Five years later, when Newt was sworn in as Speaker of the House, Tom DeLay became the majority whip and a vital part of the successful election and legislative team that emerged in 1994. But Tom was an ally, not a subordinate of Newt's. He was his own free-standing political force, and inevitably rode his own course — sometimes along Newt's path, sometimes not.

(Just as, I might note, when Newt was minority whip under minority House leader Bob Michel, he was only a sometimes ally of Mr. Michel.) Even in a unified congressional caucus — as ours was in 1994-95 — it is made up of diverse and conflicting personalities, strategies, tactics, careers and goals. As Newt's right-hand guy, I had my elbows out to match Tom DeLay's own sharp elbows. But I admired his skill and his contribution to the common goals of the party.

In 1997 (after I had left), Tom DeLay led an unsuccessful rebellion against Newt (known at the time as the "Coup"), but retained sufficient respect of the rank-and-file members to remain as a powerful and intelligent force within the party.

By the winter of 1998 Newt chose post-election retirement rather than a battle to retain the speaker's chair. Even as brilliant a leader as Newt had become more detriment than benefit to the Republican House members.

Politics is a necessarily tough business, and it is exceedingly rare that a party leadership post is given out of gratitude for past services rendered to the party. Whether it was Maggie Thatcher being thrown over as Tory Party leader and prime minister, Newt being forced out as speaker, or now Tom DeLay being shown the exit, parties have every right, and indeed a duty to their constituents, to mercilessly shed no longer useful leaders.

Even the immortal Winston Churchill was shown no gratitude by the British electorate after he had led them to victory in World War II and was then summarily defeated at the polls.

It became evident earlier this year that Tom DeLay's time had come. Although he had been arguably the most able floor manager since Lyndon Johnson in the Senate in the 1950s, allegations fair or unfair undercut his capacity to further lead.

That is why on the weekend of Jan. 6 this year, party leaders quietly urged Tom to give up not only any claim on returning to the majority leader's slot, but also his now-vulnerable Texas seat. That is why on the Jan. 6 broadcast of "The McLaughlin

Group," I predicted that he would give up his leadership claims within a week — and probably his House seat thereafter. He gave his leadership claims up the next day, and his House seat earlier this week.

But if a party has a right to act ruthlessly in its self-interest, it also has a duty not to cave to the other party or its media allies. A party should get rid of its leaders on its own schedule — not its opponent's. That is why last year, when Democrats were calling for Tom's blood, I wrote a rhetorically violent column urging the Republican Party not to throw him over. The party did stand firm with him then — and in fact gave him a big party. These things are a matter of tribal pride.

Tom has served the party magnificently over the last two decades — both as a principled conservative legislator, and as a shrewd and tireless political operator. And he has had the good judgment to exit on his own two feet.

Both the Republican Party and the country are stronger and better for all that Tom DeLay has contributed.

So, as a not-always-ally, I wish him Godspeed on the next leg of his journey.

Now, The Spotlight Turns To Rep. Ney (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, April 5, 2006

The stunning announcement by Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) that he would resign from Congress has thrust another embattled Republican even more firmly into the spotlight: Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio).

Ney went to great lengths Tuesday to deny that he had any intention of leaving office, and he received public support from his fellow Ohioan, House Majority Leader John Boehner. Boehner said "there's no pressure" on Ney to quit, although Boehner did acknowledge that Ney faces a difficult re-election battle this fall. Ney, Boehner said, "has got his hands full, but he believes he's doing well."

Ohio Democrats and government watchdog groups, however, stepped up their calls for Ney to give up his House seat, with some predicting that he would soon be indicted in the federal corruption probe that has already brought down former GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff and others.

"All the dominos around Bob Ney in that case are falling, and you know in a game of dominos that you're going to tip over sooner rather than later," said Brian Rothenberg, a spokesman for the Ohio Democratic Party. "They're falling all around him, and he's wobbling right now. You can only wobble so long before you lose your balance."

One of Ney's potential opponents in November, Chillicothe Mayor Joe Sulzer, said that Ney "should take another cue from Tom DeLay and retire, for the good of Ohio."

Ney then issued a defiant statement of his own on Tuesday afternoon.

Ney said that "while I respect Tom DeLay's decision, I am not Tom DeLay. I have absolutely no intention of retiring. My constituents will make that decision in the next election, and I am grateful for the very strong support I continue to receive when I travel around the district."

Ney also lashed out at Sulzer and Zack Space, another Democratic candidate, calling them liberal allies of House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and unsuitable to represent the 18th district in Ohio.

"If elected to Congress, the first vote either Joe Sulzer or Zack Space will cast will be a vote for liberal San Francisco politics by voting for Nancy Pelosi for Speaker of the House," Ney said. "This will be a vote for higher taxes, more Second Amendment restrictions, more late-term abortions, more money for the United Nations and a cut-and-run policy in the war on terror."

However, Ney's legal and ethical problems have continued to grow with every new twist in the Abramoff probe, and some GOP strategists are privately wondering if it wouldn't be in the party's best interests if six-term lawmaker were to follow DeLay out the door.

"It's when you step and look at it from a 10,000-foot level, what is the right thing to do?" asked a senior House Republican staffer of Ney's future, suggesting that Ney has not fully come to grips with the scale of his political problems. The source said that Ney is still paying attention to the political atmosphere "at the street level" instead of looking at the overall environment in his district. "The way [DeLay] makes a decision, he's a tactician. Ney has to be a tactician now too," the staffer said.

Ney and his lawyers have continued to insist he did nothing wrong. But a Republican strategist close to the House leadership suggested that Ney is only holding onto his seat in order to strengthen his bargaining position in any future negotiations with the Justice Department.

"The only leverage he has is as a Member of Congress," said this strategist. "If he retires, he has no power."

Like DeLay, Ney has been a target of a federal corruption probe, and at least one of his former aides, Neil Volz, is under investigation by the Justice Department. Documents and e-mails from Ney's office were subpoenaed last year by Justice as it prepared its case against Abramoff. Abramoff pleaded guilty in January to a variety of federal charges, including conspiracy to bribe public officials.

Like DeLay, Ney has been forced to divert tens of thousands of dollars from his re-election campaign in order to pay legal bills. The Ohio Republican has had to open a legal defense fund to help offset those costs.

But even more ominously than DeLay, Ney has been implicated in three separate plea agreements between the Justice Department and individuals involved in the Abramoff scandal: Abramoff himself, Michael Scanlon and Tony Rudy. Scanlon, a former DeLay aide and ex-business partner with Abramoff, pleaded guilty to conspiracy to bribe public officials and mail and wire fraud last year. Rudy, another former DeLay aide, pleaded guilty last Friday to similar charges.

Ney — who's referred to as "Representative #1" in documents related to the case — and his aides play a prominent role in all three plea agreements as alleged targets of a bribery scheme that dates back at least five years.

Rudy's plea deal even included a new allegation about Ney: that the Ohio Republican had agreed in March 2001 to support legislation "that would enable Abramoff's clients to continue manufacture clothing with labels representing it was manufactured in the United States without being subject to the same wage and labor standards as companies operating in the continental United States." Ney has been known for years as a strong supporter of limiting foreign imports, so if he signed onto such a proposal as suggested by the Justice Department, it would have represented a dramatic change of view on a key issue.

Ney's office said Ney had no information on the latest allegation.

According to Federal Election Commission records, Abramoff donated $1,000 to Ney's re-election campaign on March 19, 2001. Adam Kidan, Abramoff's former business partner, gave $1,000 to Ney on the same day. Abramoff and Kidan pleaded guilty to fraud in connection with their purchase of a Florida casino cruise-ship company and were sentenced to 70 months in prison by a federal judge.

Ney is also a tangential player in the perjury trial of David Safavian, a former Bush administration official who has been charged with lying to federal and Senate investigators about his dealings with Abramoff. Both he and Ney took part in a now infamous August 2002 golf junket with Abramoff to Scotland.

Ney Vows He'll Fight On, Not Quit (HILL)

By Jackie Kucinich

The Hill, April 5, 2006

Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio) continued yesterday to deny that the scandal involving former GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff is creating any pressure for him to leave Congress, even after the decision by Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) to relinquish his House seat.

Ney received calls from supporters shortly after stories that DeLay plans to resign hit the Internet on Monday night. His backers wanted to know if he was considering the same course of action.

Ney assured his supporters that he isn't poised to follow DeLay's lead.

"We are two different people," Ney said in an interview with The Hill, stressing that he had absolutely no intention of resigning.

In a press release issued yesterday, Ney elaborated: "While I respect Tom DeLay's decision, I am not Tom DeLay. … My constituents will make that decision in the next election, and I am grateful for the very strong support I continue to receive when I travel around the district."

When asked whether he had received any information from the Justice Department about whether he would be indicted, he said, "I haven't heard anything."

"We turned over the material [the Justice Department] requested. … They have my telephone number," he said.

Ney spokesman Brian Walsh said 60 local elected officials as well as the 16 GOP chairmen in his Ohio district have endorsed his boss.

Ney resigned as House Administration Committee chairman Jan. 15, explaining that growing allegations about his connection to Abramoff were beginning to detract attention from the committee and the work of the House GOP conference.

Ney has been accused of performing legislative favors in exchange for lavish gifts, trips and campaign contributions. In the Abramoff plea agreement, he is referred to as the "Representative #1" singled out in a Justice Department probe of Abramoff's dealings.

"On the legal side, the congressman has said from day one that he has done absolutely nothing improper or illegal," Walsh said. "He has pledged to cooperate in any way possible with the Abramoff investigation and remains absolutely confident that his name will be cleared."

Ney told The Hill in a previous interview that, if indicted, he would still run to retain his seat.

Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) yesterday also denied that DeLay's announcement put more pressure on Ney to give up his seat.

"There's no pressure," Boehner told reporters.

Asked about the dynamics of Ney's race in terms of the Abramoff investigation, Boehner said: "He's got his hands full, but he's doing well."

Ney said he had spoken with Boehner shortly after Boehner was elected majority leader.

"I have his support and the support of my delegation," Ney said.

Ney has maintained that once his name is cleared he will return to his post as the chairman of the House Administration Committee.

"Once these false allegations have been put to rest, and I have the full confidence that they will be, I look forward to resuming the chair for the rest of my appointed term and continuing the important work of the Committee," Ney said in a release Jan. 15.

He stepped down from that position that day. Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) appointed Rep. Vernon Ehlers (R-Mich.), the second most senior member on the committee, shortly after Ney's departure.

But Ehlers seems to be settling into the chairmanship, if staff changes are any indication.

Less than a month after becoming the new mayor of Capitol Hill, as the chairman of the administration panel is often referred to, Ehlers began reviewing all committee staff, and on Feb. 2 he replaced Ney's staff director, Paul Vinovich, with William Plaster, formally the deputy chief administrative officer.

Vinovich remained on staff as a committee counsel.

Additionally, House sources close to the committee indicated that four interns, hired during Ney's tenure, were immediately let go during the changeover. At the time, Brandt denied the interns' jobs were ever in jeopardy and said some had opted to go to Ney's personal office.

Ney said he was surprised about all the staff changes, since few were made when DeLay stepped down as majority leader late last year.

"Once this is cleared, I would like to return," Ney said, but he added that the choice is up to Hastert: "Who knows what the time frame will be?"

While it is considered typical that an incoming chairman review committee staff, it is unclear whether it is common House procedure to review staff if the chairmanship is only a temporary position.

"I like Vern. I help him, and that's my way of supporting him," Ney said.

The House Administration Committee is seeking a new communications director for the committee to handle internal and strategic communications between the committee and the House, said Ehlers spokesman Jon Brandt.

"Chairman Ehlers is hiring his staff as he sees it appropriate within the rules and budget of the committee, just as any other committee chairman does," Brandt said.

On March 29, Abramoff was sentenced to 70 months in prison on conspiracy and fraud charges regarding his purchase of a casino fleet in South Florida.

New Maneuvers By Lawmakers Over A Colleague's Altercation (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON, April 4 — The case of Representative Cynthia A. McKinney, the Georgia Democrat who attributed a recent altercation with the Capitol Police to racial profiling, prompted a new round of political maneuvering on Tuesday as Democrats tried to distance themselves from the congresswoman and some Republicans pressed for a resolution praising the police.

"I don't think any of it justifies hitting a police officer," the House Democratic leader, Representative Nancy Pelosi of California said, in response to a question about Ms. McKinney. "I don't know if that happened, but I am saying if it did happen, it wasn't justified."

Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the Democratic whip, told reporters that members "should all cooperate fully" with the police, adding, "It doesn't appear that happened."

The Democrats made their remarks as federal prosecutors weighed whether to charge Ms. McKinney in connection with the episode, which occurred last week as she tried to circumvent a metal detector to enter the Capitol, which members of Congress are allowed to do. A Capitol Police officer failed to recognize her, and she apparently responded in a physical manner.

At a news conference Friday, Ms. McKinney said she regretted the episode but had acted in self-defense in response to "the inappropriate touching and stopping of me, a female black congresswoman." On Tuesday, her spokesman did not respond to a telephone call or e-mail message seeking comment.

Republicans have tried to make political hay of the episode, saying it did not comport with the Democrats' efforts to portray themselves as committed to national security. Representative Patrick T. McHenry, Republican of North Carolina, said Tuesday that he would introduce a resolution commending the police for their professionalism.

A senior House Republican aide said that the resolution would probably not come to a vote, but that Republicans would probably offer comments praising the police Wednesday when a separate police-related resolution was offered.

Mr. McHenry said his intention was to honor the "service and sacrifice" of the police, but he left little doubt that he was also intending to embarrass Democrats.

"I want to give them a pat on the back," he said of the officers, "not a punch in the chest."

McKinney Rebuked By Her Leader (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Hill, April 5, 2006

House Democratic leaders publicly rebuked Rep. Cynthia McKinney (D-Ga.) yesterday over an incident last week in which she hit a U.S. Capitol Police officer when he stopped her at a security checkpoint.

Speaking at a news conference, House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) said of McKinney's explanation, "I don't think any of it justifies hitting a police officer. I don't know if that happened, but if it did happen, I don't think it was justified. … I find it hard to see any set of facts that would justify striking a police officer."

Pelosi, who is no longer on speaking terms with McKinney, went on, "Our Capitol Police have a very difficult job protecting this symbol of democracy and the buildings around it."

House Democratic Whip Steny Hoyer (Md.) was even more emphatic.

"I think it is the responsibility of every member [of Congress], every visitor to the Capitol, every staff member, every member of the press and anyone else who comes in and out of the Capitol and the House or Senate office buildings to cooperate fully with the Capitol Police, who have been given an extraordinarily difficult and important responsibility of keeping the Capitol safe," he said, adding, "It doesn't appear that happened" in McKinney's case.

McKinney, a controversial member of Congress since she was first elected in 1992, says she struck the officer after he touched her inappropriately.

The U.S. Capitol Police has referred the matter to the U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia, who is expected to decide shortly whether to prosecute the congresswoman. Prosecutors could bring either the felony charge of assault on a police officer or a misdemeanor assault charge.

McKinney was entering the Longworth House Office Building shortly before 9 a.m. last Wednesday when a Capitol Police office stopped her for bypassing the metal detector. Members of Congress are allowed to walk around the detectors and are usually recognized by security officers.

Pelosi, appearing at an event to promote homeland-security planning among women, said she was not concerned that the McKinney controversy would draw attention from Democratic initiatives.

"This is the action of one person," she said.

Yet the political furor over the fracas could have reverberations beyond McKinney herself. Two Georgia Democrats, Reps. John Barrow and Jim Marshall, face tough reelection races in the Peach State.

"I don't think there's any doubt that Republicans can use McKinney against Democrats," said Alan Abramowitz, a professor of political science at Emory University in Atlanta. "They can hold her up as what's wrong with the Democratic Party. I wouldn't be surprised to see moderate candidates like [Reps.] John Barrow and Jim Marshall distancing themselves [from her]."

And Georgia Republicans have picked up on the issue.

"Representative McKinney could be a much better representative for the people then her actions demonstrated last week," said former Rep. Mac Collins (R-Ga.), who is seeking to defeat Marshall. "I believe she needs to apologize to the Congress, and to the people who reside in the 4th District of Georgia."

Former Rep. Max Burns (R-Ga.), also seeking to come back to Congress, challenged Barrow to denounce McKinney.

Marshall and Barrow declined to comment.

No member of the Georgia Democratic delegation, including revered civil-rights pioneer Rep. John Lewis, has stepped up to defend McKinney.

The lack of support for McKinney has fueled talk that she may be vulnerable to a primary challenge. Hank Johnson, who is black and a county commissioner, has declared his candidacy. He has, however, raised only pocket change as of the most recent campaign-finance reports. McKinney reported $35,000 on hand.

In a statement, Johnson chided McKinney for her conduct in the police fracas.

"I hope McKinney will put the interests of the people ahead of her own ego and do whatever is necessary to bring some closure to this. If that means having to make an apology, she should apologize," Johnson said.

Former Rep. Denise Majette defeated McKinney in the 2002 primary and served one term before running unsuccessfully for the Senate, leaving a vacant seat for McKinney to recapture. Majette has yet to express an interest in vying for her old seat.

If she did challenge McKinney, she could face some ill will from the many supporters who were disillusioned when she opted for a risky Senate run only two years after they had helped elect her to the House. Majette is reportedly interested in the position of state school superintendent.

After Scuffle, House GOP Acts To Laud Capitol Police (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — House Republicans introduced a resolution Tuesday to commend the Capitol Police force for its professionalism. The proposal follows a confrontation last week between Rep. Cynthia McKinney, D-Ga., and an officer she is accused of hitting.

Republicans presented their resolution as U.S. Attorney Kenneth Wainstein considered whether to press criminal charges against McKinney.

"I don't think it's fair to attack the Capitol Police, and I think it's time that we show our support for them," said Rep. Patrick McHenry, R-N.C., a sponsor of the measure. Ignoring a police officer's order to stop, or hitting one, "is never OK," McHenry said. McKinney is alleged to have hit a uniformed police officer who asked her to stop on her way into a House office building on March 29.

Democratic leaders did not defend McKinney or her charge of racial profiling.

"I don't think any of it justifies hitting a police officer," said House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi of California. "If it did happen, I don't think it was justified."

Rep. Steny Hoyer of Maryland, the No. 2 Democrat in the House, said all members of Congress, staffers and visitors in the building have a responsibility to obey Capitol Police.

Rep. Mel Watt, D-N.C., chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus, had no comment, a spokesman said.

McKinney said the officer started the incident by "inappropriately touching and stopping" her. A spokesman for the congresswoman did not respond to a request for comment.

The six-term lawmaker said the issue is not about whether to obey a police officer's order, whether she hit him or the fact that she was not wearing the lapel pin that identifies members of Congress.

"The issue is racial profiling," McKinney told CNN on Monday.

The measure introduced late Tuesday, co-sponsored by Rep. Mario Diaz-Balart, R-Fla., does not specifically mention McKinney, 51, or the confrontation, McHenry said.

Instead, the non-binding measure declares that Capitol Police "must remain constantly alert for … failure to respond to requests and instructions" and "consistently apply security and safety measures to all, including members of Congress."

Lawmaker's Encounter With Guard Raises A Capitol Tempest (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman And Nick Timiraos

The Los Angeles Times, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — It started with the seemingly smallest of incidents -- a misunderstanding last week at a security checkpoint in the Longworth House Office Building, where guards regularly check the identification and belongings of those entering the building.

But by Tuesday, the encounter between Rep. Cynthia McKinney, D-Ga., and a Capitol Police officer -- in which he touched her on the shoulder and she jabbed him with her cell phone -- had begun to mushroom into a racial and political furor, replete with accusations of racial profiling and threats of criminal charges. Along the way, leaders of both political parties and federal law enforcement joined the fray.

In the post-Sept. 11 world, it was clear, no security issue is minor, and in Washington politics, no incident is too small or too sensitive to be exploited as partisan cannon fodder.

The issue arose when McKinney sought to enter the Longworth House Office Building. She stepped around the metal detector as members of Congress are entitled to do. But she was not wearing the pin that identifies her as a member, and a guard tried to stop her.

Some think the resulting confrontation may have sprung from nothing more than a change of hairdo.

McKinney acknowledged she was not wearing her identifying pin, but maintained that the guard should have recognized a member's face, as Capitol Police often do, though it is not a requirement. Colleagues say McKinney had recently changed her hairstyle and suggest that may have led to a failure to recognize her.

By Tuesday's end, however, the last thing anyone involved with the case seemed to be looking for was an innocent explanation or a way to turn down the heat.

In the House, Republicans rushed to put themselves on the side of law and order, pushing through a resolution applauding the professionalism of the Capitol Police. "I don't think it's fair to attack the Capitol Police and I think it's time that we show our support for them," declared sponsor Rep. Patrick McHenry, R-N.C.

And the Justice Department, which handles local prosecutions in the District of Columbia, said it was considering criminal charges against McKinney.

A conservative blog, NewsByUs.com, gibed that McKinney was suffering from PTHD, post traumatic hairstyle disorder.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., distanced herself from McKinney. "I think what happened last week was a very unfortunate incident," she said. "I think that all members of Congress like to be recognized, that's for sure. And this was a case in which she wasn't. I don't think any of it justifies hitting a police officer. I don't know if that happened, but I am saying if it did happen, I don't think it was justified."

And with the news media digging up every morsel they could on McKinney's behavior, an Atlanta television station reported that McKinney spent $1,000 to fly singer Isaac Hayes to the dedication of a new office in Atlanta. After the news aired, McKinney's staff said taxpayers will be reimbursed.

Controversy is nothing new to McKinney's 4th District constituents.

In an earlier incident that echoes what pundits are now calling The Scuffle, McKinney complained when guards at the White House during the Clinton administration did not recognize her or treat her like other members of Congress.

After the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, McKinney apologized to Saudi Prince Alwaleed bin Talal after New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani turned down his offer of $10 million to help families of Sept. 11 victims. She suggested the money be sent to poor Americans.

A few months later, McKinney called for an investigation into whether President Bush knew in advance of the Sept. 11 attacks. "Persons close to this administration are poised to make huge profits off America's new war," she said.

"She's a political exhibitionist," said Ross Baker, a political scientist at Rutgers University. "She's always cavorted like this."

Friday, with two dozen Georgia schoolchildren in the background holding signs that read "God Bless Cynthia" and "Is Cynthia a Target?" McKinney blasted the officer for taking her shoulder and asking her to go through the metal detector.

Her attorney, James Myart, elaborated. "Like thousands of average Americans across this country, (she) is too a victim of the excessive use of force by law enforcement officials because of how she looks and the color of her skin. Ms. McKinney is just a victim of being in Congress while black."

The chairman of the U.S. Capitol Police Fraternal Order of Police, Andy Maybo, issued a statement backing the officer, who is believed to be white.

"We, the U.S. Capitol Police Fraternal Order of Police, are extremely proud of our officer," Maybo said. "He has upheld his oath as an officer and has executed his duties and responsibilities in a professional manner."

Security On Capitol Hill Is No Joke (USAT)

The 535 members of Congress have grown accustomed to perks that can lead, in some, to a sense of entitlement larger than the great outdoors.

Why, for example, must the mighty submit to the same security procedures the rest of the country has accepted as routine in an age of terrorism?

Rep. Cynthia McKinney, D-Ga., was apparently thinking along those lines last week when she breezed past a metal detector at a House office building without wearing a lapel pin that helps U.S. Capitol Police identify legislators.

An officer who didn't recognize her asked her three times to stop. When McKinney didn't respond, he put his hand out to restrain her.

At this point, a reasonable person might have identified herself without incident.

But McKinney — a volatile politician known for making outrageous comments such as accusing President Bush of having prior knowledge of the 9/11 attacks — allegedly responded by striking the officer before flashing her ID and dashing off to her meeting.

When Capitol Police said they would seek an arrest warrant, McKinney, who is black, responded by changing the subject from her own arrogance to accusing the officer of engaging in racial profiling.

Perhaps he hadn't recognized her because she had changed her appearance, McKinney suggested: "Do I have to notify Capitol Police every time I change my hairstyle?"

Security on Capitol Hill is no joke. Two Capitol Police officers were killed in 1998 when a mentally ill man opened fire at a tourist entrance. That was before 9/11 and the anthrax attacks.

McKinney should stop exploiting a phony race issue and apologize for her overbearing behavior. There's little doubt that Capitol Police will remember her in the future.

The McKinney Mess (RC)

Roll Call, April 5, 2006

We should be writing about Rep. Tom DeLay today. As much as anything else, the Texas Republican's triumphs and excesses have defined the dozen-year reign of the House GOP. But as hypnotic as the still-unfolding drama of his political downfall may be, it is impossible for us not to weigh in today on another Capitol Hill drama.

Today is Capitol Police Chief Terrance Gainer's last day on the beat. His tenure, which included helping the Capitol adjust to the post-Sept. 11, 2001, security environment, unfortunately ends in what will be labeled as a dust-up over a long-ignored nepotism law. We suspect there is a great deal more that eased Gainer's decision to turn in his badge. The perfect example of why Congress will always struggle to attract and keep men like Gainer — and of the unique pressures brought to bear on the man in the chief's chair — came just days ago from Georgia Rep. Cynthia McKinney (D).

The chief must not only answer to the Capitol Police Board, something that limits the chief's ability to make quick or sweeping changes to address threats to an acknowledged top target for terror, but also to 535 other bosses. Oh, and the spouses of those 535 bosses. Can't forget about them, as Rep. Bill Young (R-Fla.) and his wife, Beverly, proved.

After McKinney claimed she had been racially profiled and "inappropriately touched" by a Capitol Police officer (whose initial sin was apparently doing his job), did she take up her case with authorities and share her apparent concern about the state of security in the Capitol? No. She quickly made this drama about her, calling a press conference and flanking herself with entertainers. Naive as it sounds, we hope that she will find a graceful way to bring a close to this episode.

Many problems confronted in Washington, D.C., are complex. The one highlighted by the McKinney incident is, as well, but only because lawmakers so rarely hear the word "no," even when it's just a police officer trying to perform his sworn duty to protect Congress.

But we have a simple solution to make sure we don't see a repeat of the incident, and it doesn't even require Members to keep track of those pesky lapel pins. With the full-throated support of the House and Senate leadership, the police board should immediately call an end to the practice of allowing Members and those accompanying them to bypass magnetometers and other security measures around the Capitol complex. It's a practice we've always disliked, and one that only fuels perceptions of Congress as a pampered class. Now McKinney has given us new reason to encourage Congressional leaders to get rid of it.

Yes, we can already hear the complaints from the chronically overscheduled about how this will complicate their lives. In a legislature where one chamber routinely conducts the vast bulk of its business between Tuesday evening and Thursday morning, perhaps that's a good argument for spending more time in Washington and spreading those commitments across more days.

A little inconvenience may cause Members to better remember why the Capitol Police are here, as if reminders are necessary after two officers were slain just a few years ago trying to defend the Capitol. They are to protect Members before they are to serve them.

U.S. Focus On Abstinence Weakens AIDS Fight, Agency Finds (NYT)

By Celia W. Dugger

Insistence by Republican Congressional leaders that American money to fight the spread of AIDS globally be used to emphasize abstinence and fidelity is undercutting comprehensive and widely accepted aid models, the Government Accountability Office said in a report released Tuesday.

The report by the G.A.O., an investigative arm of Congress, examines the effect of a mandate from Congress that at least a third of United States money to prevent the spread of AIDS worldwide be devoted to sexual abstinence and fidelity programs.

It found that the provision had limited the reach of broader strategies to fight AIDS that include the use of condoms — a conclusion strongly contested by a senior Bush administration official.

The report also said the requirement had meant that officials in some countries have had to reduce spending on programs to prevent the transmission of H.I.V. from women to their newborn babies, as well as other prevention strategies.

"It is hampering their ability to implement key elements of the widely accepted model of H.I.V./AIDS prevention — the ABC approach," said David Gootnick, the main author of the report. ABC stands for abstain, be faithful or use condoms.

The new emphasis on abstinence and fidelity emerged in 2003 from the House International Relations Committee as it debated President Bush's $15 billion, five-year AIDS program. Since then, financing for AIDS prevention programs has increased sharply, from $207 million in 2004 to $322 million this year.

The report is based on interviews with United States officials carrying out American-financed AIDS programs in 15 countries, mostly in Africa. They were guaranteed anonymity to encourage candor.

American officials told Congressional investigators that the guidelines were at times ambiguous and confusing. The rules on abstinence and fidelity, they said, have made it more difficult for them to tailor programs to local needs.

Some officials said that although activities to promote condom use have been restricted, they did not understand the distinction between condom education and condom promotion, "causing uncertainty over whether certain condom-related activities are permissible," the report stated.

Dr. Mark R. Dybul, the deputy coordinator of the federal AIDS program, strongly disagreed. He said the program was carrying out a balanced effort that includes all the elements of ABC, a strategy that successfully reduced H.I.V. infection rates in Uganda. The guidelines are generally clearly spelled out, he said.

More broadly, he said, Congress's requirement has brought about what he called a needed shift of emphasis to include abstinence and fidelity, saying that earlier programs had been overly focused on condoms.

But condoms have not been neglected, he said. The number distributed at United States expense has risen during Mr. Bush's years in office, to 429 million last year from 348 million in 2001, federal figures show.

In a statement on Tuesday, Representative Henry J. Hyde, the Illinois Republican who heads the House International Relations Committee, said no report was needed "to uncover the fact that country teams may be resistant to change, and that some adjustment time would be needed to implement new requirements."

Representative Tom Lantos of California, the ranking Democrat on the same committee, differed.

"While this was obvious to those of us who do not have ideological hang-ups, the reality was that only a compromise would fly," he said, referring to the 2003 debate in Congress.

U.S. Abstinence Tack In AIDS Prevention Is Criticized By GAO (WSJ)

By Steve Stecklow

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

The federal government's increased emphasis on promoting sexual abstinence as a global AIDS-prevention strategy is hampering efforts to create comprehensive disease-prevention programs and causing some confusion in the field, a report by the Government Accountability Office found.

The report by the congressional watchdog agency didn't address the effectiveness of the abstinence programs promoted under the President's Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief, or Pepfar, which has been the subject of debate among health-care officials. Instead, it focused on the implementation of a congressional mandate that at least a third of AIDS prevention funds be spent on abstinence-until-marriage programs.

In Pepfar, a five-year, $15 billion program, the government aims to avert seven million new cases of HIV, the AIDS-causing virus, outside the U.S. by the year 2010. The program endorses the "ABC model," which stands for "Abstain, Be faithful or use Condoms." The legislation behind the program suggests that 20% of the program's funding be applied to prevention, with other funds going to treatment and care programs.

The report found that U.S. officials in 17 of 20 countries studied said that the abstinence-spending requirement "would prevent them from allocating prevention resources in accordance with local HIV/AIDS prevention needs."

The requirement also has led to reduced funding for other AIDS-prevention programs, including those aimed at reducing mother-to-child transmission of the virus, the report found. A team in one country reported that the spending requirement forced it to cut funds from a program to care for AIDS patients to address a local condom shortage.

The report also found confusion in many countries over the "ABC model," including which condom-promoting activities were permitted.

In an attached response to the GAO report, government officials who oversee Mr. Bush's AIDS program said it was on track to achieve its prevention goal and noted that funding for all prevention methods had increased from previous federal initiatives. The response also said program officials were committed to improving communication to the field.

GAO Criticizes Bush's AIDS Plan (WP)

By David Brown

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

The requirement that a large fraction of President Bush's global AIDS plan go to promote abstinence and fidelity is causing confusion in many countries and in a few is eroding other prevention efforts, including ones to reduce mother-to-child transmission of the virus.

Those are among the chief conclusions of an 87-page report by the Government Accountability Office that examined the most controversial aspect of the giant AIDS plan, budgeted at $15 billion over five years.

The survey of U.S.-funded programs in 20 countries -- 15 of them the focus of the President's Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief (PEPFAR) -- found widespread support for the "ABC" strategy that encourages abstinence until marriage, being faithful thereafter and using condoms in high-risk sexual encounters.

At the same time, the document paints a picture of worried program managers trying to juggle the demands of both their local populations and the U.S. Congress, seeking to craft comprehensive prevention messages while simultaneously keeping account books that strictly record spending on the abstinence effort.

The Office of the U.S. Global AIDS Coordinator requires that 20 percent of all AIDS spending go for prevention. Half the prevention budget must be spent to stop sexual transmission of HIV. Two-thirds of that spending, in turn, must be used promoting abstinence and fidelity.

"Most of the 20 PEPFAR teams . . . reported that fulfilling [that requirement] presents challenges to their ability to respond to the local epidemiology and cultural and social norms," the GAO authors wrote. About half a dozen teams said the spending requirement "can undermine the integrated nature of HIV/AIDS prevention programs."

Of the 15 "focus countries" -- 12 African countries, plus Haiti, Guyana and Vietnam -- nine reduced the amount of money for programs to prevent mother-to-child transmission of HIV in their 2006 budgets to meet the spending target for abstinence promotion.

In one, mother-to-child funding was cut from $1.4 million to $1 million, and in another it was reduced by $300,000, said GAO's David Gootnick, who oversaw the report.

In perhaps the largest adjustment, one country cut from $8 million to $4 million its spending on prevention services for couples in which one person has HIV infection and the other does not -- an extremely high-risk group -- as well as on sexually active youths and sex workers.

"This team noted that allocating funding in accordance with the spending requirement is not appropriate for the country's epidemic and has reduced the quality of the team's prevention programming," the authors wrote.

In order to encourage candid answers, GAO agreed to not identify the organizations or countries cited in the report.

But Richard Marlink, a physician who oversees prevention and care programs at the Elizabeth Glaser Pediatric AIDS Foundation, said that the need to spend more on abstinence cut into money available to its mother-to-child prevention programs in Mozambique and Swaziland. Since 2000, the foundation has provided antiviral drugs used to prevent HIV transmission to 136,000 pregnant women.

Several activist organizations said the GAO findings confirm their suspicions.

The abstinence policy "is basically unworkable," said Paul Zeitz, director of the Global AIDS Alliance. "This shows the problem very clearly and starkly."

But the AIDS coordinator's office, which is in the State Department, has shown considerable flexibility in administering the rules.

In June 2004, it notified Congress that it would broaden the definition of "abstinence until marriage" to include programs that also encouraged fidelity in sexual relationships outside marriage.

The office also exempts some countries' programs from meeting the abstinence-spending target as long as the entire overseas AIDS-prevention budget meets it. Ten of the 20 countries surveyed got exemptions.

Mark Dybul, a physician who is the medical director of the Office of the U.S. Global AIDS Coordinator, said condom promotion -- the C in ABC -- has suffered no reduction under the Bush plan.

"What we have done is come into a balance with ABC," he said.

He said the program cutbacks described in the GAO anecdotes would not have been necessary if the administration had received all the overseas AIDS funding it sought -- $527 million more over the last three budgets.

Laura Bush Visits St. Louis For Fundraiser, Youth (AP)

By Jeff Douglas

The Associated Press, April 4, 2006

ST. LOUIS - First lady Laura Bush said the most important issue facing America is defending itself.

Mrs. Bush visited St. Louis Tuesday to raise money for Republican Sen. Jim Talent's re-election campaign, while promoting her Helping America's Youth Initiative.

"At this historic time in our country, no issue is more important than defending America," Mrs. Bush told about 400 Talent supporters at a downtown hotel that stands near the St. Louis Arch.

"Thanks to the men and women of the United States military, America is winning the war on terror," she said. Mrs. Bush praised the Missouri Sen. for his work on the Senate Armed Services Committee. She also sent her sympathy to those hit by tornados that struck Missouri on Sunday.

Mrs. Bush said Talent "understands the sacrifices made by our armed services personnel, and he understands the importance of their mission."

The incumbent senator faces Democratic State Auditor Claire McCaskill in November. Talent was in Washington Tuesday, chairing a defense subcommittee meeting, and could not attend the fundraiser.

In his place was his wife, Brenda, along with President Bush's uncle, William "Bucky" Bush, and Gov. Matt Blunt's wife, Melanie.

A spokesman for Talent said the fundraiser was expected to bring in about $200,000.

In her 10 minute speech, Mrs. Bush called Talent a leader in the government's search for alternative energy sources, saying he helped develop a bio-fuels caucus in the Senate.

The first lady also addressed the President's Helping America's Youth Initiative. In the past year Mrs. Bush has visited multiple cities and toured youth programs that keep adolescents away from drugs and gangs.

Earlier Tuesday, Mrs. Bush visited a rehab center in the St. Louis suburb of St. Charles, where she met privately with teens recovering from substance abuse.

During the private meeting at the center, five recovering teens spoke openly about their addiction and recovery from methamphetamine, marijuana, cocaine and alcohol. The 24-bed Preferred Family Healthcare rehab center treats about 300 young people each year.

"We can't let children suffer with drug abuse and substance abuse because they can't afford help," Mrs. Bush said. She praised an Albuquerque, N.M., program that teaches alcohol prevention in the second grade.

One young man in the meeting, identified only as Matt, 16, questioned if second-graders would remember what they learned about drinking alcohol as they got older.

"Recovery is a very selfish thing - you have to be out for yourself," Matt said. The teen said he began smoking cigarettes at age 9 and is recovering from an addiction to marijuana and alcohol. He was ordered to treatment by the courts and said he has been clean for more than three months.

Mrs. Bush asked the teens for advice on what adults can do to keep children away from drugs and alcohol. Matt's response: "Don't let your kids grow up too fast."

Conferences will be held around the country to examine ways to help youth, with the first one this summer in Indiana, Mrs. Bush said.

Laura Bush Headlines Talent Campaign Fundraiser (SLPD)

By Jo Mannies

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, April 5, 2006

Laura Bush, wife of President George W. Bush, visited with five teenagers who are overcoming addictions to various drugs during the first stop of a regional visit today, a visit that included a campaign event for U.S. Sen. Jim Talent.

At the Talent event, about 400 hundred faithful Republicans greeted Mrs. Bush, who lauded the senator as "a very important member of the U.S. Senate. . . (who) truly represents the values and priorities of this great state."

She said Talent has helped the administration in its war on terrorism: "Jim understands the sacrifices made by our armed personnel." Talent was not in the ballroom to hear the praise because he remained in Washington to chair a defense subcommittee meeting and to be present today for a likely vote on an immigration measure.

Aides said that he had intended to be in town for the fund-raiser before his duties had intervened. About $200,000 was raised at the luncheon. The minium ticket price was $420, but some paid more to attend a private reception with Mrs. Bush and have their picture taken with her.

Earlier, at another stop, Mrs. Bush saw counselors and teens during a private visit to a St. Charles adolescent drug treatment center operated by Preferred Family Healthcare. The Kirksville-based company operates 35 facilities around Missouri that offer mental health and substance abuse treatment.

The tour was part of a series of visits Mrs. Bush is making around the country with various programs that encourage children and teens to avoid drug use or that treat those dealing with addiction.

She spent about 45 minutes at the St. Charles facility before heading down I-70 to the Millennium Hotel for the Talent fundraiser. Talent's best-known Democratic challenger is State Auditor Claire McCaskill.

Mrs. Bush called the treatment center "one really good example" of the types of facilities that were a wise use of federal money. She had been in Albuquerque, N.M., Monday visiting with second graders who had been learning about the dangers of addiction to drugs and alcohol.

The message she heard there also related to the one she heard here.

"You can't leave your life to luck. You can't guess...Think about the decisions you make," she said.

The session with the teens was candid; no television cameras or photographers were allowed. Only a couple of print reporters were allowed to witness the half-hour session.

Michael Schwend, president and chief exectuive officer of Preferred Family Healthcare, said earlier he was impressed that Mrs. Bush wanted the meeting to be semi-private.

"It's an incredible honor for the staff working in this facility. They deserve it," Schwend said. "This is a fitting response to their efforts."

While at the St. Charles facility, Mrs. Bush made no mention of the fact that it is Election Day and that a hotly contested state senate race is at stake in St. Charles.

That fact has been discussed for days by political activitists in both parties, who have speculated whether her stop would encourage Republican voters to get to the polls on behalf of State Rep. Scott Rupp, a Republican running against State Rep. Wayne Henke, a Democrat, for the vacant state senate seat.

Both parties took note that it was Mrs. Bush who was headlining the Jim Talent event, not her husband or any other major Republican administration figures.

"There's a reason Republicans are bringing in the only popular member of the Bush family," said Jack Cardetti, spokesman for the Missouri Democratic Party. Republican election officials in St. Charles said privately that her visit, even though it was low-key, could help Republican voter turnout.

527 Bill Splits Republicans (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, April 5, 2006

Battle lines have formed within the GOP, pitting the conservative Club for Growth and its allies against the party's leadership, as the House prepares to take up new limits on 527s.

The Democrats' steep advantage over the GOP in fundraising by the tax-exempt groups, which use a tax-code loophole to take in unlimited donations for political activity, led many Republicans to suggest that the crackdown created a partisan split. If Democrats did not embrace tighter regulation, Republicans would paint their support of the 2002 McCain-Feingold campaign-finance law as hypocritical.

But the Club for Growth is muddying the ideological waters, arguing that a Republican-backed 527 bill, even one that relaxes caps on aggregate contributions and coordinated campaign spending, violates the party's core principle of deregulated political speech. Club for Growth President Pat Toomey (R-Pa.), who served in the House until 2004, has enlisted more than 20 right-leaning advocacy groups in his quest to derail the bill.

Incumbent lawmakers "are basically saying, 'There are people out there criticizing me. … I have the power; I'll shut them down.' It's outrageous, it's appalling, it's frighteningly similar to what despotic regimes do to newspapers and individuals who criticize them," Toomey said in an interview late last week.

Co-signers of the Club's letter of opposition to the House 527 bill include Americans for Tax Reform's Grover Norquist, FreedomWorks' Matt Kibbe, Citizens Against Government Waste's Tom Schatz and conservative elder statesman Paul Weyrich. Even House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio), among his conference's leading advocates of 527 regulation, gave a nod to the bill's critics yesterday during a briefing with reporters.

"I understand their concerns, but we shouldn't let the perfect become the enemy of the good," Boehner said, referring to the argument that cash flowing to 527s, which must disclose their donors, already has begun shifting to 501(c) groups, which face far fewer reporting requirements.

The 527 bill slated for House consideration today is likely to resemble one offered by Reps. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.) and Marty Meehan (D-Mass.) that would require the groups to comply with Federal Election Commission (FEC) rules for PACs.

The Club's explosive fundraising growth during this election cycle is not driving its position against the bill, Toomey asserted.

"This should not be about the fact that we're doing well this year, which we are. It should be about the fact that we support conservative economic ideas, which we do," Toomey said.

Yet the Club has not confined its alliances to conservative groups, working with Nan Aron, president of the liberal Alliance for Justice, and Democratic election counsel Bob Bauer for strategy sessions this week.

"Placing undue restrictions on 527s will chill voter participation, stunt voter registration and reduce voter turnout during an election year," Aron said in a statement yesterday.

Some Republicans in the business world are holding their fire on the House's 527 overhaul, however. Few corporate entities have developed 527s, relying on the 501(c) designation or confining political spending to their PACs.

"Most companies, particularly public corporations, were very reluctant to invest in 527s," one business lobbyist said. "If your first duty is to your shareholders and you're going to invest in a political entity that you really have no control over, but you wear whatever it is they do because of your disclosed association, that's a risky proposition."

One of the best-known corporate 527s is the November Fund, founded in 2004 by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce to combat trial-lawyer lobbying groups and former vice-presidential candidate John Edwards. But the Chamber supplied most of the November Fund's financial backing, suggesting that it could easily reconstitute in another form if the House bill passes.

The business lobbyist acknowledged that his typical distaste for government regulation did not apply to 527 restrictions.

"Certainly we don't have the ideological-purity argument that some anti-regulation folks have. Of all the anti-regulation issues out there, this one's probably not a big one," the lobbyist said.

Rep. Tom Cole (R-Okla.) is a member of the whip team assembling vote counts on the 527 bill, expected to be a tough sell in light of burgeoning opposition from the Republican Study Committee (RSC), to which Cole also belongs.

Cole pointed out the difficult predicament of disagreeing with conservative friends on 527 regulations but said Republicans would have to embrace compromise to ensure victory in November amid a Democratic 527 onslaught.

"You have to be politically realistic about this" issue, Cole said. "This is not right to life; it's not as much of a moral question. … We need to recognize when our opponents have a weapon of this magnitude that they are using to destroy our majority. "To say 'I want to be politically consistent' and let our opponents destroy our majority seems politically misguided."

Meanwhile, at least one conservative 527, the National Federation of Republican Women (NFRW), is not opposed to a bill that would chill its own fundraising.

"We acknowledge that any 527 reform bill may affect NFRW political activities," President Beverly Davis said via e-mail. "However, the [NFRW] will work within the confines of the final 527 reform bill passed."

And one frequent foe of the Club, the centrist Republican Main Street Partnership, is working actively to support the House 527 bill. Main Street had previously pushed to add 527 restrictions to the House's lobbying and ethics reform package, which leaders had hoped to bring to the floor this week but swapped out for the 527 bill.

The Club is challenging Main Street members in at least two GOP primaries this year, backing conservative opponents to Rep. Joe Schwarz (R-Mich.) and Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.).

Four of the 10 most active 527s for this election cycle are Republican- or conservative-leaning, according to PoliticalMoneyLine. Right-leaning 527s trail their left-leaning counterparts by about $2.5 million so far in the 2006 fundraising chase, a gap that topped $110 million by the end of the 2004 cycle.

Two of the highest-grossing GOP 527s, the Republican State Leadership Committee and the Republican Governors Association, are inactive on the federal level and not likely to be affected by the House bill, should it overcome Democratic opposition to pass the Senate. One election lawyer noted that the House bill must be phrased correctly to avoid inadvertently affecting nonfederal 527s.

"It is important that the legislation is drafted to reflect the current debate, which is about federal activity," the lawyer said.

Close The 527 Loophole (WP)

THE HOUSE PLANS to take up legislation today that would close the biggest remaining loophole in the campaign finance system. It would require the political groups known as 527s to play by the same rules as other committees that aim to influence federal elections. The House ought to pass the measure, sponsored by Reps. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.) and Martin T. Meehan (D-Mass.), and shut down the kind of 527 "soft money" operation that flourished during the 2004 campaign, like Democrats' America Coming Together and Republicans' Swift Boat Veterans for Truth.

These committees, named after the section of the tax code under which they're established, are by definition "organized and operated primarily" to influence elections. When those elections are for federal office, it makes no sense to let such groups collect six-, seven- and even eight-figure checks to elect or defeat candidates, while candidates, political parties and political action committees are limited to receiving contributions a small fraction of that size. Similarly, corporations and labor unions -- barred by law from contributing directly to federal candidates or parties -- shouldn't be allowed to write checks to 527s, which exist for the same purpose.

The usual politics of campaign finance reform -- Democrats for (at least publicly), Republicans against -- are upside down this time around. The reason is that Republicans do better than Democrats at raising the (relatively) small donations known as "hard money," while Democrats took the lead in the past election cycle in raising soft money for 527 groups. Connoisseurs of hypocrisy should enjoy this spectacle, but the partisan calculations are probably overstated. Democrats, with the rise of the Internet, have been improving their hard-money fundraising. Republicans are bound to draw even in the 527 race if it continues.

There are concerns that regulating money to 527s would drive spending further into the shadows, to nonprofit groups and trade associations that, unlike 527s, don't even have to disclose their donors and spending. But there are restrictions on the partisan activity of such groups, and if a problem develops with the misuse of such organizations, that could be addressed in future legislation. It's not a reason for inaction now.

Senate Dems To Pursue New Strategy On Abortion (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, April 5, 2006

The Senate Democratic leadership says it has found a wedge issue to strengthen the party's position on abortion rights, which top strategists think has become a liability in recent years.

The wedge is legislation expanding access to contraceptives and sex education, which polls show a majority of Americans support but which Democrats are betting will be difficult for social conservatives in the Republican base to accept.

Democratic strategists say the time is right for action because women who support abortion rights but are not politically engaged are alarmed by the confirmation of Samuel Alito as Sandra Day O'Connor's replacement on the Supreme Court and by the passage of legislation strictly curbing the availability of abortion there.

Democratic leaders had planned to attach their wedge legislation to the budget resolution last month, but let that opportunity to pass.

The Prevention First Act is sponsored by Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.), one of few congressional Democrats considered anti-abortion. The bill, which Reid introduced at the start of the Congress, has the support of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), presumptive front-runner in the 2008 presidential primary and 21 other Democrats.

The bill would prohibit group health plans from excluding contraceptive drugs, devices and outpatient services if they cover the cost of other prescription drugs and outpatient services. It would also require the secretary of health and human services to disseminate information on emergency contraception to healthcare providers and require hospitals receiving federal money to provide emergency contraception to victims of sexual assault.

The bill would also mandate that federally funded programs provide information about contraceptives that is medically accurate and includes data on health benefits and failure rates.

When asked whether he would be able to get a vote on his bill soon, Reid said: "I hope so. I'll do what I can."

He added that bringing the issue to the floor is "on my mind."

A Democratic leadership aide said that, while only a slim majority of voters favor abortion rights, an overwhelming majority support promoting the use of contraceptives and comprehensive sex education.

Democratic pollsters also say that the issues of contraceptives and sex education are favorable for Democrats.

"The issue of abortion is very different from the issue of prevention, access to birth control and access to comprehensive sex education," said Anna Greenberg, a pollster for Greenberg, Quinlan, Rosner, which works for the abortion-rights group NARAL Pro-Choice America. "I think that Senator Reid's prevention-first agenda is not just smart in policy terms but smart in political terms because there is overwhelming support in the public for access to birth control and comprehensive sex education. People want women to be able to prevent unwanted pregnancies."

Celinda Lake, a pollster with Lake Snell Perry Mermin and Associates, working for NARAL, has tested voter support for Reid's Prevention First Act.

"It's 3-to-1 in favor of it. Even pro-life voters support it," Lake said. "It has the potential to be both a wedge and a turnout issue post-Alito. It shows how extreme a faction [within] the Republican Party is.

"Lazy Democratic women who are very pro-choice are very concerned about the combination of Alito and South Dakota."

Her polling last month in upstate New York, which has a heavy concentration of Republicans and socially conservative voters compared to the southern part of the state, showed that nearly 80 percent of voters supported comprehensive sex education, even when compared to programs emphasizing abstinence as the only truly effective form of birth control, Lake said.

Senate conservatives said they're not worried about the Democrats' plans to isolate them from independents and centrist.

"The efforts will likely fail because they're beholden to left-wing interest groups who oppose common-sense measures like parental notification," said John Hart, spokesman for Sen. Tom Coburn (Okla.), a conservative Republican who has been outspoken on the issues of abortion and contraception. "They take an ideological and unscientific view of contraception.

"Our work to improve accuracy of labeling on condoms has been blocked by a lot of people on the left who are supposedly for a balanced education approach."

Hart explained that Democrats and their liberal allies often oppose efforts to increase awareness about the failure rate of contraceptives in preventing pregnancy and the spread of disease.

He added that his boss would work with any colleague who wants to protect the health of women and young adults but would also "fight any effort by any politician to make this a wedge issue."

Turning The Tables (TIME)

By Perry Bacon Jr.

Time, April 5, 2006

On Capitol Hill last week, it was almost as if the two parties had decided to switch roles. At a press briefing, House Democratic Whip Steny Hoyer was declaring, "Republicans don't have an agenda," a critique Republicans usually hurl at Democrats. The next day Hoyer and other Democrats from the Senate and House, along with state governors, got together to announce the party's unified plan for improving America's national security.

Meanwhile, Republicans were looking in disarray — even before the announcement this week that Tom DeLay would give up his House seat. Some House Republicans were quietly rasing concerns after Majority Leader John Boehner questioned the value of a 700-mile fence for the U.S.-Mexico border that was part of an immigration bill passed by the House in December, while Senate Republicans questioned if their leader, Bill Frist, was allowing his presidential ambitions to get in the way of passing immigration legislation. And as the Senate moved forward with a lenient immigration reform plan, a group of almost two dozen House Republicans held a press conference to strongly denounce the Senate GOP's approach.

The conventional wisdom in Washington in recent years has been that Republicans are more unified and disciplined and have better-articulated ideas than Democrats, who are often at war with one another and questioning their leadership. But lately the Democrats, looking to create a campaign platform for 2006, have put out some ideas that their famously fractured party largely agrees on. Earlier this year, they released a plan to reform lobbying following the scandals of Jack Abramoff. Last week's security ideas were hardly earth-shattering: increasing inspection of goods coming through U.S. ports, doubling the number of Special Forces troops, pushing Iraq toward full sovereignty by the end of this year, and increasing efforts to make the U.S. less dependent on foreign oil. Some Democrats, like Pennsylvania Congressman John Murtha, have called for more aggressive steps, like the withdrawal of troops from Iraq. But Democrats seem to broadly agree on the security issues that hurt them in 2002 and 2004.

And Democrats can't be accused of lacking ideas: many of the party's most prominent leaders are putting out long tomes detailing their views. Later this month, Ted Kennedy's book America Back on Track will lay out ideas to ensure universal health care for all Americans, and House Democrat Rahm Emanuel and former Clinton aide Bruce Reed will put out a modestly titled book called The Plan in August that includes ideas such as a national science and technology center modeled on the National Institutes of Health. Illinois Senator Barack Obama has told the Chicago Tribune his new book The Audacity of Hope, due out in October, will look to show how politicians can "shift away from ideological debates and focus on traditional American common sense."

By contrast, on many key issues, Republicans can't find much agreement. Moderates and conservatives in House will spend this week battling over proposed spending cuts in the budget, while Republicans in the Senate fight about immigration reform. President Bush's domestic agenda, from health savings accounts to a commission to reform Social Security and other entitlement plans, has drawn little enthusiasm on Capitol Hill.

To be sure, Democrats still have their own problems. With a bunch of different presidential candidates, governors, congressional leaders and Howard Dean, the Democratic National Committee chairman, the party doesn't have one strong defining leader. And while Democrats may agree broadly, there are still major differences on tactics, such as the proposal to censure Bush over his warrantless spying program offered by Wisconsin Senator Russ Feingold. That idea won little support among his fellow Democrats. "I don't think it's a lack of ideas; it's coherence," says Paul Begala, the veteran Democratic strategist. The anti-war left is so mad at Connecticut Senator Joe Lieberman, for instance, that they're running a primary campaign against him.

And some prominent Republicans are offering their own policy ideas. Frist wants to start a program modeled on the Peace Corps that would send doctors and nurses to countries lacking medical personnel. Jack Kingston, a Republican congressman from Georgia, has put out what he's called the American Renewal Project, an eight-point plan that calls for a commission to recommend spending cuts to balance the budget and stop spending the Social Security surplus. The Republican Study Committee, a group of the most conservative House members, has released a plan to balance the budget in the next five years, although it would require politically difficult cuts in Medicare and Medicaid.

But the more important question might be: do policy plans and unity matter? Republicans have long argued their "Contract with America" — a 10-point plan signed by more than 300 GOP candidates — helped push them toward victory in November 1994. But according to polls at the time, most voters had not ever heard of the contract by Election Day. And many Democrats question the need for any kind of grand plan, particularly with President Bush's poll numbers below 40%; the party could urge voters to choose Democrats in Congress just to offer a balance to Bush. The key question, some Dems argue, is how successful they are in tying Republican candidates to Bush and making the election about the Administration's mistakes in Iraq and during Hurricane Katrina, rather than touting their own proposals in long policy statements. "To my way of thinking, voters don't need lots of plans," says Dianne Farrell, a Democratic congressional candidate in Connecticut running against incumbent Republican Christopher Shays. "Voters get it." Still, after years of being a house divided, Democrats will soon show their unity on another issue, putting out their plans for the economy — while happily watching the GOP's continuing family feud.

Biden Seeks Review Of State Department Screening (KRT)

By Jonathan S. Landay

Knight Ridder, April 4, 2006

WASHINGTON - A senior Democratic senator has asked the State Department's inspector general to determine whether the department has been using a political litmus test to screen private American citizens before sending them abroad to represent the United States.

Sen. Joseph Biden of Delaware, the top Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said in a letter to the inspector general that he was requesting the review in part because of a Dec. 2 Knight Ridder report that such a test was being used to weed out critics of the Bush administration's Iraq policy.

"If these allegations are true, such a policy appears to be inconsistent" with a State Department requirement "that speakers must be `representative of a broad range of responsible and informed opinion' in the United States," Biden said in the letter, which was dated Monday and sent to State Department Inspector General Howard J. Krongard.

"Moreover, it would undermine a public diplomacy purpose of the program - to show the world that we are not afraid of, and indeed actively encourage, full and open discussion of important issues," said the letter, a copy of which Knight Ridder obtained Tuesday.

The earlier Knight Ridder report concerned the U.S. Speakers/Specialists Program. Run by the State Department's Bureau of International Information Programs, it sends private American citizens and others on speaking engagements abroad.

The story quoted current and former U.S. officials as saying that potential participants were vetted - via Internet searches, for example - for any comments or writings that criticized administration policies, particularly its approach to Iraq.

Krongard's office didn't immediately return a call seeking a comment on whether it was acting on Biden's request.

In his letter, Biden said a review of the Bureau of International Information Programs also should be conducted because there hadn't been one since a 2004 inspection.

That effort, he said, found that while the overseas speakers program was a "highly regarded and valuable tool," it lacked a "strategic focus" and was largely reactive instead of proactive.

In Richmond, More Bushes in the Running

Best way for the Bush twins to stay incognito: Change into running clothes and hide out in Richmond.

Jenna and Barbara ran a 10K through the state capital's Fan district Saturday -- even crossing the finish line together! -- but went barely detected until the Richmond Times-Dispatch put the pieces together yesterday. The paper deduced that the twins ran under the fake names of Sarah and Emily Jackson , finishing at 54:27. Jenna's boyfriend, Henry Hager, finished three minutes faster under his own name. Race director Tracey Russell told us the White House reserved slots for the twins three weeks ago; both they and the Secret Service agents who ran with them blended invisibly into the crowd. "They're definitely in good shape," Russell said.

Help For Families (WT)

By Rick Santorum

The Washington Times, April 5, 2006

Thanks to the ingenuity of working Americans and the tax cuts passed by a Republican Congress in 2001 and 2003, our economy has rebounded from its post-September 11 slump and is the envy of the world. With a booming stock market, nearly 5 million jobs created since August 2003, a sound housing market, minority home ownership at an all-time high and an average unemployment percentage lower than the last three decades, there is no doubt that our economy is strong.

To keep our economy strong, three steps must be taken. First, we must extend the tax cuts of 2003 to prevent a massive tax increase, which would only stunt the economy and place a substantial burden on working families. Second, we must work to reduce the deficit by cutting wasteful government spending and reforming inefficient government programs. Third, we must do more to empower those who live beyond the reach of our robust economy.

Some in America have not reaped the rewards of our economic bounty; it is to help meet their needs that I have sponsored the Senate Anti-Poverty Agenda. There are three components to the anti-poverty agenda: work, investment and a neighborhood-based focus.

Work, not welfare, is the gateway to opportunity for all Americans. In 1996, Congress enacted historic welfare reform and the results speak for themselves: Welfare caseloads have been cut in half; more than 7 million individuals and 2 million families have exchanged a welfare check for a paycheck; and 1.6 million children have been lifted out of poverty.

To continue the success of the 1996 reforms and address the welfare recipients not yet involved in any work, Congress renewed and the president signed welfare reform, adding critical incentives to promote healthy marriage and responsible fatherhood.

In recognition of the role small businesses play in creating new jobs, I have advocated the expansion of the Work Opportunity Tax Credit (WOTC), a program that creates meaningful employment opportunities for millions of low-income Americans and provides tax incentives for employers who hire the jobless. Congress has the opportunity to approve this tax credit by passing the conference report of the Tax Reconciliation bill, which is currently in conference committee.

The second component of the Anti-Poverty Agenda is investment. Individual Development Accounts (IDAs) and KIDS Accounts are two investment proposals I have introduced that will enable low-income Americans to get the help they need as they strive to build a solid financial foundation. IDAs provide low-income, working Americans the opportunity to build assets through matched savings accounts for home ownership, educational needs or small business investments.

KIDS Accounts would provide every child with a savings account worth $500. Children in households that earn below the national median income would qualify for a one-time additional supplemental of up to $500. Allowed to mature until the account holder's 18th birthday, this tax-free money could provide a crucial first step to a down payment on a house, a college education or another step toward future prosperity.

The third component of our agenda is strengthening America's neighborhoods. The surest path to strong neighborhoods and communities is strengthening our charitable organizations, which rely on the generosity of citizens. Yet, under current law, more than two-thirds of American taxpayers are deprived of the chance to receive a tax deduction of their charitable contributions because they do not itemize on their tax returns.

The provision I have proposed that is currently in the Tax Reconciliation Bill changes this by providing tax deductions on their charitable contributions to almost 83 million Americans who do not itemize on their tax return.

I also worked to include a provision that would allow individuals to give tax-free contributions from their IRAs for charitable purposes, helping a wide range of charities and likely providing billions of dollars to help make higher education more accessible and affordable.

Lastly, I offered an amendment to the tax-reconciliation conference that provides restaurants, companies and farmers an increased tax incentive to donate food to shelters and food banks that feed the hungry.

By keeping tax rates low, enabling low-income Americans to develop real assets and amending tax laws to encourage all Americans to give generously to our nation's charities helping those in need, we will help ensure that our economy stays strong and that ours is a nation of opportunity and prosperity for all.

Investors Seek Clarity On Campaign Giving (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- As Congress debates new campaign-finance rules, shareholder groups are pushing companies to do a better job of disclosing political donations.

McDonald's Corp. and Southern Co. are the latest to agree to post more information on their Web sites about contributions to candidates and issue-oriented groups that sometimes don't have to release donors' names. Eight other companies also have changed their policies in response to shareholder requests in the past three years.

The campaign for corporate disclosure is gaining momentum. Institutional Shareholder Services, which advises investors on how to vote their proxies, is for the first time recommending passage of a shareholder resolution requiring more oversight and disclosure of political giving.

The unprecedented recommendation involves Washington Mutual Inc., a fast-growing Seattle thrift. According to Alan Gulick, a company spokesman, Washington Mutual opposes the resolution on grounds that information on the thrift's donations, roughly $50,000 in the past election cycle, are already available to the public. In addition, Washington Mutual executives argue the cost of implementing a new policy may well exceed the company's relatively modest political giving.

Proponents of corporate disclosure say political giving by public companies can create risks for shareholders, particularly if the firm winds up in the middle of a political scandal.

In the money-laundering investigation of former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, for instance, eight corporations were indicted for making donations to a Texas political group associated with Mr. DeLay. In Texas, donations by companies to political candidates are illegal; the firms say they weren't aware that their contributions might be directed to candidates, as prosecutors allege. Four of the corporations have settled with prosecutors.

"We are not arguing that companies shouldn't spend money politically. Companies really should do more due diligence in tracking where they are spending their money and where it ultimately ends up," says Bruce Freed, who is spearheading the effort as co-director of the Center for Political Accountability, a nonpartisan group working on transparency in corporate donations.

A recent survey of investors by Mason-Dixon Polling & Research, commissioned by Mr. Freed, has provided him with fresh ammunition to take to corporate executives. More than 90% of respondents backed more disclosure and 84% wanted board oversight and approval of such giving. Nearly three-quarters of respondents agreed that corporate giving is often aimed at advancing the private interests of executives rather than the company's interest.

In the past three years, the Center for Political Accountability has teamed with various shareholder organizations, including unions, religious groups and environmentalists, to introduce more than 100 corporate resolutions calling for board oversight and greater transparency of corporate political activity. All but one were defeated, but they have sparked negotiations that led to policies that make it easier for shareholders to track political giving and impose more internal scrutiny of donations. Sixty resolutions are pending this year and 41 are scheduled for votes.

Corporations largely have opposed the resolutions, saying that investors can go to a host of Web sites -- including the Federal Election Commission's -- to monitor donations.

That had been the position held by Institutional Shareholder Services. In recent months, though, ISS analysts concluded that changes in campaign-finance rules stemming from the 2002 McCain-Feingold law made it harder to track corporate giving since so much money was flowing to a new batch of political organizations not bound by the same disclosure rules as political parties, says Jim Letsky, a senior ISS analyst.

"We were seeing examples of where corporations didn't know where their money was ultimately ending up," Mr. Letsky said. Congress is considering legislation to close that loophole, but it is unclear if anything will pass this year.

ISS hasn't given overhaul advocates everything they want. Recommendations on shareholder resolutions regarding political giving will be evaluated on a company-by-company basis and largely will hinge on whether a firm already has high-level oversight of donations and a policy explaining its criteria for giving, Mr. Letsky said.

In the case of Washington Mutual, ISS analysts concluded there "is no detailed information" about "oversight or accountability for corporation contributions or the administration of Washington Mutual's PACs." By contrast, ISS this month is recommending against passage of a similar resolution brought by Citigroup Inc. shareholders because the company posts its rationale for making political donations on its Web site and requires board oversight of them.

Mr. Freed plans to step up pressure on corporations by pressing for disclosure of dues and contributions to trade associations. Corporations have long been able to make their voices heard -- and their identities concealed -- on Capitol Hill by having their trade associations take the lead, and these groups often closely guard donor lists and finances.

Mr. Freed is preparing a report that he says will track some of the millions of dollars donated by corporations to trade associations or other groups that eventually are passed on to candidates or causes that sometimes conflict with policies advocated by the firms, such as providing benefits for employees in same-sex partnerships.

Margaret Weber, coordinator of corporate responsibility for the Adrian Dominican Sisters, a Roman Catholic order in Michigan, is taking up the cause to push for disclosure of trade-association payments.

She became interested in the issue during the Capitol Hill debate over a prescription-drug plan for seniors in which the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, the trade group representing big drug companies, figured prominently. While the Dominican Sisters didn't take a position on the legislation, they had hoped the bill would allow for government-negotiated drug prices and transparency on rebates and discounts. Ms. Weber says neither happened in part because of opposition from drug makers.

Ms. Weber said information about a company's trade-association membership could influence where the sisters invest their savings, because "as much as possible, they strive to have an alignment between the values of their money and their mission."

Hillary Leaves Room For Gore (HILL)

By Dick Morris

The Hill, April 5, 2006

Hillary Clinton made a fundamental decision in 2002 to support the invasion of Iraq. In doing so, she sought the center of American politics, reacting to issues much as her husband had throughout his ascent to the presidency.

But times have changed, and the center is not what it used to be. In the highly partisan and charged environment of politics in 2006, what has become of the centrist doctrines that reelected Bill Clinton and brought George W. Bush, the compassionate conservative, to the White House? Is the center still the place to aim in getting votes?

At the White House, I described the Clintonian brand of centrism as triangulation, with the polarized, partisan participants in the dialectic aligned to the left and the right at the base of the triangle and the centrist synthesis atop the apex, embracing the best of both arguments and rejecting the worst.

But the desideratum of American politics is not always found in the apex. When we confront new issues, challenges or problems, we are not ready for synthesis. We want our politicians, on both sides of the aisle, to develop alternatives and to debate and elaborate them. Unlike the Japanese, we expect our system to polarize when we face new issues so that we can listen to both sides and make our decision.

But eventually the debate has run its course. And because we are not like Italy or France, we refuse to debate perennially the same questions and demand, after the debate has raged long enough, that our leaders articulate a synthesis that reflects our consensus.

That was the situation the Clinton White House faced in the mid-'90s. By then, Americans had been debating more or less the same issues for decades — crime, welfare, the budget deficit, our response to globalization, free trade, a federal role in education — and we had come to conclusions about what we wanted. It remained for Clinton to implement them and cement his popularity.

But as the 21st century dawned and the old problems of the '90s had been largely solved, a raft of new issues arose with which we were less familiar. As we pondered the questions of international terrorism, global climate change, the catastrophic consequences of our dependence on imported oil, the privacy issues raised by the Internet, massive illegal immigration and the high costs of the new medicines and medical treatments, we looked to our political leaders to develop alternative solutions and both want and welcome debate.

Hillary Clinton bet on consensus and centrism in backing the war and an aggressive policy on terrorism — and may have bet wrong.

There are no rewards for those who push consensus when we want polarized debate. Ask the George H.W. Bush of 1992, the Jimmy Carter of 1980 and Gerald Ford. Fate is equally unkind to polarizers when we want consensus. Ask John Kerry, Bob Dole, Mike Dukakis and Walter Mondale.

Hillary may have misjudged the left. She may have opened herself up to a challenge from the left over Iraq and the war on terror. She may have chosen the wrong time and the wrong issue on which to cross party lines.

Fortunately for her, John Kerry and John Edwards were equally complicit in backing the war at its inception. And Howard Dean was always too far off the deep end in opposing it. But Al Gore, who has no stain of support for the war to overcome and is the custom-designed candidate for the issues of energy and climate change, could mount a serious challenge to Hillary Clinton.

Mrs. Clinton is trying to move to the left on anything and everything but the war. Her comparison of illegal aliens she once said she "abhorred" to Jesus and her charge that Bush is one of our history's worst presidents reflect her concern that she may have left the left behind in her move to the center.

Now she is in a fix. If she retreats and retracts her support for the war, she will become the ultimate weather vane, shifting with the political wind. If she adopts a pro-peace posture, she undoes all of her work to position herself as a hawkish female, able to overcome the stereotypes that hamper women who wish to be commanders in chief.

But if she stays in the center as the Democratic Party falls off to the left, she could find herself with a deadly primary challenge from her husband's former running mate.

Morris, a former political adviser to Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) and President Bill Clinton, is the author of Condi vs. Hillary: The Next Great Presidential Race.

Buckley Calls Clinton A Contender (NYT/BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

William F. Buckley Jr., the prominent conservative writer and leader, says that while a strong Republican candidate for the 2008 presidential race has yet to emerge, the Democrats have in Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton a true contender to win the White House.

Mrs. Clinton is "a very consequential woman with an extraordinary background," he said in an interview with Bloomberg Television that was broadcast on Monday. "Her thought is kind of woozy left, not in my judgment threatening."

She is "a phenomenon, a woman candidate who might easily be president," he added.

Mr. Buckley suggested that he was less than impressed with the current group of potential candidates for 2008, saying, "I don't find a commanding presence sort of knocking on the door" for the next presidential campaign.

Senator John McCain of Arizona, a potential Republican candidate, is "a remarkable human being," Mr. Buckley said. "I don't think that his name comes to mind automatically as somebody who over a period of years has addressed problems with fruitful thinking, let alone with consistent thinking."

Neither senator has announced plans to seek a party nomination, though both have been raising money, making campaign appearances on behalf of other candidates and taking other steps to build a network of national support.

Mr. Buckley, 80, is often called the father of contemporary conservatism in America. He founded the National Review in 1955, and his philosophy, articulated in the magazine, calls for small government, low taxes and a strong defense. In the same interview in which he discussed Mrs. Clinton, he also criticized President Bush's handling of the war in Iraq, which he called a failure.

Mass. Residents Face Required Coverage (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

USA Today, April 5, 2006

Residents of Massachusetts will be the first in the nation required to carry health insurance, just as motorists in many states are required to carry auto insurance.

After months of debate, state lawmakers approved a bill Tuesday that requires individuals to have coverage and tacks a $295 per worker annual assessment on employers who don't provide it, with the aim of reducing the state's 550,000 uninsured to near zero within three years.

The bill goes to Republican Gov. Mitt Romney. He's expected to sign it because he proposed such a measure last summer. "It's about 95% of what I wanted," he said. "We'll be the only state in America where every citizen has health insurance."

The state will be the only one requiring that all individuals who can afford to purchase insurance do so.

"That is where they are really pioneers," says Paul Ginsburg, an economist with the Center for Studying Health System Change, a non-partisan research group in Washington. He says the only way to get universal coverage is to require individuals to carry insurance.

Free coverage will be provided to individuals at or below the federal poverty line, which is $9,600 a year, and the state will subsidize coverage for those up to three times the federal poverty level.

The legislature estimated the programs would cost $316 million the first year and up to $1 billion annually by the third year, with all but $125 million annually coming from state and federal funds already earmarked for health care.

"This plan is particularly helpful to lower- and low-middle income uninsured folks. What's less clear is its assistance to more middle income uninsured," says John McDonough of Health Care for All, an advocacy group that supports the concept of the plan.

The new subsidized insurance plans are to be available by July. After July 1, 2007, uninsured individuals who refuse to buy coverage could lose their state tax exemption, which is worth about $150 per person. In following years, those who refuse to buy will pay penalties equal to about half the cost of a health insurance plan.

Insurers have yet to put forward a package of plans that will be available, or the prices. Romney says the premiums will be about $200 a month for a single adult.

Some business groups also say the plan does nothing to contain growing medical costs.

"If you're looking for increased access for the uninsured, this (bill) is a winner," says Jon Hurst, president of the Retailers Association of Massachusetts, a statewide trade association of 2,500 retailers and restaurants. "If you're looking to reduce out-of-sight costs … particularly (for) small employers, it doesn't accomplish that."

Massachusetts Sets Health Plan For Nearly All (NYT)

By Pam Belluck

BOSTON, April 4 — Massachusetts is poised to become the first state to provide nearly universal health care coverage with a bill passed overwhelmingly by the legislature Tuesday that Gov. Mitt Romney says he will sign.

The bill does what health experts say no other state has been able to do: provide a mechanism for all of its citizens to obtain health insurance. It accomplishes that in a way that experts say combines methods and proposals from across the political spectrum, apportioning the cost among businesses, individuals and the government.

"This is probably about as close as you can get to universal," said Paul B. Ginsburg, president of the nonpartisan Center for Studying Health System Change in Washington. "It's definitely going to be inspiring to other states about how there was this compromise. They found a way to get to a major expansion of coverage that people could agree on. For a conservative Republican, this is individual responsibility. For a Democrat, this is government helping those that need help."

The bill, the product of months of wrangling between legislators and the governor, requires all Massachusetts residents to obtain health coverage by July 1, 2007.

Individuals who can afford private insurance will be penalized on their state income taxes if they do not purchase it. Government subsidies to private insurance plans will allow more of the working poor to buy insurance and will expand the number of children who are eligible for free coverage. Businesses with more than 10 workers that do not provide insurance will be assessed up to $295 per employee per year.

All told, the plan is expected to cover 515,000 uninsured people within three years, about 95 percent of the state's uninsured population, legislators said, leaving less than 1 percent of the population unprotected.

"It is not a typical Massachusetts-Taxachusetts, oh-just-crazy-liberal plan," said Stuart H. Altman, a professor of health policy at Brandeis University. "It isn't that at all. It is a pretty moderate approach, and that's what's impressive about it. It tried to borrow and blend a lot of different pieces."

Many states, including Massachusetts, have been wrestling for years with how to cover the uninsured, and several states have come close, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures. Hawaii passed a universal access law in 1974 requiring employers to offer health care coverage for employees working 20 hours or more a week, but nearly 10 percent of people remain uncovered. Efforts to cover all citizens in Minnesota and Vermont in 1992 and in Massachusetts in 1988 fell flat in the mid-1990s when the language in the bills concerning universal coverage was repealed.

In 2003, Maine enacted a law that significantly broadened insurance coverage and combined employer payments with expanded government programs. That year, California enacted a law that required employer contributions, but it was repealed in a referendum in 2004. Massachusetts would be the first state to require its citizens to have health insurance.

The Massachusetts bill creates a sliding scale of affordability ranging from people who can afford insurance outright to those who cannot afford it at all. About 215,000 people will be covered by allowing individuals and businesses with 50 or fewer employees to buy insurance with pretax dollars, and by giving insurance companies incentives to offer stripped-down plans at lower cost. Lower-cost basic plans will be available to people ages 19 to 26.

Subsidies for other private plans will be available for people with incomes at or below 300 percent of the poverty level. Children in those families will be eligible for free coverage through Medicaid, an expansion of the current system.

The Massachusetts bill was hammered out with proposals and input from state Democratic legislators; Mr. Romney, a Republican; Senator Edward M. Kennedy, a Democrat; insurers; academics; businesses; hospitals; and advocates for the poor, including religious leaders.

They were motivated in part by a threat by the federal government to eliminate $385 million in federal Medicaid money unless the state reduced the number of uninsured people. The state was supposed to have the bill completed by January, but state officials said they were confident that the federal government would approve of Tuesday's bill.

"Whenever you can have the medical community, the business community and the advocates all applauding our efforts, I think that's indicative of a successful exercise," said State Senator Robert E. Travaglini, the majority leader.

Mr. Romney, who is considering running for president in 2008, said in an interview Tuesday that the bill, passed by a legislature that is 85 percent Democratic, was "95 percent of what I proposed."

He said, "This is really a landmark for our state because this proves at this stage that we can get health insurance for all our citizens without raising taxes and without a government takeover. The old single-payer canard is gone."

Mr. Romney pushed the idea of the "individual mandate," requiring people who can afford insurance to buy it. The bill makes it possible for employers to enable many of those people to use pretax dollars, saving them 25 percent or more. Individuals who fail to get health insurance by July 2007 will first lose their personal exemption on their state taxes. In subsequent years, they would have to pay a penalty that could be as high as half of what an affordable health care premium would cost.

Eric Fehrnstrom, the governor's communications director, said that for those people with incomes above 300 percent of poverty, "our assumption was that these would be mostly single mothers who just did not have the wherewithal to get insurance. It turned out it was mostly young males. In some cases they are making very attractive salaries. These are people who just don't imagine themselves needing care, but of course when they break a leg when they're out bungee jumping they go to the hospital and we end up paying for their care anyway."

One element that Mr. Romney and some legislators did not want was the fee for employers who do not provide health insurance.

For several months the bill seemed stalled because the House and Senate leaders could not agree on the issue of charging businesses. One proposal of an $800-per-employee charge was reduced to a maximum of $295 that would go toward paying costs for the uninsured and would be reduced as more people became insured, Mr. Travaglini said.

Because the bill is part of a budget bill, Mr. Romney has line-item veto power. He said Tuesday that he would likely change the business fee provision in some way or veto it before signing the bill.

Still, he did not seem that worried about it, saying he had been most concerned that the fee not be a payroll tax, as had been originally proposed. Mr. Travaglini said that if Mr. Romney vetoed the business fee, the legislature would override it.

Bob Baker, president of the Smaller Business Association of New England, said his members seemed to accept the idea of the fee.

"The notion of the level playing field, I think from an element of fairness and equity, people are O.K. with it, unless it impinges on their ability to pay for it," Mr. Baker said. "There hasn't been a hue and cry among our members."

Mr. Romney said that with more people insured, everyone would "get better health care" and that premiums for people who already had insurance might drop because "providers won't be pushing the cost of the uninsured onto the people who have insurance."

James Roosevelt Jr., president and chief executive of Tufts Health Plan, agreed.

"I think that will help both improve the quality of health care and lower the cost," Mr. Roosevelt said, but he added, "We would have liked more flexibility in the design of health plans to permit lower premiums that are affordable for all people."

The program, which was approved 154 to 2 in the House and 37 to 0 in the Senate, will cost $1.2 billion over three years, but only $125 million of that will be new state money. The rest will come from federal money and existing state money. After three years, lawmakers say, no new state money will be required. A new agency will administer the system.

Advocates for the uninsured held a victory rally at the Statehouse.

"We're thrilled that this truly represents a commitment to the poor and the working poor," said Rabbi Jonah Pesner, a leader of the Greater Boston Interfaith Organization.

Joseph Landais, 64, could use insurance for himself, his wife and three children. Mr. Landais, a retired hospital custodian, said his wife, a nurse's aide, makes too much for the family to be eligible for Medicaid but not enough to afford insurance. He had a hernia operation four months ago that he did not have to pay for under the free-care pool, but he had not been able to see a doctor since then, even though he is still not feeling well.

"After years that you've been working that hard," Mr. Landais said, "I think you deserve something back."

Mass. Bill Requires Health Coverage (WP)

By David A. Fahrenthold

BOSTON, April 4 -- The Massachusetts legislature approved a bill Tuesday that would require all residents to purchase health insurance or face legal penalties, which would make this the first state to tackle the problem of incomplete medical coverage by treating patients the same way it does cars.

Gov. Mitt Romney (R) supports the proposal, which would require all uninsured adults in the state to purchase some kind of insurance policy by July 1, 2007, or face a fine. Their choices would be expanded to include a range of new and inexpensive policies -- ranging from about $250 per month to nearly free -- from private insurers subsidized by the state.

Romney said the bill, modeled on the state's policy of requiring auto insurance, is intended to end an era in which 550,000 people go without insurance and their hospital and doctor visits are paid for in part with public funds.

"We insist that everybody who drives a car has insurance," Romney said in an interview. "And cars are a lot less expensive than people."

Tuesday's votes approving the bill -- 154 to 2 in the House and 37 to 0 in the Senate -- were the culmination of two years of politicking and several months of backroom negotiations, as rival health-care plans from Romney and the two Democrat-led chambers were hammered into one.

What resulted is a proposal that health-care experts say is unlike any other in the country. What to do about the 45 million Americans without health insurance has flummoxed both the Bush administration, whose proposal for "health savings accounts" fizzled, and that of Bill Clinton, whose broad plan for health-care changes fell flat.

On the state level, Hawaii and Maine have programs that seek to offer near-universal access to health insurance, and Illinois last year approved a subsidy plan that will widely increase coverage for needy children.

But no state, experts say, has taken the step of making health insurance coverage a legal requirement. The idea was applauded by Uwe E. Reinhardt, a professor of economics and public affairs at Princeton University, who said that he has long believed that the American system of allowing uninsured patients to receive care at the government's expense was nothing more than "freedom to mooch."

"Massachusetts is the first state in America to reach full adulthood," said Reinhardt, noting that the new measure is a move toward personal responsibility. "The rest of America is still in adolescence."

As simple as the idea sounds -- buy insurance or else -- the proposal is complex and, in some cases, still unfinished. For instance, it leaves the task of determining exactly how much some low-income residents will pay for their new, more affordable policies to a new agency that would serve as a liaison between the government, policyholders and private insurance companies.

Because of that uncertainty, some still worry that the residents required to buy insurance would not be able to.

"Who defines what's affordable?" said the Rev. Hurmon Hamilton, a minister in the Boston neighborhood of Roxbury and a leader in an interfaith organization that has pushed for health-care changes.

Another aspect that may change is the $295 annual fee that the bill would require companies to pay for each employee they do not provide with insurance. Legislative leaders have insisted that this money be fed into the pool that would subsidize low-cost policies for the uninsured, but Romney said that would be unnecessary.

"That's likely to be adjusted by me," he said -- potentially through the use of a line-item veto.

This is how Massachusetts leaders envision the plan would work:

Uninsured people earning less than the federal poverty threshold would be able to purchase subsidized policies that have no premiums, and would be responsible for very small co-payment fees for emergency-room visits and other services. Those earning between that amount and three times the poverty-level amount would be able to buy subsidized policies with premiums based on their ability to pay. Though no maximum premium is set in the bill, legislators' intent seems to be for it to top out at about $200 to $250 per month.

All residents will have to provide details about their health insurance policy on their state income tax returns in 2008. Those who do not have insurance would first lose their personal state tax exemption, perhaps worth $150, and later face penalties equal to half the cost of the cheapest policy they should have bought. That might work out to $1,200 per year, officials said. Those who cannot find an affordable plan could obtain a waiver.

Enforcement of the requirement will not be done by hospitals, officials said: They will treat uninsured patients as before.

The bill's passage was celebrated as a victory in the state legislature, with House Speaker Salvatore F. DiMasi (D) telling colleagues that they had succeeded where other states had failed.

"We did something to solve the problem," he said.

The same message might provide a political boost to Romney, who is considering a presidential run in 2008. By proving he can work with Democrats, and find a health-care solution that relies on the private sector, Romney can portray himself as an executive who can work across the aisle in harshly partisan times.

"It might help him to say, 'Look, I have a solution for health insurance,' " said Julian E. Zelizer, a professor of history at Boston University.

Massachusetts Seeks To Mandate Health Coverage (WSJ)

In a far-reaching bid to obtain universal health-care coverage in their state, Massachusetts lawmakers overwhelmingly approved a bill that is the first in the nation that requires all citizens to buy medical insurance.

The bill also requires that businesses not offering health insurance pay penalties to help cover the uninsured and uses a combination of added state spending, tax incentives, insurance subsidies and expanded government-insurance programs to reach the estimated 550,000 Massachusetts residents who are currently uninsured. Gov. Mitt Romney, widely viewed as a possible presidential candidate, has indicated he intends to sign the bill.

Massachusetts, a state of 6.4 million people, would join only Hawaii, which for decades has required employer-provided insurance, in attempting to mandate universal coverage, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures. A handful of other states, including California and New York, have measures pending that seek to cover many more state residents, and dozens of others are trying to address the problem in smaller ways.

"States are struggling with this all over the country," said Rachel DeGolia, the operations director for Universal Health Care Action Network, a national nonprofit group pushing for wider health coverage. "What is unique about Massachusetts is they are trying to do something about it."

Richard Cauchi, director of health programs for the state legislatures group, called the individual-mandate requirement in Massachusetts "novel." The tactic, akin to forcing drivers to buy car insurance, "is an untried approach that other states will look at with interest," he said.

Yesterday's action shows that states may prove more adept at coming up with plans to provide universal coverage after President Bill Clinton found such efforts to be a big stumbling block at the federal level in the 1990s. Massachusetts faced a July federal deadline to show that it was working to cover more of the uninsured or face losing $385 million in funding for Medicaid, the federal-state insurance plan for the poor and disabled. Other states -- schedules vary from state to state -- are expected to face similar pressure in coming years.

Though some business groups, such as the Greater Boston Chamber of Commerce, have generally voiced support for the bill, others, especially those representing small businesses, are wary of its effects on costs and job creation. In addition, health-care experts say the plan, despite its bold claims, provides little new money to pay for health care. They note that under Gov. Michael Dukakis, Massachusetts approved a plan for universal health coverage in the late 1980s that died because of lack of money.

Under the plan approved yesterday, uninsured residents who don't buy new, low-cost plans -- some subsidized by the state -- would face financial penalties beginning in July 2007. In the first year, those who don't buy insurance -- provided the state makes available one deemed affordable -- forfeit their personal state tax exemption, now worth about $150. In the second year, those who don't buy would have to pay a fine equal to half of the monthly premium cost of an affordable plan. For a full year, the fine could total about $1,200 for a young adult who would be eligible for an individual plan. There are no criminal penalties for not buying insurance.

In another provision that stirred unease among some businesses, the proposed law would require companies with 11 or more employees to provide health coverage or pay a per-employee annual fee of $295. In addition, employers whose uninsured workers make multiple use of emergency room care -- "free riders," in the bill's parlance -- would have to pay between 10% and 100% of the portion of those medical bills exceeding $50,000.

The bill would shift about $1 billion in government money -- mostly federal -- to several programs to provide low-cost insurance plans to the uninsured. One plan would increase eligibility for state Medicaid to more families; another would provide state subsidies for low-income families; another would create a big insurance pool that aims to make coverage more affordable for small businesses to give their employees the chance to buy health insurance with pretax dollars.

Lawmakers hope that requiring coverage will increase demand for such policies, which private insurers would then be eager to supply. They also hope that reducing reliance on expensive emergency room visits will lower health-care costs.

The bill would require residents to secure coverage by July 2007. Lawmakers said they expect the bill will lead to the coverage of 90% to 95% of uninsured residents by 2009. "This is really a landmark for our state," Gov. Romney said in an interview. "We can do what most people thought was impossible, which is to get health insurance for every citizen without a government takeover and without new taxes."

The bill passed unanimously in the Massachusetts Senate and 155-2 in the House. Although Democrats dominate both chambers, Gov. Romney, a Republican, has been a big advocate of most of the provisions at a time when he is widely believed to be considering running for U.S. president. A successful plan for health-care reform is likely to be a big feature of any run.

Analysts and even supporters acknowledged some potential pitfalls in the bill. First, the state has yet to define what is an "affordable" health-care plan. The bill requires only that individuals buy a plan if the state determines it to be affordable, presumably based on a reasonable percentage of income. The plan relies on private insurers to come up with such plans, and insurers could either fail to do so, or provide plans that aren't attractive or that don't provide much protection.

Alan Sager, a professor of health services at Boston University, said Massachusetts is "leaping into murky waters by obliging individuals to buy coverage." He said the legislation doesn't provide enough funding to solve the problem. "It seems the bill would force individuals to buy very flimsy or expensive policies beyond their financial reach," he said.

Dr. Sager said one recent study estimated that providing health-care coverage to the uninsured in Massachusetts would require an annual state subsidy of $700 million, which is about four times what is provided for in the current legislation.

He also said the legislation contains a Medicaid rate increase for the state's hospitals and doctors that will total $540 million over three years. "This is more money for business-as-usual health care," he said. "Legislators have to trumpet great accomplishments. They conceived an elephant 18 months ago, but have given birth to a mouse."

A spokesman for the Massachusetts Hospital Association said the rate increase comes after years of Medicaid "underpayment," during which the government insurer often paid less than the cost of the service provided.

Gov. Romney has 10 days to sign the bill into law, and though he has said he will do so, he can veto individual measures. He has said he opposes any new payroll taxes for the plan, but considers the penalties on businesses to be fees, not taxes. Yesterday, he said he would examine the $295 fee carefully.

The Massachusetts plan would create a more-than $1 billion-a-year program for the uninsured, though much of it would come from shifting around existing money. The state would kick in $125 million in new spending, mostly for subsidizing health-insurance plans for lower-income residents. The rest could come from existing programs, and the fees on businesses and individuals who don't meet the bill's requirements.

"The rest of the country is waiting for us," said Massachusetts Sen. Therese Murray, a Democrat from Plymouth, Mass., and chairwoman of the Senate Committee on Ways and Means, which hammered out the legislation. "We're going to be the first test case."

A Warm Farewell For A Cold Warrior (WP)

By Dana Milbank

They laid Caspar Weinberger to rest yesterday beneath an old oak tree on an Arlington National Cemetery hilltop with a view of the Pentagon he once led.

Their faces emerged as if from the history books, or from yellowed newspaper photos: Margaret Thatcher, Jeane Kirkpatrick, Ed Meese, Frank Carlucci, John Poindexter, Jack Kemp, James Schlesinger and other Cold Warriors of the late 20th century.

And though they were mourning Weinberger, the Reagan defense chief who died last week at age 88, they were also celebrating what they see as his -- and their -- signal triumph: the end of the Soviet Union. Judging from the wizened faces, white hair and walking canes, there will not be many more such reunions.

"His goal was an era of hope and peace, one in which the people of Eastern Europe lived free, one in which the Berlin Wall no longer divided families but instead existed only in memory, or its shards sold as souvenirs," eulogized Donald Rumsfeld, who both preceded and followed Weinberger as defense secretary. "Today we live in that world, a world made safer and freer by Cold Warriors like Cap Weinberger." The usually cool Rumsfeld choked up as he added: "May God bless the country he so loved and served so well."

Colin Powell, who as President Bush's secretary of state didn't agree with Rumsfeld often, concurred on the meaning of Weinberger. Ronald Reagan, Powell said in his eulogy, "needed a champion to rebuild the armed forces of the United States to show the Soviets and the world how strength can lead to peace, and that champion was Cap Weinberger."

Both men were, in a sense, remembering a simpler time, before the binary logic of mutually assured destruction gave way to the messy nuances of asymmetrical warfare. When Weinberger ruled the Pentagon, there was an easily defined enemy, and the free world held the United States in high esteem.

In their dueling eulogies (they cited some of the same anecdotes), Rumsfeld and Powell each saw in Weinberger a proponent of his own world view. Powell, recalling Weinberger's nickname "Cap the Knife" for his budget cutting, said he was also "Cap the Compassionate" in the Nixon administration, championing Head Start and health insurance. "Above all, he loved what [America] stood for and he loved what we represented to the rest of the world," Powell said. It had the sound of an implicit rebuke of Rumsfeld and Vice President Cheney, who was seated in the front row.

Rumsfeld preferred to remember the unyielding Weinberger. "For many years, a quote from Winston Churchill hung in Cap Weinberger's office," he said. "It said: Never give in -- never, never, never, never, in nothing great or small, large or petty, never give in." Rumsfeld left out the rest of Churchill's famous phrase: "except to convictions of honor and good sense."

The other eulogist, Sen. Olympia Snowe (R), representing Weinberger's adopted home state of Maine, also invoked the Cold War. In Maine, she said of California-native Weinberger, "you never get top billing unless you were actually born there, and even if you were pivotal in the downfall of the Soviet Union and the end of the Cold War."

With Rumsfeld participating, the Pentagon took over many of the arrangements for the funeral or, in military parlance, "Internment Service for FSECDEF Caspar Weinberger." Family members did not speak at the ceremony. And the military's tight control over attendance left the Arlington chapel, which holds 300, about a third empty.

Lady Thatcher, who did not speak because of illness, heard Powell describe her as Weinberger's Churchill. Powell, who was a military aide to Weinberger, recalled his boss's persnickety side ("He hated split infinitives . . . he even insisted we send back thank-you letters for thank-you letters"), his calm ("He loved to take naps, usually in the middle of meetings") and even his tolerance of a driver who picked him up drunk on Thanksgiving and wished him a "Happy Easter." The two words that sullied Weinberger's career -- "Iran-contra" -- got only an oblique mention by Powell, who spoke of "the one moment of his despair."

The military declined to share its guest list with reporters, but the list of pallbearers included some of the top officials from Reagan's presidency: Joint Chiefs chairman John Vessey, national security adviser William Clark, energy secretary John Herrington, deputy defense secretary Will Taft. Spotted in the crowd were Reagan's Navy secretary, John Lehman, publisher Steve Forbes and Reagan Pentagon officials Richard Perle and Fred Ikle.

There were relatively few with more recent government service: Powell deputy Richard Armitage, Joint Chiefs Chairman Peter Pace and three senators. This was, after all, not a time to think about today's problems -- none of the three eulogists even mentioned the word "terror" -- but to celebrate yesterday's victory.

"Today, some think back on the Cold War as if victory in that war was inevitable; that was not the case," Rumsfeld said. It was Weinberger, he said, who "helped restore pride in our country's uniform and helped win the Cold War."

Theme Park-Like Camp Built Near Haymarket (WP)

By Nikita Stewart

The Boy Scouts of America is planning to open a $17 million camp catering to Cub Scouts next month on the site near Haymarket where the Walt Disney Co. tried to build a theme park 12 years ago.

The camp will be built and operated by the National Capital Council, which represents more than 85,000 Scouts and 23,000 volunteers in the District and 16 counties in Maryland and Virginia. It is one of the most expensive scouting construction projects in the nation, officials said, and unusual because of its focus on Cub Scouts as well as Boy Scouts.

"We've never had a facility that's been able to connect with the Cub Scouts," said Alan F. Lambert, the council's Scout executive.

Officials said the Scouts wanted a camp closer to Washington so that Cub Scouts, the organization's youngest members, could enjoy an overnight camping experience. The council's closest camp is in Goshen, Va., which is an inconvenient three-hour ride from Washington for 7- to 10-year-olds, who require more supervision and tend to get more homesick than older Scouts, Lambert said.

The scheduled opening of Camp William B. Snyder is May 6. Snyder, a former Geico chairman, is a longtime member of the area Scout council board and was instrumental in securing the land for the project.

The camp sprawls over 350 acres once designated for "Disney's America," a U.S. history theme park Disney scrapped in 1994 after protests from residents and preservationists about its proximity to the Manassas National Battlefield Park. Disney sold the site to the Boy Scouts for $1.5 million in 1997.

Camp Snyder will have touches of a theme park, from a 67-foot climbing wall to an aquatics center with water slides. Scout officials said, however, that they tried to preserve much of the site's natural state. The council created more than 100 acres of wetlands that are attracting birds and wildlife that the Scouts will explore.

"It's a positive part of the program to protect wildlife and eco-systems," Lambert said. "It's part of the camping experience."

The camp has themed areas such as the Big Dig, where Scouts can dig up replicas of dinosaur bones and assemble their own skeletons, and the Space Port, where they can explore a simulation of Mars, said Maj. Gen. Raymond Johns, chairman of program development at the camp.

"What a neat experience," he said.

From Memorial Day through Labor Day, the camp will serve about 1,000 Cub Scouts a week, said Johns. Boy Scouts can camp there on weekends throughout the year.

Johns and Lambert showed photos and drawings of the camp to the Prince William Board of County Supervisors yesterday. Other themed areas include a Native American village with tepees, a fort with a BB gun range and a ship surrounded by blue vulcanized rubber to suggest the ocean.

The adventures will not be the traditional rustic experience the public associates with scouting and camping, Lambert said. He showed a photo of the 600-seat dining hall, still under construction, that looked more like a McMansion. The modern facilities, including upgraded bathrooms and showers, were responses to parents, especially mothers, concerned about how younger children and adult volunteers would fare in the wild, Lambert said.

The Scouts will still sleep in tents, although they are much roomier, fitting six to eight Cub Scouts or four volunteers in each one, he said.

The camp's attractions and its $17 million price tag -- raised through private and corporate donations and general financing -- make it one of the biggest in the country compared with facilities used by the more than 300 councils, said Gregg Shields, national spokesman for the Boy Scouts of America in Irving, Tex. "I have not found another of a larger size in terms of investment," he said.

When Disney dropped its plans for a theme park, Snyder and Ron L. Carroll, who was Scout executive at the time, led the negotiations to buy the land, Lambert said. Carroll died last year.

Snyder, 76, who now lives in St. Petersburg, Fla., said he missed out on the Scout experience as a child because his local troop disbanded after its leader was drafted to serve in World War II. "My son was in the Scouts when he was growing up and I was a civilian leader," he said. "I think highly of the Scouts as a character-building organization."

Couric To Announce Her Move On 'Today' (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

Katie Couric plans to confirm this morning on "Today" that she is leaving the top-rated morning show after 15 years, and CBS will quickly announce, probably today, that she will take over the anchor chair once occupied by Walter Cronkite and Dan Rather.

Couric, 49, decided yesterday to use the occasion of her 15th anniversary, when the NBC program will be reflecting on her tenure, to look forward to the next chapter in her career, said sources at both networks and people familiar with her thinking.

The sources, who first confirmed Couric's plans Monday, had expected the CBS negotiations to drag on a bit longer, but said now the network has wrapped up the negotiations and wants to go public as soon as Couric does.

Bob Schieffer, the current CBS anchor, who had made clear that he did not want to keep the job indefinitely, said yesterday: "I hope it is true. I've known Katie for many years; she's a first-rate reporter and a terrific interviewer. I love Katie and I think she'll love CBS News."

The move by Couric, who will remain at "Today" until her NBC contract expires in May, will have repercussions throughout the broadcast schedule. NBC, which is determined to maintain its morning ratings lead, has offered her job to Meredith Vieira of ABC's "The View" and the syndicated "Who Wants to Be a Millionaire," who is still weighing the opportunity against family concerns. CBS is making a multimillion-dollar bet that Couric, who would be the first solo female anchor of a weekday network newscast, can boost the third-place "CBS Evening News."

Couric, who attracted enormous publicity while weighing her options, is said by those who know her to be brimming with ideas about how to adapt the evening newscast to her skills and personality.

The "Today" retrospective at 7:30 this morning will feature video clips of Couric over the years, followed by her comments about her departure, and will have a less celebratory tone than otherwise would have been the case. Couric is close to NBC chief executive Jeff Zucker, her original producer on "Today," the sources said, and has been trying to manage her departure without hurting relationships with him and other longtime colleagues at NBC.

Yes, It's Anti-Semitic (WP)

By Eliot A. Cohen

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

Academic papers posted on a Harvard Web site don't normally attract enthusiastic praise from prominent white supremacists. But John Mearsheimer and Stephen Walt's "The Israel Lobby and U.S. Foreign Policy" has won David Duke's endorsement as "a modern Declaration of American Independence" and a vindication of the ex-Klansman's earlier work, presumably including his pathbreaking book, "Jewish Supremacism."

Walt and Mearsheimer contend that American national security dictates distancing ourselves from the state of Israel; that U.S. support for Israel has led to such disasters as America's status as the No. 1 target for Islamic terrorists; and that such an otherwise inexplicable departure from good sense can be accounted for only by the power of "The Lobby" (their capitalization), an overwhelmingly Jewish force abetted by some Christian evangelicals and a gentile neocon collaborator or two, who have hijacked American foreign policy and controlled it for decades.

One of Mearsheimer's University of Chicago colleagues has characterized this as "piss-poor, monocausal social science." It is indeed a wretched piece of scholarship. Israeli citizenship rests "on the principle of blood kinship," it says, and yet the country has a million non-Jewish citizens who vote. Osama bin Laden's grievance with the United States begins with Israel, it says -- but in fact his 1998 fatwa declaring war against this country began by denouncing the U.S. presence in Saudi Arabia and the suffering of the people of Iraq. "Other ethnic lobbies can only dream of having the political muscle" The Lobby has -- news to anyone advocating lifting the embargo on Fidel Castro's Cuba. The Iraq war stemmed from The Lobby's conception of Israel's interest -- yet, oddly, the war attracted the support of anti-Israel intellectuals such as Christopher Hitchens and mainstream publications such as The Economist. America's anti-Iran policy reflects the dictates of The Lobby -- but how to explain Europe's equally strong opposition to Iranian nuclear ambitions?

Oddly, these international relations realists -- who in their more normal academic lives declare that state interests determine policy, and domestic politics matters little -- have discovered the one case in which domestic politics has, for decades, determined the policy of the world's greatest state. Their theories proclaim the importance of power, not ideals, yet they abhor the thought of allying with the strongest military and most vibrant economy in the Middle East. Reporting persecution, they have declared that they could not publish their work in the United States, but they have neglected to name the academic journals that turned them down.

Inept, even kooky academic work, then, but is it anti-Semitic? If by anti-Semitism one means obsessive and irrationally hostile beliefs about Jews; if one accuses them of disloyalty, subversion or treachery, of having occult powers and of participating in secret combinations that manipulate institutions and governments; if one systematically selects everything unfair, ugly or wrong about Jews as individuals or a group and equally systematically suppresses any exculpatory information -- why, yes, this paper is anti-Semitic.

Mearsheimer and Walt conceive of The Lobby as a conspiracy between the Washington Times and the New York Times, the Democratic-leaning Brookings Institution and Republican-leaning American Enterprise Institute, architects of the Oslo accords and their most vigorous opponents. In this world Douglas Feith manipulates Don Rumsfeld, and Dick Cheney takes orders from Richard Perle. They dwell on public figures with Jewish names and take repeated shots at conservative Christians (acceptable subjects for prejudice in intellectual circles), but they never ask why a Sen. John McCain today or, in earlier years, a rough-hewn labor leader such as George Meany declared themselves friends of Israel.

The authors dismiss or ignore past Arab threats to exterminate Israel, as well as the sewer of anti-Semitic literature that pollutes public discourse in the Arab world today. The most recent calls by Iran's fanatical -- and nuclear weapons-hungry -- president for Israel to be "wiped off the map" they brush aside as insignificant. There is nothing here about the millions of dollars that Saudi Arabia has poured into lobbying and academic institutions, or the wealth of Islamic studies programs on American campuses, though they note with suspicion some 130 Jewish studies programs on those campuses. West Bank settlements get attention; terrorist butchery of civilians on buses or in shopping malls does not. To dispute their view of Israel is not to differ about policy but to act as a foreign agent.

If this sounds personal, it is, although I am only a footnote target for Mearsheimer and Walt. I am a public intellectual and a proud Jew; sympathetic to Israel and extensively engaged in our nation's military affairs; vaguely conservative and occasionally hawkish. In a week my family will celebrate Passover with my oldest son -- the third generation to serve as an officer in the United States Army. He will be home on leave from the bomb-strewn streets of Baghdad. The patch on his shoulder is the same flag that flies on my porch.

Other supposed members of "The Lobby" also have children in military service. Impugning their patriotism or mine is not scholarship or policy advocacy. It is merely, and unforgivably, bigotry.

Iran: Ready To Negotiate On Enrichment (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini

AP, April 4, 2006

Iran said Tuesday it is willing to negotiate with world powers on large-scale enrichment of uranium but will never give way on their key demand — to cease all enrichment, a process that can produce fuel for nuclear reactors or material for bombs.

The U.N. Security Council has demanded that Iran suspend all uranium enrichment activities and asked the U.N. nuclear watchdog agency to report back by April 28 on whether Iran had complied.

Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki reiterated that Iran would not comply with the Security Council demand, saying the small-scale enrichment it resumed in February was strictly for research and was within its rights.

The United States and France have accused Iran of pursuing a secret program to build atomic weapons, but Tehran claims its nuclear program is peaceful and aimed only at generating electricity. Enrichment makes uranium suitable for reactor use but, taken to a high degree, it becomes suitable for a nuclear bomb.

"The enrichment of uranium ... is Iran's right as defined as a signatory to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty," Mottaki said. "One thing we can't give up and that is the right of the Iranian nation ... We can't hold a dialogue with any country about giving up our rights."

He added, however, that Iran was prepared to talk to the international community about large-scale enrichment.

Mottaki did not specify with whom Iran wants to hold negotiations. The United States is facing calls from its European allies for it to enter direct talks with Iran to resolve the standoff.

"I think it is recognized here in Washington that the British and the German foreign ministers are positive on this question," he told reporters Tuesday.

State Department spokesman Adam Ereli said Monday the cause of the standoff was "not because the United States isn't in negotiations" but because Iran was defying international pressure and "moving with apparently great determination to develop an enrichment capability."

"So don't suggest that the way to solve this is for the U.S. to jump into negotiations. The way to resolve it is to get Iran to cease and desist from its active refusal to be a responsible member of the international community," Ereli said.

Iran and the United States have agreed to hold rare direct, high-level talks to discuss how to stabilize Iraq. While both sides have insisted the talks won't touch on the nuclear issue, U.S. officials say they suspect Tehran is looking to open the door for nuclear talks.

Since the U.N. Security Council issued its demand last week, Iran has taken a stance of rejection — while playing up hopes for a negotiated solution.

Mottaki said Iran's nuclear program had two options: cooperation or confrontation. "Iran prefers the first option," he said.

On Monday, hard-line Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said the United States and Europe were "confused" if they thought they could stop Iran's nuclear ambitions. But he vowed Iran's nuclear program would be "transparent" and under the supervision of the International Atomic Energy Agency.

Past negotiations have faltered over the enrichment issue. Britain, France and Germany negotiated with Iran for two years on behalf of the European Union, endeavoring to persuade Tehran to abandon enrichment. Iran gave up on the negotiations last August and resumed parts of its nuclear program that it had suspended as a goodwill gesture.

Moscow then tried to persuade Tehran to accept a U.S.-backed compromise proposal under which large-scale uranium enrichment for Iran's nuclear program would take place in Russia. But negotiations ended in a stalemate after Tehran rejected a Russian demand to suspend uranium enrichment activities at home.

Democrat: Intelligence On Iran Inadequate (AP)

By Katherine Shrader

AP, April 4, 2006

U.S. intelligence information on Iran is inadequate and may contain misinformation that spy agencies are accepting as solid, the top Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee said Tuesday.

Rep. Jane Harman (news, bio, voting record), D-Calif., told a Council on Foreign Relations gathering that she and other lawmakers recently received a briefing from intelligence agencies based on information shared with the International Atomic Energy Agency and the U.N. Security Council.

Her bottom line: "I remain skeptical — lots of unanswered questions."

"The conjecture that I have is that if I were Iran, and I wanted to put out disinformation, it might look a lot like what our government is claiming is information," she said. "I can't tell you that's true, but I can't tell you it's not true."

Harman didn't provide details on the classified session.

With tensions growing between the U.S. and Iran over its nuclear program, Tehran in the past week has touted new weapons including missiles supposedly invisible to radar and torpedoes too fast to be avoided. Experts have questioned Iran's claims about the weapons' capabilities.

The announcements came as the Bush administration was working toward a diplomatic solution to address its belief that Iran intends to produce nuclear weapons. Iran says it aims only to generate electricity, but it has thus far defied U.N. Security Council demands that it give up key parts of its program.

Last week, the Security Council unanimously approved a statement demanding that Iran suspend uranium enrichment.

When asked about Iran's recent weapons announcements Tuesday, White House spokesman Scott McClellan said Iran's "aggressive military program and defiant rhetoric are further examples of how the regime is isolating itself." But he stressed the administration hopes to work toward a diplomatic solution.

McClellan said the United States has a number of concerns about Iran's behavior, including its efforts to conceal its nuclear activities, support of terrorism, use of threatening rhetoric and disregard for the demands of the international community.

Harman said she does not doubt that Iran is a threat. "The issue is how capable are they and what are the real intentions of Iran's leaders, and I think the jury is out on both of those," Harman said.

In recent months, she and others on Capitol Hill have been seeking information about how to deal with Iran. Bruises in Congress and elsewhere in the government remain fresh on the botched prewar intelligence on Iraq's never-to-be-found weapons of mass destruction.

"I want to be absolutely sure that we base decisions — especially tough decisions like what are the next steps with Iran, and I surely hope they are diplomatic because I think those are our best options — on pristine and pure intelligence or the closest we can get to that," Harman said.

She was echoing the words of former U.S. weapons inspector David Kay, who was in charge of the hunt for Iraq's arsenal until he quit his position in January 2004. Then, he said that "pristine intelligence, good accurate intelligence" was fundamental to a pre-emptive military policy, which the Bush administration adopted after Sept. 11, 2001.

Harman spoke alongside former acting CIA Director John McLaughlin, a veteran intelligence analyst who was the agency's No. 2 official in the run-up to the Iraq war. He politely quibbled with the use of the phrase "pristine intelligence."

"It's important, I think, to realize that intelligence isn't going to be pristine and pure," McLaughlin said.

He said intelligence is often incomplete and at some point policy decisions must be made. "We are getting a little caught in the idea that intelligence has the answer to everything," he said.

Iran Says It Can Handle Any Invasion (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini

AP, April 4, 2006

A top Iranian military official said Tuesday the country can now defend itself against any invasion originating from outside the region — a clear reference to the United States — as it tested a second new radar-avoiding missile.

The new surface-to-sea missile is equipped with remote-control and searching systems, state-run television reported. It said the new missile, called Kowsar after the name of a river in paradise, was a medium-range weapon that Iran had the capability to mass-produce.

It also asserted that the Kowsar's guidance system could not be scrambled, and it had been designed to sink ships.

Shortly after the test, the chief of the elite Revolutionary Guards, Gen. Yahya Rahim Safavi, warned that Iran was now able to "confront any extra-regional invasion," referring to the United States without mentioning it by name.

"The missile command of the Guards' naval force ... via positioning various types of surface-to-sea missiles, is able, while defending the coastlines and islands, to confront any extra-territorial invasion," the official Islamic Republic News Agency quoted Safavi as saying.

Safavi also called for foreign forces to leave the region. The U.S. 5th Fleet is based in Bahrain, from where it patrols the Gulf.

"Iran wants durable peace in the Persian Gulf and it can't be achieved without foreign forces and those which invaded Iraq leaving (the region)," IRNA quoted Safavi as saying.

On Friday, the country tested the Fajr-3, a missile that it said can avoid radars and hit several targets simultaneously using multiple warheads. Iran also has tested what it calls two new torpedoes.

The second torpedo, unveiled Monday, was tested in the Straits of Hormuz, the narrow entrance to the Gulf that is a vital corridor for oil supplies. That seemed to be a clear warning to the United States that Iran believes it has the capability to disable oil tankers moving through the Gulf.

The Revolutionary Guards, the elite branch of Iran's military, have been holding their maneuvers — code-named the "Great Prophet" — since Friday, touting what they call domestically built technological advances in their armed forces.

But some military analysts in Moscow said it appears the high-speed torpedoes likely were Russian-built weapons that may have been acquired from China or the former Soviet republic of Kyrgyzstan.

Others have questioned just how radar-evading the missiles are. Iran's radars are not as advanced as those of Israel, for example — meaning that perhaps the new weapons can avoid Iran's radar but not more advanced types.

The United States said Monday — after the second torpedo test — that while Iran may have made "some strides" in its military, it likely is exaggerating its capabilities.

"We know that the Iranians are always trying to improve their weapons system by both foreign and indigenous measures," Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said in Washington. "It's possible that they are increasing their capability and making strides in radar-absorbing materials and technology."

But "the Iranians have also been known to boast and exaggerate their statements about greater technical and tactical capabilities," he said.

It has not been possible to verify Iran's claims for the new armaments. But the country has made clear it aims to send a message of strength to the United States amid heightened tensions over its nuclear program.

The U.N. Security Council has demanded Iran give up uranium enrichment, a crucial part of the nuclear process. Washington is pressing for sanctions if Tehran continues its refusal to do so, though U.S. officials have not ruled out military action as an eventual option, insisting they will not allow Iran to gain a nuclear arsenal.

In Russia, a Kremlin-allied lawmaker on Tuesday criticized the recent torpedo and missile tests as a counterproductive show of might at a time when it should be trying to allay fears that it is trying to build a nuclear weapon.

"It is clear that Iran is demonstrating its muscle in order to forestall any discussions of a possible operation using force against Iran," Konstantin Kosachev, the head of the parliamentary foreign affairs committee, was quoted as saying according to the RIA Novosti news agency.

On Tuesday, state-run television also said the elite Revolutionary Guards had tested what it called a "super-modern flying boat" capable of evading radar. TV showed a brief clip of the boat's launch.

"Due to its advanced design, no radar at sea or in the air can detect it. It can lift out of the water," the television said. It said the boat was "all Iranian-made and can launch missiles with precise targeting while moving."

The television showed the boat, looking like an aircraft, taking off from the sea and flying low over the surface of the water. It said the craft can fly with a speed of 100 nautical miles per hour.

Iran said the torpedo tests were conducted Sunday and Monday. The torpedo — called a "Hoot," or "whale" — is able to move at 223 mph, too fast for any enemy ship to elude.

Iran has routinely held war games over the past two decades to improve its combat readiness and test locally made equipment such as missiles, tanks and armored personnel carriers.

Iran launched an arms development program during its 1980-88 war with Iraq to compensate for a U.S. weapons embargo. Since 1992, Iran has produced its own tanks, armored personnel carriers, missiles and a fighter plane.

Some Say Iran's Weapons Come From Russia (AP)

By Lee Keath

AP, April 4, 2006

Iran has unveiled with great fanfare a series of what it portrays as sophisticated, homegrown weapons — flying boats and missiles invisible to radar, torpedoes too fast to elude.

But experts said Tuesday it appears much of the technology came from Russia and questioned Iran's claims about the weapons' capabilities.

Still, the armaments, tested during war games by some 17,000 Revolutionary Guards in the Persian Gulf, send what may be Iran's real message: its increased ability to hit oil tankers if tension with America turns to outright confrontation.

To underline that message, the maneuvers — code-named "The Great Prophet" — have been held since Friday around the Strait of Hormuz, the 34-mile-wide entrance to the Gulf through which about two-fifths of the world's oil supplies pass.

Throughout the war games, Iran has touted what it calls technological leaps in its weapons production. In recent years, Iran rewed up its arms programs after long relying on purchases abroad to keep up its aging arsenal, hampered by U.S. sanctions and Washington's pressure on other countries against selling weapons to Tehran.

The head of the Revolutionary Guards, Gen. Yahya Rahim Safavi, proclaimed Tuesday that Iran was now able to defend itself against "any extra-regional invasion."

It was a clear reference to Iranian worries of potential U.S. military action to stop its nuclear program, which Washington claims is intended to produce nuclear weapons. Iran says it aims only to generate electricity, but has so far defied U.N. Security Council demands that it give up key parts of its program.

The new weapons, many of them shown on Iranian state TV during their tests, have come with impressive claims:

• A missile, the Fajr-3, that is invisible to radar and able to strike several targets with multiple warheads.

• A high-speed torpedo, the Hoot, able to move at some 223 mph, up to four times faster than a normal torpedo, and fired by ships cloaked to radar.

• A surface-to-sea missile, the Kowsar, with remote-control and searching systems that cannot be scrambled.

• A "super-modern flying boat," undetectable by radar and able to launch missiles with precise targeting while skimming low over the surface of the water at a top speed of 100 nautical mph.

There are questions over Iran's claims. In Washington, Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said "the Iranians have been known to boast and exaggerate" their weapons capabilities.

And some experts cast doubt on just how radar-evading Iran's ships and missiles are.

Iran's radars are not as advanced as those of Israel, for example — meaning that perhaps the weapons can avoid the radar that Iran has access to, but not more advanced types, said Meir Javedanfar, an Iranian-born, Israel-based analyst.

"The question here is, what radar did they test their own weapons against? If it's the radar they've been using for all these years, then that's not saying 100 percent that these things are undetectable," he said.

Others questioned if Iran developed the weapons on its own.

The Hoot torpedo — the name means "whale" — closely resembles the Russian-made VA-111 Shkval, the world's fastest known underwater missile, developed in 1995, said Ruslan Pukhov of Moscow's Center for Analysis of Strategies and Technologies.

The Shkval attains high speeds by coating itself in a cocoon of air bubbles, reducing friction, and Pukhov said its technology was too sophisticated for the Iranians to produce themselves.

"Hypothetically, they could get access to the Shkval technology, but if so, I don't think they got it through Russian channels," he said.

Pukhov noted the former Soviet republic of Kyrgyzstan once had a Soviet torpedo testing center on the remote mountain lake of Issyk-Kul. And he said that in the turmoil that followed the Soviet breakup, Kyrgyz authorities sold Shkvals to the Chinese, a major importer of Iranian oil.

Kanybek Tabaldiyev, a senior official with a Kyrgyz company that makes torpedo and other military hardware at Issyk-Kul, denied his company transferred sophisticated technology to Iran. He said it was possible weaponry had been acquired through other means.

Chinese officials had no immediate comment on whether their country provided Iran with Shkvals.

China has been pursuing closer relations with Tehran in hopes of help in meeting its energy needs, and the United States has sanctioned Chinese companies in the past, accusing them of violating international controls on transfers of weapons technology to Iran. Beijing has protested the U.S. sanctions and in 2003, it issued its first regulations controlling exports of missile, nuclear and biological weapons technology.

Whatever the Iranian armaments' capabilities — or origins — they likely won't greatly affect the military balance of power in the Gulf, where the U.S. Navy's 5th Fleet is based, operating out of the island nation of Bahrain.

For example, the Hoot torpedo — if indeed based on the Shkval — has too short a range, about 7,500 yards, to be militarily significant, said Pavel Felgenhauer, a Russian analyst.

But Iran may be aiming to show the world, and its people, that it has options if the standoff over its nuclear program escalates. That could boost its hand in negotiations with the United States and Europe.

"They know they are inferior to the U.S. Navy in the Persian Gulf, so this is their way of telling Americans .... we are not the only ones who would lose out if talks regarding the nuclear program fail," Javedanfar said.

The torpedo tests in particular are significant, he said.

"They know that if you sink one tanker in the Strait of Hormuz you can stop all shipping there, because the waters are quite shallow," he said.

Israelis Target Base In Abbas' Compound (AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak

AP, April 4, 2006

Israeli warplanes fired three missiles into the Gaza compound of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas on Tuesday in response to Palestinian rocket fire — the first such Israeli attack since the violent Islamic group Hamas took power last week.

Abbas condemned the attack, saying it had nothing to do with Hamas and was aimed at disrupting the daily lives of Palestinians.

The site was largely abandoned, and the army gave no explanation for hitting the security compound of the moderate leader, who was in the West Bank at the time. The missile strikes dug deep craters and wounded two police officers.

Since Hamas took control of the Cabinet, Israeli officials said they would shun the Palestinian Authority but would continue to work with Abbas, leader of the defeated Fatah Party. The attack Tuesday did not appear aimed at the Palestinian president, either directly or indirectly.

Israeli security officials have said Israel needs to send clear messages to Hamas that it must halt attacks, and Israel pledged to intensify its military strikes after Gaza militants fired a Katyusha rocket at Israel last week.

Abbas denounced the airstrike and called for international intervention to stop what he called Israel's "destruction for the sake of destruction." He said he contacted "the U.N., Russia, the EU and Arab states and told them that these actions complicate daily life and affect our human and social status."

Asked about the possibility Israel targeted a Palestinian security force that is under the authority of Hamas, Abbas replied that who is in charge of the various forces is none of Israel's business. "It is internal business," he said, adding Israel "doesn't have the right to interfere."

Abbas controls some of the armed units, and the rest are in the purview of the new interior minister, Said Siyam of Hamas.

Israel and Hamas are sworn enemies. Israel, along with the U.S. and European Union, labels Hamas a terror group for sending dozens of suicide bombers into Israel. Hamas does not accept the presence of a Jewish state in the Middle East.

While Hamas does not appear to be directly responsible for the rocket attacks on Israel, its leaders have said militants who attack Israel will not be arrested. And Hamas called last week's deadly suicide bombing at a West Bank settlement legitimate resistance to Israeli occupation.

Israeli tanks also shelled the northern Gaza Strip on Tuesday, killing one Palestinian and wounding seven, including a woman and her 6-month-old baby, Palestinian security and rescue officials said.

The Israeli army said it fired shells at empty fields in northern Gaza to deter militants from launching homemade rockets into Israel. Earlier Tuesday, militants set off several rockets, causing no injuries. Such barrages take place almost daily.

The Israeli missile attack in Gaza City came shortly after a Chinese envoy met Palestinian Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar, becoming the first foreign diplomat to do so since the Hamas government was sworn in.

Zahar, a Hamas leader, said he plans to visit China next month and was told a Palestinian delegation would be welcomed. It would be his first trip abroad since taking office.

"The Chinese told us that they are ready to receive a Palestinian delegation at any time," Zahar said. The Chinese diplomat, Yang Wei Guo, did not comment on Zahar's planned visit. Israel has been working to isolate the Hamas-led government, discouraging nations from hosting its officials.

Israel's largest bank said Tuesday it was severing ties with Palestinian banks. Bank Hapoalim said it made the decision after a legal review and "especially in light of the circumstances created" by the Hamas takeover.

Also Tuesday, Israel's new governing coalition started taking shape when the moderate Labor Party said it would join Kadima, led by acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert. A Kadima-Labor coalition would be committed to Olmert's plan to set Israel's borders by 2010, withdrawing from large parts of the West Bank.

Final results from last week's Israeli election gave Kadima 29 seats and Labor 19 in the 120-seat Israeli parliament, requiring them to bring in additional parties to secure a majority. Coalition talks are expected to take weeks.

Olmert was named acting premier Jan. 4, when Prime Minister Ariel Sharon was felled by a stroke. Sharon, who remains in a coma, was to undergo surgery Tuesday to restore part of his skull, removed during surgery to stop bleeding from the stroke. Doctors postponed the operation because Sharon had a respiratory infection, the hospital said.

The surgery is seen as a step toward moving the 78-year-old Sharon to a long-term care facility. He is not expected to recover.

Hamas FM Says Will Visit China (AFP-Y2)

AFP, April 4, 2006

Palestinian foreign minister Mahmud al-Zahar announced plans to visit China as Beijing became the latest power to reach out to Islamists Hamas despite a Western boycott.

"We are going to visit China and we have let the ambassador know," Zahar, a a Hamas hawk and firebrand, told reporters after meeting the Chinese envoy to the Palestinian territories, Yang Weiguo (eds: correct).

"We are going to go to east Asia, probably in late May, to attend an international conference. During the same month we are going to tour countries in east Asia, starting with China," he added providing no further details.

A visit to Beijing would make China the second UN Security Council member after Russia to host the radical Islamist faction since the organisation won a shock Palestinian election victory last January.

Israel immediately criticised any foreign power who may be tempted to invite the Hamas leadership for talks before the movement, blacklisted as a terrorist organisation in the West, reforms its ways.

"Anyone who recognises the Hamas government without this movement bending to the demands of the international community in recognising Israel, renouncing terrorism and accepting agreements, helps to maintain its extremist positions," said foreign ministry spokesman Mark Regev.

"If Hamas can get recognition without changing its positions, there is no chance it will become more moderate," he added.

The armed wing of the radical Islamist movement has carried out scores of suicide bombings in Israel. Its charter calls for the destruction of the Jewish state and cites armed struggle as the key to solving the Middle East conflict.

There was no immediate Chinese confirmation of a formal invitation to Zahar, but Beijing has already signalled its readiness to develop its close ties with the Palestinians.

"We are willing to maintain and develop our friendly relations with Palestine... We will earnestly consider future Palestinian requests for assistance," Chinese Foreign Minister Li Zhaoxing said last month.

The Chinese, who only forged diplomatic relations with Israel in 1992, have traditionally been seen as pro-Palestinian. Palestinian Authority president Mahmud Abbas travelled to Beijing in May 2005.

In the coming days, Zahar is to make his first foreign tour since he was sworn in as minister, with a visit to Arab countries, beginning with Egypt, where he will explain the new government's positions, his office said.

Hamas has also received invitations to South Africa and Malaysia although no dates have been set.

The Islamic group's cold-shouldering by the West however has continued with Canada, the Netherlands and the United States all saying they will have no contact with Hamas until it gives up the right to armed struggle and recognises Israel.

The so-called Middle East quartet, the European Union, Russia, the United Nations and the United States, has also collectively warned of dire consequences for Palestinian funding unless Hamas modifies its hardline stance.

Zahar has sought to minimise the loss of Western aid despite the financial crisis facing the cash-strapped Palestinian Authority, saying that Hamas will instead look for funds elsewhere from Arab and Islamic countries.

A visit by Hamas officials to Moscow last month at the invitation of Russian President Vladimir Putin incited Israeli anger and US reservations.

At the time, Hamas described its visit to Russia as a "breakthrough" that they hoped would help the group establish international legitimacy.

Rice To Lay Out U.S.-India Nuclear Deal Before Some Skeptical Lawmakers (WP)

By Dafna Linzer

When President Bush announced a new phase in U.S.-India relations last month in New Delhi, he was not the only foreign visitor to attract attention. A day after his arrival, two Iranian naval ships, carrying several hundred sailors, docked at the Indian port of Kochi to begin five days of joint exercises, part of an extensive agreement Tehran and New Delhi signed in 2003.

The port call -- and the broader issue of India's military, scientific and economic ties with Iran -- have raised apprehension on Capitol Hill, where members are weighing an effort by the Bush administration to form its own strategic partnership with New Delhi.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will address those concerns and others when she testifies today before the House and Senate foreign relations panels on details of the unfinished agreement, in which the United States would provide India with civilian nuclear technology.

She faces pressure from Republican and Democratic lawmakers, some of whom are pushing for changes to the deal out of concern about nuclear proliferation. In a letter yesterday, a bipartisan group of nuclear experts urged lawmakers not to authorize technology transfers until India stops producing nuclear weapons material, as the United States, Britain, France, Russia, and China are believed to have done.

In response, some administration officials said Rice could announce a new push for an international treaty to end production of all fissile material. Negotiations have been at a standstill since the administration announced two years ago that it could not support the kind of accord that had been on the table.

Last July, Bush agreed to give India access, for the first time, to civilian nuclear assistance, breaking with decades of U.S. policy that kept sensitive nuclear technologies from countries that have not signed the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

For the Bush administration, the break was seen as a worthy tradeoff in pursuit of a strategy to accelerate India's rise as a regional counterweight to China. But the agreement would also give India the ability to increase its nuclear arsenal. The terms took Congress by surprise, and lawmakers asked India to separate its civilian and military programs to guarantee that no U.S. technology would be used for weapons.

Last month, Bush and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh agreed on a separation plan, but Congress has not yet seen it.

Administration officials say the deal addresses nonproliferation concerns because India has agreed to open some facilities to U.N. nuclear inspections. Perhaps more important, they say, is that the world's largest democracy does not pose a nonproliferation threat.

"India has an excellent nonproliferation record," Rice said last month in promoting the deal. India is not tainted by the kind of nuclear black-market scandal that Pakistan suffered when a senior government official was caught selling nuclear components to Iran, Libya and North Korea.

But the Bush administration's actions suggest it does not see India's record as blemish-free.

The administration has imposed sanctions on two Indian companies accused of supplying Iran's nuclear program. Both companies have protested the sanctions but remain on a list in the Federal Registry. In September, two Indian nuclear scientists were also accused of providing Tehran with technology that could contribute to "the development of weapons of mass destruction." The order against one was later rescinded, but the second remains banned from travel to the United States.

India's support for Iran in diplomatic forums has also caused concern. Last September, after the U.S.-India deal was announced, Rep. Tom Lantos (D-Calif.) -- a strong supporter of India -- criticized Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns during a hearing when Burns said it was unclear whether India would support U.S. efforts to pressure Iran. Lantos urged India to do so to win broader support in Congress.

"We listened carefully to Lantos and his colleagues on the Hill and told the Indians that they had to be supportive of our efforts to isolate Iran, and they did so two weeks later," Burns said in an interview.

Lantos said yesterday: "I have every intention of voting for this deal. But my support is very much contingent upon the Iran-India relationship, and I have served notice that, given the nature of the current regime in Tehran, a proper policy vis-a-vis Iran is the sine qua non of my support." Lantos said he did not see how India could have equal ties to Iran and the United States, and said he registered his displeasure over the naval visit last week with India.

State Department spokesman J. Adam Ereli said Washington regretted the timing of the Iranian port call, but added: "Indian-Iranian relations are not of the scope and breadth and depth to call into question the principles that underline our agreement."

It is unclear when Congress will consider the changes to the law needed to complete the India deal. The administration wants Congress to act before summer, but some in Congress say the complex matter will probably not be taken up until after the November elections.

India Nuclear Deal Spurs Lobbying Pro And Con (RC)

By Kate Ackley

Roll Call, April 5, 2006

If Daryl Kimball has it his way, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will have a bumpy ride today during her back-to-back appearances before Senate and House committees.

Rice — the sole witness at a morning Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing and then at the House International Relations Committee in the afternoon — must sell Congress on the Bush administration's agreement to enter into a far-reaching deal with India that will help that country expand its civilian nuclear power program.

Kimball, executive director of the Arms Control Association, opposes the deal and has spent the days leading up to Rice's testimony trying to make sure Members ask her the toughest of questions.

"We want them to ask her what the potential impact of this will be on the 45-nation Nuclear Suppliers Group," he said, referring to an entity created in the mid-1970s after India conducted nuclear tests. Back then, he said, "India used peaceful nuclear assistance to develop its first nuclear bomb test."

Kimball isn't the only lobbyist gearing up for a potentially long and bruising fight over the India deal. With Rice ready to testify this week, lobbyists for India, for organizations that represent Indian Americans and for business groups that support the deal have all stepped up their efforts.

Sanjay Puri, chairman of the U.S. India political action committee, said in recent days that his group has escalated its push in support of the deal. President Bush has come to Congress because he needs its approval to waive certain requirements of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954. Sen. Dick Lugar (R-Ind.) and Rep. Henry Hyde (R-Ill.) have introduced legislation to do just that.

"A lot of work is going on behind the scenes to explain the background on the deal, the fine print and how it is beneficial to America," said Puri, who added that his group and its activists planned to attend an event on Thursday on Capitol Hill to build momentum after Rice's testimony.

"We have about 30,000 members around the country, and obviously we've reached out to all our people who are active in every state and have strongly urged them to reach out to Members of Congress and Senators," he said.

Tita Thompson, a spokeswoman for the Business Roundtable, said on Tuesday that her group was putting the finishing touches on a letter that would be delivered to every Member's office today, urging them to support the administration's deal with India. She said that the letter will explain that the business group believes the deal will promote closer economic, foreign policy and security relations between the United States and India.

The all-Republican lobbying firm Barbour Griffith & Rogers and the law and lobbying firm Venable represent the embassy of India. Barbour Griffith's Robert Blackwill, the former U.S. ambassador to India, is the lead lobbyist on the account; neither he nor his colleagues could be reached for comment. Barbour Griffith's contract, according to public records, amounts to $700,000 a year, while Venable makes at least $50,000 a month.

Rice will have her own legislative affairs specialist in tow, too. Jeffrey Bergner, a longtime private-sector lobbyist who owned his own firm before joining the administration, now serves as the State Department's assistant secretary for legislative affairs. Bergner did not return a call seeking comment, but his office confirmed that he was slated to accompany Rice today.

Venable's James Jatras said the embassy's case for the agreement is strong and straightforward, holding "strategic benefit for the U.S. and for global non-proliferation."

Currently, Jatras said, about 19 percent of India's nuclear capacity is under inspection. After the agreement, more than two-thirds would be under inspection, he said. "It's ironic that much of the criticism comes from non-proliferation [activists], when it actually greatly strengthens" outside scrutiny of India's nuclear assets, he said.

Jatras, a former foreign policy analyst for the Republican Study Committee, said that even though his client is the Indian government, he is touting the benefits of the agreement for the United States as well.

India, he said, has a growing economy that American businesses could tap into further if relations between the two countries were to warm even more. He also said that in order for the Indian economy to continue to grow, the country needs more energy. Jatras called India "poorly endowed" when it comes to natural resources such as oil.

But Kimball said that his arms control group's message is that contrary to what the deal's supporters say, "this is not a 'win' but a loss from a non-proliferation perspective. The adverse implications have been overlooked."

"We've also been arguing and pointing out that the U.S.-Indian relationship is already a good one, and this flawed nuclear proposal should not be the basis of future relations," Kimball added.

Kimball said his group is part of a loose network of organizations that includes the Friends Committee on National Legislation, the Union of Concerned Scientists and Peace Action. Today's hearings, he said, "are in many ways the second or third round in a long, drawn-out debate."

Rep. Ed Markey (D-Mass.) has introduced a Congressional resolution that expresses concerns about the deal. Markey could not be reached for comment.

Reps. Joe Wilson (R-S.C.) and Joe Crowley (D-N.Y.), the former co-chairmen of the House India Caucus, have taken a leading role in pushing the measure.

Wilson said Rice's appearances today will offer a big boost to the deal. The benefit to America, he said, is that nuclear power for India would reduce the competition for fossil fuel resources such as oil.

Crowley, who visited India the week before Bush traveled there, has been asked by the president to help move the effort forward. He echoed Wilson's fossil fuel argument and added that the agreement could help counteract the greenhouse effect, which most scientists believe leads to global warming.

As for the deal's prospects in Congress, Crowley said, "My sense is that it will go through."

Jatras of Venable said he hopes a bill on this can be reported out by May, if not April.

But Andy Fisher, a spokesman for Lugar, said there was no timeline and added that the Senate committee is prepared to work on this "over the coming weeks and months."

"We are going to have the hearing with Secretary Rice, and an additional hearing or hearings, if necessary, to get views on all sides of the proposal," Fisher said. "Certainly the committee members will want to walk around this a good bit to get a full understanding of all the ramifications for the United States."

Indian Nuke Deal's Fate Could Be Linked To Iran Sanctions Bill (HILL)

By David Mikhail

The Hill, April 5, 2006

A potential standoff involving dueling Iran sanctions bills could determine the fate of a civilian nuclear-cooperation deal with India — a deal that is a high priority for President Bush.

The White House is in the politically awkward position of asking Congress to ratify the high-profile nuclear deal with India while fending off Iran-related legislation that could threaten the U.S.-India pact.

Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-Fla.) and Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) have introduced bills that seek to cut off funds from Iran that could be applied toward attaining or creating nuclear weapons, enhancing provisions of the Iran and Libya Sanctions Act (ILSA). Each bill possesses provisions that call for the president to sanction oil companies for investing in Iranian petroleum development.

However, the House version, which has 355 co-sponsors, including most members of the Republican and Democratic leadership, provides less flexibility to the president to determine whether to apply such sanctions. The bill would mandate that the president make sanctions determinations for any entity under a pending ILSA investigation within 90 days of the bill's enactment. That could strain relations with countries whose oil companies are under such investigations.

Recent actions in the House have substantially increased the likelihood of overlapping discussions of the Iran sanctions bill and the nuclear deal. The legislation was voted out of the International Relations Middle East subcommittee in April 2005 but was not scheduled for a full-committee markup vote until a day before Hyde and Rep. Tom Lantos (D-Calif.), ranking member committee of the full committee, introduced the enabling legislation for the nuclear deal with India this March.

Sam Stratman, a spokesman for International Relations Committee Chairman Henry Hyde (R-Ill.), said, "It would be very premature to draw any linkages to the fate of these very different pieces of legislation." The committee will begin hearings on the nuclear agreement this week. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is scheduled to testify today.

The committee cleared the Ros-Lehtinen bill 37-3.

Yesterday, the Congressional Caucus on India and Indian Americans, co-chaired by Ros-Lehtinen, hosted India's oil minister, Shri Murli Deora, to discuss a proposed natural-gas pipeline project with Iran and how the nuclear-cooperation deal will affect India's future demands on oil.

With the nuclear-deal legislation referred to the International Relations Committee, the panel will now play an essential role in whether the bill comes to the House floor for a final vote, whether there will be amendments, which the administration has said would jeopardize the deal, and whether it is ultimately approved.

Ros-Lehtinen has said that the India deal will be a tough sell for committee members because India has not signed the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. She described her sanctions bill as a "free-standing bill" that should not damage U.S.-India relations but said there would be no exceptions from sanctions for those who have been allied with the United States in the past.

The administration is sharply opposed to the Ros-Lehtinen measure. R. Nicholas Burns, undersecretary of state for political affairs, testified last month that the House bill would "strain relations with our close allies whose help we need to change Iran's behavior" and endorsed a reauthorization of the original ILSA statute.

A subsequent State Department letter, dated two days before the markup vote, said that the administration was "unable to support H.R. 282 as drafted" and that it "would force the president's hand in dealing with sanctions and waiver decisions" that would hurt national security interests.

An International Relations Committee staffer said that the administration attempted to slow down movement of the bill in order to institute changes that would secure diplomatic flexibility but was ultimately unsuccessful.

The administration has thrown its support behind the Santorum bill, according to Robert Traynham, a spokesman for Santorum.

"State likes the Santorum bill much more than the Ros-Lehtinen bill that the House is considering," Traynham said.

Members of Santorum's staff met with Iran experts from the State Department two days after the markup vote of the House bill to discuss the Senate version, while Rice and Santorum conferred about the bill March 8. Traynham added that Santorum is looking to attach his bill to legislative vehicles, including the ILSA reauthorization statute that Burns endorsed.

The Senate bill has 51 co-sponsors, including 18 Democrats, and though introduced last year has remained in the Foreign Relations Committee and has yet to be referred to a subcommittee. Andy Fisher, press secretary for Sen. Richard Lugar (R-Ind.), the committee chairman, said there has been no determination as to whether the Senate will move the Santorum bill for a vote or rely on the Ros-Lehtinen legislation.

As part of a strategic relationship involving issues of counterterrorism, nonproliferation and balancing China's influence in the region, Bush and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh came to an agreement in March whereby the United States would provide technological assistance and nuclear fuel for India's civilian nuclear-energy program while India would subject 14 of its 22 nuclear reactors to inspection by the International Atomic Energy Agency. The enabling legislation would allow for provisions of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 to be waived for India if certain conditions have been met.

The House legislation could trigger tension between the two nations because of India's previous investments in Iranian petroleum. The nonpartisan Congressional Research Service (CRS) reported that multiple agreements have already been reached between Iran and Indian oil companies in 2004 and 2005. The deals included Iran supplying liquefied natural gas to Indian oil companies over 25- to 30-year periods, as well as private and state-owned companies' becoming involved in developing oil and gas fields in Iran.

James Eighmie, ILSA Unit chief with the State Department, offered no comment as to whether there are pending investigations involving Indian oil companies.

India has also shown interest in creating a $7.4 billion gas pipeline with Iran, which would help fulfill India's vast energy needs and sustain its strong economic growth. Iran reportedly hosted talks with oil ministers from India and Pakistan, with future talks scheduled for April. The Bush administration has been consistently opposed to the pipeline project.

A D.C.-based lobbyist, speaking on condition of anonymity, said that the Iran-sanctions bill could be used by opponents of the nuclear deal, specifically members of Singh's coalition majority who are ardent supporters of Iran, to prevent the agreement from being approved in the Indian Parliament.

Counterterrorism and nonproliferation interests have gotten in the way of applying ILSA sanctions in the past, according to the CRS. Many projects placed under review by the State Department, during both the Clinton and Bush administrations, have not culminated in sanctions.

A Pretty Good Deal For America (WSJ)

By Willaim S. Cohen

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

One of the most important successes of President Bush's foreign policy is the progress being made in building a strategic partnership between America and India, thereby helping reinforce a strong democratic anchor in Asia. Congress is about to consider legislation that would allow the implementation of a U.S.-India agreement on civilian nuclear cooperation. This agreement is key to moving forward in a number of areas of mutual advancement. Some detractors say that it is imperfect and will harm long-held nuclear nonproliferation goals. On balance and over the long term, however, I believe the U.S. stands to gain far more than it will lose by implementing this agreement. * * *

In the U.S.-India Joint Statement of July 18, 2005, the two countries set a course toward increasing ties in the arena of civilian nuclear cooperation. The agreement is important to India and the U.S. because it helps India meet its growing energy needs, but current U.S. policy and law prevent the U.S. from implementing it. India is not a signatory to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and will not agree to sign it, because to do so would mean giving up existing weapons that it deems necessary for security. Some argue that carving out an exception for India in the civilian nuclear sphere sets a bad precedent by rewarding India for developing its own nuclear weapons. Critics would liken India's behavior to Iran's or North Korea's and suggest that this agreement will encourage bad behavior by others.

The moral equivalency argument fails a crucial reality test. Iran signed the NPT and then covertly used loopholes in the treaty to pursue its goal of developing nuclear weapons. North Korea, having cheated on its past agreements, has now completely withdrawn from the NPT. Moreover, both Iran and North Korea are known proliferators. India, by contrast, developed its nuclear program outside of the NPT. Importantly, it has not shared or distributed its nuclear material or technology to other nations or rogue groups.

In exchange for changing U.S. policy, law and international agreement, India has made numerous commitments to us. It has committed to separate civilian and military nuclear programs and put the majority of its civilian programs under IAEA supervision and safeguards. These safeguards would prevent diversion of materials to India's existing military program. Moreover, India also has committed to maintain its exemplary record regarding global nonproliferation and is expressing interest in possibly joining the Bush administration's Proliferation Security Initiative. India has passed a national export control law, bringing its law and legal practice into conformity with international standards. New Delhi has reiterated its commitment to maintain a unilateral moratorium on nuclear testing. Finally, and possibly most importantly, India has agreed to work with the U.S. toward achieving a fissile material cutoff treaty.

Make no mistake, this agreement with India is by no means perfect and the Bush administration could have done a much better job in consulting with Congress first. Congress should carefully weigh the provisions of the agreement and the proposed implementing legislation, considering ways the administration can further the cause of nuclear nonproliferation in a manner that enhances but does not undermine the agreement with India. But in doing so, Congress should remain mindful that there are many critics in New Delhi who are opposed to the agreement for the very reason that it imposes restrictions on India and are looking for reasons to reject it. If the agreement is rejected in Washington or New Delhi, it is unlikely that India will be able to go forward with further development of its civilian nuclear power generation capability. This will add significant new pressure to the oil market and also force India to burn more coal. Both of these outcomes will damage U.S. economic and environmental objectives.

Initiated under President Clinton and accelerated under President Bush, a closer U.S.-India strategic partnership is born of a shared global vision, the mutual pursuit of democratic ideals, and a common interest in ensuring strategic and regional stability. Simply put, these shared goals and ideals are what make the India case worthy of exception and vastly different from the examples of Iran and North Korea. Strategically, the U.S. and India are laying the foundations of our mutual vision for future defense and security cooperation against the pressure and threats posed by failed states, global terrorist networks and emerging hegemons. * * *

In reality, India is in fact an increasingly important partner to the U.S. and European efforts aimed at stopping Iran's nuclear weapons development program. Delhi and Washington share the problems posed by global extremist terrorism and coordinate ever more closely on a full range of related intelligence matters. India's voice and assistance in the international community helping to ensure that Afghanistan and Iraq are successes is increasingly important. Perhaps, however, our greatest long-term confluence of strategic interest is shaping the positive emergence of China as a global power. To all of these ends, India has great ambitions of joining the U.N. Security Council as a permanent member and assuming even greater global responsibility.

Fundamentally upgrading the U.S.-India relationship represents one of the most important strategic innovations in American foreign policy since the end of the Cold War. Congress should recognize and consider carefully this reality during its deliberations on the civilian nuclear agreement. It is time for two great countries to set aside historical misunderstandings, resolve differences, and move forward with a mutual commitment in promoting democracy, advancing freedom, maintaining security, and establishing free and open markets. India and the United States are embarking on an important and historic journey for the future. Close strategic cooperation and defense security ties between the two countries will be an important element in determining the success or failure of that journey in an ever more complicated and dangerous world.

Russia, United States Increasingly At Odds (AP)

By Judith Ingram

AP, April 4, 2006

Like an aging couple, Russia and the United States seem to spend more time squabbling over what divides them than building on their shared interests.

Whether it's Iran, the Palestinian militant group Hamas or democracy movements in former Soviet republics, Moscow and Washington increasingly find themselves staring warily at one another across the fence.

The Cold War is long over, but questions remain: Will Russia and the United States learn to live with their differences? Or will they get so wound up in recriminations that they can't move forward on the issues where they should find common ground?

Old complaints are often dredged up.

Last week, it was President Vladimir Putin claiming the United States has put up artificial obstacles to slow Russia's entry into the World Trade Organization. While U.S. officials and even Russian negotiators begged to differ, pro-Kremlin lawmaker Konstantin Kosachev speculated the aim wasn't just to deal a setback to Moscow — but to give Ukraine a leg up in its own WTO negotiations.

The week before that, it was Washington's turn to complain, as the Pentagon leveled accusations that Russia had slipped intelligence on U.S. troop movements in Iraq to Saddam Hussein in 2003. Russian officials tersely denied the allegations and fumed over the fact that their American counterparts had not raised them privately before they were splashed across the media.

The disputes underscored the declining relationship between the U.S. and Russia since 2001, when President Bush declared that he had gotten a sense of Putin's soul during their first meeting. The bond was strengthened after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks when Putin allowed U.S. forces into Central Asia.

"There have always been differences, but from time to time they were put aside for shared values: nuclear disarmament, euphoria over the end of the Cold War, the fight against terrorism, things that pushed everything else into the shadows," said Ivan Safranchuk, the head of the Moscow office of the Washington-based Center for Defense Information. "But in the periods of thaw, Russia and the U.S. didn't create any stable mechanisms to solve problems."

Meanwhile, Russia's influence in the world has swelled, providing a growing counterbalance to U.S. hegemony. It has been a central player in negotiations over Iran's alleged nuclear arms program and a mediator with Hamas — proving that Washington needs Moscow even as it bridles at the contrary positions Russia has staked out.

The strengthening Moscow-Beijing axis is cause for American nervousness, and may underlie some of the recent vocal U.S. criticism of Russia — judgments Moscow considers unjustified.

Frustration is driving the relationship between the U.S. and Russia now, Safranchuk said, and the root problem is a "dissonance in perceptions." Moscow thinks Washington is ungrateful for the cooperation it has provided, particularly following the Sept. 11. attacks.

Another measure of that dissonance is Russian confusion over why Bush has failed to persuade Congress to lift the Soviet-era Jackson-Vanik trade restrictions while Washington freed neighboring Ukraine from the 1974 measures, opening the way for the former Soviet republic to join the WTO, Safranchuk said.

If the tables were turned and it were up to Russia's parliament to send a positive sign to the U.S., Putin could have the bill pushed through in a heartbeat — the Kremlin's control of the legislature is that strong.

Similar misperceptions have hobbled the economic relationship, in part because the Russian government expects Washington to step in and tell businesses what commitments they need to make, said Andrew Somers, head of the American Chamber of Commerce in Moscow.

For example, the United States wants Russia to develop its liquefied natural gas industry so Washington can reduce its dependence on Mideast oil, but Moscow wants guaranteed sales after it sinks billions of dollars into the project.

"The U.S. says 'we can't do that but don't worry about it, look at our charts for the next 20 years, we're running out of gas, we're running out of oil, we're overly dependent on unstable countries, we want your stuff," Somers said. "And the Russians say, 'Ok, we'll go to China.'"

The United States is among just a trio of countries — the others are Australia and Colombia — that have yet to strike a WTO accession deal with Russia. Putin watches the slow pace of negotiations and sees his ambitions to put Russia back at center stage in world affairs stymied.

"He wants to have the international stamp that Russia is a country in which you can do international trade ... and the U.S. is preventing Russia from being able to do that," said Roland Nash, head of research at Moscow's Renaissance Capital investment bank.

"I just think there's a real sense of frustration."

U.S. Near Deal With China On Illegals (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, April 5, 2006

The Department of Homeland Security is near an agreement with China to return up to 39,000 Chinese illegally living in the U.S. to the communist country, which previously had refused to accept deportations.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff yesterday said the tentative agreement, which would let the U.S. deport Chinese illegals as they are arrested, will act as a deterrent to other foreign nationals contemplating illegal immigration.

"We can't be in the position any longer where we are paying the burden and bearing the burden for countries that won't cooperate with us and take their own citizens back," said Mr. Chertoff as he completed a weeklong tour of China, Japan and Singapore to discuss security and immigration issues.

Mr. Chertoff said nearly 700 Chinese nationals held in U.S. detention centers are clogging the system and that more than 38,000 have been released on bond after spending the maximum 180 days in lockup.

China has declined to accept the illegals, citing uncertainty about their identities.

"The Chinese government is resolutely opposed to ... illegal immigration," Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao said. "First of all, we have to identify those illegal immigrants and based on that, China is willing to receive the repatriation of illegal immigrants."

Federal immigration judges have issued final orders of removal to Chinese citizens smuggled into the U.S., students and others overstaying their visas, and some awaiting legal immigration.

DHS officials said details of the agreement still are being worked out, as are specific deportation plans. The department uses electronic bracelets to track some illegals released on bond and uses other monitoring programs, such as regular check-ins.

Returning Chinese citizens is a major financial burden for China and a "low priority," Mr. Chertoff said.

"But they've got to understand it's a high priority for us," said Mr. Chertoff, who noted that it costs $95 per day to house each detainee.

China's state-owned Xinhua News Agency reported that a senior official of the Communist Party of China (CPC) told Mr. Chertoff in one meeting that bilateral cooperation is essential to maintaining world peace, stability and development.

Bilateral cooperation on trade, terrorism, nuclear nonproliferation, avian flu and the nuclear buildup in Iran and North Korea also will be top priorities when Chinese President Hu Jintao visits Washington beginning April 20.

"China hopes to make substantial achievements in extradition, fighting terrorism, Olympic Games security and illegal migration," said Luo Gan, a member of the Standing Committee of the Political Bureau of the CPC Central Committee.

William Knocke, Homeland Security spokesman, said a senior department official will remain in China for a few extra days to finish the agreement.

"We are encouraged by our discussions with the Chinese government," Mr. Knocke said. "There are details that we need to still work through, but now we have an agreement, in principle, on streamlining the process of repatriating Chinese nationals."

China is at the top of the list of foreign countries that refuse to cooperate with repatriation when their citizens are caught residing in the U.S. illegally.

When asked which other nations refuse to accept their citizens caught illegally in the U.S., Mr. Knocke said, "We're not above naming names if other governments continue to be uncooperative, but the meetings in China were very productive, and we are optimistic about other possible outcomes."

Tokyo Trip Could Aid Talks On N. Korea (WP)

By Anthony Faiola

TOKYO April 4 -- Top officials from the six countries engaged in North Korean nuclear disarmament talks will converge in Tokyo next week at a private sector conference, fueling hopes of unofficial meetings that could help restart the long-stalled negotiations.

Assistant U.S. Secretary of State Christopher Hill, Washington's chief envoy to the talks, is scheduled to arrive in Tokyo on Monday to meet with his counterparts from Japan and South Korea, U.S. officials said.

During his three-day visit, Hill will attend a Northeast Asia Cooperation Dialogue conference in which top negotiators from the other countries in the six-party talks -- China, Russia and North Korea -- will also be present.

It will be the first time that leading delegates from all six will be at the same forum since November, when the last round of talks ended in Beijing. North Korea has since resisted diplomatic efforts to return to the negotiating table, citing a global campaign by the U.S. Treasury Department to stem its alleged counterfeiting and money laundering operations.

Asian and U.S. diplomats said it was too early to tell whether any talks with the North Koreans would take place at the Tokyo conference. Michael Boyle, spokesman for the U.S. Embassy in Tokyo, said no meeting between Hill and a visiting North Korean official had been arranged. "They will be at the same conference," Boyle said. "That's all we can say."

Some analysts have suggested that the North Koreans may try to stall for months or even years before allowing the six-party talks to resume. Others say that a U.S. initiative launched last year to root out the communist government's illicit activities has been effective in putting new pressure on it.

The Treasury Department has forced U.S. banks to sever ties with a bank in Macau that is allegedly tied to illicit North Korean funds, a move that has led banks around the world to curtail dealings with North Korea to avoid similar action.

Diplomats said that Jong Thae Yang, a high-ranking official in the U.S. affairs division of the North Korean Foreign Ministry, will attend the Tokyo conference.

Sponsored by the University of California's Institute of Global Conflict and Cooperation Sources, it will bring together top officials and academics from across the region.

The conference comes at a time when Japan is taking more assertive steps on its own to pressure North Korea. Japanese politicians have made progress on both a bill threatening sanctions if it does not negotiate in good faith on the nuclear issue and a dispute over Japanese citizens abducted by the North Koreans during the 1970s and '80s to help train potential spies.

On Tuesday, Japan also added 20 North Korean businesses and institutions to an export restriction list aimed at preventing them from obtaining materials and technology that could have military use.

Syria Imposing Stronger Curbs On Opposition (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

DAMASCUS, Syria, April 4 — Just months ago, under intense international pressure to ease its stranglehold on neighboring Lebanon, the Syrian government was talking about ending the ruling Baath Party's grip on Syrian power and paving the way for a multiparty system.

But things have moved in the opposite direction. Syrian officials are aggressively silencing domestic political opposition while accommodating religious conservatives to shore up support across the country.

Security forces have detained human rights workers and political leaders, and in some cases their family members as well. They have barred travel abroad for political conferences and shut down a human rights center financed by the European Union. And the government has delivered a stern message to the national news media demanding that they promote — not challenge — the official agenda.

The leadership's actions were described in interviews with top officials as well as dissidents and human rights activists. They reflect at least in part a growing sense of confidence due to shifts in the Middle East in recent months, especially the Hamas victory in Palestinian elections, political paralysis in Lebanon and the intense difficulties facing the United States in trying to stabilize Iraq and stymie Iran's drive toward nuclear power.

The detentions, the press crackdown, the restrictions on travel and the overall effort to crush dissent are also a response to a fragile domestic political climate and concern over a growing opposition movement abroad.

"I may not be keen on early morning arrests, but this regime was being threatened," Deputy Prime Minister Abdullah Dardari, a Londoneducated technocrat charged with steering Syria's economic overhaul, said in an interview. "The survival of this regime and the stability of this country was threatened out loud and openly. There were invitations for foreign armies to come and invade Syria. So you could expect sometimes an overreaction, or a reaction, to something that is really happening."

On Tuesday, Amnesty International condemned the Syrian crackdown and called on Damascus to release "all of those arrested due to their beliefs." Human Rights Watch said it was sending a letter to the government protesting the arrests.

The government has also sought to fortify its position with a nod to a reality sweeping not just Syria, but the region: a surge in religious identification and a growing desire to empower religious political movements like Hamas and the Muslim Brotherhood. The latter group recently won 88 seats in the Egyptian Parliament in spite of government efforts to block its supporters from voting.

The Syrian government has gone further to accommodate religious conservatives than in the past, officials and religious scholars said.

It has appointed a sheik, as opposed to a secular Baathist, to head the Religious Affairs Ministry; allowed, for the first time, religious activities in the stadium at Damascus University; and permitted a speech emphasizing religious practices and identity to be given to a military audience. President Bashar al-Assad has increasingly inserted references to religious identity and culture into his speeches.

Most striking was the government's recent decision to reverse itself one month after trying to limit activities taking place in mosques. The Religious Affairs Ministry effectively ordered mosques closed for all activities but prayers, but a few weeks later the decision was deemed a greater threat to a government controlled by the Alawites, a minority religious sect, than the potential for political organizing among the majority Sunni Muslims.

"Before, religion for the regime was like a ball of fire, " said Abdul Qader al-Kittani, a professor of Islamic studies at Fattah Islamic University here. "Now they deal with it like it could be a ball of light."

He added: "Two factors pushed the regime toward this direction. The first is the beat of the street. The second is external pressures on the regime."

Damascus has a very different feel from that of a few months ago, when investigators for the United Nations Security Council issued a report suggesting that the Syrian state — not just individuals — was behind the assassination of Rafik Hariri, the former Lebanese prime minister, in February 2005 and that the authorities here had defied the United Nations Security Council by refusing to cooperate with its investigation.

The new investigator heading the inquiry, Serge Brammertz of Belgium, has kept a far lower profile and taken a less confrontational approach than his predecessor, Detlev Mehlis of Germany. Syrian officials have responded by agreeing to allow President Assad to be interviewed.

With the pressure off, the arrests have been stacking up since January, according to local human rights groups and individuals who say they were picked up by the authorities.

In Damascus, Ammar Qurabi, the former spokesman for the Arab Organization for Human Rights-Syria, was held for four days after returning from political conferences in Washington and Paris. In Aleppo, Samir Nashar, a businessman and opposition leader, was detained for three days after returning from attending political conferences abroad.

The goal was to deliver a message, some of those arrested said: the government will not tolerate any contact between internal opposition figures and a growing opposition movement abroad that is being encouraged by former Vice President Abdel Halim Khaddam, who recently forged an alliance with the Muslim Brotherhood, which is outlawed here.

"This time they wanted to relay a message or a warning: the Muslim Brotherhood, Khaddam and street protests are prohibited," said Hussein al-Odat, an opposition leader in Damascus who said he was detained last week by security forces for two hours. "They said, 'It is clear, and we will not be merciful.' "

Ibrahim Hamidi, the Damascus bureau chief for the pan-Arab newspaper Al Hayat, and the first to report on the new prohibitions, said the government was operating this way because of the changing regional situation. "Now they believe they can get away with it," he said.

Ayman Abdul Nour, a Baath Party member who promoted the idea of reforming the party from inside, said he had grown so disillusioned that he planned to move his business — a Web site that gives voice to calls for reform — from Damascus to the United Arab Emirates.

He said he had been told that the party planned to purge all those with reform agendas from its ranks. "They say they have a fixed time period to crack down and finish off the opposition," Mr. Abdel Nour said.

Human Rights Watch and several Syrian-based human rights organizations say that at least 30 people involved in politics or human rights work have been detained since January, and that several have not been heard from since. Human rights leaders in Damascus say the numbers are likely to be higher because most families are too afraid to report the arrests to their organizations.

Sami al-Abbas, a novelist, and Farouk Hamad, a poet, were arrested Monday for meeting with opposition leaders, said Razan Zaytouneh of the Syrian Human Rights Information Link, a local organization.

Muhammad al-Habash, a member of Parliament and general manager of the Islamic Studies Center in Damascus, says that in spite of the restrictions, Syria is far more relaxed than it was five years ago when, he said, he would not have been allowed to meet with a foreign reporter.

He also praised the government's recent accommodations to religion, saying, "They realize we need Islamic power, especially at this time," and he endorsed the ban on allowing travel to attend political conferences abroad.

"It is not a suitable time to allow people to travel abroad to participate in opposition conferences," he said. "We have to be real."

Possible Crack In The Boycott Of Danish Goods (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates, April 4 — A group of prominent Muslim scholars has called for ending a boycott on a Danish food products company over the publication in Denmark of derogatory cartoons of the Prophet Muhammad.

In a statement issued over the weekend, the International Conference for the Support of the Final Prophet, made up of influential Muslim scholars including Yusuf alQaradawi of Egypt and Salman alAwda, a Saudi cleric, advised that the company, Arla Foods, "should be withdrawn from the boycott on Denmark" in recognition of the company's efforts at reaching out to the Muslim world.

Arla placed full-page advertisements in Arab newspapers last month condemning the cartoons as an insult to Islam, a move that was criticized in Denmark but applauded in some Middle Eastern countries.

"We made the decision to make this statement because we really believe that you shouldn't insult people's religions," said Jan Petersen, regional director for Arla Foods Middle East. "As a company we have been caught in the middle of something that nobody could have ever expected."

Arla's dairy products, which disappeared from store shelves when the boycott began in late January, reappeared in some stores in Dubai, Saudi Arabia and other Persian Gulf countries on Tuesday, according to regional distributors.

Thomas May, the Danish consul general in Dubai, said the resolution was the product of weeks of dialogue between Danish representatives and businessmen and Muslim leaders.

But many retailers said they intended to keep Danish goods, including Arla's, off their shelves.

"We are waiting for the results, but we still have not seen a solution to the problem," said a product manager at the Sharjah Cooperative Society, a retailer in the emirate of Sharjah, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly.

"The boycott is not in our hands or in the hands of the government," he said. "It's in the hands of the people, and ultimately the consumer must decide."

Westerners In Madrassahs (CSM)

By David Montero

The Christian Science Monitor, April 5, 2006

KARACHI, PAKISTAN - A death in the family opened a doorway back to Islam for Imtiaz Baksh, a tall, turbaned Canadian with a prominent beard and quiet voice. Although raised as a Muslim by parents of Indo-Pakistani origin, he'd never been much of a practicing one himself until his mother passed away.

"Emptiness appears in the heart," he recalls, sitting on a carpet at a madrassah in Karachi. "In that way you can be born again."

More than 10 years ago, Mr. Baksh, his wife, and son began a journey that led them from the quiet of Alberta to the crushes of Karachi. They had opted to study Islam at the Jamia Binoria, a prominent madrassah or Islamic school, where they have remained since 2000.

Under pressure from Western governments, Pakistan has banned foreigners like Baksh from madrassahs after it was discovered that one of the London bombers had visited a Pakistani madrassah. No official deadline has yet been set for the return of foreign students, although the government claims 65 percent have already left.

Many of those who remain are Westernized Muslims who are pursuing a madrassah education as a supplement to - not a substitute for - other types of modern education. Indeed, many come with long experience in Western classrooms, and could form a bridge between Western and Islamic worldviews and systems of thought.

Jamia Binoria, founded in 1954, is one of the largest madrassahs in Pakistan, a sprawling complex where 5,000 students, including some 200 foreign students from 32 countries, squeeze into tiny rooms. The atmosphere is somber despite the tight spaces, and the students sway as they intone methodically over the Koran.

Like many Western students here, Imtiaz Baksh considers returning to the West with the evangelical mission of spreading the teachings of Islam, perhaps by opening a school in Canada. His son, 19-year-old Ejaz Ullah, intends to follow suit.

"Living there [in Canada] opened my eyes to how the world operates, how young people develop themselves. Living in a democratic country gave me an understanding of freedom of speech. A person had rights; you can say what you wanted to say and not be afraid of being taken away by the secret police, for example," says Baksh.

The Bakshs are one of many students at madrassahs who, in their education and upbringing, embody a melding of Western values and traditional Islamic teaching.

Saeed-ur-Rahman, who was born in England to Pakistani parents, is, he believes, a corrective to a popular misconception about madrassahs.

"It's a misconception that students [at madrassahs] are downtrodden, poor, dead-enders," he says over rounds of tea at the Jamia Uloom Islamia madrassah in Binnori Town, Karachi. "We studied [in the West], in school, in college."

A recent study by The World Bank bolsters this view, pointing out that "[t]here is weak evidence to support the hypothesis that poorer and less-educated families are more likely to send a child to a madrassah." The report also says that 75 percent of all households with a child in a madrassah also send a child to a private or public school, challenging the notion that madrassahs are the province of radicalized families.

Mr. Rahman's decision to study here makes perfect sense in his worldview. "If somebody wants to study engineering, they go to the West. We have come to these centers where the standard of Islamic education is higher," he explains in British-accented English.

Madrassahs are widely criticized for providing what is considered a paltry modern education. Like many madrassahs, Rahman's does in fact provide several years of English, science, social studies, and mathematics. But many within the system point out that, in the hundreds of years that madrassahs have existed, modern education has never been the point.

"Material seeking and getting a job are not our purpose," says Mulana Saif-ullah Raddani, editor of the madrassah's weekly newspaper. "The only purpose of our education is to understand God's commandments."

He adds that his own son is studying at the madrassah while pursuing a BA degree in computers at a private college. Some of the foreign students have come to Pakistan to gain a similar mix of madrassah and modern learning, sent by their parents to learn Islamic teachings before returning to schools in the West.

There are those who do not welcome the presence of foreign students, finding it suspicious at best and potentially dangerous at worst.

"This is a most dangerous kind of person," contends S.H.M. Jafri, a professor of Islamic studies at the Aga Khan University in Karachi. "Madrassahs give specialization in a certain type of Islam" which adds to sectarianism, he says.

Mr. Jafri finds the decision to study at madrassahs questionable given the option of studying at universities in the West. "They could have gone to a department of Islamic studies at a university in America, or at the American University in Cairo. Why have they chosen a madrassah?" he says.

Rahman believes the answer lies in taking the best from both worlds. "We take the good that the West has to offer, and then we come here and take away from this country the good, and leave with a better frame of mind," he explains.

Rahman and others say there is no over-riding conflict between their religious values and the values of the societies to which they will return.

"I don't disagree with the system. I disagree with the people who abuse the system," Baksh says. "I have a negative opinion of drug lords and pimp lords."

But there are limits to how, as Muslims, they can enjoy the social freedoms of Canada and England.

"If you call open-mindedness the freedom to do what you want freely, to sleep around wherever you want - Islam does not allow that. There is a limit to everyone's freedom," Saeed-ur-Rahman says, adding, "I think anyone can live anywhere in the world and mix with anyone in the world if he's a good citizen, and that's what Islam teaches you, to be loyal to your country, to your community."

Historic First: Kuwaiti Women Vote, Run (CSM)

By Jamie Etheridge

The Christian Science Monitor, April 5, 2006

KUWAIT CITY - A sea of black flooded a local polling station in Kuwait Tuesday when hundreds of women clad in the head-to-toe abaya cast their vote for the first time.

One of the two female candidates contesting a vacant seat on the powerful Municipal Council, Khaledah Al-Khader, said she faced some criticism from Islamic groups.

"Some individuals believe that simply because I am of the female gender, I am incapable of having a seat in the council - because I would not be strong enough to deal with the pressure," says Ms. Khader, a medical doctor educated at Tulane University in New Orleans.

Considered a test case for 2007 parliamentary polls, the by-election is the first in which women have been able to vote since the National Assembly approved universal suffrage last year.

The May 2005 decision sparked widespread debate about women's roles in politics, with some conservative Islamist members of Parliament arguing that women should not be allowed in Parliament without wearing the Islamic hijab, or head covering.

The landmark political participation of women in Kuwait's election Tuesday is part of a regional trend in the Arab Gulf states, where women are growing more publicly vocal about political matters.

Qatar recently announced that it would hold first ever parliamentary elections in 2007, in which women will be allowed to vote. These modest political gains mark a dramatic shift for a region where many women still cannot even leave their homes, take a job, or go to school without the permission of their father or husband.

But though Kuwait's new law was a victory for women activists who had fought for suffrage for decades, female candidates and voters still face obstacles.

Khader's fellow female candidate, 32-year-old chemical engineer Jenan Al-Bousheri, has taken a modest approach to her campaign, refusing to visit the all-male diwaniyas, or gathering places. Another female politician, Ayesha Al-Reshaid, who already announced plans to run for parliament in 2007 and has visited male diwaniyas, recently received a death threat warning her to stop campaigning.

Ms. Bousheri, who wears the Islamic hijab and has worked for the municipality for 10 years, says she doesn't feel threatened but instead is simply being respectful of the country's conservative nature. In addition to not visiting the diwaniyas, she refused to include her photo on campaign billboards, which could be considered indecent.

"It's a new situation in Kuwait. I don't want to put [up] my pictures. Maybe in the next two years or three years, the situation will be different ... I can put it [photos] but it's my decision," she says.

Early morning turnout at the polling stations was modest. Each station included an entrance for men and for women. Female monitors had been appointed by the electoral authorities to check the identity of female voters wearing abaya and niqab (face covering).

Kuwait TV said the polls marked an "historic day" for the country. Kuwait's Prime Minister Sheikh Nasser Al-Sabah praised the elections, visiting polling stations in the predominately Shia area of Rumaythia just south of downtown Kuwait City.

The Municipal Council has 16 members, 10 elected and six appointed by the government. The local government body wields considerable power across the nation, approving building, construction, and road projects.

The seat became vacant following the death of the late Amir Sheikh Jaber Al-Sabah and the appointment of a new government by the new Amir Sheikh Sabah Al-Ahmed Al-Sabah. Abdullah Al-Muhailbi, the Municipal Council member representing the fifth district of Rumathiya, Salmiya, was appointed Minister of Municipality in the new government.

In addition to the two female candidates, six male candidates competed for the seat. Women made up 57 percent of the 28,000 eligible voters for the fifth constituency.

Speaking at the polls, Khader told reporters that the elections showed the country and the world the capabilities of local women.

"This is the first time Kuwaiti women can show the men that we are capable. It is important that we do our best and leave the outcome of the polls to God," she said.

Scandal Pushes Thai Premier To Say He'll Resign (WP)

By Alan Sipress

BANGKOK, April 4 -- Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra announced Tuesday that he would resign in an effort to end months of demonstrations that have shaken Thailand. He pledged to leave office as soon as a new parliament convenes.

"I want all Thais to reunite," he said in a brief televised address to the nation, just two days after he won a snap election that was boycotted by the main opposition parties. "We have no time to quarrel. I want to see Thai people unite and forget what has happened."

Thaksin's pledge to resign marked a stunning reversal of fortune for a man who had aspired to be Southeast Asia's premier statesman. It followed accusations of corruption and abuse of power that have repeatedly drawn tens of thousands of demonstrators into the streets, most of them affluent residents of Bangkok who object to what they call Thaksin's autocratic rule.

The prime minister apologized to his supporters during his address and appeared to choke back tears. He said he was eager to relinquish his office but would remain in power until parliament picked a successor. He also said he would retain his seat in parliament and play an active role in the party he founded, Thais Love Thais.

Under Thai law, the new parliament should convene and begin the process of selecting a replacement by the beginning of May. But the session cannot open until all 500 seats are filled, and 39 remain vacant after the weekend balloting.

The national election commission announced Tuesday that it would hold new elections in those districts in two weeks. The main opposition parties will be eligible to contest the races, which should help ease the process of filling the vacancies.

Last year Thaksin became the first elected prime minister in his country's history to win a second consecutive term. His triumph on a wave of rural support was so overwhelming that he also became the first Thai leader to govern without having to form a coalition.

But the policeman-turned-mobile telephone tycoon alienated many in the capital with his combative approach. When allegations that he had improperly enriched himself in a telecommunications deal surfaced three months ago, his support among Bangkok's influential middle class crumbled.

During his abruptly scheduled speech on Tuesday, Thaksin, 56, appeared subdued. He appealed for an end to the crisis that has rattled Thailand since his family sold its business empire to a Singapore state company for $1.9 billion in January. He has denied doing anything illegal in connection with the deal.

"As for the many things I have been accused of, this prime minister has never thought of doing anything wrong or evil to the country. I think I have done my best," he said. He added: "Let's clean up our house and stop the chaos."

Speculation had mounted earlier in the day that Thaksin was preparing to quit after his office disclosed he was to pay a private call during the afternoon on King Bhumibol Adulyadej, who is widely revered in the country but keeps his distance from politics. Government officials provided no details about the visit, calling it a routine audience scheduled every six weeks to brief the king and seek his advice.

But the trip to the beachfront Klaikangwon Palace, 120 miles south of the capital, came one day after Thaksin raised the possibility on a television talk show that he might step aside for the sake of national reconciliation. To do so, he would have to tender his resignation to the king.

Thaksin's aides described his planned resignation as a break from politics, leaving open the possibility that he might return to elected office.

Politicians and political analysts said they expect he will continue to play a powerful role behind the scenes because he remains the dominant force in the country's largest party. He is one of the country's richest people.

Although Thaksin did not name a successor, discussions inside his party have focused on several of his loyal lieutenants. In particular, the media and political analysts have spoken of Deputy Prime Minister Somkid Jatusripitak, a marketing specialist who also serves as commerce minister.

Somkid, who holds a doctorate in business management from Northwestern University, is a longtime confidant of Thaksin's, having previously served as his adviser when Thaksin was a cabinet minister in a prior government. He is considered by many to be less controversial than other party insiders and was responsible for introducing some of Thaksin's most popular policies.

Some critics on Tuesday welcomed Thaksin's announcement. But it remained unclear whether others would be satisfied and suspend their protests before he leaves office. In recent days, many of the prime minister's foes had demanded his immediate resignation.

"He's trying to dictate the terms of his departure. He's trying to get around the election law by forcing parliament to open," said Korn Chatikavanij, a spokesman for the opposition Democrat Party, reflecting a continuing distrust of Thaksin's motives.

Protest leader Sondhi Limthongkul, who ignited the anti-Thaksin movement last year against his former business partner, gave the prime minister until April 30 to depart. He said the alliance would hold one last rally Friday in central Bangkok and then resume the protests in May if Thaksin had not followed through on his pledge.

Some detractors have also stressed that a resignation alone would not be enough to end the crisis. In an editorial Tuesday, the Nation newspaper said Thaksin's party would have to relinquish power so that a provisional government could undertake constitutional reforms.

"An independent inquiry must also be initiated to look into corruption and allegations and conflicts of interest involving Thaksin, his family and their cronies," the newspaper wrote. "Failing that, there can be no reconciliation."

Thai Premier Quits His Post, Ending Turmoil (NYT)

By Thomas Fuller

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

BANGKOK, April 4 — Thaksin Shinawatra, a billionaire turned populist politician, said Tuesday that he would step down as Thailand's prime minister, ending five years of increasingly tumultuous rule and breaking a political stalemate over demands for his resignation that had gripped the country for the past two months.

It was a sudden reversal for Mr. Thaksin, who a day earlier had claimed victory in national elections held Sunday that had been boycotted by opposition parties.

"Our country needs to move on," Mr. Thaksin said in a hastily arranged, 10-minute appearance on national television late Tuesday. "Our children need to have a much better future. There's no point if adults keep trying to beat each other up and finally destroy the country."

Mr. Thaksin said he would stay on as caretaker prime minister until a new leader was chosen, which according to Thai law must take place within 30 days of the election. Thai media have speculated about several possible replacements, including the commerce minister and close Thaksin ally, Somkid Jatusripitak.

By adopting universal health care, cracking down on drug dealers and offering debt relief to farmers, Mr. Thaksin endeared himself to rural voters, who make up 70 percent of the country's 63 million people.

But while he was loved in the countryside, he was despised by the Bangkok elite, who accused him of using his political power to further his business interests.

They also accused him of worsening the Muslim insurgency in southern Thailand, stifling media independence, fostering a culture of corruption in government contracts and allowing the police to conduct hundreds of extrajudicial killings, a charge the prime minister has brushed aside.

Mr. Thaksin, 56, announced his resignation after a meeting with Bhumibol Adulyadej, the revered Thai king, who will celebrate 60 years on the throne in June.

"We don't have time to fight," Mr. Thaksin said. "I want to see the Thai people reunite and forget what happened in the past."

Mr. Thaksin made several references to the king, suggesting that the meeting had influenced his decision.

Candidate Promises To Reform The U.N. (WT)

By Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, April 5, 2006

Sri Lanka's candidate to lead the United Nations said yesterday that as secretary-general, he would push ahead with reforms to the world organization and take a more proactive stance toward "what is evil and wrong with the world."

Jayantha Dhanapala told editors and reporters at The Washington Times that whoever replaces Secretary-General Kofi Annan next year would have to address the scandals that have weakened the United Nations' credibility.

"It is very clear that management is an imperative -- we need to have a strong management hand," said Mr. Dhanapala, who served as the U.N. undersecretary for disarmament from 1998 to 2003.

Mr. Annan's term expires Dec. 31, and three candidates have taken their campaigns on the road, visiting New York and the capitals of the five permanent Security Council members. The council must agree on a name before the 191-member General Assembly votes on the nominee.

Under an informal rotation system, it is Asia's turn to lead the world body. But U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton has said the next secretary-general should be chosen for his or her administrative skills, not the location of his or her home country.

Beijing, meanwhile, is pressing hard for the job to go to a candidate from one of the 54 members of the U.N. Asian Group.

"China strongly believes that Asia can provide the next secretary-general," Ambassador Wang Guangya told The Washington Times yesterday in New York.

Slovakian Ambassador Peter Burian, the only Eastern European voice on the Security Council besides Russia, said "the majority opinion" in the United Nations favors an Asian. "But we feel that the concept of geographical rotation should be secondary to the qualifications."

Mr. Dhanapala was in Washington meeting with State Department officials, members of Congress and think tanks to convince them of his reformist agenda and bridge-building style.

Although he declined to criticize Mr. Annan's record since he became secretary-general in 1997, Mr. Dhanapala said that the Iraq oil-for-food scandal had "sapped the morale" of the organization and that divisions over the Iraq war had affected Mr. Annan's stewardship of the United Nations and its roughly 56,600 employees worldwide.

In an indication of how he would lead, the Sri Lankan candidate noted that Article 99 of the U.N. Charter gives the secretary-general the authority to bring to the attention of the world body any issue that is likely to be a threat to peace and security.

"I think this article needs to be used much more," Mr. Dhanapala said. "We cannot allow sections of humanity to be preyed upon."

Balancing the interests of the United States against those of other nations "does not mean turning a [blind] eye to what is wrong and evil in the world," he said.

Thailand and South Korea also have named candidates -- Surakiart Sathirathai and Ban Ki-moon respectively -- and several other names have been mentioned, including two candidates from Singapore and Poland's former president Aleksander Kwasniewski.

French Premier Refuses To Bow To Protests By Angry Youths (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino And Craig S. Smith

PARIS, April 4 — Waves of demonstrations, strikes and violence hit France again on Tuesday as Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin, weakened but defiant, refused to bend to the demand that the government scrap a disputed youth labor law.

It was the fifth nationwide protest since February against a modest initiative that was aimed at encouraging the hiring of young people but that has provoked an improvised, open-ended campaign against the French government itself.

The protest in Paris was marred by violence at its destination at the Place d'Italie in the southeast of the city. Angry gangs of young people throwing bottles and stones clashed with the riot police, who fought back with tear gas and waded into the crowd to handcuff and haul off troublemakers.

Some of the small, mobile bands of youths known as casseurs, or smashers, broke concrete sidewalks and threw the pieces at the police. The youths kicked and beat protesters and destroyed property, tearing out park benches and pulling down street signs.

At times, other demonstrators tried to stop the destruction by creating circles around the casseurs. Earlier in the day, the police went from store to store at the enormous square, urging shopkeepers to close their doors.

By evening, more than 300 people had been arrested in Paris. But the clashes seemed less fierce than those of just a week ago, as riot police officers managed to keep discipline and maintain order.

In the northern city of Lille, however, hundreds of youths smashed shop windows, vandalized cars and threw rocks, bottles and other objects at the riot police, who fired back tear gas. A female reporter was assaulted while filming the violence and a young man suffered burn injuries from the shell of a tear gas grenade, Agence France-Presse reported.

The police also used tear gas to disperse casseurs in other cities, including Caen, Rennes and Lorient.

The protests brought more than one million people into the streets in cities and towns throughout France, slightly lower than the 1.16 million protesters of a week ago, according to the Interior Ministry. Union organizers estimated the number for both demonstrations at three million.

The protests even reached as far as the French island of Réunion, nearly 6,000 miles away, where thousands of people in two cities marched against the law.

The strikes that accompanied the protests on Tuesday disrupted daily life but, again, not as severely as those of last week. Some offices, hospitals, shops, universities and high schools were closed or working less efficiently; some transportation services were disrupted.

Only 24 of France's 84 universities were functioning normally, with others either partly blocked by demonstrators or closed. The Eiffel Tower was closed, as it was during last Tuesday's protests.

But, in a sure sign that this was not a country paralyzed, the Paris Métro and bus system ran on a normal schedule. Mail and many newspapers were delivered. Only 18 percent of railroad workers were on strike, compared with 28 percent a week ago. Fifteen percent of domestic flights were canceled, half the percentage of last week. The Education Ministry reported that 23 percent of its workers were absent, compared with 36 percent last week.

In the National Assembly, Mr. de Villepin faced savage criticism from the opposition.

"Mr. Prime Minister, who is governing France today?" asked Jean-Marc Ayrault, the leader of the Socialist party bloc in the Assembly. At another point he said: "You govern no more. You hold the appearance of power, but you no longer exercise it."

Mr. Ayrault said France was mired in a "crisis of regime with two prime ministers," apparently referring to the active role that Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy has played in trying to open a dialogue with the unions.

In reply, Mr. de Villepin vowed, "The government will not give in." Despite predictions that the law is doomed, he insisted: "What we want is a victory against unemployment. This is a victory for France."

The attacks on Mr. de Villepin, who has never held elective office, have grown fiercer over this issue in recent weeks. On the streets of Paris, one sign read, "In memory of a virtual prime minister."

The position of the government deteriorated even further after President Jacques Chirac's televised address on Friday, when he made a compromise offer that watered down the youth labor law.

The law, as passed by Parliament and upheld by the Constitutional Council, created a new labor contract for people under the age of 26 that gave employers up to two years to fire them without cause.

Mr. Chirac said he was sending the measure back to lawmakers, asking them to cut the probation period to one year and to require employers to give a reason for any dismissal. He asked companies not to issue contracts under the law until it had been modified. But two days later, Mr. Chirac signed the original youth initiative into law.

Fifty-five percent of those polled for a survey by BVA in the newspaper Les Échos on Tuesday said Mr. Chirac's decision to amend the law was "not enough."

According to a BVA poll that will appear in the weekly magazine L'Express on Thursday, only 49 percent of those polled said they hoped that Mr. de Villepin would stay in the post of prime minister, while 45 percent expressed the hope that he would resign.

DOJ_NMG_0025503

Mr. Sarkozy, who is also the leader of the governing Gaullist party, meanwhile, has given the impression that he, not Mr. de Villepin, his political rival, is managing the crisis. Over the weekend, Mr. Sarkozy spoke by phone with leaders of the main unions, and on Monday night held talks with party deputies to discuss amendments to the new law.

Millions In France Protest Law, Leadership (WP)

By Molly Moore

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

PARIS, April 4 -- Geoffroi Cabioch, a 21-year-old veterinary student who joined the protesters surging through Paris on Tuesday, does not oppose the new youth labor law that provoked the massive demonstration. In fact, he believes that the law "will help some of my friends find a job."

Cabioch said he was not protesting a law, but the attitude of the French government.

As many as 3 million people thronged the streets of cities across France -- equaling the huge protests of one week ago -- in what has grown from a protest against a single labor law to an outpouring of discontent with an aging leadership that a new generation feels does not represent its interests.

Even the violence that now routinely breaks out between crowds and riot police at the end of each march in Paris took on a government-vs.-the people tone Tuesday.

When heavily armored officers chased hooded youths who appear to show up just for the sport of mayhem, peaceful demonstrators booed. When flying bottles hit officers, the crowd erupted in cheers of approval. When police fired tear gas into the swarms of people, the youths, wearing hoods almost as a uniform, and peaceful people alike retreated, coughing and cursing the riot squads.

Tuesday's demonstrations and accompanying strikes that disrupted airplane and train schedules and shut down the Eiffel Tower for the second time in a week came despite a pledge by President Jacques Chirac to modify the new labor law.

It allows employers to fire workers under the age of 26 any time during their first two years of employment. Chirac said in an address to the nation Friday he was willing to cut that period to one year and to make other concessions, which he did not specify. He signed it into law Sunday.

Government and union officials are scheduled to meet Wednesday to discuss the changes.

Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin, author of the law, rammed it through Parliament in a 2 a.m. vote on an omnibus package he called "an equal opportunity law."

A new survey released by the BVA polling group Tuesday showed Villepin's popularity had plunged to 28 percent -- a 14-point drop since the protests began more than a month ago. Villepin is widely considered Chirac's leading choice for president in next year's elections.

The recent demonstrations have been the largest in France in decades. In the past, such huge displays of public anger have resulted in governments collapsing.

French government officials estimated Tuesday's turnout at 1 million in dozens of towns and cities across France; union officials put the figure at nearly 3 million.

The government claimed that only 84,000 people marched in Paris, which appeared to be a fraction of the actual number. Demonstrators poured into southeastern Paris's sprawling Place d'Italie for more than four hours. Union officials said 700,000 people participated.

The Paris demonstrations drew people from across a generational, social and educational spectrum. Parents pushed toddlers in strollers. Students from elite universities walked alongside the French-born children of African immigrants from high schools in poor suburbs. But many echoed the same frustrations.

Young people marching Tuesday expressed more anger over the way Chirac's government has imposed the law than dismay at the law itself. "The government didn't discuss the law with the unions," said Yann Lafforgue Puyo, 28, a consultant for the Renault auto company. "They imposed it -- that's not what I call democracy."

"I'm here to demonstrate against the government, which never listens to us," said Adler Innocent, a towering 22-year-old with a diamond earring. He is the son of Haitian immigrants who lives in one of the Paris suburbs hit hard last fall by a wave of arson and vandalism.

But Rebecca Wattenberg had no sympathy for the demonstrators. She stood defiantly in front of her shop, which was filled with colorful, painted glass plates, glasses and mirrors.

"I'm 22 myself -- like the demonstrators," she said, clutching the shop door key, preparing to lock up to prevent possible vandalism. "But I don't understand them. They would work and not demonstrate if they needed money."

She said the new job law was needed to give employers more flexibility. "Everywhere else in Europe people have started to realize that job laws have to change," Wattenberg said. "But not here."

Yvette Fouleboeuf, 84, who stood outside her apartment, shod in dog's-head-style slippers, said she supported the demonstrators and opposed the labor law "for my grandchildren -- they're so worried about the future."

As the demonstration began, police rounded up dozens of youths of African descent, handcuffed them and loaded them onto two buses.

Before the chanting, banner-waving marchers reached the Place

d'Italie, workers at McDonald's and Kentucky Fried Chicken restaurants were nailing large boards over their plate glass windows as though preparing for a hurricane. Cafe waiters scrambled to move tables and chairs off the sidewalks and inside.

The march was peaceful until it reached its final rallying point in the place. There, parts of the crowd erupted in mayhem, ripping up street signs and chunks of concrete and hurling them at riot police. The officers advanced on the attackers in long lines, frequently firing tear gas to disperse the crowd. In last week's turnout, hooded youths frequently robbed the peaceful demonstrators. There were no similar reports on Tuesday, even as youths threw pieces of concrete at news photographers.

But vendors who set up a grill to sell sausage-and-onion sandwiches to demonstrators were attacked by a group of youths. The vendors leapt into the cab of their truck and sped away, leaving a trail of broken bottles, squashed sausages and puddles of mayonnaise on the pavement.

Ex-Spy For Britain Found Fatally Shot In N. Ireland (WP)

By Shawn Pogatchnik

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

DUBLIN, April 4 -- A former official in the Sinn Fein political party who was recently exposed as a British spy was found fatally shot Tuesday, after apparently being tortured, police said. The killing seems certain to further complicate Northern Ireland's stalemated peace process.

Denis Donaldson, 55, died in his isolated home in Glenties in northwest Ireland, said the Irish justice minister, Michael McDowell, adding that Donaldson's right forearm had been nearly severed. He was last seen alive Monday while walking in the village, according to McDowell.

Donaldson was Sinn Fein's legislative chief in the failed power-sharing government of Northern Ireland. He admitted in December that he had been on the payroll of the British secret service and the province's anti-terrorist police for two decades. He went into hiding after that because the Irish Republican Army has traditionally killed known informants.

On Tuesday, the IRA denied responsibility in a one-line statement. "The IRA had no involvement whatsoever in the death of Denis Donaldson," the outlawed group said.

Irish Prime Minister Bertie Ahern and British Prime Minister Tony Blair condemned the killing, which came at a pivotal moment in Northern Ireland's 13-year-old peace process.

On Thursday, Blair and Ahern are to travel to Northern Ireland to reveal a new blueprint for reviving a Protestant-Catholic administration, the intended cornerstone of the province's 1998 peace accord. The plan -- 3 1/2 years of diplomacy in the making -- would call on Northern Ireland's legislature to reconvene in mid-May and face a Nov. 24 deadline to elect an administration.

The killing appeared certain to harden Protestant opinion against cooperating with Sinn Fein, the IRA-linked party that represents most Catholics in Northern Ireland. But officials in both governments said they would go ahead with Thursday's announcement.

Sinn Fein's leader, Gerry Adams, who in December defended Donaldson as an innocent man and then outed him as a British spy, said he did not know who killed him. But he suggested it might have been the work of IRA dissidents opposed to Sinn Fein's peacemaking efforts.

"It is likely that his death at this time is intended to undermine current efforts to make political progress," Adams said. "Those who carried out this murder are clearly opposed to the peace process."

Ian Paisley, whose Democratic Unionist Party represents most of Northern Ireland's British Protestant majority, said that someone within the IRA ranks was the most likely culprit. "There is a finger pointing tonight at IRA-Sinn Fein," he said.

A Catholic-Protestant administration for Northern Ireland fell apart in October 2002 because of an IRA spying scandal involving Donaldson. He and two others were charged with pilfering documents that identified the personal details of thousands of potential IRA targets. Protestants accused the IRA of plotting a possible resumption of its violent campaign.

But British prosecutors mysteriously dropped all charges in early December. A week later, Adams announced that Donaldson had confessed to being a paid British spy. Within hours, Donaldson admitted the same in a television interview.

During its 27-year campaign, the IRA's internal security unit tortured scores of IRA members suspected of passing information to British intelligence. Typical IRA methods included drowning the interrogation victim in a bathtub, applying electric shocks and administering cigarette burns.

The IRA last year declared it was renouncing violence for political purposes and backed the pledge by giving up its weapons stockpiles, moves that were supposed to spur a revival of power-sharing involving Sinn Fein. But Paisley has refused to cooperate with Sinn Fein, citing the IRA's refusal to disband and its alleged involvement in criminal activities.

I.R.A. Turncoat Is Murdered In Donegal (NYT)

By Brian Lavery

DUBLIN, April 4 — Denis Donaldson, a former member of the Irish Republican Army who was exposed last year as a British spy, was found shot dead Tuesday evening at his isolated home in Donegal.

Ireland's justice minister, Michael McDowell, confirmed that Mr. Donaldson had taken a shotgun blast to the head, and that his right forearm was "almost severed," a mutilation similar to those inflicted on I.R.A. informers throughout Northern Ireland's sectarian conflict.

Mr. McDowell said Mr. Donaldson, 55, had been tortured in his home near Glenties, in northwest Ireland, The Associated Press reported.

In a statement, the I.R.A. denied any involvement, but the killing threatens the fragile equilibrium that has lasted since last summer, when the group declared an end to its war against British rule in Northern Ireland.

In 2002, Britain accused Mr. Donaldson of spying for the I.R.A. by stealing documents from government offices at the Northern Irish parliament.

At the time, Mr. Donaldson was receiving paychecks from the British intelligence agencies MI5 and Special Branch while he was serving as Sinn Fein's chief administrator for the power-sharing provincial parliament.

The charges brought down the coalition that was formed under the Northern Ireland peace accord of 1998.

His killing came just two days before the Irish and British prime ministers, Bertie Ahern and Tony Blair, are to meet in Northern Ireland to discuss restoring the local government.

Mr. Donaldson's spying for the British became public last December after the 2002 spying charges against him and two others were dropped suddenly by the British government.

After he was informed that the charges were being dropped, he admitted his dual role to his Sinn Fein colleagues, an announcement that came as one of the movement's most embarrassing scandals in years.

When he confessed in December, he told the state broadcaster RTE, "I was recruited in the 1980's after compromising myself during a vulnerable time in my life."

He added, "I apologize to anyone who has suffered as a result of my activities, as well as to my former comrades, and especially to my family, who have become victims in all of this."

Gerry Adams, president of the I.R.A.'s political wing, Sinn Fein, after personally offering his condolences to Mr. Donaldson's family, said: "It has to be condemned. We are living in a different era, and in the future in which everyone could share.

"This killing seems to have been carried out by those who have not accepted that."

Ian Paisley, the leader of Sinn Fein's Protestant rivals, the Democratic Unionists, said the killing "has put a dark cloud" over the talks Thursday between Mr. Ahern and Mr. Blair.

"Eyes will be turned towards I.R.A./Sinn Fein on this issue," Mr. Paisley said.

As the province's largest party, the Democratic Unionists are exercising a de facto political veto by refusing to share power with Sinn Fein.

Mr. Blair and Mr. Ahern plan to restart the fledgling legislature in May, despite Protestant worries about the continued existence of the I.R.A.

Many Northern Irish republicans, who want the province to break away from Britain and join Ireland, might be happy to see Mr. Donaldson dead, and Mr. Adams suggested that his death might have been the work of British intelligence agencies seeking to move blame back toward the republicans.

Mr. Donaldson had earlier earned his bona fides as Mr. Adams's cellmate when they were jailed in the 1970's. He was also arrested after training in guerrilla warfare with Hezbollah in Lebanon in the 1980's.

Since his admission of spying and his expulsion from Sinn Fein, Mr. Donaldson seemed to age decades. When he finally admitted that he had been spying for the British, he fled his home in Belfast to a remote part of County Donegal, and a cottage that had no electricity or running water.

Hugh Jordan, a journalist who found Mr. Donaldson and reported on his situation recently, told the Press Association in Britain that "he looked like a hunted animal."

"He was extremely depressed," Mr. Jordan said after the killing. "The nerves in his eyes were trembling. He seemed like a man who didn't think he would come to any harm. He did not see his life to be in any danger, but felt the only future he had was where he was, living in that dreadfully squalid situation.

"He was alone and threatened no one. He was no harm to anybody."

Former Sinn Fein Official Shot To Death (USAT)

USA Today, April 5, 2006

Former senior Sinn Fein official Denis Donaldson, who was recently exposed as a British spy, was shot to death in his home in County Donegal, Ireland, after apparently being tortured, Irish Justice Minister Michael McDowell said Tuesday. Prime Minister Bertie Ahern called it a “brutal murder.” Donaldson admitted in December he had been on the payroll of the British secret service and Northern Ireland's anti-terrorist police for the previous two decades. He then went into hiding. The Irish Republican Army said it wasn't involved.

Rich countries' financial aid to the world's poor rose 31.4% in 2005 and reached a record $106.5 billion, due to large debt-relief packages for Iraq and Nigeria, the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development said. The total is 0.33% of the rich countries' gross national income and is halfway toward the United Nations' goal of 0.7%. The United States was the largest donor at $27.5 billion. That was 0.22% of U.S. national income, the highest rate since 1986.

A Paris court fined the terrorist known as “Carlos the Jackal” $6,110 for saying in a 2004 interview aired on French television that terrorist attacks were sometimes necessary. Ilich Ramirez Sanchez, 56, of Venezuela was convicted of defending terrorism.

He also was charged for expressing pleasure at the 9/11 attacks but was acquitted because those comments were his personal reaction, not a defense of terrorism, the court said. Ramirez gained notoriety in the 1970s for deadly bombings, assassinations and hostage-takings. He is serving a life sentence for murder.

Two Worn-Out Diplomats, One Fold-Out Bed (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

I'm just back from London, where the Brits were fascinated with the Condi Rice and Jack Straw two-for-the-road odyssey, the exchange of visits to their hometowns, Birmingham and Blackburn, and the rebuff of Condi by Paul McCartney and a Blackburn mosque.

British journalists loved hearing about how Condi exercises alongside diplomatic reporters in hotel gyms, not at all self-conscious about working out in form-fitting shorts and T-shirts.

The British are used to iron ladies, perhaps not pumping iron but trying to iron out world affairs. In his quaint new book, "Manliness," the Harvard professor Harvey Mansfield cites only one woman with that exalted trait: Margaret Thatcher, who told the first President Bush not to go wobbly on Saddam. Teaching other women to be assertive, Mr. Mansfield frets, might be "like teaching a cat to bark."

The struggles of the relentless American diplomat and the charming British diplomat to knock heads in Iraq and get the government to govern, with the war spinning into sulfurous sectarian fighting, was less mesmerizing to many reporters than the pair's gender-benders.

At one point Mr. Straw said America and England had the right to prod Iraqi politicians: "We've got to be able to deal with Mr. A, Mr. B or Mr. C. We can't deal with Mr. Nobody."

A smiling Ms. Rice, still promoting the illusion that Iraqi women are better off, corrected: "Jack, I'm sure we'd be all right with Miss A or Miss B or Miss C, too, right?" (It would have to be a generic Miss, since there are no powerful women leaders there.)

The foreign secretary held his face and pleaded: "I was not being gender-specific. Don't report me, please."

The British reporters were gobsmacked when Condi gave the fold-out bed on her Boeing 757 to Mr. Straw for the night flight to Kuwait, and slept in the aisle as flight attendants stepped over her.

It may have been a sign that U.S. foreign policy is finally becoming humble, as W. promised in his first campaign, now that Condi has admitted "thousands" of mistakes in Iraq. But it also shows the secretary understands the importance of manly virtues: she was tough enough to sleep on the floor and chivalrous enough to make sure Mr. Straw didn't.

The Times of London made smarmy jokes about "how far the special relationship has developed," and asked a Baghdad embassy spokeswoman if Jack's sleeping in Condi's bed was "second base" for the couple.

The comedian Bill Maher recently noted that while other countries elect a wide array of female leaders, our women politicians are still expected to wedge themselves into a "straitjacket" and act like men.

It has been two decades since I covered Geraldine Ferraro's historic run for the White House. One politician welcomed Ms. Ferraro with a wrist corsage; another in Mississippi asked the "young lady" if she could bake blueberry muffins. Johnny Carson joked that Joan Mondale would not like her husband working late with his female vice president.

So now there are racy Rice-Straw jokes. How far have we come?

The Los Angeles Times ran a piece yesterday about Hollywood's doubts about Hillary, including Sharon Stone's basic instinct that it's too soon for the New York senator since "a woman should be past her sexuality when she runs" and she thinks Hillary still has "threatening" sexual power.

It seemed unlikely that we'd kick the habit of wanting Daddy in the Oval Office until we kicked the habit of wanting Daddy in the anchor chair.

Now that the nightly news is largely an anachronism, and the suits are trying to make it more cuddly and personality-driven to win younger viewers, we can finally break that barrier. (Even though Walter Cronkite fretted to a group last fall that women on TV talk in "too high a register.")

DOJ_NMG_0025508

As Rebecca Dana wryly wondered in The New York Observer: "What is gravitas? And why does it kick in at nightfall?" She quoted one network executive explaining that even women "like to get their news from other women in the morning and from men — husband figures — at night."

So now we'll see if Katie Couric can be trusted with the Herculean task of appearing on camera for 5 or 10 minutes a night, reading a teleprompter.

Still, she'll have to prove that, more than being just a headliner, she knows what's behind the headlines. As Bob Schieffer has done, raising CBS ratings, or as Christiane Amanpour might do as an anchor, Katie needs to show she understands the roiling events beyond the teleprompter.

Let's just hope Les Moonves doesn't welcome her with a wrist corsage.

Dark Days For Philippine Democracy (NYT)

Filipinos thought they had put an end to electoral chicanery and governmental intimidation when they overthrew the Marcos dictatorship two decades ago. Unfortunately, President Gloria Macapagal Arroyo has completely lost touch with the ideals that inspired that 1986 "people power" movement.

Mrs. Arroyo is no Ferdinand Marcos, at least not yet. But this onetime reformer is reviving bad memories of crony corruption, presidential vote-rigging and intimidation of critical journalists. Unless the Philippine Congress and courts find ways to rein in her increasingly authoritarian tendencies, democracy itself may be in danger.

This was not the outcome people expected five years ago when Mrs. Arroyo, then the vice president, was swept into power on a wave of popular discontent with her discredited predecessor, Joseph Estrada. In those days, Mrs. Arroyo, a professional economist, was seen as an earnest reformer. She won further credit by pledging not to run for a new six-year term in 2004.

But then she changed her mind, and her style of government as well. Her narrow re-election victory became tainted after a tape revealed her discussing her vote totals with an election commissioner while ballots were still being counted. She survived an impeachment attempt over that incident. But she was forced to send her husband into exile over charges that he took bribes from gambling syndicates.

Earlier this year she briefly declared a state of emergency in response to allegations of a coup threat that others disputed. Since then she has been intensifying pressure on a wide range of political critics and especially on the press. Government officials have warned news outlets that they will be held to restrictive new guidelines, the justice secretary talks darkly about a journalistic watch list, and the staff members of a well-known center for investigative journalism have been threatened with sedition charges. No Philippine government has made such efforts to muzzle the press since the Marcos era.

President Bush has repeatedly hailed Mrs. Arroyo as an important ally against international terrorism. He now needs to warn her that by undermining a hard-won democracy, she is making her country far more vulnerable to terrorist pressures.

TERRORISM NEWS:

One Verdict Decided, 9/11 Jury Faces Second (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

WASHINGTON, April 4 — When the jurors in the Zacarias Moussaoui trial take their seats again on Thursday, they will begin a vastly different proceeding than the one they concluded on Monday with the verdict that he was responsible for some of the deaths of Sept. 11, 2001, and is thus eligible for execution.

At the end of this next phase, which may take several weeks, they will be confronted with a verdict form that will be without the subtleties and complex questions of the first phase and instead will ask them to make a more mechanical calculation.

The form will ask them to decide which carries more weight: mitigating factors like Mr. Moussaoui's troubled mental state, or aggravating factors surrounding the deaths of nearly 3,000 people on Sept. 11.

The Justice Department has asked the judge to list 26 aggravating factors on the form, including the deaths of hundreds of firefighters and police officers; the grief brought to the victims' families and friends; the disruption to New York City, including the closing of parks, playgrounds and schools and the displacement of businesses; and the destruction of parts of the Pentagon.

Mr. Moussaoui's court-appointed defense lawyers are expected to offer two main factors in mitigation: that he is mentally unbalanced and that he is seeking martyrdom.

In the eyes of several death penalty experts and lawyers, there is little doubt as to which way the scale will tilt, no matter what the final verdict form looks like. If the nine men and three women on the jury find that the aggravating factors are greater, they will turn to the simple checkoff on the form, marking whether they believe that Mr. Moussaoui should be jailed for life or executed. The death penalty would mean lethal injection at the federal prison in Terre Haute, Ind.

Richard C. Dieter, the executive director of the Death Penalty Information Center, a research group based in Washington that has been critical of the application of the death penalty, said it would be a relatively easy phase for jurors.

The unanimous decision on Monday dealt with what seems to be far more complex issues, namely whether Mr. Moussaoui could be held responsible for deaths on Sept. 11 even though he was in jail at the time and did not participate directly in the attacks.

Mr. Dieter said the outcome was still not a foregone conclusion. But like many lawyers following the case, he said he believed that "the balance is so much one way," adding, "Everybody knows what the crime is, the suffering it caused and what it has done to the whole country."

Nonetheless, he said that jurors "are not automatons" and that someone might flinch at imposing the death penalty when the moment comes.

In addition, Mr. Moussaoui, whose testimony in the first phase probably contributed to the verdict against him, is likely to testify again over the advice of his lawyers.

The jury has been what lawyers term "death-qualified," which means that all members have sworn that they are willing to impose the death penalty if warranted. Under the complicated multistep federal death penalty law, if the jury is unanimous in finding for execution, the judge is obliged to impose the sentence.

Beginning on Thursday, the prosecutors will try to focus the jurors' attention on the horrors of Sept. 11. There may be photographs of many of the victims introduced as well as testimony from as many as 45 family members of victims to recount how their lives have been affected.

The theme of the government's presentation will be that Mr. Moussaoui, a 37-year-old admitted member of Al Qaeda, should be regarded as a proxy for the 19 hijackers who died that day.

Mr. Moussaoui's lawyers, whose advice he has spurned and whose character he has reviled, have indicated they would present psychological testimony that he was affected by anti-Muslim bigotry during his childhood in France. They may also urge the jurors to recognize that he seeks martyrdom and ask them to deny him that.

Prosecutors Have Cleared Their Biggest Hurdle In The Moussaoui Case (FINDLAW/AP)

By Michael J. Sniffen, Associated Press Writer

AP, April 5, 2006

(AP) - ALEXANDRIA, Virginia-Thanks largely to Zacarias Moussaoui himself, prosecutors have cleared their highest hurdle that might deter execution of the al-Qaida conspirator. The path to the death chamber might still contain unpleasant surprises for the government.

When the case began more than four years ago, it looked easier. The government at first thought Moussaoui had been intended to be a 20th hijacker on Sept. 11, 2001. Once it became clear that wasn't his role, the government dialed back its case.

It didn't want to drop the death penalty for the high-profile prisoner who admitted having been trained to fly a plane in an attack similar to Sept. 11. The biggest problem was that Moussaoui was in jail on 9/11 and had been for almost a month.

The final government theory bore some resemblance to a pretzel: Moussaoui was directly responsible for deaths on 9/11 because he hadn't confessed all he knew when arrested. Thus, the contention was, the FBI was prevented from moving to block some or all of the four hijackings that day.

Another twist was added when many of the government witnesses for the prosecution gave as much or more comfort to the defense: They acknowledged misstep after misstep in handling leads about Moussaoui and other terrorists in the summer of 2001, raising doubts about what if anything Moussaoui could have said to change things.

Then Moussaoui took the stand over the objections of the court-appointed defense lawyers. He abandoned claims he'd made for three years that his plot to fly a 747 into the White House was unrelated to 9/11. For the first time, he said he had been training to hijack a fifth jetliner on 9/11 and fly it into the White House.

"This stage of the penalty phase was probably harder for the government, but that was before he took the stand and connected all the dots for the jury," said Richard Dieter, executive director of the Death Penalty Information Center, a group that advocates more equitable administration of the death statute.

"Whether this act (lying to agents) fits the federal death penalty law may have been a tougher question without his testimony," Dieter added. "Whether his acts a month or months ahead of time directly caused these deaths is a good question. The fact that the defendant himself says they were directly connected doesn't necessarily prove it, but it was enough for the jury."

Now testimony shifts in the second phase to whether Moussaoui deserves the death penalty for his acts. Prosecutors will introduce evidence of how heinous the crime was, while the defense will try to show mitigating factors.

What do they have: Prosecutors can pick among the personal tragedies of the families of nearly 3,000 people who died in the 9/11 attacks. The defense has indicated it will try to call a doctor to testify Moussaoui was schizophrenic and sociologists to describe his impoverished upbringing in France and the racism he faced there and in England for his Moroccan ancestry.

The testimony of victim families "is going to be a highly emotional, devastating presentation to the jury," said Mary Cheh, a law professor at George Washington University, who thought the eligibility phase could have gone the other way. "I can't imagine his being able to overcome that."

Now defense attorneys "are going uphill all the way," Cheh said. "I have no idea what they will come forward with."

Northwestern University law professor Ronald Allen agreed that Moussaoui's team has "a very uphill fight," but he cautions that the first phase is a formal decision, while "the second decision is whether to kill somebody. That becomes intensely personal. It's moral and complicated and messy."

Dieter agreed: "It only gets more complicated when a person's life is in the balance."

Another George Washington University law professor, Stephen Saltzburg, also thought prosecutors had gotten past the hard part, and their phase two presentation would be pretty straightforward. "You're going to see some powerful testimony from the families," Saltzburg said. "It's going to be a chance for some of them to get closure as best they can."

And Moussaoui could harm his own case again, Saltzburg said. He doubted the 37-year-old Frenchman would cooperate in any effort by his lawyers to portray him as a lunatic, but "he's liable to want to testify again, and do himself even greater harm. I would not be surprised if he doesn't invite them to give him the death penalty."

That would bring on the last step: appeals.

Dieter said the government's unusual case left many questions for an appeal, where anything could happen.

For prosecutors, "the more difficult time is going to be on appeal," said Jesse Chopper, law professor at the University of California at Berkeley. "His appointed lawyers are going to have many, many potential issues to raise. Compared to that, the penalty phase will be a piece of cake."

Jurors Will Relive 9/11 In Life-or-Death Case (LAT)

By Richard A. Serrano, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, April 5, 2006

Family members and victims will testify about their loss. Lawyers for Zacarias Moussaoui plan to paint a picture of a mentally ill man.

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — When the Zacarias Moussaoui trial resumes Thursday, gone will be the images of a shadowy world of Muslim extremists, of an FBI and CIA unable to track their movements, of a conspiracy in which Moussaoui's role on Sept. 11 is still unclear.

Now that a jury has found Moussaoui eligible for the death penalty, the trial comes down to a single question: Does he live or die?

Federal prosecutors, wanting Moussaoui dead, intend next to turn Courtroom 700 over to the horror of that day 4 1/2 years ago. They hope to show pictures of all 2,972 who perished, videos of the World Trade Center towers afire and bodies falling, and audiotapes of desperate phone calls to loved ones and emergency crews.

The government has designated up to 45 victims and family members to testify about their collective loss. And they hope to contrast their anguish with Moussaoui's boasts that America remains his enemy.

Separately, defense lawyers believe the jury might spare their client's life if they can show he is insane. They have several mental health professionals standing by, at least one ready to testify that Moussaoui appears to be schizophrenic.

The defense team will also say its 37-year-old client emerged from a tragic childhood only to fall under the spell of terrorist leaders preaching jihad against the West.

Jurors also are likely to hear one more time from Moussaoui. He is insistent on taking the witness stand, despite his devastating testimony last week that all but convicted him.

Moussaoui's behavior is difficult to predict, and his final performance before the jury — as an unrepentant terrorist or simply deranged — could well be the tipping point on whether he is sentenced to death by lethal injection or a life in prison without parole.

Andrew McCarthy, a former federal prosecutor in New York who has successfully tried terrorists, expects the government to prevail. But he warned that flashing thousands of photos and videos of cascading bodies could inure the jury against the human suffering they are watching.

McCarthy noted that in the first trial against four Los Angeles police officers for assaulting Rodney G. King, the beating video was shown over and over and all the officers were acquitted.

"After a while it's like watching a Road Runner cartoon, where the coyote keeps falling off the cliff and you don't wince anymore," McCarthy said. "If you overdo it, you'll lose all sensitivity."

In contrast, Carl Tobias, a law professor at the University of Richmond in Virginia, believes the insanity claim has merit, especially since the Supreme Court has exempted the mentally ill from capital punishment.

He said that with overwhelming government evidence that Moussaoui is an avowed terrorist, not to mention his self-incriminating testimony, insanity is probably the only option left for defense lawyers hamstrung by a client they cannot control.

"Who better than his counsel would be able to present a judgment about his mental fitness?" Tobias asked.

Evan Kohlmann, an international expert on terrorism who has worked as a trial consultant for the government in Virginia, agreed that prosecutors might find it difficult to knock down the insanity defense.

"The guy has been to some pretty crazy places and is definitely shellshocked," Kohlmann said, referring to Moussaoui's exploits in the war in Chechnya and at Al Qaeda training camps in Afghanistan.

"He also has been brainwashed in the ideology he holds. He's to the point of no return. But I don't know if that amounts to insanity."

Nevertheless, the government could counter the insanity argument by simply using Moussaoui's words. When he testified last week, he did not blather or snarl. Rather, he was well-spoken, polite at times, even as his statements chilled the courtroom.

He was "delighted" at the sight of the trade center collapsing. The smoking ruins, he said, were "gorgeous." He praised the 19 hijackers he was unable to join because he was arrested just weeks before the attacks. "They are now in the highest level of paradise," he said.

Moussaoui also had this to say about the judge, the prosecutors, his defense team and the jury: "I consider every American to be my enemy. So for me, any American is meant to want my death because I want their death."

His defense team, to whom he no longer talks, plans to present several mental health experts and sociologists to try to convince the jury that this kind of bombastic talk has deep roots in Moussaoui's troubled psyche.

On the stand, they are prepared to say Moussaoui, born in France to Moroccan parents, was largely raised an orphan, the son of a violent and alcoholic father and a mother who left him with others for child care. As a teenager, Moussaoui and his siblings struggled to eat and to stay in school in France.

He eventually drifted to England and into the arms of a fiery Muslim mosque that preached hate against Americans.

According to a defense brief filed in the case, psychiatrist Dr. Nancy C. Andreasen, "will testify that Mr. Moussaoui suffers from a major thought disorder, most likely schizophrenia."

To reach that diagnosis, "she will rely on her analysis of Mr. Moussaoui's writing and his appearances in court."

Martyrdom For Moussaoui? (WP)

By Jerry Markon

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

When Zacarias Moussaoui agreed to plead guilty to terrorism conspiracy charges last year, he told the judge he would accept a death sentence and acknowledged he was headed toward "the gas chamber or the lethal injection."

Two days later, Moussaoui vowed to "fight every inch against the death penalty."

Last week, he seemed to reverse course again, implicating himself in the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist plot when he took the stand at his death penalty hearing. That was before he screamed, "You'll never get my blood!" Monday after jurors found him eligible for execution.

Moussaoui's own words have raised questions about whether he wants to be executed to achieve martyrdom for the terrorist cause that he so passionately embraces. Experts on al-Qaeda and Islam think he does. Moussaoui's flip-flops on the subject make it impossible to be sure.

Yet if the Sept. 11 conspirator is indeed seeking martyrdom, it could have implications inside and outside the courtroom as jurors return to U.S. District Court in Alexandria tomorrow to begin the final phase of Moussaoui's sentencing trial.

When the United States sought death in 2001 for two convicted al-Qaeda terrorists for bombing U.S. embassies in East Africa, jurors voted to spare their lives. Ten jurors noted on the verdict form that executing one of the men could "make him a martyr" for terrorist groups.

In Islamic tradition, martyrdom means dying in a way deserving of paradise. Osama bin Laden believes that can be achieved through suicide operations. An al-Qaeda training manual, introduced as evidence at Moussaoui's trial, states that members must "be willing to do the work and undergo martyrdom for the purpose of achieving the goal and establishing the religion of majestic Allah on earth."

Some legal experts believe that's exactly what could happen if the Moussaoui jury votes to put him to death. "There's absolutely no doubt that executing him would turn him into a martyr," said Bruce Hoffman, who has studied terrorism at the Rand Corp. for 25 years.

Hoffman said terrorist groups have historically seized on martyred comrades for propaganda and to boost recruitment. Moussaoui's execution would have the same impact, he said.

"It's time for our government to be thinking about the wider repercussions," Hoffman said.

Others who track terrorist groups disagreed, noting that testimony from al-Qaeda leaders read at Moussaoui's trial portray him as a troublemaker who couldn't get along with his bosses. "I think some people might attempt to turn him into a martyr but with very little success. Even al-Qaeda cut this guy loose," said Peter Bergen, who has written two books about bin Laden's group.

"He might get the worst of all possible worlds," Bergen said. "He gets executed, which is his desire, and al-Qaeda, because this guy was fairly problematic, doesn't turn him into a martyr for the movement."

Moussaoui, 37, pleaded guilty last year to conspiring with al-Qaeda in the attacks on the World Trade Center and Pentagon. He is the only person convicted in a U.S. courtroom on charges stemming from Sept. 11. After a three-week trial, federal jurors Monday said Moussaoui was eligible for execution, finding that his lies to federal agents when he was arrested in August 2001 allowed the attacks to go forward.

In the trial's second phase, jurors will decide whether Moussaoui should be put to death or remain in prison for life.

The French citizen seemed to embrace execution when he told the government and U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema last year that he intended to plead guilty. At an April 20 hearing, Brinkema reminded Moussaoui that he had notified her two days earlier that he wanted "to accept the death penalty, which seems to be totally contradictory to the position you've taken in the past."

The judge added that Moussaoui had "made reference to the concept of martyrdom," according to a transcript.

Moussaoui responded that he had come to understand that "the course I've chosen will lead me potentially -- you say potentially, I say surely, but it's a matter of opinion -- to the gas chamber or the lethal injection. I understand this fact. I understand life and death."

Two days later, as he pleaded guilty, Moussaoui told Brinkema he had "significantly changed my position following the advice I receive from you. . . . I will not apply for death."

Yet courtroom observers thought that's precisely what Moussaoui was doing March 27 when he testified at his sentencing trial. He calmly told jurors that he wanted to kill every American, starting with what he said was his mission to fly a fifth hijacked airplane into the White House on Sept. 11. He also admitted to the government's key argument against him: that he had lied to the FBI to allow the plot to go forward.

Moussaoui said he knew his mission would be a suicide operation. Richard Bulliet, an expert on Islam at Columbia University, said Moussaoui apparently still wants to be a martyr. He said Moussaoui's testimony against himself fits with the Islamic doctrine of "purity of intent."

"If he dies with his intent clearly stated and pure and devoted to religious goals, then the chances of his being a martyr in his mind are greatly improved," Bulliet said.

Other experts noted that terrorists who go to prison for life, such as Ramzi Yousef -- architect of the first World Trade Center bombing in 1993 -- are rarely heard from again. "Moussaoui could achieve a fame and notoriety in death that eluded him in life," Hoffman said. "In life, he was a failed terrorist."

FBI Resists Easing Rules On Reporting Cash Transactions (WSJ)

By Michael Schroeder

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- U.S. law-enforcement agencies are opposing efforts by the financial-services industry to cut back a federal requirement that banks report cash transactions in excess of $10,000.

A crackdown on money laundering by the federal government in the wake of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks has forced banks to tighten their controls but has also led to complaints that government requirements are too onerous and ineffective in catching terrorists.

The House took that view into account when it passed a broad regulation-relief bill last month, which, among other things, would grant some exemptions from filing the cash reports. The Senate hasn't introduced its version of a relief bill.

At a hearing yesterday before the Senate Banking Committee, the Federal Bureau of Investigation argued that the currency-transaction reports filed by banks provide valuable intelligence in money-laundering and terrorist-financing investigations.

"To dramatically alter currency transaction reporting requirements -- without careful, independent study -- could be devastating and a significant setback to investigative and intelligence efforts," Michael Morehart, the FBI's terrorist-financing-operations section chief, told the panel.

Such viewpoints may sway committee members who seem to want to tread lightly when considering whether to modify bank reporting requirements.

Sen. Paul Sarbanes, the ranking Democrat from Maryland, said law-enforcement officials "laid out a strong rationale for the utility of the reports. We've got to strike a balance."

Stuart Levey, the Treasury Department's undersecretary in the office of terrorism and financial intelligence, recommended that the committee request that the Government Accountability Office do a thorough study about the effectiveness of the reporting program before proposing changes.

The American Bankers Association, which pushed for the House provision, has complained that the number of transaction reports now tops 13 million annually, costing $187 million in wages. The trade group argues that the reporting program is "obsolete" because of new customer identification systems and other suspicious-transaction reporting requirements.

Amnesty Links ‘rendition’ Flights With Torture (FT)

By Daniel Dombey And Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, April 5, 2006

Three Yemeni men abducted and mistreated by the US were probably held in eastern Europe, Amnesty International said in a new report.

A study by Amnesty, based on interviews with the former captives, is intended to cast light on Washington’s practice of “rendition”, or extra-legal abduction, which the human rights group says often paves the way to torture or maltreatment.

Washington insists it never sends detainees to places where they would be at risk of torture – but it also defines torture much more narrowly than do other governments.

The study said Muhammad Bashmilah, Salah Ali Qaru and Muhammad al-Assad were "held in at least four secret US-run facilities...from the information subsequently provided by the men [about the climate, food and prayer schedules] it is likely they were held in Djibouti, Afghanistan and somewhere in eastern Europe".

Both Poland and Romania, named last year as likely centres of CIA "secret prisons" by Human Rights Watch, another campaigning organisation, have denied hosting any such facilities.

Wednesday's report adds that after being arrested and transferred to US custody in 2003, the men were brought back to Yemen in 2005 and released in February this year. Although all were sentenced for forgery in connection with false travel documents, none was charged with any terrorism-related offences. The report also says they had been shackled, kept unaware of their location and not allowed to see daylight for months.

While CIA renditions have stirred controversy in Europe, criticism in the US has been relatively muted, particularly on Capitol Hill. John McCain, the Republican senator who was tortured in Vietnam, pushed through legislation banning torture, but other senior Republicans have avoided the renditions debate.

Patrick Leahy, the senior Democrat on the Senate judiciary committee, and Edward Markey, a Democratic congressman, have introduced legislation that would compel the secretary of state to assure Congress that the administration would only transfer prisoners to countries where it believes they would not be tortured, but the legislation stands little chance of approval.

Jennifer Daskal, advocacy director at Human Rights Watch, says Democrats have been unwilling to push the issue because of the lack of Republican support and concerns they could be painted as soft on national security.

U.S. Resumes Military Trials At Guantanamo Bay (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

GUANTANAMO BAY, Cuba -- The Bush administration resumed military proceedings against suspected terrorists here, one week after the Supreme Court heard arguments in a case brought by a Guantanamo prisoner who claims the secretive courts are unlawful.

Outside the hearing room, the chief military prosecutor took the unusual step of upbraiding Supreme Court Justice Stephen Breyer for a question he asked at last week's oral argument, suggesting that the justice didn't appreciate the gravity of threats facing the U.S.

The hearing yesterday saw a repetition of the interpretation and translation problems that have plagued previous proceedings, as prosecutors said defendant Abdul Zahir hadn't been provided a copy of the charges in Farsi -- his preferred language. Having brought no interpreter of their own to the hearing chamber, prosecutors asked to rely on the defense attorney's Farsi interpreter.

Mr. Zahir, an Afghan said to be about 35 years old, is charged with conspiracy, aiding the enemy and attacking civilians. The Pentagon alleges he joined al Qaeda as a translator in 1997 and later served as a paymaster, propagandist and communications manager. The charges carry a potential life sentence.

The presiding officer, Marine Col. Robert Chester, ordered that a written copy of the charges be provided in Farsi to Mr. Zahir. Mr. Zahir had received the charges in English, Arabic and Pashto, a language related to Farsi. A Pentagon spokeswoman said later that authorities assumed Pashto was his preferred language since he is believed to have come from a province where it is spoken.

Col. Chester, responding to questions raised by Mr. Zahir's Pentagon-appointed defense lawyer, Army Lt. Col. Thomas Bogar, said he was uncertain which domestic, international or military laws might be applied before the military commission, or his view of arguments last week at the Supreme Court.

The Supreme Court decision, expected in June, was also on the mind of the chief prosecutor, Air Force Col. Moe Davis, who at a news conference after the hearing took aim at Justice Breyer.

Col. Davis recalled that Justice Breyer had questioned whether current counterterrorism operations gave rise to nearly unlimited presidential war powers. "Towards the end of the argument Justice Breyer said, in talking about the current conflict, 'This is not a war, at least not an ordinary war.' "

Col. Davis said "the dictionary defines war as being in a state of hostility or a state of armed conflict" and added that "a few hours after Justice Breyer said this is not a war, enemy combatants launched a major attack on coalition forces in southern Afghanistan," leading to 34 U.S., Canadian and enemy deaths.

Pakistani Jailed For Five Years In US Over Missiles To Al-Qaeda Plot (AFP-Y2)

AFP, April 5, 2006

A Pakistani who plotted to peddle heroin and hashish to buy Stinger anti-aircraft missiles for Al-Qaeda or the Taliban has been jailed for nearly five years, US prosecutors said.

Muhammed Abid Afridi, who pleaded guilty in March 2004 to conspiracy to provide material support to terrorists and conspiracy to distribute heroin and hashish, was sentenced Monday in the California city of San Diego.

US District Judge James Lorenz sentenced Afridi to 57 months behind bars, followed by five years of supervised release, for taking part in the conspiracy along with two other men.

Co-conspirators Ilyas Ali and Syed Mustajab Shah, who pleaded guilty to the same charges, are scheduled to be sentenced next Monday and on June 19, respectively.

The trio of conspirators travelled from the Pakistani city of Karachi to Hong Kong on September 15, 2002 to meet with US undercover officers to negotiate for the sale of large quantities of drugs, the indictment showed.

The next day, the defendants agreed that they could offset the purchase price of five tonnes of hashish and 600 kilograms of heroin against the cost of four Stinger shoulder-launched missiles, according to prosecutors.

On September 18, 2002, at a hotel in Hong Kong, the men told the undercover officers they would be able to resell the missiles to the Taliban, who had been swept out of power in Afghanistan, or Al-Qaeda, according to the complaint.

Shah, Afridi and Ali were arrested in Hong Kong on September 20, 2002 by local law enforcement authorities at the request of the US government.

They were indicted by a federal grand jury on October 30, 2002 and extradited to the United States the same year.

The three had initially men denied the charges when they first appeared in court in San Diego.

US authorities have been on a sharp lookout for Stinger missiles which they have warned pose a threat to military aircraft and commercial airlines.

The United States launched its "war on terror" at home and abroad following the 2001 attacks in New York and Washington.

Chief 9/11 Architect Critical Of Bin Laden (LAT)

By Josh Meyer

The Los Angeles Times, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — To hear Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Shaikh Mohammed tell it, Osama bin Laden was a meddling boss whose indiscretion and poor judgment threatened to derail the terrorist attacks.

He also saddled Mohammed with at least four would-be hijackers who the ringleader thought were ill-equipped for the job. And he carelessly dropped hints about the imminent attacks, violating Mohammed's cardinal rule against discussing the suicide hijacking plot.

The repeated conflicts between the two Al Qaeda leaders emerged last week during the penalty phase of the trial of Zacarias Moussaoui, the only person charged in the United States in connection with the Sept. 11 attacks. Jurors heard new details of the plot from the interrogation summaries of several captured Al Qaeda officials, including an extraordinary account of a series of interrogations of Mohammed.

Mohammed described Al Qaeda in a written statement for his U.S. interrogators as an almost mystically efficient corporation that operates in ways Americans would never understand.

The portly Kuwaiti, who had studied engineering in the U.S. and was captured in Pakistan in 2003, told his interrogators that they could learn a lot from Al Qaeda, the organization.

"You must study these matters to know the huge difference between the Western mentality in administration and the Eastern mentality, specifically at Al Qaeda."

The hallmark of the system, he said, was unquestioned control: Everyone up the chain of command did as they were told, didn't ask questions and never bucked authority — all for the common cause of the enterprise, which in this case was killing as many Americans as possible.

"I know that the materialistic Western mind cannot grasp the idea, and that it is difficult for them to believe," Mohammed wrote. "But in the end," he gloated, "the operation was a success."

Yet Mohammed describes a terrorist outfit fraught with the same conflicts and petty animosities that plague many American corporations. Mohammed describes himself in particular as having to fend off a chairman of the board who insists on micromanaging despite not knowing what he was doing.

"[Shaikh] Mohammed stated that he was usually compelled to do whatever Bin Laden wanted with respect to operatives for the September 11 operation," the interrogation summary states. "That said, [Shaikh] Mohammed noted that he disobeyed Bin Laden on several occasions by taking operatives assigned to him by Bin Laden and using them how he best saw fit."

His independence from Bin Laden had its limits, however, because it was Al Qaeda's money and operatives that enabled the plot to go forward.

Mohammed succeeded in rejecting three attempts by Bin Laden to accelerate the plot. But he said his boss canceled an entire overseas element of the hijacking scheme that he was orchestrating.

Bin Laden presumably would have his own version of events. But a former FBI agent who closely tracked Al Qaeda said the testy relationship described by Mohammed was consistent with the accounts of other terrorism suspects in custody.

"They couldn't stand each other," the former official said. "They both had huge egos."

The seeds of conflict were planted at the beginning, when Mohammed first presented his idea in 1996 to hijack U.S. planes and fly them into buildings. He specifically suggested "that they send [mujahedin] to study in the flight institutes and use large planes" rather than the smaller military ones that Al Qaeda operatives were trained in flying.

He was turned away, Mohammed said, because Bin Laden told him the plan was unworkable.

Three years later, Bin Laden summoned Mohammed to Afghanistan and gave him the green light. Soon he moved his family from Pakistan to an Al Qaeda base in Kandahar, Afghanistan, to proceed with the operation.

By October 2000, Mohammed had risen in the ranks and was in firm control of the Sept. 11 plot, showing an array of management skills.

It was Mohammed who decided to send two hijackers to San Diego after coming across San Diego phone books in a local market in Karachi, Pakistan, and determining that it had numerous flight schools and other important amenities.

Mohammed told the two to visit the zoo and other tourist sites so they would blend in while they were taking flight lessons and otherwise preparing for the suicide hijackings.

He told his interrogators he provided "personalized training" to an estimated 39 Al Qaeda operatives for deployment on missions.

And Mohammed revealed some of his management stratagems to his interrogators.

"Simplicity was the key to success," was one of them.

For instance, he told the plot's co-conspirators not to use codes, especially in routine messages or e-mails.

"He asked the operatives to be normal to the maximum extent possible in their dealings, to keep the tone of their letters educational, social or commercial, and to keep the calls short."

Mohammed also delegated tasks. He entrusted much of the communications and finance details to two underlings so he would not have to be in contact with the hijackers while they were in America. And he gave lead hijacker Mohamed Atta the authority over many operational details.

Mohammed said he was a stickler for security. He insisted on compartmentalizing the details of the plot, to such a degree that even some of Al Qaeda's top officials did not know them.

"When four people know the details of an operation, it is dangerous; when two people know, it is good; when just one person knows, it is better," Mohammed said, according to his interrogators.

Had Mohammed not insisted on such security measures, he suggested, Bin Laden might have endangered the whole mission. That's because Bin Laden, an exiled Saudi multimillionaire with a huge trust fund, apparently had a knack for forcing Mohammed to take operatives who couldn't follow directions or keep their mouths shut.

In the earliest stages, Bin Laden told Mohammed to use two of his favored young operatives as lead members of the hijacking team.

Mohammed had concerns from the outset about Nawaf Alhazmi and Khalid Almihdhar, believing the two men would stick out like sore thumbs while living in the United States. Other team members would ultimately be handpicked, he said, for their worldliness, street savvy and other applicable skills.

Alhazmi and Almihdhar had U.S. visas, which helped. But one hardly spoke English and the other spoke none.

"They barely knew how to function in U.S. society," Mohammed told his interrogators. "The only reason they were involved in the 9/11 plot was because they had visas and because Bin Laden ... wanted the two to go on the operation."

By mid-2000, Mohammed moved to kick Almihdhar out of the group because he defied his orders and left the United States for Yemen, leaving Alhazmi alone in San Diego.

But Bin Laden interceded and instructed Mohammed to allow Almihdhar to return to the United States and the hijacking team, he said.

Mohammed also resented a purported 20th hijacker, Mohammed al-Qahtani, imposed on him by Bin Laden, describing him as "too much of an unsophisticated Bedouin to function in a modern society." Al-Qahtani was turned away by a suspicious customs agent in Orlando, Fla., and never joined the mission.

They had repeated disagreements over Moussaoui, whose run-ins with Al Qaeda operatives in Malaysia convinced Mohammed that he was not a "suitable operative," even with his valuable European credentials, which made him less suspicious to U.S. authorities.

Mohammed recalled Moussaoui to Pakistan and asked Bin Laden and top aide Mohammed Atef for permission to expel him from the organization. At the time, Mohammed says, Moussaoui was to be a participant in a second wave of planned attacks to follow Sept. 11.

"Despite [Shaikh] Mohammed's suggestion, Atef and Bin Laden insisted that Moussaoui remain in the program and instructed that the program should continue as planned," according to the interrogation report.

Moussaoui was punished by being sent to a school in Kandahar, after which Al Qaeda leaders pronounced him "reformed," the interrogation summary states.

Mohammed, however, "was not convinced." He grudgingly complied with his orders and sent Moussaoui to the United States for flight training. But he purposely kept Moussaoui in the dark about plot details, and told him never to mention aircraft in any communications.

Soon after he reached the United States, Moussaoui violated the order, sending Mohammed an e-mail detailing his attempts to get flight training on various aircraft.

An "exasperated" Mohammed ordered aides to break off contact with Moussaoui for fear that his indiscretion would tip off authorities about Al Qaeda's presence in the U.S.

By then, it was too late. When arrested in mid-August in Minnesota, Moussaoui possessed enough incriminating information to alert authorities to the carefully orchestrated plot, law enforcement officials would later assert.

He also was found with the home address of a top Al Qaeda chemical and biological weapons expert in South Asia, which triggered a manhunt for the operative and raised scrutiny of travelers from Pakistan to Malaysia, a favorite Al Qaeda pipeline.

Meanwhile, to Mohammed's chagrin, Bin Laden was repeatedly dropping hints about what was soon to come.

In one case, Mohammed said, Bin Laden told visitors to his Afghanistan headquarters to expect a major near-term attack against U.S. interests. In another, he said, the boss asked trainees at the Al Farooq camp near Kandahar "to pray for the success of a major operation involving 20 martyrs."

Both Mohammed and Atef "were concerned about this lack of discretion and urged Bin Laden not to make additional comments about the plot," Mohammed told his interrogators.

The interrogation summary also said he had resisted taking a sworn oath of allegiance, or bayat, to Bin Laden for as long as possible, "to ensure that he remained free to plan operations however he chose."

After Sept. 11, Mohammed finally relented, he said. Even then, he did so grudgingly, after he was told "that the refusal of such a senior and accomplished Al Qaeda leader to swear bayat set a bad example for the group's rank and file."

At His Geneva Shop, Yeslam Bin Ladin Faces Family Trouble (WSJ)

By Glenn R. Simpson

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

GENEVA -- A prominent entrepreneur in this posh Swiss city is seeking to build a luxury-goods business by turning his first name into a new brand: Yeslam.

It's a daunting task. Yeslam's last name is Bin Ladin. His half-brother is the world's most wanted terrorist.

American trial lawyers working for victims of the Sept. 11 attacks are suing Yeslam, along with other members of his family and other wealthy Saudis, for billions of dollars, contending they have hidden financial connections to Osama bin Laden (the surname is sometimes spelled differently). Now Yeslam's ex-wife, Carmen, has joined forces with the Sept. 11 victims' lawyers, as she tries to improve her divorce settlement by exposing her ex-husband's finances.

The lawsuit, which is being heard in lower Manhattan at the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York, is drawing attention to potentially serious allegations against Mr. Bin Ladin. His ex-wife, who has been investigating his assets for years, has given the 9/11 lawyers a long list of offshore companies that she says he runs. In a court filing, she claims that "the bin Laden family including Yeslam and Osama were very close" -- and that his complex finances, also a focus of police investigators in several countries, support suspicions that the half-brothers have had financial ties.

In an interview and in court statements, Mr. Bin Ladin says he barely knows Osama, and hasn't seen his half-brother in more than 20 years. He hopes to extricate himself from the 9/11 lawsuit, which seeks to establish who gave clandestine support to Osama after he declared war on the U.S. in 1996.

Behind the legal battle is a family drama that illustrates Yeslam's unusual position in the secretive Bin Ladin clan. Born in Saudi Arabia and educated in the U.S., the 56-year-old Yeslam has long struggled to straddle the cultural divide between his native Saudi Arabia and the West.

His failed marriage to the Swiss-born Carmen was the subject of her 2004 book, "Inside the Kingdom," a best-seller in the U.S. Their eldest daughter, who goes by the name Wafah Dufour, is an aspiring pop musician and model in New York who recently posed for a risque photo shoot in GQ magazine. She has signed with Regan Media, a division of News Corp.'s HarperCollins Publishers, to star in a proposed American reality television show about her life. The show hasn't yet been picked up by a network.

The setting for much of the family contretemps is Geneva, a city favored by rich Saudis who patronize its discreet banks. Mr. Bin Ladin sometimes bumps into his daughters on the Rue du Marche, Geneva's pricey main street. He says those encounters are cordial, but he acknowledges that his daughters were once denied admission to a posh party he hosted. Mr. Bin Ladin and his daughters have seldom spoken in recent years. Each side blames the other for the estrangement.

Mr. Bin Ladin says he leaves the fighting to his lawyers and focuses on his various ventures, which include backing films and mounting a huge soiree at the annual film festival in Cannes. "I am having fun," he said during a recent Friday visit to his Geneva boutique. Clean-shaven and clad in a casual sport jacket, Mr. Bin Ladin was conducting business during the day of rest for observant Muslims, while fingering worry beads, a traditional Arab practice.

The Yeslam shop offers expensive perfume, handbags, sunglasses and watches by European designers largely geared to a wealthy Arab female clientele. Yeslam handbag models are named for historic Muslim cities including Jedda and Riyadh.

"Conjugating the historical sophistication of the orient with the demands of today's world," reads the glossy Yeslam catalogue. Mr. Bin Ladin trademarked his first name. A European court turned down Mr. Bin Ladin's effort to trademark his last name, saying it would be "contrary to public policy."

Mr. Bin Ladin is one of 54 children of a construction magnate who made billions of dollars building palaces and other projects for the Saudi royal family. Yeslam married Carmen in 1974 and graduated from the University of Southern California three years later. They settled in Switzerland in 1985.

Since their divorce in 1994, Carmen has pursued her ex-husband through the Swiss courts, seeking a larger divorce settlement than the one that pays her and her three daughters support of about 9,000 Swiss francs, or about $6,900, a month. In an interview, she says she originally agreed to that amount in exchange for a promise from Yeslam not to take their girls to Saudi Arabia.

Last week, a Swiss federal court rejected Ms. Bin Ladin's appeal of the existing settlement. She says she now hopes to go through the U.S. legal system to pressure her ex-husband to revise the settlement.

Ms. Bin Ladin claims to have discovered 76 offshore companies with connections to her ex-husband in the Bahamas and other tax havens -- claims that corporate records support. She says in her affidavit in the 9/11 case that 11 of the companies are U.S. businesses -- which could make it hard for Yeslam to convince the court that he isn't subject to U.S. jurisdiction. She says Mr. Bin Ladin has more than $100 million in assets.

Mr. Bin Ladin says all his companies are legitimate and no longer do business in the U.S. He says his net worth is in the low tens of millions of dollars. His defense lawyers have asked a federal judge to reject Ms. Bin Ladin's affidavit as hearsay. "I have not talked to my ex-wife since 1994. How would she know anything?" Mr. Bin Ladin scoffs.

The controversy is taking place amid police investigations involving Mr. Bin Ladin. Since 2003, he has been the subject of money-laundering and terrorism-finance inquiries by police in Italy and France, according to documents obtained by the NEFA Foundation, a terrorism-research group funded by private donations that works with the 9/11 families.

Mr. Bin Ladin said he has already been cleared by the Swiss government of ties to terrorism after a massive 2002-2003 inquiry and knows of no other investigations.

The French and Italian investigators have complained that the Swiss government isn't cooperating with their inquiries, Swiss government records show. One Italian police letter alleges Mr. Bin Ladin has a secret immunity deal with the Swiss government. Swiss prosecutors wouldn't comment on the subject of Mr. Bin Ladin. Mr. Bin Ladin dismissed the Italian claim, saying, "If I had immunity, I would not have had 80 policemen in my place" during a 2002 Swiss raid.

Mr. Bin Ladin says he hasn't been involved with Osama in any way since the early 1980s. Italian police think otherwise. They are investigating alleged dealings among Yeslam, Banca Svizzera Italiana, and a Switzerland-based, Saudi-founded investment firm called Dar Al Mal. A 2005 Italian financial-police memo from Milan claims the bank "has been sort of a hidden patrimonial manager of the activities linked to Osama bin Laden and his lieutenant Ayman al-Zawahiri."

Banca Svizzera declined to comment, citing Swiss bank-secrecy laws. Dar Al Mal said neither Osama nor Yeslam is a client but that another relative was once on its board. Dar Al Mal said it isn't under investigation by Italian police.

Yeslam Bin Ladin acknowledges family connections to Banca Svizerra and Dar Al Mal. "I have a brother who works with them," he said, declining to say which one. "All I can say is, it's not me."

FBI Agent Says He Had Basis For Questioning Terror Suspect (SACBEE)

By Denny Walsh, Bee Staff Writer

The Sacramento Bee, April 5, 2006

An FBI agent agreed Tuesday in federal court testimony that he asked leading questions during a videotaped confession of Hamid Hayat, a Lodi man charged with terrorism, but the agent said those questions were based on previous statements by Hayat.

Special Agent Gary Schaaf testified that, immediately before he interviewed Hayat on June 4, he had been in an adjacent room observing the questioning of Hayat by another agent. That prior interview, which was not recorded, gave him ideas on areas to pursue with Hayat, Schaaf said.

In addition, the agent testified, he was familiar with the contents of many hours of secretly recorded conversations in 2002 and 2003 between Hayat and Naseem Khan, a former fast-food and mini mart worker operating undercover for the FBI.

For example, when questioned by Hayat's attorney, Wazhma Mojaddidi, Schaaf acknowledged that, while interviewing Hayat, he used the word "jihadi" before Hayat did.

But Assistant U. S. Attorney S. Robert Tice-Raskin developed during his examination of Schaaf that Hayat, in the earlier interview observed by Schaaf, told of a brief stay at a "jihadist camp" in Pakistan in 2000 and a longer stay at a similar Pakistani training facility in 2003.

Schaaf agreed with Mojaddidi that he mentioned Hayat's use of bus transportation to get to the camps before Hayat did.

On the other hand, Schaaf later agreed with Tice-Raskin that he was watching while Hayat told Special Agent Harry Sweeney that he used buses to get to both camps.

Schaaf acknowledged that he first said the camps were "teaching people how to kill American troops," and Hayat agreed. But, the agent testified, the subject initially came up in the interview conducted by Sweeney.

Schaaf said he was the first to name some radical Islamic groups in Pakistan while interviewing Hayat, but Hayat had discussed the groups in an admiring way in recorded conversations with Khan. Through his questioning of Schaaf, Tice-Raskin also made the point that Hayat did not adopt the premise of every question put to him by agents in the videotaped interview.

"He didn't simply say 'Yes, yes, yes' to everything you asked him, did he?" the prosecutor asked Schaaf.

"No," the agent replied.

The back and forth grilling of Schaaf came in the eighth week of dual trials of Hayat, 23, and his 48-year-old father, Umer Hayat. They are being tried on terrorism-related charges in the same courtroom before separate juries. Only the jury hearing the evidence in the Hamid Hayat case was in court Tuesday.

Hamid Hayat is charged with supporting terrorism by undergoing training in Pakistan and returning to Lodi in May to await orders to wage violent jihad against enemies of Islam in the United States.

He is also charged with initially lying to the FBI to conceal his training and intentions.

Umer Hayat is charged with initially lying to the FBI to cover for his son and to hide his own firsthand knowledge of terrorist training in his native Pakistan.

The Hayats, both U. S. citizens, have pleaded not guilty.

Alleged Terror Camp Is A Military Training Center, Defense Witness Testifies (LODINS)

By Layla Bohm, News-Sentinel Staff Writer

Lodi News-Sentinel, April 5, 2006

SACRAMENTO — The terror training camp a Lodi man allegedly attended is a Pakistani military training center, a humanitarian said today, as he testified about visiting the area in February.

James Lazor was called as a defense witness for the case of Lodi resident Hamid Hayat, who is charged with lying to the FBI and attending a terrorist training camp.

Later today, prosecutors revealed that an informant who had befriended Hayat while secretly recording their conversations has suddenly found another tape that was never given to investigators or attorneys. The informant, Naseem Khan, will return to the witness stand later this week.

Lazor was on an independent humanitarian mission to earthquake victims in Pakistan when Hayat's defense team asked him to visit the camp.

Lazor agreed and, while taking blankets and school children's letters to earthquake victims in northern Pakistan, he made a detour to follow geographical coordinates, he told a federal jury today.

When he arrived there Feb. 17, the Washington, D.C., man said today, he was turned away by a uniformed man who identified himself as a sergeant in the Pakistani military.

"He introduced himself and was really polite. He said it was a military camp that wasn't open to the public and that the whole ridge was controlled by the military," Lazor said outside a Sacramento courtroom where Hamid Hayat's federal trial is being held.

He'd just told jurors something similar, though prosecutors objected to him saying that the camp was run by Pakistan's military. Judge Garland E. Burrell Jr. ordered that part of the testimony stricken from the record, but jurors had already heard it. More than once during his testimony, Lazor said it was a military training camp.

A powerful earthquake devastated parts of northern Pakistan last fall, leaving many people with no homes or belongings. Lazor is friends with a journalist whose publication had received letters from people wanting to donate money, so the friend asked Lazor if he could go to Pakistan and give victims 250 blankets.

Lazor, whose wife is a political appointee for the U.S. Department of Labor, had run an aviation business that deported illegal immigrants from America, and he agreed to make the trip. He took letters from school children in Illinois and San Diego — some of whom have already gotten responses — accepted $500 in pay from Hayat's defense, and then paid for all other expenses.

Lazor landed in Islamabad, then headed to Balakot, one of the places Hayat had told FBI agents was home to a terror training camp. Armed with a global positioning system, Lazor tracked down satellite coordinates of a camp prosecutors have identified in trial.

Whether the camp was under military control in 2003, when Hayat allegedly went there, has not been confirmed in court. An FBI agent earlier testified that there is no proof, other than Hayat's statements during hours of interviews, that he attended a training camp.

Hayat, 23, is on trial with his father, 48-year-old Umer Hayat, who is charged with lying to the FBI. The case is being heard by two juries. Only Hamid Hayat's jury was in court today.

Hamid Hayat's defense attorney, Wazhma Mojaddidi, has maintained that her client only told the FBI things he believed they wanted to hear. Today, she questioned agent Gary Schaaf, one of several agents who took turns interviewing the young man last June.

Mojaddidi read small portions of interview transcripts, pointing to what she said were countless leading questions. For instance, when Schaaf told Hamid Hayat that at a camp "there's clearly weapons training, there's clearly explosives training," the Lodi man replied: "Yeah."

The attorney continued: "And it was you who first mentioned killing Americans before Hamid Hayat ever did, correct?"

Schaaf said she was correct.

Then, on cross examination by Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Tice-Raskin, Schaaf said most of the things he had mentioned to Hamid Hayat had already been discussed between the young man and another agent.

Tice-Raskin singled out lines in the transcript where Schaaf questioned Hamid Hayat, who then asked for clarifications or disagreed.

Ultimately, the matter will be up to the jury, which has been hearing the case since mid-February.

After jurors left for the day today, attorneys discussed the new evidence that surfaced over the weekend, when informant Naseem Khan was going through items in his home and found the tape.

The taped telephone conversation is about 20 minutes long and was marked Oct. 13, 2002, about two months after Khan met Hamid Hayat.

Khan started working for the FBI in December 2001, but didn't befriend Hamid Hayat until the following summer.

Defense attorneys have questioned his credibility, especially since he first told the FBI that he'd seen Osama bin Laden's right-hand man in Lodi in 1998 and 1999, and the government has since said it has no proof of that claim.

Defense attorney Johnny Griffin III said in court that he wants to know why Khan didn't give the tape to the FBI more than three years ago, and Mojaddidi said outside court that it bolsters the defense claim.

"That just puts a lot of things into question," she said.

Hayat "Terror" Camp May Be Military Facility, Witness Says (KXTV-TV)

KXTV-TV, April 5, 2006

A man on a humanitarian mission in Pakistan says what the U.S. government thinks is a terrorist training camp may actually be a Pakistani military facility.

"I was at the right location. I'm 100 percent sure of that," said James Lazor, a witness for the defense in the terrorism trial against Lodi's Hamid Hayat. Last month, Lazor was in Balakot, Pakistan searching for the camp and says he encountered Pakistani soldiers when he got close. When he spoke to one of them, Lazor said, "He was a military guy, no doubt in my mind."

Hamid Hayat, 23, is accused of training at a terrorism camp. Prosecutors claim his description of the area and the camp matches satellite images showing a complex of buildings tucked in the mountains of Pakistan's northwest Frontier Province.

Defense lawyers say Lazor's testimony disputes that. "Their expert sat on the stand and stated that in looking at the images that it cannot be a military camp, and he is clearly wrong," said Wazhma Mojaddidi, who represents Hamid Hayat. "The proof is in that the government is not able to, with all its resources, produce one person whoever went there. Us as the defense, we were able to find someone to go there, and he came back and reported what he saw."

Lazor testified that he went to Pakistan this past February, taking blankets to victims of the earthquakes as well as letters from California children to deliver to Pakistani children. He's a private citizen who went there on his own after speaking to friends about the needs of earthquake victims.

The defense would not reveal how they discovered Lazor was going there, but he agreed to try to find the terrorist camp armed with maps, a global positioning system device and the coordinates provided by defense attorneys.

Lazor said when he went up the trail and was about a mile and a half away, he was approached by a military-type vehicle. "I was stopped by a sergeant from the Pakistani military who said the area wasn't open to civilians and said it was a Pakistani military camp I would not be allowed access to," said Lazor. "He was polite and respectful. I mean if he was a terrorist it would've been a completely different scenario."

Lazor, who lead off Tuesday's defense witnesses, said he did very little research on the Hayat case before he went on his quest in Pakistan last month. "I went with an open mind," he said.

Also taking the stand was FBI agent Gary Schaaf, one of the agents who interrogated Hamid Hayat which was videotaped after Hayat claimed he attended training at the terrorist camp. Under defense questioning, he acknowledged that he often asked Hayat leading questions during the interview. Schaaf said he, not Hayat, was the one who first mentioned weapons and explosives training and the possibility someone would travel by bus to get there.

Besides the charge of training for terrorism, Hamid Hayat also faces three counts of lying to federal agents. The key evidence against him is his videotaped confession, along with secret tape recordings between him and a paid FBI informant, Naseem Khan.

On Wednesday, the trial for Hayat's father, Umer Hayat, resumes. The older Hayat, an ice cream truck driver from Lodi, is charged with lying to federal officials about his son's alleged involvement in terrorism.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Responsibility For Defending Nuclear Plants Is Debated (NYT)

By Matthew L. Wald

New York Times, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON, April 4 — A House subcommittee heard clashing testimony on Tuesday about who was responsible for defending nuclear power plants against terrorist attack, and whether the combination of private guard forces and police agencies was adequate.

A spokesman for the nuclear industry said that terrorist threats were greater than the commercial security forces at reactors could handle, and that the industry was therefore justified in lobbying against some security requirements that the Nuclear Regulatory Commission had considered.

But another witness said that there was no one else in position to respond to large threats.

After the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission redefined its requirements for the attacks that reactor owners must be prepared to defeat, known as the design basis threat, but the commission backed off some of its early ideas after industry objections.

At the hearing on Tuesday, which examined the adequacy of reactor security, the subcommittee chairman, Representative Christopher Shays of Connecticut, said, "There's an assumption that the design basis threat will protect the plant, and therefore the public." But he said he believed that the security requirements were eased "because we've made a decision that it's not practical to meet what may in fact be a very realistic threat."

The Government Accountability Office released a report at the hearing that said that the commission's process had created the appearance of a government agency submitting to industry pressure. But three members of the commission testified that that was not so.

Marvin Fertel, a vice president of the Nuclear Energy Institute, said the design basis threat was "not the full spectrum of threats," but merely what the regulatory commission believed that power companies "ought to be able to, with high assurance, win at."

Among the elements the commission decided not to put into the design basis threat were terrorists with .50-caliber sniper rifles and rocket-propelled grenades, according to testimony Tuesday. It also does not require the plants to defend against airplane attacks like those of Sept. 11; Mr. Fertel and Nuclear Regulatory Commission witnesses said the industry was in close touch with the nation's air defense command, and, if warned, could quickly take steps to lessen the impact of an attack.

He added that the nuclear industry was working with the Department of Homeland Security to improve reactor security and that, by law, companies with reactor licenses were not required to defend against "enemies of the United States."

A Nuclear Regulatory Commission witness said that provision had been written to allow the licensing of a reactor in southern Florida without obligating the utility to defend against Cuban fighter planes.

Another witness, Danielle Brian, the executive director of the Project on Government Oversight, a nonprofit group in Washington that has issued reports about security lapses at government and civilian nuclear plants, said industry officials wanted the rocket-propelled grenades and sniper rifles removed from the official threat because they claimed it was too expensive to defend against them.

"The result of this process is a completely unrealistic design basis threat that reflects not what intelligence experts say is realistic, but what industry is willing to pay for," she said.

Ms. Brian said that assembling a SWAT team and getting it to a plant site would take at least 90 minutes while a terrorist assault would succeed or fail within eight minutes.

But another witness, Christopher M. Crane, the president and chief nuclear officer of the Exelon Generation Company, the nation's largest power plant operator, said money was not the issue.

"We are not an industry overly driven by profits, and we have not pushed back very hard," he said. The industry has spent over $1.2 billion on security since the Sept. 11 attacks, Mr. Crane said. "Show one other sector that's put anywhere near that money into it," he said.

U.S. Security Czar Says Beijing, Washington Close To Pact On Repatriating Migrants (AP)

By Joe McDonald

AP, April 4, 2006

BEIJING (AP) -- Washington and Beijing are close to reaching an agreement that could lead to the repatriation of thousands of illegal Chinese immigrants in the United States, U.S. Secretary of Homeland Security Michael Chertoff said Tuesday.

Chertoff also said he would recommend implementing new X-ray technology to screen U.S.-bound cargos at foreign ports after seeing a successful pilot program in Hong Kong.

There are about 39,000 Chinese citizens in the United States who have been rejected for immigration but whom Beijing is refusing to accept, said Chertoff, whose agency oversees immigration. China has cited uncertainty about their identities.

After talks this week with Chinese officials, "I think we have reached a meeting of the minds and a common approach on the issue of repatriation of illegal migrants with China," he told reporters.

Chertoff said he was "sufficiently confident" the two sides have made progress that one of his deputies was staying in Beijing to work on details of a possible final agreement.

Chertoff met with Luo Gan, the member of China's nine-man ruling Standing Committee who is responsible for law and order, as well as ministers of public security, justice and civil aviation.

A Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman said Beijing wants to stop illegal migration but wants to confirm the identities of Chinese detained in the United States before accepting their repatriation.

"The Chinese government is resolutely opposed to ... illegal immigration," spokesman Liu Jianchao said. "First of all, we have to identify those illegal immigrants and based on that, China is willing to receive the repatriation of illegal immigrants."

Chertoff's Asia tour also took him to Japan and Singapore.

In Hong Kong, he toured a port where two companies are using new screening technology that takes high-definition X-rays of cargo and checks for radiation. The screening is designed to help intercept nuclear weapons and other possible terrorist threats.

"I'm going to suggest that we get to the stage of implementing some kind of proposal to put into effect a combination of this X-ray technology and this radiation technology at the ports of embarkation," Chertoff said.

The secretary said he and Chinese officials also discussed American visa restrictions imposed after the Sept. 11 terror attacks that Chinese students, businesspeople and others complain have blocked them from obtaining visas.

Some American companies say the increased difficulty in obtaining visas has hurt their business by blocking Chinese customers and employees from traveling to the United States.

"We are working on a program to streamline visas, expand the amount of time you can spend in the country on visas and try to make the entry process a little bit more efficient and a little more warm and cozy," Chertoff said.

Court Crafts Scheme To Break Deposition Impasse In Sept. 11 Suits (LAW)

By Mark Hamblett, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, April 5, 2006

Frustrated by the government's approach to protecting sensitive security information, a federal judge has crafted a compromise so depositions can proceed in earnest in the litigation against airlines and airports over the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks.

Southern District of New York Judge Alvin K. Hellerstein said he had to intervene "to avoid further and unnecessary delay in the progress of these cases and relieve counsel of the inherent conflicts and artificial roles" that the position of the Transportation Security Administration has created for plaintiffs lawyers.

The judge's ruling in In Re September 11 Litigation, 21 MC 97 and 21 MC 101, concerned the refusal of the Transportation Security Administration to attend depositions of the airline defendants in the litigation -- and require that defense lawyers be charged with safeguarding the security information.

The TSA intervened in the cases, which involve family members of Sept. 11 victims who opted to proceed to court instead of applying to the federal Sept. 11 Victim Compensation Fund.

The transportation administration intervened to protect what is called Sensitive Security Information -- information about security plans and procedures of the airports and airline industry.

Instead of attending the depositions, Hellerstein said, the TSA "seeks to impose on defendants' counsel the obligation to object and prevent answers that might disclose SSI," which the judge called a "strange and significant phenomena."

Counsel for the plaintiffs objected to the transportation administration's proposal, saying it would handicap their ability to aggressively pursue their cases. They also worried it might be hard to figure the applicability of sensitive information to conditions of airline security as they existed in 2001.

"Defense counsel also express concern about exposure to civil penalties if they and their witnesses fail to protect SSI," the judge said. "Plaintiffs press to proceed, citing lengthy delays, and pointing out that many of their counsel -- all those who would be taking depositions -- were cleared by TSA to obtain access to SSI pending TSA authorization of such disclosure."

The plaintiffs opposed a TSA plan that would allow them to put questions to witnesses, but not hear the answers to those questions until the administration determined that the answers could be given.

Initially, the airline and airport defendants turned documents over to the Transportation Security Administration in three groups beginning in late 2003. TSA reviewed the documents and then produced them to the defense counsel, albeit slowly, the judge said. The agency did not complete its review of the first and second waves of documents until late last year.

But two years after the agency began reviewing documents, the judge said, it "retreated" from its initial position and said it would not conditionally disclose sensitive security information material to precleared defense counsel.

He pressed for the sides to negotiate a protocol to break the impasse, but negotiations dragged on.

Hellerstein then directed the plaintiffs to serve defendants notices that they would be asking for testimony on four "critical" areas: "the warnings and information supplied to the U.S. carriers by the Federal Aviation Administration about the threat of hijackings, including terrorist hijackings, prior to Sept. 11," airport passenger screening procedures, "the so-called 'common strategy' in the event of a threatened hijacking," and, finally, the identity of documents submitted to the Transportation Security Administration to determine whether they contain sensitive security information.

But the agency's proposed final orders for the depositions had defense counsel concerned that they would be placed in conflict because government regulations might prohibit disclosure, and yet disclosure might be in the best interests of their clients.

'DIRECTLY RELEVANT' MATERIAL

In a letter last month to the court, defense counsel said "much of the what the TSA has identified as SSI is directly relevant to the exclusive standard of care governing their conduct on Sept. 11, 2001 and is at the heart of their defense."

For their part, plaintiffs wrote last month that "it would be an unconstitutional burden to impose upon counsel the responsibility to 'guess' what answers might involve disclosure of SSI at the risk of statutory and regulatory penalties."

If TSA declines to attend depositions, they argued, the agency should be deemed to have waived any objections to the answers provided by witnesses.

But the agency countered that regulations expressly charge those entrusted with security information to safeguard it from "unauthorized disclosure."

Hellerstein said the proposed alternatives by the Transportation Security Administration "fail to allow plaintiffs to engage in the back and forth so essential to establishing a claim in negligence." So he fashioned a plan whereby cleared plaintiffs' counsel may ask witnesses questions in the normal fashion and the witnesses will be defended by counsel "entitled to read and hear SSI," either under the regulations or by special clearance.

Two transcripts will be made and the agency will have 30 days to determine whether the answers are SSI. Answers that are SSI will be redacted from the second copy of the transcript. The first copy, which will reflect the agency's determinations of security information, will be considered a "final determination" subject to appeal, and a copy will be filed under seal.

"By opting out of the Victim Compensation Fund, the litigants currently before me have necessarily assumed the risks inherent in litigation," Hellerstein said. "But they could not reasonably have foreseen that they might be barred by administrative fiat."

And while the task of the Transportation Security Administration might be "formidable," he said, "the severity of the task may not serve as an excuse for barring plaintiffs from asserting the claims allowed them by law."

Marc S. Moller of Kreindler & Kreindler is liaison counsel for the plaintiffs. Desmond T. Barry of Condon & Forsyth is liaison counsel for the defendants. Elizabeth Goldman represents the TSA.

Homeland Security Pay Plan Goes Forward, But Unions Are Wary (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

The Department of Homeland Security is moving ahead with its plan to change how it evaluates and pays employees, even as it tries to fend off unions in court.

The pay changes and the court case are separate issues, but the union litigation has altered the department's timetable and injected some uncertainty into how far Homeland Security can go in changing some key workplace rules.

Gregg Prillaman , chief human capital officer at the department, said the litigation "has essentially compressed" the schedule for converting employees from the traditional civil service system, the decades-old General Schedule, to a performance-based system. "Instead of moving people onto it quicker, it is going to be slightly slower," he said.

The litigation is scheduled to resume tomorrow, when the unions, led by the National Treasury Employees Union, and the government make oral arguments before a federal appeals court.

The NTEU, contending that the new rules would gut collective bargaining in the department, won the first round last August. U.S. District Judge Rosemary M. Collyer ruled that the department's plan would put the unions on "quicksand" when trying to negotiate the terms of contracts, and she blocked new labor-management rules.

Although the unions have focused their legal efforts on stopping the department's new work rules, they also are wary of the new pay system, contending that the government has a poor track record in creating performance-based management systems that are viewed as fair and credible by workers.

The Bush administration, however, thinks the across-the-board raises provided through the General Schedule do not permit agencies to make distinctions among employees and thwart efforts to give higher raises to top performers.

In keeping with a 2002 law, Homeland Security is designing a pay system that will provide employees with raises more closely tied to their occupations and geographic location. The best workers will also receive higher raises that reflect their job performance. Employees who are deemed unsatisfactory will be at risk of not getting a raise.

The new pay system, when in place, will cover as many as 85,000 civil service employees, with a substantial number in jobs related to law enforcement. One goal of the new system is to more rigorously link annual pay raises to job performance ratings.

The initial rollout will involve 18,000 to 20,000 employees who are not covered by union contracts. Under the plan, managers, supervisors and nonunion employees will move to a new pay system, featuring broad salary scales based on occupations, next January.

In the second phase, 60,000 to 65,000 employees, including most employees covered by union contracts, will convert to the new pay system in January 2008.

Prillaman said that about 2,000 Homeland Security managers have received training on a new system for evaluating the job performance of employees and that up to 5,000 additional managers will be trained.

"The plan is not to go out and do massive harm to employees of this department. Quite the contrary," Prillaman said. "It is to give them a clearer picture of how they succeed and better recognition for that success. It is not a Machiavellian plot.

"In the end, the department's goal is the same as the employees' goal," he said. "You want to be able to have high-quality people in the organization who succeed in their job and want to stay for the long run. That is what employees want, and that is what the department wants."

Take Back The Towers (NYT)

By Dennis Smith

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

THE effort to rebuild the World Trade Center site continues to go nowhere. The planned memorial lacks start-up money and faces public indifference. Those behind the proposed museum have not shown that they have any clear idea how to represent the memory of a day of murder, pain and loss. And most important, there is no real government-business-real estate coalition supporting the commercial plans of the Lower Manhattan Development Corporation and the developer Larry Silverstein, who holds the lease.

We've reached a stage where the state and local government, so often the causes of delay, are the only players with the ability to move things forward. It is time for them to invoke their trump card: the takings clause of the United States Constitution.

To understand why, consider how all facets of the project have reached the point of inertia. Those behind the memorial, centered on its two reflecting pools, have still not satisfied the public or the politicians on several aesthetic questions.

For example, the memorial must display the names of those who died at ground zero, the Pentagon and Shanksville, Pa., as well as those killed in the 1993 attack on the twin towers. But to the consternation of many (perhaps most) of the 9/11 families, the designers seem determined to place the names haphazardly, and without reference to time or place of death.

The debate over the names points to a larger problem: many in the artistic community seem unable to accept the influence that the families of the victims have among the public. Until the designers understand the role of the families and that they are building over a tomb — bodies of hundreds of the 2,749 who died there were never recovered — the project will languish. As for the museum, the most obvious setback was the disastrous decision to have it house the controversial International Freedom Center, which was eventually reversed by Gov. George Pataki. But since then, another series of seemingly intractable issues has arisen: the footprint space and exhibition areas have been reduced, there are problems with handicapped access, there have been warnings that crowd movement could be dangerous in an emergency and, most important, Alice Greenwald, the director, has yet to say what specifically the museum will contain.

Finally, of course, there is the problem of financing. It is too late to say that the money should have been raised before the design of the memorial and associated projects was accepted. But it seems clear that corporations and individual benefactors are reluctant to pony up the half-billion dollars needed for an effort with so many unanswered questions attached to it.

There is only one way to move forward: Mayor Michael Bloomberg and the City Council should send a home-rule message to Albany and demand the confiscation of the World Trade Center site under the eminent domain clause. At a time when counties and municipalities across America are seizing houses and small businesses to build shopping malls just to increase their tax bases, there are plenty of justifiable reasons — included lost tax revenues — to demand the return of ground zero.

Is taking the site legally practicable? "As long as the land were used for public purposes such as monuments, museums, or other public buildings, it can certainly be condemned under the U.S. Constitution," says Vicki Been, a professor of real-estate law at New York University Law School. "Even if some (or most) of the land were transferred to private parties to build commercial or residential space, the Supreme Court has held that such economic development is a public purpose."

The alternative — waiting for the current players to get their act together — makes no sense. Even if the project were to regain momentum, the plan is to build 10 million square feet of commercial space that is not only unneeded but will also mostly fail to rent. The Freedom Tower will be an eyesore as well as a terrorist target, and few will want to work there.

Mayor Bloomberg has recognized the financial folly of such large-scale building in an area that needs careful neighborhood development. With his business skills and political savvy, he is the natural choice to become chief engineer and contractor of a smaller, smarter, more appropriate ground zero.

Four decades ago, the 12 blocks that form the trade center site were taken through eminent domain from a group of electronics merchants and other small-business owners. That was David Rockefeller's idea, and his brother Gov. Nelson Rockefeller made it happen. Now it is up to Governor Pataki to give Mr. Bloomberg a similar opportunity. Ground zero does not belong to the Port Authority or the Lower Manhattan Development Corporation or Larry Silverstein. It is our property. We should get it back.

Senate Panel Adds Billions To Bush Plan For Storm Relief (NYT)

By Leslie Eaton

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

Spurred by an influential Mississippi Republican, the Senate moved yesterday toward adding billions of dollars to the Bush administration's $19 billion hurricane relief request, which was approved by the House last month.

DOJ_NMG_0025529

The additional money, voted by the Senate Appropriations Committee, means that Louisiana will most likely retain all of the $4.2 billion that the House approved for home rebuilding. Texas and Mississippi had been expected to vie for a share of those funds, but the provisions adopted by the committee yesterday, adding about $8 billion in hurricane relief that would also help other programs and states, heads off such a battle.

The committee is led by Senator Thad Cochran of Mississippi, who added considerable aid for his state. The legislation includes $700 million to relocate a privately owned freight rail line in Mississippi, $1.2 billion for a pilot program favored by Mississippi's governor to replace trailers with cottages and $1 billion in block grants that are likely to go to Mississippi and Texas.

Quite apart from hurricane relief, the committee, at the request of Senator Byron L. Dorgan, Democrat of North Dakota, also added to the bill $4 billion to help farmers hurt by drought and high energy costs. Other provisions would provide more than $2 billion for fighting avian flu and $648 million for improving port security.

All this money is now part of a $106.5 billion supplemental spending bill, passed by the committee yesterday, the bulk of which — roughly $68 billion — is to pay for the war in Iraq. Like the House, the Senate committee included special funds for armored military vehicles.

The full Senate is likely to take up the bill after returning from a recess that begins at the end of the week. Eventually the additions, should they be approved on the floor, will have to be negotiated with the House. But some senators are pledging to fight the ballooning supplemental appropriation, which they say should be used for emergency spending only.

The chairman of the Senate Budget Committee, Judd Gregg, Republican of New Hampshire, said in a statement that he believed the bill should be cut back to the $92 billion requested by the administration and approved by the House. But Mr. Gregg also said he planned to try to amend the bill to increase spending on border security by more than $1 billion, and to pay for that increase by paring spending that is not related to hurricane relief or the war.

Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco and other Louisiana officials, who had converged on the Capitol to lobby for recovery money, expressed satisfaction with the Senate bill.

But they continued to demand that the Bush administration come up with a formal plan to rebuild the levees around New Orleans, a project that administration officials said last week would cost $6 billion more than originally projected by the Army Corps of Engineers.

The Senate bill added more than $600 million to the $1.5 billion the House approved for levees and flood control projects on the Gulf Coast, and called on the administration to make a formal request to Congress for that money; without the request, Louisiana officials say, the complex rebuilding process will stall.

Senator David Vitter, a Louisiana Republican, asked the administration for action, saying his state "cannot afford additional months of stonewalling with a new hurricane season right around the corner."

Mary L. Landrieu, the state's Democratic senator, went further, threatening to hold up all of the administration's executive appointments until progress is made on finding enough money for the levees. In a letter to President Bush, she called the condition of the levees "a life-or-death situation" for Louisianians.

"The people of Louisiana have waited so long for accurate numbers, for construction of levees and for adequate funding for housing rebuilding," she said at a news conference at the Capitol. "We simply cannot wait much longer."

The new spending bill also includes increased financing to cover the costs of educating students displaced by Hurricane Katrina, a provision that would mostly benefit Texas, where the largest number of such students wound up. At the behest of Senator Kay Bailey Hutchison, Republican of Texas, $10 million for law enforcement in the state was added, as was money for universities and colleges damaged by last year's storms.

Landrieu Threatens Blanket Holds To Get Levee Funding (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen

The Hill, April 5, 2006

Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.) threatened yesterday to hold President Bush's executive-branch nominees hostage until the administration agrees to a series of demands that would increase funding for coastal Louisiana.

In a letter sent to Bush yesterday, the Louisiana Democrat threatened to place holds on the president's nominees, raising the prospect that the Senate could be tied in knots as Bush tries to fill a variety of vacancies, including the top jobs at the Interior Department and the Office of Management and Budget.

"Because this is literally a life-or-death situation for the people of my state, I am compelled to notify you that I will exercise my power as a member of the Senate to stop further consideration of all executive appointments until significant progress is made on such a request and commitment," Landrieu wrote.

She is looking for an additional $6 billion for levees, flood control and coastal restoration in Louisiana — and the president's commitment to use "the full weight of the office of the president" to pursue that money, a plan for coastal restoration and a federal revenue-sharing arrangement for receipts from Outer Continental Shelf drilling.

The price tag matches the new figure the administration has said would be needed to bolster Louisiana's levee system to the point that the area would be eligible for federal flood insurance. A $95 billion supplemental spending bill marked up by the Senate Appropriations Committee yesterday already contains about $2 billion for the Louisiana coast.

Senators have been able to block nominations — or legislation — indefinitely by using the informal "hold" procedure. Senate Republican leaders could circumvent holds on nominations by calling for cloture, but each nomination would require a separate cloture vote. That could add days to the timeline for each nomination.

But the likelihood of high Senate floor drama was not yet clear yesterday. "Historically, a blanket hold does not necessarily accomplish the goal [or goals] set out for it when deployed," said Eric Ueland, chief of staff to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.).

"Mr. President the piecemeal approach that has marked your administration's response to providing adequate levee and flood protection for Louisiana has not worked," Landrieu wrote. "It needs to be replaced by a comprehensive approach that is both more effective and cost-efficient."

Louisiana lawmakers have run into strong resistance from conservative Republicans on recent requests for Gulf Coast funding. The conservatives argue that new money for the region should be offset by budget cuts.

With singular purpose, Landrieu has begged, bargained and beguiled in search of federal assistance for Louisiana since Hurricane Katrina devastated the Gulf Coast last summer. Yesterday, she promised to up the stakes for the administration.

"It's the leverage I have," Landrieu said.

She hinted that she has other arrows in her quiver but did not specify what other means she might have to put pressure on the president or the GOP-led Senate.

Landrieu did not rule out offering a floor amendment to the supplemental appropriations measure on the floor to accomplish her goal, but her aides said it would be difficult to get the money without backing from the White House.

Last month, Landrieu was the only Democrat to vote for the budget resolution, after she struck a deal with Frist and several senior Republicans that would provide $10 billion to Louisiana for similar purposes if a number of conditions are met.

But many lawmakers and aides have cast doubt on the prospects of final adoption of a conference report on the budget this year. The House is scheduled to vote on its version of the legislation this week.

"Money spent on levees and flood control today will save the federal government billions in the future by eliminating the need for costly post-storm recovery and rebuilding in areas that were not adequately protected," Landrieu wrote. "The people of my state cannot wait any longer. We can no longer rely on promises. We need action, and we need action now."

As for Landrieu's threat, Ueland said Frist will not prematurely "cross any bridge."

For Gulf Towns, Anxious Wait On Flood Plain Status (CSM)

By Patrik Jonsson

The Christian Science Monitor, April 5, 2006

BURAS, LA. - The Buras water tower is still on its side where hurricane Katrina pushed it over as though it were a LEGO toy. Schools are still closed. Water treatment is nonexistent.

Sure, a few determined survivors have returned to battered Plaquemines Parish, which looked like an inundated shrimper after sustaining four levee breaks.

But for most, the decision of whether to return is becoming more complex. Buras - and other towns in lower Plaquemines - may face a tougher road toward rebuilding if maps expected to be released this week determine that they are ineligible for federal flood insurance.

At issue: the original levees, though repaired, have proven unworthy against Katrina-size storms, and cost estimates for bolstering them have tripled, to $9 billion. That makes the maps a key to the recovery riddle, since they will guide rebuilding and factor in developers' calculations. The situation is testing the pride of Louisiana's original parish. And it's shedding light on how rebuilding will occur in the most stormwracked corners of the Gulf Coast, as communities compete for levee improvement funds.

"I need schools to send my kids to, I need a church to follow my faith, and Buras is getting none of that," says Lynda Banta, a parish councilor living in the largely unaffected Belle Chasse area. "Somebody's decided we're expendable."

This finger of gnat-infested lowland, where the levees flicker into view on both sides of the Belle Chasse highway around refineries and orange groves, is the home of oil-rig workers, refinery roughnecks, and oystermen. Some can trace their Italian, French, and Slavic heritages through the bayous for centuries. For towns like Triumph, Nairn, Venice and Port Sulphur, it's crunchtime for recovery.

The Army Corps of Engineers completed its first repairs on the Plaquemines levees on March 17, bringing them up to their original height and bolstering them with sturdier clays. But a harsh prospect overshadowed its restoration.

"Another Katrina would overtop this levee," said Army Corps of Engineers Col. Lewis Setliff during a press conference near the Empire Lock in Nairn, La.

Plaquemines, which comprises the mouth of the Mississippi, dates back to 1682, when the French explorer Rene-Robert Cavelier, Sieur de La Salle stuck a cross into the silty lowlands nearby. But since the levees and subsequent suburbs were built in the mid-20th century, the area has experienced a rough stretch in the past 40 years, as hurricanes Betsy, Camille and Katrina (the worst of all) threatened to return it to swampland.

Reinforcing the lower levees of Plaquemines would cost $3 billion for an area with less than 2 percent of the southern Louisiana population. In contrast, nearby Algiers contains 13 percent of the region's population, but the cost would be $129 million to storm-certify its levees.

Moreover, only 1,000 out of 14,000-odd people that lived in the lower part of Plaquemines Parish have returned. Statistics like that have given momentum to comments by some politicians that parts of the region should be returned to the swamps.

"It's easy for people from the outside to say that the decision seems simple: it's not a good place to live, so don't go back," says Jeanne Hurlbert, a sociologist at Louisiana State University in Baton Rouge. "Plaquemines is a place like many in southern Louisiana where the communities are strong, multigenerational, and where you're asking people to give up a way of life in a place where they've always lived."

But by focusing simply on levee height, government engineers and politicians may be missing an opportunity for "broader thinking," says David Daniel, president of the University of Texas at Dallas and the chair of an external levee review committee organized by the American Society of Civil Engineers.

After all, one local high school, destroyed by hurricane Camille, was rebuilt on stilts. It survived Katrina intact. High-ground evacuation sites and "armored" levees that would not break even while overtopped may enable areas like lower Plaquemines to endure another major storm. Some of the stilts may have to be 35 feet high, however.

"You may design for the mother of all storms and you get the grandmother of all storms," says Dr. Daniel. The committee's much anticipated risk analysis for the region is expected June 1 - the kickoff date for the new hurricane season.

FEMA Trailer Park Fails To Survive Storm From Residents (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, April 4 — A mayoral election is less than three weeks away, and the sympathy of elected officials for the irritations of voters in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina is boundless.

As a result, there will be no trailer park in Lakewood Estates, a collection of solid, spacious homes behind a high locked gate in the Algiers section.

Last weekend, angry residents of the neighborhood took to the street to protest a trailer park being built on their doorstep by the Federal Emergency Management Agency for 34 single women and their children who were left homeless by the hurricane. FEMA, their signs proclaimed, was "raping" their neighborhood.

Construction was already well along — some 20-odd trailers are already in place on the dusty lot — but fortunately for the residents of Lakewood Estates, campaign season is also well along.

Mayor C. Ray Nagin, habitually relaxed in his reactions, wasted not a moment this time. On Monday morning, with news of the residents' uprising in the local media, Mr. Nagin called a news conference.

"I'm very upset about it," he said. The contractor had "disrespected" citizens. FEMA had "bullied" city workers. Enough was enough. "This is unacceptable," the mayor said.

The disputed trailer park was now history, Mr. Nagin said. And so, for the moment, were all other trailer sites in the city, whose construction the mayor proclaimed "suspended."

The residents of Lakewood Estates had won. FEMA, though, said it was puzzled, especially since the Algiers trailer site had been approved by the mayor months ago, said Darryl Madden, an agency spokesman. All the necessary building permits had been obtained, Mr. Madden said.

A lawyer for the city declined to comment, citing a pending suit by the residents. City documents disputed the assertion that the building permits had been obtained, but a City Hall news release indeed confirmed "that this particular Algiers site was not removed from the original list."

Seven months after the hurricane, fights over where to house its displaced victims continue. Up and down Louisiana, but particularly around New Orleans, residents and local officials have taken action against the incursion of displaced city residents — overwhelmingly black — who are portrayed as bearers of crime and bad living habits, and as destroyers of property values.

Some of the most virulent opposition has occurred in the victims' own backyard. Last December Mr. Nagin backed away from a list of proposed city sites after expressions of outrage. Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco was forced to intervene here late last year, when officials could not agree on where to put the trailers.

And by the end of last year, 32 of Louisiana's 64 parishes had banned these trailer sites. Only eight had approved them unconditionally.

If these flare-ups are less frequent than before, FEMA says the need for temporary housing is nonetheless as great as ever. In New Orleans, where the agency has set up nearly 10,000 trailers, 109 sites await Mr. Nagin's approval, the agency says. He has already approved more than 100 such sites, some 17 of which are occupied. FEMA says about 12,000 requests for trailers are pending in the city, with new ones coming in all the time.

"I think it's appalling and I think it's yet another example of 'not in my backyard,' " said William P. Quigley, director of the Gillis Long Poverty Law Center at Loyola University and a litigant on behalf of hurricane victims, speaking of the Algiers site. "The people of New Orleans have been made more welcome across the U.S. than they have been in their own hometown."

The sudden loss of the Algiers site is a sharp blow, Mr. Madden said. "This was going to be a location where we were going to be able to place 34 displaced families, at a time when placing families is important," he said.

"The fact is, we have been working on this site since the mayor approved it," Mr. Madden said. "For this decision to be made at this juncture jeopardizes our effort to provide housing to displaced citizens in the aftermath of Katrina."

Security cameras watch the entrance of Lakewood Estates, and a sign proclaims "24-hour camera surveillance in progress." The collection of trailers sits on a two-acre plot on one side of a low wall, a humble contrast to the substantial, well-landscaped dwellings on the other side.

"If you look at this facility, it looks like Guantánamo," said the protest leader, Edward D. Markle. He was still furious at FEMA, though the site appears dead, for now. "It's bad," Mr. Markle said. "You've got a thousand locations that are better. I won't be able to take a bath without them seeing me."

He suggested that a much larger plot of land, across the road and away from the homes, would have made a far more suitable location.

"It's not an issue of we don't want them in our backyard," Mr. Markle said. "We invite them in our backyard. We just don't want them in our bathrooms and bedrooms."

No Hands On Deck (NYT)

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

You can't get anyone to take over as captain of a ship that's already sinking. That's the message top candidates are sending the administration about the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

As Eric Lipton reported in Sunday's Times, many of the leading candidates for the post of FEMA director have taken themselves out of the running. Normally high-profile positions like that are sought after, even fought over. But no one seems to want to take over the rudderless agency after the mess that followed Hurricane Katrina.

The lack of interest in the job represents a significant vote of no confidence in FEMA's future by leading experts in the field. Clearly, the administration won't be able to plug just a few holes at the top and expect the agency to heal itself. President Bush needs to set a clear agenda for reform and make tangible commitments on the agency's future role.

To start, FEMA's personnel troubles go much deeper than one open position. Mr. Lipton reported that 11 of the 30 most senior jobs at the agency were filled on an acting basis — including the administrators for operations, disaster recovery and disaster response. This is hardly a recipe for providing the clarity, the sense of purpose and, most of all, the sense of stability this agency needs.

It would be a mistake to simply make the acting director, David Paulison, the permanent chief, as the administration is expected to do. That would create the impression that this crucial government function was being handed over to the only person willing to take it on. Administration officials need to tackle the real impediment to finding a new director: uncertainty over FEMA's role and future.

First they need to answer a central question. Is FEMA an agency of accountants or emergency responders? Is it there to provide financial reimbursement or boots on the ground during disasters? The answer should be: a little bit of both. Most of the time, FEMA helps local and state governments after a crisis has passed. But in the largest catastrophes, when local people are as overwhelmed as they were after Hurricane Katrina, the other role — managing the response to a major disaster — is called upon. Those are the areas officials are trying to improve after the botched response to Katrina.

FEMA has suffered upheaval in recent years, not least because it went from being an independent cabinet agency to being one piece of the huge homeland security bureaucracy. Katrina exposed major failings that the agency is trying to address. Trying is nice, but as the chairman of the House appropriations panel for homeland security, Harold Rogers, put it last week, "Another failure is not an option."

Hurricane Prediction: Busy, Again (USAT)

By Patrick O'Driscoll

USA Today, April 5, 2006

This year's hurricane season is likely to be very active, though not as bad as last year's record-shattering barrage on the Gulf Coast, a leading U.S. prediction team said Tuesday.

The latest 2006 forecast by the Tropical Meteorology Project at Colorado State University envisions a higher potential for intense hurricanes to strike the East Coast. The report's "landfall probability" outlook sees a 64% chance that a major hurricane — Category 3 or higher, meaning sustained winds of at least 111 mph — will hit that region this year. That's more than double the 31% average probability over the past century.

The central Gulf Coast — Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama — devastated last year by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita rates a 30% likelihood for a major hurricane. That, too, is twice the 15% average during the previous century.

The new forecast arrives as New Orleans, southern Louisiana and the Mississippi coast struggle to rebuild and reinforce against more hurricanes. Katrina alone inflicted $80 billion in damage, caused more than 1,330 deaths and displaced hundreds of thousands of Gulf Coast residents.

Forecast co-author William Gray, dean of the USA's hurricane scientists, said last year's onslaught was made more destructive by strong steering currents of Atlantic air that guided more major hurricanes to land. It is too early to predict how such air patterns may develop this year.

Co-author Phil Klotzbach said two more factors affect the outlook: still-warm water in the Atlantic, especially in the north, and the absence of an El Nio pattern in the Pacific. Wind currents caused by El Nio, a warming of equatorial waters of the Pacific, can disrupt or cut off Atlantic storms as they blow west.

Klotzbach and Gray foresee 17 named storms this season, which runs from June through November. That's nearly twice the average of 9.6 storms a year from 1950 to 2000 but well below last year's record 27 storms, 15 of them hurricanes (winds 74 mph or more). There were so many storms in 2005 that the National Hurricane Center's alphabetical list of names ran out in October, and the center had to use Greek letters to refer to later storms.

The forecast expects nine of the 17 storms to become hurricanes, five of them major. Long-term average is about six per year, two of them major.

Although the tropical Atlantic isn't as warm as last year, temperatures have stayed warm in the North Atlantic for several years, Klotzbach said. When that happens, he said, "you tend to see more landfalls on the East Coast."

U.S. shores north of the Carolinas and Virginia haven't been hit by a major hurricane for decades. Last month, AccuWeather.com, a private service, predicted that one could strike in the Northeast, including New York City, perhaps even this year. "The Northeast is staring down the barrel of a gun," AccuWeather forecaster Joe Bastardi warned.

Klotzbach and Gray say the Atlantic is in an extraordinarily active cycle that began in the mid-1990s and could last another two decades. "From 1995 to 2003, we had a lot of (tropical storms) but very few landfalls," Klotzbach said. "There were 32 major hurricanes during that span, but only three made landfall as majors."

That has changed dramatically since. In the past three years, seven of 13 major hurricanes have struck land. "We were very, very lucky for nine years," Klotzbach said, "and we've been very, very unlucky for the last three."

In A Year Of Catastrophic Loss, Insurers Saw Record Gains (LAT)

By Peter G. Gosselin

The Los Angeles Times, April 5, 2006

The companies that provide Americans with their homeowners and auto insurance made a record $44.8-billion profit last year even after accounting for the claims of policyholders wiped out by Hurricane Katrina and the other big storms of 2005, according to the firms' filings with state regulators.

Top executives described the profit — an 18.7% increase over the previous year — as a fluke, the product of gains in other lines of insurance besides homeowners and a very good year for their investments.

They said that even with the increase, insurers face deep problems that can be fixed only by substantial premium hikes, a scaling back of commitments by several firms to the most disaster-prone portions of the country and, according to some, a greatly expanded role for the state and federal governments in insuring individuals against the largest of catastrophes.

"Unless insurers can get relief, you're going to see a pullback by the private industry," warned Robert P. Hartwig, chief economist of the industry-funded Insurance Information Institute.

"We're not being good stewards of our investors' capital or our policyholders' surplus if we keep doing business where we can't make money."

In fact, the property casualty insurance industry, which provides homeowners and auto coverage, made a considerable sum despite paying tens of billions of dollars to policyholders as a result of Katrina, which is widely described as the largest insured disaster in U.S. history, and a string of other storms.

Besides boosting profits, the industry raised its surplus by more than 7% to nearly $427 billion, according to an analysis of company filings by the National Assn. of Insurance Commissioners, which represents regulators from the 50 states. The surplus is intended to provide a financial cushion in times of high claims.

The industry covered virtually all of its claims and expenses with premiums earned during the year rather than with surplus funds, according to the organization's analysis. The ratio of claims and expenses to premiums was among the lowest in three decades.

The question is: How, in a year that produced an estimated $56.8 billion in disaster losses, nearly twice the previous record and more than twice what insurers paid after the Sept. 11 attacks, is this possible?

The answer, in part, is that U.S. insurers purchased disaster insurance of their own before the 2005 storms, much of it from overseas firms. Executives said that half — and by some estimates, nearly two-thirds — of the insured losses from last year's hurricanes ultimately will be borne by so-called reinsurers, many based in Bermuda and Europe.

In part, it's because of what Hartwig called the "anomaly" of so much of the 2005 storm damage being caused by flooding, which private insurers don't cover and instead rely on Washington handles through the national flood insurance program.

But the industry's remarkable performance also reflects a dozen-year effort by insurers to insulate themselves from the most extreme financial consequences of catastrophe by, among other things, shifting risks previously borne by companies to policyholders and the public.

The effort started after the last big batch of natural disasters in the early 1990s, among them Hurricane Andrew in Florida in 1992, and the Oakland Hills firestorm in 1991 and Northridge earthquake in 1994 in California.

The effort has included industry adoption of increasingly sophisticated techniques for analyzing catastrophic risk, as well as self-imposed limits on how much firms will cover and where. It also has included successful campaigns to get states or state-created entities to shoulder such dangers as earthquakes in California and wind in Florida, Texas, Hawaii and elsewhere. And it has involved tightening policy language — by, for example, narrowing the definition of "replacement cost" for homes — in ways that leave individuals bearing more of the burden of putting their material lives back together after trouble strikes.

While premiums for homeowners insurance have increased by more than half since the early 1990s, coverage, especially in disasters, has shrunk. Historically, insurers covered a little more than 60% of total losses in disasters, according to Hartwig, the industry economist. During the 2004 hurricanes in Florida, they covered less than 50%, according to Hartwig's numbers. During Katrina, he said, they covered about 30%, due in part to the high flood damage.

In making these changes, the insurance industry has been part of a trend that has picked up steam as the U.S. economy has grown more competitive in recent decades — a shift of financial risks from business and often government to individual households.

"If last year's hurricane season had occurred 10 years ago, it would have been devastating for the company," said Allstate Vice President Fred F. Cripe in an interview. "Last year, it was merely disappointing."

Despite evidence of industry success in reducing its financial exposure in disasters, major insurers — most prominently Allstate — have announced a new round of risk-limiting steps, including approving no new homeowners policies along substantial stretches of the nation's East and Gulf coasts. Several have called for creation of state and federal funds to serve as financial backstops for the industry in the biggest disasters.

The new proposals have drawn fire from a wide variety of quarters.

George K. Bernstein, appointed by President Nixon as the first administrator to oversee the government's flood, riot and crime insurance programs, said that private insurers had already pulled out of other risky lines of business.

"There's not going to be much left that they do insure by the time it's all over," he warned.

California Insurance Commissioner John Garamendi said: "The insurance industry is running away from risk, and leaving policyholders holding the bag."

Among those policyholders are Robert and Denise Sebastian, whose two-story brick house at 326 Bellaire Drive in the sedate Country Club Gardens section of New Orleans flooded after the walls of one of the city's major canals gave way during Katrina.

Sebastian, a 52-year-old official with the federal Minerals Management Service, has filled three loose-leaf binders with correspondence and phone notes from his efforts to collect more than $450,000 he believes his family is owed by St. Paul Travelers and Encompass Insurance, an Allstate subsidiary.

He has managed to get about half of that amount, but only after repeated clashes with the companies and returning several small checks proffered as full payment. Despite what he says is evidence of roof damage and leaking, Encompass recently denied his claim for $100,000, saying damage was due to flood or settlement and therefore was not covered by his policy.

"My wife and I are both lawyers," said Sebastian. "We've put every bit of our wherewithal into pursing these claims, and we're still not settled after seven months.

"I wonder what happens to the grandmother in Gentilly."

To be sure, Katrina and last year's other big storms dealt body blows to some insurance companies. Mississippi's No. 2 insurer, Mississippi Farm Bureau Mutual Insurance, went broke after paying $450 million in claims, and is being dissolved, according to state officials. PXRE Reinsurance Co., a subsidiary of Bermuda-based PXRE Group Ltd., has been forced to explore "strategic alternatives," according to a recent statement, after storm-related claims and expenses outstripped premiums by nearly 1,000%.

In addition, the final chapter has not been written for several insurers, including State Farm Fire and Casualty Co., USAA and Nationwide Mutual Insurance Co., because of lawsuits filed on behalf of Mississippi policyholders by prominent lawyer Richard Scruggs and the state's attorney general, Jim Hood.

Both charge the firms with wrongly denying claims for Katrina-related wind and water damage. In Hood's case, he argues that the standard provisions of homeowners policies excluding flood coverage are ambiguous. But company lawyers say the policies are clear. Industry analysts think that the plaintiffs stand little chance of succeeding, and that even if they do, the results will not fundamentally alter the companies' finances.

Among insurers, the consensus is that the industry is in the best shape it has been in years. Some argue against tampering with success.

"We've been through some of the worst natural disasters and man-made catastrophes in our history, and had some of the best earnings in the last 20 or 30 years," said Frank W. Nutter, president of the Reinsurance Assn. of America, a Washington trade group.

Nutter accused companies that are calling for major changes in coverage and creation of public backstop programs of engaging in "a risk-shift strategy of moving risks off their books onto government and policyholders." Members of Nutter's group stand to make big profits from major insurers stocking up on reinsurance to guard against fresh catastrophes. Reinsurers are said to have raised premiums by 100% or more since last year's storms.

Other industry executives insist they are simply trying to protect their companies and the public.

Hartwig, the industry economist, and Cripe, the Allstate vice president, said that insurers' greatest concern is that the number and intensity of big storms hitting the U.S. coast have risen and are likely to stay high for years to come. They said that although the industry easily handled the costs of the last two years of hurricanes, a similar pummeling during the next few years would deplete its finances.

As evidence of the change, the pair noted that seven of the 10 most costly hurricanes in U.S. history occurred during the last two years. And they cited the recent announcement by a leading disaster modeling firm, Risk Management Solutions Inc. of Newark, Calif., that chances of devastating storms making landfall are dramatically higher than it previously predicted.

RMS executive vice president Paul VanderMarck said in an interview that the firm's decision to switch from using 100-year averages to looking at just the past five years in forecasting storms, and the resulting jump in its prediction of big storm losses along the East and Gulf coasts, was based solely on new scientific knowledge, for example on rising ocean temperatures, and the views of an expert panel.

But critics said that the change was the product of pressure from insurers seeking to justify rate hikes and that, in any case, it represented an unfair changing of the rules by the industry.

"The companies came in after the early 1990s disasters and told us, 'We're going to start using these long-term models that are going to have periods of intense activity and periods of no activity," said J. Robert Hunter, who was Texas insurance commissioner at the time and is now insurance director at the Consumer Federation of America. "They wanted us set the rates so that it would even things out across the highs and lows, and we agreed," Hunter said.

"Now they're coming back," he continued, "and saying 'Oops! We got it wrong; we're going to change the model.' That reneges on the deal."

The state's current commissioner, Mike Geeslin, had similar sentiments: "You have companies that say they have a plan to stay put year in and year out, and gather a large share of the market. Then they decide they have more risk than they can stomach."

The result, Geeslin said, is that the state must either "prop them up" with rate hikes and other concessions, or step in and take their place.

Industry executives offer a second argument for drastic change that goes well beyond altered weather patterns and focuses especially on the need for federal and state backup for insurers. They suggest that the combination of rapid real estate development and rising home prices so raise the risk of gargantuan loss in a hurricane that much of coastal America has become virtually uninsurable by private industry.

In a recent speech, Allstate chief executive Edward M. Liddy painted a vivid picture of how a tightly packed set of storms could erase first the profits, then potentially the financial stability, of an insurer in a quick blast.

"When Hurricane Andrew hit the coast of Florida in 1992," Liddy told a Washington audience in January, "it wiped out all of the profits Allstate ever made in the state from all lines of insurance over the course of our history.... And when four hurricanes hit in 2004, they wiped out all the profits from 1992 to 2004.

"That's not a viable economic proposition for a company," he told his audience. "It's not a viable economic proposition for an industry."

Without government backup, he seemed to be saying, Allstate and other companies would have little business reason to continue offering insurance of any sort.

But a quick check of Allstate's regulatory filings from the mid-1990s through 2004 showed that the insurer earned $6 billion more in premiums in Florida than it incurred in losses. Add to that the premium earnings for last year, and the total rises to more than $6.6 billion.

Asked about what happened to that sum, Allstate spokesman Mike Trevino responded: "What Mr. Liddy meant to say is that ... the four hurricanes wiped out all the profits Allstate earned from our homeowners line of business," not all lines.

Overall, the company made money.

Foreign Experts Critique U.S. Red Cross On Katrina (NYT)

By Stephanie Strom

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

The American Red Cross's response to Hurricane Katrina was poorly planned, relied too heavily on inexperienced managers and often failed to meet the needs of victims, say reports by international Red Cross officials who were dispatched to assist their American counterparts.

The unusually harsh reports, prepared in late summer and the fall, detailed mismatches between the needs of victims and the supplies the Red Cross had arranged, the absence of a plan to guide the distribution of supplies and a lack of record-keeping, which allowed inventory to go astray.

"What is clear is that the basic needs of the beneficiaries are not being met," Mike Goodhand, head of the international logistics division of the British Red Cross, wrote on Sept. 15.

The reports, which were provided to The New York Times by a former American Red Cross official who insisted on anonymity, closely echo concerns raised by volunteers in the disaster area.

Those concerns are now the subject of a wide-ranging investigation by the American Red Cross that has already produced evidence of possible criminal misconduct by volunteer managers. The F.B.I. and the Louisiana attorney general are also conducting inquiries, seeking to determine whether relief supplies were stolen.

The Red Cross, which had 235,000 volunteers in the field after Hurricane Katrina, received roughly 60 percent of the $3.6 billion that Americans donated for hurricane relief.

Mr. Goodhand's report described a case in which victims in Mississippi, where his team had been sent, were requesting prepared meals and the only food that Red Cross volunteers could offer was bananas. Volunteers driving out into neighborhoods were asked for water and juice, but had only bleach on hand, he wrote.

"All efforts to address the situation were rebuffed," Mr. Goodhand wrote. He said that when his team offered its expertise on distributing supplies, it was instead assigned to hand out the supplies, work that could have been done by less experienced volunteers.

On Sept. 12, two weeks after the hurricane, his team did what he described as "a nonscientific but representative and valid" assessment of what victims were saying they needed. The most requested items were juice; Gatorade; feminine hygiene, general hygiene and household cleaning products; and insect repellent. The team found none of those in the warehouse.

"The demand for these items is entirely predictable," he wrote.

Senator Charles E. Grassley, the Iowa Republican who heads the Senate Finance Committee and has been pushing for an overhaul of the American Red Cross, called Mr. Goodhand's report, which he obtained independently, "very sobering reading."

"The report and similar findings from whistle-blowers make it clear that there is a significant need for deep, substantial reform at the American Red Cross," he wrote in an e-mail message to a reporter.

Mr. Goodhand's assessment, and a similar one by Thomas Riess, a German logistics expert with the International Committee of the Red Cross, were filed in September with the authors' home agencies, the American Red Cross and, in Mr. Goodhand's case, a number of other Red Cross agencies. While they did not allege criminal wrongdoing, they warned of the potential for it.

"The insufficient control on deliveries allows, without any effort, to unlawfully appropriate" supplies, Mr. Riess wrote on Sept. 12.

Mr. Riess's report also incorporated the observations of logistics experts from Red Cross organizations in Colombia, Ethiopia, Jordan and Russia, while Mr. Goodhand's included those of officials from the Red Cross agencies in Finland, the Netherlands and Spain. Current and former Red Cross officials said the language was far more pointed than is common in such reports, which are routinely filed when foreign Red Cross organizations participate in a disaster relief effort.

Armond T. Mascelli, vice president for response operations at the American Red Cross, said the organization was already working to address the concerns raised by the foreign experts.

For the coming hurricane season, Mr. Mascelli said, the Red Cross is striving to better its positioning of supplies and to find ways to improve delivery of necessities like food and water. For the longer term, he said, the agency is seeking the expertise of its corporate supporters to transform its rather simple distribution operation into a comprehensive system of supply chain management.

"Our plan is to do what we can that is reasonable for this hurricane season," he said, "but also look at what we put in place in the future to take care of catastrophic events."

Sir Nicholas Young, the chief executive of the British Red Cross, who coincidentally was at American Red Cross headquarters in Washington yesterday, said Mr. Goodhand's report provided a snapshot of what had happened in a small part of the disaster area and was not a commentary on the American Red Cross's overall response.

"What Mike's report in fact reflects is that he was working in Biloxi with one chapter with paid staff and with volunteers who didn't necessarily have the logistics skills they needed," Sir Nicholas said.

Both reports strongly praised the Red Cross volunteers. Mr. Riess wrote that he was "impressed by the motivation of volunteers and by the deep generosity of the American people." Mr. Goodhand called the volunteer corps "one of the best, if not the best, any of us have experienced."

But both also criticized the American Red Cross for assigning volunteers to tasks for which, the reports said, they were unprepared. For example, Mr. Goodhand said a volunteer in charge of managing a fleet of more than 100 vehicles did not know where cars and trucks were, why they had been dispatched or who had them.

Mr. Riess warned that a lack of accountability, resulting from a weak system of tracking inventory, threatened to damage relations with victims and donors alike.

"Critics may rise," he wrote, "and attract the unwelcome interest of journalists."

Counterparts Excoriate Red Cross Katrina Effort (WP)

By Jacqueline L. Salmon

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

Two international Red Cross organizations issued scathing criticisms of the American Red Cross's chaotic response to Hurricane Katrina, accusing the charity of approaching the relief effort with a "dangerous combination of ignorance and arrogance."

The reports -- by the British Red Cross and the Geneva-based International Committee of the Red Cross, which sent experts to the Gulf Coast shortly after Katrina struck -- say their American counterpart was ill-prepared for the disaster, relied on inexperienced volunteers in key positions and had an ineffective system for moving supplies to where they were needed.

The reports continue the drumbeat of criticism of the charity, which has escalated in the months since hundreds of thousands of Gulf Coast residents flocked to Red Cross shelters and relief trucks after Katrina struck.

The nonprofit group, which collected more than $2 billion in donations for the disaster, has been criticized for responding too slowly, neglecting some areas and treating minorities with insensitivity.

Official scrutiny of the charity's Katrina response escalated last week when federal law-enforcement authorities and the Louisiana attorney general launched criminal investigations.

The reports by the British Red Cross and the ICRC were prepared in September after teams of logistics experts from both organizations worked with the American Red Cross in Biloxi, Miss., and Montgomery, Ala.

But the American Red Cross didn't release them until yesterday, after The Washington Post asked the British Red Cross for a copy.

Yesterday, British Red Cross chief executive Sir Nicholas Young sought to play down the reports' harsh tones.

"When you've got a disaster of this magnitude . . . I can well understand that it's not possible to be absolutely on the top line in some areas," he said. "It's just too big."

But his organization's report, written by logistics chief Michael Goodhand, dismissed American Red Cross officials' protestations that they were overwhelmed by Katrina's size.

"The scale of impact of Katrina may have exceeded expectations," said Goodhand's report, "but the week's notice of her arrival gives ample time for contingency plans to be in place."

In vivid detail, the reports lay out problems that plagued the relief effort. They said the Red Cross did not track donated goods it took into its warehouses and had few effective systems for figuring out which goods were needed where.

As an example, the ICRC report by logistics coordinator Thomas Riess cited a truckload of donated pastries that went moldy because they were not refrigerated and a large quantity of donated radios without batteries that was dumped in an Alabama warehouse.

The British report warned that as long as the Red Cross relies on volunteer labor, its disaster response will "remain amateurish and their services to those affected sub-optimal."

Yesterday, American Red Cross officials said they took the reports seriously and, as part of an overhaul of disaster operations, are redesigning their supply-chain system with the help of corporations.

WAR NEWS:

Rice Dismisses Talk Of U.S. Bases In Iraq (AP-Y2)

By Liz Sidoti

AP2, April 4, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Tuesday brushed aside suggestions that the United States wants an indefinite troop presence and permanent military bases in Iraq.

"The presence in Iraq is for a very clear purpose, and that's to enable Iraqis to be able to govern themselves and to create security forces that can help them do that," Rice told the House Appropriations Committee's foreign operations panel.

"I don't think that anybody believes that we really want to be there longer than we have to," the chief U.S. diplomat added.

However, Rice did not say when all U.S. forces would return home and did not directly answer Rep. Steven Rothman (news, bio, voting record), D-N.J., when he asked, "Will the bases be permanent or not?"

"I would think that people would tell you, we're not seeking permanent bases really pretty much anywhere in the world these days. We are, in fact, in the process of removing base structure from a lot of places," Rice replied.

"I can't foresee the future of whether or not there will be some need for American forces for some period of time," she added. "But I can tell you that our discussions with the Iraqis are about getting them capable to defend, not just against their internal insurgency and internal enemies, but also to be able to be a responsible and defensible state within the region."

Earlier Tuesday, President Bush urged Iraq to move quickly to form a unity government, calling on elected leaders "to stand up and do their job." He said the formation of a new government would give Iraqis confidence in their future.

Bush's statement, during a brief question-and-answer session with reporters at the White House, came on the heels of a similar admonition by Rice during a visit to Iraq. She had spoken of a "sense of drift" nearly four months after Iraqis held parliamentary elections.

Bush said insurgents were using violence to prevent democracy from taking hold. "One way to help bring confidence to the Iraqi people that those few will not be able to determine the future of that country is for there to be unity government that steps up and says, 'I'm willing to lead.'"

On Captiol Hill, Rice testified before the House panel just hours after returning to the United States from a weeklong trip to Europe that included a surprise detour to Iraq. She and British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw met with nearly all of Iraq's squabbling factions for two days of diplomatic talks.

Republican and Democratic lawmakers increasingly are questioning just how long U.S. troops will remain in Iraq, especially given what appear to be construction projects at military bases Iraq and polls that show Iraqis believe the United States plans to keep permanent bases in their country.

Iraq's interim prime minister, Ibrahim al-Jaafari, has said he opposes permanent foreign bases. American public opinion is against them as well.

Last month, Bush said that American forces will remain in Iraq for years and it will be up to a future president to decide when to bring them all home.

DOJ_NMG_0025539

Appearing before the House subcommittee, Rice defended U.S. efforts to rebuild Iraq's essential services, such as electricity, even though progress has been hampered by security problems. She said the United States has made important investments in rebuilding the structures to provide such services.

"We believe that they will pay off," she said.

However, Rice acknowledged problems with security as well as "some corruption problems in some of the ministries." She said the United States is urging Iraqi officials to correct the issues so that reconstruction can proceed unhampered.

Rice also:

_Defended the United States' efforts to help Afghanistan eradicate poppy crops and the Bush administration's public plan to invest $75 million into U.S. democracy programs aimed at strengthening ties with the Iranian people.

"On this one I don't think speaking softly about the democracy problem in Iran is really the appropriate course. I think we do have to be very public about it," Rice said.

_Said it would be helpful for the African Union to "put its full weight" behind putting together a U.N. peacekeeping force in the war-ravaged Darfur region.

"There are sometimes mixed signals from the African Union about how they view this. There are sometimes mixed signals out of the Arab League about how they view this," Rice said.

Democracy In Iraq Not A Priority In U.S. Budget (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

While President Bush vows to transform Iraq into a beacon of democracy in the Middle East, his administration has been scaling back funding for the main organizations trying to carry out his vision by building democratic institutions such as political parties and civil society groups.

The administration has included limited new money for traditional democracy promotion in budget requests to Congress. Some organizations face funding cutoffs this month, while others struggle to stretch resources through the summer. The shortfall threatens projects that teach Iraqis how to create and sustain political parties, think tanks, human rights groups, independent media outlets, trade unions and other elements of democratic society.

The shift in funding priorities comes as security costs are eating up an enormous share of U.S. funds for Iraq and the administration has already ratcheted back ambitions for reconstructing the country's battered infrastructure. While acknowledging that they are investing less in party-building and other such activities, administration officials argue that bringing more order and helping Iraqis run effective ministries contribute to democracy as well.

Jennifer Windsor, executive director of Freedom House, an advocacy group that hosted a Bush speech last week, called the situation "a travesty" and said she is "appalled" that more is not being done. "This is the time to show that democracy promotion is more than holding an election. If the U.S. can't see fit to fund follow-up democracy promotion at this time," then it is making a mistake, she said.

"The commitment to what the president of the United States will say every single day of the week is his number one priority in Iraq, when it's translated into action, looks very tiny," said Les Campbell, who runs programs in the Middle East for the National Democratic Institute for International Affairs, known as NDI.

NDI and its sister, the International Republican Institute (IRI), will see their grants from the U.S. Agency for International Development dry up at the end of this month, according to a government document, leaving them only special funds earmarked by Congress last year. Similarly, the U.S. Institute of Peace has had its funding for Iraq democracy promotion cut by 60 percent. And the National Endowment for Democracy expects to run out of money for Iraqi programs by September.

"Money keeps getting transferred away to security training. Democracy's one of the things that's been transferred," said Thomas Carothers of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace's project on democracy and the rule of law. "Without that, all the other stuff looks like just background work."

Among the projects facing closure is the Iraq Civil Society and Media Program, funded by USAID and run by America's Development Foundation and the International Research and Exchanges Board. The program has established four civil society resource centers around the country, conducted hundreds of workshops and forums, and trained thousands of government officials in transparency and accountability. It also helped Iraqis set up the National Iraqi News Agency, the first independent news agency in the Arab world.

The program was supposed to run at least through June 2007 but without $15 million more, it will have to close this summer.

Officials at the White House, the State Department, the Office of Management and Budget and USAID were contacted for comment in recent days, but none would speak on the record. In response to a request for comment, USAID sent promotional documents hailing past accomplishments in Iraq, such as sponsoring town hall meetings, training election monitors, and distributing pamphlets, posters and publications explaining voting and the new constitution.

The president's supplemental Iraq spending request includes just $10 million for democracy promotion, and his proposed budget for fiscal 2007 asks for $63 million, a fraction of the tens of billions of dollars spent each year on Iraq. But officials argue that other funds in effect further the same goal. For instance, the administration targeted $254 million for enhancing the rule of law by creating a fair judiciary and a humane prison system.

For Bush, developing democracy in Iraq has become perhaps the signature of his presidency, and he takes special pride in the three elections held since sovereignty was transferred by U.S. authorities. Veterans of past democracy-building efforts, however, have complained that having elections is not enough -- an argument the president has embraced lately, both in his speeches and in his newly released National Security Strategy.

"Elections start the process. They're not the end of the process," Bush told Freedom House last week. "And one of the reasons I respect the Freedom House is because you understand that you follow elections with institution-building and the creation of civil society."

Money flowed to such programs in the beginning of the Iraq enterprise. The National Endowment for Democracy, which supported projects in the Kurdish north of Iraq even before the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003, found itself soon after Baghdad fell with $25 million to expand elsewhere in the country and eventually received a total of $71 million. It distributed some to the IRI and the NDI and some to groups such as the Iraqi National Association for Human Rights in Babylon and the Organization for a Model Iraqi Society.

Last month the endowment received the final $3 million owed on past allocations, with no further funding identified. "It does feel like everybody's getting squeezed in this area," said Barbara E. Haig, the endowment's vice president. "There probably is a commitment to these programs in principle. I don't know how much commitment there is in specificity."

The IRI and the NDI, which are affiliated with the two U.S. political parties, will lose USAID financing April 30. The two party institutes led a coalition to educate Iraqis before last year's elections. An evaluation commissioned by USAID in December called it "essential" that the program "be continued for at least another 24 months."

The party institutes will be able to continue some programs for now only because of a special earmark inserted into legislation last year with $56 million for the two groups. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) sponsored the earmark with support from Sens. Richard G. Lugar (R-Ind.), Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) and Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) after it appeared that NDI and IRI would run out of money last year.

"The solution to Iraq lies in the political process, and it's reckless for the White House to cut funds to strengthen democracy in Iraq at this time," Kennedy said yesterday.

At current spending rates, the earmark will run out this year. After that, the Bush administration has included just $15 million for the two party institutes as part of the $63 million for Iraqi democracy in next year's budget, which would require most programs to be cut.

The U.S. Institute of Peace faces similar cutbacks to its program. "It's just vital," said Daniel P. Serwer, an institute vice president. All the democracy programs in Iraq combined, he noted, cost less than one day of the U.S. military mission. "Am I absolutely sure that we will shorten the deployment time of American troops enough to justify the cost of the program? Yes," he said.

In Iraq, US Still Carries Big Stick (CSM)

By Howard LaFranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON - Much of the money for rebuilding Iraq has already been spent, and Iraqi soldiers are gradually taking over for their American counterparts. So what can the United States still use as leverage? It may be that the strongest influence is the simple fear of what would happen if the US up and left.

"Most of Iraq's leaders recognize that if the US were to pull out precipitously, things could get much worse," says Phebe Marr, an Iraq expert at the US Institute of Peace who has spent considerable time with Iraq's principal political factions. "All the talk about the US getting out, an exit strategy and so forth, has them worried. It's having an impact."

Yet even as the US shows signs of growing increasingly impatient with Iraqi leaders over their inability to name a new government, that doesn't mean the US wants to look as if it is determining Iraq's future. The result is a delicate balancing act: It's applying pressure for political action even while encouraging a sovereign Iraq that appears to stand on its own two feet.

For weeks, the US has left its behind-closed-doors arm-twisting to its ambassador in Baghdad, Zalmay Khalilzad, with the aim of seeing a national unity government named that is acceptable to the major political factions and population groups. But with alarm growing that what the US calls a "power vacuum" is feeding sectarian violence, the pressure has become more public - and from higher up.

On Tuesday, President Bush said, "It's time for the elected leaders to stand up and do their job." The remark came one day after Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice concluded a visit to Baghdad accompanied by British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw.

The two diplomats gave no public indications of their preference for prime minister, the keystone in the construction of Iraq's first permanent government since the fall of Saddam Hussein. But the US has made little effort to squelch speculation that it wishes to see Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari give up his battle to retain his post.

Ms. Rice and Mr. Straw met once with Mr. Jaafari in a tense photo session, but pointedly met for meetings and a breakfast with two other prominent Shiite leaders, Vice President Adel Abdul Mahdi and Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, who heads one of Iraq's major Shiite parties. Mr. Mahdi lost his bid to be nominated prime minister by only one vote in secret balloting of the Shiite bloc.

Those meetings may have only served to spotlight the deepening fissures within Iraq's Shiite majority - a latent situation that could lead to a new front of violence. That is especially true, some analysts say, because Jaafari has the backing of the volatile young cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. Mr. Sadr has recently toned down his anti- occupation rhetoric as he has amassed power in the new National Assembly, some observers note, but might reignite resistance if he decided it might enhance his kingmaker role.

In addition to the two diplomats, members of the US Congress have also visited Baghdad and key political leaders recently. Some have told Iraqi counterparts that the US commitment to Iraq is under pressure and could be scaled back if they do not end their political infighting.

Yet the US is also operating with the knowledge that too much pressure could have the negative result of prolonging the leadership stalemate among politicians who are sensitive about foreign influences in Iraq. "There are misgivings and growing mistrust towards those [leaders] with too-close ties to outsiders, particularly the US and Iran," says Ellen Laipson, a former CIA official with foreign-policy and national-security expertise.

By its investment and presence in the country, the US has a right to exercise pressure, and there are things it can do "without going over the line," says Ms. Laipson, now president of the Stimson Center, a Washington defense and security think tank. "We are operating within a boundary that says it's not up to us to pick the names" of who will govern, but that says the US provides "broad guidelines on what will help the security situation and get them on the right track."

So the US is in "the unusual situation of saying we'd like someone other than Jaafari" for prime minister, she says. But the US is also emphasizing that the ministers of defense and interior should be someone with no ties to the country's powerful and ethnically based militias.

Still, with US clout waning, other means of pressuring Iraq's leadership are under discussion. One idea is an international conference that would be held outside Iraq - something similar to the Bonn conference that provided guideposts to Afghanistan's post-Taliban government.

Ambassador Khalilzad, an Afghan-American who was previously ambassador to his native country, has floated that idea. Yet while "internationalizing" Iraq could help, some experts say, they also doubt that many countries wish to step in to help Iraq. Add to that the deep suspicions that Iraqis harbor toward the neighboring countries that might have some influence.

In any case, many experts caution that naming a government is not going to magically transform Iraq, any more than earlier milestones - such as elections - have done the trick.

"It's a little misplaced to say that [forming a government] somehow solves the sectarian problem or any of the other really difficult challenges on the ground," Ms. Marr says. "It will probably help some to have a new government, but we shouldn't be under any illusions that the day after, the insurgency will put down its guns, or the sectarian violence is going to stop."

Let The Iraqis Bargain (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

Americans are getting impatient about the formation of a new Iraqi government. That's what Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told political leaders in Baghdad this week, and she was putting it mildly. But it would be folly if American impatience torpedoed the slow but real progress Iraqi leaders are making toward a government that could step back from the brink of civil war.

"We need to be patient to get it right," Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, told me in a telephone interview yesterday. "Their concept of time is not the same as ours. While we press them to hurry up, the American people also need to be patient."

Khalilzad recounted the items that the Iraqi political factions have agreed on in private negotiations over the past month. On Sunday, the leaders signed off on the last of these planks of a government of national unity. The Iraqis have saved the hardest issue for last -- the names of the politicians who will hold the top jobs. That bitter fight will play out over the next several weeks.

An example of what's in these unity documents is a passage that calls for "a timetable so the Iraqi forces assume the security tasks completely and end the mission of the multinational force in Iraq." That timetable language is vague, but it would allow the new government to say it is committed to ending the American occupation. Interestingly, U.S. officials said yesterday that this passage on troop withdrawal is consistent with Bush administration policy.

The political agreements are fragile, and they will be blown away if the factions can't form a government soon to put them in practice. Meanwhile, beyond the Green Zone, Iraqis are still being slaughtered every day in the streets. But given where Iraq was six months ago -- when Sunni and Shiite leaders were barely talking -- their agreement on the framework for a unity government is important. These negotiations may not succeed, but they are not a fairy-tale fantasy, as some critics argue.

"All the elements of the deal are there, up in the air, and they could come down and click into place," Kurdish leader Barham Salih told me by telephone from Iraq. "We have come to the real crunch."

Here's the framework for the unity government, as outlined by Khalilzad, who has attended nearly all of the meetings. First, the broad strokes: The Sunni leaders have accepted that the new government will operate under the Iraqi constitution and that it will be based on the results of last December's election, both of which reflect the reality that the Shiites are Iraq's largest religious group. The Shiites, in turn, have agreed that the new government will be guided by consensus among all the factions. And they have agreed to checks that will, in theory, prevent the key security ministries from being hijacked by Shiite militia groups.

To implement this consensual approach, the Iraqi factions agreed on two bodies that weren't mentioned in the constitution. They endorsed a 19-member consultative national security council, which represents all the political factions. And they agreed on a ministerial security council, which will have the Sunni deputy prime minister as its deputy chairman. Shiite leaders have tentatively agreed that the defense minister will be a Sunni. And for the key job of interior minister, the dominant Shiite faction, known as the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, appears ready to accept the replacement of one of its members by an independent Shiite, perhaps Qasim Dawood, a man acceptable to most Sunni leaders.

The real brawl lies ahead over who should be prime minister. Ibrahim al-Jafari, the interim prime minister, is fighting to hold on to his job. Kurdish and Sunni groups have opposed him, as has the Bush administration, arguing that he is too weak and too sectarian. This anti-Jafari coalition added a crucial new member Monday when the Supreme Council's top leaders formally told Jafari they will vote against him if the choice is thrown to the new parliament. That broke the unity of the Shiite alliance, cutting 50 to 70 votes from the 130 that Jafari had counted on, and it may doom his candidacy.

The day-to-day bargaining is taking place in Baghdad. But the X-factor in this delicate game is U.S. political support. Khalilzad could fail in his effort to midwife a unity government, and Iraq could spiral into full-blown civil war. But it would be crazy for an impatient America to talk itself into defeat and pull the plug prematurely. As Prince Turki al-Faisal, the Saudi ambassador to Washington, remarked this week: "America came to Iraq uninvited. You should not leave uninvited."

Key Iraq Leader Calls For PM To Step Aside (AP-Y2)

By Robert H. Reid

AP2, April 5, 2006

An Iraqi vice president called Tuesday for the embattled Shiite prime minister to step aside so a new government can be formed, becoming the most senior Shiite official publicly to endorse demands for a leadership change to halt the slide toward civil war.

Vice President Adil Abdul-Mahdi told the British Broadcasting Corp. that he met with Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari on Monday and urged him to give up the nomination for a second term because he had lost the confidence of the Sunnis and Kurds.

But Abdul-Mahdi said al-Jaafari refused, insisting he wanted to take his case to parliament, which must approve the new prime minister and his Cabinet by a majority vote.

Asked whether al-Jaafari should withdraw his nomination, Abdul-Mahdi said: "Yes, after such a time of naming him, not getting approval from others now in UIA (the dominant Shiite political bloc), there is some rejection so I think he should step aside."

Abdul-Mahdi lost the prime minister nomination to al-Jaafari in February by a single vote at a caucus of the Shiite bloc, which won the most seats in parliamentary elections last December. Al-Jaafari squeaked through largely because he had the support of the powerful anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Abdul-Mahdi's comment followed the visit of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw, who warned the Iraqis that their key allies were losing patience with the political stalemate.

U.S. officials have been urging the Iraqis to form a new national unity government of Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds as a first step toward restoring public confidence and halting the country's slide toward anarchy. The talks have stalled over the demands that al-Jaafari be replaced.

President Bush urged the Iraqis on Tuesday to speed up the talks, calling on elected leaders "to stand up and do their job."

"One way to help bring confidence to the Iraqi people that those few will not be able to determine the future of that country is for there to be unity government that steps up and says, `I'm willing to lead,'" Bush said.

Critics blame al-Jaafari for failing to restore order and for the rise in sectarian tensions. His main critics have been Sunnis and Kurds, but last weekend two other prominent Shiite politicians also called for him to step aside as the nominee.

However, Shiite officials fear that replacing him might splinter their alliance, and a Kurdish politician who opposes al-Jaafari said he feared that international pressure to remove him might trigger a backlash among Iraqis angry over foreign influence.

On Tuesday, about 2,500 people marched in support of al-Jaafari in Baghdad's Sadr City district, carrying banners saying "Down with the Conspiracy" against their candidate.

Shiite officials have been meeting for several days with Sunni and Kurdish leaders urging them to soften their opposition to al-Jaafari.

"I think tomorrow, or the day after things will ease up," said Shiite politician Khudayer al-Khuzai, who backs the prime minister. "They were understanding the grave repercussions of changing. If al-Jaafari is changed, then the (Shiite) alliance will split. We cannot abandon him because he was democratically elected."

Meanwhile, a car bomb exploded Tuesday in a mostly Shiite area of eastern Baghdad, killing at least 10 people.

The bomb went off in the poor, mostly Shiite area of Habibiyah and damaged several cars and nearby sandwich stands, police said. Chaos ensued as militants from radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's Mahdi Army militia fired weapons in the air to clear the crowds.

At least a dozen other Iraqis were killed Tuesday in war-related violence in Baghdad and central Iraq, police said.

They included a mother and two of her sons, 9 and 12, who died when a bomb exploded in front of their home in the capital. A third son, age 13, was wounded, along with two brothers from a different family living in the same home, police said.

Elsewhere in Baghdad, a receptionist at the United Arab Emirates Embassy and his friend — both Iraqis — were slain as they left the building, police said. Insurgents have often targeted diplomats and employees of Arab and Muslim embassies to undermine support for the U.S.-backed government.

Gunmen also killed a judge, an ice cream vendor and his companion and a policeman in separate slayings in the capital, police said.

In Samarra, 60 miles north of Baghdad, a car bomb exploded near a convoy carrying the son of a city council member, killing a security guard and a driver, police said. The council member's son escaped injury.

In southern Iraq, gunmen killed one policeman and wounded another as the two were driving in the city of Basra, police said. Two mortar rounds exploded near the British consulate in Basra during a reception, causing no injuries but forcing the party to end early, an Associated Press reporter at the event said.

Police in Baghdad also found the bodies of four men, apparent victims of sectarian reprisal killings. It was unclear when they were slain.

The body of a U.S. Marine missing after a weekend vehicle accident was also recovered Tuesday, the U.S. said. Six U.S. troops were killed and two remain missing after the Sunday accident in western Iraq.

Rice Dismisses Talk Of U.S. Bases In Iraq (AP)

By Liz Sidoti, Associated Press Writer

AP, April 5, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Tuesday brushed aside suggestions that the United States wants an indefinite troop presence and permanent military bases in Iraq.

"The presence in Iraq is for a very clear purpose, and that's to enable Iraqis to be able to govern themselves and to create security forces that can help them do that," Rice told the House Appropriations Committee's foreign operations panel.

"I don't think that anybody believes that we really want to be there longer than we have to," the chief U.S. diplomat added.

However, Rice did not say when all U.S. forces would return home and did not directly answer Rep. Steven Rothman (news, bio, voting record), D-N.J., when he asked, "Will the bases be permanent or not?"

"I would think that people would tell you, we're not seeking permanent bases really pretty much anywhere in the world these days. We are, in fact, in the process of removing base structure from a lot of places," Rice replied.

"I can't foresee the future of whether or not there will be some need for American forces for some period of time," she added. "But I can tell you that our discussions with the Iraqis are about getting them capable to defend, not just against their internal insurgency and internal enemies, but also to be able to be a responsible and defensible state within the region."

Earlier Tuesday, President Bush urged Iraq to move quickly to form a unity government, calling on elected leaders "to stand up and do their job." He said the formation of a new government would give Iraqis confidence in their future.

Bush's statement, during a brief question-and-answer session with reporters at the White House, came on the heels of a similar admonition by Rice during a visit to Iraq. She had spoken of a "sense of drift" nearly four months after Iraqis held parliamentary elections.

Bush said insurgents were using violence to prevent democracy from taking hold. "One way to help bring confidence to the Iraqi people that those few will not be able to determine the future of that country is for there to be unity government that steps up and says, 'I'm willing to lead.'"

On Captiol Hill, Rice testified before the House panel just hours after returning to the United States from a weeklong trip to Europe that included a surprise detour to Iraq. She and British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw met with nearly all of Iraq's squabbling factions for two days of diplomatic talks.

Republican and Democratic lawmakers increasingly are questioning just how long U.S. troops will remain in Iraq, especially given what appear to be construction projects at military bases in Iraq and polls indicating that Iraqis believe the United States plans to keep permanent bases in their country.

Iraq's interim prime minister, Ibrahim al-Jaafari, has said he opposes permanent foreign bases. American public opinion is against them as well.

Last month, Bush said that American forces will remain in Iraq for years and it will be up to a future president to decide when to bring them all home.

Appearing before the House subcommittee, Rice defended U.S. efforts to rebuild Iraq's essential services, such as electricity, even though progress has been hampered by security problems. She said the United States has made important investments in rebuilding the structures to provide such services.

"We believe that they will pay off," she said.

However, Rice acknowledged problems with security as well as "some corruption problems in some of the ministries." She said the United States is urging Iraqi officials to correct the issues so that reconstruction can proceed unhampered.

Rice also:

· Defended the United States' efforts to help Afghanistan eradicate poppy crops and the Bush administration's public plan to invest $75 million in U.S. democracy programs aimed at strengthening ties with the Iranian people.

"On this one I don't think speaking softly about the democracy problem in Iran is really the appropriate course. I think we do have to be very public about it," Rice said.

· Said it would be helpful for the African Union to "put its full weight" behind putting together a U.N. peacekeeping force in the war-ravaged Darfur region.

"There are sometimes mixed signals from the African Union about how they view this. There are sometimes mixed signals out of the Arab League about how they view this," Rice said.

Condi's Iraq Stumble (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

Iraq can use all the gestures of solidarity it can get. And President Bush could boost both American and Iraqi morale by putting his own two boots on the ground there sometime soon. But try as we might, we can't see what good purpose was served by Condoleezza Rice and Jack Straw's lobbying in Baghdad earlier this week. If the American Secretary of State and British Foreign Secretary were aiming to be diplomatic, they failed.

That's because with both words and gestures the two publicly took sides in a contentious dispute over forming Iraq's government -- and in favor of a man, former Finance Minister Adel Abdul Mahdi, who is not even a declared candidate for Prime Minister. Meanwhile, they snubbed Ibrahim al-Jaafari, who beat out Mr. Mahdi to become the Shiite coalition's candidate for the post, and who is also the current holder of the office.

The effect was to suggest to many Shiites -- even those who don't love Mr. Jaafari -- that the U.S. and Britain are not respecting their victory in December's election. As senior Kurdish politician Mahmoud Othman, a usual ally of the U.S., put it, "I think that their interference is bad, and it further complicates issues because this is an Iraqi matter."

It's hard to see any reason for a strong U.S. preference here. Granted that Mr. Jaafari has not proven to be a strong and decisive leader. But he is by everyone's account a good and honest person, and he has more genuine support on the Iraqi street than most other leaders -- though admittedly that's not saying much given the general unpopularity of Iraqi pols. He's also less beholden to Iran than many possible alternatives.

As for Mr. Mahdi, he's clearly the smoother politician of the two. He speaks better English and he seems to have a more modern (free-market) economic philosophy, among other assets. But he also represents a party called the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq. SCIRI has very strong ties to Iran, and it has been in charge during the interim government of the problematic Interior Ministry, whose police forces are not well trusted and have been credibly accused of abuses against Sunnis.

Mr. Mahdi's name has remained in play in part because President Jalal Talabani and the Kurds appear to have struck a deal with SCIRI to acquiesce in a Kurdish takeover of the oil-rich city of Kirkuk in exchange for the Kurds allowing the emergence of a more religious Shiite southern Iraq. Some kind of federalist power sharing is necessary, but too much will also risk a too-weak national government in Baghdad.

Our point isn't to pick one man, or faction, over the other. It is that we can't see a strong rationale for the U.S. taking sides -- certainly not enough to justify Ms. Rice's suggestion that the expenditure of U.S. "treasure" in Iraq justified her barely coded calls for Mr. Jaafari to step aside. A particular danger is that Ms. Rice may be playing into the hands of troublesome cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, who dislikes Mr. Mahdi, and who may well be looking for any excuse to foment anti-American sentiment.

Mr. Jaafari may yet fail to form a new government. But it's much better to let him be seen to fail on his own if that's what happens, rather than be pushed aside by the Americans. Iraq has a parliamentary system that allows for no-confidence votes and changes of office if the government isn't working out.

More broadly, the Bush Administration can't afford to forget the most fundamental strategic fact about Iraq: To wit, our project there is entirely dependent on continued Shiite support. The U.S. and its Shiite allies can fight a low-intensity conflict with Sunni Saddamist remnants for a decade or more if need be. What would make the U.S. mission in Iraq untenable would be for Shiites to turn against us in significant numbers.

And Shiite mistrust of the U.S. has been growing. One festering issue remains former U.S. regent Paul Bremer's decision to reverse himself on the de-Baathification policy he declared shortly after the U.S. invasion. De-Baathification gave Shiites the expectation of a process to punish those associated with the former regime and undoubtedly saved a lot of Sunni lives early on. But our about-face emboldened the Baathist insurgents, and Shiite-on-Sunni revenge killings are on the rise now because Shiites believe we can't -- or worse, won't -- protect them.

One especially worrying signal about the Shiite mood has been the reaction to a U.S.-Iraqi raid on elements of Mr. Sadr's Mahdi Army about 10 days ago. Many Shiites believe instead that U.S. forces massacred worshippers in cold blood inside a mosque. Ms. Rice's visit is now being cited as evidence of a U.S. "conspiracy" to deprive Shiites of their election victory.

The Secretary of State is surely right that the U.S. sacrifice for Iraqi freedom has earned us the right to speak up. But except where U.S. interests are clearly threatened, pressure is best applied behind closed doors by the seasoned U.S. Ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad, not the unsubtle endorsement of candidates by overnighting officials.

Wisconsin Residents Vote On Whether To Keep Troops In Iraq (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, April 5, 2006

Voters in 32 Wisconsin communities went to the polls Tuesday to decide referendums calling for the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq. By late Tuesday night, ballots had been counted in 25 towns and cities. The measures passed in 19 of them, including Madison, and were defeated in six.

Organizers hope the outcome in Wisconsin will encourage people in other states to put similar referendums on November ballots and prompt members of Congress to put pressure on the Bush administration to bring troops home.

“It's not going to stop here,” said Rachel Friedman, a member of Wisconsin's Bring Our Troops Home Coalition. “This can be done anywhere.”

Most of the anti-war referendums sought an immediate “orderly and rapid withdrawal” of troops. They were sponsored by the Wisconsin Green Party and the Wisconsin Network for Peace and Justice. Activists in each town gathered signatures to qualify them for the ballot.

People in Evansville, population 4,000, voted for that resolution and against a separate measure expressing support for President Bush's policies in Iraq and recommending that U.S. troops stay “until unquestioned victory is clearly won.”

The vote was close on both Evansville referendums. “Evansville is more evenly divided than I thought it was,” said Fred Juergens, a retired chemistry professor who organized the anti-war petition drive.

Tony Ryerson, a public works employee who helped get the measure supporting the war on Evansville's ballot, said debate over the dueling referendums was healthy. “We got our voice heard and got people talking,” he said.

Madison, the traditionally liberal state capital, was the largest city voting on the proposal to bring troops home. Other towns participating are in Republican-leaning rural areas. Anti-war resolutions have been adopted by more than 50 local governments across the USA and at more than 40 town meetings in Vermont.

The referendums have no legal weight, but Georgia Duerst-Lahti, a political science professor at Beloit College in Beloit, Wis., called them "the ultimate poll" on public attitudes about the war.

Passage of a majority of the anti-war measures, she said, might have national ramifications. "It confirms in a direct political fashion that people have grave concerns about what's going on" in Iraq, she said.

A USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll last month found that 54% of Americans want U.S. troops to be withdrawn from Iraq now or within a year, and 60% said it wasn't worth it to go to war in Iraq.

Mayoral races, contests for school and county boards and funding referendums for schools also were on Tuesday's ballot in Wisconsin communities.

In the Kansas City area, voters were deciding whether to raise sales taxes to upgrade stadiums where the Royals play baseball and the Chiefs play football. Caruthersville, Mo., postponed its voting after the homes of 21 election judges were destroyed by a tornado Sunday.

Majority Of 32 Wisconsin Towns Vote For Iraq Pullout (WP)

By Kari Kydersen

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

SHOREWOOD, Wis., April 4 -- Voters in the majority of 32 Wisconsin towns with local referendums on the Iraq war voted Tuesday to bring the troops home.

A call to withdraw from Iraq by the end of the year passed overwhelmingly in the liberal Milwaukee suburb of Shorewood, while in conservative Watertown, where the City Council had opposed having the referendum, it was voted down by 75 percent.

Although the referendums are nonbinding, organizers with the Green Party and other antiwar groups said they hope they send a message to Washington.

"This sort of reminds me of Vietnam," said Nicole Bartelme, 22, a student at the University of Wisconsin at Milwaukee who voted in Shorewood. "I have some friends in Iraq, and I think we should bring them home. I don't know realistically if this will have any effect, but hopefully someone's listening."

Under a 1911 state law granting municipalities the right to "direct legislation," Wisconsin residents can place a referendum on a local ballot by collecting signatures equal to 15 percent of the number that voted for governor in the last election. Most of the referendums called for a withdrawal of troops immediately. In Evansville, there also was a referendum supporting President Bush.

The City Council in Watertown, a town of 23,000 that went strongly for Bush in the past two elections, tried to block the referendum from the ballot but was overruled by a judge after the Watertown Peace and Democracy Coalition filed a lawsuit.

The referendum passed in La Crosse, near the Minnesota border, where the City Council had been split over the issue. Council President Joe Ledvina said he was surprised by the vote.

"The council felt overwhelmingly that it wasn't our jurisdiction, that we don't want to send a message that we aren't behind our president and the troops," Ledvina said.

In Shorewood, retired government worker Rick Westphal said he opposed the war "like everyone else" but didn't know whether it was appropriate for a local ballot measure.

"Is this really the arena for this?" he asked. "People are just coming here to vote for the school board. I'd rather see this on the national ballot."

Shorewood resident Keith Schmitz, a 55-year-old public relations consultant, spent the weekend going door to door with literature about the town's referendum, which calls for a pullout by year's end.

"This is truly a grass-roots effort," he said. "None of us are James Carvilles; it's just do-it-yourself politics. We're just doing our best and seeing what happens."

Ruth Weill, co-chair of the Wisconsin Green Party, which coordinated the statewide referendum drive, said she saw the movement as a victory regardless of the outcome.

"This is a true democratic exercise," Weill said. "I'm sure before this a lot of people didn't even know what a referendum was."

Two Deadlines And An Exit (NYT)

By John F. Kerry

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

Washington

WE are now in the third war in Iraq in as many years. The first was against Saddam Hussein and his supposed weapons of mass destruction. The second was against terrorists whom, the administration said, it was better to fight over there than here. Now we find our troops in the middle of an escalating civil war.

Half of the service members listed on the Vietnam Memorial Wall died after America's leaders knew our strategy would not work. It was immoral then and it would be immoral now to engage in the same delusion. We want democracy in Iraq, but Iraqis must want it as much as we do. Our valiant soldiers can't bring democracy to Iraq if Iraq's leaders are unwilling themselves to make the compromises that democracy requires.

As our generals have said, the war cannot be won militarily. It must be won politically. No American soldier should be sacrificed because Iraqi politicians refuse to resolve their ethnic and political differences.

So far, Iraqi leaders have responded only to deadlines — a deadline to transfer authority to a provisional government, and a deadline to hold three elections.

Now we must set another deadline to extricate our troops and get Iraq up on its own two feet.

Iraqi politicians should be told that they have until May 15 to put together an effective unity government or we will immediately withdraw our military. If Iraqis aren't willing to build a unity government in the five months since the election, they're probably not willing to build one at all. The civil war will only get worse, and we will have no choice anyway but to leave.

If Iraq's leaders succeed in putting together a government, then we must agree on another deadline: a schedule for withdrawing American combat forces by year's end. Doing so will empower the new Iraqi leadership, put Iraqis in the position of running their own country and undermine support for the insurgency, which is fueled in large measure by the majority of Iraqis who want us to leave their country. Only troops essential to finishing the job of training Iraqi forces should remain.

For this transition to work, we must finally begin to engage in genuine diplomacy. We must immediately bring the leaders of the Iraqi factions together at a Dayton Accords-like summit meeting. In a neutral setting, Iraqis, working with our allies, the Arab League and the United Nations, would be compelled to reach a political agreement that includes security guarantees, the dismantling of the militias and shared goals for reconstruction.

To increase the pressure on Iraq's leaders, we must redeploy American forces to garrisoned status. Troops should be used for security backup, training and emergency response; we should leave routine patrols to Iraqi forces. Special operations against Al Qaeda and other foreign terrorists in Iraq should be initiated only on hard intelligence leads.

We will defeat Al Qaeda faster when we stop serving as its best recruitment tool. Iraqis ultimately will not tolerate foreign jihadists on their soil, and the United States will be able to maintain an over-the-horizon troop presence with rapid response capacity. An exit from Iraq will also strengthen our hand in dealing with the Iranian nuclear threat and allow us to repair the damage of repeated deployments, which flag officers believe has strained military readiness and morale.

For three years now, the administration has told us that terrible things will happen if we get tough with the Iraqis. In fact, terrible things are happening now because we haven't gotten tough enough. With two deadlines, we can change all that. We can put the American leadership on the side of our soldiers and push the Iraqi leadership to do what only it can do: build a democracy.

Hussein Charged With Genocide In 50,000 Deaths (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, April 4 — The Iraqi court trying Saddam Hussein announced Tuesday that it had charged him with genocide, saying he sought to annihilate the Kurdish people in 1988, when the military killed at least 50,000 Kurdish civilians and destroyed 2,000 villages.

The case is the first against Mr. Hussein to address the large-scale human rights violations committed during his decades in power, the same acts the Bush administration has publicized in explaining the American invasion of Iraq. Six other defendants also face charges. Mr. Hussein is already being tried for the torture and killings of 148 men and boys in the Shiite village of Dujail.

Since the United Nations adopted the genocide convention in 1948, very few courts have charged defendants with genocide, the attempt to annihilate an ethnic, religious, national or political group in whole or in part.

Convictions have been handed down in the tribunals for Rwanda and Yugoslavia. This is the first time that a Middle Eastern ruler has been charged with it.

"It was during this campaign that thousands of women, children and men were buried in mass graves in many locations," Raid Juhi, the chief judge of the Iraqi High Tribunal's investigative court, said at a news conference.

Judge Juhi said it would be up to other judges to decide when the genocide trial against Mr. Hussein would start, and whether it would overlap with the Dujail case. Defense lawyers must be given 45 days to review the case files.

The court defines the bloody Anfal campaign, whose name means "the spoils" from a favorite Koranic verse of Mr. Hussein's, as eight military operations in 1988 in the mountainous Kurdish homeland of northern Iraq. Families who escaped death squads or were allowed to live were forced to relocate into the hinterlands or in neighboring countries.

The Kurds, who make up a fifth of Iraq's people, tried to fight back, but Mr. Hussein used chemical weapons, including mustard gas and nerve agents.

Judge Juhi said the court had gathered enough evidence, like documents and mass graves, to prosecute the defendants in the deaths of at least 50,000 civilians. Kurdish officials and human rights advocates said the death toll had been much higher. They also said the Anfal campaign began years earlier, with other massacres and forced migrations.

The parties agree that at the very least, hundreds of thousands were arrested, tortured, relocated or killed.

All seven defendants are charged with crimes against humanity and war crimes related to an internal armed conflict. Mr. Hussein and one other defendant, Ali Hassan al-Majid, known as Chemical Ali, also have been charged with genocide, which legal experts say is difficult to prove. Mr. Majid was one of Mr. Hussein's most feared aides and oversaw the north during the Anfal campaign.

The other defendants include military commanders and senior intelligence officials.

"These charges should not be addressed to President Saddam," Khalil al-Dulaimi, Mr. Hussein's chief lawyer, said in a telephone interview. "They should be addressed to the American and British forces, because they are killing the Iraqi people and using weapons of mass destruction against the Iraqi people."

President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd who for years led militiamen in northern Iraq, praised the court's decision to bring the Anfal charges, and promised that he and other government officials would not try to influence the trial.

It has taken years to assemble the evidence for the Anfal case. American officials say the Dujail crimes were selected as the first ones to try Mr. Hussein on because that case was not nearly as complicated as some others. It is also easier in the Dujail case to establish a clear chain of command between Mr. Hussein and those who carried out the executions, the officials say.

But they say that the Anfal massacres and the suppression of the Shiite uprising of 1991, which resulted in up to 150,000 deaths, are the two cases that go much more directly to the heart of Mr. Hussein's murderous rule, and could prove more cathartic for a vast majority of Iraqis.

The Dujail trial, expected to resume Wednesday with a cross-examination of Mr. Hussein, is entering its final phase, in which the court will review formal charges and hear arguments from the defense lawyers.

If a death sentence is handed down to Mr. Hussein, it is unclear whether the court would carry out the execution before other cases begin or are concluded. Any death sentence is automatically appealed.

There is no deadline for a decision, but if the appeal is denied, then the statutes of the tribunal mandate that the defendant must be executed within 30 days. Even the president's office, which is supposed to approve all death sentences, would be able to do little to delay that, said American legal experts advising the tribunal.

Many Iraqis who despise Mr. Hussein, especially Shiites and Kurds, have denounced the tribunal and called for Mr. Hussein's immediate execution, while some officials, like President Talabani, have said they want Mr. Hussein to stay alive long enough to face trial on all possible charges.

There are about a dozen investigations under way, all of which may result in individual sets of charges. The operations of the tribunal and its oversight of the Dujail case have been tumultuous, plagued by the assassinations of a judge and lawyers, political pressure from the Iraqi government and power struggles among the judges.

Questions have been raised about why the tribunal was never set up in an international venue, where security would not be as great a concern. American and Iraqi officials have struggled to endow the trial with legitimacy, but many foreign governments and human rights advocates have continued to view it as a show court.

The bringing of charges in Anfal brings a new set of problems, they say. If the trial were to proceed concurrent with the trial on the Dujail killings, then Mr. Hussein's defense team could be placed at an unfair disadvantage, unless Mr. Hussein hired more lawyers. The prosecutors and judges do not have that problem; a separate prosecutor and five-judge panel will oversee Anfal.

With Mr. Hussein needing to focus on final arguments in Dujail, a concern is "how he could do all that and then simultaneously prepare for a larger and more complex litigation — it goes to issues of fairness," said Marieke Wierda, a senior associate at the International Center for Transitional Justice, a New York-based advocacy group.

The other seven defendants in the Dujail trial are all different than those in the Anfal case.

Kurdish officials often say that 180,000 people were killed in the Anfal campaign, but the actual number is closer to 80,000, according to Joost Hiltermann, the Middle East director of the International Crisis Group, an advocacy group.

The scope of the trial is generally limited to the eight military operations from February to August 1988, but the court will also examine evidence starting from March 1987, when Mr. Hussein chose Mr. Majid as the top official in northern Iraq.

In the years preceding Anfal, Kurds in Iraqi villages near Iran were forced to abandon their homes. Those areas were labeled "prohibited," and anyone living there was deemed to be an Iranian agent or saboteur. The Anfal campaign was undertaken to deal with those who had moved back or had not moved.

The other defendants in the Anfal case are Sultan Hashem Ahmed, the military commander of the campaign and the defense minister starting in 2001; Sabir Abdul-Aziz al-Duri, the director of military intelligence; Hussein Rashid al-Tikriti, the deputy of operations for the Iraqi forces; Tahir Tawfiq al-Ani, a governor of Mosul; and Farhan Mutlak al-Jubouri, the head of military intelligence in the north.

Iraq Tribunal May Charge Hussein With Genocide Of Kurds (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, April 5, 2006

BAGHDAD — Iraq's tribunal announced today that it has completed an investigation into deposed leader Saddam Hussein's involvement in a series of 1988 military operations that killed more than 100,000 Kurds and could file formal charges as early as Wednesday.

Six aides, including Hussein's cousin, Ali Hassan Majid, also known as "Chemical Ali, would also stand trial for the Anfal campaign, which included mustard gas and nerve agent attacks against civilian populations.

The former leader's ongoing Dujayl case, involving a separate massacre of at least 148 Shiites, is scheduled to resume Wednesday with further testimony from Hussein.

It was unclear today when the Anfal trial might begin, when the Dujayl trial would end, and whether the two cases could be tried contemporaneously.

Iraqi officials said they had reviewed an array of documents from Hussein's Baathist Party and thousands of witness statements in preparation for the Anfal trial. Investigators also exhumed mass graves and tested corpses for traces of banned chemical agents.

The Anfal campaign involved military operations where 5,000 people died. Civilians comprised the bulk of the campaign's casualties, leading some legal experts to push for genocide prosecutions against former Baathist regime leaders.

News of the impending trial overshadowed Iraqi leaders' struggle to form a government, nearly two months after final election results were posted.

Negotiators recessed from formal discussions today, though leaders of Iraq's leading Shiite alliance met behind closed doors to discuss whether to replace Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari.

Kurds, Sunni Arabs and Shiite parties within Jafari's own coalition claim he has been too partisan and ineffective to be granted another term, but Jafari's supporters showed no sign today that he would willingly relinquish his post.

Western and Iraqi officials have repeatedly warned that the delay has caused a dangerous leadership vacuum that has allowed violence to spread.

Today, a parked car exploded near a used car lot in western Baghdad, killing 10 people and injuring 28.

In another Baghdad incident, two Iraqi employees at the United Arab Emirates Embassy were killed in a drive-by shooting.

In Basra, gunmen shot to death Sheik Nawaf Ahmed Aqrab, a local leader of the Iraqi Islamic Party, a Sunni Arab political organization, as he left his house. He is the second prominent Sunni Arab leader to be killed in the last three days.

Saddam Charged With Kurdish Genocide (WT/AP)

By Sameer N. Yacoub, Associated Press

The Washington Times, April 5, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Iraqi authorities charged Saddam Hussein with genocide yesterday, accusing him of trying to exterminate the Kurds in a 1980s campaign that killed an estimated 100,000 -- the first move to prosecute him for the human rights violations that the U.S. cited to justify its invasion.

The former Iraqi president returns to court today in his current six-month-old trial, facing the death sentence if convicted in the killings of more than 140 Shi'ites.

But that case involves a relatively small number of victims, and the scope of the accusation pales in comparison to the crackdown against the Kurds or the suppression of the Shi'ite uprising in southern Iraq in 1991.

Investigative judge Raid Juhi told reporters that he submitted the new case against Saddam and six co-defendants to the Iraqi High Tribunal -- a legal step that is the equivalent of an indictment under Iraqi law.

His move paves the way for a second trial, which could begin any time after 45 days. Mr. Juhi said charges also include crimes against humanity.

Legal analysts said the decision to accuse Saddam of genocide has been questioned because the charge is difficult to prove. An international convention after the Nazi Holocaust during World War II defined genocide as an effort "to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group."

The latest charges involve Saddam's reported role in Operation Anfal, the 1988 military campaign launched in the final months of the war with Iran to crush independence-minded Kurdish militias and clear Kurds from the sensitive Iranian border area of northern Iraq.

Saddam had accused Kurdish militias of ties to Iran. Thousands of Kurdish villages were razed, and their inhabitants either killed or displaced.

A memo released by the tribunal said the Anfal campaign included "savage military attacks on civilians," including "the use of mustard gas and nerve agents ... to kill and maim rural villagers and to drive them out of their homes."

The operations against the Kurds included the March 1988 gas attack on the village of Halabja in which 5,000 people, including women and children, died. However, Mr. Juhi said that the Halabja attack would be prosecuted separately and was not considered part of the charges filed yesterday.

Others accused in the Anfal case include Saddam's cousin, Ali Hassan al-Majid, or "Chemical Ali"; former Defense Minister Sultan Hashim Ahmad; former intelligence chief Sabir Abdul Aziz Al-Douri; former Republican Guard commander Hussein al-Tikriti; former Nineveh provincial Gov. Taher Tafwiq al-Ani; and former top military commander Farhan Mutlaq al-Jubouri.

Saddam and seven others have been on trial since Oct. 19 on charges in the deaths of Shi'ite Muslimsafter a 1982 assassination attempt against him in the town of Dujail.

The Dujail trial was the first of what Iraqi authorities say could be up to a dozen proceedings. Saddam could face death by hanging if convicted in the Dujail case. But President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, said he doubted any sentence would be carried out until all trials were complete -- a process likely to take years.

Court Moves To Try Hussein In Massacre Of Kurds (WP)

By Jonathan Finer And Naseer Nouri

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

BAGHDAD, April 4 -- A special criminal court has finished gathering evidence on the massacre of tens of thousands of Iraqi Kurds in the late 1980s, a judge said Tuesday, clearing the way for a second trial for former president Saddam Hussein.

Investigative judge Raeed Juhi said he had referred the case against Hussein and six co-defendants to the Iraqi High Tribunal, the rough equivalent of submitting formal charges.

All of the defendants will be charged with crimes against humanity. In addition, Hussein and Ali Hassan al-Majeed, a former general and Baath Party official nicknamed "Chemical Ali" for ordering the use of mustard gas and nerve agents against the Kurds, will be prosecuted for genocide.

International human rights groups have estimated that more than 100,000 people were killed in 1987 and 1988 as part of an Iraqi government operation known as the Anfal campaign. Kurdish villages were systematically razed and survivors shipped off to squalid internment camps.

"Thousands of women, children and men were buried in mass graves," Juhi said. "We have testimony from more than 1,000 witnesses."

After the new charges were announced, Kurdish demonstrators took to the streets of the northern city of Kirkuk, ululating, waving Kurdish flags and chanting slogans against Hussein and Majeed.

"I was a child at the time when they took the men who we discovered were later executed," said Shwan Mahmoud Fattah, who said he lived near the Kurdish capital of Irbil during the Anfal campaign. "The day we waited for -- to see the killers of our families stand before justice -- has come."

Baheeja Abbas Barazanchi, 55, said, his son was killed after being accused of fighting with the pesh merga , a Kurdish militia that fought Hussein's forces. "This is God's justice," he said.

Hussein's current trial -- stemming from the massacre of nearly 150 residents of Dujail, north of Baghdad -- has entered what Juhi called the "final stage" and is set to resume Wednesday with the former leader's cross-examination. Hussein and seven co-defendants are charged in that case.

It is unclear when any new trial would begin. The case file has not yet been presented to the defense team, a U.S. official close to the court said Tuesday. Under Iraqi law, defense attorneys are allowed at least 45 days to review the results of the investigation before a trial can begin.

Hussein faces the death penalty in both the Dujail and Anfal cases. Several other cases against him are also still in the investigative phase, including that of the brutal suppression of a 1991 Shiite uprising in southern Iraq.

Some Iraqi politicians have expressed concern that Hussein could be convicted and hanged for the Dujail crimes before the other cases against him are heard. Justice Minister Abdul Hussein Shandal Issa said in an interview that the court might delay handing down any sentences until all trials are completed. Once a sentence is issued and a final appeal is finished, the punishment must be carried out within 30 days.

The new charges came as Vice President Adel Abdul Mahdi became the highest-ranking Shiite leader to call on Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jafari to withdraw as the bloc's nominee for the job in the new government. Abdul Mahdi's Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq has said Jafari, leader of the Dawa party, can no longer count on its support. Abdul Mahdi, who made his comments in a BBC television interview, lost to Jafari by one vote in the nomination battle a month ago and is considered the most likely replacement.

Jafari has thus far said he will not step aside. He is also opposed by Sunni Arab and Kurdish parties, whose participation is needed for Iraq to form a fully representative government.

In Washington, President Bush said that "one way to help bring confidence to the Iraqi people . . . is for there to be unity government that steps up and says, 'I'm willing to lead.' "

Bush said he dispatched Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to Baghdad earlier this week with the message "that the people of Iraq have voted and now it's time for the elected leaders to stand up and do their job."

In Baghdad on Tuesday, at least 10 people were killed in a series of bombings and small-arms attacks, including five policemen who died in a car bombing near the northeastern neighborhood of Sadr City.

The U.S. military reported that a Marine listed as missing in a vehicle crash during a flash flood Sunday in western Iraq had drowned in the accident, which claimed five other lives. Two more service members are still unaccounted for.

And booksellers became the latest victims of insurgent violence, as a 30-year-old shop in the western part of the capital was either bombed or set ablaze late Monday night after several local shops were warned to stop selling newspapers.

"I think they will start targeting the bookshops now after they targeted the barbers and the CD shops before," said Thair Abdul Qadir, a regular customer at Khalid bookshop in the Rabi Street neighborhood.

Saddam Genocide Charge Hard To Prove (AP)

By Anthony Deutsch

AP, April 4, 2006

Saddam Hussein on Tuesday joined a growing number of former leaders accused of the worst crime known to man: genocide. Defined as the intent to destroy an ethnic group in part or in whole, experts say it is the toughest war crime to prove.

An Iraqi indictment accused the ousted president of trying to exterminate the Kurds in northern Iraq in a 1980s campaign known as Operation Anfal that killed an estimated 100,000.

Michael Scharf, director of the Frederick K. Cox International Law Center at Case Western Reserve University in Cleveland, said the genocide case against Saddam won't be easy to prove "despite the large number of Kurdish victims (reportedly more than 100,000)."

Scharf said a number of issues could undermine the case including the sparing of Kurdish villagers, the killing of non-Kurds and potentially legitimate military goals and economic aims.

The Anfal case is the second indictment against Saddam, who has been on trial with seven co-defendants since Oct. 19 for the massacre of more than 140 Shiites following a 1982 assassination attempt against him in the town of Dujail.

U.N. tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda, applying the international convention against genocide adopted after the Holocaust, have filed genocide charges against at least 49 individuals. Slightly under half of those were convicted, while a few are still awaiting trial.

Most recently, Serbian leader Slobodan Milosevic died March 11 while on trial for the massacre of at least 8,000 Bosnian Muslims at Srebrenica in July 1995 — an attack that constituted genocide under the strict definition in international law.

The most difficult aspect to set out in a courtroom is intent and a premeditated plan and proving genocide in Bosnia has been a daunting task. Seven of the 23 people indicted have been acquitted and just one man — Gen. Radislav Krstic — was convicted by the Yugoslav tribunal and is serving a 35-year sentence for the worst violence on European soil in 50 years.

The Rwanda tribunal, which prosecutes those accused in the 1994 genocide of at least 500,000 Tutsis and moderate Hutus, has convicted 23 people and acquitted just three. Former Prime Minister Jean Kambanda pleaded guilty and is serving a life sentence with several of his government ministers.

That tribunal set a number of important legal precedents, including the first conviction based on the 1948 Genocide Convention. It also defined the crime of rape and found that rape and sexual violence may constitute genocide if the crimes are committed "with the intent to destroy a particular group targeted as such."

The latest charges involve Saddam's alleged role in Operation Anfal, which was launched in the final months of the 1980-1988 war with Iran to crush independence-minded Kurdish militias and clear Kurds from the sensitive Iranian border area.

The three-phase military campaign included the March 16, 1988, gas attack on the village of Halabja that killed 5,000. But Investigative judge Raid Juhi said Saddam will be tried separately for that attack.

The Iraqi tribunal will have the support of evidence from an earlier genocide trial that implicated Saddam.

In December, a Dutch court sentenced chemicals merchant Frans van Anraat to 15 years in prison for selling Saddam's regime the chemicals used against the Kurds. The ruling, the first ever dealing with Halabja and chemical attacks on seven other villages, concluded that the killing constituted genocide.

It had no jurisdiction to try Saddam, but prosecutors named Saddam and his cousin, Ali Hassan Majid, or "Chemical Ali," as co-conspirators.

Dutch prosecutors said the Iraqi military left an estimated 182,000 Kurds dead and hundreds of thousands more in detention camps.

Moscow Eyes Lost Oil Contract In Iraq (WT)

By Andrea R. Mihailescu

The Washington Times, April 5, 2006

Russia's largest oil company, Lukoil, is looking to the formation of a new Iraqi government as an opportunity to deal itself back into that country's huge West Qurna oil field, regaining a lucrative contract it lost in December 2002 as coalition forces were building up for the 2003 invasion.

Iraq's foreign ministry, seeking Moscow's help with some troublesome neighbors, has noted that Russian companies such as Lukoil understand Iraq's oil industry and environment because of their long history in the country.

"We hope the formation of a new government in Iraq will allow us in 2006 to start negotiations on recovering West Qurna," Andrei Kuzyaev, president of Lukoil Overseas, said at a conference in London in February.

Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari asked for Russian help in November to end interference in its internal affairs from Syria and Iran, and has said that Lukoil offers Iraq needed technological and financial capabilities.

Lukoil and Saddam Hussein's government in 1997 signed the $3.7 billion development and production contract for the giant West Qurna field, one of Iraq's largest with an estimated 11 billion to 15 billion barrels located in North Rumaila, west of Basra.

The Iraqis abruptly canceled the contract in December 2002, charging, not without merit, that Lukoil had failed to honor a provision requiring that it spend at least $200 million on the field within the first three years of the contract.

However, the energy newsletter Middle East Economic Survey reported at the time that the Iraqis were angry because Lukoil executives were hedging their bets on the expected U.S. invasion, even as Moscow was working at the United Nations to head off the attack.

Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz was quoted in Canada's National Post on Dec. 17, 2002, saying, "Lukoil went to Washington to get assurances that their contract will be implemented after the removal of the Iraqi regime. ... Such conduct cannot be accepted."

Despite losing the contract, Lukoil worked at maintaining good relations with Iraqi administrations that succeeded Saddam.

During the summer of 2004, it gave Iraq millions of dollars in humanitarian aid and provided training for Iraqi oil specialists at its facilities in Western Siberia and Volgograd, according to the Energy Information Administration, a department of the U.S. Department of Energy.

Lukoil also pledged to train 150 Iraqi specialists annually over five years at its Russian facilities.

Such aid is a "starting point for Russian companies to begin implementation of oil projects in Iraq," Lukoil President Vagit Alekperov said in September.

Now, with a permanent government to be established in Baghdad, Lukoil has reason to hope for the best.

The Iraqi oil ministry announced in June that an inter-ministerial committee would be set up to review oil contracts signed under the Saddam regime, and that it would renegotiate existing oil-development contracts with France's Total as well as Russian and Chinese energy firms.

The newly elected parliament, meanwhile, is expected to create a petroleum-investment law in line with the new constitution once a government is in place.

DOJ_NMG_0025553

"The process of negotiation is a joint process between the government and the provinces, but the ownership of the oil is for the Iraqi people," Deputy Prime Minister Ahmed Chalabi, who has served as oil minister since December, told Platts, an industry publication.

Lukoil may think its prospects are improved by the participation of U.S.-based ConocoPhillips, which now holds a 17 percent stake in the Russian company and has announced plans to increase its stake to 20 percent. However, U.S. officials say the decision will be made by the Iraqis, not the Americans.

"We're not involved in this decision-making," a State Department official said. "Oil policy and decision-making regarding Iraqi oil assets are firmly under the control of the Iraqi government."

Jamal Qureshi, lead analyst at the Washington-based energy consulting firm PFC Energy, noted that the United States does have advisers at the oil ministry who assist Iraq in its decision making.

"Who will have authority to negotiate these contracts will largely depend on how centralized the government will be," he said. "But with Iraq on the verge of civil war, the prospects are not good. There is a need for a more secure environment."

Insurgents have attacked pipelines and other oil installations nearly 300 times since 2003. Of those, 95 took place last year.

A Marine's Mother (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

Last August, Danielette James, 58, a federal custodian who cleans congressional offices five nights a week, unsuccessfully pleaded with her bosses for time off to welcome home her son, a Marine who was returning to Camp Lejeune, N.C., after seven months in Iraq.

In the end, James, unable to draw on the 172 hours of vacation time she had amassed, had to wait until a weekend for a two-day visit to North Carolina. (Her bosses at the Architect of the Capitol's office told The Washington Post at the time they had tried to meet her request.)

Over the weekend, the mother of six learned that her son, Eric McIntire, 27, had been killed by a roadside bomb near Baghdad.

McIntire, a sergeant who served nearly 10 years in the Marines, had returned to Iraq in early March. He was traveling in a Humvee with other members of his platoon on Sunday when a bomb exploded, killing him and several other men, James said.

A military chaplain broke the news Sunday afternoon to McIntire's wife of five years, Cynthia McIntire, who called James. Someone in uniform also visited James at her Woodbridge home that day.

"I was so crazy. I was crying so much. I went outside screaming, and my neighbor came running," James said.

McIntire was generous and quiet, his mother said, the sort of person who always gave money to friends in need and would talk to homeless people on the street. Before he lost his life in a war zone, the military had saved it.

"When he was young, he was into drinking and smoking," James said. "And then he said, 'Oh, no, I'm trying to mess my life up. Let me stop this.' And he stopped. And he finished high school, and then he joined the Marines. Since he joined the Marines, he has been straight. He has been so good. He is nice to his wife, he takes good care of her."

James last saw her son at Christmas. She last talked to him a few days before he returned to Iraq in early March. Before, he had wanted to go to Iraq because all of his friends were there, James said. This time he was reluctant, she said.

James stayed home from work yesterday and Monday to grieve; she says she has been asked to bring in a copy of her son's obituary. Burial will be at Arlington National Cemetery on Tuesday.

Walter Reed's World Of Hurt, Hope (WP)

By Susan Levine

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

Solomon Montgomery wakes up early on workdays. Hours before dawn, the first thing he does is pray.

He prays for the soldiers he will try to help that day, whose bodies were ravaged during attacks in Iraq. He prays that their families find comfort and courage. And with no end to the bloodshed in sight, he asks God for support. "Lord," he says, "give me the strength to do my job."

At 7 a.m., he reports for duty at Walter Reed Army Medical Center. The war remains ubiquitous in the operating rooms, some of which are set aside for the returning wounded, and on the wards, where amputees begin coming to terms with their new realities. Montgomery, a physical therapy assistant with the bulk of a former defensive end, works in a ball- and mat-filled space where, hour after hour, he challenges and cheers on brain-injured soldiers not much older than his own teenager.

So many have arrived in the past three years -- so many continue to arrive -- that they have transformed the hospital's routine. The staff has been redeployed, programs created, a special military company activated just for the injured. "This has become our normal," a nurse explains. But the cumulative effect of nearly 4,900 patients, including 1,458 battle casualties, has done more than change the institution. It has deeply affected the hundreds of doctors, nurses and therapists who work there -- who have been inspired by the resiliency and motivation of the individuals in their care, yet shaken and exhausted by the magnitude of loss.

Since the first soldier was admitted March 28, 2003, nine days after the invasion of Iraq, Walter Reed has confronted damage of daunting proportion: limbs blown off, guts blown open, brains devastated by piercing shrapnel or by concussive explosions, or maybe all that and more. The youth of the wounded elicits sadness, even tears. The veteran staff members look at these patients and see their sons and daughters. Their younger counterparts see siblings, friends.

"That's always my worst nightmare, that I'm going to take care of someone I know," says Capt. Matthew Hueman, a 31-year-old surgical resident whose West Point class has suffered casualties in the war.

Six thousand miles from the actual mortar fire, grenades and roadside bombs, it amounts to a different kind of combat fatigue.

At the start, they expected that the transports of casualties would taper off quickly. But three times a week, the white buses from Andrews Air Force Base still turn off Georgia Avenue NW through the hospital's main gate. They pull slowly up the looping drive to where a double line of gurneys and a small company of gown-clad escorts wait, and then each bus's back door swings open, revealing the litters of patients. Some soldiers are only 48 hours off the battlefield. The most critically injured are unloaded with so much medical equipment they are scarcely visible beneath it.

A pause to lower a litter, convey charts and untangle tubes, and then the new arrival is whisked inside, under the Walter Reed banner proclaiming "We provide warrior care" and on to a triage room.

That pause is all Michael Wagner needs to say, "Welcome home."

Over the past 2 1/2 years, the chief of the hospital's Medical Family Assistance Center estimates that he has greeted hundreds of patients, as well as thousands of family members. His first weeks, he struggled to find the right words. "This guy's missing a leg. What do I say to him?" he wondered. Until he understood: "They're not legs, they're not arms. They're human beings."

These days, the psychologist talks to spouses and parents with a gentle bluntness.

"How you doing?" he asks.

"Fine," they invariably say.

"How you doing?" he asks a second time.

"Fine," they repeat.

"Baloney," he says.

At which point family members usually cry. "You have to permit them to feel their hurt," he says.

Wagner, 56, is a retired Army colonel who joined up during the Vietnam War. After the 2001 terrorist attacks, he tried to volunteer anew, ultimately connecting with the command at Walter Reed and moving from Arizona to run interference for soldiers' families. At the assistance center -- established in response to the casualties' protracted presence -- he has been asked to secure everything from a massage to mortgage money. When all guest accommodations on post are filled, he persuades local hotels to provide rooms at no charge. "I need you to be a good American here," he tells hotel managers.

Still, 12-hour days consumed with strangers' needs are draining. Last fall, he finally realized how tired he was, "tired of seeing the wounded come in, young men and women in the prime of their lives, coming back ripped apart. . . . It was overload, burnout, whatever you want to call it."

The stress, he says, "wears on everybody in this hospital."

Wagner has learned how to take time off, how to get on his Harley and ride out of the city, into rural stretches of Maryland. He's reached a different place, not necessarily numb to the pain around him but able to put it in a broader context. "This is our normal," he says. "Our mission."

When he leaves the hospital grounds, which will receive soldiers until Walter Reed moves to Bethesda in several years, he finds himself looking for people with missing limbs. Their absence seems strange.

Her parents back in Washington state worry, but they don't press her for details. "How's life on the ward?" her mother will say, vaguely enough.

"We've got some complicated guys on the floor right now," Clarisa Nichols answers. She does not elaborate.

She is 24, and the hospital is her first duty station out of nursing school. She is assigned to Ward 57, the busy orthopedics unit once populated by older men and women recuperating from knee surgeries or hip replacements. In more than two years, 1st Lt. Nichols has seen virtually no such patients.

What she has seen are soldiers around her age, with massive pin-and-bolt armatures securing fractured bones or thick dressings covering raw stumps. They may be brought onto the floor with desert sand in their hair or spilling from their gear, and suddenly Iraq seems even closer. Nichols could be sent with scant notice to a combat support hospital there. Overseas duty is a matter of when, not if.

She will be ready. Her responsibilities at Walter Reed have made sure of that. At first, she questioned whether she would be able to handle them -- not so much emotionally as technically. Would she have the skills to do the job? She found herself tested on both fronts, staggered initially by the influx of casualties and challenged by their worst injuries.

"Sometimes," she says, "I'll go back to our break room and take a couple deep breaths. I'll think, 'Is there anything else I can possibly do?' "

Sometimes there is not. No more medicine she can offer, no relief other than a repositioned pillow or appendage. A patient Nichols will never forget, a soldier from the foreign forces assisting the United States in the fighting, writhed for hours one night. He spoke no English and would look at her uncomprehendingly. "There was no way I could reassure him," she says. "It was just one of those times; I sat down and held his hand. I felt helpless."

She balances that memory with the moments when patients took their beginning steps on a new prosthesis or returned with a smile and big hug after discharge. The nurses keep a bound book listing all the patients on the unit from December 2003, and on a slower shift, they'll get nostalgic looking through the pages. All told, the hospital has treated 323 amputees from Iraq and Afghanistan.

It also has seen the deaths of 11 service members.

"I can't believe how long it's been happening," Nichols reflects one afternoon. She has a younger brother in the Navy and a younger sister in the Army. "It's still hard to see an 18-year-old come in. Every so often, you wonder when it's going to end."

The number of battle casualties at Walter Reed fell to 408 during the third year of Operation Iraqi Freedom, compared with the more than 520 in each of the previous years. The trauma that sent them there -- frequently so extensive that the military coined the term "polytrauma" -- did not diminish.

Few wounds now hold the same shock factor for the hospital's surgeons. Col. Craig Shriver, who heads the general surgery department, remembers the teams of residents who came to him in late 2003 after their overnight rotations in the OR. "Three months is enough," they told him.

Recent teams have reacted far differently, though their chief doubts they are any tougher. More likely, after hearing and reading accounts of the injuries, they simply have been better fortified. "Maybe they've come to expect it," he says. As they are deployed, these new doctors will take their training directly to the troops.

Shriver himself has more than two decades in the Army and two tours as a combat surgeon. At 47, he could retire tomorrow. The reason he stays: As long as the conflict drags on, and the buses from Andrews return with their damaged cargo, he feels an obligation "to finish the job."

The last several years at Walter Reed have been the most demanding of his career. They've also been among the most humbling and rewarding. He marvels at the soldiers' attitude, their gratitude, their perseverance.

"What this has taught me is, our youngest generation is magnificent," he says.

It has renewed his faith in America.

By 10:40 in the morning, Solomon Montgomery is halfway through a set of balance exercises with 20-year-old Pfc. Daniel Perry of Somers, Conn.

"Move the top of your body," he says. "Give it a good stretch."

Bluish traces of shrapnel dot the left half of the soldier's pale face, betraying the blast that left him unconscious in an Iraqi bunker 27 days earlier. Perry met Montgomery when he was barely able to stand, unable to walk, incapable of following all but the simplest commands and angry and confused. He tried to kick the big guy, more than twice his size and age.

"Looks like this boy is going to be fun to work with," Montgomery responded cheerfully.

His PT unit focuses on those with traumatic brain injury. Before the war, it didn't exist. No need for it.

"I didn't realize what I was getting into," concedes Montgomery, a civilian employee who came to Walter Reed in 2000. During their time together, he has watched Perry make steady progress. Other patients have not. Two years ago, he was assigned a brain-injured soldier in his early twenties, a father of three whose youngest child had just been born. The man could neither hold nor see his baby: He had lost both arms and his eyesight.

Montgomery drove home that afternoon and went to bed. He stayed home the next day. He couldn't go to work; he couldn't even get out of bed. The tragedy seemed too overwhelming.

He has since found deeper reservoirs of strength -- his church in Brandywine, his Bible study group, his high school daughter, who senses when to ask, "Daddy, is the war bothering you again?" The war has brought them closer. The war, in fact, "has helped me grow to be a better man."

DOJ_NMG_0025556

He pauses. There is more.

"It's made me realize how precious life is," he says, "and the price you pay for freedom."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron Witness Calls Cuts 'Redeployments' (FINDLAW/AP)

By Michael Graczyk, Associated Press Writer

AP, April 5, 2006

(AP) - HOUSTON-A former Enron Corp. human resources supervisor testified Tuesday that people who moved from its struggling broadband venture were given opportunities to shift assignments, disputing earlier testimony that they were laid off.

Sarah Davis, testifying for a second day at the fraud and conspiracy trial of former Enron Chief Executive Jeffrey Skilling and founder Kenneth Lay, said the March 2001 cuts at Enron Broadband Services were "redeployments" and not layoffs.

Kenneth Rice, who ran Enron's money-losing broadband venture, testified in February that Skilling told him to characterize layoffs at the unit in early 2001 as redeployment so some 250 employees would believe they would keep their jobs and Wall Street analysts who influenced the company's stock would remain bullish on the weakening venture.

Asked by Skilling lawyer Mark Holscher if Rice or anyone else at Enron told her the cutbacks were "a ruse to lay people off" or "some sort of disguised layoffs," Davis replied: "No. It was redeployment."

But under cross-examination, she said it wasn't part of her duties to keep up with the business reasons for any redeployments or layoffs.

At the time of the broadband cuts, Skilling told analysts the unit had "strong growth." Rice testified that in addition to the layoffs, the unit burned through $100 million per quarter and efforts to stream video content on a fledgling network or trade Internet bandwidth were faltering.

On Monday, Davis testified Enron's hiring statistics from January through October of 2001 illustrated the company was "working robustly to bring in new talent," according to Lay attorney Chip Lewis.

As a sign of its continuing growth, Davis said she processed more than 100 new hires each month through an orientation program.

Davis was preceded on the witness stand by a former trader who was offered a promotion to shift from the profitable wholesale operation at Enron to the struggling retail division it was absorbing in 2001.

Prosecutors have presented witnesses who testified the assimilation of the risk and trading portion of its retail energy division, Enron Energy Services, was made to improperly cover up millions of dollars in losses.

Rogers Herndon, one of five witnesses testifying Monday as Lay and Skilling began their defense, said that wasn't the message he received when asked to head up risk assessment at the retail unit.

"No one ever said to you the move was to avoid losses in EES?" Skilling attorney Randall Oppenheimer asked.

"That's correct," replied Herndon, who reached the level of vice president at Enron before it imploded into bankruptcy in December 2001.

"We were not to be a profit center," he said, recalling his conversation in April 2001 with former EES Chief Executive David Delainey.

Delainey, who pleaded guilty in 2003 to insider trading and testified earlier for the prosecution, told jurors that in March 2001 he reluctantly agreed to a Skilling-approved plan to move part of the failing retail unit into the wholesale division to hide $200 million in losses.

Skilling and Lay insisted in public statements the move was made to increase efficiency and combine like trading functions. Both aim to testify.

Skilling's lead attorney Daniel Petrocelli told U.S. District Judge Sim Lake late Monday he expected the former Enron chief executive would take the stand as early as Wednesday. Lay also has said he is eager to tell his story to jurors.

The first defense witness was Joannie Williamson, who served as an assistant at various times to Skilling, Lay and former investor relations chief Mark Koenig, a key prosecution witness who pleaded guilty in August 2004 to aiding and abetting securities fraud.

Besides acknowledging his own guilt, Koenig in February also implicated Lay and Skilling in a string of falsehoods.

Asked by prosecutor Kathryn Ruemmler if she thought he had lied on the stand, Williamson said, "I think he was doing what he needed to do.

"I feel like Mark was under quite a lot of pressure," she said.

"Did he tell you he was pressured?" Ruemmler asked.

"No, he did not," Williamson replied.

Also on the stand Monday were Scott Stoness and Diann Huddleson, both former EES analysts. Stoness said Enron didn't know until May whether EES would have high losses, which was intended to challenge Delainey's recollection of moving its trading function into the larger division two months earlier to hide losses.

Huddleson said EES wasn't in disarray as Delainey and other government witnesses have said.

Skilling faces 28 counts of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and lying to auditors, while Lay faces six counts of fraud and conspiracy. Last week, Lake approved prosecutors' request to drop three counts against Skilling and one count against Lay to streamline their case.

Enron Defense Witness Testifies Skilling Didn't Favor Partnership (WSJ)

By Gary McWilliams

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

HOUSTON -- A former Enron Corp. executive testified that former President Jeffrey Skilling insisted that a controversial partnership run by the company's chief financial officer be treated the same as other bidders during the sale of an Enron subsidiary.

The defense witness's testimony is intended to show that the relationship between Enron and the partnership, known as LJM, was proper and at arm's length, as opposed to the conflict-laden relationship that prosecutors allege was used to manipulate the company's finances.

J. Mark Metts, who negotiated asset sales and acquisitions while at Enron, testified that Mr. Skilling never sought any favors for the LJM partnership amid the partnership's efforts to involve itself in a prospective asset sale that Mr. Metts was handling. LJM, a partnership set up and run by Andrew Fastow, Enron's former finance chief, is at the core of the government's conspiracy case. Prosecutors contend LJM was used improperly to hide losses from investors and to boost profits.

Mr. Skilling and former Enron Chairman Kenneth Lay are on trial in U.S. District Court here for alleged criminal conspiracy and fraud in connection with the collapse of the onetime energy titan. The defense began its case this week, and Mr. Skilling's eagerly awaited testimony could begin tomorrow.

Meanwhile, the lead defense attorney for Mr. Lay is hospitalized and could undergo surgery in the next few days to remove a blockage in his carotid artery. Houston attorney Michael Ramsey is undergoing tests at a local hospital. Yesterday, Mr. Lay's daughter, Elizabeth Vittor, an attorney on the defense team, said that Mr. Ramsey will be absent for an undetermined period, but is expected to return to court before the end of the trial.

Surgeons installed a coronary stent two weeks ago in the 66-year-old Mr. Ramsey. However, the contemplated artery surgery is unrelated to the installation of the stent, Ms. Vittor said. Yesterday, a spokeswoman said there were apparent problems with the stent that had sent him back to the hospital.

Mr. Metts, who was head of corporate development at Enron, said that after he canceled a meeting between LJM and an Enron subsidiary that he was trying to sell, Mr. Fastow complained to Mr. Skilling in April 2001. In a meeting several days later, Mr. Skilling never asked him to favor LJM and was "frustrated" by Mr. Fastow's behavior, Mr. Metts testified. "He agreed with me the only way LJM participates in the process was for LJM to play by the same rules as everybody else," Mr. Metts said.

Under questioning by prosecutors, Mr. Metts acknowledged he was demoted and assigned to a position under Mr. Fastow just a month after the dispute with Mr. Fastow arose. He also said Enron agreed to pay LJM as much as $600,000 to serve as a backup bidder on the deal he was negotiating. The business wasn't sold to the original bidder or LJM, he said. The prosecution has focused on LJM-Enron deals that didn't involve other bidders.

Mr. Metts was one of several former Enron employees who challenged statements by prosecution witnesses who had testified there were efforts to hide bad news from investors and pump up profits by manipulating accounting rules. Among other things, the former employees said they believed efforts to reduce staff at Enron Broadband Services, a telecommunications unit, and to reduce Enron's financial stake in the troubled Dabhol Indian power project were legitimate and proper.

The prosecution contends that Mr. Skilling told investors that firings at the unit were a "redeployment" to conceal the unit's troubles, and that Messrs. Lay and Skilling knew Dabhol should have been written down in mid-and-late 2001, but improperly refused to reduce the carrying value to avoid a downgrade of Enron's credit rating.

At The Enron Trial, Skilling Then Vs. Skilling Now (NYT)

By Kurt Eichenwald And Alexei Barrionuevo

DOJ_NMG_0025558

As Jeffrey K. Skilling, Enron's former chief executive, moves from the defense table to the witness stand as soon as today, he will have to be prepared to confront his own past testimony.

At his trial in Houston, Mr. Skilling will be bound by the very words he spoke under oath in secret testimony given more than four years ago, at a time when the Enron criminal investigation had not yet begun.

The testimony, taken in December 2001 as part of an investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission into the Enron debacle, serves as a road map to the defense Mr. Skilling will offer on the stand. It also points up some potential pitfalls he faces. A transcript of the testimony, which has not been made public, was obtained by The New York Times.

The transcript lays out not only what is sure to be the foundation of Mr. Skilling's own explanation for what went wrong at Enron, but also the words that could be used against him in cross-examination.

At the heart of Mr. Skilling's statements in his previous testimony was a simple refrain: Enron took every precaution; everything was legal; nothing was hidden; nothing was improper. But Mr. Skilling also advanced the argument that if anything illegal had occurred, he could not possibly have been on top of every transaction at Enron, simply because the company was too sprawling for any one person to control.

"Obviously, I couldn't see the whole company," Mr. Skilling testified when discussing his familiarity with the company's financial disclosures. "I mean, this was a gigantic company."

Some of Mr. Skilling's S.E.C. testimony appears to be in direct contradiction to statements made by prosecution witnesses in the nine weeks of the criminal trial so far. For example, at one point in the testimony, Mr. Skilling was asked by a government investigator whether Enron ever used reserves to help the company meet Wall Street's earnings expectations. Mr. Skilling flatly denied that, and went on to deny that any reserves existed for such a purpose.

Likewise, in Mr. Skilling's S.E.C. testimony, he denied that there were ever any last-minute dashes within Enron to meet quarterly earnings expectations from 1997, when he took on a top job at the company, to his departure in the summer of 2001.

"I don't think there was any time during that time period," he testified, "that by the end of the quarter we were concerned about the numbers."

But in the criminal trial, several witnesses, including Wesley H. Colwell, a former Enron accountant, testified that Enron used accounting reserves to lift the company's earnings in particular quarters for the purpose of meeting the projections of Wall Street analysts.

Mr. Colwell and other witnesses portrayed last-minute efforts to meet — and in one instance, to beat — those projections, requiring what they described as manipulations involving a penny or two of earnings per share.

Mr. Colwell testified that in July 2000, for example, Enron improperly dipped into reserves to increase earnings by $14 million, or from 32 cents a share to 34 cents a share, a change driven simply by management's desire "to make 34 cents per share" that period.

During the trial, government witnesses also portrayed a particular credit reserve, called Schedule C, as something of a "cookie jar" of earnings that could be used to help improve the company's reported performance. The earnings used in Schedule C were the product of the California energy crisis in 2000, which brought huge profits to Enron and other energy trading firms.

In his earlier testimony, Mr. Skilling said that Schedule C was a proper accounting reserve, which had been put together by Enron not to bolster earnings, but because of concerns the company had that California utilities that owed the money would never be able to pay because of their own financial troubles.

"The loss from PG&E alone was, I think, $560 million," Mr. Skilling testified. "These were significant numbers and so we started to reserve for those just to make sure that we could cover them if something did happen."

In the course of his S.E.C. testimony, Mr. Skilling also addressed the company's use of special-purpose entities that resulted in the company's shifting debt off the books — one of the central issues in the Enron scandal.

Such entities are commonly used throughout corporate America for that purpose, but to meet the accounting standards, investors independent of the company must provide a set percentage of the capital.

The accounting for several such entities proved to be improper, and several former Enron officials have pleaded guilty to criminal charges related to them. The restatement of the company's financial statements after those problems were discovered played a significant role in its ultimate collapse into bankruptcy in late 2001.

In his S.E.C. testimony, Mr. Skilling said that he had no knowledge of any problems with the accounting for transactions involving the entities.

"I had absolutely no reason, given the process and the signoffs, to have any expectation that the accounting did not properly reflect what the transactions — the way the transactions were structured," Mr. Skilling told the investigators in 2001. Mr. Skilling also discussed two entities affiliated with Enron that have been the subject of frequent testimony during the government case. One is LJM2, an investment fund operated by Andrew S. Fastow, who was Enron's chief financial officer; the fund was used for transactions with Enron.

Another is the Raptors, four partnerships used to provide hedges for company investments. A hedge, traditionally, is used to offset potential losses, with the value of the hedge going up as the value of the investment goes down.

The Raptors involved special purpose entities, requiring an outside investor. Mr. Fastow provided that outside capital through LJM2, which he led as general partner, handling investments from financial institutions and wealthy individuals.

But the Enron transactions, according to prosecution witnesses, were highly improper because they relied on secret side deals protecting Mr. Fastow and LJM2 from losses and similar problems undermining the Raptors.

In his S.E.C. testimony, Mr. Skilling was not asked if LJM2 received widespread guarantees against loss from Enron, which would be illegal. But he denied the existence of any secret side agreement that would have protected the investment fund from making good on its financial commitments.

As for the Raptors themselves, Mr. Skilling professed to have little knowledge of their workings, but said he knew that the company's accountants and Arthur Andersen, its auditing firm, had signed off on the deals.

"I cannot describe Project Raptor to you," Mr. Skilling testified. "Arthur Andersen was totally on board. They'd look at the structure and the governance and all the rest of the stuff. They thought it was fine, and it looked like it was a good way to hedge some of these high-technology investments that we had made. So it was approved by the board. But I don't recall the mechanics of how it worked."

But Ben F. Glisan Jr., the former treasurer, testified in the trial that he listed "accounting scrutiny" as his chief concern when he presented a Raptor hedging transaction to the board's finance committee in May 2000. Mr. Skilling, according to Mr. Glisan, told the directors at the meeting that day that Raptor was not a deal he would recommend "except for the fact that it allowed him to circumvent the accounting rules."

Mr. Skilling also portrayed himself in his S.E.C. testimony as something of a casual reader of Enron's financial statements, saying that he had placed his confidence in the company's financial controls to satisfy himself that the reporting was proper.

"I can't tell you I read them, you know, cover to cover," Mr. Skilling testified about the financial statements. "I felt by the time that process was completed that it was a fair and accurate presentation of what was going on in the company."

Key Defense Lawyer In Enron Trial Awaits More Surgery (WP)

2 Texas Attorneys Take Reins as Lay's Lead Counsel Is Hospitalized for Heart Blockage

HOUSTON, April 4 -- The lead lawyer for former Enron Corp. chairman Kenneth L. Lay has been hospitalized for more tests while he awaits surgery, a move that could put him out of commission for a significant portion of his client's defense against fraud charges.

Doctors at Houston's Methodist Hospital are evaluating Michael W. Ramsey, 66, for a new blockage in his carotid artery that doctors uncovered in tests Tuesday.

Last month, during a short break in the trial, Ramsey had a stent successfully implanted in a different artery to help correct shortness of breath and other symptoms he had since at least the third week of Lay and protege Jeffrey K. Skilling's trial.

Erin Fairchild, a spokeswoman for the hospital, said in an e-mail Tuesday that "blockage in the carotid artery is dangerous if left untreated because it can lead to stroke."

Elizabeth Vittor, Lay's daughter and a member of his legal defense team, called the carotid procedure doctors are contemplating "pretty significant surgery" and said it was unclear how long Ramsey's recovery would take. She added that the defense hoped Ramsey would be able to return quickly. In his absence, Dallas securities lawyer Bruce Collins and Houston appellate specialist George "Mac" Secrest take the reins for Lay.

Vittor said the defense did not anticipate requesting a delay in the trial "at this time."

Under current estimates, the case could go to the jury as early as the end of April.

Skilling is likely to appear on the witness stand Thursday, defense lawyers said. Lay, who was to be questioned by Ramsey, will testify sometime after Skilling is finished. Lay joked Tuesday that he expected Ramsey to return "in time to take full credit for the victory."

Also Tuesday, the second day of the defense case, several former Enron workers testified about a redeployment in the company's high-speed Internet unit, a power plant in Dabhol, India, and efforts to unload international assets.

Defense lawyers for Skilling and Lay attempted to show that government witnesses overstated troubles in each of those divisions. The defendants face multiple charges for making what prosecutors call overly optimistic statements to investors and employees about those topics in 2001.

Mark Metts, a lawyer who negotiated deals for Enron, testified Tuesday that experts inside and outside the company vetted important transactions. He also painted a negative portrait of former finance chief Andrew S. Fastow, who he said screamed at him after he told Fastow that "he had to play by the same rules as anybody else."

The government contends that Skilling gave favors to secretive partnerships controlled by Fastow. But Metts told the jury that Skilling was "extremely supportive" when Metts contacted him to express concern about a "power play" by Fastow in 2001. Shortly thereafter, another Enron official sent out a memo explicitly stating that Fastow's partnerships would not be favored over other bidders, defense lawyer Mark Holscher argued.

On cross-examination, Assistant U.S. Attorney Sean M. Berkowitz pointed out that weeks after the incident, Metts was demoted and that Skilling made the decision that Metts would report to Fastow.

D.C. Was Cheated, SEC Says (WP)

Firm Owes Funds For Charter Schools

Federal securities regulators yesterday accused a Maryland firm of defrauding the District of millions in federal and local funds earmarked for D.C. charter schools, saying the firm used the cash to try to prop up two failing subsidiaries.

In a complaint filed in federal court, the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission alleges that Geneva Capital Partners LLC and its owner, Eric M. Westbury of Silver Spring, obtained investments of more than $21 million from the District without telling D.C. officials that two of the city's advisers had a financial stake in Westbury's firms.

Westbury then used some of the cash to cover losses at his other companies, which together owe about $33 million to more than 2,000 small investors nationwide, the complaint says.

In addition, Geneva owes the District about $11 million. In a court hearing yesterday, SEC lawyers argued that the family of firms has insufficient assets to repay that and other debts.

"It's our view . . . that there's just not enough money for everyone to get their money back here," said Amy J. Greer, the SEC trial counsel handling the case. "We have a lot of companies all showing substantial losses. And I think it's unlikely that all of the investors, both the District and the [small investors], will be fully compensated."

Westbury did not return a call to his Bethesda office. His attorney, John M. Fedders, denied that Westbury is "a fraudster."

Westbury "has not engaged in fraud," Fedders said. "He is a man of high moral integrity, and high business ethics. I think there's an enormous misunderstanding here about some of the things that have gone on, and we dispute paragraph after paragraph of these SEC allegations."

U.S. District Judge Deborah K. Chasanow gave Fedders until April 26 to file his objections, and she set a hearing date for May 12. In the meantime, Chasanow barred Westbury from making payments to investors and ordered him to alert the court if any of them demands their money.

The order effectively prohibits Westbury from complying with the District's March 15 demand to return its remaining cash. However, the order also bars Westbury from giving the District's money to anyone else, said Daniel M. Hawke, associate district administrator for enforcement in the SEC's Philadelphia office.

District officials declined to discuss the case yesterday. But Deborah A. Gist, director of the D.C. State Education Office, which administers the charter school funds, issued a written statement saying her office "is aware that the SEC has concerns with Geneva Capital." The District "continues to deal with this issue seriously," she wrote, noting that the D.C. inspector general is also investigating.

So far, District officials have been unable to explain why they selected Geneva in 2003 to manage the charter school money, a combination of local and federal funds intended to help charter schools obtain bank loans to purchase, build and maintain facilities. Hawke and D.C. officials said mismanagement of the funds has not affected operations at any school.

The SEC complaint may shed some light on the selection process. Under the heading, "Additional Undisclosed Conflicts of Interest," the complaint accuses Westbury of failing to disclose to District officials that the financial manager of the charter school fund "had received a substantial loan" from one of Geneva's subsidiaries, SBM Certificate Co., "in connection with an unrelated commercial real estate project of his own."

In addition, the complaint says Westbury failed to tell D.C. officials that the general counsel for the charter school fund "was also an SBM board member.

"These two individuals were the very people on whom the District relied for advice and counsel relating to matters like its investments," the complaint says.

DOJ_NMG_0025561

In court documents, the financial manager was identified as Timothy Webb and the general counsel as Marialice B. Williams. They were described as independent contractors hired by the city to help manage the charter school funds. Webb, in particular, was responsible for identifying financial institutions to handle the investments, documents show.

Webb and Williams have been partners in several business ventures, according to the businesses' Web sites.

Webb could not be located late yesterday. Williams, reached at her District home, called the allegations "100 percent incorrect with respect to me."

"No one's called me at all," she said. "From the SEC or anywhere else." She referred a reporter to her attorney, who declined to comment.

Why Sweat The Small Stuff? (WSJ)

By Richard C. Pozen

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission recently announced a roundtable to discuss Section 404 of the Sarbanes-Oxley law, which requires an annual assessment by public companies of their internal controls over financial reporting. Critics question whether its benefits outweigh its costs, which have been much higher than originally estimated; because of these concerns, an SEC advisory committee recently proposed total or partial exemptions from Section 404 for small companies (with market capitalizations less than $787 million). However, some commentators have strongly opposed such exemptions, since these small companies constitute 80% of all publicly listed firms and are the ones most susceptible to financial frauds.

I take a middle ground: The current rules on assessing internal controls for all public companies should be revised, greatly reducing the costs of these assessments while preserving most of their benefits. Specifically, the management of every public company would be required to publish an annual assessment of the company's internal controls, attested to by the company's auditors. But such assessments would be focused on the company's internal controls over material information contained in the company's financial reports to the SEC.

The SEC has adopted two different requirements for internal controls. First, it has defined "internal control structure and procedures . . . for financial reporting" under Section 404 to include more items of information with more details than those ordinarily included in the financial reports of public companies. In the commission's view, internal controls must provide reasonable assurance not only that material information in the company's financial statements is accurate, but also "that receipts and expenditures of the company are being made only in accordance with authorization of management and directors of the company." By unlinking "internal controls" from "financial reporting" in Section 404, the SEC encourages management and auditors to scrutinize detailed procedures for controlling ordinary expenditures -- e.g., reimbursing travel expenses and handling petty cash -- even in cases where they are clearly immaterial to the company's financial reports.

Second, the SEC requires management to assess a public company's "disclosure controls" -- defined as "controls and other procedures . . . designed to ensure that information required to be disclosed by the issuer in the reports it files" with the commission "is recorded, processed, summarized and reported" in a timely manner. This rule on "disclosure controls" is very confusing since it overlaps with the rule on "internal controls." The SEC should end this confusion by combining both into one rule on "internal controls" over "financial reporting," which would cover the accuracy and timeliness of "material" information submitted by public companies in their financial reports to the commission.

The concept of "materiality" is traditionally judged by whether information is significant to a company's overall financial situation. However, a much broader concept of "materiality" is applied to Section 404 by the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board (PCAOB), which oversees all auditors of public companies. According to its Auditing Standard No. 2, an auditor must apply materiality "in an audit of internal controls over financial reporting at both the financial-statement level and at the individual-balance level" (emphasis added). This extension of materiality to individual balances tends to lead management and auditors to incur tremendous expense by examining controls over balances that are not financially significant for the company as a whole -- for example, reserve balances in a minor subsidiary, or inventory balances in a small factory.

The PCAOB's unduly expansive definition of materiality is exacerbated by its unduly expansive standard for assessing the likelihood of a problem occurring. According to Auditing Standard No. 2, "reasonable assurance" that internal controls are effective means that there is only a "remote likelihood that material misstatements will not be prevented or detected on a timely basis." This standard of "a remote likelihood" can easily lead to auditor concerns about internal controls based on hypothetical situations that have not occurred and are not very likely to occur. A more appropriate standard for determining that internal controls are effective would be that a problem is "unlikely to actually happen."

Suppose one employee signature is required for customer refunds under $100 and two signatures above that amount. The auditors may maintain that mishandling of small customer refunds is not "remote" because the one employee signing could, in theory, conspire with the customer to defraud the company. Yet the mishandling of small customer refunds is "unlikely to actually happen" because the one employee knows that his or her signature can easily be traced if any problem becomes evident on customer refunds.

Furthermore, Auditing Standard No. 2 states categorically: "There is no difference in the level of work performed" by the auditors when attesting to management's assessment of the company's internal controls, versus when the auditors express an opinion directly on the effectiveness of the company's internal controls. This approach leads to a high degree of redundant work: Management must test all of the company's internal controls; and the auditors can rely in part on management's testing, but only for less important areas of internal controls. A more efficient approach would be for the auditors to evaluate the design of the control systems, review the testing plan of management, and test a reasonable sample of internal controls.

In formulating their current rules, the PCAOB and the SEC were heavily influenced by an internal controls framework established in 1992 by COSO (a committee of sponsoring audit organizations). While its framework is excellent for many purposes, even the regulators recognize that, because it covers compliance with all laws and effectiveness of corporate operations, it is too broad for Section 404. COSO is now developing for small companies a control framework limited to financial reporting -- which should be extended to all public companies.

In short, instead of exempting small companies from Section 404, the SEC and the PCAOB should apply to all public companies narrower rules on internal controls. Management's assessment of internal controls should focus on the material information contained in the company's reports to the SEC, and the auditors should attest to management's assessment by reviewing its processes and sample testing. Both should apply the traditional concept of materiality -- financial significance relative to the whole company. In this manner, Section 404 will be very helpful in preventing material misstatements in a company's reports to the SEC, but at a much lower cost.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Child Porn Victim Tells House Panel The Justice Department Is Moving Too Slowly On Pedophiles (AP)

By LAURIE KELLMAN, Associated Press Writer

AP, April 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — Justin Berry, who for five years starred in his own Web cam child pornography business, told a House panel Tuesday that the Justice Department is moving too slowly to round up 1,500 pedophiles whose information he surrendered last year.

"I believed that the government would protect the children being abused. I believed they would act quickly," Berry, now 19, told the House Energy and Commerce Committee. "I was wrong."

Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra disputed that, citing a threefold increase in federal prosecutions of child pornography and abuse cases nationally over the past decade. The unit investigating Berry's case, which Sierra could not discuss, has seen its workload increase 450 percent in the last four years.

"One of law enforcement's highest priorities is the protection of innocent children from sexual predators who lurk on the Internet," Sierra said.

The same committee will hear from the Justice Department, among other federal agencies, on Thursday.

Berry's story of a lonely teenager who sought friends on the Internet but instead grew rich attracting pedophiles was reported in December by the New York Times after a six-month investigation. Its author, Kurt Eichenwald, told the Energy and Commerce Committee on Tuesday that Berry is the first such teenage witness known to turn over such a vast cache of evidence to the government.

But even Berry's catalog of his clients' names, credit card numbers and other details has resulted in only one arrest, he and Eichenwald said.

"From the time that the government was notified of Justin's information to the point where the children in direct danger were saved, more than 50 days passed," Eichenwald told the panel. "Some people identified as perpetrators literally could not get themselves arrested if they tried."

Berry embarked on his sordid journey into the world of pedophelia and drugs when at 13, living in Bakersfield, Calif., he acquired a Web camera as part of a deal with an Internet service provider. A lonely kid of a divorced family without many friends, Berry hoped to use the device to make friends his own age.

Instead, a pedophile sent him an instant message within minutes of Berry's image landing on a Web site called Spotlife.com. More followed; then men worked to earn his trust.

"At 13, I believed these people were my friends," Berry told the panel. "They were kind. They complimented me. They wanted to know about my day."

A few weeks later, he said, "everything changed" when one man proposed to pay Berry $50 to take off his shirt for a few minutes in front of the Web cam. The man helped Berry set up an account with Paypal, an online money payment system.

Last June, Eichenwald approached Berry for a story he was doing on Internet pornography. Berry agreed to help with the story and tell law enforcement what he knew about other children being exploited.

But the Justice Department and other massive federal agencies were slow to respond, Berry and Eichenwald told the panel. Berry said he has feared for his life.

DHS Spokesman Is Accused Of Soliciting Teen Online (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

The deputy press secretary for the Department of Homeland Security was arrested last night on charges that he used the Internet to seduce an undercover Florida sheriff's detective who he thought was a 14-year-old girl, the Polk County Sheriff's Office said.

Brian J. Doyle, 55, was arrested at his Silver Spring home at 7:45 p.m. and charged with seven counts of using a computer to seduce a child and 16 counts of transmitting harmful materials to a minor, according to a sheriff's office statement.

Agents with the department's Inspector General's Office, the U.S. Secret Service, the Montgomery County police and the Polk County Sheriff's Office served a search warrant and seized his home computer and other materials, the statement said.

Doyle was online at the time awaiting what he thought was a nude image of a girl who had lymphoma, Polk County Sheriff Grady Judd said in an interview with Fox News' "On the Record With Greta Van Susteren." "We wanted to make sure he was using that computer and talking to detectives at the time of the arrest," Judd said.

In his initial communication last month, Doyle told an undercover computer-crimes detective who he was and that he worked for the Department of Homeland Security, later disclosing numbers for his office phone and government-issued cellphone and using those lines, the sheriff's office said.

"If he would provide that kind of information to include a photograph of himself with his identification tags, who else may he be talking to around the world who he thinks to be a 14-year-old girl?" Judd said on CNN's "Anderson Cooper 360."

Attempts to reach Doyle, who was booked into the Montgomery County jail on the Polk County charges, on his office and cellphone numbers and by his official e-mail were unsuccessful.

He was a TSA spokesman before becoming deputy press secretary last year to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff.

Chertoff press secretary Russ Knocke declined to comment on the case beyond releasing a written statement, saying, "We take these allegations very seriously and we will cooperate fully with this ongoing investigation."

Judd said Doyle confessed and waived extradition to Polk County.

According to the sheriff's office, Doyle initiated a sexually explicit conversation with the detective on March 12 in response to an Internet profile of a 14-year-old girl.

Doyle allegedly sent pornographic movie clips, non-pornographic photos of himself and instant messages from his AOL account, the police statement said. The sheriff's office alleged that Doyle "on many occasions" instructed the undercover detective to perform a sexual act while thinking of him and described explicit acts he wished to perform.

Another Homeland Security official -- Frank Figueroa, special agent in charge of U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement in Tampa -- faces trial this week on charges of exposing himself to a teenage girl last year at a mall. Figueroa, who has been suspended, pleaded not guilty.

Official Accused Of Soliciting Girl (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, April 5, 2006

A Homeland Security deputy press secretary was arrested last night at his Silver Spring home on charges he used the Internet to solicit sex from a 14-year-old girl.

DOJ_NMG_0025564

Brian J. Doyle, 55, of Silver Spring, was arrested on charges out of Polk County, Fla., shortly before 8 p.m. yesterday. Officials say he used a computer to seduce a child and shared materials harmful to a minor through explicit conversations and pornographic movie clips.

The girl, however, was an undercover Polk County Sheriff's computer crimes detective.

"We take these allegations very seriously, and we will cooperate fully with the ongoing investigation," said William Knocke, spokesman for the Homeland Security Department.

Mr. Doyle revealed his identity to the undercover officer as well as his government and cell-phone numbers. Reports say that Mr. Doyle asked the undercover officer to perform sexual acts and that he described explicit sexual activities he wanted to engage in with her.

Mr. Doyle will be placed on administrative leave today pending an investigation and may be extradited to Florida to face charges.

Mr. Knocke declined to comment further on the charges or say how long Mr. Doyle has been under investigation by the sheriff's office, by the Florida State Attorney's Office and the Department of Homeland Security's inspector general.

He faces 23 charges of using a computer to "seduce a child," according to a statement by the Polk County Sheriff's Department.

"In addition to their online chatting, Doyle used the Internet to send hard-core pornographic movie clips to the 'girl' and used the AOL Instant Messenger chat service to have explicit sexual conversations with her," the police report said.

Law-enforcement officials also served a search warrant at his residence, during which they seized his home computer and other materials relative to this case.

"We will go after child predators, no matter where they live, to protect our innocent children," says Polk County Sheriff Grady Judd.

Minor's Bond Revoked; Attorney Taken To Jail (BSH)

By Anita Lee

Biloxi (MS) Sun Herald, April 5, 2006

JACKSON - U.S. District Court judge Henry T. Wingate revoked attorney Paul Minor's bond in the judicial bribery case Tuesday because Minor violated the terms of his release by getting drunk.

The order to revoke bond was handed down in a hearing Tuesday morning in Jackson.

Wingate said he would have considered a treatment plan had the defense presented one. Instead, defense attorney Dennis Sweet of Jackson argued that Minor wasn't drunk March 6 at the Marriott Hotel in Jackson.

Minor was taken into custody by the U.S. Marshals Service and will be transferred to the Madison County jail, where he is scheduled to remain until trial. However, Minor attorney Brad Pigott of Jackson said the defense plans to present an alternative treatment plan for alcohol abuse as soon as possible.

Wingate indicated he would be willing to consider such a plan as an alternative to incarceration.

A morning's testimony about his condition that night conflicted, but Wingate found Drug Enforcement Administration agents who witnessed Minor's intoxication more convincing than testimony from two Marriott employees who got to know Minor over the course of his first judicial bribery trial last summer.

Closing Arguments For N.Y. Detectives Accused Of Killing For Mob (NSDY/AP)

By Tom Hays, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, April 5, 2006

NEW YORK -- A former detective accused of leading a double life as a hitman for the mob was a dedicated lawman and aspiring screenplay writer who was fingered by corrupt government cooperators, his lawyer said during a blustery closing argument at the racketeering trial.

Louis Eppolito, after retiring to Las Vegas in the early 1990s, "was creating stories, writing stories," the attorney, Bruce Cutler told the jury on Tuesday. "There's nothing illegal about writing scripts."

Authorities say Eppolito, 57, and his ex-partner, Stephen Caracappa, 64, were involved in eight killings between 1986 and 1990 while on the payrolls of the New York Police Department and Luchese crime family underboss Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso. The so-called "Mafia cops" allegedly accepted $4,000 a month to help Casso silence informants and rub out rivals.

The federal jury in Brooklyn was to begin deliberations Wednesday. If convicted, the defendants would face possible sentences of life in prison.

In a sometimes booming voice, Cutler attacked the credibility of two key government witnesses _ confessed drug dealer Burton Kaplan, who claimed he was the middleman between Casso and the detectives for the hits, and admitted embezzler

Steven Corso, who wore a wire while offering the defendants drug money to finance a film project at a 2004 meeting in Las Vegas.

Kaplan "led a double life, a triple life, even a quadruple life," Cutler said.

The lawyer described Corso as a "sophisticated, unctuous, polished, low-life thief." He labeled a third witness _ a sixth-grade dropout who testified he was forced to dig the grave of one victim while Eppolito stood guard _ a "subhuman gnome."

The witnesses "have no heart, they have no soul, like these television screens," Cutler said, gesturing to courtroom monitors. "There'll be no redemption in this temple of justice."

During a rebuttal, prosecutor Robert Henoch argued that the defense never explained why Kaplan knew personal details about the lives of "Brooklyn's finest." He also asked jurors to focus on Corso's testimony about asking the ex-officers to help him score drugs for some potential film backers from Hollywood who were visiting Las Vegas in 2005.

The partners "could have walked away," Henoch said. Instead, he said, "Those men went right into a drug deal."

The defense has argued the drug charges were cooked up and tacked onto the case solely to overcome the five-year statute of limitations on the killings. The government contends all the crimes were part of a two-decade conspiracy.

Prosecutors can bring charges "within five years of the end of the conspiracy," Henoch said. "This one never ended. You know that from the drug deal."

Henoch closed by urging jurors, "Make this a temple of justice _ hold them accountable."

Defense Closes With Style In Trial Of 2 Ex-Detectives (NYT)

By ALAN FEUER

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

Bruce Cutler stood up yesterday and buttoned his suit coat. It was a dark blue suit coat, and he gave its shoulders a quick athletic roll, then went to work.

He raised his voice. He raised his fist. He raised the issue of whether ducks can stand a chance against coyotes and then, amid digressions into David Lean's movie "The Bridge on the River Kwai" and the life of Crazy Horse, the Oglala Sioux warrior chief, he drew upon his 2,072-page fourth edition of the American Heritage Dictionary and raised a last argument in defense of his client, Louis J. Eppolito, a defendant in the so-called Mafia Cops case.

Though Mr. Eppolito stands at the center of the federal trial — accused, with his former partner, Stephen Caracappa, of killing for the mob — Mr. Cutler, 57, has stood as the trial's resident semiotician. His summation was less a legal argument than a free-associative ode, a lawyerly tone poem on the themes of hope, justice and the spoken word.

"I've tried as best I can to use the English language in a precise way," he told the jury. "I've tried to use words in a precise way. It was drilled into me as a boy."

Thus it was that he turned to the dictionary — "Because that's where the words are," he explained — and read aloud the definition of "justice" ("the quality of being just, fairness"), which led him, somehow, to the definition of "spring" ("the season of the year between winter and summer during which the weather becomes warmer and plants revive"), which led him to the definition of "hope" ("to wish for something with an expectation of its fulfillment"), which led him to his own hopes, which were, as he put it, that in the future, people like the government's witnesses — men he has attacked as "desiccated miserable lowlifes" — "will not be permitted in a court of law, a temple of justice."

From the start, the Brooklyn racketeering trial has had its share of literary moments (including mentions of Mr. Eppolito's memoir, "Mafia Cop"), but Mr. Cutler's presentation was a masterpiece of rambling allusion, including references to Émile Zola, the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., the Brooklyn Bridge, the Acela train and the soullessness of television — all delivered in what could be called the Belle Apocalyptic style.

It may be best — at least in terms of his summation — to think of Mr. Cutler less as a lawyer than a poet, a bebopping, stream-of-consciousness type who progresses more by rhythm than by logic. At times he swerved between the third and second person, addressing unseen government witnesses; at others, he donned someone else's first person, assuming the identities of the witnesses themselves.

He proved himself a master not only of the metaphor (saying that Mr. Eppolito had carried "the backpack of his lineage" so long that "his legs grew strong"), but also of the pejorative.

A short list of the insults he has hurled includes: "cretin," "reprobate," "bum," "degenerate," "thieving scurvy lowlife" and "sophisticated unctuous polished lowlife thief." But yesterday he outdid even himself when he referred to a 5-foot-4, illiterate government witness as a "gnome" — defined, from the dictionary again, as "one of a race of dwarflike creatures who live underground and guard treasure hoards."

In between these slights, Mr. Cutler derided the reporters covering the trial as "scribes" and the prosecutors as men "with light shows and erudition" whose "machines are bereft and denuded of life."

"There is no hope in those machines," he said.

He even found time to discuss his client, a man who, unlike the "intelligent, educated, sophisticated, professional" prosecutors, was "a cop," "a working man," "a man who has to be someplace, to do something, who contributes somehow." It was a leitmotif of his summation: the distinction between the working class and the federal elite.

The embodiment of that elite was, in some sense, Robert Henoch, the chief prosecutor, an earnest, Jimmy Stewart-like man, who has said that his father has attended every one of his trials. Mr. Henoch closed the government's case yesterday with a rebuttal summary; today the jury is expected to get the case.

Mr. Henoch is a colonel in the Army Reserve and seemed affronted by Mr. Cutler's slurs.

"You can't just say it and it becomes true," he said in his rebuttal. "You need evidence in a temple of justice — not just words from the dictionary."

Closing Arguments For Detectives Accused Of Killing For Mob (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, April 5, 2006

The jury in the "Mafia Cops" trial is set to begin deliberations Wednesday morning in a case that is labeled by prosecutors as the most bloody betrayal of honor and public trust ever perpetrated by police officers.

After Brooklyn federal Judge Jack B. Weinstein goes over an 11-page verdict sheet with them, the jurors will retire to deliberate on whether retired NYPD detectives Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa are guilty of being hit men for the mob.

Tuesday, after hours of being cajoled, roused and emotionally tugged at by the closing arguments of prosecution and defense attorneys, the jury went home for the day after Weinstein took about two hours to read a complex legal charge. The panel is set to return to court at 9:30 Wednesday morning.

Eppolito, 57, and Caracappa, 64, are charged with acting as double agents for the Luchese crime family during the late 1980s and early 1990s. For cash bribes believed to have totaled $375,000, prosecutors contend that the defendants took part in eight gangland murders and leaked confidential police information to former Luchese boss Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso.

In a booming voice and with arm gestures that made him look like an orchestra conductor or aerobics instructor, attorney Bruce Cutler, who is representing Eppolito, said in his summation yesterday that the government witnesses were a combination of cunning thieves and lowlifes.

Cutler described Burton Kaplan, the admitted middle man between Casso and the cops, as a man who led "a double life, a triple life, even a quadruple life." He said another witness, accountant Stephen Corso, was a "sophisticated, unctuous, polished, lowlife thief." Peter Franzone, a parking lot operator who admitted digging a grave for one murder victim, was a "subhuman gnome," Cutler said.

Eppolito, Cutler said, retired to Las Vegas in the early 1990s to break into Hollywood and was "creating stories, writing stories. ... There's nothing illegal about writing scripts."

However, in a rebuttal, assistant U.S. attorney Robert Henoch said that Cutler and Edward Hayes, who is representing Caracappa, never addressed the facts.

"When you make a speech but don't go into the details, then something is wrong," Henoch said. He said that Cutler's presentation was "big voice, big words, big vocabulary."

Henoch stressed that the defense couldn't damage the testimony of witnesses like Kaplin and Corso.

"They didn't make a dent, not a scratch," Henoch said.

Henoch also turned a trial reference by the defense to Psalm 23 into a emotional tug for murder victim Israel Greenwald, whose body was unearthed last year after being missing for two decades.

"Twenty years later Leah Greenwald got to recite Psalm 23" at her husband's grave, he said.

"How dare they bring that into this courtroom?" he said, refering to the defense.

Outside the courtroom Leah Greenwald embraced Henoch. "You were amazing, you were so beautiful," she said.

Time Of Essence In 'Mafia Cops' Trial (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Staff Writer

March 9, 2000.

The Brooklyn federal court jury mulling the fate of ex-officers Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa will have to focus on that date to determine if both men escape from possible life in prison in the "Mafia Cops" trial.

DOJ_NMG_0025567

For three weeks Eppolito, 57, and Caracappa, 64, have been on trial for racketeering conspiracy, drug dealing and money laundering charges. More than 40 witnesses have testified and numerous exhibits have been introduced as evidence that prosecutors contend are strong enough to convict both men of being double agents for the mob, with involvement in eight killings.

But the 500-pound legal gorilla in the case involves the statute of limitation for racketeering conspiracy, something that concerns Judge Jack Weinstein. For someone to be convicted, the conspiracy must have continued to exist within five years of the date of the indictment. In the case of Eppolito and Caracappa, both of whom were arrested on March 9, 2005, the conspiracy must have continued to exist as of March 9, 2000.

If the jury finds that the conspiracy and Eppolito's and Caracappa's involvement in it ended before March 9, 2000, then the two defendants would be acquitted of the racketeering charges, including the murders. However, drug and money laundering charges would remain regardless.

There have been examples of defendants found guilty of the underlying racketeering offenses but able to escape responsibility because of a statute of limitation problem. One such instance was in 1987, when former Bonanno crime family members Salvatore Vitale and Joseph Massino beat a racketeering case involving hijackings.

The verdict sheet the jury will submit first lists the various murders charged in the conspiracy and then deals with the statute of limitation.

One former federal prosecutor thinks that order favors the government.

"They [the jurors] will be more inclined to find a conspiracy continued subsequent to the key date," said Steven K. Frankel, now a criminal defense attorney in Manhattan.

The guilty findings on the murders could convince jurors that the defendants shouldn't escape on a technicality, Frankel said.

Mob Cops' Dramatic Finish (NYDN)

By John Marzulli, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, April 5, 2006

One government witness was belittled as a gnome. Another was dismissed as a cretin.

To be blunt, defense lawyer Bruce Cutler wasn't holding back in his closing arguments in the so-called Mafia Cops trial, which goes to the jury in Brooklyn Federal Court today.

Jurors will tackle a 12-page verdict form that is constructed in such a way that they must first decide whether Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa murdered for the mob.

After that is decided, jurors will find a question on page 10 that could throw out the racketeering case - even if the jury believes the ex-cops were killers.

The defense contends that their clients must be declared not guilty unless the prosecutors have proven that the ex-cops continued to commit crimes beyond the statute of limitations date of March 2000 - five years before the indictment was filed. To prove that the ex-cops are guilty of racketeering, prosecutors must show that the pair continued their lives of crime well after the last alleged murder.

If found guilty, the two face life in prison.

Cutler, Eppolito's lawyer, didn't focus on parsing legal technicalities - that's not his style. Instead, Cutler directed his theatrical skills full-bore at the government's key witnesses, ripping them as "cretins, subhumans and gnomes," among other choice terms.

"I hope the day will come when the sweetheart pacts given to cretins and devils will be proscribed by Congress. I hope I live to see that day," Cutler roared.

In keeping with the previous four weeks, Cutler offered no alternative theory or alibi to clear his client or suggest reasonable doubt. But there was plenty of name-calling.

The barrel-chested barrister said he'd thumbed through a dictionary to describe witness Peter Franzone and came up with "gnome" for the 5-foot-4 former parking lot operator, who admitted burying the corpse of murder victim Israel Greenwald.

"Real detectives would have preferred murder charges against him," Cutler said without offering any evidence that Franzone, who places Eppolito and Caracappa at the scene, was the killer.

Of star witness Burton Kaplan, who was the alleged intermediary between the Mafia cops and Luchese crime underboss Anthony (Gaspipe) Casso, he "lived a double life, a triple life or even a quadruple life."

Cutler likened corrupt accountant Steven Corso, who recorded Eppolito and Caracappa last year allegedly planning to launder drug money, to Hal the coyote - who was eating innocent ducks in Central Park until his untimely death while in captivity.

That money-laundering allegation is crucial for the prosecution because it shows the conspiracy didn't end when Eppolito and Caracappa retired from the NYPD, but continued until the time of their arrest last year. "Lou never knowingly laundered money. He wouldn't know how to. More importantly he wouldn't want to," Cutler said.

Prosecutor Robert Henoch got the last turn to rebut the defense arguments, damning Cutler and Caracappa's lawyer Edward Hayes with faint praise.

"These are two heavyweight champions and they didn't land a punch, not a scratch, not a bloody nose," he said. "Lou Eppolito and Steve Caracappa knew Burt Kaplan, there cannot be a single doubt about that, and Mr. Hayes and Mr. Cutler did not say a single word about that. The silence is deafening."

WILY 'MOB COP' DEFENSE (NYPOST)

By Zach Haberman

The New York Post, April 5, 2006

A "Mafia cop" defense lawyer yesterday took his final swipes at the prosecution's star turncoat witnesses - likening one admitted embezzler to Hal the Central Park coyote - before the sensational case went to the jury.

"The coyote was eating the ducks - the ducks didn't have a chance," lawyer Bruce Cutler bellowed about witness Stephen Corso, comparing him to Hal, who recently died after being caught roaming through Central Park.

Then, referring to his client, ex-Detective Louis Eppolito, Cutler added, "Lou was no match for this man."

Cutler ripped Corso, a wire-wearing former accountant who was nabbed stealing millions of dollars from clients, as a "sophisticated, unctuous, polished, low-life thief."

Corso allegedly caught Eppolito and fellow alleged rogue cop Stephen Caracappa facilitating a drug deal in Las Vegas, charges that are coupled with eight murders that the pair reputedly helped carry out for Luchese underboss Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso. All the while, the pair proudly wore their gold NYPD detective shields as they pocketed $375,000 in Mafia money, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Henoch.

But Cutler accused another key witness in the feds' case, convicted drug dealer Burton Kaplan, as leading "a double life, a triple life, even a quadruple life."

Referring to the prosecution witnesses, Cutler sniffed, "They have no heart, they have no soul. They're empty like these [courtroom] television screens."

Cutler even slammed diminutive witness Peter Franzone, a garage worker who testified that he was forced to dig a grave for murdered diamond dealer Israel Greenwald, as a "subhuman gnome."

But Henoch said the cops' relationship to Kaplan "has no innocent explanation."

"If you're a cop, you can't associate with known criminals," Henoch said.

"The truth is not always pretty, but the truth is always perfect," he said before imploring the jury to "make this a temple of justice - hold them accountable."

The jury will begin deliberating this morning.

Phony Sheik Selling Fake Rembrandt Is Sentenced (SLPD)

By Peter Shinkle, ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, April 5, 2006

ST. LOUIS -- A man who admitted posing as a Saudi sheik as part of a scheme to sell a fake Rembrandt painting for $2.8 million, was sentenced Tuesday to 10 months in confinement.

Majed A. Ihmoud, 53, of St. Charles, pleaded guilty in October of conspiring to commit mail fraud for his role in the scam.

Ihmoud took the fake of Rembrandt's "Man with the Golden Helmet" to the Adam's Mark Hotel in downtown St. Louis on Aug. 12, 2004, expecting to sell it to a buyer for $2.8 million, the FBI said.

Ihmoud, who dressed as a sheik before the meeting, had launched the scam earlier by spreading the word around St. Louis that he was a member of the Saudi royal family and had a Rembrandt for sale, said Robert Wittman, senior investigator on the FBI's art crime team.

"He said he had a Rembrandt for sale that had come out of the Middle East," said Wittman, who is based in the FBI's Philadelphia office.

The buyer, who provided a check for $2.8 million at the meeting in the Adam's Mark, was an undercover FBI agent, Wittman said. Ihmoud was later informed he had been the target of a sting, and was unable to cash the check.

Ihmoud also admitted that in another scam he sold a pair of brass doors for $130,000 under the bogus claim that they once belonged to boxer Muhammad Ali. The doors, which in fact had not belonged to Ali, were worth only about $10,000, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Matt Drake, the prosecutor on the case.

Ihmoud also arranged for an artist to examine paintings by Van Gogh at the St. Louis Art Museum as part of a plan to have the artist paint forgeries, prosecutors said.

On Tuesday, U.S. District Judge Richard Webber sentenced Ihmoud to five months of prison and five months of home confinement. The judge also ordered him to repay the government $1,500, the amount an undercover agent gave him as a down payment for the doors.

A Wisconsin art dealer, Marilyn Karos, pleaded guilty March 8 to conspiracy and mail fraud for her role in the schemes to sell the bogus Rembrandt and the brass doors. Karos, who is already serving a prison term for possessing stolen art, is scheduled to be sentenced May 31.

Links Between Pellicano, Director Come Into Focus (LAT)

By Claudia Eller, Greg Krikorian And Kim Christensen, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, April 5, 2006

About noon on Feb. 24, two FBI agents visited veteran producer Charles Roven in his Sunset Boulevard office after calling to tell him that he was allegedly a victim of Hollywood private eye Anthony Pellicano.

The agents brought a tape recording that would startle Roven, according to sources close to the investigation. Director John McTiernan, whom Roven worked with on the 2002 box office flop "Rollerball," was allegedly on the tape with Pellicano, discussing the details of Roven's wiretapped conversations.

Pellicano allegedly briefed McTiernan on Roven's conversations regarding "Rollerball," the sources said, as well as Roven's personal calls.

Authorities charged McTiernan on Monday with lying about having hired Pellicano. A day later, the full extent of McTiernan's reliance on the indicted detective was beginning to come into focus.

McTiernan's association with Pellicano began years ago, long before the alleged Roven wiretap, when the director allegedly hired the private eye in 1998 as part of his highly publicized divorce. But it did not end there. Pellicano also allegedly intimidated a witness in a manslaughter case involving the son of McTiernan's ex-wife, Donna Dubrow.

In an interview Tuesday, Dubrow said she has seen financial records indicating that her ex-husband paid Pellicano in the neighborhood of $100,000 during their protracted divorce. The payments began at least as far back as June 1998, she said, adding that she did not know what services they were for.

"I do know that he hired Pellicano … in our divorce," Dubrow said. "I do not know if he wiretapped me."

McTiernan could not be reached for comment Tuesday.

Based on Dubrow's account, McTiernan had a well-established relationship with Pellicano when he began his collaboration with Roven on "Rollerball" in 2000. That collaboration began when the Los Angeles-based Mosaic Media Group, a multimedia, talent management and production company in which Roven is a partner, signed a deal with MGM to co-finance a slate of movies, including "Rollerball."

McTiernan directed and produced the film, on which Roven was also a credited producer.

People involved in "Rollerball" confirmed that McTiernan and Roven, both known for being strong-willed, had numerous creative disagreements over the film. But, they added, they could not recall any blowups between the two, and characterized the friction as typical for a Hollywood production.

When McTiernan learned that Roven was being brought aboard the project, according to one person familiar with the matter, he gained assurances that he would retain virtually all of the creative control as a way to limit Roven's role as a hands-on producer.

As a result, people who worked on the movie were mystified why McTiernan would have allegedly resorted to hiring Pellicano to wiretap Roven.

At the time, coincidentally, Roven's Sunset Boulevard office was across the street from Pellicano's. In early 2002, Roven moved into the same building where Pellicano was based.

Roven's productions include "Batman Begins, "Three Kings," "Twelve Monkeys" and "Scooby-Doo." He was married to the late Dawn Steel, former head of Columbia Pictures, who died of a brain tumor in 1997. Through his representatives, Roven declined to comment.

Three years before Roven's collaboration with McTiernan began on "Rollerball," McTiernan employed Pellicano as part of his divorce case. Court records in the case assert that he hired Pellicano to "harass and intimidate witnesses" in a closed criminal case involving Dubrow's son, Ethan Dubrow.

Ethan Dubrow was 26 in 1993 when a shotgun he was showing to friends at his Los Angeles home discharged, fatally wounding one of his dinner guests, Adam Scott.

After initially telling police that he thought the gun was not loaded, Dubrow later pleaded guilty to involuntary manslaughter in the death of Scott, 27, the son of Jack Scott, then president of Pasadena City College and now a Democratic state senator from Altadena.

In May 1998, several years after Dubrow's guilty plea, one of the witnesses in the shooting said Pellicano called her and implied that she had been involved in obstructing justice in the case. He accused Ethan Dubrow and his attorney of hustling her out of the country before she could testify.

The witness, Suzonne Stirling, said in a sworn declaration that she at first put Pellicano off, but called him back a few hours later to deny Pellicano's allegation that she might have obstructed justice and to ask why he was raising questions about Scott's death.

Stirling said Pellicano initially refused to identify his client but relented, saying "he had been hired by John McTiernan, who was getting a divorce from Ethan's mother."

When she asked him what that had to do with Adam Scott's death, Stirling said, Pellicano told her the case had not been thoroughly investigated and it was unheard of that Ethan Dubrow had served no time in jail after his conviction.

"Mr. Pellicano told me that Ethan was not working, that Ethan's mother was supporting him, that the money for Ethan's support was coming out of John's pocket, and that John wanted to know the truth," Stirling said in her declaration.

Stirling also said that Pellicano apparently had investigated her as well.

"Mr. Pellicano made several comments to me which made it clear to me that he knew several personal facts about me, including where my grandmother lived," Stirling said.

The contact by Pellicano came in the midst of a nasty divorce, which began when McTiernan allegedly served Dubrow with divorce papers disguised as a gift-wrapped package he had delivered to her.

In addition to squabbling over money that Dubrow may have used to support her son, the couple fought over millions of dollars worth of property, including a Wyoming ranch and a private plane.

In the meantime, federal prosecutors Tuesday underscored the complexity of their still-unfolding investigation in court papers that aim to block efforts by Pellicano's lawyer to derail the case.

Last month, attorney Steven Gruel challenged the legality of the federal government's search of Pellicano's offices and raised questions about witnesses and evidence collected by authorities.

In its response Tuesday, the U.S. attorney's office disputed the notion that authorities used a threat allegedly involving Pellicano as a ruse to search his Sunset Strip offices.

The search warrant, they said, was based on a June 2002 threat against a Los Angeles Times reporter and the agents involved in the search "were no more looking for evidence of wiretapping than they were looking for the plastic explosive and homemade bombs that they found in defendant's safe."

Astorga Waives Extradition, Will Return To New Mexico (ALBTRIB)

By Maggie Shepard, Tribune Reporter

Albuquerque Tribune, April 5, 2006

Posted 12:48 p.m. Michael Paul Astorga, wanted in connection with two Albuquerque-area homicides, waived his extradition hearing in an El Paso, Texas courtroom, Erin Kinnard, Bernalillo County Sheriff's Department spokeswoman, said this afternoon.

That means Astorga won't put up a court fight about returning to New Mexico to face at least two open counts of murder, one of which could carry the death penalty.

It's unclear when Astorga, 29, will return to Albuquerque.

Astorga, who spent a day on the FBI's top 10 "Most Wanted" list over the weekend, was captured Monday in Mexico.

He's wanted in the March 22 killing of Bernalillo County sheriff's Deputy James McGrane Jr., 38.

At the time of McGrane's killing, Astorga was a fugitive wanted for the slaying of Candido Ray Martinez last November.

Astorga Headed To New Mexico (KTSM-TV)

KTSM-TV, April 5, 2006

After being caught in Juarez on Monday, Michael Astorga is back in the U.S. and headed to New Mexico.

Tuesday, April 4, 2006 — Michael Astorga was brought back into the United States early Tuesday morning. That's just one day after being caught in Juarez. Chiuhuaha State Police found him in an SUV with guns, bullets and marijuana.

DOJ_NMG_0025571

Astorga had two outstanding warrants: One for the shooting death of Bernalillo County Sheriff's Deputy James McGrane. The other for the murder of Candido Martinez last November.

Officials say Astorga is a flight risk and will be heavily guarded in all of his transfers.

"There will be a great deal of protection and security, especially because he killed a law enforcement officer. It shows that he doesn't have much regard for those with guns or law enforcement. So he'll be well guarded," says Andrea Simmons, FBI.

Once he gets to Albuquerque he'll face those two warrants for murder. But, there is no timetable as to when he'll be back in court.

Man Sought In Deputy's Death Is Captured In Mexico (FWST)

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, April 5, 2006

ALBUQUERQUE - A man who had been on the FBI's most wanted list waived extradition Tuesday, a decision authorities said speeded up his return to New Mexico to face charges in the slaying of a Bernalillo County sheriff's deputy.

Police in Ciudad Juarez, Mexico, handed over Michael Paul Astorga, 29, to the FBI and Bernalillo County authorities in El Paso, Texas, early Tuesday morning. By Tuesday evening, Astorga - wearing shackles and handcuffs - was escorted into the Metropolitan Detention Center in Albuquerque.

Astorga had been sought for nearly two weeks in the March 22 killing of Deputy James McGrane Jr., 38, who was shot in the head after stopping a pickup truck on N.M. 337 in Tijeras, east of Albuquerque. Before McGrane's death, a warrant had been issued for Astorga in the Nov. 5 killing of Candido Martinez, 27, of Albuquerque.

Chihuahua state police said officers found three handguns and a small amount of marijuana when they pulled over Astorga and another man in a sport utility vehicle about 1:50 a.m. Monday.

Astorga insisted in a television interview in Mexico hours after his arrest that he had been on vacation in Juarez, and expressed surprise that police had been looking for him.

He also said he was asleep at a motel when Mexican police showed up and arrested him. He denied having any weapons.

His attorney, Gary Mitchell of Ruidoso, said Astorga "has the presumption of innocence" and that he wants to assure his client receives a fair trial after the highly publicized manhunt.

District Attorney Kari Brandenburg said her office has not decided whether to seek the death penalty in the case.

"We don't have to make that decision for a while," she said.

Killing a law enforcement officer is one of the criteria under state law for seeking the death penalty.

Authorities had offered a $130,000 reward for information leading to the arrest of Astorga. The sheriff's department received about 1,000 tips, and Sheriff Darren White said it will be up to the FBI to determine if someone gets the reward money and how much.

White said information leading to the capture came from good police work.

After Astorga's capture, sheriff's officers removed the black bands that had covered their badges since McGrane's death.

The department also contacted McGrane's family.

"It's kind of scary when you get a phone call early in the morning, but this was the best news we've heard in two weeks," James McGrane Sr., the deputy's father, told KOB-TV.

Astorga's mother, Theresa Romero, told the station she had no idea her son was in Mexico and that she had been out looking for him. She also said she doesn't believe her son killed McGrane.

Astorga Waives Extradition From Texas (KOB-TV)

By Reed Upton

KOB-TV, April 4, 2006

A man suspected of slaying a deputy has waived his extradition from Texas after being released to US officials by the Mexican Government early Tuesday morning.

Ironically, it was the law enforcement agents that had been pursuing Michael Astorga ever since the March 22nd shooting death of Deputy James McGrane that posted Astorga's bail with Mexican officials.

Bernalillo County deputies and FBI agents learned at about midnight Monday night that what Astorga was being held on in Ciudad Juarez was an immigration charge. They also learned his bail was only $2,000.

"Our detectives in El Paso called home, found out how much money was in their checking accounts," said Undersheriff Sal Baragiola. "They went to their ATMs. Everyone kicked in whatever they could kick in. We added up the numbers, came up with $2,000, paid it to Mexican officials, and Michael Astorga was in our custody within a couple of hours."

By waiving his extradition from Texas to New Mexico, Astorga could be back in Bernalillo County as early as Tuesday evening.

Astorga was wanted at the time of McGrane's murder in connection with the November 5th killing of 27-year-old Candido Martinez of Albuquerque.

Bernalillo County Sheriff Darren White said at the time that investigators believe Astorga shot and killed McGrane during a routine traffic stop so that he wouldn't be picked up on the pending murder charge.

After eluding a massive manhunt for 12 days, Astorga was apprehended by Mexican officials early Monday morning.

Astorga has denied involvement in the killing of McGrane.

Judge Declares Second Mistrial In Tenet Case (WSJ)

By Rhonda L. Rundle

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

A federal judge in San Diego declared a mistrial in an 11-month criminal case against a unit of Tenet Healthcare Corp., its Alvarado Hospital Medical Center and its former chief executive officer. It was the second mistrial declared by the same judge on nearly the same charges against the defendants.

The Tenet unit, the hospital and its former CEO, Barry Weinbaum, were accused by U.S. Attorney Carol C. Lam of violating the federal antikickback statute by paying bribes to doctors in exchange for patient referrals to the hospital. The alleged conspiracy involved the illegal use of relocation packages to recruit physicians to Alvarado's service area.

"Like the two juries that have deadlocked in February 2005 and now April 2006, Tenet and the prosecutors disagree over whether anyone at Alvarado Hospital Medical Center intended to break the law when they recruited physicians to the fast-growing eastern part of San Diego County," Peter Urbanowicz, Tenet's general counsel, said in a statement.

The case is important to Tenet, which has been negotiating a settlement with the Justice Department to resolve a multitude of allegations of misconduct. Some investors yesterday said the mistrial could clear the way for a final settlement, assuming that the government doesn't pursue a third trial. Tenet, based in Dallas, is the nation's second-largest hospital company.

"This is quite positive for Tenet. If they had lost and the contracts were declared illegal, it would be a setback and an enormous issue for the entire hospital industry," said Joseph Chiarelli, chairman of Chiarelli & Co., a small research boutique in New York. The mistrial "paves the way for a settlement" with the government, possibly for an amount below $1 billion, he said.

Mr. Weinbaum's attorney, Charles G. La Bella said: "I think it's time for the government to acknowledge that they are trying to criminalize something that isn't criminal. They should end this and admit that the prosecution was ill-advised."

In the second trial, the government's case was largely presented by Ms. Lam, a leading health-care fraud prosecutor and co-author of a textbook on the subject. Her office now must decide whether to pursue a third trial in the Alvarado case. Judge M. James Lorenz, who presided over both trials, set April 17 for a status conference on the case. Ms. Lam couldn't be reached for comment.

Mr. La Bella, who interviewed jurors after the mistrial was declared, said they were "pretty much split down the middle for most counts," in the case. "It wasn't a situation where there were only two people for the defense," which might encourage the government to move forward with a third trial.

Another Guilty Plea In Hired Truck Case (CHIT)

Tribune Staff Reports

Chicago Tribune, April 5, 2006

A Dolton man pleaded guilty Tuesday to bribing two Chicago city foremen to obtain at least $45,000 in city-owned asphalt for private paving projects.

Carl Edwards, 34, a private truck driver, said in a plea agreement that he paid bribes to Patrick Stillo and Robert Laino from April 2002 to November 2004.

Edwards used bribery to obtain at least 75 truckloads of city-owned asphalt, worth about $600 each, according to the plea agreement.

Edwards passed the asphalt on to private paving contractors for a fee of about $300 per truckload, then paid $150 in bribes to Stillo and Laino, the plea agreement said. Edwards sometimes paid an additional $50 to other truck drivers who helped in the scheme.

In exchange for Edwards' guilty plea and cooperation, prosecutors agreed to recommend a 9-month prison sentence. The plea agreement allows Edwards to argue for a lower term, including probation.

U.S. District Judge Harry Leinenweber is to sentence Edwards on Aug. 25.

Edwards' lawyer, Ellen Domph, could not be reached Tuesday for comment.

Edwards is the 35th defendant convicted in the federal probe of the city's Hired Truck Program.

Both Stillo and Laino pleaded guilty last year. Stillo was sentenced to 1 year in prison and Laino to 6 months.

G-Sting: Herrera's Former Friend Testifies Against Him (KLAS-TV)

KLAS-TV, April 5, 2006

Former Clark County Commissioner Dario Herrera claims he didn't take bribes from strip club owner Mike Galardi. But according to a close friend, that is not the case. From him, the jury in the G-Sting political corruption trial got insight into Herrera's relationship with Galardi.

It was a potentially damaging day for Dario Herrera as one of his former best friends testifies Herrera often bragged about his relationship with strip club owner Mike Galardi. This man, Terry Lamuraglia, says his friendship with Dario Herrera ended because he objected to Herrera's ties with Mike Galardi.

Lamuraglia told the jury he and Herrera could get comped drinks and lap dances at Galardi's Cheetahs strip club anytime. He said, "Dario would place a call to make sure everything was set up, that they knew we were coming."

Lamuraglia believes every time he and Herrera visited Cheetahs, he received sexual favors from dancers there. Further damaging Herrera's case, Lamuraglia testified Herrera bragged about "getting a free trip, getting free golf, getting entertainers, getting things paid for" by Galardi.

Jerry Bernstein, Herrera's attorney, stated, "I don't want to comment because we are in the middle of cross-examination. I don't feel that it is appropriate for me to comment about his testimony."

Herrera's attorney Jerry Bernstein was largely silent when he left court, not wanting to talk about Lamuraglia's testimony, which included an unusual story about Herrera's finances.

Lamuraglia told the court Herrera "...wanted to use my credit card to purchase furniture for the house."

Herrera used Lamuraglia's credit to purchase $20,000 worth of home furnishings and then paid Lamuraglia back largely in cash. Prosecutors imply the money was from bribes Herrera received from Mike Galardi when Herrera was a county commissioner.

Jerry Bernstein believes Lamuraglia is seeking revenge for a soured friendship, citing an interview Lamuraglia gave to a local newspaper. "'I love you, I miss you, I'm gonna hurt you.' That's what he told the Las Vegas Sun," Bernstein said.

Lamuraglia returns to the witness stand Wednesday morning.

The man at the heart of the G-Sting trial, strip club owner Mike Galardi, was at the George Federal Courthouse Tuesday. Galardi was scheduled to testify Tuesday, but will instead testify Wednesday.

George Federal Courthouse -- April 4 -- 3:30 p.m.

This afternoon federal prosecutors called Vanessa Baca to the stand. She worked for Mike Galardi as a bartender at his Cheetahs strip club.

Prosecutors in their opening statement three weeks ago identified Baca as a woman Galardi has selected to accompany Dario Herrera on a golf outing at the Southern Highlands Golf Course. But on the stand today, Baca testified Galardi asked her to go, but then added, quote, "I didn't know who was going to be there."

Baca testified at one point she and Herrera went to a section of the course that was secluded, quote, "I just remember bits and pieces of making out." Baca said she began performing a sex act on Herrera but then stopped because she did not want to continue.

Baca testified following the outing she was paid in the neighborhood of $500 by Mike Galardi, but Baca adds Galardi frequently paid her for accompanying him on social outings.

On defense cross-examination, Herrera's attorney Marc Rothenberg asked Baca when Galardi gave her $500 was she being paid as a prostitute. Baca answered, quote, "No."

Rothenberg then asked her if she made out with Herrera because it was something she wanted to do. She answered, quote, "Yes."

George Federal Courthouse -- April 4 -- 12:30 p.m.

This afternoon former Las Vegas strip club owner Michael Galardi is expected to began giving testimony in the G-Sting political corruption trial.

In late 2003, Galardi entered into a plea agreement with federal prosecutors where he admitted giving thousands of dollars in cash and gifts to former Clark County Commissioners Erin Kenny, Dario Herrera and Mary Kincaid-Chauncey.

According to federal prosecutors, the G-Sting scam began in early 1999 with Galardi being fueled by a desire for wealth and to become the valley's premiere strip club owner. He viewed the construction of his Jaguars strip club as his monument to that cause.

During construction Galardi was plagued by numerous construction set backs and liquor licensing issues. Prosecutors contend and Galardi admits that to clear all those hurdles Galardi hatched a systematic plan with another former County Commissioner Lance Malone to bribe elected officials.

Former Commissioner Erin Kenny also has plea agreement with federal prosecutors. During the last two days of testimony she has outlined how she received upwards of $70-thousand dollars from Galardi. Under Galardi's plea agreement with the government he will serve no more than five years in prison after his sentencing later this year. It is possible he could serve less if G-Sting prosecutors feel he has been helpful.

Strip Club Manger Says Dario Demanded Lap Dances

This morning Southern Highlands golf course manager Douglas Hensley testified that course records show strip club owner Mike Galardi often took Dario Herrera on golfing outings. Those outings started in Oct. 2000, two months after Herrera cancelled his own membership at the same club.

Prosecutors imply Herrera didn't need a membership if Galardi was footing the bill. Prosecutors then called Robert Leslie to the stand. Leslie was a manager at Galardi's Cheetahs strip club for nine years. Leslie testified that twice in 2001, Herrera demanded lap dances and drinks at the club to be comped out to the tune of $1,900. Leslie said Herrera was adamant about it. "He said that I needed to get that money for him," Leslie testified.

Leslie also testified he never saw any direct exchange of money or gifts between Galardi and Herrera.

Prosecutors then called Stacy Woodbury to the stand. She is the executive director of the Nevada Commission on Ethics. She testified in the case of both Dario Herrera and Mary Kincaid Chauncey, neither claimed any money from Mike Galardi on state financial disclosure forms. Those are the forms elected officials must fill out when they take office to declare their financial interests.

Woodbury told the jury, "If you accept a gift of a loan you are not to approve or disapprove...." She is referring to when voting on issues involving the person who gave the gift. Clark County Commission records show neither Herrera or Kincaid-Chauncey every disclosed a relationship with Galardi or abstained on voting on issues involving Galardi.

"The statute does not define what a gift is," said Woodbury on defense cross-examination. When Kincaid-Chauncey's attorney Richard Wright asked Woodbury what criteria elected officials are supposed to use in making a conflict of interested determination., Woodbury replied: "The statute doesn't give you any clear guidance in that area."

Accused Fixer Now Wants Trial, Not A Guilty Plea (PHI)

By Michael Hinkelman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, April 5, 2006

Molden David Faison now wants to go to trial.

Faison, a former city hearing officer accused of fixing parking tickets for $200 in cash and Prince concert tickets worth $169, had been set to plead guilty on Monday.

His change of heart yesterday came one day after U.S. District Judge Norma L. Shapiro refused to accept his guilty plea.

On Monday, the judge had expressed "doubts" that the government's charge of Hobbs Act extortion against Faison could be proven at trial. Yesterday, she said that an FBI sting like the one that led to Faison's arrest could meet the test for that kind of extortion charge - under certain conditions.

A Hobbs Act violation occurs when a public official obtains or attempts to obtain something of value that affects interstate commerce in exchange for official action.

Shapiro set a trial date of June 5 for Faison, who remains free on $50,000 bail. The trial is expected to last less than a week.

Faison signed a plea agreement with the feds on Monday, but Shapiro declared it "null and void" in light of his decision to go to trial.

Faison's attorney, Edson A. Bostic, declined to say what induced his client to change his mind.

Faison, 43, was indicted by a federal grand jury Jan. 12. He is alleged to have accepted $169 in Prince concert tickets from an FBI informant, John Florio, during a meeting Aug. 18, 2004.

Two months earlier, Florio had paid Faison $200 to fix more than $1,000 worth of his own parking tickets, according to the indictment.

As part of an FBI undercover operation, Florio, who was wearing a listening device at the Aug. 18 meeting, posed as an agent for a plumbing company engaged in interstate commerce that wanted its city parking tickets dismissed.

Florio told Faison the plumbing company (which actually had outstanding parking tickets), had paid for the concert tickets and Faison, according to the indictment, then agreed to dismiss the tickets.

The plumbing company was also cooperating with the FBI and had purchased the concert tickets as part of the sting. Shapiro raised concerns on Monday about whether that scenario met the Hobbs Act interstate-commerce test.

Yesterday, after reviewing case law on the subject, Shapiro said an FBI sting would meet the test if Faison had known or had been informed that he was accepting concert tickets from a company involved in interstate commerce.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Judy Smith declined comment after the hearing yesterday.

Feds Bust 3 In Credit Help Scam (NSDY)

By Robert E. Kessler, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, April 5, 2006

Officials charge managers of operation in Huntington with defrauding 17,000 out of $24 million

In a federal crackdown on allegedly crooked operators of consumer credit-counseling businesses, three managers of a former service in Huntington were charged yesterday with defrauding 17,000 customers around the country out of $24million, according to court papers and officials.

The three former supervising managers of Debticated Consumer Counseling arrested by FBI agents and inspectors from the U.S. Postal Inspection Service were identified in court papers as Bradley Dorman, 47, of Greenlawn; Louis Mustachio, 29, of East Northport; and Daniel Ruggerio, 28, of Kings Park. They were charged with conspiracy to commit mail fraud.

Debticated, formerly of 775 Park Ave., Huntington, which went out of business in May 2003, was controlled by two Long Island brothers, Andris and Erik Pukke, according to court papers. The two were not charged in yesterday's case. The Pukke brothers have been named in civil actions filed around the country against an interlocking group of debt counseling firms that the brothers allegedly controlled, including Debticated.

Debticated and Erik Pukke, for example, were barred from operating in California in 2003 for not being licensed in that state.

In January, Andris Pukke settled for $35 million a civil suit brought by the Federal Trade Commission against another of the family's credit-counseling firms, Maryland-based Ameridebt. The FTC had accused Ameridebt of cheating 400,000 customers out of $172 million.

Legitimate credit-counseling firms, which have mushroomed in recent years, charge fees for helping consumers work their way out of debt. Many of them are quietly subsidized by credit card companies seeking at least some part of the debt they are owed.

Allegedly fraudulent firms, including Debticated, claim to be nonprofits, but charge excessive fees without disclosing them to customers and often say that the fees are part of debt repayment, according to officials.

Debticated employees also used high-pressure sales pitches falsely claiming that customers could obtain low-interest loans, according to officials. Officials declined to identify any of the victims, but said all were from out of state.

Geoffrey Irwin, a Washington attorney who represents Andris Pukke in civil cases, declined to comment. Neither brother, nor an attorney for Erik Pukke, could be reached for comment.

Dorman, Mustachio and Ruggerio pleaded not guilty at arraignment before U.S. District Judge Joanna Seybert, who released them on $50,000 bail.

The attorney for Mustachio and Ruggerio, Raymond Suris, of Melville, declined to comment, as did Dorman's attorney, federal public defender Michael Weil. Assistant U.S. Attorneys John Martin and Demetri Jones declined to comment.

Alice Hrdy, an assistant director of the FTC, which brought the Ameridebt suit, said yesterday that in shopping for credit-counseling services, consumers should check with agencies such as the Better Business Bureau, and not deal with firms that insist on immediate payment of fees, that do not provide extensive free advice initially and do not provide written agreements as to fees and services.

Fatal Abuse Of Children Up In '04; Neglect Cases Decline (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein

The Washington Times, April 5, 2006

The number of fatally abused children rose slightly in 2004 from the previous year as the overall number of abused and neglected children dropped, a new report says.

Officials from the Department of Health and Human Services said that one reason for the increase in fatalities is improved reporting by states, but that the drop in abuse was encouraging.

"Nevertheless, we cannot tolerate the abuse of even one child," said Wade F. Horn, HHS assistant secretary for children and families.

The number of fatally abused children rose 2 percent from 1,460 in 2003 to 1,490 in 2004, according to the "Child Maltreatment 2004" report. Overall neglect and abuse dropped 4 percent from 872,000 in 2003 to 838,000.

More than 80 percent of the children who died of abuse or neglect were 3 or younger. Among infant boys, the fatality rate was 18 deaths per 100,000 boys. Among infant girls, the fatality rate was 17 deaths per 100,000 girls.

More than three-quarters of the children were killed by one or more parents, and almost a third were killed by their mothers acting alone.

Postpartum depression sometimes plays a role, but there are myriad reasons mothers or fathers hurt or kill their children, said John Orellana, a spokesman for Childhelp USA, the nationally known child-abuse prevention and treatment organization that runs the 1-800-4-A-Child hot line.

Overall, in 2004, state child protective services received about 2.9 million reports of possible child maltreatment. Less than a third of the reports -- 872,000 -- were substantiated.

This translates into a child victimization rate of 11.9 per 1,000 children in 2004. This is about 5 percent lower than in 2001, the most recent peak, when the victimization rate was 12.5 per 1,000.

Overall, the highest victimization rate was 15.3 per 1,000 children in 1993.

As is typical, roughly two-thirds of the substantiated reports in 2004 involved child neglect.

Almost 18 percent of victims were abused, about 10 percent were sexually abused, 7 percent suffered "psychological" abuse and 2 percent were "medically" neglected. In addition, 15 percent of abused children experienced "other" types of maltreatment such as abandonment or exposure to drugs at birth.

These victimization rates have fluctuated only slightly in the past five years, the HHS report said.

Nearly 79 percent of child abusers are parents, followed by "other relatives" (6.5 percent) and "unmarried partners of parent" (4.1 percent).

Abusive foster parents in New Jersey, Ohio and Florida have made headlines in recent months, but statistically, this is rare: 0.04 percent of foster parents were reported to be abusive or neglectful, the federal report said.

Reflections Behind The Badge (WP)

By Allison Klein

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

They've heard it before.

When yellow police tape is streaked across a struggling Prince George's County neighborhood, the telltale sign someone has been killed, homicide detectives Kelly Rogers and Meredith Bingley show up on the scene. It's 3 a.m., and they've been called out of bed.

"Which station do you work for?" Rogers has heard more times than she can count. With her smooth makeup, hot-pink fingernails and sleek chestnut-colored hair, people in the community think she's a television reporter.

Bingley, a stylish blonde who has down-to-earth looks, is pegged as a social worker. "Nobody thinks I'm police," Bingley said.

No matter that they have their police badges prominently displayed. They are not men in suits and ties, the typical look of Prince George's 26 homicide detectives.

Cpls. Rogers and Bingley are the only female homicide detectives in the county. There have been just six before them in the 75-year history of the department.

The small number of women is typical of area homicide units -- three of 15 homicide detectives in Montgomery County and one of 10 in Fairfax County are women.

The Prince George's detectives work in the most violent of Washington's suburbs, where last year there were 173 homicides, an average of one slaying about every other day.

"You have to be able to balance this job," said Rogers, explaining that every fourth homicide on rotation, they are called away from their husbands and children, usually in the middle of the night, to go to a scene. More often than not, they are greeted by a bloody body and hostile witnesses.

Male detectives also have to leave their families in the wee hours to go to homicides, but once they get there, nobody in the community is likely to address them as "honey." There have been times when Rogers and Bingley show up at a scene and someone will ask when the "real" detective will be there.

Although the gender barrier may have crumbled in many respects, the world of guns and violence is still fueled by testosterone. Of the department's 1,348 officers, about 17 percent are women.

"People say, 'You don't look like a police officer,' " Rogers said. "I tell them this is all I bring. What does a police officer look like?"

Bingley, 35, and Rogers, 36, are not partners or even on the same squad within the homicide unit. But they are very close friends and watch each other's backs. They talk on the phone about cases. They have similar lives, both married with young children. And both read detective novels in their spare time.

Since coming to the homicide unit in 2004, Rogers has closed eight of her 10 cases. Bingley, who has been in the unit since 2001, has solved 14 cases and is working on eight others.

County detectives generally solve 50 to 60 percent of their homicides, which is on par with such urban areas as Washington and Baltimore.

Sgt. Michael Straughan, who works with both detectives and supervises Bingley, said he has the "utmost respect" for them as investigators. He said he doesn't have an opinion of their role as women in a unit that's mostly male.

But in the community, Rogers and Bingley stand out, in part because they're white women responding to crimes, usually in depressed, majority-black neighborhoods. Last year, of the 169 homicides the department investigated, 114 of the victims were black men, and 10 were black women.

One night several years ago, Bingley drove her patrol car to a grocery store to buy a few things, and a customer commented how kind her husband must be to allow her to use his car.

She told him in a stage whisper, "This might be surprising, but I'm a police officer."

Often, they use their gender to their advantage. They say they have a knack for getting people to confess.

"People will talk to us faster; maybe I'm more patient with them," Rogers said. "They think we're more sympathetic."

Well, are they?

"Probably not," Rogers said.

Showing up on a scene and seeing blood doesn't bother Rogers. In fact, she will go to autopsies for cases that are not hers because she finds them instructive. "The smell can be the worst part," she said. "And you have to make sure they don't run over your toes with the gurney."

Bingley said she doesn't mind seeing an autopsy for forensic purposes, but she won't go more than she has to. "I don't like it, but I deal with it," she said.

For the most part, they both say they get respect on the street because they give respect to whomever they're talking to. They learned this in the academy.

"When I was in patrol, I was the only female, and I never had a problem," Rogers said. "I consider myself one of the guys."

But just because Rogers thinks she's one of the guys doesn't stop her from offering a soft touch now and again. She remembers a time she had to tell a mother her son, an innocent victim, had died. The mother broke down crying and shaking.

"I hugged her and rubbed her back," Rogers said. "I'm a mom. I felt terrible for her. Her son was just on his way to work."

Both got into the profession because they liked the excitement of it. They didn't think of the danger.

Bingley became a police officer in 1993 after graduating from the University of Maryland with an economics degree. She had planned to become an FBI agent but took the test for Prince George's police because a friend of hers didn't want to take it alone. She got the offer.

Rogers became an officer in 1990 after attending Prince George's Community College as an art major. She wanted to go into advertising. During a part-time job keeping books at a grocery store, she went on a ride-along with one of the officers assigned to the store. She was hooked. Once she got in the department, she knew exactly what she wanted to do.

"Homicides are the most important thing you can investigate," Rogers said. "When I say we have the coolest job in the world, I don't mean it in a flip way. "

On a recent chilly night, Bingley pulls up to a rowhouse in Northeast Washington where one of her victims used to live. She grabs her thick coffee-colored case file, pulls on her jacket and eases her long, blond hair out of the jacket's collar.

The victim was shot in November, and she hasn't had a good break in the case since.

Her black pumps click-click on the pavement up to the house, where a drug dealer is going to meet her in the basement and give her some information.

"You got the pictures?" the man asks her. She gets what she needs from him, then leaves.

She gets back in her car. "I'm so close," she says about the case.

Her shift is over, and she drives toward home, knowing that if gunplay turns deadly before sunrise somewhere in Prince George's, she'll be back on the street in a few hours.

CIVIL LAW:

Agencies Not Protecting Privacy Rights, GAO Says (WP)

By Robert O'Harrow Jr.

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

Government agencies that use private information services for law enforcement, counterterrorism and other investigations often do not follow federal rules to protect Americans' privacy, according to a report yesterday by the Government Accountability Office.

The Justice Department, the Department of Homeland Security and two other agencies examined by the GAO spent about $30 million last year on companies that maintain billions of electronic files about adults' current and past addresses, family members and associates, buying habits, personal finances, listed and unlisted phone numbers, and much more.

But those agencies often do not limit the collection and use of information about law-abiding citizens, as required by the Privacy Act of 1974 and other laws. The agencies also don't ensure the accuracy of the information they are buying, according to the GAO report. That's in part because of a lack of clear guidance from the agencies and the Office of Management and Budget on guidelines known as "fair information practices," the report said.

At the same time, the contractors are not bound by those "fair information practices," and they often don't comply with all of them, the report said. Companies do not notify individuals when information is collected, for instance. They limit individuals' access to records about themselves, and they generally do not have provisions for correcting mistakes, the report said.

"The nature of the information reseller business is essentially at odds with the principles," the report said. "Resellers make it their business to collect as much personal information as possible."

The 83-page report, the subject of a congressional hearing yesterday, was spurred in part by massive security breaches reported last year by ChoicePoint Inc. and LexisNexis in which sensitive files involving almost 200,000 people were sold to fraud artists.

It highlights a difficult truth about the government's increasing reliance on information services: By outsourcing the building of rich dossiers, the government is sidestepping checks on surveillance approved in the wake of domestic spy scandals involving the FBI, Army and other agencies in the 1960s and 1970s.

The report recommends that Congress consider requiring private information contractors to "more fully adhere" to fair information practices.

Information services play an important but quiet role in homeland security and criminal investigations. ChoicePoint officials last year acknowledged that they serve in effect as a private intelligence service for the government.

Rep. Chris Cannon (R-Utah), chairman of the House Judiciary Committee's subcommittee on commercial and administrative law, said the hearing was held because the ability of private information services to collect information and the government's use of those services have grown far beyond existing laws and oversight.

Peter Swire, a law professor at Ohio State University, said the information industry delivers information more efficiently than ever before, helping investigators in many ways. But he told the congressional panel that the government needs to ensure that the information it buys is accurate while giving people a chance to correct mistakes. "Accuracy that is good enough for marketing is not necessarily good enough to detain a suspect," said Swire, who served as the chief privacy counselor in the Clinton administration White House.

FDA Warns Maker Of Anthrax Vaccine (WP)

By Justin Gillis

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

Federal drug regulators have accused a California company of breaking the law by making exaggerated claims about the purity and effectiveness of a new vaccine for anthrax, a fresh blow for a troubled $1 billion program at the center of the government's plans to counter bioterrorism.

In a letter made public yesterday, the Food and Drug Administration accused VaxGen Inc. of making "false or misleading statements" about the vaccine, essentially by offering rosy interpretations of the handful of scientific studies that have been completed on the product.

The agency specifically cited a promotional document the company handed out in Washington in October that claimed the company's techniques allowed it to produce a vaccine "at nearly 100% purity" and asserting that the product generates immunity comparable to that induced by an older vaccine. Neither claim is warranted on the basis of early research, the FDA declared.

The statements in the VaxGen document closely resemble assertions the company has made in regulatory filings and in public meetings over the past two years. The FDA threatened court action unless VaxGen devises a plan to "disseminate truthful, non-misleading, and complete information" about the vaccine to anyone who might have received such puffed-up claims, an audience that may well include thousands of individual stockholders.

Though the letter was made public only yesterday, VaxGen received it March 24 and neither disseminated it nor filed any disclosure about it with the Securities and Exchange Commission. Paul Laland, a VaxGen spokesman, said the company did not feel such disclosure was warranted. "Based on our internal assessment and research of industry standards, we did not believe this was material information," he said.

He added that VaxGen was still reviewing the FDA letter and could not comment at length on the agency's assertions.

"We'll review it internally, and we're going to respond, and if needed we'll put a plan together," Laland said. "If there is something that's incorrect, then we will take corrective action."

VaxGen has been struggling to fulfill $1 billion worth of federal contracts to make 75 million doses of anthrax vaccine, enough to immunize 25 million people, a population roughly the size of the combined New York and Washington metropolitan areas. The vaccine would most likely be used after a large-scale anthrax attack to immunize people exposed to the germ, whose spores can take months to germinate, causing a deadly lung infection.

The VaxGen contracts are the largest awarded to date under Project BioShield, President Bush's program to create defenses against biological and radiological attack. Members of Congress have complained sharply about delays and other problems in the way the Health and Human Services Department has handled that program, and HHS Secretary Mike Leavitt responded recently by promising improvements.

VaxGen has long had a troubled history, including accounting problems that the company has pledged repeatedly to fix but so far hasn't. The company has acknowledged that it is at least a year behind in producing the anthrax vaccine and will default on its contracts in November unless the government grants a time extension.

Federal Authorities To Investigate Businessman's Death (AP)

AP, April 5, 2006

BATON ROUGE, La. - A federal investigation has been opened into the shooting death of a businessman, who was killed by a bystander during a scuffle with a Baton Rouge police officer.

The Justice Department has ordered the FBI to investigate, department spokesman Eric Holland said Monday. He would not speculate on how long the investigation would take.

George Temple II was killed Feb. 17 during a scuffle with a police officer that began when he was pulled over for cutting into a funeral procession. During the fight with Officer Brian Harrison, Temple was shot five times.

Authorities said one of the shots came from the officer's gun. The other four came from the gun of Perry Stephens, who authorities say came to help the officer during the struggle. One of Stephens' shots hit Temple in the head and killed him, according to an autopsy.

Police said Temple offered a bribe to the police office and a struggle began when the officer attempted to arrest Temple.

District Attorney Doug Moreau already has said that a state grand jury will review the shooting.

Trial No. 2 For Newport Officers (KNOXNS)

By J.j. Stambaugh

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), April 5, 2006

Pair of sergeants stand accused of shakedown

Two Newport police sergeants accused of shaking down a pair of Hispanic men during a 2005 traffic stop will face trial a second time today on federal civil-rights charges.

Sgts. James W. Roach Jr., 29, and Patrick Sheldon, 33, were arrested last year by the FBI after they were swept up in a five-year probe into public corruption in Cocke County dubbed "Rose Thorn." They were acquitted of felony civil-rights conspiracy charges in February, but jurors couldn't reach a verdict on misdemeanor charges of depriving the alleged victims of their civil rights.

During the first trial, Assistant U.S. Attorney Neil Smith said the officers had targeted Wilder Gomez Roblero and Marcos Mijia Vasques during a March 12, 2005, traffic stop because they were illegal immigrants and, therefore, were unlikely to report the alleged crime.

The officers, who didn't testify, have denied ever stopping the men and provided matching alibis to the Tennessee Bureau of Investigation after the alleged incident was reported.

Jurors today will be asked to ultimately render a verdict on the misdemeanor charges. Sheldon also faces an additional misdemeanor charge of being an accessory after the fact that was lodged against him after the first trial.

Through motions filed by his attorneys, Sheldon has maintained that he has been pressured by the FBI to implicate Roach and was told he would be "prosecuted to the fullest extent of the federal government's resources" if he refused to cooperate.

The evidence presented to the new jurors may differ in key respects from what the first jury heard. U.S. District Judge Ronnie Greer, for instance, has ordered defense attorneys to avoid making comments that smack of racial overtones and has also barred prosecutors from questioning a possible defense witness about a prior felony conviction.

The defense witness, Newport store operator Charles "Mo" Swanson, had been subpoenaed to testify in the first trial but didn't take the witness stand. Defense attorneys later said his gun permit had been revoked by the state Department of Safety as the result of a letter sent by Smith, who pointed out that he was a convicted felon.

Attorneys for Roach and Sheldon accused Smith of intimidating Swanson to prevent him from testifying, an allegation that Smith denied. The accusation was one of several made in an effort to have the indictment against the officers dismissed due to prosecutorial misconduct, but Greer rejected the officers' arguments in a ruling handed down Tuesday.

J.J. Stambaugh may be reached at 865-342-6307.

Report Faults Prisons Bureau On Chemicals (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

The federal Bureau of Prisons failed to address concerns that inmates and staff members at several prisons were exposed to toxic chemicals in recycling programs where inmates use hammers to smash discarded computers, according to the agency that handles whistle-blower complaints.

In a letter to President Bush and Congress on Monday, the agency, the Office of Special Counsel, called for an independent investigation into the complaints, which were brought to the federal government by a whistle-blower from a California prison in 2004.

The office criticized the Bureau of Prisons for not investigating the accusations thoroughly, saying the agency's review was deficient and "appears to be cursory at best."

The inmates dismantled the computers as part of the federal prison industries program, or Unicor, which has become one of the nation's largest recyclers, providing low-cost recycling to government agencies, schools and private companies.

The whistle-blower, Leroy A. Smith Jr., the former safety manager at Atwater Federal Prison outside Merced, Calif., said factory workers in the recycling facility there and at four other federal prisons in the country were exposed to hazardous materials including lead, cadmium, barium and beryllium when the inmates took hammers to cathode ray tubes from computers.

According to federal health agencies, overexposure to the chemicals can cause cancer, kidney disease, damage to the reproductive and central nervous systems, and death.

Mr. Smith told federal officials that he had several times ordered a shutdown of the program at Atwater after air quality tests revealed the chemicals in the factory and in a nearby food service area, but that the prison's managers and federal prison industry officials routinely ignored his recommendations, resuming the recycling without the safety measures he recommended.

The Justice Department referred the complaints to the Bureau of Prisons, which produced two reports responding to Mr. Smith's complaints in June and August 2005, concluding that the bureau, the federal prison industries program and prison staff members "took appropriate steps" to make sure the programs were operating safely.

Mr. Smith disputed those findings, and in the letter this week, the special counsel, Scott J. Bloch, a Bush appointee, took his side, saying the agency's reports were "unreasonable" and relied "on strained interpretations of applicable rules and procedures in order to justify past actions."

The report faulted the Bureau of Prisons as failing to talk to staff members who knew about potentially toxic exposure at other prisons, and as ignoring documentary evidence that contradicted its findings.

It also criticized the bureau for dismissing exposure to the chemicals as not "imminently dangerous, as no immediate threat of death or serious harm occurred." The operations should have been shut down, Mr. Bloch said, if conditions "could reasonably be expected to cause death or serious physical harm."

"I am left to conclude that a thorough, independent and impartial investigation into recycling activities" at federal prisons is still required, Mr. Bloch said in his report.

A spokeswoman for the Bureau of Prisons did not reply yesterday to a request for comment.

In a statement, Mr. Bloch said yesterday: "This is a matter where real concerns exist that need to be addressed. Unfortunately, they have not been addressed, and we find ourselves at an impasse."

Same-sex Marriage Lands Before Federal Appeals Court (AP)

By DAVID KRAVETS, The Associated Press

AP, April 5, 2006

PASADENA -- A lawyer for a gay couple suing for the right to wed told a federal appeals court Tuesday that it's unconstitutional to prevent same-sex marriage, but one judge appeared unmoved and two others said the case could die on procedural grounds.

"Everything that is wrong is not discrimination," said Judge Jerome Farris, part of a three-judge panel of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that heard 40 minutes of arguments.

The case was brought by two gay men who sued after being denied a marriage license in Orange County. They claim California's ban on same-sex marriage and federal laws against it are unconstitutional because gays and lesbians are treated differently than heterosexuals.

U.S. District Judge Gary Taylor last year ruled against the pair Arthur Smelt and Christopher Hammer, both 46, of Mission Viejo. They appealed.

Taylor ruled the law "has a disproportionate effect on homosexual individuals," but said the government's desire to promote procreation is a valid reason for infringing on the rights of gays.

Farris agreed with that assertion.

"I think marriage is a bundle of sticks and sticks include procreation," Farris said.

Richard Gilbert, the gay couple's attorney, said procreation is not the important element of marriage and Judge Sidney Thomas appeared to agree.

"I don't understand, really, the procreation argument," Thomas said.

After the hearing, Hammer said he would prevail all the way to the Supreme Court "if they acknowledge that we are human."

Still, the heavyweights of the same-sex marriage movement aren't supporting the case and instead are waging their campaigns in the state courts of California, Iowa, Washington, New Jersey, New York and elsewhere, seeking rulings similar to the 2003 decision that led to legal gay marriage in Massachusetts.

The strategy of Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund and the American Civil Liberties Union is to win in several states before going to the federal courts and eventually the Supreme Court. They say there is a strong national consensus against same-sex marriage meaning the Supreme Court today would likely rule against it.

"We are interested in serious, incremental work in order to succeed," said Jennifer Pizer, a Lambda attorney who attended the hearing.

In an interview, Gilbert said Lambda and the ACLU's strategy was failing.

Nineteen states have amended their constitution to outlaw gay marriage, and voters in at least six other states could be asked to amend theirs similarly this year.

During the hearing, Justice Department lawyer Gregory Katsas told the panel that the traditional definition of marriage doesn't violate the constitution.

The judges did not indicate when they would rule.

Thomas and Judge Ferdinand Fernandez suggested that the case may be premature, noting that a state court of appeals in San Francisco is weighing a lawsuit brought by gays and lesbians challenging California's prohibition against same-sex marriage.

A trial judge declared the ban violated the California Constitution's equal protection guarantee. The decision could reach the California Supreme Court later this year.

A same-sex marriage victory in California, Thomas and Fernandez noted, would allow Hammer and Smelt to get married.

Gilbert, however, wanted a definitive ruling on whether federal laws and the 49 states that don't permit same-sex marriage are violating the U.S. Constitution's equal protection guarantee.

If California approved same-sex marriages, the federal government would not recognize them and would prohibit his clients and others from filing federal income taxes as a married couple.

"It's a second-class marriage," Gilbert argued.

The case is Smelt v. Orange County, 05-56040.

Feingold Says He Supports Gay Marriage (AP-Y2)

AP2, April 5, 2006

Sen. Russ Feingold (news, bio, voting record), a potential presidential candidate, said Tuesday he supports giving gays and lesbians the right to marry, again positioning himself to the left of possible 2008 rivals.

DOJ_NMG_0025582

"Gay and lesbian people in our country are fighting a mean-spirited movement to harm them and to discriminate against them," Feingold, D-Wis., said in a telephone interview. "I stand with them against that movement, and I'm proud to stand with them."

Feingold said he decided to express his support for gay marriage in response to a Wisconsin constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage and civil unions, which will appear on the state ballot in November.

Feingold Backs Legalizing Same-Sex Marriages (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.), a prospective 2008 presidential candidate, said yesterday that he thinks bans on same-sex marriages have no place in the nation's laws.

Feingold said in an interview that he was motivated to state his position on one of the most divisive social issues in the country after being asked at a town hall meeting Sunday about a pending amendment to the Wisconsin state constitution to ban same-sex marriages.

Feingold called the amendment "a mean-spirited attempt" to single out gay men and lesbians for discrimination and said he would vote against it. But he went further, announcing that he favors legalizing same-sex marriages.

That puts him at odds with many prominent Democratic politicians who support gay rights but not same-sex marriage. Should Feingold decide to run for the party's presidential nomination in 2008, his position would put him to the left of many likely rivals.

"Obviously, it's a very difficult issue and evokes a lot of emotions," Feingold said in a telephone interview yesterday. "I think it's something ultimately that people throughout the country will accept, but it's not an easy issue." He accused the Bush White House and the Republican Party of using same-sex marriage as a wedge issue "to hurt Democrats who are against discrimination."

The Wisconsin senator said he is prepared to work with supporters of same-sex marriage to ensure that it is legal in the future.

"Further steps would be appropriate," he said, noting that his first priorities are to defeat the proposed Wisconsin amendment as well as a federal constitutional amendment that is expected to come to a vote in the Senate later this spring.

San Antonio Couple Wins $125,000 Judgment Against Housing Authority (SABIZ)

San Antonio Business Journal, April 5, 2006

U.S. Judge John Primomo ordered the Housing Authority of San Antonio, the San Antonio Housing Facility Corp., Pat Matherly and the Pilgrim Allena Housing Development Corp. to pay $125,000 to resolve a tenant disability discrimination case.

On June 2, 2005, the U.S. Attorney's Office filed a complaint on behalf of local residents Antonio and Josefina Maldonado in the U.S. District Court for the Western District of Texas alleging that the Westminster Square Apartments unlawfully discriminated against the couple because of their disabilities.

According to the complaint, Pilgrim Allena Housing owns the local apartment complex where the Maldonados have lived since 1989. The San Antonio Housing Facility Corp., a subsidiary of the local Housing Authority, manages the apartments. Matherly was the on-site manager at the property at the time.

Antonio Maldonado is a double-leg amputee and Josefina Maldonado has osteoporosis, hyperlipidemia, angina, diffuse arthritis and diabetes. Over the years, Josefina Maldonado increasingly had been experiencing difficulty maneuvering her husband in his wheelchair from their third-floor apartment to the ground floor via elevator.

On Feb. 23, 2004, according to the complaint, the Maldonados requested the complex make a reasonable accommodation to move them to a first floor apartment because of their deteriorating health. The couple claimed on March 15, 2004, they provided the apartment manager with documented proof from their health providers of their conditions.

The defendants denied the Maldonados' request, citing the elevators in the apartment building, according to the complaint.

However, the couple complained that they had been trapped in the elevators on previous occasions. They also discovered that the elevators weren't working at other times and that the elevators weren't near their unit, requiring Josefina Maldondo to travel much further to move to and fro.

After the apartment complex denied the Maldonados' requests, two ground-floor apartments were leased to other tenants. The couple filed a complaint with the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development and the government found that they had a cause to proceed with a civil suit. That case was filed on Aug. 29, 2005.

Last week, lawyers from the Justice Department and the Housing Authority reached a settlement. With the judge's signature in hand, the Maldonados will receive the $125,000, with part of that settlement going to the Fair Housing Council of Greater San Antonio for their help in the suit.

Bill To Delay Runoff Elections Passes Committee (AP)

MONTGOMERY, Ala. - The Alabama Legislature moved a step closer Tuesday to approving legislation to delay the June 27 primary runoff elections to July 18 to give military personnel overseas more time to vote.

The House Constitution and Elections Committee approved a Senate-passed bill to delay the party primary runoffs on a unanimous voice vote. The bill is expected to come up in the House Wednesday or Thursday, when it could receive final passage.

Attorney General Troy King and Secretary of State Nancy Worley asked the Legislature to delay the runoffs in response to a lawsuit filed against the state by the U.S. Justice Department.

The lawsuit claims there is not enough time between the June 6 primaries and the June 27 runoffs for service members, particularly those fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan, to receive and cast ballots.

The House originally passed a bill that would have kept the runoffs on June 27, but allowed service members to vote by a special ballot that would have been sent to them at the same time as the primary ballot.

King has said he doubts the Justice Department would go along with the special ballot, partly because it would not allow soldiers who did not vote in the primary to vote in the runoffs.

The Senate sponsor, Sen. Wendell Mitchell, D-Luverne, said delaying the primary is the only immediate solution.

"Unless we do something to move the primary we risk having the federal government involve itself in our election," Mitchell said.

Tilting Maryland's Vote (WP)

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

IN THE SANCTIFIED name of expanding the popular vote and widening access to the polls, Maryland Democrats have sacrificed fairness to partisan advantage. The Democrats, who dominate the state legislature in Annapolis, pushed through a bill allowing voting to take place for five days before Election Day -- but mostly at polling stations in Democratic strongholds.

This isn't the first time a majority in a state legislature has sought electoral advantage by ramming a brazenly partisan measure down the throat of the minority party. The justification generally comes down to, "Well, they'd do the same to us if they were in power." But no matter which party is behind such partisan mischief, the effect is the same: to subvert the faith that Americans place in the electoral system's fairness.

The procedural aspects of this bill's passage are odious enough. Before they voted, Democratic lawmakers stripped the bill of provisions that would have permitted Republicans an equal role in deciding where to place the early-polling stations and that would have required that the stations' locations be geographically central. The conference committee that wrote the bill was composed of six Democrats and zero Republicans.

The locations of many of the polling stations for early voting seem designed to mine Democratic votes, which tend to be in more heavily populated areas. In Howard County, early-voting stations were placed in heavily Democratic areas in an apparent effort to weaken the reelection prospects of freshman state Sen. Sandra B. Schrader, probably the most imperiled of Maryland's 14 Republican state senators.

Democrats enjoy a healthy advantage in voter registration and are understandably eager to recapture the state's governorship, which they lost in 2002, in this fall's elections. Over the past two years they have sought to leverage their statewide numerical advantage by enacting a set of relatively permissive elections laws under the aegis of what the party has called a "voters' bill of rights." As a result, Maryland voters will not be required to show any form of identification, and they will be able to cast provisional ballots practically anywhere in the state, regardless of their home address.

Republicans insist that these measures will open the door to electoral fraud; if fraud does mar the November ballot, the Democrats will be responsible. But they are not unfair on their face. By contrast, tilting the early-voting system toward heavily Democratic areas in strategically key jurisdictions taints the election even before it occurs. With such arrogance and abuse, the Democrats will only erode their majority in Maryland.

ANTITRUST:

Perspective: Bumps In The Road For AT&T-BellSouth Merger? (CNET)

By Mark Del Bianco

CNET News, April 5, 2006

The conventional wisdom in Washington is that regulatory approval of the proposed AT&T-BellSouth merger is a done deal. The consensus is that this deal will sail through with flying colors--and a few not very onerous merger conditions.

The conventional wisdom may be wrong. There is a twist that ought to give the regulators pause. Both BellSouth and AT&T own considerable chunks of prime wireless spectrum that is unused and that could quickly and relatively cheaply be used to provide broadband services that would compete with telecom and cable wireline broadband services--in other words, the long-sought "third pipe" to the home or business.

Competitors will no doubt argue that the Federal Communications Commission and the Justice Department should worry about the loss of intermodal competition that will result if the two companies are permitted to retain this valuable spectrum.

Over the last year, the development of worldwide standards for WiMax and improvements in equipment performance and cost have made the 2.3GHz and 2.5GHz frequencies more attractive. They are now among the most desirable for use in providing broadband voice, data and video services that will compete with telecom and cable wireline broadband services. These spectrum bands can also be used to compete in the backhaul and special access (both last-mile and interoffice transport) markets where the regional Bell operating companies are also dominant. Soon. they may even be used to compete with cellular and other mobile voice and data services. Equipment costs will be low and will keep falling as economies of scale kick in.

Intermodal competition cannot develop if two of the three modes--wireline and wireless--are in the hands of a single, gigantic company. Off-the-shelf WiMax products for the 2.5GHz band will be available from numerous manufacturers later this year, and a 2.3GHz version of WiMax may be developed. Mobile WiMax equipment that provides voice and high-speed data is now being tested on KDDI's network in Japan and should be widely available by early 2007.

The competitive importance of this spectrum was acknowledged by the FCC last year. As a condition to its approval of the Sprint-Nextel merger, the FCC required that Sprint meet certain milestones for offering broadband service in the 2.5GHz band. Sprint agreed to offer such service to at least 15 million Americans within four years of the order (for instance, by fall 2009), and to offer it to an additional 15 million customers by two years later. Sprint controls the most 2.5GHz spectrum in the U.S., and its planned use of this spectrum to provide services competitive with (or as Sprint claims, better than) wireline broadband services is one of the key drivers of Sprint's ongoing spinoff of its wireline operations. But Sprint's spectrum holdings, large as they are, do not provide adequate coverage in many areas, particularly in the BellSouth footprint.

BellSouth, the second-largest owner of 2.5GHz spectrum in the U.S., controls spectrum in most of the 50 largest markets, according to published reports. It also has substantial 2.3GHz spectrum (acquired in auctions in 1997). SBC Communications also gained a large amount of 2.3GHz spectrum when it acquired AT&T. According to publicly available information, neither company has yet developed any of the spectrum into a commercial line of business; rather, the spectrum is effectively warehoused at present. (However, BellSouth has deployed test broadband service in nine in-region markets using its 2.3GHz spectrum, and it announced in March that it would use the 2.3GHz spectrum to provide "backup" broadband for its wireline broadband service.)

The proposed merger will concentrate huge blocks of spectrum in one company with every incentive not to use it. Assuming that AT&T's licenses are spread equally around the U.S. and that BellSouth's licenses are located primarily in the BellSouth service area (as appears to be the case), then prior to the merger, approximately 40 percent of the BellSouth and 30 percent to 35 percent of the AT&T licenses are located in the parent Bell operating company's (BOC) service area and are not likely to be used to compete with companies' wireline broadband services.

The postmerger wireline service area will be much larger, however, and substantially less than 50 percent of the spectrum would be out of region. It is unlikely that a postmerger AT&T would have any incentive to develop this spectrum for wireless broadband. Competing with itself in-region would not be attractive; and BOCs have yet to engage in meaningful competition out of region.

Given this scenario, competitors can be expected to argue that the FCC and the Antitrust Division should require BellSouth and AT&T to divest at least their in-region 2.3GHz and 2.5GHz spectrum (together with any existing deployments). Divestiture benefits consumers and businesses if the spectrum is used by an entity or entities that will compete in the broadband, backhaul and special access markets.

It may even be argued that AT&T and BellSouth should be required also to divest all their out-of-region spectrum in order to enable nationwide competition.

Preventing a BOC from acquiring assets that could be used to compete with its core wireline business--and in this case also with its growing wireless business--is not a novel idea. In the Primestar case a few years ago, for example, the Antitrust Division prevented cable operators from buying DBS satellite assets, for fear they would warehouse the satellites in order to prevent new entrants from using them to compete with traditional cable TV.

Similar precedents involve the divestiture of manufacturing plants, drug compounds in the FDA approval pipeline, and other competitive assets in non-telecom markets.

The FCC ought to be particularly receptive to such arguments, given the importance that former Chairman Michael Powell and current Chairman Kevin Martin have placed on the development of facilities-based intermodal competition in their decisions and public statements these last few years. Intermodal competition cannot develop if two of the three modes--wireline and wireless--are in the hands of a single, gigantic company.

Interestingly, the fact that the FCC has in the past permitted BOC ownership of this spectrum and never found it to be a problem is irrelevant. The public interest standard that the FCC applies in merger approval proceedings is based partly on antitrust analysis, but also explicitly permits it to "consider technological and market changes, and the nature, complexity and speed of change of--as well as trends within--the communications industry."

Thus, the FCC could take into account the recent technological and market changes that have transformed this spectrum into a valuable competitive alternative to wireline broadband services. The FCC could determine that the merger, by effectively shielding so much spectrum from the hands of potential competitors, would not be in the public interest absent substantial spectrum divestiture.

The Antitrust Division may also act. Provided it found that the spectrum controlled by the postmerger company represents a source of substantial potential competition, it would be fairly straightforward for it to conclude that without divestiture of the spectrum, the effect of the merger "may be to substantially lessen competition"--the standard it must follow in reviewing mergers under the Clayton Act.

Whether the FCC or the Antitrust Division in this administration will take competition-preserving action is an open question. But for those who seek competition in U.S. broadband markets, and for proponents of network neutrality for whom a third pipe could be a godsend, it certainly looks like a fight worth fighting.

EU Pushes Governments To Open Gas Markets (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, April 5, 2006

Filed at 1:28 p.m. ET

STRASBOURG, France (AP) -- European Union regulators on Tuesday started legal proceedings against 17 countries for not doing enough to open up their energy markets, just weeks after the EU criticized France and Spain for trying to protect their national energy companies.

Delays in drafting new rules to liberalize gas and electricity markets are keeping prices too high, the European Commission has said.

Austria, Belgium, Britain, the Czech Republic, Germany, Estonia, Spain, Finland, France, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Lithuania, Latvia, Poland, Sweden and Slovakia will be sent a warning to put rules in place.

The Commission sent the 17 countries a letter of formal complaint. The member states concerned have two months to reply to the Commission. The final stage of the proceedings would mean taking countries to the European Court of Justice.

The Commission also said it would take Spain and Luxembourg to court for not sending it information to show they had put the legal framework in place. A court ruling can force a country to change national laws under threat of heavy fines. The Commission is still examining Portugal's and Hungary's laws.

It criticized the lack of free choice of supplier for many customers and the continued existence of regulated prices, saying that made it harder for new companies to break into the energy sector. Certain long-standing electricity and gas contracts still get preferential access, the Commission said.

It also criticized the way some energy companies do business -- without naming names -- saying there was often not enough separation between electricity and gas transmission and distribution to make sure each was independent. Many companies own the network and sell directly to customers, meaning they are wholesalers selling network access to the rivals they compete with on the retail market.

Another problem was that third-party access to networks could be "discriminatory" and the tariffs charged were not transparent enough, it said.

The power of national energy regulators was also a problem, it said, particularly their ability to set tariffs for access to networks.

"I expect that these infringement proceedings will attract member states' awareness, that these things will be (fixed)," EU energy chief Andris Piebalgs said. "I hope there will be measures taken by the member states."

High oil prices and a gas dispute between Russia and Ukraine this winter have made energy a sore point for some governments anxious to protect old monopolies from foreign predators wanting to take advantage of a move toward a single European energy market.

France backed a combination of Suez SA and state-controlled Gaz de France to fend off a possible bid from Italy's Enel SpA, while Spain faces EU legal action for a decree that could help block a bid from Germany's E.On AG for Endesa SA.

EU countries agreed in 2003 to lift barriers and allow new companies to start providing gas and electricity. However, many nations have been slow to put their promises into practice.

Only five countries had adopted rules opening up the gas and electricity markets for business customers by July 1, 2004. Nations also have to ensure that the legal framework is in place to open up markets for domestic customers by July 1, 2007.

In a parallel antitrust probe, the Commission found "serious malfunctions" across Europe's energy markets, saying it would investigate further into companies and countries where stalled deregulation has left prices too high.

It indirectly criticized "highly concentrated" gas and electricity markets where old monopolies were still firmly in place.

Belgian electricity customers, for example, have a choice of only two suppliers -- both soon to have the same owner as Suez and Gaz de France complete their tie-up.

Citigroup Cleared For Big M&A Deals (FT)

By David Wighton

Financial Times, April 5, 2006

One of the clouds hanging over Citigroup was lifted on Tuesday when the world's largest financial services company revealed that the Federal Reserve had removed the ban on it making large acquisitions.

The New York Fed, Citigroup's lead regulator, said in a letter to the company that it had dropped the ban because of the "significant progress" it had made in improving its internal controls.

The Fed imposed the restriction a year ago following Citigroup's string of regulatory problems, including the forced closure of its private bank in Japan and the furore in Europe over controversial government bond trades.

Mr Prince said the move reflected the "cumulative effect" of moves taken over the last year, including his introduction of a "five-point plan" to improve Citigroup's compliance culture.

Although the Fed ban was a blow to Citigroup's reputation, Mr Prince said the company had not been significantly hampered by the restriction, which applied only to very large transactions. "I am not sure it was a net loss," he said in an interview.

Mr Prince has shifted Citigroup's focus onto organic growth, following the deal-making of his predecessor, Sandy Weill. Moreover, most large potential targets look expensive, particularly given Citigroup's own depressed stock price.

"Transactions of size, here in the US especially, are priced at levels that are not attractive to most people," he said.

Executives have said privately that Citigroup would have liked to get involved in the $35bn battle for control of UFJ, the Japanese bank, but decided against. This was as much due to its particular problems in Japan as the Fed ban.

Mr Prince said its acquisition strategy was concentrated on medium-sized deals that "extend the franchise", particularly in Asia, eastern Europe and other emerging markets, he added.

In contrast, Western Europe was "uninviting" because of the "Balkanised" regulatory regimes.

Citigroup this week lost out in the auction for Finansbank in Turkey which is being acquired by National Bank of Greece with an offer valuing Finansbank at $5bn. "Turkey is a very interesting country. But we are very focused on not overpaying for transactions," said Mr Prince.

Analysts believe the relatively small size of the deal meant it would not have been covered by the Fed ban on Citigroup, which has a market value of $240bn, undertaking "significant expansion".

The Fed letter, from William Rutledge, excutive vice president, was dated April 3, three days after the Australian regulator announced it was taking action against Citigroup for insider dealing and failing to manage conflicts of interest.

The timing suggests that the Fed is not too concerned by the Australian regulator's move which Citigroup claims is an attack on accepted industry practice.

Citigroup shares gained 1.7 per cent, or 80 cents, to close at $48.21.

Citigroup Is Cleared To Pursue Deals (WSJ)

By Clint Riley

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

The Federal Reserve cleared Citigroup Inc. to pursue future acquisitions, lifting a yearlong restriction that was imposed following a string of scandals and regulatory missteps at the financial-services company.

In a letter sent late Monday to Charles Prince, the company's chief executive, William L. Rutledge, executive vice president of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, said that Citigroup had made "significant progress" by implementing new internal compliance and risk-management programs, and therefore "the understanding that you would refrain from significant expansion is no longer in operation."

The Fed issued its unusual prohibition in March 2005, demanding that Citigroup get its house in order following a string of problems, including run-ins with regulators over a bond-trading strategy in Europe -- that its traders dubbed "Dr. Evil" -- and activities that led to the loss of its private-banking license in Japan.

The Fed's letter came just days after securities regulators in Australia accused Citigroup of insider trading. Citigroup has denied any wrongdoing and says it will "vigorously defend" its actions. While Citigroup executives and a team of in-house regulators from the Fed stay in regular contact, it is unclear whether the Fed considered the merits of the lawsuit filed by the Australian regulators before lifting the ban on acquisitions.

A spokeswoman for the New York Fed declined to comment.

Citigroup spent the better part of 2005 implementing what Mr. Prince dubbed his "five-point plan," a roadmap aimed at strengthening internal controls, employee training and communications within the bank.

Mr. Prince, who will add the title of chairman later this month, reacted to the long-awaited news from the Fed by sending a companywide letter yesterday morning thanking Citigroup's 300,000 employees scattered around the world for their efforts. "Today we continue toward our goal of becoming the world's most respected global financial-services company." Mr. Prince wrote. "I am confident of the course we have set, and excited about our future."

Still, in an interview, the CEO said he cautioned the company's top executives in an address, "Be careful. This was not a one-year plan. It is not as if we are done."

Speculation has circulated for months that the Fed might soon loosen the reins on the New York-based bank after it became widely known that the company had entered the bidding for an estimated $3 billion majority stake in Guangdong Development Bank in China and a separate purchase of Finansbank, Turkey's eighth-largest bank by assets. Over the weekend, it was disclosed that the much smaller National Bank of Greece had beaten out Citigroup in the bidding for Finansbank.

The Fed's Mr. Rutledge said in his letter that regulators would continue to "carefully review any expansion proposal undertaken by Citigroup."

Mr. Prince, who took over as chief executive in October 2003, has told investors that 2006 is the year that the new management team he has assembled must execute and improve the company's bottom line. To do that, Mr. Prince and his team will have to expand its business in foreign markets, the company's top priority, and improve the operation of its consumer business in the U.S.

Expectations by some investors that Citigroup will once again flex its financial muscle by going on a major acquisition spree will likely be disappointed. Mr. Prince said in the interview that the Fed's letter didn't alter his commitment to expand the financial institution, which has $1.5 trillion in assets, by generating more profits from its existing businesses and expanding its reach to more customers overseas and domestically.

"It does not change our priorities," Mr. Prince said. "We are just too big to just rely only on deals."

However, Mr. Prince did say that deal-making isn't totally out of the question for Citigroup, a company with more than $28 billion in cash on its books at the end of last year. As examples of the types of deals Citigroup might do, Mr. Prince pointed to the company's April 2004 purchase of South Korea's KorAm Bank Co. for $2.7 billion; the purchase less than a year later of the 106-branch First American Bank in Texas for an undisclosed sum; and the acquisition earlier this year of OnTrade Inc., an electronic-trading platform bought for about $8 million.

In 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange, Citigroup's shares were up 80 cents to $48.21.

Arcelor Transfers Dofasco Unit To Block Takeover (WSJ)

By Jason Singer and Charles Fleming

DOJ_NMG_0025588

Arcelor SA transferred its lucrative Canadian operations to a Dutch foundation in an effort to block a €20.4 billion ($24.8 billion) hostile offer by rival steelmaker Mittal Steel Co., a move that drew rebukes from Arcelor shareholders and corporate-governance activists.

Arcelor also raised its dividend by 54% to €1.85 a share and said it will make a special payment to shareholders of $5 billion after Mittal drops its bid or the takeover attempt fails. The two payouts are meant to make siding with Arcelor financially equivalent to accepting Mittal's bid, boiling the choice down to which management team investors prefer.

Mittal vowed to press on with its bid, which has sparked debate over national pride, cultural compatibility and economic openness across Europe and in other parts of the world. But Mittal, based in Rotterdam, the Netherlands, said it would reduce the cash portion of its cash-and-stock bid because it considers the increased dividend an advance, though it hasn't yet disclosed details.

Many shareholders reacted angrily to Arcelor's move to prevent its Dofasco Inc. unit of Ontario, Canada, from being sold even if Mittal succeeds in its bid for Arcelor. They said the action is contrary to Arcelor's promises to let shareholders be the ultimate arbiters of Mittal's offer. Still, other observers said the moves could frustrate Mittal's efforts.

Arcelor's transfer is "against shareholders' interests," said Gérard Augustin-Normand, chief executive of Richelieu Finance, an investment fund based in Paris that holds about three million Arcelor shares. "It's also against Arcelor's own interests because its shareholders were its best defense," he added. "I was confident that it was going to be a fair fight, but now I'm not so sure."

Mittal, the world's largest steelmaker by production, launched its bid for Arcelor, the industry's No. 2 player, earlier this year. The two sides have since been waging aggressive campaigns to woo shareholders, with Arcelor Chief Executive Guy Dollé at one point suggesting Mittal lacks "European cultural values"; Mittal's chief executive, Lakshmi Mittal, whose family controls the company, was born in India but is based in London.

In Paris trading yesterday, Arcelor fell slightly to €32.50. Mittal fell 3.6% to €31.10 in Amsterdam. Based on Mittal's closing price yesterday, the bid values Arcelor at €31.93 a share.

Arcelor's higher dividend and one-time payout combined roughly total the cash portion of Mittal's offer and some of the savings Mittal would bring to a combined company. Tony Taccone, a steel consultant at Pittsburgh's First River, said Arcelor's dividend increase could placate some investors, while the increase and the Dofasco transfer could make the deal more difficult for Mittal to consummate.

Mr. Dollé has repeatedly but vaguely made reference to a plan Arcelor had for Dofasco that Arcelor hoped would scupper a deal. Dofasco is important because under Mittal's offer, Dofasco would be sold to Germany's ThyssenKrupp AG for 5.4 billion Canadian dollars (US$4.6 billion) if the takeover of Arcelor is successful. Selling Dofasco would help Mittal finance the cash portion of its Arcelor bid and help ease any antitrust concerns in the North American market, where Mittal already has a significant presence.

People close to the matter said Mittal and its advisers were looking at potential legal challenges to Arcelor's move, which would be prohibited in many European countries, including the United Kingdom and France, but is allowed in Luxembourg. Mittal may also try to renegotiate a sale of Dofasco's management control and financial access -- the elements still controlled by Arcelor -- to ThyssenKrupp while leaving ownership of the shares in the trust. It isn't clear whether such a transfer would satisfy regulators or what price ThyssenKrupp would pay for those rights.

Yesterday Mittal said that its bid doesn't hinge on the sale of Dofasco to ThyssenKrupp and that it will continue its quest to acquire Arcelor. "Nothing in this announcement alters our resolve or ability to proceed with our offer," Mittal said. "Today's announcement by the board of Arcelor goes against the interests of its own shareholders and is an attempt to deprive them of the right to decide on the merits of Mittal Steel's offer."

A ThyssenKrupp spokesman declined to comment.

Arcelor said it transferred ownership of Dofasco to a newly formed Dutch foundation, even though Arcelor maintains management control and all financial rights to Dofasco. The trust, called Strategic Steel Stichting, is run by a board of three Arcelor appointees: an Arcelor executive, a former Arcelor executive and Allan A. Tuttle, an American lawyer and former general counsel of Gucci Group NV. The trio has the power to determine whether Dofasco can be sold for the next five years.

Arcelor Chief Financial Officer Gonzalo Urquijo said the company made the transfer "to defend shareholders" from a potential sale of Dofasco because the Canadian company is integral to Arcelor's business strategy. "This was done in the interest of our shareholders." Corporate-governance activists scoffed at that assertion. "All the assets of a company should be able to be bought or sold," said Colette Neuville, founder and president of French minority-shareholder defense movement ADAM.

Netflix Sues Blockbuster Over Web Expansion (WSJ/AP)

DOJ_NMG_0025589

By The Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO -- Online DVD rental service Netflix Inc. on Tuesday accused Blockbuster Inc. of illegally copying its ideas in a patent infringement lawsuit challenging the video store chain's recent Internet expansion.

The complaint, filed in U.S. District Court in San Francisco, focuses largely on the online wish lists that prioritize the DVD desires of about 5.4 million people who subscribe to either Netflix or Blockbuster's Internet service.

Netflix also believes its patents cover perhaps its most popular feature -- the option of renting a DVD for an unlimited time without incurring late fees.

That change, introduced by Netflix seven years ago, became so popular that Blockbuster last year stopped charging late fees for tardy rental returns to its video stores. Dallas-based Blockbuster once pocketed hundreds of millions of dollars annually from those late fees.

Both Netflix and Blockbuster's online service charge $17.99 per month to rent up to three DVDs at a time. When subscribers return a DVD in a postage-paid envelope, the rental services automatically send the next available movie on their wish lists.

Blockbuster initially denigrated the flat-fee concept, but then reversed course and launched its Internet service in 2004 after scores of customers defected to Netflix, based in Los Gatos, Calif.

"Blockbuster has been willfully and deliberately copying Netflix's business methods," Netflix spokesman Steve Swasey said.

Blockbuster spokesman Randy Hargrove declined to comment Tuesday because the company hadn't yet seen the suit.

Netflix contends it first patented the process for managing DVD wish lists -- known as queues -- in June 2003.

A second patent issued Tuesday to Netflix apparently triggered the lawsuit. Netflix believes the additional patent covers an even wider range of automated interaction with its customers.

Netflix hopes to obtain a court order that would force Blockbuster to change the way its online rental service operates or require the company to pay patent royalties -- a potentially huge bill, based on other recent patent disputes.

For instance, the maker of the popular Blackberry email device last month agreed to pay $612.5 million to settle a long-running patent infringement case.

Because patent cases often delve into highly technical issues, they can take several years to wind through the legal system.

If Netflix prevails, it could thwart its biggest competitor in the steadily growing field of online DVD rentals.

Netflix began the year with about 4.2 million subscribers. Blockbuster has signed up about 1.2 million online customers so far. Netflix's success already has hurt Blockbuster, which lost $588 million last year and expects to continue to close stores as more DVD renters turn to the Internet.

In contrast, Netflix earned $42 million last year. But its service has been recently fending off a backlash triggered by a class-action lawsuit that focused attention on a scoring system that penalizes its most frequent renters. Netflix is awaiting court approval of a proposed settlement that would give free DVDs for a month to millions of former and current subscribers.

European competition authorities on Tuesday raided the headquarters of Norway's Color Line AS ferry company as part of an antitrust investigation.

The surprise inspection was to check for possible competition violations by the Norwegian ferry operator, the EFTA Surveillance Authority, or ESA, said in a statement.

"Surprise inspections are a preliminary step in antitrust investigations. The fact that the EFTA Surveillance Authority carries out an inspection does not mean that the company is guilty of anticompetitive behavior," the ESA said.

ESA is the enforcement arm of the European Free Trade Association, or EFTA. Through treaties with the European Union, EFTA members Norway, Iceland and Liechtenstein have open markets with the 25-nation European bloc even though they are not members.

Color Line spokesman Helge Otto Mathisen said the company was cooperating fully with the ESA inspectors, who were assisted by the Norwegian Competition Authority.

"Such a review of documentation is a normal practice when competition authorities want insights in the market," he said.

Oslo-based Color Line is a major European ferry line, with 3,500 employees in four countries, 10 ships and seven international routes between Norway, Denmark, Germany and Sweden.

The group said it transports about 4.2 million passengers and nearly 1 million motor vehicles per year, and has annual revenue of about 4 billion kroner ($615 million).

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

EPA Air-toxics Plan Sparks Internal Rift (CSM)

By Mark Clayton
The Christian Science Monitor, April 5, 2006

The Environmental Protection Agency has drafted a plan that would allow so much extra industrial air pollution that 7 of 10 of the agency's own regional air-quality directors have signed on to a memo condemning it.

While disagreement on policy issues is not unusual, former EPA officials say the regional directors used particularly strong language in criticizing the plan developed on William Wehrum's watch in a December memo, which surfaced Monday.

The stinging internal criticism is likely to pop up Wednesday at Senate confirmation hearings for Mr. Wehrum, who is nominated to become the nation's top air-quality officer.

The plan proposes loosening limits on toxic emissions from scores of industrial sectors, including refineries, chemical plants, steel mills, and smelters.

The changes, the memo said, would "essentially negate" today's limits on industry toxic air emissions like arsenic, mercury, and lead, also called "hazardous air pollutants" or "air toxics."

Such poisons are considered by the Clean Air Act to be far more dangerous to public health than air pollutants like nitrous oxides or sulfur dioxide.

Under today's requirements, any facility emitting more than 10 tons per year of a single toxin, or 25 tons of several toxins, must install pollution control equipment to cut emissions by as much as 95 percent. The new plan would allow large polluters that previously had brought emissions down below the 25-ton limit - say, to 2-3 tons - to boost emissions, as long as they remained under 25 tons.

Criticizing the plan as an unjustified "drastic change" in emissions rules, the memo cites Wehrum's office for a "trend of excluding" regional offices from rule and policy development that was "disturbing."

If adopted, some environmentalists say the new plan would blow open the most significant new hole in the Clean Air Act since the Bush administration's reinterpretation of the act's "new source review" provision, which curbed power plant emissions.

That interpretation was struck down by the US Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia last month.

"Wehrum is the architect of a lot of changes to the Clean Air Act that have weakened environmental protections," says Eric Schaeffer, director of the Environmental Integrity Project in New York, former head of the EPA's office of regulatory enforcement until 2002. "This new proposal on toxics pushes past science, law, and fair public process."

An EPA spokesman says it's too early to assess the policy proposal.

"This is a preliminary draft that is currently under development and internal review which could change before EPA issues it as a proposal," said John Millett, an EPA spokesman in an e-mailed statement. "EPA will seek public comment when it issues the proposal."

Still, some like what they've been hearing about the draft so far.

The proposed change is "good news" for health and the environment, said Bob Slaughter, president of the National Petrochemical and Refiners Association. "Without the proposal, power disincentives would exist to make these [pollution] reductions," he said in a statement.

But enforcement could be a problem. The regional directors memo calls "unfounded and overly optimist" the new plan's contention that toxic emissions are unlikely to rise since industry will want to "avoid negative publicity" and "maintain their appearance as responsible businesses."

Instead, "the cost of the increased [toxic] emissions would be borne by the communities surrounding the sources," the memo concludes.

"It's pretty clear this plan is out of bounds," says John Walke, clean air director for the Natural Resources Defense Council in Washington. "It's also clear the regional directors found it to be extreme."

Feds Want To Expand Yucca Nuclear Dump (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0025591

USA Today, April 5, 2006

The Bush administration wants to bury tens of thousands of tons more nuclear waste at the Yucca Mountain dump in Nevada than now allowed — part of a package of new proposals meant to spur development of the controversial and long-delayed dump.

The Energy Department proposed lifting the 77,000-ton storage limit on the dump 90 miles northwest of Las Vegas and allowing as much waste as the facility can hold.

That figure has been estimated by federal environmental impact studies at 132,000 tons. About 55,000 tons of nuclear waste are waiting at utility sites around the country.

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada, an opponent of the dump, said the bill was "not even on life support. It's dead when it gets here."

Yucca Mountain was approved by Congress in 2002 and was to open in 2010. The opening date has been repeatedly delayed and is now expected in 2015 or later.

The deputy press secretary for the Department of Homeland Security was arrested for using the Internet to seduce what he thought was a 14-year-old girl, according to a statement by the Polk County Sheriff's Office in Florida.

Brian Doyle, 55, was arrested at his residence in Silver Spring, Md., after an incident that allegedly occurred March 14. The "girl" was an undercover computer crimes detective in Polk County, according to a sheriff's statement.

Doyle could not be reached. Homeland Security press secretary Russ Knocke said: "We take these allegations very seriously, and we will cooperate fully."

Caspar Weinberger, who died last week at 88, was given a special military funeral at Arlington National Cemetery following a memorial service at the Fort Myer Memorial Chapel across the Potomac River from Washington. He was Defense secretary under President Reagan in the 1980s.

Among those attending was former British prime minister Margaret Thatcher, 80, who has rarely appeared in public after suffering a series of small strokes. Weinberger supported her decision to dispatch British forces to take back the Falkland Islands after they were invaded by Argentina in 1982.

Former secretary of State Colin Powell told mourners, who included Weinberger's widow, Jane, that Weinberger's life "rested on a bedrock of beliefs."

Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld said Weinberger "made changes that restored pride in our country's uniform and helped win the Cold War."

Justin Berry, who for five years starred in his own Web cam child pornography business, told the House Energy and Commerce Committee that the Justice Department is moving too slowly to round up 1,500 pedophiles whose information he surrendered last year. Berry, 19, said the names, credit card numbers and other details he provided has resulted in only one arrest.

Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra would not discuss Berry's case but said there has been a threefold increase in federal prosecutions of child pornography and abuse cases over the past decade.

Congress Is Asked To Set Opening Of Nuclear Dump (WSJ)

By John Fialka

Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Energy Department, hoping to spur development of the nuclear-waste repository being built at Nevada's Yucca Mountain, is calling on Congress to set a timetable for opening the facility and enlarging its capacity.

"We need an expansion of nuclear power in this country," said Clay Sell, the department's deputy director, who said the changes will help speed the construction of a new generation of nuclear power plants, increase domestic energy supplies and reduce air pollution.

Controversy over the facility, originally scheduled to open around 1997, and dogged opposition from Nevada's congressional delegation has resulted in a series of delays.

Mr. Sell said the proposal, if approved by Congress, would make it easier for the department to tap billions of dollars of fees, collected from utilities with nuclear power plants, to provide the $700 million to $800 million a year to finance the remaining work at the facility.

The proposal asks Congress to raise the legal limit on the capacity of the mountain's usable storage space from 70,000 to 120,000 metric tons. (A metric ton equals 2,204 pounds.) The enlargement would accommodate one of the administration's longer range plans to remove and reuse parts of the spent fuel, leaving a relatively small percentage of waste for permanent storage. Without the reduction, the department has estimated, it might need at least six more permanent storage sites.

Cleanup At West Valley Faces Legal Challenge (Times Herald)

By RICK MILLER

Times Herald, April 5, 2006

The New York State Energy Research and Development Authority has authorized a lawsuit against the U.S. Department of Energy over the nuclear cleanup at the West Valley Demonstration Project.

"The Department of Energy has taken a very limited view of its responsibility to clean up nuclear wastes at West Valley," said Vincent Delorio, Authority chairman.

"We have been working for 10 years to convince the Feds to live up to their obligations, but have been unable to reach agreement," Mr. Delorio said.

"We're very concerned that DOE is cutting the budget and the work force at West Valley when there is a great deal more work to do," he said. "DOE seems to be planning an early departure and we don't want the taxpayers of New York state left holding the bag."

Last June, U.S. Rep. John R. "Randy" Kuhl, R-Hammondsport, introduced a bill authorizing the Department of Energy to take over the site in the northern Cattaraugus County town of Ashford and spend $95 million a year to completely clean up the entire site.

The Nuclear Regulatory Commission also would be given authority over DOE activities at the site.

U.S. Reps. Brian Higgins, D-Buffalo, Thomas Reynolds, R-Clarence, and Sherwood Boehlert, R-New Hartford, are co-sponsors of the legislation. U.S. Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Charles Schumer introduced an identical bill in the Senate.

Bob Van Wicklin, a spokesman for Rep. Kuhl, told The Times Herald today, "It's unfortunate that New York has to go this route to get the Department of Energy's attention but we're running out of options and the West Valley question must be answered."

He said, "Congressman Kuhl will still try to move his bill through Congress and supports NYSERDA's efforts to clarify the situation on the courts as well. The Department (of Energy) could avoid a costly court mess by just coming to the negotiating table with New York."

The Times Herald was unable to reach DOE officials at the West Valley site for comment this morning.

The Department of Energy broke off negotiations with NYSERDA at the end of President Bill Clinton's Administration after more than two years of talks. Efforts to move the talks forward since then have been unsuccessful.

The DOE has reduced the funding levels for cleanup activities and staffing levels at the West Valley Demonstration Project to about $70 million this year.

The site of the country's first commercial nuclear fuel reprocessing plant, it was operated by Nuclear Fuel Services Inc. from 1966 to 1972 when operations were discontinued. In 1976, NFS informed state officials it would leave the site when its lease expired in 1980.

The plant separated reusable uranium and plutonium from spent fuel rods, primarily from the federal nuclear weapons reactor at Hanford, Wash., as well as other nuclear power plants.

The 1980 West Valley Demonstration Project Act authorized clean-up of the site with the federal government paying 90 percent of the cost and New York state paying 10 percent.

At the end of 2004, the project had succeeded in converting more than 600,000 gallons of highly radioactive liquid waste stored in underground tanks at the site into 275 glass logs now stored in 10-foot high stainless steel cylinders.

One of the areas of disagreement has always been the disposition of the underground tanks. The state has asked that the tanks, which contain a radioactive residue, be removed from the site, while the Department of Energy is proposing to fill them with a concrete-like grout.

The DOE also wants to demolish nuclear fuel reprocessing buildings, fill them with grout and leave them at the site.

NY May Sue US Govt To Get W Valley Nuclear Site Cleaned (AP)

BUFFALO, N.Y. (AP)--The state is prepared to take the federal government to court to end an impasse over cleanup and long-term management of the West Valley nuclear site, which once housed the nation's only commercial nuclear fuel reprocessing operation.

Talks between New York and the U.S. Department of Energy stalled during the Clinton administration. Now, with the DOE cutting staff and funding at the site, state energy officials worry the federal agency is getting ready to leave.

"DOE seems to be planning an early departure, and we don't want the taxpayers of New York state left holding the bag," said Vincent Delorio, chairman of the New York State Energy Research & Development Authority.

The agency this week authorized litigation to determine the federal government's responsibility at the Cattaraugus County site 30 miles south of Buffalo.

From 1966 to 1972, spent nuclear fuel from commercial nuclear power plants and DOE sites was chopped and dissolved, and its uranium and plutonium were extracted. The operation shut down for upgrades in 1972 but remained closed after stricter regulatory requirements passed during the closure made the prospect of reopening too expensive.

The 1980 West Valley Demonstration Project Act passed by Congress obligated the DOE to decontaminate and decommission facilities at the state-owned site, with the state pitching in on the cost.

Since 1981, West Valley Nuclear Services Co., the DOE's onsite contractor, has solidified and stored more than 600,000 gallons of high-level liquid radioactive waste, while shipping low-level waste off site. More than 300,000 cubic feet of low-level waste was removed last year.

"As past performance shows, the U.S. Department of Energy remains committed to meeting the requirements of the West Valley Demonstration Project Act," the DOE said in a statement issued Tuesday in response to the NYSERDA action. "... Overall, DOE has reduced the volume of legacy waste at the West Valley Demonstration Project by 70% in the last few years."

Legislation proposed by Rep. John "Randy" Kuhl would update the 1980 law and require the federal government to take ownership of the site and full responsibility for its cleanup. The bill would end the state's financial obligation, which has totaled more than $200 million.

NYSERDA views legal action as a last resort that would be pursued if face-to-face negotiations and the legislation were to fail, officials said.

"The progress of the legislation is uncertain, and we feel compelled to proceed simultaneously along the litigation track to make sure that we get these responsibility issues resolved so that we can move forward with the cleanup," NYSERDA President Peter Smith said.

"It's unfortunate that New York has to go this route just to get the DOE's attention, but we're running out of options," said Bob Van Wicklin, a spokesman for Kuhl, R-N.Y.

The DOE last week said it would award a contract for continued cleanup at West Valley in the coming months. West Valley Nuclear Services spokesman Terry Dunford said the company, which has held the contract since 1981, would seek to continue its work there.

AK Steel Settles 6-year-old Environmental Lawsuit With Federal And Ohio EPAs (MIDDJOUR)

Middletown (OH) Journal, April 5, 2006

Steelmaker plans to spend $13 million to clean up two streams

AK Steel Corp. will launch a nearly $13 million effort to clean up two streams contaminated with “significant” toxins as part of an agreement reached with federal and Ohio environmental protection agencies to settle a six-year-old lawsuit, the company and government officials announced Monday.

The settlement — filed in the U.S. District Court for Southern District in Cincinnati Monday morning — addresses claims that AK Steel violated the federal Clean Water, Clean Air and Resource Conservation and Recovery acts, as well as, Ohio environmental regulations in and surrounding its 2,700-acre Middletown Works.

The 103-page federal consent degree ends decades of contamination from Middletown Works, according to Sue Ellen Wooldridge, assistant Attorney General for the U.S. Justice Department’s Environment and Natural Resources Division.

“By removing contamination from the areas currently known to contain significant polychlorinated biphenyls (PCB) concentration, AK Steel will immediately begin cleanup work to protect the environment and reduce the potential for human exposure to PCBs,” Wooldridge said.

As part of the agreement, AK Steel will pay $460,000 in civil penalties to be split equally between the state of Ohio and U.S. governments. AK Steel also will spend an additional $750,000 on an “environmentally beneficial project that will remove ozone-depleting refrigerants from certain equipment at the plant.”

The agreement resolves claims filed June 2000 by the federal and Ohio Environmental Protection Agencies, the Sierra Club and the Natural Resources Defense Council. The groups claimed Middletown Works posed a threat to human health and the environment. For its part, AK Steel has agreed to pay $450,000 to the two citizen groups for their claim for costs and attorney fees.

The Curtis Street-based steelmaker signed the settlement without “admissions or findings of such violations,” according to a press release issued by the company.

The agreement, which is before U.S. District Judge Herman Weber, becomes official after a 30-day comment period, the U.S. EPA said.

AK Steel will launch its clean-up efforts after the settlement is approved, said Alan McCoy, AK's vice president for government and public relations.

Part of the cleanup effort requires AK Steel to test portions of the soil for PCB contamination around Dicks Creek and its Monroe Ditch — tributaries to the Great Miami River — and to remove contaminated soils from adjacent floodplain areas.

"I'm gratified that AK Steel, government and citizens have been able to agree on a solution to address difficult issues which have gone unresolved for many years," said Joseph Koncelik, director of the Ohio EPA. "As a result of the hard work of all involved, we can look forward to leaving our children a cleaner, safe environment."

'Landmark agreement'

James Wainscott, AK Steel's chairman, president and CEO, hailed the news as a "landmark agreement."

"This agreement, and the investigation and clean-up work that will follow, is yet another tangible example of AK Steel's commitment to the environment, improved relationships and to the citizens of Middletown and its surrounding communities."

Contamination of the creek has long been a focus of community concern because of the access children have to the area, said Marilyn Wall, conservation chair for the Sierra Club's Ohio chapter.

Wall said the steelmaker has taken a positive step in vowing to test for PCBs around the creek and commended the company's involvement of Middletown residents in the cleanup process. PCBs once were widely used to insulate electrical equipment, but the government banned their production in 1979 because of studies linking them to cancer and other health problems for fish, wildlife and humans.

"It's unusual that citizens get a chance to be part of the discussion process," Wall said.

Thomas V. Skinner, U.S. EPA Region 5 Administrator, said the settlement will resolve several environmental issues the government has pursued against AK Steel.

"It is the culmination of six years of litigation and negotiations," he said. "This settlement will result in environmental improvements in Dicks Creek basin for Middletown-area residents and workers at the AK Steel plant."

The steelmaker will spend at least $750,000 for an environmental project focused on replacing ozone depleting refrigerants with non ozone-depleting refrigerants at Middletown Works, McCoy said.

The lawsuit was first filed June 29, 2000, on behalf of the U.S. EPA for environmental allegations. The next day, Ohio filed a similar lawsuit. The court combined the actions, and since then, has dismissed some of the claims, including several air pollution claims. In 2003, Judge Weber allowed the Sierra Club and the National Resources Defense Council to join the lawsuit.

The settlement comes almost two years after AK Steel announced a similar settlement with the Ohio EPA.

In March 2004, AK Steel settled air nuisance claims with the Ohio EPA by agreeing to install new air pollution controls on its Middletown ironmaking and steelmaking facilities.

The controls — dubbed MACT for "maximum achievable control technology"— satisfy new federal requirements, McCoy said.

Ahead of schedule

AK Steel installed the first of those controls on its Middletown blast furnace last May, nearly a year ahead of the federal deadline. It had been fined $1.7 million, but received credits worth $1.3 million toward the penalty by agreeing to install the equipment sooner than required by the federal Clean Air Act.

Next month, McCoy said the steelmaker will complete the upgrade of pollution controls by installing the same controls on its Middletown basic oxygen furnace.

Since 2003, AK Steel has spent more than $370 million for environmental capital investment projects and compliance costs across the corporation, including $66 million to install new air emission controls on the ironmaking and steelmaking furnaces, McCoy said.

When fully operational, the new air emission controls are expected to capture 900 tons of non-hazardous dust emissions a year that would have resulted in offsite emissions into surrounding neighborhoods.

This is the second settlement AK Steel has reached with the EPA. In December 2004, the steelmaker reached a $1.2 million settlement for pollution violations at its steel plant in Butler, Pa.

Under that consent decree, AK Steel agreed to pay a $300,000 penalty and undertook $900,000 worth of projects to reduce smog-producing ozone in Pennsylvania, which went beyond federal and state environment regulations.

AK Steel (AKS) rose 0.07 cents to close at $15.07 Monday on the New York Stock Exchange.

7 In Colombia Face U.S. Drug Charges (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, April 5, 2006

Seven drug-smuggling suspects, including five Colombian police officers and an airline employee, have been arrested in Bogota in connection with the shipment of more than $10 million in cocaine to the United States, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration said yesterday.

An indictment handed up in the case and unsealed yesterday accused the seven of smuggling the cocaine through the El Dorado International Airport in Bogota for importation into the United States, said DEA Special Agent-in-Charge John P. Gilbride.

"Narcoterrorism is a real threat to the security of the United States, and we must never let our guard down," Mr. Gilbride said.

"This operation sends a strong signal to traffickers worldwide that the international drug-enforcement community will continue to aggressively pursue any potential compromise to airport security."

DEA spokesman Rusty Payne in Washington said the arrests were part of Operation Caso Dorado, a joint undercover investigation by DEA agents in New York and Bogota, the U.S. attorney's office in New York, agents from U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) and Colombian and Mexican law-enforcement authorities.

"More than ever, the public must be able to rely on the integrity of the law-enforcement and airline personnel responsible for the safety of airline passengers and shipments," said U.S. Attorney Michael J. Garcia in New York.

"When such officials allow smuggling of contraband destined for the United States, they violate our criminal laws and endanger our national security, and they will face justice in an American courtroom."

Named in the indictment were Leonidas Molina-Triana, a former major in the Colombian National Police (CNP); Juan Carlos Cardona, a former CNP captain; Jaime Enrique-Padilla, a former CNP lieutenant; Jorge Plazas-Silva, a CNP patrolman; Humberto Avila, a CNP patrolmen; Maria Christina Marin-Castro, an employee of Avianca Airlines; and Henry Ferro-Varon.

They were accused of conspiracy to distribute cocaine shipments through El Dorado Airport en route to the United States.

If convicted, the seven face a maximum sentence of life in prison and a mandatory minimum sentence of 10 years in prison.

According to the indictment, representatives of Colombia's notorious Norte Valle drug cartel, including former high-ranking Colombian police officials, recruited active members of the Colombian police responsible for El Dorado Airport security operations and Avianca Airlines employees at El Dorado Airport's cargo facility to permit the smuggling of cocaine from Colombia to Mexico and ultimately into the United States.

The indictment said that in October, corrupt Colombian police officials and Avianca Airlines employees permitted 900 pounds of cocaine worth more than $10 million on the streets of New York City to pass through security at the Avianca Airlines cargo facility at El Dorado Airport without detection.

7 Arrested In Cocaine Smuggling Ring (AP)

BOGOTA, Colombia (AP) -- Active and retired police and army officers working for one of Colombia's largest cocaine cartels used commercial cargo planes to ship drugs to the United States, authorities said Tuesday in announcing seven arrests.

U.S. officials, who are seeking the extradition of the seven, said the case illustrates the reaches of Colombia's notorious drug rings and the danger posed by corruption among the country's security and transportation workers.

Among those arrested are a retired police major and captain, a former army lieutenant, two police officers and an employee of Colombia's national airline, Avianca. The seventh suspect was described as a liaison between the active and former police officials and the Norte del Valle cartel, one of Colombia's largest drug traffickers. Police said the cartel used Avianca's cargo plans to transport the drugs.

"There is a national security component to this case," said Boyd Johnson, chief of the international narcotics trafficking unit at the U.S. Attorney's Office in Manhattan.

Authorities said the seven would be extradited to New York to stand trial on charges they smuggled more than 900 pounds of cocaine bound for the United States. Police said they seized 1,200 pounds of cocaine linked to the cartel in a warehouse in northern Bogota on Monday.

The arrests, beginning Monday night, were based on a U.S. indictment in New York that alleges the Norte del Valle cartel recruited the airline worker and police involved with security at El Dorado Airport.

It alleges the ring shipped the cocaine in October through Avianca's cargo facility after an airline employee approved false paperwork. The drugs were allegedly destined for the United States via Mexico.

Two patrolmen let the shipment go through security and guarded it for three days at the airline cargo area, the indictment alleges. The cocaine noted in the indictment was seized in Mexico City by Mexican law enforcement agencies on Oct. 17, it adds.

If convicted, the defendants could face anywhere from 10 years to life in prison, though the United States has assured Colombia that it will not seek life sentences for defendants extradited from there.

Colombia is the world's largest producer of cocaine. In the last four years, nearly 350 Colombians have been extradited to the United States to stand trial on drug trafficking charges.

The Norte del Valle cocaine cartel is considered to be one of the largest mafias operating in Colombia. One of its leaders, Diego Montoya, sits alongside Osama Bin Laden on the FBI's ten-most-wanted list.

8 Charged In Cocaine Smuggling CaseOperation Used Airliners Headed Into New York, Officials Say (CNN)

CNN, April 4, 2006

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Eight people, including seven current or former Colombian police officers, have been charged in an alleged plot to smuggle $10 million worth of cocaine into New York on airliners, U.S. officials said Tuesday.

The officers and an employee of the Colombian airline Avianca are in custody in Colombia, according to the Drug Enforcement Administration and the U.S. attorney's office in New York.

The indictment in the case alleges that between August and December of last year members of a Colombian cartel recruited police officials responsible for airport security and airline employees to allow drugs to be smuggled from Colombia to Mexico and, ultimately, the United States.

The arrests were the result of a joint investigation by the DEA and the U.S. attorney's office in New York along with Colombian and Mexican officials.

Meanwhile, the Justice Department has reached a settlement with Avianca requiring it to take several measures to stop what officials call repeated seizures of illegal drugs from its flights into John F. Kennedy International Airport in New York, CNN has learned.

The agreement is being filed in U.S. District Court in New York after an attempt to seize some of the airline's interests.

Officials said the required measures include hiring a private agency to monitor the airline's anti-smuggling efforts concerning drugs, explosives and weapons.

CNN's Kevin Bohn contributed to this report.

Prosecutor: Colombian Smugglers Reveal Air Travel Vulnerability (WNYC)

WNYC, April 4, 2006

A top federal prosecutor says the arrests of five current or former Colombian police officers and an employee of Avianca Airlines in a drug smuggling case raises concerns about the vulnerability of the nation's skies.

Boyd Johnson, of the U.S. Attorney's office in Manhattan, says the smugglers used Avianca jets, which fly to New York daily. He added authorities obviously have lot of concern about that and the damage that can cause.

Federal prosecutors and drug enforcement officials say the ring tried to smuggle more than $10 million worth of cocaine to the United States through Mexico.

DEA Investigates Oceanside Humane Society North County Humane Society Had Three Visits From DEA (KGTV)

KGTV-TV, April 4, 2006

OCEANSIDE, Calif. -- One of the county's oldest animal organizations is under investigation, 10News reported.

The Federal Drug Enforcement Agency is investigating Oceanside's North County Humane Society.

The North County Humane Society was founded nearly 70 years ago as a nonprofit organization -- funded mainly through private donations.

Like any other humane organization, it is subject to federal spot checks. The DEA conducted inspections in March and more information is expected.

DOJ_NMG_0025597

A spokesperson for the DEA confirms agents conducted an investigation at the North County Humane Society regarding its handling of controlled substances. The DEA will not say what agents found, if anything.

According to a statement released by NCHS Tuesday afternoon, the DEA made three prearranged visits to the site and completed its review, but NCHS has not been notified of any conclusion to those visits.

10News visited Dr. Jennifer Luke, a veterinarian in Tierrasanta.

She is not associated with nor commenting on the NCHS case.

Luke did agree to explain how the DEA regulates controlled substances used at veterinary and humane facilities.

"I have to account for every CC in my vials," said Luke.

Luke says every office handling controlled substances must have an FDA-approved lock box permanently attached to something -- in her case, a concrete wall.

That box can only be opened with dual keys -- keys only Luke has access to.

A log book tracks every vial that comes into the office. Employees must see Luke when checking out drugs for a procedure.

When a drug leaves the cabinet, it's noted in a log book. Then each ounce of the drug used is also noted, which employee used it, which patient received it and how much. Why is the process so strict? Luke says it boils down to abuse.

NCHS also confirmed the recent resignation of executive director Stacy Steel, but calls it a separate event.

In her press release, board President Julie Moran said Steel was "invaluable to the growth and visibility of NCHS."

North County Humane Society Executive Director Resigns (NCT)

By PHILIP K. IRELAND

North County Times, April 5, 2006

OCEANSIDE ---- Officials with the North County Humane Society on Tuesday confirmed both the resignation of Executive Director Stacy Steel and an inquiry of the humane society by the federal Drug Enforcement Administration.

Steel could not be reached for comment on her March 25 resignation.

The DEA notified the humane society on March 8 that an "inquiry" had begun, the press release stated. Special agents completed "three prearranged site visits with the (North County Humane Society's) cooperation, and to our knowledge has completed its review."

The humane society has not been notified of the results or conclusions of those visits, the press release stated.

Special Agent Dan Simmons, a spokesman with the DEA, confirmed Tuesday that the animal shelter was the subject of an investigation, but declined to elaborate. Simmons would not say why or when the investigation began. He also declined to say if the investigation was a routine periodic inspection or an investigation launched as the result of specific allegations.

The press release lauded Steel's tenure with the shelter, saying she was "invaluable to the growth and visibility" of the humane society.

Humane society board president Julie Moran said Tuesday that Steel served as executive director for three years.

Both Moran and board member Linda Sabo declined to say why Steel resigned, referring all questions to Alexis Gutierrez, the humane society's attorney. Gutierrez said he could not comment on Steel's resignation.

The humane society is run by a seven-member board of directors that includes Moran, Sabo, Connie Hoban, Renee Simmons and Pamela Hower.

Hoban, reached by phone at her Carlsbad home on Monday, declined comment, referring all inquiries to Moran. Sabo said Tuesday that employees of the humane society would not comment either. Attempts to contact the other board members failed.

The humane society has been involved in several high-profile events recently. The organization is working with the city of Oceanside to build the city's first dog park. And it's also in the middle of $300,000 renovation of its cat adoption and isolation centers in the wake of an outbreak of panleukopenia, a highly contagious virus disease spread through the air or by contact. Outbreaks of Panleukopenia, caused by feline parvovirus, have killed hundreds of cats at the facility during the hot summer months in each of the last two years.

The society has redesigned its two cat centers to minimize cat-to-cat contact and cat-to-human-to-cat contact and to filter and refresh air in the buildings several times per hour. Construction of the facility is still under way.

The humane society is supported by public donations and contracts to provide animal control and animal rescue services for the cities of Oceanside and Vista. Of $2.2 million in total revenue collected by the humane society in 2004, $1.3 million came from city contracts. The animal shelter reported $773,334 in public donations, according to documents filed with the Internal Revenue Service.

Father Says Daughter Acted To Avoid Prison (RTD)

By TOM CAMPBELL

Richmond (VA) Times Dispatch, April 5, 2006

Says she believed sex act with DEA agent would prevent term

The young woman, barely 18 and a new mother, did everything the feds asked her to do after she was arrested last year along with her crack-dealing boyfriend.

She pleaded guilty to drug conspiracy. She helped agents make controlled drug buys from dealers. She told them what she knew about illegal activities.

And when a special agent of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration asked her to, she performed oral sex on him last summer in a Glen Allen motel.

The Richmond-based DEA agent was William Carter Harden, who pleaded guilty March 28 in U.S. District Court to the crime of lying to a federal officer. According to court records, he denied having sex with the woman when his supervisors questioned him about it three separate times in October.

Harden, 46, faces a maximum prison term of five years at sentencing July 14. He resigned from the DEA the day before his guilty plea.

The young woman's father, James Morrow of Ashland, said his daughter told him Harden promised her he would keep her out of prison if she had sex with him. She had pleaded guilty by then, he said, but she remained free until October while working as an informant for federal prosecutors and investigators.

"She worked all through the whole thing, before and after she pleaded guilty," Morrow said, as well as before and after the incident with Harden. She knew she faced a potentially long prison sentence and she was "trying to help herself," he said.

Morrow said his daughter and her boyfriend, Christopher S. Sandridge, had been living in a Northern Virginia hotel room before they were arrested early last year. He said Sandridge was dealing crack and was the target of an investigation by Virginia State Police.

His daughter "lived in a hotel room where the guy was selling [crack], and she admitted that," Morrow said.

Both cases were later transferred to the federal court system. The daughter's case is sealed, so the court records are not available to the public. Her father said she was sentenced to serve six years in prison.

Records show Sandridge, now 23, was sentenced to serve 15 years in prison after pleading guilty to drug conspiracy and illegal firearm possession. He is in the U.S. penitentiary at Canaan, Pa.

James Morrow said his daughter told him that on July 22, the day of the sexual encounter, Harden picked her up and then stopped by the DEA office before driving her to the motel. Court records show it was the Knights Inn at 9002 Brook Road.

While Harden maintains the sex was consensual, the young woman has testified that she went through with it out of fear. Prosecutors say the government evidence could prove that the sex was meant to be payment for Harden keeping her out of prison.

The young woman "was convinced that she wasn't going to prison," her father said.

He said she was convinced of it right up to the October day when U.S. marshals arrived to take her into custody. She complained about Harden to the marshals and an investigation ensued.

He denied that he had sex with her. Records show that later Harden on five dates in October and November attempted to impede the investigation by interviewing employees at the motel about receipts, surveillance cameras and whether anyone remembered him staying there.

On Oct. 26, the records say, Harden "endeavored to persuade the desk clerk to withhold information from federal investigators."

John L. Brownlee, U.S. attorney for the Western District of Virginia, said last week that Harden was not charged with additional crimes because his guilty plea "encompasses all the facts" of what he did. It means Harden, a 14-year veteran of the DEA, can never be a federal agent again.

Richmond is in the Eastern District, but to avoid conflict because Harden has worked with prosecutors here, Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas J. Bondurant Jr. of Brownlee's office is prosecuting.

Morrow said he and his wife are caring for their daughter's child. His daughter recently turned 19 in a federal prison, he said.

According to a U.S. Bureau of Prisons Web site, she has a projected release date of August 2010.

Her father said her sentence may yet be reduced because of her cooperation with federal agents.

"My daughter's an angel," James Morrow said. "I definitely think [she]'s got something coming from all this."

Grover Beach Extends Ban On Medical Marijuana Shops (SLOT)

By Larissa Van Beurden-doust

DOJ_NMG_0025599

San Luis Obispo Tribune, April 4, 2006

Grover Beach has extended its moratorium on medical marijuana dispensaries and has taken steps to make the ban permanent.

The council voted 5-0 Monday to extend the 180-day moratorium that would have expired April 19. Without the extension, there would have a period before a permanent ban was in place that would have allowed such dispensaries to be established within the city.

The council voted 4-1 to make the ban permanent. The soonest it could become affective is 30 days after a second vote on April 20.

Mayor Larry Versaw dissented. While he said he's strongly opposed to recreationally using marijuana or any drugs and thinks a dispensary could be extremely problematic, he didn't want to give the message that the city has forever closed the door on using marijuana medicinally.

"My mother died of cancer," Versaw said while trying to hold back tears. "I do believe that in her case and a lot of cases like hers, that marijuana could serve a purpose. If not curative, at least it would have eased her suffering."

News Briefs From California's Central Coast (AP)

By AP

The San Diego Union-Tribune, April 4, 2006

BUELLTON – The City Council will decide this month on a yearlong moratorium on new medical marijuana dispensaries.

During that year, City Manager Steve Thompson said, city officials would decide whether a permanent ban is needed. The city recently enacted a 45-day moratorium on new marijuana dispensaries.

"This is wait-and-see game," Thompson said. "This is an attempt to see what the federal and state governments are going to do with regard to conflicts between their laws."

In 1996, California voters approved medical marijuana use, but the federal government classifies marijuana, along with heroin and PCP, as an extremely dangerous substance with no medicinal value.

The U.S. Supreme Court ruled last June that federal law trumps state law when it comes to enforcement.

There are two pot dispensaries in Buellton, including Hezekiah Inc. owned by Steve Allbritton. He has met with city officials and they are trying to work out a solution.

If the City Council decides to ban dispensaries permanently after studying zoning and health issues, "they would have to go," Councilman Dale Molesworth said.

"This is not the kind of thing you want spread all over the countryside,' Molesworth added.

"If they want to shut us down, it would be pretty sad. A lot of people need this service. We're the only place to go for many of our customers," Allbritton said.

Officials Say They've Cracked Major Utica Drug Ring (UTOD)

Utica (NY) Observer-Dispatch, April 5, 2006

UTICA -- Local, state and federal law enforcement have charged 13 people as the result of an investigation into a major cocaine and crack cocaine distribution ring that officials claim trafficked drugs throughout the Mohawk Valley.

In a news release, U.S. Attorney Glenn T. Suddaby said today police recovered several ounces of cocaine and crack cocaine, as well as three pistols and ammunition, more than $80,000 in cash, drug paraphernalia, a large quantity of gang photos and eight cellular phones.

The 13 people arrested were each charged with conspiracy to possess cocaine and crack cocaine with intent to distribute, Suddaby said:

-- Raymond Garrett, 35, of 901 South St.
-- Durrell Liggins, 27, of 160 Grove Place.
-- Ty Albrecht, 26, an inmate in the Oneida County jail.
-- Gregory Lee Jr., 26, of 1500 Conkling Ave.
-- Roger Patterson, 18, of 8 Shaw St.
-- Ali Shabazz, 19, of 1600 Howard Ave.
-- Jacques Yates, 26, of 518 Mandeville St.
-- Richard Gilmore, 22, an inmate in the Wyoming Correctional Facility.
-- Ann Marie Spina, 30, of 1500 Conkling Ave.
-- Haikham Phimasone, 28, of 1636 Elm St.

DOJ_NMG_0025600

-- Terence Hines, 29, of 1527 Elm St.
-- Juan Breton, 31, of 102 Expense St.
-- John Spratt, 37, of 1420 West St.

If convicted, Suddaby said, each would be sentenced to a minimum of 10 years to life in prison.

The investigation included officers from the Oneida County Drug Task Force, which encompasses the Utica, Rome and New Hartford police departments, as well as the Oneida County Sheriff's Office, state police and the FBI. Assisting in the investigation were the U.S. Marshals Service, the federal Drug Enforcement Administration, federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement and the state Office of Parole.

Selig Defends Choice Of Mitchell (AP)

CHICAGO (AP) -- Commissioner Bud Selig defended his choice of George Mitchell to head baseball's steroid investigation, saying the former Senate Majority Leader has independence.

Selig brushed off criticism that Mitchell is too much of an insider for the job -- Mitchell is a director of the Boston Red Sox and chairman of The Walt Disney Co., a national broadcaster of baseball and the network airing Barry Bonds' new reality show.

"It's important for somebody who understands what I call the mores of culture of this sport as well as he does. That helps in the investigation. That doesn't hurt it," Selig said Tuesday after helping hand out World Series rings to the Chicago White Sox.

"He has complete autonomy. He wouldn't have taken this without complete autonomy. I mean the fact that we're friends had nothing to do with it. ... He doesn't come back and talk to me. I don't want to hear from him. And he can do whatever he wants with whomever he wants. So I don't know how anybody could have more independence than Sen. Mitchell."

The investigation is already under way and has no time limit. It was launched after a book detailing allegations that Bonds, who is approaching the Hank Aaron's career home run record, used performance-enhancing drugs for five years starting in 1998. The probe will be limited to events since September 2002, when baseball banned steroids, but Mitchell can expand the investigation if he feels it is necessary.

"What I said to Sen. Mitchell was that, `Look, we've done now everything we can do.' We have the toughest program in American sports. We've banned amphetamines, which I think a lot of people don't understand the significance of that," Selig said.

"And while the book triggered, as I said last week, some of this because of the specificity of things, I think it's fair -- and I've thought a lot about it since -- that we've taken care of the present, we've taken care of the future and now I think it's important to look at the past," he added. "We'll see what happens. ... There's no sense in me speculating."

Selig emphasized that Mitchell was not looking into just Bonds. He's looking at the entire game.

"For anybody who thinks this is just a singular investigation is just wrong," Selig said. "It's incorrect. I don't know how much clearer I can be."

Selig was saddened by the fans' response to Bonds in San Diego on Monday night, when a syringe was tossed in the direction of the Giants' left fielder.

"I guess none of this is unexpected. I'm saddened by it in the sense that opening day was such a good, positive day," Selig said. "Every game was sold out. It was really a great baseball day. But controversy will spawn with that type of activity, whether I like it or not."

Bonds began the season with 708 homers and trails only Babe Ruth (714) and Hank Aaron (755) on the career list. Selig said baseball currently has not made plans for a celebration should Bonds move past Ruth's mark but could do so in coming weeks.

Bonds TV Show Debuts With Talk Of Steroids (AP)

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) -- Barry Bonds' new television show didn't shy away from the steroid allegations.

"Bonds on Bonds" debuted Tuesday night on ESPN2, opening with footage of fans booing, a syringe being thrown at the San Francisco Giants' slugger and announcers discussing the steroid allegations on opening day in San Diego.

"If it makes them happy to go out of their way to destroy me or whatever they want to try to do, go right ahead. It doesn't bother me," Bonds said. "You can't hurt me anymore than you've already hurt me. You can't hurt my family anymore than you've already hurt them."

Bonds then went on, tearing up at one point.

"They can take me down. I don't really care," he said. "I never cared. Baseball, if they want to take me down, go right ahead take it. Anyone who ever knows me knows ... I don't care. But there's so many other people who depend on me to stay strong."

Bonds, who has faced questions about steroid use for years, is under new pressure this year following last month's release of the book "Game of Shadows," which detailed allegations that he used steroids for at least five seasons.

The book contributed to commissioner Bud Selig's decision last week to announce an investigation into past steroid use in the game.

While the show aired on ESPN2, Bonds was on a couch in the Giants' clubhouse in San Diego, while three other baseball games and the NCAA women's basketball championship were on the TVs. Bonds said he thought the show was on later at night and said he'd watch the DVD when he got a chance.

Giants manager Felipe Alou flipped through the channels in his office while talking to reporters before the game, stumbling across women in a hot tub on MTV2 before putting the show on for a few minutes.

"I don't see Barry there," Alou said when he saw the hot tub. "What is that? It's pretty good."

Bonds joked about killing somebody because of all he's been through, was amazed at the number of reporters following him after excerpts from "Game of Shadows" were released, and compared the racist hate mail he receives to what Hank Aaron went through when he broke Babe Ruth's career home run record in 1974.

He also discussed his relationship with his father, three-time All-Star Bobby Bonds and his drinking habits. He said he has always measured himself against his father and godfather, Willie Mays.

Bonds entered the season with 708 home runs, seven shy of passing Ruth for second place all-time and 48 away from breaking Aaron's career record.

He said he's already surpassed the "heights" of Ruth and Aaron and said his focus is not on the record. He talked about how he wished he could leave the game but that it would let down his parents, his teammates and the fans -- he estimated half -- that root for him.

The show, put together by Tollin/Roberts Productions and ESPN Original Entertainment, has received criticism from people within and outside ESPN for its relationship with a player the network covers.

It featured interviews with reporters who have covered Bonds, including ESPN's Peter Gammons. Bonds talked about how his relationship with the media has always been "rocky" -- but that it motivates him.

There was also footage of Bonds' interaction with the media, archival video of Bonds dating to his college days at Arizona State, interviews with other players and his former manager, Dusty Baker.

The show also showed Bonds away from the ballpark, cleaning up the mess from a broken pipe from his fish tank in Arizona, often cursing and reading an article about the 10 most hated athletes in sports.

Bonds questioned that he only finished second on the list, behind NFL bad boy Terrell Owens.

"How did he get in front of me?" Bonds asked.

AP Sports Writer Bernie Wilson contributed to this report from San Diego.

Alleged Plot To Bomb County Courthouse Uncovered (MINNST)

By Robert Franklin and Randy Furst

Minneapolis Star Tribune, April 5, 2006

A Kenyon, Minn., man is accused of assembling explosives to destroy the county courthouse and 'take out' judges and lawyers.

FARIBAULT, MINN. - A plot to blow up the Rice County Courthouse and law enforcement center and perhaps kill several public officials has been uncovered, authorities said Monday.

Law enforcement officials said they recovered two propane tanks, the type used with outdoor grills, that appeared to be filled with explosives made of diesel oil and fertilizer -- similar to those used to blow up the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building in Oklahoma City 11 years ago.

Each of the 62-pound devices "probably could kill everybody here," Rice County Sheriff Richard Cook said Monday at a news conference.

No timetable for the plot was discovered, Cook said, but "we believe there was some urgency."

Allan Weatherford, 44, who lives on a farm near Kenyon, Minn., is being held in lieu of $1 million bail after being charged with seven counts of attempted arson, possession of explosives and being a felon in possession of firearms.

His brother Mark, 34, was jailed last month on an unrelated charge of reckless discharge of a firearm.

Authorities monitored phone calls between Allan Weatherford and his brother in jail, the complaint said. "It's bad out here" and "that's going to start a war," the criminal complaint quotes Allan Weatherford as saying.

Weatherford's attorney, David Ludescher, of Northfield, who was at Monday's court appearance, said Allan Weatherford had been in chemical dependency treatment in recent weeks. He is appealing a 2004 conviction for fifth-degree possession of a controlled substance and misdemeanor theft and was found not guilty of a more serious drug charge, the attorney said.

Mom got nothing in land deal

Court papers, law officers and neighbors portrayed the Weatherfords as unemployed gun enthusiasts and collectors of junk cars who depleted the estate of their mentally-incapacitated mother of hundreds of thousands of dollars. A conservator last week told a court that Lucile Weatherford, 73, got nothing three years ago when she deeded 80 acres worth at least $276,000 to her sons.

Allan Weatherford was angry because, as part of the conservatorship battle, he was being forced to move to a mobile home on the far edge of the family farm, said Scott Robinson, a Rice County sheriff's deputy who investigated the explosives case.

Robinson was named as a likely target of Allan Weatherford's wrath, along with Rice County District Judge Bernard Borene and Nathan Crowe, an assistant county attorney. All had been involved in Weatherford's 2004 drug case.

Weatherford's arrest "helps you sleep better," Crowe said, although Weatherford "was threatening basically everybody in law enforcement, everybody in the courts."

Threats against judges and prosecutors are rarely carried out. But they have been harmed on occasion: The homes of two judges were bombed in Austin and Blooming Prairie, Minn., in the 1980s; a Chicago judge's husband and mother were shot to death last year; a judge was wounded in 1992 in his courtroom in Grand Forks, N.D.; a district attorney's house was firebombed in 2001 in Superior, Wis., and an estate conservator was shot to death in 2003 in the Hennepin County Government Center.

The Rice County investigation, which began as a drug probe, involved raids and arrests in Rice, Goodhue and Dodge counties in the past two weeks by several law enforcement agencies.

A criminal complaint quoted unnamed "cooperating citizens" as saying they had seen Weatherford make a fertilizer and diesel-oil bomb out of a propane cylinder and had heard him say he wanted to blow up the courthouse to "take out" attorneys and judges. Faribault city maintenance facilities also were a likely target, the complaint said.

Allan Weatherford had worked at a fertilizer plant three years ago, the complaint said.

Steve Lurken, who rents the Weatherford family farmland, totaling about 160 acres, said the brothers lived in a machine shed on the half of the farm their mother retained.

Luverne Johnson, a neighbor, said the Weatherford sons "would stand and shoot for hours."

A sister of the Weatherfords came and got the men's widowed mother and took her home to Utah, he said.

Court papers said Lucile Weatherford suffered from Alzheimer's disease and had no idea that she had transferred land to her sons.

Mark Weatherford was removed as her co-conservator and the sister, Tammy Carter, was temporarily removed in November by Judge Gerald Wolf after the court was told that the estate's liquid assets were being depleted and no inventory was filed.

During a two-year conservatorship, the assets may have been used to support Allan Weatherford, and the other two children couldn't work together to manage the financial affairs, according to Jennifer Mittelstaedt, the original petitioner for the conservatorship.

The investigation was conducted by the South Central Drug Investigation Unit, FBI, U.S. Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco and Firearms, State Patrol, Department of Natural Resources, Faribault and Northfield police departments and Bloomington police bomb squad.

IMMIGRATION:

GOP Split Over Immigration Provisions (AP-Y2)

By David Espo

AP2, April 5, 2006

The Senate skirmished inconclusively over immigration legislation Tuesday, with Republicans deeply divided over provisions relating to millions of illegal immigrants and Democrats maneuvering to avoid politically difficult votes on border security.

DOJ_NMG_0025603

"I don't know that we're going to get a bill," Sen. Mike DeWine (news, bio, voting record), R-Ohio, said at the end of a full week of debate. "It's tough."

In a written statement issued late in the day, the Bush administration renewed its call for legislation that includes a temporary worker program to go "hand in hand with efforts to secure the border."

The carefully worded statement said the administration wants a bill that "does not create an automatic path to permanent residency or citizenship," but it did not elaborate. Nor did it address one of the issues dividing Senate Republicans — under what conditions, if any, the estimated 11 million immigrants in the United States should be permitted to seek citizenship, and whether they should be required to return to their native country first.

"We have to resolve some differences," said Sen. Chuck Hagel (news, bio, voting record) of Nebraska, one of the GOP lawmakers involved in a series of closed-door negotiating sessions designed to achieve a Republican consensus.

Under one approach, illegal immigrants would be divided between those who have been in the country more than five years and those here a shorter time.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist floated a proposal Monday night to require illegal immigrants in the United States less than five years to travel to a U.S. border entry point if they wished to gain legal status. But neither they nor the longer-term undocumented immigrants would be compelled to go to their native countries.

Several rank-and-file Republicans objected, and Frist and fellow Republicans spent much of the day trying to find an alternative.

For their part, Democrats made a show of support for legislation that emerged from the Judiciary Committee more than a week ago. It provides for tightened border security, an increase in the number of temporary workers allowed in the country, and allowing illegal immigrants to apply for citizenship after they meet several conditions, including the payment of fines and any back taxes and passing a background check.

Sen. Harry Reid (news, bio, voting record) of Nevada, the Democratic leader, blocked numerous attempts by Republicans during the day to hold votes on selected amendments. "We do not need a compromise. It's in our bill," he told reporters. He set the stage for a test vote on Thursday, but supporters will need 60 votes to prevail.

Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois, the second-ranking Democrat, said the leadership was "trying to preserve a strong bipartisan bill" and didn't want to have it watered down before any later compromise talks with the House.

Republicans loudly accused Reid of attempting to hijack the proceedings by refusing to allow votes, and privately, some Democrats acknowledged they did not want to expose their rank and file to difficult choices.

The only vote of the day did little to clarify the likely outcome, coming on a proposal by Sens. Jon Kyl of Arizona and John Cornyn of Texas to deny legal permanent residency to immigrants convicted of certain crimes or believed to pose a danger to U.S. security.

Sen. Arlen Specter (news, bio, voting record), R-Pa., engineered a vote to scuttle the proposal, but said he would oppose the effort to do so. In the end, the vote was 99-0.

The amendment remained alive, Democrats avoided a direct yes-or-no vote, and Republicans resumed efforts to unite on a compromise covering the legal fate of illegal immigrants.

Lawmakers Urge Bush To Do More On Immigrant Bill (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- With the Senate at an impasse, President Bush faces growing pressure to intercede more aggressively if he is to salvage a landmark immigration bill and move it into negotiations with the House.

"He's got to get more involved. I'm not sure where we're going, if we're going at all," said Sen. Mike DeWine (R., Ohio). Hoping to force the president's hand, Democrats broke custom and jumped ahead of the Republican leadership last night by filing a petition to force a vote tomorrow on cutting off debate.

"It is as muddled a situation as you can find," said Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R., Pa.), who brought the measure out from his panel last week with high hopes. And even as Republicans struggled to bridge their differences, the party leadership appears to be operating without a formal whip count on whether it can expect the 60 votes needed to invoke cloture.

Senate Minority Whip Richard Durbin (D., Ill.) predicted Democrats can deliver close to 40 votes themselves. And by forcing the roll call now, Mr. Durbin hopes to pressure Mr. Bush to come out more directly, embrace Senate passage and use the talks with the House to make any changes he wants.

"I tell you what would help, is if we had the support of the White House," Mr. Durbin said. "If the president would pick up the phone and call the Republican senators and tell them, I'm ready to support this bill, I want you to support this bill."

Mindful of the turmoil, the administration released a four-page policy statement saying it "strongly supports Senate passage of comprehensive immigration reform," and not just a narrow border-security bill such as was passed by the House and is favored by many conservatives.

There were signals from the White House that Mr. Bush may speak out on the issue today. White House officials say the president has reservations about how far the Judiciary Committee bill goes toward legalizing the status of millions of undocumented immigrant workers already in the U.S. and putting them on a path toward citizenship. The statement of policy is carefully parsed to give the president some flexibility on this issue. (See related article.)

The Senate Republican leadership dismissed the Democratic cloture motion as "premature and immature." Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.) has predicted that without more compromise, cloture will fall short of the 60 votes needed.

"My caucus is a little diffused right now," said Sen. Mel Martinez (R., Fla.), who supports the Judiciary bill but is working toward some compromise on the treatment of undocumented workers. Mr. Frist's office was heartened that Sen. John McCain (R., Ariz.), a chief sponsor of the immigration bill, was open to some changes, but the very complexity of the legislation demands more time than is available this week.

"The measure of this is, will people come forward?" said Angela Kelley, deputy director of the National Immigration Forum, which supports the bill. "I am nervous at some of the changes I have heard discussed, and the committee bill and conference is our best shot."

The floor debate came as a $106.5 billion bill funding continued military operations overseas and hurricane relief for the Gulf Coast cleared the Senate Appropriations Committee after a flurry of amendments that added to its costs. The speed of the action cast some doubt on how realistic the spending is, but the final tally is more than $14 billion above Mr. Bush's $92.22 billion request.

Among the add-ons were a nearly $4 billion farm disaster-aid package, $2.3 billion to help the nation prepare for the threat of avian flu, and nearly $1.2 billion to aid the Gulf Coast seafood industry and pay for the mapping and removal of debris in the Gulf of Mexico.

The bill is expected to come to the Senate floor after the two-week spring recess that begins this weekend.

Deal On Immigration Elusive (RC)

By John Stanton

Roll Call, April 5, 2006

A Senate agreement on overhauling the nation's immigration laws remained elusive Tuesday, despite efforts by Republican leaders to broker a compromise between conservatives who insist that illegal immigrants return home and moderates who support a Judiciary Committee bill that allows some 12 million illegal workers to remain in the United States.

Late in the day Tuesday, aides to lawmakers involved in the internal GOP negotiations said that a series of four compromises offered to the Republican Conference by Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) had done little to bring the internal fight to an end.

Those proposals are based on a partial amnesty under which employed illegal immigrants who have been in the U.S. for a set period of time would be allowed to stay and seek formal worker status. All other illegal immigrants would be required to return either to their home country or to some other "point of entry" to seek temporary worker papers.

Frist has said he wants to hold a final vote on the bill by week's end, and aides said they remain hopeful that the proposals floated to Republicans on Tuesday will spur a move to finish the bill.

However, a leadership aide said that while it is "too early to tell" whether the talks will result in a compromise, GOP lawmakers have all but abandoned the committee's plan to grant guest worker status to all 12 million illegal workers. This aide noted that Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) — the author, along with Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.), of the Judiciary-approved language — had initially rejected a partial guest worker provision Monday evening, but had since "come to the table" during the Conference's morning meeting.

However, aides involved in the discussion said that both the full "guest worker" program included in the committee bill and any language based on the proposed compromises floated by Frist remained far short of the 60 votes required to break a filibuster by conservatives.

A GOP aide added that Kennedy has signaled that he will oppose a partial amnesty plan. So as long as conservatives maintain that any form of amnesty is unacceptable, the likelihood of Frist being able to cobble together a coalition of 60 Republicans and Democrats remains unclear.

In addition, McCain and Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio) said they are still unsure whether they can back a compromise. They also said that questions about any such deal's mechanics remain unanswered.

"I'm not really sure what it does," DeWine told reporters prior to his party's weekly luncheon.

McCain echoed those sentiments, though he cautioned that this week may represent the Senate's best chance of addressing immigration reform this year.

"You know the attention span of the Senate," McCain said. "If we take up something and concentrate on it we get it done. If we can't concentrate on it [and take time off] things grind to a halt."

House leaders, meanwhile, remained ambivalent toward any guest worker proposal. The House earlier this year passed a measure that includes no guest worker provisions. Asked Tuesday whether the chamber would agree to a bill that did include guest worker language, House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) said, "When the Senate passes a bill and we go to conference we'll deal with it. Until then it's a lot of, 'Yah, yah, yah.'"

A statement of administration position released by the Bush White House early Tuesday evening was silent on how to address the guest worker impasse. The document was vague on the kind of program the White House would find acceptable, saying that the president would support a "temporary worker" program but not a "amnesty" program.

Nevertheless, Republicans hailed the White House statement as a potential breakthrough. In a statement, Frist said he hoped it would pave the way for a final agreement.

"Finally, a consensus on immigration can emerge here in the Senate, and the president's SAP today demonstrates that," Frist said. "Together, we agree our borders must be secure first, to make America safer. Together, we agree."

Immigration Measure Stalls In The Senate (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON, April 4 — Senate Republicans who support legislation that would legalize the nation's 11 million illegal immigrants said Tuesday that they lacked enough support to bring the measure to a vote this week and were working on a more limited compromise that would rally a broader cross-section of Republicans.

But Democrats, angered by what they viewed as Republican efforts to gut the legislation, responded by using a parliamentary tactic to force lawmakers to decide Thursday whether the bill should be considered for a vote on the Senate floor.

"What we're trying to do is preserve a strong, bipartisan bill," said Senator Richard J. Durbin, Democrat of Illinois. "Are the Republicans going to stand up and vote for comprehensive immigration reform? Or are they not?"

Eric Ueland, chief of staff for Bill Frist, the Senate majority leader, assailed the Democrats' move as "a serious blow to efforts to find common ground," and said Republicans would continue their negotiations on a possible compromise.

"The minority will be held accountable," Mr. Ueland said.

Mr. Frist has imposed a deadline of the end of this week for a vote on immigration legislation. With the growing prospect of a deadlock on a comprehensive bill, Republicans and Democrats started pointing fingers and warning that the opposing party would be to blame if efforts at passing a bill were to collapse.

Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, the Republican chairman of the Judiciary Committee, warned that the Democratic maneuver might result in the demise of his bill, which called for the legalization of the nation's immigrants. He said that "both sides are going to be losers" if a bipartisan compromise did not emerge.

"It's getting very late in the week to salvage the bill," Mr. Specter said. "It's a power struggle now. It's a struggle of wills."

The Republican compromise centered on a proposal that would eventually grant citizenship to illegal immigrants who had already lived in this country for five years or more, provided that they remained employed, paid fines and back taxes and learned English, among other things, said a Senate aide familiar with the compromise.

Illegal immigrants who have lived here for less time would have to report to an American port of entry, such as an airport or land port, where they would be classified as temporary workers and allowed to work for up to six years before returning home or applying for permanent residency, which could ultimately lead to citizenship.

The proposal was intended to bridge the sharp divide between those Republicans who argue that illegal immigrants should return home and those who believe that they should be put on a path to citizenship.

Republicans, who huddled in a flurry of meetings to work through the details, said they hoped that such a compromise would result in some consensus in their party so a vote on immigration legislation could be held this week.

Last week, the Senate Judiciary Committee voted in favor of legislation that would legalize nearly all of the nation's illegal immigrants. But the supporters of that bill, including Mr. Specter and Senators John McCain of Arizona and Mel Martinez of Florida, both Republicans, said Tuesday that they did not have enough support to bring the committee's legislation to the floor for a vote.

"We're going to have to find a place where we can all land," said Mr. Martinez, one of the principal architects of the compromise. "What we're all trying to find is something that is common ground enough to get the majority of Republicans on board."

Mr. Martinez said that his first allegiance remained with the legislation produced by the Judiciary Committee but that he feared it lacked adequate Republican support. "I'm trying to find a fallback," he said.

That effort was swiftly attacked by Democrats, who said that it would weaken the committee's bill, which has the backing of most Democrats. And they worked to block any Republican amendments to the immigration bill in an effort to force a decision on whether to bring the committee bill to a vote on the Senate floor.

Senator Harry Reid, the minority leader and a Democrat from Nevada, said there was no need for a compromise.

"We have a bill that's bipartisan," said Mr. Reid, referring to the Judiciary Committee's legislation. "It covers strong borders, a guest worker program and a path to legalization for the people about whom you just spoke. We don't need a compromise."

The White House also entered the debate on Tuesday, issuing a statement of administration policy that praised the Senate Judiciary Committee for including a temporary worker program in its legislation.

But the Bush administration warned that the final bill should not "create an automatic path to permanent residency or citizenship."

Republicans said they would be working into the night to build a compromise on the question of illegal immigrants that might attract more Republican support without alienating conservatives opposed to amnesty.

Mr. Ueland said he was hopeful that a bill would be passed this week. But he and others acknowledged that time was short.

Mr. Martinez said, "We're still looking to find a magic formula."

Senate Moves Closer To Vote On Immigration (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds And Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — With Republicans still deeply divided, Senate Democrats moved Tuesday to force a showdown over immigration reform, filing a motion to end debate and vote on a bill that provides the option of citizenship to guest workers and illegal immigrants already in the United States.

The move means the Senate will have to vote Thursday on whether to end debate. That in turn could force action on final passage three days later for the bill now on the Senate floor, which has White House support but does not command a majority among Republicans in either chamber of Congress.

"We've got to move this to a showdown vote," said Sen. Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the Senate's second-ranking Democratic leader. "The members on the other side of the aisle will have to make a choice. I think the momentum is with us."

In essence, Democrats — who generally favor less restrictive treatment of illegal immigrants than many Republicans do — sought to take advantage of GOP divisions by forcing a vote on the relatively moderate approach now on the Senate floor before the Republican majority could hammer out an agreement on a more severe measure.

Republicans, who failed again Tuesday to bridge their differences on the immigration proposals, reacted angrily to the Democratic maneuvering.

"This was premature and immature given the velocity of the debate," said Eric Ueland, chief of staff to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.). Frist has said he wants to complete legislation by Friday, and failure to reach that goal would be a blow to his image as an effective leader at a time when he is preparing to run for president.

Although many Republicans have not made up their minds, fewer than half are believed to support the current bill, which was passed by the Judiciary Committee last week with some Republican support.

Earlier in the day, Democrats had used parliamentary procedures to block debate on an amendment that could make some or all visitors who overstay their visas ineligible for legalization or citizenship.

"We're going to work hard to make sure that the bill is not damaged before leaving the floor," said Minority Leader Sen. Harry Reid (D-Nev.). "But if there's any effort to denigrate this bipartisan bill, then we won't have votes on those amendments."

"I'm very frustrated now," Frist said on the Senate floor. "It's very apparent now that the other side is trying to block a bill."

Durbin said all but a handful of the Senate's 44 Democrats and one independent supported the bill as currently drafted. In the Senate, 60 votes are needed to ensure passage and override a possible filibuster by opponents.

"If they can produce 20-plus votes, we can get a bill this week," Durbin said of the Republicans.

Even before Democrats filed the motion to end debate, Republicans accused them of being obstructionist and trying to scuttle the bill by blocking debate over amendments. And the atmosphere on and off the Senate floor grew more and more heated during the day, as Republicans realized Democrats were digging in their heels.

"I feel like there are those who are trying to jam this version of the bill down our throats … trying to deny those of us who have different ideas from presenting those ideas," said Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas), who opposes any citizenship provision for workers currently in the United States illegally.

DOJ_NMG_0025607

Democrats were unapologetic, with Reid noting pointedly that Republicans had repeatedly barred the minority from offering amendments on other legislation.

"As my mother would say, they're getting a taste of their own medicine," Reid said.

Members and staff were meeting into the evening in an effort to agree on a compromise that might permit votes on less controversial amendments.

Republicans were also debating whether to file a countermotion to the Democrats that would force a vote on a competing bill — currently on the sidelines — that would enhance border security but does not include a guest-worker program or legalization.

Both sides said it was too soon to predict the demise of the immigration reform effort.

"We have time on our side. As we get closer to recess, cooler heads will prevail," said Sen. Ken Salazar (D-Colo.).

Despite holding a string of meetings in recent days, Republicans have reported little progress toward bridging their differences, however. Senators said discussion at the weekly Republican strategy lunch was lively, loud, and in the end, inconclusive.

"We're 100 senators and I think if you polled us you would find 100 different ways of dealing with illegals," said Sen. John Ensign (R-Nev.).

"We're still looking for the magic formula," said Sen. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.).

The question of giving citizenship to the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants in the United States has become the major stumbling block for some senators, especially conservative Republicans, who argue that it is an "amnesty" that undermines respect for the law and will encourage more immigrants to cross the border illegally.

The bill currently under debate would boost enforcement, create a guest-worker program with a path to legal status and offer the possibility of citizenship to illegal immigrants who meet certain requirements, including learning English and paying back taxes.

The bill would also limit the opportunity for citizenship to illegal immigrants in the country on or before Jan. 7, 2004, and they would only be processed after legal immigrants who have already applied.

Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), chairman of the Judiciary Committee, did not express optimism that Republicans could overcome their differences quickly enough to meet the Friday deadline.

"We have retrogressed," he said.

Senators said White House officials continued to be deeply involved in discussions. President Bush has urged Congress to pass a guest-worker program, but has said that he would not favor a program that allowed illegal immigrants to gain citizenship before those already in line for legal permanent resident status.

McCain Lacks Votes For Guest-Worker Plan (AP-Y2)

By Suzanne Gamboa

AP2, April 4, 2006

Supporters of a guest worker program that would let illegal immigrants stay in the United States said Tuesday they don't have enough Senate votes to overcome objections from conservatives who oppose the measure on grounds it amounts to amnesty.

As negotiators worked on a compromise to let those who have been here longest remain, Sen. John McCain (news, bio, voting record), R-Ariz., said a majority in the 100-member Senate support his and Massachusetts Democratic Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (news, bio, voting record)'s proposal to provide green cards to illegal immigrants after they've worked in the U.S. for six years.

But it takes 60 senators to overcome opponents' parliamentary tactics, and McCain said he doesn't have that many.

More than 11 million illegal immigrants are believed to be in the U.S., and Sen. Mel Martinez, R-Fla., said he and Sen. Chuck Hagel (news, bio, voting record), R-Neb., are pushing a "fallback" plan that would put those who have been here the longest on a track toward citizenship but treat more recent arrivals differently. A similar approach was rejected by the Senate Judiciary Committee last week but it was revived Monday night during a meeting in Majority Leader Bill Frist's office.

About 30 Republican senators huddled for more than an hour Tuesday but no consensus emerged. President Bush has championed a program that would give illegal immigrants a legal status to work in the U.S. but has not specified whether they should have to leave the country at some point.

McCain and Kennedy deny that their proposal is amnesty, saying illegal immigrants would have to pay $2,000 in fines and any back taxes and clear background checks before they could get in line for a green card.

The proposal, dubbed the "roots concept, by Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., seemed to have some support from Frist. He told CNN over the weekend that 40 percent of illegal immigrants have been in the country less than five years and "need to be dealt with in a different fashion."

The Senate is in its second week of debate on immigration-broder security legislation and there is pressure to complete a bill before Congress recesses on Friday for a two-week holiday.

A bill approved by the Senate Judiciary Committee — based on a proposal by McCain and Kennedy — would allow illegal immigrants in the United States before Jan. 7, 2004, and who have jobs, to work legally for an additional six years and eventually become citizens.

Both Frist and McCain are considered likely candidates for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination.

A separate bill filed by Frist does not deal with illegal immigrants, but boosts border enforcement and cracks down on employers who hire illegal workers. The House in December passed a bill that would make being in the country illegally a felony.

Opponents consider the Judiciary Committee bill amnesty. Sens. John Cornyn, R-Texas, and Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., would give illegal immigrants up to five years to leave the country, before they can return legally to apply for permanent residence or be guest workers.

Cornyn was not at the meeting at Frist's office, but his spokesman Don Stewart was skeptical of the suggested compromise.

"It's a matter of giving amnesty to 8 million people or giving amnesty to 12 million people. It's still amnesty to millions of people," Stewart said.

A Split On The Lines Of Illegal Immigration (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

Disagreements over how to deal with illegal immigration are splitting the Republican Party as few issues have lately, dividing state congressional delegations down the middle and bringing the Senate to a virtual standstill yesterday.

Epitomizing the divisions are Arizona's GOP senators, Jon Kyl and John McCain. Both face important elections and represent the same 5.8 million people. But they are leading the two main opposing approaches that Republican senators will have to reconcile if Congress is to address border security, illegal worker status, deportation practices and other issues.

McCain, hoping to gain the 2008 presidential nomination, is the chief sponsor of legislation that would give millions of illegal immigrants a path toward citizenship if they pay fines and back taxes, learn English, stay employed and do not break laws. Kyl, facing a potentially strong Democratic challenger this fall in his bid for a third term, is a key proponent of a guest-worker program that would require undocumented workers to return to their countries when their visas expire, a move that critics call unrealistic. Both bills would pour billions of dollars into greater border enforcement.

The House has approved an enforcement-only bill, but the immigration debate has deeply divided the Senate, especially its 55 Republicans. Party leaders unsuccessfully sought a compromise in several closed meetings yesterday.

"I'm very frustrated," Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) announced on the Senate floor. He accused Democrats of obstructionism, but Democrats shrugged off the charge. The Republican-controlled Judiciary Committee sent a bill to the floor that a majority of Republicans apparently will not embrace, they noted, because of the disagreements personified by Kyl and McCain.

McCain supports the committee-approved bill, but acknowledges that Congress's divisions over immigration reflect those of the public. "I live in a state where it's the number-one issue," he said yesterday. "I know that Americans are of different minds on this, including my state. But that doesn't mean the United States Senate shouldn't act."

Kyl spent much of the day on the Senate floor, trying to amend the committee bill to add tougher sanctions against some illegal immigrants, such as those with criminal records. Aides said he did not have time for interviews.

Experts on Arizona politics say the immigration issue generates enough crosscurrents to provide ample justification for both senators' views. On one hand, Arizonans have been alarmed by the influx of impoverished Mexicans pouring into the state following tougher enforcement on the Texas and California borders in recent years, said Rodolfo Espino, a political scientist at Arizona State University. But the state's booming construction and tourism industries crave the low-wage workers, he said, and the steadily growing number of legal immigrants are wary of actions they view as punitive to fellow Latinos.

"It's a pretty conservative electorate that Kyl is facing" this fall, Espino said, and his emphasis on tighter borders and sanctions against those who crossed illegally will probably serve him well. Kyl is largely in line with Democratic Gov. Janet Napolitano, who declared a state of emergency along Arizona's Mexican border last August, Espino said, so the strategy may limit Democratic challenger Jim Pederson's room to maneuver on immigration.

"It was very surprising to see 20,000 people in the streets of Phoenix," Espino said, referring to the recent mass protest against the Kyl-backed legislation. "But in the short run, it's not going to scare any local politicians here." The prospect of a large pool of Latino citizens, eligible to vote, "is just too far off in the future for anyone to be concerned."

McCain, meanwhile, is virtually a legend in Arizona politics and has long thrived on bucking orthodox Republican positions on key issues, Espino said. Even if more Arizonans side with Kyl on immigration questions, he said, "this would not be enough to cause McCain trouble. He does enough other maverick things that endear him to the hearts and minds of Arizona voters."

The Kyl-McCain split also applies to Arizona's Republican-dominated House delegation. GOP Reps. Jim Kolbe and Jeff Flake side with McCain, saying the notion of deporting millions of illegal immigrants is unfeasible. Rep. J.D. Hayworth, meanwhile, is one of the most vehement advocates of tightening the borders and criminalizing illegal immigrants before addressing guest-worker questions.

Tamar Jacoby, who studies immigration issues at the Manhattan Institute, supports McCain's approach but says Kyl should not be dismissed as someone seeking to score political points. Both McCain and Kyl "are reformers or would-be reformers," she said, noting their similar efforts to tighten control of border crossings.

"Kyl is not grandstanding for his reelection," Jacoby said. But his notion that millions of Mexicans will willingly return home after working in the United States for several years is unrealistic, she said. McCain's emphasis on helping such workers become citizens invested in their adopted country is the better long-range bet, she said.

Criminal Alien Exception Blocked (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, April 5, 2006

Senate Democrats refused to allow consideration of an amendment yesterday that would bar illegal aliens convicted of felonies from obtaining U.S. citizenship.

Democrats said the amendment would "gut" the immigration bill under consideration in the Senate and refused to allow a vote on it.

"It hurts the bill," said Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada. "It hurts the very foundation and what I believe is the spirit" of the legislation.

Republican Sens. Jon Kyl of Arizona and John Cornyn of Texas restated the purpose of their amendment and appeared incredulous that anyone would object to it.

"I do not have to explain in any more detail than what I have as why I don't want to move forward," Mr. Reid said. "I don't agree with the amendment. I don't think it's going to benefit this legislation that is pending before the Senate and I'm going to do what I can to prevent a vote on it."

Later, Mr. Reid added, "We're not going to allow amendments like Kyl-Cornyn to take out what we believe is the goodness of this bill."

The entire bill is "in effect being blocked by the other side," said Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican.

After debate over the bill ground to a halt last night, Democrats filed a "cloture motion" that could set up a final vote before the end of the week on an immigration bill that many conservatives view as "amnesty." The bill allows illegal aliens to pay a $2,000 fine and remain working in the U.S. while applying for citizenship.

The Kyl-Cornyn amendment would have barred from U.S. citizenship any illegal alien who has been convicted of a felony, three misdemeanors or refused a court order to leave the country.

Democrats said the amendment is not necessary because crimes of "moral turpitude" such as rape and murder already prevent an illegal from obtaining U.S. citizenship, as would violations of drug laws.

Mr. Kyl came to the floor and listed the crimes he said would not be included without his amendment, such as burglary, assault and battery, possession of an unregistered, sawed-off shotgun, kidnapping and alien smuggling.

McCain Threatens To End Speech After 'boos'Published (WT/AP)

By Associated press

The Washington Times, April 5, 2006

Sen. John McCain threatened yesterday to cut short a speech to union leaders who booed his immigration views and challenged his statements on organized labor and the Iraq war.

"If you like, I will leave," Mr. McCain, Arizona Republican, told the AFL-CIO's Building and Construction Trades Department, pivoting briefly from the lectern. He returned to the microphone after the crowd quieted.

"OK, then please give me the courtesy I would give you."

DOJ_NMG_0025610

The senator had been outlining his position on the Senate immigration debate, saying tougher border enforcement must be accompanied by guest-worker provisions that give undocumented aliens a legal path toward citizenship.

Murmurs from the crowd turned to booing.

"Pay a decent wage," one audience member shouted.

"I've heard that statement before," Mr. McCain said before threatening to leave.

Afterward, the senator said he offered to cut his speech short "because I wanted to be heard."

In the speech, Mr. McCain also said withdrawing U.S. troops prematurely from Iraq would turn terrorists loose on the United States.

This time, there was no booing -- though one audience member cursed from the back of the crowd.

Mr. McCain got a laugh when he finished the speech and asked whether anybody had "questions, comments or insults."

The first questioner seemed to challenge Mr. McCain's commitment to organized labor. When the senator started to praise a particular labor group in Arizona, the crowd booed again.

"Stop," he said with a smile, drawing laughter from the crowd. "I surrender."

But he took more questions, including a pointed one on his immigration plan.

Mr. McCain responded by saying that immigrants were taking jobs that nobody else wanted. He offered anybody in the crowd $50 an hour to pick lettuce in Arizona.

Shouts of protest rose from the crowd, with some accepting Mr. McCain's job offer.

"I'll take it," one man said.

Mr. McCain insisted that none of them would do such menial labor for a complete season.

"You can't do it, my friends," he said.

Some in the crowd said they did not appreciate Mr. McCain's questioning their work ethic.

"I was impressed with his comedy routine and ability to tap dance without music. But I was impressed with nothing else about him," said John Wasniewski of Milwaukee. "He's supposed to be Mr. Straight Talk?"

Others said Mr. McCain showed some moxie, if not the best political judgment.

"Most of us don't agree with him on immigration, but I give him credit for trying," said Chris D. Schoenbeck of Milwaukee.

Florida Gov. Bush Calls Tone Of Immigration Debate `Hurtful' (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — Accusing politicians of "pounding their chests" on immigration for short-term political gain, Florida Gov. Jeb Bush said Tuesday that the tone of the debate had been "hurtful" to him and his Mexican-born wife, Columba.

Bush, the younger brother of President Bush, reserved some of his sharpest criticism for conservatives in his own Republican Party, calling it "just plain wrong" to charge illegal immigrants with a felony, as a provision passed by the Republican-led House would do. He also opposed "penalizing the children of illegal immigrants" by denying them U.S. citizenship, an idea backed by some conservatives but not included in the legislation.

"My wife came here legally, but it hurts her just as it hurts me when people give the perception that all immigrants are bad," the Florida governor wrote in an e-mail exchange with The Times.

Gov. Bush has generally avoided injecting himself into national political fights, and he rarely invokes his soft-spoken wife of 32 years in such a public way. But his comments reflect the concern among many Republicans that calls by conservatives for an immigrant crackdown risk alienating Latino voters.

His brother is attempting to navigate a growing rift among Republicans over what to do with the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants in the country. The president has proposed a guest-worker program but has not said what should happen to those already here illegally.

Florida is home to millions of residents who were born in other countries. And the Bush brothers, in Florida and Texas, where the president was governor, have been popular with Latino voters.

Both have long advocated open immigration laws, putting them at odds with many in their party.

Longtime friends and associates say the president's relationship with his brother's family, along with his experiences living and working in Texas, contributed to his views on immigration.

The Senate is debating immigration proposals this week, and White House allies are beginning to speak out more forcefully on the issue.

Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman used a speech Tuesday to the Hispanic Chamber of Commerce to extol the contributions of immigrants.

DOJ_NMG_0025611

In his e-mail, Gov. Bush chastised both politicians and the media for being simplistic on immigration, and he lauded his brother for seeking a civil tone.

"The cumulative effect of some politicians pounding their chests about immigration is hurtful to both of us," he wrote, referring to himself and his brother. "I fear they do so for current political gain at the expense of thoughtful policy over the long term."

Jeb Bush pointed to the political damage wrought 12 years ago by California's Proposition 187, in which the state's voters backed a plan to strip illegal immigrants of public benefits. The initiative was pushed by then-Gov. Pete Wilson, a Republican. Some analysts have since blamed that campaign for a backlash among Latino voters that has made California reliably Democratic in national elections.

Gov. Bush wrote that Wilson "fell prey" to the short-term political temptations. "I know he felt he was doing the right thing, but matters are worse now and the Republican Party is now the minority party in California," Bush wrote.

Wilson, in a recent interview, rejected the theory that Prop. 187 turned California to the left — arguing that, instead, he had performed especially well with female voters who later abandoned the GOP over abortion.

Referring to Republicans who shied away from cracking down on illegal immigrants as "gutless," Wilson said they were "intimidated by the fear that they will be charged with racism."

For the Florida governor, though, immigration is a personal matter. He met his wife during a high school exchange program in Mexico, and the two married when he was 21. They settled in Miami in 1980 in part because she would feel comfortable in a heavily Latin city, home to Cubans, Mexicans and thousands of other Spanish-speaking immigrants.

The governor speaks the language fluently. His son, George P. Bush, has cited his Latino heritage in campaign appearances for his father and uncle and is considered an heir to the family political dynasty.

"Columba and I watch the news early in the morning and in the evenings," Bush wrote in the late-night e-mail exchange. "The cumulative effect of the coverage is that immigrants are bad and hurting our country. The coverage is black and white, good and bad, without the nuances that the coverage deserves."

The Florida governor has said he does not intend to run for president in 2008. But he has been mentioned as a potential running mate for another likely candidate, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.).

In his e-mail, Gov. Bush endorsed the idea of a broad guest-worker program encompassing the kinds of low-wage workers sought by farms and factories as well as high-tech professionals from places such as India.

Like his brother, he offered no specificity on how to treat current immigrants and whether they should be granted a path to citizenship.

"The focus should be on protecting our borders rather than these piling on provisions that are punitive to many who have made a great contribution to our country," he wrote. "Along with that, the focus should be on a guest worker program and a means to deal with the millions of long term undocumented workers….

"Frankly," he added, "I also believe we should open up legal immigration to the qualified scientists, innovators, entrepreneurs and others who can additionally add value to our great country."

Letter On Immigration Deepens Split Among Evangelicals (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

More than 50 evangelical Christian leaders and organizations voiced their support yesterday for an immigration bill that would allow illegal immigrants to become U.S. citizens without returning to their native countries.

The statement marks a deepening split among evangelicals over immigration. It was signed by a mixture of Hispanic and white church groups. But most of the nation's large, politically influential evangelical organizations either back rival legislation that focuses on border enforcement and the deportation of illegal immigrants, or have been silent on the issue.

Hispanic evangelical leaders said yesterday that they have received support from Roman Catholic, Jewish and Muslim groups, but have been bitterly disappointed by the response of most of their fellow evangelicals, both white and black.

"This is the watershed movement -- it's the moment where either we really forge relationships with the white evangelical church that will last for decades, or there is a possibility of a definitive schism here," said the Rev. Samuel Rodriguez, president of the National Hispanic Christian Leadership Conference, which serves 10,700 Hispanic evangelical churches with 15 million members.

"There will be church ramifications to this, and there will be political ramifications," he said.

In a letter yesterday to President Bush and members of Congress, Rodriguez's group and its allies cited Bible passages that call for the compassionate treatment of foreigners. Specifically, the letter urged "border protection policies that are consistent with humanitarian values," streamlined procedures for reuniting separated families, and an option for undocumented workers to legalize their status.

The letter effectively endorsed a proposal by Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.). The bill combines a guest-worker program with provisions allowing illegal immigrants to apply for citizenship after paying fines and back taxes, undergoing criminal background checks and learning English.

Among the signers was World Relief, the humanitarian arm of the National Association of Evangelicals. But the NAE itself did not sign the letter because its members are divided on how to deal with immigration, said the Rev. Richard Cizik, the NAE's vice president for governmental affairs.

Polls show that about two-thirds of white evangelicals consider new immigrants a burden on society, compared with about half of all Americans who hold that view. On the other hand, Cizik said, most evangelicals realize that Latino immigrants are the fastest-growing part of their church.

"Evangelicals are a lot more sensitive to the plight of immigrants than outside observers might think," he said. "When you put together the biblical mandate to care for the alien and the receptivity of the Latino community to the evangel, to the gospel, you have a sensitivity factor that almost outweighs the traditional evangelical concern for law and order."

Some predominantly white evangelical groups, such as the Christian Coalition and Phyllis Schlafly's Eagle Forum, have strongly opposed the Kennedy-McCain bill, labeling it an "amnesty" package. They support a House-passed measure that would concentrate on sealing U.S. borders and enforcing existing immigration laws.

"We think our national boundaries should be respected. That's a biblical principle also," said Christian Coalition lobbyist Jim Backlin.

Many larger groups, such as James C. Dobson's Colorado-based Focus on the Family, have not taken a stand on the issue. Rodriguez, of the Hispanic Christian conference, said his group wants to know why.

"We need to know from white evangelical leaders why did they not support comprehensive immigration reform, why they came down in favor exclusively of enforcement, without any mention of the compassionate side, without any mention of the Christian moral imperatives," he said.

"So down the road, when the white evangelical community calls us and says, 'We want to partner with you on marriage, we want to partner on family issues,' my first question will be: 'Where were you when 12 million of our brothers and sisters were about to be deported and 12 million families disenfranchised?' "

Two Towns, Two Stands On Immigration Reform (CSM)

By Daniel B. Wood

The Christian Science Monitor, April 5, 2006

MAYWOOD AND COSTA MESA, CALIF. - One community is car-horn noisy, smokestack gritty, and tightly packed - with narrow streets, tiny houses, and flowering window boxes. The other is golf-course quiet, sumptuously green, and suburban - with broad boulevards, spacious lawns, and parks.

Just a few miles of freeway separate these southern California towns, but they are light-years apart in their responses to America's immigration debate. Maywood, population 45,000 and 96 percent Latino, is a self- proclaimed "sanctuary" for illegal immigrants. Costa Mesa, population 110,000 and one-third Latino, is examining ways to train some of its police force to help US immigration officials identify illegals.

As Washington grapples with rewriting US immigration law, possibly settling the status of up to 12 million undocumented residents, the state that is home to 1 in 3 of them shows how the issue is playing out at the local level - with communities deciding for themselves whether to support or subvert the federal will.

"Though immigration policy is primarily a federal prerogative, there is incredible variation at the local and state level playing out now," says Karthick Ramakrishnan, a political scientist at the University of California at Riverside and author of "Democracy in Immigrant America." "The big story at the local level now is that smaller towns, from 50,000 to 100,000 residents, are wading into the problem. Even though California has been dealing with this for decades, its smaller cities are just beginning to wrestle [with] the challenges."

Overlapping local, state, and federal mandates may be contributing to conflict and confusion among jurisdictions, say Professor Ramakrishnan and others. The federal government has primary responsibility for border enforcement and deportation, while local governments are responsible for maintaining law and order and providing public services.

In January, Maywood became the first municipality in California to declare itself a "sanctuary city." The city council, in effect, signalled its displeasure with legislation that had recently cleared the US House, voting to disregard the bill's call to classify illegal presence in the US as a felony and to enlist local police in enforcing federal immigration law. It also directed the city's police department to stop towing away cars of drivers who don't have driver's licenses - a practice it said unfairly targeted illegal immigrants.

"We did it because people in the community came to us and said we have to take a stand," says Deputy Mayor Felipe Aguirre, who runs a small Mexican art gallery on traffic-clogged Slauson Avenue. All last year, he says, residents became increasingly agitated about the Minutemen - groups of citizens, sometimes armed - standing watch at the US border to alert officials to illegal border-crossings. Then, in December, the House passed its tough border-security bill.

"The world around us is caught up in draconian ideas to tighten the noose around people who are taking care of their kids, landscaping their homes, making their clothes, picking their food," says Mr. Aguirre. "We believe there is a higher law."

A few freeway exits to the south in Costa Mesa, 24-hour fitness gyms, yoga centers, and franchise food outlets stand in contrast to Maywood's retail strips. Here, a different attitude toward illegal immigration finds expression.

"I just feel that immigration is out of control, and no one is standing up to say enough is enough," says Clara Forsythe, a college senior, sipping a latte outside the Starbucks on West 19th Street. She has felt the impact of increased street crime - including car theft and home burglary in recent years - and attributes rising problems at local schools to immigrants who don't know or won't learn English.

In the same way that Aguirre and other Maywood residents say they feel "embattled" by threats of crackdowns on illegal immigrants, Ms. Forsythe says she feels that her way of life is being "encroached on." She was distressed by a huge street demonstration in Los Angeles late last month in favor of immigrant rights, saying those demonstrators in the country illegally "disregard US law but then drain social services, from hospitals to schools and prisons."

She supports a move by Costa Mesa's city council to ask federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) officers to "cross-designate" Costa Mesa police personnel - the first municipality in the country to do so. Cross-designation is a kind of additional training for nonfederal agents - in this case a small subset of Costa Mesa police - that allows them to access previously restricted federal databases relative to immigration status. If a database shows a suspected illegal immigrant is a known felon, local officials hand the person over to ICE officials, who begin deportation proceedings.

In both Maywood and Costa Mesa, not all residents are pleased with their town's immigration decisions. Former Maywood Mayor Sam Pena, who remains a councillor, says the city should not be flouting federal law, but rather should work within the system to change it. In Costa Mesa, public outcry forced local officials to scale down their initial proposal to give cross-designation training to most patrol officers. Instead, they are asking for training for about 30 gang-enforcement specialists and plainclothes detectives who deal with violent felons.

On Saturday, hundreds of Latinos demonstrated at Costa Mesa City Hall to protest the measure, and local tempers are flaring.

"There has been lots of misinformation and disinformation about these proposals," says Sgt. Ron Smith of the Costa Mesa police department. "There is both lack of general understanding of what is going on, as well as people on both sides trying to misrepresent the other for their own agenda."

That lack of general understanding is exacerbated by at least two phenomena, say experts. One is a major finding of a 2005 Public Policy Institute of California study that "most immigrants in California lack much experience with the American political system ... immigrant involvement in city government may be quite limited."

The other is the clash between local law-and-order prerogatives and federal border-and-deportation mandates. When Congress debated in 2004 the so-called CLEAR Act (a law to let state and local agencies determine their own participation in enforcing federal immigration laws), the International Association of Chiefs of Police issued a statement saying such plans could have a "chilling effect" on the ability of local police to protect the public they serve.

The worry is that local police would see reports of criminal activity dry up in immigrant communities, as both legal and illegal immigrants come to avoid police contact.

"The role of local governments in immigration policy is likely to remain unclear," says Ramakrishnan of UC Riverside. "In some cities it might mean working hand in hand with federal immigration and border authorities, and in others it might mean looking the other way."

63-city Protest Set For Monday (WT)

By Keyonna Summers And Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, April 5, 2006

Immigration advocates yesterday announced plans for a 63-city rally on Monday that they hope will attract at least 2 million supporters to protest pending immigration reform legislation and press lawmakers into granting millions of current illegal aliens a path toward permanent residency and U.S. citizenship.

DOJ_NMG_0025614

The advocates also called for a nationwide one-day boycott of work, school and shopping May 1 to protest the House and the Senate immigration reform bills.

Calling the National Day of Action for Immigrant Justice "a true grass-roots movement," Jaime Contreras, president of the National Capital Immigrant Coalition, said, "We want to announce to the world and our elected officials that we are not criminals, that the sleeping giant that was once sleeping is now awake.

"Enough is enough. We're not here to be used as scapegoats for political campaigns," he said during a press conference yesterday at the U.S. Capitol.

The advocates also will urge defeat of the House bill, which was approved last year and, among other things, increases immigration enforcement and border security, makes illegal entry a felony, requires employers to check the legal status of workers and penalizes those who help in illegal entry.

"We're building as we speak," said Mr. Contreras, whose group is planning the nationwide protest with dozens of other organizations.

Rallies last month drew well more than 10,000 each to Phoenix, Milwaukee and Denver, and an estimated 500,000 to Los Angeles. About 80,000 Hispanics walked off their jobs in Atlanta.

Organizers again expect the largest protests to strike major cities, including Pittsburgh and Cincinnati.

Meanwhile, the Great American Boycott of 2006 is being organized for May 1 by Latino Movement USA.

"We're flexing our muscles to send a message that we are not criminals," the group's director, Juan Jose Gutierrez, said yesterday during a separate D.C. press conference.

Mr. Gutierrez, whose organization helped coordinate the Los Angeles rally, called a pending Senate bill that would create a guest-worker program and put millions of illegal aliens on track toward permanent residency an "encouraging sign," but described it as too hard on those seeking citizenship.

"We think that the right thing to do is to grant full rights, full equality, under the laws in the Constitution of the United States to all immigrants, period," he said.

Yesterday, black and Hispanic leaders -- including South Carolina Rep. James E. Clyburn, House Democratic Caucus chairman and Congressional Black Caucus member, and Hilary Shelton , director of the D.C. bureau of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People -- connected immigrants' and illegal aliens' fight to that of blacks during the civil rights movement.

Organizers are discouraging student walkouts, which last week took the region and the country by storm and were marred by the stabbing of a Northern Virginia high school student.

"We are encouraging students to get involved through the community organizations that are putting these events together," Mr. Contreras said.

Mobilizing For Monday (WSJ)

By Stephanie Kang And Miriam Jordan

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

Hispanic immigrants and their advocates in recent weeks have learned a big lesson in how quickly they can mobilize behind a political cause. With more immigration-reform demonstrations planned for early next week, organizers are about to see how much muscle they have to flex.

To build on a movement that attracted as many as 500,000 protesters in cities like Los Angeles last month, a new round of demonstrations is set for Monday in an attempt to keep pressure on the immigration issue and broaden the base of support. At least 60 cities are scheduling events that include candlelight vigils in Los Angeles, a rally in front of the Washington monument in the nation's capital, and a "day without Hispanics" in Telluride, Colo. that is intended as a work stoppage.

Turnout is hard to predict given that the events take place on a Monday rather than the previous Saturday protests. But the events could be disruptive to normal business operations in places where Hispanics are a major part of the work force -- everything from the hotel and restaurant industries to construction and agriculture.

"It's got employers' attention and they're trying to figure out what to do," says John Gay, senior vice president of government affairs and public policy at the National Restaurant Association. He says some of the association's members, hoping to avoid losing the entire staff for the day, are offering some workers the day off with pay so they can attend the events.

Possibly adding to the impact: organizers now are aggressively reaching out to other ethnic groups that are affected by the immigration debate, including Koreans and Chinese. Their message is that Hispanics aren't the only group that stands to lose under certain proposed changes to immigration law that would make illegal immigrants felons and penalize their employers.

The large number of demonstrators across the country last month underscored the political possibilities of a well-mobilized, but previously untapped Hispanic immigrant base. School demonstrations in Los Angeles and elsewhere -- in which Hispanics walked out of classes -- indicate the prospect of more spontaneous protests.

While it appeared that demonstrators sprang up virtually overnight, the protests were actually the culmination of weeks of planning by a loose infrastructure of unions, religious organizations, and ethnic and immigrant rights groups that in many cases organized into national coalitions on immigration several years ago.

The short-term goal is to stop legislation like the House of Representatives bill sponsored by Wisconsin Republican James Sensenbrenner, which calls for deportation of all illegal immigrants, construction of a fence along the U.S. and Mexico border, and penalizing those who aid illegal immigrants. The bigger goal, say organizers, is the passage of a Senate bill that would post more patrols along the Mexican border and create a plan to allow workers into the country and grant them credits toward obtaining visas if they paid taxes and learned English.

Each group has its own reason for supporting immigration overhauls. Unions have seen a decline in membership in part because illegal immigrants fear that joining would result in deportation. Certain faith-based organizations, led by the Roman Catholic church, have picked up the cause on the grounds that it is immoral to punish working illegal immigrants and those who help them.

Groups like Koreans and Chinese have thrown their weight behind the issue partly because of the high numbers of illegal immigrants in their own communities. About 20% of Korean immigrants in the U.S. are believed to be undocumented, according to the non-profit Pew Hispanic Center. Thousands of Chinese are also believed to be here without documentation.

"It's not just an issue for Latinos," says Hamid Khan, a Pakistani who is executive director of South Asian Network, an advocacy group that joined a protest last weekend in Costa Mesa, Calif. "It's for all communities of color."

But not all immigrants back the demonstrations. At the Costa Mesa event, a 20-year-old son of Chilean immigrants, Daniel Calderson, showed up to protest -- for the other side. "This isn't a race issue," he says. "It's about breaking laws. He held a sign that read: "My family did it the legal way. You should too!"

The creation of nationwide coalitions isn't just a response to recent legislation, but also to rising anti-immigrant sentiment after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and the threat represented by groups like the volunteer Minuteman Project, which patrols the U.S. borders and notifies authorities if people illegally enter the country.

The broadening effort was on display last week in Nashville, when an array of immigrants, including Hispanics, Somalis, Sundanese, Kurds and Laotions, turned out for the largest rally so far in the South -- with 15,000 people in attendance. "Before, the immigrant community was invisible," says David Lubell, director of the Tennessee Immigrant and Refugee Rights Coalition. Turning out protesters has proved more difficult in the South because newer immigrants feel their position in those local communities is more tenuous than in other areas, like the Southwest.

The groups are targeting the country's roughly 26 million legal immigrants as well as the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants in the country. Both immigrant communities are often intertwined, even within a nuclear family. So-called mixed status families are increasingly common, say immigration experts and may run counter to opponents' argument that legal immigrants resent the idea of illegal workers "cutting" in line for legalization.

"It really doesn't matter how an immigrant came to this country, or how they gained status as an immigrant," says Eun Sook Lee, executive director of the National Korean American Service & Education Consortium. "They face the same hard life -- grasping language, finding a job and really exercising their rights.".

U.S. Urged To Apologize For 1930s Deportations (USAT)

By Wendy Koch

USA Today, April 5, 2006

His father and oldest sister were farming sugar beets in the fields of Hamilton, Mont., and his mother was cooking tortillas when 6-year-old Ignacio Pia saw plainclothes authorities burst into his home.

“They came in with guns and told us to get out,” recalls Pia, 81, a retired railroad worker in Bakersfield, Calif., of the 1931 raid. “They didn't let us take anything,” not even a trunk that held birth certificates proving that he and his five siblings were U.S.-born citizens.

The family was thrown into a jail for 10 days before being sent by train to Mexico. Pia says he spent 16 years of “pure hell” there before acquiring papers of his Utah birth and returning to the USA.

The deportation of Pia's family tells an almost-forgotten story of a 1930s anti-immigrant campaign. Tens of thousands — and possibly more than 400,000 — of Mexicans and Mexican-Americans were pressured, through raids and job denials, to leave the USA, according to a USA TODAY review of documents and interviews with historians and deportees. Many, mostly children, were U.S. citizens.

If their tales seem incredible, a newspaper analysis of the history textbooks used most in U.S. middle and high schools may explain why: Little has been written about the exodus, often called "the repatriation."

That may soon change. As the U.S. Senate prepares to vote on bills that would either help illegal workers become legal residents or boost enforcement of U.S. immigration laws, an effort to address deportations that happened 70 years ago has gained traction:

·On Thursday, Rep. Hilda Solis, D-Calif., plans to introduce a bill in the U.S. House that calls for a commission to study the "deportation and coerced emigration" of U.S. citizens and legal residents. The panel would also recommend remedies that could include reparations. "An apology should be made," she says.

Co-sponsor Rep. Luis Gutierrez, D-Ill., says history may repeat itself. He says a new House bill that makes being an illegal immigrant a felony could prompt a "massive deportation of U.S. citizens," many of them U.S.-born children leaving with their parents.

"We have safeguards to ensure people aren't deported who shouldn't be," says Jeff Lungren, GOP spokesman for the House Judiciary Committee, adding the new House bill retains those safeguards.

·In January, California became the first state to enact a bill that apologizes to Latino families for the 1930s civil rights violations. It declined to approve the sort of reparations the U.S. Congress provided in 1988 for Japanese-Americans interned during World War II.

Democratic state Sen. Joe Dunn, a self-described "Irish white guy from Minnesota" who sponsored the state bill, is now pushing a measure to require students be taught about the 1930s emigration. He says as many as 2 million people of Mexican ancestry were coerced into leaving, 60% of them U.S. citizens.

·In October, a group of deportees and their relatives, known as los repatriados, will host a conference in Detroit on the topic. Organizer Helen Herrada, whose father was deported, has conducted 100 oral histories and produced a documentary. She says many sent to Mexico felt "humiliated" and didn't want to talk about it. "They just don't want it to happen again."

No precise figures exist on how many of those deported in the 1930s were illegal immigrants. Since many of those harassed left on their own, and their journeys were not officially recorded, there are also no exact figures on the total number who departed.

At least 345,839 people went to Mexico from 1930 to 1935, with 1931 as the peak year, says a 1936 dispatch from the U.S. Consulate General in Mexico City.

"It was a racial removal program," says Mae Ngai, an immigration history expert at the University of Chicago, adding people of Mexican ancestry were targeted.

However, Americans in the 1930s were "really hurting," says Otis Graham, history professor emeritus at the University of California, Santa Barbara. One in four workers were unemployed and many families hungry. Deporting illegal residents was not an "outrageous idea," Graham says. "Don't lose the context."

In the early 1900s, Mexicans poured into the USA, welcomed by U.S. factory and farm owners who needed their labor. Until entry rules tightened in 1924, they simply paid a nickel to cross the border and get visas for legal residency.

"The vast majority were here legally, because it was so easy to enter legally," says Kevin Johnson, a law professor at the University of California, Davis.

They spread out across the nation. They sharecropped in California, Texas and Louisiana, harvested sugar beets in Montana and Minnesota, laid railroad tracks in Kansas, mined coal in Utah and Oklahoma, packed meat in Chicago and assembled cars in Detroit.

By 1930, the U.S. Census counted 1.42 million people of Mexican ancestry, and 805,535 of them were U.S. born, up from 700,541 in 1920.

Change came in 1929, as the stock market and U.S. economy crashed. That year, U.S. officials tightened visa rules, reducing legal immigration from Mexico to a trickle. They also discussed what to do with those already in the USA.

"The government undertook a program that coerced people to leave," says Layla Razavi, policy analyst for the Mexican American Legal Defense and Education Fund (MALDEF). "It was really a hostile environment." She says federal officials in the Hoover administration, like local-level officials, made no distinction between people of Mexican ancestry who were in the USA legally and those who weren't.

"The document trail is shocking," says Dunn, whose staff spent two years researching the topic after he read the 1995 book Decade of Betrayal: Mexican Repatriation in the 1930s, by Francisco Balderrama and Raymond Rodriguez.

USA TODAY reviewed hundreds of pages of documents, some provided by Dunn and MALDEF and others found at the National Archives. They cite officials saying the deportations lawfully focused on illegal immigrants while the exodus of legal residents was voluntary. Yet they suggest people of Mexican ancestry faced varying forms of harassment and intimidation:

·Raids. Officials staged well-publicized raids in public places. On Feb. 26, 1931, immigration officials suddenly closed off La Placita, a square in Los Angeles, and questioned the roughly 400 people there about their legal status.

The raids "created a climate of fear and anxiety" and prompted many Mexicans to leave voluntarily, says Balderrama, professor of Chicano studies and history at California State University, Los Angeles.

In a June 1931 memo to superiors, Walter Carr, Los Angeles district director of immigration, said "thousands upon thousands of Mexican aliens" have been "literally scared out of Southern California."

Some of them came from hospitals and needed medical care en route to Mexico, immigrant inspector Harry Yeager wrote in a November 1932 letter.

The Wickersham Commission, an 11-member panel created by President Hoover, said in a May 1931 report that immigration inspectors made "checkups" of boarding houses, restaurants and pool rooms without "warrants of any kind." Labor Secretary William Doak responded that the "checkups" occurred very rarely.

·Jobs withheld. Prodded by labor unions, states and private companies barred non-citizens from some jobs, Balderrama says.

"We need their jobs for needy citizens," C.P. Visel of the Los Angeles Citizens Committee for Coordination of Unemployment Relief wrote in a 1931 telegram. In a March 1931 letter to Doak, Visel applauded U.S. officials for the "exodus of aliens deportable and otherwise who have been scared out of the community."

Emilia Castenada, 79, recalls coming home from school in 1935 in Los Angeles and hearing her father say he was being deported because "there was no work for Mexicans." She says her father, a stonemason, was a legal resident who owned property. A U.S. citizen who spoke little Spanish, she left the USA with her brother and father, who was never allowed back.

"The jobs were given to the white Americans, not the Mexicans," says Carlos DeAnda Guerra, 77, a retired furniture upholsterer in Carpinteria, Calif. He says his parents entered the USA legally in 1917 but were denied jobs. He, his mother and five U.S.-born siblings were deported in 1931, while his father, who then went into hiding, stayed to pick oranges.

"The slogan has gone out over the city (Los Angeles) and is being adhered to — 'Employ no Mexican while a white man is unemployed,' " wrote George Clements, manager of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce's agriculture department, in a memo to his boss Arthur Arnoll. He said the Mexicans' legal status was not a factor: "It is a question of pigment, not a question of citizenship or right."

·Public aid threatened. County welfare offices threatened to withhold the public aid of many Mexican-Americans, Ngai says. Memos show they also offered to pay for trips to Mexico but sometimes failed to provide adequate food. An immigration inspector reported in a November 1932 memo that no provisions were made for 78 children on a train. Their only sustenance: a few ounces of milk daily.

Most of those leaving were told they could return to the USA whenever they wanted, wrote Clements in an August 1931 letter. "This is a grave mistake, because it is not the truth." He reported each was given a card that made their return impossible, because it showed they were "county charities." Even those born in the USA, he wrote, wouldn't be able to return unless they had a birth certificate or similar proof.

·Forced departures. Some of the deportees who were moved by train or car had guards to ensure they left the USA and others were sent south on a "closed-body school bus" or "Mexican gun boat," memos show.

"Those who tried to say 'no' ended up in the physical deportation category," Dunn says, adding they were taken in squad cars to train stations.

Mexican-Americans recall other pressure tactics. Arthur Herrada, 81, a retired Ford engineer in Huron, Ohio, says his father, who was a legal U.S. resident, was threatened with deportation if he didn't join the U.S. Army. His father enlisted.

"It was an injustice that shouldn't have happened," says Jose Lopez, 79, a retired Ford worker in Detroit. He says his father came to the USA legally but couldn't find his papers in 1931 and was deported. To keep the family together, his mother took her six U.S.-born children to Mexico, where they often survived on one meal a day. Lopez welcomes a U.S. apology.

So does Guerra, the retired upholsterer, whose voice still cracks with emotion when he talks about how deportation tore his family apart. "I'm very resentful. I don't trust the government at all," says Guerra, who later served in the U.S. military.

Pia says his entire family got typhoid fever in Mexico and his father, who had worked in Utah coal mines, died of black lung disease in 1935. "My mother was left destitute, with six of us, in a country we knew nothing about," he says. They lived in the slums of Mexico City, where his formal education ended in sixth grade. "We were misfits there. We weren't welcome."

"The Depression was very bad here. You can imagine how hard it was in Mexico," says Pia, who proudly notes the advanced college degrees of each of his four U.S.-raised sons. "You can't put 16 years of pure hell out of your mind."

Backstory: Inside 'Border Patrol, Inc.' (CSM)

By Faye Bowers

DOJ_NMG_0025618

The Christian Science Monitor, April 5, 2006

NOGALES, ARIZ. - Inside the border patrol, they're called the "rock group" - agents, trained as welders, who spend days repairing holes in a 15-foot-high steel wall here along the border to keep out illegal immigrants. Both human traffickers and drug smugglers pay Mexican boys to use hacksaws - sometimes working all day - to cut holes in the wall, an "iron curtain" made out of salvaged aircraft-carrier landing mats. The welders respond with molten metal.

But while they're working, the agents are frequently pelted with rocks by youths on the Mexican side of the controversial wall. Hence the rock group moniker - a reference to the mini-intafada here rather than any parallel with Mick Jagger. The "boys are hurling stones today, so be careful," one agent warns us as we tour the area.

The tale of the hacksaws and the welders is a metaphor for life along the dusty US-Mexico border in an era of heightened security and expanding illegal immigration.

Up and down the 2,000-mile border, the US government is throwing more manpower and sophisticated technology into slowing illegal entries into the US. But as it does, immigrants are showing greater ingenuity in circumventing the barriers and patrols.

Now, as Congress considers another overhaul of immigration laws, the encounters and clashes along the border are likely to intensify. Most of the bills in Congress include provisions to expand the border patrol (now part of US Customs and Border Protection), which has already seen agent strength along the nation's southern flank more than double since 9/11, to 11,000.

The result is an agency that is becoming increasingly complex and unwieldy. Agents already use everything from horses to mountain bikes to all-terrain vehicles to track drug smugglers and human traffickers. They also use aerial surveillance, periscope trucks, and underground sensors. Yet, through it all, the task of stopping illegal immigration can still seem daunting, if not futile, as a day in the life of the border patrol here recently showed.

The nerve center of operations in the Tucson sector, a 261-mile stretch of border, is an expansive new brick-and-glass headquarters in Nogales. In one room - the intelligence hub - sits a U-shaped set of desks with 25 television monitors that show various grids of the desolate desert area. The new technology employed along the border - movement sensors buried amid the mesquite, cameras, and two unmanned aircraft - transmit information instantly to the monitors.

Camera 17 is trained on someone walking along the border fence. He suddenly spots the roving eye and ducks behind a tree. Camera 35 shows where an underground sensor has gone off, so the agent dispatches a crew to "lie in wait" for the crossers. They will pack in on horseback or on four-wheelers. Sometimes it takes two to three days to reach the spots - and the waiting can be inhospitable. One agent, Shannon Stevens, recalls her first ambush duty: She was stalked by a tarantula.

In another room, the walls are decorated with photos of confiscated items - knives, shotguns, 4,391 pounds of cocaine from a bust. Here, junior agents attend classes in Spanish and immigration law one day a week for 10 months. They're tested twice. If they fail, they lose their job. The lessons are a follow-up to the 19 weeks the agents spend at an academy that includes the equivalent of three years of college Spanish. Jim Hawkins, a senior agent, says the border patrol receives 40,000 applications a year. Only 2,000 to 3,000 survive screening and training.

Another room in the building is reserved for confiscated drugs. On this day, agents have loaded some 5,000 pounds of marijuana into two Penske moving vans and sent it north to Tucson for burning, which happens once a week.

To stem illegal entries in Nogales, the agency is trying a "defense in depth" strategy. It involves blocking smuggling routes through the town with the lit up "iron curtain" - and pushing the traffickers farther out in the desert, where agents have two or three days to track them. The idea is also to avoid shootouts in populated areas.

On the ground, the agency is bolstering surveillance with a new "scope truck." It looks like a Chevy camper. But the roof has been cut out and a large infrared camera sits in the back like a periscope. Controlling it with a joy stick, agents can see illegals at night as far as six miles away.

We leave headquarters and bump along a road for several miles that follows a border ridge through the Coronado National Forest. Only three strings of barbed wire separate the US from Mexico here. The Mexico side is on high ground - rolling hills dotted with oak and walnut trees that provide cover for smugglers. Although no people are crossing, worn paths littered with empty water jugs wind across the border at frequent intervals.

We circle back west and head through the city, where houses are painted in pastels. Hawkins points out what he calls the most troublesome drug-smuggling neighborhood in Nogales. A supposed drug lord's large hacienda sits among scores of shanties.

Farther east we reach Hamburger Hill, a notorious smuggling route. Below, the welders repair the fence. Their truck is fortified with mesh cages to protect the windows from the rock throwers. Sometimes the stoning is just a diversion, Hawkins says: While the youths throw, a smuggler crosses a short distance away.

"Manpower alone is not going" to stop this, says Rodolfo Espino, a political scientist at Arizona State University in Tempe. "As long as there's a pull for employees on this side of the border, there will be a constant push to enter from the Mexican side."

Driving back through Nogales, the agents note other ways illegals gain entry. Underneath two dry washes, which the border patrol filled in to prevent crossings, the immigrants crawl through a metal drainage culvert. To stop this, agents fabricated a steel door for the pipe. The smugglers retaliated with hydraulic jacks. The agents responded with sensors, cameras, and flood lights. It's keeping the smugglers at bay, for now.

"It's a game of constant adjustments," sighs Hawkins.

The Amnesty Trap (NYT)

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

When the week began, it looked almost as if it was time to celebrate a springtime blossoming of good sense in Washington. The Senate appeared to be closing in on solid bipartisan support for a comprehensive overhaul of the nation's immigration system. That meant adopting an approach that has been on the table for months in a bill offered last year by Senators John McCain and Edward Kennedy, then revised and passed last month by the Senate Judiciary Committee. It combines, sensibly, tighter borders with a path to citizenship for people here illegally.

The bill's opponents, including the Senate majority leader, Bill Frist, had long derided the multifaceted strategy as "amnesty," but over the weekend even Mr. Frist appeared to have a light bulb go off. On a talk show and in a news release, he recast his definition of the word in a way that seemed to justify allowing at least some of the nation's 11 million to 12 million illegal immigrants to get in line for green cards.

But it is too soon to exhale. The Judiciary Committee's bill apparently remains stuck in the amnesty trap. While it has enough votes to pass, it may not have enough to avoid a filibuster by hard-core Republicans. For them, anything other than punishment and border enforcement smacks unforgivably of forgiveness.

Now Senators Mel Martinez of Florida and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska are offering a "fallback" compromise if the committee bill fails. They would not eliminate the citizenship track, but narrow it severely. Immigrants who have been here at least five years could apply, but those who arrived more recently would be treated more harshly. The details were unclear yesterday, but the newcomers might either have to leave the country to apply for citizenship, or do so from a border city, like El Paso.

Arbitrarily separating the illegal immigrant population with a five-year rule would be cruel. Inviting millions of them to report to be deported would be utterly unfeasible. And turning El Paso into the "Go" square in Monopoly would just be stupid. It would add a meaningless hurdle to a citizenship obstacle course that is already long and difficult. All it would do is give a face-saving assurance to hard-liners that immigrants would suffer adequately for their green cards and allow Republicans to reassure suspicious constituents: this is so not amnesty.

Half-measures and semantic trickery are not what's needed now. This country has been on a long and improbable path to immigration reform. The more it has wrestled with the issue, the more distance has grown between the thoughtful Americans and the nativists who long for a Great Wall of Mexico, or for a two-tiered nation of citizens and of immigrant hired hands, free to toil forever as guest workers but never to fully join our society.

The Martinez-Hagel compromise is a bad idea. It's tempting to think flawed reform is better than none, but the wiser approach is to stand firm for what Mr. Kennedy has called "the real enchilada." We need to get it right this time, once and for all.

Here We Go Again (USAT)

USA Today, April 5, 2006

They never learn. Politicians keep pushing "guest worker" programs, even though the concept is built to fail and always does.

I don't mean what President Bush wants — where as many as 12 million illegal immigrants could stay in the USA for three years, and then apply to stay for another three years, before being expected to "self-deport." That's not realistic. Nor is it a genuine guest-worker program. People who are already here aren't really guests. What Bush proposes is temporary amnesty.

I'm talking about importing hundreds of thousands of new foreign workers from a country such as Mexico to work in farming, construction, hotels or restaurants.

That's what Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., has proposed as part of a reform bill that his Judiciary Committee put together and which serves as a starting point for the Senate immigration debate. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., has a competing bill that steers clear of guest workers, focusing instead on enforcement and increasing the allotment of green cards.

Here we go again. The U.S. government has turned to foreign workers before. And given that these programs are often criticized as indentured servitude, it's ironic that the person who kicked off the phenomenon also freed the slaves.

DOJ_NMG_0025620

Under pressure from industries suffering labor shortages during the Civil War, President Abraham Lincoln settled on foreign workers as the solution. Congress passed the Act to Encourage Immigration of 1864, which allowed employers to recruit foreign workers and pay their way to America.

Workers were supposed to forfeit some of their pay to their sponsor, but many also had to work off living expenses and wound up in debt. Labor groups, concerned that foreign workers were taking jobs from Americans, pressured Congress to repeal the act, and by 1868 it was no longer in effect.

In 1917, under pressure mostly from farmers during World War I, Congress launched a foreign-worker program to allow farmers to import workers from Mexico. It didn't go as planned. Politicians thought the workers would return home, but many did not. Eventually, the war ended, and so did the urgent need for guest workers.

The idea made a comeback during World War II, which brought another labor shortage and the arrival of the most infamous guest workers of all: the braceros. The name comes from the Spanish word for arms, brazos, as in someone who works with his arms and hands.

From 1942 to '64, under an agreement between the United States and Mexico, nearly 5 million Mexican workers went north to work in the fields. The workers were promised housing, transportation, food, fair wages and health care — most of which never materialized.

Perhaps farmers thought the benefits too costly, which isn't good when you're talking about a program that was supposed to reduce labor costs. Congress shut down the program after television journalist Edward R. Murrow documented the abuse of workers. It was bye, bye braceros.

Too many politicians and businesses view guest workers as the magic-wand solution to our immigration woes. Employers get workers. Workers get jobs. And then those workers head back across the border where they belong. They don't hang out, buy homes, enroll their children in school, join the PTA, start businesses, and change the culture and complexion of neighborhoods and towns.

Put aside the fact that guest workers are a form of corporate welfare or that, ideally, government shouldn't be in the labor-contracting business.

There are practical reasons why guest-worker programs don't work:

· Workers don't leave. While the workers are supposed to be temporary, they stick around. They get married, have kids and put down roots. As former U.S. senator Alan Simpson of Wyoming used to say, there is nothing more permanent than a temporary worker.

· Backlash never abates. Because these temporary workers never leave, a guest-worker program doesn't really put an end to the thing that gets Americans all worked up in the first place — the changing culture and complexion of towns and neighborhoods.

· Exploitation happens. Guest workers are ripe for abuse because if employers were to provide things such as housing, prevailing wages, health care and worker's compensation insurance, that would undermine the whole idea behind the program: cheap labor. Once labor isn't so cheap anymore, expect employers to lose interest.

· Illegal immigration continues. Most guest-worker plans deal in the hundreds of thousands. As long as millions of immigrants want to come to the USA and can fill millions of jobs, such a limited approach would never end illegal entry.

Congress should forget about importing new guest workers, or granting a wholesale amnesty to all 12 million illegal workers already here, and focus on reforms that stand a chance of working.

Here's a four-point plan to add to the mix:

1) Stiffen penalties against employers, including jail time, and enforce them for a change.

2) Beef up the ranks of the border patrol by 25%.

3) Increase the allotment of green cards and work visas to allow people to come in legally.

4) Grant legal status to some but not all illegal immigrants, the preference going to those who have been here the longest and who have immediate family members who are U.S. citizens.

And, lastly, let's accept the idea that, in this debate, there are no easy solutions or free lunches.

A Potential Tidal Wave Come Election Time (USAT)

USA Today, April 5, 2006

Two hundred; 500; 1,000; 2,000; 10,000; 300,000; 500,000. Far from counting sheep, these numbers of protesters signify an awakening. Political pundits and community activists say the prospect of congressional action on immigration reform has stirred up the Latino community.

Protesters have taken to the streets in cities coast to coast, chanting their opposition in two languages to the immigration reform plans being debated in Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0025621

The threats of criminalizing undocumented immigrants and the Good Samaritans who help them, separating families, imposing a man-made border, toiling away at a government-sanctioned job while paying taxes but still having no clear path to citizenship — those are just a few issues propelling people to forgo the safety of society's shadows to speak out in unison.

It's clear that depending on which side of the river you're looking across from, immigration reform is either a political/economic issue or a human rights cause.

Members of Congress, who think their chances at future elections will be enhanced with voters if they play hardball with the issue, sprinkle their speech with words such as "terrorists" and "porous border" in the same breath with "illegals" and "taking jobs from Americans."

Sympathetic supporters and the undocumented hear the ticking of the proverbial clock — not for when as many as 12 million people will be expected to turn themselves in, but for when they will be forced to live even more secretive, invisible lives.

Native-born attitudes

Though 12 million is a huge number of people, it pales in comparison with the 28 million Latinos in the USA who already have access to public services, health care, car insurance, among other taken-for-granted rights that come with legal status. These are the people who must be stirred to action.

It won't be an easy task. For one, Latinos are not a monolithic group. For another, a 2005 Pew Hispanic Center study found that although most Latinos have positive attitudes toward immigrants, native-born Latinos tend to be more divided in how they view the effect of illegal immigrants on U.S. society.

When native-born Latinos were asked whether illegal migrants helped the economy by providing low-cost labor rather than hurt the economy by driving wages down, 55% agreed vs. 34% who did not.

Where the political clout rests

The 12 million undocumented immigrants here have no influence over elected leaders. They're not citizens. They can't vote. They can make a lot of noise; they can't make a difference in a politician's future.

But there are at least 15 million eligible Hispanic voters, and they can — if only they'd wield the full force of their votes. Numbers from the 2004 election, though, are not encouraging. Just 47% of Hispanic U.S. citizens (of any race) questioned after the election said they had voted. In contrast:

· 67% of non-Hispanic whites did.

· 60% of African-Americans did.

· 44% of Asian-Americans did.

The top reason given for why many eligible Hispanics didn't vote was that they were too busy or had a conflicting schedule. Another reason: They weren't interested.

Time will tell what actions Congress will take against as many as 12 million illegal immigrants. Only then will we see whether this sleeping giant holding Latino votes has truly awakened, or is merely yawning before turning over to go back to sleep.

Fuzzy Math On Illegal Immigration (WSJ)

By Carl Bialik

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

New York Democrat Charles Schumer said legislation is needed "to solve the problem of millions of foreigners who live here illegally and unprotected" as well as "to alleviate the problem of the millions more who enter illegally every year." He kept his estimate of the number of illegal immigrants vague because "no one knows for sure how many are really here," the National Journal reported. "Nor can anyone give a reliable estimate of how fast that unknown figure is growing each year."

A sound bite from last week? Nope. The year was 1985, Mr. Schumer was in the House of Representatives and debate was raging over how to address the growing number of illegal immigrants, then estimated at somewhere between 3 million and 12 million.

Twenty-one years later, several amnesties granted to undocumented immigrants have failed to keep the number of illegal immigrants from growing. And estimates of their numbers remain fuzzy and full of pitfalls, even as lawmakers toss them around in the latest round of debates over whether to offer guest-worker status to illegal immigrants.

At the core of the problem is the fact that undocumented immigrants don't generally come forward to be counted. The most widely quoted estimate of 11 million to 12 million is derived indirectly, using what's called a residual method: Researchers subtract the number of immigrants who were authorized to come to the U.S. from the number of foreign-born residents counted by the Census Bureau, then adjust the number using estimates of immigrants' deaths and migration, and of Census undercounting. Some critics say that estimate understates the degree of undercounting: Another estimate making the rounds holds that there are 20 million illegal immigrants.

That was the upper range Bear Stearns analysts Robert Justice and Betty Ng estimated last year, citing high growth rates in foreign remittances and in school enrollments in localities with high illegal-immigrant populations. The analysts added, "According to our discussions with illegal immigrants, they avoid responding to census questionnaires."

And there are still-higher estimates to be found online: The Web site of the "immigration crime-fighting" group American Resistance Foundation estimates there are more than 28 million illegal immigrants, based largely on border-patrol apprehension rates; however, there is little reliable data on how many border-crossers who are caught try to enter a second time.

"No one really knows," says Bill Strassberger, a spokesman for the U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services, a branch of the Department of Homeland Security.

Of those citing the 20 million figure, Mr. Strassberger says that "the number seems to be agenda-driven." But if so, it's not always the same agenda doing the driving.

On CNN last Sunday, anchor Lou Dobbs, who has argued for tighter border controls, spoke of "the toll that 20 million illegal aliens take on the infrastructure of the United States and on local, state, and federal taxpayer budgets." (At other times during his recent broadcasts, Mr. Dobbs has cited a range between 11 million and 20 million. A CNN spokeswoman says Mr. Dobbs is relying on the Bear Stearns report for the higher number.)

But talk-show host Tony Snow, arguing that immigrants are a boon to the economy, wrote Monday, "The United States somehow has managed to absorb 10 million to 20 million illegal immigrants not only without turning into Animal Farm, but while cranking up the most impressive economic recovery in two decades."

In 2000, before it was folded into DHS, the Immigration and Naturalization Service used the residual method to estimate there were seven million illegal immigrants and their numbers were growing by 250,000 to 300,000 per year. Mr. Strassberger says that remains the government's best estimate, though he concedes it's out of date.

Following largely the same procedure that INS used, the Washington, D.C., think tank Pew Hispanic Center counted 11 million illegal immigrants last year, and between 11.5 million and 12 million last month; the group is the source for most lawmakers and reporters citing a number. (The Wall Street Journal generally has printed estimates of 11 million, or a range of 11 million to 12 million.)

But the residual method is by necessity complicated, and each step in its formula introduces uncertainty. Jeffrey Passel, a Pew senior research associate, walked me through the procedure (also outlined in Pew's latest report). The starting point is the Census Bureau's annual Current Population Survey report, which bases a count of foreign-born residents on interviews conducted with about 80,000 households. The Census intentionally seeks out a disproportionately large number of Hispanic households to get richer data. Interviewers, either by telephone or in person, ask where every member of each household was born. These figures are then extrapolated to the nation, adjusting for the larger sample of Hispanics. The latest estimate of foreign-born Americans to emerge from such calculations was roughly 36 million, Dr. Passel says.

Next, Pew subtracts the number of foreign-born Americans authorized to be in the country. Dr. Passel's team compiles annual numbers of green-card recipients, refugees and people granted asylum, a count that stretches back decades. But merely adding these numbers would be misleading, because some authorized immigrants decide to leave the country and others die. Dr. Passel assumes that immigrants of a certain age die at the same rate as the country's residents overall, and uses estimates from various studies on "outmigration," something he concedes is "hard to measure." (The outmigration numbers are also much bigger -- perhaps seven times as large -- as the number of deaths, because immigrants tend to be young.) Then the calculated total is subtracted from the total number of foreign-born residents, and the result is adjusted upwards by 10% to account for census undercounting of illegal immigrants. (That adjustment is based on one post-Census 2000 survey of undercounting among Mexican immigrants in the Los Angeles-area; other studies have yielded different estimates of undercounting.)

Dr. Passel and Robert Warren pioneered the residual method while working together at the Census Bureau in the 1980s. Dr. Warren then helped develop INS's methods for its 2000 estimate, so it's no surprise that the government's methods are similar to Pew's. Michael Hoefer, director of the office of immigration statistics, a branch of DHS, told me that the government uses the Census Bureau's American Community Survey instead of the Current Population Survey, which is based on a larger sample of households but is published later than the CPS. (Mr. Hoefer's office is working on a 2004 estimate to update the 2000 official figure of seven million.)

Also, Pew's count of illegal immigrants includes those considered "quasi-legal," meaning they're on their way to legal status, and awaiting asylum or in temporary protected status; INS's count doesn't, though the next round of government estimates might. That could mean a difference of about one million in the total count, Mr. Hoefer says.

Back in 1985, Dr. Passel told the National Journal, "The fatal flaw in virtually every study was that there's some assumption that you have to make in your estimation model for which there is absolutely no data." But he says now that estimation methods have improved, thanks to refinements of the residual-method technique, more-regular Census counts of the foreign-born population, and comparison of the numbers with Mexico population figures to see if the estimate of illegal immigrants from Mexico squares with a gap between expected and actual population counts south of the border.

However, there is still large uncertainty in the current estimates, due largely to Census undercounting and limited data about immigrants leaving the country. It's impossible to say how uncertain the estimates are; neither Pew nor the government publishes a margin of error, which is a standard component of most statistical estimates.

The variable numbers have provided material for Comedy Central's Stephen Colbert, who noted that on a recent Sunday political talk-show, Sen. Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican, referred to "11 million undocumented aliens," and just 30 minutes later on a different network, Massachusetts Democrat Ted Kennedy used the "12 million figure." Mr. Colbert's comment: "One million illegals snuck into this country in half an hour! That is alarming. At that rate the entire population of Mexico would be here in three days. Congress, get to work on that fence." Mr. Kennedy's spokesman cited the Pew report; a representative for Mr. Specter didn't return my call seeking comment. (Numbers Guy readers Allen Cantrell, Shauna Laughna and Robert Tamiso also spotted inconsistent immigration numbers and suggested this column topic.)

Not everyone agrees that the numbers debate matters. "As long as people concede that the number is large to begin with and is increasing, the number itself is irrelevant," Vernon Briggs, a professor of labor economics at Cornell who favors enforcing sanctions against employers of illegal immigrants, told me.

But if that were so, the numbers wouldn't be continually cited by lawmakers and the press, who would serve their constituents and audience better by acknowledging the uncertainty of these estimates.

The Immigration Impasse: A Way Out (WP)

By Robert J. Samuelson

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

Our immigration debate is at an impasse. The House has passed a mean-spirited and delusional bill that focuses heavily on border security and would criminalize some humanitarian acts that aid immigrants. As for the 10 million to 12 million illegal immigrants already here, the supposition is that they should somehow go home. Just how is unclear. Meanwhile, the Senate seems ready to authorize up to 400,000 "guest workers" annually. Guest workers, also endorsed by President Bush, would reduce illegal immigration by giving many of the same people -- mainly poor and unskilled Mexicans -- work permits. The Senate approach also is delusional and undesirable. It would increase American poverty under the guise of curing worker "shortages."

We can do better, but chances are we won't. In 2004 immigrants accounted for nearly 12 percent of the population, the highest share since the 1920s. The fact that there are so many immigrants makes discussion harder because passions on both sides are so easily aroused. Already, hundreds of thousands of Hispanics have marched in Los Angeles, Chicago, Washington and elsewhere. But broader public opinion is also increasingly agitated. A new survey by the Pew Hispanic Center finds that 52 percent of Americans think immigrants "are a burden because they take jobs [and] housing." That's up sharply from 38 percent in 2000.

In this climate, the immigration debate has become an exercise in political public relations, often disconnected from practical realities. Republicans and Democrats are trying in different ways to appease middle-class anxieties without alienating present and future Hispanic voters. The one saving grace is that we may still have time to fashion a more sensible consensus. By the Pew poll, most Americans aren't yet so fearful of immigration that they aren't open to reason and evidence. Only 21 percent see immigration as a "very big problem" in their localities, although responses are higher in areas of greater immigration (55 percent in Phoenix, 36 percent in Las Vegas).

Let me outline what I think such a consensus might be. It has three elements and borrows from both House and Senate approaches.

· Strengthen border and employer enforcement. Unless it's stopped, the present illegal immigration of an estimated 500,000 people annually will overwhelm any system. The main lure is jobs. That's why it's essential to adopt a mandatory requirement for employers to verify new workers -- electronic checking of documents. Companies that hire illegal immigrants should be penalized heavily. But it's also essential to dry up the supply. In an earlier column, I supported the construction of fences or walls, 20 to 30 feet high, along the Mexican border. They would, I think, significantly reduce the flow, though some would still come by overstaying student and tourist visas.

· Grant amnesty to existing illegal immigrants . President Bush and many Republicans oppose this, but it's essential. We can't run an immigration system that condones mass illegality. Most illegal immigrants deserve legal standing -- and a path to citizenship. Although they "broke the law," we (meaning American society) encouraged them by inadequately policing the border and employers. Most won't voluntarily return home, where typical wages are 80 percent lower. Trying to force them back would create a huge backlash. We'd have stories of parents being torn from their American-born children. Companies would complain that government was destroying their firms by removing longtime, diligent workers. Finally, the failure to legalize today's illegal workers would weaken companies' incentives to comply with checks of new workers. If firms were already breaking the law to stay in business, why not take the added risk?

· Forget guest workers . Maybe a few job categories (sheepherders) with existing guest worker programs are justified. But businesses' complaints of widespread labor "shortages" mainly put a respectable face on their thirst for cheap labor. Most guest workers won't go home, even if required (see above). They'll become illegal immigrants or citizens. Either way, adding poor people is bad social policy. It would bloat the demand for government social services. And it would hurt today's poor -- including other immigrants and many African Americans -- by keeping wages down. Jobs attracting lots of immigrants have low wage increases. From 2002 to 2004, median hourly wages rose only 2 percent for construction laborers and 3.6 percent for dishwashers.

On paper, this package has something for everyone. It lifts anxiety for today's illegal immigrants and acknowledges their dignity. It lets companies keep today's illegal workers. It toughens border and employer policing. But it would also disappoint everyone. For business groups, immigration advocates and Bush, there would be no new guest workers. The president and House Republicans would have to swallow amnesty, though maybe they could change the label and debate the details. One Senate proposal envisions an 11-year transition period and a requirement to learn English.

I don't claim that this approach would succeed. Preventing illegal immigration may prove impossible. If so, we'll need to rethink immigration policy fundamentally. But I do believe this approach has better chances of success than most of the congressional proposals. Unless we legalize today's illegal immigrants and reject large-scale guest worker programs, we will indefinitely have two tiers of immigrants -- legal and illegal -- with the prospect that the stigma of illegality will taint the legal. By success, I mean that new immigrants gradually think of themselves as Americans and that most slowly disperse all along the economic spectrum. And immigration ceases to be a major issue, because it is no longer a source of large social and economic conflicts.

High Fence And Big Gate (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

America today is struggling to find the right balance of policies on immigration. Personally, I favor a very high fence, with a very big gate.

So far, neither President Bush's proposal to allow the nation's millions of illegal immigrants to stay temporarily on work visas, nor the most hard-line G.O.P. counterproposal, which focuses only on border security, leaves me satisfied. We need a better blend of the two — a blend that will keep America the world's greatest magnet for immigrants. Why?

First, the world is flattening, and as a result more and more people around the globe have access to the same technological tools for innovation and entrepreneurship. In such a world, where innovation is concentrated really matters — because that is where the best management, research and sales jobs will be located for any company.

Because of its deeply rooted culture of immigration, the U.S. has a huge advantage in such a world. If we are smart, we can still cream off the most first-round intellectual draft choices from around the world — more than any other country — and bring that talent to our shores to start companies and work in others.

We have gone from the Iron Age to the Industrial Age to the Information Age to the Talent Age, and countries that make it easy to draw in human talent will have a distinct advantage today.

Anybody out there try to become a Swiss citizen lately? It's not so easy — and it's also not an accident that Switzerland's most famous product is the cuckoo clock.

Second, a steady flow of immigrants keeps a society flexible and competitive. In this flat world, more people than ever can leverage technology. So whatever can be done — whatever today's technologies enable and empower — will be done by someone, somewhere. The only question is whether it will be done by you or to you. The more open your society is to new people and ideas, the more things will be done by you, not to you.

We shouldn't just welcome educated immigrants, but laborers as well — not only because we need manual laborers, but also because they bring an important energy. As the Indian-American entrepreneur Vivek Paul likes to say: "The very act of leaving behind your own society is an intense motivator. ... Whether you are a doctor or a gardener, you are intensely motivated to succeed."

We need that steady energy flow, especially with India and China exploding onto the world stage with huge pent-up aspirations. If you want to know what China and India feel like today, just take out a Champagne bottle, shake it for 10 minutes and then take off the cork. Don't get in the way of that cork. Immigrants keep that kind of energy flowing in America's veins.

An amnesty for the 11 million to 12 million illegal immigrants already here is hardly ideal. It would reward illegal behavior. But since we are not going to deport them all, some version of the Arlen Specter bill seems like the right way to go: Illegal immigrants who were in the U.S. before Jan. 7, 2004, could apply for three-year guest-worker visas, each renewable one time if the applicant paid a $1,000 fine and passed a background check. After six years, if the immigrant learned sufficient English and paid another $1,000 fine and back taxes, he or she could start to apply for citizenship.

But because I strongly favor immigration, I also favor a high fence — if not a physical one, then at least a tamperproof national ID card for every American, without which you could not get a legal job or access to government services. We will not sustain a majority in favor of flexible immigration if we can't control our borders.

Good fences make good immigration policy. Fences make people more secure and able to think through this issue more calmly. Porous borders empower only anti-immigrant demagogues, like the shameful CNN, which dumbs down the whole debate.

We also need to control the influx of immigrants because one byproduct of the flattening of the world is that many decent low-end factory jobs previously open to someone with only a high school degree or less are now disappearing. As Dan Pink notes in his book, "A Whole New Mind," many of those jobs can now be done faster by a computer or cheaper by a Chinese worker. Therefore, we can't just endlessly expand our pool of manual labor without condemning people at that low end, particularly black men, to a future of declining wages or unemployment. That will have terrible social consequences.

For all these reasons, I weigh each immigration proposal with two questions: "Does it offer a real fence? Does it offer a real gate?"

TAX:

SoCal Anti-tax Crusader Sentenced To 27 Months In Prison (AP)

AP, April 5, 2006

LOS ANGELES – Nationally known anti-tax crusader George Henry "Nick" Jesson will serve 27 months in prison for tax fraud, a judge has ruled.

U.S. District Judge Percy Anderson on Monday also ordered Jesson, 55, to pay $215,454 in restitution to the federal government. The Fountain Valley resident, who ran for California governor in 2002, was taken into custody after his sentencing.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Sandra Brown said she believes the sentence was "wholly appropriate" and would deter others from considering anti-tax protests.

Jesson's wife, Trina Thi Vu, declined to comment after the sentencing, as did her attorney, citing pending state tax charges against the couple. Jesson's attorney, Robert Barnes of Malibu, could not be reached for comment.

Jesson pleaded guilty last June to filing a false federal tax form in May 2000. He had stated that his Huntington Beach company, No Time Delay Electronics, paid no wages in 1997 when he actually paid wages of $177,083 that year to himself and $273,236 to his wife. He also admitted to falsely obtaining a business tax refund of $215,454.

Jesson and his wife face trial in state court on six felony counts of failing to pay taxes on $3 million in income from 1997 to 1999. Jesson could get nine more years in prison and his wife a seven-year sentence if they're convicted of all counts.

Jesson ran for governor on an anti-tax platform and finished fourth of seven candidates in the 2002 Republican primary.

He was involved with an organization called "We the People for Constitutional Education," which contended that paying taxes is not required in the United States. He dared tax agents to try to collect from him and described raids on his home and business as "terrorist attacks."

Last month, he didn't show up for his scheduled sentencing on federal tax fraud charges. He was taken into custody after his wife told federal marshals he had left the house that morning despondent and possibly with a weapon.

Tax Preparers Come Under Fire (WSJ)

By Tom Herman And Robert Guy Matthews

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

A new government report highlights persistent problems of tax preparers cheating on clients' returns, sparking calls among leading senators to fast-track proposed legislation that would further regulate the tax-preparation industry.

The report by the Government Accountability Office was presented yesterday at a Senate Finance Committee hearing in Washington into tax-preparation issues. The report detailed undercover visits by government investigators to 19 outlets of several commercial tax-preparation chains, which weren't identified. Staffers posed as taxpayers and asked the firms to prepare -- but not file -- federal returns under two scenarios. In 10 of the 19 cases, preparers failed to report side income that had been supplied by the taxpayer, the GAO report said. Some preparers also missed key tax-saving opportunities, such as neglecting to itemize deductions or failing to claim all available deductions, it said.

GAO officials noted the survey was narrow and shouldn't be used to generalize about the industry. Still, senators said the results were disturbing and strengthened the case for new legislation. The report comes on top of other GAO studies in recent years suggesting that a number of taxpayers who relied on paid preparers may have paid too much in taxes because of overlooked tax breaks.

More than 60% of all individual income-tax returns are signed by paid preparers, up from 46% in the mid-1980s, said Sen. Chuck Grassley, the committee chairman. Industry experts estimate the number of tax preparers nationwide is in the range of 1.2 million to 1.6 million. Among them are highly trained certified public accountants, lawyers and enrolled agents, all of whom already face regulation from the Internal Revenue Service. At the other end are storefronts staffed by part-timers with little or no training. Proposed legislation is aimed at bringing these and many other paid preparers under the IRS's regulatory wing. In most states, "anyone can be a paid preparer regardless of education, training or licensure," the GAO said.

H&R Block Inc., the nation's biggest tax-preparation chain, says it runs a 66-hour tax course and administers a test to prospective hires. The firm said it also maintains continuing education programs from year to year. The GAO report didn't identify any of the firms its investigators visited in their survey.

In recent years, the IRS has been turning up the heat on fraudulent preparers as part of a broad-based attack on tax cheating and dodging. At the same time, the IRS has been cracking down on CPAs, lawyers and others involved in complex tax shelters.

Industry experts say tax preparers sometimes receive payment in the form of a percentage of any tax refund, which can give the preparer an incentive to magnify tax breaks. Other preparers may be eager to maintain customer loyalty, or to sell them additional products, such as instant refund loans or audit insurance.

The GAO report found a range of faulty practices. Of tax preparers surveyed, there were "unwarranted extra refunds" of nearly $2,000 in five cases, while in two cases the preparers cost the taxpayer more than $1,500. Had these problems been spotted by the IRS on real returns, "many of the preparers would have been subject to penalties" for such things as negligence and willful or reckless disregard of tax rules. But taxpayers would be on the hook for underpayments and interest, plus possibly penalties.

Senators said the vast majority of tax preparers do a fine job. But "we are getting reports that an increasing minority is doing a disservice to the American public -- some through bad advice, some through incompetence, and some through taking advantage of the public by unscrupulous means," Sen. Grassley said.

He said the hearing should "provide new momentum" to a regulatory bill pending in the Senate that he backs, along with Sen. Max Baucus, the committee's ranking Democrat. The bill would give the IRS Office of Professional Responsibility, which currently regulates CPAs, tax lawyers and others, additional oversight of all paid tax preparers. The bill would begin requiring exams and imposing continuing education requirements. It also would require "non-monetary sanctions," such as suspension or termination, for failure to comply with the regulations.

"The GAO study raises important points regarding returns preparers and the tax system. The facts presented in the study show the need for simplification of the tax code," the IRS said.

A TAX-LAW GLITCH attracts growing attention.

Part of a law enacted in 2004 was supposed to simplify and streamline the definition of a "child" for tax purposes. But that law created "unintended consequences," a Treasury official said. For example, some upper-income households now qualify for tax breaks they weren't supposed to get, and some low-income people have lost valuable benefits.

Rep. Lloyd Doggett, a Texas Democrat, says he plans to introduce a bill soon to clean up the mess, effective for the 2006 tax year. The Treasury also has proposed a legislative remedy.

Referring to the 2004 law, Rep. Doggett says: "This is an excellent reminder that some attempts to simplify the tax code offer an overly simple answer that is simply unfair."

BRIEFS: The IRS expects to receive more than 9.6 million forms for automatic six-month extensions this year, according to a recent publication. ... IRS Commissioner Mark Everson says even he gets a bit nervous when he gets a letter from the IRS. "I still get a little twitch when I go home and find an envelope in the mail with 'Internal Revenue Service' on it," Mr. Everson told the Yale Alumni Magazine. "And all it is is some personnel notice, saying that there's been a change in my dental benefits."

Some Tax Preparers Don't Add Up (WP)

By Albert B. Crenshaw

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0025627

Commercial tax preparers made errors, sometimes amounting to more than $1,000 in incorrect refunds and overpayments, in 100 percent of returns brought to them by a government agency seeking to test the accuracy of work done by large chain tax-preparation firms.

The study by the Government Accountability Office was small -- only 19 returns, which the GAO cautioned cannot be used to generalize to the entire commercial return-preparation industry -- but on only two returns did the preparer produce what the agency determined was the right amount. And even those two had mistakes, though they did not affect the final tax amount.

In five cases, paid preparers produced returns showing improper refunds of nearly $2,000 each, and in two cases, the returns would have had taxpayers paying more than $1,500 unnecessarily.

The agency reported its finding to the Senate Finance Committee at a hearing yesterday and urged taxpayers to be careful in choosing tax preparers.

GAO workers posed in nine cases as a plumber and his family and in 10 cases as a low-income single mother with wages from retail sales and side income from baby-sitting. The agency, with staff members from the Senate Finance Committee and Joint Tax Committee, went over both scenarios and agreed on what the correct refunds would be.

The preparers were not identified. They were described as outlets "of several commercial chain preparers scattered throughout a metropolitan area." All the preparers in the study were what the Internal Revenue Service calls "unenrolled preparers" who have not passed an examination or worked for the IRS. There are 300,000 to 600,000 such preparers. More than half of the 130 million returns filed each year are done by paid preparers, and in most states anyone can go into that business without special training or a license.

The GAO noted that several hundred thousand certified public accountants and lawyers are authorized to practice before the IRS and that another group of about 41,000, known as enrolled agents, must pass an examination or have worked for the IRS.

The GAO found that in 10 cases the preparers did not include business income. In five cases, the preparers did not ask where the taxpayers' children lived or ignored the GAO worker's explanation and incorrectly claimed the earned-income tax credit, meant to help low-income workers and their children.

In three of nine cases in which the taxpayer could have claimed a credit for higher education, the preparers did not do so, and in seven of nine cases in which itemizing would have helped, the preparers either did not do so or left off some deductible expenses. Seven of the 19 returns reported too many personal exemptions, while eight of 19 reported state tax refunds incorrectly.

"Had these problems been discovered by the IRS on real returns, IRS officials said that many of the preparers would have been subject to penalties for such things as negligence and willful or reckless disregard of tax rules," the GAO report said.

"Americans have a right to expect that when they hire a tax preparer they're going to get honest, straightforward advice," Finance Committee Chairman Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa) said in a written statement. "Unfortunately, too often that isn't the case."

The GAO urged taxpayers to take "common-sense steps," such as checking with friends and relatives for recommendations and making sure that preparers understands their circumstances and reviews their tax documents.

The IRS Web site (http://www.irs.gov/) also has tips for choosing a tax preparer. Type "choosing a tax preparer" into the search field.

Big Gain For Rich Seen In Tax Cuts For Investments (NYT)

By David Cay Johnston

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

The first data to document the effect of President Bush's tax cuts for investment income show that they have significantly lowered the tax burden on the richest Americans, reducing taxes on incomes of more than $10 million by an average of about $500,000.

An analysis of Internal Revenue Service data by The New York Times found that the benefit of the lower taxes on investments was far more concentrated on the very wealthiest Americans than the benefits of Mr. Bush's two previous tax cuts: on wages and other noninvestment income.

When Congress cut investment taxes three years ago, it was clear that the highest-income Americans would gain the most, because they had the most money in investments. But the size of the cuts and what share goes to each income group have not been known.

As Congress debates whether to make the Bush tax cuts permanent, The Times analyzed I.R.S. figures for 2003, the latest year available and the first that reflected the tax cuts for income from dividends and from the sale of stock and other assets, known as capital gains.

The analysis found the following:

¶Among taxpayers with incomes greater than $10 million, the amount by which their investment tax bill was reduced averaged about $500,000 in 2003, and total tax savings, which included the two Bush tax cuts on compensation, nearly doubled, to slightly more than $1 million.

¶These taxpayers, whose average income was $26 million, paid about the same share of their income in income taxes as those making $200,000 to $500,000 because of the lowered rates on investment income.

¶Americans with annual incomes of $1 million or more, about one-tenth of 1 percent all taxpayers, reaped 43 percent of all the savings on investment taxes in 2003. The savings for these taxpayers averaged about $41,400 each. By comparison, these same Americans received less than 10 percent of the savings from the other Bush tax cuts, which applied primarily to wages, though that share is expected to grow in coming years.

¶The savings from the investment tax cuts are expected to be larger in subsequent years because of gains in the stock market.

The Times showed the new numbers to people on various sides of the debate over tax cuts. Stephen J. Entin, president of the Institute for Research on the Economics of Taxation, a Washington organization, and other supporters of the cuts said they did not go far enough because the more money the wealthiest had to invest, the more would go to investments that produce jobs. For investment income, Mr. Entin said, "the proper tax rate would be zero."

Opponents say the cuts are too generous to those who already have plenty. Representative Charles B. Rangel of New York, the senior Democrat on the House Ways and Means Committee, said after seeing the new figures that "these tax cuts are beyond irresponsible" when "we're in a war; we haven't fixed Social Security or Medicare; we've got record deficits."

Because of the tax cuts, even the merely rich, making hundreds of thousands of dollars a year, are falling behind the very wealthiest, particularly because another provision, the alternative minimum tax, now costs many of them thousands and even tens of thousands of dollars a year in lost deductions.

About 3.5 million taxpayers filing their returns for last year are being hit by the alternative tax. But that figure will balloon this year to at least 19 million taxpayers, making as little as about $30,000, unless Congress restores a law that limited its effects until now, according to the Tax Policy Center in Washington, a joint project of the Brookings Institution and the Urban Institute, whose estimates the White House has declared reasonable.

The tax cut analysis was based on estimates from a computer model developed by Citizens for Tax Justice, which asserts that the tax system unfairly favors the rich. The group's estimates are considered reliable by advocates on differing sides of the tax debate. The Times, which also did its own analysis, asked the group to use the model to produce additional data on the effect of the investment tax cuts on various income groups. The analyses show that more than 70 percent of the tax savings on investment income went to the top 2 percent, about 2.6 million taxpayers.

By contrast, few taxpayers with modest incomes benefited because most of them who own stocks held them in retirement accounts, which are not eligible for the investment income tax cuts. Money in these accounts is not taxed until withdrawal, when the higher rates on wages apply.

Those making less than $50,000 saved an average of $10 more because of the investment tax cuts, for a total of $435 in total income tax cuts, according to the computer model.

During last week's debate on whether to restore limits on the alternative minimum tax or make permanent the cuts in investment income taxes, House leaders chose as their spokesman Representative David L. Camp, a Michigan Republican. He said Republicans favored continuing investment tax cuts because that would help more people and would especially benefit those making less than $100,000.

"Nearly 60 percent of the taxpayers with incomes less than $100,000 had income from capital gains and dividends," he said on the House floor.

But I.R.S. data show that among the 90 percent of all taxpayers who made less than $100,000, dividend tax reductions benefited just one in seven and capital gains reductions one in 20.

Mr. Camp, who had said in an interview that his figures were correct, said Monday through a spokesman that he had been misinformed by the staff of the House Ways and Means Committee. But his office said he supported making the investment tax cuts permanent because cutting these rates was "good policy and good for our economy."

President Bush, in his budget, urged Congress to make permanent the reduced taxes on investment income. He also proposed limiting the effects of the alternative minimum tax through next year, saying a permanent solution "is best addressed within the context of fundamental tax reform."

The Congressional Budget Office estimated that making the investment tax cuts permanent would cost the government $197 billion over 10 years. But advocates of eliminating taxes on investments say there is no cost to the government because lowering taxes on such income encourages more investment, which should lead to more and higher-paying jobs. Taxes on wages from those jobs should more than offset the tax savings to investors, said Mr. Entin, an advocate of eliminating taxes on most investment income as a way of promoting economic growth.

However, the Congressional Research Service, an arm of Congress that analyzes issues, concluded in a January report that lower taxes on investment income may translate into lower savings because people need fewer investments to earn the same after-tax income. In another report, the research service showed how lower taxes on investment income can encourage investment outside the United States, creating jobs, but not for Americans.

The Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, which advocates for the poor, and several mainstream policy research organizations say the investment tax cuts will have insignificant positive effects and may even damage long-term economic growth by contributing to soaring budget deficits. In an era of budget deficits, "the net effect is a wash or may even be negative," said Robert Greenstein, the executive director of the center.

There have been three tax cuts for individuals under President Bush. The top tax rate on compensation was trimmed twice and is now 35 percent, from 39.6 percent when President Bush took office. Most compensation also faces a 1.45 percent Medicare tax, which is matched by the employer, making the effective federal tax rate on high earners 37.9 percent.

Then, the top rate for most investment income was reduced to 15 percent in 2003, from the 39.6 percent for dividends and 20 percent for profits on asset sales that were in effect when Mr. Bush took office.

A result is that the wealthiest Americans now pay much higher direct taxes on money they work for than on money that works for them.

Wealthiest American Families Add To Their Share Of U.S. Net Worth (WSJ)

By Chriatopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The share of net worth held by the wealthiest 1% of American families rose slightly after inflation between 2001 and 2004, according to new figures from the Federal Reserve.

The top 1% held 33.4% of the nation's net worth in 2004, up from 32.7% in 2001, but still lower than a peak of 34.6% in 1995. Although the increase from 2001 is small, the data suggest that the upper strata, who saw their share of net worth decline between 1998 and 2001 as stock prices crashed, regained some of those losses by 2004.

The new figures on net worth -- the difference between assets and liabilities -- come from the Fed's Survey of Consumer Finances, a triennial survey based on interviews of 4,522 families that excludes those listed on the Forbes 400 list of wealthy individuals. Fed economist Arthur Kennickell noted that some respondents interviewed in the survey had wealth greater than the lowest value on the Forbes list, however.

The survey identified 715 families in the top 1%, corresponding to 1.1 million nationwide, and said the minimum net worth for the group was $6 million. In 2004, the wealthiest percent owned 70% of bonds, 51% of stocks and 62.3% of business assets.

After the richest 1%, the Fed found that the next wealthiest 9% of families held 36.1% of net worth in 2004, down from 37.1% in 2001. Below them, families in the top 50% to 90% held 27.9% of net worth in 2004, a slight increase from 2001, while families in the bottom half saw their share fall to 2.5% of net worth in 2004 from 2.8% in 2001.

Between 1989 and 2004, the figures show, families in the top 1% saw their share of net worth rise to 33.4% from 30.1%, while families in the bottom half saw their share fall to 2.5% from 3%. In the report, Mr. Kennickell noted that "wealth moved in relative terms to the upper half of the distribution during this time."

The rising slice of net worth for those at the very top between 2001 and 2004 didn't come because the super-rich acquired a greater share of stocks, cars or houses. In fact, the share of assets held by the top 1% held steady at 29.5% during the period.

Mr. Kennickell noted that it is difficult to pinpoint exactly why the top 1% gained a greater share of net worth between 2001 and 2004, because their share of assets was unchanged and their share of debt grew.

The survey found that 25% of those in the lowest 25% of net worth said they spent more than they earned in 2004, while only 6% of those in the top 1% said they did.

"A possible explanation of the decline for the lowest wealth group might be changes in their use of debt," Mr. Kennickell wrote.

Is Reliance On Real Estate A Crack In The Foundation? (WP)

By Neil Irwin

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

The U.S. economy is more dependent on housing than it has been in a half-century, as the sector fuels consumer spending and has accounted for nearly three-quarters of the nation's job growth in the past five years.

DOJ_NMG_0025630

As a result, economists worry that the housing slowdown that began late last year could hurt the broader economy more than past real estate downturns, although other parts of the economy appear to be accelerating.

What makes the real estate boom of the past decade unusual is that its effects have reverberated far beyond closely related sectors such as construction, driving sales in places as varied as furniture stores and motorcycle showrooms, especially in the Washington area and others where home prices have soared particularly rapidly.

"People know they can always refinance or flip their houses, so they are willing to spend more," said Matt Ross, sales manager at Coleman PowerSports in Falls Church, who figures that at least 20 percent of his sales of motorcycles, motor boats, and jet skis are to people who pay for their purchase using home equity.

By almost any measure, the U.S. economy is built on housing more than in the past. In 2005, investment in housing constituted a higher proportion of the goods and services the nation produced than it has since 1950, when the nation was experiencing a massive postwar housing boom. The proportion of jobs in real-estate-related fields is the highest it has been since at least 1970.

Locally, there is strong job growth in sectors other than housing. The value of home transactions in the region was nearly as high as federal procurement spending in the region last year, though each dollar spent by the government generates significantly more economic activity. But Washington area residents took more money out of their houses through mortgage refinancing and home equity loans, as a proportion of income, than those in most other cities, which could mean local consumers' spending has depended more on housing than in most places.

Now the companies that have benefited from this expansion are bracing for the great unwinding. The nation appears to be entering a period in which the role of housing in the economy is returning to something more resembling its historical norms.

A small group of economists argue that housing prices in many parts of the nation, including the Washington area, have so outstripped those supported by economic fundamentals, such as income levels, that they are due for a painful and rapid correction that could cause a recession. But most mainstream economists believe that the unwinding of the housing market's outsize role in the economy will be gradual and come just as other industries take over as economic drivers.

Nationally, the number of homes sold declined every month from August to January, according to the National Association of Realtors. Builders started work on 4.8 percent fewer units of housing in February than a year earlier, following years of sharp increases in construction.

So far, the housing slump appears not to have caused much economic distress, but the consensus of Wall Street economists' predictions is that growth will slow in the second half of the year, in part due to the housing slowdown.

"Clearly, housing is going to be a drag on the economy; the question is how much does housing slow and how quickly," said Dean Baker, co-director of the Center for Economic and Policy Research and a certified housing bear who expects a housing slump that will lead to recession.

A more common view among economists is that a cooling in the housing market would be only a mild drain on the economy.

"There will be losses in housing-related sectors, but I think other sectors will take up the slack," said Eugenio J. Aleman, a senior economist with Wells Fargo & Co.

Even if he's right, a housing slowdown could have ripple effects down to the corner paint store. Monarch Paint and Wallcovering Co., with three stores in the District, has benefited more than most from the long boom in housing, with double-digit-percentage sales increases in 2003 and 2004, said President Victor K. Krause. Those good times led the company to increase its staff 10 percent and spend about $75,000 a year on new computer systems, paint-mixing machines and other capital expenditures.

Sales growth has slowed in recent months, Krause said, which he figures is due to fewer people buying new houses and apartments they wish to have painted. If the pattern continues and sales growth slows further or stops, he plans to hold off on any new capital expenditures or hiring. "You reinvest those extra dollars that come in," Krause said, "but you don't do that if the dollars aren't there."

Real estate helped pick up the job-market slack that resulted when the high-tech bubble burst five years ago, saving the region from the severe economic slowdown some predicted. Marla Selko, for example, worked in sales for a company that provided online education services until investors in her old employer pulled its funding during the tech collapse. Looking for work in 2002, she decided to start a business that refers people to home remodeling and other contractors, called Urban Referrals, which has been fueled in part by the strong housing market.

The question is whether another engine will come in and replace housing. The Washington area is better positioned than much of the nation in that regard. Nationally, real-estate-related industries accounted for 74 percent of new jobs over the past five years. Locally, they account for only 21 percent, because in the Washington area other sectors have grown faster.

At the end of 2005, 11 percent of Washington area jobs were held by real estate brokers, construction workers, mortgage brokers or otherwise tied to real estate, according to an analysis of Labor Department data by Moody's Economy.com. That's the highest level in the 35 years the data go back.

Indeed, there were more than 12,000 members of the Northern Virginia Association of Realtors at the end of last year, twice as many as in 2001. "If the volume of business declines just a little bit, there won't be enough business to support that many people," said Dave Hawkins, managing broker of McEnearney Associates Inc. in Alexandria, who expects those numbers to eventually drop.

There are other ways housing has influenced the economy that could leave the region vulnerable.

Economists call one the wealth effect. It's the degree to which rising prices of homes (or, in the late 1990s, stocks) lead to people spending more than they would otherwise. It's notoriously hard to measure, and economists can only guess at its exact scope, but it works through different ways. For one, when people see their house appreciating sharply, some feel less need to save as much as they would otherwise, resulting in more money to spend on everything else. For another, rising home prices and low interest rates have led many Americans to refinance their mortgages or take out home equity loans, giving them more money to spend.

Economy.com figures that mortgage refinancing put money in Washington area residents' pockets equivalent to 14.5 percent of personal disposable income. That's the 14th-highest rate among major metropolitan areas, behind mostly cities in California and Florida.

"Those economies where housing has gone skyward are most vulnerable as housing comes back down to earth," said Mark Zandi, the consulting firm's chief economist.

Despite the risks ahead, some businesses that have benefited from the housing boom say they are confident that they will keep growing even as housing slows.

Case Design/Remodeling Inc., in Bethesda, has doubled to 300 employees since 2001, fueled in part by homeowners' confidence in investing in their homes and cheap money available through mortgage refinancing and home equity loans.

President Mark Richardson said he is confident that business will keep growing strongly even with the housing slump, as people hire his company to make improvements to their current homes rather than buying a new place.

So what happened in 1989, the last time the housing market entered a slump? "Oh, that was painful," said Richardson, who had to cut his staff as sales of remodeling services declined. "The market dropped off so dramatically and so quickly. People became very gun-shy. But then during that era, you had home appreciations that were double-digit in the 1980s, and all of a sudden, it went into negative territory. It made people say 'time out' and not want to do anything."

Fed Debate On 2000 Tech Bust Holds Lesson On Current Risks (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Federal Reserve officials remained bullish on technology spending through most of 2000 even as a massive bust got under way, and may have delayed easing monetary policy for fear of reinflating stock and bond markets, newly released transcripts show.

Transcripts of the Fed's deliberations through 2000, released with the customary lag yesterday, offer some lessons for today. Like in 2000, the Fed has been raising interest rates to stave off inflation. In 2000, the economy was being propelled by surging tech spending and high stock prices. Housing plays a similar role today. An important difference is that in part because of the lessons of 2000, the Fed is on the alert for any downdraft in housing.

The stock market peaked in March 2000, then began to decline with a brief rebound in August. Tech orders peaked that summer, and tech shipments at the end of the year. Still, as late as October, Fed officials remained bullish on spending in the sector.

In June 2000, then-Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan acknowledged that the economy had begun to slow, but from an unsustainable pace.

That August, David Stockton, the Fed's research director, said there was little sign of "an appreciable dent in the demand for equipment and software. It just doesn't look like this boom is about to dissipate any time soon."

In retrospect, a multiyear tech boom peaked at about that time. Business equipment spending grew at double digits in the second quarter of 2000, then screeched to a halt in the third. It was the first of eight quarters of negligible growth, or declines, in equipment spending. That slump was the main cause of the recession that ran from March to November of 2001.

By October 2000, some leading tech companies began to warn of disappointing sales. "Is there something there that those companies are seeing that we're not seeing?" William Poole, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis, asked. Mr. Stockton replied it was probably noise while acknowledging he was "nervous."

According to the transcripts, Mr. Greenspan wasn't worried. "There is nothing terribly significant going on in the economy excluding energy," he said.

The Fed had last raised short-term rates in May, to 6.5%. Thereafter, the "balance of risks" in its post-meeting statements were tilted to risks of inflation, suggesting a rate increase was more likely than a rate cut. But even as a slowdown became apparent, officials were reluctant to change that. They thought tight labor markets and high energy prices threatened to raise inflation.

Mr. Greenspan said even if the risks were balanced, saying so risked sending markets higher, creating "financial conditions that would be too easy."

Fed Governor Edward Gramlich agreed that "it is certainly possible that this would spark a rally and I don't think anybody wants to see that," but nonetheless suggested the change ought to be made.

That December, Mr. Greenspan acknowledged that growth had "unambiguously moved down dramatically." A few weeks later, the Fed began to cut rates.

Stocks Rise On Hopes Of More Mergers (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, April 5, 2006

NEW YORK — The possibility of increased merger activity boosted stocks Tuesday and pushed the Nasdaq composite index to a five-year high.

With Citigroup freed to pursue expansion by federal regulators and Computer Sciences putting itself up for sale, investors were cheered by the potential for M&A activity to remain strong through the rest of the year.

However, there were no new economic reports or major corporate earnings, and some investors held off from making big bets ahead of Friday's Labor Department report on job creation, a key barometer of economic health.

“There's fairly widespread anticipation that the economic numbers this week will be solid, though not great,” says Hugh Johnson, chief investment officer at Johnson Illington Advisors. “The market is reflecting that.”

The Nasdaq gained 8.62 points, or 0.4%, to 2345.36 for its best close since Feb. 16, 2001. However, its gain for the day actually trailed the other two major U.S. stock indexes. The Dow Jones industrial average rose 58.91 points, or 0.5%, to 11,203.85, and the Standard & Poor's 500 index added 8.12 points, or 0.6%, to 1305.93.

In company news, Citigroup gained 80 cents to $48.21 after the Federal Reserve Bank of New York lifted a yearlong ban on acquisitions as the financial conglomerate worked to improve its internal compliance programs.

Meanwhile, Computer Sciences rose $2.51 to $59.80 on news that it plans to examine “strategic alternatives” — including a sale of the company — while also cutting 5,000 jobs, or 6% of its workforce, over the next two years.

The potential for increased M&A deals comes as the Federal Reserve is expected to wind down its current program of rate increases. While another increase is expected in May, bringing the benchmark fed funds target rate to 5%, halting rate increases soon after could prompt companies to renew their acquisition efforts, knowing that rates for borrowing would be stable.

“The next phase of the market is in M&A activity, and the Fed moving to the sidelines will help with that,” says Joe Keating, chief investment officer at First American Asset Management. “So I think investors can still stay in the market and put their money to work.”

3M climbed $1.16 to $77. The company said it would sell its pharmaceutical business that makes products related to dermatology, women's health and cardiology.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Snow Gets Muted Bush Support, Fueling Talk He Will Leave Soon (WSJ)

By John D. McKinnon

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush, fueling speculation that Treasury Secretary John Snow will depart soon, offered only muted support for the former railroad executive when asked whether he is likely to survive an expected staff shake-up.

With Mr. Snow sitting next to him at a conference on health savings accounts, Mr. Bush said the Treasury secretary "has been a valuable member of my administration, and I trust his judgment and appreciate his service." But he said nothing to squash widespread talk that Mr. Snow is likely to be replaced.

The president is awaiting recommendations from new White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten for a reorganization.

DOJ_NMG_0025633

There has been widespread speculation for months that Mr. Snow, who succeeded Paul O'Neill in February 2003, will leave before the end of this year.

One person familiar with Mr. Snow's thinking said the secretary has told acquaintances that at some point before the end of the president's term, he plans to return to the private sector, possibility before year end. Mr. Snow is said to be keenly interested in influencing the choice of successor.

The secretary is seen largely as a public spokesman for the president's economic policies, rather than a major force in shaping them. His defenders in the administration say this White House, unlike some earlier ones, simply has never surrendered control over the president's domestic agenda to any cabinet secretary. Mr. Snow is, however, credited for effectively handling the administration's stance toward China on its currency regime.

The perception that the Treasury post is weaker than it was when Robert Rubin or Lawrence Summers held it in Bill Clinton's years or when James Baker held it in Ronald Reagan's administration could make it hard for the administration to replace Mr. Snow with that kind of high-profile Wall Street or corporate executive.

"People from outside do not want to come in to be Treasury secretary if they are not going to have responsibility, and this administration has not given responsibility to agencies," said Peter Wallison, a former Reagan administration official who is a fellow at the American Enterprise Institute. "That's been one of the problems from the beginning, and Treasury has been one of the principal victims."

One potential candidate, Henry Paulson, chief executive of Goldman Sachs Group, has little interest in the job and instead wants to aid environmental causes when he leaves the firm, according to a person familiar with his thinking.

So there has been speculation recently that Mr. Bush might turn to an insider should he decide to replace Mr. Snow. One possibility that has surfaced recently is to pick Allan Hubbard, director of the White House National Economic Council, a longtime friend of the president whose profile has risen lately as he pushes his approach to changing the American health-care system. But some Republicans close to the White House believe that Mr. Hubbard, an Indiana businessman, might not enjoy the heavy diet of speeches and public events that comes with the job, preferring his largely behind-the-scenes role.

Other possibilities include U.S. Trade Representative Rob Portman, a former Ohio congressman; and Steve Friedman, a former Goldman Sachs executive whom Mr. Hubbard succeeded at the National Economic Council.

Treasury Secretary Is Said To Be Thinking Of Quitting (NYT)

By Elisabeth Bumiller

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON, April 4 — Treasury Secretary John W. Snow has expressed interest in leaving his job in the next several months, a person close to him said Tuesday, as speculation raced through Washington that the White House was seeking Mr. Snow's replacement.

President Bush did little to tamp down the talk after a morning meeting about health care in the Roosevelt Room, where he responded with a tepid endorsement to a question about whether Mr. Snow would stay. The Treasury secretary was in the room as the president spoke.

"Secretary Snow is here at the table," Mr. Bush said. "He's been a part of this discussion. I'm glad you brought him up. He has been a valuable member of my administration, and I trust his judgment and appreciate his service."

When Mr. Bush has been asked in the past about whether Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld would remain in his job, he has spoken out more forcefully and enthusiastically.

Several prominent Republicans who consult regularly with the White House said on Tuesday that Joshua B. Bolten, the president's incoming chief of staff, was interested in a replacement for Mr. Snow who could more powerfully communicate the administration's message that the American economy is strong.

Another Republican who is in close contact with the West Wing staff said White House officials were expecting Mr. Snow to step down.

"They're waiting for Snow to do the right thing," the Republican said. "They thought he would have gotten the message right now and submitted his resignation."

The Republicans and the person close to Mr. Snow were granted anonymity to discuss private deliberations and thinking within the administration.

Mr. Snow's spokesman, Tony Fratto, declined to comment.

Speculation about Mr. Snow's departure has ebbed and flowed for more than a year but has intensified since Mr. Bush announced last week that Mr. Bolten would be his new chief of staff. Mr. Bolten, who once worked at Goldman Sachs, is said to be interested in filling the Treasury post with someone from Wall Street who could help reassure financial markets worried about record-high budget and trade deficits.

DOJ_NMG_0025634

Although Mr. Bush has been resistant to a Treasury secretary from the investment and financial worlds, Republicans say that he is less so now and that he recognizes that his economic team needs more credibility.

Names circulating in Republican circles as possibilities for the Treasury job include Stanley O'Neal, the chairman and chief executive of Merrill Lynch, and Henry M. Paulson Jr., the chief executive of Goldman Sachs.

Some Republicans questioned whether either man would be seriously interested in the Treasury post, which in this White House has not been the powerhouse position it was when Robert E. Rubin held it under President Bill Clinton.

Mr. Bush's Treasury secretaries — Paul H. O'Neill, the former chief executive of Alcoa, was Mr. Snow's predecessor — have not had their own voices on economic matters and have been effectively subordinate to Karl Rove, the president's political adviser and deputy chief of staff. Although Mr. Bolten has told associates that he wants to overhaul his economic team, it is unclear if he wants to change its basic structure.

Mr. Snow, who has been in the job for three years, has long said he will return to the private sector at an appropriate time. The person close to Mr. Snow who said that the secretary was interested in stepping down in the next several months appeared to be reflecting that thinking, but also appeared to be defensively positioning Mr. Snow so that any resignation could be portrayed as his own.

In his remarks in the Roosevelt Room, Mr. Bush indicated that he had given Mr. Bolten a strong hand to reorganize the White House, but only so far as he approved. Republicans have criticized the departing chief of staff, Andrew H. Card Jr., as fatigued and slow to react to national crises over the past year, including Hurricane Katrina.

"I told Josh that he is — will organize the White House in such a way that he is comfortable with and that meets my needs," Mr. Bush said. "And my needs are to have good, crisp information so I can make decisions on behalf of the American people."

Mr. Bolten is to take over on April 14, and the president said he looked forward to his recommendations on "how to get this White House for the last two and a half years of my administration to continue to function in an effective way."

When DeLay Talks, People Could Pay (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Tex.), who is no longer running for reelection and is leaving Congress shortly, should do well in the private sector -- as long as he doesn't get convicted of anything serious. The immensely profitable -- ask Bill Clinton -- speaking circuit awaits, along with perhaps a book, teaching, a radio talk show and whatnot.

In addition, he's eligible for a pension of a bit over one-third of his $183,500 majority leader's salary, or about $65,000 a year, complete with health benefits and cost-of-living adjustments.

Five House members have recently introduced pension-revocation legislation for convicted felons, and the House Administration Committee will be taking up that issue among others tomorrow when it considers a lobby reform package.

All five lawmakers are Republicans. Apparently no House Democrat has introduced such a bill. That may be, a colleague suggests, because Republicans can't imagine themselves as scofflaws; Democrats know themselves better.4-Finger Salute

Loop Fans have been asking why we didn't use the actual photo of Justice Antonin Scalia 's controversial gesture last week to respond to a question from Boston Herald reporter Laurel J. Sweet .

Scalia, leaving a special Mass for lawyers, was asked how he responds to people who questioned his impartiality on church-state cases.

Scalia flicked his fingers out from under his chin in what the Herald's reporter called an obscene gesture and Scalia insisted was not. Experts and members of the Soprano family in Jersey were divided on the issue.

A glitch in the purchase delayed the photo's arrival in time for Monday's column. But the photo of the justice as he completes his courtly response is not to be missed.The Nearly Departed

If Treasury Secretary John W. Snow doesn't know he's outta there, he might want to study President Bush 's response to a reporter's question yesterday at a health-care meeting about whether Snow is "expected to stay on."

"Secretary Snow is here at the table," Bush said. "He's been a part of this discussion." [Note past tense.] "I'm glad you brought him up." [No doubt.] "He has been a valuable member of my administration [Past tense again.], and I trust his judgment and appreciate his service. [It's been great.]"

Then, Bush almost, almost did it again. " Andrew Card , my longtime friend, a person who will go down in the annals as one," Bush paused, "a really fine chief of White House in the history of the White House." You just know he was going to say "one heckuva" chief of staff.The Departing

The No. 1 reading material on the Condoleezza Rice - Jack Straw tour to Iraq this week was the book "Cobra II," an inside account of the Iraq war by Michael R. Gordon and Bernard E. Trainor .

Both U.S. and British officials accompanying the secretary of state and the British foreign secretary were engrossed in reading it as they flew back and forth to Baghdad from England. The book contains an appendix with a series of secret British memos critical of the U.S. occupation, written by diplomat John Sawers , who just happened to be part of the Rice-Straw meetings in Iraq.

The book also recounts how British officers were appalled when Gen. Tommy Franks showed his officers the movie "Gladiator" before the invasion to inspire them.Ill Literacy

Samuel H. Abramoff had asked Lapin for an award -- so he could get into the Cosmos Club -- and Abramoff reportedly claimed on his biography that he had received such an award.

So do we believe a claim by Abramoff, a man who Silver says is "an admitted felon and forger"? Well, since he puts it that way, no, we believe Silver. No award.

Bush Eager To Hear Ideas From Bolten (AP-Y2)

By Deb Riechmann

AP2, April 4, 2006

President Bush dodged questions Tuesday about whether he would keep Treasury Secretary John Snow in his Cabinet but said he was eager to hear recommendations for change from his new chief of staff.

Some staff changes are expected when Joshua Bolten, currently the budget director, moves into the West Wing to replace Andy Card, who has been chief of staff since Bush became president. Card's last day is April 14.

Republicans have urged Bush to make major staff changes to reinvigorate the administration and lift his approval ratings from record lows.

"I told Josh that he is — will organize the White House in such a way that he is comfortable with and that meets my needs," said Bush. "And my needs are to have good, crisp information so I can make decisions on behalf of the American people."

Republicans close to the White House say they expect changes in Bush's communications, congressional relations and domestic policy shops. The political team, led by deputy chief of staff Karl Rove, is believed to be immune to change.

Critics have complained that Snow has not convinced the public that the economy is on a healthy upswing. Rumors about his departure created an awkward moment for Bush in the Roosevelt Room, where Bush discussed his initiative for health savings accounts. When a reporter asked Bush whether Snow was expected to remain in the Cabinet, the president noted that Snow was in the room.

"Secretary Snow is here at the table," Bush said. "He's been a part of this discussion. I'm glad you brought him up. He has been a valuable member of my administration, and I trust his judgment and appreciate his service." But he did not say whether Snow would stay.

Asked later why the president didn't simply dispel rumors of a Snow departure, White House press secretary Scott McClellan replied: "We've had a long policy of never speculating about personnel matters."

McClellan ducked a question about his own fate. "I appreciate the question, and as I've said, I never speculate on personnel matters. Period."

With widespread talk of a shake-up, some White House staffers report getting job offers from outside employers. Others who were planning to leave are considering staying longer so their departures are not viewed as part of any housecleaning.

Bolten must find someone to take his old job — director of the Office of Management and Budget — and find a new domestic policy adviser. Claude Allen left that post in February just before he was charged with theft for allegedly receiving phony refunds at department stores.

Supreme Court Pushes Back On Televised Proceedings (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, April 5, 2006

Supreme Court Justice Anthony Kennedy pushed back strongly Tuesday against a bill pending in the Senate that would require the Court to televise its proceedings.

"Mandating direct televised proceedings would be inconsistent with the deference and etiquette that should apply between the branches," Kennedy said in response to questions from House members at the Court's annual budget hearing Tuesday. "We feel very strongly that this matter should be left to the courts."

Kennedy also spoke out forcefully in favor of a pay raise for federal judges, warning that the failure by Congress to pass salary increases is "assuming the proportions of an historic wrong."

Every spring, justices go before a House Appropriations subcommittee seeking approval for the Court's annual budget, which next year will total $76.4 million if passed. It is a rare and often illuminating encounter between branches, with House members asking pointed questions that put justices on the spot about a range of issues.

There was some of that on Tuesday, but to an unusual degree the hearing became a platform for Kennedy and Justice Clarence Thomas to vent about actions or inactions by Congress on matters of deep interest to the high court.

The camera issue was raised early on by subcommittee chairman Joseph Knollenberg, R-Mich., who said the recent confirmation hearings for two new justices had "brought about greater interest" in the Court on the part of the public.

Kennedy at first deferred to Thomas, describing him as a "media star," apparently a reference to Thomas' greater visibility dating back to his stormy confirmation hearings in 1991. Thomas acknowledged, without pleasure, that he is probably the most recognized justice on the Court. On the issue of cameras in the Court, Thomas said it "runs the risk of undermining the manner in which we consider cases." He also said cameras would reduce the justices' cherished anonymity, leading to the need for more security. Cautiously, Thomas added that requiring the Court to allow cameras could prompt "some conflict between the branches."

That teed up the issue for Kennedy, who spoke much more forcefully against the proposal, often using the pronoun "we" to suggest that at least by his own measure of the situation, he was speaking for the full Court.

Kennedy took aim at Senate legislation sponsored by Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., which would require broadcast access unless a majority of justices in an individual case decided that a party's due process rights would be violated. The bill was endorsed by the Senate Judiciary Committee last week.

The Supreme Court, Kennedy said, does not tell Congress how it should conduct its proceedings, so likewise, Congress should not be doing the same to the Court. "We feel very strongly that we have an intimate knowledge of the dynamics and needs of the Court," said Kennedy. "By having no cameras, we teach that our Court has a different dynamic."

Rep. John Olver, D-Mass., sympathetically asked Kennedy, "Why would you countenance such a bill" if it is so inappropriate. Kennedy replied, "We wouldn't." But Kennedy did not specify what form the Court's resistance to a bill passed by Congress would take.

Kennedy seemed less vociferous about a separate bill that passed the Senate Judiciary Committee last week, legislation that would permit, but not require, camera access in all federal courts at the discretion of the chief judge or justice. He indicated that bill, if passed, would pose far fewer separation of power issues, serving mainly as a signal from Congress that the judiciary should rethink its opposition to cameras.

When Olver said, "You might get called tone deaf if you don't move somehow toward some openness and transparency," Kennedy was conciliatory. "The 'tone deaf' phrase is apt," he said.

But Kennedy's passion was aroused again later in the hearing when he was asked about the salary issue, a sore point for the judiciary for decades. Current pay for the chief justice is $212,100, while associate justices are paid $203,000. The salary for appeals court judges is $175,100, with $165,200 for district judges. Congress has traditionally pegged the judicial salary structure to the pay for senators and House members, which is $165,200, the same as district judges. Reps. Adam Schiff, D-Ca., and Judy Biggert, R-Ill., co-chairs of the Congressional Caucus on the Judicial Branch, introduced a bill last week to de-link judicial and legislative salaries.

DOJ_NMG_0025637

"In my view the present status of judges' salaries threatens the quality of the judiciary," said Kennedy, noting that when his law clerks leave his chambers, some are hired by law firms with hiring bonuses equal to his salary. "This devalues the position of the judiciary."

Kennedy said it is no longer the case, as it was decades ago, that the best lawyers in a given community aspire to the federal bench. "It doesn't happen anymore," Kennedy said, adding that the salary situation has led to a "serious erosion in the morale of the judges."

2 Justices Indicate Supreme Court Is Unlikely To Televise Sessions (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON, April 4 — Television cameras are not about to enter the Supreme Court any time soon.

That was the unmistakable message that two Supreme Court justices gave Congress at a hearing on Tuesday on the court's budget.

Several members of the House Appropriations subcommittee on transportation, treasury, judiciary, and housing and urban development, which handles the judicial branch's annual appropriation, raised the issue of television after Justices Anthony M. Kennedy and Clarence Thomas had finished discussing the court's $76.4 million budget request.

Last year, Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania and chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, introduced a bill to require the Supreme Court to permit its arguments to be televised unless a majority of the justices voted to bar television on a case-by-case basis. Other proposals include mandating television access, or simply permitting and encouraging it.

Asked for his views on the subject, Justice Kennedy said it raised a "sensitive point" about the constitutional separation of powers.

"It's not for the court to tell Congress how to conduct its proceedings," and the reverse was also true, he said. He added, "We feel very strongly that we have intimate knowledge of the dynamics and the mood of the court, and we think that proposals mandating and directing television in our court are inconsistent with the deference and etiquette that should apply between the branches."

Justice Thomas was equally firm, warning that television in the courtroom would have a negative impact on the argument sessions.

"It runs the risk of undermining the manner in which we consider cases," he said. He added that some members of the court "feel more strongly than others," but that all agreed that the court should decide the issue for itself. "The general consensus is not one of glee," he said.

Justice Thomas also said that televising the court would raise security concerns, "as members of the court who now have some degree of anonymity would lose their anonymity."

The justices, who have been the court's representatives to Congress on budget matters for several years, appeared to relish the chance to elaborate on the television question. Justice Kennedy described the absence of cameras as a positive.

"We teach that our branch has a different dynamic," he said. "We teach that we are judged by what we write."

One member of the subcommittee, Representative John W. Olver, Democrat of Massachusetts, appeared taken aback by Justice Kennedy's fervor. "You've made it clear that you are part of the cerebral branch," Mr. Olver said.

School System Improves Under Our Bright Light (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

Few voices have been stronger in support of education reform over the years than your editorial page. Which is why it troubles me to have to respond to your March 24 editorial "Spellings Test."

Instead of challenging reform's opponents, you found fault with its best friend. The Bush administration led the charge to pass the No Child Left Behind Act, the strongest educational accountability measure ever instituted. The Department of Education has challenged states that have tried to water down or wriggle out of its provisions. And we have been immovable on the "bright line" goals of the law, including annual testing, disaggregated test score data and full grade level proficiency in reading and math by 2013-14.

Four years ago, we fought hard to ensure that public school choice and tutoring services were part of NCLB. They are important accountability tools. We have urged school districts to partner with community and faith-based organizations and to set aside adequate funds for transportation. We insist school districts comply with both its letter and spirit; for example, by informing parents in a timely manner and in plain language. Sticking a letter in a kid's backpack is just not good enough.

We are holding up successful districts, such as Miami-Dade County in Florida and Desert Sands Unified in California, as role models. And those dragging their feet have been warned of consequences. Henry Johnson, who heads my Office of Elementary and Secondary Education, is taking a very close look at how well states are complying with the law. We will not hesitate to take appropriate enforcement actions.

Of course, we are not satisfied with current student participation rates. To spur improvement, we established pilot programs in several states prior to the 2005-06 school year. Early returns are promising. In Newport News, Va., for example, preliminary data show that 62% of students eligible for free tutoring signed up, aided by a door-to-door campaign to notify low-income parents. This is nearly four times the national average.

We welcome everyone's effort to use the latest data in support of closing the achievement gap. The bottom line is that none of this activity would be happening without the No Child Left Behind Act. It has done more than raise test scores and narrow the achievement gap. It has shone a bright light on the entire public education system, so that parents are no longer kept in the dark.

NJ Senators To Remove Block On Bush Highway Nominee (AP)

By Donna De La Cruz
AP, April 4, 2006

WASHINGTON -- New Jersey's two Democratic senators on Tuesday said they will lift their block on President Bush's nominee to head the Federal Highway Administration after the agency agreed to give the state more than $150 million for transportation projects that had been in jeopardy because of a new rule.

Sens. Frank Lautenberg and Robert Menendez placed a hold last week on Richard Capka's nomination to head the FHA, alleging that the agency was rescinding approvals that allowed New Jersey to spread costs for transportation projects over several years.

Since 1999, the FHA has allowed New Jersey and some other states to use multiyear funding. For example, if a project costs $100 million and would take five years to complete, New Jersey would budget $20 million a year for five years. The state paid the bills year by year.

Under the new rule, New Jersey would have had to put the project's entire cost into an escrow account.

New Jersey transportation officials met Tuesday with FHA Associate Administrator Chip Nottingham, who pledged to reverse the rule and allow six state projects to continue, the senators said.

The U.S. Transportation Department did not immediately comment.

Lautenberg said placing the hold on Capka seemed to do the trick.

"The Bush administration has blinked and promised to provide the rest of New Jersey's highway money for this year and the amount we have requested for 2007," Lautenberg said.

Menendez said Bush's plan "would have made our state more congested and less safe, and we will never sit by and allow that."

The six projects are:

_Work on the Interstate 280/Garden State Parkway interchange in East Orange.
_Work on Interstate 78 in Union, Hillside, Irvington and Newark.
_Work on the Delilah Road bridges in Absecon and Pleasantville.
_Work on the Route 440-High Street connector in Perth Amboy.
_Widening Route 1 in Edison and Woodbridge.
_Work on Interstate 295 in Greenwich, East Greenwich and West Deptford.

Capka was nominated by Bush to be the permanent FHA administration earlier this month. He will remain the acting administrator, a job he has held since August 2005, until the Senate can take action on his nomination.

Under Senate rules, any senator can block nominations or legislation. The procedure is commonly referred to as a hold. Democratic Sens. Max Baucus of Montana and John Kerry of Massachusetts have also placed holds on Capka's nomination _ Baucus for FHA's refusal to fund a $50 million transportation project for his state and Kerry for Capka's involvement with Boston's controversial $14.6 billion "Big Dig" project.

Boehner Says Budget Will Reach Floor This Week (RC)

By Jennifer Yachnin

DOJ_NMG_0025639

Roll Call, April 5, 2006

Although the House Rules Committee postponed its vote Tuesday evening on setting the debate for fiscal 2007 budget resolution, Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) insisted that the measure will reach the House floor before Members depart for the two-week Easter recess.

"It will be a tough sell. We will get there," Boehner said at a Tuesday press conference, before the committee delayed action on the rule. "Listen, we are going to do the budget this week. It is going to mean a lot of conversations and a lot of honest dialogue. So I am looking forward to the dialogue beginning."

Asked whether the resolution could be delayed through the weekend, Boehner added: "It will be done before we leave here this week."

A spokesman for Majority Leader said that the chamber could vote on the budget resolution as early as Thursday, assuming that the Rules panel approves the matter today.

Although the committee was expected to reconvene Tuesday evening on a separate matter, no definitive schedule on the budget resolution rule had been released at press time.

"I will be frank with you: If we don't do it this week, why do it?" Boehner added Tuesday. "So that is why we are going to do it this week, and we are going to pass it."

In the meantime, House Budget Chairman Jim Nussle (R-Iowa) testified before the Rules Committee Tuesday that his panel will take up a numerous reform issues — including a presidential line-item veto and earmark reform — as single package, winning praise from conservative GOP lawmakers.

While members of the conservative Republican Study Committee have criticized the budget resolution, Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.), the group's chairman, has said that the group could support the matter in exchange for leadership support of a quartet of reform proposals.

Pence said Tuesday he is "encouraged" by Nussle's testimony on both the line-item veto proposal as well as by the creation of a sunset committee to evaluate federal programs. But he added that the RNC will continue to seek a "date certain" to vote on the proposals.

Pence also noted that discussions with House leadership continued Tuesday.

"I'm satisfied that negotiations are moving along," Pence said. "We're encouraged by the progress."

In particular, Pence said that a proposal to provide for stricter enforcement of the budget on the House floor with regard to emergency appropriations could be included in a manager's amendment for the budget resolution.

But Pence suggested that if the House bill includes an amendment sought by moderate Republicans that would add $7 billion to provide for education- and health-related programs — a measure similar to one that is included in the Senate's budget resolution — it could result in a "significant departure" of conservative votes.

"We see the president's number as a ceiling," Pence said, referring to the $873 billion in domestic discretionary spending which is identical to the amount included in the House budget.

Under a substitution amendment offered by Rep. Mike Castle (R-Del.), a leader of the effort to add the $7 billion provision to the resolution, and Reps. Nancy Johnson (R-Conn.) and Dave Reichert (R-Wash.), the discretionary budget would total $880 billion.

House Republicans Seek To Raise Spending (HILL)

By Jeffrey Young

The Hill, April 5, 2006

Three House Republicans yesterday introduced a substitute to the budget resolution that would boost discretionary spending.

The centrists hope to match the success of their Senate counterparts and increase money for education, health and the Low Income Home Energy Assistance Program (LIHEAP) by $7.16 billion above the resolution marked up by Budget Committee Chairman Jim Nussle (R-Iowa).

GOP Reps. Mike Castle (Del.), Nancy Johnson (Conn.) and Dave Reichert (Wash.) sponsored the substitute amendment.

Castle and Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.) are scheduled to debate the budget on C-SPAN at 7:45 a.m. today. Pence is the chairman of the Republican Study Committee, a group of fiscal conservatives seeking deeper cuts in discretionary funding.

The centrists are hopeful that the Rules Committee will allow their amendment to proceed to the floor, Castle spokeswoman Elizabeth Wenk said.

House GOP Lacks Agenda, DeLay Says (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow And Amy Fagan

DOJ_NMG_0025640

The Washington Times, April 5, 2006

Departing Rep. Tom DeLay of Texas said yesterday that House Republicans have no vision or agenda and have let the Democrats choose the GOP leadership.

"We don't have an agreed agenda -- breaking up our leadership has taken its toll," Mr. DeLay told a small group of reporters invited to his offices in the Cannon House Office Building.

The interview came only hours after Mr. DeLay had announced in Houston that he would resign his House seat in the coming weeks, giving his party time to name someone else to stand for election from the conservative 22nd District of Texas.

The House GOP leadership "breakup" he spoke of began when he relinquished his House majority leader's post in September after a local Democratic prosecutor won a grand jury indictment against him on campaign-finance charges. Some of his former aides and associates have been indicted or convicted on various charges, and Democrats have painted Mr. DeLay as the leader of the Republican "culture of corruption" they say they're campaigning against.

"The only reason I was indicted [was] the stupid rule that allows the Democrats to pick the Republican leadership," Mr. DeLay said.

He was referring to a party rule requiring that any Republican indicted for a crime give up his leadership post. Mr. DeLay has contended that is why the Democrats, who have no such rule, persuaded Ronnie Earle to seek a grand jury indictment of Mr. DeLay and keep seeking it until he got one.

Mr. DeLay maintains his innocence and told friends and supporters in Houston yesterday that he will formally resign this spring, in large part so that Democrats won't be able to "steal" one more House seat in a critical midterm elections.

"Because I care so deeply about this district and the people in it, I refuse to allow liberal Democrats an opportunity to steal this seat with a negative, personal campaign," he said. "As difficult as this decision has been for me, it's not going to be a great day for liberal Democrats, either. My loyalty to the Republican Party -- indeed, my love for the Republican Party -- has played no small part in this decision."

Mr. DeLay called President Bush on Monday, and they spoke while the president was flying back from Cincinnati, White House spokesman Scott McClellan said yesterday.

"The president wishes Congressman DeLay all the best. He appreciates his service and thanks him for his service to the nation," Mr. McClellan said.

When asked whether Mr. Bush regrets the decision by his key political ally, Mr. McClellan said, "The president respects his decision. This was a decision that Congressman DeLay made."

Democrats said his resignation is just the tip of the iceberg, however, and they'll continue to hammer away at corruption issues.

"Mr. DeLay's departure from Congress is one piece of the changes needed to end the Republican culture of corruption," said House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat. "We need a new direction that returns the people's house to the American people."

Republican colleagues praised both Mr. DeLay's aggressive, effective leadership style and his decision to step aside for the good of the party.

"His leadership helped take our Republican conference and, as a result, our nation in a new direction, and I am confident that Tom's legacy as one of the most effective Republican leaders in a generation is assured," said Majority Whip Roy Blunt, the Missouri Republican who briefly served as leader when Mr. DeLay stepped aside.

"With this decision, he has put the interests of others ahead of his own," said Rep. David Dreier, California Republican.

Republicans were confident yesterday that a Republican will win Mr. DeLay's seat in November. They said the decision to step down was his.

"There was never any pressure for Tom DeLay to step down. People would have stood by him," said Rep. Jack Kingston, Georgia Republican.

But some party members clearly breathed a sigh of relief at the news, saying Mr. DeLay's resignation takes a key Democrat issue, one that would have been used against other Republicans, off the table. "For the tight congressional races, he will not be the poster child that he would have been if he was still in office," said Rep. Walter B. Jones, North Carolina Republican.

Mr. DeLay won his primary last month, but still faced a strong challenge from Democrat Nick Lampson, a former House member. The race looked tough because of Mr. DeLay's Texas indictment and ties to convicted ex-lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

House Minority Whip Rep. Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, and other Democrats said Mr. DeLay's resignation doesn't save Republicans from their problems.

"National Republicans want you to believe they have turned the page, but the Republican culture of putting the special interests first does not revolve around just one man," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel, Illinois Democrat, who heads the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. Drug companies, insurance, oil and energy industries "still hold sway over the Republican Congress and write the legislation," he said.

Yesterday, a determindely upbeat Mr. DeLay said also that he would devote much of his time out of Congress to "doing what I do best, strategizing for the conservative cause" and helping Republicans in the House create a "vision" for the rest of the year and beyond, including on immigration policy.

He warned that if the immigration bill sponsored by Sens. John McCain and Edward M. Kennedy becomes law, it "would seriously undermine our own base" and cost Republicans seats in the November elections. The House "should not conference with the Senate on something we haven't discussed in the House."

In his Washington interview, he said that after leaving Congress he will raise money for Republican candidates. When asked whether he could imagine eventually becoming a lobbyist for a living, he replied: "Maybe."

DeLay Announces Resignation From House (AP)

By David Espo

The Associated Press, April 4, 2006

Succumbing to scandal, former Majority Leader Tom DeLay said Tuesday he will resign from Congress in the face of a tough re-election race, closing out a career that blended unflinching conservatism with a bare-knuckled political style.

"I have no fear whatsoever about any investigation into me or my personal or professional activities," DeLay said in a statement to constituents. At the same time, he said, "I refuse to allow liberal Democrats an opportunity to steal this seat with a negative, personal campaign."

He said the voters of his Houston-area district "deserve a campaign about the vital national issues that they care most about ... and not a campaign focused solely as a referendum on me."

DeLay relinquished the post as House majority leader last fall after his indictment in Texas as part of an investigation into the allegedly illegal use of funds for state legislative races. He decided in January against trying to get the leadership post back as an election-year corruption scandal staggered Republicans and emboldened minority Democrats.

Last week, former DeLay aide Tony Rudy pleaded guilty to conspiring with lobbyist Jack Abramoff and others to corrupt public officials, and he promised to help the broad federal investigation of bribery and lobbying fraud that already has resulted in three convictions.

Neither Rudy, Abramoff nor anyone else connected with the investigation has publicly accused DeLay of breaking the law, but Rudy confessed that he had taken actions while working in the majority leader's office that were illegal. DeLay has consistently denied any wrongdoing.

Sen. John McCain (news, bio, voting record), R-Ariz., a major player in congressional investigations of Abramoff and the lobbyist's involvement with Indian tribes, said Tuesday that he respects DeLay's decision to step down, and added, "I think there are other aspects of the Abramoff scandal that will be unfolding in the weeks ahead."

McCain spoke to reporters following a speech to a Hispanic conference.

President Bush said Tuesday that DeLay had informed him of his decision Monday afternoon.

"I wish him all the best," Bush told reporters during a brief White House session, adding, "It had to have been a very difficult decision for someone who loved representing his district in the state of Texas."

Bush said the Republican Party won't suffer from DeLay's decision to resign from Congress. "My own judgment is that our party will continue to succeed because we are the party of ideas."

DeLay, an 11-term Texas lawmaker who turns 59 on Saturday, said he would make his resignation effective sometime before mid-June but contingent on the congressional calendar.

"He has served our nation with integrity and honor," said Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, who succeeded DeLay in his leadership post earlier this year.

But Democrats said the developments marked more than the end to one man's career in Congress.

"Tom Delay's announcement is just the beginning of the reckoning of the Republican culture of corruption that has gripped Washington for too long," said Karen Finney, a spokeswoman for the Democratic National Committee. "From DeLay to Scooter Libby to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, to Duke Cunningham, to Bob Ney, to David Safavian, the list of goes on and on."

DeLay portrayed his decision to resign as a fatal blow for the fortunes of his opponent, Democrat Nick Lampson, who has garnered national attention — and financial support.

"As difficult as this decision has been for me, it's not going to be a great day for liberal Democrats, either," DeLay said. "My loyalty to the Republican Party, indeed my love for the Republican Party, has played no small part in this decision."

Last month, DeLay capped a triumph in a contested GOP primary with a vow to win re-election.

DOJ_NMG_0025642

It was not clear whether Texas Gov. Rick Perry would call a special election to fill out the unexpired portion of DeLay's term, or whether the seat would remain vacant until it is filled in November.

Either way, DeLay's concern about the potential loss of a Houston-area seat long in Republican hands reflected a deeper worry among GOP strategists. After a dozen years in the majority, they face a strong challenge from Democrats this fall, at a time when President Bush's public support is sagging, and when the Abramoff scandal has helped send congressional approval ratings tumbling.

Until scandal sent him to the sidelines, DeLay had held leadership posts since the Republicans won control of the House in a 1994 landslide. DeLay quickly established himself as a forceful presence — earning a nickname as "The Hammer" — and he easily became majority leader when the spot opened up.

DeLay was the driving force behind President Clinton's impeachment in 1999, weeks after Republicans lost seats at the polls in a campaign in which they tried to make an issue of Clinton's personal behavior.

His trademark aggressiveness helped trigger his downfall, when he led a drive to redraw Texas' congressional district boundaries to increase the number of seats in GOP hands. DeLay was soon caught up in an investigation involving the use of corporate funds in the campaigns of legislators who had participated in the redistricting.

GOP Ponders A New Era (HILL)

By Patrick O'Connor

The Hill, April 5, 2006

The decision by Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) to retire signals the official end of an era in Republican governance, leaving GOP leaders and rank-and-file members pondering the direction of their party.

The departure of the man who has come to define brass-knuckle politics in Washington comes at a pivotal time for Republicans, as both the conference and the White House grapple with significant changes and new personalities brought in to help boost their flagging poll numbers and reshape their respective images.

House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) officially assumed DeLay's title earlier this year, but in many ways the outspoken Texan was still the tough-talking symbol of Republicans in the House.

DeLay's decision , which broke late Monday night and which he confirmed in a long speech to his constituents early yesterday morning, coincides with a similar shakeup at the White House, where the president's chief of staff for the past five years offered his resignation last week.

Boehner's leadership and the retirement of prominent chairmen, including Ways and Means Chairman Bill Thomas (Calif.), ushers in an era of change for the party in which new members must now fill those roles.

In the House, news of DeLay's decision not to seek reelection came as leaders prepare for a series of tough votes on the budget and a bill to apply current campaign-finance rules to 527 groups, which is expected on the floor today.

With more changes expected at the White House, Boehner met with incoming White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten on Monday to discuss interactions between the administration and Congress.

Boehner would not discuss the details of their meeting, except to say that Bolten asked him about some of the strengths and weaknesses in the White House legislative-affairs team.

"I think he is a very capable manager, and he was doing what a good manager would do, and that is to assess where he thinks the White House operation is and how it can be improved," Boehner said of Bolten.

Boehner has taken an active role in the internal budget negotiations with rank-and-file members and has clearly signaled his desire to take responsibility for the eventual outcome. His leadership continues to be a focus among members, staff, lobbyists and the media, but he has not shrunk from the spotlight.

Boehner and Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) are the last two members of a leadership team that assumed control of the majority in 1994 under then-Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.), DeLay as whip and Hastert as his chief deputy. Boehner was the House GOP conference chairman but lost his seat at the leadership table when former Rep. J.C. Watts (R-Okla.) ousted him from the post in 1998.

But Boehner bided his time, patiently waiting for a return. What happens with the votes on the budget and 527-reform bills this week will be the first clear tests of Boehner's skills as leader.

Hastert remains an anchor for the conference, but his role could be increasingly challenged if Boehner's stature increases. Hastert was noticeably absent from a press conference yesterday to address this week's agenda.

Republicans in the House reacted to news of DeLay's departure with a mixture of surprise, resignation and anger for what they perceive to be a partisan attack on their outspoken former leader. Members were also quick to praise DeLay's skills as a legislator and GOP leader.

DOJ_NMG_0025643

"Tom DeLay has been a great leader for our party," Boehner told reporters yesterday during his regular weekly briefing. "I still believe he's one of the most effective whips we've seen in the Congress."

Boehner said he had yet to speak to other members about DeLay's decision but summed up their sentiments by saying: "My guess is that most of my colleagues are saddened by this."

DeLay called Hastert and Boehner on Monday to notify them of his decision, but the majority leader said he was already asleep when his predecessor placed the call. Other members were caught off-guard. Republican Policy Committee Chairman Adam Putnam (Fla.) read the news in an e-mail alert while watching his University of Florida Gators beat UCLA to win the national championship in college basketball.

In his statement to district voters, DeLay conceded that external political pressure played a major role in his decision to resign. Legal questions were bound to haunt the former majority leader for the duration of his campaign, and he acknowledged those impediments in his remarks.

"As one of my colleagues in the House leadership astutely observed a while back, the wheels of justice turn much more slowly than the wheels of allegation," DeLay said.

Those legal questions include the possibility of further indictments in the ongoing federal investigation of former Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff, although DeLay and his lawyer, Richard Cullen, both deny that DeLay is a target in the probe. The questions also include the impending Supreme Court decision on the constitutionality of Texas's congressional map and a related campaign-finance case in which DeLay and two associates have been charged with illegally funneling corporate contributions to Republican candidates during the 2002 Statehouse races that allowed them to redraw that map.

DeLay has maintained his innocence in the latter case since he was indicted by a Texas grand jury and forced to step aside as majority leader. Democratic District Attorney Ronnie Earle, who indicted DeLay last fall, released a statement yesterday saying he would continue to prosecute the former majority leader despite his decision not to seek reelection.

While Boehner expressed sorrow for the circumstances of DeLay's resignation, he did not completely defend his predecessor for the wrongdoing of his former aides, two of whom have pleaded guilty.

"At the end of the day, the members are responsible for what happens in their offices and responsible for their staff," Boehner said yesterday. "Clearly, there were several…former staffers for Tom who ran off the road, and it is sad and unfortunate."

Asked yesterday whether or not he felt like a "marked man" given the retirements of so many contemporaries, Boehner joked: "I'm the last man standing."

Continuing Legal Troubles Reportedly Left DeLay Dispirited (NYT)

By Carl Hulse And Philip Shenon

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON, April 4 — Representative Tom DeLay's decision to resign his House seat came as federal prosecutors continued to investigate the aides who once made up his inner circle, leaving Mr. DeLay dispirited, potentially intensifying his legal troubles and further undercutting his prospects for re-election in the fall, lawmakers and others said Tuesday.

"I have no fear whatsoever about any investigation into me or my personal or professional activities," Mr. DeLay said in a formal announcement of his decision to constituents in the suburban Houston district he has represented since 1985, issued Tuesday morning as a written statement and a video on his Web site.

Mr. DeLay said his announcement on Tuesday was unrelated to a former senior aide's guilty plea last week to corruption charges, the latest admission of wrongdoing in the Jack Abramoff scandal by onetime staff members. Another of Mr. DeLay's former aides has also pleaded guilty, and prosecutors publicly signaled last week that they were examining the activities of a third.

Mr. DeLay is also under indictment in Texas on charges that he broke campaign finance laws, and he faced the prospect of an inquiry by the House ethics committee into travel arranged by Mr. Abramoff.

Some suggested it was no coincidence that his decision to resign and forgo a re-election bid came after the plea bargain last week by Tony Rudy, a former deputy chief of staff to Mr. DeLay. Mr. Rudy is cooperating with federal investigators.

"The two of them have been very close over the years," said Representative Ray LaHood, Republican of Illinois, referring to Mr. DeLay and Mr. Rudy. "Every story that is written will include DeLay's name, that's for sure."

Democrats cheered the departure of Mr. DeLay, who said he would leave Congress by mid-June. They said that he had only himself to blame for the abrupt end to his public career and that his decision to quit the House would not spare Republicans from a voter backlash.

DOJ_NMG_0025644

"Tom DeLay's legacy of abuse of power, strong-arm tactics, broken House rules and pay-to-play politics has cast a long, dark shadow over this majority leadership and the entire Congress," said Representative Louise M. Slaughter of New York, the senior Democrat on the Rules Committee. "DeLay may be gone, but this is still his Congress."

President Bush, who spoke with Mr. DeLay on Monday, said he "wished him all the best," but added that Republicans would continue to flourish "because we're the party of ideas."

Administration officials said the White House had not pushed Mr. DeLay to step down.

Privately, some senior Republicans said Mr. DeLay should have acted months ago, when Mr. Abramoff entered his guilty plea and when Mr. DeLay abandoned plans to try to regain the majority leader post he vacated after being indicted in Texas. Party strategists said his decision not to seek re-election could ease the way for other embattled Republicans, with Democrats losing a prime target for their claims of widespread corruption.

"In Richard Nixon terms, you won't have Tom DeLay to kick around anymore," said Representative Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee. He predicted that Republicans would easily hold Mr. DeLay's seat.

In addition to Mr. Rudy, another former top DeLay aide, Michael Scanlon, has pleaded guilty in the corruption case and is cooperating with prosecutors. The third former aide to be caught up in the investigation, Edwin A. Buckham, was among Mr. DeLay's closest associates, and the Justice Department is seeking to build a conspiracy case against him, people involved in the case said.

Phone calls to a home telephone number listed under Mr. Buckham's name in Maryland were not returned. A Washington lawyer who has recently represented Mr. Buckham, Laura A. Miller, did not return repeated phone calls.

Another close associate said that Mr. DeLay had been consistent in telling friends he had done nothing wrong, but that he had become dispirited in recent weeks because many of his former aides and closest friends were becoming targets of the Justice Department and were being pressured to incriminate him.

"Tony Rudy and especially Ed Buckham were more than just former colleagues — they are Tom DeLay's friends," the associate said. "You can imagine what it feels like: to know that your friends are being squeezed to say terrible things about you, things that aren't true. By leaving the House now, I think DeLay hopes that the spotlight on him and his friends will dim a little."

The associate spoke on condition of anonymity because, he said, Mr. DeLay had insisted that friends not talk to reporters about his legal troubles.

Mr. Rudy pleaded guilty last week to conspiring to corrupt public officials, although his plea agreement made no direct accusation of wrongdoing against Mr. DeLay. In a public indication that Mr. Buckham, Mr. DeLay's former chief of staff, was under scrutiny, federal law enforcement officials confirmed that he was the person referred to as "Lobbyist B" in court documents released as part of Mr. Rudy's plea agreement.

In announcing that he would relinquish the House seat he built into a formidable power center, Mr. DeLay acknowledged that the criminal inquiries had exacted a toll on his election prospects and his will to remain in Congress.

"Because I care so deeply about this district and the people in it, I refuse to allow liberal Democrats an opportunity to steal this seat with a negative, personal campaign," he said in the statement to constituents.

Colleagues and others said that even as Mr. DeLay was campaigning for re-election, he was preparing to exit the race after the primary if his political troubles appeared too deep. The more than $1.2 million in campaign contributions he amassed could now be used for legal fees.

In explaining the decision to resign, Mr. DeLay and others described as a turning point a speech he gave last week on the nexus between Christianity and America's place in the world.

The Rev. Rick Scarborough, the founder of Vision America and former pastor of a Houston church that Mr. DeLay sometimes attended, had asked Mr. DeLay to give that speech, at a conference titled "The War Against Christians" in Washington last Tuesday. He ran into Mr. DeLay again Saturday night at Sugar Creek Baptist Church in Houston.

"He pulled me aside and said that at our conference he had finally made a decision that was going to be difficult for him to announce but that God wanted him to get out of that race," Mr. Scarborough said.

DeLay Resignation Unlikely To Affect Election-year Dynamics (KRT)

By Steven Thomma

Knight Ridder, April 4, 2006

WASHINGTON - Rep. Tom DeLay's decision to retire from Congress will do little to help his embattled party retain control of the legislature in November's elections and won't erase his image as a poster child for corruption.

It leaves unchanged the larger dynamics of this year's congressional elections: deep dissatisfaction with President Bush, the war in Iraq and problems in the Republican base over such issues as immigration and federal spending.

Even with the Texas Republican leaving Congress, he'll remain a symbol that Democrats will burn into voters' minds with ads next fall. They'll relentlessly hammer the former House majority leader who cemented close ties between Congress and lobbyists and who was engulfed by a lobbying scandal that already had snared two of his former top aides and a close friend, lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

"Tom DeLay may be gone, but he's not forgotten," said John Zogby, an independent pollster.

His resignation, expected within the next two months, should help Republicans retain his suburban Houston district, where he easily could have lost the seat he has held since 1984. With a fresh candidate, Republicans have a much better chance there. That's important in a year when a net loss of just 15 seats would cost Republicans control of the House of Representatives.

But it won't shift the national tide.

DeLay, who will turn 59 on Saturday, formally announced his decision to step down Tuesday after alerting supporters and reporters the evening before. The decision came three days after a former close aide, Tony Rudy, pleaded guilty to corruption charges and said that he, like other DeLay allies before him, would cooperate in a continuing investigation.

DeLay said the corruption investigation had nothing to do with his decision, that he wasn't its target and that he resigned only to let voters focus on Republican ideas instead of controversy associated with him.

"I could have won this seat, but it would have been nasty," DeLay told Fox News.

Republicans hoped that DeLay's decision would put his controversial House tenure and its connection to scandal behind them.

"Our party will continue to succeed because we're the party of ideas," President Bush said when he was asked about DeLay on Tuesday.

"House Republicans will continue to move forward with an aggressive agenda," said House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill.

Democrats refused to join the political eulogy.

"DeLay is a symptom of a larger disease," Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean said, "a sick Republican culture of corruption that touches everyone who took his dirty money, voted for his corrupt leadership or sat silently while their party has sold our government to the highest bidder."

House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, said DeLay's woes wouldn't matter in November.

"I am not sure there will be any broad national impact. All of these races are won based on local candidates, local issues, their take on the national issues. And I don't expect it will have any impact."

Many issues are breaking the Democrats' way as election season nears.

"I don't think it (DeLay's resignation) alters the fundamental landscape," said independent political analyst Stuart Rothenberg, who closely tracks congressional races. "The campaign is still more about George Bush and Iraq."

And when the campaign turns to other issues, one of them is ethics and scandal in Congress. That's not good for Republicans.

There could be more criminal charges or even trials this year to remind voters of congressional corruption. And even if DeLay isn't indicted in connection with the Abramoff-congressional scandal, he faces trial in Texas on campaign-finance charges.

"He's still going to be in the news," said Linda Fowler, a political scientist at Dartmouth College in New Hampshire. "His name is still going to be present, keeping ethics and scandal alive."

Democrats will see to that.

"Republicans can try to move on now, arguing that DeLay's exit is a bright line. But I don't think it's going to be that easy," Rothenberg said. "The Democrats will keep pounding on ethics. ... The Democrats still have the edge for the cycle. The ethics issue is still an advantage for the Democrats."

Republicans take some solace from polls showing that about a third of Americans blame both major political parties for corruption. But among those who choose sides, they blame Republicans more than Democrats by 31 to 14 percent, according to a Pew Research Center poll.

"This is an ancillary issue," Zogby said. "But it could become a powerful ancillary issue."

The Pew Research Center poll of 1,502 adults was conducted Feb. 1-5 and had a margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

DeLay's Hardball Tactics Coming Back On Him (USAT)

By Jim Drinkard

USA Today, April 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0025646

WASHINGTON — After Tom DeLay announced he will leave Congress, Republicans are saying goodbye to the last of the revolutionary leaders who envisioned theirs as a majority party.

DeLay, together with former House speaker Newt Gingrich and fellow Texan Dick Armey, assembled the agenda that propelled Republicans to power in 1994 after four decades in the minority.

In the end, the same hardball tactics that helped preserve that power led to DeLay's fall with Tuesday's announcement that he would resign from Congress in June. His aggressive pursuit of campaign funds to help increase Republican House seats in Texas led to his indictment last year in Texas on money-laundering charges.

DeLay, nicknamed "the Hammer," took fundraising, political organizing, ties to lobbying and party discipline to new levels.

In addition to the Texas criminal charges, DeLay also faced a federal corruption investigation that has brought guilty pleas from two former aides, and House ethics committee scrutiny.

The weight of those legal woes left DeLay no longer confident he could hold the suburban Houston district that had been safely his since 1985. Democrats, led by the party's congressional campaign chairman, Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, sought to turn the scandal into a political weapon against all Republicans.

Emanuel and other Democrats insisted that DeLay's departure will not change their focus. "National Republicans want you to believe they have turned the page, but the Republican culture of putting the special interests first does not revolve around just one man," Emanuel said.

In a series of interviews, DeLay continued to maintain that he was innocent of wrongdoing but said he had come to believe that he should resign rather than risk getting beat in November.

Last month, DeLay overcame a primary challenge to win renomination for his House seat. He still faced a tough challenge from Democrat Nick Lampson, an ex-lawmaker who lost his seat in 2004 because of DeLay's legislative maneuvering.

On MSNBC's Hardball, DeLay said he was concerned with endangering the GOP majority. His constituents "deserve a Republican" to represent them, he said. "I can't be guaranteed that I would win."

Cal Jillson of Southern Methodist University said it's unlikely that's the only reason because DeLay is "a street fighter" unaccustomed to backing down. "That leaves the possibility that DeLay is aware of future adverse developments that are lapping at his doorstep," Jillson said.

DeLay said he was at peace with his decision, which he said frees him to fight for conservative causes and candidates.

Analysts saw few silver linings for the GOP. "It's a huge embarrassment for the Republicans in every jurisdiction, from Washington to his district," said Earl Black, a political scientist at Rice University.

DeLay said he planned to make his Virginia home his legal residence so Texas Republicans can replace him on the ballot. Under state law, a nominee cannot be replaced unless he dies, moves out of state or is convicted of a felony.

Black said DeLay will be remembered as an architect of the 1994 Republican congressional breakthrough. "He did not accept permanent minority status for House Republicans, and that was a very different way of thinking," Black said. "He helped get them there and keep them there."

DeLay engineered a redistricting plan in Texas that gained six seats for his party in the 2004 elections. He set up a fundraising operation that led to the indictment.

Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., said DeLay's legacy as a vote counter is unmatched. He was perhaps the "best whip … in the history of the Congress," Lott said.

DeLay enforced party discipline so Republicans could enact legislative priorities without many Democratic votes. His application of that strategy on the Medicare bill in 2003 led to an admonition from the ethics committee, which said he improperly pressured a colleague for his vote.

Rep. Henry Bonilla, R-Texas, credited DeLay with helping build the GOP in once-solidly Democratic Texas. "The state is a leading Republican power base in this country," he said.

DeLay's Decision Fuels GOP Concerns (BSUN)

By Julie Hirschfeld Davis And Gwyneth K. Shaw

The Baltimore Sun, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush and his congressional allies expressed hope Tuesday that their party could recover from the web of scandals that ensnared Tom DeLay, the powerful and hard-charging former House Republican leader who has announced that he will quit Congress within weeks.

But DeLay's decision to resign underscored broader concerns among some Republican strategists that the still-unfolding corruption charges could cost other vulnerable lawmakers their seats this year. And Democrats promised a push to make Republican scandals a signature theme of the elections.

The imminent departure of DeLay -- the 11-term congressman known as "The Hammer" for his uncompromising style and particularly popular with the president's conservative base --also leaves Bush without a go-to enforcer on Capitol Hill at a time when his influence is waning and his relations with Republican lawmakers are frayed.

Bush said Tuesday that DeLay's move "had to have been a very difficult decision for someone who loved representing his district," and the president sounded a note of optimism that Republicans could move be yond the scandals.

"My own judgment is, is that our party will continue to succeed, because we're the party of ideas," Bush said.

DeLay, in interviews and a videotaped statement to his constituents, said he cut short the bid for re-election to his Houston-area seat out of concern that he might not win the race. With a characteristically defiant flourish, he said he also hoped to deprive Democrats of a chance "to steal this seat with a negative personal campaign" and turn the contest into "a referendum on me." He pointed to polls that showed him tied with his Democratic challenger.

"I have no fear whatsoever about any investigation into me or my personal or professional activities," DeLay said.

But his announcement came within days after a former top aide, Tony C. Rudy, pleaded guilty to charges that he conspired with disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff to corrupt public officials. Abramoff, once a close DeLay as sociate, was sentenced last month to nearly six years in prison in an unrelated Florida fraud case.

DeLay, who is facing campaign finance fraud charges in Texas, stepped down from his leadership post last fall. Three days after Abramoff pleaded guilty in January to charges of bilking Indian tribes out of millions of dollars and conspiring to bribe public officials, DeLay announced that he would not seek to reclaim the leadership post.

Insiders said DeLay decided to leave Congress after determining that the unraveling lobbying and influence scandal could doom his candidacy. One said Rudy's plea "crystallized" the decision to quit the race. Polls showed that DeLay's re-election chances were being weighed down by questions about his character and credibility, all attributable to his legal problems. DeLay and his top aides recognized that they could do virtually nothing to combat those kinds of concerns, people close to him said.

"The last 18 months have been politically debilitating" for DeLay, said former Republican Rep. Bill Paxon of New York.

But Republicans also recognize that their problems could go far beyond DeLay. Most expect new corruption revelations in the coming weeks, with investigations continuing into conduct by Rep. Bob Ney, an Ohio Republican who surrendered a committee chairmanship this year under suspicion that he took bribes from Abramoff, and other former top House leadership aides.

"I don't think we've seen the last shoe drop here," one senior House Republican aide said. "There's going to be an ongoing trickle."

DeLay's imminent exit leaves Bush without an influential figure in the House. Despite his legal problems, DeLay still enjoyed considerable power, especially among conservatives who comprise the chamber's center of gravity.

Now the White House, consumed with its own personnel shake-up and facing complaints from restive Republicans that Bush has mishandled key issues and failed to communicate with them, has substantial work ahead to repair relations on Capitol Hill.

DeLay "was obviously the go-to guy when the going got tough, and they'll have to find the next go-to person. There's no time to wait," said Stuart Roy, DeLay's former communications director.

"Is it a void that can never be filled? No -- the White House has other channels -- but this is one foot soldier they'll miss," said Greg Crist, a former top Republican leadership aide.

The White House played down the effect of DeLay's departure on Bush's agenda. Asked whether the president regretted DeLay's plans, White House press secretary Scott McClellan said, "The decision has been made, and now it's time to move forward and continue working with congressional leaders to build upon our record."

In their public comments Tuesday, House Republican leaders praised DeLay's tenure and expressed sorrow at his impending departure.

"Tom's been a tremendous leader for us," said House Majority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio, calling his predecessor "one of the most effective whips that we've seen in the Congress."

"I'm sorry that he's leaving," added Boehner, who took over the leader's post in February. There was no pressure on DeLay to quit, but he looked at the political landscape and did the "honorable thing," Boehner said.

"Tom DeLay has been a great friend and an ally, and he will be missed," said California Rep. David Dreier, the Rules Committee chairman.

Privately, however, there was some relief at the idea that a prime target was being removed. In public, House Republican leaders were skittish about the subject: At an afternoon news conference, Boehner, Dreier and other top officials briefly lauded DeLay, made short remarks about this week's legislative agenda and then scurried away to avoid questions from a gaggle of reporters.

DOJ_NMG_0025648

Maryland Rep. Steny H. Hoyer, the No. 2 House Democrat, said it was obvious that DeLay's colleagues were wary of his mounting problems.

"They want to get DeLay off the stage," he said.

Ebullient Democrats, who have hammered Republicans over what they call the "culture of corruption" in the current Congress, said DeLay's departure would do nothing to dull the issue.

"Republicans want you to believe they have turned the page, but the Republican culture of putting the special interests first does not revolve around just one man," Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, the head of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said in a statement.

Tom Matzzie of the liberal political advocacy group MoveOn.org, said DeLay's resignation would not rally public support to Republicans -- or stop Democrats from raising the ethics issue.

"We're going to still kick Tom DeLay and Tom DeLayism," Matzzie said.

But Boehner dismissed the idea that DeLay, either in or out of the House, would be a factor in the elections.

"All of these races are won or lost based on local candidates, local issues, their take on the national issues," he said. "I don't expect this to have any impact."

Republicans May Be In Path Of Political 'hurricane' (USAT)

By Susan Page and Richard Wolf

USA Today, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — Is a tidal wave gathering?

The announcement Tuesday by Rep. Tom DeLay, the former House majority leader, that he would resign from Congress signaled what Democrats hope for and Republicans fear: that Democrats could be swept into power in November by the sort of political tsunami that helped Republicans win control of Congress in 1994.

"We know that there's a hurricane coming, and it's going to hit the Republicans in November," says Charlie Cook of the non-partisan Cook Political Report. "We're just trying to figure out how big this thing is."

Dick Armey, who became House Republican leader when the party gained control in 1994, acknowledges that Republicans have "set the stage for the Democrats." However, he says, Democrats need to offer an alternative rather than just attack. "I think it takes a double-barreled shotgun, and they've only got one barrel."

A Democratic takeover of the Senate seems distant, but Cook and others now figure it's possible (though not yet likely) that Democrats will gain the 15 seats they need to seize control of the House of Representatives.

Three of the five key ingredients of the 1994 turnaround are in place, including broad public dissatisfaction with the direction of the country, dismal approval ratings for the president and the taint of scandal in Congress. But there are differences, too: The number of competitive House districts is much smaller than 12 years ago, and the opposition party has yet to articulate a unified, positive message.

DeLay says his decision to call it quits helps prevent Democrats from gaining the confluence of forces they need, not to mention reducing the chances that the GOP would lose his Texas seat.

His resignation denies Democrats an easy target. "It helps Republicans slightly in that it removes the poster child for bad behavior from the political scene," says Kenneth Baer, a former speechwriter for Vice President Al Gore and author of Reinventing Democrats. He worries fellow Democrats are deluding themselves that the "once-in-a-lifetime convergence" in 1994 is about to be repeated.

He says Democrats could win back the House, though — a turn that would transform the final two years of Bush's presidency. The oversight hearings and congressional investigations that bedeviled the Clinton administration would become a factor for Bush. Even a narrow majority would put Democrats in a stronger position to shape legislation, command attention, even issue subpoenas.

The election is seven months away, and analysts are calculating how 2006 is similar to 1994, and how it's different.

·On the wrong track: Democrats' biggest advantage: Americans are increasingly worried that the country and Congress are moving in the wrong direction. In a USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll last month, 29% of those surveyed said they were satisfied with the way things were going in the nation; 68% were dissatisfied. At this point in 1994, 35% were satisfied.

"There's a very big mood out there that the country is way off course," says Illinois Rep. Rahm Emanuel, chairman of the Democrats' congressional campaign committee. "When they feel this way … voters take it out on the party in power."

In the latest survey, registered voters said they were leaning toward Democratic congressional candidates over Republicans by 55% to 39%. That's the biggest lead Democrats have had since they lost control of the House.

DOJ_NMG_0025649

·An unpopular president: Presidents matter, too. In 1994, Democrats' loss of Congress was in large part a rebuke to President Clinton. His complicated proposal to overhaul the health care system and early fumbles on issues including gays in the military pushed his job-approval rating as low as 39% in September and October. By Election Day, it was still below 50%.

Bush's approval rating in the latest survey, taken last month, was 36% — one percentage point below the low point of Clinton's presidency. It hasn't been as high as 50% in almost a year.

"The big Achilles heel for the Republicans are the president's approval rating and the war in Iraq," says Virginia Rep. Tom Davis, a former chairman of the Republicans' congressional campaign committee. "It shapes up in the atmospherics to be a pretty good year to be a Democrat."

·The taint of scandal: In 1994, Democrats were tainted by years of scandal, including the forced resignation of a House speaker, the indictment of a powerful committee chairman and a controversy over overdrawn checks at the House bank.

This year, Republicans have faced similar ethics issues: the conviction of former California congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham for taking bribes and the continuing investigation into disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff. DeLay's decision to resign is the latest reminder of those woes.

Liberal groups are trying to capitalize by tying other Republicans to "a pretty toxic Congress," says Eli Pariser of MoveOn.org.

Republicans counter that the charges won't stick. Rep. Tom Reynolds, chairman of the Republicans' congressional campaign committee, says one lawmaker's ethics troubles don't rub off on others. Voters are more concerned with "pocketbook issues," he says.

·Where's the opening? Democrats' biggest single problem: Where to fight?

The number of competitive House districts has been shrinking, in part because redistricting has protected incumbents in both parties. In 1994, strategists could target 111 members of Congress who had won two years earlier by 55% of the vote or less. This year, there are just 32 members in that category.

Political scientist Alan Abramowitz of Emory University in Atlanta has run two political models for 2006. In one, using such national political conditions as public unease about the country's direction, Democrats gain 33 seats. In a second, which includes more "micro" factors such as the number of open seats, they pick up just eight seats.

MoveOn.org is trying to make some seemingly safe Republican incumbents vulnerable. On Monday, Pariser announced a $1.3 million ad buy in districts in Connecticut, Indiana, Ohio and Virginia.

·The opposition's message: In a sprawling news conference on the steps of the Capitol in September 1994, Newt Gingrich, then the No. 2 ranking Republican in the House, led dozens of Republican House candidates in signing a "Contract with America." It outlined specific congressional reforms and policy votes they promised to pursue if they won control.

Democrats haven't issued their own "contract," although Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California last week unveiled what they called a unified Democratic approach to national security.

"The biggest reason why Republicans may keep the House is the failure of Democrats to articulate anything positive at all," says Frank Luntz, a Republican pollster who helped devise the 1994 plan. Joe Gaylord, a Republican consultant who also advised Gingrich, agrees.

He's not convinced Republicans are safe, though. "It's possible that the Democrats could capture control of the House," he cautions. In the wake of controversies like those that sank DeLay, Republicans better be "pushing the leadership to get as many reform things passed as possible."

Indicted DeLay To Resign From Congress (FT)

By Edward Alden And Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, April 5, 2006

Tom DeLay, the powerful former Republican House leader, announced on Tuesday he would not seek re-election this year to the US House of Representatives.

Mr DeLay, who played a critical role in consolidating Republican control of Washington over the past decade, said he was stepping aside to avoid a bruising political fight in his Texas district that he might have lost.

"It's very nasty. Every leftist organisation in America is down here in Houston. I just realised that my constituents don't deserve this. They deserve a Republican," he told Fox News.

He added: "I'm more interested in growing the Republican majority than in my own future."

The announcement came just days after his former deputy chief of staff, Tony Rudy, pleaded guilty to conspiracy and corruption and promised to cooperate with prosecutors investigating an alleged corruption ring run out of Mr DeLay's leadership offices.

DOJ_NMG_0025650

Mr DeLay was a close friend of Jack Abramoff, the Republican lobbyist whose influence-peddling is at the centre of the investigation.

Democrats seized on the resignation, with party leader Howard Dean saying Mr DeLay was “a symptom of a larger disease – a sick Republican culture of corruption that touches everyone who took his dirty money”.

A senior lobbyist with close ties to the Republican party said the resignation would likely have little impact on the Senate races this year, or on the 2008 presidential elections, but said it could hurt House Republicans.

“If you are a Republican running for the House in 2006, there is an impact,” he said.

A Clean Slate For The GOP? (PHI)

By Dick Polman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, April 5, 2006

"The Hammer" has driven himself out of politics, and the big question today is whether his decision to quit the Congress will dispel the increasingly acrid cloud of scandal that imperils Republican hegemony.

After all, a switch of only 15 seats puts the Democrats back at the helm in the House - a prospect that could make life more difficult for President Bush, because Democrats armed with subpoena power would be a tad more willing to launch probes of the administration's conduct.

No wonder the Republicans hope that Tom DeLay's departure is a boon to their fortunes. His precipitous fall from power - he reigned supreme as House majority leader at the start of January; he'll be out of a job by June - perhaps undercuts the Democratic quest to topple the GOP in November. DeLay, after all, has been the poster child for what Democrats have been calling "a culture of corruption" in Republican Washington.

DeLay insisted on Fox News yesterday that he was "excited" about his new clout-free life, and most Republicans think that would be just fine, because they believe his abrupt exit will brighten their November prospects. As conservative analyst William Kristol contended yesterday, DeLay's departure "gets rid of one distraction."

But does it?

Seven months remain until the election, and during that long span federal prosecutors will continue probing the scandals spawned by Jack Abramoff, the Republican lobbyist and convicted felon. That could potentially embarrass the GOP by providing the Democrats with fresh corruption story lines.

Marshall Wittmann, a former Christian Coalition lobbyist and ex-Republican aide who now works at a centrist Democratic think tank, said yesterday: "For the Republicans, it's white-knuckle time. DeLay's quitting makes the best out of a bad situation, but any Republican who thinks that this will remove the sting from the corruption issue is just whistling past the graveyard."

A party compass

It can't be assumed that corruption will be a top-tier voting issue in November - Iraq is clearly the biggest concern, according to all the polls - but any new legal proceedings aimed at Republicans could underscore the widely held perception (even among many conservatives) that the governing party has lost its compass.

DeLay has been indicted for alleged violations of Texas election laws, and he is awaiting trial. Republicans can try to distance themselves by noting that DeLay is a private citizen. More problematic is the ongoing federal probe - conducted by a Republican Justice Department - into crimes that include the corruption of public officials, as well as wire, tax and mail fraud. That probe features a strong DeLay connection.

Two figures helping the feds are Tony Rudy and Michael Scanlon, both of whom were high-ranking DeLay aides, both of whom have pleaded guilty to criminal acts. Rudy, who made his deal last week, admitted in court papers that he conspired with Abramoff (a longtime DeLay adviser and friend) to corrupt public officials and defraud clients while working for DeLay.

Nobody yet knows what Rudy and Scanlon are telling the prosecutors; nor is it yet known whom Abramoff, another cooperating party, might be naming.

'A favor'

DeLay himself has not been charged with anything (although he is designated as "Representative #2" in the Rudy criminal documents). But the GOP's image could be damaged even if none of its members are criminally indicted; both Ohio Republican Rep. Bob Ney and Republican Sen. Conrad Burns of Montana (neither of whom has been charged with anything) have political problems at home, because of their respective, and well-documented, past ties to Abramoff.

All told, longtime DeLay critics insist the issue won't die with DeLay. Tom Matzzie, the Washington director at MoveOn.org Political Action, said yesterday that even though DeLay was "a comic-book super-villain of sorts," nevertheless "there will be trial dates for himself and his cronies that will be pit stops on the way to the November elections."

But the Republican argument that DeLay's departure could foil the opposition was seconded yesterday by liberal author David Corn, who wrote on his blog: "Justice may be served by his fall, but not the Democrats' prospects in November."

DOJ_NMG_0025651

And Larry Sabato, a nonpartisan political analyst who closely tracks voter behavior, said by phone yesterday: "If DeLay had stayed in his reelection race, there would have been 1,000 headlines this fall about 'Tom DeLay's hot race and his battle to survive.' He has eliminated those headlines now. He did his party a favor. Now a different Republican can run and keep that seat for the Republicans. And every seat matters this year."

Sabato questions whether the Democrats can get traction with the corruption issue, now that "their poster boy is off the wall." As he sees it: "People need parables, someone who can put a face on a complicated issue. DeLay was a wonderful parable. Without DeLay front and center, people are more likely to lapse into, 'Yeah, they're all corrupt, both parties, just a bunch of crooks.' "

Indeed, it's historical fact that Washington's modern special-interest culture was basically created by the Democrats who controlled Congress for 40 successive years until 1995, and who in 1981 came up with the idea of giving greater access to corporate lobbyists in exchange for campaign money.

But, as DeLay critics see it, the relevant issue in 2006 is that DeLay institutionalized a cash-for-favors culture far beyond anything the Democrats did. And public-interest groups are mapping an '06 campaign that seeks to connect the Republican culture, as nurtured by DeLay, to real issues that affect voters' daily lives.

Case in point: Republicans, with heavy contributions from the pharmaceutical firms, passed the Medicare drug-prescription law - which explicitly bars the federal government from buying drugs in bulk and thereby saving seniors a lot of money. David Donnelly of the Public Campaign Action Fund contended yesterday that making these links could be "combustible" in November.

And many conservatives know that DeLay's legacy has not exactly helped their '06 election prospects. The directors of redstate.org wrote yesterday that "just because he is no lawbreaker does not mean he behaved in an ethical and honorable manner." The key to a comeback, they said, is for the still-Republican Congress "to be focused on achieving the right things for the right reasons."

DeLay's Departure A Relief For GOP (RC)

By Ben Pershing

Roll Call, April 5, 2006

With the House Republican majority he helped create in a peril also largely of his making, embattled Texas Rep. Tom DeLay (R) announced Tuesday that he would resign from Congress this year.

DeLay's decision marks the end of a career that helped transform nearly every aspect of Congressional politics, from lobbying and fundraising to redistricting, vote-counting and interparty relations.

The former Majority Leader's withdrawal from the House — which will occur at a still undetermined date before mid-June — brought forth effusive public praise and private sighs of relief from his Republican colleagues, who paid tribute to DeLay's achievements even as they hoped to rid themselves of the political effects of his burgeoning legal problems.

With DeLay's announcement, the expected passage of 527 reform this week and consideration of a broader lobbying reform package coming after the easter recess, House Republicans hope to finally get ahead of the ethics stories that have plagued them for the entire election cycle.

"In the long run this is great news because the 'Tom DeLay problem' goes away," said a House Republican leadership aide. "If he has further legal problems it will be on page A8 instead of A1 because he's no longer a Member of Congress."

After giving word of his decision to a select few media outlets Monday night, DeLay made his decision official Tuesday morning in a speech in Texas' 22nd district, where he had faced a very difficult re-election race against ex-Rep. Nick Lampson (D).

"Because I care so deeply about this district and the people in it, I refuse to allow liberal Democrats an opportunity to steal this seat with a negative, personal campaign," DeLay said, adding that he had "no regrets today, and no doubts. I am proud of the past. I am at peace with the present."

DeLay informed Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) — whom DeLay first brought into the leadership and mentored for more than a decade — of his decision on Monday and told other leaders of the news later in the day, holding a conference call with his Texas GOP colleagues that night.

"Over the last 11 years, Tom DeLay has been a most effective Majority Whip and Majority Leader for our Conference, and I am sorry to see him leave the House of Representatives," Hastert said in a statement, adding that DeLay "embodies the term steadfast and perseveres through even the toughest attacks on Republican ideals and principles."

Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio), a former DeLay enemy who succeeded the Texan in that post after DeLay was forced to step down, was similarly complimentary.

"I still believe that he is one of the most effective Whips that we have seen in the Congress, and I am sorry that he is leaving," Boehner said, later adding that DeLay "did a very honorable thing by stepping aside."

DOJ_NMG_0025652

Boehner, the former Conference chairman, also laughed as he observed that he was the "last man standing" from the elected leadership team that inaugurated the GOP's reign in the majority in 1994.

Of the GOP leaders elected in November of that year, Speaker Newt Gingrich (Ga.) resigned in 1998, Majority Leader Dick Armey (Texas) retired in 2002, then-Majority Whip DeLay announced his resignation this week and National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Bill Paxon (N.Y) retired in 1998.

Further down the ladder, Republican Policy Chairman Christopher Cox (Calif.) resigned in 2005, Conference Vice Chairwoman Susan Molinari (N.Y.) resigned in 1997 and Conference Secretary Barbara Vucanovich (Nev.) retired in 1996.

With the possible exception of 1998, most political observers believe House Republicans are in more dire straits now than they have been at any point since the 1994 takeover.

One major contributing factor to their weakness has been the incessant focus on their alleged ethical failings headlined by DeLay, who remains under indictment in Texas for allegedly laundering corporate money into 2002 state legislative races and is also under scrutiny in a wide-ranging federal investigation into bribery and fraud related to convicted former lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Abramoff has pleaded guilty to several charges, as have former DeLay press secretary Mike Scanlon and, most recently, former DeLay deputy chief of staff Tony Rudy, who admitted breaking the law while in DeLay's employ.

When DeLay was indicted by a Texas grand jury and temporarily stepped down from the Majority Leader post in September, his fellow Republicans almost universally pronounced him innocent of the charges and painted the Travis County prosecutor, Ronnie Earle, as a partisan attack dog.

And when DeLay permanently vacated the Leader post in January, most of his colleagues again expressed confidence that he would be exonerated.

But while Republicans praised DeLay Tuesday for his career achievements and for his decision, they mostly did not repeat the their earlier assertions that his legal troubles were baseless or driven solely by vengeful Democrats. At most, some simply said DeLay was innocent until proven guilty.

Boehner said that "to see [DeLay] being wrenched through this political stretching machine, if you will, rack, it is just not fair."

But when he was asked whether there was any "substance" to the allegations against DeLay, Boehner simply said, "I think the whole picture is a sad one. He has done a great job and to find himself in this predicament is regretful."

The news of DeLay's decision came during an already tumultuous week for House Republicans, who are hoping to pass a politically difficult budget and 527 reform as they parry questions about the Senate's progress on immigration reform.

"I think all of you know that this is probably the toughest week that I have had, this coming week, since I was elected Majority Leader," Boehner said to reporters Tuesday. "So I hope you all be a little charitable today. I don't think I ever took two Advil in the morning before I came to work, but I did today."

The House's plate is so full that there was very little discussion of DeLay at Tuesday's elected leadership meeting, with the conversation focused instead on the budget and 527 reform.

Even after he stepped down as Leader in September, DeLay continued to play an active role within the Conference, helping to assemble coalitions for tough votes and serving as an informal adviser to the leadership.

But DeLay largely stopped playing that role in January, according to leadership sources, as his legal predicament grew worse and he became more focused on his re-election race.

Capitalizing On DeLay Dropout (WSJ)

By Brody Mullins And David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Rep. Tom DeLay's decision to leave Congress is a wake-up call to his colleagues that anti-Washington sentiment is running high, which may dictate quick action on ethics legislation.

When a federal influence-buying probe heated up in January, Republicans pledged to learn from the past and enact reforms. But in deference to senior Republicans, the legislation has been delayed until at least late this month.

Now some Republicans say Mr. DeLay's resignation offers an incentive to act.

"This creates an opening for House Republicans to move aggressively to put this whole episode behind them," said Republican pollster Whit Ayers. "With his resignation, the House can pass strong ethics legislation and can credibly argue that they have learned from and responded to the whole imbroglio."

In 1994, powerful Democrats didn't respond to signs that their party had lost touch, and as a consequence lost control of the House that year to Republicans. It is unclear whether House Republicans are moving aggressively to head off similar political currents in an election year.

Mr. DeLay's decision to leave may have had as much to do with problems in his own backyard as his party's worries here. Mr. DeLay said he won't seek another term after he concluded he might lose his re-election race. The former No. 2 House Republican won the nomination in a crowded primary last month, but he faced a tough contest against former Democratic Rep. Nick Lampson and an independent challenger.

Ironically, Mr. DeLay made himself more vulnerable by driving through a Texas redistricting plan that his party implemented to pick up Republican seats in Texas in 2004. As part of the bargain, he absorbed into his district some Democratic precincts from his challenger Mr. Lampson, who then represented a neighboring Houston district, and in return moved some Republican precincts from his own district to help more vulnerable Republicans in surrounding districts. That left Mr. DeLay to run in a tougher, less Republican district.

A bigger problem was that former Rep. Steve Stockman -- a conservative maverick who was part of the fabled 1994 Republican class -- had come back to run against him as an independent.

"It was a much more complex environment for winning with Stockman taking votes away," said David Hill, a Texas pollster and Republican consultant who advised Mr. DeLay early in his House career. "That made the numbers a problem."

It is unclear how the resignation will affect the fight for control of Congress. Republicans hold 231 of the House's 435 seats, so a shift of just over a dozen seats would cost the party control for the first time since 1994.

Republicans said the resignation will make it tougher for Democrats to win seats because they won't have Mr. DeLay to kick around any more. "Democrats don't have an example No. 1 in their argument that there is a Republican culture of corruption," said Republican pollster Glen Bolger.

Democratic strategist James Carville argued Mr. DeLay's departure will have the opposite effect, confirming in voters' minds that something's amiss in Congress. "These guys don't just resign, they go out in a pine box," he said.

Few House Republicans have had as many ethics troubles as Mr. DeLay, who has been admonished by the House Ethics Committee three times. Last fall he was indicted in a state campaign-finance probe. Two of his former aides have pleaded guilty in a federal investigation into corruption by Republican lawmakers and former lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Mr. DeLay has said that he is innocent in both cases.

Republicans must deal with the effects while struggling with issues such as the budget and immigration. The man they elected to succeed Mr. DeLay as House majority leader, Ohio Rep. John Boehner, illustrates the party's situation. At a news conference yesterday he joked that he was "the last man standing" of the Republican rebels who took over the House in 1994. But he also admitted that for the first time he took Advil in the morning to deal with the headaches of the job.

DeLay Shows Need For Reform (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, April 5, 2006

Proponents of stricter lobbying laws say the resignation of embattled former Majority Leader Tom DeLay underscores the urgent need for reform.

"This Congress needs to be rescued," said Rep. Christopher Shays, Connecticut Republican. He added that members are being put on the defensive and need to tell voters: "We aren't as corrupt as you think."

Mr. Shays made his comments during a series of hearings on a lobbying reform bill that the House expects to debate and pass this spring.

Rep. Steve Chabot said yesterday that Mr. DeLay, Texas Republican, "has been a distraction" from key issues facing Congress. The Ohio Republican made his comments after a hearing of his Judiciary subcommittee on the constitution over the proposed lobbying bill.

The witnesses testifying at that hearing used Mr. DeLay as an illustration of the need to put tighter restrictions on lobbying.

"I don't need to remind you about the scandals," said Chellie Pingree, president of Common Cause, a nonpartisan watchdog organization. "You have unique power to restore our faith in elected leaders."

Miss Pingree noted that 85 percent of voters are concerned about corruption in Congress and worry that lawmakers will "ignore the headlines, and they can't be much bolder than they are this morning."

The measure under consideration requires lobbyists to disclose their expenses and activities more regularly and "puts more teeth into the enforcement of current law," Mr. Chabot said.

Also in the bill is a temporary suspension on privately funded travel for the rest of the 109th Congress and a ban on allowing lawmakers to travel with lobbyists on corporate flights. It also increases the penalty for violating ethics rules.

"Today's news certainly brings added stress to the situation," said Kenneth A. Gross, who heads a political law practice.

Rep. Jerrold Nadler, New York Democrat, said the recent indictments, resignations and prison sentences "have cast a pall over this institution, whether we like it or not."

DOJ_NMG_0025654

Without swift action, voters""will only become more cynical," he said.

Several House committees this week are expected to pass elements of the lobbying reform plan. The Senate passed its own version -- which includes a ban on gifts to lawmakers -- last week. The two chambers will need to reconcile the differences to the measures in a conference committee.

Rep. David Dreier, California Republican and chairman of the House Rules Committee, said passing ethics reform will make Congress "more accountable [and] more deliberative."

Enhancing disclosure will help both political parties clean up their image, he said.

Many lawmakers say the more pressing need is campaign finance reform. The House this week is expected to consider a measure dealing with 527 groups -- nonprofits funded mostly by wealthy activists.

Analysis: DeLay Leaves Troubling Legacy (AP)

By Tom Raum

The Associated Press, April 4, 2006

Tom DeLay leaves a troubling legacy for Republicans as they face re-election.

The Texan, once one of the most powerful and feared leaders of Congress, joined Newt Gingrich in helping to lead Republicans to power in 1994. But he became a symbol of the widening ethics scandal that now clouds GOP prospects for continued control.

Republicans face voters weary of corruption allegations and the heavy-handed tactics DeLay came to personify. At the same time, GOP candidates are further weighed down by President Bush's low approval ratings and the unpopularity of the war in Iraq.

"It's hard to believe that in just 12 years, Republicans could end up in the same situation that it took Democrats 40 years to get in," said Republican strategist Frank Luntz.

Luntz, who was once Gingrich's pollster and who helped orchestrate the 1994 "Contract With America," a set of unifying GOP policy initiatives, said the GOP majority now seems "tired" and those speaking out for change and innovation "are just not being noticed."

Republicans hold 231 of the 435 House seats. Democrats have 201. There is one independent and two vacancies.

DeLay said Tuesday he would resign from Congress rather than seek a 12th term so as not to hurt Republican chances. He acknowledged his re-election prospects were threatened.

The voters of his Houston-area district "deserve a campaign about the vital national issues that they care most about and that affect their lives every day, and not a campaign focused solely as a referendum on me," DeLay said.

He had stepped aside as House majority leader last fall after a grand jury in Texas indicted him, accusing him of funneling illegal corporate contributions into state legislative races. In January, he decided against trying to get the leadership post back amid a spreading election-year corruption scandal.

Former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, once a key DeLay ally, and two of DeLay's former aides have pleaded guilty in a Justice Department corruption probe and are cooperating with prosecutors.

DeLay denied anew on Tuesday that he had done anything wrong. "I'm not stupid," he said in an interview on MSNBC's "Hardball." He said he had checked with lawyers to make sure every one his actions was within the law and House rules.

"My lawyers have been told I'm not a target of the investigation," DeLay said. He said he managed his congressional office "by trusting the people I hired. Evidently, they mishandled that trust."

The Texas congressman said hoped to travel around the country to help unify the conservative movement and hoped to remain influential in Republican politics — something he suggested he could do better outside Congress.

"It's quite evident to me in the last couple of months that being a rank-and-file member, I'm not able to accomplish the things I have been able to accomplish," he said.

DeLay's resignation "marks the end of a 12-year reign of unquestioned Republican dominance and casts a shadow on the chances of Republicans in the fall elections," said Ross Baker, a political scientist at Rutgers University who specializes in Congress.

Under DeLay's sometimes iron-fisted rule, House Republicans marched pretty much in lockstep during Bush's first term, delivering one legislative victory after another. "Republicans, however loyal they may have been in the past, are now taking an every-man-for-himself attitude," Baker said.

Congress draws even lower public opinion ratings than the president. An AP-Ipsos poll last month showed only 31 percent of those surveyed approved of the job Congress was doing, compared with 37 percent for Bush.

When people were asked if they wanted to see Republicans or Democrats win control of Congress, Democrats got more backing, by 47 percent to 36 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0025655

Democrats have used DeLay's legal problems and those facing other Republicans — including Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist and former vice presidential chief of staff I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby — to claim that Republicans are in the grips of a "culture of corruption," an assertion they repeated on Tuesday.

DeLay's resignation might help to take the heat off rank-and-file Republicans — by removing from the scene an easy target for Democrats. But the Democrats signaled they were unlikely to change their focus whether DeLay was in Congress or not.

"Tom DeLay will leave behind a sad legacy of partisan political corruption," said Rep. George Miller (news, bio, voting record), D-Calif.

Further indictments and trials would help keep alive the "corruption" issue — and DeLay's role.

"As the Justice Department gets closer and closer to him through his aides, and if he is in more trouble, certainly the Democrats will use that," said James Thurber, an American University political science professor.

Republican leaders, from Bush to House Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois, were generous in their praise of DeLay on Tuesday. And Bush told reporters, "My own judgment is that our party will continue to succeed because we're the party of ideas."

Bush and DeLay haven't always seen eye to eye and are not close. Still, DeLay "has been a good soldier for Bush. And Bush has always said the right things when DeLay gets in trouble," said Bruce Buchanan, a political scientist at the University of Texas.

But there are limits to what Bush can do at this point to help DeLay — or Republicans facing tight races.

DeLay Says Prospect Of Losing Led Him To Step Down (HC)

By Kristen Mack, Eric Hanson, and Julie Mason

Houston Chronicle, April 5, 2006

U.S. Rep. Tom DeLay decided more than a week ago to resign his seat, disappointed with the margin of his Republican primary victory and looking at poll numbers that showed he might lose the seat in November, he said today.

DeLay said in an interview with Sam Malone on KTRH-AM (740) that he "should have done better" than his 62 percent showing against four challengers in the March 7 primary.

His internal polling showed he had a 50-50 chance of winning in November, he said.

"The district was very polarized," he said. "I had strong support and strong opposition."

He would have had to draw votes of moderate Republicans and independents, he said.

"Why risk it, when we can save the seat?," he said. The district leans Republican. "I'm incredibly confident I'm not leaving the 22nd District in jeopardy."

Former U.S. Rep. Nick Lampson is the Democratic nominee for the 22nd congressional district seat.

Lampson, whom DeLay has long lampooned as the "Hollywood" candidate because of his financial support from Democrats outside the state who oppose DeLay, will see that money supply dry up if he's running against less of a lightning rod than DeLay, the congressman predicted.

"He's got enough to run a campaign right now, but it's not going to be a referendum on me," DeLay said. "He has to defend his voting record."

DeLay, the subject of more ethics investigations than any other member of Congress, has been under increasing pressure from a sprawling investigation into political corruption that grew out of the lobbying activities of Jack Abramoff, with whom he had close political ties.

The ongoing investigation has an impact on him politically.

"I'm a realist and understand that," he said. "But all they have is guilt by association. I've served honestly and ethically. I've never broken a law or a House rule."

DeLay said he's not going away, but will fight for conservative causes in a different arena. And he says he will work to elect a conservative Republican as his successor.

DeLay has run up $2.5 million in legal fees, $1.5 million of which remain unpaid. He hopes to make some money on the speaking circuit to help pay those mounting legal bills.

"I feel very much at peace with this decision," he said. "I've already been planning and strategizing about what's next."

The resignation of Tom DeLay was the main topic of conversation Tuesday at Cinnamon's Bakery, a popular morning gathering place in the Sugar Creek area of Sugar Land.

Rich Christoffersen said customers were stunned by the announcement, with several saying the congressman's legal woes played a role in the resignation.

Christoffersen said current events and politics are frequent subjects discussed by morning customers who are generally supportive of DeLay.

"I think most folks are pretty sorry to see him go, with a few exceptions," Christoffersen said.

DOJ_NMG_0025656

"I am very disappointed to see him go. I think he was on the last true conservatives that were out there," he said.

Customer Abraham Joseph said he was surprised by the sudden nature of DeLay's resignation.

"I think he just buckled under pressure from the left, he didn't want to put up with all their whatever, so the best thing to do was just to back out," Joseph said.

Another customer, Charles Lojo, said DeLay has been a strong leader and wondered why the congressman would step down after winning a hard fought primary.

"It is really a shocker. Only he knows why and hopefully they are good reasons," Lojo said.

DeLay left Houston's Fox network studio around 9:20 a.m. without giving a statement to the press gathered outside. He rode in the front passenger's seat of a gray Lincoln and pulled into the station's garage.

He will not hold a press conference today, but has instead spent the day granting interviews to friendly reporters and news outlets. He also released a video address, which was distributed to news outlets.

DeLay called President Bush Monday with the news that he was stepping down from Congress, White House spokesman Scott McClellan said today.

The two for years have been uneasy allies, working together on shared goals despite sometimes sharp policy differences.

DeLay called Bush when the president was aboard Air Force One on Monday.

McClellan sidestepped questions about whether Bush was relieved by the fact that DeLay was seeking to defuse a controversy involving the congressional lobbying scandal, which has led two former DeLay staffers to plead guilty to corruption charges.

"Congressman DeLay has been a good ally with whom the president has worked to get things done for the people," McClellan said.

DeLay's ethics troubles have been a distraction for the White House, which has seen its once-ambitious domestic agenda stalled by ethics scandals, division over the war in Iraq and other complications.

Bush in the past year has run hot and cold on DeLay, expressing support and spending time with the embattled Sugar Land Republican, urging others not to pre-judge DeLay, and then putting some distance between the two of them.

McClellan said Bush will continue working with the new leadership in Congress, including on lobbying and other reforms.

"Congress is working to move forward on reforms and the president is committed to working with them," McClellan said.

The spokesman praised DeLay's efforts on behalf of Bush's agenda, including on tax cuts and the war on terrorism.

DeLay Departing On Own Terms (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

Under siege from state and federal probes into his actions and those of his closest aides and advisers, Rep. Tom DeLay had considered resigning on several occasions over the past four months. But he waited until after he had vanquished his challengers in the Republican primary to deny them the chance to become his successor, associates said.

DeLay's decision was also provoked by recent poll results that showed he faced a stiff challenge in November, the associates said.

They also cited what the Texas Republican has privately described at his frustration at no longer being a part of the House leadership, and his diminished satisfaction with rank-and-file congressional life. The lawmaker was forced to relinquish the post of majority leader after being indicted in Texas on a felony money-laundering charge last October; he had served in the job since 2002 and had been majority whip before then.

DeLay's decision allowed him to set the terms of his departure, avoiding what could have been a personally devastating loss at the polls in November. DeLay was determined to hang on to his seat at least through the primary, said Carl Forti, spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee. That was because he considered his three Republican challengers gadflies and traitors and he was determined to try to block them from succeeding him.

Several associates said DeLay was particularly influenced by poll results he received after his victory in the Republican primary on March 7, which made clear that his "negatives" in the district -- a routine tally of voters' emotional hostility toward him -- were high. That meant a close race would be won only with substantial effort and cash.

An additional impetus for putting off the resignation until now was suggested by John Feehery, a former aide to DeLay and House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.). "He needed to raise money for the defense fund. That was the bottom line," Feehery said. "He wanted to make sure he could take care of himself in the court of law." Under federal campaign rules, any reelection money a lawmaker raises can be used to pay legal fees stemming from official duties.

DeLay's decision to resign from the chamber he once ruled with a clenched fist gave some Republicans hope that the party can move beyond a burgeoning corruption scandal as the congressional election season heats up. That scandal so far has led to guilty pleas to corruption charges by lobbyist Jack Abramoff, once a close ally of DeLay's, and former DeLay aides Michael Scanlon and Tony C. Rudy, who worked with Abramoff after leaving their Capitol Hill jobs.

But Democrats vowed that they would not let their opponents slip the noose of what they have labeled a "culture of corruption."

"When a person steps down, it inflates the severity of the situation, and if they think after Tony Rudy, Jack Abramoff and the other guys the country will stop debate on these issues, they've got another thing coming," Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said yesterday. "Federal prosecutors don't care about Republican spin."

In a lengthy videotaped statement, DeLay formally said he will resign the suburban Houston seat he has held for 11 terms, taking his trademark jabs at "liberal Democrats" eager for an election fight and those he said are ready to misinterpret his every move.

"With the news of my decision, there of course will be great speculation among the political pundits and media about my reasons both for this decision and its timing. I'm quite certain most will put forth their opinions and conclusions devoid of and unencumbered by accuracy, facts and truth," he said. "I have no fear whatsoever about any investigation into me or my personal or professional activities."

The associates acknowledged that DeLay made his decision against the backdrop of a felony criminal charge in Texas that is unlikely to be resolved quickly, and amid growing interest by the Justice Department and the FBI in his family finances and the official actions he took at the behest of aides who recently pleaded guilty to involvement in a criminal conspiracy.

But DeLay -- as well as his associates -- said the decision resulted from his desire to avoid a defeat at the hands of voters in his district rather than a calculated effort to deflect any investigation.

GOP leaders were quick to praise the man who helped secure Republican control of the House and turn Washington into a bastion of Republican support. But when pushed, several Republicans conceded that DeLay bore some responsibility for the scandals that drove him from power -- scandals that reached into his House leadership offices.

"At the end of the day, the members are responsible for what happens in their offices and are responsible for their staff," said House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), who now occupies the leadership suite where Rudy and Abramoff say they traded funds and favor for legislative action. "And clearly, there were several . . . former staffers for Tom who ran off the road, and it is sad and unfortunate."

DeLay's potential legal challenges have increased in the past three months, as Abramoff, Scanlon and Rudy struck deals with a federal task force to gain reduced prison terms in exchange for their cooperation in a continuing public corruption probe. DeLay alluded in a Time magazine interview this week to being "hit" as a result of Abramoff's guilty plea in January.

As a government official familiar with the investigation said, a noteworthy aspect of the plea deals is the "dramatic premium" the Justice Department evidently places on obtaining information that might implicate others. For DeLay, this official said, "the federal case is going to get worse before it gets better."

But Richard Cullen, a key member of DeLay's defense team, said the resignation decision was not provoked by anything federal investigators have recently said. Several of DeLay's associates said that yesterday's announcement was jarring only to those not privy to DeLay's political anxieties stretching back to the 2004 race, when he won by his slimmest margin ever. "You get concerned" when you barely win against a middling opponent, a top DeLay adviser said.

Starting in December, DeLay's private polling pointed out serious political problems. At first, it suggested a roughly even voter split with former congressman Nick Lampson, the Democratic nominee. But it also showed that nearly eight in 10 voters were already firmly decided on one of the two candidates -- a rarity for a House race, especially considering that the general election was 11 months away. That meant changing minds would be costly.

The March 7 primary in which DeLay defeated three little-known Republicans with 62 percent provided a temporary boost for his campaign. But a poll DeLay commissioned two weeks ago to measure his progress with voters since December found no shift in the overall electorate since January.

That survey stoked concern in the DeLay operation because he had experienced a relatively positive run of media coverage in the past few months, and some fretted that if that was his high-water mark, he would be hard-pressed to win in November. The tally weighed heavily on DeLay after it was presented to him last week.

Rep. Henry Bonilla (R-Tex.), one of DeLay's strongest allies, said that although the former majority leader had "a sense of euphoria" after winning his primary race, this elation evaporated after he realized he would have to raise as much as $10 million to compete in the general election.

DeLay discussed his decision with Cullen last Wednesday, and he started informing others about it on Thursday. Few lawmakers or associates tried to talk him out of it, one of his advisers and others said.

"I don't think there was encouragement [for him to leave], but I think there's a great deal of relief," Feehery said. "It was a soap opera, and people are tired of soap operas. They want to get to work."

With DeLay expected to be out of Congress by mid-June, the National Republican Congressional Committee and Texas Republican officials expressed confidence that Republicans could easily retain a district that gave President Bush 64 percent of the vote in 2004. Former GOP congressman Steve Stockman, who threatened to run in the general election as an independent, said he may run as a Republican instead, joining a wide field of potential DeLay successors. They include Sugar Land Mayor David Wallace, who is organizing a campaign; Harris County Judge Robert Eckels; Tom Campbell, the second-place finisher in last month's Texas primary; Houston City Council member Shelley Sekula-Gibbs; former state district judge John Devine; and state Rep. Robert Talton.

DeLay said he would move his official residence to Alexandria and vowed to stay involved in grass-roots conservative causes and expand a foster-care program he started in Texas.

Friends and associates of DeLay say they think he can make a prosperous future for himself as a corporate-paid legislative strategist, book author and speaker.

DeLay Says He'll Lead From The Outside (DMN)

By Todd J. Gillman

The Dallas Morning News, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON – Once he leaves Congress, Tom DeLay hopes to put his talents to work pushing the conservative cause – without the trappings of power, the duties of high office or, perhaps, the huge political bull's-eye on his back.

Whether he gets that opportunity could hinge on whether he can clear up campaign money-laundering charges in Travis County and avoid getting ensnared in the Justice Department corruption inquiry that has nabbed three close associates.

"I have a lot of friends in the conservative movement," Mr. DeLay told MSNBC's Hardball in one of a handful of interviews he gave Tuesday. "They value my talents, and they listen to me. I think I can work with them."

As his surprise decision to quit Congress sunk in Tuesday, Republicans heaped praise on the deposed majority leader – and heaved sighs of relief in private as they took stock of the fallout. The outstanding questions were numerous: What will he do now? Can the GOP match "The Hammer's" glory days or replace his political street smarts?

Still others wondered what prompted the Sugar Land Republican to call it quits and what kind of influence he can wield.

"We're going to have a tremendous challenge to see whether or not we can function nearly as well without him as we did with him," said Rep. Tom Cole, R-Okla., a leading conservative who called Mr. DeLay a "historic figure," the most effective lawmaker in a generation. "This is a guy who produced victory after victory with very narrow legislative majorities."

Three days after a former top aide reached a plea deal – agreeing to testify in the corruption inquiry – Mr. DeLay declared that he would end his bid for a 12th term, give up his House seat by mid-June and change his legal residence to a condo in the capital's Virginia suburbs.

Explaining his decision

In a series of interviews with cable news outlets, he said criminal investigations had nothing to do with his decision.

Mr. DeLay said that when he filed for re-election in December, he expected his Texas criminal case to be resolved before the primary. Facing eight more months of campaigning and uncertain prospects at the polls, he thought it best to step aside and bolster the GOP's chances to retain his Houston-area seat. Some Republican colleagues speculated that winning the March 7 primary gave him the comfort of vindication with voters.

Now, Mr. DeLay said, he'll try to put his skills, contacts and energy to use pushing the conservative agenda from the outside.

"We are fractured and always have been fractured. I think I can be a unifying force," he said.

At least some allies seemed eager to embrace him.

"The entire left wing has been gunning after Congressman DeLay for years," said William Greene, president of RightMarch .com, a conservative group. "Yes, he won't be in Congress any longer – but there's no doubt that now he'll be a leader in other ways, moving the conservative agenda forward at a pace that will make the left wish they had just left him alone."

But such ambitions rang hollow to Mr. DeLay's legions of critics. Many were in a mood to gloat Tuesday.

"Tom DeLay is a gift that keeps on giving, and has been for a long time," said Chris Bell, the Texas Democratic nominee for governor. During Mr. Bell's one-term congressional career cut short by redistricting, he attacked Mr. DeLay's ethics.

The resignation caught Washington off-guard. Just a week ago, Mr. DeLay sent out a fundraising appeal vowing to work "every day" to represent conservative values. And many public officials facing criminal charges have used their grip on office as a bargaining chip with prosecutors.

DOJ_NMG_0025659

In Austin, Travis County District Attorney Ronald Earle said in a prepared statement that Mr. DeLay's decision doesn't affect the pending felony case involving allegations of campaign law violations. "This changes nothing," he said.

Federal prosecutors declined to discuss the resignation.

Mr. DeLay has not been implicated in the two-year corruption investigation, and he continued to maintain his innocence Tuesday. But he's been closely linked to the man at its core, fallen lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who has confessed to lavishing officials with millions in gifts and political contributions.

Friday's plea agreement by former DeLay deputy chief of staff Tony Rudy represented a serious evolution in the case. It included testimony that Edwin Buckham, a former chief of staff and spiritual adviser to Mr. DeLay, arranged illegal payments to Mr. Rudy when Mr. Rudy was a DeLay deputy.

Over four years, Mr. Buckham's lobbying firm paid Mr. DeLay's wife $115,000 for research on the charitable preferences of politicians – an arrangement critics have questioned.

Mr. Buckham's attorney did not return a phone call Tuesday.

Washington ethics lawyer Stan Brand, a former House counsel who defended former House Ways and Means Chairman Dan Rostenkowski and other Democrats, called it curious that Mr. DeLay would resign.

"Most members under a cloud stay as long as possible because being an incumbent is something of an advantage in the legal process," he said. But the Rudy plea put prosecutors in the "inner sanctum of DeLay's office. ... It's hard to conceive of a situation where they indict these people around him, including people in his own office, and don't go after him."

Democrats said Mr. DeLay's departure doesn't remove the taint of corruption from the GOP. They cited the ongoing "K Street project" – an effort Mr. DeLay initiated in the 1990s to pressure trade associations and lobbying firms to steer plum jobs to loyal Republicans.

"DeLay may be gone, but nothing has changed," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. "The Republican culture of putting the special interests first does not revolve around just one man."

Privately, many Republicans expressed relief that Mr. DeLay is moving on. And some of the praise Tuesday was restrained.

Bush's reaction

"I wish him all the best," President Bush told reporters. "It had to have been a very difficult decision for someone who loved representing his district in the state of Texas."

Speaker Dennis Hastert, who was Mr. DeLay's deputy whip before leapfrogging him into the House's top job, called him "a most effective" leader, citing the role he played securing GOP wins on a Medicare drug benefit, tax cuts and trade deals. But he suggested that Mr. DeLay isn't indispensable.

"We have a bold vision, and our agenda will continue," he said.

Lawmakers in both parties said Texas will miss his influence.

"Tom has been a tireless advocate for his constituents for over two decades," Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison said.

For nearly a decade, Texans held two of the top three House positions – Majority Leader Dick Armey and No. 3-ranked Mr. DeLay in the whip's post. When Mr. Armey left, Mr. DeLay moved up.

The congressional redistricting that Mr. DeLay engineered in 2003 led to the ouster of six Democrats, among them some of the most senior lawmakers in the party – including Dallas Rep. Martin Frost, who had led the party's House campaign arm and served as top Democrat on the Rules Committee, and top Democrats on the Agriculture and Homeland Security committees.

Mr. DeLay's replacement will start at the bottom of the seniority ladder.

Democrats said Mr. DeLay's resignation completed a scorched-earth policy that has left Texas largely bereft of clout.

"It's important to have a strong leader on behalf of the state of Texas to bring back resources on behalf of the people," said Rep. Sheila Jackson Lee, D-Houston. "The distinction here was that Tom's leadership was divisive. He divided the Texas delegation."

Why DeLay Quit (NATREV)

By Byron York

National Review, April 4, 2006

Rep. Tom DeLay says he made the decision to leave Congress after taking a poll in his Texas district which showed he had no better than a 50-50 chance of winning reelection this November.

In a long discussion with conservative journalists Tuesday afternoon, DeLay discussed the Republican primary he faced last month, which he won with 62 percent of the vote. While some observers called that an impressive win, given the controversy that surrounds DeLay, the congressman himself said that was when he knew he had a problem.

DOJ_NMG_0025660

"After the primary — you get a sixth sense about this stuff," DeLay said. "You know your district...You don't need polls, but we ran a poll anyway. And the poll showed, basically, that I had a 50-50 chance of winning." DeLay said he had commissioned a similar poll late last year, and "the one after the primary was slightly worse than the one in December" — suggesting that his support was shrinking.

"Sixty-two percent was kind of a lift around here," DeLay said. "People gave me a lot of credit for 62 percent. But for a 21-year incumbent, 62 percent — I mean, it's good, but it should have been 70-percent-plus. Sixty-two percent means 38 percent voted against me. So I wanted a poll done. We did the poll. I was going to spend whatever it took to decide what I was supposed to do, whether to get in or get out."

DeLay said that after the primary, "I spent a lot of time in prayer. Spent all the time in prayer." He said he talked to a number of people who are close to him, and he got the impression that he should stay in the race. "I thought right after the primary, I was supposed to go through this," he said. "What's that saying? Hardened by fire? But as time went on it was quite evident that I was supposed to evaluate the election and face reality, and the reality was I wasn't supposed to go through this, that I am supposed to get involved outside the House. I can do more good outside the House in the next few months than being locked in the 22nd District trying to fight a reelection campaign."

"I have a very strong base, an incredibly strong base," DeLay continued. "I've never seen anything like it. People that would die for me. I also have a very strong opposition that would kill me if they could get hold of me."

Such polarization, DeLay said, left very few undecideds. "What's left are soft moderate Republicans," DeLay explained, "and independents that will vote for anybody but Tom DeLay, that believe for whatever reason that he's a crook, or where there's smoke, there's fire, so the beating that I've been taking has had that impact. And what I saw was it would take a ton of money to take that small group that I could appeal to and turn them around — in the face of getting beat up every day by the mainstream media and paid-for 527s."

DeLay attributed many of his problems to Ronnie Earle, the Texas county district attorney who has indicted DeLay on campaign-finance charges. "He used this case to drag my name through the mud," DeLay said, "and he has abused the grand jury-process to drag my name through the mud."

The problem, DeLay explained, was the interplay of Earle's investigation and a House GOP rule that requires members of the leadership to step down if they are indicted. "I truly believe that the only reason I was indicted is because we have that stupid rule — that is, politically, the stupidest thing we've ever done," DeLay said. The rule, he continued, in essence "allows the Democrats to pick the Republican leadership."

"But we have it," DeLay continued. "I honored it."

Now that he will soon be out, DeLay said, he feels confident that a Republican will win the seat from his district, which President Bush carried with 64 percent of the vote in 2004. "People say, isn't this a defeat?" DeLay said. "No, it's an incredible victory. Because the 22nd District is going to have a Republican fill that seat, guaranteed. That's what my polls show. Any Republican running as a Republican will walk into that seat."

DeLay also predicted that his departure from the race will hurt the candidacy of Democratic challenger Nick Lampson, who has benefited from support and money from Democrats all around the country who wanted to see DeLay go down in defeat. "Nick Lampson's money is going to dry up," DeLay said. "He's going to have to talk about what he believes in. He's got as bad a liberal Democrat voting record as Sheila Jackson Lee. We've done our opposition research, and he does not fit this district. I consider that a victory....We will have a Republican, and I will be out doing what I do best, and that is strategizing to lead the conservative cause and elect Republicans."

When the talk turned to the Abramoff scandal, and the guilty plea of former DeLay deputy chief of staff Tony Rudy, DeLay said he had no idea that Rudy had been engaged in any criminal activity.

"The leadership office is a whirlwind of activity all day long," DeLay said. "There are things going on constantly. Maybe my management style is suspect. But we hired and had and always have had one of the best staffs on the Hill. Why? Because I hired people that wanted to accomplish the same things that I wanted to accomplish, and I have given them responsibilities and have trusted them to carry out those responsibilities. Unfortunately that trust was mishandled, obviously, by Tony Rudy. He admitted to it. That disappoints me greatly. But it had nothing to do with me."

DeLay said he has not seen the Rudy plea agreement. One section of that agreement says that, "In March and April 2000, Rudy obtained a letter from Representative #2 [DeLay] to an Executive Branch official opposing a postal rate increase that would have harmed one of Abramoff's clients." When asked about that, DeLay said he suspected that Rudy knew DeLay would be opposed to such an increase and tried to profit from that knowledge. "Frankly, what it sounds like from what I read in the media was that they were trading off of knowing that I would already be in those positions," DeLay said. "I have always opposed postal rate increases. So you know this one's coming up, DeLay's going to be against it, so I'm going to make some money off of it, telling so-and-so and so-and-so that I can get DeLay to be against it. Maybe that's what they were doing, it sounds like to me."

As for another former aide, DeLay said he "ran off" Michael Scanlon. "Scanlon — we didn't fire him, but we found him another job," DeLay said. "I'm not surprised about Scanlon, but I am shocked and surprised about Tony Rudy."

As for himself, DeLay said he asked his lawyers to do a thorough review of all of his dealings in Congress. "I spent a lot of money and four months of lawyers investigating me as if they were prosecuting me," DeLay said. "They have looked at everything that I've got for 20 years, the whole time I'm here, and there ain't nothing."

"There is absolutely nothing illegal in my operation. There's nothing untoward. There's nothing unethical. We also cooperated with the Department of Justice, given them everything we've got."

"They asked for it?"

"No. We just gave it to them."

"You volunteered?"

"Yes."

DeLay said the material he gave the Justice Department included "anything connected to Tony Rudy, Ed Buckham, Abramoff, or Scanlon." Beyond that, DeLay said he has had no contact with prosecutors. "None," he said. "And they have told my lawyers I'm not a target of the investigation. Of course, we have been saying that for three months and the press refuses to write about it."

Finally, DeLay addressed the work he did on the issue of lobbying and the so-called "K Street Project." "I am actually very proud of the K Street Project," DeLay said. "When we came in, I realized right away in 1995 that we may have taken the majority, but we haven't changed the culture of Washington, D.C. And I immediately started strategizing to change that culture. I mean, how in the world could you maintain a majority up here if all of K Street were Democrat lobbyists that owed their power and their checkbook to the Democrats, and their friends who were out of power?"

"We put together, I think, one of the largest and strongest political coalitions ever. We turned the culture from K Street contributing 70 percent of its campaign funds to Democrats and 30 percent to Republicans to today 60 percent Republican, 40 percent Democrat....It was so well done that the Democrats hate it, and they're working as hard as they can to destroy it."

Legal Costs Will Remain Challenge For DeLay (RC)

By Paul Kane

Roll Call, April 5, 2006

With no personal wealth to fall back on, Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) faces mounting legal and financial troubles even as he flees a thicket of ethical scandals inside a chamber he dominated for more than a decade.

DeLay is still facing an Austin, Texas, trial on campaign finance charges later this year, and the workings of his old leadership office continue to be under the microscope of federal investigators probing the previously hidden lobbying transactions of Jack Abramoff.

DeLay appears to have even acknowledged that another former staffer will face an indictment or cut a plea agreement with the Justice Department. In an interview with Time magazine Monday, DeLay said three former aides had “violated the trust of my office.”

“Unfortunately, there’s three ... that I don’t yet, I’ll wait until they’re found guilty,” he told Time.

That appears to be a reference to Ed Buckham, a former DeLay chief of staff who was implicated in Friday’s plea agreement by former DeLay deputy chief of staff Tony Rudy. So far, Rudy and former press secretary Michael Scanlon are the only ex-DeLay staffers to have pleaded guilty as part of Abramoff’s more than seven-year conspiracy to win official favors on Capitol Hill and in the Bush administration.

Any official legal move against Buckham would draw the case that much closer to DeLay, because Buckham has been considered his most trusted adviser, personally and politically, even after leaving DeLay’s office in December 1997.

Buckham and Rudy previously had been using the services of the same lawyer, Laura Ariane Miller, but Miller has declined repeated requests from news organizations to say if she’s still representing Buckham at a time when Rudy has singled him out in his own plea agreement. Buckham previously has denied any wrongdoing.

Once DeLay leaves office later this spring, it’s unclear how he’ll be able to meet his ever-rising legal bills. He has been using a legal defense fund to defray most of the costs, a fund that continues to raise money in increments of up to $5,000 per contributor, per year, under House rules.

Brent Perry, the fund's trustee, said it brought in more than $250,000 in the first quarter this year, money that was instantly turned around and paid to lawyers, leaving the fund nearly exhausted.

Perry rejected reports that the defense fund had more than $500,000 in its coffers at the end of 2005, saying, "Anytime I've had six figures in the trust, it's only been a matter of days before the money was spent."

If his backers are still willing to support him financially as an ex-Congressional leader, DeLay may be able to finance his debt through big-money donors with a private defense fund once he retires. Funds for private sector individuals, such as the one that recently raised more than $2 million for indicted former White House aide Scooter Libby, can accept unlimited donations from individuals and corporations. Those donations are not tax deductible for contributors and may run into gift-tax issues as well.

But as he heads for the exit, DeLay is left without any obvious personal wealth to use to pay legal bills.

When he first rose to national prominence in the mid-1990s, DeLay had little in the way of savings. A disclosure form detailing his personal finances at the end of 1997 showed that, other than his personal residence, DeLay had only $60,000 to $150,000 in holdings, the lion's share of it in Exxon Inc. stock.

Seven years later, DeLay held $80,000 to $200,000 in assets, split between Exxon stock and accounts with Wells Fargo and Charles Schwab, according to his 2004 disclosure form. However, at that time, DeLay was a net debtor, having already accumulated legal bills running from $125,000 to $260,000.

In addition to his home in Sugar Land, Texas, where he intends to retire, DeLay owns a condominium in Alexandria, Va., and for the time being he will need to retain the condo because he needs to use that as his new permanent residence in order to get his name off the Texas Congressional ballot in November.

An estimate from the National Taxpayers Union found that, at most, DeLay could expect $56,000 a year from his pension for almost 22 years of Congressional service. However, it is unclear if he immediately can begin receiving his full pension or wait three years until he turns 62.

As Roll Call reported in February, DeLay began earlier this year to dip into his campaign account to defray some of the costs related to the Abramoff probe. In mid-February, while still preparing for a re-election battle that he thought would cost close to $10 million, DeLay's campaign was sitting on $1.3 million.

It's unclear how much of that money was spent in beating back several challengers in the March 7 primary, or to what level the campaign fund was replenished in the final weeks of March.

Any leftover campaign funds could now be used to pay his legal bills, the course followed by ex-Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.) after his recent resignation and by ex-Sen. Bob Torricelli (D-N.J.) after he bowed out of his re-election amid ethics allegations in 2002.

But DeLay — who prided himself on creating a "team" attitude in the GOP Conference that involved giving contributions to colleagues, candidates and party committees — may feel peer pressure to turn over a large chunk of that cash to lawmakers or the National Republican Congressional Committee, as is allowed under the law.

In the two months before his GOP primary, DeLay was on the receiving end of a financial outpouring from his colleagues, taking in almost $100,000 from the campaign accounts of fellow House Republicans, their political action committees and their relatives, according to reports filed with the Federal Election Commission.

Even if DeLay decides to use a substantial chunk of his campaign committee's cash to pay for lawyers, it's unclear whether that will be enough to cover the mounting costs.

After his campaign paid $110,000 in February to McGuire Woods, home to Richard Cullen, the lawyer handling the Abramoff matter, DeLay's legal payments topped $1 million since July 2004, according to records with the House and the FEC.

But his bills have only soared since and will continue to do so, particularly once the Texas trial approaches and commences, and the team of lawyers working on the Abramoff investigation continue to bill hours at a high rate.

The recent agreement the Justice Department worked out with Rudy officially placed the Abramoff scandal squarely inside DeLay's leadership office, as Rudy pleaded guilty to a criminal conspiracy that began in 1997, when he was DeLay's press secretary, continuing through his rise to deputy chief of staff and then into the lobbying world in 2001.

Without officially naming Buckham, the plea agreement clearly identifies him as someone who at times worked hand-in-hand with Abramoff as a co-leader of the conspiracy, working with the confessed felon to funnel $86,000 to Rudy's family while he worked for DeLay in exchange for official favors.

In addition, the plea agreement covers events through 2004, meaning that Rudy — who left Abramoff's firm and went to work for Buckham at his Alexander Strategy Group in mid-2002 — has admitted to committing crimes while working for two-and-a-half years at Buckham's side.

House Ethics Panel Not Investigating DeLay, Other Lawmakers (USAT)

By Jim Drinkard
USA Today, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — The House ethics committee, inactive for more than a year because of partisan disputes, has declined to launch investigations of Rep. Tom DeLay, R-Texas, and other lawmakers accused of ethical lapses.

A six-hour meeting Thursday ended in partisan deadlock, according to one Republican and one Democrat familiar with the panel's deliberations. Both declined to be identified because of committee non-disclosure rules. At issue was whether the committee could begin investigations without interfering with ongoing criminal probes.

The committee has taken different approaches to that problem in the past. In some cases, as with Rep. Bud Shuster, R-Pa., it carried on a parallel probe while coordinating to make sure it didn't damage the government's case. In others, as with Rep. James Traficant, D-Ohio, it deferred its investigation until prosecutors completed their work.

Besides DeLay, the panel deadlocked last week over whether to launch investigations of Reps. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, and William Jefferson, D-La. The inaction comes as the House of Representatives prepares to take up legislation that would revamp the relationships between lobbyists and lawmakers. Several committees are set to draft pieces of an overall bill this week.

DeLay, who announced Tuesday his plans to retire from Congress, is the subject of a money-laundering case in his home state of Texas. In addition, two former aides have pleaded guilty to charges in connection with the Jack Abramoff lobbying and corruption scandal. Richard Cullen, one of DeLay's attorneys, said federal prosecutors have not indicated that his client is implicated in that case.

The House ethics panel has been gridlocked since January 2005 because of partisan disputes over its rules, staff and procedures. In the meantime, ethical questions have arisen about DeLay; Ney, who had to step down as House Administration Committee chairman because he is also caught up in the Abramoff scandal; and Jefferson, who is under investigation in a bribery case. A former aide to Jefferson has pleaded guilty in that case.

After the session, Rep. Alan Mollohan, D-W.Va., the panel's senior Democrat, issued a statement noting that the lengthy meeting yielded only one agreement: to continue an investigation begun in 2004 of Rep. Jim McDermott, D-Wash., who has admitted leaking to reporters a tape-recorded cellphone conversation involving a Republican colleague in 1996.

Committee chairman Doc Hastings, R-Wash., declined to comment on the panel's deliberations. Mollohan referred a reporter to his statement, which said the panel's limited action "falls far short of the committee's obligations in the current circumstances."

The Senate's lobbying bill would ban meals and gifts from lobbyists to lawmakers and their aides but contains few other prohibitions, focusing instead on new disclosure requirements for lobbyists. A USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll Feb. 28-March 1 found that 59% of Americans are "not too" or "not at all" confident that Congress can police itself on matters of ethics.

Republicans See Better Prospects In Texas Race (RC)

By David M. Drucker
Roll Call, April 5, 2006

With Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) out of the way, Republicans concerned with holding his seat were breathing a collective sigh of relief Tuesday, while Democrats countered that the 22nd district was still theirs for the taking.

DeLay's surprise resignation announcement touched off a flurry of behind-the-scenes maneuvering Tuesday, as potential Republican candidates sought to gauge their viability as his replacement on the Nov. 7 ballot.

A spokesman for the Democratic nominee, former Rep. Nick Lampson, said the absence of DeLay and his luggage-set of ethics issues to run against would not significantly alter the ex-Congressman's strategy, nor would it hamper his fundraising effort.

But Republican officials based in the Houston area insisted that a once-competitive district in danger of being flipped by the Democrats had just turned into a walk for DeLay's as-yet-to-be-determined replacement as the Republican nominee.

"The numbers aren't there, that's why they were having to base their entire campaign on running against Tom DeLay," said Harris County Republican Party Chairman Jared Woodfill. "Now they don't have that."

But Lampson campaign manager Mike Malaise said the former Congressman's campaign has been about far more than running against DeLay. Malaise said voters in the 22nd district already had an unfavorable opinion of DeLay, freeing up Lampson to run a positive campaign focused on the issues.

With DeLay gone, however, it will be easier for Republicans to focus media and voter attention on Lampson's record.

A memo distributed by the National Republican Congressional Committee Tuesday sought to highlight Lampson's liberal voting record. Lampson, the memo says, voted against the Bush tax cuts of 2001 and 2003, voted against eliminating the marriage tax penalty and voted against repealing the estate tax, also known as the death tax.

DOJ_NMG_0025664

But Malaise noted that Lampson has an "A" rating from the National Rifle Association. He is well positioned to win this race, as Republican voters in the district are disappointed with the GOP-controlled Congress and its record of rising deficits, foreign debt and wasteful spending, Malaise said.

Lampson previously represented about 20 percent of the current 22nd district for eight years, as a portion of it fell into the district he held prior to the DeLay-engineered mid-decade remap of Texas Congressional seats.

"There aren't many left-wing extremists who have multiple endorsements from the NRA," Malaise said, adding: "A lot of people here were extremely disappointed in the Congress DeLay led."

DeLay's decision to forgo re-election and resign from Congress, made public late Monday night, has buoyed Republicans by opening a seat with a strong GOP tilt. Because DeLay already won the Republican primary, replacing him on the ballot will fall to a committee of four electors.

According to Woodfill, Texas election law stipulates that the four electors be chosen by a caucus of the voting-precinct chairmen from each of the four counties that fall in the 22nd district. Only the chairmen who represent precincts that lie within the district will participate in the caucus.

To satisfy a requirement for removing his name from the ballot, DeLay plans to move his official residence from Sugar Land, Texas to Alexandria, Va. By no longer residing in Texas, DeLay would be ineligible to run.

The Republican chairmen of the four counties at least partly encompassed by the 22nd district were flooded with phone calls Tuesday by individuals interested in running in DeLay's place. When asked who they thought would end up actively going after the electors' appointment, the same names came up: Sugar Land Mayor David Wallace; state Sen. Kyle Janek; state Rep. Charlie Howard; Harris County Tax Assessor-Collector Paul Bettencourt; Harris County Judge Robert Eckels; and Houston City Councilwoman Shelley Sekula-Gibbs, among others.

"It's so wide open at this point," said Fort Bend County Republican Party Chairman Eric Thode.

Woodfill predicted that after the dust settled, the top contenders would get together with the leading GOP officials in the district and attempt to prevent a messy, intraparty fight.

Less clear at press time was whether Texas Gov. Rick Perry (R) would schedule a special election to fill DeLay's seat for the remaining few months of his term. DeLay said he would likely officially resign by mid-June, so the machinations to replace him cannot officially begin until then.

Wallace has already said he plans to seek the seat, while Howard, Eckels and Sekula-Gibbs indicated they are looking into it. Janek said he has decided not to run, but some say he could change his mind if appealed to by party officials.

Regardless of who emerges from the scrum, the NRCC is confident that the GOP will hold the seat.

"This is a district that is 5 points more Republican than the district Lampson lost last cycle, and he was an incumbent who outspent his Republican opponent," NRCC spokesman Carl Forti said. "He's going to get his butt kicked."

In 2004, Lampson spent $2.4 million to his opponent's $1.5 million, but still lost by 13 points to now-Rep. Ted Poe (R) in the newly drawn 2nd district.

The suburban Houston 22nd district, said Thode, can be expected to deliver a base vote of 56 percent for a standard Republican candidate (DeLay garnered 55 percent in 2004, while President Bush received 64 percent).

Lampson has raised hundreds of thousands of dollars, if not more, from national Democratic donors and liberal interest groups, all under the assumption that the money would be used to unceremoniously retire DeLay.

Now that the former Majority Leader has pre-empted a possible election defeat, Republicans believe the national focus on this race, and the money that scrutiny drove to Lampson, will cease.

"If you're Nick Lampson, your chance to pick up 6 percent was based on [DeLay's] baggage; it's now not there," Thode said. "It was all about getting rid of DeLay; DeLay's gone. [Lampson's] money just dried up."

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee remains optimistic that Lampson can flip the seat. Depending on which Republican is selected to replace DeLay, Democrats feel they still have a good chance of tying that candidate to the Congressman and the ethics scandals attached to his name.

Democrats also believe the national mood for change in Washington, D.C., is seeping into the 22nd district, while noting that Lampson is well-liked in the part of the district that includes the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, not to mention the portion of the district in Galveston County he once represented.

"He's very popular in the district. He's doing incredibly well," DCCC spokeswoman Sarah Feinberg said. "Democrats' chances in Texas 22 are excellent."

Constituents Look To Fill Void In District (USAT)

By Andrea Stone

USA Today, April 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0025665

SUGAR LAND, Texas — Like him or not — and voters in Tom DeLay's suburban Houston district do both — there seemed to be a shared feeling here Tuesday that it's just as well the troubled 11-term Republican congressman is moving on.

On the day DeLay announced he will leave Congress amid charges he laundered political money, his constituents seemed split about his guilt but resigned to his future.

At the America Buffet in nearby Stafford, onetime DeLay supporter Judy Karnika, 49, called his resignation "pretty close to an admission of guilt."

Rabbi Stuart Federow, 53, of Clear Lake is an admirer of DeLay's "morality and ethics" who said the former House majority leader may not be guilty of wrongdoing. But, he added, "it reaches a point where for the good of the people and the good of the party, you have to step aside, even if you're innocent."

DeLay maintains his innocence, even as a lobbying scandal has enveloped former staffers. As he leaves to devote himself to his defense and to what he says will be an attempt to bolster the conservative cause from outside Congress, it is unclear whether he will still be a factor in this fall's pivotal battle for control of the House of Representatives.

Gov. Rick Perry is expected to call a special election to fill DeLay's term, said Eric Thode, Republican chairman of Fort Bend County in DeLay's 22nd Congressional District. That contest, which could include a dozen candidates, is likely to be "a circus act that's totally irrelevant," Thode said.

All eyes, instead, will be on whom a committee of local GOP leaders chooses to face former Democratic congressman Nick Lampson on the November ballot.

Thode said DeLay's departure — after polls showed only a narrow lead over his Democratic challenger — makes the race "100% easier" for a Republican successor in a "hard-core" Republican district. "The bogeyman is gone," Thode said. "This is Nick Lampson's worst nightmare."

Lampson disagreed, insisting his campaign has never been about just DeLay.

"The names will change, but the issues are going to remain the same," he said.

Republican redistricting might benefit Lampson. To help other Texas Republicans, DeLay diluted the Republican Party's grip on his own district. An influx of minorities also has altered the district's makeup, making it friendlier to Democrats. Add Lampson's $2.5 million campaign war chest advantage over any late-starting Republican, and Democrats have a chance to pick up the seat, said Cal Jillson, a political scientist at Southern Methodist University in Dallas.

"The fact is, Republicans in that district are chagrined and embarrassed by DeLay and all of his ethical problems," Jillson said. "Whoever they put up will have an uphill fight."

Among Republican contenders are Sugar Land Mayor David Wallace and lawyer Tom Campbell, who came in second to DeLay in last month's GOP primary.

Jillson said Wallace is the favorite of party leaders, but he doubts Wallace can make the leap from mayor of a small suburb to running "in a very closely watched race where you're going to have to come up with several million dollars" to win. Wallace could not be reached for comment.

Most callers Tuesday on DJ Sam Malone's show on Houston's KTRH-AM radio were "dancing" over DeLay's fall, Malone said.

Not everyone was celebrating. "He was too powerful in Congress, and there needed to be a scapegoat," Sandra Voughal, 47, a Sugar Land homemaker, said as she sat at a bookstore cafe. "He's a very savvy person, but I think he recognized his day was over."

Announcement Puts 22nd District Up For Grabs (DMN)

By Bruce Nichols

The Dallas Morning News, April 5, 2006

HOUSTON – One thing seemed clear Tuesday after U.S. Rep. Tom DeLay announced he would resign from Congress. Democratic challenger Nick Lampson has lost his biggest campaign issue: Mr. DeLay.

Beyond that, a lot was up in the air. When should a special election be held to complete his term? Who will take Mr. DeLay's place as the Republican nominee in the general election?

"I think Lampson's best chance was running against Tom DeLay as a candidate indicted but not yet tried and/or convicted or acquitted," Rice University political scientist Robert Stein said.

On the other hand, Republicans and Gov. Rick Perry have a lot to decide, Richard Murray of the University of Houston said, and "resolving this is not necessarily going to be without friction on the Republican side," he said.

Several prominent Republicans expressed interest in taking Mr. DeLay's place, including Harris County Judge Robert Eckels and Sugar Land Mayor David Wallace. Lawyer Tom Campbell, who lost to Mr. DeLay in the recent Republican primary, said he would like to run.

DOJ_NMG_0025666

Mr. DeLay's decision, announced late Monday, to step down from his suburban, District 22 seat comes as questions mount about his involvement in a growing Capitol Hill ethics scandal. At the same time, he and several lieutenants face trial in Austin on charges stemming from corporate fundraising through a DeLay-created political committee, Texans for a Republican Majority.

Two separate issues are involved in replacing Mr. DeLay, said Scott Haywood, spokesman for the Texas secretary of state's office. One is choosing someone to complete his term and the other is picking a new Republican nominee for the November general election.

Nothing can happen until Mr. DeLay disqualifies himself by moving his residency out of state, thereby removing himself from the November ballot. He said he plans to solve that problem by moving to Virginia after completing some district business, perhaps by mid-June.

After Mr. DeLay departs, Mr. Perry would be required to call a special election – a free-for-all, open to all qualified candidates – to complete the term. House vacancies can't be filled by appointment. It's basically up to Mr. Perry when that election is staged. It could even be the same day as the general election, Nov. 7, officials said.

"I'm pushing for having them on the same day as the most efficient approach," said Republican consultant Allen Blakemore of Houston.

With simultaneous elections, Republicans reduce the risk of a possible surprise winner in the special election becoming a front-runner, and with the district 60-40 Republican, a party nominee with no ethics baggage would be expected to win, Dr. Murray said.

But some in the party might prefer an earlier special election, he said.

The new general election nominee will be picked by GOP leaders. A committee of precinct chairs in the district will have first shot. The State Republican Executive Committee will take charge if they were unable to agree by 70 days before Nov. 7.

Interestingly, if the special and general elections are the same day, voters might or might not see both ballots on the same piece of paper, Mr. Haywood said. "The counties actually have the option," he said.

Among the people expressing interest in the race, Judge Eckels would appear to have an edge because of his strong name identification and his success helping manage Houston's response to hurricanes in Louisiana and East Texas, analysts said.

Mr. Wallace has a strong base in the Sugar Land area, and Mr. Campbell, a former general counsel for the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, carries the cachet of having challenged Mr. DeLay in the primary.

Houston City Council member Shelley Sekula Gibbs, a dermatologist, also expressed interest but is considerably lower in profile.

Renegade Republican Steve Stockman, a former Congressman unseated by Mr. Lampson in his old Beaumont-based district, had expressed interest in mounting an independent candidacy before Mr. DeLay withdrew. There is also a Libertarian candidate, Bob Smither.

Just because Mr. Lampson has lost his main campaign issue doesn't mean his campaign is dead in the water, Dr. Murray said. He has $2 million contributed largely by national Democratic sources, and every day Mr. DeLay puts off his official departure is another day Mr. Lampson has the field to himself, Dr. Murray said.

Complicating the matter is the possibility that, before Mr. DeLay's successor is chosen, the U.S. Supreme Court could overturn the Texas congressional redistricting that Mr. DeLay engineered, raising another set of questions.

It's unclear when the Supreme Court will rule on a challenge to the plan Mr. DeLay put together to strengthen the GOP's hold on Texas' U.S. House delegation. But a decision could come as early as June, Dr. Stein said.

If the high court returned Texas to the previous boundaries, that could scramble all Texas Congressional races. In the case of Mr. DeLay's district, it conceivably could send Mr. Lampson back to Beaumont to seek his old seat now held by Republican Ted Poe, Dr. Murray said.

There's also some risk for Mr. Perry, who is seeking re-election as governor, analysts said.

He faces possible sniping from gubernatorial election opponents if he doesn't call an emergency election. On the other hand, unless a clear consensus GOP choice for Mr. DeLay's seat emerges, he faces possible internal Republican friction that could hurt his own election bid, Dr. Murray said.

A Surprise Move Leaves Texas Politics In Disarray (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

HOUSTON, April 4 — Less than a month after Representative Tom DeLay boasted of giving Republican rivals "an old-fashioned Texas whoopin'," his surprise resignation threw state politics into turmoil Tuesday, with the prospect of an electoral free-for-all in coming months.

DOJ_NMG_0025667

"Now it gets interesting," said Jared Woodfill, the Harris County Republican chairman, one of four party officials whose organizations will be faced with the job of selecting a nominee to replace Mr. DeLay on the ballot in November. Before that, however, a special election as soon as May could draw a large field of contenders eager to fill the 22nd District seat in Congress, if only for a few months.

Among Republicans already putting out feelers for a race are a high-ranking county judge, a tax assessor and collector, a councilwoman, a mayor and a state representative — as well as one of the three challengers Mr. DeLay boasted of "whoopin' " in the primary March 7.

"Yes, I am throwing my hat into the ring," said that candidate, Tom Campbell, a lawyer, who garnered 30 percent of the vote to Mr. DeLay's 62 percent, in a television interview Monday night.

Mr. DeLay, 58, the former majority leader, is under indictment in connection with campaign financing charges in Austin and is embroiled in the investigation of top aides and the lobbyist Jack Abramoff in Washington. He abandoned his quest for a 12th term, saying that recent polls had shown that his seat was in danger of falling to his Democratic challenger, former Representative Nick Lampson.

But after his primary victory he boasted of his 2-to-1 win and ridiculed The Houston Chronicle for a poll questioning his strength.

Interviewed Tuesday on KTRH radio in Houston, part of a blitz of broadcasting appearances, Mr. DeLay belittled his primary victory. "Well, to be honest with you, it should have been better," he said. "A 21-year incumbent should have done better than 62 percent."

He told Fox News that his departure was intended to hurt Mr. Lampson. "This is probably the worst day of his campaign because he knows that any Republican that replaces me on the ballot will win this seat," he said.

The comment drew ridicule from Mr. Lampson's campaign manager, Mike Malaise. "Leave it to Tom DeLay to spin the worst thing that ever happened to him to someone else's worst day," Mr. Malaise said.

The loss of Mr. DeLay as a fixture on the Texas scene seemed to surprise longtime friends and foes alike.

"I was looking forward to supporting Tom," said David G. Wallace, the mayor of Mr. DeLay's hometown, Sugar Land, outside Houston, and now a declared candidate for the seat.

Judge Robert Eckels, Harris County's top executive for a dozen years who presided with Mayor Bill White of Houston over the response to Hurricane Katrina, said he was exploring a run with mixed feelings. "I empathize with Tom," Judge Eckels said.

Others sounded bereft for less sympathetic reasons. "A whole bunch of us made our bones on DeLay," said Beverly Carter, a longtime Republican critic and founder of The Fort Bend Southwest Star in Sugar Land.

Jim Schermbeck, a documentary filmmaker from Lubbock whose film, "The Big Buy: How Tom DeLay Stole Congress," was scheduled to open in May, said he was not disappointed by the prospect of losing the congressman as a target, but might put off the release to update the material.

"It's hard to imagine Tom DeLay taking a low profile," Mr. Schermbeck said.

And Paul Burka, the political columnist of Texas Monthly, was in the middle of writing an 8,500-word cover story on Mr. DeLay. "Now," Mr. Burka said, "half the words were no good."

Mr. DeLay repeatedly linked his resignation to what he portrayed as a political vendetta by the Travis County district attorney, Ronnie Earle, who obtained the indictment on money laundering charges that forced Mr. DeLay to give up his majority leadership last fall.

Mr. Earle issued a short statement Tuesday, saying: "Tom DeLay's political status has nothing to do with the criminal charges against him. This changes nothing. His criminal cases will proceed just as they would for any other defendant. DeLay's ultimate fate will be decided by the public acting through a jury."

The process to fill the remainder of Mr. DeLay's term until January is convoluted. As the only way to be removed from the ballot is by dying, going to jail or moving out of the district, Mr. DeLay must send a letter to Gov. Rick Perry advising of his move to Virginia.

The governor — who may not appoint a temporary representative — can then call a special election concurrent with the regular November election, to fill the post for just two months. Or the governor can declare an emergency and order an election before then, to take place 36 to 50 days from the call. Anyone may run, but if no candidate wins 50 percent, the two top vote-getters compete in a runoff a month later.

To replace Mr. DeLay as the Republican nominee in November, the several dozen Republican precinct chairmen and chairwomen in the sections of the four counties making up the 22nd District each choose a county elector. The four electors then select the party standard-bearer.

Many Show Interest In Seat (HC)

DOJ_NMG_0025668

By Kristen Mack and Zeke Minaya

Houston Chronicle, April 5, 2006

Familiar and lesser-known political names emerged Monday night as possible contenders for the congressional seat being vacated by Republican U.S. Rep. Tom DeLay.

Those who acknowledged interest in the seat or were mentioned as contenders included Harris County Judge Robert Eckels, state Rep. Robert Talton, Sugar Land Mayor David Wallace, Houston City Councilwoman Shelley Sekula-Gibbs, former state District Judge John Devine and lawyer Tom Campbell, who ran against DeLay in the March Republican Primary.

Harris County Republican Party Chairman Jared Woodfill said he started receiving calls from interested officials within minutes of hearing the news of DeLay's decision.

"Numerous people have called me inquiring about the seat," he said.

Other phones also were ringing as politicians gauged potential support or heard from backers.

"I've had a number of calls this evening. I'll visit with my family and look at the process," Eckels said. "I do have an interest in at least looking at the race."

He said that his experience coordinating the local response to Hurricanes Katrina and Rita left him frustrated with the federal government and its impact on local issues.

Sugar Land Mayor Wallace said he got wind of DeLay's decision over the weekend and began organizing a campaign.

"I'm running for that spot," Wallace said Monday night.

"It is going to be a sprint. We have been working this weekend and today kind of organizing our campaign making sure we pull together a grass-roots team," Wallace said.

Wallace said he will have to take his name off the ballot for the upcoming mayor's race.

He was elected mayor in 2002 after serving as a council member for one year.

Sekula-Gibbs, who lives in Clear Lake, said she has received several calls from local Republicans asking her if she would be interested in the seat.

"I'm saddened that the congressman has decided to step down, but I'm interested in the position," she said. "I'm definitely giving it very serious consideration."

Campbell, who came in a distant second with 30 percent of the vote in the March primary, said he still wants the position.

"I believe that Tom DeLay did the right thing in stepping aside and allowing the Republican Party to move forward," Campbell said.

"This is vindication of our political process," Campbell said. "Ethics and integrity do in fact matter and the people who voted on those issues spoke and have been heard."

A special election to fill the remainder of DeLay's term likely will be held on the next uniform election date, which is in May. Gov. Rick Perry will set the date.

It was unclear Monday night how Republicans will select a November nominee to replace DeLay, who won the GOP primary in March.

"We've never had this happen in a congressional race," Woodfill said. "We'll have a little bit of time to figure it out. We have our lawyers looking at it."

At issue is whether the responsibility for selecting a nominee falls to the 62-member state Republican Executive Committee or to GOP officials in the five counties that lie partly within the 22nd Congressional District.

"It's in our best interest to choose a nominee before the special election. Otherwise, the election is going to be a free-for-all," Woodfill said. "The situation you don't want is for our nominee to be someone different than the person who runs for the special."

DeLay is expected to resign officially sometime after April 7 and move to Virginia to work with a conservative organization.

That would make him ineligible to run despite his nomination, opening the way for party officials to select another nominee, Woodfill said.

Former U.S. Rep. Nick Lampson is the Democratic nominee for the seat. Lampson's campaign manager Mike Malaise said Lampson's plans have not changed.

"Our challenge was always to get Nick's message out there," Malaise said. "We've got $2.5 million in the bank to help us do that. The other side is going to be playing catch-up to us in that regard."

"We don't know who our opponent will be. It's unrealistic to say that Republicans have it in the bag."

Malaise said Lampson hasn't decided whether to run in the special election, and isn't sure DeLay legally can withdraw from the November ballot.

Fort Bend County GOP Chairman Eric Thode said he was not informed of DeLay's decision and that it took him and other county officials by surprise.

"I think they clearly have come to the conclusion that the race was going to be horribly difficult, ugly and expensive," he said.

Thode said he thinks Republicans will hold on to the seat.

"He (Lampson) could probably not have defeated Tom DeLay. However, against a Republican with zero baggage the race is over already," Thode said.

Republican Contenders Eye DeLay's Seat (WT)

By Hugh Aynesworth

The Washington Times, April 5, 2006

DALLAS -- Within hours of Rep. Tom DeLay's announcement yesterday that he would not seek re-election to Congress, several Republicans began jockeying for position to represent the party and Houston's 22 District.

Two potential candidates seem to lead at this point: Harris County Judge Robert Echols and Sugar Land Mayor David Wallace. Both are well-known in the district, and both have expressed strong interest in running.

Most political analysts think that whoever gets the nod from the party has an excellent chance to win in November in the Republican-leaning district.

Jared Woodfill, chairman of the Harris County Republican Party, said Mr. Echols would have to be considered the favorite because of his lengthy public career and resulting name recognition.

"You'd have to handicap it in his favor," he said.

Mr. Echols, along with Houston Mayor Bill White, received plaudits for co-managing what was considered a very successful Houston program to assist evacuees from Hurricanes Katrina and Rita last fall.

Although choosing a candidate for the ballot may be a tough decision for Republicans, Gov. Rick Perry has an even more pressing problem -- whether to call a special election to fill Mr. DeLay's unexpired term. Mr. DeLay said yesterday that he would make his resignation effective sometime before mid-June.

Along with Mr. Wallace and Mr. Echols, Sugar Land lawyer Tom Campbell, who ran a distant second to Mr. DeLay in the March primary, has expressed an interest in running.

Others mentioned by political analysts as possible candidates include State Sen. Kyle Janek and state Rep. Martha Wong, both of Houston.

Chris Bell, Democratic nominee for governor who lost his congressional seat during Mr. DeLay's 2003 redistricting efforts, called the resignation "a victory."

"Tom DeLay's resignation is a great victory in the fight to clean up corruption in politics, but the war is far from over," said Mr. Bell, adding, "The culture of corruption is about a heck of a lot more than Tom DeLay."

Travis County District Attorney Ronnie Earle, who brought charges of money laundering and conspiracy against Mr. DeLay last year, had little to say about the congressman's announcement.

Mr. Earle refused to answer telephone calls, but released a terse statement yesterday, "Mr. DeLay's political status has nothing to do with the criminal charges against him, and this changes nothing."

Frontrunner: Wallace Launches Bid For DeLay's Seat (TIME)

By Hilary Hylton

Time, April 4, 2006

Congressman Tom DeLay's decision to leave the seat he has held for 22 years may have surprised many state and even local GOP leaders, as well as Democrats. But even before the embattled Texas congressman was revealing his decision to TIME in an exclusive interview, at least one potential Republican successor was already maneuvering to assume his seat. Late Monday night Sugar Land Mayor David G. Wallace,44, a popular second-term city leader whose name is on the ballot for a third term in the May 13 municipal elections, confirmed that he would make a bid for the seat.

Wallace said he had heard rumbles about DeLay's decision over the weekend, and his mayoral reelection website was pulled down for a redesign immediately after the DeLay announcement. Other insiders said they had been hearing rumors about DeLay's tight poll numbers as far back as December. Central Texas Republican Congressman John Carter told the Austin American-Statesman that a week ago DeLay had mentioned his "troubling" poll numbers that showed him in a neck-and-neck battle with his likely opponent in November, former Democratic Congressman Nick Lampson.

In an early morning videotape released to his Texas constituency, DeLay said, "I refuse to allow liberal Democrats to steal this seat with a negative personal campaign." But while his departure may be designed to take the national spotlight off the race for Texas's 22nd congressional district, it could still draw national attention, especially since Wallace's candidacy could reignite some bad blood that flared during the Bush-Kerry campaign.

Wallace now serves as investment committee chairman for Perry Properties Realty Investment Fund & Perry Properties, a commercial real estate company owned by Will Perry, son of Houston area homebuilder Bob Perry, a top Republican fundraiser in Texas who has enjoyed a long friendship with Karl Rove. Bob Perry made national news when he donated $200,000 to fund the controversial Swiftboat Veterans for Truth ads that challenged Senator John Kerry's war record during the presidential campaign.

In recent days, Bob Perry has been back in the news again for a gift to Bill Ceverha, the former treasurer of Texas Republicans for a Republican Majority (TRMPAC), the political action committee at the heart of Texas District Attorney Ronnie Earle's investigation of DeLay's funding for redistricting efforts. Ceverha is the only one, so far, found culpable in a civil suit for TRMPAC's alleged illegal maneuvers. Perry helped Ceverha pay his legal fees and, as a member of a state pension board, Ceverha was obliged to report the gift. The Texas Ethics Commission, to the chagrin of several Texas newspaper editorial pages, has said Ceverha does not need to detail the exact amount of the check.

In addition to many influential Texas Republican backers, Wallace has personal connections to one of the icons of the conservative movement, Baroness Margaret Thatcher, the former British prime minister. He did post-graduate work at the University of Reading in England and was a founding treasurer and director of the Margaret Thatcher Foundation. In Dallas, he served as CEO of The Grantham Company, the investment firm founded by Thatcher's son Mark and named for the legendary prime minister's home district of Grantham in London.

Wallace is not the only Texas Republican expressing an interest in DeLay's seat. Harris County Judge Bob Eckels, the chief executive officer for the county that includes most of the metropolitan Houston area, may make a run, as well as Houston attorney Tom Campbell, who won 30 percent of the vote in the March primary against DeLay. But given his personal and political connections, Wallace appears to have a jump on the others.

The actual date of DeLay's resignation and its confirmation by the Texas Secretary of State will determine when an election for the seat will be held. If DeLay officially resigns before this Friday, April 7, a special election could be called for the next so-called uniform election date, May 13. If the resignation falls after April 7, Gov. Rick Perry (no relation to Bob Perry) could call a special election date later, or could hold the seat vacant until the general election in November.

In that case, a special election would be open to all comers, but it will be up to GOP officials to name a candidate to replace DeLay's name on the November general election ballot. In this scenario, any GOP winner in an earlier special election would probably have an edge.

Meanwhile, it is likely that DeLay's pending move of his legal residence to Alexandria, Virginia, will not effect his trial on campaign finance irregularities. (His move out of the state is how DeLay is making himself ineligible for reelection.) "Mr. DeLay's political status has nothing to do with the criminal charges against him, and this changes nothing," Earle told the Austin American-Statesman Monday night. On the other hand, the criminal charges may have a lot to do with his political status, and as the political jockeying already under way in Texas makes abundantly clear, DeLay's exit will change everything.

From DeLay To November (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

Tom DeLay's decision to resign from Congress removes one large Republican liability this election year, but it hardly ends the party's political vulnerability. One pressing question is whether the GOP majority is going to use the few productive weeks it has left to establish a 2006 record and 2007 agenda that are worthy of re-election.

Recent evidence is not reassuring. GOP leaders seem determined to avoid any meaningful legislative fights, lest their own internal fissures show. Instead, they're promising to make the election a "choice" -- rather than a referendum on their own governance -- and thus mobilize voters by claiming that Democrats would be worse: that they'd raise taxes, impeach President Bush and cut and run from Iraq if they win. And as a desperation strategy, fear does sometimes work.

On the other hand, the biggest Republican problem now is the demoralization of their own voters. Their lack of meaningful achievements this Congress (beyond the two Supreme Court Justices), all of their spending, and troubles in Iraq have left conservative voters wondering what the point is to voting for the GOP. If Republicans want their supporters to show up on election day, they'll need more of a message than wearing a "Speaker Nancy Pelosi" fright mask.

May we suggest a Plan B? How about at least fighting for the agenda that elected them the last time? It's obvious at this stage of the 109th Congress that little will actually become law, especially with Democrats able to filibuster in the Senate. But if Republicans were seen to be fighting for some principles, voters might actually decide it's worth showing up on November 7.

Here are a few ideas, none of them new, but all of them worth accomplishing:

Taxes. We hear that the House-Senate conference to extend the 15% capital gains and dividend rates isn't even meeting. This is inexplicable. The one large domestic success of the Bush years has been the post-bubble, post-9/11 economic revival, yet Republicans seem blasé about extending the tax cuts that did so much to spur it. A failure here would hurt the stock market and demoralize economic conservatives.

While they're at it, force the Senate to vote on death-tax repeal. Republicans may not get 60 votes, but if they come close enough they may be able to get Senator Jon Kyl's compromise that would cut the rate to 15%, from nearly 50% today, and raise the exemption above $10 million or so.

Reform Congressional budgeting, by passing the line-item veto and ending static revenue scoring at the Joint Tax Committee. Another good idea is the effort by Arizonans Jeff Flake in the House and John McCain in the Senate to end earmark abuse. A return to some spending self-discipline will count for much more with conservative voters than will "lobbying reform," which is a Beltway trope designed by the same crowd that promoted the "campaign-finance reform" that empowered George Soros.

Health-care choice. Congressman John Shadegg (R., Ariz.) has a bill to let Americans purchase affordable health insurance from any of the 50 states, thus bypassing state mandates that drive up insurance costs in New York and many other places. Another idea would let associations form health-care risk pools for their members, thus giving small business owners and the self-employed the same tax-preferred insurance options that big business and unions have now. These proposals would address a top voter priority and steal a march on Democrats.

Endangered Species Act reform. This is a huge issue in the West, where ESA rules drive property owners crazy. Congressman Richard Pombo (R., Calif.) has a bipartisan proposal that would require the federal government to compensate property owners for regulatory "takings" due to wetlands preservation or endangered species limits on development. The Senate probably wouldn't pass it, but the issue could be potent in key Congressional contests this fall.

We can think of other ideas, such as fighting for appellate-court nominees in the Senate, and defending the President's anti-terror agenda, especially the National Security Agency's warrantless wiretaps. But the larger point is for Republicans to show that they are willing to fight for something.

Some Republicans seem to believe that debating any of these issues will help Democrats "nationalize" the election, which will hurt them because of Mr. Bush's low approval ratings. But a Congressman is not a dog catcher, and some kind of national agenda is what voters expect of someone they'll be sending to Washington. With the Abramoff scandal likely to keep making headlines, Republicans need something to motivate their voters. Policy will trump scandal, but only if Republicans look like they want to achieve something real.

On election night in 2004, Democratic campaign consultant James Carville asked: Where did all these Republican voters come from? Unless Republicans set a new legislative course over the next seven months, a deposed House Speaker Denny Hastert may soon be wondering: Where did all the Republican voters go?

Exit Tom DeLay (WP)

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

IT'S A MEASURE of Tom DeLay's diminished political circumstances that those most unhappy about his abandoning his House seat are the Democrats who most revile him. "This is probably the worst day of his campaign," Mr. DeLay, speaking on Fox News yesterday, said with an air of grim satisfaction of his Democratic opponent, former representative Nick Lampson. The Texas Republican had been repeatedly admonished by the House ethics committee; he is under indictment in Texas on charges of funneling illegal corporate contributions to state legislators; and he is entangled in a federal probe that has produced guilty pleas from two of his former staffers. It's much tougher for Democrats to flog their "culture of corruption" message when they can no longer kick around "Representative #2," as he's been identified in the charges against his former aides.

In truth, the DeLay reign ended in January, when Mr. DeLay permanently relinquished his position as majority leader. But his departure from the body in which he's served since 1985 offers a chance to reflect on Mr. DeLay's legacy for House Republicans -- and on the challenge that confronts them in the post-DeLay era. As New York Times op-ed columnist David Brooks put it just before Mr. DeLay left the leadership, "the real problem wasn't DeLay, it was DeLayism." That was shorthand for a political culture that put a premium on bringing in campaign cash, that dismantled barriers between the Capitol and K Street lobbyists, and that disdained debate and dissent as the GOP entrenched itself as a would-be permanent majority.

DeLayism meant keeping a book on the partisan breakdown of political contributions from lobbyists labeled "friendly" and "unfriendly." It meant strong-arming a trade group not to hire a former Democratic congressman and enlisting Federal Aviation Administration officials to track down Democrats fleeing a vote in the Texas state legislature aimed at cementing Republicans' hold on the House. Mr. DeLay offered to endorse the son of retiring Rep. Nick Smith (R-Mich.) in exchange for Mr. Smith's vote in favor of the Medicare prescription drug bill. In Mr. DeLay's House, money was king: Members had to raise so much for chairmanships, so much for leadership posts. He presided over a sprawling financial empire of leadership PACs, nonprofit groups, charitable foundations and campaign committees that at least pushed the envelope of campaign finance laws, if not outright violating them, as Texas prosecutors allege.

Mr. DeLay in his heyday got a lot done, but at a terrible cost to the institution -- and, we would argue, the party -- that he helped lead. Will the new leadership be more respectful of the rights of the minority, more willing to permit debate on the House floor, more willing to restrict cushy travel and other perks? That's far from clear. The gushing statements yesterday from Mr. DeLay's replacement as leader, Rep. John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) -- "one of the most effective and gifted leaders the Republican Party has ever known . . . has served our nation with integrity and honor" -- reflected not much embarrassment about Mr. DeLay, nor about DeLayism.

The Fall Of The Hammer (NYT)

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

Like the rise and fall of many a pugnacious politician, the case of Representative Tom DeLay, the pest exterminator turned power broker, is certainly spellbinding for its individual drama. But it is more important to note that Mr. DeLay's political demise hardly ends the influence-peddling culture to which he devoted himself. The DeLay machine's tooth-and-claw approach to politics lives on, from the Texas delegation he brazenly gerrymandered to his quid pro quo debasing of the lobbying industry.

Across two decades in Congress, Mr. DeLay pushed every limit of his power base to the extreme. He was ultimately indicted on charges of laundering the easy corporate money of Washington for use in Texas politics to win a statehouse majority and gerrymander Texas Democrats into a permanent minority. The DeLay brand of bare-knuckled triumphalism was clearly an enabling factor in the separate scandal that has prompted the indictment of two of his former lieutenants and his erstwhile ally, Jack Abramoff, the disgraced superlobbyist.

Incredibly, the G.O.P. majority Mr. DeLay dominated with a mix of campaign lucre and whiplash fear has shown no resolve to face up to his damaging legacy. Last January's vows for ethics and lobbying reform lie fallow in the House, as if the majority is gambling that voters won't notice. Republicans leaders would be foolish to think the departure of Mr. DeLay removes the obvious need to enact strong ethics enforcement and lobbying controls.

In the smarmy self-justification of Mr. DeLay's statement yesterday, he said he wanted to avoid a "referendum on me" in November. But, of course, that's exactly what the nation needs as voters come to consider a Congress deeply embedded in the easy money and easier ethics of the DeLay era.

DeLay Loses Principle, Then Power (USAT)

USA Today, April 5, 2006

Former majority leader Tom DeLay's decision to resign from Congress has given House Democrats a reason to rejoice. For more than a decade, the Texas Republican infuriated and outmaneuvered them, making them feel the acute pain of their powerlessness.

But perhaps it's the Republicans who should be the most gleeful. They'll be rid of the most potent symbol of Washington arrogance and corruption.

And perhaps DeLay's departure from the House of Representatives will give them leeway to pursue needed changes in the ways ethics are enforced and campaigns are financed.

DeLay's sorry legacy can be measured in many ways. An obvious place to start is the long list of scandals surrounding him: the guilty pleas of former friends and associates, his own indictment in Texas, and the three instances in which he was admonished by the House ethics committee (before he dismembered it).

But there are other measures as well. Through his strong-arm tactics, DeLay acted in ways contrary to long-held Republican principles. He engineered President Clinton's impeachment in a fashion more vindictive than conservative.

He was a chief architect of the biggest expansion of government since the New Deal, most notably forcing through the Medicare drug law by holding open a 15-minute roll call for almost three hours while he twisted arms.

DeLay also championed federal legislation pre-empting states' rights in areas as diverse as business regulation and the sad case of Terri Schiavo.

These scandals and dubious legislative accomplishments have a common root. They are what happens when congressional leaders come to see the acquisition, maintenance and discharge of power as a goal itself rather than as means to achieve something broader for the public's benefit.

DeLay, an ex-exterminator nicknamed "The Hammer," was not so much a political thinker as he was the CEO of an enterprise designed to reward Republicans and sustain their majority.

DOJ_NMG_0025673

He helped them raise the money they needed to be elected and re-elected. He turned his office into a concierge service for GOP members. He pressured lobbying firms to hire only Republicans. He even rewrote Texas' congressional boundaries, and the GOP picked up six seats from the Democrats.

For much of his time in power, his fellow Republicans loved him for this. And why wouldn't they? The GOP was riding high, and the system was rigged in their favor. But the enterprise lacked, and it sent out a message that virtually any behavior was OK so long as it benefited the GOP.

Now that any chance of DeLay's restoration to power has been eliminated, the attention should shift to the corrupt system he leaves behind. DeLay was simply its most egregiously able practitioner.

Nothing will be gained if his successor as House majority leader, John Boehner of Ohio, simply becomes the new CEO of the enterprise.

Out Of The House, Not Out Of Trouble (WP)

By Cris Feldman

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

In announcing yesterday that he was dropping out of the race to keep his seat in Congress, Tom DeLay said he now intends to "engage in the important cultural and political battles of our day from outside the arena of the House of Representatives." Before he does that, though, he still faces a more immediate battle in another arena -- a Texas courtroom.

Ever since a grand jury in Austin indicted him on charges of laundering corporate cash to influence Texas's 2002 elections, DeLay has dismissed the action as a purely political act by Travis County District Attorney Ronnie Earle, a Democrat. But a review of the law and the facts in this case suggest otherwise.

The centerpiece of the Texas indictments is Texans for a Republican Majority PAC (TRMPAC), which DeLay founded and which his operatives ran, with the paid assistance of his daughter. DeLay himself headlined fundraisers, made fundraising calls, participated in strategic planning and conference calls, and personally collected corporate checks.

In a recent TRMPAC civil trial, the court ruled that the PAC illegally accepted and spent $532,333 in corporate cash and violated Texas law by not reporting it. Included within the illegal $532,333 was $190,000 that TRMPAC sent to the Republican National Committee in September 2002. The defense in the civil trial explicitly sought exoneration for this transaction, and it failed.

Here are the known facts. On Sept. 10, 2002, DeLay's co-defendant, John Colyandro, sent a blank check overnight to co-defendant Jim Ellis. On Sept. 13, 2002, Ellis handed over the check in question to the RNC. According to the indictment, Ellis filled in the check for $190,000 and provided the RNC with a list of seven candidates for the Texas House, along with designated sums of cash. On Sept. 20 the $190,000 was deposited by the RNC in a corporate cash account. On the morning of Oct. 2, Ellis met with DeLay at DeLay's Capitol office. That same day the RNC generated seven internal memos requesting seven different checks to the TRMPAC candidates. On Oct. 4 seven checks totaling $190,000 were cut from a noncorporate account containing millions of dollars. The check numbers were in sequential order, 7470 through 7476.

DeLay argues that the RNC sent money to state legislature candidates across the country. Yet the seven Texas TRMPAC candidates received checks ranging from $20,000 to $40,000, whereas the next-largest RNC contribution to a candidate for a seat in a state house of representatives was $2,000. DeLay has also said that the $190,000 was "left over" money that TRMPAC did not need. But numerous documents indicate otherwise. For example, on Oct. 20, 2002, Warren Robold, TRMPAC's now-indicted fundraiser, solicited a donor by stating, "We still need $125,000 of corporate funds to finish the project and pay our obligations."

DeLay's attacks on the prosecutor have been consistent, even as explanations of his own conduct have proved inconsistent. DeLay has said at different times that he knew about the $190,000 beforehand; that he heard about it after the fact; and that he did indeed discuss it with Ellis on Oct. 2, 2002.

Corporate contributions to candidates in Texas are illegal. To make such a contribution is a third-degree felony. A contribution is considered to be the direct or indirect transfer of money, including the agreement to make such a transfer. If DeLay in any way participated in an agreement to indirectly transfer $190,000 in corporate cash to Texas candidates, he still has a problem back in Texas.

The writer is an attorney in Austin. He was on the civil trial team that won a ruling last spring finding that TRMPAC illegally raised, spent and failed to report corporate contributions in Texas.

After DeLay, A New Approach? (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0025674

Symbolically as well as practically, the departure of Tom DeLay from Congress signals the end of an era of Republican dominance. The question now is whether the retreat that clearly has begun will turn into a rout.

The former House majority leader's decision to abandon what increasingly appeared to be an uphill fight for reelection in his Texas district and retire from the House was the latest and by far the largest consequence of a widening probe of corruption on Capitol Hill.

It is one thing to see a Randy "Duke" Cunningham go to jail for bribery. Few outside his San Diego district had ever heard the name of the former Navy "Top Gun" before his spectacular downfall. Tom DeLay is a target of far larger size.

As prosecutors have extracted guilty pleas from lobbyists close to DeLay and former members of his staff, the ripples of scandal have threatened to spread through Republican ranks in the midterm election. Month after month, surveys are showing Democrats with a double-digit lead over the GOP in the voters' preference for which party should control Congress.

Whether that translates to the specific victories needed to give Democrats an extra 15 seats and a narrow House majority cannot be guessed. But the relief his fellow Republicans expressed that they can now recruit a fresh and presumably unscarred candidate in DeLay's Republican-leaning district shows how nervous they are about holding on to the House.

It is almost as if they hope that by sacrificing their erstwhile commander, they can appease the public demand for change.

As much as Newt Gingrich embodied the aggressive strategy that enabled Republicans in 1994 to break the Democrats' 40-year grip on the House, DeLay was the man who showed them how to consolidate -- and use -- their new power. As whip and then as majority leader, he built the GOP fundraising and policy alliance with the business lobbies and social conservative movements, then used that leverage to impose party-line discipline on almost every key vote.

It was a commanding performance, and one that yielded a series of policy victories for President Bush. By putting the House Republican majority in lock step with the White House, DeLay made it possible for Bush to prevail, not only over the outnumbered Democrats but also over the doubts harbored by some Senate Republicans about his agenda.

But DeLay also paid a price for his hardball tactics -- and his tendency to push against the legal limits. He was admonished repeatedly by the House ethics committee. He faces prosecution in Texas over the financing of campaigns that delivered the Texas House of Representatives to his allies, who in turn engineered a redistricting plan that gave Republicans five more seats in Congress. His palling around with convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff is still under investigation.

With DeLay's departure, the Democrats lose their most convenient symbol of abuse of power by the Republican majority -- but they have not lost the issue. DeLay's successor as majority leader, John Boehner of Ohio, continues to manage the House on the same partisan basis, looking for votes almost exclusively on his own side of the aisle and declining to offer Democrats any incentives to cooperate.

And that raises an interesting challenge for the new White House chief of staff, Josh Bolten. If he is the realist that his admirers believe, he has to acknowledge the odds that there will be fewer Republicans in Congress after November than there are today -- and perhaps not a majority.

In the House, Speaker Dennis Hastert is headed into what is probably his final term before retirement, shorn now of the support and day-to-day managerial muscle of the man who installed him as speaker, Tom DeLay. That means that if the Republicans maintain control, a lame-duck speaker will be working to deliver votes for a lame-duck president.

That could spell an awfully difficult -- and unproductive -- final two years for the Bush presidency, unless the White House finds a different approach to Capitol Hill.

The old game of muscling bills through by rounding up Republican votes through a combination of political and financial force -- the game at which Tom DeLay excelled -- is over. The question for the White House is whether it can come up with a different strategy that looks for support from at least some Democrats.

It needs that already in the Senate. And it will probably need it in the House.

Tom DeLay — A Man Of Consequence (WT)

By Tony Blankley

The Washington Times, April 5, 2006

A couple of days ago, Tom DeLay announced he would resign his Texas seat in Congress by June. His announced departure from office has induced the normal Washington hypocrisies. Democrats express delight but are actually disappointed, as his Texas congressional seat is more likely to now stay Republican and they won't have Tom DeLay to kick around any more.

Republicans express sorrow, but are actually relieved not to have him as an albatross around their party neck. And as someone who has crossed paths (and sometimes swords) with Tom ever since I started as Newt Gingrich's press secretary in 1990, I am of mixed feelings.

I first met him in early 1990, just after Newt had been elected Republican minority whip in the House of Representative. Tom had been doing the vote counting for Newt's opponent, Illinois congressman Ed Madigan — the candidate of the old Republican House establishment. Newt was — as always — the insurgent candidate.

Tom DeLay had come to make up with Newt after picking the losing side. Tom offered his loyalty in good faith, and Newt accepted it in good faith. They had never been close, but they were both smart conservative congressmen with common policy and party goals. Tom became an invaluable political ally and warrior for the Newt-led insurgent House Republicans.

Five years later, when Newt was sworn in as Speaker of the House, Tom DeLay became the majority whip and a vital part of the successful election and legislative team that emerged in 1994. But Tom was an ally, not a subordinate of Newt's. He was his own free-standing political force, and inevitably rode his own course — sometimes along Newt's path, sometimes not.

(Just as, I might note, when Newt was minority whip under minority House leader Bob Michel, he was only a sometimes ally of Mr. Michel.) Even in a unified congressional caucus — as ours was in 1994-95 — it is made up of diverse and conflicting personalities, strategies, tactics, careers and goals. As Newt's right-hand guy, I had my elbows out to match Tom DeLay's own sharp elbows. But I admired his skill and his contribution to the common goals of the party.

In 1997 (after I had left), Tom DeLay led an unsuccessful rebellion against Newt (known at the time as the "Coup"), but retained sufficient respect of the rank-and-file members to remain as a powerful and intelligent force within the party.

By the winter of 1998 Newt chose post-election retirement rather than a battle to retain the speaker's chair. Even as brilliant a leader as Newt had become more detriment than benefit to the Republican House members.

Politics is a necessarily tough business, and it is exceedingly rare that a party leadership post is given out of gratitude for past services rendered to the party. Whether it was Maggie Thatcher being thrown over as Tory Party leader and prime minister, Newt being forced out as speaker, or now Tom DeLay being shown the exit, parties have every right, and indeed a duty to their constituents, to mercilessly shed no longer useful leaders.

Even the immortal Winston Churchill was shown no gratitude by the British electorate after he had led them to victory in World War II and was then summarily defeated at the polls.

It became evident earlier this year that Tom DeLay's time had come. Although he had been arguably the most able floor manager since Lyndon Johnson in the Senate in the 1950s, allegations fair or unfair undercut his capacity to further lead.

That is why on the weekend of Jan. 6 this year, party leaders quietly urged Tom to give up not only any claim on returning to the majority leader's slot, but also his now-vulnerable Texas seat. That is why on the Jan. 6 broadcast of "The McLaughlin Group," I predicted that he would give up his leadership claims within a week — and probably his House seat thereafter. He gave his leadership claims up the next day, and his House seat earlier this week.

But if a party has a right to act ruthlessly in its self-interest, it also has a duty not to cave to the other party or its media allies. A party should get rid of its leaders on its own schedule — not its opponent's. That is why last year, when Democrats were calling for Tom's blood, I wrote a rhetorically violent column urging the Republican Party not to throw him over. The party did stand firm with him then — and in fact gave him a big party. These things are a matter of tribal pride.

Tom has served the party magnificently over the last two decades — both as a principled conservative legislator, and as a shrewd and tireless political operator. And he has had the good judgment to exit on his own two feet.

Both the Republican Party and the country are stronger and better for all that Tom DeLay has contributed.

So, as a not-always-ally, I wish him Godspeed on the next leg of his journey.

Now, The Spotlight Turns To Rep. Ney (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, April 5, 2006

The stunning announcement by Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) that he would resign from Congress has thrust another embattled Republican even more firmly into the spotlight: Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio).

Ney went to great lengths Tuesday to deny that he had any intention of leaving office, and he received public support from his fellow Ohioan, House Majority Leader John Boehner. Boehner said “there’s no pressure” on Ney to quit, although Boehner did acknowledge that Ney faces a difficult re-election battle this fall. Ney, Boehner said, “has got his hands full, but he believes he’s doing well.”

Ohio Democrats and government watchdog groups, however, stepped up their calls for Ney to give up his House seat, with some predicting that he would soon be indicted in the federal corruption probe that has already brought down former GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff and others.

“All the dominos around Bob Ney in that case are falling, and you know in a game of dominos that you’re going to tip over sooner rather than later,” said Brian Rothenberg, a spokesman for the Ohio Democratic Party. “They’re falling all around him, and he’s wobbling right now. You can only wobble so long before you lose your balance.”

DOJ_NMG_0025676

One of Ney's potential opponents in November, Chillicothe Mayor Joe Sulzer, said that Ney "should take another cue from Tom DeLay and retire, for the good of Ohio."

Ney then issued a defiant statement of his own on Tuesday afternoon.

Ney said that "while I respect Tom DeLay's decision, I am not Tom DeLay. I have absolutely no intention of retiring. My constituents will make that decision in the next election, and I am grateful for the very strong support I continue to receive when I travel around the district."

Ney also lashed out at Sulzer and Zack Space, another Democratic candidate, calling them liberal allies of House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and unsuitable to represent the 18th district in Ohio.

"If elected to Congress, the first vote either Joe Sulzer or Zack Space will cast will be a vote for liberal San Francisco politics by voting for Nancy Pelosi for Speaker of the House," Ney said. "This will be a vote for higher taxes, more Second Amendment restrictions, more late-term abortions, more money for the United Nations and a cut-and-run policy in the war on terror."

However, Ney's legal and ethical problems have continued to grow with every new twist in the Abramoff probe, and some GOP strategists are privately wondering if it wouldn't be in the party's best interests if six-term lawmaker were to follow DeLay out the door.

"It's when you step and look at it from a 10,000-foot level, what is the right thing to do?" asked a senior House Republican staffer of Ney's future, suggesting that Ney has not fully come to grips with the scale of his political problems. The source said that Ney is still paying attention to the political atmosphere "at the street level" instead of looking at the overall environment in his district. "The way [DeLay] makes a decision, he's a tactician. Ney has to be a tactician now too," the staffer said.

Ney and his lawyers have continued to insist he did nothing wrong. But a Republican strategist close to the House leadership suggested that Ney is only holding onto his seat in order to strengthen his bargaining position in any future negotiations with the Justice Department.

"The only leverage he has is as a Member of Congress," said this strategist. "If he retires, he has no power."

Like DeLay, Ney has been a target of a federal corruption probe, and at least one of his former aides, Neil Volz, is under investigation by the Justice Department. Documents and e-mails from Ney's office were subpoenaed last year by Justice as it prepared its case against Abramoff. Abramoff pleaded guilty in January to a variety of federal charges, including conspiracy to bribe public officials.

Like DeLay, Ney has been forced to divert tens of thousands of dollars from his re-election campaign in order to pay legal bills. The Ohio Republican has had to open a legal defense fund to help offset those costs.

But even more ominously than DeLay, Ney has been implicated in three separate plea agreements between the Justice Department and individuals involved in the Abramoff scandal: Abramoff himself, Michael Scanlon and Tony Rudy. Scanlon, a former DeLay aide and ex-business partner with Abramoff, pleaded guilty to conspiracy to bribe public officials and mail and wire fraud last year. Rudy, another former DeLay aide, pleaded guilty last Friday to similar charges.

Ney — who's referred to as "Representative #1" in documents related to the case — and his aides play a prominent role in all three plea agreements as alleged targets of a bribery scheme that dates back at least five years.

Rudy's plea deal even included a new allegation about Ney: that the Ohio Republican had agreed in March 2001 to support legislation "that would enable Abramoff's clients to continue manufacture clothing with labels representing it was manufactured in the United States without being subject to the same wage and labor standards as companies operating in the continental United States." Ney has been known for years as a strong supporter of limiting foreign imports, so if he signed onto such a proposal as suggested by the Justice Department, it would have represented a dramatic change of view on a key issue.

Ney's office said Ney had no information on the latest allegation.

According to Federal Election Commission records, Abramoff donated $1,000 to Ney's re-election campaign on March 19, 2001. Adam Kidan, Abramoff's former business partner, gave $1,000 to Ney on the same day. Abramoff and Kidan pleaded guilty to fraud in connection with their purchase of a Florida casino cruise-ship company and were sentenced to 70 months in prison by a federal judge.

Ney is also a tangential player in the perjury trial of David Safavian, a former Bush administration official who has been charged with lying to federal and Senate investigators about his dealings with Abramoff. Both he and Ney took part in a now infamous August 2002 golf junket with Abramoff to Scotland.

Ney Vows He'll Fight On, Not Quit (HILL)

By Jackie Kucinich

The Hill, April 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0025677

Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio) continued yesterday to deny that the scandal involving former GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff is creating any pressure for him to leave Congress, even after the decision by Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) to relinquish his House seat.

Ney received calls from supporters shortly after stories that DeLay plans to resign hit the Internet on Monday night. His backers wanted to know if he was considering the same course of action.

Ney assured his supporters that he isn't poised to follow DeLay's lead.

"We are two different people," Ney said in an interview with The Hill, stressing that he had absolutely no intention of resigning.

In a press release issued yesterday, Ney elaborated: "While I respect Tom DeLay's decision, I am not Tom DeLay. … My constituents will make that decision in the next election, and I am grateful for the very strong support I continue to receive when I travel around the district."

When asked whether he had received any information from the Justice Department about whether he would be indicted, he said, "I haven't heard anything."

"We turned over the material [the Justice Department] requested. … They have my telephone number," he said.

Ney spokesman Brian Walsh said 60 local elected officials as well as the 16 GOP chairmen in his Ohio district have endorsed his boss.

Ney resigned as House Administration Committee chairman Jan. 15, explaining that growing allegations about his connection to Abramoff were beginning to detract attention from the committee and the work of the House GOP conference.

Ney has been accused of performing legislative favors in exchange for lavish gifts, trips and campaign contributions. In the Abramoff plea agreement, he is referred to as the "Representative #1" singled out in a Justice Department probe of Abramoff's dealings.

"On the legal side, the congressman has said from day one that he has done absolutely nothing improper or illegal," Walsh said. "He has pledged to cooperate in any way possible with the Abramoff investigation and remains absolutely confident that his name will be cleared."

Ney told The Hill in a previous interview that, if indicted, he would still run to retain his seat.

Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) yesterday also denied that DeLay's announcement put more pressure on Ney to give up his seat.

"There's no pressure," Boehner told reporters.

Asked about the dynamics of Ney's race in terms of the Abramoff investigation, Boehner said: "He's got his hands full, but he's doing well."

Ney said he had spoken with Boehner shortly after Boehner was elected majority leader.

"I have his support and the support of my delegation," Ney said.

Ney has maintained that once his name is cleared he will return to his post as the chairman of the House Administration Committee.

"Once these false allegations have been put to rest, and I have the full confidence that they will be, I look forward to resuming the chair for the rest of my appointed term and continuing the important work of the Committee," Ney said in a release Jan. 15.

He stepped down from that position that day. Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) appointed Rep. Vernon Ehlers (R-Mich.), the second most senior member on the committee, shortly after Ney's departure.

But Ehlers seems to be settling into the chairmanship, if staff changes are any indication.

Less than a month after becoming the new mayor of Capitol Hill, as the chairman of the administration panel is often referred to, Ehlers began reviewing all committee staff, and on Feb. 2 he replaced Ney's staff director, Paul Vinovich, with William Plaster, formally the deputy chief administrative officer.

Vinovich remained on staff as a committee counsel.

Additionally, House sources close to the committee indicated that four interns, hired during Ney's tenure, were immediately let go during the changeover. At the time, Brandt denied the interns' jobs were ever in jeopardy and said some had opted to go to Ney's personal office.

Ney said he was surprised about all the staff changes, since few were made when DeLay stepped down as majority leader late last year.

"Once this is cleared, I would like to return," Ney said, but he added that the choice is up to Hastert: "Who knows what the time frame will be?"

While it is considered typical that an incoming chairman review committee staff, it is unclear whether it is common House procedure to review staff if the chairmanship is only a temporary position.

"I like Vern. I help him, and that's my way of supporting him," Ney said.

The House Administration Committee is seeking a new communications director for the committee to handle internal and strategic communications between the committee and the House, said Ehlers spokesman Jon Brandt.

"Chairman Ehlers is hiring his staff as he sees it appropriate within the rules and budget of the committee, just as any other committee chairman does," Brandt said.

On March 29, Abramoff was sentenced to 70 months in prison on conspiracy and fraud charges regarding his purchase of a casino fleet in South Florida.

New Maneuvers By Lawmakers Over A Colleague's Altercation (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON, April 4 — The case of Representative Cynthia A. McKinney, the Georgia Democrat who attributed a recent altercation with the Capitol Police to racial profiling, prompted a new round of political maneuvering on Tuesday as Democrats tried to distance themselves from the congresswoman and some Republicans pressed for a resolution praising the police.

"I don't think any of it justifies hitting a police officer," the House Democratic leader, Representative Nancy Pelosi of California said, in response to a question about Ms. McKinney. "I don't know if that happened, but I am saying if it did happen, it wasn't justified."

Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the Democratic whip, told reporters that members "should all cooperate fully" with the police, adding, "It doesn't appear that happened."

The Democrats made their remarks as federal prosecutors weighed whether to charge Ms. McKinney in connection with the episode, which occurred last week as she tried to circumvent a metal detector to enter the Capitol, which members of Congress are allowed to do. A Capitol Police officer failed to recognize her, and she apparently responded in a physical manner.

At a news conference Friday, Ms. McKinney said she regretted the episode but had acted in self-defense in response to "the inappropriate touching and stopping of me, a female black congresswoman." On Tuesday, her spokesman did not respond to a telephone call or e-mail message seeking comment.

Republicans have tried to make political hay of the episode, saying it did not comport with the Democrats' efforts to portray themselves as committed to national security. Representative Patrick T. McHenry, Republican of North Carolina, said Tuesday that he would introduce a resolution commending the police for their professionalism.

A senior House Republican aide said that the resolution would probably not come to a vote, but that Republicans would probably offer comments praising the police Wednesday when a separate police-related resolution was offered.

Mr. McHenry said his intention was to honor the "service and sacrifice" of the police, but he left little doubt that he was also intending to embarrass Democrats.

"I want to give them a pat on the back," he said of the officers, "not a punch in the chest."

McKinney Rebuked By Her Leader (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Hill, April 5, 2006

House Democratic leaders publicly rebuked Rep. Cynthia McKinney (D-Ga.) yesterday over an incident last week in which she hit a U.S. Capitol Police officer when he stopped her at a security checkpoint.

Speaking at a news conference, House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) said of McKinney's explanation, "I don't think any of it justifies hitting a police officer. I don't know if that happened, but if it did happen, I don't think it was justified. … I find it hard to see any set of facts that would justify striking a police officer."

Pelosi, who is no longer on speaking terms with McKinney, went on, "Our Capitol Police have a very difficult job protecting this symbol of democracy and the buildings around it."

House Democratic Whip Steny Hoyer (Md.) was even more emphatic.

"I think it is the responsibility of every member [of Congress], every visitor to the Capitol, every staff member, every member of the press and anyone else who comes in and out of the Capitol and the House or Senate office buildings to cooperate fully with the Capitol Police, who have been given an extraordinarily difficult and important responsibility of keeping the Capitol safe," he said, adding, "It doesn't appear that happened" in McKinney's case.

McKinney, a controversial member of Congress since she was first elected in 1992, says she struck the officer after he touched her inappropriately.

DOJ_NMG_0025679

The U.S. Capitol Police has referred the matter to the U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia, who is expected to decide shortly whether to prosecute the congresswoman. Prosecutors could bring either the felony charge of assault on a police officer or a misdemeanor assault charge.

McKinney was entering the Longworth House Office Building shortly before 9 a.m. last Wednesday when a Capitol Police office stopped her for bypassing the metal detector. Members of Congress are allowed to walk around the detectors and are usually recognized by security officers.

Pelosi, appearing at an event to promote homeland-security planning among women, said she was not concerned that the McKinney controversy would draw attention from Democratic initiatives.

"This is the action of one person," she said.

Yet the political furor over the fracas could have reverberations beyond McKinney herself. Two Georgia Democrats, Reps. John Barrow and Jim Marshall, face tough reelection races in the Peach State.

"I don't think there's any doubt that Republicans can use McKinney against Democrats," said Alan Abramowitz, a professor of political science at Emory University in Atlanta. "They can hold her up as what's wrong with the Democratic Party. I wouldn't be surprised to see moderate candidates like [Reps.] John Barrow and Jim Marshall distancing themselves [from her]."

And Georgia Republicans have picked up on the issue.

"Representative McKinney could be a much better representative for the people then her actions demonstrated last week," said former Rep. Mac Collins (R-Ga.), who is seeking to defeat Marshall. "I believe she needs to apologize to the Congress, and to the people who reside in the 4th District of Georgia."

Former Rep. Max Burns (R-Ga.), also seeking to come back to Congress, challenged Barrow to denounce McKinney.

Marshall and Barrow declined to comment.

No member of the Georgia Democratic delegation, including revered civil-rights pioneer Rep. John Lewis, has stepped up to defend McKinney.

The lack of support for McKinney has fueled talk that she may be vulnerable to a primary challenge. Hank Johnson, who is black and a county commissioner, has declared his candidacy. He has, however, raised only pocket change as of the most recent campaign-finance reports. McKinney reported $35,000 on hand.

In a statement, Johnson chided McKinney for her conduct in the police fracas.

"I hope McKinney will put the interests of the people ahead of her own ego and do whatever is necessary to bring some closure to this. If that means having to make an apology, she should apologize," Johnson said.

Former Rep. Denise Majette defeated McKinney in the 2002 primary and served one term before running unsuccessfully for the Senate, leaving a vacant seat for McKinney to recapture. Majette has yet to express an interest in vying for her old seat.

If she did challenge McKinney, she could face some ill will from the many supporters who were disillusioned when she opted for a risky Senate run only two years after they had helped elect her to the House. Majette is reportedly interested in the position of state school superintendent.

After Scuffle, House GOP Acts To Laud Capitol Police (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — House Republicans introduced a resolution Tuesday to commend the Capitol Police force for its professionalism. The proposal follows a confrontation last week between Rep. Cynthia McKinney, D-Ga., and an officer she is accused of hitting.

Republicans presented their resolution as U.S. Attorney Kenneth Wainstein considered whether to press criminal charges against McKinney.

"I don't think it's fair to attack the Capitol Police, and I think it's time that we show our support for them," said Rep. Patrick McHenry, R-N.C., a sponsor of the measure. Ignoring a police officer's order to stop, or hitting one, "is never OK," McHenry said. McKinney is alleged to have hit a uniformed police officer who asked her to stop on her way into a House office building on March 29.

Democratic leaders did not defend McKinney or her charge of racial profiling.

"I don't think any of it justifies hitting a police officer," said House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi of California. "If it did happen, I don't think it was justified."

Rep. Steny Hoyer of Maryland, the No. 2 Democrat in the House, said all members of Congress, staffers and visitors in the building have a responsibility to obey Capitol Police.

Rep. Mel Watt, D-N.C., chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus, had no comment, a spokesman said.

DOJ_NMG_0025680

McKinney said the officer started the incident by “inappropriately touching and stopping” her. A spokesman for the congresswoman did not respond to a request for comment.

The six-term lawmaker said the issue is not about whether to obey a police officer's order, whether she hit him or the fact that she was not wearing the lapel pin that identifies members of Congress.

“The issue is racial profiling,” McKinney told CNN on Monday.

The measure introduced late Tuesday, co-sponsored by Rep. Mario Diaz-Balart, R-Fla., does not specifically mention McKinney, 51, or the confrontation, McHenry said.

Instead, the non-binding measure declares that Capitol Police “must remain constantly alert for … failure to respond to requests and instructions” and “consistently apply security and safety measures to all, including members of Congress.”

Lawmaker's Encounter With Guard Raises A Capitol Tempest (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman And Nick Timiraos

The Los Angeles Times, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — It started with the seemingly smallest of incidents -- a misunderstanding last week at a security checkpoint in the Longworth House Office Building, where guards regularly check the identification and belongings of those entering the building.

But by Tuesday, the encounter between Rep. Cynthia McKinney, D-Ga., and a Capitol Police officer -- in which he touched her on the shoulder and she jabbed him with her cell phone -- had begun to mushroom into a racial and political furor, replete with accusations of racial profiling and threats of criminal charges. Along the way, leaders of both political parties and federal law enforcement joined the fray.

In the post-Sept. 11 world, it was clear, no security issue is minor, and in Washington politics, no incident is too small or too sensitive to be exploited as partisan cannon fodder.

The issue arose when McKinney sought to enter the Longworth House Office Building. She stepped around the metal detector as members of Congress are entitled to do. But she was not wearing the pin that identifies her as a member, and a guard tried to stop her.

Some think the resulting confrontation may have sprung from nothing more than a change of hairdo.

McKinney acknowledged she was not wearing her identifying pin, but maintained that the guard should have recognized a member's face, as Capitol Police often do, though it is not a requirement. Colleagues say McKinney had recently changed her hairstyle and suggest that may have led to a failure to recognize her.

By Tuesday's end, however, the last thing anyone involved with the case seemed to be looking for was an innocent explanation or a way to turn down the heat.

In the House, Republicans rushed to put themselves on the side of law and order, pushing through a resolution applauding the professionalism of the Capitol Police. "I don't think it's fair to attack the Capitol Police and I think it's time that we show our support for them," declared sponsor Rep. Patrick McHenry, R-N.C.

And the Justice Department, which handles local prosecutions in the District of Columbia, said it was considering criminal charges against McKinney.

A conservative blog, NewsByUs.com, gibed that McKinney was suffering from PTHD, post traumatic hairstyle disorder.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., distanced herself from McKinney. "I think what happened last week was a very unfortunate incident," she said. "I think that all members of Congress like to be recognized, that's for sure. And this was a case in which she wasn't. I don't think any of it justifies hitting a police officer. I don't know if that happened, but I am saying if it did happen, I don't think it was justified."

And with the news media digging up every morsel they could on McKinney's behavior, an Atlanta television station reported that McKinney spent $1,000 to fly singer Isaac Hayes to the dedication of a new office in Atlanta. After the news aired, McKinney's staff said taxpayers will be reimbursed.

Controversy is nothing new to McKinney's 4th District constituents.

In an earlier incident that echoes what pundits are now calling The Scuffle, McKinney complained when guards at the White House during the Clinton administration did not recognize her or treat her like other members of Congress.

After the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, McKinney apologized to Saudi Prince Alwaleed bin Talal after New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani turned down his offer of $10 million to help families of Sept. 11 victims. She suggested the money be sent to poor Americans.

A few months later, McKinney called for an investigation into whether President Bush knew in advance of the Sept. 11 attacks. "Persons close to this administration are poised to make huge profits off America's new war," she said.

"She's a political exhibitionist," said Ross Baker, a political scientist at Rutgers University. "She's always cavorted like this."

Friday, with two dozen Georgia schoolchildren in the background holding signs that read "God Bless Cynthia" and "Is Cynthia a Target?" McKinney blasted the officer for taking her shoulder and asking her to go through the metal detector.

Her attorney, James Myart, elaborated. "Like thousands of average Americans across this country, (she) is too a victim of the excessive use of force by law enforcement officials because of how she looks and the color of her skin. Ms. McKinney is just a victim of being in Congress while black."

The chairman of the U.S. Capitol Police Fraternal Order of Police, Andy Maybo, issued a statement backing the officer, who is believed to be white.

"We, the U.S. Capitol Police Fraternal Order of Police, are extremely proud of our officer," Maybo said. "He has upheld his oath as an officer and has executed his duties and responsibilities in a professional manner."

Security On Capitol Hill Is No Joke (USAT)

USA Today, April 5, 2006

The 535 members of Congress have grown accustomed to perks that can lead, in some, to a sense of entitlement larger than the great outdoors.

Why, for example, must the mighty submit to the same security procedures the rest of the country has accepted as routine in an age of terrorism?

Rep. Cynthia McKinney, D-Ga., was apparently thinking along those lines last week when she breezed past a metal detector at a House office building without wearing a lapel pin that helps U.S. Capitol Police identify legislators.

An officer who didn't recognize her asked her three times to stop. When McKinney didn't respond, he put his hand out to restrain her.

At this point, a reasonable person might have identified herself without incident.

But McKinney — a volatile politician known for making outrageous comments such as accusing President Bush of having prior knowledge of the 9/11 attacks — allegedly responded by striking the officer before flashing her ID and dashing off to her meeting.

When Capitol Police said they would seek an arrest warrant, McKinney, who is black, responded by changing the subject from her own arrogance to accusing the officer of engaging in racial profiling.

Perhaps he hadn't recognized her because she had changed her appearance, McKinney suggested: "Do I have to notify Capitol Police every time I change my hairstyle?"

Security on Capitol Hill is no joke. Two Capitol Police officers were killed in 1998 when a mentally ill man opened fire at a tourist entrance. That was before 9/11 and the anthrax attacks.

McKinney should stop exploiting a phony race issue and apologize for her overbearing behavior. There's little doubt that Capitol Police will remember her in the future.

The McKinney Mess (RC)

Roll Call, April 5, 2006

We should be writing about Rep. Tom DeLay today. As much as anything else, the Texas Republican's triumphs and excesses have defined the dozen-year reign of the House GOP. But as hypnotic as the still-unfolding drama of his political downfall may be, it is impossible for us not to weigh in today on another Capitol Hill drama.

Today is Capitol Police Chief Terrance Gainer's last day on the beat. His tenure, which included helping the Capitol adjust to the post-Sept. 11, 2001, security environment, unfortunately ends in what will be labeled as a dust-up over a long-ignored nepotism law. We suspect there is a great deal more that eased Gainer's decision to turn in his badge. The perfect example of why Congress will always struggle to attract and keep men like Gainer — and of the unique pressures brought to bear on the man in the chief's chair — came just days ago from Georgia Rep. Cynthia McKinney (D).

The chief must not only answer to the Capitol Police Board, something that limits the chief's ability to make quick or sweeping changes to address threats to an acknowledged top target for terror, but also to 535 other bosses. Oh, and the spouses of those 535 bosses. Can't forget about them, as Rep. Bill Young (R-Fla.) and his wife, Beverly, proved.

After McKinney claimed she had been racially profiled and "inappropriately touched" by a Capitol Police officer (whose initial sin was apparently doing his job), did she take up her case with authorities and share her apparent concern about the state of security in the Capitol? No. She quickly made this drama about her, calling a press conference and flanking herself with entertainers. Naive as it sounds, we hope that she will find a graceful way to bring a close to this episode.

Many problems confronted in Washington, D.C., are complex. The one highlighted by the McKinney incident is, as well, but only because lawmakers so rarely hear the word "no," even when it's just a police officer trying to perform his sworn duty to protect Congress.

But we have a simple solution to make sure we don't see a repeat of the incident, and it doesn't even require Members to keep track of those pesky lapel pins. With the full-throated support of the House and Senate leadership, the police board should immediately call an end to the practice of allowing Members and those accompanying them to bypass magnetometers and other security measures around the Capitol complex. It's a practice we've always disliked, and one that only fuels perceptions of Congress as a pampered class. Now McKinney has given us new reason to encourage Congressional leaders to get rid of it.

Yes, we can already hear the complaints from the chronically overscheduled about how this will complicate their lives. In a legislature where one chamber routinely conducts the vast bulk of its business between Tuesday evening and Thursday morning, perhaps that's a good argument for spending more time in Washington and spreading those commitments across more days.

A little inconvenience may cause Members to better remember why the Capitol Police are here, as if reminders are necessary after two officers were slain just a few years ago trying to defend the Capitol. They are to protect Members before they are to serve them.

U.S. Focus On Abstinence Weakens AIDS Fight, Agency Finds (NYT)

By Celia W. Dugger

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

Insistence by Republican Congressional leaders that American money to fight the spread of AIDS globally be used to emphasize abstinence and fidelity is undercutting comprehensive and widely accepted aid models, the Government Accountability Office said in a report released Tuesday.

The report by the G.A.O., an investigative arm of Congress, examines the effect of a mandate from Congress that at least a third of United States money to prevent the spread of AIDS worldwide be devoted to sexual abstinence and fidelity programs.

It found that the provision had limited the reach of broader strategies to fight AIDS that include the use of condoms — a conclusion strongly contested by a senior Bush administration official.

The report also said the requirement had meant that officials in some countries have had to reduce spending on programs to prevent the transmission of H.I.V. from women to their newborn babies, as well as other prevention strategies.

"It is hampering their ability to implement key elements of the widely accepted model of H.I.V./AIDS prevention — the ABC approach," said David Gootnick, the main author of the report. ABC stands for abstain, be faithful or use condoms.

The new emphasis on abstinence and fidelity emerged in 2003 from the House International Relations Committee as it debated President Bush's $15 billion, five-year AIDS program. Since then, financing for AIDS prevention programs has increased sharply, from $207 million in 2004 to $322 million this year.

The report is based on interviews with United States officials carrying out American-financed AIDS programs in 15 countries, mostly in Africa. They were guaranteed anonymity to encourage candor.

American officials told Congressional investigators that the guidelines were at times ambiguous and confusing. The rules on abstinence and fidelity, they said, have made it more difficult for them to tailor programs to local needs.

Some officials said that although activities to promote condom use have been restricted, they did not understand the distinction between condom education and condom promotion, "causing uncertainty over whether certain condom-related activities are permissible," the report stated.

Dr. Mark R. Dybul, the deputy coordinator of the federal AIDS program, strongly disagreed. He said the program was carrying out a balanced effort that includes all the elements of ABC, a strategy that successfully reduced H.I.V. infection rates in Uganda. The guidelines are generally clearly spelled out, he said.

More broadly, he said, Congress's requirement has brought about what he called a needed shift of emphasis to include abstinence and fidelity, saying that earlier programs had been overly focused on condoms.

But condoms have not been neglected, he said. The number distributed at United States expense has risen during Mr. Bush's years in office, to 429 million last year from 348 million in 2001, federal figures show.

In a statement on Tuesday, Representative Henry J. Hyde, the Illinois Republican who heads the House International Relations Committee, said no report was needed "to uncover the fact that country teams may be resistant to change, and that some adjustment time would be needed to implement new requirements."

Representative Tom Lantos of California, the ranking Democrat on the same committee, differed.

"While this was obvious to those of us who do not have ideological hang-ups, the reality was that only a compromise would fly," he said, referring to the 2003 debate in Congress.

U.S. Abstinence Tack In AIDS Prevention Is Criticized By GAO (WSJ)

By Steve Stecklow

DOJ_NMG_0025683

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

The federal government's increased emphasis on promoting sexual abstinence as a global AIDS-prevention strategy is hampering efforts to create comprehensive disease-prevention programs and causing some confusion in the field, a report by the Government Accountability Office found.

The report by the congressional watchdog agency didn't address the effectiveness of the abstinence programs promoted under the President's Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief, or Pepfar, which has been the subject of debate among health-care officials. Instead, it focused on the implementation of a congressional mandate that at least a third of AIDS prevention funds be spent on abstinence-until-marriage programs.

In Pepfar, a five-year, $15 billion program, the government aims to avert seven million new cases of HIV, the AIDS-causing virus, outside the U.S. by the year 2010. The program endorses the "ABC model," which stands for "Abstain, Be faithful or use Condoms." The legislation behind the program suggests that 20% of the program's funding be applied to prevention, with other funds going to treatment and care programs.

The report found that U.S. officials in 17 of 20 countries studied said that the abstinence-spending requirement "would prevent them from allocating prevention resources in accordance with local HIV/AIDS prevention needs."

The requirement also has led to reduced funding for other AIDS-prevention programs, including those aimed at reducing mother-to-child transmission of the virus, the report found. A team in one country reported that the spending requirement forced it to cut funds from a program to care for AIDS patients to address a local condom shortage.

The report also found confusion in many countries over the "ABC model," including which condom-promoting activities were permitted.

In an attached response to the GAO report, government officials who oversee Mr. Bush's AIDS program said it was on track to achieve its prevention goal and noted that funding for all prevention methods had increased from previous federal initiatives. The response also said program officials were committed to improving communication to the field.

GAO Criticizes Bush's AIDS Plan (WP)

By David Brown

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

The requirement that a large fraction of President Bush's global AIDS plan go to promote abstinence and fidelity is causing confusion in many countries and in a few is eroding other prevention efforts, including ones to reduce mother-to-child transmission of the virus.

Those are among the chief conclusions of an 87-page report by the Government Accountability Office that examined the most controversial aspect of the giant AIDS plan, budgeted at $15 billion over five years.

The survey of U.S.-funded programs in 20 countries -- 15 of them the focus of the President's Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief (PEPFAR) -- found widespread support for the "ABC" strategy that encourages abstinence until marriage, being faithful thereafter and using condoms in high-risk sexual encounters.

At the same time, the document paints a picture of worried program managers trying to juggle the demands of both their local populations and the U.S. Congress, seeking to craft comprehensive prevention messages while simultaneously keeping account books that strictly record spending on the abstinence effort.

The Office of the U.S. Global AIDS Coordinator requires that 20 percent of all AIDS spending go for prevention. Half the prevention budget must be spent to stop sexual transmission of HIV. Two-thirds of that spending, in turn, must be used promoting abstinence and fidelity.

"Most of the 20 PEPFAR teams . . . reported that fulfilling [that requirement] presents challenges to their ability to respond to the local epidemiology and cultural and social norms," the GAO authors wrote. About half a dozen teams said the spending requirement "can undermine the integrated nature of HIV/AIDS prevention programs."

Of the 15 "focus countries" -- 12 African countries, plus Haiti, Guyana and Vietnam -- nine reduced the amount of money for programs to prevent mother-to-child transmission of HIV in their 2006 budgets to meet the spending target for abstinence promotion.

In one, mother-to-child funding was cut from $1.4 million to $1 million, and in another it was reduced by $300,000, said GAO's David Gootnick, who oversaw the report.

In perhaps the largest adjustment, one country cut from $8 million to $4 million its spending on prevention services for couples in which one person has HIV infection and the other does not -- an extremely high-risk group -- as well as on sexually active youths and sex workers.

"This team noted that allocating funding in accordance with the spending requirement is not appropriate for the country's epidemic and has reduced the quality of the team's prevention programming," the authors wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0025684

In order to encourage candid answers, GAO agreed to not identify the organizations or countries cited in the report.

But Richard Marlink, a physician who oversees prevention and care programs at the Elizabeth Glaser Pediatric AIDS Foundation, said that the need to spend more on abstinence cut into money available to its mother-to-child prevention programs in Mozambique and Swaziland. Since 2000, the foundation has provided antiviral drugs used to prevent HIV transmission to 136,000 pregnant women.

Several activist organizations said the GAO findings confirm their suspicions.

The abstinence policy "is basically unworkable," said Paul Zeitz, director of the Global AIDS Alliance. "This shows the problem very clearly and starkly."

But the AIDS coordinator's office, which is in the State Department, has shown considerable flexibility in administering the rules.

In June 2004, it notified Congress that it would broaden the definition of "abstinence until marriage" to include programs that also encouraged fidelity in sexual relationships outside marriage.

The office also exempts some countries' programs from meeting the abstinence-spending target as long as the entire overseas AIDS-prevention budget meets it. Ten of the 20 countries surveyed got exemptions.

Mark Dybul, a physician who is the medical director of the Office of the U.S. Global AIDS Coordinator, said condom promotion -- the C in ABC -- has suffered no reduction under the Bush plan.

"What we have done is come into a balance with ABC," he said.

He said the program cutbacks described in the GAO anecdotes would not have been necessary if the administration had received all the overseas AIDS funding it sought -- $527 million more over the last three budgets.

Laura Bush Visits St. Louis For Fundraiser, Youth (AP)

By Jeff Douglas

The Associated Press, April 4, 2006

ST. LOUIS - First lady Laura Bush said the most important issue facing America is defending itself.

Mrs. Bush visited St. Louis Tuesday to raise money for Republican Sen. Jim Talent's re-election campaign, while promoting her Helping America's Youth Initiative.

"At this historic time in our country, no issue is more important than defending America," Mrs. Bush told about 400 Talent supporters at a downtown hotel that stands near the St. Louis Arch.

"Thanks to the men and women of the United States military, America is winning the war on terror," she said. Mrs. Bush praised the Missouri Sen. for his work on the Senate Armed Services Committee. She also sent her sympathy to those hit by tornados that struck Missouri on Sunday.

Mrs. Bush said Talent "understands the sacrifices made by our armed services personnel, and he understands the importance of their mission."

The incumbent senator faces Democratic State Auditor Claire McCaskill in November. Talent was in Washington Tuesday, chairing a defense subcommittee meeting, and could not attend the fundraiser.

In his place was his wife, Brenda, along with President Bush's uncle, William "Bucky" Bush, and Gov. Matt Blunt's wife, Melanie.

A spokesman for Talent said the fundraiser was expected to bring in about $200,000.

In her 10 minute speech, Mrs. Bush called Talent a leader in the government's search for alternative energy sources, saying he helped develop a bio-fuels caucus in the Senate.

The first lady also addressed the President's Helping America's Youth Initiative. In the past year Mrs. Bush has visited multiple cities and toured youth programs that keep adolescents away from drugs and gangs.

Earlier Tuesday, Mrs. Bush visited a rehab center in the St. Louis suburb of St. Charles, where she met privately with teens recovering from substance abuse.

During the private meeting at the center, five recovering teens spoke openly about their addiction and recovery from methamphetamine, marijuana, cocaine and alcohol. The 24-bed Preferred Family Healthcare rehab center treats about 300 young people each year.

"We can't let children suffer with drug abuse and substance abuse because they can't afford help," Mrs. Bush said. She praised an Albuquerque, N.M., program that teaches alcohol prevention in the second grade.

One young man in the meeting, identified only as Matt, 16, questioned if second-graders would remember what they learned about drinking alcohol as they got older.

DOJ_NMG_0025685

"Recovery is a very selfish thing - you have to be out for yourself," Matt said. The teen said he began smoking cigarettes at age 9 and is recovering from an addiction to marijuana and alcohol. He was ordered to treatment by the courts and said he has been clean for more than three months.

Mrs. Bush asked the teens for advice on what adults can do to keep children away from drugs and alcohol. Matt's response: "Don't let your kids grow up too fast."

Conferences will be held around the country to examine ways to help youth, with the first one this summer in Indiana, Mrs. Bush said.

Laura Bush Headlines Talent Campaign Fundraiser (SLPD)

By Jo Mannies

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, April 5, 2006

Laura Bush, wife of President George W. Bush, visited with five teenagers who are overcoming addictions to various drugs during the first stop of a regional visit today, a visit that included a campaign event for U.S. Sen. Jim Talent.

At the Talent event, about 400 hundred faithful Republicans greeted Mrs. Bush, who lauded the senator as "a very important member of the U.S. Senate. . . (who) truly represents the values and priorities of this great state."

She said Talent has helped the administration in its war on terrorism: "Jim understands the sacrifices made by our armed personnel." Talent was not in the ballroom to hear the praise because he remained in Washington to chair a defense subcommittee meeting and to be present today for a likely vote on an immigration measure.

Aides said that he had intended to be in town for the fund-raiser before his duties had intervened. About $200,000 was raised at the luncheon. The minium ticket price was $420, but some paid more to attend a private reception with Mrs. Bush and have their picture taken with her.

Earlier, at another stop, Mrs. Bush saw counselors and teens during a private visit to a St. Charles adolescent drug treatment center operated by Preferred Family Healthcare. The Kirksville-based company operates 35 facilities around Missouri that offer mental health and substance abuse treatment.

The tour was part of a series of visits Mrs. Bush is making around the country with various programs that encourage children and teens to avoid drug use or that treat those dealing with addiction.

She spent about 45 minutes at the St. Charles facility before heading down I-70 to the Millennium Hotel for the Talent fundraiser. Talent's best-known Democratic challenger is State Auditor Claire McCaskill.

Mrs. Bush called the treatment center "one really good example" of the types of facilities that were a wise use of federal money. She had been in Albuquerque, N.M., Monday visiting with second graders who had been learning about the dangers of addiction to drugs and alcohol.

The message she heard there also related to the one she heard here.

"You can't leave your life to luck. You can't guess...Think about the decisions you make," she said.

The session with the teens was candid; no television cameras or photographers were allowed. Only a couple of print reporters were allowed to witness the half-hour session.

Michael Schwend, president and chief exectuive officer of Preferred Family Healthcare, said earlier he was impressed that Mrs. Bush wanted the meeting to be semi-private.

"It's an incredible honor for the staff working in this facility. They deserve it," Schwend said. "This is a fitting response to their efforts."

While at the St. Charles facility, Mrs. Bush made no mention of the fact that it is Election Day and that a hotly contested state senate race is at stake in St. Charles.

That fact has been discussed for days by political activitists in both parties, who have speculated whether her stop would encourage Republican voters to get to the polls on behalf of State Rep. Scott Rupp, a Republican running against State Rep. Wayne Henke, a Democrat, for the vacant state senate seat.

Both parties took note that it was Mrs. Bush who was headlining the Jim Talent event, not her husband or any other major Republican administration figures.

"There's a reason Republicans are bringing in the only popular member of the Bush family," said Jack Cardetti, spokesman for the Missouri Democratic Party. Republican election officials in St. Charles said privately that her visit, even though it was low-key, could help Republican voter turnout.

527 Bill Splits Republicans (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, April 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0025686

Battle lines have formed within the GOP, pitting the conservative Club for Growth and its allies against the party's leadership, as the House prepares to take up new limits on 527s.

The Democrats' steep advantage over the GOP in fundraising by the tax-exempt groups, which use a tax-code loophole to take in unlimited donations for political activity, led many Republicans to suggest that the crackdown created a partisan split. If Democrats did not embrace tighter regulation, Republicans would paint their support of the 2002 McCain-Feingold campaign-finance law as hypocritical.

But the Club for Growth is muddying the ideological waters, arguing that a Republican-backed 527 bill, even one that relaxes caps on aggregate contributions and coordinated campaign spending, violates the party's core principle of deregulated political speech. Club for Growth President Pat Toomey (R-Pa.), who served in the House until 2004, has enlisted more than 20 right-leaning advocacy groups in his quest to derail the bill.

Incumbent lawmakers "are basically saying, 'There are people out there criticizing me. … I have the power; I'll shut them down.' It's outrageous, it's appalling, it's frighteningly similar to what despotic regimes do to newspapers and individuals who criticize them," Toomey said in an interview late last week.

Co-signers of the Club's letter of opposition to the House 527 bill include Americans for Tax Reform's Grover Norquist, FreedomWorks' Matt Kibbe, Citizens Against Government Waste's Tom Schatz and conservative elder statesman Paul Weyrich. Even House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio), among his conference's leading advocates of 527 regulation, gave a nod to the bill's critics yesterday during a briefing with reporters.

"I understand their concerns, but we shouldn't let the perfect become the enemy of the good," Boehner said, referring to the argument that cash flowing to 527s, which must disclose their donors, already has begun shifting to 501(c) groups, which face far fewer reporting requirements.

The 527 bill slated for House consideration today is likely to resemble one offered by Reps. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.) and Marty Meehan (D-Mass.) that would require the groups to comply with Federal Election Commission (FEC) rules for PACs.

The Club's explosive fundraising growth during this election cycle is not driving its position against the bill, Toomey asserted.

"This should not be about the fact that we're doing well this year, which we are. It should be about the fact that we support conservative economic ideas, which we do," Toomey said.

Yet the Club has not confined its alliances to conservative groups, working with Nan Aron, president of the liberal Alliance for Justice, and Democratic election counsel Bob Bauer for strategy sessions this week.

"Placing undue restrictions on 527s will chill voter participation, stunt voter registration and reduce voter turnout during an election year," Aron said in a statement yesterday.

Some Republicans in the business world are holding their fire on the House's 527 overhaul, however. Few corporate entities have developed 527s, relying on the 501(c) designation or confining political spending to their PACs.

"Most companies, particularly public corporations, were very reluctant to invest in 527s," one business lobbyist said. "If your first duty is to your shareholders and you're going to invest in a political entity that you really have no control over, but you wear whatever it is they do because of your disclosed association, that's a risky proposition."

One of the best-known corporate 527s is the November Fund, founded in 2004 by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce to combat trial-lawyer lobbying groups and former vice-presidential candidate John Edwards. But the Chamber supplied most of the November Fund's financial backing, suggesting that it could easily reconstitute in another form if the House bill passes.

The business lobbyist acknowledged that his typical distaste for government regulation did not apply to 527 restrictions.

"Certainly we don't have the ideological-purity argument that some anti-regulation folks have. Of all the anti-regulation issues out there, this one's probably not a big one," the lobbyist said.

Rep. Tom Cole (R-Okla.) is a member of the whip team assembling vote counts on the 527 bill, expected to be a tough sell in light of burgeoning opposition from the Republican Study Committee (RSC), to which Cole also belongs.

Cole pointed out the difficult predicament of disagreeing with conservative friends on 527 regulations but said Republicans would have to embrace compromise to ensure victory in November amid a Democratic 527 onslaught.

"You have to be politically realistic about this" issue, Cole said. "This is not right to life; it's not as much of a moral question. … We need to recognize when our opponents have a weapon of this magnitude that they are using to destroy our majority. "To say 'I want to be politically consistent' and let our opponents destroy our majority seems politically misguided."

Meanwhile, at least one conservative 527, the National Federation of Republican Women (NFRW), is not opposed to a bill that would chill its own fundraising.

"We acknowledge that any 527 reform bill may affect NFRW political activities," President Beverly Davis said via e-mail. "However, the [NFRW] will work within the confines of the final 527 reform bill passed."

DOJ_NMG_0025687

And one frequent foe of the Club, the centrist Republican Main Street Partnership, is working actively to support the House 527 bill. Main Street had previously pushed to add 527 restrictions to the House's lobbying and ethics reform package, which leaders had hoped to bring to the floor this week but swapped out for the 527 bill.

The Club is challenging Main Street members in at least two GOP primaries this year, backing conservative opponents to Rep. Joe Schwarz (R-Mich.) and Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.).

Four of the 10 most active 527s for this election cycle are Republican- or conservative-leaning, according to PoliticalMoneyLine. Right-leaning 527s trail their left-leaning counterparts by about $2.5 million so far in the 2006 fundraising chase, a gap that topped $110 million by the end of the 2004 cycle.

Two of the highest-grossing GOP 527s, the Republican State Leadership Committee and the Republican Governors Association, are inactive on the federal level and not likely to be affected by the House bill, should it overcome Democratic opposition to pass the Senate. One election lawyer noted that the House bill must be phrased correctly to avoid inadvertently affecting nonfederal 527s.

"It is important that the legislation is drafted to reflect the current debate, which is about federal activity," the lawyer said.

Close The 527 Loophole (WP)

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

THE HOUSE PLANS to take up legislation today that would close the biggest remaining loophole in the campaign finance system. It would require the political groups known as 527s to play by the same rules as other committees that aim to influence federal elections. The House ought to pass the measure, sponsored by Reps. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.) and Martin T. Meehan (D-Mass.), and shut down the kind of 527 "soft money" operation that flourished during the 2004 campaign, like Democrats' America Coming Together and Republicans' Swift Boat Veterans for Truth.

These committees, named after the section of the tax code under which they're established, are by definition "organized and operated primarily" to influence elections. When those elections are for federal office, it makes no sense to let such groups collect six-, seven- and even eight-figure checks to elect or defeat candidates, while candidates, political parties and political action committees are limited to receiving contributions a small fraction of that size. Similarly, corporations and labor unions -- barred by law from contributing directly to federal candidates or parties -- shouldn't be allowed to write checks to 527s, which exist for the same purpose.

The usual politics of campaign finance reform -- Democrats for (at least publicly), Republicans against -- are upside down this time around. The reason is that Republicans do better than Democrats at raising the (relatively) small donations known as "hard money," while Democrats took the lead in the past election cycle in raising soft money for 527 groups. Connoisseurs of hypocrisy should enjoy this spectacle, but the partisan calculations are probably overstated. Democrats, with the rise of the Internet, have been improving their hard-money fundraising. Republicans are bound to draw even in the 527 race if it continues.

There are concerns that regulating money to 527s would drive spending further into the shadows, to nonprofit groups and trade associations that, unlike 527s, don't even have to disclose their donors and spending. But there are restrictions on the partisan activity of such groups, and if a problem develops with the misuse of such organizations, that could be addressed in future legislation. It's not a reason for inaction now.

Senate Dems To Pursue New Strategy On Abortion (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, April 5, 2006

The Senate Democratic leadership says it has found a wedge issue to strengthen the party's position on abortion rights, which top strategists think has become a liability in recent years.

The wedge is legislation expanding access to contraceptives and sex education, which polls show a majority of Americans support but which Democrats are betting will be difficult for social conservatives in the Republican base to accept.

Democratic strategists say the time is right for action because women who support abortion rights but are not politically engaged are alarmed by the confirmation of Samuel Alito as Sandra Day O'Connor's replacement on the Supreme Court and by the passage of legislation strictly curbing the availability of abortion there.

Democratic leaders had planned to attach their wedge legislation to the budget resolution last month, but let that opportunity to pass.

The Prevention First Act is sponsored by Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.), one of few congressional Democrats considered anti-abortion. The bill, which Reid introduced at the start of the Congress, has the support of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), presumptive front-runner in the 2008 presidential primary and 21 other Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0025688

The bill would prohibit group health plans from excluding contraceptive drugs, devices and outpatient services if they cover the cost of other prescription drugs and outpatient services. It would also require the secretary of health and human services to disseminate information on emergency contraception to healthcare providers and require hospitals receiving federal money to provide emergency contraception to victims of sexual assault.

The bill would also mandate that federally funded programs provide information about contraceptives that is medically accurate and includes data on health benefits and failure rates.

When asked whether he would be able to get a vote on his bill soon, Reid said: "I hope so. I'll do what I can."

He added that bringing the issue to the floor is "on my mind."

A Democratic leadership aide said that, while only a slim majority of voters favor abortion rights, an overwhelming majority support promoting the use of contraceptives and comprehensive sex education.

Democratic pollsters also say that the issues of contraceptives and sex education are favorable for Democrats.

"The issue of abortion is very different from the issue of prevention, access to birth control and access to comprehensive sex education," said Anna Greenberg, a pollster for Greenberg, Quinlan, Rosner, which works for the abortion-rights group NARAL Pro-Choice America. "I think that Senator Reid's prevention-first agenda is not just smart in policy terms but smart in political terms because there is overwhelming support in the public for access to birth control and comprehensive sex education. People want women to be able to prevent unwanted pregnancies."

Celinda Lake, a pollster with Lake Snell Perry Mermin and Associates, working for NARAL, has tested voter support for Reid's Prevention First Act.

"It's 3-to-1 in favor of it. Even pro-life voters support it," Lake said. "It has the potential to be both a wedge and a turnout issue post-Alito. It shows how extreme a faction [within] the Republican Party is.

"Lazy Democratic women who are very pro-choice are very concerned about the combination of Alito and South Dakota."

Her polling last month in upstate New York, which has a heavy concentration of Republicans and socially conservative voters compared to the southern part of the state, showed that nearly 80 percent of voters supported comprehensive sex education, even when compared to programs emphasizing abstinence as the only truly effective form of birth control, Lake said.

Senate conservatives said they're not worried about the Democrats' plans to isolate them from independents and centrist.

"The efforts will likely fail because they're beholden to left-wing interest groups who oppose common-sense measures like parental notification," said John Hart, spokesman for Sen. Tom Coburn (Okla.), a conservative Republican who has been outspoken on the issues of abortion and contraception. "They take an ideological and unscientific view of contraception.

"Our work to improve accuracy of labeling on condoms has been blocked by a lot of people on the left who are supposedly for a balanced education approach."

Hart explained that Democrats and their liberal allies often oppose efforts to increase awareness about the failure rate of contraceptives in preventing pregnancy and the spread of disease.

He added that his boss would work with any colleague who wants to protect the health of women and young adults but would also "fight any effort by any politician to make this a wedge issue."

Turning The Tables (TIME)

By Perry Bacon Jr.

Time, April 5, 2006

On Capitol Hill last week, it was almost as if the two parties had decided to switch roles. At a press briefing, House Democratic Whip Steny Hoyer was declaring, "Republicans don't have an agenda," a critique Republicans usually hurl at Democrats. The next day Hoyer and other Democrats from the Senate and House, along with state governors, got together to announce the party's unified plan for improving America's national security.

Meanwhile, Republicans were looking in disarray — even before the announcement this week that Tom DeLay would give up his House seat. Some House Republicans were quietly rasing concerns after Majority Leader John Boehner questioned the value of a 700-mile fence for the U.S.-Mexico border that was part of an immigration bill passed by the House in December, while Senate Republicans questioned if their leader, Bill Frist, was allowing his presidential ambitions to get in the way of passing immigration legislation. And as the Senate moved forward with a lenient immigration reform plan, a group of almost two dozen House Republicans held a press conference to strongly denounce the Senate GOP's approach.

The conventional wisdom in Washington in recent years has been that Republicans are more unified and disciplined and have better-articulated ideas than Democrats, who are often at war with one another and questioning their leadership. But lately the Democrats, looking to create a campaign platform for 2006, have put out some ideas that their famously fractured party largely agrees on. Earlier this year, they released a plan to reform lobbying following the scandals of Jack Abramoff. Last week's security ideas were hardly earth-shattering: increasing inspection of goods coming through U.S. ports, doubling the number of Special Forces troops, pushing Iraq toward full sovereignty by the end of this year, and increasing efforts to make the U.S. less dependent on foreign oil. Some Democrats, like Pennsylvania Congressman John Murtha, have called for more aggressive steps, like the withdrawal of troops from Iraq. But Democrats seem to broadly agree on the security issues that hurt them in 2002 and 2004.

And Democrats can't be accused of lacking ideas: many of the party's most prominent leaders are putting out long tomes detailing their views. Later this month, Ted Kennedy's book America Back on Track will lay out ideas to ensure universal health care for all Americans, and House Democrat Rahm Emanuel and former Clinton aide Bruce Reed will put out a modestly titled book called The Plan in August that includes ideas such as a national science and technology center modeled on the National Institutes of Health. Illinois Senator Barack Obama has told the Chicago Tribune his new book The Audacity of Hope, due out in October, will look to show how politicians can "shift away from ideological debates and focus on traditional American common sense."

By contrast, on many key issues, Republicans can't find much agreement. Moderates and conservatives in House will spend this week battling over proposed spending cuts in the budget, while Republicans in the Senate fight about immigration reform. President Bush's domestic agenda, from health savings accounts to a commission to reform Social Security and other entitlement plans, has drawn little enthusiasm on Capitol Hill.

To be sure, Democrats still have their own problems. With a bunch of different presidential candidates, governors, congressional leaders and Howard Dean, the Democratic National Committee chairman, the party doesn't have one strong defining leader. And while Democrats may agree broadly, there are still major differences on tactics, such as the proposal to censure Bush over his warrantless spying program offered by Wisconsin Senator Russ Feingold. That idea won little support among his fellow Democrats. "I don't think it's a lack of ideas; it's coherence," says Paul Begala, the veteran Democratic strategist. The anti-war left is so mad at Connecticut Senator Joe Lieberman, for instance, that they're running a primary campaign against him.

And some prominent Republicans are offering their own policy ideas. Frist wants to start a program modeled on the Peace Corps that would send doctors and nurses to countries lacking medical personnel. Jack Kingston, a Republican congressman from Georgia, has put out what he's called the American Renewal Project, an eight-point plan that calls for a commission to recommend spending cuts to balance the budget and stop spending the Social Security surplus. The Republican Study Committee, a group of the most conservative House members, has released a plan to balance the budget in the next five years, although it would require politically difficult cuts in Medicare and Medicaid.

But the more important question might be: do policy plans and unity matter? Republicans have long argued their "Contract with America" — a 10-point plan signed by more than 300 GOP candidates — helped push them toward victory in November 1994. But according to polls at the time, most voters had not ever heard of the contract by Election Day. And many Democrats question the need for any kind of grand plan, particularly with President Bush's poll numbers below 40%; the party could urge voters to choose Democrats in Congress just to offer a balance to Bush. The key question, some Dems argue, is how successful they are in tying Republican candidates to Bush and making the election about the Administration's mistakes in Iraq and during Hurricane Katrina, rather than touting their own proposals in long policy statements. "To my way of thinking, voters don't need lots of plans," says Dianne Farrell, a Democratic congressional candidate in Connecticut running against incumbent Republican Christopher Shays. "Voters get it." Still, after years of being a house divided, Democrats will soon show their unity on another issue, putting out their plans for the economy — while happily watching the GOP's continuing family feud.

Biden Seeks Review Of State Department Screening (KRT)

By Jonathan S. Landay

Knight Ridder, April 4, 2006

WASHINGTON - A senior Democratic senator has asked the State Department's inspector general to determine whether the department has been using a political litmus test to screen private American citizens before sending them abroad to represent the United States.

Sen. Joseph Biden of Delaware, the top Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said in a letter to the inspector general that he was requesting the review in part because of a Dec. 2 Knight Ridder report that such a test was being used to weed out critics of the Bush administration's Iraq policy.

"If these allegations are true, such a policy appears to be inconsistent" with a State Department requirement "that speakers must be `representative of a broad range of responsible and informed opinion' in the United States," Biden said in the letter, which was dated Monday and sent to State Department Inspector General Howard J. Krongard.

"Moreover, it would undermine a public diplomacy purpose of the program - to show the world that we are not afraid of, and indeed actively encourage, full and open discussion of important issues," said the letter, a copy of which Knight Ridder obtained Tuesday.

The earlier Knight Ridder report concerned the U.S. Speakers/Specialists Program. Run by the State Department's Bureau of International Information Programs, it sends private American citizens and others on speaking engagements abroad.

The story quoted current and former U.S. officials as saying that potential participants were vetted - via Internet searches, for example - for any comments or writings that criticized administration policies, particularly its approach to Iraq.

Krongard's office didn't immediately return a call seeking a comment on whether it was acting on Biden's request.

In his letter, Biden said a review of the Bureau of International Information Programs also should be conducted because there hadn't been one since a 2004 inspection.

That effort, he said, found that while the overseas speakers program was a "highly regarded and valuable tool," it lacked a "strategic focus" and was largely reactive instead of proactive.

In Richmond, More Bushes in the Running

Best way for the Bush twins to stay incognito: Change into running clothes and hide out in Richmond.

Jenna and Barbara ran a 10K through the state capital's Fan district Saturday -- even crossing the finish line together! -- but went barely detected until the Richmond Times-Dispatch put the pieces together yesterday. The paper deduced that the twins ran under the fake names of Sarah and Emily Jackson , finishing at 54:27. Jenna's boyfriend, Henry Hager, finished three minutes faster under his own name. Race director Tracey Russell told us the White House reserved slots for the twins three weeks ago; both they and the Secret Service agents who ran with them blended invisibly into the crowd. "They're definitely in good shape," Russell said.

Help For Families (WT)

By Rick Santorum

The Washington Times, April 5, 2006

Thanks to the ingenuity of working Americans and the tax cuts passed by a Republican Congress in 2001 and 2003, our economy has rebounded from its post-September 11 slump and is the envy of the world. With a booming stock market, nearly 5 million jobs created since August 2003, a sound housing market, minority home ownership at an all-time high and an average unemployment percentage lower than the last three decades, there is no doubt that our economy is strong.

To keep our economy strong, three steps must be taken. First, we must extend the tax cuts of 2003 to prevent a massive tax increase, which would only stunt the economy and place a substantial burden on working families. Second, we must work to reduce the deficit by cutting wasteful government spending and reforming inefficient government programs. Third, we must do more to empower those who live beyond the reach of our robust economy.

Some in America have not reaped the rewards of our economic bounty; it is to help meet their needs that I have sponsored the Senate Anti-Poverty Agenda. There are three components to the anti-poverty agenda: work, investment and a neighborhood-based focus.

Work, not welfare, is the gateway to opportunity for all Americans. In 1996, Congress enacted historic welfare reform and the results speak for themselves: Welfare caseloads have been cut in half; more than 7 million individuals and 2 million families have exchanged a welfare check for a paycheck; and 1.6 million children have been lifted out of poverty.

To continue the success of the 1996 reforms and address the welfare recipients not yet involved in any work, Congress renewed and the president signed welfare reform, adding critical incentives to promote healthy marriage and responsible fatherhood.

In recognition of the role small businesses play in creating new jobs, I have advocated the expansion of the Work Opportunity Tax Credit (WOTC), a program that creates meaningful employment opportunities for millions of low-income Americans and provides tax incentives for employers who hire the jobless. Congress has the opportunity to approve this tax credit by passing the conference report of the Tax Reconciliation bill, which is currently in conference committee.

The second component of the Anti-Poverty Agenda is investment. Individual Development Accounts (IDAs) and KIDS Accounts are two investment proposals I have introduced that will enable low-income Americans to get the help they need as they strive to build a solid financial foundation. IDAs provide low-income, working Americans the opportunity to build assets through matched savings accounts for home ownership, educational needs or small business investments.

KIDS Accounts would provide every child with a savings account worth $500. Children in households that earn below the national median income would qualify for a one-time additional supplemental of up to $500. Allowed to mature until the account holder's 18th birthday, this tax-free money could provide a crucial first step to a down payment on a house, a college education or another step toward future prosperity.

The third component of our agenda is strengthening America's neighborhoods. The surest path to strong neighborhoods and communities is strengthening our charitable organizations, which rely on the generosity of citizens. Yet, under current law, more than two-thirds of American taxpayers are deprived of the chance to receive a tax deduction of their charitable contributions because they do not itemize on their tax returns.

The provision I have proposed that is currently in the Tax Reconciliation Bill changes this by providing tax deductions on their charitable contributions to almost 83 million Americans who do not itemize on their tax return.

I also worked to include a provision that would allow individuals to give tax-free contributions from their IRAs for charitable purposes, helping a wide range of charities and likely providing billions of dollars to help make higher education more accessible and affordable.

Lastly, I offered an amendment to the tax-reconciliation conference that provides restaurants, companies and farmers an increased tax incentive to donate food to shelters and food banks that feed the hungry.

By keeping tax rates low, enabling low-income Americans to develop real assets and amending tax laws to encourage all Americans to give generously to our nation's charities helping those in need, we will help ensure that our economy stays strong and that ours is a nation of opportunity and prosperity for all.

Investors Seek Clarity On Campaign Giving (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- As Congress debates new campaign-finance rules, shareholder groups are pushing companies to do a better job of disclosing political donations.

McDonald's Corp. and Southern Co. are the latest to agree to post more information on their Web sites about contributions to candidates and issue-oriented groups that sometimes don't have to release donors' names. Eight other companies also have changed their policies in response to shareholder requests in the past three years.

The campaign for corporate disclosure is gaining momentum. Institutional Shareholder Services, which advises investors on how to vote their proxies, is for the first time recommending passage of a shareholder resolution requiring more oversight and disclosure of political giving.

The unprecedented recommendation involves Washington Mutual Inc., a fast-growing Seattle thrift. According to Alan Gulick, a company spokesman, Washington Mutual opposes the resolution on grounds that information on the thrift's donations, roughly $50,000 in the past election cycle, are already available to the public. In addition, Washington Mutual executives argue the cost of implementing a new policy may well exceed the company's relatively modest political giving.

Proponents of corporate disclosure say political giving by public companies can create risks for shareholders, particularly if the firm winds up in the middle of a political scandal.

In the money-laundering investigation of former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, for instance, eight corporations were indicted for making donations to a Texas political group associated with Mr. DeLay. In Texas, donations by companies to political candidates are illegal; the firms say they weren't aware that their contributions might be directed to candidates, as prosecutors allege. Four of the corporations have settled with prosecutors.

"We are not arguing that companies shouldn't spend money politically. Companies really should do more due diligence in tracking where they are spending their money and where it ultimately ends up," says Bruce Freed, who is spearheading the effort as co-director of the Center for Political Accountability, a nonpartisan group working on transparency in corporate donations.

A recent survey of investors by Mason-Dixon Polling & Research, commissioned by Mr. Freed, has provided him with fresh ammunition to take to corporate executives. More than 90% of respondents backed more disclosure and 84% wanted board oversight and approval of such giving. Nearly three-quarters of respondents agreed that corporate giving is often aimed at advancing the private interests of executives rather than the company's interest.

In the past three years, the Center for Political Accountability has teamed with various shareholder organizations, including unions, religious groups and environmentalists, to introduce more than 100 corporate resolutions calling for board oversight and greater transparency of corporate political activity. All but one were defeated, but they have sparked negotiations that led to policies that make it easier for shareholders to track political giving and impose more internal scrutiny of donations. Sixty resolutions are pending this year and 41 are scheduled for votes.

Corporations largely have opposed the resolutions, saying that investors can go to a host of Web sites -- including the Federal Election Commission's -- to monitor donations.

That had been the position held by Institutional Shareholder Services. In recent months, though, ISS analysts concluded that changes in campaign-finance rules stemming from the 2002 McCain-Feingold law made it harder to track corporate giving since so much money was flowing to a new batch of political organizations not bound by the same disclosure rules as political parties, says Jim Letsky, a senior ISS analyst.

"We were seeing examples of where corporations didn't know where their money was ultimately ending up," Mr. Letsky said. Congress is considering legislation to close that loophole, but it is unclear if anything will pass this year.

ISS hasn't given overhaul advocates everything they want. Recommendations on shareholder resolutions regarding political giving will be evaluated on a company-by-company basis and largely will hinge on whether a firm already has high-level oversight of donations and a policy explaining its criteria for giving, Mr. Letsky said.

In the case of Washington Mutual, ISS analysts concluded there "is no detailed information" about "oversight or accountability for corporation contributions or the administration of Washington Mutual's PACs." By contrast, ISS this month is recommending against passage of a similar resolution brought by Citigroup Inc. shareholders because the company posts its rationale for making political donations on its Web site and requires board oversight of them.

Mr. Freed plans to step up pressure on corporations by pressing for disclosure of dues and contributions to trade associations. Corporations have long been able to make their voices heard -- and their identities concealed -- on Capitol Hill by having their trade associations take the lead, and these groups often closely guard donor lists and finances.

Mr. Freed is preparing a report that he says will track some of the millions of dollars donated by corporations to trade associations or other groups that eventually are passed on to candidates or causes that sometimes conflict with policies advocated by the firms, such as providing benefits for employees in same-sex partnerships.

Margaret Weber, coordinator of corporate responsibility for the Adrian Dominican Sisters, a Roman Catholic order in Michigan, is taking up the cause to push for disclosure of trade-association payments.

She became interested in the issue during the Capitol Hill debate over a prescription-drug plan for seniors in which the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, the trade group representing big drug companies, figured prominently. While the Dominican Sisters didn't take a position on the legislation, they had hoped the bill would allow for government-negotiated drug prices and transparency on rebates and discounts. Ms. Weber says neither happened in part because of opposition from drug makers.

Ms. Weber said information about a company's trade-association membership could influence where the sisters invest their savings, because "as much as possible, they strive to have an alignment between the values of their money and their mission."

Hillary Leaves Room For Gore (HILL)

By Dick Morris

The Hill, April 5, 2006

Hillary Clinton made a fundamental decision in 2002 to support the invasion of Iraq. In doing so, she sought the center of American politics, reacting to issues much as her husband had throughout his ascent to the presidency.

But times have changed, and the center is not what it used to be. In the highly partisan and charged environment of politics in 2006, what has become of the centrist doctrines that reelected Bill Clinton and brought George W. Bush, the compassionate conservative, to the White House? Is the center still the place to aim in getting votes?

At the White House, I described the Clintonian brand of centrism as triangulation, with the polarized, partisan participants in the dialectic aligned to the left and the right at the base of the triangle and the centrist synthesis atop the apex, embracing the best of both arguments and rejecting the worst.

But the desideratum of American politics is not always found in the apex. When we confront new issues, challenges or problems, we are not ready for synthesis. We want our politicians, on both sides of the aisle, to develop alternatives and to debate and elaborate them. Unlike the Japanese, we expect our system to polarize when we face new issues so that we can listen to both sides and make our decision.

But eventually the debate has run its course. And because we are not like Italy or France, we refuse to debate perennially the same questions and demand, after the debate has raged long enough, that our leaders articulate a synthesis that reflects our consensus.

That was the situation the Clinton White House faced in the mid-'90s. By then, Americans had been debating more or less the same issues for decades — crime, welfare, the budget deficit, our response to globalization, free trade, a federal role in education — and we had come to conclusions about what we wanted. It remained for Clinton to implement them and cement his popularity.

But as the 21st century dawned and the old problems of the '90s had been largely solved, a raft of new issues arose with which we were less familiar. As we pondered the questions of international terrorism, global climate change, the catastrophic consequences of our dependence on imported oil, the privacy issues raised by the Internet, massive illegal immigration and the high costs of the new medicines and medical treatments, we looked to our political leaders to develop alternative solutions and both want and welcome debate.

Hillary Clinton bet on consensus and centrism in backing the war and an aggressive policy on terrorism — and may have bet wrong.

There are no rewards for those who push consensus when we want polarized debate. Ask the George H.W. Bush of 1992, the Jimmy Carter of 1980 and Gerald Ford. Fate is equally unkind to polarizers when we want consensus. Ask John Kerry, Bob Dole, Mike Dukakis and Walter Mondale.

Hillary may have misjudged the left. She may have opened herself up to a challenge from the left over Iraq and the war on terror. She may have chosen the wrong time and the wrong issue on which to cross party lines.

Fortunately for her, John Kerry and John Edwards were equally complicit in backing the war at its inception. And Howard Dean was always too far off the deep end in opposing it. But Al Gore, who has no stain of support for the war to overcome and is the custom-designed candidate for the issues of energy and climate change, could mount a serious challenge to Hillary Clinton.

Mrs. Clinton is trying to move to the left on anything and everything but the war. Her comparison of illegal aliens she once said she "abhorred" to Jesus and her charge that Bush is one of our history's worst presidents reflect her concern that she may have left the left behind in her move to the center.

Now she is in a fix. If she retreats and retracts her support for the war, she will become the ultimate weather vane, shifting with the political wind. If she adopts a pro-peace posture, she undoes all of her work to position herself as a hawkish female, able to overcome the stereotypes that hamper women who wish to be commanders in chief.

But if she stays in the center as the Democratic Party falls off to the left, she could find herself with a deadly primary challenge from her husband's former running mate.

Buckley Calls Clinton A Contender (NYT/BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

William F. Buckley Jr., the prominent conservative writer and leader, says that while a strong Republican candidate for the 2008 presidential race has yet to emerge, the Democrats have in Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton a true contender to win the White House.

Mrs. Clinton is "a very consequential woman with an extraordinary background," he said in an interview with Bloomberg Television that was broadcast on Monday. "Her thought is kind of woozy left, not in my judgment threatening."

She is "a phenomenon, a woman candidate who might easily be president," he added.

Mr. Buckley suggested that he was less than impressed with the current group of potential candidates for 2008, saying, "I don't find a commanding presence sort of knocking on the door" for the next presidential campaign.

Senator John McCain of Arizona, a potential Republican candidate, is "a remarkable human being," Mr. Buckley said. "I don't think that his name comes to mind automatically as somebody who over a period of years has addressed problems with fruitful thinking, let alone with consistent thinking."

Neither senator has announced plans to seek a party nomination, though both have been raising money, making campaign appearances on behalf of other candidates and taking other steps to build a network of national support.

Mr. Buckley, 80, is often called the father of contemporary conservatism in America. He founded the National Review in 1955, and his philosophy, articulated in the magazine, calls for small government, low taxes and a strong defense. In the same interview in which he discussed Mrs. Clinton, he also criticized President Bush's handling of the war in Iraq, which he called a failure.

Mass. Residents Face Required Coverage (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

DOJ_NMG_0025694

USA Today, April 5, 2006

Residents of Massachusetts will be the first in the nation required to carry health insurance, just as motorists in many states are required to carry auto insurance.

After months of debate, state lawmakers approved a bill Tuesday that requires individuals to have coverage and tacks a $295 per worker annual assessment on employers who don't provide it, with the aim of reducing the state's 550,000 uninsured to near zero within three years.

The bill goes to Republican Gov. Mitt Romney. He's expected to sign it because he proposed such a measure last summer. “It's about 95% of what I wanted,” he said. “We'll be the only state in America where every citizen has health insurance.”

The state will be the only one requiring that all individuals who can afford to purchase insurance do so.

“That is where they are really pioneers,” says Paul Ginsburg, an economist with the Center for Studying Health System Change, a non-partisan research group in Washington. He says the only way to get universal coverage is to require individuals to carry insurance.

Free coverage will be provided to individuals at or below the federal poverty line, which is $9,600 a year, and the state will subsidize coverage for those up to three times the federal poverty level.

The legislature estimated the programs would cost $316 million the first year and up to $1 billion annually by the third year, with all but $125 million annually coming from state and federal funds already earmarked for health care.

“This plan is particularly helpful to lower- and low-middle income uninsured folks. What's less clear is its assistance to more middle income uninsured,” says John McDonough of Health Care for All, an advocacy group that supports the concept of the plan.

The new subsidized insurance plans are to be available by July. After July 1, 2007, uninsured individuals who refuse to buy coverage could lose their state tax exemption, which is worth about $150 per person. In following years, those who refuse to buy will pay penalties equal to about half the cost of a health insurance plan.

Insurers have yet to put forward a package of plans that will be available, or the prices. Romney says the premiums will be about $200 a month for a single adult.

Some business groups also say the plan does nothing to contain growing medical costs.

“If you're looking for increased access for the uninsured, this (bill) is a winner,” says Jon Hurst, president of the Retailers Association of Massachusetts, a statewide trade association of 2,500 retailers and restaurants. “If you're looking to reduce out-of-sight costs … particularly (for) small employers, it doesn't accomplish that.”

Massachusetts Sets Health Plan For Nearly All (NYT)

By Pam Belluck

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

BOSTON, April 4 — Massachusetts is poised to become the first state to provide nearly universal health care coverage with a bill passed overwhelmingly by the legislature Tuesday that Gov. Mitt Romney says he will sign.

The bill does what health experts say no other state has been able to do: provide a mechanism for all of its citizens to obtain health insurance. It accomplishes that in a way that experts say combines methods and proposals from across the political spectrum, apportioning the cost among businesses, individuals and the government.

"This is probably about as close as you can get to universal," said Paul B. Ginsburg, president of the nonpartisan Center for Studying Health System Change in Washington. "It's definitely going to be inspiring to other states about how there was this compromise. They found a way to get to a major expansion of coverage that people could agree on. For a conservative Republican, this is individual responsibility. For a Democrat, this is government helping those that need help."

The bill, the product of months of wrangling between legislators and the governor, requires all Massachusetts residents to obtain health coverage by July 1, 2007.

Individuals who can afford private insurance will be penalized on their state income taxes if they do not purchase it. Government subsidies to private insurance plans will allow more of the working poor to buy insurance and will expand the number of children who are eligible for free coverage. Businesses with more than 10 workers that do not provide insurance will be assessed up to $295 per employee per year.

All told, the plan is expected to cover 515,000 uninsured people within three years, about 95 percent of the state's uninsured population, legislators said, leaving less than 1 percent of the population unprotected.

"It is not a typical Massachusetts-Taxachusetts, oh-just-crazy-liberal plan," said Stuart H. Altman, a professor of health policy at Brandeis University. "It isn't that at all. It is a pretty moderate approach, and that's what's impressive about it. It tried to borrow and blend a lot of different pieces."

DOJ_NMG_0025695

Many states, including Massachusetts, have been wrestling for years with how to cover the uninsured, and several states have come close, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures. Hawaii passed a universal access law in 1974 requiring employers to offer health care coverage for employees working 20 hours or more a week, but nearly 10 percent of people remain uncovered. Efforts to cover all citizens in Minnesota and Vermont in 1992 and in Massachusetts in 1988 fell flat in the mid-1990s when the language in the bills concerning universal coverage was repealed.

In 2003, Maine enacted a law that significantly broadened insurance coverage and combined employer payments with expanded government programs. That year, California enacted a law that required employer contributions, but it was repealed in a referendum in 2004. Massachusetts would be the first state to require its citizens to have health insurance.

The Massachusetts bill creates a sliding scale of affordability ranging from people who can afford insurance outright to those who cannot afford it at all. About 215,000 people will be covered by allowing individuals and businesses with 50 or fewer employees to buy insurance with pretax dollars, and by giving insurance companies incentives to offer stripped-down plans at lower cost. Lower-cost basic plans will be available to people ages 19 to 26.

Subsidies for other private plans will be available for people with incomes at or below 300 percent of the poverty level. Children in those families will be eligible for free coverage through Medicaid, an expansion of the current system.

The Massachusetts bill was hammered out with proposals and input from state Democratic legislators; Mr. Romney, a Republican; Senator Edward M. Kennedy, a Democrat; insurers; academics; businesses; hospitals; and advocates for the poor, including religious leaders.

They were motivated in part by a threat by the federal government to eliminate $385 million in federal Medicaid money unless the state reduced the number of uninsured people. The state was supposed to have the bill completed by January, but state officials said they were confident that the federal government would approve of Tuesday's bill.

"Whenever you can have the medical community, the business community and the advocates all applauding our efforts, I think that's indicative of a successful exercise," said State Senator Robert E. Travaglini, the majority leader.

Mr. Romney, who is considering running for president in 2008, said in an interview Tuesday that the bill, passed by a legislature that is 85 percent Democratic, was "95 percent of what I proposed."

He said, "This is really a landmark for our state because this proves at this stage that we can get health insurance for all our citizens without raising taxes and without a government takeover. The old single-payer canard is gone."

Mr. Romney pushed the idea of the "individual mandate," requiring people who can afford insurance to buy it. The bill makes it possible for employers to enable many of those people to use pretax dollars, saving them 25 percent or more. Individuals who fail to get health insurance by July 2007 will first lose their personal exemption on their state taxes. In subsequent years, they would have to pay a penalty that could be as high as half of what an affordable health care premium would cost.

Eric Fehrnstrom, the governor's communications director, said that for those people with incomes above 300 percent of poverty, "our assumption was that these would be mostly single mothers who just did not have the wherewithal to get insurance. It turned out it was mostly young males. In some cases they are making very attractive salaries. These are people who just don't imagine themselves needing care, but of course when they break a leg when they're out bungee jumping they go to the hospital and we end up paying for their care anyway."

One element that Mr. Romney and some legislators did not want was the fee for employers who do not provide health insurance.

For several months the bill seemed stalled because the House and Senate leaders could not agree on the issue of charging businesses. One proposal of an $800-per-employee charge was reduced to a maximum of $295 that would go toward paying costs for the uninsured and would be reduced as more people became insured, Mr. Travaglini said.

Because the bill is part of a budget bill, Mr. Romney has line-item veto power. He said Tuesday that he would likely change the business fee provision in some way or veto it before signing the bill.

Still, he did not seem that worried about it, saying he had been most concerned that the fee not be a payroll tax, as had been originally proposed. Mr. Travaglini said that if Mr. Romney vetoed the business fee, the legislature would override it.

Bob Baker, president of the Smaller Business Association of New England, said his members seemed to accept the idea of the fee.

"The notion of the level playing field, I think from an element of fairness and equity, people are O.K. with it, unless it impinges on their ability to pay for it," Mr. Baker said. "There hasn't been a hue and cry among our members."

Mr. Romney said that with more people insured, everyone would "get better health care" and that premiums for people who already had insurance might drop because "providers won't be pushing the cost of the uninsured onto the people who have insurance."

James Roosevelt Jr., president and chief executive of Tufts Health Plan, agreed.

"I think that will help both improve the quality of health care and lower the cost," Mr. Roosevelt said, but he added, "We would have liked more flexibility in the design of health plans to permit lower premiums that are affordable for all people."

The program, which was approved 154 to 2 in the House and 37 to 0 in the Senate, will cost $1.2 billion over three years, but only $125 million of that will be new state money. The rest will come from federal money and existing state money. After three years, lawmakers say, no new state money will be required. A new agency will administer the system.

Advocates for the uninsured held a victory rally at the Statehouse.

"We're thrilled that this truly represents a commitment to the poor and the working poor," said Rabbi Jonah Pesner, a leader of the Greater Boston Interfaith Organization.

Joseph Landais, 64, could use insurance for himself, his wife and three children. Mr. Landais, a retired hospital custodian, said his wife, a nurse's aide, makes too much for the family to be eligible for Medicaid but not enough to afford insurance. He had a hernia operation four months ago that he did not have to pay for under the free-care pool, but he had not been able to see a doctor since then, even though he is still not feeling well.

"After years that you've been working that hard," Mr. Landais said, "I think you deserve something back."

Mass. Bill Requires Health Coverage (WP)

By David A. Fahrenthold

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

BOSTON, April 4 -- The Massachusetts legislature approved a bill Tuesday that would require all residents to purchase health insurance or face legal penalties, which would make this the first state to tackle the problem of incomplete medical coverage by treating patients the same way it does cars.

Gov. Mitt Romney (R) supports the proposal, which would require all uninsured adults in the state to purchase some kind of insurance policy by July 1, 2007, or face a fine. Their choices would be expanded to include a range of new and inexpensive policies -- ranging from about $250 per month to nearly free -- from private insurers subsidized by the state.

Romney said the bill, modeled on the state's policy of requiring auto insurance, is intended to end an era in which 550,000 people go without insurance and their hospital and doctor visits are paid for in part with public funds.

"We insist that everybody who drives a car has insurance," Romney said in an interview. "And cars are a lot less expensive than people."

Tuesday's votes approving the bill -- 154 to 2 in the House and 37 to 0 in the Senate -- were the culmination of two years of politicking and several months of backroom negotiations, as rival health-care plans from Romney and the two Democrat-led chambers were hammered into one.

What resulted is a proposal that health-care experts say is unlike any other in the country. What to do about the 45 million Americans without health insurance has flummoxed both the Bush administration, whose proposal for "health savings accounts" fizzled, and that of Bill Clinton, whose broad plan for health-care changes fell flat.

On the state level, Hawaii and Maine have programs that seek to offer near-universal access to health insurance, and Illinois last year approved a subsidy plan that will widely increase coverage for needy children.

But no state, experts say, has taken the step of making health insurance coverage a legal requirement. The idea was applauded by Uwe E. Reinhardt, a professor of economics and public affairs at Princeton University, who said that he has long believed that the American system of allowing uninsured patients to receive care at the government's expense was nothing more than "freedom to mooch."

"Massachusetts is the first state in America to reach full adulthood," said Reinhardt, noting that the new measure is a move toward personal responsibility. "The rest of America is still in adolescence."

As simple as the idea sounds -- buy insurance or else -- the proposal is complex and, in some cases, still unfinished. For instance, it leaves the task of determining exactly how much some low-income residents will pay for their new, more affordable policies to a new agency that would serve as a liaison between the government, policyholders and private insurance companies.

Because of that uncertainty, some still worry that the residents required to buy insurance would not be able to.

"Who defines what's affordable?" said the Rev. Hurmon Hamilton, a minister in the Boston neighborhood of Roxbury and a leader in an interfaith organization that has pushed for health-care changes.

Another aspect that may change is the $295 annual fee that the bill would require companies to pay for each employee they do not provide with insurance. Legislative leaders have insisted that this money be fed into the pool that would subsidize low-cost policies for the uninsured, but Romney said that would be unnecessary.

"That's likely to be adjusted by me," he said -- potentially through the use of a line-item veto.

This is how Massachusetts leaders envision the plan would work:

DOJ_NMG_0025697

Uninsured people earning less than the federal poverty threshold would be able to purchase subsidized policies that have no premiums, and would be responsible for very small co-payment fees for emergency-room visits and other services. Those earning between that amount and three times the poverty-level amount would be able to buy subsidized policies with premiums based on their ability to pay. Though no maximum premium is set in the bill, legislators' intent seems to be for it to top out at about $200 to $250 per month.

All residents will have to provide details about their health insurance policy on their state income tax returns in 2008. Those who do not have insurance would first lose their personal state tax exemption, perhaps worth $150, and later face penalties equal to half the cost of the cheapest policy they should have bought. That might work out to $1,200 per year, officials said. Those who cannot find an affordable plan could obtain a waiver.

Enforcement of the requirement will not be done by hospitals, officials said: They will treat uninsured patients as before.

The bill's passage was celebrated as a victory in the state legislature, with House Speaker Salvatore F. DiMasi (D) telling colleagues that they had succeeded where other states had failed.

"We did something to solve the problem," he said.

The same message might provide a political boost to Romney, who is considering a presidential run in 2008. By proving he can work with Democrats, and find a health-care solution that relies on the private sector, Romney can portray himself as an executive who can work across the aisle in harshly partisan times.

"It might help him to say, 'Look, I have a solution for health insurance,' " said Julian E. Zelizer, a professor of history at Boston University.

Massachusetts Seeks To Mandate Health Coverage (WSJ)

By John Hechinger And David Armstrong

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

In a far-reaching bid to obtain universal health-care coverage in their state, Massachusetts lawmakers overwhelmingly approved a bill that is the first in the nation that requires all citizens to buy medical insurance.

The bill also requires that businesses not offering health insurance pay penalties to help cover the uninsured and uses a combination of added state spending, tax incentives, insurance subsidies and expanded government-insurance programs to reach the estimated 550,000 Massachusetts residents who are currently uninsured. Gov. Mitt Romney, widely viewed as a possible presidential candidate, has indicated he intends to sign the bill.

Massachusetts, a state of 6.4 million people, would join only Hawaii, which for decades has required employer-provided insurance, in attempting to mandate universal coverage, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures. A handful of other states, including California and New York, have measures pending that seek to cover many more state residents, and dozens of others are trying to address the problem in smaller ways.

"States are struggling with this all over the country," said Rachel DeGolia, the operations director for Universal Health Care Action Network, a national nonprofit group pushing for wider health coverage. "What is unique about Massachusetts is they are trying to do something about it."

Richard Cauchi, director of health programs for the state legislatures group, called the individual-mandate requirement in Massachusetts "novel." The tactic, akin to forcing drivers to buy car insurance, "is an untried approach that other states will look at with interest," he said.

Yesterday's action shows that states may prove more adept at coming up with plans to provide universal coverage after President Bill Clinton found such efforts to be a big stumbling block at the federal level in the 1990s. Massachusetts faced a July federal deadline to show that it was working to cover more of the uninsured or face losing $385 million in funding for Medicaid, the federal-state insurance plan for the poor and disabled. Other states -- schedules vary from state to state -- are expected to face similar pressure in coming years.

Though some business groups, such as the Greater Boston Chamber of Commerce, have generally voiced support for the bill, others, especially those representing small businesses, are wary of its effects on costs and job creation. In addition, health-care experts say the plan, despite its bold claims, provides little new money to pay for health care. They note that under Gov. Michael Dukakis, Massachusetts approved a plan for universal health coverage in the late 1980s that died because of lack of money.

Under the plan approved yesterday, uninsured residents who don't buy new, low-cost plans -- some subsidized by the state -- would face financial penalties beginning in July 2007. In the first year, those who don't buy insurance -- provided the state makes available one deemed affordable -- forfeit their personal state tax exemption, now worth about $150. In the second year, those who don't buy would have to pay a fine equal to half of the monthly premium cost of an affordable plan. For a full year, the fine could total about $1,200 for a young adult who would be eligible for an individual plan. There are no criminal penalties for not buying insurance.

In another provision that stirred unease among some businesses, the proposed law would require companies with 11 or more employees to provide health coverage or pay a per-employee annual fee of $295. In addition, employers whose uninsured workers make multiple use of emergency room care -- "free riders," in the bill's parlance -- would have to pay between 10% and 100% of the portion of those medical bills exceeding $50,000.

The bill would shift about $1 billion in government money -- mostly federal -- to several programs to provide low-cost insurance plans to the uninsured. One plan would increase eligibility for state Medicaid to more families; another would provide state subsidies for low-income families; another would create a big insurance pool that aims to make coverage more affordable for small businesses to give their employees the chance to buy health insurance with pretax dollars.

Lawmakers hope that requiring coverage will increase demand for such policies, which private insurers would then be eager to supply. They also hope that reducing reliance on expensive emergency room visits will lower health-care costs.

The bill would require residents to secure coverage by July 2007. Lawmakers said they expect the bill will lead to the coverage of 90% to 95% of uninsured residents by 2009. "This is really a landmark for our state," Gov. Romney said in an interview. "We can do what most people thought was impossible, which is to get health insurance for every citizen without a government takeover and without new taxes."

The bill passed unanimously in the Massachusetts Senate and 155-2 in the House. Although Democrats dominate both chambers, Gov. Romney, a Republican, has been a big advocate of most of the provisions at a time when he is widely believed to be considering running for U.S. president. A successful plan for health-care reform is likely to be a big feature of any run.

Analysts and even supporters acknowledged some potential pitfalls in the bill. First, the state has yet to define what is an "affordable" health-care plan. The bill requires only that individuals buy a plan if the state determines it to be affordable, presumably based on a reasonable percentage of income. The plan relies on private insurers to come up with such plans, and insurers could either fail to do so, or provide plans that aren't attractive or that don't provide much protection.

Alan Sager, a professor of health services at Boston University, said Massachusetts is "leaping into murky waters by obliging individuals to buy coverage." He said the legislation doesn't provide enough funding to solve the problem. "It seems the bill would force individuals to buy very flimsy or expensive policies beyond their financial reach," he said.

Dr. Sager said one recent study estimated that providing health-care coverage to the uninsured in Massachusetts would require an annual state subsidy of $700 million, which is about four times what is provided for in the current legislation.

He also said the legislation contains a Medicaid rate increase for the state's hospitals and doctors that will total $540 million over three years. "This is more money for business-as-usual health care," he said. "Legislators have to trumpet great accomplishments. They conceived an elephant 18 months ago, but have given birth to a mouse."

A spokesman for the Massachusetts Hospital Association said the rate increase comes after years of Medicaid "underpayment," during which the government insurer often paid less than the cost of the service provided.

Gov. Romney has 10 days to sign the bill into law, and though he has said he will do so, he can veto individual measures. He has said he opposes any new payroll taxes for the plan, but considers the penalties on businesses to be fees, not taxes. Yesterday, he said he would examine the $295 fee carefully.

The Massachusetts plan would create a more-than $1 billion-a-year program for the uninsured, though much of it would come from shifting around existing money. The state would kick in $125 million in new spending, mostly for subsidizing health-insurance plans for lower-income residents. The rest could come from existing programs, and the fees on businesses and individuals who don't meet the bill's requirements.

"The rest of the country is waiting for us," said Massachusetts Sen. Therese Murray, a Democrat from Plymouth, Mass., and chairwoman of the Senate Committee on Ways and Means, which hammered out the legislation. "We're going to be the first test case."

A Warm Farewell For A Cold Warrior (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

They laid Caspar Weinberger to rest yesterday beneath an old oak tree on an Arlington National Cemetery hilltop with a view of the Pentagon he once led.

Their faces emerged as if from the history books, or from yellowed newspaper photos: Margaret Thatcher, Jeane Kirkpatrick, Ed Meese, Frank Carlucci, John Poindexter, Jack Kemp, James Schlesinger and other Cold Warriors of the late 20th century.

DOJ_NMG_0025699

And though they were mourning Weinberger, the Reagan defense chief who died last week at age 88, they were also celebrating what they see as his -- and their -- signal triumph: the end of the Soviet Union. Judging from the wizened faces, white hair and walking canes, there will not be many more such reunions.

"His goal was an era of hope and peace, one in which the people of Eastern Europe lived free, one in which the Berlin Wall no longer divided families but instead existed only in memory, or its shards sold as souvenirs," eulogized Donald Rumsfeld, who both preceded and followed Weinberger as defense secretary. "Today we live in that world, a world made safer and freer by Cold Warriors like Cap Weinberger." The usually cool Rumsfeld choked up as he added: "May God bless the country he so loved and served so well."

Colin Powell, who as President Bush's secretary of state didn't agree with Rumsfeld often, concurred on the meaning of Weinberger. Ronald Reagan, Powell said in his eulogy, "needed a champion to rebuild the armed forces of the United States to show the Soviets and the world how strength can lead to peace, and that champion was Cap Weinberger."

Both men were, in a sense, remembering a simpler time, before the binary logic of mutually assured destruction gave way to the messy nuances of asymmetrical warfare. When Weinberger ruled the Pentagon, there was an easily defined enemy, and the free world held the United States in high esteem.

In their dueling eulogies (they cited some of the same anecdotes), Rumsfeld and Powell each saw in Weinberger a proponent of his own world view. Powell, recalling Weinberger's nickname "Cap the Knife" for his budget cutting, said he was also "Cap the Compassionate" in the Nixon administration, championing Head Start and health insurance. "Above all, he loved what [America] stood for and he loved what we represented to the rest of the world," Powell said. It had the sound of an implicit rebuke of Rumsfeld and Vice President Cheney, who was seated in the front row.

Rumsfeld preferred to remember the unyielding Weinberger. "For many years, a quote from Winston Churchill hung in Cap Weinberger's office," he said. "It said: Never give in -- never, never, never, never, in nothing great or small, large or petty, never give in." Rumsfeld left out the rest of Churchill's famous phrase: "except to convictions of honor and good sense."

The other eulogist, Sen. Olympia Snowe (R), representing Weinberger's adopted home state of Maine, also invoked the Cold War. In Maine, she said of California-native Weinberger, "you never get top billing unless you were actually born there, and even if you were pivotal in the downfall of the Soviet Union and the end of the Cold War."

With Rumsfeld participating, the Pentagon took over many of the arrangements for the funeral or, in military parlance, "Internment Service for FSECDEF Caspar Weinberger." Family members did not speak at the ceremony. And the military's tight control over attendance left the Arlington chapel, which holds 300, about a third empty.

Lady Thatcher, who did not speak because of illness, heard Powell describe her as Weinberger's Churchill. Powell, who was a military aide to Weinberger, recalled his boss's persnickety side ("He hated split infinitives . . . he even insisted we send back thank-you letters for thank-you letters"), his calm ("He loved to take naps, usually in the middle of meetings") and even his tolerance of a driver who picked him up drunk on Thanksgiving and wished him a "Happy Easter." The two words that sullied Weinberger's career -- "Iran-contra" -- got only an oblique mention by Powell, who spoke of "the one moment of his despair."

The military declined to share its guest list with reporters, but the list of pallbearers included some of the top officials from Reagan's presidency: Joint Chiefs chairman John Vessey, national security adviser William Clark, energy secretary John Herrington, deputy defense secretary Will Taft. Spotted in the crowd were Reagan's Navy secretary, John Lehman, publisher Steve Forbes and Reagan Pentagon officials Richard Perle and Fred Ikle.

There were relatively few with more recent government service: Powell deputy Richard Armitage, Joint Chiefs Chairman Peter Pace and three senators. This was, after all, not a time to think about today's problems -- none of the three eulogists even mentioned the word "terror" -- but to celebrate yesterday's victory.

"Today, some think back on the Cold War as if victory in that war was inevitable; that was not the case," Rumsfeld said. It was Weinberger, he said, who "helped restore pride in our country's uniform and helped win the Cold War."

Theme Park-Like Camp Built Near Haymarket (WP)

By Nikita Stewart

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

The Boy Scouts of America is planning to open a $17 million camp catering to Cub Scouts next month on the site near Haymarket where the Walt Disney Co. tried to build a theme park 12 years ago.

The camp will be built and operated by the National Capital Council, which represents more than 85,000 Scouts and 23,000 volunteers in the District and 16 counties in Maryland and Virginia. It is one of the most expensive scouting construction projects in the nation, officials said, and unusual because of its focus on Cub Scouts as well as Boy Scouts.

"We've never had a facility that's been able to connect with the Cub Scouts," said Alan F. Lambert, the council's Scout executive.

DOJ_NMG_0025700

Officials said the Scouts wanted a camp closer to Washington so that Cub Scouts, the organization's youngest members, could enjoy an overnight camping experience. The council's closest camp is in Goshen, Va., which is an inconvenient three-hour ride from Washington for 7- to 10-year-olds, who require more supervision and tend to get more homesick than older Scouts, Lambert said.

The scheduled opening of Camp William B. Snyder is May 6. Snyder, a former Geico chairman, is a longtime member of the area Scout council board and was instrumental in securing the land for the project.

The camp sprawls over 350 acres once designated for "Disney's America," a U.S. history theme park Disney scrapped in 1994 after protests from residents and preservationists about its proximity to the Manassas National Battlefield Park. Disney sold the site to the Boy Scouts for $1.5 million in 1997.

Camp Snyder will have touches of a theme park, from a 67-foot climbing wall to an aquatics center with water slides. Scout officials said, however, that they tried to preserve much of the site's natural state. The council created more than 100 acres of wetlands that are attracting birds and wildlife that the Scouts will explore.

"It's a positive part of the program to protect wildlife and eco-systems," Lambert said. "It's part of the camping experience."

The camp has themed areas such as the Big Dig, where Scouts can dig up replicas of dinosaur bones and assemble their own skeletons, and the Space Port, where they can explore a simulation of Mars, said Maj. Gen. Raymond Johns, chairman of program development at the camp.

"What a neat experience," he said.

From Memorial Day through Labor Day, the camp will serve about 1,000 Cub Scouts a week, said Johns. Boy Scouts can camp there on weekends throughout the year.

Johns and Lambert showed photos and drawings of the camp to the Prince William Board of County Supervisors yesterday. Other themed areas include a Native American village with tepees, a fort with a BB gun range and a ship surrounded by blue vulcanized rubber to suggest the ocean.

The adventures will not be the traditional rustic experience the public associates with scouting and camping, Lambert said. He showed a photo of the 600-seat dining hall, still under construction, that looked more like a McMansion. The modern facilities, including upgraded bathrooms and showers, were responses to parents, especially mothers, concerned about how younger children and adult volunteers would fare in the wild, Lambert said.

The Scouts will still sleep in tents, although they are much roomier, fitting six to eight Cub Scouts or four volunteers in each one, he said.

The camp's attractions and its $17 million price tag -- raised through private and corporate donations and general financing -- make it one of the biggest in the country compared with facilities used by the more than 300 councils, said Gregg Shields, national spokesman for the Boy Scouts of America in Irving, Tex. "I have not found another of a larger size in terms of investment," he said.

When Disney dropped its plans for a theme park, Snyder and Ron L. Carroll, who was Scout executive at the time, led the negotiations to buy the land, Lambert said. Carroll died last year.

Snyder, 76, who now lives in St. Petersburg, Fla., said he missed out on the Scout experience as a child because his local troop disbanded after its leader was drafted to serve in World War II. "My son was in the Scouts when he was growing up and I was a civilian leader," he said. "I think highly of the Scouts as a character-building organization."

Couric To Announce Her Move On 'Today' (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

Katie Couric plans to confirm this morning on "Today" that she is leaving the top-rated morning show after 15 years, and CBS will quickly announce, probably today, that she will take over the anchor chair once occupied by Walter Cronkite and Dan Rather.

Couric, 49, decided yesterday to use the occasion of her 15th anniversary, when the NBC program will be reflecting on her tenure, to look forward to the next chapter in her career, said sources at both networks and people familiar with her thinking.

The sources, who first confirmed Couric's plans Monday, had expected the CBS negotiations to drag on a bit longer, but said now the network has wrapped up the negotiations and wants to go public as soon as Couric does.

Bob Schieffer, the current CBS anchor, who had made clear that he did not want to keep the job indefinitely, said yesterday: "I hope it is true. I've known Katie for many years; she's a first-rate reporter and a terrific interviewer. I love Katie and I think she'll love CBS News."

The move by Couric, who will remain at "Today" until her NBC contract expires in May, will have repercussions throughout the broadcast schedule. NBC, which is determined to maintain its morning ratings lead, has offered her job to Meredith Vieira of

ABC's "The View" and the syndicated "Who Wants to Be a Millionaire," who is still weighing the opportunity against family concerns. CBS is making a multimillion-dollar bet that Couric, who would be the first solo female anchor of a weekday network newscast, can boost the third-place "CBS Evening News."

Couric, who attracted enormous publicity while weighing her options, is said by those who know her to be brimming with ideas about how to adapt the evening newscast to her skills and personality.

The "Today" retrospective at 7:30 this morning will feature video clips of Couric over the years, followed by her comments about her departure, and will have a less celebratory tone than otherwise would have been the case. Couric is close to NBC chief executive Jeff Zucker, her original producer on "Today," the sources said, and has been trying to manage her departure without hurting relationships with him and other longtime colleagues at NBC.

Yes, It's Anti-Semitic (WP)

By Eliot A. Cohen

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

Academic papers posted on a Harvard Web site don't normally attract enthusiastic praise from prominent white supremacists. But John Mearsheimer and Stephen Walt's "The Israel Lobby and U.S. Foreign Policy" has won David Duke's endorsement as "a modern Declaration of American Independence" and a vindication of the ex-Klansman's earlier work, presumably including his pathbreaking book, "Jewish Supremacism."

Walt and Mearsheimer contend that American national security dictates distancing ourselves from the state of Israel; that U.S. support for Israel has led to such disasters as America's status as the No. 1 target for Islamic terrorists; and that such an otherwise inexplicable departure from good sense can be accounted for only by the power of "The Lobby" (their capitalization), an overwhelmingly Jewish force abetted by some Christian evangelicals and a gentile neocon collaborator or two, who have hijacked American foreign policy and controlled it for decades.

One of Mearsheimer's University of Chicago colleagues has characterized this as "piss-poor, monocausal social science." It is indeed a wretched piece of scholarship. Israeli citizenship rests "on the principle of blood kinship," it says, and yet the country has a million non-Jewish citizens who vote. Osama bin Laden's grievance with the United States begins with Israel, it says -- but in fact his 1998 fatwa declaring war against this country began by denouncing the U.S. presence in Saudi Arabia and the suffering of the people of Iraq. "Other ethnic lobbies can only dream of having the political muscle" The Lobby has -- news to anyone advocating lifting the embargo on Fidel Castro's Cuba. The Iraq war stemmed from The Lobby's conception of Israel's interest -- yet, oddly, the war attracted the support of anti-Israel intellectuals such as Christopher Hitchens and mainstream publications such as The Economist. America's anti-Iran policy reflects the dictates of The Lobby -- but how to explain Europe's equally strong opposition to Iranian nuclear ambitions?

Oddly, these international relations realists -- who in their more normal academic lives declare that state interests determine policy, and domestic politics matters little -- have discovered the one case in which domestic politics has, for decades, determined the policy of the world's greatest state. Their theories proclaim the importance of power, not ideals, yet they abhor the thought of allying with the strongest military and most vibrant economy in the Middle East. Reporting persecution, they have declared that they could not publish their work in the United States, but they have neglected to name the academic journals that turned them down.

Inept, even kooky academic work, then, but is it anti-Semitic? If by anti-Semitism one means obsessive and irrationally hostile beliefs about Jews; if one accuses them of disloyalty, subversion or treachery, of having occult powers and of participating in secret combinations that manipulate institutions and governments; if one systematically selects everything unfair, ugly or wrong about Jews as individuals or a group and equally systematically suppresses any exculpatory information -- why, yes, this paper is anti-Semitic.

Mearsheimer and Walt conceive of The Lobby as a conspiracy between the Washington Times and the New York Times, the Democratic-leaning Brookings Institution and Republican-leaning American Enterprise Institute, architects of the Oslo accords and their most vigorous opponents. In this world Douglas Feith manipulates Don Rumsfeld, and Dick Cheney takes orders from Richard Perle. They dwell on public figures with Jewish names and take repeated shots at conservative Christians (acceptable subjects for prejudice in intellectual circles), but they never ask why a Sen. John McCain today or, in earlier years, a rough-hewn labor leader such as George Meany declared themselves friends of Israel.

The authors dismiss or ignore past Arab threats to exterminate Israel, as well as the sewer of anti-Semitic literature that pollutes public discourse in the Arab world today. The most recent calls by Iran's fanatical -- and nuclear weapons-hungry -- president for Israel to be "wiped off the map" they brush aside as insignificant. There is nothing here about the millions of dollars that Saudi Arabia has poured into lobbying and academic institutions, or the wealth of Islamic studies programs on American campuses, though they note with suspicion some 130 Jewish studies programs on those campuses. West Bank settlements get attention; terrorist butchery of civilians on buses or in shopping malls does not. To dispute their view of Israel is not to differ about policy but to act as a foreign agent.

If this sounds personal, it is, although I am only a footnote target for Mearsheimer and Walt. I am a public intellectual and a proud Jew; sympathetic to Israel and extensively engaged in our nation's military affairs; vaguely conservative and occasionally hawkish. In a week my family will celebrate Passover with my oldest son -- the third generation to serve as an officer in the United States Army. He will be home on leave from the bomb-strewn streets of Baghdad. The patch on his shoulder is the same flag that flies on my porch.

Other supposed members of "The Lobby" also have children in military service. Impugning their patriotism or mine is not scholarship or policy advocacy. It is merely, and unforgivably, bigotry.

Iran: Ready To Negotiate On Enrichment (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini

AP, April 4, 2006

Iran said Tuesday it is willing to negotiate with world powers on large-scale enrichment of uranium but will never give way on their key demand — to cease all enrichment, a process that can produce fuel for nuclear reactors or material for bombs.

The U.N. Security Council has demanded that Iran suspend all uranium enrichment activities and asked the U.N. nuclear watchdog agency to report back by April 28 on whether Iran had complied.

Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki reiterated that Iran would not comply with the Security Council demand, saying the small-scale enrichment it resumed in February was strictly for research and was within its rights.

The United States and France have accused Iran of pursuing a secret program to build atomic weapons, but Tehran claims its nuclear program is peaceful and aimed only at generating electricity. Enrichment makes uranium suitable for reactor use but, taken to a high degree, it becomes suitable for a nuclear bomb.

"The enrichment of uranium ... is Iran's right as defined as a signatory to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty," Mottaki said. "One thing we can't give up and that is the right of the Iranian nation ... We can't hold a dialogue with any country about giving up our rights."

He added, however, that Iran was prepared to talk to the international community about large-scale enrichment.

Mottaki did not specify with whom Iran wants to hold negotiations. The United States is facing calls from its European allies for it to enter direct talks with Iran to resolve the standoff.

German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier underlined his country's support for U.S.-Iran nuclear talks ahead of a meeting in Washington with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

"I think it is recognized here in Washington that the British and the German foreign ministers are positive on this question," he told reporters Tuesday.

State Department spokesman Adam Ereli said Monday the cause of the standoff was "not because the United States isn't in negotiations" but because Iran was defying international pressure and "moving with apparently great determination to develop an enrichment capability."

"So don't suggest that the way to solve this is for the U.S. to jump into negotiations. The way to resolve it is to get Iran to cease and desist from its active refusal to be a responsible member of the international community," Ereli said.

Iran and the United States have agreed to hold rare direct, high-level talks to discuss how to stabilize Iraq. While both sides have insisted the talks won't touch on the nuclear issue, U.S. officials say they suspect Tehran is looking to open the door for nuclear talks.

Since the U.N. Security Council issued its demand last week, Iran has taken a stance of rejection — while playing up hopes for a negotiated solution.

Mottaki said Iran's nuclear program had two options: cooperation or confrontation. "Iran prefers the first option," he said.

On Monday, hard-line Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said the United States and Europe were "confused" if they thought they could stop Iran's nuclear ambitions. But he vowed Iran's nuclear program would be "transparent" and under the supervision of the International Atomic Energy Agency.

Past negotiations have faltered over the enrichment issue. Britain, France and Germany negotiated with Iran for two years on behalf of the European Union, endeavoring to persuade Tehran to abandon enrichment. Iran gave up on the negotiations last August and resumed parts of its nuclear program that it had suspended as a goodwill gesture.

Moscow then tried to persuade Tehran to accept a U.S.-backed compromise proposal under which large-scale uranium enrichment for Iran's nuclear program would take place in Russia. But negotiations ended in a stalemate after Tehran rejected a Russian demand to suspend uranium enrichment activities at home.

Democrat: Intelligence On Iran Inadequate (AP)

By Katherine Shrader

AP, April 4, 2006

U.S. intelligence information on Iran is inadequate and may contain misinformation that spy agencies are accepting as solid, the top Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee said Tuesday.

Rep. Jane Harman (news, bio, voting record), D-Calif., told a Council on Foreign Relations gathering that she and other lawmakers recently received a briefing from intelligence agencies based on information shared with the International Atomic Energy Agency and the U.N. Security Council.

Her bottom line: "I remain skeptical — lots of unanswered questions."

"The conjecture that I have is that if I were Iran, and I wanted to put out disinformation, it might look a lot like what our government is claiming is information," she said. "I can't tell you that's true, but I can't tell you it's not true."

Harman didn't provide details on the classified session.

With tensions growing between the U.S. and Iran over its nuclear program, Tehran in the past week has touted new weapons including missiles supposedly invisible to radar and torpedoes too fast to be avoided. Experts have questioned Iran's claims about the weapons' capabilities.

The announcements came as the Bush administration was working toward a diplomatic solution to address its belief that Iran intends to produce nuclear weapons. Iran says it aims only to generate electricity, but it has thus far defied U.N. Security Council demands that it give up key parts of its program.

Last week, the Security Council unanimously approved a statement demanding that Iran suspend uranium enrichment.

When asked about Iran's recent weapons announcements Tuesday, White House spokesman Scott McClellan said Iran's "aggressive military program and defiant rhetoric are further examples of how the regime is isolating itself." But he stressed the administration hopes to work toward a diplomatic solution.

McClellan said the United States has a number of concerns about Iran's behavior, including its efforts to conceal its nuclear activities, support of terrorism, use of threatening rhetoric and disregard for the demands of the international community.

Harman said she does not doubt that Iran is a threat. "The issue is how capable are they and what are the real intentions of Iran's leaders, and I think the jury is out on both of those," Harman said.

In recent months, she and others on Capitol Hill have been seeking information about how to deal with Iran. Bruises in Congress and elsewhere in the government remain fresh on the botched prewar intelligence on Iraq's never-to-be-found weapons of mass destruction.

"I want to be absolutely sure that we base decisions — especially tough decisions like what are the next steps with Iran, and I surely hope they are diplomatic because I think those are our best options — on pristine and pure intelligence or the closest we can get to that," Harman said.

She was echoing the words of former U.S. weapons inspector David Kay, who was in charge of the hunt for Iraq's arsenal until he quit his position in January 2004. Then, he said that "pristine intelligence, good accurate intelligence" was fundamental to a pre-emptive military policy, which the Bush administration adopted after Sept. 11, 2001.

Harman spoke alongside former acting CIA Director John McLaughlin, a veteran intelligence analyst who was the agency's No. 2 official in the run-up to the Iraq war. He politely quibbled with the use of the phrase "pristine intelligence."

"It's important, I think, to realize that intelligence isn't going to be pristine and pure," McLaughlin said.

He said intelligence is often incomplete and at some point policy decisions must be made. "We are getting a little caught in the idea that intelligence has the answer to everything," he said.

Iran Says It Can Handle Any Invasion (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini

AP, April 4, 2006

A top Iranian military official said Tuesday the country can now defend itself against any invasion originating from outside the region — a clear reference to the United States — as it tested a second new radar-avoiding missile.

The new surface-to-sea missile is equipped with remote-control and searching systems, state-run television reported. It said the new missile, called Kowsar after the name of a river in paradise, was a medium-range weapon that Iran had the capability to mass-produce.

It also asserted that the Kowsar's guidance system could not be scrambled, and it had been designed to sink ships.

Shortly after the test, the chief of the elite Revolutionary Guards, Gen. Yahya Rahim Safavi, warned that Iran was now able to "confront any extra-regional invasion," referring to the United States without mentioning it by name.

DOJ_NMG_0025704

"The missile command of the Guards' naval force ... via positioning various types of surface-to-sea missiles, is able, while defending the coastlines and islands, to confront any extra-territorial invasion," the official Islamic Republic News Agency quoted Safavi as saying.

Safavi also called for foreign forces to leave the region. The U.S. 5th Fleet is based in Bahrain, from where it patrols the Gulf.

"Iran wants durable peace in the Persian Gulf and it can't be achieved without foreign forces and those which invaded Iraq leaving (the region)," IRNA quoted Safavi as saying.

On Friday, the country tested the Fajr-3, a missile that it said can avoid radars and hit several targets simultaneously using multiple warheads. Iran also has tested what it calls two new torpedoes.

The second torpedo, unveiled Monday, was tested in the Straits of Hormuz, the narrow entrance to the Gulf that is a vital corridor for oil supplies. That seemed to be a clear warning to the United States that Iran believes it has the capability to disable oil tankers moving through the Gulf.

The Revolutionary Guards, the elite branch of Iran's military, have been holding their maneuvers — code-named the "Great Prophet" — since Friday, touting what they call domestically built technological advances in their armed forces.

But some military analysts in Moscow said it appears the high-speed torpedoes likely were Russian-built weapons that may have been acquired from China or the former Soviet republic of Kyrgyzstan.

Others have questioned just how radar-evading the missiles are. Iran's radars are not as advanced as those of Israel, for example — meaning that perhaps the new weapons can avoid Iran's radar but not more advanced types.

The United States said Monday — after the second torpedo test — that while Iran may have made "some strides" in its military, it likely is exaggerating its capabilities.

"We know that the Iranians are always trying to improve their weapons system by both foreign and indigenous measures," Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said in Washington. "It's possible that they are increasing their capability and making strides in radar-absorbing materials and technology."

But "the Iranians have also been known to boast and exaggerate their statements about greater technical and tactical capabilities," he said.

It has not been possible to verify Iran's claims for the new armaments. But the country has made clear it aims to send a message of strength to the United States amid heightened tensions over its nuclear program.

The U.N. Security Council has demanded Iran give up uranium enrichment, a crucial part of the nuclear process. Washington is pressing for sanctions if Tehran continues its refusal to do so, though U.S. officials have not ruled out military action as an eventual option, insisting they will not allow Iran to gain a nuclear arsenal.

In Russia, a Kremlin-allied lawmaker on Tuesday criticized the recent torpedo and missile tests as a counterproductive show of might at a time when it should be trying to allay fears that it is trying to build a nuclear weapon.

"It is clear that Iran is demonstrating its muscle in order to forestall any discussions of a possible operation using force against Iran," Konstantin Kosachev, the head of the parliamentary foreign affairs committee, was quoted as saying according to the RIA Novosti news agency.

On Tuesday, state-run television also said the elite Revolutionary Guards had tested what it called a "super-modern flying boat" capable of evading radar. TV showed a brief clip of the boat's launch.

"Due to its advanced design, no radar at sea or in the air can detect it. It can lift out of the water," the television said. It said the boat was "all Iranian-made and can launch missiles with precise targeting while moving."

The television showed the boat, looking like an aircraft, taking off from the sea and flying low over the surface of the water. It said the craft can fly with a speed of 100 nautical miles per hour.

Iran said the torpedo tests were conducted Sunday and Monday. The torpedo — called a "Hoot," or "whale" — is able to move at 223 mph, too fast for any enemy ship to elude.

Iran has routinely held war games over the past two decades to improve its combat readiness and test locally made equipment such as missiles, tanks and armored personnel carriers.

Iran launched an arms development program during its 1980-88 war with Iraq to compensate for a U.S. weapons embargo. Since 1992, Iran has produced its own tanks, armored personnel carriers, missiles and a fighter plane.

Some Say Iran's Weapons Come From Russia (AP)

By Lee Keath

AP, April 4, 2006

Iran has unveiled with great fanfare a series of what it portrays as sophisticated, homegrown weapons — flying boats and missiles invisible to radar, torpedoes too fast to elude.

DOJ_NMG_0025705

But experts said Tuesday it appears much of the technology came from Russia and questioned Iran's claims about the weapons' capabilities.

Still, the armaments, tested during war games by some 17,000 Revolutionary Guards in the Persian Gulf, send what may be Iran's real message: its increased ability to hit oil tankers if tension with America turns to outright confrontation.

To underline that message, the maneuvers — code-named "The Great Prophet" — have been held since Friday around the Strait of Hormuz, the 34-mile-wide entrance to the Gulf through which about two-fifths of the world's oil supplies pass.

Throughout the war games, Iran has touted what it calls technological leaps in its weapons production. In recent years, Iran revved up its arms programs after long relying on purchases abroad to keep up its aging arsenal, hampered by U.S. sanctions and Washington's pressure on other countries against selling weapons to Tehran.

The head of the Revolutionary Guards, Gen. Yahya Rahim Safavi, proclaimed Tuesday that Iran was now able to defend itself against "any extra-regional invasion."

It was a clear reference to Iranian worries of potential U.S. military action to stop its nuclear program, which Washington claims is intended to produce nuclear weapons. Iran says it aims only to generate electricity, but has so far defied U.N. Security Council demands that it give up key parts of its program.

The new weapons, many of them shown on Iranian state TV during their tests, have come with impressive claims:

· A missile, the Fajr-3, that is invisible to radar and able to strike several targets with multiple warheads.

· A high-speed torpedo, the Hoot, able to move at some 223 mph, up to four times faster than a normal torpedo, and fired by ships cloaked to radar.

· A surface-to-sea missile, the Kowsar, with remote-control and searching systems that cannot be scrambled.

· A "super-modern flying boat," undetectable by radar and able to launch missiles with precise targeting while skimming low over the surface of the water at a top speed of 100 nautical mph.

There are questions over Iran's claims. In Washington, Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said "the Iranians have been known to boast and exaggerate" their weapons capabilities.

And some experts cast doubt on just how radar-evading Iran's ships and missiles are.

Iran's radars are not as advanced as those of Israel, for example — meaning that perhaps the weapons can avoid the radar that Iran has access to, but not more advanced types, said Meir Javedanfar, an Iranian-born, Israel-based analyst.

"The question here is, what radar did they test their own weapons against? If it's the radar they've been using for all these years, then that's not saying 100 percent that these things are undetectable," he said.

Others questioned if Iran developed the weapons on its own.

The Hoot torpedo — the name means "whale" — closely resembles the Russian-made VA-111 Shkval, the world's fastest known underwater missile, developed in 1995, said Ruslan Pukhov of Moscow's Center for Analysis of Strategies and Technologies.

The Shkval attains high speeds by coating itself in a cocoon of air bubbles, reducing friction, and Pukhov said its technology was too sophisticated for the Iranians to produce themselves.

"Hypothetically, they could get access to the Shkval technology, but if so, I don't think they got it through Russian channels," he said.

Pukhov noted the former Soviet republic of Kyrgyzstan once had a Soviet torpedo testing center on the remote mountain lake of Issyk-Kul. And he said that in the turmoil that followed the Soviet breakup, Kyrgyz authorities sold Shkvals to the Chinese, a major importer of Iranian oil.

Kanybek Tabaldiyev, a senior official with a Kyrgyz company that makes torpedo and other military hardware at Issyk-Kul, denied his company transferred sophisticated technology to Iran. He said it was possible weaponry had been acquired through other means.

Chinese officials had no immediate comment on whether their country provided Iran with Shkvals.

China has been pursuing closer relations with Tehran in hopes of help in meeting its energy needs, and the United States has sanctioned Chinese companies in the past, accusing them of violating international controls on transfers of weapons technology to Iran. Beijing has protested the U.S. sanctions and in 2003, it issued its first regulations controlling exports of missile, nuclear and biological weapons technology.

Whatever the Iranian armaments' capabilities — or origins — they likely won't greatly affect the military balance of power in the Gulf, where the U.S. Navy's 5th Fleet is based, operating out of the island nation of Bahrain.

For example, the Hoot torpedo — if indeed based on the Shkval — has too short a range, about 7,500 yards, to be militarily significant, said Pavel Felgenhauer, a Russian analyst.

But Iran may be aiming to show the world, and its people, that it has options if the standoff over its nuclear program escalates. That could boost its hand in negotiations with the United States and Europe.

DOJ_NMG_0025706

"They know they are inferior to the U.S. Navy in the Persian Gulf, so this is their way of telling Americans .... we are not the only ones who would lose out if talks regarding the nuclear program fail," Javedanfar said.

The torpedo tests in particular are significant, he said.

"They know that if you sink one tanker in the Strait of Hormuz you can stop all shipping there, because the waters are quite shallow," he said.

Israelis Target Base In Abbas' Compound (AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak

AP, April 4, 2006

Israeli warplanes fired three missiles into the Gaza compound of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas on Tuesday in response to Palestinian rocket fire — the first such Israeli attack since the violent Islamic group Hamas took power last week.

Abbas condemned the attack, saying it had nothing to do with Hamas and was aimed at disrupting the daily lives of Palestinians.

The site was largely abandoned, and the army gave no explanation for hitting the security compound of the moderate leader, who was in the West Bank at the time. The missile strikes dug deep craters and wounded two police officers.

Since Hamas took control of the Cabinet, Israeli officials said they would shun the Palestinian Authority but would continue to work with Abbas, leader of the defeated Fatah Party. The attack Tuesday did not appear aimed at the Palestinian president, either directly or indirectly.

Israeli security officials have said Israel needs to send clear messages to Hamas that it must halt attacks, and Israel pledged to intensify its military strikes after Gaza militants fired a Katyusha rocket at Israel last week.

Abbas denounced the airstrike and called for international intervention to stop what he called Israel's "destruction for the sake of destruction." He said he contacted "the U.N., Russia, the EU and Arab states and told them that these actions complicate daily life and affect our human and social status."

Asked about the possibility Israel targeted a Palestinian security force that is under the authority of Hamas, Abbas replied that who is in charge of the various forces is none of Israel's business. "It is internal business," he said, adding Israel "doesn't have the right to interfere."

Abbas controls some of the armed units, and the rest are in the purview of the new interior minister, Said Siyam of Hamas.

Israel and Hamas are sworn enemies. Israel, along with the U.S. and European Union, labels Hamas a terror group for sending dozens of suicide bombers into Israel. Hamas does not accept the presence of a Jewish state in the Middle East.

While Hamas does not appear to be directly responsible for the rocket attacks on Israel, its leaders have said militants who attack Israel will not be arrested. And Hamas called last week's deadly suicide bombing at a West Bank settlement legitimate resistance to Israeli occupation.

Israeli tanks also shelled the northern Gaza Strip on Tuesday, killing one Palestinian and wounding seven, including a woman and her 6-month-old baby, Palestinian security and rescue officials said.

The Israeli army said it fired shells at empty fields in northern Gaza to deter militants from launching homemade rockets into Israel. Earlier Tuesday, militants set off several rockets, causing no injuries. Such barrages take place almost daily.

The Israeli missile attack in Gaza City came shortly after a Chinese envoy met Palestinian Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar, becoming the first foreign diplomat to do so since the Hamas government was sworn in.

Zahar, a Hamas leader, said he plans to visit China next month and was told a Palestinian delegation would be welcomed. It would be his first trip abroad since taking office.

"The Chinese told us that they are ready to receive a Palestinian delegation at any time," Zahar said. The Chinese diplomat, Yang Wei Guo, did not comment on Zahar's planned visit. Israel has been working to isolate the Hamas-led government, discouraging nations from hosting its officials.

Israel's largest bank said Tuesday it was severing ties with Palestinian banks. Bank Hapoalim said it made the decision after a legal review and "especially in light of the circumstances created" by the Hamas takeover.

Also Tuesday, Israel's new governing coalition started taking shape when the moderate Labor Party said it would join Kadima, led by acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert. A Kadima-Labor coalition would be committed to Olmert's plan to set Israel's borders by 2010, withdrawing from large parts of the West Bank.

Final results from last week's Israeli election gave Kadima 29 seats and Labor 19 in the 120-seat Israeli parliament, requiring them to bring in additional parties to secure a majority. Coalition talks are expected to take weeks.

Olmert was named acting premier Jan. 4, when Prime Minister Ariel Sharon was felled by a stroke. Sharon, who remains in a coma, was to undergo surgery Tuesday to restore part of his skull, removed during surgery to stop bleeding from the stroke. Doctors postponed the operation because Sharon had a respiratory infection, the hospital said.

DOJ_NMG_0025707

The surgery is seen as a step toward moving the 78-year-old Sharon to a long-term care facility. He is not expected to recover.

Hamas FM Says Will Visit China (AFP-Y2)

AFP, April 4, 2006

Palestinian foreign minister Mahmud al-Zahar announced plans to visit China as Beijing became the latest power to reach out to Islamists Hamas despite a Western boycott.

"We are going to visit China and we have let the ambassador know," Zahar, a a Hamas hawk and firebrand, told reporters after meeting the Chinese envoy to the Palestinian territories, Yang Weiguo (eds: correct).

"We are going to go to east Asia, probably in late May, to attend an international conference. During the same month we are going to tour countries in east Asia, starting with China," he added providing no further details.

A visit to Beijing would make China the second UN Security Council member after Russia to host the radical Islamist faction since the organisation won a shock Palestinian election victory last January.

Israel immediately criticised any foreign power who may be tempted to invite the Hamas leadership for talks before the movement, blacklisted as a terrorist organisation in the West, reforms its ways.

"Anyone who recognises the Hamas government without this movement bending to the demands of the international community in recognising Israel, renouncing terrorism and accepting agreements, helps to maintain its extremist positions," said foreign ministry spokesman Mark Regev.

"If Hamas can get recognition without changing its positions, there is no chance it will become more moderate," he added.

The armed wing of the radical Islamist movement has carried out scores of suicide bombings in Israel. Its charter calls for the destruction of the Jewish state and cites armed struggle as the key to solving the Middle East conflict.

There was no immediate Chinese confirmation of a formal invitation to Zahar, but Beijing has already signalled its readiness to develop its close ties with the Palestinians.

"We are willing to maintain and develop our friendly relations with Palestine... We will earnestly consider future Palestinian requests for assistance," Chinese Foreign Minister Li Zhaoxing said last month.

The Chinese, who only forged diplomatic relations with Israel in 1992, have traditionally been seen as pro-Palestinian. Palestinian Authority president Mahmud Abbas travelled to Beijing in May 2005.

In the coming days, Zahar is to make his first foreign tour since he was sworn in as minister, with a visit to Arab countries, beginning with Egypt, where he will explain the new government's positions, his office said.

Hamas has also received invitations to South Africa and Malaysia although no dates have been set.

The Islamic group's cold-shouldering by the West however has continued with Canada, the Netherlands and the United States all saying they will have no contact with Hamas until it gives up the right to armed struggle and recognises Israel.

The so-called Middle East quartet, the European Union, Russia, the United Nations and the United States, has also collectively warned of dire consequences for Palestinian funding unless Hamas modifies its hardline stance.

Zahar has sought to minimise the loss of Western aid despite the financial crisis facing the cash-strapped Palestinian Authority, saying that Hamas will instead look for funds elsewhere from Arab and Islamic countries.

A visit by Hamas officials to Moscow last month at the invitation of Russian President Vladimir Putin incited Israeli anger and US reservations.

At the time, Hamas described its visit to Russia as a "breakthrough" that they hoped would help the group establish international legitimacy.

Rice To Lay Out U.S.-India Nuclear Deal Before Some Skeptical Lawmakers (WP)

By Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

When President Bush announced a new phase in U.S.-India relations last month in New Delhi, he was not the only foreign visitor to attract attention. A day after his arrival, two Iranian naval ships, carrying several hundred sailors, docked at the Indian port of Kochi to begin five days of joint exercises, part of an extensive agreement Tehran and New Delhi signed in 2003.

The port call -- and the broader issue of India's military, scientific and economic ties with Iran -- have raised apprehension on Capitol Hill, where members are weighing an effort by the Bush administration to form its own strategic partnership with New Delhi.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will address those concerns and others when she testifies today before the House and Senate foreign relations panels on details of the unfinished agreement, in which the United States would provide India with civilian nuclear technology.

She faces pressure from Republican and Democratic lawmakers, some of whom are pushing for changes to the deal out of concern about nuclear proliferation. In a letter yesterday, a bipartisan group of nuclear experts urged lawmakers not to authorize technology transfers until India stops producing nuclear weapons material, as the United States, Britain, France, Russia, and China are believed to have done.

In response, some administration officials said Rice could announce a new push for an international treaty to end production of all fissile material. Negotiations have been at a standstill since the administration announced two years ago that it could not support the kind of accord that had been on the table.

Last July, Bush agreed to give India access, for the first time, to civilian nuclear assistance, breaking with decades of U.S. policy that kept sensitive nuclear technologies from countries that have not signed the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

For the Bush administration, the break was seen as a worthy tradeoff in pursuit of a strategy to accelerate India's rise as a regional counterweight to China. But the agreement would also give India the ability to increase its nuclear arsenal. The terms took Congress by surprise, and lawmakers asked India to separate its civilian and military programs to guarantee that no U.S. technology would be used for weapons.

Last month, Bush and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh agreed on a separation plan, but Congress has not yet seen it.

Administration officials say the deal addresses nonproliferation concerns because India has agreed to open some facilities to U.N. nuclear inspections. Perhaps more important, they say, is that the world's largest democracy does not pose a nonproliferation threat.

"India has an excellent nonproliferation record," Rice said last month in promoting the deal. India is not tainted by the kind of nuclear black-market scandal that Pakistan suffered when a senior government official was caught selling nuclear components to Iran, Libya and North Korea.

But the Bush administration's actions suggest it does not see India's record as blemish-free.

The administration has imposed sanctions on two Indian companies accused of supplying Iran's nuclear program. Both companies have protested the sanctions but remain on a list in the Federal Registry. In September, two Indian nuclear scientists were also accused of providing Tehran with technology that could contribute to "the development of weapons of mass destruction." The order against one was later rescinded, but the second remains banned from travel to the United States.

India's support for Iran in diplomatic forums has also caused concern. Last September, after the U.S.-India deal was announced, Rep. Tom Lantos (D-Calif.) -- a strong supporter of India -- criticized Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns during a hearing when Burns said it was unclear whether India would support U.S. efforts to pressure Iran. Lantos urged India to do so to win broader support in Congress.

"We listened carefully to Lantos and his colleagues on the Hill and told the Indians that they had to be supportive of our efforts to isolate Iran, and they did so two weeks later," Burns said in an interview.

Lantos said yesterday: "I have every intention of voting for this deal. But my support is very much contingent upon the Iran-India relationship, and I have served notice that, given the nature of the current regime in Tehran, a proper policy vis-a-vis Iran is the sine qua non of my support." Lantos said he did not see how India could have equal ties to Iran and the United States, and said he registered his displeasure over the naval visit last week with India.

State Department spokesman J. Adam Ereli said Washington regretted the timing of the Iranian port call, but added: "Indian-Iranian relations are not of the scope and breadth and depth to call into question the principles that underline our agreement."

It is unclear when Congress will consider the changes to the law needed to complete the India deal. The administration wants Congress to act before summer, but some in Congress say the complex matter will probably not be taken up until after the November elections.

India Nuclear Deal Spurs Lobbying Pro And Con (RC)

By Kate Ackley

Roll Call, April 5, 2006

If Daryl Kimball has it his way, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will have a bumpy ride today during her back-to-back appearances before Senate and House committees.

Rice — the sole witness at a morning Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing and then at the House International Relations Committee in the afternoon — must sell Congress on the Bush administration's agreement to enter into a far-reaching deal with India that will help that country expand its civilian nuclear power program.

Kimball, executive director of the Arms Control Association, opposes the deal and has spent the days leading up to Rice's testimony trying to make sure Members ask her the toughest of questions.

"We want them to ask her what the potential impact of this will be on the 45-nation Nuclear Suppliers Group," he said, referring to an entity created in the mid-1970s after India conducted nuclear tests. Back then, he said, "India used peaceful nuclear assistance to develop its first nuclear bomb test."

Kimball isn't the only lobbyist gearing up for a potentially long and bruising fight over the India deal. With Rice ready to testify this week, lobbyists for India, for organizations that represent Indian Americans and for business groups that support the deal have all stepped up their efforts.

Sanjay Puri, chairman of the U.S. India political action committee, said in recent days that his group has escalated its push in support of the deal. President Bush has come to Congress because he needs its approval to waive certain requirements of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954. Sen. Dick Lugar (R-Ind.) and Rep. Henry Hyde (R-Ill.) have introduced legislation to do just that.

"A lot of work is going on behind the scenes to explain the background on the deal, the fine print and how it is beneficial to America," said Puri, who added that his group and its activists planned to attend an event on Thursday on Capitol Hill to build momentum after Rice's testimony.

"We have about 30,000 members around the country, and obviously we've reached out to all our people who are active in every state and have strongly urged them to reach out to Members of Congress and Senators," he said.

Tita Thompson, a spokeswoman for the Business Roundtable, said on Tuesday that her group was putting the finishing touches on a letter that would be delivered to every Member's office today, urging them to support the administration's deal with India. She said that the letter will explain that the business group believes the deal will promote closer economic, foreign policy and security relations between the United States and India.

The all-Republican lobbying firm Barbour Griffith & Rogers and the law and lobbying firm Venable represent the embassy of India. Barbour Griffith's Robert Blackwill, the former U.S. ambassador to India, is the lead lobbyist on the account; neither he nor his colleagues could be reached for comment. Barbour Griffith's contract, according to public records, amounts to $700,000 a year, while Venable makes at least $50,000 a month.

Rice will have her own legislative affairs specialist in tow, too. Jeffrey Bergner, a longtime private-sector lobbyist who owned his own firm before joining the administration, now serves as the State Department's assistant secretary for legislative affairs. Bergner did not return a call seeking comment, but his office confirmed that he was slated to accompany Rice today.

Venable's James Jatras said the embassy's case for the agreement is strong and straightforward, holding "strategic benefit for the U.S. and for global non-proliferation."

Currently, Jatras said, about 19 percent of India's nuclear capacity is under inspection. After the agreement, more than two-thirds would be under inspection, he said. "It's ironic that much of the criticism comes from non-proliferation [activists], when it actually greatly strengthens" outside scrutiny of India's nuclear assets, he said.

Jatras, a former foreign policy analyst for the Republican Study Committee, said that even though his client is the Indian government, he is touting the benefits of the agreement for the United States as well.

India, he said, has a growing economy that American businesses could tap into further if relations between the two countries were to warm even more. He also said that in order for the Indian economy to continue to grow, the country needs more energy. Jatras called India "poorly endowed" when it comes to natural resources such as oil.

But Kimball said that his arms control group's message is that contrary to what the deal's supporters say, "this is not a 'win' but a loss from a non-proliferation perspective. The adverse implications have been overlooked."

"We've also been arguing and pointing out that the U.S.-Indian relationship is already a good one, and this flawed nuclear proposal should not be the basis of future relations," Kimball added.

Kimball said his group is part of a loose network of organizations that includes the Friends Committee on National Legislation, the Union of Concerned Scientists and Peace Action. Today's hearings, he said, "are in many ways the second or third round in a long, drawn-out debate."

Rep. Ed Markey (D-Mass.) has introduced a Congressional resolution that expresses concerns about the deal. Markey could not be reached for comment.

Reps. Joe Wilson (R-S.C.) and Joe Crowley (D-N.Y.), the former co-chairmen of the House India Caucus, have taken a leading role in pushing the measure.

Wilson said Rice's appearances today will offer a big boost to the deal. The benefit to America, he said, is that nuclear power for India would reduce the competition for fossil fuel resources such as oil.

Crowley, who visited India the week before Bush traveled there, has been asked by the president to help move the effort forward. He echoed Wilson's fossil fuel argument and added that the agreement could help counteract the greenhouse effect, which most scientists believe leads to global warming.

As for the deal's prospects in Congress, Crowley said, "My sense is that it will go through."

Jatras of Venable said he hopes a bill on this can be reported out by May, if not April.

But Andy Fisher, a spokesman for Lugar, said there was no timeline and added that the Senate committee is prepared to work on this "over the coming weeks and months."

"We are going to have the hearing with Secretary Rice, and an additional hearing or hearings, if necessary, to get views on all sides of the proposal," Fisher said. "Certainly the committee members will want to walk around this a good bit to get a full understanding of all the ramifications for the United States."

Indian Nuke Deal's Fate Could Be Linked To Iran Sanctions Bill (HILL)

By David Mikhail

The Hill, April 5, 2006

A potential standoff involving dueling Iran sanctions bills could determine the fate of a civilian nuclear-cooperation deal with India — a deal that is a high priority for President Bush.

The White House is in the politically awkward position of asking Congress to ratify the high-profile nuclear deal with India while fending off Iran-related legislation that could threaten the U.S.-India pact.

Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-Fla.) and Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) have introduced bills that seek to cut off funds from Iran that could be applied toward attaining or creating nuclear weapons, enhancing provisions of the Iran and Libya Sanctions Act (ILSA). Each bill possesses provisions that call for the president to sanction oil companies for investing in Iranian petroleum development.

However, the House version, which has 355 co-sponsors, including most members of the Republican and Democratic leadership, provides less flexibility to the president to determine whether to apply such sanctions. The bill would mandate that the president make sanctions determinations for any entity under a pending ILSA investigation within 90 days of the bill's enactment. That could strain relations with countries whose oil companies are under such investigations.

Recent actions in the House have substantially increased the likelihood of overlapping discussions of the Iran sanctions bill and the nuclear deal. The legislation was voted out of the International Relations Middle East subcommittee in April 2005 but was not scheduled for a full-committee markup vote until a day before Hyde and Rep. Tom Lantos (D-Calif.), ranking member committee of the full committee, introduced the enabling legislation for the nuclear deal with India this March.

Sam Stratman, a spokesman for International Relations Committee Chairman Henry Hyde (R-Ill.), said, "It would be very premature to draw any linkages to the fate of these very different pieces of legislation." The committee will begin hearings on the nuclear agreement this week. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is scheduled to testify today.

The committee cleared the Ros-Lehtinen bill 37-3.

Yesterday, the Congressional Caucus on India and Indian Americans, co-chaired by Ros-Lehtinen, hosted India's oil minister, Shri Murli Deora, to discuss a proposed natural-gas pipeline project with Iran and how the nuclear-cooperation deal will affect India's future demands on oil.

With the nuclear-deal legislation referred to the International Relations Committee, the panel will now play an essential role in whether the bill comes to the House floor for a final vote, whether there will be amendments, which the administration has said would jeopardize the deal, and whether it is ultimately approved.

Ros-Lehtinen has said that the India deal will be a tough sell for committee members because India has not signed the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. She described her sanctions bill as a "free-standing bill" that should not damage U.S.-India relations but said there would be no exceptions from sanctions for those who have been allied with the United States in the past.

The administration is sharply opposed to the Ros-Lehtinen measure. R. Nicholas Burns, undersecretary of state for political affairs, testified last month that the House bill would "strain relations with our close allies whose help we need to change Iran's behavior" and endorsed a reauthorization of the original ILSA statute.

A subsequent State Department letter, dated two days before the markup vote, said that the administration was "unable to support H.R. 282 as drafted" and that it "would force the president's hand in dealing with sanctions and waiver decisions" that would hurt national security interests.

An International Relations Committee staffer said that the administration attempted to slow down movement of the bill in order to institute changes that would secure diplomatic flexibility but was ultimately unsuccessful.

The administration has thrown its support behind the Santorum bill, according to Robert Traynham, a spokesman for Santorum.

"State likes the Santorum bill much more than the Ros-Lehtinen bill that the House is considering," Traynham said.

Members of Santorum's staff met with Iran experts from the State Department two days after the markup vote of the House bill to discuss the Senate version, while Rice and Santorum conferred about the bill March 8. Traynham added that Santorum is looking to attach his bill to legislative vehicles, including the ILSA reauthorization statute that Burns endorsed.

DOJ_NMG_0025711

The Senate bill has 51 co-sponsors, including 18 Democrats, and though introduced last year has remained in the Foreign Relations Committee and has yet to be referred to a subcommittee. Andy Fisher, press secretary for Sen. Richard Lugar (R-Ind.), the committee chairman, said there has been no determination as to whether the Senate will move the Santorum bill for a vote or rely on the Ros-Lehtinen legislation.

As part of a strategic relationship involving issues of counterterrorism, nonproliferation and balancing China's influence in the region, Bush and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh came to an agreement in March whereby the United States would provide technological assistance and nuclear fuel for India's civilian nuclear-energy program while India would subject 14 of its 22 nuclear reactors to inspection by the International Atomic Energy Agency. The enabling legislation would allow for provisions of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 to be waived for India if certain conditions have been met.

The House legislation could trigger tension between the two nations because of India's previous investments in Iranian petroleum. The nonpartisan Congressional Research Service (CRS) reported that multiple agreements have already been reached between Iran and Indian oil companies in 2004 and 2005. The deals included Iran supplying liquefied natural gas to Indian oil companies over 25- to 30-year periods, as well as private and state-owned companies' becoming involved in developing oil and gas fields in Iran.

James Eighmie, ILSA Unit chief with the State Department, offered no comment as to whether there are pending investigations involving Indian oil companies.

India has also shown interest in creating a $7.4 billion gas pipeline with Iran, which would help fulfill India's vast energy needs and sustain its strong economic growth. Iran reportedly hosted talks with oil ministers from India and Pakistan, with future talks scheduled for April. The Bush administration has been consistently opposed to the pipeline project.

A D.C.-based lobbyist, speaking on condition of anonymity, said that the Iran-sanctions bill could be used by opponents of the nuclear deal, specifically members of Singh's coalition majority who are ardent supporters of Iran, to prevent the agreement from being approved in the Indian Parliament.

Counterterrorism and nonproliferation interests have gotten in the way of applying ILSA sanctions in the past, according to the CRS. Many projects placed under review by the State Department, during both the Clinton and Bush administrations, have not culminated in sanctions.

A Pretty Good Deal For America (WSJ)

By Willaim S. Cohen

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

One of the most important successes of President Bush's foreign policy is the progress being made in building a strategic partnership between America and India, thereby helping reinforce a strong democratic anchor in Asia. Congress is about to consider legislation that would allow the implementation of a U.S.-India agreement on civilian nuclear cooperation. This agreement is key to moving forward in a number of areas of mutual advancement. Some detractors say that it is imperfect and will harm long-held nuclear nonproliferation goals. On balance and over the long term, however, I believe the U.S. stands to gain far more than it will lose by implementing this agreement. * * *

In the U.S.-India Joint Statement of July 18, 2005, the two countries set a course toward increasing ties in the arena of civilian nuclear cooperation. The agreement is important to India and the U.S. because it helps India meet its growing energy needs, but current U.S. policy and law prevent the U.S. from implementing it. India is not a signatory to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and will not agree to sign it, because to do so would mean giving up existing weapons that it deems necessary for security. Some argue that carving out an exception for India in the civilian nuclear sphere sets a bad precedent by rewarding India for developing its own nuclear weapons. Critics would liken India's behavior to Iran's or North Korea's and suggest that this agreement will encourage bad behavior by others.

The moral equivalency argument fails a crucial reality test. Iran signed the NPT and then covertly used loopholes in the treaty to pursue its goal of developing nuclear weapons. North Korea, having cheated on its past agreements, has now completely withdrawn from the NPT. Moreover, both Iran and North Korea are known proliferators. India, by contrast, developed its nuclear program outside of the NPT. Importantly, it has not shared or distributed its nuclear material or technology to other nations or rogue groups.

In exchange for changing U.S. policy, law and international agreement, India has made numerous commitments to us. It has committed to separate civilian and military nuclear programs and put the majority of its civilian programs under IAEA supervision and safeguards. These safeguards would prevent diversion of materials to India's existing military program. Moreover, India also has committed to maintain its exemplary record regarding global nonproliferation and is expressing interest in possibly joining the Bush administration's Proliferation Security Initiative. India has passed a national export control law, bringing its law and legal practice into conformity with international standards. New Delhi has reiterated its commitment to maintain a unilateral moratorium on nuclear testing. Finally, and possibly most importantly, India has agreed to work with the U.S. toward achieving a fissile material cutoff treaty.

Make no mistake, this agreement with India is by no means perfect and the Bush administration could have done a much better job in consulting with Congress first. Congress should carefully weigh the provisions of the agreement and the proposed implementing legislation, considering ways the administration can further the cause of nuclear nonproliferation in a manner that enhances but does not undermine the agreement with India. But in doing so, Congress should remain mindful that there are many critics in New Delhi who are opposed to the agreement for the very reason that it imposes restrictions on India and are looking for reasons to reject it. If the agreement is rejected in Washington or New Delhi, it is unlikely that India will be able to go forward with further development of its civilian nuclear power generation capability. This will add significant new pressure to the oil market and also force India to burn more coal. Both of these outcomes will damage U.S. economic and environmental objectives.

Initiated under President Clinton and accelerated under President Bush, a closer U.S.-India strategic partnership is born of a shared global vision, the mutual pursuit of democratic ideals, and a common interest in ensuring strategic and regional stability. Simply put, these shared goals and ideals are what make the India case worthy of exception and vastly different from the examples of Iran and North Korea. Strategically, the U.S. and India are laying the foundations of our mutual vision for future defense and security cooperation against the pressure and threats posed by failed states, global terrorist networks and emerging hegemons. * * *

In reality, India is in fact an increasingly important partner to the U.S. and European efforts aimed at stopping Iran's nuclear weapons development program. Delhi and Washington share the problems posed by global extremist terrorism and coordinate ever more closely on a full range of related intelligence matters. India's voice and assistance in the international community helping to ensure that Afghanistan and Iraq are successes is increasingly important. Perhaps, however, our greatest long-term confluence of strategic interest is shaping the positive emergence of China as a global power. To all of these ends, India has great ambitions of joining the U.N. Security Council as a permanent member and assuming even greater global responsibility.

Fundamentally upgrading the U.S.-India relationship represents one of the most important strategic innovations in American foreign policy since the end of the Cold War. Congress should recognize and consider carefully this reality during its deliberations on the civilian nuclear agreement. It is time for two great countries to set aside historical misunderstandings, resolve differences, and move forward with a mutual commitment in promoting democracy, advancing freedom, maintaining security, and establishing free and open markets. India and the United States are embarking on an important and historic journey for the future. Close strategic cooperation and defense security ties between the two countries will be an important element in determining the success or failure of that journey in an ever more complicated and dangerous world.

Russia, United States Increasingly At Odds (AP)

By Judith Ingram

AP, April 4, 2006

Like an aging couple, Russia and the United States seem to spend more time squabbling over what divides them than building on their shared interests.

Whether it's Iran, the Palestinian militant group Hamas or democracy movements in former Soviet republics, Moscow and Washington increasingly find themselves staring warily at one another across the fence.

The Cold War is long over, but questions remain: Will Russia and the United States learn to live with their differences? Or will they get so wound up in recriminations that they can't move forward on the issues where they should find common ground?

Old complaints are often dredged up.

Last week, it was President Vladimir Putin claiming the United States has put up artificial obstacles to slow Russia's entry into the World Trade Organization. While U.S. officials and even Russian negotiators begged to differ, pro-Kremlin lawmaker Konstantin Kosachev speculated the aim wasn't just to deal a setback to Moscow — but to give Ukraine a leg up in its own WTO negotiations.

The week before that, it was Washington's turn to complain, as the Pentagon leveled accusations that Russia had slipped intelligence on U.S. troop movements in Iraq to Saddam Hussein in 2003. Russian officials tersely denied the allegations and fumed over the fact that their American counterparts had not raised them privately before they were splashed across the media.

The disputes underscored the declining relationship between the U.S. and Russia since 2001, when President Bush declared that he had gotten a sense of Putin's soul during their first meeting. The bond was strengthened after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks when Putin allowed U.S. forces into Central Asia.

"There have always been differences, but from time to time they were put aside for shared values: nuclear disarmament, euphoria over the end of the Cold War, the fight against terrorism, things that pushed everything else into the shadows," said Ivan Safranchuk, the head of the Moscow office of the Washington-based Center for Defense Information. "But in the periods of thaw, Russia and the U.S. didn't create any stable mechanisms to solve problems."

Meanwhile, Russia's influence in the world has swelled, providing a growing counterbalance to U.S. hegemony. It has been a central player in negotiations over Iran's alleged nuclear arms program and a mediator with Hamas — proving that Washington needs Moscow even as it bridles at the contrary positions Russia has staked out.

The strengthening Moscow-Beijing axis is cause for American nervousness, and may underlie some of the recent vocal U.S. criticism of Russia — judgments Moscow considers unjustified.

Frustration is driving the relationship between the U.S. and Russia now, Safranchuk said, and the root problem is a "dissonance in perceptions." Moscow thinks Washington is ungrateful for the cooperation it has provided, particularly following the Sept. 11. attacks.

Another measure of that dissonance is Russian confusion over why Bush has failed to persuade Congress to lift the Soviet-era Jackson-Vanik trade restrictions while Washington freed neighboring Ukraine from the 1974 measures, opening the way for the former Soviet republic to join the WTO, Safranchuk said.

If the tables were turned and it were up to Russia's parliament to send a positive sign to the U.S., Putin could have the bill pushed through in a heartbeat — the Kremlin's control of the legislature is that strong.

Similar misperceptions have hobbled the economic relationship, in part because the Russian government expects Washington to step in and tell businesses what commitments they need to make, said Andrew Somers, head of the American Chamber of Commerce in Moscow.

For example, the United States wants Russia to develop its liquefied natural gas industry so Washington can reduce its dependence on Mideast oil, but Moscow wants guaranteed sales after it sinks billions of dollars into the project.

"The U.S. says 'we can't do that but don't worry about it, look at our charts for the next 20 years, we're running out of gas, we're running out of oil, we're overly dependent on unstable countries, we want your stuff," Somers said. "And the Russians say, 'Ok, we'll go to China.'"

The United States is among just a trio of countries — the others are Australia and Colombia — that have yet to strike a WTO accession deal with Russia. Putin watches the slow pace of negotiations and sees his ambitions to put Russia back at center stage in world affairs stymied.

"He wants to have the international stamp that Russia is a country in which you can do international trade ... and the U.S. is preventing Russia from being able to do that," said Roland Nash, head of research at Moscow's Renaissance Capital investment bank.

"I just think there's a real sense of frustration."

U.S. Near Deal With China On Illegals (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, April 5, 2006

The Department of Homeland Security is near an agreement with China to return up to 39,000 Chinese illegally living in the U.S. to the communist country, which previously had refused to accept deportations.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff yesterday said the tentative agreement, which would let the U.S. deport Chinese illegals as they are arrested, will act as a deterrent to other foreign nationals contemplating illegal immigration.

"We can't be in the position any longer where we are paying the burden and bearing the burden for countries that won't cooperate with us and take their own citizens back," said Mr. Chertoff as he completed a weeklong tour of China, Japan and Singapore to discuss security and immigration issues.

Mr. Chertoff said nearly 700 Chinese nationals held in U.S. detention centers are clogging the system and that more than 38,000 have been released on bond after spending the maximum 180 days in lockup.

China has declined to accept the illegals, citing uncertainty about their identities.

"The Chinese government is resolutely opposed to ... illegal immigration," Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao said. "First of all, we have to identify those illegal immigrants and based on that, China is willing to receive the repatriation of illegal immigrants."

Federal immigration judges have issued final orders of removal to Chinese citizens smuggled into the U.S., students and others overstaying their visas, and some awaiting legal immigration.

DOJ_NMG_0025714

DHS officials said details of the agreement still are being worked out, as are specific deportation plans. The department uses electronic bracelets to track some illegals released on bond and uses other monitoring programs, such as regular check-ins.

Returning Chinese citizens is a major financial burden for China and a "low priority," Mr. Chertoff said.

"But they've got to understand it's a high priority for us," said Mr. Chertoff, who noted that it costs $95 per day to house each detainee.

China's state-owned Xinhua News Agency reported that a senior official of the Communist Party of China (CPC) told Mr. Chertoff in one meeting that bilateral cooperation is essential to maintaining world peace, stability and development.

Bilateral cooperation on trade, terrorism, nuclear nonproliferation, avian flu and the nuclear buildup in Iran and North Korea also will be top priorities when Chinese President Hu Jintao visits Washington beginning April 20.

"China hopes to make substantial achievements in extradition, fighting terrorism, Olympic Games security and illegal migration," said Luo Gan, a member of the Standing Committee of the Political Bureau of the CPC Central Committee.

William Knocke, Homeland Security spokesman, said a senior department official will remain in China for a few extra days to finish the agreement.

"We are encouraged by our discussions with the Chinese government," Mr. Knocke said. "There are details that we need to still work through, but now we have an agreement, in principle, on streamlining the process of repatriating Chinese nationals."

China is at the top of the list of foreign countries that refuse to cooperate with repatriation when their citizens are caught residing in the U.S. illegally.

When asked which other nations refuse to accept their citizens caught illegally in the U.S., Mr. Knocke said, "We're not above naming names if other governments continue to be uncooperative, but the meetings in China were very productive, and we are optimistic about other possible outcomes."

Tokyo Trip Could Aid Talks On N. Korea (WP)

By Anthony Faiola

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

TOKYO April 4 -- Top officials from the six countries engaged in North Korean nuclear disarmament talks will converge in Tokyo next week at a private sector conference, fueling hopes of unofficial meetings that could help restart the long-stalled negotiations.

Assistant U.S. Secretary of State Christopher Hill, Washington's chief envoy to the talks, is scheduled to arrive in Tokyo on Monday to meet with his counterparts from Japan and South Korea, U.S. officials said.

During his three-day visit, Hill will attend a Northeast Asia Cooperation Dialogue conference in which top negotiators from the other countries in the six-party talks -- China, Russia and North Korea -- will also be present.

It will be the first time that leading delegates from all six will be at the same forum since November, when the last round of talks ended in Beijing. North Korea has since resisted diplomatic efforts to return to the negotiating table, citing a global campaign by the U.S. Treasury Department to stem its alleged counterfeiting and money laundering operations.

Asian and U.S. diplomats said it was too early to tell whether any talks with the North Koreans would take place at the Tokyo conference. Michael Boyle, spokesman for the U.S. Embassy in Tokyo, said no meeting between Hill and a visiting North Korean official had been arranged. "They will be at the same conference," Boyle said. "That's all we can say."

Some analysts have suggested that the North Koreans may try to stall for months or even years before allowing the six-party talks to resume. Others say that a U.S. initiative launched last year to root out the communist government's illicit activities has been effective in putting new pressure on it.

The Treasury Department has forced U.S. banks to sever ties with a bank in Macau that is allegedly tied to illicit North Korean funds, a move that has led banks around the world to curtail dealings with North Korea to avoid similar action.

Diplomats said that Jong Thae Yang, a high-ranking official in the U.S. affairs division of the North Korean Foreign Ministry, will attend the Tokyo conference.

Sponsored by the University of California's Institute of Global Conflict and Cooperation Sources, it will bring together top officials and academics from across the region.

The conference comes at a time when Japan is taking more assertive steps on its own to pressure North Korea. Japanese politicians have made progress on both a bill threatening sanctions if it does not negotiate in good faith on the nuclear issue and a dispute over Japanese citizens abducted by the North Koreans during the 1970s and '80s to help train potential spies.

On Tuesday, Japan also added 20 North Korean businesses and institutions to an export restriction list aimed at preventing them from obtaining materials and technology that could have military use.

Syria Imposing Stronger Curbs On Opposition (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

DAMASCUS, Syria, April 4 — Just months ago, under intense international pressure to ease its stranglehold on neighboring Lebanon, the Syrian government was talking about ending the ruling Baath Party's grip on Syrian power and paving the way for a multiparty system.

But things have moved in the opposite direction. Syrian officials are aggressively silencing domestic political opposition while accommodating religious conservatives to shore up support across the country.

Security forces have detained human rights workers and political leaders, and in some cases their family members as well. They have barred travel abroad for political conferences and shut down a human rights center financed by the European Union. And the government has delivered a stern message to the national news media demanding that they promote — not challenge — the official agenda.

The leadership's actions were described in interviews with top officials as well as dissidents and human rights activists. They reflect at least in part a growing sense of confidence due to shifts in the Middle East in recent months, especially the Hamas victory in Palestinian elections, political paralysis in Lebanon and the intense difficulties facing the United States in trying to stabilize Iraq and stymie Iran's drive toward nuclear power.

The detentions, the press crackdown, the restrictions on travel and the overall effort to crush dissent are also a response to a fragile domestic political climate and concern over a growing opposition movement abroad.

"I may not be keen on early morning arrests, but this regime was being threatened," Deputy Prime Minister Abdullah Dardari, a Londoneducated technocrat charged with steering Syria's economic overhaul, said in an interview. "The survival of this regime and the stability of this country was threatened out loud and openly. There were invitations for foreign armies to come and invade Syria. So you could expect sometimes an overreaction, or a reaction, to something that is really happening."

On Tuesday, Amnesty International condemned the Syrian crackdown and called on Damascus to release "all of those arrested due to their beliefs." Human Rights Watch said it was sending a letter to the government protesting the arrests.

The government has also sought to fortify its position with a nod to a reality sweeping not just Syria, but the region: a surge in religious identification and a growing desire to empower religious political movements like Hamas and the Muslim Brotherhood. The latter group recently won 88 seats in the Egyptian Parliament in spite of government efforts to block its supporters from voting.

The Syrian government has gone further to accommodate religious conservatives than in the past, officials and religious scholars said.

It has appointed a sheik, as opposed to a secular Baathist, to head the Religious Affairs Ministry; allowed, for the first time, religious activities in the stadium at Damascus University; and permitted a speech emphasizing religious practices and identity to be given to a military audience. President Bashar al-Assad has increasingly inserted references to religious identity and culture into his speeches.

Most striking was the government's recent decision to reverse itself one month after trying to limit activities taking place in mosques. The Religious Affairs Ministry effectively ordered mosques closed for all activities but prayers, but a few weeks later the decision was deemed a greater threat to a government controlled by the Alawites, a minority religious sect, than the potential for political organizing among the majority Sunni Muslims.

"Before, religion for the regime was like a ball of fire, " said Abdul Qader al-Kittani, a professor of Islamic studies at Fattah Islamic University here. "Now they deal with it like it could be a ball of light."

He added: "Two factors pushed the regime toward this direction. The first is the beat of the street. The second is external pressures on the regime."

Damascus has a very different feel from that of a few months ago, when investigators for the United Nations Security Council issued a report suggesting that the Syrian state — not just individuals — was behind the assassination of Rafik Hariri, the former Lebanese prime minister, in February 2005 and that the authorities here had defied the United Nations Security Council by refusing to cooperate with its investigation.

The new investigator heading the inquiry, Serge Brammertz of Belgium, has kept a far lower profile and taken a less confrontational approach than his predecessor, Detlev Mehlis of Germany. Syrian officials have responded by agreeing to allow President Assad to be interviewed.

With the pressure off, the arrests have been stacking up since January, according to local human rights groups and individuals who say they were picked up by the authorities.

DOJ_NMG_0025716

In Damascus, Ammar Qurabi, the former spokesman for the Arab Organization for Human Rights-Syria, was held for four days after returning from political conferences in Washington and Paris. In Aleppo, Samir Nashar, a businessman and opposition leader, was detained for three days after returning from attending political conferences abroad.

The goal was to deliver a message, some of those arrested said: the government will not tolerate any contact between internal opposition figures and a growing opposition movement abroad that is being encouraged by former Vice President Abdel Halim Khaddam, who recently forged an alliance with the Muslim Brotherhood, which is outlawed here.

"This time they wanted to relay a message or a warning: the Muslim Brotherhood, Khaddam and street protests are prohibited," said Hussein al-Odat, an opposition leader in Damascus who said he was detained last week by security forces for two hours. "They said, 'It is clear, and we will not be merciful.' "

Ibrahim Hamidi, the Damascus bureau chief for the pan-Arab newspaper Al Hayat, and the first to report on the new prohibitions, said the government was operating this way because of the changing regional situation. "Now they believe they can get away with it," he said.

Ayman Abdul Nour, a Baath Party member who promoted the idea of reforming the party from inside, said he had grown so disillusioned that he planned to move his business — a Web site that gives voice to calls for reform — from Damascus to the United Arab Emirates.

He said he had been told that the party planned to purge all those with reform agendas from its ranks. "They say they have a fixed time period to crack down and finish off the opposition," Mr. Abdel Nour said.

Human Rights Watch and several Syrian-based human rights organizations say that at least 30 people involved in politics or human rights work have been detained since January, and that several have not been heard from since. Human rights leaders in Damascus say the numbers are likely to be higher because most families are too afraid to report the arrests to their organizations.

Sami al-Abbas, a novelist, and Farouk Hamad, a poet, were arrested Monday for meeting with opposition leaders, said Razan Zaytouneh of the Syrian Human Rights Information Link, a local organization.

Muhammad al-Habash, a member of Parliament and general manager of the Islamic Studies Center in Damascus, says that in spite of the restrictions, Syria is far more relaxed than it was five years ago when, he said, he would not have been allowed to meet with a foreign reporter.

He also praised the government's recent accommodations to religion, saying, "They realize we need Islamic power, especially at this time," and he endorsed the ban on allowing travel to attend political conferences abroad.

"It is not a suitable time to allow people to travel abroad to participate in opposition conferences," he said. "We have to be real."

Possible Crack In The Boycott Of Danish Goods (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates, April 4 — A group of prominent Muslim scholars has called for ending a boycott on a Danish food products company over the publication in Denmark of derogatory cartoons of the Prophet Muhammad.

In a statement issued over the weekend, the International Conference for the Support of the Final Prophet, made up of influential Muslim scholars including Yusuf alQaradawi of Egypt and Salman alAwda, a Saudi cleric, advised that the company, Arla Foods, "should be withdrawn from the boycott on Denmark" in recognition of the company's efforts at reaching out to the Muslim world.

Arla placed full-page advertisements in Arab newspapers last month condemning the cartoons as an insult to Islam, a move that was criticized in Denmark but applauded in some Middle Eastern countries.

"We made the decision to make this statement because we really believe that you shouldn't insult people's religions," said Jan Petersen, regional director for Arla Foods Middle East. "As a company we have been caught in the middle of something that nobody could have ever expected."

Arla's dairy products, which disappeared from store shelves when the boycott began in late January, reappeared in some stores in Dubai, Saudi Arabia and other Persian Gulf countries on Tuesday, according to regional distributors.

Thomas May, the Danish consul general in Dubai, said the resolution was the product of weeks of dialogue between Danish representatives and businessmen and Muslim leaders.

But many retailers said they intended to keep Danish goods, including Arla's, off their shelves.

"We are waiting for the results, but we still have not seen a solution to the problem," said a product manager at the Sharjah Cooperative Society, a retailer in the emirate of Sharjah, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly.

DOJ_NMG_0025717

"The boycott is not in our hands or in the hands of the government," he said. "It's in the hands of the people, and ultimately the consumer must decide."

Westerners In Madrassahs (CSM)

By David Montero

The Christian Science Monitor, April 5, 2006

KARACHI, PAKISTAN - A death in the family opened a doorway back to Islam for Imtiaz Baksh, a tall, turbaned Canadian with a prominent beard and quiet voice. Although raised as a Muslim by parents of Indo-Pakistani origin, he'd never been much of a practicing one himself until his mother passed away.

"Emptiness appears in the heart," he recalls, sitting on a carpet at a madrassah in Karachi. "In that way you can be born again."

More than 10 years ago, Mr. Baksh, his wife, and son began a journey that led them from the quiet of Alberta to the crushes of Karachi. They had opted to study Islam at the Jamia Binoria, a prominent madrassah or Islamic school, where they have remained since 2000.

Under pressure from Western governments, Pakistan has banned foreigners like Baksh from madrassahs after it was discovered that one of the London bombers had visited a Pakistani madrassah. No official deadline has yet been set for the return of foreign students, although the government claims 65 percent have already left.

Many of those who remain are Westernized Muslims who are pursuing a madrassah education as a supplement to - not a substitute for - other types of modern education. Indeed, many come with long experience in Western classrooms, and could form a bridge between Western and Islamic worldviews and systems of thought.

Jamia Binoria, founded in 1954, is one of the largest madrassahs in Pakistan, a sprawling complex where 5,000 students, including some 200 foreign students from 32 countries, squeeze into tiny rooms. The atmosphere is somber despite the tight spaces, and the students sway as they intone methodically over the Koran.

Like many Western students here, Imtiaz Baksh considers returning to the West with the evangelical mission of spreading the teachings of Islam, perhaps by opening a school in Canada. His son, 19-year-old Ejaz Ullah, intends to follow suit.

"Living there [in Canada] opened my eyes to how the world operates, how young people develop themselves. Living in a democratic country gave me an understanding of freedom of speech. A person had rights; you can say what you wanted to say and not be afraid of being taken away by the secret police, for example," says Baksh.

The Bakshs are one of many students at madrassahs who, in their education and upbringing, embody a melding of Western values and traditional Islamic teaching.

Saeed-ur-Rahman, who was born in England to Pakistani parents, is, he believes, a corrective to a popular misconception about madrassahs.

"It's a misconception that students [at madrassahs] are downtrodden, poor, dead-enders," he says over rounds of tea at the Jamia Uloom Islamia madrassah in Binnori Town, Karachi. "We studied [in the West], in school, in college."

A recent study by The World Bank bolsters this view, pointing out that "[t]here is weak evidence to support the hypothesis that poorer and less-educated families are more likely to send a child to a madrassah." The report also says that 75 percent of all households with a child in a madrassah also send a child to a private or public school, challenging the notion that madrassahs are the province of radicalized families.

Mr. Rahman's decision to study here makes perfect sense in his worldview. "If somebody wants to study engineering, they go to the West. We have come to these centers where the standard of Islamic education is higher," he explains in British-accented English.

Madrassahs are widely criticized for providing what is considered a paltry modern education. Like many madrassahs, Rahman's does in fact provide several years of English, science, social studies, and mathematics. But many within the system point out that, in the hundreds of years that madrassahs have existed, modern education has never been the point.

"Material seeking and getting a job are not our purpose," says Mulana Saif-ullah Raddani, editor of the madrassah's weekly newspaper. "The only purpose of our education is to understand God's commandments."

He adds that his own son is studying at the madrassah while pursuing a BA degree in computers at a private college. Some of the foreign students have come to Pakistan to gain a similar mix of madrassah and modern learning, sent by their parents to learn Islamic teachings before returning to schools in the West.

There are those who do not welcome the presence of foreign students, finding it suspicious at best and potentially dangerous at worst.

"This is a most dangerous kind of person," contends S.H.M. Jafri, a professor of Islamic studies at the Aga Khan University in Karachi. "Madrassahs give specialization in a certain type of Islam" which adds to sectarianism, he says.

DOJ_NMG_0025718

Mr. Jafri finds the decision to study at madrassahs questionable given the option of studying at universities in the West. "They could have gone to a department of Islamic studies at a university in America, or at the American University in Cairo. Why have they chosen a madrassah?" he says.

Rahman believes the answer lies in taking the best from both worlds. "We take the good that the West has to offer, and then we come here and take away from this country the good, and leave with a better frame of mind," he explains.

Rahman and others say there is no over-riding conflict between their religious values and the values of the societies to which they will return.

"I don't disagree with the system. I disagree with the people who abuse the system," Baksh says. "I have a negative opinion of drug lords and pimp lords."

But there are limits to how, as Muslims, they can enjoy the social freedoms of Canada and England.

"If you call open-mindedness the freedom to do what you want freely, to sleep around wherever you want - Islam does not allow that. There is a limit to everyone's freedom," Saeed-ur-Rahman says, adding, "I think anyone can live anywhere in the world and mix with anyone in the world if he's a good citizen, and that's what Islam teaches you, to be loyal to your country, to your community."

Historic First: Kuwaiti Women Vote, Run (CSM)

By Jamie Etheridge

The Christian Science Monitor, April 5, 2006

KUWAIT CITY - A sea of black flooded a local polling station in Kuwait Tuesday when hundreds of women clad in the head-to-toe abaya cast their vote for the first time.

One of the two female candidates contesting a vacant seat on the powerful Municipal Council, Khaledah Al-Khader, said she faced some criticism from Islamic groups.

"Some individuals believe that simply because I am of the female gender, I am incapable of having a seat in the council - because I would not be strong enough to deal with the pressure," says Ms. Khader, a medical doctor educated at Tulane University in New Orleans.

Considered a test case for 2007 parliamentary polls, the by-election is the first in which women have been able to vote since the National Assembly approved universal suffrage last year.

The May 2005 decision sparked widespread debate about women's roles in politics, with some conservative Islamist members of Parliament arguing that women should not be allowed in Parliament without wearing the Islamic hijab, or head covering.

The landmark political participation of women in Kuwait's election Tuesday is part of a regional trend in the Arab Gulf states, where women are growing more publicly vocal about political matters.

Qatar recently announced that it would hold first ever parliamentary elections in 2007, in which women will be allowed to vote. These modest political gains mark a dramatic shift for a region where many women still cannot even leave their homes, take a job, or go to school without the permission of their father or husband.

But though Kuwait's new law was a victory for women activists who had fought for suffrage for decades, female candidates and voters still face obstacles.

Khader's fellow female candidate, 32-year-old chemical engineer Jenan Al-Bousheri, has taken a modest approach to her campaign, refusing to visit the all-male diwaniyas, or gathering places. Another female politician, Ayesha Al-Reshaid, who already announced plans to run for parliament in 2007 and has visited male diwaniyas, recently received a death threat warning her to stop campaigning.

Ms. Bousheri, who wears the Islamic hijab and has worked for the municipality for 10 years, says she doesn't feel threatened but instead is simply being respectful of the country's conservative nature. In addition to not visiting the diwaniyas, she refused to include her photo on campaign billboards, which could be considered indecent.

"It's a new situation in Kuwait. I don't want to put [up] my pictures. Maybe in the next two years or three years, the situation will be different ... I can put it [photos] but it's my decision," she says.

Early morning turnout at the polling stations was modest. Each station included an entrance for men and for women. Female monitors had been appointed by the electoral authorities to check the identity of female voters wearing abaya and niqab (face covering).

Kuwait TV said the polls marked an "historic day" for the country. Kuwait's Prime Minister Sheikh Nasser Al-Sabah praised the elections, visiting polling stations in the predominately Shia area of Rumaythia just south of downtown Kuwait City.

The Municipal Council has 16 members, 10 elected and six appointed by the government. The local government body wields considerable power across the nation, approving building, construction, and road projects.

DOJ_NMG_0025719

The seat became vacant following the death of the late Amir Sheikh Jaber Al-Sabah and the appointment of a new government by the new Amir Sheikh Sabah Al-Ahmed Al-Sabah. Abdullah Al-Muhailbi, the Municipal Council member representing the fifth district of Rumathiya, Salmiya, was appointed Minister of Municipality in the new government.

In addition to the two female candidates, six male candidates competed for the seat. Women made up 57 percent of the 28,000 eligible voters for the fifth constituency.

Speaking at the polls, Khader told reporters that the elections showed the country and the world the capabilities of local women.

"This is the first time Kuwaiti women can show the men that we are capable. It is important that we do our best and leave the outcome of the polls to God," she said.

Scandal Pushes Thai Premier To Say He'll Resign (WP)

By Alan Sipress

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

BANGKOK, April 4 -- Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra announced Tuesday that he would resign in an effort to end months of demonstrations that have shaken Thailand. He pledged to leave office as soon as a new parliament convenes.

"I want all Thais to reunite," he said in a brief televised address to the nation, just two days after he won a snap election that was boycotted by the main opposition parties. "We have no time to quarrel. I want to see Thai people unite and forget what has happened."

Thaksin's pledge to resign marked a stunning reversal of fortune for a man who had aspired to be Southeast Asia's premier statesman. It followed accusations of corruption and abuse of power that have repeatedly drawn tens of thousands of demonstrators into the streets, most of them affluent residents of Bangkok who object to what they call Thaksin's autocratic rule.

The prime minister apologized to his supporters during his address and appeared to choke back tears. He said he was eager to relinquish his office but would remain in power until parliament picked a successor. He also said he would retain his seat in parliament and play an active role in the party he founded, Thais Love Thais.

Under Thai law, the new parliament should convene and begin the process of selecting a replacement by the beginning of May. But the session cannot open until all 500 seats are filled, and 39 remain vacant after the weekend balloting.

The national election commission announced Tuesday that it would hold new elections in those districts in two weeks. The main opposition parties will be eligible to contest the races, which should help ease the process of filling the vacancies.

Last year Thaksin became the first elected prime minister in his country's history to win a second consecutive term. His triumph on a wave of rural support was so overwhelming that he also became the first Thai leader to govern without having to form a coalition.

But the policeman-turned-mobile telephone tycoon alienated many in the capital with his combative approach. When allegations that he had improperly enriched himself in a telecommunications deal surfaced three months ago, his support among Bangkok's influential middle class crumbled.

During his abruptly scheduled speech on Tuesday, Thaksin, 56, appeared subdued. He appealed for an end to the crisis that has rattled Thailand since his family sold its business empire to a Singapore state company for $1.9 billion in January. He has denied doing anything illegal in connection with the deal.

"As for the many things I have been accused of, this prime minister has never thought of doing anything wrong or evil to the country. I think I have done my best," he said. He added: "Let's clean up our house and stop the chaos."

Speculation had mounted earlier in the day that Thaksin was preparing to quit after his office disclosed he was to pay a private call during the afternoon on King Bhumibol Adulyadej, who is widely revered in the country but keeps his distance from politics. Government officials provided no details about the visit, calling it a routine audience scheduled every six weeks to brief the king and seek his advice.

But the trip to the beachfront Klaikangwon Palace, 120 miles south of the capital, came one day after Thaksin raised the possibility on a television talk show that he might step aside for the sake of national reconciliation. To do so, he would have to tender his resignation to the king.

Thaksin's aides described his planned resignation as a break from politics, leaving open the possibility that he might return to elected office.

Politicians and political analysts said they expect he will continue to play a powerful role behind the scenes because he remains the dominant force in the country's largest party. He is one of the country's richest people.

Although Thaksin did not name a successor, discussions inside his party have focused on several of his loyal lieutenants. In particular, the media and political analysts have spoken of Deputy Prime Minister Somkid Jatusripitak, a marketing specialist who also serves as commerce minister.

Somkid, who holds a doctorate in business management from Northwestern University, is a longtime confidant of Thaksin's, having previously served as his adviser when Thaksin was a cabinet minister in a prior government. He is considered by many to be less controversial than other party insiders and was responsible for introducing some of Thaksin's most popular policies.

Some critics on Tuesday welcomed Thaksin's announcement. But it remained unclear whether others would be satisfied and suspend their protests before he leaves office. In recent days, many of the prime minister's foes had demanded his immediate resignation.

"He's trying to dictate the terms of his departure. He's trying to get around the election law by forcing parliament to open," said Korn Chatikavanij, a spokesman for the opposition Democrat Party, reflecting a continuing distrust of Thaksin's motives.

Protest leader Sondhi Limthongkul, who ignited the anti-Thaksin movement last year against his former business partner, gave the prime minister until April 30 to depart. He said the alliance would hold one last rally Friday in central Bangkok and then resume the protests in May if Thaksin had not followed through on his pledge.

Some detractors have also stressed that a resignation alone would not be enough to end the crisis. In an editorial Tuesday, the Nation newspaper said Thaksin's party would have to relinquish power so that a provisional government could undertake constitutional reforms.

"An independent inquiry must also be initiated to look into corruption and allegations and conflicts of interest involving Thaksin, his family and their cronies," the newspaper wrote. "Failing that, there can be no reconciliation."

Thai Premier Quits His Post, Ending Turmoil (NYT)

By Thomas Fuller

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

BANGKOK, April 4 — Thaksin Shinawatra, a billionaire turned populist politician, said Tuesday that he would step down as Thailand's prime minister, ending five years of increasingly tumultuous rule and breaking a political stalemate over demands for his resignation that had gripped the country for the past two months.

It was a sudden reversal for Mr. Thaksin, who a day earlier had claimed victory in national elections held Sunday that had been boycotted by opposition parties.

"Our country needs to move on," Mr. Thaksin said in a hastily arranged, 10-minute appearance on national television late Tuesday. "Our children need to have a much better future. There's no point if adults keep trying to beat each other up and finally destroy the country."

Mr. Thaksin said he would stay on as caretaker prime minister until a new leader was chosen, which according to Thai law must take place within 30 days of the election. Thai media have speculated about several possible replacements, including the commerce minister and close Thaksin ally, Somkid Jatusripitak.

By adopting universal health care, cracking down on drug dealers and offering debt relief to farmers, Mr. Thaksin endeared himself to rural voters, who make up 70 percent of the country's 63 million people.

But while he was loved in the countryside, he was despised by the Bangkok elite, who accused him of using his political power to further his business interests.

They also accused him of worsening the Muslim insurgency in southern Thailand, stifling media independence, fostering a culture of corruption in government contracts and allowing the police to conduct hundreds of extrajudicial killings, a charge the prime minister has brushed aside.

Mr. Thaksin, 56, announced his resignation after a meeting with Bhumibol Adulyadej, the revered Thai king, who will celebrate 60 years on the throne in June.

"We don't have time to fight," Mr. Thaksin said. "I want to see the Thai people reunite and forget what happened in the past."

Mr. Thaksin made several references to the king, suggesting that the meeting had influenced his decision.

Candidate Promises To Reform The U.N. (WT)

By Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, April 5, 2006

Sri Lanka's candidate to lead the United Nations said yesterday that as secretary-general, he would push ahead with reforms to the world organization and take a more proactive stance toward "what is evil and wrong with the world."

Jayantha Dhanapala told editors and reporters at The Washington Times that whoever replaces Secretary-General Kofi Annan next year would have to address the scandals that have weakened the United Nations' credibility.

"It is very clear that management is an imperative -- we need to have a strong management hand," said Mr. Dhanapala, who served as the U.N. undersecretary for disarmament from 1998 to 2003.

Mr. Annan's term expires Dec. 31, and three candidates have taken their campaigns on the road, visiting New York and the capitals of the five permanent Security Council members. The council must agree on a name before the 191-member General Assembly votes on the nominee.

Under an informal rotation system, it is Asia's turn to lead the world body. But U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton has said the next secretary-general should be chosen for his or her administrative skills, not the location of his or her home country.

Beijing, meanwhile, is pressing hard for the job to go to a candidate from one of the 54 members of the U.N. Asian Group.

"China strongly believes that Asia can provide the next secretary-general," Ambassador Wang Guangya told The Washington Times yesterday in New York.

Slovakian Ambassador Peter Burian, the only Eastern European voice on the Security Council besides Russia, said "the majority opinion" in the United Nations favors an Asian. "But we feel that the concept of geographical rotation should be secondary to the qualifications."

Mr. Dhanapala was in Washington meeting with State Department officials, members of Congress and think tanks to convince them of his reformist agenda and bridge-building style.

Although he declined to criticize Mr. Annan's record since he became secretary-general in 1997, Mr. Dhanapala said that the Iraq oil-for-food scandal had "sapped the morale" of the organization and that divisions over the Iraq war had affected Mr. Annan's stewardship of the United Nations and its roughly 56,600 employees worldwide.

In an indication of how he would lead, the Sri Lankan candidate noted that Article 99 of the U.N. Charter gives the secretary-general the authority to bring to the attention of the world body any issue that is likely to be a threat to peace and security.

"I think this article needs to be used much more," Mr. Dhanapala said. "We cannot allow sections of humanity to be preyed upon."

Balancing the interests of the United States against those of other nations "does not mean turning a [blind] eye to what is wrong and evil in the world," he said.

Thailand and South Korea also have named candidates -- Surakiart Sathirathai and Ban Ki-moon respectively -- and several other names have been mentioned, including two candidates from Singapore and Poland's former president Aleksander Kwasniewski.

French Premier Refuses To Bow To Protests By Angry Youths (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino And Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

PARIS, April 4 — Waves of demonstrations, strikes and violence hit France again on Tuesday as Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin, weakened but defiant, refused to bend to the demand that the government scrap a disputed youth labor law.

It was the fifth nationwide protest since February against a modest initiative that was aimed at encouraging the hiring of young people but that has provoked an improvised, open-ended campaign against the French government itself.

The protest in Paris was marred by violence at its destination at the Place d'Italie in the southeast of the city. Angry gangs of young people throwing bottles and stones clashed with the riot police, who fought back with tear gas and waded into the crowd to handcuff and haul off troublemakers.

Some of the small, mobile bands of youths known as casseurs, or smashers, broke concrete sidewalks and threw the pieces at the police. The youths kicked and beat protesters and destroyed property, tearing out park benches and pulling down street signs.

At times, other demonstrators tried to stop the destruction by creating circles around the casseurs. Earlier in the day, the police went from store to store at the enormous square, urging shopkeepers to close their doors.

By evening, more than 300 people had been arrested in Paris. But the clashes seemed less fierce than those of just a week ago, as riot police officers managed to keep discipline and maintain order.

In the northern city of Lille, however, hundreds of youths smashed shop windows, vandalized cars and threw rocks, bottles and other objects at the riot police, who fired back tear gas. A female reporter was assaulted while filming the violence and a young man suffered burn injuries from the shell of a tear gas grenade, Agence France-Presse reported.

The police also used tear gas to disperse casseurs in other cities, including Caen, Rennes and Lorient.

DOJ_NMG_0025722

The protests brought more than one million people into the streets in cities and towns throughout France, slightly lower than the 1.16 million protesters of a week ago, according to the Interior Ministry. Union organizers estimated the number for both demonstrations at three million.

The protests even reached as far as the French island of Réunion, nearly 6,000 miles away, where thousands of people in two cities marched against the law.

The strikes that accompanied the protests on Tuesday disrupted daily life but, again, not as severely as those of last week. Some offices, hospitals, shops, universities and high schools were closed or working less efficiently; some transportation services were disrupted.

Only 24 of France's 84 universities were functioning normally, with others either partly blocked by demonstrators or closed. The Eiffel Tower was closed, as it was during last Tuesday's protests.

But, in a sure sign that this was not a country paralyzed, the Paris Métro and bus system ran on a normal schedule. Mail and many newspapers were delivered. Only 18 percent of railroad workers were on strike, compared with 28 percent a week ago. Fifteen percent of domestic flights were canceled, half the percentage of last week. The Education Ministry reported that 23 percent of its workers were absent, compared with 36 percent last week.

In the National Assembly, Mr. de Villepin faced savage criticism from the opposition.

"Mr. Prime Minister, who is governing France today?" asked Jean-Marc Ayrault, the leader of the Socialist party bloc in the Assembly. At another point he said: "You govern no more. You hold the appearance of power, but you no longer exercise it."

Mr. Ayrault said France was mired in a "crisis of regime with two prime ministers," apparently referring to the active role that Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy has played in trying to open a dialogue with the unions.

In reply, Mr. de Villepin vowed, "The government will not give in." Despite predictions that the law is doomed, he insisted: "What we want is a victory against unemployment. This is a victory for France."

The attacks on Mr. de Villepin, who has never held elective office, have grown fiercer over this issue in recent weeks. On the streets of Paris, one sign read, "In memory of a virtual prime minister."

The position of the government deteriorated even further after President Jacques Chirac's televised address on Friday, when he made a compromise offer that watered down the youth labor law.

The law, as passed by Parliament and upheld by the Constitutional Council, created a new labor contract for people under the age of 26 that gave employers up to two years to fire them without cause.

Mr. Chirac said he was sending the measure back to lawmakers, asking them to cut the probation period to one year and to require employers to give a reason for any dismissal. He asked companies not to issue contracts under the law until it had been modified. But two days later, Mr. Chirac signed the original youth initiative into law.

Fifty-five percent of those polled for a survey by BVA in the newspaper Les Échos on Tuesday said Mr. Chirac's decision to amend the law was "not enough."

According to a BVA poll that will appear in the weekly magazine L'Express on Thursday, only 49 percent of those polled said they hoped that Mr. de Villepin would stay in the post of prime minister, while 45 percent expressed the hope that he would resign.

Mr. Sarkozy, who is also the leader of the governing Gaullist party, meanwhile, has given the impression that he, not Mr. de Villepin, his political rival, is managing the crisis. Over the weekend, Mr. Sarkozy spoke by phone with leaders of the main unions, and on Monday night held talks with party deputies to discuss amendments to the new law.

Millions In France Protest Law, Leadership (WP)

By Molly Moore

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

PARIS, April 4 -- Geoffroi Cabioch, a 21-year-old veterinary student who joined the protesters surging through Paris on Tuesday, does not oppose the new youth labor law that provoked the massive demonstration. In fact, he believes that the law "will help some of my friends find a job."

Cabioch said he was not protesting a law, but the attitude of the French government.

As many as 3 million people thronged the streets of cities across France -- equaling the huge protests of one week ago -- in what has grown from a protest against a single labor law to an outpouring of discontent with an aging leadership that a new generation feels does not represent its interests.

Even the violence that now routinely breaks out between crowds and riot police at the end of each march in Paris took on a government-vs.-the people tone Tuesday.

When heavily armored officers chased hooded youths who appear to show up just for the sport of mayhem, peaceful demonstrators booed. When flying bottles hit officers, the crowd erupted in cheers of approval. When police fired tear gas into the swarms of people, the youths, wearing hoods almost as a uniform, and peaceful people alike retreated, coughing and cursing the riot squads.

Tuesday's demonstrations and accompanying strikes that disrupted airplane and train schedules and shut down the Eiffel Tower for the second time in a week came despite a pledge by President Jacques Chirac to modify the new labor law.

It allows employers to fire workers under the age of 26 any time during their first two years of employment. Chirac said in an address to the nation Friday he was willing to cut that period to one year and to make other concessions, which he did not specify. He signed it into law Sunday.

Government and union officials are scheduled to meet Wednesday to discuss the changes.

Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin, author of the law, rammed it through Parliament in a 2 a.m. vote on an omnibus package he called "an equal opportunity law."

A new survey released by the BVA polling group Tuesday showed Villepin's popularity had plunged to 28 percent -- a 14-point drop since the protests began more than a month ago. Villepin is widely considered Chirac's leading choice for president in next year's elections.

The recent demonstrations have been the largest in France in decades. In the past, such huge displays of public anger have resulted in governments collapsing.

French government officials estimated Tuesday's turnout at 1 million in dozens of towns and cities across France; union officials put the figure at nearly 3 million.

The government claimed that only 84,000 people marched in Paris, which appeared to be a fraction of the actual number. Demonstrators poured into southeastern Paris's sprawling Place d'Italie for more than four hours. Union officials said 700,000 people participated.

The Paris demonstrations drew people from across a generational, social and educational spectrum. Parents pushed toddlers in strollers. Students from elite universities walked alongside the French-born children of African immigrants from high schools in poor suburbs. But many echoed the same frustrations.

Young people marching Tuesday expressed more anger over the way Chirac's government has imposed the law than dismay at the law itself. "The government didn't discuss the law with the unions," said Yann Lafforgue Puyo, 28, a consultant for the Renault auto company. "They imposed it -- that's not what I call democracy."

"I'm here to demonstrate against the government, which never listens to us," said Adler Innocent, a towering 22-year-old with a diamond earring. He is the son of Haitian immigrants who lives in one of the Paris suburbs hit hard last fall by a wave of arson and vandalism.

But Rebecca Wattenberg had no sympathy for the demonstrators. She stood defiantly in front of her shop, which was filled with colorful, painted glass plates, glasses and mirrors.

"I'm 22 myself -- like the demonstrators," she said, clutching the shop door key, preparing to lock up to prevent possible vandalism. "But I don't understand them. They would work and not demonstrate if they needed money."

She said the new job law was needed to give employers more flexibility. "Everywhere else in Europe people have started to realize that job laws have to change," Wattenberg said. "But not here."

Yvette Fouleboeuf, 84, who stood outside her apartment, shod in dog's-head-style slippers, said she supported the demonstrators and opposed the labor law "for my grandchildren -- they're so worried about the future."

As the demonstration began, police rounded up dozens of youths of African descent, handcuffed them and loaded them onto two buses.

Before the chanting, banner-waving marchers reached the Place

d'Italie, workers at McDonald's and Kentucky Fried Chicken restaurants were nailing large boards over their plate glass windows as though preparing for a hurricane. Cafe waiters scrambled to move tables and chairs off the sidewalks and inside.

The march was peaceful until it reached its final rallying point in the place. There, parts of the crowd erupted in mayhem, ripping up street signs and chunks of concrete and hurling them at riot police. The officers advanced on the attackers in long lines, frequently firing tear gas to disperse the crowd. In last week's turnout, hooded youths frequently robbed the peaceful demonstrators. There were no similar reports on Tuesday, even as youths threw pieces of concrete at news photographers.

But vendors who set up a grill to sell sausage-and-onion sandwiches to demonstrators were attacked by a group of youths. The vendors leapt into the cab of their truck and sped away, leaving a trail of broken bottles, squashed sausages and puddles of mayonnaise on the pavement.

Ex-Spy For Britain Found Fatally Shot In N. Ireland (WP)

By Shawn Pogatchnik

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0025724

DUBLIN, April 4 -- A former official in the Sinn Fein political party who was recently exposed as a British spy was found fatally shot Tuesday, after apparently being tortured, police said. The killing seems certain to further complicate Northern Ireland's stalemated peace process.

Denis Donaldson, 55, died in his isolated home in Glenties in northwest Ireland, said the Irish justice minister, Michael McDowell, adding that Donaldson's right forearm had been nearly severed. He was last seen alive Monday while walking in the village, according to McDowell.

Donaldson was Sinn Fein's legislative chief in the failed power-sharing government of Northern Ireland. He admitted in December that he had been on the payroll of the British secret service and the province's anti-terrorist police for two decades. He went into hiding after that because the Irish Republican Army has traditionally killed known informants.

On Tuesday, the IRA denied responsibility in a one-line statement. "The IRA had no involvement whatsoever in the death of Denis Donaldson," the outlawed group said.

Irish Prime Minister Bertie Ahern and British Prime Minister Tony Blair condemned the killing, which came at a pivotal moment in Northern Ireland's 13-year-old peace process.

On Thursday, Blair and Ahern are to travel to Northern Ireland to reveal a new blueprint for reviving a Protestant-Catholic administration, the intended cornerstone of the province's 1998 peace accord. The plan -- 3 1/2 years of diplomacy in the making -- would call on Northern Ireland's legislature to reconvene in mid-May and face a Nov. 24 deadline to elect an administration.

The killing appeared certain to harden Protestant opinion against cooperating with Sinn Fein, the IRA-linked party that represents most Catholics in Northern Ireland. But officials in both governments said they would go ahead with Thursday's announcement.

Sinn Fein's leader, Gerry Adams, who in December defended Donaldson as an innocent man and then outed him as a British spy, said he did not know who killed him. But he suggested it might have been the work of IRA dissidents opposed to Sinn Fein's peacemaking efforts.

"It is likely that his death at this time is intended to undermine current efforts to make political progress," Adams said. "Those who carried out this murder are clearly opposed to the peace process."

Ian Paisley, whose Democratic Unionist Party represents most of Northern Ireland's British Protestant majority, said that someone within the IRA ranks was the most likely culprit. "There is a finger pointing tonight at IRA-Sinn Fein," he said.

A Catholic-Protestant administration for Northern Ireland fell apart in October 2002 because of an IRA spying scandal involving Donaldson. He and two others were charged with pilfering documents that identified the personal details of thousands of potential IRA targets. Protestants accused the IRA of plotting a possible resumption of its violent campaign.

But British prosecutors mysteriously dropped all charges in early December. A week later, Adams announced that Donaldson had confessed to being a paid British spy. Within hours, Donaldson admitted the same in a television interview.

During its 27-year campaign, the IRA's internal security unit tortured scores of IRA members suspected of passing information to British intelligence. Typical IRA methods included drowning the interrogation victim in a bathtub, applying electric shocks and administering cigarette burns.

The IRA last year declared it was renouncing violence for political purposes and backed the pledge by giving up its weapons stockpiles, moves that were supposed to spur a revival of power-sharing involving Sinn Fein. But Paisley has refused to cooperate with Sinn Fein, citing the IRA's refusal to disband and its alleged involvement in criminal activities.

I.R.A. Turncoat Is Murdered In Donegal (NYT)

By Brian Lavery

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

DUBLIN, April 4 — Denis Donaldson, a former member of the Irish Republican Army who was exposed last year as a British spy, was found shot dead Tuesday evening at his isolated home in Donegal.

Ireland's justice minister, Michael McDowell, confirmed that Mr. Donaldson had taken a shotgun blast to the head, and that his right forearm was "almost severed," a mutilation similar to those inflicted on I.R.A. informers throughout Northern Ireland's sectarian conflict.

Mr. McDowell said Mr. Donaldson, 55, had been tortured in his home near Glenties, in northwest Ireland, The Associated Press reported.

In a statement, the I.R.A. denied any involvement, but the killing threatens the fragile equilibrium that has lasted since last summer, when the group declared an end to its war against British rule in Northern Ireland.

In 2002, Britain accused Mr. Donaldson of spying for the I.R.A. by stealing documents from government offices at the Northern Irish parliament.

DOJ_NMG_0025725

At the time, Mr. Donaldson was receiving paychecks from the British intelligence agencies MI5 and Special Branch while he was serving as Sinn Fein's chief administrator for the power-sharing provincial parliament.

The charges brought down the coalition that was formed under the Northern Ireland peace accord of 1998.

His killing came just two days before the Irish and British prime ministers, Bertie Ahern and Tony Blair, are to meet in Northern Ireland to discuss restoring the local government.

Mr. Donaldson's spying for the British became public last December after the 2002 spying charges against him and two others were dropped suddenly by the British government.

After he was informed that the charges were being dropped, he admitted his dual role to his Sinn Fein colleagues, an announcement that came as one of the movement's most embarrassing scandals in years.

When he confessed in December, he told the state broadcaster RTE, "I was recruited in the 1980's after compromising myself during a vulnerable time in my life."

He added, "I apologize to anyone who has suffered as a result of my activities, as well as to my former comrades, and especially to my family, who have become victims in all of this."

Gerry Adams, president of the I.R.A.'s political wing, Sinn Fein, after personally offering his condolences to Mr. Donaldson's family, said: "It has to be condemned. We are living in a different era, and in the future in which everyone could share.

"This killing seems to have been carried out by those who have not accepted that."

Ian Paisley, the leader of Sinn Fein's Protestant rivals, the Democratic Unionists, said the killing "has put a dark cloud" over the talks Thursday between Mr. Ahern and Mr. Blair.

"Eyes will be turned towards I.R.A./Sinn Fein on this issue," Mr. Paisley said.

As the province's largest party, the Democratic Unionists are exercising a de facto political veto by refusing to share power with Sinn Fein.

Mr. Blair and Mr. Ahern plan to restart the fledgling legislature in May, despite Protestant worries about the continued existence of the I.R.A.

Many Northern Irish republicans, who want the province to break away from Britain and join Ireland, might be happy to see Mr. Donaldson dead, and Mr. Adams suggested that his death might have been the work of British intelligence agencies seeking to move blame back toward the republicans.

Mr. Donaldson had earlier earned his bona fides as Mr. Adams's cellmate when they were jailed in the 1970's. He was also arrested after training in guerrilla warfare with Hezbollah in Lebanon in the 1980's.

Since his admission of spying and his expulsion from Sinn Fein, Mr. Donaldson seemed to age decades. When he finally admitted that he had been spying for the British, he fled his home in Belfast to a remote part of County Donegal, and a cottage that had no electricity or running water.

Hugh Jordan, a journalist who found Mr. Donaldson and reported on his situation recently, told the Press Association in Britain that "he looked like a hunted animal."

"He was extremely depressed," Mr. Jordan said after the killing. "The nerves in his eyes were trembling. He seemed like a man who didn't think he would come to any harm. He did not see his life to be in any danger, but felt the only future he had was where he was, living in that dreadfully squalid situation.

"He was alone and threatened no one. He was no harm to anybody."

Former Sinn Fein Official Shot To Death (USAT)

USA Today, April 5, 2006

Former senior Sinn Fein official Denis Donaldson, who was recently exposed as a British spy, was shot to death in his home in County Donegal, Ireland, after apparently being tortured, Irish Justice Minister Michael McDowell said Tuesday. Prime Minister Bertie Ahern called it a “brutal murder.” Donaldson admitted in December he had been on the payroll of the British secret service and Northern Ireland's anti-terrorist police for the previous two decades. He then went into hiding. The Irish Republican Army said it wasn't involved.

Rich countries' financial aid to the world's poor rose 31.4% in 2005 and reached a record $106.5 billion, due to large debt-relief packages for Iraq and Nigeria, the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development said. The total is 0.33% of the rich countries' gross national income and is halfway toward the United Nations' goal of 0.7%. The United States was the largest donor at $27.5 billion. That was 0.22% of U.S. national income, the highest rate since 1986.

A Paris court fined the terrorist known as “Carlos the Jackal” $6,110 for saying in a 2004 interview aired on French television that terrorist attacks were sometimes necessary. Ilich Ramirez Sanchez, 56, of Venezuela was convicted of defending terrorism.

He also was charged for expressing pleasure at the 9/11 attacks but was acquitted because those comments were his personal reaction, not a defense of terrorism, the court said. Ramirez gained notoriety in the 1970s for deadly bombings, assassinations and hostage-takings. He is serving a life sentence for murder.

Sweden enforced Nazi laws barring marriages between “Aryan” Germans and Swedish Jews and suppressed public criticism of Hitler and reports of atrocities, according to research that suggests neutral Sweden accommodated the Nazis more than previously thought. The study shows “Germany got what it wanted from Sweden” without invading, said Stockholm University historian Klas Amark, who oversaw the research, commissioned in 2000.

Two Worn-Out Diplomats, One Fold-Out Bed (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

I'm just back from London, where the Brits were fascinated with the Condi Rice and Jack Straw two-for-the-road odyssey, the exchange of visits to their hometowns, Birmingham and Blackburn, and the rebuff of Condi by Paul McCartney and a Blackburn mosque.

British journalists loved hearing about how Condi exercises alongside diplomatic reporters in hotel gyms, not at all self-conscious about working out in form-fitting shorts and T-shirts.

The British are used to iron ladies, perhaps not pumping iron but trying to iron out world affairs. In his quaint new book, "Manliness," the Harvard professor Harvey Mansfield cites only one woman with that exalted trait: Margaret Thatcher, who told the first President Bush not to go wobbly on Saddam. Teaching other women to be assertive, Mr. Mansfield frets, might be "like teaching a cat to bark."

The struggles of the relentless American diplomat and the charming British diplomat to knock heads in Iraq and get the government to govern, with the war spinning into sulfurous sectarian fighting, was less mesmerizing to many reporters than the pair's gender-benders.

At one point Mr. Straw said America and England had the right to prod Iraqi politicians: "We've got to be able to deal with Mr. A, Mr. B or Mr. C. We can't deal with Mr. Nobody."

A smiling Ms. Rice, still promoting the illusion that Iraqi women are better off, corrected: "Jack, I'm sure we'd be all right with Miss A or Miss B or Miss C, too, right?" (It would have to be a generic Miss, since there are no powerful women leaders there.)

The foreign secretary held his face and pleaded: "I was not being gender-specific. Don't report me, please."

The British reporters were gobsmacked when Condi gave the fold-out bed on her Boeing 757 to Mr. Straw for the night flight to Kuwait, and slept in the aisle as flight attendants stepped over her.

It may have been a sign that U.S. foreign policy is finally becoming humble, as W. promised in his first campaign, now that Condi has admitted "thousands" of mistakes in Iraq. But it also shows the secretary understands the importance of manly virtues: she was tough enough to sleep on the floor and chivalrous enough to make sure Mr. Straw didn't.

The Times of London made smarmy jokes about "how far the special relationship has developed," and asked a Baghdad embassy spokeswoman if Jack's sleeping in Condi's bed was "second base" for the couple.

The comedian Bill Maher recently noted that while other countries elect a wide array of female leaders, our women politicians are still expected to wedge themselves into a "straitjacket" and act like men.

It has been two decades since I covered Geraldine Ferraro's historic run for the White House. One politician welcomed Ms. Ferraro with a wrist corsage; another in Mississippi asked the "young lady" if she could bake blueberry muffins. Johnny Carson joked that Joan Mondale would not like her husband working late with his female vice president.

So now there are racy Rice-Straw jokes. How far have we come?

The Los Angeles Times ran a piece yesterday about Hollywood's doubts about Hillary, including Sharon Stone's basic instinct that it's too soon for the New York senator since "a woman should be past her sexuality when she runs" and she thinks Hillary still has "threatening" sexual power.

It seemed unlikely that we'd kick the habit of wanting Daddy in the Oval Office until we kicked the habit of wanting Daddy in the anchor chair.

Now that the nightly news is largely an anachronism, and the suits are trying to make it more cuddly and personality-driven to win younger viewers, we can finally break that barrier. (Even though Walter Cronkite fretted to a group last fall that women on TV talk in "too high a register.")

As Rebecca Dana wryly wondered in The New York Observer: "What is gravitas? And why does it kick in at nightfall?" She quoted one network executive explaining that even women "like to get their news from other women in the morning and from men — husband figures — at night."

So now we'll see if Katie Couric can be trusted with the Herculean task of appearing on camera for 5 or 10 minutes a night, reading a teleprompter.

Still, she'll have to prove that, more than being just a headliner, she knows what's behind the headlines. As Bob Schieffer has done, raising CBS ratings, or as Christiane Amanpour might do as an anchor, Katie needs to show she understands the roiling events beyond the teleprompter.

Let's just hope Les Moonves doesn't welcome her with a wrist corsage.

Dark Days For Philippine Democracy (NYT)

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

Filipinos thought they had put an end to electoral chicanery and governmental intimidation when they overthrew the Marcos dictatorship two decades ago. Unfortunately, President Gloria Macapagal Arroyo has completely lost touch with the ideals that inspired that 1986 "people power" movement.

Mrs. Arroyo is no Ferdinand Marcos, at least not yet. But this onetime reformer is reviving bad memories of crony corruption, presidential vote-rigging and intimidation of critical journalists. Unless the Philippine Congress and courts find ways to rein in her increasingly authoritarian tendencies, democracy itself may be in danger.

This was not the outcome people expected five years ago when Mrs. Arroyo, then the vice president, was swept into power on a wave of popular discontent with her discredited predecessor, Joseph Estrada. In those days, Mrs. Arroyo, a professional economist, was seen as an earnest reformer. She won further credit by pledging not to run for a new six-year term in 2004.

But then she changed her mind, and her style of government as well. Her narrow re-election victory became tainted after a tape revealed her discussing her vote totals with an election commissioner while ballots were still being counted. She survived an impeachment attempt over that incident. But she was forced to send her husband into exile over charges that he took bribes from gambling syndicates.

Earlier this year she briefly declared a state of emergency in response to allegations of a coup threat that others disputed. Since then she has been intensifying pressure on a wide range of political critics and especially on the press. Government officials have warned news outlets that they will be held to restrictive new guidelines, the justice secretary talks darkly about a journalistic watch list, and the staff members of a well-known center for investigative journalism have been threatened with sedition charges. No Philippine government has made such efforts to muzzle the press since the Marcos era.

President Bush has repeatedly hailed Mrs. Arroyo as an important ally against international terrorism. He now needs to warn her that by undermining a hard-won democracy, she is making her country far more vulnerable to terrorist pressures.

Because I Say So

Slate Magazine
March 28, 2006 Tuesday

BYLINE: Dahlia Lithwick

One of the most dramatic moments in today's oral argument in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld comes when an uncharacteristically agitated Justice David Souter presses Solicitor General Paul Clement about whether Congress last December effectively stripped the Supreme Court of the right to hear habeas corpus claims from any of the hundreds of detainees being held at Guantanamo Bay.

Clement says it's not necessary for Congress to have "consciously thought it was suspending the Writ." Perhaps the lawmakers just "stumbled on the suspension of the Writ," which would also be fine, Clement suggests.

Souter stops him, amazed. "The suspension of the Writ," the justice sputters, is the most "stupendously significant act" Congress can undertake.

"Are you really saying Congress may validly suspend it inadvertently?" he asks. It's the morning's best example of the degree to which, for Souter as well as for Justice Stephen Breyer, today's argument is an agonizing exercise in Bush administration doublespeak. Clement's arguments are frequently drawn from the well of "because the president says so," or "because the president is the president," or "because it's wartime." They start to sound like Alberto Gonzales or the president: legal analysis by assertion and justification by double standard. This war is like every other war except to the extent that it differs from those other wars. We follow the laws of war except to the extent that they do not apply to us. These prisoners have all the rights to which they are entitled by law, except to the extent that we have changed the law to limit their rights.

In other words, there is almost no question for which the government cannot find a circular answer.

The issue before the court is the legality of President Bush's military tribunals. The two key war-on-terror cases of 2004 Hamdi v. Rumsfeld and Rasul v. Bush established that the administration could detain enemy combatants. But these combatants would nevertheless be entitled to some neutral adjudicatory process, the contours of which the justices left to be determined. The question for the court is whether the military tribunals established by the president by military order in 2001 meet the justices' standard for neutral and adjudicatory. The tribunals rely neither on the Geneva Convention nor the Uniform Code of Military Justice. They allow for the admission of unsworn testimony; may preclude a detainee from appearing at his own trial; and do away with the presumption of innocence. Punishment may include death.

Salim Ahmed Hamdan, alleged to be Osama Bin Laden's chauffeur, faces trial before such a tribunal on charges of conspiracy to help terrorists. His appeal encompasses a host of statutory and constitutional challenges to the tribunals. Hamdan won in the district court and lost in the D.C. Circuit federal court of appeals. Chief Justice John Roberts joined in the D.C.
Circuit decision before his promotion and has thus recused himself today.

Circuit decision before his promotion and has thus recused himself today.
As if the court didn't have enough weighty matters on its collective mind, it also must grapple with the Detainee Treatment Act, which Congress passed last December to amend the federal habeas corpus statute. The idea was to prevent the Guantanamo detainees from getting a full habeas reviewwhich often includes a chance for the accused to present evidencein the federal courts. The government argues that the DTA strips the Supreme Court of jurisdiction to hear Hamdan's case. So, the court has to start there: Can it even reach the merits of the legality of the commissions?
The press corps begins the day with a different question: What the hell has gotten into Justice Antonin Scalia? Between his extracurricular pronouncements on the arguments in this case (and I urge you to listen to the whole speech yourself) and his extracurricular hand signals last weekend, nobody is quite sure what has come over the man. He is ever more the Bill O'Reilly of the High Court.
Neal Katyal represents Hamdan this morning in a special 90-minute session that is sufficiently important to merit audio broadcast, according to the unknowable metric used by the chief justice. Katyal launches into his argument about why the DTA doesn't apply to cases like Hamdan's that were pending in the courts when the law passed. Rookie Justice Samuel Alito who speaks very little again today asks why Hamdan can't just raise these claims later, after the military tribunal has issued its final decision, the way he would in an ordinary criminal proceeding.
"This is not an ordinary criminal proceeding," replies Katyal. "If it was we wouldn't be here. This is a military commission unbounded by laws, the constitution, or treaties. It replicates the blank check this court rejected in Hamdi." Katyal says that the Framers had a "deep distrust of military tribunals" and that the only thing that assuages this distrust is that Congress is charged with setting clear rules.
Katyal then turns to the conspiracy charge Hamdan faces. He explains that the laws of war reject the charge of conspiracy as a substantive crime.
"Even if this tribunal is authorized," he claims, "allowing this charge of conspiracy would open the floodgates to the president to charge whatever he wants."
Alito asks whether the conspiracy charge can't simply be amended. To which Katyal responds, with some frustration, that the "government has had four years to get their charges together against Hamdan." Katyal argues that the Uniform Code of Military Justice sets out the bare baseline rules for military commissions. But Scalia counters that there is no point in creating military commissions if they have to adhere to the same standards as the UCMJ.
Solicitor General Paul Clement has 45 minutes to represent the Bush administration, and here is where the smoke and mirrors kick in. He cites the executive's longstanding authority to try enemies by military tribunal.
When Justice John Paul Stevens asks for the source of the laws that such tribunals would enforce, Clement replies that the source is the "laws of war." When Stevens asks whether conspiracy is encompassed within the laws of war, Clement says that the president views conspiracy as within the laws of war.
Neat trick, no?
Souter takes a slightly different tack: If you accept that the military commissions apply the laws of war, don't you have to accept the Geneva Conventions? he asks. Clement responds that the commissions can "adjudicate that the Geneva Conventions don't apply." "You can't have it both ways, " Souter retorts. The government can't say the president is operating under the laws of war, as recognized by Congress, and then for purposes of defining those laws, say the Geneva Conventions don't apply.
Sure it can. Clement replies that if a detainee has such a claim, he should bring it before the military courts. Even Kennedy seems alarmed now. He confesses that he's troubled by the notion of bringing challenges about the structure of the tribunal to the tribunal itself. "If a group is going to try some people, do you first have the trial and then challenge the legitimacy of the tribunal?" he asks incredulously.
Clement objects to his word choice. "This isn't just some group of people," he says. This is the president invoking his authority to try terrorists.
Breyer goes back to the DTA and whether it stripped the court of jurisdiction to rule on Hamdan's claims. He asks how the court can avoid "the most terribly difficult question of whether Congress can constitutionally deprive this court of jurisdiction in habeas cases."

And Stevens serves up another can't-have-it-both-ways query: When Congress takes away the courts' habeas corpus jurisdiction, "Do you say it's a permissible suspension of the writ or that it's not a suspension of the writ?" he asks.
"Both," replies Clement.
"You can't say both," chides Stevens. So this is where Clement claims that Congress could have accidentally suspended the writ, the way you might accidentally drop your eyeglasses into a punchbowl. "Wait a minute," replies Souter, and I think he's angrier than I have ever seen him. "The writ is the writ. You're saying the writ was suspended by inadvertence!" Later Breyer will add: "You want to say that these are war crimes. But this is not a war. These are not war crimes. And this is not a war crimes tribunal. If the president can do this, he can set up a commission and go to Toledo and arrest an immigrant and try him." To which Clement's answer is the fail-safe: "This is a war." And even as it starts to be clear that he is losing Kennedy who asks whether Hamdan isn't "uniquely vulnerable" and thus entitled to the theoretical protection of the Geneva ConventionsClement stands firm in his claim that the Guantanamo detainees are different from regular POWs because, well, they are.
At some point, it must begin to insult the collective intelligence of the court, these tautological arguments that end where they begin: The existing laws do not apply because this is a different kind of war. It's a different kind of war because the president says so. The president gets to say so because he is president.
For today at least, it appeared that the Bush administration would not readily marshal five votes for its core legal proposition: that if you just refuse to offer answers, the questions will go away.

Federal appeals court takes up gay marriage

Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

Pasadena -- A federal appeals court heard a challenge by two Orange County men Tuesday to a law denying federal marriage benefits for same-sex couples, but questioned whether the case belonged in court -- a suggestion welcomed by gay rights groups, which want to derail the suit and focus on overturning California's marriage law.

The hearing by the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals was the first by any appellate court on the constitutionality of the Defense of Marriage Act. Signed in 1996 by President Bill Clinton, the law reserved federal marriage benefits -- joint tax filing, Social Security survivors' rights, immigration status and numerous other marital privileges -- to opposite-sex couples. Another provision, not at issue in this case, lets states refuse to recognize same-sex marriages performed in another state or a foreign nation.

Both the federal law and the state's ban on same-sex marriage were challenged in a 2004 lawsuit by Arthur Smelt and Christopher Hammer of Mission Viejo after they were twice denied a marriage license. The pair, together since 1997, argue that both laws violate the constitutional rights of equal protection, privacy and freedom of association. The men are appealing a ruling in June by a federal judge who upheld the federal law and declined to consider the California law, which is now before a state appeals court in an unrelated case.

The Smelt-Hammer case has drawn protests from organized supporters of same-sex marriage -- Equality California, the Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund, and the National Center for Lesbian Rights, as well as the city of San Francisco -- who fear that federal court litigation could lead to an early and unfavorable U.S. Supreme Court ruling that reinforces current marriage laws.

Those groups won a ruling in March 2005 saying that California law, which defines marriage as a union between a man and a woman, discriminates on the basis of sex and violates the fundamental right to marry the person of one's choice. An appeal by the state is awaiting arguments before a state appellate court in San Francisco.

In the federal case, Equality California urged the court in a written filing to rule that an unmarried couple is not affected by the federal law and has no right to challenge it. That drew a sharp retort from Richard Gilbert, lawyer for the Orange County couple, who said gays have already endured 5,000 years of discrimination.

At Tuesday's hearing, however, two of the three judges suggested Gilbert's clients may have lost their legal platform through an act of personal rebellion -- a December 2004 filing with the state in which they said they were ending their domestic partnership and instead wanted their marriage to be recognized. They did not notify U.S. District Judge Gary Taylor, who ruled six months later that the men's status as domestic partners gave them legal standing to challenge the federal law, a law he proceeded to uphold.

"Standing was predicated on the legitimacy of the domestic partnership," said Judge Sidney Thomas. With that status apparently withdrawn, he said, "why shouldn't we abstain and let the California courts decide all this?"

When Gilbert said his clients' action had been misinterpreted, Judge Ferdinand Fernandez observed that they could reregister as domestic partners if they wanted to clear up doubts about their status. Hammer told reporters afterward that he and Smelt would consider a return to domestic partner status to be a concession that they weren't entitled to marriage.

He said he and his partner, both 46, are unwilling to await the outcome of suits by gay rights groups in state courts.

"I want things done in my lifetime, not somebody else's," Hammer said.

Only one of the judges on the panel, Judge Jerome Farris, seemed inclined to address the validity of the marriage laws. When Gilbert argued that the laws were based on bigotry, Farris said the definition of marriage could include a couple's ability to conceive a child together.

Under a law like California's domestic partner statute, Farris said, "you can unite, you can do anything else you want to do. You just can't call it marriage."

Suit challenging 'don't ask' dismissed for lack of names

Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

A federal judge has dismissed a gay rights group's challenge to the military's "don't ask, don't tell" policy because the group wouldn't tell the judge the names of the people it was representing.

The Log Cabin Republicans' refusal to name any of the past or present service members on whose behalf the organization filed the lawsuit means the group has failed to identify anyone affected by the policy and lacks standing to maintain the suit on its own, said U.S. District Judge George Schiavelli of Los Angeles.

The organization's claims of harm to its members are merely "hypothetical and conjectural," Schiavelli said in a ruling issued March 22. He said other past and present suits over the same policy have shown that those who believe their rights are violated "will step forward to legally challenge the perceived injustice despite the potential consequences."

The dismissal is not final, however, as Schiavelli gave the organization until April 28 to file an amended lawsuit naming at least one member harmed by the policy. Patrick Guerriero, president of the Log Cabin Republicans, said Monday the group would reluctantly comply.

The suit was filed anonymously largely to protect plaintiffs who were still in uniform, because "if they came out publicly they would be thrown out of the military," Guerriero said. He said his organization was talking to current and former service members involved in the case to see which of them would agree to be named publicly.

The military policy, declared by President Bill Clinton in 1993 and passed into law by Congress that year, replaced a previous ban on gays and lesbians in the armed forces. Under the current policy, recruits and service members cannot be asked about their sexual orientation, but can be barred if they declare or openly display their homosexuality.

The U.S. Supreme Court has never ruled on the constitutionality of the policy but has refused to hear appeals from several lower-court rulings in the government's favor. Those cases arose, however, before the high court's 2003 ruling that overturned state laws against private homosexual conduct and recognized a right to sexual privacy.

The Log Cabin suit, filed in October 2004, cited the Supreme Court ruling and said the military policy violates the rights of privacy, free speech and equal protection, is based solely on prejudice, and serves no legitimate government or military purpose. A similar lawsuit by the Servicemembers' Legal Defense Fund, on behalf of 12 identified former military personnel, is pending before a federal judge in Boston.

Guantanamo Judge Delays Suspect's Tribunal 3 Months

By Carol J. Williams
Times Staff Writer

U.S. NAVAL BASE GUANTANAMO BAY, Cuba — Whether the soft-spoken man with an easy smile and a posture of compliance is an Al Qaeda bagman or a hapless hotel worker wrongly ensnared in the post-Sept. 11 panic was no clearer after his Tuesday tribunal appearance than when he was arrested four years ago.

The case against Abdul Zahir, who never traveled outside his native Afghanistan before being flown to the U.S. detention site for terrorism suspects here, was suspended until July to give his Army defense lawyer time to travel to the scene of the crimes with which Zahir is charged.

That means by the time his tribunal resumes, the Supreme Court will have ruled on the question of whether the Bush administration's effort to prosecute terrorism suspects here is legal.

Zahir is one of only 10 "enemy combatants" — among hundreds of Guantanamo detainees — charged with war crimes stemming from the Sept. 11 attacks. The cases have crawled through a maze of legal and moral challenges to the tribunal's legitimacy and the U.S. military jailers' interrogation techniques.

The diminutive, bearded defendant, who says he is unsure whether he is 34 or 35, shuffled into the maximum-security military courtroom between two Marines, clearly awed by the change of scenery from the daily monotony of detention.

In proceedings that lasted less than two hours, Zahir agreed to go on even without a court translator or a copy of the charges against him in his native Persian. He also said he was satisfied for now with "Colonel Tom," Army reservist Lt. Col. Thomas Bogar, who is assigned to defend him.

Zahir said little beyond "yes" and "no" to procedural questions before Marine Col. Robert S. Chester, the presiding judge, in his appearance before the first military war crimes tribunal in which the U.S. has been involved since World War II.

In a September 2004 hearing at Guantanamo to determine whether he was properly classified as an enemy combatant, Zahir painted a picture of himself as a lowly government guesthouse worker at a hotel run by Afghanistan's Taliban regime assigned to translate and run errands for an Arab who spent three years there. The Pentagon asserts that the visitor, Abdul Hadi, was a "known member of Al Qaeda."

"I never hated the United States," Zahir told his captors during that hearing. He also asserted that he had told U.S. interrogators in Afghanistan the identities of neighbors who lobbed a grenade into a car carrying journalists near Gardez in March 2002, seriously wounding a Toronto Star correspondent. Zahir is charged with war crimes for that attack and for allegedly supporting Al Qaeda by helping Hadi.

After Monday's abbreviated hearing, the military commissions' chief prosecutor, Air Force Col. Morris Davis, said the U.S. government wasn't likely to accuse Zahir of being the attacker. Two other Afghans are mentioned in the charges and presumed to be detained here.

"I don't think the evidence we are going to introduce is that he is the person who actually threw the grenade," Davis said.

Prosecutors have proceeded with the cases not specifically stayed by U.S. court orders while the Supreme Court reviews the military commissions' jurisdiction and the legality of denying the foreign defendants the protections and rights ensured in U.S. courts and military courts-martial. Four detainees face preliminary appearances this week and three more the last week of April.

Davis seemed to denigrate the questions raised at the Supreme Court hearing March 28, contending that Justice Stephen G. Breyer had argued that President Bush's declared war on terrorism "is not a war, at least not an ordinary war." A few hours after Breyer's observation, "enemy combatants launched a major attack on coalition forces in southern Afghanistan," Davis said, further noting that a 52-year-old Vermont man on his third tour of duty there was killed as a result.

"When people ask why we are holding the enemy accountable in our common-law war courts called military commissions, the answer is plain and simple: We are at war," Davis argued.

Zahir was to have entered a plea to charges of attacking civilians, aiding the enemy and conspiracy in murder, destruction of property and terrorism. But Chester postponed further proceedings until Bogar, a Philadelphia tax lawyer in civilian life, could travel to the southern Afghanistan region where Zahir is from. The defendant, in khaki trousers, laced leather shoes and a blue oxford shirt so new it still held its packing wrinkles, had contended in his detention review that the charges had "no basis."

He has made no claims of ill treatment here, but accusations of torture, humiliation and denial of due process by other prisoners have raised an international chorus of demands that the Guantanamo camp be closed and its detainees tried in established courts or returned to their home countries.

Chester noted with mild reprimand the prosecution's failure to provide Zahir with a Persian translation of the charges against him, filed nearly two months ago and based on events in early 2002.

He also gave the defendant the opportunity to adjourn at the outset because the tribunal administrators, the Pentagon's Office of Military Commissions, had failed to provide a translator. A Persian-speaking defense aide filled the breach.

Pentagon spokeswoman Maj. Jane Boomer couldn't explain the oversight.

Katherine Newell Bierman, counter-terrorism counsel for Human Rights Watch, questioned whether a Persian translator had ever been present for Zahir's extensive interrogations considering that one couldn't be found for the formal proceedings.

Lawyers for other Guantanamo detainees have converged here this week to observe the hearings, hoping to glean the strength of the prosecution's evidence and the judges' strategy for filling holes in the commissions' legal guidance.

Several of the defense lawyers say they have been encouraged by the Supreme Court session last week in which five of the eight justices hearing the case expressed doubts about the Guantanamo judicial process.

Testimony begins in suit against U.S., alleges 2,000 men detained illegally@

TORONTO_(CP) _ A Toronto man who is part of a class-action lawsuit against senior U.S. officials, including FBI director Robert Mueller and former attorney general John Ashcroft, is testifying in a closed-door deposition in Toronto this week.

Akhil Sachdeva, a Hindu native of India who is now a Canadian citizen, began testifying on Monday before U.S. government\l "l" attorneys\l "l" about his treatment at Passaic County Jail in New Jersey, where he was detained from December 2001 to April 2002 before being cleared of terrorist links and deported to Canada.

The lawsuit, known as Turkmen v. Ashcroft, was filed by the New York-based Center for Constitutional Rights in 2002. The group's lawyers are representing the seven men named in the case, including two other Toronto men, Syed Amjad Ali Jaffri and Shakir Baloch, along with a Muslim cleric from Turkey, a French citizen from Reunion Island and two brothers from Egypt who were detained in custody after the Sept\l "l". 11\l "l", 2001, terrorist attacks.

"The suit is still in the discovery process," said Bill Goodman, the centre's legal director.

The lawsuit\l "l" charges that up to 2,000 men, mostly Muslims from the Middle East or South Asia, were picked up on minor administrative, visa or passport violations and illegally detained following Sept\l "l". 11\l "l".

"This was one of the initial strikes by the Bush administration on the Bill of Rights. The rights of (thousands of) Muslim men in the U.S. were being trampled, and we had to take it up, or we would be silent observers in the demolition of the Bill of Rights," Goodman said.

Lawyers for Sachdeva and the other men named in the case claim detainees\l "l" at the Passaic County jail and the Metropolitan Detention Center in New York were jailed under harsh conditions and terrorized by snarling dogs.

"These men were held as criminal suspects, but were not brought before any judge or magistrate or charged with a crime," Goodman said.

The lawsuit seeks monetary damages for pain and suffering by the detainees, who were released after being cleared of any terrorist links. (Toronto Star)

High Court Cases Put International Law in the Spotlight

Marcia Coyle

Twice last week the U.S. Supreme Court delved into the possible application of rights and remedies under international law but in two very different contexts: the war on crime and the war on terror.

And in both contexts, the Bush administration argued there were no judicially enforceable rights created.

The day after the justices heard arguments on whether enemy combatant Salim Hamdan, detained at Guantánamo Bay, was entitled to certain protections under the Geneva Conventions, the justices took up the much less heralded cases of two foreign nationals claiming that their rights under the Vienna Convention were violated and that their criminal convictions should be set aside.

Moises Sanchez-Llamas, a Mexican national convicted of attempted murder, and Mario Bustillo, a Honduran citizen convicted of first-degree murder, contend that Article 36 of the Vienna treaty requires signing nations to notify "without delay" a detained foreign national of his right to request help from his country's consul and, if the foreign national asks, to inform the consul of the arrest or detention. Sanchez-Llamas v. Oregon, No. 04-10566; Bustillo v. Johnson, No. 05-51.

About six years ago, they say, the U.S. government reversed its position that Article 36 creates individual rights of consular notice and access. The justices agreed to decide whether it does, and whether suppression of evidence sought by Sanchez-Llamas, or the habeas relief sought by Bustillo, would be appropriate remedies for violations of Article 36.

FOCUSED ON REMEDY

During the 90-minute argument, which featured five lawyers -- two for the criminal defendants and one each for Oregon, Virginia and the United States -- the justices focused primarily on the remedy, not the rights question.

The International Court of Justice has said that treaty signatories are to provide a reasonable remedy, noted Justice Stephen G. Breyer. If the foreign national has a lawyer, he said, perhaps the lawyer should inform him of his right, and if the lawyer fails to do so, that is ineffective assistance of counsel. "Is that sufficient in the appropriate case?" he asked.

Bustillo's counsel, Mark T. Stancil of the Washington office of Houston's Baker Botts, answered, "Relying on the lawyer to do the duty of the state does not effectuate the treaty. The treaty says the state has to notify."

"Yes, the state has to notify," said Justice David H. Souter, "but the lawyer should be taxed with knowing that this is the right, that the treaty is the law of the land, and he should raise the question of whether notice has been given, just as he asks the client if he got his Miranda rights. If he doesn't, then it's ineffective assistance."

But this situation is different from Miranda warnings, countered Stancil. The right to notice and access is a stand-alone right. "If you push these claims into ineffective assistance of counsel, they evaporate," he added, noting that there have been about 60 ineffective assistance of counsel claims based on Vienna Convention violations, and courts reportedly have found ineffective assistance in "one or none" of them.

Oregon Solicitor General Mary H. Williams told the justices that it would be "revolutionary" if the high court interpreted the Vienna Convention as sought by the defendants.

"Our problem is: The ICJ said you have to give a remedy," said Breyer.

However, Williams countered, "The treaty makes clear in its preamble that it's concerned with the obligation of the signatories and not with creating individual rights and remedies."

"Should police officers give [notice] as part of the Miranda warnings?" asked Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. Williams said that the U.S. State Department recommends police give notice as soon as they know a person is a foreign national.

"We've made better efforts to comply with our obligation under the treaty, but that doesn't lead to suppression of evidence for violations," Williams added.

U.S. Deputy Solicitor General Gregory Garre told the court, "It is a traditional rule of international law that treaties don't create individual enforceable rights."

The ICJ decision that a remedy must be provided "to be blunt, is wrong," he said, adding that the traditional way to enforce the treaty is to give notice to the detainee at the point it is determined that he is a foreign national.

Republican opponents of Attorney General Peg Lautenschlager, a Democrat, immediately accused her of filing a frivolous action to shore up liberal support for her re-election bid this year, but her office said she was only carrying out the duties of her job.

The lawsuit, filed by the National Education Association and school districts in Michigan, Vermont and Texas against U.S. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, alleges the act imposes unfunded mandates on state and local governments.

A federal judge in Michigan dismissed the lawsuit in November, but the plaintiffs have mounted an appeal.

Lautenschlager filed an amicus brief in the lawsuit Friday, which means Wisconsin supports the plaintiffs. The states of Connecticut\l "l", Delaware, Illinois, Maine and Oklahoma have filed similar briefs.

Lautenschlager said in a statement Tuesday the act dictates wide-ranging policies ranging from teacher qualifications to timing of student assessments, decisions Wisconsin school districts have traditionally made. But it doesn't provide local governments enough money to cover its requirements, she said.

In 2004, Lautenschlager issued a legal opinion saying the federal government can't force states to comply with the act. The opinion was the first in the country from a state attorney general on the act.

Fight focuses on copter records: Defense contractor files suit to deny access

REBECCA CARR

Washington -- One of the nation's largest defense contractors is suing the Pentagon to prevent the release of Black Hawk helicopter production inspection records, saying they would reveal confidential information to its competitors.

But the Bush administration disagrees with Sikorsky Aircraft Corp., whose helicopters are heavily used by the military in Iraq, Afghanistan and missions throughout the world.

The administration, better known for keeping government information secret, is asking a federal judge in Washington to release the records to Alan M. Cohn, a reporter for a television station in New Haven, Conn.

Cohn is investigating whether mechanical failures have caused Black Hawk helicopters to crash in Iraq. His quest for information began in 2003 after several Sikorsky employees told him they were worried that defective parts had caused a series of deadly crashes in Iraq that year.

Cohn believes the records would shed light on whether the Defense Department had raised concerns with Sikorsky about the quality of the helicopter's machinery.

The records in question -- called Corrective Action Requests -- are a way for the Defense Department to inform a contractor that it is not complying with the Pentagon's safety and performance standards, said Dick Finnegan, associate general counsel of the Defense Contract Management Agency.

In one such record obtained by Cohn, a Pentagon official wrote:

"The recent succession of production problems indicates to us a steady decline in SAC's [Sikorsky Aircraft Corp.'s] ability to identify and correct manufacturing and production deficiencies." The Pentagon official noted in the document that the most notable of 19 cited examples is the "installation of unqualified parts."

On March 2, 2004, Cohn filed a request under the Freedom of Information Act to obtain all inspection reports related to the Black Hawk dating to 2003 and for Sikorsky's responses. The Defense Contract Management Agency denied Cohn's request two months later.

Cohn appealed and upon review, the agency decided to reverse its earlier denial and release nearly all the documents.

Sikorsky objected. Robert K. Huffman, a lawyer representing Sikorsky, argued in legal filings that the release of the information would cause the aircraft manufacturer "substantial competitive harm" and hurt the government's ability to obtain information from Sikorsky in the future.

On May 31, 2005, the agency decided that the records would be released but said Sikorsky's responses to them would remain confidential.

Sikorsky responded by filing a lawsuit in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia against the Pentagon to halt the release of the records. The Justice\l "l" Department\l "l", in turn, recently asked Judge Richard W. Roberts to dismiss the case.

"The release of the documents is compelled by, and consistent with the goals of the FOIA," Justice\l "l" Department\l "l" lawyers wrote.

Cohn dismisses Sikorsky's concern about proprietary loss, saying it is a guise to hide possible mechanical problems that could be embarrassing to the company.

"We aren't talking about classified information here," said Cohn. "I can't for the life of me understand why the public doesn't have the right to this information. Our men and women have their lives on the line, and we have every right to expect that the aircraft does not have faulty parts."

Open government advocates agree.

"Our experience has shown that companies are happiest when no information is shared," said Danielle Brian, executive director of the Project On Government Oversight, a nonpartisan government watchdog group.

"The threshold for releasing information under the Freedom of Information Act is high. If the Defense Department believes these records should be made public, then it raises questions about why the company wants to keep them secret."

John E. Pike, a defense expert and executive director of Virginia-based GlobalSecurity.org, said the case is unusual because it pits the right of Sikorsky to protect its company secrets against the public's right to know. "Seems to me that a balancing test is needed," Pike said.

Bud Grebey, vice president of communications and marketing at Sikorsky Aircraft, said he can't comment on the nature of Cohn's requests because of the pending litigation.

But he did say that the helicopters are not released to the Pentagon unless all of the concerns in the inspection report are met.

NY May Sue US Govt To Get W Valley Nuclear Site Cleaned (AP)

Wednesday, April 5, 2006

BUFFALO, N.Y. The state is prepared to take the federal government to court to end an impasse over cleanup and long-term management of the West Valley nuclear site, which once housed the nation's only commercial nuclear fuel reprocessing operation.

Talks between New York and the U.S. Department of Energy stalled during the Clinton administration. Now, with the DOE cutting staff and funding at the site, state energy officials worry the federal agency is getting ready to leave.

"DOE seems to be planning an early departure, and we don't want the taxpayers of New York state left holding the bag," said Vincent Delorio, chairman of the New York State Energy Research & Development Authority.

The agency this week authorized litigation to determine the federal government's responsibility at the Cattaraugus County site 30 miles south of Buffalo.

From 1966 to 1972, spent nuclear fuel from commercial nuclear power plants and DOE sites was chopped and dissolved, and its uranium and plutonium were extracted. The operation shut down for upgrades in 1972 but remained closed after stricter regulatory requirements passed during the closure made the prospect of reopening too expensive.

The 1980 West Valley Demonstration Project Act passed by Congress obligated the DOE to decontaminate and decommission facilities at the state-owned site, with the state pitching in on the cost.

Since 1981, West Valley Nuclear Services Co., the DOE's onsite contractor, has solidified and stored more than 600,000 gallons of high-level liquid radioactive waste, while shipping low-level waste off site. More than 300,000 cubic feet of low-level waste was removed last year.

"As past performance shows, the U.S. Department of Energy remains committed to meeting the requirements of the West Valley Demonstration Project Act," the DOE said in a statement issued Tuesday in response to the NYSERDA action. "... Overall, DOE has reduced the volume of legacy waste at the West Valley Demonstration Project by 70% in the last few years."

Legislation proposed by Rep. John "Randy" Kuhl would update the 1980 law and require the federal government to take ownership of the site and full responsibility for its cleanup. The bill would end the state's financial obligation, which has totaled more than $200 million.

NYSERDA views legal action as a last resort that would be pursued if face-to-face negotiations and the legislation were to fail, officials said.

"The progress of the legislation is uncertain, and we feel compelled to proceed simultaneously along the litigation track to make sure that we get these responsibility issues resolved so that we can move forward with the cleanup," NYSERDA President Peter Smith said.

"It's unfortunate that New York has to go this route just to get the DOE's attention, but we're running out of options," said Bob Van Wicklin, a spokesman for Kuhl, R-N.Y.

The DOE last week said it would award a contract for continued cleanup at West Valley in the coming months. West Valley Nuclear Services spokesman Terry Dunford said the company, which has held the contract since 1981, would seek to continue its work there.

ACLU vs Boy Scout Case Heads To Court Of Appeals

Wednesday, April 5, 2006

Chicago, IL - PipeLineNews.org - In 2005, a federal district court in Chicago sided with the ACLU and ruled that the military's support for the National Scout Jamboree - held once every four years at Fort A.P. Hill in Fredericksburg, Virginia - unconstitutional. The case is Winkler v. Rumsfeld, No. 05-3451 (7th Cir.).

The ACLU's claim is that the Scout Oath's "duty to God" makes the Boy Scouts a religious organization, like a church, and that military support for the Jamboree violates the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment.

If the ruling stands, the military may not lend equipment or provide logistical support to the Jamboree, as it does for many other civic organizations. The Department of Defense appealed this decision to the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit in Chicago. Oral arguments are now scheduled for Thursday, April 6 at 9:30 a.m. CST.

Alvarado Hospital parent facing more legal woes

The latest mistrial in the Alvarado Hospital illegal-kickback case could hamper efforts by the hospital's corporate parent to settle all investigations and cases against it.

U.S. District Judge M. James Lorenz declared the mistrial yesterday after a second San Diego jury deadlocked in the federal criminal case against Alvarado Hospital Medical Center, its former chief executive Barry Weinbaum and Alvarado parent company Tenet Healthsystem Hospitals. The jury was unable to reach a unanimous conclusion on whether the hospital used its physician-recruitment program to bribe doctors to refer patients to the hospital.

It's unclear whether prosecutors will try the case a third time, but the possibility presents a hurdle for Tenet Healthcare Corp. – Tenet Healthsystem's owner – in its pursuit of a global settlement of numerous federal and state investigations into Medicare fraud, tax underpayment and securities fraud.

Merrill Lynch analyst A.J. Rice said in a research note late yesterday that the lack of a definitive conclusion will plague Tenet in the short term.

“A clear verdict in the Alvarado case would have paved the way for the company to come to a relatively quick settlement with federal authorities regarding the remaining major federal investigation-related issues,” Rice said. “However, with a hung jury that path is not as clear.”

The news of a mistrial sent Tenet's stock up 61 cents, or 8.37 percent, to close at $7.90 yesterday on the New York Stock Exchange. The stock fell 3 cents in after-hours trading.

In the past year, shares have declined nearly 32 percent as Tenet went through the 11-month trial in San Diego, investigations elsewhere into doctor relocation agreements, a Medicare settlement in Florida and declining patient admissions.

Run-ins with various government agencies are sprinkled throughout Tenet Healthcare's history. It was rechristened Tenet in 1995 in an effort to recover from an insurance-fraud scandal by predecessor National Medical Enterprises.

NME's psychiatric-services subsidiary pleaded guilty to paying millions in kickbacks to doctors in exchange for referrals. The company paid $375 million in fines to the government. NME's chief executive, who cooperated with the government in the investigation, was sentenced to five years of probation.

After replacing its management and paying $3.3 billion to buy the American Medical International hospital chain, the company was poised for rebirth under the name Tenet Healthcare.

At the time, company Chairman and Chief Executive Jeffrey C. Barbakow told employees that the name Tenet “says that we have strong values and beliefs and that we will seek out others with similar views for the benefit of both.”

After seven relatively uneventful and financially solid years, Tenet was suddenly back in the hot seat in 2002, when federal regulators accused the company of manipulating its pricing in order to tap into the Medicare outlier fund, which compensates hospitals for the most costly patients.
Federal agents also raided the company's Redding Medical Center, searching for evidence that two of its physicians performed unnecessary cardiac procedures.

In late December of that year, agents went to Alvarado Hospital in San Diego seeking evidence of an alleged scheme in which Alvarado paid $10 million to doctors over a decade in exchange for referring patients to the East County hospital for surgery, tests and other procedures. Such kickbacks are illegal under laws governing Medicare and Medicaid.

During the two trials in the case, Tenet argued that the agreements were reviewed and approved by experienced health care lawyers and were designed to address a shortage of physicians in East County.

The company's physician-relocation agreements also are under scrutiny elsewhere in California and in Texas, Louisiana, Missouri and Tennessee, according to Tenet. No charges have been filed in those investigations.

By late 2003, Barbakow had been replaced by Trevor Fetter, a Tenet executive who had worked with Barbakow at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer before both joined Tenet in 1995.

Fetter's strategy of dealing with the company's mounting legal problems has been to settle investigations wherever possible. Since he came on board as CEO, Tenet has spent hundreds of millions of dollars to settle lawsuits.

It paid $54 million to settle the government's Redding heart-procedure investigation, then paid $395 million to settle a civil class-action lawsuit by patients over the same matter. The company also had to sell the Redding hospital to avoid its being excluded from Medicare, which would almost certainly have forced the hospital to close.

In February, Tenet paid $7 million to the state of Florida to resolve a civil lawsuit regarding Medicare outlier payments filed by the Florida Attorney General's Office, as well as to end an investigation of Medicaid payments and psychiatric billings. Under terms of the settlement, the company did not admit to any of the lawsuit's allegations.

Meanwhile, the company has been bleeding financially from falling admissions and bad debt from uninsured patients. The company has lost more than $3.5 billion over the past two years.
Tenet's legal woes, such as the Alvarado case, aren't helping. In its most recent quarterly conference call, Fetter said the specter of investigations and lawsuits is hurting the company's efforts to boost the number of patients at its hospitals.

Tenet, the nation's second-largest hospital chain with 71 facilities in 13 states, continues to pursue a universal settlement of pending investigations against it in various jurisdictions.

Tenet spokesman Steven Campanini said the company's settlement efforts don't hinge on a final and firm resolution in the Alvarado case.

“We resolved several big issues involving the company that many people thought would have been the end of the company,” Campanini said, referring to the Redding and Florida settlements.
Still, he expressed hope yesterday that the company won't find itself defending itself once again in San Diego.

“We would hope that this case is not going to be tried a third time, so we can focus our full energy on the broader issues,” Campanini said.

Today's Events In Washington 43

TERRORISM NEWS:

Judge Approves First Public Playing Of 9/11 Tape At Moussaoui Trial. The AP (4/6, Sniffen) reports, "The cockpit recorder tape from the Sept. 11 jetliner that crashed in Pennsylvania will be played in public for the first time - to the Zacarias Moussaoui sentencing jury - the judge in the case ruled Wednesday." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema said the jury considering whether to execute Moussaoui could hear the recording from United Airlines Fight 93 and see a transcript of it. … This cockpit tape has been played privately for the families of Flight 93 victims, but it has never been played in public." The AP adds, "Prosecutors asked the judge to order the tape sealed and to keep the transcript from the general public after it is played in open court, but she made no immediate ruling on that. … Noting that the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals has ordered trial evidence made public, she said relatives of Flight 93 victims would have until next Tuesday to advise her whether they object to general release of the material. … She said if no family members object, she will release the material to the general public the day after it is submitted into evidence. No date was set for that."

The Washington Post (4/6, A12, Dwyer, 744K) reports that Judge Brinkema "also ordered that the tape be made available to the public after the jury hears it in court unless family members of Flight 93 victims file a written objection by Tuesday. D. Hamilton Peterson of Bethesda, president of Families of Flight 93, called the release of the recording 'enormous' and said he supports the ruling." The Washington Times (4/6, Seper, 90K) adds Brinkema "noted in her ruling that the government requested the court seal transcripts of the tape after their admission into evidence and prohibit any public dissemination of the materials."

Guiliani Expected To Take Stand. WNBC-TV (New York) (4/6) reports, "Former New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani is expected to take the stand on Thursday to describe the horror of Sept. 11, as jurors consider whether terrorist Zacarias Moussaoui should be put to death." WNBC-

TV continues, "Giuliani will be able to talk about the toll -- the months of digging, the funerals, the economic and emotional suffering -- and perhaps how he and many others literally ran for their lives as nearly 3,000 victims were trapped in the World Trade Center. … At some point, prosecutors are expected to show jurors tapes from that day, including news footage of victims falling from the sky. … Justice Department officials said he will join about 45 others, including relatives of victims and a New York 911 operator who took the panicked calls that day."

Victims' Families Divided On Death For Moussaoui. USA Today (4/6, 3A, Johnson, 2.31M) reports that members of 9/11 victims' families are divided on whether Zacarias Moussaoui should be sentenced to death. Abraham Scott, whose wife was killed at the Pentagon, has said Moussaoui "deserved to die 'like a dog with rabies,'" but Colleen Kelly, whose brother died at the WTC, said, "I don't understand how killing another person will make this any better." Their "contrasting views…reflect a wrenching debate that will begin to unfold today" as prosecutors "plan to offer testimony from 9/11 victims' family members who believe the unapologetic defendant should be executed rather than sentenced to life in prison."

Meanwhile, The Washington Post (4/6, A12, Markon, 744K) reports that "the sights and sounds of a national trauma are about to go on display as never before" as prosecutors "re-create the full horror of Sept. 11, 2001, for the jury. … It is the culmination of a four-year effort by the prosecution to knit together a portrait of terror far beyond a normal death penalty trial, and it includes an unprecedented effort to reach out to the victims of Sept. 11. Some wonder whether it will be too much for the jury -- and the victims themselves -- to bear," but "family members and victim advocates said they welcome the decision to lay bare the most intimate details of the hijackings."

FBI Agent Testifies Umer Hayat Wore Wire In Conversations With Imams. The Sacramento Bee (4/6, Walsh, 301K) reports, "In a bid for leniency for himself and his son," Umer Hayat "tried to help the FBI implicate two Muslim clerics in international terrorism. … In testimony Wednesday, Special Agent Gary Schaaf recalled for a jury hearing evidence in the case against Umer Hayat that, at Schaaf's request, Hayat wore a hidden recorder and tried to engage the clerics in incriminating conversation. Schaaf acknowledged that, while he made no promises to Hayat, he held out the possibility that snaring the Muslim imams might help the Hayats with potential criminal charges against them." The Bee notes that the FBI suspected Muhammed Adil Khan and Shabbir Ahmed "were raising money for anti-American elements in their native Pakistan and were recruiting young men in Lodi for terrorist training in Pakistan."

FBI Informant Testifies Failure To Report Recording Was Accidental. The Lodi News-Sentinel (4/6, Bohm) reports FBI informant Naseem Khan testified yesterday, under cross-examination by Umer Hayat lawyer Johnny Griffin, "was organizing his CD collection late Saturday night when he discovered a tape containing a secret recording from more than three years ago" of "a telephone conversation he'd had with Hamid Hayat," but did not give to the bureau. Khan "said he didn't mean to keep the tape from FBI agents, and that he called them half an hour after finding the conversation." Griffin asked, "How many other tapes have you not turned over to the government?" Khan replied, "This is the only one." KXTV-TV Sacramento (4/5, Hedlund) notes that the "mysterious audio tape…became the focal point of testimony" yesterday. "The contents of the tape recorded conversation has not been revealed in court, and it is unknown how critical it might be to the case." The Los Angeles Times (4/6, 958K) also briefly reports on Khan's testimony about the tape.

Slotter Testifies Agents Followed Standard Procedures In Recording Hayat Interviews. The Lodi News-Sentinel (4/6, Bohm) also reports the Hayats "were interviewed for hours…before their arrests, and only after they had talked extensively to the FBI were their interviews videotaped. Agents were following FBI recording policies set out in 1998, agent Keith Slotter testified today. Slotter, who is now the deputy assistant director in charge of training and developing at the FBI academy in Quantico, Va., was special agent in charge of the FBI's Sacramento office when the Hayats were arrested. Under standard policies, witnesses are recorded only when they are confessing, he said," and he approved agents to begin recording when the "interview had…progressed from a straight-forward interview to a confession interview,"

Prosecutors Rest Case Without "Direct Evidence" Hayat Trained At Terror Camp. NPR's All Things Considered (4/5, Gonzales) reported, "Prosecutors in the federal trial of Hamid Hayat…rest their case without offering direct evidence that Hayat attended a Jihadist training camp." Announcing the arrests in June,"officials claimed that they had uncovered a potential al-Qaida sleeper cell in the quiet farm town of Lodi." NPR noted, "Hayat's defense is now under way."

Rendered Yemeni Claims Interrogators In Djibouti Said They Were FBI Agents. BBC (4/5) reports on its Web site, "Amnesty International has suggested that Djibouti was one of the countries where prisoners allegedly abducted and mistreated by the US were held. The report, based on interviews with former detainees, also links the US practice of 'rendition' to the torture or ill-treatment of terror suspects. … Yemeni citizen Muhammad al-Assad said US officials, who said they were from the US Federal Bureau of Investigation had questioned him in Djibouti," and from there, he allegedly "was flown to another location, believed to be in Europe."

Meanwhile, The Washington Post (4/6, White, 744K) reports that the report said three "Yemeni nationals who say they were held captive for more than two years in secret US detention facilities have been released in Yemen without facing charges related to terrorism." AI officials theorize that the men were held "probably in Afghanistan, Djibouti and somewhere in Eastern Europe." If the men were indeed held incommunicado, "that practice could violate international law regarding detentions."

Canadian Teen Protests Guantanamo Treatment. The Los Angeles Times (4/6, Williams, 958K) reports that" Canadian teenager Omar Khadr refused Wednesday to participate in the war crimes case against him, in protest of being moved to … solitary confinement." Khadr "is accused of taking part in a firefight that killed a U.S. Special Forces medic" in 2002. His defense counsel charged that Khadr had been moved to the "worst" facility on the base, but a naval spokesman disputed the allegation of solitary confinement.

Knight Ridder (4/6, Rosenberg) reports, "Marine Col. Robert S. Chester is supposed to be presiding over a panel hearing allegations that the 19-year-old Canadian committed a war crime by killing a U.S. Army medic in a 2002 firefight in Khost, Afghanistan. … Instead, he agreed to take briefs and potentially call witnesses on Khadr's complaint that guards had placed him in punitive isolation at the Pentagon's showcase detention center for terrorist suspects. … 'Excuse me, Mr. Judge. I'm being punished for exercising my rights and being cooperative in participating in this Military Commission,' said Khadr, who has topped 6 feet and was sporting a fuzzy, fundamentalist Muslim beard at his hearing. … The youth had been held in barracks-like communal captive quarters at the sprawling prison camp overlooking the Caribbean until March 30. He was then moved to the state-of-the-art, Camp 5 prison, housing 80 captives in single-occupancy cement cells."

At UK Terror Trial, Defense Denounces FBI Informant As "Liar," "Fantasist." BBC (4/5) reports on its Web site, "The key witness in the prosecution of seven men accused of planning multiple bomb attacks on the UK has been branded a 'liar' and 'fantasist' in court." Mohammed Babar "has told the Old Bailey that he plotted with the men to bomb bars, trains and shopping centres. But Michel Massih QC, defending, told the witness he was a 'well-schooled, well-rehearsed, well-trained liar'." The Daily Telegraph (4/6, Gardham) notes Babar "admits he turned on his British co-conspirators in return for the promise of a shorter sentence from the FBI." Yesterday, he "denied making up his account but Mr Massih pointed out that he had affirmed at the beginning of his evidence instead of swearing on the Koran."

NYTimes Supports Fast-Tracking Court Ruling On NSA Surveillance Program. An editorial in the New York Times (4/6, 1.19M) expresses support for Senator Charles Schumer's bill that puts "the National Security Agency's secret spying program on a fast track to Supreme Court review." The editorial says that, even though President Bush is likely to ignore "strong legislation" by Congress, "it would be difficult for him to defy [an] order" from the high court.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Pentagon Threat Database Improperly Retained Reports. An internal review has found that the Pentagon's Threat and Local Observation Notice, or TALON system improperly retained reports that should have been removed. The Los Angeles Times (4/5, 958K) reports that the review "found that some information in the system did not suggest a threat and should have been removed. The Pentagon said that of 13,000 reports, less than 2% were improperly retained. A Pentagon spokesman would not characterize the reports that the investigation determined should have been excised. But a department-wide memo issued Wednesday by Gordon England, the deputy Defense secretary, directed the system's users to adhere to regulations that limit the Pentagon's ability to gather information on U.S. citizens."

Survey Find States Not Happy With Representation In DHS Policymaking. The AP (4/6, Crary) reports the National Governors Association released a report Wednesday based on a survey sent to homeland security directors in each state and five territories and commonwealths. Most said they "are dissatisfied with the quality of intelligence data provided by the federal government…and most also believe that multiple demands on National Guard forces undermine their emergency response capabilities." The survey found "states do not feel they have representation in the Department of Homeland Security's policy development and rule-making process. Several state directors said DHS consults with a few hand-picked state officials and 'then claims that it produced policy based on broad state input,' the survey said."

Many Lawmakers Don't Have GETS Cards, Unfamiliar With Program. The Hill (4/6, Cusack) reports that "only 15' of 41 lawmakers that they asked said that they had Government Emergency Telecommunications Service access cards, which give 'users priority telephone access to approved public and private-sector officials" during national emergencies. "Rep. John Linder remarked that he's on the House Homeland Security Committee 'and I've never seen it.'" Meanwhile, a "K Street insider who has a GETS card said, 'As a lobbyist, I was shocked to hear that very important members of Congress didn't even know about this important program.'" The Hill adds, "The DHS refuses to release the names of the industry groups that have been approved for GETS, citing national security."

Landrieu Says Government Should Stop Giving Money To "Dysfunctional" FEMA. Appearing on CNN's The Situation Room (4/5, Blitzer), Sen. Mary Landrieu defended her move to put a hold on the president's nominations until the White House commits to $6 billion in additional funding for Louisiana's levees. Blitzer: "But, Senator, the president and Congress have already appropriated more than $100 billion for Louisiana, for Alabama, for the entire Gulf Coast reconstruction -- $100 billion plus." Landrieu: "That $100 billion has gone to fund FEMA, that has not gone for reconstruction for Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama or Texas, which is part of our cry. Stop sending money to FEMA. It is dysfunctional. It is not working to rebuild the Gulf Coast and ..." Blitzer: "But isn't FEMA supposed to be working to rebuild the Gulf Coast?" Landrieu: "Not really. They're a Federal Emergency Management Agency. We need new tools and new methods, which is why we came together along the Gulf Coast with Haley Barbour and Governor Blanco, Thad Cochran, myself, and Trent Lott and others and crafted help through the community development block grants."

Rogers Says He Will Cut FEMA Funding Unless Permanent Director Is Named. Fox News (4/5, 1:32 p.m., Vester), reported Rep. Harold Rogers says "he will cut off money" for FEMA unless a someone fills the job of permanent director. Appearing on the program, Rogers said, "It is a tough job. It is coming off a tough season. The stress is unbelievable. But that's the bad news. The good news is we have since Katrina changed the nature of the job. Now, the preparedness part of what FEMA formerly did has been transferred to a new directorate within the Department of Homeland Security. So preparedness, which is the biggest part, frankly, of a disaster mitigation, has been transferred out of the FEMA director's chores." Asked whether he thought Acting Director David Paulison should take over the position, Rogers said, "Well, that will be up to the administration to do whatever they would like. … I think he is qualified. It is up to the President and the Secretary."

Lobbyists Hope For Moderate Reform Of Flood Insurance Program. The Hill (4/6, Schor) reports "lobbyists" are hoping the Senate and House agree on a "moderate approach" to overhauling the National Flood Insurance Program that will please "bankers, brokers, real-estate agents and builders alike." A flood-insurance bill approved by the House Financial Services Committee last month won "widespread praise from insurance trade groups," but "some lobbyists are rebelling against an amendment from Rep. Debbie Wasserman Schultz (D-Fla.) that would force FEMA — and the private insurance companies it uses — to the table for mediation of disputed disaster claims." Meanwhile, the "bill's phase-out of flood-insurance subsidies for vacation homes, second homes and businesses did not please housing-industry lobbyists, but they scored a win by beating back a bid from Rep. Jeb Hensarling (R-Texas) to kill subsidies outright."

Despite Record Claims, Insurance Industry Posts $44 Billion Profit. The CBS Evening News (4/5, story 2, 2:10, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "It might surprise you to know that in a year of catastrophic losses with hurricane after hurricane, the companies that insure our property still made record profits." CBS (Hughes) added, "Ever since Hurricane Andrew hit Florida back in 1992, and took a $25 billion bite out of the insurance industry, companies have been charging more and covering less. Mudslides, floods and earthquakes are routinely exempt from homeowner policies. That's why last year even while insurance companies paid out record amounts in claims after Hurricane Katrina and other storms, the industry still made more than $44 billion in profit, an almost 19% increase from the year before."

WAR NEWS:

Rumsfeld Rebuffs Rice's "Tactical Errors" Comments. The Washington Post (4/6, A21, White, 744K) reports, "Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said he did not know what Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was talking about when she said last week that the United States had made thousands of 'tactical errors' in handling the war in Iraq, a statement she later said was meant figuratively." He added that "calling changes in military tactics during the war 'errors' reflects a lack of understanding of warfare." These comments come "amid long-standing tensions between their departments over the war in Iraq and other issues."

Rice Visit To Iraq Said To Have Stiffened Jaafari's Resolve. The New York Times (4/6, Semple, 1.19M) reports that according to "a top aide" to Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari, the visit by Secretary Rice and UK Foreign Minister Jack Straw to Iraq "only served to stiffen" his resolve "to retain his post." The aide said the trips was "ill-timed, counterproductive and what he called 'naked intervention,'" comments that "were echoed by other leaders across the political spectrum today, including Kurds and Sunni Arabs."

The Washington Post (4/6, A20, Balz, 744K) reports Sen. John Kerry's Wednesday op-ed comments in the New York Times that he is "furious over the lack of progress in Iraq. He charged the administration with half-hearted diplomatic efforts and dismissed" Secretary Rice's "surprise 24-hour visit there this week as 'not serious diplomacy.'" Kerry said it is "unconscionable for U.S. soldiers to put their lives at risk when Iraqi politicians show no commitment to establishing a working government" and "outlined a series of deadlines yesterday for withdrawing most U.S. forces by the end of the year and called for increased diplomatic pressure by the Bush administration to compel Iraqi leaders to take responsibility for the future of their country."

National Assembly Could Force Jaafari To Resign. The Washington Times (4/6, Behn, 90K) reports "al-Jaafari will be forced out of his post through a vote in the National Assembly if he refuses to step aside voluntarily, a Shi'ite Iraqi legislator said yesterday. Ongoing political talks could result 'in a new surprise,' lawmaker Ayad Jamal al Din told editors and reporters at The Washington Times." He "declined to predict who would replace Mr. al-Jaafari, but said it would be someone acceptable to Shi'ites, Sunnis and Kurds."

US Seeks To Reassure Shiites. The Wall Street Journal (4/6, A6, Dreazen, 2.11M) reports, "During Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's two-day visit to Iraq this week with her British counterpart, Jack Straw, the two leaders said the coalition supported the Shiites' right to choose Iraq's next prime minister because of their majority status in the country" and "went out of their way to publicly praise the Shiites' most revered religious figure, Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani." This is part of "a diplomatic push to reassure Iraq's restive Shiite majority that the U.S. supports their right to pick the country's next prime minister and is grateful for their restraint in the face of Sunni violence." The messages "underscore mounting fears of alienating the country's largest sectarian group" and seem to be "an acknowledgment of Iraq's political fragility and the risk that the country's Shiite majority may continue to sour on the U.S., drastically complicating the administration's hopes of cobbling together a unity government."

Kerry Proposes Withdrawal From Iraq Unless Government Formed. Knight Ridder (4/6, Thomma, Funk, Kuhnhenn) reports that if Congress "ever turns against the war in Iraq, analysts may look back at this week as a turning point." Sen. John Kerry "urged setting a May 15 deadline to withdraw U.S. troops unless Iraq forms a unity government, and even if Iraq does form a government, Kerry urged complete American withdrawal by year's end." At the "same time, three Republicans in the House of Representatives endorsed a resolution calling for a robust and lengthy congressional debate on Iraq. While they're far short of the votes needed to force such a debate, a coalition of 40 anti-war activist groups is mounting a national campaign to drum up public pressure behind the resolution." The developments "suggest that anti-war politics could be intensifying - and that Washington may be catching up with anti-war sentiment across the country."

In a separate story, Knight Ridder (4/6, Kuhnhenn) reports Democratic leaders "in Washington have long worried that taking a stand against the war or calling for early withdrawal would label them weak on national security. But Kerry, in an interview with Knight Ridder, said that the stand he's calling for is 'tough' and necessary." Kerry is "scheduled to speak further about his proposal in a speech Thursday from the Senate floor." Kerry's position "already was getting good reviews in liberal blogs, a reception that Kerry seemed to anticipate."

The Washington Post (4/6, A20, Balz, 744K) reports Kerry "outlined a series of deadlines yesterday for withdrawing most U.S. forces by the end of the year and called for increased diplomatic pressure by the Bush administration to compel Iraqi leaders to take responsibility for the future of their country." In calling "for strict deadlines for drawing down forces, Kerry joins several other Democratic lawmakers, including Rep. John P. Murtha (Pa.) and Sen. Russell Feingold (Wis.), in challenging Bush's contention that timetables will only strengthen the opposition and lead to possible defeat for the U.S. mission." Kerry's proposals "drew no reaction from the White House or the Republican National Committee, which one GOP official called a sign that they do not regard Kerry as someone likely to influence others in his party on the central foreign policy issue of the day."

Roberts Says Senate Probe On Iraq Intelligence Could Be Done Soon. CQ (4/5, Speck) reports the Senate Intelligence Committee "will make its best effort to finish most of the investigation into the Bush administration's use of intelligence prior to the invasion of Iraq, the panel's chairman said Wednesday." Chairman Pat Roberts said "committee staff would incorporate member comments on drafts of three of the five topics under investigation during the two-week recess beginning next week. The probe could possibly be completed by the end of the month." CQ adds a Democratic aide "familiar with the issue said he doubted the drafts would be ready by the end of the month." The aide "said the Republicans had done virtually nothing on the investigation, which began in 2004, until the Nov. 1 session. He said the committee would not agree to release a 'shoddy' report and that the issues were 'more complicated than expected.'"

Air Force Releases Video Of Predator Strike On Insurgents. The CBS Evening News (4/5, story 5, 0:20, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "The Air Force released dramatic video today of a missile strike on Iraqi insurgents by an unmanned Predator aircraft. The pictures taken from the Predator show three men planning a roadside bomb north of Baghdad late last month. The aircraft then launches a powerful Hellfire missile, and the blast takes out the entire area. All three insurgents were killed."

April Reverses Downward Trend In US Fatalities In Iraq. The Washington Times (4/6, Scarborough, 90K) reports, "April is becoming one of the deadlier months for US troops in Iraq, perhaps dashing the hopes of commanders that a three-month-long downward trend in fatalities meant the insurgency was becoming less effective. In the first four days of this month, 16 Marines and Army soldiers have been killed by hostile fire or in accidents, about half the total in all of March." It is "threatening to erase a more favorable trend: The first three months of this year experienced a 25 percent decline in the number of US deaths, a drop the military credits to a more robust Iraqi security force and to better armor protection."

Insurgent Propaganda Video Said To Show Burning Of US Helicopter, Dead Pilot. An Iraqi insurgent group has released a video that purports to show the dead pilot of an American helicopter shot down in Iraq. NBC Nightly News (4/5, story 2, 2:15, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) reported, "One military official in Iraq says he is outraged by this video, while Pentagon officials admit the video does appear to be authentic. The video -- complete with music soundtrack -- is poor quality but appears to show the burning wreckage of a US Apache helicopter. Shouting 'Allahu Akbar' – Allah is the greatest – enemy fighters are also shown dragging the body of at least one man across the ground." The video "was posted on the Internet today by a militant Islamic group, the Mujahadeen Shura Council, with ties to al Qaeda in Iraq and its leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi." The Washington Post (4/6, A20, Anderson, 744K) also reports the story.

Marines Find Counterinsurgency, Community Relations Goals Can Conflict. The New York Times (4/6, Cloud, 1.19M) reports that in the town of Husayba, "Last August, under daily attack from car bombs and mortars, the Marines took down the only bridge over the Euphrates River for miles around. Now they are trying to rebuild it." Marines said that without the bridge, "insurgents and foreign fighters can no longer infiltrate as easily into this town near the Syrian border in western Anbar Province, the heavily Sunni Arab area that has formed the heart of the insurgency. But Iraqis who live on the river's northern bank grumble that they have no easy way to get to town to buy and sell goods or to see the doctor." The "shifting priorities illustrate the trade-off between combat and reconstruction that the American military is still grappling with, but especially in remote regions like this one, where the Iraqi government is still almost nonexistent."

Charges Dropped Against CBS Cameraman For Allegedly Recruiting Insurgents. The CBS Evening News (4/5, story 7, 0:15, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported an Iraqi court yesterday "dismissed charges against an Iraqi cameraman who was working for CBS News when he was arrested one year ago. 26-year-old Abdul Ameer Younis Hussein was accused of trying to recruit fighters for the insurgency but no evidence was ever produced."

Saddam Remains Defiant Under Cross Examination. Prosecutors yesterday cross-examined Saddam Hussein in his trial for the execution of 148 Shiites in the town of Dujail. Saddam's defense sought to shift the focus to the abuse of prisoners at Abu Ghraib prison by American troops. The story was covered by each of the networks in full segments. ABC World News Tonight (4/5, story 5, 1:55, Kerley, 8.78M) reported, "Saddam admitted ordering the execution of 148 Shiites in the city of Dujail after an attempt on his life there. When asked why it took only two days to review that case, he said the execution order was within his power as president. 'I take responsibility, good or bad.' But Saddam wouldn't admit that more than two dozen teenagers were among those killed. Prosecutors displayed the identification cards of some of the boys, as young as 13." One of Saddam's lawyers "started waving some of the infamous pictures from Abu Ghraib prison, shouting, 'This is torture. This is what the Americans did.'"

The CBS Evening News (4/5, story 6, 1:35, Dozier, 7.66M) reported, "Alone in the dock, Saddam Hussein veered from arrogance to annoyance, waging a verbal battle with the judge and prosecutors." Saddam "barked that the IDs were fake and in turn accused the current interior ministry of torturing and killing thousands of Iraqis." But NBC Nightly News (4/5, story 3, 2:05, Hattori, 9.87M) said Saddam looked "relaxed and confident," and "talked almost casually in court today about ordering the deaths of 148 Shiite men and boys in 1982." Saddam "again played to the media and his supporters, accusing the court of complicity with the current interior ministry, which has been accused of allowing death squads to go after Saddam loyalists."

USA Today/AP (4/6) describes Saddam as "at times sharp and combative, but often relaxed or even smiling," while the New York Times (4/6, Wong, 1.19M) emphasizes the former dictator "admitted Wednesday that he had signed an order of execution for 148 men and boys with only a cursory glance at the evidence against them." The testimony "appeared to bolster the case of the prosecution." The Washington Post (4/6, A20, Finer, 744K) and Los Angeles Times (4/5, Daragahi, 958K) run similar reports.

Paper Trail Said To Link Saddam To Kurdish Massacres. The CBS Evening News (4/5, story 6, 1:35, Dozier, 7.66M) reported Saddam "is now facing even tougher new charges. The tribunal accused him of committing genocide against Iraq's Kurds in the north, killing tens of thousands in a 1988 campaign to obliterate any villages that supported Kurdish rebels." There's "a bloody paper trail showing chain of command."

Iraqi Bloggers Seen As Valuable Source Of Information. The Wall Street Journal (4/6, Dreazen, 2.11M) reports Baghdad dentist Zeyad A.'s blog, Healing Iraq1, "has become a primary source of information on Iraq's daily deterioration for readers around the world. An agnostic of Sunni descent, Zeyad has written of friends manning impromptu neighborhood-watch patrols and religious leaders being murdered and dragged through the streets by mobs. He has also posted photos of uniformed Iraqi police driving through the streets in cars emblazoned with photos of radical Shiite clerics." With Western reporters "increasingly limited in their ability to travel around Iraq, bloggers like Zeyad, the young Iraqi woman known as Riverbend, and the brothers behind the Iraq the Model site -- who were invited to the Oval Office to meet President Bush -- offer readers details of the conflict rarely available in the mainstream foreign media."

Miss Iraq Pageant Held In Baghdad. ABC World News Tonight (4/5, story 6, :25, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "In Baghdad, they held a Miss Iraq pageant today. But even something as innocuous as a beauty contest can be dangerous. There are no pictures of the pageant because it was closed to the public and photographers. Security was tight. There's a single photo of the winner, 23-year-old Tamar Goregian. Nine of the contestants backed out of the pageant at the last minute, apparently afraid of offending hard-line Islamists."

US Official Says Pakistani, Afghan Cooperation Key To Defeating Taliban. The AP (4/6, Pennington) reports Richard Boucher, US Assistant Secretary of State for South and Central Asia, said "Pakistan and Afghanistan must cooperate to defeat the 'common enemy' of the Taliban and Islamic extremists that control the shared border." Boucher's comments "follow weeks of tensions between the two countries — both key allies in Washington's war on terrorism — over militant infiltration along the rugged frontier."

Air Force Seen As Adapting To Terrorist Tactics, Guerilla Warfare. The Wall Street Journal (4/6, A1, Jaffe, 2.11M) reports that for "most of its 59-year history, the Air Force has focused on building bigger bombs and faster planes that could reach beyond the front lines and destroy an enemy's critical infrastructure." But as the "swift toppling of Saddam Hussein has gotten bogged down in the long slog of battling an insurgency, the Air Force is shifting its emphasis. One hot new project in the service these days: a bomb designed to limit damage, not expand it." The "focused-lethality munitions" will "kill insurgents hiding in an urban building without injuring people next door. The story of this unusual bomb is just one example of how the Iraq war is triggering changes throughout a U.S. military coming to grips with the shadowy 21st century wars against terrorists and guerrillas."

Administration Outlines Plan To Rebuild Nuclear Weapons. The Los Angeles Times (4/6, Vartabedian, 958K) reports the Bush Administration yesterday "unveiled a blueprint for rebuilding the United States' decrepit nuclear weapons complex, including restoration of a large-scale bomb manufacturing capacity." The plan "calls for the most sweeping realignment and modernization of the nation's massive system of laboratories and factories for nuclear bombs since the end of the Cold War." The Administration "wants the capability to turn out 125 new nuclear bombs per year by 2022, as the Pentagon retires older bombs that it claims will no longer be reliable or safe." But "the administration blueprint is facing sharp criticism, both from those who say it does not move fast enough to consolidate plutonium stores and from those who say restarting bomb production will encourage aspiring nuclear powers across the globe to develop weapons."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former Enron Officials Testifies Warning Memo Was Seen As "Office Gossip." The Houston Chronicle (4/6, Flood) reports, "An outside lawyer for Enron told jurors today that he and a colleague spoke to 11 people in a month-long review of the accounting scandal warnings from Sherron Watkins and decided, shortly before the company's implosion, that there was no need for further investigation." The Chronicle continues, "Max Hendrick III, a partner at Houston law firm Vinson & Elkins, characterized much of former Vice President Watkin's now famous warning memo to Ken Lay as 'office gossip' and told the jury he thought they did a thorough and professional job looking at her complaints about Enron accounting and hedging vehicles called the Raptors." The Chronicle adds, "In a slow-moving day, Hendrick was one of two lawyers to testify for the defense in the conspiracy and fraud trial of ex-Enron Chairman Lay and ex-CEO Jeff Skilling. The jury also heard from Jim Derrick, Enron's former general counsel, who explained some of the legal and risk procedures in place at the company and his surprise that ex-CFO Andrew Fastow got around them and stole from Enron. … But Hendrick was on the stand much of the day, going over the investigation Derrick and Lay initiated to examine the allegations Watkins put forth shortly after Skilling resigned in August 2001. Watkins warned of an impending accounting scandal and especially focused on Fastow's side dealings and the Raptors."

Bloomberg (4/6, Calkins) reports, "Defense lawyers presented Hendrick to cast doubt on Watkins' testimony that Lay was skeptical about her accounting warnings and he hired Vinson & Elkins to do a 'bogus' investigation instead of a comprehensive probe. … The government alleges the executives hid billions in debts and losses in off-the-books partnerships created by former Chief Accounting Officer Andrew Fastow to do Enron-related deals. Fastow has pleaded guilty to fraud in connection with some of those deals and faces 10 years in prison."

The Washington Post (4/6, Ahrens) reports, "James Derrick, former general counsel for Enron, was brought by the defense to detail the measures that the company kept in place to prevent accounting fraud and suspicious deals. … Derrick testified that Skilling 'wanted a rigorous set of controls focused on a transaction that would reveal a hidden risk and, after identification, it would have to be evaluated in a way that the board of directors had approved of. Only when it went through all of those steps should a deal in fact be able to be done.' … On prosecution cross-examination, Derrick was pressed on Fastow's 'LJM2' partnership, an outside company that sought to buy Enron's wind-energy assets. … Of Fastow, Derrick testified: 'First, I was around Mr. Fastow for a number of years . . . when we were thrown together at various Enron events. In addition, my sense was that Mr. Fastow was regarded [within the company] as extremely able and extremely bright and later, as he became chief financial officer, Mr. Fastow received--outside of Enron, through various publications--he was being applauded as, in my impression, as a very good chief financial officer.'"

The Wall Street Journal (4/6, McWilliams, Emshwiller) reports, "Mr. Hendrick defended the four-week inquiry while admitting his own reservations about a broader probe. The 2001 inquiry concluded that a deeper investigation wasn't necessary. The defense says the review shows that Mr. Lay seriously pursued the allegations raised four months before Enron collapsed into bankruptcy-court protection. … Mr. Hendrick testified for the defense to rebut testimony by Sherron Watkins, a former Enron vice president who said she had warned Mr. Lay that August the former energy giant might 'implode in a wave of accounting scandals.' Her letter to Mr. Lay also urged a review of related-party transactions by 'objective experts in the fields of securities law and accounting.' But his descriptions appeared to lend support to the prosecution's characterization of the probe as narrow and weak."

Skilling Set To Testify. USA Today (4/6, Farrell) reports, "In what could prove to be the decisive juncture in the government's trial of the two men accused of perpetrating a giant fraud at Enron, former CEO Jeff Skilling is expected to take the stand in federal court here today to testify on his own behalf." USA continues, "The 52-year-old defendant, who said Wednesday that he's been 'waiting four years for this,' will likely tell jurors what he told congressional investigators in 2002, that up until the moment he decided to step down from his job in August 2001, Enron was a solid, profitable company, not the fly-by-night operation its detractors claimed it was. … The stakes couldn't be higher. Prosecutors from the Enron Task Force have accused Skilling and Enron founder Ken Lay of conspiring to hide the company's true financial condition from investors and analysts. In fall 2001, after revelations that former Enron chief financial officer Andrew Fastow made millions of dollars in illicit profits from transactions between the company and a series of private partnerships he controlled, the company's stock price tanked, and Enron eventually filed for bankruptcy-court protection."

The Washington Post (4/6, D1, Johnson) reports, "Skilling built a reputation for bluntness and impatience with people he deems intellectually inferior. His lawyers hope to turn those traits into an asset when he takes the witness stand as early as Thursday." The Post continues, "Defense lawyers say they will not try to dissuade Skilling from his characteristic outspokenness when he begins testifying in his fraud and conspiracy trial. Instead, they will attempt to convince jurors that a man so unfiltered that he once used a profanity to describe a stock analyst who questioned him could never have lied so successfully and for so long about the health of his business." The Post adds, "On the surface, Skilling could hardly be more different than his fellow defendant…Lay. Lay was the genial diplomat who charmed employees and business partners. Skilling, on the other hand, rarely backed down from a fight. Both men stood near the pinnacle of success in early 2001, when they unfurled a banner proclaiming their drive to make Enron the world's leading company. Within months, the energy trader collapsed, along with their reputations."

WSJournal Says Memo On Corporate Prosecutions Should Be Challenged In Court. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (4/6, 2.11M) says, "At a pre-trial hearing in the KPMG case in New York last week, federal Judge Lewis A. Kaplan suggested that a three-year-old Justice Department policy on corporate prosecutions might be unconstitutional. He was referring to the now famous Thompson memo, which in 2003 rewrote Justice guidelines on when to indict entire firms in criminal investigations. … Justice could alter or eliminate the Thompson memo by the stroke of a pen, but it is unlikely to do so until its legitimacy is challenged in court. If Judge Kaplan's reaction in the KPMG case is indicative, that day may not be far off. And a good thing too."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Judge Denies US Request To Make Secret Arguments At Libby Trial. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (4/6, Yost) reports US District Judge Reggie Walton "barred prosecutors in the CIA leak case Wednesday from making arguments that would be kept secret from the defendant," Lewis "Scooter" Libby. "Walton said the government may in some cases present the court the actual classified information that Libby wants for his defense without letting the defendant and his lawyers see it. The judge would then determine whether some of the deletions or substitutions that the government is making are proper."

Doyle's Arrest Prompts Hearing To Examine DHS Hiring Practices. Brian J. Doyle, DHS' deputy press secretary, was arrested Tuesday night on charges that he used a computer to seduce a child. According to the Polk County Sheriff's Department's Doyle revealed his position with DHS during the investigation. The Washington Post (4/6, A13, Londoño, Hsu, 744K) reports the arrest "has triggered a congressional inquiry into hiring practices and security clearance policies at the department." Rep. Peter T. King, who has scheduled a hearing for May 18, asked, "What if the person on the other end had been a member of al-Qa'ida or a similar terrorist organization and used this information to blackmail Mr. Doyle?" Polk County Sheriff Grady Judd said that "his office rushed the investigation" due to security concerns, adding, "we didn't know how much access to sensitive information he had or who else he was chatting to."

The Hill (4/6, Tiron) reports King said he is "concerned that DHS's security-clearance procedures and controls on misuse of electronic equipment do not meet the standards of other national-security agencies." The Subcommittee on Management, Integration and Oversight "was scheduled to examine DHS hiring and other personnel issues, including security clearances, on May 18. Now the subcommittee will examine Doyle's case in particular, King said."

USA Today (4/6, Hall, Copeland, Koch, 2.31M) reports Doyle "was stripped of his security clearance, suspended without pay and held without bail Wednesday." DHS spokesman Russ Knocke said the agency "is cooperating fully with the ongoing investigation. We take these allegations very seriously."' Judd said yesterday that Doyle had 'confessed.'"

On CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 (4/5, Meserve), Dr. John Deirmenjian said that Doyle may have said that he worked at DHS to "impress" the girl, or to try to "show her that he is someone of authority, somebody of security, that might lead a child to be more comfortable with him." Meserve: "DHS' embarrassment in this incident is compounded by the fact that the department itself hunts down child internet predators." Julie Myers, assistant secretary of US Immigration and Customs Enforcement, was shown saying, "It's terrible if there are allegations against a public official, but wherever they are, if they're doing this against children, we're going to find them and we're going to prosecute them."

In an article appearing on at least 90 news websites yesterday, the AP (4/6, Jordan) reports Doyle's arrest "raised doubts about the ability of an agency responsible for safeguarding the country to ensure the security credentials of its own people." The AP notes, "Homeland Security also oversees an Operation Predator unit, which investigates child predators and pornographers."

The Los Angeles Times (4/6, Timiraos, 958K) reports Dennis Murphy, Doyle's former supervisor, said, "There's not a person I know who doesn't like him." The Times adds, "Doyle is the second department official recently arrested. Frank Figueroa, 49, who oversees Immigration and Customs Enforcement operations in Florida, has pleaded not guilty to charges that he exposed himself to a girl at an Orlando mall last year."

Scripps Howard (4/6, Hoffman) describes Operation Predator as "a high-priority Department of Homeland Security program that does battle against those who prey sexually on children. Now, with the arrest Tuesday night of a department deputy secretary, at least two of the agency's own top personnel stand charged with just such offenses. 'It hammers home the fact that these individuals can be anywhere,' said John Shehan, of the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, which works closely with Homeland Security's Immigration and Customs Enforcement bureau."

The story was covered by each of the networks last night in full segments, though none mentioned the upcoming House hearing. ABC World News Tonight (4/5, story 3, 2:15, Thomas, 8.78M) reported Doyle's "arrest is particularly painful for Homeland Security officials, who say they have made child exploitation a top priority."

The CBS Evening News (4/5, story 4, 2:25, Attkisson, 7.66M) reported, "Investigators say Doyle couldn't have been more brazen, giving out his title, calling from the office, even sending a photo showing his Homeland Security ID." Adding "insult to injury, it wasn't even the Feds who found Doyle, though he was right under their noses. It was the local Polk County, Florida, Sheriff's Office."

NBC Nightly News (4/5, story 4, 2:40, Williams, 9.87M) reported it was "another shocking example -- a spokesman for the Department of Homeland Security, Brian J. Doyle, was put on unpaid leave today after being charged with preying on a child through online sexual conversations."

CNN's The Situation Room (4/5, Blitzer) reported, "Doyle appeared Wednesday in a Maryland courtroom via closed- circuit television. He has confessed and for now is being held without bond."

The New York Times (4/6, Janofsky, 1.19M) reports that Doyle "refused extradition to Florida" Wednesday, his lawyer claiming that he "needed time to discuss the case with Mr. Doyle and would 'most likely' return to ask the court to release Mr. Doyle to allow him to turn himself in to the authorities in Florida, where he would be formally charged." The Washington Times (4/6, Taylor, 90K) reports, "Montgomery County State's Attorney Douglas F. Gansler said that although he has authority to try the case, he would rather see Mr. Doyle extradited. 'In Florida, he's looking at a minimum of 17½ years in prison,' Mr. Gansler said. 'No one would get that in Maryland.'"

In a related story, USA Today (4/6, Hall, Kornblum, 2.31M) reports Doyle's arrest "was the product of increasingly aggressive policing of sex crimes on the Internet, according to police and children's advocates." Justice Department "funding for the…Internet Crimes Against Children (ICAC) program increased from $2.4 million in 1998 to $14.5 million this year. … ICAC-related arrests tripled from 564 in 2003 to 1,597 in 2005." USA Today adds, "It's unknown whether the increase in arrests means more teens are being victimized or just that more predators are being caught."

Grand Jury Convened To Consider Charges Against McKinney. Fox News' Special Report (4/5, Wilson) reported, "A grand jury has been convened to determine whether charges will be brought against Cynthia McKinney who allegedly assaulted a Capitol Policeman with her cell phone." For Chief Terrance Gainer, "this is about protecting the 1,500 uniform men and women who has the responsibility of protecting the US Congress. He wants to see Representative McKinney arrested. … Gainer says the only reason that McKinney was not arrested immediately after the incident is because the constitution does provide some members with some protection in some cases from arrest while Congress is in session. Police just wanted to run everything past the lawyers."

Grand Jury Subpoenas Farr Aide. The grand jury has subpoenaed a House aide who allegedly witnessed the incident between Rep. Cynthia McKinney and a Capitol Police officer last week. Roll Call (4/6, McArdle) reports, "A staffer for Rep. Sam Farr (D-Calif.) has been subpoenaed to appear before a grand jury in the case. Farr's office confirmed on Wednesday night that one of its staffers had received the subpoena but offered no other comments on the matter. Reached on Wednesday night, a lawyer for McKinney said he did not know of any grand jury hearing being convened in the case." Roll Call adds that the subpoena indicates that the US Attorney's Office "is moving quickly to determine what occurred in the highly publicized altercation at a Longworth House Office Building security checkpoint."

Black Caucus Trying To Stay Out Of McKinney Controversy. CQ (4/4, Poole) reported, "Earlier in the day, a senior member of the Congressional Black Caucus, Rep. John Conyers Jr., D-Mich., said he and other caucus members were trying to stay out of the controversy, in part because they wanted it out of the headlines. … The way McKinney has handled the episode has put her fellow Black Caucus members in an awkward position. One veteran caucus member said privately that McKinney's outspokenness has not endeared her to many of her colleagues. Others said that they, too, have been stopped by Capitol Police, and any problems have been dealt with quickly and quietly."

Lewis Urges McKinney To "Lower The Temperature." Meanwhile. Rep. John Lewis has told McKinney to stop making political hay out of the incident. The Hill (4/6, Hearn) reports that Lewis said he told McKinney that she "needs to lower the temperature and stop holding the press conferences," adding, "I don't think it had any impact because she is still going on all the TV shows."

House Republicans Said To Be "Grateful" For McKinney Controversy. The Washington Post (4/6, A2, Milbank, 744K) reports in its "Washington Sketch" column that Democrats "were just beginning to dream about the possibility of taking control of the House in the November elections as GOP unity collapsed over spending, immigration, Iraq and lobbying scandals," when Rep. Cynthia

McKinney has her altercation with a Capitol Police officer. House Republicans "were grateful for the gift." The Post adds, "Arriving on the floor yesterday afternoon for a series of votes, McKinney had earned pariah status. Several of her Democratic colleagues turned their backs or moved away when she approached, carrying her infamous cellphone and a bottle of Dasani water. Ignored by several colleagues, she stood alone in the back of the chamber for several minutes until rescued by Reps. Bernard Sanders (I-Vt.) and Maxine Waters (D-Calif.)."

Boehner Urges GOP Not To Pile On McKinney. Roll Call (4/6, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column, "At Wednesday's weekly closed-door House GOP Conference gathering, House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) urged his colleagues to quit piling on Rep. McKinney. His message basically was: Why murder someone who has already committed political suicide?"

DeLay Says McKinney Should Be Charged With Assault. Rep. Tom DeLay was asked on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (4/5) about the allegations against Rep. Cynthia McKinney. DeLay said, "These Capitol Police officers are not tour guides. They are protecting the capitol against all kinds of threats. For a member of Congress to treat one of these officers, who showed great courage, because he didn't know who she was. He didn't know that she didn't have a bomb strapped to her. He was doing his job, and for her first punch him and assault him and then afterwards, instead of apologizing to him, accuse him of racism is beyond the pale. It is outrageous and needs to be charged. And I hope she will be charged with assault and the House needs to deal with it." DeLay added that McKinney "has a long history of blaming everything on the color of her skin. She plays the victim card, the race card. She and her father and others are even anti-Semitic. She has that reputation."

Primary Foe Criticizes McKinney Over Altercation. Roll Call (4/6, Whittington) reports that DeKalb County Commissioner Hank Johnson (D), who is running against McKinney "is speaking out about the recent controversy involving her altercation with a Capitol Police officer." Johnson said Wednesday "that the situation should have been handled differently. 'There's no excuse for hitting a police officer,' he said." Johnson "charged that while McKinney is talking about hairdos and inappropriate touching, the needs of the residents of the Atlanta-area 4th district are being ignored. 'We don't feel like we've been getting our fair share of federal dollars,' he said. … Asked about the issue of racial profiling -- which McKinney has asserted is the underlying problem -- Johnson said he believed the officer was doing his job. 'I think the Capitol Hill police department has a job to do and their job is to protect the Members of Congress, the workers…their responsibility is to protect and to defend those people,' he said."

Two FEMA Employees Plead Guilty To Soliciting Katrina Relief Bribes. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (4/6, Johnson) reports, "Two Federal Emergency Management Agency employees pleaded guilty Wednesday to soliciting kickbacks from a food contractor during post-Katrina recovery efforts. Andrew Rose and Loyd Holliman each pleaded guilty in federal court to soliciting and receiving bribes as public officials, prosecutor Jim Letten said." The AP notes, "The contractor reported the offer to the FBI."

US Drops Death Penalty Push For New York Murder Scheme Suspects. The AP (4/6, Hays) reports, "Federal prosecutors are no longer seeking the death penalty against four defendants in a murder conspiracy case involving a notorious crack kingpin with ties to the rap music industry." The AP continues, "In a two-line letter sent to the judge Tuesday, prosecutors wrote they would still seek death for the chief defendant, Kenneth 'Supreme' McGriff, at a trial to begin April 17 in Brooklyn. … The new position was authorized by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, prosecutors said." The AP adds, "It is an abrupt reversal from prosecutors' previous position. They had notified the judge on March 22 that Gonzales had endorsed the death penalty against all five defendants. … Attorneys for McGriff demanded an explanation in a letter to U.S. District Judge Frederic Block that was dated Tuesday. They have asked the judge to deny the death notice for McGriff because it was filed too late. A hearing was set for Friday."

Louisiana Computer Executive Charged With Bribing Connecticut Official. The AP (4/6) reports, "The president of a Louisiana computer company has been charged with paying $3,000 to former state Sen. Ernest Newton for his promise to help her win lucrative contracts, federal officials said Wednesday." Jeanette Foxworth "faces multiple charges of conspiracy, wire fraud and making a false statement, U.S. Attorney Kevin O'Connor said. … The indictment also alleges Foxworth lied to FBI investigators during a January interview." The AP notes Newton "was sentenced in February to five years in prison after pleading guilty to unrelated charges of bribery and other crimes."

Officials Warn Of Online Sexual Predators. NBC News (4/6, Costello) reports, "Across the country, pedophiles have left the playgrounds and arcades for the anonymity of the Internet. One in five kids surveyed by the Justice Department reports receiving unwanted sexual solicitations online." NBC continues, "Catching online predators often involves finding those who traffic in online porn. Two-thirds of the offenders who committed any Internet sex crimes also possessed child porn. And the FBI reports online child porn cases have surged 2,000 percent since 1996. … 'The Internet provides an individual, a perpetrator, a potential criminal, the opportunity to hide their identity,' says the FBI's Raul Roldan. 'So they work in a covert environment — so they believe!'"

DOJ Will Not Reimburse Ohio Officials For Sniper Probe. The AP (4/6) reports, "The Justice Department does not have the money to reimburse Franklin County (OH) for the sheriff's investigation into a series of highway shootings, a federal official wrote in a letter to an Ohio congresswoman. … 'We recognize that the prolonged and difficult investigation placed a financial strain' on the sheriff's office, Assistant Attorney General William Moschella told U.S. Rep. Deborah Pryce in a letter dated Friday. 'However, there are no new funds available for the department to reimburse' the county." The AP adds, "Franklin County requested Justice Department grants to cover about $700,000 in overtime paid by the sheriff's office during the pursuit of the shooter who terrorized central Ohio for five months in late 2003 and early 2004, according to county e-mails obtained by The Columbus Dispatch. Charles McCoy Jr., arrested in March 2004, was sentenced to 27 years in prison for his guilty plea last August to involuntary manslaughter and other charges for shooting at cars and buildings on and around central Ohio highways. The one person hit in the shootings died. … The federal government reimbursed Maryland, Virginia and Washington, D.C., for their pursuit of highway snipers in 2002. … The Washington-area shootings are different because federal investigators were involved and an FBI analyst was killed during the spree, said Rob Nichols, a spokesman for Pryce."

US Indicts MS-13 Gang Members On Racketeering Charges. The Washington Post (4/6, B1, Castaneda) reports, "Even after he was locked up on state murder charges in Prince George's County, an alleged leader of the violent street gang Mara Salvatrucha continued to direct the criminal activities of his group by sending letters to a female member of the gang, according to a federal indictment unsealed yesterday." The Post continues, "Gang members also watched a videotape of a Prince George's police detective who had been investigating them and discussed killing him, the indictment alleges. And members killed a young man to prevent him from cooperating in a federal probe of the gang, according to the indictment." The Post adds, "The 53-page indictment, made public in U.S. District Court in Greenbelt, supersedes an indictment handed down by a federal grand jury last August that charged 19 young men with federal racketeering counts. … That indictment was the first racketeering case brought in Maryland against the gang, signaling an increased federal involvement in local efforts to combat it. The gang, also known as MS-13, is comprised primarily of Salvadoran immigrants with some other Central Americans and Mexicans and began showing up in the Washington area in the late 1980s. … The indictment released yesterday provides additional details about the gang's alleged activities and what police say are its efforts to derail investigations and intimidate witnesses. It charges that members committed six murders and attempted four murders in suburban Maryland from April 2003 to June 2005."

Former Strip Club Owner Testifies He Bribed Nevada Commissioners. The AP (4/6, Ritter) reports, "A former striptease club owner who pleaded guilty to bankrolling political corruption in Las Vegas and San Diego testified Wednesday that he bribed three county commissioners in return for votes benefiting his Nevada businesses. 'I didn't consider them campaign contributions,' said Michael Galardi, using the word 'bribes' when asked by a federal prosecutor to characterize cash he said he paid to former Clark County Commissioners Erin Kenny, Dario Herrera and Mary Kincaid-Chauncey. … But he stumbled when his estimate of a total of 15 to 20 payments to Herrera and Kenny conflicted with his earlier statements to prosecutors and the FBI that payments were monthly. He estimated he gave Kincaid-Chauncey up to $85,000 over the years." KLAS-TV Las Vegas (4/5, Allen) adds, "Galardi testified he first bribed an elected official 16 years ago by giving $10,000 to Las Vegas city councilman Frank Hawkins to settle a licensing issue for his Cheetahs strip club. In the mid-90s, Galardi says he paid city councilman Michael McDonald $5,000 a month for a series of years for political influence. Galardi also claims that Clark County Deputy District Attorneys Gary Guymon and Craig Hendricks received free drinks, lap dances and sexual favors whenever they visited Cheetahs."

The Las Vegas Sun (4/6, German) reports, "Former federal prosecutor Charles Kelly, a criminal defense attorney who has been following the Las Vegas trial closely, said the use of Galardi as a witness should be creating 'a great deal of anxiety' for the government. … 'The jury is entitled to know what type of person they're being asked to trust,' Kelly said. 'If they built a case around a guy who lied about the extent of his influence, they could end up holding a wet paper bag with the bottom having fallen out.'" The Sun notes, "Prosecutors have presented hours of court-approved wiretaps to support Galardi's testimony. And they have called witnesses, such as former County Commissioner Erin Kenny, who pleaded guilty to taking bribes from Galardi, to corroborate his accusations against Herrera and Kincaid-Chauncey. … Galardi's testimony also stood up well enough to obtain federal corruption convictions last year in San Diego of his bagman, former Commissioner Lance Malone, and two San Diego councilmen - although a judge later tossed out the brunt of the case against one councilman."

Missouri Man Sentenced To Prison For Attempt To Fence Rembrandt Forgery. In "Arts Briefly," The New York Times (4/6, 1.19M) reports, "A fake sheik who sold a fake Rembrandt has been sentenced to five months in federal prison and five months of home confinement, The Associated Press reported." Majed A. Ihmoud of St. Charles, Mo., "pleaded guilty to conspiring to commit mail fraud for dressing as a sheik and posing as a member of the Saudi royal family in a scheme to sell a forgery of Rembrandt's 'Man With the Golden Helmet' for $2.8 million. The buyer turned out to be an undercover F.B.I. agent."

FBI Agents Search Staten Island Mansion For Mob Murder Evidence. The New York Times (4/6, Rashbaum, 1.19M) reports, "Acting on information provided by a cooperating witness, F.B.I. agents yesterday searched for evidence of a mob murder inside a Victorian mansion on a Staten Island hilltop, according to several law enforcement officials. … The F.B.I. lab will conduct forensic tests on evidence removed from the building, one of the officials said. The search was by members of the F.B.I. squad that investigates the Bonanno crime family, several officials said, but they would not disclose the identity of the suspected victim." The Times notes, "A spokesman for the agency, James Margolin, confirmed the search but would not say whether agents had concluded that a murder had been committed in the mansion." The New York Daily News (4/6, Eaberg, Moore, 729K) adds, "The feds also called Ron Victorio, an architect who oversaw recent renovations at the Victorian landmark to get a list of people who had worked on the project. … FBI officials would not identify who they believe was slain and stashed in the mansion, saying the victim's family had not been told of the informant's tip." The New York Post (4/6, Messing, 624K) notes FBI spokeswoman Christine Monaco said, "We executed a search warrant as part of a criminal investigation." She "refused further comment, but other sources said the agents…showed up at the historic 130-acre compound just before noon. … 'It's an evidence search,' said one well-placed law-enforcement source, who declined to name the suspected victim or to specify when the slaying occurred."

"Mafia Cops" Trial Jurors End First Day Of Deliberations. Newsday (4/6, DeStefano) reports, "The jury in the 'Mafia Cops' trial ended its first day of deliberations Wednesday in Brooklyn federal court without reaching a verdict on whether ex-NYPD detectives Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa were double agents for the mob. Deliberations are to continue Thursday morning." The New York Daily News (4/6, Marzulli, 729K) notes, "There were notes from the jury asking for readback of testimony from chief witness Burt Kaplan on the murder of James Hydell. The panel also revisited a retired cop's testimony where cassette tapes featuring mob informant John (Otto) Heidell were stored in the 63rd Precinct." The New York Post (4/6, Haberman, 624K) also reports on the deliberations, under the headline "'Mob-Cop' Jury Requests 'Pipe' Line."

New York Couple Plead Guilty To Bilking New York Archdiocese. The New York Daily News (4/6, Zambito, 729K) reports, "A husband-and-wife team yesterday admitted ripping off the New York Archdiocese for

$2 million. Vincent Heintz and Nanette Melera ran a nonprofit agency, Institutional Commodity Services, that bought Communion wine, food and automobiles for the archdiocese at bulk-rate prices. FBI agents say the Briarcliff Manor couple shook down vendors for payoffs in a scheme that dated to 1996."

Husband Of Illinois Congresswoman Sentenced To Five Months For Check Kiting. The Chicago Tribune (4/6, Higgins, Cohen, 643K) reports, "Robert Creamer, a top Democratic consultant and the husband of U.S. Rep. Jan Schakowsky (D-Ill.), was sentenced Wednesday to 5 months in prison for using bad checks to prop up his struggling consumer group and for a tax charge." Creamer "also must serve 11 months of home confinement," but "he escaped the longer sentence of 30 to 37 months suggested by federal guidelines," and prosecutors are considering an appeal. The Tribune notes Creamer attorney, Ted Poulos "said Wednesday in court that the prosecution had a 'seriously myopic view' of the case and had wrongly lumped Creamer in with the fraud defendants who take a bank's money and run." But Assistant US Attorney Joseph Ferguson "countered that Creamer should have known that his methods were illegal after FBI agents interviewed him in 1992. Yet he repeated the same crimes, repaying money only after the scheme was discovered, Ferguson said." The Chicago Sun-Times (4/6, Korecki) also reports on Creamer's indictment.

California Clinic "Capper" Pleads Guilty To Medicare Fraud. The AP (4/6) reports, "A 'capper' who recruited patients for a Lemon Grove clinic that allegedly billed Medicare for services never performed pleaded guilty Wednesday to insurance fraud and offering illegal medical kickbacks." Alicia Leonardo "is one of nine people, including the clinic's operators, to be indicted in what prosecutors called a $2 million conspiracy." The AP notes, "The FBI began investigating the clinic…in November 2004 after learning that 'cappers' were allegedly paying patients to visit, prosecutors said. Deputy District Attorney Rita Hanscom said patients who had difficulty with the English language were recruited from casinos, trolley stops and other locations."

Wisconsin Bank President Charged With Fraud. The Monroe (WI) Times (4/6, Gray) reports, "Former First National Bank president Mark R. Hardyman is expected to plead guilty May 1 to one count of bank fraud." According to the federal complaint unsealed yesterday, "Hardyman altered documents, altered bank records to mislead federal auditors, granted customer loans which were not authorized or approved by the board, falsified minutes of board meetings, solicited false financial statements from a bank customer to make it appear the customer was more creditworthy to bank examiners and auditors and caused a false entry to be made in FNBB records which indicated that a particular customer had received a $2.2 million wire when Hardyman knew the wire had not been received." The Times notes that the FBI, FDIC, IRS and Agriculture Department investigated the case.

Two New Yorkers Plead Guilty To Multi-State Investment Fraud. The Lynchburg News & Advance (4/1, Waugh) reported, "A Lynchburg resident was the biggest victim in an investment scheme devised by five New York men." Dennis Testa and Nicholas Lanza "pleaded guilty Friday to bilking seven people in at least five states out of more than $400,000 by tricking them into purchasing non-existent stock for a company in New York, according to a release from the U.S. Attorney's Office." The News & Advance notes, "The charges came out of an FBI investigation that began in 1998 involving an individual who posed as a legitimate stockbroker in New York and made calls to investors in other states, including Virginia." Assistant U.S. Attorney Nancy Healey "said she thought the FBI did a great job on the case and said she hopes people learn something from the case. 'I think this case shows that people who think that they can get away with crime outside their home area are mistaken.' she said.

Duke Lacrosse Coach Resigns Over Rape Scandal. ABC World News Tonight (4/5, story 4, :30, Vargas) reported Duke University lacrosse coach Mike Pressler has resigned, "three weeks after three of his players were accused of raping a woman. Also today, Duke's president cancelled the rest of the season for the team. He cited what he called the sickening and repulsive contents of a warrant to search the house where the rape allegedly took place. Police are awaiting the results on DNA tests on nearly every player on the lacrosse team."

The CBS Evening News (4/5, story 8, 0:20, Mitchell) reported Durham, North Carolina, police "pressed their investigation of rape allegations against three players."

DOJ_NMG_0025762

NBC Nightly News (4/5, story 5, 0:20, Williams) reported, "No charges have been filed in this case as yet but the scandal has caused racial and class tensions in the community."

CIVIL LAW:

Waxman Seeks Details Of Pentagon Contract. The Los Angeles Times (4/5, Roche, 958K) reports, "Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles) asked the Pentagon on Wednesday to release details of a $47-million Air Force contract that an inspector general's report has found was awarded improperly." Waxman "cited the March 3 report, which says the no-bid contract to a subsidiary of Engineered Support Systems Inc., or ESSI, came as a result of intervention by Darlene A. Druyun. … Waxman noted in his letter that President Bush's uncle, William H.T. Bush, was an ESSI shareholder when the vehicle maintenance contract was awarded."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Osceola, FL, Rejects DOJ Voting Rights Settlement Offer. The Orlando Sentinel (4/6, Sashin) reports, "Osceola County commissioners have rejected the first settlement offer in the federal government's voting-rights lawsuit against the county." The Sentinel continues, "Justice Department attorneys last month proposed a meeting to discuss a possible settlement. It suggested Osceola could switch from its countywide election format to five or six district seats and satisfy the Voting Rights Act. … 'We remain open to considering alternatives that accomplish that objective and meet the interests of the county and its officials,' Justice Department attorney Tim Mellett wrote in a March 13 letter to Osceola's outside counsel, Vincent Fontana." The Sentinel adds, "The County Commission met in closed session March 27 to discuss the matter, and the county attorney's office planned to send an official response late Tuesday. … Fontana also disputed a Justice contention that it had created a district model in which one of five had a majority of Hispanic citizens of voting age. In such a district, the New York attorney said, eligible Hispanic voters still would be in the minority. … The five county commissioners now reside in different districts but are elected countywide. In its July lawsuit, the Justice Department says Osceola could give Hispanics more influence at the polls by switching from countywide or "at-large" elections to five equal-size districts, one of which would be majority Hispanic, to counter what it claims has been a history of bloc voting by non-Hispanics against Hispanic candidates. … The county contends Hispanics would be worse off under the Justice Department's plan because they would have influence in only one or two districts, Fontana said."

FBI Joins Investigation Of Assault On Baylor Muslim Student. KWTX-TV Waco (4/5) reports, "The FBI is working with the Baylor University Department of Public Safety to investigate an attack on a female Muslim student on the campus, Baylor Police Chief Jim Doak announced Wednesday evening. 'We have had an FBI representative on campus with us throughout the day today and will continue to work with the agency as this process goes forward,' Doak said." KWTX notes that the student "required emergency room treatment for a dislocated shoulder and contusions." Baylor University (4/5, Fogleman) adds on its Web site, "Formally known as a Domestic Police Cooperation investigation, the FBI is partnering with Baylor DPS to lend its resources to the process of gathering and analyzing leads and other information related to the case."

Florida Mosques, Temples Report Rising Hate Crime Incidents. The Miami Herald (4/6, Fantz, 323K) reports, "The weekend defacing of a Muslim prayer hall and a new audit of hate crimes against Jews brought into relief the continuing threats against Muslim and Jewish houses of worship in South Florida. On Sunday, volunteers for the Islamic Center of South Florida discovered that vandals had sprayed the words 'Osama BinLeden' in yellow paint on a wall of their new school," and "the Anti-Defamation League released an audit on Wednesday indicating that hate crimes against Jews increased statewide last year, from 173 in 2004 to 199 in 2005." Additionally, "At least five incidents of vandalism in South Florida involved mosques or places of Muslim worship last year."

Growing Muslim-American TV Network To Reach 1 Million US Homes. The AP (4/6, Thompson) reports, "A first-of-its-kind Muslim-American television network launched a year ago has gone from being a premium pay channel to a basic-cable offering on several cable and satellite systems, broadening its reach from 10,000 to more than 1 million U.S. homes. Bridges TV, featuring Muslim-American lifestyle and cultural programming, also has been approved by the Canadian Radio & Television Commission to start broadcasting in Canada." The AP notes, "The Buffalo office of the FBI has taken notice and will use the network for an 'FBI Townhall Meeting' May 15, during which an FBI agent will field on-air questions and comments from Muslim and Arab-American viewers."

NASCAR Objects To Show On Anti-Muslim Attitudes. NASCAR is objecting to a planned series on the NBC newsmagazine "Dateline," about American attitudes toward Islam, claiming the series targets race fans as potential sources for harassment of Muslim-Americans. The Washington Times (4/6, Lemke, 90K) reports that the newsmagazine is "placing Muslim and Arab-American volunteers in a variety of public places, including NASCAR races, and filming their experiences in an attempt to record discrimination or harassment. … Arab-Americans were stationed in the crowd at last week's NASCAR race in Martinsville, Va., and NBC is considering doing the same at Sunday's race in Fort Worth, Texas. NBC officials said NASCAR races were only one place where Muslims would be placed."

NOPD Facing New Brutality Allegations. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (4/6, Foster) reports, "New Orleans' police department…is investigating new allegations of brutality: claims that three white officers beat up the wife of a black officer this week. The probe comes less than a week after two former officers -- both white -- were indicted on felonies in the French Quarter beating of a black retired teacher," although "two FBI agents seen helping to restrain the man were cleared of wrongdoing Wednesday, the bureau said." The victim of the alleged beating this week, Jonie Pratt, "had a black eye, a swollen forehead and a brace on her fractured left wrist," and her mother-in-law "said the injuries were inflicted after police pulled Pratt over, claiming she ran a stop sign. … The FBI said it is conducting a preliminary inquiry to determine whether the case warrants further investigation." The New Orleans Times-Picayune (4/5, 257K) reported FBI Special Agent Sheila Thorne said that the bureau has opened a "preliminary inquiry" into the new allegations. Thorne added, "Whenever we become aware of an allegation of a possible civil rights violation, we look into it to see if it warrants further investigation."

Pennsylvania County Scraps New Voting Machine Deal. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (4/5, Sherman) reports, "With just six weeks to go before the May primary, Allegheny County is scrapping a multi-million-dollar deal for electronic voting machines built by Sequoia Voting System and instead is purchasing 4,700 touch-screen machines from Nebraska-based Election Systems and Software Inc." The Post-Gazette continues, "County Chief Executive Dan Onorato made the announcement today, saying Pennsylvania Secretary of State Pedro A. Cortes told him last week that Sequoia's system likely would not be certified because of critical software problems. … That information convinced county officials to fall back on an $11.9 million deal with ES&S for the company's iVotronic unit, which resembles a bank ATM and has already received both state and federal certification." The Post-Gazette adds, "More than 20 Pennsylvania counties already have decided to purchase the iVotronic to satisfy the Help America Vote Act, a sweeping federal law that requires local governments nationwide to upgrade their voting equipment this year or face legal action from the Justice Department. … Because of the looming deadline, ES&S plans to supply each of the county's more than 1,300 voting precincts with at least one machine by the May 16 primary election, although they hope to have at least two per precinct. For the November general election, the company hopes to have all 4,700 machines in place."

Man Sues Prince George's County Police Claiming Racism. The Washington Post (4/6, B4, Londoño) reports, "An African American restaurateur from Prince George's County filed a civil rights lawsuit yesterday against the Montgomery County police department and two patrol officers alleging that he was unreasonably stopped, searched and arrested because he is black." The Post continues, "Donnell Long, a chef who owns two Largo restaurants -- Stonefish Grill and the Red Star Tavern -- was pulled over in Silver Spring on Feb. 23 as he was driving two employees home in a vehicle that belongs to a relative of one of the passengers. … Long said he was handcuffed for nearly 40 minutes by two white officers who, he said, searched the inside of his vehicle, including his trunk, without permission. … Long is seeking $5 million in damages." The Post adds, "In the late 1990s, the U.S. Department of Justice investigated allegations of racial profiling against the Montgomery police. The department agreed to keep better data on whom officers stop and why and to have officers attend diversity training courses."

Faith-Based Groups Sue Over Wisconsin Campaign. A coalition of faith-based groups has filed suit saying their First Amendment's rights of freedom of religion and expression were violated when they were not allowed to participate as recipients in a program through which Wisconsin state employees can earmark charitable donations through payroll deductions. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (4/6, Forster, 266K) reports, "The federal lawsuit by the Springfield, Va.-based Association of Faith-Based Organizations said a state committee has rejected applications from organizations that are led by people who share a religious faith. … The lawsuit challenges the procedures for determining which organizations are eligible to receive contributions through the Wisconsin State Employees Combined Campaign. The campaign, which has been run annually since 1973, allows state and University of Wisconsin employees to have charitable contributions deducted from their paychecks during a monthlong window. About 10,000 state employees participated in 2005, donating $2.8 million."

Virginia AG Sides With Boy Scouts In Lawsuit. Virginia State Attorney General Robert McDonnell is supporting a Defense Department effort to overturn a court ruling barring the Boy Scouts of America from holding its annual Jamboree at Fort A.P. Hill in the state. The Washington Times (4/6, McLaughlin, 90K) reports, "Last year, a federal court in Chicago sided with the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU), saying the Pentagon's assistance in the Scouts' Jamboree was unconstitutional because the group's 'duty to God' oath makes it a religious organization. Oral arguments are scheduled to start today in the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Chicago." McDonnell said, "This is the latest attempt by a leftist, liberal group to go after an outstanding group in the Boy Scouts of America."

DC Government To Fund PR Campaign On Statehood. The DC government is planning to fund a public relations campaign on DC statehood. This, despite a federal law barring the use of city o federal funds for such activities. The Washington Times (4/6, Doolittle, 90K) reports that the city will distribute $1 million in grants to several groups for the campaign. Grant supporters "say the law against lobbying does not apply because the money is to be used for 'education.' They say the education grant is a creative way to circumvent federal guidelines." According to the Times, "Our Nation's Capital (ONC) will receive $300,000 and the League of Women Voters (LWV) of the District of Columbia will receive $200,000 for the public relations campaign."

Universities Yielding To Wishes Of Faithful On Hiring. A front page story in the Wall Street Journal (4/6,Golden, 2.11M) reports on "the rising influence of religious groups over the teaching of their faiths at secular colleges, despite concerns about academic freedom. US universities have usually hired religious-studies professors regardless of whether they practiced or admired the faiths they researched." But "some universities are bending to the views of private donors and state legislators by hiring the faithful."

Automatic Voter Registration For High School Seniors Proposed. John B. Anderson, a candidate for president in 1980, and the chairman of FairVote, which promotes fair elections, and Ray Martinez III, who serves on the United States Election Assistance Commission, write in the New York Times (4/6, 1.19M) that "all too many young people will graduate from high school without registering to vote and without even taking a class on the basics of voting. We need a new 'leave no voter behind' policy. … We propose automatic voter registration for all high school seniors; our goal is the registration of all eligible students before they graduate." They conclude, "By improving our registration and education efforts, we will not only help protect the voting preferences of younger Americans but the long-term vitality of our participatory democracy. Let's not leave any voters behind."

ANTITRUST:

FTC Gives Antitrust Nod To Boston Scientific-Guidant Deal. The AP (4/6) reports, "Boston Scientific Corp. said Wednesday it has won antitrust clearance from the Federal Trade Commission's staff for its $27 billion acquisition of former medical devices rival Guidant Corp., but is still awaiting final approval from the full commission as well as European regulators." The AP continues, "Also on Wednesday, Guidant said its first-quarter sales dropped 6% from last year, and it expects to record more than $120 million in charges for the quarter. Guidant has suffered sliding sales because of product recalls and news that the company withheld information about the faulty devices." The AP adds, "Boston Scientific said it continues to expect its acquisition of Guidant to close around the middle of this month following regulatory clearances. … Boston Scientific said it had entered into consent agreements with the FTC staff to resolve antitrust issues. The company did not provide details on the agreements, but Boston Scientific spokesman Paul Donovan said the agreements 'do not require any material changes to the transaction.'" The AP notes, "European regulators last week pushed back the deadline they set for completing their review until April 18, although a decision could come sooner."

Wall Street Lobbying Firms Pursuing Merger. Two of Wall Street's largest lobbying groups have announced that they will pursue a merger. The Wall Street Journal (4/6, Burns, 2.11M) reports that the Securities Industry Association and the Bond Market Association "said their boards of directors voted to endorse the concept of merging. Once the details are worked out, the two boards will vote on final approval June 30, with the full membership of each group voting on the merger after that."

JP Morgan Gets FTC Approval To Buy Kohl's Card Unit. Dow Jones (4/6) reports, "J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. received antitrust clearance from the Federal Trade Commission to buy the credit-card operations of department store chain Kohl's Corp. for $1.5 billion." Dow Jones continues, "The FTC announced Wednesday that it granted J.P. Morgan early termination on Tuesday of the waiting period required by the Hart-Scott-Rodino antitrust law. … The Kohl's portfolio includes 13 million accounts with about $1.5 billion in outstanding balances. Kohl's (KSS) is based in Menomonee Falls, Wis." Dow Jones adds, "As part of the transaction, the two companies will coordinate programs aimed at spurring Kohl's sales and card use. Kohl's will continue to manage customer service, advertising and marketing for the cards."

Group Asks Judge To Keep Seattle Newspaper Dispute In Court. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (4/5, Richman) reports, "A self-styled citizens' group today asked a King County Superior Court judge not to halt courtroom proceedings over the contract binding Seattle's two daily newspapers." The P-I continues, "Halting the litigation would be a necessary step before the publishers could move their dispute into binding arbitration, as they proposed last week. They want to exclude the group, known as The Committee for a Two-Newspaper Town, from that arbitration. … But the committee, composed of citizens and union members employed by The Seattle Times and the Seattle P-I, said that such a halt would make it impossible for its own legal claims to be heard. In its 12-page motion, the committee told Judge Greg Canova that it is 'on a par with the other two parties and has an equal right to pursue litigation in this forum without (undue) delay or disruption.'" The P-I adds, "Nearly three years ago, when P-I owner The Hearst Corp. sued to prevent The Seattle Times Co. from exiting the joint operating agreement, or JOA, that has bound them since 1983, the committee argued that key provisions of the JOA violate federal antitrust law as restraints of trade."

Apple Launches Program Allowing Macs To Use Windows. USA Today (4/6, Graham, Kessler) reports that Apple Computer on Wednesday "for the first time unveiled software allowing Microsoft's Windows operating system to run on Apple's PCs. … That's a huge change for the iconoclastic PC maker, which has long shunned Windows even though it runs on more than 90% of PCs. Now Apple is moving toward the mainstream and easing its decades-long rivalry with Microsoft."

The Wall Street Journal (4/6) reports, "Yet the new capability may not be enough to persuade that most lucrative and demanding of high-tech customers -- businesses -- to switch large portions of their PCs to Macs, some corporate technology officers say."

The Los Angeles Times (4/6, Sanchez) reports, "Investors apparently viewed the program, called Boot Camp, and Apple's recent rollout of computers powered by Intel microchips as steps that will broaden the appeal of its products, which have been praised for their innovative features but account for less than 5% of personal computer sales. The rest of the market is dominated by PCs that use Microsoft's Windows programs in concert with Intel chips. … The Cupertino, Calif.-based company made Boot Camp available today on its website as a free download. After users download and install Boot Camp, they can purchase a copy of Windows and will then be able to switch between Apple's operating system and Microsoft's program every time they restart their computers, the company said."

The Washington Post (4/6, D1, Musgrove) reports that "analysts said yesterday that Apple's Boot Camp software -- which allows the Windows operating system to run on an Apple machine -- is significant for Apple because it helps change the stakes in a purchasing decision that, for years, has kept the Mac's share of the PC market under 5 percent. Boot Camp…could tempt computer buyers who had previously resisted buying a Mac."

The New York Times (4/6, Markoff) reports, "The move was greeted with exuberance even among the loyal cult of Macintosh enthusiasts who sustained Apple through many bleak years before its resurgence on the strength of its iPod music player. Its sleek machines have long been objects of consumer lust but are frequently passed over in favor of more pedestrian computers that run Windows, leaving Apple with about 5 percent of the personal computer market."

Finnish Antitrust Officials Suspect Forest-Product Price-Fixing. The AP (4/5) reports, "The Finnish Competition Authority said Wednesday it suspects three forest companies of price fixing and has asked them to respond." The AP continues, "In a statement, the agency said it began an investigation in 2004 into suspected 'forbidden price cooperation and exchange of information for the purpose of limiting competition in wood procurement' in 1997-2004, but gave no details." The AP adds, "The antitrust body has given the three forest-product companies, Stora Enso Oyj, UPM-Kymmene Corp. and Metsaliitto Osuuskunta, until mid-May to respond to the results of its investigation after which it will decide whether to pursue the case in court. … The competition authority also noted that UPM-Kymmene might receive immunity because 'it had cooperated with the FCA.'"

P&G, Coca-Cola Settle Patent Suits. The AP (4/6) reports, "Procter & Gamble Co. has settled a lawsuit against Coca-Cola Co. that claimed the beverage maker was using P&G's patented technology that adds calcium to fruit juices, the companies said." The AP continues, "The lawsuit, filed in May 2002, said Coca-Cola's Minute Maid juice division was violating P&G's 1988 patent. P&G said that it had exclusively licensed the patented technology to Tropicana Products Inc., a division of Pepsi-Co Inc. … The settlement will allow Coca-Cola to continue selling its calcium fortified juices." The AP adds, "The companies also announced settlement of another lawsuit alleging Coca-Cola was using P&G's patented preservative system in several of its products. Under that agreement, Coca-Cola will be allowed to use the technology in certain noncarbonated products. … P&G has filed a variety of such infringement suits against other companies over the years."

Grand Jury Subpoenas Acuity Brands In Wastewater Plant Probe. Dow Jones (4/6) reports, "Acuity Brands Inc. said Wednesday that it and its Acuity Specialty Products Group Inc. unit received grand jury subpoenas in March related to the Justice Department's ongoing investigation of the unit's wastewater pretreatment plant in Atlanta." Dow Jones continues "Acuity Brands, an Atlanta-based provider of lighting fixtures and specialty chemical products, said in a quarterly report with the Securities and Exchange Commission that the Justice Department had requested information regarding Acuity Specialty's management of hazardous waste at the plant. The investigation mainly concerned the unit's operation of the plant, according to the SEC filing." Dow Jones adds, "Acuity Brands said the latest subpoenas are in addition to ones the company and its unit received in August 2003 and another subpoena that went solely to Acuity Specialty last April."

US Probing BP's Pipeline Problems. The Wall Street Journal (4/6) reports, "U.S. environmental regulators are conducting a criminal investigation into BP PLC's management of pipelines in Alaska's North Slope, according to people familiar with the matter, adding to mounting regulatory scrutiny of the British energy titan's U.S. operations." The Journal continues, "These people said the investigation, which has been under way for several months by officials at the Environmental Protection Agency, was expanded to include an early March spill of an estimated 134,000 to 267,000 gallons of crude from a BP-operated pipeline at Prudhoe Bay. Alaska state conservation officials say the pipeline ruptured from internal corrosion, causing what is considered the largest oil spill ever in the energy-rich North Slope." The Journal adds, "One person familiar with the matter said the federal investigators are looking at corrosion issues on the ruptured line, as well as others in the area, to determine if BP has committed any violations of the federal Clean Water Act. The act carries criminal and civil penalties for violations, such as allowing oil to spill into a federal waterway. … The EPA probe is just the latest embarrassment for BP -- the world's second-largest publicly traded oil company, after Exxon Mobil Corp. -- and Chief Executive John Browne, who has aggressively promoted the company as environmentally friendly and socially responsible."

Administration Said To Be Muzzling Scientists On Global Warming. The Washington Post (4/6, A27, Eilperin, 744K) reports scientists "doing climate research for the federal government say the Bush administration has made it hard for them to speak forthrightly to the public about global warming. The result, the researchers say, is a danger that Americans are not getting the full story on how the climate is changing." Employees and contractors "working for the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, along with a U.S. Geological Survey scientist working at an NOAA lab, said in interviews that over the past year administration officials have chastised them for speaking on policy questions; removed references to global warming from their reports, news releases and conference Web sites; investigated news leaks; and sometimes urged them to stop speaking to the media altogether. Their accounts indicate that the ideological battle over climate-change research, which first came to light at NASA, is being fought in other federal science agencies as well."

Senate Democrats Criticize EPA Nominee, Bush Air Pollution Proposals. CQ (4/5, Tollefson) reports Senate Democrats yesterday "hammered the Bush administration's choice to manage the EPA's air and radiation program, questioning his role in developing industry-friendly pollution regulations." William L. Wehrum, "the acting administrator for air and radiation since August 2005, was nominated to fill the position permanently. Republicans on the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee generally praised him for several years of work as counsel to the previous program administrator, Jeffrey Holmstead." But Democrats "and the committee's ranking minority member, James M. Jeffords, I-Vt., used the nomination to criticize several White House air pollution initiatives." An aide said Sen. Barbara Boxer "plans to put a hold on the nomination if it moves to the Senate floor, an aide said. A panel vote is expected on the nomination at the end of the month."

Study Suggests Power Companies Can Limit Greenhouse Gases. The Christian Science Monitor (4/6, Clayton, 61K) reports the nation's "big power companies are creating smaller amounts of gases that cause smog and acid rain than they were 15 years ago, but they're producing more greenhouse gases. That's the conclusion of a joint industry-environmentalist report, released Wednesday, which offers a ray of hope in the battle against global warming." David Hawkins, climate director of the Natural Resources Defense Council, said, "What this report shows is that with careful government regulation, companies can lower the pollution coming from power plants smokestacks - and we should be doing this with greenhouse gases like carbon dioxide, too." The Monitor adds "that conclusion remains anathema to many within the electric-power industry, who prefer a voluntary approach."

NYTimes Criticizes USDA Mad Cow Testing Policy. In an editorial, the New York Times (4/6, 1.19M) says, "Late last month, Creekstone Farms, a Kansas-based beef company, sued the United States Department of Agriculture" because the agency "won't let it" test all of its cattle for mad cow disease. The USDA argues that "100 percent testing would not guarantee food safety because mad cow disease can be hard to detect in younger cattle." The Times called the agency's argument "nonsense -- as if we were more likely to be safe by following a testing plan based on statistical modeling of the beef supply than by actually testing all the cattle." However, it conceded that "private testing is not the way to go in the long run." Instead, the Times says the USDA "should test every cow that goes to slaughter."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mueller, Gonzales Defend ChoicePoint Software Contract. The AP (4/6) reports FBI Director Robert Mueller, testifying yesterday before the justice subcommittee of the Senate Appropriations Committee, "defended…the bureau's decision to award a $12 million contract to a Georgia-based consumer data collection company that recently paid a record fine for a security breach." Sen. Patrick Leahy criticized the contract with ChoicePoint and "called the company 'the poster child for lax identity protection.'" Mueller "said the FBI's five-year agreement…was for software 'that will help analysts do their job. It's not a data package.'" IDG News Service (4/5, Gross) notes Leahy "blasted the DOJ and the FBI division," but Attorney General Alberto Gonzales defended the contract, saying that it "represented the best value for the FBI, and it covers software and technology, not data services."

The Washington Post (4/6, A11, Eggen, 744K) reports that at the hearing, Sen. Richard Shelby "and Democratic colleagues sharply questioned Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales about an administration proposal to slash assistance to local law enforcement by more than $1 billion in fiscal 2007. In unusually candid remarks, two key agency heads -- FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III and Drug Enforcement Administration chief Karen P. Tandy -- acknowledged that the proposed cuts could limit enforcement efforts and discourage local police from offering assistance in terrorism inquiries and other federal investigations. … Gonzales said the cuts were a 'difficult decision' that reflected a desire to focus on the most effective uses of taxpayer money."

Shelby Questions Sentinel Contract With Lockheed Martin. IDG News Service (4/5, Gross) also reports Sen. Richard Shelby "questioned the FBI's investments in new technology following its decision in March 2005 to abandon a case-management project after spending $170 million over four years. … 'This new technology is critically important, but I remain concerned that the FBI does not possess the necessary project management expertise, nor do I feel that the FBI has applied lessons learned from past mistakes,' said Shelby. FBI Director Robert Mueller said the new contract with Lockheed Martin will face performance audits from investigators within and outside the FBI. … 'We have learned from the mistakes of the past, and we are intent on bringing this home,' he said."

Closing Arguments Made In Drug Trial Of Baltimore Police Detectives. The Baltimore Sun (4/5, Dolan, 296K) reported that in closing arguments Tuesday at the corruption trial of Baltimore detectives William King and Antonio Murray, Assistant US Attorney Charles Peters "called the detectives 'animals' for preying on victims in a 'jungle' of West Baltimore -- a characterization that drew an impassioned rebuke from the officers' attorneys." Defense lawyer Russell Neverdon "described the officers as scapegoats inside a department that had been buffeted by the changing policies of several police commissioners in recent years." The Sun notes, "Relying on testimony from cooperating witnesses and hours of secretly recorded conversations from the FBI, prosecutors charged King and Murray last year with conspiring to rob and extort cocaine, heroin and marijuana -- as well as drug-related proceeds -- from suspects they pursued on city streets in late 2004 and early 2005."

DEA Said To Be "Retooling" For Age Of Terrorism. In U.S. News and World Report (4/5) David E. Kaplan writes, "Remember the war on drugs? It's still there, folks, but the narcs have taken a back seat to the war on terrorism. Not to miss a beat, the Drug Enforcement Administration, the 11,000-strong counternarcotics force under the Justice Department, is retooling for the age of terrorism and focusing more of its efforts on what it calls the drug-terror nexus. … Using techniques honed against Latin American drug lords, the DEA is employing a 'kingpin' strategy to take out traffickers tied to terrorist groups."

ACLU Claims Ethnic Bias In Georgia Meth Case. The New York Times (4/6, Zernike) reports the ACLU "is accusing federal prosecutors of ethnic bias in a sting last summer in which South Asian owners of convenience stores in Georgia were charged with selling household ingredients that could be used to make methamphetamine. In a legal filing, the ACLU said yesterday that prosecutors ignored extensive evidence that white-owned stores were selling the same items to methamphetamine makers and focused instead on South Asians to take advantage of language barriers.

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (4/6, Ahmed) reports the ACLU "said that while more than 80 percent of stores in the area where 'Operation Meth Merchant' was conducted are owned by whites or other ethnic groups, 23 of the 24 stores targeted by the investigation are owned by South Asians. All but five of the 49 convenience store clerks and owners who were indicted are South Asians, many with the last name Patel."

The Rome (GA) News Tribune (4/6) reports, "In Wednesday's motion — which asks for the dismissal of charges against 'Operation Meth Merchant' defendants Falgun Patel, Sudhirkumar Patel and Satishkumar Patel based on racially biased investigation practices in the case — the ACLU cited statistics indicating that more than 19 percent of all South Asian-owned convenience stores were indicted in the case as compared to 0.2 percent of all stores owned by whites or other ethnic groups."

Man Accused Of Making Meth At His Florida Home. The Miami Herald (4/5, Staff) reports the DEA "has arrested a man who investigators say ran a methamphetamine lab from his Hollywood (FL) home. The Herald says Gene Lawrence Cruncleton is accused of attempting to make meth, according to DEA agent Jeannette Moran. Police "found ammonium nitrate in the house…and evidence that methamphetamine had recently been cooked in the home."

The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (4/6, Haas) reports authorities say they "seized several handguns, high-powered rifles and shotguns, about a thousand rounds of ammunition, meth ingredients and possible bomb-making chemicals from Cruncleton's home on Tuesday. Police evacuated three-dozen homes in the neighborhood Tuesday afternoon because the chemicals used to make meth are highly explosive."

Former St. Louis Police Officer Convicted In Heroin Conspiracy. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (4/5) reports former St. Louis police officer Antoine Gordon "was convicted Wednesday of helping a heroin ring by using a law enforcement database to try to identify a possible informer. … A Drug Enforcement Administration wiretap caught Gordon in an incriminating conversation with the ringleader, Adrian Minnis, in June 2004, prosecutors said. Minnis pleaded guilty Friday."

11 Indicted For Importing Knockoff Cigarettes. The Philadelphia Inquirer (4/6, Wood) reports New Jersey authorities "announced yesterday that they had snuffed out a ring that imported tens of thousands of cartons of [cigarette] knockoffs from China. Seven people from Philadelphia and four from South Jersey were charged in indictments after a two-year undercover operation in Atlantic City and South Jersey. Three New Jersey troopers infiltrated the organization and bought more than 32,000 cartons of cut-rate Marlboro Lights, 25,000 doses of the nightclub drug ecstasy, and more than 125 pounds of potent marijuana." The Inquirer says several law enforcement organizations took part in the investigation, including the DEA.

Florida AG Withdraws From Case Following Dispute Over Steroid Questions. The AP (4/5) reports Attorney General Charlie Crist "has decided his office will no longer represent current and former Corrections Department officials in a federal lawsuit filed by Florida State Prison inmates who allege that guards sprayed them with chemical agents. The issue came to a head after an attorney in Crist's office filed a motion stating those officials should not have to answer questions about their steroid use. … 'We are not representing these guys if they will not answer questions about their use of illegal drugs,' Crist said."

Washington Post Profiles Barry Bonds, MLB Steroid Investigation. In a lengthy article, The Washington Post (4/6, A1, Fainaru) profiles Barry Bonds and Major League Baseball's investigation of steroid use and writes, "Steroids help build muscle and speed recovery but have been banned by most professional sports leagues because they also are known to cause undesirable side effects, create an uneven playing field and are illegal without a prescription. Bonds's current predicament -- chasing Ruth and Aaron while under investigation for using drugs to help him hit home runs -- at times borders on the surreal."

Pakistani Man Said To Have Regrets Following Drugs-For-Arms Plot. The San Diego Union-Tribune (4/5, Thornton) reports the Pakistani man who "received 57 months in prison for his part in a conspiracy to trade heroin and hashish for shoulder-launched Stinger missiles and cash" had "declined to make a statement before Monday's sentencing in federal court in San Diego. But his lawyer, John Cotsirilos, said his client had expressed 'regret' in a letter to the court." Saifullah Durrani and two others "have admitted they negotiated a deal in Hong Kong in September 2002 to sell heroin and hash and to accept as part of the payment four Stinger missiles that they would then sell to al-Qaeda or the Taliban."

FL: Dwight Gooden Gets 1-Year Prison Sentence Following Cocaine Use. The New York Times (4/6, Stout) reports Dwight Gooden, the former pitching star who "squandered much of his talent with self-destructive behavior off the field, was sentenced to a year and a day in a Florida state prison yesterday for violating his probation by using cocaine. Gooden, 41, was sentenced by Judge Daniel L. Perry in state circuit court in Tampa, Fla., after expressing remorse over his latest run-in with the law," according to prosecutor Pam Bondi.

The AP (4/5) reports Gooden "was serving three years' probation for speeding away from police during a drunken driving traffic stop last year when he failed a drug test and acknowledged to a probation officer that he had used cocaine. He chose the prison sentence over reinstatement of his probation, which would have meant the prospect of five years behind bars if he violated it again."

Hyde Says Drug War "Adrift" In Western Hemisphere. House International Relations Committee Chairman Henry Hyde says the war in drugs is "adrift" in the Western hemisphere. The Washington Times (4/6, Seper, 90K) reports that Hyde says the Bush Administration "is claiming a 'premature victory' in the war against Colombian drug traffickers and diverting its focus to the Middle East." Hyde said, "I am concerned our efforts to fight the scourge of illegal narcotics seem to be adrift in our hemisphere," adding, "After five years of Plan Colombia, we are finally seeing success in our war on drugs. Unfortunately, these positive results seem to have lulled the administration into a false sense of security, causing it to claim premature victory in Colombia and turn its attention to the Middle East and elsewhere." Mr. Hyde's comments "are contained in a letter last week to Rep. Dan Burton, Indiana Republican and chairman of the International Relations Western Hemisphere subcommittee."

Teen Drug Use Declining. A national survey on drug and alcohol use says drug use has edged downward among teens nationwide, with the largest decreases occurring in the Midwest and South. USA Today (4/6, Leinwand, 2.31M) reports, "Children 12 to 17 years old who reported using any illicit drug in the past month declined from 11.4% to 10.9% between 2002 and 2004. States that saw the biggest declines in teen drug use were Illinois, Nebraska, South Dakota, North Carolina, Virginia and Vermont. The study, to be released today by the U.S. Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration (SAMHSA), combines data from interviews of 135,500 people in 2003 and 2004 as part of the National Surveys on Drug Use and Health."

US, Venezuela Said To Be Finishing Anti-Drugs Agreement. The Miami Herald (4/5, Bachelet) reports Mari Pili Hernández, who heads the North American department in the Venezuelan foreign ministry, "said Tuesday her country was willing to start regular talks with the Bush administration, routinely attacked by President Hugo Chávez, on issues that include drug trafficking and energy matters. … Officials on both sides have been putting the finishing touches to a drug-trafficking agreement that would allow the Drug Enforcement Administration to resume its activities in Venezuela, Hernández said."

FBI, US Marshals Searching For Louisiana Prison Escapee. CNN.com (4/5, Frieden) reports, "FBI agents and U.S. marshals are searching for a convicted murderer who escaped Wednesday from a federal prison in Louisiana." Richard McNair "is serving a life sentence in the U.S. penitentiary in Pollock, Louisiana, after being convicted of murder and burglary in North Dakota. … Authorities are still investigating how McNair escaped, said Jane Haschemeyer, a U.S. Bureau of Prisons spokeswoman."

IMMIGRATION:

US Targets Immigration Fraud With Creation Of Task Forces. The AP (4/6, Yen) reports, "The government said Wednesday it was stepping up efforts to stem illegal immigration, creating task forces in 10 cities to crack down on those who commit fraud to enter and stay in the country. The AP continues, "The task forces bring together investigators from several agencies, including Immigration and Customs Enforcement and the Justice and Labor departments, to prosecute growing cases of immigration fraud. The fraud includes the use of fake Social Security cards, drivers licenses and passports." The AP adds, "Investigators also will seek to arrest - and deport if warranted - those who lie on government applications to obtain benefits such as U.S. citizenship, political asylum or a visa, said Julie Myers, assistant secretary for Immigration and Customs Enforcement, which is headed by Homeland Security. … 'One of the lessons from 9/11 is that false identities and fraudulent documents present serious risks to national security,' said Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff. 'We must deny criminals the identification tools they need to threaten our country.' … In the last two years, the number of immigration fraud investigations has jumped 54 percent to 3,591 cases and arrests have risen from 1,300 to 1,391, officials said. They cited the growing sophistication of technology such as high-resolution digital scanners, which make it easier to produce fraudulent documents, for the increased number of cases. … The Document and Benefit Fraud Task Forces will be located in Atlanta, Boston, Dallas, Denver, Detroit, Los Angeles, New York, Newark, N.J., Philadelphia and St. Paul, Minn. It is modeled after a

Washington, D.C.-area task force coordinated by the U.S. attorney's office."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (4/6, Malone, 430K) reports on the Atlanta Task Force and notes, "Michael J. Maxwell, who quit in February as director of the U.S. Office of Security and Investigations for immigration services, is scheduled to testify today to the House Subcommittee on International Terrorism. … Among the complaints prepared for his testimony, Maxwell says that employees assigned to perform checks on would-be citizens or permanent residents were increasingly denied access to FBI crime and terrorism databases that record allegations of criminal behavior or security problems."

GOP Senators Reach Agreement On Immigration Reform. The New York Times (4/6, Swarns, 1.19M) reports, "A group of Senate Republicans reached agreement Wednesday night on a compromise proposal that they hope can garner bipartisan support and bring passage of a bill on the future of the nation's 11 million illegal immigrants. The compromise, which followed a day of negotiations, was endorsed by Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader." But "it did not have the commitment of all Republicans, much less Democrats who have backed an approach that would put nearly all illegal immigrants on a path toward citizenship." The Times adds, "As outlined by Senate Republicans late Wednesday, the compromise would place illegal immigrants in three categories: Those who have lived in the country at least five years would be put on a path toward guaranteed citizenship, provided that they remained employed, paid fines and back taxes, and learned English, a senior Republican aide said. The aide said this group accounted for about 7 million of the roughly 11 million illegal immigrants believed to be living here." Those "who have lived here for two to five years, said to number about three million, would have to leave the country briefly before reporting to an American port of entry, where they would be classified as temporary workers. … The remaining one million or so, those who have lived in the country less than two years, would be required to leave." The Los Angeles Times (4/6, Gaouette, Reynolds, 958K) says "aides" to Frist "said a majority of GOP senators would support" the deal, "ending a stalemate that threatened to prevent action on the issue." But "any bill that comes out of the Senate would have to be reconciled with a harsher measure passed by the House."

CQ (4/6, Sandler) reports Frist "filed for cloture on the carefully negotiated measure he hopes he can persuade enough Republicans to accept as an alternative to the committee measure, which would put the estimated 11 million to 12 million illegal immigrants in the country on a path to citizenship." The new plan was proposed by Republican Sens. Chuck Hagel and Mel Martinez of Florida. There also "will be a cloture vote Thursday morning on the Judiciary Committee version favored by many Democrats, although Republican unity against the minority attempt to control the floor has doomed that effort." The Washington Post (4/6, A18, Weisman, 744K) also reports that "as of last night," he vote "to break a filibuster" on that measure "appeared almost certain to fall short of the 60 supporters needed -- in large part because of the bruised Republican feelings over Reid's parliamentary tactics that have tied up the Senate for days." The Post adds that even Sen. John McCain "said he would not bow to the Democrats' tactics and vote to end debate."

The Washington Times (4/6, Hurt, 90K) headlines its story "Senate GOP To Filibuster Alien Bill," reporting "Senate Republicans will filibuster their own immigration bill today in the face of steadfast refusal by Democrats to allow amendments to the bill that many conservatives view as granting amnesty to illegal aliens." The Times adds, "As an alternative, Majority Leader Bill Frist reached an agreement last night with fellow Republicans on a new comprehensive immigration plan that includes increasing border security and a guest-worker plan," but "still does not resolve concerns about amnesty." Frist "declined to tell The Washington Times last night how he would vote on the alternative measure."

The AP (4/6, Espo) reports "the White House offered no reaction to the GOP plan, although President Bush has called for comprehensive legislation that includes steps to offer legalized status to those in the country unlawfully."

In a story that doesn't include news of the late-night deal, USA Today (4/6, Kiely, 2.31M) notes Frist yesterday had "warned colleagues that they are on course 'to leave here in a few days having accomplished nothing.'" Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois, the deputy Democratic leader, "said the Senate is approaching a 'historic' vote" and urged President Bush "to intervene." The Hill (4/6, Allen) says "Senate Republicans and Democrats loudly blamed each other for a stalemate,"

The Christian Science Monitor (4/6, Jonsson, Chaddock, 61K) sees a change in public opinion on immigrants "since the 1990s," as the public's views of Latin American and Asian immigrants have become more positive, despite concerns over the drawbacks of immigration. Both groups are seen as hard-working and committed to family. … Immigration legislation now before Congress is pulling much of this ambivalence into the open. … In contrast to the debate during the 1986 reforms, the focus this year is jobs, not culture. Those who do not want to grant illegals any legitimate status are talking less about English-speaking and more about prospects for low-wage Americans. "

Bush's "Calculated Ambiguity" Said To Increase Risk Of Stalemate On Hill. In an analysis piece, the Los Angeles Times (4/6, Brownstein, 958K) says that as the immigration debate continues, President Bush "has adopted a strategy of calculated ambiguity that some worry may increase the risk of a legislative stalemate. Administration officials have been closely involved in this week's swirling Senate negotiations over proposals to rewrite the nation's immigration laws." But "in public and private, Bush and his aides have avoided a clear position on the most difficult issue dividing senators: whether to provide a clear path to American citizenship for as many as 12 million illegal immigrants in the United States -- a process critics deride as amnesty." The AP (4/6, Gamboa) reports Bush, "facing Republican divisions on immigration, urged the Senate on Wednesday to swiftly approve a comprehensive bill affecting millions of illegal immigrants now in the country. 'This is a vital debate,' he declared."

Industry Lobbyists Focus On Visas For High-Skilled Workers. The Wall Street Journal (4/6, 2.11M) reports on the importance of "the future of thousands of high-skilled foreign workers seeking admission to the country -- scientists, mathematicians, health-care workers…to the US economy. Because of the key role many of those workers play in cutting-edge businesses, industry lobbyists are pushing measures that would more than double the number of visas available to skilled workers." The Journal adds, "Employers are particularly irked by the visa system's treatment of foreign-born scientists who must leave the country after finishing their studies if a US company can't secure a visa to hire them. As it is, US-born students account for only about half the science, math, technology and engineering advanced-degree holders turned out by American universities yearly. When companies run out of US-born workers, and then can't hire immigrants, 'projects get dropped or delayed, so development is slowed down,' says Patrick Duffy, a human-resources lawyer for Intel Corp."

Federal Task Forces Address Immigration Fraud. The Washington Times (4/6, Seper, 90K) reports, "Ten federal task forces manned by law-enforcement personnel from several agencies were created yesterday to tackle the growing problem of immigration document and benefits fraud, building on the successes of a task force in Northern Virginia. 'The task forces announced today will help restore the integrity of our immigration system and will help close the loopholes that terrorists and other criminals exploit to enter and remain in the United States by fraud,' said Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty." The Times adds, "Led by U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE), the new Document and Benefit Fraud Task Forces will target, according to a press release:"

Former USCIS Official Says US Enemies Able To "Game" Broken Immigration System. The Washington Times (4/6, Dinan, 90K) reports at a hearing before a House subcommittee today, the former head of the Office of Security and Investigations at USCIS, Michael J. Maxwell, is scheduled to testify about "breakdowns at the agency," including a case in which a "suspected…foreign intelligence agent" that was born in Iraq used to rule on asylum applications. He "will tell legislators that the immigration system is being used by enemy governments to place agents in the United States." Maxwell told the Times that the US "immigration system as a whole is so broken that our adversaries can game it."

Debate Seen As Energizing "Sleeping Latino Giant." The Washington Post (4/6, A1, Aizenman, 744K) reports, "Drawing on fear of restrictive immigration proposals that have awakened hundreds of thousands of Latinos to political activism, organizers are using popular Spanish-language radio and networks of community organizations to mobilize protests in Washington and scores of other cities Monday." The demonstrations "are planned to expand on a groundswell that attracted about 30,000 largely Hispanic protesters in the District last month, about 100,000 in Chicago and as many as 500,000 in Los Angeles, a surprising display of political muscle from a population that makes up a substantial portion of the nation's 12 million illegal immigrants." Jaime Contreras, president of the National Capital Immigrant Coalition, "predicted that Monday's demonstration at the Washington Monument would draw 100,000 people and that nationally the turnout, in more than 60 cities, would number 'in the millions.'" He also said, "The sleeping Latino giant is finally awake." The Washington Times (4/6, Knott, 90K) also reports on the expected marches, and says "supporters of illegal aliens are promising to add to the mess, with a national call to boycott work, school and shopping places May 1."

Schools Banning Display Of National Flags. USA Today (4/6, Kenworthy, 2.31M) reports, "Several schools in Colorado, Arizona and California recently banned the display of national flags and the wearing of clothing with patriotic symbols as the divisive national debate over immigration has brought angry confrontations between Latino and Anglo students." The bans "have prompted protests by parents, stirred local debates over free speech and its limits, and caught the attention of civil liberties advocates."

Minority Journalists Say Certain Terms "Dehumanizing" Immigrants. The Washington Times (4/6, Harper, 90K) reports, "Three minority journalism groups are asking the American press to stop using 'dehumanizing' words when covering immigration." The terms "alien," "illegal alien" and "illegal immigrant," they say, "should be avoided, according to the National Association of Hispanic Journalists (NAHJ), the National Association of Black Journalists (NABJ) and the Asian American Journalists Association (AAJA)." The "preferred terms are 'undocumented immigrant,' 'undocumented worker' or 'economic refugee,' which the organizations consider more accurate and less offensive."

More Commentary. The Washington Post (4/6, A28, 744K) editorializes on whether illegal immigration affects US workers' wages. The Post says even "a small impact on low-wage workers is alarming, given the rise of inequality over the past 25 years. But the question is whether to address that inequality by trying to stop immigration or to go at it via progressive taxation, larger public investments designed to prevent poor kids from dropping out of high school, or some other policy tool. Given the expense and doubtful effectiveness of border walls and employer crackdowns, progressive tax and social policies seem preferable. … Taxing the 'immigration windfall' that flows to better-off Americans and passing it on to the less fortunate may be the best way to go."

Ronald F. Maxwell, a writer and movie director, writes a letter to President Bush in the Washington Times (4/6, 90K). He writes, "Perhaps you know me from my work. I wrote and directed the movies 'Gettysburg' and 'Gods and Generals.' … What is happening on the southern border is unprecedented. Not only in our own history, but in the history of the world. No country at any time anywhere has sustained the influx of tens of millions of foreigners across its borders. A wave of anti-American leftism is sweeping Latin America." He adds, "Your immigration policy is viewed as captive to the cheap labor -- big business lobby and inimical to the survival of our country. It is splitting the party and draining away support for your presidency. We who understand the vital stakes will not be placated by rhetoric or slogans. The failure to recognize this growing and deep disaffection among Republicans, conservatives, independents and, indeed, many Reagan Democrats, is, in the short run, going to lead to a monumental defeat for your party at the polls in November."

David Brooks writes in the New York Times (4/6, 1.19M) that "unions have a semilegitimate concern that large numbers of these workers lower wages for US workers. This is probably true, but the effect is so modest that after thousands of studies, reputable economists have not been able to agree upon how much wages are reduced or even if they are at all."

TAX:

IRS Concerned About Phishing Scams. NBC Nightly News (4/5, story 7, 2:10, Williams) reported, "The IRS is worried about a new scam. It's calling phishing – complete with its own unique spelling -- and it is rapidly spreading through cyberspace." NBC (P. Williams) added, "Emails like this say the taxpayer is due a refund or offer a way to check on when it will be paid. They include a link to an Internet site that appears to be the actual Internal Revenue Service webpage but it is a phony too. And here's the heart of the scam: The webpage asks for personal information, including Social Security number, credit card number, even the pin number for an ATM card. The IRS commissioner says the government would never send such a message." Mark Everson, IRS Commissioner: "We don't contact taxpayers via email. We contact them sometimes by telephone but usually in writing, so we just plain don't get in touch with somebody via email, especially on anything like refunds."

IRS Allows Tax Preparers To Continue Working Despite Violations. The Wall Street Journal (4/6, Wells) reports, "The Internal Revenue Service has allowed some tax preparers to continue to practice even though they have been convicted of crimes, suspended by state officials or failed to pay their own taxes, according to a new government report. … 'Some tax practitioners who have been convicted of tax-related crimes or whose licenses have been suspended or revoked by state authorities have not been suspended from practice before the IRS,' the Treasury Department's Inspector General for Tax Administration said in the report." The Journal continues, 'The report estimates that about 22,500 licensed tax practitioners -- some 5% -- haven't complied with their individual tax obligations." The Journal adds, "Sen. Max Baucus (D., Mont.), expressed dismay about the report, which comes on top of a Government Accountability Office report that showed widespread errors committed by commercial tax-preparation firms. … 'The government has got to do more to keep the paid tax-preparation industry clean,' Mr. Baucus said in a statement. 'I believe the vast majority of CPAs, attorneys and enrolled agents prepare people's taxes honestly and accurately, but when we find those who are not honest and accurate, the IRS needs to lower the boom.' … Cono Namorato, until recently the director of the IRS's Office of Professional Responsibility, agreed in a memo to the Inspector General that the office can make improvements in its enforcement of tax practitioners. But Mr. Namorato, who is joining a law firm, said the report didn't give the IRS sufficient credit for recent improvements."

Congress Making Progress On Dividends, Capital Gains Tax Cut Extensions. The Wall Street Journal (4/6, Mullins, 2.11M) reports that for the "first time in weeks, lawmakers appear to be making progress on a bid to extend President Bush's lower 15% tax rates on capital gains and dividends." Congressional Republicans "want to give final approval to the legislation this week so that Mr. Bush can sign the bill into law by this year's mid-April tax-filing deadline," but it is "unlikely that the bill will be able to clear both the House and Senate by week's end." Republicans "on both sides agree that the bill should extend the lower capital-gains and dividends tax rates by two years, from the end of 2008 when they are now set to expire through 2010. The budget impact of the lower rates on investments is $20 billion over five years." But they "disagreed over whether the legislation should include a popular $31 billion provision to exempt millions of middle-class taxpayers from the Alternative Minimum Tax."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Touts Health Savings Accounts In Visit To Connecticut. President Bush traveled to Bridgeport, CT, yesterday, where he touted his health care agenda, particularly his plans to extend health savings accounts. The AP (4/6, Riechmann) says the President "urged lawmakers on Wednesday to expand health savings accounts even though congressional Republicans say that is unlikely in an election year. … The Senate's top tax writer, Sen. Charles Grassley, has cast doubt that lawmakers can enact Bush's proposals to expand health savings accounts during this election year." In Connecticut, "the GOP faces two tough midterm matchups that national political analysts are watching as Republicans work to retain control of Congress." Rep. Christopher Shays, "who rode to Connecticut aboard Air Force One, is being opposed by Democrat Diane Farrell." Rep. Nancy Johnson also "faces a difficult race."

However, the Hartford Courant (4/6, Pazniokas, 206K) says Bush's visit "seemed resolutely apolitical." He "flew in on Air Force One, pitched 150 executives in a tiny theater on the virtues of health savings accounts, then headed back to Washington. By contrast, in a 2002 trip here Bush delivered a policy address to a crowd of 1,200, then made time for a $750,000 congressional campaign fundraiser." The Courant adds, "With Bush's approval rating sinking toward 30 percent, the state GOP seems uncertain how to use the president to help re-elect its incumbents, all of whom are on Democratic target lists. The closest the president came to politicking was a few kind words about Republican Gov. M. Jodi Rell and the hometown congressman, Rep. Christopher Shays, R-4th District." But "neither appeared on stage with Bush." Meanwhile, the New Haven Register (4/6, Bromage) reports Shays "introduced the president in very brief remarks, in which he called the health care crisis 'one of the greatest domestic challenges we face.'"

The New York Times (4/6, Rutenberg, 1.19M) says Shays "has not hesitated to disagree publicly with Mr. Bush, most recently saying the administration had made 'huge mistakes' in Iraq, though he has not wavered in his support for the war." Bush, "who lost Connecticut in the 2004 election, made veiled reference to such remarks on Wednesday. 'He is an independent fellow who speaks his mind,' Mr. Bush said of Mr. Shays, adding, as the crowd laughed, 'But he does so in a way that gets people to listen to him.' To Mr. Shays, he said, 'I'm looking forward to hearing your lecture on the way back to Washington.'"

The AP (4/6, Christoffersen) notes Bush "spoke to the Business Council of Fairfield County, which last month issued a report that found the number of uninsured residents in Connecticut, about 400,000, now equals the combined populations of the state's four largest cities." The report "says the state is facing a health care crisis and that health care is fast becoming an economic competitiveness issue."

The Washington Post (4/6, A10, Baker, 744K) reports that "with the White House preoccupied with rumors of further staff changes and Capitol Hill focused on the polarizing immigration debate," Bush was trying "to steer attention back to a domestic program that has largely languished in the two months since he unveiled it in his State of the Union address." The Post adds, "The president's health-care plan stood in striking contrast to the new legislation passed this week in next-door Massachusetts, which is set to become the first state to require that all residents obtain health insurance just as all drivers must have automobile insurance." Bush "did not directly address the Massachusetts plan, but he made the case for his less prescriptive approach that he said would give individual taxpayers the opportunity to make their own decisions about medical care."

UPI (4/6) says Bush delivered his health care remarks "to mixed reactions." Ron Pollack, executive director of Families USA, "a healthcare consumer advocacy group, said only the wealthy can afford to take advantage of HSAs, and they will not solve the problem of the uninsured." And Democratic Rep. Nydia M. Velázquez, ranking minority member of the House Small Business Committee, "said focusing on HSAs will not help small businesses with their mounting healthcare costs. Instead, she said, Bush should focus attention on legislation moving through the Senate that would enable small business to form insurance pools and purchase Association Health Plans."

The Yale Daily News (4/6, Mishkin) reports "President George W. Bush '68 arrived in the town of his birth on his way to a panel discussion about health savings accounts with business leaders in Bridgeport." The President's visit "came in the middle of a gubernatorial campaign that has focused heavily on the need to reform Connecticut's health insurance system." The visit also "occurred one day after the Massachusetts legislature passed a bill making it possible for all state residents to acquire health coverage." Bush, "who traveled via motorcade from New Haven to Bridgeport, passed a number of protestors who oppose the continued US presence in Iraq."

Shays In "Full Campaign Mode" To Explain His Stance On Iraq War. In what a front page story in the Washington Post (4/6, A1, Murray, 744K) sees a s a sign that Republicans are "nervous" that "the Iraq war could hurt them in November," Shays "is in full campaign mode, explaining his unbending support for the war to confounded voters." Shays "has distinguished himself as a reliably moderate House Republican. His middle-of-the-road stands on the environment, abortion and gay rights have irked many in his conservative party while affording him job security in his affluent, Democratic-leaning district. Not so with Iraq, the 'sentinel issue of our time,' as Shays describes it. He has strayed deep into loyalist GOP territory, and that could cost him his job." Shays faces "an aggressive and seasoned Democratic opponent, Diane Farrell, who lost by four percentage points when she challenged Shays in 2004 and who talks about the war at every public event."

Rifts Among House Republicans Said To Be Growing. The New York Times (4/6, Hulse, 1.19M) reports, "Fissures among House Republicans are growing ever more apparent, crystallized in the leadership's desperate search this week for votes to pass its budget." The "upheaval at the top, capped by Representative Tom DeLay's surprise decision to leave Congress, has emboldened centrists and conservatives to push their divergent views more assertively. With President Bush's approval ratings at or near their lows, the party is no longer being kept in line by the White House." And with Republicans "nationwide facing an inhospitable political climate, House members are far less motivated by party discipline than by what they believe it will take to get re-elected." Beyond the "spending plan, House Republicans have been split to varying degrees by immigration, the expansion of entitlement programs, tax cuts and, in a more limited but slowly expanding way, the war in Iraq."

Budget Vote Poses Steep Challenges For House GOP Leaders. The Hill (4/6, O'Connor) reports House Republican leaders "face unique obstacles in tackling this week's budget vote, which will be a major test for them in the wake of the decision by Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) to resign." The "political uncertainty created by the coming midterm elections, coupled with a new leadership team and a strong belief among members that the House and Senate will not reach an eventual compromise, make this year's vote tougher than most." The Senate-passed measure "added almost $9 billion in discretionary spending to the overall budget number requested by the White House. The House, by contrast, is expected to vote on a bill that matches the administration's request."

The Washington Times (4/6, Fagan, 90K) reports Republican leaders "struggled to bridge a major gap between two factions in their party that threatens to doom their budget blueprint, slated to be considered today." Conservatives "want to hold the line on spending, but the more liberal Republicans are demanding spending increases before they'll vote for the $2.73 trillion measure. The budget vote -- expected today or tomorrow -- will be the first major test for House Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican."

CQ (4/5, Dennis) reports the "most contentious budget rules changes sought by conservatives are intended to curtail earmarks by increasing transparency and boosting the power of members to challenge earmarks on the House floor. Appropriators are resisting such efforts." Among "other rules changes, members of the conservative Republican Study Committee (RSC) want to create a budget point of order to challenge earmarks on the floor."

Deficit Reduction Focused On Limited Portion Of Budget. The New York Times (4/6, Andrews, 1.19M) reports since President Bush "took office, overall federal spending has risen 33 percent, twice as fast as under President Bill Clinton and faster than any other president since Lyndon B. Johnson. But the biggest growth has come in areas that Republicans, by and large, have supported, the military, domestic security and the biggest expansion of Medicare in 40 years." The "military and so-called entitlement programs like Medicare now account for about four-fifths of the government's $2.7 trillion budget, and they are set to keep increasing much faster than inflation or the economy. Given the political realities, they are effectively off limits for now to budget cutters." With tax cuts "putting a squeeze on government revenues, almost all the battle to shrink the budget deficit is therefore focused on the less than one-fifth of government spending that goes to domestic 'discretionary' programs like education, scientific research, national parks and space programs."

Shelby, Democrats Criticize Police Funding Cuts. The Washington Post (4/6, A11, Eggen, 744K) reports a "key Republican senator, joined by Democrats, criticized the Justice Department yesterday for proposing deep cuts in assistance to local law enforcement agencies, arguing that the reductions would hamper efforts to combat terrorism, methamphetamine trafficking and other threats." At a hearing "of the Senate Appropriations subcommittee that oversees the Justice Department's budget, Chairman Richard C. Shelby (Ala.) and Democratic colleagues sharply questioned Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales about an administration proposal to slash assistance to local law enforcement by more than $1 billion in fiscal 2007." In "unusually candid remarks, two key agency heads -- FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III and Drug Enforcement Administration chief Karen P. Tandy -- acknowledged that the proposed cuts could limit enforcement efforts and discourage local police from offering assistance in terrorism inquiries and other federal investigations."

CAGW Says Earmarks To Cost Record $29 Billion. ABC World News Tonight (4/5, story 9, 2:20, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "In an annual report called the Pig Book," Citizens Against Government Waste "says Congress put almost 10,000 pet projects into this year's Federal budget. They will cost a record $29 billion, up 6% from last year." ABC (Cochran) added, "You may have heard the military had trouble finding money for body armor for troops in Iraq. But the Defense Appropriations bill does have $5.6 million for a center named for the winemaker Ernest Gallo, a center, which studies alcohol and drug abuse." Sen. McCain: "And it runs into the hundreds of millions, if not billions, of dollars that should be used for the men and women in the military and the war we're fighting." Cochran: "Also in the defense bill, $1 million for the waterfree urinal conservation initiative. And $500,000 for winter sports in Alaska, the home of Senator Ted Stevens." Congress also "approved $500,000 to build a teapot museum in remote Sparta, North Carolina."

The Washington Times (4/6, Price, 90K) reports Citizens Against Government Waste "identified 375 projects totaling $3.4 billion as the 'most egregious' examples." CAGW says "most of the projects listed in the book met at least two of seven criteria: requested by only one chamber of Congress; not specifically authorized; not requested by the president; not competitively awarded; cost greatly exceeded the president's budget request or the previous year's funding; not the subject of congressional hearings; and served 'only a local or special interest.'" CAGW says, "This year's list includes: $13.5 million for the International Fund for Ireland, which helped finance the World Toilet Summit; more than $6.4 million for wood utilization research; $1 million for the

Waterfree Urinal Conservation Initiative; and $500,000 for the Sparta Teapot Museum in Sparta, NC."

Stenholm Says His Line Item Veto Legislation Was Identical To White House Proposal. In a letter to the Wall Street Journal (4/6, 2.11M), former Rep. Charles Stenholm faults the paper for praising the Bush Administration's line item veto proposal after "vigorously" criticizing his "virtually identical" legislation in 1983. Stenholm writes "I offered an amendment that would have added expedited rescission authority as a fallback that would be available if the Line Item Veto was ruled unconstitutional. My Republican colleagues rejected my amendment, and when the line item veto was struck down the president was left without an effective tool to eliminate low-priority spending."

WSJournal Says Line Item Veto Should Be Passed This Year. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (4/6, 2.11M) responds to Stenholm's letter, noting, "The truth is that, back in 1993, we were defending the line-item veto proposal of Democratic President Bill Clinton. The 'modified' version then on offer from Mr. Stenholm was a weaker grant of Presidential authority favored by Democrats who were then in charge of Congress." The Journal adds, "As for the current effort to pass so-called enhanced rescission, we'll gladly take it over the dreadful spending status quo. … In any case, Mr. Stenholm's timely missive ought to remind Republicans that the 'modified line-item veto,' also known as enhanced rescission, has bipartisan support. With President Bush also asking for it, there's no excuse not to pass it this year."

White House To Nominate Bair To Lead FDIC. The Wall Street Journal (4/6, Schroeder, 2.11M) reports the White House is "expected to nominate Sheila Bair, an assistant Treasury secretary in the early years of the current Bush administration, to head the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp." Bair is "a professor of financial regulatory policy at the Isenberg School of Management at the University of Massachusetts Amherst."

Largely Along Party Lines, House Votes To Cap Contributions To 527 Groups. USA Today (4/6, 2.31M) reports, "The House of Representatives voted 218-209 on Wednesday to cap donations to non-profit political groups known as 527s, which raised more than $400 million in 2003-04 and were a significant factor in the presidential election." The bill "limits donor contributions to $25,000 a year for partisan voter mobilization activities and $5,000 a year for direct expenditures on federal elections." Republican "sponsors said the new bill closes a loophole." Democratic Rep. Steny Hoyer "said it was a move by Republicans to undercut groups that overwhelmingly favored Democratic causes in 2004. 'They are trying to gag their opponents,' he said." The Washington Post (4/6, A1, Edsall, 744K) reports the legislation "would benefit Republicans," and that it passed "in a virtual party-line vote." Roll Call (4/6, Newmyer) notes 18 Republicans voted against the measure and seven Democrats supported it.

The New York Times (4/6, Stolberg, 1.19M) calls the vote "a victory for Republicans in an otherwise difficult week, marked by the announcement that Representative Tom DeLay of Texas, the former Republican leader, would resign from Congress." The Times adds, "The new majority leader, Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, was terse after the vote. Asked for a comment, Mr. Boehner said, 'We won.'"

The Wall Street Journal (4/6, Rogers, 2.11M) says the bill would make 527s "subject to the same rules as traditional political-action committees, or PACs." But "to win, House Speaker Dennis Hastert first had to fight his way past both liberal Democrats and a faction in his own caucus allied with conservative editorialists who say limiting 527s is an intrusion on free speech." The AP (4/6, Abrams) notes that "during the 2003-2004 election cycle, businessman George Soros gave more than $23 million to Democratic-aligned 527 groups such as Media Fund and America Coming Together. Houston homebuilder Bob Perry contributed more than $8 million specifically to help the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth group that questioned the Vietnam War record of Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry, the Democratic presidential nominee." The Washington Times (4/6, Bellantoni, 90K) reports Rep. Patrick T. McHenry, North Carolina Republican, "said 527 groups are the equivalent of 'money laundering...on a scale that would make Tony Soprano blush.'"

McCain, House Leaders Reach Accord On Party-Federal Candidates Coordination. The Hill (4/6, Bolton) reports, "House Republican leaders have struck a deal with Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) to eliminate restrictions on coordination between national parties and federal candidates, a change in the law that would be of great benefit to the winner of the 2008 GOP presidential primary, according to congressional sources." The Hill adds, "Republican and Democratic campaign-finance experts alike believe the change would be a boon to McCain's campaign, if he wins his party's nomination in three years, an outcome that political handicappers are beginning to view as a real possibility."

GOP Leaders Take Issue With DeLay Comments. House GOP leaders say Rep. Tom DeLay's accusation that Republicans lack a vision or an agenda is unfair. The Washington Times (4/6, Fagan, 90K) reports that Ron Bonjean, spokesman for House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, "responding to Mr. DeLay's accusation yesterday in The Washington Times, said party leaders are pushing an aggressive agenda to provide economic security and homeland security." DeLay "made the accusation after announcing that he would resign from the House."

DeLay Departure Seen As Setback For Conservatives. The New York Times (4/6, Kirkpatrick, 1.19M) reports that several conservatives are calling DeLay's departure "both a setback and a warning for their movement. Many conservatives said Mr. DeLay's departure would leave a big hole in their forces in Congress. … But several prominent conservatives balked at Mr. DeLay's assertion in an interview, posted on Time magazine's Web site, that 'the conservative movement is leaderless' and that he aimed to become 'a strong leader to pull the movement together.' Some said his legal problems showed how his work incorporating the conservative movement into Washington's power structure was already carrying the movement away from its principles."

DeLay Says Democrats Are Trying To Criminalize Politics. DeLay said on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (4/5), "I think if we take each race individually and not nationalize the race, but each race individually and let each one of those Republicans talk about his vision of the future of what America will look like over the next 10 years, if he talks about winning the war on terror, protecting our borders, replacing a fair tax, holding the judiciary accountable, protecting the American family from the culture of death, I think that's the kind of thing that will create a choice between a Democrat that has no agenda, that is scared to death that the American people will find out what he believes in because they have been rejected and in that choice, we'll gain seats. I think we will gain seats." DeLay added that Democrats "have no agenda, no ideas, no solution. They are going to the courts. They're using their trial lawyer friends to drag people through the mud. It's happening to other members as we speak. They are trying to criminalize politics."

DeLay Case May Cool Desire For Partisan Redistricting. Roll Call (4/6, Duran) reports on the Texas redistricting plan which allowed the GOP to net six House seats. Experts believe that the "desire for overtly partisan redistricting could be cooled in other aspiring kingmakers now that DeLay has relinquished his leadership position and seat." The Texas case, "and the fact that three years later it sits before the Supreme Court, certainly has given state legislators pause." Former Rep. Martin Frost "said he hopes that Congressional leaders take the DeLay lesson to heart. … In the end, the Supreme Court's decision is what will determine how far lawmakers can reach for partisan gain, not what happened to DeLay, election experts agree."

DeLay Says He Admires Frank. Roll Call (4/6, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column that in an interview on MSNBC, DeLay "acknowledged something few, if any, of us ever thought we'd hear: He admires Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.), even loves him." DeLay named Frank as a "strong moral" Democrat in Congress. DeLay aid, "I respect him greatly. He's a true liberal, and he's unashamedly a liberal. And I respect that," adding, "I don't agree with homosexuality, but I still -- I am commanded to love Barney Frank." Roll Call adds, "Frank was amused by the latter part of DeLay's comments, and genuinely 'flattered' by the rest."

Novak Says DeLay's Legacy Has Been Tarnished Due To Aides' Greed. Syndicated columnist Robert Novak (4/6) writes that former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay's "greatest peril is the federal investigation of lobbyist Jack Abramoff that now has moved into the heart of the former majority leader's office, with two former aides pleading guilty. This has cut into DeLay's formerly solid base of support in his home district and led him to decide this week that any other Republican would have a better chance of retaining the congressional seat. But what about the greed and mendacity of some of the bright young people who worked for Tom DeLay? The suspicion is that the power politics he practiced for the public good was transmuted by those aides into their private gain. It is a stain on what the legacy should be for the most effective legislator of his time."

Slaughter Urges Colleagues To Post Report About GOP "Corruption" On Web Sites. Rep. Louise Slaughter is organizing a group of House Democrats to post her report alleging Republican "corruption" on their web sites. The Hill (4/6, Hearn) reports that Republicans say the report "is too political to appear on such sites and that doing so amounts to a violation of House rules. Less than a month ago, House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.)

removed the report from her House website after Republicans said it violated House rules that ban political documents from being distributed at taxpayer expense." Slaughter "began approaching members on the House floor several weeks ago to build support for posting the report, 'America for Sale: The Costs of Republican Corruption,' on multiple congressional sites."

Taxpayer Funding Of House Democrats' Retreats Questioned. House Democrats have spent hundreds of thousands of dollars of taxpayer money on the party's annual retreats amid a dispute with Republicans over whether House rules allow them to do so. Roll Call (4/6, Pershing) reports, "Neither party has ever asked the ethics committee for official written guidance on the subject, and the panel has never ruled publicly either way or told Democrats to stop. House rules do explicitly prohibit the expenditure of House funds for unofficial purposes, so the question turns on whether party retreats are 'official' or 'political' events. Under House rules, they cannot be both." If the party retreats 'are considered unofficial rather than official events, then House rules would prohibit the use of any House resources, including leadership office funds, to pay for them."

Talks Between FAA, Air Traffic Controllers Stall. The Washington Post (4/6, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "Contract talks between the Federal Aviation Administration and the air traffic controllers union collapsed yesterday. The FAA declared the negotiations at an impasse, which allows the agency to turn the dispute over to Congress. … Marion C. Blakey, the FAA administrator, said the agency would send its last, best offer to congressional leaders by today. Congress will have 60 calendar days to intervene in the dispute. If Congress takes no action, the FAA will be free to impose the terms of its proposal."

Cheney To Throw First Pitch At Nationals' Opener. The AP (4/6) reports Vice President Dick Cheney "will throw out the ceremonial first pitch at the Washington Nationals' Major League Baseball home opener next week, the team said Wednesday. The Nationals' first home game of the season is Tuesday afternoon against the New York Mets."

NYTimes Criticizes Delay Of Social Security, Medicare Reports. An editorial in the New York Times (4/6, 1.19M) criticizes the White House for missing the deadlines for the government's 2006 annual reports on Social Security and Medicare, calling its explanation that the reports are being held, pending action by the Senate on President Bush's nominees for two of the programs' six trustees "lame." The Times adds, "It's unlikely that the report on Social Security is much changed from last year. It's very likely that the Medicare report will show deterioration in the program's financial condition, and it would be shocking if it did not detail the crippling costs and disastrous rollout of the prescription drug benefit. … Holding up the reports seems like an attempt to hide the truth."

WSJournal Says Justice Kennedy Is "Open For Intellectual Rent." An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (4/6, 2.11M) says, "Supreme Court Justice Anthony Kennedy lashed out at our humble profession last week, castigating editorial writers whom he said frequently 'misinterpret' the Court's reasoning, according to an article in Monday's Washington Post. … While nominated as a conservative by Ronald Reagan, Justice Kennedy has proven on the High Court that he is open for intellectual rent. … Thus it is no surprise that the judicial left is already warning Justice Kennedy that he'd better join the Court's liberal big four -- or else." The Journal adds, "As Justice Kennedy's complaint last week suggests, the judicial left knows exactly what it's doing in singling him out. Liberals seem to think they won't be able to intimidate new Justice Samuel Alito and Chief Justice John Roberts. Which is why liberals will continue to treat Justice Kennedy as if he's the pigeon in one of B.F. Skinner's behavior-modification experiments."

OTHER NEWS:

Stock Rise, Lifting Nasdaq, S&P To Five-Year Highs. NBC Nightly News (4/5, story 6, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street today stocks finished higher. The Dow was up almost 36 points [to close at 11,239.55]. NASDAQ was up more than 14 points on the day [to close at 2,359.75]." USA Today (4/6, Shell, 2.31M) reports it was the Nasdaq's "best finish since a 2425.38 close on Feb. 16, 2001." USA Today also reports, "Edging up ever closer to a fresh multiyear high was the Standard & Poor's 500, which gained 5.63 points, or 0.4%, to 1311.56, its best close since May 21, 2001 -- and less than 2 points away from a five-year high. The benchmark index has now gone 774 days without a 10% correction, its fourth-longest stretch." The Wall Street

Journal (4/6, Patterson, 2.11M) and Washington Post (4/6, D3, 744K), among other newspapers, also report the stock numbers.

Speculation Said To Be Driving Oil Prices Higher. The CBS Evening News (4/5, story 3, 2:05, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Also coming off a year of record profits, despite their own hurricane damage, are America's oil companies. For those of us who buy their product, the price continues to rise. Gasoline is up 35 cents in the past six weeks to a nationwide average of $2.59 a gallon." CBS (Orr) added, "After a winter slump, $3 a gallon gas is back. Some of the usual suspects are to blame. But there is another bogeyman behind the higher prices: Energy traders cashing in on fears over supply disruptions are bidding up the price of oil." The "retired chairman of ExxonMobile has said energy traders add as much as a third to the cost of oil. That amounts to $20 worth of speculation in every $60 barrel of crude."

Drug Makers Intensify Lobbying Expenditures In States. The drug making industry is increasing its political spending in state capitals as states pass laws to change how drug makers do business. The Washington Post (4/5, A2, 744K) reports, "In an extensive analysis of lobbying records, the nonpartisan Center for Public Integrity reports that the drug industry spent more than $44 million on lobbying state governments in 2003 and 2004, and $8 million on candidates for state offices. The Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America (PhRMA) was the most active lobbyist, spending more than $4.5 million in the states. Four other major companies, Eli Lilly and Co., GlaxoSmithKline Inc., Pfizer Inc., and Johnson & Johnson, each spent more than $3 million in the period. The trade association and 14 major drug companies together accounted for 80 percent of the state capital lobbying on drug issues."

Canadian Online Pharmacies Forced To Retool. Canada's online pharmacy industry is beset by problems that have cut into sales and forced many smaller pharmacies out of business. The New York Times (4/6, Krauss, 1.19M) reports, "The industry has been obliged to retool into a far more global enterprise in which the surviving Canadian pharmacies must now either buy or become partners with pharmacies in Europe and Asia to find scarce drug supplies, improve their profit margins and protect themselves from potentially hostile Canadian regulators." The Times adds that "the most serious test has been the new Medicare drug insurance benefit, Medicare Part D, that thousands of older Americans are seeing as potentially a better option."

Student Sues GWU Over Self-Endangerment Policy. The CBS Evening News (4/5, story 9, 3:15, Mitchell) reported, "The American College Health Association says suicide is the third leading cause of death among college students. Each year, an estimated 1100 students will take their own lives." CBS (Dow) reported on the case of George Washington University student Jordan Nott, who sought treatment for depression at the university hospital and was then barred from campus. GWU's "endangering behavior policy forbids actions of any kind that imperil or jeopardize the health or safety of anyone, including one's self. Many colleges have similar guidelines, including mandatory withdrawals. What's not known is how often they are used." Nott sued to challenge the GWU policy.

DC To Institute New Post-Incarceration Inmate Inmate Health Care Program. The Washington Post (4/6, Levine) reports, "The D.C. jail will become one of the first correctional facilities in the country to provide inmates with medical care that will follow them once they are no longer behind bars." The Post continues, "The program will offer men and women incarcerated in the city's main detention center continuity of primary and specialty care after they are released. The approach, modeled on a successful project in central Massachusetts, was announced yesterday by Mayor Anthony A. Williams (D) and other District officials. … 'It's a very innovative, dynamic and comprehensive approach to the provision of inmate medical care,' said the city's new corrections director, Devon Brown." The Post adds, "The jail has had a long history of deficient health care. From 1995 until 2000, medical and mental health services there were operating under an expensive, court-ordered receivership that ultimately improved treatment at an average cost of $11 million a year. … Under the new initiative, the nonprofit organization Unity Health Care will take over inside the jail and begin seeing the men and women there, many of whom have hepatitis C, tuberculosis or HIV. But Unity will not close inmates' files once they leave the facility. Instead, it will continue to manage their care and records through the nearly three dozen clinics, centers and other medical locations it operates across the District for the uninsured and underinsured."

Schumer Says 2006 Elections Are Referendum On Bush. DSCC chairman Charles Schumer said yesterday that the 2006 elections are a referendum on President Bush and predicted Democrats would make substantial gains this year. The Hill (4/6, Kaplan) reports that Schumer "said a unified Democratic policy agenda is 'necessary but not sufficient' to triumph this fall and predicted that if the election were held now Democrats could pick up five Senate seats. At the same time, Schumer sought to tamp down expectations for Democratic gains in November, despite the overall anti-incumbent political climate and the DSCC's money advantage."

Poll Finds Black Voters Open To Supporting Steele. A report by Cornell Belcher, a polling consultant to the DNC, says that a majority of African American voters in Maryland are open to supporting Republican Senate candidate Michael Steele and urges the party to "knock Steele down." The Washington Post (4/6, B5, Mosk, 744K) reports that the March 27 report, based on a survey of 489 black voters conducted last month, "finds that 22 percent of black voters support Steele when matched against a 'generic' Democrat."

The Baltimore Sun (4/6, Skalka, 296K) also reports on the poll, noting that the fact that Democrats are "examining the leanings of blacks early in the race shows concern." The Sun says the poll "is one attempt to answer a sensitive question being bandied about in Maryland political circles: Are Democrats more likely to prevail against Steele, the first African-American elected statewide in Maryland history, with a white congressman or with the black former congressman and national NAACP president as their nominee?" The survey "concludes that 44 percent of those polled indicated that they were persuadable when presented with Steele's campaign message, a plurality that the pollster labels 'the emerging black swing' vote."

Ehrlich Administration Predicts Voter Fraud This Fall. The Ehrlich Administration says it is anticipating widespread voter fraud this year, as Democrats take advantage of Maryland's new election law, the Washington Times (4/6, Ward, 90K) reports Paul Schurick, director of communications for Gov. Bob Ehrlich, said, "I fully expect the governor's political opponents will take advantage of the opportunities for fraud. I expect them to try to engage in organized, large-scale voter fraud," adding, "I think it will be everywhere, statewide." State Democratic Party Executive Director Derek Walker "called the accusations a 'scare tactic' and said Mr. Ehrlich is 'petrified that the more people that vote, the less chance that [he] wins.'"

Massachusetts Health Care Plan Seen As Aiding Possible Romney White House Run. Massachusetts' legislature has approved a plan to provide universal health insurance coverage that stresses personal responsibility. The plan requires no or limited premiums for low-income residents, imposes a mandate on small business owners, and increases income taxes for residents who can afford coverage but refuse to carry coverage. The issue is being portrayed as a feather in the cap for Gov. Mitt Romney, a potential 2008 candidate. CNN's The Situation Room (4/5, Greenfield) reported, "If Governor Mitt Romney decides to seek the presidency, the new universal health insurance plan that Massachusetts is close to adopting is likely to be a center piece of his campaign. Why? Because in part it fits a pattern of governor candidates who point to their state house records as a way of appealing across party lines."

The story was the lead on each of the networks last night. ABC World News Tonight (4/5, lead story, 2:40, Wiener, 8.78M) reported, "Massachusetts will become the first state in the country to require all of its residents to have health insurance." Gov. Mitt Romney: "We have found a way to get every citizen health insurance." Wiener: "With the new system, residents who make less than $9,500 a year, will get free health insurance. No premiums. No deductibles. Families with low incomes but above the poverty line will pay premiums on a sliding scale. But still, no deductibles. And for the fast majority of residents who do have health insurance, lawmakers predict that cutting the roles of the uninsured will bring down premiums for everyone."

The CBS Evening News (4/5, lead story, 2:25, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "President Clinton promised it but did not deliver, and now Massachusetts has apparently done it." The state "will require every citizen to be insured. Governor Mitt Romney pushed for the program." He "considers health coverage essential, like car insurance." Gov. Romney: "Well, when people drive a car, we insist that they have automobile insurance because we don't want have to a huge accident occur and have the other driver, or other taxpayers, pick up the bill. Well, individuals also have a responsibility." Regan: "Currently, Massachusetts spends an estimated $1 billion a year covering its half million uninsured residents." Gov. Romney: "We concluded that in fact if we took the money we're spending giving people free care who don't have insurance and instead use that money to help them buy insurance, we can keep from shifting the cost of the uninsured on to people who are already covered." Regan: "The bill takes effect in July of 2007, right around the same time that Governor Mitt Romney will be deciding whether to run for president in 2008, and you can bet health care will be a major issue in that race."

NBC Nightly News (4/5, lead story, 2:40, Taibbi, 9.87M) reported, "Simple idea, to treat people the way most states now treat cars, get insurance or else. But in Massachusetts, a first, they are talking health insurance. And the or else part of it says that if you can afford it and you don't get it, the state will make you pay." Gov. Mitt Romney, Massachusetts: "Well, if people can afford to buy insurance and they don't happen to buy it, in the first couple of years, we just tell them that they're not going to get their tax refund. In other years, we start applying a penalty to them." But "critics do see serious problems, small businesses objecting to the tax penalties for not providing health coverage for their workers and some who say the working middle class will end up paying too much to subsidize the program."

Analysts Say Other States Face Barriers To Following Massachusetts Example. On ABC World News Tonight (4/5, story 2, 1:55, Vargas, 8.78M), Washington correspondent George Stephanopoulos and medical editor Dr. Tim Johnson analyzed the Massachusetts plan. Stephanopoulos said, "There's no appetite politically to take this on in Washington right now." But can other states "meet the Massachusetts conditions? Number one, they had a $1 billion pool they already spend on the uninsured. Two, they were ready to raise more money, by putting a mandate on employers, as well. And three, they had a relatively low number of uninsured. And there's probably only a handful of states that can meet those conditions." Dr. Johnson added, "There's not much in the plan that addresses medical costs, that is the cost of those who deliver the care. And the quality of that care. And in the long run, any reform bill that does not address those two issues is really no reform at all."

Clinton Praises Romney's Efforts. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton has praised the Romney's efforts on the Massachusetts plan, noting, "To come up with a bipartisan plan in this polarized environment is commendable." The AP (4/6, Fournier) reports, "She embraced the Massachusetts measure's most striking aspect -- requiring people to purchase health insurance -- but questioned Romney's plans to eliminate a fee on companies that do not provide health insurance for employees." The AP also reports that political strategists agreed "that the legislature had handed Romney a timely political victory." Romney "now has a signature achievement on an issue that polls show is a growing concern for U.S. voters."

Massachusetts Plan Called "Innovative Social Policy." An editorial in the Washington Post (4/6, A28, 744K) calls the Massachusetts bill "innovative social policy." The Post adds, "Mr. Romney deserves credit for working with a Democratic legislature to come up with a promising plan, but not for his rhetoric. … Mr. Romney, who is considering a run for president, may be tempted to argue that his state offers a model for others. But Massachusetts began with two advantages: an unusually low percentage of residents who are uninsured and a state-backed pool of money for compensating hospitals for free emergency care that provided reformers with a ready source of funds. Moreover, it isn't even certain that the Massachusetts plan will work on its home turf."

Social Conservatives Seen As Toughest Group For McCain To Woo. The Christian Science Monitor (4/6, Feldmann, 61K) questions whether Sen. John McCain, "the early front-runner for the GOP nomination," can "maintain his image as a straight-talking maverick…even as he reaches out to religious conservatives and raises hackles on both the left and right with moves that his critics call 'unprincipled.'" The Monitor adds that social conservatives may be the toughest group for McCain to convince. Leaders "speak of McCain in the harshest of terms, with no hope of redemption." The Monitor adds, "Among rank-and- file social conservatives, McCain may fare better than among their leaders, analysts say."

Religious Conservatives Urged To Take Their Ideas To "Middle." Ross Douthat, an associate editor at The Atlantic Monthly, writes in the Wall Street Journal (4/6, 2.11M) that "the last, limping years of the Bush administration find religious conservatives in a position of unusual strength -- flush from victory in the Roberts and Alito confirmation battles; relatively untainted by the stumblings and scandals afflicting the GOP; and stronger, in numbers and credibility, than most of their rivals for control of the party. … Which means that for the moment, the closest thing to a credible public philosophy the GOP has to offer emanates from the once-unlikely alliance of evangelicals and Catholics, and their God-infused politics of social reform." Religious conservatives "have moved from a seat at the GOP table to a place near its head; now they need to find a way to carry their ideas into the American middle, tempering their own bigotries and bad habits along the way, and mixing the innocence of doves with the political wisdom of serpents. And if they succeed, there's a good chance that the 'theocons'…will some day be able to look back over the patient work of decades and see a nation transformed by their labors."

Pentagon Official Examines Clintons' Financial Records. US Joint Forces Command Deputy Legislative Director Cordell Francis has been looking into the personal financial records of Sen. Hillary and former President Bill Clinton, the New York Post (4/6, Bishop, 624K) reports. the search through Clinton's records comes "a week after news broke last month that Bill had advised Dubai leaders on how to navigate U.S. political concerns over its ports deal, Senate records show. Francis was required to register his personal data with the Senate in order to access Clinton's records. The Post reviewed a list of people who had accessed the senator's documents." The Post adds, "Joint Forces Command spokesman Navy Capt. Hal Pittman said he was unaware of Francis' probing and would have to investigate the matter before commenting. He did not call back."

Couric To Anchor CBS Evening News. Katie Couric will move from NBC's Today Show to CBS in May, where she will eventually anchor The CBS Evening News. She will become the first woman to hold the position. The networks each noted the story. The CBS Evening News (4/5, story 11, 1:30, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported Couric "will be the anchor and managing editor, taking the baton from Bob Schieffer." ABC World News Tonight (4/5, story 11, :15, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "It is great to welcome another woman to the evening news. And we wish her luck." NBC Nightly News (4/5, story 9, 0:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Katie Couric is about to become competition. … We wish her the very best, right up to a point." The story was covered in today's major newspapers. Some of the stories, such as the one in USA Today (4/6, Johnson, 2.31M), say Couric's move "comes as CBS News continues to rebound from a scandal in 2004 over a story on President Bush's military career, attracting younger viewers even as the Web and other media pose the stiffest challenge yet to network newscasts, which have hemorrhaged millions of viewers in the past decade." The Washington Times (4/6, Harper, 90K) also says "CBS has lagged third in ratings behind ABC and NBC for a decade and was dogged by a credibility scandal in September 2004 after former anchorman Dan Rather broadcast a bogus '60 Minutes' story claiming…Bush had compromised his National Guard service." The Wall Street Journal (4/6, Barnes, 2.11M), Washington Post (4/6, C1, Kurtz, 744K) and New York Times (4/6, Carter, 1.19M) also report on the announcement.

Engler Says Pension Reform Bill Must Rely On Common Sense. John Engler, president of the National Association of Manufacturers, writes in USA Today (4/6, 2.31M), "Recent media reports have inaccurately suggested that pending pension reform legislation would weaken current law and allow companies to reduce pension funding. This perception is wrong. For the overwhelming majority of companies that provide defined-benefit pensions — 47% of which are manufacturing companies — existing law and the new legislation would significantly increase their funding obligations." Engler adds, 'A final bill must rely on common sense. Lawmakers and media leaders who want employers to continue defined-benefit plans while also fighting to compete in a global economy must resist anti-corporate calls for draconian, one size-fits-all legislation."

Bush Urged To Veto Pension Reform Bill. An accompanying editorial USA Today (4/6, 2.31M) says that the pending pension reform legislation gives "companies new leeway to fake their pension math. More pensioners would be placed at risk. Chances that taxpayers will be stuck with a huge bill would rise significantly." Lawmakers "are making the prospects for pension security worse. If President Bush still wants to protect pensions, he'll have to start by exercising his first veto."

Meyerson Derides Rick Berman. Harold Meyerson writes in the Washington Post (4/6, A29, 744K) about "the Beltway's most outrageous advocate, who goes by the name of Rick Berman. In recent months Berman has been in the news for placing full-page ads in major newspapers (funding sources unidentified) that gently compare America's union leaders to Fidel Castro and like authoritarians." Berman's "salvos against unions are just the latest in a line of attacks he's leveled against drunk-driving laws, anti- smoking statutes, food safety ordinances and minimum-wage standards. He is, broadly speaking, the lobbyist for the Hobbesian state of nature." Meyerson adds, "The law may have hauled Abramoff off the stage, and DeLay may be huddling with his counsel and his Creator to plan his next move. But Rick Berman rolls merrily along, an inexhaustible source of material for the Reitmans, Buckleys and all who aspire to chronicle our depravities."

Rice Defends US-India Nuclear Deal On Hill.

The New York Times (4/6, O'Neil, 1.19M) reports Secretary Rice "faced tough questioning from the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee this morning on the administration's nuclear deal with India." She "argued that the Senate needed to approve the deal…to keep that country aligned with the United States in what she called 'an all-out rush for energy supplies' by rapidly developing nations," although she "acknowledged that 'regional realities' meant that India would not agree to accept a cap on its nuclear arsenal." However, "her remarks were greeted with caution by the panel's chairman, Senator Richard G. Lugar." Still, "while Democrats made clear they would seek changes in the pact they did not seem inclined to try to block it." The Financial Times (4/6, Sevastopulo) also says the deal "received support from some Democrats," while the Wall Street Journal (4/6, King, 2.11M) headlines its story "Lawmakers Appear Open To Nuclear Pact With India" and the Washington Times (4/6, Sands, 90K) titles its report "Nuclear Accord Receives Backing As Rice Testifies."

Knight Ridder (4/6, Hutcheson) says "key Democrats offered tentative support Wednesday for a nuclear deal with India, raising prospects that Congress will approve the landmark agreement," and Bloomberg (4/6, Zacharia) also refers to the support of "prominent Democratic US lawmakers," such as Sens. Joseph Biden and John Kerry. The Los Angeles Times (4/6, Richter, 958K) runs a similar report.

In contrast, the AP (4/6, Sidoti) reports in its third paragraph that "Republicans and Democrats alike expressed serious reservations over the plan and criticized what they called the Bush administration's failure to explain its details to lawmakers earlier," although it later concedes that "some lawmakers from both political parties indicated they would back the plan because of an overall goal of strengthening the U.S.-India relationship."

Rice Says US Will Seek South Asian Nuclear Weapons Moratorium. The AFP (4/6) reports that when "replying to Democratic Senator John Kerry on whether the United States could offer 'real leadership' in trying to bring together the nuclear-armed neighbors, neither of which are signatories to the nuclear Non Proliferation Treaty (NPT)," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said "the United States would push for a South Asian moratorium on nuclear weapons production to ease tensions between India and Pakistan," although she admitted that "the United States was unable to get a commitment on nuclear controls from the South Asian nations."

Rice Rejects Linking Nuclear Deal With New Delhi's Ties To Tehran. The AFP (4/5) reported Secretary Rice told the Senate Wednesday that the "United States is concerned over India's ties with Iran but will not ask it to sever links with the Islamic republic in return for American civilian nuclear fuel and technology." Senator Barbara Boxer and others "during the hearing Wednesday expressed concerns over India's military links with Iran, including New Delhi's reported training of Iranian naval personnel."

The AP (4/5, Dareini) reported, "Iran said Wednesday it has successfully test-fired a 'top secret' missile, the third in a week, state-run television reported. The report called the missile an 'ultra-horizon' weapon and said it could be fired from all military helicopters and jet fighters."

Iranian UN Ambassador Denies Country Has Nuclear Weapons Program.

In an opinion piece in the New York Times (4/6, 1.19M) entitled "We Do Not Have a Nuclear Weapons Program," Iranian Ambassador to the United Nations Javad Zarif writes, "A solution to the situation is possible and eminently within reach. Lost amid the rhetoric is this: Iran has a strong interest in enhancing the integrity and authority of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty." Zarif says Tehran "defines its national security in the framework of regional and international cooperation and considers regional stability indispensable for its development." He praises Moscow for the "thoughtful possibilities for a deal" it has "offered," and says, "Pressure and threats do not resolve problems. Finding solutions requires political will and a readiness to engage in serious negotiations. Iran is ready. We hope the rest of the world will join us."

State Department Report "Skates Around" Consequences Of Democracy Promotion. In a story on the State Department's release of "Supporting Human Rights and Democracy: The US Record 2005-2006," the Financial Times (4/6, Dinmore) reports, "The Bush administration on Wednesday defended its efforts to promote democracy around the world in the face of growing criticism of double standards and accusations that its 'freedom drive' was flagging as a result of electoral gains by Islamists opposed to the US." Secretary Rice is quoted writing, "We stood in solidarity with the brave men and women around the world who were persecuted by repressive regimes for exercising their rights." The Times says the report "skates around the issues arising from the administration's stated goal of 'ending tyranny' – namely the success of Islamists in elections across the Middle East, and the resistance to change by allies in the 'war on terror.' The report mentions only briefly how 'some governments' moved to impose draconian restrictions on civil society groups, 'citing fears of instability or foreign interference.'" The Times notes some Administration officials "concede there is concern over direction" and Bush's pro-democracy strategy "is flagging. Recent FT interviews with senior State Department officials reinforced that impression."

Turkish Security Forces, Kurds Clash Again. The New York Times (4/6, Fisher, 1.19M) reports that "violent clashes between Kurds and security forces in Turkey over the past week have jolted memories here back to an old conflict." It adds that "after a decade of calm, at least 15 people have been killed in protests in recent days," causing Kurds to fear that their cultural and political gains might be lost.

Palestinian Finances In Desperate Shape. The Washington Times (4/6, Mitnick, 90K) reports that the Hamas-led Palestinian government claims to have inherited "empty coffers." Unrest could result if "the Palestinian Authority misses salary payments." The outgoing Fatah party asserts that "the Palestinian Authority's treasury is empty not because of poor management, but because of Hamas' refusal to [recognize] Israel." Western donors have "frozen payments until Hamas recognizes Israel and renounces violence." An editorial in the New York Times (4/6, 1.19M) urges Palestinian Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar to recognize Israel, saying that "most rational people know [what] Hamas must do if Palestinians are ever going to get the viable state they so crave."

US Proposes Shifting Burden Of UN Dues. The Washington Times (4/6, Pisik, 90K) reports that the US has proposed a "new method of apportioning U.N. dues that would mean sharp increases for countries including China, Russia and India." The proposal, to assign countries' dues according to "purchasing power parity" rather than to GDP, would decrease the US contribution to the UN budget only slightly, by 0.5%. However, China has already "complained that its assessment would increase sixfold, making its share second only to that of the United States."

IMF Wants Developing Economies To Have More Voting Rights. The Financial Times (4/6, Guha, Giles) reports that the IMF plans to "draw up a new set of voting rights that would boost the relative power of Asian countries at the likely expense of European countries." Observers say that the organization could "fall into obscurity" if it fails to give poorer countries a bigger stake; however, the IMF initiative "is likely to meet resistance from European countries that fear a dilution of their influence."

Russia, China Seen As Strengthening Ties To Offset US. The Washington Times (4/6, Mainville, 90K) reports that Russia and China are cultivating ever-stronger ties to "counterbalance U.S. global influence." Vladimir Putin and Hu Jintao have met five times "in less than a year." The two countries held joint military exercises last year; "a second round … is planned for next year." Russia also envisions selling more gas to China. However, the Times reports that "some Russian policy-makers remain wary of China's growing strength."

Gorbachev Discusses Changes In Russia, Praises Putin. In an interview with USA Today (4/6, 2.31M), former Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev discusses Russia 20 years after he came to power. He says that "a country like Russia cannot be quickly changed" and predicts that "20-25 years" are needed for his reforms to take full root. Gorbachev credits President Vladimir Putin for having "stabilized the country" after Boris Yeltsin's reign and hints that the critical West "would just like to keep Russia down as long as possible." He calls the invasion of Iraq "a major political mistake."

Moscow Airport Introduces Lie Detector For Passengers. The Washington Times/London Daily Telegraph (4/6, Blomfield) reports that Moscow's

Domodedovo airport will introduce "a lie detector test" for passengers "as early as July." The Israeli-developed machinery, "intended to identify terrorists and drugs smugglers," asks four questions, including, "Have you ever lied to the authorities?" Eventually "all passengers" will have to take the test.

Russia Said To Be Running Short Of Gas. Nadejda M. Victor, a research fellow at the Program on Energy and Sustainable Development at Stanford University, writes in the Washington Post (4/6, 744K) that Russia's Gazprom is facing a "looming decline in gas production." Wasteful domestic consumption, "dwindling supply," and "contractual commitments" to ex-Soviet states mean that Gazprom might, by 2008, be forced to "cut off internal customers (voters) or the Western customers who are the firm's main source of hard cash."

Thai PM Suddenly Quits. The Washington Post (4/6, Sipress, 744K) reports that Thai Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra has "shocked Thailand again" by immediately resigning rather than waiting several weeks as promised. Thaksin "said he was worried that his continuing presence in office was dividing Thais dangerously" and handed over power to a deputy, a "longtime" loyalist who can serve only temporarily. The temporary appointment leaves "open the possibility that another member of Thaksin's inner circle would ultimately take the top job."

AIDS Infection Rates In East, West Africa Lower Than Expected. In a front-page story today on overstated HIV infections rates in Rwanda, the Washington Post (4/6, A1, Timberg, 744K) reports that, despite dire warnings, AIDS deaths on the predicted scale never arrived here. A new national study illustrates why: The rate of HIV infection among Rwandans ages 15 to 49 is 3 percent, according to the study, enough to qualify as a major health problem but not nearly the national catastrophe once predicted." Newly published data "portray an epidemic that is more female and more urban than previously believed, one that has begun to ebb in much of East Africa and has failed to take off as predicted in most of West Africa." The Post notes that infection rates have reached worst-case predictions only in southern Africa including Botswana, South Africa, Swaziland and Zimbabwe.

French Unions Threaten More Unrest. The Washington Post (4/6, Moore, 744K) reports that French unions have demanded that the government "withdraw its contentious labor law by April 15" or risk more strikes. The Post reports that in a poll "72 percent of those questioned said they were dissatisfied" with government handling of the crisis. In addition, it notes that "increasing numbers of political commentators have begun writing [Prime Minister Dominique de] Villepin's political obituary."

Irish Police Hunt Killers Of Former British Spy. The New York Times/Agence France-Presse (4/6) reports that the Irish police "appealed to the public on Wednesday for help in finding the killers of Denis Donaldson," an IRA member who had admitted last December to "two decades" of spying for the British. The British and Irish prime ministers "said they would still meet Thursday in Armagh to present a plan to restore a power-sharing government" for Northern Ireland.

Lindsey Urges Compromise On Yuan Revaluation. Former Bush advisor Lawrence Lindsey argues in a Wall Street Journal (4/6, 2.11M) op-ed that the US and China need to compromise on yuan revaluation. He believes that "splitting the difference between" the US goal of 1% yuan appreciation per month and the Chinese position of less than 1% per quarter will "produce a compromise pace of adjustment that would be challenging but manageable for the Chinese economy." By agreeing to such a deal, China can avoid "an economically damaging fight on principle in which [it] would be the bigger loser."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Judge Approves First Public Playing Of 9/11 Tape At Moussaoui Trial. The AP (4/6, Sniffen) reports, "The cockpit recorder tape from the Sept. 11 jetliner that crashed in Pennsylvania will be played in public for the first time - to the Zacarias Moussaoui sentencing jury - the judge in the case ruled Wednesday." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema said the jury considering whether to execute Moussaoui could hear the recording from United Airlines Fight 93 and see a transcript of it. … This cockpit tape has been played privately for the families of Flight 93 victims, but it has never been played in public." The AP adds, "Prosecutors asked the judge to order the tape sealed and to keep the transcript from the general public after it is played in open court, but she made no immediate ruling on that. … Noting that the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals has ordered trial evidence made public, she said relatives of Flight 93 victims would have until next Tuesday to advise her whether they object to general release of the material. … She said if no family members object, she will release the material to the general public the day after it is submitted into evidence. No date was set for that."

The Washington Post (4/6, A12, Dwyer, 744K) reports that Judge Brinkema "also ordered that the tape be made available to the public after the jury hears it in court unless family members of Flight 93 victims file a written objection by Tuesday. D. Hamilton Peterson of Bethesda, president of Families of Flight 93, called the release of the recording 'enormous' and said he supports the ruling." The Washington Times (4/6, Seper, 90K) adds Brinkema "noted in her ruling that the government requested the court seal transcripts of the tape after their admission into evidence and prohibit any public dissemination of the materials."

Guiliani Expected To Take Stand. WNBC-TV (New York) (4/6) reports, "Former New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani is expected to take the stand on Thursday to describe the horror of Sept. 11, as jurors consider whether terrorist Zacarias Moussaoui should be put to death." WNBC-TV continues, "Giuliani will be able to talk about the toll -- the months of digging, the funerals, the economic and emotional suffering -- and perhaps how he and many others literally ran for their lives as nearly 3,000 victims were trapped in the World Trade Center. … At some point, prosecutors are expected to show jurors tapes from that day, including news footage of victims falling from the sky. … Justice Department officials said he will join about 45 others, including relatives of victims and a New York 911 operator who took the panicked calls that day."

Victims' Families Divided On Death For Moussaoui. USA Today (4/6, 3A, Johnson, 2.31M) reports that members of 9/11 victims' families are divided on whether Zacarias Moussaoui should be sentenced to death. Abraham Scott, whose wife was killed at the Pentagon, has said Moussaoui "deserved to die 'like a dog with rabies,'" but Colleen Kelly, whose brother died at the WTC, said, "I don't understand how killing another person will make this any better." Their "contrasting views…reflect a wrenching debate that will begin to unfold today" as prosecutors "plan to offer testimony from 9/11 victims' family members who believe the unapologetic defendant should be executed rather than sentenced to life in prison."

Meanwhile, The Washington Post (4/6, A12, Markon, 744K) reports that "the sights and sounds of a national trauma are about to go on display as never before" as prosecutors "re-create the full horror of Sept. 11, 2001, for the jury. … It is the culmination of a four-year effort by the prosecution to knit together a portrait of terror far beyond a normal death penalty trial, and it includes an unprecedented effort to reach out to the victims of Sept. 11. Some wonder whether it will be too much for the jury -- and the victims themselves -- to bear," but "family members and victim advocates said they welcome the decision to lay bare the most intimate details of the hijackings."

FBI Agent Testifies Umer Hayat Wore Wire In Conversations With Imams. The Sacramento Bee (4/6, Walsh, 301K) reports, "In a bid for leniency for himself and his son," Umer Hayat "tried to help the FBI implicate two Muslim clerics in international terrorism. … In testimony Wednesday, Special Agent Gary Schaaf recalled for a jury hearing evidence in the case against Umer Hayat that, at Schaaf's request, Hayat wore a hidden recorder and tried to engage the clerics in incriminating conversation. Schaaf acknowledged that, while he made no promises to Hayat, he held out the possibility that snaring the Muslim imams might help the Hayats with potential criminal charges against them." The Bee notes that the FBI suspected Muhammed Adil Khan and Shabbir Ahmed "were raising money for anti-American elements in their native Pakistan and were recruiting young men in Lodi for terrorist training in Pakistan."

FBI Informant Testifies Failure To Report Recording Was Accidental. The Lodi News-Sentinel (4/6, Bohm) reports FBI informant Naseem Khan testified yesterday, under cross-examination by Umer Hayat lawyer Johnny Griffin, "was organizing his CD collection late Saturday night when he discovered a tape containing a secret recording from more than three years ago" of "a telephone conversation he'd had with Hamid Hayat," but did not give to the bureau. Khan "said he didn't mean to keep the tape from FBI agents, and that he called them half an hour after finding the conversation." Griffin asked, "How many other tapes have you not turned over to the government?" Khan replied, "This is the only one." KXTV-TV Sacramento (4/5, Hedlund) notes that the "mysterious audio tape…became the focal point of testimony" yesterday. "The contents of the tape recorded conversation has not been revealed in court, and it is unknown how critical it might be to the case." The Los Angeles Times (4/6, 958K) also briefly reports on Khan's testimony about the tape.

Slotter Testifies Agents Followed Standard Procedures In Recording Hayat Interviews. The Lodi News-Sentinel (4/6, Bohm) also reports the Hayats "were interviewed for hours…before their arrests, and only after they had talked extensively to the FBI were their interviews videotaped. Agents were following FBI recording policies set out in 1998, agent Keith Slotter testified today. Slotter, who is now the deputy assistant director in charge of training and developing at the FBI academy in Quantico, Va., was special agent in charge of the FBI's Sacramento office when the Hayats were arrested. Under standard policies, witnesses are recorded only when they are confessing, he said," and he approved agents to begin recording when the "interview had…progressed from a straight-forward interview to a confession interview,"

Prosecutors Rest Case Without "Direct Evidence" Hayat Trained At Terror Camp. NPR's All Things Considered (4/5, Gonzales) reported, "Prosecutors in the federal trial of Hamid Hayat…rest their case without offering direct evidence that Hayat attended a Jihadist training camp." Announcing the arrests in June,"officials claimed that they had uncovered a potential al-Qaida sleeper cell in the quiet farm town of Lodi." NPR noted, "Hayat's defense is now under way."

Rendered Yemeni Claims Interrogators In Djibouti Said They Were FBI Agents. BBC (4/5) reports on its Web site, "Amnesty International has suggested that Djibouti was one of the countries where prisoners allegedly abducted and mistreated by the US were held. The report, based on interviews with former detainees, also links the US practice of 'rendition' to the torture or ill-treatment of terror suspects. … Yemeni citizen Muhammad al-Assad said US officials, who said they were from the US Federal Bureau of Investigation had questioned him in Djibouti," and from there, he allegedly "was flown to another location, believed to be in Europe."

Meanwhile, The Washington Post (4/6, White, 744K) reports that the report said three "Yemeni nationals who say they were held captive for more than two years in secret US detention facilities have been released in Yemen without facing charges related to terrorism." AI officials theorize that the men were held "probably in Afghanistan, Djibouti and somewhere in Eastern Europe." If the men were indeed held incommunicado, "that practice could violate international law regarding detentions."

Canadian Teen Protests Guantanamo Treatment. The Los Angeles Times (4/6, Williams, 958K) reports that" Canadian teenager Omar Khadr refused Wednesday to participate in the war crimes case against him, in protest of being moved to … solitary confinement." Khadr "is accused of taking part in a firefight that killed a U.S. Special Forces medic" in 2002. His defense counsel charged that Khadr had been moved to the "worst" facility on the base, but a naval spokesman disputed the allegation of solitary confinement.

Knight Ridder (4/6, Rosenberg) reports, "Marine Col. Robert S. Chester is supposed to be presiding over a panel hearing allegations that the 19-year-old Canadian committed a war crime by killing a U.S. Army medic in a 2002 firefight in Khost, Afghanistan. … Instead, he agreed to take briefs and potentially call witnesses on Khadr's complaint that guards had placed him in punitive isolation at the Pentagon's showcase detention center for terrorist suspects. … 'Excuse me, Mr. Judge. I'm being punished for exercising my rights and being cooperative in participating in this Military Commission,' said Khadr, who has topped 6 feet and was sporting a fuzzy, fundamentalist Muslim beard at his hearing. … The youth had been held in barracks-like communal captive quarters at the sprawling prison camp overlooking the Caribbean until March 30. He was then moved to the state-of-the-art, Camp 5 prison, housing 80 captives in single-occupancy cement cells."

At UK Terror Trial, Defense Denounces FBI Informant As "Liar," "Fantasist." BBC (4/5) reports on its Web site, "The key witness in the prosecution of seven men accused of planning multiple bomb attacks on the UK has been branded a 'liar' and 'fantasist' in court." Mohammed Babar "has told the Old Bailey that he plotted with the men to bomb bars, trains and shopping centres. But Michel Massih QC, defending, told the witness he was a 'well-schooled, well-rehearsed, well-trained liar'." The Daily Telegraph (4/6, Gardham) notes Babar "admits he turned on his British co-conspirators in return for the promise of a shorter sentence from the FBI." Yesterday, he "denied making up his account but Mr Massih pointed out that he had affirmed at the beginning of his evidence instead of swearing on the Koran."

NYTimes Supports Fast-Tracking Court Ruling On NSA Surveillance Program. An editorial in the New York Times (4/6, 1.19M) expresses support for Senator Charles Schumer's bill that puts "the National Security Agency's secret spying program on a fast track to Supreme Court review." The editorial says that, even though President Bush is likely to ignore "strong legislation" by Congress, "it would be difficult for him to defy [an] order" from the high court.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Pentagon Threat Database Improperly Retained Reports. An internal review has found that the Pentagon's Threat and Local Observation Notice, or TALON system improperly retained reports that should have been removed. The Los Angeles Times (4/5, 958K) reports that the review "found that some information in the system did not suggest a threat and should have been removed. The Pentagon said that of 13,000 reports, less than 2% were improperly retained. A Pentagon spokesman would not characterize the reports that the investigation determined should have been excised. But a department-wide memo issued Wednesday by Gordon England, the deputy Defense secretary, directed the system's users to adhere to regulations that limit the Pentagon's ability to gather information on U.S. citizens."

Survey Find States Not Happy With Representation In DHS Policymaking. The AP (4/6, Crary) reports the National Governors Association released a report Wednesday based on a survey sent to homeland security directors in each state and five territories and commonwealths. Most said they "are dissatisfied with the quality of intelligence data provided by the federal government…and most also believe that multiple demands on National Guard forces undermine their emergency response capabilities." The survey found "states do not feel they have representation in the Department of Homeland Security's policy development and rule-making process. Several state directors said DHS consults with a few hand-picked state officials and 'then claims that it produced policy based on broad state input,' the survey said."

Many Lawmakers Don't Have GETS Cards, Unfamiliar With Program. The Hill (4/6, Cusack) reports that "only 15' of 41 lawmakers that they asked said that they had Government Emergency Telecommunications Service access cards, which give 'users priority telephone access to approved public and private-sector officials" during national emergencies. "Rep. John Linder remarked that he's on the House Homeland Security Committee 'and I've never seen it.'" Meanwhile, a "K Street insider who has a GETS card said, 'As a lobbyist, I was shocked to hear that very important members of Congress didn't even know about this important program.'" The Hill adds, "The DHS refuses to release the names of the industry groups that have been approved for GETS, citing national security."

Landrieu Says Government Should Stop Giving Money To "Dysfunctional" FEMA. Appearing on CNN's The Situation Room (4/5, Blitzer), Sen. Mary Landrieu defended her move to put a hold on the president's nominations until the White House commits to $6 billion in additional funding for Louisiana's levees. Blitzer: "But, Senator, the president and Congress have already appropriated more than $100 billion for Louisiana, for Alabama, for the entire Gulf Coast reconstruction -- $100 billion plus." Landrieu: "That $100 billion has gone to fund FEMA, that has not gone for reconstruction for Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama or Texas, which is part of our cry. Stop sending money to FEMA. It is dysfunctional. It is not working to rebuild the Gulf Coast and ..." Blitzer: "But isn't FEMA supposed to be working to rebuild the Gulf Coast?" Landrieu: "Not really. They're a Federal Emergency Management Agency. We need new tools and new methods, which is why we came together along the Gulf Coast with Haley Barbour and Governor Blanco, Thad Cochran, myself, and Trent Lott and others and crafted help through the community development block grants."

Rogers Says He Will Cut FEMA Funding Unless Permanent Director Is Named. Fox News (4/5, 1:32 p.m., Vester), reported Rep. Harold Rogers says "he will cut off money" for FEMA unless a someone fills the job of permanent director. Appearing on the program, Rogers said, "It is a tough job. It is coming off a tough season. The stress is unbelievable. But that's the bad news. The good news is we have since Katrina changed the nature of the job. Now, the preparedness part of what FEMA formerly did has been transferred to a new directorate within the Department of Homeland Security. So preparedness, which is the biggest part, frankly, of a disaster mitigation, has been transferred out of the FEMA director's chores." Asked whether he thought Acting Director David Paulison should take over the position, Rogers said, "Well, that will be up to the administration to do whatever they would like. … I think he is qualified. It is up to the President and the Secretary."

Lobbyists Hope For Moderate Reform Of Flood Insurance Program. The Hill (4/6, Schor) reports "lobbyists" are hoping the Senate and House agree on a "moderate approach" to overhauling the National Flood Insurance Program that will please "bankers, brokers, real-estate agents and builders alike." A flood-insurance bill approved by the House Financial Services Committee last month won "widespread praise from insurance trade groups," but "some lobbyists are rebelling against an amendment from Rep. Debbie Wasserman Schultz (D-Fla.) that would force FEMA — and the private insurance companies it uses — to the table for mediation of disputed disaster claims." Meanwhile, the "bill's phase-out of flood-insurance subsidies for vacation homes, second homes and businesses did not please housing-industry lobbyists, but they scored a win by beating back a bid from Rep. Jeb Hensarling (R-Texas) to kill subsidies outright."

Despite Record Claims, Insurance Industry Posts $44 Billion Profit. The CBS Evening News (4/5, story 2, 2:10, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "It might surprise you to know that in a year of catastrophic losses with hurricane after hurricane, the companies that insure our property still made record profits." CBS (Hughes) added, "Ever since Hurricane Andrew hit Florida back in 1992, and took a $25 billion bite out of the insurance industry, companies have been charging more and covering less. Mudslides, floods and earthquakes are routinely exempt from homeowner policies. That's why last year even while insurance companies paid out record amounts in claims after Hurricane Katrina and other storms, the industry still made more than $44 billion in profit, an almost 19% increase from the year before."

WAR NEWS:

Rumsfeld Rebuffs Rice's "Tactical Errors" Comments. The Washington Post (4/6, A21, White, 744K) reports, "Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said he did not know what Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was talking about when she said last week that the United States had made thousands of 'tactical errors' in handling the war in Iraq, a statement she later said was meant figuratively." He added that "calling changes in military tactics during the war 'errors' reflects a lack of understanding of warfare." These comments come "amid long-standing tensions between their departments over the war in Iraq and other issues."

Rice Visit To Iraq Said To Have Stiffened Jaafari's Resolve. The New York Times (4/6, Semple, 1.19M) reports that according to "a top aide" to Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari, the visit by Secretary Rice and UK Foreign Minister Jack Straw to Iraq "only served to stiffen" his resolve "to retain his post." The aide said the trips was "ill-timed, counterproductive and what he called 'naked intervention,'" comments that "were echoed by other leaders across the political spectrum today, including Kurds and Sunni Arabs."

The Washington Post (4/6, A20, Balz, 744K) reports Sen. John Kerry's Wednesday op-ed comments in the New York Times that he is "furious over the lack of progress in Iraq. He charged the administration with half-hearted diplomatic efforts and dismissed" Secretary Rice's "surprise 24-hour visit there this week as 'not serious diplomacy.'" Kerry said it is "unconscionable for U.S. soldiers to put their lives at risk when Iraqi politicians show no commitment to establishing a working government" and "outlined a series of deadlines yesterday for withdrawing most U.S. forces by the end of the year and called for increased diplomatic pressure by the Bush administration to compel Iraqi leaders to take responsibility for the future of their country."

National Assembly Could Force Jaafari To Resign. The Washington Times (4/6, Behn, 90K) reports "al-Jaafari will be forced out of his post through a vote in the National Assembly if he refuses to step aside voluntarily, a Shi'ite Iraqi legislator said yesterday. Ongoing political talks could result 'in a new surprise,' lawmaker Ayad Jamal al Din told editors and reporters at The Washington Times." He "declined to predict who would replace Mr. al-Jaafari, but said it would be someone acceptable to Shi'ites, Sunnis and Kurds."

US Seeks To Reassure Shiites. The Wall Street Journal (4/6, A6, Dreazen, 2.11M) reports, "During Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's two-day visit to Iraq this week with her British counterpart, Jack Straw, the two leaders said the coalition supported the Shiites' right to choose Iraq's next prime minister because of their majority status in the country" and "went out of their way to publicly praise the Shiites' most revered religious figure, Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani." This is part of "a diplomatic push to reassure Iraq's restive Shiite majority that the U.S. supports their right to pick the country's next prime minister and is grateful for their restraint in the face of Sunni violence." The messages "underscore mounting fears of alienating the country's largest sectarian group" and seem to be "an acknowledgment of Iraq's political fragility and the risk that the country's Shiite majority may continue to sour on the U.S., drastically complicating the administration's hopes of cobbling together a unity government."

Kerry Proposes Withdrawal From Iraq Unless Government Formed. Knight Ridder (4/6, Thomma, Funk, Kuhnhenn) reports that if Congress "ever turns against the war in Iraq, analysts may look back at this week as a turning point." Sen. John Kerry "urged setting a May 15 deadline to withdraw U.S. troops unless Iraq forms a unity government, and even if Iraq does form a government, Kerry urged complete American withdrawal by year's end." At the "same time, three Republicans in the House of Representatives endorsed a resolution calling for a robust and lengthy congressional debate on Iraq. While they're far short of the votes needed to force such a debate, a coalition of 40 anti-war activist groups is mounting a national campaign to drum up public pressure behind the resolution." The developments "suggest that anti-war politics could be intensifying - and that Washington may be catching up with anti-war sentiment across the country."

In a separate story, Knight Ridder (4/6, Kuhnhenn) reports Democratic leaders "in Washington have long worried that taking a stand against the war or calling for early withdrawal would label them weak on national security. But Kerry, in an interview with Knight Ridder, said that the stand he's calling for is 'tough' and necessary." Kerry is "scheduled to speak further about his proposal in a speech Thursday from the Senate floor." Kerry's position "already was getting good reviews in liberal blogs, a reception that Kerry seemed to anticipate."

The Washington Post (4/6, A20, Balz, 744K) reports Kerry "outlined a series of deadlines yesterday for withdrawing most U.S. forces by the end of the year and called for increased diplomatic pressure by the Bush administration to compel Iraqi leaders to take responsibility for the future of their country." In calling "for strict deadlines for drawing down forces, Kerry joins several other Democratic lawmakers, including Rep. John P. Murtha (Pa.) and Sen. Russell Feingold (Wis.), in challenging Bush's contention that timetables will only strengthen the opposition and lead to possible defeat for the U.S. mission." Kerry's proposals "drew no reaction from the White House or the Republican National Committee, which one GOP official called a sign that they do not regard Kerry as someone likely to influence others in his party on the central foreign policy issue of the day."

Roberts Says Senate Probe On Iraq Intelligence Could Be Done Soon. CQ (4/5, Speck) reports the Senate Intelligence Committee "will make its best effort to finish most of the investigation into the Bush administration's use of intelligence prior to the invasion of Iraq, the panel's chairman said Wednesday." Chairman Pat Roberts said "committee staff would incorporate member comments on drafts of three of the five topics under investigation during the two-week recess beginning next week. The probe could possibly be completed by the end of the month." CQ adds a Democratic aide "familiar with the issue said he doubted the drafts would be ready by the end of the month." The aide "said the Republicans had done virtually nothing on the investigation, which began in 2004, until the Nov. 1 session. He said the committee would not agree to release a 'shoddy' report and that the issues were 'more complicated than expected.'"

Air Force Releases Video Of Predator Strike On Insurgents. The CBS Evening News (4/5, story 5, 0:20, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "The Air Force released dramatic video today of a missile strike on Iraqi insurgents by an unmanned Predator aircraft. The pictures taken from the Predator show three men planning a roadside bomb north of Baghdad late last month. The aircraft then launches a powerful Hellfire missile, and the blast takes out the entire area. All three insurgents were killed."

April Reverses Downward Trend In US Fatalities In Iraq. The Washington Times (4/6, Scarborough, 90K) reports, "April is becoming one of the deadlier months for US troops in Iraq, perhaps dashing the hopes of commanders that a three-month-long downward trend in fatalities meant the insurgency was becoming less effective. In the first four days of this month, 16 Marines and Army soldiers have been killed by hostile fire or in accidents, about half the total in all of March." It is "threatening to erase a more favorable trend: The first three months of this year experienced a 25 percent decline in the number of US deaths, a drop the military credits to a more robust Iraqi security force and to better armor protection."

Insurgent Propaganda Video Said To Show Burning Of US Helicopter, Dead Pilot. An Iraqi insurgent group has released a video that purports to show the dead pilot of an American helicopter shot down in Iraq. NBC Nightly News (4/5, story 2, 2:15, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) reported, "One military official in Iraq says he is outraged by this video, while Pentagon officials admit the video does appear to be authentic. The video -- complete with music soundtrack -- is poor quality but appears to show the burning wreckage of a US Apache helicopter. Shouting 'Allahu Akbar' – Allah is the greatest – enemy fighters are also shown dragging the body of at least one man across the ground." The video "was posted on the Internet today by a militant Islamic group, the Mujahadeen Shura Council, with ties to al Qaeda in Iraq and its leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi." The Washington Post (4/6, A20, Anderson, 744K) also reports the story.

Marines Find Counterinsurgency, Community Relations Goals Can Conflict. The New York Times (4/6, Cloud, 1.19M) reports that in the town of Husayba, "Last August, under daily attack from car bombs and mortars, the Marines took down the only bridge over the Euphrates River for miles around. Now they are trying to rebuild it." Marines said that without the bridge, "insurgents and foreign fighters can no longer infiltrate as easily into this town near the Syrian border in western Anbar Province, the heavily Sunni Arab area that has formed the heart of the insurgency. But Iraqis who live on the river's northern bank grumble that they have no easy way to get to town to buy and sell goods or to see the doctor." The "shifting priorities illustrate the trade-off between combat and reconstruction that the American military is still grappling with, but especially in remote regions like this one, where the Iraqi government is still almost nonexistent."

Charges Dropped Against CBS Cameraman For Allegedly Recruiting Insurgents. The CBS Evening News (4/5, story 7, 0:15, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported an Iraqi court yesterday "dismissed charges against an Iraqi cameraman who was working for CBS News when he was arrested one year ago. 26-year-old Abdul Ameer Younis Hussein was accused of trying to recruit fighters for the insurgency but no evidence was ever produced."

Saddam Remains Defiant Under Cross Examination. Prosecutors yesterday cross-examined Saddam Hussein in his trial for the execution of 148 Shiites in the town of Dujail. Saddam's defense sought to shift the focus to the abuse of prisoners at Abu Ghraib prison by American troops. The story was covered by each of the networks in full segments. ABC World News Tonight (4/5, story 5, 1:55, Kerley, 8.78M) reported, "Saddam admitted ordering the execution of 148 Shiites in the city of Dujail after an attempt on his life there. When asked why it took only two days to review that case, he said the execution order was within his power as president. 'I take responsibility, good or bad.' But Saddam wouldn't admit that more than two dozen teenagers were among those killed. Prosecutors displayed the identification cards of some of the boys, as young as 13." One of Saddam's lawyers "started waving some of the infamous pictures from Abu Ghraib prison, shouting, 'This is torture. This is what the Americans did.'"

The CBS Evening News (4/5, story 6, 1:35, Dozier, 7.66M) reported, "Alone in the dock, Saddam Hussein veered from arrogance to annoyance, waging a verbal battle with the judge and prosecutors." Saddam "barked that the IDs were fake and in turn accused the current interior ministry of torturing and killing thousands of Iraqis." But NBC Nightly News (4/5, story 3, 2:05, Hattori, 9.87M) said Saddam looked "relaxed and confident," and "talked almost casually in court today about ordering the deaths of 148 Shiite men and boys in 1982." Saddam "again played to the media and his supporters, accusing the court of complicity with the current interior ministry, which has been accused of allowing death squads to go after Saddam loyalists."

USA Today/AP (4/6) describes Saddam as "at times sharp and combative, but often relaxed or even smiling," while the New York Times (4/6, Wong, 1.19M) emphasizes the former dictator "admitted Wednesday that he had signed an order of execution for 148 men and boys with only a cursory glance at the evidence against them." The testimony "appeared to bolster the case of the prosecution." The Washington Post (4/6, A20, Finer, 744K) and Los Angeles Times (4/5, Daragahi, 958K) run similar reports.

Paper Trail Said To Link Saddam To Kurdish Massacres. The CBS Evening News (4/5, story 6, 1:35, Dozier, 7.66M) reported Saddam "is now facing even tougher new charges. The tribunal accused him of committing genocide against Iraq's Kurds in the north, killing tens of thousands in a 1988 campaign to obliterate any villages that supported Kurdish rebels." There's "a bloody paper trail showing chain of command."

Iraqi Bloggers Seen As Valuable Source Of Information. The Wall Street Journal (4/6, Dreazen, 2.11M) reports Baghdad dentist Zeyad A.'s blog, Healing Iraq1, "has become a primary source of information on Iraq's daily deterioration for readers around the world. An agnostic of Sunni descent, Zeyad has written of friends manning impromptu neighborhood-watch patrols and religious leaders being murdered and dragged through the streets by mobs. He has also posted photos of uniformed Iraqi police driving through the streets in cars emblazoned with photos of radical Shiite clerics." With Western reporters "increasingly limited in their ability to travel around Iraq, bloggers like Zeyad, the young Iraqi woman known as Riverbend, and the brothers behind the Iraq the Model site -- who were invited to the Oval Office to meet President Bush -- offer readers details of the conflict rarely available in the mainstream foreign media."

Miss Iraq Pageant Held In Baghdad. ABC World News Tonight (4/5, story 6, :25, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "In Baghdad, they held a Miss Iraq pageant today. But even something as innocuous as a beauty contest can be dangerous. There are no pictures of the pageant because it was closed to the public and photographers. Security was tight. There's a single photo of the winner, 23-year-old Tamar Goregian. Nine of the contestants backed out of the pageant at the last minute, apparently afraid of offending hard-line Islamists."

US Official Says Pakistani, Afghan Cooperation Key To Defeating Taliban. The AP (4/6, Pennington) reports Richard Boucher, US Assistant Secretary of State for South and Central Asia, said "Pakistan and Afghanistan must cooperate to defeat the 'common enemy' of the Taliban and Islamic extremists that control the shared border." Boucher's comments "follow weeks of tensions between the two countries — both key allies in Washington's war on terrorism — over militant infiltration along the rugged frontier."

Air Force Seen As Adapting To Terrorist Tactics, Guerilla Warfare. The Wall Street Journal (4/6, A1, Jaffe, 2.11M) reports that for "most of its 59-year history, the Air Force has focused on building bigger bombs and faster planes that could reach beyond the front lines and destroy an enemy's critical infrastructure." But as the "swift toppling of Saddam Hussein has gotten bogged down in the long slog of battling an insurgency, the Air Force is shifting its emphasis. One hot new project in the service these days: a bomb designed to limit damage, not expand it." The "focused-lethality munitions" will "kill insurgents hiding in an urban building without injuring people next door. The story of this unusual bomb is just one example of how the Iraq war is triggering changes throughout a U.S. military coming to grips with the shadowy 21st century wars against terrorists and guerrillas."

Administration Outlines Plan To Rebuild Nuclear Weapons. The Los Angeles Times (4/6, Vartabedian, 958K) reports the Bush Administration yesterday "unveiled a blueprint for rebuilding the United States' decrepit nuclear weapons complex, including restoration of a large-scale bomb manufacturing capacity." The plan "calls for the most sweeping realignment and modernization of the nation's massive system of laboratories and factories for nuclear bombs since the end of the Cold War." The Administration "wants the capability to turn out 125 new nuclear bombs per year by 2022, as the Pentagon retires older bombs that it claims will no longer be reliable or safe." But "the administration blueprint is facing sharp criticism, both from those who say it does not move fast enough to consolidate plutonium stores and from those who say restarting bomb production will encourage aspiring nuclear powers across the globe to develop weapons."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former Enron Officials Testifies Warning Memo Was Seen As "Office Gossip." The Houston Chronicle (4/6, Flood) reports, "An outside lawyer for Enron told jurors today that he and a colleague spoke to 11 people in a month-long review of the accounting scandal warnings from Sherron Watkins and decided, shortly before the company's implosion, that there was no need for further investigation." The Chronicle continues, "Max Hendrick III, a partner at Houston law firm Vinson & Elkins, characterized much of former Vice President Watkin's now famous warning memo to Ken Lay as 'office gossip' and told the jury he thought they did a thorough and professional job looking at her complaints about Enron accounting and hedging vehicles called the Raptors." The Chronicle adds, "In a slow-moving day, Hendrick was one of two lawyers to testify for the defense in the conspiracy and fraud trial of ex-Enron Chairman Lay and ex-CEO Jeff Skilling. The jury also heard from Jim Derrick, Enron's former general counsel, who explained some of the legal and risk procedures in place at the company and his surprise that ex-CFO Andrew Fastow got around them and stole from Enron. … But Hendrick was on the stand much of the day, going over the investigation Derrick and Lay initiated to examine the allegations Watkins put forth shortly after Skilling resigned in August 2001. Watkins warned of an impending accounting scandal and especially focused on Fastow's side dealings and the Raptors."

Bloomberg (4/6, Calkins) reports, "Defense lawyers presented Hendrick to cast doubt on Watkins' testimony that Lay was skeptical about her accounting warnings and he hired Vinson & Elkins to do a 'bogus' investigation instead of a comprehensive probe. … The government alleges the executives hid billions in debts and losses in off-the-books partnerships created by former Chief Accounting Officer Andrew Fastow to do Enron-related deals. Fastow has pleaded guilty to fraud in connection with some of those deals and faces 10 years in prison."

The Washington Post (4/6, Ahrens) reports, "James Derrick, former general counsel for Enron, was brought by the defense to detail the measures that the company kept in place to prevent accounting fraud and suspicious deals. … Derrick testified that Skilling 'wanted a rigorous set of controls focused on a transaction that would reveal a hidden risk and, after identification, it would have to be evaluated in a way that the board of directors had approved of. Only when it went through all of those steps should a deal in fact be able to be done.' … On prosecution cross-examination, Derrick was pressed on Fastow's 'LJM2' partnership, an outside company that sought to buy Enron's wind-energy assets. … Of Fastow, Derrick testified: 'First, I was around Mr. Fastow for a number of years . . . when we were thrown together at various Enron events. In addition, my sense was that Mr. Fastow was regarded [within the company] as extremely able and extremely bright and later, as he became chief financial officer, Mr. Fastow received--outside of Enron, through various publications--he was being applauded as, in my impression, as a very good chief financial officer.'"

The Wall Street Journal (4/6, McWilliams, Emshwiller) reports, "Mr. Hendrick defended the four-week inquiry while admitting his own reservations about a broader probe. The 2001 inquiry concluded that a deeper investigation wasn't necessary. The defense says the review shows that Mr. Lay seriously pursued the allegations raised four months before Enron collapsed into bankruptcy-court protection. … Mr. Hendrick testified for the defense to rebut testimony by Sherron Watkins, a former Enron vice president who said she had warned Mr. Lay that August the former energy giant might 'implode in a wave of accounting scandals.' Her letter to Mr. Lay also urged a review of related-party transactions by 'objective experts in the fields of securities law and accounting.' But his descriptions appeared to lend support to the prosecution's characterization of the probe as narrow and weak."

Skilling Set To Testify. USA Today (4/6, Farrell) reports, "In what could prove to be the decisive juncture in the government's trial of the two men accused of perpetrating a giant fraud at Enron, former CEO Jeff Skilling is expected to take the stand in federal court here today to testify on his own behalf." USA continues, "The 52-year-old defendant, who said Wednesday that he's been 'waiting four years for this,' will likely tell jurors what he told congressional investigators in 2002, that up until the moment he decided to step down from his job in August 2001, Enron was a solid, profitable company, not the fly-by-night operation its detractors claimed it was. … The stakes couldn't be higher. Prosecutors from the Enron Task Force have accused Skilling and Enron founder Ken Lay of conspiring to hide the company's true financial condition from investors and analysts. In fall 2001, after revelations that former Enron chief financial officer Andrew Fastow made millions of dollars in illicit profits from transactions between the company and a series of private partnerships he controlled, the company's stock price tanked, and Enron eventually filed for bankruptcy-court protection."

The Washington Post (4/6, D1, Johnson) reports, "Skilling built a reputation for bluntness and impatience with people he deems intellectually inferior. His lawyers hope to turn those traits into an asset when he takes the witness stand as early as Thursday." The Post continues, "Defense lawyers say they will not try to dissuade Skilling from his characteristic outspokenness when he begins testifying in his fraud and conspiracy trial. Instead, they will attempt to convince jurors that a man so unfiltered that he once used a profanity to describe a stock analyst who questioned him could never have lied so successfully and for so long about the health of his business." The Post adds, "On the surface, Skilling could hardly be more different than his fellow defendant…Lay. Lay was the genial diplomat who charmed employees and business partners. Skilling, on the other hand, rarely backed down from a fight. Both men stood near the pinnacle of success in early 2001, when they unfurled a banner proclaiming their drive to make Enron the world's leading company. Within months, the energy trader collapsed, along with their reputations."

WSJournal Says Memo On Corporate Prosecutions Should Be Challenged In Court. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (4/6, 2.11M) says, "At a pre-trial hearing in the KPMG case in New York last week, federal Judge Lewis A. Kaplan suggested that a three-year-old Justice Department policy on corporate prosecutions might be unconstitutional. He was referring to the now famous Thompson memo, which in 2003 rewrote Justice guidelines on when to indict entire firms in criminal investigations. … Justice could alter or eliminate the Thompson memo by the stroke of a pen, but it is unlikely to do so until its legitimacy is challenged in court. If Judge Kaplan's reaction in the KPMG case is indicative, that day may not be far off. And a good thing too."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Judge Denies US Request To Make Secret Arguments At Libby Trial. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (4/6, Yost) reports US District Judge Reggie Walton "barred prosecutors in the CIA leak case Wednesday from making arguments that would be kept secret from the defendant," Lewis "Scooter" Libby. "Walton said the government may in some cases present the court the actual classified information that Libby wants for his defense without letting the defendant and his lawyers see it. The judge would then determine whether some of the deletions or substitutions that the government is making are proper."

Doyle's Arrest Prompts Hearing To Examine DHS Hiring Practices. Brian J. Doyle, DHS' deputy press secretary, was arrested Tuesday night on charges that he used a computer to seduce a child. According to the Polk County Sheriff's Department's Doyle revealed his position with DHS during the investigation. The Washington Post (4/6, A13, Londoño, Hsu, 744K) reports the arrest "has triggered a congressional inquiry into hiring practices and security clearance policies at the department." Rep. Peter T. King, who has scheduled a hearing for May 18, asked, "What if the person on the other end had been a member of al-Qa'ida or a similar terrorist organization and used this information to blackmail Mr. Doyle?" Polk County Sheriff Grady Judd said that "his office rushed the investigation" due to security concerns, adding, "we didn't know how much access to sensitive information he had or who else he was chatting to."

The Hill (4/6, Tiron) reports King said he is "concerned that DHS's security-clearance procedures and controls on misuse of electronic equipment do not meet the standards of other national-security agencies." The Subcommittee on Management, Integration and Oversight "was scheduled to examine DHS hiring and other personnel issues, including security clearances, on May 18. Now the subcommittee will examine Doyle's case in particular, King said."

USA Today (4/6, Hall, Copeland, Koch, 2.31M) reports Doyle "was stripped of his security clearance, suspended without pay and held without bail Wednesday." DHS spokesman Russ Knocke said the agency "is cooperating fully with the ongoing investigation. We take these allegations very seriously."' Judd said yesterday that Doyle had 'confessed.'"

On CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 (4/5, Meserve), Dr. John Deirmenjian said that Doyle may have said that he worked at DHS to "impress" the girl, or to try to "show her that he is someone of authority, somebody of security, that might lead a child to be more comfortable with him." Meserve:

"DHS' embarrassment in this incident is compounded by the fact that the department itself hunts down child internet predators." Julie Myers, assistant secretary of US Immigration and Customs Enforcement, was shown saying, "It's terrible if there are allegations against a public official, but wherever they are, if they're doing this against children, we're going to find them and we're going to prosecute them."

In an article appearing on at least 90 news websites yesterday, the AP (4/6, Jordan) reports Doyle's arrest "raised doubts about the ability of an agency responsible for safeguarding the country to ensure the security credentials of its own people." The AP notes, "Homeland Security also oversees an Operation Predator unit, which investigates child predators and pornographers."

The Los Angeles Times (4/6, Timiraos, 958K) reports Dennis Murphy, Doyle's former supervisor, said, "There's not a person I know who doesn't like him." The Times adds, "Doyle is the second department official recently arrested. Frank Figueroa, 49, who oversees Immigration and Customs Enforcement operations in Florida, has pleaded not guilty to charges that he exposed himself to a girl at an Orlando mall last year."

Scripps Howard (4/6, Hoffman) describes Operation Predator as "a high-priority Department of Homeland Security program that does battle against those who prey sexually on children. Now, with the arrest Tuesday night of a department deputy secretary, at least two of the agency's own top personnel stand charged with just such offenses. 'It hammers home the fact that these individuals can be anywhere,' said John Shehan, of the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, which works closely with Homeland Security's Immigration and Customs Enforcement bureau."

The story was covered by each of the networks last night in full segments, though none mentioned the upcoming House hearing. ABC World News Tonight (4/5, story 3, 2:15, Thomas, 8.78M) reported Doyle's "arrest is particularly painful for Homeland Security officials, who say they have made child exploitation a top priority."

The CBS Evening News (4/5, story 4, 2:25, Attkisson, 7.66M) reported, "Investigators say Doyle couldn't have been more brazen, giving out his title, calling from the office, even sending a photo showing his Homeland Security ID." Adding "insult to injury, it wasn't even the Feds who found Doyle, though he was right under their noses. It was the local Polk County, Florida, Sheriff's Office."

NBC Nightly News (4/5, story 4, 2:40, Williams, 9.87M) reported it was "another shocking example -- a spokesman for the Department of Homeland Security, Brian J. Doyle, was put on unpaid leave today after being charged with preying on a child through online sexual conversations."

CNN's The Situation Room (4/5, Blitzer) reported, "Doyle appeared Wednesday in a Maryland courtroom via closed- circuit television. He has confessed and for now is being held without bond."

The New York Times (4/6, Janofsky, 1.19M) reports that Doyle "refused extradition to Florida" Wednesday, his lawyer claiming that he "needed time to discuss the case with Mr. Doyle and would 'most likely' return to ask the court to release Mr. Doyle to allow him to turn himself in to the authorities in Florida, where he would be formally charged." The Washington Times (4/6, Taylor, 90K) reports, "Montgomery County State's Attorney Douglas F. Gansler said that although he has authority to try the case, he would rather see Mr. Doyle extradited. 'In Florida, he's looking at a minimum of 17½ years in prison,' Mr. Gansler said. 'No one would get that in Maryland.'"

In a related story, USA Today (4/6, Hall, Kornblum, 2.31M) reports Doyle's arrest "was the product of increasingly aggressive policing of sex crimes on the Internet, according to police and children's advocates." Justice Department "funding for the…Internet Crimes Against Children (ICAC) program increased from $2.4 million in 1998 to $14.5 million this year. … ICAC-related arrests tripled from 564 in 2003 to 1,597 in 2005." USA Today adds, "It's unknown whether the increase in arrests means more teens are being victimized or just that more predators are being caught."

Grand Jury Convened To Consider Charges Against McKinney. Fox News' Special Report (4/5, Wilson) reported, "A grand jury has been convened to determine whether charges will be brought against Cynthia McKinney who allegedly assaulted a Capitol Policeman with her cell phone." For Chief Terrance Gainer, "this is about protecting the 1,500 uniform men and women who has the responsibility of protecting the US Congress. He wants to see Representative McKinney arrested. … Gainer says the only reason that McKinney was not arrested immediately after the incident is because the constitution does provide some members with some protection in some cases from arrest while Congress is in session. Police just wanted to run everything past the lawyers."

Grand Jury Subpoenas Farr Aide. The grand jury has subpoenaed a House aide who allegedly witnessed the incident between Rep. Cynthia McKinney and a Capitol Police officer last week. Roll Call (4/6, McArdle) reports, "A staffer for Rep. Sam Farr (D-Calif.) has been subpoenaed to appear before a grand jury in the case. Farr's office confirmed on Wednesday night that one of its staffers had received the subpoena but offered no other comments on the matter. Reached on Wednesday night, a lawyer for McKinney said he did not know of any grand jury hearing being convened in the case." Roll Call adds that the subpoena indicates that the US Attorney's Office "is moving quickly to determine what occurred in the highly publicized altercation at a Longworth House Office Building security checkpoint."

Black Caucus Trying To Stay Out Of McKinney Controversy. CQ (4/4, Poole) reported, "Earlier in the day, a senior member of the Congressional Black Caucus, Rep. John Conyers Jr., D-Mich., said he and other caucus members were trying to stay out of the controversy, in part because they wanted it out of the headlines. … The way McKinney has handled the episode has put her fellow Black Caucus members in an awkward position. One veteran caucus member said privately that McKinney's outspokenness has not endeared her to many of her colleagues. Others said that they, too, have been stopped by Capitol Police, and any problems have been dealt with quickly and quietly."

Lewis Urges McKinney To "Lower The Temperature." Meanwhile. Rep. John Lewis has told McKinney to stop making political hay out of the incident. The Hill (4/6, Hearn) reports that Lewis said he told McKinney that she "needs to lower the temperature and stop holding the press conferences," adding, "I don't think it had any impact because she is still going on all the TV shows."

House Republicans Said To Be "Grateful" For McKinney Controversy. The Washington Post (4/6, A2, Milbank, 744K) reports in its "Washington Sketch" column that Democrats "were just beginning to dream about the possibility of taking control of the House in the November elections as GOP unity collapsed over spending, immigration, Iraq and lobbying scandals," when Rep. Cynthia McKinney has her altercation with a Capitol Police officer. House Republicans "were grateful for the gift." The Post adds, "Arriving on the floor yesterday afternoon for a series of votes, McKinney had earned pariah status. Several of her Democratic colleagues turned their backs or moved away when she approached, carrying her infamous cellphone and a bottle of Dasani water. Ignored by several colleagues, she stood alone in the back of the chamber for several minutes until rescued by Reps. Bernard Sanders (I-Vt.) and Maxine Waters (D-Calif.)."

Boehner Urges GOP Not To Pile On McKinney. Roll Call (4/6, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column, "At Wednesday's weekly closed-door House GOP Conference gathering, House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) urged his colleagues to quit piling on Rep. McKinney. His message basically was: Why murder someone who has already committed political suicide?"

DeLay Says McKinney Should Be Charged With Assault. Rep. Tom DeLay was asked on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (4/5) about the allegations against Rep. Cynthia McKinney. DeLay said, "These Capitol Police officers are not tour guides. They are protecting the capitol against all kinds of threats. For a member of Congress to treat one of these officers, who showed great courage, because he didn't know who she was. He didn't know that she didn't have a bomb strapped to her. He was doing his job, and for her first punch him and assault him and then afterwards, instead of apologizing to him, accuse him of racism is beyond the pale. It is outrageous and needs to be charged. And I hope she will be charged with assault and the House needs to deal with it." DeLay added that McKinney "has a long history of blaming everything on the color of her skin. She plays the victim card, the race card. She and her father and others are even anti-Semitic. She has that reputation."

Primary Foe Criticizes McKinney Over Altercation. Roll Call (4/6, Whittington) reports that DeKalb County Commissioner Hank Johnson (D), who is running against McKinney "is speaking out about the recent controversy involving her altercation with a Capitol Police officer." Johnson said Wednesday "that the situation should have been handled differently. 'There's no excuse for hitting a police officer,' he said." Johnson "charged that while McKinney is talking about hairdos and inappropriate touching, the needs of the residents of the Atlanta-area 4th district are being ignored. 'We don't feel like we've been getting our fair share of federal dollars,' he said. … Asked about the issue of racial profiling -- which McKinney has asserted is the underlying problem -- Johnson said he believed the officer was doing his job. 'I think the Capitol Hill police department has a job to do and their job is to protect the Members of Congress, the workers…their responsibility is to protect and to defend those people,' he said."

Two FEMA Employees Plead Guilty To Soliciting Katrina Relief Bribes. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (4/6, Johnson) reports, "Two Federal Emergency Management Agency employees pleaded guilty Wednesday to soliciting kickbacks from a food contractor during post-Katrina recovery efforts. Andrew Rose and Loyd Holliman each pleaded guilty in federal court to soliciting and receiving bribes as public officials, prosecutor Jim Letten said." The AP notes, "The contractor reported the offer to the FBI."

US Drops Death Penalty Push For New York Murder Scheme Suspects. The AP (4/6, Hays) reports, "Federal prosecutors are no longer seeking the death penalty against four defendants in a murder conspiracy case involving a notorious crack kingpin with ties to the rap music industry." The AP continues, "In a two-line letter sent to the judge Tuesday, prosecutors wrote they would still seek death for the chief defendant, Kenneth 'Supreme' McGriff, at a trial to begin April 17 in Brooklyn. … The new position was authorized by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, prosecutors said." The AP adds, "It is an abrupt reversal from prosecutors' previous position. They had notified the judge on March 22 that Gonzales had endorsed the death penalty against all five defendants. … Attorneys for McGriff demanded an explanation in a letter to U.S. District Judge Frederic Block that was dated Tuesday. They have asked the judge to deny the death notice for McGriff because it was filed too late. A hearing was set for Friday."

Louisiana Computer Executive Charged With Bribing Connecticut Official. The AP (4/6) reports, "The president of a Louisiana computer company has been charged with paying $3,000 to former state Sen. Ernest Newton for his promise to help her win lucrative contracts, federal officials said Wednesday." Jeanette Foxworth "faces multiple charges of conspiracy, wire fraud and making a false statement, U.S. Attorney Kevin O'Connor said. … The indictment also alleges Foxworth lied to FBI investigators during a January interview." The AP notes Newton "was sentenced in February to five years in prison after pleading guilty to unrelated charges of bribery and other crimes."

Officials Warn Of Online Sexual Predators. NBC News (4/6, Costello) reports, "Across the country, pedophiles have left the playgrounds and arcades for the anonymity of the Internet. One in five kids surveyed by the Justice Department reports receiving unwanted sexual solicitations online." NBC continues, "Catching online predators often involves finding those who traffic in online porn. Two-thirds of the offenders who committed any Internet sex crimes also possessed child porn. And the FBI reports online child porn cases have surged 2,000 percent since 1996. … 'The Internet provides an individual, a perpetrator, a potential criminal, the opportunity to hide their identity,' says the FBI's Raul Roldan. 'So they work in a covert environment — so they believe!'"

DOJ Will Not Reimburse Ohio Officials For Sniper Probe. The AP (4/6) reports, "The Justice Department does not have the money to reimburse Franklin County (OH) for the sheriff's investigation into a series of highway shootings, a federal official wrote in a letter to an Ohio congresswoman. … 'We recognize that the prolonged and difficult investigation placed a financial strain' on the sheriff's office, Assistant Attorney General William Moschella told U.S. Rep. Deborah Pryce in a letter dated Friday. 'However, there are no new funds available for the department to reimburse' the county." The AP adds, "Franklin County requested Justice Department grants to cover about $700,000 in overtime paid by the sheriff's office during the pursuit of the shooter who terrorized central Ohio for five months in late 2003 and early 2004, according to county e-mails obtained by The Columbus Dispatch. Charles McCoy Jr., arrested in March 2004, was sentenced to 27 years in prison for his guilty plea last August to involuntary manslaughter and other charges for shooting at cars and buildings on and around central Ohio highways. The one person hit in the shootings died. … The federal government reimbursed Maryland, Virginia and Washington, D.C., for their pursuit of highway snipers in 2002. … The Washington-area shootings are different because federal investigators were involved and an FBI analyst was killed during the spree, said Rob Nichols, a spokesman for Pryce."

US Indicts MS-13 Gang Members On Racketeering Charges. The Washington Post (4/6, B1, Castaneda) reports, "Even after he was locked up on state murder charges in Prince George's County, an alleged leader of the violent street gang Mara Salvatrucha continued to direct the criminal activities of his group by sending letters to a female member of the gang, according to a federal indictment unsealed yesterday." The Post continues, "Gang members also watched a videotape of a Prince George's police detective who had been investigating them and discussed killing him, the indictment alleges. And members killed a young man to prevent him from cooperating in a federal probe of the gang, according to the indictment." The Post adds, "The 53-page indictment, made public in U.S. District Court in Greenbelt, supersedes an indictment handed down by a federal grand jury last August that charged 19 young men with federal racketeering counts. … That indictment was the first racketeering case brought in Maryland against the gang, signaling an increased federal involvement in local efforts to combat it. The gang, also known as MS-13, is comprised primarily of Salvadoran immigrants with some other Central Americans and Mexicans and began showing up in the Washington area in the late 1980s. … The indictment released yesterday provides additional details about the gang's alleged activities and what police say are its efforts to derail investigations and intimidate witnesses. It charges that members committed six murders and attempted four murders in suburban Maryland from April 2003 to June 2005."

Former Strip Club Owner Testifies He Bribed Nevada Commissioners. The AP (4/6, Ritter) reports, "A former striptease club owner who pleaded guilty to bankrolling political corruption in Las Vegas and San Diego testified Wednesday that he bribed three county commissioners in return for votes benefiting his Nevada businesses. 'I didn't consider them campaign contributions,' said Michael Galardi, using the word 'bribes' when asked by a federal prosecutor to characterize cash he said he paid to former Clark County Commissioners Erin Kenny, Dario Herrera and Mary Kincaid-Chauncey. … But he stumbled when his estimate of a total of 15 to 20 payments to Herrera and Kenny conflicted with his earlier statements to prosecutors and the FBI that payments were monthly. He estimated he gave Kincaid-Chauncey up to $85,000 over the years." KLAS-TV Las Vegas (4/5, Allen) adds, "Galardi testified he first bribed an elected official 16 years ago by giving $10,000 to Las Vegas city councilman Frank Hawkins to settle a licensing issue for his Cheetahs strip club. In the mid-90s, Galardi says he paid city councilman Michael McDonald $5,000 a month for a series of years for political influence. Galardi also claims that Clark County Deputy District Attorneys Gary Guymon and Craig Hendricks received free drinks, lap dances and sexual favors whenever they visited Cheetahs."

The Las Vegas Sun (4/6, German) reports, "Former federal prosecutor Charles Kelly, a criminal defense attorney who has been following the Las Vegas trial closely, said the use of Galardi as a witness should be creating 'a great deal of anxiety' for the government. … 'The jury is entitled to know what type of person they're being asked to trust,' Kelly said. 'If they built a case around a guy who lied about the extent of his influence, they could end up holding a wet paper bag with the bottom having fallen out.'" The Sun notes, "Prosecutors have presented hours of court-approved wiretaps to support Galardi's testimony. And they have called witnesses, such as former County Commissioner Erin Kenny, who pleaded guilty to taking bribes from Galardi, to corroborate his accusations against Herrera and Kincaid-Chauncey. … Galardi's testimony also stood up well enough to obtain federal corruption convictions last year in San Diego of his bagman, former Commissioner Lance Malone, and two San Diego councilmen - although a judge later tossed out the brunt of the case against one councilman."

Missouri Man Sentenced To Prison For Attempt To Fence Rembrandt Forgery. In "Arts Briefly," The New York Times (4/6, 1.19M) reports, "A fake sheik who sold a fake Rembrandt has been sentenced to five months in federal prison and five months of home confinement, The Associated Press reported." Majed A. Ihmoud of St. Charles, Mo., "pleaded guilty to conspiring to commit mail fraud for dressing as a sheik and posing as a member of the Saudi royal family in a scheme to sell a forgery of Rembrandt's 'Man With the Golden Helmet' for $2.8 million. The buyer turned out to be an undercover F.B.I. agent."

FBI Agents Search Staten Island Mansion For Mob Murder Evidence. The New York Times (4/6, Rashbaum, 1.19M) reports, "Acting on information provided by a cooperating witness, F.B.I. agents yesterday searched for evidence of a mob murder inside a Victorian mansion on a Staten Island hilltop, according to several law enforcement officials. … The F.B.I. lab will conduct forensic tests on evidence removed from the building, one of the officials said. The search was by members of the F.B.I. squad that investigates the Bonanno crime family, several officials said, but they would not disclose the identity of the suspected victim." The Times notes, "A spokesman for the agency, James Margolin, confirmed the search but would not say whether agents had concluded that a murder had been committed in the mansion." The New York Daily News (4/6, Eaberg, Moore, 729K) adds, "The feds also called Ron Victorio, an architect who oversaw recent renovations at the Victorian landmark to get a list of people who had worked on the project. … FBI officials would not identify who they believe was slain and stashed in the mansion, saying the victim's family had not been told of the informant's tip." The New York Post (4/6, Messing, 624K) notes FBI spokeswoman Christine Monaco said, "We executed a search warrant as part of a criminal investigation." She "refused further comment, but other sources said the agents…showed up at the historic 130-acre compound just before noon. … 'It's an evidence search,' said one well-placed law-enforcement source, who declined to name the suspected victim or to specify when the slaying occurred."

"Mafia Cops" Trial Jurors End First Day Of Deliberations. Newsday (4/6, DeStefano) reports, "The jury in the 'Mafia Cops' trial ended its first day of deliberations Wednesday in Brooklyn federal court without reaching a verdict on whether ex-NYPD detectives Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa were double agents for the mob. Deliberations are to continue Thursday morning." The New York Daily News (4/6, Marzulli, 729K) notes, "There were notes from the jury asking for readback of testimony from chief witness Burt Kaplan on the murder of James Hydell. The panel also revisited a retired cop's testimony where cassette tapes featuring mob informant John (Otto) Heidell were stored in the 63rd Precinct." The New York Post (4/6, Haberman, 624K) also reports on the deliberations, under the headline "'Mob-Cop' Jury Requests 'Pipe' Line."

New York Couple Plead Guilty To Bilking New York Archdiocese. The New York Daily News (4/6, Zambito, 729K) reports, "A husband-and-wife team yesterday admitted ripping off the New York Archdiocese for $2 million. Vincent Heintz and Nanette Melera ran a nonprofit agency, Institutional Commodity Services, that bought Communion wine, food and automobiles for the archdiocese at bulk-rate prices. FBI agents say the Briarcliff Manor couple shook down vendors for payoffs in a scheme that dated to 1996."

Husband Of Illinois Congresswoman Sentenced To Five Months For Check Kiting. The Chicago Tribune (4/6, Higgins, Cohen, 643K) reports, "Robert Creamer, a top Democratic consultant and the husband of U.S. Rep. Jan Schakowsky (D-Ill.), was sentenced Wednesday to 5 months in prison for using bad checks to prop up his struggling consumer group and for a tax charge." Creamer "also must serve 11 months of home confinement," but "he escaped the longer sentence of 30 to 37 months suggested by federal guidelines," and prosecutors are considering an appeal. The Tribune notes Creamer attorney, Ted Poulos "said Wednesday in court that the prosecution had a 'seriously myopic view' of the case and had wrongly lumped Creamer in with the fraud defendants who take a bank's money and run." But Assistant US Attorney Joseph Ferguson "countered that Creamer should have known that his methods were illegal after FBI agents interviewed him in 1992. Yet he repeated the same crimes, repaying money only after the scheme was discovered, Ferguson said." The Chicago Sun-Times (4/6, Korecki) also reports on Creamer's indictment.

California Clinic "Capper" Pleads Guilty To Medicare Fraud. The AP (4/6) reports, "A 'capper' who recruited patients for a Lemon Grove clinic that allegedly billed Medicare for services never performed pleaded guilty Wednesday to insurance fraud and offering illegal medical kickbacks." Alicia Leonardo "is one of nine people, including the clinic's operators, to be indicted in what prosecutors called a $2 million conspiracy." The AP notes, "The FBI began investigating the clinic…in November 2004 after learning that 'cappers' were allegedly paying patients to visit, prosecutors said. Deputy District Attorney Rita Hanscom said patients who had difficulty with the English language were recruited from casinos, trolley stops and other locations."

Wisconsin Bank President Charged With Fraud. The Monroe (WI) Times (4/6, Gray) reports, "Former First National Bank president Mark R. Hardyman is expected to plead guilty May 1 to one count of bank fraud." According to the federal complaint unsealed yesterday, "Hardyman altered documents, altered bank records to mislead federal auditors, granted customer loans which were not authorized or approved by the board, falsified minutes of board meetings, solicited false financial statements from a bank customer to make it appear the customer was more creditworthy to bank examiners and auditors and caused a false entry to be made in FNBB records which indicated that a particular customer had received a $2.2 million wire when Hardyman knew the wire had not been received." The Times notes that the FBI, FDIC, IRS and Agriculture Department investigated the case.

Two New Yorkers Plead Guilty To Multi-State Investment Fraud. The Lynchburg News & Advance (4/1, Waugh) reported, "A Lynchburg resident was the biggest victim in an investment scheme devised by five New York men." Dennis Testa and Nicholas Lanza "pleaded guilty Friday to bilking seven people in at least five states out of more than $400,000 by tricking them into purchasing non-existent stock for a company in New York, according to a release from the U.S. Attorney's Office." The News & Advance notes, "The charges came out of an FBI investigation that began in 1998 involving an individual who posed as a legitimate stockbroker in New York and made calls to investors in other states, including Virginia." Assistant U.S. Attorney Nancy Healey "said she thought the FBI did a great job on the case and said she hopes people learn something from the case. 'I think this case shows that people who think that they can get away with crime outside their home area are mistaken.' she said.

Duke Lacrosse Coach Resigns Over Rape Scandal. ABC World News Tonight (4/5, story 4, :30, Vargas) reported Duke University lacrosse coach Mike Pressler has resigned, "three weeks after three of his players were accused of raping a woman. Also today, Duke's president cancelled the rest of the season for the team. He cited what he called the sickening and repulsive contents of a warrant to search the house where the rape allegedly took place. Police are awaiting the results on DNA tests on nearly every player on the lacrosse team."

The CBS Evening News (4/5, story 8, 0:20, Mitchell) reported Durham, North Carolina, police "pressed their investigation of rape allegations against three players."

NBC Nightly News (4/5, story 5, 0:20, Williams) reported, "No charges have been filed in this case as yet but the scandal has caused racial and class tensions in the community."

CIVIL LAW:

Waxman Seeks Details Of Pentagon Contract. The Los Angeles Times (4/5, Roche, 958K) reports, "Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles) asked the Pentagon on Wednesday to release details of a $47-million Air Force contract that an inspector general's report has found was awarded improperly." Waxman "cited the March 3 report, which says the no-bid contract to a subsidiary of Engineered Support Systems Inc., or ESSI, came as a result of intervention by Darlene A. Druyun. … Waxman noted in his letter that President Bush's uncle, William H.T. Bush, was an ESSI shareholder when the vehicle maintenance contract was awarded."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Osceola, FL, Rejects DOJ Voting Rights Settlement Offer. The Orlando Sentinel (4/6, Sashin)

reports, "Osceola County commissioners have rejected the first settlement offer in the federal government's voting-rights lawsuit against the county." The Sentinel continues, "Justice Department attorneys last month proposed a meeting to discuss a possible settlement. It suggested Osceola could switch from its countywide election format to five or six district seats and satisfy the Voting Rights Act. … 'We remain open to considering alternatives that accomplish that objective and meet the interests of the county and its officials,' Justice Department attorney Tim Mellett wrote in a March 13 letter to Osceola's outside counsel, Vincent Fontana." The Sentinel adds, "The County Commission met in closed session March 27 to discuss the matter, and the county attorney's office planned to send an official response late Tuesday. … Fontana also disputed a Justice contention that it had created a district model in which one of five had a majority of Hispanic citizens of voting age. In such a district, the New York attorney said, eligible Hispanic voters still would be in the minority. … The five county commissioners now reside in different districts but are elected countywide. In its July lawsuit, the Justice Department says Osceola could give Hispanics more influence at the polls by switching from countywide or "at-large" elections to five equal-size districts, one of which would be majority Hispanic, to counter what it claims has been a history of bloc voting by non-Hispanics against Hispanic candidates. … The county contends Hispanics would be worse off under the Justice Department's plan because they would have influence in only one or two districts, Fontana said."

FBI Joins Investigation Of Assault On Baylor Muslim Student. KWTX-TV Waco (4/5) reports, "The FBI is working with the Baylor University Department of Public Safety to investigate an attack on a female Muslim student on the campus, Baylor Police Chief Jim Doak announced Wednesday evening. 'We have had an FBI representative on campus with us throughout the day today and will continue to work with the agency as this process goes forward,' Doak said." KWTX notes that the student "required emergency room treatment for a dislocated shoulder and contusions." Baylor University (4/5, Fogleman) adds on its Web site, "Formally known as a Domestic Police Cooperation investigation, the FBI is partnering with Baylor DPS to lend its resources to the process of gathering and analyzing leads and other information related to the case."

Florida Mosques, Temples Report Rising Hate Crime Incidents. The Miami Herald (4/6, Fantz, 323K) reports, "The weekend defacing of a Muslim prayer hall and a new audit of hate crimes against Jews brought into relief the continuing threats against Muslim and Jewish houses of worship in South Florida. On Sunday, volunteers for the Islamic Center of South Florida discovered that vandals had sprayed the words 'Osama BinLeden' in yellow paint on a wall of their new school," and "the Anti-Defamation League released an audit on Wednesday indicating that hate crimes against Jews increased statewide last year, from 173 in 2004 to 199 in 2005." Additionally, "At least five incidents of vandalism in South Florida involved mosques or places of Muslim worship last year."

Growing Muslim-American TV Network To Reach 1 Million US Homes. The AP (4/6, Thompson) reports, "A first-of-its-kind Muslim-American television network launched a year ago has gone from being a premium pay channel to a basic-cable offering on several cable and satellite systems, broadening its reach from 10,000 to more than 1 million U.S. homes. Bridges TV, featuring Muslim-American lifestyle and cultural programming, also has been approved by the Canadian Radio & Television Commission to start broadcasting in Canada." The AP notes, "The Buffalo office of the FBI has taken notice and will use the network for an 'FBI Townhall Meeting' May 15, during which an FBI agent will field on-air questions and comments from Muslim and Arab-American viewers."

NASCAR Objects To Show On Anti-Muslim Attitudes. NASCAR is objecting to a planned series on the NBC newsmagazine "Dateline," about American attitudes toward Islam, claiming the series targets race fans as potential sources for harassment of Muslim-Americans. The Washington Times (4/6, Lemke, 90K) reports that the newsmagazine is "placing Muslim and Arab-American volunteers in a variety of public places, including NASCAR races, and filming their experiences in an attempt to record discrimination or harassment. … Arab-Americans were stationed in the crowd at last week's NASCAR race in Martinsville, Va., and NBC is considering doing the same at Sunday's race in Fort Worth, Texas. NBC officials said NASCAR races were only one place where Muslims would be placed."

NOPD Facing New Brutality Allegations. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (4/6, Foster) reports, "New Orleans' police department…is investigating new allegations of brutality: claims that three white officers beat up the wife of a black officer this week. The probe comes less than a week after two former officers -- both white -- were indicted on felonies in the French Quarter beating of a black retired teacher," although "two FBI agents seen helping to restrain the man were cleared of wrongdoing Wednesday, the bureau said." The victim of the alleged beating this week, Jonie Pratt, "had a black eye, a swollen forehead and a brace on her fractured left wrist," and her mother-in-law "said the injuries were inflicted after police pulled Pratt over, claiming she ran a stop sign. … The FBI said it is conducting a preliminary inquiry to determine whether the case warrants further investigation." The New Orleans Times-Picayune

(4/5, 257K) reported FBI Special Agent Sheila Thorne said that the bureau has opened a "preliminary inquiry" into the new allegations. Thorne added, "Whenever we become aware of an allegation of a possible civil rights violation, we look into it to see if it warrants further investigation."

Pennsylvania County Scraps New Voting Machine Deal. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (4/5, Sherman) reports, "With just six weeks to go before the May primary, Allegheny County is scrapping a multi-million-dollar deal for electronic voting machines built by Sequoia Voting System and instead is purchasing 4,700 touch-screen machines from Nebraska-based Election Systems and Software Inc." The Post-Gazette continues, "County Chief Executive Dan Onorato made the announcement today, saying Pennsylvania Secretary of State Pedro A. Cortes told him last week that Sequoia's system likely would not be certified because of critical software problems. … That information convinced county officials to fall back on an $11.9 million deal with ES&S for the company's iVotronic unit, which resembles a bank ATM and has already received both state and federal certification." The Post-Gazette adds, "More than 20 Pennsylvania counties already have decided to purchase the iVotronic to satisfy the Help America Vote Act, a sweeping federal law that requires local governments nationwide to upgrade their voting equipment this year or face legal action from the Justice Department. … Because of the looming deadline, ES&S plans to supply each of the county's more than 1,300 voting precincts with at least one machine by the May 16 primary election, although they hope to have at least two per precinct. For the November general election, the company hopes to have all 4,700 machines in place."

Man Sues Prince George's County Police Claiming Racism. The Washington Post (4/6, B4, Londoño) reports, "An African American restaurateur from Prince George's County filed a civil rights lawsuit yesterday against the Montgomery County police department and two patrol officers alleging that he was unreasonably stopped, searched and arrested because he is black." The Post continues, "Donnell Long, a chef who owns two Largo restaurants -- Stonefish Grill and the Red Star Tavern -- was pulled over in Silver Spring on Feb. 23 as he was driving two employees home in a vehicle that belongs to a relative of one of the passengers. … Long said he was handcuffed for nearly 40 minutes by two white officers who, he said, searched the inside of his vehicle, including his trunk, without permission. … Long is seeking $5 million in damages." The Post adds, "In the late 1990s, the U.S. Department of Justice investigated allegations of racial profiling against the Montgomery police. The department agreed to keep better data on whom officers stop and why and to have officers attend diversity training courses."

Faith-Based Groups Sue Over Wisconsin Campaign. A coalition of faith-based groups has filed suit saying their First Amendment's rights of freedom of religion and expression were violated when they were not allowed to participate as recipients in a program through which Wisconsin state employees can earmark charitable donations through payroll deductions. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (4/6, Forster, 266K) reports, "The federal lawsuit by the Springfield, Va.-based Association of Faith-Based Organizations said a state committee has rejected applications from organizations that are led by people who share a religious faith. … The lawsuit challenges the procedures for determining which organizations are eligible to receive contributions through the Wisconsin State Employees Combined Campaign. The campaign, which has been run annually since 1973, allows state and University of Wisconsin employees to have charitable contributions deducted from their paychecks during a monthlong window. About 10,000 state employees participated in 2005, donating $2.8 million."

Virginia AG Sides With Boy Scouts In Lawsuit. Virginia State Attorney General Robert McDonnell is supporting a Defense Department effort to overturn a court ruling barring the Boy Scouts of America from holding its annual Jamboree at Fort A.P. Hill in the state. The Washington Times (4/6, McLaughlin, 90K) reports, "Last year, a federal court in Chicago sided with the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU), saying the Pentagon's assistance in the Scouts' Jamboree was unconstitutional because the group's 'duty to God' oath makes it a religious organization. Oral arguments are scheduled to start today in the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Chicago." McDonnell said, "This is the latest attempt by a leftist, liberal group to go after an outstanding group in the Boy Scouts of America."

DC Government To Fund PR Campaign On Statehood. The DC government is planning to fund a public relations campaign on DC statehood. This, despite a federal law barring the use of city o federal funds for such activities. The Washington Times (4/6, Doolittle, 90K) reports that the city will distribute $1 million in grants to several groups for the campaign. Grant supporters "say the law against lobbying does not apply because the money is to be used for 'education.' They say the education grant is a creative way to circumvent federal guidelines." According to the Times, "Our Nation's Capital (ONC) will receive $300,000 and the League of Women Voters (LWV) of the District of Columbia will receive $200,000 for the public relations campaign."

Universities Yielding To Wishes Of Faithful On Hiring. A front page story in the Wall Street Journal (4/6,Golden, 2.11M) reports on "the rising influence of religious groups over the teaching of their faiths at secular colleges, despite concerns about academic freedom. US universities have usually hired religious-studies professors regardless of whether they practiced or admired the faiths they researched." But "some universities are bending to the views of private donors and state legislators by hiring the faithful."

Automatic Voter Registration For High School Seniors Proposed. John B. Anderson, a candidate for president in 1980, and the chairman of FairVote, which promotes fair elections, and Ray Martinez III, who serves on the United States Election Assistance Commission, write in the New York Times (4/6, 1.19M) that "all too many young people will graduate from high school without registering to vote and without even taking a class on the basics of voting. We need a new 'leave no voter behind' policy. … We propose automatic voter registration for all high school seniors; our goal is the registration of all eligible students before they graduate." They conclude, "By improving our registration and education efforts, we will not only help protect the voting preferences of younger Americans but the long-term vitality of our participatory democracy. Let's not leave any voters behind."

ANTITRUST:

FTC Gives Antitrust Nod To Boston Scientific-Guidant Deal. The AP (4/6) reports, "Boston Scientific Corp. said Wednesday it has won antitrust clearance from the Federal Trade Commission's staff for its $27 billion acquisition of former medical devices rival Guidant Corp., but is still awaiting final approval from the full commission as well as European regulators." The AP continues, "Also on Wednesday, Guidant said its first-quarter sales dropped 6% from last year, and it expects to record more than $120 million in charges for the quarter. Guidant has suffered sliding sales because of product recalls and news that the company withheld information about the faulty devices." The AP adds, "Boston Scientific said it continues to expect its acquisition of Guidant to close around the middle of this month following regulatory clearances. … Boston Scientific said it had entered into consent agreements with the FTC staff to resolve antitrust issues. The company did not provide details on the agreements, but Boston Scientific spokesman Paul Donovan said the agreements 'do not require any material changes to the transaction.'" The AP notes, "European regulators last week pushed back the deadline they set for completing their review until April 18, although a decision could come sooner."

Wall Street Lobbying Firms Pursuing Merger. Two of Wall Street's largest lobbying groups have announced that they will pursue a merger. The Wall Street Journal (4/6, Burns, 2.11M) reports that the Securities Industry Association and the Bond Market Association "said their boards of directors voted to endorse the concept of merging. Once the details are worked out, the two boards will vote on final approval June 30, with the full membership of each group voting on the merger after that."

JP Morgan Gets FTC Approval To Buy Kohl's Card Unit. Dow Jones (4/6) reports, "J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. received antitrust clearance from the Federal Trade Commission to buy the credit-card operations of department store chain Kohl's Corp. for $1.5 billion." Dow Jones continues, "The FTC announced Wednesday that it granted J.P. Morgan early termination on Tuesday of the waiting period required by the Hart-Scott-Rodino antitrust law. … The Kohl's portfolio includes 13 million accounts with about $1.5 billion in outstanding balances. Kohl's (KSS) is based in Menomonee Falls, Wis." Dow Jones adds, "As part of the transaction, the two companies will coordinate programs aimed at spurring Kohl's sales and card use. Kohl's will continue to manage customer service, advertising and marketing for the cards."

Group Asks Judge To Keep Seattle Newspaper Dispute In Court. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (4/5, Richman) reports, "A self-styled citizens' group today asked a King County Superior Court judge not to halt courtroom proceedings over the contract binding Seattle's two daily newspapers." The P-I continues, "Halting the litigation would be a necessary step before the publishers could move their dispute into binding arbitration, as they proposed last week. They want to exclude the group, known as The Committee for a Two-Newspaper Town, from that arbitration. … But the committee, composed of citizens and union members employed by The Seattle Times and the Seattle P-I, said that such a halt would make it impossible for its own legal claims to be heard. In its 12-page motion, the committee told Judge Greg Canova that it is 'on a par with the other two parties and has an equal right to pursue litigation in this forum without (undue) delay or disruption.'" The P-I adds, "Nearly three years ago, when P-I owner The Hearst Corp. sued to prevent The Seattle Times Co. from exiting the joint operating agreement, or JOA, that has bound them since 1983, the committee argued that key provisions of the JOA violate federal antitrust law as restraints of trade."

Apple Launches Program Allowing Macs To Use Windows. USA Today (4/6, Graham, Kessler) reports that Apple Computer on Wednesday "for the first time unveiled software allowing Microsoft's Windows operating system to run on Apple's PCs. … That's a huge change for the iconoclastic PC maker, which has long shunned Windows even though it runs on more than 90% of PCs. Now Apple is moving toward the mainstream and easing its decades-long rivalry with Microsoft."

The Wall Street Journal (4/6) reports, "Yet the new capability may not be enough to persuade that most lucrative and demanding of high-tech customers -- businesses -- to switch large portions of their PCs to Macs, some corporate technology officers say."

The Los Angeles Times (4/6, Sanchez) reports, "Investors apparently viewed the program, called Boot Camp, and Apple's recent rollout of computers powered by Intel microchips as steps that will broaden the appeal of its products, which have been praised for their innovative features but account for less than 5% of personal computer sales. The rest of the market is dominated by PCs that use Microsoft's Windows programs in concert with Intel chips. … The Cupertino, Calif.-based company made Boot Camp available today on its website as a free download. After users download and install Boot Camp, they can purchase a copy of Windows and will then be able to switch between Apple's operating system and Microsoft's program every time they restart their computers, the company said."

The Washington Post (4/6, D1, Musgrove) reports that "analysts said yesterday that Apple's Boot Camp software -- which allows the Windows operating system to run on an Apple machine -- is significant for Apple because it helps change the stakes in a purchasing decision that, for years, has kept the Mac's share of the PC market under 5 percent. Boot Camp…could tempt computer buyers who had previously resisted buying a Mac."

The New York Times (4/6, Markoff) reports, "The move was greeted with exuberance even among the loyal cult of Macintosh enthusiasts who sustained Apple through many bleak years before its resurgence on the strength of its iPod music player. Its sleek machines have long been objects of consumer lust but are frequently passed over in favor of more pedestrian computers that run Windows, leaving Apple with about 5 percent of the personal computer market."

Finnish Antitrust Officials Suspect Forest-Product Price-Fixing. The AP (4/5) reports, "The Finnish Competition Authority said Wednesday it suspects three forest companies of price fixing and has asked them to respond." The AP continues, "In a statement, the agency said it began an investigation in 2004 into suspected 'forbidden price cooperation and exchange of information for the purpose of limiting competition in wood procurement' in 1997-2004, but gave no details." The AP adds, "The antitrust body has given the three forest-product companies, Stora Enso Oyj, UPM-Kymmene Corp. and Metsaliitto Osuuskunta, until mid-May to respond to the results of its investigation after which it will decide whether to pursue the case in court. … The competition authority also noted that UPM-Kymmene might receive immunity because 'it had cooperated with the FCA.'"

P&G, Coca-Cola Settle Patent Suits. The AP (4/6) reports, "Procter & Gamble Co. has settled a lawsuit against Coca-Cola Co. that claimed the beverage maker was using P&G's patented technology that adds calcium to fruit juices, the companies said." The AP continues, "The lawsuit, filed in May 2002, said Coca-Cola's Minute Maid juice division was violating P&G's 1988 patent. P&G said that it had exclusively licensed the patented technology to Tropicana Products Inc., a division of Pepsi-Co Inc. … The settlement will allow Coca-Cola to continue selling its calcium fortified juices." The AP adds, "The companies also announced settlement of another lawsuit alleging Coca-Cola was using P&G's patented preservative system in several of its products. Under that agreement, Coca-Cola will be allowed to use the technology in certain noncarbonated products. … P&G has filed a variety of such infringement suits against other companies over the years."

Grand Jury Subpoenas Acuity Brands In Wastewater Plant Probe. Dow Jones (4/6) reports, "Acuity Brands Inc. said Wednesday that it and its Acuity Specialty Products Group Inc. unit received grand jury subpoenas in March related to the Justice Department's ongoing investigation of the unit's wastewater pretreatment plant in Atlanta." Dow Jones continues "Acuity Brands, an Atlanta-based provider of lighting fixtures and specialty chemical products, said in a quarterly report with the Securities and Exchange Commission that the Justice Department had requested information regarding Acuity Specialty's management of hazardous waste at the plant. The investigation mainly concerned the unit's operation of the plant, according to the SEC filing." Dow Jones adds, "Acuity Brands said the latest subpoenas are in addition to ones the company and its unit received in August 2003 and another subpoena that went solely to Acuity Specialty last April."

US Probing BP's Pipeline Problems. The Wall Street Journal (4/6) reports, "U.S. environmental regulators are conducting a criminal investigation into BP PLC's management of pipelines in Alaska's North Slope, according to people familiar with the matter, adding to mounting regulatory scrutiny of the British energy titan's U.S. operations." The Journal continues, "These people said the investigation, which has been under way for several months by officials at the Environmental Protection Agency, was expanded to include an early March spill of an estimated 134,000 to 267,000 gallons of crude from a BP-operated pipeline at Prudhoe Bay. Alaska state conservation officials say the pipeline ruptured from internal corrosion, causing what is considered the largest oil spill ever in the energy-rich North Slope." The Journal adds, "One person familiar with the matter said the federal investigators are looking at corrosion issues on the ruptured line, as well as others in the area, to determine if BP has committed any violations of the federal Clean Water Act. The act carries criminal and civil penalties for violations, such as allowing oil to spill into a federal waterway. … The EPA probe is just the latest embarrassment for BP -- the world's second-largest publicly traded oil company, after Exxon Mobil Corp. -- and Chief Executive John Browne, who has aggressively promoted the company as environmentally friendly and socially responsible."

Administration Said To Be Muzzling Scientists On Global Warming. The Washington Post (4/6, A27, Eilperin, 744K) reports scientists "doing climate research for the federal government say the Bush administration has made it hard for them to speak forthrightly to the public about global warming. The result, the researchers say, is a danger that Americans are not getting the full story on how the climate is changing." Employees and contractors "working for the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, along with a U.S. Geological Survey scientist working at an NOAA lab, said in interviews that over the past year administration officials have chastised them for speaking on policy questions; removed references to global warming from their reports, news releases and conference Web sites; investigated news leaks; and sometimes urged them to stop speaking to the media altogether. Their accounts indicate that the ideological battle over climate-change research, which first came to light at NASA, is being fought in other federal science agencies as well."

Senate Democrats Criticize EPA Nominee, Bush Air Pollution Proposals. CQ (4/5, Tollefson) reports Senate Democrats yesterday "hammered the Bush administration's choice to manage the EPA's air and radiation program, questioning his role in developing industry-friendly pollution regulations." William L. Wehrum, "the acting administrator for air and radiation since August 2005, was nominated to fill the position permanently. Republicans on the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee generally praised him for several years of work as counsel to the previous program administrator, Jeffrey Holmstead." But Democrats "and the committee's ranking minority member, James M. Jeffords, I-Vt., used the nomination to criticize several White House air pollution initiatives." An aide said Sen. Barbara Boxer "plans to put a hold on the nomination if it moves to the Senate floor, an aide said. A panel vote is expected on the nomination at the end of the month."

Study Suggests Power Companies Can Limit Greenhouse Gases. The Christian Science Monitor (4/6, Clayton, 61K) reports the nation's "big power companies are creating smaller amounts of gases that cause smog and acid rain than they were 15 years ago, but they're producing more greenhouse gases. That's the conclusion of a joint industry-environmentalist report, released Wednesday, which offers a ray of hope in the battle against global warming." David Hawkins, climate director of the Natural Resources Defense Council, said, "What this report shows is that with careful government regulation, companies can lower the pollution coming from power plants smokestacks - and we should be doing this with greenhouse gases like carbon dioxide, too." The Monitor adds "that conclusion remains anathema to many within the electric-power industry, who prefer a voluntary approach."

NYTimes Criticizes USDA Mad Cow Testing Policy. In an editorial, the New York Times (4/6, 1.19M) says, "Late last month, Creekstone Farms, a Kansas-based beef company, sued the United States Department of Agriculture" because the agency "won't let it" test all of its cattle for mad cow disease. The USDA argues that "100 percent testing would not guarantee food safety because mad cow disease can be hard to detect in younger cattle." The Times called the agency's argument "nonsense -- as if we were more likely to be safe by following a testing plan based on statistical modeling of the beef supply than by actually testing all the cattle." However, it conceded that "private testing is not the way to go in the long run." Instead, the Times says the USDA "should test every cow that goes to slaughter."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mueller, Gonzales Defend ChoicePoint Software Contract. The AP (4/6) reports FBI Director Robert Mueller, testifying yesterday before the justice subcommittee of the Senate Appropriations Committee, "defended…the bureau's decision to award a $12 million contract to a Georgia-based consumer data collection company that recently paid a record fine for a security breach." Sen. Patrick Leahy criticized the contract with ChoicePoint and "called the company 'the poster child for lax identity protection.'" Mueller "said the FBI's five-year agreement…was for software 'that will help analysts do their job. It's not a data package.'" IDG News Service (4/5, Gross) notes Leahy "blasted the DOJ and the FBI division," but Attorney General Alberto Gonzales defended the contract, saying that it "represented the best value for the FBI, and it covers software and technology, not data services."

The Washington Post (4/6, A11, Eggen, 744K) reports that at the hearing, Sen. Richard Shelby "and Democratic colleagues sharply questioned Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales about an administration proposal to slash assistance to local law enforcement by more than $1 billion in fiscal 2007. In unusually candid remarks, two key agency heads -- FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III and Drug Enforcement Administration chief Karen P. Tandy -- acknowledged that the proposed cuts could limit enforcement efforts and discourage local police from offering assistance in terrorism inquiries and other federal investigations. … Gonzales said the cuts were a 'difficult decision' that reflected a desire to focus on the most effective uses of taxpayer money."

Shelby Questions Sentinel Contract With Lockheed Martin. IDG News Service (4/5, Gross) also reports Sen. Richard Shelby "questioned the FBI's investments in new technology following its decision in March 2005 to abandon a case-management project after spending $170 million over four years. … 'This new technology is critically important, but I remain concerned that the FBI does not possess the necessary project management expertise, nor do I feel that the FBI has applied lessons learned from past mistakes,' said Shelby. FBI Director Robert Mueller said the new contract with Lockheed Martin will face performance audits from investigators within and outside the FBI. … 'We have learned from the mistakes of the past, and we are intent on bringing this home,' he said."

Closing Arguments Made In Drug Trial Of Baltimore Police Detectives. The Baltimore Sun (4/5, Dolan, 296K) reported that in closing arguments Tuesday at the corruption trial of Baltimore detectives William King and Antonio Murray, Assistant US Attorney Charles Peters "called the detectives 'animals' for preying on victims in a 'jungle' of West Baltimore -- a characterization that drew an impassioned rebuke from the officers' attorneys." Defense lawyer Russell Neverdon "described the officers as scapegoats inside a department that had been buffeted by the changing policies of several police commissioners in recent years." The Sun notes, "Relying on testimony from cooperating witnesses and hours of secretly recorded conversations from the FBI, prosecutors charged King and Murray last year with conspiring to rob and extort cocaine, heroin and marijuana -- as well as drug-related proceeds -- from suspects they pursued on city streets in late 2004 and early 2005."

DEA Said To Be "Retooling" For Age Of Terrorism. In U.S. News and World Report (4/5) David E. Kaplan writes, "Remember the war on drugs? It's still there, folks, but the narcs have taken a back seat to the war on terrorism. Not to miss a beat, the Drug Enforcement Administration, the 11,000-strong counternarcotics force under the Justice Department, is retooling for the age of terrorism and focusing more of its efforts on what it calls the drug-terror nexus. … Using techniques honed against Latin American drug lords, the DEA is employing a 'kingpin' strategy to take out traffickers tied to terrorist groups."

ACLU Claims Ethnic Bias In Georgia Meth Case. The New York Times (4/6, Zernike) reports the ACLU "is accusing federal prosecutors of ethnic bias in a sting last summer in which South Asian owners of convenience stores in Georgia were charged with selling household ingredients that could be used to make methamphetamine. In a legal filing, the ACLU said yesterday that prosecutors ignored extensive evidence that white-owned stores were selling the same items to methamphetamine makers and focused instead on South Asians to take advantage of language barriers.

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (4/6, Ahmed) reports the ACLU "said that while more than 80 percent of stores in the area where 'Operation Meth Merchant' was conducted are owned by whites or other ethnic groups, 23 of the 24 stores targeted by the investigation are owned by South Asians. All but five of the 49 convenience store clerks and owners who were indicted are South Asians, many with the last name Patel."

The Rome (GA) News Tribune (4/6) reports, "In Wednesday's motion — which asks for the dismissal of charges against 'Operation Meth Merchant' defendants Falgun Patel, Sudhirkumar Patel and Satishkumar Patel based on racially biased investigation practices in the case — the ACLU cited statistics indicating that more than 19 percent of all South Asian-owned convenience stores were indicted in the case as compared to 0.2 percent of all stores owned by whites or other ethnic groups."

Man Accused Of Making Meth At His Florida Home. The Miami Herald (4/5, Staff) reports the DEA "has arrested a man who investigators say ran a methamphetamine lab from his Hollywood (FL) home. The Herald says Gene Lawrence Cruncleton is accused of attempting to make meth, according to DEA agent Jeannette Moran. Police "found ammonium nitrate in the house…and evidence that methamphetamine had recently been cooked in the home."

The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (4/6, Haas) reports authorities say they "seized several handguns, high-powered rifles and shotguns, about a thousand rounds of ammunition, meth ingredients and possible bomb-making chemicals from Cruncleton's home on Tuesday. Police evacuated three-dozen homes in the neighborhood Tuesday afternoon because the chemicals used to make meth are highly explosive."

Former St. Louis Police Officer Convicted In Heroin Conspiracy. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (4/5) reports former St. Louis police officer Antoine Gordon "was convicted Wednesday of helping a heroin ring by using a law enforcement database to try to identify a possible informer. … A Drug Enforcement Administration wiretap caught Gordon in an incriminating conversation with the ringleader, Adrian Minnis, in June 2004, prosecutors said. Minnis pleaded guilty Friday."

11 Indicted For Importing Knockoff Cigarettes. The Philadelphia Inquirer (4/6, Wood) reports New Jersey authorities "announced yesterday that they had snuffed out a ring that imported tens of thousands of cartons of [cigarette] knockoffs from China. Seven people from Philadelphia and four from South Jersey were charged in indictments after a two-year undercover operation in Atlantic City and South Jersey. Three New Jersey troopers infiltrated the organization and bought more than 32,000 cartons of cut-rate Marlboro Lights, 25,000 doses of the nightclub drug ecstasy, and more than 125 pounds of potent marijuana." The Inquirer says several law enforcement organizations took part in the investigation, including the DEA.

Florida AG Withdraws From Case Following Dispute Over Steroid Questions. The AP (4/5) reports Attorney General Charlie Crist "has decided his office will no longer represent current and former Corrections Department officials in a federal lawsuit filed by Florida State Prison inmates who allege that guards sprayed them with chemical agents. The issue came to a head after an attorney in Crist's office filed a motion stating those officials should not have to answer questions about their steroid use. … 'We are not representing these guys if they will not answer questions about their use of illegal drugs,' Crist said."

Washington Post Profiles Barry Bonds, MLB Steroid Investigation. In a lengthy article, The Washington Post (4/6, A1, Fainaru) profiles Barry Bonds and Major League Baseball's investigation of steroid use and writes, "Steroids help build muscle and speed recovery but have been banned by most professional sports leagues because they also are known to cause undesirable side effects, create an uneven playing field and are illegal without a prescription. Bonds's current predicament -- chasing Ruth and Aaron while under investigation for using drugs to help him hit home runs -- at times borders on the surreal."

Pakistani Man Said To Have Regrets Following Drugs-For-Arms Plot. The San Diego Union-Tribune (4/5, Thornton) reports the Pakistani man who "received 57 months in prison for his part in a conspiracy to trade heroin and hashish for shoulder-launched Stinger missiles and cash" had "declined to make a statement before Monday's sentencing in federal court in San Diego. But his lawyer, John Cotsirilos, said his client had expressed 'regret' in a letter to the court." Saifullah Durrani and two others "have admitted they negotiated a deal in Hong Kong in September 2002 to sell heroin and hash and to accept as part of the payment four Stinger missiles that they would then sell to al-Qaeda or the Taliban."

FL: Dwight Gooden Gets 1-Year Prison Sentence Following Cocaine Use. The New York Times (4/6, Stout) reports Dwight Gooden, the former pitching star who "squandered much of his talent with self-destructive behavior off the field, was sentenced to a year and a day in a Florida state prison yesterday for violating his probation by using cocaine. Gooden, 41, was sentenced by Judge Daniel L. Perry in state circuit court in Tampa, Fla., after expressing remorse over his latest run-in with the law," according to prosecutor Pam Bondi.

The AP (4/5) reports Gooden "was serving three years' probation for speeding away from police during a drunken driving traffic stop last year when he failed a drug test and acknowledged to a probation officer that he had used cocaine. He chose the prison sentence over reinstatement of his probation, which would have meant the prospect of five years behind bars if he violated it again."

Hyde Says Drug War "Adrift" In Western Hemisphere. House International Relations Committee Chairman Henry Hyde says the war in drugs is "adrift" in the Western hemisphere. The Washington Times (4/6, Seper, 90K) reports that Hyde says the Bush Administration "is claiming a 'premature victory' in the war against Colombian drug traffickers and diverting its focus to the Middle East." Hyde said, "I am concerned our efforts to fight the scourge of illegal narcotics seem to be adrift in our hemisphere," adding, "After five years of Plan Colombia, we are finally seeing success in our war on drugs. Unfortunately, these positive results seem to have lulled the administration into a false sense of security, causing it to claim premature victory in Colombia and turn its attention to the Middle East and elsewhere." Mr. Hyde's comments "are contained in a letter last week to Rep. Dan Burton, Indiana Republican and chairman of the International Relations Western Hemisphere subcommittee."

Teen Drug Use Declining. A national survey on drug and alcohol use says drug use has edged downward among teens nationwide, with the largest decreases occurring in the Midwest and South. USA Today (4/6, Leinwand, 2.31M) reports, "Children 12 to 17 years old who reported using any illicit drug in the past month declined from 11.4% to 10.9% between 2002 and 2004. States that saw the biggest declines in teen drug use were Illinois, Nebraska, South Dakota, North Carolina, Virginia and Vermont. The study, to be released today by the U.S. Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration (SAMHSA), combines data from interviews of 135,500 people in 2003 and 2004 as part of the National Surveys on Drug Use and Health."

US, Venezuela Said To Be Finishing Anti-Drugs Agreement. The Miami Herald (4/5, Bachelet) reports Mari Pili Hernández, who heads the North American department in the Venezuelan foreign ministry, "said Tuesday her country was willing to start regular talks with the Bush administration, routinely attacked by President Hugo Chávez, on issues that include drug trafficking and energy matters. … Officials on both sides have been putting the finishing touches to a drug-trafficking agreement that would allow the Drug Enforcement Administration to resume its activities in Venezuela, Hernández said."

FBI, US Marshals Searching For Louisiana Prison Escapee. CNN.com (4/5, Frieden) reports, "FBI agents and U.S. marshals are searching for a convicted murderer who escaped Wednesday from a federal prison in Louisiana." Richard McNair "is serving a life sentence in the U.S. penitentiary in Pollock, Louisiana, after being convicted of murder and burglary in North Dakota. … Authorities are still investigating how McNair escaped, said Jane Haschemeyer, a U.S. Bureau of Prisons spokeswoman."

IMMIGRATION:

US Targets Immigration Fraud With Creation Of Task Forces. The AP (4/6, Yen) reports, "The government said Wednesday it was stepping up efforts to stem illegal immigration, creating task forces in 10 cities to crack down on those who commit fraud to enter and stay in the country. The AP continues, "The task forces bring together investigators from several agencies, including Immigration and Customs Enforcement and the Justice and Labor departments, to prosecute growing cases of immigration fraud. The fraud includes the use of fake Social Security cards, drivers licenses and passports." The AP adds, "Investigators also will seek to arrest - and deport if warranted - those who lie on government applications to obtain benefits such as U.S. citizenship, political asylum or a visa, said Julie Myers, assistant secretary for Immigration and Customs Enforcement, which is headed by Homeland Security. … 'One of the lessons from 9/11 is that false identities and fraudulent documents present serious risks to national security,' said Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff. 'We must deny criminals the identification tools they need to threaten our country.' … In the last two years, the number of immigration fraud investigations has jumped 54 percent to 3,591 cases and arrests have risen from 1,300 to 1,391, officials said. They cited the growing sophistication of technology such as high-resolution digital scanners, which make it easier to produce fraudulent documents, for the increased number of cases. … The Document and Benefit Fraud Task Forces will be located in Atlanta, Boston, Dallas, Denver, Detroit, Los Angeles, New York, Newark, N.J., Philadelphia and St. Paul, Minn. It is modeled after a Washington, D.C.-area task force coordinated by the U.S. attorney's office."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (4/6, Malone, 430K) reports on the Atlanta Task Force and notes, "Michael J. Maxwell, who quit in February as director of the U.S. Office of Security and Investigations for immigration services, is scheduled to testify today to the House Subcommittee on International Terrorism. … Among the complaints prepared for his testimony, Maxwell says that employees assigned to perform checks on would-be citizens or permanent residents were increasingly denied access to FBI crime and terrorism databases that record allegations of criminal behavior or security problems."

GOP Senators Reach Agreement On Immigration Reform. The New York Times (4/6, Swarns, 1.19M) reports, "A group of Senate Republicans reached agreement Wednesday night on a compromise proposal that they hope can garner bipartisan support and bring passage of a bill on the future of the nation's 11 million illegal immigrants. The compromise, which followed a day of negotiations, was endorsed by Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader." But "it did not have the commitment of all Republicans, much less Democrats who have backed an approach that would put nearly all illegal immigrants on a path toward citizenship." The Times adds, "As outlined by Senate Republicans late Wednesday, the compromise would place illegal immigrants in three categories: Those who have lived in the country at least five years would be put on a path toward guaranteed citizenship, provided that they remained employed, paid fines and back taxes, and learned English, a senior Republican aide said. The aide said this group accounted for about 7 million of the roughly 11 million illegal immigrants believed to be living here." Those "who have lived here for two to five years, said to number about three million, would have to leave the country briefly before reporting to an American port of entry, where they would be classified as temporary workers. … The remaining one million or so, those who have lived in the country less than two years, would be required to leave." The Los Angeles Times (4/6, Gaouette, Reynolds, 958K) says "aides" to Frist "said a majority of GOP senators would support" the deal, "ending a stalemate that threatened to prevent action on the issue." But "any bill that comes out of the Senate would have to be reconciled with a harsher measure passed by the House."

CQ (4/6, Sandler) reports Frist "filed for cloture on the carefully negotiated measure he hopes he can persuade enough Republicans to accept as an alternative to the committee measure, which would put the estimated 11 million to 12 million illegal immigrants in the country on a path to citizenship." The new plan was proposed by Republican Sens. Chuck Hagel and Mel Martinez of Florida. There also "will be a cloture vote Thursday morning on the Judiciary Committee version favored by many Democrats, although Republican unity against the minority attempt to control the floor has doomed that effort." The Washington Post (4/6, A18, Weisman, 744K) also reports that "as of last night," he vote "to break a filibuster" on that measure "appeared almost certain to fall short of the 60 supporters needed -- in large part because of the bruised Republican feelings over Reid's parliamentary tactics that have tied up the Senate for days." The Post adds that even Sen. John McCain "said he would not bow to the Democrats' tactics and vote to end debate."

The Washington Times (4/6, Hurt, 90K) headlines its story "Senate GOP To Filibuster Alien Bill," reporting "Senate Republicans will filibuster their own immigration bill today in the face of steadfast refusal by Democrats to allow amendments to the bill that many conservatives view as granting amnesty to illegal aliens." The Times adds, "As an alternative, Majority Leader Bill Frist reached an agreement last night with fellow Republicans on a new comprehensive immigration plan that includes increasing border security and a guest-worker plan," but "still does not resolve concerns about amnesty." Frist "declined to tell The Washington Times last night how he would vote on the alternative measure."

The AP (4/6, Espo) reports "the White House offered no reaction to the GOP plan, although President Bush has called for comprehensive legislation that includes steps to offer legalized status to those in the country unlawfully."

In a story that doesn't include news of the late-night deal, USA Today (4/6, Kiely, 2.31M) notes Frist yesterday had "warned colleagues that they are on course 'to leave here in a few days having accomplished nothing.'" Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois, the deputy Democratic leader, "said the Senate is approaching a 'historic' vote" and urged President Bush "to intervene." The Hill (4/6, Allen) says "Senate Republicans and Democrats loudly blamed each other for a stalemate,"

The Christian Science Monitor (4/6, Jonsson, Chaddock, 61K) sees a change in public opinion on immigrants "since the 1990s," as the public's views of Latin American and Asian immigrants have become more positive, despite concerns over the drawbacks of immigration. Both groups are seen as hard-working and committed to family. … Immigration legislation now before Congress is pulling much of this ambivalence into the open. … In contrast to the debate during the 1986 reforms, the focus this year is jobs, not culture. Those who do not want to grant illegals any legitimate status are talking less about English-speaking and more about prospects for low-wage Americans. "

Bush's "Calculated Ambiguity" Said To Increase Risk Of Stalemate On Hill. In an analysis piece, the Los Angeles Times (4/6, Brownstein, 958K) says that as the immigration debate continues, President Bush "has adopted a strategy of calculated ambiguity that some worry may increase the risk of a legislative stalemate. Administration officials have been closely involved in this week's swirling Senate negotiations over proposals to rewrite the nation's immigration laws." But "in public and private, Bush and his aides have avoided a clear position on the most difficult issue dividing senators: whether to provide a clear path to American citizenship for as many as 12 million illegal immigrants in the United States -- a process critics deride as amnesty." The AP (4/6, Gamboa) reports Bush, "facing Republican divisions on immigration, urged the Senate on Wednesday to swiftly approve a comprehensive bill affecting millions of illegal immigrants now in the country. 'This is a vital debate,' he declared."

Industry Lobbyists Focus On Visas For High-Skilled Workers. The Wall Street Journal (4/6, 2.11M) reports on the importance of "the future of thousands of high-skilled foreign workers seeking admission to the country -- scientists, mathematicians, health-care workers…to the US economy. Because of the key role many of those workers play in cutting-edge businesses, industry lobbyists are pushing measures that would more than double the number of visas available to skilled workers." The Journal adds, "Employers are particularly irked by the visa system's treatment of foreign-born scientists who must leave the country after finishing their studies if a US company can't secure a visa to hire them. As it is, US-born students account for only about half the science, math, technology and engineering advanced-degree holders turned out by American universities yearly. When companies run out of US-born workers, and then can't hire immigrants, 'projects get dropped or delayed, so development is slowed down,' says Patrick Duffy, a human-resources lawyer for Intel Corp."

Federal Task Forces Address Immigration Fraud. The Washington Times (4/6, Seper, 90K) reports, "Ten federal task forces manned by law-enforcement personnel from several agencies were created yesterday to tackle the growing problem of immigration document and benefits fraud, building on the successes of a task force in Northern Virginia. 'The task forces announced today will help restore the integrity of our immigration system and will help close the loopholes that terrorists and other criminals exploit to enter and remain in the United States by fraud,' said Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty." The Times adds, "Led by U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE), the new Document and Benefit Fraud Task Forces will target, according to a press release:"

Former USCIS Official Says US Enemies Able To "Game" Broken Immigration System. The Washington Times (4/6, Dinan, 90K) reports at a hearing before a House subcommittee today, the former head of the Office of Security and Investigations at USCIS, Michael J. Maxwell, is scheduled to testify about "breakdowns at the agency," including a case in which a "suspected…foreign intelligence agent" that was born in Iraq used to rule on asylum applications. He "will tell legislators that the immigration system is being used by enemy governments to place agents in the United States." Maxwell told the Times that the US "immigration system as a whole is so broken that our adversaries can game it."

Debate Seen As Energizing "Sleeping Latino Giant." The Washington Post (4/6, A1, Aizenman, 744K) reports, "Drawing on fear of restrictive immigration proposals that have awakened hundreds of thousands of Latinos to political activism, organizers are using popular Spanish-language radio and networks of community organizations to mobilize protests in Washington and scores of other cities Monday." The demonstrations "are planned to expand on a groundswell that attracted about 30,000 largely Hispanic protesters in the District last month, about 100,000 in Chicago and as many as 500,000 in Los Angeles, a surprising display of political muscle from a population that makes up a substantial portion of the nation's 12 million illegal immigrants." Jaime Contreras, president of the National Capital Immigrant Coalition, "predicted that Monday's demonstration at the Washington Monument would draw 100,000 people and that nationally the turnout, in more than 60 cities, would number 'in the millions.'" He also said, "The sleeping Latino giant is finally awake." The Washington Times (4/6, Knott, 90K) also reports on the expected marches, and says "supporters of illegal aliens are promising to add to the mess, with a national call to boycott work, school and shopping places May 1."

Schools Banning Display Of National Flags. USA Today (4/6, Kenworthy, 2.31M) reports, "Several schools in Colorado, Arizona and California recently banned the display of national flags and the wearing of clothing with patriotic symbols as the divisive national debate over immigration has brought angry confrontations between Latino and Anglo students." The bans "have prompted protests by parents, stirred local debates over free speech and its limits, and caught the attention of civil liberties advocates."

Minority Journalists Say Certain Terms "Dehumanizing" Immigrants. The Washington Times (4/6, Harper, 90K) reports, "Three minority journalism groups are asking the American press to stop using 'dehumanizing' words when covering immigration." The terms "alien," "illegal alien" and "illegal immigrant," they say, "should be avoided, according to the National Association of Hispanic Journalists (NAHJ), the National Association of Black Journalists (NABJ) and the Asian American Journalists Association (AAJA)." The "preferred terms are 'undocumented immigrant,' 'undocumented worker' or 'economic refugee,' which the organizations consider more accurate and less offensive."

More Commentary. The Washington Post (4/6, A28, 744K) editorializes on whether illegal immigration affects US workers' wages. The Post says even "a small impact on low-wage workers is alarming, given the rise of inequality over the past 25 years. But the question is whether to address that inequality by trying to stop immigration or to go at it via progressive taxation, larger public investments designed to prevent poor kids from dropping out of high school, or some other policy tool. Given the expense and doubtful effectiveness of border walls and employer crackdowns, progressive tax and social policies seem preferable. … Taxing the 'immigration windfall' that flows to better-off Americans and passing it on to the less fortunate may be the best way to go."

Ronald F. Maxwell, a writer and movie director, writes a letter to President Bush in the Washington Times (4/6, 90K). He writes, "Perhaps you know me from my work. I wrote and directed the movies 'Gettysburg' and 'Gods and Generals.' … What is happening on the southern border is unprecedented. Not only in our own history, but in the history of the world. No country at any time anywhere has sustained the influx of tens of millions of foreigners across its borders. A wave of anti-American leftism is sweeping Latin America." He adds, "Your immigration policy is viewed as captive to the cheap labor -- big business lobby and inimical to the survival of our country. It is splitting the party and draining away support for your presidency. We who understand the vital stakes will not be placated by rhetoric or slogans. The failure to recognize this growing and deep disaffection among Republicans, conservatives, independents and, indeed, many Reagan Democrats, is, in the short run, going to lead to a monumental defeat for your party at the polls in November."

David Brooks writes in the New York Times (4/6, 1.19M) that "unions have a semilegitimate concern that large numbers of these workers lower wages for US workers. This is probably true, but the effect is so modest that after thousands of studies, reputable economists have not been able to agree upon how much wages are reduced or even if they are at all."

TAX:

IRS Concerned About Phishing Scams. NBC Nightly News (4/5, story 7, 2:10, Williams) reported, "The IRS is worried about a new scam. It's calling phishing – complete with its own unique spelling -- and it is rapidly spreading through cyberspace." NBC (P. Williams) added, "Emails like this say the taxpayer is due a refund or offer a way to check on when it will be paid. They include a link to an Internet site that appears to be the actual Internal Revenue Service webpage but it is a phony too. And here's the heart of the scam: The webpage asks for personal information, including Social Security number, credit card number, even the pin number for an ATM card. The IRS commissioner says the government would never send such a message." Mark Everson, IRS Commissioner: "We don't contact taxpayers via email. We contact them sometimes by telephone but usually in writing, so we just plain don't get in touch with somebody via email, especially on anything like refunds."

IRS Allows Tax Preparers To Continue Working Despite Violations. The Wall Street Journal (4/6, Wells) reports, "The Internal Revenue Service has allowed some tax preparers to continue to practice even though they have been convicted of crimes, suspended by state officials or failed to pay their own taxes, according to a new government report. … 'Some tax practitioners who have been convicted of tax-related crimes or whose licenses have been suspended or revoked by state authorities have not been suspended from practice before the IRS,' the Treasury Department's Inspector General for Tax Administration said in the report." The Journal continues, 'The report estimates that about 22,500 licensed tax practitioners -- some 5% -- haven't complied with their individual tax obligations." The Journal adds, "Sen. Max Baucus (D., Mont.), expressed dismay about the report, which comes on top of a Government Accountability Office report that showed widespread errors committed by commercial tax-preparation firms. … 'The government has got to do more to keep the paid tax-preparation industry clean,' Mr. Baucus said in a statement. 'I believe the vast majority of CPAs, attorneys and enrolled agents prepare people's taxes honestly and accurately, but when we find those who are not honest and accurate, the IRS needs to lower the boom.' … Cono Namorato, until recently the director of the IRS's Office of Professional Responsibility, agreed in a memo to the Inspector General that the office can make improvements in its enforcement of tax practitioners. But Mr. Namorato, who is joining a law firm, said the report didn't give the IRS sufficient credit for recent improvements."

Congress Making Progress On Dividends, Capital Gains Tax Cut Extensions. The Wall Street Journal (4/6, Mullins, 2.11M) reports that for the "first time in weeks, lawmakers appear to be making progress on a bid to extend President Bush's lower 15% tax rates on capital gains and dividends." Congressional Republicans "want to give final approval to the legislation this week so that Mr. Bush can sign the bill into law by this year's mid-April tax-filing deadline," but it is "unlikely that the bill will be able to clear both the House and Senate by week's end." Republicans "on both sides agree that the bill should extend the lower capital-gains and dividends tax rates by two years, from the end of 2008 when they are now set to expire through 2010. The budget impact of the lower rates on investments is $20 billion over five years." But they "disagreed over whether the legislation should include a popular $31 billion provision to exempt millions of middle-class taxpayers from the Alternative Minimum Tax."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Touts Health Savings Accounts In Visit To Connecticut. President Bush traveled to Bridgeport, CT, yesterday, where he touted his health care agenda, particularly his plans to extend health savings accounts. The AP (4/6, Riechmann) says the President "urged lawmakers on Wednesday to expand health savings accounts even though congressional Republicans say that is unlikely in an election year. … The Senate's top tax writer, Sen. Charles Grassley, has cast doubt that lawmakers can enact Bush's proposals to expand health savings accounts during this election year." In Connecticut, "the GOP faces two tough midterm matchups that national political analysts are watching as Republicans work to retain control of Congress." Rep. Christopher Shays, "who rode to Connecticut aboard Air Force One, is being opposed by Democrat Diane Farrell." Rep. Nancy Johnson also "faces a difficult race."

However, the Hartford Courant (4/6, Pazniokas, 206K) says Bush's visit "seemed resolutely apolitical." He "flew in on Air Force One, pitched 150 executives in a tiny theater on the virtues of health savings accounts, then headed back to Washington. By contrast, in a 2002 trip here Bush delivered a policy address to a crowd of 1,200, then made time for a $750,000 congressional campaign fundraiser." The Courant adds, "With Bush's approval rating sinking toward 30 percent, the state GOP seems uncertain how to use the president to help re-elect its incumbents, all of whom are on Democratic target lists. The closest the president came to politicking was a few kind words about Republican Gov. M. Jodi Rell and the hometown congressman, Rep. Christopher Shays, R-4th District." But "neither appeared on stage with Bush." Meanwhile, the New Haven Register (4/6, Bromage) reports Shays "introduced the president in very brief remarks, in which he called the health care crisis 'one of the greatest domestic challenges we face.'"

The New York Times (4/6, Rutenberg, 1.19M) says Shays "has not hesitated to disagree publicly with Mr. Bush, most recently saying the administration had made 'huge mistakes' in Iraq, though he has not wavered in his support for the war." Bush, "who lost Connecticut in the 2004 election, made veiled reference to such remarks on Wednesday. 'He is an independent fellow who speaks his mind,' Mr. Bush said of Mr. Shays, adding, as the crowd laughed, 'But he does so in a way that gets people to listen to him.' To Mr. Shays, he said, 'I'm looking forward to hearing your lecture on the way back to Washington.'"

The AP (4/6, Christoffersen) notes Bush "spoke to the Business Council of Fairfield County, which last month issued a report that found the number of uninsured residents in Connecticut, about 400,000, now equals the combined populations of the state's four largest cities." The report "says the state is facing a health care crisis and that health care is fast becoming an economic competitiveness issue."

The Washington Post (4/6, A10, Baker, 744K) reports that "with the White House preoccupied with rumors of further staff changes and Capitol Hill focused on the polarizing immigration debate," Bush was trying "to steer attention back to a domestic program that has largely languished in the two months since he unveiled it in his State of the Union address." The Post adds, "The president's health-care plan stood in striking contrast to the new legislation passed this week in next-door Massachusetts, which is set to become the first state to require that all residents obtain health insurance just as all drivers must have automobile insurance." Bush "did not directly address the Massachusetts plan, but he made the case for his less prescriptive approach that he said would give individual taxpayers the opportunity to make their own decisions about medical care."

UPI (4/6) says Bush delivered his health care remarks "to mixed reactions." Ron Pollack, executive director of Families USA, "a healthcare consumer advocacy group, said only the wealthy can afford to take advantage of HSAs, and they will not solve the problem of the uninsured." And Democratic Rep. Nydia M. Velázquez, ranking minority member of the House Small Business Committee, "said focusing on HSAs will not help small businesses with their mounting healthcare costs. Instead, she said, Bush should focus attention on legislation moving through the Senate that would enable small business to form insurance pools and purchase Association Health Plans."

The Yale Daily News (4/6, Mishkin) reports "President George W. Bush '68 arrived in the town of his birth on his way to a panel discussion about health savings accounts with business leaders in Bridgeport." The President's visit "came in the middle of a gubernatorial campaign that has focused heavily on the need to reform Connecticut's health insurance system." The visit also "occurred one day after the Massachusetts legislature passed a bill making it possible for all state residents to acquire health coverage." Bush, "who traveled via motorcade from New Haven to Bridgeport, passed a number of protestors who oppose the continued US presence in Iraq."

Shays In "Full Campaign Mode" To Explain His Stance On Iraq War. In what a front page story in the Washington Post (4/6, A1, Murray, 744K) sees a s a sign that Republicans are "nervous" that "the Iraq war could hurt them in November," Shays "is in full campaign mode, explaining his unbending support for the war to confounded voters." Shays "has distinguished himself as a reliably moderate House Republican. His middle-of-the-road stands on the environment, abortion and gay rights have irked many in his conservative party while affording him job security in his affluent, Democratic-leaning district. Not so with Iraq, the 'sentinel issue of our time,' as Shays describes it. He has strayed deep into loyalist GOP territory, and that could cost him his job." Shays faces "an aggressive and seasoned Democratic opponent, Diane Farrell, who lost by four percentage points when she challenged Shays in 2004 and who talks about the war at every public event."

Rifts Among House Republicans Said To Be Growing. The New York Times (4/6, Hulse, 1.19M) reports, "Fissures among House Republicans are growing ever more apparent, crystallized in the leadership's desperate search this week for votes to pass its budget." The "upheaval at the top, capped by Representative Tom DeLay's surprise decision to leave Congress, has emboldened centrists and conservatives to push their divergent views more assertively. With President Bush's approval ratings at or near their lows, the party is no longer being kept in line by the White House." And with Republicans "nationwide facing an inhospitable political climate, House members are far less motivated by party discipline than by what they believe it will take to get re-elected." Beyond the "spending plan, House Republicans have been split to varying degrees by immigration, the expansion of entitlement programs, tax cuts and, in a more limited but slowly expanding way, the war in Iraq."

Budget Vote Poses Steep Challenges For House GOP Leaders. The Hill (4/6, O'Connor) reports

House Republican leaders "face unique obstacles in tackling this week's budget vote, which will be a major test for them in the wake of the decision by Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) to resign." The "political uncertainty created by the coming midterm elections, coupled with a new leadership team and a strong belief among members that the House and Senate will not reach an eventual compromise, make this year's vote tougher than most." The Senate-passed measure "added almost $9 billion in discretionary spending to the overall budget number requested by the White House. The House, by contrast, is expected to vote on a bill that matches the administration's request."

The Washington Times (4/6, Fagan, 90K) reports Republican leaders "struggled to bridge a major gap between two factions in their party that threatens to doom their budget blueprint, slated to be considered today." Conservatives "want to hold the line on spending, but the more liberal Republicans are demanding spending increases before they'll vote for the $2.73 trillion measure. The budget vote -- expected today or tomorrow -- will be the first major test for House Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican."

CQ (4/5, Dennis) reports the "most contentious budget rules changes sought by conservatives are intended to curtail earmarks by increasing transparency and boosting the power of members to challenge earmarks on the House floor. Appropriators are resisting such efforts." Among "other rules changes, members of the conservative Republican Study Committee (RSC) want to create a budget point of order to challenge earmarks on the floor."

Deficit Reduction Focused On Limited Portion Of Budget. The New York Times (4/6, Andrews, 1.19M) reports since President Bush "took office, overall federal spending has risen 33 percent, twice as fast as under President Bill Clinton and faster than any other president since Lyndon B. Johnson. But the biggest growth has come in areas that Republicans, by and large, have supported, the military, domestic security and the biggest expansion of Medicare in 40 years." The "military and so-called entitlement programs like Medicare now account for about four-fifths of the government's $2.7 trillion budget, and they are set to keep increasing much faster than inflation or the economy. Given the political realities, they are effectively off limits for now to budget cutters." With tax cuts "putting a squeeze on government revenues, almost all the battle to shrink the budget deficit is therefore focused on the less than one-fifth of government spending that goes to domestic 'discretionary' programs like education, scientific research, national parks and space programs."

Shelby, Democrats Criticize Police Funding Cuts. The Washington Post (4/6, A11, Eggen, 744K) reports a "key Republican senator, joined by Democrats, criticized the Justice Department yesterday for proposing deep cuts in assistance to local law enforcement agencies, arguing that the reductions would hamper efforts to combat terrorism, methamphetamine trafficking and other threats." At a hearing "of the Senate Appropriations subcommittee that oversees the Justice Department's budget, Chairman Richard C. Shelby (Ala.) and Democratic colleagues sharply questioned Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales about an administration proposal to slash assistance to local law enforcement by more than $1 billion in fiscal 2007." In "unusually candid remarks, two key agency heads -- FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III and Drug Enforcement Administration chief Karen P. Tandy -- acknowledged that the proposed cuts could limit enforcement efforts and discourage local police from offering assistance in terrorism inquiries and other federal investigations."

CAGW Says Earmarks To Cost Record $29 Billion. ABC World News Tonight (4/5, story 9, 2:20, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "In an annual report called the Pig Book," Citizens Against Government Waste "says Congress put almost 10,000 pet projects into this year's Federal budget. They will cost a record $29 billion, up 6% from last year." ABC (Cochran) added, "You may have heard the military had trouble finding money for body armor for troops in Iraq. But the Defense Appropriations bill does have $5.6 million for a center named for the winemaker Ernest Gallo, a center, which studies alcohol and drug abuse." Sen. McCain: "And it runs into the hundreds of millions, if not billions, of dollars that should be used for the men and women in the military and the war we're fighting." Cochran: "Also in the defense bill, $1 million for the waterfree urinal conservation initiative. And $500,000 for winter sports in Alaska, the home of Senator Ted Stevens." Congress also "approved $500,000 to build a teapot museum in remote Sparta, North Carolina."

The Washington Times (4/6, Price, 90K) reports Citizens Against Government Waste "identified 375 projects totaling $3.4 billion as the 'most egregious' examples." CAGW says "most of the projects listed in the book met at least two of seven criteria: requested by only one chamber of Congress; not specifically authorized; not requested by the president; not competitively awarded; cost greatly exceeded the president's budget request or the previous year's funding; not the subject of congressional hearings; and served 'only a local or special interest.'" CAGW says, "This year's list includes: $13.5 million for the International Fund for Ireland, which helped finance the World Toilet Summit; more than $6.4 million for wood utilization research; $1 million for the Waterfree Urinal Conservation Initiative; and $500,000 for the Sparta Teapot Museum in Sparta, NC."

Stenholm Says His Line Item Veto Legislation Was Identical To White House Proposal. In a letter to the Wall Street Journal (4/6, 2.11M), former Rep. Charles Stenholm faults the paper for praising the Bush Administration's line item veto proposal after "vigorously" criticizing his "virtually identical" legislation in 1983. Stenholm writes "I offered an amendment that would have added expedited rescission authority as a fallback that would be available if the Line Item Veto was ruled unconstitutional. My Republican colleagues rejected my amendment, and when the line item veto was struck down the president was left without an effective tool to eliminate low-priority spending."

WSJournal Says Line Item Veto Should Be Passed This Year. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (4/6, 2.11M) responds to Stenholm's letter, noting, "The truth is that, back in 1993, we were defending the line-item veto proposal of Democratic President Bill Clinton. The 'modified' version then on offer from Mr. Stenholm was a weaker grant of Presidential authority favored by Democrats who were then in charge of Congress." The Journal adds, "As for the current effort to pass so-called enhanced rescission, we'll gladly take it over the dreadful spending status quo. … In any case, Mr. Stenholm's timely missive ought to remind Republicans that the 'modified line-item veto,' also known as enhanced rescission, has bipartisan support. With President Bush also asking for it, there's no excuse not to pass it this year."

White House To Nominate Bair To Lead FDIC. The Wall Street Journal (4/6, Schroeder, 2.11M) reports the White House is "expected to nominate Sheila Bair, an assistant Treasury secretary in the early years of the current Bush administration, to head the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp." Bair is "a professor of financial regulatory policy at the Isenberg School of Management at the University of Massachusetts Amherst."

Largely Along Party Lines, House Votes To Cap Contributions To 527 Groups. USA Today (4/6, 2.31M) reports, "The House of Representatives voted 218-209 on Wednesday to cap donations to non-profit political groups known as 527s, which raised more than $400 million in 2003-04 and were a significant factor in the presidential election." The bill "limits donor contributions to $25,000 a year for partisan voter mobilization activities and $5,000 a year for direct expenditures on federal elections." Republican "sponsors said the new bill closes a loophole." Democratic Rep. Steny Hoyer "said it was a move by Republicans to undercut groups that overwhelmingly favored Democratic causes in 2004. 'They are trying to gag their opponents,' he said." The Washington Post (4/6, A1, Edsall, 744K) reports the legislation "would benefit Republicans," and that it passed "in a virtual party-line vote." Roll Call (4/6, Newmyer) notes 18 Republicans voted against the measure and seven Democrats supported it.

The New York Times (4/6, Stolberg, 1.19M) calls the vote "a victory for Republicans in an otherwise difficult week, marked by the announcement that Representative Tom DeLay of Texas, the former Republican leader, would resign from Congress." The Times adds, "The new majority leader, Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, was terse after the vote. Asked for a comment, Mr. Boehner said, 'We won.'"

The Wall Street Journal (4/6, Rogers, 2.11M) says the bill would make 527s "subject to the same rules as traditional political-action committees, or PACs." But "to win, House Speaker Dennis Hastert first had to fight his way past both liberal Democrats and a faction in his own caucus allied with conservative editorialists who say limiting 527s is an intrusion on free speech." The AP (4/6, Abrams) notes that "during the 2003-2004 election cycle, businessman George Soros gave more than $23 million to Democratic-aligned 527 groups such as Media Fund and America Coming Together. Houston homebuilder Bob Perry contributed more than $8 million specifically to help the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth group that questioned the Vietnam War record of Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry, the Democratic presidential nominee." The Washington Times (4/6, Bellantoni, 90K) reports Rep. Patrick T. McHenry, North Carolina Republican, "said 527 groups are the equivalent of 'money laundering...on a scale that would make Tony Soprano blush.'"

McCain, House Leaders Reach Accord On Party-Federal Candidates Coordination. The Hill (4/6, Bolton) reports, "House Republican leaders have struck a deal with Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) to eliminate restrictions on coordination between national parties and federal candidates, a change in the law that would be of great benefit to the winner of the 2008 GOP presidential primary, according to congressional sources." The Hill adds, "Republican and Democratic campaign-finance experts alike believe the change would be a boon to McCain's campaign, if he wins his party's nomination in three years, an outcome that political handicappers are beginning to view as a real possibility."

GOP Leaders Take Issue With DeLay Comments. House GOP leaders say Rep. Tom DeLay's accusation that Republicans lack a vision or an agenda is unfair. The Washington Times (4/6, Fagan, 90K) reports that Ron Bonjean, spokesman for House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, "responding to Mr. DeLay's accusation yesterday in The Washington Times, said party leaders are pushing an aggressive agenda to provide economic security and homeland security." DeLay "made the accusation after announcing that he would resign from the House."

DeLay Departure Seen As Setback For Conservatives. The New York Times (4/6, Kirkpatrick, 1.19M) reports that several conservatives are calling DeLay's departure "both a setback and a warning for their movement. Many conservatives said Mr. DeLay's departure would leave a big hole in their forces in Congress. … But several prominent conservatives balked at Mr. DeLay's assertion in an interview, posted on Time magazine's Web site, that 'the conservative movement is leaderless' and that he aimed to become 'a strong leader to pull the movement together.'

Some said his legal problems showed how his work incorporating the conservative movement into Washington's power structure was already carrying the movement away from its principles."

DeLay Says Democrats Are Trying To Criminalize Politics. DeLay said on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (4/5), "I think if we take each race individually and not nationalize the race, but each race individually and let each one of those Republicans talk about his vision of the future of what America will look like over the next 10 years, if he talks about winning the war on terror, protecting our borders, replacing a fair tax, holding the judiciary accountable, protecting the American family from the culture of death, I think that's the kind of thing that will create a choice between a Democrat that has no agenda, that is scared to death that the American people will find out what he believes in because they have been rejected and in that choice, we'll gain seats. I think we will gain seats." DeLay added that Democrats "have no agenda, no ideas, no solution. They are going to the courts. They're using their trial lawyer friends to drag people through the mud. It's happening to other members as we speak. They are trying to criminalize politics."

DeLay Case May Cool Desire For Partisan Redistricting. Roll Call (4/6, Duran) reports on the Texas redistricting plan which allowed the GOP to net six House seats. Experts believe that the "desire for overtly partisan redistricting could be cooled in other aspiring kingmakers now that DeLay has relinquished his leadership position and seat." The Texas case, "and the fact that three years later it sits before the Supreme Court, certainly has given state legislators pause." Former Rep. Martin Frost "said he hopes that Congressional leaders take the DeLay lesson to heart. … In the end, the Supreme Court's decision is what will determine how far lawmakers can reach for partisan gain, not what happened to DeLay, election experts agree."

DeLay Says He Admires Frank. Roll Call (4/6, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column that in an interview on MSNBC, DeLay "acknowledged something few, if any, of us ever thought we'd hear: He admires Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.), even loves him." DeLay named Frank as a "strong moral" Democrat in Congress. DeLay aid, "I respect him greatly. He's a true liberal, and he's unashamedly a liberal. And I respect that," adding, "I don't agree with homosexuality, but I still -- I am commanded to love Barney Frank." Roll Call adds, "Frank was amused by the latter part of DeLay's comments, and genuinely 'flattered' by the rest."

Novak Says DeLay's Legacy Has Been Tarnished Due To Aides' Greed. Syndicated columnist Robert Novak (4/6) writes that former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay's "greatest peril is the federal investigation of lobbyist Jack Abramoff that now has moved into the heart of the former majority leader's office, with two former aides pleading guilty. This has cut into DeLay's formerly solid base of support in his home district and led him to decide this week that any other Republican would have a better chance of retaining the congressional seat. But what about the greed and mendacity of some of the bright young people who worked for Tom DeLay? The suspicion is that the power politics he practiced for the public good was transmuted by those aides into their private gain. It is a stain on what the legacy should be for the most effective legislator of his time."

Slaughter Urges Colleagues To Post Report About GOP "Corruption" On Web Sites. Rep. Louise Slaughter is organizing a group of House Democrats to post her report alleging Republican "corruption" on their web sites. The Hill (4/6, Hearn) reports that Republicans say the report "is too political to appear on such sites and that doing so amounts to a violation of House rules. Less than a month ago, House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) removed the report from her House website after Republicans said it violated House rules that ban political documents from being distributed at taxpayer expense." Slaughter "began approaching members on the House floor several weeks ago to build support for posting the report, 'America for Sale: The Costs of Republican Corruption,' on multiple congressional sites."

Taxpayer Funding Of House Democrats' Retreats Questioned. House Democrats have spent hundreds of thousands of dollars of taxpayer money on the party's annual retreats amid a dispute with Republicans over whether House rules allow them to do so. Roll Call (4/6, Pershing) reports, "Neither party has ever asked the ethics committee for official written guidance on the subject, and the panel has never ruled publicly either way or told Democrats to stop. House rules do explicitly prohibit the expenditure of House funds for unofficial purposes, so the question turns on whether party retreats are 'official' or 'political' events. Under House rules, they cannot be both." If the party retreats 'are considered unofficial rather than official events, then House rules would prohibit the use of any House resources, including leadership office funds, to pay for them."

Talks Between FAA, Air Traffic Controllers Stall. The Washington Post (4/6, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "Contract talks between the Federal Aviation Administration and the air traffic controllers union collapsed yesterday. The FAA declared the negotiations at an impasse, which allows the agency to turn the dispute over to Congress. … Marion C. Blakey, the FAA administrator, said the agency would send its last, best offer to congressional leaders by today. Congress will have 60 calendar days to intervene in the dispute. If Congress takes no action, the FAA will be free to impose the terms of its proposal."

Cheney To Throw First Pitch At Nationals' Opener. The AP (4/6) reports Vice President Dick Cheney "will throw out the ceremonial first pitch at the Washington Nationals' Major League Baseball home opener next week, the team said Wednesday. The Nationals' first home game of the season is Tuesday afternoon against the New York Mets."

NYTimes Criticizes Delay Of Social Security, Medicare Reports. An editorial in the New York Times (4/6, 1.19M) criticizes the White House for missing the deadlines for the government's 2006 annual reports on Social Security and Medicare, calling its explanation that the reports are being held, pending action by the Senate on President Bush's nominees for two of the programs' six trustees "lame." The Times adds, "It's unlikely that the report on Social Security is much changed from last year. It's very likely that the Medicare report will show deterioration in the program's financial condition, and it would be shocking if it did not detail the crippling costs and disastrous rollout of the prescription drug benefit. … Holding up the reports seems like an attempt to hide the truth."

WSJournal Says Justice Kennedy Is "Open For Intellectual Rent." An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (4/6, 2.11M) says, "Supreme Court Justice Anthony Kennedy lashed out at our humble profession last week, castigating editorial writers whom he said frequently 'misinterpret' the Court's reasoning, according to an article in Monday's Washington Post. … While nominated as a conservative by Ronald Reagan, Justice Kennedy has proven on the High Court that he is open for intellectual rent. … Thus it is no surprise that the judicial left is already warning Justice Kennedy that he'd better join the Court's liberal big four -- or else." The Journal adds, "As Justice Kennedy's complaint last week suggests, the judicial left knows exactly what it's doing in singling him out. Liberals seem to think they won't be able to intimidate new Justice Samuel Alito and Chief Justice John Roberts. Which is why liberals will continue to treat Justice Kennedy as if he's the pigeon in one of B.F. Skinner's behavior-modification experiments."

OTHER NEWS:

Stock Rise, Lifting Nasdaq, S&P To Five-Year Highs. NBC Nightly News (4/5, story 6, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street today stocks finished higher. The Dow was up almost 36 points [to close at 11,239.55]. NASDAQ was up more than 14 points on the day [to close at 2,359.75]." USA Today (4/6, Shell, 2.31M) reports it was the Nasdaq's "best finish since a 2425.38 close on Feb. 16, 2001." USA Today also reports, "Edging up ever closer to a fresh multiyear high was the Standard & Poor's 500, which gained 5.63 points, or 0.4%, to 1311.56, its best close since May 21, 2001 -- and less than 2 points away from a five-year high. The benchmark index has now gone 774 days without a 10% correction, its fourth-longest stretch." The Wall Street Journal (4/6, Patterson, 2.11M) and Washington Post (4/6, D3, 744K), among other newspapers, also report the stock numbers.

Speculation Said To Be Driving Oil Prices Higher. The CBS Evening News (4/5, story 3, 2:05, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Also coming off a year of record profits, despite their own hurricane damage, are America's oil companies. For those of us who buy their product, the price continues to rise. Gasoline is up 35 cents in the past six weeks to a nationwide average of $2.59 a gallon." CBS (Orr) added, "After a winter slump, $3 a gallon gas is back. Some of the usual suspects are to blame. But there is another bogeyman behind the higher prices: Energy traders cashing in on fears over supply disruptions are bidding up the price of oil." The "retired chairman of ExxonMobile has said energy traders add as much as a third to the cost of oil. That amounts to $20 worth of speculation in every $60 barrel of crude."

Drug Makers Intensify Lobbying Expenditures In States. The drug making industry is increasing its political spending in state capitals as states pass laws to change how drug makers do business. The Washington Post (4/5, A2, 744K) reports, "In an extensive analysis of lobbying records, the nonpartisan Center for Public Integrity reports that the drug industry spent more than $44 million on lobbying state governments in 2003 and 2004, and $8 million on candidates for state offices. The Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America (PhRMA) was the most active lobbyist, spending more than $4.5 million in the states. Four other major companies, Eli Lilly and Co., GlaxoSmithKline Inc., Pfizer Inc., and Johnson & Johnson, each spent more than $3 million in the period. The trade association and 14 major drug companies together accounted for 80 percent of the state capital lobbying on drug issues."

Canadian Online Pharmacies Forced To Retool. Canada's online pharmacy industry is beset by problems that have cut into sales and forced many smaller pharmacies out of business. The New York Times (4/6, Krauss, 1.19M) reports, "The industry has been obliged to retool into a far more global enterprise in which the surviving Canadian pharmacies must now either buy or become partners with pharmacies in Europe and Asia to find scarce drug supplies, improve their profit margins and protect themselves from potentially hostile Canadian regulators." The Times adds that "the most serious test has been the new Medicare drug insurance benefit, Medicare Part D, that thousands of older Americans are seeing as potentially a better option."

Student Sues GWU Over Self-Endangerment Policy. The CBS Evening News (4/5, story 9, 3:15, Mitchell) reported, "The American College Health Association says suicide is the third leading cause of death among college students. Each year, an estimated 1100 students will take their own lives." CBS (Dow) reported on the case of George Washington University student Jordan Nott, who sought treatment for depression at the university hospital and was then barred from campus. GWU's "endangering behavior policy forbids actions of any kind that imperil or jeopardize the health or safety of anyone, including one's self. Many colleges have similar guidelines, including mandatory withdrawals. What's not known is how often they are used." Nott sued to challenge the GWU policy.

DC To Institute New Post-Incarceration Inmate Inmate Health Care Program. The Washington Post (4/6, Levine) reports, "The D.C. jail will become one of the first correctional facilities in the country to provide inmates with medical care that will follow them once they are no longer behind bars." The Post continues, "The program will offer men and women incarcerated in the city's main detention center continuity of primary and specialty care after they are released. The approach, modeled on a successful project in central Massachusetts, was announced yesterday by Mayor Anthony A. Williams (D) and other District officials. … 'It's a very innovative, dynamic and comprehensive approach to the provision of inmate medical care,' said the city's new corrections director, Devon Brown." The Post adds, "The jail has had a long history of deficient health care. From 1995 until 2000, medical and mental health services there were operating under an expensive, court-ordered receivership that ultimately improved treatment at an average cost of $11 million a year. … Under the new initiative, the nonprofit organization Unity Health Care will take over inside the jail and begin seeing the men and women there, many of whom have hepatitis C, tuberculosis or HIV. But Unity will not close inmates' files once they leave the facility. Instead, it will continue to manage their care and records through the nearly three dozen clinics, centers and other medical locations it operates across the District for the uninsured and underinsured."

Schumer Says 2006 Elections Are Referendum On Bush. DSCC chairman Charles Schumer said yesterday that the 2006 elections are a referendum on President Bush and predicted Democrats would make substantial gains this year. The Hill (4/6, Kaplan) reports that Schumer "said a unified Democratic policy agenda is 'necessary but not sufficient' to triumph this fall and predicted that if the election were held now Democrats could pick up five Senate seats. At the same time, Schumer sought to tamp down expectations for Democratic gains in November, despite the overall anti-incumbent political climate and the DSCC's money advantage."

Poll Finds Black Voters Open To Supporting Steele. A report by Cornell Belcher, a polling consultant to the DNC, says that a majority of African American voters in Maryland are open to supporting Republican Senate candidate Michael Steele and urges the party to "knock Steele down." The Washington Post (4/6, B5, Mosk, 744K) reports that the March 27 report, based on a survey of 489 black voters conducted last month, "finds that 22 percent of black voters support Steele when matched against a 'generic' Democrat."

The Baltimore Sun (4/6, Skalka, 296K) also reports on the poll, noting that the fact that Democrats are "examining the leanings of blacks early in the race shows concern." The Sun says the poll "is one attempt to answer a sensitive question being bandied about in Maryland political circles: Are Democrats more likely to prevail against Steele, the first African-American elected statewide in Maryland history, with a white congressman or with the black former congressman and national NAACP president as their nominee?" The survey "concludes that 44 percent of those polled indicated that they were persuadable when presented with Steele's campaign message, a plurality that the pollster labels 'the emerging black swing' vote."

Ehrlich Administration Predicts Voter Fraud This Fall. The Ehrlich Administration says it is anticipating widespread voter fraud this year, as Democrats take advantage of Maryland's new election law, the Washington Times (4/6, Ward, 90K) reports Paul Schurick, director of communications for Gov. Bob Ehrlich, said, "I fully expect the governor's political opponents will take advantage of the opportunities for fraud. I expect them to try to engage in organized, large-scale voter fraud," adding, "I think it will be everywhere, statewide." State Democratic Party Executive Director Derek Walker "called the accusations a 'scare tactic' and said Mr. Ehrlich is 'petrified that the more people that vote, the less chance that [he] wins.'"

Massachusetts Health Care Plan Seen As Aiding Possible Romney White House Run. Massachusetts' legislature has approved a plan to provide universal health insurance coverage that stresses personal responsibility. The plan requires no or limited premiums for low-income residents, imposes a mandate on small business owners, and increases income taxes for residents who can afford coverage but refuse to carry coverage. The issue is being portrayed as a feather in the cap for Gov. Mitt Romney, a potential 2008 candidate. CNN's The Situation Room (4/5, Greenfield) reported, "If Governor Mitt Romney decides to seek the presidency, the new universal health insurance plan that Massachusetts is close to adopting is likely to be a center piece of his campaign. Why? Because in part it fits a pattern of governor candidates who point to their state house records as a way of appealing across party lines."

The story was the lead on each of the networks last night. ABC World News Tonight (4/5, lead story, 2:40, Wiener, 8.78M) reported, "Massachusetts will become the first state in the country to require all of its residents to have health insurance." Gov. Mitt Romney: "We have found a way to get every citizen health insurance." Wiener: "With the new system, residents who make less than $9,500 a year, will get free health insurance. No premiums. No deductibles. Families with low incomes but above the poverty line will pay premiums on a sliding scale. But still, no deductibles. And for the fast majority of residents who do have health insurance, lawmakers predict that cutting the roles of the uninsured will bring down premiums for everyone."

The CBS Evening News (4/5, lead story, 2:25, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "President Clinton promised it but did not deliver, and now Massachusetts has apparently done it." The state "will require every citizen to be insured. Governor Mitt Romney pushed for the program." He "considers health coverage essential, like car insurance." Gov. Romney: "Well, when people drive a car, we insist that they have automobile insurance because we don't want have to a huge accident occur and have the other driver, or other taxpayers, pick up the bill. Well, individuals also have a responsibility." Regan: "Currently, Massachusetts spends an estimated $1 billion a year covering its half million uninsured residents." Gov. Romney: "We concluded that in fact if we took the money we're spending giving people free care who don't have insurance and instead use that money to help them buy insurance, we can keep from shifting the cost of the uninsured on to people who are already covered." Regan: "The bill takes effect in July of 2007, right around the same time that Governor Mitt Romney will be deciding whether to run for president in 2008, and you can bet health care will be a major issue in that race."

NBC Nightly News (4/5, lead story, 2:40, Taibbi, 9.87M) reported, "Simple idea, to treat people the way most states now treat cars, get insurance or else. But in Massachusetts, a first, they are talking health insurance. And the or else part of it says that if you can afford it and you don't get it, the state will make you pay." Gov. Mitt Romney, Massachusetts: "Well, if people can afford to buy insurance and they don't happen to buy it, in the first couple of years, we just tell them that they're not going to get their tax refund. In other years, we start applying a penalty to them." But "critics do see serious problems, small businesses objecting to the tax penalties for not providing health coverage for their workers and some who say the working middle class will end up paying too much to subsidize the program."

Analysts Say Other States Face Barriers To Following Massachusetts Example. On ABC World News Tonight (4/5, story 2, 1:55, Vargas, 8.78M), Washington correspondent George Stephanopoulos and medical editor Dr. Tim Johnson analyzed the Massachusetts plan. Stephanopoulos said, "There's no appetite politically to take this on in Washington right now." But can other states "meet the Massachusetts conditions? Number one, they had a $1 billion pool they already spend on the uninsured. Two, they were ready to raise more money, by putting a mandate on employers, as well. And three, they had a relatively low number of uninsured. And there's probably only a handful of states that can meet those conditions." Dr. Johnson added, "There's not much in the plan that addresses medical costs, that is the cost of those who deliver the care. And the quality of that care. And in the long run, any reform bill that does not address those two issues is really no reform at all."

Clinton Praises Romney's Efforts. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton has praised the Romney's efforts on the Massachusetts plan, noting, "To come up with a bipartisan plan in this polarized environment is commendable." The AP (4/6, Fournier) reports, "She embraced the Massachusetts measure's most striking aspect -- requiring people to purchase health insurance -- but questioned Romney's plans to eliminate a fee on companies that do not provide health insurance for employees." The AP also reports that political strategists agreed "that the legislature had handed Romney a timely political victory." Romney "now has a signature achievement on an issue that polls show is a growing concern for U.S. voters."

Massachusetts Plan Called "Innovative Social Policy." An editorial in the Washington Post (4/6, A28, 744K) calls the Massachusetts bill "innovative social policy." The Post adds, "Mr. Romney deserves credit for working with a Democratic legislature to come up with a promising plan, but not for his rhetoric. … Mr. Romney, who is considering a run for president, may be tempted to argue that his state offers a model for others. But Massachusetts began with two advantages: an unusually low percentage of residents who are uninsured and a state-backed pool of money for compensating hospitals for free emergency care that provided reformers with a ready source of funds. Moreover, it isn't even certain that the Massachusetts plan will work on its home turf."

Social Conservatives Seen As Toughest Group For McCain To Woo. The Christian Science Monitor (4/6, Feldmann, 61K) questions whether Sen. John McCain, "the early front-runner for the GOP nomination," can "maintain his image as a straight-talking maverick…even as he reaches out to religious conservatives and raises hackles on both the left and right with moves that his critics call 'unprincipled.'" The Monitor adds that social conservatives may be the toughest group for McCain to convince. Leaders "speak of McCain in the harshest of terms, with no hope of redemption." The Monitor adds, "Among rank-and- file social conservatives, McCain may fare better than among their leaders, analysts say."

Religious Conservatives Urged To Take Their Ideas To "Middle." Ross Douthat, an associate editor at The Atlantic Monthly, writes in the Wall Street Journal (4/6, 2.11M) that "the last, limping years of the Bush administration find religious conservatives in a position of unusual strength -- flush from victory in the Roberts and Alito confirmation battles; relatively untainted by the stumblings and scandals afflicting the GOP; and stronger, in numbers and credibility, than most of their rivals for control of the party. … Which means that for the moment, the closest thing to a credible public philosophy the GOP has to offer emanates from the once-unlikely alliance of evangelicals and Catholics, and their God-infused politics of social reform." Religious conservatives "have moved from a seat at the GOP table to a place near its head; now they need to find a way to carry their ideas into the American middle, tempering their own bigotries and bad habits along the way, and mixing the innocence of doves with the political wisdom of serpents. And if they succeed, there's a good chance that the 'theocons'…will some day be able to look back over the patient work of decades and see a nation transformed by their labors."

Pentagon Official Examines Clintons' Financial Records. US Joint Forces Command Deputy Legislative Director Cordell Francis has been looking into the personal financial records of Sen. Hillary and former President Bill Clinton, the New York Post (4/6, Bishop, 624K) reports. the search through Clinton's records comes "a week after news broke last month that Bill had advised Dubai leaders on how to navigate U.S. political concerns over its ports deal, Senate records show. Francis was required to register his personal data with the Senate in order to access Clinton's records. The Post reviewed a list of people who had accessed the senator's documents." The Post adds, "Joint Forces Command spokesman Navy Capt. Hal Pittman said he was unaware of Francis' probing and would have to investigate the matter before commenting. He did not call back."

Couric To Anchor CBS Evening News. Katie Couric will move from NBC's Today Show to CBS in May, where she will eventually anchor The CBS Evening News. She will become the first woman to hold the position. The networks each noted the story. The CBS Evening News (4/5, story 11, 1:30, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported Couric "will be the anchor and managing editor, taking the baton from Bob Schieffer." ABC World News Tonight (4/5, story 11, :15, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "It is great to welcome another woman to the evening news. And we wish her luck." NBC Nightly News (4/5, story 9, 0:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Katie Couric is about to become competition. … We wish her the very best, right up to a point." The story was covered in today's major newspapers. Some of the stories, such as the one in USA Today (4/6, Johnson, 2.31M), say Couric's move "comes as CBS News continues to rebound from a scandal in 2004 over a story on President Bush's military career, attracting younger viewers even as the Web and other media pose the stiffest challenge yet to network newscasts, which have hemorrhaged millions of viewers in the past decade." The Washington Times (4/6, Harper, 90K) also says "CBS has lagged third in ratings behind ABC and NBC for a decade and was dogged by a credibility scandal in September 2004 after former anchorman Dan Rather broadcast a bogus '60 Minutes' story claiming…Bush had compromised his National Guard service." The Wall Street Journal (4/6, Barnes, 2.11M), Washington Post (4/6, C1, Kurtz, 744K) and New York Times (4/6, Carter, 1.19M) also report on the announcement.

Engler Says Pension Reform Bill Must Rely On Common Sense. John Engler, president of the National Association of Manufacturers, writes in USA Today (4/6, 2.31M), "Recent media reports have inaccurately suggested that pending pension reform legislation would weaken current law and allow companies to reduce pension funding. This perception is wrong. For the overwhelming majority of companies that provide defined-benefit pensions — 47% of which are manufacturing companies — existing law and the new legislation would significantly increase their funding obligations." Engler adds, 'A final bill must rely on common sense. Lawmakers and media leaders who want employers to continue defined-benefit plans while also fighting to compete in a global economy must resist anti-corporate calls for draconian, one size-fits-all legislation."

Bush Urged To Veto Pension Reform Bill. An accompanying editorial USA Today (4/6, 2.31M) says that the pending pension reform legislation gives "companies new leeway to fake their pension math. More pensioners would be placed at risk. Chances that taxpayers will be stuck with a huge bill would rise significantly." Lawmakers "are making the prospects for pension security worse. If President Bush still wants to protect pensions, he'll have to start by exercising his first veto."

Meyerson Derides Rick Berman. Harold Meyerson writes in the Washington Post (4/6, A29, 744K) about "the Beltway's most outrageous advocate, who goes by the name of Rick Berman. In recent months Berman has been in the news for placing full-page ads in major newspapers (funding sources unidentified) that gently compare America's union leaders to Fidel Castro and like authoritarians." Berman's "salvos against unions are just the latest in a line of attacks he's leveled against drunk-driving laws, anti- smoking statutes, food safety ordinances and minimum-wage standards. He is, broadly speaking, the lobbyist for the Hobbesian state of nature." Meyerson adds, "The law may have hauled Abramoff off the stage, and DeLay may be huddling with his counsel and his Creator to plan his next move. But Rick Berman rolls merrily along, an inexhaustible source of material for the Reitmans, Buckleys and all who aspire to chronicle our depravities."

Rice Defends US-India Nuclear Deal On Hill. The New York Times (4/6, O'Neil, 1.19M) reports Secretary Rice "faced tough questioning from the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee this morning on the administration's nuclear deal with India." She "argued that the Senate needed to approve the deal…to keep that country aligned with the United States in what she called 'an all-out rush for energy supplies' by rapidly developing nations," although she "acknowledged that 'regional realities' meant that India would not agree to accept a cap on its nuclear arsenal." However, "her remarks were greeted with caution by the panel's chairman, Senator Richard G. Lugar." Still, "while Democrats made clear they would seek changes in the pact they did not seem inclined to try to block it." The Financial Times (4/6, Sevastopulo) also says the deal "received support from some Democrats," while the Wall Street Journal (4/6, King, 2.11M) headlines its story "Lawmakers Appear Open To Nuclear Pact With India" and the Washington Times (4/6, Sands, 90K) titles its report "Nuclear Accord Receives Backing As Rice Testifies."

Knight Ridder (4/6, Hutcheson) says "key Democrats offered tentative support Wednesday for a nuclear deal with India, raising prospects that Congress will approve the landmark agreement," and Bloomberg (4/6, Zacharia) also refers to the support of "prominent Democratic US lawmakers," such as Sens. Joseph Biden and John Kerry. The Los Angeles Times (4/6, Richter, 958K) runs a similar report.

In contrast, the AP (4/6, Sidoti) reports in its third paragraph that "Republicans and Democrats alike expressed serious reservations over the plan and criticized what they called the Bush administration's failure to explain its details to lawmakers earlier," although it later concedes that "some lawmakers from both political parties indicated they would back the plan because of an overall goal of strengthening the U.S.-India relationship."

Rice Says US Will Seek South Asian Nuclear Weapons Moratorium. The AFP (4/6) reports that when "replying to Democratic Senator John Kerry on whether the United States could offer 'real leadership' in trying to bring together the nuclear-armed neighbors, neither of which are signatories to the nuclear Non Proliferation Treaty (NPT)," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said "the United States would push for a South Asian moratorium on nuclear weapons production to ease tensions between India and Pakistan," although she admitted that "the United States was unable to get a commitment on nuclear controls from the South Asian nations."

Rice Rejects Linking Nuclear Deal With New Delhi's Ties To Tehran. The AFP (4/5) reported Secretary Rice told the Senate Wednesday that the "United States is concerned over India's ties with Iran but will not ask it to sever links with the Islamic republic in return for American civilian nuclear fuel and technology." Senator Barbara Boxer and others "during the hearing Wednesday expressed concerns over India's military links with Iran, including New Delhi's reported training of Iranian naval personnel."

The AP (4/5, Dareini) reported, "Iran said Wednesday it has successfully test-fired a 'top secret' missile, the third in a week, state-run television reported. The report called the missile an 'ultra-horizon' weapon and said it could be fired from all military helicopters and jet fighters."

Iranian UN Ambassador Denies Country Has Nuclear Weapons Program. In an opinion piece in the New York Times (4/6, 1.19M) entitled "We Do Not Have a Nuclear Weapons Program," Iranian Ambassador to the United Nations Javad Zarif writes, "A solution to the situation is possible and eminently within reach. Lost amid the rhetoric is this: Iran has a strong interest in enhancing the integrity and authority of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty." Zarif says Tehran "defines its national security in the framework of regional and international cooperation and considers regional stability indispensable for its development." He praises Moscow for the "thoughtful possibilities for a deal" it has "offered," and says, "Pressure and threats do not resolve problems. Finding solutions requires political will and a readiness to engage in serious negotiations. Iran is ready. We hope the rest of the world will join us."

State Department Report "Skates Around" Consequences Of Democracy Promotion. In a story on the State Department's release of "Supporting Human Rights and Democracy: The US Record 2005-2006," the Financial Times (4/6, Dinmore) reports, "The Bush administration on Wednesday defended its efforts to promote democracy around the world in the face of growing criticism of double standards and accusations that its 'freedom drive' was flagging as a result of electoral gains by Islamists opposed to the US." Secretary Rice is quoted writing, "We stood in solidarity with the brave men and women around the world who were persecuted by repressive regimes for exercising their rights." The Times says the report "skates around the issues arising from the administration's stated goal of 'ending tyranny' – namely the success of Islamists in elections across the Middle East, and the resistance to change by allies in the 'war on terror.' The report mentions only briefly how 'some governments' moved to impose draconian restrictions on civil society groups, 'citing fears of instability or foreign interference.'" The Times notes some Administration officials "concede there is concern over direction" and Bush's pro-democracy strategy "is flagging. Recent FT interviews with senior State Department officials reinforced that impression."

Turkish Security Forces, Kurds Clash Again. The New York Times (4/6, Fisher, 1.19M) reports that "violent clashes between Kurds and security forces in Turkey over the past week have jolted memories here back to an old conflict." It adds that "after a decade of calm, at least 15 people have been killed in protests in recent days," causing Kurds to fear that their cultural and political gains might be lost.

Palestinian Finances In Desperate Shape. The Washington Times (4/6, Mitnick, 90K) reports that the Hamas-led Palestinian government claims to have inherited "empty coffers." Unrest could result if "the Palestinian Authority misses salary payments." The outgoing Fatah party asserts that "the Palestinian Authority's treasury is empty not because of poor management, but because of Hamas' refusal to [recognize] Israel." Western donors have "frozen payments until Hamas recognizes Israel and renounces violence." An editorial in the New York Times (4/6, 1.19M) urges Palestinian Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar to recognize Israel, saying that "most rational people know [what] Hamas must do if Palestinians are ever going to get the viable state they so crave."

US Proposes Shifting Burden Of UN Dues. The Washington Times (4/6, Pisik, 90K) reports that the US has proposed a "new method of apportioning U.N. dues that would mean sharp increases for countries including China, Russia and India." The proposal, to assign countries' dues according to "purchasing power parity" rather than to GDP, would decrease the US contribution to the UN budget only slightly, by 0.5%. However, China has already "complained that its assessment would increase sixfold, making its share second only to that of the United States."

IMF Wants Developing Economies To Have More Voting Rights. The Financial Times (4/6, Guha, Giles) reports that the IMF plans to "draw up a new set of voting rights that would boost the relative power of Asian countries at the likely expense of European countries." Observers say that the organization could "fall into obscurity" if it fails to give poorer countries a bigger stake; however, the IMF initiative "is likely to meet resistance from European countries that fear a dilution of their influence."

Russia, China Seen As Strengthening Ties To Offset US. The Washington Times (4/6, Mainville, 90K) reports that Russia and China are cultivating ever-stronger ties to "counterbalance U.S. global influence." Vladimir Putin and Hu Jintao have met five times "in less than a year." The two countries held joint military exercises last year; "a second round … is planned for next year." Russia also envisions selling more gas to China. However, the Times reports that "some Russian policy-makers remain wary of China's growing strength."

Gorbachev Discusses Changes In Russia, Praises Putin. In an interview with USA Today (4/6, 2.31M), former Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev discusses Russia 20 years after he came to power. He says that "a country like Russia cannot be quickly changed" and predicts that "20-25 years" are needed for his reforms to take full root. Gorbachev credits President Vladimir Putin for having "stabilized the country" after Boris Yeltsin's reign and hints that the critical West "would just like to keep Russia down as long as possible." He calls the invasion of Iraq "a major political mistake."

Moscow Airport Introduces Lie Detector For Passengers. The Washington Times/London Daily Telegraph (4/6, Blomfield) reports that Moscow's Domodedovo airport will introduce "a lie detector test" for passengers "as early as July." The Israeli-developed machinery, "intended to identify terrorists and drugs smugglers," asks four questions, including, "Have you ever lied to the authorities?" Eventually "all passengers" will have to take the test.

Russia Said To Be Running Short Of Gas. Nadejda M. Victor, a research fellow at the Program on Energy and Sustainable Development at Stanford University, writes in the Washington Post (4/6, 744K) that Russia's Gazprom is facing a "looming decline in gas production." Wasteful domestic consumption, "dwindling supply," and "contractual commitments" to ex-Soviet states mean that Gazprom might, by 2008, be forced to "cut off internal customers (voters) or the Western customers who are the firm's main source of hard cash."

Thai PM Suddenly Quits. The Washington Post (4/6, Sipress, 744K) reports that Thai Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra has "shocked Thailand again" by immediately resigning rather than waiting several weeks as promised. Thaksin "said he was worried that his continuing presence in office was dividing Thais dangerously" and handed over power to a deputy, a "longtime" loyalist who can serve only temporarily. The temporary appointment leaves "open the possibility that another member of Thaksin's inner circle would ultimately take the top job."

AIDS Infection Rates In East, West Africa Lower Than Expected. In a front-page story today on overstated HIV infections rates in Rwanda, the Washington Post (4/6, A1, Timberg, 744K) reports that, despite dire warnings, AIDS deaths on the predicted scale never arrived here. A new national study illustrates why: The rate of HIV infection among Rwandans ages 15 to 49 is 3 percent, according to the study, enough to qualify as a major health problem but not nearly the national catastrophe once predicted." Newly published data "portray an epidemic that is more female and more urban than previously believed, one that has begun to ebb in much of East Africa and has failed to take off as predicted in most of West Africa." The Post notes that infection rates have reached worst-case predictions only in southern Africa including Botswana, South Africa, Swaziland and Zimbabwe.

French Unions Threaten More Unrest. The Washington Post (4/6, Moore, 744K) reports that French unions have demanded that the government "withdraw its contentious labor law by April 15" or risk more strikes. The Post reports that in a poll "72 percent of those questioned said they were dissatisfied" with government handling of the crisis. In addition, it notes that "increasing numbers of political commentators have begun writing [Prime Minister Dominique de] Villepin's political obituary."

Irish Police Hunt Killers Of Former British Spy. The New York Times/Agence France-Presse (4/6) reports that the Irish police "appealed to the public on Wednesday for help in finding the killers of Denis Donaldson," an IRA member who had admitted last December to "two decades" of spying for the British. The British and Irish prime ministers "said they would still meet Thursday in Armagh to present a plan to restore a power-sharing government" for Northern Ireland.

Lindsey Urges Compromise On Yuan Revaluation. Former Bush advisor Lawrence Lindsey argues in a Wall Street Journal (4/6, 2.11M) op-ed that the US and China need to compromise on yuan revaluation. He believes that "splitting the difference between" the US goal of 1% yuan appreciation per month and the Chinese position of less than 1% per quarter will "produce a compromise pace of adjustment that would be challenging but manageable for the Chinese economy." By agreeing to such a deal, China can avoid "an economically damaging fight on principle in which [it] would be the bigger loser."

Court Filings Tell of Internet Spying

By THE NEW YORK TIMES

WASHINGTON, April 6 — A former AT&T technician said on Thursday that the company cooperated with the National Security Agency in 2003 to install equipment capable of "vacuum-cleaner surveillance" of

e-mail messages and other Internet traffic.

A statement by the technician, Mark Klein, and several company documents he saved after retiring in 2004, were filed on Wednesday in a class-action lawsuit against AT&T. The suit, filed in January in federal court in San Francisco by the Electronic Frontier Foundation, a civil liberties group, says the company helped the security agency invade its customers' privacy. The documents provided by Mr. Klein were filed under seal because of concerns about disclosing proprietary information.

Mr. Klein's documents, some of which he had provided to The New York Times, describe a room at the AT&T Internet and telephone hub in San Francisco that contained a piece of equipment that could sift through large volumes of Internet traffic.

EFF files suit against AT&T over NSA spying
April 7, 2006

The Electronic Frontier Foundation (EFF) today filed the legal documents needed for its class action lawsuit against AT&T to move forward. The EFF is alleging that AT&T has purposely diverted customer traffic to the NSA for years as a means of aiding the NSA's covert surveillance program that was revealed last December—and they claim to have the documents to prove it.

In what sounds like a plot lifted straight from a spy novel, a former AT&T employee has given the EFF access to three internal AT&T documents that describe the inner workings of the massive AT&T data and voice network. The documents are sensitive enough that AT&T's lawyers are deeply concerned about the possibility they could be released or made public during the court case. In a letter to the EFF, an AT&T attorney wrote,

I am informed that these documents relate to the technical structure of AT&T telephone networks and are extremely sensitive in nature-for reasons having nothing to do with the subject matter of this case. Were they or any one of them to fall into the wrong hands, they could be used to "hack" into the AT&T network, compromising its integrity. This could cause substantial damage to AT&T's network.

These documents, among others, also worried the government (which is not a party to the lawsuit), which is concerned about matters of national security being discussed in open court. The Department of Justice has looked over the materials, though, and just announced that it has no objection to the EFF case so long as the documents and proceedings are kept under seal. With the government's objections out of the way, the EFF today filed the documents with the court. Its basic claim is straightforward:

The lawsuit alleges that AT&T Corp. has opened its key telecommunications facilities and databases to direct access by the NSA and/or other government agencies, thereby disclosing to the government the contents of its customers' communications as well as detailed communications records about millions of its customers, including the lawsuit's class members.

The lawsuit also alleges that AT&T has given the government unfettered access to its over 300 terabyte "Daytona" database of caller information--one of the largest databases in the world. Moreover, by opening its network and databases to wholesale surveillance by the NSA, EFF alleges that AT&T has violated the privacy of its customers and the people they call and email, as well as broken longstanding communications privacy laws.

Why AT&T? Because they are now the largest telecom firm in America. The EFF's complaint points out that the company handles more than 300 million voice calls each day, passes more than 4,600 TB of data along its backbone, and carries 18 billion minutes of of international calls each year. They are also the largest DSL provider in the US, meaning that without their cooperation, the NSA would have significantly less data to work with. A successful case against the company would probably convince other firms to stop aiding the NSA, if for no other reason than to avoid class-action lawsuits and massive fines.

Al Qaeda liked family man ploy, declassified papers show

Andrew Zajac, Chicago Tribune

Apr. 7--WASHINGTON -- An alleged Al Qaeda sleeper agent arrested in West Peoria in December 2001 was picked for his work by Sept. 11 attack planner Khalid Shaikh Mohammed in part because the agent was married and had children, thus making him less likely to attract attention, new court documents show.

Ali Saleh Kahlab al-Marri, a Qatari national, was told to arrive in the U.S. before Sept. 11, 2001, and to head to Pakistan if he did not make it into this country before then, according to court papers filed in Charleston, S.C.

Al-Marri, his wife and five children arrived in the U.S. on Sept. 10, 2001, purportedly to study at Bradley University, authorities said.

The fresh details about al-Marri's alleged ties to Al Qaeda came from declassified portions of a sworn statement that has been the basis for detaining al-Marri as an enemy combatant.

Government\l "l" lawyers\l "l" grudgingly made the new material public on Wednesday, after a federal magistrate in Charleston said that al-Marri needed to be able to see the evidence being used to detain him, so that he could rebut it.

Al-Marri was facing fraud charges in June 2003 when he was declared an enemy combatant by President Bush and transferred from the criminal justice system to the Charleston Naval Brig. Al-Marri is the only enemy combatant currently held in the U.S.

As in many other cases involving prisoners in the war on terror, the Bush administration has sought to limit the information available to detainees and the public, on the grounds of national security.

But in late February, federal Magistrate Robert Carr told government\l "l" lawyers\l "l" that "the deck is stacked pretty good in favor of the government to start with" and that as a result, he would not consider information about al-Marri which al-Marri himself was not permitted to see and discuss with his lawyers.

Carr is expected to weigh information presented by both sides and make a recommendation to a federal judge overseeing the case about whether al-Marri should continue being held as an enemy combatant.

The declassified summary indicates that al-Marri traveled to Dubai in August 2001 and was given $10,000 to $13,000, plus $3,000 for a laptop computer, by Mustafa Ahmed al-Hawsawi, an Al Qaeda paymaster and a lieutenant of Mohammed.

The computer later was found to contain files on how to make hydrogen cyanide, a potentially lethal toxin, as well as more than 1,000 apparent credit card numbers and other financial data, which formed the basis of fraud charges originally lodged against al-Marri.

The document states that Mohammed communicated about al-Marri's activities in the U.S. through his brother, Jaralla Saleh Mohamed Kahla al-Marri, who now is being held at the Guantanamo Bay Naval Base in Cuba.

About two-thirds of one page in the new document remain censored.

Al-Marri, 40, who maintains his innocence, "should have been given this information long ago," said Jonathan Hafetz, one of his lawyers.

The government still has not offered any evidence to back up the summary, making the document essentially hearsay, Hafetz said.

Its release came after Carr, in unusually blunt language, prodded the government to either drop its use of classified information or declassify it so that al-Marri could see it and respond.

"You need to make your choice, because this deals with a man's freedom," Carr said in a conference call with lawyers in the case. "He has been removed from the battlefield, so to speak, for many years."

A government\l "l" lawyer\l "l" argued that the existing censored document put al-Marri "in a fine position to be able to respond with some alternative theory as to why he is not an enemy combatant."

"Let me put it this way," Carr replied. "You didn't present the president with only a partial [summary], did you?"

"This isn't blindman's buff or any of those children's games where he has to try to rebut or present more persuasive evidence . . . without seeing what the government has. I mean, that's just not the right way to do this," Carr said.

Jailed 4 1/2 Years in Land of the Free; In 2001, a Sri Lankan was arrested at the U.S. border and labeled a security threat. A court found the case absurd.

By H.G. Reza, Times Staff Writer

The young farmer from the Indian Ocean country of Sri Lanka wanted only to get to Canada to escape the torture. Instead, he has landed in the north Los Angeles suburb of Lancaster.

Accused of being a terrorist in his native country, Ahilan Nadarajah left in September 2001 and was guided by smugglers through Thailand, South Africa, Brazil and Mexico. He intended to sneak into the United States on his way to Toronto but was arrested at the border.

He was twice granted political asylum by a U.S. immigration judge, but the Department of Homeland Security branded him a national security threat. He spent nearly 4½ years in a U.S. jail while the government tried to deport him to Sri Lanka.

He was freed March 21 after the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals called his lengthy detention illegal in a bristling 37-page opinion that took aim at the Bush administration's controversial practice of indefinitely detaining immigrants accused of terrorism but not charged. The three-judge panel said keeping him jailed violated a 2001 U.S. Supreme Court ruling against indefinite detention in immigration cases.

The court's unanimous ruling called Nadarajah's jailing illegal and unreasonable and said the government's arguments were "patently absurd," "implausible" and "baffling."

The 26-year-old postmaster's son remains remarkably free of animosity toward the United States, despite having been locked up in solitary for five months.

"Although I believe I was jailed unjustly, I'm grateful because the American government saved my life by not sending me back," Nadarajah said in an interview last week at a Sri Lankan restaurant in Lancaster. The chances are slim he will be allowed into Canada, where he intended to seek asylum, and the U.S. probably will become his home. Much of the evidence the U.S. government used to label Nadarajah a member of the Tamil Tigers, which the State Department has branded as terrorist, came from an informant working for Canadian law enforcement.

The Sri Lankan government has been at war for two decades with the Tamil Tigers, which seeks an independent state for ethnic Tamils. Both sides have committed human rights abuses, including torture, kidnappings and politically motivated killings, according to Amnesty International.

The 9th Circuit believed Nadarajah's account: that the Sri Lankan army began jailing and torturing him when he was 17 to persuade him to admit membership in the Tamil Tigers. He was repeatedly arrested, beaten, burned with cigarette butts and hung upside down with his head inside a bag of gasoline. Twice his mother bribed army officials to release him, and the family finally decided he should leave the country.

Officials at the Sri Lankan embassy in Washington did not return calls seeking comment.

Nadarajah said his family sold their farm and jewelry to raise the $17,000 that a smuggling ring charged to take him to Canada. Although he had no close relatives there, Nadarajah said he hoped to gain asylum and join that country's sizable Tamil community.

On Sept. 21, 2001, he left Sri Lanka for Bangkok, the first leg of his journey, where he obtained a Mexican visa. He was arrested Oct. 27 while trying to enter the U.S. at San Ysidro with false immigration papers.

He remained locked up despite receiving political asylum from an immigration judge, whose rulings were upheld on appeal. The government also refused to allow him out on $20,000 bond, which the appellate court called an abuse of discretion. In arguing for Nadarajah's continued detention, the Bush administration insisted that he was not being held indefinitely because Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales would review his case at some point, as the immigration laws provide.

"[But] no one can satisfactorily assure us as to when that day will arrive," the appellate court ruled.

The U.S. government's evidence that Nadarajah was a terrorist was based mainly on information from a secret informant for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, who did not testify. Instead, a federal agent read from Canadian police reports about the informant, and he testified about his one meeting with him.

The 9th Circuit discounted the testimony and criticized the agent's claim that Nadarajah and a Sri Lankan woman, also in custody for entering the U.S. illegally, jointly called Canada to order a slaying. The court noted that the agent could not explain how they could have called from a jail where men and women are not allowed to mix.

The agent also could not explain why he had not subpoenaed the phone records.

"Every time I win in court, they're appealing. It's like a game to them, and they're playing with your life," Nadarajah said.

Despite dismay over his lengthy incarceration, he noted an important difference about his experience in a

U.S. jail.

"I was not tortured in America," said Nadarajah, who was locked up in an immigration detention facility near San Diego.

Georgetown University law professor David Cole, an expert on immigration law and a frequent critic of the administration's terrorism policies, said the appellate court's ruling 10 days after the case was argued showed the panel was disturbed by the government's conduct.

"This is remarkable," he said. "It's not unusual to wait up to two years for a ruling. But the court spoke swiftly and sternly."

The Nadarajah case was another setback for the administration in cases where immigrants arrested after Sept. 11 for immigration violations have been kept in jail without charges on suspicion of having terrorism ties.

In 2005, the Mirmehdi brothers, four Iranians from the San Fernando Valley, were released after more than three years in detention. Their release was prompted by the Supreme Court ruling blocking the government from detaining immigrants indefinitely.

Last month, a U.S. magistrate cited the same ruling in recommending the release of Buena Park resident Abdel-Jabbar Hamdan, a Jordanian citizen who has been incarcerated for 20 months.

Immigration judges blocked the deportation of Hamdan and the Mirmehdis to their native countries because they would be tortured. It is unlikely a third country will accept them because the U.S. has tied them to terrorism.

American Civil Liberties Union lawyers in Los Angeles, who represented Nadarajah, credit the release of another of their clients to fallout from his case. In that instance, Saluja Thangaraja, 26, of Sri Lanka was also arrested while entering the U.S. illegally. An immigration judge also found that she was tortured and granted her asylum, but the government kept her locked up near San Diego for nearly five years until her release March 27.

Homeland Security and Justice Department officials declined to comment.

Although he never intended to live in the U.S., Nadarajah said he would make the best of his stay here. The grant of asylum made the charge of illegal entry moot. He is free on $20,000 bond, paid for by Australian relatives, and is required to wear an electronic monitoring device on his ankle and be home by 5 p.m. while he waits for Atty. Gen. Gonzales to review his asylum case.

He is living rent-free in an apartment owned by a member of Lancaster's Sri Lankan community. After almost five years of jail food, he is enjoying traditional Tamil meals of rice and curry, and laughingly said he did not want to see beans or potatoes on his plate for a while.

"I lost hope for a time. I thought about suicide," he said "But now I feel like I have been reborn into a new life here in America, the land of freedom."

Appeals court hears arguments in DHS labor rights case

By Karen Rutzick

A three-judge panel heard arguments Thursday in an appeal of an August decision that thwarted the Homeland Security Department's new labor relations system.

The panel from the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, made up of judges Harry Edwards, A. Raymond Randolph and Thomas Griffith, questioned the government forcefully over the department's plan to allow senior-level officials to override collective bargaining agreements after the fact.

"Why don't we get to the heart of the issue?" Edwards asked. "Where is it in the history of our country under any collective bargaining scheme ... that allows the employer to unilaterally abrogate an agreement?"

That issue -- management's authority to issue a directive at any time that negates a prior agreement -- was central in District Court Judge Rosemary Collyer's summer decision to enjoin the system. Her ruling was appealed by both sides on issues they lost.

Edwards, an appointee of President Carter who often is cited as an expert in the field and wrote a book called Labor Relations Law in the Public Sector, was the most outspoken of the judges, saying it is "nonsense" to describe DHS' desired system as collective bargaining.

When lawmakers gave DHS authority in 2002 to create a new personnel system with more flexible workplace rules for the sake of national security, they required the department to preserve a system of collective bargaining.

"Congress did not say you could ignore collective bargaining rights," Edwards said. "It said just the opposite."

A central part of DHS' personnel overhaul is the plan to replace the General Schedule pay system with broad pay bands and to give raises based on market studies and performance evaluations, rather than simply time in service. The department is still planning to begin putting its pay reforms, which are not part of the lawsuit, into place this year.

Griffith, appointed by President Bush in June, asked government lawyer Thomas Bondy what he thought Congress meant when it said to preserve collective bargaining, to which Bondy replied that the new DHS system indeed retains the "trappings" of collective bargaining.

"It doesn't say trappings," Griffith said. "It says the right to collective bargaining." Griffith also used Collyer's wording, referring to contracts under the new DHS system as "illusory."

DHS' new system also modifies the role of the Federal Labor Relations Authority, a governmentwide body that adjudicates federal labor-management disputes. DHS regulations creating the system largely replace the FLRA with an internal Homeland Security Labor Relations Board, relegating the FLRA to an appeals role.

Collyer ruled that the agency illegally altered the FLRA's duties without congressional authority. Unions bristle at the notion of management-appointed board members deciding labor-management disputes.

Judge Randolph, a George H.W. Bush appointee, questioned Bondy on that point, saying Congress only authorized the department to rework itself.

"The FLRA is not in Homeland Security," Randolph said. "It's a separate, independent body outside of Homeland Security, right?"

Edwards added to that line of questioning, asking, "Where do you get the authority to tell other existing agencies what to do?"

The unions, represented by Gregory O'Duden, general counsel of the National Treasury Employees Union, also were questioned hard on their appeal of the department's ability to limit matters that are subject to collective bargaining in the first place, which Collyer let stand.

Even if the unions are successful in removing management's right to renege on contracts after the fact, the ability to limit the scope of bargaining still would allow the department to remove whole subjects from collective bargaining, limiting union power.

Griffith asked O'Duden, "Why shouldn't we just wait to see what happens here?," questioning the grounds on which the court could rule what is and is not allowed to be in the scope of collective bargaining.

The appeal is on an expedited schedule. O'Duden told reporters after the arguments that an opinion could take two to three months, but there is no set timeline.

In another wrinkle, the two largest unions in the coalition that filed the lawsuit, NTEU and the American Federation of Government Employees, are scheduled to face off in a union election May 9 to represent the Customs and Border Protection employees in DHS. If NTEU loses, it would not represent any employees in the department.

Government defends decision to fund Boy Scout event

BY MICHAEL HIGGINS
Chicago Tribune

CHICAGO - The federal government's decision to spend about $7 million on a special Boy Scout event doesn't improperly favor religious believers, despite the scouts' policy that members affirm a duty to God, a government lawyer told a federal appeals court on Thursday.

The U.S. Department of Defense has historically supported the national Boy Scout Jamboree, a 10-day event held every four years, but not because of the scouts' religious stance, said attorney Lowell Sturgill Jr.

"Any group can approach the military ... and request similar aid to what the Boy Scouts are getting," Sturgill told a three-judge panel of the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. "The plaintiffs haven't shown, on the record, that anybody has ever requested it and been denied."

Sturgill squared off on Thursday against lawyers from the American Civil Liberties Union, which argues that the spending policy favors believers over non-believers and is unconstitutional.

In July, U.S. District Judge Blanche Manning agreed with the ACLU, and issued a court order that blocks the defense department from participating in the jamboree.

Manning concluded that the Pentagon's participation violated the 1st Amendment because the Boy Scouts of America "excludes atheists and agnostics" and calls for members to believe in God.

"No one except for the Boy Scouts can get this extraordinary aid," Adam Schwartz, attorney for the ACLU, argued Thursday. "The government has declared a winner without holding a race."

Schwartz compared the Boy Scout funding to, for example, a government decision to declare that all federal drug rehabilitation funds must go to religion-based, 12-step programs.

Rev. Eugene Winkler, a former pastor at the First United Methodist Church in Chicago, and others brought the lawsuit in 1999.

Winkler said after the hearing Thursday that, though he is a former scout and scoutmaster, he believes the government's spending on the event discriminates against non-believers.

"Only kids who believe in God have this opportunity," Winkler said. "Kids who don't believe in God are excluded."

Judges quizzed Schwartz about an earlier court ruling that allowed the government to pay for chain link fencing, drinking fountains and other support for a mass by the Pope John Paul II in 1979 on the mall in Washington, D.C. They also asked about government aid to the Special Olympics and the Girl Scouts.

Schwartz said no other group got comparable assistance.

ACLU officials said the defense department spends $7 million on the jamboree, paying for everything from contractors to assemble the campground to cookie dough.

George Davidson, an attorney for the Boy Scouts, said afterward that the military does not participate in the event to promote religion. Rather, the event's purpose is public relations and military preparedness, including practice in assembling "tent cities."

Library of Congress sued for Trans discrimination

WASHINGTON — A federal judge found March 31 that an employment discrimination lawsuit brought by the American Civil Liberties Union on behalf of a transgender veteran against the Library of Congress can go forward. "Today's decision begins to restore my faith in our government," Diane Schroer, who brought the case against the Library of Congress, in a said in a news release. Finding that sex may not be "a cut-and-dried matter of chromosomes," the court ruled that federal protections against sex discrimination may also protect transgender people who are discriminated against based on their gender identity. In rejecting the government's argument that discrimination against transgender people is not sex discrimination, the court noted "the factual complexities that underlie human sexual identity."

In Detroit, Indians file suit over health care: Government must do more, they say

Niraj Warikoo, Detroit Free Press

Apr. 7--Alleging that the U.S. government has reneged on its promise to provide them health care, American Indians in metro Detroit filed a class action in Detroit on Thursday that asked for better services.

The lawsuit was filed in U.S. District Court on behalf of three Indians who say they suffer from serious illnesses but are unable to get proper care.

About 75% of an estimated 40,000 Indians in the tri-county region don't have health insurance, said local activists.

Under federal law and numerous treaties, the U.S. government is supposed to provide health care for Indians who live in urban areas. According to the lawsuit, two-thirds of American Indians live in metro areas.

But it has failed to deliver, the lawsuit claims, and needs to provide more funding for their health care.

"American Indians gave up 95% of their land in return" for government services, such as health care, said Fay Givens, executive director of the Lincoln Park-based American Indian Services, which provides mental health services.

The government "has failed in every respect," Givens said.

The class\l "l" action\l "l", put together by attorneys with the University of Michigan Clinical Law Program, was filed against the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services and Indian Health Service, which operates under the federal\l "l" agency.

Verna Miller, spokeswoman for Indian Health Service, said she couldn't comment on a pending lawsuit.

Christina Pearson, a spokeswoman for the Department of Health and Human Services, also said she couldn't comment.

The lawsuit cites a September 2004 report by the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights that said there is a "dire health care situation" for Indians.

The plaintiffs mentioned in the suit are Tonya Hammitte, David Stone and Joseph Stewart, all of Detroit. Each is unable to get proper health care for their ailments, the lawsuit says.

Metro Detroit has only one primary health care center for Indians, the Detroit-based American Indian Health and Family Services. But the center is poorly funded and staffed, the lawsuit says, and unable to provide many needed services.

Stolt-Nielsen claims Federal Court ruling was a technicality

Jerry Frank

NORWEGIAN cartel suspect Stolt-Nielsen has explained last week's adverse US Federal Court decision as a constitutional technicality, while revealing a healthy first quarter for its parcel tanker operation.

Stolt-Nielsen, fresh from the sale of its slice of fish farm business Marine Harvest to fellow Norwegian John Fredriksen, yesterday posted a $47.9m first quarter profit from continuing operations up from $24m a year earlier.

Chairman Niels Stolt-Nielsen called the figures 'solid' just days after fourth quarter figures took additional $13.5m costs linked to anti-trust probes in Europe and the US.

And the Norwegian family group at the centre of the prolonged cartel inquiry came out firing against an adverse US federal court finding last week that put it in line again for indictment proceedings.

Stolt-Nielsen insisted its loss of protection from an earlier decision by a district court was a matter of the finer points of checks and balances of US constitutional law and not a reflection on the worth of its legal argument.

'The ruing by the third circuit panel, which reversed our victory in the District Court, is purely based on the constitutional law theory that the judiciary cannot enforce the executive branch's promise not to indict,' the company proposed.

'The rule states it was not based on the merits of our legal position as to the amnesty agreement.

'We have already won once on the legal merits of the amnesty agreement, and are fully committed to enforcing the Department\l "l" of\l "l" Justice's\l "l" promises.

'We firmly believe we have not broken the amnesty agreement with the DoJ and will explore all options open to the company so that it is protected under the agreement.'

Stolt-Nielsen's parcel tanker business, amid the to-and-fro of the group's legal battle following its eviction from the DoJ anti-trust amnesty programme, has enjoyed a strong contract market alongside a weaker spot business.

Stolt's parcel tankers delivered a $41.5m operating profit down slightly on $43.2m booked in the first quarter last year.

Court Filings Tell of Internet Spying

By THE NEW YORK TIMES

WASHINGTON, April 6 — A former AT&T technician said on Thursday that the company cooperated with the National Security Agency in 2003 to install equipment capable of "vacuum-cleaner surveillance" of

e-mail messages and other Internet traffic.

A statement by the technician, Mark Klein, and several company documents he saved after retiring in 2004, were filed on Wednesday in a class-action lawsuit against AT&T. The suit, filed in January in federal court in San Francisco by the Electronic Frontier Foundation, a civil liberties group, says the company helped the security agency invade its customers' privacy. The documents provided by Mr. Klein were filed under seal because of concerns about disclosing proprietary information.

Mr. Klein's documents, some of which he had provided to The New York Times, describe a room at the AT&T Internet and telephone hub in San Francisco that contained a piece of equipment that could sift through large volumes of Internet traffic.

ARS Technica
EFF files suit against AT&T over NSA spying
April 7, 2006

The Electronic Frontier Foundation (EFF) today filed the legal documents needed for its class action lawsuit against AT&T to move forward. The EFF is alleging that AT&T has purposely diverted customer traffic to the NSA for years as a means of aiding the NSA's covert surveillance program that was revealed last December—and they claim to have the documents to prove it.

In what sounds like a plot lifted straight from a spy novel, a former AT&T employee has given the EFF access to three internal AT&T documents that describe the inner workings of the massive AT&T data and voice network. The documents are sensitive enough that AT&T's lawyers are deeply concerned about the possibility they could be released or made public during the court case. In a letter to the EFF, an AT&T attorney wrote,

I am informed that these documents relate to the technical structure of AT&T telephone networks and are extremely sensitive in nature-for reasons having nothing to do with the subject matter of this case. Were they or any one of them to fall into the wrong hands, they could be used to "hack" into the AT&T network, compromising its integrity. This could cause substantial damage to AT&T's network.

These documents, among others, also worried the government (which is not a party to the lawsuit), which is concerned about matters of national security being discussed in open court. The Department of Justice has looked over the materials, though, and just announced that it has no objection to the EFF case so long as the documents and proceedings are kept under seal. With the government's objections out of the way, the EFF today filed the documents with the court. Its basic claim is straightforward:

The lawsuit alleges that AT&T Corp. has opened its key telecommunications facilities and databases to direct access by the NSA and/or other government agencies, thereby disclosing to the government the contents of its customers' communications as well as detailed communications records about millions of its customers, including the lawsuit's class members.

The lawsuit also alleges that AT&T has given the government unfettered access to its over 300 terabyte "Daytona" database of caller information--one of the largest databases in the world. Moreover, by opening its network and databases to wholesale surveillance by the NSA, EFF alleges that AT&T has violated the privacy of its customers and the people they call and email, as well as broken longstanding communications privacy laws.

Why AT&T? Because they are now the largest telecom firm in America. The EFF's complaint points out that the company handles more than 300 million voice calls each day, passes more than 4,600 TB of data along its backbone, and carries 18 billion minutes of of international calls each year. They are also the largest DSL provider in the US, meaning that without their cooperation, the NSA would have significantly less data to work with. A successful case against the company would probably convince other firms to stop aiding the NSA, if for no other reason than to avoid class-action lawsuits and massive fines.

Al Qaeda liked family man ploy, declassified papers show

Andrew Zajac, Chicago Tribune

Apr. 7--WASHINGTON -- An alleged Al Qaeda sleeper agent arrested in West Peoria in December 2001 was picked for his work by Sept. 11 attack planner Khalid Shaikh Mohammed in part because the agent was married and had children, thus making him less likely to attract attention, new court documents show.

Ali Saleh Kahlab al-Marri, a Qatari national, was told to arrive in the U.S. before Sept. 11, 2001, and to head to Pakistan if he did not make it into this country before then, according to court papers filed in Charleston, S.C.

Al-Marri, his wife and five children arrived in the U.S. on Sept. 10, 2001, purportedly to study at Bradley University, authorities said.

The fresh details about al-Marri's alleged ties to Al Qaeda came from declassified portions of a sworn statement that has been the basis for detaining al-Marri as an enemy combatant.

Government\l "l" lawyers\l "l" grudgingly made the new material public on Wednesday, after a federal magistrate in Charleston said that al-Marri needed to be able to see the evidence being used to detain him, so that he could rebut it.

Al-Marri was facing fraud charges in June 2003 when he was declared an enemy combatant by President Bush and transferred from the criminal justice system to the Charleston Naval Brig. Al-Marri is the only enemy combatant currently held in the U.S.

As in many other cases involving prisoners in the war on terror, the Bush administration has sought to limit the information available to detainees and the public, on the grounds of national security.

But in late February, federal Magistrate Robert Carr told government\l "l" lawyers\l "l" that "the deck is stacked pretty good in favor of the government to start with" and that as a result, he would not consider information about al-Marri which al-Marri himself was not permitted to see and discuss with his lawyers.

Carr is expected to weigh information presented by both sides and make a recommendation to a federal judge overseeing the case about whether al-Marri should continue being held as an enemy combatant.

The declassified summary indicates that al-Marri traveled to Dubai in August 2001 and was given $10,000 to $13,000, plus $3,000 for a laptop computer, by Mustafa Ahmed al-Hawsawi, an Al Qaeda paymaster and a lieutenant of Mohammed.

The computer later was found to contain files on how to make hydrogen cyanide, a potentially lethal toxin, as well as more than 1,000 apparent credit card numbers and other financial data, which formed the basis of fraud charges originally lodged against al-Marri.

The document states that Mohammed communicated about al-Marri's activities in the U.S. through his brother, Jaralla Saleh Mohamed Kahla al-Marri, who now is being held at the Guantanamo Bay Naval Base in Cuba.

About two-thirds of one page in the new document remain censored.

Al-Marri, 40, who maintains his innocence, "should have been given this information long ago," said Jonathan Hafetz, one of his lawyers.

The government still has not offered any evidence to back up the summary, making the document essentially hearsay, Hafetz said.

Its release came after Carr, in unusually blunt language, prodded the government to either drop its use of classified information or declassify it so that al-Marri could see it and respond.

"You need to make your choice, because this deals with a man's freedom," Carr said in a conference call with lawyers in the case. "He has been removed from the battlefield, so to speak, for many years."

A government\l "l" lawyer\l "l" argued that the existing censored document put al-Marri "in a fine position to be able to respond with some alternative theory as to why he is not an enemy combatant."

"Let me put it this way," Carr replied. "You didn't present the president with only a partial [summary], did you?"

"This isn't blindman's buff or any of those children's games where he has to try to rebut or present more persuasive evidence . . . without seeing what the government has. I mean, that's just not the right way to do this," Carr said.

Jailed 4 1/2 Years in Land of the Free; In 2001, a Sri Lankan was arrested at the U.S. border and labeled a security threat. A court found the case absurd.

By H.G. Reza, Times Staff Writer

The young farmer from the Indian Ocean country of Sri Lanka wanted only to get to Canada to escape the torture. Instead, he has landed in the north Los Angeles suburb of Lancaster.

Accused of being a terrorist in his native country, Ahilan Nadarajah left in September 2001 and was guided by smugglers through Thailand, South Africa, Brazil and Mexico. He intended to sneak into the United States on his way to Toronto but was arrested at the border.

He was twice granted political asylum by a U.S. immigration judge, but the Department of Homeland Security branded him a national security threat. He spent nearly 4½ years in a U.S. jail while the government tried to deport him to Sri Lanka.

He was freed March 21 after the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals called his lengthy detention illegal in a bristling 37-page opinion that took aim at the Bush administration's controversial practice of indefinitely detaining immigrants accused of terrorism but not charged. The three-judge panel said keeping him jailed violated a 2001 U.S. Supreme Court ruling against indefinite detention in immigration cases.

The court's unanimous ruling called Nadarajah's jailing illegal and unreasonable and said the government's arguments were "patently absurd," "implausible" and "baffling."

The 26-year-old postmaster's son remains remarkably free of animosity toward the United States, despite having been locked up in solitary for five months.

"Although I believe I was jailed unjustly, I'm grateful because the American government saved my life by not sending me back," Nadarajah said in an interview last week at a Sri Lankan restaurant in Lancaster. The chances are slim he will be allowed into Canada, where he intended to seek asylum, and the U.S. probably will become his home. Much of the evidence the U.S. government used to label Nadarajah a member of the Tamil Tigers, which the State Department has branded as terrorist, came from an informant working for Canadian law enforcement.

The Sri Lankan government has been at war for two decades with the Tamil Tigers, which seeks an independent state for ethnic Tamils. Both sides have committed human rights abuses, including torture, kidnappings and politically motivated killings, according to Amnesty International.

The 9th Circuit believed Nadarajah's account: that the Sri Lankan army began jailing and torturing him when he was 17 to persuade him to admit membership in the Tamil Tigers. He was repeatedly arrested, beaten, burned with cigarette butts and hung upside down with his head inside a bag of gasoline. Twice his mother bribed army officials to release him, and the family finally decided he should leave the country.

Officials at the Sri Lankan embassy in Washington did not return calls seeking comment.

Nadarajah said his family sold their farm and jewelry to raise the $17,000 that a smuggling ring charged to take him to Canada. Although he had no close relatives there, Nadarajah said he hoped to gain asylum and join that country's sizable Tamil community.

On Sept. 21, 2001, he left Sri Lanka for Bangkok, the first leg of his journey, where he obtained a Mexican visa. He was arrested Oct. 27 while trying to enter the U.S. at San Ysidro with false immigration papers.

He remained locked up despite receiving political asylum from an immigration judge, whose rulings were upheld on appeal. The government also refused to allow him out on $20,000 bond, which the appellate court called an abuse of discretion. In arguing for Nadarajah's continued detention, the Bush administration insisted that he was not being held indefinitely because Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales would review his case at some point, as the immigration laws provide.

"[But] no one can satisfactorily assure us as to when that day will arrive," the appellate court ruled.

The U.S. government's evidence that Nadarajah was a terrorist was based mainly on information from a secret informant for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, who did not testify. Instead, a federal agent read from Canadian police reports about the informant, and he testified about his one meeting with him.

The 9th Circuit discounted the testimony and criticized the agent's claim that Nadarajah and a Sri Lankan woman, also in custody for entering the U.S. illegally, jointly called Canada to order a slaying. The court noted that the agent could not explain how they could have called from a jail where men and women are not allowed to mix.

The agent also could not explain why he had not subpoenaed the phone records.

"Every time I win in court, they're appealing. It's like a game to them, and they're playing with your life," Nadarajah said.

Despite dismay over his lengthy incarceration, he noted an important difference about his experience in a

U.S. jail.

"I was not tortured in America," said Nadarajah, who was locked up in an immigration detention facility near San Diego.

Georgetown University law professor David Cole, an expert on immigration law and a frequent critic of the administration's terrorism policies, said the appellate court's ruling 10 days after the case was argued showed the panel was disturbed by the government's conduct.

"This is remarkable," he said. "It's not unusual to wait up to two years for a ruling. But the court spoke swiftly and sternly."

The Nadarajah case was another setback for the administration in cases where immigrants arrested after Sept. 11 for immigration violations have been kept in jail without charges on suspicion of having terrorism ties.

In 2005, the Mirmehdi brothers, four Iranians from the San Fernando Valley, were released after more than three years in detention. Their release was prompted by the Supreme Court ruling blocking the government from detaining immigrants indefinitely.

Last month, a U.S. magistrate cited the same ruling in recommending the release of Buena Park resident Abdel-Jabbar Hamdan, a Jordanian citizen who has been incarcerated for 20 months.

Immigration judges blocked the deportation of Hamdan and the Mirmehdis to their native countries because they would be tortured. It is unlikely a third country will accept them because the U.S. has tied them to terrorism.

American Civil Liberties Union lawyers in Los Angeles, who represented Nadarajah, credit the release of another of their clients to fallout from his case. In that instance, Saluja Thangaraja, 26, of Sri Lanka was also arrested while entering the U.S. illegally. An immigration judge also found that she was tortured and granted her asylum, but the government kept her locked up near San Diego for nearly five years until her release March 27.

Homeland Security and Justice Department officials declined to comment.

Although he never intended to live in the U.S., Nadarajah said he would make the best of his stay here. The grant of asylum made the charge of illegal entry moot. He is free on $20,000 bond, paid for by Australian relatives, and is required to wear an electronic monitoring device on his ankle and be home by 5 p.m. while he waits for Atty. Gen. Gonzales to review his asylum case.

He is living rent-free in an apartment owned by a member of Lancaster's Sri Lankan community. After almost five years of jail food, he is enjoying traditional Tamil meals of rice and curry, and laughingly said he did not want to see beans or potatoes on his plate for a while.

"I lost hope for a time. I thought about suicide," he said "But now I feel like I have been reborn into a new life here in America, the land of freedom."

Appeals court hears arguments in DHS labor rights case

By Karen Rutzick

A three-judge panel heard arguments Thursday in an appeal of an August decision that thwarted the Homeland Security Department's new labor relations system.

The panel from the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, made up of judges Harry Edwards, A. Raymond Randolph and Thomas Griffith, questioned the government forcefully over the department's plan to allow senior-level officials to override collective bargaining agreements after the fact.

"Why don't we get to the heart of the issue?" Edwards asked. "Where is it in the history of our country under any collective bargaining scheme ... that allows the employer to unilaterally abrogate an agreement?"

That issue -- management's authority to issue a directive at any time that negates a prior agreement -- was central in District Court Judge Rosemary Collyer's summer decision to enjoin the system. Her ruling was appealed by both sides on issues they lost.

Edwards, an appointee of President Carter who often is cited as an expert in the field and wrote a book called Labor Relations Law in the Public Sector, was the most outspoken of the judges, saying it is "nonsense" to describe DHS' desired system as collective bargaining.

When lawmakers gave DHS authority in 2002 to create a new personnel system with more flexible workplace rules for the sake of national security, they required the department to preserve a system of collective bargaining.

"Congress did not say you could ignore collective bargaining rights," Edwards said. "It said just the opposite."

A central part of DHS' personnel overhaul is the plan to replace the General Schedule pay system with broad pay bands and to give raises based on market studies and performance evaluations, rather than simply time in service. The department is still planning to begin putting its pay reforms, which are not part of the lawsuit, into place this year.

Griffith, appointed by President Bush in June, asked government lawyer Thomas Bondy what he thought Congress meant when it said to preserve collective bargaining, to which Bondy replied that the new DHS system indeed retains the "trappings" of collective bargaining.

"It doesn't say trappings," Griffith said. "It says the right to collective bargaining." Griffith also used Collyer's wording, referring to contracts under the new DHS system as "illusory."

DHS' new system also modifies the role of the Federal Labor Relations Authority, a governmentwide body that adjudicates federal labor-management disputes. DHS regulations creating the system largely replace the FLRA with an internal Homeland Security Labor Relations Board, relegating the FLRA to an appeals role.

Collyer ruled that the agency illegally altered the FLRA's duties without congressional authority. Unions bristle at the notion of management-appointed board members deciding labor-management disputes.

Judge Randolph, a George H.W. Bush appointee, questioned Bondy on that point, saying Congress only authorized the department to rework itself.

"The FLRA is not in Homeland Security," Randolph said. "It's a separate, independent body outside of Homeland Security, right?"

Edwards added to that line of questioning, asking, "Where do you get the authority to tell other existing agencies what to do?"

The unions, represented by Gregory O'Duden, general counsel of the National Treasury Employees Union, also were questioned hard on their appeal of the department's ability to limit matters that are subject to collective bargaining in the first place, which Collyer let stand.

Even if the unions are successful in removing management's right to renege on contracts after the fact, the ability to limit the scope of bargaining still would allow the department to remove whole subjects from collective bargaining, limiting union power.

Griffith asked O'Duden, "Why shouldn't we just wait to see what happens here?," questioning the grounds on which the court could rule what is and is not allowed to be in the scope of collective bargaining.

The appeal is on an expedited schedule. O'Duden told reporters after the arguments that an opinion could take two to three months, but there is no set timeline.

In another wrinkle, the two largest unions in the coalition that filed the lawsuit, NTEU and the American Federation of Government Employees, are scheduled to face off in a union election May 9 to represent the Customs and Border Protection employees in DHS. If NTEU loses, it would not represent any employees in the department.

Government defends decision to fund Boy Scout event

BY MICHAEL HIGGINS
Chicago Tribune

CHICAGO - The federal government's decision to spend about $7 million on a special Boy Scout event doesn't improperly favor religious believers, despite the scouts' policy that members affirm a duty to God, a government lawyer told a federal appeals court on Thursday.

The U.S. Department of Defense has historically supported the national Boy Scout Jamboree, a 10-day event held every four years, but not because of the scouts' religious stance, said attorney Lowell Sturgill Jr.

"Any group can approach the military ... and request similar aid to what the Boy Scouts are getting," Sturgill told a three-judge panel of the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. "The plaintiffs haven't shown, on the record, that anybody has ever requested it and been denied."

Sturgill squared off on Thursday against lawyers from the American Civil Liberties Union, which argues that the spending policy favors believers over non-believers and is unconstitutional.

In July, U.S. District Judge Blanche Manning agreed with the ACLU, and issued a court order that blocks the defense department from participating in the jamboree.

Manning concluded that the Pentagon's participation violated the 1st Amendment because the Boy Scouts of America "excludes atheists and agnostics" and calls for members to believe in God.

"No one except for the Boy Scouts can get this extraordinary aid," Adam Schwartz, attorney for the ACLU, argued Thursday. "The government has declared a winner without holding a race."

Schwartz compared the Boy Scout funding to, for example, a government decision to declare that all federal drug rehabilitation funds must go to religion-based, 12-step programs.

Rev. Eugene Winkler, a former pastor at the First United Methodist Church in Chicago, and others brought the lawsuit in 1999.

Winkler said after the hearing Thursday that, though he is a former scout and scoutmaster, he believes the government's spending on the event discriminates against non-believers.

"Only kids who believe in God have this opportunity," Winkler said. "Kids who don't believe in God are excluded."

Judges quizzed Schwartz about an earlier court ruling that allowed the government to pay for chain link fencing, drinking fountains and other support for a mass by the Pope John Paul II in 1979 on the mall in Washington, D.C. They also asked about government aid to the Special Olympics and the Girl Scouts.

Schwartz said no other group got comparable assistance.

ACLU officials said the defense department spends $7 million on the jamboree, paying for everything from contractors to assemble the campground to cookie dough.

George Davidson, an attorney for the Boy Scouts, said afterward that the military does not participate in the event to promote religion. Rather, the event's purpose is public relations and military preparedness, including practice in assembling "tent cities."

In Detroit, Indians file suit over health care: Government must do more, they say

Niraj Warikoo, Detroit Free Press

Apr. 7--Alleging that the U.S. government has reneged on its promise to provide them health care, American Indians in metro Detroit filed a class action in Detroit on Thursday that asked for better services.

The lawsuit was filed in U.S. District Court on behalf of three Indians who say they suffer from serious illnesses but are unable to get proper care.

About 75% of an estimated 40,000 Indians in the tri-county region don't have health insurance, said local activists.

Under federal law and numerous treaties, the U.S. government is supposed to provide health care for Indians who live in urban areas. According to the lawsuit, two-thirds of American Indians live in metro areas.

But it has failed to deliver, the lawsuit claims, and needs to provide more funding for their health care.

"American Indians gave up 95% of their land in return" for government services, such as health care, said Fay Givens, executive director of the Lincoln Park-based American Indian Services, which provides mental health services.

The government "has failed in every respect," Givens said.

The class\l "l" action\l "l", put together by attorneys with the University of Michigan Clinical Law Program, was filed against the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services and Indian Health Service, which operates under the federal\l "l" agency.

Verna Miller, spokeswoman for Indian Health Service, said she couldn't comment on a pending lawsuit.

Christina Pearson, a spokeswoman for the Department of Health and Human Services, also said she couldn't comment.

The lawsuit cites a September 2004 report by the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights that said there is a "dire health care situation" for Indians.

The plaintiffs mentioned in the suit are Tonya Hammitte, David Stone and Joseph Stewart, all of Detroit. Each is unable to get proper health care for their ailments, the lawsuit says.

Metro Detroit has only one primary health care center for Indians, the Detroit-based American Indian Health and Family Services. But the center is poorly funded and staffed, the lawsuit says, and unable to provide many needed services.

Stolt-Nielsen claims Federal Court ruling was a technicality

Jerry Frank

NORWEGIAN cartel suspect Stolt-Nielsen has explained last week's adverse US Federal Court decision as a constitutional technicality, while revealing a healthy first quarter for its parcel tanker operation.

Stolt-Nielsen, fresh from the sale of its slice of fish farm business Marine Harvest to fellow Norwegian John Fredriksen, yesterday posted a $47.9m first quarter profit from continuing operations up from $24m a year earlier.

Chairman Niels Stolt-Nielsen called the figures 'solid' just days after fourth quarter figures took additional $13.5m costs linked to anti-trust probes in Europe and the US.

And the Norwegian family group at the centre of the prolonged cartel inquiry came out firing against an adverse US federal court finding last week that put it in line again for indictment proceedings.

Stolt-Nielsen insisted its loss of protection from an earlier decision by a district court was a matter of the finer points of checks and balances of US constitutional law and not a reflection on the worth of its legal argument.

'The ruing by the third circuit panel, which reversed our victory in the District Court, is purely based on the constitutional law theory that the judiciary cannot enforce the executive branch's promise not to indict,' the company proposed.

'The rule states it was not based on the merits of our legal position as to the amnesty agreement.

'We have already won once on the legal merits of the amnesty agreement, and are fully committed to enforcing the Department\l "l" of\l "l" Justice's\l "l" promises.

'We firmly believe we have not broken the amnesty agreement with the DoJ and will explore all options open to the company so that it is protected under the agreement.'

Stolt-Nielsen's parcel tanker business, amid the to-and-fro of the group's legal battle following its eviction from the DoJ anti-trust amnesty programme, has enjoyed a strong contract market alongside a weaker spot business.

Stolt's parcel tankers delivered a $41.5m operating profit down slightly on $43.2m booked in the first quarter last year.

Pilot in bombing that killed four Canadians sues U.S. Air Force

SPRINGFIELD, Ill._A decorated pilot involved in a friendly fire bombing in Afghanistan that killed four Canadian soldiers is suing the U.S. Air Force for allegedly ruining his reputation.

Maj. Harry Schmidt says military officials should not have released to the public a scathing letter of reprimand. A federal lawsuit filed in Springfield on Friday accuses the military of violating privacy laws by disclosing information about Schmidt's record without his permission.

The disclosure also violated a settlement agreement that prevented Schmidt from being court-martialed for the 2002 bombing that killed four Canadian soldiers and wounded eight others, said Charles Gittins of Virginia, Schmidt's attorney.

"The government flat-out failed to comply with their agreement," Gittins said.

Lt. Col. Catherine Reardon, an Air Force spokeswoman, had not seen the lawsuit and declined comment.

"At this point, it would be inappropriate for me to comment on the case," she said Sunday.

The letter, which was released in July 2004 by Lt. Gen. Bruce Carlson, commander of the 8th Air Force at Barksdale Air Force Base in Louisiana, said Schmidt "acted shamefully" the night of the bombing and that he demonstrated "arrogance and a lack of flight discipline." Carlson has since been promoted to general and serves as commander of Air Force Materiel Command at Wright-Patterson Air Force Base in Ohio.

A Wright-Patterson spokesman could not immediately comment when reached by phone Sunday.

Lt. Caitlin Flynn, a Barksdale spokeswoman, said officials at the base are confidant that the courts will bring about "a fair conclusion."

"We place our trust in the legal system," she said.

According to the lawsuit, Schmidt suffered damage to his reputation, mental distress, embarrassment and emotional trauma. It seeks unspecified damages from the Air Force "for each unauthorized and un-consented to disclosure" of Schmidt's military records.

Carlson, who found Schmidt guilty of dereliction of duty after a nonjudicial hearing at the base, has refused to reconsider his ruling. Besides the reprimand, Schmidt lost one-half of a month's pay for two months.

On April 17, 2002, Schmidt and another pilot were flying F-16s when they spotted muzzle flashes near Kandahar airport. The Canadians were firing weapons on a training range but Schmidt mistook the soldiers for Taliban forces and dropped a 500-pound, laser-guided bomb.

The pilot has said his superiors never told him the Canadians would be conducting live-fire exercises that night.

Schmidt transferred to the Illinois Air National Guard in 2000 after a decorated career as a Navy pilot and an instructor at the Navy's "Top Gun" fighter pilot school. He remains a member of the National Guard, but has agreed that he will never fly Air Force jets again.

The second pilot, Maj. William Umbach, of Petersburg, received a letter of reprimand in 2003 and was allowed to retire from the Guard. He is not a party to Schmidt's lawsuit.

Germany's three opposition parties voted to conduct a formal parliamentary investigation into the role the German intelligence service has played in the Iraq war. The inquiry will focus on whether German agents helped the American military during its invasion, whether the government had information regarding clandestine C.I.A. flights over Germany and whether Germany took part in the C.I.A. abduction of Khaled el\l "l"-Masri\l "l", a German citizen who says he was taken to an American prison in Afghanistan and tortured.

Canadian man: I was terrorized by dogs and threatened with life in prison by U.S. agents

By BETH DUFF-BROWN

Associated Press Writer

TORONTO_Akhil Sachdeva, an accountant from India who emigrated to Canada, still wonders why he was seized at gunpoint by U.S. agents and thrown into jail, held for months with hundreds of other foreigners in the frenzied months that followed the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

Hustled into the Manhattan offices of the FBI in New York on Dec. 20, 2001, and chained to a steel bench at 26 Federal Plaza, federal agents demanded to know about his religious and political beliefs, whether he had ever taken flying lessons and his personal views about those behind the terrorist attacks that claimed nearly 3,000 lives, he said in an interview with The Associated Press.

He lost his Canadian identification card, and joined hundreds of other foreign detainees in saying he was terrorized by snarling dogs during four months at the Passaic County Jail in New Jersey.

"Maybe because of my skin color? I am an Indian and I look like any person from Pakistan or an Arab country," Sachdeva, a Hindu native of New Delhi, said in his first interview since completing depositions in Toronto this week by attorneys representing the U.S. government.

Sachdeva, 33 and now a Canadian citizen, is seeking undisclosed financial compensation for his ordeal by joining a federal class-action lawsuit filed in New York against senior U.S. officials, including FBI Director Robert Mueller and former Attorney General John Ashcroft.

"First of all, I want an apology," Sachdeva said Thursday in a telephone interview from his home in Brampton, Ontario. "One day I have everything, the next day they destroyed my life and I was not even charged for anything _ I had done no crime. I understand that there was a need of national security then, but how can they treat people that way?"

The lawsuit, filed the New York-based Center for Constitutional Rights on behalf of nearly 800 immigrant detainees, mostly Muslim and Arab men held in the Metropolitan Detention Center in Brooklyn and the Passaic County Jail in New Jersey, alleges the federal agents and offices violated the men's constitutional right by imprisoning them on the basis of their nationality and religion. They were secretly put in high-security cell blocks normally reserved for dangerous inmates before most of them, including Sachdeva and his fellow defendants, were cleared of any terrorist connections and released.

The U.S. government is fighting the lawsuit filed in 2002, maintaining that Ashcroft and the other defendants are shielded by immunity laws designed to ensure they can perform their official duties "without the chill and distraction of damage suits."

"On September 11, 2001, the United States suffered the most devastating attack in our nation's history," says one defense motion to partially dismiss the case. "Forced to respond to this unprecedented assault, our country's highest-ranking officials were immediately called upon to make complex and sensitive judgments with limited guidance from past practice and legal precedent."

In a motion to dismiss the case, filed in November 2004, the defendants said the eight plaintiffs in the case failed to prove that they face a "real and immediate threat of future injury warranting the prospective remedy of equitable relief."

It also said the men _ who have been deported to other countries, including Canada, Turkey and Egypt _ no longer have any rights under the U.S. Constitution.

The motion said that even if the U.S. District Court in New York found merits to the plaintiffs' constitutional claim, the case should still be dismissed because the U.S. Supreme Court has said "individuals cannot be held liable unless they were personally involved in the challenged conduct and such conduct violated clearly established rights."

Some civil libertarians and human rights advocates say the Bush administration went too far in their determination to weed out any terror suspects from the detainees who were mostly picked up on lapsed visa or passport violations.

Sachdeva said he went to New York in early October 2001 to finalize his divorce from his wife, an American who owns a gas station in Port Washington, New York. He said his ex-wife told him that an FBI agent had come by and had some questions about a Muslim employee of the gas station.

She asked him to speak to the agent, Sachdeva said, and he willingly went to 26 Federal Plaza on Dec. 9, 2001, where he was politely questioned by two FBI agents. He said he told them he was planning to return to Canada and they told him this was fine.

As he prepared to return to Canada, he was staying with an uncle on Long Island, east of New York City. On the morning of Dec. 20, Sachdeva said 30 or 40 armed agents barged into the home, ordering him out of bed and into their police car. Back at Federal Plaza, they shackled his legs to a steel bench and interrogated him for four to five hours, never offering him a call his family or lawyer.

"Then they got a little rough; the agents started calling me the F-word," he said. "They were making fun, that they were willing to buy my BMW, saying `You're never going to see the sun again; you're going in for life so if you want to sell your car, we'll buy it for $5,000."

They asked him if he had ever taken flight training or used a flight simulator; he told them no. Was he a practicing Hindu? What did he think of those people behind the terrorist attacks?

He believes it was just after midnight when he was driven in a police van to the Passaic County Jail, where he was strip-searched and put in a cell with dozens of inmates. He said that for the first week, he was forced to sleep on the cold floor and given no toothbrush.

He and the other seven men in the lawsuit complained that their biggest fear came from guards who threatened them and police dogs that were routinely paraded.

"We never knew; sometimes you're sitting in a cell and suddenly there are eight or 10 officers holding dogs, then they took us in small corridors and pushed us against the walls and the dogs were two inches away," Sachdeva said. "They started barking and it was so terrifying."

He said guards let the dogs lick the food that a mosque had provided on a Muslim holiday.

Other inmates called them terrorists; one punched him in the face and chipped a front tooth.

The Passaic County Sheriff's Department, which runs the jail, said the lawsuit was unjustified and that K-9 dog units are only used to sniff out contraband or maintain security.

"Their accusations are not based on the truth, but on their desire to win a lawsuit," said spokesman Bill Maer. He added that dogs were not allowed near immigrant detainees since the Department of Homeland Security banned their use to control illegal aliens in December 2004.

On Dec. 27, Sachdeva received a notice to appear at an immigration court in Newark, New Jersey. He conceded that he had overstayed his visa and the judge told him that he would be deported to Canada or India within 30 days for the civil immigration violation.

But he remained jailed for another three and a half months before being released on April 17, 2002. He was driven straight to an airport and, in handcuffs, put on a flight back to Toronto, with no money. He did get his passport back, but never saw his driver's license and medical insurance card, key pieces of Canadian identification.

He credits Canada for his release, saying officials at the Canadian consulate in New York told him in collect calls he had made from jail that they were working on his release.

Charles\l "l" Miller\l "l", a Justice\l "l" Department\l "l" spokesman, declined comment on the lawsuit, as did Dean Boyd, a spokesman for Immigration and Customs Enforcement in Washington.

James Margolin, a special agent with the FBI in New York, said he could not say much about the case, but challenged Sachdeva's account of mistreatment by any FBI agents.

"The allegations about mistreatment at the hands of FBI agents in New York, we believe are entirely without basis in fact and are untrue, but I can't comment fully because this is a subject of pending litigation."

Cobell: Filing Indian trust lawsuit filled her with dread

MISSOULA_Elouise Cobell\l "l", the Blackfeet woman who accuses the U.S. government of cheating American Indians out of billions of dollars in federal royalties, told conference attendees here Friday that filing the lawsuit 10 years ago filled her with dread.

"I said, 'This is the U.S. government that you're suing,'" Cobell\l "l", executive director of the Native American Community Development Corp., said during a Blackfeet-sponsored conference on racism in reservation border towns. "I called a friend and told her I just didn't think I could do it. And she said, 'If you don't do it, who will?'"

Cobell\l "l" said she also thought the case would last only three years, and urged people at the conference to write their congressional representatives for a speedy resolution.

"There have been 17 decisions in this case, and we've won every one of them," she said. "But the government still delays this case at every chance ... They will try every trick that you can believe."

The most recent delay involves an effort by the government's attorneys to remove U.S. District Judge Royce Lamberth from the case. Lamberth has issued several sharply worded rulings against the government, but Cobell\l "l" said the orders only reflect the government's gross mishandling of Indian trust accounts.

"If this had happened in the private sector, there would be people in jail," she said. "If other people's money was handled this way, people would be in jail ... They would be closed down in a New York second."

Congress created the federal trust to handle Indian royalties in 1887. It demanded an accounting in 1994, and two years later Cobell\l "l" and others filed suit when the accounting was still not done.

Estimates of the money owed for unpaid royalties on oil, gas, timber and other resources from Indian lands range from a half-billion dollars to $27.5 billion, a panel of negotiators and tribal leaders told Senate and House members last month.

The tribes' $27.5 billion estimate is based on the presumption that Indians are still owed about a fifth of the $100 billion to $170 billion in royalties they should have received, most of that in accrued interest. The government's much lower figure is based on efforts to account for possible errors in collections, deposits and payments.

Military fights to keep hosting Boy Scout event

NATHANIEL HERNANDEZ

CHICAGO CHICAGO - The Defense Department wants to continue supporting the National Boy Scout Jamboree because preparing a military base for the event trains soldiers to deal with displaced people, government\l "l" attorneys\l "l" said Thursday.

The government is asking a federal appeals court to overturn a ruling that the Pentagon's support of the jamboree violates the First Amendment because the Scouts require members to swear an oath of duty to God.

The Boy Scouts received about $7 million in support from the Defense Department for the 2005 jamboree. More than 40,000 Boy Scouts attended, pumping about $17 million into Virginia's economy.

Justice Department attorney Lowell Sturgill argued that the military benefits because the jamboree produces conditions similar to those soldiers may face while serving in Iraq or responding to a natural disaster such as Hurricane Katrina.

It also is an effective recruiting tool, Sturgill said.

The American Civil Liberties Union contends that the gathering amounts to a government-sponsored religious event.

"This appeal is about a special pot of government money that cannot be enjoyed by people who don't believe in God," ACLU attorney Adam Schwartz told the three-member panel of the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

The military has provided logistical support for the jamboree since its inception in 1937. The next jamboree is planned for 2010 - the organization's 100th anniversary.

The Boy Scouts organization is not directly involved in the litigation, but says Scouts are not required to pray or attend church at the jamboree.

U.S. Court of International Trade Strikes Another Blow to Byrd Amendment

VANCOUVER, April 7 Attention News/Business Editors

VANCOUVER, April 7 /CNW/ - In a much anticipated decision, the United States Court\l "l" of\l "l" International\l "l" Trade\l "l" (U.S. CIT) today ruled that the United States is violating its own law by applying the Byrd Amendment to anti-dumping and countervailing duties on goods from Canada.

The Canadian Lumber Trade Alliance (CLTA) is extremely gratified with today's ruling. Canadian softwood lumber producers and exporters have approximately $4.4 billion (USD) on deposit with U.S. Customs, which prior to today's decision, would have been available for distribution to American competitors in the softwood lumber industry under the Byrd Amendment. The CLTA is hopeful that today's ruling will lead to a prompt order prohibiting Customs from making any further illegal distributions.

Today's decision further builds on the momentum of the World Trade Organization (WTO) decisions finding the Byrd Amendment illegal under international trade law, and Congress' resulting decision to repeal the law. Because Congress made the legislative repeal of the Byrd Amendment effective only for lumber shipped after October 2007, today's ruling should ensure that any duties paid under the unlawful orders prior to October 2007 will not be distributed to the U.S. industry.

Opinion: Giving It to the Federal Circuit: Why Stop at Immigration Appeals?

Howard J. Bashman

The U.S. Congress is considering legislation that would route all immigration appeals to the Washington, D.C.–based Federal U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, instead of to the regional federal appellate courts where the cases are now heard and decided.

Whether you view this proposal as preposterous (which, admittedly, was my initial reaction) or brilliant, it does present an intriguing possibility: Perhaps there are other categories of cases that, instead of being considered by the regional appellate courts, could be sent for appellate review exclusively to the Federal Circuit.

As the Federal Circuit's Web site explains, "The Federal Circuit is unique among the thirteen Circuit Courts of Appeals. It has nationwide jurisdiction in a variety of subject areas, including international trade, government contracts, patents, trademarks, certain money claims against the United States government, federal personnel, and veterans' benefits. Appeals to the court come from all federal district courts, the United States Court of Federal Claims, the United States Court of International Trade, and the United States Court of Veterans Appeals."

In the 12–month period ending Sept. 30, 2005, the statistics show that the Federal Circuit disposed of 1,662 cases. And during that same 12–month period, 1,555 new cases were filed in the Federal Circuit. None of those cases were immigration cases, because the Federal Circuit does not currently have jurisdiction to hear that category of cases. Across the regional federal appellate courts, in the 12–month period ending Sept. 30, 2005, the statistics show that 12,349 immigration cases were commenced. More than half of those immigration cases were commenced in the 9th Circuit, while nearly 20 percent of the cases were filed in the 2nd Circuit.

As these statistics reveal, if all immigration cases were in fact sent from the regional federal appellate courts to the Federal Circuit, the Federal Circuit's current eclectic and esoteric caseload would make up only approximately 11 percent of that court's work. The remaining 89 percent would be immigration cases.

But why stop at immigration cases? There assuredly are other categories of appeals that the regional federal appellate courts view as dry, needlessly complex, burdensome or inconsequential. Perhaps these cases, too, could be sent to the Federal Circuit, so that the regional federal appellate courts would be left to handle only the extraordinarily interesting cases that appellate judges anticipate receiving when they take their oath of office.

For example, all tax, bankruptcy, NLRB, ERISA and CERCLA cases could be sent to the Federal Circuit, if only Congress would enact an appropriate law. Correspondent Howard Mintz of The San Jose Mercury News, a seasoned journalist who regularly covers the courts, recently reported that the Federal Circuit "currently specializes in patent and bankruptcy cases." Yet the Federal Circuit does not handle any bankruptcy cases, that court's chief judge testified recently before the Senate Judiciary Committee. Nevertheless, Congress could make Mintz appear prescient, thereby increasing its goodwill among the mainstream media.

Another category of cases that Congress could direct to the Federal Circuit is pro se cases, in which one or both of the parties lack counsel. Many of the immigration cases are litigated pro se by the person seeking to remain in the United States. Once the Federal Circuit develops an expertise in dealing with pro se litigants from other countries, it would take little additional effort to grapple with the appeals of pro se litigants who are in this country lawfully.

Other cases that could be sent exclusively to the Federal Circuit are appeals from denials of Social Security benefits, black lung benefits and benefits available under the Longshore and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act. As its Web site explains, the Federal Circuit already handles "certain money claims against the United States government, federal personnel, and veterans' benefits." Thus, the Federal Circuit already has a bit of relevant experience in these areas.

Some regard the proposal to route immigration appeals exclusively to the Federal Circuit as Congress' attempt to punish the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for issuing rulings in immigration cases that are too liberal. Moreover, once the 9th Circuit no longer faces an overwhelming immigration caseload, proposals to divide the 9th Circuit into two or more federal appellate courts will appear more reasonable, because the circuit that ends up containing California will have a much smaller caseload than if the immigration appeals remained.

Yet if the proposal to route immigration appeals to the Federal Circuit is truly intended to rein in the judicial excesses of the 9th Circuit, why stop there? In addition, Congress could mandate that any appeals from federal district courts within the 9th Circuit in cases seeking to declare unconstitutional the Pledge of Allegiance or the national motto "In God We Trust" would instead be heard in the Federal Circuit. And if it were possible to predict in advance the cases in which the 9th Circuit was destined to be reversed 9–0 in the U.S. Supreme Court, those cases, too, could be sent initially, instead, to the Federal Circuit.

Congress may even wish to consider one final innovation regarding the Federal Circuit's jurisdiction. Legislation could be enacted permitting any regional federal appellate court to transfer any case to the Federal Circuit for any reason whatsoever at any time between the filing of the appeal and the conference of the case following oral argument. This way, if a regional appellate court determined that a case was too boring, too complicated, too poorly lawyered or too likely to doom the U.S. Supreme Court confirmation chances of the judges on the panel, the case could be transferred to the Federal Circuit.

The crushing immigration caseload plaguing several of the nation's regional federal appellate courts presents a serious and perhaps even intractable problem. But instead of making the Federal Circuit a court that is overwhelmed by immigration cases, why not make it a court that is overwhelmed by every conceivable sort of undesirable federal appeal? Surely this is a proposal that all of the regional federal appellate courts could wholeheartedly support.

U.S. Court Clears Canadian Beef Imports

April 10, 2006

The U.S. District Court denies a request to block the importation of live cattle and beef from Canada. U.S. Ninth District Court judge Richard Cebull refused on April 6 to issue a permanent injunction against the Agriculture Department (USDA) in order to block the importation of live cattle and beef from Canada.

The Ranchers-Cattlemen's Action Legal Fund (R-CALF), Billings, Mont., petitioned the Court for a permanent injunction against USDA's Final Rule to allow imports of Canadian cattle and beef into the United States. R-CALF claimed that Canadian cattle and beef may be infected with bovine spongiform encephalopathy (BSE).

The U.S. closed its market to Canadian beef and cattle in May 2003 after Canada reported its first case of BSE. Prior to the ban, large numbers of cattle were shipped from Canada to the United States and processed. The market closure resulted in a shortage of beef cattle at some U.S. plants and a glut of live cattle in Canada.

In March 2005, Cebull issued a preliminary injunction blocking imports of Canadian cattle and all beef except boneless beef from animals younger than 30 months of age. Cebull stated that he found the Final Rule to be arbitrary and capricious, and in violation of the Administrative Procedure Act. In July 2005, the U.S. Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals reversed the preliminary injunction, saying USDA deserved great deference and respect as a federal regulatory agency. In refusing to grant the permanent injunction this week, Cebull said his "hands are tied. The Ninth Circuit has instructed this Court to 'abide by this deferential standard,' and 'respect the agency's judgment and expertise'."

"R-CALF is deeply disappointed with this outcome, and it's clear the 9th Circuit forced this case to an abrupt halt by instructing Judge Cebull to cease further review of the scientific issues surrounding BSE," said R-CALF president Chuck Kiker. "This is a loss for every single cattle producer in the United States. The 9th Circuit's decision was based only on preliminary information provided to it before the case was fully developed and before the Administrative Record--which contained numerous scientific documents in support of R-CALF's position--was fully reviewed."

Canada's Agriculture Minister Chuck Strahl welcomed the U.S. Court's decision to block moves to close the U.S. Canadian border again to cattle. "The U.S. District Court sided with internationally recognized science standards Friday and has denied a request from Ranchers-Cattleman Action Legal Fund (R-CALF) to permanently close the U.S. border to Canadian cattle and other ruminants," he said. "This is a great development for the Canadian industry. I applaud U.S. Secretary of Agriculture Mike Johanns' continued determination to move towards a normalization of trade on the basis of sound scientific norms and principles."

EFF Has Evidence Of AT&T, NSA Spying

By David Utter

April 10, 2006

The Electronic Frontier Foundation recently bolstered its class-action suit against AT&T by submitting evidence that the telecom provided the National Security Agency with open access to Internet traffic it handled.

Internal documents obtained by the EFF form the core of its request for a preliminary injunction against AT&T and its alleged violation of federal laws.

Presently those documents reside under a temporary seal, and AT&T must submit to the court its contention that the documents remain under seal and away from the public eye.

"In an abundance of caution, we are providing AT&T with an opportunity to explain itself before this material goes on the public docket, but we believe that justice will ultimately require full disclosure," EFF Legal Director Cindy Cohn said.

The EFF provided a summary of its allegations, dating back to January 31st when it first files suit against AT&T:

The lawsuit alleges that AT&T Corp. has opened its key telecommunications facilities and databases to direct access by the NSA and/or other government agencies, thereby disclosing to the government the contents of its customers' communications as well as detailed communications records about millions of its customers, including the lawsuit's class members.

The lawsuit also alleges that AT&T has given the government unfettered access to its over 300 terabyte "Daytona" database of caller information -- one of the largest databases in the world. Moreover, by opening its network and databases to wholesale surveillance by the NSA, EFF alleges that AT&T has violated the privacy of its customers and the people they call and email, as well as broken longstanding communications privacy laws.

"The evidence that we are filing supports our claim that AT&T is diverting Internet traffic into the hands of the NSA wholesale, in violation of federal wiretapping laws and the Fourth Amendment," said EFF Staff Attorney Kevin Bankston.

"More than just threatening individuals' privacy, AT&T's apparent choice to give the government secret, direct access to millions of ordinary Americans' Internet communications is a threat to the Constitution itself. We are asking the Court to put a stop to it now."

Lawyers for AT&T had asked for the return of the documents, citing the inclusion of trade secrets and the danger to AT&T's network from malicious hackers should they fall into the wrong hands. EFF's Cohn replied that EFF would submit the documents to the court under seal and countered that AT&T's "blanket demand" request lacked specificity.

Though the documents remain under seal, the statement released by the attorney for the whistleblower, a former AT&T employee named Mark Klein, was discussed in a Wired report.

In the statement, Klein claimed that a NSA staffer interviewed an AT&T technician in 2002 in connection with a job installing equipment in a secret room at the company's switching facility in San Francisco.

That equipment included a Narus STA 6400, which Klein said was "known to be used particularly by government intelligence agencies because of its ability to sift through large amounts of data looking for preprogrammed targets."

Similar installations took place in other AT&T facilities on the West Coast. Traffic on AT&T's Worldnet as well as that routed from Internet peering links from other backbone providers traveled into the secret room; Klein claimed to have worked on connecting these circuits to a splitting cabinet, which delivered the traffic to the NSA'a secret room and its Narus data-mining hardware.

AT&T customarily does not comment on litigation. The telecom has until Wednesday to tell the court if the documents submitted by the EFF should remain under seal.

The Wired article also noted the Department of Justice could intervene in the case and request the documents remain under seal. And, the government potentially could quash the lawsuit outright, citing national security concerns under the executive power of "state secrets privilege."

B. THIS WEEK

- D.C. Circuit to Hear Oral Argument in Appeals Challenging Computer Disconnection and Class Notice Orders and Seeking Reassignment of this Indian Trust Litigation to a Different District Court Judge
  Cobell v. Norton [United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit; United States District Court for the District of Columbia]. On Tuesday, April 11, a panel of the D.C. Circuit (Tatel, Brown, Silberman) will hear oral argument in two appeals arising out of the ten-year-old Indian trust litigation. One appeal challenges an injunction requiring the Department of the Interior to disconnect major computer systems from the internet and from internal computer networks. The second appeal challenges an order requiring Interior to declare in all written communications with class members that its trust information is of questionable reliability. The appeal also seeks reassignment of the case to a different district court judge.

C. LAST WEEK

- Ninth Circuit Holds that Detention of Arriving Alien Still in Removal Proceedings Is Indefinite and Orders Alien's Release

Nadarajah v. Ashcroft [9th Cir.]. On March 17, the Ninth Circuit reversed the district court's denial of the alien's habeas corpus petition and ordered his release from detention with conditions. The court found that the alien was detained for more than four years from the time he attempted to enter the United States on false papers, his removal case remained pending on certification to the Attorney General, and he was being detained "indefinitely." The Court, for the first time, applied the reasonableness test for interpreting statutory detention authority for post-final order aliens to the pre-final order detention of an arriving alien, and also found that the alien's unchallenged grant of deferral of removal under the Convention Against Torture meant that there was no substantial likelihood of removal in the reasonably foreseeable future.

- Eighth Circuit Determines that the Board Has Authority to Issue a Final Removal Order in the First Instance

  Solano-Chicas v. Gonzales [8th Cir.]. On March 17, the Eighth Circuit affirmed the Board of Immigration Appeals' (Board) entry of an order of removal in the first instance. The Board reversed the immigration judge's grant of cancellation and ordered the alien removed. The Court held that the Board has the authority to issue a removal order in the first instance. The Court specifically disagreed with the Ninth Circuit's decision in Molina-Camacho v. Ashcroft, 393 F.3d 937 (9th Cir. 2004).

- Second Circuit Determines that Lack of Doctrinal Knowledge of Religion Does not Render Claim of Persecution on Account of Religion Incredible

  Rizal v. Gonzales [2d Cir.]. On March 21, the Second Circuit reversed the Immigration Judge's adverse credibility determination and remanded for further proceedings. The Court held that the Immigration Judge erroneously viewed the alien's lack of detailed doctrinal knowledge about Christianity as automatically rendering incredible his claim of religious persecution, without assessing the genuineness of the alien's asserted Christian self-identification and his claim that others perceived him as a Christian and had persecuted him on that basis.

- Seventh Circuit Applies the "Hypothetical Federal Felony Rule"

  Gonzales-Gomez v. Achim [7th Cir.]. On March 22, the Seventh Circuit reversed the Board of Immigration Appeals' order of removal. The Court held that the alien's Illinois felony conviction for possession of cocaine was not an aggravated felony drug trafficking offense, because it would be punishable as only a misdemeanor under federal law. The circuits have split on this "hypothetical federal felony" rule. On April 3, the Supreme Court granted certiorari in Lopez v. Gonzales, No. 05-547 (U.S. April 3, 2006), in order to resolve the circuit conflict.

- Eleventh Circuit Rejects Argument that Alien No Longer Has a Criminal Conviction Based on Grant of Motion for New Trial
  Ali v. Gonzales [11th Cir.]. On March 22, the Eleventh Circuit held that the alien's Georgia child molestation conviction was not vacated on the basis of procedural or substantive defect in the underlying proceedings. The Court determined that it was pure speculation for the alien to claim that the reason the court granted the new trial and nolle prosse motions was that alien was not adequately advised, prior to the guilty plea, as to the effect the plea would have on his immigration status, and the strongest inference was that the conviction's effect on the alien's immigration status was the principal motive for vacating the conviction.

- Seventh Circuit Criticizes Last-Minute Motion for Expert Telephonic Testimony
  Djedovic v. Gonzales [7th Cir.]. On March 23, the Seventh Circuit upheld the denial of a motion to permit an expert to testify by telephone, and the subsequent denial of asylum and withholding of removal. The Immigration Judge had denied the motion, filed two days before the merits hearing and in contravention of the local rule that such motions must be filed fourteen days before a hearing. The Court found that any claim of surprise by the aliens was improper, that the aliens were not prejudiced, and that they could not show past or future persecution.

- Eighth Circuit Determines that Omission that Goes to the Heart of Asylum Claim Raises Credibility Issue
  Cao v. Gonzales [8th Cir.]. On March 24, the Eighth Circuit upheld the denial of a derivative asylum claim by a Chinese male, who claimed his wife was forced to undergo forced sterilization. The Court examined separately the Immigration Judge's five reasons for finding the alien not credible. While noting that several of the Immigration Judge's reasons alone would be insufficient, the alien's omission in his affidavit of his wife's forced abortion and sterilization, taken together with his statements about China's family planning policy that were at odds with the State Department's Asylum Profile, were material and sufficient to uphold an adverse credibility determination.

- Second Circuit Reverses Holding that Alien's Testimony Was Sufficient to Determine that Alien Was Convicted Outside of United States
  Francis v. Gonzales [2d Cir.]. On March 27, the Second Circuit reversed the agency's holding that an alien was deportable based upon two alleged convictions in Jamaica prior to his application for admission. The charges of removability relied upon two pieces of evidence: (1) a colloquy between Francis and an Immigration Judge, which the government construed as the alien's admission of one of the Jamaican convictions; and (2) a faxed photocopy of the alien's "rap sheet" from a Jamaican police department. The Court held that no "rational factfinder" could conclude that this evidence, standing alone, constitutes clear, convincing, and unequivocal evidence that Francis had two "convictions," as that term was defined by applicable law in 1988 and 1990, and remanded for further proceedings.

- Eighth Circuit Concludes that It Lacks Jurisdiction to Review a Discretionary Denial of Good Faith Marriage Waiver
  Suvorov v. Gonzales [8th Cir.]. On March 28, the Eighth Circuit dismissed the petition for review, finding that it lacked jurisdiction under the REAL ID Act to review the Attorney General's discretionary denial of the alien's request for a waiver of the requirement that he and his former spouse file a joint petition to remove the conditional basis of petitioner's permanent residence status.

- On Reconsideration, Court Largely Approves Government's Response to Freedom of Information Act Request Concerning the Oklahoma City Bombing
  Trentadue v. Federal Bureau of Investigation [District of Utah]. On March 29, Judge Dale Kimball issued an order which, inter alia, granted in part and denied in part the government's motion for reconsideration of a May 5, 2005 order. Plaintiff brought this case seeking disclosure of documents related to the 1995 Oklahoma City bombing. He believes that his brother, Ken Trentadue (whose death in federal custody in 1996 spawned a series of lawsuits and investigations), was murdered by federal agents. In May 2005, Judge Kimball issued an order that found the government's search for documents to be unreasonable; concluded that the government had acted in bad faith; and required the government: (1) to disclose in unredacted form documents containing information about confidential informants; (2) to produce a document not responsive to plaintiffs' FOIA request; and (3) to conduct a manual search of several files, including the entire Oklahoma City bombing investigative file. The government moved for reconsideration of that order, and Judge Kimball has largely agreed with the government's positions. Although he has refused to reconsider his finding on the reasonableness of the government's original search, he was mostly satisfied by an additional computer search and concluded, inter alia, that the government did not act in bad faith, and that the government need not disclose information about confidential informants, produce non-responsive documents, or manually search the investigative file. He ordered only two limited, additional computer searches, as well as the disclosure of certain information gleaned from newspaper articles. In addition, while Judge Kimball's March 29 order appeared to suggest that documents he reviewed in camera lent some credence to plaintiff's theory that the government had an "undercover operative in with Timothy McVeigh," he issued an amended order on March 30 to remove any such suggestion. The case is being handled jointly by the United States Attorney's Office in Salt Lake City and the Civil Division's Federal Programs Branch.

- D.C. Circuit Affirms Denial of Class Certification in Suit by Hispanic Farmers Alleging Systemic Credit Discrimination by the Department of Agriculture
  Garcia v. Johanns [United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit; United Stated District Court for the District of Columbia]. On March 31, in a unanimous published decision, the D.C. Circuit (Henderson, Sentelle, Edwards) held that the district court did not abuse its discretion by declining to certify a class action to adjudicate credit discrimination claims brought by Hispanic farmers alleging systemic discrimination by the United States Department of Agriculture. Because plaintiffs' individual allegations of credit discrimination involved a variety of different credit and benefit programs carried out by different local officials in over 2,700 different geographic locations at different times over a period of nearly two decades, the district court concluded that plaintiffs could not satisfy the commonality requirement of Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 23(a)(2), and the court of appeals has now affirmed on this basis without reaching the district court's alternative holding that plaintiffs also failed to satisfy the prerequisites for class certification under Rule 23(b). On interlocutory review under 28 U.S.C. 1292(b), the court of appeals also affirmed the dismissal of plaintiffs' claim that the United States Department of Agriculture "failed to investigate" complaints of credit discrimination, holding that such claims were not actionable as "credit transactions" under the Equal Credit Opportunity Act. Although the court declined to issue an interlocutory ruling on the independent question whether such a claim might be actionable under the Administrative Procedure Act, the court left in place the district court's dismissal of that claim on the ground that the Equal Credit Opportunity Act provides an adequate alternative remedy precluding review under Section 704 of the Administrative Procedure Act.

- Supreme Court Grants* Certiorari *to Resolve Circuit Conflict on "Hypothetical Federal Felony Rule"
  Lopez v. Gonzales [U.S.]. On April 3, the Supreme Court granted an alien's petition for certiorari, in which the government had acquiesced. (Lopez v. Gonzales, 417 F.3d 934 (8th Cir. 2005), petition for certiorari granted, 74 U.S.L.W. 3289 (U.S. April 3, 2006) (No. 05-547)). The Eighth Circuit held below that an alien's felony drug possession offense under state law was a "drug trafficking offense," and hence an aggravated felony, even though the crime would be not punishable as a felony under the federal Controlled Substances Act. The government acquiesced in the alien's petition for certiorari in order to resolve a circuit conflict on this issue.

- Ninth Circuit Holds that Third Degree Rape Is an Aggravated Felony
  Rivas-Gomez v. Gonzales [9th Cir.]. On April 3, the Ninth Circuit denied the alien's petition for review in part. The Court concluded that the alien's conviction for third degree rape constituted an aggravated felony, because the terms of the state criminal statute fit within the ordinary meaning of the word "rape." The Court also concluded that the Attorney General's decision in Matter of Jean that established a heightened standard for a discretionary waiver of criminal bars to adjustment of status of refugees was not ultra vires of the INA. However, the Court granted the petition in part and remanded because the Immigration Judge applied the Matter of Jean standard without first determining whether the alien in this case had been convicted of a violent crime.

- Defendant Pleads Guilty to Conspiracy to Commit Wire Fraud
  United States v. Ronald Sloan [Southern District of Florida] (Judge Altonaga). On April 4, Ronald Sloan pled guilty to conspiracy to commit wire fraud. Sloan admitted that he made material misrepresentations to potential investors to induce them to invest money in a supposed mobile check cashing business. Sloan admitted that he misrepresented that CheckMate Financial, Inc., had a mobile unit cashing checks in Florida, when in fact, CheckMate Financial did not have such a unit in operation. The defendant participated in a conspiracy that induced more than two million dollars in investments. Five remaining co-defendants are scheduled for trial on August 1.

- Colorado Man Charged in Odometer Fraud Scheme

United States v. Gary Lee Sutton [District of Colorado] (Judge Nottingham). On April 4, a Denver grand jury charged Gary Lee Sutton of Colorado in connection with an alleged long-running odometer fraud scheme. The 22-count indictment includes two counts of mail fraud, ten counts of odometer tampering, and ten counts of making false odometer statements. The indictment alleges that Sutton purchased high-mileage vehicles at auction in the Denver area, caused the odometers to be rolled back to false, low mileages, fraudulently obtained false Colorado or Arizona titles, then sold the vehicles to used car dealers in Colorado and elsewhere.

- United States Is Awarded Approximately $3.6 Million in Customs Duties and Interest From a Chinese Importer
  United States v. Pan Pacific Textile Group, et al., (Court of International Trade) [Senior Judge Goldberg]. On April 5, 2006, the court awarded the United States $1,844,284, as well as interest in the amount of $1,791,115, from an importer of tracksuits from China, Thomas Man Chung Tao. The judgment compensates for losses stemming from Mr. Tao's importation of merchandise by means of falsified entry documents prepared by Mr. Tao's broker. This decision follows a previous decision, United States v. Pan Pacific Textile Group, Inc., 395 F. Supp. 2d 1244 (CIT 2005), in which the court held that, in actions brought pursuant to 19 U.S.C. § 1592, the principles of agency may be applied to establish an importer's liability for actions of a customs broker.

- Customs Is Denied Authority to Make "Byrd Distributions" of Funds Collected From NAFTA Countries
  Canadian Lumber Trade Alliance v. United States, Consol. (Court of International Trade) [Judge Pogue]. On April 7, the court granted our motion to dismiss, in part and granted plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment, in part. Here, Canada and private groups representing the Canadian lumber, wheat, and magnesium industries challenge the application of the Continued Dumping and Subsidy Offset Act ("Byrd Amendment"), 19 U.S.C. § 1675c, to duties collected upon imports from Canada as a violation of the NAFTA Implementation Act, 19 U.S.C. § 3438. The court dismissed Canada's claim because "it has already elected a remedy for this breach of its contractual obligations by pursuing, and winning, its claim before the [World Trade Organization], and by receiving compensation in accordance with the WTO decision." Despite expert testimony to the contrary, the court denied our motion to dismiss the private plaintiffs for lack of standing, concluding that subsidizing "a direct competitor may be sufficient to cause increased competition and therefore 'a concrete and particularized injury' that is 'actual or imminent.'" With respect to the merits, the court held that, because 19 U.S.C. § 3438 specifies that amendments to title VII of the Tariff Act of 1930 shall apply to "goods" from a NAFTA country only to the extent specified in the amendment, "the Commissioner has no authority either under an Act of Congress or under the Constitution to make the distributions at issue here."

U.S. authenticates Abu Ghraib photos

April 11, 2006

WASHINGTON – Nearly two years after graphic photographs of detainee abuse at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq were published worldwide, the U.S. government Monday for the first time authenticated 74 of the images as being part of the original compact disc that was turned over to Army investigators in January 2004.

Responding to a federal court order as part of a Freedom of Information Act lawsuit filed by the American Civil Liberties Union in New York, Justice Department lawyers wrote in court papers that the previously published images "are identical" to those that investigators have used to look into abuse at the prison.

Included among the images are such photos as Pvt. Lynndie England holding a leash attached to a naked detainee's neck, a detainee with female underwear placed on his head, detainees shackled to cell doors and beds in painful positions, and others piled in a naked pyramid. The iconic photograph of a detainee standing on a cardboard box, cloaked and hooded with wires coming from his hands, is also among the pictures.

The government, however, did not authenticate numerous photographs of soldiers using dogs to intimidate detainees, though military prosecutors have used such images in open court while pursuing cases against the soldiers.

Many of the photos, or representative samples of them, have been published in The Washington Post and on washingtonpost.com over the past two years. Salon.com, an Internet magazine, recently published the photographs on its Web site after obtaining what appeared to be the Army's compilation of abuse photos used to prosecute low-ranking soldiers. The government also authenticated three short video clips. The original disc was given to Army investigators by a soldier concerned by the abuse that he saw in photos.

Avoiding an actual government release of the images, Justice Department lawyers instead authenticated photographs that were already up on the Salon Web site, using court papers to refer to the images by number. ACLU lawyers were also provided with one additional photograph – which appears to be two detainees with their arms around each other and their faces edited out of the image – and the government declined to provide an additional 29 photographs that ACLU lawyers said they are going to fight to see.

None of the photographs the government authenticated indicates any unknown instances of abuse. Hundreds of other photos – seized from soldiers' computers in Iraq – appear to show abuse but have not been authenticated by U.S. officials.

"Our aim was to get this information into the public domain, and the government's attempts at withholding this information have proved futile," said Amrit Singh, an ACLU lawyer pursuing the lawsuit. "This is a victory for us because information to which the public is entitled has been released into the public domain. The government has fought this tooth and nail."

Defense Department officials, including top generals, have opposed releasing the images, arguing that they could set off major unrest in Muslim nations. The images a federal judge in New York ordered the government to release, it turns out, largely were the same images that already have been published.

Government wiretapping, Google crackdown among Muzzle winners

April 11, 2006

RICHMOND, Va. -- President Bush and the Justice Department are among the winners of the 2006 Jefferson Muzzle awards, given by a free-speech group to those it considers the most egregious First Amendment violators in the past year.

Bush led the list, compiled by the Thomas Jefferson Center for the Protection of Free Expression, for authorizing the National Security Agency to tap the phones of U.S. citizens who make calls overseas. The wiretaps were conducted without authorization from a federal court. The White House defended the warrantless wiretapping program as necessary to fight terrorism.

The Justice Department earned a Muzzle for demanding that Google turn over thousands of Internet records, prompting concerns that more invasive requests could follow if the government prevails. "If individuals are fearful that their communications will be intercepted by the government, such fears are likely to chill their speech," the Jefferson center said.

Other winners of the 15th annual awards include the Department of Homeland Security for barring an air marshal from expressing concerns about public safety; the Yelm, Wash., City Council for banning the words "Wal-Mart" and "big-box stores" at public hearings; and students at the University of Connecticut who heckled conservative columnist Ann Coulter.

The center, based in Charlottesville, Va., awards the Muzzles each year to mark the April 13 birthday of Thomas Jefferson, the third president and a First Amendment advocate.

As in the past, this year's winners reflect concern about "the overextension of government authority into areas that clearly affect our lives and chill and inhibit our ability to express views," center director Robert M. O'Neil told The Associated Press.

Since The New York Times disclosed the surveillance program's existence in December, it has become the target of harsh criticism, several lawsuits and a congressional investigation. John W. Dean, who was Richard Nixon's White House counsel, remarked that the domestic spying exceeds the wrongdoing that toppled his former boss.

In the Google case, the Justice Department demanded search records to buttress its defense of a law aimed at protecting children from Internet pornography. Google resisted turning over any information because of user privacy and trade secret concerns. Other Internet providers -- including AOL, Yahoo and MSN -- complied with the government's demand.

"Google appears to be the only one that drew a line in the sand," O'Neil said. "We commend their insistence that aggregate data could end up identifying a particular subscriber."

The Department of Homeland Security won its Muzzle for taking air marshal Frank Terreri off flight duty after he e-mailed colleagues expressing concerns about air-security risks. The federal policy curbing such activity was modified, and Terreri was allowed back on duty. But he sued, contending the department's rules still restrict employees' right to free speech.

In Yelm, Wash., the city council banned discussion of a plan by Wal-Mart to build a super center after many opponents sought to express their views. When that didn't squelch opposition, the council voted in June to prohibit citizens from using the terms "Wal-Mart" or "big-box stores" at public meetings.

Hecklers at the University of Connecticut earned a Muzzle for drowning out Coulter's speech in December. People have a right to express their disagreement with a speaker, the free-expression center said, but preventing fellow audience members from hearing the message is contrary to the First Amendment's spirit.

The Kansas City Star

‘Under God’ in pledge is under attack again

April 11, 2006

KANSAS CITY, MO. - The children in Shauna Hammett’s kindergarten class faced a small American flag hanging from a wall at Pawnee Elementary School in Overland Park, Kan., one recent Monday morning.

Led by a child’s voice over the loudspeaker, they recited the Pledge of Allegiance.

But if California atheist Michael Newdow gets his way, the Pledge of Allegiance no longer would include the phrase "under God." Newdow is pursuing another court case to remove those words. He formerly sued as a parent but now is representing other parents as an attorney.

The 9th Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco has set dates this spring and summer for briefs to be filed in the case. The same court ruled in 2002 that "under God" in the pledge is unconstitutional.

No matter what the court decides this time, it is almost certain the case will be appealed again to the U.S.

Supreme Court, which dismissed the previous suit on procedural grounds. That dismissal left the core issue of the pledge's constitutionality unsettled.

Pawnee Principal Mark Kelly isn't worried about all of that. "I think it's a California thing," he said of the court fight, confident the pledge will remain intact.

When Newdow sued again last year, a senior judge of the Eastern District of California ruled in his favor, ordering the Rio Linda School District not to lead students in reciting the pledge.

But he stayed his order pending appeals in the case.

Why did Newdow sue again? "I can answer that in one word: equality," he said in a phone interview. "This is not a case of people who believe or don't believe in God but in people who believe in equality."

The Constitution says government should treat people equally, Newdow said, insisting it is unequal treatment of atheists to have "under God" in the pledge and "in God we trust" on money. He is suing to get that off, too. That case, filed in November, still is in federal court in California.

"Government isn't supposed to be in the religion business at all," he said.

Worried that courts may rule against "under God," U.S. Rep. Todd Akin, a Missouri Republican, is sponsoring the proposed Pledge Protection Act, which already has nearly 200 co-sponsors.

"The words 'under God' are not just there for window dressing," Akin said in a phone interview, "but they address a central aspect of what America is all about: We believe there is a God, even though we don't agree on exactly what his name is.

"God grants basic rights to people and government's job is to protect those rights. That's why that phrase in our pledge is in need of defense."

Supporters hope Congress will pass it by late summer. They say the issue is not just the two words Congress added to the pledge in 1954 but, also is about what they see as too much power for the federal courts – power they hope to curb.

SUBJECT: Establishment of the Anti-Methamphetamine Coordination Committee

To ensure the most effective coordination of the anti-methamphetamine efforts and initiatives by the Department of Justice I am establishing an Anti-Methamphetamine Coordination Committee. I have appointed Assistant Attorney General Rachel Brand and Associate Deputy Attorney General Stuart Nash to serve as co-chairs.

While I may appoint additional members in the future, initially the Committee will include the heads of the following components or their designees: Office of the Associate Attorney General; Criminal Division; Office of Justice Programs; Office of Legislative Affairs;

Environment and Natural Resources Division; Drug Enforcement Administration; Federal Bureau of Investigations; Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives; Bureau of Prisons; Executive Office for United States Attorneys; Office of Tribal Justice; Office of Community Oriented Policing Services; Office of Public Affairs; Office of Intergovernmental and Public Liaison; and the United States Marshals Service. To represent the U.S. Attorneys' Offices, I have appointed McGregor Scott, United States Attorney for the Eastern District of California, to serve on the Committee.

It is my expectation that the members will provide the Committee with regular notice of activities related to the Department's Methamphetamine Strategic Initiatives in order to promote coordinated efforts. I look forward to receiving the Committee's recommendations on all matters relating to the Department's anti-methamphetamine activities including, but not limited to, the following:

- implementing and sustaining the Department's Methamphetamine Strategic Initiatives;
- policy;
- budget (to include all budget items of all components relating to any anti-meth activities);
- resource and grant allocations; and
- training and coordination with state and local law enforcement.

I have asked the co-chairs to convene and preside at Committee meetings, determine the Committee's agenda and establish subcommittees of the Committee. I expect the Committee to meet at least four times annually.

METHAMPHETAMINE INITIATIVES for the Department of Justice

Executive Summary

The Department of Justice is working with federal, state, and local law enforcement and our international partners to combat methamphetamine production capabilities and the trafficking and abuse of methamphetamine that plagues our Nation. Addressing the illegal distribution of methamphetamine is the Department's top drug enforcement priority.

To achieve a significant reduction in methamphetamine distribution and use, the Department will:

Establish the Anti-Methamphetamine Coordination Committee

- the Committee will oversee the implementation of the Department Initiatives and ensure the most effective coordination of Department anti-methamphetamine efforts.

Decrease Methamphetamine Production

- increase our cooperation with Mexican law enforcement authorities to halt the spread of this deadly and addictive drug and disrupt and dismantle the trafficking organizations responsible; and

- seek the cooperation of law enforcement authorities in countries that are a source of precursor chemicals in order to cut off the international supply of precursor chemicals to methamphetamine producers.

Enhance Anti-Methamphetamine Trafficking Capabilities

- assist state and local authorities with training, cleanup, and enforcement initiatives;

- enhance intelligence gathering capabilities through the OCDETF Fusion Center and the El Paso Intelligence Center; and

Maximize Department Resources in the Area of Prevention and Education

- coordinate efforts of DOJ components to assure that available resources for training, prevention, intervention, and treatment efforts are deployed efficiently and in a manner that serves overarching policy goals.

PRIORITY THREE: DRUG ENFORCEMENT

Strategic Objectives and Initiatives:

I. Establish the Anti-Methamphetamine Coordination Committee

A. Ensure the most effective coordination of anti-meth efforts by the Department of Justice.

1. Participants: OLP, OLA, DEA, ATF, OTJ, BOP, NMCI, CRIM, ENRD, OJP, HIDTA, EOUSA, COPS, OPA, OIPL, FBI, USMS, OAAG.

2. Establish Clear Objectives:

   a. Implement 2006 Department's Meth Initiatives.
   b. Develop a monthly Meth Report for the Department.
   c. Prepare 2008 Budget for Meth.
   d. Coordinate Department policy and efforts with the 2006 Synthetic Drug Control Strategy.

3. Establish the International Enforcement Subgroup. (Other subgroups can be mentioned here).

4. Establish the Methamphetamine Trafficking Intelligence Group. (MTIG)

   a. In order to most effectively deploy federal drug enforcement resources to meet the evolving nature of the methamphetamine threat, it is essential that we have the best possible strategic intelligence on what the threat is, and where the drug traffickers are most vulnerable to attack.

   b. The Deputy Attorney General is therefore commissioning a Methamphetamine Trafficking Intelligence Group, under the supervision of the Anti-Methamphetamine Coordination Committee, to prepare, within the next 120 days, an up-to-date assessment of methamphetamine trafficking into, and within, the United States.

   c. Participants in this group will include the Intelligence Section of DEA, CIA's Counter-Narcotics Center, the National Drug Intelligence Center, and the OCDETF Fusion Center.

DOJ_NMG_0025887

d. MTIG members will undertake the following activities, in addition to others as it deems appropriate.

1. Direct NDIC to produce, in selected regions, methamphetamine-specific regional intelligence assessments to establish the current baseline threat and periodic (120-180 day) follow-up assessments.

2. Enhance the existing partnership between NDIC and CNC on methamphetamine-related, joint strategic intelligence projects, including: drug flows across the U.S.-Mexican border; U.S. gang connections with major Northern Mexico drug cartels; and methamphetamine production facilities in Mexico. CNC at CIA, devoted to other priorities, did not do an international drug threat assessment last year. We could look at satellite sensors for meth labs in remote areas, for example.

3. Create a technologies working group (TWG), co-chaired by NDIC and DEA, to examine the feasibility of employing newly emerging technologies to identify, monitor, and intercept foreign shipments of precursor chemical diverted from appropriate commercial distribution channels.

II. Decrease Methamphetamine Production

A. Enhance international cooperation to decrease illegal importation of methamphetamine and chemicals.

B. Build Mexican capacity to tackle its methamphetamine and chemical problem.

1. Full clandestine lab training by DEA Quantico for Mexican counterparts. (March 2006)

2. Offer basic identification, interdiction, and clan lab training seminars to state and local police agencies in key Mexican states on an ongoing basis. (NAS-funded,40-50 per class, about 2 per month, coordinated by Mexican nationals using U.S. instructors – March-December 2006)

3. Offer interdiction training opportunities including:

a. Share "best practices" with Mexican law enforcement on how to interdict chemicals by land, sea, border and highway. (August/September 2006)

b. Operation Jetway training in airport interdiction -- offer classes to Mexican law enforcement assigned to the Mexico

DOJ_NMG_0025888

City Airport to be followed by several other identical training at DEA's various resident offices in Mexico (e.g. Guadalajara, Tijuana, Monterrey, etc.) (late February 2006).

4. One week chemical identification class to Mexican FDA-type groups that have jurisdiction over precursor chemicals and pharmaceutical drugs. (April, tentative)

5. Offer NDIC document exploitation support and training to Mexican law enforcement to assist them in identifying and building prosecutable cases against precursor chemical suppliers. Mike Walther advises that Utah Nat'l Guard can serve as translators.

6. Support Mexican outreach efforts, including –

   a. Educating "first responders" (e.g., fire, ambulance, etc.); and

   b. Raising public awareness of the dangers of meth labs and destructive nature of the drug.

7. Provide material assistance to Mexico, including surplus clan lab trucks and safety and testing equipment.

C. Convene Principals meeting: Attorneys General of the U.S. and Mexico to meet during the National Methamphetamine & Chemicals Initiative Conference. (May 2006)

D. Partnership with Precursor Source Countries.

1. Convene Hong Kong Conference to monitor flow and identify suspect shipments of ephedrine and pseudoephedrine; ask precursor source countries to share historical and current data on production and distribution through law enforcement channels. (February 2006) COMPLETED (partial success – resolution makes info sharing voluntary and references national laws)

2. Petition Commission on Narcotics Drugs in Vienna.
The United States will seek a resolution by all nations that are signatories to the various UN drug and precursor conventions to provide and share information relating to their annual requirements for key meth precursors. (March 2006) COMPLETED

3. Join with the State Department and the White House to raise the awareness and profile of the problem of meth production and the largely unregulated flow of chemicals that permits it in international contacts. The Europeans and perhaps China need to put a shared interest in alleviating the problems of meth production.

E. Monitor and ensure enforcement of the key methamphetamine precursor provisions in the Combat Meth Act.

DOJ_NMG_0025889

1. Retail sales limited to 3.6 grams;

2. Behind the counter and related provisions; and,

3. Spot market control.

F. Support State and Local Law Enforcement.

1. Promote groundbreaking for Clan Lab Training Center at Quantico in Spring 2006.

2. Link NDIC document exploitation teams with DEA, State and local law enforcement to conduct surge operations in regional methamphetamine "hot spots" to disrupt trafficker activity and build a more comprehensive strategic intelligence mosaic.
Comment: The idea here is that, for example, in a 10-day surge in Okla, NDIC or post-highway seizure, NDIC can analyze phones, pocket trash, etc. (We could ask John Richter, one of the U.S. Attorneys there, how this went.)

3. Travel to states to promote the Combat Meth Act provisions and encourage federal, state, and local partnership in the fight against methamphetamine. (GA, MO)

III.___Enhance Anti-Methamphetamine Trafficking Capabilities

A. Partner with Mexican counterparts to build cases against distribution groups.

1. Encourage agents, investigators, and prosecutors to engage in bilateral investigations and prosecutions working with trusted Mexican counterparts to prosecute key members of methamphetamine distribution organizations.

2. Post a NDDS attorney in Mexico City to work with Mexican counterparts to develop meth chemical cases in both countries.

3. Designate a dedicated NDDS meth/chemicals prosecutor.

4. Support vetted, inter-agency task forces in Mexico dedicated to methamphetamine / chemical investigations. (Initiative floated by ONDCP Director and to be announced by DEA – above-noted attorneys could support)

B. Intensify domestic enforcement efforts against methamphetamine traffickers.

1. Continue the redirection of DEA Mobile Enforcement Teams (METs) to prioritize the investigation of methamphetamine crimes, coordinating with DEA's Clandestine Lab Enforcement Teams where necessary.

2. Expand the focus of DEA's existing Clan Lab Enforcement Teams, comprised of agents and task force officers, to enhance efforts in areas particularly hard hit by meth in order to identify meth targets or help with ongoing investigations.

3. Enhance the use of DEA's chemical importer inspection teams that can be quickly deployed to perform on-site inspections of DEA registered importers if information is developed that indicates possible diversion at importer facilities.

4. Encourage U.S. Attorneys to grant high priority to the prosecution of methamphetamine "cooks" and repeat offenders in areas where methamphetamine is a problem, even if the cooks are not large-scale.

5. Seek a new mandatory minimum sentence or, alternatively, a new sentencing guideline to establish a federal sentencing floor of approximately 3 to 4 years for any meth lab operator.

6. Consider amendments to the CSA to reach international chemical trafficking to third countries where meth is destined for the U.S.

7. Promote the OCDETF Fusion Center. Commit one section of the OCDETF Fusion Center to target drug trafficking activities along the Southwest Border, with specific direction to identify and target CPOT-level traffickers in methamphetamine and precursor chemicals.

8. Develop a partnership between EPIC and the OCDETF Fusion Center in order to include EPIC's vast databases and analytical capabilities concerning the movement of drugs and other contraband, as well as the organizations that control them, across the Southwest Border.

9. Suspicious Activity Reports (SAR): Encourage United States Attorney's Offices to establish Suspicious Activity Report Review Teams.

10. Increase Prosecutor and LEA Training. (per National Synthetic Drug Action Plan (Oct. 2004)

C. The Trifecta: Guns - Gangs - Drugs

1. Analyze Nexus between Guns - Gangs - Drugs.
2. Breakout Group Discussion at the PSN Conference.
3.. Coordinate with Gang groups to address Meth and Gangs.

IV. Demand Reduction Strategies and the 2008 Budget

A. Coordinate efforts of DOJ components to ensure that available resources are deployed efficiently.

B. Identify methamphetamine user demographics to ensure that the Department's efforts are appropriately focused.

DOJ_NMG_0025891

C. Educate and assist those who come into contact with meth users and meth cooks.

D. Partner with industry and the private sector as a force multiplier in education and prevention efforts.

E. Continue to support drug endangered children programs.

Thanks. Any chance I could be on the distribution list for these clips?
No worries if you limit distribution to (a) DOJ employees and (b) cool people like Jenny, since I am neither.

U.S. authenticates Abu Ghraib photos

April 11, 2006

WASHINGTON - Nearly two years after graphic photographs of detainee abuse at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq were published worldwide, the U.S. government Monday for the first time authenticated 74 of the images as being part of the original compact disc that was turned over to Army investigators in January 2004.

Responding to a federal court order as part of a Freedom of Information Act lawsuit filed by the American Civil Liberties Union in New York, Justice Department lawyers wrote in court papers that the previously published images "are identical" to those that investigators have used to look into abuse at the prison.

Included among the images are such photos as Pvt. Lynndie England holding a leash attached to a naked detainee's neck, a detainee with female underwear placed on his head, detainees shackled to cell doors and beds in painful positions, and others piled in a naked pyramid. The iconic photograph of a detainee standing on a cardboard box, cloaked and hooded with wires coming from his hands, is also among the pictures.

The government, however, did not authenticate numerous photographs of soldiers using dogs to intimidate detainees, though military prosecutors have used such images in open court while pursuing cases against the soldiers.

Many of the photos, or representative samples of them, have been published in The Washington Post and on washingtonpost.com over the past two years. Salon.com, an Internet magazine, recently published the photographs on its Web site after obtaining what appeared to be the Army's compilation of abuse photos used to prosecute low-ranking soldiers. The government also authenticated three short video clips. The original disc was given to Army investigators by a soldier concerned by the abuse that he saw in photos.

Avoiding an actual government release of the images, Justice Department lawyers instead authenticated photographs that were already up on the Salon Web site, using court papers to refer to the images by number.
ACLU lawyers were also provided with one additional photograph - which appears to be two detainees with their arms around each other and their faces edited out of the image - and the government declined to provide an additional 29 photographs that ACLU lawyers said they are going to fight to see.

None of the photographs the government authenticated indicates any unknown instances of abuse. Hundreds of other photos - seized from soldiers' computers in Iraq - appear to show abuse but have not been authenticated by U.S. officials.

"Our aim was to get this information into the public domain, and the government's attempts at withholding this information have proved futile," said Amrit Singh, an ACLU lawyer pursuing the lawsuit. "This is a victory for us because information to which the public is entitled has been released into the public domain. The government has fought this tooth and nail."

Defense Department officials, including top generals, have opposed releasing the images, arguing that they could set off major unrest in Muslim nations. The images a federal judge in New York ordered the government to release, it turns out, largely were the same images that already have been published.

Government wiretapping, Google crackdown among Muzzle winners

April 11, 2006

RICHMOND, Va. -- President Bush and the Justice Department are among the winners of the 2006 Jefferson Muzzle awards, given by a free-speech group to those it considers the most egregious First Amendment violators in the past year.

Bush led the list, compiled by the Thomas Jefferson Center for the Protection of Free Expression, for authorizing the National Security Agency to tap the phones of U.S. citizens who make calls overseas. The wiretaps were conducted without authorization from a federal court. The White House defended the warrantless wiretapping program as necessary to fight terrorism.

The Justice Department earned a Muzzle for demanding that Google turn over thousands of Internet records, prompting concerns that more invasive requests could follow if the government prevails.

"If individuals are fearful that their communications will be intercepted by the government, such fears are likely to chill their speech," the Jefferson center said.

Other winners of the 15th annual awards include the Department of Homeland Security for barring an air marshal from expressing concerns about public safety; the Yelm, Wash., City Council for banning the words "Wal-Mart" and "big-box stores" at public hearings; and students at the University of Connecticut who heckled conservative columnist Ann Coulter.

The center, based in Charlottesville, Va., awards the Muzzles each year to mark the April 13 birthday of Thomas Jefferson, the third president and a First Amendment advocate.

As in the past, this year's winners reflect concern about "the overextension of government authority into areas that clearly affect our lives and chill and inhibit our ability to express views," center director Robert M. O'Neil told The Associated Press.

Since The New York Times disclosed the surveillance program's existence in December, it has become the target of harsh criticism, several lawsuits and a congressional investigation. John W. Dean, who was Richard Nixon's White House counsel, remarked that the domestic spying exceeds the wrongdoing that toppled his former boss.

In the Google case, the Justice Department demanded search records to buttress its defense of a law aimed at protecting children from Internet pornography. Google resisted turning over any information because of user privacy and trade secret concerns. Other Internet providers -- including AOL, Yahoo and MSN -- complied with the government's demand.

"Google appears to be the only one that drew a line in the sand," O'Neil said. "We commend their insistence that aggregate data could end up identifying a particular subscriber."

The Department of Homeland Security won its Muzzle for taking air marshal Frank Terreri off flight duty after he e-mailed colleagues expressing concerns about air-security risks. The federal policy curbing such activity was modified, and Terreri was allowed back on duty. But he sued, contending the department's rules still restrict employees' right to free speech.

In Yelm, Wash., the city council banned discussion of a plan by Wal-Mart to build a super center after many opponents sought to express their views. When that didn't squelch opposition, the council voted in June to prohibit citizens from using the terms "Wal-Mart" or "big-box stores" at public meetings.

Hecklers at the University of Connecticut earned a Muzzle for drowning out Coulter's speech in December. People have a right to express their disagreement with a speaker, the free-expression center said, but preventing fellow audience members from hearing the message is contrary to the First Amendment's spirit.

'Under God' in pledge is under attack again

April 11, 2006

KANSAS CITY, MO. - The children in Shauna Hammett's kindergarten class faced a small American flag hanging from a wall at Pawnee Elementary School in Overland Park, Kan., one recent Monday morning.

Led by a child's voice over the loudspeaker, they recited the Pledge of Allegiance.

But if California atheist Michael Newdow gets his way, the Pledge of Allegiance no longer would include the phrase "under God." Newdow is pursuing another court case to remove those words. He formerly sued as a parent but now is representing other parents as an attorney.

The 9th Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco has set dates this spring and summer for briefs to be filed in the case. The same court ruled in 2002 that "under God" in the pledge is unconstitutional.

No matter what the court decides this time, it is almost certain the case will be appealed again to the U.S. Supreme Court, which dismissed the previous suit on procedural grounds. That dismissal left the core issue of the pledge's constitutionality unsettled.

Pawnee Principal Mark Kelly isn't worried about all of that. "I think it's a California thing," he said of the court fight, confident the pledge will remain intact.

When Newdow sued again last year, a senior judge of the Eastern District of California ruled in his favor, ordering the Rio Linda School District not to lead students in reciting the pledge.

But he stayed his order pending appeals in the case.

Why did Newdow sue again? "I can answer that in one word: equality," he said in a phone interview. "This is not a case of people who believe or don't believe in God but in people who believe in equality."

The Constitution says government should treat people equally, Newdow said, insisting it is unequal treatment of atheists to have "under God" in the pledge and "in God we trust" on money. He is suing to get that off, too. That case, filed in November, still is in federal court in California.

"Government isn't supposed to be in the religion business at all," he said.

Worried that courts may rule against "under God," U.S. Rep. Todd Akin, a Missouri Republican, is sponsoring the proposed Pledge Protection Act, which already has nearly 200 co-sponsors.

"The words 'under God' are not just there for window dressing," Akin said in a phone interview, "but they address a central aspect of what America is all about: We believe there is a God, even though we don't agree on exactly what his name is.

"God grants basic rights to people and government's job is to protect those rights. That's why that phrase in our pledge is in need of defense."

Supporters hope Congress will pass it by late summer. They say the issue is not just the two words Congress added to the pledge in 1954 but, also is about what they see as too much power for the federal courts - power they hope to curb.
