer.

"He was shivering, and his face was pale," said one witness, who asked not to be identified because he feared for his safety. "I think up to the moment when they put the rope around his neck, he was not believing what was happening."

Faroun saw a different Hussein: "He was holding tight. He was not scared."

Hussein stepped onto the platform, helped by the hangmen.

As the Shiites chanted and proclaimed their loyalties to Sadr, who heads the Mahdi Army militia, which the United States is pressuring the Maliki government to dismantle, an Iraqi official turned to Haddad. "Now how are we going to disband the militia when we have such things?" the official asked.

After the outbursts, as Hussein recited his Islamic prayer for the second time, the chief hangman asked for silence. Then the floor of the gallows was opened.

"He died in a tenth of a second," Faroun said. "He did not move a leg or foot."

Hussein's body hung for about five minutes, witnesses said.

"Some of the people were shouting, 'May God pray on Muhammad and the descendants of Muhammad,' " Haddad said. "After that, the body was brought down, they placed a white cover and then laid him on the ground."

A doctor examined him and then turned to the 14 witnesses. "He is finished," he said, according to those who were there.

Hussein's body was loaded onto one of the helicopters and flown to the Green Zone, where an ambulance transported his body to an unknown destination.

Hussein's death was announced on Iraqi television at 6:10 a.m. One Iraqi witness immediately phoned Rayis and said: "The punishment has been carried out."

"I cried at the moment out of joy," she recalled.

Shi'ite-Sunni Rift Laid Bare By Hanging (WT/AP)

By Lauren Frayer

The Washington Times, December 31, 2006

BAGHDAD -- As Iraqis awoke yesterday to television images of Saddam Hussein's neck twisted by a hangman's noose, Shi'ites cheered, Sunnis vowed revenge and at least 80 persons died from bombings and death squads -- not far from the daily average.

In Baghdad's Shi'ite neighborhood of Sadr City, victims of Saddam's three decades of autocratic rule took to the streets celebrating, dancing, beating drums and hanging Saddam in effigy.

Celebratory gunfire erupted in other Shi'ite neighborhoods across the country.

Outside the Sunni insurgent stronghold of Ramadi, west of the capital, loyalists marched with Saddam pictures and waved Iraqi flags.

Defying curfews, hundreds took to the streets vowing revenge in Samarra, north of Baghdad, and gunmen paraded and fired into the air in support of Saddam in Tikrit, his hometown.

"He's gone, but our problems continue. We brought problems on ourselves after Saddam because we began fighting Shi'ite on Sunni and Sunni on Shi'ite," said Haider Hamed, 34, a candy store owner in east Baghdad whose uncle was killed in one of Saddam's many brutal purges.

The U.S. military announced the deaths of three Marines and three soldiers, making December the year's deadliest month for U.S. troops in Iraq, with 109 service members killed.

There was no immediate sign of a feared Sunni uprising in retaliation for Saddam's execution.

But the London Sunday Telegraph reported that 400 to 500 Shi'ites had been kidnapped in the past two months and messages to relatives said they would be killed if Saddam died.

The responses within Iraq to Saddam's death echoed the larger reaction across the Middle East, with his enemies rejoicing and his defenders proclaiming him a martyr.

Iranians and Kuwaitis welcomed the death of the leader who led wars against each of their countries.

Some Arab governments denounced the timing of the 69-year-old former president's hanging just before the start of the most important holiday of the Islamic calendar, Eid al-Adha.

Libya announced a three-day official mourning period and canceled all celebrations for Eid.

In Baghdad, 12 bodies bearing signs of torture were found in various parts of the city, police said.

Two car bombs detonated one after another in a religiously mixed neighborhood of northwest Baghdad, killing 37 civilians and wounding 76, police said.

Thirty-one persons died and 58 were injured when a bomb planted on a minibus exploded in a fish market in Kufa, a mostly Shi'ite town south of Baghdad, said Issa Mohammed, director of the morgue in the neighboring town of Najaf.

The man blamed for parking the vehicle in Kufa, about 100 miles south of the Iraqi capital, was cornered and killed by a mob as he walked away from the explosion, police and witnesses said.

Shoppers had crowded into the market to buy supplies for the four-day Eid al-Adha

The new deaths announced by the U.S. military included three Marines and a soldier killed in combat in Iraq's volatile western Anbar province, and two soldiers killed by roadside bombs in Baghdad.

The total U.S. death toll in Iraq teetered on the brink of 3,000 at a crucial time, as President Bush seeks to craft a new Iraq policy in the new year. Mr. Bush issued a statement from his ranch in Crawford, Texas, warning of more challenges ahead for American troops.

"Many difficult choices and further sacrifices lie ahead," he said in the statement released Friday night. "Yet the safety and security of the American people require that we not relent in ensuring that Iraq's young democracy continues to progress."

Saddam was hanged early yesterdayafter his conviction last month for crimes against humanity in connection with the 1982 executions of 148 Shi'ites following a failed assassination attempt.

Saddam was buried shortly before sunrise today in a family plot next to the graves of his two sons, witnesses said.

Those who saw the ceremony said only a few people were present for the burial in Ouja, a small town outside Tikrit, Saddam's power base 80 miles north of Baghdad.

Hussein Divides Iraq In His Death As He Did In Life (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 30 — Saddam Hussein was dead, but his legacy was more alive than ever.

As Iraqis across the country awoke to the news that the former dictator had been hanged, the bitter remains of his rule defined their responses.

For Shiites, long oppressed, it was a moment of intense release.

"This chapter of Iraqi history is over," said Mowaffak al-Rubaie, the national security adviser, speaking on national television early Saturday. "Let us forget it and live with each other."

Sunni Arabs were skeptical. After three years of grinding violence and abuses by the Shiite government security forces, trust has all but fallen away, and few feel genuinely represented by the government. Most, in fact, are afraid of it.

"I'm not part of their world," said Yusra Abdul Aziz, a teacher in the Sunni Arab enclave of Mansour. "They are not speaking about Iraq. They are speaking about themselves."

Their reactions showed just how far Iraqis have drifted apart in the three years since Mr. Hussein's capture. And while he has long faded from relevance in the life of every day Iraq, in many ways, the country is living the legacy that he built.

The new Iraq appears capable of inflicting only more of the abuse it suffered for so long, perpetuating it with overwhelming brutality. People disappear in the night. Bodies with drill holes surface in trash heaps. Government forces moonlight as killing squads.

As vicious as he was, Mr. Hussein also held the country firmly together. Beyond military control, there was a subtle social glue: Iraqis of all sects loved to hate Saddam together. Now that he is gone, Shiites are afraid to joke with Sunnis about him, and Sunnis feel they are being blamed for his crimes.

Ahmed Hillu, a 32-year-old tailor, whose suits hung on the walls of his narrow shop in Sadr City like a mute chorus, recalled watching from a hiding spot in an empty area in northeastern Baghdad as elite members of Mr. Hussein's government gunned down large groups of Shiite opposition members. He was 6 at the time.

That area, an old dam called Qasr Attash, is now one of the most common body-dumping grounds for Shiite militias.

Mr. Hussein spared almost no one in his murderous ways, but Shiites were particularly abused as a group. That systematic mistreatment seems to have left lasting scars that carry through to the current day, infusing neophyte leaders with an uncompromising and emotional approach to running things.

"When they put the rope on his neck, did he remember how many innocent people he killed?" said Husam Abdul Hussein Jasim, a watch store owner in Sadr City, whose wall was swinging with synchronized pendulums. "He's like a Satan."

Mr. Hillu, sitting behind a counter piled high with a television, plastic flowers and cellphone cards, said: "He didn't represent anything for me. He was just a death grip imposed on our neck."

Even though their oppressor had been hanged, Shiites in northeastern Baghdad were giving no parties. Blocks had none of their usual bustle. Even the office of the cleric Moktada al-Sadr was closed.

The response was markedly different than the reaction after the November verdict sentencing Mr. Hussein to death, when Silly String and sweets were plied in equal measure.

For some Iraqis, previous humiliations were enough to feel justice had been done. Smeisam, a teacher in the largely Shiite area of Binouk, said her mother, whose parents had been murdered by the government, said the moment of revenge came sweetly for her when she saw the footage of American soldiers pulling Mr. Hussein out of the spider hole near Tikrit in December 2003.

"It was when I saw him hidden just like a mouse," she said by telephone, while assembling ingredients for dolma, rice-stuffed grape leaves, for her family's holiday dinner.

Her husband, Mukaram, was completely unsentimental.

DOJ_NMG_0111246

"Truly I feel nothing," he said. "He executed so many people. Now it is his turn. For me he died when he was arrested, so he was not important at all."

Indeed, the violence left behind has taken on a life of its own. In Kufa, a Shiite holy city south of Baghdad, a bomb in a fish market killed 34 people on Saturday, Iraqi authorities said, and a mob on the scene killed a man suspected to be the bomber. In the Hurriya district of Baghdad, a series of car bombs killed 36 people.

Depressing new realities did not dampen the Shiites' joy, but they were still subdued in expressing it. Mr. Hillu, who lost two brothers to Mr. Hussein, said he brought boxes of cookies and chocolate to his neighbors in the morning, when he learned about the execution. A stranger brought free orange juice into his and other shops along his block.

Mr. Hussein's execution took place early on a day that for Sunni Arabs was the beginning of the Id al-Adha holiday. (Shiites will begin celebrating on Sunday.) Mr. Hillu said the death "adds some more taste."

If Shiites saw the hanging as a gift, most Sunnis were revolted that, in what appeared to be a violation of Iraqi law, the execution was scheduled on a holiday of forgiveness.

"Actually, I felt angry," Ms. Abdul Aziz said. "It's not a proper time. I assure you, those who are feeling that this is a good time and a good judgment, they are not Iraqis."

Others, namely Kurds, opposed the quick hanging. Now, Mr. Hussein will not testify in other important genocide cases, especially the trial over the Anfal military campaign against the Kurds, in which he is accused of unleashing mass killings and chemical attacks that killed tens of thousands of villagers.

"The truth of what happened in al-Anfal has been buried," said Abu Abdul Rahman, a 38-year-old Kurdish taxi driver. "What happened in al-Anfal? Who took part in it?"

Others were less bothered by the speed of his execution.

"I think it's too strong to say that I'm cheated," said Bakhtiyar Amin, a Kurd who is a former Iraqi minister of human rights. "He deserves what he got."

The suffering Mr. Hussein inflicted was almost inconceivable, and it caused entire population shifts — of equal intensity but in opposite directions to moves taking place today.

At a bakery down the block from Mr. Hillu's tailor shop, two Shiites, a man and his uncle, told their story of fighting against Mr. Hussein in the ill-fated Shiite uprising of 1991. In the southern city of Nasiriya, where they lived, they fought for 37 days, said Ali Muhammad, bouncing his nephew on his knee as workers holding large trays of cookies moved gracefully through the shop.

After it was over, 10 members of their family had been killed. Another eight, all members of the opposition Shiite Dawa Party, had been murdered by Mr. Hussein's henchmen. The family fled to Baghdad and began working in a bakery in Sadr City, then called Saddam City. Now families follow some of the same patterns, only this time in reverse.

The bakery smelled of sesame. Almost everyone was smiling.

"I feel like my mother delivered me for the first time," said Abdel Ali Jasim, Mr. Muhammad's 46-year-old uncle. "It's my birthday."

But that area is Shiite, insulated from the outside by Shiite militias that are much more effective than government forces, and are sometimes a part of them, too. Life there flows somewhat more easily than in Sunni areas.

Still, car bombs regularly intercede, shattering the calm. In response, Iraqis of both sects attempt to draw circles around the chaos in their own minds. As a result, they tend to generalize about the other, coming up with conspiracy theories, to make the violence easier to explain and accept.

"If we got rid of the terrorists, there would be no country better than Iraq," Mr. Jasim said. "It's the non-Iraqis that are against the Shiites."

Ms. Abdul Aziz, who refuses to state her sect, saying only that she is a Muslim, lives closer to the center of the war. Her area, Mansour, is one of the most heavily contested by the Shiite and Sunni militias now.

In September, her son Omar was shot and wounded, they think because of his name, which is Sunni. Her other son was detained by the police. She was able to secure his release because she spoke English and an American soldier agreed to help her find him. She has since moved one of them to Syria.

Mr. Hussein may be gone, but the fear that succeeded him is what defines her life today.

“Where can I live, if Baghdad is divided?” she said in English. “In the Shiite sector or Sunni sector?”

“I have to run away. It’s not a place to live in anymore.”

Elation Gives Way To Dread Of Daily Life (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 30 -- Former Iraqi president Saddam Hussein had been dead no more than 11 hours, but to Um Noor, he might as well have died three years ago.

"We've forgotten about him," Noor said late Saturday afternoon, as she stood in the jeans store she owns in central Baghdad.

Like many Iraqis, Noor once feared Hussein, who rose to power 24 years ago by ruthlessly wiping out his enemies. When U.S. troops ousted him in 2003, many Iraqis believed their days of living in fear were over.

But three years later, Iraqis are still a terrorized people. Now, instead of Hussein, they fear the car bombs that maim and kill every day, the kidnappers who snatch people off the streets in broad daylight, the mortar shells that fall on residential neighborhoods. And they fear each other, as Shiite Muslims fight Sunni Arabs in what is spiraling into a civil war.

Despite an infusion of billions of dollars in reconstruction funds from the United States, they are watching their quality of life deteriorate. They spend hours each day with no electricity. They wait in long lines for fuel. And they pay higher prices for food while their salaries remain the same.

"Everything is worse," Noor said. "What did we gain from him being gone?"

The initial jubilation among many Iraqis following Hussein's execution Saturday morning gave way to the realization that his death would not bring an end to the daily violence that Iraqis now endure or improve the services they could once count on.

Noor, a petite 36-year-old, struggles to pay the $300 a month it costs to rent the space for her store in the Karrada district of Baghdad. By the time she buys fuel for the generator to light her shop, there is little money left to provide for her two daughters. She has fewer customers now, she said, because people cannot afford to buy jeans with rhinestones and bows that sell for $20 or more a pair.

"With all that we are facing, I have to face this," she said, eyeing her front door nervously. She was there alone and it was getting dark, almost time for her to lock up. She used to keep her shop open until midnight. Now she leaves by 6 p.m. to avoid Baghdad by night. "I'm a woman alone," she said.

Sameer Dawoud, 62, has owned an art gallery in Baghdad since 1984. People bought art back then. Now, they don't want to brave the streets to browse the works hanging on his walls. The frames on his paintings of the Tigris River and Arabian horses are dusty. Several nearby art galleries have been shuttered.

Dawoud said he does not expect Hussein's death to end the violence that keeps his customers away. "Whoever is playing on the field, he will continue playing," he said.

Many Iraqis said Hussein became irrelevant long ago, when U.S. troops found him hiding in a hole near his home town of Tikrit in December 2003. He emerged looking dirty and bewildered, erasing the image most Iraqis had of him as a figure bent on domination.

His persona diminished even more as he stood trial for the retaliatory killings of 148 Shiite men and boys from the town of Dujail in the 1980s. In ill-fitting suits, he was no longer scary-looking. As many Iraqis assumed he would be convicted, interest in his trial faded. They had new enemies: insurgents, militias, death squads, Americans, each other.

The sectarian divisions that had always existed in Iraqi society had begun tearing it apart. Hussein, a Sunni, and his Baath Party often oppressed Shiites and Kurds. In the new Iraq, Shiites, who make up the majority of the population, now wield more power, and Sunnis are waging a relentless insurgency.

Reaction to Hussein's execution early Saturday, the day Sunnis consider the beginning of the holy Eid al-Adha celebration, reflected that deep divide.

"There's no Eid," said Sami Mahmoud, 35, a store owner in Karrada. "This is a day for the Persians and not for the Arabs. God have mercy on his soul."

DOJ_NMG_0111248

Shiites, many of whom lost relatives during the Hussein era or were imprisoned for political dissent, called his execution an early gift. Their Eid celebration begins Sunday.

Hussein Abu Ali, 35, a civil servant, stayed up all night with his brothers and sisters, waiting for news of the execution. Hussein had banished them from Iraq when he was a child, he said. They moved to Iran and were allowed back in only after 2003.

The family cheered at the television images of masked men wrapping a noose around Hussein's neck.

"Now the head of the snake has been cut," Ali said.

Despite the tension, there was relative calm Saturday and no curfew, which the government often imposes in particularly violent times.

Shiites celebrated peacefully in the southern city of Najaf, albeit with gunshots in the air. There were minor clashes in Tikrit, as residents carried pictures of Hussein and banners that read: "You Shiites, you shall leave this city, and every home and every street."

Car bombs killed at least 45 people.

Just three hours after Hussein's death, an olive green minibus exploded in a crowded market in the Shiite southern city of Kufa, killing 34 civilians and wounding 58, said Munthir al-Ithary, the director of the Najaf Health Department. A mob beat and stoned the perpetrator after a shopkeeper spotted him trying to flee, said Kufa's mayor, Yusif al-Janaby.

In the Hurriyah neighborhood of Baghdad, two car bombs exploded within moments of each other, one near a market, the other near the bus terminal. They killed 11 people and wounded six, said an Interior Ministry official who spoke on condition of anonymity.

There's one thing Iraqis agree on, whatever their sect: Their day-to-day problems will probably not get better anytime soon.

"I believe that a return of peace and security is not feasible, and the Americans and the Iraqi government must try hard to find solutions for the catastrophic situation," said Sherzad Omar Fekky, an instructor at the University of Kirkuk.

Zahara Jasim, 24, sat inside a women's clothing store in Karrada rubbing her hands together by a space heater to stay warm. She said she was happy to see Hussein die. She blames him for the death of her father, who fought in the Iran-Iraq war of the 1980s.

But she doesn't blame him for her current problems. That, she said, is the Americans' fault.

"They haven't done anything," she said. "There's no oil. There's no kerosene. There's no electricity. If they really wanted to make things work, they would."

Adnan Mizher, 34, a former army officer from Diyala province, northeast of Baghdad, said his brother was executed by Hussein's government. Still, he said, life was better under Hussein. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, he said, has done nothing for Iraqis.

"Today, there are killings, murder, kidnappings and displacement of people on sectarian grounds," he said. "Life under Saddam was much better than now. The hell of Saddam is better than the paradise that Maliki promised us."

Hussein's Case Won't Bolster International Human Rights Law, Experts Fear (NYT)

By Marlise Simons

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

PARIS, Dec. 30 — Saddam Hussein is one of the few modern leaders to have been tried and executed for his crimes and other abuses of power. Most dictators of the past century have died of natural causes at home or in comfortable exile — or at the hands of assassins.

But with trials of former leaders becoming more common in the past decade, there are other distinguishing features in the Hussein case: he was the first former leader to be tried by a domestic court for crimes against humanity — a crime enshrined in international law — and put to death for it.

His dawn hanging on Saturday further stands out because the new international legal institutions, like the International Criminal Court and the temporary tribunals that are trying war crimes cases in the former Yugoslavia, Rwanda and Sierra Leone, do not impose the death penalty.

Despite this application of international law against Mr. Hussein, experts say, his conviction for crimes against humanity has not significantly reinforced efforts to apply concepts of international human rights law around the world. They argue that the trial has been too widely perceived, both in Iraq and abroad, as a chaotic and politicized process with many serious flaws carried out by inexperienced judges.

Although domestic courts are now trying cases that include violations of international human rights law, the credibility of the Baghdad tribunal was also questioned by some because it was organized by the United States. European countries that had been asked for help said they could not participate because they had abolished the death sentence.

Rights groups and some international lawyers have deplored the execution as hasty. Some said the execution, based on a comparatively small case involving the killing of 148 civilians, cut short Mr. Hussein's second and far weightier trial for genocide, the gravest charge.

"Such a rapid execution before the conclusion of the genocide trial is a serious legal setback and harms the credibility of the court," said Antoine Garapon, director of the Institute for Advanced Legal Studies in Paris. He and some other lawyers argued that even if others were to stand trial for genocide against the Kurds in 1988, the person deemed most responsible would never face judgment.

Many Kurds, in fact, say they have mixed feelings about his execution because it denies them the satisfaction of seeing Mr. Hussein face further evidence of genocide presented at the Kurdish trial, which was only a few weeks away from a conclusion.

"To execute such a criminal, a man who reveled in his atrocities, is an act of justice," Najmaldin Karim, president of the Washington Kurdish Institute and a former refugee from Mr. Hussein's repression, wrote in an Op-Ed article published Saturday in The New York Times. "Sadly, however, we have not had full justice. Saddam Hussein did not confront the full horror of his crimes."

Mr. Hussein is the second notorious dictator to escape a verdict on genocide charges. The other is Slobodan Milosevic, the former president of Serbia, who died of a heart attack in March in a United Nations cell during his trial at the war crimes tribunal in The Hague.

The best-known precedents for Mr. Hussein's execution are the post-World War II trials carried out by the victorious Allied powers: the hangings of the military and political leaders of Nazi Germany and the war crimes trials in Tokyo of Japan's wartime leadership.

At that time, as now, debates raged over whether the trials conducted by victorious forces were morally wrong or whether they were politically and psychologically indispensable. Some argued that those trials of the late 1940s did more harm than good and should never have taken place. Winston Churchill, Britain's wartime leader, had always urged that the Nazi leaders be executed, without trial.

But since then, the Nuremberg trials, more so than the widely criticized Tokyo trials, have come to be regarded as the crucial precedents for trials involving grave human rights violations, specifically for the creation of the first international tribunal, dealing with war crimes in the former Yugoslavia. "The Yugoslavia tribunal brought alive and gave meaning to criminal offenses that had been on the books for years, and led eventually to charges of crimes against humanity against Saddam Hussein," said Richard Dicker, director of Human Rights Watch's international justice program.

Benjamin B. Ferencz, a former prosecutor at Nuremberg, said on his Web site on Saturday: "Whether a remorseless mass killer should be sentenced to death is a difficult question. There can never be a balance between the lives of a few mass murderers and the lives of their countless victims. Humanitarian law has moved away from imposing death as a penalty. It should be left to Iraqi judges to decide what is most appropriate to bring peace and reconciliation to their war-ravaged country."

In only a few other cases in the past half century has a political leader been tried and put to death under his country's own laws. In 1979, the former Pakistani prime minister, Zulfikar Ali Bhutto, overthrown in a military coup, was executed for the murder of a political opponent after a much-criticized trial.

In December 1989, the ousted Romanian dictator, Nicolae Ceausescu, was executed after an anti-Communist uprising. But the rushed and secret trial preceding his killing by firing squad was widely seen as summary justice. Benito Mussolini was simply shot by Italian partisans in 1945 while trying to flee to Switzerland. Anastasio Somoza of Nicaragua was blown up in his car by Argentine guerrillas in 1980 while in exile in Paraguay. Laurent Kabila, the former Congo leader, was shot and killed by a palace guard.

Only occasionally have former dictators been brought to trial in circumstances widely recognized as fair. During trials of former members of Argentine military juntas in 1985, five of the nine defendants were given long sentences in a civilian court but were pardoned a few years later. The former Rwandan prime minister, Jean Kambanda, pleaded guilty to genocide and was sentenced to life in prison by the United Nations war-crimes tribunal for Rwanda.

Manuel Noriega of Panama was sentenced to 40 years in prison for drug trafficking by an American court but was never judged for human rights or other abuses.

More often, political leaders have escaped into exile and resisted extradition attempts. Jean-Claude Duvalier, the former president of Haiti, fled to France. Idi Amin of Uganda died in peace in Saudi Arabia. Pol Pot died in bed before the new Cambodian war crimes tribunal began its work. Fulgencio Batista fled Cuba and lived the rest of his life in Portugal, and Mobutu Sese Seko fled Zaire, now Congo, and died in Morocco.

Saddam Had Feisty Exchange At The Gallows (AP)

AP, December 31, 2006

BAGHDAD (AP) — Iraqis awoke to television images of a noose being slipped over Saddam Hussein's neck and his white-shrouded body, the pre-dawn work of black-hooded hangmen. They went to bed as new video emerged showing Saddam exchanging taunts with onlookers before the gallows floor dropped away and the former dictator swung from the rope.

Saddam was buried shortly before dawn Sunday in a family plot in the cemetery in Ouja, the town of his birth. Few were present for the internment near Tikrit, 130 kilometers (80 miles) north of Baghdad.

Saddam was captured in an underground hide-out near Ouja on Dec. 13, 2003, eight months after he fled Baghdad ahead of advancing American troops.

The former Iraqi leader was buried near the graves of his sons Uday and Qusay in the main town cemetery. The sons and a grandson were killed in a gunbattle with the American forces in Mosul in July 2003.

In Baghdad's Shiite neighborhood of Sadr City on Saturday, victims of his three decades of autocratic rule took to the streets on Saturday to celebrate, dancing, beating drums and hanging Saddam in effigy. Celebratory gunfire erupted across other Shiite neighborhoods in Baghdad and other predominantly Shiite regions of the country.

There was no sign of a feared Sunni uprising in retaliation for the execution, and the bloodshed from civil warfare was not far off the daily average — 92 from bombings and death squads.

Outside the Sunni insurgent stronghold of Ramadi, west of the capital, loyalists marched with Saddam pictures and waved Iraqi flags. Defying curfews, hundreds took to the streets vowing revenge in Samarra, north of Baghdad, and gunmen paraded and fired into the air in support of Saddam in Tikrit, his hometown.

Still, authorities imposed curfews sparingly in contrast to the several-day lockdown put in place after Saddam was sentenced to death Nov. 5.

By several accounts, Saddam was calm but scornful of his captors, engaging in a give-and-take with the crowd gathered to watch him die and insisting he was Iraq's savior, not its tyrant and scourge.

"He said we are going to heaven and our enemies will rot in hell and he also called for forgiveness and love among Iraqis but also stressed that the Iraqis should fight the Americans and the Persians," Munir Haddad, an appeals court judge who witnessed the hanging, told the British Broadcasting Corp.

Another witness, national security adviser Mowaffak al-Rubaie, told The New York Times that one of the guards shouted at Saddam: "You have destroyed us. You have killed us. You have made us live in destitution."

"I have saved you from destitution and misery and destroyed your enemies, the Persian and Americans," Saddam responded, al-Rubaie told the Times.

"God damn you," the guard said.

"God damn you," responded Saddam.

DOJ_NMG_0111251

New video, first broadcast by Al-Jazeera satellite television early Sunday, had sound of someone in the group praising the founder of the Shiite Dawa Party, who was executed in 1980 along with his sister by Saddam.

Saddam appeared to smile at those taunting him from below the gallows. He said they were not showing manhood.

Then Saddam began reciting the "Shahada," a Muslim prayer that says there is no god but God and Muhammad is his messenger, according to an unabridged copy of the same tape, apparently shot with a camera phone and posted on a website.

Saddam made it to midway through his second recitation of the verse. His last word was Muhammad.

The floor dropped out of the gallows.

"The tyrant has fallen," someone in the group of onlookers shouted. The video showed a close-up of Saddam's face as he swung from the rope.

Then came another voice: "Let him swing for three minutes."

The responses within Iraq to Saddam's death echoed the larger reaction across the Middle East, with his enemies rejoicing and his defenders proclaiming him a martyr. While Iranians and Kuwaitis welcomed the death of the leader who led wars against each of their countries, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said the execution prevented exposure of the secrets and crimes the former dictator committed during his brutal rule.

Some Arab governments denounced the timing the 69-year-old former president's hanging just before the start of the most important holiday of the Islamic calendar, Eid al-Adha. Libya announced a three-day official mourning period and canceled all celebrations for Eid.

Within Iraq and across the world, the airwaves were alive with pictures of Saddam in death, a bruise on his cheek, his neck elongated and twisted impossibly to the right — grisly proof that the man who had tormented and killed so many during a bloody quarter-century rule was truly dead.

But some Iraqis — like 34-year-old Haider Hamed, a candy store owner in east Baghdad — wondered what would really change with the execution of Saddam, who was just four months shy of his 70th birthday.

"He's gone, but our problems continue," said the Shiite Muslim, whose uncle was killed in one of Saddam's many brutal purges. "We brought problems on ourselves after Saddam because we began fighting Shiite on Sunni and Sunni on Shiite."

At least 80 Iraqis died in bombings and other attacks Saturday, and police said 12 more tortured bodies were found dumped in Baghdad. The U.S. military announced six more servicemembers — three soldiers and three Marines — were killed.

The execution took place on the penultimate day of the year's deadliest month for U.S. troops, with the toll reaching 109. At least 2,998 members of the U.S. military have died in Iraq since the war began in March 2003, according to an AP count.

Um Abdullah, a Sunni and teacher in Tikrit, 80 miles north of Baghdad, said she would wear black to mourn the city's favorite son.

"Saddam will be a hero in our eyes," she said. "I have five kids and I will teach them to take revenge on Americans."

Police blocked the entrances to Tikrit and said nobody was allowed to leave or enter the city for four days. Despite the security precaution, gunmen took into the streets, carrying pictures of Saddam, shooting into the air and calling for vengeance.

Security forces also set up roadblocks at the entrance to another Sunni stronghold, Samarra, and a curfew was imposed after about 500 went into the streets to protest the execution.

Among minority Sunnis there was deep anger, born not only of Saddam's execution but of the loss of their decades-long political and economic dominance that began with Saddam's ouster in the U.S. invasion nearly four years ago.

"The president, the leader, Saddam Hussein is a martyr and God will put him along with other martyrs," said Yahya al-Attawi, who led prayer at a towering Sunni mosque constructed by Saddam in Tikrit.

There were cheers at the cafeteria of a U.S. outpost in Baghdad as soldiers having breakfast learned Saddam had been hanged.

But members of the Army's 2nd Battalion, 17th Field Artillery Regiment, on patrol in an overwhelmingly Shiite neighborhood in eastern Baghdad, said the execution wouldn't get them home any faster — and therefore didn't make much difference.

"Nothing really changes," said Capt. Dave Eastburn, 30. "The militias run everything now, not Saddam."

Staff Sgt. David Earp, who also fought in 1991's Operation Desert Storm, said the execution worried him.

DOJ_NMG_0111252

"In my opinion, something big is going to happen," said Earp, of Colorado. "There will be a response. Probably not today because they know we are looking for one, but soon."

Saddam Is Buried In Home Village (BBC)

BBC.com, December 31, 2006

Former Iraqi President Saddam Hussein, hanged for crimes against humanity on Saturday, has been buried in the village where he was born 69 years ago.

In a sparsely attended ceremony in Awja, in the Tikrit region north of the capital, the former Iraqi leader was laid to rest in a family plot.

His sons Uday and Qusay, killed by US troops in 2003, are also buried there.

Earlier, his family said he would be buried in Ramadi - a Sunni insurgent stronghold - citing security concerns.

Just hours after his execution, Saddam Hussein's body was reportedly flown to Awja aboard a US aircraft and handed to clan leaders for burial.

"Saddam Hussein has been buried today at 0400 (0100 GMT) in a place that was constructed during his regime in the centre of Awja," said relative Musa Faraj, quoted by AFP news agency.

The BBC's John Simpson in Baghdad says the Iraqi government will not be worried that Saddam's grave may turn into a place of political pilgrimage.

Ministers here think that his practical influence in Iraq has been entirely finished by his execution, our correspondent says.

'Frightened and terrified'

The former president was sentenced to death by an Iraqi court on 5 November over the killings of 148 Shias from the town of Dujail in the 1980s.

Images of Saddam Hussein being taken to the gallows in a Baghdad building his intelligence services once used for executions were broadcast on state TV on Saturday. However the moment of his execution was not shown.

The hanging took place just days after he lost an appeal and hours after he was handed over from US custody.

Saddam Hussein's execution has closed a dark chapter in Iraq's history, Prime Minister Nouri Maliki said.

In a statement, the prime minister said: "Justice, in the name of the people, has carried out the death sentence against the criminal Saddam, who faced his fate like all tyrants, frightened and terrified during a hard day which he did not expect."

US President George W Bush hailed the execution as "an important milestone" on the road to building an Iraqi democracy, but warned it would not end the deadly violence there.

'Very broken'

A small group of Iraqis - including a representative of the prime minister - witnessed the execution at 0600 (0300GMT) on Saturday in a concrete-lined chamber in Khadimiya.

Iraqi National Security Adviser Mouwafak al-Rubaie told the BBC the former leader went to the gallows quietly: "He was saying some few slogans. He was very, very, very, broken."

However, new images of the execution apparently shot on a mobile phone and aired on some Arab television channels and internet sites, show a more defiant Saddam.

Unlike the official Iraqi videotape of his final moments, the new pictures are accompanied by the sound of Saddam Hussein responding to taunts from those present.

One of the onlookers is heard telling the former Iraqi leader that he destroyed Iraq and was going straight to hell.

Saddam Hussein appeared to smile at those taunting him from below the gallows. He said they were not showing manhood.

He is then heard citing verses from the Koran before the trapdoor opened.

Tikrit curfew

Hours after Saddam was executed, the bloodshed continued As news of Saddam Hussein's demise spread, there were jubilant scenes in the Baghdad Shia stronghold of Sadr City, with people dancing in the streets and sounding their car horns. Similar scenes were witnessed in the Basra and Najaf.

DOJ_NMG_0111253

But in Tikrit, where a curfew was imposed, the news sparked protests from supporters. Protests were also reported in Samarra and Ramadi.

Hours after the execution, at least 31 people died when a car bomb exploded at a market in the southern town of Kufa. Angry crowds killed a man who police said got out of the vehicle shortly before the bomb exploded.

Later in the day, at least 37 people died and 76 were injured in at least two blasts in the Hurriya district of Baghdad.

Conflicts Shaped Two Presidencies (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

The day after he ordered a cease-fire and brought the Persian Gulf War to a close, President George H.W. Bush ruminated about the status quo he had left behind in Iraq. "Still no feeling of euphoria," he dictated to his diary Feb. 28, 1991. Saddam Hussein, he recognized, remained a threat. "He's got to go," Bush concluded.

It took nearly 16 years, but he's finally gone. And with Hussein's execution in Baghdad, so is the chief nemesis of the Bush family, a man who bedeviled father-and-son presidents and in different ways dominated both of their administrations. The long, tortured arc of the Bush-Hussein relationship that shaped recent U.S. history finally came to a close with the snap of a noose.

If there is a feeling of euphoria, or satisfaction, or perhaps just relief, neither Bush is expressing it publicly this weekend. President Bush went to bed Friday night without waiting for the execution and left it to an aide to release a statement praising the Iraqi people for "bringing Saddam Hussein to justice." His father remained silent. But Hussein's death removed only the man. The forces unleashed by the epic struggle remain as powerful and crippling as ever for two countries.

The timing of the execution, coming as the president searches for a new strategy to turn around a war he says the United States is not winning, could serve as a reminder of its origins. Bush has frequently cited Hussein's tyranny to justify his decision to invade Iraq. Within days, though, the death toll of U.S. troops will surely pass 3,000, a grim milestone that will trigger further national introspection. The cost of overthrowing Hussein and ending his reign of terror continues to mount, and few in Washington hold out faith that that will change anytime soon.

"The sacrifice has been worth it," Bush said at a year-end news conference nine days before the execution. A few moments later, he added: "I haven't questioned whether or not it was right to take Saddam Hussein out." He stopped himself. "I mean, I've questioned it -- I've come to the conclusion that it was the right decision."

Bush and other architects of the war have long maintained that it was nothing personal. "I personally never thought of it that way, nor did I think the president saw it that way," said Douglas J. Feith, the former undersecretary of defense who was a key player in going to war. "When Saddam was talked about, he was talked about as a threat to the United States, not as a personal problem of the Bush family."

Ron Kaufman, a White House aide to the first President Bush, said his ex-boss does not dwell on Hussein. "I'm sure like most Americans, he'll be glad the guy's gone," he said. "The world will be a better place now, a safer place. But I don't think he'll spend any more time thinking about it than you or I."

Yet the history of animosity between the Bushes and Hussein is hard to ignore. The relationship actually began as one of pragmatic friendship in the 1980s, when Hussein was at war with the main U.S. enemy in the region, Iran, and George H.W. Bush was vice president in an administration that offered him help. A 1992 New Yorker article suggested that Bush, through Arab intermediaries, advised Hussein to intensify the bombing of Iran.

Hussein soon became too much to handle. "People came to understand him as someone who was much less stable and someone who could not be trusted," said Craig Fuller, chief of staff to the elder Bush when he was vice president. Hussein's invasion of Kuwait in August 1990 proved a strategic miscalculation that put him and the Bushes forever on opposite sides.

The elder Bush wrongly assumed that Iraqis would overthrow Hussein, and his decision not to march to Baghdad after freeing Kuwait would haunt him and his son. An unbowed Hussein defied the international community, and in April 1993, when Bush went to Kuwait for a hero's welcome, a group of Iraqis crossed the border in what was called a thwarted attempt to kill him. President Bill Clinton launched 23 Tomahawk missiles against Iraqi targets in retaliation.

DOJ_NMG_0111254

Among those on that trip who could have been killed were Barbara Bush and Laura Bush. George W. Bush had stayed in Texas, where he was running the Texas Rangers baseball team and preparing to run for governor. Some later questioned the seriousness of the assassination attempt or its connections to Baghdad. But the incident clearly was a searing moment for the Bush family.

By the time the younger Bush ran for president, he appeared determined not to repeat the mistake he believed his father made with Hussein. "No one envisioned him still standing," the candidate told BBC in November 1999. "It's time to finish the task."

At a debate a couple of weeks later, Bush was more explicit. "If I found that in any way, shape, or form that he was developing weapons of mass destruction, I'd take him out," he said.

At Bush's first National Security Council meeting after taking office, he seemed to some aides to be ready to go. "From the very beginning, there was a conviction that Saddam Hussein was a bad person and that he needed to go," Paul O'Neill, Bush's first treasury secretary, later told CBS News. In Ron Suskind's book, "The Price of Loyalty," O'Neill was quoted as saying that Bush told aides to prepare to remove Hussein: "That was the tone of it, the president saying . . . 'Go find me a way to do this.' "

Others on the inside came to a similar conclusion. In a memo in March 2002, Peter Ricketts, a top British official, sounded skeptical of U.S. motivations: "For Iraq, 'regime change' does not stack up. It sounds like a grudge between Bush and Saddam."

That impression was fueled by both father and son that fall. "I hate Saddam Hussein, and I don't hate a lot of people," George H.W. Bush told CNN. "I don't hate easily, but I think he is -- as I say, his word is no good, and he is a brute. He has used poison gas on his own people. So, there's nothing redeeming about this man, and I have nothing but hatred in my heart for him."

Six days after that aired, his son mused about Hussein at a Texas fundraiser. "There's no doubt his hatred is mainly directed at us," he said. "There's no doubt he can't stand us. After all, this is the guy that tried to kill my dad at one time."

Bush later talked with then-Sen. Peter Fitzgerald (R-Ill.) aboard Air Force One about assassinating Hussein, saying he would repeal the executive order banning assassination of foreign leaders if intelligence gave him a clear shot. "The fact that he tried to kill my father and my wife shows the nature of the man," Bush told interviewers in March 2003. "And he not only tried to kill my father and wife, he's killed thousands of his own citizens." But he denied a vendetta. "Nah, no," he said. "I'm doing my job as the president, based upon the threats that face this country."

When Bush launched the invasion weeks later, he ordered it to start earlier than planned with a missile strike targeting Hussein. The Iraqi leader survived, but U.S. troops quickly toppled his government. Soldiers went to the Al Rashid Hotel and destroyed a mosaic, of the elder Bush's face over the slogan "Bush Is Criminal," that Hussein had laid in the lobby entrance so every guest would step on it.

Eight months later, other soldiers found Hussein in a "spider hole." "President Bush sends his regards," one soldier told the disheveled Iraqi leader.

Then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld delivered the news in Washington. "Mr. President, the first reports are not always accurate," he started cautiously.

"This sounds like it's going to be good news," Bush interrupted.

Rumsfeld said reports indicate "that we got Saddam Hussein."

"Well, that is good news."

Aides said the president made a point of not personalizing it. "I never heard him take any particular relish in Saddam's capture or the fate that obviously awaited him," said Matthew Scully, a former White House speechwriter who helped prepare Bush's remarks about Hussein's capture. "I remember vividly that the president's reaction that day was kind of businesslike. He always saw Saddam as part of the larger picture."

Still, in his White House study, the president keeps a memento -- the pistol taken from Hussein when he was captured. If there ever was a duel, it is now over.

A Bitter Family Saga Is At An End (BBC)

When Saddam Hussein looked in disbelief at the over-sized noose that was fitted by masked volunteers around his neck, the man who helped to put it there by invading Iraq and toppling the dictator was soundly asleep at his ranch in Texas.

It was only nine o'clock in the evening in Crawford but George Bush was already embedded in the land of nod, with orders not to be woken until the morning.

The blithe indifference of deep slumber was the final snub to the dead man who once described himself as "Salahadin II", "the Redeemer of all the Arabs" and "the Lion of Baghdad".

Some might think that George Bush can't afford to sleep soundly these days with his approval ratings in the cellar and his policy towards Iraq in inertia.

But while the world stirred to comment, cyberspace buzzed with applause or condemnation and Cable television hyperventilated, George Bush soldiered on in sleep. He arose only at 4.40am, we are told, which is his usual time of rising.

One hour later he had a 10-minute conversation with his National Security adviser Stephen Hadley about the events in Baghdad.

Saddam Hussein tried to get George HW Bush assassinated Shortly thereafter the White House issued a pre-prepared written statement: "Today Saddam Hussein was executed after receiving a fair trial - the kind of justice he denied the victims of his brutal regime."

The statement, which will not be complemented by a presidential turn for the cameras, betrayed no hint of gloating or crowing. It went on to say that "bringing Saddam Hussein to justice will not end the violence in Iraq".

On one level, the hanging of Saddam Hussein is the end of a dramatic family saga that has pitted the Bushes of Texas against the Husseins of Tikrit.

Failed alliance

It is a saga that started with a tacit alliance.

When George HW Bush was vice president, Saddam Hussein was still seen as a potential partner thanks to his status as the enemy of America's enemy, Iran.

It was in 1983 that Donald Rumsfeld was dispatched to Baghdad as a friend of the Reagan administration to shake the hand of Saddam Hussein and offer America's help against the ayatollahs during the Iran Iraq War.

Alliance finally turned into animosity when Saddam Hussein invaded Kuwait and President Bush cobbled together an international alliance of Western and Arab states to remove him from Kuwait but not from power.

"The butcher of Baghdad" began to call President Bush "the viper" and George junior, "the son of the viper".

It was at that time that the famous Al Rashid hotel in Baghdad received an elaborate mosaic of President Bush "the criminal", which patrons were forced to stomp across on entering the lobby.

Two years later Saddam Hussein tried to get President Bush assassinated.

The White House has always maintained that personal grudges had nothing to do with the invasion of Iraq.

And yet in September 2002, as preparations for war were well under way, George Bush the younger told a Houston fundraiser: "This is after all the man who tried to kill my dad."

Mafia rule

The personal side of this bitter family saga is over.

But even from his unmarked grave, Saddam Hussein will continue to haunt the Bush administration and define the legacy of the 43rd president of the United States.

Saddam had always promised to lure, fight and defeat the Americans in the cities of Iraq.

No-one thought at the time that this would happen after he had already been deposed.

But his prophetic threat is becoming reality, triggering a multi-headed insurgence that no longer fights on his behalf, and a vortex of sectarian violence that makes a conventional civil war look organised and coherent.

The former Iraqi leader is likely to haunt the Bush administration

The brutal bloodletting, ethnic cleansing and vicious fragmentation, in which American troops now find themselves embroiled, is also a legacy of Saddam's regime.

DOJ_NMG_0111256

A quarter of a century of his mafia rule, in which tribal loyalties were lavishly rewarded and anything less was severely punished helped to rot the cohesion of a young and artificial country.

The extent to which Iraq is disintegrating has taken many Iraqis by surprise. It was grossly under-estimated by the officials who planned the occupation.

President Bush and his advisers have always liked to compare the birth pangs of Iraqi democracy to the emergence of a free Germany after the World War II.

Bloodletting

But what they were dealing with was not Germany 1945 but Germany in 1648 emerging from the feudal bloodbath of the 30 years war.

Another example would have been Yugoslavia in the 1990s.

So not even the few beleaguered optimists in the Bush camp, including the president himself, believe that the execution of Saddam Hussein will stem the bloodletting and allow America to plan for a graceful exit.

The sectarian violence in Iraq has reached its own alarming momentum, in which Saddam Hussein had been reduced to a walk-on part.

Nearly 3,000 US servicemen and women have already been killed

The White House may boast about the new rule of law but for many ordinary Iraqis justice comes in the form of death squads, torture gangs and rogue police road blocks.

These days the wrong identity card can get you executed. This is not the kind of justice that George Bush had in mind.

So now the noose has done its deed the Pentagon is, if anything, expecting a spike in the sectarian violence.

The US State Department has put its embassies on a security alert "to prepare for demonstrations and possible attacks".

And the American public, which had long expected the execution of Saddam Hussein is waiting with growing impatience to see how exactly the president will execute his heralded "new Iraq strategy".

More troops? More money? More hope? For American soldiers December 2006 proved to be the bloodiest month of a bloody year.

Sometime in the next 10 days 3,000 US servicemen and women will have been killed by a war that was declared "accomplished" in May 2003.

Saddam Hussein is dead. His legacy lives on.

Around The World, Unease And Criticism Of Penalty (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

LONDON, Dec. 30 — With gradations of unease rather than outrage inspired by the hanging of Saddam Hussein, Western politicians sought a cautious balance on Saturday between revulsion at his record, support for his executioners and concern at the use of a capital penalty they largely shun in their own countries.

But religious leaders — Christian and Muslim — used stronger and more critical language in response to the news of Mr. Hussein's execution, which greeted most Western Europeans on their breakfast time news shows and in some newspaper headlines two days before the New Year.

Perhaps the most delicately choreographed response came from Britain, whose prime minister, Tony Blair, took a lead as America's closest ally in toppling Mr. Hussein while his Labor Party prides itself on opposing the death penalty.

In a statement issued an hour after the execution, Margaret Beckett, the foreign secretary, said: "I welcome the fact that Saddam Hussein has been tried by an Iraqi court for at least some of the appalling crimes he committed against the Iraqi people. He has now been held to account."

However, she said, "the British government does not support the use of the death penalty, in Iraq or anywhere else. We advocate an end to the death penalty worldwide, regardless of the individual or the crime. We have made our position very clear to the Iraqi authorities, but we respect their decision as that of a sovereign nation."

Mr. Blair himself — who faced wide public opposition to the Iraq war, which has shaped his political legacy — refrained from commenting as he vacationed at the Miami waterfront home of Robin Gibb, a singer in the BeeGees. A spokesman for him said Ms. Beckett's statement had been issued on behalf of the entire government, including Mr. Blair.

The execution also revived the ideological divide between supporters and opponents of the 2003 invasion. Sir Menzies Campbell, leader of the opposition Liberal Democrats, which opposed the war, said: "Saddam Hussein's death does not vindicate in any way the ill-conceived and disastrous decision to invade Iraq. His execution does not make an illegal war legal any more than it will put an end to the violence and destruction."

Generally, said the columnist Tim Hames in The Times of London, the response to the execution would be different in Britain and Continental Europe from the reaction in the United States. "Even those of us who supported the invasion in 2003, and continue to do so today," he wrote, "will harbor within their ranks, like me, those who find the notion of this crime offensive."

"Mainstream middle-class sentiment in Europe now regards the death penalty as being as ethically tainted as the crimes that produced the sentence," he added.

Erkki Tuomioja, the foreign minister of Finland, which holds the rotating presidency of the European Union, said, "The European Union has a very consistent stand on opposing the death penalty and it should not have been applied in this case either — even though there is no doubt about Saddam Hussein's guilt over serious violations against human rights."

In an editorial, The Guardian newspaper in London took an even more unequivocal position, saying, "The death penalty is an unacceptably cruel and unusual punishment, even in Iraq."

The Vatican went so far as to call the execution "tragic" — echoing expressions of revulsion by Muslim leaders, both in the West and in the broader Islamic world.

"A capital punishment is always tragic news, a reason for sadness, even if it deals with a person who was guilty of grave crimes," said the Rev. Federico Lombardi, the Vatican spokesman. "The killing of the guilty party is not the way to reconstruct justice and reconcile society. On the contrary, there is a risk that it will feed a spirit of vendetta and sow new violence."

Muslim leaders in Britain offered a similar prognosis. Muhammad Abdul Bari, the secretary general of the Muslim Council of Britain, said in a statement, "No one can deny that Saddam should have faced justice for his crimes against the people of Iraq and also his invasion of Iran and Kuwait."

"However," he added, "the fact that his trial took place while Iraq is still under occupation by foreign forces may mean that his execution, on the blessed day of Id al-Adha, will be regarded as an insensitive and provocative act by the U.S.-backed Iraqi government and that far from contributing to a so-called healing process, it may serve to further intensify the sectarian divisions in Iraq."

In Russia, the Foreign Ministry strongly criticized the execution, expressing regret that Iraqi officials disregarded international appeals not to carry it out. A spokesman, Mikhail L. Kamynin, expressed concern that Mr. Hussein's execution would worsen already deathly tensions consuming Iraq.

"The situation in Iraq is developing negatively," Mr. Kamynin said in a statement. "The country is sinking into violence and is effectively on the brink of a wide-scale civil conflict."

Mr. Hussein's execution, he went on, "may further aggravate the military-political situation and increase ethnic and religious tensions."

President Vladimir V. Putin made no statement, but other political leaders reacted even more harshly than the Foreign Ministry did. A small group of protesters from the Liberal Democratic Party picketed outside the Iraqi Embassy in Moscow, while the party's leader, Vladimir V. Zhirinovsky, a vocal supporter of Mr. Hussein and his rule, called the execution "the crime of the 21st century."

Mr. Zhirinovsky's party was accused of profiting from the sale of Iraqi oil during the United Nations sanctions program. His remarks were shown on state television.

Gennadi A. Zyuganov, the Communist Party leader, suggested in remarks to Ekho Moskvy, a Moscow radio station, that the United States would be associated with the execution, even if Iraqis oversaw his trial and death sentence. "Unfortunately, Texan law prevailed," he said, "the rule of the strong, the evil and the unprincipled."

DOJ_NMG_0111258

Other nations, like India, voiced regret. The Indian foreign minister Pranab Mukherjee said: “We had already expressed the hope that the execution would not be carried out. We are disappointed that it has been. We hope that this unfortunate event will not affect the process of reconciliation, restoration of peace and normalcy in Iraq.”

In Israel, an old enemy of Mr. Hussein’s, leaders reacted calmly but with satisfaction at the execution.

Shimon Peres, the deputy prime minister, told Israeli public radio: “Saddam Hussein brought about his own demise. This was a man who caused a great deal of harm to his people and who was a major threat to Israel.”

Ephraim Sneh, the deputy defense minister, noted that Mr. Hussein had fired 39 Scud missiles “into the heart of Israel” during the Persian Gulf war in 1991. Mr. Hussein, he said, was “a man who paid some $20,000 to the families of suicide bombers in Israel during the most intense time of the intifada and who was preparing a nuclear weapon to use against us.”

In 1981, Israeli warplanes destroyed the Osirak nuclear reactor near Baghdad just before it was to go on line, after intelligence showed that Mr. Hussein was striving to build a nuclear weapon.

Israel also strongly supported the American-led invasion in 2003 that overthrew Mr. Hussein, who was considered a major threat to begin a tank invasion against Israel and had rejected the idea of peace with Israel.

Mr. Sneh also warned that the execution could lead to “a reinforcement of the Iranian influence in Iraq and a spilling over into Jordan and Israel of Iraqi terrorism.”

The radical Islamic Hamas movement, however, condemned the execution as a “political assassination” that “violates all international laws,” according to a spokesman, Fawzi Barhum, speaking to Agence France-Presse in Gaza. Hamas, which was supported by Mr. Hussein, does not accept Israel’s right to exist and has a legislative majority in the Palestinian legislature.

“Saddam Hussein was a prisoner of war,” Mr. Barhum said. He called the trial “unjust” and said the timing of the execution, a half-day before the start of the Muslim feast of Id al-Adha, was insulting. “The hanging took place on the day of the Id and this is a message to the Arab street — the Americans have launched threats to all the Arabs,” he said.

Europeans Denounce Hussein's Execution (LAT)

By Tracy Wilkinson, Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, December 31, 2006

ROME — The death penalty is anathema across Europe, and opposition to the execution of Saddam Hussein was nearly unanimous among its leaders Saturday. At the same time, however, many were torn between those strongly held beliefs and revulsion for the former Iraqi dictator's record of atrocities.

Some of the strongest criticism came from the Vatican. The Roman Catholic Church teaches that all human life must be respected from conception until its "natural end."

The execution "is tragic news … that risks feeding the spirit of revenge and sowing new violence," said Pope Benedict XVI's spokesman, Father Federico Lombardi.

"Even though this is a person guilty of grave crimes," Lombardi told Vatican Radio on Saturday morning, the execution "is a motive for sadness."

"The killing of a guilty party is not the way to build justice nor to reconcile society."

The Vatican's top official for justice issues, Cardinal Renato Martino, said that Hussein was responsible for thousands of deaths but that executing him amounted to punishing "one crime with another crime." Speaking before the hanging, he said, "The death penalty is not a natural death, and no one, not even the state, can kill."

Several European leaders, spanning the political spectrum, questioned whether justice was served by Hussein's execution and said it could bring further bloodshed.

"We've already seen in the first hours the consequences, with a predictable increase in tension and violence," Italian Prime Minister Romano Prodi said from his home in Bologna.

Spain's center-left government and right-wing opposition, which rarely agree, condemned the hanging of Hussein as well as the late dictator's litany of abuses.

"The death penalty is not justice, it is vengeance, and so it was in this case," Gustavo de Aristegui, a senior official with the opposition Popular Party, told the Spanish news agency EFE. "But nobody will miss Saddam Hussein."

DOJ_NMG_0111259

In Britain, Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett reiterated her nation's opposition to the death penalty but applauded the process of bringing the former Iraqi leader to trial.

"I welcome the fact that Saddam Hussein has been tried by an Iraqi court for at least some of the appalling crimes he committed against the Iraqi people. He has now been held to account," Beckett said.

"The British government does not support the use of the death penalty, in Iraq or anywhere else," she said. "We advocate an end to the death penalty worldwide, regardless of the individual or the crime. We have made our position very clear to the Iraqi authorities, but we respect their decision as that of a sovereign nation."

But Menzies Campbell, leader of the opposition Liberal Democratic Party, said: "Saddam's death does not vindicate in any way the ill-conceived and disastrous decision to invade Iraq. His execution does not make an illegal war legal any more than it will put an end to the violence and destruction.

"Britain's interests will best be served by the withdrawal of our forces sooner rather than later."

France, which was a strong opponent of the 2003 U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, said Hussein's judgment and sentence were a matter for the Iraqi people.

In a statement, the Foreign Ministry said: "France, which advocates like all its European partners the universal abolition of the death penalty, takes note of Saddam Hussein's execution. That decision belongs to the Iraqi people and to the Iraqi sovereign authorities. France calls on all Iraqis to look forward and to work for reconciliation and national unity. More than ever the aim must be a return to the full sovereignty and stability of Iraq."

European politicians who are friendly to Washington stressed — carefully — their unease with the Hussein execution.

"We respect the decision, but it is known that the German government is opposed to capital punishment," German Chancellor Angela Merkel said.

"But on a day like this my thoughts are mostly on the many innocent victims of Saddam Hussein," she said.

Only in Poland, where a conservative government has remained an enthusiastic ally of the Bush administration, was there unequivocal support for the execution.

"Justice has been meted out to a criminal who murdered thousands of people in Iraq," President Lech Kaczynski's spokesman said, according to news agencies.

"This should serve as a warning to all those who would like to follow in Saddam Hussein's footsteps."

Many Who Fled Dictator Feel Jubilation, Relief (WP)

By Nelson Hernandez

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

Ibrahim Mizouri's death vigil for Saddam Hussein began at six o'clock Friday night.

Forced to flee Iraq in the 1970s when Hussein's Baath Party rose to power, Mizouri sat at his home in Annandale, eager to hear the story of the dictator's final moments. For him, Hussein's hanging was an emotional catharsis, the final act in a drama that has affected Mizouri's life as it has thousands of Iraqis who have washed up on U.S. shores, seeking safety from a dictator known for his ruthlessness.

"I was glued to the TV channel, CNN and Fox, just changing when they have the commercials, to 4 o'clock in the morning," Mizouri said. "When I saw the pictures, I said then, 'It's enough.' "

Among Iraqi Americans, the emotions that accompanied Hussein's execution were complex, ranging from jubilant to relieved to disappointed.

In Dearborn, Mich., home to one of the largest concentrations of Middle Easterners in the United States, cheering crowds thanked God for Hussein's death, saying the dictator had finally met justice after killing thousands of Iraqi citizens with bombs, bullets and chemical weapons.

"This is our celebration of the death of Saddam," Imam Husham Al-Husainy, director of the Karbalaa Islamic Educational Center mosque in Dearborn, said while standing on top of a car, the Associated Press reported. "The gift of our New Year is the murder of Saddam Hussein. If you want to share the Iraqi people's happiness for the death of Saddam, raise your voice and your hands."

DOJ_NMG_0111260

Others, such as Mizouri, were relieved, saying that only Hussein's death could ensure that the dictator would not return to power.

"Everybody's happy because we know for sure, 100 percent, that he's not going to come back," Mizouri said. "Honestly, this should have happened the very first day."

Some said they felt that Hussein's trial for the killing of 148 Shiites in the town of Dujail in 1982 had been lacking the majesty and importance commensurate with the scale of his crimes, particularly the 1987-88 Anfal campaign that killed tens of thousands of Kurds in the north and the 1991 massacre of thousands of Shiites in the south. But they added that the execution was necessary in order to move on.

"I think this is something that definitely needed to be done," said Safa Alkateb, a business executive from McLean. "I think it's really the best that you can do in the country right now. I think, given the situation, it's very, very difficult to do something better."

Najmaldim Karim, a neurosurgeon and president of the Washington Kurdish Institute, said he was disappointed by the news and thought the execution had been rushed before Hussein could account for his repression of Shiites and Kurds.

"I think it will give the impression that this was vengeance," Karim said. "It was definitely a great injustice to the survivors and the families. . . . I think there are a lot of questions that we probably will never know."

Like many Iraqi Americans, Karim thought the execution would not make a difference in the daily suffering of those still in Iraq, living amid constant sectarian violence and instability.

"In the short run, it probably will increase the violence," Karim said. "In the long run, it will lead to more animosity among the Sunnis because they will see this as vengeance. I think it will polarize them even more, personally."

Ali Attar, a doctor from McLean, was more optimistic and happy to see Hussein gone. Attar was forced to leave Iraq in 1980 because of his father's political activity.

"I am very happy to see this day," Attar said. "Although my father passed away 15 years ago, I am sure that in his grave he feels very happy that justice is served. The message of the new Iraq is different than the old Iraq. He got a trial I believe he would never give to any of his opponents."

Saddam Hanging Brings Joy, Gloom To Houston Iraqis (HC)

By Sarah Viren, Susan Carroll

Houston Chronicle, December 31, 2006

Dr. Mahdi Al-Bassam learned of Saddam Hussein's execution from news accounts.

But the Iraqi-born Sugar Land cardiologist heard a key detail about the historic death from an Iraqi government friend, who saw the execution.

"He said there was fear in his eyes, but there was no remorse," Al-Bassam said. "Even in the end."

Al-Bassam fled Iraq in 1967 and settled in the Houston area in 1971. He had uncles and cousins killed under the former dictator's regime. Saddam, he said, "brutalized the entire nation," and most of the Iraqis he spoke to back home Saturday were elated by the news of his death.

"He raped the country of its riches, and he left them starving with a $200 billion debt to the world community," he said. "He literally — not figuratively — starved his own people. To me, that's unforgivable."

The execution, announced in the United States late Friday night and near dawn in Baghdad, was greeted by cheers and celebratory gunshots in some Iraqi neighborhoods and mourning in others.

On Saturday, at Droubi's Bakery and Deli in Southwest Houston, where Iraqis are common customers, owner A.J. Droubi said there had been a lot of execution talk as people trickled in for bags of pita, jars of olives or flaky sweets.

"Some were happy," he said. "Some were not."

Intisar Alhellou, a Syrian immigrant working behind the bakery counter, counted herself in the unhappy lot. Like Al-Bassam, she made many calls back home about the execution. Those she talked to, she said, were distraught that it occurred on Eid Al-Adha, a Muslim holiday she compared to Christmas.

"Everyone is sad for what is happening, everybody in the Middle East," she said. "If they had waited, it might be different."

Even Al-Bassam, who called Saddam "an animal," had misgivings about the execution.

DOJ_NMG_0111261

"Most of the Iraqi people want to see him gone, and I understand that," Al-Bassam said. "But he has done so much harm in this world, I think he should have been made to live, and acknowledge what he did and suffer what he has done."

He said he wanted Saddam tried for more crimes, including the killing of thousands of Kurds, draining the southern marshes and the many killings whose victims are still being found in mass graves. He's infuriated by broadcasts on some Arab TV stations that portray him as a hero or martyr.

"They say the execution is politically motivated," he said. "I think a lot of that would have been reduced and nullified if all the atrocities had been put on display."

In Houston, he said, there are few Iraqi immigrants to share this story. In the late 1990s, many Iraqis immigrated to the United States and the local population was close to 15,000, he said. But after the fall of Saddam's regime, most went back. He estimates the local Iraqi population near 3,000.

He worries that many non-Iraqis have already forgotten the horrors of Saddam Hussein.

"I think the world did not get to listen to the evidence of these tremendous atrocities," he said. "But in the end, he would have been sentenced to death for all of them. He would have been (hanged) the same way sooner or later."

For Arab Critics, Hussein's Execution Symbolizes The Victory Of Vengeance Over Justice (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Dec. 30 — As daylight broke over the Arab world and news of Saddam Hussein's hanging spread over the airwaves and the Internet, the execution proved just as profound for what it did not change as for what it did.

Hezbollah's supporters in Beirut woke up on Saturday morning ready for another day of protests aimed at bringing down the United States-backed government of Fouad Siniora. Even in Iran, where the Foreign Ministry called the execution a "jubilation" for the thousands who lost family members in the Iran-Iraq war of the 1980s, officials pledged to continue pursuing their nuclear ambitions and denounced the United Nations Security Council's efforts to curb them, Iran's official news agency, IRNA, reported.

Throughout the Arab world, opposition movements are still on the run, many pro-democracy activists are either imprisoned or have simply given up, and the very targets of the American campaign to transform the Middle East, like Hezbollah, Iran and Syria, are more emboldened than ever.

Almost four years after United States troops entered Iraq with a broader foreign policy goal of ushering in a "new" Middle East, one built on democracy and rule of law, the execution of Mr. Hussein on one of the holiest days in Islam marked the unceremonious demise of that strategy, many Arab analysts said.

"If you compare the results to the objectives the U.S. claimed to realize, whether it was democracy or control of the region, their policies have evidently failed," said Nawaf Kabbara, professor of political science at Balamand University in Beirut. "They were not able to spread democracy, control anything or make any serious breakthrough. It is a failure on all levels."

For those Arabs who celebrated America's embrace of the rule of law, the quick execution, coming before the conclusion of other trials against Mr. Hussein for crimes against humanity, left a bitter taste of stolen justice. Even Mr. Hussein's staunchest enemies expressed a sense of bitterness at the end.

"It is evident that they were not after justice," said Hilal Khashan, a political science professor at the American University of Beirut. "It was a political decision, because as soon as they got a sentence on him they executed him. What mattered was his death rather than finding justice."

For those distrustful or disdainful of American intentions, the notion that the execution fell on Id al-Adha, one of the most sacred holidays of the year, seemed to symbolize the triumph of vengeance over justice.

"It looks like they just wanted to take revenge in a vulgar way; that was their gift to the Shia for the feast," said Khalid al-Dakhil, assistant professor of political sociology at King Saud University in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia, referring to Shiites, who were oppressed under Mr. Hussein and now control Iraq.

"Bush and al-Maliki thought they could benefit from this, but this is going to backfire," he added, referring to President Bush and Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq. "Saddam's execution is going to feed sectarianism and contribute to more bloodshed."

Id al-Adha, the feast of the sacrifice, is ultimately a commemoration of the Prophet Abraham's willingness to sacrifice his son Ishmael for God; instead he slaughtered a goat, and Muslims today slaughter goats, sheep and even camels to re-enact the event. As the blood of slaughtered sheep stained the streets of many Arab cities on Saturday, however, many found it hard to ignore the analogy of Mr. Hussein himself as a sacrificial lamb.

"Executing the martyr Saddam Hussein on the first day of Adha in one of the holiest months of the year is meant to defy the feeling of Muslims, to invoke sectarian strife and to confirm that Bush's policy as vindictive and aggressive," said a statement by the union of the Islamist-dominated professional associations union in Amman, Jordan.

"The phony slogans about freedom and democracy are fake," the statement continued. "The professional associations mourn the death of the hero, the martyr Saddam Hussein, and stress that the day of liberating Iraq is near."

Even those who believed Mr. Hussein was guilty expressed doubts about his trial, and about whether Iraq's rebuilt justice system was really the kind of civil institution that could support a true democracy.

"Saddam Hussein was guilty a thousand times over, but still the Americans and the Iraqi government managed to run a shabby trial," said Jihad al-Khazen, a columnist and former editor of the pan-Arab newspapers Al Hayat and Asharq al Awsat. "If they organized a fair trial with international observers that could have served as a model for other countries. Instead they messed it up, and I think Saddam in the eyes of many people will now be seen as another martyr."

Many in the region seemed to view the execution as a harbinger of further sectarian conflict. This was the first time in modern history that a Sunni dictator had been executed by a Shiite, some analysts noted, a symbolic step that was widely expected to incur Sunni retribution throughout the region. American embassies throughout the region warned citizens on Saturday to avoid protests and be prepared for unrest.

No Arab Euphoria At Saddam Death (BBC)

By Ian Pannell

BBC.com, December 30, 2006

Although the news of Saddam Hussein's execution was widely anticipated in the region, it has been greeted with a mixture of surprise and anger in some quarters - and notable silence in others.

Some Palestinians are mourning Saddam Hussein's demise

For many ordinary people in the Arab world, Saddam Hussein was admired if not particularly loved.

He was an active and strident supporter of the Palestinian cause and many regarded him as a strong leader who dared to defy both America and Israel. Images of the former leader having the noose pulled around his neck will shock many.

Libya has declared three days of national mourning.

Lawmakers and members of the militant Palestinian group, Hamas, have condemned the execution, with one calling it "a political assassination" that "violated international laws".

There is little reason to think the execution will change much in a region that heads into 2007 in a precarious state.

Opposition to the US-led invasion of Iraq was almost unanimous in the region. So perhaps it was no surprise that his trial was also regarded as unfair, as an exercise in 'victor's justice'.

Many Arab governments and people saw the legal process as instigated and controlled by Washington.

Despite the insistence that the trial, verdict and now execution was a purely Iraqi affair, few in the Middle East will believe that.

'Victory for Iraqis'

Saudi Arabia said it was surprised and dismayed at the timing of the execution on the first day of the Muslim festival of Eid al-adha. There was also criticism at how quickly the trial was over amid accusations it had been politicised.

But for those who crossed swords with Saddam, his execution is welcome news.

DOJ_NMG_0111263

Iran fought a long and bloody war with Iraq that killed hundreds of thousands of people on both sides. The country's deputy foreign minister called it a "victory for Iraqis". Hamid Reza Asefi predicted it would lead to more violence in the short-term, but would ultimately benefit the country.

Official reaction in Kuwait has been muted

But the response from Kuwait, a country Saddam invaded in 1990, was more muted. The state-owned news agency reported the only official reaction which was that this was "a matter for Iraqis".

Most other governments in the region have remained completely silent. To be fair, this is the first day of Eid al-Adha, the most important holiday in the Islamic calendar. Even so, it seems many have chosen not to step onto what is widely regarded as extremely delicate territory.

There are real worries that the instability in Iraq will be made worse by Saddam's execution.

Sectarian tensions across the Middle East have risen since the US-led occupation and the fear is that this news could make that even worse.

However, while it is possible that the troubles of the region could be affected by a single event - the execution of Saddam Hussein is unlikely to be it.

There is violence and instability in Iraq, continuing tension between Israelis and Palestinians, a peace process that (at best) is at a stand-still and an ongoing political crisis in Lebanon.

The optimism many felt this time last year that real political change may finally start to trickle through the Middle East has all but vanished.

The execution of Saddam Hussein may prompt some reflection and probably plenty of analysis, but there is little reason to think it will change much in a region that heads into 2007 in a precarious state.

Kurdish Survivors' Feelings Conflicted (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis

The Los Angeles Times, December 31, 2006

BAGHDAD — Sarchanar Mahmoud struggled to articulate the swell of emotions that washed over her when news of Saddam Hussein's death flashed across her television screen.

"There was an indescribable silence and conflicting feelings that I can't explain," said the pale, veiled woman, who still lives in the remote mountain town in northern Iraq where half her family died in a 1988 poison gas attack. "After this we came to and started talking."

Family members felt joy that they were finally rid of the fearsome dictator who had cast a long shadow over their lives. But there also was a sense of disappointment that Hussein would never face justice for what he had done to them.

In Hussein's final hours, calls for a stay of execution came from an unexpected source: survivors of some of the worst atrocities of his blood-soaked regime.

"We are happy that this tyrant's end has come," said Mahmoud, a 31-year-old court investigator in the Kurdish town of Halabja, where the gas attack took place. But "not in this sudden manner. We wished that the remaining cases would be settled first."

Hundreds of thousands were believed to have been tortured in Hussein's notorious jails, disappeared into mass graves or died in his wars and chemical attacks. But when Hussein was hanged at dawn in the capital on Saturday, it was for just one case: the killing of at least 148 men and boys in retribution for a 1982 assassination attempt in the Shiite Muslim town of Dujayl.

Officials with the special court convened to pass judgment on the former Iraqi president's decades-long regime say an ongoing trial dealing with a much wider case, the so-called Anfal campaign against Iraq's ethnic Kurdish minority that resulted in as many as 100,000 deaths, is due to resume Jan. 8. But without the chief defendant, many fear that interest will dwindle and that countless victims of other atrocities will never receive their day in court.

Larry Cox, executive director of Amnesty International USA, said the rush to execute Hussein days after an Iraqi appeals panel upheld the sentence "signifies justice denied for countless victims who endured unspeakable suffering during his regime."

"It will doubtless have a devastating impact on other related trials, as the key witness who could most compellingly shed light on the chain of command will have been silenced," he said in a statement.

Hussein had sat impassively through hours of dramatic witness accounts, detailed forensic presentations and startling reenactment in the Anfal case, but was executed before taking the stand in his defense.

Mahmoud was 13 when Iraqi warplanes attacked the town where she lived with eight family members in a two-room home belonging to an elder brother.

For three days, she recalled, the members of the family cowered in the basement. When they emerged, they stepped into pandemonium.

"We went out to the streets and found the people shouting and screaming that there was chemical bombing going on and that we had to leave," she said. Homes were smashed and bloodied bodies lay in the streets.

The family was separated in the panic. Mahmoud, her mother and two younger siblings fled to a sister's home in a nearby village. There they were advised to douse themselves in water and climb onto the roof to avoid the heavy gas that gave them painful headaches and stomachaches and made them vomit.

"We remained on the roof until dawn, wet, frightened, with the airplanes hovering over our heads," she said. "Each time we kids heard a plane, we'd close our eyes thinking that if we did so, they wouldn't find us."

They eventually fled to neighboring Iran, where Mahmoud learned from other refugees that the elder brother whom they had lived with had died with his wife and three children in the gas attack.

The Halabja warfare featured prominently in Hussein's second trial, where he faced charges of genocide for his Anfal, or "spoils of war," campaign against Kurds living in the northern reaches of Iraq.

Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish lawmaker, had urged the government to delay executing Hussein and top members of his regime at least until the conclusion of the Anfal trial. He wanted them to identify those responsible for the chemical weapons unleashed on Kurdish villagers, including the foreign companies and countries that supplied the parts to make them.

"A lot of secrets will go to the grave with Saddam and his group," he predicted. "If these trials continue without those people, what is the use?"

Under Iraqi law, all pending charges against Hussein will be dropped, and he will not be tried posthumously. But this does not affect charges against six others: Ali Hassan Majid, the northern military commander at the time; Sultan Hashim Ahmad Jabburi Tai, the campaign's military commander; Sabir Abdul Aziz Douri, director of military intelligence; Hussein Rashid Mohammed, another senior military officer; Taher Tawfiq Ani, governor of Nineveh province; and Farhan Mutlaq Jubouri, head of military intelligence in the region.

Raed Juhi, an investigative judge and spokesman for the Iraqi High Tribunal, said the Anfal trial and other cases, about a dozen in all, would continue.

The next scheduled to begin concerns the brutal crackdown that took place when Shiite Muslims and Kurdish fighters rebelled at the end of the 1991 Persian Gulf War, anticipating that the U.S. would support them.

Some survivors of the sweeping arrests and killings doubt the case will now make it to trial.

"Who is going to be tried now that there is no Saddam?" asked Mohammed Mousawi, a 58-year-old retired teacher in the southern Shiite city of Najaf.

Mousawi's brother went out to buy bread one day 15 years ago and never returned. Three other relatives disappeared about the same time. "We have no idea what happened to them," he said. "I suspect they are in one of the mass graves."

Human rights groups that have monitored Hussein's cases before the Iraqi High Tribunal say there is ample reason to fear that Iraq's government leaders might abandon the process.

"My sense from the start is that the whole undertaking seemed unnecessary to them, a waste of time and resources," said Richard Dicker, director of the International Justice Program at New York-based Human Rights Watch.

He cited the replacement of judges who appeared too lenient or sympathetic to Hussein, and a failure to provide sufficient security to defense attorneys, two of whom were killed.

The cursory way in which the court dispensed with Hussein's appeal and the speed with which he was sent to the gallows raised concern about political interference in the judicial system.

"It looks like the trial is buckling to the political process," said Hanny Megally, who heads the International Center for Transitional Justice's Middle East and North Africa program.

"The fear is that after [the next trial], which focuses on Shia, they may say: 'Look, this is expensive, this is taking a long time, let's call it a day.'

"On the other side of the coin," he said, "maybe without the big shot in the courtroom, people will start to focus more on the violations and the complaints and those stories will come out more."

For some in the ongoing Kurdish case, it was enough to see Hussein hang.

Aisha, a 51-year-old Kurdish villager who gave only one name, will never forget the day she recently faced the late dictator in court and told him about her husband, who disappeared when their village was razed during the Anfal campaign.

"I thought that I would be able to face neither him nor this whole experience," she recalled from a small home in Irbil, "yet I found myself very strong and I faced him fiercely."

It does not matter to Aisha that Hussein was executed for crimes from the previous trial.

"We got our revenge against a criminal today," she said.

Timing Of Execution Could Fuel Divisions (NSDY)

By Mohamad Bazzi

Newsday, December 31, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon -- The timing and drama surrounding Saddam Hussein's execution makes it likely that he will become a martyr for Sunni nationalists fighting U.S. forces and the new Iraqi government.

By executing Hussein at the start of Eid Al-Adha, the holiest of Muslim holidays, the Shia-dominated Iraqi government made a strategic blunder: It further angered the Sunni minority that formed the core of his regime and now is driving the insurgency.

As news of Hussein's hanging spread Saturday across the Sunni-dominated Middle East, many Arabs criticized the timing -- even those who despised the dictator. Relations between Sunnis and Shias are already strained by the regional ascendance of Shia-led Iran, its growing influence on the Iraqi leadership and its involvement in other countries with large Shia communities, especially Lebanon.

"Holding this execution at the start of Eid is only going to make relations worse between Sunnis and Shias," said Nazem Jassour, an Iraqi political analyst. "There was no good reason why the execution could not be delayed until after Eid ... It's going to be perceived by Iraqi Sunnis as one more example of how the Shia government is trying to humiliate them." The Iraqi government did not explain why it decided to execute Hussein so quickly.

There were always serious risks to bringing Hussein to justice while Iraq faces a raging insurgency. Some Iraqis warned that any trial -- especially one that Sunnis perceived as being unfair and dominated by U.S. and Iraqi officials -- would further inflame sectarian tensions. In death, Hussein could be an even more potent symbol than Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, particularly for the nationalist strain of the insurgency. Al-Zarqawi was killed in a U.S. air strike in June, but members of his al-Qaida in Iraq still are carrying out suicide bombings against civilians and security forces.

Hussein's supporters were quick to declare him a martyr, and some vowed revenge against Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who signed the death warrant.

"The president, the leader, Saddam Hussein is a martyr and God will place him in paradise along with other martyrs," Sheik Yahya al-Attawi said at a prayer service in a Sunni mosque built by Hussein in his home region of Tikrit, 80 miles north of Baghdad. "Do not grieve or complain because he has died the death of a holy warrior."

Many Arab rulers, including Hussein, usually pardon prisoners on the eve of Eid and delay any execution until well after the holiday. Exiled members of Hussein's Baath Party appeared on Arab satellite channel throughout the day and accused the Shia-led government -- especially al-Maliki's Dawa Party -- of being U.S. and Iranian puppets.

"Iraq will be ruled again by honorable people, not like it is today, by a group of spies who work for Bush," an Iraqi Baath member who goes by the nom de guerre Abu Mohammad told the Al-Arabiya channel.

It has never been clear how much influence Hussein had on the course of the insurgency, and whether he was coordinating it in a concrete way beyond sending out audiotapes to Arab media. After his arrest three years ago, the insurgency gained momentum.

While insurgents include former Baath loyalists and ex-members of the Iraqi army and intelligence services, others are Islamic militants from Iraq or neighboring Arab countries. Those militants have little allegiance to Hussein and are motivated by a desire to destroy the Shias and drive foreign troops out of a storied Arab land.

In a statement issued after Hussein's execution, al-Maliki tried to reach out to Sunnis involved in attacks on U.S. troops but not in killing Iraqi civilians. "We strongly reject considering Saddam as a representative of any sect in Iraq because the tyrant only represented his evil soul," al-Maliki said. "The door is still open for those whose hands are not tainted with the blood of innocent people to take part in the political process and work on rebuilding Iraq."

But most attempts at national reconciliation have failed, and Sunnis are likely to reject new overtures by al-Maliki because of the way he handled Hussein's execution.

The Sunni-Shia struggle in Iraq is largely political. Sunnis had dominated the country since its independence in 1932, despite making up only a fifth of Iraq's population. Hussein's regime brutally repressed the Shias, who constitute 60 percent of the country's 25 million people.

Since early 2004, insurgents have targeted Shia mosques, wedding parties and religious ceremonies across Iraq. They also have relentlessly attacked the Shia-dominated police and army. Iraq's most revered Shia cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, long has urged his followers not to retaliate against Sunnis. But as attacks on Shia civilians mounted, Shia militias and vigilantes began to fight back last year with tit-for-tat killings.

Hussein's influence reached beyond Iraq -- especially to the Palestinian-Israeli conflict. In more than 30 years as Iraq's ruler, he showed mastery at the politics of symbolism in the Arab world, and few symbols are as potent to Arabs as the Palestinians killed or injured while fighting Israel.

After the second Palestinian uprising in 2000, Hussein began distributing payments of up to $25,000 to the family of each suicide bomber and $10,000 for each Palestinian killed in clashes with Israeli forces. In all, Hussein sent about $35 million until he was ousted by the U.S. invasion in 2003.

The Iraqi checks reinforced the mix of hard-line nationalists and Islamic militants who oppose negotiations with Israel. The payments also helped Hussein restore his prestige among Arabs as the one true pan-Arab leader who refused to make concessions to Israel and the West.

Signs of Hussein's popularity could be found throughout the Palestinian territories. Mourners in funeral processions often waved Iraqi flags and posters of Hussein. Young men shouted his name while throwing stones at Israeli soldiers, chanting "Oh Saddam, Oh Saddam, come and blow up Tel Aviv."

As Hussein stood on the gallows, among his last words reportedly were: "Palestine is Arab" -- a message to Arab masses that he was dying a martyr for the most persistent Arab cause.

After Saddam, Attacks Go On (MINNST)

Minneapolis Star Tribune, December 31, 2006

BAGHDAD - After nearly three decades living with the brutal repression of Saddam Hussein and the violent aftermath of his overthrow, most of Iraq responded with relative calm Saturday to his execution, played out again and again on television.

To many Iraqis, it was a mere footnote to the narrative that has been playing out on the streets. Saddam was dead, but car bombs still reaped their daily toll: At least 80 were killed.

His death would do little, they said, to rid Iraq's new problems: sectarianism, ethnic cleansing and the lack of services.

"Everybody knows who will be sad and who will be happy," shrugged Ahmed Saleh, a 40-year-old Shiite whose sect is supposed to wish the Sunni despot good riddance. But he could hardly care as he sat with a Sunni friend Saturday. "Nothing will change."

Capt. Dave Eastburn, 30, of Columbus, Ohio, agreed. "Nothing really changes," he said. "The militias run everything now, not Saddam."

DOJ_NMG_0111267

Government leaders sought to tell a different story, saying Saddam's trip to the gallows should become a turning point in Iraq's strife. Referring to leaders of the Sunni insurgency, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said in a statement, "Saddam's execution puts an end to all their pathetic gambles on a return to dictatorship."

President Bush said the execution was a milestone on Iraq's road to democracy, but cautioned that it would not halt the bloodshed and political discord splitting the country. "Many difficult choices and further sacrifices lie ahead," he said in a somber statement released Friday night.

Other world leaders, however, used the occasion to express concerns about the death penalty and about the general course of events in Iraq.

In Italy, former Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi, who had staunchly backed the U.S.-led war in Iraq and sent Italian troops to fight, called the hanging "a step backward in Iraq's difficult road toward full democracy."The civilization in the name of which my country decided to send Italian soldiers into Iraq envisioned overcoming the death penalty, even for a bloody dictator like Saddam," he said.

Some Arab governments denounced the timing the 69-year-old former president's hanging just before the start of the most important holiday of the Islamic calendar, Eid al-Adha. Libya announced a three-day official mourning period and canceled all celebrations for Eid.

Violence, like any other day

Despite concerns about a spike in unrest, Saturday's violence was not unusually high for Iraq, nor did it appear to be in retaliation for the execution.

The military reported the deaths of six more American troops, making December the deadliest month this year for U.S. forces in Iraq. At least 2,998 members of the U.S. military have been killed since the Iraq war began in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

The new U.S. deaths included three Marines who died Thursday of wounds from fighting in western Anbar Province. A soldier also died in combat Friday in Anbar, and two others were killed by roadside bombs in separate incidents in Baghdad Friday, the military said.

In Baghdad on Saturday, 12 bodies bearing signs of torture were found in various parts of the city, police said.

Two car bombs detonated one after another in a religiously mixed neighborhood of northwest Baghdad, killing 37 civilians and wounding 76, police said.

Another 31 people died and 58 were injured when a bomb planted on a minibus exploded in a fish market in a mostly Shiite town south of Baghdad, said Issa Mohammed, director of the morgue in the neighboring town of Najaf.

A muted response

Across the country, the bitter remains of Saddam's rule defined Iraqis' responses to his death.

For Shiites, long oppressed, it was a moment of intense release.

"This chapter of Iraqi history is over," said Mowaffak al-Rubaie, Iraq's national security adviser, speaking on national television early Saturday. "Let us forget it and live with each other."

Sunni Arabs were skeptical. After three years of grinding violence and abuses by the Shiite government security forces, trust has all but fallen away, and few feel genuinely represented by the government. Most, in fact, are afraid of it.

"I'm not part of their world," said Yusra Abdul Aziz, a teacher in the Sunni Arab enclave of Mansour. "They are not speaking about Iraq. They are speaking about themselves."

Throughout the nation, larger crowds could be found in the more homogeneous cities. In the Shiite holy city of Najaf, police and residents danced side by side, chanting and singing in the streets. In Tikrit, a mostly Sunni city, angry crowds blocked main roads. But in communities immersed in civil strife, there was little response. In Baghdad, residents largely celebrated inside their homes or among friends at coffee shops.
